NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SECOND EDITION

8 Jud-Lyo

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco • Cleveland • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London • Munich

in association with

THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Second Edition

Project Editors

Thomas Carson, Joann Cerrito

Editorial

Erin Bealmear, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus

Permissions

Edna Hedblad, Shalice Shah-Caldwell

© 2003 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale. Gale is an imprint of The Gale Group, Inc., a division of Thomson Learning, Inc.

Gale and Design $^{\scriptscriptstyle{\text{TM}}}$ and Thomson Learning $^{\scriptscriptstyle{\text{TM}}}$ are trademarks used herein under license.

For more information, contact The Gale Group, Inc. 27500 Drake Rd. Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535 Or you can visit our Internet site at http://www.gale.com

Imaging and Multimedia

Randy Bassett, Dean Dauphinais, Robert Duncan, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, Lezlie Light, Dan Newell, David G. Oblender, Christine O'Bryan, Luke Rademacher, Pamela Reed

Product Design

Michelle DiMercurio

Data Capture

Civie Green

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, The Gale Group, Inc. does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. The Gale Group, Inc. accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

Manufacturing

Rhonda Williams

Indexing

Victoria Agee, Victoria Baker, Francine Cronshaw, Lynne Maday, Do Mi Stauber, Amy Suchowski

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia.—2nd ed.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 0-7876-4004-2
1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Catholic University of America.

BX841 .N44 2002 282' .03—dc21 2002000924

ISBN: 0-7876-4004-2 (set)	0-7876-4009-3 (v. 5)	0-7876-4014-x (v. 10)
0-7876-4005-0 (v. 1)	0-7876-4010-7 (v. 6)	0-7876-4015-8 (v. 11)
0-7876-4006-9 (v. 2)	0-7876-4011-5 (v. 7)	0-7876-4016-6 (v. 12)
0-7876-4007-7 (v. 3)	0-7876-4012-3 (v. 8)	0-7876-4017-4 (v. 13)
0-7876-4008-5 (v. 4)	0-7876-4013-1 (v. 9)	0-7876-4018-2 (v. 14)
		0-7876-4019-0 (v. 15)

Printed in the United States of America 10987654321

For The Catholic University of America Press

EDITORIAL STAFF

Executive Editor

Berard L. Marthaler, O.F.M.Conv., S.T.D., Ph.D.

Associate Editor

Gregory F. LaNave, Ph.D.

Assistant Editors

Jonathan Y. Tan, Ph.D. Richard E. McCarron, Ph.D.

Editorial Assistant

Denis J. Obermeyer

Director of The Catholic University of America Press

David J. McGonagle, Ph.D.

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

John Borelli, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Drew Christiansen, S.J., Ph.D., Senior Fellow, Woodstock Theological Center, Washington, D.C.

Anne M. Clifford, C.S.J., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Raymond F. Collins, M.A., S.T.D., Professor of New Testament, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Cyprian Davis, O.S.B., S.T.L., Ph.D., Professor of Church History, Saint Meinrad School of Theology, Saint Meinrad, Indiana Dennis M. Doyle, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of Dayton, Dayton, Ohio

Angelyn Dries, O.S.F., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Cardinal Stritch University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Arthur Espelage, O.F.M., J.C.D., Executive Coordinator, Canon Law Society of America, Washington, D.C.

Eugene J. Fisher, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

- Edward J. Furton, Ph.D., Editor-in-Chief, The National Catholic Bioethics Quarterly, Brighton, Massachusetts
- James F. Garneau, Ph.D., Academic Dean, The Pontifical College Josephinum, Columbus, Ohio
- J. A. Wayne Hellmann, O.F.M.Conv., Dr. Theol., Professor of Theological Studies, St. Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri
- Joseph T. Kelley, Ph.D., D.Min., Director of the Center for Augustinian Study, Merrimack College, North Andover, Massachusetts
- Judith M. Kubicki, C.S.S.F., Ph.D., Assistant Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, New York
 - William P. Loewe, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religion and Religious Education, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

- Rose M. McDermott, S.S.J., J.C.D., Associate Professor of Canon Law, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- R. Bruce Miller, M.S.L.S., Head, Theology/Philosophy, Canon Law Libraries, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Francis J. Moloney, S.D.B., S.T.L., S.S.L., D.Phil., Professor of Biblical Studies, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Katherine I. Rabenstein, B.S.F.S., Senior Credentialing Specialist, American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.
- Joel Rippinger, O.S.B., M.A., S.T.L., Subprior, Marmion Abbey, Aurora, Illinois

Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

Very Reverend David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D.

President
The Catholic University of America

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his storeroom of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research.
Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Interfaith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, "to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace." The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church's teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophers contribute to a comprehensive survey of philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler's Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church's organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus "New Zealand" precedes "Newman, John Henry," and "Old Testament Literature" precedes "Oldcastle, Sir John." Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while "Henry VIII, King of England" precedes "Henry IV, King of France."

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: "Theology, Articles on," "Liturgy, Articles on," "Jesus Christ, Articles on," etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

Jude

1-2 Kgs

Jude

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows:
Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad.
3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.
•

•
к	ΛN	١k	C

200115
Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1-2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1–2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate)
Gal	Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Л	Joel
Jn	John

1–2 Kgs	Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1–2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Nm	Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms
1-2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs
Sir	Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1–2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1–2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1–2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah
Versions

1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and

Versions
Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version

Jonah

Joshua

1–3 Jn Jon

Jos

1, 2, and 3 John

ABBREVIATIONS

ERV	English Revised Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible	NT	New Testament
JB	Jerusalem Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	RSV	Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	RV	Revised Version
NAB	New American Bible	RVm	Revised Version, margin
NEB	New English Bible	Syr	Syriac
NIV	New International Version	Vulg	Vulgate

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYLOPEDIA

J

JUDAH

Fourth son of Jacob by Leah. Judah [Heb. yehûdâ, praised, object of praise, according to the popular etymology given in Gn 29.35; 49.8, but probably in origin a place name (Noth, 56)], prominent in the Joseph narratives, is the eponymous ancestor of the tribe inhabiting southern Palestine, whence came the family of David.

Patriarch. In the Joseph narratives Judah plays a prominent role; he intervened with his brothers and offered a compromise solution to save Joseph's life (Gn 37.26–28); he stood as surety for Benjamin before Jacob (Gn 43.8–10) and assumed the role of spokesman for the brothers in Egypt (Gn 44.16, 18–34). The narrative of his marital life and his five sons indirectly alludes to the presence of foreign strains in the tribe [Gn 38.1–30; (Bright, 123)].

Tribe. Numerically the largest of the Exodus tribes under Moses (Nm 1.26-27; 26.19-20), Judah, according to the Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS, traveled east of the meeting tent beside Issachar and Zabulon on the march from Sinai (Nm 2.3-9) and served as the vanguard of the Israelite march through Moab (Nm 10.14). The warlike tribe of Judah (cf. Gn 49.8-9) played a leading role in the conquest of Canaan and, together with Simeon and some lesser clans, gained possession of southern Palestine (Jgs 1.3–20). Bounded on the east by the Dead Sea, on the north by Benjamin and Dan, Judah's territory extended west to the Mediterranean and to the south along a line from the base of the Dead Sea to the Wadi of Egypt and thence to the coast (Jos 15.1-13; 19.2, 9). Unable to expel the Jebusites from Jerusalem and thwarted by the powerful Philistines, Judah was forced to settle in the relatively secure and agriculturally rich central hill country, achieving complete domination of this territory only during the reign of David (Jos 15.63; Jgs 1.1-20; 2 Sm 5.6-10). The Judaites eventually absorbed Simeon and other smaller, previously settled clans into the tribal organization. Their relatively inaccessible land isolated the Judaites somewhat from affairs of their kinsmen (Dt 33.7; De Vaux, 95). They do not figure in the Israelite coalition force that defeated Sisera's army (Jgs 5). They contributed but one judge, Othniel, to Israelite history (Jgs 3.7-11), though they led the Israelite attack on their Benjaminite kinsmen (Jgs 20.18). Harassment by the PHILIS-TINES, reflected in the SAMSON narratives (Jgs 15.9-15; cf. also Jgs 3.31; 10.7-9), was their constant preoccupation until David's rout of this foe. During Saul's reign, DAVID, a Judahite, gained many adherents among his tribesmen who, upon Saul's death (c. 1000 B.C.), supported him as king (1 Sm 18.16; 2 Sm 2.4). With the fall of Saul's house, David was acclaimed king by all Israel and became the center of Israelite unity (2 Sm 5.5). After the secession of the northern tribes in 922 B.C., as well as during the abortive revolts of Absalom (2 Sm 15.1-18.18) and Sheba (20.1-22), Judah remained faithful to David and his dynasty. Judah, in fact, along with most of Benjamin, became identified with the Southern Kingdom and bestowed on it its tribal name (1 Kgs 12.20). The parallel histories of the kingdoms depict a relationship of constant friction erupting periodically into civil war or tempered in time of common interests to uneasy alliance. Compared to the Northern Kingdom, Judah in size, wealth, and power was of less account. However, in a theological light Judah was important for two reasons: the permanence of the Davidic line, which, as prophetically presented in Jacob's Oracles (Gn 49.10) and confirmed to David (2 Sm 7.12-17), produced Israel's ideal king, the Messiah, and the relative purity of Judah's Yahwism fostered under Isaiah and his successors, which surviving Judah's fall and exile (587–538 B.C.), produced the religious climate for the advent of the Messiah.

Bibliography: G. A. BUTTRICK, ed. The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962), 2:1003–04. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), 1225–27. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 6, 20, 95–97. J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959). M. NOTH, The History of Israel, tr. P. R. ACKROYD (New York 1960). Y. AHARONI, "The Province List of Judah," Vetus Testamentum 9 (Leiden 1959) 225–246.

[R. BARRETT]

JUDAH HA-NASI

Head of Palestinian Jewry and codifier of the MISH-NAH; b. probably in Galilee, c. 135; d. Galilee, c. 220. Judah was the son of Simeon II ben Gamaliel II, who was the grandson of GAMALIEL (mentioned in Acts 5.34; 22.3), who was in turn the grandson of Hillel. As the patriarch or head of Palestinian Jewry, Judah received as a permanent epithet the title ha-Nasi (the Prince), originally given to the president of the Great Sanhedrin in Jerusalem. In the Mishnah he is referred to simply as Rabbi (the teacher par excellence), and in the GEMARAH he is often called Rabbenu (our teacher) or Rabbenu ha-kadosh (our saintly teacher). He was instructed in the HALAKAH of the Oral Law by the most famous rabbis of his time, but he summed up his experience as a student, and later as a teacher, in the words: "Much of the Law have I learned from my teachers, more from my colleagues, but most of all from my students" (Mak. 10a).

According to his contemporaries, humility and fear of sin were his dominant traits. Although he was very rich, he led a simple and unassuming life because he was convinced that "he who accepts the pleasures of this world is deprived of the pleasures of the world to come? [Avot de-Rabbi Natan 28, ed. S. Schechter (New York 1945) 85]. When he succeeded his father as leader of the Jews in Palestine, he established the seat of the patriarchate and the academy, first at Bet Shearim and later at Sepphoris. (Both of these places are within a ten mile radius of Nazareth.) He conducted the patriarchate with royal dignity, and his authority was recognized by the Romans as well as by the Jews. His tomb was discovered in one of the catacombs of Bet Shearim during the excavations made there in 1953 [Israel Exploration Journal 4 (1956) 88-107].

Rabbi Judah's greatest and lasting contribution to JU-DAISM was his compilation and codification of the Oral Law in the collection of legal sayings called the Mishnah. Other collected teachings of earlier rabbis had been attempted before his time, but his collection soon eclipsed these and became the sole authoritative expression of the Halakah. Until his time, the traditional interpretation of the Mosaic Law was handed down orally, and hence was known as the Oral Law as distinctive from the written Law of Moses. Judah's revolutionary procedure consisted of recording the Oral Law in writing (in Mishnaic Hebrew). The earlier transmitters of the Oral Law, the Tannaim (repeaters), belonged to different schools that held variant opinions. This resulted in uncertainty as to what was really binding, and the divergent opinions ascribed to the ancient sages could be accepted or rejected at will. Judah's main contribution lay in the judicious selections he made from the copious material at his disposal. Since the publication of his Mishnah at the end of the second or beginning of the third century, the primary pursuit of Jewish sages has been commenting on its contents.

See Also: TALMUD.

Bibliography: W. BACHER, The Jewish Encyclopedia. ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 7:333–33. D. J. BORNSTEIN, Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart. (Berlin 1928–34) 8:1023–35. L. LAZARUS, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia (New York 1939–44) 6: 229–230. K. SCHUBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 5:889. A. GUTTMANN, "The Patriarch Judah I: His Birth and Death," Hebrew Union College Annual 25 (1954) 239–261.

[M. J. STIASSNY]

JUDAISM

The term Judaism admits of various meanings. Rarely, it denotes the identity of an individual Jew (as, "He is aware of his Judaism") or an indeterminate bond among all Jews; occasionally, the whole of Jewry; more often, the manifold expression of Jewish history or culture; and commonly, the sum total of commandments, rites, traditions, and beliefs that make up the Jewish religion. Even in its religious signification, the term is not univocal. Taken broadly, it encompasses the life, worship, and faith of the Jewish people of all times, beginning with the Patriarchs and Prophets. More precisely, it refers to the Jewish religion as it developed after the Babylonian Exile. The latter meaning is the topic of this article. (On the older Israelite religion, see ISRAEL, 3.)

As Israel's postexilic way, Judaism has known diverse religious experiences, gone through several phases, and expressed itself through a number of currents. There is something unique about it. Fitting none of the usual categories, Judaism is a people religion: a religion limited to one people, and a people so tied to that religion as to exist for and through it. [The word people must not be taken here in a narrow sense. In post-Biblical no less than in Biblical times, Gentiles have sought refuge under the wings of the God of Israel (Ru 2.12). Not only individuals but also a whole people, such as the KHAZARS, have become part of Judaism.] True, not all Jews live by their traditions; still, religion is so woven into the texture of their history that they are tied together by a spiritual bond and not merely by blood.

Birth. Judaism, in the strict sense of the word, was born when, under the leadership of EZRA, the Israelites bound themselves to walk in the ways of God's Torah (Neh 10.29). Probably toward the end of the 5th century B.C. a caravan had brought Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem. There this priest and scribe began to teach the statutes and ordinances of Torah to those returned from captivity (Ezr 7.10). Thus the industrious scribe—student, knower, and expounder of the Law—took the place of the stormy prophet. As the rabbis have it, with the death of the last Prophets, the Holy Spirit departed from Israel; divine inspiration withdrew, but the men in Israel could still hear "a small voice [coming from above]" (bat qôl, literally "daughter of sound," i.e., echo; e.g., Sot. 48b). For fear that the Israelites would not remain constant in the service of the Lord, Ezra ordered them to expel their "foreign," i.e., pagan, wives. The presence of such women threatened faith in and worship of the one God. Ezra was convinced that, as God's "special possession" (Ex 19.5), Israel was bound to keep aloof from peoples and lands tainted by idolatry (Ezr ch. 9–10). See IDOLATRY (IN THE BIBLE).

Seminal Ideas. Ezra's reform was the starting point of a long development. Seminal forces, small at first and growing slowly, gave Judaism its special character.

God. Prior to the Exile, Israel's belief in the living God—the Lord of history intervening in Israel's life, the One before and above man yet close to him, the One far yet near—had frequently been couched in anthropomorphic language. See ANTHROPOMORPHISM (IN THE BIBLE). Without denying God's peerlessness, the anthropomorphisms of Scripture proclaimed Him as the God who loves, seeks, and cares. Postexilic generations, however, must have felt some embarrassment at language that seemed all too human. According to the TARGUMS, it was not God who "walked in the garden" (Gn 3.8) but the memrā, His word; it was the word, not God Himself, whom Moses called "a consuming fire" (Dt 4.24). By the 3d century B.C., the name YAHWEH was considered forbidden to human lips; ADONAI (My Lord) took its place. The Alexandrian Jewish translators of the Old Testament who produced the SEPTUAGINT simply wrote o Κύριος (the Lord). Other circumlocutions were "the Name," "Heaven," or "Power," all of which are echoed in the New Testament: "hallowed be thy name" (Mt 6.9), "the kingdom of heaven" (Matthew passim), "the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Power" (Mt 26.64).

No matter how deep the emphasis on God's transcendence may have been, Judaism would not be what it is if the intensely personal God had been turned into a remote deity. The later rabbis, too, stressed that God was unlike man, but at the same time they tried to express the warm relationship between God and Israel through concepts such as the SHEKINAH, His indwelling among creatures. The Shekinah was said to go with Israel into exile, to dwell among the people even in their uncleanness, and to weep at the sadness that followed Jerusalem's destruction (Meg. 29a; Yom. 56b; Lam. Rabbah 1.46). In this concept Judaism developed a counterpoise to the Christian message that God had come in the flesh to carry man's burden.

Breast Plate for Scroll of Law. (@Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

Israel. With the expulsion of pagan wives under Ezra, there began a growing, though at no time complete, isolation of the Jewish people from its neighbors. From then on, the Biblical belief that Israel was chosen for the sake of all the earth (Gn 12.3) and the noncanonical notion that the world was made for Israel's sake (Assumption of Moses 1.12) rivaled each other. Though the latter may suggest that the heavens and the earth were created for Israel's honor only, this and similar sayings must not be taken with unimaginative literalness. They are often no more than homiletic exaggerations. This one is not necessarily a sign of national vain glory; its underlying thought is rather that the material world is not an end in itself, that all things must serve the salvation of the just (cf. 2 Baruch 15.7)—an eminently Christian idea, too. Nonetheless, there is danger in such affirmations. Though Scripture never tires of proclaiming Israel's unmerited election (e.g., Dt 7.7; Ez 16.3-14), the assumption that it had proved its merit gained ascendancy in postexilic times. A Jewish legend (e.g., 'Avodah Zarah 2b) has it that Torah was accepted by the chosen people, but only after it had been offered to all the nations and had been rejected by them. (On the use of the term Torah without the definite article, see below.)

The Western Wall in Jerusalem, the last remains of the Second Temple of Herod. (©David H. Wells/CORBIS)

The terms pagan and sinner were frequently synonymous—a usage that prevailed even in early New Testament times. In his Pentecostal speech Peter reminded the men of Jerusalem that they had crucified Jesus 'through the hands of wicked men' (Acts 2.23). The wicked men ('men without the Law,' according to the Greek text) are Pilate and his soldiers, all unbelievers in the true God. When Scripture calls Israel God's very own, dearer than all other people (Ex 19.5), it did not pronounce it superior to the Gentiles. No doubt the religious and moral superiority of the Jewish people over the pagan world was real; still, to assert it was not altogether salutary.

"Turn to me and be saved," the Prophet had cried in Yahweh's name to all the ends of the earth (Is 45.22). But the prophetic word announced also a day of vengeance when God would crush the nations in His wrath [Is 63.4, 6; see DAY OF THE LORD (ESCHATOLOGY)]. This twofold attitude is heightened in Jewish APOCALYPTIC literature. One vision has it that all Gentiles will become just, worship the one God, and share in the future messianic blessings (e.g., 1 Enoch 10.21); another, that the Messiah will destroy the godless nations, the oppressors of Israel, with the word of His mouth (e.g., Psalms of Solomon 17.27). One would gravely misunderstand this dire prediction if he forgot that the bitterness spelled out here is common to all peoples trodden under foot.

Torah. Ezra's great work was to teach and expound the Torah. The Torah stands primarily for the Pentateuch, now and then for the entire Old Testament. In later literature, it embraces the whole tradition, written as well as unwritten. (Some scholars distinguish between "the Torah," the five books of Moses, and "Torah"—without the article—the whole body of law built on them by the rabbis, in other words, Biblical and Talmudic law.) A meaningful English rendering of Torah as found in the Bible is "revelation"; its literal sense is "instruction," "guidance." It is God's instruction on what He would have His creature do in order to be just in His eyes, His guidance to Israel on how to follow Him on the road to holiness. The core of this revelation, the Ten Commandments, is surrounded by other laws and norms, statutes, or decrees; "You shall" is their idiom. Since a large part of the Pentateuch is legal in character, Torah came to be understood as law. Such is the translation of the Septuagint and the understanding of later Jewish tradition.

Though not revealed till Sinai, the Law was considered a living being, identical with the wisdom that existed before time (Prv 8.22-31). Like wisdom, the Torah was the craftsman at God's side; it served Him as the plan according to which He created the world (Ab. 3.14; Gen. Rabbah 1. 1). The Law was perfect and immutable; yet it had to be interpreted, supplemented, and adapted to the exigencies of time. There evolved, then, alongside the written law, sometimes overshadowing it, the unwritten law, "the tradition of the ancients" (Mt 15.2). On the one hand, rules were mitigated so as to make the Law workable; on the other, an ever-higher "fence" was built around it (Ab. 1.1)—a protective wall, with stop signs and danger signals, definitions and directives-that, to forestall transgression, left little room for personal decision. Although for the devout the Law was life and joy, the many—those, e.g., whose livelihood depended on the land—found its demands impossible to carry out. As the number of precepts increased, it had to be studied, too, before it could be kept. Hence the unlettered were thought of as the ungodly (see Jn 7.49).

The Final Events. Though the postexilic period was marked by an inner withdrawal from other nations, the ever-widening emigration of Jews to many lands created a vast Jewish DIASPORA whose synagogues became, paradoxically enough, proselytizing centers among the Gentiles. Moreover, foreign invasion and domination, as well as encounter with the two great cultures of Persia and Greece, helped the flowering of certain Biblical seeds, particularly that of hope.

The Prophets had seen the past as herald of the future: the Exodus of old foretelling a new exodus, the reign of David, that of another David (e.g., Is ch. 35; Jer 23.5–6). As time went on, some in Israel looked for a new priest to bring blessing to the people or for a righteous leader who would himself be a source of righteousness. Many others dreamed of a mighty deliverer who would free them from pagan tyranny. Whereas the majority of the people expected a Warrior-Messiah, a scattered few longed for the Chosen One, hidden in God's presence since the beginning of the world and before it, who would soon come in the likeness of a man, yet bearing a face "full of graciousness, like one of the holy angels" (1 Enoch 46.1).

For a long time the glittering magic and morbid sensuousness pervading so much of pagan fantasy about the afterlife had kept Israel from a fuller understanding of the world and life to come. In the centuries preceding the coming of Jesus, however, the hope in a blessed immortality, the bodily resurrection of the just and their share in God's triumph and reign, erupted in many hearts (see RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD). Full force was given to the Isaian words: "Your dead shall live, their corpses rise; awake and sing, you who lie in the dust" (26.19).

First Christian Century. These trends did not spring up at the same time, nor were they all universally accepted. In fact, 1st-century Judaism was intensely diversified, full of unrest and strife.

Sadducees. At the center was official Judaism, the small but powerful party of the SADDUCEES. Made up of the leading priests, the notables, the influential and wealthy families, they were defenders of the status quo. Clinging to the letter of Scripture, they rejected doctrinal development as well as the oral tradition. Thus the world to come was of little interest to them; they even mocked the hope that the dead would rise (see Mk 12.18–19). But their spiritual tepidity did not hinder them from upholding a rigid and stern jurisprudence. In their self-reliance they thought of man as the captain of his soul, the architect of his fortune (see Josephus, Ant. 13.5.9). As they disdained the common people, so were they disdained in turn. Since the grandeur of the Temple was their life, they disappeared with it in A.D. 70.

Pharisees. Pitted against these men of birth were the men of ritual perfection, the PHARISEES, the successors to the HASIDAEANS, those "stout men in Israel" who, at the time of the Machabean uprising, were passionately devoted to the Law (1 Mc 2.42). As their name (perûšîm, separated ones) indicates, the Pharisees kept apart from the masses who would not or could not observe the many precepts regarding ritual purity. The pharisaic movement drew its strength from the hābûrôt, companies of likeminded men who encouraged one another in the exact fulfillment of the demands made on the pious Israelite: his food, his clothing, the very walls of his house; indeed, his entire life was under the regimen of the Law.

Despite the scrupulous attention the Pharisees gave to the Torah, they believed in a certain evolution of the Torah-bound life and tried to adjust the Law to changing circumstances. They were far from uniform in their interpretation. In the 1st century B.C. there were two great competing schools: the one of the unbending Shammai and the other of the more compassionate Hillel. When confronted, for example, with the authority of truth and its conflict with that sister of love, courtesy, in daily life, the two decided differently. The first would not permit wedding guests to call a homely bride pretty, whereas the latter held that every bride ought to be looked upon as beautiful and praised (Ket. 16b-17a). Their differences, mainly of a casuistic nature, were strong enough to produce the byword that "the Torah has become as two Torahs" (Sanh. 88b). In the end the camp of moderation prevailed over the more rigid school.

Most of the teachers and preachers, i.e., most of the men who determined the worship of the synagogues in the land, were Pharisees, a fact that explains the influence of the Pharisees on the people despite their aloofness. A saying attributed to the later Rabbi AKIBA BEN JOSEPH is almost a sum of their beliefs: "All is foreseen, yet free will is given; the world is judged by goodness but all [judgment] is according to the amount of work" (Ab. 3.22). God is sovereign, the Pharisees held, yet man is free. Man is to be judged after death; paradise, purgatory, or hell will then be his lot. In the end God's reign will appear when He will be all in all as the just rise to glory.

Many Pharisees served God faithfully, in genuine devotion, even with a gentle spirit (see Jn 3.1; Acts 5.34; 23.6). When the Gospels charge Pharisees with hypocrisy, this must be taken as prophetic speech, not as a scholarly appraisal of the entire movement, much less of every individual. The Talmud, too, distinguishes between the Pharisees moved by love of God and those driven, knowingly or unknowingly, by love of self (Sot. 22b). The faults castigated in the Gospels, e.g., those of equating things essential with nonessential or commandment with preference and even confusing one with the other (see Mt 23.16–18), are pitfalls that threaten the life of piety everywhere. Although Jesus and the early Church disagreed with the Pharisees on the function and the interpretation of the Law, they gave new weight and direction to other pharisaic beliefs.

Essenes. Whereas the Sadducees held the center of Judaism and the Pharisees struggled to seize it, the ES-SENES deliberately remained at its periphery. Without deciding which of the two is the legitimate heir, one can trace the beginnings of the Essenes, like those of the Pharisees, to the early Hasidaeans (1 Mc 2.42). For some scholars, the term Essenes is a synonym for members of the QUMRAN COMMUNITY; but probably it is a generic name for several kindred groups devoted to an ascetic life. With the monks of Qumran it was a life of obedience, poverty, and chastity; of common study, common worship, and common meals; of strictest submission to the Law, according to a rule. Though they allowed no traffic with the common people, whom they considered unclean and thus enemies of God; though they despised the Sadducees, particularly the high priestly clique, as a band of usurpers; and though they shunned the Pharisees as "preachers of falsehood" and "seekers after smooth things" (1QH 2.32), the radiance of their lives broke through the walls of their "cloister." For all the tremendous differences of some of their teachings from those of the infant Church, their influence upon the Church was considerable. Yet the community had a sudden end at the hands of Roman legionaries.

Zealots. Another peripheral movement, though a vocal and active one, was that of the ZEALOTS. Zeal for God, His law, and His glory (see Acts 22.3) has always been a distinctive mark of all Jewish piety. The zeal of the Zealots, however, was of a militant kind. Although the Pharisees eagerly awaited the collapse of the Roman Empire, the end of all godless men, and the coming of the messianic reign with its lasting peace, they did not consider it their task to hasten these events. On the contrary, the Zealots, an extreme wing split off from the main pharisaic body, held it their duty to intervene. "God alone is Lord" was their creed, and "Freedom!" was their battle cry. No one in Israel, they insisted, may obey an emperor who arrogates to himself the homage that is God's due.

The Zealots supported their conviction by violence. Some of them seem to have stabbed their opponents, particularly Jewish collaborators, to death in broad daylight. Because of their favored weapon, concealed in their robes, they were known as dagger men (σικάριοι). As "underground fighters," lawless rebels against the Roman order, they are called λησταί (robbers, bandits, revolutionists) both by the Jewish historian Flavius JOSE-PHUS (Bell. Jud. 2.253–254) and by the Evangelists (Jn 18.40; Mt 27.38, 44; see BARABBAS). Their wrathfulness was the ferment in the people's "holy war" against the Romans, whose last procurator, Gessius Florus, had plundered the Temple treasury, probably to make up a tax deficit. This uprising (A.D. 66-73) led to disaster; together with the later one of BAR KOKHBA (132-135), it cost the Jewish people the last vestige of political autonomy and cost Jerusalem its role as the spiritual center of all the Jews wherever they dwelt.

Opposition and Unity. There were other groups at the border of Jewish life, e.g., the penitential movements in the Jordan region, of which John the Baptist's was foremost. The Talmud speaks somewhat disparagingly of those who submerge themselves in water every morning (Ber. 22a). There are no exact statistics on the various movements. At the time of Christ, Palestine may have had about 1.5 million Jewish inhabitants, a small number compared to the estimated 4 or 4.5 million Jews already dispersed throughout the Roman Empire (seven percent of its total population). According to Josephus, who describes the major Jewish Sects, the number of Pharisees was 6,000, of the Essenes 4,000 (Ant. 13.5.9; 10.6; 17.2.4; 18.1.3–4; 20.9.1; Bell. Jud. 2.8.2–14). Although his figures cannot always be relied on, these estimates give at least an idea of the comparative strength of some of the leading movements. But they tell nothing of the extent, much less of the attitude of the people at large, the "country folk" ('ammê hā'āres). In the New Testament some Pharisees are quoted as saying of them: "This crowd, which does not know the Law, is accursed" (Jn 7.49). The opposition among the four major groups was no less fierce. Strangely enough, the Law that united them also separated them. Yet as many-layered and striferidden as Judaism was, it was held together by the common confession: "Hear O Israel! The Lord is our God, the Lord alone!" (Dt 6.4).

Rabbinical Judaism. Wishing to have no part in the suicidal revolt of A.D. 66, Jewish Christians retreated to Pella beyond the Jordan. When the Roman army beleaguered the Holy City, Jews in their despair turned on Jews, one group excelling the other in violence. Thousands upon thousands died of starvation and disease, were crucified, deported, or sold into slavery. The ancient estimates of those killed and captured vary from more than half a million to more than a million.

Victory of Pharisaism. One man, however, was able to turn this disaster into a triumph. Before the city fell, Rabbi JOHANAN BEN ZAKKAI had himself carried out in a coffin. He went to the Roman camp and obtained the permission of its commander, Vespasian, to open a school for the study of Torah in the coastal town of Jamnia. This daring move enabled Judaism to survive; or more exactly, it established Pharisaism, rather the school of Hillel, as the foundation of all future forms of Judaism.

Great Bet Din. Rabbi Johanan was joined by other rabbis. Under his presidency, the Great Bet Din (bet dîn, house of judgment), a sort of supreme court or council, continued some of the functions of the extinct Sanhedrin. In the course of time it fixed the calendar and the canon of Scripture, from which it rejected the so-called Apocrypha—books contained in the Septuagint, such as Sirach, Tobit, 1 and 2 Maccabees—as well as the Gospels and other "heretical" writings (see Moore, 1:186-187). The Great Bet Din had to tackle also the many problems arising from the fact that at least one third of Torah, the laws pertaining to Temple worship, could no longer be carried out. The groundwork was laid, therefore, for teachings such as these: study of the laws on sacrifice takes the place of the sacrifices themselves; God accepts the former as if the latter had been offered (see Pes. K 60b). Since the Temple was destroyed, prayer, "the service of the heart," acquired the atoning power that had resided in the institutions of old. "We have no prophet, no priest, no sacrifice, no sanctuary, no altar to help win forgiveness for us," R. Isaac mourned; "from the day the Temple was laid waste, nothing was left to us but prayer. Lord, hearken then, and forgive' (Midr. Teh. 5.7).

Under Johanan's successor, Gamaliel II, Jewish Christians were expelled from the Synagogue by an ingenious strategem. A curse on renegades, heretics, and Nazarenes (i.e., Christians) was introduced into the daily prayers: that they be without hope and stricken from the book of life. No follower of Christ could have repeated this imprecation without committing spiritual suicide.

Talmud. At the turn of the 1st Christian century, Rabbi JUDAH HA-NASI, then head of the Great Bet Din, gathered the oral traditions and probably had them put into writing. The compilation was named MISHNAH for the method applied, i.e., repetition; it contained the important halakic (legal) teachings (see HALAKAH) of the preceding generations of rabbis, the Tannaim, or traditioners. The Mishnah soon became the standard work of study and investigation in the academies of Palestine and Babylon. The men who commented on it, the Amoraim, or expositors, produced the GEMARAH, or completion. Both, Mishnah and Gemarah, make up the TALMUD, which is, therefore, basically halakic. Haggadic material, however (see HAGGADAH), i.e., spiritual and moral reflections, together with practical counsels, metaphysical speculations, historical narratives, legends, scientific observations, etc., appear in it as well. The Talmud was completed at the end of the 4th century in Galilee and a century later in Babylonia; hence the two versions, the Palestinian and the Babylonian Talmuds. The Talmud is not the only compilation of rabbinic thought. There are, e.g., collections of haggadic commentaries on the Biblical books, the Midrashim (see MIDRASHIC LITERATURE).

What makes the understanding of the Talmud difficult is that it is a code of laws, a case book, and a digest of discussions and disputes that went on among various rabbis; interspersed are reflections of every kind; its contents are at times as motley as a daily newspaper. Now and then the opinions recorded are dissimilar or even contradictory. Quite often, the rabbis consider a man ignorant of the Law unworthy of trust, unreliable as witness in a court, unfit to be an orphan's protector. Yet the compilers of the Talmud rejoice in telling of the power a simple man has in heaven. During a drought, Honi (1st century B.C.) drew a circle around himself and said to God, "I swear by Your great name that I will not budge from here until You have mercy upon Your children," and rain fell (Ta'an. 23a). Moreover, the Talmud engages in a great deal of casuistry, and all casuistry tends to be tortured; still, in admonishing its readers not to wrong another man through words, it calls moral demands that cannot be codified "things entrusted to the heart" (Bava Metzia 58b).

So great is the occasional contrast between rabbinical statements that, in one place, it can be said that the nations' charity is but sin since they practice it for no other reason than to boast; in another, that the Holy Spirit rests on a man, be he Gentile or Jew, according to his deeds (see Montefiore and Loewe, 562–563, 557). Many rabbinic sayings are, therefore, tentative or are located in a definite situation so that evaluation of rabbinic thought is a special science, indeed, an art. It is not only the variety of opinions recorded in the Talmud and other rabbinical literature that hamper their appreciation, but also the style—succinct, telegraphic, often bare to the bone makes the Talmud inaccessible without a guide. Such guidance was provided by the heads of the two leading rabbinic academies of Babylonia, titled Geonim, "illustrious ones." From the 6th to the 11th centuries their authority was supreme all over Babylonia-which in the meantime had become the center of all Jewry—and thus, for most of that time, in other countries as well. Yet at the very moment the rule of talmudic Judaism seemed unassailable, it was contested by the Karaites, schismatics who, in the 8th century, repudiated the entire rabbinic tradition.

Medieval Thinkers. One who took up the defense of rabbinic Judaism against the Karaites was the Egyptianborn SA'ADIA BEN JOSEPH (882–942), "the father of Jewish philosophy." In his main work, Beliefs and Opinions, he propounded the unity of revelation and reason. The new element in his thought is its debt to Moslem theology. Sa'adia thus ushers in a line of medieval thinkers whose thought is born of a meeting with Moslem and Christian theologies, Neoplatonism, or Aristotelianism. With AVICEBRON (IBN GABIROL), in the first half of the 11th century, the focal point of Jewish thought shifts to Spain. According to him all things emanate from God as the first principle, not by necessity but through His loving will. Avicebron's depth may be shown by the climactic stanza of one of his poems:

When all Thy face is dark, And Thy just angers rise, From Thee I turn to Thee And find love in Thine eyes.

The first to treat Jewish ethics systematically was Avicebron's contemporary IBN PAQŪDA. His Duties of the Heart became a guide to the inner life for untold numbers of Jews. Rather than defend Judaism, the poetphilosopher JUDAH ben Samuel ha-Levi (c. 1080–c. 1145) attempted to show its superiority over Christianity and ISLAM. Although he enjoyed the comforts of "the golden age of Spanish Jewry," he felt that the Jews were in exile and he dreamed of Zion. Jews, he held, bore the sufferings of the world; their restoration to the Holy Land would bring salvation to the entire earth. Yet he sang also: "Would I might behold His face within my heart!/ Mine eyes would never ask to look beyond."

The giant of Spanish-Jewish thinkers was the great Talmudist MAIMONIDES (Moses ben Maimon; 1135–1204). His work is many-sided; what made it original and influential, though at first bitterly opposed by Jews (his Guide of the Perplexed was burned), was the attempt to reconcile Aristotle with Holy Scripture. As a young man, he tried to sum up Jewish faith in 13 principles: (1) God exists and is the Creator of all things; (2) He is one; (3) He is without a body; (4) He is eternal; (5) man is obliged to worship Him alone; (6) the words of the Prophets are to be believed; (7) Moses is the greatest among them; (8) the Torah was revealed by God to Moses; (9) it is unchangeable; (10) God knows all things; (11) He rewards and punishes man according to his deeds; (12) the Messiah will come; and (13) the dead will rise.

Unless he believes in these fundamental principles, a Jew cannot attain everlasting bliss, Maimonides held. Some theologians of his day disagreed with him on the selection of these principles, or on the reduction of Jewish belief to 13 articles, or even on the basic assumption that Judaism possesses dogmas, binding tenets. Still, his "creed" survived the disputes and was eventually embodied—not in its original form but in both a prose and a poetic version of later dates—in the Siddur, the Jewish daily prayerbook. The prose version, by an unknown author, begins with the words: "I believe ['ănî ma'ămîn] with perfect faith that the Creator, blessed be His name, is the Author and Guide of everything that has been created, and that He alone has made, does make and will make all things." The poetic version by Daniel ben Judah of Rome is known by its first word, Yigdal, "Magnified and praised be the living God. . . . '

Significantly, the 13 principles were embodied in the liturgy of the synagogue. Any stress on Jewish faith without an accompanying emphasis on the sacredness of day, week, month, and year distorts the image of Judaism, at whose heart is 'ǎvōdâ [(divine) service, (the) work (of honoring God)]. There is no fullness of Jewish life without the SABBATH and the festivals throughout the year—without their joy and their sorrow, without their penitential mood and their delight in God's grace, without Israel's appeal to His mercy and its assurance of His faithfulness, without the remembrance of the past and the expectation of the future. See FEASTS, RELIGIOUS; PASSOVER, FEAST OF; BOOTHS (TABERNACLES), FEAST OF; ATONEMENT, DAY OF (YOM KIPPUR); DEDICATION OF THE TEMPLE, FEAST OF; PURIM, FEAST OF.

Cabala. Swift and fragmentary though this survey is, mention must be made, at least, of the sum of Jewish mysticism, the CABALA. Mystical thoughts had appeared intermittently for centuries: in some apocalyptic works as far back as the 2d century B.C., in esoteric teachings found in the oldest midrashic literature, and in early pharisaic speculations on the work of creation and the throne of God, "the Divine Chariot" (see Ezekiel ch. 1). In the 11th century the mystical force so long underground came to the fore. By the 14th century the secrets of a few became the possession of many. In Christian mysticism the longing of the individual believer—irrevocably planted in the community of the faithful—for union with God prevails. In the Cabala (Kabbala) the personal element is hidden; "the Law of the Torah became a symbol of cosmic law, and the history of the Jewish people a symbol of the cosmic process" (Scholem, On the Kabbalah . . . , 2). The powerful hold of mystical trends on Jewish life is far greater than is generally assumed.

Among the devotees of cabalistic speculation were men as different as Joseph ben Ephraim CARO (1488-1575), the author of the Shulchan Aruch (Set Table); Shabbatai (Sabbatai) Sevi (Zevi; 1626-76), a false Messiah who, after having brought the Jewish masses everywhere to a high pitch of excitement, defected to Islam (see SHABATAIÏSM); and the Baal Shem Tov (c. 1700-60), the founder of the Hasidic movement, whose message of joy, song, and love in God swept across the Jewish communities of eastern Europe. The Shulchan Aruch, based on Spanish authorities, such as Maimonides, but neglecting the traditions of central and eastern Europe, sought to fix the Law in all its minutiae forever, as it were. Theoretically, no rabbinic code can be considered final; Halakah is ever in a fluid state. In practice, however, the Shulchan Aruch has dominated Jewish life as if it were God's infallible word. Through its unifications of various legal teachings, it became the strongest cohesive bond among Orthodox Jews. But their clinging to demands that have become obsolete made it a barrier, too; thus, even the most legitimate quests for reform were rebuffed.

Modern Times. The experience of having been misled by a "Messiah" who became an apostate and put the Jewish hope to shame was more than many hearts could bear. For a time HASIDISM, with its comfort of God's constant presence in the daily life of every Jew, lifted the Jewish soul to new heights.

Emancipation. Yet the deception was a trauma not to be healed quickly. Weariness set in and the appeal of the outside world became stronger. For centuries Jews had lived within the confines of the GHETTO, whose walls oppressed as well as protected. These walls had given them the chance of leading their own lives; but as they began to tumble, the old life no longer seemed desirable. Not a few Western Jews welcomed the age of ENLIGHT-ENMENT. Moses Mendelssohn (1729–86), a ghetto-born philosopher, counseled his fellow Jews to adapt themselves to the customs and laws of the countries in which they lived; yet he urged them to remain loyal to the faith of their forefathers. He maintained that Judaism was not a revealed religion, only revealed legislation. He accepted the Mosaic commandments and precepts as given to Jews in a supernatural way, but he recognized no eternal truths save those "comprehensible to human reason and demonstrable by the ability to think."

Cry for Reform. Ever since their loss of national sovereignty, Jews had lived at the fringe of history. All through the Middle Ages they had been a foreign body in a more or less unified society, objects of discriminatory measures, and victims of persecution. Suddenly emancipation-freedom, equality, status, and progressbeckoned before their eyes. An assembly of 110 notables convoked by Napoleon in 1806 marveled at the hidden plans of Divine Providence "changing the form of human affairs, giving comfort to the distressed, and raising the lowly out of the dust" (W. G. Plaut, The Rise of Reform Judaism, 72). Again, in 1844, the president of a rabbinic conference held at Braunschweig, Germany, proclaimed: "Let us understand the time and use it . . . [so] that our holy religion, purified of all dross and additions, cleansed of all that is merely local or ephemeral, of all disfigurations which adhere to it, will rise in new glory, to fulfill its mission to mold mankind into one brotherhood" (Plaut, 79).

Two years before, the Society of the Friends of Reform in Frankfurt had declared themselves in favor of unlimited progress in religious matters; they denied any authority to "the collection of controversies, dissertations, and prescriptions commonly called Talmud," and they repudiated the traditional hope of being led back to the land of their forefathers by a messiah. "We know no fatherland except that to which we belong by birth and citizenship," they proclaimed. (See Plaut, 52.)

Reaction. These and similar demands for an updating of Jewish worship, as well as the rejection of the Talmud's perennial authority and the novel actions taken, led to furious controversies. The promoters of the reform were denounced as deceitful or as lacking in scholarship. Bans were imposed by one side, only to be declared null and void by the other. Prohibitions were proclaimed against changing anything in the order of prayer, against using another language than Hebrew in Jewish worship, and against playing an instrument, e.g., an organ, in a synagogue. Observant Jews were warned against traffic with the dissenters; burial was refused to those who deviated from the practices of the past; the innovators were even denounced to the secular authorities. A prominent rabbi counseled the traditionalists of Hamburg: "Go to the government and ask them to humble these wanton people . . . [and to] stay the arm of the evildoers" (Plaut, 36).

Classical Reform in America. In the middle of the 19th century, Reform (Liberal or Progressive) Judaism was brought to the U.S. by German-born rabbis. Before it reached the proportions of the 20th century, it had to struggle, though by no means as hard as in the land of its birth. In 1885, 19 rabbis assembled in Pittsburgh, where they formulated their ideological stance, known as the Pittsburgh Platform, which, interestingly enough, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the Reform rabbinical organization, never made its own, though the Platform reflected the thinking of its founders.

These were its principles. (1) Every religion is an attempt to grasp the infinite. Judaism presents the highest conception of the God idea. (2) The Bible is the record of the consecration of the Jewish people as priests of the one God and a potent instrument of religious and moral instruction. Though it reflects primitive ideas, modern discoveries are not antagonistic to the doctrines of Judaism. (3) The Mosaic legislation was a necessary system of training for the Jewish people during its national life in Palestine. In the modern world only its moral laws are binding. No ceremonies are to be retained except those of a sanctifying character. Everything not adaptable to modern civilization is to be rejected. (4) The Mosaic and rabbinical laws regarding diet or ritual purity are foreign to modern mental and spiritual outlooks. (5) The modern era of universal culture is a sign that Israel's great messianic hope is about to be realized. Hence, neither a return to Palestine nor a restoration of the ancient sacrificial system is desirable. (6) Judaism is a progressive religion, ever striving to be in accord with the postulates of reason. Christianity has a providential mission in the spreading of monotheistic and moral truths. (7) The soul of man is immortal but belief in bodily resurrection, hell, and paradise is to be rejected as not rooted in Judaism. (8) In the spirit of the Mosaic Law, which strives to regulate the relation between rich and poor, Jews are duty-bound to help solve the modern problems of social justice. (See Davis, 226-227).

Conservative Movement. American Reform Judaism rallied around the Pittsburgh Platform as the instrument that would take Jews "out of medieval darkness into the light of modern progress." But, as had happened in Germany, some reform-minded men felt they could not go all the way with the leaders of the reform. In their eyes the decisive principle of the Platform was the spirit of the age, not that of Jewish tradition. The Law was indeed a living tradition and thus open to change, they argued, but all changes had to be made in harmony with what went before. The totality of Jewish history—past, present, and future—or, as Solomon Schechter (1850–1915), the founder of Conservative Judaism, called it, "Catholic Israel," was ever to be the judge of true development. As the needs of the Jewish people are heeded, Jews dare not forget the primacy of faith in God and the demands of the Torah.

While thus dismissing a static attitude, the historical school kept a deep reverence for the past and its ways. Its perspective became that of Conservative Judaism. (Its main organizations are the United Synagogue of America and the Rabbinical Assembly of America.) At first glance, it might be considered midway between Orthodoxy and Reform, but its direction is complex. It upholds the rabbinical architecture of life in its entirety, but it interprets it with a certain freedom. It honors the "creed" of Maimonides, but it is responsive to modern critical views. Many of its rabbis see the Messiah as an ideal or an age to come, rather than as a person. The idea of a "universal Israel" and its refusal to stand by any platform or series of tenets make it broad enough to harbor within its ranks the Reconstructionist Movement.

The great concern of Reconstructionism is the survival of the Jewish people; its approach is that of 20th-century pragmatism. In the eyes of Reconstructionists, God is not the supreme being but the process that makes for salvation; to believe is to reckon with life's creative forces as an organic unity and thus give meaning to life; Jewish religious practices are folkways rather than divine demands; and Judaism itself is a civilization of which religion is but a part, however important.

Modified Reform. Half a century after the Pittsburgh Platform, Reform Judaism found it necessary to modify that statement. Therefore, in 1937 the Columbus Platform was issued. Its framers no longer speak of the "God idea" but "of the One, living God, who rules the world through law and love . . . Though transcending time and space, He is the indwelling Presence of the world." Man is His child and active co-worker. The new declaration still says that "revelation is a continuous process, confined to no one group and to no one age," but it calls the Torah "a depository of permanent spiritual ideas . . . , the dynamic source of the life of Israel." (See Finkelstein, 2:1327-89.) Earlier American Reform rabbis had flatly declared: "We consider ourselves no longer a nation but a religious community, and therefore expect neither a return to Palestine . . . nor the restoration of any of the laws concerning the Jewish State." (See Davis, 227.) Now they see in the rehabilitation of Palestine "the promise of renewed life for many of our brethren. We affirm the obligation of all Jewry to aid in its upbuilding as a Jewish homeland . . . , a haven of refuge for the oppressed [and] a center of Jewish culture and life."

Classical Reform rejected all that was contrary to modern views and habits. The Columbus Platform, however, demands "the preservation of the Sabbath, festivals, and holydays," and "the use of Hebrew, together with the vernacular, in our worship and instruction." Thus the way was paved for a deeper appreciation of traditional values and symbols, a move that is paralleled by a slow awakening in some Orthodox Jewish circles to the fact that not all rules or interpretations of the past are absolute and thus unalterable, that change and evil are not necessarily synonymous. Orthodoxy is by no means a monolithic body. It knows several strands, several philosophies of a life ruled by the Law. (Its major organizations are the Rabbinical Council of America and the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America.)

Differences in Modern Practice. Although the contrasts are less harsh in the 1960s than they were years ago, the differences remain. The traditional service is, except for a few Aramaic interludes, in Hebrew. However, in the typical Reform Temple (the term temple was originally chosen as a substitute for synagogue to disavow hope for the rebuilding of the shrine that was once the pride of Jews) most of the prayers are in the vernacular. Since every congregation is independent, the proportional use of Hebrew and English in Reform and Conservative congregations varies. Traditional Jews will not pray, study Torah, or perform any act of worship unless their heads are covered. If they did otherwise, they would consider it irreverent, to stand slipshod in the presence of the Lord. The Orthodox Jews who follow custom rigidly have their heads constantly covered; at services they like to wear hats, whereas Conservatives use "yarmulkes" (Yiddish word for skullcaps), at times of varied colors and beautifully embroidered. Reform Jews wear no head covering, following in this the conventions of Western civilization, where the bared head is a sign of respect.

In Orthodox synagogues men and women are separated. In most Conservative synagogues and all Reform temples they are seated together. In a traditional service Scripture readings and prayers are chanted; in a modernized one, they are recited in a formal manner. In all Orthodox and many Conservative synagogues, priestly descendants (their shoes removed, as was done in the Temple of Jerusalem) chant the Aaronic blessing (Nm 6.22–27) over the people. The cantillation, at times amateurish, may jar a modern musically trained ear. In a reformed service, therefore, the rabbi imparts that blessing. There, as elsewhere, a prevailing criterion is decorum.

On awakening, the pious Jew praises God for having made the new day. He blesses Him for having given him sight, for clothing him, for having renewed his strength, for granting him the power to walk, for putting firm ground under foot. There is a whole system of blessings accompanying the observant Jew throughout the day. (See BERAKHOT.) If rightly used, such blessings open his heart to God's nearness and the many manifestations of His goodness. Yet like all acts to be performed at stated times, they are in danger of becoming routine. Fearing such mechanization or even the "ritualization" of religious life, Reform Judaism—mistaking the protests of the Prophets against sacrifices devoid of love as a condemnation of all ritual—has discarded the system of blessings and many other ceremonies as well, although a new appreciation of worship is dawning. Reform Judaism continues to see itself as "Prophetic Judaism," keeping alive the social concern of the Prophets; hence the involvement of many Reform Jews (not to speak here of the commitment of other Jews) in the continuing struggle to obtain social justice.

To consecrate his life to the Lord, the tradition-bound Jew wears, during the morning service, PHYLAC-TERIES (tefillîn) on head and arm near the heart; these are small boxes containing parchment strips with the words of Ex 11.16; 13.1–10; Dt 6.4–9; 11.13–21 and attached to leather straps. At all times, or at least during the morning prayers, he wears the tallît, a fringed garment used as a prayer shawl. Its purpose is to remind him 'not to follow [his] heart and eyes in lustful urge . . . [but] to be holy to [his] God'' (Nm 15.39–40).

Dietary Laws. Hebrew DIETARY LAWS, too, are meant to hallow a Jew's life. They recall that he lives under the discipline of the Law. Rabbinical tradition requires that animals be slaughtered by a Shohet (šôhet), an expert slaughterer who must see to it that the animal dies with the least possible pain and that blood is allowed to flow off freely. The cook, too, must observe certain regulations: the meat is to be cleansed and salted, so that every drop of blood will be drawn out. All vegetables are allowed. Of the animal kingdom, only fish with scales and fins, certain kinds of fowl, and those quadrupeds that chew their food twice and have cloven hoofs are permitted. Meat and dairy products may not be eaten together; hence, two separate kinds of dishes are used, and a sixhour interval must be observed between a meal with meat and one with milk or its derivatives. Reform Judaism has discarded the idea of kašrût (fitness), i.e., the laws regulating kosher food, although some of its adherents will, out of a loyalty to parents or to the Jewish past, abstain from pork. While many observant Jews modify the strict requirements of the Law to suit the demands of modern life, they expect their rabbis to observe, in their stead, the traditional rules uncompromisingly.

Bar Mitzvah. Every male child is circumcised. On the Sabbath following his 13th birthday a boy is called up to read publicly the proper passage from the Torah, thus becoming BAR MITZVAH (son of the commandment, man of duty). From that time on, he is obliged to fulfill all the commandments. In quite a few American congregations, there is an equivalent service for 12-year-old girls, called bat mitzvah (daughter of the comandment).

Marriage. A traditional wedding is performed under a huppâ (canopy), a symbol of the home, the shelter of the marital state. The ceremony consists of a number of blessings. The first praises God for having created the fruit of the vine, of which both bride and bridegroom partake. After this sharing, the bridegroom places a ring on the bride's finger: "By this ring you are wedded unto me according to the Law of Moses and that of the people of Israel." Whoever officiates, commonly a rabbi, renders thanks to God for creating all things for His glory, fashioning man and woman in His image, making them companions, and granting them joy. He begs for their continued happiness and ties their hopes to the messianic hopes of the Jewish people. At the wedding, a glass is shattered to remind the bridal couple in the midst of joy, as some have it, of the destruction of Jerusalem or, as others interpret it, of the ease with which domestic sanctity and peace can be broken.

Sometime before the wedding, a marriage contract $(k^et\hat{u}b\hat{a})$ is drawn up, and it is read aloud at the marriage ceremony; it contains, among other things, the bridegroom's promise to the bride: "I will work for you. I will honor you. I will support and maintain you as befits a Jewish husband." Complicated rules govern divorce. The $g\bar{e}t$, or bill of divorce, must be drawn up by a recognized scholar. Reform rabbis, however, accept a civil divorce as terminating a Jewish marriage. In the Reform marriage ceremony, $hupp\hat{a}$ and $ket\hat{u}b\hat{a}$ are almost always omitted, as well as the reference to the restoration of the Holy City. Other English prayers, however, for the well-being of the bride and bridegroom, are added.

Death and Burial. As his hour of death approaches, a Jew steeped in the ways of his forefathers admits shame for his sins and asks forgiveness. He begs that his pain as well as his death atone for them, that he be granted the abounding happiness stored up for the just, and that he be admitted to God's presence, where there is fullness of joy. He may appeal to the Lord to take back the soul He lent him in mercy and peace, so that the Angel of Death cannot torment him: "Hide me in the shadow of your wings." He then blesses his children. When the end is truly near, those gathered around him proclaim: "The Lord reigns, the Lord has reigned, the Lord shall reign forever and forever." It is considered a sign of divine favor if a man can die with the profession of faith on his lips: "Hear O Israel! The Lord our God, the Lord is one!"

Several hours after death, the body is washed in a prescribed way and dressed in a white shroud. For a man it is the same garment he wore for the first time as bridegroom, and later at every New Year's service, on the Day of Atonement, and at the Passover meal. A prayer shawl is wound around his body. All shrouds and coffins have the same simplicity for the rich as for the poor. The moment the coffin is lowered into the grave these words are said: "May he come to his place in peace." If a son buries one of his parents, he prays thus:

May His great name be magnified and sanctified in the world that is to be created anew, where He will quicken the dead and raise them up to life eternal, where He will rebuild the city of Jerusalem and establish His Temple in its midst, and where He will uproot all alien worship from the earth and restore the worship of the true God.

This KADDISH (qaddîš, hallowed) is one of several similar doxologies recited on various occasions. In hallowing the name of God for 11 months, a bereaved son hopes that through the power of praise his beloved parent may find peace in God. The Kaddish does not mention the dead. Yet the mourner's Kaddish is said on every anniversary. Although Jewish tradition frowns on extreme grief—excessiveness is said to imply that the mourner is filled with greater pity than God—the Orthodox rules on various periods of mourning are complicated and quite detailed. Reform Judaism has abandoned most of the practices with which tradition has surrounded the death event, particularly those of mourning, as cumbersome, harsh, and aggravating grief rather than offering solace.

Jews and Jesus. Ever since Jamnia, Judaism has precluded belief in Jesus as the Redeemer. Although some later Jewish teaching developed with Christianity in mind, the Talmudic sages avoided direct discussion of the gospel. The few hostile passages in the Talmud that, according to the opinion of competent scholars, refer to Jesus, do so without naming Him. Moreover, in speaking of Gentiles, rabbinic literature hardly distinguishes between Christians, worshipers of the one, true God, and pagans, worshipers of idols. Maimonides seems to have been the first to hold a mildly positive view of Christ's work. Maimonides (Mishneh Torah, Hilkhot Melakhim 11.4) held that Jesus' teaching, like Muhammad's, "only served to clear the way for the King Messiah to prepare the whole world to worship God with one accord" (cf. So 3.9). Several decades after Maimonides, another rabbi distinguished between the Gentiles referred to in the Talmud and those of his own day. He called his Christian contemporaries "nations restricted by the ways of religion"; and those of which the Talmudic teachers speak, "nations not delimited by the ways of religion." There have been others who spoke of the kindness "the man of Nazareth wrought to the world."

But not till Reform Judaism made its voice heard did Jesus and Christianity—topics shunned till then by most Jews and even today by some of them—become a matter of investigation. Not until then were such words spoken as those of Sigismund Stern, a German Jewish school teacher of the middle of the 19th century: "Judaism and Christianity must hold out a brotherly hand to each other, for the sake of their common work for mankind [The Jewish believers] must love their Christian fellow men, not merely as fellow human beings, but feel related to them in faith and bound to them with special ties."

Since then, a new appreciation of the person of Jesus—not to be mistaken, however, for faith in Him as the Christ—has set in. Even a scholar as steeped in tradition as Joseph Klausner (1874–1958) called Jesus a great moral teacher; Claude J. G. MONTEFIORE (1859-1939), the founder of Liberal Judaism in England, saw in Him a new type of prophet; Rabbi Leo Baeck (1874–1956) the distinguished head of German Jewry at the time of Hitler and one-time president of the World Union for Progressive Judaism-acclaimed Him as the manifestation "of what is pure and good in Judaism." The Conservative theologian Rabbi Milton Steinberg (1903–50) spoke of Him as "an extraordinarily beautiful and noble spirit, aglow with love and pity for men," and the existential thinker Martin Buber (1878–1965) regarded Him as "my great brother." Of the several statements made by American rabbis on this theme, the most interesting are those of Maurice Eisendrath, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, though they carry no official weight. Some consider them eccentric. In 1963 he called on Jews to reappraise their "ofttimes jaundiced view of him in whose name Christianity was established," and in 1965 he asked that Jesus, "this Jewish hero," be incorporated "into our never too overcrowded company of saintly spirits."

Present and Future. The largest Jewish communities are in the U.S., Russia, and Israel. Although the state of Israel guarantees freedom of worship, Orthodoxy so dominates the religious life that it prevents the other branches of Judaism from getting a foothold. Russian Jewry is threatened with spiritual extinction for lack of a sufficient number of synagogues, of religious training, and cultural activities. No attempt has been made to gather exact statistics on the number of the synagogueaffiliated among the 5 ½ million American Jews. Nor is the ratio of Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform membership certain. There were in 1965 more than 1,600 known Orthodox congregations, many of them quite small; the Conservative and Reform synagogues numbered 770 and 640 respectively. In all likelihood, each of the three branches has about one million adherents. According to one estimate, four million avail themselves of the service of the synagogue, at the high points of life. It is impossible to say what the future holds for the various branches, indeed for the whole of American Judaism. Jews seem to be more exposed than other people to the apathy toward, even the estrangement from, religion that marks much of modern life. There are those who predict that the unprecedented freedom and comfort American Jews enjoy will quench all religious thirst and wipe out most of the marks that distinguish them from their neighbors; after a few generations, they will be little more than "custodians of a museum." There are others, however, who see American Jewish life in flux and who hope for a new flowering, indeed, the emergence of a Minhag America, a fresh American-bred expression of the ancient Jewish way.

Christian View of Judaism. Christians have frequently seen Judaism as a "service of death," misapplying the words of St. Paul, who says in 2 Cor 3.6 that "the letter kills but the Spirit gives life," i.e., that the Law, when seen as God's inexorable demands, condemns the sinner to death, whereas grace renews and quickens him. Is the Christian bound to think that Judaism, however much alive empirically, is dead in God's judgment? Or is he bound to believe that God's hand is not shortened and the workings of grace not limited? Every morning the observant Jew remembers man's frailty and dependence, as well as God's sovereign goodness:

Master of all worlds! Not because of our just deeds do we cast our humble prayers before You but because of Your abundant mercy. What are we? What is our life? What our love? What our justice? What our victory? What our strength? What our might? What are we to say before You, O Lord our God and God of our fathers? Indeed, before Your presence, the mighty are as nothing . . . the wise as without knowledge Yet, we are Your people, the children of Your covenant, the sons of Abraham Your friend It is, therefore, our duty to thank, praise, and glorify You How good is our portion . . . , how great our happiness that early and late, morning and night, twice every day, we may proclaim: Hear O Israel! The Lord is our God, the Lord alone!

There can be no doubt that God's love hovers over those who pray thus. "It is not true," writes Cardinal Liénart, Bishop of Lille, "that Israel, the chosen people of the Old Covenant, has become an accursed people in the New. Actually, the religious destiny of Israel is a mystery of grace, and we Christians ought to ponder it with respectful sympathy" (Lenten Pastoral 1960). By encouraging common Biblical and theological studies as well as fraternal dialogue between Christians and Jews, Vatican Council II has clearly shown that it considers Judaism a living faith. (See section on the Jews of the Declaration on the Church's Relationship to non-Christian Religions, 1965.)

See Also: JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE; JEWISH PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: G. F. MOORE, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim, 3 v. (Cambridge, MA 1927–30). C. J. G. MONTEFIORE and H. M. J. LOEWE, eds., A Rabbinic Anthology, Selected and Arranged with Comments and Introductions (London 1938; pa. New York 1963). M. KADUSHIN, The Rabbinic Mind (New York 1952); Organic Thinking (New York 1938). I. EPSTEIN, Judaism: A Historical Presentation (Baltimore 1959). D. S. RUSSELL, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (Philadelphia 1964). G. G. SCHOLEM, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (3d ed. New York 1954; repr. pa. New York 1961); On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism, tr. R. MANHEIM (New York 1964). W. G. PLAUT, The Rise of Reform Judaism (New York 1963-). M. DAVIS, The Emergence of Conservative Judaism (Philadelphia 1963). N. GLAZER, American Judaism (Chicago 1957). J. B. AGUS, Guideposts in Modern Judaism (New York 1954). J. J. PETU-CHOWSKI, Ever Since Sinai: A Modern View of Torah (New York 1961). L. JACOBS, Principles of the Jewish Faith (London 1964). The Authorised Daily Prayer Book, ed. H. J. HERTZ (rev. ed. New York 1959). E. GARFIEL, The Service of the Heart; A Guide to the Jewish Prayer Book (New York 1958). L. FINKELSTEIN, "The Jewish Religion: Its Beliefs and Practices," The Jews: Their History, Culture and Religion, 2 v., ed. L. FINKELSTEIN (3d ed. New York 1960). M. N. EISENDRATH, Can Faith Survive? (New York 1964). K. GALLING et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 3:978-1000. R. R. GEIS et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 5:1156-71.

[J. M. OESTERREICHER]

JUDAS ISCAROIT

The Apostle who betrayed Jesus. The name Judas (Ἰούδας) is derived from the Hebrew y^ehudah (Judah), the name borne also by St. JUDE THADDEUS. Iscariot (Ἰσκαριώτης and Ἰσκαριώθ) is usually explained by the equivalent of the Hebrew ' $i\tilde{s}$ - $q^er\hat{i}\hat{o}t$ (man of Carioth); a town of uncertain site in southern Judah called Carioth-Hesron is mentioned in Jos 15.25. Judas was the son of a man named Simon (Jn 6.72; 13.26). Apart from these vague notifications nothing is known about the origin of the man who betrayed Jesus.

Apostleship and Treachery. The New Testament says nothing about the vocation of Judas. His name is simply mentioned with the rest of the Twelve Apostles, always at the end of the list (Mk 3.19; Mt 10.4; Lk 6.16). Undoubtedly he joined the other Apostles on their missionary journeys (Mk 6.7; Mt 10.1; Lk 9.1–2).

No Evangelist gives a character study of Judas. The attempt to determine the crises that led to his defection deals with half knowledge. In Jn 12.6 it is said that Judas was a petty thief and that his hand dipped into the common purse for personal advantage. It seems most probable, however, that the major crisis for Judas was the same as that faced and overcome by the other Apostles, the revelation of a suffering Messiah. This is seen most clearly in Mk 8.31–33. Peter's profession of faith in Jesus as Messiah is followed by Jesus' revelation that "the Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be put to death '' The effect of this statement on the Apostles was appalling. There was no place in their thinking for a suffering Christ. As David's descendant He must be a glorious political king. Peter was so certain of this that he took Jesus aside to remonstrate with Him. And then, even worse, Jesus taught the TWELVE that, not only was He to suffer, but they, too, must follow Him, each with his own cross (Mk 8.34-35). The last half of Mark's Gospel centers on the confusion and fear of the Apostles with regard to Jesus' future suffering (Mk 9.8–11, 30–31; 10.32–34, 43-45; 13.9-13). Judas's courage and faith must have been too weak to accept such a challenge. He traded in his apostleship for the small comforts he could obtain from the common fund.

The seeming waste of perfume at the Bethany anointing disturbed a number of the Apostles (Mk 14.3–9; Mt 26.6–9), but in Jn 12.1–8 Judas is singled out as particularly offended by it. Perhaps this was the final straw for him. Mark immediately follows this incident with the statement: "And Judas Iscariot, one of the Twelve, went to the chief priests to betray him to them" (Mk 14.10). Judas promised to inform the Sanhedrin of a time and place in which Jesus could be seized apart from the crowd: "The chief priests and the Scribes were seeking how they might seize him by stealth and put him to death; for they said, 'Not on the feast, or there might be a riot among the people'" (Mk 14.1–2).

The opportunity arrived during the LAST SUPPER. Jesus was separated from the crowds, and He would soon move down to the olive trees at Gethsemani; night would mask the movement of the Sanhedrin forces. Jesus' response to Judas's plotting was a feeling of intense sorrow. It was one of His own community, one of His particular friends, who was betraying Him. Our Lord's words to and about Judas at the Last Supper are a personalization of Ps 40(41).10: "Even my friend who had my trust and partook of my bread has raised his heel against me." It is this sad truth that is the common element in the varying traditions of Mk 14.20; Mt 26.23–25; Lk 22.21; Jn 13.18–26.

Judas's embrace of Jesus was a tragically clever move to point out Jesus in the darkness of Gethsemani. Luke cannot bring himself to state that Judas actually kissed Our Lord (Lk 22.47–48).

Demons flank the suspended body of Judas Iscariot, Romanesque relief sculpture, Autun Cathedral, France. (©Angelo Hornak/CORBIS)

Only in Mt 27.3–5 is the story told how Judas rid himself of the blood money by hurling it into the Temple. Matthew's precise specification of the 30 pieces of silver is probably a symbol. Thirty shekels was the assessed value of Zechariah's good shepherd of Yahweh's flock (Zec 11.12–13), and according to Ex 21.32 it was a fine imposed on the owner of an ox that killed a slave.

John's Gospel emphasizes the relationship between Judas and Satan. As the Passion story begins and the conflict between Christ and Satan, between light and darkness, becomes imminent, Judas is the instrument of Satan (Jn 13.2, 27). Judas leaves the supper room to inform the authorities of Jesus' whereabouts that evening; as he does he moves off into the kingdom of darkness: "Now it was night" (Jn 13.30).

Death. There are different accounts of Judas's death in the early Christian writings. According to Mt 27.5 (of which passage there is no parallel in Mark or Luke) he hanged himself. In Acts 1.18 Peter is quoted as saying that Judas fell forward or swelled up (the Greek expression πρηνής γενόμενος is of uncertain meaning) and burst open. Papias (early second century) is quoted by a certain Appolinaris as saying that "His [Judas's] flesh became bloated (πρασθείς) to such an extent that he could not walk through a space where a wagon could easily pass. Not even the huge bulk of his head could go through" [Papias Fragment 6, Partes Apostolici, F. X. Funk, ed. (Tübingen 1901) 1:360–362]. In this respect Papias agrees with Acts.

Probably both traditions are symbolic. The hanging death mentioned by Matthew refers to 2 Sm 17.23, which says that Achitophel, companion of David and a traitor to him, went and hanged himself. In Jewish tradition Achitophel was the classic example of a traitor. Jesus himself (Jn 13.18; Mk 14.18) applied to Judas Ps 40(41).10, which the rabbis had long understood as referring to Ac-hitophel. Matthew's tradition, therefore, brands Judas, in life and in death, as another Achitophel. He must have died the miserable type of death destined for traitors.

Acts and Papias give us a symbolism based, seemingly, on Wis 4.18–19, which says that sinners shall ''become dishonored corpses . . .; for he shall strike them down speechless and prostrate [or swollen: $\pi\rho\eta\nu\epsilon \hat{\iota}\varsigma$].'' This tradition states that Judas's death must have been that of a typical sinner. Both Matthew and Acts give, therefore, not the historical circumstances of Judas's death, but its theological meaning.

Bibliography: J. BLINZLER and J. H. EMMINGHAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 5:1152–54. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1231–33. R. B. HALAS, Judas Iscariot: A Scriptural and Theological Study of His Person, Deeds, and Eternal Lot (Washington 1946). J. DUPONT, "La Destinée de Judas prophetisée par David," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly (Washington 1939–) 23 (1961) 41–51.

[N. M. FLANAGAN]

JUDDE, CLAUDE

A representative of the mystical tradition of Jesuit spirituality; b. Rouen, Dec. 19, 1661; d. Paris, March 11, 1735. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1677 at Paris, made his studies there, taught at the Collège de Clermont, and was ordained. He spent his third year of probation at Rouen in 1691. So successful was Judde in his preaching assignments, first in the provinces, then in Paris, that Louis BOURDALOUE wanted the young priest to be his successor and literary executor. His superiors, however, intended Judde to occupy himself with the spiritual formation of young Jesuits. He was instructor of priests in the third year of probation at Rouen (1709-13), and then rector of the Paris novitiate (1713-21), in which office he fulfilled the functions of instructor of the third year of probation and novice master. From 1721 to 1722 he was rector of the Collège Saint-Thomas at Rennes. He died at the professed house at Paris. Judde wrote nothing for publication, but notes made of his retreats and conferences were edited and published posthumously, at first piecemeal but finally in a collection by Abbé Lenoir-Duparc, Oeuvres spirituelles du P. Judde (last reissued by Lecoffre, 5 v. Paris 1898–1910). The volumes contain a 30-day retreat, retreats for religious, treatises on confession, prayer, and the Mass, and spiritual exhortations. Judde's importance lies in his continuity with the mystical tradition in Jesuit spirituality, whose chief exponent was Louis LALLEMANT. In the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius he found his most characteristic notion, divine liberality calling forth and rewarding human generosity.

Bibliography: Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 4:863–866; 9:520–521. J. DE GUIBERT, La Spiritualité de la Compagnie de Jésus, ed. E. LAMALLE (Rome 1953). R. DAESCHLER, "Un Temoin de la tradition Mystique," Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 3 (1922) 224–249; "Le P. Judde et la tradition mystique" v. 11 (1930) 17–36.

[F. J. BERGEN]

JUDE, EPISTLE OF

One of the Catholic Epistles of the New Testament. This brief letter of 25 verses is an exhortation to the faithful to remain firm in the face of wicked men who deny Christ. The author tells his readers that the punishment of these men is foreshadowed in the Old Testament (v. 5–7); he illustrates their wickedness by examples drawn from scriptural and other sources (v. 8–13), saying that their judgment was predicted by Henoch (v. 14–16), and their coming, by the Apostles (v. 17–19). He exhorts them to wait for the Lord and to help others (v. 20–23), concluding with a doxology (v. 24–25).

Author and Date. "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James" (v. 1), is almost certainly to be identified with the Jude listed among the "brothers of the Lord" in Mk 6.3. Although this "Jude, brother of James," has, in ecclesiastical tradition, often been identified with the Apostle St. JUDE THADDEUS (Lk 6.16; Acts 1.13; Mt 10.3; Mk 3.18; Jn 14.22), exegetes today, including many Catholics, are inclined to deny this identity for the same reasons that apply in the case of "James, the brother of the Lord" (see JAMES, EPISTLE OF ST.). Furthermore, the reference in Jude verse 17 to the Apostles seems to imply that the author did not reckon himself among them. Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 3.19.20; 32.5) quotes Hegesippus as saying that two grandchildren of Jude were arrested under Domitian on the charge of being descendants of David. The cultivated Greek style and certain indications of a relatively late date (e.g., v. 17) lead certain scholars to question (as does the Catholic K. H. Schelkle) or deny the authenticity of the attribution to Jude. However, the literary dependence of 2 Peter on this letter (see PETER, EPISTLES OF ST.) cautions against assigning too late a date and, consequently, against too ready a questioning of its authenticity. The destination and place of writing are unknown. Although its canonical status in the early Church is well attested, doubts were occasioned in some quarters by reason of Jude's quoting (in v. 14–15) the apocryphal Book of Henoch. See BIBLE.

Occasion and Doctrine. Although the descriptions in the letter are too vague to permit identification of the errors of the wicked intruders, they seem to represent an embryonic form of Antinomian Christian GNOSTICISM, perhaps similar to that underlying Church troubles alluded to in Galatians, Colossians, and the Pastoral Epistles.

The author's chief concern in this short epistle is obviously to warn the recipients of the pressing dangers to faith and morals and thus to protect them from being corrupted. Nevertheless, various points of doctrine are raised or mentioned: the Persons of the Trinity (v. 1, 20, 25), the deposit of faith (v. 3), the existence of good and bad angels (v. 6, 9), the destiny of eternal life (v. 21), and zeal for others' salvation (v. 22–23).

Bibliography: C. BIGG, Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude (International Critical Commentary; 2d ed. Edinburgh 1910). G. H. BOOBYER, "Jude," Peake's Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. BLACK and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1962) 1041-42. J. CHAINE, Les Épîtres catholiques (2d ed. Étude bibliques Paris 1939). R. LE-CONTE. Les Épîtres catholiques (Bible de Jérusalem: 42: 2d ed. Paris 1961). J. B. MAYOR, The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter (London 1907). K. H. SCHELKLE, Die Petrusbriefe, Der Judasbrief (Herders theologischer Kommentar zum N.T. 13.2; Freiburg 1961). J. CANTINAT, "L'Épître de s. Jude," A. ROB-ERT and A. FEUILLET, eds., Introduction à la Bible (Tournai 1959) 2:602-610. P. FEINE et al., "Der Judasbrief," Einleitung in das N. T. (13th ed. Heidelberg 1964) 310-313. J. BLINZLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957-65) 5:1155-56. E. FASCHER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 3: 966–967. J. B. COLON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:1668–81. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1235-36.

[T. W. LEAHY]

JUDE THADDEUS, ST.

One of the Twelve Apostles. He is called Jude (Gr. 'Ιούδας, representing Heb. yehûdâ, Judah) in the lists of Lk 6.16 and Acts 1.13; but the corresponding passages of Mt 10.3 and Mk 3.18 have Thaddeus (Θαδδαῖος). In all four passages he is the 11th named. The reason for the use of Thaddeus in Matthew and Mark may lie in a certain care the first two Gospels take not to confuse him with Judas Iscariot. In Jn 14.22 he is called "Judas, not the Iscariot," and in Luke and Acts he is called "Judas of James." Yet the use of Thaddeus in Matthew and Mark is not absolutely constant, for some manuscripts have Lebbeus instead. Both seem to have the same meaning, for Thaddeus from Aramaic taddai (Aramaic tad, chest) means chesty, and Lebbeus from Hebrew libbai (Heb. leb, heart) means hearty. Some scholars, however, believe that Thaddeus is a variant of the Greek name Theudas. According to a very early tradition in the Church the James referred to in "Jude of James" is JAMES, son of Alphaeus, and James and Jude are to be identified with the BROTHERS OF JESUS (i.e., His relatives) mentioned in Mt 13.55 and Mk 6.3. Furthermore, since Jude was probably less known, to identify him better his name was associated with that of his brother. This has remained the predominant view among Catholic commentators. But in recent times certain difficulties about this interpretation have been raised. While the expression "Judas of James" used in Lk 6.16 and Acts 1.13 can mean "the brother of James" (under the influence of Jude 1), it is a rare usage. Its ordinary meaning would be "Jude the son of James," and it is precisely in this sense that the same passage uses "James [the son] of Alphaeus." Thus Jude would be the son of an otherwise unknown James. The author of the Epistle of St. Jude, whom Catholic tradition considers the same as Jude the Apostle, calls himself simply "Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ and the brother of James" (v. 1).

St. Jude, 14th-century fresco. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

The traditional material about Jude Thaddeus's later ministry and martyrdom is completely unreliable. Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 2.40) relates various supposed areas of his preaching, while the Roman Breviary mentions only Mesopotamia and Persia. He is said to have died a martyr, and in art he is represented with a halberd, the instrument of his martyrdom. Mention is made of his grandsons by Hegesippus (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 3.20.1–5); they were tried and acquitted under Domitian (81–96) and ruled Christian communities of Palestine under Trajan (98–117).

Feast: Oct. 28 (with SIMON THE APOSTLE).

See Also: JUDE, EPISTLE OF ST.

Bibliography: R. LECONTE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et. al., 4:1288–91. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1234–35. J. BLINZLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche² (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1154–55. J. CHAINE, Les Épîtres catholiques (2d ed. Paris 1939) 269–271. L. CERFAUX, La Communauté apostolique (3d ed. Paris 1956) 89–97. A. CHARUE, Les Épîtres catholiques in La Sainte Bible, ed. L. PIROT and A. CLAMER, 12 v. (Paris 1935–61) 12:375–379. L. TROTTA, Jude: A Pilgrimage to the Saint of Last Resort (San Francisco 1998), cult and legends.

[J. A. LEFRANÇOIS]

JUDGE, THOMAS AUGUSTINE

Founder of the Missionary Cenacle; b. Boston, Mass., Aug. 23, 1868; d. Washington, D.C., Nov. 23, 1933. His parents were Irish immigrants. Following education in the public schools, he entered the Congregation of the Mission (Vincentian Fathers) at Philadelphia, Pa., and was ordained there in 1899. Early experience among Latin immigrants and in preaching parish missions awakened his interest in the problem of defections from the Church. To assist the clergy in dealing with this matter, he organized a lay apostolate in Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1909. These lay missionaries, later known as the Missionary Cenacle Apostolate, were successfully established in numerous parishes in New England and the Middle Atlantic states. In 1961 they numbered approximately 2,000 members.

Judge was appointed in 1915 as superior of the Vincentian missions in the Diocese of Mobile, centered at St. Mary's Mission House, Opelika, Ala. From the lay apostles who joined him in this mission field there evolved two new religious congregations. The MISSIONARY SER-VANTS OF THE MOST HOLY TRINITY, for priests and brothers, received papal approbation in 1929; the MISSIONARY SERVANTS OF THE MOST BLESSED TRINITY was approved in 1932. These congregations, and their lay missionary associates, known collectively as the Missionary Cenacle, were directed by their founder, who was relieved of his office as superior at Opelika, from 1920 until his death. In 1923 Bp. George J. Caruana of San Juan requested that foundations be established in Puerto Rico. Judge assigned all who could be spared to those missions and personally led them in their initial work. This experience caused him thereafter to give continuing attention to the needs of the Church in Latin America.

Bibliography: J. V. BENSON, The Judgments of Father Judge (New York 1934). A. K. WALKER, Russell County in Retrospect (Richmond, Va. 1950). A. M. KRAUT, "Thomas Judge and the Catholic Laity in the Rural South," U.S. Catholic Historian 8 (1989) 187–98. D. F. O'CONNOR, "America's Pioneer in the Lay Apostolate: Father Thomas Augustine Judge, C.M. (1869–1933)," Profiles in American Sanctity, ed. J. N. TYLENDA (Chicago 1982). J. M

BLACKWELL, The Pastoral Ministry of Thomas Augustine Judge and His Role in the Development of a Catholic Lay Apostolate in the United States (Washington, D.C. 1974).

[L. BREDIGER]

JUDGES (IN THE BIBLE)

The term used in the Book of JUDGES to describe the book's heroes. The word in Hebrew (\check{sofet}) designates one who restores justice or right to someone. Broadly speaking, a judge is one appointed to settle quarrels and assist men to obtain their rights. Yet, even such a fluid concept scarcely justifies applying this term alone to the varying functions described in the Book of Judges. R. de Vaux thinks the title has been wrongly extended to the heroes of the period between Joshua and the monarchy who saved some part of the people from oppression; it would belong properly to the minor judges along with Jephthah (and, probably, Deborah), who combined the judge's office with that of savior. These minor judges were a permanent institution of the tribal federation, elected officials whose function was to interpret Yahweh's law for all Israel and to adjudicate controversial cases between clans.

Actually, the author of the book has included under a generic name (national juridical institution) much more; the great deeds of the major judges, not institutional activities, are the outstanding things in the book. For the Deuteronomist author all judgments are rooted in the historical covenant; justice is God's saving justice. Judges and saviors are equally signs of the divine saving activity in this heroic age. God alone is the ultimate savior; saving activity comes exclusively from Him (Jgs 6.34, 36–37; 7.2, 9, 14–15). Theological considerations, then, probably directed the choice of the title as applied to all the heroes of the book.

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 143–163. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1238–39.

[J. MORIARITY]

JUDGES, BOOK OF

Like the Book of Joshua, Judges takes its title from the protagonists in the story. See JUDGES (IN THE BIBLE). The theme of the Book of Judges is the recurrent punishment and salvation of Israel under the special providence of God, who raises up saviors, the judges, in time of oppression and oppressors in time of Israel's defection.

Contents and Structure. Judges opens with a bipartite introduction (1.1–3.6), describing political and religious conditions in the period after Joshua (1.1–36), and setting forth the book's theology (2.1–3.6). The body of the book largely concerns the exploits of the heroic figures whose deeds are extensively recorded—the major judges: Othniel (3.7–11), Ehud (3.12–30), Deborah-Barak (4.1–5.31), Gideon (6.1–9.57), Jephthah (10.6–12.7), and SAMSON (13.1–16.31). Alongside these "Spirit-designated" liberators are more shadowy figures, of whom some brief notice is given—the minor judges: Tola (10.1–2), Jair (10.3–5), Ibzan (12.8–10), Elon (12.11–12), Abdon (12.13–15), and perhaps Shamgar (3.31).

Delilah cutting Samson's hair. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Judges 2.6 resumes Joshua 24.28. The long introduction (2.7–3.6) then outlines in a cyclic fashion the themes of the book: sin, anger of God, oppression, salvation, and sin. These motifs are found throughout the book as a schematic formula: At the beginning of the narrative the people sin, they abandon Yahweh and follow false gods, Yahweh sells them or abandons them to their enemies, they cry to Yahweh.

The body of the narrative that follows is grouped around three main points: God raises up a liberator, a great battle takes place, Israel prevails. The narrative concludes with a twofold element: the enemy is humiliated, the land is at peace. The formulas opening and closing these narratives are rigidly observed, without, however, disturbing the body of the narrative. In the story of Othniel (3.7–11) the pattern is clearly observable. Properly speaking, the story is not a narrative at all. The author has taken a minimum of details from his source and inserted them into the outline. The result is the framework with only two proper names added.

The following structure or arrangement is suggested by the use of recurring formulas. There is a long introductory "overture" (2.7–3.6). The themes of the book are enunciated in cyclic fashion. The first part begins with the schematic narrative of Othniel (3.7–11). A simple narrative, Ehud (3.12–30), follows; then the more complex one of Deborah-Barak (4.1–24). The section closes with one of the most ancient Hebrew poems, Canticle of Deborah (ch. 5). The second part begins with a prelude by a prophet (6.7–10). The long GIDEON cycle follows (6.11–8.35), and the section closes tragically with the story of Abimelech (ch. 9), Gideon's son, and the first attempt to establish a monarchy in Israel. The third part begins with a rather long prelude in the form of a dialogue between Yahweh and the people (10.10–16). This is followed by the narrative of Jephthah (11.1–12.7). The saga of Samson (13.1–16.31), which has an ending that is tragical and yet is triumphant, closes this section and the body of the book.

Within this structure, after the story of Abimelech, the list of minor judges was inserted (10.1–5 and 12.8–15). Probably, the insertion was occasioned by the story of Jephthah who combined the office of minor judge with the role of great liberator. The recurring formulas of the book are strikingly absent in this list but there are constant elements in it: the succession, the judge of all Israel, and the duration of the judge's office in apparently artificial numbers, i.e., 23, 22, 6, 7, and 8. The death and place of burial also are noted and sometimes a report of the judge's wealth is recorded. The conclusion of the Jephte narrative (12.7) follows the pattern of this list and not the formula found in all other cases of major judges. Apparently, these minor judges represented a permanent institution of the tribal federation.

The last four chapters of Judges form a double appendix that was added to the structure outlined above: the founding of the sanctuary at Dan (ch. 17–18); the Benjaminite war (ch. 19–21). These sections represent very early traditions. They were not, however, part of the first work of the Deuteronomist editor; the great themes of the body of the book are totally absent here. These traditions were perhaps incorporated to form a link with the following history presented in the Book of Samuel. The double appendix describes the moral and cultural anarchy when, "in those days there was no king in Israel; everyone did what he thought best" (21.25).

Origin. We can distinguish four general stages in the origin and formation of the book.

- 1. Preliterary stage. Ancient oral traditions circulated embracing hero stories and tribal sagas, some with etiological elements. Very likely these were preserved in cultic centers and in schools of minstrels.
- 2. Second Stage. Many of these oral stories were probably drawn into cycle form and later still, compiled in writing—probably at the time of David or Solomon.

- 3. Third Stage. This is the work of the DEUTERONO-MISTS writing a religious history of Israel. They used these documents and from them constructed a unity by means of the formulas outlined above in "Structure." These recurring formulas are very similar to the doctrine of Deuteronomy. They reflect the same interpretation of history and the same emphasis on the covenant obligations. Such similarities are the more striking reasons for calling the redactors of the work the Deuteronomists. They found in their sources, linked with the story of Jephte, the list of minor judges, and this, too, was incorporated. The work took place sometime in the 7th century B.C.
- 4. Fourth stage. At a later date, another hand added the appendix and chapter one.

Chronology. The epoch of Judges extends roughly from 1200 to 1050 B.C. However, the chronological ordering of the book is artificial, as appears from the recurrence of the number 40—the length of a generation—or of its half, 20, or its double, 80. The various wars and oppressions recounted appear to have followed one another. But this ordering is the work of the author, who has fitted originally separate narratives into the framework of a religious history. In point of fact, many of these episodes occurred simultaneously in the various parts of the country. The author had no intention of presenting an organic history, chronologically ordered, of the period between Joshua and Samuel.

Historical Credibility. The Book of Judges is a work of religious history. As such, it has certain characteristics that are, at the same time, limitations, e.g., its scope is practical, not theoretical; it is concerned with the religious meaning of events, with history as a history of salvation. As religious history, it relates both historical facts and their religious aspect. The relation of this religious aspect or meaning demands on the part of the author a certain amount of artistic labor, e.g., selection of events and dialogues. Granted all this, the immediate object of historical examination is the narratives. Are these relations of actual events, or rather simple fictions constructed for religious teaching? The narratives fit well into the whole historical context of this era. Furthermore, the geographical and topographical information in these stories agrees with archeological facts. In general, we can say with a certain amount of confidence that these narratives are not fiction, or, at least, not pure fiction. From the evidence we possess, the basic historical character of these narratives is far more probable than the fictional.

Frequently, the historical credibility of Judges is contested because of the presence of etiological elements in the stories. Etiological tales arise to explain existing customs or landmarks. Objections to the historicity of Judges suppose that wherever an etiological element is present, the story must be suspect. There certainly were etiological elements in some of the oral traditions. But etiological stories as such were not enumerated among the sources of Judges. To speak of an etiological story or tale assumes that it can be shown that the story came into being through the etiological factor, i.e., that this factor was the creative and determinative element in the story. Such a priority in the formation of these traditions in Judges has not been proved. In addition, the etiological element does not necessarily serve one purpose, namely to explain the origin of customs or curious landmarks. Often such landmarks and customs as well as place names are incorporated into a story in order to ensure the memory of an event. Ultimately the verdict on historical credibility requires objective, external evidence. Literary form of itself furnishes no final test of historicity.

Bibliography: H. CAZELLES, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:1394–1414. A. VINCENT, Le Livre des Juges (BJ Paris 1952). L. ALONZO-SCHÖKEL, "Erzählkunst im Buche der Richter," Biblica 42.1 (1961) 143–72. Catholic Biblical Encyclopedia, ed. J. E. STEINMUELLER and K. SULLIVAN, 2 v. in 1 (New York 1956) 602–03. J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1960).

[J. MORIARITY]

JUDGMENT

The operation of the INTELLECT by which something is affirmed or denied of something else or, less properly but frequently, the internal complex expression or PROPO-SITION formed by the intellect in judging. Etymologically the word is from the medieval Latin judicamentum, like the classical judicium, meaning the act of a judge (judex) in deciding a question of law or right (jus) or in passing sentence. From this the term was extended to moral decisions about right and wrong, to practical estimates and evaluations, and then to the act of deciding about the truth or falsity of a proposition or of making any affirmation or denial (cf. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 60.1 ad 1). This article presents a historical survey of the notion, an explanation of the doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas, and a discussion of divergent views in light of that doctrine.

Historical Survey

The philosophical development of the concept of judgment falls naturally into three stages corresponding to the development of ancient philosophy, of scholastic philosophy, and of modern philosophy.

Ancient Philosophy. PLATO has no explicit doctrine of an intellectual operation distinct from direct apprehension, but he does speak of an act or faculty of decision, of assessing or evaluating ($\kappa\rho(\sigma\iota\zeta)$), not only in matters of action and prudence but also in regard to fact and truth (Rep. 582AD; Theaet. 201B; Gorg. 526C; Leges 658A, 950B). "Opinion" ($\delta\delta\xi\alpha$), in his usage, has some of the meaning of judgment. It is an intellectual act, as opposed to sensation ($\alpha(\sigma\theta\eta\sigma\iota\zeta)$), and connotes belief or assent. It may mean an assessment of what is, and thus be true or false (Rep. 478B; Theaet. 201AB; Soph. 263A–264B; Meno 97B, 98C).

"Apostles," detail of the fresco "Last Judgment" by Pietro Cavallini, S. Cecilia in Trastevere, Rome.

ARISTOTLE expressly distinguishes two operations of the intellect on the basis of their objects. The first is "the understanding of indivisibles," or "simples," i.e., of single uncompounded terms or intelligible contents; in this the question of truth or falsity does not arise. The second is a certain association of intelligible contents separately apprehended, which will necessarily be either true or false (Anim. 430a 25-b5; Interp. 16a 13; Meta. 1027b 17–23, 1051b 2–26, 33–35).

The Stoics devoted much discussion to judgment and the proposition (ἀξίωμα), which they defined as a complete utterance that is either true or false (Diogenes Laertius, Lives 7.65–66; Cicero, Tusc. 1.7.14, De fato 10.20): Truth and error, they held, do not belong to disconnected notions but to notions combined in a judgment. Yet it is not the simple combination of concepts that they stress but assent. Judgment is basically the referring of an image received in sensation to an external thing. Though there are some irresistible perceptions, which clearly and distinctly represent a real thing as it really is and constitute the criterion of truth (Sextus Empiricus, C. math. 7.244; Cicero, Acad. 2.12.37–38, 1.11.41; Diogenes, Lives 7.51), nevertheless assent is usually in man's power and thus voluntary (Sextus, C. math. 8.397; Cicero, Acad. 1.14.40, 2.12.37; De fato 19.43). See STOICISM.

"Last Judgement," 11th-century Roman Benedictine School painting by Giovanni and Niccolo.

Scholastic Philosophy. In the Middle Ages the general lines of Aristotle's doctrine were commonly followed. Judgment was referred to as the second operation of the intellect or as compositio et divisio. Varying degrees of emphasis were put upon the compositive, the assentient, and the existential aspects. (For the doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas see below.)

In later SCHOLASTICISM, FERRARIENSIS, interpreting St. Thomas, taught that judgment is in a certain way a reflective act since it implies the comparison of a QUIDDITY apprehended by the intellect with the thing about which it is apprehended, and the pronouncement of conformity or disconformity (In C. gent. 1.59.6). F. SUÁREZ denied that judgment is reflexive and held that the direct act that constitutes it has two aspects that are not really distinct operations: the combination of two previously apprehended terms and the acceptance of this combination as representative of the thing (De anim. 3.6.3–4). JOHN OF ST. THOMAS maintained that the operations of forming the proposition and of assenting to it as true of the thing are distinct and that the latter is judgment taken formally (Phil. nat. 11.3 ad 2).

Modern Philosophy. R. DESCARTES too emphasized the aspect of assent. Holding with the supposedly traditional view that judgment consists in the affirmation or denial of one idea or another and that only here are truth and error found, he nevertheless insisted that this is more than the perception of a relationship between concepts: it is an activity of accepting and approving the association made; and because all activity depends upon the will, the assent of judgment is voluntary and free and is, in fact, an act of the will rather than of the intellect (Princ. phil. 1.32, 34, 6; Med. 4).

T. HOBBES took a nominalistic view of judgment, regarding it as the joining of two names that belong to the same thing (Leviathan 1.7; cf. 1.5). Truth is merely "the right ordering of names in our affirmations" (1.4).

J. LOCKE paid much more attention to the association of ideas than to affirmation or negation. For him, knowledge is "nothing but the perception of the connexion and agreement or disagreement and repugnancy of any of our ideas" (Essay Concerning Human Understanding 4.1.2). Knowledge is certain. Judgment is of the same character except that it is sometimes contrasted with knowledge as being only probable or presumed perception (4.14.3–4; 4.6.13).

D. HUME too was concerned more with the association of ideas than with judgment as such. For him, "ideas" are only faint images left by sensory impressions (Treatise of Human Nature 1.1.1). In an important note on the Treatise he finds fault with the traditional division of the operations of the mind into conception, judgment, and reasoning and says that these operations "all resolve themselves into the first," which is conception or simple apprehension (1.3.1 n).

T. REID rejected the "ideal system"—the doctrine of ideas as substitutes for things-of Descartes, Locke, and Hume. Though he agreed with Hume in rejecting the traditional "division of the powers of the mind" (Essays on the Intellectual Powers 1.7), rather than reduce judgment to simple apprehension he made judgment come first. Sensation, taken absolutely, is held to be "necessarily accompanied by a belief in its present existence." Simple apprehension is defined as "a sensation imagined or thought of' (Inquiry into the Human Mind 2.3). Because "sensation must go before memory and imagination," he argues that "it necessarily follows that apprehension accompanied with belief and knowledge must go before simple apprehension . . . , so that here, instead of saying that the belief or knowledge is got by putting together and comparing the simple apprehensions, we ought rather to say that simple apprehension is performed by resolving and analyzing a natural and original judgment" (ibid. 2.4).

Though the point is not clear in I. KANT, there are indications that he too considers judgment to precede apprehension or conception. Understanding is the awareness of a unity (Critique of Pure Reason B89-90) and is primarily or essentially judging (B93-94, 141). This must be done by means of concepts, and the basic concepts or categories are derived from the forms of judgment (B94, 378). Kant even asserts that distinct concepts presuppose judgment just as complete concepts presuppose ratiocination. This leaves the possibility, however, that at least indistinct concepts do not come after judgment but that judgment and concepts arise together, one being impossible without the other. The division of "judgments" from which Kant derives the categories more properly belongs to a study of propositions. But there is a twofold prior division that belongs to the very manner of judging. Judgments are a posteriori if derived from experience and a priori if independent of experience (B1-2). They are analytic when the predicate is contained in the concept of the subject and synthetic when the predicate adds to the subject something not contained in its concept (B10–11). Kant's theoretical doctrine is devoted chiefly to examining how a priori synthetic judgments are possible (B14–24).

Reacting against the opinion of judgment as a mere association of images or ideas, which he thought to be almost universally held, F. BRENTANO distinguished between representation and acceptance or assent [Vom Ursprung sittlicher Erkenntnis, ed. O. Kraus (Hamburg 1955) 15–16]. And he interprets the "is" of all propositions as expressing directly actual existence [Von der Klassification der psychischen Phänomene (Leipzig 1911) 53–63].

Doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas

The doctrine of St. THOMAS AQUINAS on judgment may be exposed in terms of his teaching on composition through comparison, on the distinct function of terms, on the affirmation of concrete existence, and on truth and falsity.

Composition Through Comparison. Judgment is commonly referred to by St. Thomas as compositio et divisio, combining and separating (In 3 anim. 11.746-747; In 6 meta. 4.1232; In Boeth. de Trin. 5.3; In 1 anal. post. 1.4). By it the natures apprehended in the first operation are associated or dissociated (In 1 perih. 1.3–4). This second operation would not be needed were it not for the imperfection of man's simple APPREHEN-SION, which is abstractive, attaining only a single partial aspect of the thing at a time (Summa theologiae 1a, 58.4; C. gent. 1.58, 2.98; De ver. 8.4 ad 5). Common intelligible traits are grasped without the individualized subject in which they are found (Summa theologiae 1a, 85.1, 12.4; In 2 anim. 12.377); the nature is first known only confusedly and indeterminately, i.e., generically, without its specific characteristic (Summa theologiae 1a, 85.3, 14.6; In 1 phys. 1.7; C. gent. 2.98); the substantial nature is known without the accidents (Summa theologiae 1a, 85.5; In 7 meta., 5.1379; De ver. 2.7); the accidents are grasped separately (In 2 phys. 3.5; In 1 perih. 10.4); and the quiddity, or essence, is understood without the particular act of existing (esse) that it has in reality (De ente 3; Quodl. 8.1).

To know the thing as it is in reality, a single whole, one and concretely existing, one must have an operation that reintegrates the intelligible aspects of the thing and signifies it as existing. This requires a comparison, the establishment of a relation, which is the unity of its terms. Correlatives are known together (C. gent. 1.55; In 4 sent. 15.4.2.5 ad 3; De pot. 7.10 ad 4; De ver. 2.3 sed. contra 2). So when the data of apprehension are seen to be related, they are seen as one (De ver. 13.3; Summa theologiae 1a, 58.2; Quodl. 7.2). This comparison is judgment, "combination and separation." As an operation it is always a combination or composition, though from the standpoint of the apprehended natures it is either composition or separation according as they are perceived to belong together or not (In 1 perih. 3.4). Composition is a form of union (De ver. 2.7 ad 3; De pot. 7.1 ad 10) by which distinct things are made one. By the compositive act of the intellect the various yields of apprehension are united into a single intelligible whole (In 3 anim. 11.747; In 6 meta. 4.1241; In 3 sent. 14.1.2.4; De ver. 8.14; Summa theologiae 1a, 58.2). By judging and forming a proposition the intellect restores natures to subjects and accidents to substances (De ver. 2.7; Summa theologiae 1a, 14.14, 85.5), thus reestablishing the condition in which things exist (In 3 sent. 27.1.1 ad 5).

Distinct Function of Terms. The two elements joined in judgment do not stand on the same footing and perform the same function. One, which represents the thing to be understood (and stands as the subject in the proposition formed), is regarded as determinable in human thought; the other, which signifies what one understands about the thing (and stands as the predicate in the proposition), is determining. The two elements are therefore related as material and formal principles respectively (In 9 meta. 11.1898; In 1 perih. 8.11, 10.23; De ver. 8.14 ad 6; Summa theologiae 1a, 16.2; 3a, 16.7 ad 4, 9 ad 3). The hylomorphic composition of the proposition represents the real composition or unity of the thing known and the condition in which it exists.

When the apprehended aspects of the thing are connected in their very notions or essence, the judgment is per se, or essential. When the connection is not essential but only factual or existential, the judgment is per accidens, or accidental (In 1 anal. post. 13.2, 10.2–7, 33.4–9; In 5 meta. 9.886–888; In 4 meta. 2.548, 554; 7.622–635; De pot. 8.2 ad 6, 9.4; In 1 perih. 5.9; De fallaciis 10). In the latter case the connection must be perceived through the SENSES. In the former, though the notions are abstracted from sense representations, the connection itself is intelligible, and knowledge of it does not depend upon this presentation.

Because in judging one says that the subject is the predicate, he establishes an identity between them (In 5 meta. 11.908; Summa theologiae 1a, 85.5 ad 3). The kind of identity, however, is not the same in essential and in accidental judgments. In those that are essential the identity is formal (In 3 sent. 11.1.4 ad 6); that is, the two intelligibilities are grasped as being in whole or in part the same (ibid. 10.1.1.2; De ente 2; In 7 meta. 2.1288, 3.1328; De pot. 8.4 ad 2). In accidental judgments the identity, being only factual, is merely an identity in subject or supposit (In 3 sent. 22.1.2, 11.1.4 ad 6, 12.1.1 ad 6; Summa theologiae 1a, 85.5 ad 3), for the thing apprehended in the subject and in the predicate is the same (De pot. 8.2 ad 6). This identity in the thing is signified by the verbal composition (C. gent. 1.36). The unity of the thing founds the composition made in understanding (ibid.; De ente 3). The judgment, accordingly, by combining a subject and a predicate distinguished in apprehension, signifies a real unity and a rational diversity (Summa theologiae 1a, 13.12; C. gent. 1.36).

Affirmation of Concrete Existence. Just as the real existence of a composite being results from the composition of its elements (De pot. 7.1; In 9 meta. 11.1903; In 1 sent. 23.1.1, 38.1.3), so the existence will be signified in thought when a corresponding composition of the apprehended elements is effected in judging. Consequently, the second operation is concerned with the existence of the thing, whereas the first operation is concerned with its essence (In Boeth. de Trin. 5.3; In 1 sent. 19.5.1 ad 7, 38.1.3). This does not mean that apprehension has no reference to existence (for the essence is the manner in which existence is exercised) or that every judgment is directly a judgment of existence (for in an attributive judgment the direct intent is to assign an attribute). But the verb "to be" that is used to effect the composition, and is called the copula (In 9 meta. 11.1900; In 5 meta. 9.895-896; Quodl. 9.3; C. gent. 1.12; In 1 sent. 33.1.1 ad 1; De nat. gen. 2), even when attributive, retains the meaning of existence. For the subject is said to exist in the way signified by the predicate. "This paper is white" means "This paper exists in a white way." The predicate signifies a form had by the subject; form is the principle of existence; and for each form had there is an act of existing (In Boeth. de hebdom. 2.27; Summa theologiae 1a, 75.6, 42.1 ad 1; De prin. nat. 2). "To be" is the ultimate act of things and the act in which composite beings have their reality. The verb "to be" used without qualification signifies only actual existence; but it also, when followed by an attribute, signifies composition, because it signifies existence with the form attributed (In 1 perih. 5.22, 9.4). It need not, however, always signify existence in the real order (outside the mind); it suffices that it signify the type of existence appropriate to the subject, for truth is fulfilled in the mind (In 1 sent. 19.5.1 and ad 5).

Truth and Falsity. Because judgment signifies existence, it always involves TRUTH or FALSITY (In 3 anim. 11.748, 760; In 6 meta. 4.1224, 1225, 1227, 1236; In 1 perih. 3.2, 6.9). For "true" means that what is is, and that what is not is not; and "false" means just the reverse (In 4 meta. 17.740, 736; 16.721; C. gent. 1.59, 62). And it is in judging that one says that something is or is not, is so or is not so. For not only is something known about a thing, but it is also applied to the thing, setting up a relation or comparison between one's knowledge and the thing (C. gent. 1.59). When an intelligible character is apprehended about some thing, the intellect, being spiritual and self-luminous, is conscious of its act of apprehending and of its reference to the object; it thereby knows the conformity of its concept (used as the predicate in judging) to the thing (De ver. 1.9; In 3 sent. 23.1.2 ad 3; In 1 perih. 3.6, 9; In 6 meta. 4.1236). The judgment made contains implicitly the affirmation that the thing is as the intellect has conceived it. Thus there is here the known conformity required for formal truth (In 1 perih. 3. 6, 9; Summa theologiae 1a, 16.2; In 1 sent. 19.5.2).

Judgment accordingly implies assent, which is adherence to a proposition as true (De ver. 14.1). By expressing the "is" (or "is not") of judgment man commits himself to the truth or falsity of the composition he makes, and in this his knowledge is completed (C. gent. 1.59).

Discussion of Divergent Views

The diversity of views mentioned in the historical survey may now be discussed in terms of the doctrine of St. Thomas. This is done in three stages, the first treating views in modern philosophy; the second, disputes in scholastic philosophy; and the third, the special theory of Brentano.

Modern Views. The view that judgment is a mere association of ideas arises in Locke and Hume largely from their empiricism and their inadequate distinction of "ideas" from sensory images and impressions, along with their psychologism and their rather automatic view of the association of images. Hobbes's association of names rests on a similar empiricist basis. The genuine intellectual nature of judgment is obscured, if not denied; judgment is deprived of its distinctive feature: the conscious reference of the representations of things to the things they represent; assent is slighted; and the relevance of truth and falsity to judgment is made accidental. This is especially evident in Hume's reduction of judgment to simple apprehension. (See EMPIRICISM; PSYCHOLOGISM.)

Reid's interpretation of judgment as preceding apprehension, while taking account of assent and identifying judgment with it, is possible only because, retaining a strong empiricism, he makes assent consist in a mere acceptance of sense impressions. Assent thus appears not to be an intellectual activity at all, and judgment implies no reflection upon a CONCEPT formed and reference back to the real.

Kant, in seeming to make judgment anterior to conception, overlooks the necessity of first deriving from the thing known some intelligible character or nature and then referring it to the thing. And even within his system it is hard to see how there can be any conscious subsumption of phenomena organized in sensibility under a mental form of synthesis unless that form is in some sense preconceived.

In holding that all assent in judgment is an act of the will and is free (thus going even beyond the Stoics), Descartes excessively generalized a very true observation: many of a person's judgments are in fact free. This is true of all judgment based upon testimony, whether human or divine, because the evidence is only extrinsic and not found in the proposition itself to which assent is given. It is true also in judgments in which the evidence had is insufficient or less than compelling, as in opinionative judgments. In judgments in which the evidence is sufficient, a distinction must be made. When the evidence is mediate and the judgment is made as a result of reasoning, the judgment, and the assent, is free as regards the exercise of the act (i.e., carrying out the reasoning process or not), but not, if the reasoning is actually done, as regards "the object," i.e., the conclusion (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 17.6). For the process, with the mediate evidence that it brings, is compelling. It is in this latter sense that St. Thomas says that the assent of science is not subject to free choice (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 2.9 ad 2). In regard to immediate evidence, as is had in FIRST PRINCIPLES, assent is necessary not only as regards the object but even as regards the exercise if the intellect is used at all (Summa theologiae 1a, 82.2; 1a2ae, 17.6), for these principles are implicit in every judgment that is made (In 4 meta. 6.605).

Scholastic Disputes. In the dispute involving Ferrariensis, Suárez, and John of St. Thomas, Suárez correctly rejected any reflex act as the initial act of reason; for a reflex act always presupposes an antecedent direct act. But he incorrectly attributed the rejected view to Ferrariensis, who did not place assent in reflex judgments but rather in direct judgments, which nevertheless imply and suppose a reflection upon the apprehension of the predicate. Nor did Suárez, in holding that judgment consists primarily in the conjunction of concepts, deny or exclude assent. He says that the composition is made by "passing judgment." But what judgment is passed upon, in his view, is the fact that one concept belongs to the other. This does not sufficiently explain why the conjunction is made and neglects reference to the thing of which the concepts are formed. The distinction made by John of St. Thomas (in opposition to this view of Suárez) between the formation of the proposition (or the recognition of the composition) and assent to it as two really distinct acts requires some qualification. When a proposition is proposed by another, it is true that one first recognizes the proposition before assenting to it. But when one forms a proposition oneself, the assent is not distinct from the formation of the proposition. For the proposition is not formed until one places the "is" or "is not" of the copula; and when one places these, by that very fact he assents to the truth of the proposition. One does admittedly form questions without assenting. But a question is not a proposition in the technical sense any more than an interrogative sentence is declarative. A proposition is declarative or assertive; it is an assertion, a statement, an enunciation; and this implies commitment and assent.

A more recent dispute is that among contemporary Thomists on the role of judgment in the knowledge of existence. Taking the statement of St. Thomas that simple apprehension deals with essence and judgment with existence, some of his followers have held that existence is known only in judgment and that there is no concept of existence [É. Gilson, Being and Some Philosophers (2d ed. Toronto 1952); R. J. Henle, "Existentialism and Judgment," American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 21 (Baltimore 1946) 40-51]. Others have disputed this, holding that existence is known in simple apprehension and in a concept, even though the knowledge is completed and the existence is joined with its subject in judgment [L. M. Régis, "Gilson's Being and Some Philosophers," The Modern Schoolman 28 (St. Louis 1950–51) 111–125]. Still others have held that, though a judgment of existence precedes the concept of existence, a concept is formed in an indirect way, in which it is treated somewhat as if it were an essence (J. Maritain, Existence and the Existent, New York 1949). The words of St. Thomas can also be taken to mean that existence is not expressly signified in the simple apprehension of things, as it is in judgment, though it is implicitly connoted.

Brentano's Theory. Finally, Brentano's contention that every proposition, because it expresses or implies "is," is existential correctly calls attention to the fact that existence is signified in every judgment; but it exaggerates in supposing that the existence signified is always real and actual and that the direct intent of the judgment is always to signify existence unqualified. This clearly does not fit the case when the subject is a logical being, as in the judgment that "a syllogism is made up of three propositions"; for a syllogism cannot have real existence. And even when the subject designates a real being but is taken universally and the proposition is attributive, this interpretation is inapplicable; for example, "Man is a social being." Here, though the existence in question is real rather than logical, it is not the actual existence of man or of men but the possible or hypothetical existence that is meant: "If man exists, then man is social." And the direct intent of this proposition is not to affirm existence but to assign an attribute. It is not the bare fact of existing that is primarily meant but rather the manner in which the existence, if had, is exercised. Directly existential judgments are rather rarely made; for it is only when the existence of something is doubtful or brought into question that one stops to affirm it explicitly.

See Also: UNDERSTANDING (INTELLECTUS); KNOWLEDGE, CONNATURAL; KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF.

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v. 2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World, 1:835–849. P. H. J. HOENEN, Reality and Judgment According to St. Thomas, tr. H. F. TIBLIER (Chicago 1952). F. H. PARKER and H. B. VEATCH, Logic as a Human Instrument (New York 1959). R. W. SCHMIDT, "Judgment and Predication in a Realistic Philosophy," The New Scholasticism 29 (Washington 1955) 318–326. F. M. TYRRELL, "Concerning the Nature and the Function of the Act of Judgment," ibid. 26 (1952) 393–423. J. LEBACQZ, "Apprehension or Assent?" Heythrop Journal 5 (Oxford 1964) 36–57. F. A. CUNNINGHAM, "Judgment in St. Thomas," The Modern Schoolman 31 (1954) 185–212.

[R. W. SCHMIDT]

JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE)

The belief that God is judge of all men is found throughout Scripture. Judgment is sometimes manifested in this life, but when the belief in an afterlife appears, God is seen primarily as eschatological judge. See ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE). In the New Testament much emphasis is placed upon the bestowal of the divine prerogative of judgment upon Christ. This article will investigate the concept of God as judge, the particular judgment, and the general judgment.

God as Judge. The concept of God as a judge, imposing divine decisions upon men, is an idea that Israelite religion shared with surrounding pagans. The power that all religions generally attribute to their gods is best illustrated by the prerogative of judging, of issuing decrees and verdicts from which there is no appeal. The Biblical concept of judgment, however, can be clearly understood only in relation to the idea of justice, for it was the primary duty of a judge "to do justice" (see JUSTICE OF GOD; JUSTICE OF MEN). A man is just $(sadd\bar{\iota}q)$ if he is in a right relationship with God and his fellow men. Since this righteousness is necessary to regulate all the affairs of life, it can be described as the highest value in life. By Western standards just conduct is considered as behavior conforming to an established ethical norm with absolute claims. In the Old Testament, however, conduct was measured not by an ideal norm but by the fulfillment of the various claims exacted by specific relationships with other men. Men move in many different relationshipsfamilial, national, economic—each of which carries with it particular demands.

There is, furthermore, the special relationship of man with God; here again the just man is the one who fulfills the claims placed upon him by this relationship. In turn, God shows forth His justice, His righteous acts, when He is faithful to the role which He Himself established in relation to Israel. God fulfills the claims of this relationship particularly when He acts as judge. Numerous texts appeal to the divine decisions: "The Lord judge between you and me" (Gn 16.5; see also: Jgs 11.27; 1 Sm 24.13). So closely are justice and judgment related that the two terms are constantly linked in Biblical texts, becoming almost a literary cliché [Am 5.7; Ps 35(36).7; 93(94).15; 139(140).13].

Basically, the notion of judging means settling a dispute, making things right. Inasmuch as one of the disputants was right and the other wrong, to judge came to mean to help a man obtain his rights [Ps 74(75).8] or to condemn a man (Ez 7.3; 8.27). Many of the Psalms of complaint envision the suppliant pleading before God to do justice, i.e., to recognize the requirements of the divine relationship with His servant by vindicating the servant before his enemies [Ps 25(26).1; 34(35).24; 42(43).1].

The vindication of the just man through God's judgment brought with it condemnation of the unjust adversary; hence judgment is sometimes equated with punishment or condemnation: "He will do judgment on the nations, heaping up corpses" [Ps 109(110).6; see also: 7.12; 118(119).84; Ez 25.11].

Particular Judgment. Because of development of thought concerning the resurrection of the dead and afterlife, ideas on God's judgment of the individual underwent a good deal of change during the Biblical period. Separate sections on particular judgment in the Old Testament and in the New Testament will make this evolution clear.

In the Old Testament. Particular judgment in the sense of a divine pronouncement determining an individual's fate after death is not found in the Old Testament. The prevailing view of a RETRIBUTION operative within the limits of the present life prevented such an understanding until quite late, when the ideas of resurrection (see RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD) and immortality had taken hold of Jewish thought. The judgment of God had to be exercised here and now by recognition of a man's works and the recompense proper to them. Prosperity, posterity, longevity—these were the signs of God's favorable judgment upon a man [Ps 1.1–3; 36(37).18–25; 54(55).23; Prv 22.4]. To live wretchedly and to be cut off from life early without descendants were regarded as evidence of God's judgment against a man [Jb 15.20–21; Ps 139(140).12; Wis 3.18–19]. For the just and unjust alike the judgment was lived out in this life.

Reality belied the traditional picture, however. The Psalmist might say, "Neither in my youth, nor now that I am old, have I seen a just man forsaken nor his descendants begging bread" [Ps 36(37).25], but from early times Israel could also ask, "Why do the wicked prosper?" [Jer 12.1; see also: Psalms 36(37) and 72(73)]. In such questioning the justice of God is not doubted; this divine attribute is always assumed: "Does God pervert judgment, and does the Almighty distort justice?" (Jb 8.3). Even the cynical assertions of the Book of ECCLESIASTES about a like fate for the good and the wicked are counterbalanced by the author's insistence that "God will bring to judgment every work" (Eccl 12.14; see also: 3.17).

To see God's justice achieved was more difficult, however, and the gap between theory and observable fact produced genuine pain. The answers varied from dogged repetition of the traditional view to the cynical assertion that "it is all one! . . . Both the innocent and the wicked he destroys" (Jb 9.22). The answer of an immortality of reward or punishment following a personal judgment was not reached until a century and a half before Christ.

If some texts seem to suggest a personal judgment after death, this is doubtless because the developed doctrine of a later time is read into them. For example, Sir 21.9 suggests the fires of hell: "A band of criminals is like a bundle of tow; they will end in a flaming fire," but the words indicate merely the speedy destruction of the wicked by comparing them to swift-burning tow. Mention of the pain, decay, and corruption in store for man (Jb 17.14; 21.26; Is 14.11; 66.24) means no more than the fate common to all men. (See AFTERLIFE, 2.) Even the texts that speak of God's repaying a man on the day of his death according to his deeds (Sir 11.26) refer to retribution in this life, which may, however, be deferred until the day of death.

The prerogative of judging is closely associated with Yahweh's power as king. Justice and judgment are the foundations of His throne [Ps 96(97).2]. The divine judgment is not limited to Israel, for the entire earth is under His sway: "Rise, O God; judge the earth, for yours are all the nations" [Ps 81(82).8; see also: 104(105).7; 1 Sm 2.10; Jer 25.31]. God is especially the protector of the rights of the poor, the widow, and the orphan [Jb 36.6; Ps 67(68).6; 81(82).3; Is 1.17]. All the judgment exercised by the Israelite king is regarded as the gift of the Lord, from whom all right judgment comes [Ps 71 (72).1–2; Is 9.6].

From God's decisions there is no appeal, and Israel recognizes the justice of His verdict: "By a proper judgment you have done all this because of our sins" (Dn 3.29; see also: Tb 3.2–5; Ez 7.8). Every man will be judged according to his works (Wis 3.10; Ez 7.8). This doctrine of individual responsibility is developed especially in Ez 18.1–32; 33.10–20. As divine pronouncements, His decrees possess a binding force like that of the commandments, with which they are often associated: "They shall live by my statutes and carefully observe my decrees" (Ez 37.24).

Beginning with Genesis, God's judgment upon wickedness is spelled out in almost every book of the Old Testament, from the punishment of ADAM and EVE to the fate of the soldiers in the army of the Machabees (2 Mc 12.40–42). The moral will of the Lord permeates all of life; He is not indifferent to His creatures' disobedience, and He never leaves the guilty unpunished (Na 1.2–3; 1 Chr 21.7). Indeed there is often a disconcerting association between evil-doing and swift judgment: "Her was wicked in the sight of the Lord, so the Lord killed him" (Gn 38.7).

Numerous proverbs in the SAPIENTIAL BOOKS show the Lord weighing a man's heart: "The eyes of the Lord are in every place, keeping watch on the evil and the good" (Prv 15.3; see also: 16.2). Nothing escapes His impartial and just scrutiny (Prv 16.11); the nether world and the abyss lie open before Him; "how much more the hearts of men" (Prv 15.11; see also: Sir 18.1).

In the New Testament. The notion of divine judgment is continued and expanded in the New Testament. Since the ideas of the resurrection of the body and immortality were well developed by the time of Christ, God's definitive judgments, both particular and general, were regarded as taking place after death. Meanwhile, both the good and the wicked will continue to grow until the harvest (Mt 13.30, 40). There are no clear references to individual judgment in the Gospels; passages such as "Of every idle word men speak, they shall give account on the day of judgment" (Mt 12.36) can refer to either a particular or general judging. The particular judgment is implied in the story of Lazarus and the rich man (Lk 16.19–31). References to judgment occur always within the context of admonitions to penance and good works. Only repentance can save a man from the wrath to come (Mt 3.7-10; Lk 3.7-9). To avoid the dread sentence no price is too great: "It is better for thee to enter life maimed or lame, than, having two hands or two feet, to be cast into the everlasting fire" (Mt 18.8; see also: Mk 9.42–46). See HELL (IN THE BIBLE). In the light of coming judgment men are urged to enter by the narrow gate leading to life (Mt 7.13–14; Lk 13.24–30); to lay up lasting treasure in heaven (Mt 6.20); and for the sake of heaven to rejoice in suffering (Mt 5.12).

In his Epistles St. Paul reminds his hearers that "we shall all stand at the judgment seat of God" (Rom 14.10; see also: Acts 24.25; Heb 9.27–28). In 2 Cor 5.10 he speaks of judgment before the tribunal of Christ.

General Judgment. The theme of a judgment upon all men on the last day is a common one in Scripture. In both the OT and the NT it is often referred to as the DAY OF THE LORD.

In the Old Testament. The concept of general judgment in the OT occurs usually in the form of divine verdicts upon cities, tribes, or peoples in terms of punishment here on earth for their crimes. There is no doubt that events like the deluge (Gn 6.5-8.19) or the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 19.1-29) are presented as God's moral judgment upon human wickedness. The Book of JUDGES is built upon the often-repeated pattern of sin, punishment, repentance, and delivery. The prophetic writings in particular abound in harsh threats of the judgment awaiting the men and nations who continue to defy the Lord by the evil of their ways (Am 1.3-2.16; Ez 38.21-22; etc.). After the division of the kingdom, Amos threatened Israel and her neighbors with divine punishments for their manifold crimes (Am 1.4–6.14). Other prophets, too, direct their oracles against the pagan nations, reminding them of God's judgment to come (Is 13.1-19.25; Jer 46.1-51.64; Ez 25.1-32.32). These nations will feel God's wrath because of their crimes and because they have rejoiced over the desecration of the Temple and over Judah's downfall.

Although God will punish the arrogance of the pagans toward His chosen people, He nevertheless permits this conduct as His judgment upon faithless Israel: "I will chastise you as you deserve; I will not let you go unpunished" (Jer 46.28; see also: 17.4; 25.8–11). He uses the pagan nations as a rod for the punishment of His chosen ones (Is 10.5–11). Utter ruin and exile are the historical forms in which the Lord's judgments were expressed.

One of the earliest features of MESSIANISM in Israel was the expectation of "the day of the Lord," a time when God's destiny for His people would be fully and finally realized. This day of shame and destruction for Israel's enemies would bring corresponding triumph and prosperity to Israel. But the prophets question this understanding; Amos asks, "What will the day of the Lord mean for you? Darkness and not light!" (Am 5.18). This day will be "exceedingly terrible" (JI 2.11), a day "of wrath and burning anger" (Is 13.9). These and similar texts are often applied to the general judgment at the end of the world; see also: Ez 30.1–19; So 1.2–2.15.

As messianism developed, the prophetic vision of judgments upon individual nations and upon Israel became cosmic in scope: God's judgment would be a definitive intervention in history at the end of time (Dn 8.17), marked by devastation and destruction as preludes to a new order of things (Dn 2.31–45; 7.11–14, 17–27). In this apocalyptic literature the end of time is preceded by resurrection from the dead; the good will live forever, but everlasting horror and disgrace will be the lot of the wicked (Dn 12.2). The tribunal will pronounce against all the enemies of God and give to the just possession of the kingdom (Dn 7.9–18, 21–23, 26–27).

In the New Testament. Many specific references to the general judgment at the end of the world at the return of Christ occur in the New Testament. The most dramatic account of the general judgment is found in Mt 25.31–46; see also: Mk 13.14–27. The Judge, the standard of judgment, and the rewards and punishments are vividly described. At that time the SON OF MAN will render to everyone according to his conduct (Mt 16.27); it will be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon than for unbelievers (Mt 11.22–24; Lk 10.14); and the men of Nineve will rise in judgment against an unbelieving generation (Mt 12.41; Lk 11.32).

The judgment of condemnation is invariably linked with fire: John the Baptist warns that the bad tree will be cast into unquenchable fire (Mt 3.10; Lk 3.17; see also: Mt 18.8–9; Mk 9.42–47). Jesus uses the same metaphor in Mt 7.19, as well as in the parable of the wheat and weeds (Mt 13.30, 40–42). Buried in hell, the rich man longs for a single drop of water (Lk 16.22–24). In Matthew's classic description the wicked are committed to the fires intended for the Devil and his angels (Mt 25.41–46).

For the just the final judgment will be a vindication and often a reversal of their situation in this life; on that day they will take possession of the kingdom (Mt 25.34) and receive a hundredfold with life everlasting (Mt 19. 29–30). The ideas of the kingdom of God and judgment are closely associated: John preaches that the kingdom is at hand (Mt 3.2), and one can enter it only through repentance (Mt 3.7–8), which is also the condition for a favorable judgment. Further, a man's attitude toward the kingdom is often mentioned in terms applicable to the final judgment: "Not everyone who says to me, 'Lord, Lord,' shall enter the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 7.21). Finally, the kingdom in its full glory will be established only on the day of judgment, when the good will be separated from the wicked.

The general judgment is most often depicted as a single aspect of the PAROUSIA, the glorious return of Christ (Mt 16.27; 19.28–29; Lk 9.26). Historically, Catholic piety has often emphasized the judgment to the neglect of other features, such as the definitive establishment of God's kingdom and the inauguration of a new order of creation (see CREATION, 1). In the Parousia it is Christ who judges, but there are also texts which state that it is the Father who repays (Mt 6.4, 18; Lk 18.7) and that it is Christ who bears witness for the just (Mt 10.32).

John speaks of judgment in terms similar to those of the Synoptics (Jn 5.27, 29; 12.48), but in some passages a new note is found: judgment has already occurred (Jn 5.25; 12.31). In this realized eschatology the believer "does not come to judgment, but has passed from death to life" (Jn 5.24), while the wrath of God rests upon the unbeliever (Jn 3.36; see also 3.18). The twofold theme of light and life [see LIFE, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE)] in his Gospel is closely linked with judgment: "Now this is the judgment: The light has come into the world, yet men have loved the darkness rather than the light, for their works were evil" (Jn 3.19); and "he who is unbelieving towards the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God rests upon him" (Jn 3.36). John speaks of judgment having been committed to the Son (Jn 5.22, 27, 30; 9.39), but he also states that Jesus has not come to judge, but to save (Jn 3.17; 12.47). See JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.

The Epistles also speak of the last day when "God will judge the hidden secrets of men through Jesus Christ" (Rom 2.16; see also: Acts 17:31; 1 Pt 4.5). The role of Christ as judge is emphasized in all the texts; usually the judgment is spoken of in connection with the second coming of Christ (2 Thes 1.7–10; 2 Tm 4.1), when pronouncement will be made on both the living and the dead (Acts 10.42; 2 Tm 4.1; 1 Pt 4.5).

Since the judgment will manifest God's justice, St. Paul speaks of it as "the revelation of the Lord Jesus" (2 Thes 1.7). The day of the Lord described by the prophets becomes for him "the day of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 5.5; 2 Cor 1.14). The unexpectedness of God's visitation should prompt watchfulness (1 Thes 5.1–11) and perseverance in good works. The reward of the just is "to be ever with the Lord" (1 Thes 4.17), but the Lord will pour out his wrath upon sinners (Rom 2.5–10), slaying them with the breath of His mouth and the brightness of His coming (2 Thes 2.8).

Reflecting the traditions of the late apocalyptic writing of the Old Testament, the Book of Revelation emphasizes the resurrection of the dead before the final judgment (11.11), the utter destruction of God's enemies (ch. 6, 8, 9), the coming of Christ for judgment (14.7, 14–20), and the establishment of a new order of happiness and bliss for the elect (20.4–6).

Bibliography: Encyclopdeic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963)1241–47. A. PAUTREL and D. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT (Paris 1928–) 4:1321–94. F. BÜCHSEL and V. HERNTRICH, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 3:920-955. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das ZweiteVatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 4:727-731. F. HORST and H. CONZELMANN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 2:1417-21. W. EICHRODT, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. J. A. BAKER (Philadelphia 1961–) 1:381–391, 457-471. P. HEINISCH, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. W. G. HEIDT (Collegeville, MN 1950) 259-280. G. VON RAD, Old Testament Theology, tr. D. STALKER (New York 1962-) 1:370-383. W. COSSMANN, Die Entwicklung des Gerichts-Gedankens bei den alttestamentlichen Propheten (Giessen 1915). M. GOGUEL, Le Jugement dans le N. T. (Paris 1942) 5-20. J. A. T. ROBINSON, Jesus and His Coming (London 1957); "The Parable of the Sheep and the Goats," New Testament Studies 2 (1955-56) 225-237. C. H. DODD, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, England 1953) 201–212. F. V. FILSON, St. Paul's Conception of Recompense (Leipzig 1931). H. BRAUN, Gerichtsgedanke und Rechtfertigungslehre bei Paulus (Leipzig 1930).

[A. SUELZER]

JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY)

The theological treatment of divine judgment (1) considers it as it has been understood and expressed in the tradition of the Church, and then (2) goes on to a synthesis of the theology of divine judgment.

IN CATHOLIC TRADITION

The tradition of the Church continued the Biblical teaching on divine judgment and clarified some aspects of it that were obscure in the sacred text. The continuation of the Biblical teaching is especially noteworthy in the different professions of faith or creeds of the Church. From the very earliest, nearly all of them explicitly mention the fact that Christ is to come again to judge the living and the dead. One sees this in the Apostles' Creed in its varied early forms, in the so-called Athanasian Creed or Quicumque (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum 76), in the Nicene Creed (Denzinger 125), in the Creed of Constantinople I (Denzinger 150), in the Creed of Epiphanius (Denzinger 42, 44), and in many others in later centuries.

General Judgment. In distinction to the particular judgment, the general judgment occupied the primary place in the teaching and reflection of the early Church. It influenced Christian thought in many different ways. Athenagoras in the 2d century argued from the justice of God's judgment to the need for a resurrection of the body. He reasoned that if judgment were passed only on the soul, and the body were left dissolved forever into its constitutive elements, then God's judgment would be lacking in justice. For the one who practiced virtue or wickedness, the one who must be rewarded or punished through judgment, is the whole human person, body and soul, not the soul by itself. Hence, the very justice of the divine judgment requires the resurrection [Res. 20; TU 4.2: 73].

St. Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons in the latter part of the 2d century, writing against the Gnostic heretics and defending the doctrine of the resurrection, saw the coming of Christ itself as a work of judgment, for He comes "for the fall and the resurrection of many" (Lk 2.34). He brings ruin to those who refuse to believe in Him and resurrection to those who believe and do the Father's will. His coming thus separates people from one another and judges between them on the basis of their response to Him. The Father embraces all people in His loving providence, but human persons by their choices consent either to believe or to disobey and thus range themselves on the right hand or the left hand of the Word of God (Haer. 5.27–28).

St. Hippolytus in the early years of the 3d century considered Christ's exercise of judgment at the last day as His final accomplishment of the mission confided to Him by His Father. The just and the unjust are brought before Him, to whom all judgment has been committed. He then passes the just judgment of the Father upon all, giving to each person that which is deserved in accordance with the person's deeds [Graec. 3; TU 20.2: 141].

In the opening years of the 4th century Lactantius expressed a view peculiar to himself, that only persons who have been somehow introduced into the religion of God will be judged. All the rest he maintained (through an inaccurate exegesis of Ps 1.5) are already judged and condemned. Those who have known God must be judged on the basis of whether their deeds have been in conformity with the truth that was granted them or not. The good deeds will be weighed against the evil, and whichever prove the heavier will determine the person's eternal lot [Instit. 7.20; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 19:647–649].

Such testimonies to the Church's uninterrupted faith in the last judgment could be multiplied indefinitely. These, however, may suffice as examples of how this faith profoundly influenced the Christian view of life and of man's relationship to God.

Particular Judgment. The greatest area of clarification of the scriptural doctrine on judgment concerns the particular judgment of each individual made at the moment of death. Scripture never speaks explicitly of this judgment and in general says very little about the "intermediate state," the condition of the soul between death and resurrection. (The most important passages are Wisdom ch. 3–5; Lk 16.19–31; 2 Cor 5.6–9; and Phil

Last Judgment Portal of the Cathedral of Notre Dame, Paris, scenes of the Blessed and the Damned, commissioned by Maurice de Sully, Bishop of Paris, in 1163; completed mid-13th century. (©Adam Woolfit/CORBIS)

1.21–23.) But it is in developing the meaning of the few places that are found that the Church came to formulate an explicit doctrine on the particular judgment.

Early Centuries. In the very early ages of the Church there was much hesitation about affirming that before the resurrection and final judgment anyone was admitted to the face-to-face vision of God. The roots of this hesitation seem to have been two: the strong emphasis in Scripture on the judgment of the last day as the time when each person will receive an appropriate reward or punishment; and the teaching of the Revelation (20.1–6) on a millennium, which some interpreted as an actual 1,000-year reign of Christ upon earth at the end of time, just before the last judgment (see MILLENARIANISM). But in spite of this hesitation no one among orthodox Christians questioned that at death the period of trial for the human person is over. And though at first they did not use the term judgment, yet the Fathers clearly taught that from the moment of death onward the good and the wicked are definitively separated from one another.

The End Times, from "Liber Chronicarum," woodcut print, compiled by Hartmann Schedel. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

St. Justin shortly after the middle of the 2d century expressed the opinion in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew that at death the souls of the good and wicked are given separate dwelling places, the place of the good being better than that of the wicked. Here they await the day of the great judgment (5; PG 6.488).

Tatian, writing about the same time, distinguished between death and dissolution. The soul that does not know the truth both dies and is dissolved with the body. Later, however, it must rise at the end of the world to receive undying death in punishment. But the soul that has knowledge of God does not die, though for a time it is dissolved [Orat. 13; TU 4.1:14]. This appears to mean that the souls of the wicked are not only separated from the body but are annihilated until the last day, whereas the souls of the good are separated for a time from the body but remain in existence. In any event, it implies that a judgment of God upon them takes place at death.

In the opening years of the third century Tertullian considered that all souls except those of the martyrs are consigned to the lower regions. Here, however, there is an anticipation of the judgment to come. For the good experience refreshment and consolation; and the evil, punishment and pain. The martyrs are at once given entrance into paradise with Christ [Anim. 55, 58, CSEL 20:388, 394–395; Res. 43, CSEL 47:88–89].

St. Hilary of Poitiers in the following century used the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16.19–31) to warn sinners that hell will receive them at once at the moment of death. They are not to cajole themselves into thinking that they will have some respite before their punishment begins. Though the last day brings the judgment of eternal blessedness or eternal punishment, death meanwhile is governed by its own laws, which determine that either ABRAHAM's BOSOM or a place of torment is to be the waiting place for that day [In psalm. 2.49; CSEL 22:74].

Writing around the year 420, St. Augustine spoke explicitly of a judgment that awaits the soul as soon as it leaves the body, and he distinguished this from the great judgment to come after the resurrection. He, too, appealed to the parable of the rich man and Lazarus and regarded any denial of such a judgment as an obstinate refusal to listen to the truth of the gospel [Anima 2.4.8; CSEL 60:341]. But he was not sure if this means that the just see God face to face before the resurrection [Retract. 1.13.2; CSEL 36:67].

Intermediate State. The question of the intermediate state, and by implication the particular judgment, did not enter the solemn teaching of the Church in an ecumenical council until the Second Council of Lyons in 1274. The occasion for this treatment was a reunion with the Orthodox Churches of the East. During the time of the schism the West had come to hold firmly the doctrine of a particular judgment immediately after death, followed at once by the reward of heaven, or the temporary purification of PURGATORY, or the punishment of hell. The East, on the other hand, had no universal doctrinal uniformity in this matter. Consequently, the profession of faith of this Council contained the doctrine held in the West, though it did not use the expression "particular judgment" [Denzinger 856–859]. This judgment is clearly implied, however, in the just assignment of rewards or punishments straightway after death. The same thing is to be said of another Council of reunion, that of Florence in 1439 [Denzinger 1304–06]. The doctrine of the Council of Florence was confirmed in 1575 by Pope Gregory XIII, when there was again question of restoring communion between the East and the West [Denzinger 1986], and once more in 1743 by Benedict XIV in a profession of faith for the Eastern Maronite Christians, which expressly mentioned the first eight ecumenical councils and then Florence [Denzinger 1468] and Trent.

Benedictus Deus. One other important document on the intermediate state deserves special mention in connection with the particular judgment. It is the apostolic constitution (see BENEDICTUS DEUS [Denzinger 1000-02]) issued by Benedict XII in 1336 to set at rest certain doubts and questions that had been raised by the preaching of his immediate predecessor, John XXII. In a series of sermons given toward the end of 1331 and the beginning of 1332 at Avignon, Pope John had maintained as his opinion that until the resurrection no one enjoyed the intuitive vision of the divine essence. This was contrary to the common belief of the faithful and aroused much commotion. The Pope established a commission of cardinals and theologians to investigate the question, and they showed the Pope that his opinion was a departure from the Catholic faith. He retracted his opinion in writing just before his death in 1334. His successor, then, after a more complete examination of the whole matter issued a strict dogmatic definition of faith. He taught solemnly that the BEATIFIC VISION of God is granted to the just directly after death (of after purgatory, when this is necessary). Those dying in mortal sin are likewise at once punished in hell. As is most evident, this teaching involves a particular judgment of God, separating the just from the impenitent sinners and giving to each what is due.

Reformers. The early Protestant reformers did not assume a completely clear position on the intermediate state. Luther at one time held that with very few exceptions all souls sleep unconscious until the day of judgment [Letter to Amsdorf, Jan. 13, 1552; Luther's Works, v.48 (Philadelphia 1963) 361]. But it is not certain that he thereafter continuously affirmed this. Calvin, on the other hand, opposed the Anabaptist position that maintained that all souls sleep until the resurrection. He taught that though all things are held in suspense until the appearance of Christ the Redeemer, still the souls of the pious, having ended their time of battle, enter into blessed rest and await joyfully the promised glory, and the reprobate suffer such torments as they deserve [Instit. 3.25.6; ed. J. T. McNeil, 2 v. (Philadelphia 1960) 2:996–998]. They did not therefore completely deny a particular judgment for each soul at death. The Church issued no special new decree regarding their positions except to reaffirm the doctrine on purgatory [Denzinger 1580, 1820], which had been expressly opposed, and which of course implies a doctrine of particular judgment.

Since that time no documents of major importance have appeared relative to the particular judgment. It is a doctrine universally taught and believed throughout the Catholic Church, though only implicitly contained in its solemn definitions and declarations of faith. It is likewise held by many Protestant and Orthodox Christians.

THEOLOGY OF DIVINE JUDGMENT

This will be considered under four heads: (1) the essential idea of divine judgment as the act of God by which God achieves the divine purposes through the creature's free response to divine initiative; (2) the continuous judgment of God as the divine activity of government in executing the unfolding plan of providence; (3) the particular judgment of God as a special focus of the divine judging activity of God upon each individual in the moment of death; (4) the general judgment of God as the final consummating act of God in Christ, achieving the purpose of creation.

Essential Idea. One may proceed on the basis of all that is revealed in Sacred Scripture about divine judgment and of the meditation of the Church upon this revelation as it is manifested in the writings of the Fathers and teaching of the magisterium.

Description. This judgment may be described as God's vindication of the divine purposes in the face of the free activity of rational creatures. There is never any question of God's judgment falling upon irrational creatures, except in an analogical or symbolic fashion, as in Christ's cursing of the barren fig tree; for in the final analysis what they do is wholly determined either by the natures they have received from God (these natures variously interacting among themselves) or from the use to which they are put by the actions of free creatures. Thus, in a schematic fashion, God's judgment may be regarded as the third moment in the dialogue between God and God's free creatures that constitutes salvation history. The first moment is that of God's free, loving, merciful initiative. It embodies the divine creative purpose to share in the goodness and happiness of God with a society of angels and human beings united to God and to one another in vision, love, and joy. This divine initiative is of its nature prior to all created existence and activity. The second moment is that of the creature's free response to this loving initiative. In its response the creature either freely consents to act according to God's purpose, or in a greater or lesser degree rejects it and thus estranges itself from God and God's intentions. The third moment is God's reassertion of the divine purpose in the face of this created free response, no matter what it was; here God vindicates effectively the divine intentions and brings them to realization in a way that is somehow shaped by the creature's response. God passes judgment upon free created activity and thereby completes what God intends to achieve.

From this description of divine judgment, its effects may be listed as four: to destroy, to purify, to perfect, and to separate. God's judgment destroys the sinful response that rejected the divine initiative. This destruction does not mean annihilating the creature or making the creature's response not to have been, but it ultimately frustrates the evil intention of the sinner by somehow making this sinful purpose serve God's own merciful design. God's judgment purifies the imperfect response by removing what is unacceptable. Here there is a partial destruction in something that is fundamentally good. The latent selfishness and disorder of the creature's free activity is effectively, though perhaps painfully, eliminated from its final results. Where the response to God's initiative has been one of total acceptance, the judgment of God brings the creature's activity to full perfection. God's judgment perfects by realizing in the creature and through it the complete good aimed at by the loving, divine initiative. Finally, the judgment of God separates sometimes slowly, sometimes suddenly, but always as a manifestation of mercy and justice, those who consent to submit freely to God from those who refuse.

There is a special Christian orientation of divine judgment that needs to be mentioned even in this very general preliminary description. In the cross and Resurrection of Christ God has already passed a definitive judgment upon the totality of Christ's work, and it is a judgment of mercy. Christ is the center of God's creative and redemptive plan. He is the new head under whom all things are summed up (Eph 1.10). Christ freely responded in obedience and love to the Father's merciful disposition for the liberation of humankind from sin. The Father passed a judgment of mercy and eternal life upon all humankind in raising Jesus from the dead and constituting Him the effective source of the world's final glorification within the created world itself. From now on there is no other way in which the justifying and glorifying judgment of God falls upon an individual except in and through Christ. The last age has already begun in Him; it will be manifested and realized in all people when Christ comes again to judge the living and the dead.

Definition. Divine judgment may be essentially defined as the activity of God's intellect and will whereby God accomplishes the divine purposes in the created world according to the free responses of creatures to his prior loving initiative in the order of nature and grace. It is an act of the divine intellect, since God hereby knows the free response of the creature, the goodness or badness of that response, the consequences that follow from it, and the way it can be fitted into the divine plan. It is an act of the divine will because in judgment God effectively determines to order the free act of the creature and its consequences to God's own purposes. Judgment is thus the essential act of divine government, the effective execution of the plan of divine providence.

This understanding of judgment allows one then to make a threefold division. (1) The continuous judgment of God upon each and every free creaturely response to God's initiative. In this sense it may be said that human beings are living always under the divine judgment and that everything that happens is in some way a consequence of the judgment of God. But the full meaning of this continuous judgment of God remains to be revealed at the last day. (2) The particular judgment of God upon the individual at the moment of death. Here the judging activity of God comes to a special focus, since the individual at death makes a final, complete, irreversible response to God's loving initiative. (3) The general judgment of God upon the totality of created things. Here is the ultimate focus of the divine judging activity. God brings to final perfection the whole divine work, the universe, according to the entire history of creaturely response to God's merciful designs. All other divine judgments are integrated into this last universally consummating act, which establishes the whole of creation in its final form and sustains it forever as the perfect embodiment of divine wisdom and power and love.

Continuous Judgment of God. Human beings, both as individuals and as societies, live under the continuous judgment of God. Every free response they make to God's loving initiative is at once judged by God and related to the achievement of the divine purposes. During the period of mortal life, when the creature's choice is capable of reform and development, God's judgment also contains within it a further initiative of love. God does not simply judge what has been done but continues to invite to a fuller participation in the divine life, through a call to repentance or to further growth.

Upon Individuals. One can consider the continuous judgment of God upon individuals as it affects four different classes: repentant sinners, unrepentant sinners, the just who are endeavoring to do good, and the just who are growing careless. The judgment of God upon sin is always a destructive judgment, rendering it ultimately futile in its rebellious purpose. But as mercy tempers this judgment, God invites the sinner to destroy his own evil deed through repentance. The sinner, of course, is completely incapable of repenting and accomplishing this destruction through his own power. It is God who must draw the sinner to appreciate the disorder of his life and to reject it. This judgment of mercy leading to interior repentance was objectively passed on all sinners in the death of Christ upon the cross, "because when as yet we were sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom 5.8-9). It is applied to the individual sinner through faith in Christ, through fear of God's just punishments, confidence in God's mercy, sorrow for sin, and determination to follow God's will in the future. God then pronounces a further judgment upon the repentant sinner; this judgment is called JUSTIFICATION. By it God makes the unjust person just, the enemy a friend, and thereby accomplishes the divine purposes in accordance with the response the creature has made to God's initiative. It must be emphasized that in this manifestation of saving justice God goes far beyond anything the repentant sinner is entitled to. No response the sinner has made to grace has given him any claim upon God. God's justifying judgment is a triumph of mercy, a supreme demonstration of loving kindness. This judgment was objectively passed upon all repentant sinners in the Resurrection of Christ from the dead, "who was delivered up for our sins, and rose again for our justification" (Rom 4.25). As the sinner has died to sin with Christ's death upon the cross, so he has risen to a new life in Christ's Resurrection.

When the sinner refuses to repent, persistently rejecting the light offered by God and resisting the attraction of God's GRACE, the judgment of God is to blind the sinner and to harden the sinner's heart. This is not a positive action on God's part; it means the withdrawal of the graces that the sinner has been refusing to accept. The immediate result of this judgment of God is the sinner's experience of personal weakness. The sinful condition is deepened and the misery of the sinner's plight forces itself upon his awareness. But even here God's mercy is at work, for the darkness and unrest that take possession of the sinner's heart are intended by God to lead to an awareness of the need for repentance and forgiveness. They are designed to break through the barrier of the sinner's resistance, not by violence or coercion, but by making the sinner taste the bitterness of this voluntary estrangement from God. It might be thought that God could more easily overcome this resistance by dazzling the sinner with the brightness of divine light and drawing him with a virtually irresistible sweetness of attraction toward what is good and holy. And it seems at times that God does act in this way in the beginning of a sinner's conversion. But one who is moved toward good in this way is still largely self-seeking; and if it is only on these terms that such a person will do what God commands, this is not really serving God but oneself. Thus, the normal judgment of God upon the unrepentant sinner is to harden and blind the sinner so that the realization of his personal insufficiency may prepare him for conversion and justification. A person may persist in trying to satisfy his deep personal need by the pursuit of power, pleasure, and fame through an exertion of energy that can end only in despair. To refuse the light is to close one's being to the advance of God's grace; and this hardening is a prelude to everlasting fixity in sin, everlasting darkness, everlasting despair—not because God so intended it, but because the sinner has made anything else impossible.

The judgment of God upon the just person who continuously responds in adoring love to the initiative of God's grace is to further sanctify and draw such a person further into FRIENDSHIP WITH GOD, that is, with the Holy Trinity. This judgment of God is not always an immediately pleasant experience. Our Lord said that His Father is a vinedresser who prunes the branches that bear fruit in order that they may bear more fruit (Jn 15.2). The judgment of God, while rewarding with a more abundant life those who seek God in forgetfulness of merely selfish concerns, acts also to promote a further selflessness, a deeper humility, a freer pursuit of the sovereign good. This, too, is a mingling of mercy with justice in the execution of judgment.

The just person who begins to retreat into the selfishness he once renounced is also an object of God's judgment. God gradually lets such a one experience a deep personal weakness and insufficiency, generally in small ways at first, to enable the person to learn from lesser falls the imminent danger of a greater fall. But if he continues to fail to live according to the measure of divine life the God has given, the judgment of God will be to desert him just as he has been deserting God. A halfhearted response to grace will prove insufficient to enable a person to remain essentially faithful to God, and a serious lapse will follow as a consequence of God's judgment. Once again, this judgment of God contains within it an initiative of mercy: to make the careless one realize the danger of the situation and amend his life so as to grow as God wishes.

In these judgments of God upon individuals according to their responses to his initiative one can discern the general characteristic effects of judgment noted above. God in justifying the repentant sinner, hardening the unrepentant sinner, sanctifying further the fervent just person, and gradually deserting the careless just person is destroying sin, purifying what is imperfect, perfecting what is good, and thus separating those who respond to him in adoring love from those who refuse to do so.

Upon Societies. Sacred Scripture makes it clear that God's continuous judgment falls not only on individuals as such but also on societies. The earliest concepts of divine retribution that one finds in the Hebrew Scriptures reflect this fact. A man's faithfulness or unfaithfulness had its repercussions also upon his descendants. Groups and nations were condemned or rewarded by God for their corporate actions. Later insistence upon a greater measure of personal responsibility modified but never destroyed the earlier point of view. It remains true that where one can identify a common action and a common responsibility one can speak of a judgment of God upon the group as such. This consideration opens up vast fields for trying to understand God's action in the world; but the treatment here will confine itself to some theological observations about the continuous judgment of God upon the Church, upon civil societies, upon families, and upon other human associations in general.

It may seem strange to speak of the Church as such coming under the judgment of God. The Church is the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST, vivified by the Holy Spirit, charged with the mission and authority of Christ to teach, govern, sanctify, and save all people, divinely preserved from error in its teaching, assured of an unfailing existence until the end of time. This description might lead one to assume that though individual members of the church may come under divine judgment, the Church as such is rather to be regarded as one with the divine Judge. It is true that what is divine in the Church, what is purely and simply the action of God's merciful and redeeming love, does not come under divine judgment. But whatever in the Church involves in any way a human, free response to God does come under the judgment of God. The fact that the Church has authority from Christ does not mean that this authority will always be exercised in the best possible way. The fact that the Sacraments give grace from the power of Christ at work in them does not mean that sacramental discipline is always the one best calculated for the upbuilding of the Church. The fact that the Church cannot universally err in matters of faith and morals does not mean that it will always insist on the most significant truths or interpret them to the world in the way best suited to enlighten it. In all these ways and many more the Church as such through its leaders and its members can fail to respond properly to God's initiative within it. Or to put the matter positively, in all these areas each generation of the PEOPLE OF GOD is called upon to prove itself loyal to the covenant God has made with it in the blood of His Son.

The continuous judgment of God upon the Church does not directly affect its external success or temporal well-being; for these are not matters that are directly involved in its mission. But the Church as such will live a fervent life of faith, worship, unity, love, and apostolic concern as a consequence of God's judgment upon a submissive response of the Church's members to the guidance of the divine Spirit within the Church. Or else, the Church can experience division, formalism, defections, apostolic ineffectiveness, and scandal as God's judgment on those who seek the things that are their own and not the things of Jesus Christ. No one in the Church can be excused of responsibility before God as judge because of a particular position within the community; nor can the Church as a whole expect that, no matter what its response to God may be, its mission will be as abundantly fruitful and its witness to the world as unambiguously clear just because God is at work within it.

The continuous judgment of God likewise rests upon civil society, for this too is an instrument of divine providence for realizing God's purposes. Occasionally natural disaster or prosperity can reflect the judgment of God, as one sees illustrated in the Hebrew Scriptures. But normally the judgment of God will be seen in what directly touches the inner well-being of the society itself, in the presence or absence of tranquillity, opportunities for personal development, respect for law and civic officials, confidence in the organs of government, a tradition of genuine regard for the rights of others, and whatever else knits a people together for continuing and effective cooperation for the welfare of all. To the extent that a citizenry willingly conforms to the order of reason that manifests God's will, to that extent they as a whole will experience the tranquillity of order that is peace. It is true that there is question here largely of the working out of the natural laws of social relations; but these laws express the divine initiative on the natural level, and their built-in sanctions represent God's effective judgment on the same level.

Families, especially where these are constituted by a sacramental union, occupy a special place in God's plan and fall in a special way under God's judgment. The frequent blessings in the Hebrew Scriptures on families as such make this fact clear. But, once again, it would be a mistake to see God's judgment on a family chiefly in things that are external to it, in its wealth, social status, or even its health. Rather, to the extent that the family strives to live together in unselfish love and to worship God together in gratitude and trust, its members will as a group know the contentment that comes from God's approving judgment; and as they are negligent or disobedient in these areas, they will experience God's judgment in domestic strife, jealousy, suspicion, and unhappiness.

All other human societies and institutions follow the same pattern. Where the members genuinely cooperate for the establishment of a common good, the society will flourish, and all will benefit from the common good established by their combined efforts. But where the body of members begin to seek their own selfish aims, the institution is on its way to failure and dissolution. God's judgment upon societies as such is necessarily realized in temporal results, for these societies do not as such have an unending existence. The individual members of these societies, of course, will be judged eternally according to their individual responsibilities. A given society can exist through many generations of members, and a later generation may experience the full force of the judgment of God upon the corporate actions of an earlier generation.

For by joining themselves to this society and by ratifying in their attitudes what was determined by their ancestors, they assume the responsibility, not individually but corporately, of what was done earlier. Hence, for example, it is not incongruous that the Church at Vatican Council II should have expressed repentance and asked pardon for the faults of an earlier generation of Catholics that had contributed to the disunity of the Church [Decree on Ecumenism 7; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965)97].

Particular Judgment of God at Death. Since divine judgment is the activity by which God achieves the divine purposes through the free responses made by creatures to God's gracious initiative, there are two moments of special focus for this activity, as was noted earlier. These are the moment of death, when the human person's response to God becomes total and definitive, and the moment of Christ's Second Coming, when the purposes of God are brought to final realization. The judgment of the individual at the moment of death is called the particular judgment.

Sources of Data. As was explained in the section on divine judgment in Catholic tradition, the existence of the particular judgment as a special instance of divine activity is attested only indirectly but certainly in Sacred Scripture and the documents of the Church. It is implied in the truths that at death the good and the wicked are straightway rewarded or punished for their choices during life and that these rewards and punishments are definitive (except for purgatory, which is a transitional state in preparation for the reward of heaven). Scripture makes this clear in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16.19-31) and in St. Paul's desire to die and be with Christ (Phil 1.21–23; 2 Cor 5.6–9). Besides the testimony of the early Fathers, who always insist on a separation of the good and evil immediately after death but are not always clear that this results at once in definitive rewards and punishments, there is especially to be noted in this connection the apostolic constitution Benedictus Deus in which was solemnly defined the truth that the good after death (or after purgatory, if that is necessary) receive without delay the eternal beatific vision of God and that the wicked dying in mortal sin likewise without delay begin the punishment of hell [Denzinger 1000-02].

In the Soul. A certain type of devotional literature and popular preaching has pictured the particular judgment as a kind of judicial process, where accusations are made and a defense is offered, where one's guardian angel and patron saints plead the cause of the one being judged against the indictment leveled against the person by devils intent on carrying the soul off to hell. Meanwhile, Christ listens to both sides and at length pronounces a just sentence from which there is no appeal.

However helpful this may be to foster a proper attitude toward the seriousness of the particular judgment, it does not correspond to the way in which God's judgment is passed and the sentence executed. The particular judgment takes place wholly within the individual soul by the power of God's mind and will, which effectively and definitively joins the final dispositions of the soul with their appropriate realization. The soul in the moment of death is all that the free choices of a lifetime have made it. The dispositions of the soul in this moment sum up all the responses to God's initiative it has ever made (see DEATH, THEOLOGY OF). The soul is therefore voluntarily related to God and all creation in a certain definite manner. It is fitted to occupy a certain place in the plan of God. God's judgment both makes clear to the soul what it has made of itself and gives it that place in the total design of divine wisdom and love that the soul is suited to fill. In a sense the soul judges itself; for in the light of the divine judgment the soul inescapably recognizes and affirms what it has become and what it deserves, and by an internal impulse growing out of this condition it is carried toward its destiny, St. Thomas observes, in much the same way as a heavy object is carried earthward and a light object heavenward.

Definitive. The particular judgment at death is definitive and irrevocable. During life the individual has been under the continuous judgment of God. But this has always been somewhat provisional, never totally definitive so long as the human response was intrinsically mutable and the divine initiative capable of still different approaches and manifestations. The consummating judgment of God upon the human person in death is no longer provisional but completely definitive. It resumes in itself and ratifies the whole continuous judgment of God made throughout the person's life. All the partial achievements of the divine purpose in respect to this individual become united in a total achievement, for the good of God's whole plan and for the weal or the woe of this individual depending on the basic option manifested in his life and made firm in death.

One who during life has been led by the Spirit of God (cf. Rom 8.11), who has repented of all personal sins and through the power of Christ made satisfaction for them, and who in death has perfectly assimilated the dying of Christ, experiences the particular judgment as God's action as completely perfecting and fulfilling. God is the ultimate cause of salvation, and here is finally united to the creature who now experiences intuitive vision, unfailing love, and selfless joy. By the divine judgment God assumes the soul irreversibly and wholly into the kingdom of God

For one whose fundamental attitude is one of love of God, but who bears the stains of lesser sins or has failed to respond fully to that grace which would lead him to deeper union with Christ and help in making satisfaction for the grievous sins that have been forgiven him, the particular judgment is experienced first as a purifying action of God, one that removes and repairs what is disordered within the soul. Theologians generally distinguish purgatory and the particular judgment, but this distinction should not lead one to separate them. Purgatory is the state or condition established by the judgment of God considered as a purifying action to complete the work of grace in preparing the soul for heaven. It is generally thought that created agents are in some way the instruments of God's judgment in accomplishing this purification. But what or how this is so is not entirely clear. In any event, the ultimate purifying force is precisely the judgment of God upon the soul. The soul likewise experiences within the purifying judgment of God the immensity of God's love and the fundamental approval given its life. It is drawn to undergo in peace and perfect willingness the process that strips it of all selfishness and introduces it into everlasting blessedness.

The soul of one who dies in sin, rejecting to the last the offer of God's mercy and the invitation to repentance, experiences the particular judgment as a divine rejection, a destroying force rendering futile the self-centered goals it has refused to renounce. It must be emphasized that the individual who is lost is the ultimate cause of his own destruction. For the ultimate evil to be found in this final result is not traceable to any deficiency in God or God's activity but to the deficiency of the individual in his free response to God. God's judgment of destruction upon the individual is not the ultimate reason why a human person is lost (the individual person bears this responsibility); but it is God's affirmation of achieving the divine ultimate purpose not only in spite of, but somehow even through this rebellious individual who has chosen to be excluded from personal participation in the enjoyment of the divine good in the city of the blessed. God's action reduces this soul to the status of a mere thing, a means to an end, deprived by its own choice of the special dignity attaching to itself as person. The soul is given what it has in the last analysis really been choosing: itself, in isolation from God and in disorder with respect to the rest of the world—and this is the essential meaning of hell. And it thereby becomes through a tragic paradox an eternal witness to the fact that God is the source of all good, for cut off from God it has nothing in which it can finally rest. It witnesses also to the supreme worthiness of God to be loved, for having freely refused to love God it finds itself justly and by its own choice fixed in eternal misery.

Thus the particular judgment as it is passed on each individual at the moment of death separates finally the good and the evil. Under this action of God the world in the course of time is assuming the definite shape and structure of personal relations it will have forever.

Time and Place? Questions are sometimes raised about the time and place of the particular judgment. Some think of an interval between death and judgment when the soul is being transported to a heavenly tribunal. But such considerations spring from a too vivid imagination that attempts to picture sensibly what is wholly spiritual. The judgment of God takes place precisely at the moment of death, when the soul is separated from the body and begins to operate independently of matter. The separated soul has no spatial relationships to the material world, and so the question as to the place of the particular judgment is not a wholly intelligible one. Suffice it to say that the particular judgment does not so much occur in a place as it effectively puts the soul in a place, i.e., a state that is heaven, purgatory, or hell.

General Judgment of God. The continuous judgment of God and all particular divine judgments are ordered to the final, great consummating act of God in the general judgment when God brings all the divine, merciful designs to full realization.

Establishment of Heavenly Society. It might seem at first thought that the general judgment is a kind of anticlimax, that everything has already been decided in the sum of particular judgments, and that all one has here is a sort of public resumé of the many private acts of judgment that have been passed on all individuals in the course of history. But this is to miss the perspective of the divine purpose. It is noteworthy that Sacred Scripture frequently mentions the general judgment and nowhere explicitly mentions the particular judgment. For what God intends is not simply to save a large number of isolated souls, who thereafter happen to form themselves into a heavenly society. What God intends primarily is to establish this heavenly society, this family of persons joined to the Persons of the Holy Trinity and to one another in everlasting knowledge, love, and joy. The definitive establishment of this society is had in the general judgment.

The difference between the particular and general judgment and the importance of both can be further understood by recognizing that at one level each human person is an individual created being, while at another level each individual is also part of the total order of the universe, part of God's total design. The particular judgment consummates each person precisely in terms of its individuality, in that person's individual relationship to God, in the loneliness of the moment of death. The general judgment consummates the whole universe and the individual person along with it as a part, in that person's social relationship to all other things, in the great gathering together of all human persons at the resurrection.

It is not sufficient to distinguish these judgments by saying that in the particular the human person's soul is judged and in the general the body also. This is true enough, but it does not at all account for the greater importance of the general judgment in Holy Scripture. Human bodies are judged at the general judgment, because in the realization of God's plan human nature is reintegrated, and all human beings in their complete human personalities as body-soul composites are given the places in God's total work that their free responses to God's prior initiative have fitted them to occupy.

Some theologians have spoken of the need for a further general judgment in addition to the particular because human beings need to be judged with regard to all the consequences of their acts, and these may well continue long after the individual's death, even until the end of the world. Thus it would not be possible to judge them completely at the moment of death; another judgment at the end of time is required for all. Although there is some truth to this way of looking at things, by itself it does not seem conclusive. Strictly speaking, a person is responsible only for the consequences he foresees and intends in some way, not for everything that happens to follow upon his free choices. Hence, the individual can be judged at death for the consequences for which he is strictly responsible, and cannot really be judged at all for the other consequences. The element of truth, however, in this way of looking at the matter would seem to lie in the fact that one does influence others by one's personal choices in ways that reach across time and place and help to constitute a corporate response of humankind to the total initiative of God's love. This corporate response is indeed judged by God at the end of time. It is, of course, a response that divides humankind into two groups, those who accept this initiative and those who reject it. God's judgment forms one group into the city of God, and casts the other into outer darkness.

Names and Aspects. This judgment at the end of time has a number of different names that serve to underline various aspects of it. It is called God's judgment, because the Holy Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit together, are through their common divine act the supreme cause of the final perfection of the universe; it is a judgment passed by all of them (though by each in a way appropriate to His position within the Trinity), and it achieves the divine purpose by rewarding and punishing according to the response given the Trinitarian initiative.

It is called also the judgment of Christ. Our Lord in His humanity exercises the role of judge as one who has received this power from His Father. The New Testament and tradition are unanimous in giving Him this function. There is no opposition between a judgment of the Holy Trinity and a judgment of Christ. The Holy Trinity judges through the judgment of Christ. It is His, an activity truly proceeding from His human intellect and will, but endowed with a divine efficacy as belonging to a Divine Person within the Trinity. The act of judging is, indeed, Christ's last and greatest act as savior of mankind. Here, as will be considered presently, the glorified head of all creation completes the work assigned Him in the moment of His Incarnation.

This judgment is called the general judgment, since it embraces all human beings, good and bad, the living and the dead. The latter expression, which occurs in Scripture (Acts 10.42; 2 Tm 4.1; 1 Pt 4.5) and is found in nearly all professions of faith (Apostles' Creed, Nicene Creed, etc.), has two possible meanings. It may mean those spiritually alive and spiritually dead, and thus be the same as the good and the wicked. Or it may mean those who are physically alive at His coming and those who have already died, but are now raised to life. In any event, it is intended as a comprehensive formula to show that all people are subject to Christ's judgment.

This judgment is also called the last or the final judgment, since it is completely definitive. It does not look forward to any other judgment by which what is done here may be completed, modified, or set aside. Beyond lies only the sustaining power of God, upholding forever what is here established.

Apocalyptic Descriptions. One is accustomed to associate the general judgment with other events at the end of time, notably Christ's Second Coming and the resurrection of the dead. Following the imagery of Scripture, one thinks of Christ coming on the clouds of heaven in great glory. The dead are raised by His power to a neverending union of body and soul. And all are gathered before Him, the good on one side, the wicked on the other, to hear the fateful words of His welcome or banishment. In times past, too, it was a subject of some speculation just where this gathering together of all people would take place. Many spoke of the valley of Josaphat, relying on an expression found in the Prophet Joel (JI 4.2).

But one must recognize that Scripture in these places is using a symbolic language to help people understand the greatness of this concluding intervention of God in human history. Neither Christ's Ascension into heaven nor His Second Coming should be thought of in terms of local motion simply visible to the eye. Christ "ascends" into heaven by entering into His glory, by being raised from the dead and completely filled in His humanity by the power of the Holy Spirit, by being associated as man in God's supreme Lordship over all creation. He "comes again" when by an exercise of His fullness of power He makes Himself present in the world, transforming it and bringing it to the state of its final perfection.

One Consummating Intervention. Scripture gives indications that the Second Coming, resurrection of the dead, and last judgment are really only diverse aspects of one single consummating divine intervention. Christ executes judgment in raising all humans from the dead, some to a resurrection of life, others to a resurrection of judgment (in John's customary sense of "condemnation," Jn 5.25–29). Christ comes in the act of raising people from the dead (cf. 1 Cor 15.22–23; Phil 3.20–21). Christ judges by His coming [cf. 2 Tm 4.1 (in many Greek and Latin MSS); Heb 9.27–28]. Admittedly the places here referred to do not clearly state the identity affirmed above, but they suggest a radical unity that prompts the theologian to look more deeply into the matter.

In general a divine coming is based on an exercise of divine power that produces some new effect. Thus, the Holy Spirit comes as God infuses sanctifying grace or increases it within human persons. Hence, having recognized that Christ's Second Coming is not simply a matter of local motion and visible manifestations, one perceives that this coming, this new presence of His, is in function of a new exercise of His power producing a new effect. Thus He comes in power to the whole world when He effects a consummating transformation of all humankind. He does this by raising all people from the dead, "by exerting the power by which He is able also to subject all things to Himself" (Phil 3.21). And in effecting the resurrection of all people He gives to each a bodily condition that reflects the state of the soul in each case. Those who are united to God in the life of divine grace manifest in their bodies the glory of divine adoption. They "shine forth like the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Mt 13.43). Those souls that are dead in sin are united to a body that rather possesses and imprisons them than is possessed by them as an instrument of self-expression and life. Individuals who are alive at this Second Coming of Christ will not undergo death as a separation of body and soul; for as St. Paul wrote, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed" (1 Cor 15.51). They will experience the moment of total commitment that death involves, and their bodies will be changed to accord with their inner relationship to God.

Christ Our Lord in causing this resurrection and transformation of all people is in effect judging them. He is realizing in the totality of humankind God's gracious and loving purpose according to the response that every person has made to that purpose. Each and all are brought to the final state of relationship to God, to one another, and to all of creation, that has been shaped by their individual and collective responses to God's initiative. "Then comes the end, when He delivers the kingdom to God the Father, when He does away with all sovereignty, authority and power . . . that God may be all in all' (1 Cor 15.24, 28).

Victory and Purification. In this act of judging, which is at once Christ's Second Coming and the cause of humankind's resurrection, Our Lord reduces to utter powerlessness and futility all that is opposed to the selfgiving, creative love of God. Fallen angels and condemned humans are compelled by the inner consequences of their rebellion to glorify the power and wisdom and goodness of God in the justice of their punishment. This judgment is likewise a purification for those just who are alive at the coming of Christ but are not perfectly prepared for heaven. For them, particular judgment and general judgment coincide, and the purification of purgatory is here accomplished. St. Paul described this purifying effect of Christ's judgment in the special case of some who were preaching in Corinth from unworthy motives; he made the supposition, without however actually affirming it, that they would be alive at the coming of Christ. In this case, the FIRE OF JUDGMENT will test the quality of each person's works; if a person's work burns such a one will suffer loss, "but will personally be saved, yet so as through fire" (cf. 1 Cor 3.10–15).

But most important, Christ's judgment in the glorious resurrection of the saints completes the building of the new Jerusalem. In these human beings and in the faithful angels, God's intention to share the joy of the divine Trinitarian life with created persons who relate to God in adoring love is triumphantly achieved. These persons together constitute the society of the blessed, the bride of the Lamb (Rv 21.9), "the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2 Pt 1.11).

This theological view of the general judgment does not destroy the beautiful imagery of Scripture but helps one to see the reality that lies behind it. The coming of Christ in glory upon the clouds, His voice calling all people from the grave, the assembling of all before Him to hear His sentence—all the meaning of these images is found in that totally transforming action by which Christ makes Himself present to all people, raising them from the dead, and assigning to each and all their places in the perfectly realized plan of God.

Revelation in Judgment. Finally, the general judgment is a public divine intervention making known to all the justice of God's judgment. "Therefore, pass no judgment before the time, until the Lord comes, who will both bring to light the things hidden in darkness and make manifest the counsels of hearts; and then everyone will have his praise from God' (1 Cor 4.5). This revelation will be for the glory and joy of the saved and for the shame and sorrow of the lost. It is not clear whether the blessed in a single instant will receive complete knowledge of the whole plan of salvation as it was worked out in detail, or simply that this knowledge will be perfectly available, to be acquired as they wish in an ever deepening fashion throughout eternity. Those condemned to hell will not perceive this plan with the same fullness; their knowledge will be only such as to impress upon them the isolation they have brought upon themselves, the responsibility they bear for their own condition, and the triumph of God's purposes in spite of and even through their rebellion.

The revelation of the forgiven, secret sins of the just will not be a source of embarrassment for them. For along with these sins there will be manifested the sorrow they conceived for them, the penance they did for them, and the humble acceptance of God's forgiveness that they received for them. They will rejoice that God's mercy is revealed so strikingly in their regard, to the glory of Christ and the joy of the blessed.

Christ at the moment of the Incarnation received from the Father the commission to redeem fallen humanity, to head a new race of human beings vivified by the Holy Spirit, to establish an eternal kingdom where God's love may enrich forever those He has made His sons and daughters. All the events of the terrestrial and glorified life of Christ are directed to the fulfillment of this commission, which is finally perfectly executed in the moment of the general judgment. The action of Christ in subduing all enemies is at last brought to a close by this act of power and justice and love. His work done, the Son will deliver the kingdom to God the Father; and as all things are then subject to Christ and Christ is subject to the Father, there will begin the everlasting kingdom of the Father, where God is all in all (cf. 1 Cor 15.24–28).

See Also: JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE); END OF THE WORLD; ESCHATOLOGY (IN THEOLOGY); HEAVEN, (THEOLOGY OF); HELL (THEOLOGY OF); KINGDOM OF GOD; MAN; PAROUSIA; RESURRECTION OF CHRIST; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD; ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: J. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 8.2:1721–1828. Ibid., Tables générales 2:2705–19. J. HAEKEL et al., Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche ² 4:726–737. N. J. HEIN et al., Die Religion in Geschiche und Gegenwart, ³ 2:1415–23. W. PESCH and A. WINKLHOFER, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegrifle, ed. H. FRIES 1:483–491. M. and L. BECQUÉ, Life after Death, tr. P. HEPBURNE-SCOTT (New York 1960). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Life Everlasting, tr. P. CUMMINS (St. Louis 1952). R. W. GLEASON, The World to Come (New York 1958). R. GUARDINI, The Last Things, tr. C. E. FORSYTH and G. B. BRANHAM (New York 1954). A. WINKLHOFER, The Coming of His Kingdom, tr. A. V. LITTLEDALE (New York 1963). C. DAVIS, Theology for Today (New York 1962) 294–306. K. RAHNER, Theological Investigations (London, 1966–) 4:323–346. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Gerschiste der altchristlichen Literatur (Berlin 1882–). Corpus scriptorum Christianorum latinorum, (Vienna 1866–). Acta Apostolicae Sedis, (Rome 1909–).

[J. H. WRIGHT]

JUDICAËL OF QUIMPER, ST.

King of Brittany; d. c. 647–658. There are many legendary reports about the life of this saint, the last independent king of Brittany. According to the Chronicle of Fredegar (see FREDEGARIUS), King Dagobert I (d. 639), while staying at Clichy, sent messengers to the Bretons demanding "that they make amends promptly for what they had done amiss and submit to his rule." Judicaël came quickly to Clichy bearing gifts, and with the aid of Dagobert's treasurer ELIGIUS, later bishop of Noyon, and the referendary OUEN OF ROUEN, the two monarchs arrived at an amicable solution (Gesta Dagoberti 38). The Vita S. Mevenni records that Judicaël later became a BEN-EDICTINE monk at the Abbey of Saint-Jean-Baptiste, later called Saint-Méen-Gaël [L. H. Cottineau, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935-39) 2:2810] while St. Mevennus (d. 617) was still abbot; there he lived an exemplary life and died with a reputation for sanctity (Acta Sanctorum, June, 5:89). According to other reports, however, Judicaël became a monk to escape an assassination plot, but later returned to the world, claimed his throne, married, and begot many children, and only toward the end of his life returned to religious life. In any event, his cult was clearly established by the tenth century, when his name appeared in the Litany of All Saints at Reims, and it became widespread in the Middle Ages.

Feast: Dec. 17; Dec. 16 (Diocese of Quimper).

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 v. (Paris 1668-1701) 2:542. F. PLAINE, "Vita S. evenni," Analecta Bollandiana, 3 (1884) 142-158. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826-) 2.2:160, 416. The Fourth Book of the Chronicle of Fredegar, ed. and tr. J. M. WALLACE-HADRILL (New York 1960) 66. Gallia Christiana, v.1-13 (Paris 1715-85), v.14-16 (Paris 1856-65) 14:1019-20. A. LE GRANDE, Les Vies des saints de la Bretagne armorique (Rennes 1901) 711-713. F. DUINE, La Métropole de Bretagne (Paris 1916) 30. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933-38) 3:448-449. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1935-) 5:306. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935-56) 12:538-544. J. M. WAL-LACE-HADRILL, The Long-Haired Kings (New York 1962) 222.

[H. DRESSLER]

"Vicar's Tribunal in Naples," 18th century. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

JUDICIAL VICAR (OFFICIALIS)

In the canonical system the highest judicial power is vested in the Supreme Pontiff, who has the right to reserve to himself certain particular cases (Codex iuris canonici c. 1405 §1; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 1060 §1). In a diocese, the natural judge is the diocesan bishop (Codex iuris canonici c. 1419 §1; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 1066 §1), who constitutes one tribunal with the judicial vicar, or chief judge, of his court (Codex iuris canonici c. 1420 §2; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 1086 §2).

History. The idea of the judicial vicar or officialis has deep historical roots. In the very early days of the Church it was common for the bishop to use priests for the spiritual ministry and deacons for the direction of temporalities. From the middle of the 4th century the archdeacon occupied a very important position in church administration. His was the duty of finding clerics, educating them, approving them, and presenting them to the bishop for ordination. Moreover, he took care of the treasures and income of the Church. At times he was commissioned to make visitations of the diocese for the bishop. From the 6th century on we find he even had jurisdiction in criminal cases. In the 11th century most of the larger dioceses were divided into districts with an archdeacon in charge of each. The most important of these was the archdeacon of Rome. Gradually the jurisdictional power of archdeacons was recognized as ordinary and not too dependent upon the authority or jurisdiction of the bishop. They held synods, conducted courts, named and invested pastors, and established penalties against clerics. Appeals were made from their tribunals to the tribunal of the bishop.

In the 12th century bishops had to curb the power of the archdeacons; they did so by establishing the institution of rural deans or vicars. In Rome a vicar general or officialis was named. He had voluntary and noncriminal jurisdiction along with the jurisdiction of the archdeacon. In many regions of Germany, Spain, and France only voluntary jurisdiction would be given to this new office of vicar general. Jurisdiction in noncriminal cases was given to another who was named the officialis. The power and juridical figure of the archdeacon gradually fell into desuetude. The Council of Trent reduced the office to practically nothing (session 24, cap. 3, 20; session 25, cap. 14).

What grew up from particular law in certain places was made universal and an obligation of common law in the Latin Church by the 1917 Code of Canon Law, namely, that jurisdiction in judicial matters, separate and apart from that of the vicar general, would be committed to a new office, that of officialis.

Appointment, Qualifications, and Jurisdiction. Canon Law directs the diocesan bishop to select a judicial vicar who will enjoy ordinary authority for making judgments. He is to be an individual other than the vicar general, unless the smallness of the diocese or the lack of cases persuades the bishop that this office can be assigned to the vicar general (Codex iuris canonici c. 1420 §1; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 1086 §1).

The judicial vicar constitutes one tribunal with the bishop of the place; he cannot judge cases that the bishop reserves to himself (Codex iuris canonici c. 1420 §2; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 1086 §2). He must be a priest no younger than 30 years of age, of good character, and if he is not a doctor of canon law he must at least hold a licentiate in that science (Codex iuris canonici c. 1420 §4; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 1086 §4). He is appointed for a definite time (Codex iuris canonici c. 1422; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 1088 §1). His office does not cease but perdures during the vacancy of a see (Codex iuris canonici c. 1420 §5; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 1088 §2). The jurisdiction of the judicial vicar is ordinary (Codex iuris canonici c. 1420 §1; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 1086 §1). Since he constitutes one and the same tribunal with the bishop of the place, there is no appeal from his sentence or decision to the bishop; the appeal must be made to the authority to which a decision of the bishop himself would be appealed.

Functions. Since practically all the cases before a diocesan tribunal today are marriage cases, the work of the judicial vicar is to prepare, study, and judge pleas for nullity brought before the court on any of the grounds described in church law for such a nullity plea. The formal cases, or those involving people who have been married in what appears to be a valid marriage, are heard and tried before a panel of three judges. The judicial vicar or his associate, the adjutant judicial vicar, usually presides at such a panel.

Bibliography: R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 6:1105–11. J. ABBO and J. HANNAN, The Sacred Canons (2d ed. St. Louis 1960) 2:759–760. E. FOURNIER, L'origine du vicaire-général et des autres membres de la curie diocésaine (Paris 1940). M. LEGA and V. BARTOCETTI, Commentarius in iudicia ecclesiastica iuxta Codicem iuris canonici, 3 v. (Rome 1950) 1:112. A. COUSSA, Epitome praelectionum de iure ecclesiastico orientali, 2 v. (Grottaferrata 1948) 1:320–327.

[J. S. QUINN]

JUDITH, BOOK OF

The Book of Judith relates the story of the heroic and devout Hebrew woman, Judith, who singlehandedly saved her city and country from the enemy. The content, text, canonicity, and literary form of the book are discussed in this article.

Content. NEBUCHADNEZZAR, who is described as king of the Assyrians, dispatches his chief general, Holofernes, to punish the Western countries for refusing to pay tribute to him. The general so terrifies his enemies that they hasten to submit. The Hebrews, however, fearing for the safety of their temple, resist. After a long siege of Bethulia by Holofernes's forces, the famished inhabitants urge their governor to surrender. At this point, the beautiful and wealthy widow, Judith, indignant because of the people's lack of confidence in God, initiates her own plan. After a lengthy prayer, Judith enters the Assyrian camp, explaining that she is a deserter. Holofernes, lured by Judith's beauty, invites her to his tent to eat and drink. When Holofernes is overcome by excessive drink, Judith decapitates him and returns to Bethulia with the severed head. The next day the besieged put the confused enemy to flight. So highly acclaimed is Judith that the high priest comes from Jerusalem to honor her. The book ends with the Canticle of JUDITH and an account of her last days. The Vulgate adds a note concerning a holy day instituted in remembrance of the victory.

Text. The original Hebrew (or Aramaic) text of the Book of Judith has been lost. Of the three recensions of the Greek, the best is represented by codices Alexandrinus, Vaticanus, and Sinaiticus. The translation of St. JEROME in the Vulgate is based on an Aramaic text and takes into account the readings of the Old Latin Version; it is about one-fifth shorter than the Greek text (LXX). There exist also a few Hebrew renderings of the text and a number of midrashic résumés of late date. It has long been assumed that the Hebrew versions were mere translations of the Vulgate, but the careful study of A. M. Dubarle has shown that this supposition is unfounded; it is more probable that the existing Hebrew texts depend upon an Aramaic text similar to that used by St. Jerome.

Canonicity. Although never accepted as canonical by official JUDAISM, the deuterocanonical story of Judith was popular enough to merit reading at the feast of Hanukkah (see DEDICATION OF THE TEMPLE, FEAST OF), the date of its introduction into that liturgy, however, is not known. As part of the Greek Scriptures, the Book of Judith was used by the early Church. It has been argued that St. Paul alludes to Jdt 8.14 (LXX) in 1 Cor 2.10–11, and there may be a reminiscence of Jdt 15.10–11 in Lk 1.42, 48. Although St. Jerome did not accept the book's canonicity (and he was by no means alone), he admitted that it was "read" by the Church. The Church terminated all doubts by affirming the inspired character of the book at the Council of Trent.

Literary Form. Catholic scholars have long manifested reserve in accepting the Book of Judith as a historical work. The prevailing tendency today is to classify this work as an edifying fiction or as an apocalypse. The most serious objection to the factual content of the book arises from the difficulty in identifying the Nebuchadnezzar who is called "king of the Assyrians who reigned in NI-NIVEH" (Vulg 1.5; LXX 1.1). It would be naive to view this statement as a crude error concerning the Babylonian King Nebuchadnezzar. The statement represents either an obvious declaration that the author is not dealing with facts, or that he is employing pseudonyms. The view that Nabuchodonosor in this passage represents some other king has been the most popular explanation among Jewish and Christian exegetes alike until recent times. Of the various candidates proposed, Christian writers have favored the Persian King Artaxerxes III (see PERSIA); Jewish tradition has leaned toward one of the Seleucid kings. The German scholar Gottfried Brunner, basing his conclusions on the Behistun inscription of DARIUS I, identifies the Nebuchadnezzar of the Judith narrative with a certain Araka, a pretender to the fallen Babylonian throne. According to Brunner, Araka, who styled himself Nebuchadnezzar IV, probably established himself in the Syrian city of Ninus-vetus (whence Nineveh) until he was crushed by Darius I. Such an identification might support a literal interpretation of the narrative, but it raises new problems without eliminating all the old ones. The high priest in the Judith narrative is Joachim (LXX 4.6–8; 15.8; the Vulgate gives the name first as Eliachim [4.5–10], but then as Joachim [15.9]). Such a figure should certainly be identifiable. A succession of high priests is listed in ch. 12 of Nehemiah. A Joachim does appear in that list, but he is too early to have been a contemporary of Artaxerxes III and too late to have held office when Araka was posing a threat to Darius I. It has been suggested, therefore, that the Joachim in the Book of Judith is the high priest Alcimus of the Maccabean times (1 Mc 7.5-25; 2 Mc 14.3-26), who, according to Josephus, was also called Ἰάκειμος. There are also references in the text that point to the Maccabean era, e.g., the Sanhedrin (LXX 4.8; 11.14; 15.8).

Biblical illustration of the Story of Judith and Holofernes. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

The geographical background of the narrative is as difficult to understand as its historical framework. There have been many scholarly attempts to locate the strategic citadel of Bethulia, but from the evidence thus far obtained it must be concluded that under the name of Bethulia no such place ever existed. The name, of course, has been diversely interpreted. The simplest explanation is probably the correct one: it is a transliteration of the Hebrew word for "virgin" $(b^e t \hat{u} l \hat{a})$, and is, like the name Judith (Heb. $y^e h \hat{u} d \hat{t} t$, "Jewess"), symbolic.

This confusing mixture of historical allusions, of which only the most important have been indicated, on the one hand, suggests that Dubarle and others are correct in judging that the Book of Judith has undergone extensive revision; and, on the other, indicates rather clearly that the present book does not pretend to present a historical account. Some exegetes see in the narrative a historical event that forms the nucleus around which the author has composed a free narrative with elements gathered from various periods of Israelite history. There is no agreement, however, concerning precisely what that event was. Consequently, the majority of exegetes consider the narrative a parable dressed in historical clothing. The parable seems to be a demonstration of the truth found in the words of the Jewish enemy Achior: "But if there be no offense of this people in the sight of their God, we cannot resist them, because their God will defend them; and we shall be a reproach to the whole earth" (Vulg 5.25; LXX 5.21; cf. words of Judith, Vulg 9.15–16; LXX 9.11). The story of Judith illustrates this truth in a striking manner, for it is a woman who singlehandedly defeats the formidable enemies of her people.

The points of contact with the forces of irreligion depicted in Ezekiel (ch. 38), Daniel (ch. 7–8, 10–11), and the New Testament Revelation of St. John (ch. 13, 17) are obvious, and it is for this reason that the parable of Judith has also been called an apocalypse. The Judith narrative is history, parable, apocalypse—all these things woven together by a gifted and inspired craftsman who will probably remain forever unknown.

See Also: MIDRASH.

Bibliography: A. BARUCQ, tr., Judith (Bible de Jérusalem, 43 v., each with intro. by the tr. [Paris 1948-54]; single v. ed. of the complete Bible [Paris 1956] 14; Paris 1959). A. MILLER and J. SCHILDENBERGER, eds. and trs., Die Bücher Tobias, Judith und Esther (Bonn 1940-41). Y. M. GRINTZ, Sefer Yehudith (Jerusalem 1957). J. STEINMAN, Lecture de Judith (Paris 1953). P. F. ELLIS, The Men and the Message of the Old Testament (Collegeville, Minn. 1963) 523-530. A. LEFÈVRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928-) 4:1315-21. C. C. TORREY, The Apocryphal Literature (New Haven, Conn. 1945). A. M. DUBARLE, "Les Textes divers du livre de Judith," Vetus Testamentum 8 (1958) 344-373; "La Mention de Judith dans la littérature ancienne, juive et chrétienne," Revue biblique 66 (1959) 514-549. R. HARRIS, "A Quotation from Judith in the Pauline Epistles," Expository Times 27 (1915-16) 13-15. G. BRUNNER, Der Nabuchodonosor des Buches Judith (Berlin 1959). H. CAZELLES, "Le Personnage d'Achior dans le livre de Judith," Recherches de science religieuse 39 (1951-52) 125-137. J. E. BRUNS, "Judith or Jael," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 16 (1954) 12-14. P. W. SKEHAN, "Why Leave out Judith?" Catholic Biblical Quarterly 24 (1962) 147-154; "The Hand of Judith," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 25 (1963) 94-110.

[J. E. BRUNS]

JUDITH, CANTICLE OF

The Canticle of Judith is a triumphal hymn celebrating Judith's victory over the Assyrian army, presented as the Lord's apocalyptic day of judgment on His enemies. It is found in ch. 16 of the Book of Judith, vv. 2–21 in the Vulgate, 1–17 in the Septuagint (see JUDITH, BOOK OF). Like the Canticle of MIRIAM and the Canticle of Deborah, it praises Yahweh for the crushing defeat He inflicted on the enemies of His people. A more careful analysis of this canticle shows its literary relationship to other Biblical passages as well. The prelude (vv. 1–2 following the versification of the Septuagint) and the concluding paean (vv. 13-17) are modeled on the so-called enthronement Psalms [Ps 46(47); 92(93); 94–98(95–99)] especially Ps 97(98). The body of the hymn (vv. 3–9) describes the events that motivated its composition and should be compared with 2 Kgs 18.9-19.37 and Jgs 5.24-27. The apocalyptic tenor of v. 17 is strikingly reminiscent of Is 66.24, and some regard it as proof that the story of Judith is to be understood as an apocalyptic parable (Steinmann, 118). The most interesting question raised by the canticle is whether it antedates the rest of the book in which it is found. Just as the Canticle of Deborah is much older than the prose account that precedes it (Jgs 4.1-28), so, also, may the case be here. However, if this view is accepted, it does not alter the prevailing opinion that "Judith, the daughter of Merari" is a pseudonymous characterization. There is considerable alternation of voices in the canticle: v. 4 appears to be the sentiment of Yahweh; vv. 5–10 that of an observer who is neither Judith nor the Lord; vv. 11-12 the words of Judith, who, however, assumes here a matriarchal, if not regal, role. This technique, not uncommon in the Psalms, may indicate a liturgical Sitz im Leben for the canticle or, alternatively, a composite origin.

Bibliography: F. ZORELL, "Canticum Judith," Verbum Domini 5 (1925) 329–332. H. L. JANSEN, "La Composition du chant de Judith," Acta Orientalia 15 (1937) 63–71. J. STEINMANN, Lecture de Judith, in Bible de Jérusalem, 43 v. (Paris 1948–54) 1953, 115–119. A. E. COWLEY, "The Book of Judith," The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English, ed. R. H. CHARLES et al., 2 v. (Oxford 1913) 1:242, 246–247, 265–267.

[J. E. BRUNS]

JUDITH OF NIEDERALTAICH, BL.

Widow and recluse; d. before 800. There is considerable debate regarding the identity of Judith and her companion, St. Salome. They may have been cousins (or Judith the aunt of Salome) of Anglo-Saxon royal lineage, who lived for a considerable period as recluses under Abbot Walther (or Walker) in Oberaltaich-am-Donau. A later tradition identifies Salome as Edburga, daughter of King Offa of Mercia, who was exiled for accidentally poisoning her husband and befriended by the Bavarian widow, Judith. Relics of both were later disinterred and buried near the altar of St. Giles. It is thought that their bodies came to Niederaltaich on the occasion of the destruction of Oberaltaich by the Hungarians.

Another report states that the two recluses lived in NIEDERALTAICH about 1100. The altar of St. Giles is here rather than in Oberaltaich, and Walker was abbot here from 1069 to 1098. According to this version, while in the neighborhood of Regensburg after a pilgrimage to the Holy Land Salome became blind, allegedly in answer to prayer, asking for this affliction to escape from sinful proposals. She lived by begging. Once she fell into the Danube and was rescued by a passing ship, which took her to Passau. Afflicted with leprosy, she was recommended to the abbot of Niederaltaich, who had a recluse's cell built for her beside the monastery church. Here she was found by her blood relative and childhood playmate, Judith, who having been widowed young and having likewise gone to Jerusalem, had searched for Salome. With permission of the abbot and the chapter Judith was then also given a cell by the church of Niederaltaich. Both women worked as servants in the monastery. Both died before the end of the 11th century, Salome first. The biography dates from the 13th or 14th century. It claims that both bodies were interred in a common shrine before the altar of St. Giles; they have since been lost.

Judith and Salome were venerated in monastic martyrologies and in art but had no liturgical cult.

Feast: June 29.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901) 2:1081, 7465. Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863—) 5:492–498. A. M. ZIMMERMAN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:374, 376. R. BAUERREISS, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns (St. Ottilien 1949–55) 2:113; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1180.

[G. SPAHR]

Adoniram Judson.

Bibliography: F. WAYLAND, Memoir of . . . Rev. Adoniram Judson, 2 v. (Boston 1853). E. JUDSON, Life of Adoniram Judson (New York 1883). C. ANDERSON, To the Golden Shore: The Life of Adoniram Judson (Boston 1956).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

JUDSON, ADONIRAM

Baptist missionary; b. Malden, MA, Aug. 9, 1788; d. at sea, April 12, 1850. He was the son of a Congregationalist minister. While studying for the ministry at Andover Seminary, MA, in 1810, he and several other students determined to devote themselves to the foreign missions. Their petition led to the establishment of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. Judson was ordained at Salem, MA, Feb. 6, 1812, and sailed for India 13 days later. On shipboard his views on the necessity of faith before baptism changed. Upon arriving in Calcutta, India, he and his bride, Ann Hasseltine Judson, were rebaptized by English Baptist missionaries. In 1813 the Judsons went to Burma and opened a mission in Rangoon. The mission prospered, but in June 1824 Judson was imprisoned for 18 months, and in 1827 he moved his station to Maulmain. He published a complete translation of the Bible in Burmese (1840) and an English-Burmese dictionary (1849).

JUGAN, JEANNE, BL.

Known in religion as Marie of the Cross, foundress of the Little Sisters of the Poor; b. Oct. 25, 1792, Petites-Croix (near Cancale), Brittany, France; d. Aug. 29, 1879, Pern, France.

After the death of her fisherman father, Joseph Joucan, when she was four, her mother, Marie Horel, supported the six children as a farm laborer and taught them the faith. At 16, Jeanne, the youngest child, became a kitchen maid to a charitable family. The mistress, Viscountess de la Choue, took her on visits to the sick and poor. At 25, Jugan joined the third order of the Heart of the Admirable Mother (founded by St. John EUDES), gave away her meager possessions, and began working in a hospital, but after six years of exhausting work she returned to domestic service. Realizing that she could do more, she then devoted herself entirely to the poor, especially widows.

Bl. Jeanne Jugan.

Hospital work and domestic service had prepared Jugan for giving hospitality to the aged in Saint-Servan. She was aided by two other women, Virginie Tredaniel and Marie Jamet, to whom Abbé Augustin Marie Le Pailleur had given a rule and a charge to care for an elderly blind woman, Anne Chauvin. All four women lived together in Jugan's home and elected her superior, May 29, 1842. Eventually a benefactor purchased an abandoned convent for the Little Sisters. These women, and others who assisted them, begged daily for the needs of the elderly in their care. The sisters ate what was left after feeding their guests. Houses were soon established in Rennes, Dinan, Tours, and Angers. Although Jugan was reelected superior (Dec. 8, 1843), she was suddenly replaced (Dec. 23, 1843) by 23-year-old Marie Jamet through the action of Le Pailleur. No recognition of her role as foundress came during her lifetime. After receiving a petition from the people of Saint-Servan, the French Academy made her recipient of one of its annual awards for virtue (December 1845) in appreciation of her heroic charity in caring for the poor. In 1852 the congregation was officially recognized, and she was sent to the motherhouse for the remaining 27 years of her life, without an active role in the growth of the community.

Her contemporary Charles Dickens wrote: "There is in this woman something so calm, and so holy, that in seeing her I know myself to be in the presence of a superior being. Her words went straight to my heart, so that my eyes, I know not how, filled with tears."

It was not until 1893 that Jugan was recognized as the founder of the congregation whose rule was approved by PIUS X in 1907. In beatifying Jugan (Oct. 3, 1982) Pope JOHN PAUL II said: "I give thanks to the Lord for bringing about what Pope JOHN XXIII had so rightly hoped for and PAUL IV so ardently desired," the beatification of Jugan.

Feast: Aug. 30.

Bibliography: G. M. GARRONE, Poor in Spirit, tr. A. NEAME (London 1975). A. HELLEU, Jeanne Jugan, Foundress of the Little Sisters of the Poor, tr. M. A. GREY (St. Louis 1942). P. MILCENT, Jeanne Jugan: Humble So as to Love More, tr. A. NEAME (London 1980). F. TROCHU, Jeanne Jugan, tr. H. MONTGOMERY (Westminster, Md. 1950). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1984) 346–49. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 42 (1982) 9–10.

[T. F. CASEY/K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JULIAN OF CUENCA, ST.

Patron and second bishop of Cuenca; b. Burgos, Castile, c. 1113–38; d. January 28, c. 1208. He taught theology in Palencia and became archdeacon of Toledo (1182). In 1196 he was made bishop of Cuenca, a city taken from the Moors in 1177 and granted a famous charter (fuero) c. 1190. He drew up (c. 1200) the constitution of the cathedral chapter, later revised by Cardinal Gil ALBORNOZ. His vita and miracles have separate and obscure origins. He was an exemplary frontier bishop, known for pastoral visits and almsgiving and the feeding of the poor in person. He triumphed over temptations to gluttony, avarice, and sensuality proffered by the devil and twice miraculously provided grain for Cuenca. The cures reported at his shrine made Cuenca a place of pilgrimage. In 1589 Julian's name was included in the Roman Martyrology.

Feast: Jan. 28.

Bibliography: B. ALCÁZAR, Vida . . . de San Julian (Madrid 1692). Acta Sanctorum January 3:509–512. M. LÓPEZ, Memorias históricas de Cuenca, ed. A. GONZÁLEZ PALENCIA, 2 v. (Cuenca 1949–53) v.1. R. DE LUZ LAMARCA, San Julian en Goya y el Greco (Cuenca 1992). A. RUIZ, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 13:1088–91. G. BÖING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1197.

[E. P. COLBERT]

JULIAN OF ECLANUM

Fifth-century bishop and Pelagian theologian; b. Eclanum, Italy, 380; d. Sicily, c. 455. The son of Memorius, Bishop of Eclanum, Julian married (between 400 and 404) Ia, a woman mentioned by St. PAULINUS OF NOLA in the Epithalamium he dedicated to Julian. On the death of his wife, Julian joined the clergy of his native diocese and succeeded his father as bishop. He had an excellent knowledge of Latin and Greek, keen logic, and a fine secular and theological formation. He became a supporter of PELAGIUS, and in 418 he attacked the Epistola tractoria of Pope ZOSIMUS, in which Pelagius and Celestius were definitively condemned. Julian was deposed and expelled from Italy. He stopped in Sicily to gain supporters, then traveled in the Orient, where he was received by THEO-DORE OF MOPSUESTIA and NESTORIUS. Having tried in vain to regain his see, he taught letters in an obscure village in Sicily and died there under Valentinian III without being reconciled with the Church. However, until the 9th century his tomb had the inscription: "Here lies Julian a Catholic bishop."

Of his writings only these are incontestably authentic: four books to Turbantius; three letters; and eight books to Florus. He was answered in three different works by AUGUSTINE of Hippo. Julian's teaching is definitely heterodox. He reduced grace to a simple, protective, divine assistance, or a modality extrinsic to the soul. He practically denied the solidarity of the human race in Adam's sin. However, some of his ideas on the relation between the natural and supernatural orders and between liberty and grace must be seen as legitimate in the dogmatic and historical context of the age in which he wrote. This is the basis of recent attempts to rehabilitate Julian as both a philosopher and a theologian.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina (Paris 1878–90) 21:959–1104. Patrologia Latina Suppl. 1 (1958) 1571–72, bibliog. B. ALTANER, Patrology (New York 1960) 442–443. G. BOUWMANN, Des Julian von Aeclanum Kommentar (Analecta biblica 9; 1958). J. FORGET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT (Paris 1903–50) 8.2: 1926–31. H. I. MARROU, Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 77 (1958) 434–437. F. REFOULÉ, Recherches des sciences religeuses 52 (1964) 42–84, 233–247.

[J. BENTIVEGNA]

JULIAN OF HALICARNASSUS

MONOPHYSITE bishop and leader of the allegedly radical heretical faction; d. after 527. After being expelled from his see at Halicarnassus in Caria by the Byzantine Emperor JUSTIN I in 518, Julian fled to Alexandria, where he became the principal exponent of so-called aphthartodocetism. This aberration from orthodox doctrine maintained that Christ's body was essentially incorruptible (αφθαρτος) and that His Passion and death were real but were the result of a free and extraordinary choice of His will, whereby He conferred passivity on His naturally incorruptible body. Opponents called the Julianists also "Phantasiastae" (those who teach that Christ had merely a phantom or apparent body). R. Draguet, in a minority opinion on the evidence, believes that Julian was fundamentally orthodox and that his use of extreme monophysitic terms may be applied to Christ's humanity in a broadly moral sense. Julian's prime opponent was SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH, a moderate Monophysite against whom Julian wrote four works, of which numerous fragments in Syriac and Greek have survived. Some of Julian's letters are extant also, but a commentary on Job seems to be erroneously attributed to him.

Bibliography: R. DRAGUET, Julien d'Halicarnasse et sa controverse avec Sévère d' Antioche sur l'incorruptibilité du corps du Christ (Louvain 1924). M. JUGIE, "J. d'H. et Sévère d'Antioche," Échos d'Orient 24 (1925) 129–162, 256–285. P. PEETERS, Analecta Bollandiana 43 (1925) 422–424. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE 2:233–235.

[R. J. SCHORK]

JULIAN OF LE MANS, ST.

Bishop; dates unknown. According to the episcopal lists, he was the first bishop of Le Mans. His vita, written at the request of Bishop Avesgaud (d. 1036), has no historical value. Bishop BERTRAM OF LE MANS (d. 616) provided the earliest reference to a Bishop Julian of Le Mans when he made a bequest "to the basilica S. Juliani Episcopi." He stated that this basilica, on the right bank of the Sarthe, had been built over Julian's tomb near the basilica of Saint-Victor. When both these churches were abandoned, Bishop ALDRIC OF LE MANS transferred the remains of his predecessors to the recently built west choir of his cathedral and dedicated the altar to them (June 21, 835). In time Julian replaced Saints GERVASE AND PROTASE as titular saint of the east choir. Bishop Mainard (d. 968) ordered a silver reliquary for his remains. Fulk of Anjou, leaving for Jerusalem, invoked the protection of St. Julian for his son Geoffrey and his lands (1128). Julian was made patron of the cathedral in 1158; he is represented in several of its stained-glass windows. In 1254 his remains were translated to the cathedral's Gothic choir. Julian is also honored at Bayeux, at Paderborn, southern England, and even in Russia.

Feast: Jan. 27

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (2d ed. Paris 1907–15) 2:312–335. C. GIRAULT, "Le Tombeau de Saint Julien au Pré," Province du Maine, ser. 2, 33

(1953) 49–59, esp. 53. Congrès archéologique de France 119 (1961) 18–23, 60, 100–102. A. MUSSAT, Le Style gothique de l'Ouest de la France (Paris 1963). L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.2:769–771. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10.2:1461–74.

[J. CAMBELL]

JULIAN OF NORWICH

Anchoress, author of Sixteen Revelations of Divine Love; b. 1342; d. probably between 1416 and 1423. Her anchorhold was attached to the church of SS. Julian and Edward at Conisford, Norwich. That she was still enclosed there in 1416 is attested by a bequest to "Julian, Recluse at Norwich" in the will of Lady Suffolk of that date. A bequest in 1423 to a male anchorite, occupying this same anchorhold, indicates the terminus ad quem for Julian's death date. The various editions of Butler's Lives of the Saints list her as "Blessed" under the date of May 13, and some Benedictine calendars [e.g., Corona Sanctorum Anni Benedictini (Ramsgate 1947)] give her the title of "Saint." There is no reputable historical evidence that there was any persistent cultus to her, even of a local nature; her reputation for holiness seems to be based entirely on her Revelations, if one excludes the brief reference to her by Margery KEMPE of Lynn, who described her as an expert in giving good counsel. It is not known whether Julian was her proper name, or whether she adopted it after her enclosure at St. Julian's Church. It is unlikely that she was ever a member of the Benedictine community at Carrow Abbey, which is located near Norwich.

Apart from bequests in two other wills dated 1404 and 1416, which also refer to her as the anchoress of St. Julian's, all that is known of her she tells herself in her book of Revelations: "These revelations were shewed to a simple unlearned creature living in this mortal flesh in the year of our Lord 1373, on the 13th day of May. And when I was 30 years old and a half, God sent me a bodily sickness" She goes on to say that she was thoroughly and completely cured of her illness; and that the figure of Christ on the cross became alive before her eyes. This was the first revelation or "shewing"; 14 others followed on the same day, six concerned with Our Lord's passion, the remaining eight with other spiritual truths, and the last with the indwelling of the Blessed Trinity in the soul. The allegation that her sickness was a form of nervous hysteria, and the inference that the revelations were due to a diseased or disordered imagination, has been satisfactorily refuted by Paul Molinari, SJ.

Julian has left two separate accounts of her revelations: a shorter version, probably written soon after her experience, and a longer narrative, the result of more than 15 years of prayer and meditation on the shewings, during which time she received more light on them. Both versions are written in the first person and follow the chronological order of the shewings. The tone of her narrative is informal and conversational: it is a record of personal experience rather than a theological treatise. The purpose and content of the Revelations concern the knowledge of God and of ourselves: what we are by Him, in nature and in grace; what we are in our sinfulness and weakness. The knowledge of God granted to Julian was of His love: it is courteous, homely, intensely personal. To explain its intimate nature she has recourse to the unusual image, not to be found in any of the Fathers except St. Anselm, of the mother and the child.

In her development of the doctrine of the Mystical Body, man's incorporation into Christ, she may have owed something in expression to her contemporary Walter HILTON, an Augustinian canon; even the psychology she uses to expose the human relationship to the Father in Christ is a simplified Augustinianism (there were Austin Friars at Norwich). But if one looks for the real source of her theology of incorporation into Christ it can be found nowhere else than in St. Paul, just as for her teaching on the mystery of the divine indwelling one must go back to St. John. The account of her Revelations is regularly punctuated by concern with the problem of sin and damnation, which appeared to her to conflict with divine love and goodness, and the assurance that all shall be well. The various formulations and solutions to this problem impart a highly artistic structure to her book, which falls into four sections (ch. 1-27; 28-43; 44-65; 66-86).

Although she says repeatedly that her revelations were granted for the profit of all her fellow Christians, her audience is effectively reduced to those who "deliberately choose God in this life for love." She is particularly concerned for the "little and the simple—those who for love hate sin and dispose themselves to do God's will." The title of the first printed edition of the shorter version of her Revelations, "Comfortable Words for Christ's Lovers," is extraordinarily apt. Like Julian's own homely language, it gives no immediate clue to the profundity and wealth that is embodied in her mystical doctrine.

Bibliography: Editions. JULIAN OF NORWICH, The Shewings of Julian of Norwich, ed. G. R. CRAMPTON (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1994); The Revelation of Divine Love in Sixteen Showings Made to Dame Julian of Norwich, tr. M. L. DEL MASTRO (Liguori, Mo. 1994); Revelations of Divine Love (Short Text and Long Text), tr. E. SPEARING, intro. and notes A. C. SPEARING (Harmondsworth, Eng. 1998); Revelations of Divine Love, Translated from British Library Additional Manuscript 37790; The Motherhood of God: An Excerpt, Translated from British Library Manuscript Sloane 2477, intro., interpretive essay, and bibliography F. BEER (Rochester, N.Y. 1998). Studies. P. MOLINARI, Julian of Norwich: The Teaching of a 14th-Century Mystic (London 1958). D. KNOWLES, The English Mystical Tradition (New York 1961) 119–137. F. C. BAUERSCH-MIDT, Julian of Norwich and the Mystical Body Politic of Christ (Notre Dame, Ind. 1999). S. J. MCENTIRE, ed., Julian of Norwich: A Book of Essays (New York 1998). J. M. NUTH, Wisdom's Daughter: The Theology of Julian of Norwich (New York 1991). B. PEL-PHREY, Julian of Norwich: Christ, Our Mother (Wilmington, Del. 1989). G. M. JANTZEN, Julian of Norwich: Mystic and Theologian (New York 1988).

[J. WALSH]

JULIAN OF SPEYER

Known also as Julianus Teutonicus, early Franciscan poet, liturgist and musician; d. Paris c. 1250. As a youth he left his home of Speyer, the imperial city in the upper Rhine valley, for the new University of Paris to study music. Before long he was promoted to magister cantus (master of song) at the court of the French king. In Paris sometime after 1227 he joined the brothers of Saint Francis of Assisi in their new center of studies. For over 20 years he served the student brothers of the Franciscan Order at the "Grand Couvent des Cordeliers." His task was to oversee the proper singing of the Divine Office and to correct mistakes in public reading during the liturgy, meals, and other community gatherings. Trained in the rhythmic tradition he composed two Offices with musical notation for FRANCIS OF ASSISI and ANTHONY OF PADUA. The former, dating from c. 1231–32, was later included in the Ordinal of HAYMO OF HAVERSHAM and became widely used throughout the Latin Church until the liturgical reform of Pius V in the 16th century. Much of the textual composition of the Office is drawn from THOM-AS OF CELANO's Life of St. Francis, but it further develops the significance of the stigmata. Shortly after the composition of these two versions of the Divine Office, Julian wrote two lives, Life of St. Francis and Life of St. Anthony. The former likewise draws from the work of the same title composed earlier by Thomas of Celano. Julian's life about the saint from Assisi is much shorter and, as it was written for the formational needs of his younger brothers in Paris, it is more pastoral and practical, intimately connected with the liturgical themes of the Divine Office for Francis of Assisi.

Bibliography: R. ARMSTRONG, W. HELLMANN, W. SHORT, eds., "Divine Office of St. Francis," in Francis of Assisi: Early Documents, v. 1 (New York 1999), 311–360; "Life of St. Francis," ibid., 363–420; bibliography. J. MISKULY, "Julian of Speyer: Life of St. Francis," Franciscan Studies 49 (1989), 93–117. J. STRAYER, ed., "Rhymed Offices," in Dictionary of the Middle Ages, v. 10 (New York 1988), 366–377.

[J. A. W. HELLMANN]

JULIAN OF TOLEDO, ST.

Theologian, archbishop of Toledo, Jan. 29, 680 to March 690; b. c. 642; d. Toledo, 690. He was born into a converted Jewish family and educated in the cathedral school of Toledo under EUGENE II (III) and his successor St. ILDEFONSUS. Julian presided over the 12th to 15th Councils of Toledo (681, 683, 684, and 688). His angry reaction when his first Apologeticum fidei, dealing with the recently condemned Monothelite heresy, was criticized by Roman theologians in 684 provides evidence of an increasing isolation from Rome on the part of the Spanish Church. Julian's theology was orthodox, and there was no final break with Rome. As primate of Spain, Julian increased the importance of his see and played a part in late Visigothic politics.

Only five of the 17 works mentioned by Julian's biographer survive, together with a short Elogium Ildefonsi and a poem recently recovered. They reveal an original mind and a wide range of achievement, which includes controversy (the De sextae aetatis comprobatione, to prove to the Jews the coming of Christ, and the Apologeticum de tribus capitulis, sent to Rome in 686—the first Apologeticum is lost); the Prognosticum futuri saeculi, a manual on the future life, which enjoyed immense influence in the Middle Ages; and the Anti-keimena seu liber de contrariis, a forerunner of ABELARD's Sic et Non. The Historia Wambae and the Ars grammatica (the latter, if not by Julian, certainly by one of his disciples) display a deep knowledge of the classics.

Julian possessed a remarkable library, which may have included a few patristic texts in Greek. Julian was the author of a revision of the HISPANA, the Spanish collection of Canon Law, and he revised the MOZARABIC, or Spanish Liturgy. He received cultus in Toledo (by 858), where he was buried in the church of St. Leocadia, and was commemorated in the later calendars of Silos and Oña. Apparently there were relics of Julian at San Millán de la Cogolla and at Oviedo.

