king" (fol. 5b; ed. T. Twiss, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 1:39)—have sometimes presumed to translate the inspired words into terms of their own, such as "the divine right of kings," with the Stuarts in England, or "l'état, c'est moi," with Louis XIV of France. The people, unable to reconcile arbitrary royal decrees with the scriptural admonition, revolted against the kings and left the exegesis of the words to the Church, as if the Church were outside the realities of human experience. Those who have subsequently aspired to govern in place of the kings have often widened the breach instead of reconciling their assumption of authority with Holy Writ. The question not yet satisfactorily answered, for governors and governed alike, is basically epistemological, viz, In what form can the authority that is from God be recognized?

The unanswered question is philosophical, and not merely doctrinal or theological, for those outside the organized Christian Church are equally affected by authority and are equally subject to the conditions of life as to a universal law. The Code of Hammurabi, the Mosaic Code, the customary law of India and of China, the laws of Solon and Draco among the ancient Greeks, the highly developed early law of the Romans—which retained its significance centuries later in the Code of Justinian—all indicate that law itself is close to the essence of man. When Justinian began his Code in the name of the Blessed Trinity, he added a Christian sanction to the work of the Roman jurists, without thereby excluding much that was formulated by pagans before the Christian Era began. The fact that the specific forms of law differ in various times and places is evidence of different conditions and degrees of comprehension, not of enclaves exempt from the universal law. The task of philosophy is to examine the relationship between human conduct and the observed universal order, and to give a satisfactory account of that relationship. It may begin with the theory of knowledge, with the question of how the natural law becomes known, but it ultimately must extend to the actual situation of man in his universe.

Natural Law, Truth, and Being. The notion of NATURAL LAW has become less clear the more it has been discussed. Indeed so contradictory are some of the theories attributing authority to the natural law that the term has become divisive. Repudiated though it may be on this account, the notion of natural law has survived through so many centuries that some reconsideration of its underlying signification is needed.

As the pursuit of TRUTH is the primary motivation in scientific discovery, so it is primary in ascertaining how the human mind participates consciously in the universal law. Human laws may be created, i.e., formulated or given shape, by men as a result of observations, inferences, and conclusions, and expressed not in stone or paint but in determinations, decisions, and judgments. To the extent that these judgments conform to the actually existent order of NATURE, they are acceptable as an expression of truth, but to the extent that some elements may not conform, they are subject to revision in a manner similar to the conclusions of physical scientists. Truth is in the judgment, but not the whole truth, unless the judge is omniscient. Inventiveness and resourcefulness in utilizing findings of fact can enrich the creativity of judgment, but excesses of imaginative construction must be brought into agreement with the actual conditions of human existence.

As truth is the ultimate criterion of the way things are, and therefore is interchangeable with BEING as known by the intellect, so the GOOD is the criterion of choice at the level of the will, and therefore is interchangeable with being as the ultimate goal of motivation and desire. Again, as truth is interchangeable with being in one aspect and as good is interchangeable with being in another, so both the true and the good are interchangeable with each other (see TRANSCENDENTALS). Yet human comprehension of truth is prior to knowledge of the good, since one cannot choose what he does not know. To act in accordance with CONSCIENCE, then, means to make a decision consistent with the degree of knowledge of being one has attained; this, in fact, is indicated in the etymology of the term, con (or cum) and scientia.

Nature and Person. The point of view from which a human being observes reality is necessarily personal. By definition, adopted from BOETHIUS, a PERSON is an individual substance of a rational nature. Without investigating the quantitative implications of INDIVIDUALITY or the metaphysical significance of SUBSTANCE, attention may be focused on nature and the qualification of rationality. The term nature incorporates persons into the totality of existence, since nature refers to the essence of things that exist in the universe. The most important element in the notion of person, therefore, is being; nothing that lacks existence, no matter what its potentialities, can be a person. Beyond this, a person is distinguishable from other things by his ability to reason. Personality acquires a unique dignity or value because of its essential rationality. It is this quality of reasonableness, limited though it may be, in each individual substance, that is primary. To it all evidence, argument, and proof are directed; from it every conclusion, determination, and judgment is derived. Indeed, it is on the distinction of the rationality of persons that the similarities and differences between universal law and its human formulations are based.

The universal law unceasingly challenges man to new discoveries of its essence and manifestations. However, his capacity to reapportion the latter is admittedly conditional, and functions usually through COMMUNICA-TION with other persons. It is obvious that the movement of fish in the sea continues independently of man's word, whereas the course of action of employers and employees alike may be changed by the announced decision of an economist, perhaps, or a human lawgiver. The difference between the two cases has not always been clearly stated, and an exaggerated mechanicism in human affairs has led to confusion in the history of jurisprudence.

Scriptural Basis. Just as the notion of authority in Sacred Scripture has been cited repeatedly in connection with government and liberty, so the original words used in the inspired text have been referred to again and again, even in recent times. In English translation, the natural law is "written in the heart" (Rom 2.15). This, of course, is a figure of speech that conveys an ineffable truth in everyday language and is not expected to be taken literally. Yet it presents a difficult problem of interpretation. The words used actually challenge the reasoning human mind to discover the nature, or essence, of man and to act according to that nature. This challenge has often been acknowledged, but not successfully met. It is obvious that knowledge and judgment are involved, but intelligence alone is insufficient; in fact, the heart suggests motivation, and choice as well. The entire essence of man, and the impact of the rest of existence upon his struggle for survival and identity, are implied. Small wonder that the explanations so far suggested in philosophy reflect little more than the characteristics of the different schools that have offered them.

Inadequate Theories. Among the inadequate theories sometimes presented, determinism has had much to say about law and the natural order. It can be found throughout the history of ideas in one form or another. In modern times it has become familiar through the triad, or troika, of G. W. F. HEGEL, who presented the dialectic of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis as if it were an inevitable sequence of events. In the governments in which Hegel's theory has been dominant, it has resulted in a revolting loss of freedom. Moreover, the exalted conceptualism that characterized Hegel's speculations cannot claim general acceptance, for in it man's ability to choose is left out of account.

Mechanicism and Positivism. Mechanicists also, impressed by the repetitiveness of the physical order, have adhered generally to a determinism, but appeared less assured as mid-20th-century explorations into the atom disclosed unexpected discontinuities in nature. Their confidence in mechanical rigidity was replaced by uncertainty to such an extent that many suspended judgment while awaiting further findings.

POSITIVISM had a particularly strong influence in legal theory after the mid-19th century, but, like determinism began reviewing its dogmas. When judgments are confined to narrow interpretations of written legal documents, public or private, too many of the verifiable facts of life are left out of account, with results that are more abstract than realistic. Furthermore, identification of the rule of law with its hopefully automatic enforcement has placed an exaggerated emphasis on punishment rather than on correction. Positivists, who consistently accorded priority to power at the expense of justice in the legal order, were sufficiently shocked by unsatisfactory results of their theory to turn again to science for greater precision. But with physics and chemistry becoming less predictable, they shifted attention from atoms to cells and looked toward the life sciences, so-called, for help. Sociology proved disappointing its tendency to subordinate individuals to the pressures of mass society had been offset by concern for the protection of human rights under law. Psychology was more favored, but exaggerated emphasis on the "can't helps" of human existence and on comparable irrationalities seemed to be calling forth deeper quests. Until positivists abandon the imperialistic notion that law is to be identified with command, and with the power to enforce command, resistance was anticipated from those uncommitted to their sphere of influence, national or international.

Unwarranted Assumptions. Another unsatisfactory emphasis in philosophy, found even in the basically sound realistic school, has proved disadvantageous for the development of law. This is the tendency to proceed on the basis of unwarranted assumptions. Deductions from a priori premises that cannot be verified must, no matter how insistently repeated, be excluded in the interests of truth. The ultimate criterion of the true and the good is what the Creator has actually created, not what any limited human mind presumes to be true or accepts on hearsay evidence. It is necessary to know what has been previously thought in order to avoid repeating errors and to conserve facets of truth. However, since no human being is omniscient or able to verify everything by personal experiment, man must develop critical powers to avoid the acceptance of half-truths. Law depends for its advancement on a humble conscience, but not on an uncritical one. Yet the temper of criticism should be prudent, judicious, kind, and constructive, since love, as St. Paul teaches, is the fulfillment of the law (Rom 13.10).

Justice and Law. A striking feature of postmodern thought is the somewhat general omission of JUSTICE from theories about the legal order. Law is mentioned in connection with commands, sanctions (i.e., penalties added to a breach), demands, rights, expectations, duties, freedoms—especially freedom of expression (even when this amounts to engaging in the business of spreading mental, as opposed to physical, poison for profit)—conformed or regimented behavior, and even coexistence. The notion of justice seemed to have disappeared. In fact, H. Kelsen, a writer on jurisprudence, published his collected essays under the title What is Justice? (Berkeley 1957), thus recalling Pontius Pilate's comparable question to Christ, "What is Truth?" (Jn 18.38). Clearly, the notion of justice needed to be reasserted in legal theory.

Lex, or legislative enactment, was distinguished in Roman law from ius, or right, and ius, in turn, was distinguished from iustitia, the rendering to each his own. European languages have preserved the distinction by retaining two words for law, but the English language has obscured the difference by using one word to convey both meanings. A consciousness that the difference is significant appears in modern legal literature, however, where some attention is devoted to the "is" and the "ought" of law. Among influential positivists only the "is" mattered, as already existent; the "ought" was left to those who speculated on the nonexistent or the imagined. Hegelians and evolutionists, concerned as much with "becoming" as with "being," were somewhat more receptive to the notion of what the law "ought" to be, although, if they were also determinists, their interest in the "ought" would appear inconsistent. It was a new concern for realism in American law in the 1920s that began again to inquire whether the law that "is" corresponds adequately with the facts of life and to inquire further whether, insofar as it does not, changes should be considered. The neorealists [e.g., K. N. Llewellyn, Jurisprudence (Chicago 1962)] opened the way for a reconsideration of the relation of law to right, without quite reviving the notion of justice.

Writers in Europe [e.g., G. del Vecchio, Justice (New York 1953)], influenced perhaps by Immanuel Kant, questioned anew the meaning of justice. Following Kant's classification of law under the practical reason, praxis, or the will aspect of human activity, which takes from the intellectual judgment its natural priority—T. E. Davitt, The Nature of Law (St. Louis 1951) contrasted Ockham and Suárez with Aquinas and Bellarmine on the distinction here—these 20th-century writers stressed the CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE. They reemphasized the golden rule of action—do unto others as you would be done unto—and suggested that the most important word here is "others." They then drew the inference that justice pertains exclusively to others, thereby giving law a modern sociological connotation. The result was quite different from the traditional notion of justice, which is the notion of rendering to each person what is his own.

It is to the merit of the older definition, however, that it takes account of the necessities of human existence. It sees the proper function of law as an instrument of justice, which undertakes to assure to each living person whatever he actually needs in order to attain the fullness of existence of which he is capable. The right, or ius, or what the law "ought" to express, is, in the traditional view, not the post-Kantian wish or expectation concerning what others should do to one, but rather whatever human existence actually requires—one's own, or anyone else's-and this whether one is conscious of that need or not. Such a notion of justice is much closer to the universal order that confronts the intellect than is any theory that separates intellect from will and identifies law with the will. VOLUNTARISM, in minimizing the importance of both judgment and justice for law, is unable to reconcile satisfactorily the double aspect under which law functions, viz, as science and as art. Indeed, it fails even to account adequately for the scriptural definition of natural law as that which is "written in the heart."

End of Law. Just as the relation of law to authority raises questions about the origins and sources of both law and lawgiver, the relation of law to justice calls for a consideration of the purpose, or end, of law. Unless the latter be explained in terms of existence, or being, the entire law-giving activity proceeds on unsound premises. This is why natural philosophy, metaphysics, epistemology, and natural theology are as important for an adequate philosophy of law as are ethics or theories of the state. Yet these latter have claimed what amounts to a monopoly in speculations about law.

The fact that ETHICS and law are both concerned with conduct, and refer to the natural law in formulating directions, led to much confusion in jurisprudence. Theories of the relationship extend from those who hold that law should implement ethical decisions by force to those who hold that law is entirely unrelated to ethics. Although the ultimate goal for both is the good, their functions are quite different. Ethics directs toward the best possible conduct of which each human being is capable, whereas law is satisfied with the minimum that is acceptable to a majority in a community. This is not to say that law is public and ethics private, since law relies on conscience in private decisions as fully as ethics does in public affairs. The tasks are parallel and may at times coincide, but they are not identical. Confusion usually comes from identifying law with force, while ignoring law's reliance on judgment and persuasion in arriving at decisions.

Among the features of law that perhaps can most easily be left to legal experts are the procedures and techniques through which the law is made applicable to particular situations. Practically the entire course of studies in university law schools is devoted to these details. Moreover, legal terminology, unlike that of the physical sciences and the arts, is not generally understood by those in other intellectual pursuits. It is generally true also that the significance of law for life, which is seldom mentioned in the law schools, receives little attention in other departments of the modern university.

Historical Sources. The cultural void notable in juridical studies by the mid-20th century was not always characteristic of university teaching. Not only do the great summae of learning provide chapters on law, but there is evidence also of interchanges of expert opinion throughout Western Europe. Nor were the teachers unique in making important contributions to juridical thought. Heads of government have left monumental contributions as well.

The work of three 13th-century rulers in particular can provide the foundation for a much-needed comparative study of law. All three were kings, and they were closely associated in blood or friendship. St. LOUIS IX OF FRANCE was so concerned for lawyers that he built the beautiful Sainte-Chapelle near the law courts of Paris for their religious devotions. Alfonso X, King of Castile, patronized the collection of laws known as Siete Partidas, whose influence is still found in the southwestern United States. And Edward I of England has come to be called the English Justinian, because the common law reached such heights before his reign was over that the great modern jurist Maitland could speak of that era as "the golden days of the common law" [F. Pollock and F. W. Maitland, The History of English Law before the Time of Edward I (Cambridge, England 1895) 1:112].

This was the same century that saw not only the drafting of Magna Carta by the archbishop of Canterbury, STEPHEN LANGTON; but also the Summa of the English Franciscan ALEXANDER OF HALES at the University of Paris, with its section De legibus; the incomparable treatise of the cleric-judge Henry de BRACTON, De legibus et consuetudinibus Angliae; and the Summa theologiae of St. THOMAS AQUINAS at Paris, with its special chapter, De legibus.

Preceding this flowering were centuries of legal experience paralleling the growth of Christian thought. In the patristic era all the important writers, from TERTULLIAN to BOETHIUS and ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, many of whom were jurists, made significant contributions. Undoubtedly the sic et non dialectic of ABELARD influenced the development of adversary procedure; similarly, the harmonization of conflicting canons by Gratian showed the way for systematic treatises (see GRATIAN, DECRETUM OF). The Saxon contribution spread from the Christian renaissance in the time of BERNWARD OF HILDESHEIM.

through the laws of ALFRED THE GREAT of England, to the Sachsenspiegel, which served as prototype for various collections of laws known by such titles as speculum and spicilegium (mirror of the justices). The impetus given to revived Roman-law studies at Bologna and Padua by MA-TILDA OF TUSCANY is perhaps better known. In the Scandinavian countries, the beginnings of maritime law at the island of Wisby is attested by the ruins of the churches that served to guarantee good faith. The laws of Oléron, no less than the Visigothic Code, were shaped in the Spanish peninsula. Irish monks brought the knowledge of the Brehon laws to the Continent. The Norman development was particularly noteworthy, the archbishops of Canterbury from St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY to Thomas BECKET, at least, and Anglo-Norman jurists such as VA-CARIUS having found a convenient crossroads for the exchange of ideas at the Abbey of Bec in Normandy. Materials are thus plentiful for a new synthesis of the relations of law to life as these unfolded in the ages of faith.

From this jurisprudential heritage, Thomas MORE, F. de VITORIA, F. Suárez, Sir Edward Coke, F. BACON, H. GROTIUS, and J. Selden were able to draw when solving problems posed by the exploration of the American continent. In recent times, modern jurists such as R. von Ihering, E. Ehrlich, and G. Radbruch, in Germany; F. Gény, M. Hauriou, and G. Rénard, in France; and F. W. Maitland, in England, raise questions of grave philosophical import, but a hollow echo is heard in reply. The popes alone, from Leo XIII to John XXIII and Paul VI, have pointed out directions for an acceptable meeting-place for law and life. Justice, human dignity, subordination of force continually reappear in encyclical letters, but the universities for the most part pay little heed.

Present Need. Perhaps the greatest need is a corrective for the popular identification of law with prohibitions. Law is not essentially negative. The revealed Mosaic Code itself begins positively, and only afterward becomes negative by way of clarification. Instead of the view of law as obstructionist, the truly creative tasks that require great originality of mind must be emphasized. Law functions as a science, in arriving at its judgments, but it functions also as an art, in giving expression to choice and in decision-making. To the extent that a person glimpses an aspect of truth, or selects an aspect of good, as an authoritative guide to human conduct and formulates the result cogently, he participates in the creativity of the universal order. Through his work the truth as being becomes more intelligible, and the good as being is seen to be more desirable. And when a person to whom the law is directed accepts the application in good conscience, adopting the true and the good as his own, he also participates in the creativity of the universal order by way of responsibility or self-government. In fact, exclusion from participation, itself the deprivation of a good, is really a punishment. Law's constructive function in relation to human conduct is thus what earns for law its place of honor in the learned world, a place acknowledged in the medieval universities to be second to philosophy and theology alone.

See Also: LAW; NATURAL LAW.

Bibliography: Sources. THOMAS AQUINAS, theologiae 1a2ae, 90-97. H. DE BRACTON, De legibus et consuetudinibus Angliae, ed. and Eng. tr. T. TWISS, 6 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v. (London 1858-96; repr. New York 1964-) 1878-83). H. G. RICHARDSON, Bracton: The Problem of His Text (London 1965). Encyclical letters on the reconstruction of the social order. LEO XIII, Rerum novarum (1891). PIUS XI, Quadragesimo anno (1931). PIUS XII, Summi pontificatus (1939). JOHN XXIII, Mater et magistra (1961); Pacem in terris (1963). Pastoral Letter of the archbishops and bishops of the United States, signed by Cardinal James Gibbons, Sept. 26, 1919 (NCWC; Washington, DC 1920), drafted by E. A. PACE, on the reconstruction of the social order after World War I. Studies. T. F. T. PLUCKNETT, A Concise History of the Common Law (5th ed. Boston 1956). C. H. MCILWAIN, The Growth of Political Thought in the West (New York 1932; repr. 1955). R. O'SULLIVAN, Christian Philosophy in the Common Law (Westminster, Maryland 1942). M. T. ROONEY, Lawlessness, Law, and Sanction (Washington 1937). J. C. H. WU, Fountain of Justice (New York 1955); Cases and Materials on Jurisprudence (St. Paul 1958), useful bibliography. E. BODENHEIMER, Jurisprudence: The Philosophy and Method of the Law (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1962), objective account of modern views. Periodicals. Index to Legal Periodicals (New York 1908-). Index to Foreign Legal Periodicals (London 1960-). Catholic Lawyer (New York 1955-). Natural Law Forum (Notre Dame, Indiana 1956-). World Justice (Louvain 1959-).

[M. T. ROONEY]

LAW, WILLIAM

High Anglican ecclesiastic and spiritual author; b. Kings Cliffe, Northamptonshire, 1686; d. there, April 9, 1761. He was the son of a grocer. He entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1705. After ordination, he was elected a fellow of his college in 1711 and taught at Cambridge until the accession of George I in 1714, when he was suspended from his degree and deprived of his fellowship for his Jacobite sympathies. From 1727 to 1737, Law resided with the family of Edward Gibbon, grandfather of the historian, as tutor and as spiritual guide for the family and their friends, among whom were Archibald Hutcheson and John and Charles WESLEY. After 1743 Hutcheson's widow and Gibbon's sister joined Law at Kings Cliffe in a life of simplicity, devotion, and prayer inspired by ideals set forth in Law's Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728). They maintained two small schools and used their considerable incomes for charity. Law was the ablest High Church writer of his day: direct, simple, and logical in his exposition of Christian ideals. His influence was limited, however, because he wrote in opposition to the prevailing tendencies of his time. In the Bangorian Controversy of 1716–17, he opposed the party supported by the crown. He wrote forcefully against deism at a time when the deist and rationalist approach to religious studies, popularized by John LOCKE, was in its heyday. In 1726 he wrote a work condemning the contemporary theater.

Law had always been interested in such late medieval mystics as THOMAS À KEMPIS, TAULER, and RUYSBR-OECK, whose influence appears in the Serious Call. He advocated a full Christian life, with attention to meditation, ascetical practices, and moral virtues, especially those of daily life—everything being directed to the glorification of God. The Serious Call was the most influential spiritual work, apart from Pilgrim's Progress, after the English Reformation. In 1737 Law fell under the influence of the Moravian mystic Boenler and the German Jacob вöнме. His later works, The Spirit of Prayer (1749-50) and The Spirit of Love (1752-54), which emphasize the indwelling of Christ in the soul, led the Wesleys to break with him, although they continued to admire him. Law's doctrine tended toward the Quaker conception of the Inner Light.

Bibliography: Works, 9 v. (London 1892–93). S. H. GEM, The Mysticism of William Law (London 1914). L. STEPHEN, Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 11:677–681. J. B. GREEN, John Wesley and William Law (London 1945). E. W. BAKER, A Herald of the Evangelical Revival (London 1948). M. SCHMIDT, John Wesley, tr. N. P. GOLDHAWK (London 1962) 1. M. SCHMIDT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 4:245. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 791.

[B. NORLING]

LAW IN CHRISTIAN LIFE

According to the New Testament, God created man in and for Christ (Eph 1.3-14; Col 1.15-17) to take him up into His Trinitarian life (cf. Jn 17.20-24). With his nature, man received (Gn 2.17) his basic structure, norm of activity (ontological NATURAL LAW: Rom 2.14–15). Regenerated into a new creature (Gal 6.15; 2 Cor 5.17), he concretely tends to the beatific vision according to a new norm (ontological supernatural law) that incorporates the natural law. As a redeemed sinner, his march toward the end should be a "paschal ascent" following the Savior through the Cross to the Resurrection (Mt 16.24; Col 2.6; Heb 10.19–25). In anticipation of the incarnate "Way," Christ (Jn 14.6), God enlightened man's darkened conscience by a positive (Mosaic) law or economy, the revealed embodiment of a Divine "Way" (cf. Ps 118, 119). (See LAW, MOSAIC). Not containing the WORD, it could not justify by its own works (Gal 2.16; Rom 3.28) or supply inner strength (Gal 3.21; Rom 7.16–24). Observed without FAITH, it turned into a "letter" that kills (2 Cor 3.6–11; 1 Cor 15.56), into a prosecutor unveiling man's sinfulness (ἀμαρτία: Rom 3.20; 7.7) and thus became instrumental to transgression (παράβασις: Rom 4.15; Gal 3. 19).

Christ, Man's Living Law. Christ both completes and terminates the economy of the law (Mt 5.17; Rom 10.4; Gal 3.25), for He is the Incarnate "Way" to all truth (Jn 14.6). From within (Jn 14.15–24; Rom 8.9–11; Gal 2.20; 1 Jn 5.11-13) Christ through His Spirit moves His members and guides them. By Himself and through His Spirit (Rom 8.2-4), He is their living law (St. Thomas, In 8 Rom), supplying the strength to observe it (Gal 5.16–25). Borne up by love (Rom 5.5; 1 Jn 5.3), the Christian as such does not feel compelled by exterior laws (Jas 1.25); he may not, indeed, transgress these, for he observes them eminently with the liberty and generosity of God's children (Gal 4.5-7; Rom 8.14-17). Qua Christian, man does not sin (Gal 5.16; 1 Jn 3.6, 9; 5.18); even, beyond strict obligation, he is invited to acts of supererogation (e.g., the counsels, cf. 1 Cor 7.7, 25-38); he is to tend to perfection (Mt 5.48; 19.21). In case he draws back from love, he is still compelled by the external law, which protects him from falling below a vital minimum of love (cf. 1 Tm 1.9; Gal 5.16-23). Jesus has been a "doctor" and law-giver (cf. Mt 5-7; 11.29-30; 23.10); He has given His new commandments (Jn 15.12-17; 1 Jn 3.22). After Him, the Apostles too give precepts in their epistles. Christ's law (Gal 6.2; 1 Cor 9.21), however, constitutes man's very liberty in action, because it frees man from the slavery of any other (Gal 5.1, 13, 18; Rom 6.14).

Law of Charity. Basically the Christian law is the law of love (Mt 7.12; Mk 12.28-34; Rm 13.8-10; Gal 5.13-14; 1 Jn 4). Indeed, it canalizes man's tendency to the End loved as a good (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 1.3-8), and its driving force and its revealer—God in Christ—is love (1 Jn 4.8, 16). A real love proves and expresses itself in deeds (cf. Jn 14.15; 1 Jn 5.3): the acts of all the virtues, chiefly of fraternal charity (1 Jn 4.12, 20-21), mediate and determine specifically the basic tendency of love-charity in the various fields of moral activity (moral objects) and in the different active powers (subjective aspect, cf. Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 23.8: caritas . . . forma virtutum). As for its content, the Christian law "fulfills" and elevates the structures—and the commandments—of the natural law, giving them their concrete, supernatural finality. It sets aside the precepts that are specifically Jewish (cf. Gal 2.14-21; 4.10–11; 6.12), creates a new hierarchy of moral values (Mt 5), and adds the structures—and commandments—of the "new creation" (Trinitarian, sacramental, ecclesial). It leads directly to the following of Christ (Mt 16.24; 1 Cor 11.1). It is perceived by the reason elevated by faith and is lived in the Christian community (Acts 2.42–47; 4.32–35). In the Christian dispensation, explicit laws (canonical, civil, international) remain necessary; but their "letter" receives its meaning, inspiration, and obligation from the (individual and social) Christian dynamism proper to the members of Christ and springing from Christ Himself.

With the complete, divinized man for immediate criterion and with the God-Man for ultimate criterion, it judges of the morality of human laws according to absolute truth: above Caesar stands God and the Wisdom of His Word (cf. Prv 8.15).

See Also: AUTHORITY, ECCLESIASTICAL; CANON LAW; COMMANDMENTS, TEN; FREEDOM, SPIRITUAL; KINGDOM OF GOD; LAW, DIVINE POSITIVE; OFFICE, ECCLESIASTICAL; SOCIETY (THEOLOGY OF).

Bibliography: P. BLÄSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4:825–826. G. GILLEMAN, The Primacy of Charity in Moral Theology, tr. W. F. RYAN and A. VACHON (Westminster, Md. 1959) 253–279 and passim. E. HAMEL, "Loi naturelle et loi du Christ," Sciences Ecclésiastiques 10 (1958) 49–76. B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ, tr. E. G. KAISER, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1961) 1:227–285. S. LYONNET, "Liberté du Chrétien et loi de l'Esprit selon S. Paul," Christus (1954) 6–27; Les Épîtres de saint Paul aux Galates, aux Romains (BJ 38; 1953), annotations

[G. A. GILLEMAN]

LAWRENCE, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: Nov. 22, 498 to 499, 502 to 506. At the death of ANASTASIUS II in November 498, the Roman community split between those who wanted to continue the dead pope's conciliatory policies toward the Byzantine empire and the Patriarchate of Constantinople and those who wanted to return to the hardline approach of GELASIUS I (492-496). Most clergy favored a hard line and chose the deacon Symmachus (Nov. 22, 498-July 19, 514); a minority of the clergy, but the bulk of the aristocracy favored conciliation and chose the archpriest Laurentius. Neither faction could prevail, and so both appealed to the Ostrogothic, Arian king of Italy, Theodoric (493–516), which meant that a heretical barbarian would choose the bishop of Rome. Theodoric decided that Symmachus had more support at Rome and so sided with him. Laurentius accepted the decision, withdrew his candidacy in February of 499, and put his name first on the list of clergy supporting the decrees of a synod held by Symmachus. He also graciously accepted a bishopric in Campania.

However, his supporters would not accept defeat. In 502 they went to Theodoric to charge Symmachus with unchastity and misuse of funds. Symmachus retaliated by turning on Lawrence, who gave up his bishopric and fled to the Ostrogothic capital at Ravenna. The king ordered a synod to judge the case against Symmachus, who was exonerated, but by then Lawrence's supporters controlled much of Rome, and he returned to the city and occupied the Lateran basilica, forcing Symmachus to retire across the Tiber and hold court in St. Peter's basilica. For four years Lawrence's had the stronger position, but Theodoric's relations with Constantinople steadily declined, and he had less tolerance for a pro-Byzantine pope. In 506 the king forced Laurentius to leave the city, and Symmachus promptly excommunicated him. Lawrence retired to an estate owned by one of his supporters, and he died there a vear later.

Bibliography: H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:620–621. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of the Popes (New York 1986) 52. P. LEEWELLYN, "The Roman Church during the Laurentian Schism: Priests and Senators," Church History 45 (1978) 417–4278. J. MOOREHEAD, "The Laurentian Schism: East and West in the Roman Church," Church History 47 (1978) 125–136. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 69–99.

[J. F. KELLY]

LAWRENCE, ST.

Roman deacon and martyr; d. Rome, probably 258. Lawrence and four clerics were put to death, probably by the sword, during the persecution of Valerian (258), four days after the martyrdom of Pope SIXTUS II and his four deacons. The legendary details of his passion, such as the parting words of Sixtus predicting Lawrence's martyrdom four days later and Lawrence's last joke to the judge while being roasted on the gridiron— Assam est; versa, et manduca! (it is well done; turn it over and eat it)were known to DAMASUS, AMBROSE, PRUDENTIUS, and AUGUSTINE. These details may have come into the legend as a result of the cult of the Phrygian martyrs described by the historians SOCRATES and SOZOMEN. The feast of St. Lawrence is noted in martyrologies as early as the beginning of the fourth century; the church built over his tomb became one of the seven principal churches of Rome and a favorite place for Roman PILGRIMAGES. His cult spread rapidly through Christendom. His intercession is credited with a decisive victory over the Magyars on the Lechfeld in 955 and the victory of St. Quentin in 1557.

Feast: Aug. 10.

Bibliography: A. BENVENUTI PAPI, Il Diacono Lorenzo tra storia e leggenda, ed. C. BATTIGELLI BALDASSERONI (Florence 1998). N. WIREKER, The Passion of St. Lawrence, ed. and tr. J. M. ZIOLKOWSKI (Leiden 1994). D. W. RUSSELL, La Vie de Saint Laurent: An Anglo-Norman Poem of the Twelfth Century (London 1976). R. PAFFEN, Der Streit um das Laurentiushaupt (Mönschengladbach 1970). V. L. KENNEDY, The Saints of the Canon of the Mass (Vatican City 1938). P. FRANCHI DE' CAVALIERI, "S. Lorenzo e il supplicio della graticola," Römische Quartalschrift für Christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte (Freiburg 1887–) 14 (1900) 159–176. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 2:485–532.

[J. BRÜCKMANN]

LAWRENCE, ROBERT, ST.

Carthusian martyr; b. probably in Dorsetshire, date unknown; d. Tyburn, May 4, 1535. He received his LL.B. degree from Cambridge in 1508, and, according to Thomas Wriothesley, Earl of Southhampton, was once chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk. After his profession at the London Charterhouse, he succeeded Bl. John HOUGH-TON as prior of Beauvale (1531). At the appearance of the decree of May 15, 1535, announcing Henry VIII as Supreme Head of the English Church, Lawrence went to London for the advice of Prior Houghton. He accompanied Houghton and Bl. Augustine WEBSTER, Prior of Axholme, in a visit to Thomas Cromwell for a modified form of the decree that they could accept in conscience. They were imprisoned in the Tower together with Bl. Richard Reynolds, a Bridgettine of Syon. On April 20 they were examined by royal commissioners and sent to Westminster Hall for trial. They pleaded innocent of any seditious opposition to the king, but were declared guilty by a jury that hesitated for two days until compelled to act by Cromwell. On May 4 in the company of Bl. John Haile, the aged vicar of Isleworth, these protomartyrs were set on hurdles and dragged to Tyburn, where they suffered the penalty of treason. They were hanged, cut down while alive, eviscerated, and quartered. In 1936 a benefactor attributing his restoration to health to Lawrence's intercession erected a small chapel in the Catholic church at Eastwood near Beauvale, to which the former altarstone of Beauvale priory was restored in 1940. The ruins of Lawrence's lodging are still preserved.

Feast: May 4; Oct. 25.

Bibliography: Contemporary accounts by M. CHAUNCY, "De B.B. Martyribus Carthusiensibus in Anglia," ed. F. VAN ORTROY, Analecta Bollandiana 14 (1895) 268–283; "Martyrum Monachorum Carthusianorum in Anglia Passio minor," ed. F. VAN ORTROY, ibid. 22 (1903) 51–78; Passion and Martyrdom of the Holy English Carthusian Fathers, tr. A. F. RADCLIFFE (New York 1936). L. HENDRIKS, London Charterhouse, Its Monks and Its Martyrs (London 1889). E. M. THOMPSON, The Carthusian Order in England (New York 1930). L. E. WHATMORE, Blessed Carthusian Martyrs (London 1962).

[L. E. WHATMORE]

LAWRENCE JUSTINIAN, ST.

Spiritual writer, bishop, and first patriarch of Venice; b. Venice, 1381; d. there, Jan. 8, 1456. At the age of 19, after a spiritual crisis, he entered the Canons Regular at San Giorgio on the island of Alga, near Venice. The community became a congregation of secular canons living a common life and was approved in 1404. Lawrence Justinian (Lorenzo Giustiniani) was elected superior at Vicenza in 1407, and held the same office at San Giorgio in Alga for four terms (1409-21), and afterward he was four times elected general of the congregation (1424–31). In 1433 he was named bishop of Castello by EUGENE IV, and in 1451 he was transferred to the See of Venice. He was distinguished for the simplicity and poverty of his personal life, but was eminently, even heroically, liberal in the practice of charity toward others. He was noted also for the intensity of his apostolic zeal. His writings, the composition of which paralleled the different stages of his career, comprise 15 doctrinal works and a collection of sermons.

His doctrinal works fall into two groups. The first, concerned with the religious life, began with his Lignum vitae (1419) and ended with De compunctione et complanctu christianae perfectionis (1428), although the central work, which sums up all the others, was De casto connubio Verbi et animae (1425). The second group, which grew out of his apostolic activities, began with De spirituali animae interitu (1425) and culminated with De institutione et regimine praelatorum (c. 1450). Throughout these works there is a basic unity in the form of a dominant theme, that of Eternal Wisdom, which was derived from his mystical experience.

His conversion from the world and his entrance into the monastery was due to a vision of Eternal Wisdom that called to him to be taken as a spouse (see Fasciculus amoris 16). All spiritual paths develop from that as a progressive possession of Incarnate Wisdom in the ever more profound assimilation of the knowledge attained through love, until the soul becomes, in the light of Wisdom, a new creature, which is made to the image of the Incarnate Word and espoused to Wisdom by love.

His teaching on the apostolate, included in the second group of writings, presupposes the foregoing doctrine and is a logical development of it. Only he can be a true apostle who has attained a true and proper union with Wisdom. The Incarnate Word will infuse into such a one His own sentiments and desires for the salvation of neighbor, and the soul will correspond to this by giving testimony of the love it bears. The apostolate is nothing other than the communication of that same Wisdom; it is a diffusion of truth permeated by love. The apostle, whose work is on the efficacious level of the supernatural, not only does not impoverish, but actually enriches himself, by communication.

Much of the figure of Lawrence Justinian remains still to be brought to light. Hagiographical works about him, from that of the Bollandists to that of P. La Fontaine, are defective because of their dependence on the first life written by Bernardo Giustiniani, the nephew of the saint; and complementary studies of importance, such as those of I. Tassi and G. Cracco, have been few. The same can be said of his spirituality, for the different authors have treated only of its collateral aspects, whereas the sapiential theme constitutes the central and personal element in Lawrence Justinian's mystical doctrine and in his teaching on the apostolate. He was canonized by ALEXANDER VIII in 1690.

Feast: Sept. 5 (episcopal consecration).

Bibliography: Biographical. B. JOANNES, De beato Laurentio Justiniano, primo patriarcha veneto, Acta Sanctorum Jan. 1 (1643) 551-563. A. REGAZZI, Notizie storiche edite ed inedite di S. Lorenzo Giustiniani (Venice 1856). P. LA FONTAINE, Il primo Patriarca di Venezia (3d ed. Venice 1960). B. GIUSTINIANI, Vita B. Laurentii Justiniani Venetiarum Proto Patriarchae, with Ital. tr. (Rome 1962). Special studies. G. CRACCO, "La fondazione dei Canonici secolari di S. Giorgio in Alga," Rivista di storia della chiesa in Italia 23 (1959) 70-88. S. G. MANTESE, S. Lorenzo Giustiniani priore del Monastero di S. Agostino in Vicenza, in Miscellanea in memoria ed onere di Mons. F. M. Mistrorigo 1 (Vicenza 1956) 719–757. I. TASSI, Ludovico Barbo (Rome 1952). S. TRAMON-TIN, S. Lorenzo Giustiniani nell'arte e nel culto della Serenissima (Venice 1956). S. Lorenzo Giustiniani, protopatriarca di Venezia nel V centenario della morte: 1456-1956 (Venice 1959). F. COLA-SANTI, San Lorenzo Giustiniani nelle raccolte della Biblioteca nazionale marciana (Rome 1981). On the writings of the saint. S. TRAMONTIN, Saggio di bibliografia Laurenziana (Venice 1960). A. COSTANTINI, Introduzione alle opere di S. Lorenzo Giustiniani (Venice 1960). N. BARBATO, Ascetica dell'orazione in S. Lorenzo Giustiniani (Venice 1960). F. DE MARCO, Ricerca bibliografica su S. Lorenzo Giustiniani (Rome 1962). G. DI AGRESTI, La Sapienza, dottrina di spiritualità e di apostolato in S. Lorenzo Giustiniani (Rome 1962). G. GEENE, Praerogativa Doctoris Ecclesiae in operibus S. Laurentii Justiniani (Rome 1962). S. GIULIANI, Vita e dottrina (Rome 1962). A. HUERGA, Presencia de las Obras de S. Lorenzo Giustiniani en la Escuela de la Oracion (Rome 1962). T. PICCARI, Note marginali al libello del dottorato di S. Lorenzo Giustiniani (Rome 1962). M. L. FAY, Episcopal Asceticism in the Thought of Saint Lawrence Justinian (Rome 1970). P. M. SPOLETINI, Il De contemptu mundi di s. Lorenzo Giustiniani (Rome 1971). G. M. PILO, Lorenzo Giustiniani: due imprese pittoriche fra Sei e Settecento a Venezia, San Pietro di Castello e Santa Maria delle Penitenti (Pordenonesi 1981), iconography.

[G. DI AGRESTI]

LAWRENCE OF BRINDISI, ST.

Capuchin preacher, doctor of the church; b. Brindisi, July 22, 1559; d. Lisbon, Portugal, July 22, 1619. He was baptized Julius Caesar, and after the death of his devout, middle class parents, William and Elizabeth (Masella) Russo, he was sent to Venice for his education. In 1575 he entered the Venetian province of the Capuchin Friars Minor, receiving the name Lawrence. He completed his ecclesiastical studies at the University of Padua, where he developed his great gift of languages by learning Hebrew, Greek, German, Bohemian, Spanish, and French.

Eminent Preacher. After his ordination in 1582, he preached with success throughout Northern Italy and beyond the Alps. Much of his effectiveness was due to his homiletic use of the Bible. Eleven of his 15–tome Opera Omnia contain sermons and homilies rich with scriptural allusions. To his vast audiences he strove to communicate his devotion to the MOTHER OF GOD. He extolled her Immaculate Conception, her Assumption, and other prerogatives with a splendor of thought scarcely ever heard before. The 84 sermons of his Mariale (Opera Omnia. v.1) employ the Bible, tradition, the Fathers, theology, and the liturgy to magnify her name, and form a complete, solid tract in MARIOLOGY.

Apostle and Diplomat. Between 1599 and 1602, and again from 1606 to 1613, he came to grips with militant Protestantism in Bohemia, Austria, and Germany. In these lands, he established the Capuchin Order and reclaimed numerous Protestants for the church. At Stuhlweissemburg (Székesfehérvár) in Hungary in 1601, he played a momentary but decisive role in halting the Muslim advance of Mohammed III. When appointed by Emperor Rudolf II as chief chaplain to the outnumbered and disheartened Christian forces, Lawrence rode before the army holding aloft the cross and urging his men to victory. It was his skill as a veteran diplomat that welded the Catholic League in 1610. In 1614 he was instrumental in achieving peace between Spain and Savoy. The journey that ended with his death was a mission to Philip III of Spain on behalf of the people of Naples, who were oppressed by their tyrannical viceroy P. Giron, Duke of Osuna. Lawrence escaped Naples disguised as a Walloon soldier, found the Spanish king at Lisbon, and was successful in his mission. It was in Lisbon that his last illness overcame him. His host, Don Pedro de Toledo, carried his body back to Spain, and interred it in the Church of the Poor Clares at Villafranca del Bierzo in the Diocese of Astorga.

Administrator. In addition to these activities, Lawrence was almost continuously a major superior, serving the order as provincial of Tuscany (1590–92), Venice (1594–96), Switzerland (1598), and Liguria (1613–16). He was commissary general in Bohemia and Austria (1599–1602; 1606–10), and Bavaria–Tirol (1611–13), as well as definitor–general 1596, 1599, 1613, and 1618.

When the chapter of Capuchins in 1602 elected him superior general for three years, the order had become one of the main forces of the Catholic Restoration, numbering 9,000 friars in 34 provinces spread throughout Italy, France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Spain. He visited most of these areas on foot, preaching to large gatherings en route. His permanent affect, like that of St. Bonaventure, was one of stabilization, as he strove to balance the rigor of primitive Capuchin life with the needs of the apostolate.

Author. The admirable edition of Lawrence's Opera Omnia, published by the Venetian Capuchins at Padua between 1928 and 1956, comprises ten volumes in quarto distributed in 15 majestic tomes. Characteristic of the work is its abundant use of sacred scripture based on a perfect command of the original tongues. His mastery of Hebrew was such that when Clement VIII appointed him preacher to the Jews, rabbis took him for one of their own turned Christian. His qualities as an exegete appear in his Explanatio in Genesim (Opera Omnia v.3), a literal exposition of the first 11 chapters of Genesis.

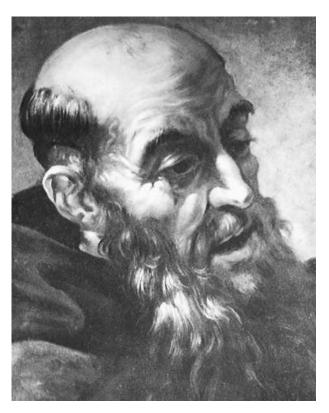

At Prague in 1607 he undertook his most extensive work, Lutheranismi hypotyposis (Opera Omnia v.2), to meet the challenge of the Protestant theologian, Polycarp Leyser. This original and thorough refutation of Lutheranism is important for its ecclesiology and first hand information about Luther's personal life and teaching. It was never published because of Brindisi's lack of leisure and Leyser's death. As a fair controversialist Lawrence refused to "fight against the dead and make war on shadows."

St. Lawrence served the church as scriptural theologian, popular preacher, missionary, polemicist, religious superior, and diplomat. His achievements in the post–Tridentine restoration of Catholicism earned him, in the words of Benedict XV, "a truly distinguished place among the most outstanding men ever raised up by Divine Providence to assist the Church in time of distress" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 11 (1919) 268].

Lawrence was beatified by Pius VI on May 23, 1783, and canonized by Leo XIII on Dec. 8, 1881. John XXIII declared him a Doctor of the Universal Church, March 19, 1959.

Feast: July 23.

Bibliography: A. DA CARMIGNANO, St. Lawrence of Brindisi, tr. P. BARRETT (Westminster, Md. 1963). J. HAAS, The Theological Significance of Some Biblical Symbols in the Mariale of St. Lawrence of Brindisi (Rome 1994), bibliography. A. M. DI BRENTA, "San Lorenzo da Brindisi Dottore Apostolico," In Santi e Santita nell'Ordine Cappuccino, trans. M. D'ALATRI (Rome 1980) 121–151. Saint Lawrence of Brindisi, Doctor of the Universal

St. Lawrence of Brindisi, oil painting by Pietro Labruzzi, at the Convent of the Capuchins, Florence-Montughi, Italy, 1610.

Church: Commemorative Ceremonies, v. 2 (Washington, D.C. 1961).

[T. MACVICAR]

LAWRENCE OF CANTERBURY, ST.

Benedictine(?) monk, second archbishop of CANTER-BURY; d. Feb. 2, 619. Probably already a priest, Lawrence accompanied St. AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY in the first Anglo-Saxon mission that arrived in Kent (597). Having returned to Rome, he brought additional missionaries to England in 601; and upon Augustine's death (May 26, 604 or 605), having already been consecrated by Augustine himself, he succeeded as archbishop. During his tenure there was a serious anti-Christian reaction c. 617, and reputedly he was restrained from abandoning England only by a dream in which he was scourged by St. Peter. Under his leadership there was no expansion of the Church in England and continued efforts to reconcile Celtic Christians to his authority proved fruitless. He was buried beside Augustine in the church of SS. Peter and Paul, Canterbury (ST. AUGUSTINE'S ABBEY).

Feast: Feb. 3 (Dioceses of Westminster and Southwark).

Bibliography: BEDE, Historia Ecclesiastica 1.27, 33; 2.4–7. A. W. HADDAN and W. STUBBS, eds., Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 3 v. in 4 (Oxford 1869–78) 3:61–70. W. BRIGHT, Chapters of Early English Church History (3d ed. Oxford 1897). F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947) 106–113, 125, 127. C. J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (New York 1962).

[R. D. WARE]

LAWRENCE OF DURHAM

Prior, writer; b. Waltham, England, before 1100; d. France, March 17, 1154. Sometime before 1128, Lawrence became a Benedictine monk at Durham, where he taught Aelred of Rievaulx (see AELRED, ST.; DURHAM, AN-CIENT SEE OF). His learning and holiness won him the office of precentor and, under Bp. Geoffrey Rufus (1129–41), that of chaplain palatine. The controversy following the death of Rufus in which Lawrence was exiled by William Cumin, usurper of the see, is described in his Dialogi. Having been recalled, Lawrence succeeded as prior of Durham in 1149. When the monks elected Hugh Pudsey as bishop in 1153, the choice was contested by HENRY MURDAC OF YORK, BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, and others, whereupon Lawrence and several other delegates went to Rome to petition the consecration of Pudsey. AN-ASTASIUS IV recognized Hugh, granting at the same time Lawrence's request for an indulgence for pilgrims to the shrine of St. CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE.

Bibliography: Works. Acta sanctorum Feb. 1:172–185; Dialogi Laurentii Dunelmensis, ed. J. RAINE (Durham 1880). M. L. MISTRETTA, ed., The Hypognosticon of Lawrence of Durham (New York 1941). A. HOSTE, "A Survey of the Unedited Work of Lawrence of Durham . . ." Sacris erudiri (1960) 249–265. Literature. C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 11:689–691. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 3:816–820. J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XIIe siècle 2:214, 220.

[M. L. MISTRETTA]

LAWRENCE OF RIPARFATTA, BL.

Dominican reformer and preacher; b. Ripafratta, near Pisa, Italy, March 23, 1373 or 1374; d. Pistoia, Italy, Sept. 28, 1456. He was a leading figure in the Dominican reform begun by Bl. RAYMOND OF CAPUA. When, under the influence of John DOMINICI, he joined the Dominican Reformed Congregation of Italy, he was about 23 years old and already a deacon. Professor of philosophy and theology at the priories in Fabriano and Pistoia for many years, he served also as prior at Fabriano (1411) and at Pistoia (1438). The opinion that at Cortona he was the novice master of St. ANTONINUS, Bl. Peter Capucci, Bl.

Fra Angelico (see FIESOLE, GUIDO DA), and Fra Benedetto, and that he served for a time as vicar-general of the Reformed Congregation, lacks documentary evidence. He was noted for his austerity and works of mercy, and was the counselor of St. Antoninus while the latter was bishop of Florence. PIUS IX approved his cult in 1851.

Feast: Sept. 28.

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum Oct. 1:42. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 3:671. S. ORLANDI, Il beato Lorenzo da Ripafratta (Florence 1956).

[R. M. BEISSEL]

LAWRENCE OF SPAIN

A native of the Iberian Peninsula; b. place and date unknown; d. Dec. 15, 1248. From 1210 to 1215 he taught at the University of Bologna, where he wrote his works. He studied Roman law under Azo. Although an expert in both laws, it is not certain that he taught more than Canon Law. Among his disciples were TANCRED of Bologna and probably BARTHOLOMEW OF BRESCIA. He is called Magister Laurentius and Laurentius Magister Scholarum in documents of the cathedral of Orense (Spain) of 1214, 1215, and 1218, where he was bishop from 1218 or 1219 to 1248. His activities both within and outside the Diocese of Orense are attested by local documents and by various bulls from Honorius III, Gregory IX, and Innocent IV that are addressed to Lawrence himself or mention him.

The following works, all still in manuscript, are known: (1) Apparatus to Gratian's Decretum (in a very poor manuscript tradition, since Lawrence's glosses are mixed up with those of other authors and much material not belonging to him carries his siglum). The Glossa Palatina (1210–15) is probably his work. Particular mention must be made of the Laurentiustype, that is, a large series of manuscripts of the Decretum from the 14th century, in which a great part of the contents of the Glossa Ordinaria is attributed to Lawrence. (2) Apparatus to the treatise De poenitentia of the Decretum, which was to become almost wholly a part of the Glossa Ordinaria. (3 and 4) Glosses on Compilationes I and II (before 1210). (5) Apparatus to Compilatio III (this must not be identified with the Seruus appellatur, as Gillmann alleged against Post, but with the Hoc non aduerto, as Nörr has shown). Although it is not certain that he commented on Compilatio V, it is quite possible that he wrote a gloss on the decrees of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), since a number of glosses with Lawrence's siglum appear in the apparatus of JOANNES TEUTONICUS. He is considered one of the most important figures in the classical period of medieval Canon Law (see DECRETISTS; QUINQUE COMPI-LATIONES ANTIQUAE).

Bibliography: A. GARCÍA, Laurentis Hispanus (Rome 1956), with bibliog. A. M. STICKLER, "Kanonistik," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1289–1302; "Laurentius Hispanus," ibid. 6:832. K. W. NÖRR, "Der Apparat des Laurentius zur Compilatio III," Bulletin of the Institute of Research and Study in Medieval Canon Law (Traditio 17 1961) 542–543. R. WEIGAND, Die bedingte Eheschliessung im kanonischen Recht (Munich 1963), passim. J. GRÜNDEL, Die Lehre von den Umstaänden der menschlichen Handlung im Mittelalter (Münster 1963). G. POST, "The So-called Laurentius-Apparatus to the Decretals of Innocent III in Compilatio III," The Jurist 2 (1942) 5–31.

[A. GARCÍA]

LAWRENCE OF THE RESURRECTION

(Herman, Nicholas), Discalced Carmelite lay brother and mystic; b. Herimesnil, Lorraine, France, 1611; d. Paris, Feb. 12, 1691. After 18 years in the army and some service as aide to William de Fuibert, treasurer of the king of France, he took the habit of the Discalced Carmelites as a lay brother in Paris. He remained there as a humble cook for 30 years, being relieved of this duty only because of blindness. He died in the French capital with a reputation for holiness.

The few writings that Lawrence left include only simple spiritual notes and a few edifying letters. After Lawrence's death, Joseph de Beaufort, vicar-general of the Diocese of Paris under Cardinal Noailles, gathered these spiritual notes, letters, and many unwritten sayings of the lay brother, publishing them under the title Abrégé de la vie . . . maximes spirituelles, lettres, etc. (Paris 1691). From this basic collection came: Maximes spirituelles (Paris 1693), and Moeurs et entretiens du Frère Laurent . . . avec la practique de la présence de Dieu (Chalons 1693). The fame of these writings was considerably diminished among French Catholics because Mme. de GUYON attempted to justify her illuministic theories with the writings of Lawrence; however, his prestige increased among Protestants, especially after the pseudomystic Pierre Poiret published the Maximes in Heidelberg in 1710.

Bibliography: N. HERMAN, La Pratique de la présence de Dieu (new ed. Paris 1934); Practice of the Presence of God, tr. d. ATTWATER (Springfield, Ill. 1962); Practice of the Presence of God, tr. d. d. D. CAMERON (Westminster, Md. 1945). FAUSTINO SGDA. FAMILIA, "Práctica de la Presencia de Dios por Fr. Lorenzo de la Resurreccion. Un poco de historia," El Monte Carmelo 34 (1930) 408–411.

[O. RODRIGUEZ]

LAWRENCE OF VILLAMAGNA, BL.

Franciscan preacher; b. Villamagna, Abruzzi, Italy, May 15, 1476; d. Ortona, Italy, June 6, 1535. He belonged to the noble family of the Mascoli whose members occupied positions of importance in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies during the 15th and 16th centuries. While still very young he overcame the violent objections of his father and entered the Franciscan Order at the Friary of Our Lady of Grace in Ortona. In the course of his theological training he showed himself a brilliant student. After his ordination he specialized in preaching, which occupied most of his remaining years. He preached with remarkable success in almost every city in Italy. His impassioned eloquence drew large crowds wherever he spoke, and he was generally acknowledged as one of the masters of sacred eloquence of his time. Several miracles were attributed to him during his life. He became ill while preaching the Lenten course at Ortona in 1535, died soon after, and was buried in the friary church there. The veneration tendered him by the faithful was confirmed by PIUS XI in 1923.

Feast: June 9.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum 15 (1923) 170–173. Acta Ordinis Fratrum Minorum 25 (1906) 127–130. G. D'AGOSTINO, Vita del B. Lorenzo da Villamagna (Lanciano 1923).

[C. J. LYNCH]

LAWRENCE O'TOOLE, ST.

First Irish archbishop of Dublin; b. near Castledermot(?), County Kildare, 1128; d. Eu, Normandy, Nov. 14, 1180. Lawrence (Lorcán O'Tuathail) was of the royal family Uí Muiredaig (which at that time had lost the right of succession); its patrimony was the southern part of Kildare, with stronghold at Mullaghmast. While yet a boy, Lawrence spent some time as a hostage with the notorious Diarmait Mac Murchada. He was committed to the care of the bishop of GLENDALOUGH, of which his grandfather, Giolla Comgaill, had been comarba Coemgin, or lay head. There, at the age of 25, he became abbot (1148–54). On the death of the bishop, Gilla na Naomh, Lawrence, then 29, declined an invitation to succeed him. But he was prevailed upon in 1162 to be consecrated the first archbishop of Dublin. The circumstances of his consecration marked a definite break with Canterbury.

As archbishop, Lawrence reformed the canons of Christ Church (Dublin) by introducing the Aaroasian rule, which he himself embraced. He was a fearless upholder of the rights of the Church. He attended synods at Athboy (1167), Cashel (1172), Dublin (1177), and Clonfert (1179), when many grave abuses were corrected. In 1179 also he set off for the Third LATERAN COUNCIL; when he stopped in England on his way to Rome, HENRY II made him swear not to infringe upon the rights of the English crown in Ireland. Lawrence, however, secured from ALEXANDER III papal protection for Dublin and its five suffragan sees and was appointed papal legate for Ireland. He played an important part as intermediary between the Irish and the Norman invaders in 1170 and 1171; in 1175 he negotiated the Windsor Treaty for Ruaidhrí O'Conchobhair, high king of Ireland. But he found it necessary in 1180 to return to England with the son of the high king to treat further on behalf of Ruaidhrí. This time he was ignored by Henry II and was forbidden to return to Ireland. When the king departed for Normandy, Lawrence followed him still hoping to make peace between him and Ruaidhrí. However, he died at Eu. He was canonized by HONORIUS III in 1226.

Feast: Nov. 14.

Bibliography: A. LEGRIS, Saint Laurent O'Toole . . . archevêque de Dublin (Rouen 1914). J. F. O'DOHERTY, Laurentius von Dublin und das irische Normannentum (Dublin 1934); "St. Laurence O'Toole and the Anglo-Norman Invasion," The Irish Ecclesiastical Record 50 (1937) 449-477, 600-625; 51 (1938) 131-146. M. V. RONAN, "St. Laurentius, Archbishop of Dublin: Original Testimonies for Canonization," ibid. 27 (1926) 347-364; 28 (1926) 247-256, 467-480. A. GWYNN, "Saint Lawrence O'Toole as Legate in Ireland (1179-1180)," Analecta biblica 68 (1950) 223-240. C. PLUMMER, "Vie et miracles de S. Laurent, archevêque de Dublin," ibid. 33 (1914) 121-186. J. RYAN, "The Ancestry of St. Laurence O'Toole," Reportorium novum 1 (1955) 64-75. D. FORRISTAL, The Man in the Middle: St Laurence O'Toole, Patron Saint of Dublin (Dublin 1988). J. HENNIG, "The Place of the Archdiocese of Dublin in the Hagiographical Tradition of the Continent," ibid. 45-63, esp. 54-59.

[C. MCGRATH]

LAWS, CONFLICT OF

Conflict of laws is a clashing of the demands of one law with those of another. Strictly speaking, no true conflict of laws is possible; and laws, like rights, are not subject to collision. This follows from the fact that law is a dictate or ordinance of reason, and right reason cannot contradict itself. When two laws are in apparent conflict, one will be more authoritative than the other; and the less authoritative law ceases to be an ordinance of reason and to that extent becomes, in effect, no law. In a case of apparent collision of laws, therefore, the conflict should be resolved by determining which of the conflicting obligations is superior to the other, and the superior obligation should be deemed to prevail and the lesser to yield before it. If it is impossible to discover which obligation is superior, a person can in good conscience give priority to whichever obligation he pleases, for the conflicting law in that case would be doubtful, and a doubtful law does not oblige.

When precepts in conflict pertain to different categories of law, the precept of a higher law prevails over that of a lower law. Thus, the natural law takes precedence over positive law, divine positive law over human law, and ecclesiastical over civil law. Although a conflict of civil and ecclesiastical law is possible, troublesome occurrences of it are infrequent under contemporary circumstances. Civil governments for the most part seek to avoid making laws regarding religious matters, and the Church abstains from legislation about matters that rightly fall under civil authority. In matters of common interest, the Church generally shows a willingness, when nothing essential to its mission is concerned, to negotiate and to compromise in order to avoid a conflict. Rights that the Church claims are not commonly urged in face of existing conflict of law, as, for example, in the case of the clerics' immunity from military service [Codex iuris canonici (Graz 1955) c. 120.3]. Where the civil law forbids the marriage of a man and woman of different races or declares such marriages to be invalid, ecclesiastical authority can generally avoid difficulties with the civil authority by not exercising its right to perform the marriage and by advising the couple instead to go to another state where the ceremony can be legally performed.

When conflicting precepts pertain to the same category of law, the general rule is that the more important, urgent, or necessary law rightfully prevails. Thus a law defending a greater good has priority of claim over a law defending a lesser good, and obligations in justice should take precedence over obligations arising only from charity, except in cases in which a neighbor is in extreme need. This does not mean that justice is greater than charity. On the contrary, justice is among the prime requirements of charity, and the urgency of its claims depends upon the fact that charity demands that they be respected. When justice and charity are opposed in a context such as this, the sense is that a claim based upon justice (and charity) is more exigent than a looser claim based only on charity.

Bibliography: B. HARING, The Law of Christ: Moral Theology for Priests and Laity, tr. E. G. KAISER, (Westminster, Md. 1961—) 1:227–285. R. F. BEGIN, Natural Law and Positive Law in Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 393; 1959). K. FUCHS, Lex naturae: Zur Theologie des Naturrechts (Dusseldorf 1955). J. FUNK, De jure naturali transcendente jus positivum (Kaldenkirchen 1947). J. A. MCHUGH and C. J. CALLAN, Moral Theology, rev. E. P. FARRELL, 2 v. (New York 1958) 1:284–294.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

LAXISM

The moral system according to which a person in a doubt of conscience about the morality of a certain course of action, may safely follow the opinion for liberty provided that it possesses any probability whatsoever. This system, or certain individual solutions logically following from it, found favor with a number of 17th-century theologians, such as Juan SÁNCHEZ, Tommaso TAM-BURINI, and Juan CARAMUEL. The fundamental principle of this system was condemned by Innocent XI in 1679. The condemned proposition read: "Generally, when we do anything relying on probability, whether intrinsic or extrinsic, however slight, provided it is not beyond the bounds of probability, we are always acting prudently" (Denz 2103). Many particular errors of laxism also were condemned by the Holy See in the 17th century (Denz 2021-25; 2101-67). No Catholic theologian accepts laxism today. This system is based on the idea that the law of God is something to be evaded, rather than to be lovingly observed when its existence is practically certain, as is surely the case when the opinion for liberty is only slightly probable.

See Also: MORALITY, SYSTEMS OF; DOUBT, MORAL; CONSCIENCE; REFLEX PRINCIPLES.

Bibliography: D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH (Barcelona 1945–46) 1:343. J. AERTNYS and C. A. DAMEN, Theologia moralis, 2 v. (Turin 1947) 1:101. H. NOLDIN, Summa theologiae moralis, ed. A. SCHMITT, 3 v. (Barcelona 1945) 1:234.

[F. J. CONNELL]

LAY CONFESSION

An avowal of sins, made to a layman (one in no sense in Orders), in order to obtain forgiveness. As a practice, it existed in certain areas and at certain times in the Church. Doctrinally, however, no authoritative teacher has ever held that the layman has the power to absolve sacramentally. Yet the practice showed high esteem for the value of confession in the process of repentance, that was still developing in those times. As a religious fact, lay confession pertains historically to three different periods, and to both the Greek and Latin Churches, although in different fashions.

1st to 4th Centuries. Not only deacons, but Christians without hierarchical rank sometimes acted as confessors. The laymen belonged to a class called "saints" (les spirituels); it was a kind of charismatic order, enjoying special graces and gifts, including the power to hear confessions, even to absolve (among many witnesses are Tertullian-Montanist, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen). This class, functioning alongside the hierarchy, was involved in an abusive practice, that may have developed out of a faulty interpretation of Jn 20.22–23. It at least paralleled a practice in some of the monasteries of the time, where the "saints" filled the role of confessor. However, during this period, for grave sins, the penitent was obliged to submit to the bishop in public penance.

4th to 13th Centuries. The proximate origin of lay confession in this period was twofold: originally, it was an extension of the monastic practice of confession, prescribed by both SS. Basil and Columbanus; later, it accompanied the doctrinal development of Penance: the obligation of confession gradually increased, as the burden of external penances gradually diminished.

The Greek Church. The bishop, always the principal director of souls, the confessor par excellence, delegated ordained priests to assist in the work. Oriental Christians added the requirement of clairvoyance and holiness to constitute a true director of souls. Confessors without priestly Orders began when the monks extended their work as spiritual fathers and confessors beyond the cloister. Probably earlier, but surely in the eighth and nineth centuries, the monks moved out among the people. Impressed by the monks' distinctive garb, celibacy (which the secular clergy had refused at Nicaea), and asceticism, the people turned to the monks enthusiastically for direction, confession, and even remission. The monks were judged the "saints" par excellence, and soon they completely replaced the secular clergy in the ministry of Penance. This abuse was complained of by Emperor Baudouin (13th century) and opposed doctrinally by Balsamon, but the monk confessors without Orders multiplied from the tenth to the 12th centuries at Alexandria, Constantinople, and Antioch.

The Latin Church. Here the practice dates from the 11th century. Previously, mortal sins were confessed to bishops and priests only. Although they always remained the only official ministers of the Sacrament, confession to laymen, in cases of necessity, was in general usage by the 13th century. Prime sanction came from Liber de vera et falsa poenitentia 10.25: "So great is the power of confession, that if no priest is available, confess to your neighbor" (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878-90] 40:1122). With the prestige of Augustine's name, the opinion won acceptance. Where previously the penitent was permitted (Lanfranc) to confess lesser sins (St. Bede, Raoul Ardent) to laymen, now he was said to be obliged to confess both lesser and grave sins (Lombard, Alain de Lille, St. Thomas in early writings) to a layman; St. Bonaventure held such a confession to be permitted, but not obligatory.

To this period belong several abuses that grew out of the practice. For example, Innocent III, in an apostolic letter, condemned and ordered the extirpation of the practice of certain Cistercian abbesses who preached publicly and heard the confessions of their subjects. 13th Century and After. Theologians asked, What is the value of a confession to a layman? Is it a Sacrament? All schools agreed that it was not formally sacramental, because it was made to one who could not absolve. With this reservation, it may be stated that the Augustinian school inclined to a sort of sacramental value; for St. Thomas it was sacramental in some way, but not completely; and for the Franciscans, not sacramental at all. Scotus, teaching that priestly absolution is the essence of Penance, questioned whether lay confession was even licit.

Its Disappearance. Lay confession disappeared because of three factors: (1) the nature of the Sacrament was better grasped and made explicit; (2) heretical teachers attempted to use the practice as an argument to claim the power of remission for all men (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 1260); and (3) the official action of the Church at the Fourth Lateran Council made annual confession to one's own priest a matter of precept (Enchiridion symbolorum, 810). The final blow came from the definition of the Council of Trent: there can be no sacramental character to any confession made to a layman (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1684, 1710). By the middle of the 16th century, the practice had already disappeared in Spain, although it continued to be mentioned in other places (England, for example).

See Also: PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF; CONFESSOR.

Bibliography: P. GALTIER, De paenitentia (new ed. Rome 1956). 186, 533. E. VACANDARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903—50) 3.1:838–894. P. BERNARD, ibid., 894–926. A. TEETAERT, La Confession aux laïques dans l'Église latine depuis le VIIIe jusqu'au XIVe siècle (Paris 1926).

[J. A. SPITZIG]

LAY CONGRESSES, AMERICAN CATHOLIC

Held in Baltimore, MD (1889), and Chicago, IL (1893), and attended by Catholic lay delegates from all over the U.S. for the purpose of considering various social problems affecting the Church. The Catholic Congress of 1889 was held on November 11 and 12 at the Concordia Opera House, Baltimore, in conjunction with the centennial celebration of the American hierarchy. The suggestion for such a convention of laymen came from Henry F. Brownson, son of Orestes Brownson; and despite the initial opposition of Cardinal James GIBBONS, who doubted the wisdom and timeliness of a congress, the idea quickly won the support of several members of the hierarchy, including Abp. John IRELAND OF ST. PAUL, Minn. William J. ONAHAN, chairman of the committee on organization, was assisted by the historian John Gilmary SHEA. Brownson was chairman of the committee on papers to be read at the congress. After a solemn opening in the Baltimore cathedral, about 1,500 delegates reassembled at the Concordia to hear 14 papers, including Shea's "Catholic Congresses," Brownson's "Lay Action of the Church," and Charles J. Bonaparte's learned address on "The Independence of the Holy See." Among the resolutions adopted at the congress were those denouncing Mormonism, divorce, secret societies, socialism, and communism. Catholic social and benevolent societies, the Catholic press, and Catholic education were commended; and the delegates pledged their loyalty to the pope and demanded temporal freedom for the Holy See. Finally, they agreed that a second lay congress should be held in Chicago during the Columbian celebration (1892–93).

The second Catholic Congress, which met in Chicago in early September 1893, was organized by Abp. Patrick FEEHAN of Chicago and William J. Onahan. During the three-day gathering, 18 papers touching on a variety of subjects, including capital and labor, Church and State, the independence of the Holy See, temperance, and Catholic education were read, but without discussion. The more prominent speakers at the congress included Gibbons, Abp. F. Satolli, Edgar H. Gans, Maurice Francis Egan, and George Parsons Lathrop. Resolutions similar to those of 1889 were adopted, but no plans were made for a third congress.

These two Catholic congresses, both of which were looked on with favor by the Holy See and a majority of the American hierarchy, foreshadowed a closer cooperation between the clergy and the laity in the U.S. Archbishop Ireland stated at the conclusion of the Baltimore congress that he hoped the hierarchy, heretofore unaware of the laity's potential, would put "so much talent, so much strong faith" to good use. Seventy-five years later, the bishops assembled at Vatican Council II debated Ireland's suggestion and through legislation reemphasized the interdependence of the clergy and laity within the Church's structure.

Bibliography: Souvenir Volume of the Centennial Celebration and Catholic Congress (Detroit 1889). J. T. ELLIS, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1952).

[J. Q. FELLER]

LAY SPIRITUALITY

Describing lay spirituality is a formidable task, not least because the very concept is in doubt. It has been asserted that lay spirituality is simply basic Christian spirituality sine addito and thus ought not be treated as a separate subject. Some have argued that there is not just one lay spirituality but many reflecting the diverse contexts of the lay vocation. For example, might not the married require a different spirituality than the single, the worker than the professional, the member of a lay ecclesial movement than a tertiary? Still others are hesitant to delineate a lay spirituality for fear of reviving past tendencies to treat laity as second class citizens and their spirituality as somewhat inferior to that of clerics and religious.

Despite these concerns, a convergence of ideas regarding lay spirituality has emerged since the Second Vatican Council. While there are diverse ways of living the lay vocation, some fundamental and unifying components can be identified. This article explores the foundations for a lay spirituality in the New Testament, reviews the historical data in order to see how lay spirituality has evolved, and discusses the impact of the Second Vatican Council and post-conciliar developments. By way of conclusion, some key elements for a lay spirituality in the twenty-first century are suggested.

New Testament Foundations. Although it is clear that Jesus instituted a structured community (Mt 16–18) and St. Paul described different roles within the body of Christ (cf. 1 Cor 12, Rom 12), the New Testament as a whole precludes the idea of distinct spiritualities for diverse members of the Church, and consequently any notion of a specific lay spirituality. The word laikos is not even found in the New Testament; rather the Greek substantive is used to describe an entire people consecrated to God through baptism who together become "a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people (laós)" (1 Pt 2:9). All the baptized, without distinction, are called to holiness.

The primordial and fundamental spirituality for all the baptized, according to the New Testament, is one of Christian discipleship. Through a continual process of conversion which manifests itself in conformity to Jesus Christ, the disciple seeks the Kingdom by doing the will of the Father (Mt 6:33), living the beatitudes (Mt 5:1–11), joining the community in celebration of the Eucharist (Acts 2: 46) and embracing an evangelical life of service to others (Mt 25: 35–36). This radical new life is brought about through the action of the Holy Spirit, enfolding the believer into koinonia with other believers (2 Cor 13:14) and the very life of God (Rom 5:5). This spirituality is for the laity; this spirituality is for every Christian who struggles with the tension of living in the world but being not of the world (Rom 12–13).

A Brief Historical Survey.

From the Early Church to the Middle Ages. The spirituality of the early Church was decisively informed by a dichotomy between the Church and world. Until the peace of Constantine (313), persecution and exclusion from civil society marked Church life. In a community characterized by internal cohesion against a hostile world, the model of sanctity for all the baptized was the martyr. Convinced that the End Times were at hand, these martyrs embraced a costly discipleship in imitation of Christ, identifying with his perfect martyrdom. Among the first martyrs were many laity, including Blandina (d. Lyon, 177 A.D.) and Perpetua and Felicitas (d. Carthage, 203 A.D.).

Notwithstanding the certainty that the world around them was vanishing, some of the early Christians grappled with how best to incarnate the Gospel in a pagan society. An early manifestation of this dilemma is found in the Epistle to Diognetus (c.150-200 A.D.): "Christians are not distinguished from the rest of humanity by either country, speech or customs. They do not live in cities of their own; they use no peculiar language, they do not follow an eccentric manner of life. . . . They reside in their own countries, but only as aliens; they take part in everything as citizens, and endure everything as foreigners. Every foreign land is their home, and every home a foreign land" (Epistola Diognetus V, 1-5 passim). This anonymous letter exhorts Christians to embrace their responsibilities in the world, "for God has appointed them to so great a post" (V, 9). They are to become for the world what the soul is to the body. Just as the soul animates the body, so Christians are called to bring the life of Christ to the world.

Mindful of the true source of their strength in God, Christians from the earliest time gathered on the first day of the week to celebrate Eucharist. Here again, the incarnational and eschatological dimensions of spirituality are united as the memorial of the death and resurrection of Christ is joined with joyous expectation of Christ's return. It was common to consider Sunday not only the first day of the week, but also the Eighth Day, for it was not only the beginning of time, but an anticipation of the festal gathering at the end of time (St. Basil, On the Holy Spirit, 27, 66; SC 17,484–485).

In addition to the Eucharist, early Church Fathers encouraged presbyters and laity alike to pray daily either alone or with others. Tertullian's treatise On Prayer (c. 198–204 A.D.), counsels every Christian to pray not only at the beginning and end of each day, but also at the third, sixth and ninth hours, and even at night. Further, he suggests that Christians pray before meals, before going to the baths, as well as when they entertain guests (chapters 25–27). The Apostolic Constitutions, written in Greek by a Syrian around 380 A.D., specifically instructs bishops to encourage lay participation in communal prayer: "When you teach, bishop, command and exhort the people to frequent church regularly, morning and evening every day, and not to forsake it at all, but to assemble continually and not diminish the Church by absenting themselves and making the Body of Christ lack a member. . . . But especially on the Sabbath, and on . . . the day of the resurrection of the Lord, meet even more diligently, sending up praise to God . . ." (Apostolic Constitutions, book II, 59).

To these directives, John Chrysostom (344–407 A.D.) and Gregory the Great (540-604 A.D.) added familiarity with the WORD of God. Chrysostom's reply to a skeptical lay person is telling: "You say, 'I am not a monk'. . . But in this you have made a mistake, because you believe that Scripture concerns only monks, while it is even more necessary for you faithful who are in the midst of the world" (In Matthaeum V, 5). Gregory makes a similar point in a letter (c. 595 A.D.) to the physician of the emperor who was too busy to read Sacred Scripture everyday. "What is Sacred Scripture if not a letter from Almighty God to his creatures? If you find yourself away on a journey and you receive a letter from the Emperor, . . . you would not go to bed, until you knew what the Emperor had to say to you. The Emperor of heaven, the Lord of all humanity and of angels, has written you a letter regarding your life. . . and you do not show any impatience in reading this letter. . . . Find a way every day to meditate on the words of your Creator. Learn to discover the heart of God in the word of God" (Registrum Epistola L. V, 46).

Even in this early period, a spirituality common to all the baptized nourished by the Eucharist, prayer and Sacred Scripture had to compete with an emerging wedge between the clergy and the laity. The first use of the word laikos is found in Clement's letter to the Corinthians with the enigmatic statement that "the layman is bound by lay ordinances" (40, 5). While scholars debate Clement's precise meaning, it is clear that the use of the term is isolated; it does not occur again until the mid-second century. By this time, the laity are distinguished from clerics in the writings of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (d. c. 215 A.D.), Origen (d. c. 254 A.D.) and CYPRIAN (d. c. 258 A.D.). By the beginning of the third century, this division becomes widely accepted, leading to both a distinctive lay spirituality and in some cases its denigration as inferior to that of the cleric.

In addition to the dichotomy between clergy and laity, the rise of monasticism, which itself began as a lay movement, had an adverse effect on lay spirituality. In the period after Constantine, the monk and the virgin replaced the martyr as models of Christian perfection. Although monasticism's positive and valid emphasis on virginity and fuga mundi as a spiritual path remains a vital gift to the Church, there was an accompanying negative proclivity to undervalue the married state and to suggest that Christian perfection for ordinary lay women and men consisted in an imitation, insofar as possible, of the monastic lifestyle.

Another line of thought detrimental to the idea of lay spirituality came from AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO'S (354–430) teaching on ORIGINAL SIN. In his anti-Pelagian writings, Augustine taught that Adam's sin was passed on from one generation to the next through the inordinate concupiscence intrinsic to sexual intercourse. Though Augustine's teaching is complex and needs to be understood in the diverse contexts of his writings, without a doubt, his works, as interpreted through the centuries, have cast a dark shadow on human sexuality and marriage. Since marriage is one key element that distinguishes most lay persons from the monk or virgin, the ideal of a common spirituality of all the baptized further recedes.

Notwithstanding these developments, one can find in Augustine positive and constructive contributions to lay spirituality. For example, precisely in his teaching on baptism, Augustine says, "Let us rejoice and give thanks: we have not only become Christians, but Christ himself . . . Stand in awe and rejoice: We have become Christ' (In Ioann. Evang. Tract. 21,8). This statement along with many others in the Church Fathers, especially those surrounding the preparation of catechumens and the mystagogical catechesis for the newly baptized, are significant resources for developing a lay spirituality firmly rooted in the sacraments of initiation.

The Middle Ages. Unfortunately, in the Middle Ages these treasures from the Church Fathers remained largely obscured. The canonist, GRATIAN (c. 1189) epitomizes a prevalent attitude towards the laity when he delimits two types of Christians: clerics (and also monks), involved in spiritual activities, and laity, consigned to temporal affairs. For Gratian, the lay state is a concession to human weakness for "these are allowed to possess temporal goods . . . They are allowed to marry, to till the earth, to pronounce judgements on men's disputes and plead in court, to lay their offerings on the altar, to pay their tithes: and so they can be saved, if they do good and avoid evil" (Corpus iuris canonici C. 12, q.1 c.7). This common outlook, when combined with the fact that most of the laity were uneducated, led to a minimalist approach to lay spirituality. Gradually, lay spirituality became coterminous with simply keeping the commandments. It must be said, however, that our access to the actual spiritual life of the laity during this time is obscured by the fact that the vast majority, being illiterate, had no means to leave their thoughts to posterity.

Yet here again there are counter-trends. Earlier, Charlemagne (r. 768-814), the first layman of the new empire, both lived and promoted a spirituality appropriate for the laity, emphasizing the relationship between prayer and the need for Christian formation (cf. General Monition of 789). Later, in the twelfth century, various lay movements that promoted chastity, simplicity, poverty and manual work became popular. These movements were sometimes prone to error, either by exaggeration or imprecise theological formulations which led to suspicion on the part of the institutional Church. Among them were the mulieres sanctae in the low countries, commonly known as the BEGUINES. These women lived a committed Christian life, either alone or in community, without entering a monastery or marrying. The development of lay confraternities like the Humiliati in Lombardy and of the Tertiaries connected with various mendicant orders provided new ways of living the lay vocation in the midst of the world. Some outstanding medieval lay saints include ANGELA OF FOLIGNO (c. 1248–1309), CATHERINE OF SIENA (1347-1380) and FRANCES OF ROME (1384-1440), though their status as laity is often neglected.

For those laity not connected with a particular counter-movement, the liturgical year provided a spiritual framework in which everyday activities were conducted. Liturgical feasts and fasts marked the turning of the seasons and proclaimed the sacredness of time. Other positive elements include popular devotions focused on the humanity of Christ, a profound reverence for the presence of Christ in the Eucharist, pilgrimages to Rome and the Holy Land, a greater accessibility to Sacred Scripture, and a more developed devotion to the Virgin Mary. Marriage, though still not fully appreciated as a path to Christian perfection, was at least recognized as one of the seven sacraments. In addition, all Christians of the age of reason were not only encouraged, but required to receive the Sacrament of Penance and the Eucharist at least once a year (cf. Fourth Lateran Council c. 21; Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta 221).

The waning of the Middle Ages brings a further development in lay spirituality. With increased literacy the laity were able to gain a new level of participation in the life of the Church. For example, in late medieval England, the popularity of Books of Hours or primers, monastic in origin, and devotional books allowed some lay Christians to take greater initiative in their own spiritual formation.

From the Reform to Modern Times. The Catholic response to the Protestant Reformation had both negative and positive consequences for lay spirituality. Negatively, an increased insistence on the hierarchical character of the Church relegated the laity to the lowest rung. Positively, however, many developments in the Counter-Reformation helped the laity discover God in their daily lives. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA'S (1491–1556) Spiritual Exercises, written when he was still a layman, brought spirituality out of its monastic confines into the heart of the world. The first spiritual treatise written specifically for the laity was The Introduction to the Devout Life written by FRANCIS DE SALES (1567–1622). His preface explains that "Nearly everybody who has written about the spiritual life has had in mind those who live apart from the world, or at least the devotion they advocate would lead to such retirement. My intention is to write for those who have to live in the world and who, according to their state, to all outward appearances have to live an ordinary life" (p. 1). Addressing himself primarily to noble women, de Sales insists that they too are called to holiness, to the fulness of Christian perfection, seeking the will of God in ordinary activities.

If Francis de Sales offered the first spirituality of the laity, Vincent Pallotti (1795–1850) offers significant insights into the mission of the laity. His spirituality, focused on Caritas Christi urgens (2 Cor 5:14), is rooted in the compelling love of Christ which draws all Christians, clerical and lay, to participation in the mission of the Church. Pallotti envisioned a universal apostolate as a collaborative and complementary effort uniting clergy, religious and laity.

Along similar lines, Vincent Pallotti's contemporary John Henry NEWMAN (1801–1890) sought to retrieve the biblical notion that every Christian has a vocation and mission. This idea is most beautifully expressed in a personal meditation: "God has created me to do Him some definite service: He has committed some work to me which He has not committed to another. I have my mission—I never may know it in this life, but I shall be told it in the next. . . . I am a link in a chain, a bond of connection between persons. He has not created me for naught. I shall do good. I shall do His work" (Meditations on Christian Doctrine, March 7, 1848 in Meditations and Devotions). Of course, Newman was fully aware that for laity to participate in the mission of the Church, greater attention to formation in the faith was needed. "I want a laity. . . who know their religion and who enter into it, who know just where they stand, who know what they hold, and what they do not, who know their creed so well that they can give an account of it, who know so much of history that they can defend it. I want an intelligent and well-instructed laity" (Newman, Lectures on the Present Position of Catholics in England, Longmans Green 1924, p. 390).

A layman who well fits Newman's ideal of an intelligent and well-instructed laity is Frédéric OZANAM (1813-1853), who served the poor as part of the Society of Saint Vincent de Paul. This married man and father juggled family commitment, active service of those in need, and a career as a professor. He demonstrated that it is possible for a committed lay person to live a radical evangelical life in the midst of the world. In a letter to his wife, Ozanam offers a vision of discipleship within marriage. "Then Providence led you into my path, and I offered you the sharing of a life poor, for long and perhaps ever obscure, but sanctified, ennobled by the cultivation of all that is beautiful. I offered you . . . the tenderness of a heart which had never belonged to anyone but you" (Letters, p. 357). Ozanam stands out as an exemplar of lay sanctity, although full appreciation of what lay holiness might mean will be delayed until the next century.

The Impact on Early Twentieth Century Developments on Lay Spirituality. For Catholic lay spirituality in the twentieth century all roads lead to and from the Second Vatican Council. In the first half of the century various trends of spiritual revival and theological reflection retrieved the biblical centrality of baptism and the Church as the People of God. This retrieval would have great and positive effects on a new appreciation of the lay vocation and mission. Careful attention to pre-conciliar developments reveals that the Second Vatican Council's teaching on the laity is as much a point of arrival as a point of departure. This becomes evident by tracing the insights into the lay apostolate developed in the teachings of Pius X, Benedict XV, Pius XI and Pius XII, especially with regard to CATHOLIC ACTION. Within theological circles, the great milestone is Yves Congar's Jalons pour un théologie du laïcat (1953). Also important were the effects of the liturgical movement and advances in Biblical scholarship. In sum, the emerging theology of the preconciliar period aimed at a more positive description of the laity, stressing that the lay mission comes directly from Christ through baptism. All of these elements will affect the spirituality of the laity as fostered at and after the Second Vatican Council.

Combined with developments in theology, the twentieth century has also seen the birth of various and diverse initiatives to promote lay spirituality, sometimes in the form of movements, new communities and associations. The Young Christian Worker Movement, begun in 1912 by the Belgian priest, Joseph Cardign, helps young working class men and women develop a spirituality that integrates faith and life through its threefold discernment process of see, judge and act. OPUS DEI, founded in 1928 by the Spanish priest Josemaría Escrivá, became a personal prelature in 1982. It proposes to help ordinary people discover paths to sanctity in their everyday life. Other movements or associations respond to specific challenges. Chiara Lubich's FOCOLARI movement, begun in 1943, seeks to overcome the modern sense of isolation by providing a communal experience of unity with God and others. Another effort to combat isolation, particularly intense for handicapped women and men, is Jean Vanier's L'Arche which began in 1964 and offers a community of love and healing. In all of their diversity, these various initiatives, of which only a few have been mentioned here, desire to promote a spirituality that acknowledges the universal call to holiness and encourage lay women and men to live an evangelical life in the midst of the world.

The Influence of Vatican II on Lay Spirituality.

The Twentieth Century renewal made itself felt in the Second Vatican Council's deliberations on how best to present the nature of the Church in Lumen Gentium. The monumental decision to begin with the whole people of God (Lumen Gentium 9–17) before reflecting on the hierarchy (Lumen Gentium 18-29) and laity (Lumen Gentium 30–42) sets the framework for a total ecclesiology which recognizes both the equality of all the members of the Church and the fundamental unity of the communio Christifidelium. While charisms, roles and functions differ, all the baptized share the same dignity and ultimate call to communion with the Triune God. The consequences of this approach for the spirituality of the laity are four. First, the laity are not relegated to the margins of the Church, but through their baptism enter into a life of communion that incorporates them into the Christ. Second, the lay state is presented as a genuine path to holiness and is in no way a concession to human weakness. Third, through baptism and confirmation the laity participate in the priestly, prophetic and kingly office of Christ, which is an expression of their vocation and mission in the Church and in the world. Finally, the dualistic notion that clerics and religious are concerned only with the sacred while the laity are concerned only with the temporal is rejected. The entire Church is called to be a sacrament of salvation in the world.

While firmly rejecting dualism, Lumen Gentium holds that the distinguishing mark of the lay vocation and mission is its secular character (Lumen Gentium 31). As the conciliar teaching unfolds, it becomes clear that the secular character is understood not merely as an anthropological or sociological reality, but as a profoundly theological reality. Lumen Gentium examines the existential situation in which lay people live out their baptism and respond to God's call. It is identified as primarily in the midst of the world—in the context of family life, work, civic responsibilities. These concrete situations of everyday life present opportunities for growth in holiness (Lumen Gentium 41) and are how the laity participate in the one mission of Christ. They are to become like a leaven in the world (cf. Lumen Gentium 31, AA 2).

The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, Gaudium et spes, encourages all Christians—laity, priests and religious— to see religious and temporal activities as one vital synthesis and to guard against a split between faith and life. Specifically, regarding the laity, the Council Fathers caution that those who neglect family, work and responsibilities in society place their eternal salvation in jeopardy (GS 43). Family life and faith are to be united, and work, far from separating one from Christ, is a path for living out one's baptism. (AA 4). This emphasis on the integration of faith and life is one of the key contributions of the Second Vatican Council to lay spirituality.

Post Conciliar Developments. Six post conciliar developments deserve mention. Foremost are the 1987 synod dedicated to the vocation and mission of the laity in the Church and the world, and the publication of the post-synodal apostolic exhortation, Christifideles laici (CL, 1988), by John Paul II. Christifideles laici is closely related to the two other post-synodal apostolic exhortations that followed it, Pastores dabo vobis (1992) and Vita Consecrata (1996). Taken together, they celebrate the diverse vocations in the Church in the context of an ecclesiology of communion.

The primary strength of viewing lay spirituality within an ecclesiology of community is the priority given to being before doing. The laity are described more in terms of who they are rather than what they do. This approach also emphasizes that the sacraments of initiation are an entrance into communion with the Triune God. The theme of communion has the further value of retrieving the Pauline insistence on the diversity and complementarity of the various charisms and ministries in the Church.

Another important theme of Christifideles laici is its promotion of a full integration of spiritual and secular activity. Using an image from the Gospel of John (John 14), John Paul II notes that, "the branch, engrafted to the vine which is Christ, bears its fruit in every sphere of existence and activity. In fact, every area of the lay faithful's lives, as different as they are, enters into the plan of God, who desires these very areas be the 'places in time' where the love of Christ is revealed and realized for both the glory of the Father and service of others" (Christifideles laici 59). Christifideles laici also makes explicit the paradigm shift that had already taken place in the documents of the Second Vatican Council. Instead of referring to the 'laity," Christifideles laici consistently refers to "the lay faithful," or "lay Christians"—Christifideles laici— those faithful who have been incorporated into Christ by baptism. Here, the lay faithful are not characterized by their relationship to priests, but by their relationship to the person and work of Jesus Christ.

Second, Christifideles laici recognizes not only the secular character of the lay vocation, but also the gift that lay participation in ecclesial activities has been to the Church (Christifideles laici 23). Already in the post-synodal exhortation, Evanglii Nuntiandi (1975), Paul VI stated that the laity "are being called, to cooperate with their pastors in the service of the ecclesial community, to extend and invigorate it by the exercise of different kinds of ministries according to the grace and charisms which the Lord has pleased to bestow upon them" (Evanglii Nuntiandi 73). Developing a theology and a spirituality that recognizes these legitimate ecclesial lay ministries is a major task for the twenty-first century.

Third, the pontificate of John Paul II has given great attention to the spirituality of marriage and the family, beginning with the apostolic exhortation, Familiaris consortio (1981). Taking up this challenge to develop a spirituality appropriate for couples and their families, a variety of institutes have emerged. What unites these initiatives is the conviction that the relationships between husband and wife, between parents and children, provide an authentic path for spiritual growth. In particular, the virtues traditionally associated with asceticism are here expressed in the mutual self-gift inherent in the struggles and joys of marital and family life. A deeper understanding of this relatively new area of lay spirituality will require an interdisciplinary approach that takes into account not only theological insights, but also philosophical, psychological and sociological data. Concomitant with this urgent need for a marital and family spirituality is the development of a spirituality of those who are single-whether through choice, widowhood or as a result of broken marriages.

Fourth, the rapid growth of ecclesial movements, associations and other more spontaneous groupings has opened up new contours of lay spirituality. Such diverse groups as the Cursillos de Cristiandad, Charismatic Renewal, the Neocatechumenal Way, Communion and Liberation and Worldwide Marriage Encounter witness to the desire of many laity to enter into a deeper Christian commitment with others who share the same vision. In addition to more formal movements and associations, small Christian communities, sometimes referred to as basic ecclesial communities, have flourished in various parts of the world, often among the poorest of the poor. These groups not only develop solidarity amongst their members through common prayer and reflection on Sacred Scripture, but also explore how GOSPEL values can transform society. Each ecclesial movement, association or initiative makes its own contribution to the development of lay spirituality and together they are a sign of the SPIRIT working to renew the Church. The Code of Canon Law provides guidelines for the various categories of associations in the Church (cf. canons 215, 298–329).

Fifth, there are recent attempts to promote a spirituality of the workplace. Since most lay women and men spend a major portion of their day in economic activity, the theological significance of human work must be considered. Work is embraced not exclusively for personal and familial needs, but also to serve society and to cultivate resources for the common good. A Christian spirituality of work accents the inherent dignity of labor, but does not define a person by his or her occupation. (GS 35, LE 26). A full approach this spirituality will aim to connect work, leisure and worship.

Finally, a survey of the twentieth century would not be complete without mentioning the renewed appreciation of martyrdom for lay spirituality. When the Commission for the New Martyrs published its findings in March 2000, among the 12,692 new martyrs listed were 2,351 lay men and women. These are representative of the countless unknown laity who died for their faith in this century. This development provides a needed corrective to past tendencies to identify radical discipleship almost exclusively with clerical or monastic models. Remembering those men and women who lived their baptismal commitment to the full can expand and enrich the spiritual landscape of the entire Church.

Towards a Lay Spirituality in the Twenty-first Century. In light of past developments, some guidelines for a lay spirituality in the twenty-first century can be ascertained. First, every consideration of lay spirituality begins with the conviction that all the baptized are called to radical Christian discipleship. Jesus is the paradigm of every Christian vocation and it is in conformity to Christ that one's relationship with the Triune God, with the Church and with the world, is discerned. Since to be a follower of Jesus is to be baptized into his life and death, there can be no second class Christians. The future of lay spirituality presumes the universal call to holiness by virtue of the sacraments of initiation.

Second, even within a new context, the traditional building blocks of lay spirituality provide a firm foundation. The laity, living out their baptism within the sacramental life of the Church, are challenged to experience the Eucharist as the font and summit of their spirituality. This celebration flows into a eucharistic way of life, a life lived in thanksgiving, praise of God and self-giving love to God and to others. This eucharistic way of life finds nourishment in prayer grounded in meditation of Sacred Scripture. The task, however, is to find creative ways to assist laity in rediscovering the centrality of the sacraments, Sacred Scripture and prayer in a fragmented and frenetic society where the link between faith and life is under constant threat.

Third, the secular character of the lay vocation is gaining in importance in the twenty-first century. The challenges of globalization, environmental stewardship and cultural diversity will require new ways to actualize the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Like the early Christians, the baptized of the future will be called not to abandon the world, but to transform it in light of the KINGDOM OF GOD. Theirs will be an incarnate spirituality, always supporting whatever promotes the dignity of the human person and courageously resisting all that is contrary to Gospel values. As followers of the Crucified One, the lay faithful must be in solidarity with the poor, promoting a faith that does justice.

Fourth, the future of Catholic lay spirituality is inseparable from Vatican II's irrevocable commitment to ecumenism and inter-religious dialogue. A mature spirituality strives for full visible unity among Christians, while celebrating the communio already shared through baptism. In addition, those living in religiously pluralistic societies are challenged to integrate the proclamation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ with respectful openness to neighbors of different religious convictions. With nonbelievers whose lives are often marked by ethical values and a sincere search for truth, the laity are called to embody a culture of dialogue.

Finally, since lay spirituality is no longer to be seen as a watered down form of monastic spirituality, new models of sanctity need to be promoted. Some past exemplars have already been mentioned in this article. The Church will benefit from more models of lay sanctity, including canonized married saints, recognized precisely because they bear signs of holiness in and through their lay vocation, as husbands, as wives, as mothers, as fathers, as workers, as politicians.

In conclusion, those exploring the potential of lay spirituality will encounter not only the burdens of the past, but the genuine riches of the tradition. The post-conciliar era has proved to be a springtime for the lay vocation, but whether the Church will reap the full measure of the harvest will depend upon laity taking responsibility in forging their own paths to sanctity. Too often in the past, family and work responsibilities have prevented them from carving out large block of sacred time and sacred space for spiritual activities. In reality, however, all time and space have a sacred dimension for they are shot through with God's presence. Salvation is worked out precisely in and through relationships at home, at work, and in the marketplace. The challenge in the twenty-first century is for laity to discover extraordinary grace ever active in their ordinary lives.

Bibliography: G. ANGELINI, et.al. I laici nella Chiesa. Collana di teologia pratica, 6. (Torino 1986). A. ANGEL, "Principios fundamentales para una teología del laicado en la Eclesiología del Vaticano II," Gregorianum 68 (1987):103-155. A. W. ASTELL, ed. Lay Sanctity, Medieval and Modern (Notre Dame 2000). A. "LAICO" BARUFFO, S. DE FIORES and T. GOFFI, eds. Nuovo dizionario di spiritualità, Cinisello Balsamo (Milano 1985). Y. CONGAR, "Laic et laïcat." Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, doctrine et histoire, M. VILLER, C. BAUMGARTNER, A. RAYEZ, eds. (Paris 1937–1994). Y. CONGAR, Lay People in the Church: A Study for a Theology of Laity, Eng trans. D. ATTWATER (London 1985). Revised and updated ed. of Jalons pour une théologie du laïcat (Paris 1964). Y. CONGAR, Ministères et communion ecclésiale (Paris 1971). Y. CONGAR, "My Pathfindings in the Theology of Laity and Ministry," Jurist 32 (1972)169-188. E. DAL COVOLO, F. BERGAM-ELLI, E. ZOCCA, M. G. BIANCO, Laici e laicità nei primi secoli della Chiesa (Milan 1995). I. DE LA POTTERIE, "L'origine et le sens primitif du mot laïc." Nouvelle Revue Théologique 80 (1958): 40-853. E. DREYER, "A Spirituality of the Laity: Yes or No," Spirituality Today 38 (1986) 197-208. L. DOOHAN, The Lay Centered Church: Theology and Spirituality (Minneapolis, MN 1984). L. DOOHAN, The Laity: A Bibliography (Wilmington 1987). E. DUFFY, The Stripping of the Altars: Traditional Religion in England 1400-1580 (New Haven and London 1992). J. DUPUIS, "Lay People in Church and World," Gregorianum 68 (1987) 347-390. K. J. EGAN, "The Call of the Laity to a Spirituality of Discipleship," The Jurist 47 (1987): 71–85. E. DIAZ, J. ANTONIO, La espiritualidad de los laicos en una eclesiología de comunión (Madrid 1992). A. FAIVRE, Les laïcs aux origines de l'Eglise (Paris Centurion, 1984). A. FAIVRE, "Naissance d'un laïcat chrétien: Les enjeux chrétiens d'un mot," Freiburger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Theologie 33 (1986) 391-429. J. FONTAINE, "The Practice of Christian Life: The Birth of the Laity," Christian Spirituality: Origins to the Twelfth Century, B. MCGINN, J. MEYENDORFF, and J. LECLERCQ, eds. (New York 1985), 453-491. W. H. C. FREND, "Early Christianity and Society, A Jewish Legacy in the Pre-Constantinian Era," Harvard Theological Review 76 (1983) 53-71. W. H. C. FREND, "Blandina and Perpetua: Two Early Christian Heroines," Les Martyrs de Lyon, Colloques Internationaux du Centre Nationale de la Recherche Scientifiques, 575 (Paris 1978) 167-177. W. H. C. FREND, "The Church of the Roman Empire, 313-600," The Layman and Christian History: A Project of the Department on the Laity of the World Council of Churches, ed. S. C. NEILL and H.-R. WEBER (Philadelphia 1963) 57-87. B. FORTE, Laicato e laicità (Genova 1986). R. GOLDIE, "Lay, Laity, Laicity: A Bibliographical Survey," The Laity Today 26 (1979) 107-144. R. GOLDIE, "L'Avant-Concile des 'Christifideles laici.'' Revue d'Histoire Ecclésiastique 88 (1993) 131-171. R. GOLDIE, From a Roman Window: Five Decades: The World, The Church and the Catholic Laity, (Blackburn, Victoria 1998). M. JOURJON, "Les premiers emplois du mot laïc dans la littérature patristique," Lumière et Vie 65 (1963) 37-42. C. O'DONNELL, "Diognetus, Epistle to" and "Laity," Ecclesia: A Theological Encyclopedia of the Church (Collegeville 1996). D. ORSUTO, "Discovering the Extraordinary in the Ordinary: Towards a Christian Marital Spirituality, INTAMS Review 7 (2001) 3-12. O. PASQUATO, I laici in Giovanni Crisostomo: Tra Chiesa, famiglia e città (Roma 1998). PONTIFICIUM CONSILIUM PRO LAICIS, "Movements in the Church" Laity Today (Vatican City, 1999). A. PREW-WINTERS, "Who Is a Lay Person?" The Jurist 47 (1987): 51-70. R. TAFT, The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West (Collegeville 1986). G. THILS, "Les laïcs: A la récherche d'une définition," Revue théologique de Louvain 19 (1988) 191–196. A. VAUCHEZ, The Laity in the Middle Ages, ed. D. E. BORNSTEIN, trans. M. J. SCHNEIDER, (Notre Dame and London 1993). K. WAAIJMAN, "Lay Spirituality," Studies in Spirituality 10 (2000) 5–20.

[D. ORSUTO]

LAYMANN, PAULUS

Canonist; b. Arzl, near Innsbruck, 1574; d. Constance, Nov. 13, 1635. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1594 after completing his juridical studies, and was ordained in 1603. He taught philosophy at the University of Ingolstadt until 1609. He taught theology in a house of his institute in Munich from 1609 to 1625, and Canon Law at the University of Dillingen from 1625 to 1632. He was acknowledged as one of the era's great experts in Canon Law and moral theology. His works number 35 and are enumerated in Sommervogel. The most important of these works, used as a seminary text through many editions until the 18th century, is Theologia Moralis in quinque libros partita (Munich 1625). His Jus Canonicum seu Commentaria in libros decretales (3 v., Dillingen 1666–98) was published after his death.

It has been falsely asserted that he approved extreme measures in the treatment of witnesses in witchcraft cases. This charge was based on the Processus juridicus contra sagas et veneficos, which was attributed to him. It has now been accepted that this was not his own work because of the more lenient measures he suggests in his Theologia Moralis and Jus Canonicum.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:1582–94. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (3d ed., Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:884–886. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici 1, v.1–5 (Mechlin 1928–); v.1, Prolegomena (2d ed. 1945) 1:537. E. JOMBART, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 6:366. F. X. WERNZ, Ius decretalium, 6 v. (Rome 1898–1905) 1:320.

[T. F. DONOVAN]

LAZARUS

The name of two men in the New Testament. The Greek form of the name, $\Lambda \acute{\alpha} \zeta \alpha \rho o \zeta$, is based on an abbreviated form of the Hebrew name, 'el'āzār (God has helped).

Lazarus of Bethany. He is mentioned only in John (ch. 11–12). He was the brother of Mary and Martha (the former distinct from St. MARY MAGDALENE) and a friend of Jesus (Jn 11.1–2, 11). Jesus had a special affection for him (11.3, 36), and often received hospitality at his house (Lk 10.38-40). Shortly before Our Lord's last visit to Jerusalem Lazarus died; when Jesus was informed of his death He delayed two days; He then came to Bethany and raised Lazarus from the dead, although Lazarus had been four days in the tomb (Jn 11.1-44). This resulted both in the conversion to Christ of many who had witnessed the miracle (11.45), and in the determination of the enemies of Jesus to do away with both Jesus and Lazarus (11.46–53; 12.10–11). Lazarus last appears at a banquet given in honor of Jesus (12.1-8), apparently the same banquet that Matthew and Mark place at the house of Simon the Leper six days before the Crucifixion (Mt 26.6-13; Mk 14.3-9). There is no trustworthy evidence on the later life or on the death of Lazarus. Some scholars [e.g., F. V. Filson, Journal of Biblical Literature 68 (1949) 83-88] have made futile attempts to identify Lazarus with "the disciple whom Jesus loved" of the Fourth Gospel, even though Lazarus was not one of the TWELVE, to whom the "beloved disciple" obviously belonged.

The Tomb of Lazarus. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

In his customary fashion John surrounds the Lazarus incident with symbolism. The raising of Lazarus from the dead is the seventh and last of the Johannine "signs." Jesus had shown Himself to be the light of the world by restoring sight to the blind (John ch. 9); now He appears as the life of the world by restoring Lazarus to life: "I am the resurrection and the life . . ." (Jn 11.25). Natural life is the pledge of the supernatural life that is bestowed by the glorified Christ after His own death and Resurrection. It is noteworthy that the Synoptic Gospels make no mention of Lazarus, although they describe other raisings from the dead (Mk 5.21–43; Lk 7.11–17;.)

Modern Bethany is called El-'Azariyeh, the Arabic form of the Latin word Lazarium, which became the fourth-century Christian name for the little village that gradually surrounded the church built above the reputed tomb of Lazarus.

Lazarus the Poor Man. In one of His parables (Lk 16.19-31) Jesus gave the name Lazarus to the man who lay sick and miserable at the rich man's gate, longing in vain for "the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table"; when both men died, Lazarus was borne by angels to ABRAHAM'S BOSOM, to dine at the messianic banquet table, but the rich man went to torments in HADES. This is the only New Testament parable in which a character is given a name. Perhaps Jesus did so here to show that Lazarus put his trust in God's help, as the name signifies. The rich man is popularly called Dives, which is merely the Latin word for "rich man." He is called Neues (Ninive?) in the early MS P^{75} , and Phinees in the Sahidic (Coptic) version. Despite the use of a personal name in this parable, the characters in it were obviously not historical. However, in the Middle Ages the poor man of the parable became St. Lazarus, the patron of beggars and lepers (known also as lazars).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1315. J. MICHL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:845–846. G. STÄHLIN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:246–247. P. RENARD, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX (Paris 1895–1912) 4.1:137–141. R. DUNKERLEY, New Testament Studies 5 (1958–59) 321–327. W. CADMAN, "The Raising of Lazarus," Studia Evangelica, ed. K. ALAND (Berlin 1959) 423–434. W. WILKINS, "Die Erweckung des Lazarus," Theologische Zeitschrift 15 (1959) 22–39. J. MARTIN, "History and Eschatology in the Lazarus Narrative," Scottish Journal of Theology 17 (1964) 332–343. H. J. CADBURY, "A Proper Name for Dives," Journal of Biblical Literature 81 (1962) 399–402.

[E. MAY]

LAZARUS THE CONFESSOR, ST.

Stylite and monastic founder; b. near Magnesia, 968; d. Mt. Galesius, Nov. 8, 1054. As a child Lazarus felt an attraction for the Holy Land and made several abortive attempts to go there. Finally he succeeded and at first took up the life of a solitary, then entered the monastery of St. Sabas near Jerusalem, where he was ordained a priest. In the neighborhood of Ephesus he founded three monasteries: one in honor of the Savior; another in honor of the Resurrection; and the Theotokos, or Mother of God, Monastery on Mt. Galesius. As a stylite living in a hut on a column near the monastery church, he directed the monastic life. He composed a rule for the monks, laying out their spiritual and temporal tasks, and insisted on special care for the poor and indigent. His vita was written by GREGORY II CYPRIUS; a second life was written by an unknown monk named Gregory in the 14th century (Biblioteca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. Halkin, 979).

Feast: Nov. 7.

Bibliography: Biblioteca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN (Brussels 1957) 979, 980, 980e. Acta Sanctorum (Antwerp 1643–; Venice 1734–; Paris 1863–) Nov. 3:502–608. H. DELE-HAYE, Les Saints stylites (Brussels 1923) 106–116, 131, 160. Synaxarium ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae. Propylaeum ad Acta sanctorum novembris, ed. H. DELEHAYE (Brussels 1902) 203–204.29, 211–212.43, 826.31.

[P. ROCHE]

LEA, HENRY CHARLES

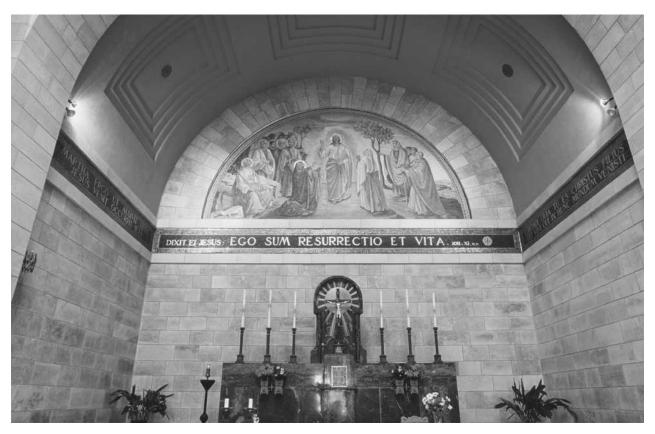

American Protestant publisher and historian; b. Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 19, 1825; d. Philadelphia, Oct. 24, 1909. He was the son of Isaac Lea (d. 1886), a distinguished scientist of Quaker descent, and of the Catholicborn Frances Ann Carey. He early displayed a remarkable diversity of interests, writing with equal facility in the fields of chemistry, biology, botany, modern and classical literature, and politics. But his reputation rests upon his historical works, written later in life, and dealing almost exclusively with the customs and institutions of the medieval Church. Lea tackled vast subjects with a breadth of conception, industry, attention to detail, and soberness of style that brought critical acclaim from scholars as distinguished and diverse as Lord ACTON, F. W. Maitland, and Bishop Mandell CREIGHTON, but his works are marred by a slipshod and confusing system of reference and by strong anti-Catholic prejudice. Although in part they remain of fundamental value today, particularly in the treatment of legal procedures, many facets of his historical writings have been superseded by later research. His chief works are An Historical Sketch of Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church (Philadelphia 1867; rev. and enl. ed. Boston 1884; rev. in 2 v. New York 1907), A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages (3 v. New York 1888; rev. ed. London and New York 1906), A History of Auricular Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church (3 v. Philadelphia 1896), A History of the Inquisition of Spain (4 v. New York and London 1906–1907), and The Inquisition in the Spanish Dependencies (New York 1908).

Bibliography: P. M. BAUMGARTEN, Henry Charles Lea's Historical Writings (New York 1909). E. S. BRADLEY, Henry Charles Lea (Philadelphia 1931), contains exhaustive bibliog. E. A. RYAN, "The Religion of Henry Charles Lea," in Mélanges Joseph de Ghellinck, S.J., 2 v. (Gembloux 1951) 2:1043–51.

[J. V. FEARNS]

LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE OF WOMEN RELIGIOUS IN THE U.S.A. (LCWR)

History. During the Holy Year 1950, major superiors from the entire world gathered in Rome to participate in the First General Congress of the States of Perfection. For women major superiors of the U.S.A. this meeting began a chain of events leading to the establishment of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious of the U.S.A., initially known as the Conference of Major Superiors of Women in the U.S.A. (CMSW). In 1952 the Holy See established a commission of General Superiors of Orders of Men and Women. The first committee for women religious in the U.S. planned the National Congress of Religious of the U.S.A., held in South Bend in 1952. That same year participants in the meeting also attended the First World Congress of Mothers General in Rome. All these events furthered the movement toward a national conference. In 1956 the first statutes of CMSW were adopted; the following year the first chairperson of the organization was elected. In 1959 the Holy See gave the Conference formal approbation.

Church mural showing St. Lazarus rising from the dead Bethany, Jordan. (©Hanan Isachar/CORBIS)

In the late 1960s and the early years of the 1970s the membership of the Conference of Major Superiors of Women Religious (CMSW) manifested, in striking contrast, the different viewpoints prevalent in the American Church on what constitutes authentic adaptation and renewal. The resultant tension between religious superiors of different theological orientations was one of the characteristics of the CMSW during these years. So sharp was the contrast that many believed both the role and existence of the Conference were in jeopardy. Movements among the rank and file of American sisters made the point that the formal organization of superiors, the CMSW, could not speak for the generality of the sisters. New organizations arose attempting to speak for sisters of all communities, the "grass roots," on questions of social and religious concern, in particular the National Association of Women Religious (NAWR). Another organization, the Consortium Perfectae Caritatis, was begun by superiors who believed that CMSW was promoting a form of renewal of religious life that they judged as dissonant from the directives of the Church.

In an effort to clarify its nature and purpose, the Conference initiated a project known as the Sisters Survey. Through a questionnaire disseminated in 1967, data were collected on: the changing structures of religious orders; preferred apostolic services, life styles and theologies; and participation in adaptation/renewal processes after Vatican II. Participating in the study were 139,000 sisters, from 301 different congregations. In 1969, it commissioned a thorough managerial study of the organization. This study became the occasion of extended dialogue among the membership on the objectives of the Conference as well as on the most effective structures to attain these purposes.

As a result of this study the Conference was reorganized in 1971 and a number of new committees were created. The superiors, expressing a different concept of their role, voted to change their corporate title to Leadership Conference of Women Religious (LCWR). Associate membership status was granted to representatives of a number of national organizations. The bylaws of LCWR were revised in 1971 to reflect these changes and were approved by the Sacred Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes in 1972. In 1989 the bylaws were again revised and again approved by the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life (CICLSAL). Although LCWR worked hard for several years to resolve the internal tensions resultant upon conflicting theologies of religious life represented by the membership, the dissenting superiors formed a separate group. They requested and received recognition in 1992 from the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life (CICLSAL) as the Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious (CMSWR).

Structure and Organization. The Conference, as an organization with pontifical status, exercises moral power in relationship to its members. The autonomy of each congregation is preserved. The Conference possesses authority sufficient for its organizational purposes. Membership in the LCWR is open to the chief administrative officers of all institutes, provinces and regions of women religious in the U.S. and territorial possessions. The current membership is drawn from approximately 300 congregations. The primary purpose of the Conference is to "promote a developing understanding and living of religious life" in three areas: (1) assisting members "personally and communally to carry out more collaboratively their service of leadership in their congregations in order to accomplish further the mission of Christ in today's world"; (2) "fostering dialogue and collaboration among religious congregations within the Church and the larger society"; and (3) collaborating with "groups concerned with the needs of society, thereby maximizing the potential of the Conference for effecting change" (Bylaws Art. II, Section 1).

Organizationally the LCWR is divided into 15 geographic regions. The members gather annually in national assembly, which constitutes the legislative body of the Conference. Between assemblies a national board and the executive committee of that board govern the LCWR. The board is composed of five national officers, one representative from each region and the executive director.

Henry Charles Lea. (Archive Photos)

The Conference is administered by a national secretariat located in Silver Spring, Maryland. The LCWR works in close collaboration with the Conference of Major Superiors of Men (CMSM). It maintains liaison relationships with various committees of the NCCB/USCC as well as with a number of other national organizations that share similar values and goals. As a symbol of its concern for the world community and its need to know that community, the LCWR has secured nongovernmental status through the Office of Public Information at the United Nations.

Projects and Activities. From its inception the LCWR has manifested five priorities in its programs and activities: the development of an apostolic spirituality which sees religious as vitally involved in the mission of the Church, action for justice, the fullest participation of women in ecclesial and civic life, the promotion of leadership and collaboration with other groups of similar orientation. LCWR emphasizes three goals as expressions of its enduring priorities: to develop effective religious leadership, to foster a transformed religious life and to articulate our evolutionary understanding of its underlying spirituality, and to collaborate with others in effecting systemic change for justice. In addition to concern for the growth and development of communities of American women religious, the LCWR has devoted much of its energy and resources to promoting service to the needs of the world. Together with a continuing commitment to traditional ministries of education and health care, LCWR has given increased attention to newer ministries for women religious, such as the parish team ministry, better housing conditions, service to the migrant workers or campus ministries. The LCWR also continues its commitment to supporting a fuller role for women and their gifts in service to the Church and to the world, in keeping with calls from the U.S. bishops and from Pope John Paul II.

Over the years the LCWR has maintained relationships with CICLSAL through an annual meeting. They have related as well with the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB) and with the American Conference of Major Superiors of Men (CMSM) through a variety of structures. Initially relationships were through liaison committees. In 1988 after two years of planning, a "mixed commission" of bishops, CMSM representatives and LCWR representatives was established as the Tri-Conference Commission. Each organization had five members. The purpose of the Commission was to assist and advise all three conferences by coming together for consultation and collaboration on issues and programs of mutual interest. The group also served as the board for the National Religious Retirement Office (NRRO). With the recognition of CMSWR as a canonical body, the LCWR initiated an invitation to them to join the Commission. The newly expanded and renamed commission held its first meeting in November 1994 as the Commission on Religious Life and Ministry.

Bibliography: Bylaws of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious of the United States of America (Washington, D.C. 1972). L. A. QUINONEZ, New Visions, New Roles: Women in the Church: Leadership Conference of Women Religious of the United States (Washington, DC 1975). M. M. MODDE, A Canonical Study of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious (LCWR) of the United States of America (J.C.D. dissertation, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. 1977). F. R. ROSENBERG, Women and Ministry: A Survey of the Experience of Roman Catholic Women in the United States: A Project Undertaken for the Ecclesial Role of Women Commission of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious (Washington, DC 1980). The Role of U.S. Religious in Human Promotion: A Joint Project of the Conference of Major Superiors of Men, and of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious (Washington, DC 1984).

[M. D. TURNER/P. M. BOYLE/S. DELANEY]

LEAGUE, THE HOLY

French leagues were religious and political organizations designed as a countermeasure to the Reformation. They started on a local basis to oppose and combat more effectively the action of the HUGUENOTS. Early Catholic leagues, formed in Toulouse (1563), Angers (1565), Dijon (1567), Bourges, and Troyes (1568), were restricted to the towns and composed of royalist burghers. The movement was taken over by the nobility in 1576 with the formation of the Sainte Ligue. In the formulation of the League's program the decisive event was the Treaty of Beaulieu ("Peace of Monsieur") of May 6, 1576. Marshal d'Humières, governor of Peronne, Roye, and Montdidier—who organized in Picardy the first league to be dominated by the aristocracy—refused to give Peronne to Henry, Prince of Condé, one of the Huguenot leaders, who had been appointed governor of Picardy under the terms of the treaty. D'Humières's goal was not simply defense of the Catholic religion, but also revolt against royalty. Outside the province the movement was spread by the lawyer Pierre David and the Jesuit Jean Mathieu; in Paris it was organized by Pierre Hennequin and the Des Labruyère (father and son). Despite the official declaration of obedience to Henry III, who became the nominal chief of the League, its most zealous new recruits were antiroyalist. The League became a tool of the nobles, who were intent on promoting their own ends at the expense of the crown.

Leadership of the Duke of Guise. The first public action of the League took place at the first States-General at Blois (November to December 1576) when both the nobility and the clergy demanded revocation of the Treaty of Beaulieu and the suppression of heresy by armed force. Henry III capitulated by passing the Edict of January (1577) and joining the League. During the two wars of religion between 1576 and 1580 his influence and authority in the Catholic camp rapidly diminished: Henry, Duke of GUISE, became the real leader of the Catholic party and set his sights on the throne of France. It became the League's aim to depose the House of Valois. Its members were afraid that Henry III might appoint Henry de Navarre, a Huguenot, as his successor. A secret committee of five (expanded to 16 in early 1587) was formed in Paris; its members were concerned with pro-League propaganda, the recruitment of adherents, the arming of Parisians, and the establishment of links with the major French towns. Cardinal de Bourbon was declared the League's official candidate for the throne. Henry de Guise, with the League's strong backing—his strongest support came from extremist elements within the party turned to foreign alliances (one of the chief reasons for the League's later demise) and concluded a formal alliance with PHILIP II OF SPAIN (Treaty of Joinville, 1584). The purpose of the alliance was to destroy heresy in France and the Netherlands, and upon the death of Henry III to crown Cardinal de Bourbon. Guise's reputation was further enhanced during the eighth war of religion (1585–89) in which he personally defeated German troops at Vimory and at Auneau in 1587 (see WARS OF RE-LIGION). The war was a series of successes for the League: these included the taking of a number of fortified towns in the east (Metz, Toul, Verdun, etc.) to bar a possible Protestant invasion from abroad. By the Treaty of Nemours (July 1585) Henry III surrendered to the League, canceling all previous measures of toleration. The only major defeat suffered by the League was at the battle of Coutras (Oct. 20, 1587) in which Joyeuse was beaten by Navarre.

Defying the king's orders, on May 9, 1588, Guise went to Paris (where he was acclaimed "King of Paris") to press him to introduce into France the Inquisition and the decrees of the Council of Trent (1545–63). The latter rejected all forms of compromise between Protestantism and Catholicism. The 30,000 men mustered by the League, and kept in readiness to support Guise's claims against the royalty, were ready to destroy the 6,000 Swiss soldiers called into the city by the King on May 12 ("Day of the Barricades"). Henry III fled to Chartres and through the Edict of Union (July 10) made far-reaching concessions: he granted places of surety to the Leaguers, made Guise lieutenant general of the kingdom, and promised to call the States-General.

Dual Character of the League. The second States-General, held at Blois (September to December 1588), was entirely dominated by the League; the overall national interest was to be sacrificed to the religious need, and the king was to yield to the representatives of the people. The dual character of the League was thus revealed: a religious movement against Protestantism combined with a joint reaction of aristocratic and democratic elements against royal absolutism. Humiliated and angered by the States-General, Henry III broke with the League and had Henry de Guise and his brother Charles murdered (Dec. 23 and 24, 1588). Taking over the League, the Duke of Mayenne assumed the presidency of its general council, consisting of 40 members. He received financial aid from Philip II of Spain and sought the support of Rome. The League ruled Paris in open revolt against the monarchy. Henry III, in alliance with Henry de Navarre, was about to begin the siege of Paris when he was assassinated by Jacques Clément (Aug. 2, 1589). The royalist army recognized Navarre as heir to the throne; all patriotic elements acclaimed him as the national leader. He soon fostered an alliance between the Huguenots and the moderate Catholics against the Leaguers. The latter, refusing to recognize him as Henry IV, proclaimed the aged Cardinal de Bourbon as Charles X (1590). A division within the League followed: some wanted Mayenne as successor to the throne; others backed Philip II, who claimed the throne on behalf of his daughter Isabella, offspring of his marriage with Elizabeth de Valois; some supported Charles Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy. The League vigorously opposed Henry IV while he was reconquering the country and, despite Henry's victories—he defeated Mayenne at Arques (September 1589) and at Ivry (March 1590)—had some successes.

Decline in Power. Henry IV's final victory at the siege of Paris was delayed by Alexander Farnese, Duke of Parma, one of Philip II's generals. Combining forces with Mayenne, Farnese managed to break the blockade and bring provisions into the city. During Mayenne's absence from Paris, the government of Sixteen took violent measures, killing some members of the parlement and terrorizing the politiques by drawing up proscription lists. Upon his return, Mayenne had four of the Sixteen executed; others went into hiding and the revolutionary government of the League in Paris came to an end. Cardinal de Bourbon died in 1591. At the States-General in 1593, an attempt was made to deal with the question of succession. The assembly rejected the candidature of Isabella of Spain on the ground of the Salic law. The solution was offered by Henry IV, who abjured the reformed religion at Saint-Denis (July 25, 1593). The great majority of Catholics declared themselves on his side; among the first towns to do so were Meaux, Pontoise, Orléans, Bourges, and Lyon. Charles de Cossé, Count of Brissac, governor of Paris, having received a gift of 200,000 livres and a marshal's baton, led the king into the city on March 22, 1594. Gifts amounting to 32 million livres bought the allegiance of the dukes of Mayenne, Guise, Elbeuf, Nemours, Epernon, and Joyeuse. The League melted away. In September 1595 Henry IV was granted the papal absolution. Only the Duke of Mercoeur resisted the king in Brittany until March 1598.

Bibliography: M. WILKINSON, A History of the League or Sainte Union 1576–1595 (Glasgow 1929). I. V. LUCHITSKII, Documents inédits pour servir à l'histoire de la Réforme et de la Ligue (Paris 1875). P. LE ROY et al., Satyre Ménippée de la vertu du Catholicon d'Espagne . . . (Paris 1594), a contemporary parody of the States-General of 1593. H. DE L'ÉPINOIS, La Ligue et les papes (Paris 1886). P. ROBIQUET, Paris et la Ligue sous le règne de Henri III (Paris 1886). C. LABITTE, De la démocratie chez les prédicateurs de la Ligue (2d ed. Paris 1865). S. GOULART, ed., Mémoires de la Ligue. . . , rev. C. P. GOUJET, 6 v. in 4 (Amsterdam 1758).

[W. J. STANKIEWICZ]

LEANDER OF SEVILLE, ST.

Bishop and organizer of the Spanish Church; b. probably Cartagena, Spain; d. Seville, c. 600. Leander (Leandro) was the older brother of three other saints, FLORENTINA; FULGENTIUS, later bishop of Écija; and ISI-DORE, whose education he personally supervised. He became a monk and was chosen (c. 577) to be archbishop of Seville. For 20 years he was the most important ecclesiastic in Spain. He persuaded the Arian King Leovigild's two sons, HERMENEGILD (c. 579) and Reccared (587), to embrace the Catholic faith. In 589 he presided over the Third Council of TOLEDO, at which the Visigoths officially embraced Catholicism. Leovigild had forced Leander to leave Spain (579–80) because of the part he had played in the conversion of Hermenegild, but whether Leander approved of Hermenegild's rebellion against his father is uncertain. He spent his years of exile at Constantinople, where he met the future pontiff, GREGORY I THE GREAT, and urged him to write his Moralia, or commentary on Job. The two corresponded in later years, and Gregory sent the pallium to Leander, the first bishop in Spain to receive this privilege.

Only two of Leander's writings are extant: the sermon he preached at the Third Council of Toledo, in which he expressed the joy of all at the end of religious disunity in the country, and De institutione virginum, written at the request of his sister Florentina. The latter is concerned with the virtues that nuns should practice and the dangers they should avoid. It is one of the gems of medieval ascetical literature.

Feast: Feb. 27.

Bibliography: LEANDER OF SEVILLE, De institutione virginum, ed. A. C. VEGA (Escorial 1948). U. DOMÍNGUEZ, Leandro de Sevilla y la lucha contra el arrianismo (Madrid 1981). L. NAVARRA, Leandro di Siviglia: profilo storico-letterario (L'Aquila 1987). Leandri Hispalensis episcopi, De institutione virginum et contemptu mund: léxico latino-español, ed. M. MARTÍNEZ PASTOR et al. (Hildesheim 1998). B. ALTANER, Patrology (Span. ed.) appendix 14–15. A. C. VEGA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:847–848. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:432–433.

[S. J. MCKENNA]

LEBANON, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Lebanese Republic is located in the Middle East, and is bordered on the north and east by Syria, on the southeast by the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights, on the south by Israel and on the west by the Mediterranean Sea. Two Mountain ranges dominate the region, separated by the fertile Al Biqa' valley. In medieval times the mountains served as a refuge for religious minorities, such as the Maronites in the north and the Druzes in the south, as well as for political dissidents, their rugged heights discouraging communication with the East while the sea invited contact with the West. In antiquity the slopes of Mt. Lebanon provided fir, pine, cedar and other hardwood trees sought by Egyptian pharaohs and Assyrian emperors for building palaces, temples and boats in their treeless lands. The offshore waters of Tyre and Sidon yielded murex, the source of the precious purple dye that gave the Phoenicians ("purple red") their Greek name.

Gaining its political independence from the French in 1943 under a mandate from the League of Nations, Lebanon maintained social and political stability during the mid-20th century. In 1975 the region was engulfed by civil war, which continued for 16 years before ending in 1991 with the Ta'if Accord. While Israel, Syria and Damascus continued to maintain a military presence in the region, Lebanon attempted to return to relative stability, resuming multiparty elections and attempting to restore its weakened economy.

Early History. While maintaining their Semitic identity under Egyptian, Assyrian, Neo-Babylonian and Persian suzerainties, the Lebanese became Hellenized c.350 B.C. Christianity reached southern Lebanon during Jesus's lifetime, and Christ Himself reached the district of Tyre and Sidon (Mt 15.21). Returning from Greece c. A.D. 56, St. Paul landed at Tyre, where stood an established church that some consider to be the earliest church in Lebanon. That of Sidon, where Paul stopped on his way to Rome, evidently came next. Books of martyrs abound with names of Lebanese victims of persecution. Emperor Constantine's conversion to Christianity resulted in the demolition of the temple at Afqah and the conversion of the temple of Hadad (Jupiter) at Baalbek (Heliopolis) into a church. Throughout the Roman-Byzantine period Lebanon enjoyed relative peace and security under the Pax Romana, while benefitting from participation in a worldwide market. This was reflected in increased population—hitherto limited to the maritime lowlands, which spread inland and attained a new densi-

Arab conquests began in 633 and engulfed the entire region, except for the mountains. While Arabic quickly spread, it did not displace the Aramaic dialect of Syriac in some areas until the 17th century; the dialect was still in use in Maronite liturgy in 2000. Beginning in the mid-7th century Mu'āwiyah, founder of the UMAYYAD dynasty and his successors paid a weekly subsidy to Christian bands in north Lebanon that eventually evolved into the Maronite community. These Christians provided the first Crusaders with guides and later furnished the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem with a contingent of archers. When Muslim rule returned in the 13th century, such acts would receive retribution, as Mameluke sultans ravaged the community and decimated its population. After the Crusades neighboring Syria and Palestine adopted a generally Muslim aspect. In 1584 Pope Gregory XIII established a special college in Rome for Maronite clergy.

The Druzes entered southern Lebanon in about 1020 as dissident Muslims and spread northward, where Fakhr-al-Dīn II al-Ma'nī and Bashīr II al-Shihābi ruled almost independently. The Maronite-Druze wars fought from 1842 to 1860 resulted in an autonomous Lebanon under a Christian Ottoman governor-general. World War I ended this privileged status, and World War II ended the French mandate. By the early 20th century a number of Eastern Patriarchs, including the Maronite, Syrian Catholic, Armenian Catholic and Armenian Orthodox, had their principal residences in Lebanon.

Bibliography: H. LAMMENS, La Syrie: Précis historique, 2 v. (Beirut 1921). N. A. ZIADEH, Syria and Lebanon (New York 1957). A. H. HOURANI, Syria and Lebanon (New York 1946). P. K. HITTI, Lebanon in History (2d ed. New York 1962). R. RISTELHUEBER, Les Traditions françaises au Liban (2d ed. Paris 1925).

[P. K. HITTI]

In 1943 the Lebanese Republic was born, and for three decades thereafter peace and prosperity characterized the region. Christians and Muslims shared equal political power and ecumenical dialogue between all faiths continued to take place. Universities and seminaries, long the center for Christian intellectual activity, trained many of the clergy, not only for Lebanon but for other countries in the Middle East as well. The University of St. Joseph of Beruit, administered by the Jesuits and the University of the Holy Spirit of Kalik, administered by the Order of Lebanese monks, both with pontifical faculties, continued to flourish. Publishing houses in Lebanon produced liturgical texts, catechetical resources and works of theology.

War in the Middle East. While Lebanon's stable political situation and strategic location aided its economic growth and gained it influence within the Middle East, problems soon surfaced. Over time the government fell into the hands of conservative Christians, leaving the substantial Muslim population without political representation and influenced by the growing tide of Islamic fundamentalism. Balancing the interests of so many religious communities and cultures was bound to suffer serious strain under the tensions prevalent in the Middle East.

As the Arab-Israeli conflict escalated to the south, thousands of Palestinian Muslims crossed the border north into Lebanon, among them heavily armed militants who used Lebanon to stage attacks on Israel. In 1958 U.S. troops landed in Beirut to break up a Muslim rebellion. Finally, in April of 1975 civil war broke out between the Christian militia and Muslim groups supporting the Palestinian cause, resulting in the deaths of thousands of Christians and the loss of homes, churches, schools, convents and monasteries. In addition, several hundred thousand Christians were forced to flee from the region.

Capital: Beirut.
Size: 3,799 sq. miles.

Population: 3,578,100 in 2000. Languages: Arabic, French, English.

Religions: 1,073,420 Catholics (30%), 2,218,400 Muslims

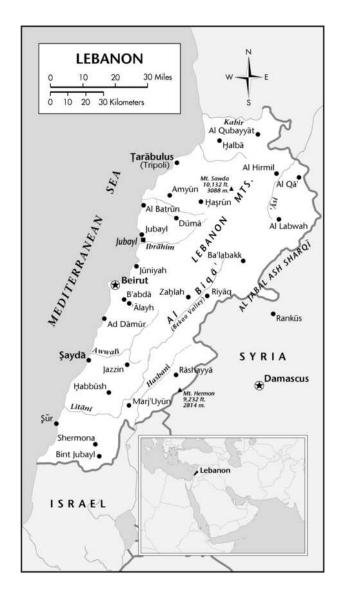

(62%), 286,280 Protestants (8%).

Ecclesiastical organizations: The Latin-rite Church in Lebanon has an apostolic vicariate in Beirut. In addition, a number of Eastern churches in communion with Rome are present in the region. The Maronite Catholic Church has a patriarchate at Antioch, archeparchies at Antélias, Beirut, Tripoli, and Tyre, and eparchies at Baalbek-Deir el-Ahmar, Batrun, Jbeil, Joubbé-Sarba and Jounieh, Saida, and Zahleh. A patriarchate for the Armenian Catholic Church is located in Cilicia, with an eparchy in Beirut. The Greek Melkite Church has patriarchates in Beirut-Gibail and Tyre, the latter with suffragans at Baniyas, Saida, and Tripoli, as well as eparchies at Baalbek and Zahlah. The Syrian Catholic Church has a patriarchate at Antioch, with an eparchy located in Beirut. An eparchy for the Chaldean Catholic Church is located in Beirut.

Despite an April of 1976 cease-fire declared by Lebanese president, Suleiman Franjieh, fighting continued and two years later Israel invaded southern Lebanon in an effort to destroy Palestinian bases. These forces returned in 1982 to force the evacuation of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) headquarters in West Beruit. Two months of bombing ended when U.S. and European troops were deployed to protect Palestinian and Muslim civilians. Still the violence in West Beirut continued: president-elect Bashir Gemayel was assassinated, the Christian militia massacred Palestinian refugees, fighting erupted between Christian and Druze militias, hostages were taken and terrorist attacks on international peacekeeping forces and other Westerners resulted in the withdrawal of Western forces.

The Lebanese army finally gained control of Beirut and a peace was reached in 1991. By the close of the fighting, 140,000 had been killed, 300,000 wounded, 800,000 lost their homes and 950,000 left Lebanon, most of them Christians. 175 communities were destroyed. Hundreds of churches were gone, most of them Catholic, and almost a third of the region's Catholic schools had been closed. A third of the population remaining in Lebanon were left without jobs.

In 1992 a new government was elected that attempted to restore the country economically and socially. Under the peace, the president, prime minister and speaker of parliament were required to be Maronite Christian, Sunni Muslim and Shi'a Muslim, respectively, as a way of preserving political balance. In 1998 Emile Lahoud became Lebanon's new president. In 1995 Pope John Paul II convened a synod to aid bishops in their task of healing the many wounds caused by the violence of the war, although this meeting engendered new controversy when several bishops criticized the existence of an Israeli militarized "security zone" in South Lebanon. Four years later Beirut hosted a meeting of Middle East and North African Church leaders as they addressed the future of the Catholic Church in an increasingly fundamentalist Muslim world.

Into the 21st Century. Despite the devastation of the late 20th century, Lebanon remained the one country in the Middle East where Islam and Christianity were able to encounter each other as equals. Minor religious groups included Protestants, Syrians (Suryān, Orthodox and Catholic), Nusayri and Jews, all of which were encouraged by the government to participate in interfaith dialogue. Greek Melkite Catholics, an Orthodox group that split with Rome in the 18th century, was among the nine partriarchal sects active in Lebanon by 2000. In addition, followers of five Muslim sects and 11 Christian denominations made their home in the region.

By 2000 there were over 990 parishes serving various Catholic denominations in Lebanon, and 740 diocesan and 622 religious priests tended them. The Church operated over 300 trilingual (Arabic, French, English) primary and secondary schools for the benefit of the Lebanese community, and their students accounted for 30 percent of the nation's students. Almost 3,000 sisters worked among the religiously diverse Lebanese community, serving the educational and humanitarian needs of all people, no matter what their faith.

Bibliography: P. K. HITTI, Lebanon in History: From the Earliest Times to the Present (London 1967). K. S. SALIBI, The Modern History of Lebanon (Westport, CT 1976); Cross Roads to Civil War: Lebanon 1958–1976 (Delmar, NY 1976). P. DIB, History of the Maronite Church, tr. S. BEGGIANI (Beirut 1971).

[S. BEGGIANI/EDS.]

LEBBE, FREDERIC VINCENT

Priest, promoter of Chinese Catholic journalism, founder of missionary and indigenous religious congregations, advocate of adaptation to Chinese culture and of the establishment of a Chinese hierarchy; b. Ghent, Belgium, Aug. 19, 1877; d. Chongquing, China, June 24, 1940. The eldest son of a Belgian Catholic father and a French-English convert mother, he entered the Congregation of the Missions (the Vincentians) in 1895. Fired by a desire to be a missionary and martyr, he went to Beijing, China, with Msgr. A. FAVIER, Vicar Apostolic, in 1901. He was ordained there the same year.

From the beginning of his missionary work, Lebbe was convinced the missioner should become a Chinese to the Chinese. Hence he lived, spoke, wrote, and dressed as a Chinese. Remarkable success in the country missions brought him to Tianjin, where he strove for widespread conversions by public lectures for intellectuals, by forming associations of Catholic laymen for the propagation of the faith, and by establishing a Catholic press. With the help of Ying Lien-chih, a Catholic layman and former editor of a Chinese newspaper, and some other writers, in 1912 he started the first Catholic weekly in China, Kuang I Lu (Public Benefit Record). Success was immediate, and its rapidly increasing circulation brought it to areas outside of Tianjin. It proved to be an informative and powerful force during the first public elections and in the forging of the Constitution.

Lebbe's next step (1916) was a great journalistic success, a large Catholic daily, I Shih Pao (People's Welfare Daily). Within three months it was the leading newspaper in North China and compared favorably with others in accuracy of news reporting and independence of judgment. Lebbe contributed a daily chat on religion and a column of answers to religious questions. Editions in Beijing and Shanghai soon appeared, and a woman's weekly, a magazine for missionaries, and a children's weekly followed. Lebbe strongly recommended such use of the press in his suggestions to Rome on missionary methods.

Many of Lebbe's ideals seemed vindicated by Benedicts XV's apostolic epistle on missionary methods, Maximum illud (1919), and in 1926, six Chinese priests, recommended by Lebbe, were consecrated bishops. In Europe he established the priests' Society of Auxiliaries of the Missions and the International Women's Auxiliaries; in China, he gave impetus to Chinese monasticism and established the Little Brothers of St. John and the Little Sisters of St. Teresa. He died during the Sino-Japanese War due to harsh treatment by Chinese communists. The Chinese government proclaimed a day of mourning in his honor, and it also published an official decree acknowledging and praising his work.

Bibliography: Recueil des Archives Vincent Lebbe, 5 vols. (Louvain 1982–86). J. P. LECLERCQ, Vincent Lebbe: Der Apostel des modernen China (Vienna 1965). J. P. WIEST, "The Legacy of Vincent Lebbe" International Bulletin of Missionary Research 23 (1999): 33–37.

[A. R. O'HARA]

LEBON, JOSEPH

Twentieth-century patrologist, Orientalist, and theologian; b. Tamines, Belgium, Dec. 18, 1879; d. Namur, June 12, 1957. After following a course of studies in the diocesan institutions of Namur, Lebon was ordained on Aug. 10, 1903. He earned a doctorate at Louvain on July 14, 1909, with a dissertation (Le Monophysisme sévérien, Louvain 1907) that has been acknowledged as the standard history of the Monophysite Christology, then succeeded P. Ladeuze as professor of New Testament theology and patrology at the university. In December of 1918 he obtained the chair of the history of theology in the Middle Ages, and in 1920 he began to teach courses in Armenian culture. From 1932 to 1941 he taught Syriac languages and literature; and from 1942 to 1949, the introduction to the theology of the Orthodox churches.

Although Lebon devoted attention to other subjects, such as Christian of Stablo and Heriger of Lobbes, and published several studies on MARIOLOGY, his main interest was centered on the Fathers of the Church and the development of Christology in the patristic age. Introduced to the study of MONOPHYSITISM by J. Chabot, Lebon published a remarkable series of editions and studies dealing with SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH (ed. Contra impium Grammaticum, Orationes ad Nephalium, Correspondence with Sergius the Grammarian); PHILOXENUS OF MABBUGH (Textes inédits); and a revised study of the Monophysite Christology (1951). He contributed a number of articles to the Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique and Muséon in which he identified works of THEODORET OF CYR and the florilegia of TIMOTHY AELURUS, Severus of Antioch, and Ephrem of Antioch, and contributed monographs to a critical edition of the works of ATHANASIUS of Alexandria. He studied the definitions of faith at the Councils of Ephesus (431), Nicaea I (325), and Constantinople I (381) as well as that of Chalcedon (451). With J. de Ghellinck, he founded the Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense. An indefatigable and exact scholar, he collaborated on a number of projects in the field of Oriental patrology and was a mainstay in the continuation of the Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium, a joint effort of the University of Louvain and The Catholic University of America.

Monumental Archway of Ancient Tyre, Lebanon. (©Paul Almasy/CORBIS)

Bibliography: G. BARDY, Annua Nuntia Louvaniensia 5 (1948):56–75. Bibliographie académique 7 (1934–54):301–303. J. COPPENS, Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 33 (1957): 672–675. A. M. CHARUE, Revue diocésaine de Namur 11 (1957): 335–344. A. VAN ROEY, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 52 (1957): 1023–26.

[F. X. MURPHY]

LEBRETON, JULES

Theologian and church historian; b. Tours, March 20, 1873; d. Neuilly-sur-Seine, July 6, 1956. He entered the Society of Jesus at Canterbury, England, in 1890. Following his juniorate he taught Greek and Latin for four years (1895–99). He completed his studies in philosophy and theology in Jersey, Fourvière, and Canterbury, and was ordained in 1903. In the meantime, he had presented two theses on Latin syntax to the Sorbonne for the doctorat ès lettres and received his degree in 1901. The first thesis, Études sur la langue et la grammaire de Cicéron (Paris 1901), remains a valuable contribution to its field. The solid training in classical philology and its method as well as that in theology was to stand him in good stead in his future career. In 1905 he was appointed a professor of dogmatic theology in the Faculty of Theology at the Institut Catholique in Paris, and two years later the new rector, A. Baudrillart, gave him the chair of the history of Christian origins in the same faculty, a post that he held, apart from a long illness (1912–17), until his retirement in 1943. In 1910, with L. de Grandmaison, SJ, he founded the scholarly Recherches de Science religieuse, to which for over 30 years he contributed his invaluable Bulletins on the history of Christian origins. He was a frequent contributor also to Études and other journals. Among his numerous books and articles, several must be given special mention. His magistral Les Origines du Dogme de la Trinité, v. 1 Les Origines (Paris 1910), appeared in the midst of the Modernist crisis and demonstrated that sound and objective historical and theological criticism could be combined with uncompromising orthodoxy. In 1927 the sixth edition appeared under the new title Histoire du Dogme de la Trinité: des Origines au Concile de Nicée, v. 1 Les Origines. The second volume, De saint Clément à saint Irenée, was published the following year. Other preoccupations prevented the continuance of the work as originally projected. In 1931 Lebreton published his La Vie et l'Enseignement de Jésus-Christ Notre Seigneur (2 v. Paris 19th ed. 1951), which immediately took its place as one of the leading scholarly works on Our Lord. He collaborated with J. Zeiler on the first two volumes of Fliche-Martin, Histoire de l'Église [L'Église primitive and De la fin du second siècle à la paix constantinienne (Paris 1934, 1935)], a work that marks an epoch in ecclesiastical historiography. Among his later contributions are Lumen Christi. La Doctrine Spirituelle du Nouveau Testament (Paris 1947), Tu Solus Sanctus. Jésus-Christ vivant dans les Saints. Études de Théologie Mystique (Paris 1948), the article "Contemplation dans la Bible" (Dictionnaire de Spiritualité 2.2:1645–1716), and the article "Jésus-Christ" (Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplément 4:966-1073). There is a complete list of all Lebreton's publications, including translations of his books into other languages to 1950, in Mélanges Jules Lebreton 2:446–477. His work throughout reveals a phenomenal breadth and depth of learning, meticulous accuracy, and an attitude that is critical but at the same time reverent and strictly orthodox.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Tables générales 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 2:2925–27. R. D'OUINCE, "Le Père Jules Lebreton (1873–1956)," Études 290 (1956) 274–280. Mélanges Jules Lebreton, 2 v. (Recherches de science réligieuse 39–40; 1951–52).

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

LEBUFFE, FRANCIS PETER

Author, editor; b. Charlestown, S.C., Aug. 21, 1885; d. New York City, May 27, 1954. He was the son of Adolphe F. and Mary (Guillemin) LeBuffe. After receiving his early education at Gonzaga College, Washington, D.C., he entered the Society of Jesus (1901) and studied at Poughkeepsie, N.Y., and at Woodstock, Md., where he was ordained on June 28, 1915. A physical collapse prevented sustained work for three years, after which he became regent (1920-22) of the School of Law at Fordham University, N.Y., and published a book on jurisprudence. He was dean of the Fordham University School of Social Service from 1923 to 1926, when he joined the staff of America and also became managing editor of Thought. After 1939 he devoted his time to writing in New York City. Besides several books, he published hundreds of articles and pamphlets on current topics and devotional subjects. He possessed varied interests and was the founder of the Eastern Jesuit Philosophical Association and the Jesuit Anthropological Association; president of the Catholic Anthropological Conference; director of the Catholic Press Association; moderator of the Catholic Evidence Guild; and regional director of the sodalities of the Blessed Virgin.

[F. X. CURRAN]

LEBUINUS (LEBWIN), ST.

Benedictine, Anglo-Saxon missionary to Germany; d. Deventer, c. 780. Lebuin(us) or Lebwin is the Latin form of the Old English Liafwin, "dear friend." A monk of the Abbey of RIPON, where he was ordained, Lebuinus was one of the many monks to follow St. BONIFACE and his companions to Europe to carry on the work of conversion. After their martyrdom, according to his earliest biographer, Lebuinus was divinely inspired to preach to the Franks and SAXONS near the river Ysel, and thus to continue the work of St. WILLIBRORD OF UTRECHT. Sometime after 754 he sought out St. GREGORY OF UTRECHT, who directed him to the territory of the Frisians bordering on Westphalia, sending one of Willibrord's disciples, Marchelm (Marculf?), with him. Lebuinus was gladly received into the household of the widow Abarhilda, who helped him build a chapel across the river from Deventer. Later he built a church in Deventer itself.

In his attempt to convert the Frisians and Saxons Lebuinus underwent many persecutions. His church was burned by the Westphalians and their allies, and his Frisian converts scattered. With the help of friends he rebuilt the church and continued his preaching. Among his friends and acquaintances were many chieftains, particularly Folcbert of the Village of Sudberg, who with his son Helco protected Lebuinus. At that time the Saxon chieftains met once a year at Marklo on the Weser with their freedmen and serfs to confirm their laws and to hold court. Against the advice of Folcbert, who feared that he would anger the pagan assembly, Lebuinus appeared at one such meeting robed in full canonical vestments and carrying a cross in one hand and a book of the Gospels under his arm. Announcing himself as a messenger of God, he informed the assembly that if they would accept God's commands, He would confer benefits upon them and preserve them in their liberty. If not, He would send a king to vanquish them, despoiling them of lands and possessions and leading them into slavery. Although the elders in the group tried to deter them, the immediate reaction of the younger Saxons was to wrench stakes from the fence to cast at Lebuinus. In the midst of the melee Lebuinus disappeared. All then agreed that they had been unjust and decided that if they listened to messengers from the Normans, Slavs, and Frisians, in justice they should listen to a messenger from God. After that meeting, the Saxons allowed Lebuinus to travel unharmed wherever he wished to preach throughout their territory.

After his death Lebuinus was buried in his own church in Deventer. Shortly afterward the Saxons, after searching vainly for his body, burned the church and laid the village waste. Albricus, successor to Gregory at Utrecht, sent St. LUDGER to restore the place and rebuild the church. According to report, Lebuinus appeared to Ludger in a dream and told him where his body lay. His body and the Gospels discovered with it, written probably in his own hand, were still in Deventer in a church bearing his name in 882 when it was again destroyed, this time by the Normans. The relics of St. Livinus (whose feast also is on November 12) are probably those of Lebuinus.

Feast: Nov. 12 (primarily in the Netherlands).

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 132:877–894, by HUCBALD OF ST. AMAND, c. 900. Ana-lecta Bollandiana 34–35 (1915–16) 306–330; 39 (1921) 306–330; 70 (1952) 285–305. W. BÖHNE, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:870. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum, (Metten 1933–38) 3:286–289, 297–298. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 30.2:789–795, an early Life of St. Lebuinus on which Hucbald of St. Amand's version is based. C. H. TALBOT, ed. and tr., Anglo-Saxon Missionaries in Germany (New York 1954) 229–234, tr. of the Life in the Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores above. S. BARING-GOULD, The Lives of the Saints, 16 v. (new ed. Edinburgh 1914) 13:306–307. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:324.

[M. E. COLLINS]

LE CAMUS, ÉTIENNE

French cardinal; b. Paris, 1632; d. Grenoble, Sept. 12, 1707. As the son of an illustrious noble family, he was, in the traditional manner, marked early for a clerical career, although he showed no personal inclination for the religious life. Through family connections he became an almoner of the king, holding office from 1653 to 1669. This phase of his life was marked by dissipation and constant scandal. He came under the influence of Bossuet and retired from court to place himself under the spiritual tutelage of the austere and Jansenist-tainted Nicolas PAVILLON, bishop of Alet. In 1671 Le Camus became bishop of Grenoble, having first refused the office on the grounds that the past notoriety of his life might cause scandal. His sanctity while he was a bishop was legendary: he underwent extraordinary fastings, slept on straw, and shunned ostentation of all kinds. The affection and respect he showed to Protestants in his diocese resulted in an exceptional number of conversions years before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He staunchly opposed the violence later employed against Protestants. In 1686 he received the red hat as a sign of papal approval. But it was without the king's presentation, for it had been intended by King Louis XIV for his own favorite, Harlay, Archbishop of Paris.

Bibliography: É. LE CAMUS, Lettres, ed. A. M. P. INGOLD (Paris 1892); Lettres inédites, ed. C. FAURE (Paris 1933). L. CEYSSENS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957—) 6:871. É. APPOLIS, Le "Tiers parti" catholique au XVIIIe siècle: entre Jansénistes et Zelanti (Paris 1960). J. ORCIBAL, Louis XIV contre Innocent XI (Paris 1949).

[L. L. BERNARD]

LE CLERC, ALIX, BL.

Foundress with St. Peter Fourier of the Congregation of Notre Dame; b. Remiremont, Lorraine, France, Feb. 2, 1576; d. Nancy, France, Jan. 9, 1622. A dream of the Bl. Alix Le Clerc, engraving.

Blessed Virgin wearing the habit of the future Congregation of Notre Dame induced youthful Alix Le Clerc to sacrifice the pleasures of a wealthy bourgeois family and, at the direction of her pastor, Peter FOURIER, to organize a community dedicated to the free education of youth. Fourier drafted the first constitutions, which were provisionally approved in 1598, confirmed in 1617, and finally approved by Pope URBAN VIII in 1628. Alix braved the difficulties of new foundations, false accusations, and public humiliations; she persevered in constant, appalling, corporal penances and still maintained equanimity and personal charm. Her cause for canonization was introduced in 1899. She was beatified on May 4, 1947. Alix's work lives on not only in her own congregation, but in the Canadian Congregation de Notre Dame founded in 1650 by St. Marguerite BOURGEOYS, who was inspired by the work of the earlier society. The Canonesses Regular of St. Augustine were reformed on the Notre Dame pattern by Fourier. The School Sisters of Notre Dame founded in 1833 also follow the Rule of Fourier.

Feast: October 22.

Bibliography: R. BAZIN, Take This Child, tr. M. A. GELSON (Boston 1948). M. S. L. WEST, Blessed Alix Le Clerc (London 1947).

P. DE GONNEVILLE, La Mère Alix Le Clerc (Paris 1947). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:59–63.

[M. P. TRAUTH]

LE CLERC, JEAN

Arminian theologian and biblical scholar; b. Geneva, March 19, 1657; d. Amsterdam, Jan. 8, 1736. Le Clerc (Clericus) studied at Grenoble and Saumur and came under Arminian and Socinian influence. His first work, Epistolae theologiae (1679), written under the pseudonym Liberius de St. Amore, was directed against what he called scholastic errors on the major dogmas. He proposed to restate them in scriptural and historical terms. In 1684 he was named professor of philosophy, later of ecclesiastical history, in the Remonstrant Seminary in Amsterdam. He attacked Nicholas Malebranche in part two of a collaborative work, Entrétiens sur diverses matières de théologie (1685). Beginning the same year, in Sentiments de quelques théologiens de Holland, he engaged in a series of anonymous or pseudonymous published exchanges (1685-87) with Richard Simon, attacking his plan of a polyglot Bible and ascribing the historic portions of the Pentateuch to King Josiah. He also denied the divine inspiration of certain other books. He made a new edition of the apostolic Fathers and edited three major encyclopedias of literature, including *Biblio*thèque universelle et historique (26 v. 1686-93). From 1728 to his death he suffered paralysis and the loss of memory and voice.

Bibliography: J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:105–107. J. P. DE BIE and J. LOOSJES, eds., Biographisch woordenboek van protestantsche godgeleerden in Nederland (The Hague 1919–49) 2:83–104.

[G. H. WILLIAMS]

LE CLERC DU TREMBLAY, FRANÇOIS

Better known by his religious name, Father Joseph of Paris, intimate adviser of Cardinal RICHELIEU and thus called the éminence grise; b. Paris, Nov. 4, 1577; d. Rueil, near Paris, Dec. 18, 1638. As the son of a magistrate and a noblewoman, he studied at the University of Paris and began a military career but, after travels in Italy and England, entered the Capuchin novitiate in Orléans in 1599. He was ordained in 1604, and was subsequently professor of philosophy, master of novices, and provincial of Touraine. He was also a preacher and devoted himself to the reform of religious orders. In 1617 he obtained from Rome the brief confirming his foundation of the reformed Benedictine nuns of Notre Dame du Calvaire (Calvairiennes) with convents in Angers, Paris, and elsewhere, for whom he composed instructions and spiritual works until his death.

True to the spirit of St. Francis, his spirituality is characterized by love of Christ crucified, and his first political interest was to rouse Christian princes to reconquer the tomb of Christ. He wrote an epic on the Crusades. But, unable to rely on the position of Spain, he put all his trust in a France strong within and without. In contact with the royal court from 1615, he favored the political rise of Richelieu, who, when head of the royal council, made him his most intimate counselor and trusted aid. Richelieu even sent him to the Diet of Regensburg, where he is credited with having frustrated the plan of FERDINAND II to have his son elected to succeed him as emperor.

Father Joseph wrote works in defense of Richelieu's policy, composed instructions for diplomats and generals, and at times revived the cardinal's own courage, making known to him the visions of his reformed nuns. Richelieu wanted to make him his successor and asked the cardinalate for him. As prefect of French missions in the Levant, which he fostered actively, he also concerned himself with other Capuchin missions. He left many spiritual writings, among which are Exercice des bienheureux practicables en terre par les âmes dévotes (1610) and Introduction à la vie spirituelle (1626).

Bibliography: Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 870–873. JOSEPH DE PARIS, Lettres et documents . . . concernant les missions étrangères (1619–38), ed. G. DE VAUMAS (Lyon 1942). G. FAGNIEZ, Le Père Joseph et Richelieu (1577–1638), 2 v. (Paris 1894) fundamental. L. DEDOUVRES, Politique et apôtre: Le Pêre Joseph . . . , 2 v. (Paris 1932). É. D'ALENÇON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903—50) 8.2:1530–33. Bonaventura v. M., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 5:1133–34.

[P. BLET]

heir to the great editions inaugurated by his mentor, Dom Cabrol. He collaborated on the first volumes of the Monumenta Ecclesiae liturgica, 4 v. (Paris 1904-12) and Les Martyrs: Recueil des pièces authentiques sur les martyrs, 15 v. (Paris 1903–24) and wrote L'Afrique chrétienne, 2 v. (Paris 1904) and L'Espagne chrétienne, 2 v. (Paris 1906), Manuel d'archéologie chrétienne, 2 v. (Paris 1907) and Histoire du déclin et de la chute de la monarchie française, 10 v. (Paris 1921–40). All these works are remarkable for the author's ability to synthesize the latest results of scholarship on these subjects. This talent he utilized in carrying on almost alone the edition of the Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, 15 v. (1907-53), which he inherited from Dom Cabrol and for which he had prepared the final articles for volume 14. The work was completed by H. I. Marrou. While his archeological scholarship has been severely criticized as being a not always accurate compilation, particularly in the description of monuments, and while his prejudices are obvious, the Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie is an invaluable source for studies of Christian antiquity.

Leclercq also translated and revised C. J. von HE-FELE's monumental history of the councils, Histoire des conciles, 10 v. (Paris 1907–38), and published Saint-Benoît sur Loire (4th ed. Paris 1925), S. Jérôme (Louvain 1927), L'Ordre Bénédictine (Louvain 1930), La Vie chrétienne primitive (Louvain 1928), Ferdinand Gaillard, ''maître-graveur'' (Paris 1934), and A Chronicle of Social and Political Events from 1610 to 1914 (Oxford 1937).

Bibliography: G. DRIOUX, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 40 (194–45): 384. E. KIRSCHBAUM, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:872. L. BROU, Ephemerides liturgicae, 60 (1946): 198–199. A. FERRUA, "Il Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie," La civiltà cattolica 89.1 (1938): 67–72; 90.4 (1939): 172–175.

[F. X. MURPHY]

LECLERCQ, HENRI

Benedictine scholar, archeologist, and historian of the early Church; b. Tournai, Belgium, Dec. 4, 1869; d. London, March 23, 1945. A naturalized French citizen, Henri Leclercq d'Orlancourt entered the Benedictines and was professed in the Abbey of Solesmes in 1896. With Dom Fernand CABROL, he transferred to Farnborough, England, and was ordained in 1898. In 1924 he was incardinated into the Diocese of Westminster and became an oblate of the Abby of St. Mary, Paris, and chaplain to the Sisters of Sion in London.

This indefatigable scholar, who spent the major part of his career in the British Museum, was the assistant and

LECLERCO, JEAN

Benedictine, monastic scholar; b. Jan. 31, 1911, Avesnes, France; d. Oct. 27, 1993, Clervaux. In 1927 he sought admission to the Abbaye Saint-Maurice in Clervaux, Luxembourg, but was initially refused because he asked to be a simple monk rather than a priest. He was finally received into the community in 1928 and was ordained to the priesthood in 1936. From 1933 to 1937 he studied theology at the Collegio S. Anselmo in Rome where he was influenced by Anselm STOLZ, whose work Theologie der Mystik contained themes that Leclercq eventually developed and disseminated to a wide audience in his numerous books and articles. He completed his dissertation, begun in Rome, at the Institut Catholique in Paris in 1940. During the Second World War he lived at the motherhouse of French monasticism at Ligugé. By 1944 he had published his dissertation on John of Paris as well as nineteen articles. With the encouragement of Étienne Gilson, he turned his attention away from scholastic theologians to the medieval monastic authors, including PETER OF CELLE, PETER THE VENERABLE, and JOHN OF FÉCAMP. In 1948 the procurator general of the CISTERCIAN Order commissioned Leclercq to prepare a new critical edition of the works of St. Bernard, a project that occupied him for many years, brought him into close contact with Cistercian houses, constituted his most important contribution to medieval studies, and inspired numerous other books and articles. He was the most prolific medievalist of the second half of the twentieth century. He taught at both S. Anselmo and the Gregorian University in Rome. Following the Second VATICAN COUNCIL, while not relinquishing his scholarly research, he devoted himself to monastic renewal as he traveled to numerous monasteries throughout the world, even to Africa, Asia, South America, and the South Pacific. He was as much loved in monastic cloisters as he was admired in academic circles for his keen intellect, prodigious memory, and an enthusiastic and joyful personality.

Bibliography: J. LECLERCQ, Memoirs: From Grace to Grace (Petersham, Mass. 2000). E. R. ELDER, ed., The Joy of Learning and the Love of God: Studies in Honor of Jean Leclercq (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1995). M. MARTIN, "A Bibliography of the Works of Jean Leclercq," in The Joy of Learning, 415–498. E. JEAUNEAU and M. SHEEHAN, "Hommage à dom Jean Leclercq," Studia Monastica 33 (1991) 379–388. A. LIMAGE CONDE, "Dom Jean Leclercq y las letras monásticas," Studia Monastica 32 (1992) 315–359.

[R. K. SEASOLTZ]

LECTIONARIES, I: HISTORICAL

Lectionary is the term used broadly to refer to any book of biblical passages indicated for liturgical celebration. The individual readings are also known by the Latinate lections or by the Greek technical term pericope (a "snippet" of a biblical book). The history of the evolution of the pericopal system is complicated. This article will focus on the Jewish context, general development, typology, and illustration of the lectionaries for Mass in the West through the Missal of Pius V (1570). Further historical detail is covered in PERICOPES. The revision and development of the Lectionary for Mass after the Second Vatican Council is treated under LECTIONARIES, II: CONTEMPORARY ROMAN CATHOLIC and LECTIONARIES, III: ECUMENICAL.

Jewish Use of the Scriptures. The reading of passages from the Scriptures was one of the elements of worship continued by Christians from Jewish liturgical practice (Lk 4:16-21; Acts 13:27). Jewish communities developed an extensive order of scriptural passages designated to be read at the weekly Sabbath services. Nevertheless, the earliest information about which readings were used and how they were read in synagogues dates to the 6th century A.D. Norman Bonneau, following C. Perrot, has explored the evidence. The liturgical action revolved around various prayers and readings, but the high point was the reading from Torah (known in the Greek Septuagint as the Pentateuch in reference to its five books). The Babylonian tradition divided the Torah into 54 sequential segments that were read over a oneyear cycle of Sabbaths. The Palestinian tradition read the Torah in 154 sequential segments extending over a threeyear cycle of Sabbaths. The one-year Babylonian tradition prevailed and is used in synagogues today. In addition to the first reading from the Torah, each Sabbath synagogue service also included a second reading selected from what the Jewish tradition identifies as the prophets. Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings constituted the "early prophets"; Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the 12 Minor Prophets constituted the "later prophets." The reading from the prophets (called haftorah, Aramaic for "dismissal") was chosen to amplify and comment upon the reading from Torah. Every year, the Jewish calendar feasts of Passover (Pesach), Pentecost (Shavuot), and Tabernacles (Sukkoth) interrupted the sequence of Torah readings. Even if these feasts did not fall on the Sabbath, they nevertheless required the reading, at least on contiguous Sabbaths, of passages consonant with the event the feasts celebrated. In these cases the normally prescribed sequential excerpt from the Torah, with its accompanying prophetic reading was set aside. The major liturgical feasts, then recurring in a yearly cycle, interrupted the weekly cycle of Sabbaths. By the 6th century A.D. the Jewish tradition of lectionaries exhibited the following features: a sequential reading from the Torah, paired with a haftorah from the prophets, interrupted by special readings at the annual high feasts, proclaimed at the weekly Sabbath synagogal service.

Within the Bible itself, there is evidence for the practice of selecting special readings for major occasions. Deuteronomy 31:9–11, Nehemiah 8:18, and 2 Kings 23:1–3 are but three examples where texts were read on major celebrations in the Temple at Jerusalem. These passages suggest the temple liturgy at times of high liturgical feasts and are valuable for establishing the practice for the selection of special readings for the yearly feasts as well as the pairing of prophets to readings from Torah.

Early Christian Use of the Scriptures. References found in the Acts of the Apostles attest to regular Sabbath readings that were firmly established and practiced widespread: "For in every city, for generations past, Moses has had those who proclaim him, for he has been read aloud every Sabbath in the synagogues" (15:21). Luke relates how Jesus visited the synagogue in Nazareth on the Sabbath and read from the prophet Isaiah (4:15–21), which may suggest the emerging system of haftorah. Many Jewish scholars posit that it was not until after the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70 that the synagogue was transformed from a place for study of Torah to a place of ritual reading of Torah.

Further references within the New Testament attest to the early Christian use of the Hebrew Scriptures in their worship, especially the psalms (Eph 5:18–20; Col 3:16). Scripture was also read for community edification and instruction (1 Tm 4:13). These texts, however, do not mention the Sunday Eucharist. Furthermore, it is not clear that Paul's injunctions to read his letters (1 Thes 5: 27; Col 4:16) refer to liturgical gatherings.

The earliest witness of the use of Scripture at liturgy dates to the mid-2d century at the time of Justin Martyr: "On the day which is dedicated to the sun, all those who live in the cities and who dwell in the countryside gather in a common meeting, and the Memoirs of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read as long as time permits. Then, when the reader has finished, the president verbally gives a warning and appeal for the imitation of these good examples" (1 Apol 67).

Ways of Reading the Bible. The early church had coextensive systems of improvisation, continuous reading, and fixed readings. Scholars today emphasize that as far as liturgical readings in the early period were concerned, improvisation was the rule, with readings selected by the bishop according to occasion. As the canon was taking shaping, there was also a degree of variety among the churches as to what books were read; for example, in some churches The Shepard of Hermas or Clement of Rome's letters were read; while in others, Revelation was omitted

Continuous reading or lectio continua was also a method used in the ancient Church. A related manner involves semicontinuous reading, whereby some passages are omitted. The most obvious example is to be found in the voluminous patristic commentaries on the Old and New Testaments, some of which provide transcription of homilies on the Scripture readings given in the liturgy or for catechesis. From the 4th century on there are letters and sermons of St. Ambrose and St. Augustine that reveal certain books were reserved to certain liturgical seasons: at Milan, as at Constantinople, the books of Job and Jonah were read during Lent. In Africa, Genesis took up part of this season, and the Acts of the Apostles was read during Easter time. In the middle of the 5th century, according to the testimony of Gennadius of Marseilles, Venerius, the bishop of Marseilles, drew up the first authoritative lectionary determining the pericopes proper to the particular feasts and seasons, but it excluded ferial days. The first complete lectionaries date only from the 7th century.

The first evidence of fixed readings for liturgy is related to the development of the liturgical year and to a lesser degree, the local church in which the liturgy was celebrated. The introduction of annual feasts, seasons, and martyrs, is correlated to specially selected biblical books and fixed passages that were deemed appropriate to the mystery being celebrated. This method sometimes is referred to as an eclogadic reading (Greek eklogé, "what is selected"), where a passage is excerpted from a longer narrative context. Often a typological reading was used for the selection of the passages.

The type and number of readings at liturgy varied from region to region. In the Antiochene tradition, for example, there were two lessons from the Law and the Prophets (akin to synagogal practice) followed by one from the epistles or Acts and finally one from the Gospels (Apostolic Constitutions, 8.5.11). The use of three lessons, one OT and two NT, was far more common, as witnessed by the custom in Gaul and Spain until the 7th century and in the ancient Masses in Milan. In Rome, the system of three readings was simplified to two by the 7th century, when the custom was to have two readings on Sundays (NT and Gospel) and one OT reading and the Gospel on serial weekdays. Liturgical vigils for feasts such as Pasch and Pentecost included several longer readings from the OT and NT.

Methods of Indication. Four methods developed and were used coextensively to indicate the biblical pericopes to be proclaimed at the liturgy. The first, the simplest, was simple notes or symbols written in the margins of the books of the Bible to help the reader find the proper passage. From this grew the second method of compiling lists called capitularies. There are three types of capitularies: lists of epistles (sometimes including the Old Testament), lists of Gospel readings, and lists that combined the two. The list would give the liturgical day and the specific incipit (beginning verse) and explicit (ending verse) of the reading or in the case of the Gospels, the appropriate Eusebian section. The division of the Bible into chapters and then verses evolves only in the late Middle Ages. Scholarship has determined that the choice of epistle readings and of Gospel readings developed and circulated separately. The lists came to be combined, but as Vogel points out, more by chance than design. A third type of organization involved giving the whole text of the particular reading, rather than just the beginning and ending. A fourth system developed that gives the readings with the prayers of the sacramentary (e.g., Casinensis 271).

Terminology. Historians of the liturgy note that there is no precision used to described the types of lectionary. The difficulty in classification of the historical manuscripts resides in the fact that books in the Middle Ages were custom made and thus differed one from the other depending upon the design of the scribe or the desire of the one placing the order. Following T. Klauser, complete lists of non-Gospel readings or books with the non-Gospel reading given are referred to as epistolaries. Complete lists of Gospel readings or Gospel readings given in full are generally called evangeliaries. The term "Mass Lectionary" refers to documents that contain both series of epistles and Gospels. The term comes (or liber comitis) is used in the manuscript tradition to refer to both lists of epistles as well as documents that give the epistles in full, but not Gospels. The term comes is alternatively explained as derived from comma, meaning a "selection," or comes, meaning a "companion" to the whole Bible. Likewise, the term "lectionary" retains its general sense, and one encounters such terms as lectionarius epistolarum or lectionarius evangeliorum. As the full missal (missale plenarius) (see MISSAL, ROMAN) developed beginning in the 9th century, the readings contained in the epistolary and evangelary were combined with the prayers of the sacramentary and the antiphons into a single book. With the development of the Missal, the readings for the Mass were subsumed into one book along with the mass prayers and chants, rendering the Lectionary redundant.

Further Types of Lectionaries. In the early Middle Ages a variety of liturgical books emerged in response to the liturgical needs and roles of the time. The diverse parts performed by the various ministers were distributed accordingly. Therefore, prayers that the priest had to pray at the altar were in one book, while the readings to be read by reader or Gospels for the deacon were contained in another, and a different volume of antiphons was prepared for the choir. There were also lectionary collections that contained either extracts from the Fathers or historical narratives about the martyrs and other saints, which were read aloud as lessons in the Divine Office. Sometimes collections were made containing just the extracts to be used in choir. Other times a large volume of patristic homilies (known also as a homilary or sermonarium) or historical matter was employed, in which certain passages were marked to be used as lessons. This last custom seems more particularly the case with regard to the short biographical accounts of martyrs and other saints. In this connection the word legenda in particular is of common occurrence. The legenda (also called passionarium) is a collection of narratives of variable length, in which are recounted the life, martyrdom, translation, or miracles of the saints. This usually forms a large volume, and the order of the pieces in the collection is commonly, though not necessarily, that of the calendar. A few legendæ come down from the early Middle Ages, but the vast majority of those now preserved in libraries belong to the 11th, 12th, and 13th centuries.

Manuscript Evidence. The oldest surviving liturgical documents containing information on the nature and arrangement of the readings in the liturgy date to the 6th century. They are preserved in the manuscripts of Wolfenbüttel (Herzog-August Bibl., cod. Weissenburgensis 76; c. 500, Gaul) and at Fulda (Hess. Landesbibl. Cod. Bonif. 1; c. 545, Capua). Another early sacramentary is the Codex Velseri, ms. lat. 3514, of the Royal Library at Munich, written probably before 700. When these books were used in choir during Office the reader either read certain definitely marked passages, indicated by markings of which our existing manuscripts constantly show traces, or, in the earlier periods especially, he read on until the abbot or priest who presided gave him the signal to stop. After the 13th century, however, this type of book was much more rarely transcribed in favor of a complete lectionary with passages in extenso.

Illustration of the Books of Readings. During the Middle Ages considerable artistic attention was given to the illumination of books for Mass readings. E. Palazzo calls particular attention to this tradition. The Gospel Book was especially suited to elaborate decoration both with the exterior binding and the interior illustrations indicating the privileged place Sacred Scripture had in the liturgy. In the Middle Ages the Book of the Gospels was carried in procession through the church to the ambo where the deacon read from it. In medieval inventories and catalogs of church libraries and treasuries, the books of readings were called such things as "golden book," "golden text with ivory cover and precious stones," or "three books adorned with gold and precious stones" (liber aureus, textus aureus cum tabulis eburnea et gemmis, libri III auro et gemmis ornati), terms indicating their great value both materially and spiritually. The books of Gospels, with or without capitulare, then the evangeliaries, are the two main books that were illustrated. The Carolingian books of Gospels commonly have full-page paintings of the four evangelists serving as sumptuous dividers between the four Gospels. The tables of canons indicating the scriptural pericopes to be read are often framed in beautiful arches inspired by paleo-Christian subjects, such as the fountain of life and symbolic birds. The Evangeliary of Godescalc (781-183; Paris, B.N., new acq. lat. 1203), named for the scribe who signed the colophon and written for Charlemagne in the court scriptorium, contains paintings of the evangelist as well as those of the Majestas Domini and the fountain of life grouped together at the beginning of the book. The Gospel text is written in gold and silver letters on a purple parchment, indicating the regal destiny of this manuscript.

The Ottonian period witnessed a change in illustration of the lectionaries, especially the evangeliary. Certain scriptoria, such as Reichenau, distinguished themselves for the highly ornate evangeliaries with wellworked-out iconographic cycles adopted from the earlier Carolingian books. Most of the Ottonian evangelaries are based upon a christological cycle, which originate in biblical illustration drawn from the sacramentaries. Special attention was devoted to images of Gospel parables, similar to the iconographic tradition of the Byzantine books of the same period. The Ottonian tradition carried through in later books of readings from the Romanesque period, especially in books of German provenance. After the 12th century, the evangeliary and lectionary would diminish in artistic importance in favor of the missal and pontifical. Compared to the evangeliaries, the epistolaries never received the same important decoration during the Middle Ages.

Tridentine Liturgical Reform. One fruit of the liturgical reform of the Council of Trent was a pruning, organization, and standardization of the calendar and lectionary systems. Norman Bonneau has examined the reading assignments of the 1570 Missal of Pius V in its 1955 edition. There was a one-year cycle of readings consisting of 138 difference biblical passages. Each Sunday and feast day had two readings, the Epistle and the Gospel. The OT was read as the "Epistle" only on three occasions: Epiphany, Good Friday, and the Easter Vigil. The Gospel of Mark was read 4 times; Matthew, 22; Luke, 21; and John, 14 times, primarily in the Easter Season, Christmas, and Lent. There were two minor instances of lectio continua for the Gospels, and a number of short ones for the epistles.

As for the weekday cycle, the scriptural passages for weekday Eucharist in the Missal of Pius V were derived from the Sunday Eucharist without reference to liturgical feast or season. After the Council of Trent when the Roman Missal was being prepared, the suggestion was made and rejected that three weekday readings be provided as a choice when the Sunday reading had to be repeated. A precedent for this practice existed in the sacramentaries from the 8th century to the second half of the 19th century for masses on Wednesdays and Fridays. The ferial Masses of Lent had no reading of an epistle in the strict sense of the word. A pericope (part of a scriptural text used as a liturgical reading) from the Old Testament always took its place. Even though certain Masses, those of the Ember Wednesdays and of the Wednesdays of the Great Scrutiny, had three readings, they still had no epistle, since the first two readings were taken from the Old Testament. The Masses of the Ember Saturdays had, by way of exception, five readings from the Old Testament before the Epistle; but this distribution was not from earlier practices—the old Roman lectionaries had either four or six readings; the reading from Daniel and the Canticle of the Three Young Men is a Gallican addition (see EMBER DAYS). In reducing the number of the readings from 12 to four, the Ordo of the Easter Vigil as revised during the pontificate of Pius XII reestablished the practice of the time of Gregory the Great, leading to the reading first from the Law then the Prophets, followed by the Apostle (Paul), and the Gospel.

By way of comparison, in the other rites of the Latin West, the method of organization varied from the Roman system. In the AMBROSIAN RITE of Milan and MOZARABIC RITE of Toledo in Spain, there were usually three readings, as in the ancient Gallican liturgy. St. Ambrose indicates the traditional order: "First the Prophet is read, and the Apostle, and then the Gospel" (In psalmum CXVIII, 17, 10, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 271 v., indexes 4 v. [Paris 1878–90] 15, col. 1443). Various indications, in particular the number of Collects given in the early substrate of the Gelasian Sacramentary, allow a presumption that this was also the practice of the Roman Church before St. Gregory the Great. If this is the case, then the liturgies of Milan and Toledo are the guardians of the universal tradition of the West.

Readings for the Divine Office. The lectionary for Mass is distinguished from the lectionary for the Divine Office (Liturgy of the Hours). The Bible furnishes the broad contours of the Office with its psalmody, singing of the canticles of the Old and New Testaments, and the continuous reading of the Scriptures. Longer and more difficult texts, and even entire books, are read in the Office. This would not be possible at Mass. Given the difference in the cycles of Office and Mass, the different length of the readings, and the continuity of the readings within each service, the Scripture readings for the Office were not harmonized with the lectionary for Mass until Vatican II.

Although the Church has always given a large place in the Divine Office to the reading of the Bible, the place for this reading is not the same in all rites. The day Hours, including Lauds and Vespers, had only "little chapters," vestiges of longer readings. During the papacy of Pius XII a new Latin version of the Office was prepared using the entire Bible with a more abundant use of the New Testament. Vatican II continued the reform of the Office and it was thus that the Constitution on the Liturgy decreed that Matins "shall be made up of fewer psalms and longer readings" (SC 89c). In 1964 when the Consilium met to implement the liturgical reforms of Vatican II, two guidelines were approved: no day without a reading from Scripture; and the Bible readings of the Office are to complement those of the Mass. Pope Paul VI promulgated the new Liturgy of the Hours in 1970 but it was not published until February 1971. The initial plan was to have two volumes: the first to contain the Psalter, the Ordinary, and the Commons; and the second volume the readings, thus constituting a true lectionary. In the end, it was decided that this format would be unwieldy. Therefore, the new Office comprises four self-contained volumes. Regarding the cycle of Scripture readings, originally a two-year cycle was planned. In view of the practical difficulties entailed, it was finally decided to include only a one-year cycle in the books containing the Liturgy of the Hours and to leave the second year of the cycle to a supplement. The supplement as a fifth volume has yet to appear.

Bibliography: P. BERNARD, "La question du nombre des lectures à la messe dans le rit romain jusqu'au VIIe siècle: Quelques réflexion à propos d'un ouvrage récent," Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes 151 (1993) 185-192. N. BONNEAU, The Sunday Lectionary: Ritual Word, Paschal Shape (Collegeville, Minn. 1992). A. CHAVASSE, Les lectionnaires romaines de la messe au VIIe et au VIIIe siècle. Sources et dérivés, 2 v. Spicilegii friburgensis Subsidia 22 (Fribourg 1993); "Les plus anciens types du lectionnaire et de l'antiphonaire romains de la messe," Revue Bénédictine 62 (1952) 3-94; "L'évangéliare romain de 645: un recueil. Sa composition (façons et matériaux)," Revue Bénédictine 92 (1982) 33-75; "Aménagements liturgiques à Rome au VIIe et au VIIIe siècle," Revue Bénédictine 99 (1989) 75-102; "Évangéliaire, épistolier, antiphonaire et sacramentaire. Les livres romains de la messe aux VIIe et VIIIe siècles," Echos d'Orient 6 (1989) 177-225; "Après Grégoire le Grand. L'organisation des évangéliares au VIIe et au VIIIe siècle," in Rituels. Mélanges offerts au P. Gy, OP, (Paris 1990) 125-130. For a complete list of his works, as well as a treatment of his life and career, see "Hommage à M. le Pr Chavasse," Recherches de science religieuse 58 (1984). M. JOHNSON, Bibliographia Liturgica: Bibliographie der Nachschlagewerke für Liturgiewissenschaft (Rome 1992). K. GAMBER, Codices liturgici latini antiquiores, (Spicilegii Friburgensis subsidia, v. 1; Freiburg 1988). T. KLAUSER, Das römische Capitulare evangeliorum (Münster 1935). G. MORIN, "Le plus ancien Comes ou Lectionnaire de l'Eglise romaine," Revue Bénédictine 27 (1910) 41-74. H. P. NEUHEUSER, Internationale Bibliographie "Liturgische Bücher": eine Auswahl kunsthistorischer und liturgiewissenschaftlicher Literatur zu liturgischen Handschriften und Drucken (Munich 1991). É. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books from the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century (Collegeville, Minn. 1993). C. PERROT, "The Reading of the Bible in the Ancient Synagogue," Mikra: Text, Translation, Reading, and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. M. J. MULDER (Philadelphia 1988) 137-159. C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources Translated and Revised by William Storey and Niels Rasmussen (Washington, D.C. 1986). G. G. WILLIS, "The Kalendar and Lectionary," in A History of the Early Roman Liturgy, ed. G. G. WILLIS (London 1994).

[M. S. DRISCOLL]

LECTIONARIES, II: CONTEMPORARY ROMAN CATHOLIC

Readings from Holy Scripture constitute an essential element of the Sacred Liturgy. Recognizing the importance of integrating the readings into all the rites of public worship, especially the Eucharistic liturgy, the Fathers of the Second Vatican Council in the Constitution on the Liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium (SC) declared that "Sacred Scripture is of the greatest importance in the celebration of the liturgy. For it is from it that lessons are read and explained in the homily, and psalms are sung. It is from the Scriptures that the prayers, collects and hymns draw their inspiration and their force, and that actions and signs derive their meaning" (SC 24). Further, the council mandated a reform of the liturgy that would promote an appreciation for the Scriptures by providing the faithful with "more ample, more varied and more suitable" readings at every Mass (SC 35), by opening up treasures of the Bible "more lavishly so that richer fare may be provided for the faithful at the table of God's Word. In this way, a more representative part of the Sacred Scriptures will be read to the people in the course of a prescribed number of years" (SC 51).

First Editio Typica of the Lectionary for Mass. As a part of the overall reform of the liturgy the Second Vatican Council ordered that the lectionary be revised, thereby increasing the number of pericopes from Sacred Scripture, particularly from the Old Testament. These new inclusions would be accommodated by the creation of a three-year cycle of Sunday readings and a two-year cycle of daily readings. Since the shift from the existing annual cycle to the new multiyear cycles was such a vast and important undertaking, Study Group (Coetus) 11 was engaged for the purpose of creating a suitable preliminary study for the enterprise. They created a preliminary weekday lectionary (ordo lectionum per ferias), which had a providential twofold effect: the appetite of the faithful was whetted for a broader taste of Sacred Scriptures; and valuable guidelines were yielded, based on the experience, for the compilation of the definitive set of readings.

In response to the council's directives, and in collaboration with Coetus 11, a revised Lectionary was prepared by the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy under the title Ordo Lectionum Missae. The editio typica of the new Lectionary, approved by Pope Paul VI in the Apostolic Constitution Missale Romanum (April 3, 1969) and published by a letter from Benno Cardinal Gut, prefect of the Sacred Congregation for Divine Worship on Pentecost Sunday (May 25, 1969), provided only the appropriate biblical citations for the particular celebrations.

First Edition in English Translation. The desire for greater variety in the readings was stimulated by the introduction of the vernacular languages. Repetition of the same readings—especially on weekdays, when the Scriptures of the preceding Sunday were read over and over, and in the Commons—created boredom and were not effective in promoting prayer. The Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy therefore sent a letter of publication that directed episcopal conferences to prepare vernacular editions of the Ordo Lectionum Missae in accordance with the consilium's 1969 instruction on vernacular translations.

The National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) in the United States published such an edition and decreed its mandatory use in the dioceses of the United States beginning with the first Sunday of Advent, Nov. 29, 1971. The biblical texts used for this edition were from the New American Bible (NAB), a translation first commissioned by the Bishops' Committee for the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine in 1944. For the next two decades, some 50 scholars of the Catholic Biblical Association labored to produce a translation of the Bible from its original languages and the oldest extant texts.

The English edition of the Lectionary, which appeared in 1970, contained the complete texts of the biblical readings and chants for the liturgy of the word in the celebration of the Mass. In addition to the texts, indices and tables indicating the use of the years in the cycle of readings provide the rationale for the arrangement of readings in the pattern of this Lectionary. For English speakers throughout the world a joint commission was established in 1963 known as the INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY that was entrusted with the responsibility of producing English translations of liturgical texts.

Second Edition of the Lectionary for Mass. The Holy See issued a second typical edition of the Ordo Lectionum Missae (editio typica altera), which was approved by Pope John Paul II and published by a decree from James Cardinal Knox, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation for the Sacraments and Divine Worship on Jan. 21, 1981. The primary goal of the second edition of the Lectionary for Mass was the production of a book displaying the greatest possible fidelity to the biblical text. Being aware of the limitations of the English language, and acting in accord with Dei Verbum—The Constitution on Divine Revelation—which teaches that "since the Word of God must be readily available at all times, the Church, with motherly concern, sees to it that suitable and correct translations are made into various languages, especially from the original texts of the sacred books," a working group, comprised of representatives of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments, and the NCCB, sought a lectionary that would faithfully convey the meaning of the Greek and Hebrew scriptures. The second edition of the Lectionary for Mass (LFM) for use in the dioceses of the United States was approved by the NCCB on June 20, 1992, and confirmed by the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments on Oct. 6, 1997.

As with its first edition, the revised Lectionary for Mass was based on the 1970 New American Bible. The 16 years of private and liturgical use of this translation, as well as subsequent advances in biblical scholarship, led to the revision of its translation of the New Testament in 1986. The revised Lectionary for Mass therefore employs the 1986 edition of the Revised New Testament and the 1970 edition of the Old Testament, including the Psalms.

Of concern to the editors of the revised Lectionary for Mass was the development of a common scriptural vocabulary. By the preferential use of NAB vocabulary and phrases in the translation of titles (tituli) found above readings and in the first lines (incipits) of all readings, the editors attempted to develop consistent biblical-liturgical terms.

Certain changes to the base text were made both for increased precision and in the interest of accurately conveying a horizontally inclusive scriptural term as well as for greater ease in proclamation. In the first category may be included the following kinds of examples: "their holocausts" was changed to "their burnt offerings" (LFM 118); "a smoking brazier" was changed to "a smoking fire pot" (LFM 27); "seahs of flour" was changed to "measures of flour" (LFM 108C).

Two concerns were raised in a second category of inclusive language: the problem in the English language for a true generic term when referring to humanity, and the preponderance of masculine images and pronouns in reference to God. With attention to the principle of demonstrating maximum possible fidelity to the sacred text, the working group adopted three base versions for the lectionary. First, the 1986 Revised New Testament of the NAB was chosen as a translation whose primary concern was fidelity to what the text says. When the meaning of the Greek is inclusive of both sexes, the translation seeks to reproduce such inclusivity insofar as this is possible in normal English usage, without resort to inelegant circumlocutions or neologisms that would offend against the dignity of the language. Second, the working group adopted the 1970 Old Testament of the NAB, which was then modified for accuracy in rendering certain collective nouns and for the particular demands of public proclamation. Third, the working group adopted the 1970 translation of the NAB Psalter rather than the 1991 revision of this work. Because of previous critiques by Roman congregations of the 1991 translation, the working group concluded that the 1991 Psalter was unacceptable for liturgical use.

The 1989 NCCB Criteria for the Evaluation of the Use of Inclusive language in Scriptural Translations noted that the revealed word of God consistently uses a masculine reference for God. Hence, the working group avoided any use of vertical inclusivity in rendering scriptural texts.

The introduction to the second edition of the Lectionary for Mass was considerably expanded and opens with an extended theological reflection, based on conciliar and postconciliar teachings, on the significance of the Word of God in liturgical celebration. Following the example of Christ, who himself read and proclaimed the Scriptures, the liturgy is both founded on the Word of God and sustained by it. Through a variety of liturgical celebrations and other gatherings, the Word of God enriches the Church through the "unfolding mystery of Christ" in the liturgical year, while the liturgy itself enriches the word with new meaning and power. In this process all of Christ's faithful through the liturgy respond collectively and individually to the working of the Holy Spirit.

See Also: LECTIONARIES I: HISTORY; LECTIONARIES III: ECUMENICAL.

Bibliography: A. BUGNINI "The Lectionary of the Roman Missal," The Reform of the Liturgy 1948–1975 (Collegeville, Minn. 1990) 406–425. É. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books from the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century (Collegeville, Minn. 1993). C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources, tr. and rev. by W. STOREY and N. RASMUSSEN (Washington, D.C. 1986). C. WIÉNER, "The Roman Catholic Eucharistic Lectionary," Studia Liturgica 21.1 (1991) 2–13. N. BONNEAU, The Sunday Lectionary: Ritual Word, Paschal Shape (Collegeville, Minn. 1998). E. NÜBOLD, Entstehung und Bewertung der neuen Perikopenordnung des Römischen Ritus für die Messfeier an Sonn-und Festtagen (Paderborn 1986).

[M. S. DRISCOLL]

LECTIONARIES, III: ECUMENICAL

In 1969 the Roman Catholic Church issued its Ovdo lectionum Missae (see LECTIONARIES, II: CONTEMPORARY). This lectionary provided a three-year cycle of Scripture readings for use during liturgical worship on the Sundays of the Catholic liturgical year, a two-year cycle of readings for the weekdays, readings for the Proper and Common of saints, and a selection of readings for ritual and votive Masses and Masses for various occasions. This system of readings was prepared in order to fulfill a mandate of the Second Vatican Council, which called for the provision of a richer share of God's word through the use of a more representative portion of Scripture during worship than had previously been the case. The effect of the Sunday lectionary in particular is that in the course of three years Catholics experience virtually the entire New Testament and a substantial selection of the Old Testament in their weekly worship.

Ecumenical Adoption. In the years immediately following the appearance of the Roman Lectionary, a number of churches in the United States and Canada adopted and adapted the Sunday portion of this lectionary to their particular denominational needs. Before the end of the 1970s the three-year lectionary (as it came to be called) existed in several major denominational forms in addition to the Roman Catholic: Episcopalian, Lutheran, Presbyterian, and United Methodist. Each of these was constructed essentially upon the principles of selection and arrangement of the 1969 Roman Catholic system of readings. Differences, where they existed, were for the most part the result of calendar questions or editorial matters, for example, the question of where to begin and end specific readings.

In the decade that followed, North American Christians benefitted from an ecumenical development that has perhaps been insufficiently recognized. On a given Sunday and in different denominational assemblies largely similar and frequently identical passages of the Bible were proclaimed and preached.

Interest in ecumenical lectionaries went beyond North America. The Joint Liturgical Group (JLG), an ecumenical association of eight churches in Great Britain, developed a lectionary that uses a two-year cycle of readings and that divides the Sundays of the year into a three-fold thematic scheme.

Common Lectionary. Building upon this development, the CONSULTATION ON COMMON TEXTS (CCT) sponsored a conference on the lectionary in 1978 to determine whether it would be possible to seek greater consensus in the matter of the lectionary. The conference delegates voted unanimously in favor of seeking as much consensus as possible with the three-year lectionary. At the request of the conference participants, the CCT established a project committee of biblical and liturgical experts to carry out several specific recommendations of the conference: to produce a common calendar for the Christian year that would include common terminology for the days of the year; to produce a consensus table of readings and psalms for the Sundays of the three-year lectionary and for a few special days or feasts; and to include in this table a more representative selection of readings from the Old Testament in order to balance the nearly exclusive use of prophetic and narrowly typological passages in the Roman Lectionary.

In 1983 the CCT released the fruits of this labor under the title Common Lectionary: The Lectionary Proposed by the Consultation on Common Texts. This proposal was recommended to the churches and interested individuals for a period of trial use and study. On the basis of recommendations received, the CCT was to revise its proposed system of readings and calendar and then make it available in a final version for the churches. The U.S. National Conference of Catholic Bishops voted overwhelmingly to participate in the trial use of the Common Lectionary in selected parishes, but this action did not receive the necessary Vatican approval.

The Common Lectionary was an order of readings, not a printed lectionary, for use on Sundays and a few special days of the Christian liturgical year. The following were its major principles: (1) It incorporated the basic calendar and structure of three readings and psalm in the Roman lectionary; (2) the Gospel pericopes were maintained as given in the existing versions of the three-year lectionary (this was the area of least divergence between denominational systems of readings); (3) the New Testament pericopes of the existing three-year lectionaries were largely accepted, with some lengthening and minor textual arrangement; (4) the principle of semi-continuous reading, already present in the second readings and Gospel readings on the Sundays following Pentecost, was extended to the Old Testament reading on a number of the Sundays following Pentecost. This made possible the reading of major narratives from the Old Testament; (5) more selections from the minor prophets and from Wisdom literature were included.

The Common Lectionary was for the most part a careful harmonization of the slight variations in readings that existed in the major versions of the three-year lectionary. The semi-continuous reading of the Old Testament readings on some of the Sundays following Pentecost was the only real innovation in this lectionary proposal. Its extension to the first reading in this part of the lectionary has not meant, however, the abandonment of the typological relationship between the first reading and the Gospel, a major premise of the three-year lectionary on Sundays. A broad harmony between the two has been maintained and thus the topological principle retained, though not on a Sunday-by-Sunday basis. The narrative material that this arrangement made possible included, for Year A, 20 Sundays of selections from the Pentateuch (beginning with Abraham's call and concluding with Moses' death); for Year B, 14 Sundays of the Davidic narrative (from David's anointing to his death); for Year C, 10 Sundays of the Elijah-Elisha narrative (beginning with Solomon's dedication of the Temple and concluding with Elisha's death).

Revised Common Lectionary. In 1983 the CCT, JLG, and other ecumenical liturgical associations joined with the INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY (ICEL) to form the ENGLISH LANGUAGE LITURGICAL CONSULTATION (ELLC). From its inception, the ELLC played an active role in fostering the development of an international ecumenical lectionary based on feedback received from the use of the Common Lectionary. The fruit of its endeavors was a revised edition published under the title Revised Common Lectionary (RCL), which incorporated much of the feedback and suggestions received from the trial use of the Common Lectionary.

The RCL retained the foundational three-year cycle of the Roman Lectionary, with a virtually identical liturgical calendar. The NT epistle and gospel readings are almost always the same. There are two major differences between the RCL and the Roman Lectionary. First, in the OT readings in ordinary time, the RCL abandons the Roman typological model in favor of a broader system which links the Patriarchal and Mosaic narratives (i.e., from Genesis to Judges) for Year A (Matthew), the Davidic and Wisdom narratives for Year B (Mark), and a broad selection of Major and Minor Prophets (Elijah, Elisha, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Joel and Habbakuk) for Year C (Luke). Second, an attempt was made in the RCL to include women and their role in salvation history by providing texts about women never heard on Sunday before. In the Roman Lectionary these readings are found in the two-year weekday lectionary cycle, and not in the three-year Sunday cycle.

The RCL was widely adopted by major Protestant churches worldwide, making it a truly ecumenical lectionary. Some of the churches that officially adopted the RCL include the American Baptist Churches in the United States of America, the Anglican Church of Australia, the Anglican Church of Canada, the Christian Church [Disciples of Christ], the Christian Reformed Church in North America, the Church of England, the Anglican Church in South Africa, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada, the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the United States of America, the United Church of Canada, the United Church of Christ, and the United Methodist Church.

Bibliography: The Revised Common Lectionary (Nashville, Tenn. 1992). C. J. SCHLUETER, "The Gender Balance of Texts from the Gospels: The Revised Common Lectionary and the Lutheran Book of Worship," Currents in Theology and Mission 20 (June 1993) 177–186. P. C. BOWER, Handbook for the Revised Common Lectionary (Louisville, Ky. 1996). J. C. ROCHELLE, "Notes on the Revised Common Lectionary," Currents in Theology and Mission 23 (Feb. 1996) 29–37.

[J. M. SCHELLMAN/EDS.]

LECTIONARY FOR MASSES WITH CHILDREN

The Lectionary for Masses with Children (LMC) adapts the Roman Lectionary for Mass (1981) to the needs and capacities of pre-adolescent children. The aim of the LMC is to nourish the faith of children and lead them to full participation in the worship of the whole assembly. The translation of the scriptures used is the Contemporary English Version (CEV), a translation from the original languages prepared specifically for children by the American Bible Society.

The publication of a LMC follows the recommendation of the Directory for Masses with Children published by the Congregation for Divine Worship (no. 43) and approved by Pope Paul VI in 1973. The National Conference of Catholic Bishops of the United States approved the Lectionary for Masses with Children in November 1991 and the Apostolic See granted permission for an experimental use of the lectionary in 1992. The LMC is best understood within the broader context of the Directory, the General Instruction of the Roman Missal, and the Introduction to the Lectionary for Mass.

Principles and Directives. Part One of the Introduction of the LMC reflects on the importance of the celebration of the word of God for the formation of the community. Part Two provides basic principles for liturgies of the word with children: 1) the Gospel is always read; 2) a liturgical dismissal is used when children occasionally celebrate a separate liturgy of the word; 3) and a homily by the priest or an explanation of the readings by one of the adults is given at Masses with children.

Part Three discusses the purpose and provides foundational principles. This section also underlines some basic principles of liturgical catechesis such as the formative influence of liturgy; the need to involve children in the actions of the liturgy as well as to appeal to the intuitive nature of children through the use of ritual elements and symbols; and the liturgy of the word is ritual prayer and not an instructional session. The final section of part three includes catechetical notes on the relationship of the lectionary to the liturgical year and on the way in which the Church's calendar expresses and shapes Christian identity.

Part Four treats "Particular Issues" connected with the liturgy of the word celebrated with children. It examines the place of celebration, objects used in celebration, the importance of the use of music, and the need to preserve the common format of the full assembly in the liturgies for children.

The LMC may be used at Sunday Masses when there are large numbers of children present along with adults (although proper balance and consideration for the entire assembly requires that LMC should not be used exclusively or even preferentially), at a separate liturgy of the word with children, or at other liturgical celebrations within the context of the liturgical year. On Christmas Day, Epiphany, Sundays of Lent, Easter Sunday, Ascension, and Pentecost, the universal lectionary takes precedence. The readings from the children's lectionary may be used only when the celebration of the liturgy of the word for the children is held in a place apart from the main assembly.

The Content of the Lectionary. The LMC follows the content and arrangement of readings for the three cycles of Sundays, the proper of seasons, solemnities, and feasts of the Lord in the Roman Lectionary. All three readings for Sunday are included when they are suitable for use with children. At least one reading is always given in addition to the Gospel and common texts for sung responsorial psalms are included.

Sets of readings that reflect the liturgical and theological motifs of the major seasons are provided for weekdays of the year (seasons and Ordinary Time). The final section of the lectionary is comprised of Gospel acclamations for weekdays in Ordinary Time, the Proper of the Saints, Common of the Saints, ritual Masses and Masses for special occasions.

Bibliography: C.K. DOOLEY, To Listen and Tell: Introduction to the Lectionary for Masses with Children with Commentary (Washington, DC 1993). P. MAZAR and R. PIERCY, A Guide to the Lectionary for Masses with Children (Chicago 1993).

[C. DOOLEY]

LECTOR

Historically, the lector was the second of the minor orders leading to the priesthood. Readings from the sacred books are an important part of Christian worship. Originally, this task was entrusted to lay persons, but by the end of the second century it had become the function of a special order. As time went on, however, the lectorate lost its importance. In the Western Church the reading of the Epistle and Gospel was reserved to the subdeacon and the deacon respectively.

By the apostolic letter, Ministeria quaedam, dated Aug. 15, 1972, Pope Paul VI suppressed, among other things, the minor order of the lector. Under present legislation, only men may be instituted into the ministry of lector by the ordinary (see CIC canon 230 §1). Requirements for admission into the ministry of lector are: (1) the presentation of a petition freely made out and signed by the aspirant to the ordinary who has the right to accept the petition; (2) a suitable age and special qualities to be determined by the episcopal conference; (3) a firm will to give faithful service to God and the Christian people (Paul VI Ministeria quaedam VIII). The lector is appointed and instituted to fulfill the following functions in the liturgy: (1) to read the lessons from sacred Scripture, except for the Gospel, in the Mass and other liturgical celebrations; (2) to recite the psalm between the readings when there is no psalmist; (3) to present the intentions for the General Intercessions in the absence of the deacon or cantor; (4) to direct the singing and the participation of the faithful. The lector "may also instruct the faithful for the worthy reception of the sacraments," (and) "take care of preparing other faithful who by a temporary appointment are to read the Scriptures in liturgical celebrations" (ibid. V). To assure the authenticity of this ministry's exercise, Ministeria quaedam directed episcopal conferences to set suitable intervals "interstices" which "should be observed between the conferring of the ministries of lector and acolyte whenever more than one ministry is conferred on the same person" (ibid. X). The NCCB set the interval between the two institutions as six months at its regular meeting in November 1973. While institution in the lay ministries is required before diaconal ordination, it is not limited to candidates for the order of deacon or priest. However, the exclusion of women from institution in the ministry of lector has made of this office a step before ordination in the U.S. and in many other countries, much as the former minor order of lector was a step on the way to priesthood. Both women and men without formal institution may fulfill all the functions of a lector by temporary designation under the provisions of CIC canon 230 §2.

Bibliography: M. ANDRIEU, "Les Ordres mineurs dans l'ancien rite romain," Revue des sciences religieuses 5 (Strasbourg 1925) 232–274. W. CROCE, "Die niederen Weihen und ihre hierarchische Wertung," Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 70 (Vienna 1948) 257–314. The Institution of Readers, Eng. tr., ICEL (Washington, D.C. 1976). Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, Study Text III, Ministries in the Church: Commentary on the Apostolic Letters of Pope Paul VI, "Ministeria quaedam" and "Ad pascendum" (Washington, D.C. 1974); Newsletter 11 (1975) 4. Notitiae 60 (1971) 20.

[T. J. RILEY/J. A. GURRIERI/EDS.]

LEDESMA, PEDRO DE

Thomistic theologian; b. Salamanca, c. 1550; d. Salamanca, Sept. 9, 1616. After becoming a Dominican in 1563, he taught theology for more than 40 years at Segovia, Avila, and Salamanca where he occupied the chair of Durandus (moral theology and liturgy) from 1604, and the second chair of St. Thomas (dogmatic theology) from 1608. Ledesma was noted for his great erudition, virtuous life, and defense of the absolute Thomism of BAÑEZ. He is unjustifiably named a forerunner of PROBABILISM. Among his works are: De divinae gratiae auxiliis (1611); De magno matrimonii sacramento (1592); De divina perfectione (1596); Primera parte and Segunda parte de la Summa (1598), a two-volume commentary on the sacramental theology of St. Thomas; and the Doctrina Christiana (1598).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.1:404–405. D. CHENU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 9:126–127. A. MICHELITSCH, Kommentatoren zur Summa Theologiae des hl. Thomas v. Aquin (Graz 1924) 53, 163.

[M. MARKOWSKI]

LEDÓCHOWSKA, MARIA TERESA, BL.

Foundress of the Sodality of St. Peter Claver for African Missions (now the MISSIONARY SISTERS OF ST. PETER CLAVER); b. Loosdorf, Austria, April 29, 1863; d. Rome, July 6, 1922. She was the daughter of Count Antonius Kalka-Ledóchowski, the sister of Wladimir LEDÓ-CHOWSKI, superior general of the Jesuits, and (Bl.) Urszula LEDÓCHOWSKA and niece of Cardinal Miecysław LEDÓCHOWSKI. After living at Salzburg in the court of the grand duchess of Tuscany (1885-90), Countess Ledóchowska came under the influence of Cardinal Charles LAVIGERIE and dedicated herself entirely to the abolition of slavery and to the evangelization of Africa. In 1894 she founded a religious congregation to aid the missions of Africa directly or indirectly. For the remainder of her life she acted as the sodality's superior general. She recognized the importance of the press for the mission apostolate and started the periodical Echo of Africa. The polyglot printing plants that she established have published millions of copies of catechisms and other religious works in native languages. She was beatified Oct. 19, 1975 by Paul VI.

Bibliography: Maria Terésa Ledóchowska i misje: praca zbiorowa, eds. B. BEJZE, J. GUCWY, and A. KOSZORZA (Warsaw 1977). V. BIELAK, The Servant of God, Mary Theresa Countess Ledóchowska, Foundress of the Sodality of Saint Peter Claver (2d ed. St. Louis, Mo. 1944). M. and G. MAGNOCAVALLO, Vita della fedel

Serva di Dio Maria Teresa Contessa Ledóchowska (Rome 1940). G. PAPÁSOGLI, Maria Teresa Ledóchowska (Rome c. 1950). M. WI-NOWSKA, Allez dans le monde entier: l'appel de Marie-Thérèse Ledochowska (Paris 1975).

[P. MOLINARI]

LEDÓCHOWSKA, URSZULA (URSULA), BL.

Baptized Julia Maria, founder of the Ursuline Sisters of the Agony of Jesus in Gethsemane; b. April 17, 1865, Loosdorf, Austria (now Lipnica Murowana near Tarnów, Poland); d. May 29, 1939, Rome, Italy. Urszula was born into a privileged family of Count Antonius Kalka-Ledóchowski and his Swiss wife; the sister of Maria Teresa LEDÓCHOWSKA and Wladimir LEDÓCHOWSKI, superior general of the Jesuits; and niece of Cardinal Miecysław LEDÓCHOWSKI. Following financial setbacks the family moved to Saint Poelten (1873), where her father died two years later. Urszula founded a congregation of Ursulines, known as the Gray Ursulines, at Pniewy (near Poznán). She shared the benefits of her privileged family life by caring for and teaching young people. In 1907, she left Krakow to work in St. Petersburg, Russia. Three years later she moved the boarding school for Polish girls from St. Petersburg to Karelia, Finland, until she herself left Russia for Scandinavia (1914). After receiving papal approbation from Benedict XV following the war, the Gray Ursulines spread throughout Poland and beyond. Urszula was called to Rome by the Holy See, where she inspired many Catholic institutions. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II, June 20, 1983, at Poznán, Poland.

Feast: May 29.

Bibliography: T. BOJARSKA, W imie trzech krzyzy: opowiesc o Julii Urszuli Ledóchowskiej i jej zgromadzeniu (Warsaw 1981). J. LEDÓCHOWSKA, Zycie dla innych: blogoslawiona Urszula Ledóchowska (Poznán 1984). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1987) 1264–68. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 27 (1983) 10–11.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LEDÓCHOWSKI, MIESCYSŁAW HALKA

Polish cardinal, archbishop, count; b. Górki, near Klimontów, Poland, Oct. 29, 1822; d. Rome, July 22, 1902. After attending the Gymnasiums in Radom and Warsaw, he continued his higher studies in Warsaw and Rome and obtained doctorates in theology and canon law. In 1845 he was ordained. After several years of service in the papal Secretariate of State, he was appointed audi- tor in the nunciature in Portugal. From 1855 to 1860 he was apostolic delegate extraordinary in Colombia and Chile. After his consecration as a titular bishop on Nov. 3, 1861, he served as nuncio in Belgium (1861–66). On December 8, 1866, Pope Pius IX named him archbishop of Gniezno and Poznań (German, Gnesen and Posen). In this office he showed special concern for the proper training of his clergy and the care of souls. At VATICAN COUN-CIL I he was a member of the commission dealing with dogmatic questions. In 1870 he journeyed to Versailles to induce Otto von Bismarck to support the restoration of the STATES OF THE CHURCH. When the KULTURKAMPF in Prussia endangered Polish Catholicism, Ledóchowski dedicated the archbishoprics of Gniezno and Poznań to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. He insisted that religion be taught in Polish and permitted religious instruction in German only for the highest classes of the Gymnasium. Because of his failure to observe the May Laws issued by the Prussian government, he was fined 30,000 taler (about $90,000). On Nov. 24, 1873, the governor of the Province of Posen demanded his resignation from his episcopal office. Upon his refusal, he was arrested on Feb. 3, 1874 and interned at Oströw. The Prussian court for ecclesiastical affairs ordered his removal from office and forced the cathedral chapter to elect a successor, but the archbishop's authority actually increased during his detention (1874-76). Pope Pius IX called him "the brave defender of the faith" and upon making him a cardinal (1875) compared him with John FISHER. After his release, he was forbidden to reside in his sees or in the neighboring provinces. When he issued regulations for his archdioceses from Rome, he was again fined by the German government for "usurpation of episcopal rights." During the negotiations leading to the settlement of the Kulturkampf, he resigned from his archbishoprics (February 1886). Meanwhile, beginning in 1883 he had been serving in the papal Secretariate of State; in 1885 he was made secretary of papal briefs. He was a highly respected member of several Roman congregations and served as prefect of the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH (1892–1902). He was skeptical of the efforts of the Holy See to reach an understanding with Russia and even expressed opposition. In 1927 his remains were transferred from Rome to the cathedral of Poznań.

Bibliography: J. B. KISSLING, Geschichte des Kulturkampfes im Deutschen Reiche, 3 v. (Freiburg 1911–16). W. KLIMKIEWICZ, Kardynal Ledóchowski na tle swej epoki, 1822–1902, 2 v. (Cracow 1938–39). E. WINTER, Russland und die slawischen Völker in der Diplomatie des Vatikans, 1878–1903 (Berlin 1950). A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 2:621–622. G. MARON, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 6 v. (Tübingen 1957–63) 4:261–262.

[B. STASIEWSKI]

LEDÓCHOWSKI, WLADIMIR

Superior general of the JESUITS; b. Loosdorf, Austria, Oct. 7, 1866; d. Rome, Dec. 13, 1942. He was the son of Count Antonius Kalka-Ledóchowski, the brother of Maria T. LEDÓCHOWSKA, and the nephew of Cardinal Miecysław LEDÓCHOWSKI. During his secondary school studies at the Theresianum in Vienna, he was a page for the Austrian empress. After studying law for a year at the University of Cracow, he began to study for the secular priesthood in 1885 at Tarnów and continued them at the Gregorian University in Rome. In 1889 he joined the Jesuits and was ordained in 1894. He was appointed successively writer, superior of the residence in Cracow, and then rector of the college there, vice-provincial (1901) and provincial (1902) of the Galicia province. He acted as assistant for the German assistancy from 1906 until Feb. 11, 1915, when he was elected the 26th superior general of the order. During his term in this post (1915-42) assistancies increased in number from five to eight; provinces, from 26 to 50; missions, from 29 to 46; missionaries, from 971 to 3,785; members from 16,946 to 26,588. Ledóchowski was responsible also for the new codification of the order's constitutions after the promulgation of the Code of Canon Law; the reorganization of the superior general's curia; changes in the RATIO STUDIORUM; the notable impetus given to the Jesuit institutions of higher studies in Rome, including the Pontifical Oriental Institute and the Russian College (which was confided to the Jesuits during Ledóchowski's generalate); the promotion of publications, especially scientific ones; the vigorous impulse to the work of the SPIRITUAL EXER-CISES, to sodalities of the Blessed Virgin, and to the APOSTLESHIP OF PRAYER. His numerous letters and instructions to Jesuits promoted IGNATIAN SPIRITUALITY. Ledóchowski was noted for keen perception, knowledge of men and of conditions throughout the world, spiritual firmness, and indefatigable labor.

Bibliography: Selected Writings of Father Ledóchowski (Chicago 1945). L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon; Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934) 1085–1088. J. H. SLATTERY, ''In Memoriam: VI. Ledóchowski,'' Woodstock Letters 72 (1943): 1–20. G. CASSIANI INGONI, Il p. W. Ledóchowski (Rome 1945), uncritical.