Feast: March 8.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, v.2 of SS. PP. Toletanorum quotquot extant opera, ed. F. A. LORENZANA Y BUTRÓN (Madrid 1785) 1–384, repr. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 V., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 96:452–818. FELIX OF TOLEDO, Vita, ibid. xv–xxii, repr. Patrologia Latina, 96:444–452. M. C. DÍAZ Y DÍAZ, Index scriptorum lationorum medii aevi Hispanorum, 2 v. (Salamanca 1958–59). B. BISCHOFF, "Ein Brief Julians von Toledo über Rhythmen, metrische Dictung und Prosa," Hermes, 87 (1959) 247–256. A. VEIGA VALIÑA, La doctrina escatológica de San Julián de Toledo (Lugo 1940). F. X. MURPHY, in Mélanges Joseph de Ghellinck, v.1 (Gembloux 1951) 361–373, Monothelitism; "J. of T. and the Fall of the Visigothic Kingdom in Spain," Speculum, 27 (1952) 1–27. J. MADOZ, Estudios eclesiásticos, 26 (1952) 39–69; "Fuentes teologico-literarias de S. J. de T.," Gregorianum, 33 (1952)

399–417. J. N. HILLGARTH, "El Prognosticum futuri saeculi de S. J. de T.," Analecta Sacra Tarraconensia, 30 (1957) 5–61, bibliog; "St. J. of T. in the Middle Ages," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes, 21 (1958) 7–26.

[J. N. HILLGARTH]

JULIAN SABAS, ST.

Monk; b. Heliopolis, Syria, c. 300; d. Osrhoene, 377 or 380. Theodoret (History of the Monks, 2) says that he lived first in a hermit's cell on the banks of the Euphrates and then in a cave in the desert of OSRHOENE, between Antioch and the Euphrates, where he gathered a group of disciples. He went to Sinai and built a church on the rock where the Lord was said to have appeared to Moses. He appeared in Antioch in the reign of VALENS (364–378) to refute Arian claims that he agreed with them and then retired to Osrhoene. In Acta Sanctorum Dec., Propyl. 21,231; 461, he is identified with St. Julian the Monk and St. Julian the Hermit (Roman MARTYROLOGY (RM) Jan. 14, June 9, and Oct. 18).

Feast: Jan. 17 (RM and Greek Synaxarion); Oct. 18.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Nov., Propyl. 398–400. THEO-DORET, Historia Ecclesiastica, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 82: 1305–24. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 1:352–353.

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

JULIAN THE APOSTATE

Roman Emperor (361–363); b. c. 331; d. June 26, 363. He was the son of Julius Constantius, the half brother of Constantine the Great. His mother Basilina died shortly after his birth in 331; his father perished in 337 in the slaughter that brought into power the illegitimate branch of Constantine's descendants. The fraternal rivalries within the family shaped Julian's whole life. With his brother Gallus, Julian lived precariously and in obscurity, chiefly at Macellum in Asia Minor. His tutor Mardonius, probably a pagan, introduced him to the best aspects of Hellenistic culture. At Macellum Julian also read extensively in Christian literature, received baptism, and even served as lector in church. Most of the Christian clergy he knew, such as Eusebius of Nicomedia and George of Cappadocia, for example, were Arians.

When Gallus became Caesar in 351, Julian was allowed to travel and study. Libanius and other teachers strengthened his love of Greek culture. Contact with the theurgist Neoplatonist, Maximus of Ephesus, led to Julian's secret apostasy from Christianity c. 351; he was also initiated into the cult of Mithra. The fall of Gallus in 354 endangered Julian, who was summoned by Constantius II to the West, where he lived under surveillance. In 355 Constantius, with no sons of his own, appointed Julian Caesar with jurisdiction over the West. In battles against the Germans during the next five years Julian showed true military skill. In 360 his soldiers proclaimed him Augustus, in a mutiny. Constantius died in 361, with civil war imminent and Julian was accepted as sole emperor. He spent his reign in the East. Except for minor administrative measures, he concerned himself with religion and the war that he waged against the Persians and in which he eventually died.

Julian the Apostate, 19th century. (©The Granger Collection)

The mainspring of Julian's abhorrence of Christianity was his cultural conservatism. He was completely devoted to Greco-Roman civilization and thought he was mystically called to rescue it from an alien, uncouth Christianity. Disinclined to persecution by force, he proclaimed toleration for all Christian sects, revoked all special privileges, removed Christians from political office, and forbade them to teach the classical curriculum of the schools. He exiled St. ATHANASIUS and refused to come to the defense of NISIBIS because of its Christian population. In his work, Against the Galileans, he expounds his anti-Christian position. Positively, his religious program envisioned a rejuvenated paganism with Neoplatonism as an intellectual base and a reformed priesthood modeled on the Christian clergy. His efforts met with complete apathy, however. He wrote four minor philosophical works. His letters and the satirical Misopogon offer additional insights into a noble but erratic character.

Bibliography: K. GROSS, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1195–96. H. DÖRRIE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3:1060–61. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949–59). G. RICCIOTTI, Julian the Apostate (Milwaukee 1960).

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

JULIANA OF LIÈGE, BL.

Also known as Juliana of Mont-Cornillon; promoter of the Feast of Corpus Christi; b. Rétinne, near Liège, c. 1191-92; d. Fosses, near Namur, April 5, 1258. She joined the Canonesses Regular at Mont-Cornillon, where she became prioress in 1222. As a result of a vision in 1209, she had become one of the earliest protagonists for a feast of the Blessed Sacrament. Her local bishop, Robert of Torote (1240-46), ordered the celebration of this feast on the Thursday following the octave of Trinity Sunday. She persuaded John of Cornillon to compose a preliminary Office for the feast [cf. C. Lambot and I. Franson, L'Office de la FêteDieu primitive (Maredsous 1946)]. Then cardinal legate HUGH OF ST. CHER extended its celebration to Germany, Bohemia, and Poland (1252). But her zeal earned her enemies and she was forced to leave Cornillon, seeking shelter among the BEGUINES of Namur. Six years after Juliana died at Saint-Fevillen in Fosses, URBAN IV, a former archdeacon at Liège, urged by Eve of Liège, extended the celebration of CORPUS CHRISTI to the whole Church. Juliana's cult as a beata was confirmed in 1869.

Feast: April 5.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, April, 1:442–475. E. DENIS, La Vraie histoire de sainte Julienne de L. (Tournai 1935). G. SI-MENON, J. de Cornillon (Brussels 1946). E. W. MCDONNELL, Beguines and Beghards in Medieval Culture (New Brunswick, N.J. 1954). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:37–38.

[J. J. SMITH]

JULIANISTS (APHTHARTODOCETISM)

Heresy concerned with the incorruptibility of Christ's body. Among the Monophysites who took refuge in Egypt when JUSTIN I became emperor in 519 was JULIAN OF HALICARNASSUS, a strong partisan of SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH. Julian and Severus disagreed on the question of the incorruptibility of Christ's body. Severus maintained that the value of Christ's sacrifice on the cross would be null if His body were not capable of corruption. Julian denied this, saying that Christ was not subject to the effects of original sin. While Christ's sufferings were real, they were due to an act of His will which made it possible for His body to experience death, though it was naturally not subject to suffering or corruption. This disagreement caused a split among the Egyptian Monophysites. The Julianists accused the Severans of maintaining that Christ's body was corrupted in the tomb. The Severans called the Julianists "aphthartodocetists," because they believed the body of Christ to be a mere appearance, and consequently not corruptible; furthermore, they attributed to the Julianists radical heresies, such as that of the Actistetae who affirmed that the body of Christ, as well as His divinity, was uncreated. Under Gaianus, patriarch of Alexandria, the Julianist heresy spread quickly through Egypt, establishing itself in Ethiopia, Syria, Mesopotamia, Albania, and Armenia, and in the mid-6th century it seemed about to prevail in the East. Although eventually absorbed by strict Monophysitism, it caused the further disintegration of that belief into various sects. Toward the end of 564, Emperor JUSTINIAN I, evidently under the influence of the bishop of Joppa in Palestine, issued an edict affirming that the body of Christ was by nature incorruptible and impassible, whereupon the Patriarch Eutychius of Constantinople protested and was deposed on Jan. 31, 565. Led by ANASTASIUS, patriarch of Antioch, the patriarchs of Alexandria and Jerusalem also resisted, and on the death of the Emperor the Justinian cause ended.

Bibliography: R. DRAGUET, Julien d'Halicarnasse et sa controverse avec Sévère d'Antioche sur l'incorruptibilité du corps du Christ (Louvain 1924); Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:1931–40. M. JUGIE, "Julien d'Halicarnasse et Sévère d'Antioche," Échos d'Orient 28 (1925) 129–162, 257–285. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949–59) 1:233–235, 685–687.

[G. A. MALONEY]

JULIUS I, ST., POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 6, 337 to April 12, 352. Papal history enters a new phase with Julius. From his pontificate onward, scholars have far more information to work with, including papal documents; they also have accurate dates. A vacancy of four months occurred between the death of Mark and Julius' election as Bishop of Rome, described by the Liber pontificalis as "a Roman by birth, whose father was Rusticus." The date of the new Pope's consecration is known from the Liberian catalogue, the date of his burial from the Depositio Episcoporum.

His election coincided roughly with the death of Constantine the Great (May 22), and marked, in the Arian struggle, the beginning of a new phase characterized on the part of the Roman See by a more vigorous participation which apparently had not been possible while the Emperor lived. The death of Constantine meant the end, for the time being, of any uniform imperial policy toward the Church. Of his three sons who shared the Empire, two, Constantine II and Constans, followed the Council of NICEA while Constantius, who obtained the East, favored the Arian party. Constantine II permitted the return of Athanasius from exile, an act that prompted EUSEBIUS OF NICOMEDIA, now bishop of Constantinople, and the Arian-sympathizing Eastern bishops to try to have Athanasius ousted again. They sent a delegation to Julius with the acts of the council at Tyre (335) in an attempt to obtain his approval for what had been done there and to win recognition for Pistus, the Arian intruder in Alexandria. When Julius informed him about the opposition of the Eusebian party, Athanasius vindicated himself of the charges made against him in a great council in Alexandria and notified Julius and the other bishops in a synodal letter (338).

Before the envoys from Athanasius arrived, the leader of the Eusebian delegation, Macarius, departed from Rome, leaving his assistants, Hesychius and Martyrius, behind. When confronted by the refutation of Athanasius, they suggested that the pope summon a general council to settle the matter. Julius accepted the idea and wrote to both sides in this sense. Meanwhile Athanasius had to flee Alexandria when the Eusebians forcibly installed a new Arian intruder, Gregory of Cappadocia, in place of Pistus (339). Athanasius protested his expulsion in an encyclical that prompted Julius to send legates to the Eusebians summoning them to a council in Rome (340). After delaying the papal representatives in Antioch for a long time, the Eusebians refused the summons, and the legates returned to Rome with their negative reply (341).

The letter of the Eusebians is interesting for the light it throws on Eastern attitudes toward the primacy. While confessing that "the Roman church was entitled to the honor of all, because it was the school of the Apostles and was from the beginning the metropolis of religion," they found fault with Julius for transgressing the canons by disregarding their council at Tyre and communicating with Athanasius. This would be a common Eastern attitude for centuries, honoring Rome's antiquity and apostolicity, but not feeling obliged to agree with or follow the papacy on all matters. The Roman council, attended by Athanasius, Marcellus of Ancyra, and other bishops driven from their sees by the Eusebians, was held without the Eusebians (June 10, 341). The case of Athanasius was again examined, and he and the other bishops were ordered restored to their sees.

(l to r) Pope Cornelius, Pope St. Julius I, and Bishop Lepodius, right side detail of 12th-century mosaic in the apse of the church of S. Maria in Trastevere, Rome.

The reply of Julius to the Eusebians (341) is called "a masterpiece of episcopal diplomacy" because of its admirable combination of firmness and conciliation. The pope refuted their charges and found their reasons for not attending the Roman council unconvincing. It was not he, but they, who had violated the canons by deposing Athanasius without reference to Rome. It is interesting that Julius bases his intervention not on the Petrine privilege to which later popes would appeal, but on ecclesiastical custom (canons), and that he discreetly refers to the collegial character of episcopal authority: "You should have written to us all, so that justice might be determined by all. For the sufferers were bishops and prominent churches, which the Apostles themselves had governed. And why were we not written to about the church of the Alexandrians? Are you ignorant that the custom was first to write to us, and then for justice to be determined from here?"

The last sentence probably refers to the special tie binding the Church of Alexandria to Rome, but the Roman decision remained without effect.

In a council at Antioch held later the same year and presided over by Constantius himself (the so-called Dedication Council), the deposition of Athanasius was confirmed; Gregory was recognized as bishop of Alexandria; and Arian formulas were adopted. The Council of SARDI-CA (Sofia), at which Julius was represented by the legates Archidamus and Philoxenus, was called to find a way out of the impasse (343), but ended in disagreement. After issuing a synodal letter addressed to all the bishops condemning Athanasius and Marcellus of Ancyra and excommunicating Julius as the cause of "all the evil," the Eusebians, who refused to join their Western colleagues, departed for home. The remaining bishops, under the presidency of Hosius, once again vindicated Athanasius and passed several canons intended to regulate appeals to Rome. These remained a dead letter, however, owing to the refusal of the Eusebians to recognize the council and, probably, a cause of their restrictive nature. They are interesting, nevertheless, as evidence of the persistence of the belief that the Roman primacy was based on Peter: "in order to honor the memory of blessed Peter ''

After the death of the intruder Gregory, Athanasius was able to return to his see with the permission of Constantius, and he brought with him a letter to the Alexandrians from Julius (346). The remaining years of the pontificate of Julius were relatively quiet. He had the satisfaction of receiving the submission of two prominent Arians, Ursacius of Singidunum (Belgrade) and Valens of Mursa (347), who withdrew their allegations against Athanasius at a council in Milan and before the Pope in person in Rome. Unfortunately, they soon reverted to their old ways.

The Liber pontificalis attributes to Julius a decree, possibly contemporary, regarding the organization of the archives and chancery (scrinium) of the Roman Church on the imperial model, in which mention is made for the first time of the primicerius notariorum; to this Pope it attributes also the construction of several churches including the two city churches later known as SS. Apostoli and S. Maria in Trastevere (titulus Iulii), as well as a ceremonial hall in the Lateran Palace (basilica lulii), later demolished to make way for the medieval Hall of Councils. An anonymous author known as the CHRONOGRAHER of 354 recorded that Rome observed the birth date of Jesus on December 25, but indicates that the practice had been known since 336. This means that Julius was the first pope to celebrate Christmas on the now traditional day, a practice followed by other Western churches and by most Eastern ones. Julius was buried in the cemetery of Calepodius on the Via Aurelia, but the exact location of his tomb is unknown.

Feast: April 12.

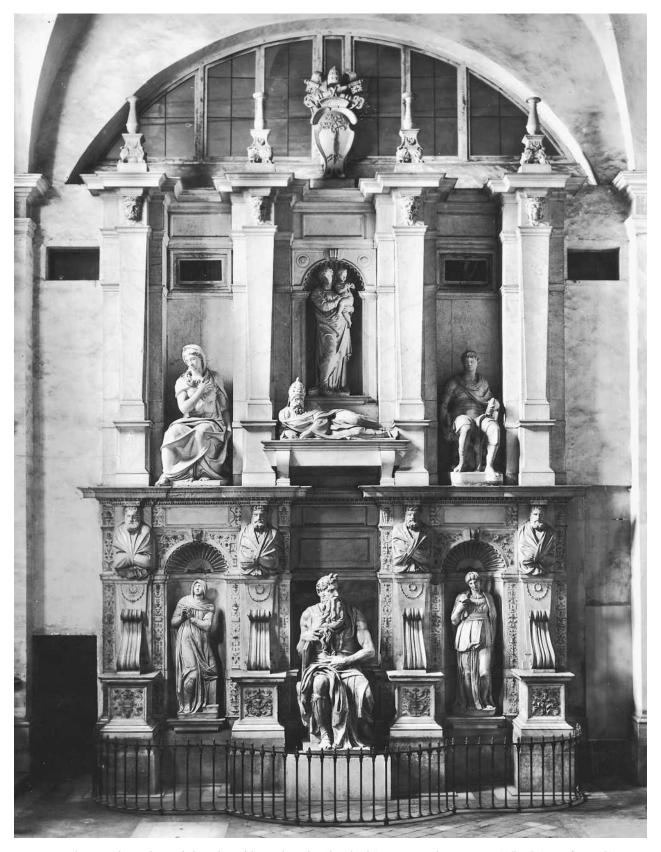

See Also: ARIANISM.

Bibliography: ATHANASIUS, Apologia contra Arianos, 25: 282-291, 343-347. Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Streenbrugge 1961) 1627. Patrologiae cursus completus, series latina; suppl., ed. A. HAMMAN (Paris 1957-) 1:191-192. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886-92, 1958) 1:205-206; 3:81-82. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903-50) 8.2:1914-17. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907-53) 13.1:1199. E. SCHWARTZ, Gesammelte Schriften, ed. H. D. ALTENDORF, 5 v. (Berlin 1938-62), v.4. R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei Papi (Rome 1957) 92-93. R. VIELLIARD, Recherches sur les origines de la Rome chrétienne (Mâcon 1941; repr. Rome 1959) 68-69. H. HESS, The Canons of the Council of Sardica, A.D. 343 (Oxford 1958). E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 2:644-645. W. GESSEL, "Das primatiale Bewüsstsein Julius I," Festschrift H. Tüchle (Paderborn 1975) 63-74. H. JEDIN, ed., History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:35-41. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 29-30. C. PIETRI, Roma Christiana (Rome 1976) 187-237. G. FERNÁNDEZ HERNÁNDEZ, "La autenticidad de los cánones del siódo sardicense en los años 343-344: una polémica historiogràfica," Anuario de Historia de la Iglesia 6 (Pamplona 1997) 305-7. N. STANEV, "Le concile de Sardique de 343: étape nouvelle dans la lutte des idées au IVe siècle," in Thracia 11. Studien in honorem Alexander Fol (Serdicae 1995) 455-62. M. VINZENT, ed., Markell von Ankyra. Die Fragmente—der Brief an Julius von Rom, (Leiden 1997).

[J. CHAPIN]

JULIUS II, POPE

Pontificate: Nov. 1, 1503, to Feb. 21, 1513; b. Giuliano Della Rovere, Albisola (near Savona) in the Republic of Genoa in 1443; d. Rome. His father, Raffaello, was a brother of Pope SIXTUS IV (Francesco Della Rovere). While his uncle was Franciscan minister general, Giuliano studied with the Franciscans in Perugia and was ordained. It is uncertain if he entered the Franciscan order. When his uncle became pope in 1471, he was named bishop of Carpentras and made cardinal priest of St. Peter in Chains. Eventually, he held eight bishoprics, was archbishop of Avignon, and was granted many abbeys and benefices. From 1480 to 1482 Giuliano served as legate a latere to France, showing great skill in composing the differences between Louis XI and Maximilian of Austria over the Burgundian inheritance. When Sixtus IV died, Cardinal Della Rovere, partly by simony, secured the election of Battista Cibò, who took the name of INNOCENT VIII. Della Rovere's influence, therefore, continued and he became a rival of Cardinals Borgia and Sforza. The election of Rodrigo Borgia as ALEXANDER VI in 1492 was a reverse for him. Except for brief shows of reconciliation, Della Rovere was hostile to Alexander VI and usually resided away from Rome.

Monument of Pope Julius II by Michelangelo and his atelier, the Church of St. Peter in Chains, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Della Rovere and Charles VIII. Just prior to the invasion of Italy by Charles VIII, Della Rovere fled to France with the belief that Church reforms might be achieved with the King's support. He accompanied Charles VIII into Italy, and, on Dec. 31, 1494, sought his backing for the convocation of a council to depose Alexander VI on the grounds of his having won the election of 1492 through bribery. When Charles VIII negotiated and signed a treaty with Alexander in 1495, Della Rovere became disillusioned with the French and returned to Avignon.

The Borgia Peril. In 1498 a reconciliation with Alexander VI was effected, when Della Rovere's diplomatic services helped to secure Charlotte d'Albret, sister of the King of Navarre, as a bride for Cesare Borgia. This peace ended in 1502 when Cesare attacked the Duke of Urbino where Francesco Della Rovere, the cardinal's nephew, stood in line of succession to the dukedom. During the following year Della Rovere remained far from Rome, spending part of the time in France. There Louis XII, considering the cardinal as friendly to French interests, granted him the abbey of Chiaravalle near Milan. The death of Alexander VI in August 1503 made the cardinal's return to Rome possible. The rallying of the Romans against Cesare Borgia's troops, and the illness of Cesare himself, saved the conclave from Borgia intimidation. Although Della Rovere was unable to obtain the election for himself, he frustrated the attempt to elect Cardinal d'Amboise. The election of the sickly Cardinal Piccolomini as PIUS III was followed by a pontificate of less than a month. Thereupon, by extensive promises to Cesare Borgia, and with bribes, Della Rovere was unanimously elected pope.

Julius II sought to repair the damage inflicted on the Church by the Borgias. He determined to recover territories lost to the Papal State, to achieve financial solvency, to strengthen administration, to eliminate simony, and to reduce nepotism. Believing that papal authority might best be enhanced by increased temporal power, he stressed territorial conquest, skillful diplomacy, and external glory. He was determined to recover territories alienated by his predecessors or occupied in the months immediately following the death of Alexander VI. The dukedom of the Romagna had been bestowed upon Cesare Borgia, and the Venetians had moved in on these papal lands in 1503. Julius II used persuasion with the Venetians, who relinquished some of these Romagna holdings but continued to hold Rimini and Faenza. In September 1506 the Pope obtained the surrender of Gian Paolo Baglioni, Lord of Perugia, and expelled Giovanni Bentivoglio from Bologna. But the Venetians continued to deny the restitutions the Pope demanded.

Military Alliances. In 1508 the Emperor Maximilian made war on Venice and joined Louis XII of France in the League of Cambrai against the republic. In 1509 the Pope entered the league and issued a bull of excommunication and interdict. After the Venetians were defeated at Agnadello in May 1509, papal troops regained Rimini, Faenza, and other lost territories. By the beginning of 1510, after Julius II had received freedom of trade and navigation, and confirmation of ecclesiastical rights in Venetian territory, he became reconciled with the republic and lifted the excommunication. But neither France nor the Emperor wished to make peace. At that point the French threat to Italy led the Pope to form an alliance with Venice and Spain.

The first countermove of Louis XII was to convoke a synod at Tours in which the French bishops revived the ancient Gallican claims. Louis XII then, in agreement with the Emperor, promoted in the name of a group of rebel cardinals the calling of a council at Pisa. This act led Julius II to call the Fifth Lateran Council in 1511. Meanwhile, the Pope turned against the Duke of Ferrara, who was supporting the French. Papal troops occupied Modena in 1510 and took Mirandola in January 1511. These successes were offset by the loss of Bologna in May and the recapture of Mirandola. In August, however, Julius reconciled the powerful Roman families of Colonna and Orsini so that he had the nearly unanimous backing of the Roman nobility. Furthermore, the Holy League (Venice, Spain, and the papacy) was formally completed in October 1511. Before the end of the year England joined this combination. In April 1512, the league was defeated at Ravenna by Gaston de Foix. But the French victory was brief. Cardinal Schiner, leading Swiss forces on behalf of the league, took Cremona and Pavia and then, in June 1512, secured the surrender of Milan. The congress of the league met in Mantua and awarded Milan to Maximilian Sforza. At the end of 1512 Italian affairs in general were still unsettled except for the withdrawal of the French. While the league congress was deliberating in Mantua, the Medici returned to Florence, from which they had been ousted. Although territorial problems remained unresolved when Julius II died in February 1513, he had enlarged the territory and power of the Papal State. Some hailed him as the "Liberator of Italy."

Reforms and the Lateran Council. A bull, published in 1510 but dated Jan. 14, 1505, voided any papal election tainted with simony. This bull was confirmed in February 1513, a few days before Julius' death, by the

Fifth Lateran Council (see LATERAN COUNCILS). Julius also renewed the bull of Pius II forbidding appeal from a pope to a council. It was he, too, who granted a dispensation enabling Prince Henry of England, later HENRY VIII, to marry CATHERINE OF ARAGON. Julius was aware of the need for reform in the Church and indicated this when the Lateran Council opened in May 1512. But the Council became preoccupied with the problems associated with France and with the uncanonical council of Pisa-Milan. The latter council, which had been poorly supported, left Pisa for Milan and then, in 1512, moved to Lyons where it lost the sponsorship of France and came to an end. Administratively Julius II carefully supervised magistrates through a governor and vicechamberlain and defined more precisely legal and procedural distinctions between lay and ecclesiastical cases. He required, annually, strict audits of accounts, and he reorganized the college of notaries. He effected a monetary reform, increased papal revenue by the sale of curial offices, and restored a treasury left almost empty by the Borgias. For these among other reasons Jacob Burckhardt described him as "Savior of the Papacy."

Patron of Arts. He was a patron to Michelangelo, Raphael, Bramante, and others. He began building the new basilica of St. Peter's with plans by Bramante. He commissioned, among other works by Michelangelo, the frescoes on the vault of the Sistine Chapel. He assigned to Raphael the paintings of the Stanze della Segnatura. He beautified Rome and carried out much construction throughout the Papal State. He helped found the Vatican Library. In the courts of Saint Damasus and the Belvedere he provided the beginnings of a great collection of ancient sculpture.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London-St. Louis 1938-61) 6. M. BROSCH, Papst Julius II und die Gründung des Kirchenstaates (Gotha 1878). E. RODOCANACHI, La Première renaissance: Rome au temps de Jules V et de Léon X (Paris 1912); Histoire de Rome: Le pontificat de Jules II (Paris 1928). J. KLAZKO, Jules II (Paris 1898). A. LUZIO, Isabella d' Este di fronte a Giulio II negli ultimi tre anni del suo pontificato (Milan 1912). E. GAGLIARDI, "Julius II, der Schöpfer des Kirchenstaates," Deutsche Rundschau 149 (1911) 262-275. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 8.2:2667–86. G. B. PICOTTI, La politica italiana sotto il pontificato di Giulio II (Pisa 1949). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20 Jh. (Leipzig 1931-41) 4:394-408. A. SCHIAVO, "La cappella vaticana del coro e vicende dei sepolcri di Sisto IV e Giulio II," Studi Romani 6 (1958) 297-307. C. SHAW, Julius II: The Warrior Pope (Oxford 1988). I. CLOULAS, Julius II (Paris 1990). F. GILBERT, The Pope, His Banker, and Venice (Cambridge, Mass. 1980). J. D'AMICO, Renaissance Humanism in Papal Rome (Baltimore 1983).

[D. R. CAMPBELL]

"Pope Julius III," by Scipione Pulzone.

JULIUS III, POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 7, 1550, to March 23, 1555; b. Giovanni Maria Ciocchi del Monte, Rome, Sept. 10, 1487. Born into a family of lawyers, he studied jurisprudence in Perugia and Bologna, after completing his humanistic instruction under the tutelage of Raffaelo Lippo Brandolino in Rome. He undertook theological training at the direction of the Dominican Ambrosius Catharinus and became a chamberlain of Julius II. In 1511 he succeeded his uncle, Antonio del Monte, in the archiepiscopal See of Siponto, and on Feb. 16, 1513, preached the sermon at the fifth session of the Fifth Lateran Council (1512-17). He became bishop of Pavia in 1520 and served two terms as governor of Rome during the pontificate of Clement VII. In 1534 PAUL III appointed him vicelegate of Bologna, Romagna, Parma, and Piacenza, and auditor of the Apostolic Camera. He was created a cardinal priest with the title of SS. Vitalis, Gervase, and Protase on Dec. 22, 1536, and, on Oct. 5, 1543, he was raised to cardinal bishop of Palestrina. Having been chosen as copresident of the Council of Trent with Cardinals Marcello Cervini (later MARCELLUS II) and Reginald POLE, he opened the council on Dec. 13, 1545. His opposition to the anti-Roman policies of Emperor Charles V, and especially his influence in moving the council to Bologna, made him unpopular in Germany. As a result his chances of election to succeed Paul III in the conclave of Nov. 29, 1549, were blocked by imperial veto, until a compromise of French and Farnese cardinals secured his majority. To achieve this accord he made an election capitulation in which he promised to cede Parma into the control of Ottavio Farnese. Parma later became a central issue that involved Julius in the Hapsburg-Valois power struggle. Ottavio allied himself with French interests in Northern Italy and signed a treaty with Henry II on May 27, 1551. This drove the Pope to support Charles V at the risk of a French schism. He declared the fief of Parma vacant and sent an army, commanded by his nephew, Giambattista del Monte, to join the forces of Ferrante Gonzaga, Governor of Milan. The combined armies were to overthrow the French who invaded the Romagna from Mirandola, reduced Crevalcore, occupied Castro, and threatened Ravenna. At the failure of these armies, Julius was forced into a truce on April 29, 1552, that restored Castro to the papacy but placed Farnese in possession of Parma for a two-year period.

The Parma war and the Lutheran wars in Southern Germany hindered the continuance of the Council of Trent, which Julius ordered resumed on May 1, 1551, with Cardinal Marcello Crescenzi as president. The opposition of Henry II and his loyal bishops led to its suspension on April 15, 1552. Although the council was stalled, Julius continued efforts at Church reform. As early as 1550 he appointed a commission of Cardinals Domenico de Cupis, Gian Pietro Caraffa (later Paul IV), Francesco Sfrondato, Marcello Crescenzi, Innocenzo Cibo, and Reginald Pole to prepare a schema of reform. He wrote more than 50 briefs on reform, and on Sept. 16, 1552, he initiated a program to control the conferring of benefices, the relationships between regular and secular clergy, monastic discipline, clerical dress, and changes in curial administration. He planned a bull to implement these measures, but his death prevented its publication. He encouraged the newly formed Society of Jesus, whose constitution he confirmed on July 21, 1550, and at the suggestion of St. Ignatius of Loyola he founded the Collegium Germanicum to train German priests in Rome on Aug. 31, 1552, giving it an annual endowment. He was interested in the expansion of the faith in the Indies, Far East, and the Americas, and worked toward the reunion of the Chaldean Nestorians in Mesopotamia, and the Copts of Abyssinia. He named the Jesuit João NUNES BARRETO, first Patriarch of Abyssinia with Melchior Carneiro and Andrew Oviedo as his coadjutors, to win the favor of Negus (emperor) Claudius of Abyssinia. Upon the accession of Catholic Mary Tudor to the throne of England in 1553, he appointed Cardinal Reginald Pole as legate and adviser to the Queen, and by 1555 complete restoration of papal supremacy was achieved by a proclamation of Parliament.

A Renaissance Pope, Julius was a generous patron of humanism, and during his pontificate he placed Galeazzo Florimonte, Romolo Amaseo, and Paolo Sadoleto in his chancery; received the homage of Paolo Giovio, Pietro Aretino, and Lorenzo Davidico; appointed Marcello Cervini as Vatican Librarian and reformed the Roman University; appointed Michaelangelo chief architect of St. Peter's and named Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina its choir master. Besides building the Church of St. Andrew to commemorate his escape from death during the Sack of Rome in 1527, he erected the luxurious Villa Giulia at the Porta del Popolo, where he resided during his later years. A policy of vacillation and excessive nepotism cloud his pontificate. He was extravagant with gifts to his relatives and created a scandal by bestowing a cardinal's hat on a youth of 17, who was adopted by his brother, Baldovino del Monte.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 13:1–335 with full bibliography. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 17:105–145. H. JEDIN, History of the Council of Trent, tr. E. GRAF, (St. Louis 1957–60) v.1. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) ² 5:1205–06. A. NOVA, The Artistic Patronage of Julius III (1550–1555) (New York 1968). P. PARTNER, Renaissance Rome, 1500–1555 (Berkeley 1976). Epistolae ad Principes. Leo X–Pius IV (1513–1565) ed, L. NANNI (Vatican City 1993). C. GUTIERREZ, Trento, un problema (1552–1562) (Madrid 1995). P. PRODI and W. REINHARD, eds. Il Concilio di Trento e il moderno (Bologna 1996).

[E. D. MCSHANE]

JULIUS AFRICANUS, SEXTUS

Father of Christian chronography; b. Roman colony, Jerusalem, c. 160; d. c. 240. Destined for a military career, he accompanied the Emperor Septimius Severus on his campaigns in Osrhoene in 195 and was in close contact with the royal house at Edessa. He also attended lectures by the Christian teacher Heraclas in Alexandria and was influenced by the Stromata of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA. About 220 he became prefect of Emmaus-Nicopolis, a subdivision of Palestine, and in 224 the Emmaus colony sent him to plead its case before the Emperor.

At Rome, Alexander Severus gave him the task of organizing the public library housed in the Pantheon. It seems that he was spiritual adviser to the Empress-Mother, Mamaea. Later tradition has it that he became a bishop, but it is unlikely that he was even a priest. With his friend ORIGEN, he corresponded about scriptural questions

His main extant works are the Chronicles and the Kestoi. There are also two letters. The Chronicles appeared in 221 and provide a chronological list of sacred and profane events from creation to A.D. 220. This first Christian "history of the world" became a main source for EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA and subsequent historians. The work comprised five books, of which only fragments remain. Computing 5,500 years between creation and the birth of Christ, Julius expressed his belief that the Second Coming would take place in the year 6000, thus giving a chiliastic turn to the work. His use of sources was scarcely critical.

The Kestoi (i.e., "embroideries") is an encyclopedic miscellany in 24 books, of which large fragments are extant. It is dedicated to the Emperor Alexander Severus, and its subject matter ranges from medicine, science, and agriculture to magic and war. This work was written after the Chronicles and contains a strange mixture of Christianity and superstition.

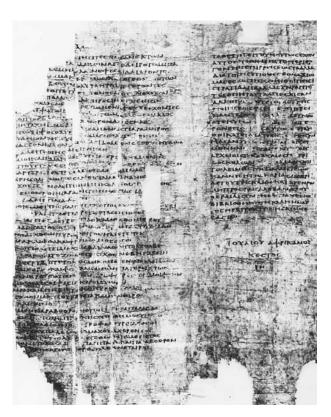

One of the two letters is addressed to Origen and deals with the authenticity of the story of Susanna (Dn 13.1–64); it exhibits a sounder critical sense, and the entire text is extant. There are only fragments of the second letter. It was addressed to ARISTIDES, and in it Julius attempts to harmonize the Mathaean and Lucan genealogies of Christ.

Bibliography: M. J. ROUTH, ed., Reliquiae Sacrae, 5 v. (2d ed. Oxford 1846–48) 2:238–309, chronicles. B. P. GRENFELL and A. S. HUNT, eds., The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, 3 v. (London 1903) 36–41, Kestoi. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:1921–25. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster MD 1950) 2: 138–140. H. GELZER, Sextus Julius Africanus und die byzantinische Chronographie, 2 v. (Leipzig 1880–98). W. REICHARDT, ed., TU 34.3 (1909), letters. W. A. OLDFATHER and A. S. PEASE, American Journal of Philology 39 (1918) 405–406, Kestoi. F. GRANGER, Journal of Theological Studies 34 (1933) 157–161, Library; 35 (1934) 361–368, Western Text. E. H. BLAKENEY, Theology 29 (1934) 164–169, Letter to Origen.

[P. W. LAWLER]

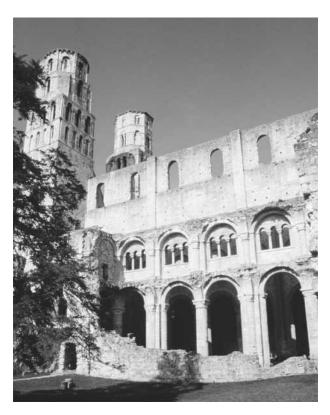

JUMIÈGES, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine abbey, in Upper Normandy, west of Rouen, Archdiocese of Rouen (Latin, Gemmeticum). It was founded on the Seine in 654 by Clovis II at the urging of Queen BATHILDIS. The first abbot, PHILIBERT, established the monastery under the LUXEUIL observance, built three churches (Notre Dame, Saint-Pierre, Saint-Germain), the cloister buildings, and the abbey walls. He organized the abbey's commercial port on the Seine. The abbey, already called "Jumièges the Almsgiver," enjoyed its first period of real prosperity from the 8th through the early third of the 9th century. At this time the BENEDICTINE rule replaced the Luxeuil observance; the monastery had several hundred monks, students, domes-Papyrus fragment from book 18 of "Kestoi," by Sextus Julius Africanus, written between 221–276 A.D., discovered in Oxyrhynchus, Egypt.

tics, and serfs. After the Norman plunderings (841, 845, 851), Jumièges was abandoned by the monks, who fled to Haspres (near Cambrai, France). It was temporarily restored in 940 by Duke William Longsword of Normandy, with monks from Poitiers; it was permanently restored c. 1010 by Abbot WILLIAM OF SAINT-BÉNIGNE OF DIJON and his disciple Thierry. The church of Notre Dame, rebuilt in Romanesque style, was consecrated in 1067; it was enhanced c. 1250 by the addition of an ogival choir, and its transept was rebuilt during the 14th century. The church of Saint-Pierre was restored during the same years. The abbey's second period of prosperity lasted from 1050 to 1340, during which time Abbot Gontard (1048–95) promoted the abbey's intellectual life, organized a scriptorium (which developed a school of miniature painters), and procured manuscripts. Abbot Alexander (1198-1213) gave further impetus to education and reorganized the scriptorium. Abbot William of Rouen (1239-1259) increased the abbey's manuscript holdings by gift and purchase. Excessive papal taxation, accumulation of debts, and pillaging during the Hundred Years' War led to a decline, but the abbey was restored by Jean de la Chaussée (1431-62). In 1516 the Reform of CHEZAL-BENOÎT was introduced. From 1524 to 1539 Abbot François de Fontenay restored the buildings and the church of Notre

Abbey of Junieges. (©Julia Waterlow; Eye Ubiquitous/CORBIS)

Dame and built a new cloister of unusual richness in flamboyant ogival style, but he was succeeded by commendatory abbots who were both greedy and litigious. In 1562 the abbey was plundered by the Protestants. The MAURIST Reform was introduced in 1616 and Jumièges produced many Maurist scholars, e.g., C. F. Toustain and R. P. Tassin. But only 20 monks remained at Jumièges in 1730; it was abolished during the French Revolution. The library became the nucleus of the municipal library of Rouen; the archives were sent to Yvetôt, but in 1827 were returned to Rouen. The local pastor would not accept Notre Dame for his parish church, and it was allowed to go to ruin by its owner, as were the convent buildings.

Bibliography: Chartes de l' abbaye de Jumièges (v. 825 à 1204) conservées aux archives de la Seine-Inférieure, ed. J. J. VERNIER, 2 v. (Paris 1916); Histoire de l'abbaye royale de Saint-Pierre de Jumièges, ed. J. LOTH, 3 v. (Rouen 1882–85). Vita Filiberti, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 5:568–606. L. A. JOUEN, Jumièges, histoire et légendes, ruines et reliques (Rouen 1954). D. KNOWLES et al., "Jumièges et l' Angleterre," Jumièges: Congrès scientifique du XIIIe centenaire, Rouen, 10–12 juin 1954, 2 v. (Rouen 1955) 1:259–313.

[P. COUSIN]

JUNG, CARL GUSTAV

Psychiatrist, founder of the school of analytical psychology; b. Kesswyl, Switzerland, July 26, 1875; d. Zurich, Switzerland, June 6, 1961. After receiving his medical degree from the University of Basel, he obtained training in psychiatry from individuals such as Pierre Janet, Eugen Bleuler, and Sigmund Freud. He held staff positions at the Burgholzli Mental Hospital in Zurich and at the University of Zurich. About 1913 he gave up all of his formal institutional affiliations to devote his life to clinical practice, training, research, and writing. Beginning a regular correspondence with Freud in 1906, which ended when he terminated his relationship with Freud in 1913, Jung became closely associated with the psychoanalytical movement and with Freud himself. From the date of its founding in 1910 and until 1914, Jung served as president of the International Psychoanalytical Association. In 1909 Jung and Freud made a historical trip to Clark University in Worcester, Mass., to present a lecture

However, in spite of Freud's great confidence in him and their close friendship, Jung began to persist in disagreeing with Freud in many areas. Not only did he feel that Freud's theory of the libido, centering around sexuality, should be broadened to include other drives, such as the urge for power, but also he felt that Freud's theory of the unconscious was too limited. He postulated the concept of a "collective" unconscious that was the seat of archetypes—inherited predispositions reflecting symbolically the entire history of man.

Among his other noteworthy contributions was his personality typology. It suggested that along the basic attitudinal spectrum of introversion-extraversion, in combination with the four functions of thinking, feeling, intuition, and emotion, eight modal personality types existed.

Of particular interest to Thomistic scholars was his concept of INDIVIDUATION, which encompassed the ultimate growth and fulfillment of the individual into a "total spiritual being." It is predicated heavily on the concept of self-responsibility in contrast to Freud's emphasis on a biological-historical determinism.

In the area of DREAM interpretation he believed that the "manifest" content of the dream can be interpreted quite literally in the context of the aspirations for the future of the individual, while Freud stressed the "latent" meaning of the dream as symbolic representation of the now unconscious past.

One interesting aspect of Jung's orientation is that as a youth he had a desire to study archeology; although he eventually became a psychiatrist, his general approach to the understanding of man was archeological. For example, his methodical studies of cultures of the past, for clues to symbols that could be used in support of his theory of archetypes and his concept of the collective unconscious, would appear to reflect his archeological background. Yet, in his approach to psychotherapy, he was much more likely to be concerned with the conscious—present and future—than was Freud, whose theory of the repetition compulsion suggested that man was acting out repeatedly the influences of the first few years of life.

Jung was a prolific writer, and much of his thinking, from his spelling out of a theory of personality to a morass of metaphysical speculations, can be found in his many books and articles.

Bibliography: C. G. JUNG, Collected Papers on Analytical Psychology (New York 1917); Contributions to Analytical Psychology (New York 1928); Psychological Types (New York 1923); Modern Man in Search of a Soul (New York 1933); Psychology and Religion (New Haven 1938; repr. 1960); The Integration of Personality (New York 1939); Über Psychische Energetik und das Wesen der Träume (2d rev. ed. Zurich 1948); Von den Wurzeln des Bewusstseins (Zurich 1954); Memories, Dreams, Reflections, ed. A. JAFFÉ, tr. R. and C. WINSTON (New York 1963). R. I. EVANS, Conversations with Carl Jung and Reactions from Ernest Jones (Princeton 1964). C. S. HALL and G. LINDZEY, Theories of Personality (New York 1957). R. L. MUNROE, Schools of Psychoanalytic Thought (New York 1955).

[R. I. EVANS]

JUNGMANN, JOSEF

Jesuit authority in homiletics and aesthetics; b. Münster, Westphalia, Nov. 12, 1830; d. Innsbruck, Nov. 25, 1885. In 1850 he began his philosophical and theological studies at the German College in Rome and upon their completion in 1855 he was ordained. Two of his brothers also studied at the German College and became priests. His brother Bernard (1833-95) was a lecturer at the University of Louvain and wrote on a wide variety of philosophical and theological topics. On May 5, 1857, Josef entered the Society of Jesus. In 1858, even before the end of his novitiate, he was made professor of homiletics in the reestablished faculty of theology at the University of Innsbruck. He remained at the University lecturing in homiletics and catechetics for many years, exercising an extraordinary influence over the many students who came under his direction. A prolific author of books and articles, he is particularly well known for his specialized treatises on homiletics, aesthetics, and devotion to the Sacred Heart. [For a commentary on Jungmann's work, see Croce's article in Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie (1958) 193–199.] Jungmann's principal works are: Theorie der geistl. Beredsamkeit (2 v. 1877–78; Michael Gatterer, the author's colleague, edited a fourth and much abbreviated edition in 1908 excluding the section on catethetics); Die Schöneit und die schöne Kunst (1886), reedited under the title of Aesthetik (2 v. 1884); Zur Verehrung U.L. Frau (1879); Die Andacht zum hl. Herzen Jesu u. die Bedenken gegen dieselbe (1885); Das Gemüt und das Gefühlsvermögen der neueren Psychologie (1885); and the Gefahren belletristischer Lecture (1872).

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliotèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:884–885. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934); photoduplicated with rev. and suppl., 2 v. (Louvain-Heverlee 1962) 944.

[C. SEVILLA]

JUNGMANN, JOSEF ANDREAS

Austrian Jesuit, inspirer of the liturgical and catechetical renewal; b. Sand near Taufers, South Tirol (pre-World War I Austria), Nov. 16, 1889; d. Innsbruck, Jan. 26, 1975. After theological studies in the diocesan seminary of Brixen, S. Tirol, he was ordained on July 27, 1913. His work as assistant pastor in Niedervintl and Gossensasz, before becoming a Jesuit, Sept. 13, 1917, contributed substantially to the basically pastoral orientation of his later scientific work. From 1925 at the University of Innsbruck, he taught pastoral theology, catechetics, and liturgy until 1963, with an interruption from 1938 to 1945 when Hitler closed the theology faculty of the university. Jungmann was also editor (1926–63) of Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie (again with an interruption, 1938-45). After having contributed through his writings to creating the general theological and pastoral climate for Vatican Council II, he was chosen, Aug. 25, 1960, to be a member of the conciliar Preparatory Commission. He continued his intensive and dedicated work during the council as a highly esteemed peritus of the Commission for Liturgy and after the Council as consultor of the Consilium (the commission entrusted with the implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy).

Superb mastery of his subject; penetrating, well-balanced, and impartial judgment; an exceptional gift of inspiration for sound and timely developments within the church, especially in the fields of liturgy and preaching; deep respect for the achievements of others who engaged in the same field of studies; and his proverbial modesty—all won Jungmann many friends and enthusiastic admirers. Festschriften of his colleagues, friends, and former students on his 60th, 70th, and 80th birthdays, as well as honors conferred by his country, manifested the great and general appreciation of him and his work. Jungmann's special talent consisted in letting the past teach an understanding and right evaluation of the present and point to right solutions for the future. Although outstanding in historical research, he was never lost in its details nor did he ever pursue history for its own sake. Solid historical research was for him the indispensable tool for a right assessment of the present condition of the Christian community and its need for genuine, penetrating renewal. His deep faith and his imperturbable adherence to the Church did not prevent him from seeing clearly and presenting with respectful objectivity unhealthy and harmful trends and developments of the past in Christian worship and preaching. The mere fact that, e.g., the leaders of the Church authorized and contributed to an ever-decreasing active participation of the people in the official worship of the Church, does not prove that this development was healthy and guided by the Holy Spirit. It is the special merit of Jungmann that, with his thorough historical studies combined with deep understanding of the conditions of authentic historical development, he undermined any simplistic interpretation of the Church's guidance by the Holy Spirit and opened the way to the needed thorough reform. At first many, including also prominent leaders of the Church, considered Jungmann to be unorthodox; but soon the weight of his incontestable reasons and also his modest and prudent presentation achieved general recognition and admiration. Without the selfsacrificing work of forerunners like Jungmann the reform as initiated by Vatican II could never have happened.

Writings. Although his 1924 doctoral thesis (never published) dealt with the catechesis on grace in the early Church, the field of Jungmann's special studies was liturgy and in particular the history of the Latin liturgy and the problems of an authentic liturgical renewal. His very first book Die Stellung Christi im liturgischen Gebet (1925; tr. The Place of Christ in Liturgical Prayer, 1965) is a masterpiece of his own method. Through a thorough study of the official worship of the Church it delineates, although only implicitly, the much-needed renewal of devotional prayer. Similarly, he paved the way for the timely renewal of the rites of penance in Die lateinischen Buszriten (1932). His Die liturgische Feier. Grundsätliches und Geschichtliches über Formgesetze der Liturgie (1938; 4th rev. ed. 1965) is a precious study on the nature and form of authentic liturgical celebration outside of sacramental liturgy; it appeared in English as The Liturgy of the Word (1966). In Gewordene Liturgie (1940) the best of Jungmann's numerous articles reached a larger audience. Jungmann used the academic exile imposed by Hitler for preparing his main work, which made him suddenly world famous, Missarum Sollemnia. Eine genetische Erklärung der römischen Messe (2 v., 1948; 5th ed.

1965). It was soon translated into all major European languages: the complete English translation of F. A. Brunner, The Mass of the Roman Rite (2 v., New York 1950) was followed by an abridgement by C. Riepe (1 v., New York 1959). Probably more than any other single book, Missarum Sollemnia prepared for and favored the conciliar reform of the Latin liturgy. Another significant work was Der Gottesdienst der Kirche (1955, 3d ed. 1962; tr. Public Worship, 1957). The lectures Jungmann gave in the summer of 1949 at the University of Notre Dame appeared first in English as Early Liturgy to the Time of Gregory the Great (1959; Ger. 1967). Liturgisches Erie und pastorale Gegenwart (1960) collects articles and conferences of general interest into one volume. The last two books, Christliches Gebet im Wandel und Bestand (1969) and Messe im Gottesvolk. Ein nachkonziliarer Durchblick durch Missarum Sollemnia (1970) are the crowning conclusion of an extremely rich and intensive literary activity: 304 books and articles, not counting some 800 shorter reviews of books. After Jungmann's death The Mass, an Historical, Theological and Pastoral Survey (1976) was published.

Because his masterful research and towering authority were almost exclusively in the history of liturgy and liturgical renewal, one may easily overlook Jungmann's momentous contribution to the renewal of catechesis and preaching. He is the acknowledged initiator and most prominent exponent of the second phase of modern catechetics known as kerygmatic renewal. It led to a shift of emphasis from method to content in all forms of the ministry of the Word. The kerygmatic approach means that any authentic announcing of God's word to young and old alike must concentrate on the good news of salvation by which God challenges sinful man to a new life in Christ. How biblical, liturgical, and kerygmatic renewal must be seen and actualized as partial aspects of a thorough integral pastoral renewal Jungmann showed best in his classic Die Frohbotschaft und unsere Glaubensverkündigung (1936); abridged English ed. The Good News Yesterday and Today, 1962, tr. W. A. Huesman, with essays, ed. J. Hofinger, appraising its contribution to pastoral renewal. When the book appeared it was so much ahead of the times that only swift withdrawal from the market could save it from ecclesiastical condemnation. But it had served its purpose. Hardly any other book anticipated and prepared for Vatican II's pastoral renewal as much as Jungmann's controversial book. During the council, without any further opposition, its revised edition appeared: Glaubensverkündigung im Lichte der Frohbotschaft (1963; Eng. tr. Announcing the Word of God, 1967). Great influence was also exerted by Katechetik. Aufgabe und Methode der religiösen Unterweisung (1953; 5th ed. 1968; tr. Handing On the Faith, 1959). His Christus als Mittelpunkt religiöser Erziehung (1939) brings out the central position of Christ in genuine catechesis.

Bibliography: B. FISCHER and H. B. MEYER, eds., J. A. Jungmann, Ein Leben für Liturgie und Kerygma (Innsbruck 1975) 156–207. J. HOFINGER, "J. A. Jungmann," Living Light 13 (1976) 350–359. F. X. ARNOLD and B. FISCHER, eds., Die Messe in der Glaubensverkündigung (Freiburg 1950; 2d ed. 1953). B. FISCHER and J. WAGNER, eds., Paschatis Sollemnia. Studien zu Osterfeier und Osterfrömmigkeit (Freiburg 1959). For Jungmann's 80th birthday, a separate issue of Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 91 (1969) 249–516.

[J. HOFINGER]

JUNILIUS AFRICANUS

Ancient exegete and Quaestor Sacri Palatii under the Emperor Justinian I in the years A.D. 541 to 549. Birth and death dates are unknown, although it seems certain that he died before A.D. 550. An African, he entered the imperial service and rose to one of the highest offices. How he acquired a considerable knowledge of theology and Scripture is not indicated in the scanty sources available on his life and work. His friend, Primasius, Bishop of Hadrumentum, having learned through him of the existence of an introduction to scriptural exegesis composed in Greek by the Persian Paul, who had been trained at the Syrian School of NISIBIS, urged Junilius to translate the work into Latin. His Instituta regularia divinae legis, in two books and cast in dialogue form, is a free translation or adaptation of the original Greek. The work reflects essentially the method of exegesis and general outlook of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, but its Nestorian tendencies have been exaggerated. Cassiodorus mentions Junilius's "Introduction" with praise in his Institutes (1.10), and the work had considerable influence in the early Middle Ages.

Bibliography: H. KIHN, Theodor von Mopsuestia und Junilius Africanus als Exegeten (Freiburg 1880); this work contains a critical text of the Instituta. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–32) 5:334–336. L. PIROT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:1971–76. E. STEIN, "Deux questions de Justinien et l'empioi des langues dans ses novelles," Bull. Acad. Roy. de Belgique (Lettres) 23 (1937) 365–390. M. L. W. LAISTNER, "Antiochene Exegesis in Western Europe during the Middle Ages," Harvard Theological Review 40 (1947) 19–31.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

JURA, FATHERS OF

The Fathers of Jura is a monastic community founded by St. Romanus and his brother St. Lupicinus at Condat in the French Jura region. Romanus (b. c. 400) was trained in the monastery of AINAY and went to Condat (now Saint-Claude) to become a hermit. He was soon joined by Lupicinus. Their holiness was so edifying that others came in great numbers to join them, and the two were obliged to found the new monastery of Leuconne (now St. Lupicin), as well as a convent for cloistered nuns, La Beaume, the site of the present village of Saint-Romain-de-la-Roche. The rule first followed by these monks was a composite, drawn from other existing rules and adapted to their own situation and needs. Time was given every day to prayer and reading; manual labor was stressed. In the beginning each monk lived in a separate cell, but at the time of St. EUGENDUS, the second successor to Lupicinus, there was a common building for sleeping and for eating. Clothing and food were simple. From earliest times the monastery enriched the district with temporal benefits as well as spiritual. Plantations, gardens, and mills sprang up in the area through the work of the monks. Intellectual labor also was encouraged, and under St. Eugendus, Greek and Latin were taught and manuscripts were transcribed. Lupicinus also wielded social and political influence, not hesitating to have recourse to the civil authority of the region in order to help his neighbor.

St. Romanus died c. 463–464 and was buried in the convent church at La Beaume. St. Lupicinus governed the monks until his death in 480. There are two biographies of these saints, one by St. GREGORY OF TOURS in the Liber vitae patrum, and an anonymous Vita patrum Jurensium. This latter is from the early 6th century, and was always considered authentic until Quesnel found apparent inconsistencies in it. However, these have been explained by L. Duchesne in his La Vie des Pères du Jura, where he urged that the traditional value of the vita be recognized.

Feast: St. Romanus: Feb. 28; St. Lupicinus: March 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 3:743–754. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 3:131–153. L. DUCHESNE, ''La Vie des Pères de Jura,'' Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 18 (1893) 3–16. G. A. A. HANOTAUX, Histoire de la nation française, 15 v. (Paris 1920–35) 6:58. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 8.1:430–438. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:438–439. É. BROUETTE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:24–25.

[G. E. CONWAY]

JUST PRICE

This article does not treat in detail the many complexities of modern price JUSTICE, but attempts only to state generally accepted moral principles governing the just price. These principles are meant to apply to staple commodities bought and sold in the open market; they do not necessarily apply to rare articles or occasional private transactions.

Notion of a Just Price. The price of a thing is its value in terms of money. Value, in this context, is the capacity of goods to satisfy human wants. Money is the medium of exchange; it serves as a general standard of value for all goods. Fundamentally, then, the just price is the true money value of the commodity, a price that can buy other commodities having a capacity for satisfying human wants equal to that of the commodity sold. The whole concept of commutative justice is based on the idea of equality. Modern commerce, though very complex, is rooted in the same idea of equality. It aims at allowing a person to obtain the equal of what he gives. This idea of equality is not opposed to the idea of profit; a person is entitled to the fruit of his industry or ingenuity. One may profit without violating justice, but justice sets limits on the methods by which profit may legitimately be gained.

Determination of the Just Price. The problem facing the moralist is this: How can the equal capacity of commodities for satisfying human wants be calculated? Extreme answers to this question must be rejected. One extreme view holds that each commodity has a fixed money value that van be exactly determined at any given time. This view must be rejected, since it is impossible to determine human needs and desires with precision; these needs vary widely from person to person, and from time to time, and depend on too many purely psychological factors, such as taste and fashion. Another extreme view is that all value so depends on the whims of individual buyers that any price they are willing to pay is just. This position must be rejected because it is immoral; it would thwart the very idea of money as a medium of exchange, of trade as a function of society, and of commutative justice as a moral virtue.

In opposition to such views, the traditional, NATURAL LAW theory maintains that the just price should be determined not by the usefulness of a commodity to this or that individual, but to men generally. The price should represent the judgment of the general buying public on the value of a particular commodity. This judgment is expressed in the open market, where buyers and sellers freely compete with one another and establish in the process a true equality between the capacities of different commodities to satisfy human wants. The competitive price is, then, the natural (or common) price that will drive out all other prices. Wherever there is pure competition, this competitive price will be the just price. This competitive or common price is not static. Neither is it exactly determinable, but may range between a highest and a lowest limit. Within this range any price could be considered just.

Legal Price. At times, in order to protect the interests of both buyers and sellers and to offset attempts to raise or lower prices artificially, public authority may consider it necessary to establish a legal price. In this case, value is set at a particular level and an adequate price for a commodity or service is fixed by law. Moralists agree that this legal price, where established, is the just price. However, deviations is considerably better (or worse) than the standard item, or if the established price is no longer observed by most people with the tacit consent of the public authority.

In pricing things for which there is no established market to furnish a common estimate of value, or no legal price, justice depends on the judgment of appraisers experienced in such transactions. This is sometimes called the conventional price because it is formed by compact or agreement. Moralists hold that a just price for things whose value is uncertain is reached when both parties to the bargain freely and honestly consent to it. There is agreement among Catholic moralists that: (1) It is against justice, in ordinary circumstances, to demand more than the legal price permits; (2) To sell above the highest just price or to buy below the lowest is a violation of justice.

Bibliography: J. MESSNER, Social Ethics: Natural Law in the Modern World, tr. J. J. DOHERTY (St. Louis 1957). V. A. DEMANT, ed., The Just Price: The Medieval Doctrine and Its Possible Equivalent Today (London 1930). P. BOVEN, Le Prix normal (Paris 1924). O. VON NELL-BREUNING, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirsche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:719–721. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 15.2:2625–31.

[D. LOWERY]

JUSTICE

The complete integration of love and justice is the chief characteristic of Christian moral doctrine besides its Christocentric orientations. It is through love of God and neighbor that the kingdom of God is achieved within us. And yet this love cannot be authentic unless the Christian also continually attempts to form the external world by the same dynamic force. Only thus does man honestly respond to the justice that God has gratuitously given him. This article therefore considers the relation between the justice received from God and the cardinal virtue of justice, and then the relation of justice to love. It then distinguishes, without unduly separating, the basic moral attitude of justice from objective right and especially from legal right, and with this as a background considers the various species and characteristics of justice.

Justice, Love, and Right (Ius)

From a theological point of view, justice among men is not primary. The primacy belongs rather to God's own sovereign justice, bestowed on and thus obligating man as a creature, justifying sinners with utter gratuity, making them just and simultaneously, with and through gratuitous justice, making them capable of a newer and "better justice." Theologically prior to justice among men is the awareness that the "justice" owed to God in a thousand ways is an absolutely free and yet absolutely binding love involving a man totally. In the biblical-theological view, justice among men deserves the name justice in the full sense only if it is accomplished with a view toward God in that love and thanksgiving and obedience are owed to God absolutely.

In this respect biblical thought is fundamentally different from the anthropocentrism of Aristotelian and Stoic thought. The relation of man to God is far different from a relation between equals, and it involves far more than a strict equality between giving and receiving. And yet in the relation of man to God the essential structure of all genuine justice is verified. Man in his totality, with whatever good there is in him, is a gift of God, a gift in person. And in the life of grace God gives man His most personal love. In the relation of man to God it is therefore a question of the original and absolute duty of "justice" that finds expression in piety and in the worship of God. "What can I give to the Lord for all that He has given me?" (Ps 115.12). The exemplar of justice is Jesus, who in His sacred humanity gave Himself up to the Father for man's redemption from that most fundamental injustice: sin. Speaking to the Baptist of the baptism of penance that He would finally achieve on the Cross, Christ said, ". . . it becomes us to fulfill all justice" (Mt 3.15). God's superabundant fidelity and love make man perpetually indebted, and man cannot presume ever to even accounts. "When you have done everything that was commanded you, say, 'We are unprofitable servants; we have done what it was our duty to do" (Lk 17.10).

The worship of God that man as a creature and a member of the family of God can offer to the Creator and the Father must be the most righteous possible. But the Christian must be extremely careful to avoid self-righteousness and self-satisfaction, precisely on the basis of justice. Worshipful justice makes one aware that "he who is just, let him be just still" (Rv 22.11).

If, after the manner of the Pharisee, the notion of justice among men, which is basically measured in terms of objective equality, is univocally applied to the relation of man to God, then authentic religion is greatly endangered. The situation must be reversed: that better justice demanded by, and owed to, God should serve as model and mollifier of justice among men, which tends toward a certain rigidity if it is not thus spiritualized and purified. Justice among men will become a genuinely Christian virtue only if it is an extension of that grateful justice that is owed to God.

Justice and Love. The question of the point of departure and the point of view is decisive for a specifically Christian and a truly human understanding of justice. If one looks first to external relations and sees them as objective and regards personal relations, on the contrary, as "merely" subjective, then justice becomes mere external order. Connected with this is the view that considers man as primarily a possession of the state, which overemphasizes the juridical order. But if the person, with his essential relation to the Thou and the We, is taken as the point of departure, and if the personal community is considered above all in terms of the intimate community of the family, then, with complete necessity, love is seen as primary and justice is the mediator in the personal order of love, preserving the capacity of the person for love. The theological viewpoint decisively corroborates this position: God is love, and every revelation of His justice, all His justifying action, speaks primarily of His love.

If one treats justice one-sidedly in terms of material goods (acquisition, property, exchange), then only with difficulty can he arrive at a comprehensive view. The person has rights that stand on a much higher plane than property rights. To another, not his goods but his personal dignity and personal rights are due before all else. But without love-i.e., without that attitude that is directed to the person as such—the most sublime rights of the person and of the community cannot be fully and authentically recognized at all. On the other hand, the fulfillment of the duties of justice directly related to measurable values clears away many obstacles that stand in the way of love—although indirectly the person must indeed always be cointended as the bearer of these rights. Thus the basic ontological order is love, then justice; but, in terms of the gradual achievement of order, the order may be justice, then love.

When it is a case of an order imposed from without and enforceable by sanction, then justice is directly intended and love only indirectly. Civil society or a financial undertaking cannot synthesize love and justice in the same way as the intimate community of marriage. But when men intend to order their common undertakings in a human way, then justice must place itself at the service of the community, and thus at the service of love. But love does not render superfluous or cancel out either justice in the material order, which measures according to the most exact standards possible, or the external order of law. These orders of justice must remain as long as all men have not yet achieved the perfection of love, i.e., as long as this world lasts. It is significant that in the opinion of many of the Church Fathers and theologians the necessity of a juridical order stems principally from original sin.

In considering the relation of love and justice, the following basic propositions must come into play: (1) Love is more basic than justice. (2) Love best guarantees the fulfillment of justice; and, correspondingly, failure in justice points to a failure of love. (3) The aim of justice must be achieved in the spirit of love. (4) Love gives clear vision and full extension to justice. (5) When there is question of one's own activity, one who bases himself on love considers primarily not the minimum requirements of justice but the actual needs of his neighbor and of the community; and when there is question of claims against or the imposition of burdens on others, he is above all careful to demand no more than that to which he has clear title. (6) Love is always prepared to suspend one's own rights for the good of another, assuming, of course, that the rights are such that they can be given up without damage to one's own integrity and that of the community. That love is indeed great that considers whatever is here and now obstructive to one's neighbor and the community as no longer a right at all, demonstrative legal title and honest acquisition to the contrary notwithstanding. For love there is a clear distinction between abstract right and the actual need for that right.

Every duty in justice is a duty in love, for every external order must be simultaneously informed by the personal dynamic force of order, which is love. And yet not every duty in love is strictly a duty in justice. Before God, the duties of love are no less binding than the duties of justice. Yet much more than the duties of justice, the duties of love are measured by the progress of the person in good. It is only through growth in love that one gradually comes to recognize better the real and exalted demands of the chief commandment: to love God and one's neighbor "according to the measure of the gifts of grace." This is not true of justice in the same measure. Here there is a clear contrast with the universally binding minimum standards. Here there is likewise a basis for the fact that systems of instruction in moral theology that are chiefly concerned with what one must demand of everyone in the confessional depend on the tract "Right and Justice" rather than on the description of the essence of love.

Justice and Right. In considering justice further, one must distinguish three facets: (1) the basic attitude (virtue) of justice that is a constant disposition to give to each his due; (2) the objective right (ius) that is owed objectively to each person and community, either on the basis of divine law or on the basis of the just legislation of the Church or of the State; and (3) the statute itself. Basic moral insight and the virtue of prudence are concerned with seeing what is due, not only abstractly and universally but also concretely, here and now. However, the virtue of justice facilitates the unbiased search for objective right and—this is its main function—determines the will to acknowledge and fulfill that right. The legislation of the Church and of the State is necessary. In part it merely corroborates what is due on the basis of divine law; in part it more carefully determines that which answers to the nature and calling of man in any given historical situation; and in part it represents a selection from among many possible legitimate arrangements, so that it might guarantee a common life and activity that are orderly and peaceful.

A purely mechanical fulfillment and application of the positive law without the control of the virtues of prudence and justice make life in society unworthy of man and, in the long run, unjust as well. When it comes to considering positive (legislated) law, one must first ask whether it answers to the objective requirements of justice. A positive law can entail injustice either if it violates the demands of divine law (natural or revealed)-in which case compliance is not allowed—or if it is basically neither necessary nor actually useful—in which case prudence determines, with the well-being of the community and of the person in mind, whether compliance or noncompliance is better. A law may be initially just, but because of altered circumstances it can become useless and unjust. In a situation in which the authority is duly constituted and functioning properly, one's decision should favor the law whenever there is real doubt. But when the authorities are either totally incapable or completely criminal, critical sense must be employed. The virtue of prudence will normally be exercised in determining whether and in what way the application of the law in the concrete circumstances of the here and now corresponds to true justice. Without EPIKEIA, without dispensation or the responsible excusing of oneself from the law itself or from its literal fulfillment when circumstances require it, compliance with positive law cannot truly correspond for any length of time to the virtue of justice.

The individual approaches the full realization of the basic virtue of justice only by constantly striving for it. Similarly, there is an essentially dynamic character to the science of human rights and of legislation. Consider, for example, the cases of slavery and of racial integration. There was a time when the abolition of slavery was utopian, when the immediately pressing duty was the mitigation of the condition of the slaves. (Of course this does not imply blamelessness in the fact that the recognition of the complete abolition of slavery as the only solution in keeping with the dignity of man came so late in history.) The same is true of the complete integration of the various races.

The Virtue of Justice and Its Subspecies

According to the common definition of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, the virtue of justice is "the strong and firm will to give to each his due" (ST 2a2ae, 58.1). This does not imply that to each exactly the same is due. Apart from commutative justice, which aims at complete parity between what is given and what is due in return (give and take), justice demands an equality of proportion. Only in matters in which one is equal to the other is there question of exact equality; in cases in which men differ the degrees and types of right must be distinguished. Indeed, the subspecies of justice are distinguished according to the types, the bearers, and the executors of right.

Commutative Justice. In iustitia commutativa the private person as well as groups (communities as moral persons) are the bearers of right. The aim of this right is the utility of both parties who exchange their goods or services. Commutative justice demands that one strive for a fair standard of giving and receiving in return. It forbids encroaching on the rights of others. Basic violations of commutative justice are theft, fraud, unjust damage.

General, or Legal, Justice. In iustitia generalis, or legalis, the community is the bearer of rights. This right intends the common good. Its fulfillment is the work of official agencies of the community, as well as of each individual member. The legislative authorities exercise legal justice through the promulgation of laws that further the common good. The government in its executive officials achieves it by the sensible use of existing just laws and by taking whatever measures are necessary for the common good. And every member of civil society exercises it by backing good legislation and government (through voting, influencing public opinion, and the like) and by intelligently obeying the existing laws for the sake of the common good. For St. Thomas, the complete range of moral virtues is seen from the perspective of general, or legal, justice, which subordinates every legitimate activity to the common good (ST 2a2ae, 58.5). In this way he considers it as the chief of all moral virtues, for the common good takes precedence over that of the individual (ST 2a2ae, 58.12). This indicates the essentially social—and ultimately the salvific-social—perspective of Christian morality. However, the common interpretation of legal justice is not so broad.

Distributive Justice. Iustitia distributiva intends the good of each individual as a member of the community. In feudal times and still more in the age of absolutism, it seemed that the governmental agency alone exercised this virtue. In a democratic age it evidently affects every citizen not only to the extent that the just distribution of burdens or privileges is a matter of concern to each but also to the extent that each should actively assert his influence to that end. Every individual has basic rights within the community that the community as a whole and each of its agencies and members must recognize. One sins against distributive justice by stirring up and advocating group and class egoism.

Legal and distributive justice have a certain proportion to each other: the more the individual devotes his powers to the common good, so much the more must the community also devote to his good. And yet this basic proposition should not be exaggerated, nor should it be considered in terms of commutative justice, for the fundamental relation between community, group, and individual is not that of mere service and reward. Rather, as in an organism, special care is due to the weak member. And the powerful are bound to renounce all privileges, however they may have been obtained, that infringe on the basic rights and the true good of the other members of the community.

Social Justice. In the age of privileged classes and even more in the age of individualism, doctrinal presentations of distributive (and also legal) justice ignored a perspective that has been added in the 20th century, namely, that of justice of the common good, or social justice. Iustitia socialis has become recognized as a new and important subspecies of the virtue of justice since Pius XI's encyclical Quadragesimo anno. It includes both legal and distributive justice, and yet its chief concern is not so much strict legal rights and duties as it is the natural rights of the community, its members, and the member communities of the family of nations in their relations to one another.

In keeping with the pressing question of the just social position of the worker, the notion of social justice was first applied basically and primarily to the relation between the owner of capital, the entrepreneur, and the worker as members of various social groups. Among other things, that meant the worker should be paid as a member of a family; that the shares of wages and profits, the allotment of the social products to each, should be computed with an eye toward the good of the industry, the general economy, and the social order.

In an age of steadily increasing economic complexity, of countless interrelations, and a solidarity that extends far beyond particular industries, indeed beyond national economies, it becomes much more apparent than in the ages of household and city economy that the principles of commutative justice alone are entirely insufficient. There is much more involved in every transaction than mere exchange between private parties, for every transaction presupposes countless prior transactions on the part of the society. And ultimately it is not merely a question of transactions and prior transactions. A truly realistic view of justice, achieved only gradually in the modern age, envisions above all the community of persons naturally established by God: the common family of all mankind. Every talent and all possessions are bestowed by God with a view toward the totality. The person unfolds to the highest level of his being only in solidarity. Every form of justice is included in and presupposed by social justice, but in the latter case it is always a question of rights and duties that derive from the nature of the human community and of the person. Transactions are not primary. It is rather the social nature of man that is primary, the encompassing social purpose of all earthly goods, and also the abilities of the person.

The Family. Social justice encompasses every community from the family to the community of nations. The child as a person and as a member of the human community has inalienable rights—above all, the right to life (and that indeed from the moment of conception), the right to be born into a wholesome family (from which follow the immorality of extramarital intercourse and a whole set of community obligations for safeguarding the family), and the right to education and support. Every community, from the family on up to the state and the community of nations, has to attend to and, as far as possible, to protect these rights. Because of their parenthood, because of their place in the community, parents owe to the child all that is requisite for healthy physical and spiritual development and for membership in human society. This social obligation depends on their means and on their ability to work, but first and most basically on the fact that they are parents. Similarly, on the basis of his belonging to the family, the child has the obligation, to the extent that it is possible within the family, to be concerned with the progress of the family in every regard and above all to show love for his parents in return for their love. But this is not a debt that could be paid off on the basis of commutative justice. It is the response required by the very nature and position of the child as a member of the family. And it becomes real and urgent also ifand perhaps only if—other members of the family are remiss.

Civil Government. Beginning with the smaller groups and next higher communities and extending on up to the state and the community of nations, the government has the duty of safeguarding the inalienable rights of each member of the community. Such rights would be, for example, the rights to life, security, intellectual and religious freedom, and the opportunity to work according to one's capacity, so long as one does not forfeit one or the other of these rights by wrongdoing, thus bringing into play penal justice.

Social justice demands that neither the person nor the group be deprived of its proper functions. On the contrary, the fundamental principle of subsidiarity—a typical expression of social justice—requires the higher community, from the family on up, to do all that it can to preserve the functional integrity of the lower community and the person and also, if necessity forces it to take over the lower role, to reestablish it, having taken on this function only temporarily and as a substitute measure. Conversely, the person and the group must be constantly prepared to preserve the functional integrity of every higher group and of society as a whole at their own levels.

International Community. In the mid-20th century the solidarity of the community of nations has strongly come to the fore. Through the development of modern technology and culture, nations have grown more closely together and now demonstrate in very many ways that the general welfare of each nation individually and of all nations collectively are closely linked. Catholic social teaching (above all, Mater et Magistra, Pacem in terris, and the Constitution of Vatican Council II On the Church and the Modern World) has made a decisive contribution to the further development of a worldwide view of common welfare justice. The nations especially favored by nature and history are obliged to come to the aid of the poor nations seeking further technological and cultural advancement, until the poor nations reach their full functional capacity and corresponding autonomy within the community of nations. Aid for development and promoting practicable possibilities for emigration are not charitable "alms" but rather actual demands of the social order and duties in justice for the sake of peace. Such help should not be made to depend on repayment, which is often quite impossible.

Boundaries between Justice and Love. Social justice presupposes deep insight into the social nature of man and into the essential purpose of the different types of community. The boundaries between justice and love are drawn strictly or more loosely, depending on the situation. Much of what was seen in the past as a mere "duty of love" or as gratuitous almsgiving is now clearly seen as a requirement of social justice if one considers the essential solidarity of the family of mankind. This advancement approximates the view of the Church Fathers (despite differences in social and economic structures and in the tasks at hand), who, moreover, saw this essential solidarity not from the viewpoint of justice among men but from the perspective of divine justice and evangelical love. Finally, social justice can endure in its full breadth and height only in terms of faith in God, the giver of all good gifts, and in the unity of the human race in God's sight. It is the familial justice of the creatures of God and the children of God, the basic attitude of the "family of God."

Such an approach to social justice in no way allows men to be self-satisfied after the manner of those who are just according to the law. It is an essentially dynamic view that keeps them aware of the perpetually approximative and imperfect character of every fulfillment. It attempts to take the next step that is historically possible at any given time.

Penal Justice. Iustitia vindicativa is the temperate will to restore violated justice and order through punishment proportionate to the violation and to the exigencies of the social order. It is above all a virtue proper to superiors and judges, who, in meting out punishment, should aim only at the furtherance and protection of the common good (public order and safety, confidence in justice and the sense of right). But it is also a virtue of the subject who is prepared to undergo due punishment if necessary and a virtue of other members of the community who contribute to the restoration of violated justice and order (see VENGEANCE).

Characteristics of Justice. The obligations of justice can be strictly and objectively determined, at least in their basic form, without regard to the gifts and the particular level of virtue of each individual, even if the process of determination is conditioned by change and history. In the case of justice, it is not directly and primarily a question of personal relations but of the order of possessions and goods-always, of course, with a view toward the person and the community. However, as regards goods, not only material goods should be considered but also the higher cultural goods-indeed, even truth, fidelity, and honor—insofar as they concern the necessary functioning of communal life. In contrast to legal right, it is a peculiarity of the virtue of justice that it is never fully enforceable, even though a certain measure of enforceability is required by the very nature of justice. The limits of enforcement are set by the clearly discernible rights and by the nature of the common welfare, which can be very much endangered by the excessive use of force; for it is a question of the common welfare that has as its very center the spirit of liberty that moves men to the free fulfillment of what is just.

Bibliography: E. BRUNNER, Gerechtigkeit (Zurich 1943). G. DEL VECCHIO, Justice: An Historical and Philosophical Essay, ed. A. H. CAMPBELL, tr. LADY GUTHRIE (New York 1953); Philosophy of Law, tr. T. O. MARTIN (Washington 1953). A. DESCAMPS, Les Justes et la justice dans les évangiles et le christianisme primitif hormis la doctrine proprement paulinienne (Louvain 1950). B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ: Moral Theology for Priests and Laity, tr. E.G. KAISER (Westminster, Md. 1961-). F. HEIDSIECK, La Vertu de justice (Paris 1959). V. HEYLEN, Tractatus de iure et iustitia (5th ed. Mechlin 1950). H. MERSCHMANN, Die dreifache Gerechtigkeit: Grundgedanken der scholastischen Gesellschaftslehre (Recklinghausen 1946). J. MESSNER, Social Ethics: Natural Law in the Modern World, tr. J. J. DOHERTY (new ed. St. Louis 1964). R. NIEBUHR, Love and Justice, ed. D. B. ROBERTSON (Philadelphia 1957). J. PIEPER, Justice, tr. L. E. LYNCH (New York 1955). P. TILLICH, Love, Power, and Justice (New York 1960).

[B. HÄRING]

JUSTICE, DOUBLE

The early reformers taught that the sinner is justified, or declared righteous, by the imputation of the justice, or righteousness, of Jesus Christ. Even though the justified man's sins are forgiven, they remain in him; but God does not reckon them to him because of the merits of the Savior. In Catholic doctrine, on the other hand, JUSTIFICATION is an internal sanctification of the sinner, who voluntarily receives from God an infusion of GRACE and the VIRTUES. The one and only formal cause of justification is inherent, or inhering, justice, also called "sanctifying grace." By this inherent justice sins are forgiven and blotted out, even though CONCUPISCENCE, which is not punishable, remains.

In the discussions of the sixth session of the Council of Trent on the justification of the sinner, a compromise theory, that of double justice, was proposed by Girolamo SERIPANDO, superior general of the Augustinians and afterward cardinal. A primitive form of this opinion had been defended prior to Trent by a few Protestant and some Catholic theologians. Chief among the latter were John Gropper of Cologne and Gasparo Contarini, a Venetian, created cardinal in 1535.

The doctrine of double justice was so named because it taught two formal causes of justification, both the inherent justice held by Catholics and the imputed righteousness held by Protestants. The proponents of this opinion argued that inherent justice is imperfect and that the works of the just man, marred with faults and imperfections, are not worthy of heaven. To become completely righteous before God and to be able to appear at the tribunal of the divine judge clothed in righteousness and with sufficient merit of eternal life, a person needs more than internal sanctification. The justified sinner needs also a special application of the merits of Christ by way of imputation. The application or imputation is not, however, purely forensic or external but includes a formal effect, namely, the insertion of the just man into the Body of Christ as one of its members.

The fathers of the Council of Trent, in approving the decree on justification, decisively rejected the doctrine of double justice in chapter seven: "Finally the only formal cause [of justification] is the 'justice of God, not the justice by which He is Himself just but the justice by which He makes us just" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 1529). Furthermore, the necessity of a special imputation of Christ's merits for the fullness of the merits of the just is excluded in chapter 16: "It must be believed that nothing else is wanting to the justified [besides the constant influx of Christ in His members] for them to be considered as having fully satisfied the divine law by their works . . . and as having truly merited the eternal life which they will attain in due time . . . for the justice that is said to be ours because it inheres in us and justifies us is likewise God's justice because He has put it in us through the merit of Christ' (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1546–47). The condemnation in canon ten shows both that Christ's righteousness is the meritorious cause of justification and that Christ's righteousness is neither its single formal cause nor one of two formal causes.

Bibliography: H. JEDIN, Papal Legate at the Council of Trent: Cardinal Seripando, tr. F. C. ECKHOFF (St. Louis 1947). A. BRIVA, "El problema de la doble justificación en la escuela de Colonia," in Semana española de teología 18, 1958 (Madrid 1961) 19–44. P. PAS, "La Doctrine de la double justice au concile de Trente," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 30 (1954) 5–53. C. E. MAXCEY, "Double Justice, Diego Laynez, and the Council of Trent," Church History 48 (1979) 269–78. P. SCHÄFER, "Hoffnungsgestalt und Geganwart des Heiles: Für Disjussion um die doppelte Gerechtigkeit auf dem Konzil von Trent," Theologie und Philosophie 55 (1980) 204–29. E. ARNOLD, "Triplex iustitia": The Sixteenth Century and the Twentieth," in Christian Authority: Essays in Honor of Henry Chadwick, ed. G. R. EVANS (Oxford 1988) 204–23. A. E. MCGRATH, Iustitia Dei: A History of the Doctrine of Justification (Cambridge 1998).

[T. J. MOTHERWAY/C. MALLOY]

JUSTICE OF GOD

The concept of God's justice is discussed here as it evolved in the Bible and as it has been developed in Christian theology.

In the Bible. The concept of justice has a special meaning in the Old Testament and this meaning is carried over into the New Testament, particularly into Paul's Epistle to the Romans.

In the Old Testament. In ordinary usage one thinks of the "justice of God," as either vindictive justice, that is, the justice whereby God punishes sinners, or as distributive justice, that is, the justice by which he both punishes sinners and rewards the just. However, the Hebrew concept of justice must be clearly discerned lest one read modern notions into it. Therefore we must examine the Hebrew word sedâiâh (justice or righteousness) and its relationship to hesed (loyalty) and 'ĕmet (fidelity).

The use of parallelism in the Old Testament poetry makes it often quite clear what words these writers considered to be synonymous. Thus, the consoling message of Deutero-Isaiah (40–66) justice ($s^ed\hat{a}(\hat{a}h)$) and salvation ($t^e\hat{s}(\hat{u}^c\hat{a})$) appear quite frequently together. God is said to be "a just and saving God" (Is 45.21) or "I am bringing on my justice, it is not far off, my salvation shall not tarry" (Is 46.13, also 51.5). In the Psalms God's justice is often paralleled or associated with his salvation, his truth or fidelity and his mercy (Ps 35,36.6–7, 39,40.11, 70,71.15, 102,103.17). In both Deutero-Isaiah and the Psalms God's justice, equivalent by parallelism to his salvation, is described as something to be revealed (Ps 97,98.2). This understanding is important for the interpreting the Letter to the Romans.

In the Old Testament the justice of God is often bestowed on the just man, whereas the wrath of God is reserved for the sinner. Thus Mi 7.9 states: "The wrath of the Lord I will endure because I have sinned against him. He will bring me forth to the light; I will see his justice." In Ps 84 and 85 such terms as wrath, anger, vexation (v. 3–5) are opposed to such terms as kindness, truth, peace, salvation and justice (v. 9–11).

In the Old Testament, then, the justice of God is neither vindictive nor distributive but salvific, and it is founded upon God's covenantal commitment to Israel. God is just in that he is abidingly faithful to his freely made promises of salvation and deliverance. Hence such terms as justice, salvation, fidelity and truth are easily interchanged in the Old Testament (Ps 97,98.2–3, Dt 32.4).

In the New Testament. Within the Old Testament the messianic era was foreseen as the establishment of God's perfect salvific justice (Is 9.6, 11.3–9; Jer 23.6). Yet, within the New Testament, it is limited, almost exclusively, to the Letter to the Romans (see Mk 1.15 with Is 40.13). While Paul discusses a common theme in both Galatians and Romans, the concept of justice does not appear in the former. Because Paul was writing to the Galatians within the polemical atmosphere of the Judaizers, he probably avoided the term "justice" since, within contemporary Jewish thought, it had come to assume the connotation of the impartial distribution of rewards and punishments in accordance with legal norms. Instead he uses ἐπαγγελία (promise) (see Gal 3–4) for the basis of the gratuitous gift of salvation. Nonetheless, from within the Old Testament environment one can readily equate "promises of God" (Galatians) with "justice of God" (Romans). There are five principal texts to be considered in Rom 1.17; 3.5, 21–22, 25–26; 10.3. Luther interpreted Rom 1.7 to denote that attribute of God whereby he is just and punishes the sins of the unjust. However, such an interpretation is dubious.

Rom 1.17 is placed within the context of God being faithful to his covenantal promise of salvation, whereby God vindicates his justice. In this verse the justice (δικαιούνη) of God is revealed in the preaching of the gospel. Moreover, in Rom 1.18 the "wrath [ὀργή] of God" is likewise "revealed." In accordance with the Old Testament this places Rom 1.17–18 in continuity with the distinction of justice as salvific deliverance and wrath as God's justice against "all ungodliness and wickedness."

Rom 3.5: "But if our wickedness shows forth the justice of God . . . is God unjust to inflict wrath on us?" This verse is again placed within convenantal theology. Even if Israel does not remain faithful, God will not break his bond. Israel's infidelity will serve only to make God's fidelity even more merciful. Thus Paul establishes three antitheses: infidelity – fidelity (3.3); injustice – justice (3.5); and falsehood – truth (3.7). Once again the justice of God is his fidelity and truth to his covenantal promises despite the infidelity of man, which, of course, begets his wrath.

Rom 3.21-22: "But now the justice of God has been manifested apart from the law, although the law and the prophets bear witness to it, the justice of God through faith in Jesus Christ for all who believe." Thus God's justice is manifested negatively "apart from the law" and yet positively "through faith in Jesus Christ." In 3.20 Paul alludes to Ps 142,143.2 where justice is used in the sense of salvific deliverance, for it is parallel to fidelity and opposed to divine judgement. Once again, then, Paul uses the term in its foundational Old Testament sense of divine covenantal fidelity for salvation.

Rom 3.25–26: ". . . Christ Jesus, whom God has put forward as an expiation by his blood, to be received by faith. This was to show God's justice, because in his divine forbearance he had passed over former sins; it was to prove at the present time that he himself is just and that he justifies him who has faith in Jesus." This text has always caused exegetical difficulties, especially because of the enigmantic phrase that God "had passed over $[\tau \eta \nu \pi \alpha \rho \epsilon \sigma \nu]$ former sins." The Old Testament usage elucidates the phrase and its context. God and man were bound together in a covenantal bond, but man broke his side of the covenant by sin and therefore nullified the entire relationship. Yet God did not allow man's sin to free him from his own commitment. Rather, he "passed over" these sins, not in regard to punishment, but in regard to covenant nullification. He himself remained faithful and even merciful. His fidelity showed the greatness of his own justice in bringing man the promised salvation even after man's repudiation of its advent by the sins of covenant infidelity. Such salvation, indeed, is precisely to give man a share in the divine justice so that man himself now remains in an eternal covenant with God through Christ. God's justice was manifested through the expiation of sin through the blood of Jesus and so believers are justified, that is, acquire the justice of God, through faith in him.

Rom 10.3—4: "For, being ignorant of the justice that comes from God, and seeking to establish their own, they did not submit to God's justice. For Christ is the end of the law, that every one who has faith may be justified." Again, the Old Testament meaning of God's justice is evident in these verses. The Pharisaic attempt to obtain salvation by works of the Law showed that they did not understand the salvation (the justice of God) offered to them by God, that is, salvation initiated only by the gratuitous gift of God and accepted through faith. Therefore they did not submit to the justice of God, that is, his salvific deliverance now made manifest in Christ and accepted in faith.

In both the Old Testament and Paul the primary meaning of divine justice is God's merciful fidelity to his promises. This finds its culmination in Jesus Christ through whom the justice of God is revealed and through whom the believer is made just. However, for those who refuse the justice of God through Jesus Christ, God's just wrath will come upon them at the end of time (Rv 16.5–7; 19.2).

See Also: JUSTIFICATION; REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE); RETRIBUTION; GRACE (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: R. ADAMIAH, Justice and History in the Old Testament (Cleveland 1982). R. B. HAYS, s.v. "Justification," The Anchor Bible Dictionary (New York 1992). S. LYONNET, "De 'Iustitia Dei' in Ep. Ad Rom," Verb Dom, 25 (1947) 23–34, 118–121, 129–144, 193–203, 257–263. J. PIPER, The Justification of God (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1983). J. RUWET, "Misericordia et Justitia Dei in V.T.," Verb Dom, 24 (1947) 35–42, 89–98.

[D. M. CROSSAN/T. G. WEINANDY]

In Theology. Within systematic theology there are four interrelated notions of the justice of God. The first pertains to God's perfection in that he is perfectly just in himself. Thus the justice of God is the absence and impossibility of any moral disorder within himself. God's justice is thus equivalent to his infinite holiness and perfect goodness (Aquinas, Summa theologiae, I.21.1.ad 3 and 4). (See HOLINESS OF GOD).

Secondly, the justice of God in himself is the foundation and cause of the justice or righteousness within sinful humankind. Augustine states that as God shares his wisdom with humankind, because he is wisdom itself, so also he, who is just in himself, gives to humankind justice "when he justifies the godless (Rom 4.5)" (De Trin. 14.15). The Council of Trent, quoting Augustine, declares the same: "The only formal cause [of our justification] is "the justice of God, not the justice by which he is himself just, but the justice by which he makes us just" (Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1529). Or again: "The justice that is said to be ours because it inheres in us is likewise God's justice because he has put it in us through the merit of Christ" (Denzinger 1546) (See JUSTIFICATION).

Thirdly, the theological concept of God's justice is most broadly applied to God's action towards creation and particularly towards human beings in so far as he renders to each and all their due. Aquinas designates this "retributive justice" or "commutative justice." As a ruler or the head of a family justly gives to each member what is due, "so the order of the universe, which is manifest in both physical nature and in beings endowed with a will, shows forth God's justice" (S.T., I.21.1). Aquinas approvingly quotes Dionysius: "We must need see that God is truly just in seeing how he gives to all existing things what is proper to the condition of each; and preserves the nature of each one in the order and with the powers that properly belong to it" (Div. Nom., 8.4). Thus God "exercises justice when he gives to each thing what is due to it by its nature and condition" (S.T., I.21.1.ad 3). God's justice then is placed within his overall providential and orderly care for the whole of creation.

Fourthly, God's justice pertains to his response to the free moral actions of human beings. God "will render to every man according to his works" (Rom 2.6; see Mt 16.27). "For God is not so unjust as to overlook your work and the love which you showed for his sake in serving the saints, as you still do" (Heb 6.10). Thus, "God rewards those who seek him (Heb 11.6, see Denzinger, 2122). Paul, having kept the faith, is confident that "henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the just judge, will award to me on that Day, and not only to me but also to all who have loved his appearing" (2 Tm 4.6-7, see Denzinger 1545). Aquinas states: "Justice, therefore, in God is sometimes spoken of as the fitting accompaniment of his goodness; sometimes as the reward of merit' (S.T., I.21.1.ad 3). He then equally approves Anselm's statement: "When you punish the wicked, it is just, since it agrees with their deserts; and when you spare the wicked, it is also just; since it befits your goodness' (Pros., 10). The magisterium more often refers to God's justice as the punishment due to sin than to the reward due to merit (see Denzinger, 621, 1672, 2216, 3781). Augustine states that God "can condemn no one without demerits, because he is just" (C. Julian. 3.18.35). Yet he also speaks of God's justice with regard to the retribution of both good and evil-"making good or bad use of their free will, they are judged most justly" (Spir. et litt. 33.58); or of the reward to be rendered for merits that the just judge will render (see Grat. et lib. arb. 6.14). Moreover, it should be noted that God's justice is not arbitrary. God justly rewards those who have freely cooperated with his grace and he justly, depending upon the seriousness of the sin, punishes or even condemns unrepentant sinners, for sin itself justly demands such condemnation which God justly sanctions (see Aquinas, S.C.G., 3.140). Within our sinful world the misuse of power, or greed, or lust, or hatred and prejudice cause horrendous and appalling injustice by violating the authentic dignity and just rights of human beings. Because this world's justice cannot possibly make right such injustices, Christians look then to the day when Jesus will come in glory for finally he will redress all wrongs and set all things right. All will proclaim: "Just are you in these your judgments . . . true and just are your judgments" (Rv 16.5-7, 19.2). God's justice will then reign forever.

God's justice does not conflict with his mercy, nor does his mercy diminish his justice. Both are part of God's absolute goodness. Aquinas states: "The communicating of perfections, absolutely considered, appertains to goodness; in so far as perfections are given to things in proportion, the bestowal of them belongs to justice . . .; in so far as God does not bestow them for his own use, but only on account of his goodness, it belongs to liberality; in so far as perfections given to things by God expel defects, it belongs to mercy" (S.T., I.21.3). Justice demands mercy. "The Lord does deeds of justice...He knows of what we are made, he remembers that we are dust" (Ps 102/103.6, 14). God's justice demands that he act mercifully towards sinners and his mercy is always enacted in accordance with his justice. Thus, the Father, in his loving mercy, sent his Son into the world not to condemn it but that those who believe might rightfully possess eternal life (Jn 3.16–17). In mercy God justly condemned sin through the cross of Christ so that humankind might be justified through faith in him (Rom 3.21–26). Aguinas holds that "mercy does not destroy justice, but in a sense is the fullness thereof" (S.T., I.21.3.ad 2). God mercifully renders to humankind more than it justly merits and he mercifully punishes humankind less than it justly deserves (see S.T., I.21.4 and ad 1). (See MERCY OF GOD)

See Also: JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); PUNISHMENT; SANCTION; SANCTION, DIVINE; GOD, ARTICLES ON. Bibliography: T. AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae, I.21; Summa Contra Gentiles, 3.140. B. DAVIES, The Thought of Thomas Aquinas (Oxford 1992). H. KÜNG, Justification (New York 1964).

[T. G. WEINANDY]

JUSTICE OF MEN

The concept of man's justice is discussed here as it evolved in the Bible and as it has been developed in Christian theology.

In the Bible. After treating the fundamental themes concerning the justice of men found in the OT, consideration will be given to the perfection of man's justice in the NT.

In the Old Testament. In the covenantal theology of Israel the term hesed (fidelity) applied to both parties of the agreement, to both God and man. The term justice $(\underline{s}^e d\bar{a}q\hat{a})$ or δικαιοσύνη) had the same duality of application: the justice of God meant His fidelity to His covenantal promises, and the justice of man meant basically and originally his fidelity to his side of the mutual commitment. That man, then, was just who fulfilled completely all the stipulations of the covenant, which consisted of the Ten Commandments and all their applications to everyday life and to new situations that constituted the case law of the Pentateuch. An example from the life of David makes this meaning clear. While Saul was pursuing David, the latter got a chance to kill him but refrained from doing so because Saul was still "the Lord's anointed." Afterward Saul admitted that David was "more just" than he, for David had shown him kindness whereas he had shown him evil (1 Sm 24.18). David was just, i.e., faithful to his king, even while the latter attempted to kill him.

In the prophetic indictment of Israel for covenant infidelity, i.e., for idolatry and the social injustices that proceeded from ignoring the covenant, it was often simply of Israel's injustice that the Prophets spoke, for the term summed up the idea of covenant disobedience. Thus Amos, having condemned the extravagant cult (Am 3.14) and social evil of Israel (4.1), pinpointed his indictment by saying, "Woe to those who turn judgment to wormwood and cast justice to the ground!" (5.7).

Especially were those who exercised the office of judge in Israel obliged to judge justly, i.e., according to covenantal law and its casuistic specifications, and not to allow respect of persons or bribery to contaminate their decisions (Dt 1.16–17; 16.19–20). But beyond the justice or injustice of human judges was the judgment of God; one of the functions of the Temple according to Solomon's dedication prayer was to have been to serve as a place of vindication for the wrongly accused who came into God's presence to swear to their innocence (1 Kgs 8.31–32).

The theme of God's ultimate vindication of the justice of the wrongly accused appears quite frequently also in the Psalms, e.g., 25(26).1; 34(35).23–24, and especially 23 (24).3–5, where the justice that was rewarded is described as belonging to one "whose hands are sinless, whose heart is clean, who desires not what is vain, nor swears deceitfully to his neighbor." The picture of the just man as one who kept covenant fidelity with his God (in practice, the Ten Commandments) appears in greater detail in Psalm 14(15) in a kindred context; such a man could dare to approach the Temple and enter the presence of God. The counterpart of the just man was the rich extortioner described in Jer 22.13–17. (See JUSTICE OF GOD.)

In such a context of justice, equated with the covenant fidelity whereby man lived out the results of his commitment to Yahweh, the justice of the coming Messiah is to be understood. Against the background of the increasing infidelity of the Davidic dynasty, Isaiah announced a new Davidic monarch who would rule with justice and fidelity to the covenant. He himself, the messianic monarch, would live in justice with God and procure justice for others by judging them according to the covenant (Is 9.6; 11.2–5; 16.5). Jeremiah spoke of a new covenant between God and His people, one that they would keep (Jer 31.31–34); but he also promised at the same eschatological era ("days are coming" in 23.5; 31.27, 31; 33.14–18) a new David to reign in justice (23.5; 33.15).

The restoration and fixation of the Mosaic Law that took place after the exile still retained the ancient covenantal framework. Israel's obligation to the divine commands grew intrinsically and organically from its new being as "my people" (cf., e.g., Joshua ch. 24 with Nehemiah ch. 9). In the solemn renewal of the covenant, the author of Neh 9.13-14 stressed the Mosaic Law within the usual historical prologue to the establishment of covenant obligation, and he then interpreted Israel's former infidelity in terms of disobedience to this Law (Neh 9.16, 26, 29, 34). The newly inspired Israelites made and signed a binding covenant (9.38), which was interpreted as meaning to take an oath, under the penalty of a curse, that they would walk in the Law of God, given by Moses, God's servant, and would be careful to observe all the Lord's commands, His ordinances, and His statutes (10.29–30). The just man and his justice would henceforth be more and more described in terms of obedience to law as a means to attain fidelity to the covenant. Yet, even in Psalm 118(119), the praise of fidelity to the Law, the Psalmist knew full well that it was only in so far as God came into an individual's life that he was thereafter enabled to observe the Law ("Give me discernment, that I may observe your law and keep it with all my heart," v. 34). This thinking is summed up succinctly in Ps 1.2, which sees the just man as one who "delights in the law of the Lord and meditates in his law day and night." Such a theme is far from the thinking of the Pharisee who sought justice by keeping precepts; he should rather have kept precepts because he had found justice, or better, because justice had found him. Once sacred law became disconnected from its basis in divinely given covenantal being, it tended to proliferate indiscriminately in multiple interpretations and applications, and since its vital core was now dead, it became eventually an insufferable burden for the believer. By the time of the NT the Mosaic Law had fallen into such a state in the hands of the Pharisaic theologians.

In the New Testament. The problem of the justice of men in the NT coincides with that of JUSTIFICATION. At the time of Jesus the spiritual authorities of the people of God had lost an understanding of divine law as the dayto-day specification of their covenant commitment, even to the point where their interpretation was now in open conflict with the Ten Commandments themselves (Mt 15.1-9). Thus, one of the first things Jesus had to do in preparing His disciples for the arrival of the kingdom was to warn them that "unless your justice exceeds that of the Scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 5.20). Jesus' new justice is described in Matthew ch. 5-7; it was spiritual and interior, but, above all, it was based on the fact that the believer saw God as his Father and sought to act according to such an existential situation (Mt 5.48; 6.4, 6, 18). The justice of the kingdom of God was based, in other words, on a new and perfect relationship with God, which Jesus mediated to mankind as Moses had mediated the ancient covenant at Sinai. With the new covenant came a new law, and when the new law conflicted, in the Pharisaic interpretation, with the old Law, Jesus did not hesitate to place mercy and love before such an explicit law as that commanding rest on the Sabbath (Mk 3.1-6).

St. Paul was embroiled even more formally and theologically in the same controversy. The Pharisaic position was known to him from within, and he set out to oppose it in Galatians, on a rather personal level, and in Romans, on a more theoretical basis. There had been, he argued, only one justice (justification) for man and that was offered gratuitously to man by God's merciful love and was accepted as such by faith; this was as true for Abraham as for those living after Christ (Gal 3.6–18; 4.21–31; Rom 4.1–25; 9.6–9). Neither in the OT nor in the NT could a man attain justification, i.e., become just, by observing a set of precepts, however divine and holy they may have been. Paul's teaching was a direct polemic against the Pharisaic position that was in danger of passing, through Pharisee converts, into the early Church. But Paul also insisted in the moral section of almost all his Epistles and equally clearly in the doctrinal part of Romans (e.g., ch. 5 and 8) that the justice that man accepted by faith, which was a share in God's own fidelity to Himself (Rom 3.26), was a baptismal commitment that resulted in the life lived in the risen Lord (Gal 2.20; Col 3.1–4).

James stressed the last point even more strongly, possibly because of a misunderstanding of Paul existing among some of the Apostle's converts. The act of faith had to lead to a life of charity or it could hardly be termed faith; it was dead faith (Jas 2.14–26). In a polemic with the Pharisees it was necessary for Paul to stress the absolute gratuity of the first moment of transition from sin to grace whereby the justice of men was established; but in the polemic of James, possibly with negligent Christians, it was necessary to talk rather of the daily commitment that flowed organically from the gift of faith. The same teaching appears in Jn 1.17, where Christ brings into this world for mankind the power of abiding covenant fidelity, which then overflows for mankind in love (1 Jn 2.29; 3.16–18; 4.7–11).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1254–55. A. DESCAMPS and L. CERFAUX, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:1417–1510. W. KORNFELD and H. VORGRIMLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:711–713. A. DESCAMPS, Les Justes et la justice dans les évangiles et le christianisme primitif hormis la doctrine proprement paulinienne (Louvain 1950).

[D. M. CROSSAN]

In Dogmatic Theology. Justice of men may be understood either as the moral virtue that regulates man's actions regarding other people and by which he renders each one his due (justice considered as a cardinal virtue or as a special virtue; see JUSTICE), or in a broader sense as designating rectitude in man himself, in his inner disposition, his higher powers being submissive to God and his lower powers to the higher in such a manner that he finds himself in right order with regard to God, to his neighbor, and to himself (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 113.1; De ver. 28.1). In a word, it is the state of man in which he is what he should be. It is in this sense, closely akin to the biblical concept of the just man and identical with the meaning of the term in the phrase ORIGINAL JUSTICE, that justice is considered here.

Gift of God. This justice of men is a gift of God's GRACE and the fruit of justification. Of himself man is unable to be what he should be. St. Augustine and the anti-Pelagian councils inspired by him, when they were confronted by the naturalism of Pelagius, asserted the doctrine that only God's grace in Christ makes men just (see H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 225–227). The Council of Trent in its decree on justification restated and developed the doctrine. Neither the Law nor nature, it said, can bestow justice, but only the grace of God through Christ, man's redeemer (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1521–25). Hence "the justice that is said to be ours because it inheres in us and justifies us is likewise God's justice because He gave it to us through the merit of Christ" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1547; cf. 1529).

This justice is an objective reality in man (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1529), different for different persons (ibid.), susceptible to growth and meant to grow by GOOD WORKS in keeping the Commandments (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1535). It is the contrary of the state of sin or of injustice (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1528): "Every sin, insofar as it entails insubordination of reason to God, may be called injustice contrary to . . . justice" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 113.1 ad 1). Accordingly, only those who live in the state of grace are just; they only are what they should be according to the will of God. This supernaturalism excludes every form of naturalism, past or present.

This doctrine rests on a double basis. First, without this divine gift of justice, all men are sinners, having either ORIGINAL SIN or personal SIN or both. Historically this is the more explicit reason for the doctrine of St. Augustine and the councils of his time; it is also the explicit teaching of Trent, which allows no middle state between sin and justice (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1528, 1524). A second and more basic reason is that in the present world economy all men are called to the supernatural DESTINY that no one can attain without grace; and so no one is just in God's eyes unless he lives in grace. The justice or righteousness of those who are not in grace is but justice in a relative sense, secundum quid. But it is a doctrinal deviation repudiated by the Church to say "that the 'justice' of infidels is injustice or sin' (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1925). Only Christian justice is justice in the full sense of the term, simpliciter. St. Augustine did not say more when he spoke of the good works and virtues of infidels as sins and vices because they are without faith and grace: their justice is only apparent, not real; it does not effectively help them toward SALVATION.

The justice of men, justice of Christians, applies to "being" before it applies to "doing." It is not merely a matter of keeping the law; the Church condemned the legalistic concept of justice proposed by Baius (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1942, 1969–70; see BAIUS

AND BAIANISM); keeping the Commandments is only a sequel to the state of justice. But objective justice of its nature requires just works, or subjective justice. On being follows doing. In terms of Christian grace, INCORPORATION IN CHRIST postulates imitation of Christ.

Imperfection of Man's Justice. This justice, however, in the redemptive economy of grace is incomplete and imperfect. It never reaches the level of perfection that it had in the state of original justice. First of all, vigilance and struggle are required to persevere in justice; no one can be victorious in the struggle with the flesh, the world, and the devil without the help of grace (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1541). Even with the help of grace, man is not able to avoid every venial sin-not without a special privilege such as was given to the Blessed Virgin (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1573). Furthermore, from the existence in the just of CONCUPISCENCE common theological doctrine concludes that without the help of actual grace man is unable to keep the natural law for long and to avoid every mortal sin. Man's justice does not take away his congenital debility. Awareness of this is a constant reminder to man that his justice is not the fruit of his own effort only but a gift of God.

Current theology of grace expresses the traditional doctrine of men's justice by saying that justice is one of the formal effects of sanctifying grace. This means that they, and only they, who live in the state of grace are what they should be according to the will of God. In fact, only they who share in Christ's grace are on the way to salvation and effectively living in the right order established by God, namely, the SUPERNATURAL ORDER.

See Also: ELEVATION OF MAN; GRACE, ARTICLES ON; MAN; PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM; SALUTARY ACTS: SUPERNATURAL.

Bibliography: R. LEMONNYER and J. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–05) 8:2:2042–2227. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Tables générales (1951–) 1:1844–68. J. HASPECKER et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:977–1000. R. SCHNACKENBURG et al., ibid. 8:1033–50. J. WANG TCH'ANGTCHE, Saint Augustin et les vertus des païens (Paris 1938).

[P. DE LETTER]

JUSTIFICATION

The doctrine of God's justification of the sinner is treated under five headings: 1. In the Scriptures, 2. In Classical Theology, 3. In the Sixteenth Century, 4. From Trent to Vatican II. 5. After Vatican II.

Council of Trent, painting by Hermanos Zuccarelli, c. 1560-1566. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

IN THE SCRIPTURES

In the Old Testament. The word for justification has a juridical and forensic connotation. The verb sādaq means "to be just" or "to be not guilty" in the juridical sense. The causative form hisdiq means "to justify," and this usually intends the obtaining of justice for one unjustly accused, justification as vindication. This justification whereby the accused is declared innocent before the tribunal is supposed to conform to reality as far as the judge can decide. In Dt 25.1, for example, two men litigate before the law and "a decision is handed down to them acquitting the innocent party and condemning the guilty party." It is strictly enjoined, however, "The innocent and the just you shall not put to death, nor shall you acquit [justify] the guilty" (Ex 23.7). Quite often the main value of this external juridical justification is seen as a vindication of interior innocence before God, and it is God who has requited this innocence by the judge's decree [Ps 25 (26).1; 34 (35). 23-24] In the Septuagint (LXX) δικαιόω is used for hiṣdîq of the Hebrew OT, and the meaning changes slightly. The emphasis of the Hebrew word was rather negative or, better, liberative in that it denoted the juridical declaration of forensic, though presumably factual, innocence; but the Greek term meant "to give justice," either of acquittal for the innocent or of condemnation for the guilty.

The use of hiṣdîq in Is 53.11 deserves special attention: "Through his suffering, my Servant shall justify many, and their guilt he shall bear." This is explained in the next verse: "And he shall take away the sins of many, and win pardon for their offenses." The Servant is not merely a judge who declares "the many" juridically acquitted before a human tribunal. By his suffering he obtains pardon and remission of their sins before God; and so he "justifies" them in reality. Otherwise the justification would be a declaration of innocence without foundation in fact, which is always a heinous crime in the OT. This is a unique use of hiṣdîq, for the general OT usage reserves the term for the actually innocent; here it is used for the action whereby sinners are rendered innocent by pardon. The Servant alone can do this, since God accepts his atonement as having redemptive and justifying value. There is a similar case in Dn 12.3: "But the wise shall shine brightly like the splendor of the firmament, and those who lead the many to justice shall be like the stars forever." Here the wise men have taught sinners how to live justly before God and so have brought them to forgiveness of their sins in God's sight, that is, to justification.

The recovered Hebrew text of Sir 42.1–2 is to be translated as: "But of these things be not ashamed lest you sin through human respect of the law of the Most High and his precepts or of the judgment, so as to justify him who is guilty." The Greek δικαιῶσαι τὸν ἀσεβῆ, might be taken, in the neutrality of the Greek δικαιόω ("acquit" or "condemn"), as meaning, "to condemn the wicked." But the Hebrew l^e haṣdîq rāšā means that one must not fear man so as to justify an evil man by acquittal. Thus, in the OT it is always wrong "to justify" (hiṣdîq) the guilty, to declare them innocent, unless they have become just before God. Only God can do this. Any declaration of justification that does not conform to inner reality is sinful and must never be done by a human judge, as of course it is never done by the divine Judge.

In Jesus Christ's Teaching. As it is reported in the NT, the early preaching of Jesus, especially to the group of the disciples, stressed the difference between the δικαιοσύνη (justification) of the Pharisees and that which the disciples were to have. In Matthew ch. 5-7 the theme of the initial section, immediately after the exordium of the Beatitudes, is conveyed in the words, "unless your justice exceeds that of the Scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter the kingdom of heaven" (5.20). Justice has a wide sense in this context and is almost equivalent to holiness. It is not restricted to the precise passage from sin to holiness; it rather denotes a mode of life in union with God. There follow five examples from the Mosaic Law, and Jesus's interpretation is contrasted with the customary one on murder (5.21-26), adultery (5.27–28), oaths (5.33–37), revenge (5.38–42), and love (5.43–48). The justice that will belong to the approaching kingdom must be spiritual, interior, and based on God's forgiving love.

The second section follows the same pattern. The theme appears in Mt 6.1: "Take heed not to do your good [δικαιοσύνη] before men, in order to be seen by them; otherwise you shall have no reward with your Father in heaven." This is developed with regard to three basic works of piety, alms (6.2–4), prayer (6.5–6), and fasting (6.16–18). Rather than the idea of justification (6.2, 5, 16) or holiness that the Pharisees are said to demand, Jesus requires an interior bond between the believer and God, not an external manifestation that others would see. In this context the term "justice" is used in a wide sense that does not evoke a juridical statement of innocence but a life of innocence or holiness that is led before God. No doubt the declarative idea is still present, for one should presume that God pronounces the innocent holy and guiltless before the divine tribunal.

The same theme appears more clearly in Lk 16.15: "You are they who declare themselves just [oi δικαιοῦντες ἑαυτούς] in the sight of men, but God knows your hearts." In Luke 18 the Pharisee proclaims himself innocent before the divine tribunal: "O God, I thank you that I am not like the rest of men' (18.11), while the publican simply prays: "O God, be merciful to me a sinner!" (18.13). But the publican "went down to his home justified rather than the other" (18.14). This parable throws light on the statement of Jesus: "I have come not to call the just, but sinners" (Mk 2.17b; Mt 9.13b). It is not for those who consider themselves justified, but for those who need justification that Jesus has come. Already in the life and preaching of Jesus there was a clash with the Pharisees on justification, at least on the practical rather than the theoretical level. In a similar polemical situation, St. Paul will explore the implications of this teaching more theoretically.

The Doctrine of Paul. In order to understand the Pauline understanding of justification it is necessary to appreciate the anti-Pharisaic polemic within which it was forged and to take careful note of the precise meaning that the term came to have in the controversy.

Originally the law of Moses had been given to Israel in the framework of a covenantal relationship with Adonai, their God. Suzerainty treaties in the Near East of Mosaic times formulated the obligations of vassal states to their imperial overlord in terms of a reciprocal bond created by some anterior action of the latter upon them. Such a format was used for the Ten Commandments and thence for all the cases that flew logically from them. This meant that Adonai proclaimed a covenant with the Israelites, who then were given a new being, that of "my people," based on a mutual commitment between them and God. The divine law was seen as a formulation and specification of Israel's being as the people of God (Ex 19.1-6; Lv 19.2).

In Pharisaic thought, however, the covenant basis came to be obscured by an expanding system of laws and prescriptions. As a result the mass of Mosaic legislation took on the appearance of a burden, an obligation forced upon the people from outside. The faithful, exact, and minute fulfillment of these many prescriptions tended to become the basis for union with God, the cause rather than the effect of relationship with Adonai. Instead of fidelity to obligation being a result of God's grasping the existence of Israel, fidelity appeared to be the cause of Israel's grasping of God, the means becoming the end, and the effect the cause.

In order to combat the delusion that one can be just and holy by exact fulfillment of Torah, Paul drew attention to the precise moment when one passes from the state of sin to that of holiness before God. He understood the Pharisees' teaching from within since be had been formally trained in their schools. In Phil 3.6 he states: "as regards the justice of the Law, I was blameless." That is, in light of the Pharisaic norm that justification arises from a flawless fulfillment of all the law's requirements, he was perfect. In such a perspective we really accomplish our own justification, if at least God has given us the necessary legal precepts. Paul repeatedly refers to this as justification "in" or "from" or "by" the Law and/or its works (Gal 2.21; Rom 3.20; 8.3: 10.5; 11.31). Since, however, Paul's thought developed under the influence of his growing theological acumen in the vicissitudes of his apostolic mission, his ideas can be followed in chronological sequence.

Decision at Jerusalem. Peter had baptized the centurion Cornelius, who had not accepted the obligations of Torah. He had done so at the command of the Holy Spirit (Acts 10.1–11.18). On his first missionary journey, Paul also made many Gentile converts (Acts 13.12, 48). The question of the value of the Mosaic Law for Christians was then inevitably raised. There were converted Pharisees who regarded circumcision and the whole Torah as necessary to Christian life (Acts 15.1, 5). The conclusion reached at Jerusalem, however, was that the Gentiles could not be bound by the Mosaic Law as necessary to salvation because salvation comes through Christ alone (Acts 15.6–12; Gal 2.1–16).

Controversy at Antioch. The decree of Acts 15.13–29 may have been sent by James to ANTIOCH at some later date than the first decision in Acts 15.1–12, since Paul behaved in his churches as if it did not exist (1 Cor 5.1–8; 8.1–13). It may have been a special concession to the churches of Syria, intended to enable Jews and Gentiles to live and eat together, and to intermarry. In any case it seems to have provided the occasion of the disagreement between Paul and Peter at Antioch (Gal 2.11–21). Paul used the incident to give a clear formulation of his position: "We know that one is not justified by the works of the Law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ. Hence we also believe in Christ Jesus, that we may be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the Law, because by the works of the Law no one will be justified" (Gal 2.16). Justification cannot be at the same time by the works of the Law and by faith in Christ. Paul argues that Peter has already committed himself to the latter belief, in keeping with Acts 10–11 and 15, and his action in Antioch belies it. By faith in Christ the believers receive a new existence, a new life, and it is in virtue of this new being that they should act (Gal 2.20–21). The statement in Galatians may have been more clearly expressed at the time of its recall than in its first formulation, but already in Antioch Paul realized that justification by the works of the Law is radically opposed to justification by immersion in the dying and rising of Christ.

Galatians and Romans. The controversy over justification reaches a climax in these Epistles. Although the date of Galatians is disputed, the closeness of its theme and language to those of Romans makes it likely that both were written in the same period toward the end of Paul's third missionary journey. Galatians was composed to offset the action of some Judaeo-Christians who came to the churches of Galatia and argued for the continuing value of the Mosaic Law and accordingly of justification through the works of the Law (Gal 3.1–6). It is plausible that the problems that had come to a head in Galatia and that Paul had dealt with vehemently and rather personally led him to bring attention to the question in a formal letter. Romans was then composed to explain the conclusions he had reached and to present them to the intended sphere of his future activity (Rom 15.22-33). In this explanation the controversy moved to a deeper level as Paul argued that there was, is, and can be only one way of justification, the gratuitous gift of divine forgiveness offered in Christ and received in faith and baptism. The works of the Law never effected justification, which is always by faith in the promises of God, whether these concern the Messiah to come or the One who has come. The way of justification in Christ is firmly rooted in the OT, which, Paul argues, his opponents—Judaeo-Christians who bring justification by works of the Law into the communities led by Paul-have not understood, any more than they have understood the teaching of Christ. Sharpened by this controversy, Paul's thought has turned to the first moment when the sinner is made just. Is this moment brought about by the works of the unjustified in obedience to Torah? or by an act of faith, the humble acceptance of the gratuitous gift of divine mercy, forgiveness, and life? Paul's demonstration hinges on three antitheses.

(1) Adam and Christ. The basic antithesis does not appear in the more pointed polemic of Galatians, but in the fuller exposition of Romans. Scripture and human experience show that before the coming of Christ both pagans (Rom 1.18–32) and Jews (2.1–3, 20) were sinners before God; the entire world lacked and longed for justification. It is only from the "justice of God" (3.21, 22, 25, 26a), that is, from God's fidelity to the covenantal promise of salvific deliverance, that the believer is justified. The key phrase is in 3.26b: "so that [God] might be just [δίκαιον] and justifying [δικαιοῦντα] the one who believes in Christ." Justification precedes any consideration of how the justified live out their life and salvation, united with the risen Lord, in anticipation of their bodily resurrection. This justification is based exclusively on God's fidelity to the promises; it is purely gratuitous and cannot be gained by human works. Though foretold in the OT it cannot be obtained by the works of the Law or by any works (3.21-22). Received in faith, it is no mere intellectual assent to a set of propositions, but a commitment of one's entire being to the centrality of the death and resurrection of Christ in God's salvific plan (3.23-24). Only by such an act of faith related to baptism (see Gal 3.26-29; Rom 6.3-5; Col 2.12 and cf. Gal 2.16-20 with Rom 6.3-9) is one brought from sin to justice and holiness.

In order to offset the view of justice obtained through the works of the Law, Paul used the term "justification" to denote precisely the transition from sinner to saint. Adam's sin brought sin into the world for all his descendants, who then compounded it by their personal sins. Reversely, Christ brought justice. Having received it in baptismal faith, the justified believers now live a life that is not their own but that of the risen Lord. With Adam as with Christ, Paul does not envisage only the moment of fall or of justification, but also the entire realm and life of sin or salvation that ensue from that moment (Rom 5.1–21). Both justification and salvation are purely gratuitous gifts, the former by faith alone, the latter as the believer's entire life lived in the risen Lord. It is the worksin-Christ of the justified that concern Paul in the second section of almost all his letters. The Adam-Christ parallel is also developed in 1 Cor 15.45-49 (earlier than Romans) and in Eph 4.22-24. The antithesis makes it clear that the gift of justification is the beginning of the life of salvation, the climax of which will be bodily resurrection in Christ (Phil 2.6-11; 3.20-21).

(2) Abraham and Christ. In Gal 3.6–18, 29; 4.21–31 and Rom 4.1–25; 9.6–9, Paul uses the example of Abraham to show that the only justification ever offered, even in the OT, was by faith, whether in the Christ to come or in the Christ who has come. There never was a way of justification by legal works. The core of the argument is the citation of Gn 15.6 in Gal 3.6 and Rom 4.3: "Abraham believed the Lord, who credited the act to him as justice [εἰς δικαιοσύνην]." The primary transition, the moment of justification (of the aorist ἑλογίσθη in Gn 15.6 with the aorist δικαιωθέντες in Rom 5.1 that denotes the instant of baptismal faith), was not achieved by works of the Law, for the Law was not given until much later (Gal 3.15–18), or indeed by any one of Abraham's works (Rom 4.1–5). Abraham was justified by God's gratuitous promise, which he only had to believe.

According to Paul, Abraham's example was already seen in the OT as the model for all future justification. In Gal 3.8 Paul cites Gn 12.3; 18.18 in the LXX version ("In you shall all the nations of the earth be blessed") rather than in the original Hebrew ("In you shall all the nations of the earth invoke blessings on one another," that is, by saying, "May you be as blessed as Abraham"). The citation is seen as a prophecy that eventually the Gentiles will receive the blessing of justification after the manner of Abraham, by faith-acceptance. This line of thought is further developed in Rom 4.18-22. Abraham believed the angel's prophecy that new life would come from his and Sara's old bodies; and Christians believe that just as God brought Jesus from the dead to glorified life, so they will themselves be raised from death in sin to life in grace. A second point emerges in Rom 4.9-12. Abraham received the promise and was justified by faith before submitting to ritual circumcision. He was therefore justified while in uncircumcision, as in Gn 17. (This tradition of the Pentateuchal priestly writers is more recent than the Yahwist tradition of Gn 15 that relates to the same event). Here again Abraham's case shows that the Gentiles can be justified in uncircumcision, without the works of the Law. In summary, the OT itself knows only of justification by faith, the acceptance of God's free gift. And this is what God promised to extend to all humankind through a unique descendant of Abraham (Gal 3.15-18).

(3) Moses and Christ. In Gal 3.19-29 and more fully in Rom 4.13-16; 7.1-23 Paul examines the relationship of the Mosaic Law and its works to justification by faith. Torah was originally given by God as part of a covenant framework, and its precepts were the specification and objective statement of the relation between "your God" and "my people," by virtue of which those who had been freed from EGYPT by the divine will were made God's own people. However, the Mosaic Law that Paul knew, however divine, holy, and sacred, was not the divine gift that had fed the prophetic zeal. Shorn of its covenantal basis, the Law had turned into an intolerable burden imposed on human liberty from without, by external pressure and compulsion. The Law of God, so conceived and practiced, strengthens Paul's thesis. Far from producing justification, which it could never do in any case, the Mosaic Law, as Paul knew it and as much of Israel's past could show, had occasioned a disobedience that imprisoned Israel under the wrath of God. Now, however, the way of escape was opened. In the gift of God in Christ Jesus, the disciples receive in baptismal faith a justification that brings them to a new being in union with the risen Lord (Col 1–4). And such "justification into life" (δικαίωσιν ζωῆς, Rom 5.18) gives the justified a continuing holiness in union with the Lord (Rom 8).

The Epistle of James. At first glance the teaching of the Epistle of James seems diametrically opposed to the view of justification that is explained in Galatians and Romans. Paul states, "But we know that man is not justified [δικαιοῦται] by the works of the Law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ" (Gal 2.16), and again, "For we reckon that one is justified by faith independently of the works of the Law" (Rom 3.28). James, however, says: "You see that by works one is justified [δικαιοῦται], and not by faith only" (Jas 2.24). While the vocabulary is exactly the same—"justified," "works," "faith"—the statements seem to be clear contradictions. Even the OT example used by Paul to support his thesis of justification by faith alone is adduced by James to show that justification is by faith and works. Paul had cited Abraham as witness, using Gn 15.6 in both Gal 3.6 and Rom 4.3. In Jas 2.21-23, however, the author takes the same Gn 15.6 as a prelude to Gn 22, so that Abraham's faith in the promised posterity is "made perfect" by his obedient willingness to sacrifice Isaac, in whose descendants the promises should come to fulfillment. Actually, however, the very argument from Abraham clarifies the quite different meanings that Paul and James give to the same vocabulary.

The teaching of Paul may at times have been deliberately abused as an excuse for license rather than as a mandate for the liberty of the children of God. His teaching on the Parousia (see 2 Pt 3.16), and, more to the point, his teaching on justification seems to have led some to conclude that life after justification could be lived in any manner whatever. In 1 Cor 6.12, "all things are permissible" reads like the slogan of such an attitude, taken up by Paul in order to reject it. In Rom 3.8 and 6.1, Paul speaks of those who calumniate his teaching in such a manner. James may well be writing specifically against people who were using Paul's oral catechesis as an excuse for sin or indifference. Freed from the Mosaic Law, justified by baptismal faith, they no longer recognized any obligations. Paul, however, taught that the justified must live a life consonant with union with the risen Lord.

James, in this perspective, is not talking of the "works of the Law," an expression the Epistle never uses. Instead he insists on the works one must do after baptismal justification lest justification become a lie. Justification then designates the entire life rather than merely the initial moment when one has received the gift of divine life. James is interested in the works of the justified Christian, like charity (Jas 2.14–17), and he makes exactly the same point as 1 Jn 3.16–18: "Let us not love in word, neither with the tongue, but in deed and truth." This was also what Paul intended by "faith which works through charity" (Gal 5.6).

There is thus no fundamental contradiction between Paul and James. Were it not for their use of the same vocabulary in differing senses the question might never have arisen. When James says, "Of his own will he has begotten us by the word of truth, that we might be, as it were, the first-fruits of his creatures" (Jas 1.18) his teaching converges with that of Paul. When both are read in conjunction against the OT background of the term "justification" the Biblical doctrine appears in its fullness. No human forensic tribunal can justify a person who is guilty before it, for this would be a perversion of justice. The presumption is always that a tribunal justifies a person falsely accused, who is thus proclaimed not guilty (OT). But even the OT knows that things are quite different with God, who is able to "justify" the guilty when the divine sentence forgives their sins. Such a divine action brings about an inner change in being for the person concerned, or else the Judge of all the world would have acted unjustly (cf. Is 53.4-12).

Paul works in a situation of anti-Pharisaic polemic. He argues that the justification whereby God declares a sinner holy is not effected by human fidelity to the prescriptions of Torah. The sinner is justified only by the gratuitous gift of divine forgiveness. On the one hand, Paul stresses quite forcefully that thereafter the justified person lives a life of love in the risen Lord. Justification and salvation are free divine gifts, as are life and holiness. The moment of justification is by faith alone, and the life in Christ that follows is by faith that works through Christ's charity. On the other hand, James is in a different polemical situation as, most likely, he argues against a libertarian interpretation of Paul's teachings. Faith is not a dead act of mere lip service. It must be lived out as Christian, otherwise of course it was not there from the beginning, and there was merely an exterior semblance of it.

Bibliography: G. KLEIN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 6 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–63) 5: 825–828. A. DESCAMPS and L. CERFAUX, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed., ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris) 4:1417–1510. B. R. LEMONYER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2043–77. G. E. MENDENHALL, Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East (Pittsburgh 1955). S. DUPONT, Les Béatitudes. 1. Le problème littéraire: Les deux versions du Sermon sur la montagne et les Béatitudes (Louvain 1958). H. KÜNG, Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, tr. T. COLLINS et al. (New York 1964). J. REUMANN, Righteousness in the New Testament, with Responses by Joseph A. Fitzmyer and Jerome D. Quinn (Philadelphia 1982).

[D. M. CROSSAN/G. H. TAVARD]

IN CLASSICAL THEOLOGY

In the present context "classical theology" designates the theology of the patristic and medieval periods, chiefly in the West, with the understanding that the Eastern and Oriental Churches went through a distinct development while the Western Church struggled with the implications of the theology of St. AUGUSTINE. Briefly, justification is understood to be a gift from God, conveyed in faith and baptism, by which the faithful are moved from the state of injustice or sinfulness called original sin, eventually compounded by personal sins, to a state of justice or righteousness in God's eyes. While Eastern Christianity did not emphasize justification but drew attention to its fulfillment in sanctification and deification, Western Christianity explored the passage from sin to justice, along with its moral implications for the Christian life. To see the meaning of this doctrine in its proper context one ought (1) to locate it in the Christian message, (2) to sketch its historical development and show the main influences that went into its making, (3) to expound the doctrine of the scholastics and the theological explanation of it, mainly according to the mind and principles of Thomas Aquinas.

Setting of the Doctrine in the Christian Message.

The Christian kerygma is centered on the Good News that salvation is offered in Christ to all human persons. The Word Incarnate became the Redeemer through his life, passion, death, and resurrection, bringing the forgiveness of sins to fallen humanity, and restoring the life of grace which anticipates the glory of heaven. Justification is the application of Christ's redemption to the individual believer.

Accordingly, the doctrine of justification presupposes the revelation of the fall. All men and women, Jesus and Mary excepted, are burdened with an inherited sinfulness when they come into this world. The universal reign of sin, the result of both original and personal sin, makes them incapable of being naturally just in the eyes of the Creator. Human sinfulness entails the forfeiture of the life of grace and a congenital weakness, called concupiscence, in seeking and doing what is right. Since no human person is just by nature and his personal efforts, justification must be God's gift. Christ's overcoming of the Fall opens the way to justification. By his earthly life, passion, death, and resurrection, Jesus took away the sins of the world and restored the original justice lost by the fall. The redemption of humanity, however, still has to be applied to particular persons as their personal redemption through the forgiveness of their sins and the undeserved gift of grace. Justification is the opening of this process. It is inseparable from Jesus Christ the Redeemer and from the Holy Spirit, the Sanctifier.

Christ's redemptive mission continues in and through the Church, which may be understood analogically as the primary sacrament of Christ. The Church fulfills its mission by preaching the gospel, administering the sacraments, whose primary minister is Christ himself, and generally leading the faithful in the way of holiness.

Infants can be saved and receive grace and glory through baptism, without their personal involvement. Morally adult persons, however, are not saved without their consent. Justification requires true conversion, so that adults must freely ask for baptism. When they fall again into personal sin they can be forgiven when, sinful and repentant, they meet again with Christ and God in contrition, normally by way of the sacrament of Reconciliation. In justification Creator and creature, God's grace and the human will, are one. The restoration of the sinner through justification, however, is not completed in this life. The gifts that are constitutive of the life of grace are restored, but not all of those which, like the gift of "integrity," could facilitate and stabilize it. Concupiscence remains. As it restores the life of grace, justification is a beginning. Sanctification, however, is imperfect and always precarious since it can be undone by mortal sin. It is at the same time perfectible, capable of growth in grace. Only at the consummation of redemption at the Second Coming of Christ, in the Parousia at the end of time, will all the lost gifts be restored. The fulfillment of justice and holiness is for the next world, when grace is changed into glory.

Historical Development before St. Augustine. The idea of and even the term "justification" originated with St. Augustine. Later on the medieval scholastics speculated about their meaning and implications.

Before Augustine elements of the doctrine of justification are found primarily in the catechesis and liturgy of Christian initiation, in which baptism is prominent, and secondarily in the penitential discipline. Even before explicit awareness of the fallen state was expressed in the doctrine of original sin in the controversies provoked by Pelagianism early in the fifth century, the beginning of Christian life through the sacraments of initiation was commonly seen under the two aspects of forgiveness of sin and participation in the life of Christ.

The Greek Fathers emphasized the second aspect as they explained θειοποίησις, deification, but they were aware that baptism remits sin. The Latins, without overlooking the new life in Christ which begins in Baptism, focused attention on the forgiveness of sin. While the Greeks spoke of the indwelling Spirit, or the Logos of God, or the Holy Trinity as the source of divinization, more than of the transformation that the indwelling brings about, the Latins did the reverse. They paid more attention to the human transformation than to the divine indwelling, to the effect than to the cause. They concentrated on the state following baptism, as contrasted with the state that preceded it, more than on the mode of passage from sin to faith and justice.

As the early Fathers of the Church understood it, the human condition steers a middle course between the Manichean view of matter and flesh as evil, and the Stoics' belief that there is by nature a spark of the divine in all human persons. Even though sin is now forgiven, sharing in the divine nature is not a natural datum but a pure gift of God.

Augustine and Pelagianism. The occasion for the bishop of Hippo to formulate the doctrine of justification came in his reaction to Pelagius's denial of the absolute need of the grace of Christ to be good and to do the right thing. Pelagius, a fashionable spiritual director in the city of Rome, taught that the soul is so endowed with free will that it is perfectly able to do what is good by itself. The asceticism he promoted denied fundamental sin and the absolute need for grace. His followers blamed the influence of Manicheeism for the doctrine of original sin. Each person, they maintained, is good and able to persevere in justice thanks to a good use of God's gifts through the free will.

Against this overt naturalism Augustine reaffirmed the absolute need of Christ's grace for redemption. Humans are born in sin and cannot be just unless they are justified by the grace of Christ. Justification is not only the forgiveness of sin. It is also a shield against future sin. Yet justifying grace does not remove all the consequences of the fall of Adam. Concupiscence remains after baptism, if no longer as guilt, at least as a tendency to exclusive self-love: transit reatu remanet actu. Justification requires a human consent that is itself enabled by God's grace. No human person left to the resources of nature can do anything that is not affected by inordinate selflove, which inevitably vitiates all thoughts and actions. Even those that seem to be virtuous need to be purified by healing grace. This sort of working with God may be summed up as having a living faith, the sort of faith that inspires hope and charity, all of which is God's gift.

In Augustine's mind, as in that of his contemporaries, justifying grace is grace taken as a whole, without the later distinctions between actual and habitual grace. The reason for its necessity derives primarily from the fallen state of humankind. Grace has both a healing and an elevating function that Augustine, like the Greeks, also spoke of as divinization, though this aspect of grace was hardly prominent in the course of the anti-Pelagian polemics. At the time, the distinction between the natural and the supernatural was not explicit, so that Augustine envisaged the human condition as it is, in its actual existence. When he affirmed human working with grace he was satisfied that grace restores the will to the perfection it had before sin, and he made no attempt to show how grace and free will can share a common action. Lastly, keeping the grain of truth contained in Manicheeism, Augustine was not blind to the disorder of concupiscence that remains after baptism. This Augustinian teaching on justification in facto esse rather than in fieri, in its achieved reality rather than in its becoming, was the first systematic Western formulation of the Christian condition after baptism. It was to have a far-reaching influence on later Latin theology.

The most important element in the doctrine, decisive for all further development, is that righteousness is God's gift. It is a sharing in the justice of God, justice and mercy being one when God saves those who deserve to be condemned. The gratuity of salvation is central. All initiative in the process of justification comes from God alone. When, as in the writings of the monk John Cassian, remnants of Pelagianism, later called Semi-Pelagianism, suggested that at times God's grace awaits a sinner's positive gesture toward justification, Augustine objected that the beginning of faith, including the very assent of the mind to the message of salvation, is, no less than any subsequent growth and maintenance or perseverance of justification, totally God's gift and grace.

Augustine's influence in the West was decisive in shaping its doctrine on justification, with its negative stress on the remission of sin, its positive stress on the total gratuity of God's gift, and also, echoing Augustine's view of the consequences of the Fall, on the precariousness of human holiness. It should be noted, however, that decrees of Council II of Orange (529) against the Semi-Pelagians were mostly unknown to medieval theologians between the ninth century, when Archbishop Hincmar of Rheims quoted them in the predestinarian controversy against Gottschalk, and the sixteenth century, when they were incorporated in the canonical collection of Peter Crabbe in 1538. St. Thomas himself did not know this council, even when in his later works he distinguished between the position of Pelagius and that of his followers.

In any case the influence of Augustine has been considerably less in the Christian East than in the West. The Greek Fathers after Augustine remained reluctant to call sin a state that is independent of the personal will, and they continued to stress the doctrine of divinization.

Scholastic Theology. The transition from the patristic to the scholastic theology of justification took from the eighth to the twelfth century. It brought about the predominance of a very different mentality in the formulation of doctrine. The Fathers' pastoral and practical approach made way for a speculative and academic one. The main problem before the schools related to the connection between the negative and the positive sides of justification, between the forgiveness of sin and the infusion of grace. Is this connection merely factual, known from revelation and tradition? Or is it necessary in the first place? Investigation of this problem led the scholastics to study not merely the state of justification in contrast with the state of sin, but also the very process that leads from the one to the other. This study was facilitated by the use of Aristotelian philosophy and the gradual elaboration of various concepts regarding sin and grace such as act, habit, change, mutation in the light of formal and material causality. The question thus became: How and why does the habitual state or habit of sin give way to the state or the habit of grace?

The several schools that took up the problem were generally marked by either intellectualism or voluntarism. The first is characteristic of the thought of St. THOM-AS AQUINAS. In the realism of his theory of intellectual knowledge, which he regarded as valid even when bearing on supernatural realities, he applied the general metaphysics of mutation to the changeover from sin to grace, which he then identified as the expelling of one form by the infusion of a new one. He thus could see an organic and necessary correlation between remission of sin and infusion of grace and, in another aspect, between God's action and the human response. In this perspective justification involves both the negative and the positive aspects, as well as divine and human actions. It is a complex event that is wrought by God and accepted by the sinner, in which habitual sin is expelled from the soul by the infusion of the new form that is grace. Other questions regarding the degree of grace infused or the persistence of concupiscence Thomas explained in a similar way, not merely in light of God's disposition but also from the point of view of the human reception of grace. This disposition, in his mind, is expressed in the very nature of divine causality: Scientia Dei causa rerum. The theology of justification thus moves to the objective or ontological level. This basic trust in the realism of our intellectual knowledge of supernatural realities sets theology a new task as the fides quaerens intellectum of St. Anselm functions in light of the synthesis of Augustinianism and Aristotelian metaphysics that is St. Thomas's achievement.

The other trend, voluntarism, was favored in the Franciscan School. It was based on Bonaventure's determination that Goodness (bonum) rather than Being (esse) is the primary name of God. The forgiveness of sin and the infusion of grace are connected by the will, that is, the goodness of God. Yet they are not identical and they need not coincide. As John Duns Scotus reflected that the connection is not due to the contradiction between sin and grace, but simply to God's will, he identified grace and charity, which must be one when given to the sinner as they are one in God. Habitual sin was then seen as an orientation to punishment (ordinatio ad poenam), and grace as a sanctifying power that is given when the sinner is accepted by God (acceptatio Dei). Consequently, the organic structure of justification appeared in another light than in the theology of Thomas Aquinas. Since God's will is the cause of all that is (voluntas Dei causa rerum), it is also the sole reason for the correlation of the remission of sin and the infusion of grace.

WILLIAM OF OCKHAM took one further step. He not only saw God's decree as the only reason for the connection between the negative and the positive aspects of justification. Because he denied the capacity of the human intellect to know reality as it is, he attributed a merely nominal value to concepts, including the theological notions of justice and justification. He then logically concluded that God could have decreed otherwise. By absolute divine power (de potentia absoluta) grace could have been given without sins being forgiven, although it is not so given in the actual order of creation and redemption (de potentia ordinata). The distinction of these two divine powers and the ensuing orders became a fundamental principle of nominalist theology.

Such a voluntarism was not compatible with the organic concept of justification that Thomas Aquinas had elaborated or with the realism of the Thomist conception of grace. If human concepts cannot be relied upon to express supernatural realities truly, though imperfectly, God's will, which is the reason why things are what they are, can be known only by revelation. In this case the human intellect cannot be trusted to know the truth, a situation that brought about a gradual shift of attention from ontology to psychology in theological circles. The basic question became, not "what is reality?" but, "what do we think of it?" The data of tradition, in this perspective, needs to be supported by the evidence of experience. Thus the nominalist theology of justification and grace opened the way to the notion that justification of the sinner is a purely forensic act of God, decreed indeed by the divine will, yet totally external to the person. In this case one could logically entertain the thought that God not only could, but would proclaim the sinner just without necessarily abolishing the sin. This became in the sixteenth century one of the basic problems of the Reformation.

IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

The Reformers. The Protestant theology of justification has a twofold origin in the life and teaching of Martin LUTHER (ca.1483–1546). Negatively, it derives from his experience of sinfulness and of the ineffectiveness of the ascetical practices in his life as an Augustinian friar. Positively, it is the fruit of his discovery that the justice of God to which St. Paul refers is not a sentence of condemnation, but the merciful justice by which God forgives and declares the sinner just. Faith in Christ, and not the works of the law or anyone's personal works, justifies from sin. The main points of doctrine in the Lutheran theology of justification corresponded to Luther's personal experience. Human efforts, words, and works are of no avail. Only the grace of God made known through Christ justifies and saves. Christ covers the sinner with his own justice, which is then imputed to the sinner. Since justification comes entirely from God and not from anything that is human, one may say that the justified sinner remains fundamentally sinful, even when, as they should, the believers do follow Christ in performing works of holiness. These works are the fruit of divine grace and have no merit of their own.

When Luther turned to the medieval doctrine of justification in the form that nominalism had given it, he simply had to repudiate what was belied by his experience and by his understanding of the Pauline teaching. Neither good works nor merits are the way to justification. It is an illusion to think that the human person is able freely to cooperate with God at any moment of the process of salvation. Luther did not repudiate medieval theology as a whole. He even found conceptions that were germane to his own in the writings of the Rhineland mystics, notably Johannes Tauler and the anonymous author of the book to which he gave the title Theologia deutsch. From the standpoint of ecclesiology, justification, because it is the key to salvation, is the article where the Church stands and falls (articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae). From the standpoint of morality and the proper Christian behavior, it does not change what sinners remain in themselves because of the resilience of concupiscence after forgiveness. The sinner is nonetheless seen by God as just, because included by faith in the very justice of Christ, thus being at the same time just and sinful (simul justus et peccator). From the standpoint of methodology, justification is the principle of discernment between truly Christian and Pelagian or Semi-Pelagian systems of salvation.

This basic understanding of justification was incorporated by Melanchthon in article four of the Confession of Augsburg (1531): "Men cannot be justified before God by their own strength, merits, or works, but are freely justified for Christ's sake through faith." In keeping with this the Formula of Concord in 1581 declared: "Nevertheless they [the faithful] through faith on account of the obedience of Christ . . . are pronounced good and just and reputed as such, even though by reason of their corrupt nature they are sinners to this point and so remain as long as they bear this mortal body" (Solida Declaratio, 3.16; Die Bekenntnisschriften der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche 921).

When John CALVIN composed his Institutio christianae religionis (five editions, each longer than the previous one, from 1536 to 1559), he systematized the Lutheran doctrine of justification in his own original way. While he tied together justification and election, he also balanced the power of grace with the necessity of good works in proof of justification. However, the central doctrine of his systematic theology is, rather than justification, the interior testimony of the Spirit who assists the faithful when they read the Scriptures. In addition, the doctrine of justification was increasingly absorbed in Calvin's conviction that all humans, when they are created, are destined to heaven or to hell by a divine decree (double predestination), which is nonetheless just for being antecedent to their creation.

Similar doctrines of justification had also been formulated, in partial dependence on Luther, by Ulrich Zwingli in Zurich and Martin Bucer in Strasbourg. Heinrich Bullinger, Zwingli's successor in Zurich, endorsed Calvinist formulations in the Second Helvetic Confession (1566). The doctrines that were passed on to most of the later Reformed Churches, however, had been hardened by the Synod of Dort (1617–1618), where the dominant accent was placed on predestination and the invincibility of grace.

The Council of Trent. The Council of TRENT, called to respond to the Protestant Reformation, formulated the Catholic doctrine of justification at its sixth session (1547). The decree De justificatione impii (DS 1520–83) is in two parts. The first part explains the doctrine in 16 chapters. Thirty-three canons condemn various doctrines that may or may not have been taught as such by the Reformers, not one of whom is named in the conciliar texts.

The Tridentine decree set the problem of justification in a broad Trinitarian and sacramental context, even as it made use of Aristotelian categories of causality. It identified the final cause of justification as the glory of God and of Christ, and the life eternal to be given to the justified. The efficient cause is God's gracious mercy. The meritorious cause is Our Lord Jesus Christ, who redeemed the faithful through the passion and the cross. The instrumental cause is baptism, the sacrament of faith, received in fact or in desire (DS 1529; cf. DS 1524), along with the sacrament of penance, also received in fact or in desire for the recovery of grace lost by postbaptismal personal sin (DS 1542; decree De sacramento paenitentiae, session XIV, 1551, DS 1677). The formal cause is the justice of God by which he makes us just (DS 1529). The Trinitarian aspect of justification is thus indicated, though not explained at length. The Father, the Word of God, and the Holy Spirit have a role in it (DS 1525–30). Justification creates a new relation or union with God the Father, with Christ, and with the Holy Spirit. This is called God's indwelling in the soul.

The decree on justification essentially sums up and reformulates the doctrine of the preceding centuries, particularly that of the councils of Carthage against Pelagianism and of Orange against Semi-Pelagianism. Nothing substantial has in fact been added to the Church's teaching since Trent, except for what a better understanding of Martin Luther's teaching made possible after the Second Vatican Council. Justification implies a real remission of sins (DS 1528) and not merely their nonimputation (cf. DS 1561), although concupiscence persists after baptism (cf. DS 1515). It brings about an interior renewal that is the fruit of grace and divine gifts (DS 1528), even if this origin cannot be detected at the psychological level (cf. DS 1533, 1562-65). It implies the sinner's voluntary acceptance of the divine grace and gifts (DS 1528). This assent to God is the fruit of prevenient grace, so that one may truly speak of a preparation for justification (DS 1526).

The immediate context of justification is no other than the universal redemption wrought by Christ, who came to reconcile creation with God, and whose grace when applied to individual believers justifies them in the eyes of God (DS 1521–23). The initiative comes from God's grace and not from human free will, although it does require human assent (DS 1524–27). Along with Semi-Pelagianism this rules out deterministic views for which divine grace would be totally irresistible (DS 1554). That justification "is not only the remission of sins but also a sanctification and an interior renovation by the willing reception of grace and gifts" (DS 1528) implies three dogmatic principles, regarding the remission of sins, sanctification, and the acceptance of grace.

Remission of Sins. For the Council of Trent whatever is truly and properly sin is taken away rather than merely brushed over or not imputed to the guilty (DS 1515). Redemption in Christ entails liberation from sin (DS 1522) when it is applied to the faithful as their justification (DS 1523). This does not mean that concupiscence has disappeared. As was said in the decree of session V on original sin (1546), concupiscence remains after baptism, "to be struggled against, though it has no power over those who do not consent to it and who, by the grace of Jesus Christ, strenuously resist it" (DS 1515). While it is not sin properly so called, it comes from sin and inclines to it. Thus the council affirmed the reality of the remission of sin in baptism, while it also recognized the imperfection of the baptized as long as concupiscence has not been stifled.

Sanctification. The Christian is made interiorly holy and is renewed through a willing reception of the divine grace and gifts (DS 1528) by which the faithful are consecrated to God and know themselves to be a new creation. In justification they are reborn and receive justifying grace (DS 1523). Grace and charity, infused in the soul, inhere in it (DS 1561). "The only formal cause [of justification] is the justice of God, not that by which God is just, but by which God makes us just so that when endowed with it we are renewed by God in the spirit of our mind" (DS 1529). Such a formula undoubtedly implied that justification is not purely forensic and that it does bring about a true change in the justified: "Not only are we held to be, but we are truly called and are just." Thus sanctifying grace is received as a gift that is intended to be permanent and places the faithful in the state of grace.

As it referred to the only formal cause of justification, the Tridentine decree implicitly excluded the notion of "double righteousness." That justification is the fruit of two formal causes-God's justice imputed to the believer and a human justice based on good works-had been proposed in 1542 at the Regensburg Colloquy and agreed upon by Melanchthon and Cardinal Gasparo Contarini, though it was immediately rejected by both Luther and Pope PAUL III. It was put before the Council of Trent by Cardinal Seripando. The council, however, did not accept it. Instead, it held that the imputation of God's justice, which is also the application of the merits of Christ, takes place in the gift of faith, hope, and love to the baptized. Through the merits of Christ's Passion, the justification of the impious unites them to Jesus Christ, through whom they receive the theological virtues of faith, hope, and love (DS 1530; 1561). The council considered grace and love to be inseparable, although it did not decide whether they are distinct or identical, so as not to favor either of two opinions that were held at the time by Catholic theologians. The interior renewal, "whereby from unjust one becomes just, and from enemy friend" (DS 1528), includes the reception of grace along with faith, hope, and love as gifts from God through the merits of Christ.

Free Acceptance. The reception of God's grace and gifts is not forced upon sinners (DS 1528). It is accepted in a free personal movement toward God in living faith (DS 1531), a faith that is manifest in hope and in love (DS 1530). Repentance is cited among the acts that dispose to justification (DS 1526). It is active in the process and at the moment of justification (cf. DS 1559). It is necessary to those who fall into sin after justification (DS 1542), and there is no remission of personal sins after baptism without penance and contrition. Thus the teaching of Trent implies repentance as one element in the sinner's willing reception of God's grace and gifts.

Related Conciliar Teachings. Regarding the gift of justice in justification the conciliar decree added several other points that are not without importance. First, grace is granted in varying degrees to various persons, depending on the Holy Spirit's good pleasure and each person's dispositions (DS 1529). This teaching on the inequality of grace sets aside the error of Pelagius and of some of the Protestants who claimed equal justice for all. Second, justice or grace is capable of increasing and is intended to increase as the faithful strive for perfection and make their way toward holiness. It grows in proportion with the good works that the just do when, by God's grace, they keep the commandments (DS 1535, 1574, 1582). Third, against what they took to be "the vain confidence of the heretics," the Tridentine bishops denied that the fact of one's own justification could be a point of faith: "No one can know with the certainty of faith, which cannot admit of error, that one has obtained God's grace" (DS 1533; cf. 1562). They did not, however, exclude the possibility of a moral certitude of being in grace, as was maintained in Scotist theology. Fourth, Trent rejected the absolute predestination of the elect and a predestination of others to evil (DS 1540, 1565-67), as also the possibility, outside of a private revelation, of having an antecedent certainty of one's final perseverance (DS 1541).

It should be noted, although this did not affect the substance of what they taught, that the council fathers assumed that as they preserved the old notion of merit their doctrine differed substantially from the Lutheran teaching that justification is by faith alone. Likewise, as they affirmed that grace can be lost, and is actually lost by every mortal sin and not only by infidelity (DS 1544, 1572), they thought that they contradicted the belief, held by some of the "Spiritual Reformers," that once it is given by God, justice cannot be lost again.

FROM TRENT TO VATICAN II

The Tridentine decree on justification considerably influenced later Catholic theology, being used as the central bulwark against what the theologians of the Counter-Reformation identified as the errors of the Reformers. This influence led to a rehabilitation of the realist trend in the organic concept of justification that had been developed in Thomism, although Scotist ideas were not systematically ignored. A typical example in this regard is Suarez's notion of the physical, though not metaphysical, incompossibility of the state of sin and the state of grace. Suarez toned down Thomist realism without disregarding it altogether. The Tridentine teaching further determined two emphases in the subsequent theology of justification. Its description of the interior renewal of the soul invited keeping the Aristotelian image of grace as a form that inheres in the soul. Its teaching on the voluntary acceptance of grace led to a pastoral insistence on the free cooperation of the faithful with grace. The point of debate in Catholic theology, however, shifted from habitual or sanctifying grace to actual grace. There were heated discussions between followers of the Dominican Dominic Bañez (1528–1604) and of the Jesuit Luis de Molina (1535–1600) regarding the nature of actual grace and the relations between free will and grace in human action.

The reaction to the Reformation led to exaggerations. Because they saw created grace as a form in the soul some authors tended to treat it as a thing and to overlook its essentially relative character, constant dependence on uncreated grace, the Holy Spirit. Moreover, a emphasis on free cooperation focused undue attention on human merit and led to giving a disproportionate importance to actual grace over sanctifying grace and uncreated grace. When they were not engaged in polemics with one another or against the Reformers and the theologians of Protestant Orthodoxy, the Catholic theologians of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries generally restated the Tridentine teaching in light of the classical commentators of Thomas Aquinas, although some, following Suarez, incorporated various aspects of the Scotist perspective in their syntheses. In any case, apologetic and polemic concerns with Protestantism led them to stress the lifelong process of sanctification rather than its beginning in justification, and to focus the theology of justification on the passage from sin to grace.

Protestant Scholasticism. In the Protestant schools of the seventeenth century theological reflection became somewhat distant from the religious experience of the great Reformers. The writings of Luther were treated as source books that needed to be exegeted rationally in light of the inter-Lutheran agreement embodied in the Formula of Concord (1581). In this process many theologians turned to Aristotelian categories and logical tools in spite of Luther's misgivings about philosophy. The theology of justification tended to become a theory of conversion, one theme among many, rather than the very heart of thought and piety and the key to theology. The various aspects of the experience of justification repentance and faith, sense of unworthiness and evidence of divine filiation followed one another instead of coalescing. The nine-volume Loci theologici of Johann Gerhard (1582–1637) represents the acme of Lutheran orthodoxy. Like their counterparts in Roman Catholicism these theologians sought out Scripture and tradition for arguments that could lead, with the help of rational logic, to a systematic understanding of doctrine. Similar systems were built up by Reformed theologians, who found their chief inspiration in Calvin's Institutio christianae religionis and their doctrinal standards in the Calvinist Confessions, especially the Second Helvetic Confession (1566) and the Westminster Confession (1646), and often also in the decisions of the Synod of Dort.

Pietism and Revivalism. In reaction to the rather dry intellectualism of Protestant orthodoxy, the rise of Pietism brought about a renewal of the theology of justification. Already in the sixteenth century the spiritual Reformers, many of them Anabaptists, understood faith to be an interior illumination coming from the Spirit. In England George Fox (1624–1691) and the Quakers carried this to an extreme that rendered the Church superfluous for those attentive to the Inner Light in their heart. Under the influence of Philip SPENER (1635-1705) in Germany, a drastic shift took place in systematic theology. The emphasis came to be placed on faith experienced as an overwhelming moment of conversion rather than on the dialectic of sin and righteousness. With Count Nikolaus von Zinzendorf (1700–1760) and the Moravian communities, religion became a mystical experience in which fear is absorbed in the assurance of salvation. Conversion was taken to be a complete transformation manifested in warm fervor. The theology of justification amounted to a description of the personal experience of conversion and rebirth. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, similar pietistic emphases led, in the American colonies, to the enthusiastic revivals of the Connecticut valley, which in turn, through the Holiness movement of the nineteenth century, inspired a Pentecostal turnabout in communities where the centrality of Scripture gave way to that of the interior Spirit outwardly manifested.

The Wesleyan Reaction. The theology of justification that was developed in the seventeenth century by the Caroline divines of the Church of England incorporated many ideas from the Catholic tradition. The exclusivity of faith (sola fides) that had been at the heart of the Reformation was delicately balanced by the conviction that, as Augustine had observed, God does not save sinners against their will. In this case faith is a divine gift that needs so to be accepted as to act as a condition of justification. There thus crept into English theology a strong emphasis on the human work that is involved in the process of justification, sanctification, and salvation. In the eighteenth century, however, the philosophy of deism and the spread of varieties of Arianism in some sections of the Church of England had the effect of stifling the fruits of Caroline theology in many areas of the British Isles. A reaction, largely inspired by continental pietism, led to a powerful Evangelical movement, as may be seen in the life of John WESLEY (1703-1791), the initiator of Methodism.

Wesley, who had turned to piety as a student in Oxford and had visited the Moravien societies in Germany, found that his work as an Anglican priest, especially in the years he spent in Georgia, was largely a failure. He suddenly discovered the cause of this failure on May 24, 1738, at Aldersgate in London, when he found what had hitherto been missing in his life and ministry. As he listened to a lecture on the Epistle to the Romans he "found his heart strangely warmed" and underwent a profound conversion. As Wesley described it in his diary, this conversion was focused on a sense of personal salvation: "I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for my salvation; and an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death." Until this moment Wesley's work had been unknowingly self-centered. From that time on it was Christcentered, and inseparably tied to a search for perfection on the model of biblical holiness. This implied a recovery of the centrality of justification by faith alone. But it also introduced a personal assurance of salvation in the theology of justification. What has been called "the Wesleyan reaction" in the evolution of Protestantism was indeed a restoration of justification by faith, without any condition on the human side, yet with an added dimension of awareness that had not been featured in the theologies of Luther or Calvin. By the same token, Wesley brought the necessity of good works back to the center, not indeed as conditions of salvation, but as necessary manifestations of effective justification. From this arose a new focus on moral conversion in Christian life and pastoral guidance, which became a feature of the Evangelical movements and revivals of the nineteenth century.

Schleiermacher and Liberal Protestantism. In the history of the Protestant Churches, the Wesleyan and Evangelical movements had to struggle with another fruit of the eighteenth century: the liberal Protestantism that grew out of the philosophy of the Enlightenment and in which the theology of justification lost its centrality. In 1799, as he defended religion against its "cultured despisers," Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768-1834) identified it with an intuitive sense of total dependence on a transcendent principle that believers call God. In light of this basic human experience he presented the Christian doctrines, in 1821 (The Christian Faith), as so many aspects of the human dependence on God as this is revealed in Jesus Christ. Faith is the Christian religious consciousness. It sees the historical Christ as the highest exemplification of total dependence on God. In this perspective justification is examined as the "second theorem" that explains and explores the "doctrine of regeneration" (109). Following conversion, which is the "first theorem" (108), it implies the forgiveness of sins and recognition of the converted as a child of God. Thus entering into living fellowship with Christ in his "kingly office," the believer is in a changed relation to God. This new Christian self-consciousness implies awareness of "the communication of the Spirit" (121).

As it was inspired by, but often went beyond, Schleiermacher, much of Protestant theology in the later nineteenth century took a turn toward a "liberalism" that was in danger of dilution into a sort of religious rationalism. The Christian message could then hardly be distinguished from the promotion of a humanist morality at the service of human progress and civilization. The Reformation doctrine of justification could hardly survive in such a context.

Neo-Orthodoxy. Liberal theology inevitably provoked reactions, and eventually a rehabilitation of the theology of justification. Albrecht Ritschl (1822–1889) was the first to attempt to restate the doctrine of justification by faith alone in its traditional sense, though without restoring it to the central place it had with Martin Luther. In his "dialectical" or existential theology, Søren KIER-KEGAARD (1813-55) reemphasized both the centrality of the Word and the paradoxical character of the faith that justifies. Following World War I, the Swiss theologian Karl BARTH (1886-1968), in the second edition of his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1921), formulated a powerful restatement of the theology of justification, which he brought back to centrality in his multivolume Church Dogmatics (1932-1967). He particularly insisted on the ties between justification and the work of Christ. The sola fides that is the means of justification implies solus Christus as the agent. It is the doctrine of Christ, and not only justification by faith alone, that is the articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae. As was shown, among others, by Hans Urs von Balthasar and Hans Küng, Barth's theology of justification is in close agreement with the Catholic tradition at its best. Barth's reflection comes near to the Catholic conviction on the ineffectiveness of all human effort unaided by grace.

The Neo-Scholastic Theology of Justification. Catholic theology in the twentieth century did not particularly stress the doctrine of justification. In light of the neo-scholasticism that had been advocated by LEO XIII and inserted in canon law as the official theology of seminaries (1917 CIC, canon 1366 2), the standard view was focused, on the one hand, on an interpretation of the Tridentine decree that overstressed its anti-Protestant bias and, on the other, on a systematic reading of the Summa theologiae of Thomas Aquinas (I II, q.113) that tended to ignore its historical conditioning.

In this neo-scholastic perspective, justification includes true remission of sins and removal of the state of sin, that is, the original sin that is made worse by the habitus created by repetitions of sinful actions. God does not consider a person just without making that person just, for it is God's knowledge of reality that causes it to be. Habitual sin is a permanent and guilty turning away from God as the supernatural goal of the creature. Its removal requires a reorientation to God, a voluntary deprivation or permanent rejection of the obstacles that impede the human striving for God. Since this cannot be done without grace and the accompanying gifts, the cessation or removal of sin implies the restoration of grace and gifts that will enable the sinner's reconversion to God. As God alone gives grace, so God alone forgives sin. The infusion of grace and gifts therefore means that a sinner recovers an habitual orientation to God as supernatural and final end. By grace, through faith, in hope and in love, the Christian effectively looks to God for salvation. Striving toward this supernatural end is the fruit of a dynamic principle that has its origin in God's gift and its setting in human nature, thus raising the human person to supernatural dignity.

The grace and gifts bestowed in justification activate the soul and its faculties in their obediential potency before God's action. Endowed with this deifying dynamism the sinner is just according to God's salvific will. Whether seen negatively as remission of sins or positively as infusion of grace, conversion implies free cooperation and a personal relationship with God that is necessarily voluntary. Removal of sin and reception of grace require the turning away from sin that is called repentance (contrition when it is total, attrition when incomplete), and a free turning to God in living faith, that is, faith with hope and charity. This voluntary cooperation in justification entails an awareness of moving away from sin and turning to God.

Justification is thus seen as the instantaneous changeover of a repentant sinner who is moved by God from sin to grace. As God forgives sin and infuses grace, the believer feels contrition and accedes to grace in faith, hope, and love (S.T. I–II, q.113, a.1; a.7–8). That the change in justification happens in an instant, however gradual and slow may have been its preparation, follows from the Aristotelian principle that the loss of one form is the gain of another (corruptio unius est generatio alterius). The cessation of the state of sin is the inception of the state of grace, and vice versa (S.T. I–II, q.113, a.7).

This analysis raises questions regarding the relations (1) between God's action and human cooperation, (2) between the forgiveness of sin and the infusion of grace as two aspects of a single divine act, and (3) between the components of human cooperation: contrition and faith with hope and charity. The solution, again, comes from the mutual priority and causality that scholastic philosophy identified as the law of every real change or mutation. In the line of formal causality the introduction of a new form determines, or causes, or is prior to, the cessation of the previous form. In the line of dispositive or material causality, however, the cessation of the previous form causes, or is prior to, the introduction of the new form. A new form is gained because a previous one is lost, and conversely a previous form is lost because a new one is gained. Sin is remitted because grace is infused, and grace is infused because sin is remitted, "because" expressing formal and dispositive causality, not efficient causality.

- (1) God's Action and Human Cooperation. God is the mover and the repenting sinner is being moved, but as a free being that moves itself, that is, not without willing cooperation. The infusion of grace is prior to the human response and causes it by way of formal causality. Inversely, human free cooperation or voluntary reception is prior to the infusion of grace in the line of dispositive or material causality. Being the last disposition for grace, the acceptance of it causes the infusion of grace by making its reception possible. God's action and human cooperation condition one another in different ways; they do not hinder or oppose one another. The reception of grace presupposes a receptive soul, disposed for grace, this disposition being itself caused by grace itself.
- (2) Remission of Sin and Infusion of Grace. That sin is forgiven because grace is infused, and grace infused because sin is forgiven, shows the metaphysical impossibility of separating the forgiveness of sin and the infusion of grace. It would be self-contradictory for God to infuse grace without forgiving sin, or to forgive sin without infusing grace. This seems to preclude a merely declarative, imputative, or forensic justification. It also excludes the incompossibility of sin and grace, as though God could de potentia absoluta (but does not de potentia ordinata) give grace while sin remains, or forgive sin without giving grace.
- (3) Contrition and Faith with Charity. Perfect contrition exists when repentance is totally inspired by faith enlivened by the pure love of God. As such it is the final disposition of a repentant sinner for the gift of grace. Love for God in turn causes repentance to be true contrition. Contrition is perfect because of love, while as ultimate disposition it makes God's gift of love possible. Contrition and love condition one another; and this mutual conditioning enables them to coexist at the instant of justification. That contrition perfected by charity constitutes the human cooperation with God in justification implies that it is the only one way to be effectively ready for the infusion of grace, both in and outside the sacrament. Since there can be only one ultimate disposition for one form, only contrition is the sinner's final disposition for grace. The difference between sacramental and extrasacramental justification is accidental, regarding only the manner in which this ultimate disposition comes about.

Whence a trend in modern sacramental theology that so requires proper dispositions in the recipient of grace that it no longer accepts what used to be the common opinion, namely, that the sacrament makes up for imperfect dispositions.

Three systematic conclusions seem to follow that were generally accepted in the last decades before Vatican Council II:

- (1) Justification is always relatively imperfect since grace is normally given while concupiscence remains. Were grace infused in the human soul by virtue of a natural disposition without free acceptance by each person, it would entail the restoration of natural, prelapsarian integrity. Because of the persistent attraction of evil it is possible for the just to lose grace, and morally impossible to remain in sanctifying grace and avoid all grave sin without the help of actual grace.
- (2) Since the acceptance of the divine grace and gifts is indispensable to justification, a justified sinner may, by virtue of his awareness of repentance, faith, hope, and love, be also aware of grace received. There is normally, however, no direct evidence of the supernatural aspect of these dispositions and of grace itself, though the analysis of psychological dispositions may well show signs of the passage from sin to grace. One such sign is true contrition, which entails the effective resolution to abstain from sin. These signs may be sufficient to provide a moral certitude of being in the state of grace.
- (3) The Council of Trent affirmed that justification entails relationships with God, Christ, and the Holy Spirit (DS 1525, 1529–1531) that are called in spiritual writings the indwelling of the Holy Trinity in the soul of the just. Since created grace and its gifts flow from uncreated grace, the indwelling Three Persons are directly involved in justification. Although the scholastic perspective points to created grace as the only formal cause and the only form of justification, uncreated grace, the Holy Spirit, may be likened to a "quasi-form" as the soul's indwelling Guest.

Pastoral Implications. Pastoral theology cannot be indifferent to the doctrine on justification, especially in the Thomist understanding that became standard in neoscholasticism.

Since a kind of cooperation with justifying grace is irreplaceable, sincerity and genuineness in religious practice are imperative. Without repentance perfected by charity, which includes faith and hope, no justification and no genuine religious life are possible. Whether one is justified by God in or outside the reception of a sacrament there is no substitute for the change of heart that bears fruit under grace. Thomism identifies this change of heart with contrition perfected by love. Sacramental grace, especially in the sacraments of initiation and of reconciliation, contributes to this contrition. This has inspired the insistence of contemporary moral theology and pastoral practice on the sacramental life.

The remains of concupiscence in the justified entail that it is not possible to live in grace without struggle and watchfulness. Unless they are assisted by healing grace, the justified are unable to remain in the state of grace. Because this help is always offered by God they can indeed persevere. Distrust of self, however, should go along with trust in God's never-failing grace, thus creating a spiritual equilibrium that is not always easy to obtain or maintain.

Since classical THOMISM finds an ontological change in the process of justification, some psychological repercussions of it may be perceived. Nevertheless the forgiveness of sin and the infusion of grace cannot be identified with the psychoanalytical resolution of a guilt complex and its attending peace of soul. Therapeutic methods are helpful in their own line, yet foreign to metaphysics and still more to the remission of sin by the pure gift of divine grace. While psychoanalysis may eventually free a person for a willing response to grace, it is no substitute for the theological return to God that is justifying grace.

AFTER VATICAN II

Neither Vatican I nor Vatican II had occasion to debate the doctrine of justification. Vatican II, however, created conditions in which Catholic theologians could take a new look at the doctrine of the Reformers, especially in the context of the bilateral dialogues with Lutherans and with Anglicans that were started in the wake of the council. Despite the anti-Protestant interpretation of the Tridentine decree that prevailed through the Counter-Reformation, a better knowledge of Luther by Catholic scholars in the mid-twentieth century and the ecumenical impetus coming from John XXIII opened what turned out to be unexpected possibilities for the overcoming of traditional polemics. It was in fact already apparent in theology on the eve of Vatican II that there was a convergence between Martin Luther's view of the Christian as simul justus et peccator and the Catholic teaching that concupiscence remains in the justified. What the Protestant view calls sinfulness in the justified bears some similarity to the inclination to evil that Catholic theology names concupiscence. Likewise, the Protestant idea that the justified relate to Christ and God in a trustful faith that initiates a conversion of life does not contradict the Catholic idea that created grace structures the state of the justified as a complex of new relationships with the Three divine Persons. It is because these relationships are real that created grace is needed to give them an objective setting in human life. Thus it was possible even before the ecumenical opening of Vatican II to present the Catholic doctrine on justification in a perspective that was closer to the position of the Reformers than had been the case in the heyday of the Counter-Reformation.

The bilateral dialogues that started in 1965 between Lutherans and Catholics paid attention early to the question of justification and to the frequent assumption that there is a contradiction between the Catholic and the Lutheran notions. Already in 1972 the International Joint Lutheran/Roman Catholic Commission noted in its statement, "The Gospel and the Church," that "a farreaching agreement on the doctrine of justification appears possible." Both sides had to take account of the modern context of the question. Modern culture born of the Enlightenment, the FRENCH REVOLUTION, and the industrial and technological advances of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries requires a new language and, to a large extent, a new method for the presentation of the Christian faith and its theology. In 1963 the Lutheran World Federation meeting in Helsinki had found itself unable to arrive at a consensus on the contemporary meaning of justification. Its concluding document, Justification Today, recognized that modern culture is more concerned with the global meaning and conditions of life than with Luther's original questions, how to find a gracious God and how to be just in God's eyes. It reaffirmed the centrality of justification for Christian faith, while admitting the urgency of new expressions of the doctrine that would be attuned to the emerging theologies of Africa and of Asia.

Lutheran reflection in the last decades before the third millennium tended to go in two general directions. On the one side, some authors presented justification in light of an existential hermeneutics, often influenced by the Systematic Theology of Paul Tillich. Justification is then seen as the divine response to the conundrum of sinful existence. On the other side, others, who remained closer to Luther and the confessional books, saw justification as a passage from death to life which ought to act as a "metaprinciple" behind all Christian affirmations and actions, and in the light of which all Christian institutions and theologies should be assessed. Among Catholics the multiplication of unbiased studies on Martin Luther and a better knowledge of the sixth session of the Council of Trent gave rise to a new appreciation of the Reformer's intents and actions.

The effect of these developments was keenly felt when the official dialogues began to deal at length with the problem of justification. In 1983, "Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue" in the United States issued a common statement on the topic. This document and the supporting material describe the situation between the churches in and after the sixteenth century, and survey the convergence of thought that is manifest in recent developments. Its concluding "declaration" (nn. 161–164) attempts to do justice both to Luther's central insight and to the decrees of Trent. It amounts to a modern formulation of the doctrine of justification. In this text "the gospel" is identified with the proclamation of "God's creative graciousness offered to us and to everyone for healing and reconciliation." It is an "undeserved gift which is granted and made known in faith." Furthermore, justification is acknowledged to be the heart of Christian life and the critical principle for all theology and life in the Church.

In 1987, the second commission of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Consultation (ARCIC-II) issued an agreed statement, "Salvation in the Church," in which justification was set in the broad context of the traditional theology of salvation. No difference was found between the Catholic and the Anglican doctrines. Furthermore, in 1985 unofficial consultations that took place in Germany reached the conclusion that the anathemas of the Council of Trent against the doctrines of the Lutheran Reformation, especially in regard to justification by faith, have become for the most part obsolete, and that many of them in any case had condemned doctrines that were not those of the Lutheran Reformation. The question was pursued by an ad hoc study group of nine Catholic theologians, who presented their report to the Holy See in 1994. This in turn led to a largely unexpected ecumenical breakthrough, in the form of an agreement between the Lutheran World Federation and the Pontifical Council for the Promotion of Christian Unity concerning the Tridentine canons on justification. The text of this agreement was finalized in 1997 after extensive consultations in the Lutheran and Catholic churches. In the city of Augsburg on Aug. 31, 1999, officials of the Lutheran World Federation (LWF) and of the Catholic Church (Cardinal Edward Cassidy and several bishops) signed a statement that supported the "Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification." The text declared:

Consensus in basic truths of the doctrine of justification exists between Lutherans and Catholics. . . . The earlier mutual doctrinal condemnations do not apply to the teaching of the dialogue partners as presented in the Joint Declaration. . . Lutherans and Catholics will continue their efforts ecumenically in their common witness to interpret the message of justification in language relevant for human beings today, and with reference both to individual and social concerns of our times.

This solemn agreement, the first of its kind in the history of the ecumenical movement, is limited to the understanding of justification by faith. Neither does it answer all the questions raised reciprocally by Protestants and Catholics since the Reformation; nor does it speak for all Lutherans since there are some Lutheran churches that remain outside the LWF. In addition, a few churches of the LWF have not approved the text, and a number of theologians in Germany have even protested against it. Nonetheless, the document and its signing have two major theological consequences. First, the theologies of justification that developed during the Counter-Reformation and in neo-scholasticism have become untenable in the Catholic Church, at least insofar as they involve a misunderstanding of some basic Lutheran tenets. Second, Catholic theology is now committed to making a common effort with Lutheran theologians to work out together the implications of the "Joint Declaration" for the life of the churches.

Bibliography: J. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 8:2042-2227. A. VACANT et al, ed. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903-50) Tables générales 2:2782-96. H. ROCKERT, Die Rechtfertigungslehre auf dem Tridentinischen Konzil (Bonn 1925). M. PIET-TE, John Wesley in the Evolution of Protestantism (New York 1937). W. CANNON, The Theology of John Wesley, with Special Reference to the Doctrine of Justification (Nashville 1946). W. DETTL-OFF, Die Lehre von der acceptatio divina bei I. D. Scotus (Werl 1954). H. KÜNG, Rechtfertigung: Die Lehre Karl Barths und eine katholische Besinnung (Einsiedeln 1957) bibliog. 288-304. J. OLAZARAN, Documentos inéditos Tridentinos sobre la justificacion (Madrid 1957). K. RAHNER, Schriften zur Theologie (Einsiedeln 1954-1962) 4:237-271. O. E. BORGEN, ed., John Wesley. An Autobiographical Sketch of the Man and His Thought, Chiefly from His Letters (Leiden 1966). B. HÄGGLUND, The Background of Luther's Doctrine of Justification in Late Medieval Theology (Philadelphia 1971). G. H. TAVARD, Justification: An Ecumenical Study (New York 1983). H. G. ANDERSON, T. A. MURPHY, J. A. BURGESS, eds., Justification by Faith: Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue VII (Minneapolis 1985). A. E. MCGRATH, Justitia Dei. A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification, 2 v. (Cambridge 1986). H. MEYER and G. GASSMANN, eds., Rechtfertigung im Oekumenischen Dialog (Frankfurt-am-Main 1987). ARCIC-II, Salvation and the Church (London 1987). Justification by Grace through Faith. Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification. Study Resources for Congregations and Parishes (Ottawa 1999).

[G. H. TAVARD/P. DE LETTER]

JUSTIN I, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reigned July 1, 518 to Aug. 1, 527; b. near the fortress of Bederiana in Thrace, c. 450, a Latin-speaking area which had suffered from Hunnic and Ostrogothic invasions that had made life difficult for the peasantry. In the reign of the emperor, Leo (457–474), Justin, along with two other young farmers from Bederiana, set out for Constantinople with only some parched bread in their pockets, and once there, they found that Leo was creating a new palace guard, the Excubitores, that was intended to counterbalance the Germanic troops in the city. The three young farmers were enrolled. We hear nothing further of Justin's companions, but he himself rose through the ranks and under the emperor, Anastasius I, he became the count, that is, commander of the Excubitors. When Anastasius I died suddenly in 518, Justin was chosen emperor even though he was already an old man, and uneducated, although it is unlikely that he was completely illiterate. His wife, Lupicina, whom he had purchased as a slave, freed and married, became empress, taking the more genteel name, Euphemia. He had no children, but as his fortunes rose, he brought his nephews to the capital and saw to it that they received an education.

One of these, Flavius Petrus Sabbatius, the son of his sister, he adopted with the name Justinian. By 518, Justinian was already a guardsman in the Scholarians, the largely ornamental imperial guard, and he became his uncle's right-hand man, so much so that Justin's reign was considered by some contemporaries as part of Justinian's. The empress, Euphemia, disapproved of THEO-DORA (1), and Justinian could not marry her before Euphemia's death (c. 523). Four months before his own death, Justin made Justinian co-emperor.

At the start of his reign, Justin, who recognized the supremacy of Rome in matters of dogma, was determined to end the impasse over the Henotikon of the emperor, Zeno. It was promulgated to reconcile the Monophysites and the Chalcedonians, but instead it resulted in the ACA-CIAN SCHISM (484-519), which divided the churches of Rome and Constantinople. After a year of negotiation, Justin met the demands of Pope Hormisdas and union with Rome was restored. During the negotiations, a group of monks from Scythia Minor (Dobrudja) went to Rome with Justinian's approbation to seek Hormisdas's approval of a compromise known as Theopaschitism, but Hormisdas rejected their formula. Later, however, (March 15, 533) Justinian would publish his own acceptance of Theopaschitism and Pope John I would in turn agree to it (March 25, 534). Justin took vigorous measures against the Monophysites in Syria. The patriarch of Antioch, Severus, and more than 50 bishops were deposed. In spite of Pope Hormisdas's urging, however, Justin would not extend the persecution to Egypt, where Monophysitism was deeply entrenched.

In 523 to 524, Justin moved against the Arian heretics in the Eastern empire, intending to consecrate the wealthy Arian churches as Catholic, probably with the aim of eliminating ARIANISM. In Italy, Theoderic, the king of the Arian Ostrogoths, reacted angrily, commanding Pope John I to go to Constantinople to intercede with Justin and Justinian. The pope was received in Constantinople with high honors, and while there, he performed a coronation ceremony for Justin, thereby recognizing Justin as his sovereign. Imperial policy towards the Arians remained tolerant for the next ten years, until after the Byzantine reconquest of Africa. But Theoderic's suspicions were aroused, and when Pope John returned to Italy, he threw him into prison, where he died on May 18, 526.

Justin launched the age of Justinian, which was his greatest achievement, and he has been overshadowed almost completely by his successor. But his own career was remarkable; he rose from the humblest beginnings and brought his family into positions of power and influence. At the start of his reign he showed a degree of independence. For example, his abrupt reversal of Anastasius's pro-Monophysite policy and his submission to Pope Hormisdas was his own decision, though it was supported by the empress, Euphemia, and perhaps with less enthusiasm, by Justinian. In his final years, when he was old and ill, he fell completely under Justinian's domination.

Bibliography: E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire (Amsterdam 1949) 2:219–273. J. B. BURY, A History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the death of Justinian, A.D. 395–565 (London 1923) 2:16–23. A. H. M. JONES, The Later Roman Empire, 284–602. A Social, Economic and Administrative Survey, 3 v. (Oxford 1964). A. A. VASILIEV, Justin the First (Cambridge, MA 1950) the basic work. J. A. S. EVANS, The Age of Justinian: The Circumstances of Imperial Power (London 1996) 96–110. G. GREATREX, "Justin I and the Arians," Studia Patristica 34 (2001) 72–81.

[J. A. S. EVANS]

JUSTIN II, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Justin II, Byzantine Emperor, the son of Justinian I's sister, Vigilantia, reigned nominally from Nov. 14, 565 to his death Oct. 5, 578. However his wife, Sophia, a niece of the empress, Theodora, took over the reins of power when he suffered a mental breakdown, and she persuaded Justin I, in a brief moment of lucidity, to appoint the count of the Excubitors, Tiberius, as emperor on Dec. 7, 574.

On his accession, Justin reversed Justinian I's policy of appeasing the empire's enemies on the frontiers with subsidies. In 572, he repudiated the peace treaty Justinian had negotiated with the Persians ten years earlier, and refused further subsidies, with the result that war was renewed. After some initial success, the Byzantines suffered disastrous defeat, losing the fortress of Daras to Persia. It was the news of this loss that triggered Justin's insanity. Sophia was forced to buy peace. Justin also ended the subsidies Justinian I had made to the Avars, but after the Byzantine debacle on the Persian frontier, the Avar khan was able to extort a generous payment. The Avars consolidated their control north of the Danube, helping the Lombards to destroy the Gepids, and then pushing the Lombards to leave for Italy in 568. The Lombard invaders found Italy ill-prepared; Justin could not spare reinforcements and the able but autocratic Narses, who had conquered the Ostrogoths (552) and might have organized resistance, had been dismissed on the eve of the invasion.

For six years, Justin and Sophia, who were initially sympathetic to the Monophysites, tried to find a solution to the schism between them and the orthodox, but in vain. Finally (March 22, 571), Justin turned to persecution and issued a comprehensive creed which all bishops, priests and monks had to sign or go to prison. Justin also brought about a short-lived union of the Armenian church with Constantinople at the start of his reign, when the Armenian Christians in Persian-controlled Persarmenia were hard pressed by Persian Zororastrians, and sought his help. He is supposed to have fixed Christmas to December 25, but it still fell on Jan. 6, in 1601.

Bibliography: A. A. VASILIEV, A History of the Byzantine Empire (Madison, WI 1952; repr. 1964). A V. CAMERON, "The Empress Sophia," Byzantion 45 (1975) 5–21; "The Artistic Patronage of Justinian II," Byzantion 50 (1980) 62–84.; "The Early Religious Policies of Justin II," Studies in Church History 13 (1976) 51–67. P. GOUBERT, Byzance avant l'Islam I (Paris 1951). H. TURTLEDOVE, "Justin II's Observance of Justinian' Persian Treaty of 562," Byzantinische Zeitschrift 76 (1983) 292–303.

[J. A. S. EVANS]

JUSTIN MARTYR, ST.

Christian philosopher and apologist; b. Flavia Neapolis (Shechem, modern Nablus, in Samaritan territory) of Greek parents; d. Rome, c. 165. His father was Priscus; his grandfather, Bacchius. With various teachers at Ephesus he studied philosophy: Stoic, Peripatetic, Pythagorean, and finally Platonist. His quest was for religious truth, and Platonism spoke of the vision of God. But an old Christian by the seashore undermined his Platonism, spoke of the Old Testament Prophets, and converted him to Christianity. He had already been impressed by the martyrs. For a time he taught Christian philosophy in Ephesus, but left soon after 135. He next appears in Rome, teaching at his house, apparently on the Viminal. He disputed with the Cynic philosopher Crescens. About 165 he was delated to the city prefect Rusticus and martyred for his faith. In the ninth century he was introduced in the martyrology of FLORUS OF LYONS on April 13. Leo XIII transferred him to April 14. The Greek Acts of Justin's martyrdom rest on contemporary record and survive in a good MS tradition. In Byzantine times many works circulated under his name; but from the three collections of writings ascribed to him in MSS (Paris. Gr. 451, dated 914; Paris. Gr.450, dated 1364; and a Strassburg codex of c. 1300 destroyed in 1870), criticism allows as authentic only the two apologies and the Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, a corrupt text of which is transmitted by Paris. Gr. 450. Apologia II is a supplement to Apologia I, which was addressed to Antoninus Pius soon after 150. The Dialogue, purporting to represent a debate at Ephesus in 135, was written after Apologia I. To Apologia I Justin appended a rescript of Hadrian of 124; this document is genuine.

St. Justin Martyr, woodcut.

Justin and Philosophy. As a Christian philosopher, Justin adopted the philosopher's cloak. He describes his conversion from Platonism to Christianity in such a way as to imply that there is no sharp discontinuity between them: Christianity fulfills the highest aspirations of Plato. Justin regards both the Bible and Plato as agreed: that God is transcendent, unchangeable, incorporeal, impassible, beyond time and space; that the world is created (Justin does not say created out of nothing); and that the soul is akin to God and has free will. Not, indeed, that Plato is always right: he mistakenly thought that the soul is naturally immortal and undergoes transmigration. But Plato correctly saw the deceit in pagan cult and myth. So Christianity can have no compromise with pagan religion, but has much in common with the best philosophers. Accordingly, Justin presents his faith as a virtually corrected Platonism, expressed in forms suitable for universal apprehension even by the uneducated, and elevated above the uncertainties of human reasoning by the gift of supernatural revelation. An almost equal optimism appears in Justin's estimate of STOICISM, excellent in its ethical teaching, but mistaken in adopting materialism, pantheism, and cosmic fatalism.

Justin has two ways of explaining how philosophers have found the truth. First, they have studied the Old Testament, whence they learned, e.g., of punishment hereafter. The reference to the divine triad in the second (pseudo-) Platonic epistle shows that Plato had learned from Moses of the mystery of the Trinity. (So Justin first attests the coming together of the Christian Trinity with late Platonic speculation.) Because the divine oracles are obscure and because allegory can be penetrated only through inspiration from the divine Author, the philosophers have erred. For example, the Stoic belief in a cycle of cosmic conflagrations "misunderstands" the fire of God's judgment. Second, the philosophers have also discovered truth independently of the Biblical revelation. Christ, the divine LOGOS, is the universal reason, the "seminal logos" in which all rational beings participate; therefore seeds of truth are found in everyone endowed with reason, particularly in the most gifted. Disagreements among philosophers show that each has but a partial apprehension; Christ is the whole Logos. Socrates, like Abraham, was a "Christian before Christ." Justin implies the thesis developed by CLEMENT OF ALEXAN-DRIA that philosophy is God's gift to the Greeks, a preparation for the gospel parallel to the Old Testament.

Justin's philosophy is eclectic, not in the sense of seeking to reconcile everyone and everything, but in taking the Biblical revelation as the criterion of truth and welcoming all philosophy compatible with it. In fact, the philosophy of the educated public he addresses is already a fusion of Stoic ethics and Platonic metaphysics. The distinctive and original feature of his thought lies in his conception of a divine plan in history, bringing together the Old Testament and the highest aspirations of the Greeks as two tributaries of the great river of Christianity. As a thinker, Justin should not be overestimated, but he was as good a Platonist as most of his pagan contemporaries; it is a measure of his impact that the anti-Christian writer CELSUS took him very seriously. Of the three classical arguments of ancient apologetics (miracles, prophecies, and the spread of the gospel), the argument from prophecy is prominent in Justin's armory, not only in the Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, but also in Apologia I addressed to the emperor (see APOLOGETICS).

Justin's Theology. Justin's Platonism seriously affects his theology of the relation between the Father and the Logos. Arguing against Trypho's thesis that Biblical monotheism excludes the honor in which Christians hold Jesus, Justin replies that the theophanies of the Old Testament imply the existence of "another God," "other than the Father in number, not in will"; for the supreme Father is too remote and transcendent to be in direct contact with this world. The presuppositions of the argument had been made commonplace by PHILO JUDAEUS, but it is not certain that Justin had read Philo. The presuppositions were later exploited by ARIANISM until Justin's legacy was finally purged by Augustine's De Trinitate.

Because Justin is distinguishing "Father" and "Son" as God transcendent and God immanent, he remains unclear about the work of the Holy Spirit, who (he says) is "in the third rank," except as inspiring the Prophets. Apart from his Logos theology, Justin is the most eloquent representative of the popular theology of the second century with its characteristic credal stress on the historic facts of Redemption—passionately opposed to the DOCETISM and GNOSTICISM that spiritualized away both the historicity of the gospel and the hope of resurrection, and acutely aware of the conflict with MARCION's denial that the Old Testament God is Father of Jesus Christ. Justin wrote a treatise against Marcion that is lost. He insists that the Incarnation is the culmination of the Creator's plan. Christ as Logos is the agent in creation, manifesting Himself to the Patriarchs, and finally taking of Mary our entire manhood: body, reason, and soul. To the Pauline typology of Adam and Christ, Justin adds the analogy of Eve with Mary, seeing in this "recapitulation" a proof of the unity of Old and New Testaments and the continuity of creation and Redemption. Here Justin contributed much to the thought of Irenaeus and Tertullian. Anti-Gnostic polemic may also be seen in his eschatology: preceded by Elijah as forerunner, Christ will return to a renewed Jerusalem for 1,000 years until the final resurrection. Justin thinks it heresy to hold that souls ascend to heaven immediately at death. A toleration that he extends to fellow Christians who do not accept the virgin birth is not accorded to those who deny millennial hopes.

Church and Sacraments. Though undeveloped, Justin's doctrine of the Church stresses unity and universality. The Church is the true Israel, vindicated against rival sects by being the object of persecution. The Romans ought to recognize an ally in it and suppress the heretics. To dispel pagan suspicion that the Sacraments are black magic Justin describes Baptism and the Eucharist. His account is noteworthy for references to pagan analogies (e.g., a Mithraic initiation ceremony with bread and water), which Justin explains as diabolical counterfeits.

(DEMONOLOGY is prominent in Justin's world view.) Baptism, which is washing with water in the name of the Trinity, signifies remission of sins, regeneration, "illumination," and transference from necessity to freedom. The weekly Eucharist is thanksgiving for both creation and Redemption. After readings from Prophets and Apostles, a sermon, prayers, and the kiss of peace, the "president" is given bread and wine mixed with water (the stress on dilution meets pagan gossip about Christian inebriation) and offers a long prayer of thanksgiving. The deacons distribute the Eucharist to the baptized, who receive it not as bread and drink, but as Jesus' flesh and blood. They also take the Sacrament to absent members.

Justin is a crucial witness to the emerging New Testament corpus. He cites synoptic sayings as from "the apostles' memoirs," probably using a synoptic gospel harmony that his follower TATIAN enlarged to include St. John. Justin's tradition included a few apocryphal points and sayings diverging from canonical forms. The Apocalypse he regards as the work of the Apostle John. He never names St. Paul but has many echoes of several Epistles, including Hebrews. He is the first certain writer to use Acts. His knowledge of St. John's Gospel is probable.

Justin was not translated into Latin before 1554. His influence is marked above all in IRENAEUS, TERTULLIAN, HIPPOLYTUS, and ORIGEN, who built on foundations laid by him. Between the Apostles and Irenaeus he is much the greatest figure.

Feast: April 14; June 1 among the Greeks.

Bibliography: JUSTIN MARTYR, The Dialogue with Trypho, tr. A. L. WILLIAMS (New York 1930), well-annotated translation. E. J. GOODSPEED, Die ältesten Apologeten (Leipzig 1914), critical apparatus misleading. R. KNOPF and G. KRÜGER, Ausgewählte Märtyrerakten (3d ed. Tübingen 1929). W. SCHMID, ''Die Textüberlieferung der Apologie des Justin,'' Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenchaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 40 (1941) 87–138. C. ANDRESEN, Logos und Nomos: Die Polemik des Kelsos wider das Christentum (Berlin 1955); Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart. 6 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–63) 3:1076. H. WEY, Die Funktionen der bösen Geister (Winterthur 1957). W. PANNENBERG, ''Die Aufnahme des philosophischen Gottesbegriffs,'' Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 70 (1959) 1–45. K. GROSS, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, 5:1225–26. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, Md.) 1:196–219, bibliog.

[H. CHADWICK]

JUSTINA OF AREZZO, BL.

Baptized Francuccia Bezzoli; BENEDICTINE nun, AN-CHORITE; b. Arezzo, Italy; d. there, Mar. 12, 1319. She entered the convent of Santa Maria del Ponte in her native city at the age of 13 and later, with the permission of her superiors, left the convent and joined an anchoress named Lucia living in a cell near Civitella. She remained there alone after the death of her companion, until blindness forced her return to Arezzo, where she lived for another 20 years exhibiting great patience and prayerfulness. Her cult was confirmed in 1890, and her relics are kept in Santo Spirito in Arezzo. She is invoked in cases of blindness and for other diseases of the eyes.

Justinian I, relief portrait by Gaetano Cecere.

Feast: March 12.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Mar. 2:238–241. Spicilegium monasticum 1 (Rome 1896) 19–34. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige 1:318, 322. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche² 5:1226. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 1:578–579.

[C. R. BYERLY]

JUSTINIAN I, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reigned 527 to 565; legislator, theologian, restorer of the Roman Empire, b. Tauresium, probably modern Caricin Grad, 482, d. Constantinople, Nov. 14, 565.

Flavius Petrus Sabbatius Justinianus was the son of an obscure Thracian named Sabbatius and of a sister of the future emperor JUSTIN I. His native tongue was Latin and his family Catholic, and evidently unquestioning supporters of the Chalcedonian Creed. He received a good education thanks to his uncle Justin, who served in the guard under the emperors Leo I and Anastasius, rising to the rank of Count of the Excubitors, and at some point Justin adopted him: hence the name "Justinianus." At the time of Justin's enthronement (July 1, 518), Justinian was a candidatus (the name refers to his white uniform) in the Palatine guard known as the Scholarians, and he immediately became a comes illustris and Justin's close counselor. He supported Justin's policy of repairing relations with the papacy, which had developed into open rupture under Anastasius, and on March 28, 519, the ACA-CIAN SCHISM was finally healed and Rome and Constantinople were reconciled. He lent support to the Scythian monks who tried to get Pope Hormisdas to accept the Theopaschite formula as orthodox, and though Hormisdas refused, his successor Pope John I was to prove amenable. On the assassination of his rival Vitalian, he became a commander of the troops in Constantinople (magister militum praesentalis) in July 420, and the next year, he became consul and celebrated his inauguration with magnificent games. His marriage to THEODORA had to be postponed until after the death of Empress Euphemia, who disapproved of Theodora's earlier life as an actress and prostitute. On April 1, 527, the ailing Emperor Justin gave him the title of Augustus, and on April 4, the patriarch Epiphanius crowned him coemperor. Theodora (d. June 548) was associated with him as Augusta. Perhaps because of their humble origins, the imperial couple encouraged elaborate court ceremonial, and Theodora in particular insisted on all the marks of reverence which were her due.

Imperial Reorganization. On the death of Justin I (Aug. 1, 527), Justinian became sole emperor, and commenced a plan of repair and restoration on the political, religious and legislative fronts. The empire was gravely menaced by barbarian incursions from without and by heresies in the Christian church from within. He reorganized the military, and overthrew the Vandal kingdom in Africa (533–534), and reorganized civil and ecclesiastical affairs in new African prefecture. He destroyed the Ostrogothic kingdom in Italy (535–552) and when socalled "Endless Peace" (533) with Persia collapsed after seven years, he continued the Persian War with varying degrees of success. The Persian destruction of Antioch in 540 marked the low point of imperial fortunes in the east, and the arrival of bubonic plague, which reached Constantinople in 542, drastically reduced the empire's manpower resources. In 530, Justinian recognized Harith, the sheik of the Christian Arab clan known as the Ghassanids, as phylarch and ally, and entrusted the defense of the south Syrian frontier to him. In Egypt, where the First Cataract had marked the southern frontier since the time of the emperor Diocletian, Justinian closed the temple of Isis at Philae in 537, and after 543, the three Nubian kingdoms to the south of Philae were converted to Christianity. In the Crimea, civil war broke out after Grod, the king of the "Huns" (proto-Bulgars) came to Constantinople for Christian baptism (528) and on his return was killed in an anti-Byzantine insurrection aroused by the pagan priests who were incensed at Grod's efforts to spread Christianity in his realm. Justinian moved quickly to safeguard Bosporus in the Crimea and made it a center of resistance to the Huns. In the Balkans where there were constant invasions by raiding parties of proto-Bulgars and Slavs, he built numerous forts and places of refuge and prevented any permanent settlements of Slavs south of the Danube.

Justinian almost lost his throne to an uprising (Jan. 13–18, 532) known as the Nika revolt from the battle cry nika ("conquer!") which the rebels used. The Blues and the Greens, the colors of the two major groups of chariotracing fans in the Hippodrome, allied against him, took control of the streets and set fire to large areas of Constantinople. Justinian and his court were on the point of taking flight when Empress Theodora rallied them to make a final effort. Belisarius and Mundo, a Gepid prince who had entered Justinian's service, led out their troops, caught the rebels massed in the Hippodrome where they were acclaiming Anastasius' nephew Hypatius as emperor, and massacred them. Some 30,000 were reportedly slain. The revolt had won the support of much of the Constantinople senate, and once it collapsed, Justinian needed to fear no more opposition from that quarter. The fire had destroyed the center of the city, including the Theodosian church of HAGIA SOPHIA, and Justinian seized the opportunity to rebuild magnificently. He employed the architects Anthemius of Tralles and Isidore of Miletus to build a new Hagia Sophia, a domed basilica that pushed the limits of contemporary engineering skill. An earthquake on Dec. 14, 557 opened a fissure in the dome, and the following spring (May 7) the dome collapsed, almost killing the masons who were repairing it. The church was restored according to the plans of Isidore the Younger, who made the dome higher so as to reduce its outward thrust. The old patriarchal cathedral of Hagia Eirene was also destroyed in the Nika riots and was rebuilt, though the rebuilt church was burned again in 564. The Holy Apostles church, built by CONSTANTIUS II, was unharmed by the Nika riots, but it had fallen into disrepair and was completely rebuilt (536). Tradition attributed its construction to Theodora. It provided the model for San Marco in Venice with its five cupolas.

Religious Policy. Deeply interested in theology and convinced that, as emperor and vicegerent of God, he possessed authority over matters of religion, he undertook to repress pagans, heretics, and Samaritans, and unlike previous emperors, he lumped Jews together with other non-believers, even though Judaism was still a religio licita. However in practice he seems not to have extended his repressive measures to the Jews, and archaeology reveals that in Palestine, his reign was a golden age of synagogue building in spite of the law forbidding Jews to construct new synagogues. He ruled that the Scriptures could be read in synagogues either in Greek or the local language of the congregation, but he prohibited use of the Mishnah. His repression of paganism was harsh: he deprived pagans of the right to teach or inherit and in 529, he closed down the Neoplatonic Academy in Athens which had become an intellectual center for pagan revival. Justinian's reign marks the end of the long, unequal struggle between Christianity and paganism. Samaritan revolts in 529 and 556 were suppressed savagely; the 529 revolt reportedly left 100,000 Samaritans dead or enslaved, and deprived large areas of Palestine of cultivators. After a vain effort to convert the Manichees, Montanists, Macedonians (PNEUMATOMACHIANS) and Ophites, he persecuted them. The Montanists resisted vigorously, some of them shutting themselves up in their churches and setting them on fire.

At the instance of Theodora, who was herself Monophysite, and a Monophysite advocate at the imperial court, Justinian softened the repressive measures applied during the reign of Justin I. In 532, he held a colloquy at Constantinople between the moderate Monophysites who looked to the exiled patriarch of Antioch, Severus, as their leader, and representative Catholic bishops, and personally presided over the third session in a vain attempt to find an agreement. He published his own confession of faith in the form of an edict (March 15, 533) which was based on the Theopaschite formula that stated that one of the Trinity suffered in the flesh, and persuaded Pope JOHN I to accept it. When the Sleepless Monks (Akoimetoi), tireless champions of the Chalcedonian Creed, protested, the pope excommunicated them.

In 535, Empress Theodora arranged for the installation of two new patriarchs: Theodosius as successor to Timothy IV of Alexandria (February 10), and Anthimus, bishop of Trebizond as successor to Epiphanius (d. June 5) of Constantinople. Anthimus was considered Catholic but Theodora knew that in fact, he was sympathetic to Monophysitism, and when he met Severus, the two easily came to an agreement. However in March 536, Pope Agapetus arrived in Constantinople as an emissary of the Ostrogothic king Theoderic, and he convinced Justinian of the error of his ways. The pope excommunicated and deposed Anthimus and consecrated Mennas as patriarch. Severus fled to Egypt, and Theodora protected Anthimus by hiding him in the women's quarters of the Great Palace, where he was discovered after her death (548). Agapetus' sudden death (April 22) did nothing to lessen Justinian's new resolve to enforce orthodoxy. A synod (May 2-June 4) confirmed Mennas as patriarch and condemned both Anthimus and Severus, and Justinian undertook to repress Monophysitism throughout the empire, not excepting Egypt (Aug. 6, 536). Theodosius, the Monophysite patriarch whom Theodora supported, had retained his see for almost 17 months, but only with the help of imperial troops, for his position was challenged by the Julianists, a.k.a. Aphthartodocetists, a more radical wing of the Monophysites. Now he was summoned to Constantinople where the emperor urged him to accept the Chalcedonian Creed, and when he refused, he was replaced by a Chalcedonian patriarch. Theodosius was sent off to the fortress of Derkos in Thrace with some 300 Monophysite clergy, but Theodora soon secured more comfortable quarters for them in the Palace of Hormisdas next to the Great Palace, and there he lived until his death in 566, recognized by the Monophysites after Severus' death as their leader. In 541, when the Ghassanid phylarch Harith approached Theodora with a request for a Monophysite bishop for his tribe, Theodosius, with Theodora's blessing, consecrated two monks, Theodore as metropolitan of Bostra and Jacob Baradaeus as metropolitan of Edessa. Jacob, before his death (578) in turn consecrated 27 metropolitan bishops and some 100,000 clergy, thus creating a Monophysite hierarchy separate from the Chalcedonians, who became known as "Melkites" after the Semitic word for "king".

The "Three Chapters." While Rome was under siege by the Goths (537-538), Empress Theodora had Pope SILVERIUS I deposed by Belisarius on suspicion of treason, and Vigilius I, who had promised Theodora to be more flexible, was chosen in his place. Vigilius' nuncio (apokrisarios) in Constantinople, Pelagius, later Pope PELAGIUS I, became Justinian's counselor. His position as favorite adviser, however, was usurped by two Origenist monks from Palestine, THEODORE ASCIDAS and Domitian, who caught Justinian's attention when they came to Constantinople in 536 to take part in a synod. Pelagius served an an imperial appointee at the synod of Gaza which replaced Paul, the Melkite patriarch of Alexandria with Zoïlus (late 539) and on his return to Constantinople, he convinced Justinian to write a long treatise against Origenism in the form of an edict (543), which all five patriarchs signed. Thus Pelagius had the satisfaction of annoying Theodore Ascidas as well as striking a blow for orthodoxy. But when Pelagius left for Rome (late 543), Theodore riposted by convincing Justinian that a road to reconciliation with the Monophysites lay in the condemnation of the person and writings of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, certain works of Theodoret of Cyrrhus and a letter by Ibas of Edessa. Theodoret and Ibas had been supporters of Nestorius, but after the Council of Chalcedon, they had been brought into communion, thus providing grounds for the Monophysite charge that Chalcedonianism was really only NESTORIANISM. All three had died at peace with the Church.

In early 544, Justinian published his edict against the THREE CHAPTERS. However, for the Monophysites it was irrelevant, for it failed to condemn the Council of Chalcedon, and for the Catholics it was disconcerting, for it appeared to attack the doctrine of Chalcedon. The Roman see in particular viewed the Three Chapters edict as a challenge to papal authority, and opposition was particularly strong in Africa which had now been liberated from the Vandals. The patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria and Antioch signed the edict under protest. But Pope Vigilius, aware of the strength of the opposition in the Latin West, refused, and Justinian resorted to strong-arm tactics. Vigilius was arrested while saying mass in the church of S. Cecilia in Trastevere and taken to Constantinople (Jan. 27, 547). Under pressure, Vigilius gave Justinian and Theodora secret assurances that he would condemn the Three Chapters, and in April 548, issued a Iudicatum which anathematized the Three Chapters that at the same time upholding Chalcedon. There was a storm of protest from the western bishops, and Justinian, who could not afford western alienation at this point while the Byzantine conquest of Italy was still in the balance, allowed Vigilius to abrogate his Iudicatum in return for a secret promise to work for the condemnation of the Three Chapters (August 550).

Pope Vigilius. In preparation for the council, Justinian tried to win over the African bishops. Reparatus of Carthage was intransigent, and Justinian arranged for him to go into exile on a trumped-up charge of treason, and his fate so impressed Firmus of Numidia that he signed the Three Chapters edict. But the remaining two African bishops would not give way. In July 551, Justinian published a theological tract condemning the Three Chapters that he had prepared with Theodore Ascidas, but Vigilius threatened to excommunicate anyone who accepted it, and on being menaced, took refuge in the church of SS. Peter and Paul, the twin of SS. Sergius and Bacchus which still stands in Istanbul near the site of the Palace of Hormisdas. Justinian sent a posse of notables there, including Belisarius, to arrest the pope, but he resisted and the onlookers intervened when the posse tried to drag him off. However, on the night of Dec. 23, 551, Vigilius crossed the Bosporus to the basilica of S. Euphemia together with the two African bishops who would not sign the Three Chapters edict, and there sought asylum. The pope returned to Constantinople on June 26, and the patriarch and bishops in turn reiterated their support of the Creed of Chalcedon. Meanwhile, Justinian's agents set to work in Africa and they were effective. Reparatus was replaced as bishop of Carthage by a more flexible prelate and used a combination of force and persuasion to win over the African clergy.

Mennas died suddenly (Aug. 24, 552) and was replaced swiftly by the abbot Eutychius. In July 551, Justinian had replaced the Melkite patriarch of Alexandria with Apollinaris, and in December 552, Eustachius became patriarch of Jerusalem. In a meeting between the pope and the patriarchs (Jan. 6, 553), Vigilius was given a profession of the faith of the patriarchs and asked to preside at a forthcoming ecumenical council. Vigilius agreed but suggested to Justinian that the Latin West could not be properly represented unless a synod were held in Italy or Sicily. Justinian rejected this proposal, as well as the suggestion of a preparatory commision where the pope and his aides could not be outvoted by the Eastern patriarchs.

In March 553, Justinian convoked a synod at the request of monks from Palestine where a fierce struggle between the Origenist and the strictly Chalcedonian monasteries had developed after the death of the doughty Chalcedonian archimandrite of the Judaean lauras, Mar Saba (533). In this synod, Justinian had 15 anathemas promulgated against Origenism and the isochritic doctrines, and the pope concurred. Justinian also demanded a final decision about the Three Chapters from the pope and sent him copious documentation. Yet the pope demurred, and when the Fifth Ecumenical Council at Constantinople opened in Hagia Sophia (May 5, 553), the pope did not attend.

Council of Constantinople. Justinian left the presidency of the council to the patriarchs but a letter from him was read out at the opening session, wherein he laid down a program of procedure, reminded the bishops that they had already agreed to the condemnation of the Three Chapters, and deplored Vigilius' refusal to participate. At his suggestion, several deputations waited on the pope, and he yielded so far as to publish his Constitutum I, wherein he condemned the doctrines attributed to Theodore and Theodoret, but avoided any condemnation of the three churchmen under indictment. Justinian refused to accept the Constitutum, commenting that if Vigilius condemned the Three Chapters, it was superfluous, and if he justified them, he was condemning himself. He informed the seventh session of the Council that he had removed the pope's name from the diptychs, and he also presented the bishops with documents containing the secret assurances he had received from Vigilius in 547 and 550. In condemning Vigilius, he declared, he was not breaking with the See of Rome but only with the incumbent, thereby making a distinction which was first made by Pope LEO I (440–461). The council condemned the pope and in its final session (June 2) it promulgated 14 anathemas that were taken almost literally from Justinian's edict of July 551. It also included Origen among the group of heresiarchs.

Hoping the pope would give way, Justinian published the council's condemnation only on July 14, and then he began a campaign of pressure until the pope surrendered, sending a letter of submission (December 8) to the Patriarch Eutychius. Justinian demanded a formal statement, and on Feb. 23, 554, Vigilius published his Constitutum II wherein he repudiated his former decisions and condemned both the doctrines and the authors of the Three Chapters. In return, Justinian gave heed to the pope's petition on behalf of Italy which was ruined by war and plague, and on Aug. 13, 554, he issued the Pragmatic Sanction, regulating ecclesiastical, economic and political affairs in Italy. It was an effort to restore the social fabric of Italy as it had existed before the Gothic War, and it was for the most part a futile effort.

Vigilius was already an ill man, suffering from a kidney stone, when he surrendered and on his way back to Rome, he died at Syracuse (June 7, 555). He had fought a good fight to preserve authority of Rome, but the Italian clergy did not forgive his surrender, and he was refused interment in St. Peter's basilica where the other sixth century popes were buried. Knowledge of Greek had by this time faded badly in the west, and hence many of the Latin clergy who defended the Three Chapters so fiercely could not read them. If they had, they might have realized that Justinian had a point: the Three Chapters did smack of heresy. But the Latin West saw the Three Chapters dispute as a challenge to the Creed of Chalcedon and the supremacy of the pope, and it fought back with all its might. The condemnation of the Three Chapters had no effect on the Monophysite dispute. In 557, Justinian called Jacob Baradaeus and a large selection of his followers to Constantinople for a colloquy, but it achieved nothing.

Aftermath of the Council. In a surprise move, Justinian offered the papal throne to Pelagius, a stout defender of Vigilius whose In defensione trium capitulorum, written the previous year, had strongly opposed Justinian's condemnation of the Three Chapters. The condition was that Pelagius now agree with the condemnation, and Pelagius accepted. He returned to face hostility in Italy, but imperial troops under Narses' command maintained firm control, and he was ordained bishop of Rome on Easter Sunday, 556, in St. Peter's basilica, by two bishops and a presbyter, since the usual complement of three bishops willing to perform the ceremony could not be found. Yet little by little Pelagius managed to impose his authority south of the Po River. Milan, north of it, remained estranged until the Lombard invasion (568). In Africa Justinian exiled and imprisoned recalcitrant prelates and his tactics bore fruit. Justin II's first edict sent the exiles back to their sees with the provision that they avoid any "novelties". Their passion was spent.

When Theodore Ascidas died (January 558), the bishop of Joppa in Palestine, whose name is unknown, took Theodore's place as Justinian's advisor, and he pointed out that if Justinian could not win over those Monophysites who followed the teachings of Severus, why not approach the follower of Severus' rival, Julian of Halicarnassus who preached the incorruptibility of Christ's body and were known as Aphthartodocetists? Justinian was not immediately won over. In 562, he published an edict reasserting the Chalcedonian doctrine. But near the end of 564 he promulgated an edict declaring orthodox the doctrine of Julian of Halicarnassus that Christ's body was incorruptible and incapable of suffering. Eutychius, the patriarch of Constantinople, refused his assent and was arrested (Jan. 22, 565) and deposed by a synod (Jan. 31, 565). He was replaced by John of Sirimis, who seems to have convinced Justinian that he would be willing to assent to his Aphthartodocetist decree, but he would not be the first of the patriarchs to do so. The other patriarchs, Apollinaris of Alexandria, Anastasius of Antioch and Macarius of Jerusalem, all resisted, and Justinian's death on November 14 averted a major crisis. JUSTIN II immediately cancelled Justinian's decree.

Legislation. Justinian promulgated a cluster of laws intended to bring about religious conformity. His first such law (Cod.Just. I. 5. 12) dates to 527, while he was still co-emperor with Justin I, and it was followed by a group of laws against pagans, heretics, and Samaritans. These laws were extended to include Jews, though he does not appear to have enforced the laws against Judaism any more rigorously than his predecessors. At the same time, he attacked the social inequities of the empire with exemplary vigor. Laws governing slavery were simplified. Freedmen should conduct themselves as free citizens, he asserted, and though he safeguarded the rights of former masters as patrons of their freed slaves, he ruled that the demands of the patron must be reasonable. However he did nothing to better the condition of the adscripticii coloni, tenant farmers bound to their lessors under conditions little different from slavery. By now, free tenant farmers had practically disappeared and Justinian recognized only the freehold farmer and the adscript tenant, who was a serf and could break his tie to his landlord only if he became a bishop. He passed laws against prostitution, he wiped out many of the legal disabilities of actors and actresses, and passed regulations governing dowries and ante-nuptial donations. The old custom of divorce by mutual consent was prohibited; instead he gave legal recognition to a list of just causes. The rights of women to hold property was put on an equal footing with the rights of men.