[P. MOLINARI]

LEE, EDWARD

Archbishop of York (1531–44); b. Kent, c. 1482; d. York, Sept. 13, 1544. He was the son of Richard Lee, a country gentleman of Delee Magna, Kent. He was a bachelor of arts and fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and then received his M.A. from Cambridge in 1504. After a succession of ecclesiastical positions at Wells, Norfolk, and Lincoln, he became King Henry VIII's chaplain in 1518 and was groomed by Cardinal Thomas Wolsey for diplomatic service. From 1517 to 1520, this boyhood friend of Thomas More carried on a sharp literary controversy with Erasmus over the latter's revised version of the New Testament. Lee accused Erasmus of plagiarism, and the quarrel has led historians to describe Lee as an opponent of the new learning. Lee, however conservative in literary and religious matters, was never an obscurantist or a reactionary. He served King Henry VIII on several diplomatic missions to Austria (1523), Spain (1529), and Bologna (1530). His rapid promotions to king's almoner, the archdeaconry of Colchester, chancellor of Salisbury, and finally the archbishopric of York in 1531 were due in large measure to his efficient service. The archbishop supported King Henry VIII in his opposition to papal claims in English affairs, but he was very uncomfortable with Henry's doctrine of royal supremacy over the Church and refused to sign an agreement calling the king's first marriage void from the beginning (1533). When taken prisoner during the Pilgrimage of Grace (1536) and fearful for his life, Lee swore an oath supporting the rebellion. He later opposed the rebels, and despite royal annoyance at his somewhat hasty action retained the approval of Thomas Cromwell. A disciplinarian, the archbishop kept good order in his archdiocese. He loyally supported the Act of Six Articles in 1539 and issued new statutes for the governing of York. An opponent of Lutheranism and of Tyndale's Bible, Lee, like Bishops Stephen Gardiner, Cuthbert Tunstall, and Edmund Bonner, was a Henrician doctrinal conservative who once confessed that he owed "all things save his soul" to the king. These bishops observed the tradition of obedience to the king and state, a principle universal to Tudor England and one that had a marked effect on conservative and reformer alike.

Bibliography: W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 11:788–790. P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, rev. ed. 3 v. in 1 (New York 1963). L. B. SMITH, Tudor Prelates and Politics, 1536–1558 (Princeton 1953).

[P. S. MCGARRY]

LEEN, EDWARD

Educator, retreat master, and spiritual writer; b. Abbeyfeale, Ireland, Aug. 17, 1885; d. Dublin, Nov. 10, 1944. Edward Thomas Leen grew up in a deeply religious family, which produced three priests, including Archbishop James Leen, CSSp, of Mauritius. Educated at Rockwell College, Cashel, he made his profession in the Congregation of the Holy Ghost at Chevilly, France, in 1909. After studying philosophy at University College, Dublin, he went to Rome in 1912, where he earned his doctorate in theology summa cum laude at the Gregorian University and earned the Pius X gold medal for excellence in dogmatic theology. After working for two years as a missionary in Nigeria, he returned to Dublin and became dean of studies and subsequently president of Blackrock College. He played a prominent role in the founding of the Missionary Sisters of the Holy Rosary (1924). In 1930 he joined the staff of the Spiritan Senior Seminary in Ireland, of which he became president in 1939. In the same year he made a tour of the United States, lecturing and preaching in many places. He was happy to note, "Far from finding people who were materialistic in their outlook, I have come in contact with a spirituality which has astounded me, and I would say abashed me."

A widely read spiritual writer, Leen established his reputation with a series of books that appeared rapidly after 1935. His spiritual outlook was deeply influenced by Dom Marmion, OSB, and Francis Libermann, CSSp. All his writings are thoroughly centered on Christ and present a synthesis of Christian wisdom, linking the person's own spiritual life to that of Christ.

His philosophy of Christian humanism, expounded in What Is Education? (1943), gave rise to many controversies, but its plea that catechetical instruction take a psychological rather than logical approach and stress God's love and mercy rather than His justice has finally been heard. His other works are Progress in Mental Prayer (1935); In the Likeness of Christ (1936); The Holy Ghost (1937); Why the Cross? (1938); The True Vine and Its Branches (1938); The Church Before Pilate (1939); and The Voice of a Priest, ed. by Bernard J. Kelly, CSSp (1946).

Bibliography: M. O'CARROLL, Edward Leen, C.S.Sp. (Westminster, Md. 1953).

[H. J. KOREN]

LEEUW, GERARDUS VAN DER

Protestant theologian, leading representative of the phenomenological interpretation of religion; b. The Hague, March 18, 1890; d. Utrecht, Nov. 18, 1950. He was a professor at the University of Groningen from 1918 to 1950, but he also served as minister of education, art, and science, from 1945 to 1946. In his thought, he was influenced by N. Söderblom, R. Otto, L. Lévy-Bruhl, and R. Bultmann. He was concerned primarily with the systematic description of the phenomenon of religion, in which the history of religion had a central place. In his treatment of the primitive mentality, he made a sharp distinction between the primitive and the modern. He found no place for God in the earliest form of religion, but he maintained that this form was based on Mana. He was an artist as well as a scientist. Many of his students have made contributions in the religious aspects of music, dance, and drama. His concept of the primitive was criticized by his successor at Groningen, T. P. van Baaren, in his book Wij Mensen (Utrecht 1960).

Bibliography: Works. Phänomenologie der Religion (Tübingen 1933; 2d ed. 1956); Eng. Religion in Essence and Manifestation, tr. J. E. TURNER (London 1938); Inleiding to de phaenomenologie von de godsdienst (Haarlem 1948); German tr. with rev., Einführung in die Phänomenologie der Religion (Gütersloh 1957); Vom Heiligen in der Kunst (3d ed. ibid. 1957); Eng., Sacred and Profane Beauty, tr. D. F. GREEN (New York 1963). Literature. J. HAEKEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Frieburg 1957–65) 6:875. G. LANCZKOWSKI, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 6 v. (Tübingen 1957–63) 4:262. F. SIERKSMA, Prof. Dr. Gerardus van der Leeuw (Amsterdam 1951).

[H. M. M. FORTMANN]

LEFEBVRE, MARCEL

Missionary, bishop of Tulle (France), titular archbishop and superior general of the HOLY GHOST FATHERS; b. Tourcoing, France, Nov. 29, 1905; d. Martigny, Switzerland, March 25, 1991. Marcel Lefebvre was one of eight children of René and Gabrielle Lefebvre. Madame Lefebvre, a pious but demanding mother who predicted that her son Marcel would play a "great role" in the church, died in 1938. Marcel's father, a rigid disciplinarian with monarchist political views, was active in the French underground during World War II. Captured by the Nazis, he died in Sonnenburg Prison at age 62 in 1944.

Marcel studied for the priesthood at the French seminary in Rome. After receiving degrees in philosophy and theology, he was ordained on Sept. 21, 1929 and subsequently appointed to the working-class parish of Marias-de-Lomme, an industrial suburb of Lille, France. Three years later, through the influence of his older brother René, a priest member of the Holy Ghost Fathers, Marcel joined the same congregation. He was sent to Gabon, where he served as rector of a seminary and in various missionary apostolates in French Equatorial Africa.

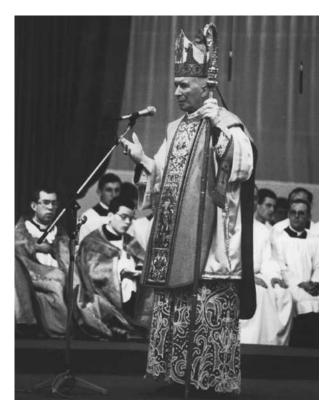

Lefebvre returned to France in 1945 to head the training school of the Holy Ghost Fathers at Mortain. Two years later he returned to Africa, was ordained a bishop, and named vicar-apostolic of Dakar by Pope Pius XII. In September 1948, Lefebvre was appointed apostolic delegate for the whole of French-speaking Africa, a position he held for the next 11 years. He returned again to France in 1959 and was appointed bishop of the diocese of Tulle by Pope John XXIII. In 1962, when he was elected superior general of the Holy Ghost Fathers, the pope named him titular archbishop of Synnada in Phrygia.

Between 1960 and 1962, Archbishop Lefebvre served on the Central Preparatory Commission charged with producing the schemata presented at the Second Vatican Council. Although he later professed that he approached Vatican II with high hopes and an open mind, his work on the Preparatory Commission quickly led to disillusionment. During the Council debates, Lefebvre's opposition to the new theological currents intensified. He was a founder of the International Group of Fathers (Coetus Internationalis Patrum) an organization of conservative prelates who maneuvered to uphold tradition against the liberal-progressive elements pressing for change. Lefebvre sided with the conservatives in all the major Council debates and refused to sign the conciliar documents on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes) and the Declaration on Religious Liberty (Dignitatis Humanae).

Seminary at Econe. In 1968 Lefebvre resigned as head of the Holy Ghost Fathers in a dispute with members of the Chapter General over reform of the order in keeping with the Council directives. He then moved to Rome to retire but, by his own account, was sought out by a group of young men who were looking for someone to direct them in traditional priestly formation. Lefebvre, who had previously directed a small group of conservative seminarians to the French seminary in Rome, subsequently encouraged them to pursue their studies at the University of Fribourg in Switzerland. He abandoned this course of action when he became convinced that the university—like the Church itself—was "infected" with modernism. In June 1969 he gained permission from Bishop Charriere of Fribourg to establish a house for seminarians and with the approval of Bishop Adam of Sion, Lefebvre obtained a large house belonging to the canons of Saint Bernard in the canton of Valias, Switzerland. This property became the Econe seminary, opening formally on Oct. 7, 1970. The following month, Bishop Charriere canonically established Lefebvre's priestly fraternity as the Fraternité Sacredotale de Pie X (the Society of Saint Pius X)-named after the Pope known as the "scourge of modernists."

Lefebvre's seminary quickly developed a reputation as a traditionalist stronghold committed to the Tridentine rite, to Thomistic theology, and to a general repudiation of the reforms of Vatican II. In the fall of 1974, in response to Lefebvre's escalating critique of the Council and continuing use of the (then prohibited) Tridentine Mass, and in response to pressures from French bishops who opposed Lefebvre's "rebel seminary," the Vatican announced an investigation of Econe. On November 21, in reaction to the "scandal" occasioned by remarks made by the two Belgian priests who carried out the visitation, Lefebvre issued an acerbic declaration denouncing the neo-modernist and neo-Protestant tendencies that were contributing to the "demolition of the Church, to the ruin of the priesthood, to the destruction of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass and the sacraments, to the disappearance of religious life, and to naturalist and Teilhardian teaching in universities, seminaries, and catechetics. . . . " Lefebvre renounced the new Mass as the preeminent symbol of all postconciliar trends opposed to "orthodoxy and the never-changing Magisterium." He pronounced Vatican II "entirely corrupt" and asserted that fidelity to the true Church could only be assured by a "categorical refusal" of the Council.

Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre speaking during the public Mass marking the 50th anniversary of his ordination, Paris, 1979. (AP/Wide World)

In February 1975, Lefebvre was asked to go to Rome for a "discussion" with curia officials. Shortly after the meeting, his Declaration was condemned as "unacceptable on all points." In spite of this reprimand, a public rebuke by Pope Paul VI, and an order to close his seminary, Lefebvre continued his traditionalist initiatives. On July 22, 1976 he was officially suspended a divinis for refusing a direct Vatican order prohibiting ordinations. Defying the suspension in August, the "rebel archbishop" gave a controversial and emotional sermon during a public and previously planned Mass at Lille. He denounced the "bastard sacraments," the "adulterous union of the Church with the Revolution," and the ecumenical dialogues with Protestants—while reiterating the call for the re-establishment of the temporal power of the Church wherever possible.

For the next 12 years, communication between Lefebvre and the Vatican remained open. The archbishop corresponded with Pope Paul VI and his successors and answered various doctrinal queries from the Vatican. While these discussions proceeded without resolve, Lefebvre's priestly fraternity steadily expanded its international network of traditionalist publishing enterprises, chapels, schools, priories, and seminaries. Lefebvre traveled extensively on behalf of the Society, giving spiritual conferences to his priests and supporters and bringing the traditional sacraments to beleaguered groups of traditionalist Catholics.

Excommunication and Death. Following the election of Pope John Paul II (1978) the atmosphere in Rome regarding the "Econe affair" turned more conciliatory. Lefebvre met personally with John Paul II on Nov. 18, 1978. Although the expectation of rapprochement was high, negotiations between Lefebvre and the Vatican remained at an impasse throughout the 1980s. In 1983, Lefebvre retired as superior general of the Society and chose Father Franz Schmidberger, a German priest, as his successor.

While appearing publicly irenic and willing to reach some accommodation with Church officialdom, Lefebvre continued to equivocate on his position on Vatican II and on the doctrinal integrity of the new (Novus Ordo) Mass. In October 1983, he increased pressure on the Vatican by intimating that he would ordain an episcopal successor, with or without papal permission.

Aging and in ill health, Lefebvre renewed this threat again in 1987 during the June ordinations at Econe when he announced his "Operation Survival" for tradition. A new round of Vatican negotiations ensued, culminating the following year in the archbishop's signing a May 5, 1988 protocol granting him much of the substance of his previous demands: official recognition of the Society, semi-independence from diocesan bishops, and permission to continue to use the Tridentine liturgy. On the critical issue of a successor, Lefebvre received permission to ordain one bishop.

The long-sought solution to the "Econe problem" proved short-lived, however. Lefebvre promptly withdrew his assent to the protocol the following day. Insisting that the Vatican was stalling and had not collaborated effectively, he demanded a June 30 date for the ordinations and the right to ordain more than one episcopal successor. These demands were refused. Lefebvre, in turn, proceeded with his plans to "perpetuate tradition" in spite of a flurry of last minute Vatican pleas. On June 30, 1988, under a tent church constructed in the shadow of his flagship seminary in Econe, he ordained four of his priests as bishops. Lefebvre and his new bishops incurred immediate excommunication—along with Bishop Antonio de Castro Mayer of Campos, Brazil, a longtime supporter of Lefebvre's, who attended the ordinations.

Following his excommunication, Lefebvre's contact with the Vatican diminished, although several overtures were undertaken from Rome to reopen the conversation. Through his writing and public pronouncements, Lefebvre maintained that his excommunication was "absolutely null and void." His denunciations of Vatican II, the conciliar Church, the de-Christianization of society, and the subversion of Catholicism by a cabal of Freemasons, communists, and liberal and modernist forces within it continued unabated.

In the early hours of March 25, 1991, following surgery for the removal of an abdominal tumor, Marcel Lefebvre died in Martigny in the Canton of Valais near Econe, Switzerland.

Archbishop Lefebvre's serene and tranquil public demeanor and deep personal piety belied a resolute and doctrinaire mind. His many years of seminary and episcopal experience sharpened his administrative acumen and political sagacity in dealing with the internal affairs of his expanding priestly fraternity and with Vatican officials. To his opponents and detractors he was an incorrigible reactionary whose conservative religious views and rigid ecclesiology paralleled the ancien regime political thinking of France's extreme right-wing elements. From the magisterial perspective Lefebvre became a recalcitrant and disobedient servant who refused to recognize an ecumenical council, broke the bonds of ecclesial unity, and led his followers into a schism because of his "incomplete and contradictory" notion of the Church's living tradition.

To many of his supporters, however, the French archbishop was a "saint," a modern day Athanasius, an instrument of Providence who heroically exposed the "false spirit" of Vatican II and who acted to save the Church from its betrayal by a modernist bureaucracy and the forces of subversion that had long conspired against it

Throughout his controversy with the Vatican, the "rebel archbishop" presented his actions in the rhetoric of classical sectarianism: as pristine and uncorrupted initiatives through which he and his supporters alone maintained continuity with the true faith. He died professing that he had done no more than "hand down" what he had received by his own training and ecclesial mandate.

Bibliography: Y. CONGAR. Challenge to the Church: The Case of Archbishop Lefebvre (Huntington IN 1976). J. HANU, Vatican Encounter: Conversations with Archbishop Lefebvre, trans. E. Shosberger (Kansas City KS 1978). M. DAVIES, Apologia Pro Marcel Lefebvre, Vols. I, II, III (Dickinson TX 1980, 1984, 1988). M. LEFEBVRE, A Bishop Speaks: Writings and Addresses, 1963-1975 (Edinburgh n.d.); I Accuse the Council (Dickinson TX 1982); An Open Letter to Confused Catholics (Herefordshire, England 1986). F. LAISNEY, Archbishop Lefebvre and the Vatican, 1987-1988 (Dickinson TX 1989). W. DINGES, "Roman Catholic Traditionalism," in M.E. MARTY and R.S. APPLEBY, eds., Fundamentalisms Observed, Vol. I (Chicago 1991): 66-101. The Angelus XI:7 (July 1988); XIV:5/6 (May/June 1991).

[W. D. DINGES]

LEFEVERE, PETER PAUL

Bishop, missionary; b. Roulers, Bruges, Belgium, April 29, 1804; d. Detroit, Mich., March 4, 1869. He was the son of Charles and Albertine (Muylle) Lefevere. After study at the Lazarist seminary in Paris, he was sent to Missouri, where he completed his theology at The Barrens in Perryville. He was ordained by Bishop Gabriel Rosati of St. Louis, Mo., on Nov. 20, 1831, and then was pastor for seven years in Salt River, a parish covering eight stations in Missouri, four in Illinois, and two in Wisconsin. His work earned him appointment as administrator and coadjutor of Detroit, and he was consecrated on Nov. 21, 1841. He began his episcopate in a diocese that was disorganized and financially distressed. Lefevere recruited priests from Belgium, and in 1844 he introduced the Daughters of Charity, the first of a number of teaching sisterhoods to come to Michigan. To bring discipline to clergy and laity, he issued the first set of diocesan statutes (1843) and held the first diocesan synod (1859). Against much opposition, he secured for himself and his successors the ownership of church property. He also promoted the cause of temperance, particularly among the Indians. Beyond the diocese, he founded, with Bishop John Lancaster Spalding, the American College at Louvain, Belgium, and sent priests from Detroit to be its first four rectors. Lefevere had come to a territory that contained only 25 churches and 18 priests; he left, at his death, 160 churches and 88 priests in the lower peninsula of Michigan alone.

Bibliography: R. H. CLARKE, Lives of the Deceased Bishops of the Catholic Church in the United States, 4 v. (New York 1887–89).

[E. P. ATZERT]

LEFÈVRE D'ÉTAPLES, JACQUES

Humanist Aristotelian, Biblical and patristic scholar; b. Étaples, Picardy, c. 1461; d. Nérac, French Navarre, March 1536. He was educated at the University of Paris (B.A., 1479). Lefèvre lectured on philosophy at the Collège Cardinal Lemoine from c. 1490 until he retired from active teaching in 1508. Between 1508 and 1520 he continued his scholarly work at the abbey of Saint-Germaindes-Prés under the patronage of the abbot Guillaume BRI-CONNET, subsequently bishop of Meaux. In June 1521 Briçonnet called him to Meaux to participate in a comprehensive program of diocesan reform. His chief contribution was a French translation of the New Testament (1523) and Psalms (1524). The fortuitous coincidence of the Meaux experiment with the first penetration of Lutheranism in France focused the attention of the faculty of theology on his works. In 1523 a committee of theologians detected 11 errors in his commentary on the Gospels. When summoned to appear before the Parlement of Paris on suspicion of heresy, Lefévre fled to Strasbourg in the late summer of 1525. He was recalled by Francis I in 1526 and appointed librarian at Blois and tutor of the King's children; he finished translating the Bible under royal protection and published it in a single volume at Antwerp in 1530. He passed his last years in tranquil retirement at the court of Marguerite d'Angoulême, Queen of Navarre.

Lefévre's principal intellectual interests were the philosophy of Aristotle, the Pauline Epistles, patristic literature, and the tradition of medieval Christian mysticism. By means of translations, commentaries, introductions, and paraphrases he recovered, or so his contemporaries believed, both the precise meaning of the works of Aristotle and the true elegance of their style. From Aristotle he urged his readers to turn to a reverent study of Scripture, guided by the Fathers. He himself edited a variety of patristic texts and undertook a major program of Biblical research and commentary: on the Psalms (1509), St. Paul (1512), the Gospels (1522), and the Catholic Epistles (1527). But it was in the mystics that Lefévre found the most satisfying nourishment of his own piety. He published works of Richard of Saint-Victor, Elizabeth of Schönau, and Hildegarde of Bingen; seven books by Raymond Lull; and Ruysbroeck's De ornatu spiritualium nuptiarum. Lefévre crowned his Aristotelian, patristic, and Biblical scholarship with a variety of speculative mysticism derived from the two thinkers who influenced him most profoundly, Pseudo-Dionysius and Nicholas of Cusa. After 1519 Lefévre moved toward a more self-consciously Biblical theology. He read Luther with sympathetic interest. A common devotion to St. Paul gives their doctrines of justification a superficial resemblance, while direct Lutheran influence can be detected in his last works. But he remained too attached to Catholic sentiment and practice and too committed to the image of human liberty and dignity in Aristotle and the Greek Fathers to break with tradition.

See Also: ARISTOTELIANISM; RENAISSANCE PHILOSOPHY; MYSTICISM; HUMANISM.

Bibliography: É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 9.1: 132–159. A. RENAUDET, Préréforme et humanisme à Paris pendant les premières guerres d'Italie, 1494–1517 (2d ed. Melun 1953). M. MANN, Érasme et les débuts de la Réforme française, 1517–1536 (Paris 1934). E. F. RICE, "The Humanist Idea of Christian Antiquity: Lefévre d' Étaples and His Circle," Studies in the Renaissance (New York 1954–) 9 (1962) 126–160. G. BEDO-UELLE, Lefèvre d'Étaples et l'intelligence des écritures (Geneva 1976). J. LEFÈVRE D'ÉTAPLES, The Prefatory Epistles of Jacques Lèfevre d'Étaples (New York 1972). E. F. RICE, "Jacques Lèfevre d'Étaples and the Medieval Christian Mystics," in Florilegium Historiale, J. G. ROWE and W. H. STOCKDALE, eds. (Toronto 1971).

[E. F. RICE]

LEGATES, PAPAL

Papal legates are clerics sent by the pope into a particular nation, with or without ecclesiastical jurisdiction, with or without diplomatic character, to treat, on his behalf, of the Church affairs entrusted to them.

Papal Prerogative of Legation. It is the right of the Roman pontiff, independent of all civil authority, to send legates into every part of the world. Because the pope unites in himself two distinct sovereignties, the spiritual and the temporal, he enjoys the right of legation by a twofold juridical title. It is, however, in virtue of the mandate received from the divine founder of the Church that the right to send legates is eminently his. The primacy, or the pope's supreme, full, and immediate jurisdiction in the universal Church requires, as a logical consequence, that it be so. This refers primarily to the right of internal legation—the legation concerned with the jurisdictional relations of the pope with local churches and subordinate ecclesiastical authorities in the world. The pope enjoys further the right of external legation—the legation concerned with the Church's international activities and her relations with civil governments. External legation is the right of all independent states and, in general, of all subjects of international law, that is, of any international institution having an independent and autonomous personality within the international community. The Church is such a universal juridic entity or society juridically perfect. This is so although it lacks, or may at times lack (as do other atypical international entities, such as the United Nations), certain characteristics typical of states. For a great number of centuries the Church has been so considered. Thus, as a subject of international law, it was consistently permitted, even when deprived of its temporal power, the performance of acts belonging exclusively to the competence of universal juridic entities. Among these acts is the uncontested exercise of external legation, passive and active.

Early History. There were practical applications of the papal right of internal legation as early as the 4th century, when the popes began sending representatives to general and particular councils and, as vicars apostolic, to remote provinces of the Church. From the 5th century through the middle of the 8th, other legates were being sent by Rome, in what may be considered the first manifestations of the papal right of external legation. These apocrisiaries, or responsales (papal agents and observers), were to act as papal representatives at the imperial court in Constantinople. The first of these was sent by Leo I. Their function was to keep Rome posted on the happenings at the court and in the eastern regions of the Empire and to convey the pope's instructions on the Church's doctrinal and disciplinary matters, as well as on questions affecting Italy.

Diplomatic legates of a special kind, called legati missi (literally, "legates sent"), made their appearance about the 9th century. Their importance and prestige grew when, in the 11th century, their legations, both to courts of princes and to particular Church dignitaries, began to be entrusted to cardinals—who were then given greater power and the higher title of legati a latere (legates sent from the pope's side, as it were). The Middle Ages brought still another category of legates—the legati nati (native legates or born legates), so called because they were not sent from Rome but received their role, chiefly a jurisdictional one in matters strictly ecclesiastical, as incumbents of some illustrious episcopal see, such as Canterbury, York, Rheims, Cologne, Prague, or Toledo. There, and in surrounding territories, these residential archbishops represented the pope and acted in his name. The papal emissaries for final purposes were another kind of medieval legate (nuntii et collectores iurium, redituum et omnium bonorum Camerae Apostolicae). Their chief task was to collect alms and tithes of princes and the faithful and forward them to Rome and otherwise raise funds for the support of the Holy See and its activities. Their range of duty extended beyond the financial until, not infrequently, it included negotiations and transactions of a diplomatic nature with local political authorities.

The modern nuncios and nunciatures trace their origins to one or more of these types of legates. They derive their name and pattern from the last mentioned—the nuntii and collectores.

Modern Development. The first nuncios and nunciatures in the modern sense date from the close of the 15th century. According to some, the first papal agent on a permanent basis was Francisco de Prats, Alexander VI's emissary to Spain from 1492 to 1503. Others say Angelo Leonini, sent to Venice in 1500 by the same pope, was the first nuncio. These and others who may then have been called nuncios were certainly true emissaries of the popes. Whether they were nuncios in the strict sense (papal officers sent as ambassadors to a foreign court on a permanent basis with authority to treat any question affecting the pope and the princes) is not clear, for the term "nuncio" was still used in a broad sense at the time and could indifferently describe an envoy sent on either an extraordinary or an ordinary mission. At any rate, before the Reformation there were nunciatures in Vienna, Paris, Madrid, Lisbon, and Naples. More were added after the Protestant Revolt, in Cologne (1582), Brussels (1577), and other northern cities.

In 1584, Gregory XIII (1572-85) strengthened the system of papal diplomacy, giving it organic structure and a body of well-defined regulations. For the first time, the distinctive role, attributions, and economic treatment of the various kinds of papal diplomatic agents (nuncios, internuncios, legates, etc.) were clearly defined. This reorganization was instrumental in ushering in the golden era of Church diplomacy. But soon after the Treaties of Westphalia (1648) came a period of decline that lasted for more than two centuries. There was a notable amelioration in the period between World Wars I and II, as all over the world nunciatures, internunciatures, and apostolic delegations grew in number and prestige. After World War II, numerous and active representations were established in Asia and Africa. For the list of all papal missions, diplomatic and nondiplomatic, as well as of all civil diplomatic missions accredited to the Holy See, see the latest edition of Annuario pontificio, the book prepared and issued annually by the Vatican Secretariate of State.

Functions. Paul VI in the motu proprio of June 24, 1969, Sollicitudo omnium Ecclesiarum, redefined the meaning and function of papal legates. They are ecclesiastics, especially bishops, who are entrusted with the task of personally and stably representing the pope in various countries and regions. The term "legate" applies to a number of different kinds of officials. Apostolic delegates are the personal representatives of the pope to local Churches. NUNCIOS, pronuncios, or internuncios represent the Holy See to the civil governments of the territories in which they serve as well as to the local Church there. Occasionally a papal mission is appointed to deal with a specific issue in a given country. Both lay people and clerics can be sent as delegates or observers to international conferences; these, too, are papal legates; but their office is not treated in detail in general canonical legislation.

A legate expresses the pope's concern for the good of the nation in which he serves, especially with respect to questions of peace and the development of peoples. He is charged with protecting the legitimate interests of the Church in her dealings with the civil government. Occasionally and bearing in mind the advice of local bishops, he enters into negotiations with the civil government about questions of concern to both CHURCH AND STATE. Within the limits of his mandate and in close association with the bishops and patriarchs of the region, the legate promotes ecumenical dialogue. Being under the direction of the cardinal secretary of state and the prefect of the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church, the legate reports directly to them about all his activities.

Other duties of the legate are more closely allied with internal affairs. He informs the Holy See about the spiritual condition of the local Church and communicates and interprets papal documents and curial deliberations to the local Church. He is the facilitator of the process whereby candidates for the episcopacy are selected; and he forwards their names to the proper Roman dicasteries, together with an accurate indication of which candidate seems most suitable. The legate also has the duty of studying the question of the creation, division, and suppression of dioceses. He will inform the proper Roman dicastery of the episcopal conference's recommendations on the matter.

The legate is advised to give generous assistance and counsel to individual residential bishops. Although not himself a member of the national episcopal conference, he generally attends its sessions. He is to be notified in advance of its agenda and is to inform the Holy See about it. The legate exercises similar functions with respect to religious superiors and the national conferences of religious. Whenever no official delegate or observer has been appointed to an international conference within his territory, the legate is to pursue the business of the conference, informing the Holy See of its progress. Delegates or observers at an international conference are to complete the mission entrusted to them after consulting with the legate in whose territory they happen to be.

The legation (offices of the papal legate) itself has certain legal privileges. It is exempt from the jurisdiction of the local Ordinary and the legate can grant faculties for use in the oratory of the legation. The legate has the right to bless the people and to celebrate the Liturgy of the Hours in all churches within his territory. He takes precedence over all patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops within his territory, but not over cardinals. All of these rights aim at making clear the dignity of the office of the legate and at enabling him to perform his duties more easily.

Bibliography: A. WYNEN, Die päpstliche Diplomatie geschichtlich und rechtliche dargestellt (Freiburg im Br. 1922). P. BREZ-ZI, La diplomazia pontificia (Milan 1942). G. PARO, The Right of Papal Legation (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 211; Washington 1947). P. SAVINO, Diplomazia ecclesiastica (Rome 1952). E. L. HESTON, "Papal Diplomacy: Its Organization and Way of Action," The Catholic Church in World Affairs, ed. W. GURIAN and M. A. FITZIMONS (Notre Dame, Ind. 1954). G. DE MARCHI, Le nunziature apostoliche dal 1800 al 1956 (Rome 1957). D. STAFFA, Le delegazioni apostoliche (Rome 1959). R. A. GRAHAM, Vatican Diplomacy (Princeton 1959). I. CARDINALE, Le Saint-Siège et la diplomatie (Paris 1963). J. ABBO and J. HANNAN, The Sacred Canons, 2 v. (2d ed. St. Louis 1960) 1:265–270. PAUL VI, Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 61 (Rome 1969) 471–484.

[J. A. ABBO/J. G. JOHNSON]

LE GAUDIER, ANTHONY

Jesuit theologian and spiritual writer; b. Château-Thierry, France, Jan. 7, 1572; d. Paris, April 14, 1622. At the age of 17 Le Gaudier entered the Society of Jesus in Belgium (Sept. 4, 1589). As a Jesuit, he exhibited an exceptional talent for directing the spiritual lives of his fellow religious. This was so true of his life as a professor of scripture at Pont-à-Mousson and as a professor of moral theology at La Flèche and at Verdun that Le Gaudier was eventually made master of novices and of tertians, and he served as rector at Liège and at Paris. It was during his years as rector in Paris (1618-21) that he published his works on the spiritual life. Written originally in Latin, they were translated into French and other languages. They include De sanctissimo Christi Jesus Dei et hominis amore paraeneticum in quo ejus amoris causae praxis et fructus exponuntur (Pont-à-Mousson 1619), De vera Christi Jesus Dei et hominis imitatione (Paris 1620), De Dei praesentia (Paris 1620), and Praxis meditandi a B. P. Ignatio Societatis Jesu fundatore traditae explicatio (Paris 1620). However, Le Gaudier's outstanding contribution to Catholic asceticism, De natura et statibus perfectionis (Paris 1643), was published posthumously.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:1265–68. J. DE GUIBERT, The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice, tr. W. J. YOUNG (Chicago 1964). J. J. MCCANN, Contemplation and the Mixed Life according to Antonius Le Gaudier, S.J. (Manila 1951). H. DE GENSAC, Revue d'ascétique et mystique 39 (1963) 172–195, 338–360.

[V. A. LAPOMARDA]

LÉGER, PAUL-EMILE

Cardinal, archbishop of Montreal, missionary; b. St. Anicet, Quebec, April 26, 1904; d. Montreal, Nov. 13, 1991. Léger was the son of Ernest and Alva (Beauvais) Léger. Required to leave school at an early age because of ill health, he apprenticed first as a butcher and then as a mechanic before he resolved one Christmas morning to be a priest. He was accepted by the Société de St. Sulpice and proceeded with his priestly studies at Montreal's Grand Séminaire.

Ordained in 1929, Léger was sent for further studies to the Institut Catholique in Paris. He spent some years in Japan establishing a new seminary in Fukuoka. After a term as rector of the Pontifical Canadian College in Rome, he was appointed archbishop of Montreal in 1950.

In 1953, Léger was created a cardinal by Pope Pius XII. A member of the preparatory commission for the Second Vatican Council and a confidant of Popes John XXIII and Paul VI, Léger was identified with the leading progressives of the Council—Alfrink, Suenens, and Lercaro. He spoke eloquently of the primacy of love over law and repeatedly reminded the hierarchy that the laity, particularly in the area of sexual morality, had an indispensable role to play in the life of the Church. They must be listened to, he argued, and their experience and wisdom given heavy weight by Church authorities.

In 1967, Léger amazed the world by resigning as archbishop of Montreal. He exchanged the vermilion robes of the cardinal prince for the white soutane of the missionary priest. He reasoned: "I have reached the age when a certain sclerosis of soul and body sets in. The spur must be used to get out of the rut." He went to work among the lepers of Cameroon.

Bibliography: K. BELL, A Man and his Mission: Cardinal Léger in Africa (Scarborough 1976). J. DUGGAN, Paul-Emile Léger (Don Mills 1981). L. LACHANCE, Le prince et les lépreux (Montreal 1972). P. E. LÉGER, Les origines de l'homme: Conférence prononcée a l'Université de Montréal (Montreal 1961).

[M. HIGGINS]

LEGES ROMANAE BARBARORUM

Leges romanae barbarorum is a comprehensive term employed for the law codes issued by the Germanic kings, from the middle of the 5th century A.D., for their subjects of Roman origin. They are the Lex Romana Visigothorum, Lex Romana Burgundionum, and Lex Romana Curiensis. Whether the Visigoths had put out an earlier Codex Theodoricianus c. 458 to 466 for the population living under their traditional Roman law is a disputed question. The personal principle was still in force at that time, i.e., Romans and Germans lived under a different law; although both were under the same German royal rule. Gradually the territorial principle dominated, i.e., the same law for all subjects, a step that was closely connected with Romanization. The extant sources (leges) reflect in part this development, since at first one finds side by side Leges Romanae for the Romans and Leges Barbarorum for the Germans, but later one finds a merging of the two into a common code of law for both elements of the population. For example, on the one hand, the prohibition of marriage between Goths and Romans was abolished under King Leovigild (568-586), and the abandonment of Arianism for Catholicism by the Goths under Leovigild's successor, Reccared I (586–601), was of basic significance for the process of legal unification. On the other hand, among the other Gothic peoples, e.g., the Ostrogoths (so in the kingdom of Theodoric between A.D. 493 and 507), the law was the same for Romans and Germans from the outset.

The Roman law in the Leges Romanae constituted what was known as a vulgar law. It was no longer on the level of classical jurisprudence and was somewhat primitive and crude. No distinction was made anywhere between ownership and possession. The drafting of the Leges was done by members of the clergy and laymen trained in Roman law. However, it is possible, often very clearly, to trace the respective roles of the royal chanceries and the Church in the legislation. At times the influence of the Roman vulgar law was so strong that it all but suppressed German national law. The latter then maintained itself outside the Leges as customary law over a long period. During the high Middle Ages in Spain, for example, in a land once held by the VISIGOTHS, it even received a written form in the so–called Fueros.

Bibliography: R. BUCHNER, Die Rechtsquellen in W. WATEN-BACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Vorzeit und Karolinger, Hefte 1–4, ed. W. LEVISON and H. LÖWE (Weimar 1952–63) Beiheft 1953. K. VON AMIRA and K. A. ECKHARDT, Germanisches Recht, v.1 (4th ed. Berlin 1960). H. MITTEIS and H. LIEBERICH, Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte (9th ed. Munich 1965). Estudios visigóticos, v.2 El Codigo de Eurico (Rome 1960) ed. and tr. A. D'ORS.

[H. THIEME]

LEGION OF MARY

An international association of lay Catholics founded in Dublin, Ireland (1921), for the spiritual advancement of its members and the general intensification of Catholic life. On Sept. 7, 1921, a small group of lay people, stimulated by an awareness of the Christian vocation to be a witness and urged on by the writings of the popes, met with their parish priest in St. Nicholas of Myra parish, Dublin, to discover some practical means of translating their discussions on the doctrine of the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST and the writings of St. Louis Marie

GRIGNION DE MONTFORT into concrete action in the service of others. The system of lay apostleship that eventually became known as the Legion of Mary was influenced also by the ST. VINCENT DE PAUL SOCIETY, which was extremely active in Dublin during the 1920s. During the next 40 years the original group of the Myra Street meeting multiplied worldwide. In addition to the active members of the Legion of Mary, there are also auxiliary members who render the Legion a service of prayer. The Legion was first established in the U.S. in 1931.

Membership. The Legion admits any practicing Catholic of at least 18 years of age. (A junior system, differing only in the adaptation of the work to adolescents, parallels the senior organization and prepares the young for membership in the senior group). The Legion demands high standards of Christian life, but only after the member is enrolled and not as a prerequisite for admission; the method employed consists of prayer and active work in the apostolate. Consequently, the two most fundamental requirements for membership are (1) attendance at the weekly meeting, where the Legion prayers, spiritual reading, and guidance by the spiritual director form the member and (2) the performance of a substantial amount of assigned apostolic work each week. Discipline, very much a part of the ideal of membership, is measured by the individual's adherence to the system; in addition, each member has a personal responsibility to recruit new members, both active and auxiliary. The Legion seeks to undertake any and every form of social service and evangelical outreach. The visitation of homes is the most characteristic work of the Legion members.

Organization. The nomenclature employed, derived from ancient Roman military usage, designates the individual unit or cell as a praesidium, a district of two or more praesidia as a curia, the governing body for a country or region as a senatus, and the supreme governing body as the concilium. The higher governing bodies come into existence only as the multiplication of praesidia requires them. As the number of praesidia in an area increases, the curias, composed of the officers of the various praesidia, are multiplied and in turn are governed by a higher council, the comitium. Several comitia are supervised by a senatus, which answers directly to the highest council in the system, the concilium, whose headquarters are in Dublin. This tight supervision of the lower groups by the governing councils, together with the standard handbook accounts for the remarkable uniformity throughout the world.

Bibliography: LEGION OF MARY, The Official Handbook of the Legion of Mary. F. DUFF, Miracles on Tap (Bay Shore, NY 1962), by the founder of Legion of Mary. L. C. MORAND, The Character of the Legion of Mary in the Law of the Church (London 1955). L. J. SUENENS, Theology of the Apostolate of the Legion of Mary (Westminster, MD 1954). F. J. RIPLEY and F. S. MITCHELL, Souls at Stake (New York 1948).

IT. P. CARROLL/EDS.1

LEGIONARIES OF CHRIST

A clerical congregation established in Mexico City in 1941 by Marcial Maciel, a priest from Cotija, Michoacán. During the religious persecution in Mexico in 1936, Maciel, then a 16-year-old seminarian, felt called to start a religious congregation of priests. On Jan. 3, 1941, under the auspices of Francisco Gonzáles Arias, bishop of Cuernavaca, he founded the Legion of Christ and opened the Sacred Heart Apostolic School with a group of 13 boys.

In 1946 Maciel opened a second Apostolic School and the first novitiate in Comillas, Santander, Spain. On May 25, 1948, the Holy See granted the legion the nihil obstat necessary for the canonical establishment of a diocesan congregation. The Holy See elevated it to pontifical status with the Decree of Praise (Decretum laudis) on Feb. 6, 1965 and gave definitive approval of its constitutions on June 29, 1983.

Regnum Christi. Meanwhile, in 1949 Father Maciel founded Regnum Christi, an apostolic movement dedicated to the service of humanity and the world. It includes laity, men and women, deacons and priests. The association reminds its members of their responsibility, rooted in baptism, to make faith the driving force in their daily lives and to undertake organized apostolic activity. The Regnum Christi Movement is inspired by the charism of its founder and is closely allied with the Legionaries of Christ.

In 1950 the Legion of Christ moved its general headquarters to Rome and established a Center for Higher Studies. In 1958 the Legionaries, with the support of Mexican Catholics, built the church of Our Lady of Guadalupe adjacent to the Generalate. The legion has centers of formation in Mexico, Spain, Italy, Ireland, and the United States. Its U.S. headquarters are in Cheshire, Conn.

Bibliography: J. GARCIA, "Legionari di Cristo" and "Marcial Maciel," Dizionario degli Isituti di Perfezione, 5 v. (Rome 1978). M. MACIEL, Integral Formation of Catholic Priests (Hamden, Conn. 1998).

[J. GARCIA]

LEGITIMACY OF CHILDREN (CANON LAW)

Legitimacy, in its ordinary sense, means that a person has been conceived from a valid marriage. Thus a person conceived or born outside of valid wedlock, or born, but not conceived, of a valid marriage would be illegitimate according to the natural law. This same principle would apply if such a person was conceived and born of a marriage that was thought, at least by one party, to be valid, but in fact was not. However, legitimacy in canon law is not so narrowly defined. The Church broadens the definition by considering as legitimate those born of a union that is thought to be valid but in reality is not.

Definition. Church law considers as legitimate those born or conceived of a valid or putative marriage (Codex iuris canonicis c. 1137). This definition includes not only those naturally legitimate, but also gives a juridic legitimacy to those born of a putative marriage, that is, a marriage thought to be valid by at least one of the parties.

For a marriage to be valid it is required that there existed no invalidating impediment to the marriage, that true matrimonial consent is given, and that the required form of marriage is followed. It must be noted that a marriage is usually not described as putative for a Catholic party if he has not followed the Catholic form of marriage. (See MARRIAGE LEGISLATION [CANON LAW].)

The church law enumerates certain presumptions. First of these is that the husband of the woman is the father of her child unless the contrary is proved by clear evidence (Codex iuris canonicis c. 1138 1). Another is that a child born at least 180 days after the celebration of the marriage or within 300 days after conjugal life has been dissolved is presumed to be legitimate (Codex iuris canonicis c. 1138 2).

Legitimation of Children. The Holy See may change the status of an illegitimate child and declare him or her legitimate. The reasons the Church might so decree are for the good of the child, the parents, and society. A child is also legitimated by subsequent valid or putative marriage of his or her parents (Codex iuris canonicis c. 1139).

There is an additional way of legitimatizing children. Illegitimate persons may become fully legitimate by a radical sanation (Codex iuris canonicis c. 1161; Corpus canonum ecclesiarum orientalium c. 848). A radical sanation is an extraordinary means of convalidating a marriage. It dispenses from impediments, dispenses from the renewal of consent, and, by a fiction of law, the canonical effects of the marriage are retroactive. One of these effects is the legitimation of the offspring. This is legitimation in its fullest sense; it is as if the child were born of a valid marriage. The effect reaches back to the time when the parties first exchanged true matrimonial consent. Thus, any children conceived or born after this first consent are to be considered legitimate.

Effects. Under the 1917 Code of Canon Law, there were several instances where persons who were illegitimate were barred from certain ecclesiastical dignities and offices. Illegitimacy would have prohibited a man from entering a seminary because illegitimacy made him irregular to receive Orders (1917 Codex iuris canonicis c. 984, 1°). An illegitimate man would have also been restricted from the cardinalate (1917 Codex iuris Canonicis c. 232 §2, 1°), the episcopacy (1917 Codex iuris Canonicis c. 331 §1, 1–) and the office of abbot or prelate nullius (1917 Codex iuris Canonicis c. 320 §2). Illegitimate persons could not have been elected to the office of major superior in religious institutes (1917 Codex iuris Canonicis c. 504).

There are no effects of illegitimacy in the 1983 Code of Canon Law. The Church maintains the distinction in canon law, although it has little practical importance.

Bibliography: J. ABBO and J. HANNAN, The Sacred Canons (St. Louis 1960) 2:1114–17. H. A. AYRINHAC and P. J. LYDON, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law (New York 1957) 1114–17. T. L. BOUSCAREEN and A. C. ELLIS, Canon Law (Milwaukee 1957) 1154–60. G. I. MCDEVITT, Legitimacy and Legitimation (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 138; Washington 1941). T. P. DOYLE, in J. A. CORIDEN et al., The Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary (New York 1985) 810–811. L. A. ROBITAILLE in J. P. BEAL et al., New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York 2000).

[A. SWIFT]

LE GOBIEN, CHARLES

French Jesuit, founder of the Lettres édifiantes an important source of information on the history of Catholic missions; b. Saint-Malo, Dec. 20, 1653; d. Paris, March 5, 1708. He entered the Society of Jesus on Nov. 25, 1671. After teaching for a number of years in Jesuit schools in Tours and Alençon, he became procurator for the Chinese mission. To arouse interest in the work of the Jesuit missionaries, in 1697 he published a letter on the progress of religion in China. That was followed in 1698 by a history of the Chinese emperor's edict in favor of Christianity with an explanation of the CHINESE RITES honoring Confucius and the dead, and next by an account in 1700 of the Catholic missions in the Marianas Islands. Then in 1702, Gobien began the Lettres édifiantes, an annual publication of selected letters from Jesuit missionaries in China and the East Indies. He continued as editor of the first eight volumes. The entire collection of 36 volumes was reissued about four times; and M. L. Aimé-Martin published an abridged French edition entitled Panthéon Littéraire (1838-43). Some of the letters were translated into English in 1714 and German in 1720.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, *Bibliotèque de la Compag*nie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:1512–1515; 9:417; 12:1124. C. CARY-ELWES, China and the Cross: A Survey of Missionary History (New York 1957).

[J. V. MENTAG]

LEHMKUHL, AUGUST

Jesuit moralist; b. Hagen, Westphalia, Sept. 23, 1834; d. Valkenburg, Holland, June 23, 1918. He taught scripture and later moral theology at Maria Laach. He then taught at Ditton Hall, England, until 1880, when he returned to the Continent and devoted himself exclusively to writing. In 1883 he published his major work, the Theologia Moralis (2 v. Freiburg). In it he applied the principles of St. THOMAS AQUINAS and St. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI to contemporary problems in moral theology. It has gone through numerous editions and revisions. His other major work was his Casus Conscientiae (2 v. Freiburg 1902–04). In the area of social and economic justice he wrote Arbeitsvertrag und Streik (Freiburg 1899); Die Soziale Not und der Kirchliche Einfluse (1892); and Die Internationale Regelung der Sozialen Frage (Freiburg 1893). In these and other articles he was a pioneer in attempting an exact and scientific analysis of sociopolitical problems from the viewpoint of moral theology. He was an ardent defender of many of the demands of the working class.

Bibliography: G. GUNDLACH, Staatslexicon, H. SACHER, ed. (Freiburg 1957–) 5:335–336.

[R. M. BUSH]

LEHODEY, VITAL

Trappist Cistercian ascetico-mystical author; b. Hambye, France, Dec. 17, 1857 (Baptized Alcime Jude); d. Abbey of Bricquebec, Diocese of Coutances, May 6, 1948. After ordination to the priesthood on Dec. 18, 1880, Lehodey spent nine years in diocesan ministry before entering the Trappist Cistercian Abbey of Bricquebec, where he took the religious habit and received the name Vital, on Aug. 15, 1890. Appointed prior upon his simple profession on Aug. 20, 1892, he became superior ad nutum, on Nov. 1, 1893; and, thanks to an indult permitting anticipation of his solemn profession, he was elected abbot on July 8, 1895. Reasons of health forced his resignation in 1929.

The fruits of Lehodey's progressive liberation from a somewhat rigoristic pessimism characteristic of his milieu are found in three major works. Les Voies de l'oraison mentale (Paris 1908; The Ways of Mental Prayer, Dublin 1912), notable for its clarity and solid theology, marks a return to a mystical tradition sadly neglected in the aftermath of the quietist and Jansenist controversies. The Directoire spirituel (Bricquebec 1910; A Spiritual Directory for Religious, New Melleray 1932, Gethsemani Abbey 1946), is a revision of the order's Directoire of 1869, the excessive pessimism of which is tempered by a new insistence on the primacy of charity and contemplation. Le Saint abandon (Paris 1919; Holy Abandonment, Dublin 1934) is universally recognized as a classic on this subject.

Gottfried Wilhelm von Leibniz.

Bibliography: "Dom Vital Lehodey, 1857–1948," Collectanea Ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorum 10 (1948) 155–161. I. VALLERY-RADOT, La Mission de Dom Vital Lehodey (Paris 1956), Eng. adaptation by N. KINSELLA, Flight and Pursuit: The Mission of Dom Vital Lehodey (Dublin 1962).

[C. WADDELL]

LEIBNIZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM VON

German philosopher, polyhistorian, and court adviser; b. Leipzig, July 1, 1646; d. Hanover, Nov. 14, 1716.

Life. Leibniz studied law, mathematics, and philosophy at Jena and Leipzig. There he became acquainted with, and was influenced by, the works of Aristotle and the scholastics, especially F. SUÁREZ, as well as contemporary mechanistic theories in the natural sciences. At 17 he wrote De principio individui (Leipzig 1663); at 20 he received the degree of doctor of laws in Altdorf, near Nuremberg. In 1667 Leibniz entered the service of the Archbishop-Elector of Mainz, J. P. Schönborn, who wielded considerable influence in the political life of the times. Leibniz spent the years from 1672 to 1676 as a diplomat in Paris, where he came into contact with prominent scientists, philosophers, and theologians, among them C. Huygens, E. Mariotte, N. MALEBRANCHE, E. W. Tschirnhaus, and A. ARNAULD. Between his duties in Paris, he managed to go to London, where he corresponded with members of the Royal Society. On his return to Germany, he sought out and conferred with B. SPINOZA in Holland. While in Paris, Leibniz invented the infinitesimal calculus, which I. Newton had also discovered. Then, from 1776 on, Leibniz was court adviser and librarian for the Duke of Braunschweig-Lüneburg at Hanover, where he worked on the history of the Guelfs and made an excellent series of source studies. He carried on an extensive correspondence with leading figures in the Church, in science, and in politics, discussing even such practical economic matters as mining, water supply, and land cultivation. He set himself especially to the task of organizing science, founded the Society (later Academy) of Science at Berlin, and negotiated similar plans for Petersburg and Vienna. He interested himself also in the spread of Christianity and worked toward reuniting the two great Christian denominations. He was a Protestant by persuasion; however, toward the end of his life he became a solitary, opposed even to his own church.

Doctrines. The distinctive philosophical teachings of Leibniz may be discussed under the headings of logic and theory of knowledge; metaphysics and theodicy; and ethical, political, and religious theory.

Logic and Theory of Knowledge. Leibniz here adopted a rationalistic approach, combining in one synthesis the theory of recollection of Plato, the eternal law concept of the Stoics—which, for St. Paul, is written in the hearts of men (Rom 2.15)—the theory of the active intellect of the scholastics, the notion of the divine spark of the mystics, and the innate ideas of R. DESCARTES. However, one cannot represent these innate ideas as "the public proclamations of a magistrate inscribed on a particular tablet." They are nothing more than the understanding or reason itself judging between true and false on the basis of immanent, aprioristic faculties and principles. The senses are also required, but only as a blind man requires a cane. They offer man only the occasion for the exercise of understanding, which alone can throw light on the concept and without which sensation remains empty.

Leibniz therefore distinguishes between two types of truth, factual truth (contingent truths or truths of fact and existence) and real truth (truths of essences). Only the latter are truths in the strict sense of the word; the former are obscured by the senses. Man must have recourse to the principle of SUFFICIENT REASON (ratio sufficiens) in making judgments; i.e., he can justify the connection between subject and predicate only if there is sufficient ground for doing so. Since not all interrelationships between things are accessible to sense experience, factual truths are only probabilities, properly speaking, and not real truths, which are always universally valid, necessary, and eternal. For a mind to be able to penetrate all relations it must resolve factual truths into real truths, as if everything that could accompany an essence were already contained in its concept. The divine mind may see in this way, but Leibniz would have had the human mind operate thus also. For this reason, he attempted to resolve facts into necessary truths and sense data into concepts by means of a typical rationalist oversimplification.

Moreover, this feature of his philosophy was one over which he was most enthusiastic. He referred to the process of reducing factual knowledge to necessary conceptual relations as the ars combinatoria or characteristica universalis. One could, he thought, establish characteristic symbols or figures for all existing things and develop an algebraic art of comprehension on the basis of a mathematical calculus. Thus with Raymond LULL he became a forerunner of modern logistics (see LOGIC, SYMBOLIC). He hoped in this way to be able to resolve all controversies and intellectual disputes. He also conceived his ars combinatoria as of help in spreading the faith. "For if missionaries can be led to use this language, they can establish the true religion that stands in complete harmony with reason and one need no longer fear defections from religion in the future."

Metaphysics and Theodicy. The central concept of Leibniz's metaphysics is the MONAD. He devised his theory while enlarging upon Descartes's notion of substance. If the body, as Descartes had said, is extension only, then something of the essence, namely, its capacity for activity, is not accounted for. Substance must then be a unit of action, un être capable d'action. This unit of action might be regarded as an aggregate of forces, but this would have no reality if the substance itself were not real. On the other hand, substance cannot be extended, because it would admit of infinite divisibility and thus fail to be an ultimate force unit. Hence, substances must be extended, not as a mathematical point, but as an ultimate unit of a psychical nature, a monad. "Monads are then the real atoms of nature; in short, they are the elements of things."

The function of the monad is representation; every force, including the will, is a type of representation—but this too is a radical simplification. There is a differentiation in the intensity of representations; this extends from the most unconscious (in pure or "empty" monads) to conscious representation that approaches perception and thought (as in plants and animals), to that of self-conscious being (as in human souls), and finally to that of the divine monad, who mirrors all things with the utmost clarity because He is pure act (actus purus). The ascent from absolutely motionless monads to pure act is, according to Leibniz, an unbroken continuum, for nature admits of no gaps (lex continui), a principle that also underlies the infinitesimal calculus.

Every monad reflects the universe, and this without external stimuli. "Monads have no windows." For this reason, all monads have a similar content and harmonize with one another without having to interact causally: they are ruled by a preestablished harmony like that of two clocks that are set and wound together but run independently. Nevertheless, the differentiation of intensity in the representations serves as a principle of INDIVIDUATION. Without this, all substances would be identical—the principles of the identity of indiscernibles.

Since for Leibniz the monad took the place of the atom, he can be regarded as taking account of modern mathematical and mechanistic thought, which he knew, and also of classical metaphysics, whose teachings on FORM and ENTELECHY he further advanced by combining them with the monad concept. He recognized that there are not only parts in nature—and mechanism took account of these alone—but also unities and associations and ends that were included in the concept of entelechy. Thus each monad comprehends other monads under it and organizes them into a unity. The human soul is such a monad substance. One finds such entelechies in the whole range of the organic, but surprisingly also in the inorganic. God is the monad of monads; He is the substance that makes all other substances possible.

By this teaching Leibniz attempted to avoid Spinoza's concept of undifferentiated substance, since his monad theory preserved individuality and particularly the human person with his freedom and self-determination. He went too far, however, for his reduction of the atom to something psychical or spiritual could not account for the nature of bodies. Although he regarded EXTENSION as a phenomenon bene fundatum, he actually was teaching a type of PANPSYCHISM. The implied DYNAMISM is too one-sided, for it is necessary that force be opposed to something that is not force in order for it to be intelligible.

As for God's being the monad of all monads, this put Leibniz more in accord with tradition, where God is regarded as the Form of forms and PURE ACT. He also adopted the standard proofs for the existence of God, even the ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT. There are difficulties in his teachings, however, for he conceived God as having created the best of all possible worlds (see OPTIMISM), and thus seemed to endanger God's freedom. Leibniz felt that he had not done so, asserting the best possible worlds included EVIL. In his THEODICY he justified this by distinguishing between metaphysical, physical, and moral evil. The first is nothing more than the finitude of the world. Physical evil he equated with pain; God wills this indirectly as punishment for guilt, on the one hand, and for the greater good He wills to draw from it, on the other. He does not will moral evil as such, but permits it because man is free. Leibniz also sought to justify revelation in his theodicy. It never contradicts real truth, the truth of reason; it can, however, go beyond reason and especially beyond factual truth, which itself is without necessity. A similar stand was taken by a contemporary, J. A. COMENI-

Ethical, Political, and Religious Theory. Leibniz opposed T. HOBBES in advocating the reasonableness, the wisdom, and the goodness proper to God's order. Man is the being he is because of his spirit and freedom, and his habitat is the realm of spirit where God is both sovereign and father. This perfection must be served by both the law and the state. Law consists in wise and good order, with God as well as with man. If right were to be sought only in utility or in power, God would not differ from an all-powerful devil, Leibniz's philosophy of law stands in contrast with the utilitarianism of Hobbes, S. Pufendorf (1632–94), and C. Thomasius. He had a strong following, however, in R. Boscovich, J. F. Herbart, B. Bolzano, G. Teichmüller (1832–88), and R. H. LOTZE; he also influenced E. Becher (1882–1929) and A. N. WHITE-HEAD.

See Also: RATIONALISM.

Bibliography: Major works. Discours de métaphysique (1686) and La Monadologie (1714), Eng. Discourse on Metaphysics, Correspondence with Arnauld, and the Monadology, tr. G. R. MONTGOMERY (La Salle, Ill. 1962); Système nouveau de la nature . . . (1695); Nouveaux essais sur l'entendement humain (1704); Eng. tr. A. G. LANGLEY (2d ed. Chicago 1916); Essais de shéodicée (Amsterdam 1710); Principes de la nature et de la grâce (1714). Editions. Opera philosophica, ed. J. E. ERDMANN, 2 v. (Berlin 1839-40; repr. 1959); Die philosophischen Schriften, ed. C. I. GER-HARDT, 7 v. (Berlin 1875-90; repr. Hildesheim 1960-61); Sämtliche Schriften und Briefe, ed. Preussische Akademie der Wissenschaften (Berlin 1923-). Literature. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster Md. 1946-), v.4. J. HIRSCHBERGER, History of Philosophy, tr. A. N. FUERST, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1958–59). Y. BELAVAL, Leibniz: Initiation à sa philosophie (Paris 1962). H. W. B. JOSEPH, Lectures on the Philosophy of Leibniz (Oxford 1949). L. COUTURAT, La Logique de Leibniz après des documents inédits (Paris 1901; rept. Hildesheim 1961). B. RUSSELL, A Critical Exposition of the Philosophy of Leibniz (new ed. London 1937). K. HILDE-BRANDT, Leibniz und das Reich der Gnade (The Hague 1953). H. G. ALEXANDER, ed., The Leibniz-Clark Correspondence (Manchester, Eng. 1956). J. O. FLECKENSTEIN, G. W. Leibniz: Barock und Universalismus (Munich 1959). A. WILDERMUTH, Wahrheit und Schöpfung: Ein Grundriss der Metaphysik des G. W. Leibniz (Winterthur 1960). J. JALABERT, Le Dieu de Leibniz (Paris 1960). G. MARTIN, Leibniz: Logik und Metaphysik (Cologne 1960). H. M. WOLFF, Leibniz: Allbeseelung und Skepsis (Bern 1961).

[J. HIRSCHBERGER]

LEIDRADUS OF LYONS

Archbishop of Lyons; b. in the ancient Province of Noricum; d. Soissons, France, Dec. 28, 817. A cleric in Salzburg c. 790, Leidradus through his friend ALCUIN received an invitation to CHARLEMAGNE's court, where he was Alcuin's favorite disciple. In 797 or 798 he succeeded Ado as archbishop of Lyons. His consecration was delayed until 799 because in 798 Charlemagne sent him with THEODULF OF ORLÉANS as missi dominici to Narbonnaise Gaul, a commission immortalized by Theodulf's charming poem, Contra judices, where he praises Leidradus's rare ability, exceptional good sense, and eminent virtue. An important contribution of Leidradus's episcopate, his struggle against ADOPTIONISM, took him to Spain in 798, where he attended the Council of Urgel in 799. One source, based on Jerome de la Higuera's report of c. 810, which states that he had the happiness of converting ELIPANDUS OF TOLEDO and Felix of Urgel, is probably erroneous. Leidradus's work in Lyons rescued that see from the sad conditions resulting from the Muslim occupation during the 731-734 period and subsequent confiscations by CHARLES MARTEL in 737 (see CAROLINGIANS).

Leidradus's achievements were solid, and he recounts them in a letter to Charlemagne (ed. H. Leclerq, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 10:235-237, with a Fr. tr.). He described them because he feared death might interrupt his program, which he wished Charlemagne to carry out. He had reformed the chant, using as a model the plainsong of Metz taught by a cleric from that see (see CHRODEGANG OF METZ), and his own lectors and chanters were so well trained that they could teach others. He promoted the transcription of numerous manuscripts, but he was especially the restorer of churches and monasteries: St. John the Baptist (the cathedral), St. Nizier, St. Mary, St. Eulalia, and the convent of St. George, Île-Barthe, a monastery on an island in the Saöne. In imitation of Bishop Chrodegang, he organized his clergy into a college of canons, priests, and deacons, whom he attached to the Baptistery of St. Stephen, designating them as fratres sancti Stephani. The episcopal family thus produced continued until the twelfth century, and a school for training young clerics was attached to it. Someone, perhaps Leidradus himself, added to this letter a summary account of each church and monastery according to the number of its inhabitants and their social rank; there are 727 colonicas (cultivated estates) and 33 absas (vacant ones). Perhaps the list, specific and detailed, was what Charlemagne expected, and the letter may have been a clever move to make him favorable to the attached report because of his esteem for Leidradus. Besides the letter to Charlemagne, Leidradus wrote a theological treatise for the emperor entitled *Liber de sac*ramento baptismi (ed. E. Dümmler, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 4:539-540) and a short treatise on the accompanying ceremony of renouncing the devil (ibid. 540–541). A letter of consolation to his sister (ibid. 544–545) is also preserved. After the death of Charlemagne, the bishop retired to the monastery of Saint-Médard at Soissons, where he died.

Bibliography: Patrologia latina, 217 v. (Paris 1878–1890) 99:853–886. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 4:539–546. J. POURRAT, L'Antique école de Leidrade (Lyons 1899); L'Université catholique 31 (Lyons 1899): 161–182. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 1:249, 380, 381, 386–390, 392, 394, 538, 541. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (Paris 1907–15) 2:171–172. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:195–196. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10.1:232–244. B. WALCHER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–) 6:926.

[C. M. AHERNE]

LEIGH, RICHARD, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Garth or Earth; b. ca. 1561, Cambridgeshire, England; hanged at Tyburn (London), Aug. 30, 1588. Leigh, ordained in Rome (1586), returned to England in 1587 to minister in London, where he was arrested and exiled. Soon after his second arrival he was again captured and imprisoned in the Tower of London (June 1588). He irrefutably betrayed himself as a Catholic by answering questions put to another who was under examination and was condemned for his priesthood. He was executed together with BB. Edward SHELLEY, Richard FLOWER, John Roche, and St. Margaret WARD. Leigh was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England). See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LEISNER, KARL FRIEDRICH WILHELM MARIA, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Feb. 28, 1915, Rees am Niederrhein, Westphalia, Germany; d. Aug. 12, 1945, Planegg (near Munich). Karl's parents, Wilhelm Leisner and Amalie Falkenstein, moved to Kleve in 1921, where he attended the local public school. He studied philosophy and theology at the Borromeo College in Münster (1934–36); theology at Freiburg in Breisgau (1936–37) and Münster (1937-39). While at the university, his bishop commissioned him as diocesan leader of youth groups from 1934 to 1936. To circumvent Nazi control, Karl taught his charges the catechism on excursions. His education was interrupted for six months in 1937 by mandatory national agricultural service in Sachsen and Emsland. During this period he again opposed Nazi regulations by organizing Sunday Mass for fellow workers. Leisner entered Münster's diocesan seminary in 1938 and was ordained deacon March 25, 1939 by Bishop Clemens Augustinus Graf von Galen.

While recuperating from tuberculosis in the sanitarium at St. Blasien, Schwarzwald, he was arrested Nov. 8, 1939, for offhandedly expressing regret that an assassination attempt against Hitler had failed. He was held in the prison of Freiburg from 1939 to 1940, then incarcerated in Mannheim's prison. After Mannheim, he was taken to the concentration camps at Sachsenhausen and Dachau Dec. 24, 1940. On Dec. 17, 1944, French Bishop Gabriel Piguet of Clermont-Ferrand secretly ordained Leisner to the priesthood at Dachau. Father Leisner furtively celebrated Mass for the first and only time on Dec. 26 in the barrack's chapel. Dachau was liberated by Allied troops May 4, 1945. Leisner, suffering the effects of tuberculosis and imprisonment, died a few months later at the age of 30 in a sanitarium at Planegg near Munich.

In 1966 his body was exhumed from his grave in Kleve and placed in the Martyrs Crypt in the Xanten cathedral. His cause was opened in Rome March 15, 1980. Among the documents examined were his diary with entries from March 23, 1927 through July 25, 1945, and about 130 substantial letters, which provide insight into his spirituality. He was beatified June 23, 1996, by John Paul II during his third pastoral visit to Germany.

Bibliography: Christus meine Leidenschaft, Karl Leisner, sein Leben in Bildern und Dokumenten, ed. W. HAAS (Kevelaer 1985); Karl Leisner: Mit Christus leben. Gedanken für jeden Tag, ed. W. HAAS (Kevelaer 1979). O. CESCA, Castelo no tormenta, Carlos Leisner (Santa Maria, Brazil 1963). C. FELDMANN, Wer glaubt, muss widerstehen: Bernhard Lichtenberg-Karl Leisner, 3d ed. (Freiburg 1996). R. LEJEUNE, K. Leisner: Wie Gold geläutert im Feuer (Strassburg 1988). O. PIES, Stephanus heute, Karl Leisner, Priester und Opfer. (Kevelaer 1951). J. SCHMIEDL, Karl Leisner:

Leben für die Jugend (Vallendar-Schönstatt 1996). L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 26 (1996) 1–3.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LEISURE

Leisure is an analogous term, for its import changes from person to person and from CULTURE to culture. The leisure of a university professor, for instance, no doubt differs from the leisure of his young student. The term, however, has similar resonances for both: joyful feelings of FREEDOM, fulfillment, and significance. Both intuitively recognize the truth of Aristotle's dictum that men are unleisurely only to gain leisure (Ethica Nicomachea, 1177 b).

An examination of the leisure-time pursuits of different cultures makes the analogous nature of leisure even more apparent. Although the resonances of freedom, fulfillment, and significance remain, the concrete embodiments of these sentiments vary widely-an afternoon in a Manhattan art gallery differs both in tone and content from a native religious festival. Leisure, then, is not a simple essence but rather a category of activity defined by a SOCIETY's view of what constitutes man's true happiness. It can be examined in its richest context only when it is related to all other values of a society. This is best done by viewing leisure in its social function, i.e., by considering what leisure does for society and how it is related to each major social institution (the family, the state, the economy, etc.). The relationship between leisure and the institutions that universally arise to meet society's recurrent problems of continuity, cooperation, and survival will be seen more easily after leisure has been functionally defined and located within the Western humanistic tradition.

Relation to Work. Leisure is often defined functionally as the opposite of labor, but this definition is inadequate for two reasons. First, the word has received a modicum of clarity by being distinguished from mere recreation (the renewal of energies for more efficient work) and from free time (any time set apart from the exigencies of toil). Although the worker receives no pay for his use of free time or recreation, these two concepts actually stand in close relation to work itself. Recreation and free time find their justification as propaedeutics for work. From a purely business point of view, Sunday worship and the coffee break are qualitatively the same: they both contribute to making better workers for the enterprise.

The second reason that leisure cannot expeditiously be defined as the opposite of work is that the actual boundary between labor and leisure is sometimes difficult to fix. Philosopher Yves Rene Simon speaks of how work is meant to be a delight rather than toil when he says "work is essentially joyful but it involves the permanent foundation of the possibility of pain." When a carpenter goes about his daily tasks he indeed labors. But may a lawyer who makes artistic cabinets for his own pleasure be categorized as a man of work or as a man of leisure? It is an observable fact that some men expend more energy at their so-called leisure activities than they do at their jobs. Expenditure of energy, then, cannot be the criterion. Nor, in the light of the example, can the activity in itself be the norm for distinguishing work from leisure.

This refractoriness to definition is rooted in the fact that labor is also socially defined. Since the same activity can be labor in one situation and not in another, one must conclude that labor is a concept that does not refer merely to the nature of human activity, but also to the social structure in which this activity is performed. Since the labor structure changes in the course of history, the meaning of the word labor changes with this development. The underlying characteristic of all the various manifestations of labor is that labor is always incorporated into a system of services done with a certain regularity. The performance of these services does not depend solely upon the freedom of the working individual.

Transcendent Character. Leisure, on the other hand, is of an entirely different order. It enables man to transcend the social matrix of economic production and routine social duties so that he can consider the significance of things and perform significant acts. Such a social category is possible because society itself, through its hierarchy of values, can recognize and decree that man has a dignity transcending the ordinary demands of social interaction. Thus J. Pieper includes within the comprehension of the term leisure "the philosophical act, the religious act, the aesthetic act, and, of course, the effect of love and death, or some other way in which man's relation to the world is convulsed and shaken—all these fundamental ways of acting belong naturally together, by reason of the power which they have in common of enabling a man to break through and transcend the workaday world" (Leisure 95).

Leisure, then, is time spent in activities intimately and causally connected with the highest powers of man (see PERFECTION, ONTOLOGICAL). These activities have no other purpose than the individual's fullest self-realization. What this human perfection involves concretely and what activities further its achievement are matters of cultural definition. At the sociological level, therefore, the important consideration is that norms of human perfection are operative in any society, whether Christian or Marxist, for example, and the time available for uninterrupted and single-minded pursuit of the ideal norm is leisure time.

Commentators usually portray the Greek tradition of leisure, for example; as highly intellectualist with a heavy emphasis on CONTEMPLATION and a bias against action. This linking of intellect and leisure is understandable in the light of the Greek linking of the intellect with man's perfection. Aristotle concluded that the life of the intellect is the best and most pleasant for man because the intellect, more than anything else, is the man (see INTELLECTUAL LIFE). He stressed that all noncontemplative activities are encased in a productive system: they are means used to gain further goals. But contemplation frees man from any instrumental system and is "loved for its own sake; for nothing arises from it apart from the contemplating, while from practical activities we gain more or less apart from the action" (Ethica Nicomachea, 1177 b).

In modern society contemplation is not considered the highest realization of man's powers nor the pinnacle of knowledge and thus, even in the Greek sense, it can no longer be considered as the only act worthy of the term leisure. Science, for example, as Werner Heisenberg and others point out, is innately a form of activity in which the answers to questions in nature are not simply found, but provoked by the active attitude of the investigators. Even before the impact of science, the Christian emphasis on love of neighbor and the priority of deeds over words, the stress on the unity of thought and action, did much to shift the Western perspective on the perfection of man from a primarily intellectualist to a more integral conception.

Universality. Although the Greeks reflected on leisure more than any other people, leisure was not unknown outside their tradition. In fact, leisure is a cultural universal. Even non-industrial peoples are capable of producing some excess of goods over the minimum demands of necessity. The ceremonial exchange of goods and the extension of credit by one tribesman to another show that not only entire groups, but individuals within these groups, may possess surpluses over immediate needs. They translate their economic surpluses, however small, into social leisure that is enjoyed primarily but not entirely by the members of the community who are supported by this excess wealth. Besides this, from the standpoint of the depth and intangible richness of a human life, it is not hard to see that non-industrialized people of the past, or present, provided they are not penurious and not involved in dehumanized work, may in their daily life enjoy more constant leisure than those in industrialized and technological societies. Heidegger says that the tendency in these latter groups has been "to look upon the world primarily as a fund of energy." This has produced a shallowness of meaning and an understanding of leisure as mere diversion. Similarly, Gabriel Marcel has said apropos the often technocratic modern world that "a great tragedy with the world today is that life is no longer loved but taken as something to be gotten through."

The empirical fact of the universality of leisure can be intelligibly explained by a systematic functional analysis of society. Viewed as a whole, any successful society must solve four major functional problems: (1) adaptation to its environment, accomplished for the most part by economic institutions; (2) goal setting, the task of political institutions; (3) management of the tension generated by the possible conflict between an individual's desires and capabilities and society's demands and requirements, a contribution made largely by the family and other primary groups; and (4) the integration or harmonization of all the different institutions that are meeting the problems of adaptation, goal setting, and management of tension. The integrative function is performed when the social system, through a religion or ideology, explains itself to itself. There must be a broad general consensus as to the worth of the system and the justness of its demands, if relatively smooth interaction is to be possible. The implications of this analysis are apparent: if the integrative function is necessary for a society, as both theoretical analysis and empirical findings indicate, then much leisure is necessary for some members of the society, and some leisure is necessary for all members. The formulation of values and their effective transmission to the population and, equally important, the internalization of these crucial values demand at least some degree of freedom from toil.

Leisure, then, appears in every society precisely because it is a prerequisite for the formation and survival of a society. Some have seen the development of a leisure class simply as a parasitical growth undermining the efficiency of a society. Historically, leisure has frequently been twisted into a shield of privilege. Analysis confined to these phenomena, however, is inadequate to the explanation of leisure. First, consensus makers and transmitters of values are functionally required by all societies. Second, leisure can never be entirely limited to one social class, for the members of a society must, to some degree, have the time and opportunity to internalize the core values of the society. Because of the plasticity of the human organism, internalization is never merely passively receptive but rather a dynamic process of acceptance and ratification. Rejection of values is also a possibility and, under certain conditions, is one of the important sources of social change.

Acceptance or rejection of values involves necessary reference to an ego-ideal, and it is this reference to some standard of human perfectibility that roots the functional analysis of leisure well within the traditional conception of the term. Thus the foregoing analysis of the integrative function of leisure, with its concomitant emphasis on values and concept of human perfectibility, turns out to be very Greek in its theoretical structure. The concrete results in application to a specific society can nevertheless be very non-Hellenic. A society could channel most of its energies into solving one functional problem, such as economic adaptation, and give relatively little consideration to the problem of explaining the significance of this productive activity and its relation to the perfection of its citizenry.

American Patterns. For example, most commentators observe that American leisure patterns are competitive in tone and pervaded with puritanical doubts that are resolved only by justifying leisure as earned by work or as necessary for continued work. Many Americans fear retirement not because of economic worries but simply because of a gnawing fear that their idleness will lower their prestige in a work-oriented society that confers status only on active producers. In a word, leisure in America can be viewed as strongly affected by economic functions and characterized by the need for mere tension release rather than engagement in significant activity. Leisure's relation to the integrative function is less pronounced. This analysis is in tune with the often heard remark that America is long on means but short on ends. Still, this tendency has been reducing in American society in the last 50 years, as evidenced by a 2001 IPSOS poll contrasted with one taken by Gallup in 1955. The recent poll shows considerably less interest in work itself and in leisure for the purpose of resting one for work and correspondingly more interest in leisure as contributive of meaning and wellness in one's life. One may wonder, of course, how much this developing appreciation for leisure is a refinement of self-occupied pleasures and health and how much it represents a greater openness to spiritual joy and to an embracive generosity to other persons.

Despite America's poor history with regard to the social evaluation of leisure, some observers are optimistic about future leisure patterns. Although American leisure is strongly influenced by economic values, the economic sphere itself is undergoing radical change. With the spread of AUTOMATION and the increase of managerial jobs, work can become more of an expression of human creativity and initiative. If this is the case, then leisure and work can be identified on the deepest level: the achieving of human perfection. For if work is increasingly characterized by intelligence, initiative, and responsibility, it will become more an expression of human creativeness and will be very close to those activities that the Greeks termed leisure. This is, of course, highly conjectural. Work, since it does to some degree tie one to a system, can never be an expression of complete initiative and responsibility. Work and leisure will perhaps be closer partners in the future, but they will remain, to some degree, distinct. According to traditional Western philosophy, this distinction is rooted in the very nature of man. For it is man's nature to be part of a social system, to be an individual member of a species, and yet to transcend the system as a person, as an end in himself.

Philosophical Remarks. In a more philosophical and spiritual vein, leisure can be viewed as a sense of deep restfulness in and presence to life: to nature, other persons, one's self, and God. It can become a contemplative act in which one realizes that in spite of the hustle and bustle of life there is time to learn, love, laugh, and enjoy. Like every virtue it is ultimately both a gift from God and an expression of our freedom. Its presence in daily life draws us beyond mere toil and goal-fixation, beyond perfectionism and toward real perfection and sanctity. It carries us beyond all forms of acquisitiveness and lust, mere egoistic planning and daydreaming, and needless worry into briefer and longer periods of delight in the ordinary and innocent pleasures of body and soul, in the expression of our creative energies, and in the contemplation of God. In this deepest, truest, and most humane form of leisure we are enabled to step out of the tyranny of worldly tasks and goals into a foretaste of eternity. In Charles Pèguy's poem "Sleep" God says to the worker who resents the need to sleep that "I have it against you a little because you have it against my creature sleep. The world has told you never to put off till tomorrow what you can do today. But I, God, tell you: Never do today what you can put off until tomorrow. Blessed is he who puts off."

Bibliography: ARISTOTLE, Ethica Nicomachea, J. PEIPER, Leisure: The Basis of Culture, tr. A. DRU (New York 1952; rev. 1964), invaluable speculative introductions S. DE GRAZIA, Of Time, Work and Leisure (New York 1962). P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, The Divine Milieu (New York 1960). H. ARENDT, The Human Condition (Chicago 1958). T. VEBLEN, Theory of the Leisure Class (London 1898; pa. New York 1954). N. ANDERSON, Work and Leisure (New York 1961). H. DURANT, The Problem of Leisure (London 1938), E. O. SMIGEL, ed., Work and Leisure (New Haven 1963). R. DENNEY and M. L. MEYERSON, "A Preliminary Bibliography on Leisure," American Journal of Sociology 62 (1956–57) 602–615. W. KERR, The Decline of Pleasure (New York 1962). G. MARCEL, Being and Having, tr. K. FARRER (London 1949). T. WINNIFRITH and C. BARRETT, eds., The Philosophy of Leisure (New York 1989).

[J. R. KELLY/R. E. LANE]

LE JAY, CLAUDE (JAJUS)

Theologian; b. Mieussy, near Geneva, 1504; d. Vienna, Aug. 6, 1552. Le Jay followed his friend Peter FABER to Paris and there earned a master's degree in arts in 1534; he made solemn profession with St. Ignatius in 1541. With Salmeron and Canisius he earned a doctorate at Bologna, and in 1542 he was sent by Paul III to Germany, where he lectured on the scriptures at Ingolstadt. His clear theological mind was enlisted by Cardinal O. TRUCHSESS VON WALDBURG both before and during the Council of Trent. At the Synod of Salzburg he greatly aided the Catholic cause by clearly indicating that the denial of papal primacy was itself heresy. At Trent he was one of the two theologians charged with drafting the decree on sacred scripture and tradition.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:765.

[A. ROCK]

LEJEUNE, JEAN

French Oratorian and preacher; b. Dôle, in Franche-Compté, 1592; d. Limoges, Aug. 19, 1672. Lejeune was the son of a successful lawyer, councilor of the parlement of Dôle, and member of a well-known family distinguished for careers in law and renowned for piety. He studied theology at the University of Dôle and had settled down as a canon of Arbois when he came under the influence of Pierre de Bérulle, founder of the French Congregation of the Oratory. In 1611 Lejeune renounced his canonry and entered the Oratory; after serving briefly as director of the seminary at Langres, he devoted the rest of his life to preaching. The next few years saw Lejeune preaching Advent and Lenten courses, missions, and sermons throughout France. He quickly became known as a most persuasive orator, notable for his unusual ardor and an exceptionally popular style. At age 37 he was struck blind in the midst of a Lenten course at Rouen, but he continued to engage in preaching as much as ever with the aid of a devoted confrere, Lefevre, who acted as his companion.

Lejeune soon acquired the nickname of Le Père Aveugle (the blind father), and his handicap served to increase and strengthen his apostolate rather than to diminish it. He was noted for his life of mortification and acquired a reputation for sanctity, so that Lamy could praise him for preaching by his manner of life more than by his style of oratory.

In 1662 he published in Toulouse a collection of 362 sermons, which was later republished under the title they now bear, Le Missionaire de L'Oratoire (Lyons 1825–27). The sermons deal with the usual topics in a rather unpretentious style without polemics. They do suffer from faults common in the seventeenth century, especially from lengthy classical citations and a somewhat unusual manner of presentation. In a typical sermon, Lejeune would first state the theme of his discourse and then proceed to prove the thesis by successive arguments from Sacred Scripture, from the Fathers of the Church, and from natural reason, so that his talks greatly resembled classroom presentations of theological theses.

In general, he avoided controversial issues and tended to confine himself to the exposition of fundamental Catholic doctrine. Even so, he was personally criticized and shared in the suspicion of Jansenism generally directed toward the French Oratory. Selections of his sermons were translated into Latin and published under the title Johannis Junii deliciae pastorum (Mainz 1667).

Bibliography: G. GOYAU, Histoire religieuse, v. 6 of G. A. A. HANOTAUX, Histoire de la nation française, 15 v. (Paris 1920–35). A. MOLIEN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:196–197.

[A. J. CLARK]

LEJEUNE, JÉRÔME

Physician, research scientist, member of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, first president, Pontifical Academy for Life; b. Montrouge, France, 1927; d. Paris, France, April 3, 1994. Jérôme Lejeune studied at the University of Paris, earning a doctorate in medicine in 1951 and a doctorate in science in 1960. While in his early thirties, he worked at the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, the French government laboratory. At age thirty-one, he discovered the chromosomal abnormality that causes Down Syndrome, a form of mental retardation. This seminal discovery opened the door to an increase in the field of genetic research known as clinical cytogenetics that deals with disorders resulting from chromosomal abnormalities.

Lejeune showed that in Down Syndrome, the extra chromosome was a marker for biochemical imbalance. Although he never produced a way to prevent the condition, he devised several protocols for its treatment and was able in most cases to improve the intelligence of his patients. He also identified the occurrence of thyroid deficiency in fifty percent of his patients under five. By treating the thyroid deficiency, he was able to improve his patients' intelligence and activity quickly and permanently. He also discovered other conditions caused by chromosomal abnormalities (e.g., the deletion of the short arm on the fifth pair of chromosomes in Cri du Chat syndrome). At the time of his death, he was treating amino acid deficiencies in his patients.

While professor of fundamental genetics at the René Descartes University, he also ran a department at the institute of genetics and treated patients at the Hospital for Sick Children in Paris. Lejeune continued his research and treatment of Down Syndrome children from around the world even when government funding for his work was withdrawn.

His work did not go unrecognized, and he was honored in many countries. In France, he was a member of the sociological section of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences; in the United States, he was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, having spent several years in the United States. He worked with the United Nations scientific committee on congenital abnormalities, and he was a member of many academies of science worldwide.

Christian Faith. Lejeune's Christian faith was the bedrock of both his personal and his public life, and he never compromised the fundamental belief that all human life is sacred from conception to natural death. When Lejeune began research into Down Syndrome, he was one of several scientists working on the problem in Europe. With the advent of legalized abortion, the attitude of the medical profession changed. Research became concentrated on what has been described as "search and destroy": most modern research is concerned with finding a quick and efficient test to spot a child with Down Syndrome as early as possible in pregnancy in order that the child may be aborted. By the mid-1970s Lejeune was one of few scientists in Europe still trying to find a cure or an amelioration for the Down Syndrome children.

In 1974 he was made a member of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences and in the 1980s he was in great demand by Pope John Paul II for information and advice on the many disturbing developments in genetics, such as embryo experimentation and genetic engineering. They became close friends. When the pope established the Pontifical Academy for Life, he invited Lejeune to become its first president, although the pope knew that Lejeune was dying. Lejeune was a great leader in the prolife movement, serving as chairman of Laissez-les vivres, president of the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children (SPUC), and founding member of the World Federation of Doctors Who Respect Human Life.

Bibliography: J. LEJEUNE, Les Chromosomes humains (Paris 1965); Concentration Can (San Francisco 1992).

[M. WHITE]

LELOUTRE, JEAN LOUIS

Missionary; b. Morlaix. France, Sept. 26, 1709; d. Nantes, France, 1772. After ordination at the seminary of the Paris Foreign Mission Society in 1737, he was sent to Canada to the parish of Annapolis, Nova Scotia, but he was detained in Louisbourg, Cape Breton Island. He was named as missionary to the Acadian Micmacs (Nova Scotia) and arrived in Schubenacadie in 1738. In 1745 he returned to Louisbourg as military chaplain. Following a trip to France, he resumed his missionary work among the Micmacs in 1749. In 1754 he was named vicargeneral of Quebec. He was taken prisoner by the English after the fall of Ft. Beausejour and was deported to the Island of Jersey (1758–63). After the Treaty of Paris he was released; he returned to France, where he became involved in arrangements for the settlement of the Acadians at Belle-isle-en-mer, Canada.

Bibliography: N. M. ROGER, "The Abbé Le Loutre," Canadian Historical Review 11 (1930): J. B. BREBNER, New England's Outpost (New York 1927). J. C. WEBSTER, The Career of Abbé Le Loutre (privately printed; Shediac, N.B. 1933).

[G. CARRIÈRE]

LE MAISTRE, ANTOINE AND ISAAC

Brothers who were prominent in the history of JAN-SENISM, particularly as solitaires of PORT-ROYAL.

Antoine, lawyer and writer; b. Paris, May 2, 1608; d. Port-Royal, near Paris, Nov. 4, 1658. He was the son of Isaac Le Maistre, a master of requests, and of Catherine Arnauld, a sister of the reformer of Port-Royal, Angélique Arnauld. After acquiring a brilliant legal reputation, he came under the influence of Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, Abbé Saint-Cyran and withdrew to Port-Royal in 1637. Antoine was known to his contemporaries primarily for his legal speeches, which were already famous when he published them in 1657. Afterward, Antoine used his eloquence to vindicate his fellow-Jansenists. He defended Saint-Cyrian in a spirited letter to Cardinal Richelieu in 1638, and again in the Apologie pour feu M. l'ábbe de Saint-Cyrian (Paris 1642). He produced several other polemics, devotional works, and translations.

Isaac, spiritual director and writer, better known as Le Maistre de Saci (Sacy; anagrams of Isaac); b. Paris, March 29, 1613; d. Pomponne, Jan. 4, 1684. In 1637 he retired with his brother to Port-Royal. After his ordination in 1649, he became spiritual adviser to the other solitaires. With the imposition of Alexander VII's ''formulary'' in 1661, he fled from Port-Royal, was imprisoned from 1666 to 1668 in the Bastille, and spent most of his later life in exile. Isaac did much to popularize Jansenism in France by letting it speak through his many translations of the Scriptures and Church Fathers. Among his best-known works was Traduction du Noveau Testament, 2 v. (Amsterdam 1667), which was condemned by Clement IX in 1669. His life's work was to initiate La sainte Bible en latin et en français, 32 v. (Paris 1687–1702).

Bibliography: G. DELASSAUT, Le Maistre de Sacy et son temps (Paris 1957). J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:198–202. Biographie universelle, ed. L. G. MICHAUD, 45 v. (Paris 1843–65) 24:65–66; 37:196–198.

[J. Q. C. MACKRELL]

LE MASSON, INNOCENT

Carthusian author; b. Noyon, Dec. 21, 1627; d. May 8, 1703. He entered the Carthusian order at Mont-Renaud in 1645, and became prior there 18 years later. In 1675 he became prior of Grande-Chartreuse and general of the order. The following year his monastery was destroyed by fire, and he designed the new buildings of Grande-Chartreuse. He reconstituted the archives and produced Annales Ordinis Cartusiensis, later known as Disciplina Ordinis Cartusiensis (ed. Montreuil, 1894). It is a commentary on the rules and a vindication of the order from accusations of relaxation made by Abbé de Rancé. Le Masson also stimulated the composition of the real annals of the order by Dom Le Couteulx (8 v. ed. Montreuil, 1887) and of the collection by Dom Le Vasseur of biographies of saintly Carthusians, Ephemerides Ordinis Cartusiensis (5 v., ed. Montreuil, 1890). He prepared a new edition of the rules that had been approved by Rome in 1688. During his administration, he himself controlled and disposed many things, and centralized authority into the hands of the general; sometimes his ideas were out of harmony with authentic Carthusian traditions.

He preserved Carthusian spirituality from dangers of JANSENISM, ordering books suspected of the heresy to be gathered up from the charterhouses and sent to the head house, where he burned them. He wrote a Directorium Novitiorum and several treatises for the young monks' instruction. They are sound in doctrine, clear and pithy, and illustrated by apt examples. His Carthusian sources for these were GUIGO II, Adam of Cryburgh, LUDOLPH OF SAXONY, DENIS THE CARTHUSIAN, and Johannes Justus LANSPERGIUS; he borrowed also from Thomas à Kempis (The Imitation of Christ) and from St. FRANCIS DE SALES.

Le Masson combated QUIETISM, particularly among the Carthusian nuns whose houses he himself visited. He composed the Semaine du Sacré-Coeur for them.

Bibliography: C. M. BOUTRAIS, La Grande Chartreuse par un Chartreux (9th ed. Grenoble 1964). J. P. MARTIN, "La Doctrine spirituelle de Dom Innocent Le Masson," Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 17 (1936): 368–396; 18 (1937): 45–64. S. AUTORE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:202–208.

[B. DU MOUSTIER]

LEME DA SILVEIRA CINTRA, SEBASTIÃO

Second Brazilian cardinal; b. Espirito Santo do Pinhal, São Paulo, Jan. 20, 1882; d. Rio de Janeiro, Oct. 17, 1942. After becoming a priest on Oct. 10, 1904, he served in São Paulo as assistant pastor, seminary professor, director of the Catholic daily, A Gazeta do Povo, and cathedral canon. He was consecrated auxiliary bishop to Cardinal Joaquim ARCOVERDE DE ALBUQUERQUE CAV-ALCANTI, of Rio de Janeiro, in 1911. In 1916 he became archbishop of Olinda, Pernambuco, where he actively supported the press and religious instruction. He did much to promote priestly vocations and Eucharistic weeks, founded the Catholic Confederation to coordinate Catholic Action associations, and rebuilt the cathedral and episcopal palace. His pastoral letter of 1916 on religious ignorance and its remedies aroused nationwide concern for its frankness in the treatment of religious indifference and the inefficiency of the Catholic majority.

As coadjutor bishop of ailing Cardinal Arcoverde, he launched, in 1923, the Catholic Confederation of Rio de Janeiro, which, together with the significant manual, Acão Católica, set the policy of future Catholic Action. The same year he was the president of the first National Eucharistic Congress, which invigorated the Catholicism of Rio de Janeiro. In 1924 he was instrumental in reopening the diocesan seminary, which had been closed for 16 years. He organized spiritual retreats for the laity, instituted the Social Week of Catholic Action in 1928, and promoted the construction of the huge statue of Christ the Redeemer overlooking the city from Mount Corcovado. Dom Leme succeeded Arcoverde as archbishop of Rio de Janeiro in 1930 and went to Rome to receive the cardinal's hat. During his difficult term, he sought to attack directly the evils already outlined in his 1916 pastoral letter, and his principal fighters were intellectuals transformed into defenders of the faith. These intellectuals, stimulated by the cardinal, associated themselves with the "Centro Dom Vital" and the periodical Ordem, founded by Jackson Figueiredo, and extended their influence into various sectors of national life.

During the revolution fostered by the state of São Paulo against Getúlio Vargas in 1932, Leme acted with diplomatic decision. The cardinal obtained promises from the Constitutional Assembly for the abolition of certain anti-Catholic laws and their replacement by Catholic ones. He founded the Catholic Electoral League (LEC), which supported candidates who attacked divorce and secularism in the schools and who favored chaplaincies for the Armed Forces and hospitals. Owing to pressure from the cardinal's Catholic Confederation, women received the right to vote, and the Constitution of 1934 acquired a Christian foundation. Leme organized and was named papal legate of the important Brazilian Plenary Council of 1939, which modernized ecclesiastical legislation for the Church in Brazil. His last important act was the foundation of the Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro in 1941.

Bibliography: L. PESSOA RAJA GABAGLIA, O cardeal Leme, homem de coração (Rio de Janeiro 1945). G. SCHUBERT, ed., A província eclesiâstica do Rio de Janeiro (Rio de Janeiro 1948). I. M. R. DO SANTO ROSARIO, O cardeal Leme (Rio de Janeiro 1962).

[I. SILVEIRA]

LEMIRE, JULES

French priest and legislator; b. Hazebrouck (Nord), April 23, 1853; d. Hazebrouck, March 7, 1928. As a young teacher he was impressed by the social doctrines of Frédéric le Play and Cardinal Henry Edward MAN-NING; he dedicated to Manning his book Le Cardinal Manning et son oeuvre sociale (Paris 1893). In 1893 he was elected as a Christian Democratic deputy from his native department in opposition to a conservative. Soon after, he was wounded in the Chamber of Deputies during an anarchist uprising. He projected the image of a progressive priest—a "democratic pastor"—and sat in the assembly with the anti-clerical party on the left during the open conflict between Church and State. His candidacy for reelection was first disapproved and then forbidden by the archbishop of Cambrai. In 1914, when he was triumphantly reelected and named vice-president of the Chamber of Deputies, he refused the latter office but incurred ecclesiastical suspension nonetheless. This was lifted in 1916 by Benedict XV. Lemire remained in the position of deputy until his death.

Lemire dedicated his oratorical talent and his zeal to spreading the doctrine of RERUM NOVARUM and the ideals of Christian democracy. He established innumerable workers' gardens. In the Chamber of Deputies, he addressed himself to the defense of the family in opposition to the individualistic conception of the Code Civil. Indefatigable in his interventions, he helped to secure the first family benefits: civil service allowances, marriage assistance, and the protection of family property against unjust seizure. He was the first to petition for the establishment of a ministry of labor. In 1901 he encouraged the priests' congress of Bourges to introduce young priests to the social teaching of the popes and its early accomplishments. In his last years he was an outstanding mayor of his own town of Hazebrouck.

Bibliography: J. DORIGNY, L'Abbé Lemore: Sa carrière parlementaire (Paris 1914). J. R. and G. RÉMY, Une grande figure et un grand coeur: L'Abbé Lemire (Paris 1929). C. DROULERS, Chemin faisant avec l'Abbé Lemire (Paris 1929).

[H. ROLLET]

LEMKE, PETER HENRY

Missionary; b. Rhena, Mecklenburg, Germany, July 27, 1796; d. Carrolltown, Pa., Nov. 29, 1882. His parents, J. Martin and Friederike Lemke, sent him to the Lutheran cathedral school at Schwerin, Germany, in 1811. Later he attended the University of Rostock, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and received his license as a Lutheran minister in 1820. After reading the works of Martin Luther in 1823, Lemke lost his faith. He then went to Regensburg, Germany; there he was converted to Catholicism in 1824 and was ordained on April 11, 1826. He began his American missionary career under Bishop Francis P. Kendrick of Philadelphia, Pa., in 1834. The next year he was sent to assist Demetrius Gallitzin, the prince priest of Loretto, Pa. Here in western Pennsylvania Lemke bought land and founded Carrolltown. On Feb. 2, 1853, as Father Henry, he pronounced his Benedictine vows at the Priory of St. Vincent, Latrobe, Pa. In 1855 he moved to Doniphan City in the Kansas Territory, becoming the forerunner of the Benedictines at Atchison, Kans. In 1858 he revisited Europe and wrote a biography of Gallitzin. After holding pastorates in Elizabeth, N.J. (1861–77), he retired to Carrolltown.

Bibliography: P. BECKMAN, Kansas Monks: A History of St. Benedict's Abbey (Atchison, Kans. 1957) 9–43. A. A. LAMBING, Ave Maria 19 (1883) 41–45; 68–71; 110–113; 128–132; 141–143.

[R. J. MURTHA]

LEMOS, TOMÁS DE

Theologian; b. Rivadavia, Spain, c. 1546; d. Rome, Aug. 23, 1629. With Diego ÁLVAREZ, De Lemos was chosen to represent officially the Dominican position in the dispute over the nature of efficacious grace. A papal commission had voted to censure 61 propositions in Luis de MOLINA's Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratiae donis. Since subsequent efforts at reconciling the two positions had proven futile, Clement VIII (d. 1605) brought the Jesuit defendants and their accusers face to face. Clement VIII and Leo XI (d. 1605) died without reaching a decision. Under Paul V (d. 1621) the cardinals voted to condemn 42 propositions of Molina, but no final decision was ever reached. Throughout the discussion Tomás de Lemos made a trenchant presentation of the Augustinian-Thomistic position. At the close of the dispute, he refused a bishopric offered him through the King of Spain and retired to the Roman priory of Santa Maria sopra Minerva.

His part in the 47 discussions was subsequently published in the Acta omnia congregationum ac disputationum (Louvain 1702). His own famous work Panopolia gratiae (4 v., Liége 1676) was attacked by the Inquisition but vigorously defended by the Dominicans.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.1:461–464. M. D. CHENU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:210–211.

[W. D. HUGHES]

LENIN, N.

Pseudonym of Vladimir Ilich Ulyanov, founder of the Russian Bolshevik party, first head of the Soviet Union; b. Simbirsk (now Ulyanovsk), April 22 (N.S.), 1870; d. Gorki, near Moscow, Jan. 21, 1924. The talents of young Vladimir, son of a school inspector, were recognized early by the director of his gymnasium, F. M. Kerensky, father of Alexander Kerensky, who became head of the provisional government after the revolution of 1917. In May of 1887, an older brother, Alexander, was executed for participation in a populist attempt to assassinate Czar Alexander III. In June of 1887, the family moved to Kazan, where Vladimir entered the university law school. He joined an illegal student circle and, to avoid arrest, left the university. The czarist police soon took him into custody, however, and he was exiled to the village of Kokuschkino. In the fall of 1888 he was allowed to return to Kazan, where he joined the Marxist circle under the leadership of Fedoseev. In 1891 he took his bar examination in St. Petersburg and returned to practice law in Samara (now Kuibyshev), where the family had moved in 1889. He founded the first Marxian circle in the city in 1892, demanding from the members unquestioning subordination to his dictates. In August of 1893, he returned to the capital.

Lenin's first monograph, circulated privately in 1894, was entitled "Who Are the 'Friends of the People' and How Do They Fight Against Social Democrats?" It was directed against the populist organization. In April of 1895, he traveled for the first time to Western Europe to make contacts with emigré Marxists who had established themselves in Geneva as the "Liberation of Labor" group. He returned to Russia in September of 1895 and united most of the existing Marxist groups in St. Petersburg into one organization, the "Union for the Struggle for the Liberation of the Working Class." In December of that year he was arrested and jailed, and in February of 1897 he was exiled for three years to Eastern Siberia. There he continued to write and to discuss the problems of the Russian Marxists with other exiled revolutionaries. He wrote pamphlets for his followers at home and prepared a monumental work, The Development of Capitalism in Russia (1897). To hide his identity he adopted in 1900 the pseudonym N. Lenin.

Vladimir Ilich Lenin, painting by Valentin Aleksandrovich Serov.

Foundation of the Bolshevik Party. After emigrating to Western Europe in July 1900, Lenin began in December the publication in Germany of his first newspaper, Iskra (The Spark), which was smuggled to the Russian empire. It was at his insistence that the second congress of the Russian Socialist Democratic Labor Party was convened in Brussels and London during the summer of 1903 (the founding congress had been held at Minsk in 1898). A bitter discussion about the structure of the party led to a split between the Bolshinstvo, (i.e., majority, hence Bolsheviks,) and the Menshinstvo, (i.e., minority, hence, Mensheviks). The next year Lenin started his own Bolshevik newspaper, Vperyod (Forward). The Bolsheviks played only a very small role during the Russian revolution of 1905. Lenin returned to the Russian capital in November of that year but, realizing the weakness of the Marxists, he eventually fled again to Switzerland and later moved to Paris. His main preoccupation from 1907 to 1912 was with polemics against the Mensheviks and all other elements that opposed his views. In 1912, the Bolshevik party was formed as an independent political organization at a conference in Prague. Later in the year Lenin moved to Cracow, Poland, where he convened the Bolshevik Central Committee. It was at this meeting that he decided to utilize the national enmity between the Russians and the non-Russians for revolutionary Bolshevik strategy. At the outbreak of World War I he was arrested by the Austrian police but managed to return to Switzerland where, together with G. Zinoviev, he established the headquarters of Bolshevik agitation.

The Soviet Revolution. When the czarist empire collapsed, during the revolution of February and March of 1917, Lenin returned to Russia and immediately demanded "All Power to the Soviets." He called for an immediate end to the war, distribution of land to the peasants, and the right of all nations of the former Russian empire to self-determination, including secession from Russia. In July he provoked a revolt against the provisional government, but the Bolsheviks were quickly defeated. Lenin went into hiding in Finland. By September, however, the St. Petersburg Soviet (elected council) was under Bolshevik control. Trotsky, who had joined Lenin's forces early in 1917, became its chairman. During the night of November 7-8, the Bolsheviks gained control of St. Petersburg and forced the provisional government to capitulate.

The first Soviet government was formed on November 8. Its cabinet was called the Council of People's Commissars, and Lenin was its chairman. The secret police, the Cheka, was organized. Lenin ordered the nationalization of property. In January of 1918, he dispersed the constituent assembly. In March he signed the Brest-Litovsk Peace Treaty with the Central Powers. When the non-Russian nations proclaimed their independence, Lenin ordered the Red Army to invade and conquer them. In March of 1921, however, he reversed his policy of integral socialism ("war communism") and initiated the New Economic Policy, interpreted by many as a retreat from Marxist principles and a return to partial private ownership. On May 26, 1922, he suffered a stroke, and only temporarily regained his health. One of his last major concerns was the role of Joseph Stalin, whom he wanted removed from his position as general secretary of

Bibliography: V. I. LENIN, Selected Works, 2 v. in 4 (Moscow 1952). D. SHUB, Lenin (New York 1950). D. W. TREADGOLD, Lenin

and His Rivals (New York 1955). B. D. WOLFE, Three Who Made a Revolution (New York 1948).

[M. S. PAP]

LENT

From the Anglo-Saxon Lencten, meaning springtime, Lent is the 40–day period of prayer, penance, and spiritual endeavor in preparation for Easter. Lent is not an end in itself; it exists only to lead to the paschal feast and so can be rightly understood only in the light of Easter. Easter gives meaning to Lent and shows it for what it is: the great paschal retreat of the Church. "The season of Lent has a twofold character: primarily by recalling or preparing for the celebration of Christian Initiation and by penance, it disposes the faithful, who more diligently hear the word of God and devote themselves to prayer, to celebrate the Paschal Mystery" (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 109).

History. In the first three centuries, the period of fasting in preparation for the paschal feast did not exceed a week at the most; one or two days was the usual limit. Irenaeus of Lyons declares that in some places the faithful fasted on only one day, in others two days, and in still others, for 40 consecutive hours (Eusebius, Eccesiastical History 5:24; Patrologia Graeca. ed J. P. Migne [Paris 1857–66] 20:503). The third or fourth century Apostolic Tradition prescribes a two-day fast (33; B. Botte, ed., La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte: Essai de reconstitution [Liturgiegeschichtliche Quellen und Forschungen, Münster 1909–40] [1963] 79).

The first mention of a period of 40 days occurs in the fifth canon of the Council of Nicaea (325), although some scholars dispute whether Lent is meant there. There is no question about the existence of the 40–day fast later on in that century, however, for St. ATHANASIUS often alluded to it in his festal letters. The Council of Laodicaea (360) expressly commanded its observance, and by the end of the fourth century the 40–day fast, called tessarakosté in Greek and quadragesima in Latin, was observed everywhere throughout both East and West.

Fasting. The custom may have originated in the prescribed fast of candidates for Baptism; it is certain that the catechumenate had a great deal to do with the formation of Lent. The number 40 was suggested no doubt by Christ's 40–day fast in the desert. The manner of reckoning the 40 days, however, varied in the different Churches. As a rule, the East spread Lent over seven weeks with both Saturday and Sunday exempt from fasting, whereas in the West there was a six—week period with only Sundays exempt. As a result there were only 36 actual fasting days, a situation that the Western Church remedied in the seventh century by adding four days beginning with Ash Wednesday. In the fourth century, however, the concern was not so much about whether there were 40 actual fasting days or not; the approach was to the season as a whole. The emphasis was not as much on the fasting as on the spiritual renewal that the preparation for Easter demanded. It was simply a period marked by fasting, but not necessarily one in which the faithful fasted every day. However, as time went on, more and more emphasis was laid upon fasting, and consequently there is apparent a more precise calculation of the 40 days.

During the early centuries (from the fifth century on especially) the observance of the fast was very strict. Only one meal a day, toward evening, was allowed; flesh meat and fish, and in most places even eggs and dairy products, were absolutely forbidden. Meat was not allowed even on Sundays. However, from the nineth century on the practice began to be considerably relaxed. The time for the one evening meal was anticipated so that by the 15th century it was the general custom even for religious to have this meal at noon. Once that was generally accepted, the way was opened for a collation in the evening, which by the 13th century included some light food as well as drink. The prohibition against fish was removed during the Middle Ages, while dispensation permitting the use of dairy products came to be more general.

In the course of the last few centuries the Holy See has granted other more substantial mitigations of the law of fasting. Meat was allowed at the principal meal on Sundays, then gradually on the weekdays, Friday always excepted. The trend to greater emphasis on other forms of penitential works than fasting and abstinence, particularly on exercises of piety and the works of charity, found legislative expression in the apostolic constitution Poenitemini of Pope Paul VI (Feb. 17, 1966). According to this constitution, abstinence is to be observed on Ash Wednesday and on all Fridays of the year that do not fall on holy days of obligation, and fasting as well as abstinence is to be observed on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

Spirit. The popular idea of Lent, which prevailed until well into the 20th century was that it was a time of prolonged meditation upon the Passion, with special emphasis upon Christ's physical sufferings. This view finds little support in the texts of the Lenten liturgy, and in any case it must be abandoned in the light of Vatican Council II's insistence that the season of Lent has the twofold character: by recalling or preparing for Christian Initiation and Penance to dispose the faithful for a celebration of the Paschal Mystery. Furthermore, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy declares that it is important to impress upon the minds of the faithful not only the social consequences of sin, but also the true nature of the virtue of penance as leading to the detestation of sin as an offense against God.

Lent is unquestionably a time of penance, of asceticism, of spiritual discipline. However, making these things ends in themselves can obscure the real purpose of Lent, as is demonstrated in the sermons of the Fathers, especially St. Leo, and in the liturgy itself. The accumulated evidence of Christian tradition in this regard shows without any doubt that the real aim of Lent is, above all else, to prepare Christians for the celebration of the death and RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. This celebration is not a matter only of commemorating the historical fact of the redemption of the human race, but even more of an anamnetical reliving the mystery of Redemption in all its fullness. Consequently, the better the preparation, the more effective the celebration will be. One can effectively relive the mystery only with purified mind and heart. The purpose of Lent is to provide that purification by weaning all of humanity from sin and selfishness through selfdenial and prayer, by creating in them the desire to do God's will and to make His kingdom come by making it come first of all in their hearts.

Lent is then a collective retreat of 40 days, a time when one tries to live in the spirit of his Baptism, a time of penance in the ancient sense of repentance, metanoia, change of heart and mind, conversion.

Once Lent was established in the fourth century, it quickly became associated with Christian Intiation, since Easter was the great baptismal feast. It was the time when those catechumens who would be baptized at the Easter feast were more immediately prepared for that Sacrament. Not only those who were to be baptized, but all Christians prepared themselves for Easter. The Lenten season consequently developed into a time of spiritual renewal for the whole Church and a more profound initiation into the mystery of Christ. The whole Church renews her spiritual youth, and the necessary prelude to this rejuvenation is the awakening of the consciousness of Baptism, of realizing what it means to be baptized. This explains the prominence of the themes of Baptism, new life, and Redemption in the Lenten liturgy.

Lent is especially consecrated to the purification of the heart. This purification is accomplished first of all by sorrow for sin, compunction of heart, and penance, but also involves the positive element of growth in virtue. The Church often insists upon fasting from sin and from vice during these 40 days; in fact bodily fasting is the symbol of this true internal and spiritual fast as well as the means to attain it. True conversion, which is the aim of Lent, means forsaking sin and sinful ways. The Lenten Office reminds us of this every day: "Return to me with your whole heart, with fasting and weeping and mourning; rend your hearts and not your garments says the Lord Almighty" (Joel 2.12–13 from the "little chapter" for Terce). The bodily fasting and self-discipline in which all Christians engage during this time has for its main purpose to give them that control over themselves that they must have to purify their hearts and renew their lives. We are not only to fast from sin, but by our very fasting, pursue holiness. The Gospel pericopes of this season present the person of Christ as the model and source of all holiness. These passages focus attention upon Him and inspire the Christian to follow in His steps.

This conversion from sin and compunction of heart should take place at the very beginning of Lent and not be deferred to the end of the season. Lent is not intended to be a kind of preparation for the Easter Confession. On the contrary, the original ideal was that Confession was made before Lent began. The penance was imposed on Ash Wednesday and penitents guilty of very serious sins were excluded from the Eucharist until they were absolved on Holy Thursday. The whole Lenten season is the time for penance, which means sorrow for sin and conversion to God. A further reason for confessing grave sins before Lent begins is that the Eucharist plays an important part in bringing about that purification of heart that is the goal of the Lenten observance.

Stational Mass. Historically, the importance of Lent in the Church year was emphasized by the fact that each day in this season had its proper Mass and STATIONAL CHURCH. No other season of the year is distinguished in this manner. Furthermore, these Mass formularies (with the exception of the Thursday Masses, which were added in the eighth century) are among the most ancient in the Missal, going back at least to the time of Gregory the Great (d. 606).

The reason there is a proper Mass for each day in Lent is that the Christian community at Rome was accustomed to gather in a designated church to participate in the pope's Eucharistic celebration. This custom emphasized both the unity of the Christian community and the importance of Lent as a time of special prayer. It showed too that Lent is not an individualistic affair, but a corporate action that involves the whole community. The Church at Rome instinctively felt that the solemn corporate offering of the Holy Eucharist by the whole community gathered around its chief shepherd was the ideal way of observing Lent.

After these ferial Masses had been in large part eclipsed for many centuries, Pius X took the first step to restoring them to their original dignity by permitting the Masses of those days to be said even on feast days (below the rank of second class). In the 1955 reforms of Pius XII, all feasts under second class rank are reduced to commemorations leaving the ferial Mass and Office in possession of the day. This gave a renewed prominence to the temporal cycle over the sanctoral, reversing a tendency that began in the Middle Ages and that obscured the fact that the liturgical year is primarily the celebration of the work of Redemption.

The texts of the ferial Masses show strong influence of the themes of the Lenten season: penance, conversion, return to God, sorrow for sin, redemption, the Passion, and especially Baptism. The fact that Lent was the great baptismal retreat of the Church and the last stage of the catechumenate has greatly affected the liturgy of the season.

The last week of Lent is called HOLY WEEK; the theme of the Masses during this time is the Lord's messianic mission achieved by means of His Passion. The prayers continue to refer to fasting, but most of the chants are drawn from those Psalms that allude to the voice of Christ in His Passion. The Gospels during this time present the Passion as a growing conflict between Christ and His enemies. The Office during Passiontide is remarkable chiefly for the hymns that sing the triumph of the cross: the Pange lingua of Prudentius and the Vexilla Regis of Venantius Fortunatus.

Historically, the Lenten Masses have several other features that set them apart. The most notable are the Oratio super Populum and the absence of the Alleluia in the Christian West. The first of these is simply the ancient collect of blessing that concluded every Mass. Gregory the Great dropped this from the Mass during the rest of the year, but retained it for the ferial days during Lent and made it a prayer for pentitents. In the 1969 liturgical revisions, the ancient form of collect of blessings was fully restored. In the Latin Church, the Alleluia is so intimately associated with the joy of Easter that it was natural it should be dropped out during so penitential a season as Lent. The Christian East has always kept the use of the Alleluia throughout the Sundays of Lent, on the basis that every Sunday is a celebration of the Lord's celebration, the season of Lent notwithstanding.

Bibliography: E. FLICOTEAUX, Le Sens du carême (Paris 1956). H. FRANKE, Lent and Easter (Westminster, Md. 1955). T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (Collegeville, 1991); A. J. MARTIMORT, ed. The Church at Prayer IV: The Liturgy and Time (Collegeville 1986); A. NOCENT, The Liturgical Year, v. 2 Lent (Collegeville 1977). A. ADAM, The liturgical year: its history & its meaning after the reform of the liturgy (New York 1981).

[W. J. O'SHEA/T. KROSNICKI/EDS.]

LENTINI, DOMENICO, BL.

Priest of the Diocese of Tursi-Lagonegro (formerly Policastro); b. Nov. 20, 1770, at Lauria, Potenza, Italy; d. there Feb. 25, 1828. The youngest of the five children of Macario Lentini and Rosalia Vitarella, Domenico (Dominic) Lentini studied in the seminary at Salerno and was ordained in 1794. In addition to his ministry in Lauria, he taught literature, philosophy, and theology to young people in his home without monetary compensation. He preached and catechized throughout the diocese and spread the devotion to Our Lady of Sorrows. He is called the "precursor to the Curé d'Ars" (St. John VIAN-NEY) because of his willingness to make himself available to hear confessions and his gift of reading hearts. He practiced personal austerity in order to provide charity to the poor, and frequent penances in the spirit of reparation. Lentini was beatified on Oct. 12, 1997 by Pope John Paul

Feast: Feb. 25.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 20 (1997): 999. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 42 (1997): 1–2. G. REALE, Domenico Lentini, santo di paese (Reggio Calabria 1977).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LENZ, DESIDERIUS

Benedictine architect and sculptor who founded the school of BEURONESE ART; b. Peter Lenz, in Haigerloch, March 12, 1832; d. Beuron, Jan. 28, 1928. After a sculpture course at Munich Academy (1850-58), Lenz was professor at the Nuremberg Artistic Handicrafts School until 1862. He studied in Italy until 1865 and was profoundly influenced by Egyptian art through the publications of the Egyptologist K. R. Lepsius. In 1872 he entered Beuron as artist oblate and was sent to Monte Cassino for his novitiate; he took vows in 1878 (subdiaconate, 1891; choir monk, 1892). Lenz together with Gabriel (Jakob) Wüger founded the Beuron art school in 1894; its purpose was to achieve a renewal of sacred art in a time of overriding naturalism. For this purpose Lenz developed an aesthetic geometry based on his observation of Egyptian art. In his studies he sought for the primordial dimensions of the human body, in order to create a "dogma-grounded religious art," which was his understanding of ancient art. In this spirit, between 1868 and 1871, Lenz built and decorated with frescoes the St. Maur Chapel near Beuron aided by his friends Gabriel Wüger and Luke (Fridolin) Steiner. In 1872 he remodeled the baroque Beuron monastery church, eliminating the high altar with J. A. Feuchtmayer's "Assumption." In later years Lenz and the Beuron school planned and directed extensive projects in the Abbey of Monte Cassino. Frescoes were painted in the tower (1876–80, 1885–93), and the crypt was decorated with mosaics (1898–1913). Decorations were carried out also in the churches of Maredsous, Belgium (1892), and of Emmaus (1881–91) and St. Gabriel (1891–99) in Prague.

Bibliography: D. LENZ, Zur Ästhetik der Beuroner Schule (2d ed. Beuron 1927). G. SCHWIND, P. Desiderius Lenz (Beuron 1932). M. DREESBACH, ''P. Desiderius Lenz von Beuron: Theorie und Werk,'' Studien und Mitteilungen zur Geschichte des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 68 (1957): 95–183; 69 (1958): 5–59. S. MAYER, Beuroner Bibliographie, 1863–1963 (Beuron 1963) 161–164.

[U. ENGELMANN]

LEO, LEONARDO

Baroque composer of opera and church music (full name: Lionardo Oronzo Salvatore de Leo); b. San Vito degli Schiavi (near Brindisi), Italy, Aug. 5, 1694; d. Naples, Oct. 31, 1744. In 1709 Leo began his musical studies at the Conservatorio Santa Maria della Pietà dei Turchini in Naples. While he was still a student, his first sacred opera (1712) was successfully performed there. He was a supernumerary organist of the royal chapel from 1713, and, after the death of A. SCARLATTI in 1725, he became first organist. As choirmaster for the royal chapel from 1744, Leo composed Mass propers for the Sundays of Lent in A CAPPELLA style to replace the concertato music previously favored. At the time of his death, Leo was primo maestro at the Conservatorio di Sant' Onofrio (where he began teaching in 1739) and at the Turchini (where he had been secundo maestro 1734-37 and primo maestro from 1741 on). Among his students were JOMMELLI, Piccini, and Traetta. Leo's importance arises partly from his activity in the Neapolitan opera seria tradition (he was also one of the creators of the comic opera) and partly from the contrapuntal innovations in his church music (Masses, Magnificats, motets, etc.). The well-known, eight-voice Miserere, for two choirs and basso continuo (ed. H. Wiley Hitchcock, St. Louis 1961), may have drawn other Neapolitan composers to the a cappella style. A number of instrumental works (organ, harpsichord, cello) have also been preserved.

Bibliography: H. HUCKE, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 8:622–630. E. J. DENT, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 5:131–135. R. EITNER, Quellen-Lexikon der Musiker und Musikgelehrten, 10 v. [Leipzig 1900–04; New York n.d. (1947)] 6:134–138. Leo's sacred music is repr. in several standard collections. There is no complete modern ed. G. H. HARDIE, "Leonardo Leo (1694–1744) and His Comic Operas Amor vuol sofferenze and Alidoro" (Ph.D. diss. Cornell University, 1973). H. HUCKE,

Leo I, Byzantine Emperor. (Archive Photos)

"Leonardo Leo" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 10, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 666–669. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 497. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 1038–1039. S. R. VAN NEST, "Leonardo Leo's F Major Dixit Dominus: An Edition and Commentary" (D.M.A. diss. University of Missouri at Kansas City, 1997).

[R. STEINER]

LEO I, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reigned from 457 to 474; b. Thrace, c. 400; d. Constantinople, 474. A tribune commanding Selymbria, Leo was presented to the troops in Constantinople as the new emperor upon the death in 457 of MARCIAN by the Alan Patrician Aspar. Accepted by the Senate, he was crowned by Patriarch ANATOLIUS, in the first such ceremony recorded in Byzantine history.

When informed of the anti-Chalcedonian intrigue by Julian of Cos, apocrisiarius for Pope Leo I in Constantinople, the new emperor sent an imperial decree to the Oriental metropolitans upholding the orthodox faith (Acta Conciliarum Oecumenicorum 2.5:12.8 and 75.28). Under the influence of Monophysite agitation (particularly that of the usurper bishop of Alexandria, TIMOTHY AELURUS, installed after the murder of Proterius on March 29, 457), and of Aspar, Leo exhibited some hesitation in his attitude toward the Council of CHALCEDON and was importuned by letters from Pope LEO I to himself and Bishop Anatolius.

He decided against a council to revise the Chalcedonian decisions, and he sent a circular inquiry to the Oriental metropolitans, asking whether Chalcedon should be upheld and Timothy Aelurus recognized as bishop of Alexandria (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. 2.9). The metropolitan synods, except that of Pamphylia. voted in favor of Chalcedon and against Timothy, as did the renowned ascetics Symeon STYLITES, John of Cyr, and Baradatus. The results of these consultations, which attested the unity of the episcopate, were published and a policy of rigorous repression of the anti-Chalcedonians inaugurated. Timothy Aelurus was banished to Gangra in Paphlagonia (spring of 460) and the intruder Peter the Fuller (469-471) was deposed from Antioch on the complaint of Bishop Martyrius. A law forbade monks to leave their monasteries unless sent as procurators and prohibited their participation in doctrinal quarrels (Codex Just. 1.3.29). In 469 Leo condemned simony in episcopal elections (ibid. 1.3.30), having in mind Patriarch Gennadius (458-471) and the collusion of the 80 bishops who attended his installation. Unsuccessful in the repression of the VANDALS in Africa (461–468), he turned against the Arians after the death of Aspar (471).

The unique manuscripts of the Latin translation of the Codex Encyclius, which is apparently a second version made by the monk Epiphanius for CASSIODORUS, is mutilated and contains the responses of only 20 provinces to Leo's circular inquiry (Acta Conciliarum Oecumenicorum 2.5:24–98).

Bibliography: T. SCHNITZLER, Im Kampfe um Chalcedon (Analecta Gregoriana 16; 1938). E. SCHWARTZ, Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma (Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften N.S. 10 (Munich 1935–). C. MOELLER, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, eds. 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 1:651–668. F. HOFMANN, ibid. 2:24–35. R. HAACKE, ibid. 108–112. H. BACHT, ibid. 257–261. A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, ed., Les Moines d'Orient (Paris 1961–) 2:87–161. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949–59) 1:354–362. F. DÖLGER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:961.

[H. CHIRAT]

LEO III, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

March 25, 717, to June 18, 741; b. Germaniceia, northern Syria, c. 675. Leo was transferred with his parents to Thrace by JUSTINIAN II. He first came into prominence in 705, when he helped Justinian regain his throne.

Justinian rewarded him with the title of spatharius and later sent him on a mission to the Caucasus. Anastasius II appointed him strategus of the Ametolikon theme, but when Anastasius was overthrown, Leo rebelled and in 717 seized the throne for himself. His reign is known for two important developments: the checking of the expansion of the Arabs and the launching of ICONOCLASM. When Leo shattered the Arab siege of Constantinople in 717, he saved the empire as a whole; and when he defeated them in 740 at Acroinon, he saved Asia Minor. Iconoclasm, launched in 726 (see GERMANUS I, PATRIARCH), plunged the empire into a controversy that lasted more than a century; it also brought about a rift with Rome that had serious consequences. For it was as a result of this rift that Leo III removed Sicily, Calabria, and Illyricum (732–733) from the jurisdiction of the papacy and placed them under that of the Byzantine PATRIARCHATE (see AN-ASTASIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE; GREGORY III, POPE). Leo III was also a reformer. He issued a new legal code, the Ecloga, and made several administrative changes, but the important social and economic reforms formerly attributed to him are no longer considered to have been his work.

Bibliography: K. SCHENK, Kaiser Leo III (Halle 1880). G. OSTROGORKSY, History of the Byzantine State (Oxford 1956) 133–147.

[P. CHARANIS]

of 815) to confirm the decisions of Constantine V's council of 754 and condemn the justification of the use of images defined by the Council of NICAEA II (787).

He persecuted bishops Joseph of Thessalonika, Peter of Nicaea, Michael of Synnada, Euthymius of Sardis, and Anthony of Dyrrachium for their opposition to his iconoclastic policy. THEODORE THE STUDITE appealed to Pope PASCHAL I and asked the intervention of the Carolingian King Louis the Pious; and the Studite monk Thaddeus and THEOPHANES THE CONFESSOR died in exile in 818.

Leo's iconoclastic policies, however, were not as stringent as those of his predecessors, and he made a number of converts among the monks who had previously been the strongest upholders of the orthodox position. On the Vigil of Christmas, supporters of Michael II the Amorian (820–829) assassinated Leo in the palace chapel. His reign, despite his iconoclasm, is regarded as one of the more efficient in Byzantine history.

Bibliography: F. DÖLGER, Corpus der grieschischen Urkunden des Mittelalters und der neueren Zeit, series A, Regesten (Munich 1924–32) 1:47–49. P. J. ALEXANDER, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople (New York 1958) 77–80, 111–147, 222. G. OSTROGORSKY, Studien zur Geschichte des byzantinischen Bilderstreites (Breslau 1929) 46–60. V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople, (Kadikoi-Bucharest 1932–) 1.2:29–41. S. RUNCIMAN, A History of the First Bulgarian Empire (London 1930) 61–74.

[H. CHIRAT]

LEO V, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Emperor from 813 to 820; iconoclast; d. Constantinople, 820. Leo was of Armenian descent. He served as a general in Anatolia under Michael I and caused that emperor's defeat and deposition by withholding the support of his troops in a battle against the Bulgarians at Versinikia, near Adrianople on June 22, 813. When proclaimed emperor, he assured the patriarch of Constantinople NICEPHORUS I (806–815) of his orthodoxy before entering the capital. After his coronation on July 11, 813, however, he refused to give the patriarch a written assurance of his orthodox faith.

Upon the death of the Bulgarian King Krum on April 13, 814, the siege of Constantinople was raised, and Leo arranged a 30-year peace treaty with the new Bulgarian Khan Omortag (winter of 815–816). He had already initiated the second period of ICONOCLASM, which lasted from 814 to 843. He set up a commission of six to justify the iconoclastic theology in a document that repudiated the making, existence, and veneration of images (Pentecost, 814); exiled Patriarch Nicephorus for his opposition (March 13, 815); installed Theodotus as the new patriarch; and convoked a synod in the Hagia Sophia (April

LEO VI, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reigned: Aug. 30, 886 (coemperor Jan. 6, 870), to his death on May 11, 912; b. Constantinople?, Sept. 19, 866; d. Constantinople; surnamed "the Wise" during his own lifetime. He was the second son of the emperor Basil I, and the eldest by Basil's marriage to Eudocia Ingerina. Although contemporary sources maintained that his real father was Basil's predecessor, Michael III, Leo never admitted his dubious parentage, and the translation of the body of Michael III to the capital was rather an act of political reconciliation than one of filial concern. He received a careful, mainly literary and theological education. Imprisoned for three years on charges of conspiracy against his father, he survived several conspiracies and revolts during his own reign. His private life was marred by the premature deaths of his first three wives, Theophano Martinakiou, Zoe Zaoutzaina, and Eudocia Baiane, and of two, perhaps even all three of his children by them. In September 905 a male heir, the future Constantine VII, was born by his mistress Zoe Karbounopsina, whereupon Leo uncanonically married for a fourth time. In the ensuing crisis in church-state relations, known as the "Tetragamy affair," he first had the support of Patriarch Nicholas I Mystikos, who subsequently, changed his mind. He was exiled and replaced by the emperor's spiritual father, EUTHYMIUS I. In March 907 a council of the representatives of Rome and the other patriarchates accorded Leo dispensation, although he had to observe penance. After his death, but with his prior consent, his brother the emperor Alexander restored Nicholas to the patriarchal throne. Reconciliation of the rival church parties became possible only in 920 and led to the promulgation of the Tomus Unionis, which was the official condemnation and prohibition of fourth marriages in the future (including the regulation of third marriages) and a declaration of the union of the Church.

In the belief that as God's chosen and omnipotent representative on Earth the emperor is responsible for the welfare and guidance of his subjects, Leo consistently pursued imperial control of internal affairs, including his officials, the aristocracy, the military, the guilds, and the church. To this end, one of his first acts after his accession was the deposition of Patriarch Photios and the appointment of his own brother Stephen. He was especially active in the improvement of the efficiency of the state, as several works published during his reign bear witness. They include Cletorologion of Philotheos, which is about government administration, and the Book of the Prefect, which discusses commerce. His legislative activity was remarkable. It included the completion of the Sixty Books (i.e., a great corpus of Roman law, a later version of which came to be known as the Basilica), the promulgation of 117 Novels and the compilation of the Procheiron. His government had the support of worthy administrators, especially Stylianos Zaoutzes, who was prominent in the early years of the reign. Leo was a successful diplomat, and during a period of continuous warfare he was able to stabilize of the empire despite some important defeats by the Bulgars (896) and Arabs (the loss of Taormina in 902, the sack of Thessalonica in 904, and the annihilation of the fleet of Himerios in 911–12). His armies had some success in the field, although Leo did not lead them himself, but his military policies, especially his diplomacy, contributed to the establishment of a balance of power on the eastern and western fronts.

Under Leo the court was a flourishing cultural and intellectual center. He himself was an author, and his literary production includes his Novels, two military treatises, homilies and orations (including a funeral oration on his parents), hymnography, and a monastic treatise. Various works, most notably two collections of oracles, were later attributed to him and maintained his posthumous fame as a prophet. Several depictions of Leo survive, and he can probably be identified as the emperor prostrating himself before Christ in the famous narthex mosaic of St. Sophia, Constantinople.

Bibliography: P. NOAILLES and A. DAIN, Les Novelles de Léon VI le Sage (Paris 1944). A. DAIN, Leonis VI Sapientis Problemata (Paris 1935). Tactica: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857-66) 107, 672C-1120, and in part R. VÁRI, Leonis Imperatoris Tactica I-II.1 (Budapest 1917-22). A. VOGT and I. HAUSHERR, Oraison funèbre de Basile I par son fils Léon VI le Sage (Rome 1932). Homilies: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857-66) 107, 1-298, and Akakios, Levonto' tou' sofou' panhgurikoi; lovgoi (Athens 1868). Monastic treatise: A. PAPA-DOPOULOS-KERAMEUS, ed., Varia Graeca Sacra (St. Petersburg 1909) 213-253. H. J. W. TILLYARD, "JEwqina; jAnastavsima. The Morning Hymns of the Emperor Leo," Annual of the British School at Athens 30 (1932) 86-108; 31 (1933) 115-147. F. CICOLLELA, "II carme anacreontico di Leone VI," Bollettino dei Classici ser. III, 10 (1989) 17–37. P. KARLIN-HAYTER, Vita Euthymii Patriarchae CP (Brussels 1971). C. MANGO, "The Legend of Leo the Wise," Zbornik Radova Vizantoloskog Instituta 6 (1960) 59–93; repr. in his Byzantium and Its Image (London 1984) no. XVI. G. OSTROGOR-SKY, History of the Byzantine State, tr. J. HUSSEY (2d ed. New Brunswick, N.J. 1969; several repr.) 233-261. J. GROSDIDIER DE MATONS, "Trois études sur Léon VI," Travaux et Mémoires 5 (1973) 181–242. A. SCHMINCK, Studien zu mittelbyzantinischen Rechtsbüchern (Frankfurt 1986). T. ANTONOPOULOU, The Homilies of the Emperor Leo VI (Leiden, New York 1997). S. TOUGHER, The Reign of Leo VI (886-912) (Leiden, New York, Cologne 1997).

[T. ANTONOPOULOU]

LEO I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: 440 to 461, called the Great, Doctor of the Church; b. probably Tuscany, the son of Quintianus, c. 400; d. Rome, Nov. 10, 461.

Life. Leo was deacon under Pope Celestine I (422–432), apparently entrusted with the care of the poor, and was possibly the acolyte mentioned as a Roman messenger to Africa by St. Augustine (Epist. 191.1). During the early difficulties over Nestorianism, he requested John CASSIAN to prepare a treatise, De Incarnatione Domini (430), sending him documents from the papal chancery (praef.). He was appealed to by CYRIL OF ALEX-ANDRIA for aid in curtailing the ambition of Juvenal of Jerusalem in 431 (Leo, Epist. 119.4). He was probably among the rectores romanae ecclesiae who drew up the syllabus on grace appended to the Letter of Pope Celestine to the bishop of Marseilles (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. F. Kaltenbrunner, 381) in which decisions of previous popes and synods in Africa are cited for the Church's doctrine (Patrologia Latina 45:175-660). PROSPER OF AQUITAINE credited Leo with strengthening the stand of Pope SIXTUS III in 439 against Julian of Eclanum (Chronicles. an. 439). Apparently at the request of the court of Ravenna, Leo was sent to Gaul in the spring of 440 to mediate the quarrel between the Patrician Aetius and the Pretorian Prefect Albinus (Prosper, Chronicles. an. 441). During his absence, Sixtus died (Aug. 19, 440), and the populace elected Leo, who returned to Rome and was consecrated bishop on Sept. 29, 440. In the sermon he preached on the occasion, Leo thanked the assembled clergy and populace for the confidence placed in him "absent on a long journey" (Ser. 1); and in four anniversary sermons at annual synods he described the bishops as "equal in the episcopacy, and in infirmities," but guided by "Peter in the person of Peter's successor' (Ser. 3.3), who is the "primate of all the bishops" (ibid. 4). He acknowledged the universal priesthood of the faithful presided over by Christ, whom the bishop of Rome represents, taking the place of Peter. Christ gave such great power to him whom he made ruler (principem) of the whole Church so that "if anything is properly done or directed by us in our time" it is to be attributed to the activity of him to whom it was said, "And you converted, confirm your brethren" (Ser. 4.2–4). Finally, Leo saw Peter functioning in the person of the pope (Ser. 5.2–4).

Proscenium arch view of Pope Leo I dissuading Attila, King of the Huns, from wrecking Rome after the destruction of Aquileia. (Archive Photos)

As bishop of Rome Leo dedicated himself to the priestly duty of preaching (sacerdotalis sermonis officium), and sermons of his for the whole liturgical cycle have been preserved: 10 for Christmas, eight for Epiphany, 12 for Lent, 19 on the Passion, two for Easter, two for the Ascension, three for Pentecost, one on the Feast of St. Peter, and another for St. Lawrence, 22 for the Ember days, which he says are celebrated four times a year (Ser. 19.2), when the faithful fast on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday and celebrate the vigil of Sunday at St. Peter's. Six sermons (de collectis) describe the distribution of alms to the poor as an Apostolic institution to offset pagan superstition (Ser. 6–11), and a sermon on Rome's deliverance, apparently from Genseric in 455, testifies to survivals of astrology, the circus, and pagan spectacles (Ser. 84). Leo reproved the custom of bowing toward the sun and condemned as paganitatis spiritu the notion that December 25 marks the rise of the New Sun rather than the birth of Christ (Ser. 27.4). He was also active in seeking to preserve the peace of his parishioners. He met with Attila the Hun at Mincio in Northern Italy and was successful in persuading him to withdraw from Italy. In 455, after Rome had been sacked by Genseric over a period of two weeks, he persuaded him to vacate the city with no further loss of life or property. In his efforts against heresy he prosecuted the Manichees (Ser. 9.4; Epist. 7) and condemned the Monophysites who had come to Rome with merchants from Egypt (Ser. 9.4; 96.1), the Pelagians (Epist. 1), and many other heretics.

To the bishops of the ten provinces of central and southern Italy under papal jurisdiction (corresponding in area to that of the civil vicarius Urbis), Leo commended the decretalia constituta of his predecessors and demanded notification of election, with approbation and consecration in Rome, and attendance at the annual synods. He specified liturgical, canonical, pastoral uniformity, gave rules for the Church's patrimony (Jaffé, 414–417), and sent aid to Sicily after the Vandal invasion.

Milan, which was the imperial capital of the West, functioned, particularly under St. Ambrose, as the seat of the metropolitan for the seven North Italian provinces. But this did not prevent Leo from asserting his authority here. For example he ordered a synod at Milan (451) to accept his Tome to Flavian; he vindicated the rights of Bishop Septimus of Altinum against the bishop of Aquileia (Jaffé, 398, 399), but congratulated Bishop Januarius of Aquileia for vigilance (ibid. 416), and in March 458 he settled a moral problem for Nicetas of Aquileia, ruling in favor of returned captives of war whose wives had taken a second husband in good faith (ibid. 536).

In dealing with the universal Church Leo was equally assertive. On July 27, 444, he acknowledged the succession of DIOSCORUS as patriarch of Alexandria, spoke of the papal principatus apostolicus, and urged uniformity in canonical and liturgical practice (ut fide et actibus congruamus; Jaffé, 406). When the Eutychian troubles began in Constantinople, Leo chided Bishop FLAVIAN for his delay in referring the matter to Rome, but supported him by sending his Tome to Flavian and legates to the Council of EPHESUS in 449; he later castigated the council as illud Latrocinium, that Robber Synod. He appealed in vain to Theodosius II to have its proceedings reversed, and on the accession of Marcian as Co-emperor with Pulcheria in August 450 he wrote to congratulate them. Though he preferred no council or one in Italy, he accepted Marcian's convocation of the Council of CHALCEDON and sent to it legates and his Tome. Though he refused to accept the jurisdictional ordination of canon 28, which gave Constantinople primacy in the Orient after Rome as the "New Rome," he finally confirmed the council's doctrinal decisions (453) and kept in close contact with the Emperor and, despite hesitations, with Anatolius the Patriarch and his own apocrisiarius, Julian of Cos, for information and action in attempting to have the council's decisions accepted among the Monophysite clergy and monks of Egypt, Palestine, and Syria. He kept abreast of ecclesiastical movements in the Orient, accepted the prerogative of Alexandria to set the annual date for Easter as of Nicene determination, and asserted papal rights over Eastern Illyricum, despite the claims of Constantinople. On the death of Marcian (457), the pope entered into cordial relations with Emperor Leo the Thracian, tolerated his hesitation to accept the pope's counsel regarding the support of Chalcedon, and encouraged him to safeguard the true faith even by intimidating or deposing bishops. In Africa, Pope Leo insisted upon the preservation of ecclesiastical statutes in the choice of bishops and in the resolution of scandals and disputes among clerics and bishops; but he cautioned great moderation, particularly under the Vandal vexations.

When Hilary of Arles, who had interfered in the affairs of many dioceses in Gaul and, in a synod in Rome discussing one of his interventions, withstood Leo to the face, Leo proved just but intransigent. He had Hilary confined to his diocese by an imperial edict (Novel. Valent. 17: July 8, 445) in which Emperor Valentinian III acknowledged the papal primacy. With his vicar in Illyricum, Anastasius of Thessalonica, Leo was almost brutal when he discovered that Anastasius had acted precipitously in dealing with his suffragans. "I gave you power as my vicar, but did not invest you with the plentitudo potestatis," said Leo, again recommending moderation in the use of power, and conceded that in governance, some things must be severely repressed, others, tolerated.

Doctrine. In regard to faith, Leo wrote no treatise, but he described the process of achieving faith: "We are led to the faith as it is proclaimed in the Gospel story and by prophetical instruments; so that we cannot hold as ambiguous what has been announced by so many oracles." The testimony of the Apostles renders Christ present: "We see what they saw; touch what they touched" (Ser. 64.1; 73.1). He maintained that the Church and Christ do not live in the past: "Not in history alone do we know these things, but in virtue of present achievements" (Ser. 63.6). God adorns his body the Church with innumerable charismatic gifts (Ser. 63.7). In the body of Christ (Ser. 25.5; 46.3) sanctified by the Holy Spirit (Ser. 75.5), the members are held together by a consortium gratiae (Ser. 89.5) excluding those who will not accept its belief and practice. It is the Holy Spirit who instructs in the Scriptures, and although frequently the mystery of the message is difficult to understand, there is never need for doubt (Ser. 66.1). Even the attack of heretics can render faith clearer and stronger through the assistance given the faithful by the Holy Spirit in overcoming difficulties (Epist. 102.1; 104.1). The Apostles' Creed is a "brief and perfect confession of the Catholic faith" (Epist. 31.4) and has already refuted the Nestorians and Eutychians. Leo expressed some hesitation before the ratiocinatio humana (Ser. 26.2) and the argumenta mundanae doctrinae (Ser. 69.5), placing his reliance in the mystery of the Redemption. He warned against the philosophical attempt to limit God to categories of space and time.

Adam's fall was occasioned by the temptation of the devil and the human desire for angelic honors (Ser. 25.5; 30.6). But God in his mercy prepared a remedy from the beginnings of the universe (primordia mundi; Ser. 22.1), sending a singular physician from the heavens, announced by great signs and prophecies (Ser. 12.1), His Son, the same in nature as man but sinless, and thus, as man, a perfect image and likeness of God (Ser. 64.2; Epist. 59.4). Born of a Virgin, Christ retained the paternal glory (Ser. 22.2). He is homoousios, of same substance as the Father, and consubstantial with his Mother as man (Ser. 30.6). Thus he has been able to accomplish human redemption (Ser. 56.1; Epist. 35.1), which neither the Mosaic Law nor the Prophets could achieve (Ser. 23.3). The cross of Christ is thus a sacrament or mystery, and the altar is for the oblation of humanity through this salutary Host (Ser. 55.3), and is for all men at all times (Ser. 23.4).

Human redemption unto liberty should be exercised in observance of evangelical discipline in the works of mercy and the love of justice, which have been perfected and augmented by the Savior (Ser. 63.5; 92.1). Human dignity, given by Christ, is supported by Grace so that the person can love what God loves and abstain from what displeases God (Ser. 94.2), who gives both the desire for doing good to the will, and efficacy to the action placed (Ser. 38.3). While humanity recognizes the revolt of concupiscence, the person should still be more conscious of his regeneration in Christ through Baptism and the Sacraments (Ser. 90.1; 18.1; 98.1).

In Baptism the contagion of the ancient damnation is burnt out, so that the human person becomes the body of Christ (Epist. 59.4). While the person is still in the body, there is no need for despair since correction is to be hoped for by all (Ser. 34.5).

Lent is the time for expiating faults both grave and small through penance (Ser. 43.3; 45.1). Fasting, almsgiving, and prayer, particularly in unison with the Church, are the principal means of obtaining pardon; for the tears of the penitent through the apostolic key open the gates of God's mercy (Ser. 49.3), since penance disarms God's justice (Ser. 92.1). This pardon is exercised through the power of the keys confided to the bishops, who should exhort to penance and apply forgiveness most mercifully, particularly to those in danger of death (Epist. 108.2; Ser. 5.5).

The Eucharist is the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, fulfilling the sacrifice once for all, offered to God (Ser. 54.3). It should be received with faith so that there is no doubt in the mind of those answering Amen as to the reality of the body and blood of Christ that they receive (Ser. 91.30; Epist. 69.2). Leo spoke of the chrismatio of the baptized, whom the "Sign of the Cross makes kings and the unction of the Holy Spirit makes priests" (Ser. 4.1), and he mentioned the clarior ordo levitarum (deacons), the greater dignity of priests, and the sacratior unctio sacerdotum (bishops; Ser. 69.7; 66.2). He distinguished between the three hierarchical orders (Epist. 12.5) and mentioned subdiaconate, all four orders being subject to the law of continence (Epist. 14.4).

Ecclesiastical Governance. In the government of the Church, Leo set down norms of propriety and moderation whereby, the onus of evil being lifted, a differential in correction is required; for certain things are to be tolerated, others, cut out (Epist. 12.15). The Church should ever apply moderation, acting severely with the obdurate, but quickly giving forgiveness to those who repent and strive for correction (Epist. 30.1). Nevertheless, care must be taken to preserve the statuta of the Apostolic See and the decrees and authority of the canons (Epist. 1.1). The bishops form a society of charity, throughout the whole world preserving the integrity of communion (Epist. 80.1), and this fraternal union in charity and peace is served by the confession of one faith (Epist. 130.2).

Leo conceded that the emperor, whose subject he was as a Roman, was endowed with regalia potentia and sacerdotalis industria (Epist. 115.1; 116). He attributed to Leo the Thracian both a royal and sacerdotal spirit (mens; Epist. 155.2) and reminded him of his care for the universal church. In the end, however, Leo conceded that there was fundamental difference between imperial politics and the administration of the Church, each having its own proper function.

Of Leo's writings only 96 sermons and 173 letters (of which 20 are considered spurious and 30 were written to him) have survived. It is certain that Leo had Prosper of Aquitaine as secretary and that in the composition of papal documents the curial style was achieved by experts. Leo's sermons are of his own composition, but they exhibit an extremely polished antithetical style that indicates they were refashioned before publication. However, they are excellent instruments of the exhortation to sanctity, with scriptural foundation and an ecclesiastical awareness that enters deeply into the supernatural mystery of salvation, which Leo accommodated to the everyday needs and interests of his people on a liturgically effective plane. Considerable research has been done on the sacramentaries to ferret out Leo's contribution to the liturgical life of the Church; but in this field few certainties have been attained. What is certain is that the sacramentary bearing his name is a compilation of orations and prefaces of the Mass made in the sixth century. Although the Leonine Sacramentary is not wholly Leonine, it still remains as the oldest extant form of the Roman Missal. Leo's greatness is assured in the fundamentally spiritual approach he exercised in his daily pastoral instruction for the sanctification of his people. He is admittedly the greatest administrator of the ancient Church, the man who truly amalgamated ecclesiastical procedure with Roman law and put a juridical structure under the Roman primacy that has withstood the toll of 16 centuries. But his true significance resides in his doctrinal insistence on the mystery involved in Christ and the Church and in the supernatural charisms of the spiritual life accorded to man in Christ and in His body the Church. In keeping with this concept, Leo firmly believed that everything he did and said as pope for the governance of the Church was participated in by Christ, the head of the mystical body, and concurred in by St. Peter, in whose place Leo acted (cujus vice fungimur).

Feast: April 11, June 28; (Greek Church, Feb. 18).

Bibliography: Patrologia latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878-90) v.54-56. A. CHAVASSE, ed. Leo Magnus Tractatus, (Turnhout 1987). R. DOLLE, Sources Chrétiennes, ed. H. DE LUBAC et. al (Paris 1941) 22, 49. E. HUNT, tr. Letters (New York 1957). E. SCHWARTZ, Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum 2.4. Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (2d ed. Stenbrugge 1961) 1656-61. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen biz zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930-33) 1:423-564. H. SCHIPPER and J. VAN OORT, Sermons and Letters against the Manicaheans: Selected Fragments (Turnhout 2000). C. SILVA-TAROUCA, "Nuovi studi sulle antiche lettere dei papi," Gregorianum 12 (1931) 3-56, 349-425, 547-598; Epistulae contra Euthchis haerisin (Rome 1934-5); "La tradizione manoscritta del Tomus Leonis," Studi dedicati alla memoria di Paolo Ubaldi (Milan 1937) 151-170. M. KRABBLE, ed. Epistuala ad Demetriadem de vera humilitate (Washington DC 1965). J. LECLERQ, ed. Sermons (Paris 1964). B. AL-TANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAF (New York 1960) 417-422. P. BATIFFOL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 9.1:218-301. H. LIETZMANN, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et. al. 12.2 (1925) 1962-73. H. ARENS, Die Christologische sprache Leos des Grossen: analyse des Tomus an den Patriarchen Flavian (Freiburg 1982). P. BARCLIFT, "The Shifting Tones of Pope Leo the Great's Christological Vocabulary," Church History 66 (1997): 221-39; and "Predestination and Divine Foreknowledge in the Sermons of Pope Leo the Great," Church History 62 (1993): 5-21. L. CASULA, La cristologia di San Leone Magno: il fondamento dottrinale e soteriologico (Milan 2000). Y. M. DUVAL, "Quelques emprunts de saint Léon á Saint Augustin," Mélanges de science religieuse 15 (1958) 85-94; Journal of Theological Studies 11 (1960) 83-84. F. DI CAPUA, Il ritmo prosaico nelle lettere dei papi, 3 v. (Rome 1937–47). G. M. DURAND, "Leon le Grand," Revue des Sciences Philosophiques et Theologiques 69 (1985): 577-610. W. J. HALLIWELL, The Style of Pope St. Leo the Great (Catholic University of America, Patristic Studies 59; 1939). C. CALLEWAERT, S. Léon le Grand et les textes du Léonien (Steenbrugge 1954). A. FIELD, The Binding of the Strong Man: the Teaching of St. Leo the Great in a Modern Version. (Ann Arbor, MI 1976). A. P. LANG, Leo der Grosse und die Texte des Altgelasianums (Steyl 1957). P. GAL-TIER, A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart (Würzburg 1950-54)1:345-387. F. HOFMANN, ibid. 2:24-35. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE (Paris 1949-59) 1:309-362, 572-579. O. HORN, Petrou Kathedra: der Bischof von Rom und die Synoden von Ephesus (449) und Chalcedon (Paderborn 1982). A. GUILLAUME, Jeûne et charité. . .chez s. Léon le Grand (Paris 1954). M. B. DE SOOS, Le Mystère liturgique d'après s. Léon le Grand (Mènster 1958). N. JAMES, "Leo the Great and Prosper of Aquitane: A Fifth Century Pope and His Advisor [texts]," Journal of Theological Studies 44 (1993): 554-84; and, "Was Leo the Great the author of Liturgical Prayers?" Studia Patristica 26 (1993): 35-40.

[F. X. MURPHY]

LEO II, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: January 681, to July 3, 683. A Sicilian by birth, he was competent in both Greek and Latin. In accord with the decree of Emperor CONSTANTINE IV Pogonatus that the electoral certificate of Pope AGATHO's successor be sent to Constantinople for ratification, Leo's election shortly after Agatho's death on Jan. 10, 681, was announced to Constantine by March 681. Confirmation, however, was not received at Rome until July 682, thus delaying Leo's consecration by the bishops of Ostia, Porto, and Velletri to August 682. On Dec. 13, 681, the emperor had forwarded for papal approbation the acts of the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE III that condemned Monothelitism. Leo ratified the synodal decisions sometime after Sept. 1, 682, but explained that Pope HONORIUS I's only fault in regard to Monothelitism lay in his permissive attitude toward the heresy. At the same time papal letters were written to the Spanish hierarchy, to King Ervigio, a Count Simplicius, and Abp. Quiricus of Toledo; they contained a partial Latin translation of the acts of the Council and the request that they be subscribed to and their teaching promulgated. The privilege of Mar. 1, 666, whereby the Church of RAVENNA had been declared AUTOCEPHALOUS by Emperor CONSTANS II was withdrawn by Constantine IV, and the Emperor directed the archbishop-elect of Ravenna to go to Rome for his consecration. In turn Leo exempted the archbishop from the traditional taxes incidental to consecration.

Feast: July 3.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878-90) 96:387-420. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:359–362,377–379. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. P. EWALD (repr. Graz 1956) 1:240-241; 2:699, 741. F. DÖLGER, Corpus der griechischen Urkunden des Mittelalters und der neueren Zeit (Munich 1924-32). J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Florence-Venice 1757-98) 11:713-922, 1046-58. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 1.2:49–53. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 9.1:301-304. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tubingen 1930-33) 2:610-619. O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941). J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950-53) 1:338-342. A. BREUKLAAR, Biographisch-Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon 4 (Herzberg 1992). FULLER, A., "A propos de la nouvelle édition des actes du sixième concile oecuménique (Constantinople III)," Revue des Études Byzantines 52 (1994) 273-86. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3d ed. (Freiburg 1997). B.S. SODARO, Santi e beati di Calabria (1996) 71-74. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 78-79.

[H. G. J. BECK]

LEO III, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Dec. 26, 795 to June 24, 816. Son of a non-noble and perhaps non-Roman family, Leo made a career in the papal administration, eventually becoming a cardinal priest and an important official in charge of the personal possessions of the pope. Elected pope with the support of the clerical party in Rome and perhaps uncertain of his position in the eyes of the Roman aristocracy, Leo quickly sent a letter to CHARLEMAGNE asking renewal of the Frankish-papal friendship alliance. The new pope also sent the keys to the tomb of St. Peter and the standards of the city of Rome along with a request that the king send an official to accept oaths of obedience and loyalty from the Romans. At least symbolically, these acts suggested that the pope recognized some special status for the king extending beyond the role of protector of the Papal State. Charlemagne indicated his willingness to renew the friendship alliance, but he also made clear in somewhat ominous terms his conception of the relationship between king and pope: As king, his was the responsibility to take whatever measures were necessary to defend the true faith against external attacks by pagans and infidels and to enhance its practice and restrain its detractors within the Christian community, while it was the pope's responsibility to pray for the success of the king in his efforts to safeguard and promote the Church.

Leo was soon in need of a protector, this time from within the Papal State. Almost from the beginning of his pontificate, there was unrest among the nobility in the Papal State stemming from what was perceived as the harshness of the papal administration. In April 799 a band of dissidents, led by a papal official who was a nephew of Leo's predecessor, Pope ADRIAN I, attacked Leo while he participated in a religious procession. They sought to render him unfit for office by blinding him and cutting out his tongue. Rescued from that fate by supporters, including Frankish agents, Leo was summoned to Paderborn to meet with Charlemagne. His enemies also appeared there to bring charges of adultery and perjury against Leo. Charlemagne ordered the pope back to Rome, escorted by Frankish bishops and counts. At the Frankish court there was growing concern about the seriousness of the crisis and a sense that only Charlemagne was in a position to guarantee the welfare of Christendom. Once back in Rome, Leo was reinstalled as pope. The Frankish officials who escorted him undertook an investigation of the charges against the pope, but the final settlement of the case was left to Charlemagne, who arrived in Rome in late November 800. He summoned a synod of Frankish and Roman dignitaries to examine the charges against Leo. That body took the position that no earthly authority was qualified to judge the Vicar of Christ. Instead, on December 23, Leo appeared before another synod and cleared himself by swearing on oath that he was innocent of the charges against him.

On Christmas Day 800, during Mass at St. Peter's, Leo placed a crown on the head of Charlemagne while the assembled crowd acclaimed him "emperor of the Romans." Songs praising Charlemagne as emperor (the laudes) were intoned and the pope prostrated himself before the new emperor. The responsibility for and the implications of this momentous event have long been debated. Despite a claim made later by Charlemagne's biographer, Einhard, that the king would not have attended Mass that day had he known what was going to happen, the evidence leaves little doubt that the event was jointly planned by pope and king. In view of the tenuous position of the pope at the moment and of Charlemagne's usual mode of action, perhaps it can be assumed that the king was the prime mover. The coronation offered advantages for both. To Charlemagne and his advisers the new title was one befitting the king's accomplishments and his exalted place in Christendom, and it reinforced the ideology of rulership being shaped at the Frankish court. As emperor Charlemagne's legal position in the Papal State was clearer than that defined by his previous title of patricius Romanorum. His new title gave him a status equal to that of the emperor in Constantinople. For Leo the coronation established on a clearer basis a legal authority capable of dealing with the enemies of the pope within the Papal State as well as his external enemies. That aspect of the coronation became obvious when early in 801 Charlemagne tried the conspirators, found them guilty of treason under Roman law, and sentenced them to death, a sentence commuted to exile at the request of Leo. Leo's role in bestowing the imperial crown served to exalt papal authority and acted as a precedent for later papal claims to rights in the selection of emperors. Some contemporaries claimed that in 800 the imperial office was vacant because a woman, the Empress IRENE, occupied the throne. But despite Byzantine suspicions to the contrary, Charlemagne and Leo had no intention of usurping the crown of the eastern emperors or of transferring the office from new Rome back to old Rome. Instead they created a second empire comprised of all who were loyal to the Roman faith and its guardians, the pope, and the emperor in the West. The coronation linked the pope and the emperor in the West more closely together in guiding the Christian people, but it also posed the issue of which held the superior authority.

After 800 Leo remained on friendly terms with Charlemagne despite occasions when the pope complained about the intrusion of Frankish agents into papal affairs. Although the Roman Church provided models for the shaping of Christian life in Charlemagne's empire, the emperor continued to act as the directive force in renewing religious life in his realm without deferring to the pope. Charlemagne paid no heed to the pope in matters relating to his imperial title, which the pope had played some part in creating. In 806 he arranged for his own succession by dividing his empire among his three sons without reference to the imperial office; perhaps Leo was informed of the emperor's intention in this matter when he visited Francia in 805-806, but that was the extent of papal involvement. In 813 Charlemagne himself crowned as emperor his one surviving son, Louis the Pious, again acting without papal participation. Charlemagne carried on his long struggle to gain recognition from Constantinople for his imperial title without any significant participation by the pope; only when the treaty successfully ending that quest was worked out in 812 was Leo given a copy of it. Leo was able to act independently in some religious affairs, not always with the emperor's approval. He stoutly resisted Charlemagne's efforts to gain papal approval for the introduction of the filioque clause into the text of the Nicene Creed used in the Roman liturgy. Leo did cooperate with Charlemagne and his theologians to end the heresy of ADOPTIONISM in Spain.

Although most of his attention was focused on his own Papal State and the Frankish court, Leo was able to exert influence in other areas. He played an important role in establishing the ecclesiastical organization of Bavaria. He collaborated with Charlemagne in restoring King Eardulf of Northumbria to his throne, in disciplining the archbishop of York for his intrigues against Eardulf, and in restoring territory to the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury that had been detached by Pope ADRIAN I. Dissident factions in the Byzantine Church, especially one led by THEODORE THE STUDITE, repeatedly appealed to Leo for help against alleged abuses by Byzantine emperors and patriarchs; Leo usually tried to be conciliatory in these cases, in part because he was conscious of Charlemagne's ongoing effort to gain from Constantinople recognition for his imperial office. These cases indicate that Leo sustained his position as primate in Christendom, albeit vaguely defined and in spite of the towering shadow of Charlemagne and his CAESARO-PAPISM.

With the tacit consent of Charlemagne, Leo ruled the papal state as a sovereign. He was active in increasing papal revenues in order to continue the rebuilding the city of Rome and its churches, an effort made possible in part by generous gifts from Charlemagne. Despite the benefits his pontificate brought to Rome and the Papal State, his regime continued to meet resistance. The end of his pontificate was marked by another rebellion followed by a rural uprising, both vigorously suppressed by the papal administration. Amidst indications that he was less inclined toward the papacy than was his father, Emperor Louis the Pious was sufficiently concerned about the situation in the Papal State to order an investigation and then to summon the king of Italy, Bernard, to settle the problem. The Republic of St. Peter still needed a protector, one increasingly called upon to settle disturbances within the papal state threatening its existence.

Feast: Jan.12.

Bibliography: Sources. Le Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHES-NE, 3 v., 2d ed. (Paris, 1955-1957) 2: 1-48 (Eng. tr. in The Lives of the Eighth-Century Popes (Liber Pontificalis). The Ancient Biographies of Nine Popes from A.D. 715 to A.D. 817, trans. with intro. R. DAVIS, (Liverpool 1992) 173-230. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v., 2d ed. (Leipzig 1885-1888) 1: 307-316. Annales regni Francorum, a. 799-801, ed. F. KURZE, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum in usum scholarum (Hannover 1895) 106-116 (Eng. tr. in Carolingian Chronicles. Royal Frankish Annals and Nithard's Histories, tr. B. W. SCHOLZ [Ann Arbor, Mich. 1970], 77-82). Epistolae selectae pontificum Romanorum Carlo Magno et Ludowico Pio regnantibus scriptae, ed. K. HAMPE, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae v. 3 (Berlin 1899) 58-68. Leonis III. Papae Epistolae X, ed. K. HAMPE, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae, v. 3 (Berlin 1899) 85-104. Annales Laureshamenses, a. 801, ed. G. PERTZ, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Hannover 1826) 39. Karolus Magnus et Leo Papa. Ein Paderborner Epos von Jahre 799,, ed. J. BROCKMANN, with studies by H. BEUMANN, F. BRÜN-HOLZ, and W. WINKLEMANN, Studien und Quellen zur westfälischen Geschichte 5 (Paderborn, 1966). Alcvini sive Albini Epistolae, ed. E. DÜMMLER, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae, v. 2 (Berlin 1899) 1–493. Literature. L. DUCHESNE, The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes, A.D. 754-1073, tr. A. H. MATTHEW (London 1908) 112-125. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte des Papsttums. Eine Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zum

Tod Pius X, v. 2: Das Papsttums im Frühmittelalter. Geschichte des Päpste von Regierungsantritt Gregors des Grossen bis zum Mitte des ll. Jahrhundert (Leipzig 1934)184-199. É. AMMAN, Histoire de la Église depuis les origines jusqu'a nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN 6 (Paris 1947) 153-203. J. HALLER, Das Papsttums: Idee und Wirklichkeit, vol. 2: Der Aufbau (Basel 1951) 16-39. W. ULL-MANN, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages. A Study in the Ideological Relation of Clerical to Lay Power (London 1955) 87-118. W. MOHR, "Karl der Grosse, Leo III und der römische Aufstand von 799," Archivum Latinitatis Medii Aevi et Bulletin Ducange, 20: 39-98. W. OHNSORGE, "Zur Frage der griechischen Abstammung des Papstes Leo III," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 23: 188–190. F. KEMPF, H.-G. BECK, E. EWIG, and J. A. JUNGMANN, The Church in the Age of Feudalism, tr. A. BIGGS, Handbook of Church History, ed. H. JEDIN and J. DOLAN, v. 3 (New York and London 1968) 84-102. H.-G. BECK, "Die Herkunft des Papstes Leo III.," Frühmittelalterliche Studien 2: 131-137. V. PERI, "Leone III e il Filioque. Ancora un falso e l'autentico simbolo Romono," Rivista di storia e litteratura religiosa 6: 266-297. W. H. FRITZE, Papst und Frankenkönig. Studien zu den päpstlichfränkischen Rechtsbeziehungen von 754 bis 824, Vorträge und Forschungen, Sonderband 10 (Sigmaringen 1973) passim,, especially 46-48. R. FOLZ, The Imperial Coronation of Charlemagne, tr. J. E. ANDERSON (London 1974). M. KERNER, "Der Reinigungseid Leos III. Von Dezember 800. Die Frage seiner Echtheit und der frühen kanonistischen Überlieferung. Eine Studia zum Problem der päpstlichen Immunität im früheren Mittelalter," Zeitschrift des Aachener Geschichtsvereins 84-85, 131-160. L. WALLACH, "The Genuine and the Forged Oaths of Pope Leo III," and, "The Roman Synod of December 800 and the Alleged Trial of Leo III," in Diplomatic Studies in Latin and Greek Documents from the Carolingian Age (Ithaca, N.Y., and London 1977) 299-327, 328-352. R. KRAUTHEIMER, Rome: Profile of a City, 312-1308 (Princeton, NJ 1980) 109-142. O. HEGENEDER, "Der crimen maiestatis, der Prozess gegen die Attentäter Papst Leo III. und die Kaiserkrönung Karls des Grossen," in Aus Kirche und Reich: Studien zu Theologie, Politik und Recht im Mittelalter. Festschrift für Friedrich Kempf zu seinem fünfundsiebzigsten Geburtstag und Füfzigjährigen Doktorjubiläum, ed. H. MORDEK (Sigmaringen 1983) 55-79. T. F. X. NOBLE, The Republic of St. Peter. The Birth of the Papal State, 680-825 (Philadelphia 1984) 291-299. V. PERI, "Il Filioque nei magisterio Adriano I e di Leone III. Une plaausible formulazione del dogma," Rivista di storia della chiesa in Italia 41 (1987) 5-25. P. LLEWELLYN, "Le contexte romain du couronnement de Charlemagne. Le temps de l'Avent de l'année 800," Le Moyen Age 96: 209-225. P. DELOGU, "The Rebirth of Rome in the 8th and 9th centuries," in The Rebirth of Towns in the West, A.D. 700-1050, ed. R. HODGES and B. HIBLEY, CBA Research Reports 68 (London 1988) 33-42. J. FRIED, "Ludwig der Fromme, das Papsttum und die fränkischen Kirche," in Charlemagne's Heir. New Perspectives on the Reign of Louis the Pious (814-840), ed. P. GODMAN and ROGER COLLINS (Oxford, 1990) 231-273. L. P. ERMINI, "Renovatio murorum. Tra programma urbanistico et restauro conservativo: Roma e il ducato Romano," in Committenti e produzione artisticoletteraria nell'alto medioevo occidentale, 2 v., Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo 39 (Spoleto 1992) 2: 485-530, and figures 1-36. P. LLEWELLYN, Rome in the Dark Ages (London 1993) 141-172, especially 150-156. P. ENGLEBERT, "Papstreisen ins Frankenreich," Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und Kirchengeschichte 88: 77-113.

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

The Assumption of the Virgin, Pope St. Leo IV at left, detail of a 9th-century fresco in the basilica of S. Clemente, Rome.

LEO IV, ST. POPE

Pontificate: Jan. 847 to July 17, 855. Of Roman origin, Leo became a Benedictine monk as a youth. Pope GREGORY IV called him to service in the Lateran administration, and Pope SERGIUS II made him a cardinal priest. At the time of his election the Papal State was in dire need of strong leadership. It was torn by internal strife resulting from what many perceived as oppressive misgovernment by papal officials during the pontificate of Sergius II. It was recovering from a Saracen raid in 846, which witnessed the sack of the basilica of St. Peter and the ravaging of countryside surrounding Rome. As a consequence of the Treaty of Verdun in 843, which divided the previously unified Carolingian Empire into three competing kingdoms, it remained to be seen who would serve as St. Peter's protector. The new Pope's response to these challenges opened the way for a remarkable expansion of papal prestige during the next three decades.

Leo IV's first concern was the defense of Rome against the Saracens. He undertook to strengthen the existing city walls and to ensure the future safety of St. Peter's by constructing a wall enclosing the basilica and its associated ecclesiastical structures, and by attaching the enclosure to the city's main fortifications. This project, requiring four years (848 to 852) and a vast outlay of money and labor, created the Leonine city (Civitas Leonina), a stronghold which for centuries to come served as a place of safety for the papacy. Leo took steps to improve the fortifications of port cities guarding the papal state, especially those at the mouth of the Tiber. He even built a new city, Leopolis, as a refuge for the inhabitants of Centumcellae (Civita-vecchia) who were in danger of Saracen attack. In 849 the Pope was instrumental in organizing a naval campaign by the combined fleets of the cities of Naples, Amalfi, and Gaeta that, with the aid of a storm, inflicted a major defeat on a Saracen fleet preparing to attack Rome. All of these efforts played an important part in elevating papal prestige and marked a significant contribution to a larger effort that, during the last half of the ninth century, prevented the Saracen occupation of southern and central Italy.

Leo IV's relationship with his Frankish protectors was outwardly orderly, but often marked by tensions. Within the already established framework marking Frankish-papal relationship, Leo recognized Emperor LOTHAIR I as his overlord. Lothair, who resided in Aachen after he succeeded Louis the Pious as emperor in 840, increasingly entrusted directions of affairs in Italy to his son, Louis II, who served as king of Italy until 850, when at the request of Lothair I he was crowned coemperor by Pope Leo IV, thus affirming once again the role of the papacy in authenticating the assumption of the imperial office. The authority of Lothair I and Louis II in Rome continued to be defined by the Constituto Romana, an accord reached in 824 between Pope Eugenius II and the Carolingian government. In general, Leo IV respected its provisions, which defined for the Papal State a privileged position within the Empire. However it also placed limits on papal sovereignty and allowed the emperor specific rights in the governance of the Papal State, rights that Louis II was inclined to press. Yet Leo IV guarded his ability to control the governance of the Papal State. He challenged unwarranted intrusions of his protector's agents into affairs rightly belonging to the pope as governor of the Republic of St. Peter. Recent analysis of his benefactions in Rome reveal that he worked hard to keep the favor of nobles whose support was required to assure continued papal control over the Papal State, but who were increasingly resentful of the Frankish presence in Rome. He was especially concerned with instituting reforms; a Roman synod of 853 issued a series of canons aimed at limiting the involvement of the Roman clergy in secular affairs, defining and enforcing the spiritual responsibilities of clerics, improving clerical education and morals, and protecting church property. Leo's efforts to maintain control of affairs in the Papal State and to improve the quality of governance not only set him at occasionaly odds with Emperor Louis II, but also met opposition from a circle of educated nobles centered around a certain Bishop Arsenius of Orte and his nephew, Anastasius the Librarian. Although Arsenius and his circle were primarily interested in personal power, they also nurtured aspirations of restoring Rome to its ancient role as political capital of world. These nostalgic dreams inclined them toward Emperor Louis II as a more suitable ruler of Rome than Pope Leo IV. Anastasius reflected this inclination when he sought the protection of Louis II after Leo's dissatisfaction with his exercise of his priestly duties caused him to flee Rome. Despite Leo's repeated sentences of excommunication intended to force his return to Rome, Anastasius remained with Louis II and was widely viewed as the Emperor's choice to succeed Leo.

Leo IV's activities extended beyond defense of the Papal State against external enemies and resistance to its absorption into the Carolingian Empire. A careful analysis of his correspondence, surviving only in fragments, suggests that by the middle of the ninth century the bishop of Rome was increasingly viewed as an authority to whom those seeking guidance in the conduct of religious life, broadly defined, might turn.

Most often Leo IV was asked to intervene in cases involving the actions taken by powerful ecclesiastical potentates in the exercise of their offices. On the basis of complaints from various sources, he was forced to take firm action to curb the efforts of Archbishop John of Ravenna to escape Roman control. In response to appeals to Rome Leo challenged the actions of Archbishop Hincmar of Reims on various issues: excommunicating a vassal of Emperor Lothair I for violating his marriage vows; threatening to excommunicate Emperor Lothair I; and acting on decisions concerning the legality of episcopal ordinations reached in local councils held without papal participation or approval. In these cases the Pope ruled that Hincmar had exceeded his canonical authority and was subject to correction by the higher authority of the bishop of Rome. On the basis of appeals by the injured parties, Leo IV challenged the authority of Patriarch Ignatius of Constantinople for his action in deposing three Sicilian bishops. Leo died before the cases involving Hincmar and Ignatius were fully resolved, but his actions reflected an expanded definition of papal authority.

On occasion Leo IV confronted secular rulers. Emperor Lothair I's requested that Leo designate Hincmar as papal vicar of Gaul and Germany. Leo refused, stating that another already had that honor. In 853 Alfred, the young son of King Ethelwulf of Wessex, appeared in Rome as a pilgrim; Leo anointed him as future king and adopted him as his spiritual son by serving as his godfather. The Pope reprimanded the duke of Brittany for his treatment of the bishops of Brittany who resisted the duke's efforts to promote political independence from the West Frankish kingdom by establishing an autonomous Breton metropolitan see free from the jurisdiction of the archbishopric of Tours. Leo IV responded to still other appeals to Rome by sending instructions intended to provide proper direction in matters of ecclesiastical discipline to inquiring parties; such instructions went to a bishop in Africa, to bishops in England, and to bishops in Brittany.

In the responses coming from Rome to an ever widening circle in the Christian world, a certain message began to emerge, a message by no means new, but articulated again in terms reflecting new realities. Ultimate authority in ecclesiastical affairs rested in the hands of bishops. Their decisions were subject to appeal to the bishop of Rome who had a right to render final, binding judgments on the issues at stake. So too were the decisions of bishops sitting in council subject to approval and correction by the pope. The judgments of the bishop of Rome became, in effect, additions to the body of canon law, thereby expanding Rome's right to legislate for the entire Church. The bishop of Rome had the authority to take whatever action he deemed necessary to assure the safeguarding of the faith and proper Christian discipline. In brief, Leo IV's actions in these cases gave powerful impetus to a hierarchical view of governance of the Christian establishment, with the vicar of St. Peter placed at the apex of the hierarchy in possession of the final authority to assure that God's will would prevail.

Aside from his efforts to strengthen the defenses of Rome, Leo IV took a strong interest in rebuilding and beautifying churches in Rome and elsewhere in the papal state. In this respect he earned an important place among the late eighth—and early ninth—century popes who created the medieval city of Rome. His biography notes that he made important changes in the Roman liturgy, did much to encourage the development of Church music, and was famous as a preacher.

Feast: July 17.

Bibliography: Sources: Le Liber Pontificalis ed. L. DUCHES-NE, 3 v., 2nd ed. (Paris 1955-1957), 2: 106-139; Eng. tr. The Lives of the Ninth-Century Popes (Liber Pontificalis) R. DAVIS (Liverpool 1995) 99–159. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v., (2d ed. Leipzig 1885–1888) 1: 329–339. Epistolae selectae Sergii II, Leonis IV, Benedicti III pontificum Romanorum, ed. A. VON HIRSCH-GEREUTH, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae (Berlin 1899). Der Konzilien der karolingischen Teilreiche, 843-859, ed. W. HART-MANN, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia, (Hannover 1984). Annales Bertiniani, a, 868, ed. G. PERTZ, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Germanicarum in usum scholarum (Hannover 1888); Eng. tr. in The Annals of St.-Bertin, tr. J. L. NELSON (Manchester 1991). Literature: L. DUCHESNE, The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes, A.D. 754-1073, tr. A. H. MATTHEW (London 1908) 144-152. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte des Papsttums. Eine Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zum Tod Pius X v. 2 (Leipzig 1934) 223-240. É. AMANN, Histoire de l'Église depuis les origines jusqu'a nos jours, ed. A. FLI-CHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1947) 6:280-288. R. KRAUTHEIMERR, Rome: Profile of a City, 312–1308 (Princeton, N.J. 1980) 109–142. P. DELOGU, "The Rebirth of Rome in the 8th and 9th Centuries," in The Rebirth of Towns in the West, A.D. 700–1050, ed. R. HODGES and B. HIBLEY (London 1988) 33–42. W. HARTMANN, Die Synoden der Karolingerzeit im Frankenreich und in Italien, Konziliengeschichte, ed. W. BRANMÜLLER (Paderborn 1989). P. LLEWELLYN, Rome in the Dark Ages (London 1993)141–172. K. HERBERS, Leo III. und das Papsttum in der Mitte des 9. Jahrhunderts: Möglichkeiten und Grenzen päpstlicher Herrschaft in der späten Karolingerzeit (Stuttgart 1996).

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

LEO V, POPE

Pontificate: July to September 903; the successor of BENEDICT IV; from Arden. A simple priest from Priapi, in the district of Ardea, Leo was not a member of the Roman clergy when elected pope. After three months in office he was imprisoned and killed by Christopher, cardinal priest of S. Damaso, who succeeded him as pope (antipope?) from September 903 to January 904. Christopher, in turn, was deposed and executed by SERGIUS III. Leo's only recorded act is found in a bull issued in the interest of the canons of the church of Bologna. A legend of Breton origin identifies him with a Benedictine, St. Tugdual, who as a pilgrim to Rome was reputedly elected pope.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christian natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (2d ed. Leipzig 1881-88; repr. Graz 1956) 1:444; 2:746. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, v. 1-2 (Paris 1886-92), v. 3 (Paris 1958) 2:234. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304, 18 v. (London 1902-32) 4:111. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum, 5 v. (2d, rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950-53) 2:193, 545-546. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1955) 2:346, 434. A. FAVÉ, "S. Tugdual pape," Bull. de la Societé archéol. du Finistère (Quimper 1897-98) 91-95. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-5) 9.1:316. K. HERBERS, Biographisch-Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon, 4 (Herzberg 1992). S. SCHOLZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d ed. 6 (Freiburg 1997). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 118-119.

[O. J. BLUM]

LEO VI, POPE

Pontificate: May or June 928 to Dec. 928 or Jan. 929; b. Rome. The son of the primicerius Christopher, he was a priest of St. Susanna at the time of his promotion. He was elected by MAROZIA and her party and succeeded to the papacy at the deposition of Pope JOHN X, who died in prison in the CASTEL SANT 'ANGELO. Almost nothing is known of his brief pontificate. He seems to have followed the policy of his predecessor, and one surviving bull was directed to the bishops of Dalmatia, ordering them to obey their archbishop, John of Spalato, to whom Leo had granted the pallium.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (repr. Graz 1956) 3579. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DU-CHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:242. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 4:188. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale (Bologna 1947). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1954–59) 2:355, 434. S. SCHOLZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3d. ed. 6 (Freiburg 1997). H. ZIMMERMANN, Biographisch–Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon, 4 (Herzberg 1992). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 122.

[O. J. BLUM]

LEO VII, POPE

Pontificate: Jan. 936 to July 13, 939; b. Rome. A priest of St. Sixtus and probably a Benedictine, he was promoted to the papacy by Alberic II, on whose favor he was wholly dependent. Together they promoted the reform of GORZE and the CLUNIAC REFORM. At Leo's invitation Abbot ODO OF CLUNY came to Rome, where he was effective both as a peacemaker and as a stimulator of spiritual revival. Leo's surviving letters indicate his interest in CLUNY and SUBIACO, whose rights he confirmed, and in the rebirth of Christian life in France. He sent the PAL-LIUM to ADALDAG of Bremen–Hamburg (c. 937) and appointed Abp. Frederick of Mainz apostolic vicar and legate for all Germany, charging him with the reform of the clergy of every rank. His advice to Frederick regarding the Jews was something less than permissive: he forbade their forced conversion but allowed Frederick to expel them from the cities unless they accepted the Christian faith.

Bibliography: P JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (repr. Graz 1956) 1:455-457; 2:706, 747. Patrologia latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 132:1065–88. Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 10 (1885) 380-386. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886-92) 2:244. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1930-32) 4:205-207. E. BOURGEOIS, "L'assemblée de Mersen 847," in Mélanges Paul Fabre. Études d'histoire du Moyen Age (Geneva 1972) 72-100. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale (Bologna 1947). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 6:949. H. ZIELINSKI, "Zur Aachener Königserhebung von 936," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters (1972) 210-222. H. ZIMMERMAN, Biographisch-Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon, 4 (Herzberg 1992). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 123-124.

LEO VIII, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 4, 963 to March 1, 965; b. Rome. A man of blameless character, Leo was still a layman holding the office of protoscriniarius when Emperor OTTO I chose him to become pope. He was elected at the Roman synod at which the absentee JOHN XII was deposed and was consecrated on Dec. 6, having been promoted to all orders in one day without observing the canonical interstices. Leo was the first pope to be installed according to the new liturgy introduced into Italy by the reforming Otto. His tenure in Rome remained uncertain; and on Jan. 3, 964, the Romans, incited by John XII, rioted against the Emperor and his papal appointee. The uprising was crushed in a bloody encounter with imperial troops. After Otto departed for Spoleto, John returned, took the city, and at a synod in St. Peter's (Feb. 26, 964) reciprocated by excommunicating and deposing Leo, who had fled to Otto's court. John died suddenly on May 14, and the impetuous Romans elected the cardinal deacon Benedict Grammaticus, who took the name BENE-DICT V. On June 23, Otto reentered Rome and reinstated Leo, whose pontificate was thenceforth uneventful after Benedict had been deprived, degraded, and deported to Hamburg (965). Three supposed Leonine documents, the Privilegium minus, the Privilegium maius, and the Cessatio donationum (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Constitutiones 1:665–678), the last purporting to restore a number of papal territories to Otto and his wife, Adelaide, are forgeries of the period of the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. s. LÖWENFELD (repr. Graz 1956) 1:467-470. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886-92) 2:250. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. LECLERCQ (Paris 1907-38) 4:609-626. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 4:260–281. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 9:317-320. T. KLAUSER, "Die liturgischen Austauschbeziehungen Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 53 (1936) 186-189. M. ANDRIEU, "La Carrière ecclésiastique des papes," Revue des sciences religieuses 21 (1947) 109-110. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1954-59) 2:369-372, 435. B. GEB-HARDT, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte, ed. H. GRUNDMANN (Stuttgart 1954-60) 1:184-185. W. ULLMANN, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (2d ed. New York 1962). E.D. HEHL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3d. ed. 6 (Freiburg 1997). K. JORDAN, "Ravennater Fälschungen aus den Anfängen des Investiturstreites," Ausgewählte Aufsätze zur Geschichte des Mittelalters (1980) 52-74. I. S. ROBINSON, "Zur Entstehung des Privilegium Maius Leonis VIII papae," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 38 (1982) 26-65. H. ZIMMERMANN, Biographisch-Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon 4 (Herzberg 1992). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 127 - 128.

[O. J. BLUM]

LEO IX, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Feb. 2, 1049 to April 19, 1054; b. Bruno of Egisheim, Egisheim, Alsace, June 21, 1002. Leo's reign marks the beginning of true papal reform and of the liberation of the Church from both the Roman nobility and German imperial entanglements. As a young cleric, he saw military service in Lombardy, replacing his aged bishop in the muster of Emperor CONRAD II. A blood relative of Conrad, he owed to him his later appointment as bishop. He was consecrated in the See of Toul, Sept. 9, 1027. Influenced by the principles of monastic reform of CLUNY and Lorraine, he reformed the monasteries of St. Aper, MOYENMOUTIER, REMIREMONT, and Saint-Dié, which were under his patronage. As bishop, he also held many visitations and synods. Bruno was elected pope at Worms by his cousin, the Emperor Henry III, and was crowned in St. Peter's. His biographer, HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA, states that he accepted only after the acclamation of the Roman clergy and people. Experienced in administration, he introduced fresh policy carried out by young reformers from Lorraine: HUGH OF REMIRE-MONT; Frederick of Lorraine, later STEPHEN IX; and especially Humbert, his "secretary of state" and author of his important papers. Hildebrand, later GREGORY VII, also began his career in Rome during Leo's pontificate.

After his coronation, Leo spent no more than six months in Rome. Traveling through Italy, Germany, France, and as far as Hungary, he projected an image of the papacy in action to those for whom the pope had been only a name, sometimes one of ill repute. He held 12 synods at Rome, Bari, Mainz, Pavia, Reims, and elsewhere, and issued decrees against simony and clerical marriage. He granted papal security to monastic property, honored the relics of saints, and canonized GERARD OF TOUL. At Vercelli in 1050, he condemned BERENGARIUS OF TOURS for his teachings on the Eucharist.

Working harmoniously with Henry III, Leo could be styled the "Imperial Vicar for Italy." His policy, stimulated by the DONATION OF CONSTANTINE, of opposing by force the Norman devastation of southern Italy made the German court uncooperative and aroused the antagonism of MICHAEL CERULARIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople. With ragged recruits from Germany and Italy, Leo engaged the Normans at Civitate on June 18, 1053, but was defeated and then honorably detained near Bari. In January 1054, he sent a mission under Humbert to the Byzantine Emperor, CONSTANTINE IX, proposing a triple alliance of the papacy, Byzantium, and the Empire against the Normans. But irresponsible acts by Humbert and Cerularius on this occasion aggravated the chronically strained relations between the churches, which led eventually to the denouement of 1204 (see EASTERN SCHISM). Leo did not live to direct these events. Broken by defeat and weakened, perhaps by malaria, he was carried to Rome and died in St. Peter's, where he was buried.

Feast: April 19.

Bibliography: Sources. Acta Apostolicae Sedis, April 2:648-665. J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, v.9 (Paris 1668-1701; 2d ed. Venice 1733-40) Saec 6.2:47-81. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898-1901; suppl. 1911) 4818-29. Analecta Bollandiana (Brussels 1882-) 25:258-297. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 143:465–798. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD et al., 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881-88; repr. Graz 1956) 1:529-549. P. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Italia Pontificia, 8 v. (Berlin 1906-35) 8:8-10. C. J. C. WILL, Acta et scripta (Leipzig 1861). Literature. A. MICHEL, Humbert und Kerullarios, 2 v. (Paderborn 1924-30); "Die folgenschweren Ideen des Kardinals Humbert," Studi gregoriani, 1, ed. G. B. BORINO (Rome 1947) 65-92; "Die Anfänge des Kardinals Humbert," Studi gregoriani, 3, ed. G. B. BORINO (Rome 1948) 299-319. L. SITTLER and P. STINTZI, S. Léon IX, le pape alsacien (Colmar 1950). J. HAL-LER, Das Papsttum, 5 v. (2d, rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 2:286–296. V. GRUMEL, "Les préliminaires du schisme de Michel Cérulaire," Revue des études byzantines, 10 (Paris 1952) 5-23. H. TRITZ, "Die Hagiographischen Quellen zur Geschichte Papst Leos IX," Studi gregoriani, 4, ed. G. B. BORINO (Rome 1952) 191-364, R. MAYNE, "East and West in 1054," Cambridge Historical Journal, 11 (Cambridge, Eng. 1953-55) 133-148. H. G. KRAUSE, Das Papstwahldekret von 1059 (Rome 1960). D. M. NICOL, "Byzantium and the Papacy in the 11th Century," The Journal of Ecclesiastical History, 13 (London 1962) 1-20. J. DREHMANN, Papst Leo IX. Und die Simonie (Hildesheim 1973). E. PETRUCCI Ecclesiologia e politica di Leone IX (Rome 1977). M. L. JACOTEY, Bruno, pape alsacien ou Saint Léon IX (Remiremont 1984). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 147. J. DAHLHAUS, "Leo IX," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, third ed. (Freiburg 1996) 6:825-825. M. PARISSE, ed., Vita Leonis noni, French trans by M. GOULLET (Paris 1997).

[O. J. BLUM]

LEO X, POPE

Pontificate: March 9, 1513, to Dec. 1, 1521; b. Giovanni de'Medici, Florence, Dec. 11, 1475. As the second son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, he was destined for high Church service from an early age. Giovanni received the tonsure before reaching the age of eight and became the cardinal deacon of Santa Maria in Dominica at 13. He was educated at his father's court by the humanists Marsilio FICINO, Angelo Poliziano, and Giovanni and PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, who instilled in him a lifelong interest in learning; later at Pisa he studied theology and Canon Law (1489–91). In 1492, still in his teens, he became a member of the College of Cardinals and took up residence in Rome. At the death of Lorenzo de'Medici (1492), he returned to Florence and lived with his elder brother Pietro. In the same year Cardinal de'Medici took part in the conclave that elected, without his vote, Alexander VI. During SAVONAROLA'S "reign of Virtue" he was living in Florence and he left only when the Medicis were sent into exile in November 1494. Expelled from his native city, the 19-year-old cardinal, who was considered clever and wise, visited France, the Netherlands, and Germany. Not until May 1500 did he return to Rome, where he buried himself in literature and the arts and developed a love for music and the theater that he never lost. In 1503, when his brother Pietro died, he became the head of the Medici family. The death of Alexander VI brought the Sacred College of Cardinals together in September of the same year, and only the aging and ailing PIUS III could gain the necessary two-thirds vote. When he died 26 days later, the cardinals resumed their deliberations. Cardinal Giulio della Rovere emerged from the conclave as JULIUS II. In October 1511 the Pope appointed Cardinal Giovanni de'Medici legate of Bologna and Romagna. The following year, when Florence supported the schismatic council at Pia, Julius ordered him to attack his native city at the head of a papal army. But the Florentines engineered a bloodless revolution allowing the Medicis to return on September 14, 1512, Giovanni then became the real power in Florence, though his younger brother Giuliano actually held the first place in the Republic.

Pope Leo X with the cardinals Giulio de'Medici (later Pope Clement VII) and Luigi de Rosai, portrait by Raphael, 1518.

Election to the Papacy. The death of Julius II during the night of February 20-21, 1513, resulted in the sevenday conclave that opened March 4. The College was not at full strength since the rebellious cardinals who were holding a council at Pisa were excluded. The remaining 25 cardinals were not divided in any major rivalries, but were desirous of a peace-loving successor to the deceased soldier-pope. As a result, Cardinal de'Medici, who was supported by the younger cardinals, and finally by the senior members as well, since they believed his ill health would lead to a short pontificate, emerged from the conclave with the required votes. The 37-year-old cardinal received Holy Orders on March 15, was consecrated bishop two days later, and was crowned on the 19th. Leo X was the personification of the Renaissance in its most humanistic form. He befriended the humanists, spending not merely the vast sums accumulated by his predecessor and all that he could raise, but mortgaging the papacy to the extent of 400,000 ducats. His love of art, music, and the theater again made Rome the cultural center of the Western world. He vigorously advanced the construction of St. Peter's Basilica and collected books, manuscripts, and gems, with little regard for price. The scandals of the Borgia era were not to be found in Medici Rome. Leo knew how to enjoy life, but not at the expense of piety. Before hunting, one of his greatest loves, he always attended Mass, and on occasions even celebrated the Mass himself. Never one to overwork, he would escape from Rome for months at a time to relax in the country.

Fifth Lateran Council. The early years of the pontificate of Leo X witnessed the culminating work of the Fifth Lateran Council (see LATERAN COUNCILS). The Council had been called by Julius II to offset the council called in Pisa. Nine cardinals, most of them French, had gathered at Pisa and issued a summons for an ecumenical council to meet in that city in 1512. Alienated by Julius's foreign policies and his autocratic manners, they wished to curtail the absolute power of the pope by invoking the decree of the Council of Constance that required councils to be called every ten years. Julius had met this challenge swiftly and effectively by convoking an ecumenical council of his own to meet at the Lateran in July 1511. The Pisa group was supported almost exclusively by the French and Germans, who were unable to come to agreement because both insisted on managing Church affairs within their respective national boundaries. When Emperor Maximilian believed that Pisa II would lead to schism, he withdrew his support and opened negotiations leading to his recognition of the Lateran Council, which opened on May 3, 1512. The death of Julius within nine months left the bulk of the work of the council to his successor, Leo X.

The Council was poorly attended from the beginning, and of the 80 to 90 bishops present, the majority were Italian. Its main objectives were peace within the Christian world, a crusade against the Turks, and internal reforms. The decrees of this Council were primarily disciplinary. Under the heading of reform the Council discussed most matters treated at Trent some 40 years later. That little came out of the deliberations of the Lateran Council is explained in part by the lack of urgency that, as the result of the Protestant Revolt, characterized Trent. Nevertheless there were attempts at reform. Strict rules were drawn up for cardinals and other members of the Curaia; although the Pope violated them even before the Council adjourned. Preachers were warned against criticism of the hierarchy, and a system was approved for the censorship of printed books. The standard condemnations against pluralism and absenteeism were reissued, but it was made clear that dispensations might be granted to circumvent this prohibition. The Council's only major decision concerning faith was to condemn the neo-Aristotelian doubts about the immortality of the soul. The Council ended on March 16, 1517, a scant six months before Martin Luther posted his attack on indulgences.

Foreign Policies. Leo X was not only the head of the universal Church, but also, and often primarily, the temporal ruler of the States of the Church. In addition, as head of the house of Medici, he controlled the Florentine Republic. The major diplomatic problem facing Leo when he ascended the throne was the removal of foreign influence and dominance from the peninsula. France's interest in Italy arose from the claims of Charles VIII to Naples. His successor, Louis XII, added to this a title to Milan. At the beginning of 1513 the French, in alliance with the Venetians, were attempting to regain Milan and Naples. Leo found himself at war as an ally of Emperor Maximilian I, Ferdinand I of Spain, and Henry VIII of England in the League of Mechlin (April 5, 1513). The league suffered initial setbacks, but at the battle of Novara (June 6) the French were decisively defeated. The peace signed between Louis XII and the papacy included the withdrawal of French support from the Pisan council, bringing it to an inglorious end (December 1513).

Concordat with Francis I. The death of Louis XII (1515) brought the ambitious and energetic Francis I to the throne of France. The new King immediately revived his predecessor's claims to Milan and Naples and crossed the Alps at the head of an army that was victorious at the battle of Marignano (September 14, 1515). Leo negotiated a settlement, followed by a secret conference with Francis at Bologna in December of the same year. The groundwork was laid here for a long overdue understanding on Church-State relations. The new Concordat, written into the bull Primitiva (August 18, 1516) and promulgated as law in France the following year, clarified the relationship between King and Pope. The King was given the right to nominate all bishops, abbots, and priors, while the Pope reserved for himself the nominations to vacant benefices in curia and certain other benefices. While in practice the King's nomination amounted to appointment, in theory the Pope always had the power to veto an undesirable candidate. This settlement lasted until the French Revolution in 1789.

Imperial Election. The death of Ferdinand of Aragon in 1516 brought his young and energetic grandson Charles to the throne. Then in 1519 Charles's paternal grandfather, Emperor Maximilian, died. When both Charles and Francis I made a bid for the imperial title, the Pope supported the French King. However, Leo quickly veered in the direction of Frederick the Wise of Saxony, the protector of Martin Luther, until the contest was settled in June 1519, with the election of Charles V. The Pope then gravitated toward Spain.

Leo was also plagued by real and rumored domestic problems and intrigues. To cope with these difficulties and to enhance the grandeur of the Medici family he practiced nepotism. He appointed as archbishop of Florence, and then as cardinal and vice chancellor of the Holy See, his cousin Giulio de'Medici (later CLEMENT VII). The Pope's younger brother, Giuliano, and his nephew, Lorenzo, were named Roman patricians. In 1517 the failure of a conspiracy to poison the Pope by several discontented members of the College of Cardinals resulted in the execution of Cardinal Alfonso Petrucci and the imprisonment and punishment by fines of Cardinals Adriano Castellesi, Francesco Soderini, Raffaello Riario, and Bandinello Sauli, as well as far-reaching changes in that Sacred College. Notable among these was the publication on July 1, 1517, of the names of 31 new cardinals.

St. Peter's Indulgence. The construction of St. Peter's in Rome, the planned crusade against the Turks, the war with France and Spain, patronage of the arts, and the various other ever-increasing expenses of the papacy caused Leo X to search constantly for new sources of revenue. One of these, by no means new, was the preaching of indulgences. Julius II had authorized an indulgence to support the building of St. Peter's. Leo renewed the indulgence; although it was so unpopular in Germany, because the local princes resented the flow of money out of northern Europe, that it was being preached in only a few German dioceses by 1514. The death of Archbishop von Gemmingen of Mainz in March 1514 left one of Germany's wealthiest archdioceses vacant. ALBRECHT OF BRAN-DENBURG, already archbishop of Magdeburg and bishop of Halberstadt, immediately advanced his candidacy, but was unable to raise the 14,000-ducat installation tax for Mainz and the 10,000 ducats required for the papal dispensation for the plural holding of sees. In an arrangement with the banking house of Jacob Fugger, the full amount would be advanced to the papacy at once if the new archbishop would allow indulgence preachers to go into his, as yet untouched, dioceses. One-half of the sums accumulated from the indulgences would go to the Fuggers, the other half to Rome. Leo X looked favorably on the profitable proposition, and on March 31, 1515, he issued the bull authorizing the indulgence to be preached in the Archdioceses of Mainz and Magdeburg. It was not until January 1517, that the Dominican friar Johann TETZEL began preaching.

Luther's 95 Theses. It was a direct reaction to Tetzel's preaching that led Martin LUTHER to post his 95 theses on the church door of Wittenberg castle. A summary of Luther's ideas was sent to Rome early in 1518. The Pope instructed the Augustinian general, Gabrielle della Volta, to silence the monk, but the attempt was unsuccessful. The diplomatic move to win over Luther's protector, Frederick the Wise of Saxony, by sending him the Golden Rose was likewise futile. After the Leipzig debates between Johann ECK and Luther (1519), Leo issued the bull Exsurge Domine (June 15, 1520), which condemned Luther on 41 counts. When Luther publicly burned the bull on December 10, he was excommunicated in the bull Decet Romanum Pontificem (January 3, 1521).

Luther's teachings were by no means confined to Germany. In England Henry VIII reacted by writing a defense of the seven Sacraments, for which the Pope bestowed upon him the title Defender of the Faith (October 11, 1521). Reaction in Scandinavia was more negative. Giovannangelo ARCIMBOLDI, the papal nuncio to the Danish court of Christian II, had been expelled (1520) because of his political activities, and Christian invited Lutheran theologians to Copenhagen. Leo acted promptly and sent a new nuncio, the Minorite Francesco de Potentia, who temporarily restored harmony.

The Lutheran challenge was not the only one to trouble the reign of Leo X. The dispute between Johannes Pfefferkorn and Johann Reuchlin became the concern of the papacy in September 1513. Pfefferkorn had begun a campaign to confiscate Jewish literature as subversive of faith and was opposed by Reuchlin and other humanists. The Pope referred the matter to the local bishops, who handed down a decision in favor of Reuchlin in March 1514. An appeal to Rome resulted in Leo's reversing the decision; Reuchlin was silenced.

The entangled international wars and alliances, together with the turbulence of domestic politics, explain in part why Leo was not more vigorous in suppressing the heretical and schismatical movements in northern Europe. He was perhaps, the last of the Renaissance popes who looked upon the papacy as primarily a temporal monarchy.

Bibliography: LEO X, Regesta . . . Leonis X . . . e tabularii Vaticani manuscriptis voluminibus, ed. J. HERGENRÖTHER (Freiburg 1884-). P. GIOVIO, Historia sui temporis, 2 v. (Florence 1550-52); Vita Leonis X (Florence 1548, 1551), earliest account of his life. W. ROSCOE, Life and Pontificate of Leo X, 2 v. (London 1853). D. GNOLI, La Roma di Leone X (Milan 1938). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938-61) v.7-8, bibliog. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20 Jh. (Leipzig 1931-41) 4:408-426. H. M. VAUGHAN, The Medici Popes (New York 1908). G. B. PICOTTI, La Giovinezza di Leone X (Milan 1928). E. P. RODO-CANACHI, Le Pontifical de Léon X, 1513–1521 (Paris 1930). G. K. BROWN, Italy and the Reformation to 1550 (Oxford 1933). G. TRUC, Léon X et son siècle (Paris 1941). H. JEDIN, History of the Council of Trent, tr. E. GRAF, (St. Louis 1957-60) v.1. R. AUBENAS and R. RICARD, Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, 15, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1951). G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 9.1:329-332: G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 6:950-952, bibliog. S. BEDINI, The Pope's Elephant (Lisbon 1997). C. FALCONI, Leone X (Milan 1987). A. FERRAJOLI, II ruolo della Corte di Leone X (Rome 1984). Epistolae ad Principes. Leo X-Pius IV (1513-1565), ed. L. NANNI (Vatican City 1992). C. BRESNAHAN MENNING, Charity and State in Late Renaissance Ithaca (Ithaca, N.Y. 1993).

[J. G. GALLAHER]

LEO XI, POPE

Pontificate: April 1 to April 27, 1605; b. Alessandro Ottaviano de' Medici, Florence, June 2, 1535. His mother, Francesca Salviati, of a collateral branch of the ruling Florentine family, objected to her son's vocation, and he was not ordained until after her death. For 15 years he served in Rome as the ambassador of Grand Duke Cosimo of Tuscany. Gregory XIII named him bishop of Pistoia in 1573, archbishop of Florence in 1574, and cardinal in 1583. Clement VIII appointed him his legate to France in 1596 in the hope of improving the situation of Catholics under King Henry IV. He became cardinal-bishop of Albano in 1600 and was transferred to Palestrina two years later. At the same time he was named prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. His election to the papacy with French support was predicted by Philip Neri, his close friend during his years as Tuscan ambassador in Rome. Sixty-two cardinals met in the conclave of 1605. Ten votes were given to the Jesuit Cardinal Robert BELLARMINE; 20 were cast for the historian from the Oratory, Cardinal Caesar BARONIUS, who, after receiving 37 votes in the second scrutiny, urged his friends not to vote for him. The election then went to Alessandro de' Medici. During his short pontificate Leo XI, who adopted the name of his uncle Leo X, initiated changes in the system of voting in conclave, settled the conflict between the clergy of Castile and Léon and the Jesuits, assisted Emperor Rudolf II in the Turkish War, and purchased the Villa Medici on the Pincio in Rome.

Bibliography: P. PASCHINI and V. MONACHINO, eds., I Papi nella storia, 2 v. (Rome 1961) 2:682–683. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 25:1–28. G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 9.1:332–333. Bullarium Romanum (Magnum), ed. H. MAINARDI and C. COCQUELINES, 18 folio v. (Rome 1733–62) 11:182–194. R. PO-CHIA HSIA, The World of Catholic Renewal, 1540–1700 (New York 1996). M. CARAVALE and A. CARACCIOLO, Lo stato pontificio de Martino V a Pio IX (Turin 1978).

[T. F. CASEY]

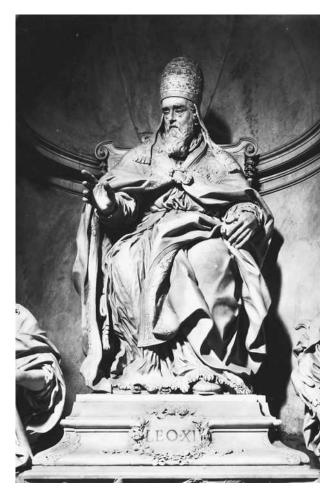

LEO XII, POPE

Pontificate: Sept. 28, 1823, to Feb. 10, 1829; b. Annibale Della Genga at Castello della Genga, near Spoleto, Italy, Aug. 22, 1760.

Prepapal Career. After early studies in Osimo, he attended in Rome the Collegio Piceno and the Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici. Soon after ordination (1783) he was made a secret chamberlain to Pius VI. Della Genga was named a canon of St. Peter's Basilica in 1792, and in 1793 titular archbishop of Tyre and nuncio to Lucerne, Switzerland. From there he went to COLOGNE as nuncio (1794–1805), during a period made tense by the imperial ambitions of NAPOLEON I. Pius VII named Della Genga his representative to the Diet of Ratisbon for negotiations with Prussia (1805). Archbishop Della Genga was in retirement from papal diplomatic service at the abbey in Monticelli (1808-14) while Pius VII was held prisoner by Napoleon. For a brief period in 1814 be acted as nuncio to Paris. His tardiness in traveling to France and his inability to prevent the formal transfer of Avignon to France led to his dismissal at the instigation of Cardinal CONSALVI, papal secretary of state. In 1816 Della Genga was made a cardinal and bishop of Sinigaglia, a diocese he resigned in 1818. In 1820 he became vicargeneral of Rome.

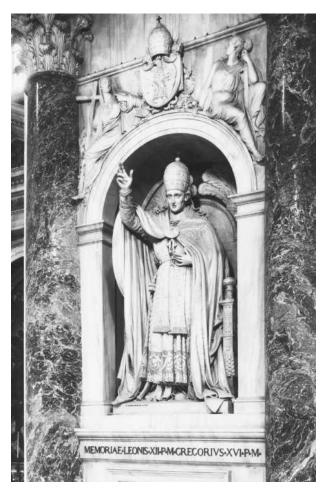

The conclave, which met for 26 days after the death of Pius VII, and which saw Austria veto Cardinal Severoli, gave the ailing Della Genga 34 votes and prevailed upon the unwilling candidate to accept the election. The shadow of the conclave hung over his pontificate, for he had been chosen by the conservatives (zelanti), who were hostile to Consalvi's policy of political and doctrinal moderation and reformism.

Pontificate. Revising Pius VII's policies, Leo sought to reassert authority in the Papal State. His first encycli-

"Monument of Pope Leo XI," sculptural group by Alessandro Algardi, seated pope, St. Peter's Basilica, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

cal, Ubi primum (May 3, 1824), voiced his determination to raise the clergy's intellectual, moral, and disciplinary standards and to oppose all dangerous teachings. He replaced Consalvi with the more conservative Cardinal DELLA SOMAGLIA as secretary of state. The Pope's main purpose in this shift was to reverse the recent changes in the administration of the STATES OF THE CHURCH and to restore them to the control of the clergy and nobles. An edict in 1826 confined the Jews in Rome to the ghetto and deprived them of their property. As a result, many Jews left Rome and the Papal States, with resulting economic harm. Secret societies, which promoted revolution in the Papal States, provoked press censorship. In 1825 Leo XII condemned indifferentism. That same year he promulgated Quo graviora mala against Freemasonry and the CAR-BONARI. Capital punishment, which was employed in Ravenna, served only to inflame the revolutionaries in the Legations. Leo XII's efforts to reverse the mounting budgetary deficits in his domain proved unsuccessful. The return to practices abandoned during the French occupation proved distasteful to the populace of the Papal States and intensified their desire for greater self-determination and lay administration.

"Monument of Pope Leo XII," sculpture by Giuseppe De Fabris, 1836, located in the Basilica of St. Peter, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Education was regulated by the bull Quod divina sapientia (1824), which created some uncertainty about Leo XII's attitude concerning the relation between science and religion. The Pope also restored the Gregorian University to the Jesuits.

Across the Atlantic, James WHITFIELD was appointed to succeed Ambrose Marechal as archbishop of Baltimore (1828). The Pope also named an administrator in Philadelphia in 1826 to aid Bp. Henry CONWELL, who had yielded to demands that the laity name their own pastors (see TRUSTEEISM). Two vicariates apostolic were formed in 1825, one for Mississippi and the other for Alabama and Florida. Louisiana was divided into the Dioceses of New Orleans and Saint Louis in 1826.

Leo XII was more conciliatory in dealing with the European powers than with his own subjects. He ardently desired to strengthen alliances with sovereigns; yet he did not hesitate to send a critical letter to Louis XVIII complaining against the restoration governments and their dealing with enemies of the Church. He was sympathetic with Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS and the protest of ultramontanism against the prevailing GALLICANISM. While rejoicing at the restoration in SPAIN, he resisted the royal demand that he recognized its right of PATRONATO REAL over the newly independent lands of Latin America. The NETHERLANDS were tense because of Protestant and Catholic frictions, which had been aggravated by Belgian independence movement leaders; yet Leo XII concluded a concordat with King William I (1827). During this pontificate Catholic EMANCIPATION came close to achievement in Great Britain and Ireland; the emancipation act was passed April 13, 1829.

Leo XII tried to suppress the growing forces of LIB-ERALISM and sympathized with monarchs who were seeking to restore the conditions of the ancien régime.

Bibliography: J. SCHMIDLIN, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit, 1800–1939 (Munich 1933–39) v.1. J. LEFLON, La Crise révolutionnaire, 1789–1846 (A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 20 [Paris 1949]). E. E. Y. HALES, Revolution and Papacy, 1769–1846 (Garden City, N. Y. 1960). P. PASCHINI and V. MONACHINO, eds., I. Papi nella Storia, 2 v. (Rome 1961) 2:887–898, P. DE LETURIA, Relaciones entre la Santa Sede e Hespanoamérica, 3 v. (Rome 1959) v.2, 3. R. COLAPIETRA, La formazione diplomatica di Leone XII (Rome 1966). R. COLAPIETRA, La chiesa tra Lamennais e Mettenich Il Pontificato di Leone XII (Brescia 1963). J.D. HOLMES, The Triumph of the Holy See (London 1978). M. CARAVALE and A. CARACCIOLO, Lo stato pontificio da Martino V a Pio IX (Turin 1978).

[T. F. CASEY]

LEO XIII, POPE

Pontificate, Feb. 20, 1878, to July 20, 1903; b. Gioacchino Vincenzo Pecci, Carpineto (Frosinone), central Italy; March 2, 1810.

Prepapal Career. He was the sixth of seven sons of Col. Ludovico Pecci and Anna Prosperi Buzi. His family was noble but by no means wealthy. After his early education at the Jesuit college in Viterbo (1818–24), he studied at Rome in the Romain College (1824–32). Admitted in 1832 to the Accademia dei Nobili ecclesiastici, he pursued studies in theology and in civil and Canon Law at the University of the Sapienza (1832–37). In 1837 he was ordained and was appointed a domestic prelate. In January of 1838, Gregory XVI, who had remarked his courage during the cholera epidemic of the previous year, appointed him apostolic delegate to Benevento in the STATES

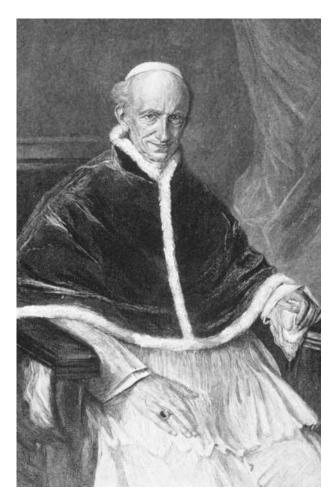

OF THE CHURCH. There Msgr. Pecci proved energetic in controlling banditry and the intrigues of the liberals. Transferred to the same function in Perugia (1841), he faced similar problems. By his capable administration and economic improvements, building roads and establishing a savings bank for farmers, he won the affection of the populace.

Consecrated titular archbishop of Damietta, he went to Belgium as nuncio in January of 1843. The most delicate question confronting him was that of education. Pecci supported the bishops and Catholic politicians in opposition to Prime Minister Nothomb, who wished to confer on the government the right of naming members of "University Juries." So discontented was the king at the defeat of this project that he demanded the recall of the nuncio, whose attitude had helped check the entente between moderate liberals and Catholics known as unionism

Pecci's three years in Brussels were of considerable importance in developing his later outlook as pope. They represented his sole contact with industrial Europe, save for brief sojourns in the Rhineland, London, and Paris. Conditions in Belgium led him to reflect on the situation of Catholics elsewhere who lived under political regimes with liberal institutions.

Quitting Brussels (May 1846) Pecci went to Perugia, where he remained as archbishop until 1878. He showed special interest in clerical formation. Under the auspices of his brother Joseph, a Jesuit and professor at the seminary, he favored the renewal of THOMISM and established the Academy of St. Thomas in 1859. During the revolutionary events of 1859-60 he reaffirmed the legitimacy of the papal temporal power and protested firmly but not abusively the religious policy of the Italian government. At VATICAN COUNCIL I he voted with the majority, but was not an outstanding member. Cardinal ANTONELLI, secretary of state, believed Pecci's policies hostile to his and kept him from Rome. The archbishop's pastoral letters (1876–77) on the Church and civilization, emphasizing that the Church must enter the current of modern civilization, drew wide attention. A cardinal from 1853, he became camerlengo in the Roman Curia (Sept. 9, 1877) while retaining his see. At the conclave following Pius IX's death, he was papabile as candidate of the moderates. After receiving 19 votes on the first ballot, compared with six given to the next most favored choice, Cardinal BILIO, he emerged as pope after the third ballot, with 44 of the 61 votes.

Pontificate. Leo XIII's pontificate, foreseen as a brief transitional one, lasted more than 25 years and came to be ranked among the most significant in recent times because of his numerous teachings, acts of initiative, and exceptional prestige. Patient, conciliatory, and wise in choosing opportune solutions to problems and then abiding by them, the pontiff displayed a strong will and calm energy in his actions.

Pope Leo XIII. (Kean Collection/Archive Photos)

In line with Pius IX he favored devotion to the SACRED HEART. His encyclical Annum Sacrum (May 25, 1899) consecrated the whole human race to the Sacred Heart. Nine encyclicals concerned devotion to the Blessed Virgin MARY and to the ROSARY. The encyclical Auspicato concessum (Sept. 17, 1882) renewed the Franciscan Third Order.

Missions received much attention. Leo's pontificate coincided with the apogee of colonialism. To speed the abolition of African slavery he published two encyclicals, In plurimis (May 5, 1888) to the Brazilian hierarchy, and Catholicae Ecclesiae (Nov. 20, 1890). A concordat (June 23, 1886) restrained the king of Portugal's right of padroado in India solely to Portugese possessions (see PATRONATO REAL; GOA). In the same year the pope established the hierarchy in India. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith reorganized the missions in China, but the French protectorate over Catholics in China would not permit (1886) the erection of a nunciature in Beijing.

Leo XIII had high hopes of reunion with the Oriental and Slavic Churches. Bishop STROSSMAYER urged the Pontiff to display his interest in them. The encyclical Grande munus (Sept. 30, 1880) recalled the Holy See's approval of the apostolic methods of SS. CYRIL AND METHODIUS. The Eucharistic Congress in Jerusalem (1893) and the apostolic letter Orientalium (Nov. 30, 1894), which dealt with rites questions, reaffirmed hope for reunion, which did not materialize.