By way of ecclesiastical legislation, he passed laws requiring clerical celibacy and regulating accession to the episcopate (Cod. Just. I. 3.41; Just. Novel. 6.1). Bishops were instructed to retrench their ordinations, for churches were spending more than their income on the stipends of their clergy. He regulated the conduct of monks and clergy, forbade them to attend the Hippodrome, legislated the control of property for convents and monasteries, and forbade the alienation of Church goods. He gave prefects and provincial governors the right of surveillance over ecclesiastical abuses and excluded persons accused of murder, adultery or rape from the right of asylum in church. On the other hand, bishops were authorized to act against governors to right injustice when necessary (Cod. Just. I. 41.33; Novel. 8.8) and juridical processes against clerics and monks were put exclusively into the hands of bishops unless referred to the emperor himself. This was a period when the only source of justice in the outlying parts of the empire was often only the local bishop.

Justinian's great achievement, however, was his code of laws. On Feb. 13, 528, he summoned a ten-man commission chaired by John the Cappadocian to update the old Gregorian and Hermogenian Codes, as well as the Theodosian Code published a century earlier. The aim of the new code was to limit the ingenuity of lawyers who would produce obscure constitutions as precedents in order to win a point even when it did not conform to the general law. The new code came into effect in April 529. Twenty months later, Justinian set up another commission to undertake the collection of jurists' law, that is, the writings of private specialists in jurisprudence as opposed to imperial edicts, constitutions and responses. The commissioners had to scan 1,528 books written by Roman lawyers from the first to the fourth centuries. Heading the commission was the brilliant Tribonian, probably a product of the Beirut Law School who was "Quaestor of the Sacred Palace." The Nika riots cost Tribonian his quaestorship, but the commission continued its labors with Tribonian still its chair, and the whole work was completed in three years and published (Dec. 16, 533). It was called the Digest or in Greek, the Pandects.

At the same time as the Digest a new textbook for law students (the Institutes) was published. It was written by Dorotheus, the dean of the Beirut Law School, and Theophilus, a professor of the Constantinople Law School, both members of the commission chaired by Tribonian who also supervised the writing of the Institutes. Like the Digest, Justinian gave the Institutes the force of law. It now became clear that the Code of 529 needed updating, and Tribonian, Dorotheus and three lawyers set to work on a second edition. It was published on Nov. 14, 534. This edition superseded the Code of 529, known as the Codex vetus, which has not survived.

In the Constitution (Cordi nobis est) which prefaced the promulgation of the Code in 534, Justinian indicated that he planned a collection of his subsequent laws under the title Novellae Constitutiones, but he never carried out this plan. But there were unofficial collections, the oldest of which is an abridged Latin version made for use in Italy and containing no novels later than 555. The fullest is a collection of 168 constitutions, which also contains some by Justin II and Tiberius II and hence is no earlier than the reign of Tiberius II. It gives each novel in its original language, which is usually Greek. The third is the Authenticum, where the latest entry dates to 556. It gives Greek originals in literal Latin translation and contains 134 Novels. Noteworthy is the use of Greek. In Justinian's reign, Latin ceased to be the exclusive language of law.

Justinian's Building Program. We are usually well-informed about Justinian's buildings because Procopius of Caesarea, better known as the author of the History of the Wars of Justinian, which chronicled events of the wars up until 552, wrote a panegyric describing them. The Peri Ktismaton, in Latin, the De aedificiis, begins with Justinian's buildings in Constantinople in the first book, and then in the remaining five books, undertakes to describe his building program throughout the empire. Italy is omitted, but Justinian built little there. The church of San Vitale in Ravenna, which contains famous mosaics of Justinian and Theodora on the two side-walls of the chancel, was dedicated in 547. But it was begun while Ravenna was still the capital of the Ostrogothic kingdom in Italy, and it was paid for by a local banker, Julius Argentarius. In Constantinople, pride of place goes to the great church of Hagia Sophia, which still stands. Also surviving, and used as a mosque, is SS. Sergius and Bacchus near the Palace of Hormisdas where Justinian and Theodora lived before Justinian became emperor. Justinian joined it to the imperial palace, and Theodora used it as a monastery and refuge for Monophysite churchmen. SS. Sergius and Bacchus may have been used for Monophysite services, and its twin, SS. Peter and Paul, which was joined to SS. Sergius and Bacchus by a common exonarthex, may have been used for the Latin rite. Outside Constantinople, he rebuilt Antioch which was sacked by the Persians in 540, and rebuilt his birthplace Tauresium with the new name, Justiniana Prima, and he made its metropolitan an archbishop, giving him the same rank as the metropolitans of Ravenna and Carthage. Procopius' panegyric reveals Justinian's concern for building churches to the glory of God, forts and walls to defend his subjects, and wells and aqueducts to assure a water supply. In the Balkans Procopius lists over 600 sites where Justinian built or improved defenses, many of them simply places of refuge where the inhabitants of the surrounding area could go for safety when invaders threatened.

Conclusion. Justinian's reign was a period of change, and in spite of his efforts, he left the empire in a more precarious position when it ended than when it began. Part of the reason was bad luck. The economy was expanding under the reign of Anastasius (d. 518) and the expansion continued under Justin I and Justinian until the epidemic of bubonic plague, which broke out first in Egypt, moved up the eastern Mediterranean coast and reached Constantinople in 542. From there it traveled westward, reaching Italy and France by 543 and even reaching Ireland the following year. There was a second outbreak in Constantinople in 558. This was bubonic or bubo-septicaemic plague, spread by fleas living on rodents, not the more deadly pulmonary type which is directly communicable to another person, for Procopius who describes the symptoms in detail notes that those who cared for plague victims did not necessarily contract the disease. Nonetheless it cut the population base drastically. One estimate is that the empire's population in 600 was only 60 percent of what it was in 500.

The empire's resources became overextended. It is the general view that Justinian's ambition to restore the Roman Empire in the western Mediterranean was responsible for this. But the reconquest at first went well. Justinian made a peace intended to last indefinitely with Persia (533), for which he paid an indemnity of 11,000 gold pounds and, trusting that the Persian king Khusro would keep his word and he would have no cause for alarm on his eastern frontier, Justinian sent an expedition of modest size led by the young general Belisarius against the Vandal kingdom in North Africa in 533. The conquest was easy and Belisarius returned to Constantinople to celebrate a triumph. In 535 Belisarius led an even smaller force against Sicily, which fell easily. On December 31, Belisarius entered Syracuse. Next year he invaded Italy. The offensive went well at first; on Dec. 9, 536, Belisarius entered Rome without a fight, for Pope Silverius urged the Romans to open the city gates to him. But the Goths regrouped, and subjected Rome to a terrible siege that lasted until mid-March 538. Quarreling among the Byzantine general staff hampered the campaign, and when Belisarius finally took Ravenna in 540, it was because he tricked the Ostrogoths into believing that if they surrendered the city to him, he would rebel against Justinian and declare himself independent ruler in Italy with Gothic support. When Belisarius returned to Constantinople, he received a cool welcome.

The 540s were grim. In 540 Khusro broke the Endless Peace and invaded Syria, sacking Antioch and collecting ransoms from other cities. In Italy, the Goths rallied under a new king, Baduila, and the war dragged on until 552. The plague drained the empire of manpower and Justinian had to rely more upon barbarian recruits. In Africa there was unrest. The war of reconquest, which was launched when times were prosperous, overextended the resources of the empire. Still, Justinian could not resist an opportunity for more conquest in the west. In 551, a Visigothic noble, Athanagild, rebelled against the Visigothic king and appealed for help to Justinian. Justinian sent an army, which helped obtain the kingdom for Athanagild, but then the Byzantines declined to leave. The Byzantines remained in Spain until c. 624. Nonetheless the criticism that Justinian neglected the defense of his eastern provinces in order to concentrate on his western conquests is not justified. Justinian refused to commit large numbers of troops to the Gothic War in Italy in the 540s. Not until 551 did he send the eunuch Narses to Italy with sufficient resources to win the war in Italy, and the Goths were finally destroyed in two battles fought in 552.

Justinian's activities and accomplishments reveal a man of incredible energy and acute intelligence: his subjects spoke of him as the "Emperor who never sleeps" (John Lydus, De magistratibus 3.55). He was a tireless reformer in a society that was hostile to innovation. To quote his own words, he spent day and night reflecting on measures which were pleasing to God and useful to his subjects (Novel 8, preface). His reign is notable for the number of brilliant generals who served under him, such as Belisarius, the eunuch Narses, the Armenian Sittas who became Justinian's brother-in-law, and his cousin Germanus whose career suffered from Theodora's antipathy until her death. His praetorian prefect John the Cappadocian carried through administrative reforms ruthlessly until he ran afoul of the empress Theodora who contrived his downfall. Justinian spent prodigiously and taxed heavily; Evagrius (4.30) writing after his death, thought him greedy for money, but a generous builder of churches, orphanages, homes for the aged and hospitals for the sick. He believed it was his mission, as vicegerent of God, to unify Christian belief and to that end, he pursued heretics and sought to find a formula that was common ground for the Chalcedonian Catholics and the Monophysites. Contemporaries wondered at his partnership with Theodora, for she was Monophysite and championed the Monophysite cause. Procopius in his Secret History, an invective wherein he claimed to reveal the depravity of Justinian and Theodora as well as Belisarius and his wife Antonina, thought that Justinian and Theodora pretended to disagree in order to stir up trouble. More likely Justinian realized the value of having a loyal opposition, for as long as the Monophysites had an ally at court, they did not spawn any separatist movement. Whatever their theological differences, Justinian had no doubt of Theodora's loyalty.

According to the panegyrist Corippus, Justinian spent his last years in his religious preoccupations (In laudem Justini 2.265–267). The end of his reign was disturbed by a number of attempted rebellions. The aged Belisarius was implicated in one of the these, but since there was no proof of his guilt, in July 563, he was rehabilitated. He died in March 565, eight months before Justinian. His last service to the empire was to organize the defense of Constantinople against an incursion of the Kutrigur Huns in 559. Justinian himself died in his sleep without warning on the night of November 14 or 15, and his death averted a theological crisis. For all his contradictions and failures, he was probably the greatest of the Byzantine emperors.

Bibliography: J. B. BURY, A History of the Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian, 2 v. (London 1923). W. SCHUBART, Justinian und Theodora (Munich 1943). R. BROWNING, Justinian and Theodora, 2nd ed. (London 1987). P. CHUVIN, A Chronicle of the Last Pagans, tr. B. A. ARCHER (Cambridge, Mass. 1990). A. CAMERON, Circus Factions: Blues and Greens in Rome and Byzantium (Oxford 1976). C. DIEHL, Justinien et la civilisation byzantine (Paris 1904). J. A. S. EVANS, The Age of Justinian: The Circumstances of Imperial Power (London 1996). idem, The Empress Theodora: Partner of Justinian (Austin, Tex. 2002). W. H. C. FREND, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement: Chapters in the History of the Church in the Fifth and Sixth Centuries (Cambridge 1972). G. GREATREX, "The Nika Riot: A Reappraisal," Journal of Hellenic Studies 117 (1997) 60-86. A. H. M. JONES, The Later Roman Empire 284-602, 3 v. (Oxford 1964). F. MAFFEI, Edifici di Giustiniano nell'ambito dell'impero (Spoleto 1988). J. MOORHEAD, Justinian (London 1994). C. PAZDERNIK, "'Our Most Pious Consort Given us by God': Dissident Reactions to the Partnership of Justinian and Theodora, A.D. 525-548," Classical Antiquity 13 (1994) 256-281. B. RUBIN, Das Zeitalter Iustinians 2 v. (Berlin 1960). E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949-59) 2: 275-780. P. N. URE, Justinian and His Age (Harmondsworth 1951).

[J. A. S. EVANS]

JUSTINIAN II, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

With his father's death in 685, Justinian II became Byzantine emperor at the age of 17. The first years of his reign were successful ones for the Byzantine Empire. The Caliph 'Abd al-Malik, faced with internal problems and the possibility of new Byzantine attacks, renewed his peace treaty with more favorable terms for the Byzantines. The caliph not only increased the amount of yearly tribute paid to the Byzantines, but also agreed to share the income from Armenia, Iberia, and Cyprus. Justinian, in return, resettled the Mardaites, who had been raiding the countryside in Syria and Lebanon, in western Asia Minor and the Peloponnese. In 688, Justinian led a successful military expedition against the Slavs who were settled in the eastern regions of the empire. In 692 Justinian renewed attacks on the Arabs but suffered a setback when a large number of Slavs who had been recently drafted into his army deserted, leading to a Byzantine defeat.

Justinian continued the religious policy of his father, Constantine IV, and attempted to bring about a reconciliation between Rome and Constantinople. He was the first emperor to place the image of Christ on his coinage, along with the motto servus Christi. Justinian, however, was soon at odds with the papacy since he was not willing to agree to the supremacy of the Roman see over the see of Constantinople. In an effort to resolve the conflict, he convened the Trullo council in 692, which was also known as the Quinisext council since it dealt with matters discussed at the fifth and sixth ecumenical councils. While the council addressed a wide range of subjects, such as church organization and clerical marriage, its most significant judgment was when it emphasized the equality of the Constantinopolitan and Roman sees. Pope Sergius I, however, upheld the position that the Roman see was superior to all others and rejected all the council's canons. Justinian attempted to militarily enforce the council's decision and ordered the arrest of the pope, but the Roman populace and local troops prevented this.

While he enjoyed early success, the latter part of Justinian's reign was not popular with the people. Heavy taxation and his disregard for the senate led to a successful coup in 695 that elevated Leontius to the throne. Leontius then had Justinian's nose and tongue slit and exiled him to Cherson. Justinian's mutilation led to his nickname rhinotmetos, "cut" or "slit nose", and he supposedly wore a gold nose over the disfigurement to hide it. During his exile, the city authorities became concerned that Justinian was plotting to regain the throne and decided to send him to Constantinople. Receiving word of this, Justinian fled to the Khazars and was received by their khan with great hospitality and eventually married the khan's sister, who took the name Theodora. Learning of his actions, the Byzantines sent envoys to the Khazars to demand that they give up Justinian. The khan eventually relented and agreed to hand over Justinian to the envoys. Justinian, learning of the betrayal, fled to the Bulgars who agreed to support him in his effort to regain the throne. In 705, Justinian arrived outside Constantinople with a large army of Bulgars and Slavs. Since the defenses of Constantinople proved to be too formidable for a frontal assault, Justinian entered the city through the aqueducts and was able to seize control and regain his throne. He then had his wife Theodora, who became the first foreign Byzantine empress, and their son Tiberius join him in Constantinople.

In 711, in an effort to stop the Khazars' encroachment on Byzantine territory, Justinian sent a successful military expedition against the city of Cherson. This expedition also gave him the opportunity to punish the city for his poor treatment during his exile. After the punitive expedition departed from Cherson, the city immediately revolted. When the Byzantine force returned in an effort to retake the city, it was unable to do so. Soon the besieging fleet and army switched sides and joined the revolt against Justinian and proclaimed Philippicos as emperor. Justinian was forced to flee and traveled to Asia Minor in an effort to raise military support. He was unable to gain any backing and was soon killed and his head was removed and sent to Rome and Ravenna for display.

Bibliography: F. GÖRRES, "Justinian II und das römische Papsttum," Byzantinische Zeitschrift 17 (1908) 432–54. J. F. HALDON, Byzantium in the Seventh Century: The Transformation of a Culture (Cambridge 1990). W. E. KAEGI, JR. Byzantine Military Unrest, 471–843: An Interpretation (Amsterdam 1981). G. OSTROGORSKY, Geschichte des byzantischen Staates (Munich 1963). A. N. STRATOS, Byzantium in the Seventh Century (Amsterdam 1968). W. TREADGOLD, A History of Byzantine State and Society (Stanford 1997).

[R. S. MOORE]

JUSTINIANUS, ST.

Hermit and martyr; probably of noble Breton origin; d. Isle of Ramsey (off Pembrokeshire, now Dyfed) or Isle of Man, c. 530–540. Having come to Wales early in the sixth century, Justinianus (Stinan or Jestin) lived in a hermitage on either the Isle of Ramsey or the Isle of Man. Accounts of his martyrdom differ; he is variously reported to have been murdered by three companions, slaves or pirates. John CAPGRAVE, author of Nova legenda Angliae, is the first to produce a vita of Justinian; but his editor (Acta Sanctorum, Aug., 4:636) complained that Justinianus was too little known; no compiler of Breton saints, not even Albert le Grand, included his name. Nevertheless, his name was included in several Welsh calendars and a church at Llanstinan (near Fishguard) is dedicated to him.

Feast: Aug. 23 or Dec. 5.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Aug., 4:633–636. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1904; suppl. 1911) 1:4576. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 8:431–432.

[M. C. HILFERTY]

JUSTUS OF CANTERBURY, ST.

First bishop of Rochester, fourth archbishop of Canterbury; d. Nov. 10, 627. A member of GREGORY I's second missionary group, which arrived in England in 601, he was consecrated bishop for west Kent in 604 by AUGUS-TINE OF CANTERBURY and established his see at ROCHES-TER, where St. Andrew's was built as his cathedral. He was driven from his see c. 617 during a pagan reaction, but was received back after a year in Gaul. He succeeded MELLITUS (d. April 24, 627) as archbishop of CANTER-BURY. The chief accomplishment of his primacy was the consecration of PAULINUS OF YORK in 625 as missionary bishop for Northumbria. The opening of this mission resulted eventually in the founding of the second primatial see at YORK. Justus was buried in the church of Saints Peter and Paul, Canterbury (see SAINT AUGUSTINE, ABBEY OF).

Feast: Nov. 10.

Bibliography: BEDE, Historia Ecclesiastica 1.29; 2.3–9, 18. Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, ed. A. W. HADDAN and W. STUBBS, 3 v. in 4 (Oxford 1869–78) 3:72–81. W. BRIGHT, Chapters of Early English Church History (3d ed. Oxford 1897). W. STUBBS, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, 4 v. (London 1877–87) 3:592–593.

[R. D. WARE]

JUSTUS OF TIBERIAS

Jewish historian and Josephus's rival in connection with the Jewish war against the Romans; fl. in the 1st Christian century. What little is known of his life and works is derived almost entirely from the writings of Flavius JOSEPHUS (Life 343, 354–358, 390–393, 410), with whom he had strong differences. The recipient of a Greek education and favorably inclined to Greco-Roman culture, Justus joined his father, Pistus, perhaps unwillingly, at Tiberias in the general Jewish revolt against the Romans (A.D. 66). His part in the insurrection is not clear, and Josephus may well have been responsible for the local uprising; apparently each accused the other of complicity with the Romans to remove the blame from himself, or perhaps neither was very zealous for the Jewish cause. Shortly after the outbreak, Justus fled to AGRIPPA II at Beirut. Denounced before Vespasian, he was ordered to be executed by Agrippa but instead he was imprisoned. After being freed and again imprisoned, he eventually gained the favor of Agrippa, who appointed him as his secretary. When he was later found incompetent and unreliable, he was expelled.

Among the books Justus is reported to have written is a History of the Jewish War, which was published probably about 25 years after the end of the war (A.D. 70), for he would hardly have criticized Agrippa II so severely, as Josephus claimed he did, before the king's death (c. 93). Josephus, in his Life, contradicts the contentions and facts of Justus's presentation and thus gives an idea of the contents of his rival's work. The knowledge that some of the Church Fathers had of Justus was derived probably from the prejudiced statements of Josephus, rather than from Justus's own writings. According to PHOTIUS, another work of Justus was a Chronicle of the Jewish Kings from Moses to Agrippa II, of which perhaps the History of the Jewish War was a part. Jerome (De viris illustribus 14) ascribes to Justus a short commentary on the Scriptures.

Bibliography: H. LUTHER, Josephus und Justus von Tiberias (Halle 1910). E. SCHÜRER, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ, tr. J. MACPHERSON et al., 5 v. (Edinburgh 1897–98) 1.1:65–69, with bibliog., 92; 2.3:222. F. JACOBY, Paulys Realenz-kylopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft (1919) 10.2:1341–46. S. KRAUSS, Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 7:398–399. A. SCHALIT, Encyclopedia Judaica (Berlin 1928–34) 9:623–626. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1230.

[R. KRINSKY]

JUSTUS OF URGEL, ST.

Bishop of Urgel, Catalonia, Spain; b. Valencia(?); d. Urgel(?), after 546. According to ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (De viris illustribus, 33–34), he had three brothers: Bishops Justinianus, of Valencia; Nifridius, of Egara; and Elpidius, of an unknown see. Justus signed the acts of two councils: Toledo II, in 527; and Lerida, in 546. His allegorical explication of the CANTICLE OF CANTICLES (Song of Songs), in which he alludes to the persecution of the Church in Spain by Arian Visigoths, is introduced by a letter to the Metropolitan Sergius of Tarragona, another to the Deacon Justus, and a prologue to the reader. His sermon on the feast of St. VINCENT OF SARAGOSSA was used in the Mozarabic liturgy. He was entered in the Roman MARTYROLOGY in 1586.

Feast: May 28.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 V., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 67:961–994. B. DE GAIFFIER, "Les Notices Hispaniques du martyrologe Romain," Analecta Bollandiana, 58 (1940) 84; "Sermons Latin en l'honneur de S. Vincent antérieurs au X° siècle," ibid., 67 (1949) 278–280.

[E. P. COLBERT]

JUTTA, BL.

Benedictine abbess, sister of Count Meginhard of Spanheim; b. c. 1090; d. Disibodenberg (Diessenberg), near Kreuznach, Germany c. 1136. Jutta (Judith) became a recluse near the monastery of Disibodenberg (Mons St. Disibodi) and in 1106 was joined by St. HILDEGARD OF BINGEN, who was then eight years old. Other noble women soon gathered there, and Jutta presided over them as prioress until her death. She was succeeded by St. Hildegarde, who said that Jutta "overflowed with the grace of God like a river fed by many streams."

Feast: Dec. 22.

Bibliography: "De s. Hildegarde," Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 5:679–701. Analecta Bollandiana 27 (1908) 341. A. SILVAS, Jutta and Hildegard: The Biographical Sources (University Park, PA 1999). J. MAY, Die heilige Hildegard von Bingen (Munich 1911) 14–31. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 4:597–598. W. BÖHNE, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 5:1230–31. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 12:616.

[J. C. MOORE]

JUTTA OF FUCHSSTADT, BL.

Cistercian abbess; d. c. 1250. She lived at Essleben in an independent community of pious women who, wishing to order their religious life according to a rule, obtained permission from the bishop of Würzburg to found the Cistercian convent of Heiligenthal (Lower Franconia). Jutta (or Julitta) served as its first abbess (1234–50). She was buried before the high altar of the convent church, to which many made pilgrimages. Her grave was opened with the approval of the bishop in 1664 and again in 1897. Her most striking relic was an arm to which was attached a golden cup from which the sick drank and were cured; it came into the possession of Julius Hospital in Würzburg in 1579, but is now lost.

Feast: Nov. 29.

Bibliography: M. WIELAND, "Kloster Heiligenthal," Cistercienser-Chronik 124 (1899) 161–164; 125 (1899) 201–202. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige 3:372, 373. S. LENSSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense 1:313. E. KRAUSEN, Die Klöster des Zisterzienserordens in Bayern (Bayerische Heimatforschung 7; Munich 1953) 48.

[D. ANDREINI]

JUTTA OF SANGERHAUSEN, ST.

Widow, patroness of Prussia; b. Sangerhausen, Thuringia; d. Kulmsee, Prussia, May 12, 1260. Though drawn to the religious life, Jutta (or Judith) married, acquiescing to the wishes of her parents. After her husband died during a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, she entrusted their children to religious houses, divided her goods among the poor, and set out to help the sick and distressed. She settled in Prussia in 1256 on the Kulmsee, as an anchoress (see ANCHORITES), and nursed the sick, especially the leprous. Her spiritual directors were Blessed JOHN LOBEDAU and Bishop Heidenreich. Like Lobedau she is remarkable for her devotion to the SACRED HEART OF JESUS. She was buried in Kulmsee cathedral.

Feast: May 5.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, May, 7:593–604. H. WESTP-FAHL, Jutta von Sangerhausen (Meitingen 1938). C. KROLLMANN, Altpreussische Biographie (Königsberg 1941) 1:315. H. HOFF-MANN, Helden und Heilige des Deutschen Ostens (Lippstadt 1953) 72–74

[D. ANDREINI]

105

K

KAAS, LUDWIG

Center Party representative in German Reichstag, prothonotary apostolic; b. Trier, Germany, May 23, 1881; d. Rome, April 15, 1952. After studying in Rome he was ordained (1909) and then studied law at Bonn under Ulrich Stutz. In 1918 he became professor of canon law in Trier. He was elected in 1919 to the National Assembly as a CENTER PARTY delegate and later sat on the Prussian Privy Council (Staatsrat). Under the Weimar Republic he was a representative in the Reichstag from 1920, where his main interest was in foreign affairs. He was a member of the German delegation to the League of Nations (1926) and at the London and Paris conferences. He did not, however, support strongly Gustav Stresemann's foreign policy. Kaas advocated the liberation of the Rhineland and the formation of this region as a state within the German Republic. As chairman of the Center party from 1928 until its dissolution in 1933, Kaas upheld Heinrich Brüning as chancellor, disassociated the party from collaboration with the Socialists, and urged coalition with the rightist German Nationalists. When the Nazis came to power (1933), Kaas was one of those mainly responsible for the passage of the enabling act that permitted Hitler as chancellor to assume dictatorial powers. Kaas was a friend of the nuncio Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli (later PIUS XII) and was his close adviser in the negotiations leading to the concordat of 1933. From 1933 Kaas, a prothonotary apostolic di numero partecipanti since 1929, lived in Rome, where he became secretary of the Congregation of ST. PETER'S BASILICA. In this position he directed until his death the archeological investigations under the basilica that led to very important discoveries concerning the burial place and remains of St. Peter.

Bibliography: A. WYNEN, Ludwig Kaas (Trier 1953). J. N. MOODY, ed., Church and Society (New York 1953) 325–583. E. EYCK, A History of the Weimar Republic, tr. H. P. HANSON and R. G. L. WAITE, 2 v. (Cambridge, Mass. 1962–63), v. 2. G. SCHREIBER, Staatslexikon 4:747–750; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1233. A. L. C. BULLOCK, Hitler: A Study in Tyranny (rev. ed. New York 1958).

[M. A. GALLIN]

KADDISH

A Jewish prayer that is often referred to as the prayer for the dead since it is customary for the Jewish mourner to recite it in the synagogue thrice daily for 11 months after the death of a parent or close relative. Its text, however, does not contain words of supplication for the dead but only exaltation and glorification of the Holy Name, in line with the teachings of the sages that one should praise God equally for the good and for the evil that befall him, even in the time of deepest mourning.

The Kaddish (Aramaic qaddîš, "holy," i.e., hallowed be the great name of the Lord), first mentioned in the tractate Soferim, originated as a closing doxology to a haggadic discourse in study houses of the Jewish community in Babylonia, and was composed in Aramaic, the vernacular of that time, except for one section in Hebrew. The first part of the text was taken from Ez 38.23, and other sections were added in later eras. The second part is from the 1st century. The last paragraph, beginning with the Oseh Shalom (He who makes peace), is taken from the Shemoneh Esreh [18 (blessings)], and the Al Yisrael veRabbanan (Unto Israel and the rabbis) was added in medieval times. Today it is recited also after the study of the oral law and as a doxology with congregational response at the end of prayers in the synagogue. Of even greater importance than the body of the text is the congregational response: "May His Great Name be praised for all Eternity." The Talmud (Sotah 49a) states: "Since the destruction of the Temple the world has been sustained by the Kedushah [proclamation of God's holiness] of the liturgy and the Yehe Shemeh Rabba [May His Great Name . . .] of the haggadic discourse. Happy the King who is thus lauded in His house!" (Berakhot 3a). The repetition of the AMEN (verily, truly) represents affirmation, acceptance, and faith. Ten men are needed to recite the Kaddish.

The Kaddish has several different forms, each used for a different purpose: (1) Kaddish ha-Gadol (the great Kaddish), known also as the Burial Kaddish, is the mourner's first recitation of the Kaddish. It is a prayer of faith in resurrection of the dead, and so it is called also Kaddish of Resurrection (Tehiyat ha-Meytim). (2) Kaddish de Rabbanan (rabbis' Kaddish) is a tribute of praise, arranged to be recited after learning the oral Law, especially haggadic material; it is also a prayer for the rabbis. (3) Kaddish de Sheliah Tzibbur (Kaddish of the deputy of the community) is the congregational Kaddish recited by the cantor at public prayer (see CANTOR IN JEWISH LIT-URGY). This form has two divisions, the Half Kaddish (Hatzi-Kaddish) and the Full Kaddish [Kaddish Shalem including Tithkabbel (May it be acceptable)], each of which is inserted in specific places in the regular congregational prayers. (4) Kaddish Yatom (Orphan's Kaddish), called also the Mourner's Kaddish (Kaddish Abelim), is recited by the orphan for an 11-month period. The 10 forms of praise are parallel to the Ten Commandments.

The regular recitation of the Orphan's Kaddish produces a special kind of mystic benefit. The earliest reference to this was in a legend wherein Rabbi AKIBA BEN JOSEPH met a spirit in the guise of a man carrying wood; the spirit told Akiba that the wood was for the fire in GE-HENNA, in which he was burned daily in punishment for having maltreated the poor while he was a tax-collector, and that he would be released from his awful torture if he had a son to recite the Bareku (bless ye) and the Kaddish before a worshiping assembly that would respond with the praise of God's name. On learning that the man had utterly neglected his son, Akiba cared for and educated the youth, so that one day he stood in the assembly and recited the Bareku and the Kaddish and released his father from Gehenna (Maseket Kallah 11.11). At first, the Kaddish for deceased parents was recited a full year; later the time was reduced to 11 months, since it was considered unworthy to have such an opinion of the demerit of one's father. The custom of reciting this Kaddish was extended to include the Yahrzeit (anniversary of death) as well.

Bibliography: J. SCHICK, The Kaddish (New York 1928). D. DE SOLA POOL, The Kaddish (New York 1909; repr. 1929); Universal Jewish Encyclopedia 6:273–275. P. BIRNBAUM, A Book of Jewish Concepts (New York 1964) 537–539. J. H. HERTZ, ed. and tr., The Authorized Daily Prayer Book (rev. ed. New York 1948). J. D. EISENSTEIN, Jewish Encyclopedia 7:401–405. M. E. JERNENSKY and A. NADEL, Encyclopedia Judaica 9:734–742. R. R. GEIS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1238. E. LEVI, Yesodot Ha-Tefilah (Tel Aviv 1963), in Hebrew. I. JACOBSON, Netiv Binah (Tel Aviv 1964–) 1:365–373, in Hebrew.

[E. SUBAR]

KAFKA, MARIA RESTITUTA, BL.

Baptized Helena, nurse, martyr of the Franciscan Sisters of CHRISTIAN CHARITY ("Hartmannschwestern"); b. May 10, 1894, Hussowitz-Brunn, Moravia (now Brno, Czech Republic); d. March 30, 1943, Vienna, Austria. Helena Kafka was the sixth daughter of a cobbler who moved the family to Vienna while she was still a child. During her teens she began working as a sales clerk, then as a nurse, which put her into contact with the nursing Hartmannschwestern. She took the name "Restituta" upon entering the congregation (1914). Sr. Restituta was a skilled surgical nurse (1919–39), but also gained a reputation for championing the cause of those in need: the poor, the oppressed, and the unjustly accused—even a Nazi doctor.

Following the Anschluss (March 1938), she was an outspoken opponent of Adolf Hilter. She was arrested on Ash Wednesday 1942 for replacing the pictures of Hitler in each room of a new hospital wing with crucifixes and refusing to remove them. On Oct. 28, 1942, she received the death sentence for treason. Upon being offered her freedom in exchange for leaving the order, she refused. For the next five months, until the order of decapitation was executed, Sr. Restituta nursed other prisoners without regard to political affiliation.

On April 6, 1998, her martyrdom was declared. In the Plaza of Heroes in Vienna in front of the balcony where Hilter announced the Anschluss of Austria, Pope John Paul II beatified Kafka on June 21, 1998.

Feast: Oct. 29 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: P. RONAI, Schwester Maria Restituta Kafka (Innsbruck 1998).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KAGAWA, TOYOHIKO

Japanese social reformer and Protestant leader; b. Kobe, July 10, 1888; d. Tokyo, April 23, 1960. After being orphaned at the age of four, he was raised by an uncle and aunt in Awa and Tokushima. When he became a Christian in his teens, he was disinherited, but with the help of missionaries he studied at the Presbyterian College in Tokyo (1905–08). From 1910 to 1924 he spent all but two years in a small hut in the slum section of Kobe, called Shinkawa. Disturbed by the poverty and misery of the area, he went to the United States to pursue at Princeton University further studies in social techniques (1914–16) and then founded the Labor Federation (1918) and the Farmers' Union (1921). Kagawa was arrested during the rice riots of 1919 and the shipyard strikes of 1921, but he agitated successfully for universal manhood suffrage and modification of laws against trade unionism. In 1923 he was asked to supervise relief and social work in Tokyo. Within a year he reorganized entirely the Bureau of Social Welfare. His book Across the Death Line (1920), which drew on his experiences, won him enormous popularity. This and other books drew the attention of the Japanese government to the appalling conditions in the slums. Kagawa insisted that a reorganization of the world's economic structure through cooperative enterprise was necessary to realize the Christian ideal of the social order. Besides founding the Anti-War League (1928), he started the Kingdom of God Movement (1930) to promote the conversion of Japan. He established credit unions, schools, hospitals, and churches on the cooperative principle. On five occasions he visited the United States to gain support for his social reform projects. His pacifism caused his imprisonment in 1940, but he was released after World War II and became a leader in the attempt to adapt democratic institutions to Japan. Among the more important of his numerous writings, with dates of their translation into English, are The Religion of Jesus (1931), Christ and Japan (1934), Songs of the Slums (1935), Meditations on the Cross (1936), Brotherhood Economics (1934), and Behold the Man (1941).

Bibliography: W. AXLING, Kagawa (8th ed. rev. New York 1946). Kagawa nijû seiki no kaitakusha (Tokyo 1960), Kagawa, a pioneer of the 20th century, ed. at Meiji Gakuin University.

[A. SCHWADE]

KAKUBILLA, ST.

Called also Cacucabilla, Cacucilla, Cucacilla, and other names, a mythological, popular saint of the 15th century. Her name, reminiscent of Colum-cille (see CO-LUMBA, ST.), goes back to St. COLUMBAN, who was invoked against demons and in thunderstorms. In Germany the Latin ending -illa made the saint a woman, who was invoked against rats and mice. In the "Book of Remedies of Wolfsturn" one may find the curious advice: "Against rats write these words on four places in the house: Sanctus(?) Kakukakilla." In the later Middle Ages the blessing formulas consider this saint as masculine in Tyrol, and as feminine in Styria, Thuringia, Alsace, and Sweden. There is a portrait of a saint with two mice and with the title Cutubilla in the abbey church of Adelberg in Württemberg; the picture is of no historical value, but of ethnological interest. Similar pictures are found in Uppland, Sweden, dating from c. 1500. These, however, represent an abbess, probably confused with the abbess St. GERTRUD OF NIVELLES. The name Kakubilla has superstitious and magical implications.

Bibliography: H. BÄCHTOLD-STÄUBLI, ed., Handwörterbuch des deutschen Aberglaubens, 10 v. (Leipzig 1927–42) 4:913–914. Zeitschrift des Vereins für Votkskunde 1 (1891) 321, 444; 2 (1892) 199–201; 8 (1898) 341–342. W. STAMMLER, Münster 13.10 (1960), bibliog.; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche² 5:1254–55. J. BRAUN, Tracht und Attribute der Heiligen in der deutschen Kunst (Stuttgart 1943).

[V. H. REDLICH]

KALĀM

The science of Muslim theology. This article discusses its meaning, origin and development, content, nature and method.

Meaning. Kalām means speech, utterance, discourse; 'ilm al-kalām is speech or discourse par excellence, i.e., the speech of those who discuss God and the things of God, or, according to some, the science that treats of God's attribute of speech. The latter was one of the first questions discussed by Muslim theologians, and so all theological discussion came to be called kalām. The theologians are called mutakallimūn (speakers, discoursers). Ibn Khaldūn (d. 1406) defines kalām as "a science which furnishes the means of proving the dogmas of the faith by rational arguments and of refuting the innovators who, in matters of belief, depart from the doctrine followed by the ancients and the partisans of tradition. The very essence of these dogmas is the profession of God's unicity." This definition, like most others, brings out the essentially defensive and polemic nature of Muslim theology.

Origin and Development. The specifically Islamic sciences all derive from the Qur'ān and its influence. The Qur'ān is for Islam a divine and autonomous datum in the strictest sense. But its meaning was not always clear, and the first efforts at exegesis reveal two tendencies, one literalist and the other rational, which continued to characterize Muslim thought in general, and kalām in particular. Political quarrels over the Caliphate gave rise to the factions, later sects, of the Khārijites (secessionists), the SHĪ'ITES, and the Murji'a (those suspending judgment). The theological points involved were faith and its relation to works, and the juridical position of the Muslim grave sinner.

Umayyad Period (661–750). The transfer of the capital of Islam to Damascus led to the first real encounter of Muslims with Christian theological thought. SS. Sophronius, Andrew of Crete, and John of Damascus all date from the Arab period of Damascus. The two main points discussed were predestination (qadar) and whether the Qur'ān is created or uncreated. In Persia, the encounter with dualism led to polemic on God's unicity, His existence, and His attributes.

'Abbāsid Period (750-1258). The constitution of kalām as an autonomous science came early in this period. Non-Arab, especially Persian, influences were very important. The foundation of the Basra and Kufa schools of grammar affected exegesis of the Qur'an and in this and other ways influenced kalām. The formation of the principal systems of jurisprudence (figh) also left its mark on the mentality and method of many mutakallimūn, since these were usually also jurists (see ISLAMIC LAW). But the most important factor in the shaping and development of kalām was the influence exercised by the translation into Arabic, through Syriac or directly from the Greek, of the principal philosophical works of Greek antiquity. Moreover, Islam now had to face all kinds of "heterodoxies," such as materialism and MANICHAEISM. To reply to their adversaries, Muslim doctors threw themselves into the fray, and the resulting first significant school of kalām was that of the MU'TAZILITES. These were the real founders of kalām. They were succeeded by the Ash'arite schools, and Ash'arism finally came to be identified with "orthodoxy" (see ASH'ARĪ, AL-). The role played by such other schools of kalām as the Māturīdites, Zaydites, and Shī'ites is difficult to evaluate, since their works have not been sufficiently studied.

Content. The chief questions discussed by the mutakallimūn may be indicated by a brief analysis of the Tamhīd of al-Bāqillānī (d. 1013). The first two chapters are a rudimentary epistemology and ontology leading to an important third chapter on God's existence and attributes. Chapters 4 to 9 are polemics against materialists, astrologers, dualists, Magians, Christians, and Brahmins. Chapters 10 to 11 discuss the prophethood of Muhammad and his signal miracle of the inimitable Qur'an. Chapters 12 to 15 are a polemic against the Jews, and chapter 16 is directed against the corporealists (who made God a body). This leads to a theoretical discussion of attributes and their nature in chapters 17 to 19. The uncreatedness of the Qur'ān is defended in chapter 20. Chapter 21 details Mu'tazilite views, and chapter 22 returns to the divine attributes. Chapter 23 is on the beatific vision. In chapters 24 to 35 various aspects of the divine will, predestination, and human acts are discussed. Chapters 36 to 39 deal with faith and the status of the sinner in this life and the next. The Prophet Muhammad's intercession is the subject of chapter 40. The long concluding section is a discussion of the authenticity of tradition and of the caliphate, with a long defense of the legitimacy of the first four caliphs.

Nature and Method. The history of kalām and the study of the texts at hand make it very clear that kalām is primarily a defensive and polemic apology aimed at refuting adversaries and solving doubts. It is never conceived as a means of penetrating more profoundly into the data of revelation. Thus al-Ghazzālī, whose Iqtiṣad is one of the finest works of kalām, is inclined to minimize the importance of kalām and to restrain its use to those who need a remedy against doubts about the faith. The real theological problem of Islam is not that posed by kalām, but rather that evoked by the rigid Ḥanbalite insistence on the absolute transcendence of the one God. Kalām, therefore is Muslim theology in an actual, but rather restricted, sense.

The theological sources of the mutakallimūn are: texts of the Qur'n, always the weightiest proofs; ISLAMIC TRADITIONS (hadīth: the words and acts of Muhammad as reported by his companions and handed down by oral transmission); and rational arguments. Consensus ($ijm\bar{a}$ ') is sometimes appealed to, but it is more a source of jurisprudence. Philological, or grammatical, arguments and subtleties are often involved in the interpretation of Qur'ān texts and of traditions. As kalām developed, the use of rational argument became more prominent and the relatively simple analogies of the early authors were more and more replaced by Aristotelian logic and the formal syllogism. Philosophy as such was never very popular in Islam, but the later mutakallimūn gave much attention to questions that were more philosophical than theological. The professional philosophers, such as Averroës and MAIMONIDES, had a very poor opinion of the reasoning of the mutakallimūn.

Kalām and Catholic Theology. There are two reasons why at least some Catholic theologians should not neglect kalām. The first is that a sympathetic knowledge of ISLAM, unclouded by passion or prejudice, must include knowledge of this discipline, which has played so important a role in the direction and development of Islamic religious thought. This scarcely needs elaboration, and the theologian is the one best equipped to gain and evaluate such knowledge. The second reason may be summed up in the fact that it is an important area of "comparative theology." The significance of this has been brought out well by M. M. Anawati and L. Gardet.

Knowledge of the nature and methods of kalām can help the Catholic theologian to a deeper appreciation of his own theology. It can also suggest further questions that must be asked in Catholic as well as in Islamic theology. And it can lead to a dialogue conducted not in the spirit of kalām perhaps, but in a sympathetic spirit that may be permanently fruitful.

Bibliography: L. GARDET and M. M. ANAWATI, Introduction à la théologie musulmane (Paris 1948). I. GOLDZIHER, Vorlesungen über den Islam (2d ed. Heidelberg 1925); Le Dogme et la loi de l'Islam, tr. F. ARIN from the 1st ed. (Paris 1920). A. S. TRITTON, Muslim Theology (London 1947). W. M. WATT, Free Will and Predestination in Early Islam (London 1948). A. J. WENSINCK, The Muslim Creed (New York 1932). MAS'ŪD IBN 'UMAR, AL-TAFTĀZĀNĪ, A

Commentary on the Creed of Islam, tr. E. E. ELDER (New York 1950), commentary on the creed of al-Nasafī. AL-GHAZZĀLĪ, Iqtisād (El justo medio en la creencia) tr. M. ASIN-PALACIOS (Madrid 1929), includes summary translations of some of his other works. IMĀM EL ḤARĀMEIN, El-Irchad, ed. and tr. J. D. LUCIANI (Collection du centenaire de l'Algerie; Paris 1938).

[R. J. MCCARTHY/EDS.]

KALANDS BRETHREN

Confraternities of the Calends, so called because of their custom of holding divine services on the first of the month (calendae). They were an ecclesiastical society whose members, both clerical (domini) and lay (fratres), were under the direction of a clerical dean; they existed for the purpose of providing for burials and suffrages for the dead and also for mutual help in economic and legal difficulties. The custom of celebrating the first of the month is of pagan origin, but early in the Middle Ages this custom was directed toward special suffrages and Masses for the dead; e.g., Conrad of Hochstaden, Archbishop of Cologne, referred in 1260 to canons who were negligent in the matter of lunationes mensium, aut Kalendae, seu obitus fidelium. In the 13th and 14th centuries the Kalands spread throughout the northwestern part of Germany, with heaviest concentration in Westphalia, and were usually connected with cathedrals and chantries. Membership in the Kalands differed according to individual statutes, some groups being composed exclusively of priests or clerics, others of clerics and laymen, but most commonly of clerics, laymen, and women. Membership was usually limited to 12 persons, a good reputation being an essential requirement for acceptance. During the Reformation the Kalands suffered almost total disintegration, and during the secularization that followed they disappeared, leaving hardly a trace. They are still preserved in Münster (cathedral, since 1300), Wiedenbrück, (chantry, since 1343), and Wüllen (parish church, since 1357).

Bibliography: L. VON LEDEBUR, "Die Kalandsverbrüderungen in den Landen Sächsischen Volks-Stammes" Märkische Forschungen von dem Verein für Geschichte der Mark Brandenburg 4 (1850) 7–76. R. STAPPER, "Der grosse Kaland am Dom zu Münster," Westfälische Zeitschrift 86 (1929) 82–96. F. FLASKAMP, Die Kalands-Brüderschaft zu Wiedenbrück, 2 v. (Münster 1957–59). R. PREISING, Der Werler Kaland (Werl 1958).

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

KĀLĪ

One of the names of the Mother Goddess in Hinduism. She is the consort of Śiva, and is known in her auspicious aspect as Umā or Pārvatī, but in her terrible aspect as Durgā or Kālī. She is represented as a four-armed woman with her tongue lolling out; she is garlanded with skulls and dancing on the body of her prostrate lord. Yet, this fearful goddess is worshiped all over India as the Great Mother, and especially in Bengal, she has inspired intense devotion. She was celebrated in exquisite poetry by Rāmprasād Sen in the 18th century; and Rāmakrishna, the "saint" of modern Hinduism, was her devotee, regarding her as the eternal manifestation of the Supreme Being. Her cult is distinguished by the sacrifice of goats; the Kālī Ghat in Calcutta is the center of these rites.

The goddess Kali. (Victoria & Albert Museum, Crown Copyright/Art Resource, NY)

See Also: HINDUISM and its bibliography.

[B. GRIFFITHS]

KALINOWSKI, RAFAŁ OF ST. JÓZEF, ST.

Baptized Józef (Joseph), engineer, freedom fighter, Discalced Carmelite (OCD) priest, "martyr of the confessional"; b. Sept. 1, 1835, at Vilna, Lithuania; d. Nov. 15, 1907, at the Carmel in Wadowice, Poland.

Born in Lithuania to an aristocratic Polish family, Kalinowski entered the military in 1853 and studied civil engineering at the Academy of Military Sciences, St. Petersburg. Thereafter he was appointed to the fortress at Brest Litowski, Belarus, where he was charged with overseeing the building of the railway line between Kurst and Odessa. His success in that task led to his promotion to captain about the time the Russian Army occupied Poland (1863). Although he desired to devote himself to charity, as a Polish patriot, he accepted the position of minister of war in Vilna and participated in the uprising (1863) against the Russian occupation. He was captured in 1864 and condemned to death. Later his sentence was commuted to ten years' exile in Siberia. The first four years were spent in a desolate labor camp, where he became known as a man of boundless charity and serenity. Fellow prisoners sought him out for spiritual advice. He was freed in 1874, but since he was forbidden to live in any major Polish city, he went to Paris, where he became tutor to Prince August Czartoryski, who later became a Salesian priest.

In 1877 he was received into the Austrian Carmelites, taking the name Rafał of St. Józef and was ordained priest in 1882. Thereafter he began his work of restoring the Discalced Carmelites in Poland, especially in Czerna, Krakow, and Wadowice, where he a founded a monastery (1892) and served as its prior. His primary apostolate centered on the confessional. His gift of charity made him a much sought spiritual director, but he also taught novices and served in other capacities. Among his spiritual sons is St. Albert CHMIELOWSKI.

His spiritual life is marked by continual prayer fed by austerity and silence. He also longed and worked for Christian unity. He wrote several books on Carmelite spirituality. Kalinowski is buried at Czerna.

Pope JOHN PAUL II, who was born in Wadowice and tried to become a Carmelite, beatified Kalinowski in 1983 at Krakow, Poland. When Kalinowski was canonized by the same pope (Nov. 17, 1991), he was the first Carmelite friar to be so honored since John of the Cross in 1726.

Feast: Nov. 19 (Carmelites).

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 76 (1984) 1045–1047. L'Osservatore Romano, English ed., no. 28 (1983) 9–10. S. ADAMCZYK, Niespokojne serce (Krakow 1983). R. BENDER, Powstanieczakonnik [ojciec] Rafał Kalinowski (Warsaw 1977). J. GALOFARO, Al Carmelo attraverso la Siberia (Rome 1960). C. GIL, O. Rafał Kalinowski (Krakow 1979). R. KALINOWSKI, Listy (Lublin 1978). S. T. PRASKIEWICZ, St. Raphael Kalinowski: An Introduction to His Life and Spirituality, tr. T. COONAN, M. GRIFFIN, and L. SULLIVAN (Washington 1999).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KANSAS, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Part of the Louisiana Purchase, the area that is now Kansas was annexed to the United States in 1803. Having been part of the Missouri Territory until 1821, it remained unorganized until formation of the Indian Territory in 1832. The Kansas-Nebraska Act (1854) established the territories of Kansas and Nebraska, and on January 29, 1861, Kansas became the 34th state to enter the Union. Its 81,815 square miles are at the geographic center of the continental United States, with Nebraska to the North, Missouri to the East, Oklahoma to the South, and Colorado to the West.

At the time of the Louisiana Purchase, Shawnee, Osage, Potawatomi, Quivira, Kaw (Kansa), Ottawa, Cherokee, and many other Native American tribes occupied the territory. During the nineteenth century, thousands of Native Americans were relocated to Kansas, and then to Oklahoma. When Kansas attained statehood, it held a population of about 110,000—mostly settlers from the South and New England and immigrants from Germany, Russia, Sweden, and England. By that time, nearly all Native Americans had been pushed into Oklahoma. In the year 2000, Kansas had a total population of 2,688,418, of whom 86.1% were white, 7.0% Hispanic, 5.7% black, 1.7% Asian, and only 0.9% Native American Early History. On June 29, 1541, Franciscan Friar Juan de Padilla (c. 1490–1542) crossed the Arkansas River near present-day Dodge City with Spanish conquistador Francisco Vásquez de Coronado (c. 1510–1554). After celebrating the first Mass in what is now the United States, he separated from Coronado and began evangelizing the Quivira. A monument stands near Saint Rose's Church, Council Grove, at the site believed to be the place where he became the protomartyr of the United States at the hands of a rival tribe.

Father Charles DE LA CROIX (1792–1869) made the next attempt to evangelize Kansas when he traveled to the Neosho River and converted many of the Osage (1822), but it was the Jesuits who established a lasting presence. Beginning in 1827, Father Charles VAN QUICKENBORNE, S.J. (1788–1837) journeyed repeatedly from St. Louis to evangelize the Native Americans of northeast Kansas primarily Osage, Peorias, Weas, and Pienkishaws. He established Saint Francis Xavier mission for the Kickapoo near Leavenworth in 1836 but abandoned it in 1847. Father Christian Hoecken, S.J. (1851) established a mission for the Pottawatomie at Sugar Creek (1839), where Saint Rose Philippine DUCHESNE (1769-1852) and the Religious of the Sacred Heart founded a school for girls (1841). In 1847, when the Pottawatomies moved to their new reservation west of present-day Topeka, the missionaries followed and established Saint Mary's Jesuit Mission with Saint Mary's College, which they operated until 1967, and in 1978 sold to the schismatic Society of Saint Pius X. In 1846, the Jesuits established a mission for soldiers at Fort Scott, and then in 1847, Fathers John Schoenmakers, S.J. (1807–1883) and John Bax, S.J. (1817–1852), along with three lay brothers, established Osage Mission at St. Paul, both in southeast Kansas. Osage Mission included Saint Ann's Academy for girls, run by the Sisters of Loretto from Kentucky.

Pius IX established the "Vicariate Apostolic East of the Rocky Mountains to Missouri" in 1851. He gave care of this territory to Bishop Jean-Baptiste Miège (1851-1874), who resided at Saint Mary's Mission. With over one million square miles of land, the territory stretched from the Rocky Mountains to the Missouri River, and from Texas to Canada. A year after the Kansas-Nebraska Act allowed white immigration, Miège established Leavenworth as his episcopal city. There were 700 Catholics, six complete churches, three under construction, 11 stations, and eight priests. Pius IX divided the vicariate in 1857, leaving Miège with just the Kansas Territory. Even in this smaller territory, covering the vast land remained a considerable challenge. To this end, Father Philip Colleton (1821–1876) organized a circulating library of 250 volumes, and Miège brought various religious orders to Kansas, including Benedictine monks (Atchison 1858), Sisters of Charity (Leavenworth 1858), Benedictine Sisters (Atchison 1863), and Carmelite priests (Leavenworth 1864). These religious men and women established schools and took of the care of parishes and missions. Bishop Miège consecrated the Leavenworth Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception (1868) and attended the Vatican Council (1869-70) before he resigned in 1874.

Bishop Louis Mary Fink (1877-1904) succeeded Miège and promoted Catholic immigration to Kansas, bringing German, Polish, Croatian, Slovak, Slovenian, Lithuanian, and Irish immigrants who established ethnic parishes. The Homestead Act (1862)—granting 160 acres of land to each settler-and the building of railroads led to a tripling of the Kansas population from 107,206 in 1860 to 364,399 in 1870. In the aftermath of the Civil War, the Black population also rose and Holy Epiphany parish was established in Leavenworth as the first African-American parish west of St. Louis (1874). At Fink's request, the Holy See established Leavenworth as a diocese on May 22, 1877, a suffragan of St. Louis. At the time, it included 45,000 Catholics, 60 priests, 80 churches and chapels, one abbey, seven colleges, 20 parochial schools, an orphanage, and a hospital.

It was Fink's vision to establish a system of "Christian forts" throughout Kansas following the military

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of Kansas City in Kansas	1952
Diocese of Dodge City	1951
Diocese of Salina	1887
Diocese of Wichita	1887

model. These would be places of refuge for Catholics and especially the clergy who often traveled long distances in their ministerial activities. He brought Franciscan friars to Emporia (1878) and Ursuline sisters to Scipio (1896). The most notable example of these was, however, Saint Fidelis Friary at Victoria, established in 1878 by Capuchin Friar Anastasius Joseph Mueller (d. 1878), who died two months after founding the friary. The Capuchins expanded the friary to include the Capuchin school of philosophy (1903), Hays Catholic College (1908), Saint Anthony's Hospital in Hays (1909), and the nationally known "Cathedral of the Plains" (1912). The friary with the "cathedral" still stands as a landmark for travelers on Interstate 70. The Capuchin friars of Missouri, Kansas, and Colorado formed the Mid-American Province of Saint Conrad (1977), with a novitiate in Victoria.

At Fink's request, the Holy See divided the diocese in 1887, establishing the Dioceses of Concordia in northwest Kansas under Bishop Richard Scannell (1887–1890) and Wichita, which occupied the southern half of the state, under James O'Reilly (d. 1887), who died before his installation, and who was replaced by Bishop John Joseph Hennessy (1888–1897). The Church of Our Lady of Perpetual Help was made the cathedral in Concordia, and in Wichita, Saint Aloysius church was designated the pro-cathedral until the dedication of the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception (1912). The last Indian raid in Kansas occurred that year and the railroads flourished. Quarantine laws had stopped the cattle trail drives from Texas in 1885, and harsh winters in 1886 and 1887 had disastrous effects on cattle. Land values had risen 400% from 1881-1887, so a crash in 1887 drove many settlers from the land making room for immigrants. These immigrants came largely from around the Great Lakes, especially Illinois and Ohio, and from Germany. Unlike in most other states, women in Kansas were able to vote in municipal, school, and bond elections, and Susanna Medora Salter (1860-1961) served as America's first Woman Mayor in Argonia, Kansas.

Twentieth Century. When Scannell was transferred to Omaha, Bishop Henessey of Wichita was named administrator of Concordia until the 1897 appointment of Thadeus Butler (1833–1897), who died in Rome before his installation. John Francis Cunningham (1898–1919) was then named the second bishop of Concordia. Immigration continued through the turn of the century, bringing more challenges for the Church. As communities grew and moved due to flooding, railroads, or changes in county seats, churches were needed that could hold larger congregations and withstand the Kansas weather. Many of the earlier wooden buildings had since been destroyed by fire, flood, or wind, so new churches were built of stone, many of which remain in use, especially in rural communities.

Father Francis Clement Kelly, pastor of Immaculate Conception parish, Lapeer, Michigan and later Bishop of Oklahoma City and Tulsa (1924–1948), gave a lecture to Catholics at Argonia in southwestern Kansas. The following day, moved by their inability to build a church, he addressed Bishop Hennessy who suggested that he form an extension society to collect money for needy parishes. Therefore, in 1904, Father Kelly established the Catholic Church Extension Society of the United States of America (CCES). One of the society's earliest projects was Saint Anthony's chapel car, a 72-foot railroad car with a chapel that seated 50, sleeping quarters for the missionaries and a porter, a kitchen with refrigerator, and a library. On June 22, 1907, it left Wichita on its first missionary journey stopping first in Wellington, Kansas the following day; Father Tom McKernan (1881–1959) celebrated a Mass at which Bishop Hennessy preached. Those two, along with organist George Hennessey (no relation to the bishop), a representative of the CCES, and a porter traveled throughout the Diocese of Wichita administering the sacraments, praying vespers, and leading various devotions. They made a tour through the South before leaving the chapel car in New Orleans with the CCES. The overwhelming success prompted the Extension Society to construct a second, larger car, but it did not serve in Kansas due to new anti-pass laws which prevented the pass courtesy that the chapel car had previously enjoyed from the railroads.

Due in part to the great demand for wheat in Europe, the 1910s and 1920s were a time of economic prosperity for Kansas. Bishops Thomas F. Lillis (1904–1910) and John Ward (1911–1929) of Leavenworth; Hennessy, and August J. Schwertner (1921–1939) of Wichita; and Cunningham and Francis J. Tief (1921–1938) of Concordia placed great emphasis on education. In addition to the high schools these bishops established throughout the state, Tief founded Marymount College at Salina in 1922, which, four years later, was the first school in the state to offer degrees to women, and Ward founded Saint Mary's College at Leavenworth in 1923.

However prosperous times may have been in the first two decades of the century, the following decade brought disaster. In 1929, the Great Depression reduced the demand for crops while production remained high. The following year brought dust storms in which violent winds at times carried the fertile Kansas soil over 100 miles before dropping it, covering roads, railroad tracks, and farm machinery. Hot summers, cold winters, floods, and grasshopper swarms devastated Kansas' agriculture throughout the 1930s. During the depression, the emphasis on education continued with Bishop Cunningham establishing Saint Joseph's College and Military Academy at Hays in 1931. Bishop Schwertner established 16 religious vacation schools in 1929, with 737 students, and 19 more in 1930, with a total of 1,469 students. He also established religious correspondence schools for children who lived far from a church, and in 1929, the Sisters College, a branch of the University of Wichita, was opened at the cathedral to train teachers, with 129 sisters enrolled. The following year, radio station KFH aired the Catholic Radio Hour to further these educational efforts, and in the 1930s, the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine was begun in all three dioceses.

Expansion and Change. Because of its location on the Missouri River and the presence of railroad lines, Kansas City grew rapidly. As a result, Bishop George Donnelly (1947–1950) moved his see from Leavenworth to Kansas City, Kansas in 1947, shortly after his installation. He made Saint Peter's church his cathedral.

Clyde Cessna (1879-1954), during the winter of 1916-17, and Walter Beech (1891-1951), in 1932, began constructing planes on assembly lines in Wichita, setting the stage for a great turning point in state history. With the entry of the United States into World War II (1939), the demand for military aircraft brought thousands of workers to Wichita from surrounding rural areas and other states; in the 1940s, the population of Wichita grew from 114,966 to 168,279. Further growth came for Wichita with the activation of McConnell Air Force Base in 1951. While at the beginning of World War II there were only eight parishes in the city, by 1960, there were 17. In that same time, only seven parishes were established elsewhere within the 1960 diocesan boundaries, three of which were near the Air Force base. Expansion of Fort Riley infantry camp and Air Force bases in Salina and Walker brought rapid growth to those towns. The Kansas population, and by consequence, the Church, was becoming more and more urban.

As populations grew and shifted, Bishop Frank A. Thill (1938–1957) moved his see from Concordia to the larger Salina where better access to railroads facilitated travel for himself and his priests; he named Sacred Heart church his new cathedral. Bishop Frederick W. Freking (1957-1965) dedicated the current Sacred Heart Cathedral, built in a grain elevator motif, in 1962. Also due to this rapid growth, Bishop Mark K. Carroll of Wichita (1947-1963) petitioned that the Diocese of Wichita be split. The Holy See granted his request and in 1951 established the Diocese of Dodge City with Bishop John B. Franz (1951–1960) its first ordinary. In 1961, Dodge City became the first diocese in the United States and the second in the western hemisphere to honor Mary as its patroness under the title of Our Lady of Guadalupe, and the Cathedral of Our Lady of Guadalupe was dedicated in 2001. A year after the establishment of the Diocese of Dodge City, Kansas was made an ecclesiastical province with Kansas City as its metropolitan see.

Exterior view of cupola of Catholic church with golden dome and cross, Kansas City. (©Kevin R. Morris/CORBIS)

In 1954, Bishop Carroll announced the project he considered to be his "greatest ambition," the establishment of Chaplain Kapaun Memorial High School in Wichita, which he opened two years later. A priest of the Diocese of Wichita from Pilsen, Kansas, Chaplain Emil Kapaun (1916–1951) had served as an army chaplain in both World War II and the Korean Conflict. He died in a prisoner of war camp hospital in Pyoktong, Korea. In 1971, the high school merged with Mount Carmel Academy to form Kapaun Mount Carmel High School. In 1965, Archbishop Hunkeler (1951-1969) opened Savior of the World Minor Seminary with 66 freshmen and 31 sophomores from various dioceses. However, decreasing enrollment and the shortage of priests to serve on its faculty forced Archbishop Ignatius Strecker (1969-1992) to close the seminary in 1987. The facility was then converted into the Savior Pastoral Center. With the rapid cultural changes that came about in the 1950s and 1960s, the dioceses of Kansas felt the need to reevaluate their ministries. Dodge City held its first synod in 1957. Wichita held a synod the following year, its first since 1898, and Salina held its first in 1962. Diocesan Councils of Catholic Women were established in Wichita and Salina in 1958 and in Dodge City in 1962. As the number of priests in all four dioceses decreased in the years following Vatican Council II, new efforts were made to meet the spiritual needs of the faithful. In Salina, in 1975, Bishop Cyril J. Vogel (1965-1979) began "Team Ministry," a group of three priests who together staffed six parishes (though each retained canonical responsibility for two of them). The model was continued, though individual priests were transferred into and out of the team, and eventually, women religious were included, thus initiating their role as "pastoral associates" in the diocese. In Dodge City, Bishop Eugene Gerber (1976–1982) began a permanent diaconate program in 1978 that produced seven deacons, ordained in the winter of 1983-84. Bishop Gilmore (1998-) reestablished the program in 1999, and in December 2000 ordained six Hispanic men. He hoped that they could help the diocese meet the growing demand for Hispanic ministry that arose as Mexican laborers immigrated to the area to work in meat packing plants. In addition, priests have been recruited for ministry in the state from Burma, Vietnam, and the Philippines.

Wichita received international attention in 1991 when the pro-life organization Operation Rescue organized the "Summer of Mercy," a six-week series of demonstrations, rallies, and protests. Operation Rescue leaders arrived in Wichita on July 15 and immediately began protesting in front of Wichita's three abortion clinics by praying, singing, and physically blocking entrances. Those six weeks saw over 2,000 arrests and cost local and county governments over $500,000. The Summer of Mercy culminated on August 24 with a rally at which Bishop Gerber encouraged the 40,000 people present to continue their peaceful efforts against abortion. At the same time, the National Organization for Women held a counter-rally drawing only 5,000 pro-choice advocates. As the counter-rally disbanded, a group calling themselves "Rural America For Life" jammed Wichita traffic for three hours as their tractorcade moved through the city with 300 farm vehicles sporting pro-life signs. The Summer of Mercy breathed new life into the pro-life movement in Wichita, throughout the state, and other parts of the country. The diocese has seen lasting effects as the abortion issue has remained a source of unity, drawing adults and especially youth to greater participation in the life of the Church.

Catholic health care in Kansas has been led by the Sisters of the Sorrowful Mother of the Third Order of Saint Francis, who started Saint Francis Hospital in Wichita in 1889. By 1969, with 860 beds, it had become the second largest Catholic hospital in the nation. In 1995, the hospital merged with Saint Joseph's Hospital, for which the Sister's of Saint Joseph had assumed responsibility in 1925, forming the Via Christi Regional Medical Center with over 1,500 beds at the two campuses.

Since the Second Vatican Council, all four dioceses have put a new emphasis on the universal call to holiness. Bishop Gerber, while in Dodge City, introduced RENEW (1981) to promote family and small group prayer and scripture study. Later, in that same diocese, Bishop Stanley G. Schlarmann (1983-1998) promoted Teens Encounter Christ and the Cursillo movement. Catholics in the diocese participated in Cursillo weekends in Texas beginning in 1962 until 1988 when the first weekend was held in the diocese at Lakin. Though normally conducted in Spanish, the diocese has also held weekends in English. Bishop George K. Fitzsimons (1984–) established a RENEW Office (1985) and an Office of Lay Ministry (1986) for the Diocese of Salina, and Archbishop Strecker directed every parish in the Archdiocese of Kansas City to establish a parish council and finance committee in order to promote lay involvement. The archdiocese also became home to a large number of active Serra Clubs, an international organization that supports vocations.

After being transferred to the Diocese of Wichita in 1982, Bishop Gerber promoted various programs to deepen spirituality among the laity, including Teens Encounter Christ and the Totus Tuus Summer Catechetical Program, which has served all four dioceses of Kansas as well as parishes in Colorado, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Missouri, Georgia, and Wisconsin since its beginning in 1987. Bishop Gerber also made a strong effort to promote Eucharistic devotion, which was enthusiastically received in parishes throughout the diocese. Archbishop Keleher (1992–) did similarly in Kansas City.

Bibliography: The Archdiocese of Kansas City in Kansas, The Archdiocese of Kansas City in Kansas: 150 Years of Faith 1850–2000 (Strasbourg, France 2000). M. P. FITZGERALD S.C.L, Beacon on the Plains (Leavenworth, KS 1939). M. F. LAHEY, Harvest of Faith: History of the Diocese of Salina, 1887–1987 (Dallas, TX). J. M. MOEDER, History of the Diocese of Wichita (1963). I. J. STRECKER, The Church in Kansas 1850–1905: "A Family Story". A. TONNE, The Story of Chaplain Kapaun: Patriot Priest of the Korean Conflict (Emporia, KS 1954). T. WENZL, A Legacy of Faith, A History of the Diocese of Dodge City (Newton, KS 2001).

[D. MARSTALL]

KANSAS CITY, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Metropolitan see embracing 21 counties in the northeastern part of Kansas, an area of 12,524 square miles, with the Dioceses of Dodge City, Salina, and Wichita, all in Kansas, as suffragan sees. The Archdiocese of Kansas City (Kansanopolitana) was established as the Diocese of Leavenworth on May 22, 1877, was changed to Kansas City on May 10, 1947, and it became an archdiocese on Aug. 9, 1952. At the beginning of the 21st century, Catholics comprised about 20 percent of the total population.

Early History. Catholicism in Kansas dates from 1541, when the Coronado expedition arrived, accompanied by the Franciscan Juan de PADILLA, who lost his life while preaching to Native American tribes. In 1820, Sans Nerf, head chief of the Osage, appealed to Bp. Louis William DuBourg of St. Louis to visit or send them missionaries. Rev. Charles de la Croix was sent in 1822. That same year DuBourg went to Washington to ask the U.S. government to subsidize four missionaries whom he proposed to send to the Osages. His proposal was approved by Secretary of War John C. Calhoun, then in charge of Native American affairs, who promised an annual subsidy of $800.

Although the Kickapoo mission, founded in 1835 by Charles Van Quickenborne, SJ, lasted only four years, it became the center from which the two focal missions were later established among the Osages and Pottawatomies. From Osage Mission School, founded by John Schoenmakers, SJ, in 1847, and from St. Mary's Pottawatomie mission, founded by Christian Hoecken, SJ, in 1848, the Jesuits first ministered to surrounding Indian tribes and later sought out scattered white frontiersmen. Their itinerant circuits covered most of Kansas as it is now constituted. As secular priests arrived to assume responsibility for established parishes, the Jesuits gradually withdrew from the mission field. However, the zeal of Fathers John Bax, Paul Ponziglione, Philip Colleton, and Louis Dumortier had opened the frontier to the Catholic Church, making it known and respected not only by Catholics but by non-Catholics also.

The religious of the Sacred Heart, including Mother Phillipine DUCHESNE, opened a school for Native American girls among the Pottawatomies in 1841. The Sisters of Loretto arrived at Osage mission in 1847, to establish the first permanent boarding school on Kansas soil.

At the request of the Seventh Provincial Council of Baltimore, Pius IX, on July 19, 1850, erected the vicariate apostolic of Native American Territory, which included the present states of Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, parts of North and South Dakota west of the Missouri River, Wyoming, Montana, and Colorado. John B. MIÈGE, SJ, professor of moral theology at St. Louis University, was consecrated bishop of Messine and first vicar apostolic of the new jurisdiction. He made St. Mary's mission in Kansas his residence, and the log cabin church there served as his cathedral until August 1855, when he moved to Leavenworth, a promising city in the newly organized Kansas Territory. On horseback or by wagon, Miège visited the Native American villages, military forts, trading posts, and growing towns of his vast mission, which was reduced in size in 1857 when Nebraska was organized into a separate vicariate.

Miège invited the Benedictine and Carmelite fathers, the Benedictine sisters, and the Sisters of Charity, to the mission fields in his vicariate. The Sisters of Charity opened the first orphanage in Kansas (1863) and the first hospital in Leavenworth (1869). Among the first secular priests to enter the apostolate in Kansas were Theodore Heimann, a German priest who later joined the Carmelites, J. H. Defourri from France, and Ambrose T. Butler from Ireland. Daniel Hurley, the first Native American ordained in Kansas (1877), exerted an important influence on the growth of the Church there.

Ecclesiastical Administration. In 1871, Louis M. FINK, OSB, was consecrated bishop of Eucarpia and auxiliary to Bishop Miège, whom he succeeded upon Miège's resignation in 1874. When Leavenworth was elevated to the status of diocese in 1877, Fink administered the entire state of Kansas, which then included 65 priests, 88 churches, three "colleges," four academies, one hospital, one orphanage, and 13 parochial schools with 1,700 pupils. During the next ten years, the building of roads and railroads, generous government land policies, and the settlement of the Native American issue on the frontier attracted immigrants; and Irish, Germans, Belgians, and French established colonies throughout the diocese. The German-Russians who settled in Ellis and Rush counties in the late 1890s left an enviable cultural heritage to the Church in Kansas. Those who worked among them included the Capuchin Fathers, Sisters of St. Agnes, and Sisters of St. Joseph of Concordia.

At Fink's suggestion, the Diocese of Leavenworth was divided and the western section constituted the Dioceses of Concordia and Wichita, Aug. 2, 1887. The areas of the three dioceses were redistributed in 1897 when boundaries were adjusted. Fink continued to administer Leavenworth until his death in 1904, when he was succeeded by Thomas F. Lillis, who was consecrated on Dec. 27, 1904, and governed the see until his transfer to the Diocese of Kansas City, Mo., in 1910. John Ward, consecrated third bishop of Leavenworth on Feb. 22, 1911, ruled until his death in 1929, when his coadjutor, Francis Johannes, succeeded to the see, which he headed until his death in 1937. Paul C. Schulte's administration, begun in 1937, was terminated by his transfer to the Archdiocese of Indianapolis in 1946, when George J. Donnelly succeeded him in Leavenworth. A year later the see was changed to Kansas City where, following Donnelly's death in 1950, Edward J. Hunkeler became successively bishop (1951) and archbishop (1952). When Hunkeler retired in 1969, he was succeeded by Bishop Ignatius J. Strecker, Bishop of Springfield-Cape Girardeau, who was Archbishop of Kansas City from 1969 until his retirement in 1993. In 1993, Bishop James P. Keleher, Bishop of Belleville was installed as Strecker's successor.

Institutional Development. In the expansion of its parochial and secondary school systems, the archdiocese pioneered in the central Catholic high school movement in the U.S. in the early 20th century. Catholic institutions of higher learning in the archdiocese included Donnelly College (Kansas City), St. Mary College (Leavenworth) and Benedictine College (Atchison), established, July 1, 1971, as a merger between St. Benedict's College, directed by the Benedictine monks; and Mt. St. Scholastica College, directed by the Benedictine Sisters.

Bibliography: P. BECKMAN, The Catholic Church on the Kansas Frontier, 1850–1877 (Washington 1943). R. J. BOLLIG, History of Catholic Education in Kansas, 1836–1932 (Washington 1933). Garraghan JMUS. W. W. GRAVES, Life and Letters of Fathers Ponziglione, Schoenmakers and Other Early Jesuits at Osage Mission (St. Paul, Kan. 1916). T. H. KINSELLA, A Centenary of Catholicity in Kansas 1822–1922 (Kansas City 1921). M. E. THOMAS, Footprints on the Frontier (Westminster, Md. 1948). THE ARCHDIOCESE OF KANSAS CITY IN KANSAS, The Archdiocese of Kansas City in Kansas: 150 Years of Faith 1850–2000 (Strasbourg, France 2000).

[M. E. THOMAS/EDS.]

KANSAS CITY-ST. JOSEPH, DIOCESE OF

The Diocese of Kansas City was established Sept. 10, 1880; the Diocese of St. Joseph, March 3, 1868. After some territorial alterations throughout the state of Missouri, the two dioceses were redesignated as the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph (Kansanopolitana-Sancti Joseph), Aug. 29, 1956. It is a suffragan of the Archdiocese of St. Louis.

Early History. The first bishop of St. Joseph was John J. Hogan, who was consecrated Sept. 13, 1868; he was transferred to the new See of Kansas City in 1880, but remained administrator of St. Joseph until 1893. His successors in Kansas City were Thomas F. Lillis (1913–38) and Edwin V. O'Hara (1939–56); Bp. Maurice F. Burke of Cheyenne, Wyo., was transferred to St. Joseph (1893-1923), and was succeeded there by Francis Gilfillan (1923–33) and Charles H. LeBlond (1933–56). On Sept. 11, 1956, Bp. John P. Cody, coadjutor of St. Joseph since 1954, was appointed to succeed O'Hara in the redesignated Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph. Bishop Charles H. Helmsing of Springfield-Cape Girardeau, Mo., became the ordinary of Kansas City-St. Joseph on Jan. 27, 1962, following Cody's transfer (Aug. 10, 1961) to New Orleans, La. Following Helmsing's retirement in 1977, Bishop John J. Sullivan of Grand Island, Nebr. was transferred to Kansas City-St. Joseph on June 27. Upon his retirement on Sept. 9, 1993 he was succeeded by Bishop Raymond J. Boland who was transferred from Birmingham, Alabama.

The earliest Catholics of the diocese were French traders and their Native American wives and children, then German and Irish immigrants. Among the first European families to settle in what is now the site of Kansas City was François and Berenice Chouteau who offered their time and money to build Kansas City's first church, for some time known as "Chouteau's Church." They were instrumental in preserving the faith for themselves and the other members of the small community at the big bend of the Missouri River until they secured a resident priest.

Early clergy included Frs. Charles de la Croix (1822) Anthony Lutz (1828) and various Jesuit missionaries (1827–1875) The first resident priest to serve the area that is now Kansas City was Benedict Roux from Lyons, France, who was sent to St. Louis by the Society for the Propagation of the Faith and then appointed (1833) to the frontier settlement by Bp. Joseph Rosati. The first resident pastor of Independence, Mo., was Bernard Donnelly, who served from 1845 to his death in 1880 as missionary to much of the territory now comprising the diocese. He was pastor of the pioneer parish in Kansas City and was personally responsible for the establishment of the first Catholic school, hospital, orphanage, and cemetery in Kansas City.

Twentieth Century. Following Vatican II, the diocese, under the leadership of Bishop Helmsing was involved in several ecumenical projects, the most significant of which was the signing of a Covenant with the Episcopal Diocese of West Missouri. Further implementation of the Council came under Bishop Sullivan who was interested in lay ministry development. In 1978 the Center for Pastoral Life and Ministry was established for the purpose of preparing a well trained cadre of lay pastoral ministers. (In 1995 the Center' formation program, New Wine, was published by Paulist Press for use throughout the United States.)

In the mid 1960s, mission outreach began with the sending of priests to serve in four parishes in Bolivia all of which were subsequently turned over to indigenous clergy and pastoral workers. Efforts continued with the growth of "sister parish" relationships developed during the last two decades of the 20th century. Delegations traveled to sister parishes in Mexico and Central America for mutual learning, sharing and faith development.

Typical of many dioceses in the 20th century, growth in Catholic population and the establishment of parishes and institutions to serve their needs flourished through the mid 1960s. With the great cultural shifts and racial tensions following this period, many priests, religious and lay leaders were active in promoting civil rights both locally and nationally. Nevertheless, the diocese was not immune from "white flight" from the inner city and the economic hardships developing in rural America necessitating the closure and consolidation of numerous parishes from the 1970s to the early 1990s. In the latter half of the 1990s, the trend changed and several new parishes were established to accommodate the Catholic population.

At the dawn of the 21st century the Catholic population in the diocese numbered about 13 percent of the total population, distributed across 85 parishes and 15 missions. This included a growing presence of Hispanic and Vietnamese Catholics. Among Catholic institutions of higher education are Conception Seminary College (1886), Rockhurst University (1910) and Avila College (1916). The National Catholic Reporter, originally started as a national edition of the diocesan newspaper, is headquartered in Kansas City. The Catholic Key is the diocesan newspaper.

Bibliography: W. J. DALTON, The Life of Father Bernard Donnelly (Kansas City, Mo. 1921). G. J. GARRAGHAN, Catholic Beginnings in Kansas City, Missouri (Chicago 1920); ed., "Selected Letters from the Roux Correspondence, 1833–34," American Catholic Historical Review 4.1 (Washington 1918) 84–100. J. HOGAN, Fifty Years Ago: A Memoir Written in 1898 (Kansas City, Mo. 1907). J. P. O'HANLON, Life and Scenery in Missouri: Reminiscences of a Missionary Priest (Dublin 1890). J. E. ROTHENSTEINER, History of the Archdiocese of St. Louis (St. Louis 1928). J. J. SCHLA-FLY, Light in the Early West (New York 1959); "Birth of Kansas City's Pioneer Church," Missouri Historical Review 44 (1950) 364–372. W. KUENHOF, "Catholic Church Annals in Kansas City, 1800–57," American Catholic Historical Review 3.2 (1917) 326–335.

[J. J. SCHLAFLY/G. M. NOONAN]

Immanuel Kant. (Archive Photos)

KANT, IMMANUEL

German philosopher of outstanding ability and influence; b. Königsberg, East Prussia, April 22, 1724; d. there, Feb. 12, 1804. Kant's father was a harness maker of ability. The spiritual climate of his family was that of orthodox Lutheranism intermingled with pietistic elements. Kant himself never traveled farther than the province of Königsberg; he left the city but seldom, and then only for short stays in the country. He began his graduate studies in 1740 at the University of Königsberg and earned his doctorate in philosophy there in 1755. His Habilitationsschrift at the university was a work on the first principles of metaphysics. He remained an instructor until 1770, when he was appointed ordinary professor of logic and metaphysics. Kant was popular and much esteemed as a professor at the university; after 1781, in fact, he came to be recognized as one of the most famous men of his time. His way of life was always simple and rigorously ordered; he spent his days working seriously and with a sense of duty that may be characterized as stoic. Although he had no family of his own, he had the inclination and the time for sociability, and in spite of a weak physical constitution he lived to old age.

Development and Works. The line development of Kant's philosophical activity may be seen in his works.

There is a clear contrast between two periods: from the years 1769/1770 and on his precritical thought gradually gave way to his critical philosophy. During the precritical period Kant mainly followed the thought patterns of the rationalist Enlightenment, proceeding along the paths traced by G. W. LEIBNIZ and C. WOLFF. At the same time he somehow transcended this movement by taking into account the irrationalistic philosophy of emotions that he had learned from the work of J. J. ROUSSEAU. Again, he manifested strong interest in mathematics and the natural sciences; here he had high regard for Sir Isaac Newton, whom he considered his master. Chief among the works of this period are his Natural History and Theory of the Heavens (Königsberg 1755; tr. W. Hastie in Kant's Cosmogony, Glasgow 1900) and Der einzig mögliche Beweisgrund zu einer Demonstration des Daseins Gottes (Königsberg 1763). In the latter work he attempts to develop a proof of God's existence that is completely a priori. This proof gives a new foundation for causal thinking and thus develops the true sense of the cosmological and teleological proof of God's existence. However, the rational surface current lost some of its force because of the irrational undercurrent. The following words are indicative of this trend: "It is absolutely necessary to convince oneself of the existence of God; but it is not equally necessary to demonstrate it." This formulation already contains a foreboding of the critical period.

In the second phase of Kant's philosophical development, the irrational element gains the upper hand and rational metaphysics disappears. As Kant himself expresses it, he was roused from his "dogmatic slumber" through Hume's remarks on the law of causality. D. HUME maintained that the necessity that, according to traditional metaphysics, links the effect to its cause and ultimately leads to the first cause cannot be inferred either from the connection of concepts (a priori) or from experience (a posteriori). This position was taken up by Kant, who extended the argument to all necessary connections between concepts and, in so doing, raised the general question as to the possibility of experience and science and, above all, of metaphysics. Kant endeavored to solve this problem in his main work, the Critique of Pure Reason (Riga 1781, 2d ed. 1787; tr. N. K. Smith, 2d ed., London 1933). The Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics (Riga 1783; tr. P. Carus, rev. L. W. Beck, New York 1950) gives a short introduction and a synthetical presentation of this work. To the investigation of the theoretical realm (the field of knowing) Kant added the study of the practical realm (the field of moral action). Thus his main ethical work was titled the Critique of Practical Reason (Riga 1788; tr. L. W. Beck, Chicago 1949); three years previously, as a precursor to this, Kant had published his Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (Riga 1785;

tr. H. J. Paton, London 1950). His Critique of Judgment (Berlin 1790; tr. J. H. Bernard, 2d ed. London 1931) is intimately connected with the two great critiques just mentioned. It deals with the faculty that plays an intermediary role between knowing and willing and that he identifies as judgment and feeling in one; its contents show that it deals with aesthetics and critical teleology. To the critique of religion Kant devoted his Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (Königsberg 1793; tr. T. M. Greene and H. H. Hudson, Glasgow 1934). His Metaphysics of Ethics (Königsberg 1797; tr. J. W. Semple, 3d ed. Edinburgh 1886) deals with problems of ethics and the philosophy of law. Finally, the Opus postumum (Tübingen 1920, 1938) gives a valuable glimpse into Kant's ultimate development and into the transition from his thought to German IDEALISM.

Philosophy of Criticism. Criticism is Kant's original achievement; it identifies him as one of the greatest thinkers of mankind and as one of the most influential authors in contemporary philosophy. But it is important to understand what Kant means by criticism, or critique. In a general sense, the term refers to the cultivation of reason by way of "the secure path of a science" (B xxx). More particularly, its use is not negative but positive, a fact that finds expression in the famous sentence: "I have therefore found it necessary to deny knowledge in order to make room for faith" (B xxx). Correspondingly, its negative use consists in not allowing oneself to "venture with speculative reason beyond the limits of experience" (B xxiv). Thus criticism removes the decisive hindrance that threatens to supplant or even to destroy the "absolutely necessary practical employment of pure reason . . . in which it [pure reason] inevitably goes beyond the limits of sensibility" (B xxv). Accordingly, the critique guarantees a secure path for science by confining speculative reason to its own limits and by giving practical reason the complete use of its rights—rights that thus far had not been recognized.

Place in the History of Ideas. Kant, being confronted with the two extremes of RATIONALISM and EMPIRICISM, set for himself the task of creating a synthesis between them. As he saw it, rationalism operates in the sphere of innate ideas, with their analytical and therefore aprioristic necessity; this necessity, however, is not based on experience and consequently does not apply to reality itself. On the other hand, empiricism starts completely from experience and thus (it seems) from reality, but it arrives only at a posteriori and therefore synthetic statements that lack necessity. Kant sought to unite the concept and experience; he sought a necessity that extends to the order of objective reality and an order of objective reality that in itself contains necessity. This interpenetration finds its expression in judgments that are a priori and yet synthetic, on the one hand, and synthetic and yet a priori, on the other. Kant thought that he could attain this goal only by way of a "changed point of view" (B xvi) referred to as a "Copernican revolution." On the supposition, thus far considered to be valid, that "all our knowledge must conform to objects" (ibid.), a priori judgments that enlarge man's knowledge synthetically are impossible. Here one needs the opposite assumption, according to which "we suppose that objects must conform to our knowledge" (ibid.); only in this way are we able "to have knowledge of objects a priori, determining something in regard to them prior to their being given" (ibid.). Consequently, "we can know a priori of things only what we ourselves put into them" (B xviii); this means that the process of knowing a priori "has to do only with appearances, and must leave the thing-in-itself as indeed real per se, but as not known by us" (B xx). Since, however, all of metaphysics aims at the thing-in-itself, speculative reason, by which, as has been said, we "never transcend the limits of possible experience" (B xix), is unable to rise to the metaphysical level.

Critique of Knowledge. Kant perfects his criticism of knowledge in the Critique of Pure Reason, which moves from transcendental aesthetics to transcendental logic; and, within the latter, from transcendental analytics to transcendental dialectics. See TRANSCENDENTAL (KANT-IAN). Throughout, the investigation revolves around the synthetic a priori judgments that have already been mentioned; these are synthetic insofar as they extend knowledge through a predicate that is not contained in the concept of the subject; they are a priori insofar as they have a necessary and universal validity, and this previous to any actual experience of individual cases. All of this, however, leads to the question: "How are a priori synthetic judgments possible?" (B 19). To put it more accurately, these judgments are questioned as to the conditions for their possibility; such conditions, on the terms of the Copernican revolution, can be found only in the subject. Kant here develops his transcendental method, a method by which he transcends a priori knowledge and arrives at the level of the conditions for its possibility, which are already marked out in the subject.

Mathematics and natural science, for him, have already followed the certain path of science. Thus, as he points out in detail, they contain a number of synthetic a priori judgments that are valid without further discussion. Consequently, one has to prove not that they are valid, but how their accepted validity is possible. To explain this, Kant goes back to the distinction between matter and form in human knowledge. The matter coincides with sensation; this is "the effect of an object upon the faculty of representation, so far as we are affected by it" (A 19); only in this way "can the object be given to us"

(ibid.). Matter, taken a posteriori as unordered multiplicity, has as its opposite complement form, "in which alone the sensations can be posited" and connected "in certain relationships" (A 20); this form must "lie ready for the sensations a priori in the mind" (ibid.). At this point one must explain the three domains of a priori forms.

First is the region of sense knowledge. This is the field of "receptivity" by which "we are affected by the objects" (A 19); "objects are given to us by means of sensibility, and it alone yields us intuitions" (ibid.). Now, that intuition is called empirical "which is in relation to the object through sensation" (A 20) and which therefore is based on received impressions. By way of contrast, a pure intuition is that in which "there is nothing that belongs to sensation" (ibid.); it is "the pure form of sensibility" (ibid.) and is actuated in the mind a priori, even without a given object. Correspondingly, transcendental aesthetics is "the science of all principles of a priori sensibility" (A 21); but these are two, "namely, space and time" (A 22), and they are the conditions for the possibility of the a priori synthetic judgments of mathematics. Space is more particularly the form of the external sense faculties, i.e., "the subjective condition of sensibility, under which alone outer intuition is possible for us" (A 26). Time, on the other hand, is "the form of inner sense, that is, of the intuition of ourselves and of our inner state" (A 33). Again, time is "the formal a priori condition of all appearances whatsoever," because the external representations also "belong, in themselves, as determinations of the mind, to our inner state" (A 34). To space and time is ascribed an "empirical reality" (A 35), that is, an objective validity, as the conditions that alone enable man to perceive objects; in the same way they have a "transcendental ideality" (A 36) insofar as they are "merely conditions of our sensibility" and cannot, in any way, be ascribed to "things as they are in themselves" (ibid.). Thus, it is true, they "make a priori synthetic propositions possible," but these "apply to objects only in so far as objects are viewed as appearances, and do not present things as they are in themselves" (A 39).

Second is the area of reason. As "spontaneity [in the production] of concepts," reason cooperates with the sense faculties, which are "receptivity for impressions"; through these impressions the object is "given," whereas through reason it is "thought" (A 50). Knowledge can arise "only through their union," for "thoughts without content are empty, and intuitions without concepts are blind" (A 51). Everything depends on the pure concepts; in these "there is no mingling of sensation," and they concern only "the form of the thought of an object in general" (A 50–51). Thus transcendental analytics consists in the "dissection of the faculty of understanding itself" insofar as, in this faculty, the pure concepts as in "their birthplace," have been located and prepared in an a priori way (A 65-66). It is thus that the synthetic a priori judgments of natural science are explained with regard to their possibility. Here the question is how to seek pure concepts on the basis of a single principle and how to "determine in an a priori manner their systematic completeness" (A 67). Because reason reaches only to "the mediate knowledge of an object" (A 68) or judgments, it constitutes "a faculty of judgment" (A 69). The elementary forms of judgment are outlined in it; from the point of view of "the mere form of understanding" they can be classified "under four heads, each of which contains three moments' (A 70). Coordinated to these are the 12 "pure concepts of understanding" (e.g., substance, causality, etc.) "which apply a priori to objects of intuition in general" (A 79); as "the true, primary concepts of the pure understanding" they are called "the categories" (A 81). To the process of educing them is linked transcendental deduction, which shows that the categories are "conditions of the possibility of experience and are therefore valid a priori for all objects of experience" (B 161). However, objects must be understood not as things in themselves, but as "appearances in space and time" that are determined by the categories (B 168–169). "Consequently, there can be no a priori knowledge, except of objects of possible experience" (B 166). Subject to the same limitations are the principles that teach reason (being the potency for judging) how "to apply to appearances the concepts of understanding" (A 132). To these principles belong the "principle of succession in time in accordance with the law of causality: All alterations take place in conformity with the law of the connection of cause and effect" (A 189, B 232).

Third is the study of the intellect, which is the concern of transcendental dialectics. Here the synthetic a priori judgments of metaphysics are examined as to their possibility. The question is not how they are possible, but simply whether they are possible. Kant's answer is that they are not. Here his concern is to show the "transcendental illusion" (A 297); it is a "natural and inevitable illusion" (A 298), and thus it has been able to lead metaphysics astray until now. The critique must be applied to "transcendental principles" that, in contrast to "immanent" principles, lead man to go beyond "the limits of possible experience" (A 295). At the basis of these principles one finds "transcendental ideas," designed by reason in an a priori and necessary fashion; "no object adequate to the transcendental idea can ever be found within experience"; "for they view all knowledge gained in experience as being determined by an absolute totality of conditions," by "an absolute whole" (A 327), or even by "an unconditioned [reality]" (A 323), whereas "no experience is unconditioned" (A 326). From the different ways of drawing conclusions, Kant gathers that there are three and only three ideas, namely, the soul as "the absolute (unconditioned) unity of the thinking subject," the world as "the absolute unity of the series of conditions of appearance," and God as "the absolute unity of the condition of all objects of thought in general" (A 334). These ideas "never allow of any constitutive employment . . . as supplying concepts of certain objects" (A 644). In other words, the objects that are outlined in these ideas are never recognized through them; for ideas that go as far as the thing-in-itself remain empty, because the intellectual intuition that complements them and reaches out into the realm of the thing-in-itself has not been given to man. Or, one should say, man's "nature is so constituted that our intuition can never be other than sensible" (A 51). On the other hand, these same ideas have an "indispensably necessary, regulative employment" insofar as they put before the intellect the "form of a whole of knowledge" and in this way "determine a priori for every part its position and relation to the other parts" (A 644–645). This delimitation of their use is opposed by the "sophistications" that rise "from the very nature of reason" (A 339) and claim to form a bridge from ideas to their corresponding objects. The four paralogisms intend to proceed "from the transcendental concept of the subject" to a science "concerning the nature of our thinking being" (A 340, 345). Just as "rational psychology" (A 342) is impossible, so also is "rational cosmology" (A 408). When the latter is attempted as "the absolute totality . . . of conditions for any given appearance" (A 340), reason is entangled in the four antinomies (e.g., the limitation vs. the boundlessness of the universe in space and time). In like fashion, there can be no rational theology (A 631); for all three kinds of proof for the existence of God are inconclusive (A 590). "The physico-theological proof . . . rests upon the cosmological proof, and the cosmological upon the ontological [proof]" (A 630), which itself suffers from an illegitimate transition from the realm of concepts to the realm of reality. What is left of God is only the "transcendental ideal" as the "concept of all reality" and "the complete determination of things," "without requiring that all this reality be objectively given and be itself a thing" (A 580).

Critique of Morality. Whereas the theoretical reason, or strict knowledge, can use ideas only in a regulative manner and concepts only within the realm of the PHE-NOMENA (in contrast to the NOUMENA), practical reason, or morality, goes on to the objective use of ideas and to extending the application of concepts to the noumena. Here Kant finds a basic fact, a given reality beyond any doubt: the CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE as the "fundamental law of pure practical reason." It is: "So act that the maxim of your will could always hold at the same time as the principle of a universal legislation" (Critique of Practical Reason; ed. Cassirer, 5:35). This "synthetic proposition a priori" is not based on "any pure or empirical intuition"; but it presents itself as something that "forces itself upon us" (36). In it the "pure will" is conceived as "determined by the mere form of the law" (35); on the other hand, "the material of volition," being the "object of a desire," takes away morality (38). As opposed to this "heteronomy," one finds "autonomy" to be "the sole principle of all moral laws" (38), and in this principle pure reason is "originally legislative" (36). Moral acting is not only conditionally, viz, "to make a desired effect possible," but it is "unconditionally commanded" (36). Therefore, it is "not limited to human beings" but extends to all rational beings, even "the Infinite Being" (37); however, it presents itself only to man as an "obligation" whose fulfillment brings him closer to the holiness of the Divine Being.

By reason of the unconditional or absolute quality of the moral law, pure reason is authorized to make "an extension in its practical use which is not possible to it in its speculative use" (57). In this way Kant arrives at the postulates, which are not "theoretical dogmas but presuppositions of necessarily practical import." They do not expand "speculative knowledge, but they give objective reality to the ideas of speculative reason" (143); here the pure will shows itself as "belonging to a pure intelligible world" (57). "These postulates are those of immortality, of freedom affirmatively regarded (as the causality of a being so far as he belongs to the intelligible world), and of the existence of God'' (143). They evoke assent not through insight, but through "pure practical faith." One says: I will those things that correspond to the postulates to be reality, "I stand by this and will not give up this belief" (155). At this point "my interest inevitably determines my judgment because I will not yield anything of this interest" (ibid.). Thus the practical metaphysics of faith, for which room had been made by abolishing the theoretical metaphysics of pure knowledge, is shown by Kant to be the center of gravity in human thought.

Critique of Aesthetic Experience. This critique deals with the transition that constitutes the ultimate unity of reason. Here the faculty of judgment forms "a middle between understanding and reason" (Critique of Judgment; ed. Cassirer, 5:245). In like manner "the feeling of pleasure or displeasure" stands "between the faculties of knowledge and desire" (ibid.). The reflective (as opposed to the determining) power of judgment rises from "the particular" to "the universal" (248). In this it is guided by the a priori principle of "finality," which, however, reflects only on the "nexus of phenomena in nature," and should not be ascribed to nature itself (249). Finality is also found in the fact that nature is in keeping with the "need of understanding" to discover repeatedly the comprehensive principles in the apparently "heterogeneous laws" and phenomena of nature (255–256). The fulfillment of this need gives "a very appreciable pleasure"; even "the feeling of pleasure . . . is determined by a ground which is a priori and valid for all men: and that, too, merely by virtue of the reference of the object to our faculty of cognition" without considering the practical finality attached to the faculty of desire (256).

More particularly, one must distinguish the aesthetic judgment from the teleological judgment (262). The first consists in "the faculty of estimating formal finality (otherwise called subjective) by the feeling of pleasure or displeasure"; the latter refers to "the faculty of estimating the real finality (objective) of nature by understanding and reason" (262). More precisely, "the aesthetic representation of finality" is present when the representation of an object is "immediately coupled with the feeling of pleasure' (258). But this pleasure is caused through the fact that "the conformity of the object to the cognitive faculties" is "brought into play in the reflective judgment" and establishes a harmonious interplay, particularly between the imagination and the intellect (258-259). The object with whose representation "pleasure is also judged to be combined necessarily" is called beautiful; "the faculty of judging by means of such a pleasure (and so also with universal validity)" is taste (259). Accordingly, "the beautiful is that which, apart from a concept, pleases universally" (289) or "is cognized as object of a necessary delight" (311), and this "apart from any interest" (279) or "apart from the representation of an end" (306), which would appeal not to feeling but to de-

Critique of Religion. According to Kant, religion consists in the "recognition of all duties as divine commands" (Critique of Practical Reason, 140); this, however, does not mean that they are "arbitrary and contingent ordinances of a foreign will" (ibid.). He who fulfills the obligation out of consideration of God, out of "fear or hope," falls into a heteronomy that "would destroy the entire moral worth of the actions" (ibid.). However, the moral law orders man to strive after "the highest possible good," and one must follow this law without self-interest and purely as an obligation (ibid.). This highest good includes "the greatest degree of moral perfection" and the "greatest happiness" corresponding to it (141). But because only "a holy and beneficent Author of the world" is able to guarantee such a correspondence, it is possible for one to hope for the highest good only when his will is in accord with God's will (ibid.). It is only in this sense that obligations, though they are "essential laws of any free will, . . . must [still] be regarded as commands of the Supreme Being' (140). Religion is ultimately 'the disposition, accompanying all our actions, to perform these as though they were being executed in the service of God' (Religion within the Limits of Pure Reason; ed. Cassirer, 6:346). All religious activity (e.g., prayer) reduces to this; everything that goes beyond it is characterized by Kant as "a superstitious illusion" (345). Only such a religion based on reason and restricted to the field of morals is permitted; only this constitutes the true core of the Christian religion of revelation, which degenerates into "practical superstition" and "clericalism" (325–327) when it pretends to be more than it is.

Critical Appraisal. With the ability of a genius, Kant aspired to create a grand synthesis between sense knowledge and intellectual knowledge and between man's theoretical and practical activity. He developed his transcendental method in order to achieve this synthesis. In this undertaking he was able to attain noteworthy results: the unity of human cognition, its necessity and universality, the significance of the a priori, the absoluteness of the moral imperative, the foundation of existence in the metaphysical order, and the transcendental problematics. Yet Kant's synthesis, taken as a whole, failed. It did so because he remained too much subject to the limitations of his own historical situation and, therefore, was not able to go deep enough and penetrate to ultimate depths.

From the point of view of M. Heidegger, one may summarize Kant's failure in his being unaware of BEING. How much Kant succumbs to this is clearly shown by his distinction between reason and intellect. The reason is rightly considered the faculty that, by way of fundamental concepts or categories, permeates sensible phenomena; this is equivalent to the ratio of St. THOMAS AQUINAS and its corresponding QUIDDITY, or quidditas rei materialis. Kant's intellect, on the other hand, reaches out into the metaphysical realm with its three ideas, but is never able really to penetrate it. The basis for this restriction lies in intellect's having lost, for Kant, its proper orientation toward being as all-inclusive—an orientation that enables man to enter the metaphysical realm in the first place. For St. Thomas, on the contrary, intellectus is intrinsically ordered to ens, which is grounded in esse. In this connection, Kant considers intellect as completely excluded from any form of intellectual INTUITION, whereas for St. Thomas intellectus participates in such intuition through its grasp of being, but without having it as such. Consequently, in St. Thomas's view man enters into the realm of the absolute on the theoretical level; here he is in communication with all other intelligent beings, including the divine mind. Kant relegates all this to the practical realm alone.

The transcendental method can be carried through in a way that goes beyond Kant himself to arrive at being as the primary condition for the possibility of human knowledge, and even of all human action. This basic idea has far-reaching consequences. The proof for God's existence is somehow precontained in the orientation of intellect toward being; thus does theoretical metaphysics become possible. Being, too, enables a priori knowledge to reveal rather than conceal, as it must do for Kant. Again, the formal objects of the soul's faculties for St. Thomas correspond to Kant's forms; thus knowledge through categories is not restricted to that which is "for man," but opens up to that which is "in itself." Finally, the absoluteness of the moral imperative also receives its foundation in being, and thus theory and practice are brought into harmony and unity.

See Also: KANTIANISM; NEO-KANTIANISM; CRITICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL; AGNOSTICISM; UNDERSTANDING (INTELLECTUS).

Bibliography: Works. Gesammelte Schriften, 22 v. (Berlin 1902-42), critical ed. sponsored by the Prussian Academy of Sciences. Immanuel Kants Werke, ed. E. CASSIRER, 11 v. (Berlin 1912–18). General studies. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946-1963) v.6. J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). S. VANNI ROVIGHI, Introduzione allo studio di K. (2d ed. Milan 1951). M. CAMPO, La genesi del criticismo kantiano (Varese 1953-). V. MA-THIEU, La filosofia trascendentale e l'"Opus postumum" di K. (Turin 1958), H. J. DE VLEESCHAUWER, La Déduction transcendantale dans l'oeuvre de K, 3 v. (Antwerp 1934–37); L'Évolution de la pensée kantienne (Paris 1939). K. VORLÄNDER, I. Kant: Der Mann und das Werk, 2 v. (Leipzig 1924). M. WUNDT, Kant als Metaphysiker (Stuttgart 1924), J. MARÉCHAL, Le Point de départ de la métaphysique, v.3 (3d ed. Paris 1944) v.5 (2d ed. 1949). Catholic and fundamental. M. AEBI, K.s Begründung der "Deutschen Philos" (Basel 1947). G. MARTIN, I. Kant: Ontologie und Wissenschaftstheorie (Cologne 1951). Tulane University, A Symposion on K. (New Orleans 1954). J. B. LOTZ, ed., Kant und die Scholastik heute (Pullach 1955). H. HEIMSOETH, Studien zur Philosophie I. Kants (Cologne 1956). F. DELEKA, I. Kant: Hist.-krit. Interpretation der Hauptschriften (Heidelberg 1963). Theoretical philosophy. M. HEIDEGGER, K. und das Problem der Metaphysik (Bonn 1929); Die Frage nach dem Ding (Tübingen 1962). C. NINK, Kommentar zu K.s Kritik der reinen Vernunft (Frankfurt 1930). H. J. PATON, K.s Metaphysics of Experience (New York 1936). F. GRAYEFF, Deutung und Darstellung der theoretischen Philosophie K.s (Hamburg 1951). H. W. CASSIRER, Kant's First Critique (New York 1954). R. P. WOLFF, Kant's Theory of Mental Activity (Cambridge, Mass. 1963). Practical philosophy. G. KRÜGER, Philosophie und Moral in der kantischen Kritik (Tübingen 1931). R. DAVAL, La Métaphysique de Kant (Paris 1951). A. R. DUNCAN, Practical Reason and Morality (London 1957). H. J. PATON, The Categorical Imperative (3d ed. London 1959). J. SCHMUCKER, Die Ursprünge der Ethik Kants in seinen vorkritischen Schriften und Reflektionen (Meisenheim 1961) Catholic and fundamental. Aesthetics. W. BIEMEL, Die Bedeutung von Kants Begründung der Ästhetik für die Philosophie der Kunst (Cologne 1959). Philosophy of religion. J. HASENFUSS, Die Grundlagen der Religion bei Kant (Würzburg 1927), Catholic. B. JANSEN, Die Religionsphilosophie Kants (Berlin 1929), Catholic.

[J. B. LOTZ]

KANTIANISM

The philosophy of criticism developed by I. KANT and his followers. Since Kant's thought is exposed in the article devoted to him, this article concentrates on his first followers and opponents, the impact of his thought on his contemporaries, and its later influences on German idealism, neo-Kantianism, and neoscholasticism.

Characteristics. Kantianism was influenced by the preceding movements of EMPIRICISM, RATIONALISM, and the philosophy of the ENLIGHTENMENT, and through them was led to formulate a profound synthesis of their views. In the process, it limited the speculative or theoretical reason to the area of possible experience. Accordingly, it conceived human knowledge as arriving at necessary and universally valid judgments by way of a priori forms, but it held that these judgments refer only to the appearances or PHENOMENA. The NOUMENA or things-inthemselves were conceived as remaining hidden, although their reality was never questioned by Kant. Another conclusion drawn from this was the impossibility of a metaphysics in the Kantian theory of knowledge; the ideas that reason forms when conceptualizing metaphysical reality have only a regulative function with respect to the knowledge of phenomena and have no constitutive or objective meaning. Thus man is not able to grasp the corresponding objects of these ideas.

In Kantianism, the practical reason or the purely rational will has a greater role to play than the theoretical reason. This role expresses itself in a CATEGORICAL IM-PERATIVE that is plainly unconditional and thus absolute. The imperative is exclusively determined by the form of the law that the pure will gives itself in virtue of its autonomy (see ETHICAL FORMALISM). For the Kantian, he who lets himself be guided by concretely defined motives lapses into a heteronomy that destroys the ethical nature of his action. Because of its indeterminateness the ethical imperative embraces not only man but in general all intelligent beings. Consequently, it opens the way to the intelligible world, to the noumena and the thing-in-itself. This is the basis for the possibility of a practical metaphysics that rests upon a belief required by ethical considerations but that does not increase man's speculative knowledge.

The term criticism is often used as a synonym for Kantianism (see CRITICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL). But usually criticism is taken in the more strict sense of a critical theory of knowledge; it represents only the first and basic part of Kantianism, according to Kant's own words: "Criticism constitutes rather the preliminary organization necessary for arriving at a solid, scientific metaphysics" (B xxxvi). Its opposite is DOGMATISM, wherein pure reason develops itself "without a previous criticism of its own capacity" (B xxxv). In the fullest sense of the word, Kantianism designates not only the philosophical work of Kant himself but also the further development of the intellectual movement he started. This development led to a series of different interpretations because of the intrinsic tensions that existed within Kant's own thought.

Early Adherents. Among the early proponents of Kantianism the most important was K. L. Reinhold (1758–1823), who introduced Kant's thought to a wide audience; his popular Briefe über die kantische Philosophie (1786–87) were particularly effective, and through his efforts Jena became a center of studies on Kant. In his Versuch einer neuen Theorie des menschlichen Vorstellungsvermögens (Jena 1789) he applied himself to the dualism of sense knowledge and reason, both of which stood side by side in Kant's work without further reduction. Reinhold looked for their common origin and thought this to be the imagination. Thus he prepared the way for J. G. Fichte.

- S. Maimon (1753–1800) focused attention on Kant and contributed heavily to a further cultivation of his thought with some penetrating and profound works. He rejected the thing-in-itself as a delusion or fiction of consciousness; multiplicity as given corresponds, for him, to the inner capacity of human thought itself and therefore need not be reduced to some thing independent of mind.
- J. S. Beck (1761–1840) likewise turned against the thing-in-itself. When Kant affirms that things affect the subject, for Beck this must be understood as a purely didactic accommodation to dogmatically inclined readers. Thus both Maimon and Beck explained Kant's thought in a one-sided, idealistic way while suppressing its realistic elements.

In contrast to these authors C. G. Bardili (1761–1808) developed his abstruse "rational realism" that prepared the way for the ideas of F. W. J. Schelling and G. W. F. Hegel by reducing the real world and the ideal world to their unity in the ABSOLUTE. Kantianism was defended also by many scholars in Holland, France, and England.

Opponents. The critical discussion that had already started among the followers of Kant was brought to a focus by his opponents. Among the independent critics must be included C. Garve (1742–98). As early as 1782 Garve published a review of the first edition of the Critique of Pure Reason, which he interpreted in the sense of Berkeley's idealism and came to overlook its realistic elements. In the second edition Kant replied to this by bringing out more clearly the realistic features of his work. Garve also furnished a critical study of Kantian moral philosophy that still merits the attention of scholars.

Under the inspiration of J. Locke and of G. W. Leibniz, D. Tiedemann (1748–1803) defended the objective validity of man's knowledge of reality, and in this opposed himself to Kant. J. A. Eberhard (1739–1809) also stood out among the followers of Leibniz; it was against his attacks that Kant wrote a special essay "on a discovery that would make it possible to dispense with every new criticism of pure reason on the basis of an older one" (Königsberg 1790).

The skeptic G. E. Schulze (1761–1833) argued in a penetrating way against Kantianism. In his Aenesidemus (Helmstädt 1792), he attacked the Kantian thing-in-itself on the grounds that the very affection that it produces, which Kantians regard as necessary, is impossible in the terms of their philosophy. Besides, he criticized the fact that Kant attributed logical validity to subjective forms; from this, for him, Hume's PSYCHOLOGISM would be the only reasonable consequent.

Influence on Contemporaries. Under this heading are discussed thinkers who did important intellectual work on their own and in so doing came into dispute with Kantian doctrines.

J. G. HAMANN, who was on friendly terms with Kant and with J. G. Herder and F. H. Jacobi, rejected the dualism Kant assumed to exist in the source of human knowledge. This dualism, for Hamann, bespeaks an untenable one-sidedness that is the product of reason and its distinctions; moreover, it is refuted by language, through which reason attains its own sensible existence. Intellectual knowledge should be replaced by the individual certainty of faith, which enables the mysteries of Christianity to become a living experience.

F. H. JACOBI clearly analyzed the difficulty inherent in Kant's doctrine of the thing-in-itself. By holding that the affection of the senses results from the thing-in-itself, Kantians apply the relation of cause and effect (which, according to Kantianism, is valid only within the world of phenomena) to the realm of the thing-in-itself. In virtue of sense perception Jacobi himself was immediately convinced of the existence of real things. With Kant he assumed that the theoretical reason is confined to finite and experiential things. While rejecting the Kantian doctrine of the metaphysical postulates, he defended an immediate perception of transcendental reality; this he called faith and claimed it is achieved by reason. Kant took a position against this view in his treatise Was heisst, sich im Denken orientieren? (Berlin 1786).

J. G. HERDER did not do justice to Kant in his bitter Metakritik (Riga 1799) of the transcendental analytics. Against Kant's gross dualism of matter and form and of nature and freedom, he asserted their essential unity and gradual development. Language, for him, testifies strongly against the apriorism of Kant; space and time are concepts derived from experience.

J. C. F. Schiller studied Kant's major works and particularly the Critique of Judgment. Under Kant's influence he wrote his important work Über Anmut und Würde (Leipzig 1793); in this he attacked the heart of the Kantian doctrine on duty because it could lead to a gloomy asceticism. Moral dignity, for him the surging of the spirit above nature, is complemented by moral grace, which is the harmony between spirit and nature, between duty and inclination. In opposition to this Kant observed that along such lines EUDAEMONISM could easily creep into moral doctrine.

J. W. GOETHE occupied himself especially with the Critique of Judgment and admitted that it gave him the philosophical basis for his "creations, actions, and thoughts." He praised the work for giving its due both to nature and to art.

Later Influences. The philosophical work of Kant remained so fundamental for succeeding thinkers that not one who took his work seriously could avoid discussing it. Every competent mind thus felt Kant's influence, either positively or negatively, and the stimulating effect of his work has not yet been exhausted.

German Idealism. Kantianism was further developed, overcome, and at first supplanted by the vast speculative systems of German IDEALISM; one may call this an "elevating process" (in Hegel's terminology a Vorgang des Aufhebens) wherein, of course, not all the basic elements of Kantian thought were preserved, e.g., the finite character of human knowledge. Idealism received its decisive stimulus from the tensions that were typical in Kant's thought. The search went beyond sense knowledge and reason, appearance and the thing-in-itself, experiential and metaphysical reality, the theoretical and the practical, and nature and freedom toward an underlying, unifying principle that was ultimately found in absolute reality. From a methodological point of view this evolving idealism should be characterized as transcendental, insofar as it refers to Kant's transcendental problematics that he himself projected into the metaphysical realm. See TRANSCENDENTAL (KANTIAN). Its essentially dialectical method may also have been anticipated in Kant, particularly in the "logical requirements and criteria of all knowledge of things in general" (B 114) where the three steps of unity, multiplicity, and reduction of multiplicity to unity emerge. More specific details may be seen in considering the three principal authors of German idealism, viz, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel.

J. G. FICHTE intended merely to bring Kant's basic insight to its logical and systematical conclusions; but Kant's idea differed sharply from Fichte's Wissenschafts-lehre. More precisely, Fichte started with the practical reason and tried to develop this through transcendental deduction and also to derive from it the theoretical reason with its categories. The thing-in-itself, for him, coincides with the pure Ego or subject and its moral activity, and from this all else (except God) results. This amounts to an idealism that eliminates the realistic element proper to Kant's thought.

F. W. J. SCHELLING aimed in a conscious and determined way at completing and thus surpassing Kant; to this effect his thought went back beyond that of Fichte. Following the example of Kant's three Critiques, he divided his transcendental philosophy into a theoretical and a practical philosophy, the unity of which he perfected with his doctrines on the finality of nature and of art. In doing so Schelling gave new emphasis to the Critique of Judgment. Against the background of the identity of nature and spirit, it is art that constitutes the highest union of freedom and necessity. Schelling departed from Kant not only as to content but also as to method by raising intellectual INTUITION to the status of being fundamental to philosophical activity.

G. W. F. HEGEL focused on theoretical philosophy and therefore put the Critique of Pure Reason in the foreground. His principal objection against Kant was that Kant did not go beyond the intellect, which was unable to reconcile oppositions. Hegel himself believed that he could achieve a comprehensive mediation of antitheses by way of reason; in this way the categories could be expanded beyond the phenomena and raised to the point where absolute reality could manifest itself. As to methodology, Hegel advocated intellectual intuition against Kant and with Schelling, but held that intuition presents itself only in the dialectical movement of the mind, a point on which he differed from Schelling.

Neo-Kantianism. After idealism began to wane, German philosophy lost itself to a large degree in POSITIV-ISM, MATERIALISM, and HISTORICISM. The first signs of renewal came from K. Fischer (1824-1907), E. Zeller (1814-1908), and O. Liebmann (1840-1912), who started the movement back to Kant; each chapter of Liebmann's book ended with the words: "Therefore, one must return to Kant." NEO-KANTIANISM, which was influential for several decades before waning in the 20th century, developed from these endeavors. It emphasized, in a somewhat one-sided way, Kant's theory of knowledge and of science. Basic to this movement was the conviction that the scientific content of reality was exhaustively dealt with by the particular sciences; therefore, the only possible task for philosophy was to develop a theory of science by investigating its nature and presuppositions. The Marburg school restricted its field of investigation more to the natural sciences and arrived in this way at an extreme form of idealism that no longer permits anything to be given in advance, but admits only whatever is produced or established by consciousness (H. Cohen, P. Natorp, and E. CASSIRER). The Baden school, on the other hand, was concerned with the historical sciences of culture and art and developed from this study its theory of values (W. Windelband, H. Rickert, and H. Münsterberg). H. Vaihinger founded the Kantstudien (1896) and the Kantgesellschaft (1904). The metaphysical element in Kant also came gradually into sight as some thinkers sought not to destroy, but to provide a new foundation for, metaphysics in line with Kant's principles (Liebmann, F. Paulsen, and above all M. Wundt). The ontological aspect of Kant's thought was worked out by G. Martin and H. Heimsoeth.

Traces of Kant's continued influence persisted in the PHENOMENOLOGY of E. HUSSERL, particularly in his transcendental reduction and in constituting of essences; in the realism of N. HARTMANN, developed in opposition to neo-Kantianism, and particularly in Hartmann's conception of metaphysics as pure problematics; and finally, in the EXISTENTIALISM of K. Jaspers, especially in the limits ascribed to knowledge and in his metaphysics of philosophical faith.

Neoscholasticism. At first scholastic thinkers adopted a negative attitude toward Kant, seeing him mainly as one who opposed realism, founded idealism, and destroyed the proofs for the existence of God. The scholastic theory of knowledge developed in opposition to Kant's theories; based on realism, it argued for a rational metaphysics. A more positive view of Kantian philosophy asserted itself only gradually; its pioneers were, in France, A. G. SERTILLANGES and A. Valensin and, in Germany, B. Jansen, T. Steinbüchel, and E. Przywara. The real breakthrough, however, was achieved by J. MARÉCHAL, who elaborated Kant's metaphysical theory of cognition and established a lively confrontation with a more profoundly understood THOMAS AQUINAS. In particular, Maréchal, taking over the transcendental problematics and method and perfecting them far beyond Kant, indicated the correlation between Kant's a priori forms and Aquinas's formal objects, and unfolded the dynamism of the human mind. He made use of Aquinas to show that the tendency that for Kant discloses the metaphysical world only at the stage of practical reason is already inherent in theoretical reason. In scholastic circles Maréchal's interpretation of Kant met with much opposition but with even more approval; it opened up a new road that was taken and further extended by many authors, who proposed their own emendations. In this field new suggestions have been offered by M. Heidegger, who considers the Critique of Pure Reason as the foundation of metaphysics. These ideas have been crystallized in the Mélanges Maréchal as well as in Kant und die Scholastik heute (ed. J. B. Lotz).

Appreciation. For a critique of Kantianism, the reader is referred to the article on Kant himself. The point that touches the heart of the criticism is that the finite human mind is infinite to the extent that it arrives at being pure and simple, penetrates into the essences of sensible things, grasps the inner, objective reality, and finally discloses metaphysical reality, still within the sphere of theoretical knowledge. In the Critique of Pure Reason nothing but a faint trace of this infinity can be found. Only in the Critique of Practical Reason does it emerge, and this because the metaphysical realm is made accessible by the absolute character of the moral imperative, There, however, the infinity in man's autonomy is just as much overdone as it is weakened in Kant's faith regarding the metaphysical postulates. The succeeding development of Kantianism evolves around the same issues: it oscillates between the extreme infinity of the German idealists and the more or less extreme theories of finitude advocated by other Kantians.

See Also: NEO-KANTIANISM; HEGELIANISM AND NEOHEGELIANISM.

Bibliography: A. RIEHL, Der philosophische Kritizismus, 2 v. (Leipzig 1876–1887). R. KRONER, Von Kant bis Hegel, 2 v. (2d ed. Tübingen 1961). V. DELBOS, De Kant aux postkantiens (Paris 1940). J. VUILLEMIN, L'Héritage kantien et la revolution copernicienne: Fichte, Cohen, Heidegger (Paris 1954). V. VERRA, Dopo Kant: Il criticismo dell'età preromantica (Turin 1957). M. WUNDT, Kant als Metaphysiker (Stuttgart 1924). Mélanges Jos. Maréchal, 2 v. (Brussels 1950). J. B. LOTZ, ed., Kant und die Scholastik heute (Pullach 1955).

[J. B. LOTS]

KARDEC, ALLAN

Pseudonym of Hippolyte Léon Denizard Rivail, exponent of Spiritism; b. Lyons, France, Oct. 3, 1804; d. Paris, March 31, 1869. He was the son of the lawyer Jean Baptiste Antoine Rivail and began his studies in Lyons and completed them in Yverdun, Switzerland, in the famous institute of PESTALOZZI, with whom he became a collaborator. Kardec received a bachelor's degree in sciences and letters, became a fine linguist, and early devoted himself to his duties as a teacher. Already in 1828 he began to publish didactic works of arithmetic, geometry, grammar, chemistry, physics, astronomy, and physiology. In 1832 he married Amelia Boudet.

Early in his youth he dedicated himself with enthusiasm to mesmeric magnetism and hypnotism, applying magnetic passes to the sick, from which activity arose his reputation of also being a doctor. In December 1854 he became interested in the phenomenon of the dancing table, a careful observation of which led him to discover two important peculiarities, impossible, he then thought, to be explained by the blind force of magnetism: (1) the table denoted intelligence and, therefore, the cause of the movements must be intelligent; (2) this intelligence was autonomous, independent of the persons who placed their hands on the table, and, therefore, must originate from a cause intelligent, different, and invisible. For this reason he concluded: (1) that neither animal magnetism by itself, nor the presences of persons, could be sufficient and adequate causes of the intelligent gyrations of the table; and (2) that the other extracorporeal intelligence, present and engaging interest, though invisible, must be a spirit. Thus arose the idea of SPIRITISM, a neologism created by Kardec to indicate the perceptive and provocative communicability with the spirits (souls of the dead). From this point he dedicated himself with extraordinary vigor and persistence to the evocation and consultation of the spirits, because it seemed to him that in this way he was able to aid others and to definitely resolve the moral and religious problems of humanity.

On April 18, 1857, the first edition of Le livre des esprits contenant les principes de la doctrine spirite appeared in the form of 1018 questions (formulated by him) and answers (supposedly "according to the instructions given by the superior spirits with the confluence of diverse mediums"). With that book arose the codified Spiritism of a religious character that still exists today (see BRAZIL). In 1861 he published another fundamental work for the spiritual movement, the book of mediums (or the "guide of evocators"). In 1864 appeared the Gospel according to Spiritism; in 1865, a book about heaven and hell; and in 1868, one about miracles and prophecies. Other works were published after his death. In 1857 he initiated the Revue Spirite, and in 1858 he founded the Society of Spiritual Studies. By the decree of the Holy Office of April 20, 1864, all his works were prohibited. Every movement initiated by Kardec was characterized by necromancy and reincarnation.

[B. KLOPPENBURG]

KARLOWSKA, MARIA, BL.

Foundress of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd of Divine Providence; b. Sept. 4, 1865, Stupówka (now Karlowo near Gziezno), Poland; d. March 24, 1935, Pniewita, Poland. The eleventh child of Matthew Karlowska and Eugenia Dembinski, Maria attended school in Poznán, where her family had moved after her birth. Following the death of her parents (1882), Maria worked in her sister's tailor shop, where she met a prostitute. Maria came to understand that her mission was to work for the moral and social rehabilitation of prostitutes and to tend to those suffering from venereal diseases. Her ministry attracted a number of like-minded women. Together they founded the Good Shepherd Sisters in 1894. That same year, with financial help from Duchess Aniela Poluticka, Maria established the Good Shepherd Institute in Winiary (near Poznán) to care for prostitutes. Both Prussian and Polish civil authorities commended Karlowska's work, which continues today in seven Polish educational institutions for girls and women, three homes for single mothers, and a rehabilitation center. Karlowska's cause for beatification started in 1965. She was declared venerable on July 11, 1995, and on March 8, 1997, a miracle attributed to her intercession was approved. She was beatified by John Paul II on June 6 1997 (Feast of the Sacred Heart), at Wielka Krokiew Arena, Zakopane (near Kraków), Poland.

Feast: June 5.

Bibliography: M. KARLOWSKA, Wybór pism Marii Karlowskiej, ed. J. R. BAR (Warsaw 1981). L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 29 (1995): 5.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KARLSTADT, ANDREAS RUDOLF BODENSTEIN VON

German theologian and reformer; b. Karlstadt am Main, c. 1480; d. Basel, Switzerland, Dec. 24, 1541. Karlstadt (or Carlstadt), one of Luther's earliest supporters, was educated at the Universities of Erfurt and Cologne. In 1505 he was professor of Thomistic philosophy at the University of Wittenberg; three years later he was made a canon at the collegiate church. His initial work, De Intentionibus, Distinctiones sive Formalitates Thomistae, marks him as one of the strongest adversaries of the via moderna in this university. After obtaining the doctorate in theology in 1510, he was made professor ordinarius of sacred theology. Two years later, at the insistence of Frederick the Wise, he was sent to Rome, where within a few months he obtained a doctorate in canon law and civil law. Upon returning from Rome, he published an attack on the abuses of the papal court entitled Concerning Papal Sanctity. He also launched an attack on scholastic theology. In September of 1516 he published 151 theses that repudiated the traditional Catholic doctrine on grace and free will. In 1518 he replied to Johann ECK's attack on Martin Luther by maintaining the supremacy of Scripture over tradition and patristic writings. He later engaged the Ingolstadt professor in the famous Leipzig debate. Karlstadt was mentioned in Leo X's bull of excommunication Exsurge Domine (June 15, 1520) against Luther. During this early period of the Reformation, Karlstadt became one of the most prominent of the early Lutheran exegetes. He denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch and divided the Scripture into three categories based upon relative certainty of authorship, De Canonicis Scripturis (1520). Unlike Luther, he did not reject the authorship of the Epistle of St. James. In 1521 he was invited by King Christian II of Denmark to introduce the reform into that country, but the hostility of the nobility and the clergy forced him to return to Wittenberg, where he continued his polemical writings, denouncing monastic vows, celibacy, and the Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist. He anticipated Luther in rejecting much of the liturgy of the Mass, and he was the first of the early reformers to marry. The iconoclastic disturbance that occurred in Wittenberg during Luther's absence and that was instigated by the Zwickau prophets, can be traced indirectly to his attacks on the externals of divine worship (see MÜNZER, THOMAS; ANABAPTISTS).

When expelled from Wittenberg in 1524, he wandered throughout Germany associating himself for a time with the Anabaptists in Holstein and Friesland. After 1530 he settled in Zurich and was later recommended by Heinrich BULLINGER to a position at the University of Basel. Here he was directly involved in a struggle with the humanists in an attempt to raise the academic standards of the university. In 1536 at the invitation of Martin BUCER, he represented the city council at Strassburg in a final attempt to reconcile the Lutheran and Zwinglian factions on the question of the Real Presence. Karlstadt's importance lies in the fact that he was the real author of the Eucharistic controversy that later divided the Protestant movement. It was a result largely of his influence that the Swiss reform movement was converted to the Sacramentarian position. His role was more that of a nonviolent visionary, a spiritualist, rather than a man of affairs. Although opposed to the ancient Church, he had nothing substantial to put in its place.

Bibliography: Karlstadts Schriften aus den Jahren 1523–25, ed. E. HERTZSCH, 2 v. (Heidelberg 1956–57). E. HERTZSCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:1154–55; Karlstadt und seine Bedeutung für san Luthertum (Gotha 1932). K. SCHOTTENLOHER, Bibliographie zur deutschen Geschichte im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung, 1517–85, 6 v. (Leipzig 1933–40; repr. Stuttgart 1956–58, v. 7 1962–) 9616–49. T. FREY, Das Rheintal zur Zeit der Glaubensspaltung (Altstätten 1947). O. VASELLA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1363–64. H. BARGE, Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt, 2 v. (Leipzig 1905). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 237.

[J. P. DOLAN]

KARMA

A term literally meaning "action," it came to be used in Hindu doctrine to signify the chain of cause and effect by which every action necessarily produces a given effect, not only in the physical but also in the moral order. This chain of cause and effect was believed to extend beyond the individual life-span, so that each man's character and fortune is determined by his past action or karma in a previous life. Thus, every soul has its own karma, which it inherits from the past, and continues to create new karma by its actions in the present. Nevertheless, by good works, especially of a religious nature, and by refraining from all harmful action, it is possible to destroy the effects of past karma and to avoid acquiring new. Accordingly, though one's life, character, and above all one's position in society are largely determined by karma, an element of freedom is left. The goal of every soul is ultimately to be set free from karma and to attain liberation (moksa) from the wheel of time (samsāra). Hence, though there is an element of fatalism in the doctrine of karma, it is rightly contended that it leaves a place for freedom and morality.

See Also: INDIAN PHILOSOPHY; HINDUISM.

[B. GRIFFITHS]

KARNKOWSKI, STANISLAW

Archbishop of Gniezno and primate of Poland 1581–1603; b. May 10, 1520; d. Lowicz, Poland, June 8, 1603. In 1567, he was appointed bishop of Włocławek. Here he began his life-long effort to revivify Catholic life and worship. Karnkowski summoned a diocesan synod in 1568 to implement the Tridentine reforms. As a patron of the Jesuits, he aided their work, and it was with his encouragement that Jacob Wujek, SJ, translated the Bible into Polish. Karnkowski also founded seminaries in Gniezno and Kalisz as centers of reform. In 1579 he made a collection of synodal laws published as the Constitutiones synodorum metropolitanae ecclesiae Gneznensis provincialium. Politically, he favored Henry of Valois as king of Poland; later on, he also supported Stephen BÁ-THORY and Sigismund III Vasa who became kings of Poland during his lifetime. Karnkowski's vigorous leadership and support of reform did much to strengthen the church and reclaim many for Catholicism in the second half of the 16th century.

Bibliography: Cambridge History of Poland, ed. W. F. REDDAWAY et al., 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1941–50). B. STASIEWSKI, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 vol. (2nd ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1372–73.

[F. J. LADOWICZ]

KASPER, KATHARINA

Foundress of the POOR HANDMAIDS OF JESUS CHRIST; b. Dernbach, near Montabaur (Unterwesterwald), Germany, May 26, 1820; d. there, Feb. 2, 1898. Katharina, who came from a poor, pious family, founded her religious congregation in her native village in 1848 to care for the sick. It received diocesan approval in 1851. From 1858 the congregation's apostolate broadened to include teaching. Mother Maria (Katharina's name in religion), who served as superior general until her death, saw her first house opened in the U.S. (1868). During the KULTUR-KAMPF she went to England to establish houses (1875). By 1898 the Poor Handmaids had almost 2,000 members in 193 houses, including 286 sisters in 27 houses in the U.S. In 1950 her remains were moved to the chapel in the motherhouse in Dernbach. The Roman decree introducing her beatification cause was issued in 1946.

Bibliography: W. P. MEYER, Heiliges Magdtum vor Gott: Mutter Maria Kasper (Wiesbaden 1933). G. T. MEAGHER, With Attentive Ear and Courageous Heart: A Biography of Mother Mary Kasper (Milwaukee 1957).

[N. BACKMUND]

KASSAB, NIMATULLAH AL-HARDINI YOUSEF, BL.

Baptized Youssef Girgis (Joseph George) Kassab, scholar, priest of the Maronite Rite; b. 1808 at Hardine, Caza de Batroun, northern Lebanon; d. Dec. 14, 1858, at Kfifan Monastery, Lebanon.

Son of Girgis Kassab and Maryam Raad, Youssef attended the monastery school of Saint Antony Abbot at Houb (1816–22). On Nov. 1, 1828, he joined the Lebanese Maronite Order of Monks at Saint Antony at Qozhaya. He took the name, Brother Nimatullah ("Grace from God"). Following a two-year probation and profession at Qozhaya (Nov. 14, 1830), he studied theology at the Monastery of Keprianos and Yustina in Kfifane.

From the time of his ordination by Bishop Semaan Zouein (Christmas Day 1835) until his death, Nimatullah was involved in the formation of new priests as director of the scholasticate (1938–45) and a professor of moral theology at Bharsof (1847–50) and Kfifan (1835–38, 1853–56), where one of his students was Sharbel Maklouf (canonized by Pope Paul VI, Oct. 9, 1977). Nimatullah served as administrator of the monastery of Our Lady of Tamiche (1847–50) and as assistant general for three terms (1845–48, 1850–53,1856–58). He refused appointment to the office of abbot general, although he was the recognized master of spirituality in the order. Despite suffering through two civil wars (1840 and 1845), Nimatullah remained unshaken in faith and invariably charitable in his interactions with others until his death from pleurisy aggravated by the cold. Saint Sharbel Makhlouf was among the brothers who attended his deathbed.

Nimatullah's body was reburied in his monastery church at Kfifan (May 18, 1996), where many miracles occurred. He was declared venerable by John Paul II on Sept. 7, 1989, and beatified by John Paul II, May 10, 1998.

Feast: Dec. 14 (Maronites).

Bibliography: D. ATTWATER, Saints of the East (New York 1963) 180–84. O. ELIAS, The Blessed Nimatullah Kassab Al-Hardini (Beirut 1998). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 12 (1998) 599.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KASTL, ABBEY OF

Originally a Benedictine abbey in the Diocese of Eichstädt, Upper Palatinate, Holy Roman Empire; located between Amberg and Neumarkt on the Lauter River. Kastl (Castl, Castellum, Castelbergenses) was founded in 1098, and endowed by Berengar I of Sulzbach, Frederick of Hapsburg, and Luitgard of Kastlberg, widow of Diepold I of Nordgau. Paschal II placed Kastl under papal jurisdiction in 1102. These privileges were confirmed and expanded by Innocent II in 1139 and by Gregory IX in 1233. In 1163 Emperor Frederick I Barbarossa placed Kastl under imperial protection. At the instigation of Bishop Gebhard III of Constance, Kastl was settled by Abbot Theodore and 12 of his monks from Petershausen. The monks of Kastl, being advocates of the Hirsau reform, brought the Hirsau constitution to a number of monasteries under their jurisdiction. Houses at Reichenbach, Plankstitten, Ahausen, Heidenheim, and Wülzburg (including its convent of nuns) embraced the Hirsau-Kastl reform. The most vigorous growth of Kastl's estates and commercial interests took place under Abbot Herman (1322-56), whose loyalty to Louis of Bavaria and whose friendship with the Wittelsbach landlords served as a strong foundation for reform as well. Herman's reforms, inspired by Benedict XII's bull Summi magistri (1336), were responsible for the first stirrings of monastic revival and improvement at Kastl and its daughter houses. Later, in 1378, Abbot Otto Nortweiner codified the constitutions of Kastl. The Consuetudines Castellenses, based on reform movements at Monte Cassino, Hirsau, and Erfurt and influenced by the writings of Benedict of Aniane, Bernard of Clairvaux, Peter Damian, and Benedict XII, inspired Benedictine ascetical and liturgical reform throughout the 15th century. Joining ranks with the younger Bursfeld congregations, the Kastl reform movement spread throughout southern Germany. The deteriorating political situation within the empire eventually thwarted the growth and influence of Kastl. Dynastic wars over succession, the Knights' War, the Peasants' War, and the Reformation itself brought decline, division, and destruction. Shortly after the Count Palatine Otto Henry embraced Calvinism, his son and successor, Frederick III, suppressed Kastl in 1563. Not until 1636, one year after the treaty of Prague, did the Elector Maximilian of Bavaria restore Kastl and confide it to the Jesuits. When the latter were suppressed in 1773, Kastl eventually came under the jurisdiction of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem (1782-1808). Kastl itself was suppressed for the last time in 1808 as a result of the Napoleonic reform.

Bibliography: C. WOLFF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:14–16. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1507–08.

[P. S. MCGARRY]

KATERKAMP, JOHANN THEODOR HERMANN

Catholic theologian and church historian; b. Ochtrup, Westphalia, Jan. 17, 1764; d. Münster, Westphalia, June 9, 1834. After his ordination as priest in 1787, Katerkamp was recommended by his university professor Clemens Becker as private tutor for the family of the imperial princes of Droste-Vischering in Münster. He thus became one of the youngest members of the Münster circle of scholars around the Princess Amalia GALLITZIN, a circle that included such men as Franz von FÜRSTEN-BERG, B. OVERBERG, and Von Stolberg. From 1797 until the princess's death in 1806 Katerkamp lived in her home. He began his public work only in 1809 when he was named provisional professor of church history at the University of Münster. Then in 1819 he was appointed ordinary professor of church history, canon law, and patrology at Münster. Katerkamp was the author of the first major Catholic Church history of modern times. This was his principal work; it was influenced by and followed entirely the spirit of F. L. von Stolberg's 15-volume Geschichte der Religion Jesu (1806–18).

See Also: HISTORIOGRAPHY, ECCLESIASTICAL.

Bibliography: Works. Kirchengeschichte, Intro. and 5 v. (Münster 1819–34), to 1153; Über den Primat des Apostels Petrus and seiner Nachfolger (Münster 1820), also under the title Friedrich Leopolds Grafen zu Stolberg historische Glaubwürdigkeit im Gegensatz zu Herrn Dr. Paulus' kritischer Beurteilung seiner Geschichte; Denkwürdigkeiten aus dem Leben der Fürstin A. von Gallitzin, mit besonderer Rücksicht auf ihre nächsten Verbindungen, Hemsterhuys Fürstenberg, Overberg und Stolberg (Münster 1828; 2d ed. 1839). Literature. H. BROCKMAN, "Trauerrede" in Zeitschrift für Philosophie und katholische Theologie 3 (1834) 113–132. A. B. LUTTERBECK, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie 15:452–453. Realenzyklopädie für protestantische Theologie 10:179–180. P. BRACHIN, Le Cercle de Münster (1779–1806) et la pensée religieuse de F. L. Stolberg (Lyons 1951). E. REINHARD, Die Münsterische "Familia sacra" (Münster 1953). E. HEGEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:57–58.

[H. RUMPLER]

KATZER, FREDERICK FRANCIS XAVIER

Third archbishop of the Milwaukee, WI, Archdiocese; b. Ebensee, Austria, Feb. 7, 1844; d. Fond du Lac, WI, July 20, 1903. He spent his boyhood in Gmunden and studied at the seminary in Freinberg, near Linz, Austria. As a student he joined a group of volunteers for the Minnesota missions in the United States, but when all could not be accepted there, Katzer entered St. Francis Seminary for the Milwaukee Diocese. Bp. John M. Henni ordained him on Dec. 21, 1866, and appointed him professor in the seminary. In this capacity, he composed an allegorical drama, Der Kampf der Gegenwart (The Battle of the Present), dealing with Europe's social problems. When F. X. Krautbauer of Milwaukee was appointed bishop of Green Bay, WI, in 1875, he took Katzer with him and later appointed him rector of the cathedral and vicar-general. When Krautbauer died suddenly, Katzer was named his successor and consecrated on Sept. 21, 1886, by Abp. Michael Heiss.

Leadership of the campaign for repeal of the Bennett Law (1889) passed to Katzer at the death of Heiss in 1890. Catholic opinion regarding the state law, which made education compulsory and prescribed the use of English in instruction, was divided. Despite Catholic disunity, the Heiss-Katzer crusade succeeded, and the law was repealed following the 1890 election.

Meanwhile the death of Archbishop Heiss in March 1890 had left the Milwaukee Archdiocese vacant. Fearing that Katzer might be named to it, some priests, desiring a more American metropolitan, tried to prevent his appointment. Abp. John Ireland advised Gibbons that Katzer was "thoroughly German and thoroughly unfit to be an archbishop." At the archbishops' meeting in Boston (July 1890), Katzer was set aside in favor of Bp. John L. Spalding of Peoria as the metropolitans' first choice for Milwaukee. Nevertheless, Rome, passing over other candidates, appointed Katzer on Jan. 30, 1891. Fully aware of the strained situation, Gibbons, at the conferring of the pallium in Milwaukee, warned of the dangers of dissension and nationalism. The sermon was hailed by those who regarded Katzer's appointment as a distinct triumph for the German-American element in the Church, but settlement of the German question was still remote.

Katzer was an ardent supporter of the legislation of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore concerning Catholic grade schools. With other German Catholics he was critical of Ireland's advocacy of the Faribault plan and was irked at Rome's toleration of it. In addition, he looked with disfavor on the 14 points that Abp. Francesco Satolli delivered to the American archbishops in 1892 to settle the school controversy. In regard to secret societies, Katzer likewise espoused the stricter view. When the election of 1896 raised the question of socialism, Katzer let it be known that he did not favor William Jennings Bryan, fearing that social revolution would follow from the free coinage of silver. In contrast to some churchmen who gloried in Catholic loyalty during the war with Spain in 1898, Katzer observed silence. But after Leo XIII issued his letter on Americanism, Katzer, together with his suffragans, dispatched a letter of thanks to the Holy Father affirming that the condemned errors were more widespread than many cared to concede. Four years later, Katzer died. His remains were interred in the Chapel-inthe-Woods cemetery at St. Francis Seminary.

Bibliography: C. J. BARRY, The Catholic Church and German Americans (Milwaukee 1953). B. J. BLIED, Three Archbishops of Milwaukee (Milwaukee 1955). F. LOIDL, Erzbischof Friedrich Xavier Katzer (Vienna 1953).

[B. J. BLIED]

KAZEL, DOROTHY

Ursuline nun and missionary; b. Cleveland, Ohio, June 30, 1938; d. San Pedro Nonualco, El Salvador, Dec. 2, 1980. The only daughter of Joseph and Malvina (Kazlawskas) Kazel, Dorothy grew up in a predominately Lithuanian neighborhood on Cleveland's East Side. She graduated from Notre Dame Academy in 1957 and subsequently worked as a medical secretary, taught third grade, and became engaged. Deciding that marriage was not for her, she entered the Ursuline Community on Sept. 8, 1960, and became a novice the next year, taking the name Sister Laurentine, a prophetic choice since an Ursuline martyred during the French Revolution bore that name. Later Kazel resumed her baptismal name. She made final vows in August of 1968.

During the next few years, she earned B.A. and M.A. degrees and was certified as a school counselor. Sister Kazel was appointed to the Cleveland Diocesan Latin American Mission team in July of 1974 to serve a fiveyear term in El Salvador. After a period of orientation in Costa Rica, she was assigned to the parish of Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe in Chirilagua. Later she was transferred to the parish of San Carlos Borromeo in La Union, and finally to the parish of the Immaculate Conception in La Libertad. In those parishes, Dorothy assisted with the liturgy, prepared children for First Communion, helped train lay catechists, taught reading, and instructed women in basic nutrition and child care.

As political unrest and violence escalated in 1977, Kazel continued her ministry undaunted by danger. She took on the additional tasks of transporting the dispossessed to refugee camps, helping bury the slain, and counseling survivors. When Archbishop Oscar Romero was murdered in March of 1980, Kazel, deeply affected, wrote to U.S. President Jimmy Carter to express concern that U.S. money was being used to intimidate and exterminate thousands of innocent people.

Her five-year term drawing to a close, Kazel offered to remain one more year to help the Cleveland team's new recruits. Shortly afterwards, on the evening of Dec. 2, 1980, she and her co-worker, lay missionary Jean Donovan, drove their van to El Salvador international airport to pick up Maryknoll Sisters Ita Ford and Maura Clarke. As the four women drove toward La Libertad, five Salvadoran national guardsmen abducted them, drove them to a deserted area, tortured and raped them, then shot and left them by the roadside for strangers to bury in a common grave. Dorothy's body was returned to Cleveland for burial, where her wake was held at the Ursuline motherhouse. After the Mass of the Resurrection was celebrated on December 9 at St. John Cathedral, she was laid to rest in the Ursuline community plot in All Souls Cemetery, Chardon, Ohio.

International public outrage at the murder of the churchwomen became so great that the Salvadoran government ultimately arrested the guardsmen. Yet almost four years passed before they were tried, found guilty, and sentenced to 30 years in prison.

The people of El Salvador venerate the memory of Kazel. Her heroic sacrifice has helped raise the consciousness of Americans to an awareness of the intolerable plight of El Salvador's poor. Through her death Kazel has accomplished what she had set out to do in life.

Bibliography: A. CARRIGAN, Salvador Witness: The Life and Calling of Jean Donovan (New York 1984). D. C. KAZEL, Alleluia Woman: Sister Dorothy Kazel, O.S.U. (Cleveland 1987).

[M. F. HEARON]

KAZIMIERCZYK, STANISLAW YOUSEF, BL.

Augustinian canon regular of the Lateran of Corpus Christi; b. 1433 at Casimiria, near Krakow, Poland; d. there, May 3, 1489. Stanislaw, son of Soltyn Matthias and Jadwiga, attended the local schools before studying at the Jagiellonian University of Krakow. After joining the canons regular of the Lateran of Corpus Christi (1456), professing his vows, and completing his studies for the priesthood, he was ordained. Thereafter, he served the community in many roles, including novice master and subprior. However, he is remembered for his defense of the faith against John HUS and John WYCLIF, his devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, concern for the poor and sick, and preaching. Some of his written sermons and lectures have survived the destruction of World War II. His body now rests in the church of the Corpus Christi. John Paul II recognized his ancient cultus, April 18, 1993, following the issuance of the decretum Dec. 21, 1992.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1993) 549.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KEANE, AUGUSTUS HENRY

Journalist; b. Cork, Ireland, June 1, 1833; d. London, Feb. 3, 1912. He studied for the priesthood in Ireland and at Rome's Propaganda Fide College (renamed in 1962 the Pontificia Università Urbaniana), but did not proceed beyond minor orders. His flair for languages and anthropological research, already evident in Rome, grew with studies at the Catholic University in Dublin, where he received a B.A. degree. He also devoted himself to journalism, and, in 1862, took over the editorship of the weekly Glasgow Free Press (1851), the only Catholic newspaper published in Scotland. In 1864 he became its proprietor.

The religious situation in southwest Scotland was complex and explosive. In 1862, more than 200,000 Irish-born Catholics had settled in southwest Scotland; they had left Ireland in the two previous decades as a result of the famine and lived mainly in and around Glasgow. This sudden expansion brought the organization of Scottish Catholicism almost to a breaking point. Differences of national temperament and politics between the immigrants and the native clergy led to misunderstandings and strife; the Free Press had begun by 1859 openly to champion the grievances of the immigrants against the alleged partiality of the Scottish vicars apostolic. Though he had taken over the Free Press with expressions of loyalty to ecclesiastical authority, Keane soon began a virulent attack on Bp. John Murdoch, the vicar apostolic resident in Glasgow; on his successor, Bp. John Gray; and on all native-born Scots priests. This attack increased in violence until 1868, when the newspaper was condemned by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith; the Free Press ceased publication in that year.

The Free Press incident is important in the development of the Church in modern Scotland: the very real threat of schism it produced made it clear that the Church in Scotland badly needed reorganization. The result was the reestablishment of the Scottish hierarchy in 1878. After the suppression of the Free Press, Keane devoted himself to academic pursuits and contributed extensively on ethnology, geography, and allied subjects to learned journals and encyclopedias. For some years he was professor of Hindustani at University College, London, and, in 1897, received a Civil List pension of £50 "for his labours in the field of ethnology." The fact that he was cremated would seem to indicate that he had given up the practice of his faith.

[D. MCROBERTS]

KEANE, JOHN JOSEPH

Archbishop, first rector of The Catholic University of America; b. Ballyshannon, Donegal, Ireland, Sept. 12, 1839; d. Dubuque, Iowa, June 22, 1918. He was one of the five children of Hugh and Fannie (Connolly) Keane. When John was seven years old, the family emigrated to St. John, New Brunswick, Canada, and then moved to Baltimore, Md., in 1848. After graduating from Calvert Hall, Baltimore, in 1856 and working for firms in Baltimore for three years, he entered St. Charles' College, Ellicott City, and later St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore. He was ordained on July 2, 1866, by Archbishop Martin J. Spalding, who assigned him to St. Patrick's Church, Washington, D.C.

During the 12 years that he labored in Washington as an assistant, he was an enthusiastic promoter of the temperance movement and was instrumental in the formation of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America (1872), as well as the Catholic Young Men's National Union (1875), the Carroll Institute (1873), and the Tabernacle Society in Washington. The zeal and ability he displayed in furthering the objectives of these organizations and in working for the welfare of all classes in the parish attracted the notice of his superiors, who obtained his appointment on March 31, 1878 to the Diocese of Richmond, Va., as its fifth bishop. It soon became clear that all within the jurisdiction of the new bishop had a claim on his attention and care. By lecturing throughout the diocese to Protestant groups, he lessened prejudice against the Church. Despite opposition, he persisted in an endeavor to instruct African Americans in the Church's teachings, eventually recording some gains among them. From the beginning of his episcopal career, he fostered devotion to the Holy Spirit, publishing in 1880 A Sodality Manual for the Use of the Servants of the Holy Ghost.

Rectorship at Catholic University. After the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884), he became more influential in ecclesiastical affairs. In May of 1885, as a member of the committee appointed by the council to found a Catholic university in the United States, he entered wholeheartedly into the work of collecting for the proposed institution. He and Bishop John Ireland of St. Paul represented the committee in obtaining the Holy See's approval for the establishment of The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA in Washington, D.C. He was relieved of the care of the Richmond diocese on Aug. 14, 1888, to devote all his energy to the founding of the university, which opened Nov. 13, 1889, with Keane as its first rector. Within a few years he gained a national reputation as an administrator and as an interesting and powerful orator, widely quoted in newspapers. At the same time, he became more clearly identified with the so-called liberal or progressive members of the American hierarchy through active participation in controversial matters. He had a part in preventing the condemnation of the KNIGHTS OF LABOR and in influencing Roman authorities to set aside many of the demands that the Germans had made in the Abbelen memorial (see ABBELEN, PETER). He was active in the controversy over the school question and over Cahenslyism (see CAHENSLY, PETER PAUL), in obtaining full and suitable representation of the Catholic Church at the Chicago Parliament of Religions, and in advocating the rapid Americanization of Catholic immigrants. Consequently, he incurred the enmity of prominent ecclesiastics who made up the conservative party in the American Church, as well as of conservatives in Europe who had an interest in American Church affairs. Roman authorities, who were kept fully informed about his activities (which were frequently represented as indicating dangerous liberalism), gradually lost confidence in him and in his ability to retain the support of Catholics of all national origins for the university. On Sept. 15, 1896, Leo XIII removed him from the rectorship and offered him a choice of honorable positions.

Later Career. He accepted his banishment from the institution that owed to him, more than to any other prelate, its existence and spirit. To counteract the impression that he and his progressive friends were held in disfavor by their ecclesiastical superiors because of his dismissal from the university, he accepted the Holy Father's invitation to work in Rome. He was raised to archiepiscopal rank and appointed a consultor of the Congregation of the Propaganda and of the Congregation of Studies. For two and one half years he lived simply in two rooms at the Canadian College, serving in Rome and elsewhere in Europe the interests of the American Church and of his friends. In the controversy known as Americanism that raged in Europe from 1897 to 1899, he was attacked in an unprincipled manner by critics who pictured him "as a rationalist, throwing all dogma over to modern ideas." He engaged in an exhausting battle in Rome to counteract this endeavor to destroy his good name and won a victory. At the request of the governing board of The Catholic University of America, he was released in 1899 from his duties in Rome to devote a year to procuring donations from wealthy Catholics in the United States, since the institution was then in financial difficulty. He entered upon the familiar paths of former years with some enthusiasm and with modest success. While he was engaged in this work, the Archdiocese of Dubuque became vacant and his friends urged the Holy See to name him to the post. After considerable delay, he received the appointment on July 24, 1900.

He considered the appointment to Dubuque a satisfactory answer to those who had been attacking him for several years and became engrossed in the administration of the archdiocese. He devoted particular attention to the development of Loras College, and he gave all the Catholic educational institutions of the archdiocese new inspiration and impetus. During his tenure, 12 new academies for girls and two for boys were constructed. He carried on an effective campaign against alcoholism and its attendant evils throughout his administration, forming in 1902 an Archdiocesan Total Abstinence Union. By the year 1909 he became aware of a loss of physical vigor and of some impairment of his faculties. When an attempt to have a coadjutor or an auxiliary appointed for Dubuque failed, Keane sent his resignation to the pope, who accepted it on April 3, 1911. He lived at the cathedral rectory until his death. Many of his lectures were published, and articles by him on various topics appeared in the Catholic World, American Ecclesiastical Review, American Catholic Quarterly Review and the North American Review.

See Also: AMERICANISM.

Bibliography: J. J. KEANE, Onward and Upward, comp. M. F. EGAN (Baltimore 1902). P. H. AHERN, The Life of John J. Keane, Educator and Archbishop 1839–1918 (Milwaukee 1955); The Catholic University of America, 1887–1896: The Rectorship of John J. Keane (Washington 1949).

[P. H. AHERN]

John Keble. (Archive Photos)

KEBLE, JOHN

Anglican theologian, leader of the OXFORD MOVE-MENT; b. Fairford, England, April 25, 1792; d. Bournemouth, March 29, 1866. He was the son of John and Sarah (Maule) Keble. After study at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, he was elected a fellow of Oriel College (1811). Ordained to the Anglican priesthood in 1816, he renounced his tutorship at Oriel in 1823 and devoted the rest of his life to parochial work, principally at Hursley. He maintained contact with Oxford, however, holding a professorship of poetry there (1831–41). Among the Oxford students who were converted to his HIGH CHURCH views was Richard Hurrell FROUDE, who acted as intermediary in drawing Keble and John Henry NEWMAN together. Newman regarded Keble's sermon, "National Apostasy," delivered at Oxford on July 14, 1833, as the beginning of the Oxford Movement. Keble's contributions to the movement included a book of poetry, The Christian Year (1827), which portrayed the Church as the visible channel of invisible grace; seven of the Tracts for the Times; and a translation of St. Irenaeus for the Library of the Fathers. He also helped to edit Froude's Remains (1837) and the Works of Richard Hooker (1836). After Newman's conversion Keble continued his sermons in defense of TRACTARIANISM and advocated the adoration of the sacred species in his work, On Eucharistical Adoration (1857). His influence on the Oxford Movement was exerted chiefly through his qualities as a humble pastor. Keble College at Oxford was named for him in 1869.

Bibliography: G. BATTISCOMBE, John Keble: A Study in Limitations (New York 1964). J. T. COLERIDGE, A Memoir of the Rev. John Keble (London 1869).

[T. S. BOKENKOTTER]

KEDERMYSTER, RICHARD

Abbot of the Benedictine monastery of Winchcombe and a man of some influence in the reign of Henry VIII; b. Worcestershire?, England, date unknown; d. Winchcombe, Gloucestershire, 1531. Kedermyster entered the abbey of Winchcombe as a novice at the age of 15 and at 19 went to study at the Benedictine House, Gloucester Hall, in Oxford. Four years later he was recalled to Winchcombe, and in 1487 he was elected abbot. He was an exact observer and reformer of the discipline of the house and was famous as a scholar and promoter of learning. He made frequent visits to Oxford and in 1500 took the degree of D.D. Kedermyster became well known as a preacher and often preached before Henry VIII. In 1512 he was sent with Bp. John FISHER and others to the Lateran Council convened by Julius II. In 1514 he preached his famous sermon that attacked the Act of 1512 depriving minor clerks of "benefit of clergy" and thereby sparked off a controversy in which current anticlerical feeling played an important part. Kedermyster was a keen antiquarian, and in 1532 he compiled a register, since lost, of the early documents of his abbey. In 1521 he published his Tractatus contra M. Lutheri, and in 1525 he resigned the abbacy.

Bibliography: The Victoria History of the County of Gloucester, ed. W. PAGE (London 1907–). T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900 10: 1185.

[M. M. CURTIS]

KEEGAN, ROBERT FULTON

Administrator; b. Nashua, NH, May 3, 1888; d. New York City, Nov. 4, 1947. He was educated in New York City at Cathedral College and St. Joseph's Seminary; he was ordained on Sept. 18, 1915. After receiving (1916) his M.A. in sociology at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., he was appointed (1919) by Abp. Patrick J. Hayes to be the first executive director of New York's Catholic Charities. Under Keegan's direction, Catholic Charities became the largest voluntary charitable organization in the United States. He unified its diverse and overlapping welfare agencies, broadened their base of financial support, expanded their technical and professional services, and improved their standards of operation. The social agencies of the Archdiocese of New York became recognized leaders in the field of welfare, and there was a nationwide awakening of diocesan responsibility in the field of charity. Keegan also obtained the cooperation of public and nonsectarian agencies, many of which elected him as their president. In 1933 he was named pastor of Blessed Sacrament Church, New York City. He subsequently became a papal chamberlain (1929), domestic prelate (1937), and prothonotary apostolic (1940).

Bibliography: E. R. MOORE, Roman Collar (New York 1950).

[G. A KELLY]

KEELY, PATRICK CHARLES

19th-century American church architect (variously Kiely, Keily); b. Ireland, either Kilkenny, Aug. 9, 1816, or Thurles, Aug. 9, 1820; d. Brooklyn, N.Y., Aug. 11, 1896. Presumably trained under his architect-father, he migrated to the U.S. in 1841. Between 1847 and 1892 he designed 16 Catholic cathedrals and an estimated 500 to 700 other churches. The cathedrals of Rochester, N.Y., Chicago, Ill., Boston, Mass., Providence, R.I., and Erie, Pa., and St. Francis Xavier Church in New York City are among his best-known works. In general his structures are"preaching churches"—broad for their length, with large, unobstructed interiors and often stark and naïve but monumental exteriors. Their style is neo- or "Victorian" Gothic, a decadent adaptation of medieval architecture that became widespread in both Europe and America in the 19th century. In 1884 Keely received the second Laetare medal conferred by the University of Notre Dame, Ind.

Bibliography: H. F. and E. R. WITHEY, Biographical Dictionary of American Architects (Los Angeles 1956). F. W. KERVICK, Architects in America of Catholic Tradition (Rutland, Vt. 1962). H. L. WILSON, The Cathedrals of Patrick Charles Keely (Master's diss. unpub. Catholic University of America 1952), valuable critique. W. A. DALY, Patrick Charles Keely: Architect and Builder (Master's diss. unpub. Catholic University of America 1934), uncritical but useful for chronology.

[P. GOETTELMAN]

KEHR, PAUL FRIDOLIN

Protestant historian of the papacy; b. Waltershausen (Thuringia), Germany, Dec. 26, 1860; d. Wässerndorf, near Würzburg, Nov. 9, 1944. Kehr began his academic career as a collaborator on the Monumenta Germaniae historia and taught at Marburg in 1893. In 1895 he was nominated to the chair in medieval history at Göttingen. In 1896 he suggested that the Academy of Göttingen carefully collect and publish all pontifical documents preceding the reign of Innocent III (1198). He proposed that all such documents, edited and unedited, recensions, originals, and copies, in all the archives of Europe, be investigated critically and scientifically. The resulting project came to be known as the Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. The organization for the reporting of these documents was planned along regional and diocesan lines. Kehr's first volume was published in Rome (1906). It and the volumes that followed were consistently notable for their precision and meticulous methodology. For his impressive achievement in shedding further light upon the growth and development of the papacy, PIUS XI (1931) financially assisted Kehr in founding the "Pius-Stiftung für Papst-Urkunden und mittelalterliche Gesdichts-forschung." Since his death additional volumes have appeared. As present, Italia Pontifica has reached eight volumes; Germania Pontificia, three volumes. Similar collections for France, England, Portugal, and Spain either have appeared or are in preparation.

Bibliography: W. HOLTZMANN, Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 8 (1950) 26–58. O. VASELLA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:102–103.

[B. F. SCHERER]

KELLER, JAMES G.

Founder of The CHRISTOPHERS; b. Oakland, California, June 27, 1900; d. New York City, Feb. 7, 1977. Educated in public schools and for seven years at St. Patrick's Seminary, Menlo Park, California he joined Maryknoll in September of 1921. Most of his studies during the major seminary years were at The Catholic University of America (bachelor of sacred theology, 1924, and master of arts, 1925). He was a member of the Maryknoll class of 1925 and was ordained on Aug. 15, 1925 at his parish church, St. Francis de Sales in Oakland. He founded The Christophers in 1945 out of the conviction that each person can do something, with God's help, to change the world for the better. The name "Christopher" taken from the Greek meaning "Christ-bearer," sums up the missionary character of the movement.

Tirelessly Keller proclaimed the Christopher ideal that "everyone can change the world" by stimulating others to show personal responsibility and individual initiative in raising the standards of all phases of human endeavor. He stressed in particular those fields of influence that affect the common good of all-government, education, labor-management relations, literature and entertainment. His book, You Can Change the World, published in 1948, was a best seller. To bring the message of positive, constructive action to the widest audience possible, he launched Christopher News Notespublished seven times a year, sent gratis to 750,000 persons; weekly radio and television programs; a one-minute inspirational radio spot broadcast daily; a yearly Christopher book; a daily newspaper column called "Three Minutes a Day"; and the Christopher Awards—in recognition of writers, producers, and directors in literature, motion pictures, and television whose works attest to the highest values of the human spirit. To accentuate the positive as the Christopher objective, he adopted as the Christopher motto the Chinese proverb, "Better to light one candle than to curse the darkness"; the Prayer of St. Francis as the Christopher Prayer; and stressed the biblical injunction from St. Paul, "Be not overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good" (Romans 12.21). A man of prayer, great hope and vision, he was consumed with the idea of reaching as many people as he could in his lifetime with the love and truth of Christ. A victim of Parkinson's Disease, he retired as director of The Christophers in 1969, but remained as consultant up until the last year of his life.

Bibliography: J. G. KELLER, To Light a Candle; The Autobiography of James Keller, Founder of the Christophers (New York, 1963).

[THE CHRISTOPHERS/EDS.]

KELLEY, FRANCIS CLEMENT

Bishop, founder of the Extension Society; b. Prince Edward Island, Canada, Nov. 24, 1870; d. Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, Feb. 1, 1948; the son of John Kelley, a merchant, landowner, and senior partner in the firm of Ely & Kelley, and Mary (Murphy) Kelley, the daughter of an Irish political exile. Kelley attended Laval University in Quebec, where he studied at Nicolet Seminary and was ordained a priest on August 24, 1893, for the Diocese of Detroit, Michigan. Kelley was appointed pastor of Lapeer parish. In 1905, he founded the Catholic Church Extension Society of the United States, and was elected its president. The following year, its headquarters, and Kelley himself, transferred to Chicago, Illinois; there for 19 years he presided over the society, raising its receipts to almost $1 million annually.

Kelley founded and edited the quarterly Extension Magazine, featuring articles on home mission activities and fiction by Catholic writers. Under his direction, the magazine had more than 3 million paid subscribers. Not merely a gifted editor, Kelley was a popular lecturer and author of more that a dozen books. His two most prominent works were: Blood Drenched Altars (1935), a controversial account of the church in Mexico; and The Bishop Jots It Down (1939), an autobiography written, it has been said, with the encouragement of H. L. Menken.

Kelley was widely active in war and diplomacy. He served as chaplain in the Spanish-American War; and as a diplomat, Kelley represented the bishops of Mexico during the World War I Peace Conference in Paris. He initiated unofficial negotiations in Paris with Premier Vittorio Orlando of Italy for a settlement of the Roman question, and two years after the peace conference, was sent to England by the Vatican to settle postwar difficulties over German and Austrian missions. As president of the Extension Society, Kelley represented the Mexican bishops during the Carranza Revolution and established St. Philip Neri Seminary at Castroville, Tex., for exiled Mexican seminarians and clergy, while collecting money for their relief. Similarly, he was active in raising funds to assist the Archdiocese of Vancouver, Canada, in times of financial crisis.

In 1924, he was named bishop of Oklahoma City and Tulsa, Oklahoma. During his episcopate, Kelley successfully resisted the agitation of the Ku Klux Klan and continued his mission work as "the Extension Bishop." Under his care the infant diocese grew to maturity.

Bibliography: J. P. GAFFEY, Francis Clement Kelley and the American Catholic Dream. 2 vols. Bensenville, Ill., 1980. M. J. OBERKOETTER, O.S.B. "A Bio-Bibliography of Bishop Francis Clement Kelley, 1870–1948." M.A. thesis, Rosary College, River Forest, Ill., 1955.

[E. A. FLUSCHE]

KELLS, ABBEY OF

Former Irish abbey in present-day Kells, County Meath, Ireland, about 40 miles northwest of Dublin. In 807, after IONA had been sacked three times by the Vikings, Cellach transferred the primacy of the Columban league of churches to Kells (Cenannas), a mainland foundation of COLUMBA OF IONA. However, the Vikings struck at Kells also, and its church (built c. 804) was destroyed. Another church (now called Colum Cille's, or Columba's, House) was built in 814. About 848 the Pictish King Kenneth mac Alpin seems to have tried to withdraw the churches in Scotland from the primacy of Kells, endeavoring to set up Dunkeld as the metropolis there. Kells was pillaged once again in 899 and five times in the 10th century. In the 12th century the primacy passed from Kells to Derry, and at Kells the Columban rule was replaced by that of the CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUS-TINE. The modern Protestant church in Kells occupies the site of the original monastic foundation, of which there remain five 10th-century IRISH CROSSES, a round tower, and St. Colum Cille's House. The Rolls of Chancery of Ireland, 31 Henry VIII, contain the instrument (dated Nov. 18, 1539) under which Kells was surrendered to the crown. The famous Book of Kells belonged to Kells, and on the blank spaces of this evangeliarium were copied certain charters of the abbey. These are of considerable interest and provide important information about the organization of one of the principal monastic churches at a period of decline, when the old order was being replaced by the new diocesan system. The Crozier of Kells is preserved in the British Museum.

Bibliography: M. ARCHDALL, Monasticon hibernicum (London 1786) 541–548, complete but must be checked with later eds. of sources used. ADAMNAN, The Life of St. Columba, ed. W. REEVES (Dublin 1857) 387–389. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland, v. 1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929). 1:445, 753–756, with a synopsis of the charters of the Book of Kells and bibliog. E. H. L. SEXTON, A Descriptive and Bibliographical List of Irish Figure Sculptures of the Early Christian Period (Portland, Maine 1947) 174–191. E. SULLIVAN, The Book of Kells (5th ed. New York 1952) 20–22. H. G. LEASK, Irish Churches and Monastic Buildings, 3 v. (Dundalk, Ire. 1955–60) 1:32–34. M. and L. DE PAOR, Early Christian Ireland (2d ed. New York 1960).

[C. MCGRATH]

KELLS, BOOK OF

The Book of Kells is a vellum Gospel book profusely and brilliantly decorated, one of the greatest achievements of European decorative art, produced in the Columban mission field, perhaps at Iona, 775-800. It is now at Trinity College, Dublin. The decoration builds on the earlier tradition of the books of DURROW and LINDIS-FARNE, but belongs to a later, more elaborate, sophisticated, and baroque phase. In addition to the pages representing the Evangelist symbols, it has pages of fantastic ornament with spreads of minute and intricate color work and pen drawing; great ornamental monogram pages; heavily ornate canon tables; and illustrative pages depicting the arrest of Christ, the Virgin and Child, the temptation of Christ, and other subjects. A brilliant series of inhabited or zoomorphic initials, all different, runs through the text. The ornamental text passages in capitals have become almost illegible. The human figure, foliate motifs, and marginal genre subjets, such as the otter and salmon or cat and mice, appear.

At least four, perhaps five, different artists can be distinguished, and their work varies in style and quality but the palette is consistently rich. In the elaborate canon tables the symbols of the Evangelists replace their names over the columns. The book appears to have been regarded primarily as a medium of unrestricted artistic creation. The text is mixed, and it is poorly set out and full of mistakes, though in an ornamental half—uncial hand of great beauty.

Bibliography: Codex Cenannensis, ed. E. H. ALTON and P. MEYER, 3 v. (New York 1950–51). S. F. H. ROBINSON, Celtic Illuminative Art in the Gospel Books of Durrow, Lindisfarne and Kells (Dublin 1908). E. SULLIVAN, The Book of Kells (New York 1955). F. O'MAHONY, ed., The Book of Kells: Proceedings of a Conference at Trinity College Dublin, 6–9 September 1992 (Aldershot, Eng. 1994). G. HENDERSON, From Durrow to Kells: The Insular Gospel-books, 650–800 (New York 1987). C. FARR, The Book of Kells: Its Function and Audience (London 1997).

[R. L. S. BRUCE-MITFORD]

KELLY, GERALD ANDREW

Jesuit moral theologian; b. Denver, Colo., Sept. 30, 1902; d. Kansas City, Mo., Aug. 2, 1964. After receiving his elementary and secondary education in Denver, he entered the Society of Jesus at Florissant, Mo., in 1920. He obtained his bachelor's and master's degrees in arts at St. Louis University, where he also received his licenciate in theology. He was ordained in 1933 and took his doctorate in theology at the Gregorian University in Rome in 1937.

For 26 years Kelly taught moral theology to Jesuit scholastics at St. Mary's College, St. Mary's, Kansas. At summer sessions he gave courses to nuns and laity at Marquette, St. Louis, and Creighton Universities, at Rockhurst College, and at St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Ind. On many and various occasions he addressed assemblies of priests, nuns, physicians, nurses, and students in different parts of the United States. He was managing editor of the Review for Religious (1942–59).

His approach to moral problems was thoroughly scientific and his solution was always solidly based upon principles clearly seen and lucidly expounded. He was an independent thinker who respected points of view different from his own, but he did not hesitate to disagree with others when the occasion demanded it. If he could not solve a problem, he frankly said so. He had the ability to simplify complex problems without oversimplifying them and to deal with profound matters without recourse to jargon or complicated language. He was at his best in his treatment of medico-moral problems, and he was chairman of the committee that formulated the ethical code of the Catholic Hospital Association. He received the Cardinal Spellman award for theology for 1953.

Among his writings were Modern Youth and Chastity (1941), The Good Confessor (1951), Guidance for Religious (1956), Medico-Moral Problems (1957), Moral Theology under Pius XII (with John C. Ford, SJ, 1957), Contemporary Moral Theology (with John C. Ford, SJ, v. 1, 1958; v. 2, 1963). His critical summaries of current developments in moral theology published between 1946 and 1952 in Theological Studies were of considerable value to theologians and students, and his many articles in the Linacre Quarterly were helpful especially to physicians and nurses.

Dr. Herbert Parke, the Chief Librarian of Dublin's Trinity College, holds the Book of Kells before a backdrop depicting the book's illumination of the Virgin Mary, Nov. 1, 1961. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

[C. MCAULIFFE]

KELLY, MICHAEL VINCENT

Author of books and articles on pastoral theology, religious education, and rural life; assistant superior general of the Basilian Fathers (1922–36); b. Adjala, Ontario, Canada, July 31, 1863; d. Toronto, Ontario, July 24, 1942. The son of Irish immigrants, he was educated at St. Michael's College, Toronto, and at the University of Toronto (B.A. 1887). He entered the Congregation of Priests of St. Basil at Beaconsfield, England, and was ordained at Toronto Sept. 21, 1891. Kelly's special interest was the parochial ministry. Among his books are: Zeal in the

St. John Kemble.

Classroom (Toronto 1922); Some of the Pastor's Problems (Toronto 1923); Remarked in Passing (Toronto 1934), reminiscences on his 70th birthday; First Communicant's Catechism translated into Slovak and Spanish; and in collaboration with Canon J. B. Geniesse, Efficax Antidotum ad Matrimonia Mixta Praecavenda (Rome 1923).

Bibliography: Basilian Annals 1 (July 1943) 22–25. M. V. KELLY, The Kellys of Monastereyan and Adjala (Toronto 1942).

[R. J. SCOLLARD]

KEMBLE, JOHN, ST.

Priest, martyr, alias John Holland; b. Rhyd y Car Farm, St. Weonards, Herefordshire, England, 1599 or 1600; d. Hereford, Aug. 22, 1679. The Kembles were an old Wiltshire family. Sometime in the 1620s, John was smuggled abroad to the English College at Douai where he was ordained on Feb. 23, 1625. On June 4 he was sent home to his native district as a missionary. He made his headquarters at Pembridge Castle, the home first of his brother George, then of his nephew Captain Richard Kemble, who saved Charles II's life at the Battle of Worcester. With the help of the Jesuits, John established mission centers throughout Herefordshire and Mon-mouthshire. The persecution was less severe in the reign of Charles I than in that of James and he worked in comparative safety. Nevertheless, Monmouthshire headed the list of recusant convictions for the 29 counties of the southern division in the first 15 years of Charles I's reign. In 1649 John paid a visit to London, presumably on ecclesiastical business. He returned home and continued his missionary labors throughout the Commonwealth. He took no part in politics but ministered to the existing Catholics and converted many Protestants.

The storm broke in 1678, when Titus Oates revealed his "popish plot" (see OATES PLOT). Everywhere priests were arrested and dragged up to London to confront Titus. Sometimes he fitted them into his "plot," sometimes he did not bother. The result was the sameexecution. Kemble's friends urged him to hide, but he refused. Although over 80, he was arrested in November and taken to Hereford jail. His captor was Captain Scudamore, whose wife and children were Catholics and members of his flock. After three months' imprisonment, during which the prison governor sketched his portrait, John was brought to trial and sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered as a seminary priest. On Apr. 23, 1679, he was sent with David LEWIS for examination by Oates. John was suffering from a malady that made riding particularly painful, but he was nevertheless strapped to a horse and brought up to London. There, neither Titus Oates nor his associate, Bedloes, was able to bring any charge against the two priests. They were offered life and liberty to disclose details of the nonexistent plot to no avail. On May 28 they were ordered back to their respective jails. When the undersheriff arrived to take John to execution on Aug. 22, the martyr asked for time to finish his prayers, and smoke a last pipe, and have a last drink. (Hence the expressions "Kemble pipe" and "Kemble cup" for the last pipe or drink of a sitting). At Widemarsh Common, before a huge crowd, John denied the plot and made a last profession of faith. He was allowed to hang till dead before they quartered him. He was beatified on Dec.15, 1929, and canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Feast: Aug. 22; Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), 555–57. B. CAMM, Forgotten Shrines (St. Louis 1910). M. V. LOVEJOY, Blessed John Kemble (Postulation pamphlet; London 1960).

[G. FITZ HERBERT]

KEMP, JOHN (KEMPE)

Cardinal, archbishop of Canterbury; b. near Ashford, Kent, c. 1377; d. Canterbury, March 22, 1454. He attended Merton College, specializing in Canon Law. He was appointed a member of the ecclesiastical courts, and in 1415 became dean of the Court of ARCHES, having been made vicar-general of Abp. Henry CHICHELE of Canterbury the year before. Henry V made him chancellor of Normandy and keeper of the privy seal in 1418. MARTIN V provided him with the bishopric of Rochester on June 21, 1419. He was translated to Chichester, Feb. 28, 1421, only to accept papal provision for his translation to the bishopric of London the same year. He became archbishop of York, July 20, 1425. The king employed him on numerous diplomatic missions abroad, e.g., at the Council of BASEL and at Arras, and found him a strong supporter at home, for, as chancellor (1426-32), Kemp sided with Henry BEAUFORT against Duke Humphrey of Gloucester. EUGENE IV recognized Kemp's abilities by creating him a cardinal priest in 1439. This caused a conflict with Abp. Chichele of Canterbury, for a cardinal of whatever rank had precedence over an archbishop. On July 21, 1452, Kemp became archbishop of Canterbury after having been continuously in the king's service during his 27 years at York. He is buried at Canterbury. There are no extant writings of Kemp. Although his diplomatic activity cannot have been conducive to exercising ecclesiastical influence, there is no evidence to suggest that he neglected his pastoral or episcopal duties. His career reflects the multifarious responsibilities of a competent higher ecclesiastic in the later Middle Ages.

Bibliography: W. F. HOOK, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, 12 v. (London 1860–84) v.5. R. F. WILLIAMS, Lives of the English Cardinals 2 v. (London 1868) 2:110–123. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 2: 1031–32. W. ULLMANN, "Eugenius IV, Cardinal Kemp, and Archbishop Chichele," Medieval Studies, Presented to Aubrey Gwynn, S.J. (Dublin 1961).

[W. ULLMANN]

KEMP, THOMAS

Bishop of London; b. c. 1414; d. March 28, 1489. He owed his early advancement to his uncle, Cardinal John KEMP. After taking his M.A. and B.Theol. at Oxford, he became canon of Lincoln in 1433. Rapid preferement followed in the Archdiocese of York, where his uncle was archbishop, and Thomas became canon of York (1435), and archdeacon of York (1436–42) and of Richmond (1442–48); he was also archdeacon of Middlesex (1449). On Henry VI's recommendation, he was provided by Nicholas V to the See of London on Aug. 21, 1448, despite Henry's later change of mind. Consecrated by his uncle on Feb. 8, 1450, he held the see until death. He was king's clerk and chaplain by 1443, and he was among the bishops who tried to mediate between Henry VI and the Yorkists before the Battle of Northampton (1460). Afterward he played little part in politics. He was a considerable benefactor of Merton College, Oxford, and of the university, where he helped to finance the Divinity School and the building of the library.

See Also: OXFORD, UNIVERSITY OF.

Bibliography: Manuscript Register, Guildhall Library, London. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 vol. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1032–34.

[C. D. ROSS]

KEMPE, MARGERY

English mystic and author of The Book of Margery Kempe, the oldest extant autobiography in English; b. Lynn, Norfolk, c. 1373; d. sometime after 1439. The daughter of John Brunham, who was five times mayor of Lynn, she married John Kempe, burgess, in 1393. Vain and ambitious, she tried to support her extravagances by trade, first by brewing, then by a horsemill. The failure of both undertakings, together with an attack of madness suffered after the birth of her first child, turned her gradually to prayer and penance. The madness, which did not recur, was cured, she tells us, by a vision of Christ seated on her bed and saying: "Dowtyr why hast thou forsakyn me and I forsoke never the."

In 1413, having borne her husband 14 children, she separated from him by mutual consent, to live a religious life in the world. Soon after, having visited many English shrines and holy persons (among them Julian of Norwich), she set out for the Holy Land. On her return journey she spent six months in Italy (1414–15), where she was better understood than among the English pilgrims, who did not appreciate her unusual vocation—"boystrous" crying, exclusively religious conversation, and rebuke of her neighbors' faults. Throughout her life she suffered taunts of Lollardy that occasionally developed into formal accusations. In 1417–18 she visited Santiago de Compostela. In 1425 she returned to Lynn to nurse her husband until his death in 1431. Thereafter, she traveled to Norway and Danzig (1433–34).

Unable to write herself, she had set down by the aid of two clerks, c. 1431–38, a vivid and frank account of her travels, temptations, mystical experiences, and deep compassion for sinners. Her book, known only in extracts till 1934, when a manuscript was discovered in the Butler-Bowden family, has undoubted value as a literary and human document, and as a picture of medieval life. Margery herself remains a controversial figure: by some considered a victim of religious mania; by others, a genuine mystic.

Bibliography: The Book of Margery Kempe, critical ed. S. B. MEECH and H. E. ALLEN (Early English Text Society 212; 1940); modernized version ed. W. BUTLER-BOWDON (New York 1944). E. I. WATKIN, "In Defense of Margery Kempe," Poets and Mystics (New York 1953) 104–135. D. KNOWLES, "Margery Kempe," The English Mystical Tradition (New York 1961) 138–150. L. COLLIS, Memoirs of a Medieval Woman: The Life and Times of Margery Kempe (New York 1983).

[M. N. MALTMAN]

KEMPTEN, ABBEY OF

Former royal BENEDICTINE monastery in the presentday town of Kempten (the old Roman Campodunum), Bavaria, Germany. It was founded by SANKT GALLEN c. 725 as a small cell, and by 752 it was a nondependent, royal, proprietary, Benedictine monastery with the right of free election of abbot. It was favored by CHARLE-MAGNE and his consort Hildegard, who was considered a foundress. Its first monastic buildings probably imitated the style of Sankt Gallen. Kempten organized the evangelization of the Algäu. The Hungarians destroyed the old abbey in 926, and the monks moved to a hill west of the town (at the site of the east wing of the residence now there). Reformed under Bp. ULRIC OF AUGSBURG, it had ties with the GORZE-TRIER-EINSIEDELN circle, and, in the 12th century, with the HIRSAU-FRUTTUARIA-SANKT-BLASIEN group. In 1213 the abbatial territory was given the status of a county; the abbot was invested with pontificalia in 1238. He was made a prince of the empire in 1360, and thenceforth Kempten accepted only noblemen as monks. In 1419 it gained EXEMPTION. The 15th and 16th centuries saw the beginnings of reform, but the inroads of the Swabian nobility, peasant uprisings in 1491 and 1525 with looting of church and monastery, strife with the town, and the REFORMATION made reform ineffective. The famous printing press whose tradition is maintained by the Kösel publishing house was established at Kempten in 1593. Prince-Abbot Johann Euchar von Wolfurt (1616-31) saw the abbey looted by Swedes and townsmen in the Thirty Years' War. Under Roman Giel of Gielsberg, elected abbot in 1639 at the age of 27, Kempten joined the Lorraine Benedictine congregation (1649) and the Swiss congregation (1664), and with Christophorus of Schönau from Einsiedeln as subprior (at the request of the bishop of Constance and the nobility), the cloisters and church were rebuilt after 1651. The original church dated from the 10th to the 11th centuries; its interior and exterior baroque reconstruction and expansion were not completed until c. 1742; the old parish church of St. Lawrence still shows the influence of Sankt Gallen. When Kempten was dissolved in 1803, it ceded its holdings (18 square miles occupied by 42,000 people) to the state of Bavaria.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobiblioographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1510–11. R. HENGGELER, Profess-buch der fürstlichen Benediktinerabtei unserer lieben Frau zu Einsiedeln (Monasticon-Benedictinum Helvetiae 3; Einsiedeln 1934). K. HALLINGER, Gorze-Kluny, 2 v. (Studia anselmiana 22–25; Rome 1950–51). J. ROTTENKOLBER, Geschichte des hochfürstlichen Stiftes Kempten (Munich 1933); Geschichte des Allgäus (Munich 1951). A. SCHÄDLER, ed., 1200 Jahre Stift Kempten (Kempten 1952). H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte Schwabens, 2 v. (Stuttgart 1950–54). F. ZOEPFL, Das Bistum Augsburg und seine Bischöfe im Mittelalter (Munich 1955). Festschrift zur 900-Jahr-Feier des Klosters, 1056–1956, ed. G. SPAHR (Weingarten 1956). N. LIEB, Rokoko in der Residenz von Kempten (Kempten 1958).

[G. SPAHR]

KENNA, JOHN EDWARD

U.S. senator; b. Kanawha County, Va. (later W. Va.), April 10, 1848; d. Washington, D.C., Jan. 11, 1893. His father, Edward Kenna, was an Irish immigrant, and his mother, Margery Lewis, came from a prominent Virginia family. His childhood was spent in southern Missouri, where frontier conditions did not permit even an elementary education. In 1864 Kenna joined Gen. Joseph O. Shelby's Confederate forces and stayed with them until their surrender at Shreveport, La., in 1865. Kenna then returned to West Virginia, studied for three years at St. Vincent's College, Wheeling, and was admitted to the bar in 1870. That year he married Rosa Quigg; after her death he married Anna Benninghaus in 1876. In 1872 he was chosen prosecuting attorney for Kanawha County, and in 1875 he became justice pro tempore of the circuit court of his district. He was elected in 1876 to the national House of Representatives. After three terms in the House, he was elected to the U.S. Senate, where he served from 1883 until his death. In Congress Kenna sought Federal aid for improved navigation along the Kanawha River and advocated Federal regulation of railroads. As a leader of the Democratic party, he was chairman (1886, 1888) of the Democratic Congressional Committee and a spokesman in the Senate for the administration of President Grover Cleveland. He defended Cleveland's power to remove appointed officials from office and supported his demand for tariff reform in 1887.

[V. P. DE SANTIS]

KENNETH (CANICE) OF DERRY, ST.

Patron of Diocese of Ossory, Ireland; b. Glengiven, County Derry, 521 or 527 (Annals of Ulster); d. 599 or 600 (Annals of Ulster) or 603 (Annals of Inisfallen). Kenneth (Canice or Cainnech), one of the most famous early Irish saints, was born of poor parents. He studied at the great Irish monastic schools of Clonard and Glasnevin and later at St. Cadoc's, Llancarvan in Wales. He returned to Ireland and made his principal monastic foundation at Aghaboe, County Laois. One of his many foundations, that of Kilkenny, Ireland, later replaced Aghaboe as the principal church of Ossory. As a friend of COLUMBA OF IONA, Kenneth also traveled and preached extensively in Scotland. He had a Hebridean island foundation on Inchkenneth, not far from Iona. Devotion to the saint became widespread in Scotland, where he is known as Kenneth. In Ireland today" Canice" is preferred. He is invoked in some early Continental litanies of saints. St. Adamnan's biography of Columba pictures Kenneth's luminous personality.

Feast: Oct. 11.

Bibliography: Vitae sanctorum Hiberniae, comp. C. PLUM-MER, 2 v. (Oxford 1910) 1:152–169. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 1:394–395, 409. L. GOUGAUD, Les Saints irlandais hors d'Irlande (Louvain 1936). D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD, Scotland of the Saints (London 1952). ADAMNAN, Adamnan's Life of Columba, ed. and tr. A. O. and M. O. ANDERSON (London 1961).

[D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD]

KENOSIS

The INCARNATION is described as a humiliation or emptying (Greek $\kappa\epsilon\nu\delta\omega$) in Phil 2.7. The whole passage (2.5–11) is important because it is one of the great Christological texts of the New Testament and because it has been cited in support of a modern theory on the Incarnation known as kenoticism.

In Phil 2.5–11 Paul is probably quoting a hymn sung in the Palestinian Churches. As L. Cerfaux has shown, the movements of the third and fourth strophes (v. 7b and v. 9) are patterned on the Deutero-Isaian picture of the suffering and glorified Servant of the Lord (Is ch. 53; see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF). The words "every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord [κύριος]" is a brief act of faith like Rom 10.9 and 1 Cor 12.3 (see LORD, THE). Despite a wide variation in the interpretation of individual words and phrases, the mainstream of patristic exegesis is unanimous in seeing in this text a scriptural proof of the divinity of Christ, of His real and complete humanity, and of the unity of His Person.

The modern kenotic theory of the Incarnation began with Evangelical theologians in Germany in the 19th century. It was taken up by some Anglicans and Russian Orthodox. Common to all the types of kenotic theology is the thesis that the divine Word relinquished some or all of His divinity in becoming man: that He surrendered His omnipotence, His divine omniscience, His omnipresence; that He lost consciousness of His divinity; or even that He ceased to be God from the moment of the Incarnation until the Resurrection. For the kenotic school of theology there is no other way of reconciling a really human experience in Our Lord with belief in His divinity.

P. Henry's brilliant and exhaustive evaluation of kenotic theology makes the following points: the whole weight of impartial scholarship is against the kenotic interpretation of Phil 2.5–11; in all of Christian antiquity there is no trace of kenoticism in interpreting this passage; it is metaphysically impossible for God to change. On the other hand, a positive refutation of kenoticism must reckon with the questions it has raised. Was the human condition in all its fullness (e.g., the agony of decision) experienced by Our Lord? If so, what is to be said about such traditional theological assertions as that of Christ's foreknowledge?

See Also: JESUS CHRIST (IN THEOLOGY).

Bibliography: P. HENRY, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 5:7–161. A. GAUDEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 8.2:2339–49. F. LOOFS, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion & Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 7:680–687. L. CERFAUX, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (New York 1959). C. GORE, The Incarnation of the Son of God (Bampton Lectures; London 1891). D. G. DAWE, "A Fresh Look at the Kenotic Christologies," Scottish Journal of Theology 15 (1962) 337–349.

[J. M. CARMODY]

KENRAGHTY, MAURICE

Irish martyr; b. Kilmallock, date unknown; d. Clonmel, Tipperary, April 30, 1585. He was a silversmith's son. After earning his bachelor of theology degree abroad, Kenraghty became chaplain to Gerald, 16th Earl of Desmond. During Desmond's rebellion Kenraghty was captured in Sept. 1583 by Murtough MacSweeney, one of Lord Roche's mercenaries, and imprisoned in Clonmel. During Passiontide, 1585, Victor White, a citizen of Clonmel, bribed Kenraghty's jailer to release him for one night to administer the Sacraments. The jailer, however, betrayed them; White was arrested, but Kenraghty escaped. Apparently he surrendered himself in return for the release of White and was condemned to death for high treason. When he was offered pardon if he acknowledged the spiritual supremacy of the queen, he declined and was hanged, drawn, and quartered.

Bibliography: D. MURPHY, Our Martyrs (Dublin 1896). R. BAGWELL, Ireland Under the Tudors, 3 v. (London 1885–90). R. D. EDWARDS, Church and State in Tudor Ireland (New York 1935).

[J. G. BARRY]

KENRICK, FRANCIS PATRICK

Archbishop, author; b. Dublin, Ireland, Dec. 3, 1796; d. Baltimore, Md., July 8, 1863. He was the elder son of Jane (Eustace) and Thomas Kenrick, a successful scrivener. The second son, Peter Richard, became the first archbishop of St. Louis. Francis was educated in local schools under the tutelage of his pastor and uncle, Richard Kenrick, known as the Vincent de Paul of Dublin. At the age of 18 he went to Rome to study for the priesthood at the College of the Propaganda, where he made a brilliant record in Scripture and theology. On April 7, 1821, he was ordained by Abp. Alfonso Frattini, and shortly thereafter he volunteered for the American mission in Kentucky.

His first assignment was to teach theology, Church history, and liturgy at St. Joseph's Seminary, Bardstown, Ky. He also taught history and Greek in the college department. During these years he laid the foundation that made him the foremost theological scholar in the American Church. He was also pastor of the local congregation and acted as secretary to Bp. Benedict FLAGET. When named a preacher of the 1826 Jubilee Year, he quickly won acclaim throughout his diocese as an apologist ready to defend the teachings of the Church by either the spoken or written word. In 1828 his answer to an attack on the Real Presence was published as the Letters of Omega and Omicron on Transubstantiation (Louisville 1828). The following year he went to the First Provincial Council of Baltimore as Flaget's theologian and was chosen secretary of that assembly. Among the Council's problems was the difficulty with lay trustees in Philadelphia, which had proved too much for the aged Bp. Henry CON-WELL. The Council persuaded Rome to name Kenrick coadjutor of Philadelphia with full jurisdiction; on June 6, 1830, he was consecrated titular bishop of Arath in the Bardstown cathedral by Flaget.

Ordinary of Philadelphia. In 1830 the PHILADEL-PHIA diocese included the states of Pennsylvania and Delaware and what was known as West Jersey. Although Conwell had asked that Kenrick be named his coadjutor, the young bishop met with opposition from his superior when he tried to assume the administration. This situation was not fully remedied until Conwell's death in 1842, when Kenrick succeeded him as ordinary of Philadelphia.

One of Kenrick's first acts as coadjutor in Philadelphia was to attack the trustee problem by placing St.

Mary's Church under interdict until the lay trustees recognized his episcopal authority to name pastors. The following year (1832) he convoked the first diocesan synod, which enacted legislation that prevented the recurrence of trusteeism in the diocese; the policy was adopted by other American bishops. Two later synods, in 1842 and 1847, ensured uniformity of discipline and faced the problems arising from increasing immigration. The work of the bishop, his priests, and the Sisters of Charity, during the cholera epidemic in Philadelphia, including the use of St. Augustine's school as a hospital, won goodwill for the Church.

Kenrick was interested in helping the poor, and he used the royalties from his writings for this purpose. He promoted the temperance movement, but would not sponsor Father Theobald Mathew's program because he thought that it slighted the necessary spiritual means. Because he refused to become politically involved in the Irish Freedom Movement, he was not so popular as some of his Irish contemporaries in the American hierarchy. The diocesan newspaper the Catholic Herald, which he founded with the assistance of Michael HURLEY, OSA, and Father John Hughes, the future archbishop of New York, avoided purely political questions and was criticized for its conservative policy, even in Church affairs. The bishop refused to preside at the Masonic funeral of Stephen Girard from Holy Trinity Church, but he permitted burial in Holy Trinity cemetery without the benefit of clergy because Girard's sudden death had prevented his reconciliation with the Church.

During the early years of his administration, Kenrick founded St. Charles Borromeo, the diocesan seminary. To supply textbooks for his seminarians he wrote four volumes of Theologica Dogmatica (Philadelphia 1834–40) and three volumes of Theologia Moralis (Baltimore 1860–61). At the time of his promotion to Baltimore he had translated all of the New Testament and most of the Old. Among his works defending the Church against the attacks of non-Catholics are The Primacy of the Apostolic See Vindicated (Philadelphia 1845) and The Catholic Doctrine on Justification (Philadelphia 1841). A Treatise on Baptism and a Treatise on Confirmation (Baltimore 1852) stressed the necessity of sacramental Baptism and the normal manner of receiving the Holy Spirit in opposition to Quaker and some Baptist teachings.

He fostered a parochial school system that embraced half of the parishes in the diocese and encouraged the founding of the Augustinian college (University), Villanova (1842), and the Jesuit college, St. Joseph's (1851), as well as several private academies and convent schools. He successfully contested compulsory attendance at instructions based on the King James Version of the Bible in Philadelphia public schools. Although he wanted the children of each sect to be permitted to read their own Bible, his stand was distorted into the calumny that "the Catholic bishop wants to take the Bible out of the public schools." This served as an inflammatory note for the Native-American riots of 1844 in which St. Michael's and St. Augustine's churches were burned and St. Phillip's destroyed. Despite criticism, Kenrick restrained his angry flock from retaliation. By temporarily closing the churches in the troubled areas and turning over the keys of church properties, he placed the burden of protection on the civil authorities. His moderation saved bloodshed, and in the public reaction against the "church-burners" he received many noted converts into the Church.

In the 21 years of his administration of Philadelphia, Kenrick made 19 visitations by stagecoach and horseback over a territory extending from Lake Erie to Cape May, N.J., and from the southern boundary of New York to the eastern boundary of West Virginia, an area equal to that of England, Scotland, and Wales. During his rule the number of churches increased from 22 to 92, priests from 35 to 101, and the Catholic population from 35,000 to 170,000, even though the new Diocese of Pittsburgh had removed the western part of the state from Philadelphia's jurisdiction.

Archbishop of Baltimore. On Aug. 3, 1851, Kenrick was promoted to the See of Baltimore. The following year he presided over the First Plenary Council as apostolic delegate. At the request of Pius IX in 1853, he collected the opinions of the American bishops concerning a definition of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception and was in Rome for its promulgation in 1854. Through his efforts the Forty Hours devotion was introduced into the U.S. As he had done in Philadelphia, he encouraged each parish to found its own school. In Baltimore he completed his translation of the Sacred Scriptures and continued his contributions to scholarly periodicals.

Kenrick was considered the leading American moral theologian of his generation. During the Civil War, he held the opinion that the institution of slavery under certain protective conditions was not in itself immoral. As the leader of the American hierarchy he stated his position in an address on Christian patriotism in which he taught that national loyalty should prevail over state patriotism. This teaching was not popular with many Marylanders dedicated to the South. Because of his policy of aloofness from all political entanglements, he was disturbed by the pro-Southern editorial policy of Baltimore's Catholic Mirror. It seems that his death was hastened by reports of the slaughter at Gettysburg. His cause for canonization was being considered by the Church authorities of Philadelphia when it was decided instead to promote that of his successor, John Neumann, who was beatified in 1963.

Bibliography: H. J. NOLAN, The Most Reverend Francis Patrick Kenrick (Catholic University of America Studies in American Church History 37; Washington 1948). J. J. O'SHEA, The Two Kenricks (Philadelphia 1904). F. E. TOURSCHER, ed., The Kenrick-Frenaye Correspondence, 1830–1862 (Philadelphia 1920); Diary and Visitation Record of Rt. Rev. Francis Patrick Kenrick (Lancaster, Pa. 1916).

[H. J. NOLAN]

KENRICK, PETER RICHARD

First archbishop of St. Louis, author; b. Dublin, Ireland, Aug. 17, 1806; d. St. Louis, Mo., March 4, 1896. Upon completion of his education at St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, Ireland, he was ordained on March 6, 1832. A year later he traveled to Philadelphia at the invitation of his elder brother, Francis Patrick, the bishop of that diocese. There he became rector of the cathedral, president of the seminary, and vicar-general. It was during this time that he also published The New Month of Mary (1840), The Validity of Anglican Ordinations (1841), and The Holy House of Loretto (1842). On Nov. 30, 1841, he was named coadjutor bishop of St. Louis and was consecrated in Philadelphia by Bishop Joseph ROSA-TI of St. Louis. Rosati then left for Haiti, under the commission of Gregory XVI, sending Kenrick to administer the St. Louis diocese in his absence. When Rosati died on Sept. 25, 1843, Kenrick became bishop of St. Louis. On Jan. 30, 1847, Pius IX raised St. Louis to an archdiocese, appointing Kenrick as its first archbishop. It was almost two years, however, before Kenrick received the pallium, and another year before he had suffragan sees assigned to him.

Kenrick's lengthly tenure in St. Louis was characterized by an impressive growth of the area and of the Church. During his time, the population of the city rose from 20,000 to 500,000; the Catholic population of the see, from 100,000 to 200,000, although the size of the archdiocese was substantially reduced. The number of priests increased from 75 in the early 1840s to 350 near the end of the nineteenth century; parishes increased from 39 to 165. Part of this growth in parishes was made possible by the bank that Kenrick established to help finance diocesan programs; he managed and supervised the bank until the late 1860s. After the Civil War, Missouri adopted the so-called Drake constitution, which forbade any clergyman from preaching or solemnizing marriages without first taking an oath of loyalty to the State. When one of his priests was imprisoned for failing to take the oath, Kenrick appealed the case to the U.S. Supreme Court, which overruled two previous decisions of Missouri courts that the oath was constitutional.

Kenrick played an active role in VATICAN COUNCIL I as one of the leaders of the minority party that opposed the definition of papal infallibility. He not only held that definition was inopportune because it would keep interested non-Catholics from the Church and possibly cause a schism within it, but, theoretically, he believed that papal pronouncements were infallible only if the bishops of the world concurred in them. For these reasons, he vigorously opposed the definition of papal infallibility as understood by the majority in the council and published in Naples his Concio, a pamphlet that represented the general views of the minority. Following the definition, the pamphlet was condemned by the Congregation of the Index, but it did not appear on the list of prohibited works.

While in Rome, Kenrick asked the cardinal prefect of the Congregation of Propaganda Fide for a coadjutor. Approximately one year after his return from the council, he consecrated Patrick J. Ryan, who had been serving as administrator of the archdiocese. For reasons not altogether clear from extant sources, Ryan thereafter performed all episcopal functions in the archdiocese and governed it with the assistance of the vicar-general. Meanwhile Kenrick, though still retaining the powers of governing, went into what was equivalent to retirement. For 12 years Ryan ordained, confirmed, made the parish visitations, and dedicated the churches, until 1884 when he was appointed archbishop of Philadelphia. With Ryan's departure from St. Louis, Kenrick abandoned his retirement and once again took up the customary episcopal duties. He also attended the Third Plenary Council in Baltimore (1884).

In the early 1890s the pastors of St. Louis petitioned Cardinal James Gibbons for a coadjutor; the Holy See named Bishop John J. Kain of Wheeling, who arrived in St. Louis on Aug. 23, 1893, and was made administrator on December 14. On May 21, 1895, the Holy See appointed him archbishop of St. Louis and named Kenrick titular archbishop of Marcianopolis.

It was characteristic of Kenrick to formulate an opinion and then stand by it. Incidents throughout his life indicate that he was independent in his thinking and strong-willed. When he first asked for a coadjutor, for instance, he did so against the advice of his brother, Francis Patrick, then archbishop of Baltimore. When the proposition to publish his brother's revised English version of the Sacred Scriptures was introduced at the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866), Peter Kenrick was its chief opponent. At the time of the Civil War, he refused to allow the U.S. flag to be flown from his cathedral as some other bishops had done. He was so generally suspect for his Southern sympathies that Secretary of State William Seward questioned Archbishop John Hughes of New York about having Kenrick removed from his see by the Vatican.

A judgment concerning such resolute independence is difficult to make and is complicated by the fact that much of Kenrick's correspondence has been lost; at times what is available is not conclusive and may even be contradictory. For 54 years he acted as administrator, as bishop, and then as archbishop of St. Louis; Pius IX called Kenrick "a great man" and Leo XIII referred to him as "a noble man and a true Christian bishop."

Bibliography: J. E. ROTHENSTEINER, History of the Archdiocese of St. Louis, 2 v. (St. Louis 1928). H. J. NOLAN, The Most Reverend Francis Patrick Kenrick, Third Bishop of Philadelphia, 1830–1851 (Washington 1948).

[J. LEIBRECHT]

KENTIGERN (MUNGO), ST.

Bishop of Glasgow, Scotland, and apostle of the ancient British kingdom of Strathclyde; d. c. 612. Very little is known for certain about him. Of the five known sources of his life that describe his mother as the British princess Theneuu and recount his miracles, his friendship with St. Servanus, and his meeting with St. COLUMBA, none is earlier than the 12th century. The two main sources are the Life written by an anonymous cleric for Bishop Herbert of Glasgow (1147–64) and that written by Jocelin of Furness for Bishop Jocelin of Glasgow (1175–99). It is suggested, however, that both these authors drew on earlier Lives, one of which was composed shortly after the saint's death. That he was bishop of Glasgow and labored in the Clyde Valley can hardly be doubted.

Feast: Jan. 14 (formerly Jan. 13).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Jan. 2:97–103. K. H. JACKSON, "The Sources for the Life of St. Kentigern," in Studies in the Early British Church, by N. CHADWICK et al. (Cambridge, Eng. 1958) 273–357. J. MACQUEEN, "Yvain, Ewen, and Owein ap Urien," Transactions of the Dumfriesshire and Galloway Natural History and Antiquarian Society, 33 (1954–55) 107–131; 36 (1959) 175–183. R. B. HALE, The Beloved St. Mungo, Founder of Glasgow (Ottawa 1989). JOCELINUS OF FURNESS, Saint Mungo: Also Known as Kentigern, ed. I. MACDONALD (Edinburgh 1993).

[L. MACFARLANE]

KENTUCKY, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

By 2000, Catholics constituted about 10 percent of the population in the state of Kentucky. In addition to the Holy Land area near Bardstown, the greater numbers of these lived in cities along the Ohio River that had received significant inflow of German and Irish immigrants in the 19th century. They are concentrated in Louisville, Owensboro, Covington, Henderson and Paducah. In many areas of Kentucky, especially in the south and east, it is not uncommon to find only one Catholic congregation per county. There are four Catholic jurisdictions in the state: the Archdiocese of Louisville, and the dioceses of Covington (1853), Owensboro (1937), and Lexington (1988).

Early History. The early Catholics in Kentucky were a resourceful group of pioneers. Initially without priests, their earliest parishes were gathered by laity. Their first seminary (St. Thomas) had its beginnings on a flatboat coming down the Ohio River. One of their first colleges (St. Mary's) began life in an old distillery building. One of their pioneer priests was Stephen BADIN, the first priest ordained in the United States.

In 1808 Pope Pius VII established America's first inland diocese at Bardstown in Nelson County, Kentucky. Nelson, Marion and Washington counties came to be known as Kentucky's "Catholic Holy Land." The designation results both from the history of the area as well as from its ongoing institutions—such as St. Joseph's Proto-Cathedral, numerous parishes, three large motherhouses of sisters and the Abbey of Gethsemani. The sizable population of Catholics in the area is something of a rarity in the rural South.

The first Catholics in Kentucky came almost entirely from Maryland, including the William Coomes family and Dr. George Hart, who settled at Harrodsburg in 1775. Dr. Hart was one of the first physicians, and Mrs. Coomes conducted the first elementary school in Kentucky. The first Catholic colony, consisting of 25 families led by Basil Hayden, came in the spring of 1785 to establish the Pottinger Creek settlement, a few miles from Bardstown. Before Kentucky was admitted to the Union in 1792, there were at least six distinct colonies settled on the creeks in an arc around Bardstown. The first priest to be assigned to Kentucky by Bishop John Carroll was an Irish Franciscan, Charles Whelan, who, in the fall of 1787, accompanied a group from Maryland. A controversy over his salary, issuing in a court case, forced Whelan to leave Kentucky after two-and-a-half years of service. In 1791 Rev. William De Rohan arrived with a group from North Carolina. Under his direction, the Pottinger Creek Catholics built a log chapel, named variously Holy Cross and Sacred Heart, which was the first Catholic place of worship in Kentucky. However, his ministry, unauthorized by Carroll, soon met with many difficulties, and De Rohan was deprived of his faculties. Thereafter, he taught

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of Louisville	1937
Diocese of Covington	1853
Diocese of Lexington	1988
Diocese of Owensboro	1937

in various Catholic settlement schools, and resided at St. Thomas Seminary, where he died in 1832.

In 1793, Rev. Stephen T. Badin, the first priest to be ordained in the United States, with Rev. Michael Barrieres arrived in Kentucky from Baltimore. On the first Sunday in Advent, Badin said Mass in the home of Denis McCarthy at Lexington; he remained in the Scott County settlement for more than a year before moving to Pottinger's Creek. Three miles from the chapel at Holy Cross, he purchased a farm, which he named St. Stephen's. From this place (later the site of the motherhouse of the Sisters of Loretto), Badin directed Catholic life for the next 15 years. Among the 70,000 Kentuckians in 1793 Badin estimated there were about 300 Catholic families, to whom he alone ministered until February 1797, when Carroll sent Rev. Michael Fournier to his aid. Two years later, Rev. Anthony Salmon joined them, and shortly after, Rev. John Thayer of Boston was added to the group. However, Salmon was killed by a fall from his horse in 1799, and in 1803 Fournier died and Thayer departed, leaving Badin alone once again.

In 1805 help arrived in the person of the Belgian priest, Charles NERINCKX, who soon began the erection of Holy Mary, the first of ten churches he was to build in less than ten years. The Dominican, Edward D. FENW-ICK, also arrived that spring to look for land; a year later he returned with three English confreres, Samuel T. Wilson, William R. Tuite, and Robert A. Angier, to establish the first foundation of the Dominican Order in the United States at Springfield. By 1807 they had enrolled 12 boys in their seminary, and two years later they dedicated St. Rose Church, a brick structure. In 1809 the Dominicans opened St. Thomas College, the first Catholic college in the West, which for 20 years provided a classical education for many prominent Southerners, including Jefferson Davis. With Nerinckx, there had also come into Kentucky in 1805 a group of Trappist monks, led by Dom Urbain Guillet. After a short stay with Badin, the monks moved to a farm on Pottinger's Creek and finally bought land on the Green River in Casey County, where they began a free school for boys, the first Catholic school in Kentucky. In 1809 Dom Urbain transferred the group to the Illinois country after seven priests and eight brothers had died in the attempt to found the community in Kentucky.

Diocese. As early as October 1804, Carroll asked Badin for a report on the possibility of establishing a diocese in Kentucky; every year thereafter Badin discussed the idea with the bishop. In 1807 the missionary recommended that the see be located at Bardstown and the first incumbent be Benedict FLAGET. Among the names submitted to Rome by Carroll were Flaget, Badin (whom some, including the Dominicans, feared might be selected), Wilson, and Nerinckx. In 1808 Rome finally acted, creating Baltimore an archdiocese with suffragan sees at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Bardstown.

Flaget. Flaget, shocked by his nomination to Bardstown, tried to refuse the office, going to France to plead with his Sulpician superiors for support in his stand. However, when the Pope ordered him to accept, he gave up his resistance and spent his time in France gathering recruits for his new diocese. Upon their return, Archbishop Carroll consecrated Flaget on November 4, 1810, in Fells Point, Maryland, and the following May the new bishop set out for Kentucky.

Immediately after his installation in Bardstown on June 9, 1811, he began a visitation of the Kentucky congregations organized by Badin and Nerinckx. On December 21, 1811, Flaget ordained Chabrat at St. Rose, the first ordination in Kentucky and in the West. Three miles from Bardstown, on the Thomas Howard plantation, he established St. Thomas Seminary, and by 1816 a brick church was erected there. In 1812 two distinctly American sisterhoods were founded: the Sisters of LORETTO and the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, both of which flourished, staffing schools, orphanages, and hospitals throughout the diocese and the country. In 1822 another native Kentuckian sisterhood, the Dominican Sisters of St. Catharine, was formed by Wilson at St. Rose, Springfield. The order later spread to conduct hospitals, a college, and grade and high schools.

The first diocesan synod was called by Flaget on February 20, 1812; five seculars and three Dominican priests attended. This period also marked the beginning of the dispute between Badin and Flaget over Church lands. Title to practically all land was held by Badin, who had purchased many acres with his own money or funds he had personally borrowed. The bishop thought that Badin should turn over to him all titles, with no conditions; Badin argued that Flaget should at least assume the outstanding debts. Since Canon Law was not clear on the subject and Carroll would make no decision, the matter went unsettled and was partly the cause of Badin's departure for Europe in 1819. On his return nine years later, Badin performed missionary work in various states, returning frequently to Kentucky, where in later years he was again invested with the title of vicar-general. The land question was evidently settled when Badin made the transfer in his last will.

During his long episcopate, Flaget's visitations took him to Catholic settlements throughout a vast territory that ultimately embraced not only Kentucky, but also Tennessee, Indiana, Missouri, Ohio, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan. He administered Confirmation, settled disputes over TRUSTEEISM, negotiated with Indian commissioners, and directed the progress of the Church. In 1816 Flaget blessed the cornerstone of St. Joseph's Cathedral in Bardstown, which was dedicated on August 8, 1819. The first cathedral west of the Alleghenies, it has been named a national monument by the Federal government. A seminary was opened next to the cathedral and the seminarians moved from St. Thomas to Bardstown. In the fall of 1819 Rev. George Elder founded St. Joseph's College in the basement of the seminary, and within a year another building was necessary to accommodate the students. In 1821 Rev. William Byrne founded St. Mary's College near Lebanon on property acquired by Nerinckx, who had intended it for the establishment of a brotherhood. As there were only two members for the proposed community, the college remained there and in 1833 was entrusted to Jesuits Peter Chazelle and Nicholas Petit. Four years later, it was granted a charter by the state, and the next year a novitiate was opened there. The Jesuits kept this college until 1846 when they left to accept St. John's College, Fordham, New York City, on the invitation of John Hughes, later archbishop of New York. Two years later a group of Jesuits from Missouri entered the diocese, serving in Bardstown and establishing a free school and St. Aloysius College in Louisville. In 1868 the Jesuits again left the diocese.

In 1832 when Flaget decided to resign his see, Rome designated his coadjutor, John David, whom he had consecrated in 1819, as his successor. However, the uproar that ensued in Catholic Kentucky led the Holy See to reverse the action, and the see was returned to Flaget. On July 20, 1834, when Chabrat was consecrated as the second coadjutor of Bardstown, many of the priests, especially the faculty of St. Joseph College, were opposed to this promotion. Although there remained a great deal of unrest and dissatisfaction, Chabrat made no major blunders and satisfactorily directed the diocese during the several years Flaget was in Europe. Failing eyesight caused Chabrat to retire to France in 1846; he died at Mauriac, November 21, 1868.

When Flaget made his first ad limina visit to Rome in 1836, he petitioned for the removal of the see from Bardstown to Louisville. This was done in 1841, four years after the boundaries of the diocese had been reduced to the single state of Kentucky. Bishop David died July 12, 1841, in Nazareth, Kentucky, and was buried there.

Soon after Martin J. SPALDING's return from Rome in 1834 he joined the faculty of the seminary and the college in Bardstown and initiated the publication of the first Catholic periodical of Kentucky, a monthly literary magazine, the St. Joseph College Minerva. After a year it was succeeded by a weekly newspaper, the Catholic Advocate under Benjamin J. Webb, which was to last 15 years before merging with the Cincinnati paper.

Flaget's invitation to the French sisters of the Institute of the Good Shepherd was accepted in 1843 when they established a house in Louisville. In December 1848, a colony of 40 Trappists purchased 1,600 acres in Nelson County from the Sisters of Loretto. This foundation of Gethsemani, which was raised to the rank of abbey in July 1850, gave the diocese seven religious communities. Flaget consecrated Martin J. Spalding coadjutor bishop of Louisville on Sept. 10, 1848. The following year the cornerstone of the new Cathedral of the Assumption in Louisville was blessed. When Flaget died on Feb. 11, 1850, he was 87 and had been a priest for 62 years and a bishop for almost 40. Buried first in the garden of the Good Shepherd convent, his remains were later transferred to the crypt of the cathedral in Louisville.

Flaget was succeeded by his coadjutor, Bishop Martin John Spalding who served until 1864 when he was transferred to Baltimore. In 1853 the diocese of Covington was erected by separating the eastern part of Kentucky from Louisville.

The Civil War took its toll on Catholic institutions in the state. The colleges and academies of the Holy Land were especially hard hit in their enrollments. St. Joseph's College in Bardstown had to close and was commandeered for a military hospital. Train accommodations were in such short supply that Bishop Martin John Spalding was once required to ride back to Louisville in a baggage car with soldiers' corpses.

In the years after the war, the turbulent administration of Bishop William George McCloskey began (1868–1909). At Rome during the Vatican Council, he long opposed the declaration of papal infallibility as inopportune, eventually joining the large number who accepted it. At home he managed to quarrel frequently and publicly with his priests as well as with many of the religious communities in the diocese. He once placed the motherhouse of the Sisters of Loretto under interdict over an insurance issue. During these disputes a number of priests left the diocese, perhaps the best known was the intellectual John Lancaster Spalding (1840–1916), nephew of bishop Martin John Spalding and later first bishop of Peoria.

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the state was home to a group of lively and talented Catholic laity: Colonel Patrick Henry Callahan (1866–1941), an early national figure in furthering social justice issues as elucidated by papal social encyclicals; poet Elvira Sydnor Miller (1860–1937); writer Charles T. O'Malley (1851–1910); John Whallen (1850–1913) and James Whallen (1851–1930), brothers, who ran the Democratic political machine in Louisville; and Colonel Matt Winn (1861–1941) who turned the Kentucky Derby into an international event. Additionally, in this era there was Daniel Rudd (1854–1933), a national black lay leader who helped to bring together congresses of African American Catholics in the 1890s. He grew up in the area, moved away, but was buried at Bardstown.

The Catholic Church in Kentucky has had a long, venerable tradition with academic institutions. Five Catholic higher education centers stand proudly in the commonwealth today: Spalding University opened in 1920 in Louisville as Nazareth College, continuing an educational tradition of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth dating back to 1814. St. Catharine Junior College at Springfield was founded by the Dominican Sisters in 1931. Bellarmine College in Louisville, established in 1950, merged with the city's Ursuline College in 1968. Bellarmine, a university since 2000, hosts the international Thomas Merton Studies Center. Covington is home to Thomas More College, originally founded as Villa Madonna in 1921. Brescia University in Owensboro began in 1925 as a junior college for women on the grounds of the motherhouse of the Ursuline Sisters of Mount St. Joseph.

Bibliography: J. A. BOONE, ed., The Roman Catholic Diocese of Owensboro, Kentucky (Owensboro 1995). T. D. CLARK, A History of Kentucky (Lexington 1977). C. F. CREWS, An American Holy Land (Wilmington 1987). J. HAYDEN, ed., This Far by Faith: The Story of Catholicity in Western Kentucky (Owensboro 1987). L. HARRISON and J. KLOTTER, A New History of Kentucky (Lexington 1997). J. H. SCHAUINGER, Cathedrals in the Wilderness (Milwaukee 1952). M. R. MATTINGLY, The Catholic Church on the Kentucky Frontier, 1785–1812 (Washington, D.C. 1936). P. E. RYAN, History of the Diocese of Covington, Kentucky (Covington 1954). M. J. SPALDING, Sketches of the Early Catholic Missions of Kentucky (Louisville 1844). B. WEBB, The Centenary of Catholicity in Kentucky (Louisville 1884).

[V. P. MCMURRY/C. F. CREWS]

KENYA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A temperate, humid, agricultural country located in equatorial East Africa, the Republic of Kenya is bordered on the southeast by the Indian Ocean, on the south by Tanzania, on the west by UGANDA, on the north by ETHIO- Capital: Nairobi. Size: 224,960 sq. miles. Population: 30,339,770 in 2000.

Languages: English, Kiswahili; indigenous languages are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 8,495,135 Catholics (28%), 2,901,780 Muslims (10%), 11,529,112 Protestants (38%), 70,980,073 indigenous beliefs (23%), 315,670 other (1%).

PIA, on the northeast by SUDAN and on the east by SOMA-LIA. A former British crown colony, Kenya was granted extensive internal autonomy in 1960, following years of ethnic unrest and bloodshed. It achieved independence as a Commonwealth nation on Dec. 12, 1963. With a landscape that ranges from mountain peaks to arid plains to coastal lowlands, Kenya is noted for its wildlife and its rivers. Coffee and tea are among the country's main exports. While natural resources in the region include veins of gold, rubies and garnets, Kenya's economic growth is founded primarily on agriculture, as well as the manufacture of small consumer goods, agricultural processing, cement and tourism. Kenyans are primarily a tribal people representing Kikuyu, Luhya, Luo, Kamba, Kisii, Kalenjin, Meru and other African peoples. The life expectancy for an adult Kenyan male was under 47 years in 2000.

Church History. In Kenya's Great Rift Valley some of the earliest hominid fossil remains have been discovered by paleontologists. Arabs settled the region in the 7th century, remaining near the Kenyan coast to allow for trade. Portuguese traders appeared along that same coastal region from 1498 onward, but systematic Christian evangelization of Kenya's native peoplespredominately the Masaii and Kikuyu, who entered the region in the mid-18th century— was begun by Protestant missionaries in 1844. This Protestant influence increased after 1887 when Kenya fell under the control of the British East Africa Company. The HOLY GHOST FA-THERS entered the region from Tanganyika in 1892, and Kenya became subject to the Prefecture Apostolic of Zanzibar (vicariate in 1906). The CONSOLATA MISSION-ARY Fathers came in 1902, the MILL HILL MISSIONARIES in 1904 and ST. PATRICK'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY in 1953. Native apathy, language difficulties and Muslim influences in the country's coastal areas presented formidable obstacles to evangelization efforts, but Catholicism grew, especially through its promotion of education.

In 1920 Kenya became a British crown colony. Improved by railways to enhance trade, portions of the country were set apart for the exclusive habitation of the many British who immigrated to Africa. Ultimately native Kenyans, let by nationalist leader Jomo Kenyatta, de-

Archdioceses	Suffragans
Kisumu	Bungoma, Eldoret, Homa Bay,
	Kakamenga, Kisii, Kitale, Lodwar
Mombasa	Garissa, Malindi
Nairobi	Kericho, Kitui, Machakos, Nakuru
	Ngong
Nyeri	Embu, Meru, Marsabit, Muranga
The is an apostolic v	ricariate at Isiolo. The region also has a manded equal representation in government, as well as a dismantling of the social constructs separating the races. This rising nationalism led to the Mau Mau movement of the 1950s, during which time many African Christians were killed. Even during World War II and the Mau Mau terrorism, Church efforts among Kenyan natives continued, and conversions, particularly among the Kikuyu, increased. Providing the continued opportunity for Kenyans to receive a basic education certainly ranked among the most praiseworthy charitable efforts of the Kenyan Catholic Church during the 20th century.

In 1953 the Church hierarchy was established, and Nairobi, the capital, became the seat of an archdiocese and metropolitan see for the country. At the time of Kenya's independence in 1963 about 10 percent of the inhabitants were Muslims, 20 percent were Christians (including 820,000 Protestants) and the rest practiced indigenous beliefs that sometimes incorporated Christian elements

Kenyatta, who served as the first president of the new republic, died in 1978, and Daniel arap Moi succeeded to power. Unpopular, inefficient and corrupt, Moi's government sparked further unrest and a failed coup attempt before he agreed to elections in 1991. His continued victory in multiparty elections held during the 1990s did nothing to stabilize Kenyan politics, and ethnic violence continued. In 1998 the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi was bombed, leaving numerous victims; the Church played an active role in alleviating the suffering that followed this tragedy. Despite the government corruption throughout the country, Kenya's Catholic Church leaders continued to speak out against poverty, ethnic prejudice and other social issues that threatened the quality of life in Kenya into the 21st century. Among the most vocal of these leaders were Archbishop of Nairobi Raphael Ndingi Mwana a' Nzeki and Father John Kaiser, a Mill Hill Missionary. Father Kaiser was murdered in August of 2000, his death believed to be a consequence of his outspoken attacks against the government; investigations into his death were continually stalled by the police.

Despite the controversy surrounding his administration, Moi advocated many social policies in line with Catholic doctrine. For example, in 1996 he prohibited the teaching of sex education in Kenyan schools. While the government continued to respect religious freedom, it actively restricted some non-worship activities of the Church. In April of 2000 police broke up a gathering of Catholics in a Laikipia Church on the grounds that the participants were suspected freedom fighters. Ecumenical efforts by the Church in Kenya included the creation of the Inter-Faith Peace Movement, bringing together Muslims, Catholics, Hindus and Protestants; despite such efforts, clashes between Muslims and Christian sects were reported throughout the 1990s, and in 1996 a basilica in Nairobi was desecrated by fundamentalist Christians.

Members of the el-Molo tribe attend Mass at the Catholic Mission in Loiyangallani, Kenya. (©Jeffrey L. Rotman/CORBIS)

By 2000 Kenya had 607 parishes tended by 860 secular and 877 religious priests, 609 brothers and 3,773 sisters. Over 220,000 baptisms were performed in the country during 1999.

Bibliography: K. INGHAM, A History of East Africa (London 1962). R. OLIVER, The Missionary Factor in East Africa (London 1952). Bilan du Monde 2:545–551. Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses, vicariates and prefectures. For additional bibliography, see AFRICA.

[J. J. O'MEARA/EDS.]

KEOGH, JAMES

Editor, theologian; b. Enniscorthy, Ireland, Feb. 4, 1834; d. Pittsburgh, Pa., July 10, 1870. He immigrated to the U.S. with his parents in 1841 and settled at Pittsburgh. Keogh received his doctorate in philosophy (1851) and theology (1855) from the College of the Propaganda, Rome, and was ordained on Aug. 5, 1856. He returned to Pittsburgh, where he served as convent chaplain and pastor of a mission church at Latrobe, Pa. In 1857 Bp. Michael O'Connor appointed him professor of dogmatic theology at St. Michael's Seminary, Glenwood, Pa. He became president of the seminary in 1863 and acted also as secretary to Bp. Michael Domenec, CM, and as editor of the diocesan newspaper, the Pittsburgh Catholic. Disagreement over the management of the seminary and the editorial policy of the newspaper caused him to resign his offices in 1865. He then lectured in theology at St. Charles Seminary, Philadelphia, Pa., and became the first editor of the Philadelphia Catholic Standard, founded in 1866. He was one of the secretaries of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866), and was considered for the post of American representative in the preparatory work for Vatican Council I. He was acquiring some reputation as a lecturer and contributor to the Catholic World when ill-health forced his retirement to Pittsburgh in 1868.

Bibliography: A. A. LAMBING, A History of the Catholic Church in the Dioceses of Pittsburgh and Allegheny (New York 1880).

[J. J. HENNESEY]

KEOGH, JOHN

Often called the father of the Newman apostolate in the U.S.; b. Philadelphia, Nov. 29, 1877; d. there, Oct. 14, 1960. He was ordained in 1909 for the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, and in 1913 was appointed first full-time chaplain to Catholic students at the University of Pennsylvania, where the first Newman club had been formed 20 years earlier. In 1917 Keogh became first national chaplain of the Federation of College Catholic Clubs, later known as the National Newman Club Federation. Keogh remained national chaplain until 1935. During these years, at his own expense he crossed the U.S. many times, urging bishops to provide Newman programs for Catholic students at secular colleges and universities. He often met with opposition. He was abused, criticized, ridiculed, and scolded for being "opposed to Catholic education"; yet eventually he won his point by the logic of his position and the persistence of his zeal. Although named pastor of a large Philadelphia parish, St. Gabriel's, in 1938, he maintained an active interest in the national Newman movement. He was one of the founders of the John Henry Cardinal Newman Honorary Society and in 1945 became its chaplain, a post he held until his death. He rarely missed a national Newman convention, and was an active member of the Newman Chaplains' Association from the time it was established in 1950. In the 50th year of his priesthood, Keogh was made a domestic prelate by Pope Pius XII. That same year he became the first priest to receive the Cardinal Newman Award, a citation normally given to a Catholic layman. Though remembered best for his pioneer work in the Newman apostolate, Keogh for many years was also president of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union.

[C. W. ALBRIGHT]

KEOUGH, FRANCIS PATRICK

Bishop of Providence, RI, archbishop of Baltimore, MD; b. New Britain, CT, Dec. 30, 1889; d. Washington, D.C., Dec. 8, 1961. The second son of Irish immigrants, Patrick and Margaret (Ryan) Keough, he attended parochial school in his native city and began his studies for the priesthood at St. Thomas Seminary, Hartford, Connecticut. In 1911 he was sent to the Sulpician Seminary at Issy, France, but he returned after the outbreak of World War I and continued his theological studies at St. Bernard's in Rochester, New York. He was ordained for the Hartford diocese on June 10, 1916. For three years he did parochial work; thereafter, until his appointment to Providence (Feb. 10, 1934), he was engaged in special diocesan assignments as institutional chaplain, director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, assistant chancellor, and secretary to the bishop. Keough was consecrated in his see city on May 22, 1934, by the newly appointed Apostolic Delegate, Abp. Amleto Cicognani, later cardinal and Vatican secretary of state. During his 13 years as ordinary of a heavily Catholic state, Keough founded a minor seminary, used his knowledge of French to soften differences that had risen between the Frenchspeaking and English-speaking members of his flock, and employed his financial talents to overcome entirely the heavy debts burdening the diocese at his arrival. Despite his reluctance to leave his native New England, he was appointed to the nation's premier see Nov. 29, 1947, and was installed in Baltimore's basilica-cathedral by Archbishop Cicognani on Feb. 24, 1948.

James Keogh.

Keough's new position of prestige led to numerous major appointments to the National Catholic Welfare Conference, where he had already served in many secondary posts. He played a decisive role in the issuance of the historic 1958 statement of the American Catholic hierarchy against racial discrimination. Always concerned about the needy, he built a residence for the elderly (Stella Maris) and a consolidated home for deprived school-age children (Villa Maria); he also took the initial steps for constructing a new St. Vincent's Infant Home and an adjacent maternity care residence (Villa St. Louise). His major building project was the construction (1954–59) of an $8 million cathedral from funds bequeathed by a Baltimore merchant, Thomas O'Neill. This Cathedral of Mary Our Queen became the metropolitan center on Sept. 21, 1959. Two years later the archbishop was buried beneath its main altar.

As a retiring man of childlike piety and conservative temperament, Keough preferred a gradual and quiet approach in solving the practical problems that completely absorbed his energies. Declining health, which began with a major illness in 1954, and the preoccupations of overseeing the construction of the new cathedral considerably restricted the general productivity of his later years.

[J. J. GALLAGHER]

KEPLER, JOHANN

Astronomer, mathematician, discoverer of the three laws of planetary motion; b. Weil der Stadt, Germany, Dec. 27, 1571; d. Regensburg, Germany, Nov. 15, 1630.

He was the son of Heinrich and Katharina (Guldenmann) Kepler. The Keplers, Lutherans in a predominantly Catholic city, were craftsmen, although their ancestors belonged to the minor nobility. Kepler attended German and Latin elementary schools, the Maulbronn seminary, and the Tübingen seminary, passing the master's examination in theology in 1591 but continuing at the university. There, Michael Maestlin, although following Ptolemaic astronomy in his writings, taught Kepler the essence of the Copernican theory.

Not his support of that doctrine, but his doubts about the interpretation of the Sacraments and his unwillingness to condemn the Calvinists completely, caused Kepler to incur his teachers' disfavor. In 1594, having been recommended by them as the best available candidate because of his mathematical and astronomical knowledge, Kepler became a mathematics teacher at the Protestant seminary in Graz, Austria.

In 1595 Kepler, believing that nothing in nature was created by God without a plan and influenced by Pythagoras, Plato, and others, suddenly thought of a geometrical structure of the universe that accounted for the number of planets and their relative distances from the sun by circumscribing the five regular solids about the planet spheres. The Mysterium Cosmographicum (1596), describing this, attracted the favorable attention of Tycho Brahe.

Kepler sought a parallax of the fixed stars. He could accept neither Tycho's geo-heliocentric system, which he considered a compromise, nor the enormous diameter of the sphere of fixed stars necessitated by a moving earth. He studied chronological problems, magnetism, the inclination of the ecliptic, and the weather, seeking the stars' influence on it. He planned his later work on the world harmony, noting Copernicus's allusion to the symmetry in the visible universe, and finding the regular solids as the basis of musical harmony. To test his theories, Kepler needed Tycho Brahe's accurate observations.

When the Counter Reformation triumphed in Graz, Kepler, although among those ordered to leave, received permission to return, possibly because of his friendship with the Catholic Bavarian chancellor. He never became Catholic and upheld the Augsburg Confession (see AUGS-BURG, CONFESSION OF).

Work with Tycho Brahe. When Graz became unbearable, Kepler accepted Tycho's invitation to visit him near Prague, and he finally moved there with his wife and stepdaughter. The two astronomers first met on Feb. 4, 1600. Kepler was assigned work on the Mars observations but did not obtain precise values for the eccentricities of the planet orbits and their distances from the sun that he needed to test his theories, nor was he granted access to the bulk of Tycho's observations.

When Tycho died on Oct. 24, 1601, Kepler succeeded him as imperial mathematician but at a lower and infrequently paid salary. Now all of Tycho's observations were at his disposal. Without acceding to Tycho's dying request to present the planetary motions in accordance with the Tychonic system, Kepler, whenever possible, showed where this system agreed with the observations.

Laws of Planetary Motion. Kepler believed that within the sun there was a force that moves the planets, their motion being so much the quicker the nearer they are to the sun. Using Tycho's observations of Mars, as though observing the earth from there, Kepler calculated the eccentricity of the earth's orbit, discovering that at the aphelion and the perihelion, and presumably everywhere, the speed of the earth is inversely proportional to its distance from the sun. Dividing half the earth's circular orbit into 180°, he calculated and added together the distances to the sun of each of these little arcs. Correct distances of the earth from the sun provided correct distances from Mars. His use of Mars was fortunate because of its large eccentricity.

His calculations resulted in the discovery (1602) of the second law of planet motion (the radius vector describes equal areas in equal times) and (1605) of the first law (planets move in ellipses with the sun at one focus), both announced in 1609 in the Astronomia Nova. Kepler replaced the geometrical systems with a dynamic one and abandoned the 2,000-year old principle of uniform circular motion. Under William GILBERT'S influence Kepler explained the deviation in radius vector by considering the planets as composed of magnetic filaments; one end of each filament was attracted by the sun, the other repelled.

In the Ad Vitellionem (1604) Kepler explained the inverted image on the retina, improved the formula for refraction, and discussed the apparent diameters of the celestial bodies and of eclipses. This book is important in the history of infinitesimal calculus, as are his Astronomia Nova and his work on the shapes of wine casks (Latin, 1615; German, 1616) in which he replaced Archimedes' "exhaustion method" by a direct method and contributed to the theory of regular solids.

Kepler described the 1604 nova in German and Latin tracts. He placed it among the fixed stars, thought it an agglomeration of heavenly material, and considered its appearance to be God's manner of exhorting men. The comet of 1607 received similar treatment.

Galileo's Sidereus Nuncius (1610) drew a favorable reply from Kepler, whose Dioptrice (1611) gave an exhaustive treatment of the passage of light through lenses.

In 1611 Kepler's wife and one of his three children died. The emperor, deposed in 1611, died early in 1612. Thereupon, Kepler moved to Linz, remaining as district mathematician until 1626. During that time he remarried; fathered six children; witnessed his mother's witch trial; and published the Epitome of Copernican Astronomy (1618, 1620, 1621), the World Harmony (1619), which announced the third planet law (the squares of the times of the revolution of two planets are to each other as the cubes of their mean distances from the sun), a work on logarithms, and other tracts. He worked on the Somnium (1634), begun in Tübingen, describing a journey to the moon and the earth viewed from there, and completed the Rudolphine Tables (1627), based on Tycho's observations but on the Copernican-Keplerian system of the universe.

His last years were spent in Ulm and in Sagan, in Wallenstein's employ. He died while seeking funds owed him by the Imperial Treasury.

Johann Kepler.

Bibliography: M. CASPAR, Kepler, tr. and ed. C. D. HELLMAN (New York 1959); ed., Bibliographia Kepleriana (Munich 1936).

[C. D. HELLMAN]

KERBY, WILLIAM JOSEPH

Sociologist, writer, editor, and organizer of Catholic social work; b. Lawler, Iowa, Feb. 20, 1870; d. Washington, D.C., July 27, 1936. Kerby had the advantage of unusually devoted Catholic parents, Daniel and Ellen (Rochford). His father was able to personally teach him the rudiments of Latin and Greek, and his mother schooled him in personal service to the needy. For his secondary and college training, he was sent to St. Joseph's College, now Loras College, Dubuque, Iowa. Afterward he studied for the priesthood at St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, Wis., and was ordained in Dubuque on Dec. 21, 1892. He was then sent to the Catholic University of America, where he obtained the licentiate in theology in 1894, returning to teach at the college in Dubuque in that year.

When Catholic University decided to introduce sociology into its curriculum, it invited him to take charge of the subject. He was sent to Europe in 1895, attended Bonn and Berlin universities, and received his doctorate in social and political science from Louvain in 1897. That fall he began his long career with the department of sociology at the Catholic University.

Kerby's interpretation of sociology was strongly influenced by his great concern for the welfare of the needy and the underprivileged. His major impact was therefore in social service, an area that in those days was not sharply distinguished from sociology. It has been truly said that he deserves the title of founder of scientific social work among the Catholics in the United States. He was a moving spirit in the organization of the National Conference of Catholic Charities in 1910. From 1911 to 1917 he edited the Saint Vincent de Paul Quarterly. He was also a prime mover in organizing the first Catholic school for social workers. Moreover in books, such as The Social Mission of Charity, in numerous periodical articles, in his work as editor of the American Ecclesiastical Review, and especially in his personal contacts he deeply impressed his generation.

On April 19, 1934 Kerby was made a domestic prelate. By this time his health had begun to fail and he had resigned as head of the department of sociology at the Catholic University. He was able to continue many of his activities up to the last.

Bibliography: J. J. BURKE, "The Rt. Rev. William J. Kerby: An Appreciation," Ecclesiastical Review 95 (1936) 225–233.

[P. H. FURFEY]

KERGUIN, JEANNE MARIE, ST.

In religion Marie de Ste. Nathalie (or Mary of the Nativity), martyr, religious of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary; b. May 5, 1864, Belle-Isle en Terre, Brittany, France; d. July 9, 1900, Taiyüan, China. Born into a peasant family, Jeanne Marie assumed responsibility for household duties following her mother's death. In 1887, she was received into the novitiate of the Missionaries of Mary, where she worked on the farm and joyfully attended to menial chores. Following her novitiate she was assigned to Paris, then Carthage—where she fell ill—then Rome. Although her health was still a concern, she was sent to China in March 1899, where she was beheaded a little more than a year later during the Boxer Rebellion. She was beatified by Pius XII with her religious sisters by Pope Pius XII, Nov. 24, 1946, and canonized, Oct. 1, 2000, by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: July 4.

Bibliography: G. GOYAU, Valiant Women: Mother Mary of the Passion and the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary, tr. G. TEL-

FORD (London 1936). M. T. DE BLARER, Les Bse Marie Hermine de Jésus et ses compagnes, franciscaines missionnaires de Marie, massacrées le 9 juillet 1900 à Tai-Yuan-Fou, Chine (Paris 1947). L. M. BALCONI, Le Martiri di Taiyuen (Milan 1945). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 47 (1955) 381–388. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 40 (2000): 1–2, 10.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KERN, JAKOB FRANZ, BL.

Baptized Franz (Francis) Alexander Kern, Norbertine priest; b. April 11, 1897, Vienna; d. there, Oct. 20, 1924. One of three children of a working-class family, Kern discerned a call to the priesthood at an early age. He was in the minor seminary at Hollabrunn hoping to become a diocesan priest, when his studies were interrupted by the outset of World War I. He was drafted (1915) and sent to Vöklabruck for officer training. As an officer in the Austrian Army with the Fourth Tyrolean Imperial Fusiliers, he was severely wounded on the Italian Front (Sept. 11, 1916). After recuperating in Salzburg for nearly a year, he resumed his seminary studies, but was recalled to military duty until the end of the war. Thereafter, he recommenced with his training for the archdiocesan priesthood. Upon hearing that Father Isidor Bogdan Zahrodnik, a Norbertine, had left his monastery for the schismatic Czech National Church, Jakob felt an inward compulsion to complete his training as a priest. He entered the Premonstatensian Abbey of Geras, northwest of Vienna near the Czech border, to begin his novitiate (1920). On July 23, 1922, with a dispensation because he had not taken his final vows, Brother Jakob was ordained in Saint Stephen's Cathedral, Vienna. He developed complications from his war injuries that debilitated him. On the day he was to make his solemn profession, he died during a second surgery. Kern's mortal remains are preserved in a small silver casket in a chapel adjacent to the Norbertine abbey church at Geras. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II in the Heldenplatz at Vienna, June 21, 1998.

Feast: Oct. 20.

Bibliography: P. VOGEL, Drei Aarauer Pioniere (Zurich 1980). H. J. WELDINGER, Jakob Kern, tr. H. S. SZANTO (Silverado, Calif. 1998). Sühnepriester Jakob Kern (Graz 1960). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 29 (1995) 5; 25 (1998) 2.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KERSUZAN, FRANCOIS MARIE

Bishop, Haitian patriot; b. Grandchamp, Brittany, March 25, 1848; d. Morne Lory, Haiti, July 1935. He was ordained in 1871 and served in the cathedral of Port-au-Prince until 1884. He was auxiliary bishop of Port-au-Prince and titular bishop of Hippa from 1884 to 1886. In 1886 he became bishop of Cap-Haitien. After 1925, illness made it impossible for Kersuzan to administer his diocese. In 1929 he retired, and as titular archbishop of Sergiopolis he spent the rest of his life in prayer, especially devoted to Our Lady of Perpetual Help.

After the death in 1890 of Archbishop Hillion of Port-au-Prince, Kersuzan was the only bishop in Haiti. He undertook a strong campaign against superstition and voodoo. He organized a Catholic league against it and founded an official journal of the league, La Croix. He was a firm believer in education as essential to true Christian life. In 1904 he founded the secondary school, or the Collège Notre Dame du Perpétuel Secours, where he spent his last years.

In 1903 Bishop Kersuzan's name was proposed to Rome by the provisional government for the archbishop-ric of Port-au-Prince when Archbishop Tonti was sent as apostolic nuncio to Brazil. However, he was not acceptable to General—and President—Nord Alexis and his wife, so the appointment was not made.

When the city of Cap-Haitien was threatened with disaster in the political upheavals of 1888, the bishop began his role as its defender. He remained the protector of citizens and officials, of prisoners and of suspects, through the wild revolutionary days after 1902 and the American occupation which began in 1915. During the occupation he was the only bishop in contact with the United States authorities. He made a trip to the U.S. in 1918, and he gave a deposition before the McCormick Commission in 1921, both times to explain the situation of the Church in Haiti. Thus he became the representative of the Haitian people. Kersuzan was a zealous apostle of the devotion to Our Lady of Perpetual Help, which became widespread in Haiti. He was buried in the cathedral of Cap-Haitien.

Bibliography: J. M. JAN, Collecta pour l'histoire du diocese du Cap-Haïtien 2 v. (Port-au-Prince 1958).

[J. M. JAN]

KERYGMA

The solemn and public proclamation of salvation in Christ made in the name of God to non-Christians; it was accompanied by an appeal to signs and wonders to dispose the hearers to faith, conversion, and a return to God.

New Testament and Early Church. In the New Testament the word is used in its verbal form (κηρυσεῖν) some 61 times to describe the proclamation of the kingdom of God and of the "gospel of God, which he had promised beforehand through his prophets in the holy Scriptures" (Rom 1.2). Kerygma (κάρυγμα) was employed in an almost technical sense by the New Testament authors to signify the manner in which an authorized preacher, kērux (κῆρυξ), announced the truth that "the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Mt 12.28; Lk 11.20). The message consists essentially in proclaiming Christ dead and risen from the dead (cf. Rom 8.34) as the SON OF GOD "who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from the wickedness of this present world" (Gal 1.4).

The content of the kerygma is the gospel of Christ (cf. Mk 1.14), what is to be believed (Rom 10.18), or simply the logos, or word (Acts 17.11; 2 Tm 4.2). Jesus had announced the coming of the kingdom with His call for repentance (Mk 1.15). The central object of the apostolic kerygma was Christ (Acts 8.5; 19.13; 1 Cor 1.23), in whom, according to the prophecies, is salvation (2 Cur 1.19–20). It was the cross with the implication of the Resurrection (1 Cor 1.23; Rom 8.17) and Christ's return as judge (Acts 10.42).

The earliest exponents of the Christian faith had worked out a distinct way of presenting the fundamental convictions of their religion. The Christian preacher thought of himself as the divinely authorized announcer, or herald, of very important news after the manner of John the Baptist (Mt 3.1-2; Mk 11.30-33). The preacher recounted the life and work of Jesus Christ in brief form, demonstrating that in Christ's conflicts, sufferings, death, and Resurrection, the divinely guided history [see SALVA-TION HISTORY (HEILSGESCHICHTE)] of mankind had reached its climax. God Himself had now most personally intervened in the history of mankind to inaugurate His kingdom on earth. This announcement was bracketed between that of the fulfillment of the Old Testament prophecies and the new Christian community's, or Church's, eschatological destiny in the Second Coming of the Savior to reader judgment. The preacher sought to convince his hearers that they were now confronted by God Himself as represented in His kingdom and that they stood liable to immediate and inescapable judgment. They had only to accept His invitation to embark on a new life wherein through God's mercy they would be unburdened of past delinquencies and have the opportunity of enjoying a new relationship with God, in the Lord Christ Jesus.

This apostolic kerygma is exemplified in the speech attributed to Peter on Pentecost (Acts 2.14–39; cf. 4.812), in which the Apostle, appealing to "what was spoken through the prophet," described Jesus of Nazareth as a man approved by God, who had been "delivered up by the settled purpose and foreknowledge of God." He was crucified by the hands of lawless men but was raised by God from death and made LORD and Christ; exalted by the right hand of God, He poured forth through the Holy Spirit what was seen and heard. This was followed by an exhortation to repeat and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of sins.

A similar formula is revealed in St. Paul's letter to the Romans (1.1–4; 2.16; 8.34; 10.8–9). Paul announces the "gospel of God, which he had promised beforehand through his prophets," concerning the Son, Jesus Christ, who was from the seed of David; who died and was raised from the dead; who was declared Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness; who is at the right hand of God; and through whom God will judge the secrets of men. It was completed with the assurance: "For if thou confess with thy mouth that Jesus is the Lord, and believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom 10.9).

Dogmatic Theology. The modern attempt to reintroduce the kerygmatic element into the study and teaching of THEOLOGY centers on the proclamation of the mystery of the faith as an invitation to direct commitment to Christ, to efficacious and dynamic actualization. This is in contrast to that kind of systematic study which focuses more contemplatively on a series of topics, or concepts. The latter is necessary as a safeguard of orthodoxy and for the fashioning of a structure to encompass the full content of the faith and to serve as a basis of theological development, but it sometimes tends to static conceptualism. Kerygmatic theology emphasizes charismatic witness under the immediate stimulus of the Holy Spirit to the dynamic presence of Christ in the Church.

The kerygma may indicate the act of proclamation or the thing proclaimed, i.e., the content of the kerygma, or both, so that in some manner the past salvific event becomes present as a call to FAITH and obedience. K. Rahner has brought together all the notes of kerygma cited above. It is the living proclamation of the word of God in the Church by a divinely (through the Church) empowered and designated preacher, in such a way that this word—uttered by the preacher in the strength of the Spirit unto faith, hope, and charity as an evangelical offer of salvation and as a power that binds and judges-makes itself present with the actuality of the "now" presence characteristic of salvation history in Christo Jesu, from the beginning to the end (of time). This word the hearer, with the strength of the same Spirit, can receive in faith and love, the spoken and the heard having become a word-event.

Kerygma finds its widest expression in the prophetic ministry of the whole body of the Church, most commonly expressed in preaching. It attains its highest signification in the Church's sacramental (and liturgical life, where word and action join, and here especially in the Eucharistic celebration (1 Cor 11.26).

Bibliography: H. SCHÜRMANN and K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 6:122-126. G. FRIEDRICH, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935) 2:705-734; 3:682-717. J. OEHLER, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA, et al. (Stuttgart 1893-) 11.1 (1921) 349-357. H. OTT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 3:1250-54. C. H. DODD, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments (New York 1937; repr. 1962). D. GRASSO, L'annuncio della salvezza (Naples 1965). A. OEPKE, Die Missionspredigt des Apostels Paulus (Leipzig 1920). K. H. RENGSTORF, Apostolat und Predigtamt (2d ed. Stuttgart 1954). H. SCHLIER, Wort Gottes (Würzburg 1958). C. F. EVANS, Journal of Theological Studies 7 (1956) 25-41. Z. ALSZEGHY and M. FLICK, Gregorianum 40 (1959) 671-744. J. MCKENZIE, Theological Studies 21 (1960) 183-206. A. RÉTIF, Nouvelle Revue Théologique 71 (1949) 910-922.

[F. X. MURPHY/E. F. MALONE]

KERYGMATIC THEOLOGY

The systematic study of theological truths within a structure that can directly and immediately serve to prepare for and promote the preaching of the truths of revelation to the Christian people (A. de Villalmonte). The modern movement for a kerygmatic theology seeks to orientate scientific theology to Christian life and apostolate, and thereby to bring about an interaction of theology and apostolic action.

Kerygmatic theology can mean any organic statement of Christian truth that includes in its scope the goals of the pastoral activity of the Church. It includes those theological systems that, while primarily representing a scientific position, contain its methodological characteristics, e.g., the Christocentric organization of M. Scheeben, M. d'Herbigny, and É. Mersch and the existential problematic of K. Rahner. In its strictest sense, the term applies to a systematic structuring of the revealed data as the "good news" of SALVATION in Christ. The organization of doctrinal and theological content follows closely the presentation of salvation history given by God in Sacred Scripture, setting each doctrinal statement and religious or moral commandment within the framework of God's saving action.

The concern of kerygmatic theology is primarily pedagogical. This pedagogy is historical, advancing through the moments of salvation from Abraham to Jesus Christ, and within the New Testament through the deepening revelation of God and His work in the Person and work of Jesus Christ. It is Christocentric, setting forth God's providential purpose and plan to prepare for and manifest Jesus Christ. It is reasonable, for it employs a systematic presentation of its own with a progressive and concentric illumination of this mystery in fundamental themes: the promise, the alliance, the faithfulness of God; His holiness, His justice and love, His wisdom; and, finally, Jesus Christ, Son of God and son of man, Word of life, and head of a new humanity, founder and consummator, together with the Holy Spirit, of the definitive kingdom of God.

Because a kerygmatic theology exists to nourish a missionary preaching, it is a theology of value. The value content of a doctrinal truth controls the conceptual structuring of the theological synthesis, so that the dominant value is perceptible throughout the total corpus of Christian truth, and in every part of the corpus, particularly through a thematic organization, e.g., as it is nuanced in Sacred Scripture in the major themes of covenant, word, etc. The statement and arrangement of the many particular truths reveal and reinforce the dominant value.

The concern for value results in a synthesis that is concrete rather than abstract, historically situated rather than scientifically and speculatively organized. Salvation history provides the principle of synthesis, revealing and preserving the inherent value. By relating Christian truth with a personal meeting with Christ in Scripture and liturgy, expressed in a life of worship and service, there is both an experience and a reinforcement of the meaningful value of the Christian proclamation.

Symbolism is used to convey value, and the valuesymbol relation explains the central position of the man Jesus Christ and His history in a kerygmatic synthesis. The relation highlights as well the demand for a theology and a catechesis adaptable to the psychological and cultural needs of the individual.

An early attempt to establish a theology independent of SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY met with a strong disapproval, principally because of its inherent ambiguity, imprecision, and limited intellectual scope. The middle position expressed principally by J. Jungmann and K. Rahner found general acceptance: (1) the goals of theology and preaching are different; (2) every full Christian theology is kerygmatic; (3) the technical and scholastic precision of scientific theology is necessary; (4) this must be complemented by a kerygmatic synthesis.

See Also: CHRISTOCENTRISM; KERYGMA; SALVATION HISTORY (HEILSGESCHICHTE); SYMBOL IN REVELATION; THEOLOGY.

Bibliography: K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, (Freiburg 1957–66) 6:126. G. E. CARTER, The Modern Challenge to Religious Education, ed. W. J. REEDY (New York 1961). J. HOF-

William Henry Ketcham.

INGER, The Art of Teaching Christian Doctrine (2nd ed. Notre Dame, Ind. 1962). J. A. JUNGMANN, The Good News Yesterday and Today, ed., abr., and tr. W. A. HUESMAN (New York 1962); Handing on the Faith, rev. and tr. A. N. FUERST (New York 1959). A. DE VILLALMONTE, La teología kerigmática (Barcelona 1962).

[E. F. MALONE]

KETCHAM, WILLIAM HENRY

Missionary; b. Summer, Iowa, June 1, 1868; d. Washington, D.C., Nov. 14, 1921. Ketcham, born of non-Catholic parents, was received into the Church in 1885 while a student in St. Charles College, Grand Couteau, La. He was ordained on March 13, 1892, at Guthrie, Okla., and served at first as pastor to the settlers and indigenous people in the northern Native American territory, then as a missionary to the Choctaw. He made many converts to the Church in Oklahoma and organized 18 new congregations, six parish churches, and four schools. In 1901 Ketcham was appointed by the U.S. hierarchy as director of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions; he served in this capacity for 20 years. The Native American missions had been crippled by the withdrawal of Federal subsidies and the passage of restrictive legislation inspired by American Protective Association agitation. Ketcham helped to eliminate these policies and established, by appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, the right of natives to use tribal funds for the education of their children in mission schools. He placed the missions on a satisfactory financial basis and stimulated mission work by his frequent visits. In 1912 Pres. William Howard Taft, recognizing Ketcham's influence among the natives, appointed him a member of the U.S. Board of Commissioners of Indian Affairs. During the next decade, Ketcham was responsible for many improvements in the facilities and operation of Federal schools and hospitals for Native Americans.

[J. B. TENNELLY]

KETTELER, WILHELM EMMANUEL VON

German bishop, pioneer in Catholic social thought; b. Münster, Westphalia, Dec. 25, 1811; d. Burghausen, Upper Bavaria, July 13, 1877.

Career. After completing legal studies he entered government service as a law clerk (1835), but left it (1838) in protest against Prussia's treatment of Abp. Clemens von Droste zu Vischering of Cologne in the CO-LOGNE mixed marriage dispute. He became a member of the circle of Joseph von GÖRRES in Munich, where Bp. Karl Von Reisach of Eichstätt influenced him to study for the priesthood. During his theological studies in Munich (1841-44) he was much influenced by Johann MÖHLER, Karl Windischmann, and Ignaz von DÖLLINGER. After ordination he served as a chaplain in Beckum (1844-46), pastor in Hopsten (1846-49), and dean at St. Hedwig's Church in Berlin (1849–50). This pastoral experience made him keenly aware of the material as well as the spiritual needs of his parishioners. His conviction grew that concern for their social betterment was inseparable from the care of their souls.

As bishop of Mainz, from May 20, 1850, until his death, Ketteler came to be recognized as the spiritual leader of German Catholics; his interest in social questions won general and deep respect. At the National Assembly in Frankfurt (1848) Ketteler was a representative and attracted considerable attention by his speech commemorating the victims of the September revolt. This address contained his basic notions on political and social topics. As a member of the German Reichstag (1871–72)

he opposed unequivocally the beginnings of the KULTUR-KAMPF. During the following years he was the leading Catholic spokesman and defender of the Church's rights. Ketteler was a cofounder of the Bishops' Conference that began in Fulda (1867) and he was mainly responsible for making it a permanent institution. At VATICAN COUNCIL I he opposed the definition of papal infallibility as inopportune and claimed that the assumptions, conditions, and scope of infallibility should be explained with greater precision in relation to the episcopal office. Ketteler was increasingly recognized as a key figure in the Church for opposing current LIBERALISM and LAICISM and their effects on marriage, education, the family, and economic life, and for upholding the primacy of religious factors as constructive and spiritualizing forces. Ketteler strengthened his case by his utilization of all the modern means at his disposal, by his determination and energy, and by his ability to transform weak, indolent priests infected with liberalism into united and determined clerics. He fulfilled his episcopal duties selflessly, earnestly, and forcefully.

Social Program. Four stages can be distinguished in the ever-widening influence of Ketteler's social program. First came his appeal for social reform in a speech delivered in Frankfurt (1848). At the Catholic congress (Katholikentag) held the same year in Mainz, and soon after, in his Advent sermons in the cathedral, Ketteler expounded the Church's position on social questions. This was the year when MARX and ENGELS issued the Communist Manifesto. The second stage came with Ketteler's book on Christianity and the labor problem, Die Arbeiterfrage und das Christentum (1864), which was based on a thorough investigation of socialist literature and Christian social principles as expounded by St. Thomas Aquinas. A third stage appeared with Ketteler's sermon on the worker problem, in which he proposed concrete reforms (July 25, 1869). The final stage was reached in his sermon (September 1869) at the episcopal conference in Fulda. In this, his most significant pronouncement, Ketteler spoke on the Church's social and charitable obligations to the working class and tried to rouse the interest of his fellow bishops by defining the essentials of the problem. Ketteler emphasized that the natural law and Christian fraternal charity contradicted current economic liberalism and its view that economic life was a war waged by each man against all others. As this system developed, according to Ketteler, it resulted in many places in the growth of a working class that was spiritually and morally crippled and inaccessible to Christian influence. Liberalism, he pointed out, contradicted human dignity, because God intended to bestow the goods of this world for the support of all mankind; liberalism opposed the divine plan for the procreation and education of men by means of the family; and, even worse, it neglected Christian precepts concerning love of neighbor. Ketteler argued that the Church must intervene and fulfill its mission to save the souls of working-class persons, and to release them from a proximate occasion of sin that often rendered the observance of Christian duties almost impossible. His final appeal was for a changed Christian outlook on social thought and for legislative reforms. This was an opportune time to enact social legislation in Germany and the initiative in this direction was taken (1877) by Count Ferdinand von Galen, Ketteler's nephew, in the Reichstag. Unfortunately, this proposal was not enacted into law until 1891; yet Ketteler's name remained closely linked from the beginning with Germany's much-admired social legislation and its safeguards for workers in illness, disability, and old age.

At the Katholikentag in Mainz (1871) Ketteler's address on "Liberalism, Socialism, and Christianity" revealed the false ideas rooted in contemporary social thought and proposed the possibility of correcting them by Christian ideas that would eradicate the evils in current views without sacrificing anything good in them. Ketteler's pastoral letter (February 1876) on religion and social welfare stressed religion's cultural role in the proper regulation of modern social life.

A. F. Lennig, J. B. Heinrich, C. Moufang, P. L. Haffner, and others at Mainz who came under Ketteler's influence, continued his theological ideas and social program later in the 19th century and spread them throughout Catholic Germany. Leo XIII's encyclical RERUM NOVARUM (1891) was so much indebted to Ketteler that the pope referred to him as "my great predecessor" and admitted that he had learned much from him.

Bibliography: Works. Predigten, ed. J. M. RAICH, 2 v. (Mainz 1878); Briefe, ed. J. M. RAICH (Mainz 1879); Hirtenbriefe, ed. J. M. RAICH (Mainz 1904); Ausgewählte Schriften, ed. J. MUMBAUER, 3 v. (2d ed. Munich 1924); Die grossen sozialen Fragen der Gegenwart, ed. E. DEUERLEIN (Mainz 1948). Biographies. O. PFÜLF, 3 v. (Mainz 1899). G. GOYAU (Paris 1907). F. VIGENER (Munich 1924). T. BRAUER (Hamburg 1927). W. FRANZMATHES (Mainz 1927). L. LENHART (Kevelaer 1936). Literature. L. LENHART, Seelennot aus Lebensenge: Das Problem "Lebensraum und Sittlichkeit" nach Bischof von Ketteler (Mainz 1933); J. HÖFER and K. RAHNER Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957-65) 6:128-130. P. TISCHLEDER, Der Totalismus in der prophetischen Vorausschau W. E. v. Kettelers (Mainz 1947). R. AUBERT, "Mgr. K., évêque de Mayence et les origines du catholicisme social," in Collectanea Mechliniensia 32 (1947) 534-539. F. S. NITTI, Catholic Socialism, tr. M. MACKINTOSH (2d ed. New York 1895). J. J. LAUX (G. METLAKE, pseud.) Christian Social Reform: Program Outlined by Its Pioneer, William Emmanuel, Baron von Ketteler (Philadelphia 1912). W. E. HOGAN, The Development of Bishop W. E. v. K's Interpretation of the Social Problem (Washington 1946). G. G. WINDELL, The Catholics and German Unity, 1866-1871 (Minneapolis 1954). C. BAUER, Staatslexicon, H. SACHER, ed. 4:953-957.

[L. LENHART]

KEVENHOERSTER, JOHN BERNARD

Bishop, first vicar apostolic of the Bahama Islands; b. Alten-Essen, Prussia, Nov. 1, 1869; d. Bahama Islands, Dec. 9, 1949. He was the son of Bernard Kevenhoerster, an architect and contractor, and Agnes Plantenberg. The family left Germany in 1881 to settle in the Germanspeaking parish of St. Joseph, Minneapolis, Minn., where John attended St. Joseph's School until 1883. In 1887 he began his studies for the priesthood at St. John's Abbey, Collegeville, Minn., and entered the novitiate on July 25, 1892. He made his vows as a Benedictine a year later and was ordained on June 24, 1896. In October 1907, he was appointed pastor of St. Anselm's Parish, Bronx, N.Y., where he built a school, opened one of the first public playgrounds in the city, and constructed a church modeled after the Hagia Sophia. On Dec. 3, 1929, he was made vicar forane of the Bahamas, where he served for 20 years as a missionary of the poor. After becoming domestic prelate and prefect apostolic in 1932, he was consecrated bishop on Dec. 21, 1933. By the time the Bahamas became a vicariate apostolic in 1941, Kevenhoerster had introduced 19 churches and missions, 14 grammar schools, St. Augustine's Priory School, and the Bahamian teaching sisterhood. In 1946 Kevenhoerster was honored as an assistant at the pontifical throne.

[B. J. HOWARD]

KEVIN, ST.

Irish monastic founder; b. near Dublin, Ireland; d. Glendalough, June 3, 618. Kevin (Coemgen) received the rudiments of education from three ascetics, possibly at Killnemanagh, near Tallaght, and retired to a deserted place called Hollywood, near Blessington, where he stayed until sought out by many disciples. He retired to Glendalough (the Two Lakes) and on a hillock built a beehive cell. When his whereabouts was discovered Kevin realized that he could not in conscience ignore his disciples, and Glendalough became a monastic center c. 570 with Kevin as abbot. A church of wood was built on a mountain ledge, close to the community, who lived in huts. At his death, Kevin was laid to rest beside the little church, later known as Rigferta, "royal graves." When the space beneath the mountain ledge became too cramped the monastery proper was moved to a larger site half a mile down the valley, where a new church dedicated to St. Kevin was erected with other churches to a total of ten. In the penitential season Kevin retired to a crude stone cell above the upper lake still known as "St. Kevin's Bed." Glendalough was made an episcopal see in 1111, but is now part of Dublin. It was famous as a place of pilgrimage on St. Kevin's day until well into the 19th century.

Saint Kevin's Church, Glendalough, Ireland. (@Michael St. Maur Sheil/CORBIS)

Feast: June 3.

Bibliography: C. EDMONDS, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 4:92. "Vita Sancti Coemgeni," Vitae sanctorum Hiberniae, ed. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1910) 1:234–257. Acta Sanctorum, June, 1:303–315. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 1:403–404. J. RYAN, Irish Monasticism (London 1931). W. DELIUS, Geschichte der irischen Kirche (Munich 1954). M. and L. DE PAOR, Early Christian Ireland (New York 1958). M. RODGERS, Glendalough: a Celtic pilgrimage (Harrisburg, Pa. 1996).

[J. RYAN]

KEYS, POWER OF

The glorified Christ's possession of "the key of David" (Rv 3.7) symbolizes His royal authority in the messianic kingdom. So, in Isaiah 22.22, the giving of the "key of the House of David" expresses the idea of the authority to be conferred on Eliakim, chosen to be master of the royal palace. In rabbinic literature the "giving of keys" consistently means the granting of authority, as to a steward placed over his master's household (H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament 1:736). Jesus denounces the Scribes and Pharisees, because having the "key of knowledge" (Lk 11.52) they have "shut the kingdom of heaven against men" (Mt 23.13).

In the light of canonical and extracanonical parallels, it seems certain that Mt 16.19a means not that St. PETER is to be the "gate-keeper of heaven," but that Christ will confer on him vicarious authority over His household on earth, that is, over the Church that He promises to build on him as on a rock. For it is "on earth" that Peter will exercise his power of BINDING AND LOOSING (Mt 16.19bc). The keys that Christ will give to Peter are the keys of the kingdom of heaven, in the sense that Peter's authoritative decisions will bind men in conscience; on their acceptance of his teaching of the gospel and his direction in the way of SALVATION will depend their entrance into the KINGDOM OF GOD for all eternity.

Christ Giving the Keys to Saint Peter, painting by Vincenzo di Catena, 1517. (@Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

See Also: AUTHORITY, ECCLESIASTICAL; OFFICE, ECCLESIASTICAL; POPE; PRIMACY OF THE POPE

Bibliography: J. JEREMIAS, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935) 3:749–53. H. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, "Die Schlüsselgewalt der Kirche," Evangelische Theologie 4 (1937) 143–69.

[F. A. SULLIVAN]

KHAZARS

The Khazars were an ethnic group, belonging to the Turkish peoples, who, toward the end of the second century of the Christian Era, had settled in the region between the Caucasus and the lower Volga and Don Rivers, and in the following centuries, after a series of victories over the Byzantines, the Persians, and the Arabs, established a powerful kingdom in southeastern Asia. At the beginning of the eighth century, dynastic ties bound the Khazars more closely to Constantinople, which led to a limited spread of Christianity among them. They also became acquainted with Judaism from the numerous Jews who lived in the Crimea and along the Bosphorus. When the Byzantine emperor, Leo the Isaurian, persecuted the Jews in A.D. 723, many Jews found refuge in the Khazar kingdom, and their influence was so great that, around the middle of the eighth century, the king of the Khazars and many of the Khazar nobility accepted the Jewish faith. According to a widespread legend, the conversion of the Khazars to JUDAISM followed a religious discussion in which their king was particularly impressed by the arguments of Jewish theologians.

After the conversion of the leading Khazars to Judaism, many Jews, including several Jewish scholars, migrated to the Khazar kingdom, where they kept in touch with the intellectual centers of the Jewish world, especially those in Mesopotamia and Palestine. The literary sources indicate explicitly that the Khazars acknowledged the authority of the Talmud; hence, they must not have been affected in religious matters by the Karaites.

The Khazars' acceptance of Judaism coincided with a period of peaceful development in their history, when they focused their attention on the strengthening of their power at home and on the extending of their political influence abroad. They thus established new commercial centers of importance at various places throughout their sphere of influence, and in these places, as well as in their older cities, such as Itil in the delta of the Volga, and Samkarsh and Tamatarcha on the Bosphorus, the Jewish element formed an important part of the population. At Semender on the Caspian Sea, a viceroy of the Khazars, who was likewise a convert to Judaism, had his headquarters. Although the most important posts among the Khazars were held by families which had been converted to Judaism, there reigned in Khazaria a spirit of religious toleration such as was rarely to be found at the time in Christian or Moslem countries.

In the last third of the ninth century, the Khazar kingdom suffered considerably from the incursions of another Turkish people, the Petchonegs. Meanwhile, since the Russians occupied the region at the delta of the Dnieper and even attacked Constantinople, the Byzantines were forced, for the sake of mutual defense, to strengthen their friendly relations with the Khazars. The task of doing this was entrusted to Cyril, the later apostle of the Slavs, who used the opportunity to further an effort to win the Khazars to Christianity. At the beginning of the tenth century, however, the Byzantines allied themselves with peoples who were hostile to the Khazars, and among these people, too, they sent their Christian missionaries. The Khazar king was once more able to avert the threatened invasion of his land, but he put an end to the vaunted religious toleration in his realm. After this failure of the Byzantines in their efforts to weaken the Khazars, they induced the Russians to undertake a military campaign against them. The Russian grand duke, Igor, captured the city of Samkarsh and the Khazar cities in the Crimea, but he was then defeated, together with his Byzantine allies, by the Khazars. Yet the Russians' advance could not be checked forever. Between A.D. 964 and 969 they overran most of the region where the Khazars had been settled. Many of the Khazars withdrew into the remote steppes and especially into the inaccessible mountain country of the Caucasus. From here their king appealed to various Muslim countries for help, offering them in return his willingness to become a Muslim himself.

For some centuries several sections of the former kingdom of the Khazars preserved a certain amount of political independence, and in these regions the Khazar people remained loyal to their Jewish faith. However, when the Crimea was later conquered by the Tartars, most of the remaining Khazars embraced Islam, while the others were absorbed, partly by the Rabbanite and partly by the Karaite communities of Jews. Yet the so-called Mountain Jews of modern times are in part descendants of the ancient Khazars. Some Khazar elements seem to have entered Hungary, too, at an early date in the train of the Magyars, who were akin to the Khazars and once belonged to their kingdom.

Although the European Jews in the first Christian millennium had some knowledge of the existence of a Jewish kingdom in Khazaria, they did not have much precise information about it. The Spanish-Jewish scholar and statesman, Hasdai Ibn Shaprut, who lived around the middle of the tenth century, sent a letter to King Joseph of the Khazars in which he asked several definite questions about this people. The king's answer, written in Hebrew, was cited by various medieval authors and was also used by Judah Ben Samuel HA-LEVI in his Kuzari (about A.D. 1100). Toward the end of the nineteenth century, a copy of this letter was discovered among the documents that were found in the GENIZA of the synagogue of Old Cairo, together with other documents concerning the Khazars. Their contents largely corroborate the data already known about this people from the Armenian, Byzantine, and Arabic historians.

Bibliography: J. BRUTZKUS, Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judantum in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 10 v. (Berlin 1928–34) 5:337–350. R. W. ROGERS, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–06) 4:1–7. J. STARR, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, 10 v. (New York 1939–44) 6:375–378. A. YARMOLINSKY, "The Khazars: A Bibliography," Bulletin of the New York Public Library (Sept. 1938), rev. ed. printed separately (New York 1939).

[K. HRUBY]

KHOMIAKOV, ALEKSEĬ STEPANOVICH

Leader of the early Slavophile ideologists and most influential Russian Orthodox lay theologian of the 19th century, poet; b. Moscow, May 1, 1804; d. of cholera on his estate near Riazan, Sept. 23, 1860. Khomiakov was a very versatile and erudite member of the landed gentry, and he was intimately acquainted with leading intellectuals at home and abroad. He was well read in the Greek Fathers, but the chief influence on his thought came from the German romantic and idealist philosophers then popular in Russia. He studied literature at the University of Moscow and wrote verse tragedies (e.g., Ermak, 1832). After two ventures in a military career (1822 and 1828) and some study of art, he married in 1836. He vigorously argued for the abolition of serfdom, for intellectual freedom, and for the curtailment of censorship.

In contrast to the secularist Westernizers who believed that Russia should adopt European ideas and institutions such as a representative assembly, Khomiakov, a religious populist, advocated the preservation and strengthening of Russia's ancient patriarchal traditions as embodied in the peasant collective village or commune.

He held that history's movement was caused by the clash of two forces, the Iranian principle of spiritual and moral freedom and the Kushite principle of material and logical necessity. The former characterized Russia, the latter predominated in the West. The Slavophiles, not to be confused with the later political Pan-Slavists, asserted that Western civilization was doomed to extinction because it was based on juridicism, rationalism, and materialism.

According to Khomiakov, Roman Catholicism had turned Christianity into a state by its absorption of Roman law and its exaltation of a legalistic hierarchy. This hierarchy, apart from and above the faithful, culminated in a despotic papacy. It possessed an enforced external unity without inner freedom. Protestantism was a logical continuation of Catholic rationalism and had achieved only an unprincipled freedom without unity, which is license. The Russian Orthodox people alone, i.e., the peasants in their communes, as distinct from the upper classes and the institutional hierarchic Church, had preserved Christianity in its pure form and was destined to lead other nations into a new Christian era because of its Christian character. The superiority of the Russian Orthodox people was attributed to the spirit of sobornost, Khomiakov's main contribution to theology. Sobornost is derived from the Slavonic word for "catholic" in the Nicene Creed and variously translated as integrality, communality, collegiality, or collectivity. Sobornost effects the harmonious blending of inner freedom and unity, of the individual and society, in a living organic body whose members are bound together by mutual love under the sole headship of Christ; this love is the Holy Spirit. Sobornost is also the criterion of truth, which resides not in the decisions of the hierarchy, nor even of an ecumenical council, but in acceptance by the whole Christian community united in mutual love.

See Also: RUSSIAN THEOLOGY; SLAVOPHILISM.

Bibliography: A. S. KHOMIÂKOV, Polnoe sobranie sochineniĭi, 8 v. (Moscow 1900), collected works. A. GRATIEUX, A. S. Khomiakov et le mouvement slavophile, 2 v. (Paris 1939). P. BARON, Un Théologien laïc orthodoxe russe au XIXe siècle (Orientalia Christiana Analecta 127; Rome 1940). P. K. CHRISTOFF, An Introduction to Nineteenth-Century Russian Slavophilism: A Study in Ideas (The Hague 1961–) v. 1. N. V. RIASANOVSKY, Russia and the West in the Teaching of the Slavophiles (Cambridge, Mass. 1952).

[W. J. MCBREARTY]

KIERKEGAARD, SØREN AABYE

Danish philosopher and theologian, influential Protestant thinker of the 19th century, commonly considered the precursor of EXISTENTIALISM; b. Copenhagen, May 5, 1813; d. Copenhagen, Nov. 4, 1855.

Søren Aabye Kierkegaard.

Early Formation. Søren was the seventh and last child of an elderly couple. His father, who had started life as a shepherd lad in the Jutland moors, retired at the age of 40 from a prosperous hosier business in Copenhagen. In his later years he was given to melancholy, particularly after losing his wife and five of his children within two years. This melancholy left a deep impression on the young Kierkegaard, as did the strict pietistic education he received at home. A secret guilt in his father's life, which he discovered as a theology student, affected Søren profoundly. A later diary entry about an unidentified man records: ". . . the terrible thing about this man, who once when he was a small boy, as he tended his sheep on the Jutland heath, suffering greatly, starving and in want, stood up upon a hill and cursed God-and this man was unable to forget it when he was 82 years old." When confronted with this text after Kierkegaard's death, Peter, his only surviving brother, exclaimed: "This is the story of our father and ourselves."

After this "great earthquake" in his life, Kierkegaard became convinced that a curse rested upon his family, that it was to be "wiped out by the powerful hand of God." A period of dissipation and estrangement from his father followed. Four years later, a religious conversion coincided with a family reconciliation. Shortly afterward Kierkegaard passed his final examinations in theology and wrote a doctoral Dissertation On the Concept of Irony (1841); in contrast to his later works, this betrays the strong influence of HEGEL.

Along with his father's influence, another event was to determine Kierkegaard's spiritual evolution. In 1840 he betrothed himself to a 17-year-old girl, Regine Olsen. A year later, realizing that he was psychologically unfit for marriage, he broke the engagement. This unhappy love affair initiated one of the most prodigious literary careers in history. Initially Kierkegaard tried to clarify his personal problems and to understand their meaning in the larger context of human existence. All his early works allude to his relationship with Regine and contain cryptic messages for her.

Published Works. In 1843 he published Either-Or, a compendious work in two volumes. Although it appeared under a pseudonym, the book made its author famous immediately. In the next three years 14 more works followed: Repetition (1843), Fear and Trembling (1843), The Concept of Dread (1844), Prefaces (1844), Philosophical Fragments (1844), Stages on Life's Way (1845), Concluding Unscientific Postscript (1846), and seven sets of Edifying Discourses, published under his own name to accompany the other pseudonymous writings. After 1846 Kierkegaard's creativity slackened, although he was still to publish three major works: The Works of Love (1847), Sickness Unto Death (1849), and Training in Christianity (1850). During this period he also wrote the greater part of his diary.

In 1846 he came under attack from the Corsair, a Copenhagen satirical weekly that he had challenged in a newspaper article. For almost a year the ridicule and low wit of the Corsair made him an object of derision all over Denmark.

Kierkegaard's last two years were marked by a violent conflict with the Danish National Church, which he felt had betrayed the message of the Gospel by its compromising attitude. He carried on his onslaught in a self-published periodical, the Instant. In the middle of this attack he fainted on the street and was brought to the Frederikshospital, where he died from an unknown disease in the spinal marrow.

Freedom and Choice. Kierkegaard has rightly been called the father of modern existentialism. Man for him is essentially FREEDOM, and he constitutes himself in his free CHOICE. Already in his first major work, Either-Or, Kierkegaard describes life as a choice between an aesthetic attitude in which man drifts along from one pleasure to another, and an ethical one in which freedom determines itself by a self-imposed acceptance of law and duty. The aesthete refuses to commit himself to anything permanent (marriage, a profession) lest he limit the infinite possibilities of his SELF; but since the real self of a free being can be constituted only by a self-choice, he does not "exist" in the full sense of the word. The ethical man, on the contrary, accepts the limitations of his choice and thus becomes a real PERSON.

Yet, as Kierkegaard shows in his two subsequent works, Repetition and Fear and Trembling, the ethical choice is not final. Sooner or later the ethical man will be faced by the predicament of a transcendent power that prevents him from fully realizing his freedom. Just as Job, in spite of his exemplary life, lost all his possessions, so man in his striving toward self-realization has to cope with powers beyond his control. How will he do this? He cannot simply ignore them. Much less can he abandon his moral autonomy by forfeiting his freedom in blind resignation. But to maintain simultaneously both freedom and TRANSCENDENCE would seem to be a task that is impossible.

Faith and Subjectivity. This is made even more difficult by freedom's intrinsic deficiency. In accordance with the Protestant interpretation of the ORIGINAL SIN, which he analyzed in The Concept of Dread, Kierkegaard claims that man is essentially unable to fulfill the law of his own being. The ethical attitude, therefore, cannot be final in the constitution of the self. This fact is illustrated by the Biblical story of Abraham, who received a divine order to sacrifice his son and thus to "suspend" the ethical law. The realization of the ethical universal, the immanent law of a nature identical for all men, cannot be the highest achievement of freedom, as Hegel claimed. Only religious faith enables man to reconcile immanent freedom with the acceptance of a transcendent reality placing him in a position of dependence, for in faith alone can he consistently assert his insufficiency and the certainty to overcome this insufficiency with the help of a higher power. It was faith that allowed Abraham to ascend Mt. Moria, and yet to believe that in his posterity all generations would be blessed. The ultimate stage in the constitution of the self is, therefore, not the mere choice of the self, but a choice that includes the self's dependence on the transcendent. To become an authentic self, man must commit himself to God; for he is, in his very essence, a dynamic relation to God. To choose or not to choose is no longer the only alternative for freedom; a more basic one is to choose or to choose "before God." In Stages on Life's Way, Kierkegaard thus describes the three possible attitudes of man with respect to his self: the aesthetic, the ethical, and the religious.

In his most technical works, *Philosophical Frag*ments and Concluding Unscientific Postscript, Kierkegaard further elaborates the relation between freedom and faith. If the self is essentially freedom, then its highest truth must be subjective; that is, a truth that is not entirely given but becomes true only after having gone through an appropriation process of the WILL. That existential certainty is acquired only through personal commitment is illustrated by the attitude of Socrates, who staked his life for an objectively uncertain affirmation. But this is precisely what faith does: the transcendent by its very nature is never objectively certain—yet it is an integral part of man's relation to himself. Man therefore must make it certain by his subjective commitment to it. Since the highest existential truth is the most subjective, and since subjectivity increases as objective certainty decreases, Christian faith is the highest existential truth, for its object is not merely uncertain to objective reason—it is repellent. Indeed, according to Kierkegaard's Protestant interpretation, Christianity teaches that man is untrue in his very being, and consequently, that even his subjectivity is bound to be unauthentic. While natural faith is paradoxical, Christianity is absolutely paradoxical, or, from the point of view of reason, absurd. Yet, by the same token, Christianity is the highest truth of existence, for it brings man to an inwardness that is deeper than his own subjectivity.

Influence and Critique. Kierkegaard is one of the most provocative of Christian thinkers. His influence on philosophers, particularly Heidegger and Sartre, and on theologians, Protestant and Catholic alike, can be compared with that of Augustine and Pascal. His most important contribution to modern thought is his definition of the self as freedom, by which man becomes a self-constituting being. Yet equally important is his insistence that this self is, in its very center, dependent on God. For Catholics, the most objectionable part of his thought is his radical individualism. Catholics also find themselves unable to accept a notion of SIN that totally disconnects the link between Creator and creature, and the subjectivism that this implies in the theology of faith.

See Also: EXISTENTIALISM; IRRATIONALISM; EXISTENTIAL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography: Danish Editions. Samlede Vaerker, ed. A. B. DRACHMANN et al., 20 v. (3d ed. Copenhagen 1962); Papirer, ed. P. A. HEIBERG et al., 20 v. (Copenhagen 1909–48). Breve og Aktstykker vedrφrende Sφren Kierkegaard, ed. N. THULSTRUP, 2 v. (Copenhagen 1953–54). English Translations. Almost all of Kierkegaard's works have been translated into English; complete and up-to-date bibliography of these translations can be found in W. LOWRIE, Kierkegaard, 2 v. (New York 1962). Secondary Studies. J. D. COLLINS, The Mind of Kierkegaard (Chicago 1953). H. DIEM, Kierkegaard's Dialectic of Existence, tr. H. KNIGHT (Edinburgh 1959). L. K. DUPRÉ, Kierkegaard as Theologian (New York 1963). H. ROOS, Sφren Kierkegaard and Catholicism, tr. R. M. BRACKET (Westminster, Md. 1954). D. F. SWENSON, Something about Kierkegaard, ed. L. M. SWENSON (rev. and enl. Minneapolis 1945). E. HIRSCH, Kierkegaard-Studien, 2 v. (Gütersloh 1933). W. RUTTENBECK, Sören Kierkegaard: Der Christliche Denker und sein Werk (Berlin 1929). P. MESNARD, Le Vrai visage de Kierkegaard (Paris 1948). J. WAHL, Études Kierkegaardiennes (2d ed. Paris 1949).

[L. DUPRÉ]

KILDARE, ABBEY OF

Former Irish monastery in Kildare, County Kildare (Cill Dara, "the church of the oak tree"), Ireland. Its foundation by St. BRIGID dates probably from the transition period between the death of St. Patrick and the rise of the great monastic founders, that is, c. 460 to 520. Church organization was still incomplete, and Brigid found herself the most important Christian personage in a large part of the province of Leinster. To provide for the spiritual needs of the people, she induced the bishop, Conlaed, to leave his hermit life and take up residence in a house beside the convent for women she had already founded at Kildare. This was the beginning of the double MONASTERY there, the only one of its kind in Ireland. Brigid and her successors as abbess of Kildare exercised jurisdiction over the faithful in the neighborhood with the approval of the successors of St. Patrick in ARMAGH. The long line of abbesses continued to 1171; a corresponding list of abbots, bishops, and other officials shows that the men's monastery retained its identity into the 12th century. When Kildare became an Episcopal see in 1111, it gradually shed its earlier monastic character. GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS speaks of the Book of Kildare, which seems to have compared with the Book of KELLS, but this is lost. Only the monastic round tower remains of the abbey buildings.

Bibliography: J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland, v. 1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 356–364. The Annals of Ulster, ed. and tr. W. M. HENNESSY and B. MACCARTHY, 4 v. (Dublin 1887–1909). Chronicum Scotorum, ed. W. M. HENNESSY (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 46; 1866). The Annals of Inisfallen, ed. and tr. S. MACAIRT (Dublin 1951). Annals of the Four Masters, ed. and tr. J. O'DONOVAN, 7 v. (2d ed. Dublin 1856)

[J. RYAN]

KILIAN OF AUBIGNY, ST.

Irish hermit in France; d. 670. Little is known of the career of Kilian (originally Chillen). He is said to have been returning from a pilgrimage to Rome when he met St. FARO, bishop of Meaux, who found him a site for a hermitage at Aubigny near Arras. Here Kilian spent the rest of his life and was later venerated as a saint. St. Faro was also responsible for settling the Irish St. FIACRE in the same part of France.

Feast: Nov. 13.

Bibliography: J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 1:492–493. L. GOUGAUD, Les Saints irlandais hors d'Irlande (Louvain 1936). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:330–331. T. Ó FIAICH, Gaelscrinte i gCein (Dublin 1960) 52–53.

[D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD]

KILIAN OF WÜRZBURG, ST.

Bishop and martyr; b. Ireland (according to strong local tradition, at Mullagh, County Cavan), c. 640; d. Würzburg, Germany, July 8, 689. According to the older and more trustworthy passio Kilian (or Chilianus) was already a bishop when he left Ireland with 11 companions and reached the residence of the pagan Thuringian duke, Gozbert, at Würzburg. Having decided to evangelize this region, he reputedly traveled to Rome for papal approval in the autumn of 686. The account of this journey and of his meeting with Pope CONON is certainly unhistorical. He converted many in Franconia and Thuringia, including Duke Gozbert, whom he persuaded to separate from Geilana, his brother's widow. In revenge Geilana had Kilian murdered along with two of his fellow missionaries, the priest Coloman (Kolonat) and the deacon Totnan. Their relics were solemnly transferred by BURCHARD, first bishop of Würzburg, to the new cathedral on July 8, 752, and are now enshrined in the Neumünster, erected over the spot where, according to tradition, the martyrdom took place. Much controversy has centered on the dating and reliability of the Passio Prima and Secunda that deal with the saint's life, but A. Bigelmair dates the Passio Prima to 752 and accepts it as historical, though with an accretion of legend.

Feast: July 8.

Bibliography: Sources. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826-) 5:711-728. Acta Sanctorum, July, 2:599-619. J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 v. (Paris 1668-1701) 2:951-953. Literature. N. MOORE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885-1900) 4:363-364. F. EM-MERICH, Der heilige Kilian, Regionarbischof und Märtyrer, historisch-kritisch dargestellt (Würzburg 1896). A. BIGELMAIR, "Die Gründung des Bistums Würzburg," Würzburger Diözesangeschichtsblätter, 2 (1934) 1-18; "Die Passio des heiligen Kilian und seiner Gefährten," Herbipolis jubilans: 1200 Jahre Bistum Würzburg (Würzburg 1952) 1-25. J. DIENEMANN, Der Kult des heiligen Kilian im 8. und 9. Jahrhundert (Würzburg 1955). A. GWYNN, "New Light on St. Kilian," The Irish Ecclesiastical Record, 88 (1957) 1-16. K. FIRSCHING, Die deutschen Bearbeitungen der Kilianslegende unter besonderer Berücksichtigung deutscher Legendarhandschriften des Mittelalters (Würzburg 1973). W. DETTELBACHER, Die Kilianimesse zu Würzburg (Würzburg 1977), cult. L. K. WALTER, St. Kilian: Schrifttumsverzeichnis zu Martyrium und Kult der Frankenapostel und zur Gründung des Bistums Würzburg (Würzburg 1989). F.-L. GANZ, Dich loben, dir danken-: 1300 Jahre Mission und Martyrium der Frankenapostel Kilian, Kolonat und Totnan: das Buch der Diözese Würzburg zum Jubiläumsjahr (Würzburg 1990).

[T. Ó FIAICH]

KILMARTIN, EDWARD J.

Jesuit priest and theologian of liturgy; b. Portland, Maine, Aug. 31, 1923; d. Boston, Massachusetts, June 16, 1994. Kilmartin entered the Society of Jesus in 1941 and was ordained in 1954. Having prepared to teach petroleum engineering in the ill-fated Jesuit mission in Baghdad, Iraq, Kilmartin next earned a doctorate in dogmatic and ecumenical theology under J. Witte at the Gregorian in Rome (1958). He was recalled suddenly to the Jesuit theologate in Weston, Massachusetts, to teach a course in sacramental theology, where he collaborated on New Testament Abstracts. This originally temporary assignment led to 19 years' teaching of historicalsystematic theology specializing in sacraments—the final nine after Kilmartin relocated to Cambridge, Massachusetts. From 1975 to 1985 Kilmartin directed the doctoral program in Liturgical Studies at the University of Notre Dame. In 1985 he was appointed professor ordinarius of liturgy at the Pontifical Oriental Institute, Rome, and named professor emeritus in 1994. Summer-school teaching at Marquette, San Francisco, Notre Dame, and Creighton universities and in Australia acquainted numerous students with his theological method.

The work of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES on eschatology and baptism, eucharist, and ministry provided a special focus at the beginning and near the end of Kilmartin's theological career. At Notre Dame he directed dissertations in Protestant and Catholic liturgical traditions. As member for 19 years of the Roman Catholic-Orthodox dialogue in the United States (for 13 years executive secretary) and active participant in the Oriental-Orthodox dialogue over the same period, he pursued a lifelong interest in the traditions of the undivided churches of the first millennium with a view to recovering common perspectives. Kilmartin was a principal drafter of the Roman Catholic response to the Lima Document, above all the section on eucharist, for the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity. He was also consulted by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

Kilmartin's thought was stimulated by key themes of European theology: Odo CASEL's Mysterientheologie, anamnesis, the active presence of Christ, and pneumatology. He rooted his theology in New Testament and early liturgical sources, painstakingly analyzing them and integrating the gains made especially by the Germans J. Betz, K. RAHNER, A. Häussling, L. Lies, and H. B. Meyer.

Christian Liturgy (1988), his major work, presents a post-Rahnerian systematic theology of liturgy for which D. Coffey provides the trinitarian model. His work established parameters for and a method of systematic theology of liturgy in which the response of faith and the sacraments are brought back in all respects to their trinitarian foundations.

The major contributions of Kilmartin include: an articulation of liturgy's relation to the Trinity and the consequences of the personal missions of Christ and the Holy Spirit; a eucharistic theology that, inspired by early church and patristic sources, relates this data to contemporary confessional and ecumenical questions; and a critical analysis of Christomonistic theologies of eucharist and ministry for their failure to incorporate pneumatology and ecclesiology. Up to his death he investigated areas where official Roman theology could fruitfully dialogue with Eastern and Western liturgical traditions.

Bibliography: A complete bibliography and curriculum vitae is found in M. A. FAHEY, "In Memoriam: Edward J. Kilmartin, SJ (1923-1994)," Orientalia Christiana periodica 61 (January 1995). On ecumenism and ecclesiology: "Reception in History: An Ecclesiological Phenomenon and Its Significance," Journal of Ecumenical Studies 21 (1984) 34-54; Culture and the Praying Church: The Particular Liturgy of the Individual Church (Ottawa 1990). On eucharist and ministry: "Apostolic Office: Sacrament of Christ," Theological Studies 36 (1975) 243-64; "Ecclesiastical Office, Power and Spirit," Proceedings of the Catholic Theological Society 37 (1982) 98-108; "The Active Role of Christ and the Holy Spirit in the Sanctification of the Eucharistic Elements," Theological Studies 45 (1984) 225-53; "A Catholic Response to Lima 1982," One in Christ 21 (1985) 204-16; "The Official Vatican Response to BEM: Eucharist," Ecumenical Trends 17 (1988) 37-40; "The Catholic Tradition of Eucharistic Theology: Towards the Third Millennium," Theological Studies 55 (1994) 405-57. On systematic theology of liturgy: Christian Liturgy: Theology and Practice. Part I: Systematic Theology of Liturgy (Kansas City, Mo. 1988); "Sacraments as Liturgy of the Church," Theological Studies 50 (1989) 527-47.

[M. M. SCHAEFER]

KILWINNING, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery of the Tironian congregation (see TIRON, ABBEY OF) at Kilwinning, Ayrshire, within the Diocese of Galloway, Scotland. The identity of the founder and the date of foundation remain obscure. Kilwinning (Kylwynnyn and other variants) was long thought to have been founded by Hugh de Moreville in 1140, but recent evidence points rather to his son Richard's having founded it sometime between 1162 and 1189. Records mention the church of St. Vinin or Wynnin there in 1184 (Kilwinning itself meaning the "cell or church of Wynnin"), but the first reference to it as an abbey is dated 1202–07. Kilwinning, a daughterhouse of Kelso Abbey, was well endowed by private and royal benefactors, and judging by its fine remains, must have been one of the most graceful and impressive abbeys in the country by the mid-13th century. It was largely destroyed by Reformers in 1561 and was erected into a free barony for William Melville in 1592. It is now a ruin.

Bibliography: W. MACLEOD, "Collections Towards a History of the Abbey of K.," Archaeological and Historical Collections Relating to the Counties of Ayr and Wigton, 1 (1878) 115–222. D. E. EASSON, Medieval Religious Houses: Scotland (London 1957) 59. G. W. S. BARROW, "From Queen Margaret to David I: Benedictines and Tironians," Innes Review, 11 (1960) 22–38.

[L. MACFARLANE]

KINDEKENS, PETER

Founder of the American College of Louvain; b. Denderwindeke, Belgium, date unknown; d. Detroit, Michigan, March 23, 1873. Before his ordination on Sept. 24, 1842, he offered his services to bishop Peter Paul LEFEVERE of Detroit. On coming to the United States, he became Lefevere's vicar-general. He served as director of St. Thomas Seminary, Detroit, which opened in 1846, and designed the new cathedral in Detroit, begun in 1845. In 1856 he was sent to Rome to represent Lefevere in a controversy with the REDEMPTORISTS of the diocese. There, on behalf of archbishop Francis P. KEN-RICK of Baltimore, Maryland, Kindekens inquired into the possibility of establishing an American College at Rome. Conditions there were unfavorable, but it seemed possible to found a similar college at Louvain, Belgium. On his return to America, Kindekens sent a circular letter to the bishops of the United States proposing this idea. Bishops Lefevere and Martin J. SPALDING adopted the project, and Kindekens was sent to Louvain early in 1857 to establish the college. During his two and a half years as rector, he purchased a house and property, opened the seminary, and obtained financial support from Belgian and German donations. He admitted at least 30 students and sent nine to the missions of America, most of them to the Diocese of Detroit. In 1860 he surrendered his office to John DE NEVE and returned to his duties as vicargeneral of Detroit.

Bibliography: J. D. SAUTER, The American College of Louvain, 1857–1898 (Louvain 1959). G. PARE, The Catholic Church in Detroit, 1701–1888 (Detroit 1951).

[J. D. SAUTER]

AL-KINDĪ, 'ABD AL-MASIH

Supposed author of what is now being recognized as a pseudonymous apology in Arabic for the Christian faith. The work purports to be the contemporary record of a controversy held in 819 before the Caliph al-Ma'mūn on the relative worth of Christianity and Islam.

The parties to the controversy are a Muslim, 'Abdallah ibn Ismā'īl al-Hāshimī, and a Nestorian Christian, al-Kindī. The bulk of the work is al-Kindī's reply to a letter of the former. Al-Hāshimī in this letter, after showing a surprising familiarity with a number of Christian practices and persons and revealing a preference for Nestorians over Jacobites, appeals to his Christian friend to embrace ISLAM. Specifically he urges on him: prayer to the one God after the example of Abraham "the first Muslim," confession of MUḤAMMAD's prophetic dignity, observance of RAMADAN, the pilgrimage to MECCA, the holy war, belief in the general resurrection, abandonment of the Trinity and Holy Cross, and the attractiveness of the Moslem moral code and its effective sanctions.

Al-Kindī deals with these items in detail. He denies that Abraham was a Muslim. From being a pagan, he became, through God's intervention, a believer long before Muḥammad. It has been noticed that al-Kindī's treatment of God's unicity draws largely and even verbatim on the Jacobite Abu Ra'ita.

Al-Kindī treats Muḥammad's prophetic dignity with harshness and biting irony. He contrasts unfavorably the holy war and the wars of the Old Testament; Muḥammad's teaching of mercy and his practice of force and immorality. He charges that Muḥammad lacks true prophecy and miracles and that the spread of Islam has the marks of falsehood.

In discussing the QUR'ĀN he makes bold to distinguish three kinds of law: divine, brought by Christ; natural or rational, brought by Moses; and Satanic, brought by Muḥammad. In this context he develops what has been called the first sketch of a critical history of the Qur'ānic text. He accepts none of the claims made for the book—its miraculous language and probative worth—and is indignant at God's being made responsible for Muḥammad's decisions and practices.

The pilgrimage to Mecca is classed with pagan ceremonies and contrasted with prayer in the Christian holy places. Circumcision is denied a religious character. The holy war is held to be opposed to Christian love. On these and similar grounds al-Kindī rejects al-Hāshimī's appeal and makes his own counterappeal.

The work is probably later than 819. Evidence supporting this includes the use of Abu Ra'ita (third decade of the 9th century); the argument against Muḥammad's name being on the throne of God suggests a controversy in the days of al-Ṭabarī (d. 923); and parallels with a work of Ibn al-Rāwandī (d. 910). It would seem then to belong to the 10th century. The pseudonymous character would explain how it was tolerated. The preference for Nestorians suggests a Nestorian author. Known and used by medieval Europeans, it was first printed in London in 1880.

Bibliography: L. MASSIGNON, Encyclopedia of Islam, ed. M. T. HOUTSMA et al., 4 v. (Leiden 1913–38) 2:1080. G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur, 5 v. (Vatican City 1944-53); Studi e Testi 118, 133, 146, 147, 172 2:135–145.

[J. A. DEVENNY]

AL-KINDĪ, ABŪ YŪSUF YAʻQŪB IBN-ISHĀQ

First outstanding scholar of Arab descent, hence his honorific title Faylasüf al-'Arab (the philosopher of the Arabs). His surname indicates descent from the noble South Arabian tribe of Kindah.

Life. Al-Kindī was born about 801 in al-Kūfah (Kufa), Iraq, where his father was a governor under the 'Abbāsids. He studied at Baghdad, where he flourished and died about 873. As a young man he held positions in the courts of al-Ma'mūm (813-833) and al-Mu'tasim (833–842), whose son he tutored. He dedicated some of his works to his pupil. Baghdad was then not only the political but also the intellectual capital of Islam. It was especially noted as a center of translation from Hindu through Persian, and from Greek through Syriac into Arabic. Al-Kindī himself is credited with translating, among other Greek works, those of Ptolemy; but recent research seems to indicate that he, whose philosophical vocabulary shows many Syriacisms, depended upon translations made by Christian Syrians, whose Arabic he may have revised. The philosophy he developed was eclectic, concerned primarily with reconciling and combining—in Neoplatonic fashion—the views of Plato and Aristotle. He followed the Neo-Pythagoreans in attaching mystic values to numerals, making mathematics the basis of science, especially of physics, and in not excluding medicine. In his moral philosophy he shared with his contemporaries, the Mu'tazilites, the views of Socrates on virtuous living and the deprecation of luxury.

Al-Kindī is ranked among the 12 greatest minds of Islam, but he was more encyclopedic than creative. His industry and literary activity contributed to the early diffusion of Greek learning and Persian-Indian science. Hardly a known scientific field—mathematics, physics, optics, medicine, astrology, geography, music, logic, poetry, or theology—was alien to his pen.

Works. For the celebration of al-Kindī's 1,000th anniversary in Baghdad (1962), Richard J. McCarthy, SJ, published a list of 361 titles attributed to him [Al-Taṣānīf] al-Mansūbah ilā Faylasūf al-'Arab (Baghdad 1962)]. The list begins with a work on philosophy and ends with one on swords. A short treatise by him on the manufacture of swords was published on the same occasion ['Aml al-Suyūf (Baghdad 1962)]. One treatise in the list deals with the art of cooking. In the titles, the names of Socrates, Aristotle, Plato, Euclid, Archimedes, Ptolemy, Hippocrates, and Galen appear, some more than once. Most of the works are treatises, some still in manuscript form, others now lost; a few may be spurious. Those extant in Latin are perhaps more numerous than those in Arabic. Alkindus, as he was designated in Latin, was well known to scholars throughout medieval times, but in the Arab world his influence waned after the 10th century. He was eclipsed by other Arab-Muslim philosophers both in Spain and in the East. Perhaps some of his books were lost when the conservative Caliph al-Mutawakkil (847-861) restored orthodoxy, disgraced and humiliated him, and seized his library. It was to the school of translators that flourished in Toledo under the patronage of Archbishop Raymond that the Latin world owed its knowledge of this Arab philosopher. GERARD OF CREMO-NA (d. 1187) was especially interested in al-Kindī, as was John of Seville (Joannes Hispalensis), a Christian convert from Judaism. At least some of the medical translations by Gerard of Cremona were included in the De medicinarum compositarum gradibus investigandis, published at Strassburg in 1531. In it al-Kindī propounds the extraordinary theory that mathematics is the basis of composite medicine and that doxology is a mathematical art. Alchemy, then considered an important science, was deprecated by al-Kindī. He did not believe it possible to transform base metal into gold or silver (the chief preoccupation of alchemists in his day). In Arabic the first large collection of al-Kindī [Rasā'il al-Kindī al-Falsafīyah, ed. Muhammad 'Abd-al-Wahhāb abū-Rīdah (Cairo)], containing 25 philosophical treatises, was not published until 1950-53.

One of al-Kindī's principal works dealt with geometrical and physiological aspects. Based on the optics of Euclid in Theon's recension, it was rendered into Latin as De aspectibus and was widely used in both Latin and Arabic until superseded by the greater work of Alhazen (Ibn al-Haytham). In his treatise, al-Kindī discusses the passage of light in a straight line and the process of vision directly, or through a looking glass. He recognizes that while in smell, taste, hearing, and touch the sense receives impressions from outside objects, in the case of vision the sense grasps its object instantaneously and in an active manner. In a treatise, extant in Latin, on the blue color of the sky he recognizes the effect of atoms of dust and vapor.

The earliest Arabic works on music that have come down to us are the five compiled by al-Kindī. They contain a determination of pitch and a description of rhythm $(\bar{\imath}q\bar{a}')$ as a constituent of Arab music, indicating a knowledge of measured song, or mensural music, in Islam centuries earlier than in Christendom. In music, which he renders as $m\bar{u}s\bar{\imath}q\bar{\imath}$ in Arabic, he was clearly indebted to the Greeks, as he was in other fields, such as astronomy. Although celebrated as an astrologer, he dealt with exact astronomical measurements.

Primarily a natural philosopher, al-Kindī devoted works to the soul (nafs), the intelligence ('aql), and to the relationship of the two. To him the world as a whole was the work of an external force, the divine intelligence. Between God and the world of matter lay the world of the soul. The human soul is an emanation of this world soul. Purely Islamic issues did not escape his attention. In one treatise he takes up the question of $tawh\bar{\iota}d$, the dogma of the unity of God, and in other works he attempts to refute both dualists and disbelievers.

Bibliography: T. J. DE BOER, The History of Philosophy in Islam, tr. E. R. JONES (London 1903). C. BROCKELMANN, Geschichte der arabischen Literatur, 2 v. (2d ed. Leiden 1943–49) 1:230–231. G. SARTON, Introduction to the History of Science, 3 v. in 5 (Baltimore 1927–48) 1:559–560. A. NAGY, Die philosophischen Abhandlungen des Ja'qüb ben Ishäq al-Kindï Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 2.5 (1897).

[P. K. HITTI]

KINDNESS

Gentleness, compassion, beneficence, the opposite of malevolence. Originally it seems to have indicated an attitude likely to be found among persons related by blood, but the modern designation is broader. Moreover, family affection, when too exclusive, can become a vice. In any case, the term came to be applied generally to an attitude and behavior toward people at large.

Though some elements of this human characteristic found favor with the Greek moralists, its present ethical position flows quite directly from OT and NT sources. It is considered as a divine attribute (1 Sm 20.14). In the teachings of Jesus the kind and forgiving spirit is made a condition of receiving divine mercy and forgiveness. Kindness in the sense of love is extended even to enemies (Mt 5.44). Just as in OT times there prevailed a special law of HOSPITALITY for strangers and travelers, so too in the early Christian Church hospitality and kindness to strangers was held in esteem. In fact, St. Paul made it one of the qualifications for selection for the episcopacy (1 Tm 2.2).

In describing virtuous actions St. Paul was frequently given to an abundant use of synonyms and to redundancy. Thus in speaking of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5.22–23), he sometimes used kindness in place of benignity or meekness. Again in 1 Cor 13.4 he lists kindness as one of the many attributes of the charitable man. Thus, for the moralist, kindness is considered in relationship with charity.

Since charity is love, it impels one to will the good of others in an efficacious manner. Hence, any general activity in which charity expands into practical exercise is kindness. Normally such activity takes into consideration the spiritual and bodily needs of neighbors. Thus, kindness extends to sinners who have a special claim to those gestures of compassion that prove helpful in restoring them to the community of saints. Such gestures are seldom misunderstood as approbation of sin itself. (See CHARITY.)

Bibliography: B. OLIVIER, "Charity," The Virtues and States of Life, ed. A. M. HENRY, tr. R. J. OLSON and G. T. LENNON (Theology Library 4; Chicago 1957) 127–208. G. KELLY, "On the Duty of Loving the Neighbor, Especially Enemies," Review for Religious 7 (1948) 299–312.

[W. HERBST]

KINGA, ST.

Also known as Cunegund or Kunigunde, princess (sometimes referred to as "queen") of Malopolska (Little Poland), widow, consecrated virgin of the Poor Clares; b. 1224, Hungary; d. July 24, 1292, Stary Sacz (also Sandeck, Sandecz, or Sandez), Poland.

Kinga was the daughter of King Bela IV of Hungary, Arpad Dynasty, and his wife, Maria, daughter of Emperor Theodorus Lascharis of Constantinople. Among the religious luminaries of her lineage are her sisters, Saint MARGARET OF HUNGARY (d. 1270) and Blessed Jolenta of Hungary (d. 1299); her great-aunt, Queen Saint HEDWIG of Silesia (d. 1243); her aunt, Saint ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY (1207–31); her uncle, Blessed Ludwig IV of Thuringia (1200–27); and her cousin, Blessed Gertrude of Altenberg (d. 1297).

Kinga's position required her to marry (1239) Boles-law II, sovereign of Lesser Poland (Krakow, Sandomire, and Lublin). Tradition relates that by mutual consent the couple pledged vows of perpetual continence before their bishop and their marriage was never consummated. Throughout her married life, Kinga continued to engage in prayer, mortification, and personal charity. Her spirituality was influenced by her contemporaries, the Dominican Saint HYACINTH (d. 1257) and the Blesseds, Bronisława (d. 1259), Sadok (d. 1260), and Salomea (d. 1268). At Boleslaw's death (1279), Kinga sold her possessions to relieve the poor, then took the veil at Stary Sacz Abbey, which she had built for the Poor Clares.

While Pope Alexander VIII approved Kinga's cultus as a beata in 1690 and she was declared patroness of Poland and Lithuania in 1695, her cause for canonization required reintroduction and her heroic virtues were declared on July 3, 1998. She was canonized by Pope John Paul II at Stary Sacz, Poland, June 16, 1999.

Feast: July 24 (Poland); July 27 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: Blogoslawiona Kinga: zyciorys, zbiór modlitw, ed. J. R. BAR (Warsaw 1985). R. PICO, Vita della venerabile Cunegonde, reina di Polonia, based on data collected by A. BZOWSKI (Rome 1633). Vita sanctae Kyngae ducissae Cracoviensis (Tarnów 1997).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KINGDOM OF GOD

The biblical expressions "Kingdom of God," "Kingdom of Christ," and "Kingdom of Heaven," all roughly equivalent, refer to three different aspects of the divine lordship or sovereignty over creation. Greek basileia, Hebrew malkuth, Aramaic malkutha, all connote these three aspects: a territory or space governed by a king (= kingdom); a king's activity or time of governing (= reign); the office or function of being a king (= kingship). Because this biblical formula is central to Jesus' way of conceiving the relationship between God and the world, God and humankind, it has become a major theme of biblical theology.

The Kingdom of God in the Scriptures

Old Testament. The formula "Kingdom of God" only begins to emerge in the later books of the Hebrew Bible, for example, 1 Chronicles 28:5 (malkut Yhwh) and 2 Chronicles 13:8 (mamlechet Yhwh); confer, Psalms 45:6-7; 22:28; 145:11-13; Wisdom 10:10. It becomes the dominant theme of the book of Daniel, the apocalyptic book par excellence of the OT, where almost every chapter culminates in its proclamation. The theme is also present in the literature of the Qumran sect, particularly in the War Scroll, which shares the same apocalyptic outlook as Daniel. In Daniel, the two most important chapters for our purposes are 2 (the dream of the statue of four metals plus clay) and 4 (the night vision of the four beasts). The four metals and four beasts represent four world empires or kingdoms, followed by the kingdom of God. These chapters thus represent a theological interpretation of world history. The crucial verses for Jesus and the NT are Daniel 7:13-14: "I saw one like a son of man coming with the clouds of heaven. And he came to the Ancient of Days and was presented before him. To him was given dominion and glory and kingship [= kingdom], that all peoples . . . should serve him.' This scene takes place in heaven and presents a transfer of royal power from a senior god to a younger god whose kingdom will be universal. This text is a basis for the NT doctrines of the kingdom, Christology, the Trinity and the Church (= "the saints of the Most High" in Daniel 7:18, 22, 27), besides giving a theology of history and a foundation for Christian involvement in the struggles for greater social justice and peace. Its importance can thus hardly be overestimated. This list of theological topics shows also the implications of the kingdom theme. In this sense apocalyptic is "the mother of Christian theology" (Käsemann).

In the earlier periods of Israelite literature the formula "Kingdom of God" is not common. Much is uncertain in the conceptual development, but one thing is clear: "Kingdom of God" grows out of the older idea that "God is king" (Yahwe malach). This older formula can have an anti-monarchical or a pro-monarchical sense. God, and no man, is king: this is the old theocratic notion found in Judges 8:22-23; 9:1-5, esp. vv. 7-15 (M. Buber). Or: God is king, and David is his earthly representative. The divine king can also fit into the priestly theology of a beneficent creation. Yet the expression is hardly present in the Pentateuch (Ex 15:18; Nm 23:21; perhaps Dt 33:5, all poetic texts). God as king takes the side of the hungry, prisoners, the oppressed, the blind, resident aliens, widows and orphans (Ps 146). He protects those without other social protection. As such, he is intended as the model for earthly kings. The prophet Ezekiel takes a radical turn: God as king punishes his disobedient people by sending them into exile (Ez 20, esp. v. 33). The Deuteronomistic historian is generally critical of the Israelite monarchy (1 Sm 8 and 12). Deutero-Isaiah softens these harsh views: God will now lead his people back to the land, in a new exodus (Is 4:2; 43:14–15, 25; 52:7–8). The disappointments after the return, especially the Seleucid persecutions and its martyrs, led religious reflection to a more radical apocalyptic and messianic hope for a new divine intervention that would replace the world empires and Judea's Temple state. This hope for a definitive reign of God on earth is expressed in Daniel (see above), but also in many pseudepigrapha (Assumption of Moses, Ethiopic Enoch), as well as much of the Qumran literature, for example, the War Scroll, where the mention of Michael shows the link with Daniel.

The kingdom of God and the Messiah are strongly present in rabbinic literature and the targums, written down one or several centuries after the close of the NT canon but often containing traditions current in earlier times. In this literature it is customary to refer to the kingdom as the kingdom of heaven (lit. "of the heavens").

This usage is also present in Matthew. "Heaven" here functions as a reverent circumlocution for God. It is a mistake to identify this variant formula with heaven, and thereby cut off any connection between the kingdom hope and this earth, an error made by several church fathers (see below).

New Testament. During the 20th century it was common to say that the announcement of the near coming of the kingdom of God was the central message of the preaching of Jesus. This view has been challenged by the "third quest" for the historical Jesus (M. Borg, J. D. Crossan, B. L. Mack), which classifies Jesus as a saintly sage rather than as an apocalyptic prophet. But, based on our earliest sources, Q and Mark (not the Gospel of Thomas), it will be the view held in this article.

Jesus' public ministry begins with this announcement (Mk 1:15; Mt 4:17; Luke 4:18-19, citing Is 61:1-2, gives a good idea of the social justice implications of the kingdom, without employing the term; the same may be said for Rv 5:12). The kingdom is also to be the main message of the preaching of Jesus' disciples: Mt 10:7 par Lk 9:2 (Q). The prayer Jesus taught his disciples has as its center the petition that "thy kingdom come . . . to earth, as it [already] is in heaven" (Mt 6:20; Lk 11:2 [Q]). This prayer implies that the kingdom is not yet fully realized on earth; it is to come in its fullness in the near future, as a divine gift. The parallel clause "thy will be done' suggest that the kingdom means that God's will be done. This moral content is then clarified as essentially justice (Mt 6:33). The petition also implies that the kingdom already exists in its fullness in heaven, even if not yet on earth. Still, in the healing and exorcizing ministry of Jesus the kingdom is already present (Matthew 12:28; Luke 11:20 [Q]), in sign, by anticipation, in germ. The kingdom is the content and purpose of the parables (Mk 4:11, 26, 30). It is the goal of death and the motive for ethical practice (Mk 9:1, 47). It must be approached as a child and is far from the rich (Mk 10:14-15, 23-25). One who knows that the greatest commandment is to love God and neighbor is near to it (Mk 12:34). The eucharistic meal anticipates it and looks forward to it (Mk 14:25). The man who takes care of the body of Jesus is one who seeks the kingdom (Mk 15:43). Thus the kingdom of God is the ultimate horizon of the preaching of Jesus, the highest value, the goal of history.

The two later synoptic gospels add some further developments. Matthew's gospel can be analyzed in such a way that from start to finish its second major theme (alongside the principal theme, the story of Jesus) is the kingdom of God. Even the infancy gospel becomes a mortal contest between two rival claimants to the throne. Matthew contributes two special emphases. The first is the close connection between eschatology (kingdom) and ethics. Entrance or admission to the kingdom becomes the reward for ethical action, the struggle for social justice. The kingdom is the first and last reward in the beatitudes (Mt 5:3, 10). The point is most powerfully made in the last judgment scene, proper to Matthew (25:31–46, esp. vv. 34-36). The second special emphasis is the relation between the kingdom and the church. Matthew 16:17–19 asserts that there is a connection between kingdom and church, that leaders in the church hold the keys to the kingdom, and, implicitly, that our relationship to the leaders has some bearing on our eternal destiny. The church is not the kingdom, nor is it heaven, but it is the path to them-that is, a gathering of those who look forward to them. The church is a sign of the kingdom's partial presence; she is at the service of the kingdom, its proto-sacrament.

Luke's contributions to the kingdom theme are: (1) the description in 4:16–30; (2) the kingdom as the object of preaching (Lk 4:43; 8:1; 9:2, 11, 60, 62; 16:16; Acts 8:12; 19:8; 20:25; 28:23, 31); (3) the mysterious entos hymon of Luke 17:21b. Today this is usually translated: "The kingdom of God is in the midst of you," but in the past it was translated as "within you." This older translation ignores the context and the plural pronoun, and was sometimes used to make the kingdom a purely, private, interior, mystical affair, in the spirit of John 14:23. (4) The book of Acts begins (1:3, 6) and ends (28:31) with the kingdom hope; as the church waits for it, she is consoled by the gift of the Holy Spirit (1:8; 2:1–4).

Both Paul and the book of Revelation present a kind of timetable of the last events (1 Thes 4:13-18; 1 Cor 15:20–28; Rv 20:1–10); these schedules in large measure are harmonious, but only Revelation 20 gives a figure for the duration of the kingdom in its fullness on earth: a thousand years, the millennium. This figure must be understood as symbolic, meaning "a long time." 2 Peter (3:1-14) tries to keep up the hope for the kingdom in view of its delay. The Gospel of John on the whole represents a shift away from the hope for the kingdom to come to earth. It displaces Christian hope to a hope for eternal life, already now on earth, and then in heaven. But it still maintains a hope for the return of Christ to earth (14:3, 18, 28), and mentions the kingdom explicitly in 3:3, 5, and in 18:36. This last verse has often been badly translated, but the New Revised Standard Version corrects the errors: the kingdom does not originate on earth, but it is intended to come here.

Summarizing the biblical message, we may say that the kingdom is a (1) social, (2) political, (3) personal, (4) universal, (5) divine gift to redeemed humanity.

The Kingdom of God in Church History

Church fathers. There are four main currents of interpretation of the kingdom of God in the patristic period. (1) The apocalyptic or eschatological interpretation, the only one exegetically defensible, continues in the first centuries and culminates in St. Irenaeus. Its features have already been described in the biblical section above. (2) The spiritual-mystical current begins with Origen. It identifies the kingdom either with heaven, or with Christ himself, or with the immortality of the soul, or with grace and charity in the soul. (3) The political current begins when the persecution of Christians by the Roman empire ceases, and the emperor Constantine refounds the empire as Christian (312). The theologian Eusebius of Caesarea saw this surprising shift as a fulfillment of biblical prophecy. For him the empire had become the kingdom of God on earth, the emperor was the Son of man, and he had the right to govern not only the state but also the church (caesaropapism). This view prevailed in the eastern or Byzantine empire till 1453. After that, its claims passed to the czars of Moscow. The western empire was revitalized in 800 with Charlemagne and continued till 1806, in frequent tension with papal claims. The imperial or political model continued in central Europe in various guises until 1918, and took a brief (1933–1945) demonic form in Hitler's Third Reich. Similar ideas were present in other parts of Europe (England, France) and spread to the new world (for example, America as redeemer nation). Military religious orders like the Knights of Malta, born during the crusades, symbolize this model inside the Church today. (4) About a century after Eusebius, St. Augustine developed the ecclesial model for interpreting the kingdom of God. On this view, the kingdom is found already now imperfectly in the church on earth, and will be found perfectly in the future in heaven. This concept was later expanded to reinforce papal claims to superiority over the emperors. Although biblically weak, this view at least helped preserve the religious character of the concept.

Medieval period. In the middle ages, these four lines of interpretation continued to compete with one another. The kingdom ceased to be a central object of reflection for the great scholastic theologians except in connection with the ideas of Joachim of Fiore. In meditating on the scriptures, he arrived at the idea of a history of salvation in three states or ages: the state of the Father (OT); the state of the Son (NT); and the state of the Holy Spirit in the future, when all God's people would be contemplatives under an angelic pope. Joachim's ideas were radicalized by Franciscan Spirituals, notably Gerard of Borgo San Donnino. Saints Bonaventure and Thomas Aquinas both attacked this challenge to the abiding form of the church. Joachim's ideas were later picked up by Protestant radical reformers and then by Romantic ideal-ist philosophers like Schleiermacher and Schelling. The German Dominican school of Rhineland mysticism meanwhile developed the idea of the kingdom as identical with God.

Modern period. In the early modern period, the kingdom vision continued to inspire utopian political thinkers like St. Thomas More and Tommaso Campanella, scientists like Newton and Priestley, explorers like Columbus, and missionaries like A. Viera. Rationalist philosophy (Descartes to Hume) ignores it. The "hero" of the story of the kingdom in modern thought (up to 1892) is Immanuel Kant. In one of his last works, Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793), he devotes a chapter to the kingdom as a model "ethical commonwealth." This he conceived as a kingdom of virtue. The tendency is moralizing, even Pelagian, as though we build the kingdom ourselves, rather than receive it as a gift of God. Kant's views had a great influence on what was later called "culture Protestantism" in Europe (Harnack) and on the Social Gospel movement in America (Rauschenbusch). More violent strains appeared in Marxism and in Nietzsche's aristocratic-radical reaction to Marx.

In 1892, a major rediscovery of the biblical message of the kingdom as a social gift of God occurred in a little book by Johannes Weiss, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God. Weiss's break with Kantian moralism was aggressively promoted by Albert Schweitzer in his studies of Jesus and Paul. Catholic exegetes, at first blocked by censors, were able to receive this discovery starting with R. Schnackenburg's book of 1958, just in time to influence the second Vatican Council. This exegetical rediscovery was also exploited in systematic theology by Jürgen Moltmann, Theology of Hope (1964), and J. B. Metz. Latin American liberation theology is another application of kingdom-centered theology.

Because of the use of the kingdom theme in the current theological discussion of the possibility of salvation of believers in non-Christian religions (see esp. the work of Jacques Dupuis), recent magisterial documents have devoted increasing attention to it: Redemptoris missio (all of chap. 2), Dialogue and Proclamation, and Dominus Iesus. Biblically, there seems to be no justification for using the kingdom as a means to bypass the church in the present eon of salvation. But the precise contours of the kingdom as it will come in its fullness with the return of Christ in the future cannot now be exhaustively determined.

The theme of the kingdom of God, made central by Daniel and Jesus, offers a powerful vision of hope for the future of this world in God's plan of salvation, which intends to realize the values of justice, peace, love, and joy (Rom 14:17). It is one of the several master themes of the Bible. This theme is dangerous to the extent that we forget that it is God's kingdom, his to bring when he judges that we are ready to receive it. People of hope can only prepare the way of the Lord. The struggle for social justice, which the promise of the kingdom inspires, needs to be sustained by faith and prayer, by life in community and persevering study.

Bibliography: J. BRIGHT, The Kingdom of God (Nashville 1953). K. KOCH, The Relevance of Apocalyptic (London 1972). J. WEISS, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (Philadelphia 1971). R. SCHNACKENBURG, God's Rule and Kingdom (New York 1963). B. T. VIVIANO, The Kingdom of God in History (Wilmington 1988). J. FUELLENBACH, The Kingdom of God (Maryknoll 1995). J. RATZINGER, The Theology of History in St. Bonaventure (Chicago 1971).

[B. T. VIVIANO]

KINGS, BOOK(S) OF

Name and Division. In the Hebrew Bible, the books of 1-2 Kings are one continuous book, called simply "Kings." The ancient Greek translation, the Septuagint (LXX), split the text into two books, as it did as well with the preceding book, "Samuel." It then named the four resulting books 1-4 Kingdoms. The Vulgate, translated by Jerome in the fourth Christian century, followed the LXX, though it drew slightly closer to the Hebrew tradition by naming the books 1-4 Kings. Although the Protestant tradition moved even closer to the Hebrew by naming the books 1-2 Samuel and 1-2 Kings, Roman Catholic tradition retained the practice of the Vulgate until the mid-twentieth century. This resulted in the confusing situation of 1-2 Kings in Protestant translations being the same as 3–4 Kings in Roman Catholic versions. Since the encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943), however, when Pope Pius XII urged Roman Catholic biblical translators to base their work on the original language texts rather than on the Latin Vulgate, Roman Catholic Bibles, like Protestant ones, title the four books 1–2 Samuel and 1-2 Kings. The artificiality of the division between 1 and 2 Kings is nevertheless clear, since the last three verses of 1 Kings contain the formulaic introduction to the reign of Ahaziah, which is continued and completed in 2 Kings 1.

Content and Organization. The two Books of Kings tell the story of the Israelite monarchy from the accession of Solomon, son of David (around 960 B.C.), through the division of the single Davidic realm into the two kingdoms of Israel in the north and Judah in the south, to the destruction of both kingdoms: Israel fell to the Assyrians in 722 B.C., Judah to the Babylonians in 587 B.C.. A brief addendum tells of the release of Jehoiachin, exiled king of Judah, from Babylonian prison in 562 B.C. (2 Kgs 25:27–30). Coverage of this four-century period is not even. The narrative treats some decades very extensively (e.g., the forty-year reign of Solomon takes eleven chapters to recount) and other decades very briefly (e.g., the forty-one-year reign of Jeroboam II is summarized in seven verses). The overall arrangement of the books is roughly symmetrical, and follows a concentric pattern that centers on the history of the northern kingdom's Omrid dynasty (see Savran, 148):

- 1. The Reign of Solomon (1 Kgs 1–11)
- 2. Separate establishment of the northern kingdom (1 Kgs 12–14:20)
- 3. Summaries: kings of north and south (1 Kgs 14:21–16:20)
- 4. The Omrid dynasty
 - a. Foundation of the dynasty in violence (1 Kgs 16:21–28)
 - b. Omrid kings, especially Ahab, and the prophets, especially Elijah (1 Kgs 16:29–2 Kgs 1:18)
 - c. Elisha succeeds Elijah as prophet (2 Kgs 2)
 - d. Omrid kings, especially Jehoram (sometimes abbreviated to Joram), and the prophets, especially Elisha (2 Kgs 3:1–9:13)
 - e. Destruction of the dynasty in violence (2 Kgs 9:14–11:20)
- 5. Summaries: kings of north and south (2 Kgs 11:21 [= Hebrew 12:1]–16:20)
- 6. Destruction of the northern kingdom (2 Kgs 17)
- 7. The southern kingdom to its destruction (2 Kgs 18–25)

Within this overall organization, the narrator uses a regular pattern for the recital of the history of the divided kingdoms. He tells the whole story of each king in turn, in order of accession to the throne, irrespective of whether that king ruled over the northern kingdom or the southern. The result is indeed a history of the kings, as the Hebrew text says, and not of the kingdoms, as the LXX would have it. The pattern is not theologically innocent. By it, the narrator reminds us that the division of Israel into two political units was indeed God's will (1 Kgs 11:29–39; 12:15), even if its fragmentation into separate religious bodies was due to human sin (1 Kgs 12:26–31; 13:33–34). The narrator's strategy thus balances the unity of God's people with the duality of the kingdoms God has assigned them to.

From the death of Solomon on (1 Kgs 11:41–43), with few exceptions, each king's reign is recounted according to the same pattern. Each regnal account begins with a formulaic introduction that comprises (a) a synchronization of the new king's year of accession with the regnal year in the other kingdom; (b) the king's age at accession (for kings of Judah only); (c) the length of the king's reign and his capital city; (d) the name of the king's mother (for kings of Judah only); and (e) a rather less formulaic theological evaluation of the king. Each regnal account ends with a formulaic conclusion that (a) refers the reader to other sources and (b) notes the death and burial of the king and the name of his successor (some of this information may be left out if it has already been given, for instance, in reporting an assassination). Between the introduction and conclusion, summary accounts usually describe a single noteworthy event of the reign. But even longer treatments, such as the reign of Ahab, begin and end with the formulas (see 1 Kgs 16:29–30; 22:39–40). The pattern is rarely disrupted, and few passages are situated between regnal accounts (1 Kgs 16:21–22; 2 Kings 2; 2 Kgs 13:14–25).

History of the Text. Clearly, 1–2 Kings as we have them today cannot predate the latest event they describe, the release of Jehoiachin from prison in 562 B.C.. However, most scholars believe that the present text is based on one or more earlier editions of the history that derive from the reign of Josiah (about 640–609 B.C.) or perhaps even Hezekiah (about 715-687 B.C.). Furthermore, the authors of 1-2 Kings refer their readers to three older sources, unfortunately not extant today ("The Book of the Acts of Solomon," 1 Kgs 11:41; "The Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel," 1 Kgs 14:19 and passim; and "The Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah," 1 Kgs 15:23, and passim). Whether these sources were based on official court records from the two kingdoms, or perhaps even constituted such court records themselves, is a matter of conjecture. Passages like 1 Kgs 4:2-6, 8-19 may indicate that the authors had (indirect?) access to archival records, and story cycles like 2 Kgs 2:19-8:6 may originate in anecdotes passed on in prophetic circles.

Kings as History. Despite the authors' possible use of older records, scholars today hesitate over the value of 1-2 Kings as reliable history. In general terms, most would agree with the panoramic sweep of the tale: a single kingdom, divided, and eventually conquered by the great Mesopotamian empires of Assyria and Babylon. But the particulars of the account are much less certain. Paucity of external corroboration (such as documentary evidence from other contemporary cultures or archaeological evidence from Israel) makes it difficult to judge the accuracy of the books' historical claims. Careful reading of the text reveals that the authors had no compunction about "adjusting" the historical data for their own purposes. For instance, details in 1 Kgs 4:22–23 surely originally described the "provisions" supplied by the Israelites (4:7), not the "tribute" exacted from vassal states (4:21). A second example concerns the invasion of Judah by the Assyrians toward the end of the eighth century (2) Kings 18–19). Difficulties reconciling the biblical narrative with Assyrian records suggest that the biblical authors have either conflated two different versions of one invasion or combined independent accounts of two separate incursions. On the level of individuals, the uncertainty is even more cogent. The intransigence of Elijah, the evil of Jezebel, the piety of Hezekiah—surely these owe as much or more to the authors' sense of dramatic portrayal as they do to historically reliable biography.

Kings as Theology. The key to the Books of Kings is to understand them as a theological interpretation of history. The presenting issue of 1–2 Kings is to explain the dismal failure of the monarchic experiment in Israel. The presenting issue of the entire Deuteronomistic History, of which 1–2 Kings is the last major section, is to explain the dismal failure of Israel's experience in the Promised Land, from their arrival under the leadership of Joshua to their departure by Assyrian and Babylonian dispersion. And the explanations are thoroughly theological: violation of the covenantal obligations toward God resulted in imposition of punishments foreseen in the covenant itself (see Dt 27–28, especially 28:36, 64).

Each king receives a theological evaluation at the end of the formulaic introduction to his reign. Northern kings are condemned without exception, usually for following "the sin of Jeroboam"—that is, worship of the golden calves the first northern king set up at sanctuaries in Dan and Bethel. The authors deem this idolatry, although historically Jeroboam's shrines were almost certainly dedicated to the true God of Israel, who was understood to be enthroned invisibly on the golden calves (just as he was enthroned invisibly on the cherubimwinged lions?—in the Temple at Jerusalem). The condemnations of northern kings become progressively more severe, reaching their nadir with Ahab (1 Kgs 16:30–33). After the fall of the northern kingdom in 722 B.C., the authors interrupt the historical recital to reflect on the cause of Israel's destruction, their abandonment of Yahweh (2 Kgs 17:6-23).

Some of the southern kings, too, are condemned, though many receive qualified praise. Praise is given for fidelity to God; praise is qualified for "failing to remove the high places"—that is, sanctuaries that were presumably dedicated to Yahweh but that the authors of Kings considered heterodox, because, in their view, the Temple in Jerusalem was the sole legitimate place to offer sacrifice to Yahweh. Only two southern kings receive unqualified praise, Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18:3–4) and Josiah (2 Kgs 22:2), both for their fidelity to Yahweh following the model of King David. The purely theological basis of the authors' evaluations is clear when one considers their treatment of Manasseh, whose reign was the longest of any king of either kingdom. His policies seem to have preserved peace in the land throughout his long reign (though at the expense of vassalage to Assyria); but the authors of Kings dismiss him in less than a chapter, and deem his idolatry so evil that not even the pieties of Josiah could atone for it (2 Kgs 24:3).

A further indication of the theological spirit of Kings is the important and pervasive presence of prophets and prophetic material. The concentric structure of 1–2 Kings (see above) centers on a moment of prophetic succession, as if the whole history of Israel pivots on the bearers of God's word, rather than on the deeds of mere kings. History is driven by that Word. It is spoken in prophecy and realized in fulfillment events (see, among more than forty examples, 1 Kgs 11:31–39 and 12:15; 1 Kgs 13:2 and 2 Kgs 23:15–16; 1 Kgs 21:19 and 22:38; 1 Kgs 19:15–16 and 2 Kings 8:7–15; 9:1–13). Even the behavior of Yahweh himself reflects the importance of prophets: he speaks several times (twice in dreams) to King Solomon, but with one exception God never speaks directly to anyone but prophets after that.

Reading Kings Today. The enduring message of 1–2 Kings is its claim that the Word of God is the driving force of human history. There is no perfect, inevitably right form of human government; even those human institutions established by divine dispensation are vulnerable to the weaknesses and sins of the human beings who embody them in our world. But beneath the vacillations of men and women, behind the vagaries of kings and nations, around and above the vicissitudes of human history, the Word of God is at work and will ultimately prevail.

Bibliography: J. A. MONTGOMERY, The Books of Kings, International Critical Commentary, ed. S. R. DRIVER et al. (Edinburgh 1951). J. GRAY, I & II Kings (Philadelphia 1970). R. D. NELSON, The Double Redaction of the Deuteronomistic History (Sheffield 1981). C. CONROY, 1-2 Samuel, 1-2 Kings (OTM; Wilmington 1983). G. H. JONES, 1 and 2 Kings (NCBC; Grand Rapids 1984). B. O. LONG, 1 Kings (FOTL; Grand Rapids 1984). S. J. DEVRIES, 1 Kings (WBC; Waco 1985). T. R. HOBBS, 2 Kings (WBC; Waco 1985). R. NELSON, First and Second Kings (Atlanta 1987). G. SAVRAN, "1 and 2 Kings," in The Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. R. ALTER and F. KERMODE (Cambridge, Mass. 1987); 146-64. M. COGAN and H. TADMOR, II Kings (New York 1988). I. W. PROVAN, Hezekiah and the Books of Kings (BZAW; Berlin 1988). J. T. WALSH and C. R. BEGG, "1-2 Kings," in The New Jerome Biblical Commentary (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1990), §10. B. O. LONG, 2 Kings (FOTL; Grand Rapids 1991). S. L. MCKENZIE, The Trouble with Kings (SVT; Leiden 1991). S. W. HOLLOWAY, "Kings, Book of 1-2," in The Anchor Bible Dictionary (New York 1992); 4:69-83. G. N. KNOPPERS, Two Nations under God (Atlanta 1993). A. BRENNER, A Feminist Companion to Samuel and Kings (Sheffield 1994). I. W. PROVAN, First and Second Kings (NIBCOT; Peabody, Mass. 1995). J. T. WALSH, 1 Kings (Berit Olam; Collegeville 1996). T. FRETHEIM, First and Second Kings (Louisville 1999). R. L. COHN, 2 Kings (Collegeville 1999).

[J. T. WALSH]

KINGSHIP IN THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST

A purely secular view of Near Eastern kingship that does not take into account the special relationship existing between king and deity is destined to be found myopic. In ancient Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Israel the king was the representative of the deity on earth. It is very important, therefore, to determine the nature of this association in order to understand better the concept of kingship in the respective countries. After treating of kingship in ancient Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Israel, this article will conclude with a consideration of the Israelite concept of the ideal king of the future.

Relation of King to Deity in Ancient Egypt. The fundamental concept of Egyptian kingship was that the king or pharaoh was a superhuman being, a god from birth, begotten by the sun god and first King RA (RE) and metaphysically one with all of the great gods. In his different ministerial capacities he incarnated the gods Horus, Seth, and Osiris. As the personification of the gods, he ruled by divine decree and meted out justice by divine wisdom. The beneficial relations between heaven and earth resulting from the king's union with the gods were reactivated yearly at the principal festivals, especially the all important "Sed festival." On that occasion the king took part in a cultic drama in which he ritually overcame death and chaos by resurrecting in triumph and thus generated prosperity for the land and its people during the coming year.

Relation of King to Deity in Ancient Mesopotamia. In ancient Mesopotamia the king was the earthly viceroy of the national god, but he was not considered divine as were the pharaos. He was a mortal, made to carry a superhuman charge placed upon him by the gods—a "big man" as his Sumerian title 1u-gal signifies. There are some scattered examples of kings using the divine ideogram before their names, but these graphic signs are not enough to establish a common concept of deification.

The king did take on characteristics of a deity, but only intermittently, as for instance at the New Year festival. It was then that he substituted for the national god in the enacted ritual drama and renewed his superhuman endowments, while also restoring harmony and fruitfulness to nature temporarily disturbed by the change of seasons. Nature's renewal in the spring was looked upon as the result of a sacred marriage (hierogamy) between the mother goddess, represented ritually by a priestess, and the king, made to play the part of the divine bridegroom.

The Mesopotamian king is said to be "adopted, nursed, and reared" by the gods. He is "holy" by virtue of his familiarity with the gods, and thereby partakes of "eternity, splendor, and glory." He is likened to the different gods, especially the sun god and the resurrected fertility god, Tammuz; yet he ever remains the earthly steward of the deities—a mortal like all men.

Whereas in Egyptian ideology the king's role of representing the gods was particularly emphasized, in Mesopotamia more stress is placed upon the king's representation of his people before the divine throne. Once again, at the prominent New Year festival the king, as the representative of the congregation, ritually effected the resuscitation of the "dead god" by bringing him the assistance he needed. The people also through their king "descended to the dead god," temporarily confined to the nether world, and by a further ritual effected a reversal of mood that brought the god back to the world of the living. Thus conjoined to their king, the people would be assured a new period of fertility for the coming year. Even in such a ritual, the king is never a god. He is temporarily "fused" with divinity, imbued with the god's destiny, experience, and life giving powers that he, in his turn, imparts to the society he represents.

On the basis of such ideas, advocates of the so-called "Myth and Ritual School" of comparative religion conclude to a common "ritual pattern" in the king ideology of the entire ancient Near East. This theory revolves about the divine figure of the king, especially in his cultic function at the great cyclic festivals. The king is of divine origin. He suffers, dies, returns to life, conquers the monsters of chaos, and in the annual repetition of these sacred acts becomes a source of prosperity and blessing for his people. Israelite kingship is said to be patterned on this ideology.

As ingenious as the "Ritual Pattern Theory" may be, most Biblical scholars today view it as an unproved hypothesis, wanting seriously in Biblical evidence, and, on the whole, underestimating the distinctive qualities of Israel's religion.

Relation of the King to Yahweh in Ancient Israel.

Although Israel's monarchical structure was in some ways influenced by the "king ideology" of neighboring nations, the theistic concept of Yahweh's kingship was and always remained such a basic tenet of Israel's religion that kingship took on properties quite distinct from the ideologies of Egypt and Mesopotamia.

For one thing, kingship in Israel was integrated into a theocratic system in which Yahweh alone was considered king and absolute ruler of the universe (Ex 15.18; 19.6; Nm 23.21; 1 Sm 8.7; 12.12; Jgs 8.23); the human king was but His earthly regent. As a matter of fact, there was strong feeling against the introduction of the monarchy from the very outset; it appeared too restrictive of the free and independent traditions inherited from Israel's migrant days, and what was more objectionable, it was too closely allied with the Canaanite way of life.

The theocratic structure of the people of God was based on the Sinai covenant [see COVENANT (IN THE BIBLE)]. In their attempt to settle the promised land the Israelites encountered steady opposition from hostile neighbors, and it soon became clear there was need of effective centralized action; the Israelite tribes needed a leader (1 Sm 8.20). It was then that a new "royalized" covenant was established between Yahweh and the Davidic dynasty; the latter, however, always representing and embodying the people Israel by virtue of the Biblical concept of "corporate personality." The king becomes Yahweh's viceregent, and in contrast to Yahweh, Israel's real king, the human position of the king is clearly delineated.

In Israel there is no indication at all of the earthly king's divinization. He did enjoy a privileged position as God's viceroy on earth, it is true. He became "the Lord's anointed" (1 Sm 16.6; 2 Sm 1.14) and "prince" (Hebrews $n\bar{a}g\hat{i}d$) over Israel (1 Sm 9.16; 10.1; 13.14); he was changed into "another man" (1 Sm 10.6, 9), and as such he was endowed with the "spirit" (rûah) of Yahweh (1 Sm 10.6, 10; 11.6; 16.13) and treated as inviolable (1 Sm 24.7; 31.4; 2 Sm 1.4). He became Yahweh's adopted son: "This day I have begotten thee" (Ps 2.7). In a critically troublesome passage he is even called 'ĕlōhîm (God), and his throne is regarded as eternal [Ps 44 (45).7]. Such extravagant phraseology depicting the close association between God and the king really proves nothing more than that the king of Israel existed by virtue of Yahweh's will and was His earthly representative. The hyperbolic expressions so common to oriental Hofstil (court style) cannot be taken too literally. They indicate the preeminent role of the king, but always as subordinated to God.

Furthermore if the kings were considered quasidivine, it is difficult to explain why the Prophets reprimanded them so harshly and frequently for their dereliction of covenant duties, and for neglecting to fulfill their obligations as servants of God and of the people (Dt 17.14–20; 1 Sm 13.8–15; 15.26; 2 Sm 5.12; 1 Kgs 11.31–39; 18.17–19; 21.17–24; Jer 22.15–17).

As God's earthly viceroy, the king became a purveyor of divine blessings for the people and their land. He was their source of strength [Ps 89(90).18], their breath of life (Lam 4.20), and therefore had to be protected in the interests of the nation (2 Sm 18.3). His position entitled him to universal sovereignty [Ps 2.8–9; 71(72).8–11; 88(89).26–28], establishing justice in the world [Ps 44 (45).4–8; 71 (72).1–4], and destroying his enemies [Ps 2.9; 20(21).9–14]. Even the fertility of the land was ascribed to his association with Yahweh, the source of all life [Ps 71(72).3, 16].

Israel's Ideal King of the Future. An important phase in the historical development of Israelite kingship was Yahweh's promise, delivered through the Prophet Nathan, that the Davidic dynasty would remain forever [2 Sm 7.8–16; 1 Chr 17.7–14; Ps 87(88).3–5, 20–38]. This assertion was the basis of future eschatological hopes for a new kingdom and an ideal king, and in this regard also Israelite kingship differed radically from the kingship patterns of Egypt and Mesopotamia.

A tension arose when this promise came into contact with the harsh empirical reality of the utter failure of the monarchy in both Israel and Judah. Many of the kings had so often abandoned their covenant obligations, and appeared so unworthy of their privileged position that there arose within the prophetic movement, especially in Isaiah of the late 8th century B.C., the hope for an ideal king, one who would embody and revive the qualities of David of old: a king of peace and justice (Is 9.1–6), animated by the spirit of the Lord (Is 11.2), one who would restore the earth to her paradisaical harmony and bliss (Is 11.6–9). This future MESSIAH was depicted in various images by the classical prophets down through the centuries.

With the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. and the dissolution of the monarchy, the hopes and aspirations for a future king were marked by a profound change. Israel was chastened by the humiliating experience of the Babylonian Exile [Lam 4.20; Ps 88(89).39–52], and although the first pioneers who returned to Jerusalem were stimulated temporarily by the hope of a new Davidic "branch" (Zec 3.8–10; 6.9–14), the Israelite hope for the future focused more on the KINGDOM OF GOD than on one specific individual. Yet at the threshold of the New Testament, Judaism was awaiting a Messiah king who would free Israel from foreign oppression and bring about lasting peace in the world.

See Also: MESSIANISM.

Bibliography: R. LABAT, La Caractère religieux de la royauté assyro-babylonienne (Paris 1939). H. FRANKFORT, Kingship and the Gods (Chicago 1948). C. R. NORTH, "The Religious Aspects of Hebrew Kingship," Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 50 (1932) 8–38. J. DE FRAINE, L'Aspect religieux de la royauté Israélite; L'Institution monarchique dans l'A. T. et dans les textes mésopotamiens (Rome 1954). S. MOWINCKEL, He That Cometh, tr. C. W. ANDERSON (Nashville 1956) 21–95; The Psalms in Israel's Worship, tr. D. R. APTHOMAS, 2 v. (Nashville 1962) 1:50–61. H. CAZELLES, "Mito, rituale, e regalità," Bibbia e Oriente 2 (1960) 121–35. K. H. BERNHARDT, Das Problem der altorientalischen Königsideologie in A. T., unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Geschichte der Psalmenexegese dargestellt und kritisch gewürdigt (Vetus Testamentum suppl. 8; 1961). Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L.

HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1282–86.

[E. J. CIUBA]

KINLOSS, ABBEY OF

Former CISTERCIAN Abbey of St. Mary within the county and old diocese of Moray, Scotland. Founded by DAVID I in 1150 or 1151, it was colonized from MELROSE. Much of the abbey's later, unquiet history was faithfully recorded and preserved by the learned Italian humanist John Ferreri, who taught classics there at the invitation of its greatest abbot, Robert Reid, subsequent bishop of Orkney (1541). Erected into a temporal lordship for Edward Bruce in 1601, the abbey is now a ruin.

Bibliography: J. FERRERI, Historia abbatum de Kynlos (Edinburgh 1839). J. STUART, ed., Records of the Monastery of Kinloss (Edinburgh 1872). J. M. CANIVEZ, ed., Statuta capitulorum generalium ordinis cisterciensis ab anno 1116 ad annum 1786, 8 v. (Louvain 1933–41) 8:287. D. E. EASSON, Medieval Religious Houses: Scotland (London 1957) 65.

[L. MACFARLANE]

KINO, EUSEBIO FRANCISCO

Missionary, explorer, and cartographer; b. Segno, Italy, Aug. 10, 1645; d. Magdalena, Ariz. (then Mexico), March 15, 1711. Called the "Apostle of Sonora and Arizona," Kino changed his family name, spelled Chino or Chini, to Quino or Kino. In his prayers for recovery from a nearly fatal illness in 1663, he promised St. Francis Xavier that he would assume the name Francisco, enter the Society of Jesus, and devote himself to the missions. Two years later, he joined the Jesuit province of Upper Germany. While engaged in ecclesiastical studies, chiefly at Innsbruck and Ingolstadt, he also familiarized himself with astronomy and mathematics as necessities for the Chinese missions. His association with Germany during these years have led some historians to class him as a German under the name Kühn. Finally in 1678, after repeated petitions, Kino was assigned to a group being assembled in Spain for missions in American and Asia. Since their destinations were not explicit, he and a fellow Jesuit drew lots; the pious gamble chose his destination as Mexico.

Kino voyaged from Genoa to Cádiz, only to endure a two-year delay in Spain—a delay that permitted him to study the comet of 1680. He sailed from Cádiz in January of 1681 and landed at Vera Cruz, Mexico, in May. In Mexico City he published a pamphlet containing his observations on the comet, which were attacked by the Mexican scholar and former Jesuit novice, Carlos Sigüenza y Gángora. Meanwhile Kino had left Mexico City to serve as a royal cosmographer and Jesuit superior on the Atondo expedition of 1683 to Lower California. He wrote reports, crossed this reputedly "large island" from Gulf shore to Pacific coast, and drew maps which he sent to Europe. Drought caused the abandonment of his missionary and colonizing venture in 1685.

Pimería Alta, a vast region extending over modern northern Sonora and southern Arizona, was the scene of Kino's endeavors from 1687 until his death. Establishing his headquarters at Mission Dolores in 1687, he founded missions in the San Miguel, Magdalena, Altar, Sonóita, Santa Cruz, and San Pedro valleys. He baptized 4,500 Pimas, promoted cattle raising, and established missions on the sites of many modern towns and cities. He rode thousands of miles, traveling north from Dolores as far as the Gila and Colorado Rivers. His was the first clearly recorded description of the Casa Grande of the Gila. His enthusiastic letters and reports on Lower California helped the Jesuits to return there in 1697. Kino himself was retained at Primería even though royal decrees directed him to go to California with the missionary Juan Salvatierra; his missions sent cattle and other supplies to the new posts across the Gulf.

In 1700, while constucting the first mission of San Xavier del Bac, he became convinced that California was not an island when he noticed blue shells that he had originally seen on California's Pacific coast side. Two expeditions to the lower Colorado strengthened his opinion, and his maps did much to prove the fact to Europe. He planned to open a road around the head of the gulf, but it was not until generations later that Juan de Anza and Junípero Serra made it a reality. In 1711 the dedication of a chapel in honor of St. Francis Xavier brought Kino to his mission at Magdalena, and he died there.

Bibliography: E. S. KINO, Kino's Historical Memoir of Pimería Alta, tr. and ed. H. E. BOLTON (Berkeley 1948). E. J. BURRUS, ed., Kino Reports to Headquarters (Rome 1954). H. E. BOLTON, Rim of Christendom: A Biography of Eusebio Francisco Kino, Pacific Coast Pioneer (New York 1936; repr. 1960).

[J. A. DONOHUE]

KIRBY, LUKE, ST.

English martyr; b. probably near Richmond, Yorkshire, England, c. 1548; d. Tyburn (London), May 30, 1582. Cardinal William Allen calls him a master of arts of Cambridge, but this is uncertain. However, he was educated as a non-Catholic and, crossing to Douai, he was received into the Church at the English College, where he was ordained on Sept. 19, 1577. From Douai he went the next year to Rome to continue his studies. On Apr. 18, 1580, along with (St.) Edmund CAMPION, he set out for England. He left Rheims on June 16, but he was captured immediately on landing at Dover and was taken to London and imprisoned in the Gatehouse. On Dec. 4, 1580, he was transferred to the Tower, where he was subjected to the "Scavenger's Daughter," a double iron hoop that enclosed and contracted the body. On Nov. 16, 1581, he was tried at Westminster Hall with Edmund Campion, Ralph SHERWIN, and Alexander BRIANT. Although he was condemned with his companions for complicity in a fictitious plot in Flanders, his execution was delayed until May 30 the following year. During this interval he was kept in chains. Before he was hanged, drawn, and quartered, he protested his innocence of any conspiracy against the Queen. Kirby was beatified by Leo XIII on Dec. 29, 1886, and canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970.

Feast: May 28; Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs Declared Blessed by Pope Leo XIII in 1866 and 1895, 2 v. (New York 1904–14) 2:500–522. M. T. H. BANKS, Blessed Luke Kirby (Postulation Pamphlet; London 1961). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 2:415–416. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969).

[G. FITZ HERBERT]

KIRCHER, ATHANASIUS

German archeologist; b. Geisa (Fulda), May 2, 1601; d. Rome, Oct. 30, 1690. He joined the Society of Jesus at 17 and later taught mathematics and philosophy at the Jesuit college in Würzburg. He was ordained in 1628. During the THIRTY YEARS' WAR he was forced to go to Avignon (1632), but two years later he settled in Rome, where he taught mathematics, physics, and Oriental languages. He later devoted all his attention to archeology, especially to the interpretation of hieroglyphics found in ancient monuments and ruins. He also did some work in physics, where he is credited with the construction of convergent mirrors and projectors. The Kircher Museum that he founded in the Roman College was taken over by the state in 1870. He wrote many books about different subjects, among them: Specula melitensis encyclica (Mesina 1638); Ars magna lucis et umbrae (Rome 1645); Musurgia universalis (Rome 1650); Magnes sive de arte magnetica libri tres (1640); Itinerarium extaticum (1656); Iter extaticum II (1657); Lingua aegyptiaca restituta (Rome 1664); Mundus subterraneus (Amsterdam 1664, 3d ed. 1671); Polygraphica seu artificium linguarum (Rome 1665); Latium, id est, nova et parallela Latii descriptio (Rome 1671).

Athanasius Kircher.

Kircher's place in science rests primarily on his extensive writings, which give a picture of scientific understanding in the 17th century. He was a man of his time, and many of his statements have been shown to be uncritical or incorrect, but the charge of scientific falsification, which has been leveled against him, has not been substantiated.

Bibliography: K. BRISCHAR, Athanasius Kircher: Ein Lebensbild (Würzburg 1877). P. Athanasii Kircheri vita a semetipso conscripta (Augsburg 1684). L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934); photoduplicated with rev. and suppl., 2 v. (Louvain-Heverlee 1962) 2:983–984.

[E. T. SPAIN]

KIRK, KENNETH ESCOTT

Anglican bishop of Oxford, theologian; b. Sheffield, England, Feb. 21, 1886; d. Oxford, June 8, 1954. Educated at Sheffield Royal Grammar School and at St. John's, Oxford, Kirk graduated (1908) with first class honors and became assistant to the professor of philosophy at University College, London (1909–12). He received holy orders in 1913, and devoted the rest of his life, except for an interval as military chaplain during World War I, to an academic career at Oxford. In 1927 he became regius professor of moral and pastoral theology, and canon of Christ's Church, Oxford. He delivered the Bampton Lectures in 1928. From 1937 to his death he was bishop of Oxford. Kirk was an Anglo-Catholic in the liberal tradition of Charles GORE and the LUX MUNDI school. He contributed to Essays Catholic and Critical (1926), a symposium that accepted the findings of critical scholarship in a way that would have seemed temerarious to earlier generations of Tractarians, but that was by 1926 taken for granted by most progressive Anglo-Catholics. Kirk was also one of the most prominent Anglican moral theologians of his day. His main publications were: A Study of Silent Minds (1918), Some Principles of Moral Theology (1920), Conscience and Its Problems (1927), The Vision of God (Bampton Lectures 1928), The Threshold of Ethics (1933), The Crisis of Christian Rationalism (1935), The Epistle to the Romans (Clarendon Bible, 1936), The Ministry of Absolution (1947), and The Coherence of Christian Doctrine (1950). Kirk edited and contributed to Personal Ethics (1934) and the Apostolic Ministry (1946).

Bibliography: E. W. KEMP, The Life and Letters of Kenneth Escott Kirk (London 1959).

[W. HANNAH]

KIRK, RUSSELL AMOS

Man of letters and political theorist; b. Plymouth, Michigan, Oct. 18, 1918; d. Piety Hill, Mecosta, Michigan, April 29, 1994. Russell Kirk was the son of Russell and Marjorie (Pierce) Kirk. He received a B.A. from Michigan State University (1940); an M.A. from Duke University (1941); and a D.Litt. from St. Andrews University, Scotland (1952). He married Annette Courtemanche in 1964 and was the father of four children.

Kirk achieved national prominence and a broad permanent following with the publication of The Conservative Mind: From Burke to Santayana (1953). This was followed by 29 other books, including studies of John Randolph of Roanoke, Edmund Burke, and T. S. Eliot. Notable among his many publications are Academic Freedom (1955), Eliot and His Age (1971), The Roots of the American Order (1974), Decadence and Renewal in the Higher Learning (1978), The Conservative Constitution (1990), and The Politics of Prudence (1993). The author of a long-running column "From the Academy" in the National Review, Kirk founded the quarterly review, Modern Age, in 1957 and in 1960 The University Bookman, which continues under the editorship of his wife.

Throughout his career Kirk devoted his intellectual energy to studying the philosophical roots and principal documents of the Anglo-American tradition of political theory. A convert to Catholicism shortly before his marriage in 1964, he was convinced that all political problems, in the last analysis, are religious and moral problems. "At heart," he wrote, "all social questions are exercises in ethics; and ethics in turn depend on religious faith." He believed that religion, particularly Christianity, is the key to restoring the harmony of a properly ordered society.

"Purveyor of Immutable Truths." A defender of the principle of subsidiarity, Kirk stressed the need to preserve local communities against the leveling tendency of big government and big business. Judging the modern university to be the instrument for the inculcation of the secular philosophy of the Enlightenment, he was a consistent critic of American higher education. For decades he waged war against administrators and faculty members whom he regarded as corrupting the American university by lowering standards of achievement and by failing to respect inherited traditions.

Kirk was convinced that cognitive claims cannot always be immediately adjudicated, that the process of judging can be complicated, and consequently, that if standards are not to be trivial, they must transcend the present and rest upon the best judgments available. His conservative mind reflected his study and appreciation of classical antiquity, i.e., Plato, Aristotle, Seneca, Cicero, Livy, and Pliny. He was convinced that nature is intelligible, that the human mind is capable of ferreting out its secrets, and that time-transcending standards can be adduced and employed. Kirk wanted to be known as "a purveyor of immutable truths."

Hailed as the "father of the conservative movement," Kirk's contribution to letters was widely recognized. He was awarded numerous honorary degrees and was the recipient of the Ingersoll prize for scholarly writing (1984) and the Presidential Citizen's Medal (1989). He was a Fulbright Lecturer, a Guggenheim Fellow, a Senior Fellow of the American Council of Learned Societies, a National Endowment for the Humanities Constitutional Fellow and a Distinguished Fellow of the Heritage Foundation.

Bibliography: A bibliography of Kirk's writings is available from the Intercollegiate Studies Institute, 14 South Bryn Mawr Avenue, Bryn Mawr, PA 19010. For a tribute to his work, see The Unbought Grace of Life, ed. J. E. PERSON (Peru, IL 1994).

[J. DOUGHTERY]

Kirkstall Abbey from the Northwest. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

KIRKMAN, RICHARD, BL.

Priest and martyr; b. Addingham, West Riding, Yorkshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, Aug. 22, 1582. He studied at the seminaries of Douai and Rheims prior to his presbyterial ordination on Holy Saturday 1579. In order to disguise his priestly nature, Kirkman served as tutor in the household of Robert Dymoke, hereditary Champion of England (d. in Lincoln gaol for his faith, Sept. 11, 1580), at Scrivelsby, Lincolnshire. Fr. Kirkman was eventually discovered and arrested, Aug. 8, 1582. He was arraigned shortly thereafter for being an illegal priest and confined to a turret cell with Bl. William LACEY. For the last 12 days of his earthly life, Richard was held in a verminous underground dungeon. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KIRKSTALL, ABBEY OF

Former CISTERCIAN monastery near Leeds, England, in the ancient See of YORK. Kirkstall was a daughterhouse of FOUNTAINS ABBEY and thus in the line of descent from CLAIRVAUX. It was founded in 1147 by Henry Lacy as an offering of thanksgiving for his recovery from a severe illness. The original foundation was at Barnoldswick, on the Lancashire side of Yorkshire. In 1152, however, the monastic community was translated to its permanent site at Aierdale, near Leeds, and built there the abbey dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary. The abbey flourished during the later Middle Ages until the dissolution of all monastic communities in England in the 16th century. It was surrendered to HENRY VIII on Nov. 22, 1540. The buildings that have survived constitute a fine example of the Norman Gothic style of the mid-12th century.

Bibliography: Sources. M. V. CLARKE and N. DENHOLM-YOUNG, "The Kirkstall Chronicle, 1355–1400," The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 15 (1931) 100–137. Fundacio abbathie de Kyrkestall, ed. E. K. CLARKE (Thoresby Society 4; Leeds 1895) 169–208. Literature. W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73); best ed. by J. CALEY et al., 6 v. (1817–30) 5:526–552. A. MULREADY and C. COPE, An Historical, Antiquarian and Picturesque Account of Kirkstall Abbey (Leeds 1827). L.

JANAUSCHEK, Origines Cistercienses, v. 1 (Vienna 1877) 93–94. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1521. D. KNOWLES, The Religious Houses of Medieval England (London 1940), passim. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962) passim.

[J. BRÜCKMANN]

KIRLIN, JOSEPH

Pastor, author; b. Philadelphia, PA, March 20, 1868; d. Philadelphia, Nov. 26, 1926. He was educated by the Christian Brothers at La Salle College, Philadelphia, receiving an A.B. in 1886. That fall he began to study for the priesthood at St. Charles Seminary, Overbrook, PA, and continued at The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERI-CA, Washington, D.C. He was ordained on Dec. 17, 1892, and obtained a bachelor's degree in sacred theology the following year. While assistant at St. Patrick's Church, Philadelphia, he published the *Life of Most Reverend Pat*rick John Ryan (1903), planned as part of a complete history of the Catholic Church in Philadelphia. By 1909 he had completed his large volume, Catholicity in Philadelphia, a work rich in facts about the Colonial and Revolutionary periods. Kirlin was disappointed with the indifferent reception this book received, and later turned to devotional writing. In 1920, when he was named a papal chamberlain, he began to contribute to Emmanuel, the magazine of the national Priest's Eucharistic League. From his monthly articles there grew a trilogy of works: One Hour with Him (1923), Our Tryst with Him (1925), and With Him in Mind (1926). Kirlin preached and lectured widely on the Eucharistic movement. His sermons were published posthumously in 1929 as Christ the Builder. His Priestly Virtue and Zeal, also appearing in 1929, was a study of the Curé of Ars. Shortly before his death Kirlin accepted the presidency of the Catholic University Alumni Association and that of the American Catholic Historical Society. He had long been pastor of the Most Precious Blood Parish, which he founded in Philadelphia in 1907.

[H. J. NOLAN]

KIRSCH, JOHANN PETER

Church historian, archeologist, and pioneer in the history of papal finances; b. Dippach, Luxemburg, Nov. 3, 1861; d. Rome, Feb. 4, 1941. Kirsch made his seminary studies and was ordained in Luxemburg in 1884. In residence at the Campo Teutonico, Rome, from 1884 to 1890, he came under the influence of G. B. de ROSSI, J. HERGENRÖTHER, H. S. DENIFLE, F. X. KRAUS, and P. Bat-tifol; and in 1888 he became director of the Institut der Görresgesellschaft. Professor of patrology and Christian archeology at Fribourg from 1890 to 1932, he was named rector of Istituto Pontificio di Archeologia Cristiana at Rome by Pius XI in 1926, and a prothonotary apostolic in 1932.

Johann Peter Kirsch.

In his scholarly activity he specialized in methodical research and provided a deeper understanding of the Reformation through his Die Finanzverwaltung des Kardinalkollegiums im XIII. und XIV. Jahrhundert (Münster 1895) and Die päpstlichen Kollectorien in Deutschland während des XIV. Jahrhunderts (Paderborn 1894). He was editor of the fourth to sixth editions of Hergenröther's Handbuch der allgemeinen Kirchengeschichte, and he joined with Bigelmair, Greven, and Veit in publishing a new church history (4 v. Freiburg 1930-49). He was coeditor with A. Ehrhard of Forschungen zur christlichen Literatur-und Dogmengeschichte from 1900. He investigated early Christian places of worship, especially in their relation to the liturgy, published Die römischen Titelkirchen (Paderborn 1918), Der stadtrömische christliche Festkalender im Altertum (Münster 1924), Die Stationskirchen des Missale Romanum (Freiburg 1926), and contributed 249 articles to the Catholic Encyclopedia.

Bibliography: O. PERLER, Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 35 (1941) 1–3. J. SAUER, Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres–Gesellschaft 61 (1941) 467–474. G. BELVEDERI, Rivista di archeologia cristiana 18 (1941) 7–21. E. MOLITOR, Mgr. J. P. Kirsch (Luxembourg 1956). The Catholic Encyclopedia and its Makers (New York 1917) 92–93.

[E. MOLITOR]

KISMET

Arabic-Turkish term for fate, destiny. The original meaning of the Arabic word qismah, qismat, was distribution; later it came to mean lot, portion; in the third stage, which is a Turkish adaptation, it received the specific meaning of the lot that is destined for every man. The earliest use of the word in English was in 1849 by E. B. Eastwick in Dry Leaves, 46: "One day a man related to me a story of kismet or destiny." In Turkish the word kismet is usually an expression of a practical fatalism that accepts the blows of fate with resignation (see FATE AND FATALISM). Hence it is not to be confused with the word qadar, which is an expression of the theological doctrine concerning PREDESTINATION. The words charkh and falak in Persian and Turkish literature express almost the same sentiment: irrational and inevitable influence exercised by the spheres. It is interesting to notice that such a doctrine, which might seem to paralyze human endeavor, has had among the Muslims precisely the opposite effect. It has been the chief inspiration of the great courage that won for their religion its early triumphs and made it one of the great spiritual powers of the world.

Bibliography: Encyclopedia of Islam, ed. M. T. HOUTSMA et al. (Leiden 1913–38) 2:1041. For other meanings of the word in Turkish, see E. LITTMANN, Morgenländische Wörter im Deutschen (2d ed. Tübingen 1924), and E. MARGAURDSEN, Das Wesen des Osmanen (Munich 1916) 100. For the interpretation of qadar, see E. E. SALISBURY, ''Muhammadan Doctrine of Predestination and Free Will,'' The Journal of the American Oriental Society 8 (1864–66) 152.

[P. KUJOORY]

KISS OF PEACE

The kiss as an expression of fraternal love and peace derives from several New Testament epistles in which the faithful are urged to salute one another with the kiss of love, or holy kiss. (1 Pt 5:14, Rom 16:16, 1 Cor 16:20, 2 Cor 13:12). Many scholars believe that there is reference here to a liturgical rite. In the middle of the 2nd century it is clearly referred to by Justin Martyr as a liturgical act (I Ap 1:65).

The kiss of peace was used in many circumstances that called for a special expression of charity, such as the welcoming of the newly baptized into the Christian community and the reconciliation of penitents. But it has been most widely practiced in the celebration of the Eucharist. In the early centuries, it took place before the Canon and usually before the Offertory (see Ap. Trad. 4). While the kiss of peace has retained its ancient position in the Christian East until today, in the West it was transferred to the end of the Canon before 417 (Innocent I, Epist. Ad Decentium 1; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 20:553), apparently in order to associate it with the expression of fraternal peace in the LORD'S PRAYER. Later it became a part of the rite of communion as a sign of unity and bond of love.

The kiss of peace was extended to all the faithful up to the end of the Middle Ages (Innocent III, De sacro altaris Mysterio 6.5; Patrologia Latina 217:909). Originally it seemed to have been done with the mouth (Ap. Trad. 22). In the latter part of the Middle Ages we find the substitution of an embrace for the clergy and the circulation of an object to be kissed by the faithful, at first the paten or a liturgical book, such as the Missal or the Gospel Book, later a crucifix, a reliquary, or an object called the osculatorium or peace—board, which was often a piece of wood with a cross inscribed, but sometimes a highly decorated object of precious metal or ivory.

The liturgical reforms of Vatican II gave the kiss of peace a new lease on life. The 1969 General Instruction of the Roman Missal exhorted the people to express their love for one another and beg for peace and unity in the Church in the exchange of peace according to the "customs and mentality of the people" as determined by the local conference of bishops (General Instruction of the Roman Missal, n.56[b]). This could take the form of an embrace or handshake (as is the usual practice in North America), a bow (as is customary in many parts of the Far East) or even a kiss done with the mouth according to the ancient usage (in many parts of Europe and Latin America).

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGMANN, The Early Liturgy (South Bend, Ind. 1959). G. DIX, The Shape of the Liturgy (2nd ed. London 1945). G. W. WOOLFENDEN, "'Let Us Offer Each Other the Sign of Peace'—An Enquiry'' Worship, 67 (1993) 239–252. L. E. PHILLIPS, "The Kiss of Peace and the Opening Greeting of the Pre–anaphoral Dialogue," Studia Liturgica, 23 (1993) 177–186. R. CABIÉ, "Le rite de la paix," in Les Combats de la paix (Toulouse 1996) 47–71.

[B. I. MULLAHY/EDS.]

KITBAMRUNG, NICHOLAS BUNKERD, BL.

Baptized Benedictus, priest, martyr; b. c. Jan. 31, to Feb. 28, 1895, on a sampan in the Nakhon Chaisri district (mission of Bangkok), Thailand; d. Jan. 12, 1944, near Ban Han, Thailand. One of six children of converts to the faith, Joseph Poxang and Agnes Thiang Kitbamrung, Nicholas entered the minor seminary of Hang Xan at thirteen. He completed his studies at Penang (Malaysia) Seminary and was ordained in Assumption Cathedral, Bangkok, by Bishop René Perros (Jan. 24, 1926).

He began his pastoral work as assistant at Bang Nok Kheuk, Samut Songkhram province, where he also taught catechesis to Salesian seminarians and Thai to the priests establishing a mission in Thailand. He was transferred to Phitsanulok (1928), where he taught the language to his newly arrived pastor and learned a Chinese dialect (Hakka) himself. In 1930, he was sent as a missionary to North Vietnam and Chiang Mai (northern Thailand) to strengthen the faith of those who had left the Church due to privation. At the end of that mission, he was assigned to the Khorat District to engage in catechesis and reevangelization of lapsed Catholics. He began evangelizing virtually unexplored lands along the border of Laos in 1937.

He was arrested as a French spy (1941) during the war between France and Indochina and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. While incarcerated, Nicholas contracted tuberculosis, which was aggravated by maltreatment. Nevertheless, he continued to minister to his fellow inmates and baptized many of them before his death. When his illness became severe he was left in a hospital to die because he was a Catholic.

The decree of martyrdom in his cause was promulgated, Jan. 27, 2000. He was beatified by John Paul II on March 5, 2000. Patron of Thailand.

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. (March 8, 2000) 1, 2–3.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KITTEL, GERHARD

German Evangelical NT scholar, son of Rudolph KITTEL; b. Breslau, Sept. 23, 1888; d. Tübingen, July 11, 1948. He taught at Kiel (1913–17), Leipzig (1917–21), Greifswald (1921–26), Tübingen (1926–39), and Vienna (1939–43). He devoted himself principally to a study of the Jewish background of the NT, maintaining that the Jewish element of the primitive community prevailed over the Hellenistic. In 1931 he organized and became the first editor of the monumental Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament. Following the example of H. Cremer and G. Koegel and the suggestions of A. Schlatter, he insisted on tracing the semantics of every word; this entailed a study and combination of its secular usages in classical Greek and Koine with its religious significance in the Septuagint and its Hebrew background. His little book, Die Judenfrage (Stuttgart and Berlin 1933), numerous articles in anti-Semitic magazines, and collaboration with Eugen Fischer in Das antike Weltjudentum (1943) caused his imprisonment by the Allies after World War II and forced his retirement to the Benedictine Abbey of Beuron.

Bibliography: W. F. ALBRIGHT, "Gerhard Kittel and the Jewish Question in Antiquity," History, Archaeology and Christian Humanism (New York 1964) 229–240.

[L. A. BUSHINSKI]

KITTEL, RUDOLF

German Protestant OT scholar, best known by his critical edition of the Hebrew Bible; b. Eningen, Württemberg, March 28, 1853; d. Leipzig, Oct. 20, 1929. Kittel became professor of Old Testament studies in Breslau (1888) and in Leipzig (1898). As a theologian who believed in divine revelation, in his three-volume Geschichte des Volkes Israel (v.1, 6th ed. Gotha 1923; v.2, 7th ed. ibid. 1925; v.3, Stuttgart 1927-29) he rejected the natural-evolutionism of J. WELLHAUSEN and set forth the inner spiritual history of Israel while also showing its relationship to the history of other religions of the ancient Near East. He was the first to make extensive use of archeological discoveries in connection with the history of Israel, and he also employed these to good effect in his controversy with Friedrich Delitzsch over PANBABYLONI-ANISM. Independent historical and theological judgment is likewise characteristic of his Religion des Volkes Israel (Leipzig 1921, 2d ed. 1929) and his commentaries on several books of the Old Testament: Psalms, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and Isaiah. His indispensable Biblia Hebraica was prepared with the assistance of several fellow specialists (Leipzig 1905-06; 3d ed., P. Kahle, ed., ibid. 1929–37).

Bibliography: J. HEMPEL, Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft 84 (1930) 78–93. E. KUTSCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:1626–27. O. KAISER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:310–311.

[V. HAMP]

KJELD, ST.

Danish noble, whose cult is confined to Denmark; b. Venning, near Randers, Denmark, c. 1105; d. Viborg, Sept. 27, 1150. After a pious youth Kjeld (Ketillus or Ex-uperius) became a canon regular at the Cathedral of Our Lady in Viborg, at the urging of Bishop Eskil of Viborg (d. 1132). On completing his studies he became provost of the cathedral, but lost this office because his generosity was considered excessive. Following a trip to Rome (1148–49) he was reinstated by EUGENE III. Kjeld had preached the expedition of 1147 against the Wends and was planning to devote himself to the Slavic missions when he died. The Danish bishops, especially Archbishop ABSALON OF LUND, sought but failed to obtain his canonization from CLEMENT III. The pope, however, allowed the archbishop to establish Kjeld's cult in his own see on July 11, 1189. Kjeld was venerated especially in Jutland, and was the patron of a guild at Viborg and of a chapel in Viborg's cathedral. His reliquary was burned in 1726.

Feast: July 11.

Bibliography: Vitae sanctorum danorum, ed. M. C. GERTZ (new ed. Copenhagen 1908–12) 251–283. T. GAD in Kulturhistorisk leksikon for nordisk middelalder, ed. J. DANSTRUP (Copenhagen 1956–) 8:435–437. A. OTTO, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:311–312.

[L. MUSSET]

KLESL, MELCHIOR

Austrian cardinal and statesman; b. Vienna, Feb. 19, 1552; d. Wiener-Neustadt, Sept. 18, 1630. Son of a Protestant banker, Klesl (Khlesl, Klesel) was 16 when, together with his family, he was converted to Catholicism by the Jesuit G. Scherer, one of the best known preachers of his time. He studied philosophy at the University of Vienna. In 1579 he received his doctorate, was ordained, and appointed provost of St. Stephen and chancellor of the University of Vienna. As such he became instrumental in carrying out the previous ordinance of Ferdinand I, when it was renewed by Emperor Rudolph II in 1581; this forbade Protestants either to teach or to take academic degrees in the University of Vienna. The following year Klesl was appointed councilor of the bishop of Passau for lower Austria. Thus began his lifetime work of bringing Catholicism back to Austria. In 1588 he was appointed administrator of the Diocese of Wiener-Neustadt, and in 1590 he was made the chairman of the Reformation Commission for all the towns and cities other than Vienna. He brought back to the Church, at least outwardly, a number of Austrian towns, among them Neustadt. The chief obstacle to his work was the lack of wellqualified priests. In 1598 he was made bishop of Vienna and in 1615 a cardinal. Chancellor to the Archduke Matthias (1599), he became in 1611 head of his privy council. When Matthias became emperor (1612), Klesl conducted most of the imperial business. At the beginning of the disorders in Bohemia, Klesl at first counseled against the concessions to the Protestants. It was upon his advice that Matthias, in a letter of March 21, 1618, rejected their complaints as unjustified, forbade their intended meetings, and threatened the originators with legal proceedings. Later, however, Klesl reversed himself and tried to reconcile the contending religious parties. In order to remove the chief obstacle to the war policy, the Archduke Ferdinand, who suspected Klesl of being opposed to his candidacy for the imperial throne, and the Archduke Maximilian of Tyrol, probably supported by the Spanish ambassador Oñate, had the cardinal arrested (July 20, 1618) and conveyed to Amras castle near Innsbruck. A few days later he was brought to the castle of Innsbruck, and from there to the monastery Georgenberg near Schwaz. Through the intercession of the pope he received permission to go to Rome (1622). He returned to Vienna in 1627.

Bibliography: J. VON HAMMER-PURGSTALL, Khlesls . . . Leben . . . , 4 v. (Vienna 1847–51). B. CHUDOBA, Spain and the Empire, 1519–1643 (Chicago 1952). K. H. OELRICH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6: 339–340, bibliog. M. RITTER, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) 16:167–178. G. MECENSEFFY Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:1664.

[J. FELICIJAN]

KLEUTGEN, JOSEPH

Philosopher and theologian; b. Dortmund, April 9, 1811; d. Kaltern (Tyrol), Jan. 13, 1883. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1834, taking the name Peters to avoid conflict with the Prussian government. From 1837 until 1843 he taught ethics at the University of Freiburg. Many consider Kleutgen responsible for the restoration of the use of the scholastic method in German Catholic philosophical and theological circles. His Die Theologie der Vorzeit (3 v. Münster 1853–60) and Die Philosophie der Vorzeit (2 v. Münster 1860–63) are representative works. While inveighing against the errors of G. HERMES, A. GÜNTHER, and J. FROHSCHAMMER, and repudiating the philosophies of I. KANT, G. W. F. HEGEL, and F. SCHEL-LING, these studies set forth Catholic principles of philosophy and theology in the traditional scholastic form, especially as interpreted and employed by F. SUÄREZ. During VATICAN COUNCIL I Kleutgen served as theologian for the bishop of Paderborn and took part in the formulation of the dogmatic constitution De fide catholica. In 1878 Leo XIII named him prefect of studies and professor of dogmatic theology at the Gregorian University in Rome. It is said that Kleutgen was instrumental in the composition of the first draft of the famous encyclical on the doctrine of St. Thomas, AETERNI PATRIS, issued by Leo XIII in 1879. He was able to complete only the first of his projected eight-volume work entitled Institutiones theologicae, namely, De ipso Deo (Regensburg 1881).

[C. R. MEYER]

KLOSTERNEUBURG, MONASTERY OF

A monastery of Augustinian canons on the Danube, Archdiocese of Vienna, Austria. Established c. 1100 with secular canons, it was transferred to Augustinians in 1133. Margrave St. LEOPOLD III (c. 1075–1136) and Abp. Conrad II of Salzburg endowed the monastery richly and in 1114 began the building of its monumental church. The monastery, always one of the most important spiritual and artistic centers in Austria, defended papal interests in the Middle Ages, and in 1359 its provost received the right to wear pontificals. As a rich monastery it had political prominence, and as the burial place of Leopold it was the religious center of the country. Theological disciplines were cultivated from the beginning, and in the 15th century cartography and astronomy were studied. After declining during the Reformation, it was brought back to Catholicism under the strong direction of the emperors and in a 16th-century renaissance it reestablished the Bohemian monasteries of Třebon and Borovany. In 1730 Charles VI began a gigantic, still unfinished monasteryresidence modeled after the ESCORIAL. During World War II under the Nazis, the monastery was suppressed.

The provosts of the monastery include OTTO (1126-32), later bishop of Freising; Bl. HARTMANN (1133–40), later bishop of Brixen; and Cardinal Friedrich PIFFL (1907–13), later archbishop of Vienna. Pius PAR-SCH (1884-1954), institutor of the popular liturgical movement, and Romanus Scholz (1912-44), an Austrian resistance hero, were canons of Klosterneuburg. The interior of the Romanesque church (1114-36) with Gothic towers was rebuilt in 17th-century baroque. St. Leopold's chapel, originally the chapterhouse, includes the famous enamel altar by Nicholas of Verdun (1181), a great bronze chandelier (1120-30), and beautiful glass paintings of the 14th and 15th centuries. A Gothic cloister (13th-14th century) and a baroque emperor's "palace" with a marble hall (1730–40) are noteworthy. The library of 160,000 volumes and 1,256 MSS, the archives, the famous treasure containing the Austrian archducal crown (1616), and a gallery with many Gothic paintings are of great value. The 95 members of 1914 were reduced to 65 in 1964. The monastery serves 26 parishes with 135,000 souls. It has a theological academy founded in 1768, a school for boys and a choir school, and editorial and publishing facilities. It engages in farming, forestry, and the cultivation of vineyards. Pilgrims come to the shrine of St. Leopold for his feast (November 15). The monastery has published the bimonthly Bibel und Liturgie since 1926.

Bibliography: Jahrbuch des Stiftes Klosterneuburg, 9 v. (1908–20; NS 1961–). Klosterneuburger Kunstschätze (1961–). B. ČERNIK, Das Augustiner-Chorherrenstift Klosterneuburg (Vienna 1958). F. RÖHRIG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:349–350. H. FILLITZ, ed., Beiträge zur Kunstgeschichte und Archäologie des Frühmittelalters (Graz 1962).

[F. H. RÖHRIG]

KLUPFEL, ENGELBERT

Theologian; b. Wipfeld near Würzburg, Jan. 18, 1733; d. Freiburg im Breisgau, July 8, 1811. He was baptized Andrew, but took the name Engelbert when he entered the Augustinian Order in 1751. After philosophical studies (1751–58) at Fribourg (Switzerland), Erfurt, Freiburg, and Constance, he taught philosophy and theology (1763-67) in the order's houses at Oberndorf (Neckar), Mainz, and Constance. In 1767 he was named professor of theology at the University of Freiburg im Breisgau and remained there until 1805. In his De statu naturae purae (Freiburg 1768) and De eximiis dotibus humanae naturae ante peccatum (Freiburg 1769), he embraced the teaching on grace of the young Augustinian school begun by H. NORIS. Despite his being influenced by the spirit of his times in the denial of papal infallibility, his two-volume work Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae (Vienna 1789) is free of rationalistic errors; it was prescribed as the official theological manual for Austria. His purely positive theological method, in reaction to scholasticism, developed valuable insights for the history of dogma. Also noteworthy are his Christus Dominus sacerdos (Freiburg 1772) and Nova bibliotheca ecclesiastica Friburgensis (7 v. Freiburg 1775-90); in the latter he attacks the rationalism of J. S. Semler.

Bibliography: W. RAUCH, Engelbert Klüpfel, ein führender Theologe der Aufklärungszeit (Freiburg 1922). H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–1913); v.1 (4th ed. 1926) 5.1:651–654. F. LANG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:355.

[A. ZUMKELLER]

KNIGHT, WILLIAM, BL.

Lay martyr; b. c. 1572 at South Duffield, Hemingbrough, Yorkshire, England; d. Nov. 29, 1596, hanged, drawn, and quartered at York. On coming of age he claimed from his Protestant uncle property left to him by his father, Leonard Knight. When his uncle denounced him to the authorities for being a Catholic, he was immediately arrested. In October 1593, Knight was remanded to York Castle, where BB. William GIBSON and George ERRINGTON were already confined. A certain Protestant clergyman, also a prisoner, arranged to gain his freedom by feigning a desire to become a Catholic. He won the confidence of Knight and his two companions, who explained the faith to him. With the connivance of the authorities, he was directed to Bl. Henry ABBOT, then at liberty, who endeavored to find a priest to reconcile him to the Church. Thereupon Abbot was arrested and, together with Knight and his two comrades, sentenced to death for persuading the clergyman to embrace Catholicism—an act of treason under the penal laws. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KNIGHTS OF ALCÁNTARA

One of three chief military orders in Spain, established in the 12th century to fight the Moors. The order was known initially as that of San Julián del Pereiro. The first evidence of its existence is a charter from King Fernando II of León (Jan. 1176), addressed to the community settled at Pereiro on the borders of León and Portugal. In December of the same year Pope ALEXANDER III gave his approval to the community. The settlement at Pereiro may date from 1167 as suggested by INNOCENT III's bull of 1207 referring to the possessions that the order had held for 40 years or more. LUCIUS III's bull of 1183 indicates that the knights followed a mitigated BENEDICTINE RULE as a dependency of Cîteaux. Sometime before 1187 they were affiliated to the Order of Calatrava. About the same time they transferred their chief seat to Trujillo in the Kingdom of Castile where it remained until the Moors captured Trujillo in 1195. In 1218 the Order of Calatrava ceded the fortress of Alcántara (on the Tagus River near the Portuguese frontier) to the Knights of San Julián. Henceforth they were known as the Order of Alcántara. The master of Calatrava retained the right to visit Alcántara "according to the Order of Cîteaux." The organization and customs of Alcántara were similar to those of the Order of Calatrava. The Knights of Alcántara played an active role in the reconquest of Extremadura and Andalusia, but in the later medieval centuries, from 1318 onward, their energies were diverted increasingly by internal dissension and by involvement in domestic politics. This prompted King Ferdinand V and Queen Isabella, who had seen the loyalty of the master vacillate from Spain to Portugal and back, to assume administration of the order in 1494 with papal permission. Pope ADRIAN VI in 1523 annexed the mastership of the crown in perpetuity. Since 1546 the knights have been permitted to marry. Although Charles V and other rulers underwent the year of probation and became professed members in the order, the original spirit was gradually lost. The order survives today as an honorary society of noblemen.

Bibliography: A. DE TORRES Y TAPIA, Cronica de la Orden de Alcántara, 2 v. (Madrid 1763). J. F. O'CALLAGHAN, "The Foundation of the Order of Alcántara, 1176–1218," Catholic Historical Review 47 (1961–62) 471–486. Bullarium ordinis militiae de Alcántara (Madrid 1759). A. FOREY, The Military Orders from the Twelfth to the Early Fourteenth Centuries (Toronto 1992).

[J. F. O'CALLAGHAN]

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS

A fraternal benefit society of Catholic men chartered by the state of Connecticut in 1882. For over its 115 years the Order has responded to the myriad needs of the local churches in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. This article traces the origins of Columbianism as a force in the Church and society with particular focus on its character as a Catholic antidefamation society.

History. Michael J. McGivney was the New Haven priest who founded the Knights of Columbus in 1882. He was an unassuming pious priest who easily elicited the trust of the laity. Concerned with the strong appeal of the prohibited secret societies among Catholic youth and with the plight of the widows and children suffering the loss of the breadwinner, he was eager to form a fraternal insurance society imbued with deep loyalties to Catholicism and to the American experience.

In October of 1881 McGivney and a small group of laymen decided to establish an independent society rather than become a branch of one of two existing Catholic benefit societies. In early February 1882 they placed their order under the patronage of Christopher Columbus. According to the few surviving documents, the Columbian motif represented the group's Catholic consciousness. Columbus was the symbol. By portraying the navigator's landing at San Salvador as the Catholic baptism of the nation, the Knights were asserting religious legitimacy. Just as the heirs of the Pilgrims invoked the Mayflower as the Protestant symbol of their identity as early Americans, so the Knights invoked the Santa Maria as the symbol of their self-understanding as Catholic citizens. On March 29, 1882 the Order was incorporated in the State of Connecticut. One of the charter members invoked the cause of Catholic civil liberty when he asserted that the order's patron signified that, as Catholic descendants of Columbus "[we] were entitled to all rights and privileges due to such a discovery by one of our faith."

Knights of Columbus headquarters, New Haven, Connecticut. (©G.E. Kidder Smith/CORBIS)

For the first ten years insurance was a mandatory feature of membership in the order. In 1892 non-insurance or associate membership was established, which meant that candidates for knighthood could be drawn to the order unfettered by economic ties. When the order expanded into Massachusetts in 1892, Columbianism became more explicit. The quadricentennial of Columbus's landfall, the rise of another wave of anti-Catholicism in the form of the American Protective Association and the expansionist policies of the leadership fostered the development of Columbianism. The general spirit of patriotism, culminating in the Spanish American War, also animated the order's character. From New England the order expanded throughout the nation. By 1905 the Knights were in every state in the Union, five provinces of Canada, Mexico, the Philippines, and were poised to enter Cuba and Puerto Rico. The causation for this enormously successful period of expansion is primarily due to the way in which the Knights conveyed through their ceremonials their strong sense of American Catholic identity. In a sense, the ceremonials provided the candidates for knighthood with a rite of passage from old world ties to loyalty to the new republic. Basic to their ethos was the prevailing notion of manliness, that gender construction manifested in fraternal sentiments and muscular Christianity.

The Knights extolled Catholic unity and struggled against the divisive character of ethnic particularism. Though the leaders were all second-generation Irish-Americans, they were realists on the ethnic issue. Hence, they allowed the establishment of the Teutonic Council for German-American Knights and of the Italian-American Ansonia Council, both of which were instituted in Boston during the 1890s.

Activities. In accord with the order's antidefamation character, it instituted in 1914 the Knights of Columbus Commission on Religious Prejudices. The latter was mandated 'to study the causes, investigate conditions and suggest remedies for the religious prejudice that has been manifest through the press and rostrum.' Under the chairmanship of Patrick Henry Callahan, then K. of C. state deputy of Kentucky and a wealthy industrialist known for his capital-labor profit-sharing plan, the commission followed its mandate to the letter. As an antidote to prejudices Callahan especially promoted the papal encyclical of 1891, Rerum Novarum.

Columbian lay activism manifested itself in a new field of work in 1916 when U.S. troops were stationed along the Mexican border. After learning of the needs for recreational and religious centers, the order established sixteen buildings from the Gulf of Mexico to the Gulf of California for the social needs of all soldiers and for the religious needs of Catholics.

As a result of this experience, the Knights offered such services to the U.S. government when it entered World War I in April 1917. American and Canadian K. of C. "Huts" with signs saying, "Everyone Welcome, Everything Free," were established in the training camps and eventually in Europe and Asia, even to the remote area of Siberia. The order raised one million dollars during the first year. As a result of a joint drive with the Y.M.C.A., the Jewish Welfare Board, the Salvation Army, and others, the order received over thirty million dollars for its War Camp Fund.

After the war, the Knights established employment bureaus throughout the country to find jobs for veterans.

They also provided college scholarships for returning servicemen and set up evening schools for veterans and all others interested in academic and vocational advancement. In January 1924 there were sixty-nine evening schools with an enrollment of more than 30,000 students. The Knights received numerous commendations for war and reconstruction work, but the greatest tribute was demonstrated by the more than 450,000 men who joined the order between 1917 and 1923.

During the 1920s Columbianism expressed itself in a variety of new programs. In response to those historians who stressed an economic interpretation of American history, who disregarded the idealism of the revolutionary period, and who ignored the contributions of the various non-Anglo-Saxon immigrant groups, the order established the K. of C. Historical Commission. The commission was charged with the responsibility "to investigate the facts of history, to correct historical errors and omissions, to amplify and preserve our national history to exalt and perpetuate American ideals and to combat anti-American propaganda by means of pamphlets . . . and by other proper means and methods as shall be approved by the Supreme Assembly." Under the direction of Edward McSweeney, a former trade unionist and immigration officer on Ellis Island, the commission awarded prizes for the best historical monographs. Works of such scholars who later earned national reputations, as Samuel Flagg Bemis and Allan Nevins, were published by Macmillan in the Knights of Columbus Historical Series.

In the autumn of 1922, McSweeney designed a unique set of historical studies entitled, "The Knights of Columbus Racial Contribution Series." Three monographs were published in this ambitious series: The Gift of Black Folk by W. E. B. DuBois; The Jews in the Making of America by George Cohen; and The Germans in the Making of America by Frederick Franklin Schrader. In his introduction to each of these books, McSweeney summarized the history of immigration to America, the waves of nativism, anti-Catholicism, anti-Semitism, and the persistence of racial prejudice in the life of the nation.

In 1921 Pope Benedict XV called upon Columbianism's Catholic anti-defamation character to respond to religious prejudice in Rome. The pope elaborated on how anti-Catholic propaganda was a strong factor in the Protestant evangelization of Rome and the degree to which it threatened to break down Roman youth's loyalties to the Church.

Within a year after this historic audience, the order had appointed a commission for the order's Roman project, had established a one-million-dollar Italian Welfare Fund through a per capita tax on the membership, had received permission to construct recreation centers from Benedict's successor, Pope Pius XI, and had contracted the services of a Roman engineer and architect, Enrico Galeazzi. Between 1924 and 1927 the order opened five recreation centers, the most significant of which was St. Peter's Oratory, adjacent to Vatican City. In the 1930s this program was absorbed into the Catholic Action movement.

During the Great Depression the Knights revived their antisocialism, a crusade that included a social justice component. At the Supreme Council meeting in August 1937, held in San Antonio, the crusade was unanimously endorsed by the delegates. Supreme Knight Martin Carmody reported that the Daily Worker, the official voice of the American Communist Party, had frequently vented "its wrath against the Knights of Columbus." Shortly after the convention, the Supreme Board of Directors approved Carmody's proposal to hire an anti-Communist lecturer, George Hermann Derry, who had been a member of the K. of C.'s Historical Commission and who had recently resigned as president of Marygrove College in Detroit. Derry's lecture program, which was subject to the prior approval of the hierarchy, included a general public address sponsored by local Knights and an address to the clergy of the diocese on anti-Communist leadership.

The administration of Luke E. Hart (1953-64), John K. McDevitt (1964–1977), and Virgil C. Dechant, are identified with the modernization of the order within the context of its traditional loyalty to Church and country. Hart laid the basis for the modern insurance program that was later greatly refined by Virgil Dechant. Hart's conservatism on racial and labor issues alienated many members of the order and the hierarchy. McDevitt led a movement to reform the policy governing admissions to local councils, thereby engendering racial integration. By this policy and by cosponsoring a Human Rights Congress at Yale and fostering other programs related to social justice, McDevitt restored the confidence of the hierarchy in the order's direction. In general, John Mc-Devitt's administration represents a synthesis of modern fraternalism and traditional faith.

Virgil C. Dechant's administration reflects his command of the insurance programs, his policy to modernize the structures of the international headquarters in New Haven, his commitment to infuse a strong social service component into the order's fraternalism, his positive response to the needs of the American Church mediated by the bishop, and his deep loyalty to the Vatican represented by the order's contributions to the pope's charities, and the Vatican's needs for architectural restoration and artistic beatification.

Under Dechant's leadership the order has experienced considerable growth. In 2001 there were 1.7 million Knights located in more than 13,000 councils. With twenty-five billion dollars of insurance in force and with the widespread programs of the order, entailing contributions of nearly $92.2 million by Supreme, state, and local councils in 1989, and almost twenty-three million manhours given to community service during that year, the Knights of Columbus still experience the vitality of their original mission to respond to the needs of the Church and to witness to the unique character of the Catholic experience in America.

Upon the retirement of Virgil Dechant at the age of 70 in October 2000, Carl Anderson, the Supreme Secretary, was elected Supreme Knight by the Supreme Board of Directors. Formerly the Dean of the John Paul II Institute for Marriage and Family, Anderson brings a theological dimension to his leadership. His columns in Columbia include a religious message in a popular idiom. Since a year later the amount of insurance in force reached the record level of $42 billion, Anderson reveals a command of that vital aspect of the Order.

Bibliography: The papers of the order are located in the Archives of the Knights of Columbus in New Haven, Connecticut. C. J. KAUFFMAN, Faith and Fraternalism The History of the Knights of Columbus, rev. ed (New York 1992); Columbianism and the Knights of Columbus (New York 1992).

[C. J. KAUFFMAN]

KNIGHTS OF DOBRIN

One of the twelve religious MILITARY ORDERS of knighthood that came into being between 1100 and 1300 and one of the three of German origin. It was founded by Duke Conrad of Masovia and Bp. CHRISTIAN OF PRUSSIA, who patterned the new brotherhood after the Order of the KNIGHTS OF THE SWORD of Livonia. In August 1228 a certain Bruno, together with 14 knights, were invested into the new order. These "new" Knights of Dobrin may actually have been former members of the Order of the Brothers of the Sword. Duke Conrad endowed them with Dobrin castle in Prussia on the Drweca River, hence the name, Knights of Dobrin. The knights were most likely Germans. Their habit consisted of a white mantle with a red cross. The new order, however, had little opportunity to develop. The Prussians were greatly annoyed by the news of its foundation and attacked Dobrin castle in strength and surrounded it so closely that none of its inhabitants dared to venture far beyond its ramparts. When Duke Conrad was forced to cede Prussia to the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, the Order of Dobrin lost its reason for existence and applied to the Holy See for permission to merge with the Teutonic Order. On April 19, 1235, permission was granted. A group of knights, however, refused to accept the merger, and ten of them were still living under the protection of Duke Conrad c. 1240. After this date the Order of Dobrin disappeared completely from history, and its possessions, following a short litigation, became the property of the Teutonic Knights.

Bibliography: T. HIRSCH et al., eds., Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 5 v. (Leipzig 1861–74), v.1, main source. M. TUMLER, Der Deutsche Orden im Werden, Wachsen und Wirken bis 1400 (Vienna 1955; 2d ed. 1965). A. FOREY, The Military Orders from the Twelfth to the Early Fourteenth Centuries (Toronto 1992).

[G. GROSSCHMID]

KNIGHTS OF LABOR

A U.S. labor organization founded in 1869 at Philadelphia, Pa., by Uriah S. Stephens (1821-82); it was the most successful effort of its kind up to that time and exercised maximum influence from 1877 to 1887. In 1871 Stephens, an abolitionist who had studied for the Baptist ministry before becoming a tailor and labor leader, adopted the name Noble and Holy Order of the Knights of Labor for his secret organization. Ten years later the order dropped "Noble and Holy" from its official title, eliminated its oath of secrecy, and revised its ritual. Combining advanced social theories with practical objectives, the Knights advocated laws for improved safety regulation, mechanics' liens, the eight-hour workday, public ownership of utilities, and the regulation of child labor. Convict leasing was opposed. Although arbitration, instead of strikes, was advanced strongly, a strike fund was soon started. Women were encouraged to organize, and equal pay for both sexes for equal work was advocated. The order's stated objective was the organization of every department of productive industry; it became an advocate of industrial union, in contrast with its earlier emphasis on craft unions. The Knights were committed also to a system of producer cooperatives, an activity that proved unprofitable and contributed to the eventual decline of the organization. After Terence Vincent Powderly succeeded Stephens as grand master workman of the order (1879), membership increased to 700,000 (1886), and the Knights emerged successful in a number of strikes, including that against the Missouri Pacific railroad. However, the Chicago Haymarket Square riot in May 1886 was used widely to discredit the Knights, although they took no part in it.

The attitude of Catholic clergy was an important factor in the rising and waning fortunes of the organization. Many parish priests, fearing possible socialistic or violent influences, often opposed such unions. The Knights were condemned by the hierarchy of Canada on the grounds of secrecy, but Cardinal James Gibbons of Baltimore, Md., was convinced of the merits of labor organizations and obtained assurance against condemnation from Rome. In 1891 Leo XIII's encyclical RERUM NOVARUM strongly supported the cardinal's position. When Powderly retired (1893), the Knights' difficulties with the Church had ceased; but other labor unions, more in touch with the changing times, were coming to the fore. In 1917 the Knights of Labor officially disbanded.

Bibliography: H. J. BROWNE, Catholic University of America, Studies in American Church History: The Catholic Church and the Knights of Labor 38 (Washington 1949). N. J. WARE, The Labor Movement in the United States, 1860–1895 (New York 1929). J. R. COMMONS et al., eds., A Documentary History of American Industrial Society, 10 v. (Cleveland 1909). J. T. ELLIS, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1952).

[J. W. COLEMAN]

KNIGHTS OF MALTA

The Sovereign Military Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, of Rhodes, and of Malta, commonly called the Knights of Malta or Knights Hospitaller, a religious and knightly order dating from the 11th century.

History of the Order. Whatever its possible antecedents, the order began in Jerusalem in a hospiceinfirmary for pilgrims founded by Blessed Gerard (d. 1120) before the First CRUSADE. Together with the adjoining church, the hospice was dedicated to St. John the Baptist and served by a religious confraternity following a variant of the rule of St. AUGUSTINE. Gerard was its first rector. After the formation of the kingdom of JERUSALEM this confraternity received approbation in a bull of PAS-CHAL II, February 15, 1113 (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum 6341), which also ensured to the new order the protection of the Holy See and the right of freely electing Gerard's successors without interference from any other authority, ecclesiastical or lay. Succeeding popes confirmed and enlarged these privileges. Gerard's successors were styled masters and then grand masters of the hospital. Under its second head, Raymond de Podio (du Puy), the order acquired its military-chivalric character because of the need to defend pilgrims and the Christian kingdom against Muslim attacks.

The growing prestige of the order brought it great donations, especially the TEMPLAR properties granted to it by the Holy See in 1312. Throughout its extensive possessions, East and West, it spread a network of domus hospitales for the service and defense of pilgrims. These were grouped into bailiwicks, priories, and grand priories. The failure of the Crusades forced the order to abandon the Holy Land; in 1310 it acquired the island of RHODES, becoming a territorial state and a naval power patrolling the eastern Mediterranean against the Muslim assault. In the 14th and 15th centuries the order was divided into national units called Tongues (Langues). The advance of Islam, now led by the OTTOMAN TURKS, could not be arrested. After four unsuccessful Turkish attacks, the Sultan Süleyman I the Magnificent conquered Rhodes in 1522 and forced the Knights to retreat to the West. In 1530 the Emperor CHARLES V ceded to them the sovereign possession of the islands of Malta, Gozo, and Camino, as well as Tripoli in North Africa. Malta's strategic position between the Christian and the Moslem world enabled the order to block Islam's advance toward the heart of Christendom. This island was subjected to violent Ottoman attacks especially in 1551, 1565 (the Great Siege), and 1644. Galleys of the order took part in the Battle of LEPANTO (1571), which broke the Ottoman tide. On Malta the order reached the height of its power. Grandiose fortifications made the island impregnable. The order's navy became one of the most powerful in the Mediterranean and waged incessant war on the Ottomans and the Barbary pirates.

Coat of arms embellishing one of the tombs of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, St. John's Cathedral, Valletta, Malta. (@Adam Woolfitt/CORBIS)

The REFORMATION deprived the order of its English and of many of its German possessions, and during the 17th and 18th centuries the Knights experienced a period of decline. Growing nationalism in the West clashed with the order's supranational character, and finally the FRENCH REVOLUTION, hostile both to the Church and to the Knights Hospitaller, despoiled the order in France and advanced irresistibly toward its Mediterranean holdings. Greek Orthodox Russia, however, motivated by the Russian Emperor Paul I's personal admiration for the Knights, his abhorrence of the Revolution, and Russia's very practical perennial drive toward the Mediterranean, appeared ready to oppose France. The rapprochement that resulted was sealed in the Convention of Jan. 15, 1797, between the Grand Master de Rohan and Paul I, establishing a new grand priory of the order in Russia. This foundation was formed in part from the Polish grand priory, which, in the partitions of Poland, had fallen under Russian control. In November 1797, under the new Grand Master Ferdinand von Hompesch, Paul I was proclaimed protector of the order. The French reply was the seizure of Malta. On his way to Egypt, NAPOLEON I moved on the island in violation of the order's internationally guaranteed neutrality, and on June 12, 1798, the island fell to the French. Hompesch and the convent removed to Trieste under Austria's protection. Russia's reply to this seizure of Malta was to produce a claim to it. On September 6, 1798, profiting by the indignation aroused by the surrender of Malta, the Russian grand priory proclaimed Hompesch deposed; on September 21, Paul assumed the "supreme direction" of the order; on November 7 the Russian grand priory proclaimed him grand master and on November 24 he accepted that dignity and the sovereignty over Malta implied by it. On January 8, 1799, he announced the formation (December 10, 1798) of another "Grand Priory of Russia" for non-Catholics.

Despite Paul's pressure the Holy See refused to recognize him as grand master. Recognition came from many of the knights and from European governments, however, and on July 6, 1799, the Court of Vienna forced Hompesch to abdicate. Thus de facto, if not de jure, Paul I was the head of the order. By September 1800 the British had taken Malta from the French; Paul I was murdered (March 23, 1801), and his son and successor Alexander I assumed protection of the order. Laying no claims to the grand mastership, he called for a canonical election of a new grand master. With the approval of PIUS VII the Bailiff John Baptist Tommasi became grand master on February 9, 1803, and was recognized by the allied powers and by Russia. In 1803 Alexander I tacitly abandoned the protectorship of the order; in 1810 the order's properties were confiscated by the crown; and in 1817 a decision of the Russian cabinet, sanctioned by the Emperor, declared that the order no longer existed in Russia. The Grand Master Tommasi had died in 1805, and an interregnum followed, during which the order was ruled by lieutenants. In 1834 the convent was finally moved to Rome. LEO XIII restored the grand mastership in the person of the Lieutenant Ceschi a Santa Croce (1879–1905), who was succeeded by the Grand Masters Thun-Hohenstein (1905–31) and Chigi della Rovere Albani (1931–51). The position of the order vis-à-vis the Holy See was defined anew, January 24, 1953, by a commission of cardinals appointed by PIUS XII. John XXIII (June 24, 1961) approved the new Constitutional Charter of the order.

The Knights of Malta have also had a second order, the Hospitaller Sisters of St. John of Jerusalem, still existing in Spain and Malta, but no longer under the grand master's jurisdiction.

Status. The order is a religious community of lay men and women, and chaplains, whose aims are the sanctification of its members, service of the faith and of the Holy See, and welfare work. It is also the oldest order of chivalry in existence, composed of both religious and lay knights and of other associates, and is internationally recognized as sovereign. In its latter capacity it deals with the Papal Secretariate of State and maintains diplomatic relations with the Holy See and a number of states in both hemispheres. The sovereign aspect of the order enables it to carry on its religious and charitable activities freely on a worldwide scale. Like chivalry itself, the order has been traditionally an institution of the nobility, but in modern times, its membership includes Catholics on the basis of merit as well as birth.

Classes of Members. Its members are divided into three classes: (1) the knights of justice and professed chaplains, forming the religious and directive core, and bound by religious vows, both simple and solemn; (2) the knights of obedience and donates of justice, who promise to strive toward Christian perfection in their lives; the "donates" are not knights, but persons who have served the order; (3) the lay members and secular chaplains, subdivided into knights and dames of honor and devotion, honorary conventual chaplains, knights and dames of grace and devotion, magistral chaplains, knights and dames of magistral grace, and donates of devotion. Several grades require proof of nobility in addition to other qualifications; others require merit alone. Within them, the higher ranks of grand cross or bailiff may be acquired. Cardinals are traditionally invested with the insignia of bailiffs grand cross of honor and devotion.

Territorially the order is now divided into five grand priories (Rome, Lombardy-Venetia, Naples-Sicily, Bohemia, Austria) and 26 national associations including two of master knights, i.e., knights of magistral grace. In the U.S. Members not belonging to either priories or associations are in gremio religionis, depending directly on the grand master in Rome. The supreme head of the order is the grand master, elected for life from among the solemnly professed knights of justice, with papal approval. In his absence the order is ruled by a lieutenant. The grand master has the title of prince and is equal in rank to a cardinal. He is styled most eminent highness and is internationally recognized as a chief of state. He governs the order with the assistance of the sovereign council; the supreme assembly is the general chapter convoked at regular intervals. For the elections of grand master or lieutenant the complete council of state is convoked. The pope is represented in the order by a cardinal patronus. The order's headquarters and the grand master's residence (the convent) are at the Malta Palace in Rome.

Activities. The order's principal charitable activities fall into the following categories: (1) Hospital work: the order maintains a great number of hospitals, clinics, medical and research centers, and dispensaries in various parts of the world.(2) Care for the wounded in war and peace: it operates first-aid centers and maintains a number of ambulance corps, equipped with hospital facilities, trains, and transport planes. (3) Relief work for refugees and the needy.

The spiritual character of the order is founded on the mixture of its religious and chivalric ideals. Its service of Christ and of the unfortunate, its honor, courtesy, and noblesse oblige have lost none of their worth with the passage of time. The blending of these two aspects in the military-monastic orders of the Crusades helped to spiritualize military valor on the model of its ideal, the soldier of Christ.

Bibliography: F. DE HELLWALD, Bibliographie méthodique de l'ordre souv. de St. Jean de Jérusalem (Rome 1885). E. ROSSI, Aggiunta alla bibliographie méthodique de l'ordre souv. de St. Jean de Jérusalem de F. de Hellwald (Rome 1924). G. BOTTARELLI and M. MONTERISI, Storia politica e militare del sovrano ordine di S. Giovanni di Gerusalemme, detto di Malta, 2 v. (Milan 1940). J. M. DELAVILLE LE ROULX, Cartulaire général de l'ordre des Hospitaliers de St. Jean de Jérusalem, 4 v. (Paris 1894-1906). T. MICHEL DE PIERREDON, Histoire politique de l'ordre souverain de St. Jean de Jérusalem (ordre de Malta) 1789-1955, 2 v. (2d ed. Paris 1956-63). E. E. HUME, Medical Work of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem (Baltimore 1940). J. H. VAN DER VELDT, The Ecclesiastical Orders of Knighthood (Washington 1956).J. A. BRUNDAGE, "A Twelfth-Century Oxford Disputation concerning the Privileges of the Knights Hospitallers," Mediaeval Studies 24 (Toronto-London 1962) 153-160. Constitutional Charter of the Sovereign Military Hospitaller Order of St. John of Jerusalem of Rhodes and of Malta (Rome 1961). Order of Malta, Livre blanc (Rome 1962). H. J. A. SIRE, The Knights of Malta (New Haven 1994). R. MCHUGH, The Knights of Malta: 900 Years of Care (Dublin, Ireland: 1996).

[O. P. SHERBOWITZ-WETZOR/C. TOUMANOFF/EDS.]

KNIGHTS OF MONTESA

A military order established June 10, 1317, by Pope JOHN XXII at the request of King JAMES II OF ARAGON. The order received the properties of the TEMPLARS and of the KNIGHTS OF MALTA in the Kingdom of Valencia and had its chief seat at Montesa near Játiva. The knights were subject to the rule and customs of the Order of CALATRAVA, whose master, accompanied by the abbot either of Santes Creus or Valldigna, was obliged to visit Montesa annually. Only in 1319 did the master of Calatrava implement the pope's instructions and confer the habit on the first knights of Montesa. The Cistercian general chapter of 1321 incorporated Montesa into the Order of CÎTEAUX in accordance with the papal bull, and authorized the abbot of Santes Creus to send monks to care for the spiritual needs of the knights. Statutes enacted by the masters of Calatrava (1326, 1331, and 1353) and by the Cistercian abbots of MORIMOND (1444 and 1468) give a clear picture of the organization and customs of Montesa. In 1400 Pope BENEDICT XIII, at the request of King Martin of Aragon, united the Order of San Jorge de Alfama to Montesa. Several masters of Montesa performed distinctive services in the international policy of the kings of Aragon. In 1587 Pope Sixtus V annexed the mastership to the crown in perpetuity.

Bibliography: H. DE SAMPER, Montesa ilustrada, 2 v. (Valencia 1669). A. L. JAVIERRE MUR, Privilegios reales de la Orden de Montesa en la Edad Media (Madrid 1945). Enciclopedia de la Religión Católica 5: 577–578.

[J. F. O'CALLAGHAN]

KNIGHTS OF PETER CLAVER

A predominantly African-American Catholic fraternal organization founded Nov. 7, 1909 at Mobile, Ala., by three Black laymen (Gilbert Faustina, Frank Collins and Frank Trenier) and four Josephite fathers (Revs. Conrad F. Rebesher, John H. Dorsey, Samuel J. Kelly and Joseph P. Van Baast), and placed under the patronage of St. Peter Claver. It was incorporated on July 12, 1911. The organization was later extended to include fourth-degree knights (1917), junior knights (1917), ladies auxiliary (1922), and junior daughters (1930). The constitutions of the national council were revised nine times (1925, 1929, 1936, 1948, 1951, 1971, 1979, 1989, and 1999). The Ladies' Auxiliary was recognized as a division of the National Council at Galveston, Texas in August of 1926, and the Junior Knights recognized as a division of the National Council from Oct. 1, 1935 onwards. The order operates in over 56 archdioceses and dioceses throughout the United States.

The purpose of the order is to render service to God and to the Church by promoting the brotherhood of man, especially through spiritual and corporal works of mercy and various other Catholic activities. Historically, the order operated mutual aid, thrift, social, educational and poverty-alleviation programs, and supported endeavors promoting desegregation in the South and the extension of suffrage to African Americans. The order continues to collaborate in mutual projects with the National Advancement of Colored People, National Council of Negro Women, National Council of Catholic Women, Urban League, Sickle Cell Anema Foundation, Xavier University Development and Expansion Fund, The Sr. Thea Bowman Black Catholic Educational Foundation, The International Alliance of Catholic Knights, the National Black Catholic Congress, and National Black Clergy and National Black Sisters' Conferences. Besides offering educational scholarships and financial aid, the order supports a variety of charitable appeals. It contributed $100,000 toward the construction of Our Mother of Africa Chapel in the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, D.C. that was dedicated at the closing liturgy of the 8th National Black Catholic Congress in August of 1997.

The order has had 13 supreme knights: Gilbert Faustina (1909-26), Louis Israel (1926-40), Alphonse Auguste (1941), John H. Clouser (1941-46), J. Roland Prejean (1946-52), Beverly V. Baranco, Jr. (1952-58), Eugene B. Perry (1958-64), Shields G. Gilmore, Jr. (1964–1970), Ernest Granger, Sr. (1970–76), Murray J. Frank (1976-1982), Chester J. Jones (1982-88), Paul C. Condoll (1988–1994) and A. Jackie Elly (1994–). In the Ladies' Auxiliary, there have been ten Supreme Ladies: Mrs. M. L. Lunnon (1926–28), Mrs. A. R. Aubry (1928-1952), Mrs. E. B. Jones (1952-1958), Mrs. Inez Y. Bowman (1958-1964), Mrs. Thelma P. Lombard (1964-70), Mrs. Florence W. Lee (1970-1976), Mrs. Elise LeNoir Morris (1976-1982), Mrs. Consuella M. Broussard (1982-1988), Mrs. Dorothy B. Henderson (1988-1994) and Ms. Leodia Gooch (1994-).

The first official journal of the order was the Shield, which commenced publication in November of 1910. In 1922, it was renamed the Claverite, and since 1974 it is published semi-annually. The headquarters of the order is located at 1825 Orleans Ave., New Orleans, LA 70116.

[E. B. PERRY/EDS.]

KNIGHTS OF ST. GEORGE

A Catholic fraternal society organized in Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1880 with the approval of Bp. John Tuigg (1876–89). The original purpose of the order was to form a large, well-organized society capable of offering effective assistance to the many German immigrant families that were settling in the Pittsburgh area at that time. The movement began among members of St. Martin's parish, a German national parish in Pittsburgh. In the fall of 1880 a constitution was adopted, and the order took as its official title the German Roman Catholic Knights of St. George. On Jan. 8, 1881, a civil charter was obtained in Allegheny County, Pa. In addition to various social and charitable works, the knights gave financial aid to seminarians and sponsored the lay retreat movement. At one time, they also published a periodical called Knight of St. George.

[R. A. KLINEFELTER]

KNIGHTS OF ST. JAMES

Military religious order under the patronage of the Apostle James, established Aug. 1, 1170, in Cáceres, Spain, by Pedro Fernandes and companions. King Fernando II of León, realizing the value of such an order for the defense of his recent conquests in Extremadura, ceded Cáceres to the order. Thus the order was known initially as that of Cáceres, although the Moslems soon reconquered the town. In 1171 the knights concluded a pact with the archbishop of SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA, who placed them under the Apostle's protection and received their master as a canon of the cathedral chapter. Meanwhile, Fernando II, who was later to be considered one of the founders, continued his generous donations to the order. At the same time the order acquired properties in Portugal, Castile, and Aragon, and by 1184 even held property in France, England, and Carinthia. ALEXANDER III gave his approbation to the new order in 1175, stipulating that a convent of clerics under the direction of a prior should be responsible for its spiritual welfare. A general chapter was to be held each year, and 13 councilors were to elect the master, who served for life. The knights, following the Rule of St. AUGUSTINE, were allowed to marry under certain conditions. In addition to the master, the principal officers were the priors of León and Uclés and the commanders entrusted with the administration and defense of the order's encomiendas.

Uclés, lying east of Toledo, was the order's principal seat in the Kingdom of Castile, and frequently the order was known by that name. The order contributed substantially to the Reconquest in all the Hispanic kingdoms, though its major holdings were located in Extremadura, the Campo de Montiel, and Andalusia. It soon became the wealthiest of all the peninsular military orders, and in the later Middle Ages the mastership became a prize avidly sought by powerful personages.

Some of the leading figures of 15th century Castilian politics, viz, Enrique, nephew of King Enrique III, Alvaro de Luna, Beltrán de la Cueva, and Juan Pacheco, Marquess of Villena, all enjoyed the power, prestige, and revenues attached to the mastership. To curb this threat to monarchical authority, King Ferdinand V and Queen Isabella, with papal approval, annexed the mastership to the crown in 1493. In 1523 Pope Adrian VI united the mastership to the crown in perpetuity.

Bibliography: Bullarium ordinis sancti Jacobi, ed. A. F. AGUADO et al. (Madrid 1719). J. LOPEZ AGURLETA, Vida del venerable fundador de la Orden de Santiago, 2 v. (Madrid 1731). C. GUTIÉR-REZ DEL ARROYO, Privilegios reales de la Orden de Santiago (Madrid 1946). A. FOREY, The Military Orders from the Twelfth to the Early Fourteenth Centuries (Toronto 1992).

[J. F. O'CALLAGHAN]

KNIGHTS OF ST. JOHN

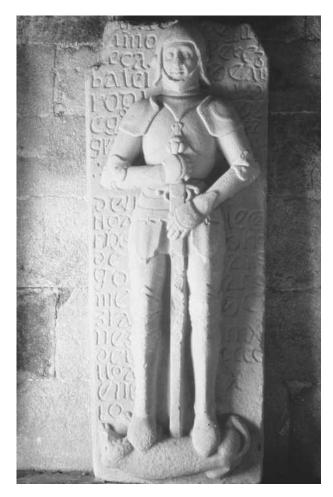

A semimilitary fraternal organization incorporated by a special act of the Legislature of the state of New York on May 6, 1886, as the Roman Catholic Union of the Knights of St. John. The name of the organization was changed by another special act on Feb. 20, 1896, to Knights of St. John, for the purpose of admitting to membership persons of all rites of the Catholic Church. The order was founded under the protection of St. John the Baptist, patron of the HOSPITALLERS OF ST. JOHN OF JERUSALEM, who were organized in the 12th century as a military order to protect pilgrims to the Holy Land from attack by the Turks and to assist those wounded or taken ill while traveling.

Among the objectives of the modern Knights of St. John were: to foster a feeling of fraternity among its members; to improve their moral, mental, and social condition; to aid and support members and their families in case of need; and to participate in a special way in the functions of the Catholic Church. The knights wore their uniforms when they exercised their privilege of serving as escort at the more important liturgical, ceremonial, and official functions of the Church and on many civic occasions. The central governing body, called the supreme commandery, comprised grand commanderies covering a given geographical area. The grand commanderies were made up of local commanderies, generally affiliated with a parish, and district commanderies, usually contained within a diocese.

[R. C. NOONAN/EDS.]

KNIGHTS OF THE FAITH

Knights of the Faith was a Catholic and royalist secret society in France during the Restoration period. Its founder was Ferdinand de Bertier, whose father, the last intendant of Paris, was slaughtered by a revolutionary mob (July 22, 1789). Convinced that FREEMASONRY was responsible for the FRENCH REVOLUTION and his father's death, Bertier decided to fight it with its own methods. To this end he created in 1810 a kind of counter-Masonry dedicated to the defense of throne and altar. The hierarchy of the Chevaliers de la Foi, as they were known, comprised the following grades: charity member (Associé de Charité), equerry, hospital knight, and knight of the Faith. Only the last grade knew the full scope of the organization. In each civil department of France members formed a "banner." The society was governed by a council of nine members presided over by a grand-master, Viscount (later Duke) Mathieu de Montmorency. The Holy See refused to approve it as a military religious order. In the last months of the rule of Napoleon I, the Knights prepared public opinion for the return of the Bourbons, and were instrumental in arranging the royalist coup in Bordeaux (March 12, 1814) that helped to convince the Allied governments of the feasibility of restoring the old dynasty. After 1815, the society organized the ultraroyalist party that fought bitterly against the moderate policies of Louis XVIII and his favorite minister Élie Decazes. At the end of 1822, when royalists came to power, two knights, Montmorency and Joseph de Villèle, entered the ministry. When their protector, Charles X, became king (1824), they were able to press their reactionary and religious program. Villèle tried to rule the majority of the elected chamber by using the vote of some 100 members affiliated to the Knights, although other leading knights disagreed with him because they considered the outcry against the congregation injurious to religion. One of these organizations was confused with the other because notable Rightist political figures such as Montmorency, Armand de Polignac, and Ferdinand de Bertier belonged to both of them. To end this mix-up and weaken Villèle's position, the founders dissolved the knights (January 1826). In a way, the Knights of the Faith prefigured the later OPUS DEI.

15th-century tomb slab from one of the knights of St. James, housed within the chapel of Villar de Donas, Santiago de Compostela, Spain. (©Adam Woolfitt/CORBIS)

Bibliography: G. DE BERTIER DE SAUVIGNY, Un type d'ultraroyaliste: Le Comte Ferdinand de Bertier et l'énigme de la Congrégation (Paris 1948).

[G. DE BERTIER DE SAUVIGNY]

KNIGHTS OF THE HOLY SEPULCHER

Formally known as The Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem (Ordo Equestris Sancti Sepulcri Hierosolymitani), the Knights of the Holy Sepulcher is a confraternity of persons bound together solely by the pious custom of receiving knighthood at the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem. Legend attributes the foundation of the Knights of the Holy Sepulcher to GODFREY OF BOUILLON, one of the leaders of the First CRUSADE, who, after the conquest of Jerusalem in 1099, was elected Advocatus sancti sepulchri. Historical data to support this account are entirely lacking. The Knights of the Holy Sepulcher ought not to be confused with the Canons Regular of the Holy Sepulcher, nor are they to be thought of as a military religious order similar to the TEMPLARS or the KNIGHTS OF MALTA. The origin of the confraternity can be traced to the above-mentioned devotion, which was practiced by many pilgrims to the Holy Places.

Technically members of the knightly class—but often in fact, not—those so knighted in Jerusalem could be described as Knights of the Holy Sepulcher. At first, knighthood was always conferred by a member of the knightly class. The FRANCISCANS, to whom Pope Clement VI entrusted the custody of the Holy Land in 1342, always conferred the benedictio militis and, in the absence of a knight, even the accolade upon prospective knights. At the close of the 15th century, the superior of the Franciscan monastery in Jerusalem assumed the title of grand master of the Holy Sepulcher and was so recognized by the Holy See. In 1847 Pope Pius IX accorded the title to the Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, with authority to admit knights to the confraternity. From 1907 to 1928 the popes held the grandmastership, which is now given to one of the cardinals. In 1868 and again in 1949, 1962, and 1977 the popes promulgated statutes for the knights. At present the knights are organized in five classes: knights of the collar, knights grand cross, commanders with plaque, commanders, and knights. Investiture has been open to women since 1868. The insignia are a white cape and a red enameled cross of Jerusalem.

Bibliography: M. H. A. D'ASSEMANI, The Cross on the Sword: A History of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem (Chicago 1944). X. DE BOURBON-PARMA et al., Les Chevaliers du Saint-Sépulcre (Paris 1957). G. TESSIER, "Les Débuts de l'Ordre du St. Sépulcre en Espagne," Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes 116 (1958) 5–28.

[J. F. O'CALLAGHAN]

KNIGHTS OF THE SWORD

Known also as the Brothers of the Sword and as the Livonian Knights, one of the 12 religious MILITARY OR-DERS of knighthood that came into being between 1100 and 1300, and one of the three of German origin. It was founded in 1201, either by Abbot Theoderic of Riga or by Bp. ALBERT I of Riga. The order was confirmed by Pope Innocent III in 1204. The brother knights were to be called Milites Christi de Lyvonia, but they were commonly referred to as Brothers of the Sword. Their rule was that of the TEMPLARS; their habit was the white mantle with a red cross and a red sword behind it pointing up. The purpose of the new order was to convert the heathen Esths and Livs of Livonia, both obstinately pagan. The Knights of the Sword merged with the Teutonic Knights on May 12, 1237, thereby extending considerably the sphere of interest of the latter. This merger merely added to the already great political confusion and complex political hierarchy of Livonia: the master of the Brothers of the Sword, the representative of the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, the archbishop of Riga, and the estates of Livonia all exercised simultaneous and conflicting jurisdiction over that territory. The Brothers of the Sword, unrestricted by their merger with the Teutonic Knights, continued their skirmishes with Poland, Lithuania, and the Russian states. Untamed, they never took on the semireligious characteristics of the Teutonic Knights, but, true to their name, continued to live by the sword until Nov. 8, 1561, when, pursuant to an agreement between the Land Master Gotthard Kettler and the archbishop of Riga, William of Brandenburg, Livonia became a part of Lithuania. The Knights of the Sword were dissolved then.

Bibliography: F. G. VON BUNGE, Der Orden der Schwertbrüder (Leipzig 1875). M. TUMLER, Der Deutsche Orden im Werden, Wachsen und Wirken bis 1400 (Vienna 1955; 2d ed. 1965). F. BENNINGHOVEN, Der Orden der Schwertbrüder (Cologne 1964). A. FOREY, The Military Orders from the Twelfth to the Early Fourteenth Centuries (Toronto 1992).

[G. GROSSCHMID]

KNOLL, ALBERT

Theologian; b. Brunico, Italy, July 12, 1796; d. Bolzano, Italy, Mar. 30, 1863. He entered the Capuchins in 1818, and later taught theology for 27 years and was a definitor general of his order from 1847 to 1853. His literary activity covered three areas: dogma, Canon Law, and pastoral theology. His outstanding theological work was Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae generalis (Innsbruck 1852). This work was accorded an extraordinary reception in seminaries because of its orthodoxy, clarity of method, and abundance of proofs; it went through 15 editions from 1852 to 1904. A more ample treatment of theology was given in Institutiones theologiae theoreticae (6 v. Turin 1853–59); it enjoyed 12 editions from 1862 to 1892. In the field of Canon Law he wrote an exposition of the Franciscan rule, Expositio Regulae Fratrum Minorum (Innsbruck 1850), which is regarded as official by the Capuchins. There were five editions in Latin, two in Spanish, and one in Italian. In addition, he left two courses on preaching, Predigten für die Sonntage (Bressanone 1867), that were published four times in German and three times in Italian.

Bibliography: É. D'ALENÇON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al, 14 vol. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:664–666.

[M. DE POBLADURA]

KNOW-NOTHINGISM

A form of NATIVISM which flourished in the 1850s, expressing itself principally in the political activity of the American or Know-Nothing party.

Heavy German and Irish immigration, chiefly Catholic, in the years 1830 to 1860 evoked an outburst of nativism expressed in various cities by propaganda and riots against foreigners and "papists." It became political with the organization of nativists in local and state (e.g.,

Know-Nothing Party 1844 campaign ribbon. (©David J. & Janice L. Frent Collection/CORBIS)

Louisiana in 1841) elections. The cities of New York in 1844 and Boston in 1845 were carried by the American-Republican or Native American party who had the support of the Whigs. But the latter eventually withdrew their support and the party disappeared from the national scene in 1847.

The Know-Nothing party then developed from several nativist secret societies, a few of which merged under the leadership first of Charles B. Allen of New York and later of James W. Barker. Known originally as the Order of the Star-Spangled Banner, the organization and proceedings were secret and every member was sworn to know nothing about them when questioned. The party first entered politics indirectly by supporting the nativistic nominees of existing parties, and by 1852 the success of this maneuver was becoming evident. Election frauds in the older parties strengthened Know-Nothing opposition to foreigners and Catholics, leading to the demand that 21 years' residence in the U.S. be required before an alien could become a citizen, and even then he could not hold public office. Other proposals sought to deny all rights to the foreign-born and to their children, unless educated in public schools.