A papal commission was appointed (1895) to study ANGLICAN ORDERS. The apostolic letter denying their validity (APOSTOLICAE CURAE, Sept. 13, 1896) discouraged prospects for union with ANGLICANISM.

In the intellectual order the encyclical AETERNI PATRIS (Aug. 4, 1879) was decisive in importance. Urged by his brother Cardinal Joseph Pecci and by Father LIB-ERATORE, Leo XIII sought renewal of philosophical thought in the Church on the basis of Thomism and an assurance of sound doctrinal teaching in seminaries. In Thomism he perceived the body of thought that he wished used in opposition to LIBERALISM on the political and social planes. The reorganization of the Roman Academy of St. Thomas (1886), the nomination of MERCIER to a chair of Thomism at Louvain (1882), the condemnation (1887) of propositions extracted from the works of ROSMINI-SERBATI, who had a following in northern Italy, were all part of the program to restore Thomism.

The opening of the VATICAN ARCHIVES in 1881 to historians demonstrated concretely Leo XIII's eagerness to promote scholarly research.

The encyclical PROVIDENTISSIMUS DEUS (Nov. 18, 1893) explained the paths open to biblical exegesis. The creation (1902) of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION marked a stiffer policy, a solicitude for watching over the labors of exegetes at the time MODERNISM was developing.

The organization of society and the relations between CHURCH AND STATE called forth the famous encyclicals DIUTURNUM (June 29, 1881), IMMORTALE DEI (Nov. 1, 1885), LIBERTAS (June 20, 1888), and Sapientiae christianae (Jan. 10, 1890), which reaffirmed the condemnations of the principles of liberalism by Gregory XVI and Pius IX. They recalled also the divine origin of AUTHORITY and the proper union between Church and State, both "perfect" societies. The encyclicals further demonstrated that the Church is not hostile to any form of government. Also they contrasted "legitimate and honest liberty" with "immoderate liberty" that refuses all reference to God and admits the coexistence of diverse cults. Especially did the pope urge Catholics to accept existing institutions in view of the COMMON GOOD, to participate in political life, and to make use of the liberal institutions of the press and the parliamentary systems of government in the interest of the Church.

Social questions were also the topic of papal encyclicals that gained wide attention even from unbelievers. Quod Apostolici muneris (Dec. 28, 1878) condemned socialism. Arcanum (Feb. 10, 1880) defined the Christian concept of the FAMILY. RERUM NOVARUM (May 15, 1891), published three years after the letter to Cardinal GIBBONS concerning the KNIGHTS OF LABOR, was Leo XIII's most important social pronouncement. Directed against socialism and economic liberalism, it drew its inspiration from the Catholic social studies at the Union of Fribourg and imparted a strong impulse to the Christian Social Movement (see SOCIAL THOUGHT, PAPAL).

Christian Democracy arose in Belgium, France, and Italy. The encyclical Graves de communi re (Jan. 18, 1901) accepted the term Christian Democracy, but denied to it all political significance by defining it as "beneficent Christian action in favor of the people."

Leo XIII and States. The policy of the pope and his successive secretaries of state (FRANCHI, NINA, JACOBINI, RAMPOLLA) was dominated by the contrast between an intransigent attitude on the ROMAN QUESTION and a search for a solution to the conflicts with various governments that had arisen at the close of Pius IX's pontificate.

No sooner was Leo XIII elected than he protested against the situation confronting the pope in Rome. After several attempts at conciliation failed, he despaired of a settlement of the Roman Question by direct negotiations with the Kingdom of Italy. From this point of view the year 1887 and the appointment of Cardinal Rampolla as secretary of state were decisive. Henceforth the pontiff sought in vain to pose the problem on an international plane, placing his hopes in Germany after the KULTUR-KAMPF subsided, and then in France. For Italian Catholics he maintained the policy of NON EXPEDIT, requiring abstention from political elections. Italian Catholics developed a civil sense, however, by social action in the Opera dei Congressi.

The Kulturkampf ended in Germany after long negotiations. The Center Party wanted the complete abolition of the May Laws. Leo XIII was content with partial, compromise settlements in 1880 and 1883. Only in 1887 was there formal revision of the May Laws.

In Belgium and France the pope had to withstand a reign of ANTICLERICALISM. The Belgian school law (1879) occasioned a conflict that led to the rupture of diplomatic relations with the Vatican in June of 1880. Despite this, Leo XIII invited intransigent Belgian Catholics to accept the constitution of their country. It was in this period that a truly Catholic party was formed whose success at the polls (1884) resulted in the renewal of diplomatic relations.

In France Leo XIII urged moderation on Catholics at the time of the vote on the lay laws. After hopes for a restored monarchy proved vain and Boulangism failed, the pope pressed French Catholics to accept the Third Republic. From the Algiers Toast pronounced by Cardinal LAVIGERIE (Nov. 12, 1890) to the encyclical Au Milieu des sollicitudes (Feb. 16, 1892), he promoted the RALLIEMENT. This policy was stalemated, at least for a while, by dissensions among French Catholics, by their attitude on the Dreyfus case and by the new wave of anticlericalism that led to the vote (1901) on the Law of Associations and to the accession of Combes as premier.

Relations were strained with Austria-Hungary, which was particularly defiant of Cardinal Rampolla. Improved Vatican relations with Russia, a condition for reunion with the Orthodox Churches, disturbed the court of Vienna.

Leo XIII on many occasions expressed his favorable sentiments toward the United States. He followed closely the growth of Catholicism there, as he made clear by naming Msgr. SATOLLI as apostolic delegate (1893) and by the encyclical Longinqua (Jan. 6, 1895). Disputes over AMERICANISM were ended by the letter TESTEM BENEVOLENTIAE (Jan. 22, 1899).

Relations with Latin American nations improved. In 1899 an important council met in Rome representing the Church of this area.

Leo XIII envisioned an important role for the papacy in international affairs. On many occasions he recalled the Church's mission as peacemaker and pointed out the costs of an armed peace. His sole success, however, was the Roman mediation (1885) in the dispute between the German empire and Spain over the Caroline Islands. When the Hague Peace Conference met in 1899, the pope was not invited because of the opposition of the Italian government. Thus the Roman Question prevented the papacy from enjoying its sought-after international role.

Papal prestige, symbolized by the white, ascetic silhouette of Leo XIII, considerably increased during his pontificate. Commentaries from the entire world at the time of the pope's death gave proof of this. Despite setbacks, Leo XIII's pontificate planted seeds that were eventually to grow into an abundant harvest.

Bibliography: Sources. Acta Sanctae Sedis, v.11–35. (Rome 1878–1903). Acta Leonis XIII, 24 v. (Rome 1881–1905). The Great

Encyclical Letters of Pope Leo XIII (New York 1903). A. MERCATI, Raccolta di Concordati (Rome 1954) 1:1001-91, [72]-[90]. A. SIMON, ed., Documents relatifs à la Nonciature de Bruxelles (Brussels 1958); Lettres de Pecci, 1843-46 (Brussels 1959). M. C. CAR-LEN, Dictionary of Papal Pronouncements, 1878-1957 (New York 1958). Literature. C. T'SERCLAES, Le Pape Léon XIII, 3 v. (Paris 1894–1906). D. FERRATA, Mémoires (Paris 1922). E. SODERINI, Il pontificato di Leone XIII, 3 v. (Milan 1932-33); tr. B. B. CARTER, v.1 The Pontificate of Leo XIII (London 1934), v.2 Leo XIII, Italy and France (1935), v.3 not tr. G. GOYAU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 9.1:334-359. J. SCHMIDLIN, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit, 1800-1939 (Munich 1933-39) v.2. K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the 19th and 20th Centuries v.1. H. DANIEL-ROPS, L'Église des révolutions: Un Combat pour Dieu, 1870-1939 (Histoire de l'Église du Christ 6.2; Paris 1963). A. DANSETTE, Religious History of Modern France, tr. J. DINGLE (New York 1961) v.2. É. LECANUET, L'Église de France sous le Troisième République (Paris 1930-31) v.2-4. A. C. JEMOLO, Church and State in Italy, 1850-1950, tr. D. MOORE (Philadephia 1960). F. FONZI, I cattolici e la società italiana dopo l'unità (Rome 1953). F. ENGEL-JANOSI, Österreich und der Vatikan, 1846–1918, 2 v. (Graz 1958-60) v.1. E. WINTER, Russland und die slawischen Völker in der Diplomatic des Vatikans 1878-1903 (Berlin 1950). C. CRISPOLTI and G. AURELI, eds., La politica di Leone XIII da Luigi Galimberti a Mariano Rampolla (Rome 1912). F. MOURRET, Les Directions politiques, intellectuelles, et sociales de Léon XIII (Paris 1920). A. CHIH, L'Occident "chrétien" vu par les Chinois vers la fin du XIXe siècle, 1870-1900 (Paris 1962). R. ESPOSITO, Leone XIII e l'oriente christiano (Rome 1960). R. AUBERT, "Aspects divers du néo-thomisme sous le pontificat de Léon XIII," Aspetti della cultura cattolica nell'età di Leone XIII, ed. G. ROSSINI (Rome 1961) 133-227; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 6:953-956. G. PELL, Rerum novarum: One Hundred Years Later (Boston 1992). P. FURLONG and D. CUR-TIS. eds., The Church Faces the Modern World: Rerum novarum and its Impact (United Kingdom 1994). M. LAUNAY, La papauté à l'aube du XXe siècle: Léon XIII et Pie X (1878-1914) (Paris 1997).

[J. M. MAYEUR]

LEO LUKE, ST.

Abbot; b. Corleone (Coriglione), Sicily, c. 885; d. Monteleone in Calabria, c. 980. While very young he became a monk at the Abbey of St. Philip in Argira. Some years later (c. 940) Arab raids and the generally usettled conditions led him to accompany many other monks to the interior of Calabria. After a pilgrimage to Rome, he became a disciple of St. Christopher of Collesano (d. c. 955), the founder of a monastery near Monteleone, and succeeded him as abbot, a position he held for more than 20 years until his death. His cultus has never been confirmed.

Feast: March 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 1:97–102. D. PERRI, Note agiografiche sul protettore di Vibo Valentia, S. Leoluca abate (Vibo Valentia, Italy 1947), see review in Bollettino della badia greca di Grottaferrata 2 (1948): 231–234. S. BORSARI, Il monache-simo bizantino nella Sicilia e nell'Italia Meridionale prenormanne (Naples 1963) 53.

[G. T. DENNIS]

LEO MARSICANUS

Also known as Ostiensis, monk and chronicler of MONTE CASSINO; b. c. 1046; d. May 22, 1115. At the age of 14 Leo entered Monte Cassino, where he subsequently became abbey librarian. In 1101 PASCHAL II named him cardinal bishop of Ostia. Leo has been called the most important medieval Italian historian. He is the author of the reliable Chronica Casinensis monasterii from St. Benedict to 1057; Guido and the unreliable Peter the Deacon of Rome continued it to 1139. Leo's other works include Historia peregrinorum, Vita S. Mennatis, De consecratione ecclesiarum a Desiderio et Oderisio in Monte Cassino aedificatarum.

Bibliography: Sources. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 7:574–727. L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, 25 v. in 28 (2nd new ed. Città di Castello 1900–) 4:151–628. Literature. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:546–549. H. W. KLEWITZ, "Petrus Diaconus und die Montecassiner Klosterchronik des Leo von Ostia," Archiv für Urkundenforschung 14 (1935) 414–453. W. SMIDT, "Die vermeintliche Urgestalt der Chronik Leos," Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 28 (1938) 286–297. P. SCH-MITZ, Histoire de l'ordre de Saint Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous 1942–56) v. 2, 5.

[V. GELLHAUS]

LEO OF ASSISI (BROTHER LEO)

Secretary, companion, and confessor of FRANCIS OF ASSISI; b. end of 12th century; d. Assisi(?), Nov. 14–15, 1271. Francis affectionately called him Frate pecorella di Dio because of his innocence and candor. The only extant holographs of Francis, i.e., a letter preserved in Spoleto and the Laudes creatoris with the blessing from Nm 6.24 on the reverse, in Sacro Convento, Assisi, were written for Leo. After the death of Francis, Leo conflicted sharply with ELIAS OF CORTONA, but soon retired to a hermitage and spent the rest of his life writing in defense of what he considered the authentic ideas of Francis. Attributed to him are the Vita b. Aegidii, Liber de intentione s. Francisci, and Verba s. Francisci; the Speculum perfectionis and Legenda trium sociorum are most probably not his.

Bibliography: Vita in Analecta Franciscana 3 (1897) 65–74. L. OLIGER, "Liber exemplorum Fratrum Minorum saeculi XIII," Antonianum 2 (1927) 203–276. L. LEMMENS, ed. Documenta antiqua Franciscana, 3 v. (Quaracchi Florence 1901–02) v. 1; "Die Schriften des Br. Leo von Assisi," Miscellanea Francesco Ehrle 5 v. Studi e Testi (1924) 37–41 3:25–48. A. MACDONELL, Sons of Francis (London 1902) 95–112. FRANCIS OF ASSISI, The Writings, ed. P. HERMANN, tr. B. FAHY (Chicago 1964). L. HARDICK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:956. O. ENGLEBERT, St. Francis of Assisi: A Biography (Chicago 1966).

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

LEO OF CAVA

Name of two abbots of the Benedictine Abbey of LA CAVA, outside Salerno, Italy.

Leo I, St., from Lucca in Tuscany; d. July 12, 1079. Leo was designated successor by Abbot ALFERIUS, the founder of Cava, at the moment of his death in 1050. He is known almost uniquely through the vita by Abbot Hugh of Venosa in Apulia, former monk of Cava, who wrote his biography (c. 1140) along with the lives of Alferius and Leo's successors, PETER PAPPACARBONE and CONSTABILIS. The vita presents Leo as a humble and charitable man, dedicated to the relief of the poor and oppressed, and thus in constant conflict with the vindictive and cruel Gisulf II, Prince of Salerno (1052-77). It is reported that Leo was rewarded with visions of the Mother of God. The archives of Cava contain many documents outlining donations made to Cava during his abbacy. Toward the end of his life he selected as coadjutor and successor Alferius's nephew Peter. This choice aroused dissension and hostility because of the strictness of the new abbot. Leo's immemorial cult was approved by Pope Leo XIII in 1893.

Feast: July 12.

Leo II, Bl.; d. Aug. 19, 1295. After becoming abbot of Cava in 1268, he followed the example set by his namesake and predecessor. In 1274 he took part in the Council of Lyons, stopping at CLUNY on his way there. He encouraged the development of the Cava SCRIPTORI-UM and both the monastery's beautiful cloister and the chapel of San Germano (decorated with GIOTTO paintings), which he built, are extant. Despite numerous endowments, the abbey suffered a notable loss during his reign when it was compelled to give up all its holdings in Sicily in 1282. His cult was approved by Pope Pius XI in 1928.

Feast: Aug. 19.

Bibliography: L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, 25 v. in 28 (Milan 1723–51; 1748–71) 6.5:11–16, thirteenth-century manuscript at Cava. P. GUILLAUME, Un monaco ed un principe del secolo XI (Naples 1876); Essai historique sur l'abbaye da Cava d'après des documents inédits (Naples 1877)

29–43, 170–182. P. LUGANO, I santi padri Cavensi (Naples 1932) 13–15, 48–51.

[I. DE PICCOLI]

LEO OF ST. JOHN

Carmelite of the Touraine Reform; b. Rennes, France, July 9, 1600; d. Paris, Dec. 30, 1671. He was a man of prodigiously extensive interests and accomplishments. He promoted reform within his own order and held all its most important offices, except that of general. He was a friend of Richelieu and later of Mazarin, whose policies he generally supported, in spite of his connections with the devout party. Although Leo was a conciliator in the Jansenist conflict, he was nevertheless attacked violently by Arnauld. He maintained important political, religious, and intellectual relations with the royal family, great statemen, the nobility, the intellectuals, St. Vincent de Paul, Innocent X, and many cardinals. He was a precursor of Bossuet and wrote a remarkable Traité de l'éloquence Chrétienne (in Année royale, 1, Paris 1655). He entered successfully into the controversy with the Calvinists. His L'Économie de la vraie religion (Paris 1643), was an important work, whose apologetic, completely different from that of Pascal, and foreshadowing Malebranche, took its inspiration from medieval Augustinian rationalism, notably that of Raymond Lull. A Dionysian and Augustinian, Leo can neither be listed among the Thomists nor among the "devout humanists." He was a major instrument in spreading Bérulle's spirituality.

Bibliography: C. DE VILLIERS, Bibliotheca carmelitana, 2 v. in 1 (Rome 1927) 2:235–246. P. ANASTASE DE S. PAUL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:394–396. J. P. MASSAUT, "Léon de Saint-Jean . . . prédicateur et théologien encyclopédique," Carmelus 8 (1961): 27–62; "Autour de Richelieu et de Mazarin: Le carme Léon de Saint-Jean et la grande politique," Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine 7 (1960): 11–46; "Thomisme et augustinisme dans l'apologétique du XVIIe siècle," Revue des sciences philosophiques et théolgiques 44 (1960): 617–638; "Humaniste ou augustinien? Le carme Léon de Saint-Jean et l'antiquité classique," Revue des études augustiniennes, Aug. 7 (1961): 373–388.

[J. P. MASSAUT]

LEO OF VERCELLI

Bishop of Vercelli (998–999), poet, imperial logothete, and trusted adviser of Otto III; d. Vercelli, April 10, 1026. His origin, whether German or Italian, is disputed. In 997 he was the colleague of Gerbert (see SYLVESTER II) in the palace chapel of OTTO III. In 998 he accompanied Otto to Italy, where he remained for the rest of his life in the service of three German emperors. His legal training gave him an influential role as imperial judge and redactor of legislation. He probably drafted Otto III's capitularies on church property, although their substance should probably be ascribed to Gerbert. He drew up the diploma whereby Otto gave eight counties to the Roman Church. At the Council of Pavia in 1022 he rendered similar services to Emperor HENRY II. As bishop he regarded himself as an imperial official, a "bishop of the empire." He energetically enforced the imperial decrees reintegrating Church property and governed the counties of Vercelli and Santhià conferred upon him by Otto III. He opposed Arduin of Ivrea, leader of the opposition to Otto and claimant to the Italian crown after his death. His loyalty to Henry II of Germany contributed largely to Henry's ultimate victory. Extremely versatile, Leo on occasion expressed his imperialist enthusiasm in Latin verses that showed considerable literary skill.

Bibliography: K. STRECKER, ed., Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae, (Berlin 1826–) 5.2:476–489. H. BLOCH, "Beiträge zur Geschichte des Bischofs Leo von Vercelli und seines Zeit," Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 22 (1896): 13–136. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 2:511–517. E. N. JOHNSON, The Secular Activities of the German Episcopate, 919–1024 (Lincoln, Neb. 1932). M. UHLIRZ, "Die italienische Kirchenpolitik der Ottonen," Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 48 (1934): 201–321, passim.

[C. E. BOYD]

LEO THAUMATURGUS, ST.

Bishop of Catania, Sicily, and miracle worker; b. probably at Ravenha, c. 703; d. c. 785. As bishop of Catania, he enjoyed universal respect. He was invited to Constantinople to the courts of Emperor Leo IV and of Emperor Constantine VI, who solicited his intercession.

Feast: Feb. 20.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 3 (1865) 226–229. Synaxarium ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae. Propylaeum ad Acta sanctorum novembris 479. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca 3:981. H. G. GECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich.

[M. C. HILFERTY]

LEOBARD, SS.

The name of two saints of the sixth and seventh centuries.

Leobard (Liberd) of Tours, Benedictine recluse of Auvergne; d. c. 593. After the death of his parents, who had wanted him to marry, he lived for 22 years as a recluse in the Diocese of Tours under the spiritual direction of GREGORY OF TOURS, who also wrote his life. Leobard founded the Abbey of MARMOUTIER and was its first abbot.

Feast: Jan. 18 (Roman MARTYROLOGY); Feb. 13 (Tours).

Leobard of Maursmünster, abbot, disciple of Waldebert, known also as Liuberat in the necrology of Reichenau, founded the Abbey of Maursmünster; d. c. 660.

Feast: Dec. 31; Feb. 25.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum 2:562–563. GREGORY OF TOURS, Opera, in Patrologia Latina, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 71:1092–96. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum, (Berlin 1826–) 1.2:741. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 1:369–370.

[O. L. KAPSNER]

LEOBIN OF CHARTRES, ST.

Bishop of CHARTRES, 544-c. 556. From detailed information furnished by the vita, written most probably by his successor, Caletric (557–c. 567), but reworked in the ninth century, Leobin is one of the best known of the early bishops of Chartres. He entered the monastery of St. Hilary at Poitiers, where he subsequently became cellarer and acquired a reputation for strict enforcement of monastic regulations and for zeal in his studies. Apparently forced to leave St. Hilary's because of the hostility of certain monks, he visited a number of monasteries from the region of the Loire to Lerins. Subsequently, St. AVITUS OF VIENNE made him abbot of Brou. In 544, he was elected bishop of Chartres, and, although not the founder of its episcopal school, he did much to develop it. An active participant in the synods of Orléans (549) and Paris (552), he was one of the judges who deposed Saffaracus, bishop of Paris.

Feast: March 14; Sept. 15 (translation feast).

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901) 2:4847. Acta Sanctorum, March 2:344–349. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores antiquissimi (Berlin 1826–) 4.2:73–82. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 3.1:1021–25. A. PONCELET, "Les Saints de Micy," Analecta Bollandiana 24 (1905): 1–104, esp. 25–31.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

LEODEGAR OF AUTUN, ST.

Bishop and martyr, also known as Léger; b. c. 616; d. forest of Sarcing, near Arras, France, Oct. 2, 678. Descended from a noble Frankish family, he was archdeacon at Poitiers under his uncle Didon (d. 673) and then abbot of SAINT-MAIXENT for at least six years until he was called to the court of Neustria by BATHILDIS, regent there since 657. Through the queen's influence he became c. 663 bishop of AUTUN, an important Burgundian see struggling to maintain its autonomy. He had the cathedral restored, brought about the translation of the relics of St. Symphorian (second century), and convened a synod. The kingdom, however, was thrown into chaos when Chlotar III (d. 673) came of age and Bathildis retired to the convent of CHELLES, leaving power to Ebroinus (d. 681), the mayor of the palace. Neustria and Burgundy thus had the same king but each remained a separate kingdom. When Ebroinus attempted to assert universal authority, the Burgundian nobles revolted, led by Leodegar. In March (or May) of 673, young Chlotar died, and Ebroinus tried to impose Theodoric III (d. c. 691) as king, but the nobles had him shorn and the mayor was exiled to LUXEUIL. Childeric II (d. 675), king of Austrasia since 662, became the sole monarch for the three kingdoms. Accused of plotting against the king, Leodegar also was exiled to Luxeuil, but upon the assassination of Childeric in the fall of 675 and the return of Theodoric, both Leodegar and Ebroinus were liberated. Leodegar returned to Autun, where Hermanarius restored to him his usurped see, and Ebroinus became more active than ever. Ignoring Wulfoad, the mayor of the palace, he proclaimed Clovis III king in Austrasia and assumed power in his name. At Crécyen-Ponthieu he captured King Theodoric, who had been thought dead, and laid siege to Autun. Fasting, alms, and processions were of no avail, and at length, Leodegar gave himself up to prevent a sack of the city. Under the false indictment of having had a hand in the assassination of Childeric, Leodegar was blinded and his tongue was cut out. In September of 678 he appeared at the royal palace before a synod that degraded him; he was then dragged off to the forest of Sarcing, where he was beheaded.

Desiderius, bishop of Chalons, and Waimer, count of Champagne, Leodegar's enemies, were condemned by the Synod of Mâlay even before his death, and Ebroinus was assassinated in the spring of 681. Nothing now stood in the way of a rehabilitation, and an assembly of bishops proclaimed Leodegar a martyr. His remains were translated c. 682 to Saint-Maixent by Abbot Audulf (d. 682), and a basilica was erected under his patronage near the abbot's house. During the NORMAN invasions the relics were transferred from one place to another, but a part of them was returned c. 930. Many churches in France and Belgium bear his name, and he is especially honored in the Dioceses of Autun and Poitiers. He is invoked for diseases of the eyes, and he is depicted in art as a bishop holding in one hand an auger, the instrument used in his blinding.

Feast: Oct. 2.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 96:373-376. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826-) 5:249-362. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 1:355-463. CAMERLINCK, St. Léger (Paris 1910). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 15 v. (Paris 1907-53) 8.2:2460-93. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 12 v. (Paris 1935-56) 10:39-43. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955-59) 2:796-797. A. MUSSAT, Le Style gothique de l'Ouest de la France (Paris 1963) 370-371 and plate ivii/a. D'ARCO SILVIO AVALLE, Monumenti prefranciani. Il Sermone di Valenciennes e il Sant Lethgier, ed. R. RO-SANI (Turin 1967). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898-1901) 4850-4856. A. M. ZIM-MERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933-38) 3:125-129. R. DU MOULIN-ECKART, Leudegar, Bischof von Autun (Breslau 1890).

[J. CAMBELL]

LEÓN, LUIS DE

Augustinian friar, theologian, exegete, poet, philosopher; b. Aug. 15, 1527, Belmonte (Cuenca), Spain; d. Aug. 23, 1591. Luis was the first-born son of Lope de León and Ines de Varela; the family was of lesser nobility (hidalgos) of Jewish descent. Luis spent his childhood in Madrid and Valladolid and, after 1541, in Salamanca where he studied canon law at the prestigious university there. On Jan. 29, 1544, he made his profession as an Augustinian friar at the Convento San Agustin in Salamanca. He studied arts at that convento (1544–1546) and then theology at the University of Salamanca under such teachers as Melchor Cano, Domingo Soto, and Mancio del Corpus Christi. He became proficient in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, later studying Scripture and Semitic languages at the University of Alcala de Henares (1556–1557). It was in 1557 that he delivered his famous Discurso de las Duenas, an oratorical piece of high literary quality and profound religious insight. Continuing his theological studies at Salamanca, he earned the licentiate and masters in theology in 1560. From 1561 to 1565, while holding the Chair of St. Thomas "in opposition," he explicated a number of questions from Aquinas's Summa Theologiae, among them De religione, De simonia, De iuramento, and De fide. At about the same time, at the request of his cousin Isabel de Osorio, a nun at the convent of Sanctus Spiritus in Salamanca, he began the translation of and commentary on the Hebrew text of the "Song of Songs." A friar who cleaned Luis's cell pilfered a copy and what had been intended for private use received unexpectedly wide publication. The "Song of Songs" (Cantar de Cantares) is a brilliant display of Luis's talent. His Spanish version of the Hebrew text is a unique and unprecedented expression of the theme of divine love.

Seventh-century crypt of the church dedicated to and built over the interred remains of St. Leodegar of Autun, Saint-Maixent, France.

In 1563 Luis was named definitor of the Order of St. Augustine in the Province of Castille. He held the Durando Chair at the University of Castille from 1565 to 1573. During this time the impassioned academic disputes between the Augustinians and the Dominicans grew more heated. Fray Luis considered in his De Incarnatione (1566–1567) how best to reconcile the freedom of Christ with the mandate for redemption received from His Father. In 1571 he lectured on Aquinas's De Legibus, adding a number of significant new ideas, namely, the development of the concept of the common good and an examination of the juridical nature of the Law of Nations.

In 1571 Bartolome de Medina censured Fray Luis in 17 propositions presented to the Council of the Inquisition. The case was examined and in March of 1572 Fray Luis was imprisoned in Valladolid. In that same year Martin Martinez de Cantalapiedra and Alfonso Gudiel were also imprisoned, accused of "hebraizing tendencies." While imprisoned, the three professors collaborated on an effort to incorporate into scriptural interpretation the advances and insights made possible by linguistics and the study of ancient classical civilization. The Inquisition questioned Fray Luis about his Jewish ancestry, about his translation of the "Song of Songs," and about his critique of the Latin Vulgate translation. In 1575 Mancio del Corpus Christi delivered a finding favorable to Fray Luis's teaching, and in December of 1576 he was absolved from all accusations of heresy and restored to his university chair at Salamanca. In subsequent years he was appointed to the chair of moral philosophy (1578) and then the chair of Scripture (1579), which he held until his death.

Fray Luis was a born poet whose verses extol beauty, goodness, and peace, but also expresses pain, sadness, and restlessness. His odes are elegant, short, and simple. Forty years after his death, his verses were published by Francisco de Quevedo in Obras propias, y traducciones latinas, griegas, y italianas (Original Works and Translations from Latin, Greek and Italian). His literary work reaches its highest point in De los nombres de Cristo (On the Names of Christ). Published in 1583 and again in 1585, this work offers an extensive introduction to biblical, patristic, philosophical, and theological thought. His sources range from Horace to the Psalms, from Plato to Augustine, from Cicero to the Neoplatonists, and from the Church Fathers to the Hebrew exegetes. He adopted the literary form of a Renaissance Christian dialogue. The interlocutors are three Augustinians from the Convento de Salamanca, Sabino, Marcelo, and Juliano, who converse on the fundamental names attributed to Christ in the scriptures. In another work popular with newlyweds of the day, La perfecta casada (The Perfect Spouse) (1583), he draws the picture of a sixteenth-century woman in light of the Book of Proverbs. It shows an awareness of feminine psychology and the influence of the Renaissance humanist Luis Vives's De institutione feminae christianae (1524). The Comentario al libro de Job (Commentary on the Book of Job), begun in prison, was never finished. Another Augustinian friar added a conclusion and published it in 1779. In this work, possibly his most autobiographical, Fray Luis occupies the place of Job and his dramatic experience of sin and abandonment.

Fray Luis also promoted reform of the Augustinian Order by his work Forma de vivir (Way of Living) (1589) and in his role as prior and provincial counselor. He advanced reform of the Carmelite Order and was the first publisher of the works of Teresa of Avila (1588). He died nine days after being elected provincial. His remains rest in an urn in the Chapel of the University of Salamanca.

Bibliography: Works. Obras completas castellanas, prologue and notes by P. FELIX GARCIA, rev. ed. by R. LAZCANO, 5th ed. in 2 v. (Madrid 1991); The Names of Christ, tr. M. DURAN and

W. KLUBACK (New York 1974). A Bilingual Edition of Fray Luis de León's La perfecta casada, The Role of Married Women in Sixteenth-Century Spain, ed. and tr. J. A. JONES and J. SAN JOSE LERA (Lewiston-Queenston-Lampeter 1999). Poesias completas. Obras propias en castellano y latin y traducciones e imitaciones latinas, griegas, biblico-hebreas y romances, ed. C. CUEVAS (Madrid 1998); Cantar de los Cantares de Salomon, ed. J. M. BLECUA (Madrid 1994). Literature. G. BARRIENTOS, Fray Luis de León y la Universidad de Salamanca (San Lorenzo de El Escorial 1996). J. CASTILLO VEGAS, El mundo juridico en Fray Luis de León (Burgos 2000). V. GARCIA DE LA CONCHA and J. SAN JOSE LERA, eds., Fray Luis de León: Historia, Humanismo y Letras (Salamanca 1996). I. JERICO BERMEJO, Fray Luis de León: La Teologia sobre el articulo y el dogma de fe (1568) (Madrid 1997). R. LAZCANO, Fray Luis de León, un hombre singular (Madrid 1991), Eng. trans. in Augustinian Heritage 39 (1993): 3-77. R. LAZCANO, Fray Luis de León. Bibliografia. Segunda edicion, actualizada y ampliada (Madrid 1994). F. J. PEREA SILLER, Fray Luis de León y la lengua perfecta. Linguistica, cabala y hermeneutica en "De los nombres de Cristo" (Cordoba 1998). J. PEREZ, El humanismo de Fray Luis de León (Madrid 1994).

[R. LAZCANO]

LEONARD OF PORT MAURICE, ST.

Renowned preacher, ascetic; b. Paul Jerome Casanova, in Porto Maurizio, Liguria, Italy, Dec. 20, 1676; d. Rome, Nov. 26, 1751. As a youth, Paul was sent to Rome and educated at the Jesuit Collegium Romanum. In 1697 he became a Franciscan of the Riformella instituted by Bl. Bonaventure of Barcelona. When assigned in 1709 to the retreat of Monte alle Croci in Florence, he initiated his 40-year apostolate of preaching popular missions, retreats, and Lenten courses and of promoting the devotion of the Way of the Cross. He also founded the retreat of Incontro near Florence. His collected works of sermons, correspondence, spiritual directives, and treatises were published in two editions (13 v. Rome 1853-54; 5 v. Venice 1868). His remains are preserved in S. Bonaventura al Palatino, Rome. He was beatified in 1796 and canonized in 1867. In 1923 he was declared patron saint of popular missionaries.

Feast: Nov. 26.

Bibliography: LEONARD OF PORT MAURICE, Prediche e lettere inedite a cura del P. Benedetto Innocenti (Quaracchi-Florence 1915). B. M. DONATIELLO and K. SOLTÉSZ, "San Leonardo da Porto Maurizio. Lettere e documenti inediti," Studi Francescani 94, 3-4 (1997) 353–425. M. BIGARONI, "Lettere inedite di San Leonardo da Porto Maurizio," Archivum Franciscanum historicum 64 (1971) 172–196. G. CANTINI, S. Leonardo da P. M. e la sua predicazione (Rome 1936).

[J. B. WUEST]

LEONARDI, JOHN, ST.

Founder of the CLERKS REGULAR OF THE MOTHER OF GOD; b. Diecimo, near Lucca, 1541?; d. Rome, Oct. 9, 1609. Leonardi, who came from a working-class family, was apprenticed to a druggist. After his ordination c. 1572, he immediately began to train lay leaders and catechists, and in 1579 he formed the CONFRATERNITY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE. He published a compendium of Christian doctrine (Lucca 1574) that remained in use until the nineteenth century. In 1574 Leonardi founded his religious congregation, which received episcopal approval in 1583, papal approbation in 1595, and became an order proper, the Clerks Regular of the Mother of God, in 1621. Leonardi inaugurated four additional religious orders, reformed several others, was cofounder in 1603 of a seminary for foreign missions, and fulfilled several important missions. He himself died after nursing his brethren through an influenza epidemic. John Leonardi was beatified in 1861 and canonized in 1938. His relics are enshrined at Santa Maria in Campirelli, Rome.

Feast: Oct. 9.

Bibliography: S. Giovanni Leonardi, Fondatore dei Chierici Regolari della Madre di Dio, ed. Members of the Ordine della Madre di Dio (Rome 1938). F. FERRAIRONI, Tre Secoli di storia dell'Ordine della Madre di Dio (Rome 1939). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, 4 v., rev. ed. (New York 1956) 4:65.

[M. P. TRAUTH]

LEONIDES, ST.

Martyr, father of ORIGEN; b. place unknown, 150–160?; d. Alexandria, 202 (203?) during the persecution under Septimius Severus. It is unlikely that Leonides was a bishop; however, he was an excellent husband and father and a man of profound faith who took care to teach Holy Scripture to his seven sons. Origen, his eldest son, encouraged him to remain firm in his faith while in prison and not to be concerned about his family. His goods were confiscated after he was beheaded.

Feast: April 22.

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, History Ecclesiastical 6:1–2 in Patrologia Graeca, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 20:524–525. JEROME, De vir. ill., 54 in Patrologia Graeca, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 23:664. Acta Sanctorum April 3:10–11. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 4:564–566.

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

LÉONIN

The first significant composer of the Notre Dame school; dates and places of birth and death unknown (in Latin, Leoninus). An avant-garde composer of the late 12th century, he was the first polyphonist to create music of such compelling style and beauty that it was sung both in his own country and elsewhere in Europe. His works were immediately performed in his local cathedral, Notre Dame of Paris (whose cornerstone had been laid in 1163), and he was commissioned to set the cycle of solo parts of the Alleluia and Gradual of the Mass and some responsorial parts of the Office for feasts and for the whole liturgical year. The resulting compilation was the famous Magnus liber organi He composed for two voices in techniques known as organum and clausula and was probably the first contrapuntist to work out his lines in a series of repeated rhythmic patterns called modi.

Bibliography: W. WAITE, The Rhythm of Twelfth-Century Polyphony (New Haven 1954), contains transcription of his works. H. TISCHLER, "A Propos the Notation of the Parisian Organa," Journal of the American Musicological Society 14 (Boston 1961) 1–8. H. HUSMANN, "The Origin and Destination of the Magnus liber organi," Musical Quarterly 49 (New York 1963) 311–330. H. COUSSEMAKER, Scriptorium de musica medii aevi nova series 4 v. (Paris 1864–76) 1:342. G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940). New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP v.2 (New York 1957–). I. D. BENT, "Léonin" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 10, ed. S. SADIE, (New York 1980) 676–677. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 498. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, 8th ed. (New York 1992) 1040.

[E. THURSTON]

LEONINE COMMISSION

As a consequence of the encyclical Aeterni Patris (1879), a commission was formed in 1880 for preparing new editions of the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas and was named after Pope Leo XIII. A committee of three cardinals headed by the Dominican Thomas Zigliara inaugurated the enterprise. The pope had desired texts corrected from the best manuscripts that could be rapidly published for use in the Thomistic revival. However, the commission soon realized that a study of all extant manuscripts alone could produce definitive editions, so that in 1893 it became a project solely of the Dominican Order. The Leonine editions are highly regarded, their editorial method set new standards, and they have significantly contributed to the development of medieval textual criticism.

In the first period (to 1930) the Summa theologiae and the Summa contra Gentiles were completed, together with Aristotelian commentaries on logic and natural philosophy. When the commission had practically become defunct, the Order launched a revival in 1948, and besides the original group sections were founded in Spain, Canada, and the United States. In this second period sixteen editions were brought to completion, some winning the greatest acclaim. Now at the opening of a new century almost all the experienced researchers have ceased their labor, so that another beginning commences with new recruits. Although the membership has always chiefly been composed by Dominicans, as Leo XIII insisted, lay scholars have been associated with the project and have been editors of some texts. At present two non-Dominicans are full members. The American Section, located at the Dominican House of Studies, Washington, D.C., has as its projects the Sententia libri Metaphysicae; the Scriptum, the Third Book of the Sentences of Peter Lombard; and the Quaestio disputata De spiritualibus creaturis (now published). The St. Thomas Aquinas Foundation contributes financial assistance.

The state of the edition at present is as follows. Tomes that have been published:

- t. 1 v.1 Expositio libri Perhermenias, 1882, new ed. 1989;
- t. 1 v.2 Expositio libri Posteriorum Analyticorum, 1882, new ed. 1989;
- t. 2 In Aristotelis libros Physicorum, 1884;
- t. 3 In Aristotelis libros De caelo . . . Meteorologicorum, 1886;
- t. 4-12 Summa theologiae, 1888-1906;
- t. 13-15 Summa contra Gentiles, 1918-1930;
- t. 16 Indices in tomos 4–15, 1948;
- t. 22 QD De veritate, 1970-1976;
- t. 23 QD De malo, 1982;
- t. 24 v.1 QD De anima, 1996;
- t. 24 v.2 QD De spiritualibus creaturis, 2000;
- t. 25 Quaestiones De quolibet, 1996;
- t. 26 Expositio super Iob, 1965;
- t. 28 Expositio super Isaiam, 1974;
- t. 40-43 Opuscula I-IV, 1967-1979;
- t. 45 v.1 Sententia Iibri De anima, 1984;
- t. 45 v.2 Sententia libri De sensu, 1985;
- t. 47 Sententia libri Ethicorum, 1969;
- t. 48 Sententia libri Politicorum, 1971;
- t. 50 Super libros Boetii De Trinitate, De hedomadibus, 1992.

In various stages of preparation:

- t. 17-20 Scriptum Super IV Sententiarum
- t. 21 QD De potentia
- t. 24, 3 QD De virtutibus, etc.
- t. 30 Super Matthaeum
- t. 31 Super loannem
- t. 32-35 Super Epistolas Pauli Apostoli
- t. 44 Opuscula V
- t. 46 Sententia libri Metaphysicae
- t. 49 Super liberum De causis, Super librum Dionysii divinis nominibus.

Tomes not begun:

- t. 27 Super Psalmos
- t. 29 Super Ieremiam et Threnos
- t. 36–39 Glossa continua super Evangelia (Catena aurea)

Bibliography: G. M. GRECH, "The Leonine Edition of the Works of St. Thomas Aquinas," in From an Abundant Spring, The Walter Farrell Memorial Volume of The Thomist (New York 1952) 218–258. L. J. BATAILLON, "L'Édition léonine des oeuvres de saint Thomas et les études médiévales," Atti dell'VIII Congresso Tomistico Internazionale 1 (1981) 425–464. P. M. DE CONTENSON, "Documents sur les origines et les premières années de la commission léonine," in St. Thomas Aquinas, 1274–1974; Commemorative Studies (Toronto 1974) 2:331–388.

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

LEONINE PRAYERS

The prayers ordered by Leo XIII to be said kneeling (and usually in the vernacular) after low Mass; they comprised the Hail Mary (three times), SALVE REGINA, (Hail Holy Queen) with versicle, response and oration, and a prayer to St. Michael the Archangel. To these the addition of an ejaculatory prayer to the Sacred Heart was recommended by St. Pius X in 1904. Although prayers of this kind had been in use in the Papal States since 1859, Leo XIII extended them to the whole church on Jan. 6, 1884. In 1886 a slight change was made in the oration and it was then that the St. Michael prayer was added. The prayers were first ordered because of loss of the Papal States, but after the 1928 LATERAN Treaty, Pius XI ordered them recited for Russia. After various curtailments, they were suppressed on Sept. 26, 1964.

Bibliography: R. E. BRENNAN, "The Leonine Prayers," American Ecclesiastical Review 125 (Washington, DC 1951) 85–94.

[F. A. BRUNNER/EDS.]

LEONINE SACRAMENTARY

The popular, though incorrect name for the earliest surviving collection of Roman Mass formularies and ordination prayers that scholars have called the Sacramentary of Verona (Sacramentarium Veronense). The name "Leonine Sacramentary" is misleading, since it is neither a sacramentary, nor was it composed by Pope Leo I. More accurately, it is a compilation of individual LIBELLI MISSARUM in a single manuscript. It is a unicum, i.e., it exists in a single MS, Codex LXXXV (80) of the Chapter Library at Verona. E. A. Lowe dates it, on palaeographical grounds, as written in the first quarter of the 7th century. J. Bianchini published it in 1735, in v.4 of his Anastasius Bibliothecarius, under the title Sacramentarium Leonianum. In 1748 L. A. Muratori reedited it under the same title, but in 1754 J. A. Assemani, who gave it the title Sacramentarium Veronense, vulgo Leonianum, edited it again. In 1896 C. L. Feltoe published a handy, but inaccurate, edition, with the old title. The most recent edition is that of K. Mohlberg, who has rightly again called it Sacramentarium Veronense (Rome 1956).

Description. The contents of this book are exclusively Roman, at least in origin. They are not a well-ordered whole, but a random collection of Mass prayer formularies, grouped under the months of the year. The first part of the MS is missing, and as it is today, it begins in the middle of April. It contains more than 1,300 formularies, but for relatively few occasions. The feast of SS. Peter and Paul, for instance, has no fewer than 28 Masses, while that of St. Lawrence has 14. Although the material is Roman, the Sacramentary was not compiled for use at Rome.

Authorship. Various theories have been put forward to explain its origin. E. Bourque and A. Stuiber, in Libelli Sacramentorum Romani (Bonn 1950) conjectured that it is a collection of Roman Libelli Missarum preserved in the Lateran Archives. Many of these may well have dated from the pontificate of Damasus. More recently, Schmidt has put forward the hypothesis that one of the immediate sources of this Sacramentary is a somewhat elusive collection of prayers that he calls the Sacramentarium Tabularii Papalis and that he attributes to Pope Gelasius. Interesting as this theory is, some may well think that it supposes a too logical development. The more common view is that the Veronense is a collection of Roman Libelli Missarum put together by a provincial bishop anxious for Roman formularies. G. Lucchesi has suggested that its calendar is that of the See of Ravenna and that its compiler may have been Maximianus, archbishop from 546 to 557. But Lowe thinks that Verona is possibly its place of origin.

Bianchini gave his edition the title Sacramentarium Leonianum because he was convinced that Leo I was its author. However, C. Callewaert (d. 1943) has made a comparison of the literary parallels between the text of the Sacramentary and the writings of Leo. He has shown that some parallels do exist, but the difficulty is to interpret these. There are three possible explanations: (1) that in his writings Leo is making use of liturgical texts familiar to him from use, (2) that someone familiar with Leo's writings made use of phrases from them in composing the prayers, and (3) that in fact Leo wrote the prayers. Callewaert preferred the third explanation, but in this he may have been a little hasty, since F. L. Cross has shown that the first solution might be considered equally probable ["PreLeonine Elements in the Proper of the Roman Mass" Journal of Theological Studies 50 (1959) 191–197]. Nor is the second explanation impossible: in at least two places in the Gregorian Sacramentary someone has used the language of St. Gregory the Great in composing (after his lifetime) prayers for liturgical use. Callewaert observed that not all the formularies in the Veronense could be attributed to Leo, but he maintained that Leo was the creator of the style of liturgical prayer found in the Veronense. J. H. Crehan, in reviewing the excellent study of Leonine formularies by A. P. Lang, was inclined to the opinion that Leo did, in some instances, quote from earlier liturgical prayers in his writings. Further scrutiny of the text of the Veronense and the literary output of Popes Gelasius and Vigilius (537–555) has led such scholars as B. Capelle, C. Coebergh, and A. Chavasse to attribute much of this Sacramentary to these popes. How much of the actual material in the Veronense can be attributed to Leo is, therefore, still not known with certainty.

C. Vogel summarizes the scholarly consensus as follows: (1) the Veronense is not a sacramentary, properly, speaking, but a private collection of libelli missarum deriving, in the first instance, from the Lateran archives. Several of the libelli appeared to have been rearranged and adapted for use in the various Roman tituli. (2) Most of the libelli were composed in the 5th or 6th centuries. (3) The apparent disorganized state of the collection stems not so much from the compiler's carelessness or inexperience, as from his obsession with keeping intact the various groupings of masses as he had found them. (4) The compiler worked outside Rome. (5) The libelli reveals the oldest prayer formularies of the Roman Rite: preces (consecratory formulae), oratio fidelium (prayer of the faithful) and orationes (brief prayers after the chants, the readings and at the conclusion of morning and evening prayer). (6) The Veronense was compiled at a time when the desire to collect all the documents of the popes was manifesting itself in the Latin Church (Vogel, Medieval Liturgy, 43).

Bibliography: Critical Edition. Sacramentarium Veronense (Cod. Bibl. Capit. Veron; LXXXV: formerly LXXX) ed. L.C. MOHL-BERG, L. EIZENHÖFER, P. SIFFRIN, Rerum Ecclesiasticarum Documenta, Series Maior, Fontes 1 (Rome 1956, 1966). Commentaries. P. BRUYLANTS, Concordance Verbale du Sacramentaire Léonien (Louvain 1948). D. M. HOPE, The Leonine Sacramentary: A Reassessment of Its Nature and Purpose (Oxford 1971). A discussion of the problems concerning St. Leo the Great and the Leonianum together with the relevant bibliog. is in E. DEKKERS, "Autour de l'oeuvre liturgique de s. Léon le Grand," Sacris erudiri 10 (1958) 363–398. G. LUCCHESI, Nouve note agiografiche Ravennati: Santi e riti del Sacramentario Leoniano a Ravenna (Faenza 1943). A. P. LANG, Leo der Grosse und die Texte des Altgelasianums (Steyl 1957); "Leo der Grosse und die liturgischen Texte des Oktavtages yon Epiphanie," Sacris erudiri 11 (1960) 12-135; "Anklänge an Orationen der Ostervigil in Sermonen Leos des Grossen," ibid. 13 (1962) 281-325. For overview and further bibliographies, see: C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to Sources (Washington, DC 1986); and E. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books: From the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century (Collegeville, Minn. 1998).

[H. ASHWORTH/EDS.]

LEONIUS, BL.

Benedictine abbot and reformer in the Low Countries, noted for works of charity; d. Oct. 26, 1163. Leonius, descended from an old Flemish family, was educated at Anchin by the Benedictines, whom he joined at the age of 22. Influenced by his teacher Alvisius, Leonius adopted the ideals of the CLUNIAC REFORM. He was prior at Hesdin, and in 1131 he was made abbot of Lobbes, where he served until 1137, when he became abbot of SAINT-BERTIN. There he established a school of higher religious studies. Leonius took part in the Second CRUSADE and was a friend of its preacher, BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX.

Feast: Jan. 26, and Feb. 6 or 7.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 11:792–794. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 13:661–666; 21:323–331. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 182:585–590 (letters from St. Bernard to Leonius). W. LAMPEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:967. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige 1:130, 132–133. M. A. BORELLI, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico 2:647.

[R. BALCH]

LEONTIUS OF BYZANTIUM

Sixth-century Byzantine monk and theologian; b. probably in Constantinople, c. 500; d. Constantinople, 543. Leontius entered (c. 520) the monastery called the New Laura in Palestine with his spiritual master, Nonnus, a disciple of the Origenist monk EVAGRIUS PONTICUS (d. 399). After coming to Constantinople in 531, Leontius remained there until at least 536, defending the Council of CHALCEDON against the MONOPHYSITES. In 532 he was an observer at a colloquy between Orthodox and Monophysites (see HYPATIUS OF EPHESUS) and in 536 was present at the council in Constantinople that banished the Monophysites. Leontius became the nucleus of an Origenistic Chalcedonian party, led after 537 by his friend THEODORE ASCIDAS. In 537 Leontius was in Palestine, where he defended Origenism against the attacks of the Orthodox, but he returned to Constantinople about 540, when the controversy was referred to the emperor. The Origenistic Chalcedonians lost, and in 543 JUSTINIAN I condemned ORIGENISM. However, just before his death (543) Leontius's polemic against THEODORE OF MOP-SUESTIA seems to have launched the campaign that led to the condemnation of the THREE CHAPTERS at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE I (553). Three works of Leontius are extant: Three Books against the Nestorians and Eutychians; A Resolution of the Arguments Advanced by Severus [of Antioch]; and Thirty Chapters against Severus. He is perhaps the author of Against the Frauds of the Apollinarians.

The Christology of Leontius translated the heretical Christology of Evagrius Ponticus into the terms of the formula of the Council of Chalcedon: Jesus Christ, one person (hypostasis) in two natures. For Leontius as for Evagrius Ponticus, Jesus Christ is the one spirit or intellect (nous) of the intellectual and immaterial world who did not fall and so remains united to the Word of God in the vision of God. In the Incarnation this nous, Jesus Christ, joins himself to a body and so in one person unites two natures, the Word of God and man. This Christology had no future; but Leontius's concept of an enhypostasized being (ἐνυπόστατον), that is, a being that finds its hypostasis or existence in its union with a being of a different nature, was developed later by MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR and JOHN DAMASCENE.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca 86:1267–1396, 1901–76. F. LOOFS, Leontius von Byzanz in Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur (Berlin 1882–) 3.1–2; 1887. F. DIEKAMP, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten im 6. Jahrhundert (Münster 1899). V. GRUMEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:400–426. M. RICHARD, Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 27 (1938): 27–52; Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 35 (1939): 695–723; Mélanges de science religieuse 1 (1944): 35–88; Revue des études byzantines 5 (1947): 31–66. E. SCHWARTZ, ed., Kyrillos von Skythopolis in Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, (Berlin 1882–) 49.2; 1939. B. ALTANER, Theologische Quartalschrift 127 (1947): 147–165. D. B. EVANS, Leontius of Byzantium (Doctoral diss. unpub. Harvard Divinity School 1966).

[D. B. EVANS]

LEONTIUS OF FRÉJUS, ST.

Bishop, patron of Fréjus (France); b. probably Nîmes, late fourth century; d. Fréjus, c. 432. He was consecrated bishop of Fréjus before 419 and remained there until his death. The local tradition that holds that he went as an apostle into Germany (432–442) is historically doubtful. He supported St. HONORATUS OF ARLES in the foundation of the monastery at LÉRINS. John CASSIAN dedicated the first ten Collationes to him. He is among several bishops of Gaul who received a joint letter from BONIFACE I in 419 (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198; 349) and from CELESTINE II in 431 (Jaffé 381).

Feast: Dec. 1 (Fréjus); Dec. 5 (Nîmes).

Bibliography: S. LE NAIN DE TILLEMONT, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles, 16 v. (Paris 1693–1712) 12:468–470, 476–477, 676–679. Gallia Christiana v. 1–13 (Paris 1715–85) v. 14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 1:420–421. J. B. DISDIER, Recherches historiques sur saint Léonce (Draguignan 1864). L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (Paris 1886–92; 2d ed. Paris 1907–58) 1:285. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 12:25–27.

[G. E. CONWAY]

LEONTIUS OF JERUSALEM

Sixth-century monk and theologian. Leontius belonged to the party of Neochalcedonians, or Cyrillian Chalcedonians. He is known only from two works, composed probably during the reign of JUSTINIAN I, before the outbreak of the controversy over the THREE CHAPTERS (c. 544), Contra Monophysitas, and Adversus Nestorianos. Leontius insisted that the Christological formula of the Council of CHALCEDON (451), stating that Jesus Christ is one person (hypostasis) in two natures, could be interpreted only by means of the Christology of CYRIL OF AL-EXANDRIA. Therefore he identified the one hypostasis of Jesus Christ with one hypostasis of the Trinity, that is, with the Word of God, who was incarnate in Jesus Christ. His Contra Monophysitas defends this position against the Monophysites and against SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH, whereas the longer Adversus Nestorianos defends it against his orthodox Chalcedonian critics: the strict Dyophysites of the tradition of the school of Antioch, as well as, it seems, the Origenistic Chalcedonians (see LEONTIUS OF BYZANTIUM).

Because Justinian I was a Cyrillian Chalcedonian, it has been suggested that Leontius was the emperor's theological adviser and that he, and not Leontius of Byzantium, was the Leontius present at the colloquy of 532 between the orthodox and the Monophysites and at the council of 536. Although as a Cyrillian Chalcedonian Leontius stood in the mainstream of the development of Eastern orthodox Christology, his work seems to have been little used in later times.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca 86:1395–1902. M. RICH-ARD, Mélanges de science religieuse (1944) 35–88. C. MOELLER, in A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 1:686–687, 701–704. Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 27 (1951): 467–482.

[D. B. EVANS]

LEOPOLD III OF AUSTRIA, ST.

Margrave of Austria; b. Gars, Austria, c. 1075; d. Nov. 15, 1136. Leopold was educated by St. ALTMAN OF PASSAU. Because of his loyalty during the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE, Pope INNOCENT II called him "Son of St. Peter." Leopold later changed his allegiance to Emperor HENRY V and married Henry's daughter Agnes. Two of his six sons were the historian OTTO OF FREISING and Archbishop Conrad II of Salzburg. In 1108 Leopold refounded the monastery of the canon regulars in KLOS-TERNEUBURG, and in 1133 (not 1135), the Cistercian abbey HEILIGENKREUZ. He also founded the Benedictine monastery of Kleinmariazell and placed the monasteries of MELK and Klosterneuburg directly under papal jurisdiction. He laid the foundations of Austria's greatness and also of its ecclesiastical provincialism. In 1125 he gave up his claim to the German throne. Buried in the crypt of Klosterneuburg, he was canonized in 1485 and declared the national patron of Austria in 1663; his feast is a national holiday. He is pictured in a suit of armor with a flag and the model of a church (miniatures published by V. O. Ludwig, Klosterneuburg, Vienna 1951).

Feast: Nov. 15.

Bibliography: Sources. Chronicon pii marchionis, in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826-) 9:609-613. H. FICHTENAU and E. ZÖLLNER, eds., Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte der Babenberger in Österreich, v. 1 (Vienna 1950) 2-14. Literature. H. PFEIFFER and B. CERNIK, Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum qui in bibliotheca canonicorum regularium s. Augustini Claustroneoburgi asservantur (Klosterneuburg 1925). V. O. LUD-WIG, Der hl. Leopold (Innsbruck 1936). Sankt Leopold: Festschrift des Augustiner Chorherrenstiftes Klosterneuburg, ed. S. WINTER-MAYR (Klosterneuburg 1936). G. WACHER, Leopold der Heilige und Klosterneuburg vom 12-20 Jahrhunderts. (Diss. Vienna 1949). H. HANTSCH, ed., Gestalter der Geschichte Österreichs (Innsbruck 1962). Leopold III. und die Babenbergerzeit, ed. H. LAMPALZER (Vienna 1985). F. RÖHRIG, Leopold III. der Heilige, Markgraf von Österreich (Vienna 1985). M. KASTL, Das Schriftwort in Leopoldspredigten des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts (Vienna 1988). J. WODKA, Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1959) 79-85, 419.

[V. H. REDLICH]

LEOPOLD OF GAICHE, BL.

Franciscan; b. Gaiche, Italy, 1732; d. Monteluco, April 2, 1815. He became a Franciscan in 1751, was ordained in 1757, and taught philosophy and theology. In 1768 he began 47 years of missionary activity in Umbria and the Papal States, in the manner of St. LEONARD OF PORT MAURICE. He was elected provincial (1781–84) but continued to preach, and he built in Monteluco a retreat for missionaries, of which he became guardian. When Napoleon seized the Papal States and suppressed religious houses, Leopold withdrew to a hut. He was imprisoned briefly for his refusal to take an oath to the new regime. After Napoleon's fall in 1814, Leopold returned to Monteluco and spent his last years in prayer. He wrote a Diario delle S. Missioni. He was beatified by Leo XIII, on March 3, 1893.

Feast: April 2.

Bibliography: M. A. HABIG, Franciscan Book of Saints (Chicago 1959). G. FUSSENEGGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:970.

[R. BARTMAN]

LEOPOLDINEN STIFTUNG (LEOPOLDINE SOCIETY)

An Austrian mission society organized in 1828 in Vienna through the efforts of Frederick Résé, a German missionary who joined the U.S. Diocese of Cincinnati in 1824. While in Europe in 1828 to solicit funds for his diocese, Résé obtained an audience with Emperor Francis I, who granted permission for the new mission society; the following year the society received official approbation from Pope Leo XII. Patterned after the French Society for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, established in Lyons in 1822, the Austrian organization was called Leopoldinen Stiftung to honor St. Leopold, an Austrian medieval margrave, and to memorialize the emperor's daughter Leopoldina, who died as empress of Brazil in 1826.

Members of the organization were required to pray for the missions and contribute a weekly alms to be used exclusively for America. Funds thus collected were sent to headquarters in Vienna, where they were then distributed to needy bishops and religious communities in the U.S. Contributions to America had totaled more than $436,000 by 1861, after which the activity of the society declined sharply. It ceased to exist in 1921, and by then the total contributed was $709,114. The generous financial assistance was augmented by valuable gifts of church goods and, more important, numerous Austrian recruits for the American missions, including the future Bishop (later Blessed) John NEUMANN of Philadelphia; the future Bishop Frederic BARAGA of Marquette; Father Caspar Rehrl, founder of the Sisters of St. Agnes; Father Joseph SALZMANN, founder of St. Francis Seminary in Milwaukee; Father Francis X. PIERZ of Minnesota; Father John Stephen RAFFEINER of New York; and many others. Coinciding with the period of expansion of church and nation into the Ohio and Mississippi valleys, this foreign mission aid proved more effective in strengthening Catholicism than the bare facts indicate, and served to arouse nativist opposition.

From the outset the society published missionary data; its annual reports, Berichte der Leopoldinen Stiftung im Kaiserthume Oesterreichs, presenting financial statements and letters from missionaries, which featured especially the work among the native and immigrant groups of the U.S., still constitute an important source of American Church history. Of historical value also is Canon Josep Salzbacher's Meine Reise nach Nord-Amerika im Jahre 1842, published after he, as editor of the Berichte, visited the U.S. to investigate charges of unfairness that had been reaching Europe regarding the distribution of aid.

Bibliography: B. J. BLIED, Austrian Aid to American Catholics, 1830–1860 (Milwaukee 1944). T. ROEMER, Ten Decades of Alms (St. Louis 1942).

[B. J. BLIED]

LEPANTO, BATTLE OF

The battle of Lepanto was an engagement fought between the Christian and Turkish fleets on Oct. 7, 1571. It was the last great naval battle under oars. The capture of Constantinople by Mohammed II (1430–81) in 1453 ended the Eastern Roman Empire and opened the Balkans and Hungary to further conquest. It also established Turkey as the dominant maritime power in the Mediterranean. Turkish galleys raided the coasts of the Italian peninsula; Syria, Egypt, Tripoli, and Tunisia acknowledged the Sultan as overlord; Rhodes, after a valiant defense by the Knights of St. John, was captured in 1522.

Occasion for War. To protect her valuable trade with Eastern ports, Venice had tried to maintain a strategic neutrality in the continual Christian-Turkish warfare, but when Sultan Selim II (1566-74) demanded the surrender of Cyprus (1570), the Venetian senate appealed to Pope Pius V. The pope succeeded in organizing resistance to the Muslims and assembled a fleet to meet at Messina in 1571 under the command of Don Juan of Austria, half-brother of Philip II of Spain. Spain would pay one-half, Venice one-third, and the pope one-sixth of the total expense of the operation. Of a total of 206 galleys, Venice furnished 108, Naples 29, Genoa 14, Spain 13, the Pope 12, and Malta 3. This was a period of transition in naval weaponry. The larger vessels had guns in their bows, and the fighting men were archers or musketeers, but were provided with swords for the hand-to-hand fighting that usually ended a battle. In the Christian fleet there were also six large galleasses, each mounting 20 guns and a large crew of musketeers. In the plan of Don Juan two of these ships were to move ahead of his three squadrons. In all, there were about 80,000 men under his command. The Turks held a distinct superiority with a fleet of 220 to 230 galleys, 50 to 60 galeots (smaller, oared vessels), and 120,000 soldiers and rowers; these last were Christians captured at sea or in shore raids. The rowers in the Christian fleet were either captive Muslims, convicted criminals promised freedom after victory, or hired for the campaign. Pius V sent a legate and chaplains to Messina, together with a blue banner for the flagship, showing Christ crucified. After the blessing of the legate, the ships sailed from Messina harbor.

Allegorical representation of the "Battle of Lepanto," fresco by Giorgio Vasari and Daniele da Volterra in the Sala Regia of the Palazzo Vaticano, Rome.

Encounter. Don Juan passed down the Greek coast on the morning of Oct. 7, 1571, and spied the Turks in the Gulf of Lepanto, 20 miles east of the southern tip of Ithaca. The Venetian admiral, Agostino Barbarigo, took position on the northern end of his squadron while the 53 galleys formed a line abreast, heading east. Don Juan visited each of the 62 galleys in his center squadron early in the morning, holding a crucifix aloft. His flagship, the "Reale," with 60 oars, 300 rowers, and 400 fighting men, was placed in the center of the line. The papal admiral, Marco Antonio Colonna, was on Don Juan's right, the Venetian admiral, Sebastian Veniero, the most experienced seaman of the fleet, on his left. Two of the 38 galleys of the reserve squadron under the command of the Spanish Marquis de Santa Cruz were directly astern. The wind, favorable to the Turks at dawn, fell before the battle. The two northern Turkish squadrons advanced abreast, suffering slight damage from the four galleasses. Mohammed Scirocco, Viceroy of Alexandria, attacked the galley of Barbarigo. Other galleys passed through shallow water and attacked the vessel on her side and stern. Opening the visor of his helmet, Barbarigo was struck in the eye by an arrow that pierced his brain. His nephew, Marino Contarini, boarded the ship with reinforcements, drove off the Turks, and was mortally wounded. The Venetian and Spanish fighting men reorganized, swept the deck of the Egyptian flagship with musketry fire, and charged over her bow with pikes and swords, killing Scirocco and capturing the ship.

The Turkish commander-in-chief, Admiral Ali Pasha, led his center squadron with 95 galleys. His flagship, the "Sultana," flying a white flag embroidered with verses from the Qu'ran, carried 100 archers and 300 musketeers. Steering for the "Reale," flagship of Don Juan, it fired three cannon at point-blank range, and striking almost bow on, cut into the Spanish galley. The "Sultana" rode higher in the water, and Turks poured down onto the deck of the "Reale," which would have been captured had not Admiral Colonna maneuvered to ram the "Sultana," and Santa Cruz joined with reinforcements. The "Sultana" was captured and Ali Pasha slain in battle. Meanwhile Giovanni Andrea Doria made an error in handling his 53 galleys of the right squadron. Instead of heading eastward, in line with the other squadrons, Doria turned to the south to prevent envelopment of his seaward flank. Uluch Ali, with 60 galleys and 30 smaller craft, countered and drew Doria farther away from the center squadron. The nearest Christian galleys were overwhelmed, and the flagship of the Knights of St. John was captured. The prompt action of Santa Cruz and Don Juan saved the squadron, and Uluch Ali abandoned his captives and fled with 15 galleys. About 35 other Turkish galleys reached Lepanto, taking with them one captured galley.

Results of the Battle. Aside from those burned, sunk, or wrecked, 117 Muslim galleys, six galeots, 117 large cannon, and 250 smaller ones were divided among the victors. Twelve thousand Christians were released from slavery; nearly 9,000 Christians were killed or died of wounds. Twice this number, including Don Juan, Colonna, Santa Cruz, and Veniero recovered from their wounds. The heroic dead included Venetian Admiral Barbarigo and 16 galley captains, a papal galley captain, 60 Knights of St. John, and many Spanish noblemen. The Turks lost 30,000. The pursuit of Uluch Ali was begun, but the difficulties of preparing the galleys with less than three hours of daylight remaining were too great. The victory though impressive was not decisive, because it was not effectively followed up. Venetian power in the Mediterranean continued to wane in favor of the Turks, when in 1573 Venice sued for peace and abandoned Cyprus. Nevertheless, the Battle of Lepanto was celebrated throughout Europe as a decisive Christian victory and became the subject for artistic and literary invention.

Bibliography: J. P. E. JURIEN DE LA GRAVIÈRE, La Guerre de Chypre et la bataille de Lépante, 2 v. (Paris 1888). L. COLOMA, The Story of Don John of Austria, tr. A. M. MORETON (New York 1912). W. L. RODGERS, Naval Warfare Under Oars (Annapolis 1939). R. C. ANDERSON, Naval Wars in the Levant (Princeton 1952). A. MACIA SERRANO, Lepanto (Madrid 1971). J. BEECHING, The Galleys at Lepanto (New York 1982).

[J. B. HEFFERNAN]

LÉPICIER, ALEXIS

Cardinal, theologian; b. Vaucouleurs, France, Feb. 28, 1863; d. Rome, May 20, 1936. At the age of 15 Lépicier left France and joined the Servite Order in London. After completing his studies at various priories of the Order in England and at the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice, Paris, he was ordained in London, in September of 1885. Two months later he was called to Rome by his superior general to study at the Propaganda Fide, where he earned doctorates in theology and philosophy. In 1890 he returned to England as master of novices.

In 1892 at the age of 29 he was appointed by Leo XIII to the chair of dogmatic theology left vacant by his former professor, Francesco Satolli, who had been appointed first apostolic delegate to the United States. Lépicier held this post for 21 years, until he was elected superior general of the Servites in 1913. The prodigious theological work of these years culminated in his Institutiones theologicae dogmaticae ad textum S. Thomae Concinnatae (25 v.). His tract De Beata Virgine Maria Matre Dei (5 eds.) was one of the earliest scholastic treatments of Marian theology. His writings influenced the neoscholastic revival. In addition to a busy teaching career, Lépicier filled positions in five Roman Congregations and was assigned to various commissions. Moreover, he undertook long journeys in the interest of the Curia. In 1912 he was apostolic visitor in Scotland and upon his return to Rome he was made delegate to that country without the obligation of residence.

In May of 1924 he was consecrated archbishop of Tarsus and sent as apostolic visitor to India, where he remained for nearly two years. In 1927 he traveled to Abyssinia and Eritrea as visitor. In December of 1927 Pius XI made him a cardinal, and the following year he became prefect of the Congregation of Religious.

Bibliography: A. M. LÉPICIER, Le Cardinal Lépicier, des servites de Marie, 2 v. (n.p. 1946).

[J. M. RYSKA]

LEPIDI, ALBERTO

Dominican philosopher and theologian; b. Popoli (Abruzzi), 1838; d. Rome, 1922. He taught theology in the spirit of St. Thomas Aquinas at Flavigny (1870), Louvain (1874), and Rome (1885). His lectures were a curious mixture of Aristotelian Thomism and Greco-Christian mysticism. His critical examination of ONTOLOGISM as taught by N. MALEBRANCHE and V. GIO-BERTI, Examen philosophicotheologicum de ontologismo (Louvain 1874), clearly asserts the teaching of St. Thomas on the origin of ideas, the nature of knowledge, and the natural knowledge of God. His Elementa philosophiae Christianae (3 v. Paris and Louvain 1875-79) follows Aguinas for the most part, but deviates somewhat on the real distinction between essence and existence in creatures and on the use of Anselm's ontological argument to demonstrate the existence of God. He wrote also a critical study of I. Kant's doctrine of pure reason: La critica della ragion pura secondo Kant (Rome 1894). In 1897 he resigned the chair of theology at the College of St. Thomas in Rome to become master of the sacred palace. In 1905 he wrote a short dogmatic explanation of the cult of the Eucharistic Heart of Jesus, which was edited by E. HUGON (Paris 1926). Lepidi is remembered as a prominent contributor to the neoscholastic movement for his work in reorganizing the course of theological studies for the Dominicans, especially in the French province.

Bibliography: G. SESTILI, Il p. Alberto Lepidi e la su filosofia (Turin 1930). Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1886. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 5.1:1260.

[F. J. ROENSCH]

LE PLAT, JODOCUS

Canonist; b. Mechelen, Nov. 18, 1732; d. Koblenz, Aug. 6, 1810. He became professor of canon law at Louvain in 1775. Prior to this time he had already achieved notoriety in opposing the doctrine of the Pauline Privilege, which had the support of Benedict XIV and many illustrious theologians. He became a supporter of JOSEPHINISM, which he introduced into Belgium. This incited such displeasure that he was forced in 1787 to flee to Holland, where he was received by the Jansenists with whom he collaborated in the Nouvelles Ecclesiastiques. He became rector of the Canon Law School in Koblenz in 1806. He secured the publication of the Commentaire of Van Espen on the Decretum, endeavoring to show the apocryphal canons. His other works include Institutionum iurisprudentiae ecclesiasticae (1780); Canones et Decreta S. S. oecumenici et generalis concilii Tridentini (Antwerp 1779); Dissertatio de sponsalibus et impedimentis matrimoniorum (1783); Monumentum concilii Tridentini (Louvain 1781–87).

Bibliography: R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:401–402.

[H. A. LARROQUE]

LEPROSY (IN THE BIBLE)

Leprosy, also known as Hansen's disease, is the only sickness whose traditional complex of social, legal, religious, and hagiographical aspects have made its history inseparable from that of the Bible and the Church. It is also unique in that the treatment, cure, and rehabilitation of millions of victims are seriously impeded today by widespread errors concerning it, which are historically associated with the Bible and the Church.

Nature of True Leprosy. Hansen's disease is a chronic infectious sickness caused by a rod-shaped acid-fast bacillus, Mycobacterium leprae, discovered by G. A. Hansen in Bergen, Norway, in 1873. It chiefly affects the skin, mucous membranes of the upper respiratory tract, eyes, and certain peripheral nerves. The disease is neither congenital nor hereditary. Its exact mode of transmission—probably direct contact—remains unknown. Only a small percentage of persons having prolonged contacts with patients contract the disease. A natural immunity, therefore, appears to prevail in most people, dependent on unexplored racial or genetic factors. Hansen's disease is considered less infectious than tuberculosis. Its average incubation period is about three years, but it may be shorter or longer. Apart from indeterminate and borderline cases, the two main types, presumably based on high or low resistance, are: (1) tuberculoid, having few bacilli, but with nerve involvement causing anesthesia, paralysis of some muscles, and disintegration of toe and finger bones; these so-called closed cases are considered noninfectious except during reaction, and often result in spontaneous recovery ("burnt-out cases"); and (2) lepromatous, characterized by lesions and swellings containing numerous bacilli, expecially on the face ("leonine face") and in the upper respiratory tract and vocal cords, with frequent eye-involvement; these so-called open cases are infectious. Often decades after infection, death usually results, not from the disease itself, but from secondary infections and other causes. Until the 20th century, leprosy was thought to be highly contagious and generally incurable.

Elisha Cures Naaman of Leprosy. (@Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

So-called Leprosy in the Bible. Before discussing the Biblical disease that has been traditionally called leprosy, it is good to consider the evidence concerning the existence of genuine leprosy in the ancient world during Biblical times.

Modern medical historians, notably G. Sticker, have disproved often repeated errors concerning leprosy in pre-Christian times that have resulted from mistranslations of generic ancient terms unaccompanied by clinical descriptions. The oldest recognizable reference to Hansen's disease occurs in the Indian medical treatise Sushruta Samhita, compiled in its present recension about 600 B.C., but including more ancient traditional knowledge. The term kushta in the still older Vedas and Laws of Manu designates skin diseases in general. In Chinese medical literature, leprosy is not recognized until 500 to 300 B.C. and clinically described only in A.D. 200 to 300 by Hua T'o.

Of direct relevance to the problem of so-called leprosy in the Bible is the still confused history of Hansen's disease in ancient Egypt. References in the Ebers medical papyrus (c. 1550 B.C.) to sicknesses named aat and uchedu have been mistranslated as leprosy. B. Ebbell's identification of "Chon's swelling" as leprosy has been rejected by leprologists J. Lowe and Dharmendra; G. Grapow, a leading expert on ancient Egyptian medicine, has not thoroughly analyzed the problem. A. Bloom has shown that the terms used by Flavius JOSEPHUS (Contra Apionem, 1.26) and other writers to designate a disease that allegedly afflicted the people of Israel in Egypt under Moses do not refer to leprosy. Bloom also reports no evidence of leprosy in ancient Egyptian statuary and art that clearly depict other sicknesses. As to skeletons and mummies, he records only one case indicating leprosy, but it came from a Christian cemetery of the Christian era. In 1962 V. Møller-Christensen examined 18,000 human remains from ancient Egypt, Palestine, and Europe, but found no trace of Hansen's disease older than c. A.D. 500. Lucretius' reference to elephas morbus (De rerum natura, 6.1112)—if it means genuine leprosy, a disputed point—would prove only that it existed there in the first century B.C., which no one denies.

Evidence of Hansen's disease in the Middle East before the armies of Alexander the Great probably imported it from India is limited to a few references to unidentified skin diseases in Herodotus and in Persian and Babylonian texts. In Palestine, the only hint is a "leonine face" of the Egyptian god Bes on a Canaanite jar of c. 1411 to 1314 B.C. found at Beth-San (Bethshan) in 1925. It would therefore seem probable that cases of Hansen's disease were sporadic rather than endemic in the Near East during the millennium between Moses and Alexander the Great, i.e., in Old Testament times.

In the Old Testament. Concordances list up to 83 references in both the Old Testament and the New Testament to various forms of the Hebrew root sr' and the Greek words λέπρα and λεπρός that are inaccurately translated as leprosy, leper, or leprous in modern Bibles. The root of the Hebrew noun $s\bar{s}ara'at$ that is used in the Old Testament (often accompanied by nega', "blow," "plague") probably means etymologically affliction, prostration, or defilement; hence it designates, according to the context, a condition of ritual or cultic uncleanliness manifested in certain skin disorders and blemishes or in incrustations of fungi or molds in linen, leather, or stones.

Explicit rules for the priests on how to diagnose ṣāra'at in human beings are given in Lv 13.1–46; however, modern translations of clinical terms in that chapter are confusingly disparate. The affliction called sāra'at was diagnosed from the following symptoms: subcutaneous lesions with hairs turning white (Lv 13.3), spreading lesions (Lv 13.7–8), lesions with ulceration (Lv 13.11), secondary infections with ulceration (Lv 13.15), deepseated lesions spreading from a healed ulcer (Lv 13.22) or from the healed scar of a burn (Lv 13.25, 27), spreading lesions on scalp or chin or forehead (Lv 13.30, 36, 43). Superficial local skin infections that improved or failed to spread after a quarantine of a week or two were not considered sāra'at (Lv 13.6, 23, 28, 34, 37, 39). Moreover, a man in whose skin sāra'at developed into a generalized eruption covering the entire body that later healed by desquamation (scaling) was declared clean (Lv 13.12-13,16-17).

Once a man was diagnosed as having $s\bar{a}ra'at$, he had to keep his clothes rent and his head bare, muffling his beard and calling out, "unclean" (Lv 13.45); he was obliged also to dwell outside the camp (Lv 13.45; Nm 5.2; 12.15) or in a separate house (2 Chr 26.21) "as long as the sore is on him" (Lv 13.46). When a priest found that the $s\bar{a}ra'at$ had healed, the man underwent an expiatory rite of purification (Lv 14.1–32). Another rite was prescribed for the purification of houses in which $s\bar{a}ra'at$ of walls had not spread after replastering (Lv 14.49–53).

Nine other passages shed helpful light on the Old Testament concept of sāra'at: Ex 4.6-7 (Moses' hand); Lv 22.4 (disqualification for the priesthood); Nm 5.2 (isolation); Nm 12.9-14 (Miriam); 2 Sm 3.29 (Joab); 2 Kgs 5.1-14, 27 (Naaman and Gehazi); 2 Kgs 7.3-11 (four outcasts of Samaria); 2 Chr 26.17-23; See Also 2 Kgs 15.5 (King Azariah) and Dt 24.8-9, which merely stresses Leviticus ch. 13-14 and Nm 12.10. These texts demonstrate that sāra'at in human beings referred to skin disorders that might be disfiguring and serious (Nm 12.12), and chronic or even lifelong (2 Kgs 7.3;2 Chr 26.21), but they might also be cured or cleansed (Lv 13.12; Lv 14.3; 2 Kgs 5.14). In several instances they are described as a sign (Ex 4.6-7) or punishment (Nm 12.9-10; 2 Sm 3.29; 2 Kgs 5.27; 2 Chr 26.17-23) inflicted by God, as were other maladies (Dt 28.21–22, 27, 35, 59).

As a stain or blemish, ṣāra'at, like other sources of defilement, e.g., touching a corpse (Nm 19.11–22), rendered a person technically "unclean," i.e., temporarily impure or unholy, hence unacceptable in proximity to the ark of the covenant, which could be approached only by the pure and unblemished (see PURE AND IMPURE).

Scholars disagree as to whether ṣāra'at was contagious in a hygienic sense, because of the failure of some to make the necessary distinction between bacterial infection, unknown as such in the Bible, and the cultic concept of uncleanliness. The latter was highly contagious (Leviticus ch. 11–15)—but only among Israelites (Mishnah, Negaim, 3.1). The case of the Gentile Naaman (2 Kgs 5.1) proves that ṣāraʿat was not considered medically infectious. Nevertheless, it is obvious that the Levitical regulations had an effective prophylactic influence.

Almost without exception, modern leprologists agree that the symptoms of sāra'at do not resemble those of Hansen's disease. Stressing the omission of such characteristic features as anesthesia, leonine face, hoarseness, blindness, mutilations, slow evolution, and incurability, leprologists suggest that sāra'at designated skin disorders of various kinds, including leucoderma, vitiligo, psoriasis, eczema, yaws, sycosis or tinea barbae, ringworm of the scalp, or impetigo, as well as fungi and molds. Consequently, they conclude that Hansen's disease is not described in the Old Testament. However, owing to the sporadic presence of genuine leprosy in the Near East in early Old Testament times and its gradual spread in late Old Testament centuries, some of its victims may have been included among those diagnosed as having sāra'at. Incidentally, Job's skin disorder is not called by that name and was probably scabies crustosa, according to H. P. Lie. The passing allusions to sāra'at in the writings of the OUMRAN COMMUNITY and the extended dermatological treatise Negaim in the Mishnah serve to underline the persistence of the cultic aspect.

Of crucial importance to an understanding of $s\bar{a}ra'at$ is the choice of the Greek word $\lambda \epsilon \pi \rho \alpha$ (Latin lepra) by the learned rabbis who made the Greek translation, known as the Septuagint (LXX), of the Pentateuch in the third century B.C. at Alexandria, which was then a Hellenistic scientific center. The Hippocratic and later Greek medical writings apply $\lambda \epsilon \pi \rho \alpha$ to curable scaling skin affections such as vitiligo and psoriasis. The standard Greek term for genuine leprosy, significantly appearing only after 250 B.C. (and not in Hippocrates) was $\dot{\epsilon}\lambda \epsilon - \rho \alpha v \tau i \alpha \sigma i \zeta$, later Latinized as elephantiasis Graecorum.

In the New Testament. Following the pattern of the LXX, $\lambda \hat{\epsilon} \pi \rho \alpha$ was used to designate cases of $s\bar{a}ra'at$ in the New Testament, with a direct reference to the Levitical rules in Mk 1.44 and to Naaman in Lk 4.27. Stressing the cultic aspect, cures were called cleansing (καθαρίζω: Mk 10.8;11.5; Mk 1.40–42: Lk 4.27: 17.14), excepting that of the grateful Samaritan, for whom Luke the physician used healing (ἰάομαι: Lk 17.15). These cleansings were one of the messianic signs (Mt 10.8; 11.5). Of significance for the future was the detail that Jesus ''had compassion on and touched'' the outcast (Mk 1.41; See Also Mt 8.3; Lk 5.13). Also noteworthy was his befriending of "Simon the leper" (Mt 26.6; Mk 14.3). The beggar Lazarus is described as being covered with sores (Lk 16.20), but as with Job, he is not called $\lambda \epsilon \pi \rho \delta \varsigma$ (leprous). Outside the Gospels, there is no mention of any form of leprosy in the New Testament.

Noting that none of the passages in the Gospels supply clinical descriptions, leprologists conclude that the lepra of the New Testament, being the equivalent of the $s\bar{a}ra$ of the Old Testament, was not Hansen's disease. However, it is more probable, since genuine leprosy was endemic in the Near East in the first Christian century, that some of its victims may have been included among those diagnosed as having lepra. In any case, whatever the particular disease was, the instantaneity of the cures effected by Christ testifies to their miraculous nature.

Bibliography: General. V. KLINGMÜLLER, Handbuch der Hautund Geschlechtskrankheiten 10.2 (Berlin 1930) 4-21. K. GRÖN, ibid. 806-842. G. STICKER, ibid. 23 (1931) 264-642. E. JEAN-SELME, La Lèpre (Paris 1934) 9-67. A. WEYMOUTH (I. G. COBB), Through the Leper-squint: A Study of Leprosy from Pre-Christian Times to the Present Day (London 1938). J. LOWE, "Comments on the History of Leprosy," Leprosy Review 18 (1947) 54-64. Antiquity. B. EBBELL, "A Contribution to the Earliest History of Lepro-International Journal of Leprosy 3 (1935) 257–263. DHARMENDRA, "Leprosy in Ancient Indian Medicine," ibid. 15 (1947) 424-430. M. YOELI, "A 'Facies Leontina' of Leprosy on an Ancient Canaanite Jar," ibid. 30 (1962) 211-214. V. MOLLER-CHRISTENSEN, "The Origin and Antiquity of Leprosy," ibid. 31 (1963) 562. A. BLOOM, La Lèpre dans l'ancienne Ègypte et chez les anciens hébreux. La Lèpre dans la Bible (Cairo 1938). H. GRA-POW, Grundriss der Medizin der alten Agypter, 7 v. (Berlin 1954-61). O. K. SKINSNES, "Leprosy in Society," Leprosy Review 35 (1964) 21–35, 106–122, 175–182. Bible. H. P. LIE, "On Leprosy in the Bible," ibid. 9 (1938) 25-31, 55-67. F. C. LENDRUM, "The Name 'Leprosy,'" American Journal of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene 1 (1952) 999-1008. Leprosy and the Bible (pamphlet; London 1961), repr. of four articles from The Bible Translator 11 (1960) 10-23, 69-80, 80-81; 12 (1961) 75-79. R. G. COCHRANE et al., in J. HASTINGS and J. A. SELBIA, eds., Dictionary of the Bible (Edinburgh 1942-50) (1963) (rev. ed. New York 1963) 575-578. W. LEIBRAND, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957-65) 1:1115-16. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1322 - 23.

[R. BROWN]

LE QUIEN, MICHEL

Dominican theologian and historian of the Eastern Church; b. Boulogne-sur-Mer, Oct. 8, 1661; d. Paris, March 12, 1733. After studying at Plessis College, Paris, Le Quien entered the Dominican Order, in which he served as librarian of the convent of Saint-Honoré in Paris and devoted his career to scholarly pursuits. He mastered Hebrew, Greek, and Arabic; assisted scholars; and was a friend of Bernard de MONTFAUCON and the MAURISTS. He published Défense du texte hébreu et de la version Vulgate (Paris 1690), in which he attempted to establish the integrity of the text. In his Panoplia contra schisma Graecorum (Paris 1718), published under the pseudonym Stephanus de Altamura Ponticensis, he took issue with the historical arguments advanced by Patriarch Nectarius of Jerusalem against the papal primacy and opposed the validity of Anglican Orders in a bitter controversy (91725–31) with P. Le Courayer. He produced the still standard though incomplete edition of St. JOHN DAM-ASCENE's Opera omnia (2 v. Paris 1712; Patrologia Graeca v.94-96) and Oriens Christianus (3 v., posthumous, Paris 1740). The latter work is a synthesis of the history of the Oriental patriarchates and bishoprics with an account of the Latin bishops who occupied those sees after the Crusades. His ambitious plan to include in this work the Notitiae episcopatuum and catalogues of the Eastern and African monasteries and of the African hierarchy had to be abandoned. Le Quien also wrote a monograph on Boulogne-sur-Mer and left unfinished an edition of the Opera omnia Leontii Byzantini.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 8.2:2592–96. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:441–443. H. ENGBERDING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:974. S. VAILHÉ, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 9:187–188.

[J. BEAUDRY]

LERCHER, LUDWIG

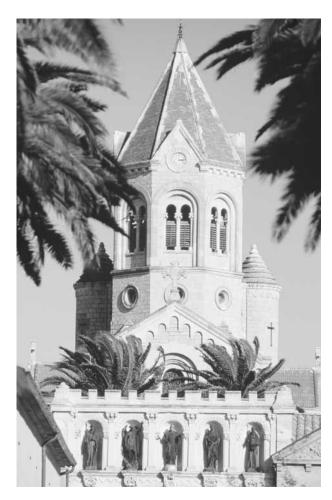

Theologian; b. Hall, Austria, June 30, 1864; d. Innsbruck, Aug. 5, 1937. He became a Jesuit in 1891 and professor of theology at the University of Innsbruck in 1899. Through his lectures and writings he exercised great influence on the formation of the clergy. His chief work, Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae, 4 vols. (Innsbruck 1924–34), combines a solid presentation of theology with an emphasis on its ascetical relevance.

Bibliography: Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v., ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:974. F. LAKNER, ''Die dogmatische Theologie an der Universität Innsbruck, 1857–1957,'' Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 80 (1958): 101–141.

[J. BEUMER]

LÉRINS, ABBEY OF

Cistercian monastery on the island of St. Honoratus, one of a group of islands off the southeast coast of France, opposite Cannes. In about 410 HONORATUS OF

Tower of the Abbey of Lérins. (©John Heseltine/CORBIS)

ARLES and a companion settled on the abandoned and desolate site as hermits. They were joined by other men with similar ideals, and soon a monastic community came into being, probably somewhat similar to a Palestinian laura. Its importance as a spiritual center is attested to by the names of the saints and bishops who were monks or visitors there in the first century of its existence. Among the monks were Maximus and Faustus of Riez, Caesarius and Virgilius of Arles, Eucherius of Lyons, and Lupus of Troyes; among the visitors were Vincent of Lérins, Salvianus of Marseilles, Patrick of Ireland, and Augustine of Canterbury. The early rule, possibly unwritten, in any case has not survived. There are some indications that it strongly influenced St. Benedict when he wrote his Rule, which in its turn was officially adopted by Abbot Aigulf (c. 660). A massacre of the monks (c. 732), when the island was occupied by the Saracens, brought an end to the first period of monastic life at Lérins. A restoration took place when the invaders were driven out (975), and the 11th century was a time of great material and spiritual prosperity. Numerous foundations along the whole Mediterranean coast and to the north spread the heritage of Lérins. This period of prosperity came to an end in 1464 when the pope replaced the regular abbot with a commendatory one. This was a death blow to the moral greatness of the abbey and also prepared its material ruin. One of these commendatory abbots, A. Grimaldi, bishop of Vence, united Lérins to the Italian Cassinese Congregation (1515), but the reformation that might have taken place because of this was impeded by the continual difficulties raised by the French kings and bishops over the foreign affiliation. The abbey was suppressed by royal decree in 1786 and its buildings sold at auction in 1791. In 1859 Monsignor Jordany, bishop of Fréjus, purchased the island and gave it to the Cistercian Congregation of Senanque, which established a community (1871) and eventually its headquarters there. Several remains of the earlier monasteries still exist: the so-called seven chapels, probably going back to very early days; an old cloister from the 8th century; and a defensive tower from the Middle Ages.

Bibliography: H. MORIS, L'Abbaye de Lérins. Histoire et monuments (Paris 1909). H. MORIS and E. BLANC, Cartulaire de l'abbaye de Lérins, 2 v. (Paris 1884–1905). A. C. COOPER-MARSDEN, The History of the Islands of the Lérins . . . (Cambridge, Eng. 1913). C. L. CRISTIANI, Lérins et ses fondateurs (Paris 1946). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 8.2:2596–2627. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés 1:1588–90. D. MISONNE, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche ² 6:975–976.

[C. FALK]

LEROQUAIS, VICTOR MARTIAL

Specialist in liturgical manuscripts; b. Saint-Germain-de-Tallevende, France, Sept. 7, 1875; d. Paris, March 1, 1946. Having studied at Vire and Sommervieu, he studied theology at Saint-Sulpice. Ordained in Paris on June 9, 1900, he became assistant pastor at Lisieux and later (1906-12) pastor of Bény-sur-mer. As he explained the Mass to the children of his parish, he decided to learn more about liturgical manuscripts and to write a history of the Latin Mass. With some difficulty he obtained leave of his bishop, Msgr. Lemonnier, and began to work at the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. Here he remained, apart from trips to provincial libraries. At his own expense, which he met by selling his furniture and books, he published a series of inventories in which he described the Sacramentaries, Breviaries, Pontificals, and Psalters found in French public libraries: Les Sacramentaires et les missels manuscrits des bibliothèques publiques de France (Paris 1924); Les Livres d'heures manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale, 3 v. (Paris 1927); Les Bréviaires manuscrits des bibliothèques publiques de France, 6 v. (Paris 1934); Les Pontificaux manuscrits des bibliothèques de France, 4 v. (Paris 1937). He taught courses at the École Pratique des Hautes Études and gave a series of lectures at the École des Chartes. He was also a member of the Henry Bradshaw Society.

Bibliography: J. LECLERCQ, Revue du moyen-âge latin 2 (1946): 126–128. J. PORCHER, Scriptorium 1 (1946–47): 170–172. F. COMBALUZIER, Ephemerides liturgicae 60 (1946): 389–395.

[N. HUYGHEBAERT]

LE ROY, ALEXANDER

Alexander Le Roy was born (1854) of humble means in Normandy, a farmer's son. An unusually gifted student, he planned to be a parish priest but transferred to the Spiritans, the missionary Congregation of the Holy Ghost (1874), his heart set on Africa. Suddenly, before ordination (1876), his health failed, perhaps explaining his subsequent appointment not to the rigors of Africa but to the classroom: to Réunion in the Indian Ocean (1877), to central France (1878), and to Pondicherry, India (1880). Improved health and a change of Congregational leadership brought a new appointment, and he finally arrived in Bagamoyo, East Africa (1881), bursting with energy and about to develop prodigiously wide-ranging interests.

He doubly liberated African slaves: once freed, they continued the habit of dependency, so he made them responsible for their own farms and livelihood, thus promoting their self-respect. He also traveled widely, making, in his words, "numerous journeys with more or less prolonged sojourns from Somaliland to Mozambique . . . from Kilimanjaro [climbing above 16,500 feet] to the Maasai plains." He was constantly and avidly accumulating information, writing, criticizing the colonial régime, and becoming persona non grata for his pains.

Effectively expelled by the German authorities, he returned to Paris (1892), and was appointed vicar apostolic of the two Guineas (stretching from Sénégal in West Africa to the Cape of Good Hope). Within three years—and with formidable administrative skills—he reorganized the vicariate, only to be elected superior general (1896). For three decades, Le Roy would lead the Spiritans. He had already championed the formation of catechists in his vicariate. His unpublished study The Catechists in the Missions urged lay catechists both to spread the Gospel in a predominantly Islamic society and create Christian communities; and he deemed premature the huge effort to train a native clergy. He also founded the Missionary Sisters of the Holy Ghost (1921) to work across French and Portuguese Africa. As the first superior general with African experience he would leave a distinctively African stamp on the congregation, whose numbers doubled to over 2000 during his tenure.

His encouragement inspired both scholarship and missionary zeal, and he left a rich scholarly legacy. In his fifties he became the first incumbent of the Chair of the History of Religions at the Institut Catholique de Paris (his inaugural lectures becoming his sympathetic and still-in-print textbook The Religion of the Primitives). His bibliography fills ten pages and includes exploration, geography, cartography, ethnology, ethnography, biography and autobiography, including: Le T.R.P Frédéric Le Vavasseur (Paris, n.d); v. 5 of Piolet, J. (editor), Les Missions Catholiques Françaises au XIX siècle; "Le rôle scientifique des missionaires" Anthropos 1 (1906) 3–10; The Religion of the Primitives (New York, 1969); Au Kilema-Ndjaro, 4th Edition (Paris 1928) and Directoire Général des Missions (Paris 1930). Failing health precipitated his resignation (1926), yet Le Roy recovered and enjoyed twelve more years of life. The sickly twentyyear-old survived to be an octogenarian, dying in Paris (1938), aged 84.

Bibliography: E. BAUR and A. LE ROY, Voyage dans L'Oudoé, L'Ouzigoua et L'Ousogara (Tours 1899). H. KOREN, The Spiritans: A History of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost (Pittsburgh 1958).

[A. J. GITTINS]

LE ROY, ÉDOUARD

French Catholic philosopher and mathematician; b. Paris, June 18, 1870; d. Paris, Nov. 1, 1954.

Le Roy developed the evolutionary philosophy of Henri BERGSON in the direction of a Christian "psychistic" idealism, and succeeded to Bergson's chair at the Collège de France in 1921. In holding that theoretical science is only a system of symbols and not a penetration into ultimate reality, he opposed philosophies that tended to substitute abstract concepts for an intuition of life. Even dogmatic statements have a limited function that is negative (to prevent error) and practical (to engender religious attitudes and action). They provide no direct insight into God's inner life. Le Roy believed that, unlike static concepts, life is always on the move. The process of evolution begins with a diffused cosmic energy that is latently psychic; life is manifested when this energy is concentrated in organisms of growing complexity. The biological realm of organisms is transcended when man appears, and thenceforth evolution is continued in the realm of spirit, or the noösphere-while remaining always subject to God's transcendent and continuously creative action. The resulting phenomenology of evolution bears many resemblances, in thought and terminology, to notions later expressed by Le Roy's close friend and associate, Pierre TEILHARD DE CHARDIN.

Bibliography: Works. Dogme et critique (Paris 1907); Les Origines humaines et l'évolution de l'intelligence (Paris 1928); La Pensée intuitive, 2 v. (Paris 1929–30); Le Problème de Dieu (Paris 1930); La Pensée mathématique pare (Paris 1960), posthumously. Literature. I. DANIELE, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1888–90. A. G. SERTILLANGES, Le Christianisme et les philosophies, 2 v. (Paris 1939–41) 2:402–419.

[J. M. SOMERVILLE]

LES DUNES, ABBEY OF

Former Cistercian abbey (Latin, Dunae), located near Coxyde, Belgium, in the former Diocese of Thérouanne (presently the Diocese of Bruges). This abbey, founded in 1107 by the hermit Léger, was attached c. 1120 to the Norman Abbey of SAVIGNY. The abbot Fulk, successor of Léger, placed the monastery under St. BER-NARD and retired to CLAIRVAUX. Under the administration of the abbot, Bl. Idesbald, the abbey gained many domains along the coast. The abbot of Les Dunes was chief of the wateringues; that is, he had charge of the maintenance of the dikes. From Les Dunes, Clairmarais, near Saint-Omer, and TER DOEST, not far from Bruges, were founded. The abbey raised sheep for their wool. At the beginning of the 13th century a new monastery was built for a community of 400 religious. During the 16th century, because of the wars and internal strife, the abbey faced serious financial difficulties. In 1566 and 1578 the abbey was ravaged by Protestants. Abbot Bernard Campmans (1623-42) transferred the community to a new monastery at Bruges, from which the monks were evicted by the French Revolution. Since 1841 the abbey buildings have housed the major seminary of Bruges. Recent excavations at Coxyde have brought to light a large part of the monastery.

Bibliography: A. BUT, Cronica et cartularium monasterii de Dunis, ed. F. VAN DE PUTTE (Bruges 1864); Cronica abbatum monasterii de Dunis (Bruges 1839). Statuta capitulorum generalium ordinis cisterciensis, ed. J. M. CANIVEZ, 8 v. (Louvain 1933–41). L. JANAUSCHEX, Origines Cistercienses (Vienna 1877) 51. M. A. DIMIER, "L'Église de l'abbaye des Dunes," Bulletin monumental 112 (1954) 243–251; Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 14:1039–1044. J. DE VINCENNES, L'abbaye des Dunes: Saint Idesbald (Charleroi 1956). P. SCHITTEKAT, Sous les dunes de Coxyde (Brussels 1960). A. JANSSENS DE BISTHOVEN, De abdij van de Duinen te Brugge (Bruges 1963).

[M. A. DIMIER]

LE SENNE, RENÉ

French philosopher; b. Elbeuf-sur-Seine, July 8, 1882; d. Paris, Oct. 1, 1954. He was a student at the École Normale Supérieure in 1903 and agrégé at the University of Paris in 1906; he defended his dissertation for a doctorate of letters in 1930. He then taught at the Lycée Louisle-Grand, was named professor at the Sorbonne in 1942, and was admitted to the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques in 1948. With Louis LAVELLE he established the collection Philosophie de l'Esprit in 1934; he also directed the Logos and Caractères collections of the Presses Universitaires de France and presided at the International Institute of Philosophy in 1952 and 1953.

His thought is dialectical, like that of O. Hamelin (1856–1907), whose method he reformed and enlarged. It begins with relation and not with being, as does Lavelle's, and seeks not so much an explanation of the world as salvation of the person. The privileged relation for Le Senne is duty, to which he devoted his doctoral dissertation (Le Devoir, Paris 1930); dialectic itself is a duty, as duty is a dialectic. Duty encroaches upon intelligence, but man must allow himself to be stimulated by contradiction everywhere and surmount it. "At the provocation of the irrational," he writes, "the self answers with courage." This courage must be inventive, for the work of awareness never ends; it cannot establish itself alongside Infinity, which unceasingly moves reflection and makes it pass alternately from an obstacle to a value (Obstacle el Valeur, Paris 1934). This is why the moral treatise he published presents both exemplary lives, such as those of Socrates and Jesus, and analyses of concepts (Traité de morale générale, Paris 1942).

Le Senne opposed reasoning to lived experience; yet the opposition he referred to as "the ideo-existential relation" is a call to live thought and to think life. Value thus reaches man from two directions, each of which preserves the image of the other. A sort of refraction, or diffraction, of value into life follows this; it is manifested by a "double cogito"—reflection, surpassing its given determinations, centers itself in the self and in God. There is no self without God and no God without self, except asymptotically.

Le Senne's vision of the world is harsher than that of Lavelle; he insists on the interhuman bond, but on condition of seeing in it a work in common rather than a mystical intimacy. The opacity and the conflicts of nature contaminate value itself, as one sees in the example of war, where hostility rests on the devotion of each belligerent to one same value, that of country. There is no solution to this APORIA except an increasing fidelity to the solidarity itself of values. Thence the condemnation of all fanaticisms, not because they are intense but because they are exclusive; thence also the refusal to give privilege to any particular value, not even charity. God alone is the perfectly determining and indeterminable value for all determined values. Even in future life Le Senne seemed to await a sort of perpetual purgatory that made him say: "To die is to move one's furniture."

Besides his philosophical work, Le Senne is note-worthy for his interest in characterology (Traité de caractérologie, Paris 1946). He conceived of character as the mental skeleton of man and not as a bundle of virtualities that could be equated with his person. He also rethought and deepened the distinction G. Heymans (1857–1930) proposed between primary character, which is changeable, and secondary character, which retains all the reverberation that goes on within it.

Bibliography: C. ROSSO, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice- Rome 1957) 2:1891–1894. G. BERGER, Notice sur la vie et les travaux de René Le Senne, 1882–1954 (Paris 1956). J. PAUMEN, Le Spiritualisme existentiel de René Le Senne (Paris 1949).

[M. NÉDONCELLE]

LESEUR, ÉLISABETH

Spiritual writer; b. Paris, Oct. 16, 1866; d. Paris, May 3, 1914. She was the eldest of five children of a cultivated background, and attended a small private school. In July of 1889 she married Félix Leseur, a doctor who had lost his faith through reading the fashionable atheist literature then current in France. To unsettle his wife's moderate Catholicism, he gave her Renan's Vie de Jésus. Paradoxically, the book awakened her dormant faith, and her Spiritual Journal begins at this point.

Adopting as her motto, "Each soul that perfects itself perfects the world," she proceeded to make her life ever more ascetic, interior, and hidden. Her greatest trial arose from the fact that Félix, whom she deeply loved, did not share her spiritual adventure. Her apostolate was an indirect one: she never preached and never sought religious discussion. The hallmarks of her dealings with souls were affability, delicacy, silence, and individual encounter.

Since childhood she had suffered from hepatitis, and she was often forced to receive visitors from a chaise longue. In March of 1911, she offered her life for Félix's conversion. Soon after, her illness was diagnosed as generalized cancer and she died at the age of 48 with no apparent sign of change in Félix.

In 1917, however, her husband was reconciled to the faith and, at the age of 62 he was ordained a Dominican priest, thus fulfilling Élisabeth's prophecy that he would one day be "Père Leseur." He spoke throughout Europe and frequently referred to her Journal, which had been published in 1917. He died in February of 1950.

Her cause for beatification has been introduced in Rome.

Bibliography: M. L. HERKING, Elisabeth Leseur Nous Parle (Paris 1955). J. VERBILLION, "The Silent Apostolate of Elizabeth Leseur," Cross and Crown 11 (1959): 28-45.

[J. VERBILLION]

LESOTHO, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Kingdom of Lesotho is located in Africa, completely surrounded by the Republic of SOUTH AFRICA. A mountainous region, it consists of highland plateaus, rising to hills and thence to mountains at its perimeter. Featuring a temperate climate, Lesotho's natural resources consist primarily of water and pasture land from which its small farming concerns raise corn, wheat, barley, sheep and goats. Between 45 and 65 percent of the adult male labor force travel to South Africa to work in the mines, sending home a portion of their pay to their families. Lesotho also has a small reserve of diamonds, as well as small quantities of minerals.

Welded together from scattered Basotho tribes by Chief Moshesh in 1820, Lesotho resisted European claims until 1871, when it was annexed to the Cape Town colony. From 1884 to 1966 it was a British protectorate administered by a high commissioner, together with SWAZILAND and BOTSWANA (formerly Bechuanaland). Following over two decades of military rule, the region established a constitutional government in 1993. Lesotho is inhabited primarily by a single tribe, the Basotho, which has helped it maintain peace.

History. The first Catholic mission was established in 1862 by the OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE from the Vicariate Apostolic of Natal. Having sought the help of the British as a means of avoiding Dutch incursions, Basuto Chief Moshesh welcomed them and chose the site for the mission, later called Roma, which benefited from the efforts of Father Joseph Gerard (beatified 1988). The Prefecture Apostolic of Basutoland, created in 1894, became a vicariate apostolic in 1909. In 1924 the Oblates established at Roma a seminary, and in 1945, Pius XII University College. In 1951, when the South African hierarchy was established, the vicariate became the diocese of Maseru. In 1961 Maseru was made an archdiocese and metropolitan see for Basutoland, its first archbishop the great-grandson of Moshesh. In 1963 the University College became nondenominational, but the Oblates remained in charge of Pius XII College.

Capital: Maseru. Size: 11,716 sq. miles. Population: 2,143,140 in 2000.

Languages: Sesotho, English, Zulu, Xhosa.

Religions: 1,114,440 Catholics (52%), 107,160 Muslims (5%), 642,780 Protestants (30%), 27,860 without religious affiliation. Archdiocese: Maseru, with suffragans Leribe, Mohale's Hoek, and Qacha's Nek.