In 1854 the Know-Nothing party officially became the American party and won some startling victories. Its candidates were elected to the governorships of Massachusetts and Delaware; carried the state legislatures in several New England states and in Maryland, Kentucky, and California; and obtained five seats in the Senate and 43 in the House of the 34th Congress. However, factions soon developed over tariff and land problems and especially over the slavery question, with the consequent decrease of the party's power. In 1856 a national platform that included anti-alien and anti-Catholic planks was presented, and Millard Fillmore, who was also the Whig candidate, was nominated for the presidency. The Know-Nothings dedicated themselves to "place in offices of honor, trust or profit . . . none but native-born Protestant citizens" and swore to oppose all "foreign influence, Popery, Jesuitism and Catholicism." Abraham Lincoln's comment on this bigotry was: "When the Know-Nothings get control, the [Declaration] will read: 'all men are created equal except Negroes, and foreigners, and Catholics." Although the American party polled about 25 per cent of the popular vote in 1856, it received the electoral vote of only one state, Maryland.

After 1857 the party lost ground, so that by 1859 only the border states supported it. Such vestiges as remained in 1860 were absorbed into the Constitutional Union and Republican parties. The same year marked Know-Nothingism's disappearance as a local political power. Thereafter, many of the Know-Nothing gains were reversed; for example, the New York legislature, which under Know-Nothing influence had passed the Putnam Bill of 1855 forbidding Catholic bishops to hold property in their own names, quietly repealed the measure in 1863.

Public opinion never fully supported the forces of Know-Nothingism, particularly in regard to the immigrant and Catholic citizen, although Know-Nothing views on nonsupport for sectarian schools continued to be upheld. As a short-lived phenomenon of the 1850s, this singular movement did not withstand the test of time and its force was dissipated before it became too dangerous. Although a similar spirit of racial and religious intolerance was revived sporadically in such organizations as the KU KLUX KLAN, few of these had much political vitality.

Bibliography: A. R. BILLINGTON, The Protestant Crusade, 1800–1860 (New York 1938). F. X. CURRAN, Major Trends in American Church History (New York 1946). M. T. GEARY, A History of Third Parties in Pennsylvania, 1840–1860 (Ph.D. Thesis, CUA, Washington 1938). J. HIGHMAN, Strangers in the Land: Patterns of American Nativism, 1860–1925 (New Brunswick, N.J. 1955). L. D. SCISCO, Political Nativism in New York State (New York 1901). W. D. OVERDYKE, The Know-Nothing in the South (Baton Rouge 1950).

[M. L. FELL]

KNOWLEDGE

Variously defined as the act by which one becomes the other in an intentional way; the act by which one is aware of something in thought, with or without the aid of the senses; the habit or ability to recall such an act; or the matter that is the object of such an act or habit. This article discusses the common notion of knowledge, its definition and characteristics, its various classifications, and the problem it poses—all from the viewpoint of Thomistic philosophy. For other views, see KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF.

Common Notion. Knowledge rarely presents itself as a problem to the average person; he simply takes it for granted as something that in some way puts him in contact with things other than himself. He also recognizes it as something unique, even though he may not be able to define it or even to describe it articulately. This inability stems, in part, from his discerning so many different types of knowledge; for example, seeing, imagining, remembering, and reasoning can all be included under his notion. He knows facts and he knows persons; he knows his business or profession; he knows some science and some philosophy; he knows how to do certain things and how to achieve particular goals. Yet with all this he also has experience of imperfect knowledge, of ignorance, of error and mistakes, both in himself and in others.

Although such a notion of knowledge generally suffices for the average person, the philosopher cannot be satisfied with it. He must come to grips with knowledge in its proper nature and its general and detailed classifications. Reflecting upon knowledge, he notes that it poses problems: what are the processes through which it occurs; does it have any validity; what is the possibility of attaining certitude? Such questions open broad areas for investigation; yet they present such difficulty that opposed and often contradictory theories of knowledge continue to have their expositors and defenders.

Definition and Characteristics. St. THOMAS AQUINAS defined knowledge in the following terms: "The noblest way of possessing a thing is to possess it in an immaterial way, that is, by possessing its form without its matter; and this is the definition of knowledge" (In lib. de caus. 18). He thus calls attention to the fact that knowing means possessing something and making it one's own, but in a unique and peculiar way. To know a thing means not to make it one's own in a material or bodily way, but rather to make its form one's own. Since FORM is the perfection or determination that is distinctive in a thing and that makes it to be what it is, knowledge is making one's own the perfection of something else; the knower adds to his own perfection the perfection of another.

This definition he explains more fully by noting that the perfection a thing has in virtue of being what it is also limits it by differentiating it from other things whose perfections it lacks (De ver. 2.2). In order that there be a remedy for this type of imperfection, some beings have knowledge; this enables the perfections of one thing to be found in another. The ability to possess the perfection of other things while remaining oneself is precisely the perfection of the knower as knower. For St. Thomas, in fact, the natural end and purpose of man's existence is to have, through knowledge, the perfections of the entire universe: "The ultimate perfection to which the soul can reach is that in it there be found the whole order of the universe and its causes. This, according to the philosophers, is the ultimate end of man' (ibid.).

Knowledge as Perfection. Such a view of knowledge eliminates the possibility that knowledge be a physical or mechanical process. It is, on the contrary, a perfection that can be found only in living things; these alone have the ability to perform immanent or self-constructing operations, i.e., actions that increase rather than decrease the perfection of the agent. More particularly, it is only in the animal kingdom that this ability is found. Here it culminates in the intellectual knowledge of man, who, although limited as a creature, is nonetheless open, through knowledge, to unlimited perfection.

Knowledge is said to be an action or an operation just as LIFE is said to be a motion or a self-motion. According to St. Thomas, however, these expressions are "more by way of example than of definition" (In 2 anim. 1.219). Ontologically, knowledge is neither an action nor a MO-TION; it belongs rather in the category of QUALITY (see CATEGORIES OF BEING; ACTION AND PASSION). Knowing, therefore, is not doing something but becoming something. It is a self-modification brought about precisely by the objective possession of some thing other than oneself. The knower's being is expanded by the addition of a perfection previously not possessed, yet contributed by something else that has lost nothing in the giving. There has been no change such as occurs when matter receives a new form while losing an old one, but form, itself a perfection, has had new perfection added to it, and thus has been modified and perfected cognitively.

Subject and Object. It is not surprising that the capacity to share in the being of other things and make their perfections one's own should present mysterious facets and paradoxes. Knowledge, for example, forces itself upon man's attention as a number of activities occurring within him that are at the same time related to things outside him, which are thereby brought into his field of consciousness. The paradox here is that of SUBJECT and OBJECT. Knowledge never occurs except in the framework of this subject-object relatedness. Apart from knowledge, the subject has not as yet begun to be a subject but remains only an organism or a person; the object, also, has not yet begun to be an object, but is simply a thing, sensible or intelligible but not yet known. A being is constituted an object only by some relation that it begins to have to some living thing having the power of knowing.

Neither subject nor object can ever be viewed as absolutes, but only as related; otherwise knowledge itself is eliminated. This makes it necessary to reject the contemporary view of the cognitive relationship as one of self as opposed to nonself, each being regarded as an absolute. When one attempts to explain knowledge on this basis, the explanation is prejudiced and divorced from reality. Actually, in knowledge subject and object are intelligible only by correlative reference.

Interiority and Exteriority. No sooner has one become assured of the IMMANENCE and interiority of knowledge as an operation proceeding from a living being, an operation having its roots in IMMATERIALITY and thus completely different from any kind of motion in matter, than he must face its opposing characteristic, viz, its exteriority, its relation to something other than the self. The paradox of subject and object is continued and deepened, a fact that tortures the modern mind into a flight to some kind of IDEALISM wherein the mind supposedly creates its own object. But this will not do; it solves nothing and it eventually makes all knowledge unintelligible and impossible, whereas in experience knowledge is a most stubborn fact that refuses to be sequestered and quarantined in the mind as in a prison. The solution to this part of the paradox is a recognition that the object is quite real; that there is no knowledge without an object to which a subject becomes related through some type of INTENTIONALITY. This means that a cognitive power is a living relation to the object that stimulated it and thereby set off the act of cognition. In this the object has neither a real relation to the subject nor any real dependence on it, although St. Thomas does maintain that the subject has a real relation to the object as that which is measured to the measure (De pot. 7.10). While using this expression, however, St. Thomas warns that the word "measure" is not to be taken quantitatively, but rather in an analogous way as relating to being and to truth (In 5 meta. 17.1003).

Consciousness. In some theories, knowledge is identified with CONSCIOUSNESS. Despite their close connection, the two are not the same. Consciousness is a state of greater or lesser awareness in a cognitive being; as such, it should not be substantialized and made a reality in itself. A conscious act is an act of knowledge that involves knowing one's internal operations and dispositions and oneself as subject to them. These operations may in turn be acts of knowledge, but they may also be noncognitive acts, such as wishing or walking. It is also possible that knowledge occur without consciousness, as happens when one dreams or experiences an external sensation during sleep. Consciousness and knowledge are simultaneous when one knows an object and at the same time is aware of himself as knowing it. It may further be noted that analytically consciousness can be distinguished into sensory and intellectual; yet in the concrete, man has only one unified human consciousness that embraces both simultaneously.

Truth and Certitude. In the simplest act of knowledge, simple APPREHENSION, the measuring by the object is effected automatically, with the result that apprehensive knowledge is always true and allows no room for error. This is not remarkable; it means simply that when an object is presented to a knowing power, it will be known as presented. The possibility of FALSITY and ERROR arises as soon as one begins to rearrange and unify his knowledge through judgments that apply a predicate to a subject. TRUTH is had as a property of knowledge when JUDGMENT is in harmony with being as it is in reality; otherwise falsity is present. Similarly, a judgment is said to be certain when it is enunciated with no fear of error, and merely probable when one is inclined to regard what he proclaims as true while recognizing that the opposite is also possible (see CERTITUDE).

Classification. Knowledge may be classified from many different points of view. On the basis of origin, natural knowledge, achieved by the unaided use of human cognitive powers, may be distinguished from supernatural knowledge, which derives from some divine assistance given in revelation. Knowledge gained by the unaided use of man's resources includes the greater part of human knowledge, taken in a quantitative sense, and is responsible for the development of all the sciences and arts, with the exception of sacred theology. From the standpoint of the objects that man can know, the fundamental division is that into SENSE knowledge and intellectual knowledge. Sense knowledge arises from the immediate impact of bodily things upon the sense organs of sight, hearing, taste, smell, and touch. When elaborated by such internal senses as the IMAGINATION, MEMORY. and the COGITATIVE POWER, the content of sense knowledge becomes the basis for intellectual knowledge, the characteristic of which is its abstractness—a freedom and disengagement from all the conditions of material existence (see ABSTRACTION).

Intellectual Knowledge. Whereas sense knowledge is a perfection common to both animals and men, intellectual knowledge is specific to man; indeed, it is the hallmark of humanity. It enables man not merely to knowall animals can do this—but to know abstractly, in a detached and absolute fashion. Such knowing has no counterpart in the senses, which depend on bodily organs and are limited by them and their conditions. Intellectual knowledge alone is properly called thinking, since it alone can present objects to man in the abstract mode free from the limitations and conditions of matter, time, and place. Intellectual knowledge alone, grasping not the external appearances or surface qualities of things but their very essence, penetrates to the inner reality of things and reveals in some degree what they are, rather than what they look like, taste like, or feel like. Because of this, the object of intellectual knowledge is said to be the being of things (see INTELLECT). The wide extension of this object opens up to man the possibility of knowing things above the material order, even though the source of such knowledge always remains in sensory experience.

The product of intellectual apprehension is called the IDEA or CONCEPT. At first imperfect and representative of only a limited part of the reality that is their object, ideas or concepts are perfected by series of judgments and reasoning processes. Through these, intellectual knowledge expands itself and becomes more completely representative of reality. Utilizing such processes, men have gradually developed all their sciences and arts, culminating in the natural wisdom of METAPHYSICS and the supernatural wisdom of sacred theology.

Supernatural Knowledge. The possibility of supernatural knowledge, i.e., knowledge unavailable to man by his own natural cognitive powers, is precisely the possibility of God's making known to man certain truths he could not discover by himself. A gratuitous denial of the possibility of revelation is certainly unwarranted; the acceptance of the fact of revelation is something else, but this is not the concern here. While it usually presupposes assent to the rational truths of natural religion, FAITH properly so-called is not to be identified with a natural acceptance; it is in itself supernatural and a gift of God. St. Paul describes the origin of supernatural knowledge with these words: "God who at sundry times and in divers manners spoke in times past to the fathers by the prophets, last of all in these days has spoken to us by his Son, whom he appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the world" (Heb 1.1-2). This supernatural knowledge, accepted by faith, has been elaborated into a series of conclusions and implications that is properly the science of sacred THEOLOGY.

Actual and Habitual Knowledge. Because the sum total of a man's knowledge is not always in the forefront of his consciousness, a distinction must be made between actual and habitual knowledge. At any given moment, the activity of man's cognitive powers is producing in him actual knowledge; yet some of his powers are capable of preserving knowledge and recalling it when the objects previously known are no longer present. Although the external senses are stimulated only by objects actually present, one may have habitual knowledge both in the internal senses, e.g., in the imagination or memory, and in the intellect. This habitual knowledge is preserved through qualities that are more or less permanent, such as the PHANTASM on the sensory level and the idea on the intellectual. The ability to recall these at will in any particular case varies greatly and may be influenced by a wide array of situations and circumstances.

Intuitive and Discursive Knowledge. Another distinction is that between knowledge that is immediate or intuitive and that which is mediate or dicursive. In the first type, the knowledge arises either from the direct contact of the external senses with their objects or the direct intellectual grasp of a proposition whose terms are seen to be necessarily related (see INTUITION). In the second, there is a progression from one or more propositions to another whose truth is recognized as being based on, and implicated with, the proposition already known (see REA-SONING). This can occur in two ways: when the process is from the particular to the general, from facts to laws or causes, it is called INDUCTION; its opposite, DEDUC-TION, arises from general propositions and proceeds to their particular application. A further distinction may be mentioned in connection with the inference involved in mediate knowledge. When the inference proceeds from cause to effect, it is said to be a priori; when the procession is from effect to cause, it is a posteriori.

Problem of Knowledge. Knowledge has always raised questions for the inquiring mind, and these questions take different forms depending upon the point of view of the inquirer. The psychologist, for example, wants to know what knowledge is and how it originates (see KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF). The logician searches for the laws that govern exact thinking and that must be followed if truth is to be attained (see LOGIC). All such questions about knowledge, however, point toward the major problem of the value of knowledge. The solution of this and its attendant problems is the primary concern of EPISTEMOLOGY.

It has been frequently taken for granted that before anyone can enter the temple of wisdom, he must begin with a critique of knowledge to determine, at the beginning, whether or not his ideas correspond with reality. This method was inaugurated by R. DESCARTES and I. KANT, and perfected by their followers. So deeply were their disciples convinced of its necessity that they tended to make the problem of the critique of knowledge not merely the preliminary question but the entire content of philosophical investigation.

Actually, however, it is impossible to begin all investigation with a critique of knowledge, if only because a critique of knowledge presupposes both a psychology and a metaphysics. Man does not first know knowledge; he first knows things. St. Thomas points out that all man's knowledge originates from knowledge of FIRST PRINCI-PLES, and that these arise directly from sense experience (De ver. 10.6). All human knowledge is thus based on the certitudes of immediate EVIDENCE, and these form the foundation of all knowledge on both the sensory and intellectual levels. The first object of man's knowledge is the material world in which he lives, the material bodies that present themselves to his senses as the subjects of continual changes and movements. And the value of this knowledge is guaranteed by the immediate contact of the senses with their proper formal objects in material things. No bridge from subject to object is either necessary or possible. The contact is immediate and direct.

Validity of Sensation. There can be no proof, moreover, that such is the origin of human knowledge; proof must proceed from something more fundamental, and nothing can be more primitive or fundamental than the primary knowledge of the senses. Proof, again, requires a middle term. There is none here; nor can there be. While immediacy of the evidence makes proof unnecessary, however, one may give an indirect indication of its validity by observing that the lack of any one of the senses deprives a man of all the knowledge that particular sense might have apprehended. A man born blind, for example, knows nothing of color, and no amount of teaching will help him in this regard; color for him is unimaginable and unthinkable, a clear indication that the materials of knowledge come only through the experience of the senses.

Besides this indirect indication of the validity of sense knowledge, it is possible to defend this validity positively by a direct analysis of SENSATION itself. St. Thomas makes such an analysis in the Summa theologiae in answer to the question: "Whether there is falsity in the senses?" He there states: "The affection of the sense is its sensation itself. Hence from the fact that sense reports as it is affected, it follows that we are not deceived in the judgment by which we judge that we experience sensation" (Summa theologiae 1a, 17.2 ad 1). When, therefore, one is aware of his senses reporting contact with an object, he can have infallible assurance that he is really sensing something, and sensing it as it is, no matter what, on further analysis, its nature might turn out to be. For it may be taken as certain that no legitimate distinction between appearance and reality can make whatever appears to be be itself unreal. If there is an appearance to the senses, there is a reality appearing; the alternative is to face the contradiction, that a sensation could terminate in nothing, and that nothing can appear. To sum up, if man senses, he senses something; and if he senses something, he must sense it as it is. The seeming alternative, that is, to sense nothing, is an absurdity; the only alternative is not to sense at all.

Validity of Intellection. There is no doubt, then, that all man's knowledge begins with the senses, but man is also clearly aware that it does not end there. His intellect is a different and higher power of knowledge that utilizes the content provided by the senses to expand and elaborate his knowledge into ideas, judgments, and reasoning processes. Analysis of his experience forces him to recognize intellectual knowledge as different and more perfect than sensory knowledge, although it does not force him to conclude that the intellect operates separately and in isolation from the senses. The PERSON is a strict unity and so is human knowledge. Yet the component of knowledge supplied by the senses differs from that of the intellect. The knowledge of the senses is restricted to the external and sensible qualities of things, while intellectual knowledge grasps the essences, the intimate natures of things. One sees, for example, the color, shape, size, and position of a house, but it is only by intellectual knowledge that he begins to understand what a house is, that is, a structure used to shelter human living and working. In short, whereas the senses are concerned only with the sensible phenomena, the intellect penetrates to the nature, the very being of the object.

The analysis of knowledge, therefore, reveals that human knowledge exists on two distinct levels that complement and complete each other. In man they are bound together in such close unity that together they grasp the same object, an object that is at once sensible and intelligible. In this close association with the senses is to be placed the critical foundation of the validity of intellectual knowledge. This knowledge begins and derives from the content provided by the senses, without which the intellect would have no object, and therefore no operation.

Since the proper object of the intellect is being, the intellect manifests itself as a living relation to being, to the real. What man grasps intellectually is not the PHENOMENA of things, but the determinations hidden under the phenomena, though manifested by them, and characterizing the ESSENCE of the thing. The validity of such intellectual apprehension has a parallel in the necessary validity of sensory apprehension. St. Thomas uses and applies the analogy when he answers the question: "Whether the intellect can be false?" He writes: "For, every faculty as such is per se directed to its proper object, and things of this kind are always the same. Hence so long as the faculty exists, its judgment concerning its own proper object does not fail. . . . Hence as regards simple objects not subject to composite definitions we cannot be deceived unless we understand nothing whatever about them" (Summa theologiae 1a, 85.6). Just as color is necessarily perceived by sight, so being is necessarily understood by intelligence. The intellect knows the thing in its being, and it knows it as it is. Intellectual knowledge is valid in apprehension because the light of the intellect penetrates to the REALITY of the object and cannot avoid doing so.

Validity of Judgment. A more formidable problem arises concerning the validity of the JUDGMENT, since it is here that truth or falsity is properly found. Because it is in this intellectual act that the first indemonstrable principles are known, the judgment furnishes the basic foundation for the truths of every science and both wisdoms. Thus St. Thomas maintains that, in its origin, all knowledge consists in becoming aware of the first indemonstrable principles (De ver. 10.6). These principles are simply the primary mental assents at which the mind naturally and necessarily arrives in its inspection of reality, both in terms of the general modes of being common to everything and the special modes of being proper to the different kinds of things in man's experience. The judgments relating to the general modes of being concern the TRAN-SCENDENTALS; these are the origin of all the principles and conclusions of METAPHYSICS. The judgments relating to the special modes of being concern the categories or various types of reality found concretized in things; these are the origin of all principles and conclusions of SCIENCE (SCIENTIA). The ultimate test of the truth of any judgment, then, can only be the analytic resolution of that judgment back to first principles. For this reason St. Thomas can say: "There is never falsity in the intellect if resolution back to first principles be rightly carried out" (De ver. 1.12). The human intellect does not learn these principles, nor does it assume them; it arrives at them naturally, necessarily, and immediately upon knowing the terms that make them up. The mind thus attains truth and certitude by grasping first principles, and then proceeding from these to conclusions. This does not mean that from these principles all knowledge can be deduced, but only that before anything can be deduced, they must be admitted and applied.

All judgments take place as the result of a unifying mental process that adds, to a concept already possessed, some new characteristic. It is well to note that a judgment does not take place by comparing mentally two different concepts and seeing these as compatible or not. A judgment is an assent, a dynamic act of the mind that occurs after a REFLECTION on a composite concept that itself results from a composite phantasm. The connection between the two elements, known simultaneously in the composite concept and seen as possible in the apprehension, is affirmed in the judgment, which is a dynamic statement of the conformity between mind and reality. This is, in turn, the known conformity of the bond between the elements of the composite concept in the mind and the make-up of the object in reality.

This analysis of the act of judgment is the very core of St. Thomas's critical theory and his solution to the problem of knowledge. Judgment is the touchstone of all truth, the bridge that closes the gap between mind and reality. Using it, man's intellect can penetrate the secrets of matter and unravel the mysteries of the universe. He can detect the order in the world and put order into his life and his relations with others. He can know the natural law and even the eternal law of God as the ultimate rule of his action. Thus the power of judgment leads him upward to the life of the spirit and ultimately to God Himself.

See Also: EPISTEMOLOGY.

Bibliography: G. A. DE BRIE, Bibliographia philosophica, 1934–1945 (Brussels 1950–) 2:130–165. V. J. BOURKE, Thomistic Bibliography, 1920–1940 (St. Louis 1945) 2216–2741. L. M. RÉGIS, St. Thomas and Epistemology (Milwaukee, Wis. 1946); Epistemology, tr. I. C. BYRNE (New York 1959). W. O. MARTIN, The Order and Integration of Knowledge (Ann Arbor, Mich. 1957). J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite; or, The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN (New York 1959). R. HOUDE and J. P. MULLALY, eds., Philosophy of Knowledge (Philadelphia 1960). G. VAN RIET, L'Épistémologie thomiste (Louvain 1946). J. PÉGHAIRE, Regards sur le connaître (Montreal 1949).

[G. C. REILLY]

KNOWLEDGE, CONNATURAL

Knowledge through connaturality is an act of the INTELLECT and is, like other forms of knowledge, an immanent activity whereby the knowing subject goes out and mingles in the life of others without ceasing to be himself. Unlike the rational, discursive knowledge characteristic of the sciences and philosophy, however, connatural knowledge is not achieved primarily through concepts and by way of DEMONSTRATION. It is rather a knowledge resulting from an interaction between sensitivity and affectivity, intellect and will, knowing and loving. It is thus a type of knowledge caused in some way by the unitive tendencies of man's appetites, in particular his rational appetite, or WILL. As knowledge, it is essentially an act of the intellect; as connatural, it involves APPETITE and will. Because it is a mode of knowing involving desire as well as intellect, it is a highly personal act, evidencing in the concrete that knowing is an act of the whole man, of a person, who knows through his intellect but whose knowledge is affected, at times intrinsically, by noncognitive factors. Again, unlike rational, discursive knowledge, connatural knowledge is directed to the concrete individual, not to the abstract universal.

History. This type of knowledge, which is perhaps best illustrated in the saying from the Imitation of Christ (1.1), "I would rather feel contrition than know how to define it," has a rich philosophical heritage. Aristotle implicitly recognized it when he distinguished between the rational, scientific knowledge of moral questions and the knowledge of these questions based on virtuous habits within the person, maintaining that in moral matters virtue is more certain than science (Eth. Nic. 1143b 11–13) and that "virtue and the good man are as such the measure of each thing" (ibid. 1176a 17). Connatural knowledge was implied also by PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, who maintained that the spiritual man knows divine things not only because he has learned them but also because he "suffers" them.

The medieval schoolmen did not work out explicit theories of connatural knowledge, but they recognized it as a genuine mode of knowing. The discussions of man's moral conduct and his spiritual life, particularly in St. THOMAS AQUINAS, suggest the lines along which a more formal analysis of this type of knowledge can be developed. Aside from the Renaissance commentators on St. Thomas, in particular JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, philosophers of the modern period paid little attention to this mode of human knowledge. The emphasis on inter-subjectivity in recent existential and phenomenological thought has helped redirect inquiry into this subject. Interest in it is reflected in J. H. Newman's distinction between notional and real knowledge, a distinction further elaborated by M. Blondel, and in H. Bergson's opposition of the knowledge characteristic of scientific inquiry to that achieved in INTUITION. The question of connatural knowledge has engaged a number of contemporary Thomists, particularly in discussions of ethical and aesthetic questions. Among those who have given much thought to this subject are T. Gilby, J. P. ROUSSELOT, R. O. Johann, B. Miller, and, in particular, J. Maritain.

Connaturality. The connatural is whatever is fitting to or in accord with nature (Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 26.1 ad 3). It refers to a linking or union of two natures (and is thus distinct from the natural), and it is a linking that springs from something intrinsic to the natures involved. Knowledge is itself a nature, and, as a nature, is distinct from the nature of the knowing subject. Yet it is fitting for man to know; this act is "in accord" with his nature. Thus, in a loose sense, one can say that knowledge itself is connatural to man. Moreover, one can apply the term connatural to whatever is fitting or proper either to the act of knowing itself, or to the faculties of knowledge, e.g., the intellect, or to the agent or subject of knowledge, the human person. Thus it is connatural for man's knowledge to be objective and to be derived from the senses: in this sense the term connatural is predicated of the act of knowledge as such. Again, acts of knowing, even in the speculative order, become connatural to a person whose intellect has been strengthened through habits or virtues inclining him to judge easily in certain areas of judgment. In this way one who has acquired the speculative habit of mathematics, for example, is connaturalized to making judgments in mathematical questions. This is a type of connatural knowledge called by Maritain an intellective mode, one "by way of knowledge."

The type of knowledge usually referred to as connatural is knowledge through affective inclination, a knowledge wherein the connaturality influences not only the manner in which knowledge takes place but also what is known. It is a knowledge wherein "love passes into the condition of the object," as John of St. Thomas put it (Curs. theol. In 1am2ae, 70.18.4.11). It is the type of knowledge characteristic of the good man in his judgments of moral questions, of the mystic with regard to divine things, of the artist with respect to his work. Connatural knowledge in the strict sense, then, refers to judgments that are based not "on the perfect use of reason," but rather on an inclination or affinity of the knowing subject to the object known, an inclination caused by affective factors within the knower (cf. ST 1a, 1.6 ad 3; 1a2ae, 68.1 ad 4; 2a2ae, 45.2-3).

Knowledge and Love. To see how knowledge through affective connaturality takes place, it is necessary to consider the relation between knowledge and desire and the effect of love on knowledge. The intellect itself is an appetite: it has a native desire or inclination for perfect union with being—for the concrete, the individual, the whole substance—and for a union greater than that attainable through concepts and discursive thought. The need for discourse reveals the imperfection of man's intellect and of his inability to grasp reality in an allembracing intuitive vision. His intellect, moreover, has an elicited appetite, the will, which goes out to the goods presented by reason and draws him to things even more than does reason (cf. ST 1a2ae, 22.2). The object known is present to the intellect as a representation existing in a spiritual way, as an intentional SPECIES joining intellect to thing. But this is not enough for love; "in the intellect the object is present in a specific likeness, but in the will . . . as a motive principle" (C. gent. 4.19), or, as Gilby puts it, objects are present to the intellect as meanings, but they are present to the will as magnetic forces (35).

There is, then, pressure on the intellect, both by reason of its native drive and by reason of the love it elicits, to a closer union with the real, with being. Intellect and will are spiritual powers of the same person; and because they are spiritual, they "mutually contain each other" (ST 1a, 16.4 ad 1) and interact. Not only does the will act on the intellect as an efficient cause, moving it to acts of knowledge, but it also acts on the intellect as a formal cause, intrinsically modifying the act of knowledge. As St. Thomas says, "the lover is not content with a superficial knowledge, but strives to enter into everything that belongs to the beloved"; he does not rest with an external and superficial attachment, but longs for a perfect and intimate possession (ST 1a2ae, 28.2). In this interaction of intellect and will, there is built up within the knowing subject, the person, an inclination or connaturality toward the object of his affections. Even his love can be said to discern "by causing discernment in the reason" (ST 2a2ae, 47.1 ad 1).

This type of knowledge is well described in the words of John of St. Thomas: "Love experiences its object with a sort of loving taste In this way the one loving takes on the very condition of his object, that is, through the effective experience the object is rendered more conformed, more proportioned and united to the person, more suitable to him. For this reason the intellect is carried toward the object as something experienced, as brought into agreement with it' (Curs. theol. In 1am2ae, 70.18.4.11). Because the object of connatural knowledge is so attuned, as it were, to the knowing subject, the type of knowledge achieved is in some ways similar to one's knowledge of oneself. And one's self-knowledge is not essentially dependent on concepts or representations: "For the mind to attend to itself . . . a representation is not necessary. It is enough that the essence of the soul is present to the mind and is perceived through its activity" (De ver. 10.8). Representations and concepts are conditions, antecedents, and byproducts of one's CONSCIOUS-NESS of oneself, but are not formal constituents of selfknowledge itself (cf. ST 1a, 87.1).

The same reasoning is analogously true of man's knowledge of things through affective connaturality, as illustrated by the chaste man's knowledge of chastity, by a father's loving knowledge of his son, by a mystic's knowledge of God, by the poet's knowledge of his art.

As knowledge, connaturality pertains to the intellect, but as connatural it introduces noncognitive factors and shows the truth of the Thomistic dictum that it is man, a person, who knows, not a disembodied intellect.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE; JUDGMENT; FIRST PRINCIPLES; SYNDERESIS.

Bibliography: B. MILLER, The Range of Intellect (London 1961). T. GILBY, The Poetic Experience (New York 1934). R. O. JOHANN, The Meaning of Love (Westminster, Md. 1955). J. MARITAIN, Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry (New York 1955); Distinguish to Unite, or The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN (New York 1959); The Range of Reason (New York 1952). A. HAYEN, L'Ordre philosophique de Saint Thomas, v.2 of La Communication de l'être d'aprés Saint Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1957–).

[W. E. MAY]

KNOWLEDGE, GIFT OF

The gift of the Holy Spirit that perfects the work of faith by enabling the believer to appreciate rightly the relation of created things to his supernatural, ultimate end. Faith, unassisted by this gift, that is, acting under ordinary grace, knows that all things are ordered to God. The gift of UNDERSTANDING moves the mind to penetrate this truth more deeply than is possible to faith alone. To this penetration achieved by understanding, the gift of knowledge adds a judgment on how the things of earthly experience are related to the supernatural order. The judgment is intuitive in that it is immediate and bypasses the ordinary discursive steps by which faith operates. It develops in the soul a connaturality for such judgment. Without conscious reflection, the believer is immediately certain of how the realities he meets are related to eternal life.

See Also: HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF; UNDERSTANDING, GIFT OF.

Bibliography: B. FROGET, The Indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the Souls of the Just, tr. S. A. RAEMERS (Westminster, Md. 1950). A. ROYO, The Theology of Christian Perfection, ed. and tr. J. AUMANNN (Dubuque, Iowa 1962) 378–383. R. CESSARIO, Christian Faith and the Theological Life (Washington, D.C. 1996). S. PINCKAERS, The Sources of Christian Ethics, tr. M. T. NOBLE (3d rev. ed.; Washington, D.C. 1995). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 8–9.

[P. F. MULHERN]

KNOWLEDGE, INFUSED

Infused knowledge is that knowledge that is not acquired by personal effort nor by the instruction of others, but rather is produced directly in a created mind by some angelic or divine illumination. Its distinguishing characteristic is its mode of acquisition and not its subject matter, which can be either natural or supernatural truths. Infused knowledge should also be distinguished from connatural knowledge, such as the angels are sometimes presumed to possess, in that infused knowledge is not necessarily or inseparably associated with the intellect endowed with it.

Whatever is to be said of an angel's ability to infuse knowledge into other minds, there is no doubt that God can do so. To what extent He actually does so is more difficult to determine. Theologians plausibly assume some infusion of knowledge is involved in the initial revelation of supernatural truths such as that given to Adam, the Patriarchs, the Prophets, and so on. Though Scripture often describes God or His angelic messengers as speaking audibly, or appearing in some physical guise, to man (Gn 3.8-9; 4.6; 18.1; 22.11, 15-19; Ex 3.4), it also mentions internal communications of God, or an angel, coming "in a dream by night" (Gn 20.3; Mt 1.20; 2.13, 22). In such instances God could "speak internally" or work directly upon the mind (cf. 2 Cor 12.1-4). Even if God imparted knowledge by audible sounds, some inner illumination would be required to make the recipient certain that God Himself is speaking.

Theologians commonly teach not only that Christ's human soul enjoyed the beatific vision from the first moment of its creation but also that Christ's human mind was infused with the highest possible degree of natural and supernatural knowledge. Texts like that of Luke 2.52 are referred either to the external manifestation of this knowledge or to Christ's experimental knowledge, viz, that acquired through the medium of His mental faculties and bodily senses.

Before human evolution came to be widely accepted, Adam was generally cited as another instance where natural knowledge was infused. Created in the full bloom of manhood, so the argument went, he must be endowed with such knowledge as befitted his status as head of the human race. This would include not only the primitive supernatural revelation but also at least such natural knowledge as a mature man would require. But if man is viewed in an evolutionary context, the need for infused natural knowledge is less apparent. Since man's mental development, however, is ordinarily linguistically conditioned, where no previous language existed some infused knowledge would still seem to be required.

Infused knowledge frequently figures in the rich and varied speculations of scholastic philosophers and theologians as to how angelic spirits or departed souls communicate with one another or acquire new knowledge, particularly about the material universe.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 1.1:371; 8.2:2028; 14.2:1653–57. THOMAS AQUINAS, Studia theologiae, 3a, 11. Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. Fathers of the Society of Jesus, Professors of the Theological Faculties in Spain, 4 v. (Madrid), v. 1 (5th ed. 1962), v. 2 (3d ed. 1958), v. 3 (4th ed. 1961), v. 4 (4th ed. 1962); Biblioteca de autores cristianos (Madrid 1945–) 3:1, 265–304.

[A. B. WOLTER]

KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF

Knowledge is a most ordinary human experience, while at the same time it is a most mysterious one. We know instinctively what it is, but we cannot clearly define it. With eyes open at day, we see countless objects. We know them; we hear, smell, taste, and touch things; we imagine some and remember others. We make affirmations and denials; we plan for the future; we try to solve problems. All the time, we are aware of doing these things, thus we are conscious of the many forms of knowing that can occupy the human mind: sense knowledge, both exterior (seeing and hearing) and interior (imagining and remembering); and intellectual knowledge, both direct (affirming, reasoning) and indirect or reflexive (awareness of affirming or of reasoning).

Acquisition of Knowledge. How do we acquire such knowledge? Philosophers do not agree on an answer (see KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF). Here we consider only the Thomistic explanation of the origin of knowledge, first discussing this as a simple approximation to the thought of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, then correcting and deepening the explanation in the light of recent scholarship and a more penetrating study of Aquinas's doctrine.

Sense Knowledge and Abstraction. According to some exponents of THOMISM, all human knowledge comes entirely from the SENSES. Through the senses, especially those of seeing and of hearing, man knows many material objects. For example, I have seen countless trees in my life. They have provided me with sensationsgreen, hard; with perceptions—this maple tree, that oak; and with the IDEA of tree—a woody perennial with a single trunk—that is universal and applies to all trees, here and everywhere, present, past, and future, real and possible. How does one pass from many concrete, individual trees, all different, to a single and universal idea of tree? Through the process of ABSTRACTION, which may be explained as follows: The countless trees we know have some characteristics in common, whereas other characteristics belong only to one tree, or to a few trees. We drop the latter characteristics, keeping only those that are found in every tree. This seems to imply that the universal idea of tree is present in every perception of a tree, but hidden under many characteristics that do not strictly belong to it. We remove these accidental characteristics; we extract or abstract from the individual image or perception the underlying universal idea.

As a rough approximation, this interpretation is correct, but it can easily be taken in an empirical way, implying that man's INTELLIGENCE is merely passive in the formation of ideas. Such an empiricism logically leads to materialism, for if the intelligence receives its ideas passively from the material objects of sense experience, it must be a material power. How can material objects act upon an immaterial faculty? If the reply is that human intelligence is not merely passive, since it actively abstracts the universal idea from the senses or from the phantasm, that reply raises another difficulty. If to abstract means to make a choice between common features that will be kept in the universal idea and accidental features that will be dropped, this supposes that the intellect knows all the features among which it must choose. This idea implies that man's intellect knows the singular, material individual; that it is directly affected by the concrete, material aspects of reality. This is not the teaching of Aquinas.

Activity of Intellect. A closer study of St. Thomas's thought reveals his position to be as follows: The human INTELLECT is not a purely passive faculty in the formation of ideas, but contributes something of its own. With everything it comes to know, man's intelligence affirms that it is something, a being. A fuller description of that being comes from the senses. Thus it follows that man does not attain the universal idea gradually and inductively, as described above. The first contact of intelligence with a material object produces at once a universal idea. This might be simply the idea of "something big and green." Such a concept is actually a composite of intellectual and sense data. It is a universal idea, for it applies to an indefinite number of possible objects, yet it can be particularized by a pointing finger that says, in effect: "Something big and green, over there." We see, therefore, that abstraction does not involve the extraction of a thing's hidden ESSENCE from its many accidental features, but rather the fact of referring a unity supplied by the intellect to a multiplicity offered by the senses.

Types of Knowledge. Man's knowledge involves both sensation and intellect, and these two elements always go together. Man never has a sensation without a corresponding idea; he never has an idea without a sensation or image that is the residue of former sensations.

SENSATION gives man knowledge of concrete aspects or qualities of individual, material objects, e.g., colors, sounds, and odors. When such qualities are organized so as to constitute a unity in space and time, the result is a PERCEPTION. For instance, I perceive this house, that man. Such perceptions are stored away in the IMAGINA-TION and the memory. Thus, even when I do not see the house before my eyes, I may have a distinct individual representation of it—an image that I may recognize as referring to a real house previously perceived—known as a memory image.

When I perceive, imagine, or remember a tree, I can also say: "That is a tree." This statement itself represents intellectual knowledge. It implies that I have a CONCEPT of tree; even though I refer at present to this individual oak, my perception applies equally to innumerable other trees, and thus is universal (see UNIVERSALS). Also, when I state: "This is a tree," I affirm something. I perform an act of JUDGMENT, the central act of human knowledge affirming (or denying) something of something else; this reflects my contact with extramental reality, for it states that an objective state of affairs corresponds to my subjective representation.

Immateriality. The previous section described lower to higher types of knowledge. It is also useful to start by considering knowledge first as it occurs in God. For a Thomist, God not only possesses knowledge; He is knowledge. In other words, God is consciousness; He is supreme and fully luminous self-awareness, and since God is also infinite and pure BEING, it follows that being in its fullness is consciousness, self-awareness, and knowledge. Looking at knowledge from this viewpoint, we no longer ask: How is it possible that some beings know? Instead we ask: How is it possible that some beings do not know? Since God, who is infinite being, is also infinite knowledge, being and knowledge seem to go together, and this is so. The degree of knowledge a being possesses corresponds to the degree of being with which it is endowed. The more it is being, the more and the better it knows. Conversely, whatever limits the being of things limits also their power of knowing, but being is limited by POTENCY, especially the potency known as MATTER. Thus, the more a being is material, the weaker is its power of knowing. The basis of all knowledge is therefore IMMATERIALITY.

This may be further explained as follows. By and of itself being is self-luminous and conscious. When more and more limited by matter, it gradually loses this self-luminosity. Because animals are more material than men, their knowledge is inferior to human knowledge, while plants, being even more material than animals, possess no knowledge, although even they have some activities that are akin to knowing, such as their ability to collect from the soil and air exactly what they need for life and growth, building the specialized tissues needed for their vital activities.

Form in Knowledge. In the act of knowledge, two features require explanation: immanence and objectivity.

Immanence obtains when the object as known exists in some way in the mind of the knowing subject. Objectivity is the feature of knowledge by which the object is recognized as existing outside the knowing subject and as distinct from it.

Immanence. Thomists explain the immanence of knowledge as follows: Every material object possesses many forms—usually one substantial form and a multiplicity of acccidental forms. The substantial FORM makes the object be what it is, whereas the accidental forms make it be such and such a thing of this kind. Thus, a young black cat is a cat because of its substantial form, and it is young and black because of its accidental forms of age and color. In the process of cognition, these forms, while existing physically or ontologically in the extramental object, enter the knowing subject and become, intentionally, his own forms. They do not become the forms of that subject physically, since this would make the subject become ontologically whatever he knows-e.g., a man would thus become a young black cat-but the forms become intentionally his, and he becomes intentionally whatever he knows.

This phenomenon is referred to as the intentional presence of the object in the knowing subject. Intentional is here not opposed to real, but rather to physical. While forms are really present in the knowing subject, they are in that subject not as the subject is in its natural reality, but they inform it as it is actually in the act of knowing. Intentional existence is the existence of something in a knowing power precisely as such. St. Thomas explains that this presence differs from the presence of an accident in the substance that underlies it, and from the presence of the substantial form in primary matter. Both the union of substance and accident and that of form and matter result in a third reality differing from its two components. The intentional union, however, is more intimate. Through it the faculty becomes the other, as other, while still remaining itself; through it the subject knows the other as other. The forms that come to be intentionally present in knowing faculties are known as intentional species (see SPECIES, INTENTIONAL; INTENTIONALITY).

Objectivity. The problem of OBJECTIVITY has attracted less attention than immanence in traditional Thomism. The intentional species explains how the knower becomes in some way what he knows. Yet, since the forms thus become his own forms, it seems that he should know them as his own; what requires explanation is how, through them, he can know the other as other, i.e., as non-subject, as object.

It is not enough to say that the subject is aware that these forms come from objects outside, for this begs the question. He knows that they come from objects outside only because he knows such objects as "not himself"; how then does he know them as "not himself"? Again, it is not enough to appeal to the physical CAUSALITY of the object upon the knowing power. Such causality is undeniable, at least on the sense level, but it does not fall directly under conscious awareness.

To answer the question, one must distinguish the objectivity of the sense powers from that of the intellect. It seems evident, from their behavior, that animals are aware of objects, i.e., of things as distinct from themselves, yet they do not seem to know objects as objects; they are not aware of things in their environment as distinct in being from themselves. Several reasons lead to this conclusion. First, to know things as different entities from themselves, animals must know being as such; but the senses do not attain being formally as being, but in a material way. Next, to know objects as objects and nonsubjects, animals must be aware of themselves as subjects; but to know oneself as a subject supposes reflection, which is proper to spiritual faculties. Finally, if animals knew objects as such, they would designate them, refer to them, give them names; they would talk and use language.

Animal vs. Human Objectivity. How then do animals know that things are distinct from themselves? It seems that they know objects only as spatially distinct from their own bodies. Kant's explanation of this kind of objectivity is that space is the a priori form of external sensation. While maintaining, against him, that real space exists outside knowing subjects, we can agree that space as man knows and sees it-the dimensions in which material objects are contained—is an a priori form. Animals, too, must have such an a priori intuition of space. By that intuition an animal notices that objects occupy positions that are not its own position, and thus knows them as spatially distinct from itself. Man has great difficulty in understanding such mere spatial objectivity because, although he too perceives it in sense perception, for him it is always backed by an ontological distinction that is discerned by his intellect.

How this ontological distinction can be known has been explained by Joseph MARÉCHAL, who accounts for the objectivity of human knowledge by the dynamism of the intellect. Knowledge does not simply happen to man's intellect. The intellect wants to know; it has an appetite for the forms of objects and strives toward cognition of these forms; but the term of its striving is known as other, distinguished from the striving subject, and thus is objectified. Objects are known as such, as ontologically distinct from man, because their forms fulfill the intellect's natural appetite for being and intelligibility.

Knowledge of Knowing. Man not only knows objects, he also knows that he knows them. He is aware of being aware, conscious that he is conscious. This fact, important in that many thinkers insist upon it as the note that distinguishes man from animals, is undeniable. He who attempts to deny it, affirms it in his very denial; for how can he know that he does not know, except that, in examining his own knowledge—and thus knowing it—he does not discover in it any self-knowledge?

Knowledge of knowing is a special kind of knowledge. It is intuitive; that is, it uses no intermediary concepts (see INTUITION). Man knows the universal nature of tree or of justice only in, and through, the concept of tree or of justice. On the other hand, when he is aware that he knows, he does so directly and immediately, without a species expressa or a concept. The fact that man possesses such complete self-reflection constitutes the best proof of the immateriality of the human intellect, and also of the immateriality of the human soul (see REFLECTION; SOUL, HUMAN, IMMORTALITY OF).

See Also: KNOWLEDGE; EPISTEMOLOGY.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a, 14; 54–58; 84–89. J. F. DONCEEL, Philosophical Psychology (2d ed., rev. New York 1961). R. E. BRENNAN, Thomistic Psychology (New York 1941). J. E. ROYCE, Man and His Nature (New York 1961). H. REITH, An Introduction to Philosophical Psychology (Engelwood Cliffs, N.J. 1956). P. ROUSSELOT, The Intellectualism of Saint Thomas, tr. J. E. O'MAHONY (London 1935). B. J. F. LONERGAN, Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (New York 1957).

[J. F. DONCEEL]

KNOWLEDGE, SOCIOLOGY OF

The study of the relation between products of the mind and existential conditions. The basic assumption of the study is that the development of thought is not independent of the concrete situation in which it takes place. This connection being assumed, the sociology of knowledge aims at defining its nature, whether in general terms or with reference to specific events. The field, therefore, embraces both a theory and a method of investigation; in either case, it differs from disciplines such as EPISTEMOL-OGY and ETHICS that focus their attention on the internal coherence, logical antecedents, and final value of a given system. The sociological approach shifts the focus from the intrinsic validity to the external origin and consequences of knowledge, from the objective content of a proposition to the subjective dispositions of its proponents. The distinction between the two approaches is certainly not easy; not seldom one finds sociologists moving from premises and reaching conclusions that are proper to the philosophy of knowledge (see KNOWLEDGE, THEO-RIES OF).

Sometimes studies in this field give the term knowledge so broad a meaning as to make it virtually equivalent to CULTURE (in the anthropological sense). So understood, the sociology of knowledge tends to encompass in its object all kinds of mental products, from folklore to law and technology. In this sense, it may include the contributions of the French school, e.g., Émile DURKHEIM (1858–1917), Lucien Lévy-Bruhl (1857–1939), Marcel Mauss (1872–1950), and Marcel Granet (1884–1940), which investigated the correspondence between mentality and social structures, especially among primitives.

Central Problem. In principle, there is no reason why sociological analysis should be limited to one rather than to another type of knowledge; except for certain forms of mysticism, learning and COMMUNICATION always occur in a social situation and can, therefore, be analyzed in terms of the concrete conditions of their occurrence. In point of fact, however, students have concentrated mostly on political thought, economic doctrines, social ethics—in a word, on knowledge that implies systematic value judgments with respect to interpersonal relations and human institutions in industrial society.

Two reasons, one theoretical, the other historical, may explain the tendency to concentrate on the history of social thought. It is generally assumed that natural and mathematical sciences are relatively independent of the historical situations in which they develop, at least insofar as the very content of the scientific propositions is concerned. Historically, the sociology of knowledge is rooted in the works of social philosophers and reformers whose main concern has not been to institute a systematic analysis of knowledge as such, but to prove the dependence of political ideologies on class interests and economic structures. This trend is best expressed in the writings of Karl MARX (1818–83) and Friedrich ENGELS (1820–95). Actually, the Marxian doctrine of the ideology as a superstructure has played a determining role in the emergence and the initial orientation of the sociology of knowledge. This influence explains also the original tendency to correlate the development of thought with socioeconomic factors much more than with natural conditions, with the cultural milieu rather than the physical environment. Special importance is attributed to a thinker's identification with a status group, whether based on education, prestige, wealth, political power, ethnic or religious affiliation.

All these factors—physical, demographic, economic, sociocultural—constitute the "existential conditions" involved in the development of thought. The most controversial point in the sociology of knowledge is the definition of the nature of this relation. For some, the relation is strictly causal; for others, it is functional or merely symbolic. Often enough, the same author uses different and ill-defined words, such as "correspondence," without giving a definite interpretation of this relation, either theoretically or—even less—on the basis of substantive findings. On the whole, the tendency has been to stress much more the dependence of thought on the existential conditions rather than the reverse side of the relation. With the passing of the years, however, the tendency has been to interpret this dependency less and less in a deterministic way; this trend coincides with a progressive shift from a philosophical to a stricter empirical approach.

Development. The problems raised by the sociology of knowledge are very old; one could trace them back to Francis BACON (1561–1626) and his famous theory of the Idola or even further to the SOPHISTS' interpretation of the social origin of law and religion. Formally, however, the very name of the discipline first appeared at the beginning of the 20th century, in an article by Wilhelm Jerusalem, "Soziologie des Erkennens" (Die Zukunft, May 1909). The most significant contributions belong to the period between the two world wars; they are mostly in German, and prefer the name Wissens-soziologie. Particularly important are the works of Max SCHELER (1874–1928) and Karl Mannheim (1893–1947).

Scheler rejected the Marxian theory of the complete dependence of thought on economic conditions; at the same time, he decried the idealistic view of history as the constant unfolding of the Mind. For him there could be no one-way dependence but only an orderly interaction between the "ideal factors" (the realm of transcendental values) and the "real factors" (racial, economic, demographic, and political conditions). He defined the sociology of knowledge as the study of such interaction as has actually occurred in specific historical periods, and he found most appropriate to this investigation the phenomenological approach of Edmund HUSSERL (1859–1938), intended to detect the incarnation of the essence (Wesen) in the concrete existence (Dasein). Scheler's works, including his Versuche einer Soziologie des Wissens (1924), are philosophical rather than sociological in orientation.

Mannheim is probably the best-known exponent of the discipline, especially for his Ideologie und Utopie (1929). He combined in his eclectic system the Marxian views with the spiritual trends of German HISTORICISM. He saw all political thought, the proletarian no less than the bourgeois, as existentially conditioned. To him this "total conception" of ideology did not necessarily invalidate the objectivity of knowledge, since each social group develops a particular Weltanschauung that is neither false nor entirely true; full truth, he believed, would come from the synthesis of the various points of view.

Ideologies aim at maintaining well-established positions; the "utopia," on the contrary, is a doctrine promoting social progress, a prophecy embodied in a powerful historical movement. In his view, the rise of SCIENTISM marked the end of the utopian mentality, hence the risk of stagnation. The sociology of knowledge therefore had a twofold function: to understand the idea systems relative to the various groups and epochs and to restore confidence in the transforming role of ideas in history. Mannheim considered these two functions to be strictly intertwined, so that the same discipline could appear as both an objective method of investigation and a new philosophy of social renewal; each function (verstehen or erklären) he assigned to a socially free elite (eine freischwebende Intelligenz) having a role in many respects similar to that of the Marxian proletariat.

In the U.S., the sociology of knowledge gained status after 1930, as a result of the translation of German studies and some original works, such as P. A. Sorokin's Social and Cultural Dynamics (4 v. New York 1937-41). Sorokin's work offers two significant features: a theoretical stand for the dependence of socioeconomic structures on the major value premises in a given culture and a methodological effort to analyze statistically the cultural products of several centuries in order to detect the types of value orientation prevailing in the various epochs. It is difficult to say how much American sociology has contributed to the field, since much research may bear on the problems of the sociology of knowledge without being formally included under the name or within the theoretical framework of the discipline. In this respect, it is possible to cite studies of mass communication; social stratification; cultural change; and, in general, research on one or the other aspect of knowledge, e.g., the sociology of law, RELIGION, art, or education. As a whole, American contributions to this sociological field are mostly methodological, intended to supply a better definition of basic concepts (e.g., existential condition, cultural integration, ideology) and a better definition of particular areas of investigation in order to test the sweeping generalizations that characterized the beginnings of the sociology of knowledge.

Bibliography: F. ADLER, "The Range of Sociology of Knowledge," in Modern Sociological Theory in Continuity and Change, ed. H. BECKER and A. BOSKOFF (New York 1957) ch. 13. H. O. DAHLKE, "The Sociology of Knowledge," in Contemporary Social Theory, ed. H. E. BARNES et al. (New York 1940) ch. 4. P. KEC-SKEMETI, "Introduction" to K. MANNHEIM, Essays on the Sociology of Knowledge (New York 1952). J. J. MAQUET, The Sociology of Knowledge: Its Structure and Its Relation to the Philosophy of Knowledge, tr. J. F. LOCKE (Boston 1951) with bibliog. R. K. MER-TON, Social Theory and Social Structure (Glencoe, Ill. 1957) ch. 12–13. W. STARK, The Sociology of Knowledge: An Essay in Aid of a Deeper Understanding of the History of Ideas (Glencoe, Ill. 1958). L. WIRTH, "Preface" to K. MANNHEIM, Ideology and Utopia:

An Introduction to the Sociology of Knowledge, tr. L. WIRTH and E. A. SHILS (New York 1936). P. BERGER and T. LUCKMANN, "Sociology of Religion and Sociology of Knowledge," in Sociology and Social Research 47 (1962–63) 417–427. P. L. BERGER and T. LUCKMAN, The Social Construction of Reality (Garden City, N.Y. 1966).

[P. TUFARI]

KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF

Theory of knowledge is an area of philosophical speculation concerned with the nature, conditions, and/or first principles of knowledge in general and also, according to some authors, with the truth-value, or reliability, of knowledge in general. The expression "theory of knowledge" is used interchangeably with the term EPIS-TEMOLOGY by some authors, but others, particularly in Europe, mean something else by the latter term—usually a critique of modern scientific knowledge (cf. Enciclopedia filosofica 1:1942). Theory of knowledge is among the more controversial areas in philosophy, there being serious disagreement among the different philosophical traditions over the selection and correct formulation of the problems to be considered. Disagreement exists also over the question of whether theory of knowledge should precede and control, or follow and be controlled by, METAPHYSICS and psychology.

Scholastic philosophers generally prefer the second alternative, both because their conception of being and knowing requires that a theory of knowledge rest on something more basic than itself, and also because there is a strong tendency, discoverable in history, for the first alternative to lead to some kind of skepticism.

This article traces the historical development of theories of knowledge from early times to the present, treating successively of the Greek origins of the problem, medieval theories of knowledge, knowledge in modern thought, and contemporary views of knowledge. Systematic analyses, from the viewpoint of scholastic philosophy, of various problems associated with the theory of knowledge are treated elsewhere (see KNOWLEDGE; SENSE KNOWLEDGE; CERTITUDE; TRUTH).

Greek Origins of the Problem

Like many problems in philosophy, the problem of knowledge received its earliest formulation and a variety of solutions among the Greeks, the most important of whom include Parmenides, Democritus, Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle.

Parmenides. Questions concerning the nature and conditions of knowledge first assumed importance in the philosophy of PARMENIDES (fl. c. 485 B.C.). Parmenides's predecessors had concerned themselves, from the very beginning of GREEK PHILOSOPHY (c. 585 B.C.), with cosmological questions concerning the basic material from which the familiar things of experience are made and concerning the process whereby such things undergo change. That there is a plurality of things undergoing change these thinkers took as an obvious fact. The starting point of Parmenides's thought seems also to have been this plurality, but he found that a more basic affirmation about reality is that it exists. Being is and nonbeing is not. Determined to discover the ultimate implications of this intuition, Parmenides said that being cannot come to be (since being "is" and what "is" cannot come to be) and must therefore be eternal, in the sense of beginningless. Moreover, change must be an appearance only, since change means becoming, and neither being (because it simply "is") nor nonbeing (because it is nothingness) can become. In a conclusion that influenced the subsequent history of Greek thought about being and knowledge, Parmenides declared that being is eternal and changeless.

This intuition controls Parmenides's theory of knowledge. Corresponding to the duality that he introduces between being (or true reality) and appearances, he also introduces a duality between knowledge, the object of which is being and in which alone is to be found truth, and another, corrupted or limited kind of cognition called doxai (Gr. δόξαι), a term often translated, somewhat misleadingly, as "opinions," that rather means one's perceptions of the plural and changing appearances of being. A similar duality is introduced by Parmenides between reasoning, which, because it achieves knowledge about true reality, is the higher way; and sensation, which, tied down to the appearances of plurality and change, leads to perplexity and poor discernment. The ordinary cognition of all men is one in which knowledge and doxai are mixed, and it is only in rare moments of inspiration and illumination that men-a few men-have cognitions in which things are seen from the standpoint of the timelessness and changelessness of being.

Atomists and Sophists. The theory of knowledge of the Greek atomistic school (5th century B.C.) was a continuation of Parmenides's doctrine on knowledge, in spite of the fact that, at first glance, a world conceived in terms of a plurality of atoms would seem to have little in common with the Parmenidean world. The best known representative of this school, DEMOCRITUS of Abdera, distinguishing between reality (eternal and changeless atoms moving through the void) and appearances (the changing configurations of atom-groups making up the familiar world), concluded that, since no one perceives the atoms, knowledge of reality is impossible. One has only doxai, which were explained as private sensations resulting from atoms impinging upon the cognitive organs.

While Democritus's theory of knowledge restricted cognition to doxai, his Parmenidean background was strong enough to move him to regard such cognition as superficial and second best; a genuine knowledge of true reality, were it possible, would be better. It was left for the SOPHISTS to take the logical step of declaring that, if doxai alone constitute the cognition possible for man, then there is hardly any basis for depreciating and regarding as second best this kind of cognition. Among the Sophists, Protagoras (c. 49 to 420 B.C.) eliminated the Parmenidean notion of truth—i.e., stable knowledge of eternal, changeless being—on the ground that it was useless and therefore quite irrelevant in the matter of living one's life wisely and well. Truth, therefore, if it is to be found anywhere, will have to be found in one's everchanging doxai, one's perceptions of the appearances. This doctrine was taken by some to mean that the way in which things happen to appear to an individual is the way they actually are, for him, and that therefore truth is relative to each individual.

Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. Against this background, SOCRATES, whose chief interest was virtue (identified, for him, with knowing how to live wisely and well), saw that the Sophists' notion of truth made virtue impossible, since ever-changing doxai provided no dependable guides for living well. Accordingly, Socrates sought to discover from the changing, particular appearances of things some permanent and universally valid meanings in terms of which there could be a genuine knowledge of being and hence some basis for making wise decisions.

Socrates's project was carried further by his major disciple PLATO, who agreed that doxai were not a satisfactory guide for living well. Only genuine knowledge could be a satisfactory guide. Accepting the Parmenidean doctrine that knowledge means knowledge of being and that being is eternal and changeless, Plato concluded that behind the familiar world of changing sensible things appearances-there is an archetypal world of Forms (Ideas) which, eternal and changeless, provide the stability needed for objects of knowledge. In spite of the everchanging character of the material world about which there can be only doxai, genuine knowledge of permanent and universally valid meanings—and therefore a basis for making wise decisions—is possible, because of the existence of the Forms. These Forms were said by Plato to be known by the soul prior to its imprisonment in the body, and during its earthly life the soul's knowledge is simply recollection.

ARISTOTLE, while agreeing with Parmenides and Plato that stability is a necessary requisite for an object of knowledge, rejected Plato's tendency to locate this stability in a separate world of Forms and insisted that, since all knowledge begins with sensible things, there must be something stable in these themselves. This was explained in terms of the Aristotelian hylomorphic doctrine, according to which every sensible substance is a composite of a determinable principle (matter) in virtue of which the substance can change, and a determining principle (form) in virtue of which the substance is what it is (see MATTER AND FORM). Accordingly, while a sensible substance can change, nevertheless to the extent that it "is" it is stable; hence it is being and is knowable—its stability, being, and knowableness resulting from its form. The knower's knowledge was explained by Aristotle in terms of the knower abstracting the form of the known object, so that the knower's knowledge is not something that represents the known object; it actually is the known object (see AB-STRACTION).

Later Greeks. Among later Greek philosophers, the Stoics viewed knowledge as consisting in impressions on the soul brought about through sense perceptions of particular things. The Epicureans located truth basically in sensation, which they reduced, after the manner of Democritus, to particles striking the cognitive organs. The Skeptics repudiated all claims to knowledge and truth, but their skepticism was aimed at destroying philosophies and not at paralyzing practical life.

See Also: SKEPTICISM; PYRRHONISM; CYNICS; STOICISM; EPICUREANISM; NEOPLATONISM.

Bibliography: General introductions. A. H. ARMSTRONG, An Introduction to Ancient Philosophy (Westminster, Maryland 1957). J. BURNET, Greek Philosophy: Thales to Plato (London 1914; reprint 1932). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy: v.1: Greece and Rome (Westminster, Maryland 1946; 2d ed. 1950). J. OWENS, A History of Ancient Western Philosophy (New York 1959). J. I. BEARE, Greek Theories of Elementary Cognition from Alcmaeon to Aristotle (Oxford 1906). Particular philosophers. G. VLASTOS, "Parmenides' Theory of Knowledge," American Philological Association, Transactions and Proceedings 77 (1946) 66-77. Plato's Theory of Knowledge, tr. F. M. CORNFORD (London 1935). N. GUL-LEY, Plato's Theory of Knowledge (New York 1962). W. D. ROSS, Plato's Theory of Ideas (Oxford 1951); Aristotle (5th ed. London 1953) 136-165, 215-21. M. M. PATRICK, The Greek Sceptics (New York 1929). M. DE CORTE, La Doctrine de l'intelligence chez Aristote (Paris 1934).

[F. R. ELLIS]

Medieval Theories of Knowledge

From such origins in Greek philosophy, theories of knowledge were extensively developed by the early medievals and the schoolmen. Under the sway of Platonism, writers such as St. Augustine, Boethius, St. Anselm, and Abelard set the stage for the later scholastic theories. Aristotle's influence, transmitted by Arab thinkers such as Avicenna and Averroës, added a further dimension to medieval thought. These currents fused in the hochscholastik period, and brought forth various solutions to the problem of knowledge, as proposed principally by St. Bonaventure, St. Thomas Aquinas, John Duns Scotus, and William of Ockham.

Christian Platonists. Like Aristotle, medieval scholars inherited a noetic that derived from Plato and, often enough, succeeded in becoming Aristotelians without altogether ceasing to be Platonists. Knowledge, for instance, was specified by its certitude. The stability of knowledge, they were tempted to think, must be founded on the object known, but the changing singular seemed a poor candidate for the role. Still, permanent structures are discerned in things. To grasp their essences, a Platonic mind has but to concentrate forces that are weakened when dispersed among sensibles. A Platonic being is intelligible of itself and hardly needs modification by the intellect. What is required is rather an ethical purification of the one who knows.

St. Augustine. St. AUGUSTINE surmounted a crisis of skepticism in his youth with the reflection that to err is to exist and to reject an error is to proclaim truth (Civ. 11.26; Lib. arb. 2.3.7). He urged the mind in search of true knowledge to turn from deceptive externals and to collect her forces, to enter within herself where the mind must recognize that she is under the rule of a higher light (Vera relig. 39.72), that truth is the mind's discovery, not her construction (Doctr. christ. 2.32.50; Lib. arb. 2.12.34; Civ. 11.25), and that this higher light, one for all minds, inferior to nothing, and eternally immutable, is an illumination that flows from and reveals God (Lib. arb. 2.13.36–37). Although St. Paul is an indispensable guide into the mysteries of ultimate truth (Conf. 7.21.27), Plato can teach man to turn within and to allow love, the "weight" of the soul (Epist. 157.2.9; Conf. 13.9.10), to bear her above the dissipation of sensual involvement. Sensation is much more a matter of the soul's attention than of corporeal passivity (Musica 6.5.9).

St. Augustine proposes a crucial role for memory. With mind and will, a Trinitarian vestige in man, memory renders the eternal exemplars accessible to the mind (Trin. 12.15:25). Citing Vergil to show that there can be a memory of the present (ibid. 14.11.14), Augustine holds that by memory man retains the past and also sees the present in the light of the exemplars to which the apex of the soul is always present. But he is careful to disclaim a prior existence of the human soul (Civ. 11.23; Retract. 1.4.4).

Boethius. BOETHIUS claimed that he had cultivated what Augustine had sown (Trin.), but to say nothing of his personal genius, he added to his knowledge of Plato a technical training in the philosophy of Aristotle and, despite (or perhaps because of) his knowledge of both, thought they could be reconciled (Lib. de interp. ed. 2.2). Knowledge is proportioned to the capacity of the knower (Consol. 5 prosa 4, 6) and also to the object known (In Porphy. dial. 1; Trin.), for knowledge is possible only to the extent that knower and known can coincide in their grade of being. The object of man's highest knowledge is the "intellectible," a term coined by Boethius to designate what is one and the same of itself, always consistent in its own divinity, and never grasped by sense, but only by mind and intellect (In Porphy. dial. 1).

The second level of knowledge and thus of being is that of the "intelligibles." Here man proceeds "by thought and understanding concerning the First Intellectible" to grasp the causes of the sublunar sphere and the human soul itself, that soul which, at first an "intellectible," has lost caste by the contamination of body and has become an "intelligible" (ibid.).

A third level of speculative knowledge discerns the natures and attributes of bodies by prescinding from their matter (ibid.). God, the object of theology, the supreme degree of speculative knowledge, is approached by man in "intellectual" fashion (intellectualiter). Intelligible objects, superior to bodies although in contact with them, are approached by way of "discipline" (disciplinaliter), the rationalizing proper to man; a procedure that results in mathematics. Corporeal natures, "rationally" (rationaliter) considered, are the objects of physics (Trin.). Because he has fallen, man cannot know without rationalizing; but because he is a fallen god, an "intellectible," he need not despair of wisdom.

In sensation, the soul is active (Consol. 5.4 prosa 5) and, taken to the letter, Boethius more than once invoked the preexistence of souls to explain knowledge (Consol. 3.11 prosa 12; In Porphy. dial. 1). But these remarks are in the spirit of Platonic myth-making, inspired by man's present state, rather than descriptions of the historic past.

Erigena. One of the most daring applications of dialectic to Christian faith is that of JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA: since to know God is salvation, ignorance must be the same as damnation (De praed. 17.9). Because nature is "everything that is and everything that is not" (De div. nat. 1), the knowledge of nature is radically theological. "Nature creating, but not created" is God, the divine Ideas are "nature creating and created." The World is "nature, not creating, but created" and the goal of the great return, when God will be all in all, is God qualified as "nature neither creating nor created" (ibid.). Thus all knowledge, with all being, is treated under the title "On the Division of Nature."

St. Anselm. By his use of the old truth that God is "that than which a greater cannot be conceived" to establish that God necessarily exists, ANSELM OF CANTERBURY posed a sign of contradiction for all succeeding speculation. For those who accept his world, the Proslogion argument is irrefutable, but for those who live in another world, the reasoning remains unconvincing (see ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT). This means less than Anselm had a strange theory of truth and knowledge, than that his consciousness of reasoning in the presence of truth and its participations rendered all theories superfluous. Unparticipated truth is being itself, and Anselm's world is no more a world of beings than a world of truths.

Peter Abelard. ABELARD came to the problem of knowledge impressed by the radical singularity of each individual and by man's inability to recognize in a general concept the individuals of which, nonetheless, it can be predicated. Man knows things, it seemed to him, in three ways: by sensation, when a thing is present; by imagination when, in its totality, a thing is the object of the soul's attention; and by intellection, when the soul attends to some detailed aspect of that thing. Like an artist, the knower holds his material with one hand and shapes it with the other. He works over what is grasped by sense or imagination to discern the forms that exist together, but that can be thought apart. Sensation requires corporeal instruments, but is primarily the work of the soul (Logica 'Ingred.,' Gloss. in Perih.).

The Arabian Aristotle. With access to Aristotle, there was a shift in the problematic. No longer deplored as an obstacle to knowledge, sensation was accredited as its sole starting point. At once receptive to what sense can deliver and active in dematerializing that content to fit it for intellectual assimilation, intellect implies two powers. As capable of adaption to the forms of other things, intellect is passive. As capable of rendering the potentially intelligible material singular actually intelligible, intellect is "agent." This much is surely in Aristotle, but where did the Stagirite intend to locate these powers?

Arabian commentators took firm positions where the text of Aristotle left some latitude. The intelligence responsible for providing the human knower with suitably immaterial forms is an astronomical deity, styled by Avicenna the "Giver of Forms" or the "Intellect in effect" and by Averroës, the "Agent Intellect." Both hold it is one for all men.

Avicenna. The soul may be, as Avicenna would have it, the very essence of man (De anim. 1.1), but for all Aristotelians, soul is the form of the body, and here Avicenna betrays some uneasiness with Aristotle. For to be a form of matter, Avicenna remarked, defines a function of the soul rather than its nature (ibid.). As in potency to receive such forms, the intellect of man is "material," by which he meant "passive," not "corporeal." As possessed of forms, but not adverting to them, intellect is "habitual"; as actually knowing that it knows, intellect is "in effect," or, in terms that remind one that intelligible forms come to man from above, it is "borrowed" (accommodatus) and "acquired" (adeptus). "The Giver of Forms, totally and always "in effect," is to our minds what the sun is to our sight." Not only the source of intelligible forms for human intellects, the Giver of Forms has a second right to his title. This Intelligence provides matter under the sphere of the moon with the constituent forms it is prepared to receive and thus brings new beings into existence.

Averroës. Averroës agreed with Avicenna that there is a "passive" intellect by which a man is capable of receiving intelligible forms from above, but this he described as corporeal imagination, destined to perish at the death of the individual who possesses it. The union of the separate Agent Intellect with the passive one engenders a third intellect that Averroës termed "material," since it too is passive. This third intellect is as little the possession of the individual as light reflected from a body is part of that body. Hence there is no ground in the uncorruptibility of intellect for the immortality of the human individual. All that is individual is corruptible, and all that is incorruptible is both radically separate from matter and one for all men. As the Agent Intellect is one for all men, so too the material intellect is one for the entire race. The highest cognitive faculty that pertains to the individual is the corporeally rooted, and therefore perishable, "passive intellect" or "imagination."

If this is the last word of philosophy, then it is a wisdom incompatible with Christian faith in personal immortality. The "prophetic intellect," source of the illumination that has resulted in that "miraculous" work, the Qu'rān, reinforces the decision of modern scholarship that the Three Impostors (Moses, Jesus, and Muḥammad), attributed to Averroés, is a forgery, but it was not enough to defend him from persecution by the Islamic theologians of his own day (In de anima 3.4, 5). See INTELLECT, UNITY OF; DOUBLE TRUTH, THEORY OF; ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY.

Aristotle and the Christians. The dangers implicit in the Arabian development of Aristotelian thought were quickly recognized by the schoolmen of the 13th century. Correctives were soon forthcoming, with various repudiations of Aristotle and with a pronounced revival, in some quarters, of the doctrines of St. Augustine.

St. Bonaventure. His intimate knowledge of Aristotle's text notwithstanding, St. BONAVENTURE was little inclined to abandon the pathways of his Christian masters for those of Aristotle. The content of knowledge as garnered through sensation and the intellect can be described in Aristotelian terms, but certitude specifies genuine knowledge and this, as St. Augustine knew and Aristotle did not know, is the fruit of a divine ILLUMINATION. Neither the created mind that knows, nor the created object known, can be the source of the universality, necessity, and immutability of "certitudinal" knowledge. The divine attributes these terms evoke are the ultimate ground of knowledge (In 2 sent. 7.2.2.1).

Faced with the two-edged risk of ascribing too much to creatures or too much to God, Bonaventure never hesitated to follow the dictates of his piety and to choose the explanation that gives most to God. But not everyone, not even every Franciscan, in the 13th century was content with this solution. Is the divine illumination the same as the general concurrence of God with creatures, or is it a special help? Does divine illumination pertain to the order of nature or to the order of grace? The Franciscans found it increasingly difficult to know with Aristotle and to be certain with Augustine, and the temptation was not always resisted to transfer the problem from philosophy to theology.

St. Thomas Aquinas. The most important of those who declined to accept a piety that exalts the Creator by positing intrinsic deficiencies in creation was St. THOMAS AQUINAS. With the balance that is one of his chief glories, however, he admitted that whether, with Plato and Augustine, one says that the intelligibles are participated from God, or, with Aristotle and himself, that what is participated is the very light that renders things intelligible, "does not matter much" (De spir. creat. 10 ad 8). The light of reason implanted in man by God, the natural power of the human mind that Aristotle had called the "agent intellect," is "as it were, a certain similitude of Uncreated Truth' (De ver. 11.1). As Augustine had found much to christen in Plato, Aguinas found the Aristotelian panoply of knowledge within the created structure of man. Intellect, with its passive and active powers, belongs within the human soul. As truly the form of body for Aquinas as for Aristotle, the soul is the single form of man's being and man is profoundly one, for all his wealth of powers. The human soul is by nature incorruptible and a being (hoc aliquid) in its own right, destined to inform a body, but capable of surviving the dissolution of death because by nature incapable of dissolution.

On the other hand, Aquinas had many reservations on how much man can know. His acceptance of the Aristotelian cosmos, for instance, is provisional; although this is a good account of how things seem (apparentia salvarentur), men may find another that will do as well. For all his "demonstrations," Aristotle was handling as truths what are but hypotheses (In 2 cael. 17). In philosophy, where, in principle, the human intellect "penetrates to the essence" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 31.5), the essential principles, substantial forms—indeed, the essence of even a fly—all remain in fact unknown to man (In 1 anim. 1.15; De spir. creat. 11 ad 3; Symb. 1). The theologian too must resign himself to a modest accomplishment: the most profound moment in his knowledge of God is the realization that men are ignorant of Him (De pot. 7.5 ad 14). Within these limitations, content with knowledge consonant with man's limited being, Aquinas developed both philosophical and theological knowledge.

His successors were less patient. Removing from knowledge whatever fails to meet the highest standard of certitude and working under the shadow of the Parisian condemnations of 1270 and 1277, they relinquished one proposition after another and assigned to belief what they had thought could be known. To preserve what knowledge might be salvaged, they set out on a road that could end only by restricting knowledge to immediate experience.

Scotus and Ockham. John DUNS SCOTUS accepted Aristotelian abstraction, but his "absolute quiddities," known to be real because they move the intellect, a thing that nonbeing cannot do, are traces, it has been said, of the eternal "reasons" of Augustine (Gilson, 766). To his mastery of Aristotle's theory of knowledge, Scotus added a distinction between man's intuitive knowledge of what exists as such and his abstractive knowledge of common natures that, of themselves, remain indifferent to existence. WILLIAM OF OCKHAM borrowed this terminology, but opposed the doctrine.

For Scotus, to have intuitive knowledge of a nonexistent is a contradiction (Rep. Par. 3.14.3.12), whereas for Ockham, the two knowledges differ intrinsically (seipsis different) and it is within the absolute power of God to cause intuitive knowledge of what does not exist in man. This is Ockham's way of saying that it is not a contradiction to have intuitive knowledge of a nonexistent (Quodl. 6.6). Abstractive knowledge cannot be concerned with common natures, for the Ockhamist reason that they are gratuitous constructions, unfounded in the real world. Ockham reserves abstractive knowledge for man's grasp of the objects he represents to himself in their absence. Owing to the absolute divine power, even intuitive knowledge is open to the danger of error. If this is so, man's last resource is not even theology. It is faith, as faith was Ockham's final resort. Because faith and knowledge are not identical, their marriage had been possible, but now men began to refuse the name of knowledge to whatever falls short of the absolute certitude possibly only to Absolute Spirit (Pieper, 145). Noetic fatigue could hardly go further.

See Also: DIALECTICS IN THE MIDDLE AGES; UNIVERSALS.

Bibliography: É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). J. PIEPER, Scholasticism, tr. R. and C. WINSTON (New York 1960). R. P. MCKEON, ed. Selections from Medieval Philosophers, 2 v. (New York 1929–30). WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, Philosophical Writings, ed. P. BOEHNER (New York 1957).

[E. A. SYNAN]

Knowledge in Modern Thought

Modern philosophy, commonly regarded as having begun with René Descartes (1596-1650), developed theories of knowledge having all the characteristics of the new scientific age. Descartes and G. W. Leibniz tried to reduce the complexities of human understanding to basic formulae; British empiricists tried to restrict human knowledge to only what could be measured and empirically observed. Even Immanuel Kant was deeply impressed by the creative scientific hypothesis that apparently brought understanding of reality and explained experience without being based on it; and, in his elaborate theory of knowledge described in The Critique of Pure Reason (1781), Kant presented human knowledge as taking place largely through a priori forms that shape the human understanding and differentiate it from the divine. For G. W. F. Hegel consciousness evolving in rich complexity ultimately constitutes the divine; and this theme was developed in the 19th century by A. Schopenhauer and others.

Descartes and Leibniz. In the philosophy of René DESCARTES, the act of knowledge is central. Seeking a solid basis for his entire system and through a methodic doubt questioning the existence of everything he could not know with certitude, he finally selected his consciousness of thinking as the most self-evident and irrefutable principle possible. "I think, therefore I am." But, if his own existence was implied by his thought, then he must be a substance whose whole nature or essence was thought. "I realized," he writes, "that this substance of myself had no need of a place or any material thing in order to exist. The result was that I,-that is, the soul by which I am what I am-is entirely distinct from my body." Unsettled too by the obscurity of sensation, Descartes rejected the reports given by the senses about the world. Man must believe the world is real; he possesses no demonstrable certitude of its reality.

Gottfried Wilhelm LEIBNIZ continued the same philosophical development. Discoverer of the infinitesimal calculus, Leibniz was attracted by the rigor of the mathematical method of deduction from definitions. Why, he asked, cannot this method be applied to metaphysics as well as to mathematics? Asserting that man's notions of substance, cause, and unity arise out of interior reflection (rather than from sense experience), Leibniz thought that all knowledge of the world could be explained if one conceived of all bodies as being composed of monads, i.e., immaterial, animated units depending directly upon God for existence. The soul and body, although composed of different kinds of monads, work in harmony, forming one being. Man's concept of space arises from the thought of monads coexisting in some relationship; his concept of time arises from the notion of events happening together or successively. Briefly, the world could be best understood, not through sense experience, but through reflection upon the nature of the MONAD and its infinite possibility of order and perfection under divine direction.

Hobbes and Locke. The British empiricists reacted against such reasoning. To Thomas HOBBES, all philosophy begins with sense experience, and philosophy's only function is to explain it. Universal ideas cannot be abstracted from experience; they are simply common names standing for particular things. Colors, sounds, odors, and other qualities are subjective and nonscientific, since they have significance only to an individual, stimulated sensory organ. The "objective" world of bodies in motion is meaningful since they can be measured. Surprisingly, Hobbes speaks of human willing as a form of motion, and describes degrees of human intelligence as traceable to differences in dynamic forces.

Another Englishman, John LOCKE, shared Hobbes's conviction that philosophy should begin with sense experience, but, unlike Hobbes, he did not think that it should end there. Making the nature of human knowledge the central focus of his philosophy (his principal work was Essay concerning Human Understanding), Locke denied that any ideas are innate. Man's concepts of space and time arise from experience; and although color, sound, and other sensations are not simple reproductions of identical qualities in bodies around him, nevertheless they are objective since they are caused by such bodies. Man can at least infer the existence of bodies from such sensations and call them the unknown substrate of accidents, since he cannot be certain to what extent the substances that cause these sensations possess the qualities corresponding to them. Locke extended this principle to intellection: one knows only his ideas of objects directly, and can merely infer the existence of objects from the fact that he has ideas of them. But how can one be certain that his ideas correspond with their objects? How can he be certain that there are any objects at all? These were the questions posed by his critics.

Berkeley and Hume. Anglican Bishop George BERKELEY answered such questions for himself and his followers by asserting that there are no objects. All of man's ideas come directly from God. There is no need of a world; for if Locke's substance is unknown and unknowable, it is also unnecessary. Esse est percipi ("to be is to be perceived") was the basic theme of Berkeley's philosophy. Human ideas have their correspondent reality in the divine ideas found in the mind of God. Physical laws of nature do not constitute an adequate explanation of experience; they are generalizations but not explanations of what has happened. The ultimate explanation of nature, or rather of the experience that constitutes nature, is to be found in metaphysics, which teaches that God constantly pours ideas into minds and in this sense continually creates the world.

David HUME shared Bishop Berkeley's doubts about the reality of substance. If, as Locke says, the substrate of accidents is unknown, why postulate its existence? The ultimate cause of impressions is beyond explanation. "It will always be impossible to decide with certainty whether they arise immediately from the object or are produced by the creative power of the mind or are derived from the author of our being." He felt that all of human knowledge could be reduced to two kinds of sense impressions: faint, general images, and vivid, individual phantasms. Intellectual or abstract knowledge were excluded. Universal ideas are in reality the general terms with which particular sense images are associated.

Hume rejected any kind of a generalization. Since there is no particular sense quality (i.e., a color or sound) to indicate that a being is an effect, this is unverifiable by the senses and should be rejected. All that can be asserted about causality, he argues, is what is observable, and this is that a certain sequence of events can be seen to take place whereby one event follows another. What follows another in time is called an effect. But there is nothing in any object (such as its contingency) that can prove that it is an effect, i.e., caused by another.

Hume considered his own person to be not a substance but a mass of sensations: "When I enter most intimately into what I call myself I always stumble on some particular impression or other." Hence, he concluded that his self is constituted by "bundles or collections of different perceptions which succeed each other . . . and are in a perpetual flux and movement."

Kant's Criticism. Describing himself as being roused from his dogmatic slumber by the writings of Hume, Immanuel KANT wrote his masterpiece, The Cri- tique of Pure Reason, explicitly to save science (especially the laws of mathematics and physics) and morality in general. Admitting that knowledge begins with sense experience, Kant denied that it must end there. In fact (he argues) all of sense experience is conditioned by space and time. Being the condition of sense experience, space and time cannot themselves be explained by such experience. They must be a priori forms of human sensation. For this reason, he continues, metaphysics, or the knowledge of being as it is in itself, should be based not on experience but rather on what conditions experience in human understanding. In The Critique of Pure Reason, Kant attempted to effect what he called a Copernican revolution in philosophy: truth would henceforth be considered as the conformity, not of the intellect with an object, but of the object with the intellect. In other words, philosophy would concern itself not with making certain that its concepts corresponded with an objective reality; its task would be to see that human experience corresponded with the nature of concepts and categories that constitute human understanding.

A later work on morality, The Critique of Practical Reason (1788), insisted that since one cannot discover any objective moral law in nature, he must be guided by an innate concept of holiness, expressed in the maxim "So act that the maxim of your will can always be valid as a principle making universal law."

Hegel and Schopenhauer. Of the great German thinkers following Kant, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich HEGEL was undoubtedly the greatest If, as Kant averred, consciousness must conclude that thought is purely formal and regulative, should one not go further and maintain that intelligence itself must be considered as absolute? If one cannot know the thing in itself (das Ding an sich) as Kant was forced to admit, why should he concern himself with it? Cannot consciousness supply its own content, as well as its own form? Thus, the ultimate duality between thought and being, between subject and object can be dissolved. In a transcendent identity of thought and being, of subject and object, would arise spirit (Geist), which, containing contradictory ideas, transforming them by generating their opposites, would finally synthesize them in a higher form including both. This Hegeltan triadconstituting a dynamic dialectic-K. MARX was later to borrow and exploit in his own system of materialism (see MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL).

Arthur SCHOPENHAUER continued the tradition of Hegelian idealism. Conceiving philosophy's task as the explanation of conscious experience, he asserted that principles of becoming govern sense experience; principles of being are the basis of mathematical concepts and constructs; and, finally, principles of knowing form the foundation of logical categories. Hence, all of knowledge is determined by innate principles.

Yet Schopenhauer did not entirely lose the Kantian nostalgia for the world as it is in itself. Although it can never be known, Schopenhauer writes, its existence cannot be questioned by man's deepest instinct. The phenomenal world (the world as it appears) is a world of conflict; the noumenal world (the world as it is in itself) is a world of peace, and the soul yearns for it. Suffering and sympathy lead man away from the phenomenal world to the noumenal world, and the human spirit finds its highest act in heroic self-renunciation.

Twentieth-Century Views

In the 20th century, disillusionment with Hegelian philosophies of the Absolute Spirit gave rise to the study of knowledge as a purely human act. Neo-Kantians abandoned the quest for "the thing-in-itself" (which Kant had said could be known only by a divine mind) and, while insisting that the only meaningful knowledge would be that of an object as it appears, asserted that the highest type of knowledge is the provisional explanation scientists give of reality. Under the leadership of Edmund Husserl, phenomenologists held that judgment about the actual existence of reality can be suspended; it is sufficient to describe simply what appears to consciousness. Existentialists, such as J. P. Sartre (1905-1980), flatly denied that one can know what a thing is in itself; in itself a thing has no essence. It is sufficient to know that a thing is, for its entire meaning is imposed upon it by man. Logical analysts insisted that no statement is meaningful if its elements cannot be verified by the senses; and since man is only too prone to confuse what he experiences with irrelevant materials drawn from grammar and religious beliefs, all his statements should be purified by being subjected to rigorous logical analysis.

Bergson and Dilthey. Impatient with the selfdestructive tendencies in German idealism, philosophers of France were moved to construct systems emphasizing the dynamic aspects of consciousness. To Henri BERG-SON, the essence of reality is not being but becoming. Against Kant, he denied that time is an a priori condition of experience; it is, instead, the very essence of experience. Time should not be excluded from metaphysics; metaphysicians should try to understand the primary role that time plays in human experience and in the universe itself. All matter is in motion; consciousness itself may be said to be constituted by time and motion since it is continually evolving. In fact, all things can be said to be part of the élan vital, the surging flow of life toward higher forms of freedom and consciousness. The ordinary function of intelligence consists in devising means whereby human life can progress; its highest act, however, is the intuition whereby the intelligence understands its relationship with God and its destiny of transcending present limitations.

Eminent German philosophers, such as Wilhelm DILTHEY, had similar philosophical ideas. Dilthey reacted against Kantian and Hegelian philosophy as being systems of static concepts, and characteristically suggested that philosophy should be viewed as a form of history, since history alone can express experience as a living whole.

Neo-Kantians. A group of German philosophers at Marburg, calling themselves Neo-Kantians, thought that ordinary knowledge is nonscientific and nonphilosophical. Epistemology should restrict itself to examination and evaluation of the philosophical implications of the methods and statements of positive sciences. Herman Cohen (1842-1918), the most distinguished proponent of the Marburg school, felt that since scientific explanations of phenomena are based upon intellectual constructs, all reality (i.e., all phenomena) might be reduced to laws of reason. Hence, the ultimate explanation of reality would be found in logic, rather than in metaphysics. Wilhelm Windelband (1848–1915), founder of the Baden school, developed a similar theory of epistemology, stressing the importance of subjective cultural values in human experience. He maintained that the truth value of judgments is determined by their correspondence with indemonstrable values that the mind has by its nature and expresses in its logic, ethics, art, and religion.

Phenomenologists. Edmund HUSSERL is frequently called the founder of the phenomenological method, which stresses the importance of returning to things themselves. In perception, a thing is present to consciousness. It is a phenomenon; it appears to man. To avoid the conflict between the realists and the idealists, Husserl asserted that it is sufficient to say simply that the thing appears; one can suspend judgment as regards its existence. And since essence determines the meaning of an object, its actual existence is relatively unimportant to consciousness. By describing what appears, the phenomenologist gets at the essence, and this is what matters. (See PHENOMENOLOGY.)

Neorealists and Naturalists. Neorealism did not accept this view, however. Its adherents asserted that it is possible and highly important to affirm trans-subjective reality. In England, Bertrand RUSSELL is frequently considered to be a neorealist—although his views changed considerably over the years. He insisted that philosophy should ask hard, matter-of-fact questions about the data that empirical science provides about existing objects. Philosophy would not be a science at all were it not for the fact that, while clarifying the concepts of empirical science, it constructs a purely formal logic; yet its laws, like those of science, have no more than high probability. In the United States, George SANTAYANA was frequently numbered among the neorealists, although his views were quite opposed to those of Lord Russell. Santayana maintained that substance is external to consciousness, and, although constant assumes various shapes that consciousness understands through modifications in space and time. What lies behind space, time, and substance is unknowable.

Alfred North WHITEHEAD is sometimes called a realist, for his interest in empirical science and its methods made him sympathetic to Russell's views. However, Whitehead held that philosophy can and should go beyond science. It should embrace all of human experience, including art and religion. Although philosophy must begin with experience, it is not constrained within its limits; actually, even so-called material bodies are but convenient concepts enabling one to explain experience. The world is made up, not of things, but of events—the central event being the act of consciousness, which contains the past and anticipates the future.

In the United States, the term naturalist was applied to the school initiated by John Dewey. Defining thought as the reaction of the intelligence to the doubtful as such, Dewey emphasized the nature of thought as inquiry, rather than understanding or contemplation. Thought and learning must be active, rather than passive. To him the methods of empirical science, of affirmation and varification through experiment, were the only valid sources of certainty. Although he had been educated in a strongly Hegelian environment and had been a Hegelian himself for a brief period, he developed a contempt for what he called "idealistic speculation." He considered metaphysics a harmful pastime, and accepted ethical ideals as real only if they succeeded in moving men to constructive action in society. The highest function of human intelligence takes place when, understanding the present, the mind employs itself in the service of society to realize its ideals in the future. No value is absolute or terminal. New and higher values will always appear. Hence, all knowledge must be provisional. Absolute certitude is not only impossible; it is illusory even to desire it.

Neopositivists and Analysts. Neopositivism is a name frequently applied to the philosophy of the Vienna Circle, represented in the United States by Rudolph Carnap (1891–1970) and Hans Reichenbach (1891–1953), two German émigrés. Reverencing logic as the philosophical science par excellence, neopositivists restricted the role of philosophy to analysis of scientific methods and procedures. Ludwig WITTGENSTEIN, in his Tractatus

Logico-Philosophicus (1921), often called the "neopositivist Bible," asserted that universal statements cannot possibly be based upon the intellectual knowledge of natures or intellectual abstraction. They are simply shorthand symbols of many individual facts or events. Consequently, it is meaningless to speak of a metaphysics or ethics arising from a consideration of the nature of being or the nature of man and society. (See LOGICAL POSITIVISM.)

Closely allied with neopositivism and sometimes identified with it is the analytical school represented by A. J. Ayer (1910–1989) and Gilbert Ryle (1900–1976). In Language, Truth and Logic (1936), Ayer proclaims the principle of verification whereby nothing can be considered as true if it cannot be immediately verified by sense experience. The concept of substance is regarded as having arisen out of grammar, i.e., the need to have a subject for predicates; and metaphysics in general is presented as a word game inferior to poetry, since the poet realizes that he is working in the realm of imagination whereas the philosopher does not. Ryle's work, The Concept of Mind (1949), presents philosophy as a system of linguistic analysis whose burden is to clarify general statements. "Philosophy is the replacement of category-habits by category disciplines"; that is, philosophy should concern itself, not with trying to divide being into categories (as Aristotle and Kant attempted to do) but rather with establishing a systematic explanation of the categories themselves.

Existentialists. Another school of thought, EXISTENTIALISM, derives its name from the fact that its proponents stressed the importance of existence over essence. Plato, they alleged, made ideas or essences the supreme concern of philosophers. Almost all philosophers who have followed him have been "essentialists," constructing their systems out of ideas, essences, and definitions. But an essence as such has no reality. The Universal man does not exist. It is men who exist—existing individuals, not general essences.

Kierkegaard. Søren KIERKEGAARD is generally acknowledged to be the father of existentialism. Danishborn and inheriting beliefs that man is essentially evil, with an intellect so darkened that he can know nothing of God and His laws except what he learns through blind faith, Kierkegaard attacked Hegelianism and German idealism as empty rationalisms without any relevance to life. Human lives are ruled, not by logic, but by God, whose providence is incomprehensible and whose acts (such as His command to Abraham to kill Isaac) are seemingly absurd. Philosophy should not discourse about natures and essences; this is metaphysical make-believe. The world is constituted of individual existing beings without any intelligible interrelationship.

Jaspers. Karl Jaspers (1883–1969), a Protestant, can also be classified as an existentialist, although, unlike Kierkegaard, he had no aversion to philosophy as a system, as his three-volume Philosophie (1932) indicates. In the spirit of Kierkegaard, he described the self as being basically consciousness of the self as sin. But, consciousness is existence, and existence is consciousness, since meaningful relationships can exist only through the act of knowledge. Moreover, one cannot talk about subject and object in the act of knowledge as though they had no relationship. What is called object is already assimilated to the subject and has no meaning without the subject. For Jaspers, the term existence includes both subject and object, even though he seems to accentuate the role of subject by describing the manner in which existence exercises liberty through the creation of values.

Marcel. Gabriel Marcel (1889–1973), regarded frequently as a Catholic existentialist, conceived of human life as a continuing encounter with God, a dialogue beginning in time and enduring in eternity. Without denying that the intellect can know the nature of man, Marcel (like Martin Buber, the Jewish existentialist) insisted that each man is unique and his ultimate meaning to be found in his incommunicable personality, rather than in the nature he shares with others.

Heidegger. Martin Heidegger (1889-1976) and Jean Paul Sartre were the two most influential 20th-century existentialists. Heidegger, once a Catholic, later an atheist, and still later a theist, outlined his principal ideas in Sein und Zeit (1927). Rejecting the classical inquiry into being as such, Heidegger begins with a study of what he describes simply as Dasein. Although Heidegger himself believed that Dasein defies translation, some felt that its general notion can be conveyed through the phrase "individual consciousness." It is this kind of being that has primacy; all other beings exist for consciousness. It is consciousness that gives meaning to all objects; it makes all serve its purposes and its projects. Moreover, since human consciousness is open to knowledge of all things, its potential enrichment is limited only by death; in fact, consciousness can be described as "freedom until death," i.e., consciousness can become all things until death cuts it short.

Sartre. Overtly atheistic, Sartre similarly centered his system in human consciousness, which he described as "nothingness" in L'Etre et le néant (1943), since consciousness finds its entire meaning in what it knows, and paradoxically is meaningless unless it is consciousness of something other than consciousness. However, the intellect does not come upon a world constituted of fixed essences, since there are no essences but only existents. Every object stands alone. Each object is unique, non-related to other objects, hence absurd. An object can be defined only as the totality of its possible or actual phenomenological aspects; but the phenomenological aspects of any object are determined by the needs, desires, and values of each consciousness.

According to Sartre, the essence of consciousness is becoming. Were it to cease becoming, it would cease to be; and, although this potentiality immanent within consciousness gives it life and movement, it condemns it to the restless existence of being forever a projection into a nonexistent future (for the future as such never is).

Concluding Evaluation. Most historians of philosophy agree that the foregoing disputes over the nature of knowledge have arisen from an over-simplification of human understanding. Constituted as it is of both abstract and concrete elements, man's knowledge is subject to two kinds of analysis and development. The idealists seem to have concentrated on the abstract elements in human knowledge; for them knowledge soon becomes a matter of concepts and definitions. Empiricists, on the other hand, have concentrated on the concrete elements of human knowledge in a laudable effort to "stay in the real world"; but, ironically, their world of reality seems to be without meaning, as the existentialists have been quick to point out.

Any adequate theory of knowledge must, it seems, consider human knowledge as the complex operation of an intellectual substance that is the form of a human body. Unless the human soul had sense organs and formed perceptions from which to abstract its concepts, it could not know any existing thing. Thus, abstract knowledge cannot be viewed entirely apart from its empirical origins; otherwise it will lose its existential significance. On the other hand, empirical knowledge cannot be viewed entirely apart from the common elements that are discoverable within it; otherwise it will lose its full intelligibility.

Scholastic and Greek theories of knowledge do, in fact, have many concerns found also in modern theories. For example, scholastic philosophers are usually careful to point out that the intellect rarely knows the essences of material substances completely. Hence, man's knowledge of such substances is normally provisional, and subject to revision. In his commentaries on the logical writings of Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas notes how frequently one must rely upon nominal or provisional definitions, and he expresses as well the continuing need of logical analysis of terms in judgments.

In any event, there are as many theories of knowledge as there are theories of man, for EPISTEMOLOGY itself is always shaped by basic views regarding the nature of the human soul and of the reality that surrounds man—of which he is a part. (See MAN; SOUL, HUMAN.)

See Also: AGNOSTICISM; CONCEPTUALISM; CRITICISM; DOGMATISM; EMPIRICISM; EXEMPLARISM; FIDEISM; IDEALISM; MATERIALISM; NOMINALISM; PHENOMENALISM; POSITIVISM; PRAGMATISM; RATIONALISM; REALISM; RELATIVISM; SENSISM; SOLIPSISM; TRADITIONALISM.

Bibliography: I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, Contemporary European Philosophy, tr. D. NICHOLL and K. ASCHENBRENNER (Berkeley 1956). J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). History of Philosophy; v. 4: Descartes to Leibniz (Westminster, Maryland 1958). L. M. RÉGIS, Epistemology, tr. I. C. BYRNE (New York 1959). M. J. ADLER, ed. The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v.2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World 1:880–920. P. PRINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:813–40. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:389–95.

[R. W. MULLIGAN]

KNOWLES, DAVID

English monk, historian; b. on the feast of St. Michael, Sept. 29, 1896 at Eastfield, Studley, in Warwickshire; d. Nov. 21, 1974 in Chichester. Christened Michael Clive, he received the name David as a Benedictine. Knowles' scholarly reputation rests principally on his work as a historian of pre-Reformation English monasticism; his opus magnum is The Monastic Order in England; a History of its Development from the Times of St. Dunstan to the Fourth Lateran Council, 943–1216 (Cambridge 1940; 2d ed., 1963). The 3-volume The Religious Orders in England (Cambridge 1956, 1957, 1959) completed his history of the religious orders in England up to and inclusive of the Reformation; this work is not of the same exceptional stature as his Monastic Order.

Knowles was educated in the school at DOWNSIDE ABBEY where he became a novice in 1914 and where he pronounced simple vows in 1915 and solemn vows in 1918. From 1919 to 1922 he studied classical languages and philosophy at Cambridge as a member of Christ's College. He was ordained a priest on July 9, 1922. During the academic year of 1922-1923 he studied theology at Sant' Anselmo, Rome. Upon his return to Downside Abbey, Dom David took up a number of duties, e.g., as teacher of classics in the school, temporary novice master in 1928, and master over the junior monks from 1929 to 1933. He became the editor of the Downside Review to which he made many contributions. His first book, The American Civil War... (Oxford 1926) was the result of a lifelong enthusiasm, but he never visited North America, despite many invitations to lecture.

Dom David was the leader of a group of monks at Downside who sought to initiate a new foundation of a contemplative character. Permission for this foundation was refused by the abbot of Downside and by the Congregation of Religious (1934). As a result, Father David lived from 1933 to 1939 in a form of exile at Ealing Abbey, London. In 1939 the tension of these years culminated in a nervous breakdown. Without permission Father David left the jurisdiction of Downside, an action which resulted in a canonical suspension. Later Abbot Cuthbert Butler (now Bishop Butler) arranged for Dom David's position to be regularized as an exclaustration, a condition which perdured until his death. This arrangement made it possible for Dom David to live outside his monastery and yet remain a Benedictine in good standing. Despite this tragedy in his life, Dom David always deeply cherished his calling as a Benedictine and he maintained an affection for Downside Abbey. The monks of Saint Leo Abbey, Florida, reissued Dom David's booklet, The Benedictines . . . (Saint Leo, Florida 1962), which had appeared years before (London 1929; reprinted New York 1930) because these monks considered this essay to be the "nearly perfect exposition" of Benedictine monasticism.

Knowles' reputation as historian was spreading. In November of 1941 he was awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters by Cambridge, and in 1944 he became a Fellow of Peterhouse and thereafter his ascent up the ladder of academic success was rapid: university lecturer at Cambridge in 1946, professor of medieval history in 1947, and, in 1954, Regius Professor of Modern History in the University, a position he held until his retirement in 1963.

Father David was a man of slight physical build but with an intense and strong inner spirit. He was quiet and even austere, but possessed a gentle humor. His inner strength made possible his extraordinary productivity, but it also had a hand in the tragedy of his life. Moreover, this quiet strength was discernible in his carefully prepared and dignified lectures which held both seasoned scholars and undergraduates spellbound. Father David, as he was known to his friends, was a reserved man, but this reserve did not prevent his warmth and charm from coming through clearly in his lectures and especially in personal conversation and correspondence.

As an author David Knowles was perhaps the finest stylist of modern historians writing in English. He wrote to be clear and he always was so; yet his writings were rich in apt figures of speech and in literary allusions. He may have been at his very best in his assessment of character, a topic that he took up in his now-famous inaugural lecture as Regius Professor. However, at times he demanded too much of those about whom he wrote, as he did of himself, a characteristic that no doubt played a part in difficulties with his abbey. His characterizations of Thomas BECKET, BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, Lord Macaulay, Cardinal GASQUET, and Dom Edward Cuthbert BUTLER are modern classics in character evaluation.

Throughout his life, Father David was intensely interested in the life and study of mysticism. In the former he had a personal abiding interest. His writings on mysticism, however, are narrow in scope and not of the same caliber as his work as a monastic historian. The personal quality of his passion for mysticism may have prevented his writings on it from achieving the quality of his historical writings.

Bibliographies of Father David's writings indicate the exceptional productivity of a monk whose way of life was both highly disciplined and austere. He continued to be prolific in his years of retirement. What did emerge in his later years was a firmly conservative concern over the changes taking place in the Catholic church and in what he considered to be its crisis of authority. He expressed this concern avidly and eloquently in a number of articles written in retirement. Dom David composed an autobiography which will not be published in the near future nor will it be accessible to researchers until a later date, a decision made by his literary executors. In considering the life of David Knowles as a monastic historian, one cannot escape a comparison with Dom Jean MABILLON, the 17thcentury Maurist whom he so admired. In addition, what Dom David wrote of Dom Edward Cuthbert Butler (1858-1934) is surely an even more apt description of himself: "[H]e will long be remembered as the most remarkable English Benedictine scholar and historian of his time" (The Historian and Character and Other Essays [Cambridge 1963] 362).

Bibliography: For lists of the writings of Knowles, 1919–1962: D. KNOWLES, The Historian and Character and Other Essays (Cambridge 1963) 363–373; for 1963–1974 with supplement for 1932–1962: A. STACPOOLE, "The Making of a Monastic Historian—III," Ampleforth Journal 80 (1975) 51–55. Biographical studies: C. N. L. BROOKE, "David Knowles, 1896–1974," Proceedings of the British Academy 61 (1976) 439–477 K. J. EGAN, "Dom David Knowles (1896–1974)," American Benedictine Review 27 (1976) 235–246. W. A. PANTIN, "Curriculum Vitae," in D. KNOWLES The Historian and Character . . . xvii–xxviii. A. STAC-POOLE, "The Making of a Monastic Historian—I, II, III," Ampleforth Journal 80, Parts I and II (1975) 71–91; 19–38: 48–55.

[K. J. EGAN]

KNOX, JAMES ROBERT

Cardinal archbishop of Melbourne, curia official, papal legate; b. Bayswater, a suburb of Perth in Western Australia, March 2, 1914; d. Rome, June 26, 1983.

One of three children born to John Knox, an immigrant from Kilkenny, Ireland, and the former Emily Walsh, who died when James was still a child. He attended local schools but was forced to interrupt his education in order to help support the family during the Depression years. When later he sought to enter the seminary, he applied to the abbot at the distant Abbey Nullius of New Norcia, then a suffragan See of Perth, in the hope of joining the small group of priests already incardinated in this widespread rural diocese. (At the time, the archdiocese of Perth did not have a seminary, and depended entirely on applicants from Irish seminaries for its clergy.) Knox completed his secondary education at St. Ildephonsus' College in New Norcia, and in 1935 he began studies at the abbey seminary. Later he joined other Australians at the Propaganda Fidei in Rome where he was ordained on Dec. 22, 1941. He remained in Rome during World War II, earning a doctorate in theology, and he did graduate studies in canon law. In 1945 he joined the staff at Propaganda Fide becoming vice-rector in 1947.

The year 1948 marked the beginning of his career with the Vatican diplomatic corps. Working in the Secretariat of State, he developed a friendship with Archbishop Giovanni Battista Montini, who was to become Pope PAUL VI, that endured through the years. Named to the Camerieri Segreti Soprannumerati (Chaplains to His Holiness), Monsignor Knox was appointed secretary to the apostolic delegation in Japan in 1950. In 1953, he was consecrated titular archbishop of Melitene and named Apostolic Delegate to Eastern and Western British Africa with his residence at Mombasa (Kenya). During his four years in that position many native African priests were nominated as bishops. In 1957, Knox was appointed Apostolic Internuncio to India and Apostolic Delegate to Burma and Ceylon (Sri Lanka). In the ten years he served as representative of the Holy See in the Indian subcontinent, a period that spanned the duration of the Second Vatican Council, Archbishop Knox was instrumental in creating many new dioceses and in the development of religious communities in both the Oriental and Latin rites, including the MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY founded by Mother Teresa.

Post Vatican II. In 1967, then 53 years old, Knox was appointed to succeed Justin Simonds, as archbishop of Melbourne in his native Australia. During the six years he served in that see, Knox instituted a long list of reforms in the spirit of Vatican II: the division of the archdiocese into regions under the pastoral care of three auxiliary bishops; the naming of eleven episcopal vicars; the reorganization of the provincial seminary at Clayton; the adaptation of the sanctuary of the cathedral to conform with the liturgical requirements of Vatican II; the establishment of the Melbourne Education Board and Parish Education boards as well as the Catholic Education Commission of Victoria; the introduction of recurrent funding from federal government sources in 1970; the funding of non-government teachers' colleges and the amalgamation of the existing Catholic colleges into the Institute of Catholic Education; the establishment of additional regional secondary schools and the creation of 20 new parishes with parish schools in each. He fostered missionary projects in New Guinea and Venezuela through the Melbourne Overseas Mission. In February of 1973 Melbourne hosted the Fortieth International Eucharistic Congress.

At the Consistory of March 5, 1973, Pope Paul VI nominated Knox to the College of Cardinals, and six months later called him to Rome to become the prefect both of the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments and of the Sacred Congregation for Divine Worship. It was Knox's task to merge these two dicasteries into one. In 1975 Paul VI approved the formation of the new Congregation for Sacraments and Divine Worship, with Knox as prefect and Archbishop Antonio Innocenti as secretary. In addition to his responsibilities as prefect of the Congregation for Sacraments and Divine Worship, Knox was an active member of other congregations, and on several occasions he served as special envoy of both Paul VI and John Paul II. In May of 1981, Pope John Paul II appointed him the first president of the newly formed Pontifical Council for the Family.

His health began to decline in the summer of 1982, but he continued his work. Stricken with a circulatory failure in May of 1983, while attending a meeting of the Congregation for Oriental Churches, Cardinal Knox died a few weeks later. He is buried in St. Patrick's Cathedral in Melbourne.

Bibliography: Annuario Pontificio, 1945; 1946; 1949; 1950; 1953; 1954; 1958; 1968; 1974; 1975; 1982; 1983. Official Directory of the Catholic Church in Australia, 1969–70; 1981–82; 1985–86. L'Osservatore Romano, June 27–28, 1983; July 2, 1983. L'Osservatore Romano (Eng.) July 4, 1983; July 11, 1983.

[W. A. MULLINS]

KNOX, JOHN

Scottish Protestant reformer; b. near Haddington, East Lothian, 1513; d. Edinburgh, Nov. 24, 1572. Of his early life, little is recorded. His family for several generations had been retainers of the house of Bothwell. The Universities of St. Andrews and Glasgow claim him as a student, but definite proof of his attendance is lacking. A recent document asserts that he was ordained by Bp. William Chisholm of Dunblane on April 15, 1536. During the next decade he performed the duties of notary apostolic in the Archdiocese of St. Andrews and acted as tutor to the children of some East Lothian lairds who patronized the leading Protestant preacher of the day, George WISHART.

Conversion to Evangelicalism. During this period, Knox became a convert to the "new Evangel," and in the winter of 1545-46 he himself carried a "two-handed sword" before the preacher. When Wishart was put to death for heresy at St. Andrews (March 28, 1545-46), a group of disaffected gentry assassinated Cardinal David Beaton, Chancellor of Scotland, and occupied the archepiscopal castle at St. Andrews. On April 10, 1547, Knox and his pupils joined the "Castilians," a group of devout and radical Protestants. The group soon recognized Knox's ability as a controversialist preacher and commissioned him to undertake the public preaching of the new doctrines. Knox began preaching in the castle and parish kirk of St. Andrews. When the French fleet captured the castle on July 30, 1547, Knox was taken captive with the others and remained aboard a French galley for 19 months. Released early in 1549, Knox made his way to England and became a licensed preacher, first at Berwick, then at Newcastle, and finally in London, where he was one of the six chaplains to the young King, Edward VI. His intervention in the preparatory discussions for the revised BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER is responsible for the inclusion of the "Black Rubric" in the service (when approaching the Lord's Supper, "no adoration is intended or ought to be done"). Knox turned down the offer of the bishopric of Rochester, for he shrewdly foresaw that Catholic Mary Tudor would succeed to the throne.

Exile at Geneva. When that event occurred (1553), Knox fled to the Continent, where he preached in various English Protestant colonies. He visited Dieppe several times, but his principal place of sojourn was that "perfect school of Christ," Calvin's Geneva. There was a short visit to Scotland in 1555, "at the end of the harvest," when he claims to have laid the small beginnings of a Protestant church. The French Queen-Regent of Scotland, Mary of Guise, constrained by the pressure of international politics, had allowed religious toleration. Before long the political and religious climate changed, and Knox, now married to the English Marjory Bowes (spring 1556), returned to Geneva. The Protestant nobles in Scotland invited Knox (May 1557) to return to minister to them, but by the time he reached Dieppe they had changed their minds. This vacillation brought about a change in Knox's political thinking. Hitherto following Calvin, he had advocated moderation and nonviolence in dealing with "idolatrous" rulers. Then, in 1558, he published several pamphlets asserting that punishment of "idolatry" and "blasphemy" in rulers "doth not appertain to kings and chief rulers only but also to the whole body of that people and to every member of the same" and that this duty extends to deposing and punishing rulers who are "tyrants against God and against his truth known." In these pamphlets Knox provided the ideology for the revolution that was shortly to be accomplished in Scotland.

John Knox.

Return to Scotland. Some Protestant nobles and lairds, after pledging themselves "to maintain, set forward and establish the most blessed word of God and his Congregation" (December 1557), invited Knox to return to Scotland. He landed on May 2, 1559, joined the forces of the Congregation at Perth, and on May 11, in the parish kirk of St. John, he preached the sermon that led to the "casting down" of the town churches and the wrecking of the religious houses in the neighborhood. In June the coast towns of Fife and the primatial city of St. Andrews were purged by the army of the Congregation: Stirling, Linlithgow, and Edinburgh were visited in turn. On June 10, 1560, the whole resistance of the Catholic and French party collapsed with the death of the Queen-Regent, Mary of Guise. The Treaty of Edinburgh, in July, eliminated the French and created a situation where the Lords of the Congregation, with English help, could now dominate Scotland. The illegal "Reformation Parliament," held in August, abolished the jurisdiction of the pope in Scotland and prohibited the celebration of Mass, together with all doctrine and practice contrary to the Confession of Faith, which was now adopted.

Knox was the architect of the new ecclesiastical system. Although the Confession of Faith, drawn up by him and his associates, was accepted, the Book of Discipline, which sought to redistribute the temporal possessions of the medieval Church in accordance with the needs of the new Protestant regime, was rejected. Knox was appointed minister of Edinburgh, and during the tumultuous years of the personal reign of MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS, he made the pulpit of the collegiate kirk of St. Giles a focal point in the political and religious life of the kingdom. In March 1564, now a widower in his 50s, he contracted his second marriage, with Margaret Stewart, the 16-year-old daughter of Lord Ochiltree. After the assassination of the regent, James Stewart, Earl of Moray (1570), Knox's health began to decline. He was buried in the kirkyard of St. Giles.

During his lifetime, Knox was known chiefly as a powerful and inspiring preacher with a strong sense of his personal vocation as a prophet. His posthumous fame rests mostly on his History of the Reformation in Scotland, an extremely biased but vigorous and dramatic specimen of 16th-century Anglo-Scottish prose. From this work and from his other writings, especially the Confession of Faith, can be pieced together the main elements of Knox's theological teaching. His contribution lay not in original thought; his works instead repeated Protestant teachings, but in a lively idiom that inspired his admirers. In his early Protestant years, due no doubt to the influence of Wishart, Knox accepted the Zwinglian views of a symbolic presence of Christ in the Eucharist. Later at Geneva his theological tenets were molded into Calvinism, and his antipathy to traditional Catholic doctrine concentrated on the rejection of the sacrificial character of the Mass and of the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist. Among his writings are: The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women (1558), a diatribe against Mary of Guise; Treatise on Predestination (1560); English Metrical Psalter (1564).

See Also: SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF.

Bibliography: Works, ed. D. LAING, 6 v. (Edinburgh 1846–64); History of the Reformation in Scotland, ed. W. C. DICKINSON, 2 v. (New York 1949). A. LANG, John Knox and the Reformation (London 1905). T. MCCRIE, The Life of John Knox, 2 v. (Edinburgh 1812; 1 v. ed. Inverness 1960). D. MCROBERTS, ed., Essays on the Scottish Reformation, 1513–1625 (Glasgow 1962). E. S. C. PERCY, John Knox (London 1937). G. MACGREGOR, The Thundering Scot (Philadelphia 1957). M. SCHMIDT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:1686. A. J. G. MACKAY, The Dictionary of National Biography

From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. With corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; suppl. 1901–) 11:308–328. R. MASON, ed., John Knox and the British Reformations (Aldershot UK. 1998). J. MCEWEN, The Faith of John Knox (Richmond 1961). J. G. RIDLEY, John Knox (New York 1968). D. SHAW, ed., John Knox: A Quartercentenary Reappraisal (Edinburgh 1975).

[D. MCROBERTS]

KNOX, RONALD ARBUTHNOTT

Author, biblical scholar; b. Kibworth, England, Feb. 17, 1888; d. Mells, England, Aug. 24, 1957. The youngest son of the Anglican bishop of Manchester, he was educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford. He took Anglican orders in 1910 and became chaplain of Trinity College, Oxford. A strong Anglo-Catholic, he introduced as many Roman practices as possible, a policy that brought him into conflict with the Anglican bishops. He carried his satirical gifts into religious controversy and satirized the latitudinarian views of some of his Anglican fellow clergy in brilliant parodies of Dryden and Swift. Increasingly dissatisfied with his Anglican position, in 1917 he was received into the Catholic Church, detailing his reasons in his Spiritual Aeneid (1918).

He made his theological studies at St. Edmund's, Ware, and was ordained in 1919. He taught at St. Edmund's until 1926 when he was appointed chaplain to the Catholic students at Oxford University, a post he held until immediately before the outbreak of World War II. His major literary work of that period was Let Dons Delight (1939), a series of imaginary conversations at intervals of 50 years in an imaginary Oxford common room.

Knox found that life at Oxford was too full of interruptions to his literary work. Convinced that the great work to which he was called was the production of a modern English Bible, he withdrew from his chaplaincy and other activities. His Bible (the New Testament, 1944; the Psalms, 1947; the Old Testament, 1948; complete edition, 1955) was a masterpiece of English style. Prominent among his later works was Enthusiasm (1950), a study of religious vagaries. In his last public appearance, he delivered the Romanes Lecture at Oxford on "Translation" in June of 1957.

Other than those mentioned above, his numerous volumes include Other Eyes Than Ours (1926), The Belief of Catholics (1927), Essays in Satire (1928), Caliban in Grub Street (1930), and Broadcast Minds (1932).

Bibliography: E. WAUGH, Monsignor Ronald Knox (Boston 1959).

[C. HOLLIS]

KNOXVILLE, DIOCESE OF

The Diocese of Knoxville was established on Sept. 8, 1988. The Most Reverend Anthony J. O'Connell, D.D., was appointed its first bishop. When O'Connell was appointed bishop of Palm Beach in 1999, he was succeeded by Msgr. Joseph E. Kurtz of the Diocese of Allentown. With an area of 14,242 sq. miles, the diocese comprises 36 counties in the eastern portion of the state of Tennessee and is situated in a rural area where some of the poorest counties in the nation are located. At the beginning of the 21st century, Roman Catholics comprised around two percent of the total population, distributed in 43 parishes and two missions. The diocesan newspaper is The East Tennessee Catholic.

[F. X. MANKEL/EDS.]

KNUDSON, ALBERT CORNELIUS

Methodist minister, Old Testament scholar and theologian, known especially for his synthesis of personalistic philosophy with a systematic Christian theology; b. Grandmeadow, Minn., Jan. 23, 1873; d. Aug. 28, 1953. He was the son of Rev. Asle Knudson, and he studied at the University of Minnesota, Minneapolis (A.B. 1893); Boston University, Mass. (S.T.B. 1896, Ph.D. 1900); and the German Universities of Jena and Berlin (honorary Th.D. 1923). After teaching briefly at the Universities of Denver, Colo., and Baker, Baldwin City, Ks, and at Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa., he began his long career in Boston University School of Theology as professor of Hebrew and Old Testament exegesis (1906). From 1921 to 1943 he was professor of systematic theology and served also as dean from 1926 to 1938.

In theology, he defended an independently valid religious a priori, alongside Immanuel Kant's speculative, ethical, and aesthetic a prioris. He developed his theological system in deliberate relation to the theologies of Friedrich SCHLEIERMACHER and Albrecht RITSCHL, on the one hand, and the personalistic philosophy of Borden Parker Bowne, on the other (see PERSONALISM). His books included Religious Teaching of the Old Testament (New York 1918), The Doctrine of God (New York 1930), The Doctrine of Redemption (New York 1933), and The Validity of Religious Experience (New York 1937).

[L. H. DE WOLF]

KNUTSON, KENT SIGVART

Theologian and president of American Lutheran Church (ALC); b. Goldfield, Iowa, Aug. 7, 1924; d., Minneapolis, March 12, 1973. After receiving a B.S. in chemical engineering in 1947 from Iowa State University, he worked briefly for an oil company, but then entered Luther Seminary, St. Paul, and received the B.D. there in 1951. The same year he married Norma Arnesen of Brooklyn, N.Y., and they became the parents of four children, in addition to adopting two Korean children.

He pursued graduate studies from 1951 to 1954 at Columbia University and Union Theological Seminary in New York, receiving a Ph.D. in 1961. In 1954 he was ordained by the Evangelical Lutheran Church, one of the churches that joined in 1960 to form the ALC. After serving as pastor of Our Saviour Lutheran Church in Staten Island, N.Y. (1954–58), he joined the faculty of Luther Seminary, teaching systematic theology and serving (1960-69) as director of graduate studies. In 1969 he became president of Wartburg Seminary, Dubuque. At the 1970 ALC convention, where he supported the decision to ordain women, Knutson was elected as the second ALC president, succeeding Fredrik Schiotz the following January. Knutson was a participant in the Lutheran-Catholic dialogues in the U.S. from their beginning in 1965, and in the international Lutheran-Anglican talks. He was a member of the executive committee of the Lutheran World Federation and the central committee of the World Council of Churches at the time of his death. He had also served as author and editor of theological publications. In the fall of 1972 he became fatally ill with what physicians diagnosed as Jakob-Creutzfeldt disease, a rare disorder of the central nervous system. He had perhaps contracted the disease in New Guinea during a tour of Asian mission stations the previous summer.

[T. EARLY]

KODALY, ZOLTAN

Hungarian composer and musicologist; b. Kecskemét, Hungary, Dec. 16, 1882; d. Budapest, March 6, 1967. From his early years Kodaly acquired musical culture through his parents and from singing in the Catholic cathedral in Nagyszombat (now Trnava, Slovakia), where his father, a railway official, was stationed several years. But Kodaly also began to absorb the folk music of the countryside, and after studies at the University of Budapest and the Academy of Music there, he received his doctorate (1906) by presenting a thesis on Hungarian folk music.

After brief studies in Berlin and Paris, where he was influenced by Debussy, he taught (1907–41) at the Budapest Academy. With Béla Bartók (1881–1945), a friend and collaborator, he collected thousands of Hungarian folk songs. Some were published in 1906 and 1921, and they served as the basis of the Corpus Musicae Popularis Hungaricae, begun in 1951. Kodaly also published a scholarly treatment, Folk Music of Hungary, (1937), and made extensive use of Hungarian folk melodies in his own compositions. His varied output included such religious works as Psalmus Hungaricus (1923), a setting for a 16th century poet's version of Psalm 55; Te Deum of Budavar (1936), written for the 250th anniversary of Buda's liberation; and Missa Brevis (1945), which Kodaly conducted at its U.S. premier in 1946.

Kodaly devoted much of his efforts to improving musical education for children, and his theories in this field gained international influence. World War II was a difficult period for Kodaly, but he successfully defied Nazi demands that he divorce his Jewish wife. In the postwar years he held a number of government and cultural posts, and received Hungary's Kossuth Prize in 1952 and 1957. He also made several trips to other countries during those years, lecturing, conducting, and attending international conferences.

Bibliography: L. EOSZE, Zoltan Kodaly (London 1962), tr. I. FARKAS and G. GULYAS. F. BÓNIS, "Beobachtungen zum schaffensprozess in Kodálys Psalmus Hungaricus," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch, 75 (1991) 93–105. J. BREUER, A Guide to Kodály tr. M. STEINER (Budapest 1990). K. DOMMETT, "Zoltán Kodály," in International Dictionary of Opera, ed. C. S. LARUE, 2 v. (Detroit 1993) 694–696; "Háry János" in International Dictionary of Opera, ed. C. S. LARUE, 2 v. (Detroit 1993) 584–585. L. EÖSZE, "Zoltán Kodály," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 10 (New York 1980) 136–145. I. KECSKEMÉTI, Kodály, the Composer: Brief Studies on the First Half of Kodály's Oeuvre (Kecskemét 1986).

[T. EARLY]

KOHLMANN, ANTHONY

Defender of the seal of confession and of religious freedom; b. Kaiserberg, Alsace, July 13, 1771; d. Rome, Italy, April 11, 1836. After his theological studies and ordination at Fribourg, Switzerland, he joined (1796) the Congregation of the Fathers of the Sacred Heart. After transferring (1800) to the Society of Jesus then existing in Russia, he joined (1804) the Georgetown College community, Washington, D.C., and frequently made missionary excursions into Pennsylvania and Maryland. From 1808 to 1815 he served in New York; under his direction the foundations of old St. Patrick's were laid, a school was established on what later became the site of the new cathedral, and a school for girls was opened under the Ursulines (1812). While rector of St. Peter's in 1813, Kohlmann undertook to return goods stolen by a penitent. When the owner, James Keating, urged the court to compel Kohlmann to reveal the name of the penitent, four Protestant judges of the Court of General Sessions upheld Kohlmann's defense of secrecy of the confessional. Referring to article 38 of the state constitution, the Protestant defense lawyer, Richard Riker, asked: "Where is the liberty of conscience to the Catholic, if the priest and the penitent be thus exposed?" The controversy attracted attention throughout the country; New York and other states soon passed special protective legislation.

Kohlmann returned to Georgetown (1815) and was later assigned (1824) to the Gregorian University, Rome, where the future Leo XIII was one of his students. He served as consultor to the College of Cardinals and to various congregations of the Holy See. During his last days he was confessor at the Gesú, where he died.

Bibliography: A. P. STROKES, Church and State in the United States, 3 v. (New York 1950).

[T. O. HANLEY]

KOLBE, FREDERICK CHARLES

South African educator, poet, and author; b. Paarl, Cape Province, 1854; d. Cape Town, Jan. 12, 1936. He was the son of a Westphalian (German) Protestant missionary who had married the daughter of a member of the London Missionary Society. At the University of Cape Town he won a scholarship for law studies in London, where he was converted to Catholicism; Cardinal Henry Manning sent him to the English College in Rome, where he was ordained in 1882. Back in South Africa, he began a life of teaching and lecturing in addition to his pastoral duties. He not only expended much time and energy in actual teaching in Cape Town Catholic schools, but he pioneered in improving Catholic teacher education. As a member of the board of governors of the University of Cape Town and the University of the Cape of Good Hope (where he was also an examiner), he sought to create centers of intensive teacher training; he long but fruitlessly advocated the foundation of a Catholic university for South Africa.

At the request of the hierarchy, Kolbe founded (1891) the South African Catholic Magazine and until 1909 (except for two short intervals) was its editor and chief contributor. Never an organ of official Catholic opinion, it had as its chief aim the defense of the faith, although it carried many articles of general interest. Kolbe frequently defended Aristotelian-Thomistic education, then under attack by the scientists of the day, a stand that led him to a lengthy criticism of Newman's Grammar of Assent. After 1908 he devoted himself exclusively to evaluating the efforts of the Catholic schools so as to stimulate them to greater excellence. By 1898 his hearing was steadily failing, and he was suffering progressive loss of sight, but he remained a leading figure in Catholic education and in South African university circles. He confessed to being "penlazy," and many of his articles are merely transcribed lectures. His The Art of Life, however, was once considered the most perfect piece of prose by a South African. His three volumes of poems, mostly devotional and didactic, never won much acclaim, although his most famous poem, "Out of the Strong Came Sweetness," is in almost every anthology of South African literature.

Kolbe's range of interests was large; he inherited a love for botany and mountaineering from his father, he had an extensive knowledge of Shakespeare, and his insights into the psychology of education were notable. Catholics often referred to him as the "Newman of South Africa"; his close friend, Gen. Jan Christian Smuts, called him "South Africa's showpiece."

Bibliography: W. E. BROWN, The Catholic Church in South Africa from Its Origins to the Present Day (New York 1960).

[J. A. BELL]

KOLBE, MAXIMILIAN, ST.

Franciscan priest, evangelizer, "martyr of charity"; b. Jan. 8, 1894, Zdunska Wola, Poland; d. Aug. 14, 1941, in Oświęcim (Auschwitz), Poland. Baptized Raymond Kolbe, he took the religious name Maximilian when he entered the Conventual Franciscan Order's novitiate on Sept. 4, 1910. Having professed simple vows as a friar on Sept. 5, 1911, and solemn vows on Nov. 1, 1914, he was ordained a priest in Rome, Italy, on April 28, 1918. While still a seminarian in Rome, on Oct. 16, 1917, he founded the Militia Immaculatae, a movement promoting evangelization through Marian consecration. Returning to Poland in 1919, he soon initiated a mass media apostolate to further the work of evangelization. In 1922, he launched the publication Rycerz Niepokalanej (Knight of the Immaculate), whose monthly circulation would grow to one million issues by 1939. His publishing apostolate expanded to include three additional journals and one daily newspaper.

Though debilitated by tuberculosis, Kolbe founded a massive Franciscan friary and evangelization center, Niepokalanów (City of the Immaculate) near Warsaw in 1927 and a similar one in Nagasaki, Japan, in 1930. He labored at the Japanese mission for six years. He was regarded as an innovator in religious life, entrusting key responsibilities to nonordained friars trained in various specialties of the apostolate.

St. Maximilian Kolbe. (AP/Wide World Photos)

As guardian of Niepokalanów during the Nazi occupation of Poland, Kolbe welcomed more than 1,500 displaced Jewish refugees, ministering to them with such sensitivity that he even provided for their celebration of Jewish religious feasts. He was arrested by the Gestapo on Feb. 17, 1941, after publishing an article entitled "Truth." First imprisoned at Pawlak jail in Warsaw, he was transported to Oświęcim (Auschwitz) concentration camp on May 28, 1941. Though beaten, tortured, and subjected to extra punishment because he was a priest, Kolbe constantly encouraged his fellow prisoners to love their enemies: "Hatred destroys; love alone creates." In late July 1941, a prisoner escaped from his barracks. In retaliation, the Nazis selected ten individuals for execution. One of the condemned, Franciszek Gajcwniczek, cried aloud that he had a wife and children. Moved by the plight of this family man, Kolbe stepped forward to take Gajowniczek's place. The Nazi commandant Fritsch allowed the substitution. Consigned with the other nine to a subterranean cell, Kolbe survived without food or water for nearly two weeks, until the Nazis dispatched him and the other survivors with lethal injection. On Oct. 17, 1971 Pope Paul VI beatified him and, on Oct. 10, 1982, Pope John Paul II canonized him with the title "Martyr of Charity."

Feast: Aug. 14.

Bibliography: D. DEWAR, Saint of Auschwitz (San Francisco 1982). J. DOMANSKI, I dati storici della vita del P. Massimiliano M. Kolbe (Rome 1973); For the Life of the World: Saint Maximilian and the Eucharist (Libertyville, Ill. 1993). L. M. FACCENDA, One more gift (West Covina, Calif. 1990); Symbiosis-contemplation and action (West Covina, Calif. 1991). A. FROSSARD, "Forget Not Love": The Passion of Maximilian Kolbe (Kenosha, Wisc. 1977; San Francisco 1990). B. HANLEY, Maximilian Kolbe (Notre Dame, Ind. 1982). JOHN PAUL II, Massimiliano Kolbe, patrono del nostro difficile secolo (Vatican City 1982). S. C. LOSRIT, The last days of Maximilian Kolbe (New York 1981). H. M. MANTEAU-BONAMY, La Doctrine mariale du père Kolbe (Paris 1975), Eng. tr. R. AR-NANDEZ, Immaculate Conception and the Holy Spirit (Kenosha, Wisc. 1977). A. RICCIARDI, St. Maximilian Kolbe: Apostle of Our Difficult Age (Boston 1982). A. ROMB, ed., The Kolbe Reader: The Writings of St Maximilian M. Kolbe, OFM Conv. (Libertyville, Ill. 1987); Maximilian Kolbe: authentic Franciscan (Libertyville, Ill. 1990). P. TREECE, A Man for Others: Maximilian Kolbe Saint of Auschwitz, In the Words of Those Who Knew Him (San Francisco 1982). M. WINOWSKA The Death Camp Proved Him Real, (Kenosha, Wis. 1971), Eng. tr. of Secret de Maximilien Kolbe (Paris 1971).

[J. E. MCCURRY]

KÖLLIN, CONRAD

Dominican apologete and early Thomistic commentator; b. Ulm, Germany, c. 1476; d. Cologne, Aug. 26, 1536. Köllin (Kollin, a Colle, Kolyn), the son of an undertaker, entered the Order of Preachers in 1492, eight years after the entry of his brother Ulrich (1469–1535). He studied philosophy and theology at Ulm, then matriculated at the University of Heidelberg in 1500. After serving as biblicus (1501), bachelor of the Sentences (1503), and master of students (1505), he became a master of theology in 1507. The same year he was elected prior of the Dominican community and became dean of the theology faculty of the university. At that time he began his lectures on the Summa theologiae of St. Thomas Aquinas. At the insistence of the theology faculties of Heidelberg and Cologne, and with the permission of Cardinal T. de Vio CAJETAN, then master general, Köllin published his most important theological work, a commentary on the la2ae of the Summa (Cologne 1512). His other contributions to moral theology include Speculum vitae (Cologne 1518) and Quodlibeta (Cologne 1523). His influence led to the introduction of the Summa theologiae as the standard theological textbook in place of the Sentences of Peter Lombard.

Köllin was probably the most important Catholic theologian in Germany at the time of the Reformation. He energetically defended Catholic doctrine against the teaching of the Lutherans in his Eversio Lutherani Epithalamii (Cologne 1527) and Adversus caninas Martini Lutheri nuptias (Tübingen 1530). From 1528 until his death he was inquisitor for the ecclesiastical provinces of Mainz, Trier, and Cologne.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorm, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23) 2.1:100. J. WILMS, Der Kölner Universitätsprofessor Konrad Köllin (Cologne 1941). N. PAULUS, Die deutschen Dominikaner im Kampfe gegen Luther, 1518–1563 (Freiburg 1903) 111–134.

[J. HENNESSEY]

KOLPING, ADOLF, BL.

Pioneer German Catholic social leader; founder of the Kolping Societies (Gesellenvereine); b. Kerpen, near Cologne, Dec. 8, 1813; d. Cologne, Dec. 4, 1865. Kolping was the son of a shepherd, Peter Kolping, and Anna Maria Zurheyden. He apprenticed as a shoemaker. While working 12 hours a day he prepared himself for institutions of higher learning by teaching himself. He was graduated from the Marzellengymnasium at the age of 24, and then studied at the Universities of Munich and Bonn (1841–44). After his ordination at Cologne in 1845, he was assigned to the struggling industrial city of Elberfeld, where he was impressed by the effects of the new capitalism. He joined a youth organization founded by a teacher, Johann Gregor Breuer, became its president in 1847, and, after two years of successful effort, began to be called "father of the journeymen." This organization was his model when, in 1849, he was transferred to the Cologne cathedral and founded there a Catholic association of journeymen. Even in his lifetime his "Kolping Families" (Kolpingwerke) spread throughout Europe and to America; at his death he was mourned by some 26,000 members in 400 different branches.

Kolping's spiritual character was formed by his family, his early sacrifices, and hard work. On the intellectual level he encountered at Munich the heritage of Johann Michael Sailer (1751–1832), for whom religion was the basis of all education. The social teachings of Franz von Baader (1765–1841) likewise left their mark upon his program. Professors who influenced him especially were Josef Görres, Ignaz Döllinger, and Friedrich Windischmann. Kolping deliberately opposed the intellectual tendencies of his age. He was a leader against the rationalism and antisocial individualism then found in the social and political spheres as liberalism among the upper classes and socialism among the lower. Nevertheless, he developed no system, but became a man of action.

Kolping recognized the new value of work and achievement in the transition from the feudal to the modern social order, as well as the importance of the education of the individual for the attainment of this value. He furthered the education of the young people in his association, which he wanted to have recognized as "a people's academy in the people's style." At the same time, he demanded occupational efficiency, saying, "Religion and work are the golden foundation of the people."

Kolping's strength as an educator lay in his fostering of those attitudes that enable individuals to achieve something by their own power and to improve their social position. His purpose extended to raising the intellectual and spiritual status of the whole working class. In 1849, Kolping was appointed vicar of the Cologne cathedral and began to write and speak extensively to promulgate the ideas of the Gesellenverein, defend the rights of workers, and awaken Catholics to their socio-political responsibilities. Kolping used the money generated by his writings to found several periodicals: Rheinische Kirchenblatt, Feierstunde, and Vereinsorgan (1850–54), Rheinischen Volksblätter für Haus, Familie, und Handwerk (from 1854), the Katholischer Volkskalender (1850–53), Kalender für das katholische Volk (1853–66). The so-called German "John Bosco" or "Journeymen's Father" died at age 51 and was buried in the Minoritenkirche, Cologne.

At his beatification Oct. 27, 1991, Pope John Paul II called Kolping the "precursor of the great social encyclicals." He described the blessed as a man who "stood with both feet planted firmly on the ground, and was oriented toward heaven."

Bibliography: Schriften. Kölner Ausgabe, Vol. I: Documents, Diary, Poems, ed. H. J. KRACHT (Cologne 1975; 2d ed. 1981); Vol. II: Letters, ed. M. HANKE (Cologne 1976); Vol. III-V: Social Statements and the Gesellenverein, ed. R. COPELOVICI et al. (Cologne 1985-87); Vol. VI: Pictures from Rome, ed. H. J. KRACHT (Cologne 1986). Briefe, ed. M. HANKE and R. COPELOVICI (Cologne 1991). Kolping und sein Werk, ed. Generalsekretariat der kath. Gesellenvereine (Cologne 1920). Literature. T. BRAUER, Kolping (Freiburg 1923, Kevelaer 1935). A. BUETTNER, Kolping Der Mann Gottes: Priester des Volkes (Cologne 1937). V. CONZEMIUS, Kolping Der Gesellenvater aktuell, damals und heute (Fribourg-Hamburg 1982). C. FELDMANN, Adolf Kolping: Für ein soziales Christentum (Freiburg 1991). H. FESTING, Kolping und sein Werk. Ein Überblick über Leben und Wirken des großen Sozialreformers sowie über die Entwicklung seines Werkes bis heute (Freiburg 1981); Was Kolping für uns bedeutet (Freiburg 1985). H. GRANVOGL, Kolping und die christliche-soziale Bewegung (Augsburg 1987). M. HANKE, Sozialer Wandel durch Veränderung des Menschen. Leben, Wirken und Werk des Sozialpädagogen Kolping (Mülheim 1974). H.-J. KRACHT, Kolping: Ein Mann von gestern mit Ideen für morgen (2d. ed. Essen 1972); Kolping: Sozialpädagoge und Erwachsenenbildner (Cologne 1977); Adolph Kolping: Priester, Pädagoge, Publizist im Dienst christlicher Sozialreform (Freiburg 1993). R. MÜLLER, Adolf Kolping: Visionär und Reformer (Freiburg 1991). L. PERRIDON, Gesellschaftspolit. Bedingungen der Arbeit Kolpings (Augsburg-Munich 1978). T. REMPE, Kolping: Grundsätze zur Pädagogik und Organisation seines Werkes (Cologne 1975). B. RIDDER, Person und Leben Kolpings in Urkunden und im Urteil von Zeitgenossen (Cologne 1960). G. RITZERFELD, Kolping (Cologne 1963). S. G. SCHÄFFER, Kolping, der Gesellenvater. Ein Lebensbild (Münster 1880, 1882, reprinted Paderborn 1894, Cologne 1927, 1947, 1952, 1961). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1991) 1064. P. STEINKE, Leitbild für die Kirche (Paderborn 1992). H. J. WIRTZ, Katholische Gesellenvereine und Kolpingsfamilien im Bistum Münster 1852-1960 (Münster 1999). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1991) 1064.

[H. FISCHER]

KOLPING SOCIETY, CATHOLIC

A socio-religious organization for promoting the development of the individual and family, founded in Cologne, Germany, in 1849 by Adolph Kolping, a priest of the archdiocese. Through its "Kolping Houses," which serve as centers of activity of the local branches and also as familial homes with boarding facilities for out-of-town members, it fosters a sense of belonging and friendship through spiritual, educational, social, and charitable programs.

Kolping was ordained on April 13, 1845, in the Minoriten Church in Cologne, which later became the center of his foundation and his final resting place. He became interested in the work that bears his name during his first priestly assignment at Elberfeld in the Rhineland where he was director for a small group of young Catholics organized as a friendship society. After his transfer to Cologne, he organized the first group of young workers on May 6, 1849. The organization soon spread over Central Europe; by 1865, the time of his death, Kolping's societies spread throughout many countries of the world.

The first Kolping societies in the United States were organized in 1859. The present national organization, The Catholic Kolping Society of America, was constituted in 1923 and affiliated to the International Kolping Society. Historically, its houses in New York and Los Angeles served as boarding houses for young men in transition. Its activities are organized in and around the many Kolping Houses, where members and friends gather and interact within the framework of the Christian Gospel.

Bibliography: M. I. FIEDERLING, Adolf Kolping and the Kolping Society of the United States (Chicago 1941). F. J. WOTHE, Adolf Kolping: Leben und Lehre eines grossen Erziehers (3d ed. Recklinghausen 1952). J. NATTERMANN, Adolf Kolping als Sozialpädagoge (Meiner 1926).

[H. A. KREWITT/EDS.]

KÖNIG, FRANZ BORGIA

Cardinal, archbishop of Vienna; b. Aug. 3, 1905, Rabenstein, Lower Austria into a farmer's family, the eldest of 10 children. He attended the grammar school of the Benedictine Monastery of Melk, and in 1927 went on to Collegium Germanicum-Hungaricum in Rome, where he studied philosophy (Ph.D., 1930) and theology (Ph.D., 1936) and was ordained to the priesthood on Oct. 29, 1933. During his stay in Rome he also studied old Persian religions and languages at the Pontifical Institute Biblicum. After his return to his home diocese of Sankt Pölten, Lower Austria, he served as chaplain in smaller parishes and then as curate to the cathedral. His teaching career began in 1945 with an appointment to lecture in religious studies at the University of Vienna; from 1948 to 1952 he taught moral theology at the University of Salzburg. He published widely in the field of comparative religion, his chief work being the three-volume Christus und die Religionen der Erde (1948). In 1952 he was elected titular bishop of Liviade and appointed coadjutor of Sankt Pölten, with right of succession. Continuing his work in religious studies he compiled his Religionswissenschaftliches Wörterbuch (1956) and was appointed editor for the second edition of the Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (10 vols). Pope Pius XII appointed him archbishop of Vienna in 1956, and two years later he was created cardinal, with the title of S. Eusebio, by Pope John XXIII. He was also the ordinary for Greek-rite Catholics living in Austria and, from 1959 to 1968, military vicar of Austria. In 1959 Cardinal König founded the Afro-Asian-Institute in Vienna as a platform for intercultural and interreligious exchange between the Christian West and the newly emancipated Afro-Asian countries. This spontaneous experiment gave him a clear vision and firm attitude at the Second Vatican Council regarding religious freedom (declaration Dignitatis Humanae, 1965) and interreligious dialogue (declaration Nostra Aetate, 1965). König was appointed to the Central Preparatory Commission of the Second Vatican Council and for the first session served in the Theological Commission. Karl Rahner was his peritus at the council.

Franz Borgia Cardinal König. (Archive Photos.)

In 1965 Pope Paul VI appointed Cardinal König president of the Secretariat for Non-Believers, a position he held until 1980. A concern for dialogue—ecumenical, interreligious, church-state—was the hallmark of his public activity. In Austria he tried to heal the wounds of civil war and the dissent of pre-war Austria (Austrofascism vs. Austro- Marxism) by reconciling trade unions and socialists with the church. A breakthrough was achieved by his lecture at the General Assembly of the Austrian Trade Unions 1973, "Kirche und Gesellschaft." His first diplomatic contacts with eastern churches under communist oppression resulted in a profound ecumenical engagement with Orthodoxy and Old Oriental Churches from which the foundation "Pro Oriente" took its origin (1964). The resulting mutual visits and free theological exchange bore rich fruit, including the "Vienna Formula" (1993), which cleared old misunderstandings in Christology by a commonly accepted definition of the natures and person of Christ with a large impact on interecclesial relationships. The global dimension of the gospel's message led Cardinal König to cooperate with the Congregation of World Mission in Rome (1968). He also made notable attempts to engage in dialogue with scholars. In 1968 he offered an attempt to reconcile natural sciences and Christian faith with "Der Fall Galilei." He also helped to found the "Institut für die Wissenschaften vom Menschen" (1983), which since that time has held biennial seminars with the pope at Castel Gandolfo. In 1985 Cardinal König resigned his archbishopric. For the next five years he served as president of "Pax Christi International."

It is widely held that Cardinal König took the lead in advancing the candidacy of Karol Wojtyła in the 1978 conclave that elected him as Pope John Paul II.

Bibliography: A. SCHIFFERLE, Geduld und Vertrauen: Franz Kardinal König—Texte und Gespräche. (Freiburg 1995).A. FENZL and R. FÖLDY, eds. Franz Kardinal König. Haus auf festem Grund. (1994). F. KÖNIG, Appelle an Gewissen und Vernunft (1996).J.

KUNZ, ed. Kardinal Franz König: Ansichten eines engagierten Kirchenmannes. (1991).

[P. BSTEH]

KONINGS, ANTHONY

Redemptorist moral theologian; b. Helmond, near 's-Hertogenbosch, in the Low Countries, Aug. 24, 1821; d. Ilchester, Maryland, June 30, 1884. Konings entered the REDEMPTORIST congregation and was professed on Nov. 6, 1843, and ordained on Dec. 21, 1844. He served as professor of moral theology and Canon Law in the Redemptorist house of studies at Wittem, Holland, and became provincial of the province of Holland (1865-68). In 1870 he accepted an assignment that brought him to the U.S., where he taught moral theology and Canon Law in the Redemptorist seminary at Ilchester, Maryland, and quickly became a consultant to American bishops and priests in difficult questions involving theological and canonical principles and practice. He wrote a number of tracts and articles on these subjects and two highly appreciated books: Theologia moralis S. Alphonsi in compendium redacta et usui ven. cleri americani accomodata (Boston 1874, six later editions) and Commentarium in facultates apostolicas . . . ad usum ven. cleri americani (New York 1884). This work was revised by J. Putzer in 1893 and had a 5th edition in 1898.

Bibliography: J. A. HANDLEY, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al, 16 vol. (New York 1907–14) 8:689–690. M. DE MEULEMEESTER et al., Bibliographie générale des écrivains Rédemptoristes, 3 vol. (Louvain 1933–39) 2:227–228; 3:333.

[A. SAMPERS]

KOREA, MARTYRS OF, SS.

Also known as Andrew Kim Tae-gon and Companions, and Paul Chong Hasang and Companions; d. in Korea, 1839, 1846, 1866, and 1867. During his 21st international pastoral visit, Pope John Paul II canonized 103 of the estimated 8,000–10,000 martyrs of Korea on May 6, 1984, in its capital Seoul. This marked the bicentennial of Christianity in Korea and the first canonization ceremony held outside the Vatican. After noting the uniqueness of the Korean Catholic community in the history of the Church, he said: "The death of the martyrs is similar to the death of Christ on the Cross, because, like his, theirs has become the beginning of new life."

The canonized Korean Martyrs are 103 Catholics first beatified in two groups: 79 martyrs who died during the Choson dynasty (1839–46) were beatified in 1925; 24 martyred in 1866–67 were raised to the altar in 1968.

St. Andrew Kim Tae-gon.

Among the group were 10 French missionaries (3 bishops and 7 Paris Society of Foreign Missions [MEP]), 46 Korean men (1 priest, 1 seminarian, 25 lay catechists, and 19 other laymen), and 47 Korean women (15 virgins, 11 married women, 18 widows, and 3 of unknown marital status; 3 of them were catechists). They ranged in age from 13 to 78. Most of the canonized saints were beheaded, but 17 were hanged or strangled, 10 expired in prison, and 7 died under torture. Their common feast is September 20 on the General Roman Liturgical Calendar.

The names of the two martyrs listed in the liturgical calendar are Andrew Kim Tae-gon, the first Korean priest, and Paul Chong Hasang, a renowned lay leader.

Andrew Kim Tae-gon, b. Tchoung-tcheng Province, Korea, Aug. 21, 1821; d. near Seoul, Korea, Sept. 16, 1846, was born into Korean nobility. Kim's father Ignatius Kim, and grandfather, In-He Kim (d. 1814) died for the faith. After his baptism (1836) Andrew went with two other Korean youths to seminary in Macau, China, where he remained until 1842. He then set out for his native land, but not until his third attempt and after many difficulties did he succeed in entering the closely guarded Hermit Kingdom, as Korea was known, by way of Manchuria (1845). In 1844 he was ordained a deacon, and in 1845 he crossed the Yellow Sea and was ordained a priest in Shanghai, becoming the first native Korean priest. He returned to Korea in company with Bp. Jean Ferréol, the vicar apostolic, and Fr. A. Daveluy. In 1846 Kim was assigned to arrange for the entrance of more missionaries by some water routes that would elude the border patrol. During this process he was arrested, imprisoned, tortured, and finally beheaded at the Han River near Seoul, the capital. The body was exposed publicly for three days, according to the custom, before burial at the site of execution. After 40 days the Catholics were able to obtain the remains and bury them on Mi-ri nai Mountain about 35 miles distant. In 1949 the HOLY SEE designated him the principal patron of the clergy of Korea.

Paul Chong Hasang (Cheong), seminarian, lay catechist, d. Sept. 22, 1839 (age 45), hanged outside the small west gate in Seoul. Paul was one of the lay leaders of the early Korean Church. His father, leader of the confraternity of Christian doctrine, and his uncle were martyred in the Shin-Yu persecution of 1801. Following in their footsteps, Paul gathered the scattered Christians and labored to strengthen the infant Korean Church. He traveled nine times to Beijing as a servant to the Korean diplomatic mission in order to petition the bishop of Beijing to send priests to Korea. Because his plea fell on deaf ears, he appealed directly to Rome in 1925, which led to the dispatch of French missionaries. He also wrote to the prime minister a short apologetic (Sang-Je-Sang-Su) on Christian doctrine and its harmony with national values in the hope of ending the persecution of Christians. Paul was one of the three men sent by Maubant to Macau for seminary training; he was martyred, however, prior to ordination. His mother, Cecilia, and sister died for their faith shortly thereafter.

The earliest missionaries to Korea are also included among the martyrs canonized: Laurent Joseph Marius Imbert, bishop; b. 1786, Marignane (Bouches-du-Rhône), France; Pierre Philibert Maubant, b.1803 in Vaussy (Calvados); Jacques Honoré Chastan, b. 1803 in Marcoux (Basses-Alpes). Imbert entered the MEP in 1818, was ordained in 1819, and went to China (1820) after ordination, where he labored as a missionary until he became the second vicar apostolic of Korea (1837) and the first one to enter the country. Preceding him were two French confreres, Maubant and Chastan. Maubant was ordained in 1829, joined the MEP in 1831, and set out for Korea in 1832. He entered the country in 1836, the same year as Chastan, who was ordained in 1826, joined the MEP in 1827, and went to Thailand before his assignment to Korea (1832). Since the Hermit Kingdom did not admit foreigners and did not tolerate Christians, the three men, the only priests then in the country, could not engage openly in their apostolate. An edict, issued in April 1839 was followed by fierce persecution. Bishop Imbert (whose Korean name was Bom) found it necessary to flee from Seoul, the capital, in June. He remained in hiding until betrayed by a renegade Christian and seized by the authorities (August 11). From his prison in Seoul he sent to his two priests a controversial letter that directed them to come forward. Maubant (Ra in Korean) and Chastan (Cheong) came as directed. The three were tried, tortured, and sentenced to military execution. After they had been beheaded at state expense at a public and solemn ceremony in Sae Nam Do near Seoul (Sept. 21, 1839), their heads were suspended in public to terrify Christians. Their mortal remains are enshrined at Samsong-san, near Seoul.

Besides these men, the following other martyrs were canonized. They are listed by their given name together with their date of death and age at the time of death.

Agatha Chon Kyong-hyob (Kyung-Hyun Jeon, Tiyen), virgin; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (52), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Agatha Kim A-gi (Up-Yi Kim), widow; d. May 24, 1839 (65); beatified 1925.

Agatha Kwon Chin-i (Jin-Yi Kwon), housewife; d. Jan. 31, 1840 (21), beheaded at Dang-Gogae.

Agatha Yi (Lee), virgin; d. Jan. 9, 1840 (17), hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Agatha Yi Kan-nan (Gan-Nan Lee), widow; d. Sept. 20, 1846 (32), hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Agatha Yi Kyong-i (Kyung-Yi Lee), virgin; d. Jan. 31, 1840 (27), beheaded at Dang-Gogae.

Agatha So-Sa Lee, widow; d. May 24, 1839 (55), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Agnes Kim Hyo-ju (Hyo-Joo Kim), virgin; d. Sept. 3, 1839 (23), beheaded outside the small west gate. She was imprisoned with her sister Columba Kim.

Alexius U Se-yong (Se-Young Woo); d. March 21, 1866 (21), beheaded at Saenam-To, then was displayed.

Andrew Chong Hwa-gyong (Hwa-Kyung Jung; Cheong; Tjyeng), lay catechist; d. Jan. 23, 1840 (33), hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Anna Kim Chang-gum (Jang-Keum Kim), widow; d. July 20, 1839 (50), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Anna Pak A-gi (Ah-Ki Park), housewife, May 24, 1839 (56), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Antoine Daveluy, French bishop; d. March 30, 1866 (49) beheaded at Kalmaemot, then the head was displayed as a warning to other Christians. He entered Korea with Andrew Kim Tae-gon and Bp. Ferréol in 1845. In 1862 he baptized 40 catechumens in the Christian refuge now called Han-Ti (meaning "mass grave") in the Palgong Mountains. Later all the Christians of the village were massacred in a surprise attack and buried together. Daveluy was responsible for establishing a press to print catechisms and for collecting and preserving information on those martyred. He edited the first Korean-French dictionary, which authorities burned together with other Christian books. In an attempt to spare other Christians, Daveluy turned himself in. From jail he wrote to Aumaitre and Martin Huin suggesting the same course of action. He was consecrated auxiliary to Bp. Berneux (1856) and martyred with Aumaitre, Huin, and Joseph Chang Chu-gi just three weeks after becoming the 5th apostolic vicar of Korea.

Anthony Kim Song-u (Sung-Woo Kim), lay catechist, d. April 29, 1841 (46), strangled in prison at Dang-Gogae for harboring foreign priests in his home. Two of his brothers were also martyred.

Augustine Pak Chong-won (Jong-Won Park), lay catechist; d. Jan. 31, 1840 (48), beheaded at Dang-Gogae.

Augustine Yi Kwang-hon (Kwang-Hun Lee, Ni), lay catechist; d. May 24, 1839 (52), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Augustine Yu Chin-kil (Jin-Kil Yoo, Ryou, Nyou); d. Sept. 22, 1839 (48), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Barbara Cho Chung-i (Zung-Yi Cho), housewife; d. Dec. 29, 1839 (57), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Barbara Ch'oe Yong-i (Young-Yi Choi), housewife; d. Feb. 1, 1840 (22), hanged at Dang-Gogae.

Barbara Han A-gi (Ah-Ki Han), widow; d. May 24, 1839 (47), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Barbara Kim, widow; d. May 27, 1839 (34) in prison.

Barbara Ko Sun-i (Soon-Yi Ko), housewife; d. Dec. 29, 1839 (41), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Barbara Kwon Hui (Hee Kwon), housewife; d. Sept. 3,1839 (45), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Barbara Yi (Jung-Hee Lee, Yong-h'ui), widow; d. Sept. 3, 1839 (40), beheaded outside the small west gate. She is the aunt of Barbara Yi Chong-hui (infra) and sister of Magdalene Yi Yong-h'ui.

Barbara Yi Chong-hui (Jung-Hee Lee), virgin; d. May 27, 1839 (14) in prison. Her aunts Barbara Jung-Hee

Lee and Magdalene Yi Yong-h'ui were martyred several months later.

Bartholomew Chong Mun-ho (Moon-Ho Jung), county governor; d. Dec. 23, 1866 (65), beheaded at Jun Joo (ChonHo), where he is buried.

Benedicta Hyon Kyong-nyon (Kyung-Ryung Han; Hyen), lay catechist; d. Dec. 29, 1839 (45), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Catherine Chong Ch'ol-yom (Chul-Yom Jung; Cheong), housewife; d. Sept. 20, 1846 (29), hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Catherine Yi (Lee), widow; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (56) in prison.

Charles Cho Shin-ch'ol (Shin-Chul Cho, Tjyo); d. Sept. 26, 1839 (46), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Charles Hyon Sok-mun (Seok-Moon Hyun, Hyen), lay catechist; d. Sept. 19, 1846 (49), decapitated and head displayed at Seoul. Bishop Imbert entrusted the care of the Korean Christians to Charles before the deaths of the three priests.

Cecilia Yu So-sa (Ryou), widow and mother of Paul Chong Hasang and Elizabeth Chong Ch'ong-hye; d. Nov. 23, 1839 (78) in prison.

Columba Kim Hyo-im, virgin; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (25), imprisoned, pierced with red hot awls, scorched with burning coals, then beheaded outside the small west gate.

Damian Nam Myong-hyok, lay catechist; d. May 24, 1839 (37) beheaded outside the small west gate. He was a model husband and father.

Elizabeth Chong Ch'ong-hye (Jung-Hye Jung; Cheong), virgin, younger sister of Paul Chong Hasang; d. Dec. 29, 1839 (42), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Francis Ch'oe Kyong-hwan (Kyung-Hwan Choi, Tchoi), lay catechist; d. Sept. 12, 1839 (34) in prison. Francis is the father of Korea's second native priest, Thomas Yang-Up Choi. During the Gihae persecution his family was arrested. His youngest son starved to death in his mother's arms in prison; four of his sons, however, survived to witness the beheading of Francis's wife, Maria Song-Rye Yi, the year following his death (1840). Although his sons did not die for the faith, they suffered becoming exiled beggars. In 1849 Fr. Yang-Up Choi returned to his homeland to pray at his father's grave near AnYang in the village of DamBae-Gol.

Ignatius Kim Che-jun (Je-Joon Kim), father of Andrew Kim and lay catechist; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (43), beheaded outside the small west gate.

John Baptist Chon Chang-un (Jang-Woon Jeon), vendor and publisher; d. March 9, 1866 (55), beheaded outside the small west gate.

John Baptist Nam Chong-sam (Jong-Sam Nam), regional governor; d. March 7, 1866 (49), beheaded outside the small west gate of Seoul. Chong-sam was renowned as a just government official. Before his arrest and martyrdom he resigned his position and retired to Myojae because he could not offer sacrifice to his ancestors in good conscience. He is remembered as a model of chastity, charity, and poverty.

John Baptist Yi Kwang-nyol (Kwang-Ryul Lee), technician; d. July 20, 1839 (44), beheaded outside the small west gate.

John Pak Hu-jae (Hoo-Jae Park), merchant; d. Sept. 3, 1839 (40), beheaded outside the small west gate.

John Ri Mun-u (Moon-Woo Lee), lay catechist; d. Feb. 1, 1839 (31), hanged at Dang-Gogae. He was a Korean layman who wrote a still extant letter from prison; beatified 1925.

John Yi Yun-il (Yoon-Il Lee), lay catechist; d. Jan. 21, 1867 (43), beheaded at Kwan-Duk Jung in TaeKu. In 1987 his body was translated to the Lourdes Grotto at TaeKu, where Pope John Paul II stopped to pray in 1984.

Joseph Chang Chu-gi (Joo-Ki Jang), lay catechist and teacher of Chinese literature; d. March 30, 1866 (63). The first Korean seminary was established in his home in 1856. One room was used as a classroom and dormitory; the other as a rectory. He was decapitated and his head displayed at Kalmaemot for trying to protect the Christians hidden in his pottery kiln, which had been used by the Christians as a place of worship and to support themselves once they were dispossessed of family and property for their religion.

Joseph Chang Song-jib (Sung-Jip Jang, Tjyang), brother of Anthony Sung-Woo Kim; d. May 26, 1839 (53) strangled in prison at Po Chung Ok.

Joseph Cho Yun-ho (Yoon-Ho Cho), farmer; d. Dec. 23, 1866 (18) died at Jun Joo.

Joseph Im Ch'i-baek (Chi-Baek Im, Rim), Seoul boatman; d. Sept. 20, 1846 (42) hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Julietta Kim, virgin; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (55), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Just Ranfer de Bretennières, French priest; d. March 7, 1866 (28), decapitated, head displayed at Seoul.

Lawrence Han I-hyong (Yi-Hyung Han), lay catechist; d. Sept. 20, 1846 (47), hanged Po Chung Ok.

Lucy Kim, virgin; d. July 20, 1839 (21) outside the small west gate.

Lucy Kim (II), widow; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (70) in prison.

Lucy Pak Hui-sun (Hee-Soon Park), virgin; d. May 5, 1839 (38), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Louis Beaulieu, French priest; d. March 7, 1866 (26), decapitated and head displayed at Seoul.

Luke Hwang Sok-tu (Seok-Du Hwang), lay catechist; d. March 30, 1866 (53), beheaded then displayed at Kalmaemot. Luke was the brilliant coworker of Bishop Daveluy. He translated the Bible into Korean and wrote catechetical material for publication.

Magdalena Cho, virgin; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (32) in prison.

Magdalena Han Yong-i (Young-Yi Han), widow; d. Dec. 29, 1839 (55), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Magdalena Ho Kye-im (Gye-Im Her; He Kye-im, Ho), housewife; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (66), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Magdalena Kim Ob-i (Ah-Ki Lee), widow; d. May 24, 1839 (52), hanged outside the small west gate.

Magdalena Pak Pong-son (Bong-Son Park), widow; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (43), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Magdalena Son So-byok (So-Byuk Son), housewife; d. Jan. 31, 1840 (39), hanged at Dang-Gogae.

Magdalena Yi Yong-dok (Young-Duk Lee), virgin; d. Dec. 29, 1839 (27), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Magdalena Yi Yong-h'ui (Young-Hee Lee), virgin; d. July 20, 1839 (30) outside the small west gate. She is the sister of Barbara Yi.

Maria Pak K'un-agi (Keum-AhKi Park), housewife; d. Sept. 3, 1839 (53), beheaded outside the small west gate. Her husband, Philip Kim, was also martyred but is not numbered among these saints.

Maria Won Kwi-im (Gui-Im Won, Ouen), virgin; d. July 20, 1839 (21), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Maria Yi In-dok (In-Duk Lee), virgin; d. Jan. 31, 1840 (22), hanged at Dang-Gogae.

Maria Yi Y'on-hui (Yeon-Hee Lee), wife, mother, member of a simple form of religious sisterhood; d. Sept. 3, 1839 (35), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Mark Chong Ui-bae (Eui-Bae Jung), lay catechist; d. March 11, 1866 (71), decapitated and head displayed at Seoul.

Martha Kim Song-im (Sung-Im Kim), widow; d. July 20, 1839 (49), outside the small west gate.

Martin Luc (Luke) Huin, French priest; d. March 30, 1866 (30), beheaded and head displayed at Kalmaemot.

Paul Ho Hyop (Im Her, He, Heo), soldier; d. Jan. 30, 1840 (45), hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Paul Hong Yong-ju (Young-Joo Hong), lay catechist; d. Feb. 1, 1840 (39), beheaded at Dang-Gogae.

Perpetua Hong Kum-ju (Keum-Joo Hong), widow; d. Sept. 29, 1839 (35), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Pierre Aumaitre, French priest of MEP; d. March 30, 1866 (29), beheaded at Kalmaemot.

Peter Cho Hwa-so (Hwa-Seo Cho), farmer; d. Dec. 13, 1866 (51), beheaded at Jun Joo.

Peter Ch'oe Ch'ang-hup (Chang-Hoop Choi), lay catechist; d. Dec. 29, 1839 (52), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Peter Ch'oe Hyong (Hyung Choi), lay catechist; d. March 9, 1866 (52), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Peter Chong Won-ji (Won-Ji Jung), farmer; d. Dec. 13, 1866 (20), beheaded at Jun Joo.

Peter Hong Pyong-ju (Byung-Joo Hong, Kong), lay catechist; d. Jan. 31, 1840 (42), hanged at Dang-Gogae.

Peter Kwon Tug-in (Deuk-In Kwon, Kouen), producer of religious goods; d. May 24, 1839 (34) in prison outside the small west gate.

Peter Nam Kyong-mun (Kyung-Moon Nam), soldier, lay catechist; d. Sept. 20, 1846 (50), hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Peter Son Son-ji (Seon-Ji Son), lay catechist; d. Dec. 13, 1866 (46), beheaded at SupJungYi with Bartholomew Chong Mun-ho. Their bodies rest at Chon Ho in the north Cholla province.

Peter Ho-Young Lee, lay catechist; d. Nov. 25, 1838 (35) in prison.

Peter Won-Seo Han, lay catechist; d. Dec. 13, 1866 (20), beheaded at Jun Joo.

Peter Yi Myong-so (Myung-Seo Lee), farmer; d. Dec. 13, 1866 (45), beheaded at Jun Joo.

Peter Yi Tae-ch'ol (Dae-Chul Yoo, Ryou, Ryau), youth; d. Oct. 31, 1839 (13) at Po Chung Ok. Little Peter had presented himself to the magistrates, proclaiming that he was a Christian. The judges were horrified at his tortures. Fearing the popular opinion would turn again the authorities, his executioners strangled him after his return to prison.

Peter Yu Chong-nyul (Jung-Ryung Yoo), lay catechist; d. Feb. 17, 1866 (29) at Pyung Yang (now in North Korea).

Pierre-Henri Dorie, French priest; d. March 7, 1866 (27), beheaded at SaeNamTo and head displayed.

Protasius Chong Kuk-bo (Kook-Bo Jung, Cheong), noble and maker of musical instruments; d. May 20, 1839 (40) in prison at Po Chung Ok. He apostatized under torture and was released. Later he regretted his weakness, gave himself up to the authorities, and died from his torments.

Rosa Kim, widow; d. July 20, 1839 (55), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Sebastian Nam I-gwan (Yi-Kwan Nam), lay catechist; d. Sept. 26, 1839 (59), beheaded outside the small west gate.

Simeon Berneux, French bishop; d. March 7, 1866 (52), beheaded.

Stephen Min Kuk-ka (Geuk-Ga Min), lay catechist; d. Jan. 30, 1840 (53), hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Susanna U Sul-im (Sul-Im Woo), widow; d. Sept. 20, 1846 (43), hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Teresa Kim, widow; d. Jan. 9, 1940 (44) hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Teresa Kim Im-i (Yim-Yi Kim), virgin; d. Sept. 20, 1846 (35), hanged at Po Chung Ok.

Teresa Yi Mae-im (Mae-Im Lee), housewife; d. July 20, 1839 (51), outside the small west gate.

Thomas Son Cha-son (Ja-Sun Son), farmer; d. March 30, 1866 (22), hanged at Gong Joo.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 17 (1925) 366–69. L'Osservatore Romano, English ed., no. 20 (1984) 5–6, 20. C. DALLET, L'Histoire de l'Eglise de Corée (1874) 118–185. Documents relatifs au martyrs de Corée, 2 v. (Hong Kong 1924). C. A. HERBST, "Unless the Grain of Wheat First Die . . .," American Ecclesiastical Revue 139 (1958) 331–337; "The Bishop Dies," ibid. 138 (1958) 149–157; "Korea's Martyr-Patron," ibid. 137 (1957) 330–341. K. D. KIM, Life of Kim Dae Kun (Seoul 1960), in Korean. A. LAUNAY, Martyrs français et coréens (1925). S. A. MOFFETT, The Christians of Korea (New York 1962). M. W. NOBLE, Victorious Lives of Early Christians (Seoul 1933).

[C. A. HERBST/K. RABENSTEIN]

KOREA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located on the eastern coast of the Asian continent, the Korean peninsula borders on China in the north and Capital: The capital of North Korea is P'yongyang; the capital of South Korea is Seoul.

Size: 46,609 sq. miles (north); 38,022 sq. miles (south). Population: 21.2 million (north); 46.4 million (south). The people are racially homogeneous except for a few ethnic Japanese and a small number of Chinese.

Languages: Korean; English is taught in schools in the south. Religions: 49% are Christian, 47% Buddhist, 3% Confucian, and 1% Shamanist, Ch'ondogyo (Religion of the Heavenly Way) and other in the south. Buddhism and Confucianism dominate in North Korea with some Christians and followers of the Ch'ongdogyo.

is surrounded by the Yellow Sea to the east and the Sea of Japan to the west. Politically the peninsula is divided into the Democratic People's Republic of Korea in the north and the Republic of Korea in the south. The Annuario Pontificio treats Korea as a single entity.

The Korean peninsula, mostly mountainous and poorly endowed with natural resources, was unified politically from the 7th century onward. Bitter experiences with invaders led the kingdom to close its doors to all foreigners except Chinese at the end of the 16th century. For the next 250 years or so Korea was known as the Hermit Kingdom. From 1910 until 1945 it was annexed to Japan. In 1948 North Korea came under communist rule, and the ensuing civil war between North and South Korea (1950-53) ended in a stalemate. Subsequent rapprochement between the North and South resulted in in a marked reduction in border tensions, limited family reunion meetings, reopening of rail connection and closer trade ties. For his peacemaking efforts, Kim Dae Jung, the first Catholic to be President of South Korea, was awarded the 2000 Nobel Peace Prize.

Korean Religion. The earliest form of Korean religion exhibits close affinity with the nature cults of north-central Asia and may be described as animism. It embodied a belief in the existence of numerous spirits and demons in the sky and on earth, in the sun, moon, and stars, and in mountains and rivers. Ancestor worship is a marked feature of the old native religion, and there is a belief in a High God (Hananim), identified with the firmament, or heaven. The shaman (mutang) has had so central a role since prehistoric times that the native Korean religion may well be called shamanism. Even after the coming of Confucianism and Buddhism, shamanistic beliefs and practices continued to flourish, and they are still very much alive in modern Korea, especially in the countryside.

Confucianism was introduced from China as early as the 1st century B.C., and gave strong support to the native ancestor worship. It exercised a marked influence on Korean culture and government until it was eclipsed by Buddhism from the 4th and 5th centuries A.D. Neo-Confucianism spread from China into Korea several centuries later and in 1392 was adopted as the official religion of the Korean state under the Wang Dynasty. Despite the official supremacy of Confucianism until the Japanese occupation of Korea beginning in 1910, Buddhism continued to have an important place in the religious life of the people. The severe measures employed by the Japanese in the 1930s and during World War II to suppress all forms of religion in Korea that were regarded as inimical to Japanese imperial policy and their efforts to introduce Shintoism were marked largely by failure even before the recovery of Korean independence in 1945.

Among the numerous non-Christian sects that developed especially during the Japanese domination and since 1945, Ch'ondogyo (Religion of the Heavenly Way) deserves mention. Formerly known as Tonghak (Eastern Learning), Ch'ondogyo is an indigenous Korean religion that was founded by Ch'oe Cheu in 1860. It is a syncretic blend of Buddhism, Confucianism, Taoism, shamanism and Roman Catholicism.

Origins of the Catholic Church in Korea. During the Japanese invasion of Korea from 1592 to 1599, some Koreans were baptized, probably by Japanese Christian soldiers. Koreans were among the Christians put to death during the severe persecutions in Japan early in the 17th century: 9 of the 205 martyrs beatified in 1867 were Koreans (see JAPAN, MARTYRS OF). Attempts at Christian evangelization were frustrated by Korea's refusal to permit contacts with the outside world except for an annual embassy to pay a tax to the overlords of the imperial court in Beijing. Christian literature, obtained from the Jesuit missionaries there on these occasions, was brought back to Korea. In 1777 a group of educated Koreans began to study these books, and one of the scholars advised Yi Sung Hun, a member of the annual delegation of 1783, to contact the missionaries in Beijing. There he was baptized by Jean de Grammont, a Jesuit previous to the suppression of the order, and took the name Peter. Upon his return to Seoul he soon converted his influential friends Yi Pyok (baptized John Baptist) and Kwon Il Shin (Francis Xavier). The first church was located in the home of Kim Bom Ou in Myongdong. So successful was the apostolate of these first converts that James Chu, a Chinese priest who managed to enter the country secretly (1794), found 4,000 Catholics, none of whom had ever seen a priest. By 1801, when Father James Chu and 300 others were put to death for their faith, the Church had grown to 10,000.

Growth under Persecution. In 1831 the country was removed from the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Beijing and placed under the newly created Vicariate Apostolic of Korea, which was entrusted to the Paris Foreign Mission Society (MEP). Bishop Barthilemy Bruguière, the first vicar apostolic, died in 1835 before reaching Korea. Pierre Maubant, his companion, arrived in 1836 and was soon joined by another priest, Jacques Chastan, and by the second vicar apostolic, Laurent Imbert. These three MEP missionaries were martyred in the persecution of 1839, leaving Korea without priests until 1845, when Andrew Kim Te-gon, the first Korean priest, arrived from China with Father Daveluy and Bp. Jean Ferriol. Thomas Choi, the second native priest, arrived in 1849. In 1857 Korea had 7 priests for its 15,000 Catholics, and counted 1,924 baptisms; and in 1866 it had 12 priests for 23,000 Catholics. The first century of the Catholic Church in Korea was one of growth in the face of persecutions, which became particularly severe in 1801, 1839, 1846, and above all from 1866 to 1869, when some 10,000 Catholics were put to death. The final royal decree against Catholicism appeared in 1881, but it was not seriously enforced. During his pastoral visit to Korea in 1984 Pope John Paul II canonized the first Korean priest Andrew Kim Te-gon, the seminarian Paul Chong Pasang and 111 others who died in the persecutions (see KOREA, MARTYRS OF).

The Church since 1883. Religious freedom was granted in 1883 when Korea was opened to foreigners, and a period of steady growth followed. Bishop Fe1ix Ridel, who had escaped from the 1866 persecution, returned as vicar apostolic in 1877. He was soon arrested, but French and Japanese pressure effected his release. Ridel sent 22 Koreans to Malaya to prepare for the priesthood and began building red-brick churches in the Western style. The cathedral in Seoul was begun in 1888. The Sisters of St. Paul (Chartres) arrived in 1888, and the Benedictines in 1908. The seminary at Seoul opened in 1891. In 1901 a riot on the island of Cheju, fomented by jealous shamans, resulted in the massacre of 700 Catholics. Two Paris Foreign Mission Society (MEP) priests, who had baptized hundreds there, narrowly escaped death.

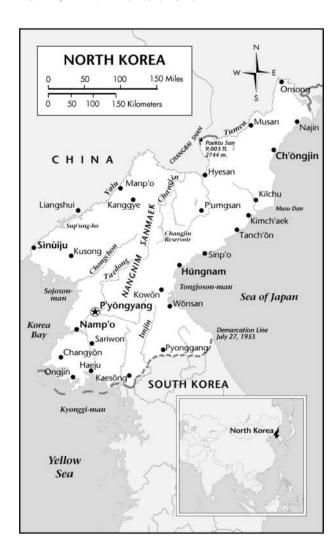

Korea had 77,000 Catholics in 1911 when the Vicariate Apostolic of Seoul was divided to create that of Taikyu. As the Church grew, other vicariates were erected. Paul Ro, who became bishop of Seoul in 1942, was the first native bishop. Another Korean, F. Hong, became bishop of P'yongyang in 1944. The Korean War seriously disrupted the Church. In sections that were invaded by Communists, persecutions occurred: bishops and priests were imprisoned and put to death; Bp. Patrick Byrne, one of the Maryknoll Missioners, perished during a forced march. In South Korea, the Catholic Church experienced tremendous growth after 1953. Very little is known about

Metropolitan Sees	Suffragans
Kwangju	Cheju, Chongju
Seoul	Ch'unch'on, Hamhung (North Korea), Inch'on, P'yongyang (North Korea), Suwon, Taejon, Wonju
Taegu	Andong, Ch'ongju, Masan, Pusan

the Church in North Korea since then. In 1962, when the Korean hierarchy was established, three ecclesiastical provinces were created Kwangju, Seoul and Taegu.

The Impact of Vatican II. The Catholic Church in Korea in the 1960s and 1970s was strongly influenced by the Second VATICAN COUNCIL. The use of the vernacular in the Mass and the liturgical reforms were eagerly embraced. The Catholic Conference of Korea had the documents of the council and many explanatory works translated quickly into Korean. Since there had been a lack of materials for religious education, these materials filled a vacuum. In the 1970s Korea became a sending Church. The Korean Foreign Mission Society was founded in 1975, and religious institutes of women began to send missionaries abroad. By 1992 Koreans had also joined such foreign missionary societies as the Columbans and Guadalupe Missioners. Koreans were serving as missionaries in Papua-New Guinea, Taiwan, and several countries of Africa and South America. In addition, many Korean priests and religious were serving Koreans living abroad, especially those living in the United States. This post-conciliar period coincided with a period of economic expansion in South Korea that had begun in the late 1950s. The rapid economic development, led by a strong central government that favored large monopolistic corporations (chaebols), involved much exploitation and injustice. To mobilize the population for this development effort, and to counter North Korea's strong military, the central government employed a strong anti-communist stance and pervasive control of the media and squelched opposition. Thus, the main challenges to the Church during the 1970s and 1980s were issues of justice and human rights. Bishop Daniel Tji of Wonju and Cardinal Kim, Archbishop of Seoul, became outspoken critics of the regime and a group of clergy formed the Catholic Priests' Association for Justice.

Changing Status. In the 1980s the Catholic Church enjoyed high prestige in South Korean society. It was considered urban and modern. Its churches and liturgies gave Koreans a sense of awe and of the divine. The Koreanization of the clergy and visible involvement of Catholic priests and laity, especially young people, in the struggle for justice lent credibility to the whole Church. Priests in general became regarded as trustworthy persons, and Cardinal Kim was perceived by many as the most trustworthy person in the nation. Furthermore, the sense of insecurity following the Kwangju massacre helped turn many Koreans to religion. The Catholic laity, organized in the parishes into neighborhood groups or into lay organizations such as the Legion of Mary, were zealous in evangelizing the non-Christian Koreans. The Church enhanced its prestige by holding two huge events involving papal visits: the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Catholic Church in Korea, held in 1984, and the Eucharistic Congress in 1989. These large celebrations fitted in with the mood of the nation hosting the Asian Games in 1986 and the Olympic Games in 1988.

Ecumenical Collaboration. From the 1990s onwards, Christians comprised almost half of the South Korean population, and are strongly represented in all parts of society. This was the result of Christianity's rapid growth after religious freedom was granted in 1883. A sizeable proportion of Christians are Presbyterians and Methodists, followed by the Roman Catholics. Charismatic movements have attracted many Korean Christians. The Protestant charismatics have often formed around a charismatic leader, such as the case of Cho Yonggi, founder of the Full Gospel Central Church in 1958, which grew rapidly to over 250,000 members by the 1980s and eventually began sending out missionaries internationally. In other cases charismatic healers have set up prayer houses for faith healing, and have attracted huge numbers of the sick or of penitents. In the Catholic Church the charismatic movement is much more subdued and has for the most part been incorporated into the parish or diocesan structure. On the other hand, suspicious private revelations have influenced many of the Korean faithful, both Protestant and Catholic, and several Catholic priests have been suspended for promoting them.

Ecumenical collaboration between Protestants and Catholics in Korea has been slow for a number of reasons. Catholics and Protestants use a different name for God. They have produced a common translation of the New Testament, but it has been adopted widely only in the Catholic Church. The Catholic Church is generally tolerant and open, but many Protestant groups attack the Catholic Church, and some even attack other Protestant churches. This divisiveness is often associated with competition for members. One of the few areas of ecumenical collaboration has been among Christians engaged together in the social movements for justice.

Bibliography: C. DALLET, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, 2 v. (Paris 1874). E. FOURER, La Corée: Martyrs et missionaires (Nancy 1895). The Catholic Church in Korea (Hong Kong 1924). F. DE-MANGE, "Centenaire de 1'érection de la Corée en Vicariat Apostolique (1831-1931)," Revue d'histoire des missions 8 (1931) 387-415. COREANUS, "La Préhistoire de l'Église de Corée," ibid. 11 (1934) 203-220. J. LAURES, "Koreas erste Berührung mit dem Christentum." Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 40 (1956) 177-189, 282-287. YU HONG-NYOL, History of the Catholic Church in Korea (Seoul 1962), in Korean. C. KIM and J. CHONG, Catholic Korea Yesterday and Today (Seoul 1963), in Korean. W.E. BIERNATZKI, Korean Catholicism in the 1970s: A Christian Community Comes of Age (New York 1975). NYUNG KIM, The Politics of Religion in South Korea, 1974-1989: The Catholic Church's Political Opposition to the Authoritarian State (Pullman WA 1993). J.G. RUIZ DE MEDINA, Origenes de la Iglesia católica coreana desde 1566 hasta 1784 (Rome 1986). Kwangju Archdiocese Catholic Justice and Peace Research Institute, Hankuk Kat'olik Kyohoiwa Sowoichung Kurigo Sahoi Undong (Kwangju 1990). KWANG CHO, Hankuk Chunjukyo 200 Nyun (Seoul 1989). SOK WU CH'OI, Hankuk Chunjukyohoiui Yoksa (Seoul 1982). OK HUI KIM, Hankuk Chunjukyo Yosongsa (Masan 1983).

[C. A. HERBST/M. S. PARK/EDS.]

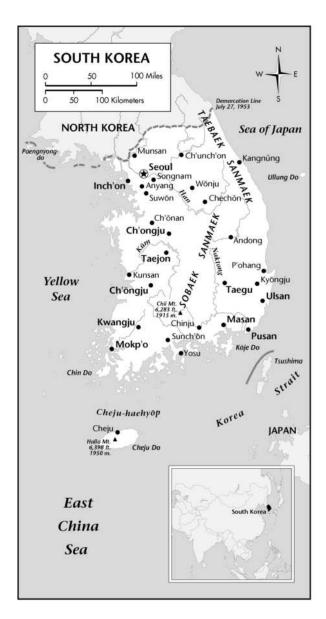

KOŠICE, MARTYRS OF, SS.

Melichar Grodziecký, Marek Križín, and Stefan Pongrácz; priests, martyrs; d. Sept. 7 and 8, 1619 at Košice in the far eastern portion of Slovakia; beatified 1905; canonized by Pope John Paul II, July 2, 1995 at the airport of Košice.

Košice was a Calvinist stronghold in the early seventeenth century. These martyrs came from three countries in order to offer the sacraments to Catholics who were otherwise without priests. The king's deputy petitioned the Jesuits to send priests to tend to the minority population and gratefully housed the two respondents in his official residence outside the city. Protestant antipathy toward Catholicism increased. Upon hearing that the Calvinist prince of Transylvania was approaching Košice under Georg I Rákóczi, the Jesuits hurried back to the city to be with their flock and were joined by the canon Križín. On the morning of September 7, soldiers tried to force them into apostasy. Upon their refusal, the priests were brutally beaten and killed. Their bodies were thrown into a sewage ditch, where they remained for six months before a pious countess was given permission to bury them. Immediately after death, they became the objects of veneration. Their relics are now housed in the Ursuline church at Trnava, Croatia.

Melichar Grodziecký, also known as Melchior Grodech or Grodecz, Jesuit priest; b. ca. 1584, in Grodziec (a village between Biesko and Cieszyn), Silesia, Poland. Melichar was born into a noble family and had Bishop John of Olomouc as an uncle. Melichar was educated by the Jesuits at Vienna, Austria. After joining the Society of Jesus at Brno, Moravia (1603), which was founded by his uncle John, he studied philosophy and theology, was ordained (1614), and worked as a teacher in Prague. At the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, he passed through Moravia and Slovakia, finally settling in Košice. Following the initial beating, Fr. Melichar was stripped, tortured, and finally he was mercifully beheaded.

Marek Križín, also known as Mark Crisin, Korosy, or Križevčanin, diocesan priest, administrator of Széplak Abbey; b. 1588 at Križevči, Croatia. Born into a noble Croatian family, he was educated by the Jesuits in Vienna and Graz, where he earned a doctorate in philosophy, and at the Germanicum (1611–1615) in Rome. Following ordination in Rome, he ministered for two years in his homeland. Then his former professor in Graz, Cardinal Pázmány, appointed him head of the Trnava seminary and a canon of the Esztergom Cathedral (Hungary). In 1619, he accepted assignment as administrator of the property of the former Benedictine abbey of Krásna near Košice in the hope of stimulating the faith there. In the face of persecution he remained at the service of his flock, offering an example of fidelity to Christ. Križín, to whom the attention of the soldiers had first turned, suffered the same tortures as Grodziecký. When Križín fainted from the pain, he was beheaded.

Stefan (Stephen) Pongrácz, Jesuit priest; b. ca. 1582 at Alvincz Castle, Transylvania, Hungary. Born into a noble family, he studied classics in his homeland, then attended the Jesuit College at Cluj, Romania, and abandoned the prospect of a brilliant, secular career in order to enter the Society of Jesus at Brno, Moravia (1602), where he first met Grodziecký. Following his studies in philosophy at Prague (Bohemia) and theology at Graz (Austria), he was ordained in 1615. He taught for a time at the Jesuit college at Humenné, Slovakia, before accepting the invitation to minister in troubled Košice. Despite savage and prolonged torture, Pongrácz' was alive when the soldiers threw him into the sewage ditch with his dead companions. He suffered in pain for another 20 hours before giving up his spirit.

Exterior of The Immaculate Conception Cathedral, Seoul, South Korea.

During the canonization ceremony the Holy Father noted: "This canonization was also an important ecumenical event, as was evident both at my meeting with representatives of the Protestant denominations and during my visit to the place that commemorates the death of a group of the faithful of the Reformation." He prayed at the monument commemorating their death.

On first glance it is difficult to reconcile Pope John Paul II's efforts toward Christian unity and this canonization of three martyrs of the Reformation. But as he explained it in his homily:

Today's liturgy invites us to reflect on the tragic events of the early seventeenth century, emphasizing, on the one hand, the senselessness of violence relentlessly visited upon innocent victims and, on the other, the splendid example of so many followers of Christ who were able to face sufferings of every kind without going against their own consciences. Besides the three Martyrs of Košice many other people, also belonging to Christian confessions, were subjected to torture and suffered heavy punishment; some were even put to death. How can we fail to acknowledge, for example, the spiritual greatness of the 24 members of the Evangelical Churches who were killed at Presov? To them and to all who accepted suffering and death out of fidelity to the dictates of their conscience the Church gives praise and expresses admiration. . . . May [the example of the three new saints] renew in their fellow citizens of today a commitment to mutual understanding.

Feast: Sept. 7 (Jesuit calendar).

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, 27 (1995): 1–3; 28 (1995) 6, 11; 29 (1995) 9. J. N. TYLENDA, Jesuit Saints and Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 290–292.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KOSTISTK, GEREMIA OF VALACHIA, BL.

Also known as Jeremiah or Jeremy of Valachia, and Ieremia Stoica, Capuchin; b. June 29, 1556, Zaro, Romania; d. March 5, 1625, Naples, Italy. Leaving his friary in Romania to travel to Naples, Geremia startled the locals by living in imitation of Christ for forty years. He was known for his spiritual wisdom and fraternal love for the poor and sick to whom he ministered selflessly. He fell ill while tending the sick and died at age sixty-eight. Pope John Paul II beatified him on Oct. 30, 1983, as the first Romanian so recognized officially.

Feast: May 8.

Bibliography: F. S. TOPPI, Spirito francescano nel beato Geremia Stoica da Valacchia, Studi e Ricerche Francescane (1984) 127–42. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 76 (1984): 550–53. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 46 (1983): 6–7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KOSTKA, STANISLAUS, ST.

Patron of Poland; b. Rostkovo, Poland, Oct. 28, 1550; d. Rome, Italy, Aug. 15, 1568. He was the second of seven children, born into the high Polish nobility. His training at home was religious, exacting, and firm. At 14 he and his elder brother Paul enrolled in the Jesuit college in Vienna. Stanislaus's early desire for holiness intensified and he showed great constancy in his practice of prayer and penance. This annoyed Paul who treated Stanislaus with brutality. Stanislaus seemed to receive some unusual spiritual favors. On one occasion, when seriously sick, he saw angels, attended by St. Barbara, patron of his sodality at school, bringing him Holy Communion. He also beheld the Blessed Virgin, holding the Christ Child and advising him to enter the Society of Jesus. The Jesuit superior at Vienna was reluctant to admit him into the society because of the possible wrath of his father, so Stanislaus decided to apply elsewhere. He left Vienna and, after successfully eluding his brother, who pursued him, he walked to Dillingen in Germany where he met St. Peter CANISIUS, the German provincial. Canisius sent him to Rome where he was admitted to the novitiate of St. Andrew on Oct. 28, 1567, by the General, St. Francis BORGIA. In the ten remaining months of his life all were impressed by his earnest and childlike fervor. In early August of 1568, he seemed to foresee his death. On the tenth he became ill and died within the week. He was canonized in 1726.

Feast: Nov. 13.

Bibliography: D. BARTOLI, Compendio della vita del B. Stanislao Kostka, ed. C. GROSSI (Turin 1925). J. E. KERNS, Portrait of a Champion: A Life of St. Stanley Kostka (Westminster, Md. 1957). J. MAJKOWSKI, Saint Stanislaus Kostka. A Psychological Hagiography (Rome 1972). U. UBALDINI, Analecta Bollandiana, 9 (1890) 360–378.

[W. V. BANGERT]

KOUDELKA, JOSEPH MARIA

Bishop; b. Chlistovo, Bohemia, Dec. 8, 1852; d. Superior, Wis., June 24, 1921. At 13, after education at the college at Klattau, Bohemia, he immigrated with his parents to the U.S. and settled near Manitowoc, Wis. He continued his studies at St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, Wis., became a naturalized citizen, and was ordained Oct. 8, 1875. After pastoral work at St. Prokopius Church, Cleveland, Ohio, until 1882, he served (1882–83) as editor of Hlas, a Bohemian magazine published in St. Louis, and then returned to Cleveland as pastor of St. Michael's (1883–1907), where he built the parish church and school.

He prepared the first, second, and third readers (in German) for Bohemian schools (1882), wrote a short history of the Catholic Church for Catholic schools (1905), and compiled prayer books for adults and children. He spoke German, Polish, Bohemian, and English and had a command of the classical languages. When Bp. Ignatius Horstmann asked for an auxiliary bishop in Cleveland to care for the foreign populace, especially the Slavic peoples, Koudelka was appointed Nov. 29, 1907, and consecrated bishop of Germanicopolis Feb. 25, 1908. He was the first auxiliary bishop of special jurisdiction appointed in the U.S., and he served in Cleveland until Sept. 4, 1911, when he was transferred to Milwaukee as auxiliary to Abp. S. G. Messmer.

On Aug. 1, 1913, Koudelka was appointed second bishop of the Diocese of Superior, where, during his eight-year administration, ten parish churches, 22 missions, three hospitals, two high schools, five elementary schools, two industrial schools, and one orphanage were built. The Catholic population increased from 53,130 to 57,514; the number of priests serving the diocese, from 86 to 98. Among the most noted buildings erected under Koudelka was the St. Joseph Orphanage in Superior, with its imitation baroque chapel, much of which was financed by the missions and retreats Koudelka gave across the nation. He was buried at St. Michael's, his former parish in Cleveland, and his remains are interred in St. Mary's cemetery there.

A priest and nuns stand amid a group of toddlers outside Maryknoll Kindergarten in Seoul, Korea, 1946. (©Horace Bristol/CORBIS)

[V. E. RUSH]

KOWALSKA, FAUSTINA, ST.

Baptized Elena (or Helena), in religion Maria Faustina (Polish: Faustyna), visionary, virgin of the Congregation of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mercy; b. Aug. 25, 1905, at Głogowiec (west of Łodz), Poland; d. Oct. 5, 1938, at Kraków.

Known as the apostle of Divine Mercy, Faustina was the third of ten children (six survived infancy) in a poor family. Although she had only two years of formal education, her diaries exhibit profound insight. She was baptized at St. Casimir's, Swinice Warckie; at age 7 (1912), she first heard Jesus in an inner locution inviting her to strive for perfection. In 1922, she expressed a desire to enter the convent, but, because her parents needed her financial help, she worked as a housekeeper in Aleksandrów, Łodz, and Ostrówek. At age 29, she first attempted to enter a convent in Warsaw, but was turned away. Following a vision of the suffering Christ, she entered the Sisters of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mercy Aug. 1, 1925, and changed her name. After her postulancy at a vacation house and novitiate in Kraków, she made her temporary vows April 30, 1928. Faustina professed her final vows in 1933 before Bishop Stanislaus Rospond of Kraków. Thereafter, she served her sisters as an unassuming cook, gardener, and porter in the congregation's houses at Kraków, Płock, and Vilnius.

The embroidered drapery with an image of sister Faustina Kowalska hangs on the facade of St. Peter's Basilica April 30, 2000. Pope John Paul II made her his first canonization of the Catholic Jubilee year. (©APF/CORBIS)

On Feb. 22, 1931, in Płock, Faustina had a vision of Jesus, asking her to promote the Second Sunday of Easter as a celebration of Divine Mercy and spread the devotion throughout the world. After a psychiatric assessment certified Faustina's mental health, Father Michael Sopocko, her spiritual director, arranged for artist Kazimierowski to render a painting of her vision of Jesus as the merciful savior with streams of red and white light shining from his heart. Faustina kept a journal of her mystical experiences. Only a few of her superiors, her confessor, and spiritual director knew of her visions, revelations, hidden stigmata, and gifts of ubiquity, reading souls, and prophecy. A poor translation of her nearly 700-page diary was condemned by the Vatican in 1958. However, when popular veneration of Faustina continued, Cardinal Karol Wojtyła had it re-translated, which resulted in the ban's removal April 15, 1978, six months before his election to the papacy. In visions Christ also asked the humble sister to propagate the Chaplet of Divine Mercy, veneration of the Divine Mercy image inscribed "Jesus, I trust in You," and the remembrance of his death each day at 3 P.M.

Faustina, the inspiration for the Polish Apostles of Divine Mercy, died from tuberculosis. The movement comprised of priests, religious, and laity has spread to 29 countries. Pope John Paul II made a pilgrimage to Faustina's tomb at the Sanctuary of Divine Mercy in Kraków-Łagiewniki June 7, 1997, where she died and which the young Wojtyła visited daily before work at the Solvay factory.

Her cause for beatification was reopened in Rome Jan. 30, 1968. Faustina was both beatified April 18, 1993, and canonized April 30, 2000, by John Paul II, whose lifelong efforts to propagate devotion to the Divine Mercy (see DIVES IN MISERICORDIA, 1980) culminated when he officially declared April 30, 2000, that the Second Sunday of Easter would also be designated "Divine Mercy Sunday" throughout the Church.

Feast: Oct. 5.

Bibliography: Writings by St. Faustina: Diary: Divine Mercy in My Soul (3d rev. ed. Stockbridge, Mass. 2000); Revelations of Divine Mercy: Daily Readings from the Diary of Blessed Faustina Kowalska, ed. G. W. KOSICKI (Ann Arbor, Mich. 1996). Literature about St. Faustina: J. BURKUS, Gaila minios (Hot Springs, Ark. 1983). G. W. KOSICKI, Now Is the Time for Mercy (Stockbridge, Mass. 1991); Meet Saint Faustina (Ann Arbor, Mich. 2001). MARIAN FATHERS, The Promise (Stockbridge, Mass. 1987). S. MICHALENKO, The Life of Faustina Kowalska (Ann Arbor, Mich. 1999). C. M. ODELL, Faustina: Apostle of Divine Mercy (Huntington, Ind. 1998). S. URBANSKI, Zycie mistyczne błogosławionej Faustyny Kowalskiej (Warsaw 1997).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KOZAL, MICHAŁ, BL.

Bishop, martyr of Dachau; b. Sept. 27, 1893, Ligota (now Nowy Folwark near Poznán), Poland; d. Jan. 26, 1943, Dachau Concentration Camp. Kozal was born into a devout peasant family. Following his ordination to the priesthood (1918), he held parish assignments while teaching in Catholic secondary schools. In August 1939, Kozal was appointed by Pope Pius XII auxilary bishop of Wloclawek, Poland, then named bishop. During the short time between his consecration and arrest in which he could celebrate only a single Mass, Kozal was responsible for sending to safety Stefan Wyszynski. Kozal was arrested by the Gestapo on Nov. 7, 1939 as part of the Nazi drive to eradicate the Polish intelligentsia and elite. He was held for a time in a Wloclawek prison, then sent to a convent in Lad. Following stops in Szczeglin and Berlin, Kozal was interned at Dachau (April 25, 1941). For the next two years he secretly celebrated Mass whenever possible and ministered to his fellow prisoners. He was killed with an injection of carbolic acid. Bp. Kozal was beatified at Warsaw, Poland, by John Paul II, June 14, 1987.

Feast: June 14.

Bibliography: S. BISKUPSKI, Meczénskie biskupstwo ksiedza Michala Kozala; bararzynstwo hitlerowskie w walce z Kósciolem Katolickim w Polsce (2d. ed. Warsaw 1955). T. BOJARSKA, Cierniowa mitra (Warsaw 1971). W. FRATCZAK, Biskup Michal Kozal: zycie-meczénstwo-kult (Warsaw 1987). F. KORSZYNSKI, Un vescovo polacco a Dachau (Brescia 1963). Nuremberg War Crimes Trial Proceedings, v. 4, 511. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 23 (1987): 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KOZKA, KAROLINA, BL.

Virgin martyr for purity, lay woman; b. Aug. 2, 1898, Wal-Ruda, Poland; d. there Nov. 18, 1914. The fourth of the eleven children of the farmers Jan Kozka and Maria Borzecka, vivacious Karolina developed an intense prayer life at an early age. She was dragged into the woods and killed by one of the occupying Russian soldiers after she rejected his advances. When her body was found nearly three weeks later, it was interred in the churchyard at Zabawa (Dec. 6, 1914). Her relics were translated in November 1917 and a cross erected at the execution site. Pope John Paul II beatified her at Tarnów, Poland, June 10, 1987.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1987) 739. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 29 (1987) 3–5.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KÓZMÍNSKI, HONORAT, BL.

Baptized Florence Wenceslaus John Kózmínski (or Kózmínskiego), also known as Honorat a Biala, architect, Capuchin, founder; b. Oct. 16, 1829, Biala Podlaska, Poland; d. Dec. 16, 1916, Nowe Miasto, Poland. Kózmínski was the second of four children of an affluent architect and his pious spouse. Following in his father's footsteps, he studied architecture at the Warsaw School of Fine Arts. Kózmínski's faith failed at his father's death in 1845, but was reinvigorated during his internment (1846-47) on a false charge of treason against the Russian occupation and subsequent illness. He became a Capuchin December of 1848, received the name Honorat, and was ordained Dec. 8, 1852. Thereafter he preached and served as spiritual director in Warsaw. Under the Russian occupation, he founded more than 20 associations and congregations, including the Circles of the Living Rosary and the Sister Servants of Mary Immaculate (1878). Most of these groups were reorganized by the Polish hierarchy in 1908. Among the surviving organizations is the Franciscan Sisters of Saint Felix of Cantalice (FELICIANS), founded by Mother Angela TRUSZKOWSKA under the spiritual direction of Blessed Honorat, who witnessed the dedication of the initial Felician sisters on Nov. 21, 1855. Although Honorat was placed under house arrest at Zakroczym monastery during the Russian period of suppression, he continued to provide spiritual direction. From 1892 to 1895, Kózmínski ministered at Nowe Miasto until he was appointed commissary for the Polish Capuchins. He died following a painful illness. Pope John Paul II beatified Honorat Oct. 16, 1988.

Bibliography: Dziedzictwo bl. Honorata Kózmínskiego, ed. H. I. SZUMIL and G. BARTOSZEWSKIEGO (Sandomierz 1998). C.-C. BILLOT, Honorat Kozminski (Blois, France 1982). W. KLUZ, Ziarnko gorczycy: o Honorat Kózmínski OFMCap (Warsaw 1987). F. DA RIESE PIO X, Onorato Kózmínski da Biala Podlaska: un polacco che visse sempre in piedi (Rome 1976). M. SZYMULA, Duchowóśc zakonna: duchowóśc zakonna wedlug nauczania bl. Honorata Kózmínskiego (2d. ed. Warsaw 1999). M. A. WERNER, O. Honorat Kózmínski, kapucyn (Poznan 1972). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1988) 1173.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

KRAMP, JOSEPH

Liturgist; b. Kerpen, Rhineland, June 19, 1886; d. Frankfurt, June 14, 1940. He joined the Society of Jesus in 1905. During World War I he served as a chaplain in German army hospitals. For a short while he taught in Bombay but returned to Germany because of poor health. From 1928 to 1940, though he lived the life of a quiet scholar in Frankfurt, he exerted an especially strong influence on the Catholic German youth movement. In the field of his special competence, pre-Tridentine theology, he published ten major and minor works, several of which have been translated. He won international recognition for his work Eucharistia (Freiburg 1924; English tr. St. Paul, Minn. 1926). In it he offers the first analysis of the late medieval changes of attitude toward the Eucharist. His published writings also include: Die Opferanschauungen der römishen Messliturgie (Regensburg 1920), Mess. liturgie and Opfergedanken (Regensburg 1921), and Messliturgie und Gottesreich in three volumes (Freiburg 1921). A great part of his endeavor was given to a study of the Liturgical Year. Avoiding the then prevalent tendency to moralize, his method consisted in a careful analysis of the liturgical texts. His books also show a remarkable eschatological tendency long before this became common in the writings of other liturgists. Unfortunately, because of his daring interpretation of the sacrificial character of the Mass, he was excluded from academic offices.

[H. A. REINHOLD]

KRAUS, FRANZ XAVER

Church and art historian; b. Trier, Germany, Sept. 18, 1840; d. San Remo, Italy, Dec. 28, 1901. He was ordained in 1864; he became professor of the history of Christian art at Strassburg in 1872, and of Church history at Freiburg im Breisgau in 1878. As a leader of the liberal wing of Catholic scholars, he criticized the centralization of Church government and the Ultramontanes (see ULTRAMONTANISM) and attempted to provide a reconciliation between Catholicism and modern culture, as well as between Church and State in the KULTURKAMPF difficulties. He was a Dante scholar and essayist who raised Christian archeology and art history to independent disciplines in Germany. His diaries are important for the history of the Church in the 19th century. His Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte went through four editions (Trier 1872–96) during his lifetime. He produced the two-volume Realencyklopädie der christl. Altertümer (Freiburg 1883–86); the Geschichte der christl. Kunst in two volumes (Freiburg 1895–1900), and several studies of ancient Christian art and inscriptions in Alsace-Lorraine and the Rhineland. His diaries (Tagebücher) were published by H. Schiel (Cologne 1957).

Bibliography: C. BRAIG, Zur Erinnerung an F. X. Kraus (Freiburg 1902). H. SCHIEL, Im Spannungsfeld von Kirche und Politik: F. X. Kraus (Trier 1951); F. X. Kraus und die Katholische Tübinger Schule (Ellwangen 1958). H. TRITZ, "F. X. Kraus und P. M. A. Hughes," Spicilegium Historicum Congregationis SSmi Redemptoris 11 (1963) 182–232.

[H. SCHIEL]

KRAUTH, CHARLES PORTERFIELD

Lutheran leader and theologian; b. Martinsburg, Va., March 17, 1823; d. Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 2, 1883. After education at Gettysburg College and Theological Seminary, Pa., where his father, Charles Philip Krauth, was professor, he became pastor of churches in Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. In 1859 he moved to Philadelphia, where he was made editor of the Lutheran, and in its weekly columns he championed the conservative teachings and practices that were characteristic of the confessional revival of the mid-19th century. Krauth was a man of great learning and contributed to a variety of theological journals. When the Lutheran Theological Seminary was founded in Philadelphia (1864), he was elected professor of systematic theology. He was the leading organizer and first president of the General Council (1867), into which he hoped to gather all the conservative synods of English-, German-, and Scandinavianspeaking Lutherans in North America. Although his hope was only partially realized, his leadership was widely respected. His position was set forth in his major work, The Conservative Reformation and its Theology (1872). Besides teaching theology, Krauth was professor of philosophy at the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, during his last 15 years.

Bibliography: A. SPAETH, Charles Porterfield Krauth, 2 v. (v.1 New York 1898; v.2 Philadelphia 1909).

[T. G. TAPPERT]

KREISLER, FRITZ

Composer and violin virtuoso; b. Vienna, Feb. 2, 1875; d. New York City, Jan. 29, 1962. He was a musical wonder child whose talent was fostered by his parents,

Fritz Kreisler. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

Anna and Samuel Severin Kreisler, and his teachers, including Anton Bruckner and Leo Delibes. He won the Vienna Conservatory's gold medal for violin as a boy of ten, and the Paris Conservatory's grand prize at 12; at 13 he made his New York debut. Later, while working toward recognition as an adult artist, he became acquainted with Johannes BRAHMS and Joseph Joachim, whose influence on him was lasting. Kreisler's Berlin debut took place in 1899, and for the next 60 years he brought violin virtuosity to audiences the world over. In 1939 he settled in America, and in 1943 he became a U.S. citizen. He retired from the concert stage in 1950 but continued to play for charitable causes, as had been his lifelong custom. His funeral took place at St. John the Evangelist Church, New York City.

Loved by audiences and revered by critics and colleagues, Kreisler also enriched the violin repertory as composer and arranger. Early in his career he published as transcriptions of 17th- and 18th-century masters, such as Vivaldi and Couperin, works that were later revealed to be his own. He composed concertos, chamber music, violin and piano solos, operettas, and cadenzas for Mozart, Beethoven, and Brahms concertos. His best-known works are Caprice viennois, Liebesfreud, Tambourin chinois, the operetta Apple Blossoms, and the Quartet in A-minor.

The Benedettini Room in the Kremsmünster Abbey Library. (@Massimo Listri/CORBIS)

Bibliography: L. P. LOCHNER, Fritz Kreisler (New York 1951). M. PINCHERLE, The World of the Virtuoso, tr. L. H. BROCKWAY (New York 1963). New York Times (Jan. 30, 1962) 1:4. H. JANCICK, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 7:1742–43. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, ed. N. SLONIMSKY (5th, rev. ed. New York 1958) 869. AMY BIANCOLLI, Fritz Kreisler: Love's Sorrow, Love's Joy (Portland 1998). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 467. B. SCHWARZ, ''Fritz Kreisler'' in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 10, ed. S. SADIE, (New York 1980) 249–250. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 963.

[M. FITZGIBBON]

KREMSMÜNSTER, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey on the Krems River in the Diocese of Linz, north central Austria; dedicated to St. Agapitus. Established (777) by Duke Tassilo III of Bavaria with monks from Mondsee (founded before 748) and under the Carolingians from 788, it evangelized and colonized among the Slavs. Magyar invasions ended an era of brilliance, and the abbey came under the bishops of Passau c. 917. GORZE reforms were introduced under Abbots Sigmar (1013-40) and Dietrich (1066-85); the HIRSAU reform, under Ulrich III (1173-82). A strong Cistercian influence appeared under Friedrich von Aich (1275-1325), and Kremsmünster, with its scriptorium and famous historian Bernard (d. 1326), reached its peak. The 15th-century MELK reform brought humanist influences. In 1549 the abbey school became a Gymnasium. Monastic and intellectual life was strengthened under Erhard Voit (1571-88), Johann III (1588-1600), Alexander a Lacu (1601-13), and Anton Wolfradt (1613-39). Baroque buildings were begun under Erenbert Schrevogel (1669–1703), and the observatory was constructed (1748–58). The learned baroque poet-dramatist Simon Rettenpacher (d. 1706) illustrates Kremsmünster's activities in music and liturgical drama in the 17th and 18th centuries. A few monks remained during the Nazi occupation of the abbey (1941–45). The library of 100,000 volumes has 400 MSS; the science and art collections are noteworthy. The treasure includes the 8th-century Tassilo chalice and candlesticks and the Codex millenarius.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Necrologia (Berlin 1826–) 4:197–238. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 9:544–554; 25:610–678. T. HAGN, Urkundenbuch für die Geschichte des Benedictiner Stiftes Kremsmünster, seiner Pfarreien und Besitzungen vom Jahre 777 bis 1400 (Vienna 1852); Wirken der Benedictiner-Abtei Kremsmünster (Linz 1848). Festschrift zum 400jährigen Bestande des öffentlichen Obergymnasiums der Benedictiner zu Kremsmünster, 1549–1949 (Wels 1949). A. KELLNER, Musikgeschichte des Stiftes Kremsmünster (Kassel 1956). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1529–30. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1962) 2:222. W. NEUMÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:602.

[D. ANDREINI]

KRIŽANIĆ, JURAJ

The "Father of Pan-Slavism"; b. Oberh, Croatia, c. 1617; d. near Vienna, 1683. He attended the Jesuit Gymnasium in Zagreb from 1630 to 1636, studied philosophy at the University of Graz, Austria, and theology at Bologna and Rome, and after his ordination in September 1642, received a doctorate in theology. He prepared himself for the mission in which he had long been interested, converting the Russians to Catholicism. In 1647, after two years in Croatia, he traveled to Warsaw, Smolensk, and Moscow, and then went to Poland for two years. Subsequently he arrived at Vienna and visited Constantinople with an Austrian diplomatic mission. In Rome in 1652, he wrote several treatises in Latin about Russia and the Orthodox. Without permission of the Office of Propaganda he left Rome for Vienna, and by April 1659 he was in the Ukraine. In September 1659, he concealed his identity as a Catholic priest, went to Moscow, and worked for a time as a translator for the government of Tsar Alexis. In January 1661, he was exiled to Tobolsk, Siberia, where he wrote several books, notably a grammar of a proposed general Slavic language, and Politika, which appealed to the Tsar to unite all Slavs against the Germans. In March 1676 he was released and went to Vilna to join the Polish Dominicans. He died as a chaplain in the Polish army of King John III Sobieski during the Turkish siege of Vienna in the summer of 1683. Several of his books were published in Russia where he was hailed as a significant writer and an advocate of the ideal of Slavic solidarity.

Bibliography: P. G. SCOLARDI, Krijanich: Messager de l'unité des chrétiens et père du panslavisme (Paris 1947). M. B. PETROVICH,

"Juraj Križaniç: A Precursor of Pan-Slavism," American Slavic and East European Review 6. 18–19 (1947) 75–92.

[G. J. PRPIC]

KROL, JOHN JOSEPH

Cardinal, archbishop of Philadelphia; b. Cleveland, Ohio, Oct. 26, 1910; d. Philadelphia, Pa., Mar. 3, 1996. The fifth child of John Krol Sr., a stone cutter by trade, and Anna Pietruszka, Krol received his early education at St. Hyacinth's elementary school and the Cathedral Latin School in Cleveland. Upon graduation from high school in 1927, he found employment as a meat cutter in a local market. He eventually answered God's call to the priesthood, began his studies at St. Mary's College, Orchard Lake, Mich., and completed them at St. Mary's Seminary in Cleveland. He was ordained on Feb. 20, 1937 at St. John's Cathedral in Cleveland by Bishop Joseph SCHREMBS. His first and only parochial assignment followed at Immaculate Heart of Mary Parish in Cleveland. The following year he was sent to Rome for studies in canon law. With the outbreak of World War II, he was recalled to the United States and assigned to the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, where he completed a doctorate in CANON LAW.