In 1959 the Church helped to found the Basotholand National Party (BNP), which was instrumental in the region's move toward independence. In 1966 Lesotho became an independent constitutional monarchy, its national assembly working with the region's tribal chiefs. By the late 1970s, under BNP leadership, Lesotho was able to stabilize its economy, but strains on its small economy increased due to the steady influx of South African refugees seeking escape from their country's racist apartheid policies; Lesotho's international airline flights were not subject to the scrutiny or control of South African police. A military government gained power in 1986, whereupon the national assembly was dissolved and replaced by a military council that ruled with the king. A democratic constitution was enacted in a bloodless coup in 1991 and elections held two years later.

In addition to its active role in the nation's health care system, one of the reasons for the predominance of the Catholic faith in the region was the early establishment of a network of Church-run schools, which by 2000, with over 490 primary and 75 secondary schools, accounted for 75 percent of all schools in the country. Lesotho's bishops were members of the South African Bishops' Conference, an organization that worked diligently to bring about racial peace and justice in the whole region. Theological disputes between Catholic and Lesotho's evangelical Protestant leaders made ecumenical efforts rare, although during a 1996 ad limina visit with Pope John Paul II the bishops were exhorted to engage in such outreach.

By 2000 there were 78 parishes tended by over 50 diocesan and 80 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 45 brothers and 600 sisters, who cared in particular for those families whose breadwinner's worked in South Africa. Beginning in the mid-20th century, the Church in Lesotho adopted some elements of local culture, such as tribal call-and-response singing, in its services and performed services in the native language. The pope urged that such "inculturation" be controlled so that Church doctrine be interpreted correctly. Catholics continued to wield political influence at the beginning of the 21st century, due to both their relative affluence and their position as a majority voice in the dominant BNP.

Bibliography: W. E. BROWN, The Catholic Church in South Africa, ed. M. DERRICK (New York 1960) 207–223. Annuario Pontificio (1965) 235, 266. Bilan du Monde, 2:120–123. For additional bibliography, see AFRICA.

[J. E. BRADY/EDS.]

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM

German critic, dramatist, leading exponent of the Aufklärung; b. Kamenz, in Oberlausitz (Saxony), Jan. 22, 1729; d. Braunschweig, Feb. 15, 1781. He was the son of a Lutheran pastor and attended the celebrated school of St. Afra in Meissen (1741–46). He then entered the University of Leipzig, where, at the wish of his father, he studied first theology, then medicine. But his main interest was in philosophy and literature. His early play, Der junge Gelehrte, was produced at Leipzig in 1748 by the company of actors under the direction of Caroline Neuber (1697–1760). When this company failed in the same year, Lessing, who had become surety for its debts, fled to Berlin to escape his creditors. There he again wrote plays: Der Freigeist (1749), under the influence of the French comedy, and Die Juden (1749), which foreshadowed the themes of his later play Nathan der Weise. He also became a literary and dramatic critic; his essays were published in the short-lived journal Beiträge zur Historie und Aufnahme des Theaters (1749–50; with Christlob Mylius, 1752–54), the Berliner Privilegierte Zeitung, and the Vossische Zeitung and its supplement, Das Neueste aus dem Reiche des Witzes, of which he was editor in 1751.

In 1751–52, after having studied for his master's degree in Wittenberg, Lessing was again in Berlin, where he published the first volumes of his collected works (Schriften, 6 v., 1753–55, which included the lyrics and epigrams originally published as Kleinigkeiten in 1751). Lessing's second review of drama, Die theatralische Bibliothek, was published from 1754 to 1758. In collaboration with Moses Mendelssohn (1729-86) he published Pope, ein Metaphysiker! (1755), an essay that defines the distinct roles of poet and philosopher. He frequently changed his residence in the following years: he was at Leipzig (1755–58), where he formed a close friendship with the poet Ewald Christian von Kleist (1715-59); at Berlin (1758-60); Breslau (1760-64), as secretary to the governor, General Tauentzien; Berlin (1765-67); Hamburg (1767-68); and in Italy (1768-70). In 1770 he accepted the position of court librarian at Wolfenbüttel in Braunschweig, where, except for a visit to Vienna and Italy in 1775, he remained until his death. In 1776 he married a widow, Eva König, who died in childbirth the following year.

Influence as Critic. Lessing, in whom the German ENLIGHTENMENT found its culmination and German classicism its most eminent precursor and teacher, has been called the foremost critic of his time. His essay on the nature of the fable, prefixed to the collected edition of his Fabeln (1759), distinguishes the kinds of action proper to fable, drama, and epic. Perceptive criticisms of contemporary authors, among them Klopstock and Wieland, are to be found in the 54 letters he contributed to the journal Briefe, die neueste Literatur betreffend, published in Berlin (1759–65), with Moses Mendelssohn and Friedrich Nicolai (1733-1811), the latter a bookseller and writer of rationalistic literature. Especially noteworthy is the seventeenth letter, in which Lessing strove to free German literature from its subjection to the artificial rules of French pseudoclassicism by reinterpreting the classical tradition of the ancients and pointing the way to a proper appreciation of Shakespeare. In Laokoon oder Über die Grenzen der Malerei und Poesie (1766) he defined the boundaries between the plastic arts, which portray objects in space, and literature, which portrays events in time.

As dramatic critic of the newly established National Theater in Hamburg, Lessing published the Hamburgische Dramaturgie (1767-68). Intended originally as a series of reviews of plays performed at the National Theater, these essays became in point of fact vehicles for the expression of Lessing's own dramatic theory, which, though largely derivative, exerted a major influence on 18th-century drama in Germany and in Europe generally. In them he again strove to break the tyranny of French pseudoclassicism in Germany and to create a German national drama based on a correct interpretation of Aristotle's dramatic theory of the unities. Out of Lessing's feud with the antiquarian Christian Adolf Klotz (1738-71), professor at the University of Halle, arose the *Briefe an*tiquarischen Inhalts (1768-69) and the admirable essay Wie die Alten den Tod gebildet (1769).

Dramatic Work. Lessing's interest in the theater was not confined to criticism. Besides the plays already mentioned, he is author of a one-act tragedy Philotas (1759) and of the more important Miss Sara Sampson (1755), the first significant tragedy of middle-class life (bürgerliches Trauerspiel) in German literature. Based on English models (especially George Lillo's Merchant of London, 1731), this play gave practical expression to Lessing's revolt against Johann Christoph Gottsched (1700-66), the chief patron of French pseudoclassicism in Germany. In Minna von Barnhelm (1767), a play whose setting was the Seven Years' War, Lessing wrote the first German national drama of modern times, the first play in which a soldier (the hero, Major von Tellheim) has an honorable role. It is also the first masterpiece of German comedy, in which the comedy has its logical source in the events themselves, and the events in the characters who portray them; it is still popular in Germany. Lessing likewise gave Germany its first political tragedy, Emilia Galotti (1772), an indictment of corruption and immorality among the petty princes of absolutism.

Lessing's last drama, Nathan der Weise (1779), belongs more properly among the theological polemics precipitated by his publication, in Beiträge zur Geschichte und Literatur (1773–81), of selections from the Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes by Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768). To the ensuing controversy between orthodoxy and rationalism belong Lessing's Anti-Goeze (1778), a rebuttal of his most vehement opponent, the Hamburg pastor Johann Melchior Goeze (1717–86), and Nathan der Weise, in which Gotthold Ephraim Lessing.

Lessing, forbidden by the Braunschweig government to continue his strife with orthodoxy, returned to his "old pulpit," the stage, and pleaded for religious tolerance; the play's parable of the three rings reflects his rejection of the concept of one true religion. Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (1780) is an essay that contains his doctrine of an organic religious evolution away from revealed religion and toward a future rational religion to succeed Judaism and Christianity. Ernst und Falk: Gespräche für Freimaurer (1777, 1780) is a group of five dialogues in which Lessing renewed his plea for religious and political tolerance. Mention should be made also of the volume of Rettungen (1753–54), in which Lessing sought to vindicate earlier victims of theological bigotry, and of the publication of a previously unknown manuscript of BERENGARIUS OF TOURS, a work Lessing found in the Wolfenbüttel library.

Bibliography: Works. First ed. by his brother K. G. LESSING et al., 31 v. (Berlin 1771–1825); ed. K. LACHMANN, 13 v. (Berlin 1838–40); ed. W. STAMMLER, 2 v. (Munich 1959); ed. H. KESTEN, 2 v. (Frankfurt 1962). Studies. K. G. LESSING, ed., Gotthold Ephraim Lessings Leben nebst seinem noch übrigen literarischen Nachlasse, 3 v. (Berlin 1793–95). J. SIME, Lessing: His Life and Writings, 2 v. (London 1877). E. SCHMIDT, Lessing: Geschichte seines Lebens und seiner Schriften, ed. F. SCHULTZ, 2 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1923). H. KESTEN, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing: Ein deutscher Moralist (Mainz 1960). W. KOSCH, Deutsches Literatur-Lexikon, ed. B. BERGER

(Bern 1963) 246-248. H. B. GARLAND, Lessing: The Founder of Modern German Literature (2d ed. New York 1962).

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

LESSIUS, LEONARD

Theologian; b. Brecht near Antwerp, Oct. 1, 1554; d. Louvain, Jan. 15, 1623. His family name was Leys. The early loss of his parents produced in him a sobriety and profound introversion that were to last throughout his life and to give impetus to his proclivity toward prayer and serious study. Destined by his uncle for a career in business, Leonard instead won a scholarship at the University of Louvain at the age of 13. There he took courses in arts and philosophy, preparatory to becoming a Jesuit. He distinguished himself by winning the first place in his class. In June of 1572 he was assigned to teach philosophy at the College of Douai. At the same time he began to study theology on his own initiative. He was ordained in 1580 and made prefect of studies at Douai the following year. Later, he was given a sabbatical in Liège and then sent to Rome, where he continued his theological studies under Bellarmine and Suárez. Returning to Belgium in 1584, he taught theology at the University of Louvain. There he shocked some of the older professors by substituting in his classes the Summa of St. Thomas for the customary Liber Sententiarum of Peter Lombard.

From 1564 one of the professors at the university, Michael du Bay (Baius), had been teaching a doctrine suspected by some as being tainted with heresy (see BAIUS AND BAIANISM). When some of Lessius' lectures had a tone quite antithetic to the ideas of their master, Baius's followers presented a garbled version of the young Jesuit's theses to the university authorities for scrutiny. Lessius was accused of reviving SEMI-PELAGIANISM. At the instigation of P. Tolet, the university issued a condemnation of 31 of the supposed propositions of Lessius. In 1586 Lessius published his Theses theologicae, in which he defended the doctrine he was really teaching. A bitter quarrel between the Baianists and Jesuits ensued; Lessius maintained such composure that even his opponents were constrained to express their admiration for him. Eventually, at the request of Sixtus V (d. 1590), the doctrine of Lessius was examined by a commission of theologians and found to be in accord with Catholic dogma.

During his lifetime as a teacher, Lessius published a great number of works, many of which went through several editions even in various languages. Most famous of all was his treatise De justitia et jure (Louvain 1605). The book deals in great detail with the morality of contracts, buying and selling, fair prices, wages, market manipulations, problems of exchange, exploitation of newly discovered lands and their resources, etc. Outstanding in this work was the then novel opinion that taking of interest on loans of money is not in itself sinful. The division of Christianity through the multiplication of sects did not escape his notice or pen; on this question he wrote Quae fides et religio sit capessenda (Antwerp 1609). He also compiled a theological treatise De providentia numinis et animi immortalitate (Antwerp 1613). Lessius' masterful defense of papal authority is not extant today because his superiors, fearful of confiscation and reprisals by the king of France, restricted the circulation of this work.

His defense of MOLINISM in his famous work on efficacious grace, De gratia efficaci (Antwerp 1610), caused quite a controversy among the Jesuits (See GRACE, EFFICACIOUS). At first the book was approved by the Jesuit general's office, but later Aquaviva, the Jesuit general, censured it because it failed to distinguish clearly enough the difference between sufficient and efficacious grace. In virtue of holy obedience Lessius was commanded by the general to emend his original text in accordance with propositions dictated to him by Aquiviva. Lessius complied.

Representative of Lessius' spirituality is his little series of meditations called De summo bono et aeterna beatitudine hominis (Antwerp 1620). His cause for beatification has been introduced.

Bibliography: C. H. CHAMBERLAIN, "Leonard Lessius," Jesuit Thinkers of the Renaissance, ed. G. SMITH (Milwaukee 1939). C. VAN SULL, Léonard Lessius, S.J. (Louvain 1930). R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:981–982. C. SOMMERVOGEL, et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:1726–1751. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:453–454; 7.2:2135–2145.

[C. MEYER]

LESTONNAC, JEANNE DE, ST.

Foundress of the COMPANY OF MARY (ODN); b. Bordeaux, France, 1556; d. there, Feb. 2, 1640. She was the niece of the philosopher Michel de MONTAIGNE. Jeanne married Gaston de Montferrand in 1573 and bore seven children. In 1603, six years after her husband's death, she entered the Cistercian convent at Les Feuillants, Toulouse. Her health failed after ten months, and she left the convent upon the advice of her superiors. She then devoted herself to charitable works in which she was joined by several friends. From this group she founded her religious congregation for the education of girls, approved by PAUL V in 1607. Mother de Lestonnac governed the congregation until 1622 when, through malicious gossip, she was discredited and replaced as superior. After bearing this trial and subsequent humiliations with heroic patience and confidence in God, she was vindicated in 1624. Her last years were devoted to assisting new foundations and to revising the order's constitutions. She was buried in Bordeaux, but her body was found preserved in 1822 at the solemn translation of her remains. She was declared venerable in 1834, beatified by LEO XIII on Sept. 23, 1900, and canonized by PIUS XII on May 15, 1949.

Feast: Feb. 2.

Bibliography: P. HOESL, In the Service of Youth, tr. J. CARR (London 1951). V. MERCIER, La Vénérable Jeanne de Lestonnac (Paris 1891). F. SOURY-LAVERGNE, Chemin d'éducation: sur les traces de Jeanne de Lestonnac (Chambray 1985). C. TESTORE, Ste. Giovanna de Lestonnac di Montferrant-Landiras (Rome 1949).

[M. G. MCNEIL]

LE TELLIER, CHARLES MAURICE

Archbishop of Reims; b. Turin, 1643; d. Reims, February 22, 1710. His father was the chancellor Michel, and his brother François, the Marquis of Louvois. From his childhood an ecclesiastical career was planned for him. From the time of his ordination, he expressed strong Gallican views. At the age of 25 he was named coadjutor of François Barberini, Archbishop of Reims, and at 28 he became Barberini's successor. Further honors included his being named a councilor of state in 1679 and a commander of the Order of the Holy Spirit in 1688. As a very active Gallican, he opposed the Jesuits. His library of more than 50,000 volumes was renowned; this he bequeathed to the abbey of Sainte-Genéviève. He presided over the general assembly of the French clergy in 1700. Most of his writings deal with diocesan administration, but he wrote also against the Molinists and Jansenists. He administered his diocese excellently. Contemporaries describe him as haughty. His manuscripts are collected in the Bibliothèque Nationale, having been given in 1718 by his nephew to the King's library.

Bibliography: J. GILLET, Charles-Maurice Le Tellier, archevêque-duc de Reims (Paris 1881). H. J. P. FISQUET, La France pontificale, 21 v. (Paris 1864–73) 14:190–193. L. DE R. SAINT-SIMON, The Memoirs of the Duke of Saint-Simon, tr. B. ST. JOHN, 4 v. in 2 (New York 1936). Biographie universelle, ed. L. G. MICHAUD, 45 v. (Paris 1843–65) 24:358–359. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 9.1:454–456.

[D. R. CAMPBELL]

LE TELLIER, MICHEL

Confessor of King LOUIS XIV, theologian; b. Vire, France, Dec. 16, 1643; d. La Flèche, France, Sept. 2, 1719. Though he published significant books between 1685 and 1708, his historical importance was a result of his influence upon King Louis XIV after 1708. He entered the Jesuits in 1661, and for 28 years taught humanities, philosophy, and biblical exegesis at Louisle-Grand in Paris. He became rector of this college. He was Jesuit provincial when, in 1708, he was chosen as the king's confessor after Father La Chaise's death. Before this he had written in defense of Jesuit practices in China in allowing Confucian rites to their Chinese converts. He wrote also against JANSENISM and against Pasquier Quesnel's Reflexions morales; and he was associated with the publication of the Mémoires de Trevoux. It was at his insistence that the king ordered Port-Royal destroyed. He also worked to bring about the condemnation of Quesnel's book in Rome and to obtain the publication of the bull Unigenitus in France. He was openly hostile to Cardinal Louis Antoine de NOAILLES. Upon Louis XIV's death, he was sent first to Amiens, then to La Flèche. Harsh judgments of him were written by the Jansenists, by partisans of the Duke of Orleans, and by Saint-Simon.

Bibliography: L. ANDRÉ, Les Sources de l'histoire de France, XVIIe siècle (Paris 1932). A. BROU, Les Jésuites de la légende, 2 v. (Paris 1906–07). G. PLANTAVIT DE LA PAUSE, Lettres sur le confessorat du Père Le Tellier, ed. I. DE RECALDE (Paris 1922). C. SOMMERVOGEL et al. Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 7:1911–1919. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:456–458. L. DE R. SAINT-SIMON, The Memoirs of the Duke of Saint-Simon, tr. B. ST. JOHN, 4 v. in 2 (New York 1936).

[D. R. CAMPBELL]

LE THORONET, ABBEY OF

Former Cistercian abbey of Provence, France, founded in 1136 in the Diocese of Fréjus by Raymond Bérenger, count of Barcelona and marquis of Provence. The monks came from Mazan in the region of Viviers and settled first in Tourtour. The abbey took the name of Florège and was later transferred to nearby Thoronet. On the island of Porquerolles an abbey founded from Thoronet was destroyed by the Saracens in 1160. During the 16th-century THIRTY YEARS' WAR the monks temporarily left the abbey. During the French Revolution the monastery was suppressed and the buildings were sold. The most famous abbot was Bl. Fulk, a former troubadour, who became bishop of Toulouse in 1205. In 1854 the French government purchased the buildings and restored them.

Bibliography: L. ROSTAN, "Étude d'archéologie comparée: trois abbayes de l'Ordre de Cîteaux, Silvacane, Thoronet, Senanque," Bulletin monumental, 18 (1852) 111–121. M. AUBERT, "L'Abbaye du Thoronet," Congrès archéologique de France 95

(1932) 224–243. R. BÉRENGUIER, L'Abbaye cistercienne du Thoronet (Lille 1955). M. A. DIMIER and J. PORCHER, L'Art cistercien (Paris 1962).

[M. A. DIMIER]

LEUBUS, ABBEY OF

Cistercian monastery near Wohlau, Silesia, Diocese of Breslau. It was founded in 1150 as a Polish Benedictine monastery and was taken over by CISTERCIANS from PFORTA in 1163. In about 1175 the Romanesque church was consecrated. The Gothic monastery church and prince's chapel were constructed between 1300 and 1340; and the baroque renovation, distinguished by the magnificent paintings of Michael Willmann (d. 1706), dates from the period, 1695 to 1740, after the destruction of the monastery by the Swedes (1632). The harmony of its style and the grand scale on which it was built (it measured almost 800 feet across the front) make it a remarkable example of German BAROQUE. The hall of princes and the library with their magnificent paintings and stucco work are especially important. Leubus was a significant cultural center and as such contributed to the Germanization of Silesia. Several foundations were made from Leubus: Mogila near Cracow (1222), Heinrichau (1227), and Kamenz in Silesia (1239). The monks splendidly illuminated their manuscripts, antiphonals, graduals, and missals (13th and 14th century, now in the city library of Breslau) and influenced, to a great extent, the development of Silesian engraving. In 1810 the monastery was suppressed by King Frederick William III of Prussia and became a mental institution. Since 1945 the monastery and church (which were plundered) have stood empty.

Bibliography: Sources. J. G. BÜSCHING, Die Urkunden des Klosters Leubus (Breslau 1821). W. WATTENBACH, Monumenta Lubensia (Breslau 1861). Literature. F. HANUS, Die ältere Geschichte der Zisterzienser-Abtei Leubus in Schlesien bis zur Mitte des 14. Jahrhunderts (New York 1947). G. GRUNDMANN, Schlesische Barockkirchen und Klöster (Lindau 1958).

[A. SCHNEIDER]

LEUREN, PETER

Canonist; b. Cologne, Germany, May 13, 1646; d. Coblenz, Germany, Nov. 16, 1723. On April 13, 1633, he joined the Society of Jesus. He received his doctorate in theology at Treves, Germany (1679). He was named rector of the Jesuit College in Coblenz. The following are his principal works about Canon Law: Forum beneficiale (Cologne 1704), a complete study on the law of benefices; Vicarius episcopalis (Cologne 1708; Venice 1709), a treatise on the practical problems of the vicar-general; and Forum ecclesiasticum (Mainz 1717; Augsburg 1720; Venice 1729; Augsburg 1757), a general presentation of Canon Law according to the teaching of ancient and modern authors.

Bibliography: J. FOLLIET, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:419. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80; repr. Graz 1956) 3.1:155–156.

[L. R. KOZLOWSKI]

LEUTFRED (LEUFROY), ST.

Founder of the abbey of La Croix–Saint–Ouen (later, La Croix–Saint–Leufroy) of Évreux; d. 738. Born of good parentage near Évreux, he studied at Chartres at the suggestion of St. OUEN. After a short teaching career, he suddenly left his family and went to live at the monastery of Cailly under the direction of a hermit. Finally, having gone to Rouen, he put himself under the direction of the Irish monk Sidonius, from whom he received the monastic habit. He became the friend of St. Ansbert. After returning to his own country, he ruled the house he had founded until his death. In 851 his relics were translated for the first time; later during the 9th century, when the monks had to flee the Normans, they carried the relics to the church of SAINT–GERMAIN–DES–PRÉS (PARIS). In 1222 they were again brought to the La Croix–Saint–Ouen.

Feast: June 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 5:91–100. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 7.1:1–18. M. COENS, Analecta Bollandiana 41(1923) 442–446. J. B. MESNEL, Saint Leufray, abbé de la Croix, fasc. 6 of Les Saints du diocèse d'Évreux (Évreux 1912–81). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige 2:343. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 6:339–341. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 2:610.

[É. BROUETTE]

LE VACHER, JEAN

French missionary and consul, martyred in North Africa; b. Écouen, France, March 15, 1619; d. Algiers, July 28, 1683. After being ordained in the Congregation of the Mission in 1647, he was sent the same year by St. VINCENT DE PAUL as a missionary to the Christian slaves in Tunis. During his stay in North Africa, he was French consul in Tunis from 1648 to 1653 and from 1657 to 1666, becoming prefect apostolic of Tunis in 1648, vicar apostolic of Tunis in 1650, and vicar-general of Carthage in 1651.

After spending two years in France, he returned to Algiers in 1668 and was named vicar apostolic of Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, and Morocco; in 1677, he became French consul in Algiers. His life of apostolic heroism in Africa terminated when a French force bombarded Algiers in 1683. Le Vacher refused firmly to renounce his faith and was bound to the mouth of a cannon, which was then fired. Beatification proceedings began on July 6, 1923.

Bibliography: L. MISERMONT, Le Plus grand des premiers missionaires de saint Vincent de Paul (Paris 1935). R. STREIT and J. DINDINGER, Bibliotheca missionum (Freiburg 1916–) 16:728–733, 924.

[M. A. ROCHE]

LEVADOUX, MICHAEL

Missionary; b. Clermont in Auvergne, France, April 1, 1746; d. Puy, France, Jan. 13, 1815. He entered the Society of Saint-Sulpice at Paris in 1774 and taught at the seminary in Limoges until 1791. When John CARROLL decided to establish the first American seminary in Baltimore, Md. (1791), under Sulpician direction, Levadoux sailed from Saint Malo with the first group of Sulpicians sent by their superior general, Jacques André Emery. As treasurer, Levadoux assisted in the administration of St. Mary's Seminary for one year. In June of 1792 Carroll assigned Levadoux to do missionary work in Illinois. For four years with the help of another Sulpician, Gabriel RICHARD, Levadoux ministered to the French settlements at Cahokia, Kaskaskia, and Prairie du Rocher. When the Catholic Church in Michigan became part of the Baltimore jurisdiction, Carroll transferred Levadoux to Detroit (1796) as pastor of St. Anne's parish. Ill health forced Levadoux to leave Detroit in the spring of 1802, and after a year's residence at St. Mary's in Baltimore, he returned to France.

Bibliography: G. W. PARÉ, The Catholic Church in Detroit, 1701–1888 (Detroit 1951). P. K. GUILDAY, The Life and Times of John Carroll, 2 v. (New York 1927).

[T. O. WOOD]

LEVI BEN GERSON

Jewish philosopher, physician, and astronomer, known also as Ralbag, Gersonide, and Master Leo of Bagnols (Languedoc); b. Orange, France, 1288; d. 1344. He spent his life alternately in Orange, Perpignan, and Avignon, where the popes were residing. He is the most famous teacher of the philosophical school that followed the spirit initiated by MAIMONIDES, as well as the best among the Jewish writers of the fourteenth century. Although he had talent for the theological, natural, medical, astronomical, and speculative sciences, he became outstanding by virtue of his writings about religious philosophy and exegesis.

His first works are The Book on Comparison and The Book of Numbers, but his masterpiece has the title Wars of the Lord, which his detractors called Wars Against the Lord because of some slightly rationalistic tendencies in its author. Gerson's principal philosophical ideas reside particularly in this work. The subjects treated are numerous and diversified: the immortality of the soul, prophecy, God's omniscience, providence, the heavenly bodies, and creation. The book also contains a whole treatise on astronomy, the calculations and observations of which make him a precursor of Kepler.

Despite edifying reflections, Gerson's exegesis has a pronounced rationalistic flavor inasmuch as it does violence to biblical texts and Jewish beliefs in order to adapt them to Aristotelian philosophy. This is quite different from the procedure of St. Thomas Aquinas, who in the preceding century had adapted the same philosophy to Christian dogma. More precisely, Gerson was interested especially in reconciling religion and philosophy by proceeding, not with the hypotheses of Maimonides, but with an impartial and purely critical spirit cleansed of all religious prejudice. He anticipated Spinoza, who also would seek the truth for its own sake and outside of every historical consideration. "Our law," Gerson said, "is not despotic. It does not seek to make us accept error as though it were truth. It seeks especially to lead us to the knowledge of the truth." Going beyond the positions held by the Jewish philosophers who came before him, Gerson was the first to attack the dogma about creation ex nihilo by recognizing the existence of a primary matter that he deemed so formless as to make it equivalent to the "nothing" referred to in the cited dogma.

The success of his exegesis resulted not so much from his philosophical ideas as from the charm of his style and, even more so, from the reflections for moral practice he placed at the end of each chapter in the Bible. These reflections or Toalioth enjoyed great popularity and underwent many editions. Yet Gerson did not have great influence on Judaism, the orthodox members of which at times accused him of heresy. He had more success with Christian scholars, indeed, to the extent that Pope CLEMENT VI had him translate from Hebrew into Latin his treatise on astronomy and his study about the instrument he had invented.

 $See\ Also:$ JEWISH PHILOSOPHY; SCIENCE (IN THE MIDDLE AGES).

Bibliography: I. HUSIK, A History of Medieval Jewish Philosophy (New York 1959); Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 10 v. (Berlin 1928–34) 7:324–338. G. VAJDA, Introduction à la pensée juive du moyen âge (Paris 1947). J. CARO, Kritische Untersuchungen zu Levi ben Gersons Widerlegung des aristotelischen Zeitbegriffes (Würzburg 1935). E. L. EHRLICH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:995.

[A. BRUNOT]

LEVIATHAN

Leviathan is a mythical sea monster of ancient folklore. Ancient tablets discovered at UGARIT in the 1930s have confirmed the mythical background of Leviathan, or lôtān, as he is known in these texts ("the coiled one," from the root lwy, to turn or twist). In these texts, where he is called the "fleeing serpent" and "coiled serpent," exactly as in Is 27.1 and Jb 26.13, he is pictured as a seven—headed, evidently serpentlike monster that is slaughtered by BAAL or his consort Anat [see J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (Princeton 1955) 137, 138]. It is unfortunate that the nature and activity of the monster are not more prominent in the extant narratives, which, it may be noted, are not cosmogonic in nature.

According to the Old Testament [Ps 73(74).14] it is not Baal, but Yahweh, who crushed the many-headed Leviathan and fed him to the sharks. The context of the reference in this Psalm shows that here also Leviathan is pictured as a sea monster and seems to indicate that he was destroyed before the organization of the universe (v. 16–17). There is an allusion to the myth, though an obscure one, also in Jb 3.8. In Is 27.1 the apocalyptist, basing himself on Leviathan's double attribute ("fleeing serpent" and "coiled serpent"), seems to have made two monsters out of one and used them to symbolize unidentified political enemies that will be destroyed in eschatological times (cf. Rahab as a symbol of Egypt). In Jb 40.25–41.26 is found a lengthy description of Leviathan, the terrible monster of the deep. The author seems to have found his inspiration in the crocodile for most of the traits he attributes to Leviathan, but some of them he has drawn from his own imagination (e.g., 41.10-13). In this passage, as well an in Ps 103(104).26, Leviathan has been in large part "demythologized" and merely designates a marine animal, awesome to man, perhaps, but a plaything to Yahweh.

Bibliography: H. GUNKEL, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit (2d ed. Göttingen 1921). O. KAISER, Die mythische Bedeutung des Meeres in Ägypten, Ugarit, und Israel (Berlin 1959). J. L. MCKENZIE, "A Note on Psalm 73(74):13–15," Theological Studies 11 (1950) 275–282.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (IN THE BIBLE)

The term levirate marriage, from the Latin levir meaning husband's brother or brother-in-law, refers to marriage between a widow and her deceased husband's brother. If a married man died without a son, his brother was to marry the widow. The practice is reflected in three Old Testament texts: Gn 38.6–11, the Book of Ruth, and Dt 25.5–10.

The purpose of the law in Deuteronomy was to prevent loss of family property by the widow's marrying outside the clan. The law applied only to the case of brothers who had lived together and worked common property. The levirate marriage would insure issue to the deceased and pass the inheritance to the firstborn of the new union. Later, levirate law applied only if no child was born, since daughters could inherit (Nm 27.8; 36.6-7). If the brother-in-law refused to marry, his sisterin-law took off his sandal publicly and spat in his face because he refused to build up his brother's house (Dt 25.7–10). In Ruth, in default of a brother-in-law, other relatives had the duty of marrying the widow in order of nearness of kinship to her. Both widow and relative could refuse to marry in this case without disgrace (Ru 3.10; 3.13).

In Mt 22.23–28; Mk 12.18–23; Lk 20.27–33, the question put to Christ about a widow's marrying seven brothers reflects the levirate law. Though not found in the Code of Hammurabi, the custom was known also among the Assyrians and Hittites. Here death during engagement also brought the law into effect [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts relating to the Old Testament (Princeton 1955) 182; 196].

Bibliography: P. CRUVEILHIER, "Le Lévirat chez les Hébreux et chez les Assyriens," Revue biblique 34 (Paris 1925) 524–546. M. BURROWS, "Levirate Marriage in Israel," Journal of Biblical Literature 59 (Boston 1940) 23–33. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 37–38.

[R. H. MCGRATH]

LEVITATION

The suspension of a material body in the air without any visible support, in apparent opposition to the law of gravity. There seems to be little doubt concerning the fact of levitation, but it has not been scientifically proved that this type of bodily suspension surpasses the psychophysical powers of nature. Levitation of human bodies or of inanimate objects has been reported in the lives of the saints, in cases of diabolical intervention, in spiritualistic seances, and in certain psychotic seizures. The three possible causes of levitation are God (directly or through the agency of angels), the devil (with God's permission), or some force or power of nature as yet unknown. Among the numerous canonized saints who experienced levitation, the following are the most renowned: SS. TERESA OF AVILA, JOSEPH OF CUPERTINO, CATHERINE OF SIENA, Philip NERI, Peter Alcántara, PAUL OF THE CROSS, JOHN BOSCO, Peter CLAVER, and Gemma GALGANI. Levitation is not admitted as one of the miracles required for the canonization of a saint, though it may be considered a testimony of a person's heroic sanctity.

Bibliography: J. Maréchal, Studies in the Psychology of the Mystics, tr. A. Thorold (London 1927). A. Farges, Mystical Phenomena Compared with Their Human and Diabolical Counterfeits, tr. S. P. Jacques (London 1926). J. G. Arintero, The Mystical Evolution in the Development and Vitality of the Church, tr. J. Aumann, 2 v. (St. Louis 1949–51). A. Royo, The Theology of Christian Perfection, tr. and ed. J. Aumann (Dubuque 1962). H. Thurston, The Physical Phenomena of Mysticism, ed. J. H. Crehan (Chicago 1952). A. Wiesinger, Occult Phenomena in the Light of Theology, tr. B. Battershaw (Westminster, Md. 1957).

[J. AUMANN]

LEVITES

Members of an Israelite tribe set aside for the service of the Lord. In the development of this institution over several centuries, there were many changes as evidenced by the divergent picture of the Levites in various Biblical traditions.

Origin of the Name. Many scholars agree that the word Levi (Heb. lēwî) was not a personal name but designated primarily a functional class, the sons of Levi (benē $l\bar{e}w\hat{\imath}$), with Levi probably only their quasi-fictitious eponymous ancestor. If the word is derived from the Hebrew root lwh, it could come from either of two meanings: (1) "to associate with, to be attached to," a meaning suggested by the word play at Levi's birth (Gn 29.34) and by the phrase, "they will be associated" (weyillāwû) with AARON, used in Nm 18.2, 4; or (2) "to be given over as a pledge, to be consecrated," a meaning found in Minaean inscriptions, from the root lw', used for persons consecrated to a divinity. Some scholars (e.g., R. De Vaux Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. McHugh (New York 1961) 358-359, 369-370), however, favor an origin in a personal name (perhaps a short form of Levi-El, attached to God), and Levite as primarily a nomen gentilitium, a descendent of Levi.

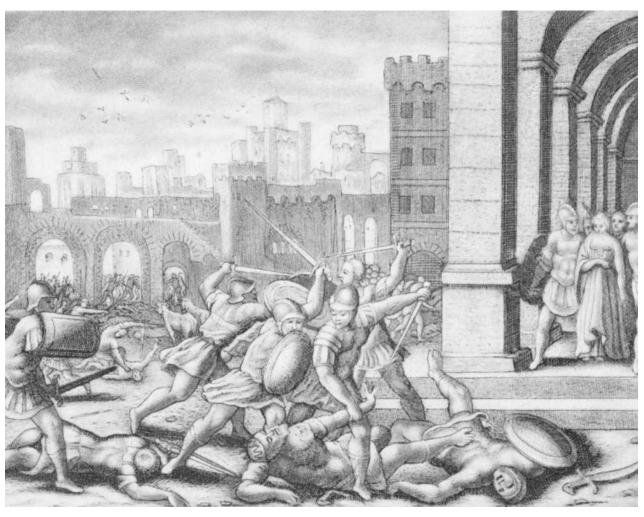

Early Secular History. The treacherous attack of Levi and Simeon on Shechem (Gn 34.1–31) and their later condemnation by Jacob (49.5–7) are seen by many as ancient tradition concerning these two tribes in central Palestine before the conquest under Joshua. According to this theory, elements of these tribes met with some disaster in the area of Shechem and were forced southward. Simeon eventually lost its identity within the tribe of Judah, while the tribe of Levi, after the sojourn in Egypt, won a new lease on life by assuming the priestly functions of all the tribes. That the tribe of Levi had a secular history can hardly be doubted, since Levi is included on an equal footing with the other tribes in ancient lists, e.g., Gn 46.8–27. It is also quite certain that Levite elements were in Egypt, for this tribe has many names of Egyptian origin, including that of MOSES. Although in Jacob's Oracles there is no mention of any priesthood in the oracle on Simeon and Levi (Gn 49.5-7), there is no reason to reject the Biblical connection between the secular and priestly tribe of Levi.

Levites as a Priestly Tribe. It is difficult to untangle the Biblical traditions of the Levitical priesthood. That the Levites were set aside for the service of the sanctuary at an early date is clear, but when this happened and how it was related to Aaron's priesthood are problems. As late as the early monarchy, the Levites did not have exclusive control of priestly functions, for non-Levitical priests existed, e.g., the son of the Ephraimite Micah (Jgs 17.5), the Ephraimite Samuel (1 Sm 1.1–20; 7.9), and David's sons (2 Sm 8.18). Micah, however, preferred a Levite priest when he was able to engage the services of one (Jgs 17.7–13).

Tradition ascribes the origin of the Levitical priesthood to Moses. Because of their part in carrying out the command of Moses to kill the idolaters of the golden calf, the Levites were "dedicated to the Lord" (Ex 32.27–29). In Moses' Oracles a relatively long oracle is given to Levi as the tribe that is entrusted with priestly functions: the use of the Urim and Thummim, the teaching of the law, and the offering of sacrifice (Dt 33.8–11). In both of these passages the Levites are detached from family ties. They are no longer a secular tribe to be counted with the others (Nm 1.47–49); they have no share in Israel (Dt 18.1–2). In Canaan they are allotted no territory (Jos 13.14, 33) but are given instead the Levitical cities (Nm 35.1–8; Jos 21).

Granted a preconquest Levitical priesthood, when did the distinction between priestly and nonpriestly Levites arise? It is still the common opinion that the Book of DEUTERONOMY insists on the same priestly rights for all the Levites. If there is any distinction, it is based on circumstances; the Levites at the central sanctuary function and receive their stipend (Dt 18.1–5), while those living elsewhere do not function, unless they visit the central shrine (18.6–8), and therefore depend on the charity of the people (14.27–29). Probably the Levites who were able to act as priests at the many local shrines after the conquest found themselves at a growing disadvantage: first by the official sanctuary at Jerusalem with its Zadokite clergy, and then by the centralization of cult under Ezekiel and Josiah. Later the distinction became not only a fact but also law.

Simeon and Levi Killing the Men of Hamor's City. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Later Functions of Levites. In the idealized restoration of Ezekiel there are the priest sons of Zadok who serve the altar and the Levites who serve the Temple (Ez 44.10–31). The Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS make a clear division between Aaron and his sons, the priests, on the one hand, and the Levites "given" to serve Aaron, on the other (Nm 16.1–18.24). This division probably reflects the end of a long process: the final supremacy of the Aaronic claim over the Levites. The difference can be seen in Deuteronomy (Dt 10.8), where the Levites carry the ark, and in the priestly writers (Nm 4.15), where the Levites approach the ark only after it has been veiled by the priests.

With the return of the exiles under EZRA and NEHE-MIAH, there are distinct families of priests, Levites, singers, doorkeepers, and Temple servants or oblates (Ezr 2.36–58); but it was not until later, in the additions to the work of the Biblical CHRONICLER, that the singers and doorkeepers were incorporated into the Levites and traced back to the three sons of Levi in rather artificial genealogies (1 Chr 6.18–22). The oblates, or Nathinim (Heb. netînîm, given), who were originally slaves or foreigners employed in the pre-exilic Temple, gradually disappeared after the Exile; and the Levites took over their function. The Levites had other important functions, acting as clerks, judges (1 Chr 23.4), and teachers (Neh 8.7–9; 2 Chr 17.8–9).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1326–30. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 358–371, 388–394, 544–545. G. HÖLSCHER, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al., 12.2 (1925) 2155–2208. A. LEFÈVRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible supplement, ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 5:389–397. D. R. JONES, J. HASTINGS, and J. A. SELBIA, eds., Dictionary of the Bible (New York 1963) 793–797. H. H. ROWLEY, "Early Levite History and the Question of the Exodus," Journal of Near Eastern Studies 3 (1944) 73–78. G. E. WRIGHT, "The Levites in Deuteronomy," Vetus Testamentum 4 (1954) 325–330. J. A. EMERTON, "Priests and Levites in Deuteronomy," ibid. 12 (1962) 129–138.

[O. BUCHER]

LEVITICUS, BOOK OF

The third book of the Bible, called in Hebrew by its initial word $wayyiqr\bar{a}$ ' (and he called), takes its English name from the Latin translation of the Greek title $\lambda\epsilon$ uttkóv ($\beta\iota\beta\lambda$ iov), ''the Levitical book,'' because much of the book is concerned with the cultic duties of the Levitical priesthood. The division of the book, its origin and date of composition, and its contents are treated in this article.

Divisions. The book has five main divisions: sacrifice ritual (ch. 1–7), ordination ceremony (ch. 8–10), legal purity laws (ch. 11–15) with accompanying atonement ritual (ch. 16), Holiness Code (ch. 17–26), and redemption of offerings (ch. 27).

Origin and date. This book developed within the sacerdotal circles and is the major work of the priestly tradition (see PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL). Although profoundly influenced by the cultic directives of Moses, the Book of Leviticus has a protracted history of composition that precludes its being attributed to any single person. Many of its laws are very ancient; some of them were adapted from Canaanite practices during the early centuries of the Hebrew occupation of Palestine. Preserved mainly at local sanctuaries, these laws existed primitively in detached form or in small independent collections.

The more proximate history of the book dates from the final years of the Hebrew monarchy before the fall of Judah in 587 B.C. when the Holliness Code was edited by the clergy of Jerusalem (see HOLINESS, LAW OF). This important collection of earlier material exerted great influence on subsequent work of the priestly school, notably, the remainder of the Book of Leviticus and the Book of Ezekiel. The Book of Leviticus in its present form is postexilic, i.e., after 538 B.C. and is concerned largely with the liturgy of the restored Temple. At that time the priestly authors re-edited the Holiness Code and added the ritual of sacrifice, rite of ordination, laws of legal purity, and the ceremonial for the Day of Atonement, with chapter 27 appended at a still later date. The literary setting of this legislation at the foot of Sinai, under the aegis of Moses, pointed to its ultimate source and spirit and gave the book its authoritative character.

Content. Chapters 1 to 7 delineate the various types of sacrifice: the HOLOCAUST, wherein the entire victim was burned on the altar; the cereal offering, frequently an adjunct to the animal offering; the PEACE OFFERING, divided into thanksgiving, VOTIVE, and free will offerings, wherein one part of the victim was completely burned and the other cooked and eaten by priest and offerer; the SIN and guilt offerings, made in expiation for sin, with part of the victim burned and the remainder either destroyed or consumed by the priests. In addition to outlining the ritual, these chapters underscore the rights and duties of priest and layman in sacrificial matters. [See SAC-RIFICE, III (IN ISRAEL).]

Although as a whole this book consists of laws and regulations, there are two small narratives, namely, the account of the ordination of AARON and his sons, and the death of Aaron's sons, Nadab and Abihu (ch. 8–10). The elaborate account of how Aaron and his sons were ordained is intended less as factual history than as a norm regulating the ordinations of priests. The untimely death of Aaron's two sons illustrates the seriousness of intermingling the SACRED AND THE PROFANE in acts of cult.

Legal purity, given extensive treatment in chapters 11 to 15, was strictly required of a people wholly dedicated to the Lord. Objective uncleanness, communicable to both persons and things, arose from eating certain animals or touching their dead bodies, childbirth, various skin diseases, sexual disturbances, and such corrupting elements as mildew or moss. These categories, often reflecting primitive taboos, underscored the necessity of unmarred integrity in every aspect of life. To remedy uncleanness, purification rites were demanded. (See PURE AND IMPURE.) Similar rites, applicable to the sinful uncleanness of the entire community, constituted the ceremony for the Day of Atonement (ch. 16). [See ATONEMENT, DAY OF (YOM KIPPUR).]

The Holiness Code (ch. 17–26), the original nucleus of the Book of Leviticus, stresses the importance of moral and legal sanctity in Israel as a reflection of Yahweh's own sacredness. The book's appendix, chapter 27, treats sacred vows and tithes and their accepted commutation.

Bibliography: H. CAZELLES, Le Lévitique, (Bible de Jérusalem 3; 1951); Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 5:497–530. M. NOTH, Das Dritte Buch Mose (Das Alte Testament Deutsch 6; Göttingen 1962). G. H. DAVIES, Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (New York 1962) 4:117–122. G. AUZOU, "Connaissance du Lévitique," Cahiers Sioniens 7 (1953) 291–319. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions (New York 1961) 439, 460–464, 507–510. A. S. HERBERT, Worship in Ancient Israel (Richmond 1959).

[R. J. FALEY]

The Offering of the Jews, taken from Leviticus 1 and 6, painting by the Master of the Gathering of Manna. (\bigcirc Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

LEWES, PRIORY OF

Former Benedictine monastery, in present-day Lewes, Sussex, England. Founded between 1078 and 1081 by William de Warenne, earl of Surrey, and his wife, Gundreda, it was the earliest Cluniac foundation in England. It was dedicated to St. Pancras. The original community, sent by St. HUGH OF CLUNY, consisted of three monks and a prior. By the terms of the foundation charter the prior was to be nominated by the abbot of CLUNY from among the three best monks in the house, precedence being given to the abbots of Cluny itself and of La CHARITÉ-SUR-LOIRE. The abbots of Cluny had few rights of oversight of Lewes and her dependencies, which came to number a dozen monasteries and cells. In 1351 Lewes bought a charter of denization from King Edward III to secure immunity from royal control; and in 1410 the abbot of Cluny appointed John Burgherst, prior of Lewes, vicar-general of all the Cluniac houses in England, a measure that caused resentment in those communities that had not been founded directly from Cluny. In 1480 Pope SIXTUS IV exempted Lewes from the jurisdiction of Cluny and placed it directly under the Holy See. The house was surrendered to King HENRY VIII on Nov. 11, 1537, and the church and monastery were demolished by Giovanni Portinari and his assistants between Feb. 16 and April 11, 1538. The lands were given to the Cromwell family.

Bibliography: R. GRAHAM, "The English Province of the Order of Cluny in the 15th Century," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 4th ser., 7 (1924) 98–130. Victoria History of the County of Sussex, ed. W. PAGE, v. 2 (London 1927). D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962) 151, 153, 154–158, 281–282. D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England (Cambridge, Eng. 1948–60) 2:159–160, 167–168; 3:280, 285, 350, 384.

[B. HAMILTON]

LEWIS, CLIVE STAPLES

Literary historian, Christian apologist, scholar, critic, writer of science fiction and children's books; b. Belfast, Ireland, Nov. 29, 1898; d. the Kilns, Headington, England, Nov. 22, 1963. His father was Albert James Lewis, a solicitor; his mother Florence Augusta Hamilton. They had two sons, Warren and Clive, who at an early age changed his name to "Jack." Before he was 10 his mother died of cancer, and the two boys were on their own, being somewhat estranged from their father. In 1917 Lewis prepared for entrance into Oxford University but World War I found him commissioned as a second lieutenant in the Somerset Light Infantry. He arrived at the front line trenches on his 19th birthday Nov. 29, 1917, soon afterwards seeing service at Fampoux and Monchy, and was wounded at Mt. Bemechon, near Lillers, in April 1918.

He returned to Oxford in January 1919 and on June 25, 1925, was elected to official fellowship in Magdalen College as tutor in English Language and Literature. He remained at Oxford until 1954. Passed over for the Merton Chair of English Literature in 1947 and defeated in 1951 for the Professorship of Poetry, he finally accepted in 1954 the Professorship of Medieval and Renaissance Literature at Magdalene College in Cambridge. Soon after, Oxford awarded him an honorary fellowship.

In 1956 Lewis married Joy Gresham Davidman, who died in 1960 of bone cancer. Lewis described this most difficult experience in A Grief Observed (1961).

Prior to 1929 Lewis had considered himself an atheist or at least an agnostic, and had published two books of poetry in that vein, but his conversion to theism in 1929 and to Christianity in 1931 resulted in his first book on apologetics: The Pilgrim's Regress (1933). Using John Bunyan's classic as a model, Lewis enucleated one of his major themes: the idea of longing, disquietude, yearning, Sehnsucht, for the eternal which no earthly thing can satisfy since our hearts are restless for the Eternal. Following Saint AUGUSTINE, the PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, and Pascal, Lewis asserts that earthly pleasures, being unsatisfactory, can only point to an everlasting heavenly pleasure. This theme is repeated in the Chronicles of Narnia (1950-56), a series of children's books treating traditional topics but translating them into an imaginary kingdom of people and animals. Aslan, the lion and king of beasts, represents a Christ figure.

Lewis's two most popular works are The Screwtape Letters (1942), a series of letters from the devil to his undersecretary in hell, Wormwood, on how to win a Christian from the fold, and Mere Christianity (1952), a summation of talks from the British Broadcasting Series that made Lewis famous during World War II.

Elsewhere, Lewis deals with the imperatives of the moral law, and in The Abolition of Man (1943) asserts that ethical commands (the Tao) are not merely written in the heart, but into the very structure of the universe itself. The Great Divorce(1945) records a series of conversations between various visitors from hell who are allowed to make an excursion to heaven, and for the most part decide not to remain there. The Problem of Pain (1940) contains some interesting analyses of evolution, primitive societies, animal pain, and the existence of hell. Various kinds of love (The Four Loves 1960), prayer (Letters to Malcolm: Chiefly on Prayer 1964), insights into the Psalms (Reflections on the Psalms 1958), and theological questions on sin and redemption arising on other planets not yet or about to be tempted (Out of the Silent Planet 1938; Perelandra 1943; and That Hideous Strength 1945), are just a few of the many topics which Lewis dealt with. Some consider his best work to be the novel Till We Have Faces (1956), a story of the soul based on the Greek legend of Psyche.

Lewis is widely remembered not so much for his scholarly expertise in medieval and Renaissance English literature (brilliantly demonstrated in the Oxford History of English Literature 1966), but for his popular writings in defense of traditional Christianity, and in this he is not infrequently compared to G. K. CHESTERTON and Hilaire Belloc. Quite orthodox in content but very original in style it is their direct "ad hominem" approach which has helped to make his books so lasting in their appeal.

Bibliography: H. CARPENTER, The Inklings (London 1978). M. J. CHRISTENSEN, C. S. Lewis on Scripture (Waco, Tex. 1979). J. R. CHRISTOPHER and J. K. OSTLING, An Annotated Checklist of Writings About Him and His Works (Kent, Ohio 1974). J. T. COMO, ed., C. S. Lewis at the Breakfast Table and other Reminiscences (New York 1979). C. DERRICK, C. S. Lewis and the Church of Rome (San Francisco 1981). W. GRIFFIN, Clive Staples Lewis: A Dramatic Life (San Francisco 1986). W. HOOPER, Past Watchful Dragons: The Narnian Chronicles of C. S. Lewis (New York 1979). C. C. KILBY, The Christian World of C. S. Lewis (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1964). G. MEILAENDER, The Taste for the Other. The Social and Ethical Thought of C. S. Lewis (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1978). R. L. PURTILL, C. S. Lewis' Case for the Christian Faith (New York 1981). C. WALSH, C. S. Lewis: Apostle to the Skeptics (New York1949); The Literary Legacy of C. S. Lewis (New York 1979). W. L. WHITE, The Image of Man in C. S. Lewis (Nashville 1969). J. R. WILLIS, Pleasures Forevermore. The Theology of C. S. Lewis (Chicago 1983).

[J. R. WILLIS]

LEWIS, DAVID (CHARLES BAKER), ST.

Welsh martyr, b. Monmouthshire, 1617; d. Usk, Wales, Aug. 27, 1679. His father, Morgan Lewis, was a Protestant; his mother, Margaret Pritchard, a Catholic; David was the only one of his parents' nine children to be brought up a Protestant. He was educated at the Royal Grammar School, Abergavenny, and from the age of 16, at the Middle Temple. After three years there he went abroad as tutor to the son of Count Savage. At Paris he became a Catholic, then entered the English College, Rome, on Nov. 6, 1638. He was ordained in 1642 and became a Jesuit novice two years later. In 1646 he was sent to England, but shortly afterward was recalled to become confessor at the English College. In 1648 he left again for South Wales, where he worked until his death, "a zealous seeker after lost sheep . . . and so charitable to his indigent neighbors that he was commonly called the father of the poor."

He went about mostly at night and on foot. His head-quarters were at Cwm, a small hamlet between Monmouth and Hereford; twice he was superior of this district. During the Oates persecution Cwm was sacked, and the library there taken to Hereford Cathedral, where it is now. Lewis hid at Llanfihangel Llantarnam. He was betrayed by Dorothy James, the wife of his apostate servant: she boasted that she would "wash her hands in Mr. Lewis' blood and have his head to make porridge of, as a sheep's head." On Sunday, Nov. 17, he was found in his refuge as he was about to say Mass. He was committed to Monmouth jail, and kept there until Jan. 13, 1679, when he was taken to Usk. He was tried at the March assizes at Monmouth, and condemned for his priesthood, chiefly on the evidence of James and his wife.

Before the sentence was carried out, he was made to ride to London with John KEMBLE, to be questioned on the OATES Plot by the Privy Council. On his return, he was executed on August 27, at Usk, close to the site of the present Catholic church. The official executioner refused to perform his task and fled; a convict, a bungling amateur, was bribed to take his place with a promise of freedom. When threatened with stoning by sympathetic onlookers, he too ran away, and a blacksmith was finally employed. On the scaffold Lewis made a stirring address in Welsh. He was buried in the Protestant churchyard at Usk, where his traditional grave, outside the west door of the church, is today a place of pilgrimage. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929, and canonized by Paul VI in 1970.

Feast: Aug. 27.

Bibliography: T. P. ELLIS, Catholic Martyrs of Wales (London 1933). H. FOLEY, ed., Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82) 5.2:912–931. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:424–426. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time (London–New York 1885–1902) 4:205–209. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924).

[G. FITZHERBERT]

LEWIS, EDWIN

Methodist theologian and pioneer in mediating the European neo-orthodox movement to America; b. Newbury, England, April 18, 1881; d. Morristown, N.J., Nov. 28, 1959. At age 19 he went to Newfoundland, Canada, and entered the ministry. In 1904 he moved to the United States, where he served pastorates in North Dakota, New Jersey, and New York. Lewis received his higher education at several schools; he earned his A.B. (1915) at New York State College, Albany, and his Th.D. (1918) at Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N.J. At Drew he was professor of systematic theology for 35 years. Lewis's first book, Jesus Christ and the Human Quest (1924), revealed him as an evangelical liberal. His A Christian Manifesto (1934) indicated a shift; he proclaimed the gospel as understandable only in terms of revelation, comprehensible only as an act of faith. His reorientation developed from intensive Bible study while coediting the Abingdon Bible Commentary combined with the influence of crisis theologians whom he both expounded and criticized. His persistent, basic sympathy with the concerns of liberals, however, prevents his being identified with radical NEO-ORTHODOXY. In retirement beginning in 1951, he lectured widely, wrote 60 articles for Harpers' Bible Dictionary, and completed his 12th and 13th books.

[R. STOODY]

LEWIS, FRANK J.

Businessman and philanthropist; b. Chicago, IL., April 9, 1867; d. there, Dec. 21, 1960. He was the son of William and Ellen (Ford) Lewis, Irish immigrants. Before he was 20 he had not only learned the roofing trade but had also organized a tar products company that eventually became one of the nation's leading producers of roofing and paving materials and of coal tar chemicals as well. Later he served as chairman of the board of directors of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago; he also held directorships in several large corporations. At 60, Lewis withdrew from active participation in the business world and dedicated the following 33 years to philanthropy and Catholic charities. He made substantial contributions, totaling millions of dollars, to the Catholic Church Extension Society; to the Lewis Memorial Maternity Hospital, Chicago; to St. Ambrose College, Davenport, Iowa; and to De Paul University and Loyola University, Chicago. Lewis College, in Lockport, IL., was named after him in 1934. His philosophy of life was expressed in his statement that "God gives a man money so that he will share it with others. Ownership of money is stewardship." He received many honorary degrees from colleges and universities and was honored by the papacy by being made a Knight of St. Gregory, a Knight Commander of St. Sylvester, a Knight Commander of the Order of Pius IX, and a Papal Count of the Holy Roman Empire.

[P. KINIERY]

LEXINGTON, DIOCESE OF

The diocese of Lexington (Lexingtonensis) was established Jan. 14, 1988, by Pope John Paul II. At its inception the diocese comprised fifty counties of central and eastern Kentucky that had formerly been part of the diocese of Covington and the archdiocese of Louisville. Eighty percent of the diocese is in the area of Kentucky designated by an act of Congress as "Appalachia."

The Most Reverend J. Kendrick Williams, a native of Athertonville, Kentucky, auxiliary bishop of the diocese of Covington, was installed March 2, 1988 as Lexington's first bishop, in the newly designated Cathedral of Christ the King. Bishop Williams took the lead in fostering good ecumenical relations. He served as an advisory committee member for the Bible Belt Study conducted by the Catholic University of America, as a member of the American Board of Catholic Missions, and as episcopal representative to the Southern Baptist/Roman Catholic Conversation and the Bishops' Committee for Ecumenical and Inter-religious Affairs.

The Lexington diocese with the support of the Extension Society and other agencies fosters a missionary outreach, especially in the mountains of eastern Kentucky, a region where historically Catholics are few and far between. The diocese supports a sizeable Catholic Center at the University of Kentucky in the see city and promotes the Newman apostolate in several other cities where there are colleges and universities. In 2000 the diocese had 59 parishes ministering to some 45,000 Catholics.

[M. K. SEIBERT/C. F. CREWS]

LEXINTON, STEPHEN DE

Cistercian reformer, abbot, founder of the Cistercian College at the University of Paris; b. Lexinton, Nottinghamshire, England, between 1190 and 1196; d. Ourscamp Abbey, Oise, France, March 21, 1260. He came from a distinguished family: his father, Richard of Lexinton, had three other sons, Robert, a judge (d. 1250), John, a royal clerk and keeper of the great seal (d. 1257), and Henry, Bishop of Lincoln (d. 1258). Stephen was intended for the Church and was sent to study in Paris and then in Oxford under EDMUND OF ABINGDON. In 1215 King John appointed him to a canonry in Southwell, Nottinghamshire, but in 1221 Stephen chose to become a CISTER-CIAN monk at QUARR, Isle of Wight. In 1223 he was made abbot of Stanley Abbey in Wiltshire, and in 1227 he was sent to reform the Cistercian abbeys in Ireland. Finding them in a disgraceful state, he was forced to use the drastic remedy of suppressing the whole filiation of MELLI-FONT, placing those abbeys under the visitation and supervision of a number of English houses, a system that lasted until 1274 when the filiation was restored. In 1229 he was appointed abbot of SAVIGNY, and in 1235 he played an important part in resolving the difficulties that had risen between the abbot of CÎTEAUX and the four abbots of CLAIRVAUX, LA FERTÉ, PONTIGNY, and MORI-MOND. In 1241 he was summoned to Rome and narrowly escaped being captured with the other Cistercian abbots by Emperor FREDERICK II. When Abbot William of Clairvaux died in captivity, Stephen was elected to succeed him (1243). In 1245 he undertook his most controversial action, that of founding a Cistercian house of studies, the Collège St. Bernard, at the University of Paris. MATTHEW PARIS says that Stephen was deposed because of this action by the abbot of Cîteaux in 1256. Paris's statement has been challenged, but C. H. Lawrence has recently proven that there can be no doubt but that Stephen was actually deposed, and furthermore, that despite the strong support of Pope ALEXANDER IV, who ordered that he should be restored to office and thought of promoting him to an English archbishopric (probably York), he retired to Clairvaux's daughter house of Ourscamp, where he died. A register book of his early letters up to 1241 has survived and is printed in Analecta Sacri Ordinis Cisterciensis 2 (1946): 1-118; 8 (1952): 181-378.

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (1957–59) 2: 1140–1141. C. H. LAWRENCE, "Stephen of Lexington and Cistercian University Studies in the Thirteenth Century," The Journal of Ecclesiastical History 11 (1960): 164–179.

[D. L. BETHELL]

LEZANA, JUAN BAUTISTA DE

Carmelite canonist, theologian, and historian; b. Madrid, Nov. 23, 1586; d. Rome, March 29, 1659. He made his profession of vows in Madrid in December of 1602. After studying philosophy at Toledo, he pursued his theological courses at houses of his order and at the Universities of Salamanca and Alcalá. He came under the influence of Michael de La FUENTE. Lezana lectured to Carmelite students on Aristotle and Aquinas, and took charge of studies for the order at Toledo. In 1625 he attended the general chapter in Rome, and he remained in that city the rest of his life. Again put in charge of studies, he lectured in theology at the Carmelite house of studies of Santa Maria in Traspontina. For 16 years he also taught metaphysics at the Roman Sapienza. He was made a consulter of the Congregation of the Index by URBAN VIII and a consulter of the Congregation of Rites by INNO-CENT X. He refused a bishopric. In 1658 ALEXANDER VII appointed him procurator general of his order, and he held various titular provincialates besides acting as counselor to a number of priors general, a position for which he several times received some votes. Lezana was an exemplary religious, dedicated to the observance of the common life, and very assiduous in prayer and study. An indefatigable writer, he published works on asceticism, Canon Law, Mariology (he was an apologist for the Immaculate Conception), theology, and history, besides works of translation. His writings have been influential, highly respected, and widely diffused. However, the first three volumes of his Annales sacri, prophetici, et Eliani Ordinis Beat. Virginis Mariae de Monte Carmeli . . . (4 v., Rome 1645-56) are concerned with the so-called history of the Carmelite Order up to the twelfth century, although the order was not founded until c. 1200. Nevertheless, these volumes are a witness of the seventeenth-century beliefs of the CARMELITES about their past. The fourth volume takes the history up to 1513 and contains some important documentation. An unfinished fifth volume supposedly preserved in the archives of the order in Rome cannot be traced.

Bibliography: C. DE VILLIERS, Bibliotheca carmelitana, ed. G. WESSELS, 2 v. in 1 (Rome 1927) 1:772–779. A. DE SAINT PAUL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:502–503. G. MESTERS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v., ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1002–1003. B. ZIMMERMAN, The Catholic Encyclopedia, 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 9:209.

[K. J. EGAN]

L'HÔPITAL (L'HOSPITAL), MICHEL DE

French statesman and advocate of religious toleration; b. Auvergne, near Aigueperse, 1507; d. Vignay, March 13, 1573. His father was a physician and served also as comptroller of accounts for Charles of Bourbon. His early education was at Toulouse until he was forced to flee France in 1523. For six years he studied law at Padua and then he joined his father in Rome, where he served as auditor of the rota. Upon his return to France in 1534, he practiced law, and he married in 1537. L'Hôpital was appointed counselor to the Parlement of Paris from 1537 to 1547. In 1547 HENRY II sent him to Bologna as his representative to the first session of the Council of Trent. L'Hôpital returned to France in 1548 and became chancellor to Princess Margaret, the king's sister. In 1553 he was appointed master of requests and in 1554 president of the Chambre des Comptes. In 1557 he became a member of the privy council. He reached the pinnacle of his career when, through the influence of CATHERINE DE MÉDICIS, he was appointed chancellor of France (1560). He served in this position during a period of religious strife in France over the rise of the HUGUE-NOTS.

Wars of Religion. In 1561 he appeared before a meeting of the States-General to appeal for greater toleration. The result was the enactment of the Edict of Orléans (1561) and the Edict of January of 1562, which granted improved conditions for the Huguenots. A massacre of Huguenots by soldiers of Francis, the Duke of Guise, took place in March of 1562. In protest, L'Hôpital withdrew to his estates at Vignay until the civil strife was ended through the Edict of Amboise (March 1563), which provided protection for the rights of the Huguenots. Upon his return to court L'Hôpital undertook to strengthen the government of Catherine de Médicis. At his bidding the royal council refused to publish the acts of the Council of Trent because of their conflict with the Gallican liberties of the French Church. He supported the position of the moderate Catholic party in opposition to the rightist Guise position. In 1566 he obtained the enactment of the Ordinance of Moulin, which provided for judiciary reform. No further reforms were possible since religious hostilities broke out again in 1567, and L'Hôpital's influence began to decline. Catherine de Médicis blamed him for policies of moderation that she had supported but that his critics believed responsible for increasing religious strife. As the second phase of the religious wars began, the criticism of his policies increased. The cardinal of Lorraine, the duke of Alva, and others accused him of supporting the Huguenots. In 1568 he was forced to resign his position as keeper of the seals as a result of papal pressure. In return, the papal Curia transferred control of certain Church property to the French government. Shortly thereafter L'Hôpital withdrew from public life, believing that his vacating of his position was essential for the peace of France, although technically he did not resign the chancellorship until forced to do so in February of 1573.

Late Life. L'Hôpital spent the last years of his life in seclusion at Vignay. Here he wrote poems and other short commentaries on his era. In 1570 he addressed to Charles IX a short memoir entitled Le But de la guerre et de la paix, ou discours du chancelier l'Hospital pour exhorter Charles IX à donner la paix à ses sujets. In 1585 a grandson published another of his works, entitled Epistolarum seu sermonum libri sex.

Although Michel de L'Hôpital was accused of heresy in his own time, he remained a practicing Catholic to the end of his life. His enemies criticized him for the policy of placing the welfare of France above the welfare of a single group. Catherine continued her support of this policy for many years after his death, despite the fact that it was responsible for his fall from power. He deplored the excesses of the Massacre of ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, which occurred less than a year before his death, and he so indicated in a letter to Charles IX.

Bibliography: Oeuvres inédites de Michel l'Hospital, ed. P. J. S. DUFÉY, 2 v. (Paris 1825). A. E. SHAW, Michel de l'Hospital and his Policy (London 1905). C. T. ATKINSON, Michel de l'Hospital (New York 1900). A. F. VILLEMAIN, Vie du chancelier de l'Hôpital (Paris 1874). J. HÉRITIER, Michel de l'Hospital (Paris 1943). A. C. KELLER, "Michel de l'Hospital and the Edict of Toleration of 1562," Bibliothèque d'humanisme et renaissance 14 (1952): 301–310. A. BUISSON, Michel de l'Hospital, 1507–1573 (Paris 1950), bibliog. J. LECLER, Toleration and the Reformation, tr. T. L. WESTOW, 2 v. (New York 1960). R. NÜRNBERGER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–) 4:341. S. SKALWEIT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1003.

[W. J. STEINER]

LIBELLATICI

Christians in possession of libelli or certificates stating that, particularly during the Decian persecution (251-253), they had offered or were willing to offer sacrifice in the prescribed fashion. Copies of the official certificates signed by an imperial commissioner have been discovered in Egypt, though they may have belonged to pagans for whom they posed no moral problem. The term was also applied earlier to requests for pardon (libelli pacis) given to the lapsi or fallen Christians by incarcerated confessors of the faith demanding that the bishop admit them to reconciliation. Tertullian mentions the practice of the martyrs' granting libelli pacis asking pardon for sinners (Ad mart. 1.6); but he later condemned their misuse (De pud. 22.1-2). The request was based on the notion that the martyrs' sufferings in themselves gave him power to forgive sins, and that the bishop had merely to take note of this fact (CYPRIAN, Epist. 21.3). Cyprian of Carthage strongly opposed this movement (Epist. 27.1–2) while admitting the value of the martyrs' intercessory prayers and sufferings to abbreviate the time of penance for the lapsi, particularly for those seeking reconciliation before death. The practice seems to have been known but early repudiated in Rome; it apparently spread from the Church in North Africa to Egypt and Asia Minor.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 9.1:78–79. A. D'ALÈS, l'Édit de Calliste (Paris 1914). B. POSCHMANN, Paenitentia secunda (Bonn 1940). L. FAULHABER, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 43 (Vienna 1919) 439–466, 617–657. E. BOURQUE, Histoire de la pénitence-sacrament (Quebec 1947) 88–92, 98–104. J. R. KNIPFING, "Libelli of the Decian Persecution," Harvard Theological Review 16 (1923) 345–390.

[F. HAUSER]

LIBELLI MISSARUM

Leaflets or small booklets containing the prayer formularies (e.g., the collect and other presidential prayers, the preface to the Roman Canon, the introductory formula for the Hanc igitur, etc.) that were composed for specific Sundays or feast days. They are significant as the bridge marking the transition from the period of extemporized praying, and the collection and arrangement of presidential prayers into a SACRAMENTARY proper.

It appeared that North African synodal legislation encouraged the individual bishop to write down his formularies of liturgical prayer. During the course of the fifth and sixth centuries individual bishops began to gather together such collections, to which the name Libelli Missarum has been given. Some bishops had recourse to the Lateran Archives, which contained the Libelli Missarum of many of the popes. Now, from the time of Pope Damasus (366-384), Rome had enhanced the cult of the martyrs. However, such a cult was a strictly local one, the Mass of the martyr being said only in the place of his burial or his church. In the tituli, or parish churches, the Mass formularies used were exclusively of the type now in the Roman Missal for use on Sundays. During the pontificate of Leo the Great, the tituli began, for some reason unknown to us, to celebrate the feasts of the martyrs and in the churches of the martyrs they began to make use of the Masses of the Temporal. It was at this time that the first Roman Libelli Missarum began to appear. It must be stressed that at this period (mid-fifth century) Rome possessed no Sacramentary for general use—neither during the pontificate of Leo I nor during that of Gelasius. There would have been no call for such a book, since each church had its own small collection of Mass formularies. H. Schmidt has suggested ["De Sacramentariis Romanis," Gregorianum 34 (1953) 729], and the idea is not without some probability, that Gelasius I gathered together a number of these Libelli Missarum and that this collection later formed the nucleus of the official Roman Sacramentary. A study of these prayer formularies is indispensable to an understanding of liturgical development in the Latin rite.

While individual examples of libelli missarum are no longer extant in most cases, a single-volume compilation of these libelli have survived, and is popularly, though incorrectly known as the LEONINE SACRAMENTARY.

Bibliography: C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to Sources (Washington, D.C. 1986). E. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books: From the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century (Collegeville, Minn. 1998).

[H. ASHWORTH/EDS.]

LIBER CENSUUM

Liber censuum is a tax book compiled in 1192 by the papal chamberlain Censius, later Pope HONORIUS III. It listed the various taxes, rates, and dues then owed to the Holy See throughout the Western world. It gave the dues owed by individual churches, monasteries, and others, diocese by diocese and province by province. Such lists were not new, but the Liber censuum by its thoroughness, well–ordered arrangement, and subsequent use is one of the outstanding documents of the financial history of the medieval papacy. It remained in use down to Eugene IV (1431–47).

A text of the original survives (MS Vat. lat. 8486), with some additions in the 13th century. Together with the list of dues, the manuscript contains five further pieces: (1) a list of exempt, i.e., papal, bishoprics and abbeys; (2) the Liber de mirabilibus urbis Romae; (3) an Ordo Romanus; (4) two lists of popes, one to Celestine III and the other to Eugene III; and (5) a cartulary of privileges and donations.

Various sources were used by Censius. There is some doubt as to the exact amount of direct or indirect use he made of the work of Cardinal BOSO, chamberlain to Adrian IV and Alexander III. One of his major sources was the Gesta pauperis scholaris Albini (Albinus, Cardinal Bishop of Albano, d. c. 1198). But there is no doubt that through these sources Censius took documents from the Collectio canonum of DEUSDEDIT (1083–86), the Liber politicus of Benedict Presbyter (1140–43), and the tax books of EUGENE III (1145–53) and ADRIAN IV (1154–59).

Certainly the Liber censuum was an achievement. But it is a misinterpretation of the facts to regard it as a record of financial success. Censius compiled it at a difficult time in papal financial history. It thus represents the determination of the Curia to keep alive its claims and to provide a basis for future action, especially toward overlordship in central Italy.

Bibliography: Text in P. FABRE and L. D. DUCHESNE, Le Liber censuum de l'Église romaine, 3 v. (Paris 1889–1910; v.3 ed. G. MOLLAT, 1952). W. E. LUNT, ed. and tr., Papal Revenues in the Middle Ages, 2 v. (New York 1934). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 9: 180–220. M. MICHAUD, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 3:233–253. A. P. FRUTAZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1012–13. v. PFAFF, "Der Liber censuum von 1192," Vierteljahrschrift für Sozial—und Wirtschaftsgeschichte 44 (1957) 78–96, 105–120, 220–242, 325–351.

[J. GILCHRIST]

LIBER DE CAUSIS

The Liber de causis, "a book concerning causes," is a comparatively short, anonymous, and basically Neoplatonic treatise that most likely was composed in Arabic, and greatly influenced all Western medieval Christian authors once GERARD OF CREMONA (d. 1187) had translated it into Latin at the end of the 12th century. ALAN OF LILLE (d. 1203) was the first Westerner to quote it, and his example was followed by WILLIAM OF AUXERRE, PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR, WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE, ALEXANDER OF HALES, ROLAND OF CREMONA, ALEXANDER NECKHAM, THOMAS OF YORK, BONAVENTURE, ROGER BACON, THOM-AS AQUINAS, and ALBERT THE GREAT. Each of the last three wrote a commentary on it. The extent of its popularity is attested by the fact that approximately 150 manuscripts of the Latin text are still extant. The book consists of 32 general propositions, each of which is briefly explained. Modern editions of its Latin version run to little more than 25 pages.

Content. With one exception, to be noted later, the doctrine set down in it is typically Neoplatonic. For the author of the Liber as for PLOTINUS and other early Neoplatonists, the universe consists of four strata of reality, hierarchically arranged, within which all existents are located. At the top is God, the First Cause and the Primal One and True; at the bottom is the sensible universe; on the two intervening levels are souls and intelligences. Each stratum below God is subdivided hierarchically. The lowest is headed by heavenly bodies and Time, with material things filling in the lower ranks. On the next stratum the higher division is made up of intellectual souls, with the First Intellectual Soul occupying the lead position and the lower division being constituted by mere souls. On the third stratum divine intelligences make up the more perfect rank, which is headed by the First Divine Intelligence, and mere intelligences form the less perfect.

The relationships within hierarchies are always described by comparing what is higher to what is lower. The higher is joined to what is lower through a middle item, which is similar to each extreme. The higher knows the lower as its effect, while the lower knows the higher as its cause. The higher is in the lower, and the lower in the higher, each in its own way. In the case of an effect produced by both a higher and a lower cause, the higher has more influence than the lower because the higher causes the very causality of the lower, with the result that the efficacy of the Supreme Cause is prior to, present within, and remains after, the efficacy of all other causes. No matter what the basis of comparison may be, the higher is always better than the lower, with the highest completely transcending the order in question.

Such is the hierarchical and Neoplatonic universe described within the pages of the Liber—a complex structure whose four tiers are tightly fitted one upon another through mutual resemblance, knowledge, inexistence, and causal influence. The fact that the author espouses a doctrine of creation indicates that, apart from Neoplatonism, he was guided also by divine revelation (through either the Qur'an or the Hebrew Scriptures). In some form or other the expression, "to create," occurs approximately 45 times in the Liber. The common theme of those occurrences is that the First Principle of the universe is a creator, and that his creative casuality extends to absolutely everything—immediately to the First Intelligence and through this latter to all else: to the Soul, to all other eternal and self-subsistent entities, to all heavenly bodies and material things, and even to Time itself. For the author, creation is the bestowal of being upon all (dare rebus omnibus ens) as this paraphrase makes clear: "Every cause makes a unique and characteristic contribution to its effects. Hence, First Being gives being to every being, First Life gives life to self-movers, First Intelligence gives knowledge to knowers. Let us say, then, that the First Being is the cause of causes and, if it confers being on absolutely everything, it does so by creation. On the other hand, First Life confers life on its subsequents not through creation but only after the manner of a form" [Prop. 18 (ed. Steele) 175].

To create, then, means to bestow being, to cause something to be that before was not. If this interpretation is correct, the author has an accurate notion of creation, and this accuracy indicates that the impact of divine revelation upon him has been strong enough to break through an otherwise rigid Neoplatonism.

Authorship. Although scholars commonly agree that Gerard of Cremona is its Latin translator, the authorship of the Liber is still open to question. Until at least the middle of the 13th century the treatise was attributed to Aristotle; in fact, it was at times titled Liber Aristotelis de expositione bonitatis purae, and was included among Aristotle's works in the official syllabus of the University of Paris as late as 1255. St. Thomas Aquinas first challenged this attribution shortly after 1268, when he read William of Moerbeke's Latin translation of Proclus's Elements of Theology and realized that the ultimate source of the Liber was PROCLUS. Aquinas concluded that its author was some Arabian philosopher who was acquainted with Proclus's treatise.

Most modern exegetes attributed it either to ALFARA-BI (d. c. 950), or to David the Jew (ibn Daoud), who worked with DOMINIC GUNDISALVI in Toledo, Spain, translating Arabic and Greek treatises into Latin during the second half of the 12th century. From extrinsic evidence and from the nature and content of the Liber itself; this much seems clear: (1) its author was a Semite; (2) he certainly lived before the 13th century and probably as early as the 9th century; (3) he derived his knowledged of creation from divine revelation; and (4) the rest of his theory is Neoplatonic, derived from Arabic versions, certainly of Proclus's Elements of Theology and probably of parts of Plotinus's Enneads.

See Also: NEOPLATONISM; ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY; SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography: O. BARDENHEWER, Die pseudo-aristotelische Schrift über das reine Gute, bekannt unter dem Namen "Liber de Causis" (Freiburg 1882), Arabic text, together with a German translation, plus an edition of Gerard of Cremona's Latin translation. "Liber de Causis," an edition of Gerard of Cremona's Latin tr. in R. BACON, Opera hactenus inedita, ed. R. STEELE, fac. 12 (Oxford 1935) 161–87. L. SWEENEY, "Research Difficulties in the Liber de Causis," The Modern Schoolman 36 (1959) 108–15; "Doctrine of Creation in Liber de Causis," An Etienne Gilson Tribute, ed. C. J. O'NEIL (Milwaukee 1959) 274–89. G. C. ANAWATI, "Prolégomènes à une nouvelle édition du De Causis arabe," Mélanges Louis Massignon, 3 v. (Damascus 1956–57) 1:73–110. H. D. SAFFREY, Sancti Thomae de Aquino super librum de causis expositio (Fribourg 1954). M. ALONSO, Temas filosoficos medievales (Comillas 1959).

[L. SWEENEY]

LIBER DIURNUS ROMANORUM PONTIFICUM

A book of formulas of the Roman Curia, among the most controversial of medieval sources. The time and place of origin of its three authentic manuscript copies, as well as their subsequent whereabouts throughout the centuries, are as uncertain as are the order and development of its texts. Both the name of the book and its official status have been disputed. However, the latter is now clear. Exact dates and statements concerning places and persons establish beyond doubt the fact that the manuscripts could never have gone back to a private collector remote from Rome. Those objections to the official character of the book that arise from the inclusion of apparently spurious sections "pertaining to bishops or cloisters" are not strong in their proof. For with regard to the difficult misinterpreted formulas, the point in question is always what place to assign them with assurance in a papal chancery. That Rome has no further trace of the original official book is understandable, because of the use of papyrus which is subject to deterioration; and considering other losses from archives, it is not surprising.

Manuscripts. The only three copies of this unique source under consideration today are the Roman Vatican Codex V, the Ambrosius A of Milan, and the Cleromontanus C. The last mentioned, formerly preserved at the Jesuit Collège de Clermont in Paris, is now in the care of the Benedictine Abbey Egmond-Binnen in Holland. V and C belong to the 9th century, whereas A probably first appeared at the beginning of the 10th century. All three copies provide series of different discontinuous sections independent of one another. The numerous former links with an original in the papal chancery office are no longer established.

The writers of these three manuscripts could not possibly have been officials in the papal chancery office. Numerous primitive misspellings, some of them awkward corrections of misinterpreted letter formations or anxious copyings of them, prove that the script of the three manuscripts was not wholly familiar to the copyists. Besides, there is uncertain handling of the word "ill," which is usually employed in a language in many different ways. In addition, there is a lack of familiarity with the commonly occurring abbreviations used in chanceries, and some of the misinterpretations of these are even grotesque. Misunderstood elements of dates, inaccurate forms of Greek tags, mistaken titles of spiritual and worldly hierarchies, and various things prove emphatically that the scribes of the three manuscripts were not officials in the papal chancery. None of the three manuscripts is an example of usage customary in the papal chancery, whereas all three go back to such a manuscript.

In addition to the three fragmentary codices there, are 11 fragments in the canonical Collection of DEUS-DEDIT: 2:109–112; 3:145–150; 4:427. Their originals are close to the handwritings of C and A, the stronger similarity being with that of C. The residence of the exarch at Ravenna, the archbishop of that city, papal officials and apocrisiary no longer play a role in these fragments. The German emperor is the addressee; the dilectissimi fratres domini episcopi could only have been German bishops. Further changes in materials and in form likewise show that it could have been only the papal chancery that had so lively an interest in the reorganization of the formulas in contrast to the versions of V, A, and C. This new version goes back to the new ordering of political circumstances through the renovatio imperii of Otto I.

The real Liber diurnus was considered a flexible, changeable work capable of being amended and expanded, a document which, through continual adaptation, would apply to changing conditions and thus remain practicable.

Editions. The widely traveled Lucas Holstenius (1596–1661), a convert from Hamburg, gave to Rome a first edition of the Liber diurnus in handwriting V. As a result of the work of opposing forces, it did not have any significant effect. A second one, brought to Paris in 1680 by John Garnier, SJ, based on Codex C, was consigned to a hardly better fate. Even the edition of Rozière (Paris 1869), also based on V, was affected by the delayed aftermath of the great ecclesiastical political disputes that had been so disadvantageous to the earlier ones. Sickel's edition likewise depends on Codex V, which he thought was the only one available; but in addition it depends on the earlier editions of Codex C, which had been lost in the meantime. The existence of A was completely unknown to Sickel at the time of the appearance of his edition.

The many differences of opinion that sentiment and emotion have stirred up in regard to the Liber diurnus are not yet entirely settled, not even by the combined edition of H. Foerster containing all three handwritings and the fragments of Deusdedit's collection. This edition has separate printings of the four components of textual transmission and deliberately abandons the constructing of a text that would be valid once and for all, because there has never been only one of the Liber diurnus.

Bibliography: Liber Diurnus, ed. H. FOERSTER (Bern 1958). A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini (Turin 1950) 1:66. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I (2d ed. Mechlin 1945) 1:190–192.

[H. FOERSTER]

LIBER PONTIFICALIS

Liber pontificalis (LP) is the name used since the eighteenth century for a work that was titled in the Middle Ages Gesta Pontificum Romanorum. The work is a series of career sketches of varying length of the popes. The accounts are not strictly biographical because they rarely contain any information about their subject's prepontifical careers. There is a certain regularity in the information provided for each pope: paternal ancestry, electoral details, major ecclesiastical initiatives, liturgical innovations or reforms, diplomatic engagements, (sometimes) construction and donation records, length of pontificate, and number of ordinations performed. The lives were almost certainly written in the papal administration; some scholars arguing for the scrinium and some for the vestiary. Many manuscripts of the LP are preceded by an apocryphal exchange of correspondence between St. Jerome and Pope Damasus. Thus the earliest portion of the work was erroneously attributed to Damasus in the Middle Ages. In the sixteenth century, the LP was attributed to Anastasius Bibliothecarius who may have written some of the mid-ninth century lives. The early papal lives were recorded in several different sources such as the Catalogus Liberianus and the Chronographer of 354. The LP was prepared in stages beginning under Boniface II (530–532) when the whole series down to Felix IV (526-530) was complied. In the time of Pope Conon (686–687) a second redaction was prepared. From the early eighth file nomine uocar precipit. aug fur ponam que refpie adfein pomum orationem iftam delepfir. De qui apto tuo petro collani clauib; rogni celeftif liganor arq; fol nendi pomificium madidiffi concede ur intreffic enfancho apecarou nive neerbilibemun abanc cuntatem quam nount to ao inuante funcatumuf. fac ab na tua impetiul manere focusari de hoftib; quezcusfaconteucha e nonof acmultiplicef habe triumphof.p.Scdam uero lepfit fup potterulam que fina e iurta caftru fei angli. De qab ipo funul munoi contro bane fram catholicam - aplicam. sceliam abbotab; cuttodire - confernare dignat ef iniquitatis nig chographum pretar emunda ... cumate hanc quam tuo foo nommi paptoz tuozz. Pac. P. fuffracqua nouner dedicammabomib; mimicoz infibijs fecura femp aug inperitam mane printer. Terriam ucio outnomem feriplit fig pofterulam que respicir adla lam fammum. lia qo omnipor amifericorfde.ut ao to toto corde clamamef.infredente bemo perio apto moneg precatif indulgentiam confequation icuit talbet quam ego famulul tuul. Laur. epi te augulta te nono ope decheaus meoq; nomine lamana uoca tun ut lemp illefa maneat ac lecum, apub clemen nam tuam iuguer ewamul F. Cuam obsem loto philatel fin anno phatacuntal fumphe excession. Tinan, confectation if fur anno cuttaf unoiq; confu mata e milla maqidie pay ilgana mayima fun-century until the death of Leo III (816), the lives were written shortly after each pontificate, but they were usually begun during the pope's reign. Across the ninth century the lives were compiled sporadically. The series then broke off until it was resumed in the time of Gregory VII and carried on in several stages until the end of the twelfth century. Thereafter there were sometimes multiple lives of particular popes and occasional compilations of such lives down to 1479 when Platina prepared the last medieval version of the whole text. Useful and interesting for all periods, the LP is, alongside the papal correspondence, the critical source for papal history between 500 and 900.

Folio of a 12th-century Liber pontificalis with the biography of Leo IV. In the lower margin is a note relative to the fictional Popess Joan.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, Le Liber Pontificalis, 2 v. (Paris 1886-92), v. 3 ed. C. VOGEL (Paris 1957). U. PŘEROVSKÝ, "Liber pontificalis nella recensione di Pietro Guglielmo OSB, e del card. Pandolfo," Studia Gratiana, 21-23 (Rome 1978). O. BERTOLINI, "Il 'Liber Pontificalis,'" in La storiografia altomedievale, Settimane di studio del centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo 17 (1970) 387–455. H. GEERTMAN, More Veterum (Groningen 1975). T. F. X. NOBLE, "A New Look at the Liber Pontificalis," Archivum Historiae Pontificiae 23 (1985) 347–58.

[T. F. X. NOBLE]

LIBER SEXTUS

The first authentic collection of Church legislation after that of Gregory IX (1234). It was commissioned by Pope Boniface VIII in 1296 and promulgated on March 3, 1298, embracing some 64 years of papal and conciliar legislation. Although the constitutions of the Councils of Lyons (1245, 1274) were in circulation, and some popes had made collections of their own constitutions (e.g., Innocent IV in 1246, 1251, and 1253, and Gregory X when promulgating the 1274 Council of Lyons), there was some uncertainty about the force of much of the papal legislation after 1234. Upon Boniface's election in 1294, the University of Bologna, among others, petitioned its former alumnus (1260–64) to look into the question.

Selecting three seasoned canonists (William Mandagout, Archbishop of Embrun; Bérenger FRÉDOL, Bishop of Béziers; and Richard Petronio, vice-chancellor of the papacy), Boniface gave them a free hand. The new collection, completed within two years, was named Liber Sextus (Sext) and, like the decretals of Gregory IX, was divided into five books, with titles and chapters. Of the 15 popes between 1234 and 1294, however, only six were represented (Gregory IX, Innocent IV, Alexander IV, Urban IV, Clement IV, and Nicholas III), being allowed some 108 chapters, while Boniface's own legislation occupied 251 chapters; to a total of 359 chapters some 88 regulae iuris, or rules of interpretation of law, were added, mainly from Roman law. The many papal constitutions denied a place were thereby declared null and void for the future; others of a transitory nature were not given in full but noted simply as reservatae. Although Boniface accepted all but one of 41 chapters of the third collection of Innocent IV (1253), he recast other decretals, at times retaining only the central idea; on occasion he also modified conciliar decrees, composing, for example, the constitution Cum ex eo (Sext 1.6.34) in mitigation of Licet canon of Lyons (Sext 1.6.14). It is, indeed, significant that the constitutions of Boniface included in the Sext were written in great part for that compilation. What he intended was, in effect, a codification rather than a collection; in fact any papal decree admitted to the Sext was now universally binding, irrespective of its original scope. Boniface was not simply adding to the decretals but rather, as he put it when explaining his choice of title, advancing Gregory's five books to the state of perfection proper to the number six. Many glosses on the Sext were written, notably by Joannes Monachus (1301) and JOAN-NES ANDREAE (c. 1301), that of the latter becoming ordinaria. The Sext was printed many times and is part of the official CORPUS IURIS CANONICI of 1582.

Bibliography: L. E. BOYLE, "The Constitution Cum ex eo of Pope Boniface VIII," Medieval Studies 24 (1962) 263–302. G. LE

BRAS, "Boniface VIII: Symphoniste et modérateur," in Mélanges d'histoire du Moyen Age, dédiés à la memoire de Louis Halphen (Paris 1951) 383–394. E. GÖLLER, "Zur Geschichte des zweiten Lyoner Konzils und das Liber Sextus," Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 10.2 (1906) 81–87.

[L. E. BOYLE]

LIBERAL ARTS

A name given in late Roman times to disciplines that were considered preparatory studies for PHILOSOPHY; they were usually counted seven in number and were grouped as the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, and logic) and the quadrivium (arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy). In 20th-century usage, the term has become more general and less precise.

The historical development of the liberal arts tradition, and of its underlying philosophy, is best sketched in terms of its origins in Greek thought, its passage to the West its medieval conception as analyzed by St. Thomas Aquinas, and, finally, its decline in the modern period.

Origins in Greek Thought. From the 8th century B.C., Greek education was based on gymnastics and "music." This latter, eventually called "grammar," included the study of literature and music. These literary studies were expanded during the 5th century by the study of RHETORIC, introduced by the SOPHISTS as they sought to prepare free citizens who could speak in the public assemblies. The Sophist Protagoras about 400 B.C. introduced as a companion to rhetoric the art of debating called eristics, or DIALECTICS, said to have originated with the philosopher ZENO OF ELEA (c. 450).

About the same time another Sophist, Hippias of Elis (see Plato, Protagoras 315C), insisted on the value for public speakers of a broad education in all the arts, including the four mathematical disciplines of arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy developed by the Pythagorean philosophers of the previous century.

These seven arts, along with others mentioned from time to time, were called the ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία (general education). This educational practice was explained theoretically in various ways by different schools of philosophy. Thus Isocrates, a leading rhetorician of the 4th century, defends them in his Antidosis and Panathenaicus as the best preparation of a citizen, since a citizen must lead others by the art of persuasion (rhetoric) and this art requires a broad education.

This sophistic position was vigorously opposed by SOCRATES and PLATO. The latter (especially in Republic bk. 7 and Laws bk. 7) minimizes the value of both poetry and rhetoric, which lead only to opinion, and emphasizes the importance of mathematics as the first step into the realm of science. Such arts are only a preparation for true wisdom, or philosophy, which Plato believed was to be pursued by dialectics, but which was grasped by intuitive wisdom beyond any method.

Aristotle also opposed the Sophists but did not assign to mathematics the same educational significance as Plato. Instead, he gave the fundamental role to LOGIC, a discipline that he himself developed and distinguished from grammar, rhetoric, and dialectics; the latter are methods of probable reasoning, whereas logic is a method of analysis whereby strictly scientific knowledge can be certified.

Other Greek philosophers tended to minimize the value of the liberal arts. This was true of the skeptics, as seen in the attack on these arts by Sextus Empiricus in his Adversus Mathematicos of the 2d century A.D. (see SKEPTICISM). It was true The Epicureans reduced logic to their Canonic, which was more an epistemological defense of sense knowledge than a true logic. The Stoics, on the other hand, did make important contributions both to grammar and to logic, and it is in the writings of Martianus Capella, a Latin of Stoic tendencies (5th century A.D.), that the traditional list of the seven arts and the term artes liberales first appear. Martianus apparently derived his list from that of the Roman encyclopedist Varro (1st century B.C.), which, however, also included architecture and medicine. Yet the Stoics generally took the view expressed by SENECA: "You see why liberal studies are so called: it is because they are worthy of freeborn men. But there is only one really liberal study—that which gives man his liberty. It is the study of wisdom; and that is lofty, brave and great souled. All other studies are puny and puerile" (Epist. 88).

Passage to the West. Such studies continued as a matter of course in Byzantine Christianity and were passed on eventually to Islamic education; here there was no marked development except for some advances in mathematics by Arabian writers. In Western Christianity their good repute was established by St. AUGUSTINE, himself a former teacher of rhetoric, who insisted on the importance of these studies as a preparation for the Christian study of the Sacred Scriptures. He began but did not finish an encyclopedia of the arts. From the works De ordine and De musica it is clear that his conception of these disciplines was essentially Platonic: the order that is found in language, music, and mathematics is a reflection of the perfect order that exists in God. The beginner is led by this sensible reflection of God toward a true vision of Him. For St. Augustine, as a Christian, in this life the vision is possessed only by faith in God's Word.

The detailed transmission of the Greek achievement in these arts came to the West not through Augustine but through BOETHIUS, who attempted, and in part succeeded, in translating into Latin the fundamental Greek works of Aristotle and Euclid. During the Dark Ages these translations, along with various much-abbreviated manuals of the arts, formed the preparation for the study of the Scriptures in the monastic schools (see the Institutiones of CASSIODORUS and the Etymologiae of St. ISIDORE OF SE-VILLE). With ALCUIN and the Carolingian renaissance some real development of these arts began to take place, but it was only in the 12th-century renaissance, with ABE-LARD and the writers of the School of Chartres, that notable progress was made. The most important works of this period are the Didascalion of HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR and the Metalogicon of JOHN OF SALISBURY, both of which, however, still remained within the Augustinian framework.

In the new universities of the 13th century the study of the arts leading to the master of arts degree was the basic faculty that prepared students to go on to law, medicine, or theology or constituted a terminal education. The Augustinian and Platonic view was long dominant and found its finest expression in the De reductione artium ad theologiam of St. Bonaventure. The introduction of the full Aristotelian corpus, however, gave to the Middle Ages a new conception of philosophy as something distinct from the liberal arts and intermediate between them and the study of theology. It is this view that is found in St. Albert the Great, St. Thomas Aquinas, and the later Aristotelian scholastics.

Thomistic Analysis. In his commentary on the De Trinitate of Boethius, St. THOMAS AQUINAS attempted to harmonize the complex tradition outlined above and to explain it along Aristotelian lines. Occasional remarks in other works and especially in his commentary on Aristotle's Posterior Analytics fill out this theory.

Status as Arts. According to Aquinas the liberal arts are arts only in an analogical sense. [See ART (PHILOSO-PHY)]. An art in the strict sense is recta ratio factibilium, i.e., good judgment about making something, where "making" means the production of a physical work. Such a definition applies only to the servile arts; it does not apply to the liberal arts, since these make nothing physical but only a certain "work in the mind," an arrangement of ideas—although, of course, these ideas may be externally expressed by physical symbols. They are called "liberal" precisely because they pertain to the contemplative (speculative) rather than to the active or productive life of man. Many of them, if not all, are true sciences as well as arts because they not only produce a mental work but demonstrate the truth value of this work.

As liberal arts, however, they are not studied for their own truth content but as instruments of other sciences.

Conception of Logic. The clearest example of such a speculative art is logic, which does not deal with any real object but purely with the mental order the mind produces within itself by forming mental relations between one object of thought and another. As Aristotle had seen, however, logic is not a single discipline but a group of related disciplines: (1) demonstrative logic, which analyzes scientific arguments of the strictest type (DEMON-STRATION), wherein the factual evidence is sufficent to yield CERTITUDE; (2) dialectical logic, which analyzes less rigorous types of reasoning such as those involved in discussion, debate, and scientific research, and where only PROBABILITY and OPINION can be obtained; (3) rhetoric, which is similar to dialectics but which also takes into consideration the interests and motives of a particular audience, and which aims at persuasion to action rather than at scientific conviction; and (4) POETICS, which also deals only with probabilities conveyed through stories imitative of human life, whose purpose is the quieting of human passions through the delight felt in contemplating the beautiful. The first two of these logics are instruments for the sciences; the last two, since they deal more with the passions and imagination, are valuable for expressing the truths attained by science or by experience in a way that is ethically effective or pleasing. Although in some respects a very difficult study, logic in its entirety should be taught before the other sciences as the instrument necessary to their perfect functioning.

Grammar, according to Aquinas, is only an auxiliary to these arts and deals with the external expression of thought by verbal symbols. What were later called the fine arts are for him similar to the liberal arts in that they resemble poetics, although they use nonverbal symbols. Those that are purely compositive (the composing of literature or of music) he classified as liberal arts in the strict sense. Those that involve the external execution of a work (such as acting, playing a musical instrument, and the plastic arts) he considered servile disciplines, although the works they produce are liberal in function.

Mathematics. Mathematics, in Aquinas's view, is a science of reality, not merely of mental being. Hence it is markedly distinct from logic; it is deserving of the name of philosophy since it gives insight into the nature of being. Nevertheless, the object with which it deals is abstract QUANTITY; quantity in itself has little dignity because it is a mere accident of things and because it is understood in abstraction rather than in its existence. For this reason mathematics is least among the purely scientific studies. As an instrument, however, it is of great importance for two reasons: (1) since its factual content is slight and its logical rigor great, it is the ideal exemplification of demonstrative logic for the young student whose factual knowledge is limited but who must master the difficult art of demonstrative logic; (2) because it deals with quantities abstracted from their concrete conditions, it is very useful in the natural sciences, which require a study of the quantitative properties of things. Can mathematics then be called a liberal art? Yes, for although it does not make its object (which is real quantity), it does know this object by mental construction, since it studies ideal quantities constructed in the imagination by processes of measurement or counting.

Instruments of Higher Sciences. All these arts are instruments for the higher sciences, which differ from logic in that they deal with real objects, and from mathematics in that they deal with realities considered in their existent condition and not ideally. These real sciences are enumerated by Aquinas as natural science, the moral sciences, and theology, the last of which is divided into natural theology, or metaphysics, and sacred theology. [See SCIENCE (SCIENTIA); SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF.]

Decline in the Modern Period. This ideal of a liberal arts education was never actually realized in the medieval universities, where logic and dialectics tended to dominate to the neglect of the other arts. In the 14th century, NOMINALISM brought this logicism to its ultimate extreme. In strong reaction to this, the Renaissance humanists under the influence of Quintilian and Cicero returned to the emphasis on grammar and rhetoric; they thus developed the so-called "traditional classic education," which dominated lower education but did not succeed in destroying Aristotle in the universities. This movement culminated in the work of Rudolphus Agricola and Peter RAMUS, who attempted to replace Aristotelian logic by a new dialectic, which was actually a pedagogical rhetoric, a tool by which received knowledge could be organized simply for memorization.

The really major change began with advances in mathematics in the 16th and 17th centuries, culminating with the proposal of René DESCARTES to adopt the mathematical deductive method as the universal method of all knowledge. This approach, because of its Platonic tendency, came into sharp conflict with the remains of the Aristotelian inductive tradition as proposed by thinkers such as Francis BACON. A kind of reconciliation was effected by Isaac Newton in the form of what has come to be called the "scientific method," wherein a deductive mathematical theory is grounded in observation and experiment.

Such a method, however, proved not very suitable in the "humanities"—the fine arts, philosophy, theology, history, morals, and politics. As a result, as Jacob Klein has pointed out, a second method, the "historical method," was evolved. Having its roots in the development of critical historiography during the religious controversies of the post-Reformation period, this method was developed by philosophers in the romantic and idealistic traditions such as G. VICO, G. W. F. HEGEL, W. DILTHEY, and R. G. Collingwood (1889-1943). Vico emphasized the logic of historical evidence, but added to this the interpretation of the data by a dialectic based on the power of human sympathy; through this dialectic, man is able to see the events of history as an evolution and expression of his own inner tendencies as a man, in contrast to the impersonal and objective approach of the "scientific method." Later this opposition of method was to be reflected in Western culture as a deep division between those trained in science and those trained in the humanities, between an objective and a subjective point of view, and between the two dominant philosophical tendencies, POSITIVISM and EXISTENTIALISM.

Bibliography: P. H. CONWAY and B. M. ASHLEY, The Liberal Arts in St. Thomas Aquinas (Washington 1959). P. ABELSON, The Seven Liberal Arts (New York 1906). H. I. MARROU, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique (Paris 1958); A History of Education in Antiquity, tr. G. LAMB (New York 1956). R. P. MCKEON, "Rhetoric in the Middle Ages," Speculum 17 (1942) 1–32. W. J. ONG, Ramus: Method and the Decay of Dialogue (Cambridge, MA 1958). R. M. MARTIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 4: 827–843. J. KOCH, ed., Artes liberales: Von der antiken Bildung zur Wissenschaft des Mittelalters (Leiden 1959).

[B. M. ASHLEY]

LIBERAL CATHOLIC CHURCH

A group or groups within a movement known as "Independent Catholicism." It has roots in the Dutch Old Catholicism and has some theological affinities with Roman Catholicism, such as the meaning of sacraments, but with serious departures both in its theology, ecclesiology, and pastoral practice. In the U.S., there is a Liberal Catholic Church (LCC) that is a regional body within the larger international communion and claims legal title to the name in the United States. There is also a group that splintered from this body in 1947, yet is resident in only America. The latter is called the Liberal Catholic Church International, yet its members simply refer to their church as the LCC. Both entities describe themselves as the Liberal Catholic Church or the Liberal Catholic Church in the Province of the United States and both claim "official" status as the true church. Both the LCC (the international body) and the LCCI (the American body) have similarities and differences, but the critical distinction lies in the succession of bishops. In 2001, Dean Bekken was the presiding bishop of the LCCI with a headquarters in San Diego, California; James P. Roberts, Jr., was the LCCI regionary bishop in the Province of the United States (New York). In that same year, Ian Richard Hooker was the presiding bishop of the LCC with a headquarters in London, England; Bishop William Downey was the regionary bishop of the LCC in the Province of the United States (Ojai, California).

Both members of the Liberal Catholic movement use the same basic liturgy and both have an open communion table. Both churches acknowledge the laity's freedom of belief. Both churches accept married and celibate clergy. Both churches will remarry the divorced. Neither church ordains women. However, the LCC requires its clergy to accept the basic tenets of theosophy (reincarnation, karma, ascended masters, etc.) as well as Catholic Christianity; the LCCI requires only that its clergy accept the basic tenets of Catholic Christianity (the Holy Trinity, a real Eucharistic presence, etc.). The LCC does not permit its clergy to receive a salary for their religious work. The LCCI permits a salary if a parish is financially able.

History. On April 28, 1908, Arnold Harris Mathew (1852–1919), a former Roman Catholic priest, was consecrated as the Old Catholic Bishop for Great Britain and Ireland (see OLD CATHOLICS). By 1915, the movement to convert the English to the Old Catholics of Utrecht was failing. On Dec. 31, 1915, Bishop Mathew left to rejoin the Roman Catholic Church and Bishop Frederick Samuel Willoughby soon followed, but not before consecrating James Ingall Wedgwood a bishop. Theosophists of the Old Catholic Mission in Great Britain rallied behind Wedgwood of the famous tableware china family. In 1916, Wedgwood consecrated a kindred spirit in the noted theosophist Charles Webster Leadbeater regionary bishop of Australasia. Within a year's time, Wedgwood and Leadbeater had compiled the liturgy for the church, which on Sept. 6, 1918, was renamed Liberal Catholic.

In 1917 Wedgwood established the church in the United States. Its growth led him to create (1919) the American province under Bishop I. S. Cooper, who by 1924 had built a procathedral in Los Angeles, California. Cooper was consecrated in July 1919 by Wedgwood and Leadbetter. The St. Alban Theological Seminary was established in America in 1923. It is the LCCI's official seminary, and instructs its seminarians worldwide through distance learning from its base in San Diego, California. It is not an accredited institution, nor does it claim to grant educational degrees. There is also a St. Alban's Press that publishes tracts by its theologian-bishops. Adherents of the LCC are estimated to be around 8,000 worldwide; for the LCCI adherents number approximately 5,000.

In 1947 a controversy arose over what appeared to be a jurisdictional dispute between the American clergy and the then presiding bishop, F. W. Pigott of London, England. As part of the dispute, Bishop Pigott "suspended" the regionary bishop, Charles Hampton, and all the clergy supporting him. A cleft between the U.S. regionary and the presiding bishop resulted in litigation over the control of the church. The result was that Bishop Edward M. Matthews was awarded control of church property as well as the name, though the LCC's international governing body, the General Episcopal Synod, did not acknowledge his authority. While he later reconciled with the LCC, control of the American body fell into the hands of Dean Bekken, whom Matthews ordained a priest, and under whose direction the group came to be known as the LCCI. The schism continues to the present day. The effects of this fracturing have been to surface many scores of claimants to the title of "bishop" for an equal number of "churches."

Belief System. Holding that there are diverse paths to truth, the LCCI does not proselytize. The LCC on the other hand is expansionist and has established itself on every continent. Both groups affirm an apostolic succession through Old Catholicism. Both churches permit laity absolute interpretive license, seeking its members' fellowship in their willingness to worship corporately through a common ritual. While no creedal adherence is demanded from its members, some core teachings resonate with other Christian communities. Among these teachings are a doctrine of the Trinity, creation, Christology (including incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension), the seven sacraments, and that the church is the mystical Body of Christ. The LCCI also teaches that human beings are all immortal, both before and after physical death, and bodies are vehicles or expressions of human consciousness wherein the Spirit dwells. It does not teach reincarnation.