In 1942 Krol returned to Cleveland and the chair of canon law at St. Mary's Seminary. At the same time, he functioned as defender of the bond, vice-chancellor, and eventually chancellor of the diocese. In 1948 he was elected president of the Canon Law Society of America. Pope PIUS XII created him Papal Chamberlain in 1945 and Domestic Prelate in 1951. In 1953 Monsignor Krol was named auxiliary bishop of Cleveland and titular bishop of Cadi. He chose as his episcopal motto Deus Rex Meus, a heraldic pun on his own name (krol is Polish for ''king'').

In 1960 Pope John XXIII announced his intention of summoning an ecumenical council. Bishop Krol was named to the preparatory commission on bishops and the government of dioceses. As the council years unfolded he would go on to be appointed one of the five undersecretaries of the council. He was also a member of the central coordinating committee of the council. Before the council convened, Krol was named to succeed Cardinal O'Hara as tenth ordinary of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia. He was installed on March 22, 1961. On the same day as his appointment to Philadelphia, the archdiocese was split to create the diocese of Allentown.

Archbishop Krol arrived in Philadelphia at a time of social and demographic change. Of the 39 parishes he founded, all but five were in the suburbs; of 16 parishes closed or consolidated, all but two were within the city of Philadelphia. One of Archbishop Krol's chief priorities was Catholic education. During his tenure St. Charles Borromeo Seminary received full accreditation for its college program. A student apostolate program was introduced, and a school of religious studies for religious and laity was founded. Despite the decline in enrollment during the 1970s, Krol maintained a viable archdiocesan school system. One of his most successful efforts to raise funds for the schools was the foundation of BLOCS (Business Leaders Organized for Catholic Schools). This was a non-sectarian community business effort to raise money for Catholic schools as a recognition of their value to the whole community. In 1963 Archbishop Krol was named chairman of the Education Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC). In 1965 he was elected vice-chairman of the administrative board of the NCWC. When the NCWC gave way to the newly organized NCCB/USCC, he was elected vice-president of the NCCB and president of the same body in 1971. As spokesman for the Catholic bishops he testified against nuclear arms and the arms race before Congress during the deliberations on the SALT Treaty of 1979.

Archbishop Krol was a strict constructionist with regard to the liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican Council. One innovation he consistently opposed was that of Saturday evening Mass. To the end of his life he battled for the sanctity of Sunday observance. In matters ecumenical, he was among the leaders of the American hierarchy. In 1964 he founded the Archbishop's Commission on Human Relations with a twofold mandate of directing the archdiocesan ecumenical movement and of promoting racial harmony in cooperation with other faith groups. His ecumenical efforts brought him recognition from the Mason's Golden Slipper Square Club in 1966 when they granted him their Brotherhood Award. In 1967 he received the first John Wesley Ecumenical Award. In 1968 he was given the Human Relations Award of the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

On June 26, 1967 Pope Paul VI named Krol to the College of Cardinals, the same day that Archbishop Karol Wojtyła received the red biretta. Krol's titular church was Santa Maria della Mercede e Sant' Adriano. He was appointed to the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples and the Congregation for Oriental Churches. He also served on the Prefecture of Economic Affairs of the Holy See.

In 1976 Cardinal Krol and the archdiocese hosted the Forty-first International Eucharistic Congress. During his tenure the cardinal diligently pursued the causes of Philadelphia's local heroes of the faith. He saw the canonization of St. John Neumann, CSSR, fourth bishop of Philadelphia, in June of 1977. In 1964 he opened the cause of Mother Katherine Drexel, foundress of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, which ultimately led to her canonization in October of 2000.

Cardinal Krol participated in the two historic conclaves of 1978 that elected Popes John Paul I and John Paul II. In October of 1979 he welcomed John Paul II to Philadelphia on the journey that would take the pontiff to New York, Boston, Chicago, Des Moines, and Washington D.C.

Much still remains to be known about the historic collaboration between Pope JOHN PAUL II and President Ronald Reagan in the downfall of Communism in Poland during the 1980s, but there have been credible reports that the line from the Vatican to the White House ran through Philadelphia and Cardinal Krol.

The Cardinal retired from his archdiocesan duties on Feb. 11, 1988. During his retirement years, he was a moving force behind the Papal Foundation that was set up in 1988 to ease the financial burdens of the Holy See in the wake of the Banco Ambrosiano collapse. Cardinal Krol died at the archepiscopal residence on the feast day of Mother Katherine DREXEL. He is interred in the crypt of Philadelphia's Cathedral Basilica of Sts. Peter and Paul.

Bibliography: J. F. CONNOLLY, The History of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia (Philadelphia 1976). The Catholic Standard and Times vol. 100 (March 1996). The American Catholic Who's Who (Washington 1980).

[THOMAS J. MCMANUS]

KROMER, MARTIN (CROMER)

Polish bishop, humanist, historian, and diplomat; b. Biecz, near Cracow, 1515; d. Heilsberg, East Prussia, March 23, 1589. After studying at Cracow, Bologna, and Rome, he served as secretary to Bp. Gamrat of Cracow and to Prince (later King) Sigismund II August. During these years he wrote his De origine et rebus gestis Polonorum (1555), a history of Poland from early times down to 1506. From 1557 to 1564 he was ambassador of King Sigismund II August (1548-72) at the Imperial Court of Ferdinand I. He also served on diplomatic missions to Rome and Trent. His great work Polonia sive de situ, populis, moribus, magistratibus et republica regni Poloniae, appeared in 1577. He became coadjutor of Ermland (Warmia) in 1569, and succeeded as bishop in 1579. He convoked a number of synods during his tenure as bishop. Pastoral visitations, ecclesiastical reforms, and several new foundations increased under his direction. A patron of the Jesuits, he fought the Lutheran and Calvinist reformers. Kromer also wrote several books in Polish, German, and Latin for liturgical use in his diocese. He continued his lifetime interest in music, already begun in 1534 when he published De musica figurata. His interest in Greek and Roman studies continued throughout his life, and a translation of St. John Chrysostom's sermons was one of his early works. His own polemical writings, sermons, and catechism were written in Polish.

Bibliography: E. M. WERMTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:648–649. A. EICHHORN, Der ermländische Bishof Martin Kromer. . (Braunsberg 1868). A. BORRMANN, Ermland und die Reformation 1523–1772 (Königsberg 1912). Cambridge History of Poland, ed. W. F. REDDAWAY et al., 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1941–50).

[F. J. LADOWICZ]

KU KLUX KLAN

Two secret organizations in the U.S. have used this name. The original Klan was formed as a Southern response to Radical Reconstruction. The modern society traces its ancestry to the intolerance of the Know-Nothing Movement and the American Protective Association. The second Klan was directed against African Americans, Jews, Catholics, and other, more recent, immigrant groups. It has also been a self-appointed guardian of Americanism and of a fundamentalist code of morality.

In May 1866, six Confederate veterans in Pulaski, Tenn., formed a social club, deriving its name from the Greek word kyklos, or circle. When its ghostly disguises and macabre ritual unexpectedly proved frightening to blacks, Southerners discerned in the Klan a means of resistance to carpetbag-scalawag regimes supported by the votes of African-Americans. At Nashville, Tenn., in 1867, the Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, was organized under the former Confederate cavalry leader Nathan Bedford Forrest as grand wizard. The empire was divided into realms (states governed by grand dragons), provinces (counties governed by grand titans), and dens (local units governed by grand cyclopses). A prescript setting forth the aims of the order referred to chivalry and patriotism but meant the reestablishment of white supremacy.

During the height of its reign, from 1868 to 1871, the Klan could boast of a membership of 550,000. In white robes and masked by hoods, Klansmen rode at night to terrorize African-Americans with ghostly tricks. When fear did not succeed, lynching, whipping, and other forms of violence were employed. Congress responded in 1871 by enacting the Ku Klux Act, designed to break up the organization. But the Klan had already begun to decline, as its leaders became alarmed at irresponsible criminal acts protected by Klan secrecy. The Klan disbanded locally, however, only after its purpose was accomplished or when it became possible to work openly for its objectives. Not until 1877 did the Klan entirely disappear, leaving behind a legend of heroic defense of Southern rights.

In 1915, on Stone Mountain, near Atlanta, Ga., a second Ku Klux Klan was founded by Col. William J. Simmons. As imperial wizard, Simmons developed an elaborate ritual and nomenclature based on that of the old Klan. In 1921 a professional publicity man, Edward Young Clarke, was hired to build up the membership. With the help of Elizabeth Tyler, Clarke conducted a campaign that enrolled five million members by 1924. The Klan's sudden appeal can be ascribed to post-World War I developments: extreme nationalism, economic depression, moral breakdown, and antiradical hysteria. The Klan blamed each of these problems on one of its numerous targets-African-Americans, Jews, Catholics, foreigners, violators of the Klan's moral code—and offered as antidote a self-advertised gentile, Protestant, American, white man's organization.

As the society grew, its activities were no longer confined to parading and cross burning. The New York World revealed lynchings, mutilations, tar-and-feather parties, and assorted varieties of violence that could be traced to the Klan. A moral scandal involving Clarke and Ku Klux Klan members marching down Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, D.C., 1920s.

Mrs. Tyler was unearthed, and the disclosure of huge profits from the sale of memberships and costumes cast doubt on the promoters' motives. Simmons, Clarke, and Tyler were ousted when a Texas dentist, Hiram Wesley Evans, became imperial wizard. Under Evans the Klan concentrated its efforts upon attaining political power. Governors in Georgia, Alabama, and Texas furthered Klan interests, while in Oregon a Klan-dominated legislature enacted a law against parochial schools.

The Klan never enjoyed lasting influence at the national or even state level. Its principal power lay in local politics, and even there the society soon began to disintegrate. The Klan was discredited by the conviction of its Indiana grand dragon on a charge of murder and undermined by the return of prosperity and the collapse of postwar reaction. It retained enough strength to play a role in the defeat of Alfred E. Smith in the election of 1928, but by 1930 its membership had fallen to 30,000. During the 1930s the Klan tried to recoup its fortunes by attacking Bolshevism, which it virtually equated with such labor unions as the CIO, but by 1944 the order was forced to dissolve to elude payment of $685,000 in federal taxes. In 1946 Dr. Samuel J. Green revived the order, but met with effective resistance when most states enacted anti-Klan legislation and the U.S. Department of Justice placed the Klan's name on its subversive list. After Green's death the invisible empire split asunder. The Klan revived to some extent because of the Supreme Court antisegregation decision of 1954 and the nomination of a Catholic presidential candidate in 1960. However, it has been largely supplanted by the White Citizens Councils, which generally denounce Klan secrecy and terrorism. The Klan's status today is one of widespread disrepute.

Bibliography: E. M. COULTER, The South During Reconstruction 1865–1877 (Baton Rouge 1947). H. CARTER, The Angry Scar (Garden City 1959). J. M. MECKLIN, The Ku Klux Klan (New York 1924). S. F. HORN, Invisible Empire (Boston 1939). A. S. RICE, The Ku Klux Klan in American Politics (Washington 1962). W. H. FISH-ER, Invisible Empire: A Bibliography of the Ku Klux Klan (Metuchen, N.J. 1980).

[J. L. MORRISON]

KUHN, JOHANNES

Theologian; b. Wäschenbeuren, Germany, Feb. 19, 1806; d. Tübingen, May 8, 1887. He studied theology at the University of Tübingen and was ordained in 1831. At Munich he studied philosophy under F. SCHELLING. He was professor of the exegesis of the New Testament at Giessen in 1832, and at Tübingen in 1837. From 1839 to 1882 he was professor of dogma at Tübingen. In 1856, he became a permanent member of the state tribunal, and in 1868, a member of the Board of Peers. As a philosophically endowed and skilled dialectician, he wrote Das Leben Jesu (Mainz 1838), against D. F. Strauss's Leben Jesu Kritisch bearbeitet. His most famous work is the four volume Katholische Dogmatik (Tübingen 1846–68). Kuhn showed the development of each truth of faith in accordance with the historical character of revelation, and sought to understand it speculatively through the dialectics that he had shaped in his discussions with G. W. F. HEGEL (d. 1831). Revelation is given us in Scripture and tradition; the norm of Christian faith is living tradition. Through opposition to heresies, faith develops in a dialectical process that is not only logical but also real and historical, and that eventually brings opposites to a real unity. The scientific dialectic of dogmatic theology proceeds from a knowledge of facts to a knowledge of their necessity.

Bibliography: P. SCHANZ, "Zur Erinnerung an Johannes E. von Kuhn," Theologische Quartalschrift 69 (1887) 531–598. F. A. SCHALCK, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 8.2:2377–79. R. VATTER, Das Verhältnis von Trinität und Vernunft nach Johannes E. von Kuhn (Speyer, Ger. 1940). J. R. GEISELMANN, Die lebendige Überlieferung als Norm des christlichen Glaubens (Freiburg 1959); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:656–657.

[J. R. GEISELMANN]

KULTURKAMPF

Church-State conflict in Prussia and other states in GERMANY, in Austria, and in Switzerland (1871–90). It became known as the Kulturkampf (struggle for civilization) after Rudolf Virchow, an atheist and materialist scientist, thus described it (Jan. 17, 1873) in the Prussian Landtag, where he represented the German Liberal party. The term is misleading because the struggle developed from a complex of causes.

Antecedents. The dispute began in Prussia and had its main center there. This predominantly Protestant territory had been the scene of a major Church-State conflict concerning mixed marriages during the 1830s (see CO-LOGNE, MIXED MARRIAGE DISPUTE IN). King Frederick William IV (1840-61) ended this disagreement, and for the duration of his long reign granted considerable freedom to Catholics, permitting the Church to prosper. For nearly three decades after the settlement of the Cologne affair, Prussian Catholics enjoyed a liberty superior to that in most other sections of Germany, although intolerance continued to be the rule in many German principalities under Protestant rulers. State control of religion was common, even in Catholic states such as Bavaria. From about the mid-19th century, however, opposition to the Church in Prussia was on the increase from diverse quarters and for a variety of reasons. Part of it was confessional. Protestant hostility tended to subside until 1850, but became much more pronounced after that because of growing Catholic activity and demands for further liberties. The marked progress of ULTRAMONTANISM, the increasing influence of the PAPACY in Germany and elsewhere, and finally the solemn definitions of papal primacy and infallibility at VATICAN COUNCIL I (1870) disturbed many Protestants. So did the writings of DÖLLINGER and others against Luther and the Reformation. The growing practice of recruiting membership in various kinds of societies along sectarian lines further separated Protestants and Catholics. There were unfounded fears of an imminent Catholic offensive.

German LIBERALISM became very hostile to Catholicism. After the revolution in 1848, liberalism in Germany developed along lines more philosophical than political and fell under the influence of HEGELIANISM and its views on the unlimited power of the state. The liberal outlook was materialistic and antiecclesiastical. To speed the process of laicizing society, secularizing education, and eliminating all religious influences from public and private life, the liberals advocated a return to Prussia's former practices of state control over religion. Middle-class financial and industrial interests, strong supporters of liberalism, objected also to the progressive social views of Bp. Wilhelm von KETTELER and the CENTER PARTY. The naturalistic liberal view of the world and of man was so diametrically opposed to the Catholic one that the struggle between them could be regarded, in part at least, as a Kulturkampf. The SYLLABUS OF ERRORS (1864) served to widen the gulf between liberals and Catholics.

Nationalistic and political factors were also part of the background of the Kulturkampf. In the drive to unify Germany, Catholics favored the inclusion of Austria, whereas Protestants sided with Bismarck in the successful move to eliminate this great Catholic power from united Germany and to make Protestant Prussia the leading state. Germanism was portrayed as the equivalent of Protestantism and Prussianism.

Solidarity among Catholics increased with the mounting offensive against them. Prussian Catholics took the lead in organizing themselves for political, social, and religious purposes. The formation of the Center party in 1870 was the best-known manifestation of this trend. One of its effects, however, was to stimulate the opposition.

Otto von Bismarck was the person most responsible for inaugurating the Kulturkampf. His motives were both religious and political. He misunderstood and disliked Catholicism as a religion, and a number of political considerations reinforced his opposition. Catholics were the chief opponents to his plans for uniting Germany, but excluding Austria. During the Franco-Prussian War some Catholics in southern Germany sympathized openly with France. In Alsace-Lorraine many of the Catholic clergy opposed incorporation into the new German Empire. Catholic nostalgia for a "Great Germany" did not disappear in 1870. Catholics throughout Germany showed themselves wary of a Protestant emperor. Bavarians voiced suspicions that unification under the Hohenzollerns aimed to convert all Germans into Prussians and Lutherans.

Bismarck's suspicions about Catholic patriotism increased when the clergy in Silesia advocated the use of the Polish language in confessional schools and resisted Germanization. Bismarck wanted a centralized state, but Catholics inclined toward a federated one. Their particularist views were understandable because Catholics were a minority group in the Empire as a whole, but they won political support among Protestants in Hanover and elsewhere. The Center party was sufficiently powerful to challenge the chancellor's dominance. The Catholic Church, Bismarck thought, should be subject to state control, like other religious groups. In his foreign policy Bismarck believed it advantageous to ally himself with the new Kingdom of Italy. The Center party, however, pressed for intervention in the ROMAN QUESTION to bring about the restoration of the STATES OF THE CHURCH. Bismarck condemned this policy as preferring the welfare of the pope to that of the fatherland. He denounced the Center as a state within a state and as a gathering of enemies of the Empire. The chancellor tried to destroy the Center by having the Holy See disavow the party, and when this attempt failed, he resorted to open conflict with Catholics. In doing so he had the support of the liberals and of many Protestants.

The Conflict. The Kulturkampf began with the abolition of the Catholic bureau in the Prussian ministry of education and public worship (July 8, 1871).

Prussia. The government began to support the OLD CATHOLICS in their conflicts with the hierarchy. In August, Bismarck ordered normal schools and school inspection in Alsace-Lorraine removed from the control of the Catholic clergy and placed under lay supervision. The Pulpit Law (Kanzelparagraph) was enacted (Nov. 28, 1871) by the Reichstag, placing severe penalties on criticisms of the state from the pulpit. Tension increased when Pius IX refused to accept Cardinal Gustav Hohenlohe as the first ambassador of the Empire to the Holy See. This rebuff led Bismarck to remark (May 15, 1872): "We shall not go to Canossa."

Upon the proposal of Adalbert Falk, Prussian minister of education and public worship, a law was passed (March 1872) in the Prussian Landtag that subjected all schools to state inspection. Bismarck sought primarily to terminate anti-German activities by priests in Silesia, but the Center party saw this as an opening wedge to secularize education completely, a step the liberals had been advocating. In June all religious were excluded from public education in Prussia, and the Reichstag ordered all Jesuits expelled from the empire within six months (July 4, 1872). As a result, more than 500 members of this order went into exile. When Pius IX protested (December 1872), Bismarck severed diplomatic relations with the Vatican. In 1873 the Redemptorists, Vincentians, Holy Ghost Fathers, and Religious of the Sacred Heart fell under the same ban as the Jesuits.

In 1873 the Prussian Landtag promulgated a series of laws in May—hence the name May Laws. They placed priestly training under close government supervision and required seminarians, who must be German nationals, to study three years in a German university and to submit to state examinations in literature, history, and philosophy. Clerical appointments by bishops were subjected to government veto, and restrictions were placed on episcopal powers of excommunication and of discipline, although appeals could be made from episcopal decisions to a newly created civil tribunal.

One effect of these May Laws was to unify Catholics. Prussian bishops refused to cooperate in carrying out this legislation. Priests supported their bishops, even though many of them were fined and imprisoned. The Center party increased greatly its representation in the Landtag and Reichstag. Archbishop Mieczysław LEDÓ-CHOWSKI was arrested and exiled for opposing the teaching of the catechism in German to Polish children. The archbishop of Cologne and the bishop of Trier were also arrested. A second set of May Laws, in 1874, made recalcitrant bishops and priests liable to deposition and exile. During vacancies caused by their removal, their offices were to be administered in accordance with the Prussian government's directives. Pius IX declared the May Laws null and void (February 1875). An attempt by a Catholic to assassinate Bismarck (July 1874) was utilized by the chancellor to try to discredit the Center party and to justify further measures against Catholics. Civil marriage was made obligatory in Prussia (February 1875), and later in other German states. In April of 1875, the Landtag passed the so-called Bread-basket Law, which permitted the state to suspend all financial grants in dioceses where the law was not obeyed. In May all religious, except those engaged in hospital work, were expelled. In June all Church property was confiscated, and title to it was transferred to lay trustees elected by the parishioners. By 1877 thousands of parishes had lost their pastors, and nine of the twelve Prussian bishops were in exile. Although some bishops were able to administer their dioceses secretly through delegated priests, the disruption of Church life was very serious.

The height of the Kulturkampf came in 1875. Catholic resistance remained firm; yet Ludwig WINDTHORST prevented an extremism in the Center party and in the growing Catholic press that would preclude negotiation and compromise with Bismarck. By 1875 there was no longer likelihood of an alliance of German Catholics with Austria against the empire. Then, too, the coalition of national liberals and conservatives that had supported Bismarck lost its coherence, and the socialists emerged as a new political enemy that Bismarck had to take into account. Emperor William I favored a more moderate policy. Pope Leo XIII (1878–1903) proved more conciliatory than his predecessor, and the papal nuncio at Munich began conversations to end the strife. Bismarck slowly gave way, but he was reluctant to repeal the May Laws outright, and he insisted upon the Center party's cooperation on certain military issues. Falk was dismissed in 1879, and his successor was given wide discretionary powers to alleviate the May Laws. German Catholics resented the exclusion of Windthorst and other Center leaders from the negotiations in Vienna between Prussia and the Vatican. Restoration of diplomatic relations with the Holy See came in 1882. In 1886 and 1887 the May Laws were modified to the satisfaction of Catholics. Other anti-Catholic measures were repealed in 1890 and 1891, but it was not until 1904 that the section of the law expelling Jesuits was rescinded, and not until 1917 was the anti-Jesuit legislation completely abrogated.

Elsewhere in Germany. Some other German states followed Prussia's example. Baden, which had introduced restrictions on Catholics in the 1860s, enacted laws similar to Prussia's concerning clerical education and appointments. It required all primary schools to operate as interdenominational ones (Simultanschule) and assisted the Old Catholics. Although Baden did not copy Prussia's severity in enforcing these laws, the Archdiocese of Freiburg remained vacant from 1868 to 1881. Hessen-Darmstadt introduced interdenominational schools, but the other measures patterned on Prussia's were not strictly enforced. Baden and Hessen-Darmstadt repealed their Kulturkampf laws between 1880 and 1886. In Catholic BAVARIA, Johann von Lutz, the liberal minister of education (later premier), started the Kulturkampf in close cooperation with Bismarck. Bavaria aided the Old Catholics, established Simultanschule, and until 1890 reverted to the type of state control of the Church (Staatskirchentum) prevalent in the 18th century.

Austria. A Kulturkampf began in Austria before 1870. In 1868 the liberals under Prime Minister Count Franz von Beust transferred marriage jurisdiction to civil courts, secularized the administration of public schools, and undermined the public position of the Church. In 1870 the government used the definition of papal infallibility as a pretext to abrogate the concordat of 1855. The liberals also cultivated the Old Catholics and impeded the Jesuits. In 1874 a set of May Laws passed the Austrian parliament that seriously affected the Church's legal position, restricted the rights of religious orders, placed Church funds under State supervision, and imposed upon bishops the obligation of notifying the state concerning ecclesiastical appointments. Pius IX sharply condemned the legislation, and Cardinal Joseph von RAUSCHER, Bp. Joseph Fessler, and Bp. Franz von RUDIGIER offered resistance. Since the enforcement of these measures was not severe, the Austrian bishops were divided, and a serious Church-State conflict was averted. When the liberal parties lost their influence (1879), much of the damage to the Church was soon undone.

Switzerland. In Switzerland, Catholics were in a difficult situation after the military defeat of the Sonderbund in 1847. The Jesuits were subsequently banned and monasteries were closed. The Syllabus of Errors and the definition of papal infallibility incensed Protestants and led them to enter a bitter onslaught against the Church. Old Catholics received government protection and were allowed to form the Christian Catholic Church (1875); in Protestant cantons they were given many Catholic churches for their use. In Basel, Bp. Eugène LACHAT was expelled for proceeding against priests who refused to accept the decrees of Vatican Council I. In Bernese Jura, where protest was strongest against the expulsion, priests faithful to their bishop were forced from their parishes and replaced by Old Catholic priests. At Geneva, Bp. Gaspard MERMILLOD was similarly deposed and expelled (1873) for attempting to establish an episcopal see in the city. In 1874 the federal constitution was revised to prohibit the establishment of new dioceses or monasteries without the federal government's consent. Jesuits and other religious orders were expelled from the entire country. The papal nuncio was asked to leave (1874), and diplomatic relations with the Holy See were severed until 1884. Civil marriage became obligatory; and schools, interdenominational. One effect of this repression was to draw Swiss Catholics closer together. Leo XIII began negotiations, seeking a settlement, and in 1883 Mermillod was able to return. Religious peace gradually returned.

Conclusion. The Kulturkampf caused much suffering for the Church, but it was not a success. Moral victory lay with the Catholics, who emerged more closely united and much more attached to Rome. Unfortunately, Catholics tended to develop the ghetto mentality of an oppressed minority and to remain aloof from the higher cultural life. For the state, the Kulturkampf had the bad effect of estranging millions of Catholic citizens for some decades.

Bibliography: A. CONSTABEL, Die Vorgeschichte des Kulturkampfes: Quellenveröffentlichung aus dem deutschen Zentralarchiv (Berlin 1956). G. GOYAU, Bismarck et l'Église: Le Kulturkampf, 4 v. (Paris 1911-13). J. B. KISSLING, Geschichte des Kulturkampfes im Deutschen Reiche, 3 v. (Freiburg 1911-16). G. FRANZ, Kulturkampf: Staat und katholische Kirche in Mitteleuropa von der Säkularisation bis zum Abschluss des preussischen Kulturkampfes (Munich 1954). E. SCHMIDT-VOLKMAR, Der Kulturkampf in Deutschland, 1871-90 (Göttingen 1962), reviewed by J. K. ZEENDER, Washington Catholic Historical Review 50 (1965) 601–602. P. SATTLER, "Bismarcks Entschluss zum Kulturkampf," Forschungen zur brandenburgischen und preussischen Geschichte 52 (1940) 66-101. R. MORSEY, "Bismarck und der Kulturkampf," Archiv für Kulturgeschichte 39 (1957) 232-270. E. WEINZIERL-FISCHER, "Bismarcks Haltung zum Vatikanum und der Beginn des Kulturkampfes," Mitteilung des österreichischen Staatsarchivs 10 (1957) 302-321. R. AUBERT, Le Pontificat de Pie IX (Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 21; 2d ed. Paris 1964). H. BORNKAMM, "Die Staatsidee im Kulturkampf," Historische Zeitschrift 170 (1950) 41-72, 273-306, also sep. pub. (Munich 1950). E. JESTAEDT, Der Kulturkampf im Fuldaer Land (Fulda 1960). G. G. WINDELL, The Catholics and German Unity, 1866–71 (Minneapolis 1954). K. S. PINSON, Modern Germany: Its History and Civilization (New York 1954) ch.9. E. EYCK, Bismarck and the German Empire (London 1950). F. A. ARLINGHAUS, "The Kulturkampf and European Diplomacy," Washington Catholic Historical Review 28 (1943) 340-375; "British Public Opinion and the Kulturkampf in Germany 1871-75," ibid. 34 (1949) 385-413. M. O. KOLBECK, American Opinion on the Kulturkampf (Washington 1942). L. P. WALLACE, The Papacy and European Diplomacy 1869-78 (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1948). F. ENGEL-JANOSI, Österreich und der Vatikan, 1846-1918, 2 v. (Graz 1958-60) v.1. J. WODKA, Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1959). K. EDER, Der Liberalismus in Altösterreich (Vienna-Munich 1955). T. SCHWEGLER, Geschichte der Katholischen Kirche in der Schweiz (2d ed. Stans 1943). F. STROBEL, Die Jesuiten und die Schweiz im 19. Jahrhundert (Olten 1954). A. LINDT, Protestanten, Katholiken, Kulturkampf (Zurich 1963), for the Kulturkampf in Switzerland. E. DANCOURT, Scènes et récits du Kulturkampf dans le Canton de Berne (St. Maruice 1921). R. W. LOUGEE, "The Kulturkampf and Historical Postivism," Church History 23 (1954) 219-235. H. RAAB, Staatslexikon, ed. GÖRRES-GESELLSCHAFT (Freiburg 1957-63) 5:181-185. K. KUPISCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:109–115. N. MIKO, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 6:673–675.

[H. W. L. FREUDENTHAL]

KUNDIG, MARTIN

Priest, cathedral rector, civic leader; b. Switzerland, Nov. 19, 1805; d. Milwaukee, WI, March 6, 1879. He attended schools at Einsiedeln and Lucerne, Switzerland; Rome, Italy; and Bardstown, KY. He was ordained on Feb. 2, 1829, for the Diocese of Cincinnati, Ohio. After spending three years in southern Ohio, he was transferred to Detroit, MI, where he founded parishes and was active in civic affairs. During a cholera epidemic in 1834 he set up relief services, among them a hospital. He became superintendent of the poorhouse for Wayne County, and his interest in free public schools gained him an appointment as a regent of the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. In 1842 he went to Wisconsin, where he helped newcomers, especially the English-speaking, by guiding their land purchases and organizing societies. At his initiative, temperance societies were formed in Milwaukee and the city received such favorable notice that the hierarchy recommended it as the headquarters of a new diocese. Among his civic interests were the promotion of easier attainment of citizenship for immigrants, better harbor facilities, and education. The first free public school in Wisconsin was opened June 16, 1845, in the basement of St. Mark's Church, Kenosha, of which he was the pastor. He also planned a trade school in connection with Bishop's Hall at the cathedral in Milwaukee. The builder of 22 churches in southeastern Wisconsin and rector (1859-79) of the cathedral, he served also for 30 years as vicar-general under Bp. John Martin Henni.

Bibliography: P. L. JOHNSON, Stuffed Saddlebags: The Life of Martin Kundig, Priest (Milwaukee 1942).

[P. L. JOHNSON]

KUNIGUNDE, GERMAN EMPRESS, ST.

German empress also known as Cunegunda; b. c. 980; d. convent of Kaufungen, Hesse, Germany, March 3, 1033 or 1039. The daughter of Count Siegfried of Luxembourg, Kunigunde married Duke Henry IV of Bavaria, the future Emperor HENRY II, c. 998. She was crowned queen at Paderborn on Aug. 10, 1002, and on Feb. 14, 1014, she was crowned empress by Pope BENEDICT VIII in Rome. She helped and counseled Henry II in affairs of government and repeatedly represented him during his absences. When he founded the Diocese of Bamberg (1007) she presented her dowry as the financial basis for its establishment. After the emperor's death (1024) she retired to the convent in Kaufungen that she had founded earlier (1017). She is buried at her husband's side in the cathedral of Bamberg. Her vita, written c. 1199, is rich in miraculous accounts, for example, that she walked unharmed on 12 red-hot plowshares. Since their marriage was childless, a legend arose that she and the emperor had vowed perpetual virginity. Her cult as a virgin in the Diocese of Bamberg and in other places where she had been active has Marian overtones. Kunigunde was canonized on March 29, 1200.

Feast: March 3, also Sept. 9 (Diocese of Bamberg).

Bibliography: S. HIRSCH, Jahrbücher des deutschen Reichs unter Heinrich II, 3 v. (Berlin 1862-75). Vita, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores (Berlin 1826-) 4:821-824. J. BRAUN, Tracht und Attribute der Heiligen in der deutschen Kunst (Stuttgart 1943) 447–450. R. KLAUSER, Der Heinrichsund Kunigundenkult im mittelalterlichen Bistum Bamberg (Bamberg 1957). Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 6:680-681. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:470–471. EBERNANT OF ERFURT, Heinrich und Kunegunde, ed. R. BECHSTEIN (Stuttgart 1860, repr. Amsterdam 1968). G. BEZ-ZENBERGER, Leben und Legende der Kaiserin Kunigunde (Kassel 1982). B. NEUNDORFER, Leben und Legende: die Bildwerke am Grab des Kaiserpaares Heinrich und Kunigunde im Bamberger Dom (Bamberg 1985). K. GUTH, Die heiligen Heinrich und Kunigunde: Leben, Legende, Kult und Kunst (Bamberg 1986). Kunigunde: eine Kaiserin an der Jahrtausendwende, ed. I. BAUM-GÄRTNER (Kassel 1997).

[F. DRESSLER]

KUNO OF TRIER, ST.

Archbishop; b. Pfullingen, Swabia, Germany, 1016; d. Ürzig, June 1, 1066. Kuno (or Conrad) was cathedral provost under his uncle, Archbishop ANNO II of Cologne, under whose influence HENRY IV named Kuno archbishop of Trier (1066), investing him with ring and staff. The people and clergy of Trier objected to this violation of their electoral rights, and a force under Count Theoderich, the protector of Trier, captured Kuno at Bitburg, en route to his coronation. After two weeks' imprisonment at Ürzig on the Moselle River, he was killed by a vassal of Theoderich. Bishop Theoderich of Verdun brought the body to Tholey monastery, where Kuno was venerated as saint and martyr, although his cult did not spread.

Feast: June 1.

Bibliography: THEODERICH VON THOLEY, Vita et passio, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 8:212–219. G. MEYER VON KNONAU, Jahrbücher des Deutschen Reiches unter Heinrich IV. und Heinrich V., 7 v. (Leipzig 1890–1909)

v.1. R. MARTINI, Die Trierer Bischofswahlen vom Beginn des zehnten bis zum Ausgang des zwölften Jahrhunderts (Berlin 1909). J. HEYDENREICH, Die Metropolitangewalt der Erzbischöfe v. Trier bis auf Baldewin (Marburg 1938).

[D. ANDREINI]

KUTTNER, STEPHAN GEORGE

Historian of canon law, researcher, university professor; b. Bonn, Germany, March 24, 1907. Kuttner studied at the Universities of Frankfurt, Freiburg, and Berlin where he received a LL.B. in 1928 and a J.U.D. in 1930. He served for a short time as assistant in the Berlin University Law School (1929-32). Forced to flee Germany in 1933 because of Hitler's pogrom of the Jews, Kuttner made his way to Rome, entering the Catholic Church on Aug. 15, 1933. The following year he became research associate at the Vatican Library, a position he held from 1934 to 1940. Immersing himself in the study of medieval canon law, Kuttner laid the foundation for his future career. In 1937 he published Repertorium der Kanonistik (1140-1234), the first extensive catalogue of manuscripts from the Decretum of Gratian to the Decretals of Gregory IX. From 1937 to 1940 he also served as an associate professor Utriusque Juris at the Pontifical Institute (now the Lateran University). At the outbreak of World War II Kuttner and his family found asylum in the United States and acquired citizenship in 1945.

After two years as visiting professor of the History of Canon Law at the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., Kuttner was appointed ordinary professor in 1942, the first lay person to hold a regular appointment on the pontifical faculty of canon law. In 1964 he accepted an invitation from Yale University to become the T. Lawrason Riggs Professor of Roman Catholic Studies. His final academic move was to the University of California at Berkeley in 1970 as director of the Robbins Collection of Canon Law and professor (1975 emeritus) in residence.

Kuttner was founder and co-editor (1943–71) of Traditio, a journal of studies in ancient and medieval history, thought and religion (now published at Fordham University) and editor of Seminar (1943–56) devoted to Roman law studies. He was also founder and president of the Institute of Medieval Canon Law from 1955 to 1991, when he was named chairman of the board. He edited publications of the Institute, the Bulletin of Medieval Canon Law (from 1971 to 1991), and the Monumenta iuris canonici in three series: glosses, canonical collections, and proceedings of international congresses (1965–).

Upon receiving the "Role of Law" award from the Canon Law Society of America in 1978 Kuttner stated:

Capital: Kuwait City. Size: 6,880 sq. miles.

Population: 1,973,572 in 2000.

Languages: Arabic; English is widely spoken. Religions: 157,800 Catholics (.8%), 1,677,536 Muslims (85%), 138,236 (14.2%) practice other faiths.

I owe my career only to my stubborn conviction that for the knowledge of canon law it is necessary to know how canon law developed over the centuries, and that it is a crucial point in this development to know the riches of canonical thought of the middle ages which are to a great part hidden in manuscripts. . . . But that there is this connection between the history of the Church and the law of the Church has to me always been a key to my own passion for my own work (CSLA Proceedings 40 [1977] 161–62).

On Feb. 11, 1993 Dr. and Mrs. Kuttner were present for the inaugural lecture instituting "The Stephan Kuttner Distinguished Chair in Canon Law" at the Catholic University of America.

Bibliography: Variorum Reprints (London) has collected many of Kuttner's essays. In each of the three volumes there is a retractationes section in which he corrects and updates the original articles: The History of Ideas and Doctrines of Canon Law in the Middle Ages (1980), 11 studies in English and French, including "Harmony from Dissonance: An Interpretation of Medieval Canon Law" (Wimmer Lecture, 1956) and "Cardinalis: The History of a Canonical Concept"; Medieval Councils, Decretals, and Collections of Canon Law (1980), 13 studies in French, English, and German; Gratian and the Schools of Law, 1140-1234 (1983) 10 studies in English, French, German, and Italian, including with E. RATH-BONE, "Anglo-Norman Canonists in the Twelfth Century"; Kanonistische Schuldlehre von Gratian bis auf die Dekretalen Gregors IX: systematisch auf Grund der handschriftlichen Quellen dargestellt, Studi e Testi 64 (Vatican City 1935, reprint 1961); Repertorium der Kanonistik (1140-1234): Prodromus corpus glossarum, Studi e testi 71 (Vatican City 1937); L'Edition romaine des conciles généraux et les actes du premier concile de Lyon (1940); Decreta septem priorum sessionum Concilii Tridentini (1945); KUTTNER and RELZE, eds., A Catalogue of Canon and Roman Law Manuscripts in the Vatican Library, Studi e Testi 322, 328 (Vatican City 1986).

[J. E. LYNCH]

KUWAIT, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The State of Kuwait is an independent monarchy located on the northwest coast of the Persian Gulf. It is bounded by Iraq on the northwest, and Saudi Arabia on the west and south. An arid, desert territory, Kuwait' economy depended primarily upon the fishing off its long coastline until the discovery of oil within its borders in April 1938, and the material and social progress brought about by oil revenues quickly transformed life throughout the country. Major inland oil fields are located in Al Wafrah and Maqwâ to the south of Kuwait City, and Al Bahrah and Sabriya to the northeast; other oil is pumped from offshore platforms. Containing ten percent of the world's petroleum reserves, Kuwait ranked first in crude oil production in the Middle East and fourth in the world.

Kuwait's population is composed chiefly of Kuwaiti and other Arabs, who are ethnically closer to Iraqis than to the Arabs of the peninsular hinterland. South Asians and Iranians account for just over ten percent of the population. Except for small communities of Jews, Hindus, Christians, and Parsi, the population is evenly divided between Sunni and Shi'a Muslim, and almost half the country's residents are immigrants.

The ruling al-Sabah family, Sunni Muslims of Bedouin descent, gained power in Kuwait in 1756, shortly after the founding of the principality. The sultanate became an ally of Great Britain through a treaty signed by Muvarak in 1899, and Britain extended its relationship to that of protectorate in January 1914. Kuwait's boundaries with Saudi Arabia were defined by a treaty ratified in 1934. The sultanate became a sovereign state in June 1961, after a claim by Iraq to Kuwaiti territory was repulsed, and Kuwait joined the United Nations two years later.

In 1971 the defense pact between Kuwait and Great Britain expired, leaving Kuwait to pursue a neutral position in international matters. However, its natural wealth remained a temptation to neighboring Iraq, which invaded Kuwait on Aug. 2, 1990. After a seven-month occupation during which thousands of Kuwaitis were killed or taken hostage, U.S. and other forces entered the region, repulsing the Iraqi Army in the Gulf War. Cleanup costs following the war were astronomical due to the necessity of cleaning up the oil leaked after Iraq sabotaged over 700 oil wells throughout Kuwait. In 1992 the country held its first parliamentary elections, allowing radical and other opposition groups to extend their influence.

Although the Kuwaiti constitution of Nov. 11, 1962, granted freedom of religion, it also proclaimed Islam to be the religions of the state, and the government placed restrictions on religious activities as required by Islamic law. While tensions continued to flare between the country's two Muslim factions, relations between Muslims and Christians remained amicable. The Catholic Church was permitted to operate openly in Kuwait, although the government prohibition against evangelical efforts limited its presence to administering primarily to the foreign-born workers residing in the country. Most of these workers, employed by the oil industry, were Philippine Catholics who had immigrated to the region with their families.

An Apostolic Vicariate of the Roman Catholic Church is located in the capital city of Kuwait, and a Patriarchate of the Roman Orthodox or Eastern-rite Church is also present. Between the two Catholic churches, Kuwait contains four parishes administered by nine priests. Bibles and other religious materials are legally imported into Kuwait through the Book House Company, Ltd. In 1969 diplomatic relations were established between the Vatican and the Kuwaiti government; by late 1996 a nunciature was situated in the country, followed, in March 2000, by a permanent mission.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde 2:551–552. L. LOCKHART, "Outline of the History of Kuwait," Journal of the Royal Central Asian Society 34 (1947) 262–274.

[A. JAMME/EDS.]

KYRIE ELEISON

An acclamation, immediately following the penitential rite in the Roman Rite of the Mass, which praises the Lord and implores his mercy (General Instruction of Roman Missal, 30). In the Roman Rite, the text comprises two basic invocations: "Kyrie eleison" (Lord, have mercy) and "Christe eleison" (Christ, have mercy). In the Eastern Christian liturgical tradition, the acclamation "Kyrie eleison" is used extensively, especially as a congregational response in the many litanies scattered throughout the eucharist and the divine office. In its pre-Christian context, the acclamation "Kyrie eleison" was widely used in civic and religious ceremonies, often as an acclamation of the munificent benevolence and mercy of the Roman emperor.

The Kyrie first appeared in the Mass as the response of a litany in the Antioch-Jerusalem liturgy after the middle of the 4th century. From there it passed to Rome early in the 5th century. Toward the end of the 5th century a litany was codified by Pope Gelasius (492–96), inserted into the entrance rite of the Mass; it is known as the Deprecatio Gelasii [for the critical text, see B. Capelle, "Le Kyrie de la messe et le pape Gélase," Revue Bénédictine (Maredsous 1884–) 46 (1934) 126–44]. This litany was still sung at Mass during the time of Pope Gregory the Great (d. 604). However, Gregory made some historically important changes in its form. On ordinary days and on the Sundays after Pentecost and Epiphany, the customary invocations to be intoned by the clerics were omitted and only the response Kyrie eleison was sung. A further modification made by Pope Gregory was the insertion of the Christe eleison [Gregory the Great, Ep. 9 26, in Monumenta Germanae Historica: Epistolae (Berlin 1826–) 2:59].

Over time, this limited use of the full Gelasian invocations on greater feasts disappeared entirely. The Kyrie as an independent entity was very early joined to the end of the stational litany. In such cases, the Kyrie of the Mass was omitted [Ordo Romanus 11 (1143), Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1878–90) 78:1039]. This usage is retained in the present Easter Vigil, where the litany replaces the entrance action, and its Kyrie is the Kyrie of the Mass. Originally, the number of invocations was not fixed in the Roman Rite of the Mass. Ordo Romanus I (circa 700) directs the Kyrie to be sung until the Pope gave the signal to stop. The early 9th century Ordo Romanus IV (St. Armand) specified that nine invocations were to be sung, giving rise to the traditional ninefold Kyrie.

Originally a congregational acclamation, by the time of the first Roman Ordo (Ordo Romanus 1 9, ed. Andrieu, 2:84), the schola was the only performer of the Kyrie. By the 12th century, the two semichoruses of clerics—of which the schola formed a part—simply alternated in the singing of the nine invocations (Liber usuum O. Cist. 2 62, Patrologia Latina 166:1435).

The first musical witnesses indicate that the Kyrie melodies had achieved a high degree of musical complexity by the 10th century. The oldest such witnesses are the Kyriale, Troparium, and Sequentiarium (10th century) of St. Martial in Limoges (Paris B.N. lat. 887) and the cantatorium (10th or 11th century) from the same place (Paris B.N. lat. 1118). Among the elaborate settings found in the St. Martial Kyriale are the Kyries listed as numbers 3 to 6 in the Graduale Romanum.

Many of these elaborate melodies were the direct outgrowth of the appearances of tropes in the 9th and 10th centuries (Anglès, 126). Kyrie 10 in the Graduale Romanum began with the trope Alme Pater, of which only the first verse is extant today. Blume has published 158 complete tropes (Analecta hymnica 47:43–216). The total rises to approximately 175 with the inclusion of the incomplete examples.

The first evidence of a troping of the Kyrie was afforded by Amalarius of Metz and represented as follows: Kyrie eleison, Domine Pater, miserere; Christe eleison, miserere qui nos redemisti sanguine tuo; Kyrie eleison, Domine, Spiritus Sancte, miserere (De off. eccl.3 6, Patrologia Latina 105:1113). None of the song books contain this trope, but the trope Alme domine is similarly constructed (Analecta hymnica 47:163).

The names given by medieval MSS for the troped Kyrie are numerous. The Winchester Troper describes the troped Kyrie as follows: "Incipiunt laudes preces, quae voce latina hoc resonant: Miserere tuis, O Christe, misellis" (see Blume, Analecta hymnica 47:1). Besides the term laudes preces, early French sources used the terms prosulae, prosae, or versus ad Kyrie eleison. An important distinction in the Kyrie tropes is that found between the rahmen (surrounding) tropes (new musical and textual material that precedes or follows the original Kyrie setting or separates the groups of three) and the textual tropes (i.e., textual interpolations, laid out syllabically on the single notes of disaggregate melismatic settings of the Kyrie). The rahmen trope is generally rather rare, whereas the textual trope is found very frequently. Only the MSS Paris B.N. lat. 887 and 1118 show a mixture of both types; all the other MSS know only the one or the other type of Kyrie trope.

The notation of the textual tropes in the MSS is varied. Usually, each acclamation is notated twice, in a troped and an untroped version—one under the other. In the St. Gall MSS, the melismatic version is notated first and is followed by the troped version. In the St. Martial family MSS, the troped version is placed first and is followed by the melismatic version. From this double style of notation, one might conclude to a corresponding difference in performance. Ursprung, however, interprets this double notation as implying that one semichorus sang the melisma while the other simultaneously sang the troped version, the two choirs then coming together on the word eleison (Die Kath. Kirchenmusik 57). Handschin, on the other hand, denies this possibility of "combining heterogeneous material" [New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. Westrup (New York 1957–) 2:166].

Of some 493 MSS studied, a total of 226 chant melodies have been found for the Kyrie (Melnicki, 13). Their musical form can be divided into three main groups: (1) AAA—the simplest form based on litanic models and comprising about one-fifth of all the melodies; (2) ABA—Da capo form, also comprising one-fifth of the melodies (see Kyries 2, 5, 11, and 18 in Grad. Rom.); (3) ABC—the latest of the three, although its oldest specimens date from the 10th century (see Kyrie 9 in Grad. Rom.). Within the third group, extremely varied forms developed. Among these developed forms is the following example: AXA; BXB; CXC. The X in each of the three sets may either be the same in each case as XXX, or as XYX, or finally as XYZ (see Kyries 3, 6, 9, and ab lib. 1–6 in Grad. Rom.).

The most ancient version in common usage today is that of the Vatican Kyrie 18. Vatican Kyrie 15 and 16 also are very early and form a special group with Kyrie 18. Among the earlier versions, the final invocation often descends to provide the tone for the Gloria. Kyrie 16 provides an example of this trait as it descends to E—the first tone of Gloria 15.

Modality was not a strict concept for the musical settings of the Kyrie. The Kyrie was not linked to a psalm tone as a canon of modality. Similarly, heterogeneous transmission of the melodies made them less susceptible to the modal canons of the theoreticians.

The modality of the medieval settings of the Kyrie was built principally on the final. Hence it is more helpful to speak of D, E, F and G modes. Among these, the most popular were the G and D modes. The D mode is found most frequently in French sources; the G mode is found most frequently in Italian sources. Very popular in German sources was a loosely knit group of E-mode melodies using a triadic structure (E-G-H, or C). Only in the 12th century (Narbonne Troper, Paris B.N. lat. 778) were all the Kyries arranged according to modes. Here, too, the larger modal groups were distinguished into authentic and plagal modes.

The differences between the musical settings of the Kyrie and those of the Propers for the Mass are very marked. The settings of the Proper have a very strong melodic unity, whereas those of the Kyrie tend to be largely regional in character. Out of the 226 settings cited by Melnicki, only 26 are international in character (Melnicki, 14-26). For the Propers, the medieval MSS show an almost unbelievable uniformity in the transmission of both the melody and the neume groupings, while the transmission of the Kyrie settings shows a substantial number of melodic variants and discrepancies in the melismatic neume groupings from region to region. The Kyrie melodies also have stylistic characteristics that are manifestly different from the musical settings of the Propers: transposition, episodic melodic material, motif repetition, and eventually signs of a strong influence exerted by the popular Sequence, Estampie, and Lai-Leich forms.

Bibliography: H. ANGLÈS, "Gregorian Chant," New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP, 11 v. (New York 1957–)

2:126-27. Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886-1922) v.47, ed. C. BLUME and H. M. BANNISTER. C. CALLEWAERT, "Les Étapes de l'histoire du Kyrie," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 38 (1942) 20-45. Graduale Romanum (Tournai 1961). J. HANDSCHIN, "Trope, Sequence, and Conductus," New Oxford History of Music 2:128-74. J. A. JUNGMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951-55) 1:333-46. M. MELNICKI, Das einstimmige Kyrie des lateinischen Mittelalters (Regensburg 1955). B. STÄBLEIN, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 7:1931-46. O. URSPRUNG, Die katholische Kirchenmusik (Potsdam 1931). P. WAGNER, Einführung in die gregorianischen Melodien, 3 v. (Leipzig) v.2 (2d ed. 1912); repr. (Hildesheim 1962). D. A. BJORK, "The Kyrie Trope," Journal of the American Musicological Society 33 (1980) 1-41. D. A. BJORK, "Early Settings of the Kyrie Eleison and Problems of Genre Definition," Journal of the Plainsong and Medieval Music Society 3 (1980) 40-48. P. DE CLERCK, La prière universelle dans les liturgies latines anciennes: témoignages patristiques et textes liturgiqques (Münster 1977). J. F. BALDOVIN, The Urban Character of Christian Worship: The Origins, Development, and Meaning of Stational Liturgy (Rome 1987). J. F. BALDOVIN, "Kyrie eleison and the Entrance Rite of the Roman Eucharist," Worship 60 (1986) 334-47.

[C. KELLY/EDS.]

L

LABADIE, JEAN DE

Founder of the Labadists; b. Bourg, near Bordeaux, Feb. 13, 1610; d. Altona, Feb. 13, 1674. He was educated by the Jesuits at Bordeaux, then entered the Society of Jesus and was ordained in 1635. As a teacher and preacher he gained considerable renown, and he was esteemed for his piety. However, he imagined himself to have visions and revelations and a call to reform the Catholic Church. He fell seriously ill and after recovering asked for and received permission to leave the Society of Jesus. As a diocesan priest he labored at Bordeaux, Paris, Amiens, and Abbeville. Finally, after a stormy career, he embraced Protestantism at Montauban on Oct. 16, 1650. The delight of the reformers at so illustrious a recruit seems to have been tempered when Labadie now tried to reform them. His failure here ended in the formation of a sect of his own about 1670. Labadie thought that man, through contemplation, would see all things in God. Thus the Scriptures are not necessary; rather the Holy Spirit will inspire man. Labadie rejected infant Baptism and denied the Real Presence in the Eucharist. He minimized the observance of the Lord's Day. The semicommunistic society of his followers died out about 1732.

Bibliography: G. FRANK, The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclope-dia of Religious Knowledge, ed. S. M. JACKSON (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1951–54) 6:390–392. L. MARCHAL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2383–85.

[H. J. MULLER]

LABARUM

The name given to the banner of Emperor CONSTAN-TINE I, an adaptation of the Roman cavalry standard (vex-illum) with the pagan emblems replaced by Christian symbols. After his victory at the Milvian bridge (313), Constantine made the labarum the imperial flag of the western Empire, and from 324, for the entire Roman Empire. It was accompanied by an honor guard of 50 soldiers, outstanding for their bravery and devotion to the Christian faith (Eusebius, Vita Constantini 1.26).

Eusebius stated that the labarum was designed by Constantine himself on the day after his alleged vision of the cross. The banner consisted of a long gilt spear with a transverse bar forming a cross, crowned with a wreath of gold and precious stones enclosing the CHI-RHO monogram of Christ with a square purple banner inscribed TOYTO NIKA ("by this sign conquer") and embroidered with precious stones interlaced with gold hanging from the cross-bar. There were medallions of the Emperor and his sons immediately above this banner (Eusebius, Vita Constantini 1.26). The labarum is pictured on Constantinian coins from 314. Variants of the original labarum were supplied to all legions; the variety of design, together with the constancy of the essential parts, can be seen upon comparison of several preserved Constantinian coins. After a period of brief eclipse during the reign of Emperor Julian (361-363), the labarum was brought back to a place of honor by Jovian and housed in the imperial palace in Constantinople. The significance of the labarum transcends its use as the first Christian military standard. In effect it proclaimed that Constantine, aware of the bankruptcy of the old psychological stimuli to geopolitical solidarity, was calling on the labarum to provide a new stimulus and rallying point; and it meant that Christianity was agreeing to ride at the head of a huge organized military force and share the fortunes of an earthly power.

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, Vita Constantini 1.26–31; Hist. eccl. 9.9.2. H. GRÉGOIRE, Byzantion 4 (1927–28) 477–482. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 8.1:927–962. J. J. HATT, Latomus 9 (1950) 427–436.

[A. G. GIBSON]

LABASTIDA Y DÁVALOS, PELAGIO ANTONIO DE

Mexican archbishop and scholar; b. Zamora, Michoacán, March 21, 1816; d. Coacaleco, Tlalnepantla, Feb.

The Emperor Honorius Holding a Labarum, leaf of a 5th-century ivory diptych in the Cathedral at Aosta, Italy.

4, 1891. He was ordained on Nov. 10, 1838, and received his degree in Canon Law in 1839. He became a professor of literature, philosophy, and Spanish. In the Michoacán curia he held the offices of prosecutor and judge of wills and inheritances, chaplaincies, and pious works. Santa Anna proposed him for the Puebla Diocese. He was appointed in Rome on March 23, 1855, and consecrated on July 8 by the bishop of Michoacán, Clemente de Jesús Munguía. When the Plan of Ayutla was promulgated, Labastida was accused of attacking the government from the pulpit, and he went into exile in Havana. From there he went to live in Rome. In his travels he visited Palestine, Egypt, and India. When Maximilian of Austria heard the bishop was in Europe, he asked to see him to obtain more exact information on the Mexican political situation; so Labastida, bishop of monarchist leanings, visited the future emperor in Miramar. On March 19, 1863, Labastida was appointed archbishop of Mexico, returning there on October 12. He was named to the imperial regency but soon resigned. In 1865 he made pastoral visits to Tierra Caliente and the valley of Toluca. On Feb. 5, 1867, on the invitation of Pope Pius IX, he went to Rome, where he remained because of the new political unrest in Mexico, taking part in Vatican Council I as a member of the commission on ecclesiastical discipline. When the Council was suspended, he returned to Mexico City on May 19, 1871, and took up his episcopal duties in a political climate dominated by Liberals. He secured approval for the coronation of the statue of Our Lady of Guadalupe. The president of Mexico, Porfirio Díaz, presented him with a crozier on the 50th anniversary of his ordination (1888) and attended the bishop's funeral three years later. Labastida left a large number of sermons, pastoral letters, decrees, and funeral orations.

Bibliography: J. T. BASURTO, El Arzobispado de México (Mexico City 1944). E. VALVERDE TÉLLEZ, Bio-bibliografia eclesiástica mexicana (1821–1943), 3 v. (Mexico City 1949).

[L. MEDINA-ASCENSIO]

LABAT, JEAN BAPTISTE

Dominican missionary, author; b. Paris, 1663 or 1664; d. Paris, Jan. 6, 1738. Professed in Paris April 11, 1685, he later lectured in Nancy. From 1694 to 1705 he was active in the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe in the Lesser (French) Antilles, first as priest then as procurator, superior, and finally as apostolic prefect. As a missionary he was generous, commercially astute, inventive, and a defender of French interests against foreign rivals. Through his outstanding military efforts, he liberated Martinique from the British expedition, led by Sir Christopher Codrington in 1703. His superiors recalled him to France, where instead of granting him recognition for his work, the government through intrigues and misrepresentation confined him to a cloister in Toul without a trial, and he was not allowed to resume his island voyages. Released after intervention by the Dominican superior general, he traveled extensively in Spain and Italy, and was allowed to return to Paris after the death of Louis XIV (1715). There he wrote his famous memoirs. In 1727 he was made procurator for the Dominican superior general. He was a perceptive observer with many interests. His accounts of foreign countries were sincere, candid, and objective, but often diffuse. In addition to the Nouveau voyage aux Isles de l'Amerique (6 v., Paris 1722), which has been often translated and edited, and Voyages en Espagne et en Italie (8 v., Paris 1730), Labat wrote of West Africa (5 v., Paris 1728), Guinea (4 v., Amsterdam 1728), and Syria-North Africa (7 v., Paris 1735).

Bibliography: M. A. LAMARCHE, Le Père Labat au l'humour d'un savant, 1664–1738 (Montreal 1938). J. RENNARD, Le Père Labat aux Antilles (Paris 1927).

[B. M. BIERMANN]

LABBE, PHILIPPE

French scholar and Jesuit; b, Bourges, July 10, 1607; d. Paris, March 17, 1667. Philippe Labbe was born into a middle-class family whose professional connections were with the law. After entering the Society of Jesus (Sept. 28, 1623), Labbe taught the upper classes at the Jesuit college in Bourges. He soon abandoned teaching for ambitious projects of research, many of which remained unfinished at the time of his death. Many of his works were compilations, dealing with a variety of disciplines and comprising numerous volumes. Every year he produced one or more works. Labbe, like other of his contemporaries, was given to stating controversial opinions and to defending them vigorously in print. He spoke of Protestants and the intolerance typical of his century. De scriptoribus ecclesiasticis quos attigit card. Robertus Bellarminus (Paris 1660) is a criticism of a bibliography of ecclesiastical authors in which Labbe censured certain Protestant writers. Labbe's learning was extensive. His scholarly interests included hagiography, ecclesiastical and secular history, heraldry, antiquities, geography, and Greek prosody. In some fields his learning was sound, and certain of his works have been useful to subsequent generations of scholars. For a complete list of his publications (some 80 titles), see C. Sommervogel et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890-1932).

In Pharus Galliae Antiquae (Moulins 1644), Labbe bitterly criticized a similar account by Sanson. The dispute that ensued reached such proportions that the Chancellor of France, Pierre Séguier, Duc de Villemor, had to intervene and pacify the irate scholars. Labbe was responsible for the first plan of a history of Byzantium, De Byzantinae historiae scriptoribus (Paris 1648). This work was his most precious contribution to historical studies and the most useful to posterity. Aristotelis et Platonis graecorum interpretum types hactenus editorem (Paris 1657) is the plan of a work devoted to the history of Greek and Roman philosophy. Claudii Galeni Vita (Paris 1660) and Claudii Galeni chronologium eloquim (Paris 1660) are basic works on the life of Galen. Labbe attempted a historical concordance that is useful to the study of French history, L'Abrégé royal de l'alliance chronologique de l'histoire sacrée et profane (Paris 1651). Another major and lasting contribution is his collection of councils, Sacrosancta concilia ad regiam editionem exacta. . . (Paris 1671–72). This particular work comprised eight volumes and was completed by G. Cos-

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 4:184–190. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:1295–1328; 9:561–563. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934) 2:1053–54.

[C. HOLMES]

LABERTHONNIÈRE, LUCIEN

French Modernist philosopher and theologian; b. Chazelet (Indre), Oct. 5, 1860; d. Paris, Oct. 6, 1932. After ordination (1886) as a member of the ORATORIANS, he became a professor of philosophy at the College of Juilly (1887). He came under the influence of BOUTROUX, at the Sorbonne, where he continued his studies. In his preoccupation with reconciling philosophy and religion, his thinking was influenced by BLONDEL, PASCAL, and MAINE DE BIRAN. He was appointed superior at the École Massillon in Paris (1898) and of the college of Juilly (1900). From 1905 until 1913 he edited Annales de la philosophie chrétienne. As a follower of Blondel's immanence theories and a severe critic of Church authority and of SCHOLASTIC PHILOSOPHY (but not that of St. THOM-AS AQUINAS), he developed a pragmatic personalist view of religion called moral dogmatism. His Essais de philosophie religieuse (1903) and Le Réalisme chrétien et l'idéalisme grec (1904) were put on the Index in 1906. The Annales and two of his other works, Le Témoignage des martyrs (1912) and Sur le chemin du Catholicisme (1913), were placed on the Index in 1913. When he was subsequently forbidden to publish his writings, he obeyed but continued to write. His Études sur Descartes and Études de philosophie cartésienne, published posthumously, were placed on the Index in 1936 and 1941, respectively. His private life was exemplary, and he died at peace with the Church, after receiving the Last Rites.

Bibliography: M. M. D'HENDECOURT, Essai sur la philosophie du Père Laberthonnière (Paris 1947). E. CASTELLI, Laberthonnière (Milan 1927). J. P. GOLINAS, La Restauration du Thomisme sous Léon XIII et les philosophies nouvelles: Études de la pensée de M. Blondel et du Père Laberthonnière (Washington 1959). I. DANIELE, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1760–62.

[F. M. O'CONNOR]

LABORANS

Cardinal, canonist, and theologian; b. Pontorma, near Florence; d. most likely Rome, c. 1190. He studied at Frankfurt and received the rank of magister at the University of Paris. He held the post of canonicus at Capua before 1160. In 1173 he became cardinal deacon of S. Maria in Porticu and in 1180 cardinal priest of S. Maria in Trastevere. He belonged to the school of canonists known as the DECRETISTS, in that their main concern was to comment on the Decretum of GRATIAN. He is the author of several works, the most famous being his Codex Compilationis. This work, finished in 1182, was the result of 20 years of labor on his part. It is an attempt at rearranging Gratian's Decretum in a more logical order, with the addition of new materials such as decretals of Innocent II, Eugene III, Alexander III, and the canons of the Third Lateran Council. Laborans is also the author of three theological treatises: De vera libertate (1144–61); Contra Sabellianos (1180–90); and De relativa praedicatione personae in divinis (1180–90). He was apparently influenced by the school of Gilbert of Poitiers in his theological work.

Bibliography: S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937) 267–268. G. LEBRAS, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 8.2:2388.

[J. M. BUCKLEY]

LABOREM EXERCENS

Pope John Paul II's encyclical on labor, dated Sept. 14, 1981. The intermediate occasion for the encyclical was the ninetieth anniversary of RERUM NOVARUM, Pope Leo XIII's social encyclical of 1891—the start of what has come to be known as "papal social thought." Laborem exercens defined the human being as "worker." Humans differ from animals because humans alone must create the conditions of their survival and well-being by labor. The encyclical significantly expanded the notion of work. John Paul II indicated that labor does not refer principally to industrial labor, as it tended to do in previous encyclicals, but included agriculture, clerical, scientific, service-oriented and intellectual work (nn. 1, 4).

The encyclical presented Catholic social teaching as a radical critique of communism and capitalism. Oppression and inequality in the world are caused by a disorder in the organization of labor. While capital (including the mechanical means of production and the natural resources made available for production) is "the result of labor" (n. 12), i.e., accumulated labor, and therefore should be united with labor and serve labor, in actual fact capital has organized itself against labor in Western society.

The encyclical formulated the fundamental principle of "the priority of labor over capital." In today's world in which industries are interconnected and related to public institutions, capital is meant to serve the entire laboring society. State ownership of the industries in itself offers no guarantee that the priority of labor over capital will be respected. The encyclical defended private ownership of productive goods, but added that ownership, whether private or public, is always conditional. "Isolating the means of production as separate property in order to set it up in the form of capital in opposition to labor—and even to practice exploitation of labor—is contrary to the very nature of these means . . . because the only legitimate title to their possessions is that they should serve labor" (n. 14).

Laborem exercens argued that the dignity of labor is such that laborers are entitled to co-own the goods they produce and thus share in the decisions regarding the use of these goods. Workers are also entitled to share in the decisions concerning the work process. According to John Paul II, workers are meant to be "the subjects," the fully responsible agents, of production. The encyclical encouraged all movements that seek to extend workers' participation in ownership and management. (At the time the encyclical appeared there was still hope that the union movement Solidarity would transform Polish society).

What strategy must be adopted to transform the economic systems of West and East so that the priority of labor be respected?

To achieve social justice in the various parts of the world, in the various countries and in the relationship between them, there is a need for ever new movements of solidarity of the workers and with the workers. . . . The Church is firmly committed to this cause, for it considers it to be its mission, its service, a proof of its fidelity to Christ, so that it can truly be the Church of the poor (n. 8).

This radical teaching was reinstated in the "Instruction on Christian Freedom and Liberation" (March 1986), published by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith: "The serious socio-economic problems which occur today cannot be solved unless new fronts of solidarity are created: solidarity among themselves, solidarity with the poor to which the rich are called, solidarity among the workers and with the workers" (n. 89).

Bibliography: For the text of Laborem exercens, see Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1981): 57–647 (Latin); Origins 11, no. 15 (Sept. 24, 1981): 225, 227–244 (English); The Pope Speaks 26 (1981): 289–336 (English). For commentaries and summaries of the encyclical, see: G. BAUM, The Priority of Labor (New York 1982). D. DORR, Option for the Poor (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1983). J. W. HOUCK and O. F. WILLIAMS, eds., Co-creation and Capitalism: John Paul II's "Laborem Exercens" (Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1983).

[G. BAUM]

LABOURÉ, CATHERINE, ST.

Mystic, inaugurator of the MIRACULOUS MEDAL devotion; b. Fain-les-Moutiers, Burgundy, France, May 2, 1806; d. Enghien-Reuilly Convent, Paris, Dec. 31, 1876. Zoé, as she was baptized, was the ninth of 17 children of Pierre Labouré, a prosperous farmer, and Madeleine Louise Gontard (d. 1815). She received no formal education, but frequent Communion, daily Mass, and hours of prayer nurtured her desire to enter religious life. From the age of 12 she managed the household for her father and brothers. In 1828 her father tried to discourage her vocation by sending her to Paris to work as a waitress in his brother's café. Unhappy there, she fled to relations in Châtillon-sur-Seine, where she entered the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul (January 1830) and took Catherine as her name in religion. At the novitiate in Rue du Bac, Paris, she soon experienced visions of St. Vincent de Paul's heart. Repeatedly she enjoyed the visible presence of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament. According to Catherine, she was awakened on the night of July 18, 1830, by her guardian angel, who led her to the chapel. There Our Lady appeared and, while Catherine knelt at her knee, sat and talked for two hours, giving spiritual advice, predicting world calamities, and speaking of a mission for Catherine. In a second apparition (Nov. 27, 1830) this mission was revealed when the novice beheld a picture of Mary standing on a globe with light streaming from her hands. Around the Virgin were the words in French: "O Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee." After manifesting the miraculous medal, Mary entrusted to Catherine the inauguration of the devotion to it. A third vision (September 1831) was to the same effect. Catherine confided her experience only to her confessor, M. Aladel, who obtained permission from the archbishop of Paris to have the medal struck (1832). In 1836 an archdiocesan commission canonically approved the authenticity of the visions.

Catherine was sent to Reuilly, Paris (January 1831), and worked there for the remaining 46 years of her life, tending the aged and laboring in other humble occupations. Her mystical experiences continued. She had a mysterious vision of the cross (c. 1847) and made remarkable prophecies. To her superiors, however, she seemed "insignificant" and "cold, even apathetic." Not until May 1876 did Catherine reveal her visions to her superiors, and then in order to expedite a statue requested by Mary. Her incorrupt body lies in the chapel of the motherhouse on Rue du Bac, Paris. She was beatified May 28, 1933, by PIUS XI, and canonized July 27, 1947, by PIUS XII.

Feast: Nov. 28.

Bibliography: J. I. DIRVIN, St. Catherine Labouré of the Miraculous Medal (New York 1958). O. ENGLEBERT, Catherine Labouré and the Modern Apparitions of Our Lady, tr. A. GUINAN (New York 1959). R. LAURENTIN and P. ROCHE, Catherine Labouré et la médaille miraculeuse: documents authentiques: 1830–1876 (Paris 1976). R. LAURENTIN, The Life of Catherine Labouré, tr. P. INWOOD (London 1983). Siegeszug der wunderbaren Medaille, ed. W. DURRER (Jestetten 1983). Franciscan Friars of the Immaculate, "You Will Make This Known . . ." (New Bedford, MA 1998).

[J. I. DIRVIN]

LABRE, BENEDICT JOSEPH, ST.

The "beggar of Rome" and promoter of the FORTY HOURS DEVOTION; b. Amettes, France, March 25, 1748; d. Rome, Italy, April 16, 1783. He was the eldest of 15 children of a village shopkeeper. At the age of 12 he was sent to study with his uncle, the parish priest of Érin, at whose home he became so interested in Scripture and the saints that he tended to neglect more practical studies. After they had both selflessly devoted themselves to the care of the sick during a local epidemic, his uncle died of cholera, and Benedict's ambition then became entrance into an austere religious order. At the age of 18 he set out on foot for La Trappe, but was told upon arriving that he was too young. Although he was later several times accepted by the Carthusians and the Cistercians, his eccentricities and poor health prevented his becoming an apt subject for community life.

In 1770, Benedict started on a pilgrimage to Rome, walking all the way and living on alms. His last letter to his parents mentioned his intention of joining an order in Italy, but he apparently abandoned this plan in favor of a different and unusual vocation: to live the evangelical counsels as a wanderer in the midst of the world. For the next six years his life was one of continual pilgrimages to all the principle shrines of Europe. He visited Loreto, Assisi, Bari, Einsiedeln, Aix, Compostela, and others. He made himself homeless, traveled everywhere on foot, normally slept on the bare ground, and had no possessions except a ragged cloak and a few books. Living on alms, he frequently shared what he received with other beggars. He took no care of his body, and this neglect became a source of mortification and, to Benedict's delight, induced contempt. In the course of his journeys, he often spent hours before some wayside shrine or days in a remote church absorbed in prayer. Hardships, inclement weather, and calumnies were borne with equanimity and joy.

After 1776, Benedict settled in Rome. His nights were spent in the ruins of the Colosseum and his days in various churches. He particularly loved Forty Hours and sought out churches where the devotion was being observed. His increasing ill health finally forced him to take lodging in a poor house. Early in 1783 he fell ill and peacefully died during Holy Week. He was immediately popularly proclaimed a saint, and devotion to the "beggar of Rome' and the "saint of the Forty Hours" spread rapidly throughout the entire Church. He was canonized in 1883 by LEO XIII.

Feast: April 16.

Bibliography: J. MANTENAY, St. Benoît Labre (Paris 1908).

L. BRACALONI, Il Santo della strada: Benedetto Giuseppe Labre (Rome 1946). F. GAQUÈRE, Le saint pauvre de Jésus-Christ, Benoît-Joseph Labre (new ed. Avignon 1954). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:106–108. A. BEILLIARD, Amettes-en-Artois, Saint Benoît-Joseph Labre: itinéraire (Amettes 1973). J. RICHARD, Le vagabond de Dieu: saint Benoît Labre (Paris 1976). A. DHÔTEL, Saint Benoît Joseph Labre (Paris 1983). P. DOYÈRE, Benoît Labre, ermite pèlerin (Paris 1983). Centre d'histoire religieuse de Lille, Benoît Labre: errance et sainteté, histoire d'un culte, ed. Y. M. HILAIRE (Paris 1984). G. VILLARUBIAS, Amettes, sanctuaire et village d'Artois (Amettes, France 1985).

[W. E. LANGLEY]

LABRIOLLE, PIERRE DE

Historian, Latin scholar, and patrologist; b. Asnières, near Paris, June 18, 1874; d. Nantes, Dec. 28, 1940. After classical studies in Paris, he taught at Laval University in Montreal, at the Collège Stanislas in Paris, at the lycée in Rennes, and at the University of Fribourg in Switzerland (1904–19), and was associated with the University of Poitiers and the Sorbonne in Paris, (1926–40). In 1916 he entered the Académie des inscriptions et belles lettres. His patristic studies began with short biographies of SS. Vincent of Lérins (1906), Jerome (1907), and Ambrose (1908). After a dissertation at Fribourg on the sources for the history of MONTANISM (1910), he published La Crise montaniste (Paris 1913). His Histoire de la littérature latine chrétienne (1910, Eng. tr. H. Wilson, 1925), was reedited by G. BARDY (2 v., Paris 1947). He founded the Bulletin d'ancienne littérature et d'archéologie chrétienne (Paris 1911—). He revived the study of patristics in French universities; his fame rests particularly on the texts he edited and his translation of several of Augustine's works for the Budé series. La Réaction païenne (to Christianity) appeared in Paris in 1934, and he contributed to volumes three and four of Histoire de l'Église (1936–37) of A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN.

Bibliography: J. ZEILLER, Revue des études latines 19 (1941) 55–61. A. HAMMAN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:721.

[F. X. MURPHY]

LA CAVA (SS. TRINITÁ), ABBEY OF

Benedictine monastery near Salerno, Italy. It was founded in 1011 by St. ALFERIUS and enlarged by his second successor, Abbot PETER PAPPACARBONE (1079-1123), who built the church that was consecrated by Pope Urban II in 1092. Cava became the center of a flourishing Benedictine congregation inspired by the usages of CLUNY, where Alferius and Peter had stayed for some time. Endowed with a considerable number of holdings and dependencies, including several seaports, the abbey established a closely knit network of trade relations with Africa and the eastern Mediterranean and extended its influence through all of Italy, from Milan to Sicily. By the middle of the 13th century, Cava's power began to decline; becoming involved in the wars between the houses of Anjou and Aragon, it lost many holdings on the mainland, and in 1282 Pope MARTIN IV forced the abbey to cede its Sicilian holdings to Aragon. Its abbot was one of the most influential dignitaries at the royal court of Naples, and in consequence by 1394 Cava came to be ruled by bishops, selected at will by the popes from among the secular clergy, and with results for the abbey that can be readily imagined. The monastery lost its Calabrian holdings in 1410; Pope Eugene IV introduced COM-MENDATION in 1431. In 1492, when the monks remaining at Cava proved refractory to reform, the commendatory abbot Cardinal Oliviero Carafa removed them and substituted monks of the Reform Congregation of St. Justina (see BENEDICTINES), in favor of whom he renounced his commendation. The consequent abrogation of episcopal authority at Cava resulted in local disorders and pillaging, leading to the erection (1513) of the Diocese of Cava, distinct from the abbey. The monastery was closed from 1807 to 1815 and then suppressed in 1866; the monks, however, were left as "custodians," a step that preserved monastic buildings and the library from destruction. Today the abbot nullius of Cava has a territory of 22 parishes and about 25,000 inhabitants; the abbey belongs to the Benedictine Cassinese Congregation. In the library, besides documents of historical importance, there are preserved a Gothic Bible of the 14th century, a codex of Lombard law, and more than 600 incunabula. Four abbots are honored as saints: Alferius (1011-50), Leo I of Cava (1050-79), Peter (1079-1123), and CONSTABILIS (1123–24). Their veneration, authorized by Pope Sixtus V in 1589, was reconfirmed by Leo XIII in 1893. Another eight are blessed: Simeon (1141), Falco (1146), Marinus (1170), Benincasa (1194), Peter II (1208), Balsamon (1232), Leonard (1255), and Leo II of Cava (1268–95).

Bibliography: Chronicon Cavense, L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, 25 v. in 28, ed. G. CARDUCCI and V. FIORINI (2d, new ed. Cittè di Castello 1900–) 7:913–962. Annales Cavenses, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 3:185–197. Codex diplomaticus Cavensis, ed. M. MORCALDI et al., 8 v. (Naples-Milan 1874–93). P. GUILLAUME, Essai historique sur l'abbaye de Cava (Cava 1877). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:635–637. P. SCHMITZ, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 12:21–24. G. PENCO, Storia del monachesimo in Italia (Rome 1961).

[I. DE PICCOLI]

LACEY, WILLIAM, BL.

Priest and martyr; b. Horton, near Settle, West Riding, Yorkshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, Aug. 22, 1582. William Lacey, a gentleman who held a distinguished position under the Crown until c. 1565, was step-father to two sons, Arthur and Joseph Cresswell, who became Jesuits. For 14 years he and his wife suffered persecution as recusants, including imprisonment at Hull. After the death of his wife, Lacey studied at the English College in Rheims (1580-81) and, under a special dispensation because he had been married twice, was ordained priest at Rome in 1581. He visited Loreto (May 10, 1581) en route back to England. The following year he was arrested in York Castle (July 22, 1582) after hearing a Mass said by the soon-to-be apostate Thomas Bell. After enduring the hardships of imprisonment in a dungeon, he was arraigned (August 11), condemned, and confined until his death. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs, (New York 1905), II, 564–88. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), I, 16–17. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LA CHAIZE, FRANÇOIS DE

Jesuit confessor of Louis XIV; b. Château d'Aix (Loire), Aug. 25, 1624; d. Paris, Jan. 20, 1709. He studied at the Jesuit college of Roannes, entered the novitiate in Avignon in 1639, was ordained in 1656, and in 1658 made his profession in Lyons, where he taught philosophy and was later rector and provincial. From 1675 to his death he was confessor of LOUIS XIV, coming to the court when Louis was giving public scandal by living with the Duchess of Montespan. La Chaize's policy of mildness rather than strictness was in time justified by the complete conversion of the king. His influence was long preponderant on the Council of Conscience, where he assisted the king in the appointment of bishops. He took a position akin to that of the bishops in the difficulties between Louis, and Innocent XI, who, inclined toward a strict stand, was displeased with La Chaize. He advised against extreme measures against Jansenists and Protestants.

Bibliography: G. GUITTON, Le Père de La Chaize, confesseur de Louis XIV, 2 v. (Paris 1959). J. BRUCKER, La Compagnie de Jésus (Paris 1920).

[P. BLET]

LACHAT, EUGÈNE

Bishop of Basel; b. Montavon (Berne), Switzerland, Oct. 14, 1819; d. Balerna (Ticino), Nov. 1, 1886. After completing his philosophical and theological studies in Albano in Italy, he was ordained (1842) and then worked as a missionary in Italy until 1844, when he went to Alsace. In 1850 he became pastor in Grandfontaine (Berne), and in 1855, dean in Delémont. As bishop of Basel (1863–84), he headed the largest see in the seven cantons during a period of radicalism characterized by constant infringements on ecclesiastical matters. At VATICAN COUNCIL I, Lachat spoke in favor of papal infallibility. As a result, the Swiss press violently attacked him. Open battle, the KULTURKAMPF, broke out when Lachat inflicted ecclesiastical censures on the few priests who refused to admit the defined doctrine of papal infallibility. Lachat was declared deposed by the governments of five of the seven cantons in which his diocese lay (Jan. 29, 1873) and was expelled from his residence (April 16, 1873). For the next 12 years he directed his see from exile in Lucerne, where he erected a seminary (1882). At the wish of Pope LEO XIII, he resigned his bishopric (1884). He was made titular archbishop of Damietta and apostolic administrator of Ticino (1885), and he erected a seminary in Lugano, where he was buried in the church of S. Maria degli Angeli.

Bibliography: P. VAUTREY, Histoire des évêques de Bâle, v.2 (Einsiedeln 1886) 559–635. D. FERRATA, Mémoires, v.1 (Rome 1920) 69–184. J. FOLLETÊTE, Un Évêque jurassien (Paris 1925). T. SCHWEGLER, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in der Schweiz (2d ed. Stans 1943). A. CHÈVRE, ''Mgr. Eugène Lachat, évêque de Bâle: Á Propos d'un centenaire 1863–1963,'' Zeitschrift für Schweizerische Kirchengeschichte, 58 (1964) 119–133.

[J. B. VILLIGER]

LACHELIER, JULES

French Catholic idealist philosopher; b. Fontainebleau, May 27, 1832; d. there, Jan. 18, 1918. After graduation from the École Normale Supérieure, he studied philosophy privately under Félix Ravaisson (1813–1900). From 1864 to 1875 he taught philosophy at the École Normale Supérieure, but resigned because of a secret fear of disturbing his students' faith. He served in the university administration from 1875 to 1910, but his influence on young professors of philosophy remained great, and perdures through the 20th century.

Lachelier's idealism, Platonist and Leibnizian rather than Kantian, is based on the incompatibility of realism with absolute scientific determinism. The latter demands absolute homogeneity of all parts of matter, and therefore excludes any qualitative diversity whereby individual things can have distinct existence. Hence absolute scientific determinism implies that its object is purely mental. Mechanism thus proceeds from mind, but from impersonal mind that cannot be other than the object it thinks. Mechanical necessity is therefore a purely intelligible object of mathematical physics, from which all sensible qualities and distinct bodies, whether living or nonliving, are absent.

Impersonal mind does not stop at this level of abstract thought. Rather, by a pure act of instinct, it organizes distinct bodies harmoniously into a cosmos. By producing a world of real bodily units, impersonal mind itself becomes real through its real object.

Yet impersonal mind cannot be other than its object, which is still blind instinct. To become intellectual thought, impersonal mind reflects on itself and sees that it is the act whereby all things have being and truth. This creative act is man's intellectual judgment in which he judges the world of instinct to be true being. The human intellect, however, can only apply its judgment to instinctive finality that antedates it and to which it must passively conform. Since passive conformity is contrary to the nature of mind, the possibility remains that Pure Thought (God) may exist independently of human sense consciousness. God's existence is an unverifiable possibility, however, because experience is sufficiently explained without it.

In criticism, one should note that Lachelier's idealism was based on an absolute mechanical determinism later rejected by the physical sciences. His argument against natural units resembles the common scholastic argument that natural units are composed of primary matter and substantial form. To the extent that he acknowledged the human mind's passivity to the instinctive cosmos, Lachelier was a realist.

See Also: IDEALISM

Bibliography: Oeuvres, 2 v. (Paris 1933). The Philosophy of Jules Lachelier, tr. E. G. BALLARD (The Hague 1960). L. MILLET, Le Symbolisme dans la philosophie de Lachelier (Paris 1959), excellent bibliog. E. G. BALLARD, "Jules Lachelier's Idealism," Review of Metaphysics, 8 (1954–55) 685–705. R. A. POWELL, Truth or Absolute Nothing: A Critique of the Idealist Philosophy of Jules Lachelier (River Forest, Ill. 1958). A. G. SERTILLANGES, Le Christianisme et les philosophies, 2 v. (Paris 1939–41). v. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venics–Rome 1957) 2:1766–68.

[R. A. POWELL]

LACOMBE, ALBERT

Missionary; b. St. Sulpice, Montreal, Canada, Feb. 28, 1827; d. Midnapore, Alberta, Canada, Dec. 12, 1916. He was the son of Albert and Agathe (Duhamel) Lacombe. After ordination on June 13, 1849, he first exercised his ministry at Pembina, North Dakota (1849-51) and then returned to Canada as a curate in Berthierville (1851–52). He offered his services to Bp. Alexandre TACHÉ, OMI, of Red River, and went with him to Saint Boniface in 1852. From there he left for Edmonton and worked among the Cree and métis of Lake LaBiche, wintering at Fort Edmonton. In 1853 he took up residence at Lake St. Anne and visited Fort Jasper, and in 1855 he undertook an extensive trip to Small Slave Lake and Peace River. Upon his return to Lake St. Anne he joined the Oblates of Mary Immaculate and made his profession on Sept. 28, 1856. He founded the mission of St. Joachim in Edmonton (1858), and with Taché he determined the site of St. Albert mission, which bears his name (1861). From 1865 to 1872 he roamed the Plains and evangelized the Cree and Black Feet, founding (1866) St. Paul of the Cree in Brosseau, Alberta, the first attempt at agricultural colonization of the natives of the West.

He was named an official government intermediary during Louis RIEL's revolution (1873–74), served as pastor in Winnipeg (1874–80), attended to the care of the construction gangs of the Canadian Pacific railroad, and succeeded in preventing the Black Feet from slaughtering the workers (1883). Because of this he was named president of the Pacific for one hour when the first train arrived in Calgary in 1884. He founded the first industrial school for indigenous peoples at Dunbow, Alberta (1884), and opened a hospital (1893) and a school (1898) at Blood Reserve. From 1886 to 1892 he was a member of the Board of Education of the Northwest Territories. He founded a colony for the métis at St. Paul, Alberta, the source of many parishes. Between 1893 and 1895 he was frequently sent to the government at Ottawa to see justice done in the Catholic school question of the West. He was part of the government commission entrusted with making a treaty with the natives (1899) and traveled to Hungary (1900) and to Austria (1904) to enlist Ruthenian rite priests. In 1909 he founded a hospital at Midnapore, Alberta. He was the author of many important works in the native language.

Bibliography: K. HUGHES, Father Lacombe: The Black-Robe Voyageur (New York 1911). Le Père Lacombe . . . d'après ses memoires . . . par une soeur de la Providence (Montreal 1916). P. E. BRETON, The Big Chief of the Prairies: The Life of Father Lacombe (Montreal 1956).

[G. CARRIÈRE]

LACORDAIRE, JEAN-BAPTISTE HENRI

Dominican preacher, refounder of Dominican Order in France; b. May 12, 1802, Recey-sur-Ource (Burgundy); d. Nov. 21, 1861, Sorèze. His father, a physician like many of his ancestors, died when Jean-Baptiste was only four. His mother was deeply committed to providing the best care and education for her four children. At the lycée Lacordaire attended, he came under the influence of a bright but unbelieving teacher. Within a short time, the impressionable young student lost his Catholic faith. He had, however, acquired a love of the ideals of the French Revolution, liberty, equality, and fraternity, which would endure throughout his life. In 1819 Lacordaire entered the law school at Dijon, where his exceptional talent for public speaking blossomed. Early in his law school career, Lacordaire was very much influenced by the writings of J. J. ROUSSEAU on religious and political issues. He adopted a deistic understanding of God and saw religion, especially Christianity, as important because of its social utility. He parted company with Rousseau's political views after he became involved with a group of conservative, monarchist, and mostly Catholic students known as the Société d'Études. This group, founded in 1821, strongly supported the Bourbon Restoration. Influenced by these students, Lacordaire rejected Rousseau's notion of the social contract and instead committed himself to government based on a constitutional monarchy because it alone seemed capable of maintaining a balance between liberty and authority. As a result of his association with this predominantly Catholic group, Lacordaire became increasingly open to Catholicism and preoccupied with questions of religious faith. He completed law school at Dijon and moved to Paris in 1822 in order to begin a legal apprenticeship.

Conversion and Early Priesthood. Although Lacordaire's legal career in Paris got off to a bright and promising start, he was very troubled interiorly. He suffered from the Romantic melancholy that was typical of his generation, from the Romantic need for religious belief that was frustrated by the inability to believe. His "cold" reason seemed to rule out religion while his Romantic imagination, his "extremely religious soul," yearned to believe. By early 1824, it was apparent that his heart would be the victor. He wrote to a friend: "Would you believe it, I am every day growing more and more a Christian." His conversion to Catholic Christianity was soon completed. He described it in this Romantic fashion: "I remember having read the Gospel of Matthew and having cried one night: when one cries, one soon believes." From the beginning, his Catholic faith was profoundly related to his concern for the betterment of society. He believed that society could only have balance, just laws, authentic progress, and perfection through the Catholic Church.

Lacordaire entered the Sulpician seminary near Paris on May 12, 1824. Despite misgivings by seminary officials about his political views, which were untypical of French priesthood candidates of his era, he was ordained as a priest of the archdiocese of Paris on Sept. 22, 1827 by Archbishop de QUÉLEN. He was soon offered an important position in Rome but declined becoming instead chaplain of a Visitation convent. He received a supplementary assignment in 1828 when he was appointed assistant chaplain of a secondary school. These two tasks allowed him ample opportunity to pursue the study of theology. By the end of the 1820s Lacordaire was seriously considering the possibility of becoming a missionary to the United States because of its separation of church and state. He had received an offer from Bishop John Dubois of New York, an exile from revolutionary France, to become vicar general of his diocese and rector of the diocesan seminary.

Political Involvement. In 1830, Lacordaire abandoned any plans to leave France for the United States when he joined with Félicité LAMENNAIS, a priest who was one of the leading ultramontanists and Catholic political liberals in France, and a few others of like mind in the project of reconciling the Catholic Church and modern liberal society. They decided to fight for the cause of "God and liberty" by publishing a nationally distributed Catholic daily newspaper called L'Avenir. From the first issue of Oct. 16, 1830, the editors sought the support of all, Catholic or not, who believed in freedom of religion, education, and the press. They also argued that church and state should be free from mutual interference. The newspaper also advocated the freedom of religious orders to exist. L'Avenir soon found itself confronted by enemies on all sides. Secular liberals distrusted Catholic liberals. The predominantly conservative Catholic population of France distrusted liberals of every kind. The bishops, who were generally Gallican, disliked both the ULTRAMONTANISM and the political liberalism of Lacordaire, Lamennais et al. The editors, fearing that L'Avenir would be unable to survive such widespread opposition, decided to appeal to Pope GREGORY XVI for support. They believed that their staunch ultramontanism would bolster their case. They were mistaken: the pope issued the encyclical Mirari vos (Aug. 15, 1832), condemning L'Avenir, without mentioning it by name, and its entire project of reconciling Catholicism with such modern ideas as separation of church and state and freedom of religion and the press. The editors promptly accepted the papal condemnation and permanently ceased publication of their newspaper. In 1833, Lacordaire quietly resumed his chaplaincy at the Visitation convent.

Beginning of Preaching Career. Lacordaire's brilliant preaching career began in early 1834 with a series of conferences given to the students of the Collège Stanislas in Paris at the suggestion of Frédéric Ozanam. As his reputation grew, more adults than young students came to these conferences. Among his attentive listeners were such literary figures as CHATEAUBRIAND and Victor HUGO. His audience was impressed by the eloquence, enthusiasm, and commitment that he brought to his presentation of religious themes. To a generation that loved liberty, Lacordaire spoke of it as a tree that God himself had planted in the Garden of Eden. However, some of the clergy denounced him to the archbishop of Paris as a preacher of novelties rather than of orthodox Christianity. Consequently, Archbishop de Quélen suspended his conferences but later dramatically vindicated Lacordaire by giving him the prestigious task of preaching the 1835 Lenten conferences at Notre Dame Cathedral. In his sermons there, he expressed his concern for the social problems of his era and offered Christianity as the only adequate solution to these problems. He continued his popular and influential preaching at Notre Dame during Lent of 1836. At the conclusion of those conferences, he resigned from his preaching position at Notre Dame and retreated to Rome for study and meditation.

Dominican Vocation. During a retreat made with the Jesuits in Rome in May 1837, Lacordaire began to seriously think about the possibility of becoming a religious. In August of that year, he discussed the possibility of refounding the Dominican Order in France with Prosper Guéranger, who was himself engaged in restoring the Benedictine Order in France. Lacordaire was very impressed with the Dominican emphasis on preaching and with the order's democratic structure. He definitively decided to join the Order of Preachers during a retreat in France at the Abbey of Solesmes in June 1838. To win public approval for the restoration of an order that was still technically illegal in France, he wrote his Essay on the Re-Establishment in France of the Order of Preachers in which he eloquently appealed to his compatriots' love of liberty for support of an institution that he believed had historically been characterized by liberal and democratic constitutions. With two French recruits, Lacordaire began his novitiate year at the Dominican convent of La Quercia near Viterbo, Italy, in April 1839. He wrote an important Life of St. Dominic while still a novice. After completing theological studies in Rome, he returned to France where, on Feb. 14, 1841, he preached from the pulpit of Notre Dame Cathedral in his Dominican habit to an immense congregation which included Archbishop de Quélen as well as many government officials. Lacordaire continued to preach throughout France and Belgium, even resuming his acclaimed conferences at the Parisian cathedral. During the revolutionary year of 1848, he served briefly as a deputy of the National Assembly. The Dominican Order officially restored the Province of France in 1850 in recognition of the great growth in vocations and the establishment of new convents in that country during the 1840s. Lacordaire was appointed as provincial.

Alexandre Jandel, one of Lacordaire's early recruits, was appointed head of the Dominican Order in 1850 by Pope Pius IX. Long-standing differences between the two friars on questions of religious observance soon surfaced. Jandel emphasized the necessity for a strict and rigorous interpretation and observance of the Dominican constitutions while Lacordaire emphasized an "admirable freedom" at the heart of Dominican life which allowed for mitigations in the observance for the sake of the primary end of the order, preaching. In 1852, the issue of the night office brought the two superiors into open conflict. Jandel believed that, according to the constitutions, the office of Matins could be celebrated no later than three a.m. Lacordaire had instructed the friars of his province to celebrate that office at four a.m. in order to allow for adequate sleep, given the demands of their ministries. Jandel then informed the superiors in the French province that he was revoking Lacordaire's directive.

In 1852, Lacordaire, who had always been concerned about the religious education of the young, founded a men's community of Third Order Dominican teachers. Two years later, he accepted responsibility on behalf of the Dominicans for an historic boys' college at Sorèze near Toulouse. He made himself the head of that school, a post that he held for the rest of his life. When his term as provincial ended in 1854, he became more deeply involved in the direction of the college while continuing to do some preaching. He was elected provincial for the second time in 1858. His failing health led to his resignation as provincial in August 1861. On Nov. 21, 1861, he died at Sorèze.

Bibliography: H. LACORDAIRE, Essay on the Re-Establishment in France of the Order of Preachers (Mémoire pour le Rétablissement en France de l'Ordre des Frères Precheurs), ed. S. TUGWELL (Chicago 1983); La liberté de la parole évangélique: écrits, conférences, lettres, textes choisis et présentés par A. DUVAL et J.-P. JOSSUA (Paris 1996). P. BATTS, "Lacordaire's Understanding of 'Restoration' in Relation to his Refounding of the Dominican Order in 19th Century France' (D.Th. diss., St. Paul University [Ottawa] 1999). B. BONVIN, Lacordaire-Jandel, la Restauration de l'Ordre Dominicain en France après la Revolution (Paris 1989). B. CHOCARNE, The Inner Life of Père Lacordaire, trans. A. DRANE (New York 1879). J. T. FOISSET, Vie du R. P. Lacordaire, 2 vols. (Paris 1870). H. D. NOBLE, La vocation dominicaine du P. Lacordaire (Paris 1914). L. C. SHEPPARD, Lacordaire: A Biographical Essay (New York 1964).

[P. M. BATTS]

LACROIX, CLAUDE

Jesuit moral theologian; b. Dahlem, Luxembourg, April 7, 1652; d. Cologne, June 1 or 2, 1714. He entered the Society of Jesus at Trier in 1673 and was ordained in 1684. For three years he taught philosophy at Cologne, and then taught moral theology at Münster and Cologne. His great work Theologia moralis (8 v. Cologne 1707–14) was a commentary on the Medulla theologiae moralis of Hermann BUSENBAUM and itself became one of the outstanding theological works of the 18th century. It went through 25 editions in 50 years and won for Lacroix the reputation of being one of the finest moralists of his age. One of the later editions (1757), however, served as a focal point of the opposition of the Jansenists to the Jesuits and was condemned by the parliament of Paris and publicly burned at Toulouse.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:1347–54. H. HURT-ER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 4:911. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2424.

[J. C. WILLKE]

LA CROSSE, DIOCESE OF

The Diocese of La Crosse (Crossensis), suffragan of the metropolitan See of MILWAUKEE, was established March 3, 1868, upon recommendation of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, and embracing that half of the state of Wisconsin north and west of the Wisconsin River. Subsequent subdivisions erecting the Diocese of Superior (1905) and Madison (1946) reduced the original territory to 15,070 square miles. The resulting territory spans 19 counties in West-Central Wisconsin. Approximately 30 percent of the population is Catholic. The diocesan Catholic population grew steadily throughout the history of the diocese, aided initially by German and Irish immigration, and subsequently by heavy pockets of Polish immigration. After leveling off for a couple of decades, the Catholic population again began to increase in the 1990s as a result of the influx of large number of Mexican immigrants.

Bishops. When the first bishop, Bavarian-born Michael HEISS, was consecrated in 1868, the diocese had 18 priests, 47 small churches, and a Catholic population of about 30,000. By 1880, when he was transferred to Milwaukee, the number of priests had increased to 59 and the number of churches had more than doubled, while the Catholic population showed an increase of 50 percent. The second bishop, Kilian C. Flasch, also Bavarian-born, was rector of St. Francis Seminary in Milwaukee in the years before his consecration as the second bishop of La Crosse in 1881. During his ten-year episcopate there was a marked increase in the number of churches and educational facilities within the diocese.

The third bishop of La Crosse, James Schwebach, who was Flasch's vicar-general, was consecrated in 1892. Schwebach was born in Platen, Luxembourg, in 1847, immigrated to the United States in 1864, and, after completing his studies at St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, was ordained in 1870. Under his episcopacy the expansion of Catholic activity kept pace with the increase of population. A continuous program of construction of churches and the establishment of a diocesan high school marked his episcopate.

Alexander J. McGavick, a former auxiliary of Chicago, Ill., was appointed the fourth bishop of La Crosse in 1921. Despite his own poor health, the economic depression of the 1930s, and the outbreak of World War II, McGavick erected 38 new buildings, including a number of high schools. John P. Treacy, who had been appointed coadjutor with right of succession in 1945, became the fifth ordinary of the diocese in July 1946, two years before the death of McGavick. To encourage priestly vocations Treacy established Holy Cross Seminary, overlooking the Mississippi River south of La Crosse. Treacy also built a new cathedral, placing it under the patronage of St. Joseph the Workman.

After Treacy's death in 1964, Bp. Frederick W. Freking of Salina, Kans., was appointed sixth bishop of La Crosse in 1965. Freking oversaw the implementation of postconciliar reforms in the diocese. John J. Paul, a priest of the diocese, was ordained an auxiliary bishop in 1977, eventually becoming the seventh bishop of La Crosse in 1983. Bishop Paul implemented an aggressive recruitment program for the diocesan clergy. By the time of his resignation in 1994, the number of diocesan seminarians had rebounded to more than 30.

Raymond L. Burke, another native son of the diocese, served on the Apostolic Signatura in Rome before his ordination as the eighth bishop of La Crosse in 1995. An ardent defender of the family farm, Bishop Burke was named President of the Board of Directors of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference in 1996. His episcopate was marked by several major building projects. In December of 1999 he unveiled plans to build a large pilgrimage shrine southeast of La Crosse in honor of Our Lady of Guadalupe, scheduled for completion in 2004. He held a diocesan synod to mark the Jubilee Year 2000.

Bibliography: H. H. HEMING, ed. The Catholic Church in Wisconsin (Milwaukee 1895–98). L. RUMMEL, History of the Catholic Church in Wisconsin (Madison 1976).

[J. E. BIECHLER/D. SAKOWSKI]

LACTANTIUS

Lucius Caelius (or Caecilius) Firmianus, Christian apologist; b. North Africa, c. 240; d. c. 320. As a pagan he was a pupil of ARNOBIUS the Elder and long a teacher of rhetoric; he was officially invited to teach at Nicomedia during Diocletian's reign. It is uncertain when he became a Christian, but in the persecution of 303 he lost his official position and was impoverished. He seems to have moved to the West (c. 305), may have lived in Gaul, and probably returned to the East (311–313). In his old age (c. 317) in Trier, he became tutor to Crispus, Constantine's son.

None of his works survive except those connected with Christianity. The De Opificio Dei (303-304) is a demonstration of divine providence based on the wonders of human anatomy. The Divinae institutiones in seven books, completed by 313, was written to refute attacks on Christianity by a philosopher and a high official (Hierocles)—and other past or future traducers of Christianity. In this work Lactantius attacks paganism and philosophy; discusses Christianity, justice, true worship, and true religion; and deals extensively with eschatology. In pursuing his goal, the union of true religion and true wisdom, possible only in Christianity, he makes little use of Scripture but relies on pagan prophets, such as the SIBYL-LINE oracles and Hermes Trismegistus. His quotations of Scripture depend largely on Cyprian's Testimonia. In De ira Dei (c. 314) he counters the notion that God is indifferent, showing that His anger toward the wicked corresponds to His favor to the good. De mortibus persecutorum (c. 318), which shows the evil fate of those who had persecuted Christians, is an important historical source for the period after 303. Its authorship is no longer questioned. Lactantius's Epitome of his Institutiones and a poem on the PHOENIX are also extant.

In style Lactantius is the most classical of the early Christian Latin authors. He uses pagan authors, especially Cicero, Lucretius, and Vergil. Jerome says that his writing is 'like a stream of Ciceronian eloquence,' and in the Renaissance he was called the 'Christian Cicero.' He has little to say of Christian doctrine and institutions and is of little value as a theologian. "Would that he had been able to establish our teaching as well as he demolished that of others," said Jerome.

Bibliography: Opera Omnia, ed. S. BRANDT and G. LAUB-MANN, 2 v. in 3 (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 19, 27.1, 27.2; 1890, 1893, 1897); De la mort des persécuteurs, tr. and ed. J. MOREAU, 2 v. (Sources Chrétiennes 39; 1954); De ira Dei, tr. and ed. H. KRAFT and A. WLOSOK (Darmstadt 1957); Divinarum institutionum epitome, tr. and ed. E. H. BLAKENEY (London 1950). R. PICHON, Lactance (Paris 1901), fundamental. A. WLOSOK, Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis (Heidelberg 1960); "Zur Bedeutung der nichtcyprianischen Bibelzitate bei Laktanz," Studia Patristica 4.2 (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 79; 1961) 234–250. J. STEVENSON, "The Life and Literary Activity of Lactantius," ibid., 1.1 (Texte und Untersuchungen 63; 1957) 661–677. J. QUASTEN, Patrology 2:392–410. D. R. S. BAILEY, "Lactantiana," Vigiliae christianae 14 (1960) 165–169.

[J. STEVENSON]

LACUNZA Y DÍAZ, MANUEL DE

Chilean theologian and Scripture scholar; b. Santiago, Chile, July 19, 1731; d. Imola, Italy, July 18, 1801. On Sept. 7, 1747, he entered the Society of Jesus and in 1755, he was ordained. On the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain and its colonies in 1767, he went to Italy, where he led a retired life dedicated to meditation and study. This resulted in a book that later became famous, Venida del mesías en gloria y majestad, finished in 1790. It circulated in manuscript form before it was published in Cádiz, Spain, in 1812. It was later published in London, Mexico, Paris, and elsewhere, and translated into various languages. Lacunza used the pseudonym Juan Josafat Ben Ezra. The book had, even among the Jesuits, fervent admirers as well as strong opponents. It was finally banned by the Holy Office on Sept. 6, 1824, and again on July 11, 1941, this time with specific reference to the book's moderate MILLENARIANISM. This was considered a fatal blow to the book among Catholics, although many of them, like Menéndez Pelayo, believed before 1941 that the condemnation did not refer to millenarianism per se but rather to statements against the Roman Curia or statements offensive to the Fathers of the Church or in praise of Judaism. Among Protestants the book has become a symbol for some adventist sects. Lacunza's good faith and proper intentions cannot be doubted, although his mental health is questionable. His great reputation in Chile is based upon the depth of his thought, expressed in a polished style.

Bibliography: A. F. VAUCHER, Une Célébrité oubliée: Le padre Manuel de Lacunza y Díaz (Collonges-sous-Salève, Switzerland 1941). F. MATEOS, "El padre Manuel de Lacunza y el milenarismo," Revista chilena de historia y geografía 115 (1950) 134–161.

[F. MATEOS]

LACY, EDMUND

Bishop of Exeter; d. Chudleigh, Devonshire, Sept. 18, 1455. The son of Stephen Lacy of Gloucester, he was a fellow of University College, Oxford, by 1391; he became doctor of theology in 1414. However, he was called "the king's clerk" and enjoyed royal patronage on a moderate scale from 1400. He may have been attached to Henry (V), Prince of Wales, for he became dean of the chapel in the royal household soon after Henry's accession in 1413. Lacy resigned this office and ceased to attend the king after his consecration as bishop of HEREFORD in 1417. He was translated to EXETER in 1420, and for the remainder of his life he generally resided in the diocese. In 1435 Lacy was excused from attending parliaments and councils because of a long-standing disease of the shin bones (Cal. Patent Rolls 1429-36 453). This affliction may have occasioned his promotion of the therapeutic cult of St. Raphael, for whose feast he composed an Office to be observed in Exeter Cathedral and the collegiate churches of Crediton and Ottery St. Mary; he eventually secured its observance in Hereford and York Cathedrals as well. Lacy's tomb in Exeter Cathedral is said to have been the scene of many miraculous cures [U. M. Radford, "The Wax Images Found in Exeter Cathedral," The Antiquaries Journal 29 (1949) 164–168].

Bibliography: Lacy's registers have been pub. Hereford, ed. A. T. BANNISTER (Canterbury and York Society; London 1918); Exeter, register of institutions, ed. F. C. HINGESTON-RANDOLPH (Devon and Cornwall Record Society; Exeter 1909). For his Exeter common register, ed. G. R. DUNSTAN (Canterbury and York Society; London 1963–). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1081–83.

[R. L. STOREY]

LADISLAUS, KING OF HUNGARY, ST.

Reigned 1077 to July 29, 1095; b. Poland, c. 1040; d. Nitra, Czechoslovakia. The son of King Béla I of Hungary and a daughter of the Polish King Mesko II, Ladislaus (László, Lazlo, or Lancelot) was elected king against his will after the death of his brother King Geisa I. His cousin Solomon, aided by Emperor HENRY IV, rebelled against him. When Solomon revolted a second time with the aid of heathen Cumans, Ladislaus defeated them and finally unified his kingdom. In 1083 he successfully promoted the canonization of King STEPHEN I of Hungary, EMERIC OF HUNGARY, and GERARD OF CSANÁD. In 1091 he founded the bishopric of Zagreb, later annexing Croatia and Bosnia outright. Ladislaus did not subscribe to the GREGORIAN REFORM although in the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE he sided with the pope and with Rudolph of Swabia. He married Agnes (sometimes called Adelaide), the daughter of Rudolph. He introduced a new law code for his kingdom. Priests were allowed to marry, but remarriage was forbidden. The Diet at Szabolcs marked a step toward a deepened religious life among both clergy and laymen. He died while preparing for the First CRUSADE, and he was buried in the cathedral that he had built in Oradea (Romania). In 1192 he was canonized by CELESTINE III.

Feast: June 27.

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum June 7:284–294. G. FEJÉR, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 43 v. (Budapest 1829–44) v.1. S. L. ENDLICHER, ed., Rerum Hungaricarum monumenta arpadiana (Sankt Gallen 1849). P. VON VÁCZY, Die erste Epoche des ungar. Königtums (Budapest 1935). Vies des saintes et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 6:461–463. A. BUTLER The Lives of the Saints rev. ed. (New York 1956) 2:654–655. P. J. GÁL, Idvezlégy, kegyelmes Szent László kerály, Magyarországnak édes oltalma (Budapest 1999), legends.

[J. PAPIN]

LADISLAUS OF GIELNIÓW, BL.

Franciscan popular missionary; b. c. 1440, Gielnów, Diocese of Gniezno, Poland; d. May 4, 1505 (feast, May 4, September 25). After being educated in Cracow, he entered the FRANCISCAN Order. Pious and filled with apostolic zeal, Ladislaus in his pastoral activities followed the example of JOHN CAPISTRAN. In 1487 he became provincial of the Polish Bernardine province; he founded a new observant convent that became a center of missionary activity for Lithuania. He excelled as a poet, whose works were devoted to the Passion of Christ and to Our Lady, in whose honor he introduced a special form of rosary. He was beatified on Feb. 11, 1750, by BENEDICT XIV, and in 1753 he was proclaimed a patron of Poland, the city of Warsaw, and Lithuania.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 1 (1863) 565–620. Masarykův slovník naučný, 7 v. (Prague 1925–33) 4:291. C. BOG-DALSKI, Bernardyni w Polsce, v.2 (Krakow 1933) 93–142, the Bernadines of Poland. B. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:728.

[J. PAPIN]

LAETUS, ST.

Hermit; fl. at Micy, sixth century. The sole primary source for his life is the largely legendary vita composed in the 10th century on the model of the vita of St. Viator of Sologne (sixth century) written in the ninth century. Whether Laetus was ever ordained or remained a deacon is uncertain. He was a monk in the monastery at Micy under the abbot AVITUS, and then went into a forest area north of Orléans as a hermit. The place where he died was later called Saint-Lié in his honor. In 943 Ermentheus, bishop of Orléans, transferred his relics to Pithiviers, France. In the late Middle Ages he was venerated, among other places, at Laon, Paris, and Orléans.

Feast: Nov. 5.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 2:4672. Acta sanctorum Nov. 3:67–79. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 3:264–265. A. PONCELET, "Les Saints de Micy," Analecta Bollandiana 24 (1905) 1–104, esp. 61–71, 98–103.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

LAFARGE

A family of distinguished U.S. artists and authors founded by Jean Frédéric de la Farge, a refugee from Revolutionary France, who arrived in the United States in 1807 and settled near the present LaFargeville in upper New York State, and his wife Louisa, daughter of emigré Louis François Binsse de St. Victor (1774–1884), a miniaturist.

John. Artist and author; b. New York, March 3, 1835; d. Providence, R. I., Nov. 14, 1910. A son of Jean Frédéric and Louisa, he attended St. John's College (now Fordham University), New York City, and graduated (1853) from Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md. He was preparing for law, but went to Paris (1856) and enrolled briefly in Thomas Couture's studio, apparently without any notion of becoming an artist. He met French intellectuals through his cousin, the literary critic Paul Bins, Comte de St. Victor (1825-81), encountered the Pre-Raphaelites in England, and haunted the art galleries. He came under the influence of William Morris Hunt, a Couture disciple, at Newport, R.I, in 1859 and began a serious interest in art. His early works were chiefly landscapes that somewhat anticipated impressionism as well as plein-air painting.

Never robust after a serious illness in the 1860s, La-Farge nevertheless served on the committee set up to establish the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City. Shortly thereafter he began mural painting and, through his collaboration with architects, realized a fusion of building and decorative arts for the first time in the United States. His work appears in Trinity Church, Boston, planned with the architect H. H. Richardson; the Capitol, St. Paul, Minnesota; the Supreme Court building in Baltimore; the Church of the Ascension, New York City (probably his masterpiece); and in private New York mansions. His experiments in stained-glass design, which led to the invention of "opaline" glass and the creation of the jewel-like "Peacock Window" in the art museum at Worcester, Massachusetts, brought new life to this supposedly dead medium. He was also in the vanguard of European and U. S. artists who evinced interest in the art of the Pacific Islands. His voyage to Japan and the South Seas with his close friend Henry ADAMS in 1886 occasioned an important series of water colors. In 1899 he "incited" Adams to visit Chartres with him to study the windows, about which Adams philosophizes in his classic Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres.

LaFarge was a stimulating writer and lecturer. His Considerations on Painting (1895) originated as lectures at New York's Metropolitan Museum. In 1897 he published An Artist's Letters from Japan and a monograph on the Japanese artist Hokusai (1760–1859). LaFarge possessed, according to Adams, the most complex mind in the United States. To the art critic Royal Cortissoz, his biographer, he stated: "Painting is, more than people think, a question of brains." This attitude probably reveals both the strength and weakness of his work; in certain of his murals, for example, the desired effect is somewhat marred by an overly meticulous regard for detail. His achievement was substantial, however, both in his own works and in his influence.

LaFarge married (1860) Margaret Mason, grand-daughter of Commodore Matthew C. Perry and great-granddaughter of Benjamin Franklin, and fathered nine children; among them were Christopher Grant, John Louis Bancel, and John.

Bibliography: R. CORTISSOZ, John LaFarge (Boston 1911). J. LAFARGE, The Manner Is Ordinary (New York 1954). S. ISHAM, History of American Painting (New York 1927). O. W. LARKIN, Art and Life in America (rev. ed. New York 1960). H. ADAMS, The Education of Henry Adams (Boston 1961).

[F. GETLEIN]

Christopher Grant. Eldest son of John, architect; b. Newport, R. I., Jan. 5, 1862, d. Saunderstown, R. I., Oct. 11, 1938. After two years at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and a two-year apprenticeship with H. H. Richardson, he formed (1886) a partnership with George L. Hains, and their Romanesque design won the competition for the cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City. He devoted most of his time and talent to this project until, after the completion of the choir in 1907, all work was halted, a new competition held, and the firm of Cram, Goodhue, and Ferguson was selected to complete the cathedral in Gothic style. Although bitterly disappointed, LaFarge continued to serve his profession, not only with distinguished designs, but also as a fellow, director, and vice president of the American Institute of Architects and as chairman of the advisory committee of the architecture schools at Columbia University in New York City and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. As a member of the American Institute of Architects Committee for Education, he visited schools of architecture. lecturing on cultural aspects of the profession. Other La-Farge designs are the Fourth Presbyterian Church, New York City; the U.S. Naval Hospital, Brooklyn; buildings for the New York City Zoological Society (of which he was a founder); St. Paul's Church, Rochester, N. Y.; the Houghton Memorial Chapel, Wellesley College, Wellesley, Massachusetts; the Parkhard Memorial Library, Salt Lake City, Utah; the Morgan Building and Williams Memorial, Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut; and St. Matthew's Cathedral, Washington, D.C. He was the husband of Florence Bayard Lockwood and father of poet, novelist, and architect Christopher Grant (1897–1956) and writer and social scientist Oliver Hazard Perry (1901-1963).

Bibliography: J. LAFARGE, op. cit.

[P. GOETTELMANN]

John Louis Bancel. Second son of John, artist and designer; b. Newport, R. I., Sept. 23, 1865; d. Mount Carmel, Conn., Aug. 14, 1938. After a year at the University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine, a serious eye infection caused him to abandon this study in 1885. He turned to art, and after a brief apprenticeship in his father's New York studio, he studied in Europe for 12 years. He maintained close association with his father in the latter's business affairs. His major art work was related to church architecture and public buildings and included murals, mosaics, and stained glass; but he was known as well for his landscapes and figure painting. His most outstanding piece is the mosaic of the coronation of the Virgin Mary in the chapel of Trinity College, Washington, D.C. Other notable creations are the four altarpieces for the Church of the Immaculate Conception at Newport (his earliest commission); and mural decorations for the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, D.C.; St. Charles Seminary, Catonsville, Maryland; Sacred Heart Chapel, St. Paul, Minnesota; St. Aidan's Chapel, New Haven, Connecticut; and the New Haven public library. Examples of his work in stained glass are found in the Sacred Heart Chapel in St. Paul and the Church of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, Mount Carmel, California. He served with the Connecticut State Commission on Sculpture and with the national competitions jury sponsored by the U.S. Treasury Department for the decoration of government buildings. Yale University awarded him an honorary B. F. A. in 1917. He was a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, the National Society of Mural Painters, the New York Water Color Club, Liturgical Arts Society (president), and honorary member of the American Institute of Architects. He married Mabel Hooper in 1898 and they had four children: Louis Bancel, Edward Hooper, Henry Adams, and Thomas Sergeant LaFarge. Thomas Sergeant (1904–1943), an assistant to his father, was lost at sea during World War II.

Bibliography: J. LAFARGE, op. cit. New York Times (Aug. 15, 1938) 15:1, obituary.

[D'A. MCNICKLE]

John. Third son of John, editor, journalist, founder of the Catholic interracial movement in the United States; b. Newport, R. I., Feb. 13, 1880; d. New York City, Nov. 24, 1963. His early education was largely private; he entered Harvard College in 1897 and graduated in 1901. He studied for the priesthood at the University of Innsbruck, Austria, where he was ordained on July 26, 1905. He entered the Society of Jesus on Nov. 12, 1905, at Poughkeepsie, New York, and after two years of noviceship taught for a year at Canisius College in Buffalo and later at Loyola College in Baltimore. Two years of study at Woodstock College in Maryland earned him an M. A. in philosophy, but ill health forced him to abandon hope of reviewing theology. One year was spent as chaplain in the penal and hospital institutions of New York City, followed by 15 years of pastoral labor in the Jesuit missions in Charles and St. Mary's counties in southern Maryland. It was there he witnessed first hand racial prejudice and exploitation of the blacks. This period was interrupted for a year (1916–17) by studies in ascetical theology at St. Andrew-on-Hudson in Poughkeepsie. In August of 1926 he was appointed an associate editor of America, the national Catholic weekly review, a position he held until his death, except for two years as executive editor and four years as editor in chief.

Upon his return to New York City in 1926, LaFarge began his long apostolate for interracial justice in the pages of America, on the lecture platform, and principally through the formation of the Catholic Interracial Councils and their organ, the Interracial Review. The forerunner of this body had been the Catholic Laymen's Union, a group of Afro-American Catholics brought together by LaFarge to develop a program of spiritual formation and study of race relations. On Pentecost Sunday 1934 the union expanded into the first Catholic Interracial Council. In 1958 the 40 such councils established across the country held their first national convention in Chicago and established the NATIONAL CATHOLIC CONFERENCE FOR INTERRACIAL JUSTICE, with offices in Chicago and New York. The conference has been a strong voice for the Catholic position on civil rights and has widened the influence LaFarge first gave to the movement. The previous year (1937) LaFarge published Interracial Justice: A Study of the Catholic Doctrine of Race Relations in which he condemned racism as sinful.

LaFarge was also chaplain of the LITURGICAL ARTS SOCIETY from its foundation in 1933, of the St. Ansgar's Scandinavian Catholic League, and of the Catholic Laymen's Union, all of New York. At various times he was an officer of the Catholic Association for International Peace and of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference.

Besides his signed and unsigned contributions to America, he contributed to Études (Paris), Civiltà Cattolica (Rome), Criterio (Argentina), Stimmen der Zeit (Munich), Streven (Brussels), De Linie (Amsterdam), the Month (England), as well as numerous American reviews. In 1947 he delivered the Dudleian Lecture at Harvard University Divinity School and the Phi Beta Kappa oration at the Harvard College commencement of 1954. In 1958 he lectured in French at the Cours International of the Benedictine Monastery of Toumliline, Morocco. In 1961 he was a traveling consultant in Germany for the U.S. Department of State. Of his frequent book reviews, some two or three a month for about 35 years, most appeared in America, but some also appeared in Thought, Interracial Review, New York Times, Saturday Review, New York Herald Tribune, and other publications. He also wrote several pamphlets for the America Press.

LaFarge was a fellow of the National Academy of Arts and Sciences (Boston), a member in 1947 of Panel VII (Rockefeller Brothers Report on Foreign Policy), and one of the 147 electors of the National Hall of Fame (New York University, 1960). He was the recipient of many awards, among them the American Liberties Medallion of the American Jewish Committee and the annual Campion Award of the Catholic Book Club. He published two autobiographical works, The Manner Is Ordinary (1954) and Reflections on Growing Old (1963). His other works include Jesuits in Modern Times (1927), The Race Question and the Negro (1953), The Catholic Viewpoint on Race Relations (1956), and An American Amen (1958).

Bibliography: J. LAFARGE, op. cit. America 109 (Dec. 7, 1963) 725. Publishers Weekly 184 (Dec. 9, 1963) 27–28. R. HECHT, An Unordinary Man: A Life of John LaFarge, S.J. (Metuchen, N.J. 1996) D. SUTHERN, John LaFarge and the Limits of Catholic Interracialism (Baton Rouge 1996). M. W. NICKELS, The Federated Colored Catholics: A Study of Three Varied Perspectives on Racial Justice as Represented by John LaFarge, William Markoe, and Thomas Turner (PhD Dissertation, Catholic University of America 1975).

[P. S. HURLEY]

LAFAYETTE, DIOCESE OF

The Diocese of Lafayette (Lafayettensis), Louisiana, suffragan of the metropolitan See of New Orleans, comprises the civil parishes of Acadia, Evangeline, Iberia, Lafayette, St. Landry, St. Martin, St. Mary, and Vermilion in western Louisiana, a total of 5,777 square miles. The diocese was erected Jan. 11, 1918, by Pope Benedict XV, with Jules B. Jeanmard as its first bishop. Catholics number about 65 percent of its population. There are 121 ecclesiastical parishes and 32 missions.

The early history of the area is part of the history of the Archdiocese of NEW ORLEANS. When Lafayette was chosen as the seat of a new diocese in 1918, St. John the Evangelist parish church became the cathedral. The first bishop, Jules B. Jeanmard, who was the first Lousianaborn priest to become a bishop, and who had served as chancellor and administrator of New Orleans, was consecrated at St. Louis Cathedral, New Orleans, Dec. 8, 1918. He took possession of the new see December 12, and remained its ordinary until his resignation on March 13, 1956; he died on Feb. 23, 1957. Under Jeanmard's 38 years as ordinary several more parishes were created, schools established, and lay involvement in programs of Catholic Action was stressed through religious instruction, spiritual conferences, and retreats. Sodality, scouting, and the retreat movements encouraged the faith of young Catholics and promoted vocations to the priesthood and religious life. Institutions founded by Jeanmard such as St. Mary's Children's Home (1924), staffed by the Most Holy Sacrament Sisters, Our Lady of Lourdes Hospital (1949), run by the Sisters of St. Francis of Calais, and Immaculata Seminary (1948), staffed by the Marist Fathers, helped to aid the physical and spiritual welfare of the growing diocese. Diocesan sponsorship of radio and, later, television programs in French and English, and a local newspaper were encouraged. In 1934 Jeanmard welcomed the first Black priests ordained by the Society of the Divine Word.

Bishop Maurice Schexnayder, who had been consecrated auxiliary Feb. 22, 1951, succeeded Bishop Jeanmard on May 24, 1956. Upon his resignation in 1972, Bishop Gerard L. Frey was transferred from Savannah, Georgia, and appointed the third Bishop of Lafayette. The Rev. Harry J. Flynn was appointed coadjutor to Bishop Frey in 1986 and became the fourth Bishop of Lafayette in 1989. When Bishop Flynn was elevated to Coadjutor Archbishop of Minneapolis-St. Paul in 1994, Bishop Edward J. O'Donnell was installed as the fifth bishop in 1994.

Bibliography: Archives, Diocese of Lafayette; R. BAUDIER, The Catholic Church in Louisiana (New Orleans 1939).

[R. E. TRACY/M. G. GUIDRY]

LA FERTÉ, ABBEY OF

First daughter abbey of CÎTEAUX (Latin, Firmitas), founded in 1113 in the Diocese of Châlon-sur-Saône (now Autun) by the counts of Châlon, who donated a fourth of the forest of Bragny. Under the administration of the first abbot, Philibert, the domain was enlarged by donations from noblemen of the region. In 1120 the number of religious was large enough to enable the abbot, Opizo, to found the first Cistercian house outside France, the abbey of Tigliedo, located south of the Alps in the province of Genoa, the Diocese of Acqui. In 1124 the third abbot, Peter, was promoted to the archbishopric of Tarentaise. That same year the abbey of Locedio was founded from La Ferté in Piedmont in the Diocese of Vercelli. In 1132 the abbey of Maizières was founded in Burgundy in the Diocese of Châlon (modern Diocese of Dijon). When the general chapter at Cîteaux in 1191 learned that the abbeys of Lombardy had held a separate chapter, it requested that the Abbey of La Ferté make an inquiry there summoning all the abbots in order to forbid such reunions. A struggle for power within the Cistercian Order continued between the abbot of Cîteaux and the first four daughter abbeys, La Ferté, PONTIGNY, CLAIR-VAUX, and MORIMOND (all founded by St. STEPHEN HAR-DING; d. 1134). Innocent III checked the controversy (1215), but it flared up again in 1265, to be settled by Clement IV's bull Parvus fons (P. Cousin 375). In 1207 the abbey of Barona was founded in Lombardy in the Diocese of Pavia. The last daughter abbey, Saint-Serge, was founded in Syria in 1235. The monastery was built on a grand scale by the abbot Simon (1208–29). Several of its daughter abbeys founded still other houses, and the Abbey of La Forté eventually had a filiation of 16 monasteries.

When the Peace of Brétigny (1360), between France and England, came to an end, La Ferté was plundered and ravaged by roving companies of mercenaries. In 1415 the duke of Burgundy, John the Fearless, fortified the abbey with a moat and two walls. In 1439 the general chapter designated the abbot, John, along with three other abbots, to attend the Council of Florence as the representatives of the order from France. In 1562, during the Wars of Religion, the abbey was plundered by the Huguenots. Several years later (1567) Admiral de Coligny seized La Ferté; the abbey was pillaged and burned. Abbot Claude Petit (1677–1710) rebuilt the monastery, preserving the 13thcentury church, adding to it a new contemporary façade. At the beginning of the French Revolution there were only about 15 religious left at La Ferté. The buildings were sold, and the library was scattered. Today all that remains of the monastery is the 18th-century abbatial palace.

Bibliography: Sources. G. DUBY, Recueil des pancartes de l'abbaye de la Ferté-sur-Grosne, 1113–1178 (Paris 1953). T. HÜM-PFNER, "Exordium Cistercii cum summa cartae caritatis et fundatio primarum quattuor filiarum Cistercii," Analecta Sacri Ordinis Cisterciensis 2 (1946) 119–145. Statuta capitulorum generalium ordinis cisterciensis, ed. J. M. CANIVEZ, 8 v. (Louvain 1933–41). Literature. J. L. BAZIN, "Notice historique sur l'abbaye de la Ferté-sur-Grosne," Mémoires de la Société d'histoire et d'archéologie de Châlon-sur-Saône (1895) 1–70. A. A. KING, Cîteaux and Her Elder Daughters (London 1954) 106–147. B. STÜRZER, "La Ferté-sur-Grosne," Cistercienser-Chronik 7 (1895) 225–231, 257–264, 289–296, 321–334, 353–360. K. SPAHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:729.

[M. A. DIMIER]

LAFITAU, JOSEPH FRANÇOIS

Jesuit author and missionary in New France; b. Bordeaux, Jan. 1, 1681; d. there, July 3, 1746. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1696 and in 1711 he was sent to New France (Canada), where for several years he labored among the Iroquois at Sault Saint Louis. After his recall to France in 1717 he spent his remaining years as a professor and writer. One of his better-known works, familiar to historians and anthropologists, is the two-volume treatise Moeurs des sauvages Américains comparés aux moeurs des premiers temps (Paris 1724), which went through several editions and translations. This is an excellent source work and contains penetrating observations on the liquor traffic of the French traders with the natives. Shortly after his return to France he published also a work on ginseng, species of which had been found in Canada, and was responsible for spreading knowledge of this medicinal root among Europeans. Another major work, Histoire des déouvertes et conquêtes des Portugais dans le Nouveau Monde (Paris 1733), was later translated into Portuguese. This work is a disappointment to an Americanist hoping for contemporary and historical insights into the story of colonial Brazil; the author interprets the "Nouveau Monde" as including the Orient and devotes his study primarily to Portuguese enterprise in that area, rather than to the New World of the Americas. Lafitau was also one of the contributors of his day to the important Jesuit periodical of the 18th century, Mémoires de Trévoux.

Bibliography: L. KOCH Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Juse einst und jetzt (Louvain-Heverlee 1962) 1056–57.

[J. F. BANNON]

LAFLÈCHE, LOUIS FRANÇOIS RICHER

Canadian bishop; b. Ste. Anne de la Pérade, Quebec, Canada, Sept. 4, 1818; d. Three Rivers, Quebec, July 14, 1898. He attended Nicolet College, Quebec; was ordained in 1844; and went as a missionary to the Northwest. In 1846 he accompanied Rev. (later Abp.) A. A. TACHÉ to La Crosse island, where he distinguished himself by his rapid mastery of the native languages and was the first to reduce the language of the Mantagnas to a grammatical form. After being named titular bishop of Arath (1849), he was ill for five years and begged for a release from the episcopate, suggesting that Taché take his place. In 1851 at Turtle Mountain, N.Dak., he directed the defense of 60 people of mixed native and European descent against 2,000 Sioux who kept them under siege for two days (July 13 and 14). The Sioux finally withdrew, convinced that the Great Spirit was guarding the small band. He returned to Canada (1856) and taught at Nicolet, where he was named president of the college (1859). In 1866 he was appointed coadjutor of Three Rivers and in 1870, succeeded to the see. He was an able administrator and an eloquent orator, whose weekly sermons dealt with the great social and politicoreligious questions of the time. His writings include five volumes of pastoral letters as well as Quelques considerations sur les rapports de la société civile avec la réligion et la famille (Montreal 1866) and Conferences (Three Rivers 1885). He is considered as one of the fathers of French Canadian nationalism.

Bibliography: Généalogie des familles. Richer de LaFlèche et Hamelin (Desauliers 1909). R. RUMILLY, Monseigneur Laflèche et son temps (Montreal 1938). A. G. MORICE, Dictionnaire historique des Canadiens et Métis français de l'Ouest (Quebec 1908). J. P. A. BENOÎT, Vie de Mgr. Taché, 2 v. (Montreal 1904).

[C. W. WESTFALL]

LAGNY-SUR-MARNE, ABBEY OF

Former royal BENEDICTINE abbey in the canton of Lagny, arrondissement of Meaux (Seine-et-Marne), France; in the old Diocese of Paris, present-day Meaux (Lat. Latiniacum). It was founded c. 644 by (St.) FURSEY, a noble Irishman, on land belonging to Archambaud, mayor of the palace under Clovis II. Burned by the NOR-MANS, it was restored during the 10th century. In 933 the abbots became the counts of Lagny. Thanks to the protection of the counts of Champagne and the kings, as well as to the friars of Champagne and Brie, which were held in Lagny, the abbey became very prosperous. In 1396 Abbot Peter II started the construction of a new abbey church, of which only the choir was erected. In 1485 the abbey was placed in COMMENDATION. In 1512, under the cardinal of Narbonne, it underwent the reform of Saint-Martin-des-Champs. In 1562 it was plundered by the Huguenots. The MAURIST reform of 1641 included Lagny among its member abbeys. When the abbey was suppressed by the FRENCH REVOLUTION, it was paying £9,000 to the commendatory abbot and £7,000 to the 15 or 16 religious who were living there. The abbey church is now used as a parish church; the monastic buildings have been appropriated for municipal use.

Bibliography: BEAUNIER, La France monastique, v. 1 of Abbayes et prieurés de l'ancienne France, ed. J. M. L. BESSE, 12 v. (Paris 1905–41). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1538–39.

[H. TARDIF]

LAGRANGE, MARIE JOSEPH

Outstanding Scripture scholar, b. Bourg-en-Bresse (Ain), France, March 7, 1855; d. Saint-Maximin (Var), France, March 10, 1938. After attending the minor seminary at Autun, Albert Lagrange studied in Paris, where he obtained a doctorate in law in 1878. He spent one year at Saint-Sulpice and then joined the Dominicans, receiving the habit in 1879 and the religious name Marie-Joseph at Saint-Maximin. Because the Dominicans were then expelled from France, he finished his studies at Salamanca and was ordained at Zamora on Dec. 23, 1883. He taught history and philosophy at Salamanca and Toulouse, and four years later (in 1888) he took up oriental studies at the University of Vienna. When he had been there two years, he was sent to Jerusalem to set up a Biblical school. He arrived in Jerusalem on March 10, 1890. The Ecole Pratique d'Études Bibliques opened its doors on November 15 of that year (see ÉCOLE BIBLIQUE). His articles on inspiration (1895–96) in the Revue biblique, founded in 1892, showed him to be a rare combination of theologian and Biblical scholar. In 1900 a new project, the Études bibliques, was announced; Lagrange's own contribution (Juges, 1903) was the first to appear in this series.

A paper on the sources of the Pentateuch, read to him at an international congress held in Fribourg (1897), and the publication of his Toulouse lectures under the title of La Méthode historique (1903) led to such bitter criticism that in 1907 he turned to work on the New Testament; his S. Marc appeared in 1911. The mention of his name in a consistorial decree—a disciplinary measure and not a doctrinal censure—resulted in his leaving the École from September 1912 to June 1913. World War I (1914–18) obliged him to leave the Holy City, but in Paris he saw to the regular appearance of the Revue biblique. His commentaries on Romans and Galatians were written in this period.

His commentaries on Luke, Matthew, and John appeared at regular intervals (1921, 1923, 1925), and his most popular work, the Gospel of Jesus Christ, in 1928. In 1935 ill health forced Lagrange to leave Jerusalem for France where he died three years later at the age of 83. He was buried at Saint-Maximin, but in 1967 his body was brought back to Jerusalem where it was interred in the Basilica of Saint Stephen.

A complete bibliography of Father Lagrange's writings contains 1,786 items. Some of his other important books are: Études sur les religions sémitiques (1903), Éclaircissement sur la méthode historique (1905 pro manuscripto), La Genèse (1906 pro manuscripto), La Messianisme chez les Juifs (1909), Synopsis evangelica graece (1926), Le Judaïsme avant Jésus-Christ (1931), Histoire ancienne du canon du NT (1933), Critique textuelle—La Critique rationnelle (1935), Critique historique—Les mystères: L'Orphisme (1937). His last article, entitled "L'Authenticité mosaïque de la Genèse et la théorie des documents," was completed on his deathbed.

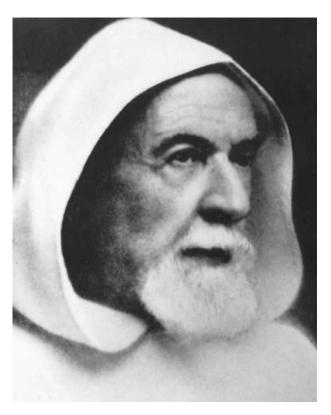

The name Lagrange is rightly associated with the twentieth century revival of Catholic interest in the Bible and almost alone lifted Catholic Biblical studies out of mediocrity. The encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (1943) mentions his École Biblique with approval.

Bibliography: F. M. BRAUN, The Work of Père Lagrange, tr. R. T. A. MURPHY (Milwaukee 1963). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 779. M-J. LAGRANGE, Père Lagrange, Personal Reflections and Memoirs, tr. H. WANS-BROUGH (New York, 1985).

[R. T. A. MURPHY/EDS.]

LAICISM

Etymologically and historically, the term "laicism" suggests a movement wherein the laity seek to take over clerical functions and to comport themselves in civil life without taking into account the Church's prescriptions and teachings. This concept ill accords with laicism as it is known nowadays. Among the contemporary partisans of laicism are men who have never belonged to the Catholic Church and who are sometimes strangers to all religious affiliation. Yet these men are called "laymen." While remaining outside the Church and even while rising up against it, they retain a name borrowed from the ecclesiastical vocabulary. Thereby laicism avows its origins; it can be born only in Catholic countries. Often it is confused with ANTICLERICALISM, which anteceded it and is a negative and popular form of it. "Laicism" and "laicist" are terms belonging to the Catholic armory of combat; the opposing camp speaks only of "laïcité" and laic (laïque). To give precision to these vague notions, distinctions are necessary.

Marie Joseph Lagrange.

Early Manifestations. The various forms of laicism can be grouped and examined from two viewpoints, institutional and political.

Institutional. The distinction between clerics and laity in the Church is of divine institution. To deny this or to try to dilute it is to adopt a laicist position. Such happened in MONTANISM, which accorded more authority to prophets than to priests and bishops. Although they separated from the Roman Church, the Montanists retained, from the third to the fifth centuries, a hierarchy of an unusual kind, since it very probably included women. Among the numerous medieval heresies, those of the CA-THARI and WALDENSES exalted those Christians whom they termed "spiritual" and regarded as priests those who passed as "morally perfect." According to John WYCLIF, only the predestined are truly priests. Attitudes of this type remained hesitant and confused; while abandoning the hierarchy they attempted to retain at least some elements of it.

Luther and Calvin, however, were well aware of what they denied. In his Open Letter to the Christian Nobility (1520) Luther termed oversubtle and hypocritical the teaching that pope, bishops, priests, and monks are called to the ecclesiastical state; whereas princes, lords, artisans, and peasants are called to the lay state. All Christians, according to him, belong to the ecclesiastical state; all are consecrated priests by Baptism. Calvin affirmed that there is only one priest, Jesus Christ, and two Sacraments, Baptism and the Eucharist; all the other Sacraments, including Holy Orders, are merely "false sacraments."

QUESNEL, along with some 18th–century Jansenists, revived certain ideas of Edmond RICHER in order to transform them into laicist Richerism by equating priests and bishops, laymen and priests. To the laymen, in Quesnel's view, belong a determining role in the excommunication of bad Christians, in the election of pastors, and in the confirmation of doctrinal definitions. These ideas inspired the authors of the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY (1790).

Political. St. Ambrose once had to remind Theodosius that the emperor was "in the Church and not above the Church." After the conversion of Constantine, however, the Roman emperors watched over the Church and considered themselves "bishops of those outside." Later the barbarian kings were likewise invested with ministerial roles. The episcopate was then said to be in the hands of the king, who intervened in the recruiting of bishops, convoked councils, and alone gave legal force to synodal decrees. When kings were consecrated, their power appeared still more clearly to be a necessary prolongation of ecclesiastical authority. Not without reason did E. Amann and A. Dumas, authors of the seventh volume of Histoire de l'Église (ed. A. Fliche and V. Martin), subtitle this tome The Church in the Power of the Laity, 888–1057, because bishops were elected both by the clergy and by prominent lay personages. During this period, temporal rulers often did not await the choice of the clerical electors; rather they imposed their own candidates on them. The emperor and certain kings conferred INVESTI-TURE on abbots and bishops by cross and ring. All the energy of Pope Gregory VII (1073-85) was required to curb this invasion of laicism (see INVESTITURE STRUGGLE).

Less than two centuries later, the continual claims by civil rulers against the ecclesiastical world found support in a laity better instructed and more conscious of its rights. This new lay spirit developed by means of a philosophy inspired by Aristotle's political theories and was strengthened subsequent to the gaining of communal liberties, which were often won despite clerical opposition that occurred, in Flanders, Italy, France, and Germany.

This outlook was revealed blatantly in the conflict between Pope BONIFACE VIII and King PHILIP IV, the Fair, of France. It was to sustain Louis IV, the Bavarian, that MARSILIUS OF PADUA composed the Defensor pacis, which John XXII condemned (1327). According to the Defensor pacis the Church is only the totality of the faithful believers who invoke the name of Christ; the State should reserve to itself the choice of candidates for the priesthood, nominations to pastorates and other benefices, control of religious teaching by priests, surveillance over devotional practices, and payment of salaries to the clergy, who should no longer have any possessions. The Western Schism, OCKHAMISM, and the revival of the study of Roman Law provided a convergence of circumstances that facilitated the return of the episcopate to the power of rulers. The papacy had to make concessions. Thanks to a concordat concluded in 1516 with Pope Leo X, the king of France obtained control over all consistorial benefices; he could expect thereafter to have as bishops and abbots only men devoted to him.

The French government went further; without breaking with the Holy See, it conducted a "lay policy." Thus, it did not hesitate to ally with the Turks in order to escape from the menace that threatened the immense empire of Charles V. Ignoring the "testament of Adam" and the AL-EXANDRINE BULLS that divided newly discovered lands between Spain and Portugal, France conquered colonies in virtue of the natural law, which gives unpossessed lands to the first occupant. Without admitting freedom of conscience, France granted to Protestants freedom to practice their religion in the Edict of NANTES (1598). In manifold ways (foreign alliances, colonial affairs, domestic government), profane interests were thereby divorced from religious interests. Each Catholic ruler in Europe imitated the king of France and pretended to be "emperor in his kingdom" and to enjoy all the same privileges that the emperors of the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE enjoved.

The 18th Century. As a result of the Eastern Schism in the 11th century and the Protestant Reformation in the 16th, two large groups detached themselves from Rome; but both of them continued to honor God through Jesus Christ. Some modern Catholic states, however, repudiated Christianity and even enfranchised themselves from all religion. The initiative was taken by France during the FRENCH REVOLUTION. Preparing the way for dechristianization in this upheaval were government regulations that removed from the clergy the charge of civil registers of Baptisms, marriages, and burials; granted authorization for divorce; and permitted, even encouraged, priests and religious to marry. Dechristianization was carried through in 1793 when the French Revolutionary calendar replaced the Gregorian; and all churches in Paris were closed to Catholic services and transformed into temples devoted to the cult of the goddess of REASON—a measure that was extended to the provinces. Gatherings of the faithful were forbidden as suspect. Infractions of these laws were punishable with imprisonment and death. By 1795 the French Republic recognized no cult.

The 19th Century. The laws that struck at religious in Spain (1820, 1835), Portugal (1834), and Piedmont (1855, 1866) did not spring from a plan of laicization. The policy in France under the Third Republic, however, carried through in stages from 1879, seemed to follow a preconceived design. Anticlericalism had for more than 50 years fostered animosity against religion, but this type of anticlericalism was sentimental. The preparation of French anticlerical plans, however, was the work of thinkers. Its roots were (1) the rationalistic SPIRITUALISM of such men as Victor COUSIN, Pierre Janet, and Joseph Ernest RENAN, who admitted the existence of God, but rejected all religion; (2) the atheistic PERSONALISM of Charles Renouvier, who deified man and recommended the practice of a morality independent of all authority; and (3) the positivism of Auguste COMTE and Hippolyte TAINE, who rejected theology and metaphysics as outmoded disciplines of a bygone age.

Three essential steps can be distinguished in French laicism. The first concerned public elementary education, since it suppressed religious education (1882) and then removed from the schools the religious men and women engaged in this work (1886). Legislation required that teaching be lay or neutral. Jules Ferry, author of the law of March 28, 1882, knew well what he sought, for he declared: "My aim is to organize humanity without God and without king." René Viviani, a deputy in a position to know the will of the anticlerical majority, stated in the Chamber of Deputies: "There is talk about neutrality in the schools, but it is time to say that educational neutrality has been only a diplomatic lie. . . . We have never had any other design than to make an antireligious university."

The 20th Century. The second step consisted of the dissolution and spoilation of French religious congregations (1901–04). This was open warfare. Voltaire had earlier approved this tactic when he congratulated King Frederick II of Prussia for his proposal to get rid of monks in his realm; he wrote to him: "Your idea of attacking Christian superstitition through the monks is that of a great captain." This passage was quoted in the Chamber of Deputies during the discussion in the law of associations, an enactment known as the Waldeck-Rousseau law, which was very liberal in all other respects save those concerning religious congregations. In the judgment of Ferdinand Buisson, the Waldeck-Rousseau law was the most decisive anticlerical act since the laicizing of the schools, the first public act engaging the republic in a basic conflict with the Church, a conflict up to then characterized by many armistices, peace treaties, and tacit compromises. Viviani did not dissimulate when he admitted in the Chamber of Deputies to the applause of his friends: "We are face to face not only with these ardent and bellicose congregations. . . . We are . . . face to face with the Catholic Church." Another deputy declared in 1903: "We are combating religion and all religions, religious sentiment, and all religious dogmas."

These thoughts coincided with those of Justin Émile Combes, who was then president of the council. It was he who applied the law of 1901, forced religious to go into exile or become secularized, and caused the enactment (1904) of a law that forbade all former members of congregations to teach. The third step in laicization, likewise Combes's work, was the law separating the Church from the State (Dec. 9, 1905). The churches in question were the Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish-the three "confessions" recognized since the time of Napoleon I. The goods of the Catholic Church were ordered to be passed over to special associations called "cultuelles," made up of laymen and distinct from the hierarchical organization. When Pius X forbade (1906) the recognition of these associations, the government left the churches at the disposition of the faithful (1907), but seized episcopal residences, seminaries, etc. (1908). Thus the spoilation of the dioceses and parishes followed upon the confiscation of religious houses (1903).

In Portugal, after the republic was proclaimed (Oct. 5, 1910), it required but a few months to accomplish what had taken France 25 years. In MEXICO, the constitution of 1917 gathered a complete program of laicism into a single article that, among other things, arrogated to the State all authority in religious matters, denied all legal character to dioceses and parishes, ordered the goods of religious to be seized, and deprived candidates to the priesthood of the right to vote. Under the dictatorship of Pres. Plutarco Elias CALLES, priests could not exercise their ministry without legal authorization (1926), and churches were abandoned or transformed into museums, prisons, and garages. All religious services ceased. This situation lasted until 1936.

Previous to the outbreak of civil war in 1936, SPAIN had for five years engaged in the establishment of a laicism inspired by French legislation. The constitution of 1931 declared that the State had no official religion, envisaged the expulsion of the Jesuits without explicitly naming them, permitted divorce, secularized cemeteries, etc. A decree dissolved the Jesuits (1932), and a law suppressed the other religious institutes (1933), but the republic did not have time to establish the state monopoly over education foreseen in the constitution. The official atheism in all countries under communist rule implies the introduction of laicism sooner or later.

Numerous Church documents condemned antireligious laicism as contrary to the Church's rights and to the natural law. The texts of many papal pronouncements can be found in the work by Ehler and Morrall cited in the bibliography. Laicism does not exist automatically wherever Church and State are separated. In Chile, e.g., the separation was regarded by Pius XI in 1925 as a friendly union. The same can be said of the U.S. because of the strict application of its Constitution.

To avoid equivocation, defensive laicism can be distinguished from aggressive. The former is the heir of past monarchies; it can appeal for support to the Gospel, which prescribes rendering to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's (Lk ch. 20 and 25); this is the laicism of liberal states that respect religions and at the same time carefully preserve the greatest possible independence. Aggressive laicism ignores God or denies His existence and strives to consign Him to oblivion. This is the laicism of totalitarian states that persecute all religions; this is the "plague of our epoch" denounced by Pius XI in the encyclical QUAS PRIMAS (1925).

Bibliography: E. M. ACOMB, The French Laic Laws, 1879–1889 (New York 1941). H. X. ARQUILLIERE, L'Augustinisme politique (2d ed. Paris 1955), L. CAPÉRAN, Histoire contemporaine de la laïcité française, 3 v. (Paris 1957-61); L'Invasion laïque (Paris 1935). P. H. CARON, L'État contre l'Esprit: Laïcisme ou christianisme (Paris 1955). Chiesa e stato, 2 v. (Università cattolica del Sacro Cuore; Milan 1939). S. Z. EHLER and J. B. MORRALL, eds. and trs., Church and State through the Centuries (Westminster, Md. 1954), contains documents. B. EMONET, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, ed. A. D'ALÈS (Paris 1911-22) 2:1767-1810. G. DE LAGARDE, La Naissance de l'esprit laïque au déclin du moyen âge, 5 v. (3d ed. Louvain 1956-63). A. LATREILLE, L'Église catholique et la révolution française, v.1 (Paris 1946). O. GIACCHI, Lo stato laico (Milan 1947). É. LECANUET, "Les Pères du laïcisme en France," Le Correspondant 277 (1919) 420-444. J. LE-CLER, The Two Sovereignties: A Study of the Relationship between Church and State (New York 1952), tr. from French. M. LIGOT, Laïcisme et Laïcité (Paris 1926). L. V. MÉJAN, La Séparation des Églises et de l'État (Paris 1959). L. L. RUMMEL, "The Anticlerical Program as a Disruptive Factor in the Solidarity of the Late French Republics," American Catholic Historical Review 34 (1948-49) 1-19. J. B. TROTABAS, La Notion de laïcité dans le droit de l'Église catholique et de l'État républicain (Paris 1961). G. WEILL, Histoire de l'idée laïque en France au XIXe siècle (Paris 1929). Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903-50) Tables générales, 2857-62.

[C. BERTHELOT DU CHESNAY]

LAICIZATION (LOSS OF THE CLERICAL STATE)

In canon law, laicization is an act by legitimate authority that takes away from a cleric the lawful use, except for emergencies, of the power of orders; deprives him of his rights, privileges, and clerical status; and renders him juridically equivalent to a lay person. Church law clearly points out that laicization in no way affects the power of orders, not even those that are clearly of ecclesiastical origin; rather, the action touches on the lawful use of the power of orders. There are three ways in which a cleric loses the clerical state: (a) by judicial sentence or administrative decree that declares the invalidity of sacred ordination; (b) by a penalty of dismissal legitimately imposed for some crime specified in church law; or (c) by a rescript or letter of the Apostolic See, as for example, the priest who desires to leave active ministry and live as a lay person, either with or without marriage (see CIC 290 and CCEO 394).

Historically, the Catholic Church divided clergy into major and minor clerics. The first category consisted of sacerdotes, that is, bishops and priests, along with deacons; the second category comprised those tonsured clerics receiving the minor orders of PORTER, acolyte, LECTOR, and exorcist. Since 1972, laicization applies only to deacons, presbyters, and bishops.

Examples of laicization occurred more frequently in history among those with minor orders. A minor cleric who freely married, or joined the military without permission, or without legitimate cause ceased to wear ecclesiastical dress and tonsure and did not resume them within a month after warning automatically incurred laicization. Likewise, religious minor clerics automatically incurred laicization if dismissed from their institute. Church law provided that laicization be imposed in the case of a minor cleric guilty of external carnal sins and the religious minor cleric whose profession is declared invalid due to fraud. Voluntary instances of laicization took place when the minor cleric informed his ordinary that he wished to return to the lay state, and the decree of the same ordinary ordering the return of a cleric whom he judged unsuitable for advancement to major orders.

Ecclesiastical law did not envision the voluntary departure from active ministry by major clerics, as for example, priests. Involuntary departure as a penalty, however, appeared in church history and law. The distinction between deposition and degradation may be found in the Decretals of Gregory IX (Decretales Greg. IX, c. 27, De verborum significatione, lib. V, tit. 40). In either case, the focus of the penalty was upon the use of an individual's power through ordination.

Laicization is connected in canon law with the theological principle that once Holy Orders have been validly received, they constitute an indelible character on that person that can never be invalidated. The loss of the juridical status of a cleric does not mean that a person becomes "unordained," but rather that he loses the right to the lawful exercise of orders and he loses all the privileges and obligations (except that of celibacy) of a cleric. The most significant effect of the loss of the clerical state is the prohibition from exercising the power of orders and the subsequent deprivation of all offices, functions, and any delegated power.

1917 Code of Canon Law. There were no commonly known procedures for voluntary departure or laicization in the 1917 code. One reason may be that dispensations from the priestly vow of celibacy were not granted. Prior to 1970, the law and the practice for a laicized priest was that he retain his obligation to celibacy. For example, a decree dated April 18, 1936, from the Sacred Penitentiary stated that for the Latin Church "dispensation from [sacred celibacy], in past times, was hardly ever granted, and according to the present discipline is never given, even in danger of death" (AAS 28 [1936] 242). From 1939 to 1963, such dispensations were granted in 315 instances. Since that time, the number of dispensation requests rose into the thousands. When such a dispensation from celibacy is requested and granted by the supreme authority of the Church, it always includes the loss of the clerical state and significantly restricts the person's ability to participate in public church functions.

The 1917 code contained procedures for involuntary loss of the clerical state. The distinction between the two penalties of deposition and degradation found expression in CIC canons 2303 and 2305. Both penalties could be inflicted only for offenses specified as punishable by these penalties under the law of the code. In addition to the case mentioned in canon 2305, §2, the 1917 CIC lists five others in which the law warrants the imposition of the penalty of degradation (see canons 2314, §1, 3°; 2343, §1, 3°; 2354, §2; 2368; and 2388, §1). Deposition, while leaving in effect the obligations arising from the reception of sacred orders, carried a suspension from offices and ineligibility for offices and positions in the Church. Degradation includes deposition, perpetual deprivation of the right to wear ecclesiastical garb and the reduction of the cleric to the lay state whereby the cleric was relieved of the obligations of the clerical state, except that of observing celibacy.

Changes were introduced in the wake of Vatican Council II. The first may be classified as terminological while the second concerns the development of procedures governing voluntary departures and later involuntary departures from the clerical state. The major moments of this change may be marked by the norms issued by the Holy See, especially those of 1980; the revision of church law in 1983; the norms issues in 1988 by Pastor bonus and subsequent directives.

Vatican Council II. The Church altered its view of the clerical state as a result of the insistence of the Second VATICAN COUNCIL on the fundamental equality of all the People of God. The change is clear with respect to membership. Entrance into the clerical state, according to the 1917 Code of Canon Law, came about with the reception of tonsure followed by the minor orders. With the suppression of both of these entrance rites in 1972 by the motu proprio Ministeria Quaedam (AAS 64 [1972] 529-534), ordination to the diaconate marks one as a cleric. Therefore, the present discipline on the loss of the clerical state applies only to deacons, presbyters, and bishops. The change is equally clear with respect to the loss of the clerical state. The material on the loss of the clerical state in the 1917 code was entitled "The Reduction of Clerics to the Lay State," which clearly implied the inferiority of the laity. The use of "loss of the clerical state" and "return to the lay state" more accurately reflect the conciliar emphasis on equality, which became one of the principles guiding the revision of the code. Vatican II deliberations pointed to the difference between involuntary and voluntary loss of the clerical state, but left the implementation to the Holy See.

At the request of many bishops at Vatican Council II, Pope Paul VI launched a twofold approach to the question of procedures for voluntary departure from active ministry. On one hand, church teaching would continue to explore the great value placed on priestly celibacy in the Latin Church (CLD 7:92–95). On the other hand a special 18 member commission was formed in the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. They set forth on Feb. 2, 1964, an instruction announcing their exclusive competence to deal with petitions for the return of priests to lay status, dispensed from all obligations of the clerical state, including celibacy (CLD 7:1002–1015).

The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith instituted in 1964 a procedure whereby the gathering of information with respect to a petition take place by a strictly judicial process through ecclesiastical court authorities under the local ordinary. Each dispensation request, after examination by the special commission was reserved to the pope. The policy required two items: the dispensed priest live outside the area of his previous priestly ministry and any celebration of canonical marriage was to be privately celebrated and witnessed by the ordinary. The same congregation replaced this first procedure on Jan. 13, 1971. Preparation of a petition no longer required judicial procedure, which was replaced by an administrative and pastoral procedure of data-gathering. Presentation of a petition to Rome need no longer be made necessarily by the local ordinary. Instead, the responsible agent was the petitioner's personal superiorthe bishop in the case of his diocesan priest, the major superior in the case of religious priest. The new norms required that the laicized priest refrain not only from strictly priestly functions, but also from certain specified functions often associated with priestly ministry, e.g., the function of homilist and the office of rector, spiritual director, or professor in seminaries, theology faculties, and similar institutes. Further, he should not hold the position of religion teacher, nor the office of principal of a Catholic school. Restrictions on the externals of a marriage ceremony of the laicized priest were generally retained as in the instruction of 1964. (AAS 63 [1971]:303–312 or CLD 7:117–121).

Eighteen months later the congregation gave authentic clarification to some doubts arising in the 1971 norms in a circular letter of June 26, 1972. Laicization should never be the first, but only the last resort in salvaging a disintegrated priestly commitment; and ordinaries are encouraged to use every means to help prevent a priest from seeking a dispensation on impulse, in a state of depression, or without truly mature and solid motivation. Once dispensed and canonically married, the former priest may never be readmitted to the exercise of orders, but the dispensed priest, if unmarried and convinced that he mistakenly sought laicization may apply to the Holy See and seek the recission of his laicization. The circular letter reminded bishops that they may not resort to the emergency powers granted them by canon 81 of the 1917 code to dispense a priest from celibacy since the office of priesthood involves the public order and the common good; a priest is not free to set it aside at his own discretion once he has freely accepted it (AAS 64 [1972] 641 or CLD 7:121-124).

Procedures and Norms after 1980. On Oct. 14, 1980, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued a letter to all local ordinaries and moderator generals of clerical religious institutes "on the mode of procedure in the examination and resolution of petitions which look to a dispensation from celibacy" (AAS 64 [1972]:1132 or CLD 9:92–96). Appended to the letter were eight procedural norms to be followed in the instruction of each case.

The norms adopt a position that a dispensation is a relaxation of the law in a particular case and should never be viewed as a right; that is, a dispensation from priestly celibacy is anything but an inevitable, almost automatic, result of an administrative process. The norms presumed that before applying, each petitioner already has used all the resources available to solve his problems, i.e., the help of priestly brothers, friends and relatives as well as counseling by spiritual and psychological experts. The norms attempt to stress the individuality of each case and the need to develop an approach that addresses the uniqueness of the petition being prepared. Therefore, the norms must always be interpreted in the light of guidance found in the congregation's letter. Paragraph five of that letter, for example, speaks of cases of priests who long abandoned the priestly life, cannot withdraw from their present state and wish to sanate it; cases of those who should not have received priestly ordination because they lacked due sense of freedom or responsibility, or because the competent superiors were not able, at the proper time, to judge in a prudent and sufficiently suitable manner whether the candidate was really fit to live his life perpetually in celibacy dedicated to God.

The 1983 Code of Canon Law identifies three ways by which a member of the clergy can lose his juridical status as a cleric and thus be returned to the lay state. Canon 290 states that a cleric loses the clerical state by: (1) a juridical decision or administrative decree that declares the invalidity of sacred ordination; (2) the legitimate infliction of the penalty of dismissal; and (3) a rescript of the Apostolic See that is granted to deacons for serious reasons only and to presbyters for only the most serious reasons. Except for the case of the declaration of the invalidity of sacred ordination (c. 290) laicization does not entail, and is distinguished from, a dispensation from the obligation of celibacy (c. 291).

The theology of orders determines that which is necessary for the validity mentioned in canon 291, namely requirements of the minister, candidate, their intentions, and liturgical form. Procedures for claiming the invalidity of orders are found in canons 1708–1712. The loss of the clerical state by imposition of the penalty of dismissal (c. 291) requires a careful procedure as outlined in canons 1717–1731 and can be imposed only for reasons identified in the law. Similar to the 1917 code, the new code cites six instances: cc 1364, §2; 1367; 1370, §1; 1387; 1394, §1; and 1395. Such an imposed penalty is considered an expiatory one, that is, it is meant to repair or compensate for damage done to the ecclesial community. It can never be inflicted automatically or by decree, but must be imposed.

Pastor bonus. Pope John Paul II transferred competence for dispensation requests to the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments under articles 63 and 68 of the Apostolic Constitution on the Roman Curia, Pastor bonus, of June 28, 1988. Competence for cases submitted prior to this date were retained by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The competency called for by Pastor bonus was confirmed in a letter of Feb. 8, 1989 (Notitiae 25 [1989] 485). All petitions of secular and religious clerics in Latin or other Churches sui juris in common law or mission territories come to this congregation. Further clarification on competency occurred in a July 25, 1989, letter to the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life regarding dispensations from the obligations arising from the ordination to the diaconate by religious men (Notitiae 26 [1991] 53–54).

Since Pastor bonus, a number of practical instructions on processing laicization petitions became available. "Documents Necessary for the Instruction of a Case for the Dispensation from the Obligations of Priestly Celibacy" was issued by the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments in April 1991 (CLSA Roman Replies & Advisory Opinions [1991] 2–4). The next year the congregation issued "Loss of the Clerical State by a Deacon and a Dispensation from All the Obligations of Ordination" through Archbishop Daniel Pilazczyk, May 11, 1992 (CLSA Roman Replies & Advisory Opinions [1992] 6–11). Finally, a circular letter was sent on June 6, 1997, to all ordinaries and superiors concerning the laicization of priests and deacons (Origins 27/11 [Aug. 28, 1997] 169, 170–172).

The Effects of the Loss of the Clerical State. While more attention focuses on the procedures on loss of the clerical state, there are a number of consequences applicable to all three modes. CIC canon 292 and CCEO canon 395 state that one who loses the clerical state is no longer bound by its obligations but also no longer enjoys its rights (cc. 279–289). With the exception stated in canon 976, one who loses the clerical state is forbidden the exercise of sacred orders. It is necessary therefore to examine individual rescripts for restrictions imposed on the departing cleric.

A Return to the Clerical State. The present law of the Church provides for such a possibility with CIC canon 293 and CCEO canon 398. "A cleric who loses the clerical state cannot be enrolled among clerics again except through a rescript of the Apostolic See." No further procedures are set forth. As a commentary on this topic, one might consult M. Souckar, "Return to Ministry of Dispensed Priests," Jurist 54 (1994) 605–616.

Bibliography: POPE PAUL VI, "Tradition of Priestly Celibacy Reaffirmed (Feb. 2, 1969)," Canon Law Digest [CLD] 7:92-95; "Reduction to Lay State: Norms," CLD 7:1002-1015; "Reduction to Lay State: Circular Letter to Ordinaries (Jan. 13, 1971)," CLD 7:117-121; "Reduction to Lay State; Procedural Norms; Interpretation (June 26, 1972)," CLD 7:121-124; "Reduction to Lay State: Norms (Oct. 14, 1980)," CLD 9:92-96; "Documents Necessary for the Instruction of a Case for the Dispensation from the Obligations of Priestly Celibacy," CLSA Roman Replies & Advisory Opinions (Washington, D.C. 1991) 2-4; "Loss of the Clerical State by a Deacon and a Dispensation from All the Obligations of Ordination," CLSA Roman Replies & Advisory Opinions (Washington, D.C. 1992) 6-11; "Circular Letter to All Ordinaries and Superior (June 6, 1992)," Origins 27:11 (Aug. 28, 1997) 169, 170, 172. J. E. LYNCH, "Loss of the Clerical State," The Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary, ed. J. A. CORIDEN, et al. (New York/ Mahwah, N.J. 1985) 229-238. F. J. SCHNEIDER, "Loss of Clerical State," New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, ed. J. P. BEAL et al. (New York/Mahwah, N.J. 2000) 382–392. M. SOUCKAR, "Return to Ministry of Dispensed Priests," Jurist 54 (1994) 605–616.

[A. ESPELAGE]

LAÍNEZ, DIEGO

Theologian; b. Almazán, Spain, 1512; d. Rome, Jan. 19, 1565. Upon completing his humanistic studies at Soria and Sigüenza, he studied philosophy and one year of theology at Alcalá (1528–33), and received a master in arts (1532). In 1533 he continued his studies at the University of Paris, attracted there also by the desire to know IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA.

After having made the spiritual exercises, he along with six companions pronounced vows at Montmartre on Aug. 15, 1534. This was the nucleus of the Society of Jesus. He was ordained June 24, 1537, and spent the rest of his life in Italy, preaching and teaching. The Company of Jesus having been canonically established on Sept. 27, 1540, he and his companions made their solemn profession in it (April 22, 1541). His wisdom, prudence, and learning made him a confidant of Ignatius. Laínez was successively provincial in Italy (1552), vicar (1556), and general (1558) of the Company.

Though dedicating himself constantly to the study of the sacred sciences, Laínez was one of the great men of the Catholic reform, active in both preaching and teaching. He acquired a truly extraordinary reputation before popes and outstanding churchmen of his time. At his death, PIUS V said that the Church had lost one of its best experts.

The best-known activity of Laínez was his participation in three periods of the Council of Trent, in the first two as papal theologian, in the third as Council father. He arrived at Trent toward the end of the fifth session and intervened in the discussion on justification. Especially decisive was his refutation of G. SERIPANDO on twofold justification and the certitude of the state of grace. He worked on the redaction of an index of Protestant errors about the Sacraments prior to the seventh session. He also spoke on Penance and Purgatory. During the second period (1551–52) Laínez intervened in important discussions on the Real Presence, Penance, and the Sacrifice of the Mass. No less influential were his reform decrees drawn up in collaboration with dogmatic theologians. During the third period (1562-63) he spoke on the Mass, Communion under both species for the laity (which he opposed), Holy Orders, the jurisdiction, reform and residence of bishops, abuses in the clerical state, and annulment of clandestine marriages. He used his prestige to obtain the Council's approbation of the Company of Jesus. On the 400th anniversary of the Council (1963) it was recalled that Laínez was one of the leading figures in the Council's work.

At the request of Peter Canisius and Emperor Ferdinand I, Ignatius entrusted Laínez with the compilation of a theological work to meet the needs of the times. Because of the demands of the apostolic ministry, he was unable to finish it. Only notes and rough drafts were left behind.

Bibliography: D. Laínez, Disputationes Tridentinae, ed. H. GRISAR, 2 v. (Innsbruck 1886). J. H. FICHTER, James Laynez, Jesuit (St. Louis 1944). C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:1596–1600. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2449–50. M. SCADUTO, Storia della Compagnia di Gesù in Italia, v.3, L'Epoca di Giacomo Laínez: Il governo 1556–1565 (Rome 1964). F. CERECEDA, Diego Laínez en la Europa religiosa de su tiempo, 1512–1565, 2 v. (Madrid 1945–46).

[J. M. DALMAU]

LAITY, CANON LAW

The 1983 Code of Canon Law is unique in the history of Church legislation in the prominence it gives to lay members of the Christian Faithful. In the 1917 Code, laity were mentioned in two canons. One stated that laity had a right to receive from clergy the spiritual goods of the church and the second prohibited laity from wearing clerical dress unless they were seminarians. The 1983 Code, as the canonical articulation of Vatican II, is conspicuously different in its approach to and inclusion of laity. Most notably, reflecting the teaching of Vatican II, book II of the Code, "The People of God," is restructured to begin with a treatment of the Christian faithful, clergy and laity alike, their place in the Church their obligations and rights (cc. 204-223), and then the rights and obligations of the lay Christian Faithful in particular (cc. 224-231). In addition, laity are the particular concern of the final section of book II, "Associations of the Christian Faithful" (cc. 298-329).

Particularly significant in the canons on all the Christian Faithful are: the statement that all the baptized share in Christ's priestly prophetic and royal functions and in the mission "which God has entrusted to the Church to fulfill in the world" (c. 204 § 1); all the Christian Faithful enjoy "true equality regarding dignity and action" by which each one builds up the body of Christ (c. 208 § 1); that each one has the right and duty to lead a holy life (c. 210) and receive the spiritual goods of the Church, especially the word of God and the sacraments (c. 213); all are at liberty to join together in associations, by their own initiative, for purposes of "charity or piety or for the promotion of the Christian vocation in the world" (c. 215).

Two stipulations of the 1983 Code, both radical departures from the former Code, form the basis for much lay involvement in the inner life of the Church. First, laity are eligible to hold ecclesiastical offices (cc.145, 228 §1) and second, laity may cooperate in the exercise of the power of governance (c. 129). Many questions surround the scope and implementation of these canons, especially the second, and study of them is ongoing.

In addition to these pervasive provisions of the law, laity are specifically mentioned with respect to a number of activities to which they may be invited by the hierarchy. A qualified lay person may serve as chancellor of a diocese (c. 483), or in a variety of marriage tribunal positions, including judge (cc. 1421, 1428, 1435), or on diocesan or parish finance councils (cc. 492–494, 537) or pastoral councils (c. 512). Some laity on a diocese must be invited to participate in a diocesan synod (c. 463). When there is a dearth of priests, laity may be entrusted with participation in the pastoral care of a parish (c. 517, § 2). All qualified laity may be invited to serve as experts and advisors to bishops and pastors (c. 228 §2).

In the liturgical life of the church, lay men may be permanently installed as lectors or acolytes (c. 230 § 1). All qualified lay persons may be invited to serve as readers, commentators, cantors (c. 230 § 2), and when warranted because of need, laity may be invited to preach, preside at prayer, confer baptism and distribute the Eucharist (c. 230 § 3). Laity may be delegated to assist at weddings (c. 1112), administer sacramentals (c. 1168), preach in churches (c. 766), and be commissioned as missionaries (c. 784) or catechists (c. 785)

In virtue of their own proper role in the mission of the Church received in baptism, laity share in the Church's teaching office by witnessing to the gospel in their lives (c. 759) and by having concern for catechesis (c. 774 § 1). From the same baptismal foundation, laity share in the Church's sanctifying office through their active participation in liturgical celebrations, especially the Eucharist (c. 835 § 4).

Those lay persons who are married receive particular attention in the 1983 Code. A married couple, in living out their vocation, are to build up the people of God (c. 226, § 1). Those couples who are also parents have the obligation and right to educate their children in the faith (c. 226 § 2). This role of parents with respect to the faith formation of their children is repeated and emphasized a number of times, especially in the canons on sacramental preparation (For instance, see cc. 851, 868, 872, 890, 914, 1063, 1°). In circumstances other than sacramental preparation, the role of parents is no less diminished. They are to set an example of faith for their children by word and example (c. 774 § 2) and are given a "most grave duty and primary right" to care for their children in all aspects of life, physical, social, moral, cultural and religious (c. 1136; see also cc. 793 and 1252).

Despite the significant changes clearly seen from the 1917 Code to the 1983 Code, there are some weaknesses. First, many of these statements on laity, especially the enumerations of the obligations and rights, are so new to the law that they are neither fully implemented nor fully understood. Related to this is concern that the enumerated rights are not sufficiently complemented with structures for the vindication of rights. Also, authors have noted the Code's omission of the role of charism in determining a lay person's activity within the Church (see AA 3; LG 12, 13), which raises significant canonical questions about the foundation of lay ministries undertaken.

Bibliography: J. BEAL, et al., eds., New Commentary of the Code of Canon Law (Mahwah 2000). F. MCMANUS, "Laity in Church Law: New Code, New Focus," The Jurist 47 (1987) 11–31. E. PFNAUSCH, ed., Code, Community, Ministry (Washington, DC 1992). Lay Ecclesial Ministry: The State of the Questions (Washington, DC 1999).

[E. RINERE]

LAITY, FORMATION AND EDUCATION OF

In the context of Christian belief and discipleship, formation can be understood as a continuing, lifetime process by which one grows into the likeness of Christ, according to God's will and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The task of formation of the lay faithful, whether viewed as a responsibility of the individual or as a ministry of the community for its members, is considered critical for the development of "a living, explicit, and fruitful confession of faith" (General Directory for Catechesis, 82).

Numerous references to the importance of formation appear in the documents of the Second Vatican Council (e.g., Apostolicam actuositatem, 28–32) and in postconciliar documents (e.g., Christifideles laici, 57–63). Christifideles laici (57) urges that formation be placed among the priorities of a diocese's plan of pastoral action. The U.S. Bishops underscore this direction and assert that attention to adult faith formation will render all Church ministries more fruitful (Our Hearts Were Burning within Us: A Pastoral Plan for Adult Faith Formation in the United States, pp. 12–14).

Formation is situated within the renewal of the Church as a means to an end. Conciliar and postconciliar teaching envisions a laity who are witnesses to Christ: well-formed in faith, enthusiastic, capable of leadership in society and in the Church, filled with compassion, and working for justice. Formation is a tool for achieving these outcomes.

The fundamental purpose of lay formation is a clearer discovery of one's vocation and a greater willingness to live it so as to fulfill a mission of discipleship within the broader communion and mission of the Church. Because it aims to bring about a unity of faith and life, formation encompasses and integrates such activities as catechesis, religious education, and various types of pastoral training. Formation has several interrelated dimensions: spiritual, doctrinal, and the cultivation of human values.

Formation takes place at many levels and through a variety of methods. Noting that formation is an ecclesial activity in the Church and by the Church, Christifideles laici (61–62) mentions as typical places of formation the "domestic church" of the family, the diocese and parish, small church communities, schools, groups, associations, and movements. Each of these agents plays an appropriate and complementary role in the total endeavor. Formation efforts in the United States include also parish religious education programs for adults in general, for catechists, and for parents preparing their children for sacraments. Every year the RCIA/Catechumenate enrolls thousands of adults seeking baptism or full communion with the Church or simply returning to the practice of their faith. Parish or diocesan-sponsored renewal programs and Scripture study groups often provide a systematic process of faith formation for many adults. For others, a process of formation is integral to their membership in a small Church community, an apostolic movement or association of the Christian faithful (Codex iuris canonici c. 298ff), a secular institute or third order, or an associate program connected to a religious congregation. Catholic colleges and universities, as well as some seminaries, offer undergraduate and graduate degrees to lay people in theology, canon law, religious studies, and pastoral ministries.

In the United States particularly, the postconciliar flourishing of lay ministries has led to an increase in the number and variety of education and formation programs conducted by diocesan agencies, academic institutions, and some Catholic organizations. The distinguishing characteristic of these programs is their focus on equipping lay men and women for designated roles of service and leadership in the public ministries of the Church. Programs are designed for both full- and part-time participants. Diocesan formation programs typically involve two or three years of part-time study and offer a certificate of completion at the end. Some diocesan programs are affiliated with a local college, university, or seminary and enable a student to earn an academic degree. Programs sponsored by institutions of higher learning typically offer a masters degree (e.g., M.A. or M.Div.) upon completion. Between 1985 and 2000 the number of persons enrolled in diocesan and academic programs of lay ministry formation grew from 10,500 to more than 30,000. Women account for a little over 60 percent of the total enrollment.

A significant effort in lay formation is carried out by the Hispanic Catholic community in the United States through diocesan lay leadership programs, lay movements, and a network of regional pastoral institutes, e.g., the Mexican American Cultural Center (MACC), the Southeast Pastoral Institute (SEPI), and the Northeast Pastoral Formation Institute. There are more than 20 such institutes, each serving several dioceses in a geographic region.

[H. R. MCCORD]

LAITY, THEOLOGY OF

The theology of the laity flows from a total ecclesiology that highlights the sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist in its consideration of membership, functions, rights, duties, and mission of the faithful. The Second VATICAN COUNCIL was unprecedented in its reflection upon and articulation of the identity, role, and spirituality of the laity in the Church and in the world. This renewal of ecclesial thought and practice was due to an emphasis on: the biblical theme of the Church as the People of God, the dignity and equality of the members of the Church that is rooted in baptism, and the common sharing in the threefold mission of Christ as priest, prophet, and king.

Term and Concept. The terms "lay" or "laity" are derived from the Greek terms laos theou, meaning simply the people, and laikos, meaning the mass of common people in contrast to their leaders. The Scriptures only use the term laos. In the Septuagint, the term laos is used to distinguish the people from their rulers or leaders, such as prophets, princes, and priests (Is 24:2; Jer 26:11). But laos is also used in the Septuagint to denote the election of Israel from among the nations as God's chosen race and special possession (Ex 19:4–7; Dt 7:6–12). This sense is used later in the New Testament to affirm that all Christians are chosen, called, and predestined as the People of God (1 Pt 2:9–10; Eph 1:4–5).

The term laikos, on the other hand, is used neither in the Septuagint nor in the New Testament. In fact, it was not used until 95 A.D. in the patristic source of I Clement 40.5. In later Christian usage, however, laikos became the pejorative term for the mass of common, often uneducated, people, as distinguished from the clergy, monastics, and religious of the Church. In this development, the sense of consecration, election, and call of the laity was almost forgotten.

The Second Vatican Council rediscovered the New Testament nuance of the concept of laity, laos, in its Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (LG). This document gave a typological description of the laity employing not only the negative sense, that laity are neither clergy nor religious, but also the positive sense of their call, election, and consecration by God. "The faithful who by Baptism are incorporated into Christ, are placed in the People of God, and in their own way share the priestly, prophetic, and kingly office of Christ, and to the best of their ability carry on the mission of the whole Christian people in the Church and in the world" (LG 31).

Development of the Theology of the Laity. The conciliar theology of the laity, as articulated in the documents LG, The Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, and The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, is based on a foundation of preconciliar biblical, theological, and liturgical developments. The liturgical movement, begun in the early 20th century, promoted the full, conscious, and active participation of all the baptized as essential to the proper celebration of the liturgical life of the Church. The laity were viewed no longer as passive recipients of the liturgy celebrated by the clergy, but rather as active participants in the sacramental worship of the Church. Another important factor in the development of the conciliar theology of the laity was the theology of the Church as the Body of Christ, as taught by Pope Pius XII (Mystici Corporis 1943). This Pauline and patristic image of the Church highlighted both the unity and diversity of the members of the Body and the common responsibility for the mission of the Church. Similarly, the 20th-century renewal of biblical studies helped to shape a theology of the laity. The study of the New Testament ecclesiologies of the Church as the People of God and the New Israel demonstrated the communal aspect of the Church, which is integral for any theology of the laity. Finally, the apostolic movements of the 20th century, particularly Catholic Action, were the pastoral context for articulating the mission of the laity as a full sharing in the salvific mission of the Church.

Conciliar Theology. As a result of these developments, a new theology of the laity began to emerge. The difficulty in formulating a theology of the laity is that it presupposes a whole ecclesiology in which the mystery of the Church is given in all its dimensions, including the full ecclesial reality of the laity. This shift in ECCLESIOLOGY is exactly what happened at the Second Vatican Council. It was the first council to treat the laity from a theological, rather than an exclusively canonical, point of view.

The conciliar ecclesiology can be found in LG. This document speaks of the laity in two places: in chapter 2, "The People of God," and chapter 4, "The Laity." Based on the theological and biblical foundation of chapter 2, chapter 4 presents a description of the identity and role of the laity in the context of a total ecclesiology. This renewed ecclesiology enabled the council to speak of the laity from the perspective of their relation to the mystery of the Church itself and to the Church's mission. This document clearly presents the laity as part of the Church, rather than as a mere appendage or addition to the Church. The laity are not simply the object of the ministry of the clergy. In terms of mission, the laity are not merely cooperators in the hierarchy's apostolate, but rather full sharers in the one mission of Christ.

The fundamental equality and dignity of the Christian existence of all the members of the People of God is affirmed within the common matrix of baptismal identity. From this common baptism flows an incorporation into the Church and a common vocation to holiness. Through confirmation, all the baptized are deputed to share in the mission of the Church. According to LG, baptism, confirmation, and holy orders imprint a sacramental character that are both instruments of grace as well as juridical signs giving visible structure to the People of God. From these characters, which are based on sacramental configuration to Christ, flows a functional diversity within the People of God. Within the one mission of the Church, there is a diversity of roles. All the members of the People of God, therefore, share in the activity of the Church, and not just the clergy or religious.

Vocation and Mission of the Laity. The two fundamental concepts in the conciliar theology of the laity are the vocation or identity of the laity and the mission or role of the laity. According to the conciliar ecclesiology, the identity or vocation of the laity must be properly understood before the roles, mission, and function of the laity can be treated. The vocation of the laity is described in LG #31 and the mission of the laity is described in #33. A further elaboration of the mission of the laity can be found in The Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity (AA), specifically sections #2 and #3, which are founded upon the theology of LG. AA sought to give the laity a renewed sense of responsibility in the life of the Church by stressing their active participation in its saving mission.

A typological, rather than ontological description of the laity is given in LG # 31. The council gave a proximate genus for the laity, that is, what they have in common with all of the other members of the faithful, as a point of departure for reflecting on their vocation. This common matrix is the baptismal character, which includes the fundamental dignity and equality of all the faithful and a common responsibility for carrying out the mission of the Church. The laity, like clergy and religious, have their own sharing in the threefold offices of Christ as priest, prophet, and king.

This section also gave a description of the specific difference of the vocation of the laity, that is, what belongs properly and exclusively to them, namely, their secular character. The laity seek for the Kingdom of God in temporal affairs. The description itself admits that the clergy and religious engage in secular activities, but their competence is not specifically related to the world, as is the laity's. The conciliar ecclesiology, therefore, views the secular character of the vocation of the laity as something more than sociological, it is in fact part of the theological description of the laity.

The mission of the laity is described in LG #33. The council affirmed that the apostolate of the laity is a sharing in the salvific mission of the Church itself, and not simply a sharing in the apostolate of the hierarchy, which was the popular pre-conciliar definition. The laity, according to the council, have both the right and the responsibility to participate in the Church's mission to the world as well as the right and responsibility to contribute to the Church's inner life and organization.

Section #2 of AA states that there are two aspects to the mission of the Church: to make all people sharers in Christ's redemption and to order the whole world in relationship to Him. The laity participate in both of these aspects by exercising their apostolate in both the Church and the world. Once again, the council is affirming that it is not only the hierarchy who engage in the apostolate, but rather all the members of the faithful have the right and duty to engage in apostolic activity. Within the one mission of the Church, there is a diversity of ministry, according to this section. Among the members of the Church there is a basic equality, yet a functional diversity. All the faithful share in the threefold offices of Christ as priest, prophet, and king, and therefore all have their own responsibility in the mission of the People of God.

The dogmatic basis for the mission of the laity is the sacraments of baptism and confirmation (LG #33; AA #3). These sacramental characters depute the laity for their mission in the Church and in the world. The laity are commissioned by Christ Himself through these sacraments, and thereby receive the right and duty to exercise the apostolate. The laity, therefore, do not need any special delegation or deputation from the hierarchy in order to labor for the sanctification and growth of the Church and the renewal of the temporal order in general terms, since they are deputed by the Lord Himself. The sacramental identity of the laity, which flows from baptism and confirmation, is nourished by the Eucharist since it communicates that love which is the soul of the apostolate.

The laity's participation in the royal priesthood of believers is another aspect of their sacramental identity (AA #3). Along with the ministerial priesthood, the common priesthood of the laity is a true participation in the one priesthood of Christ. Drawing upon the teaching of 1 Peter 2, the council demonstrates that each member of the Church, by reason of their baptism and confirmation, is consecrated into a royal priesthood and a holy people. The mission of those so consecrated consists in offering spiritual sacrifices through everything they do and giving witness to Christ throughout the world. The priestly character of this mission consists in communicating the grace of Christ's redeeming sacrifice to the world.

The secular character of the laity gives their mission its uniqueness (LG #33; AA #2). Typically, although not exclusively, the lay apostolate is exercised in and through direct concern with secular affairs. Because of their secular character, the laity make the Church present and operative in the world in a way distinct from that of the clergy or religious. There are certain circumstances and places, according to the council, where the Church can be the salt of the earth only through the laity. The secular character of the laity is not merely concerned with physical presence in the world—since every member of the Church is in the world in this sense—but with a living presence that involves commitment and immersion in the temporal order. The laity are described not simply as representatives of the Church to the world, but rather, they are the Church in the world. They are the witnesses and living instruments of the mission of the Church through their engagement in temporal affairs. The Christian penetration of the temporal order implies apostolic activity. The council affirms the redemptive value of the daily activities of the laity in the family, workplace, school, and society. The laity, empowered by the Spirit of Christ, exercise their apostolate typically amidst the affairs of the world as a kind of leaven. Because of their secular character, the laity are the Church in the heart of the world, and therefore they bring the world into the heart of the Church.

The mission of the laity includes not only their activities in the world, but also their participation in the inner life and organization of the Church. LG #33 states that the laity can take on a direct form of cooperation in the apostolate of the hierarchy. This organized form of apostolic activity is not specifically described in this section, but it could include liturgical roles, preaching, ecclesiastical administration, works of mercy, etc. This cooperation in the apostolate of the hierarchy can take on an even more direct form, through deputation. These offices are functions, which properly belong to the hierarchy, but can be fulfilled by the laity in a case of necessity through deputation for a spiritual purpose.

This mission of the laity is carried on through the three theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity (AA #3). These three virtues, poured into the faithful by the power of the Holy Spirit, are the motivating force of their apostolate, and bring with them the new command of love. This new command of love given to the Church by the Lord is fulfilled in bringing the message of salvation to others. This apostolate of communicating eternal life to all is the obligation of all the faithful, and not an additional responsibility for only certain members of the Church. Besides the theological virtues, charisms of the Holy Spirit are also given to the laity for the exercise of their apostolate. Charisms are special gifts given according to the needs of the Church that complement the sacraments and ministries. The reception of these charisms brings with it the right and duty to exercise them by responding to the grace bestowed by the Spirit.

Postconciliar Developments. The most important papal document on the theology of the laity since the Second Vatican Council was Pope John Paul II's Apostolic Exhortation, The Lay Members of Christ's Faithful People (CFL), issued Dec. 30, 1988. This exhortation was the result of the 1987 Bishops' Synod whose theme was "The Vocation and Mission of the Laity in the Church and in the World Twenty Years after the Second Vatican Council."

The theme of the vocation of the laity is described in CFL #9–15, with the key sections being #9 and #15, where the question of the identity of the laity is specifically raised. The mission of the laity is described in CFL #23–24, which deal with the ministries, offices, roles, and charisms of the laity.

The pope does not offer a new dogmatic definition or description of the laity, but rather, he returns to the conciliar typological description. In CFL #9, two elements of the conciliar teaching are highlighted, the baptismal identity of the laity and their unique secular character. Baptism brings about a newness of life, which is a regeneration in the life of the Son of God, an incorporation into His Body, the Church, and an anointing in the Holy Spirit. After this reflection on baptismal identity, the pope then describes the secular character of the laity. Although all the members of the Church have a secular character because the Church itself has an authentic secular dimension, the laity have their own manner of realization and function within this common secular character. The pope explains how the world is the place, in sociological and theological terms, in which the laity receive their call from God. The laity, because of their secular character, are to be a leaven in the world, sanctifying the world from within by fulfilling their own particular duties.

The mission of the laity is presented by the pope in CFL #23–24 as flowing from their vocation. The Church is an organic communio, characterized by the presence of both a diversity and a complementarity of vocations, states of life, ministries, charisms, and responsibilities. The Holy Spirit is the source of both the diversity and complementarity. Within this communio, there is a fundamental equality and dignity of all the baptized in acting for the edification of the Church. The mission of each member of the faithful is determined by their specific sacramental identities, vocations, and charisms received from the Holy Spirit. The laity participate with all the faithful in the threefold offices of Christ and therefore share in the priestly, prophetic, and kingly mission of Christ. Within this one mission of Christ, the roles, offices, and ministries of the laity find their source in the sacramental identity flowing from baptism and confirmation.

The ecclesiology of the Second Vatican Council brought about a new age of the laity. Twenty years later, the 1988 apostolic exhortation on the laity provided a further elaboration of the fundamental themes of the vocation and mission of the laity in the Church and in the world. From these developments emerges the need for renewed understandings of: the spirituality of the laity, their rights and duties according to canon law, the possibilities for lay ministry, and the necessity of spiritual and educational formation of the laity.

Bibliography: "Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, The Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity," in Vatican Council II, the Conciliar and Post-Conciliar Documents, ed. A. FLANNERY (New York 1975). POPE JOHN PAUL II, Christifideles Laici, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 81 (1989) 393-521 (Eng. tr., "On the Vocation and Mission of the Lay Faithful in the Church and in the World," Origins 18 [1989] 561-595). Y. CONGAR, Lay People in the Church (London 1957). P. COUGHLIN, The Hour of the Laity (Philadelphia 1989). L. DOOHAN, The Lay-Centered Church (Minneapolis 1984). A. FAIVRE, The Emergence of the Laity in the Early Church (New York 1990). A. HAGSTROM, The Concepts of the Vocation and Mission of the Laity (San Francisco 1994). F. KLOSTERMANN, "The Laity," in Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, v. 1, ed. H. VORGRIMLER (New York 1969) 231-252; "Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity," in Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, v. 3, ed. H. VORGRIMLER (New York 1969) 273-404. K. B. OS-BORNE, Ministry: Lay Ministry in the Roman Catholic Church (New York 1993). R. PARENT, A Church of the Baptized (New York 1987). K. RAHNER, "Notes on the Lay Apostolate," in Theological Investigations, v. 2 (London 1963) 319-352. E. SCHILLEBEECKX, The Layman in the Church and Other Essays (New York 1963); The Mission of the Church (New York 1973).

[A. A. HAGSTROM]

LAITY IN THE MIDDLE AGES

Specific study of the laity in the MIDDLE AGES has until recently been neglected. Standard works of reference seldom treat separately or even mention "lay" thought and influence. There is much research yet to be done, so what shall be attempted here is an interpretive study under the following headings: (1) definition of the term laicus in the Middle Ages; (2) the two powers—cleric and lay, Church and State; (3) the laity and the Church's teaching authority and jurisdiction; (4) the social order; (5) LAY SPIRITUALITY; and (6) conclusion.

Definition. The term laicus in the Middle Ages took on a strongly juridical, institutional meaning. As an antonym of clerus it became synonymous with "one under authority" or "one who was unconsecrated" as against the consecrated authorities, the clerics. The great medieval authors had little time for the layman; when they did mention him, it was usually to stress his subordination to the clergy or to note his excesses. This negative attitude contrasted sharply with the use and meaning of the term λαός in the NT and λαϊκός in the early Church, where it meant a member of the people of God, one who was baptized, and thus referred to clergy and laity alike. By the 11th century the dualistic concept of membership in the Church was strengthened by the GREGORIAN REFORM ideals, which fostered specific religious virtues for all clerics, e.g., the common life and CELIBACY. GRATIAN crystallized this attitude in the influential text Duo sunt genera Christianorum (Corpus iuris canonici C.12 q.1 c.7); there are two kinds, for religious are included with the clerics. The distinguishing mark of the clergy was the TONSURE; it marked the recipient's submission to ecclesiastical jurisdiction and brought him many advantages not possessed by laymen. Consequently, many of the laity took the tonsure or entered minor orders (see HOLY OR-DERS), whose original specific function was gradually rejected. We may cite, for example, the instance of Arras, in which a group of married bankers and merchants took the tonsure to escape secular justice against their financial misdoings. Abuse of clerical immunity from secular jurisdiction became common, for the test of membership of the clergy was hard to apply and literacy became the criterion. Extreme claims arising from this confusion, e.g., Thomas BECKET's defense of criminous clerks and the bull CLERICIS LAICOS of BONIFACE VIII, injured the cause of the Church in the eyes of the laity.

The Two Powers. Throughout the Middle Ages the laity were regarded as inferior to the clergy. Such texts as Dt 22.10, "You shall not plow with an ox and an ass harnessed together," were cited as proof that the laity should not be brought into ecclesiastical matters. Thus, the Synod of Seville (619) forbade laymen to serve as stewards or as ecclesiastical judges (Corpus iuris canonici C.16 q.7 c.22). But the reality was far different. In the matter of episcopal elections in the early Church, the laity approved of the candidate elected by the clergy. Then the lay ruler, apart from the consecration, consolidated the whole process by taking it into his own hands. His influence predominated until the 11th century. Thus Richard I of Normandy had his son Robert elected to Rouen; his nephew Hugh, to Bayeux; and another nephew, John, to Avranches. The Gregorian reformers tried, though unsuccessfully, to restore the ancient discipline. Despite the eventual control exercised by the CATHEDRAL chapter and later by the papacy, episcopal elections continued to be subject to pressure by the lay rulers.

Much of this interference arose from the nature of the relationship between CHURCH and State in the Middle Ages. The Church, which occupied a favorable position in the Western kingdoms, treated the lay powers as an instrument to fulfill its mission. Churchmen often invoked lay help, e.g., in the deposition of "unjust" rulers (thus, the Emperor HENRY IV), in the CRUSADES against the infidels, or in the suppression of heresy, as in the wars against the ALBIGENSES (1208–1330). GREGORY VII expressed these ideas in his two letters to Abp. Hermann of Metz in 1076 and 1081 (Reg. 4.2, 8.21). Popes, such as INNOCENT III and INNOCENT IV, and other prelates often exercised great influence over lay rulers. Papal authority in Italy and its spiritual influence elsewhere frustrated the so-called medieval Empire (see HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE).

Although lay rulers benefited from ecclesiastical recognition, such as sacral ANOINTING, they did not accept hierocratic claims unless these suited their purposes. Moreover, they quickly converted the concept of a duty to help the Church into a right to do so. The lay princes generally favored the dualism of the primitive form of the Gelasian theory (see GELASIUS I, POPE), but extreme polemicists, such as the ANONYMOUS OF YORK, could reverse the roles completely (cf. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Libelli de lite 3.667).

In practice, the distinction between Church and State was an obvious one throughout the Middle Ages. So great was the lay threat to the independence of the Church that the latter was forced to define its position in every way. Its great wealth was the special object of lay ambition. Ultimately, by the 11th century, this resulted in the virtual feudalization of the Church. The PROPRIETARY CHURCH system and lay ownership of TITHES were widespread abuses, which caused even supposedly extreme hierocratic churchmen to distinguish between the Church, as divine and clerical, and the State, as temporal and lay.

Canonically, the clerical reaction to lay intrusion was consistent and absolute (cf. Corpus iuris canonici C.16 q.7 cc.1–43). Secularization of church property was prohibited. Laymen were excluded from ecclesiastical administration with some exceptions, e.g., the seniores laici in the African Church in the 4th and early 5th century. In fact, lay interference, especially in the use and disposition of CHURCH PROPERTY, lasted throughout the Middle Ages. Much of the interference was the result of willing consent by the clergy, e.g., the employment of laymen as collectors of tithes, as agents and bailiffs for cathedral chapters, as lawyers to represent Church interests in the secular courts, and as bankers for the papacy and lesser ecclesiastical units. Lay intrusion was particularly strong after 1300, for the canonists and theologians failed to deal with the problems generated by the economic changes of the time. They continued to repeat the ancient formulas when they should have dealt anew with such urgent matters as the "right" of the State to tax Church wealth or its responsibility to care for the poor. There had been some exceptions, as when Innocent III accepted the already existent alienation of tithes to laymen, except for the parish clergy's quarter, and when the various national clergy made payments of grace in lieu of taxation. However, from 1300 onward ecclesiastical finance caused a great dial of suspicion and dispute.

Papal finances in particular roused lay hostility, so that in the 16th century pretended financial abuses were commonly regarded as a major cause of the REFORMATION. This was a major propaganda victory for the lay rulers. In fact, the papacy had been most powerful financially only until the early 14th century. Papal assets gradually fell into lay hands, so that on the eve of the Reformation the greater part of papal income came from the Italian patrimony and not from abroad (see STATES OF THE CHURCH).

These disputes enlivened the Middle Ages and, toward the end, took place in an atmosphere of ANTI-CLERICALISM. But this was not always so. Before 1300 in all the major conflicts there were laymen and clergy on both sides. Gregory VII often appealed to the laity against recalcitrant clergy, and the Emperor Henry IV enjoyed the support of the clergy of the Empire against the pretender Rudolf. Mutual interests and prevailing opinion drew Church and State together. The laity could not conceive of a society without the Church, and from this the medieval Church drew its greatest strength. In the last resort the Church depended on the lay powers for the enforcement of its "rights," the libertas Ecclesiae.

Laity, the Magisterium, and Church Jurisdiction. With few exceptions, notably heretics and Jews, the laity wished to live and die within the body of the Church. The Church carried the grave responsibility of presenting the true faith, which it elected to fulfill by developing its institutions and sacramentology, to the detriment, some would say, of the charismatic or prophetic ministry. Thus, no treatise emerged from the Middle Ages on the place of the laity within the Church; in fact, there is no treatise De ecclesia as such until the De regimine christiana of JAMES OF VITERBO. Of course, the laity had some function within the sacramental system, especially in the administration of the Sacrament of MATRIMONY and, in times of necessity, of BAPTISM. Certain pious practices, e.g., LAY CONFESSION, approved by THOMAS AQUINAS (In 4 sent. 17. 3.3.2 ad 1), helped to bridge the gap between clerics and laymen. The concept of lay participation in offering the sacrifice of the Mass with the priest was not lost (cf. PETER DAMIAN, Patrologia Latina 145:237). But these were exceptions and do not refute the generalization that the role of the people in the medieval Church was essentially a passive one. Lay poverty and ignorance were chiefly responsible for the laity's never achieving an "apostolate" or a "theology," making it impossible for the educated clergy to propose a cooperative role, except that of the material sword, the arm of the Church. The office of preaching was rigorously denied to laymen (cf. Leo I, Patrologia Latina 54:1045-46; Corpus iuris canonici D.23 c.29; X 5.7.12, 13; VIo 5.2.2); women especially were forbidden to preach.

These prohibitions were generally successful until c. 1100, when the intellectual Renaissance and the economic revolution of the 12th and 13th centuries produced a new type of layman, the forerunner of the humanist and the civis, and a new class of people, the urban proletariat. These new laymen came up against the ancient prohibitions. The gap between them and the clergy widened, and their aspirations went elsewhere, especially into the medieval heresies, until the coming of the friars (see MENDICANT ORDERS) helped redress the balance.

The heresies (there were really only two main groups, the WALDENSES and the CATHARI) were largely lay movements that were strong in the towns. They were evangelical, anticlerical, and inspired by the concepts of the "primitive church" and the "community of believers." Both stressed lay preaching and apostolic poverty (see POVERTY MOVEMENT). The Waldenses in particular encouraged Bible reading in the vernacular and lay confession. Not surprisingly, the heretics succeeded so long as they had support of the lay rulers, who used the threat of heresy to secure economic concessions from the Church. Ultimately the lay princes were forced to ally with the Church to suppress heresy because the doctrine of lay individualism threatened their own theocratic basis as well as the hierocratic structure of the Church (cf. Second Lateran, c.23; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta 178).

Various methods of suppression were tried, including force and persuasion. The rise of the friars, initially with strong lay orientation, partly succeeded in winning back the laity who had been lost to the parish clergy. But in Canon Law the property of obstinate heretics was confiscable (cf. Innocent III, Vergentis in senium, March 25, 1199; A. Potthast, Regesta pontificum romanorum inde ab a. 1198 ad a. 1304 643; Corpus iuris canonici X 5.7.10). This decided the lay rulers, especially the lords of northern France, who then forced the Church into the long wars against their southern neighbors, the so-called crusade against the Albigenses.

The final adoption of force and the use of the INQUI-SITION as the prime instrument for the suppression of heresy may be linked with the failure of the noble attempt by St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI to channel lay fervor into the service of the Church. Francis' great merit was to have recognized a vital truth, viz, that in certain situations the people must be consulted and their needs linked with those of the Church. Unfortunately, the subsequent institutionalization of the FRANCISCANS was a sign that the Church was not prepared to pay a sufficiently high price to retain the allegiance of the masses, i.e., a religious order with a predominantly lay character. After 1242 no lay brother could be appointed to offices in the order (see ELIAS OF CORTONA).

The conflict between lay and cleric was heightened by lack of understanding on the part of the clergy. Although the Church recognized lay competence in secular affairs (Fourth Lateran, c.42; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta 229), its whole approach was prejudiced by regarding the lay state as a concession to human weakness (cf. Corpus iuris canonici C.12 q.1 c.7). The laity reacted by hostility, which led to the common clerical observation that "they [the laity] are opposed to us" (cf. commentary of HOSTIENSIS, Corpus iuris canonici X 3.30.17).

In practice the conflict was generally one of jurisdiction (the independence of Church courts, clerical immunity from secular courts, the right of the Church to try laymen for certain offenses) and administration (the distribution and use of Church property, and appointment to Church offices). On these matters the Church left no doubt that the laity should not interfere. The (false) decretal Nulla facultas of Pope Stephen was widely cited in support (cf. First Lateran c.8; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta 167).

There was also a great deal of agreement and cooperation, e.g., in the medieval councils and synods to which the laity were generally summoned for technical advice, publicity, or aid in executing certain decrees. Hostiensis stated that laymen should be present when their own causes, marriage, or matter of faith were being treated but absent during discussion of ecclesiastical matters or clerical faults. In the 15th century Panormitanus (see TUDESCHIS, NICOLAUS DE) gave two examples of the use of lay periti at general COUNCILS. The idea of excluding laymen from councils did not emerge until after the Council of TRENT.

The Social Order. The medieval Church performed many of the welfare functions of the modern State, for ecclesiastics recognized the principle that the Church's wealth was not for the sole use of the individual cleric but for the good of the Church as a whole. Such welfare services included provision for HOSPITALS, the poor, pilgrims and travelers, and education. But the canonists failed to adjust their teaching fully in the light of the economic and social changes of the period after 1300. This left the Church unprepared for the emergence of the concept of the civis, or citizen, which replaced the term laicus. It signified a diminution in the social functions of the Church and called for a realignment of traditional distinctions.

In this respect, the most notable deficiency of the Church was the failure to provide a system of education for the masses. [See EDUCATION.] This is not the same as saying that there were no educated laymen in the Middle Ages. It is commonly but mistakenly supposed that once the classical tradition of the early Church in the West had passed, an educated laity had also disappeared, and that especially from the 9th to the 12th century only clerics could read and write. Riché gives many examples to prove the contrary, concluding that the equation laicus = illiteratus was valid only in the sense of one who does not know Latin. In any case, certain professions, e.g., law and medicine, had a strong lay tone throughout the Middle Ages (cf. Fourth Lateran, c.18; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta 220). In Italy the tradition of a lay culture was never entirely abandoned, and it began to flower again in the 11th century. Throughout Europe instruction for children did exist, although the teaching was a clerical monopoly until the 13th century. The earliest lay-controlled schools were those conducted by heretics.

However, the rise of the learned layman as a prominent figure in society dates from the early 12th century onward, and educated laymen flourished in the Roman law schools and universities of southern Europe. Laymen were even admitted to the Canon Law schools and included such canonists as the eminent JOANNES ANDREAE (1270–1348), Petrus de Ancharano (1330–1416), and Laurentius de Ridolfis (d. c. 1450). But lay education was directed principally to secular subjects. There was nothing in the later Middle Ages to equal lay influence in the early Church, when a large number of the Fathers began their theological work as laymen, e.g., SS. Cyprian, Basil, Gregory Nazianzus, Jerome, and Augustine. Significantly, the majority of these belonged to the Eastern Church, where the tradition of the lay theologian had never died. Institutionalism in the West led to the idea that the study of the sacred sciences belonged to the clergy, and that of the profane to the laity.

Changes in the social and educational status of the laity resulted from the economic expansion of the 12th and 13th centuries, and the Church played a role in these developments. One view is that the Church encouraged "good" business (cf. the JUST PRICE and the prohibition of USURY). Another is that the Church hindered commercial growth by such restrictions. Both views need revision. In the early Middle Ages the economy was mainly at subsistence level, so the Church could treat economic matters in severe condemnatory terms because little was at stake. But in the expansion period her teaching was modified to suit new conditions: usury laws were revised, the just price was in fact merely the market price, and business became respectable. If anyone suffered it was the Church, which frequently was the victim of the layman's pursuit of profits. At the end of the Middle Ages economic collapse and discontent among the lay rulers and merchant classes led them to attack the Church's wealth as a cure for economic ills and even, finally, to embrace the Reformation.

Lay Spirituality. In the Western Church the general lack of an educated laity left the people cut off from the main stream of religious thought. The language of the Church was Latin, which proved difficult for the barbarian and pagan masses who had entered the former Roman provinces. Such people could not, initially, provide a firm foundation for the faith, so the Church established its unity upon the clergy, the sacramental system, and Canon Law. There was thus little opportunity for a positive lay contribution to the spread of the faith. For several centuries the sorry lot of the masses, victims of frequent plagues, famine, a high mortality rate, and low life expectancy, made it impossible for the Church to do more than preach satisfaction for sin (see PENITENTIALS) and to encourage prayer in the form of the cult of some local saint. In any case piety was associated with ascetism, and marriage was at its best a concession to human weakness. From about 1000 some changes were noticeable. Marriage as a Sacrament was stressed; devotion to the humanity of Christ and to Mary, His Mother, the elevation and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, PILGRIMAGES to Rome and the Holy Land, religious drama and literature, vernacular translations of the Bible, as well as the physical expansion of the Church (parish churches, cathedrals, monasteries, built principally by laymen and financed by lay donations) witness to a remarkable growth of lay piety that was genuine, intense, and widespread. In 1215 the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (c.21; Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta 221) obliged every Christian of the age of reason to receive the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist at least once a year. Finally, the coming of the friars helped spread religion in the cities and towns. If this enthusiasm failed to remain orthodox and gave place in the later Middle Ages to SUPERSTITION and heresy (see, e.g., J. WYCLIF, J. HUS, M. LUTHER), the responsibility lay elsewhere.

Conclusion. Throughout the medieval period there were definite modifications in the status and influence of the laity within the Church. The most marked change is noted after 1300, when lay hostility to the papacy, anticlericalism, and a lay spirit emerged (see MARSILIUS OF PADUA, Defensor pacis). Contact with Renaissance HU-MANISM, the growth of the State, the philosophical skepticism of NOMINALISM, the spread of lay education, the effects of endemic plague, especially of the Plague of 1348, the Hundred Years' War, the AVIGNON PAPACY, the WESTERN SCHISM, CONCILIARISM, the spread of heresy and popular revolts such as the Peasants' Revolt of 1381 in England, made the period from 1300 to 1500 an age of transition. Yet canonists and theologians failed to note these things. The general councils merely reiterated earlier prohibitions and in doing so increased the gap between the laity and the clergy. On the eve of the Reformation, the Fifth LATERAN COUNCIL (1512-17) had nothing to say concerning the social and religious aspirations of the masses, apart from the bull for reform of the MONTES PIETATIS (Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta 601–603).

The great merit and achievement of the medieval Church was that it had been able to inspire the masses to fervor and enthusiasm. But its negligence in directing these emotions into worthwhile and respectable objectives and, essentially, its failure to educate the laity were momentous defects for which the Church was to pay a heavy price.

Bibliography: P. THOMAS, Le Droit de propriété des laïques sur les églises et le patronage laïque au moyen âge (Paris 1906). A. TEETAERT, La Confession aux laïques dans l'Église latine depuis le VIIIe jusqu'au XIVe siècle (Paris 1926). J. HASHAGEN, Staat und Kirche vor der Reformation: Eine Untersuchung der vorreformatorischen Bedeutung des Laieneinflusses in der Kirche (Essen 1931). J. HUIZINGA, The Waning of the Middle Ages (London 1924; pa. Garden City, NY 1954). É. LESNE, Les Écoles de la fin du VIIIe siècle à la fin du XIIe (Lille 1940). J. E. DOWNS, The Concept of Clerical Immunity (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 126; Washington 1941). M. J. HUGHES, Women Healers in Medieval Life and Literature (New York 1943). S. RUNCIMAN, The Medieval Manichee: A Study of the Christian Dualist Heresy (Cambridge, Eng. 1947). P. DELHAYE, "L'Organisation scolaire au XIIe siècle," Traditio 5 (1947) 211-268. Y. M. J. CONGAR and F. VARIL-LON, Sacerdoce et laïcat dans l'Église (Paris 1947). R. A. KNOX, Enthusiasm: A Chapter in the History of Religion (New York 1950). O. KOEHLER, "Der Laie im katholischen Kirchenrecht," Stimmen der Zeit 146 (1949-50) 43-53. P. G. CARON, "Les Seniores laici de l'Eacute; glise africaine," Revue internationale des droits de l'antiquité 6 (1951) 7-22. É. AMANN and A. DUMAS, L'Église au pouvoir des laïques (A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 7; 1948). A. SIGUR, "Lay Cooperation with the Magisterium," Jurist 13 (1953) 268-297. L. LEITMAIER, "Der Laie in der Kirche im Mittelalter und im 20. Jahrhundert," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 39 (1953) 28-45. G. B. BORINO, "L'investitura laica del decreto di Nicolò II al decreto di Gregorio VII," Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. BORINO 5 (1956) 345-359. G. DE LAGARDE, La Naissance de l'esprit laïque au déclin du moyen âge, 5 v. (3d ed. Louvain-Paris 1956-63). H. I. MARROU, A History of Education in Antiquity, tr. G. LAMB (New York 1956). G. PHILIPS, The Role of the Laity in the Church, tr. J. R. GILBERT and J. W. MOUDRY (Chicago 1956). N. R. C. COHN, The Pursuit of the Millennium (London 1957). Y. M. J. CONGAR, Jalons pour une théologie du laïcat (3d ed. Paris 1964); Eng. Lay People in the Church, tr. D. ATTWATER (Westminster, MD 1957). E. H. KANTO-ROWICZ, The King's Two Bodies (Princeton 1957). I. ORIGO, The Merchant of Prato (New York 1957). R. B. BROOKE, Early Franciscan Government: Elias to Bonaventure (Cambridge, Eng. 1959). R. J. COX, A Study of the Juridic Status of Laymen in the Writing of the Medieval Canonists (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 395; Washington 1959). H. MAISONNEUVE, Études sur les origines de l'Inquisition (2d ed. Paris 1960). H. GRUNDMANN, Religiöse Bewegungen im Mittelalter (2d ed. Hildesheim 1961). D. KNOWLES, The English Mystical Tradition (New York 1961). W. ULLMANN, Principles of Government and Politics in the Middle Ages (New York 1961). J. LECLERCQ et al., La Spiritualité du moyen-âge (Paris 1961). S. C. NEILL and H. R. WEBER, eds., The Layman in Christian History (Philadelphia 1963). P. RICHÉ, "Les Bibliothèques de trois aristocrates laïcs carolingiens," Moyen-âge 69 (1963) 87-104. K. MÖRSDORF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 6:733-741. D. HERLIHY, Women, Family, and Society in Medieval Europe (Providence 1995).

[J. GILCHRIST]

LAKE, KIRSOPP

Biblical scholar; b. Southampton, England, April 7, 1872; d. Pasadena, Calif., Nov. 10, 1946. After education at St. Paul's School and Lincoln College, Oxford, he was ordained (1896) to the Anglican ministry and made curate of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford. While there he wrote one of his most important works, The Text of the New Testament (1900). In 1904 he joined the University of Leiden, Netherlands, as a professor of New Testament exegesis. Three years later he published Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, in which he cast doubt on the evidence of Christ's physical resurrection. In 1914 he went to Harvard University in the U.S., becoming successively professor of early Christian literature, Winn professor of ecclesiastical history (1919–32), and professor of history (1932–37). Lake's early scholarly work was historical, dealing particularly with St. Paul and the Acts of the Apostles. He later did important work in textual criticism and succeeded in identifying the Lake Group of manuscripts as part of the library used by Origen in commentaries written at Alexandria and Caesarea. Among his other publications are Earlier Epistles of St. Paul (1911), which emphasizes the influence of Hellenistic religions on primitive Christianity; Stewardship of Faith (1915), which was attacked by Roman Catholics as a denial of the divinity of Christ; and Beginnings of Christianity (5 v. 1920–32), written in collaboration with F. J. Foakes Jackson, an imposing introduction to the Acts of the Apostles.

[E. DELANEY]

LALLEMANT, JACQUES PHILIPPE

Theologian; b. Saint-Valéry-sur-Somme, Sept. 18, 1660; d. Paris, Aug. 24, 1748. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1677, and spent most of his life combating Jansenism. Of his 31 published works the following are the most important: Journal historique des assemblées tenues en Sorbonne pour condamner les Mémoires de la Chine (Paris 1700), seven letters concerning the controversy about the CHINESE RITES, and Réponse aux nouveaux écrits de MM. des missions étrangères contre les jésuites (Paris 1702); Jansenius condamné par l'Église, par luimême et par ses défenseurs et par saint Augustin (Brussels 1705), an abridged history of the judgments of the Church against the teachings of C. O. JANSEN; Le Véritable esprit des nouveaux disciples de saint Augustin (4 v., Brussels 1705); Le P. Quesnel séditieux et hérétique dans ses Réflexions morales sur le Nouveau Testament (Brussels 1704); and Réflexions morales avec notes sur le Nouveau Testament traduit en français (12 v., Paris 1713-25).

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:1387–1400. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2456–59.

[P. BROUTIN]

LALLEMANT, LOUIS

French Jesuit authority on the spiritual life; b. Châlons-sur-Marne, Oct. 30?, 1587; d. Bourges, April 5, 1635. We know little about the ancestry and infancy of Lallemant. He was the son of a magistrate in the service of the king of France in the province of Champagne. He was sent as a boarding student to the Jesuit college at Bourges where he gave evidence of a precocious and solid piety.

He entered the novitiate at 18, and pronounced his solemn vows Oct. 28, 1621. He then became professor of philosophy and of theology, later master of novices and, of special importance, instructor of tertians, charged with the spiritual formation of the Jesuits making an additional year of novitiate after having finished their studies and before beginning their apostolic ministries.

Lallemant himself did not write, but one of his students gathered notes that were preserved, arranged, and published in Paris (1694) by Pierre Champion, SJ, almost 60 years after Lallemant's death. This book was entitled La Vie et la doctrine spirituelle du P. Louis Lallemant de la Compagnie de Jésus. It contains a biography, written by Champion, and an addition, made up of notes taken at the conferences of Lallemant by his disciple J. J. SURIN. Despite the difficult critical problems posed by such a manner of transmission and composition, we can regard the Doctrine spirituelle as the true thought of Lallemant.

In this work he insists on purity of heart, on docility to the direction of the Holy Spirit. Under the influence of the Spiritual Exercises he teaches the discernment of spirits, that is, the discovery of the action and of the will of God, recognized in everyday life through the movements of the heart. He insists as well on the gifts of the Holy Spirit and on union with Our Lord in prayer. He poses the classic problem of the relation between prayer and action. For him, prayer ought to lead to a disinterested contemplation, but it ought also to prepare for apostolic action, nourish it, and submit it to the light of the Holy Spirit. Action, on the other hand, ought to lead us to God and be a constant stimulus to prayer. This is an apostolic spirituality: prayer and action are the means of becoming a true apostle. "The final point of the highest perfection in this world is zeal for souls."

Lallemant inspired a double set of disciples: mystical writers, such as J. Rigoleuc and J. J. Surin; and heroic missionaries, such as Bl. Julien Maunoir and St. Isaac Jogues.

Bibliography: L. LALLEMANT, La Vie et la doctrine spirituelle du Père Louis Lallemant (2d ed. Paris 1961), introd. and notes by F. COUREL. J. DE GUIBERT, La Spiritualité de la Compagnie de Jésus, ed. E. LAMALLE (Rome 1953), a sure and precise general view of Lallemant. H. BRÉMOND, Histoire littéraire du sentiment réligieux en France depuis la fin des guerres de religion jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1911–36) 5:3–65. A. POTTIER, Essai de théologie mystique comparée: Le Père Louis Lallemant et les grands spirituels de son temps, 3 v. (Paris 1927–29). P. BOUVIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2459–64. F. COUREL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:753. J. JIMÉNEZ, ''En torno a la formación de la Doctrine spirituelle del P. Lallement,'' Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu 32 (1963) 225–292.

[F. COUREL]

LALOR, TERESA, MOTHER

Foundress of the American Visitandines; b. Ballyragget, County Kilkenny, Ireland, c. 1769; d. Washington, D.C., Sept. 9, 1846. While on a visit to Philadelphia, Pa., in 1797, Alice Lalor and two other young women cooperated with Rev. Leonard Neale in founding what was to become the first American house of the VISITATION NUNS. In 1799, when Neale was transferred to Georgetown (Washington, D.C.), they followed. They lodged first with a group of refugee Poor Clare nuns, but they later moved into their own quarters and adopted a quasi-Jesuit rule given them by Neale. "The Pious Ladies," as they were known, obtained the Visitation rule, and Mother Teresa took her vows on Dec. 28, 1816. The free school for girls that she established, as well as the sisterhood itself, prospered after initial difficulties. The school assumed a national character, and the sisterhood expanded to Mobile, Ala., in 1832 and to Baltimore, Md., in 1837. After almost 20 years as superior, Mother Teresa relinquished her office in 1819 and spent her remaining days in the ranks of her community.

Bibliography: J. B. CODE, Great American Foundresses (New York 1929). G. P. and R. H. LATHROP, A Story of Courage: Annals of the Georgetown Convent of the Visitation (Cambridge, Mass. 1895).

[J. B. CODE]

LAMAISM

Mahāyāna Buddhism first entered Tibet from India in the 7th century. In the 8th century it became "Lamaism" through local developments and absorption of many native religious elements. Several sects came into being. Most of the lamas (bla-ma, "superior") were married and wore red garments, hence the name Red Church. In the 8th century Tibet became a powerful empire, a development helping the consolidation of Lamaism. Contrary to original Buddhist doctrine, Lamaism developed into a theistic religion with many gods and demons, and an elaborate ritual with spells, incantations, and prayer formulas. Under the Mongol dynasty in China (13th and 14th centuries), Lamaism wielded much influence at the court and made its first entry into Mongolia.

Reformed Lamaism. Tsong-kha-pa (1357–1419), a native of northeastern Tibet, started a reformation and restored celibacy of the monks. His sect, dGe-lugs-pa, "the virtuous," became known as the Yellow Church, because of its yellow garments. It was centered around Lhasa. In 1577 Tsong-kha-pa's third successor was invited to visit Mongolia. On this occasion, a Mongol prince bestowed upon him the title Dalai Lama—"Ocean, or Universal, lama"; he thus became the third Dalai Lama, and his successors have ever since borne that title. He died in Mongolia, in 1588. The fourth Dalai Lama was a Mongol (1589–1616). The most famous one was the fifth, Ngagdbang-bLo-bzang (1617–82). The 14th Dalai Lama went into exile in India in 1959.

The Mongol journey and the subsequent revival of Lamaism in Mongolia brought added prestige to the Yellow Church in Tibet: in due time it supplanted almost entirely the earlier sects (about 90 percent of the lamas were of the Yellow Church), and the Dalai Lama became temporal ruler as well as supreme religious head. From Mongolia, Lamaism spread into southern Siberia, and with the Mongol emmigration of the 17th century, into southern Russia.

The Dalai Lamas. The Dalai Lamas are believed to be incarnations ("Living Buddhas") of the bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara, "Looking with mercy upon the world." Another hierarch of great importance was the Panchen Lama, a reincarnation of Amitābha Buddha. Theoretically of equal rank with the Dalai Lama, he was often subordinated to him, but after China had established supremacy over Tibet in the 18th century, it was Chinese policy to exploit their rivalry. At one time an important Lamaist hierarch was located in Urga (now Ulanbator), Outer Mongolia.

The sacred writings of Lamaism are called Kandjur (bKa-'gyur), "translation of precepts," in 108 volumes, mostly from the Sanskrit, and Tanjur (bsTan-'gyur), "translation of commentaries," comprising commentaries and various treatises, in 225 volumes.

See Also: BUDDHISM.

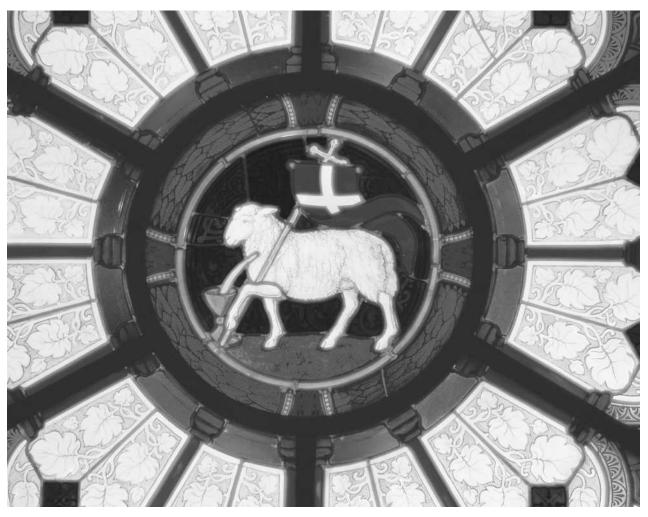

Bibliography: L. A. WADDELL, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 7:784–789. C. A. BELL, The Religion of Tibet (Oxford 1931). H. HOFFMANN, Die Religionen Tibets (Freiburg 1956). G. REGAMEY, "Die Religion Tibets," Christus und die Religionen der Erde, ed. F. KÖNIG (2d ed. Vienna 1916): 3:307–317.

[H. SERRUYS]

LAMB OF GOD

This subject is dealt with here first exegetically and then, on that basis, theologically. Finally, the iconography will be considered.

Exegesis. The origin of this title given to Christ (Jn 1.29–36) is difficult to determine. It can perhaps be traced to Isaiah ch. 53, where the Servant of Yahweh is compared to a lamb (v. 7), and Acts (8.32) applies this text explicitly to Christ. There it is said that He bears our sins

A Lamb of God stained glass window at the Chapel of the Holy Ghost Hospital. (@Dave Bartruff/CORBIS)

(Is 53.6, 11–12); but by itself this text is incapable of explaining the expression, for in John, Christ is not said to be like a lamb; He is the lamb; what is more, the lamb of God. He does not bear the sins of others; He takes them away. However, the entire account of the baptism of Christ, within the framework of which John places the proclamation made by the Baptist (cf. Jn 1.31-34 and Mt 3.16–17) directs one's search toward the Servant of Yahweh. The divine revelation, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," and the descent of the Spirit (Mt 3.16-17 and parallels) and Jn 1.34 (with the variant "he is the chosen one," which seems original) recall clearly the prophecy of the Servant of Yahweh, Is 42.1 [cf. O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, tr. S. Guthrie and C. Hall (rev. ed. Philadelphia 1963)]. C. F. Burney, following C. J. Ball, has pointed out that the Aramaic word ṭalya', which like the $\pi\alpha \hat{\imath}\varsigma$ of the Septuagint, signifies boy, young man, and servant, also signifies lamb. The studies of J. Jeremias render very plausible the explanation that the meaning of the expression can be found in the twofold signification of the word ṭalya' and that the original form of the expression was "Behold the Servant of God" (Cullmann, B. Gärtner, M. E. Boismard, R. Schnackenburg), a saying much easier to explain, coming from the lips of the Baptist, than the expression Lamb of God. B. Gärtner states that the Targum of Psalm 117(118) in fact gives to the Davidic Messiah the title to ṭalya', taken by turn in the twofold sense of servant and of lamb. All this would indicate that the Johannine account is Aramaic in origin, moreover that the translation of ṭalya' into ἀμνός was intentional and not the result of an error.

The meaning of the title is to be sought not in the concept that the Baptist may have had of the Messiah, since the expression as it came from his lips probably had another form; it is to be sought in the fourth Gospel. However, the fourth Gospel appears to a number of exegetes, with the evidence growing [cf. F. X. Durrwell, The Resurrection: A Biblical Study, tr. B. Sheed (New York 1960); B. Gärtner John 6 and the Jewish Passover (Lund 1959)], as a paschal Gospel. The symbolism underlying the title is that of the lamb of sacrifice, and not of the daily sacrifice, but of the paschal sacrifice. The final evocation of the paschal lamb (Jn 19.36), when the Evangelist's account reaches its culminating point, explains the proclamation at the beginning (1.29). The primitive liturgy (cf. 1 Cor 5.7–8), the coinciding of the death of Christ with the paschal feast of the Jews, probably contributed to giving this title to Christ.

Theology. For St. John the title of Lamb of God is of great theological importance. This springs from the fact that the whole Gospel account is enclosed between this proclamation of Jesus as lamb of God and the evocation of the prefigurative lamb (1.29 and 19.36); also from the fact that John emphasizes (18.28; 19.14, 31) the coincidence between the immolation of the prefigurative paschal lamb and the Hour of Christ when the destiny of Christ is accomplished and His whole being is revealed (8.28), and when He is presented to men as the object of their faith (3.14–15; 12.32; 19.35, 37). It can be concluded, then, that the paschal lamb was for St. John a privileged image to express the mystery of Christ.

Salvific Transcendence. In its form, the title is close to others in the fourth Gospel that express the transcendence of Christ. Just as Jesus is not like bread, a vine, a shepherd, etc., but indeed is the Bread, the Vine, the Shepherd, etc., so that no others can be so named, in the same way He is not only like a lamb, He is the Lamb. This transcendence is emphasized by the addition "of God," which expresses not only the divine origin and character (cf. "the bread from heaven," "the bread of God" 6.32–33), but also the sacrificial consecration in God. Christ is the victim of the true sacrifice. There is on this point as on others [cf. C. Spico, L'Épître aux Hébreux (Paris 1952) 1:109–138] a certain resemblance between Johannine thought and that of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

The transcendence of Christ is, according to St. John, essentially salvific, so that in Him one cannot separate the mystery of the Incarnation from that of the Redemption. Christ says: "I Am" (8.28, 58); but ordinarily He adds a predicate signifying that He Is for men (the bread, the vine, the resurrection and the life). The title Lamb of God makes it clear and precise that this salvific mystery is sacrificial. One can say that the mystery of Redemption, the paschal mystery, is for St. John inherent in that of the Incarnation.

Just as Christ is from the beginning "the bread from heaven," "the shepherd," etc., and just as He becomes so in plenitude only by His sacrifice (6.52; 10.11), so also

He is from the beginning called the lamb (1.29)—from the beginning there is in Him the sacrificial consecration (10.36)—but He becomes so in plenitude only in death. The salvific Incarnation is realized in plenitude only by passage through death, and it is as immolated that Christ continues forever when, in glory, the mystery of the salvific Incarnation has reached its plenitude (cf. Rv 5.6).

Sanctification in God. This title also sheds light on the nature of the redemptive sacrifice. The paschal rite was a sacrifice of communion (cf. 1 Cor 5.7–8); the meal was an essential element of it. Understood by St. John by means of the symbolism of the paschal lamb, the sacrifice of Christ is not presented in the manner of a substitution, where the victim bears the sins of others and expiates them by undergoing their punishment. Contrary to Isaiah 53.6, 11–12, it is not said that the Lamb bears but that He takes away sin. Just as, according to St. John, darkness is dispelled by the Word that is light, and death by communion with Him who is the bread of life, the resurrection, so also sin is destroyed by communion with the Lamb, by participation in the sanctity proper to His sacrifice.

For the sacrifice is, in the eyes of John, a sanctification in God (17.19). Sanctified from the beginning (10.36), Christ comes to the plenitude of His sanctification in His death (17.19), where He is caught up into the glory of God (13.32) and where He shares this sanctification with His own (17.19).

It is therefore vain to pose the question: Is it by His innocence (Lagrange) and by His holiness (Boismard) or rather is it by His sacrifice that the Lamb abolishes sin? It is certainly through His sacrifice, according to St. John, that sin is abolished (1 Jn 1.7; 2.2; 4.10), but in this sacrifice is the plenitude of the sanctification of Christ by God.

Sin, therefore, is abolished by the sanctity of Christ in His sacrifice and by communion with Him. So the Apocalypse shows the faithful washing their garments in the blood of the Lamb (7.14). Christ not only merits the pardon of sin, He is Himself the expiation (1 Jn 2.2; 4.10), that is, the abolition of sin. This is in conformity with the idea of the Old Testament, according to which it is the holiness of God that expiates the sins of men in the sacrifice. A confirmation that sin is expiated by Christ immolated and by communication with His holiness is found in the fact that the Lamb of God is characterized by the presence of the Holy Spirit in Him (1.29–34), that Christ is designated once again as the Lamb of God at the moment when from His opened side issued the water, symbol of the Holy Spirit (19.33-36; cf. 7.37-39), and that it is in the Spirit that sins are forgiven (1.33; 20.22-23).

The theology of the Lamb is taken up again in the Apocalypse. Heaven is the place proper to the sacrifice of the Lamb (5.6). Christ is there forever immolated (5.6). All that is said of Christ: Lord, judge, fullness of the Spirit of God, pastor of the Church and its spouse—all this is said of Him in so much as He is the lamb immolated. The paschal sacrifice belongs to His very being, and the faithful are saved by communion with this Lamb immolated.

Bibliography: R. SCHNACKENBURG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 6:768–769, bibliog. E. LOHSE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:218–219. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1297–99. M. E. BOISMARD, Du baptême à Cana (Paris 1953).

[F. X. DURRWELL]

Iconography. The symbol of the Lamb shows up very early in Christian iconography. Behind the representation, which underwent only slight modification throughout history, lies a wealth of theology. The lamb first appears, it seems, with representations of the Good Shepherd, but by the fourth century the lamb became an independent symbol, without the figure of Christ. Both the symbol and the idea behind it derive from Scripture: the eating of the paschal lamb and the saving power of its blood (Ex ch. 12); the comparison of the Servant of the Lord to a lamb (Is ch. 53); and John the Baptist's reference to Christ as the Lamb of God (Jn 1.29–36).

The symbolic lamb began to appear in the apses or façades of basilicas, on sarcophagi, and on smaller pieces of art. In ancient Christian portrayals of paradise one sees the lamb on the mountain, with four streams (the four Gospels) flowing to the four ends of the earth (SS. Cosmas and Damian, Rome). Frequently six lambs were added on either side, representing the Apostles or the faithful. In the apse of old St. Peter's, Rome, the lamb is depicted as in Rv 5.6–10, standing in a triumphant, redeeming position in front of the cross. In A.D. 692 a small restriction was placed on the symbolic representation of the lamb. The Council of Trulla, held in the Eastern Church, forbade the representation of the lamb to take the place of the body of Christ on the cross.

In the baptistery of the Lateran, one sees the lamb depicted as the source of the fruits of Baptism. The Lateran also shows the lamb, according to an image in the Revelation, resting on the scroll with seven seals, holding a victorious banner, and adored by the 24 elders and the four living creatures. All of these representations, with minor differences, are found in Italy, Spain, France, and Germany as far back as the fourth century. Somewhat later the lamb was associated with the holy sacrifice of the Mass and with the Passion by having the lamb appear with a chalice; this chalice is sometimes receiving a stream of blood from the wounded side of the lamb. The symbolic use of the lamb continued through the Middle Ages, but during this later period deterioration crept in. The lamb, for instance, became the base for pillars and doorposts or was pictured led by Mary as its shepherdess. Today the lamb symbol is modeled mostly upon very early types.

Gradually the lamb was also used in art forms and in other instruction media of the Church as a symbol of purity, humility, holy simplicity, patience, and still other virtues; e.g., St. Agnes is shown with the lamb (purity).

With regard to liturgical music and recitation, the term Lamb of God is prominent in the Latin rite. The lamb, apparently representing Christ as the victorious Redeemer, is cited in the Mass and in litanies. Some of these Mass texts reach as far back as the fourth century. In the Byzantine liturgy the sacramental bread bears the figure of the lamb; and in order to signify the sacrifice and death of the victim Christ, the lamb is cut into four parts. A popular sacramental is the AGNUS DEI (Latin for Lamb of God), wax blessed every seven years by the Pope. It has a very interesting history and is used as a reminder of God's special blessing.

In the Western Church as far back as the seventh century (Sacramentary of Bobbio) one finds a blessing of a lamb that was to be eaten at the Easter meal. The Rituale romanum contains the blessing of the lamb. In the Eastern Church there was some hesitation to accept this blessing of the lamb, but by the Middle Ages it was received into their rituals.

To appreciate the lamb symbol adequately, one must be acquainted with the nature and peculiar habits of the lamb. Unfortunately, many people today are almost entirely ignorant of these, as well as of the special mode of pasturing sheep in seminomadic areas like Palestine.

See Also: RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, 2; SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF SATISFACTION OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903—50) 1:576–585. V. H. ELBERN et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 6:766–768. R. SCHNACKENBURG, ibid. 768–769. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 1:877–905. Proceedings of the Precious Blood Study Week, 2 v. (Rensselaer, Ind. 1957–60), index s.v. "Lamb."

[V. M. OBERHAUSER]

LAMBACH, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey near the former Diocese of Passau, now Linz, in upper Austria, founded c. 1040 by Count Arnold II of Wels-Lambach for 12 secular canons, and placed under the patronage of the Assumption. In 1056 Arnold's second son, Bp. ADALBERO OF WÜRZBURG (1045–90), summoned BENEDICTINE monks from Münsterschwarzach. Lambach became a reform center that influenced ADMONT, MELK, SANKT LAMBRECHT, etc. In the 12th century Lambach developed a distinguished school of painting, writing, music, and theater that flourished into the baroque period. The monastery was a transshipment center for salt. In the 15th century the Melk reform was introduced at Lambach, Pontificals were granted to the abbot (1459), and Lambach monks were made abbots of Schotten in Vienna and NIEDERALTAICH. The abbey enjoyed close relations with the new Universities of Vienna and Salzburg. It suffered loss of holdings and decline of discipline because of schism and wars (especially in 1626 and 1632), despite generally competent abbots from 1585 to 1725. The Lambach monk Florentius Müller worked among London Catholics while chaplain to Prince Starhemberg. The extant abbey church dates from 1652-56, the monastic buildings from 1664. Lambach artists included Altomonte and the brothers Carlone and Koloman Felner (1818). Lambach was dissolved for two months in 1784. However, by the second half of the 19th century it was once again flourishing. It was dissolved by the National Socialists (1941–45). Today it conducts both a middle school and a school of agriculture and administers four parishes.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1542–43. K. HALLINGER, Gorze-Kluny, 2 v. (Studia anselmiana 24–25; 1951). W. LUGER, Die Benediktinerabtei Lambach (Linz 1952). S. LEIDINGER, 900 Jahre Lambach (Linz 1956). N. WIBIRAL et al., "Die Freilegungsarbeiten im ehemaligen Westchor der Stiftskirche von Lambach," Oesterreichische Zeitschrift für Kunst und Denkmalpflege 14 (1960) 1–24.

[G. SPAHR]

LAMBERT, LOUIS ALOYSIUS

Priest, editor, publicist; b. Charleroi, Pa., April 13, 1835; d. Newfoundland, N.J., Sept. 25, 1910. He attended St. Vincent's College, Latrobe, Pa., and the St. Louis archdiocesan theological seminary, Carondelet, Mo. After ordination on Feb. 11, 1859, for the Diocese of Alton, Ill., he did pastoral work in Cairo, Alton, and Shawneetown, Ill. Five months after the outbreak of the Civil War, Lambert enlisted as U.S. Army chaplain and saw action at Fts. Henry and Donelson and at the Battle of Shiloh before his resignation took effect on April 16, 1862. He returned briefly to Shawneetown and was reassigned to Cairo, where he held the pastorate of St. Patrick's church from 1863 to 1868.

With the permission of his bishop, he next went to New York to teach for the Paulist Fathers, whose community he considered joining. Deciding against this, he secured excardination from the Diocese of Alton on May 20, 1869, and was adopted by Bp. Bernard John MCQUAID as a priest of the Diocese of Rochester, N.Y. There he held posts as administrator and pastor. In 1877, while stationed at St. Mary's, Waterloo, NY, he founded the diocesan weekly Catholic Times, which he edited until 1880, when he became involved in a controversy with his ordinary, Bishop McQuaid. He was subsequently transferred to Scottsville, N.Y., where he was pastor of Assumption church until his death.

He founded and edited the Catholic Times of Philadelphia (1892-94) and edited the Freeman's Journal of New York (1895–1910), in which he renewed the controversy with McQuaid by highly literate (and often unfair) attacks. An able linguist, Lambert translated several works into English. One, Paul Merz's Thesaurus Biblicus, or Handbook of Scriptural Reference (Waterloo, NY 1800), was the first Catholic scriptural concordance published in the United States. Another of his translations was August Kerckhoff's Grammar of Volapük (New York 1888). His Notes on Ingersoll (Buffalo 1887) definitively refuted the then current rationalistic preachments of the "great agnostic," Robert Green Ingersoll (1822–99). These internationally popular books and his subsequent Christian Science before the Bar of Reason (New York 1908) inspired Lambert's fellow Catholics to call him the "American Newman." As a result he was much in demand as an essayist, lecturer, and literary editor. In 1892 the University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind., bestowed on him an honorary doctorate of laws.

Bibliography: Archives of The Catholic University of America. Archives of the Dioceses of Rochester and Belleville. The National Archives, Washington, D.C. A. H. GERMAIN, Catholic Military and Naval Chaplains, 1776–1917 (Washington, D.C. 1929). F. J. ZWIERLEIN, Life and Letters of Bishop McQuaid, 3 v. (Rochester 1925–27). G. N. SCHUSTER, Dictionary of Ameican Biography, ed. A. JOHNSON and D. MALONE, 20 v. (New York 1928–36; index 1937; 1st supplement 1944; 2nd supplement 1958) 10:557–558.

[R. F. MCNAMARA]

LAMBERT DE LA MOTTE, PIERRE

Missionary; b. La Boissière, France, Jan. 28, 1624; d. Juthia, Thailand, June 15, 1679. He was ordained Dec. 27, 1655, and went to Rome to take part with F. PALLU in negotiations for vicars-apostolic under the jurisdiction of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. With Pallu he founded the Paris Missions seminary in 1658. In 1659 he was made titular bishop of Beirut, vicar-apostolic of Cochin China, and apostolic administrator of southern China. He set out in 1660; crossed Egypt, Persia, and India on foot; and reached Siam in 1662. He and Pallu, finding the condition of the missions disheartening, prepared instructions for missionaries that were adopted by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. He founded a seminary in Siam and ordained two Vietnamese priests in 1668. Then he visited Tonkin (northern Vietnam), where he ordained four priests and held a synod to govern the parochial apostolate. He founded the congregation of the LOVERS OF THE HOLY CROSS for women in Vietnam (Amantes de la Croix, Dòng Mênh Thánh Giá) in 1670.

Bibliography: J. GUENNOU, Les Missions étrangères (Paris 1963).

[H. PROUVOST/EDS.]

LAMBERT OF MAASTRICHT, ST.

Bishop and martyr; d. Liège, Sept. 17, 705 or 706. Born of wealthy parents, Lambert grew up under the supervision of his uncle, Theodard of Maastricht, whom he succeeded as bishop in 672. Shortly afterward the incompetent Childeric II, king of Austrasia, was assassinated. In the upheaval that followed, Lambert fled to the monastery of STAVELOT while an intruder took his place as bishop. After seven years of exile, Lambert was restored to his see by the new mayor of the palace, Pepin II of Heristal. Later the bishop had to upbraid Pepin for an adulterous affair. In the conflict over the immunity of his church, Lambert was murdered by his adversary, Count Dodo. Popularly venerated as a martyr in France, Westphalia, and Holland, Lambert is honored as the patron of the city of Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany.

Feast: Sept. 17.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum September 5:518–617. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 9:361–364. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 2:4677–94. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:579–580. H. LERCLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 9.1:623–625; 10.1:955–963. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:758. J. DE BORCHGRAVE D'ALTENA et al., eds., Trésors d'art Saint Remacle, Saint Lambert (Stavelot 1968).

[J. E. LYNCH]

LAMBERT OF SAINT-OMER

Encyclopedist; d. c. 1125; A canon at Saint-Omer as his father, Onulf, had been before him, Lambert was the author of an encyclopedia of general knowledge, the Liber floridus (Patrologia Latina 163:1003-31), completed in 1120. His work is a compilation of extracts from authorities, both ancient and contemporary, usually unacknowledged; it embraces most fields of learning, including history, geography, mathematics, astronomy, natural history, grammar, and orthography. His sources included Pliny, Seneca, Publilius Syrus, Orosius, Macrobius, Paulinus of Nola, Jerome, Isidore, Gregory of Tours, Rabanus Maurus, Peter the Painter, Einhard, Bede, and others. The work has many illustrations, maps, plans, and genealogical trees. There is much repetition of information. Nothing is known of Lambert's career. He is sometimes confused with LAMBERT OF SAINT-BERTIN, who is certainly a separate identity, but the two may have belonged to the same monastery of Sithiu, i.e., SAINT-BERTIN.

Bibliography: The original MS of the Liber floridus is Ghent 92, s. xii. On the illustrations in this MS, see V. VAN DER HAEG-HEN, "Le Manuscrit gantois du Liber floridus et ses illustrations, XIIe siècle," Bulletijn der Maatschappij van Geschieden Oudheidkunde te Gent 16 (1908) 112–118. For other MSS, see Manitius 3:241–244. L. DUCHESNE, ed., Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–1892) 1:clxxxv-clxxxvii. L. V. DELISLE, "Notice sur les manuscrits du Liber floridus" in Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque nationale et autres bibliothèques 38.2 (1906) 577–791. J. M. DE SMET, "L'Enégète Lambert, écolâtre d'Utrecht," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 42 (1947) 103–110. B. SMALLEY, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (2d ed. Oxford 1952).

[P. B. CORBETT]

LAMBERT OF SAINT-BERTIN

Abbot; b. c. 1060; d. Saint-Bertin, June 22, 1125. Born of a noble family, Lambert entered the Abbey of SAINT-BERTIN c. 1070. There he taught grammar, philosophy, theology, and music. Having become abbot in 1095, he made energetic reforms in the monastery and brought it under the CLUNIAC REFORM. A contemporary account of his life (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores 15:946-953) records that he wrote sermons on the Old Testament; disputations on free will, predestination, and grace; and questiones on natural science. His letters to AN-SELM OF CANTERBURY are extant (Patrologia Latina 158:1083; 159:72, 171), as are the verses exchanged with REGINALD OF CANTERBURY [ed. F. Liebermann, Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 13 (1888) 528, 531-534]. The identification of Lambert with LAMBERT OF SAINT-OMER made by M. E. Taillar, J. Tessier, and R. Ceillier has been denied by L. Duchesne, L. Delisle, and M. Manitius, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters.

Bibliography: H. DE LAPLANE, Les Abbés de Saint-Bertin, 2 v. (Saint-Omer 1854–55). Liber pontificalis 1:clxxxv-clxxxvi. L. DELISLE, Notice sur les manuscrits du Liber floridus (Paris 1906). O. HOLDER-EGGER, Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 32 (1907) 524–525. O. BLED, "L'École bertinienne," Bulletin de la société des anti-quaires de la Morinie 14 (1923) 99–115. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 3:241–244.

[P. B. CORBETT]

LAMBERT OF SPOLETO, GERMAN EMPEROR

Ruled April 30, 892, to Oct. 15, 898; son of Guido III of Spoleto and the Lombard Princess Agiltrude; d. Marengo, Italy, in a hunting accident. Having been associated with his father as king of Italy in 891 and crowned emperor by Pope FORMOSUS in 892, he became sole ruler on his father's death in 894. From his father he inherited a conflict with Berengar I of Friuli. An expedition against him by Arnulf, the German emperor, in 895, prompted by an appeal from Formosus, resulted in the capture of Rome from Agiltrude, acting for her son. Arnulf was crowned emperor by Formosus but was incapacitated by illness and returned to Germany. The death of Formosus and an agreement with Berengar enabled Agiltrude and Lambert to re-enter Rome in 897. To satisfy the enemies of Formosus, Pope STEPHEN VI condemned and degraded the exhumed body of the dead pope in a macabre postmortem trial. Agiltrude and Lambert had left the city, and the measure of their responsibility for this profanation is still debated. In a papal election later that year Lambert pronounced in favor of pacification by supporting JOHN IX. The Synod of Ravenna in 898 affirmed Lambert's power over Rome and the STATES OF THE CHURCH and issued a series of reforming decrees, which he incorporated in a capitulary. An attempt at resistance by Adalbert of Tuscany was crushed.

Bibliography: P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale (774–1252) (Bologna 1947). G. FASOLI, I re d'Italia, 888–962 (Florence 1949). C. G. MOR, L'età feudale, 2 v. (Milan 1952–53). F. ZOEPFL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:759.

[C. E. BOYD]

LAMBERTENGHI OF COMO, GEREMIA, BL.

Priest of the Franciscan Third Order Regular, called the Martyr of the Cloister because of his exceptional practice of penance; b. of a noble family at Como, Italy, 1440; d. convent of Valverde (Forlí), Mar. 25, 1513. From early youth he showed devotion to Christ's Passion and a love of austerity. In his 20th year he entered the convent of St. Donato, near Como. After ordination, he was appointed to the office of preacher, vicar, and prior in various communities. His apostolic dedication to these duties did not diminish his observance of the rule nor decrease the intensity of his penances. It is recorded that he used an iron chain to discipline his body and often took his rest lying in a coffin through which he had driven 100 nails. There is testimony of his miraculous power before and after death. His body, still uncorrupt, now rests in the Cathedral of Forlí.

Bibliography: R. PAZZELLI, Il Terz'ordine Regolare di S. Francesco (Rome 1958).

[V. PETRICCIONE]

LAMBERTINI, IMELDA, BL.

Virgin; b. Bologna, Italy, c. 1321; d. near Bologna, May 12, 1333. Born of a noble family, she entered the Dominican cloister of Valdipietra near Bologna. Since she was under 12, then the required age for First Communion, her ardent request for Holy Communion was denied. On Ascension Day 1333, when the nuns received Communion, Imelda, then 11 years old, remained in her place. Suddenly, it was reported, the Sacred Host appeared above her head. The priest gave it to the child, whose First Communion was also her last, for she died in the rapture of her thanksgiving. She was beatified in 1826, and in 1910 was proclaimed the patroness of first communicants.

Feast: May 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 3:181–183. Daughters of St. Paul, Her Dream Came True; The Life of Bl. Imelda Lambertini (Boston 1967). Année dominicaine, Sept 2 (Lyon 1900) 527–545. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:301.

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

LAMBETH CONFERENCE

The consultative assembly of bishops of the entire Anglican Communion that are held at approximately tenyear intervals at Lambeth Palace, London, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The initiative for these gatherings came from the bishops of Canada, who were disturbed by the liberal theology of Essays and Reviews (1860) and of Bp. John Colenso who petitioned in 1865 for a council representative of Anglicans throughout the world. Despite initial misgivings, especially in England, Abp. Charles Longley of Canterbury agreed to convene an assembly, provided that it issued no declaration of faith and no canons or decisions binding on the Church, but confine itself to counsel and encouragement. Since its inauguration, the Lambeth Conference has been a purely informal and consultative gathering of all Anglican episcopal leaders without jurisdictional power; but they have contributed greatly to Anglican unity and cohesion. Their recommendations lack binding force until enacted by local hierarchies in local synods of convocations.

The authority of Lambeth within the Anglican Communion is entirely moral, in the sense of being advisory, rather than legislative and jurisdictional. For this reason the conference normally expresses its corporate mind on issues confronting the church in documents that are commended to Anglicans throughout the world for study. These statements are commonly taken into account by the legislative and policy-making bodies of the individual member churches as being expressive of the mind of the church.

The Lambeth Conference has been criticized by some Anglicans on two counts: it consists solely of bishops, and it meets only once every decade. Since its inception until the end of the 20th century, there have been thirteen conferences. The 1968 conference took positive action to provide a fully representative pan-Anglican body made up of bishops, clergy, and laity that could meet more frequently. The result was the establishment of the Anglican Consultative Council in October 1969. In 1988, for the first time the Lambeth Conference included the full Anglican Consultative Council and episcopal representatives from churches in communion with Canterbury, namely the churches of Bangladesh, North India, South India and Pakistan, and the Old Catholic Churches of the Union of Utrecht.

Bibliography: R. T. DAVIDSON, ed., The Lambeth Conferences of 1867, 1978 and 1888 (New York 1896). H. RYAN, "Lambeth '68, a Roman Catholic Theological Reflection," Theological Studies 29 (1968) 597–636. G. F. LYTLE, Lambeth Conferences Past and Present (Austin, Texas 1989). V. K. SAMUEL, and C. SUGDEN, Lambeth: A View from the Two Thirds World (London 1989).

[W.H. HANNAH/C. E. SIMCOX/EDS.]

LAMBETH QUADRILATERAL

The four articles stating, from the Anglican point of view, the essentials for a reunited Christian Church: acceptance of Scripture, the Apostles' and Nicene Creed, the two Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist, and "the historic Episcopate." It was first proposed by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the U.S. in its General Convention held in Chicago in 1886, and adopted by the LAMBETH CONFERENCE of 1888. There have been some variations in the wording of these points. The Lambeth Conference of 1888 declared that Scripture contained "all things necessary to salvation" and that the two Sacraments were ordained by Christ himself; the Chicago declaration of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the U.S., in its general convention of 1886, had omitted these qualifications. The four points must be understood in connection with other Anglican statements, among which was the report of the Joint Commission on Approaches to Unity in the American Episcopalian General Convention of 1949. It contained declarations on the Eucharistic sacrifice and on the other Sacraments as "sacramental rites of mysteries." Some Anglican statements also interpret acceptance of the Nicene Creed as involving recognition of the first six ecumenical councils. The subject of episcopacy has been discussed at subsequent Lambeth Conferences and other church unity gatherings.

Bibliography: R. T. DAVIDSON, The Five Lambeth Conferences (New York 1920). R. M. BROWN and D. H. SCOTT, eds., Challenge to Reunion (New York 1963). J. R. WRIGHT, ed. Essays on the centenary of the Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral 1886/88-1986/88: Quadrilateral at One Hundred (London 1988).

[B. LEEMING/EDS.]

LAMBING, ANDREW ARNOLD

Priest, author, historian; b. Manorville, Pa., Feb. 1, 1842; d. Wilkinsburg, Pa., Dec. 24, 1918. He was the third child of Michael Anthony and Anne (Shields) Lambing. He entered St. Michael Seminary, Glenwood, Pa., in 1863, and was ordained on Aug. 4, 1869, by Bp. Michael Domenec, CM, of Pittsburgh, Pa. First assigned to St. Francis College, Loretto, Pa., he later held appointments in Pennsylvania at Pittsburgh (1873-85) and Wilkinsburg (1885–1918). He was active in diocesan affairs, serving as fiscal procurator, censor of books, and president of the diocesan school board. As a writer, he contributed articles to newspapers and to such magazines as Ave Maria and American Ecclesiastical Review. His religious works that gained wide popularity included The Orphan's Friend (1875), The Sunday-School Teacher's Manual (1877), The Sacramentals (1892), Come Holy Ghost (1901), The Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary (1904), and Fountains of Living Water (1907). Lambing was an authority on early western Pennsylvanian history. He wrote A History of the Catholic Church in the Dioceses of Pittsburgh and Allegheny (1880), which, with its critical essay on sources, was a landmark in American Catholic historiography. He founded (1884) the Ohio Valley Catholic Historical Society, the first organization of its kind. In July 1884 he edited the first American Catholic historical quarterly, Historical Researches in Western Pennsylvania, Principally Catholic, retitled American Catholic Historical Researches (1886). He also translated The Baptismal Register of Fort Duquesne, 1754–1756 (1885); contributed to History of Allegheny County (1889) and Standard History of Pittsburgh (1898); helped to edit A Century and a Half of Pittsburgh and Her People (1908); and wrote Brief Sketch of St. James' Roman Catholic Church, Wilkinsburg, Pa. (n.d.) and Foundation Stones of a Great Diocese (1912). In 1915 Lambing was elevated to the rank of domestic prelate.

Bibliography: M. M. HAMMILL, The Expansion of the Catholic Church in Pennsylvania (Pittsburgh 1960).

[M. C. SCHROEDER]

LAMBRUSCHINI, LUIGI

Cardinal, papal secretary of state; b. Sestri Levante (Genova), Italy, May 16, 1776; d. Rome, May 12, 1854. After completing his early studies at S. Margherite Ligure, he joined the BARNABITES and took his vows (Nov. 18, 1794). His philosophical studies were made at Macerata and his theological course at Rome, but the installation of the Roman Republic caused him to transfer to Genoa. Subsequent to his ordination (Jan. 1, 1799), he taught in various colleges of the Barnabites. In 1814 he began a career of intense activity in the Roman Curia. He was appointed consultor (August 1814) and then secretary (March 1816) in the Congregation of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. As theological consultor he collaborated with the secretary of state Cardinal Ercole CONS-ALVI in concluding concordats with Tuscany (1815) and Naples (1818) and in many other ecclesiastical matters of special importance. As vicar-general for Cardinal Francesco Fontana, he helped restore Barnabite colleges suppressed during the Napoleonic epoch in Italy. He was appointed archbishop of Genoa (1819) and nuncio to France (November 1826), while retaining the See of Genoa until 1830. In the Paris nunciature (1827–31) he demonstrated decisively his opposition to LIBERALISM and to popular sovereignty. He was opposed to the July Revolution and remained loyal to the Bourbons, but he was hostile toward the house of Orléans. The new French government demanded his recall (1831).

Upon returning to Rome, Lambruschini, who had meanwhile been named titular archbishop of Beirut (July 5, 1830), was created a cardinal (Sept. 30, 1831). He became prefect of the Congregation of Regular Discipline (1832) and then prefect of the Congregation of Studies (1835). From 1832 he served also in the Congregation of

Andrew Arnold Lambing. (Archive Photos, Inc.)

Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. In January 1836 GREGORY XVI appointed him secretary of state, a post he held until the pope's death (June 1, 1846). At the papal conclave in 1846 Lambruschini received 15 votes in the first ballot. PIUS IX selected him as a member of the Congregation of State. Lambruschini also conducted the diplomatic arrangements with Russia for the concordat signed Aug. 3, 1847.

Toward the end of 1848 he fled Rome for Naples, where he was often consulted by Pius IX, who was in exile at Gaeta. After the fall of the short-lived Roman Republic, Lambruschini returned to Rome and served as prefect of the Congregation of Rites, secretary of briefs, librarian of the Roman Church, and bishop of Porto and S. Rufina, and of Civitavecchia. His role was very important in the preparation of the decree defining the Immaculate Conception (1854).

Lambruschini's knowledge of philosophy and theology was vast. He showed himself always an intransigent conservative and a strenuous defender of the Church's doctrines and of the Holy See's rights. He did not, however, comprehend contemporary problems. He realized the need for better education of the clergy, but he did not understand how the clergy could be dedicated to the instruction and education of all the faithful. In general he mistrusted all innovations in cultural, spiritual, ecclesiastical, political, and social areas.

Bibliography: L. LAMBRUSCHINI, La mia nunziatura di Francia, ed. P. PIRRI (Bologna 1934). A. GIAMPAOLO, "La preparazione politica del cardinale L. . . ," Rassegna storica del Risorgimento 18 (1931) 81–163. G. BOFFITO, Scrittori Barnabiti, 4 v. (Florence 1933–37) 2:312–336. J. GRISAR, "Die Allokution Gregors XVI vom 10. Dez. 1837," in Gregorio XVI Miscellanea Commemorativa, 2 v. (Rome 1948) 2:441–560. P. DROULERS, "La Nonciature de Paris et les troubles sociaux-politiques sous la Monarchie de juillet," in Saggi storici intorno al Papato dei professori della Facoltà di storia ecclesiastica (Miscellanea historiae pontificiae 21; Rome 1959) 401–463. L. M. MANZINI, Il cardinale L. Lambruschini (Studi e Testi 203; 1960).

[L. PASZTOR]

LAMBTON, JOSEPH, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. 1569 at Malton, Yorkshire, England; d. July 24, 1592 (?), at Newcastle-on-Tyne. This second son of Thomas Lambton and his wife Katharine Birkhead of West Brandon, Durham, studied at the English College in Rheims (1584–89) and in Rome (1589–92). Ordained at age 23 in 1592, he was sent to the English Mission and was arrested upon landing at Newcastle with Bl. Edward WATERSON. As was usual for the execution of a popish priest, he was hung, but cut down alive before the final phase of the sentence: drawing and quartering. The reprieved felon who acted as his hangman refused to complete the sentence, which was at last carried out by a Frenchman practicing as a surgeon at Kenton. Lambton was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast: July 27; May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: Catholic Record Society's Publications (London, 1905–), V, 212, 228, 231, 293. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LAMENNAIS, HUGUES FÉLICITÉ ROBERT DE

French priest, writer, philosopher, apologist for ultramontanism, and pioneer of Catholic liberalism; b.

Saint-Malo (Ille-et-Vilaine), France, June 19, 1782; d. Paris, Feb. 27, 1854.

Early Career. He came from a well-to-do, uppermiddle-class family of Brittany. His grandfather added to the family name the title de La Mennais. Félicité signed his name F. de La Mennais until his alignment with the democratic movement led him to adopt the signature F. Lamennais. During his early years he steeped himself in the works of ROUSSEAU and other rationalistic authors of the French ENLIGHTENMENT, and became indifferent to religion. The influence of his brother Jean de LAMENNAIS was instrumental in restoring his Catholic faith (1804). Félicité began a serious private study of religious problems. In collaboration with his brother he wrote Réflexions sur l'état de l'Église en France au XVIIIe siècle (1809) and Tradition de l'Église sur l'institution des évêques (1814). He was ordained in 1816 without attending a seminary. Thereupon he devoted himself to apologetic studies with the aim of restoring to the Church the selfconfidence it had lost during the FRENCH REVOLUTION. He intended also to provide a religious basis for civil society in the spirit of Joseph de MAISTRE, Louis de BON-ALD, and other defenders of tradition. Both purposes were evident in his widely acclaimed Essai sur l'indifférence en matière de religion (4 v. 1817-23) in which he claimed that certitude must be sought in the raison générale or sens commun, the common conviction of men in general. This norm he valued as a participation in the divine omniscience and, therefore, infallible. A "natural" belief in the testimony of humanity, according to this outlook, is the basis of certitude (see TRADITIONALISM). Lamennais further asserted that the highest expression of truth comes from the Church. This reasoning was defective because it confused cause with effect and concluded that certitude for the individual results from the "common sense," whereas the "common sense" results from the totality of individual certitudes. Despite this shortcoming the book provided a powerful attack on widespread religious indifference. The author's fame spread quickly throughout Europe.

La Chesnaie, a country house acquired in 1799 by the two brothers, was the center from which Félicité diffused his ideas. He began there a campaign to restore society from a state that seemed to him to be verging on dissolution. In 1828 he founded the short-lived Congregation of St. Peter, designed to inaugurate a new type of religious institute more flexible in its organization than existing religious orders. It combined a broader outlook on the world with a training, considered better suited to modern needs, that introduced members to the founder's ideas concerning the revival of Christianity.

Catholic Liberalism. From his study of history Lamennais became convinced that union with the civil power does not aid religion. He concluded that a Catholic revival would occur only when the Church was liberated from dependence on the state and its Bourbon rulers. Soon he thought of allying Catholicism with liberalism (see LIBERALISM, RELIGIOUS). In his book De la religion considérée dans ses rapports avec l'ordre politique et civil (2 v. 1825–26) his views on the proper relation between the spiritual and temporal powers opposed those of GALLICANISM and upheld those of ULTRAMONTANISM. A second book, Des progrès de la révolution et de la guerre contre l'Église (1829), insisted that the Church utilize the fundamental liberties granted by the government in the charter and abandon all claims to a privileged position, thereby accepting, at least de facto, the liberal notion of the state instead of the traditional Christian one.

The revolution of 1830 in France convinced Lamennais of the correctness of his ideas. To propagate them he started (1830) a newspaper, L'Avenir, which became the voice of Catholic liberalism. Its motto was "God and Liberty." GERBET, GUÉRANGER, LACORDAIRE, MON-TALEMBERT, ROHRBACHER, and other disciples of Lamennais were on the distinguished list of collaborators. In his belief that liberty and Christianity were equally necessary, Lamennais appealed to both liberals and Catholics to accept "everybody's right to do anything that is not against right." L'Avenir sought complete religious liberty, freedom for the Church in education, freedom of the press and of association, universal suffrage, and governmental decentralization. Basing its stand on the legal one of common law, even where the Church's rights were concerned, L'Avenir advocated complete separation of Church and State. It held that the state must keep aloof from all religious groups and exercise no authority over them, but must respect the liberty of each of them. As a result the French CONCORDAT OF 1801 should be abolished, episcopal nominations left to the Church, and the clergy removed from the public payroll. L'Avenir publicized a campaign for educational and religious liberty organized by the Agence générale pour la défense de la liberté religieuse, founded by Lamennais in 1828. The intent was to bring before the civil courts every encroachment on the Church's liberty.

L'Avenir was concerned with such delicate problems, and its harsh denunciations of opposing views aroused the hostility of the government and the bishops, most of whom were Gallicans who owed their appointments to the provisions of the concordat. Several bishops publicly opposed some methods of L'Avenir, such as open controversy and recourse to trials in the civil courts, and some of its ideas, such as those on liberty, democracy, popular sovereignty, and complete separation of Church and State. Thereupon the number of subscribers to L'Avenir declined rapidly.

Condemnation. With a crisis inevitable Lamennais, Lacordaire, and Montalembert departed (December 1831) for Rome to submit their program to the pope. After a formal audience with GREGORY XVI, the trio returned to France, leaving behind for examination a memoir that exposed their ideals. Meanwhile several French bishops had forwarded to Rome a document called the "Censure of Toulouse," which requested the condemnation of certain propositions extracted from the writings of Lamennais. The French and Austrian governments also applied pressure on Rome to gain a condemnation of doctrines and activities that were regarded as subversive of the state. Notwithstanding this pressure the Vatican conducted a more careful study than Lamennais realized. At its conclusion Gregory XVI issued the encyclical Mirari vos (Aug. 15, 1832); its warnings against the evils of the age contained implicitly a censure of L'Avenir. In a letter to Lamennais Cardinal PACCA revealed that the Holy See was grieved with the editors mainly because: (1) they had taken it upon themselves to deal publicly with very delicate questions that should be handled only by the heads of the Church and the State; (2) their doctrines on civil and political liberty tended of their nature to foment a spirit of revolt; (3) their views on liberty of worship and of the press were exaggerated and contrary to the Church's teachings and practice; and (4) their suggestion of collaboration between Catholics and all who wanted to work for liberty was most disturbing to the pope.

The Roman censure was justifiable because L'Avenir failed to make the necessary distinctions in its defense of complete separation of Church and State. The LIBERAL-ISM with which an alliance was sought regarded religion as merely a personal question, a subjective matter; and this outlook led inevitably to RELATIVISM and INDIFFER-ENTISM. The term liberalism recalled to Catholic minds the excesses of the French Revolution; yet Lamennais failed to distinguish between the true and the false in liberal ideology. He neglected also to make essential reservations in proclaiming his alliance with the liberals. L'Avenir's editors did not accept the philosophical bases of secular liberalism or the indifferentism to which Mirari vos reduced these bases, but they gave the impression of doing so by making the concessions they did and by taking positions that led logically to what was legitimately objectionable in the liberal standpoint. This impression was strengthened by the polemical expressions utilized by the editors and by the failure to disassociate the paper's views on liberty and democracy from the violently anti-Catholic, secular bias that characterized many champions of these ideals.

It was a profoundly disappointed Lamennais who drafted an act of submission on behalf of the editors of L'Avenir and of the council of the Agence générale (Sept. 10, 1832), but it cannot be proved that this submission was insincere. During the following two years, however, Lamennais changed his attitude toward the papacy and transferred his campaign to the purely secular level by avoiding the theological aspects of questions. Contributing to his subsequent tragedy was the inconsiderate attitude of Bishops D' ASTROS and De Lesquen. Lamennais was required to reiterate his submission four more times. Finally he became embittered and abandoned all priestly functions (January 1834).

Four months later he published Paroles d'un croyant, which bitterly denounced political tyranny. The book exercised a baneful influence despite its condemnation in the encyclical Singulari nos (July 15, 1834) as undermining the entire civil order. In Affaires de Rome (1836–37) Lamennais made a serious but incomplete attempt to justify himself. The book was placed on the Index (Feb. 14, 1837). By this time Lamennais had abandoned the Church and his former associates had broken with him. Five more of his works were also placed on the Index between 1838 and 1846.

Last Years. The solution of the growing social question and the defense of democracy were his chief concerns in his remaining years. Regeneration of society had, to be sure, ever been his constant driving force; it gave consistency to the seeming contradictions in the various periods of his career. He was not strictly a socialist even though his views at times approached socialism. His conviction was that mankind was approaching a regime in which the working class would predominate. He sympathized with the proletariat and believed in its moral superiority over other classes. After the revolution of 1848 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, but the effect of his brief term in the legislature was disillusionment. Soon he retired from public life. His last important publication was a translation of Dante's Divine Comedy; its lengthy introduction may be considered his spiritual and intellectual testament. His faith deteriorated into a strange mixture of Christianity, pantheism, and naturalism. He died unreconciled with the Church.

Appraisal. Scholarly studies in mid-20th century have tended to recognize the great merit and significance of Lamennais in many fields. Despite the failure of his priestly vocation and the imprudence and inaccuracy of some of his proposals, he has exercised profound influence on Catholicism. He supplied a new impetus to Catholic apologetics, demonstrated the need for an improved program of clerical studies, and did more than anyone else to popularize ultramontanism and to weaken Gallicanism among the French clergy. His attempt to obtain the active participation of the laity in the Church's defense was laudable. It was with him that the reconciliation of the Church with democracy began. He pioneered in social Catholicism by seeking to satisfy popular longings for social justice. In his impetuosity he went too far and too fast. Several of his ideas reappeared, however, in mitigated form later in the 19th century. Outside France Lamennais exercised considerable influence as an apologist. His notions of liberty were utilized by the Church later in its struggles for emancipation. Among the more prominent Catholics influenced by Lamennais were DÖLLINGER and GÖrres in Germany, GIOBERTI and ROSMINISERBATI in Italy, BALMES and DONOSO CORTÉS in Spain, Malou and Van Bommel in Belgium, J. G. LeSage ten Broek in the Netherlands, WISEMAN in England, and O'CONNELL in Ireland.

Bibliography: H. TALVART and J. PLACE, Bibliographie des auteurs modernes de langue française (1801-) (Paris 1928-) 11:167-229. F. DUINE, Essai de bibliographie de F. R. de Lamennais (Paris 1923). Works. Oeuvres complètes, 12 v. in 6 (Paris 1836-37). There is a mediocre Eng. tr. of the first v. of the Essay on Indifference in Matters of Religion by H. E. STANLEY (London 1895); Oeuvres posthumes, ed. E. D. FORGUES, 3 v. (Paris 1856–59); Paroles d'un croyant: 1833 (Paris 1834), critical ed. Y. LE HIR (Paris 1949), Eng. The People's Prophecy, tr. C. REAVELY (London 1943); Articles de l'Avenir, 7 v. (Louvain 1831-32); Essai d'un système de philosophie catholique (Paris 1834), critical ed. Y. LE HIR (Rennes 1954); Correspondance inédite entre L. et le baron de Vitrolles, ed. E. FORGUES (Paris 1886); Lettres inédites de L. à Montalembert, ed. E. FORGUES (Paris 1898). C. F. MONTALEMBERT, Lettres à L., ed. G. GOYAU and P. DE LALLEMAND (Paris 1932). Literature. C. BOUTARD, Lamennais: Sa vie et ses doctrines, 3 v. (Paris 1905–13). F. DUINE, L.: Sa vie, ses idées, ses ouvrages (Paris 1922). P. DUDON, L. et le Saint-Siège (1820–1834) (Paris 1911). A. R. VIDLER, Prophecy and Papacy: A Study of L., the Church and the Revolution (New York 1954), excellent. F. J. VRIJMOED, L. avant sa défection, et la Néerlande catholique (Paris 1930). C. CAR-COPINO, Les Doctrines sociales de L. (Paris 1942). Y. LE HIR, L. écrivain (Paris 1948). R. REMOND, L. et la démocratie (Paris 1948). J. B. DUROSELLE, Les Débuts du catholicisme social en France, 1822-1870 (Paris 1951). A. DANSETTE, Religious History of Modern France (New York 1961) v.1. A. GAMBARO, Sulle orme del L. in Italia (Turin 1958-). J. R. DERRÉ, L.: Ses amis et le mouvement des idées à l'époque romantique (Paris 1962). C. CONSTANTIN, "Libéralisme catholique," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables Générales 1951-) 9.1:506-629. A. FONCK, ibid. 8.2:2473-2526 I. DANIELE, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1786-88.

[R. BOUDENS]

LA MENNAIS, JEAN MARIE ROBERT DE, VEN.

Religious founder; b. Saint-Malo (Ille-et-Vilaine), France, Sept. 8, 1780; d. Ploërmel (Morbihan), Dec. 26, 1860. Jean, the brother of Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS, was ordained in 1804. After serving as curate and teacher, he retired because of ill health to La Chesnaie, a country home belonging to his family. There he guided his brother toward ecclesiastical studies and collaborated with him by doing the research for Reflexions sur l'état de l'Église en France au XVIIIe siècle (1808) and Tradition de l'Église sur l'institution des évêques (1814), and the translation for Guide spirituel (1809). In 1814 Jean became secretary to Bishop Caffarelli of Saint-Brieuc and then vicar-general of the diocese. He was also active in organizing and conducting parish missions and in starting confraternities. In 1819 he founded a group of teaching brothers that joined in 1820 with another group, founded also in Brittany in 1816 by Gabriel DESHAYES, to form the BROTHERS OF CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION OF PLOËRMEL. Until his death Jean administered this congregation and the Daughters of Providence of Saint-Brieuc, which he founded in conjunction with Marie Anne Cartel (1818). Called to Paris in 1822 as vicar-general of the grand almoner of France, he participated in the nomination or transfer of some 40 bishops, but repeatedly declined to accept the episcopal dignity for himself.

After returning to Brittany (1824) La Mennais centered his educational and other apostolic activities in Ploërmel. He founded the Priests of St. Méen (1824), which soon became the Congregation of St. Peter, and placed his brother in charge of it (1828). Félicité's apostasy terminated the brief existence of this congregation and caused Jean unwarranted humiliations as well as personal sorrow, but it did not curb his apostolic labors. He guided François Mazellier with his congregation, which fused with the MARIST BROTHERS in 1841. He acted also as adviser to Jacques Dujarié and Basil MOREAU in the founding of the Holy Cross Brothers. His cause for beatification was introduced in 1911 and the antepreparatory congregation on his virtues was held in 1946.

Bibliography: A. P. LAVEILLE, Jean-Marie de La Mennais (1780–1860), 2 v. (Paris 1903). A. MERLAUD, Jean-Marie de La Mennais (Paris 1960).

[E. G. DROUIN]

LAMENT, BOLESLAWA MARIA, BL.

Foundress of the Missionary Sisters of the Holy Family; b. July 3, 1862, Lowicz, Poland; d. Jan.29, 1946, Bialystak, Poland. Lament is remembered for persevering in charity during difficult times. She began her work by establishing organizations in her home town to care for the ill and abandoned, which led to the founding of the Missionary Sisters of the Holy Family (1905). The sisters soon spread to St. Petersburg, Mohilev, and Zytomierz. The turmoil of World War I and subsequent civil unrest forced Lament to reestablish her missions three times. Before her death the congregation extended to Ven. Jean Marie Robert De La Mennais.

Pinsk, Vilnius, and Bialystak. Long before the Second Vatican Council, Lament labored for Christian unity. She was beatified at Boleslawa, Poland by John Paul II, June 5, 1991.

Bibliography: B. LAMENT, Wybór pism Boleslawy Lament, ed. R. J. BAR (Warsaw 1976).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LAMENTABILI

A decree of the Holy Office (July 3, 1903), approved in forma communi by Pius X (July 4), which lists 65 condemned propositions. These cover, such areas as the Church's right to interpret Scripture, Biblical inspiration, the historicity of the Gospels, the meaning of revelation, the preservation of Christology, the fact of the Resurrection, the origin of the Church and the Sacraments from Christ, the objectivity of dogma, and dogma's harmony with history. Modernism, the movement aimed at, was officially so named in the encyclical PASCENDI (Sept. 8, 1907). Some of the propositions have a sense not intended by many Modernist writers. But the decree purposely remains on an impersonal level, and the propositions are condemned precisely in the sense in which they are stated. The decree gives no precise qualifications to the various assertions beyond the term "errors." The carefully worded propositions are by no means as conservative as a cursory reading might infer. Many of the condemnations contain echoes of a memoir on the writings of LOISY prepared for Cardinal Richard of Paris to be submitted to the Holy Office. It is generally agreed that certain of the propositions also reflect the writings of G. TYRRELL, E. LE ROY, and A. HOUTIN.

The 'wailing wall' in Jerusalem. The old orthodox Jews are praying and teaching the youngsters the Lamentations on Jeremiah. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sedis 40 (1907) 470–478. H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖNMETZER (Freiburg 1932) 3401–66. Eng. tr. V. A. YZERMANS, All Things in Christ (Westminster, Md. 1954). J. RIVIÈRE, Le Modernisme dans l'Èglise (Paris 1929).

[J. J. HEANEY]

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF

This book appears in the Vulgate (Vulg) after Jeremiah, but in the Greek Septuagint it is usually found after ch. 5 of Baruch. In Hebrew tradition it is the fifth book of "The Writings," and is entitled "How" (the book's first word).

Author. Scholars are unanimous today in denying its authorship to Jeremiah. In the past many attributed it to him because of the lamentations he wrote for Josiah (2 Chr 35.25), but neither the style nor the contents reflect his authorship. Many differences exist between Jeremiah and Lamentations, e.g., in Jer. 37.7 the Prophet knew that Egypt could not help Israel, but the author of Lam 4.17 records his disappointed hope in Egypt's aid. The five poems were very likely not even written by the same author. They reflect the conditions in Judah during the period following the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. and received their present form before Jerusalem's restoration.

Form and Content. The first four Lamentations are studied literary creations, acrostic in form and having a peculiar rhythm characteristic of the $g\hat{e}n\hat{a}$ (elegy or dirge), each line having three accented syllables followed after a pause by two more. The fifth Lamentation is a supplication with a three-plus-three meter and in the Vulg is entitled The Prayer of the Prophet Jeremiah.

The first four poems have an acrostic form, i.e., the first word of each verse begins with a consecutive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The fifth poem has as many verses as the letters in the alphabet, but is not acrostic. The first three poems have three-line stanzas, but the fourth has two-line stanzas. Each line of each stanza in the third poem begins with the same letter, i.e., three lines with aleph in the first stanza, three with beth in the second, etc. The 16th letter (\dot{a} yin) and the 17th letter ($p\bar{e}$) are reversed in ch. 2–4. This alphabetic confusion is an indication that the poems were written independently, and when they were compiled they had already a form so fixed as to preclude any correction.

The acrostic form was used as a pedagogic device, symbolizing completeness and suggesting the totality of grief and sorrow for sin, and thus instilling hope. It may also have served a mnemonic purpose.

Following H. Gunkel's analysis of Hebrew psalmody, three literary types are found in Lamentations, the communal lament, the individual lament, and the funeral dirge. The first, second, and fourth poems are essentially funeral dirges; the fifth poem is a communal lament, while the third, while resembling a personal lament similar to Jeremiah's "Confessions" (e.g., Jer 11.18–12.6), contains elements also of the communal lament. The national calamity that struck Judah in 587 B.C. required all the resources of the poet to express his emotion. He therefore sometimes used all three types in the same poem. Thus in the funeral dirges of ch. 1, 2, and 4 there are also elements of the communal and the personal lament.

The dirges express the destitution of Jerusalem and Judah after the ravages of the Babylonian conquest. The poems contrast in graphic images the present humiliation and devastation with past glory and favor. They indict the priests and Prophets for their poor leadership in failing to warn Judah of her sin and coming judgment. Suffering is shown as a purifying agent for Israel's faith and as leading the Israelites to a consciousness of their sin.

Bibliography: Commentaries. G. RICCIOTTI (Turin 1924). M. HALLER (Tübingen 1940). A. F. KNIGHT (Torch Bible Comment; London 1955). E. J. CROWLEY (Pamphlet Bible Ser. 29; New York 1962). A. GELIN (Bible de Jérusalem, 43 v., each with intro. by the tr. [Paris 1948–54]; 23; 1951). A. GELIN and A. S. HERBERT in Peake's Comment, on the Bible, ed. M. BLACK and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1962) 563–567. Literature. A. GELIN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 5:237–251. N. K. GOTTWALD, Studies in the Book of Lamentations (Chicago 1954).

[C. MCGOUGH]

LAMORMAINI, WILHELM

Jesuit administrator and teacher; b. Duchy of Luxembourg, Dec. 29, 1570; d. Vienna, Feb. 22, 1648. He received his doctorate at Prague, entered the Society of Jesus in 1590, and was ordained in 1596. From 1600 he taught philosophy and theology at Graz; he became rector of the Jesuit college there in 1614. He was in Rome between 1621 and 1623 and then went to Vienna to become father confessor and spiritual counselor to the Emperor FERDINAND II. As such, he played a significant role in conjunction with Ferdinand's efforts to renew Hapsburg power and Catholic strength in the Holy Roman Empire, in particular with respect to the administration of the Edict of RESTITUTION (1629) and the elimination of Duke Albrecht von WALLENSTEIN in 1634. After the death of Ferdinand in 1637, Lamormaini became rector of the University in Vienna, and between 1643 and 1645 he was provincial of the Austrian province of the Society of Jesus. There he was noted for encouraging the growth of Jesuit institutions in the Empire and strengthening the Church in the Hapsburg lands. Part of his biography of the emperor, Ferdinand II, Romanorum Imperatoris virtutes, was published in 1638.

Bibliography: A. POSCH, "Zur Tätigkeit und Beurteilung Lamormains," Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung 63 (1955) 375–390; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:769. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:1428–31.

[T. T. HELDE]

LAMPLEY, WILLIAM, BL.

Lay martyr; b. probably at Gloucester, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered there, Feb. 12, 1588. He was tried for persuading some of his relatives to "popery," but offered leniency if he would conform to the new religion. Upon his refusal he was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, an unusual punishment for a layman. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). D. DE YEPES, Historia Particular de la persecución de Inglaterra (Madrid 1599).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LAMPS AND LIGHTING, EARLY CHRISTIAN

Few exact data exist regarding the use of lamps and lighting in the primitive Christian house churches (see BA-SILICA); but two elements were present: (1) the use of artificial light for utilitarian or prudential reasons during the night vigil services and the evening liturgies as indicated in 1 Cor 11.21; need to repudiate pagan calumnies concerning debauchery at Christian worship services. (2) Light was employed also for specifically liturgical purposes. The first element accounts for the instance reported in Acts 20.7–8, and the frequent symbolicohomiletical references to lighting equipment in Rv 1.12; 4.5; 11.4 imply the second element.

When worship services began to be held in the CATA-COMBS, the two elements were combined—to honor the martyrs and to supply constant illumination. The utilitarian and liturgical elements are succinctly combined in the phrase in the Testament of Our Lord: "all places should be lighted both for symbolism and for reading." For this purpose small terra-cotta lamps, plain or decorated with Christian symbols, were used, as is attested by the numerous discoveries in the catacombs.

The transition to a daytime use of lights no longer serving any utilitarian purpose at liturgical functions was a gradual one. There is some evidence of a protest among the 4th-century Fathers against a practice disturbingly redolent of pagan customs and unjustified by need or usefulness (Lactantius, Institut. Div., 6.2; Jerome, Contra Vigilantium, 6; Gregory of Nazianzus, Orat., 5.35).

An inventory of the furnishings of the church of Cirta, dating from the early 4th century, lists seven silver lamps, two chandeliers, seven small brass candelabra with lamps, and 11 lamps with chains to hang them by. Lamps and chandeliers began to be presented to individual churches in the early 4th century (Liber pontificalis 1: 173–176).

The Constantinian Peace of the Church (313) and the subsequent enhancement of the status of Christian churches brought a great development in lighting. PAULINUS OF NOLA and PRUDENTIUS are most valuable informants. Paulinus speaks of a perpetual light (continuum scyphus argenteus aptus ad usum; Patrologia Latina 61:539). This source from which all lamps could readily be lighted when desired had a utilitarian purpose. It also served as watch light against thieves and cannot be considered as indicative of a special cult of the Blessed Sacrament. Paulinus himself introduced colored candles whose papyrus wick gave off a heady perfume while burning (Patrologia Latina 61:467). Prudentius comments enthusiastically on the richness of the lighting in Christian churches (Patrologia Latina 69:819, 829). Constantine I presented to the Lateran two sets of seven 10-foot bronze candelabra and hanging coronae (phari, canthari, stantarea) with as many as 120 dolphin-shaped branches, each supporting one or more lamps (Liber pontificalis 1:173–176).

Jerome speaks of the "custom, through all the churches of the East, that when the Gospels are to be read, lights are kindled, though the sun is already shining, not indeed to dispel darkness but to show a token of joy" (Contra Vigilantium 7). Eusebius of Caesarea indicates the use of candles at funeral ceremonies when he writes that Constantine's body lay in state and "they lighted candles on golden stands around it . . ." (Vita Const. 4.66); and Constantius's Vita S. Germani says that at the funeral of this 5th-century bishop of Auxerre "the multitude of lights eclipsed the rays of the sun and maintained their brightness even through the day" (20.24). The burning of candles and lamps before martyrs' relics probably developed from this funeral custom and was already practiced in Jerome's day (Contra Vigilantium 6).

All early representations of the Last Supper show a lamp hanging over the table; and the Jerusalem pilgrim (c. 550), author of the Breviarius, was shown the alleged original. The Syrian Narsai (d. 512) has a description of the liturgy remarking that "the altar stands crowned with beauty and splendor and upon it is the Gospel of life and the adorable wood . . . the censors are smoking, the lamps shining" [R. H. Connolly, Liturgical Homilies of Narsai (Cambridge 1909) 12]. By this time, use of lamps and candles around, but apparently not actually on, the altar had become universal.

In the course of the 5th century, bronze began to be substituted for more precious metals; but the ecclesiastical lighting equipment was among the last to make the substitution.

See Also: LIGHT, LITURGICAL USE OF.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CARROLL, H. LECLERQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 2.2:1834–42; 3.1:210–215; 4.2:1726–30. A. WECKWERTH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:990–991; Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 69 (1958) 71–76. H. SCHNELL, Das Münster, v.1 (Münster 1947) 103-.

[A. G. GIBSON]

LAMY, BERNARD

Oratorian philosopher and theologian; b. Le Mans, France, June 1640; d. Rouen, Jan. 29, 1715. He entered the order Oct. 17, 1657, and was ordained in 1667. Appointed to teach philosophy at the University of Angers (1673–75), he distinguished himself by his adherence to CARTESIANISM and his attacks on ARISTOTELIANISM, the only philosophy authorized by the Sorbonne and Louis XIV. He tried to explain the transubstantiation by the Cartesian theory of extension, and he questioned the divine origin of the royalty. As a result he was forbidden to teach and was exiled near Grenoble. But after eight months he was sent to teach at the seminary in Grenoble, where he wrote most of his works. In 1686 he began teaching at the seminary of Saint-Magloire in Paris. But a great controversy arose over publication of his Harmonia, sive concordia quatuor evangelistarum (1689), in which he worked out a new chronology of the life of Christ, asserting that He could not have celebrated the Passover on the day before His death; and he was sent to Rouen. He wrote also on rhetoric, L'Art de parler (1675), which was translated into English, and Réflexions sur l'art poétique (1678), and on arithmetic, geometry, mechanics, and optics. He wrote studies on the New Testament and several treatises on Christian education. His masterpiece is Démonstration de la vérité et de la sainteté de la morale chrétienne. He was a disciple of N. MALE-BRANCHE and helped to develop his philosophy in France.

Bibliography: F. GIRBAL, Bernard Lamy de l'Oratoire (Paris 1964). J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2550–52. J. F. DRISCOLL, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN (New York 1907–14) 8: 771–772. F. GIBRAL and P. CLAIR, Entretiens sur les sciences (Paris 1966), critical edition.

[F. GIRBAL]

naissance de soi-même. In it he interpreted several passages by Malebranche as endorsing quietism, which provoked Malebranche to reply, denying the assertion. Lamy advocated OCCASIONALISM against Leibniz's theory of a preestablished harmony and was answered by Leibniz (Philosophische Schriften, 4:572–595). He wrote polemics on monastic studies, against the Jesuits (Plaintes de l'apologiste des bénédictins, 1699), and on rhetoric (Réflexions sur l'éloquence, 1700; La rhétorique trahie par son apologiste, 1704). He wrote Réflexions sur le traité de la prière publique against J. J. Duguet (1649-1733). In his philosophical works Lamy was inspired largely by Malebranche, particularly in Les premiers éléments des sciences . . . (Paris 1706). He refuted Spinoza in Le nouvel athéisme renversé (Paris 1696). He wrote also L'incrédule amené à la religion par la raison (Paris 1710) and De la connaissance et de l'amour de Dieu (Paris 1712).

Bibliography: R. P. TASSIN, Histoire littéraire de la congrégation de Saint-Maur (Brussels 1770) 351–367. F. BOUILLIER, Histoire de la philosophie cartésienne, 2 v. (3d ed. Paris 1868) 2: 363–373. G. RODIS-LEWIS, Le Problème de l'inconscient et la cartésianisme (Paris 1950) 200–238. C. ROSSO, Enciclopedia Filosofica 2:1792. J. BAUDOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2552–55. D. MISONNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:770.

[G. RODIS-LEWIS]

LAMY, FRANÇOIS

Benedictine philosopher; b. Montereau, Diocese of Chartres, 1636; d. Saint-Denis, April 4, 1711. At first a military man, Lamy in 1659 entered the order at Saint-Maur after a duel. He taught a Cartesian philosophy, although not without difficulties, at Saint-Maur (1670), Saint-Quentin, and Soissons (1672–73). He taught theology at Saint-Germain-des-Prés (1674–75) and then went to live in the solitude of Saint-Bale in the Diocese of Meaux, where he came into contact with BOSSUET. From 1687 to 1689 he was prior of Rebais. Because of his adherence to CARTESIANISM he was prohibited from teaching by order of the king in 1689; he retired to Saint-Denis until his death. Although his works were generally of a polemic nature, he easily reconciled himself with his adversaries. He criticized P. NICOLE in Réflexions sur le Traité de la grâce générale (MS 3217, Archives of Port-Royal, Amersfoort, Netherlands). His discussions with Bossuet regarding the infinite satisfaction deriving from the sufferings of Christ may be found in Correspondance de Bossuet [ed. C. Urbain and L. Levesque (Paris 1909-23) 456]. He effected a reconciliation between Bossuet and N. MALEBRANCHE after the appearance of the latter's Traité de la nature et de la grâce, which Lamy himself had attacked. Lamy's chief work is De la con-

LAMY, JOHN BAPTIST

First archbishop of SANTA FE, N.M.; b. Lempdes, Puy-de-Dôme, France, Oct. 11, 1814; d. Santa Fe, Feb. 13, 1888. His parents were Jean and Marie (Dié) Lamy, of old and respected families of the district.

Early Career. After studies in the seminaries of his home diocese of Clermont-Ferrand, Lamy was ordained in 1838. Some months later he was recruited for the American missions by bishop J. B. PURCELL of Cincinnati, Ohio. He was appointed (1850) to the new vicariate apostolic of New Mexico. His jurisdiction then embraced most of what later became New Mexico, Arizona, and the eastern settled part of Colorado, an area annexed by the United States in 1846 and established as a formal Territory in 1850. Lamy was consecrated in St. Peter's Cathedral, Cincinnati on Nov. 24, 1850, by M. J. Spalding, then Bishop of Louisville, Kentucky. To avoid the perils of the Santa Fe Trail between Missouri and his see, Lamy sailed down to New Orleans, Louisiana, and then started from the Texas coast up to Santa Fe. After suffering shipwreck and many other hardships, he reached Santa Fe on Aug. 9, 1851, and was enthusiastically received by the people. He soon learned, however, of the hostility of the local clergy, who regarded him as a foreign intruder. Making the hazardous 800 mile journey to Durango, Mexico, Lamy conferred with the former ordinary of the territory, bishop Antonio Zubiria, who not only received him kindly, but wrote a strong letter to the New Mexico clergy, enjoining them to accept the new order.

Ordinary of Santa Fe. The need for educational institutions and an adequate clergy were among Lamy's major concerns when he returned to Santa Fe on Jan. 10, 1852. While attending the First Plenary Council of Baltimore (1852), he succeeded in recruiting four Sisters of LORETTO from Kentucky, who returned to Santa Fe with him to open an academy and motherhouse and lay the foundations for Catholic education throughout the entire territory. When the vicariate was erected into the Diocese of Santa Fe on July 29, 1853, as a suffragan of St. Louis, Missouri, Lamy, as ordinary, continued his efforts to further the progress of the Church in the vast area of his jurisdiction. Lamy, renowned for his frequent journeys over the perilous Santa Fe Trail in search of loans and donations and of additional priests and teachers, was largely responsible for reestablishing the faith in the Southwest. His trips to Europe to recruit more young priests and seminarians met with considerable success, as did his patient handling of a few dissident native clergy and a strange lay flagellant society, the Penitentes. By 1865 he could report to Rome that, where he had found only ten priests in 1850, he now had 37 priests and six theologians in minor orders; 45 new churches and chapels had been built, and 18 or 20 ancient ones repaired; and there were four convent schools conducted by the Loretto Sisters and three by the Brothers of the Christian Schools. Six of the priests were natives ordained by Lamy, who had started a seminary to accommodate native vocations as well as seminarians from abroad.

New priests and seminarians from France continued to arrive periodically, to augment the clergy staffing distant Tucson, Arizona, and Denver, Colorado, as well as New Mexico proper. Lamy also welcomed the first Jesuits from Naples, Italy (1867), as well as the Sisters of Charity from Cincinnati (1865), who founded the first hospital and orphanage in the far West. The extent of the diocese, and of Lamy's burden, were very much lessened in 1868 with the creation of the Vicariates Apostolic of Colorado and Arizona, with two of his best priests, Joseph MACHEBEUF and John B. Salpointe, as their first bishops. With the help of a French architect, Lamy planned to replace the adobe Church of St. Francis, erected in 1714, with a new cathedral in the French Romanesque architecture of the cathedral in his native Clermont. The structure was still incomplete when it was dedicated in 1886 as the Cathedral of San Francisco de Asis.

When the Holy See erected Santa Fe into an archdiocese Feb. 12, 1875, Lamy became its first archbishop. By 1884, Lamy's age and failing health led Rome to give him Salpointe as coadjutor. When Lamy resigned his see a year later and was appointed titular archbishop of Cyzicus, he retired to a secluded ranch north of Santa Fe; early in 1888 he was brought back to town, where he died peacefully.

A memorial resolution, passed by the Territorial Congress of New Mexico in 1888, paid tribute to the esteem in which Lamy was held by Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish citizens for his personal work in promoting every type of civic and cultural improvement in the Territory. The place of his final retirement later became an exclusive resort called "Bishop's Lodge," where his little chapel remained as a memorial to him. In 1915 a heroic bronze statue of him was unveiled in front of his cathedral; the first governor and major officials of the new state of New Mexico took active part in the ceremonies. Willa Cather's novel, Death Comes for the Archbishop (1927), was based on his career. During World War II, New Mexico named a liberty ship "Archbishop Lamy," and in 1950 the archdiocese observed a Lamy Centennial, with appropriate ceremonies in the cathedral, and the founding of a Lamy memorial parish of St. John the Baptist in Santa Fe.

Bibliography: J. B. SALPOINTE, Soldiers of the Cross (Banning, California 1898). A. CHAVEZ, Archives of the Archdiocese of Santa Fe, 1678–1900 (Washington 1957). P. HORGAN, Lamy of Santa Fe, His Life and Times (New York 1975).

[A. CHAVEZ]

LANCELOTTI, GIOVANNI PAOLO

Canonist and teacher; b. Perugia, 1522; d. Perugia, Sept. 23, 1590. He received his doctorate in law in Perugia in 1546 and soon became professor of law there. His classes followed the division of the Corpus iuris civilis Institutiones into persons, things, and actions, instead of the usual method of pure commentary on the Decretals. On invitation of PAUL IV he went to Rome to edit his class notes in a canonical volume that would correspond to the Institutes of Justinian. His hope was for his work to receive the force of law through official approbation and to be attached to the authentic collections of the Decretals. Neither Paul IV nor his successor PIUS IV would give the desired approbation. The work was, therefore, published privately in Perugia in 1563 under the title Institutiones iuris canonici, quibus ius pontificium singulari methodo libris quatuor comprehenditur. It received wide diffusion in the schools. Other works include: De Comparatione iuris pontificii et caesarei et utriusque interpretandi ratione (Lyons 1674), Index rerum Corporis iuris canonici (Rome 1580), Rebularum in universo pontificio iure libri tres (Perugia 1587).

Bibliography: R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 6:333. A. E. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici (Mechlin 1928) 1:384–385. Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts (Graz 1956) 3.1:451–453. A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini (Turin 1950) 365–366.

[H. A. LARROQUE]

LANCICIUS, NICHOLAS (LECZYCKI), VEN.

Jesuit ascetical writer; b. Nesvizh (Nieswiesz), Lithuania, Dec. 10, 1574; d. Kaunas (Kovno), Lithuania, March 16, 1652. Through his constant study of apologetic writings he was converted from CALVINISM. Two years later, Feb. 17, 1592, he entered the Society of Jesus at Cracow. He studied at Rome under R. BELLARMINE and F. SUÁREZ. After his ordination in 1601, he worked with Niccolò Orlandini seeking documents for the history of the society. When Orlandini died in 1606, Lancicius became the spiritual father of the Roman College. After 1608 he was in Poland, where he taught Hebrew, Scripture, and theology at the Academy of Wilna. He was then made the rector of the college at Kalisz (Kalisch) and Cracow, and was provincial of the Lithuanian Province (1631–35). During these years of administration he was able to keep up a direct apostolate among the people as well as to write ascetical works and books on the spirit and organization of the Society of Jesus. Among his principal works are: De meditationibus rerum divinarum, De condicione boni superioris, De efficacia S.mae Eucharistiae ad profectum spiritualem in virtutibus, De praxi divinae praesentiae, and De praestantia instituti S.J. In 1650 Bollandus published his collected works (2 v. Antwerp). These have often been re-edited in whole or in part, and a number have been translated into various languages.

Bibliography: G. FELL, Wetzer und Welte's Kirchenlexikon, 13 v. (2d ed. Freiburg 1882–1903) 7:1378–81. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934) 1071–72. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 3:1216–17. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:1446–55. B. A. BALBINUS, Vita venerabilis patris Nicolai Lancicii (Prague 1690). J. DE GUIBERT, The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice, tr. W. J. YOUNG, ed. G. E. GANSS (Chicago 1964) 330–331.

[R. M. BUSH]

LAND, PHILIP S.

Jesuit priest, professor, social activist; b. Montreal, Canada, June 13, 1911; d. Washington, D.C., Jan. 20, 1994. Land was born the fifth of seven children. The family eventually settled in Tacoma, Washington, where Land attended the Jesuit high school Bellarmine Prep before entering the Society of Jesus in August 1929. During philosophy studies in Spokane, Washington, he was exposed to New Deal social programs and to Catholic social teaching. While teaching high school in Tacoma from 1936 to 1939, he became a popular speaker on social justice topics. Following his theology studies and ordination to the priesthood, he pursued a Ph.D. in economics, studying at St. Louis University and Columbia.

In 1950, Land joined the staff of the Institute of Social Order in St. Louis, doing social research, writing and teaching. He helped to create the review Social Order. From 1953 to 1954 he served on the editorial staff of America magazine in New York.

In January 1956, Land was called to Rome to teach economics at the Gregorian University, where he served in full- or part-time capacity for twenty years. In 1967 he joined the staff of the newly-founded Pontifical Commission Justice and Peace, working there under the leadership of Joseph Gremillion. Land left Rome in 1976 after his opposition to HUMANAE VITAE led to his dismissal from the Vatican delegation to the United Nations (UN) Population Conference in Bucharest [1974] and ended his effectiveness at the Commission Justice and Peace. He joined the staff of the Center of Concern in Washington, D.C., where he worked as a senior researcher and writer until his death.

Intellectual Journey. The life work of Land reflects a singular commitment to social justice that can be traced to his encounters with victims of the 1929 stock market crash who came to the doors of the Jesuit novitiate in Los Gatos, California, hungry and homeless. Land's intellectual journey saw him break free from the early strong influence of the German Catholic social thinkers Heinrich Pesch and Gustav GUNDLACH. He opened himself to more biblically based, theological approaches to social teaching and gradually came to embrace the insights of praxis-based liberation theology, the Rahnerian shift to the subject, ecotheology, and feminist theology. He argued forcefully that this intellectual evolution constituted an authentic retrieval of Thomas Aquinas' vision of prudence and practical wisdom.

During his years at the Commission Justice and Peace, Land made several important contributions to the Church's work for justice. He played a key role in the foundation of SODEPAX, a joint commission of the Vatican and the World Council of Churches to address issues of society, development and peace. He helped to conceptualize and organize the commission, securing George Dunne, SJ, to be its first director.

In 1970 Land served as the principal staff person for the synod Justice in the World and the major drafter of its document. In that capacity, he fought single-handedly to save the passage insisting that the Church should not speak about injustice unless it is willing to recognize its own injustice. In addition he was instrumental in preparing and distributing a study guide and background materials for the synod document, including highlights of the MEDELLÍN Conference of bishops held in 1968 in Colombia. Thus, under Land's leadership, foundational liberation themes were made available to the whole Church for the first time.

As part of the Vatican delegation to the UN, Land was also responsible for getting language about the "obligation of the nation or nations toward the international common good under the guidance of international social justice" into the UN charter.

During his eighteen years at the Center of Concern, Land's activities ranged from marching in demonstrations to teaching and lecturing to scholarly research and publication. His major writings include a reflective and careful defense of the US bishops' pastoral letter on the economy entitled Shaping Welfare Consensus and his semi-autobiographical reflections on the evolution of Catholic social thinking in the thirty years after Vatican II, Catholic Social Thought: As I Have Lived It, Loathed It and Loved It.

Bibliography: P. LAND, Catholic Social Teaching: As I Have Lived It, Loathed It and Loved It (Chicago 1995); Eco-Theology (Washington, D.C. 1991); "Toward a New Methodology in Catholic Social Teaching," in The Logic of Solidarity: Commentaries on Pope John Paul II's Encyclical on Social Concern, G. BAUM and R. ELLSBERG, eds. (New York 1989); Shaping Welfare Consensus: U.S. Catholic Bishops' Contribution (Washington, DC 1988); "The Lordship of Christ and Economic Structures," in Above Every Name: The Lordship of Christ and Social Systems, T. CLARK, ed. (New York 1980).

[J. E. HUG]

LANDA, DIEGO DE

Franciscan missionary and bishop; b. Cifuentes, Guadalajara, Spain, date unknown; d. Mérida, Yucatán, April 29, 1579. He was professed as Friar Minor in the Convento de los Reyes, Toledo. In 1549, soon after ordination, he went to Yucatán to serve as missionary to the Maya. He quickly achieved mastery of the Maya language, of which he composed a grammar, now lost; and during his missionary labors in major centers of the native population he acquired comprehensive knowledge of preconquest Maya culture. For several years he administered the mission in the pueblo of Izamal, where he began construction of a large church and friary. In 1561 he was elected first minister provincial of the newly established Franciscan province of St. Joseph of Yucatán and Guatemala.

From May to July 1562, Landa made a sweeping inquisitorial investigation of survivals of native religion in the Tutul Xiu district of Mani and adjacent areas. In this inquiry, for which he had active collaboration of the Spanish alcalde of Yucatán, physical torture was employed to elicit testimony and confessions from many Indians. The recorded testimony revealed substantial evidence of continuing practice of idolatry and human sacrifice by baptized Mayans, including prominent leaders. Francisco de Toral, OFM, first resident bishop of Yucatán, who arrived in August 1562, severely criticized Landa's stern measures on the grounds that they were unjust and impolitic in a new mission area.

Landa's authority to conduct the inquiry was also questioned in several quarters. In 1563 Landa returned to Spain to defend his actions before the royal court. The crown referred the case for review and decision to the minister provincial of the Franciscan province of Castile, who in turn called for opinions from a distinguished panel of canonists and civil lawyers. This group concurred that Landa, as minister provincial in Yucatán, had legal authority to conduct inquisitorial proceedings prior to the arrival of Bishop Toral by virtue of Pope ADRIAN VI's Omnímoda of 1522, which granted quasiepiscopal powers to prelates of mendicant orders in America in areas without a resident bishop. They also expressed general agreement that the conditions faced by Landa in 1562 had warranted stern remedial measures. In 1569 the minister provincial absolved Landa of all charges of which he had been accused.

In April 1572, PHILIP II presented Landa to the Holy See as bishop of Yucatán, successor of Toral (d. April 20, 1571). The papal bulls of appointment were issued on Nov. 17, 1572. A year later (October 1573), Landa took possession in Mérida. The most significant feature of his episcopate was his sustained effort, illustrated by unpublished documentation in the Archivo de Indias, Seville, to alleviate exploitation of the Maya by the local officials, the colonists, and the encomenderos.

During his residence in Spain in the 1560s, Landa wrote the Relación de las cosas de Yucatan, his most enduring claim to fame. The only extant MS (not the original version, which has not been found) of this treatise on Maya antiquities is now preserved in the Academy of History, Madrid. Publication of an incomplete text of this MS, with a French translation, by Brasseur de Bourbourg in 1864, stimulated renewed interest in Maya civilization by European and American scholars. Since 1864 at least eight editions of the Relación in Spanish, French, and English have appeared. Landa's discussion of the Maya calendar and his representations of month and day glyphs have facilitated decipherment of a considerable part of the known corpus of Maya hieroglyphic writings and inscriptions. His Maya "alphabet" has not proved too useful as a research tool. In many other respects, however, the Relación has been a major source of great value for modern students of Maya life, society, and religion in pre- and postconquest times.

Bibliography: Landa's Relación de las cosas de Yucatan, ed. and tr. A. M. TOZZER (Cambridge, Mass. 1941). D. LÓPEZ COGOLLUDO, Historia de Yucatan (Madrid 1688 and later eds.). C. CARRILLO Y ANCONA, El obispado de Yucatan, 2 v. (Mérida de Yucatan, Mex. 1892). F. V. SCHOLES and R. L. ROYS, "Fray Diego de Landa and the Problem of Idolatry in Yucatan," Carnegie Institute of Washington, Cooperation in Research (Washington 1938) 585–620.

[F. V. SCHOLES]

LANDELIN, SS.

Two saints of the seventh century.

Landelin (Landolin), fl. early seventh century, a hermit and possibly a missionary laboring near the site of the future Abbey of Ettenheimmünster in Baden, near Freiburg im Breisgau. He apparently suffered a violent death, and he is honored as a martyr at Ettenheimmünster, Strasbourg, and Freiburg im Breisgau.

Feast: Sept. 21.

Landelin of Crespin and LOBBES, abbot; d. c. 686. He was a Frankish noble, who, according to FOLCWIN OF LOBBES in his Gesta abbatum Lobiensium (Monumenta Germaniae Historica Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 4:56), was converted from a life of robbery by Bp. St. Autbert of Cambrai (d. c. 669) and founded the monastery of Lobbes (654) at the site of his former crimes (Hainaut, Belgium) as well as the Abbey of Crespin (670, Department of Nord, France), and perhaps the monasteries of AULNE (656 in Hainaut) and Walers-en-Faigne (657 in Hainaut) also.

Feast: June 15.

Bibliography: Landelin, or Landolin. J. VAN DER STRAETEN, Analecta Bollandiana 73 (1955) 66–97, life; ibid., 97–118, text. Bibliographica hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 2:4699. A. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 2:313–315. A. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:772–773. Landelin. Acta sanctorum June 3:538–544. A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca historica medii aevi 2:1417. Bibliographica hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 2:4696–98; suppl. No. 4698a. U. BERLIÈRE, Monasticon belge, v.1 (Bruges 1890).

[C. DAVIS]

LANDÉVENNEC, ABBEY OF

Dedicated to St. Guénolé (Gwenole); belonging to Benedictines of the Congregation of Subiaco, in Landévennec, Finistère, Brittany, France; Diocese of Quimper. It was founded c. 480 by St. Guénolé, born in Brittany of parents who had migrated from Wales (SS. Fracan and Guen). His brothers Jacut and Guéthénoc and sister Clervie also are venerated as saints. Educated by "the eminent master" St. Budoc on the island of Lavret, Guénolé and 11 monks settled on the barren island of Topepig for three years before moving to Landévennec. Feasts of St. Guénolé are celebrated on March 3 (his death, 532?) and April 28 (translation). SS. Guenaël and Judul were early successors of Guénolé. The 6th-century Celtic usages of IONA (St. COLUMBA or Columbcille) were abandoned under Abbot Matmonoc on the order of Louis I the Pious (818). Gurdistan (Wrdisten), under whom the abbey prospered, wrote the vita of St. Guénolé c. 880.

Norman invasions drove the monks to Montreuil-sur-Mer with the relics of their founder (914). They returned under John, ally of Duke Alan Twisted Beard, liberator of Brittany (936–939); the relics stayed at Montreuil until they were destroyed in 1793. Several times burned and pillaged (14th–16th century), the abbey became commendatory on the death of Jean du Vieux Chastel (1522), last of the 51 regular abbots. It was reformed by MAURISTS (1636), but the Jansenist crisis of 1718 was fatal. The last commendatory abbot, Bp. Conen de Saint-Luc of Quimper, suppressed the title of abbot and incorporated the abbey into his mensal revenue (1784). The last monks were dispersed in 1791, and the buildings were demolished in the early 19th century.

In the 18th century the abbey's domain included eight priories and nomination to ten parishes. Prior Audren de Kerdrel founded the Société d'Histoire de Bretagne (1684). François Delfau (1637–76), critic of COMMENDATION, was exiled from SAINT-DENIS to Landévennec. Subprior François Louvard was a noted Jansenist (1696). Louis Le Pelletier (d. 1733) compiled a Breton dictionary.

In 1950 Louis-Felix Colliot, third abbot of Kerbénéat (built in 1878), purchased Landévennec, and in 1958 the community of Kerbénéat moved to new buildings in Landévennec. The church was consecrated in 1965, at which time the abbey had a hostel for men's retreats, published the bulletin Pax every three months, and had assembled a Breton library and a museum of Landévennec history. MSS of the 9th, 10th, and 11th centuries attributed to Landévennec are in Quimper, Oxford, Cambridge, Copenhagen, and New York. A 17th-century necrology of Landévennec has been edited by A. Oheix (Bulletin diocésain d'histoire et d'archeologie de Quimper 1913).

The Abbey of Landévennec: the ruins of the medieval abbey.

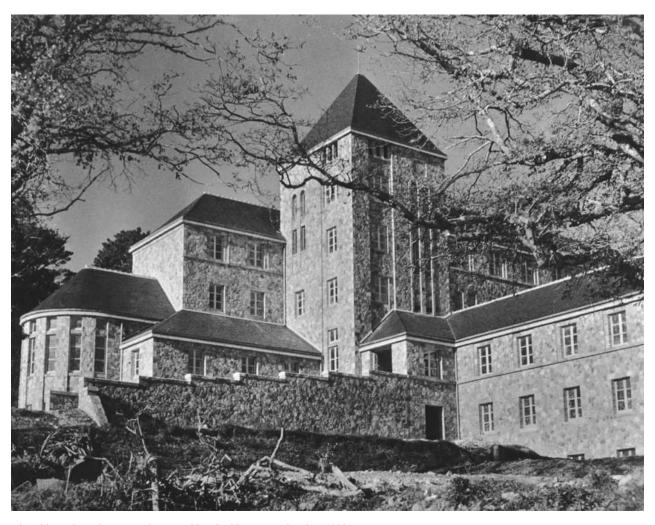

Bibliography: N. MARS, "L'Extinction du titre abbatial de Landévennec en 1784," Association Bretonne 69 (1960). P. DE LA HAYE, L'Abbaye de Landévennec (Châteaudun 1958). L. H. COTTINEAU, Reépertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1549–50. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 8.1:1237–56. J. TEMPLÉ, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 5:323–324. N. MARS, "Histoire du royal monastère de S. Guénolé de Landévennec (MS of 1648)," Pax (1956–61).

[G. OLLIVIER]

LANDINI, FRANCESCO

Blind poet-organist of the ars nova era; b. Fiesole, Italy, c. 1325; d. Florence, Sept. 2, 1397. His father was the painter Jacopo del Casentino. Francesco, blinded by smallpox in early childhood, probably studied music under Jacopo da Bologna, developing a prodigious memory and great skill at improvisation. He also worked in philosophy and astrology, and supported the theories of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM. He was crowned poet laureate at a Venetian festival in 1364. At least nine of his musical compositions are known to be settings of his own verses, and many anonymous verses he set are possibly his. Although he was for many years organist at the Basilica of San Lorenzo, Florence, his only surviving organ piece is an arrangement of one of his own love songs. An account book of Andrea de'Servi shows that he was paid for five motets, but no sacred works of his are known today. He is considered the most prolific ars nova composer of 14th-century Italy. There survive 12 madrigals, a caccia, and 142 ballate set for voices and instruments in two or three parts. Both his portrait in the Squarcialupi Codex (Florence, Bibl. Medicea Laurenziana, Pal. 87) and his tombstone at San Lorenzo show a blind figure holding a small lap-organ or organetto, on which he could accompany his own singing, as described in Giovanni da Prato's II Paradiso degli Alberti (1389).

The Abbey of Landévennec: the new abbey buildings completed in 1958.

Bibliography: Works, ed. L. ELLINWOOD (Cambridge, Mass. 1939). F. VILLANI, Liber de Civitatis Florentiae Famosis Civibus, ed. G. C. GALLETTI (Florence 1847). L. SCHRADE, ed., Polyphonic Music of the Fourteenth Century, 4 v. (Monaco 1956-58) v. 4. L. ELLINWOOD, "The Fourteenth Century in Italy," New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP, 11 v. (New York 1957-) 3:77-80. N. PIRROTTA, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 8:163-168. P. GARGIULO, ed., Dolcissime Armonie: nel sesto centenario della morte di Francesco Landini (Florence 1997). M. P. LONG, "Francesco Landini and the Florentine Cultural Élite," in Early Music History 3: Studies in Medieval and Early Modern Music, ed. I. FENLON (Cambridge, Eng. 1983) 83-99; "Landini's Musical Patrimony: A Reassessment of Some Compositional Conventions in Trecento Polyphony," Journal of the American Musicological Society, 40 (1987) 31-52. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 1002. K. VON FISCHER, "Francesco Landini," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 10 (New York 1980) 428-434.

[L. ELLINWOOD]

LANDO, POPE

Pontificate: July or Nov. 913 to Mar. 914. A Roman of Sabinian ancestry, Lando was one of several popes created in the tenth century by the house of Theophylactus. Pope FORMOSUS had appointed the original THEO-PHYLACTUS as vestararius (or vestiarius), an office of considerable influence and importance in the control of the temporalities of the Holy See. In Rome Theophylactus held the titles of consul and senator—a distinction shared by his wife THEODORA and his daughters THEO-DORA and MAROZIA. These women dictated the election of papal candidates for half a century, and thus gave grounds for the legend that in this period of history a woman wore the tiara (see JOAN, POPESS, FABLE OF). Like most popes of this tragic era, Lando enjoyed a very brief pontificate. During the six months of his tenure nothing good or evil is recorded of the papacy. It is probable that Lando was simply the instrument of the Roman aristocracy, especially the elder Theodora. He was succeeded by JOHN X.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:239. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (repr. Graz 1956) 1:448. LIUTPRAND, Antapodosis, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (Berlin 1826–) v. 41. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 4:147–148. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935) 7: 32–34. R. BENERICETTI, La cronologia dei Papi dei secoli IX–XI secondo le carte di Ravenna (1999) 35–36. S. SCHOLZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 6 (3d. ed. Freiburg 1997). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 121.

[P. J. MULLINS]

LANDOALD, ST.

Missionary to the Low Countries; d. Wintershoven, near Maastricht, Netherlands, 668. According to the legendary life produced by HERIGER OF LOBBES in the 10th century, Landoald was a Roman priest, descended from a Lombard family. When Pope (St.) MARTIN I sent him with a party of missionaries to help St. AMANDUS, the Apostle of the Belgians, Landoald evangelized the territory between the Meuse and the Schelde. In that district he made his headquarters at Wintershoven, where he built a church dedicated by St. Remaclus, c. 659. The remains of Landoald were discovered in 980 at Wintershoven and translated to Ghent.

Feast: March 19.

Bibliography: Bibliographica hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 2:4700-10. Acta sanctorum March 3:35–47. Monumenta Germaniae Historica Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 15.2:599–611. L. VAN DER ESSEN, Étude critique . . . des saints mérovingiens de l'ancienne Belgique (Louvain 1907) 357–368. É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945–) 1:312; 2:254, 272–273, 286, 322, 397. Vies des saintes et des bienheuruex selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 3:424–425. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 1:634–635.

[C. P. LOUGHRAN]

LANDRY (LANDRICH), SS.

Landry of Paris, bishop of Paris from 650 to c. 656; d. c. 660. He succeeded Andebert and distinguished himself by his charity during the famine of 651. The foundation of the HÔTEL-DIEU DE PARIS is attributed to him. The only known charter of his episcopate concerned the abbey of Saint-Denis-en-France. This document is lost, but it is mentioned in the privilege of Clovis II, dated June 22, 654, to which the bishop affixed his signature. The relics of St. Landry were preserved in the church of Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois in Paris, where they had been deposited in 1171. These relics, enclosed in a silver reliquary, were destroyed in 1798.

Feast: June 10.

Landry of Soignies, abbot, bishop; d. c. 730. He was the son of St. VINCENT MADELGARIUS and St. WALDETRUD. He became abbot of Soignies (Hainaut, Belgium) and of Hautmont (Nord, France). He was a missionary bishop in the region of Brussels, particularly "in Meltis castellum," now Melsbroek, Belgium. The lists of bishops for Metz or Meaux either are very inaccurate or outrightly contradict any attempt to insert his name within their lists. Landry is very probably the person to whom Marculfus dedicated his Formulae. His relics are in the collegiate church of Soignies. There is a local cult to him there as well as at Melsbroek. His vita was written in Soignies in the 11th century or earlier.

Feast: April 17.

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum June 2:289–291. Gallia Christiana 7:24–25. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Bibliographie (Paris 1905–07) 2:2752. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–15) 2:472. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:518–519. Acta sanctorum April 2:483–488. L. VAN DER ESSEN, Étude critique . . . des saints merovingiens (Louvain 1907) 288–291. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:64, 66. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saintes et des bienheureux (Paris 1935–56) 4:413–414; 6:177–79.

[É. BROUETTE]

LANDULF

A member of the capitanei (the Italian noble class) in 11th-century Milan, leader of the Patarines from c. 1056 through the early 1060s; b. Milan; d. the early 1060s (exact date is unknown). While ARIALDO preached in the countryside, Landulf covered the city. Together, they formed a powerful team, exhibiting sincerity, efficiency, gentleness, and most of all a good strategic plan for their quest of reforming the Church of Milan.

Dressed shabbily, Landulf, with a persuasive voice, preached reform to the people like a demagogue. As early as 1057 he could be heard addressing the people as follows: "For light flatters darkness, all blind are affected, because the blind are your leaders. But now can the blind lead the blind? Is it not both who are falling down in a pit?"

On his way to Rome during the pontificate of STE-PHEN IX to join Arialdo, Landulf was wounded at Piacenza. (It seems that the Patarine movement branched throughout Lombardy, especially at one of the Lombard cities, Piacenza, where Bishop Dionigo tried to drive them from his city; thus it can be assumed that Landulf received his wound in one of the skirmishes there.) Shortly afterward, his strength was weakened further by consumption. Thus, he had to withdraw from the Patarine effort. After his death his brother, ERLEMBALD, replaced him in the reform movement.

Bibliography: ARNULF, "Gesta archiepiscoporum Mediolanensium," Monumenta Germaniae Historica Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 8.1–31. U. BALZANI, Le cronache Italiane nel medio evo (2d ed. Milan 1900). S. M. BROWN, "Movimenti politico-religiosi a Milano ai tempi della Pataria," Archivo-storico Lombardi, ser. 58, 6 (1931) 227–228. H. E. J. COWDREY, "The Papacy, the Patarenes and the Church of Milan," TRHS, ser. 5, 18 (1968) 25–48. LANDULF SENIOR, "Historia Mediolanensis," Monumenta Germaniae Historica Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 8.32–100. F. MEDA, "Arialdo ed Erlembaldo," La scuola cattolica e la scienze Italiana, ser. 2, 10 (1895) 535–552. J. P. WHITNEY, Hildebrandine Essays (Cambridge 1932) 143–157.

[P. M. LEVINE]

LANDULF OF ÉVREUX, ST.

Bishop; d. before 614. Very little is known about this saint except that he was bishop of Évreux, and that c. 600 he exhumed the relics of St. TAURINUS (late fourth century), the first bishop of Évreux, and built a church in his honor. Other biographical embellishments are taken from the Vita s. Taurini, a forgery dating from the ninth century, supposedly the work of a disciple of the saintly Bp. DEODATUS OF NEVERS. Reputed miracles were added to the vita in the 10th and 11th centuries. According to these accounts even before becoming bishop, Landulf had been informed by heavenly voices about the relics of his holy predecessor. After Landulf assumed the episcopal office, a great ray of light reportedly indicated the very spot where he was to seek for the body of St. Taurinus. In spite of these uncertainties, the local cult of Landulf is one of long standing.

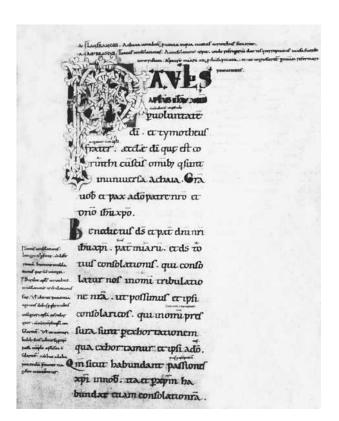

Feast: Aug. 13.

Bibliography: Gallica Christiana 11:567. Acta sanctorum Aug. 3:96. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saintes et des bienheureux (Paris 1935–56) 8:320. E. JARRY, Catholicisme 4:848–849. C. DUCHESNAY, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 16:210.

[H. DRESSLER]

LANFRANC

Archbishop of CANTERBURY; b. Pavia, c. 1005; d. Canterbury, May 24, 1089. After studying and practicing 12th-century manuscript page of "St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians," translated by John Wesley, with marginal glosses of Lanfranc and St. Ambrose, (Bib. Vat. Cod. Lat. 143, fol. 67v).

civil law at Pavia he became a student of the liberal arts and theology under BERENGARIUS at his school in Tours (1035). He excelled in dialectic and opened his own school at Avranches in 1039, but suddenly entered the destitute Benedictine abbey of BEC in 1042 to become a monk, and later prior, under Abbot HERLUIN OF BEC. There he founded a school that became known throughout Europe; St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, IVO OF CHARTRES, and the later Pope ALEXANDER II were among his pupils. As a dialectician and theologian Lanfranc wrote glosses on the Epistles of St. Paul, the Collationes of Cassian, and other works, concentrating, like Berengarius, on a thorough study of the words of the text. In the Eucharistic controversies he defended the orthodox position against Berengarius at the councils of Rome and Vercelli (1050), at Tours (1059), and in his Liber de corpore et sanguine Domini (c. 1059-62). While at Bec he became an adviser to William, Duke of Normandy, the future WILLIAM I OF ENGLAND, who in 1063 made him abbot of his new foundation, St. Stephen's at Caen. Against his inclination and only on papal order Lanfranc was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury, Aug. 29, 1070. He proved himself an effective but cautious reformer. Unlike GREGORY VII, Lanfranc agreed with William that the reform of the English Church was the king's responsibility. However, Lanfranc's reforms concerning clerical celibacy, marriage, and cathedral chapters, and his use of Norman churchmen brought the English Church into close contact with the GREGORIAN REFORM movement on the Continent. His most important innovation was the creation of separate courts of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. He introduced pre-Gregorian collections of Canon Law into England and infused new vitality into English monasticism. Lanfranc asserted his supremacy over the archbishop of YORK, but H. Böhmer's thesis that he forged documents to support his primacy has been disproved [E. Hora, "Zur Ehrenrettung Lanfranks. . ." Theologische Quartalschrift, 3 (1931) 288-319]. While he had the full confidence and support of William the Conqueror, relations with William's successor. William (II) Rufus, soon became difficult. Lanfranc's life as a scholar, prelate, and statesman as well as his lapidary letters reveal an agile, orderly mind and a determined, practical disposition. The monks who lived with Lanfranc, such as St. Anselm, GILBERT CRISPIN, and EADMER OF CANTERBURY, testify to his fatherly care, kindness, and humility.

Bibliography: Works. Opera omnia, ed. J. L. D'ACHÉRY (Paris 1648); Opera . . . omnia, ed. J. A. GILES, 2 v. (Oxford 1844). Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 150. LANFRANC, The Monastic constitutions, ed. and tr. D. KNOWLES (New York 1951). Sources. "Acta Lanfranci" in J. EARLE, Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, ed. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1892-99) 1:287-292. GILBERT CRISPIN, Vita Herluini in Gilbert Crispin, ed. J. A. ROBINSON (Cambridge, Eng. 1911) 87-110. A. LE PRÉVOST, ed., Ordericus Vitalis: Historia ecclesiastica, 5 v. (Paris 1838–55) 2:126, 209-213; 3:309; 5:382. WILLIAM OF MALMSBURY, Gesta Pontificum Anglorum, ed. N. E. S. A. HAMILTON (Rerum Britannicarum Medi: aevi scriptores [New York 1964-]) 52:37-73. M. CRIS-PIN, "Vita beati Lanfranci," Patrologia Latina 150:19-58. Literature. A. J. MACDONALD, Lanfranc: A Study of His Life, Work and Writing (2d ed. London 1944). É. AMANN and A. GAUDEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 8.2:2558-70. z. N. BROOKE, The English Church and the Papacy (Cambridge, Eng. 1931). D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943-1216 (Cambridge, Eng. 1962) 107-144. F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947). N. F. CANTOR, Church, Kingship, and Lay Investiture in England, 1089-1135 (Princeton 1958). F. L. Cross, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 783-784. J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (Cambridge, Eng. 1962). R. W. SOUTHERN, "Lanfranc of Bec and Berengar of Tours," Studies in Medieval History Presented to F. M. Powicke, ed. R. W. HUNT et al. (Oxford 1948) 27-48; "The Canterbury Forgeries," English Historical Review 73 (1958) 193-1226; Saint Anselm and His Biographer (New York 1963). D. C. DOUGLAS, William the Conqueror (Berkeley 1964).

[B. W. SCHOLZ]

LANG, ANDREAS

Benedictine abbot of Michelsberg (Bamberg, Germany); b. Staffelstein (Upper Franconia) c. 1450; d. Oct.

23, 1502. He became the third in a series of reform abbots of his monastery (1483), restoring the discipline of the Bursfeld reform and initiating the abbey's second period of flourishing. He also improved the material situation of his abbey, reorganizing its economic management and restoring the buildings of church and cloister. Interested in learning himself, he took special care to assist the monastery's school and library. His local reform activity made him influential in the general chapters of the Bursfeld Congregation. He collected materials on the history of the bishopric of Bamberg, on the history of the Michelsberg abbey, and on the saints of the Benedictine order. He wrote a number of works on these topics, notably his Catalogus sanctorum ordinis sancti Benedicti. Manuscripts of his writings survive in the Staatsbibliothek and the Staatsarchiv at Bamberg.

Bibliography: F. DRESSLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:782. Der Catalogus sanctorum O.S.B. des Abtes Andreas von Michelsberg, ed. J. FASSBINDER (Bonn 1910).

[C. G. NAUERT, JR.]

LANG, MATTHÄUS

German statesman, churchman, and humanist; b. Augsburg, 1468; d. Salzburg, March 30, 1540. A member of a burgher family, he studied law at Tübingen and pursued humanistic studies at Ingolstadt and Vienna. He entered the imperial service as a secretary and soon rose to a position of power and influence; his unquestioned talent and loyalty commended him to Emperor Maximilian I. He reached the high point in his diplomatic career when he acted as the emperor's representative in the negotiations leading to the League of Cambrai (1508), the reconciliation with the pope (1512), and the marriage treaties with the Jagellonians, concluded at the Congress of Vienna (1515). The great influence he had as the emperor's chief adviser made possible his especially rapid rise in the ecclesiastical hierarchy: provost of the Augsburg chapter (1500), bishop of Gurk (1505), cardinal (1512), and archbishop of Salzburg (1519). He was ordained and consecrated bishop only in 1519. Maximilian's death brought the period of his involvement in imperial politics to a close, and he devoted much of his energy to the governing of Salzburg. He was soon confronted by powerful demands for social and religious change; during the PEASANTS' WAR (1524-25) he was able to repress revolt in his territory only by securing the help of the Swabian League. The strong measures he took to halt the spread of the Reformation were paralleled by his effort to carry out a program of reform within the Church, which constituted one of the first tangible signs of the Catholic reform in Germany. Gifted and ambitious, he was not popular with his contemporaries, many of whom were troubled by his nonaristocratic origin; yet his achievements as imperial adviser and diplomat, prince-archbishop of Salzburg, and patron of the arts were of a very high order.

Bibliography: Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) 20:610–613. H. WIDMANN, Geschichte Salzburgs, v.3 (Gotha 1914) 1–72. J. WODKA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:783.

[W. B. SLOTTMAN]

LANGDON, JOHN

Bishop of Rochester; b. Kent, England; d. Basel, Switzerland, Sept. 30, 1434. In 1398 Langdon became a Benedictine at Christ Church, CANTERBURY, where he was subprior by 1411. In that year, while studying at Canterbury College, Oxford, he incepted as doctor of theology. He served on a university commission examining the works of John WYCLIF (1411) and continued to be prominently engaged in the suppression of heresy. In 1419 King Henry V tried in vain to obtain Langdon's PROVI-SION to the Norman See of Lisieux, but he was provided to Rochester in 1421. As the appointment of regular clergy to bishoprics was then rare in England, Langdon's promotion to the See of ROCHESTER was a recognition of his outstanding qualities: he was a zealous champion of orthodoxy and a distinguished preacher (he twice preached before the convocation of Canterbury). He compiled a now lost Anglorum chronicon. He was abroad in 1422–23, probably in Italy (Cal. Patent Rolls 1422–29, 82; Cal. Close Rolls 1422-29, 482, 484), and he may have attended the Council of Siena. Langdon was appointed to the king's council in 1430 (Public Record Office, Exchequer Warrants for Issues 47.322) and served on an embassy to treat for peace with King Charles VII of France in 1432. He was an English representative at the Council of BASEL.

Bibliography: C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 11:538–539. A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1093–94.

[R. L. STOREY]

LANGHORNE, RICHARD, BL.

Lay martyr; b. Bedford, England, c. 1635; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), July 14, 1679. Richard, son of the barrister William Langhorne and Lettice Needham, was himself admitted to the Inner Temple, November 1646, and the bar in 1654. He married a Protestant woman, Dorothy Legatt. Langhorne suffered persecution. He was arrested for the first time on June 15, 1667, but was later released. He was not so fortunate the second time, Oct. 7, 1678, when he was arrested in connection with the fallacious Titus Oates Plot. Without examination he was committed to Newgate Prison, where he was kept in solitary confinement for eight months. On June 14, 1679, he was brought before the bar at the Old Bailey and found guilty based on the perjury of several witnesses. Although he was offered a pardon if he confessed his guilt and disclosed the property of the Jesuits, he persisted in declaring his ignorance of any conspiracy. Thus, he was condemned to execution. His last words were to the hangman were "I am desirous to be with my Jesus. I am ready and you need stay no longer for me." He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), II, 388. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LANGLEY, RICHARD, BL.

Gentleman, lay martyr; b. Grimthorpe (?), Yorkshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, Dec. 1, 1586. As the son of Richard Langley of Rathorpe Hall (Walton) and Joan Beaumont of Mirfield, Richard inherited several estates including Grimthorpe, Rathorpe, and Ousethorpe near Pocklington in the East Riding of Yorkshire, which was his primary home. He married Agnes Hansby of New Malton with whom he had one son and four daughters. He created hiding places on his estates for refugee priests. The existence of an underground retreat at Grimthorpe was revealed to the president of the North, who dispatched (Oct. 28, 1586) a group of civil, military, and Protestant religious authorities to search his properties. Two priests were arrested at Grimthorpe and Langley himself seized at Ousethorpe. All were taken to York prison and arraigned. During his trial, the sympathetic jury was dismissed and another empaneled. Although his guilt was never established by the evidence, Langley was convicted and sentenced to death for harboring illegal priests. His friends requested and were denied the opportunity to bury him honorably. Langley was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England). See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), I, 120. H. FOLEY, Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus (London 1878), III, 735; (London 1880), VI, 316. J. MORRIS, ed., The Troubles of Our Catholic Forefathers Related by Themselves, 3 v. (London 1872–77). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LANGRES, COUNCILS OF

Several assemblies held at the diocesan seat of Langres, in northeast France. In 859 bishops from the Provinces of Lyons, Vienne, and Arles met at Langres and revised the canons on predestination made at VALENCE in 855. A few weeks later this new version was proposed by REMIGIUS of Lyons to the council at Savonnières (C. J. Von Hefele, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. Leclercq, 4:216–217, 1336). Other Langres councils included the provincial council for Lyons held in 830, mentioned in a donation charter (ibid. 4:82). A charter of 883 speaks of a diocesan synod held at Langres in that year (ibid. 4:1356), and in 1116 two further synods were assembled, one with a papal legate, the archbishop of Vienne, copresiding with the bishop of Langres (ibid. 5:558).

Bibliography: J. RATH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65).

[R. KAY]

LANIGAN, JOHN

Irish ecclesiastical historian; b. Cashel, County Tipperary, 1758; d. Finglas, near Dublin, July 7, 1828. He was the son of Thomas Lanigan, a schoolmaster, and Mary Anne Dorkan. In 1776 Archbishop Butler of Cashel sent him to the Irish College, Rome, where he was ordained. One of his professors in Rome had been Pietro Tamburini, on whose advice he went to the University of Pavia, where he became professor of Hebrew, Sacred Scripture, and ecclesiastical history. In 1786 he was pressed to attend the synod of Pistoia, where Tamburini played a very prominent part, but he refused. He continued to teach at Pavia, and published some books on Scripture studies, of which the most significant was Institutionum Biblicarum pars prima (1793). In 1794 the university conferred on him its doctorate of divinity.

He returned to Ireland when Napoleon's troops occupied Pavia in 1796. Because of his associations with Tamburini he was suspected of JANSENISM by some Irish bishops, and was refused assistance in the Diocese of Cork, where he had landed, and in his native Diocese of Cashel. He made his way to Dublin, where he was helped by a fellow student of his Roman days, Martin Hugh Hamill, the parish priest of Francis Street, and by the Capuchins in Church Street.

In 1798 he was offered the chair of Sacred Scripture in St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, on the proposal of Archbishop O'Reilly of Armagh, seconded by Abp. John T. Troy of Dublin. However, Bishop Moylan of Cork, with what certainly seems to have been excessive zeal, demanded that he be asked to subscribe to an anti-Jansenist formulary then commonly tendered to French refugee clergy. Lanigan was resentful of this demand, and the proposed appointment fell through.

On May 2, 1799, he was appointed "translator, editor and corrector of the press" by the Royal Dublin Society, and in 1808 he became its librarian. In this same year he was one of the founders of the short-lived "Gaelic Society of Dublin." The fruit of his personal studies was An Ecclesiastical History of Ireland from the First Introduction of Christianity among the Irish to the Beginning of the Thirteenth Century, published in four volumes in 1822. Lanigan wrote his work despite failing health. It showed his wide reading and trenchant style and judgment, and marked a great advance on anything previously published on the subject. Although recent scholarship has dated it, it is still useful.

Bibliography: T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 11:576–578. W. J. FITZPATRICK, Irish Wits and Worthies: Including Dr. Lanigan, His Life and Times (Dublin 1873). H. F. BERRY, A History of the Royal Dublin Society (London 1915).

[P. J. CORISH]

LANSPERGIUS, JOHANNES JUSTUS

Carthusian spiritual writer; b. Landsberg, Bavaria, 1490; d. Cologne, Aug. 10, 1539. He entered the Charterhouse of St. Barbara at Cologne in 1509, and except for the period from 1530 to 1535, when he was prior at Jülich, his life was spent at Cologne. At that time St. Barbara's was a notable center of religious fervor, and Lanspergius was one of its leading representatives. He exercised a wide influence by preaching, writing letters, circulating prayers and devout treatises, and giving spiritual direction. Two of the earliest Jesuits, Peter FABER and St. Peter CANISIUS, came under his influence. Lanspergius was convinced that the only effective remedy for the evils of his day—the Reformation period—consisted in enkindling, preserving, and increasing the fire of divine love in the souls of men. His writings, which were numerous, were addressed to a varied public. He wrote a treatise on perfection for interior souls, sermons and homilies, counsel for Christian gentlemen, letters to nuns, and exhortations for sinners. He was an eloquent apostle of devotion to the SACRED HEART. All the essentials of that devotion can be found in his letter to a monk of his own monastery [Lanspergii Opera Omnia (Montreuil 1890) 4:138–139]. As a means of promoting this devotion, he edited the Revelations of St. Gertrude of Helfta (Cologne 1536).

Bibliography: J. J. LANSPERGIUS, An Epistle of Jesus Christ to the Faithful Soul, tr. P. HOWARD, ed. MONK OF PARKMINSTER (London 1926). S. AUTORE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2606–09. R. BAUERREISS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:779. H. C. MANN, "Chronicles of Cologne Charterhouse," Pax 47 (1957) 13–19, 59–64, 95–98, 134–139; 48 (1958) 50–55, 86–92; 51 (1961) 66–71.

[B. DU MOUSTIER]

LANTBERT OF FREISING, ST.

Bishop of Freising; d. Sept. 19, 955 or 957. He is supposed to have been descended from the count of Sempt and to have been attached to the cathedral even before his elevation. Lantbert was appointed bishop of Freising in 937 or, according to other sources, on Aug. 28, 938, and presided in that see during the period of the Hungarian incursions and of domestic opposition to OTTO I. A document of Otto I confirmed the donation of the Abbey of Moosburg and of estates in Vöhringen from 950. Lantbert was present at a synod of Augsburg in 952. He has been venerated since the 11th century, and his cult has been officially recognized in Freising Diocese since the 15th century. His biography owes much to the legend of St. NICHOLAS of Myra; e.g., Lantbert is supposed even as a child to have denied himself milk and other nourishment on certain days of the week; three blind men are alleged to have received their sight from drinking the surplus milk. The legend also reflects the Hungarian invasion: the Hungarians are supposed to have come to Freising, ravaged the city for six days, and burned down the churches of St. Vitus and St. Stephen together with the rest of the city, the cathedral alone being spared because of a thick fog that hid it from the enemy. Other sources state that the Hungarians had indeed set fire to the cathedral but that the fog put it out. In either case, the deliverance was ascribed to the prayers of the bishop, who is therefore usually represented in art as praying in front of the cathedral with the city of Freising in flames about him.

Feast: Sept. 18 or 19.

Bibliography: J. E. STADLER and F. J. HEIM, Vollständiges Heiligen-Lexikon, 5 v. (Augsburg 1858–82) v.3. J. A. FISCHER, Lan- tbert von Freising, 937–957, der Bischof und Heilige (Munich 1959).

[G. SPAHR]

LANTERI, PIO BRUNONE

Founder of the Oblates of the Virgin Mary; b. Cuneo, Italy, May 12, 1759; d. Pinerolo (Torino), Aug. 5, 1830. After leaving the Carthusians because of ill health, he studied for the secular priesthood and was ordained, and soon after he received the laureate in theology at the University of Turin (1782). In order to devote himself entirely to apostolic and charitable activities in Turin, he refused all ecclesiastical benefices and offices. He was especially active in the Amicizia Cristiana, an association founded by Nikolaus von Diessbach, SJ, to utilize the press and secret gatherings for the benefit of the Church, much as the Freemasons were using them against the Church. Lanteri was very successful as a spiritual guide to university students, seminarians, young soldiers, and workers. He was a stanch supporter of PIUS VII during the pope's years of imprisonment by Napoleon I; as a result he was exiled from Turin (1811-14). Together with Giovanni Reinaudi, he founded a religious congregation of priests, the Oblates of the Virgin Mary (1815), which received the Holy See's approval (1826) and which numbered 200 members in 1963. Lanteri established in Turin (1817) the Amicizia Cattolica to counteract the Protestant biblical societies of London by distributing Catholic devotional literature. Soon this organization absorbed all the functions of the Amicizia Cristiana but abandoned its secrecy. It was the prototype for lay Catholic organizations in Italy. Lanteri also promoted the education and formation of the clergy, preached retreats in the Ignatian method, and spread the writings of St. Alphonsus Liguori. Save for a few devotional works that appeared in print, Lanteri's writings remain in manuscript form. The decree introducing his beatification cause in Rome was issued in 1952.

Bibliography: T. PIATTI, Un precursore dell'Azione Cattolica: Il servo di Dio P. B. Lanteri (2d ed. Turin 1934). I. FELICI, Una bandiera mai ripiegata. P. B. Lanteri, fondatore dei PP. Oblati, precursore dell'Azione Cattolica (Pinerolo 1950). L. CRISTIANI, Un Prêtre redouté de Napoléon: P. B. Lanteri (Nice 1957). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 44 (1952) 883–887.

[F. G. SOTTOCORNOLA]

LANTRUA, GIOVANNI OF TRIORA, ST.

Franciscan priest, martyr; b. Triora (Savona), Italy, March 15, 1760; d. Changsha (Hunan), China, Feb. 7, 1816. After joining the Franciscans (1777), he was ordained (1784) and then served as superior of various houses in Tarquinia and Velletri until he left for China (1798). A long delay in Lisbon and a difficult sea voyage delayed his arrival at Macau until 1800. During a period of political upheavals and religious persecutions, he exercised a zealous apostolate in the Provinces of Hunan, Hupeh, and Kiangsi from 1802 until his arrest in July 1815. After six months of imprisonment and torture, he was put to death by strangulation. His remains were transported to Macau (1819) and later to Rome, where they rest in the church of S. Maria in Aracoeli. He was beatified by Pope Leo XII (May 27, 1900) and canonized (Oct. 1, 2000) by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: Feb. 3.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 39 (Rome 1947) 213–221, 307–311. G. ANTONELLI, Un martire di Cina, il b. G. da Triora (Rome 1900), J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56); v. 13, suppl. and table générale (1959) 2:317–318.

[J. KRAHL]

LAODICEA

Nine different cities were called Laodicea in antiquity; those in Phrygia, in Pisidia, and on the northern seacoast of Syria are the more significant.

Laodicea in Phrygia Pacatiana, also known as Laodicea near Lycus, was founded by Antiochus II and named after his wife. In spite of disastrous earthquakes, particularly in Nero's time, Laodicea was prosperous and noted for the quality of the woolen clothing it produced. Friendly relations with Smyrna, Hierapolis, Pergamum, and Nicomedia and the city's location on the main trade route from Ephesus to the East contributed to its affluence. A well-organized Jewish community lived in the city.

Christianity came to Laodicea in Apostolic times. St. Paul (Col 4.12–17) mentions the Church here and its zealous Epaphras, but a Pauline epistle to the Laodiceans is disputed. By the end of the 1st century the Church was an important one in Asia Minor, to which St. John (Rv 3.14–22) gave stern admonitions. Between 165 and 170 a synod met at Laodicea to discuss the EASTER CONTROVERSY (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 4.26.3). Polycrates in sending the synod's decisions to Pope St. VICTOR I calls Sagaris, the martyr bishop of Laodicea, one of the "great luminaries of Asia" (ibid. 5.24.5). A council convened in the city (c. 360) and formulated important canons for the discipline of the clergy and laity, and for the liturgy. The much-discussed canon 60 lists the books of the Old and New Testaments omitting Judith, Tobit, Sirach, Maccabees, and Revelation. The bishopric of Laodicea became the metropolitan see of Phrygia with numerous suffragans. In the 12th and 13th centuries Turks and Mongols destroyed the city; its ruins have not yet been excavated.

Laodicea in Pisidia (Laodicea Combusta or Catace-caumene), the modern Yorgan Ladik, was located on the main trade route from Ephesus to the Euphrates. Little is known about the city's early Christianity, but numerous Greek inscriptions dating from 350 to 450 show its vigorous growth. In 1908 the sepulchral inscription of Marcus Julius Eugenius (d. c. 332), Bishop of Laodicea, was discovered. In his epitaph written by himself the bishop says that he was the son of Cyrillus Celer; served the governor of Pisidia in a military capacity; married a senator's daughter, Gaia Julia Flaviana; suffered for the faith because of Maximinus's command to offer sacrifice; and came to Laodicea, where he was chosen bishop and held that office for 25 years, during which he rebuilt the church and adorned it with paintings and statues.

Laodicea on the northern seacoast of Syria was a port city founded by Seleucus I and named after his mother. Hellenistic cults survived long in this region, and no bishops are listed before the middle of the 3rd century. APOLLINARIS, whose Christological errors went undetected for some time, became bishop there in 362. A synod met in Laodicea in 481 to deal with matters concerning Stephen of Antioch. Justinian I renovated the church of St. John in this city. Because of its strategic location Laodicea frequently bore the brunt of military expeditions from the Byzantines, Arabs, and Crusaders but was never completely destroyed. On April 28, 1961, Laodicea became the seat of the Melchite archbishop.

Bibliography: É. BEURLIER, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX 4.1:86–87 (Paris 1895–1912). W. M. RAMSAY, The Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, 2 v. (Oxford 1895–97). E. HONIG-MANN, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 12.1 (Stuttgart 1924). 712–724. C. M. KAUFMANN, Handbuch der altchristlichen Epigraphik (St. Louis 1917) 249–251. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 8.1:1321–23. Monumenta historica Societatis Jesu, v.1 (Rome 1932). B. KÖTTING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, (Freiburg, 1957–66) ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER 6:793–95.

[H. DRESSLER]

LAOS, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Lao People's Democratic Republic is a landlocked country in southeast Asia, bordered on the northwest by Burma and China, on the northeast and east by VIETNAM, on the south by CAMBODIA and on the west by THAILAND (formerly Siam). The region's terrain is characterized by rugged mountains, plateaus and the alluvial plains of the Mekong River which serves as Laos' western border. Heavily forested and with a tropical climate, it weathers monsoons, a summer rainy season and a winter dry season. Agricultural products include rice, corn, tobacco and tea, while natural resources consist of timber, gypsum, gold, gemstones and tin.

Formerly part of French Indochina, Laos became a constitutional monarchy in 1947 and gained independence in 1949. For the next decade Laos experienced continual political unrest and sporadic civil war among rightist, neutralist and communist-backed Pathet Lao factions, and by the 1960s communists controlled the government. Laos was bombed by the United States during the Vietnam War between 1965–69, and it was proclaimed a republic in 1975. A majority of Laotians are ethnic Lao, the principal lowland inhabitants who are also the most dominant politically and culturally.

Early History. Originally inhabited by Tai from China, Laos joined Thailand as part of the kingdom of Lan Xang in the 14th century, and by 1550 Buddhism had been established as the predominant religion. Lan Xang went into decline in the 17th century, a result of dynastic conflicts. Italian Jesuit Giovanni Leira entered Vientiane c. 1630. In 1666 Louis Laneau, the first vicar apostolic of Siam (1673-96), successfully evangelized a Laotian village in Siam, near Ayuthia. The receptivity of these people to the Gospel moved Laneau to send missionaries into Laos and to compose Instructions aux missionnaires du Laos, a remarkable missiological document. The Siamese revolution of 1688 prevented the continuation of the Laos mission, and it would not be revived until the late 19th century, although challenging terrain continued to hamper evangelization efforts through the 20th

In the late 18th century, Siam established hegemony over much of what is now Laos. The region was divided into principalities centered on Luang Prabang in the north, Vientiane in the center and Champassak in the south. Following its colonization of Vietnam, the French supplanted the Siamese and began integrating all of Laos into the French empire. The Franco-Siamese treaty of 1907 defined the present Lao boundary with Thailand.

In the 19th century the Laotians dwelling in the northern region around Sam Neua, near the border of Vietnam, were evangelized to a certain extent from western Tonkin (Hanoi). Missionary efforts also originated from Cambodia (1852), although they were ultimately unsuccessful. Most of the missionary endeavor in eastern Capital: Vientiane. Size: 91,430 sq. miles.

Population: 5,497,459 in 2000.

Languages: Lao, French, English; tribal dialects are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 43,765 Catholics (.8%), 3,298,475 Buddhists (60%), 21,650 Protestants (.3%), 1,649,237 animists (30%), 484,332 with no religious affiliation.

Apostolic vicariates: Luang Prabang, Paksé, Savannakhet, and Vientiane.

Laos started from Ubon in 1881. Two Ubon priests of the PARIS FOREIGN MISSION SOCIETY (MEP), Jean Prudhomme and François Guéguo discovered a forbidden traffic in slaves and began to ransom hundreds of them. Between 1881 and 1887 nine Christian communities of former slaves were established, and a strong movement of conversions followed, although it could not be fully exploited for lack of apostolic workers. From the right bank of the Mekong, Prudhomme relocated in 1883 to the left bank, where the French, now installed in Cochin China and Cambodia, extended their protectorate in 1893 over the kingdoms of Luang Prabang and Vientiane, thereby giving rise to modern Laos. Conversions diminished along the right bank of the Mekong, but increased along the left bank. The first chapel opened in Vientiane in 1896 and the first permanent residence in 1910. The Vicariate Apostolic of Laos, embracing Laos and eastern Siam, was created in 1899 when there were 8,000 Catholics and 2,000 catechumens in the entire area. Not until 1929 did a missionary begin to work in the northern section around Luang Prabang.

The 20th Century and Beyond. During World War II Japanese forces occupied French Indochina, including Laos. King Sisavang Vong of Luang Prabang declared independence from France on July 19, 1949, just prior to Japan's surrender, and a nationalist fervor gripped the region. In September of 1945, Vientiane and Champassak united with Luang Prabang to form an independent government under the Lao Issara ("Free Laos") banner. The movement, however, was short-lived. Within six months French troops had reoccupied the country and conferred limited autonomy on Laos following elections for a constituent assembly.

During the first Indochina war between France and the communist movement in Vietnam, Prince Souphanouvong formed the Pathet Lao ("Land of Laos"), a communist resistance group. Laos was not granted full sovereignty until the Geneva Peace conference, held in 1954 following Vietnam's defeat of the French. Following elections held in 1955, the first coalition government was formed, led by Prince Souvanna Phouma. It collapsed in 1958, amidst increased polarization of the political process, and rightist forces took over the government, which operated in tandem with a constitutional monarch.

In 1960 paratroop captain Kong Le seized Vientiane in a coup and formed a neutralist government in hopes of ending the fighting. The new government, again led by Souvanna Phouma lost power to rightist forces under General Phoumi Nosavan that same year. Subsequently, the neutralists allied themselves with the communist insurgents and won the support of the USSR. General Nosavan began receiving aid from the United States.

A second Geneva conference (1961–62) established the independence and neutrality of Laos. Unfortunately, shortly afterward, both sides accused each other of violating the terms of the agreement, and with superpower support on both sides, civil war resumed and the increasing U.S. and North Vietnamese military presence in the country drew Laos into the second Indochina war (1954–75). For nearly a decade the region was devastated by what some considered the worst bombing of the 20th century, as U.S. troops attempted to destroy the supply lines along the Ho Chi Minh Trail in eastern Laos.

By 1963 Laos contained three vicariates: Ventiane (created in 1952 from the Prefecture of Ventiane and Luang Prabang, erected in 1938), Luang Prabang (part of the Vicariate of Ventiane until 1963), and Savannaket (1963, called the Prefecture, 1950–58, and then Vicariate of Thakkek, 1958–63). Ventiane and Luang Prabang, in the north, were confided to the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, who first came in 1937; Savannaket was entrusted to the MEP. Despite the fact that Buddhism has been named the state religion, Laos's three vicar iates encompassed 28,000 Catholics, 82 religious and 6 secular priests, 48 brothers and 124 sisters. In the country's 45 Catholic schools were enrolled 8,000 students.

The Church under Communism. The war in Laos had drastic consequences for the Church. In 1972 the country's communist party renamed itself the Lao People's Revolutionary Party (LPRP) and became part of a new coalition government in 1973, shortly after the Vientiane cease-fire agreement. Nonetheless, the political struggle between communists, neutralists and rightists continued. The fall of Saigon, Vietnam and Phnom Penh, Cambodia to communist forces, in April of 1975 hastened the decline of the coalition in Laos. Months after Vietnam's communist victories, the Pathet Lao entered Vientiane. On Dec. 2, 1975 the King of Laos abdicated his throne and the LPDR set about establishing a communist state.

Once in power, the Pathet Lao took control of the media and set about arresting and imprisoning many military leaders and members of the former government. In a centralized society, the Laotian economy began to falter, and ten percent of the country—including many low-land Lao and ethnic Hmong—became refugees. Of these people, most were eventually resettled in other countries, including the United States, China and Thailand, although by 1999 29,000 Hmong and lowland Lao had returned to Laos. Most political prisoners were released by the government during the early 1980s. While a new constitution enacted in 1992 embodied more liberal social policies, including freedom of religion, the communist government continued its policy of control.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 Laos had 29 parishes and fewer than 20 priests at work among the faithful, and the Church maintained its greatest influence in the central and southern provinces, while northern regions were more resistant to minority faiths. Tending to humanitarian needs were 79 sisters, who were prohibited from any evangelization. While the state did not recognize the American doctor and missionary Tom Dooley cares for a Laotian Buddhist monk. Dr. Dooley was one of the founders of a medical mission in Laos. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Vatican, a papal nuncio from Bangkok coordinated efforts by Laotian missions to provide aid to the region's lepers and disabled persons. Catholic schools continued to be banned by the government, as party cadres continued their antagonism to "foreign" religions, in 1997 going so far as to demand a list of those believing in Jesus. All religious groups were required to report to the government's Department of Religious Affairs in the Lao Front for National Construction, a group mandated by the constitution to discourage "all acts . . . creating division of religion or creating division among the people." Buddhism was voted into law as the state religion in 2000, although its practice was inhibited along with that of minority faiths. Despite the government's efforts to reform the nation's economic base, Laos continued to rely on aid from the International Monetary Fund and other sources, Japan being its largest donor nation.

In February of 1999 Vientiane Bishop Jean Khamse made the first ad limina visit to Pope John Paul II in over four decades. Asked about the status of the Laotian Church, Bishop Khamse commented that "the Church in Laos is like an infant, an infant saved from the waters." With little infrastructure and few priests, the Church gained most support from animists, for whom Catholicism was seen as a psychological liberation from the superstitions of tribal faiths. Efforts at evangelization in Laos, Khamse added, required a contemplative dimension and missionaries "must be witnesses of Jesus who love's the people around them."

Bibliography: M. BERTHÉAS, La Mission du Laos (Lyons 1909). E. PAPINOT, "Cinquante ans d'apostolat au Laos (1881–1931)," Revue d'historie des missions, 8 (1931) 337–352. Le missioni cattoliche: Storia, geographia, statistica (Rome 1950) 271–272. Bilan du Monde, 2:553–555. Annuario Pontificio has data on all diocese.

[J. GUENNOU/EDS.]

LAOZI (LAO-TZU)

In English, "Venerable Master" or "Old Master." An honorific title for a mysterious Chinese philosopher and Daoist (Taoist) sage, supposed author of the Daode Jing (Tao Te Ching in English: "The Classic of The Way and Virtue"), venerated as the deity known as Taishang laojun (Tai-shang Lao-Chün, in English "Highest Venerable Lord") or Huanglao jun (Huang Lao-Chün, in English "Yellow Venerable Lord") by the adherents of Daoism (Taoism), lived apparently in the period circa 500–400 B.C. during the Zhou (Chou) Dynasty.

What little is known about his life comes from the account of his supposed life in the Shiji (Shi Chi, "Records of the Historian"), written by the Chinese historian Sima Qian (Ssu-ma Ch'ien) around 100 B.C. According to him, Laozi's family name was Li, his supposed given name was Er Dan (Erh Tan, in English "long ears," probably a reference to the traditional Chinese symbol of wisdom and longevity rather than a reference to the sage's real name). Apparently, he worked as an archivist at the Zhou imperial court, before leaving in disillusionment and making his way westward in search of wisdom. Scholars are divided as to the historicity of Sima Qian's account of the alleged encounter between Laozi and CON-FUCIUS at the Zhou court, in which Laozi berated Confucius for his arrogance and lack of understanding; many scholars have attributed that account to subsequent anti-Confucian polemics of the Daoists.

Some scholars have questioned Sima Qian's attribution of the authorship of the Daode Jing to Laozi, as there is no mention of an author in all extant versions of the Daode Jing. Sima Qian had recounted a legend in which Laozi, weary of living and heading westward in search of wisdom, penned down his philosophy at the request of the "Keeper of the Pass" (i.e., frontier guard). Contemporary textual analysis of the received text points to the existence of several redactional layers. Although the received text is traditionally divided into 81 chapters of 5,000 characters, the earliest extant manuscripts—the Guodian text (circa 300 B.C.) and the Mawang dui (Ma-wang Tui) texts (168 B.C.)—while preserving the contents of the work albeit in an inverted order, suggest that the original was probably a continuous work of some 5,400 characters, in all likelihood written or edited by a single author.

The Daode Jing presents the Dao as a nameless, undefinable, spontaneous, eternal, cyclical and everchanging cosmological essence. It advocates that one engages in "non–action" (wu–wei) to be in harmony with the Dao. Here, "non–action" is not mere passivity, but rather, taking only those actions that would be in harmony with the cosmological ordering of things in the Dao.

The utopian society which the Daode Jing presents is one of harmony between ruler and ruled, in which the Sage–Ruler embodies wu–wei as a way of governing, viz., governing behind the scenes in a manner that the subjects are not even aware that they are being governed. This philosophy has attracted many adherents both in the Far East and in the Western world, making the Daode Jing the most translated ancient Asian treatise in the European languages in the 19th and 20th centuries.

See Also: CHINESE PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: M. KALTENMARK, Lao-tzu and Taoism (Stanford 1969). W. T. CHAN, A Source Book in Chinese Philosophy (Princeton 1963) 136–176. K. Y. CH'EN, Lao-tzu: Text, Notes, and Comments (San Francisco 1981). D. C. LAU, tr. Chinese Classics: Tao Te Ching (Hong Kong 1982). A. C. GRAHAM, Disputers of the Tao (LaSalle, IL 1989). E. WONG, Lao-tzu's Treatise on the Response of the Tao (San Francisco 1993). R.G. HENRICKS, tr. Lao-tzu's Tao Te Ching: A Translation of the Startling New Documents Found at Guodian (New York 2000).

[J. Y. TAN]

LAPIDE, CORNELIUS A.

The Latin form of his Dutch name, Cornelis Cornelissen van den Steen, voluminous exegete; b. Bocholt, Province of Limburg, Belgium, Dec. 18, 1567; d. Rome, March 12 (or 11), 1637. After studying theology at Douai and Louvain, Lapide entered the Society of Jesus in 1592 and was ordained three years later. He taught Sacred Scripture for 40 years, first at Louvain (1596–1616) and then at the Roman College (1616–36). His lively lectures, rich in topical allusions and pleasant irrelevancies, delighted students. His prodigious commentaries, covering the entire Bible with the exception of Job and Psalms, appeared steadily from 1614 to 1645. Supported abundantly by quotations from Church Fathers and later interpreters, his exegesis frequently included not only the literal sense of a passage but the allegorical, tropological, and anagogical meanings as well. His knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, of theology, Church history, and the classical philosophers and natural historians (especially Aristotle and Pliny), and his intense industry, fervor, and awareness of problems of the day, all combined to produce commentaries highly esteemed by his contemporaries and posterity. He saw his greatest work, Commentaria in omnes Divi Pauli Epistolas (Antwerp 1614), go through 11 of its eventual 80 editions. The entire listing of his works and their editions fills 15 columns in the Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus. Two notable editions of his complete works, with commentaries on Job (by J. de PINEDA) and Psalms (by St. Robert BELLARMINE) added, are the Malta edition (1843-46) in 10 volumes and the Paris edition (1859–63) in 22 volumes. A large part of his exegesis was included by J. P. Migne in his Cursus S. Scripturae (Paris 1837–45) v. 5–20.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, (Brussels-Paris 1890–32) 4:1511–26. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:787–789. R. GALDOS, "De scripturisticis meritis P. Cornelii a Lapide," Verbum Domini 17 (1937) 39–44, 88–96; "De canonibus exegeticis apud P. C. a L.," ibid. 146–152; "Nel Terzo Centenario della morte di C. a L.," La civilta cattolica 88.3 (1937) 204–218. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:58. G. HEINRICI, Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie 4:289–291.

[T. T. TAHENY]

LAPINI, ANNA MARIA

Foundress of the Poor Daughters of the Holy Stigmata of St. Francis; b. Florence, Italy, May 27, 1809; d. there, April 15, 1860. At her father's urging, Anna Maria Fiorelli relinquished her desire to enter religious life and married Giovanni Lapini (1835). Her husband caused her much grief by his immoral conduct and unbelief, but she led him back to a Christian life before his death (1844). In 1848 she founded the Stigmatine Sisters, who followed the rule of the Third Order of St. Francis and labored to educate poor and abandoned girls. Anna and her companions received their habits in 1850. The Holy See's approval came in 1888. By 1961 the congregation numbered 1,255 members in 123 houses, mostly in Italy. Anna's religious life was one of great poverty and suffering caused by ill health, misunderstanding, and unfair hostility. The cause for Anna's beatification was formally introduced in Rome in 1918.

Bibliography: A. MARTINI, Suor A. Lapini, fondatrice delle Suore Stimmatine (Florence 1937). M. RICCI, Anna Lapini (4th ed. Florence 1937). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 10 (1918) 99–102.

[F. G. SOTTOCORNOLA]

LAPSI

From the Latin word for "fallen," the Christians who fell from the faith in the persecution of Decius (249–251). They were of three kinds: sacrificati, those who offered sacrifice to the pagan gods; thurificati, those who burned incense at a pagan religious ceremony; and libellatici, those who obtained certificates stating they had sacrificed, though they had not done so. While there had always been apostates, the lapsi formed a problem because of their great number and the desire most had of being readmitted to communion in the Church even while the persecution continued. Church leadership differed in the solution of the problem. In Rome NOVATIAN leaned toward a rigoristic treatment, denying penance and reconciliation, at least until after the persecution; in Carthage many lapsi had recourse to confessors of the faith for their intercession and received libelli pacis, or requests that the bishops admit them to communion. Bishop Cyprian decided on a synod to solve the problem in Carthage, and Pope Cornelius did the same in Rome. Reconciliation was extended to the libellatici and to the sacrificati in danger of death who had already begun to do penance.

Ven. Luis de La Puente, 17th-century engraving.

Bibliography: CYPRIAN, Epist. 5–56; Laps. B. POSCHMANN, Paenitentia secunda (Bonn 1940) 368–397. K. RAHNER, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 74 (1952) 257–276, 381–438. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CARROLL, H. LECLERQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 5.1: 1067–80; 9.1:78–79, 81–85.

[F. HAUSER]

LA PUENTE, LUIS DE, VEN.

Jesuit spiritual writer; b. Valladolid, Nov. 11, 1554; d. there, Feb. 16, 1624. La Puente studied arts and letters at the University of Valladolid and later pursued courses in theology with the Dominicans. He entered the Society of Jesus on Dec. 2, 1574, and later made his tertianship under the direction of Balthasar Alvarez, SJ. He was regent of studies and professor of theology in Oviedo and Valladolid from 1596 to 1599. He dedicated almost the whole of his life to administration and spiritual direction. He served as rector in Vallagarcia and twice in Valladolid (1594–96, 1601–02), as novice master in Villagarcía (1585–89, 1593–94, 1599–1601) and in Medina del Campo (1592–93), and as spiritual director in Valladolid and Salamanca (1589–92, 1597–99).

He is remembered chiefly for his spiritual writings. The specific characteristic of his spirituality was its paternal spirit. This quality La Puente appears to have acquired through the gift of wisdom, and it enabled him to inspire in his disciples a clear perception of the spiritual world. In his writings he appears not only as a theologian of depth but as a spiritual master as well. His knowledge of the Scriptures, soundness of doctrine, and clarity of expression are remarkable. His spirituality seems to spring from his insight into the theological foundations of the truths about which he wrote. However, he misused symbolism, made frequent use of an artificial interpretation of the Scriptures, and the pace in the development of his ideas was often too slow.

Among his principal writings was Meditaciones de los Misterios de nuestra fe (Meditations on the Mysteries of our Faith, 2 v., Valladolid 1605). More than 260 complete or partial editions of the Meditations, including translations into many languages, are known to have been published. The Meditations begin with a study of the end of man and the four last things, continue with the life of Christ, and end with a masterful consideration of the divine attributes. The introduction to the Meditations is a "short, clear and precise summary of mental prayer, the most complete and delightful treatise on prayer ever written." (C. M. Abad, 152).

Guía espiritual (Spiritual Guide, Valladolid 1609), a work not as well known as La Puente's Meditations, is more profound and sublime in doctrine. It treats of the contemplative life in its various practices (including mystical exercises) and the active life, in the consideration of which great emphasis is laid upon mortification. In this work La Puente revealed himself not only as a mystic but as a learned theologian able to present his doctrine with accuracy and precision.

De la perfección del cristiano en todos sus estados (On Christian Perfection in the Different States of Life, 4 v., Valladolid 1612–16) is one of the first treatises on spirituality to be based upon the perfection of the different states of life. Perfection is considered in its relation to the Sacraments. The book treats of the spiritual perfection to which God calls the Christian in Baptism and the perfection signified in Confirmation and Holy Orders, and there follows an application of these principles to the different states of life. It includes a treatment of the necessity and kind of civil obedience expected of the Christian, and it dwells upon the perfection proper to married life.

Expositio moralis et mystica in Canticum Canticorum (2 v., Cologne 1622) is a spiritual and mystical commentary on the Song of Songs. Its value does not lie in its exegesis of the text, which is too symbolic and contrived, but in the spiritual doctrine that it sets forth, especially that with regard to grace, the Mystical Body, and contemplation.

La Puente is also remembered for his Vida del Padre Baltasar Alvarez (The Life of Father Balthasar Alvarez, Madrid 1615) and his Sentimientos y avisos espirituales (Spiritual Counseling and Dispositions, Seville 1671).

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 6:1271–95. I. IPARRAGUIRRE, Répértoire de spiritualité ignatienne (Rome 1961), with detailed bibliog. C. M. ABAD, Vida y escritos del V. P. Luis de La Puente (Comillas 1957), best biog.; El V. P. Luis de La Puente: Sus libros y doctrina espiritual (Comillas 1954), analysis of works. J. DE GUIBERT, The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice, tr. W. J. YOUNG, ed. G. E. GANSS (Chicago 1964).

[I. IPARRAGUIRRE]

LARA PUENTE, SALVADOR, ST.

Martyr, lay youth; b. Aug. 13, 1905, Berlin, Súchil, Archdiocese of Durango, Mexico; d. Aug. 15, 1926, Puerto de Santa Teresa near Zacatecas. Like his cousin St. David ROLDÁN, he abandoned his studies at Durango seminary in order to assist his family financially. While working for a mining company, he remained active in pastoral work, Mexican Youth for Catholic Action (president), and the National League (secretary). He was arrested and shot with his cousin, after witnessing the assassination of their pastor BATIZ and Manuel MORALES. Salvador was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). V. GARCÍA JUÁREZ, Los cristeros (Fresnillo, Zac. 1990).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LARKE, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), March 7, 1544. For most of his life, Fr.

Larke was rector of St. Ethelburga's, Bishopsgate, London (1504–42). For some of that time he was rector of Woodford, Essex (1526–27). Chancellor (St.) Thomas MORE nominated him as rector of Chelsea, a position Larke held from March 29, 1530 until his attainder. He was indicted Feb. 15, 1543 for refusing to acknowledge the royal supremacy in spiritual matters. Charged with him were BB. Fr. John IRELAND, German GARDINER, and John HEYWOOD (who recanted on the hurdle). Their heads and quarters were buried under the gallows. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); March 11 (Diocese of Brentwood).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs, (New York 1904), I, 541–47. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LARKIN, JOHN

Jesuit, educator; b. Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, Feb. 2, 1801; d. New York City, Dec. 11, 1858. He was born of Irish parents who sent him at an early age to Ushaw College, Ushaw, England, where he studied under the noted historian, John Lingard. After a trip to India, Larkin entered the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice in Paris; he was ordained in 1827. About 1830 he went to teach philosophy at the Sulpician College in Montreal, Canada, and in 1841 he entered the Society of Jesus in Louisville, KY. In 1846 he came with his fellow Jesuits from Mt. St. Mary, KY, to staff St. John's College, Fordham, NY, founded five years before by Bp. John Hughes. Larkin served as vice president for a year and, in 1847, he was appointed president of a college that was being planned in New York City. Having borrowed the money to purchase a Protestant church, he opened a school in its basement, but the building was destroyed by fire on Jan. 22, 1848. While looking for another site, he received a letter from the archbishop of Quebec, informing him of his appointment to the See of Toronto. With the permission of his superior, Larkin went to Europe and successfully petitioned to have his designation as bishop rescinded. After making his third year of probation at Laon, France, he became president of St. John's College, Fordham, in 1851. He left St. John's in 1854 and went to England, where he was engaged in parochial work. In 1857, in the U.S., he served as parish priest at St. Francis Xavier's Church, New York City, where he died the following year.

Duke Francois-Alexandre-Frederic de La Rochefoucauld-Liancourt.

Bibliography: T. G. TAAFE, A History of St. John's College, Fordham (New York 1891).

[V. C. HOPKINS]

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD

An ancient French aristocratic family, originating in the town of La Rochefoucauld (Charente), well known since the 12th century and presently divided into three branches: the main branch of the La Rochefoucaulds and the families of the Ducs of Estisse and De Doudeauville.

François de, cardinal; b. Paris, Dec. 8, 1558; d. Sainte-Geneviève, Feb. 14, 1645. François, orphaned at the age of four by the death of his father on the battlefield, was reared by an uncle, Jean de la Rochefoucauld, Abbot of Marmoutier, and educated at the Jesuit College of Clermont. Appointed abbot of Tournus at the age of 15, he proved himself, despite his youth, an excellent ecclesiastical administrator. He finished his theological and classical education in Rome, and became bishop of Clermont (1584). Protestantism was very strong in his diocese, but the young bishop was successful in reconquering it fully for Catholicism. He did not participate in the religious wars of his age, but he refused to recognize HENRY IV as King of France till the latter's conversion to Catholicism. Subsequently, close relations were established between the bishop and the monarch. Bishop de La Rochefoucauld became cardinal on the personal intervention of Henry IV at Rome (1607). The cardinal was a deeply respected adviser to the court during the minority of Louis XIII. Appointed bishop of Senlis, he was sent to Rome as royal ambassador. As a diplomatist, he supported the decrees of the Council of Trent, with strong reservations, however, since he was deeply attached to the Gallican Church and the interests of the French monarchy. In 1618 he became great almoner of France, abbot of Sainte-Geneviève in 1619, and then president of the State Council. Two years later, he resigned as president, and consecrated himself to the reform of religious orders. He founded the Congregation of Sainte-Geneviève, known also as the Congregation of France. He was also vice dean of the College of Cardinals.

François de, litterateur, moralist, known first as the Prince of Marsillac; b. Paris, Sept. 15, 1613; d. Paris, March 17, 1680. As a youth, he participated in various military campaigns and in the continuous intrigues of his aristocratic world against Cardinal de Richelieu. He even played a part in the plot of Cinq-Mars. This was the beginning of a series of political adventures, plots, and rebellions first against Richelieu, then against Mazarin. During the Fronde, he unsuccessfully plotted the murder of Cardinal de Retz and, in the battle of the Faubourg of Saint-Antoine, he was seriously wounded and lost his eyesight for a short period. After 1653 La Rochefoucauld lived in retirement and devoted his time to writing his Mémoires and Maximes morales. The most celebrated and witty women of his age, Mmes. de Sablé, de Lafayette, and de Sévigné were his constant companions. Louis XIV showered him with royal favors. His Mémoires were first published in 1662 in Cologne, although the author disavowed this edition. This work, republished in 1817, is a revelation concerning the history of the Fronde. The original title of the Maximes is Reflections ou sentences et maximes morales; the Saint-Beuve edition (1853) is considered the best. Voltaire said that the Maximes with their high literary value, their deep intellectual honesty, and their precise style greatly contributed to the development of the French sense of taste.

Rochefoucauld-Bayers, François Joseph de la, Bl., bishop of Beauvais; b. Angoulême, March 28, 1755; d. Paris, Sept. 2, 1792. A representative of the clergy in the States General of 1789, he defended the privileges of the clergy and the court. Soon he and his brother Pierre Louis, Bishop of Senlis, were declared "enemies to the constitutional monarchy." The two prelates fled to their sister, the Abbess of Soissons (Marie-Charlotte de la Rochefoucauld). Unwilling to compromise their sister, they returned to Paris. There Rochefoucauld-Bayers, Bishop of Beauvais, was arrested and jailed in the infamous prison of Carmes. Soon his brother, the bishop of Senlis, was arrested also and detained in the same jail. Both were murdered during the general massacre of political prisoners on Sept. 2, 1792.

Feast: Sept. 2

Bibliography: G. DE LA ROCHEFOUCAULD, Un Homme d'église et d'état. . .: Le Cardinal F. de la Rochefoucauld (Paris 1926). M. BISHOP, The Life and Adventures of Rochefoucauld (Ithaca 1951). É. MAGNE, Le Vrai visage de La Rochefoucauld (Paris 1923). P. CARON, Les Massacres de Septembre (Paris 1935). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1926) 415–425. S. SKALWEIT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:799–800.

[E. GONDA]

LA RUE, PIERRE DE

Renaissance church composer (called also Peter van Straten, Petrus de Vico, Pierchon); b. probably Tournai, Belgium, c. 1460; d. Courtrai, Nov. 20, 1518. He was a singer and member of the Brotherhood of Our Lady,'s Hertogenbosch (1489-92), and a chaplain and singer of the Burgundian-Hapsburg court at Brussels and Malines (1492–1516) where he served Maximilian of Austria, Philip the Fair, Margaret of Austria, and Charles V. He participated in many journeys of the court, including those to Spain in 1501-02 and 1506. In 1516 he took up residence at the chapter of Notre-Dame Cathedral, Courtrai, where he held a canonry, and died there. His known compositions include 31 Masses, 7 Mass movements, 7 Magnificats, 23 motets, and about 35 secular songs to French and Flemish texts. Most of his works survive in MS, among them splendidly illuminated choirbooks of the Netherlands court chapel and the Papal chapel. Petrucci printed a volume of five of his Masses, the Misse Petri de la Rue (Venice 1503).

La Rue's compositions are notable examples of Franco-Flemish polyphony and are distinguished by their rhythmic and contrapuntal intricacy and their great expressiveness. He was held in high regard by his royal employers and by fellow musicians, and his works continued to be cited in treatises throughout the 16th century. Most important are the Masses, among them a requiem for low voices, a six-part Missa Ave sanctissima Maria in triple canon (parodying a motet variously attributed to Verdelot and to La Rue himself), and two canonic Masses on the popular cantus firmus, L'Homme armé.

Bibliography: Modern eds. Liber Missarum, ed. A. TIRABASSI (Malines 1941), seven Masses from a MS in Royal Library, Brussels. Monumenta musicae Belgicae, v. 8 Drie missen, ed. R. B. LEN-AERTS and J. ROBIJNS (Antwerp 1960). Documenta polyphoniae liturgicae Sanctae Ecclesiae Romanae, ed. L. FEININGER (Rome 1947-), ser. 1B, no. 1, one Mass. Das Chorwerk, ed. F. BLUME, v. 3 (1930), chansons; v. 11 (1931), Requiem; v. 91, motets. M. PICK-ER, ed., The Chanson Albums of Marguerite of Austria (Berkeley 1965). J. ROBYNS, Pierre de la Rue, circa 1460-1518: Een biobibliographische studie (Brussels 1954). N. DAVISON, "The Motets of Pierre de la Rue," Musical Quarterly 48 (1962) 19-35. W. RUB-SAMEN, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 8:225-239. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). N. DAVISON, "Absalom fili mi Reconsidered," Tidschrift van de Koninklijke Vereniging voor Nederlandse Muziekgeschiedenis, 46 (1996) 42–56. J. E. KREIDER, "The Masses for Five and Six Voices by Pierre de la Rue" (Ph.D. diss. Indiana University 1974). H. MECONI, "Style and Authenticity in the Secular Music of Pierre de la Rue" (Ph.D. diss. Harvard University 1986). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 485. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 1012. M. STAEHELIN, "Pierre de La Rue," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 10 (New York 1980) 473-476.

[M. PICKER]

LA SALETTE

Village in the Diocese of Grenoble, southeast France. Since the apparition of the Blessed Virgin to two children there on Sept. 19, 1846, it has been a major pilgrimage shrine. The apparition occurred while Melanie Mathieu-Calvat, age 15, and Maximin Giraud, age 11, poor peasants with almost no secular or religious education, were herding cows on a mountain above La Salette. They were startled by the appearance in a globe of brilliant light of a beautiful Lady resplendently attired but weeping. She gave them a message, which they could hardly have invented, "to all her people": unless there should be repentance from widespread religious apathy, she would be forced to let fall the arm of her Son. The children were told to pray, and each was entrusted with a secret.

Initial disbelief in the apparition soon gave way. In the glen where the episode had taken place a spring began to flow, and miraculous cures associated with its waters began to multiply. Bishop Philibert de Bruillard of Grenoble began a canonical inquiry of the children and the miracles. After five years of silence he gave an official judgment that the apparition had all the characteristics of truth and that the faithful had grounds for believing in it, inasmuch as the events could not be explained except by divine intervention and the testimony of the miracles was superior to men's objections. Devotion to Our Lady of La Salette was therefore authorized. Subsequent popes since Pius IX, to whom the children made known the secrets, have confirmed La Salette and the cult. Leo XIII made Bishop de Bruillard's church (1852–64) a minor basilica (1879). A proper Mass and Office was granted in 1942.

From the first, objections had been raised by anticlericals, clerical liberals, and sincere people on grounds of mendacity and the uncouth nature of the children; but the objections ignored the exhaustive episcopal investigation. St. John VIANNEY, the Curé of Ars, who had accepted the account, interpreted an interview with Maximin as a denial of the apparition; but, following two favors received through the intercession of Our Lady of La Salette, he publicly renewed his belief the year before his death (1858). The fact that neither Maximin nor Melanie subsequently became manifest saints led some people to doubt the apparition, the authenticity of which is independent of the persons to whom it was revealed. "Our Lady left me as I was," said Maximin, who died a holy death in nearby Corps at the age of 40. Melanie, who died in 1904, made several efforts to become a religious in Grenoble, Darlington (England), and Marseilles; in 1867 she went to live in south Italy, returned to France (1884), and again to south Italy, attending Mass daily. Neither Maximin nor Melanie ever repudiated any part of their account.

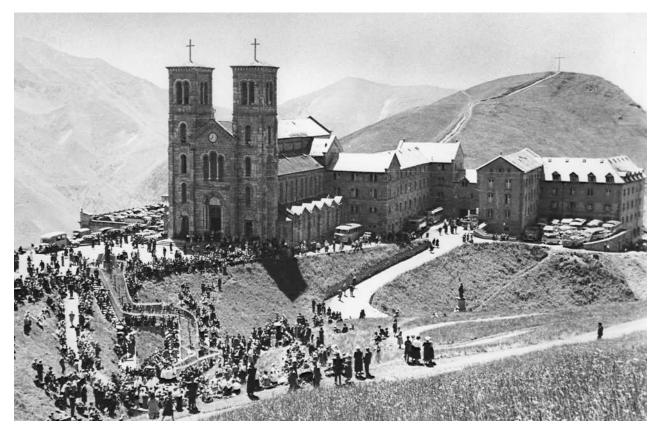

Bibliography: L. J. AUBIN, "La Salette," Catholic Encyclopedia Suppl. II (New York 1922). L. CARLIER, Histoire de l'apparition de la Mère de Dieu sur la montagne de La Salette (Paris 1941). J. JAOUEN, La Grace de La Salette (Paris 1946). J. BEEVERS, The Sun Her Mantle (Westminster, Md. 1953). J. S. KENNEDY, Light on the Mountain (New York 1953). L. BASSETTE, Le Fait de La Salette (Paris 1955). W. B. ULLATHORNE, The Holy Mountain of La Salette (4th ed. London 1855).

[H. M. GILLETT]

LA SALETTE, MISSIONARIES OF OUR LADY OF

(MS, Official Catholic Directory #0720); a congregation of priests and brothers devoted to preaching missions and retreats, conducting shrines and centers of devotion to Our Lady, working in the foreign missions, and caring for parishes.

Beginnings. The Missionaries of Our Lady of La Salette had their origin in the group of diocesan priests organized in 1852 by Bp. Philibert de Bruillard of Grenoble, France, to serve at the church being erected on the mountain of La Salette, on the spot of the apparition of the Blessed Virgin Sept. 19, 1846. The first three members, P. Burnoud, M. Sibillat, and A. Denaz, began their work in May 1852 and were joined the following spring by P. Bonvallet and P. Archier. Although Denaz was the first to express a desire for religious life, he died before the first profession, when six of his companions took their vows on Feb. 2, 1858, the foundation day of the congregation.

Exterior of pilgrimage church, La Salette, southeast France.

The first rule was merely an outline drawn up by the vicar-general of the diocese; however, Revs. Sylvain Giraud and Pierre Archier soon crystallized the nature, purpose, and spirit of the congregation. Giraud, who had entered the congregation in November 1858 and was appointed novice master in 1862, wrote La Pratique de la Dévotion à Notre Dame de la Salette (1863) and De la Vie d'Union avec Marie (1864). His books embodied the spirit and spirituality of the congregation. Between 1858 and 1876, however, two tendencies developed within the community—one for a contemplative, Trappist-like life, and the other for an active apostolate. A chapter in 1876, which elected Archier as superior, firmly oriented the congregation toward the active apostolate.

Development. In 1876 Archier opened a minor seminary and sought the approval of Rome for the congregation. LEO XIII gave the first decree of approbation in May 1879; the rule was finally approved in 1926. In June 1880 the first band of missionaries left for Norway, and five years later, three of the group were ordained, the first in Norway since the Reformation. In 1881 the major seminary was moved to Switzerland and in 1896 to Rome.

Two priests were sent to the U.S. in 1892 to begin a foundation at Hartford, Conn.; in 1899 missionaries departed for Madagascar.

In 1901, when all French foundations were lost to the congregation through governmental legislation, the care of the basilica and the pilgrimage on the mountain of La Salette reverted to the bishop. After World Wars I and II, however, the former foundations were reestablished and new ones begun; the fathers returned to La Salette in 1943. The first foundation in Rome dates from 1896, when some seminarians were sent there to complete their studies.

American Foundations. In 1902 at the request of Bp. Thomas Beaven of Springfield, Mass., five Swiss priests were sent to Cracow, Poland, to learn the language to prepare them to minister to Polish immigrants in the U.S. This led to a Polish province and foundations in the U.S. and Argentina.

Bp. Lawrence McMahon welcomed the two priests who were sent to Hartford, where a number of priests, seminarians, and lay brothers joined them. Encouraged by the hierarchy, the U.S. province also entered actively into parish work. In 1937 the mission territory of Arakan, Burma (eventually also the Prome-Thayetmyo district) was given to its care. In 1927 the basis for a new province was laid with the purchase of property in Enfield, N.H., to serve as a minor seminary for the French-speaking in New England and Canada. In 1958 the western part of the U.S., two foundations of the Polish province (Olivet, Ill., and Milwaukee, Wis.), and five in Canada, was established as a separate province, with provincial residence at St. Louis, Mo.

The generalate is in Rome. There are three provinces in the U.S.: the Province of Our Lady of Seven Dolors (1934) with its headquarters in Hartford, Conn.; the Province of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (1945) with its headquarters in Attleboro, Mass.; the Province of Mary Queen (1958) with its headquarters in St Louis, Mo.; and the Province of Mary, Queen of Peace (1967) with its headquarters in Twin Lakes, Wis.

Bibliography: J. JAOUEN, Les Missionnaires de Notre Dame de la Salette (Les Grands Ordres Monastiques et Instituts Religieux 43; Paris 1953). J. P. O'REILLY, The Story of La Salette (Chicago 1953). L. BASSETTE, Le Fait de la Salette (Paris 1955).

[J. A. LEFRANCOIS/EDS.]

LA SALLE, ROBERT CAVELIER DE

French explorer; b. Rouen, France, Nov. 22, 1643; d. Texas, March 19, 1687. In 1658 he went to Paris, where he became a Jesuit novice, but finding himself unsuited to this kind of life, he left the society. He sailed for New France (1666), arriving at Montreal, where the Sulpicians granted him a seigneury on the island of Montreal, which he named Saint Sulpice in honor of his benefactors; Saint Sulpice later became the town of La Chine. La Salle's curiosity was aroused by the natives' tales of a great river to the southwest that flowed, no one knew how far, in a southerly direction. He spent two years learning eight Native American dialects and gaining practical experience with French homesteaders and native hunters in the Canadian terrain. In 1668 he approached Gov. Rémy Courcelle and the intendant, Jean Baptiste Talon, who authorized a trip for exploration, but advanced no funds and delegated no authority to draw upon state resources for any assistance. Unlike J. Cartier, La Salle had to finance his own exploring ventures; he obtained funds for the journey by selling to the Sulpicians the land they had given him earlier. At Courcelle's suggestion, the Sulpicians under Dollier de Casson sent a few of their number with La Salle to preach to the Native Americans. After exploring the Ohio River, the French penetrated into Lake Michigan and discovered the upper Illinois River. In 1672 La Salle was sent out by L. de B. Frontenac, governor of New France, to arrange a meeting with the native tribes. It was held the following summer on the site of present-day Kingston, Ontario, at the junction of Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River, where Frontenac advised the tribes of his intentions to build a fort and trading post. La Salle was made commandant (1673) of the fort, named after Frontenac, and, after receiving a patent of nobility from Louis XIV, began (1675) to develop it as a trading post. In the autumn of 1677 he returned to France to obtain sanction for a proposed expedition in search of the Mississippi; he received authorization to erect at his own expense two forts, one at the mouth of the Niagara and one at the southern extremity of Lake Michigan. In return for these efforts, Louis XIV granted him exclusive right of the buffalo hide trade in the Mississippi region.

Bp. Philibert de Bruillard.

After his return to Fort Frontenac (1678), La Salle set out on his second trip of exploration, during which he succeeded (1682) in descending the Mississippi from its junction with the Illinois to the Gulf of Mexico at present-day New Orleans. He took possession of the whole area, which he named Louisiana. When he returned to France (1683) and discovered that war between Spain and France was imminent, he recognized that, since Spanish-controlled Mexico was relatively close to the regions he had recently penetrated, New Orleans could serve as a strategic base for military operations against Mexico.

Moreover, the northern portion of Mexico contained rich gold and silver mines that would greatly increase French wealth. At Versailles, on April 14, 1684, Louis XIV sanctioned La Salle's plan and gave some state aid to the enterprise, which, however, met with trouble from the outset. La Salle was unsuccessful in his attempt to locate the mouth of the Mississippi by sailing from France directly to the Gulf of Mexico, and his four ships carrying potential settlers finally landed on the southern coast of Texas. The captains of the ships refused to cooperate with the unfortunate La Salle, who was shot and killed on March 19, 1687. The settlers fell victims to the natives, who spared only the children, who later were adopted by the Spaniards in Mexico. Of the 300 people who had set out from France on July 24, 1685, only five escaped the natives and made their way to New France.

La Salle's expeditions did not enjoy the full support of the French government, which was more interested in a thorough development of the St. Lawrence area and felt that exploration took men away from this goal. Despite this, the famous explorer added to European knowledge of North America and greatly extended French sovereignty there.

Bibliography: P. CHESNEL, History of Cavelier de La Salle, 1643–1687: Explorations in the Valleys of the Ohio, Illinois and Mississippi, tr. A. C. MEANY (New York 1932). W. J. ECCLES, Frontenac: The Courtier Governor (Toronto 1959). The Encyclopedia of Canada, ed. W. S. WALLACE, 6 v. (Toronto 1935–37) 6:75–76. L. V. JACKS, La Salle (New York 1931). F. PARKMAN, The Discovery of the Great West (Toronto 1962). Royal Fort Frontenac, comp. and tr. R. A. PRESTON (Toronto 1958). J. L. RUTLEDGE, Century of Conflict: The Struggle between the French and British in Colonial America (Can. Hist. Ser. 2; Garden City, N.Y. 1956).

[F. BOLAND]

LASANCE, FRANCIS XAVIER

Writer of Catholic devotional works; b. Cincinnati, Ohio, Jan. 24, 1860; d. there, Dec. 11, 1946. After education at Xavier College, Cincinnati, and St. Meinrad Abbey, Ind., he was ordained May 24, 1883, by Abp. William Henry ELDER of Cincinnati. During the next seven years Lasance served as curate and pastor at Kenton, Reading, Dayton, Lebanon, and Monroe—all in the Cincinnati Archdiocese. Poor health forced him to give up parish work in 1890; from then until his death he lived a retired, semi-invalid existence, writing numerous devotional works on the Mass and the Eucharist; editing and compiling several missals; and publishing numerous spiritual books, especially for religious and children. He was the author of about 30 works, including Thoughts on the Religious Life (1907), My Prayer Book (1913), Reflec- tions for Religious (1920), Our Lady Book (1924), and New Missal for Every Day (1932).

[J. Q. FELLER]

LAS CASAS, BARTOLOMÉ DE

Spanish Dominican author and "Apostle to the Indians"; b. Seville, 1474; d. Madrid, 1566. The son of a merchant who had accompanied Columbus on his second voyage, Las Casas himself went to America in 1502 with Governor Ovando, and was ordained in Española. After his own experience as an encomendero in Cuba, he gave up colonizing to undertake the reform of a colonial system whose inhumanity disgusted him. From 1515 to 1522 both in Spain and in America, he tried to win approval for a series of projects that, without ignoring the just interests of the Crown and of good colonists, would lead to the elimination of the disastrous practices of the encomienda system and military conquest and would foster peaceful colonization and the Christianization of the native tribes. The results hardly came up to his hope and when his last attempt, thwarted by circumstances and his own imprudence, ended bloodily, Las Casas withdrew from society and entered the Dominican Order (1523).

After a long retreat, which gave him the opportunity to study theology and to plan his great works, Las Casas resolutely resumed his interrupted activity, directing his efforts toward evangelical conquest. He played a decisive role in the defeat of the rebel cacique Enriquillo in Española; he attempted a missionary venture, opposed by the authorities, in an unpacified area of Nicaragua; and, above all, he laid careful plans for a peaceful entry into Guatemala—in Tezulutlán, the Land of War. In Spain after 1540, Las Casas devoted himself to far-reaching demands for reform that produced some favorable results. As implacable in his accusations as he was fertile and persuasive in his suggestion for remedies, he is considered primarily responsible for the famous New Laws of 1542-43, which reorganized the Council of the Indies, established new audiencias, provided for the gradual suppression of the encomienda system, prohibited enslavement of native peoples, and decreed new regulations for discoveries and conquests. These laws were not a complete success, and the colonial world opposed them strongly. As bishop of Chiapa, Las Casas returned to America in 1544 to take part in the struggle himself. He did not even succeed in enforcing the New Laws in his own diocese, but received a slightly warmer reception from the natives of the "Land of War," where he and his fellow DOMINICANS founded a mission called Vera Paz.

His final return to Spain in 1547 did not mean retirement for the tireless old man. About 1550 he engaged in his famous controversy with Sepúlveda on the question of wars of conquest in the Indies. Some years later he was actively opposing the continuation of the encomienda system, and up until his death he was the zealous advocate of the native peoples, seeking redress of their grievances. During these last years, as well as earlier in his career, his chief weapon was his pen. His extensive writings were all connected with his reform projects. He wrote three major works: De unico vocationis modo, a Latin treatise on the theory of the evangelical conquest; Apologética historia, a detailed description of the abilities of native peoples; and Historia de Las Indias; a condemnation of 30 years of poor colonial policy. He wrote also many doctrinal treatises, letters, memorials, and pamphlets, of which the most famous, Brevisima relación de la destrucción de las Indias, is also the most stern indictment of the cruelty of the CONQUISTADORES. Because of its sensationalism it was immediately translated into other languages and widely circulated. It was in large part responsible for the development of the "Black Legend," the consequences of which still exist and have fallen back in part upon Las Casas himself. Despite this, history must note the human compassion in Las Casas's ideals.

Bartolomé de Las Casas is visited by two native converts in this early engraving. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: Obras escogidas, ed. J. PÉREZ DE TUDELA BUESO, 5 v. (Madrid 1957–58). R. MENÉNDEZ PIDAL, El padre las Casas, su doble personalidad (Madrid 1963). M. M. MARTINEZ, Fray Bartolomé de las Casas: Padre de América (Madrid 1958). M. GIMÉNEZ FERNÁNDEZ, Bartolomé de las Casas, 2 v. (Seville 1953–60). L. HANKE, The Spanish Struggle for Justice in the Conquest of America (Philadelphia 1949). H. R. WAGNER and H. R. PARISH, The Life and Writings of Bartolomé de las Casas (Albuquerque, NM 1967). J. FRIEDE and B. KEEN, Bartolomé de las Casas in History: Toward an Understanding of the Man and His Work (De Kalb, Ill. 1971). G. GUTIÉRREZ, Las Casas: In Search of the Poor of Poor of Jesus Christ (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1993).

[A. SAINT-LU/EDS.]

ŁASKI, JAN AND JAN (LASCO)

Uncle and nephew. Jan, chancellor and primate of Poland; b. Łaski, Poland, 1456; d. Kalisz, Poland, May 19, 1531. After completing his education in Poland and abroad, he held various spiritual offices, becoming chancellor in 1503. In 1505 he compiled the "Łaski Statutes," the first official edition of Polish law. In 1510 he became archbishop of Gniezno, and thereby, primate of Poland. An ardent foe of the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, he sought to annex East Prussia to Poland. At the Fifth LATERAN COUNCIL he defended Poland's rights to Prussia, at which time Pope Leo X conferred upon him and his successors in the archiespiscopal See of Gniezno the title of legatus natus. At Łaski's request Pope Leo X ordered the grand master of the Teutonic Knights to pay homage to the king of Poland. He later opposed the Peace of Cracow (1525), by which the grand master, in return for this homage, received the king's recognition of the secularization of Prussia. From 1526 onward, Łaski's influence at court began to decline. Toward the end of his life, he was suspected of aiding the Turks through his nephew Jerome. In 1530 Pope Clement VII ordered him to Rome to explain his actions, but he was prevented from leaving the country by King Sigismund. Łaski was a vigorous foe of Lutheranism. Even before the COUNTER REFORMATION, which began in Poland under his aegis, he laid particular stress on the need for Church reform, especially in the selection and training of parochial clergy and in the general enlightenment of the faithful. Throughout his life he stressed discipline, morals, and clerical zeal. He edited a number of editions of canonical decrees and statutes.

Jan, religious reformer, nephew of the above Jan; b. Łaski, Poland, 1499; d. Pinczów, Jan. 8, 1560. He began his early education at Cracow under the guidance of his uncle and later studied in Rome and Bologna. He was ordained in 1521. From 1524 to 1526, he traveled throughout western Europe and befriended Huldrych ZWINGLI, Guillaume FAREL and Desiderius ERASMUS; the lastmentioned left him his library. On the death of his uncle (1531), he returned to western Europe, residing principally in Frankfurt and Liège, where he came further under the influence of the Protestants and where he later married. He was then appointed superintendent of Church affairs in Emden, in East Friesland, which he quickly turned into a "northern Geneva" and where he established one of the first compulsory educational systems in Europe. The Emden catechism was in great part his work. In 1550 he accepted the invitation of Thomas CRANMER to visit England, where he became the head of the congregation of Protestant refugees of Austin Friars in London. In this position, he influenced the development of Puritanism, and to a lesser degree that of Anglicanism. On the accession of Mary Tudor, he settled in Denmark, then in Emden, and eventually in Frankfurt. From Frankfurt he addressed three letters to King Sigismund August and to the Polish nobility, in which he called upon them to introduce the Reformation into Poland. At the request of the Polish Calvinists, he was permitted to return to Poland, where he unsuccessfully sought to win the king and the Lutherans to Calvinism. He settled in Little Poland, where he quickly became the head of the Calvinists. He spent his last years in organizing schools and in improving existing translations of the Bible.

Bibliography: H. DALTON. John A. Lasco (London 1936). B. STASIEWSKI, Reformation und Gegenreformation in Polen (Münster 1960); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:803–804. v. FALKENROTH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:236.

[E. KUSIELEWICZ]

LASSO, ORLANDO DI

Distinguished Renaissance polyphonist of the Franco-Flemish tradition; b. Mons (Hainaut), Flanders, 1530 or 1532 (evidence favors 1532); d. Munich, June 14,1594. The original name was probably Roland de Lassus, Latinized as Orlandus Lassus, but the composer himself preferred the Italian form. After being choirboy at St. Nicholas in Mons, at age 12 he was brought to the court at Palermo and later to Milan by Ferdinand Gonzaga, Viceroy of Sicily. From 18 to 21 he was in the service of the Marquis of Terza at Naples, and in 1553 was appointed choirmaster at St. John Lateran in Rome, which position he held for a little more than a year. At that time he must have become acquainted with PALESTRINA, then choirmaster at the Julian Chapel and in 1555 Lasso's successor at the Lateran. After visits to England and France, he spent two years (1555–56) in Antwerp supervising the first publication of his works, a collection of madrigals, chansons, and motels that display remarkable versatility and accomplishment. Called to the Bavarian court of Albert V at Munich in 1556, he served in the ducal chapel as a tenor singer and then, after 1563, as chapelmaster. In 1558 he married Regina Wäckinger, who gave him four sons and two daughters. He was knighted in 1570 by Maximilian II, and in 1574 by Pope Gregory XIII. That same year he was offered a post at the French court by Charles IX, but the offer was quickly voided by the king's death later that year. Among Lasso's Munich pupils was Giovanni GABRIELI, who served and studied under him from 1575 to 1579. Lasso's later years were darkened by ill health and melancholia.

Lasso was one of the most prolific of major composers. Of some 1,250 known works, his most important are the motets, which constitute about half the total and rank him, along with Josquin DESPREZ and Palestrina, among the greatest Renaissance masters. He also composed over 50 Masses, more than 100 Magnificats, four Passions, and a wide variety of liturgical pieces. His hundreds of Italian, French, and German songs include many excellent examples of their kind. Lasso's style is rooted in the expressive, firmly wrought polyphony of his older countrymen, Desprez and Jacobus CLEMENS NON PAPA. It appears fully matured in his Primo Libro de Motetti (Antwerp 1555), wherein not only his mastery of imitative polyphony for five and six voices is displayed, but also a remarkable sensitivity to the text and ability to express it through music. Influence of the chromatic experiments of RORE and VICENTINO is revealed in the early Prophetiae Sibyllarum. His style is identified with musica reservata (music "reserved" for the understanding of connoisseurs) by his humanist friend Samuel Quickelberg in commenting on the composer's monumental cycle of penitential psalms. On the whole, Lasso's music is more harmonically oriented than Palestrina's, and is more apt to display dramatic and extraordinary effects that anticipate the baroque idiom.

Most of Lasso's Masses are parodies based on motets, madrigals, and chansons by himself and others. His Masses, unlike his motets, cannot compare with Palestrina's for richness of invention and spiritual power. As Lasso aged, the exuberance and harmonic color of his earlier work gave way to a more austere, somber style "affording a profounder pleasure to the mind and ear," as he wrote in the preface to his last motet collection (1593). His final work, the cycle of spiritual madrigals Lagrime di S. Pietro (1595), illustrates the introspection of his late style. In 1604 Lasso's sons, Rudolph and Ferdinand, brought out virtually the entire corpus of his motets as the Magnus opus musicum. This served as the basis for the Sämtliche Werke of which 21 of a projected 60 volumes were published.

See Also: LITURGICAL MUSIC, HISTORY OF, 4

Bibliography: Sämtliche Werke, ed. F. X. HABERL and A. SANDBERGER, 21 v. (Leipzig 1894-1926), motets and most of the secular music; Neue Reihe (new ed. Kassel 1961-64), 4 v. to date, containing miscellaneous motets and secular pieces, the 4 Passions, and 17 Masses; Septem Psalmi poenitentiales, ed. H. BÄUERLE (Leipzig 1906); Lagrime di S. Pietro, ed. H. J. THERSTAPPEN, in Das Chorwerk, ed. F. BLUME, 34, 37, 41 (Wolfenbüttel 1936); Prophetiae Sibyllarum (ibid.) 48 (1937); Musica Sacra, ed. F. COMMER, v. 5-12 (Regensburg 1839-87), Masses and liturgical pieces. W. BOETTICHER, Orlando di Lasso und seine Zeit, 1532-1594 (Kassel 1958-); Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 8:251-292. E. LOWINSKY, Das Antwerpener Motettenbuch Orlando di Lasso's . . . (The Hague 1937). J. R. MILNE, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 5: 59-82. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). D. CROOK, Orlando di Lasso's Imitation Magnificats for Counter- Reformation Munich (Princeton, N.J. 1994). R. FREEDMAN, "The Lassus Chansons and Their Protestant Listeners of the Late Sixteenth Century," Musical Quarterly, 82 (1998) 564-585. F. KÖRNDLE, "Lassos Musik zum Vltimum Judicium," Die Musikforschung, 53 (2000) 68-70. M. LESSOIL-DAELMAN, "Les jeux numériques dans les Psaumes de la Pénitence de Lassus," Revue Belge de Musicologie, 49 (1995) 47–78. H. LEUCHTMANN, "Orlando di Lassos Bußpsalmen," Musik und Kirche, 66 (1996) 273-278. D. R. MELAMED, "Who Wrote Lassus's Most Famous Piece?," Early Music, 26 (1998) 6-22. J. T. WINEMIL-LER, "Lasso, Albrecht V, and the Figure of Job: Speculation on the History and Function of Lasso's Sacrae lectiones ex propheta Iob and Vienna Mus. Ms. 18.744," Journal of Musicological Research, 12 (1993) 273-302.

[M. PICKER]

Orlando di Lasso. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

LASSO DE LA VEGA, RAFAEL

Bishop in Gran Colombia during the independence period; b. Santiago de Veraguas, Panama, Oct. 21, 1764; d. Quito, Ecuador, April 6, 1831. He belonged to an honorable family. He was educated in the seminaries of Panama and Santafé de Bogotá, in whose University of Santo Tomás he received a doctorate in canon law. He was ordained in 1792 and served in a parish in Bogotá, teaching at the same time in the university as professor of Latin. He became canon of the metropolitan cathedral of Bogotá and of the cathedral of Panama. Ferdinand VII presented him as bishop of Mérida, and he was confirmed by the papal bull of March 8, 1815. As an appointment of the restored Ferdinand VII, Lasso de la Vega worked against the independence movement and suspended priests who supported it. However, when the break with Spain was accomplished, he changed his position and supported the victorious Bolívar. In 1821, after the signing of the Constitution of Cúcuta, he left his congregation in Mérida and took an active part in the legislative work of the new republic of Colombia. He was a senator in 1823-24 and was selected vice president of the Congress. He undertook to promote contacts between the new nation and the Roman Curia. His letter to Pius VII of Oct. 20, 1821, on the political events in the New World, revealed the problems of the American revolution to the pope and was the beginning of diplomatic relations between the Vatican and the new republics. In 1828, on the petition of the president of Colombia, he was promoted by Leo XII to the bishopric of Quito.

Mosaic of the Last Supper, 6th century, S. Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna.

[E. J. CASTILLERO]

LAST SUPPER, ICONOGRAPHY OF

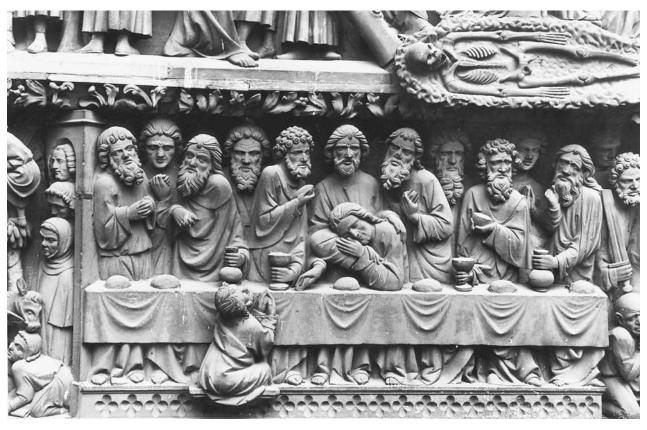

Symbolic representations of the Last Supper appear in the earliest Christian art. Aside from these, the iconography of the Last Supper usually takes the form of one of three scenes: the washing of the feet of the Apostles; the discovery of the treachery of Judas; and the Communion of the Apostles.

Symbolic Representations. Until the Edict of Milan (313), virtually all references to the New Testament in the art of the CATACOMBS are symbolic. Representations of the Last Supper, however, are unusually abundant in the catacomb of St. Callisto, Rome (early 3d century). The fish and bread are shown together, sometimes filling a tripod. During this period, in the same underground cemetery, seven places provided with bread and fish are shown spaced out around the table. It is, on the one hand, an exact recollection of the refrigerium or funerary meal and, on the other, a reference to the Eucharist, though not to the Last Supper. In the famous Greek chapel of the Roman catacomb of Priscilla, one of the guests is already shown (c. 150; see AGAPE) making the gesture of fractio panis; the figure, however, is not to be interpreted as that of Christ. As soon as the Church attained its freedom, references to the Last Supper become more explicit. In a colonnaded sarcophagus (350–380; Musée Lapidaire Chrétien, Arles), Christ is in the midst of six Apostles, the two closest of whom offer him bread and fish. The symbolic articles survived beyond the art of the catacombs. In Rome on the bas-relief of the door of S. Sabina (c. 425–430) Christ is represented twice. In the upper part He is shown blessing seven baskets of bread, and in the lower portion, He is blessing seven pitchers of wine.

The Washing of the Feet. The first of the three scenes (Jn 13.1–17) is very important, since it prefigures the Sacrament of Penance and appropriately precedes that of the Eucharist, or Communion. This purification of the Apostles, sometimes referred to as the "Baptism of the Apostles," constituted a theme that was perfect for the decoration of lavabos in the sacristy and the cloister (1705, wood lavabo by Giovanni Giuliani; Cistercian Abbey, Heiligenkreuz). In this scene, Christ remains standing in Byzantine art (6th-century evangeliary, archbishop's residence, Rossano; 11th-century mosaic, Daphni), whereas in Western art he customarily kneels before Peter (12th-century cloister capital, Moissac; façade relief, St.-Gilles-du-Gard). Though the washing of the feet has never been a very popular scene in Christian iconography, nevertheless it persisted long after the Council of Trent. Later representations include those of Claude Vignon (1653, Nantes Museum), Jean-Honoré Fragonard (1754, cathedral of Grasse), and Ford Madox Brown (1852; Tate Gallery, London).

The Treachery of Judas. The discovery of the treachery of Judas has been widely represented in Western art. It permitted, in every case, the most incisive psychological study and the most dramatic setting (1495–97; fresco by Leonardo da Vinci, S. Maria delle Grazie, Milan). A few rare examples show Christ and his disciples standing (late 13th century; central tympanum, west façade, cathedral of Strasbourg). In the art of the first millennium of our era, the C-shaped table perpetuated the memory of the Roman triclinium (520-530, mosaic, San Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna; 6th-century evangeliary, Rossano). This arrangement of the triclinium does not reappear until much later, under the influence of archeological preoccupations (1678, painting by Jean Baptiste de Champaigne; Lyons Museum). Beginning in the Romanesque period, the guests are seated around a rectangular table; Christ commonly occupies the center of the long side, and Judas, isolated, is opposite him. Judas is identified by one or more of the following characteristics: in the vast majority of cases he holds a purse; frequently he holds his hand toward the plate or swallows the piece of bread, dipped in wine, which Christ extends to him (1394, panel painting by Bertram de Minden; Hanover Museum). At this precise moment, the devil sometimes enters into his mouth in the form of a toad or a red winged creature, in order to illustrate the words of St. John: tunc introivit in eum Satanas (c. 1215, Psalter of Blanche of Castille; Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, Paris); or he steals a fish, proof of his gluttony (1181; ambo of Nicholas of Verdun, Klosterneuberg). In contrast to the bright haloes of the other Apostles, that of Judas is black or absent (1305, fresco by Giotto; Scrovegni Chapel, Padua). Titian was the first to place the table on a slant, to suggest a much greater depth (c. 1544; Ducal Palace, Urbino). Accepting this ingenious arrangement, Tintoretto plunged the scene into darkness pierced with difficulty by a flaring lamp (1594; S. Giorgio Maggiore, Venice).

Last Supper, late-13th-century sculpture, detail of the west facade tympanum, Cathedral at Strasbourg, Germany.

Communion of the Apostles. The Communion of the Apostles is a theme especially well represented in Byzantine art (Gospel Book of Rabbula, 586; Laurentian Library, Florence). Christ is represented twice, since six Apostles advance toward him to receive the bread and six others to receive the wine; all are standing. In Western art, Christ is represented once and He alone remains standing. The Apostles kneel, and the Virgin also, if she is present. Among the rare examples may be cited a fresco by Fra Angelico (1432–42; Convent of St. Mark, Florence) ence), a panel by Justus of Ghent (1474; Pinacoteca, Urbino), and a fresco by Luca Signorelli (1512, Cortona cathedral). Western artists have sometimes evoked the institution of the Eucharist by means of the blessing of the bread and of the wine (Consecration). This is the case with Dirk Bouts (1464–70; church of St. Peter, Louvain), who enriched the theme by means of four prefigurations borrowed from the Old Testament: the sacrifice of Melchisedec to Abraham, the harvest of the manna in the desert, Elijah comforted by an angel, and the Jewish Passover.

Bibliography: O. SCHMITT, ed., Reallexikon zur deutschen Kunstgeschichte (Stuttgart 1933–). M. VLOBERG, L'Eucharistie dans l'art (Grenoble 1946). E. H. KANTOROWICZ, "Baptism of the Apostles," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 9–10 (1956) 205–251. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 2.2.

[V. DENIS]

LASUÉN, FERMÍN FRANCISCO DE

Franciscan missionary; b. Vitoria, Cantabria, Spain, June 7, 1736; d. Carmel, Calif., June 27, 1803. He was the son of Lorenzo and María Francisca (de Arasqueta) de Lasuén. He became a Franciscan (1751) and as a deacon volunteered for the missions of the New World. Upon arriving in Mexico (1759), he entered the Apostolic College of San Fernando. After serving the missions of the Sierra Gorda (1762-67), he went to Baja California until 1773, building the mission of San Borjas. Traveling overland to the missions of Upper California, Lasuén reached San Diego (1773) and was assigned to Mission San Gabriel until 1775, when he became the personal chaplain to Commander Rivera at Monterey. Fray J. Serra sent him to found Mission San Juan Capistrano, but his assignment there was cut short by the Native American revolt at San Diego. After the restoration of peace he was placed in charge of San Diego until 1785, when he was chosen president of the missions of Upper California, with headquarters at Mission San Carlos, Carmel. Between 1786 and 1798, Lasuén founded nine missions, bringing the total established since 1769 to 18. He was vicar forane, ecclesiastical judge, and military vicar for the bishop of Sonora, in whose jurisdiction California lay, and from 1795 he was commissary of the Holy Office of the Inquisition. Under Lasuén the number of missionaries increased from 18 to 40; between 1784 and 1802 baptisms rose from 5,800 to 33,717, and the number of converts living at the missions, from 4,646 to 15,562. Mission buildings increased, and stone churches such as San Carlos and San Gabriel were erected.

Though adhering to principles, Lasuén was diplomatic in his relationships with the civil and military authorities. The explorers G. Vancouver, J. P. Lapérouse, and C. Malaspina, who met him at Monterey, proclaimed him a model padre and president. Their combined appraisal of him, together with that of later historians such as G. Bancroft and C. E. Chapman, show Lasuén to have been a pious, learned, agreeable, dignified, unobtrusive, and benevolent apostle, who through the quiet force of his character built up the missions spiritually, economically, and architecturally. His numerous writings were confined to missions matters and are concise in style. Lasuén is interred at Carmel Mission church.

See Also: CALIFORNIA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; SAN FRANCISCO, ARCHDIOCESE OF.

Bibliography: Archives, Santa Barbara Mission. Archives, Archdiocese of San Francisco. Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico City. Missions San Gabriel, San Diego, and San Carlos, Calif., Church Registers. H. H. BANCROFT, History of California, 7 v. (San Francisco 1884–90). C. E. CHAPMAN, A History of California: The Spanish Period (New York 1928). Z. ENGELHARDT, The Missions and Missionaries of California, 4 v. (2d ed. San Francisco 1929); San Diego Mission (San Francisco 1920). M. J. GEIGER, The Life and Times of Fray Junípero Serra, 2 v. (Washington 1959). F. KENNEALLY, Writings of Fermín Francisco de Lasuén, 2 v. (Washington 1965).

[M. GEIGER]

LAS VEGAS, DIOCESE OF

From 1931 to the establishment of the Diocese of Las Vegas (Dioecesis Campensis) in 1995, all the state of Nevada was in the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Reno. In October 1976, Pope Paul VI, in recognition of the growth in population and importance of the southern part of the state where the majority of Catholics lived, redesignated it as the diocese as Reno-Las Vegas. In 1995 when Pope John Paul II re-formed Reno as a separate diocese, Bishop Daniel Walsh who had been bishop of Reno-Las Vegas was appointed to the new diocese of Las Vegas. In May 2000 Bishop Walsh was transferred to the diocese of Santa Rosa and a year later Joseph A. Pepe was installed in Guardian Angel Cathedral as the second bishop of Las Vegas.

The Las Vegas diocese consists of Nevada's five southernmost counties. The diocesan newspaper is the Desert Clarion. It is a suffragan see of the Province of San Francisco.

[M. CUNNINGHAM]

LATEAU, LOUISE

Stigmatic; b. Bois d'Haine, Belgium, Jan. 29, 1850; d. there, Aug. 25, 1883. She came of poor parents. Her health seems to have been good until she was savaged by a cow when she was 13. From that time she suffered successively from abscesses, throat trouble, neuralgic pains, and blood-spitting and was several times believed to be dying. She also began to have visions, and in 1868 she was gradually stigmatized, the wounds in the side, feet, and hands appearing one after the other and bleeding on Fridays, when she also fell into ecstasy. On the other days of the week she continued to work, but she ate practically nothing, and from spring 1871 onward was unable to take any solid food. She drank very little and later, it is alleged, nothing at all. In 1876 she became bedridden and from then on is believed to have lived only on Holy Communion. She also developed other faculties generally associated with stigmatization such as clairvoyance and hierognosis, that is, discernment of blessed objects and of the authenticity of relics.

The phenomena aroused great interest throughout Belgium and elsewhere, and in 1868 an ecclesiastical commission was appointed to investigate them. Its members subjected Louise to severe tests including the "recall," that is, the termination of an ecstasy or trance by a mental or oral command, and by making her work on Fridays in an unsuccessful attempt to prevent the phenomena from appearing. The German physician, Prof. R. Virchow, considered her a fraud, but on the other hand, the Belgian Academy of Medicine, after a lengthy investigation, confessed themselves unable to explain the phenomena naturally (See STIGMATIZATION).

Bibliography: M. DIDRY and A. WALLEMACQ, Belgian Mystic of the Nineteenth Century: Louise Lateau of Bois-d'Haine, 1850–53, tr. F. IZARD (London 1931); La Stigmatisée belge: La servante de Dieu, Louise Lateau, de Bois-d'Haine (3d ed. Louvain 1947). A. THIÉRY, Nouvelle Biographie de Louise Lateau d'après les documents authentiques, 3 v. (Louvain 1915–21).

[H. GRAEF]

LATERAN

The term Lateran may refer to one building or the entire group of buildings that stand on the Monte Celio in ROME. They comprise mainly: (1) the Basilica of St. John Lateran, which is the episcopal seat of the pope as bishop of Rome; (2) the Baptistery; and (3) the Lateran Palace, which at one time served as the residence of the popes. The Lateran has been the site for five major church councils (1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, 1512–1517) and several minor ones. Under the LATERAN PACT of 1929 the Lateran enjoys diplomatic immunity but not extraterritoriality (arts. 13, 15). The Lateran serves as a museum and as the cathedral and central offices for the Diocese of Rome. Renovations and restorations have been carried out by many of the popes throughout the centuries until the present.

Although the present architecture is largely late 16th century onward, the buildings retain some foundations, architectural detail, and decoration that illustrate the long and varied history of the Lateran both before and during its Christian period (from the 4th century onward). Originally the site had been occupied by the palace of the Laterani, a noble Roman family. Eventually it became imperial property and finally passed to the Emperor Constantine through his wife Fausta (the domus Faustae). Constantine, pursing his policy of recognizing Christianity as the official religion of the Empire, donated the property with an ample patrimony to the Church. This event would be recalled several times over the subsequent centuries to reinforce the prestige of the Lateran. The height of its influence as a residence was in the Middle Ages until the time of the Avignon papacy. Subsequently the Vatican replaced the Lateran as the residence of the popes and the administrative center of the Holy See. However, on the feast of St. John the Baptist in 1962 John XXIII (1958–1963) announced the transfer of the offices for the Vicariate of Rome to the Lateran Palace. He transferred the Lateran Museum from the Vatican to the Lateran Palace in 1963.

Basilica. The Basilica of St. John Lateran is one of the four great patriarchal basilicas of Rome. It is the oldest and the first in rank (Mater et Caput Omnium Ecclesiarum Urbis et Orbis). Originally it was known as the Church of the Savior, and only later was it dedicated to John the Baptist. The first basilica was probably an adaptation by Constantine of the already existing basilica or great hall of the palace (Jerome, Ep. 73; Patrologia Latina 22:692). The subsequent architectural history is marked by numerous occasions of destruction followed by renovation, the principal causes being fire, earthquake, and neglect. There was an earthquake that damaged the apse in 443, the Vandal attacks occurred in 455; restoration was undertaken by Leo I (440-461) around 460. During the 8th century the Saracens attacked the basilica, and Adrian I (772-795) renovated it. Severe damage caused by earthquake in 896 was repaired by Sergius III (904–911) in 905. After that the Lateran retained its typical medieval form for four centuries. There is a tradition that St. Francis of Assisi appeared to Innocent III (1198–1216) in a dream to support the crumbling Lateran. At the end of the 13th century a Gothic renovation took place in 1290 under Nicholas IV (1288-1292), especially through the work of the artists Giacomo Torriti and Giacoma di Camerino. In 1308 the Lateran burned and was partly rebuilt by Clement V (1305-1314) and John XXII (1316-1334); it was burned again in 1360 and later restored by Urban V (1362-1370). It was not therefore surprising that under the impact of these and later changes, both the early and the medieval features of the basilica have disappeared almost entirely. But old drawings and paintings preserve a picture of the monumental character of the former edifice.

The main characteristics of the Constantinian basilica were the large apse rising above the bishop's throne; the altar as the center of worship, seen through the great triumphal arch at the west end of the central nave—the church was rectangular in shape and divided by rows of columns that ran from east to west; and by the arcades and four side aisles formed by the columns. The roof timbers were open. In front there was an atrium surrounded by colonnades with a fountain in the center. The façade had three windows and was embellished with mosaics. Generally the early basilica is said to have lacked a transverse nave until one was added under Clement V (1305–1314), but now Josi, Krautheimer, and S. Corbett think otherwise. They refer to a closed, tripartite nave. There was no crypt or confessio. The main walls of the central nave originally rested on 30 granite pillars, in time replaced by columns of masonry. The upper walls had mosaics with scenes from the Old and New Testaments. Toward the front a clerestory of 16 windows on each side opened onto the timber framework of the lower side roofs; the side aisles were divided by 21 smaller pillars on each side. Although the altar formerly occupied the position customary in basilicas, i.e., in the center of the chord of the apse, successive rebuildings and extensions added to the transverse nave and placed the choir beyond the altar. Above the altar is the BALDACHINO, resting on four marble columns; it was erected in 1369 but appears somewhat incongruous in the present baroque interior. Traditionally the basilica was richly decorated, hence the title Basilica Aurea given by Gregory I (590–604). Of the decoration the most famous were the mosaics of the semicircular apse. The main mosaic, representing Christ the Redeemer, was venerated throughout the Middle Ages. It was reworked in the 13th century and when the old apse was destroyed in 1878 to enlarge the church, the mosaics were reerected in the new apse.

During the Avignon papacy most of the basilica was ruined by two fires and was collapsed by an earthquake. As a result many wanted St. Peter's Basilica to become the primatial church. However, Gregory XI (1370–1380) issued a bull from Avignon in 1372 affirming the Lateran's primacy. When Gregory returned to Rome in 1377 he had to live at the Vatican because the Lateran was in poor condition and it lacked security. Martin V (1417-1431) sent a clear signal about the Lateran's importance when he restored it and provided a place for his burial there. He also installed the cosmatesque pavement in 1425. Eugenius IV (1431–1447) continued some renovations and constructed a new monastery for the Augustinian order of canon regular. Both Martin V and Eugenius IV reaffirmed the Lateran's primacy. Sixtus IV (1471–1484) affirmed the primacy of the Lateran by soliciting donations during the Holy Year of 1475. In preparation for the Holy Year of 1500 Alexander VI (1492–1503) had work done in the interior, including a fresco above the Holy Door and the triumphal arch that separates the nave from the transept. Julian II (1503–1513) had limited renovations done in preparation for the Lateran Council in 1512. Leo X (1513–1521) initiated restoration of the Lateran baptistery.

Pius IV (1559–1565) launched extensive renovations. Most the changes during his reign were done on the exterior, especially the transept façade and the roof. Pius V (1566–1572) continued the renovations and extinguished the rivalry of primacy with a bull in 1569 giving the Lateran this distinction. Freiburg highlights the importance of the twin towers and the transept façade as restoring the imperial majesty and spiritual primacy that the Lateran possessed during the Constantinian period. Gregory XIII 1572–1585) completed projects (the Aurelian wall portal, Via Appia Nuova, Via Merulana) of Pius IV and constructed another road in preparation for the Holy Year of 1575. This road began at from the north piazza, continued past the Porta Metronia to the Porta San Sebastiano, where it intersected with the Via Appia Antica.

Freiburg points out that these changes made the Lateran the centric point in a radiating scheme that facilitated access to three of the four churches Holy Year pilgrims were required to visit.

Sixtus V (1585-1590) continued the theological influence of renovations that he accomplished in the Lateran Palace. He wanted to emphasize the sacraments, especially the Eucharist. A new benediction loggia was built on the north transept façade of the basilica by Domenico Fontana. Under Clement VIII (1592-1605) renovations occurred in two phases: construction of the new transept ceiling, restoration of the high altar, the ciborium, and the confessio chapel (1592-1596) and a new chapel, with material from the Pantheon, and expansion of the transept (1597–1600). The full baroque remodeling and decoration were executed by Francesco Borromini under Innocent X (1644–1655), especially from 1646 to 1649. A new curtain wall concealed the old brickwork, and the former columns were enclosed in huge pilasters with great statues in front. Alexander Galilei built the main facade in 1735. Finally during the reign of Leo XIII (1878–1903) came the choir with extended apse.

Originally outside the basilica there were seven oratories for the deacons of the church. These were eventually worked into the church itself. The devotion of visiting the seven altars gave rise to the similar devotion found in other Roman churches.

The Baptistry. Next to the basilica, in the southwest corner of the Piazza di San Giovanni, is the octagonal baptistery, begun by Constantine on the site of the baths belonging to the former palace of the Laterani. Excavations have discovered a hot spring structure with a network of underground passages. There is evidence of an earthquake in 191. A circular room was found constructed between 300 and 312. There is a decorated mosaic pavement from the 4th century and graffiti with the Christian cross. In the interior of the baptistery are eight porphyry columns that support an architrave on which are eight smaller columns, which in turn support the octagonal drums of the lantern. Originally, detached from the basilica, the BAPTISTERY was entered through the portico of St. Venantius consisting of a vestibule in which two large porphyry columns leading still stand and which was formerly approached by a colonnade of smaller porphyry columns leading from the church. The grandeur of the baptistery expressed the solemnity with which Baptism was received in the early church. Hilary (461-468) added the two Johannine chapels; on the west side is that of John the Baptist with its bronze doors taken from the Baths of Caracalla, and on the east, that of the Evangelist. John IV (640–642) built a third oratory in honor of St. Venantius and other Dalmatian martyrs. Here the mosaics are 7th century and, when compared with earlier mosaics, they illustrate the decline in this art form.

Gregory XIII (1572–1585) made extensive renovations to the baptistery. Restorations in the interior included new windows, repairs to the marble revetment of the walls, and fresco decoration—all lost in later interventions. Freiburg states these renovations highlighted the baptistery's historical prominence given by the baptism of Constantine. During the reign of Gregory XIII baptism was once again regularly performed in the Lateran baptistery on the feasts of Easter and Pentecost. Gregory also revived the tradition of conferring confirmation there immediately after the baptismal ceremony. Clement VIII (1592–1595) renovated the chapels around the central octagon.