In the ministry for both groups, minor orders (cleric, doorkeeper, reader, exorcist, and acolyte) are intended primarily to assist the candidate in his own spiritual growth and life. Major orders (deacon, priest, and bishop) are intended primarily to assist the Christian community. Subdeacon is an intermediate stage. The hierarchy comprises regionary bishops over provinces; suffragans over dioceses; and auxiliaries, with various duties; they are all chosen by the general episcopal synod that also selects the presiding bishop. Presiding bishops for the LCC have been J. I. Wedgwood (1916-23), C. W. Leadbeater (1923-34), F. W. Pigott (1934-56), A. G. Vreede (1956-64), Sir H. Sykes (1964-1973), S. H. P. von Krusenstierna (1973-84), E. S. Taylor (1984-93), and J. C. van Alphen (1993-2000). The LCCI claims apostolic succession up through the presidency of Bishop Pigott and then Bishops R. M. Wardell, E. M. Matthews, F. Erwin, W. H. Daw, J. Neth, and since September, 1979, D. Bekken. The LCCI publishes Community, a thrice-yearly journal of news, articles, book reviews and poetry relating to spirituality and religion. The LCC publishes The Liberal Catholic.

[E. E. BEAUREGARD/P. J. HAYES]

LIBERALISM, RELIGIOUS

Religious liberalism is a naturalist manifestation, an effort at emancipation from supernatural demands, especially those of a dogmatic kind. It found followers in all positive religions (including Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism, and Islam), but it became widespread only in the 19th and 20th centuries. The phenomenon consists of an opposition between the NATURAL and the SUPERNATU-RAL; it stems from a desire to establish new relations between the two. In some cases, it endeavors to redefine the supernatural. When this rational ideal reaches its logical consequences, after being generated and developed in a subjective and individualistic manner, its manifestations are very diverse and seemingly contradictory. These include emancipation of the laity in the fervor of their rational adherence to the Church and their apostolic action (Catholic Liberalism); ecclesiastical liberalism; indifferentism; the rationalism of positivism; the subjectivism of fideism; the social engagement of the disciples of traditionalism; the sentimentality of the supporters of modernism.

Origins. Antiquity knew a degree of skepticism concerning Greek and Roman religions. In the early Christian Era, some individuals displayed a parallel tendency. During the medieval period, some laymen, such as the Ghibellines, on the borders of theocracy, affirmed a desire to emancipate themselves in political matters. Ecclesiastical liberalism appeared in the thought of MARSILIUS OF PADUA and others.

Contemporary religious liberalism, especially in western Europe, traces its origins more markedly to the RENAISSANCE. If the Renaissance did not reject the supernatural, it nevertheless produced, in men like MACHIA-VELLI, a naturalistic mode of thought and action. Although focused especially on secular areas, it did not neglect religious phenomena, as the lives of ERASMUS and St. Thomas MORE demonstrate.

The Reformation, at the convergence of the preceding currents, developed religious liberalism and strengthened its fabric. By proclaiming the primacy of individual conscience and promoting adherence to an invisible church, LUTHER clearly opened the way to free examination, even in religious matters. This remains true even though Luther's ardent faith seemed to correct what was overnaturalistic in his rationality and overinstinctive in his sentimentality. The individual conscience, which Luther extolled and believed to be moved by the Holy Spirit, did away with the guarantees that dogma, ecclesiastical discipline, and rites might otherwise supply.

Precise delineation of religious liberalism had to await the 18th-century ENLIGHTENMENT, with its strivings for liberty. The philosophy of the Enlightenment, which considered reason the noblest manifestation of human dignity, culminated in the Declaration of the Rights of Man (See ENLIGHTENMENT, PHILOSOPHY OF). Its champions had already expressed a desire for liberty. Political circumstances would lead to an even clearer emphasis that human dignity is found in liberty above all. Subjectivist German philosophies, such as that of Immanuel Kant, served to solidify this conviction.

All these currents merged in Hugues Félicité de LA-MENNAIS. This publicist sought to establish harmony between God and liberty and thereby to adapt the Church to the contemporary world. His latent rationalism and subjectivism, however, favored the development of all types of religious liberalism. Although he engaged directly in Liberal Catholicism, he did not fail to influence the rationalistic tendencies of 19th-century liberalism. Liberal Catholicism, considered as a new humanism in thought and action, had very close affiliations with Modernism.

POSITIVISM led equally in the same direction. By endeavoring to impose knowledge at the behest of the external object, it approached Kantian subjectivism, which appeared to make knowledge something internal, something which emerged from itself.

Types. These diverse origins resulted in a great variety of forms of religious liberalism, some orthodox, some heterodox.

Liberal Catholicism can be classed among the former. Despite the encyclical Mirari vos (1832) of Gregory XVI, and other Roman decisions, some of its adepts consciously or unconsciously accepted modern liberties for themselves, so much so that their adversaries regarded them as heretics. The great majority, however, simply wished to help modernize the Church by this approach. They strongly favored emancipation of the laity in political affairs. This was generally true in France and Belgium; also in Italy, at least during certain periods of the Risorgimento. Some, like DÖLLINGER in Germany and Lord John ACTON in England, advocated autonomy for the laity in doctrinal matters.

Ecclesiastical liberalism, which was displayed especially in Belgium (1840) and Switzerland (1846), reproduced a tendency manifest at the Synod of Pistoia (1786), and partially realized in the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY (1792). It sought to introduce democracy into the ecclesiastical hierarchy by having candidates for the episcopacy elected, thereby compromising the rights of the Holy See in the nomination of bishops.

TRADITIONALISM, as advocated by Lamennais was an expression of religious liberalism in the doctrinal domain. It ended by regarding the Church and its teachings not as divine in origin but as one stage in historical evolution.

In its attempt to resolve more precisely the problem of faith, religious liberalism found expression in the theories of HERMES, who considered the act of faith a naturalistic expression of reason and the heart.

Religious liberalism appeared elsewhere in the tendencies of FIDEISM, which, in the manner of ROSMINI-SERBATI, GIOBERTI, and other disciples of ONTOLOGISM, sought to follow the ideas of PLATONISM and discover in faith an intuition, a purely supernatural manifestation inspired by a subjectivism disengaged from rational imperatives.

The subjectivism latent in fideism, and the relativism expressed in traditionalism led to INDIFFERENTISM, which equated, more or less precisely, doctrines of the most diverse, even contradictory, kind, provided they were based on sincerity, the source of certitude and merit.

Enamored with modernity, some tried with more or less good will to impart to dogmas a "historical dimension" and a progressive development. In this class were MÖHLER and others of the Tübingen school.

Others, such as Anton GÜNTHER, turned for inspiration to metaphysics, and derived an explanation of the Trinity and the Incarnation based on reason alone. STRAUSS, RENAN, and others who were devoted to scriptural studies, applied to them positivistic and rationalistic methods and interpreted the sacred books of the Bible as the expression of myths or as merely human language.

Marc SANGNIER and others in France and Italy bore the banner of liberalism into the social domain, where they fought in the name of liberty for the political emancipation and predominance of the working class.

Certain Catholics in the U.S. advanced simultaneously into the terrain of doctrine and of action under the standard of liberty, and engaged in what they termed AMERICANISM. They admitted the activity of the Holy Spirit in souls, but in an individualistic, Lutheran manner. Seeking a new formula of Christian HUMANISM, they attributed to the natural virtues an apostolic efficacy and fecundity superior to that of the supernatural virtues. Active virtues seemed to them better suited to modern times than the passive virtues they conceived to be generally taught in the Gospels.

These types of religious liberalism merged in Modernism, a more precise expression of RATIONALISM. Over and above the reasoning intelligence, it admitted a sort of intuitive and sentimental knowledge which provoked the act of faith. This act, produced more or less by divine grace, was not understood as adherence to a dogma imposed from without, but as the acceptance of a religious truth due to immanent, rational, sentimental, or pragmatic factors. Dogma would, therefore, be described as the effusion of a thinking and emotive soul, and subject, even in its content, to evolution and variation. Modernism penetrated the moral and Biblical sciences, and spread to several countries, notably France, Italy, England, and Germany.

Rationalist tendencies in religious liberalism were equally evident in the thought of Louis SABATIER, Paul SABATIER, and other representatives of Protestant liberalism (see LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL). They were at work also in liberal Judaism and ZIONISM. After abandoning faith in the divinity of Christ or the Mosaic Law, these intellectual directions moved into AGNOSTICISM.

Papal Condemnations. The Holy See condemned some types of religious liberalism. Its political tendencies were reprobated by Pius IX (QUANTA CURA, SYLLABUS OF ERRORS, 1864), and GREGORY XVI (Mirari vos, 1832). The latter Pope likewise attacked its rationalistic and fideistic inclinations (Dum acerbissimas, 1835), and its ecclesiastical ones (Quo graviora, 1833). Leo XIII opposed its activism (TESTEM BENEVOLENTIAE, 1899). Its Modernist trends merited from Pius X the severest condemnations of all (LAMENTABILI and PASCENDI, 1907). Although the protagonists of these movements often protested that Rome did not enunciate their teachings exactly in its condemnations, the Holy See had discovered in all of them an essentially naturalist and rationalist tendency.

Bibliography: C. CONSTANTIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 9.1:506-629. R. AUBERT, "L'Enseignement du magistère ecclesiastique au XIXe siècle sur le liberalisme," Tolérance et communauté humaine (Tournai 1952) 75-105; Le Problème de l'acte de foi (3d ed. Louvain 1958); Le Pontificat de Pie IX (Fliche-Martin 21; 2d ed. 1964). J. LEFLON, La Crise révolutionnaire, 1789-1846 (ibid. 20; 1949). W. NIGG, Geschichte des religiösen liberalismus (Zurich 1937). H. HAAG, Les Origines du catholicisme libéral en Belgique, 1789-1839 (Louvain 1950). G. MARTINA, Il liberalismo cattolico ed il Sillabo (Rome 1959). A. SIMON, Rencontres mennaisiennes en Belgique (Brussels 1963); L'Hypothèse libérale en Belgique (Wetteren 1956). É. POULAT, Histoire, dogme, et critique dans la crise moderniste (Tournai 1962). P. POUPARD, Un Essai de philosophie chrétienne au XIXe siècle: L'Abbé Louis Bautain (Paris 1962). P. SCOPPOLA, Crisi modernista e rinnovamento cattolico in Italia (Bologna 1961). J. RIVIÈRE, Le Modernisme dans l'Église (Paris 1929); Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 10.2:2010-47. H. J. SCHOEPS, Israel und Christenheit (Munich 1961). C. BAUER, Staatslexikon, ed. Görres-Gesellschaft (Freiburg 1957–63) 5:370–380. E. DEUERLEIN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanishe Konsil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 6:1007–10.

[A. SIMON]

LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL

Protestant Christianity was dominated in the 19th and early 20th centuries by liberal theology. This article describes briefly the setting into which it was born, the factors of its coming to be, and its species, insofar as they can be distinguished. In conclusion, it distills out of this description the elements common to the movement.

Setting. In the early 19th century Protestant scholasticism, for a long time on the wane, was in utter disrepute. This was due in great measure to the ascendancy of DEISM and RATIONALISM, but also to the appearance of REVIVALISM, a movement that rejected the dry speculation of the scholastics, but that by the same token did not really meet the problems raised by the champions of the ENLIGHTENMENT. Also on the scene, of course, was the Kantian synthesis, wherein God and immortality were viewed as postulates of moral experience.

Factors. If theological liberalism be viewed, in the first place, as an attempt to conciliate these conflicting forces, it is just to accord F. SCHLEIERMACHER the title Father of Liberal Theology. In fact, his first published work was a sort of apologia for religion, addressed to the adherents of the rationalist school. Schleiermacher's idea about religion, moreover, became the leitmotiv for the entire liberal movement. In Der christliche Glaube he articulated these ideas with more precision, indicating that the essence of religion (common to all religions) is the feeling or immediate consciousness of being absolutely dependent upon God, and that the various religions (including Christianity) are peculiar modifications of this feeling. For Christians the attitude of Jesus in this regard is exemplary; and religious beliefs, doctrines, or dogmas are born from reflection on this affective sensibility.

Higher criticism of the Bible was another important factor in the formation of the liberal movement. The so-called Leben-Jesu-Forschung was carried on throughout the 19th century (see JESUS CHRIST, BIOGRAPHICAL STUDIES OF); and it is present too in contemporary Protestant exegesis. In general the critics of the earlier period abandoned the notion that the Bible is an infallible record of divine revelation; but their outlook concerning the meaning of the Gospel accounts of the life of Jesus varied with the numerous philosophical standpoints open to the liberal school. From a purely rationalist starting point, H. E. G. Paulus did away with everything supernatural in the Bible. D. F. STRAUSS was more under the influence of HEGEL'S IDEALISM; and to him is owed the introduction of the category of "myth" into the Biblical question. [See MYTH AND MYTHOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE).] Strauss's French counterpart, E. RENAN, reduced everything supernatural in the Gospels to legend. Another group of German liberal critics attempted, on similar bases, a psychologically oriented description of the historical "personality" of Jesus; and for them He was simply the herald of MESSIANISM, a profound thinker, and the founder, here and now, of the KINGDOM OF GOD (see ESCHATOLOGISM).

The contribution of A. RITSCHL to the genesis of the liberal movement is not to be discounted. The main thesis of his theology of moral values is that the gospel is suspended on an ellipse between two foci: JUSTIFICATION and Redemption [see REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE)], on the one hand (the redemptive work of Christ), and on the other the kingdom of God (the fellowship of redeemed persons). Ritschl also insisted that a genuine understanding of the love of God demands a reevaluation of the doctrine of ORIGINAL SIN—meaning of course an affirmation of the integrity of human nature. These views are characteristically assimilated into liberalism in all its forms.

The dialectic between religion and science is a final factor in the birth of theological liberalism. Among Protestants the notions of DARWIN were applied widely in fields other than that of biology, with the effect of reinforcing the following notions: (1) that God is immanent in the world (see IMMANENCE); (2) that Redemption consists in a gradual transformation of man from the state of the brute to a condition of obedient sonship to God; (3) that the relation of the Christian religion to other religions is to be understood in evolutionary terms.

The substance of these tendencies was epitomized in the thought of A. von HARNACK, in whom theological liberalism found its strongest protagonist. In his Das Wesen des Christentums Von Harnack made the core of Christianity to consist in the personality and teaching of Jesus. This teaching, moreover, he conceived as susceptible of being summarized in three simple statements: (1) The kingdom of God is coming. (2) God is our Father and thus the value of the human soul is infinite. (3) Christian life consists in perfect righteousness and the fulfillment of the commandment of love. Von Harnack saw that even in primitive Christianity this pure gospel tended to be cast into the alloy of Hellenistic Christianity—the Pauline synthesis. His program, of course, was a return to primitive simplicity, wherein ecclesiastical structures would give way to the real gospel. The contact of Von Harnack with certain figures in the Modernist crisis is well known. Species. Though it is difficult to categorize so many different currents of thought, theological liberalism seems to be specified by two main emphases. The first of these consists in an assimilation of the theological view of the Enlightenment, which reduced the doctrines of faith to religious and moral principles capable of being discovered and understood by unaided human reason. In this category one may locate the greater number of liberal theologians whose main endeavor was the Leben-Jesu-Forschung. Such a view is implicit even in the thought of Schleiermacher, who, however, introduced a notion that became very dear to the liberals: feeling or sentiment as the starting point of religion, from which doctrines might be derived.

The other species of theological liberalism harks back to the Hegelian-inspired theory of the Christian religion's being the fulfillment and crown of the progress of the human spirit. Those who followed this bent make up the so-called Religionsgeschichtliche Schule, e.g., D. F. Strauss, A. E. Biedermann, F. C. BAUR (the last named was distinguished also by his debates with the Catholic theologian of Tübingen, J. A. Möhler). They set forth the doctrine of immanence in terms that constitute a denial of the distinction between the natural and the supernatural. In the same vein knowledge of God communicated through Jesus Christ is considered to be quite excellent, but no different in kind from any other knowledge of divine reality.

Common Elements. Throughout the gamut of theological liberalism the same themes occur: a certain confusion of revelation and human reason; the reduction of DOGMA to the philosophy of religion (see RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY OF); and the identification of the development of the DEPOSIT OF FAITH with the speculative unfolding of man's self-consciousness. Certain corollaries of these basic principles also appear frequently: a radical distinction between the "Jesus of history" and the "Christ of the creeds"; maximum optimism concerning the status of man in relation to God, with an attenuated doctrine of sin and its effects. And throughout the entire system the constantly recurring note is the exaltation of the faith experience as the ultimate authority in matters of religion.

Bibliography: J. DILLENBERGER and C. WELCH, Protestant Christianity Interpreted Through Its Development (New York 1958). A. VON HARNACK, What Is Christianity, tr. T. B. SAUNDERS (2d ed. New York 1903). W. LOHFF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1005–07. F. MUSSNER, ibid. 6:859–864. J. H. NEWMAN, An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent, ed. C. F. HARROLD (New York 1947; Image Bk. 1955). F. SCHLEIERMACHER, The Christian Faith, ed. H. R. MACKINTOSH and J. S. STEWART (Edinburgh 1928; 2 v. 1963). D. E. ROBERTS and H. P. VAN DUSEN, eds., Liberal Theology (New York 1942).

[M. B. SCHEPERS]

LIBERALITY, VIRTUE OF

Liberality is the virtue disposing a person to the observance of a reasonable mean between the opposite extremes of prodigality and stinginess in making expenditures intended for the benefit of others. Although liberality is the virtue that regulates and controls the appetite for external goods, the desire and use of these goods to the benefit of others enters prominently into its concept, and indeed constitutes its principal concern. Generally speaking, men are sufficiently disposed by nature to seek and use such goods to their own pleasure and advantage, and so need no virtue to equip them for this. Moreover, what they spend upon themselves is often spent in the exchange of one kind of possession for another and thus involves no real outlay. What a man needs to be strengthened to is a readiness to use these goods to the benefit of others besides himself. Liberality differs from justice because what is given is not strictly owed; from mercy, because it is not evoked by the need of the beneficiary; from gratitude, because its gifts are not viewed as a return for favors received. Although it differs from charity in that its proximate motive is the inherent fitness of a spirit of generosity in human relationships, it may well be activated at the command of charity, and it is a disposition that lends itself readily to the service of that virtue.

It is characteristic of the liberal man to be generous in giving to others, but his generosity should not be out of proportion to his means, nor should a man let it render him incapable of satisfying the demands of justice, piety, or charity, nor should it entail the sacrifice of other virtuous good. Excess in liberality is the sin of prodigality, but generosity, prudently moderated, becomes the socially developed man and the Christian, and therefore St. Paul urged the Ephesians to labor, working with their hands, that they might have something to share with their neighbors (Eph 4.28). The virtue of liberality in a man is not necessarily measured by the actual quantity of his benefactions, but often depends more upon the disposition with which he gives (Mk 12.41–44).

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 117–119. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis, 3 v. (Paris 1949) 2:840–842.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

LIBERATION THEOLOGY

The term "liberation theology" covers a diversity of theological movements. Historically and specifically, it refers to a recent theological line of thought within Latin America that focuses on the political, economic, and ideological causes of social inequality and makes liberation rather than development its central theological, economic, and political category. It not only analyzes the concrete Latin-American situation, but it argues that all theology should begin by analyzing its concrete social situation and by returning to its religious sources for means to rectify it. Some of the ideas liberation theology were taken up by the Second General Conference of the Latin American Episcopate (CELAM) that met in Medellín, Colombia in 1968. The Medellín documents describe the institutional violence and the exploitive relations of dependency in the social situation and they point to the need for cultural and economic liberation.

In a more extended sense, liberation theology refers to any theological movement making the criticism of oppression and the support of liberation integral to the theological task itself. Black theology and feminist theology are therefore seen as major types of liberation theology. The term has also been appropriated by other minority groups. Because of its relationship with specific groups, some view liberation theology negatively as simply a specific cultural movement in which specific groups appeal to religious beliefs in order to legitimate their particular agenda and goals.

Common Methodology of Liberation Theologies.

In its more fundamental and extended meaning, liberation theology refers to a theological method. Notwithstanding the diversity of liberation theologies they share a common theological methodology. This methodology brings to the fore within theology an awareness of the sociology of knowledge, since it underscores the interrelation between theory and praxis. It outlines the social and cultural conditions of theological concepts and institutional patterns. Therefore, it encourages theology to become more self-reflective about the socio-political basis of its religious symbols and their consequential praxis. It advocates a practical as well as theoretical role for theology as a discipline. Several basic traits constitute the common methodology of liberation theology.

Starting Point. The starting-point of liberation theology is an analysis of the concrete socio-political situation and the uncovering of the discrimination, alienation, and oppression within it. The discrepancy between the rich and poor within individual countries and between the advanced and developing nations leads Latin-American liberation theology to single out the relations of dependency between nations as the cause of this inequality. It therefore censures theories of development reinforcing rather than correcting the exploitation. It therefore demands liberation and not development. Feminist theology argues that the discrimination against women in society and Church is not only factual, but has been given cultural and religious legitimation. Black theology not only points to socio-economic discrimination, but also underscores its cultural causes. All liberation theologies therefore undertake to demonstrate by their analysis of the concrete situation not only the existence of discrimination or oppression, but also its economic and cultural causes.

Reflection on the Religious Tradition. Secondly, liberation theology studies the religious tradition in relation to this contemporary analysis and experience which provides a new perspective for reading and interpreting the tradition. Does the tradition support or allow the unjust situation? Or does it work against it? Much of Latin-American liberation theology examines how the Church's mission has been understood. Has the distinction between priests and laity led to a dichotomy in which the priest has a spiritual mission and the laity a worldly one without much interrelation? Has the Church's mission been bifurcated by separating its salvific function from its concern for the world? Feminist theology describes how masculine language and patriarchal images have specified the religious understanding of God and how anthropological misconceptions have become institutionalized as religious taboos. Black theology not only uncovers how the oppression of blacks has been legitimated in church history, but also shows how fundamental images of blackness and whiteness have led to this oppression. In each liberation theology, therefore, the present experience and analysis of injustices has led to a critique not only of the present but also the past with its cultural and religious traditions.

The Reconstructive Task. Thirdly, liberation theology proposes that theology has the twofold constructive task of retrieval and reinterpretation. Theology should retrieve those forgotten religious symbols or neglected ecclesial practices that could serve to overcome the oppression. It equally proposes a fundamental reinterpretation of traditional religious symbols and beliefs that legitimate oppression or discrimination. Latin-American liberation theology seeks not only to retrieve the public dimension of faith and the political mission of the Church, but also to reinterpret traditional conceptions of sin, grace, salvation history, and eschatology. Sin is reinterpreted as social sin in reference to social structures. Development—political, cultural, and economic—is related to God's Kingdom not merely as sign, image, or anticipation, but as a causal relation that underscores continuity and fulfillment. Black theology discovers in black experience, history, and culture the resources to overcome alienations. It reinterprets traditional conceptions of divine providence, suffering, and salvation. Feminist theology retrieves images of the femininity of God and views of the equality of the sexes within the history of religions and Christianity. It also reinterprets traditional religious symbols and beliefs. It does not simply urge that sexist language be excluded from biblical, liturgical, and theological texts, but seeks to revise dominant images of God. Likewise it suggests that the traditional conceptions of original sin as pride or the desire for power often expresses masculine rather than feminine experience.

Praxis as Criterion. Fourthly, liberation theologies make concrete praxis not only a goal but also a criterion of theological method. Present experience and praxis provide not only a source from which tradition is questioned, but also a criterion by which the truth of theological affirmations can be judged. Much diversity exists among liberation theologians in regard to the norm of theological affirmations. Within Black theology James Cone takes a Barthian position, where J. Deotis Roberts is more Tillichean. Often Latin-American liberation theologies so underscore the primacy of praxis that their positions could be described as a sort of theological consequentialism. Feminist theology along with the others places a premium on personal experience and partisan commitment as a source and criterion of theological affirmations. Since all liberation theologies focus on the relation between theory and praxis, they emphasize the significance of praxis as a source and goal. They demand that theology concern itself with concrete social and political goals. Moreover, these goals should be more than those established by the present structures of society. Instead they should involve a restructuring of society itself. Only if society is restructured and its culture revised, they believe, can their visions of emancipation and liberation be achieved.

Criticisms. Both the individual liberation theologies and the common methodological basis have been criticized, the criticisms centering on the question of criteria and goals. Firstly, since liberation theologies strive to eliminate social discrimination and political oppression, they are criticized for identifying the Church's mission as an immanent socio-political goal rather than as a transcendent, eschatological end. Secondly, since liberation theology appeals to personal experience as a source and norm of theological reflection, it is criticized for replacing objectivity with partisanship. Thirdly, since the goal of liberation is a standard by which the religious tradition is evaluated, it is objected that such a standard is unspecified unless one already has a vision of what constitutes genuine liberation. In response liberation theologians strive to show how precisely the transcendence of the Christian vision contributes to political reform and how this vision provides the ultimate norm of theological reflection and praxis. Its aim is not to eliminate transcendence, but to link this transcedence with social, political, and cultural reform.

Bibliography: General surveys of Latin-American theology and liberation theology: H. ASSMANN, Theology for a Nomad Church (New York 1976). J. MIGUEL BONINO, Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation (Philadelphia 1975). F. FLORENZA, "Latin-American Liberation The-Theology," Interpretation 28 n. 4 (1974) 441–457. G. GUTIERREZ, A Theology of Liberation, tr. C. INDA and J. EAGLESON (New York 1973). J. SEGUNDO, A Theology for Artisans of a New Humanity, tr. J. DRURY (5 v., New York 1973); The Liberation of Theology, tr. J. DRURY (New York 1976). History of the movement: E. DUSSEL, History and Theology of Liberation (New York 1976). Documents of a conference bringing all liberation theologies of North America together: S. TORRES and J. EAGLESON, Theology in the Americas (New York 1976). A. T. HEN-NELLY, ed., Liberation Theology: A Documentary History (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1990). H. MCKENNIE GOODPASTURE, ed., Cross and Sword: An Eyewitness History of Christianity in Latin America (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1989). P. C. PHAN, "Method in Liberation Theology," Theological Studies 61 (2000) 40-63. L. and C. BOFF, Introducing Liberation Theology, tr. P. BURNS (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1986). C. CADORETTE, et al., eds., Liberation Theology: An Introductory Reader (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1992). F. E. CROWE, "Bernard Lonergan and Liberation Theology," in W. L. YSAAC, ed., The Third World and Bernard Lonergan: A Tribute to a Concerned Thinker (Manila 1986).

[F. SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA]

LIBERATION THEOLOGY, LATIN AMERICA

In Latin America liberation theology is an interpretation of Christian faith out of the experience of the poor (their suffering, struggles, and hope); a theological critique of the injustice in existing society and its legitimizing ideologies; and reflection on criteria for the activity of the Church and of Christians. These aspects are obviously interconnected: e.g., involvement in the struggle for justice sharpens the reading of Scripture, and it is the Biblical vision that makes the critique of existing society theological.

The primary audience addressed by this theology is neither an academic theological community nor the poor themselves, but pastoral agents (priests, sisters, lay) working with the poor. Although the questions arise out of pastoral work, liberation theologians are not concerned with an immediate "how-to" but rather with the theological sense of the experience of poor and struggling Christians. The overall enterprise is aimed at providing a theologically grounded rationale for pastoral work with a liberating orientation. To a degree this involves defending its legitimacy within the Church.

Since its inception in the 1960s this theology has understood "liberation" to mean a process of basic change toward a more just and participatory society, one in which people will be able to live more as brothers and sisters. Liberation theology does not describe in any detail what such a society would be like nor how it would be reached. A frequent theme is that of "integral" liberation: ending the oppression of the poor is a dimension of the total liberation (from sin and death) effected by Christ.

Liberation theology pays particular attention to its context, both sociopolitical and eccesial. Thus far, three such contexts may be more or less clearly discerned. 1) Liberation theology emerged in the late 1960s and early 1970s as Latin Americans concluded that current models of development would not bring most people out of poverty. What was needed was a new model of development—a revolution (not necessarily violent). The 1968 CELAM (Latin American Bishops Conference) meeting at MEDELLÍN, Colombia, was a major catalyst (see LATIN AMERICA, CHURCH IN). 2) A wave of military coups led to repressive military dictatorships in most of Latin America during the 1970s. As repression affected pastoral work, church people often found themselves working to defend elemental human rights. Moreover, Archbishop Lopez Trujillo, elected secretary-general of CELAM in 1972, set out to counter liberation theology. 3) Developments beginning in 1978 to 1979 (election of Pope John Paul II; CELAM meeting in Puebla, Mexico; revolution in Central America; gradual return to civilian rule in most of Latin America) signalled a third kind of social and ecclesial context.

Local conditions often varied from these general situations. For example, during the late 1960s and early 1970s, when repression was worst in Brazil, the Peruvian military government was attempting to implement populist programs. The Brazilian church, representing 40 percent of Latin-American Catholics, relied on its own internal structures and paid little attention to CELAM. Finally; at the village or barrio level, conditions often showed little variation, despite larger political shifts. With these qualifications, the sociopolitical and ecclesial context remains important for liberation theology.

Themes. Liberation theologians reflect on the perennial themes: God, creation, Israel, Jesus Christ, the Church, etc. Their concern, however, is not to justify belief in the face of unbelief, but to serve evangelization in a context of oppression. With regard to the "Godquestion," for example, theologians have retrieved the Biblical category of IDOLATRY. Certain realities, such as wealth, political power, or national security, have taken on an absolute importance, above the welfare and even the life of many human beings, becoming "divinities of death." The Biblical God, however, is a living God who desires that human beings have life—and not only "spiritual" life. Whereas North Atlantic theology seeks to respond to the doubts of its interlocutors, Latin American theology points to a "battle of the gods"—between the divinities of death and the God of life.

While sharing in the larger christological enterprise of biblicists and theologians elsewhere, Latin-American theologians have their own particular emphases. Leonardo Boff, Jon Sobrino, and Juan Luis Segundo, among others, have devoted major attention to Christology. Their central concern however, is not so much to verify with utmost precision what can be known of the "historical" Jesus, as to reflect on the significance of Jesus as a historical actor: his message, his action, the enmity and conflict he aroused, leading eventually to his death; in the Resurrection they see God's vindication of his message and work. The experience of the poor and of persecution of those who struggle for justice has sensitized them to the conflictive aspects of the GOSPEL accounts. They are interested not only in the history lived by Jesus, but in the history-making potential of that history for later generations and especially today. They do not anachronistically seek to make Jesus a first-century revolutionary, but they are convinced that Jesus has revolutionary implications. One central theme is that of the kingdom, the most allembracing symbol of what Jesus proclaimed. Advances in justice and love are partial realizations of the kingdom, steps toward its definitive consummation. The Church must be ever aware that it is not the kingdom, but is to serve the kingdom.

Latin-American theology is very ecclesial—it grows out of pastoral work and much of the theological writing itself addresses the (specifically Roman Catholic) Church. The notion of the "popular church" is a focus of controversy. Starting in the 1960s, the basecommunity became a common, though far from universal, model of pastoral work. In Brazil, a nationwide meeting on base-communities coined the expression "church born of the people through the Spirit of God" (1975), usually shortened to "popular church." The intent of the term was not anti-institutional but simply referred to the church "happening," as it were, among the poor masses of the people, when they are evangelized and begin to live their faith at the local level with their own expressions of worship and mutual concern. This is also understood as an ecclesial expression of a process taking place in society as a whole, as poor people become active agents in society, especially in movements to defend their rights. In the period leading up to the CELAM meeting at Puebla (1979) the term became polemical. There the bishops, following Pope JOHN PAUL II, warned against the notion of a "popular church," which they assumed to be in opposition to an "institutional church."

Similarly, the bishops, while supporting basecommunities, warned that they were incomplete and stressed that the Church is more fully present in the parish, and even more fully present in the diocese. From this perspective, the base-community is regarded as the lowest subdivision of the world-church. Yet, it is also argued that if the "fullness" of the Church exists where people live the gospel injunction, then it exists fully in the basecommunity, and in fact, the "higher" levels of the church (parish or diocese) exist to serve the "front lines" where people seek to put the gospel into practice. If the fullness of the Church is there, should it not be expressed eucharistically? If present ministerial structures make that impossible, might they not be changed? It is within this kind of argument that Leonardo Boff raised the question of ordination for married people, including women, at the base-community level.

Most Latin-American liberation theologians operate consciously within the Roman Catholic horizon. They have generally not raised certain questions (papal ofrice and infallibility, sexual morality) commonly discussed in post-Vatican II North Atlantic theology, and they go out of their way to avoid taking on a rebel role, e.g., Boff accepted his silencing (1985). They do not want the central issue of the liberation of the poor to be obscured by ecclesiastical controversies. Their position also reflects a basic acceptance of Roman Catholic eccesiology. For example, in critiquing the "Ratzinger document" [Libertatis Nuntius (Aug. 6, 1985)], Juan Luis Segundo explicitly accepted the magisterium, and expressly argued that the authority of Vatican II was higher than that of a Roman congregation (see below).

Although relatively few in number, Protestants have played an important role in the development of liberation theology. Nevertheless, ecumenism is more a matter of practical collaboration than of expressly thematized theological reflection.

Critique of Society—Marxism. There is a consensus that existing development models do not serve the poor majority. PUEBLA spoke of a "grave structural conflict" (i.e., conflict is inherent in existing socioeconomic and political structures) and quoted Pope John Paul II: "The growing affluence of a few people parallels the growing poverty of the masses." Puebla also critiqued ideologies (capitalist liberalism, Marxist collectivism, national security), but as if the Church and its social teaching were above ideology. Liberation theologians question this stance and tend to see ideology as embedded in language and part of the human condition. Moreover, they distinguish between ideologies as all-embracing philosophical systems, such as dialectical materialism, and as limited analytical instruments, means toward an end, specifically for understanding how society functions with a view toward changing it. In this limited understanding they make use of Marxism as do virtually all Latin-American intellectuals who are serious about structural change. Militant grassroots organizations also usually make some use of Marxist categories of analysis.

Nevertheless, Marxism appears rather less frequently in liberation theology than one might expect. Some theologians scarcely mention it, and only a few deal with it head on. Segundo in Faith and Ideologies (Maryknoll, New York 1984) has an extended critique. In The Ideological Weapons of Death (Maryknoll 1986), Franz Hinkelammert utilizes Marx's concept of fetishism as a major category for uncovering the idolatry present in major Western thinkers and even, he believes, in representatives of Catholic social teaching.

Issues Relating to Practice. Although their questions arise from pastoral work, liberation theologians are not interested in resolving immediate issues, but in elaborating criteria for what the Church and Christians should do. In raising the question of the unity of the Church, for example, John Sobrino was no doubt stimulated by particular conflicts within EL SALVADOR, particularly divisions within the Church over how to respond to the increasing repression and growing popular militancy during the late 1970s. In response, he sought to discern ecclesiological criteria (e.g., that the Church is to serve not itself but the kingdom, and that tension between prophetism and institution is to be expected). He observed that "authority is not the final or sole criterion of discernment," which is rather to be sought in the "communal doing of truth." Unity within the Church will always be "relative, partial, and provisional" and is achieved "through the dialectic of union and conflict." Such a position cautions against an easy reliance on unity with the bishops as a single criterion for Church unity, and suggests a theological basis for living with some tension within the Church, when that tension arises out of the struggle for justice.

The establishment of a revolutionary government in NICARAGUA (1979) raised many questions—practical, but ultimately theological—for Christians, although not a great deal of formal theological writing. People's responses were largely based on a prior political judgement. If one assumed that the Sandinista government was Marxist and that Marxism is ultimately incompatible with Christianity, the Christian response should logically be one of opposition. Numerous Christians, including priests, sisters and theologians, had a different perspective. They argued that discernment should be based not on how the Church would fare institutionally but on the revolution's capability of bringing about a more human life for the majority of the people. On that criterion, they judged that it was the best feasible alternative, and that Christians should support the revolutionary process. Such support should be critical, but criticism should be made within an overall position of support and participation, not from outside or in a manner that would undermine the revolution itself.

For its part the Sandinista front departed from the precedent of all previous Marxist parties in power when it officially declared that the (Marxist) view of religion as a "machine of alienation" was a product of a particular period in history, and was not true of Nicaragua. This was in effect a rejection of Marx's "opium of the people" dictum as a timeless principle. The Sandinistas furthermore declared that religious belief would not bar anyone form being a Sandinista—a clear break with the practice of Marxist governments in power. As relations between the hierarchy and the Sandinista government worsened, Christians supportive of the revolution maintained that the problem was essentially one of division within the Church over how to respond to the revolution and not a fundamental clash between the Church itself and the revolution.

Liberation Theology and Magisterium. Liberation theology's relationship to official Catholic teaching is complex, and in fact, official Church teaching is close to liberation theology on significant points. The 1971 synod of bishops declared that "action on behalf of justice and participation in the transformation of the world fully appear to us as a constitutive dimension of the preaching of the gospel, or . . . of the Church's mission for the redemption of the human race and its liberation from every oppressive situation," a position echoed at the 1974 synod. Similarly, the Puebla document (1979) shows the effects of liberation theology, especially in its "preferential option for the poor." Latin American theologians welcomed and wrote commentaries on Pope John Paul II's encyclical LABOREM EXERCENS (1981).

Nevertheless, there are numerous disputed points, most of which were expressed in the 1984 Instruction of the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, headed by Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger. While acknowledging the sincerity of many pastoral workers, and the legitimacy of the theme of liberation, the Instruction points to "deviations and risks" present in some "liberation theologies." (This use of the plural implies that there exist legitimate and illegitimate forms. When leading exponents such as Boff and Gutierrez were summoned to Rome, however, it was unclear who the proponents of a legitimate liberation theology might be.)

Objections can be divided into those against the use of Marxist analysis, and those against what is regarded as liberation theology's hermeneutics. Arguments against Marxism are made on several grounds: that it claims to be "scientific" but in fact overlooks essential aspects, that it promotes "class struggle" and violence, and is committed to atheism. Moreover, existing Marxist regimes, a "shame of our times," are totalitarian and hold millions of people in servitude. As for hermeneutics, liberation theology is said to propose "a novel interpretation of both the content of faith and of Christian existence which seriously departs from the faith of the Church, and in fact actually constitutes a practical negation." Its reading of the Bible is reductionist and it twists the notion of the truth through praxis, making it the criterion for truth. Similarly, it is argued that the Church is "emptied of its specific reality, and its sacramental and hierarchical structure . . . which was willed by the Lord himself." The Instruction is a compendium of charges raised against liberation theology since the early 1970s.

Initially most liberation theologians, such as Gutierrez and Boff, took a benign view of the Instruction, stating that what it presented was a caricature of liberation theology, and that any theologian who held such views would merit censure. They also stated that it reflected a European view, remote from the Latin American experience. Juan Luis Segundo, however, directly confronted the Instruction. In a close reading of the text, and especially the first half, which deals with general principles, he extracted the Instruction's implicit underlying theology, particularly a dualistic pattern of thought that he held was overcome at Vatican II. He noted that PAUL VI, anticipating that some might wonder whether the Church had "deviated toward the anthropocentric positions of modern culture," had responded, "Deviated, no; turned, yes." In Segundo's assessment, the Instruction is at odds with the theology developed at Vatican II, whose authority is higher than that of a Roman Congregation.

The April 1986 "Instruction on Christian Freedom and Liberation" issued by the same congregation, avoided condemnations, although its tone and style were alien to Latin American thinking. The lifting of Boff's silencing and a cordial meeting between the Brazilian bishops and Pope John Paul II during the same month also signalled a lessening of tension.

Contraction and Expansion. In the 1990s, Liberation Theology experienced both contraction and expansion. The contraction, mainly experienced at home in Latin America, was the result of pressure from both the Vatican and some bishops in CELAM. Nonetheless theologians struggled to prove themselves faithful carriers of Catholic theology and continued to flourish under ecclesiastical activism. Creative expansion of the movement fostered a quieter but even greater impact in a number of areas and on a global scale. By adhering to their methodological starting point of a careful reading of the "signs of the times" as Gaudium et spes recommended, liberation theology expanded its horizons well beyond a Marxist critique and dependency theory to a broader theological critique of culture, a more discerning examination of neo-Liberal economies, and the quest for authentic, integral development in the Third World. The fall of the Berlin wall provided the opening for movement from an ideological posture of confrontation to a more theologically and educationally focused engagement with local, national and global structures. The focus on the suffering poor continued but with a clearer understanding of the impact of globalization, urbanization and technology on that suffering. Following the lead of the founding fathers of liberation thought, Gustavo Gutiérrez and Juan Lois Segundo, José Comblin emphasized the "changing context" but still highlighted the freedom of Christ as "calling and risk." He continued, "It is God's gift, and the Pauline name for the reign of God." It is a gift that never reaches completion on earth but is the fundamental drive that guides the human adventure with its joys and tragedies. That freedom in Jesus Christ constitutes the human calling and vocation. It is that profound sense of freedom which allows for a deeper grasp of poverty. Jon Sobrino's treatment of Jesus Christ as liberator advances this line of thought.

Liberation theology's impact at the beginning of the 21st century had expanded to the whole globe and touched the thorny issues of gender and indigenous cultures. African, Asian, Black, Feminist and Indigenous Theologians were influenced by the methods of liberation theology. A candid and honest cross-fertilization enriched these efforts in contextual theology in a rapidly globalizing world. Likewise, the liberation motif had a positive reaction in other world religions. Liberation theology movements emerged in BUDDHISM, JUDAISM and ISLAM. The imprint of liberation thinking also registered in Catholic social teaching, most notably perhaps, in Sollicitudo Rei Socialis (1988) and Ecclesia in America (1998) of Pope John Paul II. That same imprint could be deciphered in the important worldwide pastoral efforts surrounding debt relief for underdeveloped countries and faith-based community organizing in the poor inner cities of the United States. Finally, it should be noted that liberation theology, and particularly the "conscientization" approach of Paulo Freire, were singled out as a unique Catholic-Christian contribution to sustainable and integral social-economic development worldwide.

In both its contraction and expansion liberation theology continued, in a modest way, to give a Christian direction for the global pursuit of justice for all peoples.

Bibliography: P. BERRYMAN, Liberation Theology (New York 1987); The Religious Roots of Rebellion (Maryknoll 1984). L. BOFF, Ecclesiogenesis (Maryknoll 1986). J. EAGLESON and P. SCHARPER, eds., Puebla and Beyond (Maryknoll 1980). G. GUTIER-REZ, The Power of the Poor in History (Maryknoll 1983). J. L. SEGUNDO, Theology and the Church: A Response to Cardinal Ratzinger and a Warning to the Whole Church (Minneapolis, Minnesota 1985). J. SOBRINO, The True Church and the Poor (Maryknoll 1984). J. COMBLIN, Called for Freedom: The Changing Context of Liberation Theology (Maryknoll 1998). G. GUTIERREZ, The Density of the Present: Selected Writings (Maryknoll 1999). A. T. HENNEL-LY, Liberation Theologies: The Global Pursuit of Justice (Mystic, Connecticut 1995). R. J. SCHREITER, The New Catholicity: Theology between the Global and the Local (Maryknoll 1997). I. ELLACURIA and J. SOBRINO, eds., Mysterium liberationis: Fundamental Concepts of Liberation Theology (Maryknoll 1993). P. C. PHAN, "The Future of Liberation Theology," The Living Light 28/3 (1992) 259–71. M. P. AQUINO, Our Cry for Life: Feminist Theology from Latin America (Maryknoll 1993). B. L. SHERWIN and H. KASIMOW, eds., John Paul II and Interreligious Dialogue (Maryknoll 1999). G. DE SCHRIJVER, ed., Liberation Theologies on Shifting Grounds: A Clash of Socio-Economic and Cultural Paradigms (Leuven 1998). D. BATSTONE, et al., eds., Liberation Theologies, Postmodernity, and the Americas (London 1997). J. SOBRINO, Jesus the Liberator (Maryknoll 1994); Christ the Liberator (Maryknoll 2001). M. ENGELBERT, "African Liberation Theology," L. BOFF and V. ELI-ZONDO, eds., Concilium 199 (Edinburgh 1988). A. PIERIS, An Asian Theology of Liberation (Maryknoll 1988). E. MARTEY, African Theology: Inculturation and Liberation (Maryknoll 1993). C. S. QUEEN and S. B. KING, Engaged Buddhism: Buddhist Liberation Movements in Asia (Albany 1996). A. ENGINEER, Islam and Liberation Theology: Essays on Liberative Elements in Islam (New Delhi 1990). O. MADURO, ed., Judaism, Christianity, and Liberation: An Agenda for Dialogue (Maryknoll 1991).

[P. BERRYMAN/J. P. HOGAN]

LIBERATORE, MATTEO

Jesuit philosopher and theologian; b. Salerno, Aug. 14, 1810; d. Rome, Oct. 18, 1892. After his studies and ordination in Naples, he was assigned to teach philosophy and later theology at the Jesuit college there (1837–48). He collaborated with C. M. Curci and L. TAPARELLI in founding Civiltà cattolica (1850-), which he helped to edit until his death. Having passed from eclecticism to THOMISM about 1850, he used the epistemology of St. Thomas to refute the theories of J. LOCKE, I. KANT, and especially A. ROSMINI-SERBATI. He made a genuine contribution to the traditional understanding of the natural law, and figured significantly in the restoration of Thomism in Italy, defending it against the errors of modern philosophers, with whom he was quite conversant. Among his major works are Institutiones philosophicae, 2 v. (Naples 1840-42), published in 11 eds.; Della conoscenza intellettuale, 2 v. (Rome 1857-58); Istituzioni di etica e di diritto naturale (Rome 1863); La Chiesa e lo Stato (Naples 1871); Dell'uomo, 2 v. (Rome 1874-75); Degli universali (Rome 1883); Del diritto pubblico ecclesiastico (Prato 1887); and Principi di economia politica (Rome 1889).

See Also: SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography: "Necrologio . . . ," La civiltà cattolica (ser. 15) 4 (1892): 352–360. A. MASNOVO, "Le P. Liberatore fut-il thomiste de 1840 à 1850?" Revue néo-scolastique de philosophie 15 (1908): 518–526; Il neo-tomismo in Italia (Milan 1923). T. MIRABELLA, Il pensiero politico del P. Matteo Liberatore . . . (Milan 1956). P. DEZZA, Alle origini del neotomismo (Milan 1940).

[R. M. PIZZORNI]

LIBERATUS OF CARTHAGE

Sixth-century African cleric and theologian; d. after 556. An archdeacon in the Church of Carthage, Liberatus accompanied Bishops Caius and Peter to Rome in 535, carrying a synodal letter from the council held at Carthage after the Byzantine conquest of North Africa (J. D. MANSI, Sacororum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. [Florence-Venice 1757-98] 8:849). Pope AGAPETUS I mentions him in his response to Bishop Reparatus of Carthage (Patrologia Latina 66:45). Liberatus supported his bishop in his strong stand in favor of the Council of CHALCEDON at the beginning of the controversy over the THREE CHAPTERS (544) and followed him to Constantinople (551) when Reparatus was summoned to the capital by JUSTINIAN I. Reparatus was deposed for his intransigence and exiled to the monastery of the Euchaites in Pontus (552). At the close of the Council of CON-STANTINOPLE II (July 553), Liberatus was forced to join him there (Victor of Tunnuna, Chron., an. 552-563). Apparently on the death of Reparatus on Jan. 7, 563, Liberatus returned to Africa. Nothing further is known of his career.

He wrote the Breviarium causae Nestorianorum et Eutychianorum, which describes the Christological controversies from the accession of NESTORIUS as patriarch of Constantinople (428) to the condemnation of the Three Chapters (553). Basing his doctrine on the orthodoxy of the Chalcedonian decrees, Liberatus described the intrigues that accompanied the theological disputes regarding the two natures in Christ and the efforts made by the Monophysites to discredit Chalcedon by attacking THEO-DORE OF MOPSUESTIA, THEODORET OF CYR, and Ibas of Edessa. He said explicitly that it was the partisans of Nestorius who misinterpreted the teaching of Diodore of Tarsus and Theodore in their zeal to combat the teaching of Eunomius and Apollinaris. While he defended the true Antiochene theology and was severe on CYRIL OF ALEX-ANDRIA because of his methods in dealing with opponents, he proved that the MONOPHYSITES were wrong in the way they interpreted Cyril. His animosity was concentrated on Pope VIGILIUS I, concerning whose career and death he furnished valuable information (c. 22).

Liberatus used excellent sources; for the course of events, he relied on the Tripartite History, which, as he remarked, had recently been translated from the Greek under the care of CASSIODORUS. For Chalcedon (c. 13) he employed the Gesta synodalia, the Epistolae sanctorum patrum, including the Gesta Acacii or Breviculus historiae Eutychianistarum (Schwartz, Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum, [Berlin 1914–] 2.1–5), as well as a history "that he found written in Greek at Alexandria." This may be the Ecclesiastical History of ZACHARY THE RHETOR. For the age of Justinian he used his own and the witness of contemporaries.

Well abreast of the doctrinal issues involved, the Breviarium is a valuable witness to the complexity and extent of sixth-century theological development. Its date of composition is difficult to determine. It records the death of Vigilius (June 7, 555) but speaks of Theodore of Alexandria as still living (d. 566 or 567).

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 68:963–1052. Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum, (Berlin 1914–) 2.5:98–144. É. AMANN, Dictionnarie de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:630–631. P. H. HEBRAND, Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft (1922) 223–232. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 2:159–167. B. ALTANER, Patrology (New York 1960) 590. H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v., ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1012. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 5 v. (Freiburg 1913–32) 5:328–329.

[F. X. MURPHY]

LIBERIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Liberia, largely agricultural, is located on the coast of West Africa, bordering the North Atlantic Ocean on the southwest, SIERRA LEONE on the northwest, GUINEA on the north, and CÔTE D'IVOIRE on the east. A tropical region, Liberia has a long coastal plain rising to plateau, with low mountains in the northeast. Dry winters from December to March are punctuated by dusty harmattan winds blowing from the Sahara desert, while summers are rainy. Natural resources include iron ore, diamonds, gold and timber from the region's rain forests; agricultural crops include rubber, coffee, cocoa, cassava, palm oil, sugar cane, rice, bananas and livestock.

Africa's oldest independent republic, Liberia was created out of settlements of liberated American slaves organized by the American Colonization Society. The re-Capital: Monrovia. Size: 43,000 sq. miles. Population: 3,164,160 in 2000.

Languages: English; 20 ethnic languages are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 300,790 Catholics (10%), 760,400 Muslims (24%), 759,340 Protestants (24%), 1,343,630 follow indigenous beliefs

Archdiocese: Monrovia, with suffragans Cape Palmas and

Gbarnga.

gion, settled after 1822, proclaimed its independence in 1847 and patterned its government on that of the United States. Political and economic power remained largely in the hands of a very small American-Liberian minority, despite the fact that 95 percent of the inhabitants are members of indigenous African tribes such as Kpelle, Bassa, Gio, Kru, Grebo, Mano and Gbandi. An additional 75,000, the Congo people, are descendants of Caribbean slaves who immigrated to the region. A military government during the 1980s was followed by a decade of civil war ending in 1996 when free elections were held in the country. The region's economy and social structure remained unsettled through 2000. Most of the population are agricultural workers; only 39 percent of Liberians can read and write.

Early History. Portuguese missionaries visited the coastal region from the 15th century, and the Jesuits and the Capuchins from Sierra Leone exercised an intermittent apostolate beginning 200 years later. Settlements of blacks, liberated from slavery in the United States, began forming in 1822, and from its founding, Liberia was a stronghold of Protestant missionary activity. The American Catholic bishops and the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith expressed keen concern for the expatriate Catholic settlers. In 1833, Bishop John England of Charleston, South Carolina, requested of Rome that missionaries be sent to care for black Catholic settlers. Pope Gregory XVI then asked the bishops of Philadelphia and New York each to send a priest. They arrived in 1842: Edward BARRON, an Irish-born priest of Philadelphia, and John Kelly (1802-66), an Irish-born priest of Albany, with Denis Pindar (1823-44), an Irish lay catechist. Barron became the first bishop of the Vicariate Apostolic of the Two Guineas (created 1842), an immense territory comprising all of West Africa from Senegal to the Orange River in Southern Africa. He returned to Liberia in 1844 after recruiting seven priests and three laymen in Europe, but the mission was abandoned before the year's end because the missionaries had either died or were broken in health due to the region's damp climate. Barron resigned his post and returned to the United States.

The Holy Ghost Fathers from Sierra Leone established a mission at Monrovia that lasted from 1884 to 1886. When the Prefecture Apostolic of Liberia was created in 1903 (Vicariate in 1934), it was confided to the Montfort Fathers, who remained for a year in the unhealthful climate. The Society of the AFRICAN MISSIONS arrived in 1906, and took charge of the mission. By 1928 there were 3,350 Catholics, mostly among the coastal tribes.

Liberia remained a prefecture apostolic until 1934 when John Collins, SMA, was ordained bishop and appointed vicar apostolic. In 1950 the vicariate was divided when the prefecture apostolic of Cape Palmas was established; this latter jurisdiction was raised to the status of a vicariate in 1962. The first Liberian priest, Patrick Kla Juwle, was ordained in 1946. In 1972 he was ordained as the first Liberian Catholic bishop and was named the Vicar Apostolic of Cape Palmas. The Liberian hierarchy was formally established in 1981 when Monrovia became an archdiocese and had the diocese of Cape Palmas as a suffragan see. The Metropolitan See of Monrovia was further divided in 1986 when the diocese of Gbarnga was created as a second suffragan. The bishops, all native, belong to the Inter-Territorial Catholic Bishops' Conference of Liberia, Gambia and Sierra Leone.

Fatima College, a Catholic teacher training institution, opened at Cape Palmas in 1952. The Barclay Training Center, a third-level vocational and technical school staffed by the Salesians and indigenous teachers, was established in Monrovia in 1978. Also that year the National Pastoral Center was founded in Gbarnga, its emphasis on the training of lay leaders for parishes and the formation of catechists to assist in the work of evangelization. In 1979 an Inter-diocesan Matrimonial Tribunal was created in Monrovia and an indigenous religious community, the Sisters of the Holy Family, was founded in Cape Palmas. 1982 saw the founding of a Catholic Agricultural Training Center at Sanniquellie in northeast Liberia and in 1992 a nursing school was established in Monrovia. A regional major seminary for the seven dioceses was established in 1972 at Gbarnga; in 1990 it was temporarily relocated to Sierra Leone because of military hostilities.

Civil Unrest. Liberia prospered from the 1920s through the 1970s due to the lucrative market provided for its rubber harvest by the Firestone Rubber Company. The Americo-Liberian elite, which had settled the coastal areas from 1822, ruled the republic after 1947 under the leadership of president W. V. S. Tubman. Tubman's death in 1971 and a shrinking rubber market set the economy into a decline and on April 12, 1980 a violent military coup led by Master Sergeant Samuel Doe gained control of Liberia. The decade that followed was characterized by a great deal of social and political instability, the result of a corrupt and repressive regime. The flagrant disregard for civil liberties sparked confrontation between Church leaders and the military-civilian authorities. The Monrovia-based National Catholic Secretariat defended human rights and civil liberties through a newspaper and radio station; since the Church's position was strong among the indigenous peoples whom the government purported to represent, its voice could not be silenced. The region's growing unrest eventually culminated in civil war. An armed incursion led by Charles Taylor in December of 1989 to unseat the government escalated into a brutal ethnic conflict that had devastating effects in all areas of public life. Over 200,000 people were killed; another 800,000 became refugees or were exiled. As Taylor attempted to build his rebel army, children as young as eight years old were forced to carry arms.

The turmoil seriously hurt Catholic life, particularly since the Church depended heavily on its schools, healthcare and social service institutions. Church installations suffered much physical damage; some, including those in the capital city of Monrovia, were totally destroyed. Many religious congregations were dispersed, many missionaries forced to leave. Although not a stated target of either of the military factions, the Church lost one Ghanian missionary priest (1991) and five American missionary sisters (1992) in execution-style killings. In October of 1994, two of the country's bishops were forced to flee, although Archbishop Michael Francis remained, thanks to the protection offered him by a West African peacekeeping force. Lay Catholics kept Catholicism alive among the people during the civil war, especially in those areas where schools had ceased to function. Catholics, working with the ecumenical Liberian Council of Churches, sponsored vigorous programs of humanitarian assistance and social welfare; its work among the refugees, displaced persons and exiles proved consistent and effective. The defense of human rights and the active support of peace and democratic evolution continued to be a focus of the pastoral letters and speeches of Liberia's bishops throughout the civil war, which finally ended in 1997 when free elections brought rebel-turned-President Taylor to power.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 51 parishes left in Liberia, tended by 52 priests, 26 of whom were religious. Fewer than 100 other religious remained in the country, most of whom tended Liberia's 34 primary and 26 secondary Catholic private schools. Orders active in the region included the Hospitalers of St. John of God, Missionaries of the Immaculate Conception, Salesians and Hospital Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. The government continued to respect freedom of religion, which was guaranteed under the constitution promulgated in 1986, although tensions were sometimes apparent in its treatment of Liberia's growing Muslim population, which had opposed Taylor during the civil war. Of special concern to many Catholics was the damage wrought on the young, forced to fight in the war, and special schools were planned as a way to help deal with the psychological trauma associated with these disrupted childhoods. In March of 2000 the Church ran afoul of government censors, its Monrovia-based radio station closed down until it agreed to restrict broadcasts to "purely religious matters." However, this action was viewed as politically motivated; Taylor remained a proponent of Christianity, in 1999 firing most of his cabinet after they failed to attend a prayer meeting.

By late 2000 armed conflict in the northern region had resumed amid charges of corruption against Taylor and his administration. Control of the region's diamond deposits was held to be a motivation for control of the government.

Bibliography: Africa Watch, v. 5, no. 6, Liberia: Waging War to Keep the Peace (New York 1993). M. J. BANE, The Catholic Story of Liberia (New York 1950). J. BAUR, Two Thousand Years of Christianity in Liberia (Nairobi 1994). BISHOPS OF LIBERIA, Pastoral Letters (Monrovia 1980–94). P. CLIFFORD, Christianity and Politics in Doe's Liberia (London 1993). P. GANTLY, African Mission, 2 vols. (Rome 1991–92). J. C. HICKEY, A Land Both Old and Young (Newark 1987). E. M. HOGAN, Catholic Missionaries and Liberia (Cork 1981). J. G. LIEBENOW, Liberia: The Evolution of Privilege (London 1969); Liberia: The Quest for Democracy (Bloomington 1987). SOCIETY OF AFRICAN MISSIONS, A Missionary Policy for Liberia (Rome 1992). U.S. COMMITTEE FOR REFUGEES, Uprooted Liberians: Casualties of a Brutal War (New York 1992). Bilan du Monde, 2:562–565. Annuario Pontificio has information on all diocese. For additional bibliography see AFRICA.

[R. M. WILTGEN/EDS.]

LIBERIAN CATALOGUE

A list of popes with dates from St. Peter to LIBERIUS (352–366), which forms a part of the compilation of chronological and liturgical data contained in the CHRONOG-RAPHER OF 354. It is evidently the earliest version of the LIBER PONTIFICALIS and consists of two sections: one dating the pontificates from Peter to 231 (Pontianus 230-235), which was apparently constructed from authentic but faulty traditions; and one from 231-352, which seems to reflect official documentation. This list was probably prepared in 336 under Pope Mark and then revised and published under Pope Liberius as a section of the Chronographer of 354. The catalogue gives 25 years for the reign of St. Peter, and this is repeated by Eusebius-Jerome (Chronicon 2, ed. R. Helm, Die griechiscchristlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 7:179). But all the dates down to Eleutherius (175–189) are conjectural at best.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:vi–x. T. MOMMSEN, ed., Chronica minora, 3 v. (Monumenta Germaniae Historica Auctores antiquissimi 9, 11, 13; Berlin 1892–98) 1:73–76. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CARROLL, H. LECLERQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 9.1:527–530. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 2:645. O. SEECK, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 3.2 (1899) 2477–81. Epigrammata Damasiana, ed. A. FERRUA (Rome 1942) 21–45. H. STERN, Le Calendrier de 354. . . (Paris 1952).

[F. X. MURPHY]

LIBERIUS, POPE

Pontificate: May 17, 352 to Sepember 24, 366. Liberius, a native Roman, was elected bishop of Rome May 17 to succeed Pope Julius who had died April 12, 352. He came to the papacy under trying conditions.

Pope Liberius. (Archive Photos)

Arian Controversy. CONSTANTIUS II, sole emperor since the death of his brother Constans (350), was under the influence of the Eastern bishops hostile to the Creed of Nicaea. At the insistence of the Arians, the Emperor wanted the Western episcopate to reject the Nicaean doctrine of the HOMOOUSIOS or consubstantiality of the Father and the Son, and to abandon ATHANASIUS, the most stout defender of the Nicene Creed. Liberius had scarcely been elected pope when he became involved in the controversy and his attitude, which always seemed somewhat contradictory, still poses problems for the historian.

Athanasius. The Eastern bishops hostile to the Nicaean doctrine requested Liberius at the outset of his papacy to revise the decision in favor of Athanasius made by Pope St. JULIUS I (340) and by the Council of Sardica (343). Apparently Liberius summoned Athanasius to Rome to exonerate him before a synod; but instead of appearing in Rome Athanasius sent a memorandum signed by 80 Egyptian bishops. After inspecting this document the Roman synod refused to support the enemies of Athanasius.

As Constantius was then located in Arles, Liberius sent Vincent of Capua and Marcellus, Bishop of Campania, to request the convocation of a council at Aquileia. But Ursacius of Singidunum and Valens of Mursa, the two Illyrian bishops who controlled the ecclesiastical politics of Constantius, induced the Emperor to convene a synod at Arles instead; that assembly confirmed the condemnation of Athanasius. The papal legates gave way under pressure and concurred in this condemnation. The only bishop present who refused to sign was Paulinus of Treves, who was immediately exiled.

Liberius reacted strongly against his representatives and in a letter to EUSEBIUS OF VERCELLI expressed his determination to demand of Constantius the convocation of a council between the Western and Eastern bishops to establish the union that had not been achieved at Sardica (P., Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 211). This letter contains the first known use of the term "Apostolic See." Liberius then sent a letter to the Emperor through LUCIFER OF CAGLIARI, in which he defended himself energetically against the calumnies brought against him by the Emperor:

God is my witness that it is in spite of myself that I have accepted this office; but I want to live in it as long as I am in this world without offending God. It is not my own decisions [statuta] but those of the Apostle [Peter] that I am to conserve and guard. Following the tradition of my predecessors I have added nothing to the episcopal power of the bishop of Rome; but neither have I allowed it to be diminished in any way. In preserving the faith handed down by the succession of bishops, many of them martyrs, I hope that it will always remain intact [Ad Constant., Jaffé 212].

Council of Milan. The council requested by the Pope was held at Milan in October 355; under the pressure of the Emperor and his court, all the bishops but three (Denis of Milan, Eusebius of Vercelli, and Lucifer of Cagliari) approved the condemnation of Athanasius (Jaffé 216; Athanasius, History of the Arians 31–35). A short while later, the imperial eunuch Eusebius arrived in Rome with a threatening letter demanding that the Pope accede to the condemnation of Athanasius. Liberius rejected Eusebius's credentials and when Eusebius attempted to deposit them before the Confession of St. Peter, Liberius had them thrown out. Constantius then had the Pope arrested at night in the papal palace at the Lateran and brought to Milan. Theodoret of Cyrus has preserved the record of the meeting between the Pope and the Emperor. Liberius's stand was noble and spirited (Theodoret, Historia Ecclesiastica 2.16; Athanasius, History of the Arians 39). Two days later the Pope was exiled to Beroea in Thrace (355).

The Capitulation of Liberius. Toward the end of 357, the Pope left Beroea for Sirmium where the court was in residence, and in 358 he returned to Rome. But what price did Liberius pay for his liberation? There is question of the "fall" or the "capitulation" of Liberius. Reliable and unanimous contemporary evidence supplied by Athanasius (History of the Arians 41; Apology against the Arians 89), Jerome (Chronicon Eusebii Caesariensis 2365; De Viris illustribus 3.37), Hilary of Poitiers (Contra Constantinus 11) and the Collectio Avellana (1), as well as by ancient historians, such as Sozomen (Historia Ecclesiastica 4.11) relate that Liberius was guilty of a culpable failure.

Probably weakened by infirmity and age the Pope could not withstand the rigors of exile nor resist the violent threats of Constantius. He abandoned the cause of Athanasius and subscribed to a document hostile to the Nicene cause. The Collectio Avellana speaks of "perfidy," and Jerome charges Liberius with haeretica pravitas, while Hilary of Poitiers cites the testimony of four letters, preserved in his Fragmenta historica, which he attributed to Liberius.

These letters, written in 357, are addressed to the Eastern bishops, to Ursacius, Valens, Germinius of Sirmium, and Vincent of Capua, whom the Pope had already blamed for the betrayal at the Council of Arles. They explain in an embarrassed fashion the manner in which Liberius had been induced to abandon the cause of Athanasius. They contain the pathetic request that his correspondents intercede with the Emperor so that the exile might return to Rome.

The Formula of Sirmium. Besides the abandonment of Athanasius, what are the nature and character of the concessions Liberius was forced to make? Everything points to the fact that he accepted the doctrine of "the first formula of Sirmium" of 351. This symbol is capable of an orthodox explanation, but it avoided the use of the most characteristic expressions of the Nicene faith, particularly the homoousios. Thus while apologists could maintain that Liberius did not teach false doctrine, one must concede that he did not do justice to the full truth. Liberius refused to sign the second formula of Sirmium (357), which is particularly subordinationist in tendency; and in his dealings with Basil of Ancyra, the leader of the Homoiousian party, he occasioned the composition of a formula of Sirmium that contradicted the doctrine of the Anomoeans or radical Arians. Liberius condemned the bishops who denied that the Son was similar to the Father "in essence and in all things" (Sozomen, Historia Ecclesiastica 4.15). Unsatisfactory though this expression might be, it was a considerable improvement over earlier formulas and checked for a time the triumph of the Arians.

When Constantius returned Liberius to Rome, the bishops gathered in Sirmium wrote to Felix, Liberius' archdeacon, who had taken the place of the exiled Pope, and to the clergy of the capital that "the two bishops together should occupy the Apostolic See and assist each other in discharging their episcopal functions" (Sozomen, Historia Ecclesiastica 4.15). Actually Liberius was received with enthusiasm by the Roman populace who greeted him with the acclamation: "One God, one Christ, one Bishop." To avoid a riot, the usurper Felix had to flee the city, and after an attempt to occupy the Julian Basilica in Trastevere, he remained in hiding until his death (November 22, 365).

Pope Liberius traces the plan of the Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore in the snow, mosaic by F. Rusati, 1308, located in the loggia of the Basilica, Rome.

Last Years of Liberius. Little is known concerning the last years of Liberius. He was not invited personally nor did he send representatives to the Council of Rimini in 359, which approved the Homoiousian doctrine and the displacement of orthodoxy. In 385 Pope Siricius alluded to an "act" of Liberius, which set aside the synod of Rimini, and cited a decree forbidding the rebaptism of Arians addressed "to the provinces" (Jaffé 220, 255). There is also a letter of Liberius addressed in 362 to the bishops of Italy who had yielded at Rimini, in which the Pope acknowledges his agreement with the orthodox measures taken by a Synod of Alexandria in 362, and grants peace to those who rejected the error of Arius and sustained the faith of Nicaea (Jaffé 223; St. Hilary, Frag. hist., ed. Feder, 156).

Finally in 366, Liberius received a delegation of Eastern bishops including Eustathius of Sebaste, Sylvanus of Tarsus, and Theophilus of Castabala, sent by the Homoiousians who sought the support of the West. He asked them to accept the Creed of Nicaea and to discard the decisions of Rimini before he received them into communion with the Roman church. In a letter written some while later to their leaders, Liberius asserted that the Creed of Nicaea contained the complete truth and contradicted all heresies, and that the homoousios was a bulwark against Arianism. He condemned everyone who adhered to that error. (Jaffé 228; Socrates, Ekklesiastike historia 4.12.)

On the Esquiline hill in Rome near the Market of Livia, Liberius had constructed a basilica, which was renovated in the 5th century by Pope SIXTUS III and known as Santa Maria Maggiore. It is probable that the Liberian basilica had been dedicated to the Virgin Mary. On Christmas, probably of 353, in the Vatican basilica, Liberius bestowed the veil of a virgin on Marcellina, the sister of St. AMBROSE. The address that the Pope delivered on this occasion is cited by Ambrose in his De Virginitate (3.1–3) but was doubtless revised by the bishop of Milan.

Liberius's character has been sharply discussed; as early as the 6th century legend made him out to be a heretic and a traitor in order to justify his rival Felix (Gesta Liberii). Liberius did not have the strength of character of his predecessor JULIUS I, or of his successor DAMASUS I but he was a genuine if weak supporter of the Nicene cause. The troubles that erupted upon the latter's election indicate that the Roman Church had been weakened from within as well as without during the pontificate of Liberius. His name was not inscribed in the Roman MARTYROLOGY.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (2d ed. Streenbrugge 1961). B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 413-414. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 9.1:631-659. A. L. FEDER, "Die Liberiusbriefe," Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien 162: 153-183. P. LORIEUX, Mélanges de science religieuse 1: 7-34. T.D. BARNES, "The Capitulation of Liberius and Hilary of Arles", Phoenix 46: 256-265. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 2:680. H. JEDIN, ed., History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:41-63. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 30-31. C. PIETRI, Roma Christiana (Rome 1976) 237-268. C. PIETRI, "La question d'Athanase vue de Rome (338-360)," in Christiana Respublica. Élements d'une enquête sur le christianisme antique (Rome 1997) 631-664.

[P. T. CAMELOT]

LIBERMANN, FRANÇOIS MARIE PAUL, VEN.

Religious founder; b. Saverne, (Bas-Rhin), France, April 12, 1802; d. Paris, Feb. 2, 1852. He was destined to become a Jewish rabbi like his father Lazarus Libermann, but his reading of the New Testament and the influence of his oldest brother, a convert, led to his own conversion to Catholicism. At his baptism in Paris on Dec. 24, 1826, he changed his name from Jacob to François Marie Paul. In 1827 he entered the Sulpician seminary at Issy, but an attack of epilepsy (1829) shortly before the subdiaconate impeded his reception of Holy Orders. Because of his wholesome influence on the seminarians, he was permitted to remain as part of the staff. While still in minor orders he acted as novice master (1837–39) to the EUDISTS, who were reorganizing after their suppression during the French Revolution. Acquaintance with Creole seminarians inspired Libermann to found the Society of the Immaculate Heart of Mary to evangelize former slaves (1839). In 1840 he went to Rome to win approval for the new society and was ordained there (1841). In 1841 he also opened the society's first novitiate at Neuville, near Amiens. Seven of his missionaries accompanied the Irish-American bishop Edward BARRON to Africa (1843) and were among the first to penetrate the interior. Later the congregation was entrusted with missions in Mauritius, Réunion, and Haiti. At the Holy See's request, Libermann's society merged in 1848 with the HOLY GHOST FATHERS, founded in 1703 but in decline since the French Revolution. Libermann became their eleventh superior general. He continued the educational traditions of the older congregation but infused it with the missionary spirit and apostolic methods of the newer institute. Libermann's spirituality was characterized by concreteness; its essential features were later popularized by St. THÉRÈSE DE LISIEUX as the way of spiritual childhood. The decree approving the heroicity of Libermann's virtues was issued in 1910.

Bibliography: G. LEE, The Life of the Venerable Francis Libermann (St. Louis 1911; repr. London 1937). E. LEEN, The Voice of a Priest (New York 1946). H. W. HOMAN, Star of Jacob (New York 1953). A. L. VAN KAAM, A Light to the Gentiles (Milwaukee 1962).

[A. L. VAN KAAM]

LIBERTAS

Encyclical letter of Pope LEO XIII on human liberty, issued June 20, 1888. In what is in effect a miniature philosophical treatise on the nature of human liberty, Leo examined the so-called "modern liberties" and issued certain practical directives to European, especially French, Catholics.

The 19th century had seen the rise of the political and ethical philosophy that came to be called liberalism. Often referred to as continental or European liberalism (to distinguish it from more recent American usage), this philosophy embodied the denial of any divine authority and the refusal to accept it as a law or norm of the human will. Thus, in Leo's words, "What naturalists or rationalists aim at in philosophy, that the supporters of liberalism . . . are attempting in the domain of morality and politics. The fundamental doctrine of rationalism is the supremacy of the human reason, which . . . proclaims its own independence and constitutes itself the supreme principle and source and judge of truth. Hence, these followers of liberalism deny the existence of any divine authority to which obedience is due, and proclaim that every man is the law to himself; from which arises that ethical system which they style independent morality, and which under the guise of liberty, exonerates man from any obedience to the law of God and substitutes a boundless license' (par. 15).

Opposing this doctrine, Leo explains human liberty as it has ever been "cherished by the Catholic Church." He distinguishes between natural liberty, which belongs to man as endowed with intelligence, and moral liberty, which consists in choosing that good only which is in conformity with the judgment of reason. He is primarily concerned with moral liberty. Because the intellect and will of man are defective, law is morally necessary as a guide to knowledge of what is objectively reasonable and unreasonable. But law must be understood adequately. Hence, natural law and human (civil) law are analyzed. Their source is in divine law, which is ultimately "the sole standard and rule of human liberty" (par. 10). True moral liberty, therefore, requires submission to the authority of God commanding good and forbidding evil.

As he had already done on other occasions, Leo discusses the four major "modern liberties": liberty of worship, of speech and press, of teaching error, and of conscience. His purpose is to distinguish between the good and evil elements in these liberties. The Church approves the good, and condemns the evil.

The last part of the encyclical comments indirectly on the situation in France, where a dispute existed between conservative and progressive Catholics. The dispute was as political as it was doctrinal, and the pope encouraged men on both sides of it to strike a balance, pointing out that the Church accepts any form of government that truly promotes the common good, and that Catholics should take part in public affairs.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctae Sedis 20:593-613, has the official Latin text.

[D. L. LOWERY]

LIBRI CAROLINI

A Carolingian work in four volumes stating, in CHARLEMAGNE's name, the objections of his circle of theologians to the restoration of images in the Byzantine Church by the Second Council of NICAEA (787). A copy of the council's proceedings was brought by two papal legates to Rome, where an anonymous cleric prepared an imperfect translation that was sent by ADRIAN I to Charlemagne. This garbled version gave rise to the impression at the Frankish court that the Empress IRENE and her bishops had enjoined on all Christians, under pain of anathema, what was taken to be the worship of images. An official protest was planned.

The Nicene acts were read in Charlemagne's presence, and a list of objections drawn up. These became the capitula of the projected work and were sent to Adrian; his reply survives. A delegation of bishops took a fair copy of the work, once completed, to Rome. The original, working copy was kept in the imperial archives, where HINCMAR later saw and studied it; he had a copy made at Reims c. 850 (now MS Paris Arsenal 663).

This copy was discovered and its contents published (1549) pseudonymously by Jean du Tillet, afterward bishop of Meaux. New controversy now surrounded the work, whose arguments were enthusiastically adopted by Protestant apologists. Catholics rejected it as a forgery, and it was placed on the Index, where it remained until 1900. In 1865 the original copy was found in the Vatican Library (from which, several centuries earlier, the presentation copy made for Adrian I had disappeared); this at last established the work's authenticity.

Debate has continued, however, on the question of its authorship. The traditional attribution to ALCUIN is questionable, since Alcuin was in England from 790 to 793, the period during which the work was composed. New evidence has recently been discovered in its scriptural citations, which contain reminiscences of the Visigothic liturgy. These formulas, unique in Spanish sources, indicate authorship by THEODULF OF ORLÉANS, the only Spaniard at the Carolingian court, who had a natural tendency to quote Scripture in the familiar phrases of his native liturgy. In addition, the orthography—in its original version—displayed many Spanish peculiarities; these were carefully corrected in the SCRIPTORIUM.

Other corrections reflect the roundtable discussions that accompanied final preparation of the work. Official comments by the critics were noted in the margins, at first in minuscule; later these comments were transcribed into Tironian notes and the minuscule notations erased. The Vatican MS (Vat. lat. 7207) now contains 192 folia (it lacks the preface and bk. 4, which may be supplied from Arsenal 663), in a carefully executed early Caroline minuscule. The script is that of the Palace school.

The Carolingian stand on the veneration of IMAGES is conventional; images are "ornaments" in churches and reminders to the faithful of the heroism of the saints. The Libri Carolini show that Charlemagne's theologians did not understand the real issues of the controversy over ICONOCLASM in the East. The work has cardinal importance, however, for the history of CHURCH AND STATE in the West. It anticipates Charlemagne's imperial role as protector of the faith and illustrates all the characteristic principles and predilections of his scholars; it is a summa of Carolingian thought.

Bibliography: Libri Carolini, ed. H. BASTGEN, Monumenta Germanica Historica (Berlin 1826-) Concilia v. 2 suppl. G. MER-CATI, "Per la storia del codice Vaticano dei Libri Carolini," Bessarione 37 (1921) 112-119. W. VON DEN STEINEN, "Entstehungsgeschichte der Libri Carolini," Quellen und Forschungen aus italienische Archiven und Bibliothekan 21 (1929-30) 1-93; "Karl der Grosse und die Libri Carolini," Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 49 (1930–32) 207–280. D. DE BRUYNE, "La Composition des Libri Carolini," Revue Bénédictine 44 (1932) 227-234. A. FREEMAN, "Theodulf of Orléans and the Libri Carolini," Speculum 32 (1957) 663-705. L. WALLACH, "The Unknown author of the Libri Carolini," Didascaliae: Studies in Honor of Anselm M. Albareda, ed. S. PRETE (New York 1961) 469-515. Codices latini antiquiores, ed. E. A. LOWE (Oxford 1934-) v.1, on Vat. lat. 7207 (and Paris Arsenal 663). A. FREEMAN, "Further Studies in the Libri Carolini," Speculum 40 (1965) 203-289.

[A. FREEMAN]

LIBYA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriay, commonly known as Libya, is located in North Africa, south of the Mediterranean Sea. Bordered by the Gulf of Sidra to the north, Libya is bordered on the east by EGYPT, on the southeast by SUDAN, on the south by CHAD and NIGER, and on the west by ALGERIA and TUNISIA. Containing the northeast section of the Sahara, Libya is a desert region, its agricultural areas restricted to its northern coastline. The central region contains highland areas, with oases marking the Hammada al-Hamra, Fezzan, and Murzuch regions to the south. Farm crops include wheat, barley, dates, citrus fruits, and peanuts, while the region's large oil deposits have made crude oil and refined petroleum products Libya's main exports.

Although Libya became independent in 1951, after a coup by the military in 1969 it was transformed into a military dictatorship. Despite the wealth generated by its Capital: Tripoli. Size: 678,400 sq. miles. Population: 5,115,450 in 2000.

Languages: Arabic; Italian and English are spoken in urban areas.

Religions: 51,000 Catholics (.9%), 4,961,986 Sunni Muslims

(97%), 102,464 (2.1%) other faiths.

oil exports, Libyan society was hampered by an undeveloped infrastructure, and mismanagement of its socialist economy led to frequent food shortages and other economic hardships. Most Libyans are of Berber or Arab descent; ethnic minorities include Greeks, Maltese, Egyptians, Pakistanis, Indians, and Italians.

Libya is the name by which the ancient Greeks referred to all of northern Africa except Egypt. The following essay presents the history of Libya from the seventh century to the present.

After the Muslims conquered Egypt in the seventh century, they drove west and occupied Libya in 641. Although Christians there were at first tolerated as DHIMMI, Christianity languished as the older population gradually embraced both the religion and the language of their Arab conquerors. The Islamization of the country was completed in 1067, when the new tribes from Arabia settled in the land. A prefecture was established at Tripoli in 1643, under the care of Italian Franciscans, who in the early days exercised works of charity in the ports, principally among Christians, merchants, and captives, but did little among the nomadic Sanussi tribes of Libya's desert regions.

Libya remained under Turkish rule for the next several centuries, during which time few inroads were made by the Church. In 1912 the Turks were defeated and an Italian administration took over. Soon settlers arrived in the country, attended by priests, and in 1913 Tripoli was raised to the rank of a vicariate, whose territory covered the whole of Libya. As Italian immigration increased, this vast territory became too great for a single ecclesiastical administration, and in 1927 it was divided into the Vicariate of Tripoli, in the west, and that of Cyrenaica, or Benghazi, in the east. In 1939 two more territories were detached from Cyrenaica: the Prefecture of Misurata and the Vicariate Apostolic of Derna. Derna was entrusted to the Salesians, the other territories remaining in the hands of the Franciscans.

Libya was the scene of heavy fighting between German-Italian and British forces during World War II. When war broke out in 1939, the region's European population was significant, but after occupation by the British in 1943, the Italian administration was expelled, and many settlers left the country. On Dec. 24, 1951, the region achieved independence as the Kingdom of Libya, and within ten years its economy had strengthened due to the exportation of oil. However, the monarchy was short-lived; on Sept. 1, 1969, a military junta under the leadership of Col. Mu'ammar Abu Minyar al-Quadhafi took control and began a reign of terror. Active in efforts to destabilize both capitalism and communism, Quadhafi at first attempted militancy by invading Chad in the 1980s, but his failure there led him to support the terrorist efforts of others. While Libyan-sponsored terrorism decreased following a U.N.-imposed trade embargo from 1992–99, they remained a source of conflict within the Middle East. However, by 2000 the Libyan government surprised the world when it took an active role in ending a hostage crisis caused by Philippine rebels, even going so far as to pay the ransom money.

Even before Quadhafi's rise to power, changes had taken place in the number and composition of Libya's Catholic clergy; the number of Franciscans gradually diminished, and the Salesians handed over to Benghazi the administration of the Vicariate of Derna. During the late 20th century, Quadhafi established the Islamic Call Society (ICS), a moderate Islamic group that promoted the Libyan government's political and social agenda while also undermining Islamic fundamentalism and establishing relations with Libya's other faiths.

In 2000 the Church maintained apostolic vicariates in Benghazi and Tripoli, as well as an apostolic prefecture in Misurata. In Tripoli the bishop served the Italian community, while Benghazi's bishop administered to the city's predominately Maltese Catholic population. Coptic and Greek Orthodox clergy also worked in the cities of Tripoli and Benghazi. Libya established diplomatic relations with the Holy See in 1997, and as the region' first apostolic nuncio, Bishop Jose Sebastian Laboa defended the courage of the Libyan people during a politically difficult period.

Despite its status as a minority religion in a predominately Muslim nation, the Church took responsibility for a number of charitable and cultural activities, among them hospitals, schools, and homes for the handicapped. Catholic schools, open also to Muslim children, provided education for thousands of Libyan young people. While members of religious orders had been restricted from entering the country during the 1970s and 1980s, this situation was reversed and religious were actively encouraged to enter Libya after U.N.-imposed trade sanctions caused shortages of medical aid and other necessary supplies. While opposing Libya's role in terrorist activities, Pope John Paul II's activism was instrumental in finally lifting the U.N. trade sanctions, thus aiding the region's economy in recovery as Libya moved into the new millennium.

Bibliography: C. BERGNA, La missione franciscana in Libya (Tripoli 1924); La missione franciscana in Tripoli dal 1510 al 1850 (Tripoli 1925). Conspectus missionum O. F. M. (Rome 1957) 37–47. Bilan du Monde 2:566–569.

[J. CUOQ/EDS.]

LICCIO, JOHN, BL.

Italian Dominican preacher and reformer; b. Càccamo (Palermo), c. 1426; d. there, 1511. He received the religious habit at about 15 years of age in the Monastery of Santa Zita in Palermo, where he learned the spirit of religious reform from his superior (Bl.) Pietro Geremia. He preached with success in Sicily, Vicenza, and Naples. In 1469 he established the Monastery of the Holy Spirit in Polizzi, and in 1487 that of Càccamo, where he was the first vicar until 1494, and then first prior until his death. He was elected vicar-general of the reformed congregation of Sicily in 1488 and ten years later became vicar-general of the entire Sicilian Province and also canonical visitator for the reform of the monasteries of Augusta, Taormina, and Trapani. Miracles occurring during his life and during the transfer of his relics led to his beat-ification by BENEDICT XIV on April 25, 1753.

Feast: Nov. 14.

Bibliography: Monumenta Ordinis Fratrum Praedicatorum historica 14 (1904): 229–230. G. BARRECA, Vita del beato Giovanni Liccio da Càccamo (3d ed. Palermo 1953). I. TAURISANO, Catalogus hagiographicus ordinis praedicatorum (Rome 1918). M. S. CONIGLIONE, La Provincia domenicana di Sicilia (Catania 1937); Pietro Geremia (Catania 1952); Il beato Giovanni Liccio da Càccamo (Palermo 1955).

[A. L. REDIGONDA]

LICHTENBERG, BERNHARD, BL.

Priest, martyr, provost of Berlin; b. Dec. 3, 1875, Ohlau, Silesia, Poland (then Germany); d. Nov. 5, 1943, Hof, Upper Franconia, Germany.

One of five children of the devout Catholic grocer August Lichtenberg and his wife, Emilie, Bernhard was raised in the predominantly Protestant town of Ohlau. After studying in Prague, Munich, and Innsbruck, he completed his theological studies in Breslau (now Wrocław, Poland), where he was ordained in 1899. He held various parish assignments in Berlin, then in 1914 served as military chaplain. In 1931 he joined St. Hedwig's cathedral chapter in Berlin, where he was appointed to the parish the following year and named provost in January 1938. He was a tireless promoter of the apostolate for priestly vocations.

As early as 1935, Lichtenberg protested from St. Hedwig's pulpit and to the government leaders against the atrocities in the concentration camps. Lichtenberg condemned the elimination of religious instruction in the schools, the secularization of marriage, and the euthanasia practiced against the innocent. Beginning in November 1938, he prayed publicly every day "for the oppressed non-Aryan Christians, for the persecuted Jews, and for prisoners in the concentration camps." Arrested in October 1941 but released shortly thereafter, he continued his prayers and protests. On May 22, 1942, he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for treason and "misuse of his official position." While in prison Lichtenberg, who was 68 years old, suffered a heart attack. The Gestapo, fearing he would die in Berlin in their custody, put him in a cattle car en route to Dachau concentration camp. At Hof he was so sick that he was unloaded and taken to the city hospital, where he died.

John Paul II declared Lichtenberg a martyr July 2, 1994. Following the beatification rite in Berlin's Olympic Stadium June 23, 1996, during John Paul II's third pastoral visit to Germany, the pope prayed at the martyr's tomb in the crypt of St. Hedwig's Cathedral.

Feast: Nov. 5 (Archdiocese of Berlin).

Bibliography: W. ADOLPH, Im Schatten des Galgens (Berlin 1953). A. ERB, Bernhard Lichtenberg: Dompropst von St. Hedwig zu Berlin, 5th ed. (Berlin 1968). C. FELDMANN, Wer glaubt, muss widerstehen: Bernhard Lichtenberg-Karl Leisner, 3d. ed. (Freiburg 1996). D. HANKY, Bernhard Lichtenberg. Priester. Bekenner. Martyrer (Berlin 1994). B. M. KEMPER, Priester vor Hitlers Tribunalen (Munich 1996). E. KOCK, Er widerstand (Berlin 1996). H. KÜHN, Blutzeugen des Bistums Berlin (Berlin 1952). K. MAGIERA, Bernhard Lichtenberg (Berlin 1963). O. OGIERMANN, Bis zum letzten Atemzug (Leipzig 1983).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LICINIUS OF ANGERS, ST.

Bishop; b. c. 540; d. c. 610. According to his biographies, one written by an anonymous author of Angers, the other by MARBOD OF RENNES, archdeacon at Angers, Licinius (Lésin) was born of a wealthy, noble family and was educated at the royal court. He was made count of Anjou by Clotaire II (d. 628) and at the urging of the court and his family was about to marry the daughter of a prominent nobleman. By divine intervention, as his biographers insist, the young lady was stricken by leprosy, whereupon Licinius left the court and became a cleric. When the See of ANGERS became vacant, Licinius was chosen bishop, possibly in 592, and fulfilled the duties of this office with great zeal and effectiveness. In 601 Pope GREGORY I THE GREAT wrote a letter to seven Frankish bishops, one of them Licinius, recommending to their charity the monks who were on their way to help AUGUS-TINE OF CANTERBURY in England (P. Jaffé, ed. P. Ewald, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annun post Christum natum 1198, 205). The monastery of St. John the Baptist, to which Charles II the Bald later granted some property, was founded by this saintly bishop of Angers. In his last will and testament BERTRAM, bishop of Le Mans, makes mention of the close friendship that existed between him and Licinius (Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, 15 v. [Paris 1907-53] 10:1506, 1519).

Feast: Feb. 13 (Angers); Nov. 1 (Roman MARTYROLOGY).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 2:675–686. Gallia Christiana, v. 14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 14:549, 599, app. 146. J. L.

BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier ave l'historique des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 11:56–58. J. CAMBELL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1029. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.2:805. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901) 2:4917–4918. J. LEVRON, Les Saints du pays angevin (Grenoble 1943) 73–84.

[H. DRESSLER]

LIDANUS, ST.

Benedictine abbot and monastic founder; b. Antina, Italy, c. 1026; d. Sezze, Italy, 1118. He is believed to have entered the monastery of MONTE CASSINO at an early age. He was the founder and first abbot of the monastery of St. Cecilia at Sezze. He is especially noted for the part he played in the work of draining the Pontine marshes, where his monastery was located. He is the patron of Sezze, where his relics are venerated.

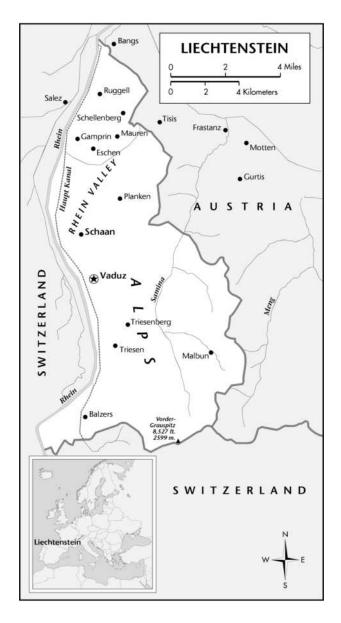

Feast: July 2 (Sezze); April 27 and July 18.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jul. 1:302–309. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901) 2:4919–4921. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:390, 393. v. VENDITTI, La leggenda medioevale di Lidano d'Antena (Turin 1959).

[K. NOLAN]

LIDGETT, JOHN SCOTT

English Methodist divine; b. Lewisham, Aug. 10, 1854; d. Epsom, June 16, 1953. After studying at the University of London, he was ordained to the Methodist ministry (1876). He became a noted preacher with a passion for social justice. Lidgett is remembered best for his foundation in 1891 of the Bermondsey Settlement, in which he held the position of warden. He was active in London municipal politics and served as alderman on the London County Council (1905-10) and as leader of the Progressive party (1919–28). He was editor of the *Meth*odist Times (1907–18) and president of the Methodist Conference (1908). In 1932 he was instrumental in uniting the Wesleyan Methodist Church with the Primitive Methodist Church and the United Methodist Church, and then he became the first president of the United Methodist Church of Great Britain. At the University of London he sat on the senate (1926-46) and became vice chancellor (1930). His publications include The Spiritual Principle of the Atonement (1897), The Christian Religion: Its Meaning and Proof (1907), The Idea of God and Social Ideals (1938), God and the World (1943), and Salvation (1952).

Bibliography: E. W. BAKER et al., John Scott Lidgett: A Symposium, ed. R. E. DAVIES (London 1957).

[W. HANNAH]

LIECHTENSTEIN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A sovereign principality located on the right bank of the Rhine, the Principality of Liechtenstein is bordered on the west and south by the Swiss cantons of Saint Gallen and Graubünden and the east by the Austrian province of Vorarlberg. A lowland region bordering the Rhine characterizes its west, while the landscape of the principality rises to mountainous terrain and a portion of the Rhaetian Alps to the south. Liechtenstein's economy depends largely on light industry; agricultural crops include corn, wine and fruit. Farming and stock raising have diminished in importance as the population has become increasingly urbanized. Small machinery, dental products, hardware and pottery now account for much of its exports. One of the smallest nations in the world, Liechtenstein derives 30 percent of its state revenues from the nominal incorporation of foreign companies, which establish ''letter box'' offices in the principality to benefit from Liechtenstein's low business tax rate. Almost half of the principality's labor force are residents of Austria and Switzerland.

The principality was formed in 1719 from the union of the Barony of Schellenberg with the County of Vaduz; it continued to be part of the Holy Roman Empire until July 12, 1806, when it gained its independence as part of the Rhine Federation. It became wholly independent in 1866, and to preserve its neutrality into the future had abolished its army within two years. The 1921 constitution established a constitutional, hereditary monarchy based on democratic and parliamentary principles. Although once linked to Austria, Liechtenstein has retained close ties with Switzerland since World War I; it uses the Swiss franc as its currency, and is in a customs union with Switzerland, which administers its telegraph and postal systems. Women were given the right to vote in national (but not local) elections in 1984.

History. Christianity entered Liechtenstein in the 4th century. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the region was exercised by the Diocese of Chur in SWITZERLAND probably by the 4th century, certainly by the 5th. Chur also covered Zurich and eastern Switzerland. The highland region belonged from the beginning to the deanery of Unter der Landquart (Capitulum sub Langaro); the lowland, not until 1370. Previously Liechtenstein was part of the deanery of Walgau (Capitulum vallis Trusianae). Beginning in 1717 Liechtenstein pertained to the chapter of Walgau; after its independence in 1816 it gained its own chapter under a local vicar (Landesvikar). During the Protestant Reformation Liechtensteiners remained loyal to the Catholic Church, thanks in good part to the attitude of their civil rulers. Historians have argued that, in 1943, German Chancellor Adolph Hitler considered a plan to take control of the Vatican by deporting Pope Pius XII to Liechtenstein, although this scheme was never realized.

The constitution of Oct. 5, 1921 guaranteed freedom of conscience and of religion to all residents. As the national church (Landeskirche), the Catholic Church enjoyed the full protection of the government, and was funded in full by the government until the late 1990s, when the relationship between the State and the Church came under renewed scrutiny. While these financial arrangements remained pending through 2002, the government continued to allocate church funds into an escrow account. Other beliefs were granted freedom of worship within the limits of morality and public order, and also received state funding in proportion to their membership. Civil legislation permitted separation from bed and board but not divorce. Pastors were also civil officials. An Evangelical Church was organized in 1881, and in 1961 was formally established in the Principality of Liechtenstein under the patronage of the Reformed Church (Landeskirche) of Saint Gallen.

In 1997 the Vatican established a new diocese in Vaduz, to be headed by Bishop Wulfgang Haas, a liberal and somewhat controversial former bishop of Chur. Vaduz, like Chur, was immediately subject to the Holy See. Liechtenstein had ten parishes, administered by 16 secular and ten religious priests (see LA SALETTE, MISSIONARIES OF OUR LADY OF). Several MARIST BROTHERS engaged in secondary school teaching, while additional care was offered by the 62 PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS, members of both Sisters Adorers of the Most Precious Blood and Sisters of the Precious Blood of Schellenberg, Liechtenstein. Religious training remained compulsory in all public schools, unless a parental exemption was requested. The government supported ecumenical dialogues and funded adult education in religion.

Bibliography: A. FROMMELT, "Fürstentum Liechtenstein," Helvetia Christiana: Bistum Chur, v.1 (Zurich 1942) 209–234; "Das Fürstentum Liechtenstein im Bistumsverband," in 1500 Jahre Bistum Chur (Zurich 1950) 211–221. E. POESCHEL, Die Kunstdenkmäler des Fürstentums Liechtenstein (Basel 1950). Jahrbuch des Historischen Vereins ür das Fürstentum Liechtenstein (Vaduz 1901–). I. MÜLLER, "Die Patrozinien des F.L.," ibid. 59 (1959) 303–327. M. H. VICAIRE and N. BACKMUND, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 13:213–221, s.v. "Chur."

[R. ALLGÄUER/EDS.]

LIÈGE

City on both banks of the Meuse River in east Belgium; capital of Liège Province; and a diocese (Leodiensis) comprising Liège and Limburg Provinces, 2,426 square miles in area.

Liège owes its origin to the fact that LAMBERT, Bishop of Maastricht, built near a Merovingian portus an oratory where he was murdered. His successor, Hubert, impressed by the miracles that took place, established his see there (717–718), suffragan to COLOGNE. Liège became an ecclesiastical principality under the German Holy Roman Empire c. 980 and remained so until the French Revolution. Under the first PRINCE-BISHOP, Not-ker (972–1008), and his successor, WAZO, the cathedral school flourished, "the Athens of the North," until it gave way to the University of Paris. RATHERIUS OF VERO-NA (d. 974) and HERIGER OF LOBBES were literary figures associated with Liège. The Peace of God was introduced into the Empire form Liège (1082). JULIANA OF LIÈGE in 1246 had Bishop Robert establish a special feast in honor of the Blessed Sacrament, which Urban IV prescribed for the whole Church. Bishops of the 16th century successfully opposed various Protestant movements.

When new dioceses were created in the Low Countries (1559), the bishop of Liège lost half his see but nonetheless promulgated the reforms of the Council of Trent and founded a seminary. In the 18th century the EN-LIGHTENMENT made progress; Bp. François-Charles de Velbruck (1772–84) belonged to the Masons. In 1795 France annexed the town and principality. The CONCOR-DAT OF 1801 gave Liège its present territory with the collegiate church of St-Paul as cathedral; St-Lambert having been demolished by French Revolutionaries. In 1815 Liège went to the United Kingdom of the Netherlands, and in 1830 became part of Belgium. The city, which in the 16th century had a school of humanities, obtained a university in 1816. The fact that Liège was for many centuries the seat of a diocese and of an ecclesiastical principality explains its riches in churches, abbeys, and convents, as well as the anticlerical feeling of the population.

St-Paul, founded in 969, built in the 13th and restored in the 16th century, the cathedral since 1802, contains the shrine of St. Lambert in gilded silver. The collegiate St-Barthélémy, in part 11th and 12th century, has famous baptismal fonts by Renier de Huy (1111–18). St-Croix, founded by Notker, has a west apse in 13th-century Rhenish Romanesque. St-Denis, with the oldest Romanesque tower in Belgium, has a 14th-century Gothic choir. St-Jacques, rebuilt in 16th-century flamboyant Gothic; has a rich decor and a Renaissance side portal. The palace of the prince-bishops (1526–38), now the Palais de Justice, has an inside court with original composite columns. The church of the Benedictine Abbey of St-Jacques (1015), which was suppressed in the French Revolution, became a parish church.

Bibliography: J. DARIS, Notices historiques sur les églises du diocèse de Liège, 17 v. (Liège 1867–99). T. GOBERT, Liège à travers les âges, 6 v. (2d ed. Liège 1924–29). J. PAQUAY, ed., La Collégiale de Saint-Barthélémy à Liège (Liège 1935). G. DE FROIDCOURT, François-Charles, comte de Velbruck, prince-évêque de Liège, franc-maçon (Liège 1936). É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique, 5 v. (Brussels 1945–52), 2 suppl. J. LEJEUNE, La Principauté de Liège (Liège 1948). J. PHILIPPE, L'Ancien palais des princes de Liège (Liège 1949). J. STIENNON, Étude sur le chartrier et le domaine de l'Abbaye de Saint Jacques de Liège, 1015–1029 (Liège 1956). L. DEWEZ, La Cathédrale Saint-Paul à Liège (Liège 1956). P. HARSIN, Études critiques sur l'histoire de la principauté de Liège, 1477–1795, 3 v. (Liège 1956–59).

[M. DIERICKX]

LIÉNART, ACHILLE

Cardinal, bishop of Lille, France; b. Lille (Nord), France, Feb. 7, 1884; d. Lille, Feb. 15, 1973. He studied at the College of St. Joseph in Lille and the Seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris, where he was ordained to the priesthood on June 29, 1907. Remaining in Paris for further studies, he received licentiates in theology from the Institut Catholique and in letters from the Sorbonne. He completed his studies in Rome, receiving a doctorate in theology and a licentiate in Sacred Scripture from the Pontifical Biblical Institute. Upon his return to France, he taught Sacred Scripture at the grand seminary in Cambrai (1910-14) and at the grand seminary of the new diocese of Lille (1919-26). During World War I he served as a volunteer chaplain and received the Croix de guerre with six citations. From 1926 to 1928, he was pastor of St. Christopher's parish in the industrial city of Tourcoing. On Dec. 8, 1928, he was consecrated bishop of Lille, where he served until his resignation due to age on March 14, 1968.

As bishop, his two deepest concerns were the care of souls and social justice. He built a new diocesan seminary, completed the Cathedral of Notre Dame de Treille, and called a diocesan synod to draw up the first statutes of the diocese. During a bitter strike in 1929 he sided with the workers and won Vatican support for the right and duty of Catholic workers to form labor unions. The following year, Pope Pius XI appointed him cardinal. A vigorous advocate of Catholic Action as the remedy for social ills, he condemned both atheistic materialism and economic liberalism. He served as president of the Assembly of French Cardinals and Archbishops from 1940 to 1966 and, concurrently from 1954, as director of the Mission of France. During the Nazi occupation, he publicly opposed forced labor and rendered notable assistance to the victims of the war. In 1947 he journeyed to Cameroon, where the first sections of the association Ad Lucem, which he established to send lay Catholics to help in mission lands, were located. He took a pivotal role in the Second Vatican Council, where he insisted at the opening session that the council must be master of its own house and not merely the rubber stamp for the work of the preparatory commissions. He was mainly responsible for the revision of the "Schema on the Sources of Divine Revelation' and was a staunch advocate of a strong statement on behalf of the Jews. His many pastoral letters and statements constitute a corpus of contemporary Catholic theology on the whole range of problems facing modern man.

Bibliography: L'Ame du régiment, l'abbé Thibaut (Cambrai 1922). Dans les pas de Jésus (Paris 1953). La Semaine Religieuse de Lille (1928–68). W. ABBOTT, SJ, Twelve Council Fathers (New York 1963). P. LESOURD and J. M. RAMIZ, Achille Cardinal Liénart (Notre Dame, Ind. 1965).

[F. MURPHY]

LIESBORN, ABBEY OF

Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of Münster, Westphalia, founded in 1131 by monks from Werden. They were invited by Bishop Egbert to replace a community of nuns that, having been founded there c. 815, was suppressed by the bishop because of relaxed discipline. By the 13th century the abbey was rich and powerful, but religious life declined and it became a kind of rest home for the nobility. Discipline was restored when it joined the Bursfeld Union in 1465 under Abbot Heinrich of Cleves (1464-90). Under Abbot Johann Smalebecker (1490–1522) it became famous as a center of art and learning, and because of its influence in the reform of other communities it was known as the Bursfeld of the West. The Gothic abbatial church was completed in 1506. In the 16th century decline set in under several unworthy abbots, and the wars of the 17th century caused more disorder. There was a period of improvement after the Peace of Westphalia in 1648, but 18th-century wars caused a new decline. It was deeply in debt when it was suppressed in 1803.

Bibliography: L. SCHMITZ-KALLENBERG, Monasticon Westfaliae (Münster 1909). J. LINNEBORN, "Das Kloster Liesborn zur Zeit seiner Aufhebung," Studien und Mitteilungen 23 (1902) 309–339. B. SENGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1048.

[C. FALK]

LIESSIES, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery near Avesnes (Nord), France, Diocese of Cambrai (patron, St. Lambert). Very little is known of its origin: according to the 11th-century Vita of St. Hiltrude, it was founded in the 8th century, c. 764, by Count Wibert whose son Guntrade was first superior, and whose daughter Hiltrude lived a holy life nearby. It is quite possible that originally it was a double MONASTERY. The great riches given by its founder disappeared during the following centuries as a result of SECU-LARIZATIONS (of church property) and Norman invasions. When in 1095, Thierry, lord of Avesnes, decided to restore the monastery, it was occupied by only four canons. Its restoration was in fact a refoundation: BENEDICTINES were introduced and the monastery was once again richly endowed. But prosperity was shortlived and Liessies remained in the following centuries a small abbey often experiencing financial difficulties that, in turn, made difficult the practice of regular observance. The great abbot of Liessies was Bl. F. Louis BLOSIUS (1530-66), whose many ascetical treatises record the Benedictine program of asceticism he worked out for his monks; at the same time he reorganized the temporal administration of the abbey with such success that through him material well-being returned to the abbey temporarily and spiritual fervor, permanently. During the French Revolution, the religious were driven away, the goods of the monastery were sold, and the buildings gradually destroyed.

Bibliography: J. PETER, L'Abbaye de Liessies (Lille 1912). F. BAIX, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 9:228–242.

[H. PLATELLE]

LIETBERT OF CAMBRAI-ARRAS, ST.