The Lateran Palace. The imperial residence was given by Constantine to Melchiades, the Bishop of Rome. The Lateran Palace provided a location for the residence (including a library and archives) and central administration of the church for almost 1,000 years. Julian II (337–352) created the Holy Scrinium as a repository for literary and theological writings. St. Jerome mentioned the scrinium in a 4th century letter. Hilarius I (461–468) built two libraries at the palace. Gregory the Great (590–604) mentions that he placed his sermons at Lateran. The condition of the palace declined over the next two hundred years as construction work focused on new churches to honor martyrs. John VII (705–707) planned to restore it or move the papal residence to the Palatine Hill. The palace was finally restored by Zacharias (741–752). Mandel describes how he embellished and enlarged the palace after the imperial palace at Constantinople, with a great tower, known as the Torre degli Annibaldi; a new porch before the palace archives; and a new triclinum on the piano nobile, also known as the Basilica Zacharia, complete with a map of the world. The impetus to maintain and beautify the papal residence was carried on by Leo III (795-816), who built two more triclinia; restored the long corridor connecting the second triclinium, also known as the Sala del Concilio, to the basilica; and dedicated an oratory to the Archangel Michael. Work continued on the palace during the pontificates of Gregory IV (827-844), Leo IV (847-855), and Sergius III (904-911). Callistus II (1119-1124) built a chapel dedicated to St. Nicholas and Innocent II (1130–1143) built two new rooms. Innocent III (1198-1216) further enlarged the residence with more rooms and an oratory to express the grandeur of the papacy. An earthquake damaged the Lateran in 1227. Boniface VIII (1294–1303) built the Palazzo Nuovo and the Benediction Loggia. The Lateran palace was destroyed by fire in 1308 and 1309. During the Avignon period (1309–1377) another earthquake in 1349, and a fire in 1361, further damaged the residence.

After the Avignon period the abysmal condition of Lateran Palace led to the papal residence being moved to the Vatican, where it remains to the present. However, restoration on the Lateran palace began to take place during the reign of Julius II (1503-1513) in preparation for the Fifth Lateran Council. Sixtus V (1585-1590) constructed a new Lateran Palace. Mandel describes the layout of the Lateran Palace and the frescoes of the four main halls (Hall of the Popes, Hall of the Emperors, Hall of the Apostles, and the Hall of Constantine), the five Old Testament rooms dedicated to Samuel, David, Solomon, Elijah and Daniel), the papal chapel and antechapel, the Hall of the Obelisks, the Hall of Gloria, and the four rooms of the private papal apartment. Sixtus V also had the Scala Sancta, a staircase of 28 steps made of Tyrian marble covered with wood, moved to the present site where they lead to the Sancta Sanctorum, the old private chapel of the popes in the Lateran Palace. An Egyptian obelisk was excavated from the Circus Maximus in 1586 and transferred to the piazza of the Lateran. Recent studies have demonstrated that Sixtus V's construction and decoration of a palace with imperial dimensions sought to emphasize the spiritual imperium of the pope.

Subsequent popes have made wonderful improvements. Innocent X (1644–1655) commissioned Borromini in 1646 to make additions and Alexander VII (1655-1667) restored the Oratory of the Blessed Sacrament in 1662. Pius IX (1846-1878) undertook some restorations in 1853 but he also desired to construct 14 chapels in the Sancta Sanctorum to correspond with the Stations of the Cross; Pius X (1903–1914) approved this project in 1909. Pius XI (1922-1939) approved plans to build a chapel for the Holy Year of 1925. The Lateran Museum and the Vicariate offices of Rome were moved from the Vatican to the second floor of the Lateran Palace by John XXIII (1958–1963) to restore the Lateran's historic role in the diocese. He also initiated excavations of the Lateran in 1961 that were completed in 1968 under Paul VI (1963-1978).

Bibliography: JOHN THE DEACON, Liber de ecclesia Lateranensi, Patrologia Latina 194:1543–60. P. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Italia Pontificia (Berlin 1906–35) 1:22–35. A. L. FROTHINGHAM, The Monuments of Christian Rome from Constantine to the Renaissance (New York 1908). P. LAUER, Le Palais de Latran (Paris 1911). R. A. LANCIANI, Wanderings through Ancient Roman Churches (New York 1924). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 8.2: 1529–1887. E. JOSI, "Scoperte nella Basilica Costantiniana al Laterano," Revista di archeologia cristiana 11 (1934) 335–358. R. KRAUTHEIMER, "La Façade ancienne de Saint-Jean de Latran à Rome," Revue Archéologique 6th ser., 5 (1935) 231–235. A. M. COLINI, Storia e topografia del Celio nell'antichità (Atti della Pontificia Acccademia Romana di Archeologia, ser. 3, Memorie 7; 1944). F. W. DEICH-MANN, Frühchristliche Kitchen im Rom (Basel 1948). J. DE BLASI, Le 4 basiliche patriarcali dell'Anno Santo (Florence 1949). R. ELZE, "Die päpstliche Kapelle im 12. und 13. Jahrhundert," Zeitschrift der Savigny- Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistidche Abteilung 36 (1950) 145-204; "Das 'Sacrum Palatium Lateranense' im X. und XI. Jht.," Studi gregoriani 4 (1952) 27-54. E. JOSI et al., "Note Lateranensi," Revista di archeologia cristiana 33 (1957) 79-98; 34 (1958) 59-72. L. VOELKL, "Archäologische Funde und Forschungen," Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 55 (1960) 101-121; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 6:813-815. D. FONTANA, Della transportatione dell'obelisco Vaticano et delle fabriche di Nostre Signore Papa Siste V (Rome 1604; reprinted Milan 1978). A. SCHIAVO, The Lateran Palace and Baptistery (Rome 1969). G. PELLICCIONI, Le nuove scoperte sulle origini del Battistero Lateranense (Rome 1973). C. MANDEL, Sixtus V and the Lateran Palace (Rome 1994). J. FREI-BURG, The Lateran in 1600: Christian Concord in Counter-Reformation Rome (New York 1995). A. ROCA DE AMICIS, L'Opera di Borromini in San Giovanni in Laterano: gli anni della Fabbrica 1646-1650 (Rome 1995). L. DONADONO, Scala Santa a San Giovanni in Laterano (Rome 2000).

[J. GILCHRIST/C. KOSANKE]

LATERAN COUNCILS

The Lateran basilica was from early times the particular cathedral of the bishop of Rome; and from 313, in the reign of Emperor CONSTANTINE I THE GREAT, the Lateran palace provided a meeting place for many councils convened by papal authority. Among these, although the councils held in 649, 769, 823, 1059, 1102, 1105, 1110, 1112, and 1116 have a notable place in conciliar history, it is the meetings of 1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, and 1512 to 1517 that are of outstanding importance. They are traditionally known as the First, Second, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Lateran Councils respectively, and have ecumenical status in the Western Church [see COUNCILS, GENERAL (ECUMENICAL)].

First (1123). The First Lateran (9th ecumenical) Council was convoked by Pope CALLISTUS II in December 1122, and sat from c. March 18 to April 6, 1123. Its historical context was the settlement of the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE by the Concordat of WORMS on Sept. 23, 1122, and the instrumenta of Worms were read and ratified at the Council. About 300 archbishops and bishops and perhaps 600 abbots from the Western Church were present. No record of the Council's deliberations has survived; but 22 (or, by some reckonings, 25) canons were promulgated, and various particular affairs were transacted, such as the canonization of CONRAD OF CONSTANCE (d. 976), the granting of the PALLIUM to Archbishop Adalbero of Bremen-Hamburg, and the ventilation of the Canterbury and YORK dispute over primacy in England. The canons themselves mostly restated earlier rulings (notably those of the Council of Reims in 1119), and ranged from general principles applicable to the whole Church to matters of immediate or regional interest, many of them being later subsumed into the Decretum of GRATIAN. They dealt principally with ordinations, offices, and spiritual ministrations; with clerks; and with the protection of churches, property, persons, and places. More precisely, they may be classified according to their definitions on the following topics: simoniacal ordinations (1), appointments to ecclesiastical offices (2), ordinations by the antipope Gregory VIII (6), episcopal control of the granting of the cure of souls (7), communion of clerks with excommunicates (9), the consecration of uncanonically elected bishops (10), spiritual ministrations by monks (17), appointment of parish priests by the bishop (18), monastic subjection to the bishop (19), cohabitation of clerks with women (3), clerical concubinage and marriage (21); safeguards for church property (4), protection of church offerings—especially of certain Roman churches (14), protection of church goods (20), alienation of church property by intruders (22), protection of Benevento in the papal patrimony (8) and of the Porticians in the Leonine City (12), indulgences for Crusaders and protection for their families (11), protection of pilgrims and merchants (16), the Truce of God (13), the laws of consanguinity (5), and false coining (15). The work of the Council was therefore the confirmation of peace in Christian society, the establishment of order and discipline within the Church, and the eradication of abuse. It holds a significant place in the history of the Church reform that had originated in the previous century (see GREGORIAN RE-FORM).

Second (1139). The double election of Pope INNO-CENT II and Anacletus II (see PIERLEONI) in 1130 inaugurated a period of schism that ended only with the latter's death in 1138. To affirm the recovered unity of the Church and also to deal with doctrinal and disciplinary problems, Innocent convened a plenary synod in the Lateran during April 1139. This Second Lateran (10th ecumenical) Council was attended by a large and widely representative assembly of between 500 and 1,000 archbishops, bishops, and abbots, including some from the East. The opening address by the Pope announced the deposition of the adherents of his former rival, the excommunication of Roger II of Sicily, and the condemnation of the heretical followers of PETER OF BRUYS and ARNOLD OF BRESCIA. The Council promulgated 30 canons and dealt with, among other matters, the canonization of Sturmi, first abbot of Fulda. The canons repeated a large number of definitions from the Council of Reims (1131), which itself had been influenced by that of Clermont-Ferrand (1130); and most of them were later included in

The 12th-century cloister of the Basilica of St. John Lateran, Rome, by Vassallettus and Petrus Cosmati. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Gratian's Decretum. Continuing the work of First Lateran, this legislation marks a consolidation of the reform program dating from the previous century, its canons dealing with doctrine and authority, the rights of bishops, clerks, religious, churches, and other related topics. In particular, the Council defined on the following questions: annulment of many elections by the antipope and his adherents (30); sanctions against those condemning the Eucharist, infant baptism, the priesthood, and marriage (23); prohibition of payment for Confirmation, Extreme Unction, and burials (24); the nonreception of excommunicates by bishops (3); the nonspoliation of the property of dead bishops and clerks (5); the consultation of monks and canons regular in episcopal elections (28); clerical dress and behavior (4); married clerks and those with concubines (6); marriage after solemn vows of chastity (7–8); the prohibition of study of civil law and medicine by religious (9); protection of clerks, monks, pilgrims, merchants, and others (11); priests' sons and the service of the altar (21); nuns failing to live by their rules (26) or chanting in choir with monks or canons regular (27); the protection of clerks from violence (25: Si quis suadente); simony (1–2); lay ownership of churches or tithes (10), inherited benefices (16); lay grants of benefices (25); the Truce of God (12); the prohibition of usury (13); tournaments (14); cross bows and archery (29), incendiarism (18–20); and false penitence (22).

Third (1179). Like the Council of 1139, the Third Lateran (11th ecumenical) Council followed the ending of a long period of schism that in this instance had begun with the contested election of Pope ALEXANDER III in 1159, was maintained through a series of three antipopes supported by the Emperor FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA, and was effectively ended with the papal-imperial agreement at Venice in 1177. A surviving list of the Council's participants, the first of its kind, records the attendance of about 300 bishops and numerous abbots. Regional representation was impressively wide, including, besides Italian prelates, those from France, Germany, England, Ireland, Scotland, Dalmatia, Spain, Denmark, Hungary, and the Crusaders' States. In addition there were envoys from many Christian rulers. The Council sessions were held on March 5, 14, and 19, 1179, and 27 canons were promulgated. The Council, both for its circumstances and its achievements, occupies an important place in the history of Canon Law: it was the first ecumenical council in the period of ius novum, and was presided over by the first of the great canonist popes, Alexander III, the former Rolando Bandinelli. The canons of the Council were widely disseminated and were promptly taken into the new collections of DECRETALS, from which they passed into Compilatio prima (see QUINQUE COMPILATIONES AN-TIQUAE) and finally into the official Canon Law in the Gregorian Decretales (see CORPUS IURIS CANONICI) of 1234. The opening canon (Licet de vitanda) embodied a ruling of permanent historical importance in that it required a two-thirds majority of the cardinals in all future papal elections (see POPES, ELECTION OF); the second annulled the ordinations of the antipopes Victor IV, Paschal II, and Callistus III. The remaining canons dealt mainly with disciplinary matters concerning clerks and with abuses and sanctions. The principal topics can be grouped as follows: the canonical age requirement for bishops and other officials (3); the necessity of a title before ordination (5); benefice collation (8); occupations forbidden to clerks (12); majority decisions in ecclesiastical communities (16); prohibition of more than one rector in a single church (17); the provision of cathedral schools with free instruction (18); clerical and church immunities (19); appellate jurisdiction (6); injunctions against excessive procurations (4); simony (7); pluralism (13); and clerical vices (11); regulations concerning the TEMPLARS, HOSPI-TALLERS (9) and CISTERCIANS (10), and provision of religious services for lepers (23); tournaments (12); the Truce of God (21); and protection for clerks, monks, pilgrims, merchants and others (22); sanctions against those cooperating with Saracens and pirates (24), against usurers (25), Jews and Saracens (26), Cathari, Brabançons, and other mercenaries (27). The Council therefore marked a further important stage in the development of papal legislative authority and of Church reform, and prepared the way for the still more important legislation of Pope Innocent III in the Council of 1215.

Interior of the Basilica of St. John Lateran, Rome, showing 17th-century decorations by Francesco Borromini. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Fourth (1215). The Fourth Lateran (12th ecumenical) Council marks the high point of medieval papal legislation and is sometimes called "the Great Lateran Council" or simply "the Great Council." It is generally considered the most important council before the Council of TRENT.

Background and Sessions. Projected for many years by Pope INNOCENT III, but delayed by the numerous vexatious problems with which the Pope was confronted, the Council was formally announced in a bull of April 19, 1213. "In accordance with the practice of the ancient fathers," archbishops and bishops from all parts of the Church, in East and West, were invited, together with the heads of religious orders and clerical communities and Christian secular rulers. Many letters of invitation are recorded in the papal registers. Great care and preparation were devoted to securing the widest possible representation at the Council and to ensuring its success. When at last the Council assembled in November 1215, there were present more than 400 archbishops and bishops, of whom about 70 were either primates or archbishops, including the Latin patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem, together with the delegates of those of Alexandria and Antioch. The bishops came from every part of the Western Church, including Bohemia, Hungary, Poland, Lithuania, and Estonia. Also present were more than 800 abbots and priors, as well as the envoys of Emperor FREDERICK II and the Latin Emperor of Constantinople; of the kings of France, England, Aragon, Sicily, Hungary, Cyprus, and Jerusalem; of princes, magnates, cities, and communes. There were, however, no representatives from the Greek Church in the East, though these were invited. The Council was opened on November 11 with a solemn address by the Pope on the text Desiderio desideravi hoc Pascha manducare vobiscum ante patiar (Lk 22.15). Immediately after the Pope, the patriarch of Jerusalem spoke on the misfortunes of the Holy Land. The bishop of Agde spoke next on the problem of the ALBIGENSES in the south of France. The choice of these two speakers suggested the major problems with which the Council was concerned.

In addition to the inaugural session, further meetings were held on November 20 and 30, and many questions were debated both at and between the sessions. Two problems in particular engaged the Council's attention: the promotion of a new Crusade following the unsatisfactory outcome of the Fourth CRUSADE of 1204 and the recrudescence of heresy. The Council sought the establishment of peace and unity throughout Christendom as a prerequisite for the new Crusade (a four-year peace was imposed on Christian peoples and the bishops were commanded to reconcile all enemies) and fixed the starting date at June 1, 1217; the obligation of preaching and supporting the Crusade was enjoined on all prelates and Christian rulers, protection and privileges were decreed for the crusaders, and a three-year impost of onefortieth of their income was laid on the clergy. But Innocent's hopes were destined to be unfulfilled in this matter; with his death on June 16, 1216, the necessary unity and interest were soon dissipated. As for the problem of heresy, the doctrines of the CATHARI (or Albigenses) and, to a lesser extent, those of the WALDENSES were condemned, though neither sect was specifically named in the official decrees. Of particular importance in this context were the conciliar definitions touching on the Cathari, including a solemn statement of orthodox faith, later incorporated in the Gregorian Decretales of 1234 as the opening text. Procedural rules were drawn up for the repression of heresy, and crusading privileges were extended to those taking part in the campaigns against the heretics. In addition, the position of those schismatic Greeks reunited with the apostolic see was the subject of an important decree (4). The Council was concerned also with many other spiritual and political questions: the general state of the Church, touching on dogmatic, disciplinary, and juristic questions; the moral well-being of the Church in its clergy, religious, and laity. Matters of political or regional interest dealt with at the Council included the confirmation of Frederick II as emperor of the West; the granting of the conquered part of the county of Toulouse to Simon de Montfort l'Amaury in recognition of his role against the Albigenses; the confirmation of the Pope's earlier rejection of MAGNA CARTA, which was judged by Innocent to have been extorted by the magnates from King JOHN and therefore invalid; the confirmation of Archbishop STEPHEN LANGTON's suspension; the jurisdictional claims of the primate of Toledo; and many other disputes and problems within the provinces of the Western Church. A proposal that the central machinery of papal administration should in future be supported financially by regular payments from the Church as a whole was opposed by a majority and therefore frustrated: this action is an indication of a measure of consultation and consent in the Council's deliberations.

Canons. The Council promulgated 70 canons (or capitula) and one crusading decree. The canons were soon after incorporated in Compilatio quarta (of the Quinque Compilationes antiquae), together with decretals from the closing years of Innocent's pontificate, and later passed with very few exceptions into the Decretales of 1234. Certain canons established dogmatic definitions and sacramental obligations that have remained in force to the present day: the opening canon (Firmiter credimus) included the profession of Catholic faith mentioned above, and is especially important for its definitive Eucharistic doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION; the second canon condemned the teachings of JOACHIM OF FIORE and AMALRIC OF BÈNE, and the third dealt with heretics, their protectors and episcopal INQUISITION; the fifth asserted the order of patriarchal precedence after the Roman see to be: Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem; the 21st canon (Omnis utriusque sexus) bound all Christians of the age of reason to receive annually the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist. For their spiritual and canonical importance the greater number of the canons can be classified according to several main themes: the Sacraments and spiritual ministrations; Church order, organization, and reform; ecclesiastical benefices and property; and judicial, procedural, and penal questions. As for the Sacraments and spiritual ministrations, the Council legislated on all the Sacraments except Confirmation: annual confession and Communion (21); Extreme Unction (20) and the care of the dying, with the obligation of doctors to consider the spiritual needs of their patients (22); episcopal elections (24-25); episcopal responsibility for worthy appointments and the requisite qualities of character and learning for priests and holders of benefices (26-27, 30); abuses in connection with the celebration of the Mass and divine services (17); the nonprofanation of churches (19); and marriage questions (50-51), including the reduction of the prohibited degrees of consanguinity from seven to four (52). For the promotion of Church order, organization, and reform, the Council pronounced on bishops and, among other matters, their powers of excommunication (47) and absolution (49), exactions and procurations (65, 33-34) and the nonprolongation of episcopal vacancies (23); on clerks in regard to their benefices, tonsure, behavior, and neglect of spiritual duties (14-18), their nonparticipation in secular administration and relations with feudal superiors (43, 45); and the provision for cathedral schools with free instruction (11); repeating the legislation of the 1179 Council; on monks and religious, enjoining that no new orders be founded (13) and that triennial general chapters be held in each ecclesiastical province for houses not so organized already (12: In singulis regnis), on tithe exemptions and payments (56), on privileges enjoyed during interdict (58), and other questions (cf. 59-60, 64). Relating to ecclesiastical benefices and church property, the Council dealt with the resignation of benefices (28); the abuse of pluralism (29); the canonical requirements for collation to benefices (30); the nonhereditability of benefices and the prohibition of the illegitimate sons of canons succeeding to their fathers' churches (31); incomes, taxes, imposts, procurations, and so forth (32-34); vicarages (32); prohibition of lay alienation of church property (44); regulations for the exposition of relics; and curbing the abuses of indulgences (62). Judicial, procedural, and penal matters were inevitably a concern of the great jurist Pope, and were regulated by canons on the procedure for the inquiry into and punishment of offenses, while stressing the need of prudence (9); the prohibition of the blessing of hot water and hot iron for judicial ORDEALS (18); the safeguarding of the rights of clerks from lay usurpation and the prohibition of clerks from involvement in secular justice (42); on courts of justice and appellate procedure (48); the prohibition of lay persons from being appointed arbitrators in spiritual matters (40); consideration of objections raised against judges (48); and penalties for all forms of SIMO-NY, relating to consecrations, ordinations, the reception of religious, for raising interdict, and undue exactions for burials and marriages, with the reminder that lay persons were to pay their accustomed dues (63-66).

The closing "chapters" of the Council dealt specifically with the Jews and their place in Christian society: no Christian was to have commerce with usurious Jews (67); both Jews and Saracens were to wear a distinctive dress to mark them off from Christians, and Jews were forbidden to appear in public in Holy Week to avoid risk of insult to Christians at that time (68); they might exercise no public function involving power over Christians (69); and Jews willingly seeking baptism were first to abandon their own rites (70). This legislation against the Jews, which in part continued and restated Alexander's work in the Third Lateran Council, must be seen in the context of contemporary society and in the special circumstances of the Council's preoccupation with the misfortunes of the Holy Land and a new Crusade.

The Great Lateran Council, whose canons were for the first time promulgated in the name of the Pope, is aptly considered a culminating point in the history of medieval papal legislation and leadership of Christendom, with its concern for all problems of the universal Church and every class of person in the Societas Christiana.

Fifth (1512–17). The First Lateran to the Council of VIENNE, CONCILIARISM found its expression in the Councils of PISA, CONSTANCE, and BASEL. The reemergence of papal monarchical authority after Basel did not, however, entail the eclipse of conciliar ambitions: an attempt to reopen the Council of Basel in 1482 was a failure, but academic interest in the conciliar doctrines survived and secular princes at times employed the threat of a council to bring pressure to bear on the pope. It was in the midst of the conflict between the French King Louis XII and Pope JULIUS II, and because of Julius's failure to implement his promise to convene a council, that a group of disaffected cardinals meeting in Milan summoned a council to convene in Pisa, with the support of the French King and Emperor Maximilian. The council assembled (a month late) on Nov. 1, 1511, in the presence of four cardinals, the proxies of three others, two archbishops, 14 bishops, five abbots, procurators of three French universities, canonists, and theologians. Sessions one to three (1511) were held in Pisa where the decrees of Constance and Basel were reissued, sessions four to eight (1511-12) in Milan where Julius II was suspended from office, and sessions nine and ten (1512) in Asti and Lyon respectively where the council asserted its legitimacy.

It was in response to this conciliabulum of Pisa, known also as the Council of Pisa II, that Julius II convoked the Fifth Lateran (18th ecumenical) Council for April 19, 1512. The Council was announced in the bull Sacrosanctae Romanae ecclesiae of July 18, 1511, which condemned the projected council of the schismatic cardinals and justified the Pope's own delays. As a result of the French victory at Ravenna on April 11, 1512, the Council opened later than intended, on May 3, 1512. The ecumenical status of the Fifth Lateran Council has been questioned through the centuries, but is at present generally accepted. According to the count of the master of ceremonies, the inaugural session was attended by 16 cardinals and 83 mitred prelates. Later, following the death of Julius II and the reconciliation of his successor with the French, the number attending the Council rose to 23 or 24 cardinals and 122 prelates at the eighth session, on Dec. 19, 1513.

The Council was conceived within the framework of the great papal assemblies of the Middle Ages, and was held in Rome under papal presidency. Its decrees were issued as papal bulls or constitutions having conciliar approval. In addition to condemning the work of the conciliabulum of Pisa, the Council was concerned to condemn the PRAGMATIC SANCTION of Bourges. There were 12 sessions in all, the final one being on March 16, 1517. The death of Julius II had intervened on Feb. 21, 1513, and the succession of Pope LEO X had facilitated French adherence to the Council, as mentioned above. The first five sessions (May 10, 1512 to Feb. 16, 1513) dealt primarily with Pisa II and the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, the Emperor repudiating the actions of Pisa II at the third session. The fifth session declared papal elections would be null if they were tainted with simony (Cum tam divino). Under Leo X, three commissions were set up to deal with general peace, Church reform, the preservation of the faith, and the extinction of schism. The eighth and ninth sessions (Dec. 19, 1513, and May 5, 1514) registered respectively the disavowal of Pisa II by the ambassadors of Louis XII and a document testifying to the submission of the French bishops. The eighth session confirmed an earlier papal bull regulating the Curia's taxation system (In apostolici culminis) and included a dogmatic definition on the individuality of the human soul, against the teachings of Pietro POMPONAZZI; the ninth session pronounced on reforms touching the choice of bishops, monasteries held in trust by secular clergy, pluralities, ecclesiastical dress, blasphemy, and clerical immunity (Supernae dispositionis). Three important measures of the 10th session (May 4, 1515) dealt with MONTES PIETATIS (pawn shops) to aid the poor, episcopal liberties and dignities, and the pre-publication censorship of printed books; the 11th session (Dec. 19, 1516) was concerned with preaching, exemptions of religious, abrogation of the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, and approval of the Concordat of Bologna. The concluding session (March 16, 1517) decided for a Crusade against the Turks and the imposition of a three-year tax on all benefices.

The deliberations and enactments of the Council testify to an awareness of the principal abuses in the Church and a concern on the part of some Church leaders for reform. Several measures were well designed to deal with these problems, but there proved to be little zeal in making them effective, and the Church was soon confronted with protestations far more perilous.

Bibliography: General. G. TANGL, Die Teilnehmer an den allgemeinen Konzilien des Mittelalters (Weimar 1922). H. E. FEINE, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte, v. 1, Die katholische Kirche (4th ed. Cologne 1964). H. JEDIN, Ecumenical Councils of the Catholic Church, tr. E. GRAF (New York 1960). P. HUGHES, The Church in Crisis (New York 1961). G. LE BRAS et al., Histoire du droit et des institutions de l'Église en Occident, v. 7 L'Âge classique (1140–1378): Sources et théorie du droit (Paris 1965). R. FOREVIL-LE, "Procédure et débats dans les conciles médiévaux de Latran (1123–1215)," Revue historique de droit français et éranger, 42 (1964) 122–23; Histoire des conciles oecuméniques, v. 6 Latran I, II, III, et Latran IV (Paris 1966). M. MOLLAT, Les conciles Latran I a Latran IV (Louvain 1974). First Council. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757-98); reprinted and continued by L. PETIT and J. B. MARTIN 53 v. in 60 (Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960–) 21:277–304. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907-38) 1:630-44. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935-) 8:391-95. F. VER-NET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-50) 8.2:2628-37. R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1933-65) 6:344-45. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 6:815-16. Second Council. Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 21:525-46. Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, 5.1:721–38. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, 9.1:137-39. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 8.2:2637-44. R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, 6:346-47. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 6:816. Third Council. Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 22:209-467. Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, 5.2:1086-1112. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, 9.2:156-74. M. PACAUT, Alexandre III (Paris 1956) passim. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 8.2:2644-52. R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, 6:347-49. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 6:816. Fourth Council. Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 22:953-1086. Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, 5.2:1316-98. A. LUCHAIRE, Innocent III, 6 v. (Paris 1906-08). Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, 10:194-211. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937) (Studi et Testi 71) 369-71. S. KUTTNER, "Johannes Teutonicus, das vierte Laterankonzil und die Compilatio quarta," Miscellanea Giovanni Mercanti (Rome 1946) v. 5 (Studi et Testi 125; 1946) 608-34. H. TILLMANN, Papst Innocenz III (Bonn 1954). A. GARCÍA Y GARCÍA, "El Concilio IV de Letrán (1215) y sus comentarios," Traditio, 14 (1958) 484-502. F. M. POWICKE and C. R. CHENEY, eds., Councils and Synods, 2.1 (Oxford 1964) 47-49. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 8.2:2652-67. R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, 6:349-53. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 6:816-17. S. KUTTNER and A. GARCÍA Y GARCÍA, "A New Eye-witness Account of the Fourth Lateran Council," Traditio, 20 (1964) 115-78. F. ROBB, "The Fourth Lateran Council's Definition of Trinitarian Orthodoxy," Journal of Ecclesiastical History, 48 (1997): 22-43. C. SMALL, "The Fourth Lateran Council of 1215: A Turning Point in the History of Medieval Europe," Religious Studies and Theology, 11 (May-September 1991): 66-78. Fifth Council. Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 32:649-1002. Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, 8.1:339-375, 396-548. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, 15:164-65, 187-89. H. JEDIN, History of the Council of Trent, tr. E. GRAF, v. 1-2 (St. Louis 1957-60), v. 3 (in prep); Geschichte des Konzils von Trient, 2 v. (Freiburg 1949-57; v.1, 2d ed. 1951) F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 8.2:2667-86. R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, 6:353-56. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 6:817-18. N. H. MINNICH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER (3d ed. Freiburg 1993) 6:670-71; The Fifth Lateran Council (1512-1517) (Aldershot, Hampshire 1993). O. DE LA BROSSE, in Latran V et Trente, Historie des conciles oecuméniques, 10 (Paris 1975), 13-114, 397-98, 411-33. P. B. T. BILI-ANIUK, The Fifth Lateran Council (1512-1517) and the Eastern Churches (Toronto 1975).

[C. DUGGAN/N. H. MINNICH]

LATERAN PACTS

Lateran Pacts refer to the treaty, financial agreement, and concordat between the Holy See and the Kingdom of Italy, signed Feb. 11, 1929, in the Lateran Palace.

Diplomatic Preliminaries. Subsequent to the seizure of the STATES OF THE CHURCH (1870), succeeding popes protested against this procedure as unjustified and refused to accept the Law of GUARANTEES. The Italian government persisted in its unwillingness to cede to the papacy any territory or to permit international mediation. Immediately after his election (Feb. 6, 1922) PIUS XI indicated his eagerness to terminate the long, embittered situation by appearing on the front balcony of St. Peter's Basilica to impart his blessing, a gesture unknown since 1870. With the triumph of Fascism (1922) Mussolini soon gave proof of a similar desire. Proposals to reform ecclesiastical legislation were introduced (1925) by the minister of justice. Alfredo Rocco, but were withdrawn when Pius XI declared that he could not recognize statutes "unless preceded by proper negotiations and agreements with the Holy See and Us."

Discussions that finally succeeded began on Aug. 5. 1926, between Domenico Barone, an official representing Italy, and Francesco Pacelli, legal adviser to the Holy See (and brother of the later Pius XII), authorized by the pope as Vatican representative. Their numerous meetings until 1929 were held in unviolated secrecy. Pius XI, who followed the proceedings very attentively and personally supervised all details, insisted from the start on "recognition of the absolute sovereignty of the pope over the territory to be assigned to him." His interests throughout were motivated clearly by religious considerations, as those of Mussolini were by political ones.

Treaty. The treaty, consisting of a preamble and 27 articles, definitively and irrevocably settled the ROMAN QUESTION. It recognized the Holy See's absolute, visible independence and sovereignty, even in international relations. Italy affirmed the Catholic religion as the sole religion of the state, although restrictions were not imposed on other religions. VATICAN CITY was created as an independent state with its own defined territory over which the Holy See could exercise exclusive, absolute, sovereign jurisdiction, free of interference from the Italian or other governments. The treaty also admitted the right of Vatican City to issue coinage and stamps, send and receive diplomatic representatives, and govern as citizens those with fixed residence within its border. Italy guaranteed to the tiny state (108.7 acres) an adequate water supply, a link with the Italian railway system and the construction of a station within Vatican City, and connections with the telegraph, telephone, and postal services of the outside world. Various details of relations between Italy and Vatican City were arranged in other clauses.

The person of the pope was held to be sacred and inviolable. Offenses against him by deed or word were held punishable in Italian law and similar in gravity to offenses against the king. Central corporate entities of the Church were also exempted from all governmental interference.

Italy recognized the Holy See's full proprietary rights over the patriarchal basilicas of St. John Lateran, St. Mary Major, and St. Paul; also over several other churches and buildings in Rome and over the papal palace at CASTEL GANDOLFO. These also were granted extraterritoriality and immunities were given to foreign embassies, although they were part of Italian territory.

The Holy See declared its desire to remain aloof from temporal disputes between nations and from international congresses convoked to settle such disputes, unless the contending parties jointly appeal to its mission of peace. As a result Vatican City is always to be considered neutral and inviolable territory. Aircraft flights of any kind over it were prohibited. The Holy See recognized the Kingdom of Italy under the Savoy dynasty with Rome as its capital. Both parties declared the Law of Guarantees abrogated.

Financial Settlement. By a special convention constituting an integral part of the treaty (although in an appendix to it), Italy undertook to compensate the Apostolic See for its loss of the States of the Church and possessions therein. In view of Italy's economic situation, the pope reduced his legitimate claims for indemnity and settled for 750 million lire in cash and 1 billion lire in 5 percent negotiable government bonds.

Concordat. The concordat, with a preamble and 45 articles, accompanied the treaty as a necessary complement and sought to regulate in detail the status of religion and the Church in Italy. It guaranteed to the Church free exercise of its spiritual power and free, public exercise of worship. The government promised to prevent occurrences in Rome at variance with the city's sacred character. Freedom was assured the Holy See, bishops, and priests in the exercise of their religious functions. The rights of the Holy See to communicate freely with the Catholic world and to publish instructions in any language were admitted. The Holy See could also select archbishops and bishops in Italy after presenting the names to the government for possible objections. However, newly appointed bishops were obliged to take an oath of loyalty to the state. The ecclesiastical authorities were to award benefices, but Italian benefices must be given to Italian citizens; and the government was to receive previous notice of appointments to parochial benefices. The government abolished the exequatur and placet. Priests and religious were exempted from military service and jury duty. The basilicas of the Holy House at Loreto, St. Francis of Assisi, and St. Anthony at Padua and their administration were ceded to the Holy See, which was also given control of the catacombs in Rome and elsewhere in Italy.

The state recognized the civil effects of the Sacrament of Matrimony. It also agreed to have religious instruction given in public elementary and secondary schools by ecclesiastically approved priests, religious, or laymen. Religious associations and confraternities received state approval, as did auxiliary organizations of Catholic Action. Prohibition was renewed against ecclesiastics or religious who might wish to enroll or engage in political parties.

Aftermath. Almost unanimous enthusiasm greeted the pacts in Italy and elsewhere. Negotiations at times had threatened to break down completely, and the final texts embodied compromises. For Italy, however, it was a relief to end a situation injurious throughout the world to the reputation of the kingdom since its foundation. Mussolini's prestige was enhanced. The pacts were for the Holy See a great improvement over the unilateral Law of Guarantees, which gave no assurance of permanence. If Vatican City contained only a minute fraction of the area of the former States of the Church, Pius XI insisted that its size was adequate. The pontiff was especially pleased with the Concordat, by which, he said, "Italy was given back to God, and God to Italy." International guarantees were lacking in the accords, but the pope believed them useless. Early in the deliberations the question of associating other nations with the agreements was discussed and quickly dismissed. Between the date of signing the pacts and that of formal ratification (June 7), Pius XI criticized some of Mussolini's comments, especially those asserting full rights of the Fascist party over Italian youth.

During the Fascist regime many attacks were made against Catholic Action in defiance of the Concordat. The most serious conflict arose in 1931 over the charge that Catholic youth associations were engaging in political rather than religious activities. Basically the difficulties were the result of the Fascist pretension to exclusive control of all youth organizations. Pius XI also condemned the racial laws (1937), imitations of Hitler's, as a breach of the Concordat.

The Lateran Pacts outlived the overthrow of Fascism and the kingdom. After Italy became a republic (1944), the pacts were embodied in the new constitution, with the support of Communist and Socialist as well as of Christian Democratic deputies.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 21 (1929) 209–295. A. MERCATI, Raccolta di Concordati . . . (Rome 1954) 2:84–133.

Treaty and Concordat between the Holy See and Italy: Official Documents (Washington 1929) has the original text and English tr. of the pacts. F. PACELLI, Diario della Conciliazione (Vatican City 1959). C. A. BIGGINI, Storia inedita della Conciliazione (Rome 1942). D. A. BINCHY, Church and State in Fascist Italy (New York 1941). V. DEL GIUDICE, La Questione romana e i rapporti tra Stato e Chiesa fina alla Conciliazione (Rome 1947). N. TRIPODI, I Patti Lateranesi e il Fascismo (Bologna 1959). F. M. MARCHESI, Il Concordato italiano dell'Il febbraio 1929 (Naples 1960).

[A. RANDALL]

LATERAN PACTS 1985

On June 3, 1985, with the exchange of ratifications between the Holy See and the Italian government, the Concordat of Feb. 18, 1984, went into effect. This agreement between the Vatican and the Italian State amounts to a revision of the original Concordat which formed a part of the LATERAN PACTS of Feb. 11, 1929. Over the course of time it had become outdated in several areas. The Concordat of 1985, which probably will be referred to commonly as the "Revised Lateran Pacts," retained some of the fundamental provisions of the earlier agreement.

The revised Concordat consists of a Preamble, 14 Articles and an Additional Protocol which is to be regarded as an integral part of the agreement. There is also a Protocol of Approval to which both parties affixed their signatures on Nov. 15, 1984, and which regulates the norms governing ecclesiastical goods.

Outline of the Pact. The Preamble explains why the Holy See and the Government of the Italian Republic thought it necessary and opportune to modify the old Concordat. Since 1929, many changes had occurred in the political and social order which dictated such a modification. Additionally, developments brought about by the Second VATICAN COUNCIL on the subject of relations between Church and State likewise demanded change. There had been for several decades in Italy a political regime vastly different from that of the period of the original Pacts. After the Second World War, the nation had adopted a new Constitution and it was therefore both necessary and desirable to revise the Concordat in order to bring it into closer harmony with the Italian Constitution. The Constitution of 1948 included the principle, from the original Lateran Pacts, that "modifications of the [Lateran] Pacts, accepted by both parties, do not require a revision of the Constitution." This principle was important to both the Italian government and the Holy See in reaching their decision to revise the Lateran Pacts rather than simply abolish them completely. Such radical action would have required a change in the Constitution which, quite understandably, would have entailed a far more complex process. The new Concordat retains throughout its text the above-mentioned principle.

Façade of St. John Lateran Cathedral, Rome. (@Ruggero Vanni/CORBIS)

In the very first article of the Concordat, the Government of the Italian Republic and the Holy See reaffirm that the State and the Catholic Church are, each in its proper order, independent and sovereign. Furthermore, each party commits itself to respect fully that principle in their mutual relations and they pledge reciprocal cooperation in promoting the good of citizens and the country. The Church, for its part, acknowledges the independence and sovereignty of the State in temporal affairs and binds itself not to interfere in those matters which are proper to the State. On the other hand, the State concedes that the Church is truly independent and sovereign in the spiritual and religious order.

In its Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, Gaudium et spes, the Second Vatican Council dealt with the question of relations between the Church and the political community. The Council document stated:

The political community and the Church are autonomous and independent of each other in their own fields. Nevertheless, both are devoted to the personal vocation of man, though under different titles. This service will redound the more effectively to the welfare of all insofar as both institutions practice better cooperation according to the local and prevailing situation . . . For man's horizons are not bounded only by the temporal order; living on the level of human history he preserves the integrity of his eternal destiny (n. 76).

While the State refrains from expressing judgments of a religious, spiritual or moral value, it does recognize that humanity has certain needs which lie beyond its scope and which the State, of itself, cannot adequately meet. At the same time, the State acknowledges that the Church can accomplish much for the good of the country. This occurs, for example, whenever the Church contributes to the uplifting of the moral tone of the citizenry, or through its acts of charity towards the impoverished in society. The Concordat makes it improbable to think of the Church and State as completely distinct one from the other. Reciprocal ignorance and mutual disinterest have been replaced by a healthy harmony which requires each party to meet with each other and to work together for the common good.

It is highly significant that in the Concordat's Additional Protocol both sides agreed that "the Catholic Church is no longer to be regarded as the only State religion." Such was the arrangement sanctioned by the original Lateran Pacts, but now the concept of a State religion implies that there exists a confessional State which is Catholic. This would be inconsistent with the teaching of the Second Vatican Council where it is declared that the Church does not desire any privileged position vis-à-vis the political community (cf. Gaudium et spes, n. 76).

In the second article of the Concordat, the Italian Republic recognizes that the Church enjoys ample freedom in carrying out its pastoral, educational and charitable mission of evangelization and sanctification. This Article takes into account the broad scope of the Church's mission which is not confined merely to worship but includes, among others, the tasks of educating its members and performing charitable acts. When the Church establishes its own schools, whether for the formation of its clergy or for the education of young people, it does so to fulfill its own proper mission and not to supplement the State's educational system.

In regard to the appointment of bishops, article three abrogates the practice previously in force whereby candidates for episcopal appointment had to be presented by the Holy See to the government for notification, in case it had some objection. The requirement of bishops to take an oath of fidelity to the State before the President of the Republic has also been dropped. The fourth article exempts priests, deacons and religious in vows from military service, allowing them to select some form of civil service instead in times of national emergency.

The revised Concordat, in its fifth article, assures that houses of worship cannot be occupied, expropriated or demolished by the State except for grave cause and only with the prior consent of the competent ecclesiastical authority. Additionally, in this article, the right of sanctuary is upheld.

Sundays and other religious feasts determined by both parties are officially recognized holidays according to article six. Article seven guarantees that ecclesiastical institutions and associations receive treatment identical to any other association, without discrimination or privilege. The State acknowledges that institutions established or approved according to Canon Law possess a true juridical personality within society.

The most profound innovations of the Revised Concordat can be found in article eight which treats of marriage. In contrast to the original Concordat, no mention is made here of marriage as a sacrament. This is consistent with the fact that the State no longer holds that the Catholic religion is the religion of the State. The Concordat states only that the State recognizes the civil effects of marriage contracted according to the norms of Canon Law, provided that certain conditions are met. Whereas in the 1929 Concordat, sentences of nullity of marriage and dispensations from ratum et non consummatum marriages received ratification by the State, the Revised Concordat stipulates that only nullity cases will have this effect when one of the parties to the marriage formally requests it. At this point in the Concordat, the Holy See sought to reaffirm its teaching on marriage and wished to emphasize the solicitude which the Church has in safeguarding the dignity and the values of the family. Such a declaration is understandable in the context of legislation which had been passed in recent years that permitted divorce and abortion in Italy.

Article nine guarantees the Church the right to establish its own schools. An important element of this article is the norm governing the teaching of religion in the public schools. "The Italian government, acknowledging the value of religious culture and taking into consideration the fact that Catholicism forms a part of the historical patrimony of the Italian people, will continue to permit the teaching of religion in the public schools at every level except at the university level." The right to choose whether a pupil will receive religious training in the public school is left to the parents or the students at the time of their enrollment.

Although recognized by the State, those institutions of formation in ecclesiastical disciplines that have been established in accord with Canon Law fall under the sole competency of the ecclesiastical authority. Article eleven guarantees the exercise of religious freedom to those whose personal liberty is in some way restricted, as in the case of people in hospitals, nursing homes, prisons, the armed forces, etc. The State will appoint ecclesiastics for this service upon presentation by competent Church authority. The Holy See and the Italian Republic have also agreed to collaborate in preserving the historical and artistic patrimony which they share. The final two articles of the Concordat reiterate a constant theme, that of collaboration between the two parties. These articles call for a spirit of collaboration and conclude that not every single situation can be foreseen by the present agreement. Thus, the door is left open for further negotiations, always in a collaborative way, should these prove necessary in the future.

Relevance. Finally, we may ask what is the importance of this Concordat for the Church in Italy? First, it does allow the Church greater freedom. The Church in Italy is now able to exercise that libertas ecclesiae it has received from Christ. This is the ultimate purpose of establishing an agreement between Church and State. Secondly, the Church reaches out to the State and obligates itself to collaborate to a greater extent in the promotion of the well-being of the citizenry. In the words of Gaudium et spes, "whatever truth, goodness, and justice is to be found in past or present human institutions is held in high esteem by the Church . . . '' (n. 42). Thirdly, the Church cannot be dependent on the State as it strives to fulfill its own mission. Thus, there is an urgent need to involve the laity in a far greater way and to make the Catholic community understand that it must support its clergy and institutions. The important matter of the teaching of religion in the schools can no longer be taken for granted. Parents and children are now called upon to make an active choice for this institution.

For the Church in Italy, the Revised Concordat signifies greater freedom but at the same time it implies on the part of the Church a greater effort to collaborate with the Italian government. Of particular importance is the notion that the Church must now rely more and more on itself for its own mission.

In addressing Mr. Bettino Craxi, then President of the Italian Republic, Pope John Paul II referred to the Revised Concordat as "an instrument of harmony and collaboration." The Concordat, he noted, "is situated now in a society characterized by free competition of ideas and by pluralistic articulation of the various social components. It can and must constitute an element of promotion and growth, fostering the profound unity of ideals and sentiments by which all Italians feel themselves to be brothers in the same homeland."

Bibliography: Text of the Revised Concordat La Civiltà Cattolica I (1984) 470–478 [Italian]. F. LOMBARDI, "I nuovi rapporti tra la Chiesa e lo Stato in Italia," ibid., 479–494. G. DE ROSA, "Che cosa cambia in Italia dopo la revisione del Concordato?" ibid., 176–187. Address in L'Osservatore Romano, English edition (August 19, 1985): 6–7, contains addresses in English on the concordat by A. CASSOROLI, B. CRAXI, and JOHN PAUL II.

[P. LAGHI]

LATHROP, ALPHONSA, MOTHER

Author, foundress of the Servants of Relief for Incurable Cancer; b. Lenox, Mass., May 20, 1851; d. Hawthorne, N.Y., July 9, 1926. The youngest child of Nathaniel and Sophia (Peabody) Hawthorne, Rose was taken as an infant to Liverpool, England, where her father served as U.S. consul. The family subsequently spent two years in Italy before returning to Concord, Mass., in 1860. In 1871 Rose married George Parsons Lathrop in London. They lived in New York City until Lathrop moved to Boston as assistant editor of the Atlantic Monthly. During these years, Rose wrote verses and short stories that appeared in the Independent, Harper's Bazaar, the American, Scribner's, Appleton's Journal, and St. Nicholas; a book of poems, Along the Shore, was published in 1888. In 1876 a son, Francis Hawthorne Lathrop, was born, but he died of diphtheria in 1881. Received into the Catholic Church in 1891 by Alfred Young, CSP, the Lathrops collaborated on A Story of Courage (1894), a history of the Georgetown Sisters of the Visitation. At this time, however, Lathrop's increasing intemperance led his wife, with the vicar-general's permission, to leave him. Learning from Young of a young seamstress sent to Blackwell's Island to die of cancer, Mrs. Lathrop determined to devote her life to serving victims of this disease. After training for three months at the New York Cancer Hospital, she began work on the lower east side of the city. For financial assistance she depended on persons who learned of her plans from the articles she wrote. She also found time to publish her Memories of Hawthorne (1897).

Her husband died in 1898 and in 1899 Clement Theunte, OP, received Mrs. Lathrop and her associate, Alice Huber, as Dominican tertiaries. As Sister M. Alphonsa and Sister M. Rose, they made their first vows on Dec. 8, 1900, and established the Dominican Congregation of St. Rose of Lima, incorporated as the Servants of Relief for Incurable Cancer (see DOMINICAN SISTERS). As the community grew, its work expanded. The motherhouse, novitiate, and a cancer home were established at Hawthorne, and aid for patients was secured through Mother Alphonsa's magazine, Christ's Poor, and through her series of published reports.

Bibliography: K. BURTON, Sorrow Built a Bridge: A Daughter of Hawthorne (New York 1937). T. MAYNARD, A Fire was Lighted: The Life of Rose Hawthorne Lathrop (Milwaukee 1948). M. JOSEPH, Out of Many Hearts (Hawthorne, N.Y. 1961), unpub. biog.

[M. L. C. DUNN]

LATIMER, HUGH

Bishop of Worcester and most influential preacher of the early English Reformation; b. Thurcaston, Leicestershire, date uncertain but perhaps 1492; d. Oxford, Oct.

16, 1555. He came of yeoman stock, and was educated at Cambridge, elected Fellow of Clare Hall (1510), and awarded the master of arts degree in 1514. The following year he was ordained. He remained at the university for more than 20 years and came to occupy a position of prominence and influence there, being appointed a university preacher and chaplain (1522). His disputation for the bachelor of divinity degree in 1524 was an attack on Melanchthon's teachings. Soon thereafter, however, he became a leader of the group of Cambridge reformers who had come under the influence of Erasmus and Martin Luther. He preached on behalf of an authorized English translation of the Bible and took a leading part in supporting Henry VIII against papal claims in the matter of the King's marriage. He likewise preached in defense of the royal supremacy.

In 1535 Latimer was made bishop of Worcester. As a Member of Parliament he voted for the suppression of the lesser monasteries. He also gave strong support to the government's destruction of the shrines. In 1539 he resigned his see, believing that this was the King's wish. In the changing religious scenes of this period, Latimer experienced varying fortunes. He had been charged with heresy in the reign of Henry VIII and had been forced to recant. He had served as the King's chaplain and shortly after had been imprisoned and forbidden to preach. In 1548 he formally rejected the doctrine of transubstantiation. As court preacher under Edward VI he exercised a great influence on the formation of Protestant thinking in England. When Queen Mary Tudor came to the throne he was charged with heresy, brought to trial, condemned, and burned at the stake with Nicholas RIDLEY.

Bibliography: Works, ed. G. E. CORRIE, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1844–45). A. G. CHESTER, Hugh Latimer, Apostle to the English (Philadelphia 1954). M. SCHMIDT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart³ 4:238–239.

[D. J. GUNDERSON]

LATIN (IN THE CHURCH)

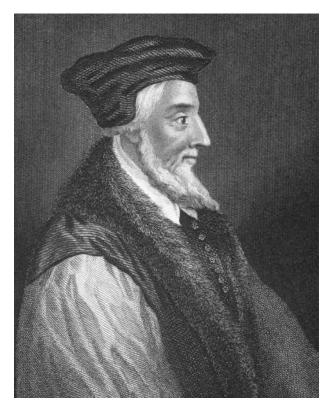

At the time of the first Pentecost the inauguration of the Church the most commonly spoken languages in Jerusalem were ARAMAIC, GREEK, and Latin. Natives of the city knew Aramaic (a later dialect of Hebrew) as their birthright. From the fourth century B.C. onward, Greek had been the most important language of commerce and communication throughout the Mediterranean; as a consequence, many speakers of Aramaic were more comfortable reading the Holy Scriptures in what amounted to the vernacular i.e., Greek available in the Septuagint, a translation intended for those no longer fluent in the earlier Hebrew. Latin arrived as a language of irrepressible political force first under Pompey in 67 B.C. and finally, after some reorganization, in the days of Augustus, who in A.D. 6 combined Judaea and Samaria into a single Roman province. The inscription placed above the head of Jesus at his crucifixion was written, as John attests, "in Hebrew, in Latin, in Greek" (19.20).

Mother Alphonsa Lathrop.

The ubiquity of koine, or "common," Greek during the Hellenistic Age (from the death of Alexander in 323 B.C.) and the reality of Roman control of the Italian peninsula (from 264 B.C.) with a South largely inhabited by Greek immigrants together meant that even the Latinspeaking Romans found it profitable to learn Greek as a second language. The plebeian Roman soldier, however lacking in formal education, would acquire Greek when on duty abroad; those of the patrician class at home who entered public service saw that Greek was a necessary part of their training. Quintilian, the Roman teacher of rhetoric, notes (ca. A.D. 95.) that public servants had for several generations used the exercise of translation from Greek into Latin to sharpen their verbal facility. Consequently, when Peter came from the Greek environment of Jerusalem to Rome he found among people high and low a fully bilingual community where the newborn Church could continue to use the worldwide language of Greek.

Hugh Latimer. (Archive Photos)

Greek is the original language of the New Testament from Paul's Letter to the Galatians (ca. 49) to the Second Letter of "Peter" (ca. 100–125); it is the tongue of the earliest Christian Fathers from Clement of Rome to Eusebius and beyond; it is the language of the Eucharistic liturgy and other formal rites as prescribed by the early Church. The NICENE CREED is a Greek document.

Beginnings of Ecclesiastical Latin

The first missionaries from Rome to the world found in the province of Africa (annexed in 146 B.C. after the last of the Punic Wars) a vast territory centered on a reconstructed Carthage, whose inhabitants spoke both the mother tongue Punic, or Phoenician and Latin, the language of their Roman administrators, but very little Greek. As a result, it was convenient for these bilingual missionaries to use Latin when spreading the Gospel to the Africans. Africa is the source of the earliest Church record originally composed in Latin, the Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs (180), in the form of a Roman legal procedure, from which (§12) we gather most importantly that a Latin version of the Bible (including the letters of Paul) was by then in circulation. Here in north Africa, the anonymous translators of the Bible showed the way to TER-TULLIAN (ca. 160 -ca. 225), the earliest Christian writer in Latin whose works are extant. By the start of his career, the Latin-speaking community through its vernacular liturgies had already become familiar with hundreds of words now standard in Christian terminology, e.g., angelus, baptisma, blasphemus, daemonium, ecclesia, ethnicus, eucharistia, extasis, martyr, Paracletus, prophetia, annuntiatio, gratia, peccator, persecutor, sacramentum, saeculum. Tertullian's unforced use of these terms assumes their long familiarity. In addition, he may be given credit for extending Christian vocabulary; his background in law, and its necessary training in Greek, equipped him as a coiner of words from Greek into Latin (e.g., exomologesis, christianismus) as well as from Latin resources (e.g., vivificatio, trinitas). In his day, Christians and non-Christians alike sought mastery of declamatio, a speech-writing exercise on set topics practiced in the schools of rhetoric. Thus as an apologist of the early Church, he was able use his secular education to defend Christianity.

Latin Translations of the Bible

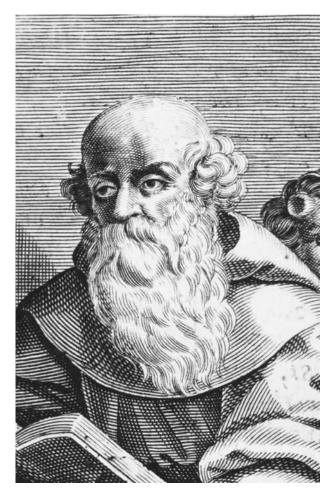

The earliest translation of the Bible from Greek into the vernacular, i.e., Latin, grew out of an understandable pastoral concern: the people's immediate need to hear the Word of God preached in their own tongue. But the style and language of the "Old Latin" versions of the Bible made for unusual works of Latin since they preserved both the Semitic thought and the Greek expression of the originals. The Old Latin New Testament is filled with "loan translations," i.e., attempts at putting not only the thought of the original into a different tongue, but also its idiomatic syntax. However odd such a Grecized Latin may have sounded to the uneducated flocks of north Africa, nevertheless, the bilingual missionaries, as their shepherds, very early on through their preaching and exegesis fostered an enduring devotion to the expression as well as to the thought of the Good News in Latin. At the core of many primitive Christian liturgies was the reading of the Latin Bible, a circumstance which soon made familiar that which was once odd.

Toward the end of the fourth century, when in the West Latin had overtaken Greek as the language of the Church, there existed various forms of a Latin Bible in Christian communities across Europe as well as in Africa. The time had come for the compiling of a uniform edition to serve the needs of a widespread, ever more Greekless, Church of the West. So thought Pope DAMASUS, who in 382 asked Sophronius Eusebius Hieronymus, or JEROME, to begin this enormous task. The Pope's insight embraced not only the recognition of the need for uniformity, but more significantly, the realization that Latin had become the de facto official language of the Western Church; he had seen in his lifetime the use of Greek in the Eucharistic liturgy its last major use finally give way to Latin.

Urged on (after the death of the pope) by bishops Cromatius and Heliodorus, Jerome translated the Old Testament books from the original Hebrew not from the Septuagint, itself a translation. (Some OT books, such as Baruch and Wisdom, probably unseen by Jerome, have come down to us only in Old Latin translations from the Septuagint.) Looking both to preserve and correct as much as he could of the time-honored Old Latin versions, Jerome carefully emended the Latin of the Psalms by comparing it to the Greek of the Septuagint (while also making an entirely new rival translation of the Psalms directly from the Hebrew), but only slightly refurbished the Old Latin of the New Testament, often simply transposing phrases to conform to the word order of the Greek original. For instance, he corrected et pax in terra "and peace on earth" to et in terra pax "and on earth peace" (καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς εἰρήνη) (Lk 2.14). Jerome's ideal was to serve both the Hebraea veritas and the Graeca veritas the authentic Hebrew of the Old Testament and the authentic Greek of the New. Nevertheless, he anticipated (rightly) that for his troubles some would call him a falsarius sacrilegus "sacrilegious falsifier." Only gradually, over the next 300 years, did the Old Latin version yield ground to Jerome's Vulgate, or "published," edition of the Latin Bible. Not one of the many Bible quotations in the sixth-century work, Instituta Regularia Divinae Legis, by Junillus, comes from the Hieronymian VULGATE. Furthermore, the existence of at least one ninth- and one twelfth-century manuscript containing excerpts from the Old Latin translation of 2 Maccabees 7 bears witness to the fact that religious culture, once firmly established, changes but slowly. In 1546, the Council of TRENT at last gave formal approval to the work of Jerome and his successors; the Vulgate had finally become the editio typica, or official version, of the Hebrew and Greek originals. It was revised under the auspices of Pope Sixtus V (1589) and Pope Clement VIII (1592, 1593, 1598). The Nova Vulgata, the current editio typica, made its appearance in 1979.

Two Levels of Ecclesiastical Latin

Among the earliest Latin Fathers were men trained in rhetoric and the sophisticated literature of classical Latin and Greek; nevertheless, they did not hesitate to apply their secular skills to defend or explain Christianity despite the fact that its basic texts were couched in a graceless Latin derived from a rude Greek. Such Latin Fathers include Tertullian, Minucius Felix, Lactantius, and, of a later generation, Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine. Because their works of apologetics and exegesis added to the fund of basic Christian texts, ecclesiastical Latinity was of two kinds: one that produced original works by known authors, where the genius and power of the language was free to speak out boldly on every page, and another an anonymous and earlier kind that timidly fulfilled the confining task of nearly verbatim translation of the sacred books, a too cautious Latin which the early Fathers found themselves in the uncomfortable position of having to support. The unknown translators' respect for the sacred original and fear of paraphrase had at least initially restrained the proper use of Latin in the Church. (In contrast, Quintilian earlier praised translation as an exercise that gave Latin speakers free rein in turning the thought of a Greek original into idiomatic Latin.) Jerome exemplifies the tension between the two Latins: "What does Horace have to do with the Psalter? Maro with the Gospels? Cicero with the Apostle [Paul]?" (Letter XXII, 29). Despite Jerome's love of the choice language and style of classical literature, ironically, because of his work in revising the Old Latin translations of the Bible, his name is virtually the only one attached to them. But next to his classical library brought to the desert from Rome, he could point with satisfaction to the bibliotheca Christi, "the library of Christ" (Letter LX, 10): Tertullian, Cyprian, Lactantius, Hilary of Poitiers, Minucius Felix, Victorinus, Arnobius. AUGUSTINE, a native speaker of Punic, versed in rhetoric and the classics, both spoke and wrote a powerful Latin as a second language, and yet he, too, accepted the fact that the literal translations of the Bible had left no room for the display of an idiomatic, if not eloquent, style. The Greek sacred corpus, to begin with, had not been written in the elegant dialect of Plato but instead in the later koine, the common Greek of its time; the anonymous Latin translators, unconscious of literary history, wrote in the Vulgar Latin of their time, one far removed from the Ciceronian ideal. Of this both Jerome and Augustine were fully aware. Later Christian Doctors, such as THOMAS AQUINAS, were wholly uninhibited by the question of the levels of Latinity. The language of Aquinas addresses human knowledge and divine revelation in a clear and beautiful manner, proving that ecclesiastical Latin can be the vehicle of powerful philosophical thought.

St. Jerome. (Archive Photos)

Latin Superseded as the Vernacular but Maintained by the Church

The partition of the Roman Empire (330) and the dissolution of its western half (early fifth century) accelerated an inevitable process: Latin both began to forget itself and continued to remember itself. When it proceeded unconsciously to change, former Latin-speaking provinces no longer in communication with a centripetal Rome (indeed, in his last days Constantine ruled from Constantinople) each began to develop imperceptibly a local dialect from the prevalent but now moribund tongue of their former rulers. By the end of the sixth century, these local vernaculars were on the way to becoming the Romance languages: Romanian, Italian, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Romansch. One example of the transformation will suffice: we can say that by 1100 with the appearance of Le Chanson de Roland the process in Gallia, now France, was fairly well complete; Latin, unchecked, had become French. But when Latin remained conscious of its long history, aided by the unyielding sameness of the written-down word and among Christians by the desire of the Church to preserve rather than to innovate, it took on the role of a second language of the learned class. Educated men of the Middle Ages looked before and after upon two worlds: they might choose to speak or not an emerging patois, such as French or Italian, while at the same time in their formal studies they strove to emulate the style of Cicero, that paragon of classical Latinity, and aimed for a public career where a more formal Latin, written or spoken, was required. The Frankish scholar Einhard (ca. 770–840), educated in the Thuringian monastery of Fulda with its excellent classical library, wrote the Latin biography of Charlemagne in a clear imitation of the style of Cicero and the manner of Suetonius. Departures from the classical norm reveal him as a man of his day, conversant with legal and ecclesiastical texts important to his life and work. Literate Christians over many centuries could read Latin in its highest form in Cicero or Virgil, and still cherish the now no longer strange Latin of the Bible with its close imitation of constructions peculiar to Greek. As time passed, however, and the new vernacular languages became firmly established, the uneducated faithful were no longer so well served by Latin. In Italy, for example, DANTE ALIGHIERI, after much hesitation, chose to write his Commedia, not in Latin, now limited to scholars, but in Italian, the tongue understood by all. Translations of the Latin version of the Bible (in whole or substantially so) into the various European vernaculars came relatively early: Anglo-Saxon, ca. 1000; Anglo-Norman, ca. 1350; French, 13th century; German, early 15th century; Swedish, 15th century; Italian, 1472; Spanish, 1478; Dutch, 1545. These several vernacular translations, designed to serve pastoral needs, all appeared before the opening of the Council of Trent (1545 1563). As a Counter-Reformation measure, the council gave a unique place to the Vulgate translation of the Bible by declaring it divinely inspired, thus ensuring for the time that translations would continue to be made from this Latin version. The use of Latin in the Eucharistic liturgy confirmed by the bull, Quo Primum, promulgated by Pope Pius V in 1570 moreover continued well into the twentieth century. From the sixteenth century onward, Latin was sharply perceived as a sacral language, one entirely set apart from the vernacular. The use of Latin passed from a pastoral function to a canonical one.

Characteristic Features of Liturgical Latin

The most remarkable stylistic features in the Roman liturgy were taken from the old tradition of pre-Christian Rome. In the canon of the Mass the striking use of parallelism, the polished sentence structure, the accumulation of synonyms, and the almost legal precision in the expression are all very closely related to the ancient Roman prayer style. Furthermore, in the canon and in the presidential prayers there is a certain predilection for ancient Roman religious terms, which are sometimes even preferred to the equivalent words of the Christian vocabulary. Thus, for example, the ancient Roman word preces (which occurs together with precatio and deprecatio in the early liturgical texts) partly replaces oratio, the early Christian word for "prayer." Next to the early Christian orare, "to pray," we find the old Roman precari. Beatitudo is used more often than the early refrigerium, a word derived from popular usage. Official terms from the Roman tradition, such as pontifex and antistes, are found beside episcopus; praesul another old Roman word beside presbyter. These pre-Christian elements had been neglected by the earliest Christian communities, but by the end of the fourth century any Christian texts that were not translations freely availed themselves of Latin's wide scope. Christians educated in rhetoric, such as Ambrose, fully conscious of the history of the language and the classical models such as Cicero, did not hesitate to compose liturgical texts replete with rhetorical devices (e.g., parallelism, tricolon, isocola, antithesis, chiasmus, synchysis, and paradox) and sophisticated rhythmical clausulae. Such a text is the glorious Exsultet, believed to be the work of Ambrose.

The Ambrosian Hymn

In the same period in which the Latinization of the Roman liturgy was completed, the Western Church was enriched by a new literary form: the so-called Ambrosian hymn. Although HILARY OF POITIERS was the first in the West to introduce hymns on Greek and Syrian models, it was AMBROSE who fully realized the potential of such a popular form of communication. So completely was Ambrose's name associated with these hymns that the genre itself, taken up by many successors, early on was styled the "Ambrosian hymn." The canonical hours as prescribed by the rule of Benedict of Nursia made constant use of Ambrosian hymns, very many of which are still to be found in the Roman Breviary. The ones generally considered to be the work of Ambrose are "Aeterne rerum Conditor," "Deus Creator omnium," "Jam surgit hora tertia," and "Veni Redemptor gentium." All are in quantitative measures (quatrains of iambic diameter); all reinforce points of Christian dogma.

The Curial Style

When the Western Church was becoming more and more consolidated, the papal Curia gradually took the place of much temporal authority, finally even adopting many of its outward forms. In this combining of the ecclesiastical and the secular, there slowly developed a papal chancery language and style that even today continues to look to classical Latin as its model for its official documents. In its purely ceremonial form for example in proclaiming various honors the Latin used can be nearly inscrutable. In papal bulls, however, it often demonstrates a notable clarity, power, and grace; such a Latin is regarded as the guide when papal documents are translated into the world's dominant languages.

The Triumph of the Vernacular

Since the Second Vatican Council (1962 1965), the Church has borne witness to the fact that the message of the gospel is not language-specific, that it transcends all languages, including Latin. Although the council's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy declared that "the use of the Latin language is to be preserved in the Latin rites," it was left open to "the competent territorial [i.e., national] ecclesiastical authority . . . to determine whether, and to what extent, the vernacular language is to be used" (36). The result has been that, although Latin continues to hold an honored place, it has in the celebration of the Eucharist throughout the world been superseded by the various living languages of the people "for the sake of a better comprehension of the mystery being celebrated" (General Instruction of the Roman Missal, intro., §12). To such an extent has Latin declined in importance that the official hymn of the Jubilee Year 2000 appeared in several vernacular tongues, but not in Latin.

Such a rapid reversal could not have been anticipated by Pope John XXIII in February 1962 when, before the opening of Vatican II later that year, he issued Veterum Sapientia, his Apostolic Constitution on promoting the study of Latin. In this bull John repeated the sentiments of his predecessor, Pius XI, who (in 1922) had praised Latin as universal, immutable, and non-vernacular.

The movement away from Latin to the national languages was well underway at the time of the promulgation (in 1969) by Pope Paul VI of the Missale Romanum in its most comprehensive reworking since the sixteenth century. This revision (the Novus Ordo Missae) was in keeping with the general norms set forth in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, 34 36, of the Second Vatican Council. The General Instruction of the Roman Missal (GIRM) and the Missal itself, including the Ordo Missae cum populo, took its more precise form in 1975, and now has the force of law. In his motu proprio Ecclesia Dei (1988), Pope John Paul II renewed permission for the use of the Roman Missal of 1962 (the 400-year-old legacy of the Council of Trent) which he first granted in his universal indult of 1984, Quattuor abhinc annos. Thus today the liturgy of the Eucharist may be celebrated in Latin in two forms, that of the Missal of 1962 and that of 1975 these provisions occurring, however, in the much larger context of the now prevalent use of the vernacular.

The waning of Latin is further marked in the differences between the Code of CANON LAW of 1917 and that of 1983. While the 1917 Code prescribed classroom lectures in Latin, the 1983 Code states that "the program for priestly formation is to make provision that the students are not only carefully taught their native language but also that they are well skilled in the Latin language" (can. 249); in the contemporary American seminary/college, this latter requirement may be fulfilled in two semesters. The 1983 Code, first promulgated in Latin, is freely available to the clergy in the vernacular.

At the start of the third millennium, Greek had been for so long as a former predominant language of the Church, that it was worthy of the utmost respect and serious study. Scholars of philosophy and history know that familiarity with the Greek and Latin sources, not to mention the Hebrew, affords a priceless perspective on the Church and its mission. But the uniqueness of the Latin language over the course of eighteen centuries has been in its changing roles. Originally, Latin was adopted as a pastoral measure to communicate the message of Christ in a language understood by most of the Christian people. Later, the mark of catholicity led Church leaders to emphasize the need for one enduring tongue, Latin, which could be reliably studied and interpreted for the faithful throughout the world. Finally, the process having come full circle, current pastoral concerns have permitted the option of liturgical practice in the vernacular. Although Latin is no longer the common tongue, nevertheless it retains an honored place as the sacral and canonical language of the Church.

Bibliography: P.-M. BOGAERT, "La Bible Latine des Origines au Moyen Âge: Aperçu Historique, État des Questions," Revue Théologique de Louvain 19 (1988) 137 159, 276 314. A. BUGNINI, The Reform of the Liturgy, 1948 1975, tr. m. J. O'CONNELL (Collegeville, Minn. 1990). F. DI CAPUA, Il Latino Letterario Medievale e lo Stile della Curia Romana (Rome 1948). E. DEKKERS and A. GAAR Clavis Patrum Latinorum (3rd ed. Turnhout 1995). B. FI-SCHER, Biblia Sacra iuxta Vulgatam Versionem (3rd ed. Stuttgart 1983). H. J. FREDE, Kirchenschriftsteller: Verzeichnis und Sigel, Vetus Latina 1/1 (4th ed. Freiburg 1996). M. T. GIBSON, The Bible in the Latin West, The Medieval Book 1 (Notre Dame 1993). M. G. HAESSLY, Rhetoric in the Sunday Collects of the Roman Missal (St. Louis 1938). R. E. LATHAM, comp. Revised Medieval Latin Word-List from British and Irish Sources (Oxford 1965). B. LÉCUREUX, Le Latin, Langue de l'Église (2nd ed. Paris 1998). E. LÖFSTEDT, Late Latin (Cambridge, Mass. 1959). F. MANTELLO, and A. G. RIGG, Medieval Latin (Washington, D.C. 1996). C. C. MARTINDALE, The Prayers of the Missal (New York 1937). B. M. METZGER, "The Latin Versions," 285-374, The Early Versions of the New Testament (Oxford 1977). C. MOHRMANN, Liturgical Latin, Its Origin and Character (Washington, D.C. 1957). L. R. PALMER, The Latin Language (3rd ed. London 1961). JOHN XXIII, apostolic constitution Veterum Sapientia (22 Feb. 1962). PAUL VI, apostolic constitution Missale Romanum (3 April 1969). JOHN PAUL II, motu proprio Ecclesia Dei (2 July 1988). J. QUASTEN and A. BERARDINO, Patrology, 4 vols. (Westminster, Md. 1950). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953). L. D. STE-PHENS, "Syllable Quality in Late Latin Clausulae," Phoenix 40 (1986) 72 91. K. STRECKER and R. B. PALMER, Introduction to Medieval Latin (Zurich and Berlin 1957).

[J. F. COLLINS]

LATIN EMPIRE OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Latin Empire of Constantinople is the modern name for the state created on the ruins of the Byzantine Empire by members of the Fourth CRUSADE in 1204; it endured until 1261. To contemporaries, it was known as Imperium Constantinopolitanum or as Romania.

After the capture of Constantinople on April 13, 1204, the crusaders, roughly half Venetian and half French, Flemings, and north-Italians, established a commission of 12 to elect a new "emperor" who would replace the former Byzantine Emperor. Baldwin of Flanders was chosen; when in 1206 he perished in Bulgarian captivity, he was succeeded by his brother Henry of Hainault (emperor 1206–1216), the ablest of the Latin Emperors. After his death, a succession of ineffectual rulers ended in the weak reign of Baldwin II (1240–1261, died 1273).

The Latin Empire borrowed some trappings of the Byzantine Empire: the coronation ceremony, the imperial purple boots, and certain titles. However, it was essentially a feudal monarchy. Its vassal states included the Kingdom of Thessalonike, the Principality of Achaia, and the Duchy of Athens, as well as the fiefs of individual knights in the vicinity of Constantinople. Uniquely among medieval feudal realms, it had a form of written constitution. Each new emperor was required to swear to abide by three documents: the pre-Conquest treaty of March 1204 which provided for the election of a new ruler and a division of the expected spoils, an agreement made in October 1204 which parceled out the territories of the former Byzantine Empire, and a treaty of October 1205 between the then-regent Henry and the Venetians which regulated the latter's responsibilities to the emperor. In fact, a council consisting half of feudal vassals of the emperor and half of Venetians had to consent to any significant civil or military action of the Latin Emperor; it proved a hindrance for most emperors.

Rival states shortly appeared on former Byzantine territory, founded by members of previous Byzantine ruling families. In Trebizond, a branch of the Comneni family established itself under Georgian protection. At Nicaea and in northwest Anatolia, Theodore Laskaris, son-inlaw of the former emperor Alexius III Angelus, created a state which eventually superseded the Latin Empire. In Epirus (in northwest Greece), an illegitimate son of John (Angelus) Doukas took the name of Michael Angelus Comnenus Doukas and established a state which for a while threatened the Latin Empire. The so-called "Second Bulgarian Empire" was the greatest immediate danger: in 1205, Baldwin I was captured, imprisoned, and killed (1206) by its ruler Ioannitsa or Kaloyan (d. 1207). His successor, John Asen II (1218–1241), was alternately ally and enemy of the Latin emperors, and effectively arbiter of the empire's destiny. After John Asen's death, the Lascarids of Nicaea acquired most of the territory in Thrace that John Asen had taken from the Latins. In 1259, Michael VIII Palaeologus overthrew the Lascarids, and on July 25, 1261, his general, Alexius Strategopoulus, seized Constantinople. The Byzantine Empire was reinstituted in its old capital, on a restricted basis, but destined to last until the Turkish conquest of 1453.

Because in 1204 the imperial crown had gone to Baldwin I, a Fleming, the Venetians were entitled to choose a patriarch for Constantinople; they picked Thomas Morosini, a subdeacon of noble Venetian descent. Pope Innocent III, although displeased that he had not been consulted, consented to the choice. Innocent and later popes tried to minimize the Venetian control of the Latin Patriarchate, with little success. While the upper clergy were Venetian or French, the parish priests remained Greek. For the most part, they submitted to rule by the Latin bishops, but remained at heart loyal to the Greek church, specifically to the Orthodox Patriarch chosen at Nicaea in 1208, whose successor returned to Constantinople in 1261.

While Dominican and Franciscan friars attempted missionary activity among the Greek population, few were willing to follow them. The violence, greed, and oppression of the victorious crusaders, and of the Latin clergy, alienated the Greeks. Only Emperor Henry of Hainault, by his moderation and outstanding justice, won support among the populace. His successors arrogantly disdained the Greeks. The principal result of Latin rule in Constantinople was to solidify Orthodox hostility to the Western Church.

Bibliography: R. WOLFF, "The Latin Empire of Constantinople, 1204–1261," in A History of the Crusades, ed. K. SETTON, 2nd ed., vol. II (Madison 1969), 187–233. R. L. WOLFF, Studies in the Latin Empire of Constantinople (London 1976). M. ANGOLD, Church and Society in Byzantium under the Comneni, 1081–1261 (Cambridge 1995). D. E. QUELLER and TH. MADDEN, The Fourth Crusade: The Conquest of Constantinople, 2nd ed. (Philadelphia 1997). D. J. GEANAKOPLOS, Emperor Michael Palaeologus and the West 1258–1282: A Study in Byzantine-Latin Relations (Cambridge, Mass. 1959).

[C. M. BRAND]

LATIN RITE

The Latin Rite, or Latin Church as it is called in canon 1 of the Code of CANON LAW, is the part of the Church that follows the ROMAN RITE in liturgy, has its own special canonical discipline, and is subject to the bishop of Rome as patriarch of the West. (See ROME, PATRIARCHATE OF.)

History. At the beginning of the Christian Era, the disciplinary rules of the Church varied from one country to another and even from one community to another. Ecclesiastical laws applicable to a particular area were formulated only during the fourth and fifth centuries with the development of the PATRIARCHATES.

Early Development. Endowed with jurisdiction over a specified and often large territory, the patriarchs enjoyed a wide autonomy in most matters of administrative and disciplinary order. Juridically the preeminence of the patriarchal sees over areas was recognized for the first time at the Council of Nicaea I (c. 6) in 325, confirmed by the Council of Constantinople I (c. 2) in 381, and reconfirmed by the Council of Chalcedon (c. 28) in 451. Constantinople I and Chalcedon extended the patriarchal privilege to the See of Constantinople and to the See of Jerusalem. The patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, and Jerusalem became the chiefs of all the bishops of Egypt and the Near East, their jurisdiction corresponding roughly to the Praefectura Orientis created by Diocletian for the East. The Western prefectures of the empire, Italy, Gaul, and Illyricum, made up the Roman patriarchate. Each patriarchate organized itself, held synods, enacted laws, and created its own particular canonical discipline.

Notwithstanding the decree of Nicaea, in the fourth and fifth centuries the Roman patriarchate did not wield a very wide authority outside Italy and especially outside the ten suburbicarian provinces of the city of Rome, where the pope exercised all the powers of a true metropolitan. A progressive centralization in the administrative and disciplinary order was to come in the West, but in the sixth century such centralized power as becomes a real patriarch was not exercised by the bishop of Rome in the Latin Church. Rome did not seem to care very much for the title of patriarch, contenting itself with the attributes of primacy.

Before St. Leo the Great (440–461), a few steps were taken tending toward administrative and disciplinary centralization under Rome. Legates of the pope were sent to certain troubled areas in the Church, as in the case of the creation of the Vicariate Apostolic of Illyricum and of the establishment of the short-lived Vicariate Apostolic of Arles in France. But nearly everywhere in the Western Church—in northern Italy, in Spain, in Africa—the local authorities retained practically all jurisdiction in the administrative order.

Definitive Establishment. The pontificate of St. Leo marked real progress toward centralization, although the onslaught of the barbarians marching through southern Europe did bring about a pause in the unifying movement. Yet the trend revived with new vigor after the conversion of England by missionaries who were sent by Rome and remained under the influence of the Roman Church. Indirectly, through the English monks, the authority of the pope even in matters of discipline was increased all over Europe. From England came the apostles of Germany, the ecclesiastical counselors of the first Carolingians, and the whole centralizing movement that, ridding the Latin Church of all the complications brought about by local primacies and national churches, was to unite in the hands of the bishop of Rome many of the powers exercised previously by the local Churches.

Although in most countries (e.g., Africa, Spain, and France) for several centuries the local episcopacies enjoyed a large measure of autonomy in administrative and disciplinary matters, even in those days great authority was attributed to Rome. The intervention of the bishop of Rome as head of the Western Church was not infrequently solicited to solve thorny or more difficult problems of a local nature. Some of the appeals to Rome against certain decisions of metropolitans and particular synods are well known: the affair of Bishop Marcianus of Arles (the right to excommunicate a bishop recognized as belonging to the bishop of Rome by the bishops of Gaul and of Carthage), the case of the Spanish bishops of Mérida and Astorga (a deposed bishop appealed to Rome against the synodal sentence condemning him), and the controversy centering around St. Cyprian in Africa. Nevertheless, at the time of St. Leo the Great, centralization in the Western Church had made very little headway; and Rome, which did not intervene in episcopal ordinations, particular councils, and the like, had no power comparable to that exercised by Alexandria over Egypt.

Among the causes that contributed considerably to increase the power of the bishop of Rome and to consolidate the centralizing trend in administrative matters were two initiatives of major importance. The pope began to take a more direct hand in cases concerning the erection and division of dioceses. Examples of such interventions can be traced as far back as the fourth and fifth centuries in Italy, in Burgundy, and in Gaul; but the intervention of Rome later became a more regular practice. At the end of the eleventh century, such interventions constituted an accepted principle of canon law. The right to erect, unite, or divide dioceses was reserved to the pope, as evidenced from a letter of Urban II written in 1092 to the archbishop of Reims: "Solius etenim Apostolici est Episcopatus conjugere, conjunctos disjungere aut etiam novos constituere," a rule reiterated by Innocent III and recorded in the decretals (Corpus iuris canonici [Leipzig 1879-81; repr. Graz 1955] X 1.1.7).

Another measure taken by the pope was equally conducive to the strengthening and the extension of the centralizing power of Rome in disciplinary matters. By the institution and the establishment of legati a latere (legati missi, legati nati, legati nuntii) in different areas of Christendom with the power to act in the name of the pope, the bishop of Rome intervened directly in the affairs of local Churches. Several of these legations, originally called vicariates apostolic, go as far back as the sixth century, and many were added in the following centuries. During the great crusade undertaken by the popes in the eleventh century for the reformation of the clergy and the faithful, these vicars were used to apply the program of reformation and further the interests of the Roman see.

Later Development. By the end of the twelfth century, the Latin Church already possessed an imposing and very comprehensive disciplinary system, built up gradually over the years since Constantine and his edict granting full liberty to Christianity. A vast arsenal of laws, enacted by local synods, by general and particular councils, and by the popes in their decretals constituted a huge collection of juridical rules adapted to the needs of a large society and provided the Western Church with a powerful and effective instrument of government. One thing remained to be done: Such a massive conglomeration of canonical rules, accumulated during centuries, needed unification, coordination, and systematization to clarify the existing law and to eliminate repetitions, contradictions, and useless or obsolete prescriptions. This was the work of Gregory IX (1227-41), who appointed St. Raymond Penafort to codify the ecclesiastical canons and prepare a new collection, the Decretals of GREGORY IX, which would be the only authentic collection in the Latin Church. Later the decretals became part of the CORPUS IURIS CONONICI, a monumental digest of laws, containing the particular discipline of the Latin rite, under which Western Christendom was governed until 1918 and whose principles are embodied in the present Code of CANON LAW.

Apart from its liturgy, which, even after the changes decreed by Vatican Council II, is quite different from that of the Eastern Churches, the Latin rite differs considerably from the others in its canonical discipline. The more striking and more commonly noted differentiations are the celibacy of the clergy, the use of unleavened bread at the Eucharist, and the distribution of Holy Communion under one species. But there are more fundamental and broader differences, which touch on practically all the aspects of ecclesiastical discipline and government. Many of the powers reserved to the bishop of Rome and exercised by him in the Latin Church are within the ordinary jurisdiction of the metropolitans or the patriarchs of the Eastern churches.

See Also: ROME; PAPACY.

Bibliography: C. H. TURNER, Studies in Early Church History (Oxford 1912). P. BATIFFOL, La Paix constantienne et le catholicisme (2d ed. Paris 1914); Le Siège apostolique (359–451) (Paris 1924). L. M. O. DUCHESNE, Histoire ancienne de l'Église, 3 v. (Paris 1906–10); L'Église au VIe siècle (Paris 1925); Origines de culte chrétien (5th ed. Paris 1925). A. HERMAN, "De conceptu ritus," Jurist 2 (1942) 333–345. A. PETRANI, De relatione iuridica inter diversos ritus in Ecclesia catholica (Turin 1930). H. DAUSEND, Das interrituelle Recht im Codex iuris canonici (Görres-Gesellschaft, Veröffentlichungen der Sektion für Rechts- und Staatswissenschaft 79; Paderborn 1939). G. MICHIELS, Normae generales juris canonici, 2 v. (2d ed. Paris-Tournai-Rome 1955); Principia generalia de personis in ecclesia (2d ed. Paris 1955). F. X. WERNZ and P. VIDAL, Ius canonicum, 7 v. in 8 (Rome 1933–1951).

[A. CARON/EDS.]

LATINA THEOLOGY

Latina theology represents a body of theological writings rather than a self-designated theological movement. Latina theologians begin with particular aspects of the Latina/o experience and offer distinct interpretations of that experience. In nascent form, Latina theology does not divide easily into clear sub-groups. Within the category of "Latina theology," three distinguishable theological commitments emerge. First, a number of Roman Catholic Latina theologians either explicitly identify their work as feminist or, if not, they privilege gender, as well as culture and ethnicity, as primary categories in the development of theology. A second group identify their work as primarily "pastoral." This group, largely Roman Catholic, endeavors to interpret contemporary Latina/o experience through the lens of history, with the purpose of responding more effectively to the immediate pastoral concerns of the Latina/o community. Finally, Protestant Latinas, incorporate some aspects of the previous two groups while also privileging the distinctiveness of Protestant faith experience.

Origins and Sources. Latina theology is an outgrowth and expression of the long history of an evolving consciousness on the part of women in Latin culture. This consciousness or critical recognition arises from the lived experience of gender, culture, race and class inequities, coupled with the lived experience of enduring faith. Short of this understanding, Latina theology can be misinterpreted as emerging exclusively in reaction to the white women's movement and theology, and in reaction to Latin American liberation theology. While these have undeniably made their contributions, Latinas' own history of struggle has played as prominent a role in the development of Latina theology. Latina consciousness can be found, for example, in the writings of the Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1648–1695); in the memoirs of 19th and 20th century Latinas (e.g. Doña María Inocencia Pico, Nina Otero-Warren); and in accounts of the Chicano Movement of the 1960s.

Some expressions of Latina theology espouse, along with white feminist theologies, a rejection of the patriarchal social system. But for Latina feminist theologians, the distortion of human nature concerns not only gender but also race and class. With Latino theologians, Latina feminist theologians share a critique of the subordination of Latinas/os to whites and the subordination of economically poor people to those of the middle and upper economic strata.

LIBERATION THEOLOGY, in both its Latin American form (e.g. Gustavo Gutierrez, Ignacio Ellacuria, Jon Sobrino) and its Third World feminist form (e.g. Elsa Tamez, Ivone Gebara, Virginia Fabella), constitutes one of the primary sources for Latina theology. Much of Latina theology attempts to interpret the idea of a "preferential option for the poor" as a preferential option for Latinas and to respond to the question, "What would theology look like if it was genuinely life-giving for Latinas?" Some expressions of Latina theology emphasize the promotion of the full humanity of Latina women; others focus less on gender believing that the liberation of the Latina/o community as a whole will adequately promote the full humanity of Latinas.

Distinct Forms. The first of the three forms, feminist or gender conscious Latina theology, is varied. Cubanborn Ada María Isasi-Díaz, along with collaborators, originated Mujerista theology in the mid-1980s. This theology assumes a preferential option for Latina women by encouraging the development of their moral agency and by giving public voice to Latinas' theological insights. Ethnography, a method used to further the reflective knowing processes of Latinas, characterizes this approach to Latina theology. In contrast, María Pilar Aquino (Mexican-born) terms her theology Latina feminist theology. It bears a strong liberationist orientation and draws on philosophy and on various social science disciplines. Her theology highlights the connections between Latin American feminist theology, Latin American liberation theology, and U.S. feminist theology. Along with these theologians, other Latina scholars have made important contributions. These are Jeanette Rodríguez-Holguin, Gloria Loya, Nancy Pineda-Madrid, and Michelle González. Not all of these theologians identify themselves as feminists but all privilege the category of gender in their work.

Pastoral theologies constitute the second form of Latina theology. Above all these theologies concern themselves with how to witness to, and communicate the faith to, Latinas/os in this historical moment. They investigate, among other ministerial foci, questions of catechesis, spiritual growth, liturgical practice and the practice of the church. They strive to respond to the contemporary pastoral needs of Latinas/os. Significant contributions have been made by Ana María Pineda, Anita de Luna, Ana María Díaz-Stevens, Marina Herrera, Rosa María Icaza, María de la Cruz Aymes, Carmen Nanko and Dominga Zapata.

Protestant Latinas form the third and final group. In drawing upon the Protestant faith experience and church practices, these theologians examine the meaning of the term evangelicalo, and provide a new interpretation of the experience of mestizaje (mixing of two realities), namely the experience of being both "Hispanic" and "Protestant." Key contributions have been made by Daisy Machado, Loida I. Martell-Otero, Teresa C. Sauceda and Elizabeth Conde-Frazier.

See Also: FEMINISM; FEMINIST THEOLOGY; WOMANIST THEOLOGY.

Bibliography: M. P. AQUINO, Our Cry for Life: Feminist Theology From Latin America (Maryknoll, NY 1993). M. P. AQUINO, D. MACHADO and J. RODRÍGUEZ, eds., Religion, Feminism and Justice: A Reader in Latina Feminist Theology (Austin, TX 2001). A. M. ISASI-DÍAZ, Mujerista Theology (Maryknoll, NY 1996); En La Lucha: Elaborating a Mujerista Theology (Minneapolis 1993). J. D. RODRÍGUEZ and L. I. MARTELL-OTERO, Teología en Conjunto: A Collaborative Hispanic Protestant Theology (Louisville 1997).

[N. PINEDA-MADRID]

LATITUDINARIANISM

A name at first applied to those 17th-century members of the Church of England who, while not skeptics, were indifferent to creeds, ritual practices, and church organization, and who set much store by personal prayer and holy living. Eventually, however, the name came to be applied to those members who combined an attendance at Sunday worship services with various degrees of rationalism and agnosticism.

Latitudinarianism is a product of two streams of thought in the 17th century. The first was an increasing distrust of religious polemic; the theological controversies of the 16th century had generated political controversy and wars. In the second place, a growing interest in scientific experiment put a premium on reason and downgraded respect for authority and tradition.

The influence of these currents of thought was seen in a handful of scholars who became known as the CAM-BRIDGE PLATONISTS. Though members of the Church of England, they were strongly influenced by PURITANISM. They refused to concern themselves with doctrine, ritual, and organization, and stressed the importance of prayer, meditation, and godly living. Their views became increasingly popular in the late 17th century, but not without some change of emphasis. The result among many socially prominent churchmen in the 18th and 19th centuries was a divorce between preaching and practice. This state of religion stimulated the rise of EVANGELICALISM and METHODISM.

Though the term latitudinarian became obsolete in the 19th century, its ideas remained powerful and served to encourage the Broad Churchmen of a later age in their work of adapting religion to what they considered to be the demands of a modern and scientific age.

Bibliography: G. P. H. PAWSON, The Cambridge Platonists and Their Place in Religious Thought (London 1930). G. R. CRAGG, From Puritanism to the Age of Reason: A Study of Changes in Religious Thought within the Church of England, 1660 to 1700 (Cambridge, Eng. 1950).

[E. MCDERMOTT]

LATOMUS, BARTHOLOMAEUS (STEINMETZ)

Humanist and controversialist; b. Arlon, Luxembourg, c. 1490; d. Koblenz, Germany, Jan. 3, 1570. As a result of humanistic studies at Freiburg im Breisgau (1517), he became acquainted with ERASMUS and traveled with him through Alsace in 1521. After teaching philosophy in Trier and Cologne, he was named professor of Latin eloquence at the Royal College of France (1534), and he taught there until called to Trier by the new elector, Ludwig Von Hagen, to act as his counselor. His work against the Reformers is exemplified in a letter written to Johann Sturm of Strassburg, which, along with Sturm's reply, is found in Epistolae duorum amicorum B. Latomi et J. Sturmii . . . (Strassburg 1540, 1566). Latomus became involved in controversy with Martin BUCER, who tried to introduce the reform into Cologne. Against him he wrote B. Latomi adv. M. Buccerum . . . (Cologne 1545) and Refutatio calumniosarum insectationum M. Bucceri . . . (Cologne 1546). He accompanied his archbishop to Speyer, Worms, and Regensburg; and in 1557 he returned to Worms to publish the Spaltung der Auspurchischen Confession (Schism of the Augsburg Confession), a work that involved Latomus in more controversy with Petrus Dathenus (1531/32-88), a Calvinist minister. As a result of a later polemical exchange with Jakob Andreä, Latomus wrote De docta simplicitate primae Ecclesiae (Cologne 1559).

Bibliography: L. ROERSCH, "Barthélemy Latomus, le premier professeur d'éloquence latine au Collège royal de France," Bulletins de l'Académie royale de Belgique, 3d ser. 14 (1887) 132–176. R. STUPPERICH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:239. E. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2624–26, with bibliog.

[G. J. DONNELLY]

LATOMUS, JACOBUS

Louvain theologian; b. Cambron, Hainault, c. 1475; d. Louvain, May 29, 1544. Latomus (Jacques Masson) became a doctor in theology at Louvain in 1519, and was rector there in 1537. He aroused the humanists by his attack on the Erasmian school in De trium linguarum. . . dialogus (Antwerp 1519), although he did not name ERASMUS. That humanist defended the necessity of knowledge of the languages of Scripture as a basis for true theology in his Apologia refellens suspiciones . . ., and St. THOMAS MORE supported Erasmus in his letter to Edward Lee, mentioning Latomus (Rogers, Correspondence, 75.414). From 1520 on Latomus wrote against the reformers, defending the decree of Louvain in 1520 against Luther's ideas in Articulorum doctrinae F. Martini Lutheri . . . (Antwerp 1521), and after a series of exchanges: De primatu Romani Pontificis . . . (Antwerp 1525). He wrote tracts against Johannes Oecolampadius, Beatus Rhenanus, Jean Gerson, Bartholomew Batnus, and William Tyndale. His works, collected by his nephew, J. Latomus, were published at Louvain (1550). The controversial writings of Latomus, though marred by the defects of the time, mark progress from decadent scholasticism to the development of a genre that Bellarmine perfected.

Bibliography: H. Hurter, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 1:1447–48. E. Amann, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:2626–28. F. NÈVE, Biographie nationale de Belgique 11:425. J. ÉTIENNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. Hofer and K. Rahner (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:822. R. Stupperich, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:239. P. Kalkoff, Die Anfänge der Gegenreformation in den Niederlanden, 2 v. (Halle 1903).

[G. J. DONNELLY]

LA TOUR DU PIN, CHARLES HUMBERT RENÉ (MARQUIS DE LA CHARCE)

French Catholic social thinker; b. Arrancy (Aisne), April 1, 1834; d. Lausanne, Switzerland, Dec. 4, 1924. He was a descendant of an illustrious family, began his career as an officer, and took part in military campaigns in the Crimea, Italy, and Algeria. When taken prisoner during the War of 1870, he was interned at Aix-la-Chapelle with Albert de Mun. Together they came upon Émile Keller's condemnation of LIBERALISM [L'Encyclique du eight décembre 1864 et les principes de 1789 (Paris 1865)] and the social doctrine of Wilhelm Emmanuel von KETTELER. Seeing in liberalism and social injustice the causes of the French defeat, La Tour du Pin wished to combat these forces, especially after the experience of the Commune. Maurice Maignen's circle of Catholic workers gave him the desired tool.

Toward the end of 1871 there was born the movement of Catholic workers' circles that multiplied encounters between employers and workers under the presidency of a member of the "ruling class." The republican government soon began to harass the circles. La Tour du Pin, who kept in close contact with Frédéric le Play, wished to give them a corporativist character. In 1877 he was named military attaché to Vienna, where he met the Comte de Chambord and continued his social studies with the Austrian Social Catholics. His work was published in his movement's official organ, L'Association catholique. Raised to the rank of colonel, he retired from the army in 1882 to devote himself to his estate at Arrancy and to the movement.

La Tour du Pin played an important role in the studies undertaken by the Fribourg Union that prepared the way for RERUM NOVARUM (1891). He greatly influenced Albert de Mun's legislative projects and strongly encouraged Léon HARMEL in the transformation of his enterprise and in his appeal to Christian employers. He took an interest in the founding of the Catholic Association of French youth by the Comte de Roquefeuile. He favored the introduction of the agricultural syndicates in 1884. His closest followers were Henri Lorin, founder of the Semaine sociales de France, and the deputy, H. de Gailhard-Bancel. In 1891 he published his Aphorismes de politique social.

The RALLIEMENT, which he refused to accept, and the decline of the circles isolated him. His influence narrowed, and he turned to ACTION FRANÇAISE. His wife's death and the German invasion that drove him out of Arrancy saddened his declining years.

La Tour du Pin was the thinker among the early Social Catholics, exerting considerable influence on the entry of the state and the Church into social questions between 1880 and 1895. He repudiated liberalism and sought to transform society, in accord with God's will, into an organic whole, a "body social" based on the family and not on the individual, on property, on work, and having the king at its head.

Bibliography: Vers un ordre social chrétien: Jalons de route (Paris 1929), essays of La Tour du Pin. E. BOSSAN DE GARAGNOL, Le Colonel de La-Tour-du-Pin d'après lui-même (Paris 1934). C. BAUSSAN, La Tour du Pin (Paris 1931). R. SÉMICHON, Les Idées sociales et politiques de La-Tour-du-Pin (Paris 1936). A. CANALETTI GAUDENTI, Un corporativista cattolico: Renato de La Tour du Pin (Rome 1935). H. ROLLET, L'Action sociale des catholiques en France (Paris 1948). R. TALMY, René de la Tour du Pin (Paris 1964).

[H. ROLLET]

LATOURETTE, KENNETH SCOTT

Professor of Missions and Oriental History at Yale University (1921–53); b. Oregon City, OR, 9 Aug. 1884; d. there, 26 Dec. 1968. After serving for approximately a year on the faculty of Yale in China at Changsha, he returned to the United States and taught at Reed College (1914–16), Denison University (1916–21), and finally at Yale where he also became chairman of the religion department and director of graduate studies. He was recipient of a number of honorary doctorates, and served as president of the American Society of Church History and the American Historical Association. In 1951, he was elected President of the American Baptist Convention.

From the moment he responded to the call of the Student Volunteer Movement and became a missionary, his life was dominated by a concern for missions. Motivated by this deep concern, Latourette became a pioneer in both the history of missions and East Asian history. His work in both these areas opened a new phase in historical studies, and many of his more than eighty monographs and numerous articles continue as standard, authoritative works. His major work is a seven volume History of The Expansion of Christianity, completed in 1945.

Latourette has often been criticized for being a "tire-less chronicler," excessively imbued with a concern for "objective" history, and lacking depth theologically. Though there is truth to these criticisms, it must be remembered that his historiographical method was the product of his age. It must also be pointed out that Latourette was trained as a historian, not a theologian. Although his historical treatment was governed more by sociological than theological considerations, he clearly made an invaluable contribution—perhaps more than any other U.S. scholar—to ground Christianity in universal history.

Bibliography: W. C. HARR, ed., Frontiers of the Christian World Mission since 1938: Essays in Honor of Kenneth Scott Latourette (New York 1962). K. S. LATOURETTE, Beyond the Ranges: An Autobiography (Grand Rapids 1967). L. MOORE, JR., "Beyond the Ranges—The Autobiography of Kenneth Scott Latourette," Hartford Quarterly Review 8.4 (Summer 1968) 77–95. W.R. HOGG, "Kenneth Scott Latourette 1884–1968: Interpreter of the Expansion of Christianity," in Mission Legacies: Biographical Studies of Leaders of the Modern Missionary Movement, eds. G.H. ANDERSON et al, (Maryknoll, 1994), 416–27. A. PFEIFFER, "Kenneth Scott Latourette: A Description and Assessment of His Historical Analysis of the Spread of Christianity in the First Five Centuries," Logia 7 (1998) 19–24.

[J. K. LUOMA]

LA TRAPPE, ABBEY OF

Or Maison-Dieu Notre Dame de la Trappe (Lat., Domus Dei de Trappa), Cistercian abbey founded in 1140 near Mortagne, France, in the Diocese of Séez, by Rotrou III, count of Perche. The first religious were monks from Breuil-Benoît of the Congregation of SAVIGNY, sent there by the founder. In 1147 the Congregation of Savigny joined the order of CÎTEAUX as a filiation of CLAIRVAUX. The abbey prospered during the administration of Bl. Adam. During the 14th century the abbey was burned by the English. Commendatory abbots in the 16th century brought a spirit of relaxation to the community. Later one of them, Armand le Bouthillier de RANCÉ, renounced his worldly life, took the religious habit, and spent his novitiate in the Abbey of Perseigne in the Province of Maine. In 1664 he became a regular abbot at La Trappe. After meeting with much initial resistance, he was able to reestablish discipline. Thus the TRAPPIST reform began; it was adopted by several monasteries of the order. During the French Revolution, Augustin de Lestrange, master of novices, left with a group of monks to seek refuge outside France, first in Switzerland at the Carthusian convent of La Valsainte. Later he traveled through Europe, attracting many vocations. He returned to France in 1815 and was able to restore the Abbey of La Trappe. The present monastery, rebuilt in 1895, is still occupied by the reformed CISTER-CIANS.

Bibliography: Cartulaire de l'abbaye de Notre-Dame de la Trappe (Alençon 1889). H. DE CHARENCEY, Histoire de l'abbaye de la Grande-Trappe, 2 v. (Mortagne 1896–1911). L. F. DU BOIS, Histoire civile, religieuse, et littéraire de l'abbaye de la Trappe (Paris 1824). H. TOURNOÜER, Bibliographie et iconographie de la Maison-Dieu, N.-D. de la Trappe (Mortagne 1894). Odyssée monastique: Dom A. de Lestrange et les Trappistes pendant la Révolution (Soligny-la-Trappe 1898). M. A. DIMIER, La Sombre Trappe: Les Légendes et la vérité (Paris 1946).

[M. A. DIMIER]

LATTER-DAY SAINTS, CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF

Also called the Mormon Church, founded in upstate New York on April 6, 1830, by Joseph SMITH (1805–44), who reported divine visitations. In 1830 he published the Book of Mormon, claiming to have translated it from plates of gold given him by the angel Moroni, purportedly a record of God's dealings with the ancestors of the American Indians, alleged to have been Hebrews who came in three migrations to the New World. Mormonism was one product of the religious revivalism and turmoil characteristic of upstate New York in that period.

Historical Development. From 1831, with the founding of a Mormon community at Kirtland, Ohio, to 1844, when Joseph Smith was murdered by a mob in Carthage, Ill., the church had a stormy history. In those years, four attempts were made to build a community embodying Mormon ideals and giving expression to the group's separate existence. At Kirtland, the effort led to financial disaster. At Independence and Far West, Mo., two more attempts were made. After some success, the Mormons attracted the opposition of their neighbors and were driven out in violence and bloodshed. Their initial successes, northern manners, religious peculiarities, claims to make the area a holy land of their religion, and favorable attitudes toward the indigenous peoples combined to elicit Missourian hostility. They were driven from Independence in the winter of 1833-34 and went into Clay County, from which they were shortly asked to leave. In Far West, which they then founded, a similar pattern of success, hostility, and expulsion followed. Joseph Smith estimated losses of $2 million in Missouri, and the final expulsion in a small-scale "Mormon War" cost some 40 lives, all but one or two of them Mormon.

Mormon efforts in the Middle West were most successful on the east bank of the Mississippi River in Illinois at Nauvoo, which soon became an attractive city of about 15,000. This accomplishment issued in a second "Mormon War." In Nauvoo, rumors concerning the secret practice of polygamy contributed to antagonism, as did the palpable evidence of Mormon size and power. In the violence that ensued, Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum were murdered by the mob, and after considerable tension and some open fighting, the Mormons were driven out. They commenced evacuation of Nauvoo in subzero weather in February of 1846.

There followed a period of discouragement and dissension. Several groups broke off at this time, one of which later formed the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Brigham YOUNG (1801–77) took over the church leadership and organized migration across Iowa to the banks of the Missouri River, where he established winter quarters. After a season of great suffering, Young organized the Mormon trek to the West, and on April 7, 1847, he left with a party of 148 for the Valley of the Great Salt Lake, Utah. They arrived on July 22, and two days later Young entered the valley.

Thus began the Mormon migration to and settlement of the intermountain region. Thousands came by wagon train, handcart, and later by railroad. The Mormons developed their settlement on a planned basis, and the church "called" people to establish communities in irrigable valleys throughout the region. By the time of Young's death in 1877, the Mormons had established 357 Settlements, and Utah had a Mormon population of about 140,000. Settlement and emigration continued. By 1900 some 90,000 immigrant converts had been brought from Europe.

The Mormon communities succeeded in Utah, but the conflict with gentile opinion and government authorities continued. When in 1857 Pres. James Buchanan sent Federal troops under Gen. A. S. Johnston, the issue nearly came to open conflict. Gradually the lines of antagonism were drawn around the two issues of Utah's admission to the Union and polygamy, which had been practiced openly in Utah since 1852. In 1863 Congress passed the Morrill Law, forbidding polygamy, which the Supreme Court upheld in 1879. In 1882 the Edmunds Act was passed, followed in 1887 by the Edmunds-Tucker Act. These laws were more stringent; the latter dissolved the church as a corporation. Anti-Mormon sentiment was aroused among the small but significant non-Mormon group in Utah, and in the nation generally. With about 200 members in jail, the Mormons capitulated and in the constitutional convention of 1887 supported the outlawing of polygamy. In September of 1890, Church President Wilford Woodruff (1807-98) renounced polygamy as effective church teaching, and in 1896 Utah was admitted to the Union. There followed a period of accommodation, and Mormonism strove for and achieved acceptance and respectability. However, a small dissident and excommunicated sect advocating and practicing polygamy continues to exist in Utah.

Mormonism's most striking achievement was settlement of the arid terrain of the intermountain West. This achievement finds its most appropriate monument in the establishment of irrigation as the basis for agriculture. The Mormons displayed both the cooperation and the discipline necessary for this accomplishment. By 1865 there were over 1,000 miles of canals in Utah, and by 1946, some 8,750 miles.

Basic Doctrinal Position. Mormonism is based upon Joseph Smith's claim that contemporary revelation began with his divine election as prophet-founder of the Mormon Church. The Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, and the Pearl of Great Price, alleged revelations of the founder, are accepted, with the Bible, as scripture. The first claims to be a miraculously translated pre-Columbian scripture; the second contains revelations announced by Joseph from time to time, including that establishing polygamy; the third allegedly contains lost parts of the Pentateuch, some of which was transcribed by Smith from papyri, Smith's writings, and articles of Mormon belief.

While the Book of Mormon is a work obviously Christian in tenor, the later teachings introduced a number of innovations. These include the doctrine of human existence in a previous spirit world, a finite developing God, baptism for the dead, an interpretation of the Trinity as tritheism, marriage for time and eternity, humanity's eternal progression to god-like status, and polygamy. Mormonism emphasizes worldly virtues of a distinctively American kind: optimism, self-improvement, hard work, and respect for law. Recreation is highly valued and organized by the church, and abstinence from coffee, tea, tobacco, and liquor is enjoined. The importance of the family is stressed. The Mormons also hold that the U.S. enjoys a special providential position in the world and that its Constitution has been divinely inspired. Millennialism has long been an integral part of Mormon doctrine, and in one form or another remains of some significance.

Organizational Structure. Church structure is complex with a hierarchical priesthood embracing all males deemed worthy. There are two levels of priesthood: the lesser Aaronic priesthood with its stages of deacon, teacher, priest, and bishop; and the Melchizedek order, which contains two higher ranks—seventies, to which men are advanced after mission experience, and high priest. Important leaders on all levels are high priests. For a long time, admission to the priesthood was only opened to white European males, and this caused some internal protest and complications in external relations. In 1978, this decision was reversed, and it was held that "all worthy male members of the church may be ordained to the priesthood without regard for race or color."

The local unit is the ward; several wards comprise a stake. The ward is led by an unpaid leader who is called a bishop and is assisted by two counselors, this triumvirate form being characteristic of all offices of executive importance. While there is great rank-and-file participation, direction is centralized and authority comes strictly from the top down. Most officers are unpaid. At the top is the church presidency made up of the First President and his two counselors and the Council of the Twelve Apostles, which has selected a number of assistants. The top 24 officials are known as the General Authorities. The church is highly organized and characterized by tremendous activism. Large numbers of young men and some young women go on two-year missions at their own expense. The church conducts a large welfare organization that farms land by volunteer labor; it also has a Genealogical Society connected with temple work for the dead that activates many older people.

The Mormon Church continues to grow, and by the end of the 20th century it had more than five million members. The church is a dominant influence in Utah, where it represents a bulwark of conservatism and has contributed people of importance nationally in a wide number of fields. It is supported by payment of tithes and has large business investments.

Bibliography: W. A. LINN, The Story of the Mormons (New York 1902). L. L. BENNION, The Religion of the Latter-Day Saints

(rev. and enl. Salt Lake City 1940). W. R. CROSS, The Burned Over District: The Social and Intellectual History of Enthusiastic Religion in Western New York, 1800–1850 (Ithaca 1950). L. NELSON, The Mormon Village: A Pattern and Technique of Land Settlement (Salt Lake City 1952). K. YOUNG, Isn't One Wife Enough? (New York 1954). T. F. O'DEA, The Mormons (Chicago 1957). L. J. ARRINGTON, Great Basin Kingdom: An Economic History of the Latter Day Saints, 1830–1900 (Cambridge, Mass. 1958). W. MULDER and A. R. MORTENSEN, eds., Among the Mormons: Historic Accounts by Contemporary Observers (New York 1958). F. S. MEAD, S. S. HILL and C. D. ATWOOD, eds., Handbook of Denominations in the United States, 11th ed (Nashville 2001).

[T. F. O'DEA/EDS.]

LATVIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in eastern Europe, the Republic of Latvia borders the gulf of Riga on the north, ESTONIA on the northeast, LITHUANIA on the south and the Baltic Sea on the west. Comprised of lowlands, Latvia boasts a continental climate, with moderately cold winters. Its terrain rises in the eastern lake region, and most of the country is well forested. Natural resources include amber, peat, limestone and dolomite, while hydropower from the Dvina River provides half the region's energy needs. Crops include various grains, sugar beets, potatoes, vegetables and dairy products.

Under the domination of German, Polish, Swedish and then Russian governments for many centuries, Latvia gained independence briefly in 1918 before becoming incorporated into the USSR in 1944. In 1991, the region achieved independence, and has since attempted to boost its sagging economy through privatization of its industrial base and the development of trade with the rest of Europe. In the wake of decades of Soviet occupation, ethnic Latvians constitute barely 52 percent of the country's population, while Russians make up about a third of the total. Conflicts over the citizenship status of the Russian population continued to be of concern to the Russian Federation in 2000.

The Early Church. Named for the Lettish people, who originally inhabited the region, Latvia was invaded by Swedes and Russians between 900 and 1000; by the 12th century the Latgali, Kurši, Sēli and Zemgali tribes were settled there. Each tribe had its own administration and state, the strongest of which was Gersika, the Latgalian state on the Daugava River, adjacent to the state of Novgorod. Gersika was Christianized through Byzantium, giving early Latvian religious terminology its Slavonic characteristic. The faith spread throughout the region, reaching Riga, then home to Livonians and Germans. Augustinian canon St. Meinhard founded a church and chapel of canons in 1180 at Ikškile, southeast of Riga, and became the first bishop of Livonia in 1186. ALBERT I became Riga's first bishop in 1201 and there established the KNIGHTS OF THE SWORD, who, together with the Order of the Cross, conquered most of the eastern Baltic. Riga was suffragan to Bremen until 1214. Innocent III (1198–1216) made the see exempt, and in 1255 it became a metropolitan see.

Reformation to Communism. Albert (Hohenzollern) of Prussia, grand master of the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, secularized the ecclesiastical territory to form the first Duchy of Prussia and introduced LUTHERANISM into Latvia c. 1530. Interior weaknesses brought Livonia (modern-day Latvia and Estonia) to its political downfall. War with Russia, from 1558 to 1582, devastated the region and it split into two parts, Vidzeme and Latgola, both of which fell under Polish rule from 1561-1629. The Swedish took Vidzeme in 1629; Latgola remained in Polish hands until 1772, when Russia acquired it in the partition of Poland; Kurzeme became the independent Duchy of Kurland in 1721. Under Polish rule, Latgola remained Catholic according to the principle of cuius regio, eius religio, with the Dominicans and Jesuits contributing greatly to its spiritual and cultural growth (see DACIA).

Under Czarist rule, until it won independence in 1918, Latvia was under constant pressure to conform to Russian ways, including eschewing the Latin rite for the Roman Orthodox faith. Roman letter type was banned in 1865 with the purpose of annihilating both Catholicism and the native tongue. This ban was not lifted until 1904, when Latgalian literature finally began to develop. During the ban, books became scarce and were either written by hand or were smuggled in from Tilsit. The prayer book, studied privately at home, was the sole means of education. A strong nationalist sentiment remained throughout the country. Chief among those who advocated against the Russification of the faith were P. Miglinīks (1850–83), A. Jurdžs (1845–1925), K. Skrynda (1875-1919), A. Skrynda (1881-1933), F. Kemps (1876–1952), N. Rancāns (1870–1933), and F. Trasuns (1864-1926).

In 1918, with the collapse of the Russian Empire following World War I, the Latvian provinces united and declared their independence. After a period of chaos under a Bolshevik occupation (1918–20) during which Catholics were persecuted, the region gained political stability. Tsarist rule had left Latvia with a shortage of priests, many of its churches destroyed by the war, and its leading laymen dead from a typhoid epidemic. Within ten years the country had rebuilt its industry and had progressed in all areas of life, including matters of faith. The Congress of Latvian Catholics met in Rezekne in Capital: Riga. Size: 24,600 sq. miles.

Population: 2,404,926 in 2000.

Languages: Lettish, Lithuanian, Russian.

Religions: 500,000 Catholics (23.5%), 190,000 Orthodox (8%), 400,000 Lutheran (16%), 12,500 Protestants (.5%), 5,100 other (.23%), 1,297,326 without religious affiliation. Archdiocese: Riga, with suffragans Liepaja, Jelgāva, and Rēzekne-Aglona.

1917 and adopted a resolution to form one state but to retain local autonomy, freedom in religious matters and the use of High Latvian. Under Pope BENEDICT XV the diocese of Riga was restored, and churches were rebuilt. Seminarians who had once prepared for the priesthood at the seminary in St. Petersburg, now attended seminaries in Aglyuna, Riga or in western European universities. In 1939, when Latvia's population was less than two million, 60 percent of Latvians were Lutheran, 25 percent Catholic, six percent Greek Orthodox and five percent Jewish.

In 1920 a Catholic political party was formed that took an active role in policymaking until 1934, when a coup d'état led by the fascist Karlis Ulmanis led to the abolishment of all political parties, as well as curtailment of freedom of speech and of the press. A highly centralized totalitarian regime was established that lasted until 1940. Despite the change in government, the Church continued to function in the country, and religious such as the Marian Fathers worked in Vilani, and the Capuchins in Skaistkaine and Riga. Sisters of the Poor Child Jesus, from Austria, conducted a girl's high school in Jaunaglyuna, while Sisters of the Holy Cross and Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus also performed humanitarian services. The first papal nuncio to Latvia was Antonio Zecchini (1922-35). Antonio Arata became nuncio in 1935 but was expelled in 1940, as the country entered another phase of its history.

The Church under Communism. In June of 1940 the Red Army entered and occupied Latvia. Devastation followed, as Catholic institutions were suppressed and priests and laymen arrested, threatened and tortured. The Lutheran Church's educational functions were also curtailed and most theological institutes were closed. Massive deportations created such havoc that many Latvians welcomed the arrival of invading German forces in June of 1941. The policy of the German occupying government toward the Church was ambivalent: not to destroy and not to help. While their policy toward the faith was viewed favorably in comparison to that of Russia, the mass killings of Latvian Jews that occurred during the Holocaust presented a moral challenge to the Church.

Once Soviet forces returned in October of 1944, following the end of World War II, the government's disregard of the Church drastically changed, and Catholics were rigidly watched and persecuted. With their bishops exiled or in Siberia, about 100 pastors and nearly 100,000 Latvian laymen fled the country, while massive deportations between 1945 and 1953 sent of thousands of others to Siberia or other remote areas of the USSR. Prohibitive taxes were levied against the Church, and in 1948 religious instruction in churches was banned by the Soviets. At the same time all Church properties were nationalized. The Lutheran and, to a lesser extent, Orthodox Churches in Latvia also suffered from repression and flight to the West, although the Soviet regime was somewhat less active in controlling the Lutheran Church because it lacked a well-organized national-religious dissident movement. Nonetheless the regime's intensification of antireligious propaganda after 1957 continued to have a detrimental effect on all faiths within Latvia.

The Fall of Communism to Present. With the rise of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev to power in 1985, the most egregious restrictions on religion were quickly relaxed, and by 1989 virtually all legal restrictions on the Church had been removed. In March of 1990, with the fall of communism in Eastern Europe, the Latvian government proclaimed independence, and the international community recognized an independent Latvian republic in 1991. The new constitution preserved the right of religious freedom, and as an established faith, the Catholic Church received tax benefits and other privileges. Although the majority of the Christian population in Latvia were members of the Lutheran Evangelical Church, Catholics formed a majority in sections of eastern Latvia. The Orthodox Church was also active in the country. In 1996, consideration of a Vatican proposal to reestablish the 1922 Concordat between the Holy See and Latvia was undertaken, although other churches in the country objected to the possibility of the Catholic Church gaining favored status. The Church also requested permission to establish a faculty of theology at the then nondenominational University of Latvia.

By 2000 there were 214 parishes tended by 88 diocesan and 21 religious priests in Latvia. In addition, 80 sisters worked within the country. Encouraging Church leaders to take an active role in promoting Catholic unity, Pope John Paul II recalled his trip to the region in 1993 and noted during a September of 1999 meeting with Latvian bishops that "indifference and religious relativism" were among those aspects of society that most threatened the country's Catholic population. By 2000 efforts were underway to establish an ecumenical dialogue in Latvia.

Bibliography: R. WITTRAM, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 1:850–856; ed., Baltische Kirchengeschichte (Göttingen 1956). L. ARBUSOW, Die Einführung der Reformation in Livonia, Estonia und Kurland (Halle 1921). A. BILMANIS, A History of Latvia (Princeton 1951). M. HELLMANN, Das Lettenland im Mittelalter (Cologne 1954). M. BOURDEAUX, Land of Crosses (Chulmleigh UK 1980). A. LIEVEN, The Baltic Revolution: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and the Path to Independence (New Haven CT 1993). R. J. MISIUNAS and R. TAAGEPERA, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence 1940–1990 (2d ed. Berkeley 1993). V. S. VARDYS, "Human-Rights Issues in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania," Journal of Baltic Studies, 12 (fall 1981) 275–98; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:986–987.

[L. LATKOVSKI/EDS.]

LAUD, WILLIAM

Archbishop of Canterbury; b. Reading, England, Oct. 7, 1573; d. London, Jan. 10, 1645. Laud, the only son of a clothier, matriculated at Oxford in 1589 and was ordained in 1601. He held modest chaplaincies and was vicar of Stanford for one year. In 1608 he was awarded his doctorate in divinity, cultivated his interest in Arabic, and preached before James I. Laud abhorred extremism. He regarded Puritans with disfavor and disliked Roman Catholicism. He believed strongly in episcopacy, order, and uniformity in religious worship. He wanted a strong and united national church, energetic and resolute, purged of sects, schisms, and slackness, and decorous and disciplined. Laud was short, red-faced, tactless, testy, and profoundly convinced of the rectitude of his own reform policies. He had an authoritarian temper and, unfortunately, he tried to force upon the PURITANS the religion of tradition-minded Anglicans. He believed in the full exercise of the royal prerogative and was accordingly rewarded by a series of promotions—from the deanery of Gloucester to the bishopric of St. David's. When James died in 1625, Laud was 52. His real predominance in the Church of England was only beginning.

The new king, Charles I, admired and respected the much older prelate. Laud became bishop of Bath and Wells, and then dean of the chapel royal, privy councilor, bishop of London, and chancellor of Oxford. Again, by the King's good grace, he was elevated to the archbishopric of Canterbury, the highest ecclesiastical office in the realm. The new archbishop was insensitive to the many diverse elements that made up the disorderly and deteriorating ecclesiastical establishment. In trying to enforce ceremonial uniformity he incurred the wrath of the Puritans because he submerged their religious practices and violated their most cherished prejudices. The English dispute over ceremonial and ritual—bowing, surplices, the position of the communion table—was sharply intensified when Laud accompanied the King to Scotland in 1633 and the fateful decision was made to ask for the acceptance of the English Prayer Book and official liturgy in that Presbyterian country. The request was regarded as an outrageous foreign interference in Scottish affairs. Scottish resistance was immediate and was followed by a futile English invasion to compel obedience.

Icon of Our Lady of Latvia.

After 11 years of personal rule, Charles summoned Parliament. As soon as it convened in 1640, the 3-week Short Parliament complained bitterly about Laud's religious despotism and the King's illegal taxation. It was dismissed. The Scots successfully invaded England and the Long Parliament (1640-60) had to be called into session. Angry and vindictive, it proceeded against the King's principal political adviser, Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, and imprisoned Archbishop Laud under a charge of treason. Strafford was summarily executed (1641), but several years passed before Laud, then an old man of 72, was brought to trial. While it was alleged that the archbishop had sought to subvert the foundations of Church and State, the charge could not be sustained and Commons proceeded against Laud by an ordinance of attainder. He was brought to the scaffold on Tower Hill, protesting that he was guilty of no offense that deserved the death penalty, rejecting the muddled accusation that he tried to bring in popery, and affirming his loyalty to English Protestantism.

William Laud, print after a painting by Anthony Van Dyke.

Bibliography: H. R. TREVOR-ROPER, Archbishop Laud, 1573–1645 (London 1940). R. P. T. COFFIN, Laud, Storm Center of Stuart England (New York 1930). S. R. GARDINER, The First Two Stuarts and the Puritan Revolution, 1603–1660 (New York 1928 D. MATHEW, The Age of Charles I (London 1951). C. V. WEDGWOOD, The King's Peace, 1637–1641 (New York 1956); The King's War, 1641–1647 (New York 1958). M. J. HAVRAN, The Catholics in Caroline England (Stanford, Calif. 1962).

[J. J. O'CONNOR]

LAUDA SION SALVATOREM

The opening words of a sequence composed c. 1264 by St. THOMAS AQUINAS for the Mass of CORPUS ET SANGUINIS CHRISTI. It is one of the four great hymns on the Holy Eucharist by the Angelic Doctor, the others being PANGE LINGUA GLORIOSI, SACRIS SOLEMNIIS, and VERBUM SUPERNUM PRODIENS. Together they set forth in cogently clear yet beautiful language the fundamental doctrinal teachings of the Church on the Real Presence. Lauda Sion salvatorem was written at the request of Pope Urban IV when the Feast of Corpus Christi was first established, and it was intended for the sequence of the Mass of the feast. Although the work was once ascribed to St. BONAVENTURE, the authorship of Aquinas is today beyond dispute. Thomas uses the prevalent accentual rather than the older classical quantitative meter, and in addition to rhyme abundant use is made of alliteration and assonance. It follows rather closely the form in which ADAM OF SAINT-VICTOR did many of his sequences, especially the beautiful Laudes crucis attollamus. It is a dogmatic poem and never wanders from the correct scholastic terms in its closely reasoned stanzas, but even so it cannot fail to make an impression by its grand and deeply moving style. Sion in the first verse is the Church or the people of God, who are summoned to sing the praises of the life-giving Sacrament. The old PASSOVER is replaced by this new feast, the commemoration of which is explained, where Christ himself figures as the sacrificial lamb. Much the same theme is developed by the same author in his Summa Theologiae (ST 1a2ae, 73-83) as is found in the seventh and later stanzas of the poem. Topics such as transubstantiation, the nature and dogma of the Sacrament, and the mystery and faith involved are all treated clearly and forcefully. The last strophe expresses the hope that the congregation of the faithful will eventually be gathered together for a heavenly feast in the company of the saints. The author of the plainsong melody of the Lauda Sion salvatorem is not known but is supposed by some scholars to have been St. Thomas himself. The melody, however, dates from the 12th century, and possibly even earlier.

Bibliography: Text, Analecta hymnica 50:584–585. G. MORIN, "L'Office cistercien pour la Fête-Dieu comparé avec celui de saint Thomas d'Aquin," Revue Bénedictine 27 (1910) 236–246. E. DUMOUTET, Corpus Domini: Aux sources de la piété eucharistique médiévale (Paris 1942). O. HUF, De Sacramentshymnen van den Hl. Thomas van Aquino (Liturgische Studien 4; Maastricht 1924). G. A. BURTON, "The Liturgical Poetry of St. Thomas," St. Thomas Papers (Cambridge, Eng. 1925) 285–298. F. TRUCCO, San Tommaso d'Aquino poeta della santissima Eucharistia (Sarzana 1928). M. GRABMANN, Die Werke des hl. Thomas von Aquin (3d ed. Münster 1949) 317–324. C. LAMBOT, "L'Office de la Fête-Dieu," Revue Bénedictine 54 (1942) 61–123. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948) 166–188. R. BUSA, S. Thomae Aquinatis hymnorum ritualium varia specimina concordantium (Milan 1951). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 402–414. F. CALLAEY, L'origine della festa del Corpus Domini (Rovigo 1958). J. SZÖVÉRFFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 2:246–251.

[W. C. KORFMACHER]

LAUDABILITER

Papal bull defining the rights of the English king in Ireland. JOHN OF SALISBURY states in his Metalogicon (1159) that on the occasion of his visit to ADRIAN IV at Benevento between November 1155 and July 1156, the latter, at his request, granted to Henry II of England the "hereditary possession" of Ireland; he proceeds to mention documentation then in existence as proof of this as well as a ring of investiture, preserved in the public treasury, which he, John, had conveyed from the pope to the king. Historians do not question John's veracity, and GI-RALDUS CAMBRENSIS later published in Expugnatio Hiberniae (2.5) a papal bull, Laudabiliter, which he states was the document given to John. Its contents have been summarized by M. P. Sheehy: "To the King of the English, Pope Adrian IV sends his approval of the king's intention to enter Ireland for the purpose of improving the state of religion. While propagating the faith the king should respect the rights of the Apostolic See particularly her rights over islands—and the rights of Irish Church leaders." The science of diplomatics shows that the document is no forgery and points to its having been issued during the reign of Adrian IV. The bull, however, does not grant to Henry II "hereditary possession" of Ireland. Nevertheless, in the succeeding centuries, when reference is made to Henry's sovereignty in Ireland, Laudabiliter is the document cited. Although the bull is frequently mentioned in official documents issued in Rome, it is clear that the papal chancery knew of it only by report and neither confirms nor denies its existence. Most modern historians believe that some such document conferring hereditary possession did exist, although it has been since lost.

Bibliography: Laudabiliter et satis, ed. M. P. SHEEHY, in Pontificia Hibernica (Dublin 1962) 15–16. M. P. SHEEHY, "The Bull Laudabiliter: A Problem in Medieval Diplomatics and History," Galway Archaeological and Historical Society Journal 29 (1961) 45–70. J. WATT," Laudabiliter in Medieval Diplomacy and Propaganda," Irish Ecclesiastical Record 87 (1957) 420–432. J. F. O'DOHERTY, "Rome and the Anglo-Norman Invasion of Ireland," ibid. 42 (1933) 131–145. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LOWENFELD (Graz 1956) 10056. A. EGGERS, Die Urkunde Papst Hardians IV. für König Heinrich II. von England über die Besetzung Irlands (Berlin 1922).

[C. MCGRATH]

LAUDOMAR, ST.

Hermit and abbot; d. Chartres, c. 590. Of the extant vitae, the shortest, first edited by Mabillon, was written probably by a disciple soon after the saint's death. Laudomar (Lomer or Launomar) received his early training from the priest Chirmirius. He was ordained and performed pastoral duties at Chartres for some years. He then withdrew to the solitude of La Perche, where he lived as a hermit. His reputation for sanctity and for the miracles ascribed to him attracted so many disciples and reverent admirers that he left La Perche and founded the monastery of Curbio (c. 570), becoming its first abbot. His relics were eventually taken to Blois, where the monastery named in his honor, Saint-Lomer, was built in 924.

Feast: Jan. 19.

Bibliography: Bibliographica hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 2:4733–40. J. S. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 1:317–327. Gallica Christiana 8:1350–53. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 1:104. S. A. BENNETT, Dictionary of Christian Biography 3:628.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

LAUDS

The morning hour of the Divine Office. The term "lauds" is derived from its nature as praise (laud) and from the Laudes or the three Psalms (148, 149, 150) that always concluded its psalmody until the reform of Pius X (d. 1914). Because it is the Church's morning prayer, its more ancient Latin names made reference to that fact, for example, matutinum, matutinum officium, matutini hymni, matutina solemnitas.

Early morning, with its wonderful freshness and stillness, is a time of day especially suited to the praise of God. When human beings and nature once again awaken and undergo their daily "resurrection," it is natural for all to rejoice anew in life and light and to acclaim the beneficent creator of all things. The rising sun has traditionally been looked on as a symbol and reminder of the Lord's Resurrection. Over time, the hour of Lauds evolved into a beautiful and solemn service of morning praise.

Resurrection thoughts are very evident in the antiphons, where the Alleluia (the resurrection acclamation par excellence) occurs frequently. This is preeminently true on Sunday, the Lord's day, when both the resurrection day and resurrection hour coincide at Lauds. On Easter Sunday there is a triple coincidence of this basic Christian motif. The climax of Lauds' praise comes at the Gospel canticle, the Benedictus, Zechariah's joyful "filled with the Holy Spirit" hailing the dawn of the day of salvation. At the beginning of each new day of grace and redemption the Church loves to greet her risen Lord and Savior as the divine Sun, the oriens ex alto.

Lauds was the fruit of a slow, persistent development. The first Christians, converted Jews, made no attempt at an immediate break with Judaism. It was to be expected that they would continue to follow Jewish prayer practices. There was prayer thrice daily in the synagogues; these services consisted of instructional Scripture readings and of prayer. The Shema and the 18 benedictions were said at the morning and evening hours. It is considered probable that the Lord's Prayer, advocated thrice daily for Christians by the Didache, had already supplanted the Shema in apostolic times.

All the early Christian writers who spoke of times of prayer, such as, Cyprian (d. 258) and Clement of Alexandria (d. c. 215), mentioned morning prayer (Cyprian, De oratione dominica 35; Clement, Stromata 7.7). Tertullian, at the beginning of the third century, did not hesitate to call the morning and evening prayers "legitimate prayers" (De oratione 25). Some say "legitimate" means prescribed, but does not demand a public service. Others say it means that these prayers were in conformity with a custom already well established, if not a veritable law, and that they were kept regularly by the Christian community, in short, were liturgical. The work of Tertullian's contemporary, Hippolytus of Rome, tends to bear out the judgment that morning prayer was kept regularly by the Christian community. It describes an early morning assembly every day at places designated by the bishop at which the presbyters and deacons gave instruction and then there were prayers (Apostolic Tradition 39, 41). The faithful were urged, not obliged, to attend. The instruction was quite likely given in connection with a reading from Holy Scripture. This is the most important and detailed early witness to an organized service in the morning. From such lessons and prayers the liturgical hour of Lauds eventually took form.

During the peace that followed Constantine's edict of toleration in 313, the Church everywhere soon appointed times of prayer for her rapidly growing community. Lauds and Vespers became canonically established hours of prayer throughout Christendom. Research has brought to light a striking uniformity throughout the Church in the basic structure of these hours. Lauds commonly had Psalm 63 and the Laudate Psalms, a Scripture reading with explanation, a hymn (inserted somewhat later), Preces (a litany of intercessions for the needs of the Church), and the concluding prayer and blessing by the presiding bishop or priest.

St. Benedict described the basic arrangement of Lauds already in his 6th-century Rule (ch. 12 and 13).

His is the first complete account of the daily organization of the Office. He himself acknowledges that he is following the Roman Church, that is, the practice of the communities, more or less regular, that served the Roman basilicas at that time. Even the titular churches of Rome, served by the secular clergy, very probably had much the same Office for Lauds.

By the middle ages, Lauds consisted of introductory versicles, five Psalms and antiphons, a short Scripture reading, a hymn, a versicle, the Benedictus, Preces on penitential days, an oration, and the concluding versicles. Unlike most of the other hours, Lauds had specially selected Psalms. Of set purpose, they are Psalms of praise and often contain nature motifs. The first Psalm of Lauds (except on penitential days) was always one in praise of God's kingship, and in the New Testament context this means the kingship of the risen Christ. In at least one of the next two Psalms there was some reference to morning. On Sundays and great feasts, the Old Testament canticle that follows is the Benedicite (Canticle of the Three Young Men); it called on all creation to join in praise of the Lord. Lastly came one of the Laudate Psalms that have praise as their dominant characteristics. The 1971 revision of the Liturgy of the Hours has preserved much of the classical structure of Lauds. Lauds or Morning Prayer begins with an introductory versicle, followed by a morning hymn. The number of psalms and canticles has been reduced to three: a psalm, an Old Testament Canticle, and a psalm of praise. Next comes a short Scripture reading, a responsory, the Canticle of Zechariah (Benedictus), intercessory prayers (preces), the Lord's Prayer, closing prayer, and a blessing.

Bibliography: P.F. BRADSHAW, Daily Prayer in the Early Church: A Study of the Origin and Early Development of the Divine Office (London 1981). G. GUIVER, Company of Voices: Daily Prayer and the People of God (New York 1988). R. TAFT, The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West: The Origins of the Divine Office and Its Meaning for Today, 2nd rev. ed. (Collegeville 1993).

[G. E. SCHIDEL/EDS.]

LAUDUS (LÔ), ST.

Bishop; b. perhaps at St. Lô, Normandy, France; d. c. 568. He became bishop of Coutances c. 523 and attended the synods of Orléans in 533, 538, 541, and 549, as well as the funerals of St. Paternus (d. 563) and St. Marculf (d. 558). He was a friend of St. Melanie of Rennes (d. c. 535). As patron saint of Coutances, he has his own Office; and in the Mass, his own Sequence and Preface. There is evidence that his cult existed also at Bayeux, where he was perhaps buried, at Rouen, and at Angers in the ninth century, when his vita was written.

Feast: Sept. 22 (Coutances and Sarum calendar); Sept. 25 (Bayeux).

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum Sept. 6 (1863) 438–448. E. W. BÖHNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:827. V. LEROQUAIS, Les Sacramentaires et les missels manuscrits des bibliothèques de France (Paris 1924) 3:380. E. A. PIGEON, Vies des saints du diocèse de Coutances et Avranches 2 v. (Avranches 1892) 113–172. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–15) 2:238. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saintes et des bienheureux (Paris 1935–56) 9:464–465.

[V. I. J. FLINT]

LAUNOY, JEAN DE

Theologian; b. Valdesie, France, Dec. 21, 1601; d. Paris, March 10, 1678. Launoy studied philosophy and theology at the College of Navarre in Paris, of which he became the historian. Receiving a licenciate and doctorate in 1634, he was ordained a priest in 1636. As an historian he developed an extreme form of criticism, pointing out the false attributions of works and the unchecked assertions of the martyrologium. He admitted neither the identity of Denis, Bishop of Paris, with the Areopagite, nor the legend according to which St. Magdalen would have taken refuge at Sainte-Baume. In his books and letters he developed a strong and coherent form of Gallicanism, rejecting the infallibility of the Roman pontiff and professing the superiority of the general council.

In 1649, he took part in the controversy concerning the author of the Imitation of Christ: according to him, the author was not Thomas à Kempis, but Gersen, Abbot of Vercelli. He defended NICHOLAS OF CLAMANGES who was posthumously attacked by his adversaries, and he published his unedited works. He also took part in a controversy about DURANDUS OF SAINT-POURÇAIN'S theory of the divine action on human beings. He did not favor the Immaculate Conception or the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, and took part in literary controversies on these issues. Although opposed to the Jansenists, he encouraged frequent communion and considered attritionism authorized by Trent.

He was excluded from the Faculty of Theology of Paris for his refusal to subscribe to the censure of A. Arnauld (1656). In his Regia in matrimonium potestas (Paris 1674), he claimed that Christian marriage was only a civil contract and was exclusively under the jurisdiction of the state. His works were issued in 10 volumes, Joannis Launoii opera omnia (Geneva 1731–33).

Bibliography: J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:2–6. P. FÉRET, La Faculté de théologie de Paris et ses docteurs les plus célèbres.

Époque moderne (Paris 1906). A. G. MARTIMORT, Le gallicanisme de Bossuet (Paris 1953). J. M. GRES-GAYER, Le Jansénisme en Sorbonne, 1643–1656 (Paris 1996); Le gallicanisme de Sorbonne, 1656–1688 (Paris 2001).

[G. MOLLAT/J. M. GRES-GAYER]

LAURA

A laura is a colony of monks leading semieremitical lives in separate huts grouped around a central building (coenobium) near a church. The monks were subject to a spiritual father and gathered on Saturday and Sunday for the communal celebration of the liturgy. Often the anchorites had to pass a period of probation in the coenobium. Laura is most commonly used with reference to 4th-century Palestinian MONASTICISM, the first monastery there having been founded by St. Chariton (c. 350) at Pharan, northeast of Jerusalem. However, the first monks of Egypt, especially those of Scete, patterned their semieremitical life on that of the laura also, as did monks of Syria, Mesopotamia, Gaul, Italy, Ireland, Britain, and as they do in Russia to this day (see ATHOS, MOUNT). It represents a mid-stage between the life of the recluse and the fully cenobitic life developed by St. PACHOMIUS. St. Euthymius (377-473) and his disciple St. SABAS (439-532) founded the most famous Palestinian lauras. In 483 Sabas established also, southeast of Jerusalem, the Great Laura (known as Mar Saba), which still stands today; and in 507, the New Laura.

Bibliography: S. VAILHÉ, "Les premiers monastères de Palestine," Bessarione 3 (1897–98) 39–58, 209–225; 4 (1898) 193–210. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 8.2:1961–88. H. G. EVELYN-WHITE, ed., The Monasteries of the Wadi n' Natrûn, 3 v. (New York 1926–33) 3:3–9. F. VAN DER MEER and C. MOHRMANN, Atlas of the Early Christian World, ed. and tr. M. F. HEDLUND and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1958) 15, 17, 34, 35, 170–171.

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

LAUSIAC HISTORY (PALLADIUS)

A history of the desert Fathers, written about 419–420 by Palladius, Bishop of Helenepolis, who dedicated it to Lausus, the royal chamberlain at the court of Theodosius II. The work gives the biographies of the monks of Egypt, Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor, many of whom Palladius had met in his sojourn in those countries. At one time he had attempted the solitary life himself, so he knew whereof he spoke. Of the historical validity of much of the work there can be no doubt; some of the stories he heard second hand, and of these we may be less certain. Palladius presented no theory of asceticism, he merely reported what he saw. If he tells of a backsliding monk or a fallen nun, he shows how the defection happened through pride or through abstention from the Liturgy and the Sacraments. It is a rich document for the history of monasticism, and it spread throughout the East. So popular a work was soon translated into Latin and many Oriental languages.

Bibliography: J. MEURSIUS, ed. (Leiden 1616). C. BUTLER, ed., 2 v. (Texts and Studies 6.1–2; Cambridge, Eng. 1898–1904) critical ed. For Butler's notes on this ed. see Journal of Theological Studies 22 (1920–21) 21–35, 138–155, 222–238. R. T. MEYER, ed. and tr. (Ancient Christian Writers, ed., J. QUASTEN et al. [Westminster, Md.-London 1946–] 34; 1965). J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, Maryland 1950–) 3:177–179. H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 5:390–391. E. HONIGMANN, Patristic Studies (Studie Testi 173; 1953) 104–122. C. E. BUTLER, The Lausiac History of Palladius: A Critical Discussion together with Notes on Early Egyptian Monachism (Hildesheim 1967). G. FRANK, The Memory of the Eyes: Pilgrims to Living Saints in Christian Late Antiquity (Berkeley 2000).

[R. T. MEYER]

LAUZON, PIERRE DE

Jesuit missionary; b. Poitiers, France, Sept. 26, 1687; d. Quebec, Canada, Sept. 5, 1742. He joined the Society of Jesus in France, Nov. 24, 1703, and was ordained and sent to Canada about 1716. He studied the Huron and Iroquois languages at L'Ancienne Lorette near Quebec and was then assigned to the Sault St. Louis (Caughnawaga) mission near Montreal. He served the Iroquois until 1721, when he went to the College of Quebec as professor of hydrography for a year. In response to the entreaties of the Iroquois and to allay their resentment at the news of a garrison taking up winter quarters at Sault St. Louis, Lauzon was sent back to his former mission (1722), was named its superior (1723), and ably directed the post for nine years. In 1732, when he was appointed superior of the Jesuits in Canada, he automatically became rector of the College of Quebec, where he remained for seven years. On a visit to France to seek help (1733), he brought back Rev. Jean Pierre Aulneau, who was martyred at Lake of the Woods in 1739. Upon completion of his term of office, Lauzon rejoined his old mission at Caughnawaga in 1739, but ill health caused his recall to Quebec two years later. Although sometimes known as Jean, Lauzon signed his name Pierre in official documents.

[G. CARRIÉRE]

LAVAL, FRANÇOIS DE MONTMORENCY, BL.

First bishop of Québec, Canada; b. April 30, 1623, Montigny-sur-Avre, France; d. May 6, 1708, Québec, Canada.

François Laval was the third son of Hughes de Laval, knight and lord of Montigny, and of Michelle de Péricard. As a younger branch of the Montmorency, his family bore its arms as well as those of the Lavals on its blazon. The coat of arms, engraved on a stone in the old church of Montigny-sur-Avre, is still extant, as is the lordly manor of the family. At age nine, Laval entered the royal college of La Flèche, a renowned Jesuit institution, where he began preliminary studies for the priesthood. Ten years later he transferred to the Jesuit Collège de Clermont in Paris for theological courses. While there he also frequented the Caen Hermitage, a house for closed retreats founded by Jean de Bernières-Louvigny, famous mystic and spiritual director who influenced his spiritual development. During Laval's prolonged studies, his father and two older brothers in turn were killed in 1645 while pursuing their military careers. Despite these trials and the material responsibility for his family, he was ordained in 1647 before renouncing his patrimonial rights. Already a canon in the cathedral of Évreux from the age of 12, he became its archdeacon soon after his ordination and diligently performed the functions of these offices until his resignation in 1654 to enter a hermitage in Caen.

His candidacy for the office of first bishop of New France was supported by the JESUITS and the French court, and on June 3, 1658, Rome named him vicar apostolic with the title of bishop of Petrea, in partibus infidelium. Despite the intrigues of some French bishops, he finally received episcopal consecration Dec. 8, 1658, feast of the Immaculate Conception, to which he later consecrated his cathedral. The young bishop departed from La Rochelle on April 13, 1659, and after a brief stop at Percé, landed on June 16 at Québec, where the small colony received him with great joy. He immediately set about organizing the Canadian Church, until then without a real leader. Leaving the apostolate of the Native Americans to the Jesuits, he entrusted the care of the French colonists to the few secular priests. To guarantee a supply of diocesan priests, both from the colony and from his mother country, he founded the Seminary of Québec in 1663, a community designed not only to form priests but to provide lodgings for those worn out by their ministry. He soon associated this seminary to that of the Paris Foreign Mission Society and in 1668 he added a minor seminary. Laval undertook pastoral visits in his huge diocese, traveling great distances on snowshoes in winter and by canoe when the rivers were free of ice. Despite obstacles and infringements of the civil authority on the ecclesiastical domain, the Canadian Church grew rapidly and became firmly united. In 1674, after prolonged negotiations, made difficult by the GALLICANISM of the French episcopacy, Laval secured the erection of the Diocese of Québec. It was immediately subject to Rome and had jurisdiction over all the lands discovered by the French in North America.

From the beginning the bishop was aware of the disorders caused by the traffic of alcohol in the colony, particularly its tragic consequences among the natives. He energetically fought the abuses of the traders, who were often protected by the governor and his counselors, and even by the French court, and on three different occasions he went directly to the king to plead for the spiritual and temporal interests of the colony. He supported existing religious communities, helped in new foundations in the cities and countryside, and tried to manage the Recollect Franciscans, who returned to Canada through the intervention of the civil authorities. His great concern for education led him to consolidate the Seminary of Québec, which was already providing several Canadian priests. After securing for it a beautiful plot of land, he generously contributed to the construction of its buildings, one of which, dating from 1678, still exists. To ensure its future he acquired vast seigneuries and ceded to it all their goods. He also founded the School of Arts, Trades, and Agriculture of St. Joachim, eight leagues from Québec, and helped to open primary schools. On orders from the court he even tried instructing natives in his minor seminary.

By visits and ordinances he stimulated individual and community piety. Devotions to the Virgin and Ste. Anne de Beaupré (the well-known pilgrimage spot dates from his time) flourished, as well as to the Holy Angels and the Holy Family, whose confraternity and feast were instituted by his mandate. New France was the first country in the world to have an Office of the Holy Family. The fervor of the French establishments was remarkable and was imitated by some of the natives, among whom high mysticism was discovered, as with the young Iroquois maid Kateri TEKAKWITHA. Laval himself solemnly baptized Daniel GARAKONTHIE, Onondaga chief. In 1688, weakened by cares, labors, and infirmities, Laval resigned and was replaced by Bp. J. B. de Saint-Vallier. The "old bishop" retired to his seminary, spending his time in prayer, works of mercy, and, frequently, at pontifical functions during his successor's long absences. Their differences over policy was a hard trial for the older man.

After Laval's death his reputation for sanctity kindled piety, and extraordinary favors were granted through his intercession. His cause of canonization was begun in

Bl. François de Montmorency Laval. (Archive Photos)

1878, introduced in Rome in 1890, and reached a decisive stage in the 1960 decree proclaiming the heroic nature of his virtues. He was beatified by John Paul II June 22, 1980. Laval's remains lie in a funeral chapel in the Seminary of Québec, a pilgrimage site.

Feast: May 6 (Canada).

Bibliography: La positio de la cause (Rome 1956), a collection of known letters. Quebecen. beatificationis et canonizationis ven. servi Dei Francisci de Montmorency-Laval Episcopi Quebecensis 1708: altera nova positio super virtutibus ex officio critice disposita (Rome 1956). N. BAILLARGEON, Le séminaire de Québec sous l'épiscopat de Mgr de Laval (Québec 1972). É. BÉGIN, François de Laval (Québec 1959). G. E. DEMERS, Mgr. de Laval (Montréal 1951). É. GERVAIS, Le Vén. François de Montmorency-Laval (Montréal 1952). A. H. GOSSELIN, Vie de Monseigneur de Laval, 2 v. (Québec 1890; new ed. 1906); Au pays de Mgr de Laval: letters de voyage (Québec 1910). H. HOUSSART, Mgr. de Laval vu par son serviteur (Québec 1961). C. DE LA ROCHEMONTEIX, Les Jésuites et la Nouvelle-France au XVIIme siècle, 3 v. (Paris 1895-96). A. VACHON, François de Laval (Montréal 1980). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1981) 235-58. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 26 (1980) 10-11.

[H. PROVOST/ K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LAVAL, JACQUES DÉSIRÉ, BL.

Doctor, priest of the Congregation of the Holy Heart of Mary (now merged with the Holy Ghost Fathers); apostle of Mauritius; b. Sept. 18, 1803, Croth, Diocese of Évreux, Normandy, France; d. Sept. 9, 1864, Port-Louis, Mauritius.

Laval, the son of a lawyer with extensive land holdings and a pious mother who tended the needy, owned his own farm by age 13. After attending local schools, he completed his secondary studies at Évreux, then studied the humanities in Paris, theology at Saint Stanislaus College in Évreux, and medicine in Paris, where he earned a doctorate at the Sorbonne Aug. 21, 1830. He opened a successful medical practice in Saint-André near Évreux, while serving as captain of the national guard and maintaining a large household. He returned to the practice of the faith following a riding accident in 1835. That summer he decided to continue his theological studies at Saint-Sulpice Seminary in Paris, where he became acquainted with François Libermann.

Laval was ordained a priest in 1838 and decided to join Libermann in a single mission for the welfare of Black slaves. Until they established their mission, Laval administered the parish of Pinterville, Évreux Diocese. During the summer of 1841, Laval donated his entire wealth to Libermann, joined the Congregation of the Holy Heart of Mary, and accompanied the newly appointed bishop to the island of Mauritius. Thus, on Sept. 11, 1841, Father Laval, whose companions remembered him as "the saint who always says he does nothing," began his 23 year ministry to a parish of 80,000. He is responsible for baptizing 67,000 emancipated slaves and instituting works for economic, social, and technical development on the island.

Laval's cause for canonization was opened in 1918. In the first beatification ceremony presided over by John Paul II, April 29, 1979, he was raised to the altars as a blessed. Patron of slaves.

Bibliography: Works. J. D. LAVAL, Extraits de sa correspondance, ed. J. LÉCUYER (Paris 1978); Le Serviteur de Dieu, Jacques-Désiré Laval, de la Congr. du St. Espirit et du St. Coeur de Marie (Paris 1912). Literature. J. ACKING, Père Laval (Port Louis 1986). B. BOCAGE, Le Père Jacques Laval: un saint de chez nous (Pacysur-Eure, France 1989). F. DELAPLACE and M. PIVAULT, Le Père Jacques-Desirè Laval, Apôtre de L'ile Maurice (Paris 1932). J. FITZSIMMONS, Father Laval (London 1973). J. MICHEL, Les auxiliaires laïcs du bienheureux Jacques Laval, apôtre de l'île Maurice (Paris 1988). J. T. RATH, Jakob Laval, der Apostel von Mauritius (Dormagen 1978). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 72 (1980) 154–57. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 19 (1979) 6–7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LAVAL, MARTYRS OF

A group of 19 beatified victims of the FRENCH REVO-LUTION, martyred in 1794. The martyrs (14 secular and one religious priest, three religious women, and one lay woman) were among the many whom the revolutionists put to death for religious reasons in the area of the present département of Mayenne in western France, whose capital is Laval.

At Laval 14 priests, arrested at various times in the preceding months, were guillotined (Jan. 21, 1794) for refusing to subscribe to the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY, to which two of them had previously subscribed with restrictions. They were: René Ambroise (b. 1720), Jacques André (b. 1763), François Duchesne (b. 1736), André Duliou (b. 1727), Jean Gallot (b. 1747), Louis Gastineau (b. 1727), François Migoret-Lambardeère (b. 1728), Julien Morin de la Girardière (b. 1733), Julien Moulé (b. 1716), Joseph Pellé (b. 1720), Augustin Philippot (b. 1716), Pierre Thomas (b. 1729), Jean Baptiste Turpin du Cormier (b. 1732), and Jean Baptiste Triquerie (b. 1737), a Conventual Franciscan.

Jacques Burin (b. 1756) was imprisoned in 1791 after reading publicly, with approval, Pius VI's condemnation of the Civil Constitution, to which he had subscribed with reservations a few months previously. After his release he disguised himself as a merchant and continued his priestly ministrations until he was shot to death in an ambush at Champgenêteux (Oct. 17, 1794). His murderer rejoiced when a chalice, found on Burin's person, indicated that his victim was a priest.

Françoise Mézière (b. 1745), a very pious laywoman and teacher, was guillotined at Laval (Feb. 5, 1794), after being apprehended while caring for wounded Vendean soldiers. At Ernée the guillotine made martyrs of two sisters belonging to the congregation of Charit é de la Chapelle-au-Riboul. For refusing to take the prescribed oath, Françoise Tréhet (b. 1756) was executed March 13, 1794, and Jeanne Véron (b. 1766), seven days later. On June 25, Sister St. Monica (Marie Lhullier, b. 1744), an illiterate lay sister belonging to the congregation of the Hospital Sisters of the Mercy of Jesus, was executed at Laval for refusing to take the oath condemned by the Church.

All 19 were beatified June 19, 1955.

Bibliography: E. CESBRON, Les Martyrs de Laval (Rennes 1955). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 13:105–114.

[M. LAWLOR]

LA VALETTE, JEAN PARISOT DE

Grand Master of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem (known also as KNIGHTS OF MALTA after 1523); b. Toulouse, 1494; d. Malta, Aug. 21, 1568. La Valette, member of a great French noble family, entered the Order of the Knights of St. John and fought the Muslims in North Africa and on the Sicilian coast. After his unanimous election as grand master of the order in 1557, he managed to restore its finances, and he cooperated with the viceroy of Sicily in an attempt to capture Tripoli. Mismanagement of the expedition by the viceroy resulted in disaster from which La Valette contrived to save some of the expeditionary force. He also built up the Maltese fleet and secured official representation for his order at the Council of Trent. The Turkish Sultan Suleiman II determined to destroy the measures taken for the strengthening of Malta. As a result of La Valette's indomitable leadership the cavaliers and mercenary soldiers on the island were brought to a high degree of readiness. The Turkish attack began on May 18, 1565, with the arrival of 159 vessels of war carrying at least 30,000 Janissaries and Spahis, with artillery and food supplies, to oppose the some 9,000 members of the island garrison. The invaders effectively laid siege to the fortress of San Elmo, but the Grand Master for a time defeated their efforts. La Valette invented a new weapon made up of wooden circles soaked in alcohol and oil, which were then covered with cotton, saltpeter, and gunpowder. These circles, lighted and flung amidst the attackers, burned them alive. Despite heroic resistance the fort fell on July 23. The Muslims then besieged San Angelo, the main citadel of the island. The Turkish commander mounted an attack on the island fortress of St. Michael where the cavaliers of the order had withdrawn; he lost thousands, and the fortress successfully resisted the attack. Finally, with the Sicilian viceroy as commander a substantial force came (September 1) to La Valette's assistance. The Turkish commander fled with the besieging army but changed his mind and returned. However, La Valette had acted promptly and in the interval had destroyed the siege machines and trenches the Muslims had constructed.

Pius IV offered La Valette a cardinal's hat, which he refused. Later, the Turks planned another invasion but ships from Malta destroyed the Turkish arsenal at Constantinople. La Valette rebuilt the fort of San Elmo and started the construction of a new city (modern Valletta). When contributions for this enterprise from western Europe failed, copper coins were struck to carry on the work so that there would be no delay; these coins appropriately carried the device non aes, sed fides. In his later years La Valette's vigorous administration was troubled by rebellion among the Spanish cavaliers on the island and by what he considered to be ingratitude on the part of Pope Pius V, who, instead of permitting La Valette to nominate his own candidate for the leadership of the order's grand priory in Rome, appointed a papal nephew to the post.

Bibliography: J. A. THOU, Historiarum sui temporis (Paris 1604). J. P. E. JURIEN DE LA GRAVIÈRE, Les Chevaliers de Malte et la Marine de Philippe II, 2 v. (Paris 1887). R. A. VERTOT, Histoire des Chevaliers Hospitaliers de S. Jean de Jerusalem, 5 v. (Paris 1726). P. DE BOURDEILLE, SEIGNEUR DE BRANTÔME, Grands capitaines françois, v.3–4 of Oeuvres complètes, 11 v. (Paris 1864–82). E. W. SCHERMERHORN, Malta of the Knights (London 1929). E. D. S. BRADFORD, The Great Siege (New York 1962). R. COHEN, Knights of Malta 1523–1798 (New York 1920).

[S. J. T. MILLER]

LA VANG, OUR LADY OF

Our Lady of La Vang, in Vietnamese, is Đức Mẹ La Vang, also known as Our Lady of Vietnam. Located in the Hai Lang district in the Quang Trị region, La Vang is about 60 km north of Hú. On Aug. 17, 1798, King Cảnh Thịnh issued an edict ordering the immediate execution of all Catholics in his realm. As persecution erupted, a group of Catholic refugees from neighboring villages escaped into the jungles of La Vang. According to the received tradition, one night, a beautiful and radiant lady with a compassionate countenance appeared to the frightened and starving refugees by a huge, old tree as they were praying for deliverance from their persecutors and protection from wild beasts. Calling herself the "Blessed Mother" (Đứ Mẹ), she comforted and encouraged them to keep their faith in Jesus Christ, taught them how to collect herbs in the forest as medicine, and promised to intercede to her Son on their behalf.

When the persecution subsided, a cult to the Blessed Virgin grew at the spot of the tree, drawing Catholics and non-Catholics alike. In 1820, a small shrine was built at the foot of the tree by her devotees. In 1825, the first church of Our Lady of La Vang was built at the spot of her apparition with land and monetary donations from the nearby villages of Thach Hån, Cổ Thành, and Ba Trừ. In 1866, the local bishop rebuilt and enlarged the church. Destroyed by anti-Catholic radicals in 1885, construction of a new church began in 1886, and the church was consecrated in 1901. By the 1920s, this building proved too small. In 1923, construction began on a new edifice which was consecrated on Aug. 22, 1928 with 20,000 pilgrims in attendance. In 1959 La Vang was officially declared the National Shrine of Our Lady of Vietnam, marking 300 years of the Church's presence in Vietnam. On Aug. 22, 1961, Pope John XXIII elevated this shrine to a minor basilica. In 1972, at the height of the Vietnam War, the basilica was completely destroyed by Communist bombardment, save for the shrine of Our Lady of La Vang, which miraculously survived intact. On Aug. 15, 1993, in his address to Vietnamese-American youth during World Youth Day in Denver, Colorado, Pope John Paul II entrusted the Vietnamese Catholic Church under the protection of Our Lady of La Vang.

Despite repeated requests, the Communist authorities refused permission to rebuild the destroyed basilica. Nevertheless, the triennial Marian Days pilgrimage to the shrine grew in size in the late 1980s and 1990s, gathering in the public square in front of the existing shrine. The 200–year anniversary celebration of the apparition in 1998–99 drew more than 200,000 pilgrims from across Vietnam, despite official restrictions barring overseas Vietnamese from participating. In the U.S., devotion to Our Lady of La Vang was promoted by the CONGREGATION OF THE MOTHER CO–REDEMPTRIX (Dòng Đồng Công). Their annual Marian Days pilgrimage celebration every August, mirrored after the traditional Marian Days pilgrimage to La Vang, drew an estimated 50,000 Vietnamese Catholics to Carthage, Missouri each year.

[V. T. PHAM]

LAVANOUX, MAURICE ÉMILE

Artist, editor, critic; b. New York, N.Y., June 10, 1894; d. New York, N.Y., Oct. 21, 1974. He received a bilingual education, studying in Montreal (1906-11), at Columbia University (1912-17), and Atelier Laloux, Paris (1919–20). A volunteer for military service in the French army in World War I, he worked in the offices of Gustaf Steinback and of Maginnis and Walsh, Boston, as draftsman and researcher, acquiring vast experience in the planning and construction of churches. In 1928 he invited a group of architects, artists, and clergymen interested in liturgical arts to several meetings at Portsmouth Priory, Newport, R.I.; from this emerged the Liturgical Arts Society. In 1932 he launched Liturgical Arts Quarterly with Harry Lorin Binsse as managing editor. Lavanoux served as editor and secretary until the magazine was discontinued in 1972 for lack of funds.

During the 40 years that he published the Quarterly Lavanoux became internationally respected among artists and scholars associated with the liturgical movement. He lectured on church art and architecture in universities and seminaries throughout the United States, Canada, and in Europe. His world travels were constantly geared to the study of new developments in the field and the establishment of personal contacts that might enrich editorial contributions to the Quarterly. It gradually took on an international character that provided leadership throughout the Church. Early, too, Lavanoux associated his work with the ecumenical movement, and he became highly respected in Protestant and Jewish circles.

While almost all of his publishing energies were focused on the Quarterly, a considerable opus in itself, Lavanoux also edited A. Henze's and T. Filthout's Contemporary Church Art (1956) and contributed an important introduction to A. Christ-Janer's and M. M. Foley's, Modern Church Architecture (1962). He served on juries for competitions sponsored by the American Institute of Architecture, the Cardinal Lercaro Awards, and Columbia and Princeton Universities' schools of architecture. He also served as advisor to architecture students at Columbia. He was consultant on many ecclesiastical buildings and contributed articles to many magazines.

While his years of enforced retirement following the discontinuance of the Quarterly were fraught with disappointment, he continued to work for the improvement of standards in liturgical art and assumed the editorship of Stained Glass magazine. He also threw himself more energetically than ever into the work of the Contemporary Christian Art Gallery (New York City). Following his quiet death at home, tributes appeared in many journals, both religious and secular. While many stressed that Vatican Council II and its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy to which he had substantially contributed had put the seal on his life's work, he himself had felt that the work was just beginning.

[C. J. MCNASPY]

LAVATER, JOHANN KASPAR

Swiss theologian, philosopher, and poet: b. Zurich, Nov. 15, 1741; d. there, Jan. 2, 1801. He attended schools in his native town and began Protestant theology in 1759. As early as 1763, however, he was turning from the EN-LIGHTENMENT's rationalistic conception of religion to the ideas of the Sturm und Drang period. He became parson at the church of St. Peter, Zurich, in 1786. A writer of deep feeling and vivid imagination, he won wide fame by his religious writing, his Schweizerlieder (1767), and especially his four-volume Physiognomische Fragmente zur Beförderung der Menschenkenntnis und Menschenliebe (1775-78), in which he attempted to analyze the character of man through an intuitive interpretation of bodily structure. This occasioned his reputation throughout Europe and led to extensive correspondence with great contemporaries such as GOETHE, Johann HERDER, and Johann HAMANN. Lavater first sympathized with the French Revolution but later protested its excesses. Ironically, he died of wounds sustained while acting as stretcher-bearer at the battle of Zurich (Nov. 26, 1800).

Lavater's belief in Christ was manifested in an undogmatic and emotional piety, as is evident in Christliche Lieder (1776–80), the four-volume Aussichten in die Ewigkeit (1768–78), and the four-volume Pontius Pilatus oder die Bibel im Kleinen (1782–85). Yet his attempt to confirm by logic his shakily based convictions led to tensions between his religious experience and theology and his yearning for a constant, earthly manifestation of God, hence his uncritical interest in mesmerism and spiritism and his passion for detecting miracles. He rebutted atheism with untiring clerical fervor; he was generally tolerant of Catholics, and his friendship with Bp. J. M. SAILER led some to believe that he was a crypto-Catholic.

Bibliography: Ausgewählte Schriften, ed. J. K. ORELLI, 8 v. (Zurich 1841–44), 4 v. (3d ed. Zurich 1859–60). C. JANENTZKY, Johann Caspar Lavater (Frauenfeld 1928). M. LAVATER-SLOMAN, Genie des Herzens: Die Lebensgeschichte Johann Caspar Lavaters (5th ed. Zurich 1955). O. VASELLA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6: 840–841.

[J. B. KELLER]

LAVELLE, LOUIS

French philosopher; b. Saint-Martin-de-Villeréal (Lot-et-Garonne), July 15, 1883; d. there, Sept. 1, 1951. An agrégé in philosophy in 1909, he taught at the Lycée Fustel de Coulanges at Strasbourg and defended his thesis for the doctorate of letters in 1921. Shortly thereafter he started teaching at the Sorbonne, and in 1930 edited the philosophy chronicles of Le Temps. In 1934, with his friend René LE SENNE, he founded the movement known as philosophy of the spirit, which aimed at a renewal of metaphysics in reaction to positivism and classical rationalism. Named inspector general of national education, then professor at the Collège de France in 1941, in 1947 he was elected to the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques. He profoundly influenced not only his students but also the general public; an architect of ideas, he added to the fullness and flexibility of his thought a purity of language and charm of style that are in the best tradition of MALEBRANCHE and the French moralists. He lived in conformity with what he taught, closely uniting his spiritual with his intellectual life. One of his last writings ends on this characteristic note: "We should tremble with joy every morning at the thought that we have another day to love God."

The point of departure for Lavelle was an analysis of being, founded on an experience that includes and transfigures the sensible. From this he drew the title for his thesis, Dialectique du monde sensible (Strasbourg 1921). In his general ontology, being and reality were first identified; subsequently Lavelle discovered a pure act at the heart of being and finally divine love at the source of this act. More and more merging being with subjectivity, he later described the real as contained within the plenitude of being and as existing only for finite subjects. The real, in his thought, gradually merged with cosmicality and tended to reduce itself to objectifiable phenomena.

Being is participated; man is separated from it by an interval that God eternally crosses but that man finds inseparable from temporal ambiguity, from freedom of negation, and from the possibility of evil. Participated act does not merge with the participating act that gives rise to human freedoms. Although he relentlessly defended the univocity of being, Lavelle sought to avoid PANTHEISM. "Participation," he wrote, "does not have the extinction of the part in the whole as an ideal, but the formation of a spiritual society from the parts with themselves and with the whole" [De l'Acte (Paris 1937) 165]. The endless fecundity of the divine act that invites man to renew himself in it shapes Lavelle's optimism.

Applied to the analysis of categories—specifically to that of time—and with its many kinds of values, this philosophy expresses itself as a highly developed system. Yet its very richness leaves one undecided over its final meaning; one wonders whether it is legitimate to establish such a complete equality between religion and philosophy and wishes that Lavelle had given a fuller analysis of intersubjective causality.

Bibliography: M. MANNO, Enciclopedia Filosofica 2:1820–26. P. LEVERT, L'Être et le réel selon Louis Lavelle (Paris 1960). W. PIERSOL, La Valeur dans la philosophie de Louis Lavelle (Paris 1959). J. ÉCOLE, La Métaphysique de l'être dans la philosophie de Louis Lavelle (Paris 1957).

[M. NÉDONCELLE]

LAVELLE, MICHAEL JOSEPH

Vicar-general, educator; b. New York City, May 30, 1856; d. there, Oct. 17, 1939. He was the eldest of four children of Patrick and Rose (Fitzsimons) Lavelle, both Irish-born. After study at Manhattan College, New York City (A.B., 1873; M.A., 1875), he was ordained at St. Joseph's Seminary, Troy, NY, June 7, 1879, by Bp. Edgar P. Wadhams of Ogdensburg, NY. Lavelle was assigned to St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York City, where he spent all his priestly life and was appointed rector in May of 1887. Under his rectorship the cathedral, opened for public worship a month before his ordination, was gradually completed. Lavelle was a close friend of Abp. Michael A. Corrigan, and vicar-general (1902–18) of New York under Cardinal John Farley, and again (1934-39) under Cardinals Patrick Hayes and Francis Spellman. For half a century Lavelle was the best-known priest in the diocese, much in demand as a public speaker, and chairman of innumerable committees.

Lavelle founded Cathedral High School, the first free Catholic high school in the city, in 1905 (chartered 1910).

Charles Martial Allemand Lavigerie, in clerical vestments.

He was one of the founders of the Catholic Summer School at Plattsburg, NY, its president (1896–1903), and chairman (1924–39) of its Board of Trustees. He founded the Catholic Institute for the Blind (now the Lavelle School for the Blind), and was one of the three organizers of the Federation of Catholic Societies, which later merged into the National Catholic Welfare Conference. He was honored as domestic prelate in 1904 and as prothonotary apostolic in 1929.

[F. D. COHALAN]

LAVIGERIE, CHARLES MARTIAL ALLEMAND

Cardinal, archbishop of Algiers and of Carthage, founder of the White Fathers and the White Sisters; b. Bayonne, France, Oct. 31, 1825; d. Algiers, Nov. 26, 1892. His father held a position in the customs, and his mother was the daughter of the director of the royal mint at Bayonne. Lavigerie owed his early religious formation to the influence of the clergy of Bayonne and of Monsignor Félix A. P. DUPANLOUP. During his studies at Saint-Sulpice in Paris he formed a friendship with the Sulpician Charles Baudry, a leader among French ontologists. Baudry's theological learning, as well as his vigorous ideas about political morality and spirituality, left a deep mark upon Lavigerie. His consciousness of his missionary vocation began in those formative years. After his ordination in 1849 he obtained doctorates in letters (1850) and in theology (1853) and was made associate professor of ecclesiastical history at the Sorbonne, becoming titular of the chair in 1857. In that same year his responsibilities were further increased, for he took under his direction the Oeuvre des écoles d'Orient. In the discharge of his duties in connection with this position he made, in 1860, at the time of the massacres in Syria, a trip to the East that left a lasting imprint upon his missionary thought. As an auditor of the Rota (1861-63), finding it necessary to take a stand upon the Roman question, he favored a general solution to the difficulties of the Holy See by a renewal of the spirit, the methods, and the organization of Church government. Elevated to the See of Nancy in 1863, Lavigerie was able in the space of four years to bring about a notable reform. He sought particularly to raise the intellectual level of the clergy and to bring his priests into contact with contemporary society.

His nomination to the See of Algiers in 1867 enabled him at last to realize his missionary vocation. From the time of his promotion, his apostolic vision reached far beyond the confines of his diocese and embraced the whole of continental Africa. His first care was to obtain from the reluctant French government freedom to exercise the apostolate among the Algerian Muslims. This brought the archbishop into conflict with the governor, Marshall MacMahon, but in 1868 he succeeded in obtaining from Napoleon III the assurance that no obstacle would be put in the way of the works of charity undertaken by the Church. In 1868 Rome made Lavigerie apostolic delegate of western Sahara and the Sudan. During this time he laid the foundations of the Society of Missionaries of Africa (the White Fathers). This was conceived as an institute of secular priests living in community; it was to be apostolic in its purpose and Ignatian in the character of its spirituality, and its members, in conformity with the spirit Lavigerie had shown from the beginning, were to adapt themselves in every respect compatible with Christian faith and morals to the life and mentality, of the Africans among whom they worked. The Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa, founded in 1869, was a religious society of women with the same missionary objective and sharing the same spirit of accommodation.

At Vatican Council I the archbishop, after associating himself with a third party of accord that sought to rec-oncile the differences between those who favored the definition of papal infallibility and those who thought it inopportune, gave his placet to the constitution Pastor aeternus.

In 1873 Lavigerie established his missionaries in the Sahara and in Kabylie. Always interested in the reunion of Churches, he founded in 1877 at St. Anne of Jerusalem a Greek Melchite seminary and entrusted it to his missionaries. In this he was motivated by a desire to increase among Eastern Catholics an esteem for their culture and a respect for their theological, canonical, and liturgical traditions.

In 1878 he founded the missions of equatorial Africa and his responsibilities as apostolic delegate were extended to include that area. Without personally visiting this new field he provided for the restoration of the practice of the primitive Church with regard to the catechumenate. When Tunisia was occupied by the French in 1881, Lavigerie was named apostolic administrator of that area, and he established many foundations in his new jurisdiction.

Leo XIII made him a cardinal in 1882, and two years later gave him the title of archbishop of Carthage and primate of Africa. From the same pope he received two missions. The first, an official one, was to stir up world opinion on the subject of African slavery. In compliance with the Pope's wish, Lavigerie began a resounding campaign, the echoes of which reached Europe and America. The conference of the great powers at Brussels in 1890 adopted proposals with regard to the best method of achieving the abolition of slavery that were in large part in conformity with suggestions Lavigerie had made, but that this was effected through the influence of the suggestions is less certain.

The second mission, an unofficial one, was to rally French Catholics to the support of the republican regime in France so as to overcome the anticlerical majority in parlement and make it possible to change the laws that barred the way to a rapprochement between France and the Holy See. Lavigerie, who from the accession of Leo XIII had actively upheld the French policy of the Holy See, launched the ralliement by proclaiming before a large assembly of officials in Algiers on Nov. 12, 1890, the obligation of French Catholics to adhere to the republican form of government. This famous toast d'Alger angered French monarchists, who criticized Lavigerie severely and heaped vituperation upon him. The cardinal replied with his spirited Lettre à un catholique, in which he attacked the claims of the pretenders and even went so far as to suggest that monarchy was an outgrown institution. But the Lettre à un catholique is only one document among others of equal importance and the antimonarchism he expressed in it is only one, and a secondary, aspect of his thought on the ralliement.

Apostolic zeal, a sense of the contemporary realities, and a constant concern for the reform of the Church were the most distinctive traits of the personality of Lavigerie.

Bibliography: L. BAUNARD, Le Cardinal Lavigerie, 2 v. (Paris 1898). J. BOUNIOL, The White Fathers and Their Missions (London 1929). G. D. KITTLER, The White Fathers (New York 1957). J. DE ARTECHE, The Cardinal of Africa: Charles Lavigerie, tr. M. MITCHELL (London 1964). J. TOURNIER, Le Cardinal Lavigerie et son action politique, 1863–1892 (Paris 1913); Bibliographie du cardinal Lavigerie (Paris 1913). S. C. WELLENS, La Societé des Missionaires d'Afrique (Louvain 1952). F. RAUSCHER, Die Mitarbeit der einheimischen Laien am Apostolat in den Missionen der Weissen Väter (Münster 1953). G. DINDINGER, "Missionsschrifttum von und über Kardinal Lavigerie," Miscellanea Pietro Fumasoni-Biondi (Rome 1947) 107–191, bibliog. X. DE MONTCLOS, Lavigerie, le Saint-Siège et l'Église, 1846–1878 (Paris 1965); Le Toast d'Alger, 1890–1891 (Paris 1966).

[X. DE MONTCLOS]

LAW

A principle that connotes order, whether this be the order of the physical universe or that of morality. In a more specific sense, law is the rule and measure of human acts and relations. This article deals with the general concept of law as it underlies the juridical order, which pertains to the sphere of morality. It explains how law is a principle of order, analyzes the classical definition of law proposed by St. THOMAS AQUINAS, and discusses his view of the relationship that obtains between law and ethics. Other conceptions of law are treated in other articles (see LAW, PHILOSOPHY OF; NATURAL LAW).

Principle of Order. Although the term law is used in all sciences, it is employed sometimes in a speculative and sometimes in a practical sense. Examples of laws that are formulations of the speculative reason are the law of gravitation, the law of conservation of energy, and the law of diminishing returns. Those that proceed from man's practical reason, on the other hand, are normative principles that regulate human activities and relationships. While both kinds of law have the connotation of order, regularity, and predictability, they serve as principles of order in different ways corresponding to the different operations of the speculative and the practical reason.

The speculative reason has TRUTH for its object, whereas the practical reason has the GOOD for its end. The former deals with causes and effects, with facts and factual relationships, whereas the latter deals with ends and means, with values and their relative importance. This difference in their subject matters has important consequences relative to the order or regularity they establish when formulating laws. As St. Thomas notes, "since the speculative reason is busied chiefly with necessary things, which cannot be otherwise than they are, its proper conclusions, like the universal principles, contain truth without fail. The practical reason, on the other hand, is busied with contingent things, about which human actions are concerned, and consequently, although there is necessity in the general principles, the more we descend to matters of detail the more frequently we encounter defects" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 94.4). The recognition of the kind of necessity associated with the order of practical reason enables one to avoid the extremes of dogmatism, which claims absolute validity for all conclusions of moral law, and relativism, which denies validity even to its fundamental principles.

Thomistic Definition. St. Thomas defines law as "an ordinance of reason for the common good, made by him who has care of the community, and promulgated" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 90.4). This definition contains four essential elements: (1) reason, (2) the common good, (3) lawmaking authority, and (4) promulgation, to which are usually added sanction and enforcement.

Reason. Since law is a rule and measure whereby man is induced to act or restrain from acting, it is evidently a product of practical reason. The will of the competent authority must also be present to set the lawmaking process in motion; but what is made must accord with some rule of reason to have the nature of law. The will of the sovereign is the efficient cause of the law, while reason is its formal cause. Thus, reason is intrinsic to law; will, however necessary genetically, remains nonetheless an extrinsic factor. For St. Thomas, the common saying that the will of the sovereign has the force of law should be understood only of a will that is in accord with reason, for "otherwise the sovereign's will would savor of lawlessness rather than of law" (ibid. 90.1 ad 3). And according to Henry de BRACTON, "there is no true kingship where will, and not the law, wields dominion" (De legibus, 5b).

Common Good. The COMMON GOOD is the final cause of law. In the case of the eternal law, this is the good of the whole of creation under the governance of divine providence. In the case of the natural law, the common fountainhead of ethics and jurisprudence, it is man's ultimate happiness, which consists in the perfection of the human person, mutual friendship between man and man, and friendship with God (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 99.1 ad 2). In the case of human law, it is the well-being of the people and the public welfare of the political community.

Since the natural law forms an essential part of human law, the ends of the natural law are capable of being furthered by human law. Human law can protect and implement the natural rights of man, which have been enumerated by Pius XII as follows: "The right to maintain and develop physical, intellectual, and moral life, and in particular the right to a religious training and education; the right to worship God, both in private and in public, including the right to engage in religious works of charity; the right, in principle, to marriage and to the attainment of the purpose of marriage, the right to wedded society and home life; the right to work as an indispensable means for the maintenance of family life; the right to the free choice of a state of life, and therefore of the priestly and religious state; the right to the use of material goods, subject to its duties and social limitations" [Christmas Broadcast, 1942; Atti e Discorsi di Pio XII, 6 v. (Rome 1942) 4:320–321].

Authority. AUTHORITY is the efficient cause of law. The very existence of law implies the existence of a law-maker. God is the sole author of the eternal law, as also of the natural law, which He has ingrained in man's nature. All systems of human law thus contain, in varying proportions, a natural-law element and a positive-law element. The former is not made by man but only declared by him, whereas the latter is man-made.

The constitutions of modern states indicate where the lawmaking power of each state is lodged. According to St. Thomas, sovereign powers belong ultimately to the people, and the government exercises them merely in a representative capacity. This theory of popular sovereignty was the basis of his maintaining that custom not only can obtain force of law but can even change or abrogate an existing law: "For . . . the consent of the whole people expressed by a custom counts far more in favor of a particular observance than the authority of the sovereign, who has not the power to frame laws, except as representing the people" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 97.3 ad 3).

Promulgation and Enforcement. These constitute the material cause of law. Nowhere is the realistic temper of St. Thomas more manifest than in his maintaining that shared knowledge is essential to the notion of law. "Wherefore, in order that a law obtain the binding force which is proper to law, it must need be applied to the men who are to be ruled by it" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 90.4). Such application is usually effected in two stages: by promulgation, when a law is officially declared or made public, and by divulgation, when knowledge of it is effectively disseminated so that it becomes commonly known. In a similar spirit one may add that the rule or measure must be effectively sanctioned and enforced for it to become a complete, existential law.

Law and Ethics. For St. Thomas, the primary precept of the natural law is "Good is to be done and evil avoided." Applied to the field of human relations, this may be stated: "Love thy neighbor" and "Do injury to no one." The first is the Golden Rule of Christ, whereas the second is basically Confucius's maxim, "Do not do to another what you would not like to have done to yourself." Long before St. Thomas, Ulpian had formulated the threefold precepts of law as "to live honestly, to injure no one, and to render each his due."

Such precepts are common to both law and ETHICS. Yet in actual practice the juridical standard of honesty seems to fall short of the ethical standard. Again, as more than one jurist has pointed out, not everything that is lawful is honorable. Why this duality of standard between ethics and law? Must man choose one and disregard the other? Confucius, for instance, preferred ethics to law: "If you guide the people by laws and keep them in order by penalties, they will merely try to avoid the penalties, but will have no sense of honor. If you guide them by moral virtues and keep them in order by inculcating good manners, they will not only keep their sense of honor but be reformed in and out" [Analects of Confucius, ed. and tr. A. Waley (London 1938) 2.3]. On the other hand, the legalists of ancient China extolled the law and dismissed ethics as subversive to the public order of the state.

In St. Thomas's view, law and ethics are equally necessary; the apparent duality of their standards can be seen to merge in a higher unity. The end of both law and ethics is to make man good, teaching him to practice virtue and refrain from vice. But ethics impels man through an internal principle, while law compels him through an external principle (Summa contra gentiles 3.127). Although "the purpose of human law is to lead men to virtue, it can do so only step by step, not abruptly" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 96.2 ad 2). Prudence dictates that human law not lay upon the multitude of imperfect men the burdens that can be carried only by those already advanced in virtue. To compel the rank and file to refrain from all evil is liable to induce them to commit yet greater evils, for "he that violently bloweth his nose, bringeth out blood" (Prv 30.33). This is why "human law does not prohibit everything that is forbidden by the natural law" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 96.2 ad 2).

Nor should the law prescribe all moral duties indiscriminately, but only those that bear directly upon the common good, such as good faith and fair dealing in human transactions. It would be imprudent to impose on all men the cultivation of the virtues required for their personal perfection, even if this were possible. Human law can contribute toward moral perfection only in an indirect way, by preserving peace and order and fostering the freedom that is required for the cultivation of VIRTUE.

See Also: LAW. DIVINE POSITIVE.

Stele depicting King Hammurabi receiving the Law from the god Shamash, basalt, c. 1780 B.C. (@Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

Bibliography: A. M. MOSCHETTI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1843–45. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:540–548. F. LAU, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1531–33. H. SCHUSTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanishe Konsil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 4:822–824. J. C. H. WU, Cases and Materials on Jurisprudence (St. Paul 1958). R. POUND, Outlines of Lectures on Jurisprudence (5th ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1943).

[J. C. H. WU]

LAW, ANCIENT NEAR-EASTERN

Written laws have come down from various countries and peoples of the ancient Near East: Sumeria, Babylonia, Assyria, the land of the Hittites (Asia Minor), and Israel. From Egypt no written laws have been preserved. Israelite law is treated elsewhere in this encyclopedia. (See LAW, MOSAIC.)

General Characteristics. In the ancient Near East, where even literary texts were composed orally, oral legal tradition and customary law preceded written law, so that the texts of at least some laws were already more or less fixed before they were written down. All the written laws have much in common. Their style is usually "casuistic," as it has been called: "When such or such a case presents itself, this or that must be done." This formula makes it very probable that the written laws originated from precedents, i.e., judicial decisions that were extended to similar cases. The laws never lay down any basic principles, but nearly always regard particular cases or situations in which men may come into conflict with each other or which are liable to be brought before the judges or judicial courts. Sometimes the legislator imposes general measures, e.g., when he determines the prices of important articles, the amount of rent to be paid in such or such a circumstance; but these regulations too are to be applied in individual relations. There is no marked difference between ius (human law) and fas (divine law), between public and private, civil and penal law. The idea of revealed law is absent, though a code such as that of Hammurabi may receive religious sanction (see below on the Code of Hammurabi). There is no order in the laws of the codes, nor in the compilations of laws for private use. A series of some paragraphs may be arranged around a common subject (judicial matter); a peculiar expression in one of them may be a key word for a sequence of other paragraphs. But there are no large subdivisions, no logical or systematic conception of the law considered as a whole.

There is no evidence that the codes that have survived were universally applied in the juridical practice of the territories for which they had been given. The lawgivers proclaimed their ideals in their codes, hoping that these would be put into practice everywhere, but they could not enforce them everywhere. Such laws were certainly applied by the kings themselves, if anyone brought a complaint before their own courts. But nobody was obliged to appear in court before the king unless he was called, nor was everybody able to do so. Local judges might have applied other judicial principles with the consent of the parties concerned. This is quite clear from many legal documents from the time of Hammurabi, which are often not in accordance with the principles of the Code of Hammurabi. The ancient Near-Eastern states were not like modern states in this respect, nor did their governments function as modern governments do. The king was the defender of the state and the supreme commander of its armies and levies; he was the supreme judge, whose special duty was to protect the weak; he often performed cultic functions. (See KINGSHIP IN THE AN-CIENT NEAR EAST.) But no ancient Near-Eastern government or king ever thought of drawing a blueprint of the state and society and promulgating laws in order to realize this ideal. This fact also determined the character of the laws, which do not state or develop basic principles, but merely mention a number of cases in which situations of conflict may arise in civil life and then state what is to be done in such cases. A marked preponderance is given to laws concerning social and family life. The peoples for whom the laws were given were urban societies dependent primarily on agriculture.

In the following paragraphs a conspectus is given of the various collections of laws or legal codes that have been preserved, but no detailed analysis can be given in this limited space, because the laws were not drawn up according to clear principles or in a logical order.

Sumerian Laws. The oldest known laws naturally come from the oldest known civilization—the Sumerian. Besides the indirect evidence from several cuneiform tablets recording legal matters, such as decisions given in lawsuits (di-tilla tablets), that from three collections furnishes knowledge of Sumerian laws as such: (1) entries in the ana ittišu series; (2) the Code of Ur-nammu; (3) the Code of Lipit-Ishtar.

Entries in the ana ittišu Series. The bilingual (Sumerian-Akkadian) series ("dictionary" texts) known from its opening Akkadian entry as the ana ittišu, a collection of legal terms drawn up for the use of Babylonian scribes, contains 12 paragraphs, in two separate groups, of Sumerian laws with Akkadian translation. Although the preserved tablets of this series were written in the 7th century B.C. for the library of Assurbanipal (Asshurbanipal) at Nineveh, the laws themselves are probably at least as old as the Third Dynasty of Ur (c. 2060-1950). The first six paragraphs are commonly known as Sumerian Family Laws because they state the penalties attached to repudiation of one member of a family by another: a father or mother by a son, a son by a father or mother, a husband by a wife, a wife by a husband. (For the text and translation, see Driver and Miles, The Babylonian Laws, 2:308-313.)

Closely related to these Sumerian Family Laws are the nine laws on the tablet from the Old-Babylonian period published by A. T. Clay as No. 28 of his Miscellaneous Inscriptions in the Yale Babylonian Collection [Yale Oriental Series 1 (New Haven 1915) 18–27].

Code of Ur-nammu. A tablet from the Old-Babylonian period published in transliteration and translation by S. N. Kramer [Orientalia 23 (1954) 40–51] preserves the first section of the Code of Ur-nammu, first king (c. 2060–2043 B.C.) of the Third Dynasty of Ur. The extant portion of the prologue, in which this king refers to certain historical events of his reign, shows that this is an official code of laws in the technical sense. Official legal codes of ancient Mesopotamia place the corpus of laws between a prologue and an epilogue, both of a religious nature, in which the royal legislators speak of their authority as having been received from the gods and in which they invoke the gods in curses to punish the violators of the laws. In this code, the Sumerian King Urnammu, after attributing his kingship and victories to the high gods, states that he was appointed by them "to establish justice in the land." By this expression is meant the protection of the poor and weak and the maintenance of the traditional customs and rights of the various social classes by the authority of the king. Of the laws themselves only seven are partially preserved on the tablet. Most of them are concerned with bodily injuries done to one man by another.

Code of Lipit-Ishtar. Although composed in the early post-Sumerian period by Lipit-Ishtar, the fifth king of the Semitic Dynasty of Isin (c. 1983–1733 B.C.), this code is still written in Sumerian. Large parts of it have been preserved on seven clay tablets, almost all from Nippur. The most complete publication of the text is by F. R. Steele [American Journal of Archeology, Concord, NH 52 (1948) 425–450]. An English translation of it is given by S. N. Kramer (J. B. Pritchart, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 159–161). Between the usual prologue and epilogue, the extant 38 laws treat of the hiring of boats, real estate, slaves, defaulting on taxes, inheritance and marriage, and rented oxen.

Babylonian Codes. In taking over the culture of the Sumerians almost in its entirety, the Akkadian-speaking Semites of ancient Mesopotamia also continued the Sumerian laws, not only in substance, but even in their formulation, so that the earliest Babylonian laws may be regarded as more or less translated from the older Sumerian laws, with certain adaptations for current conditions. The Old-Babylonian laws have been preserved particularly in two codes, that of the kingdom of Eshnunna and that of Hammurabi, King of Babylon.

Code of Eshnunna. The city of Eshnunna (modern Tell Asmar) was the capital of an Amorrite kingdom in the Diyala region east of Baghdad that flourished between the end of the Third Dynasty of Ur (c. 1950 B.C.) and the rise of the empire founded by Hammurabi (1728–1686 B.C.). Knowledge of this code comes from two tablets found in the 1945 and 1949 archeological excavations at Tell Abu Harmal, a small site near Baghdad, which in ancient times was an outpost of the kingdom of Eshnunna. Both partly mutilated tablets are private copies, with certain small variants, of an earlier, already somewhat corrupt copy of the original code. The copies reduced the prologue merely to a date formula and apparently omitted the whole epilogue. Since one of the tablets was written during the time of King Dadusha of Eshnunna, who reigned a generation before Hammurabi, and the other tablet is a little older, the original code, which is in Akkadian, must have been composed several generations before the Akkadian Code of Hammurabi. Its relationship in age with the Code of Lipit-Ishtar is uncertain. The text was published by A. Goetze [provisionally in Sumer 4 (1948) 63–102, and definitively, with translation and full discussion, in Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research 31 (1956)]. In the first edition of the text, on which Goetze's English translation (J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament 161-163) is based, the name of the king who composed the code was read as Bilalama, one of the early kings of Eshnunna, but this reading proved untenable. The name of the author of the code is unknown.

The 60 extant laws of this code treat of maximum prices (1-2), hiring a wagon (3), boats (4-6), wages of farm workers and the hire of a donkey (7-11), trespass and unlawful entry (12-13), business transactions (13-21), unlawful distraint (22-24), engagement and marriage (29-30), defloration of a slave girl (31), raising of children by others than their parents (32–35), deposit (36-37), sales and purchases (38-41), bodily injury (42-48), slaves (49-52), damage caused by animals or falling masonry (53-58), divorce (59), and neglect in guarding a house (60). A remarkable feature of the code is that many of the laws are formulated, not in the usual casuistic style ("If . . . , then . . ."), but as apodictical statements: "One kor of barley is priced at one shekel of silver; three qa of very light oil are priced at one shekel of silver," etc.

Code of Hammurabi. The most important and best preserved of all the law codes of the ancient Near East is the Code of HAMMURABI (HAMMURAPI), sixth king (1728-1686 B.C.) of the First Dynasty of Babylon. It is inscribed in Old-Babylonian monumental script on a diorite STELE, 7 ½ feet high. Although the date formula of Hammurabi's second regnal year is "The year he enacted the law of the land," the code as inscribed on the stele must represent a later revision, because the Prologue mentions several events of the King's later years. Originally the stele stood in the temple of E-sagila at BABY-LON. It was carried off to Elam as war booty, probably in the 12th century B.C. In 1902 it was found by French archeologists in the course of their excavations at Susa and published, with a French translation, in the same year by Vincent Scheil [Memoires de la delegation en Perse 4 (Paris 1902)]. The stele is now in the Louvre Museum, Paris. On top of the obverse is a bas-relief depicting the King standing in worship before the enthroned sun-god Shamash, who is also the god of justice. It is sometimes stated that the scene portrays Shamash as giving the law to Hammurabi, but there is no basis for this, either in the bas-relief or in the text. Shamash holds out in his right hand the staff and ring as symbols of his divine authority. In the prologue and epilogue of the inscription the King thus expresses his relationship to Shamash: "I, Hammurabi, am the king of justice [i.e., just king], to whom Shamash has bestowed the right things [kīnātim] . . . obedient to Shamash . . . to rise like Shamash over the people . . . at the command of Shamash, the great judge of the heavens and the earth, to make justice shine forth in the land" (reverse 25.95-98; obverse 2.23; 1.40; reverse 24.82–88). Similarly described is the relationship between the King and Marduk, the national god of Babylon (e.g., obverse 5.14-24). Nowhere is it stated that Shamash or Marduk gave the laws of the code to Hammurabi. The king, it is true, derived his authority to legislate and judge from the gods, but the law was his own; it was not a revealed law, like the law of Israel.

The stele is inscribed on the reverse as well as the obverse, and the whole text is almost perfectly preserved except for 16 lines at the bottom of the obverse. These lines were obliterated, most likely by the Elamites, who intended, but never carried out the plan to put an inscription of their own in this place. However, certain parts of the text of these lines can be restored from copies that had been made on clay tablets of various parts of the inscription. These tablets also duplicate, with variant readings, parts of the code that are preserved on the stele. The most complete publication of these tablets as well as the text of the stele itself, with a Latin translation, is by A. Deimel [Codex Hammurabi (Rome 1930; 3d rev. ed. by A. Pohl and R. Follet, Rome 1950). An English translation of it by T. J. Meek is given in J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 163–180].

The Code of Hammurabi is essentially a compilation of the older laws and customs of ancient Mesopotamia, most of them going back to Sumerian times. Hammurabi boasts that he rendered the Sumerian laws into the language of his people, classical Old Babylonian: "When Marduk sent me to rule the people and govern the land, I established right and justice [kittam u mišaram] in the language of the land, thereby promoting the people's welfare" (5.14–24).

The prologue is concerned mostly with recounting the benefits that Hammurabi bestowed on his country, particularly the various favors given to the different temples throughout the land. The epilogue, after briefly reviewing the achievements of the King, is taken up with curses on those who violate the laws or damage the stele.

The large, central part of the inscription contains the laws. In modern editions these are divided into 282 sections. The individual laws are often joined in logical groups, but there is usually but little logical sequence between the various groups. The principal groups of laws are concerned, in this order, with: false accusations; retraction of judgment by judges; theft; kidnapping; fugitive slaves; burglary; robbery; ransoming of captives; substitution of conscripts; property of soldiers; rent; irrigation; fields; orchards; loans; sale of fermented liquor; debts; embezzlement; slander; marriage; sexual crimes; inheritance; legitimation of children; adoption; substitution of another child by a wet nurse; maltreatment; damage done by a surgeon; houses and ships; cattle; damage done by cattle; theft of grain, seeds, and farm tools; hiring of people and animals; cattle breeding; and slaves. The social classes are distinguished in the code: the awēlū, citizens with full rights and full responsibility; the muškēnū, free men with limited rights and responsibilities; and the wardū, slaves. The laws presuppose a very highly developed civilization, basically agricultural, but with considerable commerce.

Since the period of Hammurabi corresponds roughly with the period of the Israelite patriarchs, the relationship between his code and the Mosaic Law has often been discussed. There are undoubtedly a few similarities that help to elucidate certain Old Testament customs, such as the husband of a childless wife begetting children in her name by the wife's slave girl (cf. par. 144-147 with Gn 21.9–14). The similarities, however, are due to the same juridical customs throughout the ancient Semitic milieu, not to any borrowings by the Israelites from Babylonian laws. In general, the material culture envisioned by the Code of Hammurabi was much higher than that of the Israelites either in the patriarchal period or in the Mosaic period. One of the closest resemblances, even in words, between the code and the Mosaic Law is in the laws of retaliation ("an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth"; cf. par. 196-197, 200 with Ex 21.23-25; Lv 24.19-20; Dt 19.21). But these are instances of ancient tribal customs that had almost died out in the Babylonia of Hammurabi's time.

Neo-Babylonian Laws. A school tablet (writing exercise in a scribal school) published by F. E. Peiser [SB-Münch 18 (1889) 823–828] contains 16 laws, of which only 9 are intelligible. The tablet was written in the Neo-Babylonian period (626–539 B.C.) and apparently represents the legal customs of this time. But these laws are probably not extracts from any code in the strict sense. The best preserved are concerned with marriage customs. (An English translation by T. J. Meek is given in J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament 197–198.)

Assyrian Laws. In addition to a few fragmentary tablets with laws from the Old-Assyrian trading post of Kanes (modern Kultepe) in eastern Asia Minor, dating from the first centuries of the 2d millennium B.C., a considerable corpus of Middle-Assyrian laws are known from tablets found by the German archeologists who excavated (1903-14) the ancient city of ASSUR (modern Qal'āt Sherqāt). These tablets, now in the Staatliches Museum, Berlin, were published by O. Schroeder [Keilschrifttexte aus Assur verschiedenen Inhalts 1.7 (Leipzig 1920) Jand E. F. Weidner [Archiv für Orientforschung 12 (1937) 50-52]. Although the tablets date from the 12th century B.C., the laws themselves are probably a few centuries older. About 116 laws, some of them of considerable length, can be reconstructed from the tablets. They contain prescriptions on sacrilege, theft and receipt of stolen goods, assault, murder, rape, slander, abortion, flight of married women, adultery, marriage, divorce, debt and surety, veiling of women, widows and wives of prisoners of war, sorcery, bodily injuries, deflowering of a virgin, manner of inflicting corporal punishment, sale of real estate, irrigation, sale of slaves, animals, theft, shipping, blasphemy, hereditary rights, etc.

The laws on women, marriage, and sexual crimes are the longest in this compilation. Characteristic of Assyrian law is the common infliction of corporal punishment, on women as well as on men, such as flogging with from 20 to 50 stripes, and amputations of various parts of the body. In contrast, penalties in Babylonian law are mostly in the form of fines. Incarceration as a penalty was not practiced in the ancient Near East. Many of the Assyrian laws are more complicated and less clearly worded than the Babylonian laws. Moreover, they give more consideration to subjective factors, such as intention, knowledge, and ignorance. (An English translation of the Middle-Assyrian laws by T. J. Meek is given in J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 180–188.)

Hittite Laws. Two of the many tablets found in the archeological excavations from 1906 to 1912 of the Hittite capital on the site of modern Bogazköi contain part of a collection of Hittite laws from the middle of the 2d millennium B.C.. Each tablet contains 100 legal paragraphs, formulated casuistically in a short and clear manner. Reference is made to a similar third tablet, but this has not been recovered.

The text contains various prescriptions on: maltreatment and murder, sorcery, mutilations, kidnapping, fugitive slaves, divorce, marriage, hiring of men and animals, feudal estates, stealing of cattle, damage to cattle, burglary, incendiarism, agriculture, theft of animals, prices, wages, bestiality, other sexual crimes, etc.

Of special interest is the fact that in many of the paragraphs more than one version of the law is given. The more recent version represents a later stage of legislation or customary law, and the compiler was interested in differences of local customs. The collection was compiled in a disorderly fashion, the same legal matters often being treated again in different places. (An English translation of the Hittite laws by A. Goetze is given in J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 188–197.)

Egyptian Laws. There are good reasons for thinking that the ancient Egyptians possessed written laws, even though these have not been preserved. Diodorus Siculus (Bibliothecae Historicae 1.25), who wrote between 60 and 30 B.C., states that in the great Egyptian courts of justice a number of scrolls containing the text of all the laws were laid before the judges. On a representation of a court of justice of the 18th Dynasty (1570–c. 1304 B.C.) 40 long objects, probably law scrolls, lie on four mats at the feet of the vizier Rechmerê. [See A. Erman, Aegypten und aegyptisches Leben im Altertum (Tübingen 1922) 158.] Diodorus also gives the names of six famous Egyptian lawgivers whose laws were handed down in writing. The oldest, according to him, was Mneus, who received his laws from Mercury (i.e., the Egyptian god Thot, the god of the order of the world, the heavenly judge, the scribe of the gods, etc.). The other legislators were Sasyches, Sesostris, Bocchoris, Amasis, and Darius the Persian. If Diodorus is correct, the Egyptians ascribed at least to some of their laws a heavenly, i.e., a revealed origin. On a stone erected by Horemheb (second half of the 14th century B.C.) a very worn copy of a royal decree is given. In the 1940s a law in demotic writing was found at Hermopolis, but it has not yet been published.

Bibliography: G. R. DRIVER and J. C. MILES, The Assyrian Laws (Oxford 1935); The Babylonian Laws, 2 v. (Oxford 1952–55). E. NEUFELD, The Hittite Laws (London 1951). J. M. P. SMITH, The Origin and History of Hebrew Law (Chicago 1931). F. HROZNY, Code Hittite provenant de l'Asie Mineure (Paris 1923). J. LEROY, Introduction à l'étude des anciens codes orientaux (Paris 1944).

[J. VAN DER PLOEG]

LAW, DIVINE POSITIVE

The law given by God to man in addition to the NATU-RAL LAW. Whereas the natural law is promulgated in the very structure of his being and is discernible by natural reason alone, the existence and content of divine positive law is known only by revelation. It is not altogether identifiable, however, with revealed law, because revelation embraces some laws of the natural order, which man could know by his own unaided reason but which God has nevertheless revealed in order that they might be grasped more readily and surely. Divine positive law includes the primitive law given by God in Paradise and after the Fall, the law of the Old Testament given through Moses and the Prophets (see LAW, MOSAIC), and the law of the New Testament revealed through Christ. The judicial and ceremonial precepts of the Mosaic Law were abrogated either on the death of Christ, or on Pentecost when the new law was solemnly promulgated, but its moral precepts were confirmed and promulgated anew in the law of Christ.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 91.4, 98–108. B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ, tr. E. G. KAISER, v.1 (Westminster, MD 1961) 237–238. A. MOLIEN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 9:887–889.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

LAW, MOSAIC

Law has a most important place in the religion of the OT. The first five books of the Bible, called by Christians the PENTATEUCH, are called the Torah ($t\hat{o}r\hat{a}$, law) by the Jews. The first of them, Genesis, contains only history; the fourth, Leviticus, only laws; the three other books, Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, contain history, laws, and discourses of Moses. The Pentateuch was the first book to be canonized by Judaism; it is the only holy book of the Samaritans. Its importance has been paramount for the history and development of the Jewish religion.

Nature of Israelite Law. The greatest difference between OT law and ancient Oriental law lies in its character of having been revealed. It is stressed that the Law is an expression of God's will, which has to be revealed to become known. Yahweh, the God of Israel, did not primarily reveal articles of faith to be believed, but commandments to be obeyed. The word $t\hat{o}r\hat{a}$ etymologically means instruction. The underlying idea is that man has been created by God and therefore must serve Him; but in order to be able to do so, he must know His will. God's revelation is His instruction to Israel how to serve Him. In the Greek Septuagint $t\hat{o}r\hat{a}$ is usually translated by $v\phi\mu\sigma$ (law), a translation that has become universal; but it should be borne in mind that for Israel the $t\hat{o}r\hat{a}$ meant more than law now means.

The importance of law in Israel appears from the fact that the Hebrew language possesses many synonyms for $t\hat{o}r\hat{a}$, which, though originally of different meanings, came finally to include this meaning (word, prescription, commandment, custom, testimony, etc.). For the pious Israelite the Law has never been a yoke, but a supreme privilege: it enables him to conform his life to the divine ordinances and so to give intrinsic value to his deeds.

Therefore, it is his duty and his privilege to study the Law in order to know it always better.

Growth of Mosaic Law. The laws of the Pentateuch were not all given at once to Israel, nor all during the life of Moses. "At present there is no longer anyone . . . who does not admit the progressive growth of the Mosaic laws caused by the social and religious conditions of later times" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 40 (Rome 1948) 45–48]. Old laws were expanded and adapted to new circumstances; new paragraphs and new laws were added; the existing laws were gathered in various collections or codes before the whole was compiled in the Pentateuch in its present form. This process went on from the time of Moses until after the end of the Babylonian Exile (538 B.C.).

Not all the laws are explicitly represented as revealed to Moses; e.g., those of Deuteronomy are nearly all formulated as prescriptions given by Moses, who was invested with divine authority (Dt 5.31-33). A part of the laws are formulated in the casuistic style of ancient Near-Eastern LAW, but many of them are formulated apodictically as divine commandments. This apodictic form is characteristic of Israelite law and reveals its nature [especially the form of the Decalogue: "Thou shalt (not) . . . " etc.]. But there is also a mixture of both styles in various ways and there are other formulations. The laws are often accompanied by religious considerations, because the Law as a whole is thought to be a divine instruction. Most of the law paragraphs have a direct religious meaning, and in this they differ from the other laws of the ancient Near East.

Relation of Law to Covenant. It is clear that Israel borrowed a part of the material of its legislation, not only in civil but also in religious matters, from the common Near-Eastern civilization; yet it pervaded its law with its own spirit, the spirit of the "fear of Yahweh." The Law was closely connected also with the COVENANT Israel had concluded with God; the covenant was conditioned on the fulfillment of the Law by the people. The nature of the covenant was that of a free pact between Yahweh and Israel, but Israel would have been far from blameless if it had not accepted the covenant and its law offered by God. Therefore in later times the people felt itself bound not only by act of the forefathers, but by the very revealed will of God.

In the postexilic period the importance of the Law grew more and more; it was identified with the idea of divine wisdom as revealed to men (Bar 3.37–4.4; Sir 24.22–27). The scrolls of the Law became and still are an object of veneration in the Jewish synagogue.

Various Collections of Laws. Different collections of laws, among which are at least two codes, can be clearly distinguished, each of them having its own literary history. The most important ones are briefly analyzed or characterized below.

Decalogue. The basic law of the Ten COMMAND-MENTS is quoted twice (Ex 20.2–17; Dt 5.6–21) in forms not completely identical; this shows that in the course of time even the text of this fundamental law received secondary additions. The Mosaic origin of the Decalogue has been disputed in modern times, though without cogent reasons.

Book of the Covenant. The group of laws in Ex 20. 22-23.33 is a true code, the (modern) name of which, BOOK OF THE COVENANT, has been taken from Ex 24.7. It contains a series of casuistic laws of the common Oriental type (21.18-22.16), which may have antedated the time of Moses, and a number of typically Israelitic statutes that contain certain important moral principles (e.g., 23.1–3, 6–9). The section in 21.12–22.16 seems to have been arranged according to a plan: crimes committed by a man against the life or bodily integrity of his fellow man; injuries done by a beast; damage caused to the property of a man. In the second part of the Book of the Covenant we find a series of various religious prescriptions and of some moral or humanitarian precepts. The historical circumstances in which the law was given are clearly indicated in the context; the promulgation of it was followed by the conclusion of a covenant. The code was destined for people possessing flocks and devoted to agriculture, but they do not presuppose a seminomad population only.

Book of Deuteronomy. Chapters 12 to 26 of the Book of DEUTERONOMY form a code also. The laws are preceded by discourses of Moses, recalling God's guidance of the people in history and inculcating the scope and general meaning of the Law: to serve God as his chosen people, distinguished and separated from all the peoples of the earth. The Greek name Δευτερονόμιον (second law), based on a faulty translation of mišnēh hattôrâ (copy of the law) in Dt 17.18, was taken to mean that the book contains the second legislation of Moses given to the people at the end of the 40 years of wandering through the desert. Though no convincing argument can be produced to disprove the fact of a second legislation by Moses, the book in its present form is certainly of a much later date, probably of the 8th or 7th century B.C., and may have received even later additions. Most likely Deuteronomy is the book of the Law found in the temple in 622 B.C. (2) Kgs 22.3–23.24). In its present form it is a code, clearly with reform tendencies, for a sedentary people living in towns and villages, in which the rights of various groups of socially weak people are defended. The paragraphs are given without much order; systematically reviewed, they may be said to contain: religious precepts, especially the law of centralization of the cult; laws that regulate institutions of public interest, such as kingship, prophecy, Levites, justice, war; measures taken to protect common interests of the nation, the town, and the family; measures to protect easily oppressed persons and even animals. In the discourses of Moses, the Decalogue and some other precepts of a general nature, such as the love of God (Dt 6.4), are quoted.

Priestly Code. Large portions of Exodus and Numbers and the whole of Leviticus have received the modern name Priestly Code from the supposedly priestly character of its legislation, which is for the greater part concerned with ritual matters: sacrifices, the cult, purity and impurity, etc. As a whole it is not a true code, but the name given to a collection of laws from various times. Many of them are ancient, others date from the time of the Exile (587–538 B.C.) or even later. Special mention should be made of the Law of HOLINESS (Lv ch. 17–26), considered by modern scholars to be the most ancient collection in the Priestly Code. It ends with a long epilogue of a general character, promising rewards, and menacing with punishments. (See PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL.)

Undue importance has been given by some scholars to the so-called cult Decalogue of Ex 34.10–26. It presents a problem to exegetes, but apparently consists of extracts from older laws. The Pentateuch does not contain all the laws and customs observed in Israel. From other Biblical passages, several other laws may be reconstituted [see J. van der Ploeg, The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 13 (Washington 1951) 42].

Bibliography: J. VAN DER PLOEG, "Studies in Hebrew Law," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 12 (Washington 1950) 248-259, 416-427; 13 (1951) 28-43, 164-171, 296-307. J. M. P. SMITH, The Origin and History of Hebrew Law (Chicago 1931). G. ÖSTBORN, Tora in the Old Testament: A Semantic Study, tr. C. HENTSCHEL (Lund 1945). H. H. ROWLEY, "Moses and the Decalogue," The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 34 (Manchester 1951-52) 81-118. L. WATERMAN, "Pro-Israelite Laws in the Book of the Covenant," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 38 (Chicago 1921-22) 36-54. J. MORGENSTERN, "The Book of the Covenant," Hebrew Union College Annual, 5 (Cincinnati 1928) 27-81. H. CAZELLES, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928-) 5:497-530. M. NOTH, Die Gesetze im Pentateuch (Halle 1940). A. ALT, Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts (Leipzig 1934). W. STODERL, Das Gesetz Israels nach Inhalt und Ursprung, v.1 of Beiträge zur Einleitung ins Alte Testament (Marienbad 1933). W. KORNFELD, Studien sum Heiligkeitsgesetz (Vienna 1952). L. M. SCHMÖKEL, Das Angewandte Rechte im Alten Testament (Leipzig 1930).

[J. P. M. VAN DER PLOEG]

LAW, PHILOSOPHY OF

The part of philosophy that studies the nature of LAW, with particular reference to the origins and ends of civil law and the principles that should govern its formulation. The study may be elaborated systematically in the context provided by a particular philosophical school, or it may be elaborated historically in light of the teachings of various schools. This article adopts the former method and discusses, from the viewpoint of Christian (or scholastic) philosophy, the following topics: law and force, authority and law's origin, inadequate theories of the nature of law, justice and law, the end of law, historical sources of the realist conception of law, and present needs in legal theory.

Law and Force. Law is addressed to persons for the purpose of directing their conduct. It develops as one aspect of human culture and tends to become significant with the expansion of commerce. Because it functions as a directive, its subject matter involves the respect due to the person when property is apportioned for man's use. At times throughout history the priorities have become inverted, and law has tended to become so identified with property that persons who have been dissatisfied by a prevailing property distribution have revolted against the law.

Although its appeal is primarily to human reasoning power and its technique relies chiefly on persuasion, law has often been associated with the implementation of state power and spoken of as if it were identical with force. Properly, law is the alternative to force; resort to force usually signifies the failure of law to persuade. Again, resort to force, especially when applied in the protection of property, tends to associate the notion of law with fear rather than with confidence. Observance of law is thereby reduced to avoidance of punishment. The statement of the rule shifts from "do right," to "do what you will, but do not get caught"; and payment of a prescribed penalty is accepted as the equivalent of fulfilling the law. The result obviously is not the same, and may be neither desired nor desirable.

Traditionally law and liberty were spoken of together, not law and fear. To ascertain the sequence of events that caused freedom to be displaced by conformity, one must examine the relationship of law to authority. This in turn raises questions about the origin and source of law.

Authority and Law's Origin. Repeatedly Sacred Scripture is cited for the observation that all AUTHORITY is from God. Kings anointed with ecclesiastical blessings, after solemn promises to rule "under God and the law"—in Bracton's phrase, who adds, "for the law makes the