Bishop of Cambrai; b. Brabant, Belgium; d. June 23, 1076. Lietbert (Liébert, Libert) became bishop of CAMBRAI in 1051, succeeding his uncle Gerard. He labored zealously for the peace and well-being of his people, protecting them from the extortions of Hugo, his bailiff, and those of Jean, castellan of Cambrai, who exiled him. After returning in triumph to his see, Lietbert led a PILGRIMAGE to the Holy Land (1054). He was forced to turn back when he heard that the Saracens had closed the Holy Sepulcher. Upon his return Lietbert gained a reputation as a builder for his establishment of the monastery and basilica of the Holy Sepulcher and for his construction of the churches of St. Croix and Saint-Vaast in Cambrai.

Feast: June 23.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 5 (1867): 498–516. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:4928–4929. É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945–) 2:21–25. H. LANCELIN, Histoire du diocèse de Cambrai (Valenciennes 1946) 95–98.

[D. S. BUCZEK]

LIETZMANN, HANS

Protestant church historian; b. Düsseldorf, March 2, 1875; d. Berlin, June 25, 1942. Lietzmann spent his youth in Wittenberg, studied in Jena, and studied classical philology and theology at Bonn, coming under the influence of the New Testament scholar Eduard Graf and of Herman Usener for his formation in philology and religious science. Upon earning his licentiate in theology with a dissertation on Der Menschensohn in 1896, he taught for a few years. He returned to Bonn in 1900 for specialization in Church history, was called to Jena in 1905, and replaced HARNACK in Berlin in 1924, taking over the chairmanship of the Church Fathers' Commission in 1930. In 1920 he assumed editorship of the Zeitschrift f. Neutestamentliches Wissenschaft. He described his life's work as the attempt to "combine classical philology and theology in a unity" (Autobiographie 8), which he did by demonstrating an expert competence in Church history, archeology, liturgy, Canon Law, credal study, and papyrology. All these disciplines were employed in his highly influential Petrus und Paulus in Rom (1915; 2d ed. 1927). His ability in dealing with New Testament studies extended to both textual and exegetical fields, and his stylistic excellence was extraordinary as were the courage and depth of his judgments. Frequently in small brochures he opened up new approaches to knowledge, as in his Schallanalyse und Textkritik (1922) and his Study of the Mandaeans (Beitrag zur Mandäerfrage 1930). His fourvolume Geschichte der alten Kirche is likewise a monument to his all-embracing competence (see MANDAE-AN RELIGION).

Bibliography: H. LIETZMANN, "Autobiographie," Religionwissenschaft der Gegenwart in Selbstdarstellangen 2 (1926): 77–117; Mass and Lord's Supper, tr. D. H. G. REEVE (Leiden 1953–); Kleine Schriften, in Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 3 (1958–62) 67,68,74, esp. in late antiquity, New Testament, liturgy, and symbol. H. LIETZMANN et al., eds., Handbuch zum Neuen Testament, 22 v. (Tübingen 1917–31). H. LIETZMANN and H. W. BEYER, Die jüdische Katakombe der Villa Torlonia in Rom (Berlin 1930). H. BORNKAMM, Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 41 (1942): 1–12. K. ALAND, "Die Schriften H. Lietzmanns," ibid. 12–33. W. ELTESTER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:375–376.

[K. ALAND]

LIFE, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE)

Life, as understood in the Bible, is God's action within a plan of goodness and for a purpose, fully known only to Himself. God lives of Himself. Human life is God's manifest action in man and man's obedient response to God reverently rendered by his action toward his fellow men and, together with them, toward the good of all creation. Man possesses life as a gift, so free that he may choose to act outside God's plan of good and so lose the gift. Action apart from God's purpose is not life but death (Gn 2:17). In the first pages of the Bible one finds man and woman making the choice of death and God mercifully promising to continue His action as a redemptive force that they must use to struggle against death and the instigator of death, whom they have preferred. Addressing the woman, God lets them know that victory, and therefore fullness of life, will not come until one of her seed shall crush the enemy's head (Gn 3:15). The Bible is a record of God's life-giving action from the beginning, as it gradually became known to a people, Israel, the seed of Abraham (Gn 17:4–8). As a record, the Bible gives a full report of life in conflict with death.

In The Old Testament

Walter Eichrodt closes his revised edition of The Theology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia 1961) with an affirmation of unity and continuity in the Biblical concept of life and a critique (512-520) of E. von Rad's 1960 edition of Old Testament Theology (New York). Von Rad is more impressed by the complications in Biblical thought and does not find a unified theology in the Scriptures. Obviously, one cannot attempt extended observations here. Every tradition of thought that enters into the record takes the Torah, or PENTATEUCH, the divine instruction given to Moses and by him to the people, as its central position. Here one must be content to cite the Biblical texts to show that all traditions agree on the concept of life they find in the Torah. After considering the terminology connected with the OT idea of life, this section treats of Israel's concepts of the living God and man's corporate life and concludes with some remarks on the tensions in the life of the Israelite and his view of a future Terminology. The Hebrew never speaks of life in the abstract. Life is always observable, something possessed. Basically, life is motion. To have life is to possess the power to act, to accomplish a task begun in man by God's rûah, His breath, His dynamic spirit (Gn. 2:7). The primary meaning of rûah is wind; it is mobile and mobilizing. God's breath is the vital, always effective source of energy in men and animals, in all living things [Ps 103 (104):10–30]. Blood coursing through the flesh is the bearer of life in men and animals (Gn 9:4-5). Bubbling water is living water, the symbol of God and of His spirit (Ez 36:25-26; Jer 2:13). Fire is living fire, often a manifestation of God Himself [Ex 3:1-6; 19:16; Ps 17(18):13; 35(36):10]. Israel's conviction that man has breath from God in common with other earthly creatures (Gn 6:17) is never pantheistic monism, which would make all life one physical reality. Animals are different from men [Gn 2:20; Ps 48(49):13; 72(73):22; Jer 50:3]. God's life is ineffable (Ex 15:11; Is 40:25).

The terms translated into English as flesh, spirit, and soul may be used interchangeably to denominate the life of the whole man; yet, each may be used to express some individual manifestation of life that is its primary meaning. The most common names for life are hayyîm (life, lifetime, a period of existence), rûah (breath), bāśār (flesh), nepeš (soul), and 'ôr (light, used metaphorically). "To see the light" is to remain alive, to find life or to return to life, freed from the power of death (Is 2:5; 53:11). Light is life [Mi 7:8; Is 60:1; Ps 12(13):4] and life-giving (Is 60:3). Darkness is evil, confusion, and death (Is 5:20; Lam 3:2). Man's rûah, his breath, his spirit, his soul is the principle of life within him, but not in the Greek dualistic sense. See SPIRIT (IN THE BIBLE). To the Hebrew, man is one, undivided being.

Flesh (bāśār) denotes man's whole being with an accent on his mortality and weakness [Ps 64(65):3]; less often it indicates the outer man only (Nm 19:8; Jgs 8:7). So also nepeš (soul, literally "breath": Jb 41:13) may signify life itself (Gn 35:18; Ex 21:23; 2 Kgs 17:21; etc.). The final result of God's act in creating mankind is a nepeš hayyâ, a "living soul," i.e., a living being (Gn 2:7). The nepeš is thus the being, the person, self [1 Sm 18:1; Ps 102(103):1; etc.]. See SOUL (IN THE BIBLE).

After his sin and God's merciful promise (Gn 3:15) man exists as living, but he is always in decline. Death can and does always intrude [Ps 17(18):5–6; 77(78):50; 89(90):10; Prv 13:14; Is 28:15]. The Hebrew speaks of grief, sickness, the calumny of enemies, and other dire afflictions as forms of death. See DEATH (IN THE BIBLE). When man overcomes these, he lives again [Ps 70(71): 20; Is 38:15–17].

In Biblical anthropology the heart (Heb. $l\bar{e}b$, $l\bar{e}b\bar{a}b$) is the seat of man's inner life (Prv 4:20–23), thinking [Ps 13(14):1; 14(15):2; Prv 24:2], remembering (Dt 4:39), and freely moving toward whatever it determines (1 Sm 14:7; Is 10:7), but subject to God's word in the way of salvation (1 Sm 12:20; Prv 3:5). See HEART (IN THE BIBLE).

An Israelite "hears" the word of God in inanimate creation [Ps 18(19):2–5; 28(29):3–9] and in the events of history [Ex 19:4–6; Ps 80(81):11–12; Is 9:7–8]. He "sees" what God says to him (Hb 2:1). Vision born of fidelity enables him to assent to God's word [Ps 105(106):12; Ex 4:31] with joyful, confident certainty and self-abandonment [Ps 32(33):4, 20–22; 55(56):5; 72(73):23–28; Jb 42:1–6].

As knowledge and understanding grow in Israel, its record declares with ever greater force that the SPIRIT of God will bring life to fruition (Is 11:2; 42:1; 44:3; Jl 3:1–2). The spirit of the Lord continues to sustain the spirit He gives to men [Ps 138(139):7; Neh 9:20]. Yet in the OT God's spirit is never said to dwell in men. It is poured out upon them to enable them to respond to God's word and carry out His purpose (Is 42:5; 44:3), which they make their own (Is 61:1; 63:11–19).

The Living God. Taking the Bible on its own terms, there is nothing more obvious than that Israel's view of human life issues not from a mystic, other-worldly philosophy or a mystery cult, but from everyday, interpersonal experience within which God acts as Creator, Savior, and Lord (Dt 30:11–14). In the events of the Exodus, in which God led them out of the bondage of Egypt (Ex 13:21), a mixed multitude of people (Nm 11:4), partly Hebrew and partly other, saw God (Ex 4:30; 5:22–6:1; 19:4) in the signs He gave of Himself there. They learned to perceive, know, and acknowledge Him, day by day, as the living God, present in their midst (Ex 33:15), acting to save them (Ex 13:21; 14:30; 15:13; 16:15), merciful (Ex 16:11; Dt 6:20–23), and beneficent (Ex 33:12–17). They saw Him doing what was always good for them (Dt 4:32-40; 8:16), giving them what was fitting to their most urgent needs [Dt 1:25; 8:1-5; Ez 17:8; Ps 85(86):5], and moving them in the depths of their being (Ex 19:5; Dt 6:4-9) to imitate Him in their personal activity toward one another (Lv 19:18; Dt 24:10-22; Mi 6:8) and toward all creation (Gn 1:28-30; Dt 8:6-20; Wis 9:2-3). Guided by their leader Moses, they heard Him in the total outcome of their deliverance, calling, enlightening, and creating in them a life of corporate unity, a will to live in His presence [Ex 19:4-8; 33:16; Dt 4:9-14; 6:1-3; Ps 23(24):6; Lam 3:40] according to the pattern, purpose, and goal that His action had begun in them (Gn 12:3; Ex 3:6-10; 19:4-8; 20:1-17).

It is not in the scope here to show how or when the people reached into the primal fibers of their ancestral tradition to find that the activity of Yahweh was the true object of its myth-making attempts to explain cosmic beginnings. [See MYTH AND MYTHOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)]. The OT authors are content to record, by allusion, that they did so [Gn 1:1–3:24; Is 51:9–10; Jb 3:8; 9:13; 26:12; 38:8–11; 40:25; Ps 32(33):7; 73(74). 12–17; 88(89): 10–11; etc.]. For them Moses was the embodiment of God's word (Sir 45:1–5) brought forward to his time (Sir 44:16–23) and carried forward to their own.

Israel did not know Yahweh's fullness, but they saw that He was not like the gods of other nations (Ex 8:6; 15:11; Is 44:6–8; Wis 15:1–17). He showed Himself as the living cause of all things that had already happened and all things yet to be (Dt 7:7–9; Is 40:26–31; Ez 39:21–29), in full control of all the elements of the earth (Exodus ch. 7–15; Psalm 8), unchanging King, enthroned forever [Ex 15:18; Dt 32:40; Is 40:28; Ps 91 (92); 92(93);

95(96)–98(99)]. He came to them as a person, one who plans and communicates toward a purpose (Dt 4:36–38; Is 45:1–13), and who sends men to communicate His purpose to others (Ex 3:16; Dt 5:5; Is 6:8; Zec 1:6).

The OT does not speak of God as spirit. It has been remarked often that, perhaps, the idea of God as spirit did not seem personal enough. Anthropomorphism, i.e., speaking of God as if He had human characteristics (Gn 2:3; 6:5–6; Ps 2:4; Is 62:5; etc.), is the Bible's way of describing God as living person. In no sense is God identified with men (Nm 23:19; Os 11:9; Is 40:25). Rather, if man lives as a free, knowing, loving, and choosing agent (Dt 11:26–28; Jos 24:14–15; Sir 15:11–20), it is because God is a person (Ex 33:14; Sir 17:1–18). Personal relationship between God, the sovereign Lord, and His people structures all Biblical life and thought (Dt 5:2–4; 6:4–9; Hos 2:9, 16; Am 3:2; Is 38:15–19; 40:1–2; etc.).

Corporate Life. Basic in the OT is the truth that human life is an ordered existence of corporate living, which moves in the direction and in the channels given it by God's command.

Founded on Divine Law. The Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS place God's word in the form of law. It describes the economy of corporate life in the apodictic commands of the Decalogue, a charter of interpersonal life based on God's absolute dominion over all things (Ex 20:1-17; 24.3; Lv 19:2-18). The DEUTERONOMISTS are more persuasive but nonetheless firm. The Book of Deuteronomy presents Moses as inculcating the observance of God's laws (Dt 4:1-2, 13; 5:1-21), which come from the Lord's personal love for the Israelites (4:37), as shown by the miracles He worked for them (4:9, 32–39). The people are to fix these laws in their heart (4:9) and teach them to their children (4:9–14), in order that they, individually and collectively (4:25-31), may live (4:1, 40). This is not to say that justice founded on law is the cause of life [Dt 7:8; Neh 9:6; Ps 118(119):17; Dn 9:18]. Man does not merit life; it is always God's free gift (Dt 32:6, 18, 39; Is 51:1-6). He acts for the glory of His Name (Is 42:8; 43:7; 62:2). It is to say that man does not truly live except in the way recognized in signs of God's activity and revealed to man's heart as the only way in which human life can operate toward its perfection [Gn 1:27-31; Dt 6:10-19; 7:12-15; 8:1-5; Ps 102(103):5]. This point is very important in view of later developments. Law and order are necessary to life by God's command (Dt 8:20) and by its very constitution, but life itself is the breath of the Lord. God placed life within an order of relation to Himself, which the Torah describes and commands. Man can choose to disobey and to die (Gn 3:6; Dt 32:15–18; Is 5:24; Jer 18:12; Prv 1:24, 33), but God alone has the power to save him [Ps 48(49):8–13; 68(69):14–19; etc.].

Social Life under God. The priestly and Deuteronomic strains in the Torah are introduced and illustrated in the teaching of Genesis ch. 1-3. It is the evident conviction of the Biblical record that man, created in God's image (Gn 1:27), became aware of his place in life within the orderly manifestation of God's goodness when, upon recognizing the inner reality of living things and giving them names, he found no helper like himself (Gn 2:20) until God gave him woman. Man and woman recognized in things as they found them an order of created good (Gn 1:27-31; see also Jer 5:24; Ps 148:6), in which they had a dominant role (Gn 1:28; see also Ps 8:6-9; Wis 9:2-3) but which they themselves did not set up (Gn 2:8; see also Sir 42:15–43:35; Wis ch. 9). All things were made ready to serve them (Gn 1:28-31). In their interpersonal lives, they found equality of being (Gn 2:23), a common need for one another (Gn 2:18; 3:16b), the common blessing of marriage and children (Gn 1:28; 2:28; see also Gn 9:7), and the land that each must till and keep as his spirit directs (Gn 2:15), while respecting the land of others (Ex 20:15, 17). There is no suggestion here of merely human evolution of thought. Understanding of life is never complete apart from communion with God (Gn 3:8; Jer 12:1, 14-17; Hos 2:10, 16; Wis 1:7; 2:21-23). Communion with God is the living thing that protects the law of human life, while adapting it to changing circumstances (Ex 4:11-17; 19:4-8; 33:7-11; Nm 11:17; 2 Kgs 22:13; Jer 16:19).

In the light of this communion, Moses' people know that life can proceed to fullness only by corporate action. Men and women are to live by manifesting God's love in each generation by their own free giving of themselves in signs of love for one another (Gn 2:24; Ex 23:4; Lv 19:18) and by perfecting all things according to His manifest will as a sign of love for Him (Dt 6:4–9). They are to use all earth's energies as they know them concretely, to bring them to fruition.

In union with Him they are to develop all earth's possibilities, which are also their own (Gn 1:28–30; 2:15–16; Dt 1:8; 11:10–12; Jer 29:5–7; Is 35:1–10). The fact that the Israelites' view of life was totally earthbound is not surprising. Their experience in God's word and, therefore, their knowledge of life was incomplete. They recognized that man lives as viceregent in the KINGDOM OF GOD, but that in every generation, much of life eludes their grasp and understanding (Job ch. 28). When all their work is done, God's faithful must wait hopefully for the full life in the promised land (Lv 26:3–13; Is 30:15, 18; Jer 29:10–14).

Israel in the Family of the Nations. In this view there is no room for dominating nationalism, exaggerated collectivism, or excessive individualism. All men belong to one human family (Gn ch. 10; Lv 19:33-34; Is 2:2-4; Ez 47:22; Zep 3:9–10). The OT as well as the NT extol the faithful of all times and nations (Gn 5:24; 6:9; 14:18; 2 Kgs ch. 5; Is 44:28; Rom 2:12–16) who, though perhaps confusedly, knew God speaking to them through signs in the cosmic order and through the events of history (Acts 17:26-28). The recorded word credits their faith as justice. They live according to God's regal will in spite of sin all around them (Gn 6:9–13; Rom 2:27–29), purified by their submission to God's word as they understand it (Wis 14:6; Mal 1:11). Men of all nations, wicked as well as just, carry forward God's action in Israel's regard (Hb 1:2-11; Is 45:14-15; 2 Chr 36:22). Israel is the servant of the Lord (Is 41:8–10; 49:3) through whom and in final union with whom the nations are to live in the light [Gn 12:2-3; Dt 9:4; Mi 4:1-5; 42:6-7; 66:18-19; Ps 95(96):3–8; 97(98):2].

Israel is God's son, His heir by adoption (Ex 4:22; 19:5-6; Hos 11:1; Bar 3:37), within whose corporate life individual Israelites, also sons and servants (Lv 25:55; Dt 3:24; Is 1:2; 2 Sm 7:5), share all life's gifts and responsibilities (Ex ch. 20–23; Jer 3:19–4:2; Is 27:12). Israelites are brothers in a spirit that transcends the flesh (Lv 19:17-18; Dt 15:7-11). The law of life inevitably binds each to all others and all others to each in good (Nm 14:19–20; Dt 9:5; Sir 17:1–18) and evil [Jdt 8:18–23; Ps 50(51):7]. One who knows what is at stake (Is 49:5) and who is without sin (53:9), if he will spend his life in suffering (Is 53:2-10) rather than give in to evil by doing wrong (Is 49:4; 53:8–10), will therefore die condemned by his fellows (Is 53:8). But if he gives his life and death as an offering for sin, bearing the guilt of many (Is 53:11), he will accomplish the will of the Lord (Is 53:10) and will justify the many (53:11), to rectify the life of the world (53:12).

Those who live justly do so by God's spirit and power projected through their action into every avenue of social existence (Ex 3:13; Nm 11:16-30; Dt 34:9; 2 Sm 23:2; Is 42:1-7; Jer 22:1-5; Ez 34:1-6). Those who respond carry forward the word of life taught by the priests during the corporate remembrance (zikkārôn) of cultic prayer (Dt 31:10–13; Jos 22:21–29; Ezr 9:5–38). Here they recognize and accept the gifts and demands of daily living as things of the spirit no less than of the flesh (Dt 26:1-15; Jos 22:2-6; 24:1-28). They offer them together in sign of their corporate fidelity, mutual labor, and self-giving (Ex 24:3-11; Lv ch. 3; Dt 12:4-28), only to receive of them again, replete with the sustaining action of God, who had given them in the first place for the happiness of their life (Ex 24:8; Lv ch. 1-7; 22; Dt 7:13). Whenever the spirit of law and cult remained pure, the worshipers' view of life remained unclouded (Jos 22:24-31; 1 Sm ch. 1; 2 Sm ch. 7; 2 Kgs ch. 23; Ezr 9:5–15) and full of joy (Dt 16:9–15; 1 Chr 15:25; 2 Chr 20:27–28; Ezr 6:22; etc.).

Tensions. God did not make death, and He takes "no pleasure in the death of a wicked man" (Ez 3:11). When through the temptation of the envious devil (Wis 2:24) mankind turned from God and death entered the world (Gn 2:17; 3:1–19), God offered hope of renewed life (Gn 3:15). But following the blind perversity that sin ($h\bar{e}t$ ", erroneous choice) maintains, mankind chose to continue in its own way (Gn 6:11–13; Is 43:27). God continued to speak to man (Gn 4:6–15; 6:13–21; etc.), but the vision of life was hopelessly clouded.

In Israel the forces of sin and death struggled to dominate at its very heart. The nation as a whole, led by faithless priests (Jer 2:8; 7:1-8:3; Hos 4:4-10; 5:1-7; Mal 2:1-9), false prophets (1 Kgs 22:6-25; Mi 3:5-8; Jer 14:13-16; 23:16-40; Ez 13:1-23), and ambitious kings (2 Kgs 16:2-18; 21:1-16; Jeremiah ch. 21-22), gradually fell to mere lip service of God (Is 29:13), when they did not fall into idolatry. Many expected their elect position in God's plan to save them (Jer 14:13; Am 5:18). There was a persistent tendency to legalism, as if life were a thing of quid pro quo with God (Prv 10:16, 27; 11:6, 19; 13:6). However, this tendency never reached the proportions found in later Judaism; for faithful priests, prophets, kings, and people combated it consistently. Legalism is not part of the Biblical tradition (Dt 8:3; 9:4-6; Jer 3:19; Hos 11:1-4).

When social injustices of all kinds fell heaviest on the Remnant of Israel that continued to live in obedient love (1 Kgs 21:1–14; Am 5:11–12; 8:4–6; Mi 2:1–10; 3:1–3, 9–11; Is 3:14–15), the anguish of their trial caused them to question God concerning His justice [Ps 72(73):1–22; Jer 15:10–21; 20:7–9]. They received no immediate answer other than a further strengthening of their faith [Ps 16(17):6–9; 20(21):17–22; etc.]. Ecclesiastes, writing late into the record, shows the futility of seeking an answer to the mystery of life by reason alone (Eccl 3:17–22; 8:5–13; 12:13–14).

View of Future Life. During many years God supported the people by His promise of a kingly mediator whom He would anoint with His spirit to a wonderful degree (Is 9:1–6; 11:1–5) and through whose regency He would finally establish a living community of His kingdom in paradisaical peace (Is 11:6–9). Now in the people's darkest hour, Jeremiah, while living still in the messianic tradition (Jer 23:5–8), knows from the Lord that in the Israelites' present state their sin is incurable (Jer 2:25–26). Although bound by the law of life, they do not have the power to keep it. They have forgotten and do not know the Living God (Jer 24:7). But "the days are coming, says the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah. . . . I will place my law within them and write it upon their hearts. . . . All, from least to greatest, shall know me' (Jer 31:31–34). They will come to life again (Ez 37:6) when the Lord will sprinkle clean water upon them, to cleanse them of their impurities and place a new spirit within them (Ez 36:25–26).

Deutero-Isaiah (Isaiah ch. 40–55) sees God's plan for man's rebirth that will include man's cooperation. The glory of God and the unfolded manifestation of His power will appear in a new Exodus (40:3–4; 45:1–6; 49:8–12) when He will support the chosen servant, who, although He will be without sin, will willingly identify Himself with His fellows (49:5–7; 53:6) and will accept the death (50:4–6; 52:13–53:9) that sinful men will impose upon Him, in order to give perfect response to God from among them. The will of the Lord will be accomplished through Him; He will justify many and will see the light in fullness of days (53:11).

A number of interpreters see statements of belief in a life of conscious relationship with God after the death of the body and even of resurrected life in Is 26:19; 53:10–12; Ps 72(73):23–27; Wis 3:1–4; 6:18–19. All scholars agree that the doctrine of the RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD is clearly stated in Dn 12:2–3 (from the middle of the 2d century B.C.) and 2 Mc 7:9, 14, 23; 14:46 (from about the same period). In Dn 7:13–27 God's holy ones are symbolized by "one like a son of man coming in clouds of heaven," who, at the throne of God, the "Ancient One," receives everlasting dominion.

The OT concept of life remains consistent. Life is God's action known through signs in His terrestrial domain (Is 41:17–20; 42:10–12). In Is 65:17–20; 66:22–23 the seer beholds, far ahead in the future, a suprahistorical world, where there is life in "the new heavens and the new earth" (66.22).

In The New Testament

Although the NT writers use a Greek terminology concerning life that is essentially the same as the Hebrew terminology of the OT writers, an immeasurably new content is given to these terms in the NT because of the new revelation of the triune life of God and the divine life as possessed by Jesus Christ and consequently of the new concept of the corporate life that Christians have as members of the mystical body of Christ.

Terminology. The NT writers follow Hebrew thought patterns, but with important qualifications in the Greek terms for life (ζωή), body (σῶμα), soul (ψυχή), and spirit (πνεῦμα). The momentum in man that needs nourishment from the TREE OF LIFE (Gn 3:9, 24; Rv 2:7) is the $\psi\nu\chi\dot{\eta}$, the soul as the seat of natural life, received from Adam (1 Cor 15:45, 49), which became the seat of death when he accepted the reign of death by sin (Rom 5:14). The life made possible to all men by God in Christ (Rom 5:15, 17) is the life of the $\pi\nu\epsilon\bar{\nu}\mu\alpha$, the spirit, spiritual life. The continuity of God's life-giving action, proceeding through Christ and received in man (1 Pt 3:18, 21–22; Acts 2:14–39) is uppermost in all NT thought (Mt 19:29; Jn 3:16; 5:21; etc.).

In the beginning life was given in the WORD, the LOGOS, the Son of God (Jn 1:1–4). It was given also in promise (Gn 15:4–5); the "children of the promise" retained it in all generations (Lk 1:46–55; Rom 9:6–13), but still in promise (Gal 3:14; Heb 11:39–40), until He who was promised had come, the offspring of Abraham, who is Christ (Gal 3:16).

Spirit (πνεῦμα) in man may be the breath of life (2 Thes 2:8.), the soul as the principle of life (27:50), or the seat of man's feelings and thoughts (Mk 2:8; Rom 8:16). But it may also be the state of being produced in man by the divine sanctifying power (2 Cor 4:13; Phil 1:27). In reference to God πνεῦμα may be the third divine person, best recognized by acts proper only to Him (Jn 14:16–17, 26; 16:7, 13–14), or when He is set off from the Father and the Son in Trinitarian formulas (Mt 28:19; 1 Cor 12:4–6; 2 Cor 13:13). Most often, however, πv εῦμα is the Spirit of God (Rom 8:9) or the spirit of Jesus Christ (Phil 1:19) designating God's life-giving power received in man (Lk 11:13; Jn 3:5; Acts 8:19, 29; 16:6; Eph 5:18).

Triune Life of God. In the one God there are three persons who live and act: God, eternal Father, principle of eternal life (1 Jn 1:2; 5:11); who gives all He is to the Son, begotten coequal with Himself (Jn 1:18; 14:10; Col 1:19; 2:9); God, eternal Son, the Father's Word (Jn 1:1–2) and His image (Col 1:15); and God the Holy Spirit, mysterious bond between Father and Son (Jn 14:16–17, 26), who pours forth Their life and love in men through Christ Jesus (Rom 5:5).

Life as Possessed by Christ. The life that Jesus Christ possesses is eternal life, the outward expression of the eternal community of life (1 Jn 1:2; Jn 5:26; Col 1:15–17; Heb 1:2–3), on which all human life is patterned (Eph 1:3–6; 3:14–15; Rom 8:29; 2 Cor 4:4–6; Jn 1:12). He whom the Father sent to identify Himself with men in the conflict between life and death (Gal 4:4–5; 1 Tm 2:5–6; Phil 2:6–8; Rom 5:17; 8:3; etc.) is His Son (Gal 4:4; Rom 1:1–4), His Word (Jn 1:14; 1 Jn 1:1–3), the supreme revelation of the Godhead in human flesh (Jn 1:18; Rom 1:3–4; Col 1:19). Although He was without sin (1 Pt 2:22; 2 Cor 5:21; Jn 8:46), He who is life itself made incarnate (Jn 1:4, 14; 14:6) accepted all the sufferings of death in the flesh (Heb 5:7–9; Rom 5:9) rather than yield to the demands of Satan or the ψυχή (natural life) in Himself or others, in order to redeem all who unite with Him (Mk 3:35) to carry forward God's creative purpose (Col 1:25–27; Eph 1:3–5; Jn 14:2; 16:7).

In Him, the spirit of life prevailed. He laid down His ψυχή only to take it up again (Jn 10:17), filled with power to resist the temptations of Satan (Lk 4:1–13; Heb 2:18; 4:15) and overcome him (Mt 12:29). He gave others power over him (Mk 3:15). As instrument of the Word in the power of the Spirit, the soul of Jesus spent itself in doing good (Acts 10:38; Jn 10:11; Mt 11:3–5) out of compassion for the poor and afflicted (Mk 1:41; Lk 7:13; Mt 9:36; 14:14; 20:34), even to the forgiveness of sin in those who wounded Him and offended His heavenly Father (Lk 23:34; Mk 2:5, 10; Lk 7:36–50; 1 Pt 2:24–25). Death had no power over Him (Jn 10:18); His spirit was free at all times to surrender itself to the will of His Father (Jn 4:34; Lk 23:46). His final surrender was victory (1 Cor 15:54).

Christ now lives, the triumphant Servant of God (Phil 2:7–9), whose life, death, and Resurrection remain the cause of life to many (Jn 10:10b; Rom 4:25; 5:10; 14:9; 2 Cor 5:15). His glorified life is the first fruits of God's eternal plan (1 Cor 15:20, 25; Col 1:15, 18), the life of the new Adam (1 Cor 15:45). When He entered into His glory (Lk 24:26), Christ became a life-giving spirit (1 Cor 15:22, 45); His risen body and soul, impregnated with the Holy Spirit, became the principle of life (2 Cor 3:17–18) in the disciples He had left on earth and those who, through them, would believe in His name (Jn 17:20).

From heaven, Christ, living as Lord of all in the kingdom of God (Acts 2:36; Phil 2:9-11; Eph 1:22; Rv 1:6; 17:14), mediator between God and men (1 Tm 2:5; Heb 8:6), sends the Holy Spirit as a pledge of eternal life in those who believe in Him (Eph 1:12–13, 19), to dwell in the very center of their being (Jn 14:16; 1 Cor 3:16), helping them to assimilate spiritually all that Christ came to teach (Jn 14:25–26; 15:26; 1 Cor 2:10–12), and enabling them to take on Christ's mind (1 Cor 2:16; Eph 4.20–24; Rom 15:6; Phil 2:9) and will (Jn 14:23; 15:12; 17:6), which are the mind and will of the Father (Rom 12:2; Jn 7:17; 14:10; 15:10, 15; 17:7–8), and so by a common bond of likeness, which is eternal life (Jn 17:3), to participate in the divine nature (2 Pt 1:4) as adopted sons of God (Jn 1:12–13; Rom 8:14–23; Gal 4:5–7; 1 Jn 3:1–2). They become the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST (Eph 1:22-23), through whose Spirit (Eph 1:13; 2 Cor 3:17-18) His fullness (Eph 1:23), the fullness of God, is penetrating the earth (Eph 3:19), to reestablish the harmony in which all things were set up in Christ (Eph 1:10) and toward Him (Eph 1:3–10). He lives as head of His body, which is the CHURCH (Eph 1:22–23). His kingdom is wherever the power of God works in men to bring about in the here and now what He has already accomplished in Christ's life, death, and Resurrection (Col 1:13–14, 22; 2:9–15).

Life of the Redeemed in Christ. Christian life is eternal life in the kingdom of God (Col 1:13), hidden in the hearts of men who bear about in their bodies the dying of Christ (Phil 3:8-11; 2 Cor 4:10; Gal 5:24) for the same reason that He bore His sufferings and death (1 Pt 2:21-25; Phil 3:10; Rom 6:8-11) and who abide in the power of His victory (Phil 4:13; 1 Jn 5:4-5). Christian life is a pearl of great price (Mt 13:46), bought by entering into the life of the kingdom through the way of the commandments of God (Mk 10:17–19), and living them (Rom 7:25) in the perfection that Christ gave them (Mt 5:17-48) in the "law of the Spirit of the life in Christ Jesus" (Rom 8:2). The rule of the Spirit is not experienced as command (Gal 5:18), for it frees men from what is purely natural (ψυχικός) in the body of death (Rom 7:23-24; 2 Cor 3:17; Gal 5:16-21) and lifts them into a life of unbounded faith, hope, charity, joy, peace, patience, continency, goodness, and fidelity (Gal 5:22-23).

Corporate life in Christ's body, which is being brought to its fullness (Eph 4:13–16), expresses itself in every avenue of temporal and spiritual responsibility (1 Cor 12:27–31; 2 Cor 8:1–9; Eph 5:21–33; 1 Pt 1:22–25; 2:3–4). In this way the Church gives evidence to all on earth that where the Spirit reigns mankind becomes a new creature (2 Cor 5:17; Eph 2:15). This life of service is echoed and prolonged even now in heaven (Rv 4:4–11; 5:9–14; 7:9–12).

Whereas Paul uses the term body of Christ (Rom 12:5; 1 Cor 12:12–27; Eph 1:23; 2:14–16; 4:4, 12, 16; 5:23, 30; Col 1:18, 24; 2:19; 3:15) to express man's new life relationship to God, John uses the concept of the vine and its branches (Jn 15:1–8) to denote this. Both comparisons serve to express oneness of spiritual being in Christ. The fact that the Spirit is the bond of union between Christ and men, the source of personal intercommunication between Father, Son, Spirit, and men united in Christ, is uppermost in both (Jn 14:16–17, 26; 15:26; 1 Cor 12:12–13; Eph 4:4).

But the rule of the Spirit is not complete even in those who, by Baptism into Christ's death and life (Rom 6:4–11; Col 2:12–13), have accepted it (Phil 3:12) and have nourished it by partaking of the bread of life in His word (Jn 6:28–29, 35–40; Phil 2:16; 1 Pt 1:23–25) and in the Sacrament of His body and blood (Jn 6:55; Lk 22:19–2:0; 1 Cor 10:16–17). Therefore, life in Christ's body is also redemptive. Redemptive help within their own community living is assured to those who believe and who use the effective signs of life and redemption that Christ has left in His Sacraments. Sacramental life is both a pledge of glory (1 Pt 3:21; Jn 6:55) and a sign to the world that the members of Christ's body are still on trial (2 Cor 6:1–2; 13:5), carrying life about in vessels of clay, so that all may see that it is from God and not of themselves (2 Cor 4:7). The total life of the Church is a sign that Christ is dwelling within it, to call sinners to reconcile themselves to the Father (2 Cor 5:20; 6:1–2), to fight the good fight of faith and lay hold of life in heaven (1 Tm 6:11–14; Lk 6:22–23).

The work of perfecting the material creation according to time and circumstance belongs to the Creator (Rom 8:19-22; 2 Pt 3:13). From the beginning God continues to give men ability, desire, time, circumstances, and command to develop earth's possibilities, each in his own personal field of endeavor (Mt 25:14; 1 Cor 7:17). Living in the Spirit, members of Christ's body must accept the challenge of their times (Rom 6:4; 13:13; Eph 5:8–15; Jn 12:35), imaging Christ's principles, thoughts, habits, desires, and loves (Col 3:9-10; Rom 8:29; 2 Cor 3:18), stripped of jealousy (1 Pt 2:1-10), stewards of God's manifold favor (1 Pt 4:10), sowing the seed of God's word (Mk 4:4-20), which, when fallen on good ground, unites men of every status (Col 3:11) in the knowledge of incorruptible existence (1 Pt 2:1-3, 13-17; 5:1), making them recognize that judgment begins here on earth (1 Pt 4:17), and orienting them to Jesus' glorious PAROUSIA (1 Cor 4:1-5; Ti 2:11-14; Mt 25:31-46).

By a mysterious condescension of His mercy, God awaits upon men to "wash their robes in the blood of the Lamb" (Rv 7:14; 22:14) and to assume their life of spiritual responsibility (2 Pt 3:8–10): but in His own time (1 Thes 5:1–3; 1 Tm 6:15; Lk 12:39–40) Christ will come again to bring about the final regeneration (Mt 19:28.). [See REBIRTH (IN THE BIBLE)]. The water of life and the power of the Spirit will flow from the throne of God and of the Lamb (Rv 22:1). The life of heaven will come to earth (Rv 21:22–22:5), to free, renew, and perfect the quality of all creation (Rom 8:19). In it, the children of God, His servants, will reflect Christ's image perfectly, because they will see Him in God as He is (1 Jn 3:2; 1 Cor 13:12), and God will be all in all (1 Cor 15:28).

Bibliography: W. EICHRODT, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. J. A. BAKER (Philadelphia 1961–); Man in the Old Testament, tr. K. and R. GREGOR SMITH (Chicago 1951). G. VON RAD, Old Testament Theology, tr. D. M. G. STALKER (New York 1962–). E. JACOB, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. A. W. HEATHCOTE and P. J. ALLCOCK (New York 1958). A. GELIN, The Religion of Israel, tr. J. R. FOSTER (New York 1959) ch. 5–8. Y. M. J. CONGAR, The Mystery of the Church, tr. A. V. LITTLEDALE (Baltimore 1960). D. MOLLAT, De notione vitae apud sanctum Joannem (Rome 1960). M. L. LAMB, "Christian Humanism and St. John's Theology of Life," Review for Religious 23 (1964) 149–159. J. J. NAVONE, "In Our Image and Likeness," Bible Today 1 (1963) 492–499. F. MUSSNER, ZΩH: Die

Anschauung vom "Leben" im 4. Evangelium. . .(Munich 1952); J. HÖFER and K. RAHNER Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 6:853–856. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1336–44.

[P. M. COYLE]

LIFE, CONCEPT OF (IN THEOLOGY)

The concept of life plays a central part in theology both in describing the living God and in explaining the created participation in the divine life that man enjoys by GRACE in this world and that constitutes his glory in the next. Hence this article speaks (1) of life in general, (2) of the living God, (3) of Christ our life, (4) of the supernatural life of creatures, and (5) of life in heaven.

Life in General. As such, life in general is not the object of theology; still less is the theologian obliged to tie himself to any particular philosophical or scientific explanation of the nature and origin of life. Where human life is concerned, the theologian must insist on the immediate creation of the individual human SOUL (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3896), but this does not bar him from speculation on the manner in which the soul informs the body or on the place to be ascribed to the evolutionary process in the explanation of the genesis of life. All that immediately concerns the theologian is that life ultimately stems from the divine act of creation and that the rational life of this individual human soul comes into existence through a direct creative act of God.

But if he is to speak of the living God and of man's supernatural organism, the theologian must speak analogically, in terms borrowed from the natural and created life that he sees around him. Indeed, the need for this is clear both from what God reveals of Himself and from the very terms used by Christ in making known to man his supernatural vocation and DESTINY. He, the Way, the Truth, and the Life, came that men might have life and have it more abundantly (Jn 14.6; 10.10). To speak of all SUPERNATURAL life in this analogical way, the theologian must start from created life as he observes it. A living substance he knows as one that is able to move itself, to operate immanently; its life is not so much a quality as the existence proper to such a nature.

The Living God. Hence the question at once arises: Can one speak of life in God? The difficulty, at the level of natural reason, is, as St. Thomas Aquinas points out (Summa theologiae 1a, 18.3 ad 1–3), that in God there is no motion and that, in view of God's simplicity, one can in no way speak of any principle of life such as one recognizes among creatures in the intellectual or sensible soul. One must, however, reflect that the fundamental concept of life, purified of its creaturely imperfections, consists not in self-movement considered as a transition from potency to act, nor in an essential composition of body and soul, but in a self-determination in act, an independence of operation that, although found in a limited way in living creatures, is found supereminently and perfectly in PURE ACT alone, the unmoved Mover. One cannot say that God has life; one must simply state that He is Life (just as He is Intellect, Will, Omnipotence, etc.) and that He is the source of all life.

In the Old Testament, God is proclaimed as the living God [see LIFE, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE)]: He is truly living, unlike the inanimate idols worshiped by the pagans; He is the living source of all the life one knows; there is in Him an inexhaustible vitality to save and to deliver, to love and to punish; His life is at the root of His eternal fidelity, whereas idols, lifeless themselves, can do nothing for those who have recourse to them [cf. Psalm 113B(115)]. The wisdom books especially, with their insistence on the power of God's knowledge and will, lead one further into the mystery of the divine life; but only in the New Testament is one presented with the fullness of this mystery in the revelation of the Holy TRINITY, through which one can begin to glimpse the fullness of the interpersonal knowing and loving that is the Divine Life.

Christ Our Life. Because He comes to men from the living Father to win them back from the death of sin, to take men up into the sharing of the Trinitarian life of knowing and loving to which God has gratuitously called them, Christ is "our life" (Col 3.4). This sharing in the divine life is to attain its fullness in the BEATIFIC VISION (through the communication of the LIGHT OF GLORY, lumen gloriae), but it has its start in this world. By faith and baptism a man is linked to the risen Lord Jesus, now "a life-giving spirit" (1 Cor 15.45), and so shares even now in that "eternal life" of which St. John speaks so frequently. It is through the Holy Spirit, the life-giver, that this union of man with Christ is forged and sustained, and it is to the action of the Spirit that one appropriates both the life of the Church and the supernatural life of the individual Christian.

Supernatural Life of Creatures. Because Scripture (above all St. Paul and St. John) speaks so consistently in terms of new life, REBIRTH, regeneration, when describing the state of the justified Christian, these terms have entered into the common vocabulary of the Church, and theologians have sought to elaborate and synthesize the data of revelation by the analogical application of the fundamental concepts proper to natural, created life. Men are "partakers of the divine nature" and adoptive sons of God because, by their INCORPORATION into the MYSTI-

CAL BODY OF CHRIST and through the divine INDWELL-ING, uncreated GRACE, they receive habitual, or sanctifying, created grace, the vital principle that fits men to know and love God as He is in Himself in a way that is proper to no creature but only to God. Given this fundamental analogy (and its correlative, the death of the soul through mortal sin), it is natural to pursue it through every aspect of the Christian's supernatural life. The VIR-TUES (especially the three theological virtues) are seen as the faculties corresponding to the life of grace, immediate principles of supernatural operation by which men are directly conjoined to God's proper knowability and lovability. The Sacraments are the exterior means of the life of grace, either engendering it (Sacraments of the dead) or nourishing it in its various stages (Sacraments of the living). The whole progress of a man toward perfection is, quite simply, his spiritual life.

Life in Heaven. But, as has already been noted, whatever the perfection of supernatural life that may be attained in this world, it is inchoate, imperfect, wholly ordered to the achievement of its consummation in heaven. Only there, in the facial vision of God (strictly supernatural, due to no creature, not even to the angels, though their purely spiritual natural life far exceeds all the created life that man knows), will the supernatural life, the participation in the inner life of the Trinity, which is men's by virtue of their adopted sonship in Christ, reach its fullness. Our life now is hidden with Christ in God (Col 3.3.); "it has not yet appeared what we shall be. We know that, when He appears, we shall be like to him, for we shall see him as he is" (1 Jn 3.2).

Thus life is at the very center and core of the Christian mystery, or rather, a passover from death to life. God reveals to men His innermost Trinitarian life and sends men His Son, the life of the world, that they may receive a gratuitous share in that same life that is proper to Him alone. "God has given us eternal life; and this life is in his Son. He who has the Son has the life. He who has not the Son has not the life" (1 Jn 5.11–12).

See Also: ELEVATION OF MAN; INTELLECTUAL LIFE; MAN, 3; GRACE, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: F. MUSSNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:853–856. H. FRIES, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe (Munich 1962–63) 2:25–30.

[R. L. STEWART]

LIFE, ORIGIN OF

Theories of how life originated on Earth are of two sorts. Biogenetic theories hold that living things always arise through the agency of preexisting organisms. Abiogenetic theories hold that living things arise from inanimate sources. Spontaneous generation, an abiogenetic theory, postulates the origin of lower plants and animals from the slime of Earth and microorganisms from nutrient broth. Biopoesis holds that only the first living form or forms arose in the remote past from inorganic matter by spontaneous generation.

This article will review some of the theories of how life may have arisen on Earth and consider the philosophical problems associated with them. These theories can be categorized under the headings of spontaneous generation, cosmozoic processes, creation, and biopoesis.

Spontaneous Generation. Until the mid-17th century it was generally held that living things could arise spontaneously, as well as by sexual or nonsexual reproduction. In 1668 Francesco Redi provided experimental evidence that maggots thought to be spontaneously generated had actually been produced from the eggs of adult flies. Redi put a snake, eels, a slice of veal, and some fish into two sets of four large, wide-mouthed flasks, covered one set of jars with fine gauze, and left the other set open. Flies entered and left the open jars, and maggots soon appeared in them. No maggots were discovered in the covered jars, although a few fly deposits and maggots appeared on the gauze cover. Redi noticed that the adult flies that finally emerged were like those crawling on the meat before the appearance of the maggots. Redi's experiments discouraged belief in the spontaneous generation not only of maggots, but of macroscopic animals and plants in general.

In the 18th century the controversy over spontaneous generation was reopened when Anton van Leeuwenhoek made a number of important discoveries about microorganisms using a microscope. An Italian abbot, L. Spallanzani, performed hundreds of experiments to show that no animalcules appeared when nutrient broth was heated in phials and sealed off from the air. The English Jesuit John Turberville countered that Spallanzani had heated his liquids too vigorously and had in this way destroyed the "vital force" of the infusions and of the air in the sealed container.

In the 1860s Louis Pasteur ended the debate over whether or not microorganisms developed de novo without parents in nutrient solutions. After heating flasks of nutrient materials to the boiling point, he sealed off the necks of some and drew the necks of others out into an S-shaped curve and left them open to the air. In the cases where he sealed the portals of entry no microorganisms appeared, whereas in the open flasks the microorganisms were trapped in the moisture in the S-shaped necks. As a result of Pasteur's experiments many biologists ruled out spontaneous generation as a theory of the origin of life. Omne vivum e vivo became the accepted dictum: yet this did not preclude the possibility of life's having arisen spontaneously in the remote past.

Cosmozoic Processes. H. von Helmholtz and Lord Kelvin were among the scientists who speculated that viable spores floating through interstellar space may have accidentally seeded life on Earth when conditions were favorable. Adherents of this theory held that life, like matter, is eternal. Therefore, it was not the origin of life that needed explanation, but the passage of the seeds of life from one planet to another. Helmholtz postulated that live germs were brought to Earth in meteorites. In 1908 S. A. Arrhenius published a similar theory, known as panspermia, which included careful calculations of the pressure of the Sun's rays acting on live germs to bring them to Earth.

At the beginning of the 21st century, the cosmozoic theory draws mixed reactions from scientists. Those in favor of it, such as Francis Crick, point to the rapidity with which life arose on Earth. Earth is approximately 4.6 billion years old. The earliest fossils currently known are 3.5 billion years old, and life is thought to have originated around 3.8 billion years ago. Until about 3.9 billion years ago Earth was bombarded by meteorites, which in some cases may have been large enough to sterilize Earth's surface to the depth of several kilometers. The numerous chemical reactions needed for the first living thing to form on Earth seem incompatible with so short a period. Other scientists, however, think that there may have be more time available than is generally assumed. Their claim is that life may not have had to wait until Earth ceased to be bombarbed, but may have have arisen deep in the subsurface of Earth. Also, it is far from certain that life could not have arisen more quickly than is generally supposed. Thus panspermia does not seem to be the only option. Another objection to panspermia is that the extreme cold, the absence of moisture and oxygen, the intense ultraviolet radiation, and the vast interstellar and interplanetary distances to be traveled make the passage of highly organized living things through space virtually impossible. On the other hand, it must be noted that life forms such as bacteria are amazingly resistant to extreme conditions. For example, Deinococcus radiodurans is able to resist 3,000 times the dose of radiation lethal to humans. Bacteria inside a camara left on the Moon were found to still be alive two-and-a-half years later despite the absence of atmosphere on the Moon. Still, proponents of panspermia fail to explain what it is about sites in the universe other than Earth such that one would have reason to believe that life began elsewhere. Panspermia does not solve the problem of the origin of life; it merely locates the origin on another planet or in space, and leaves the question unsolved. At present it is debated whether definite traces of living things have been found in meteorites. Some of the apparent trace fossils in the meteorites examined were ultimately determined to be earthly contaminants (e.g., in the 1969 Murchison meteorite). Examination of meteorite ALH84001 and other Martian meteorites, however, has led some researchers to conclude that the features observed are best explained as biogenic in origin.

Creation. The author of the book of Genesis states that God created the heavens and the earth and that God then said, "Let the earth bring forth vegetation: seedbearing plants and all kinds of fruit trees that bear fruit containing their seed" (Gn 1.11–12). St. AUGUSTINE (De Genesi ad litteram 5.4-5, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 271 v., indexes 4 v. [Paris 1878–90] 34:323–372) interprets Genesis to mean that God created animals and plants only virtually, in the sense that the earth was given the power to bring forth living things in time. Although this idea concurs with modern evolutionary theories, Scripture's purpose is not to pass judgment on scientific theories of the universe. The sacred writer teaches only that a transcendent God called the cosmos into being and set man, made in His own image and likeness, over visible creation. (See CREATION.)

Biopoesis. Theories of biopoesis attempt to explain how the first living things evolved naturally from inorganic matter. There is perhaps no other area of investigation in biology in which the words "conjectural," "speculative," and "as yet lacking experimental support" come up so frequently. Despite great advances in biology we remain ignorant of many aspects of the processes carried on by extant living things, and thus it is not surprising that we experience difficulties in explaining the origin of life processes in organisms that may be difficulty is our lack of certitude regarding the conditions of early Earth at the time that life originated.

One of the earliest theories of the origin of life was that of A. I. Oparin. In 1924 Oparin theorized that the complex properties of living things arose in the natural process of the evolution of matter. In his view, large amounts of complex organic compounds in the oceans of primitive Earth reacted to form yet more complex molecules until one or more evolved that could be designated as alive. Oparin later showed that by mixing solutions of different proteins and other substances of high molecular weight he could produce coacervate droplets that readily adsorb organic substances from the surrounding medium. He proposed that the first primitive cells may have been much like these coacervate droplets. J. B. S. Haldane speculated (1926) that ultraviolet light acting on a mixture of water, carbon dioxide, and ammonia could produce a wide variety of organic compounds in the primitive oceans. If the first living things were formed in such a medium, the nutrient material there would sustain them.

In the 1950s, experimental work to establish the possibility of a prebiological formation of "building blocks" for living things originated in the laboratories of Melvin Calvin of the University of California and of Harold Urey at the University of Chicago. Calvin and his associates treated carbon dioxide and water in a cyclotron and produced formaldehyde and formic acid. S. L. Miller, a student of Urey, then exposed a mixture of water vapor, methane, ammonia, and hydrogen—gases believed to have been present on primitive Earth—to a silent electric discharge for a few days. Analysis of the results by the method of paper chromatography revealed a mixture of amino acids, several of which are essential components of proteins.

By heating concentrated solutions of hydrogen cyanide in aqueous ammonia for several days, J. Oró was able to produce adenine, an essential building block of nucleic acids. C. Ponnamperuma exposed to ultraviolet light a dilute solution of hydrogen cyanide and produced guanine as well as adenine, the only purines found in RNA (ribonucleic acid) and DNA (deoxyribonucleic acid).

One problem with these experiments that produce amino acids abiotically is that they require reducing conditions in order to work. Many scientists no longer think that the atmosphere of early Earth at the time that life is thought to have appeared was a reducing atmosphere. Banded iron formations have been found as far back as the Archean, and it is thought that they could not have formed under reducing conditions. There are other lines of evidence as well pointing to a neutral rather than a reducing atmosphere. Some scientists remain unconvinced by this evidence and hold to a Miller-type scenario. Others turn to outer space as a source of life's building blocks. Ninety different amino acids have been discovered in meteorites, eight of which belong to the set of 20 that are found in organisms on Earth. Meteorites including microscopic ones called micrometeorites may have deposited a substantial amount of organic material on early Earth's surface. Comets and cosmic dust clouds that early Earth passed through may also have been other significant sources of organic materials.

Among those who think that the building blocks of life had a terrestrial source, some suggest that they were formed at other sites on Earth other than its surface, namely, in thermal vents in the ocean floor that provide a reducing environment. Yet other scientists suggest a hot environment even deeper in Earth's crust. Still others propose a cold environment, because high temperature tends to break down protein, nucleic acids, and many of their building blocks. In short, theories abound and there is no consensus.

Even if there were a plausible explanation for how the building blocks of life were generated, there still would remain the question of how they became assembled into the more complex units, the proteins and nucleic acids that are found in even the simplest life forms. A "chicken and egg problem" arises here: in cells amino acids are assembled into proteins on ribosomes following instructions on mRNA that was copied from DNA. Thus to get proteins it seems that there has to be DNA. Nevertheless, in order for the DNA to be transcribed into RNA one needs proteins (proteins are also need for DNA replication). A number of approaches have been taken to get around this problem.

One is to say that originally proteins were assembled by some other means. Sidney Fox had some success in forming proteinlike polypeptides under anhydrous conditions in vitro. With carefully controlled conditions of temperature and hydration he produced proteinlike polymers. The majority of origin of life scientists, however, remain unimpressed, and some find Fox's proteinoids to be more like gunk than proteins. Freeman Dyson is also of the view that proteins arose first, followed by cells that carried on metabolism and reproduced without any genetic material, but simply by breaking in two. Nucleic acids arose independently, and eventually came together with these cells, eventually directing their replication. This gets around the chicken and egg problem, but the questions remain as to how proteins and nucleic acids arose without each other, and then how the two got working together in so highly an orchestrated manner. There are other current theories of abiotic protein formation, such as the thioester hypothesis advanced by Christian De Duve, but even their own authors regards them as speculative.

Another group of scientists holds that proteins did not come first, but rather RNA did. This theory gained popularity when it was discovered that certain forms of RNA can self-replicate as well as catalyze other reactions. This seemed to offer a way out of the protein-nucleic acid dilemma. Recently, however, much of the initial enthusiasm for this theory has been lost, largely because of the failure to discover a way that RNA could be synthesized under plausible abiotic conditions, and because of RNA's instability.

A further question remains as to how these larger units (proteins, nucleic acids) are assembled into cells. Oparin formed coascervate droplets by shaking a mixture of large protein and a polysaccharide. These droplets divide into an interior and exterior phase, and the conditions of interior phase were unlike those in the surrounding medium. Although some scientists find this an attractive model of a precursor of the cell, it is far from being a consensus view. Fox proposed as a better alternative "microspheres" that spontaneously form upon adding water to abiotically formed protenoids. According to Fox microspheres manifested lifelike characteristics. Many scientists, however, remained unconvinced that there are sufficient likenesses between microspheres and cells such that microspheres could have been the precursor of cells.

There are many other theories of how life got started that have not been mentioned, e.g., theories such as those of J. D. Bernal and A.G. Cairns-Smith suggesting that clay initially catalysed the formation of complex biological molecules. This brief review should make it clear that scientists are nowhere close to an abiotic explanation of life's origin. This is only to be expected, however, given the relative newness and the special difficulties of this area of investigation.

Philosophical Problems

Philosophical problems associated with the origin of life are closely related to the definition one adopts for life itself. The lower forms of life have manifest affinities with the nonliving as well as with the higher forms of the living, and depending on which affinities one emphasizes, less or greater difficulty is encountered in explaining the production of life from inorganic matter. What follows is a discussion of the possibility of biopoesis in the context of Thomistic teaching on life and its need for an adequate cause, and the possible role of chance in the biopoesic process.

Possibility. St. THOMAS AQUINAS admitted the possibility of biopoesis. He did not reject St. Augustine's teaching that in the six days of creation Earth received from God the power to produce plants and trees (Summa theologiae 1a, 69.2). Thomas Aquinas acknowledged that the potentiality for such living forms could be present in primary matter; what is problematic is identifying an efficient cause of sufficient power to educe such from matter (see MATTER AND FORM). Earth does not seem to be an adequate efficient cause of plants, since plants, like all living things, are superior to the nonliving elements in that they are able to move themselves.

Thomas Aquinas appears to offer two different solutions to this problem. One answer is given when he addresses the question of whether the heavenly bodies are animate. In an objection it is argued that since a cause must be superior to its effect, the generation of animals from decaying materials cannot be adequately accounted for by inanimate causes, but requires an animate cause. Given that decay is caused by the motions of the celestial bodies, especially the Sun, it follows that the celestial bodies must be animate. Thomas Aquinas responds in part by proposing an alternate explanation, namely, that spontaneous generation is caused by spiritual beings who use the celestial bodies as their instruments (De spiritualibus creaturis 6 ad 12; Contra gentiles 3.23).

Other passages of Thomas Aquinas indicate that he does not categorically reject the notion that natural material agents alone may be sufficient causes of the generation of plants and lower animals. (Following Aristotle, he did not believe that higher organisms could be generated without semen.) He did see living things as differing from nonliving things in performing activities that go beyond those of the nonliving, either simply as to the manner in which they act, or as to what they accomplish as well (De Anima 13). Plants stay in existence through their own activities, whereas inanimate things do not. Animals are not only able to do things to maintain their existence, they are also capable of knowing things through their senses. In these ways plants and animals exceed nonliving natural things in perfection. On the other hand, the souls of plants and animals (see SOUL) are not forms separable from matter; the activities that plants and animals perform all involve physical interaction. E.g., a life activity proper to higher organisms such as hearing requires both having organs (ears, brain), and the presence of physical entities (sound waves) that interact with the organ. And so Thomas Aquinas in commenting on the verse from Genesis which speak of Earth producing reptiles says that "it seems that the sensitive souls of reptiles and other animals are from the action of the corporeal elements. . . . Souls of this sort do not exceed the principles of natural things. And this is manifest from considering the operation of them." (De potentia 3.11, s.c. and corp.) This latter line of thought coincides with some versions of contemporary anthropic reasoning that hold that active principles sufficient for the development of life were built into the universe by an intelligent agent from its very inception.

On either view, it is reasonable to think that Thomas Aquinas would maintain that human intelligence accompanied by our ability to manipulate natural forces may allow us someday to produce life from chemicals by artificial means.

Role of Chance. Can CHANCE account for the origin of life? Charles Darwin wrote in a letter to Asa Gray that the problem of the origin of living things is too profound for the human intellect. Nevertheless he concluded: "I am inclined to look at everything as resulting from designed laws, with the details, whether good or bad, left to the working out of what we may call chance."

There is much debate about whether the origin of life is fortuitous or necessary, and several confusions. A position at one extreme, emphasizing the contingency of natural things, regards life as a cosmic accident. At the other extreme are those who regard the finality of living things as sufficient evidence that they are the product of design, and who go on from there to deny that there is any element of chance in life's origin. Both extremes regard chance and design as mutually exclusive. This is not, however, always the case. Thomas Aquinas gives the example of a head of the household who wants the maid to meet the butler, and with this in mind sends them to the same place, each with a different task. Since the two intend something other than meeting each other, from their point of view they meet by chance. But from the householder's point of view, the meeting was not chance, but prearranged.

Another common confusion lies in opposing fortuitous occurrences with lawlike occurrences, as Oparin does when he says that "The origin of life is not a fortunate,' extremely improbable event, but quite a regular phenomenon subject to a deep scientific analysis." Those who favor this view of the workings of nature hold that, where conditions were favorable, life had to originate. Now chance occurrences are not mere coincidences, such as the Moon undergoing eclipse as one steps into the shower. Chance involves causality in keeping with the laws of nature. When a person fails to notice a small step, and moves his foot upwards, of necessity he stubs his toe. We call that bad luck not because it is not in keeping with the laws of nature, but because it was not his intention to stub his toe. Thus that something be fortuitous does not mean that it is not due to causes knowable through scientific analysis. Moreover, whether life has originated once or a few times or frequently in the universe, adequate efficient causality is in all cases necessary.

Another common misconception is the notion that if a thing arises but once, it must be an unintended fluke. From this some of those who think that life on Earth was intended go on to conclude that life must be abundant throughout the universe. If the first premise was correct, however, then many of the world's great art masterpieces would be accidents, since they are unique.

Thomas Aquinas held that spontaneously produced plants and animals, unlike those that were produced from seeds or semen, were produced by chance (In Metaphys. no. 1403). Their production required the causality of the Sun, and the fortuitous coming together of matter not determinately ordered to the production of that life form, in the way that the material in the gametes is. That the Sun gives rise to different spontaneously generated species is due to differences in the matter the Sun shines on (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 60.1). Thus that the Sun any given day causes the production of an individual of this particular species is by chance. In the greater scheme of things, however, the Sun is a universal cause meant to bring into act all the forms that are in the potency of the matter, and from this point of view that it produces individual of various species is not chance, but intended (In Metaphys. no. 1403). Thus in a similar way Thomas Aquinas might have held that the exact time life originated in the universe was a matter of chance as to its immediate causes, but that it arise at some given time was not.

Chance is not seen by Thomas Aquinas as opposed to Divine Providence, but indeed as intended by the Creator in order to have a richer universe than one in which all things were necessary. Chance events, however, are, from God's point of view, part of the order of divine providence; in this sense "nothing in the world happens by chance," as Augustine declares (Summa theologiae 1a, 103.7 ad 2). Thus Thomas Aquinas would also assert a divine determinism overarching the very real contingencies of nature according to which chance events occur in the production of life and, especially, of human life.

Bibliography: C. DE DUVE, Vital Dust (New York 1995). F. DYSON, Origins of Life (Cambridge 1999). J. HEIDMANN, Extraterrestrial Intelligence (Cambridge 1997). P. D. WARD and D. BROWNLEE, Rare Earth: Why Complex Life Is Uncommon in the Universe (New York 2000).

[A. M. HOFSTETTER/M. I. GEORGE]

LIFE AND WORK

Like the Roman Catholic social movement of the late 19th century, the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT for "life and work," involving a united Christian witness on social issues among Protestants and Orthodox, had its antecedents in the increasing concern for the economic and social problems of an expanding industrial age. After World War I, these hitherto scattered Christian social movements were gathered into an international Christian effort for human welfare and world peace. This movement developed into the Universal Christian Council on Life and Work, largely through the work of Nathan SÖDERBLOM.

The Universal Christian Council on Life and Work was active from 1920 to 1938, when the provisional committee of the World Council of Churches in process of formation came into being. This period of social history included the difficult and fruitless effort of interwar reconstruction, the encounter with revolutionary social movements and ideologies accompanying the economic depression and mass industrial unemployment of the '20s and '30s, the German church struggle, and the deepening international crisis prior to World War II. The ideas that were developed in ecumenical study and discussion provided insight and vitality for a new type of Christian witness and concern that continues to influence Christian thought and action.

The development of Life and Work is best seen through its two great conferences, at Stockholm (1925), and at Oxford (1937). The former was the first contemporary ecumenical conference on social questions. This meeting clarified the need, the possibilities, and the difficulties of an international ecumenical attitude on social issues. It revealed also a lack of theological understanding and agreement on the Christian view of man and society. The Oxford Conference of 1937 went far beyond the 1925 meeting in theological acumen and depth of social analysis. This is reflected in its pronouncements, especially in its Report on Church, Community, and State in Relation to the Economic Order. This statement emphasized that the church must exercise its transcendence of all social systems in order to guard its moral and spiritual integrity, and to render a true critique, especially of those Western social systems that it may be inclined to accept or defend uncritically.

This viewpoint became later the basis for a WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) definition of the responsible society as a guide for Christian thinking in relation to all social systems. The more subtle statement of Christian social thinking could come about only through an adroit use of the best theological and lay minds in the churches. The preparatory studies directed by J. H. Oldham are classics of ecumenical social thinking.

Life and Work was almost exclusively Western in outlook, a weakness that characterized ecumenical social thinking until 1955, when the WCC, using the Life and Work method, launched a new study program to draw the churches and the social problems of the new nations of Africa, Asia, and Latin America into the ecumenical debate. In WCC these concerns continued to be addressed by the Department on Church and Society and the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs.

Bibliography: Universal Christian Conference of Life and Work, The Stockholm Conference, 1925, ed. G. K. A. BELL (London 1926). World Conference on Church, Community and State, The Churches Survey Their Task: The Report of the Conference at Oxford, July 1937, ed. J. H. OLDHAM (London 1937). R. ROUSE and S. C. NEILL, eds., A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1948 (London 1954). E. DUFF, The Social Thought of the World Council of Churches (New York 1956). World Council of Churches, Statements on Social Questions (Geneva 1955).

[P. ABRECHT]

LIFE PHILOSOPHIES

Historians of contemporary philosophy (I. M. Bocheński, J. Hirschberger) use the term "life philosophies" to designate the teaching of a group of German and French philosophers and historians including: W. Dilthey, G. Simmel, R. Eucken, E. Troeltsch, K. Klages, H. Bergson, and E. Le Roy. The German writers do not constitute a school. Most of them were NEO-KANTIANS at the start, but they were trained in a wide variety of disciplines: history, sociology, mathematics, psychology, and, in the case of Oswald Spengler, in journalism.

The common bond among these thinkers is the notion that the abstract use of the intellect gives rise to technical and formal conceptual structures that are artificial, and that these structures are, too often, assigned greater importance than the deeper source of life in man that generates them. If we are to understand man, they say, we must turn away from conceptualization and seek to coincide with the fresh, unspoiled upsurge of life before it becomes atrophied in a rigid network of scientific formulas, eternal truths, or metaphysical absolutes. Life is infinitely richer than the conceptual instruments that we invent to interpret it.

Dilthey. Wilhelm DILTHEY (1833–1911) held that the study of the history of culture (morality, art, science, poetry, religion) provides the best approach to the life principle. A reflective study of the past reveals life on the move in its concrete manifestations. Through history man becomes conscious of himself, for he is both subject and object of the study. Such study reveals that there are no absolute scientific laws governing man's progress through time. Each event or decision is unique; each epoch has its own character. The role of the historian or the philosopher of history is to examine the momentary structure of life as it is manifested at a given point of time. This moment can never be repeated, because every event or world view emerges out of a particular context with indefinite ramifications in time and space. Postivists and metaphysicians alike want to "explain" history in terms of scientific or eternalistic ideologies. But this is to interpret life by an offprint of life, by something that is derivative. Life is self-justifying; it does not need "explanation" but "understanding," that is, an immediate insight into what is happening. To acquire an understanding of this kind we must grasp the total situation, using all our human power of sympathy, not just the abstractive faculty that always tries to reduce the particular situation to a universal law or category.

Dilthey's sense of the uniqueness of events did not prevent him from recognizing that life, as manifested in history, is expressed in various moods: the rationalistic, which gives rise to positivist naturalism; the emotional, which tends towards objective idealism; the voluntaristic, which finds expression in idealistic freedom. But these attitudes with their structures well up from below, from life itself; they are not constructs to be imposed from above upon the ongoing flux of history.

Dilthey's insistence on context was one of his great contributions to the study of HISTORY; but his historicism, which includes a rejection of rational explanations, led him into a relativistic position, making any account of the past a maze of particular events with little connection between them.

Spengler, Toynbee, and Simmel. Oswald Spengler (1880–1936) shared Dilthey's skepticism regarding the permanence of values and human institutions. In his pessimistic but brilliantly written The Decline of the West (Monaco 1918–22, 2 v.), he distinguishes eight different types of civilization produced by the life principle. Each culture cycle flourishes and then loses its vitality. The technological civilization of the West, and with its democracy and Christian humanism, is already on the way to destruction. The tide of life that lifted it to preeminence has begun to ebb, leaving only a tragic sense of helplessness. History is governed, not by institutions and concepts, but by deeper organic energies that have little regard for the niceties of justice.

Spengler's morose biologism was, no doubt, colored by the disillusionment of an author who wrote after the German defeat in World War I and by a cynical attitude towards conventional morality. But the English historian Arnold Toynbee (b. 1889) in his A Study of History (London 1934–54, 10 v.), while covering some of the same ground as Spengler, worked in a far more scholarly manner. In his analysis of the dynamics of history, while dealing with culture cycles, he is less deterministic and leaves ample room for man's voluntary control over his own future.

Georg Simmel (1858-1918), like Dilthey, was impressed by the uniqueness of each historical situation. Every past event is compounded by an unlimited number of infinitesimal forces that we can never know or catalogue in their entirety. The Battle of Marathon, for example, is at best only a tag used to designate a certain unity of vital forces. All such events are fictions, wrenched out of the complex flux of life. If we cannot hope to recover the total situation, even by the most exhaustive analysis of the contributing factors, we can at least resolve events into a set of relations between individuals and societies and in this way discover the "form" of the situation. History, then, is not merely a headlong torrent of evanescent influences; it can be grasped partially in terms of these dynamic structures that express the deeper life principle. In spite of his willingness to concede that there is some immanent logic in history, Simmel's view remains a kind of nominalistic RELATIVISM.

Troeltsch, Eucken, and Driesch. Ernst TROELTSCH (1865–1923), on the other hand, found in his sociological study of history that the life-force receives its highest expression in religion and in the values that it releases. This objective world of religious values corresponds to a deep a priori within us that finds its fulfillment in the divine.

Rudolf Eucken (1846–1926) also recognized an intelligible world of religious values. These values, implicit in the life principle, we project before us as teleological ends for action; and they constitute the one world view that can offer some hope of unifying human striving.

Hans Driesch (1867–1941) was a noted psychologist whose vitalism was influential in turning many German philosophers away from POSITIVISM and physical determinism. He attacked SCIENTISM and its attempt to explain life in terms of chemical and mechanical complexity. There is in every living organism an ENTELECHY, or vital principle, that controls its growth and accounts for its unity. If it is not yet spiritual, it cannot be reduced to the sum of the material parts that it rules.

Klages' Philosophy. Many regard Ludwig KLAGES (1872-1956) as a new NIETZSCHE. His principal work, Spirit, the Adversary of the Soul (Leipzig 1929-32, 3 v.), suggests by its very title his cult of the irrational. But he passes over Nietzsche's value theory and stresses the orgiastic, Dionysian outlook of The Birth of Tragedy (Leipzig 1872). For Klages, soul is opposed to mind or spirit (Geist). The latter is an invention of the Greeks, canonized by Christianity with its postulate of a higher world of spirit. Life is a purely biological force that surges up in the organism. Man must remain passive to its promptings, obedient to its rhythms. Spiritual values curb the innocence and purity of this naked life principle; they are like barbed wire fences that hold vital energies in prison, Man is most true to life when carried along by blood, instinct, sensibility, feeling, and the surge of life. He becomes weak and pale, self-conscious and duty-bound when he lets the conventions of society curtail the unconscious drives of the biological instinct.

Therefore, it is not logic, reason, or calculation that will rule the world, but passion. The constructions of reason are alien to life; technology, economics, and speculation divorce man from his biological roots. We must live by the compulsive image, which engenders a sense of power. The "moral" man is a city divided; he is constantly trying to subject his vital and instinctive self to a world of spiritual values that he represents as an absolute order. But children and savages have no such inhibitions because they do not reason but feel. Theirs is the authentic life because it is experienced passively as something that "happens" to them, not as something they try to control or subdue.

There are similarities between Klages' views and the Nazi glorification of blood and power: the conquering barbarian lives according to nature, emancipated from artificial moral conventions. He is the avant-garde of an expansive life-force that must overthrow the superstructure of Christianity and democracy in order to release man from the spiritual framework that crushes joy and the zest for life.

French Thinkers. In France the life philosophies assumed an entirely different character (see BERGSON, HENRI; LE ROY, ÉDOUARD; BLONDEL, MAURICE). Far from being a political danger or hostile to religion, they were almost uniformly rooted in a profound sense of the mystery of life, which never excluded but was completed by transcendence. It is true that they too made a sharp distinction between life and the abstract use of the intellect in its discursive operation. But this distinction has behind it a long tradition, beginning with Plato and Aristotle, up through St. AUGUSTINE with his ratio superior and ratio inferior, and on to the intellectus and ratio of St. THOMAS AQUI-NAS. The French remained more solidly in the intellectual current of the past, recognizing the value of conceptualization with its constructions, but warning against the kind of dogmatic scientism that tended to overlook connatural knowledge, or lived rationality, in order to substitute for it notional symbols that owed their validity and usefulness to a more direct and immediate insight into life.

The French life philosophies have nothing of the Faustian demonism in their make-up. They did not constitute an attack on rationality, but on RATIONALISM. During the modernist crisis, some Catholics feared that the French philosophers were moving in the direction of the German twilight of intellect with a corresponding emphasis on emotion and feeling (see MODERNISM). But antiintellectualism and IRRATIONALISM are not congenial to the Gallic temperament. It was EXISTENTIALISM that made its appearance at the very end of the revolt against systematic philosophy, and it bears but slight resemblance to the earlier life philosophies. On the contrary, while existentialism rejects ready-made conceptual systems and all forms of essentialism, it calls on man to structure his own experience and to develop a system of values, whether Christian or agnostic, that engages the will in an almost heroic effort of creativity. Such activism is a far cry from the German emphasis on passivity to impulse such as we find in Klages.

See Also: HISTORY, PHILOSOPHY OF.

Bibliography: For brief summaries of life philosophies, see I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, Contemporary European Philosophy tr. D.

NICHOLL and K. ASCHENBRENNER (2d ed. rev. Berkeley 1956) 121–128. J. HIRSCHBERGER, The History of Philosophy, tr. A. N. FUERST, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1958–59) 2:565–575. Among the English translations of the works of the Germans, one may consult: W. DILTHEY, Meaning in History, ed. H. P. RICKMAN (London 1961); Philosophy of Existence, tr. W. KLUBACK and M. WEINBAUM (New York 1957). H. A. HODGES, The Philosophy of Wilhelm Dilthey (London 1952). R. C. EUCKEN, Life's Basis and Life's Ideal, tr. A. G. WIDGERY (2d ed. London 1912); Main Currents of Modern Thought, tr. M. BOOTH (London 1912). E. TROELTSCH, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, tr. O. WYON, 2 v. (New York 1931).

[J. M. SOMERVILLE]

LIGHT, LITURGICAL USE OF

The use of light in the liturgy is derived from four main sources: Jewish custom, pagan and civil ceremonial, practical necessity or convenience, and symbolism, both natural and Christian. This article treats biblical usage, pagan and civil ceremonial, Christian significance, and liturgical use.

Biblical Usage. The Mosaic Law prescribed that a seven-branched lampstand, made of the finest gold, be erected in the temple (Ex 25.31–40). It was also customary for Jews to keep a light burning perpetually in the sanctuary (Ex 27.20–21; Lv 24.2–4). The significance originally attached to this perpetual light is obscure, but the later Talmudists interpreted its burning as an act of reverence for the Torah kept in the Ark of the Covenant.

The custom of burning lights before the tombs of the Prophets was not unknown in Judaism; it was a practice common to all Mediterranean religions to light torches at funerals. A great many lights were used in some of the Jewish festivals as well, notably the Feast of Tabernacles and the Feast of the DEDICATION OF THE TEMPLE, called by Hanukkah or Feast of Lights by modern Jews. The chaburah usually called for a ceremony in which a lamp was brought in and blessed with a formula such as: "Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, eternal King who createst the lamps of fire." This ceremony marked the beginning and the end of the Sabbath and was connected with several Jewish feasts.

Pagan and Civil Ceremonial. It was a popular pagan custom to light lamps and candles both in the sanctuaries and about the doorways of homes on religious festivals. Lights were burned before idols and statues of emperors. Although torches were used to kindle the funeral pyre, they had additional significance. Offering lights to the dead was regarded as a religious act; it was a means of honoring the dead who were thought to be living in the tomb. State functionaries were also honored with lights; for example, Roman consuls had the privilege of being preceded by torches or a thick candle. This was especially the right of the Roman emperors, particularly in the court ceremonial, and the custom was continued into the Middle Ages, both in the imperial court at Byzantium and in the palaces of Western kings.

Christian Significance of Light. Apart from any religious association, light conveys to the human mind a sense of joy, optimism, goodness, purity, beauty, festiveness, dignity, and life, while darkness signifies ignorance, error, sadness, gloom, desolation, death, and evil in general. This is why lights are used so profusely by all peoples in their celebrations, whether civil or religious. Moreover, all religions, using natural symbolism, associate light with goodness and the divinity, darkness with wickedness and the evil spirits. Christianity has special reason to associate light with God, for it would be difficult to find a theme more strongly emphasized by Scripture than God as light.

In the Old Testament, light has already become part of the figurative language used to describe God. His interventions in human history are surrounded by light, fire, and lightning (Ex 3.2; 19.16; Dt 33.2; Is 30.27; 66.15; Hb 3.11; Za 14.7). Yahweh's glory shines with a brilliant light (Bar 5.9; Ez 10.4); He is robed in light (Ps 104.1–2). Thus, light is a symbol of His presence (Ex 13.21; 2 Chr 4.7; 13.11). Indeed His nature is compared to light: "Thou shalt no more have the sun for thy light by day, neither shall the brightness of the moon enlighten thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee for an everlasting light" (Is 60.19). When Yahweh shows His favor to the Israelites, He is said to let His countenance shine upon them (Nm 6.25; Ps 4.7; 89.16). As light is the symbol of devine protection (Jb 22.28; Ps 27.1; Mi 7.8), it is one of the blessings of Messianic salvation (Is 9.1; 58.8). The Servant of Yahweh himself is called a light (Is 42.6; 49.6; cf. Dn 12.3).

It is only natural for this symbolic language to be continued in the New Testament. God is called "the Father of lights (Jas 1.17); He "dwells in light inaccessible" (1 Tm 6.16). In fact, St. John says: "God is light and in Him there is no darkness" (1 Jn 1.5). Thus the Word, who before His Incarnation had engaged in a victorious struggle with darkness (Jn 1.5), is presented as the light-bringer (Lk 1.79; 2.32; Acts 26.23; 2 Cor 4.6), "the light of the world" (Jn 8.12; 9.5; 12.46), "the true light that enlightens every man who comes into the world" (Jn 1.9); His life is the light of men (Jn 1.4). This divine prerogative finally shines through the glorified humanity of Christ (Mt 17.2-5; 28.3; Acts 9.3; 22.6-11; 26.13). Those who believe in Him become the children of light opposed to the children of darkness (Mt 5.14–16; Lk 16.8; Jn 3.19; 5.35; 12.36; Acts 13.47; 2 Cor 3.18; Eph 5.8; 1 Thes 5.5; 1 Jn 1.6-7). Indeed Christ is the light of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev 21.23-24).

While in theology the LOGOS as light of the Father is explained by way of intellectual generation or procession (see PROCESSIONS, TRINITARIAN), the Nicene Creed professes faith in Christ as "light from light."

Liturgical Use. The importance of this light theme in the Christian life is shown in the numerous references to light in the Divine Office, particularly in the hymns of the various hours, which compares the permanence of the Christ-light to the rise and decline of the natural light of day. Vespers, named after the evening star, Vesper, developed out of a combination of the prayer service at the twelveth hour and the Lucernarium, the blessing of the evening lamp.

Christmas. The whole of the Christmas liturgy is centered upon the coming of the divine light into the world, of the light shining in the darkness. The Word, born in light from the womb of the Father, is born again in the obscurity of this world, in the darkness of the fleshly womb of Mary; His human birth is accompanied by the splendor of the heavenly bodies manifested to the sheperds (Lk 2.9) and the Magi (Mt 2.2, 9). There are deeper theological implications than usual behind the profuse display of lights commonly seen in Christmas decorations.

Candlemas. The Feast of Candlemas (Feb. 2) brings a fitting climax to the light theme of the Christmas cycle with the blessing and procession of lighted candles. The original reason behind this feast appears to be the meeting in the temple between the Holy Family and Simeon, who proclaimed the Infant to be "a light of revelation to the gentiles and a glory to the people of Israel" (Lk 2.32). Although a procession at Jerusalem is already mentioned in the fourth—century diary of EGERIA [26; H. Pétré, Journal de voyage 21 (Paris 1948) 208], there is no indication that lights were used in it. A procession with lighted candles is certainly attested to in Palestine by Cyril of Scythopolis (d. 565) in his life of St. Theodosius [E. Schwartz, Kyrillos von Skytopolis (Leipzig 1939) 236, 24].

Easter. The Easter season, on the other hand, portrays the slow conquest of the darkness of sin by "the light of the world." During Lent He is seen to struggle with the powers of darkness that seem to triumph on Good Friday, but Christ rises from the darkness of the tomb with greater radiance and splendor than ever: "His countenance was like lightning and His raiment like snow" (Mt 28.3). This glorious victory of light over darkness is brought out dramatically in the ceremonies of the Easter Vigil: the striking of the new fire in utter darkness; the lighting of the paschal candle and its gradual dispelling of the darkness of the church building as its flame is extended to the smaller candles of the participants, accompanied by shouts of "Lumen Christi"; the magnificent strains of the Exsultet in praise of the paschal candle, symbol of Christ, the new "pillar of fire" (Ex 13.21–22) who leads redeemed Israel out of the shadow of death.

The fact that the life of the Christian is a life in the Christ-light is brought out most pointedly by the celebration within the Easter Vigil of Baptism, the paschal sacrament par excellence. In Patristic times, catechumens were called illuminandi (those to be enlightened) and the newly baptized illuminati (the enlightened). It is in this context that we must place the use of light in every baptismal ceremony. The newly baptized is given a candle with the exhortation: "Receive this burning light." After the initiation of the neophyte, the faithful participating in the Easter Vigil renew their baptismal vows, holding their candles, which have been lighted from the flame of the paschal candle. Because the religious life has traditionally been considered a king of second Baptism, it has become common in ceremonies of reception of the habit and profession for the candidate to receive a lighted candle.

Symbols of Honor and Solemnity. The ancient civil custom of honoring state officials with torches and candles was taken over by the Church [T. Klauser, Der Ursprung der bischöflichen Insignien und Ehrenrechte (Krefeld 1953) 18]. Candles and torches were carried before popes, and later bishops; by the seventh century, seven candles were carried before such dignitaries and then placed on the pavement about the altar (Ordo Rom. 1.46, 52; 2.7; 4.7–8; M. Andrieu, Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge [Louvain 1931-61] 2:82, 84, 158). Much later candles were placed on the altar; Innocent III (d. 1216) states that two candles were used for papal Masses (De sacro altaris mysterio 2.21; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 217:811). This number mounted to seven by 1254 [E. Bishop, Liturgica Historica (Oxford 1918) 310-311]. In the High Middle Ages, the quantity of candles on the altar emphasizes the solemnity of the occasion: seven for solemn pontifical Mass, six for high Mass, and two for low Mass.

It is in this context that we must place the carrying of lighted candles for the proclamation of the Gospel at solemn Mass. The Gospel Book, containing the Word of God, came to be considered as a symbol of Christ Himself and hence was honored with lights of joy (Jerome, Contra Vigilantium 7; Patrologia Latina 23:345).

Ceremonies Connected with the Dead. At first the Church inveighed against burning lights before the tombs of the dead (Council of Elvira from 301–303, c.34; J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Florence-Venice 1757–98] 2:11); in fact Lactantius spoke out against any use of lights in worship because of their pagan implications (Divinae institutiones 6.2; Patrologia Latina 6:637–639). However, when the pagan and superstitious connotations were no longer a danger, the Church adopted lamps and torches as a popular means of showing respect for martyrs (Jerome, Contra Vigilantium 7; Patrologia Latina 23:345) and other deceased Christians [see inscriptions in T. Klauser, Die Cathedra im Totenkult der heidnischen und christlichen Antike (Münster 1927) 127]. Lights were also carried in the funeral cortege [A. Rush, Death and Burial in Christian Antiquity (Washington 1941) 226–227]. It is from this early Christian custom that we derive the practice of burning candles around the coffin during the burial rites in church.

It is obvious that this Christian use of light for the dead has a much deeper significance than in pagan practice. The body of the deceased Christian has been a temple of the Holy Trinity, a tabernacle of the Light that is God; it awaits the day of the resurrection when in its glorified state it will share in "the splendor of the saints." The use of lights recalls the sacredness of the body, the immortality of the soul, and the Beatific Vision to which both are destined and for which the Church prays: "Let perpetual light shine upon him." In this same spirit of respect are lights burned before images of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the saints.

Other Uses. Not every use of lights in worship bears a special significance. Without doubt torches, lamps, and candles were often used to provide the light necessary for functions celebrated at night or in dark churches. Apart from certain solemnizing extras, the ordinary lights in a church serve a purely utilitarian purpose. Nonetheless in some circumstances lights, once needed for functional reasons, have in time taken on symbolic meanings. A typical example of this sort of development is the bishop's bugia, a candle held or placed near the book the bishop reads from in pontifical services. The lack of adequate lighting, together with the difficulty of reading the contracted spelling of ancient manuscripts, once made this candle a practical necessity. When the original utilitarian reason no longer existed, the bugia evolved into a mark of honor for the bishop.

Bibliography: G. DIX, The Shape of the Liturgy (2d ed. London 1945). F. J. DÖLGER, Sol Salutis: Gebet und Gesang im christlichen Altertum (2d ed. Münster 1925); "Lumen Christi," Antike und Christentum 5 (1936) 1–43; Die Sonne der Gerechtigkeit und der Schwarze (Münster 1918). A. G. MARTIMORT, L'Église en prière (Tournai 1961).

[B. I. MULLAHY/EDS.]

LIGHT, METAPHYSICS OF

The notion of light has greatly influenced centuries of philosophical speculation and led to metaphysical, cosmological, and noetic theories. In the mythologies of early cultures and religions, light was conceived as an important condition not only of life but also of sight and knowledge. Although usually connected with the divine, in many religions light was not so much a constituent as an attribute of the deity—a life-giving factor, a cause of happiness, wealth, health, knowledge, and beauty. Dualistic religions held that light (in man the pneuma or spirit or soul), after separation from the deity, was chained to matter; through purification, however, it could return to its origin.

Greek Thought. Philosophers rationalized the notion of light. In Greek thought, Heraclitus's theory of fire as the first principle of the world initiated an ontology of light that was further developed by the Stoics and the Pythagoreans into a dualism of light and darkness. PARMENIDES assigned this theory to the realm of opinion. Light, he held, is as little related to darkness as being is related to nonbeing.

The nucleus of Plato's teaching is the GOOD; this enlightens the intelligible world just as the sun illumines the sensible world. Thus, for him, the perfect Idea of the Good becomes at once the principle of being and knowing.

ARISTOTLE held that the cosmos consists of five elements: earth, water, air, fire, and ether. He considered ether the finest of all elements, filling the highest spheres of the cosmos and constituting the celestial bodies. Ether, in his view, is not mixed with heterogeneous particles; its purity accounts for the circular (that is, perfect) movement of the heavens in contrast with the less perfect up and down motion of the other elements. During the Middle Ages it was called the quinta essentia, light, the clarity of the heavenly regions.

Neoplatonism. Neoplatonic systems are rich in speculations concerning light (see NEOPLATONISM). In Philo's teaching, Plato's Idea of the Good is not spoken of figuratively; it is the spiritual light. However, it was PLOTINUS who first developed a metaphysics of light, considering light no longer as a physical substance. From the One emanates immaterial light, radiating outward, growing dimmer and dimmer until it shades off into darkness (a PRIVATION of light), which is matter. From the One also proceeds Nous (thought, mind), which knows all things simultaneously in an eternal now. From Nous emanates the WORLD SOUL; from the latter emanate human souls and finally material beings. They do not lack light completely, for they are illumined by form, which is considered the exteriorization of the intelligible. Here light starts its ecstatic return to its origin and proves that the sensible and the intelligible are bound together. Such unity allows for mystical and prophetical experience and knowledge.

Medieval Development. Augustine combined the teaching of Neoplatonism and Plato's Idea of the Good with revealed truths. For instance, he applied Genesis 1.3 ("Let light be made") to the creation of the mundus intelligibilis, the world of the angels. He accepted the Platonic distinction between sensible and spiritual light. Like Plato, Augustine cautioned men not to trust the sensible realm. Christ is called "Light" in the sense that He enlightens every man, although man is free to turn toward or away from the Light. On such ontological premises Augustine built his theory of ILLUMINATION, which had considerable impact on medieval thought.

Pseudo-Dionysius. The Hierarchia caelestia of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS became the handbook of Christian symbolism. From God, the Father of Lights, comes all radiation. The physical light that attracts bodily beings symbolizes the divine IMMANENCE and TRANSCENDENCE, for it penetrates all things while remaining pure itself. Light is also the forming power within man, leading him upward and uniting him to the Father of Lights.

Arabs and Jews. In later centuries an amalgamation of Christian, Jewish, and Arabian thought led to a fuller development of the metaphysics of light. Some Arabian and Jewish philosophers saw light as a substance or a power. The literature of the Talmud and Midrash speaks of light as the garment of God: God took His garment and spread it like a mantle, thus creating the celestial world. ISAAC ISRAELI taught that in the hierarchy of being, the lower beings proceed from the shadow of the higher, for example, from the shadow of Intelligence originates the anima rationalis, from its shadow, the anima bestialis, and so on. Through a good moral life, man participates in the light of the Intelligence. Similar doctrines were held by the Arabs, mainly by ALFARABI, AVICENNA, and ALGAZEL, who combined Aristotelian, Neoplatonic, and Oriental thought.

Grosseteste. Influenced by thinkers of his era, ROB-ERT GROSSETESTE formed an elaborate metaphysics of light. God is the Eternal Light and Exemplary Form of all things. He first created forma prima and materia prima. Forma prima is a point of light that by its very nature diffuses itself and becomes the corporeal form of matter. In this process materia prima is expanded into the three spatial dimensions of the finite universe. As corporeal form, light functions as a principle of distinction and multiplicity and continuity in nature. "All things are one by the perfection of one light." The rarefaction of matter through light is considered the highest actualization of matter; it is exemplified by the firmament, "the first body," which has nothing "in its composition but first matter and first form." Through this expansion of matter by light, nine celestial immutable spheres are built. The innermost of these concentric spheres is the sphere of the moon, which produces through its own light the four infralunar spheres consisting of fire, air, water, and earth. The infralunar regions are subject to change and corruption. Their beings are determined, specified, and perfected by light; and here light becomes also the principle of motion and color. Light gives these bodies form, actuality, movement, and color.

As a consequence of this speculation, optics came to be greatly developed. In its service stood geometry, the study of light diffused from a central point into straight lines, reflected and refracted by angles, and providing a mathematical structure for the universe. Grosseteste's theory had a decisive influence upon the natural philosophers at Oxford (ADAM MARSH and ROGER BACON) and at Paris (ALEXANDER OF HALES, BONAVENTURE, and others). Grosseteste's clear distinction between corporeal and noncorporeal light no longer prevailed in the De Intelligentiis of ADAM PULCHRAE MULIERIS, who returned to a light-monism: "Unumquodque quantum habet de luce, tantum retinet esse divini." Unlike these thinkers, St. THOMAS AQUINAS did not accept light as substantial form but understood it as a quality and applied it by analogy to the intelligible realm.

Renaissance and Modern Thought. During the Renaissance a revival of the metaphysics of light occurred in the theories of such philosophers as M. FICINO, G. BRUNO, and J. Böhme. G. PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, who combined Neoplatonism, medieval Christian theology, and CABALA, spoke of the supernatural light (faith), the natural light, and the light of glory. Man, a microcosm, contains in himself the cosmic sources of light and possesses also the light of the agent INTELLECT.

Francesco Patrici da Cherzo (1529–97) returned to a Neoplatonic doctrine of light in which God is the original, uncreated Light. From Him light emanates as a metaphysical principle of being, causing multiplicity and life as well as the unity of beings. Light is a kind of an intermediary between the purely spiritual and the purely material. Besides light, there are other factors in nature, namely, warmth, space, and fluidity.

Little philosophical work has been done on later theories of light. The scientific current leads to physicomathematical theories, as in Newton's Opticks (1704), rather than to metaphysical analysis. Newton postulated an ethereal medium mainly to account for the propagation of light, which he could not explain in purely mechanical terms. Light was conceived and spoken of merely in the sensible realm by G. BERKELEY and the British empiricists, whereas F. H. JACOBI applied the term to a supersensible reality open only to intuition. However, contemporary work in the philosophy of science, particularly that associated with interpretations of quantum theory, is more and more directed to investigating the reality that lies behind the physicist's equations.

See Also: ILLUMINISM; PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy, 7 v. (Westminster, Md. 1946–63). J. HIRSCHBERGER, The History of Philosophy, tr. A. N. FUERST, 2 v. (Milwaukee, Wis. 1958–59). A. A. MAURER, Medieval Philosophy (New York 1962). A. C. CROMBIE, Robert Grosseteste and the Origins of Experimental Science (Oxford 1953). R. GROSSETESTE, On Light, tr. C. C. RIEDL (Milwaukee 1942). C. BAEUMKER, Witelo, ein Philosoph und Naturforscher des XIII. Jahrhunderts (Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 3.2; 1908). J. RATZINGER, "Licht und Erleuchtung: Erwägungen zur Stellung und Entwicklung des Themas in der abendländischen Geistesgeschichte," Studium generale 13 (1960) 368–378.

[C. E. SCHÜTZINGER]

LIGHT OF GLORY

The term used in theology to describe the help given the intellect whereby it is enabled to see God face to face. The necessity of this help is a dogma of the Catholic faith, defined in the Council of Vienne against the BEGUINES and Beghards, who held that "the soul does not need the light of glory to elevate it to see God and to enjoy God in blessedness" (Enchiridion symbolorum, 895). This definition is based on Scripture passages such as Rv 21.23, which depicts God as a light illuminating the blessed in the heavenly Jerusalem, which has the glory of God (v. 11) "and has no need of the sun or the moon to shine upon it, for the glory of God lights it up" (v. 23).

Fathers. The teaching of tradition on the light of glory is found principally in the commentaries of the Fathers on Ps 35(36).10: "and in your light we see light." Although there is no clear-cut and definite teaching that can be said to be the mind of the Fathers, two affirmations recur in their writings. On the one hand, God Himself is represented as the light that illumines the elect. In addition, the Greek Fathers frequently add that the Holy Spirit will make us capable of seeing God in the Word. Even though this points in the direction of the light of glory being identified with God, a tendency that some scholastics espoused, it is not difficult to find indications in the Fathers, even in texts describing this uncreated light, that this illumination produces a true elevation of the intellectual powers of the elect. It would be pointless, however, to seek passages in the Fathers where they speak of this elevation as due to a principle intrinsically perfecting the intellect; they were content to enunciate the dogma that the blessed must be elevated to see God, without theologizing upon the means whereby this is accomplished.

Theological Speculation. Elaborating on the nature of the light of glory, theological speculation has specified it as a SUPERNATURAL habit permanently perfecting the intellect of the blessed and elevating it to enable them to see God. It is considered a HABIT because it must be permanently possessed by the elect, and a dynamic habit because it enables intellectual creatures to exercise their highest faculty perfectly with respect to its most perfect object.

The necessity of the light of glory is proved from two sources. First, the natural faculty must be elevated to the supernatural operation of the BEATIFIC vision, which totally surpasses the ability of the unaided intellect. Second, the beatific vision presumes an immediate union between the created intellect and the uncreated light, the principle and term of this vision. This union, far from rendering the light of glory superfluous, cannot be explained without it, for two things that are not one cannot be associated with one another unless at least one of them undergoes a change. Since the object seen cannot change, the created intellect must be strengthened for the vision, which strengthening is the light of glory.

Thus the light of glory has a threefold function. It elevates the created intellect to the order of the beatific vision and makes it physically capable of attaining the divine essence; it disposes the intellect to the immediate union with the divine essence necessary for the vision; it concurs actively with the intellect in producing the act of vision itself.

In the Orthodox Churches there is a difference in teaching on the light of glory that goes back to the time of the Palamites (see HESYCHASM), who distinguished between the divine essence and an uncreated light, proceeding from it and distinct from it, although not inseparable from it. God is absolutely unknowable and incommunicable in the divine essence, but is knowable and communicable in His operations or energies, chief of which is this uncreated light. Vladimir Lossky says: "This uncreated, eternal, divine, and deifying light is grace, for the word grace belongs to the divine energies in as far as they are given to us and operate the work of our deification. . . . This illumination or divine and deifying grace is not the essence but the energy of God'' (95). Thus the light of glory for them, far from being a created habit infused into the intellect, is something in God that is seen in the beatific vision, a concept that seems to contradict the divine simplicity and the dogma that the divine essence itself is the object of the vision.

See Also: HEAVEN (THEOLOGY OF); PALAMAS, GREGORY.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 7.2:2370–77. R. SCHNACKENBURG and K. FORSTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:583–591. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The One God, tr. B. ROSE (St. Louis 1943) 364–372. v. LOSSKY, "La Théologie de la lumière chez st. Grégoire de Thessalonique," Dieu vivant 1 (1945).

[R. J. BASTIAN]

LIGHTFOOT, JOSEPH BARBER

Anglican scripturist, patrologist, and bishop, known especially for his commentaries on the Pauline Epistles; b. Liverpool, England, April 13, 1828; d. Bournemouth, Hampshire, England, Dec. 21, 1889. After his studies at King Edward's School, Birmingham, he entered Trinity College, Cambridge (1847), where he was a private pupil of B. F. WESTCOTT and worked as editor with F. J. A. Hort on the Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology (1854-59). He was appointed tutor of Trinity College in 1857 and was ordained the next year. He then became in turn Hulsean professor (1861), chaplain to the prince consort and honorary chaplain to the queen, Whitehall preacher (1866), canon of St. Paul's (1871), and Lady Margaret professor of divinity (1875). Consecrated bishop of Durham in 1879, he administered this office until his death a decade later. His commentaries on the Epistles to the Galatians (1865), Philippians (1868), and Colossians (1875), by reason of their historical insight, mark a new era in New Testament exegesis in England. His works on the Apostolic Fathers are thorough, painstaking studies much esteemed by patristic scholars. For a bibliography of Lightfoot's principal works, see the Quarterly Review 176 (1893): 73.

Bibliography: F. J. A. HORT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 11:1111–19. Quarterly Review 176 (1893): 73–105. A. C. BENSON, The Leaves of the Tree (London 1911) 187–211. G. R. EDEN and F. C. MACDONALD, eds., Lightfoot of Durham (Cambridge 1932).

[B. VEROSTKO]

LIGUGÉ, ABBEY OF

In the commune of Ligugé (Vienne), France, three miles south of Poitiers. The present Abbaye Saint-Martin de Ligugé was founded in 360 by St. Martin of Tours, who became bishop of Tours in 370. Archeological excavations since 1953 have unearthed the Gallo-Roman villa, dating from the second or third century, that was the saint's first dwelling; a fourth-century exedra and chapel that testify to his coming to Ligugé; the sixth-century church visited by St. Gregory of Tours; and the structures built by Ursinus, abbot at the end of the seventh century. After being ruined during the Arab invasion (732), the monastery revived at the beginning of the eleventh century with the aid of Aumode, countess of Poitou, as a priory of the Abbey of Maillezais (Vendée). The monks ceded the place to chaplains long before it became the property of the Jesuits from Poitiers. Four monks from SOLESMES restored Benedictine life to Ligugé (1853). Under Dom Bourigaud, the second abbot (1876-1906), Ligugé revived the monasteries of Sainte-Marie of Paris, FONTE-NELLE (Saint-Wandrille) in Normandy, and SILOS in Spain. Expelled by the law of associations (1901), the community settled at Chevetogne, Belgium, until 1923, when it returned. Since then it has prospered under its abbots, Dom Gaugain, Dom Basset, and Dom Le Maître, and has cooperated with the ecumenical movement. The productions of its workshop in enamels are highly esteemed.

Bibliography: P. MONSABERT, Le Monastère de Ligugé (Ligugé 1929). J. COQUET, L'Abbaye de St. Martin de Ligugé (Ligugé 1948); Revue Mabillon 44 (1954) 45–94; 45 (1955) 75–147; 48 (1958) 245–248. H. ROCHAIS, ibid. 43 (1953) 138–146, bibliog. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topo-bibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1613. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List (Collegeville, Minn.) 2:224–225.

[H. ROCHAIS]

LIGUTTI, LUIGI G.

Pastor of rural ministry and ecumenist; b. near Udine, Italy, March 21, 1895; d. Rome, Italy, Dec. 28, 1984. He attended primary schools in his native village of Romans and Udine before emigrating to the United States in 1912 and enrolling in St. Ambrose College in Davenport, IA. He completed theological studies at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, and was ordained a priest of the Diocese of Des Moines Sept. 22, 1917. He pursued graduate studies at The Catholic University of America, Columbia University, and the University of Chicago.

After eight years of pastoral ministry he was named pastor of Assumption parish, Granger, IA, where he refined his philosophy of Catholic rural sociology, expressed in the classic work co-authored with John Rawe, SJ, I Rural Roads to Security. He gained national prominence by founding the Granger Homesteads, the first national program of housing for lower income families.

In 1937 Ligutti became executive secretary of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference (NCRLC).

Three years later he resigned his parish, moved the head-quarters of the Conference to Des Moines and became its first full-time executive secretary. Over the next 20 years he wrote and traveled extensively throughout the United States, speaking before innumerable audiences on the Church and rural life. In his apostolate he joined forces with leaders in the liturgical movement, the National Conference of Catholic Charities, and Catholic Relief Services, making American Catholics more aware of the importance of rural life and its problems. He associated with his counterparts in other Christian churches in promoting these same goals, and thus became one of the earliest ecumenists in the United States. He remained executive director of the NCRLC until 1958 when he subsequently became its director of international affairs.

On July 26, 1948, Ligutti was appointed Vatican Observer to the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the first Vatican appointment to any office of the United Nations. What he did for the cause of rural life in the United States he now undertook for the entire globe. In time he became the best known American priest throughout the world. In this office he helped draft the section on agriculture in Pope John XXIII's encyclical I Pacem in terris.

Ligutti served as a consultant to the prepatory commission and subsequently to the conciliar commission on the laity of Vatican Council II. The council's statements on rural life, tithing, and migration are chiefly the results of his efforts.

Following the Council he established I Agrimissio, an organization to assist missionaries in fostering rural values among underprivileged people throughout the world. The closing years of his life were spent in retirement at his home, Villa Stillman, in Rome. Following his death his body was returned to the United States and buried in Assumption parish cemetery in Granger.

Bibliography: V. A. YZERMANS, The People I Love: A Biography of Luigi G. Ligutti (Collegeville, MN 1976).

[V. A. YZERMANS]

LILIENFELD, ABBEY OF

Cistercian abbey in the Diocese of St. Pölten, Lower Austria; founded (1202) by Duke Leopold VI, who is buried there, and settled (1206) from HEILIGENKREUZ. It flourished in the 14th century, declined during the Reformation, and was revived by German-born abbots and monks educated at the Germanicum in Rome (Ignaz Kraft 1622–38 and Cornelius Strauch 1638–50); but there were tensions between German and Austrian monks. Abbot Matthäus Kolweiss (1650–95), an Austrian, founded St. Joseph Archconfraternity (1653) and regained ZIRC for the Cistercians. Lilienfeld, which successfully resisted the Turks (1683), was suppressed briefly (1789–90) and badly damaged by fire (1810) and war (1945). The large early Gothic church (1230), with baroque furnishings (1730–45), and the 13th-century cloister are of interest. The library, whose main hall was built c. 1700, has 34,000 volumes, 119 incunabula, and 226 MSS. The monk Christianus (d. before 1332) was a liturgical poet; Abbot Ulrich (1345–51) compiled the Concordantia caritatis; Chrysostomus HANTHALER (1717–54) compiled the Fasti Campililienses; Abbot Ladislaus Pyrker (1812–18), later patriarch of Venice, was a poet. The 100 monks of 1330 declined to 43 in 1964. The abbey serves 19 parishes.

Exterior of the church of the Abbey of Lilienfeld, Austria.

Bibliography: N. MUSSBACHER, "Das Stift Lilienfeld," Heimatkunde Lilienfeld, v. 1, 2 (Vienna-Lilienfeld 1960–63). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1614. F. LOIDL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1054.

[N. MUSSBACHER]

LIMA, MANUEL DE OLIVEIRA

Brazilian diplomat and historian; b. Recife, Dec. 25, 1867; d. Washington, D.C., March 24, 1928. Oliveira Lima came from a rich family and received all his education in Lisbon, where he graduated in 1888 in diplomacy, law, and philosophy. In 1890 he was named second secretary to the Brazilian legation in Lisbon and in 1892 was transferred to Berlin. Back in Brazil in 1896, he worked as a journalist for a short time. From 1896 to 1900 he was first secretary of the Brazilian Embassy in the United States; in 1900 he was in London and was then named minister to Japan. In 1903 he was appointed minister to Peru, but did not serve in that office, being almost immediately appointed chief of the Brazilian commission to carry on boundary negotiations with Venezuela. Later he served as minister to Sweden and Belgium. Oliveira Lima became, in fact, the intellectual ambassador of Brazil, in Europe, Japan, the United States, and Spanish America. He became famous as a public speaker and a conversationalist, giving conferences and courses in every country he visited. He was the first Brazilian to be professor at the Sorbonne in Paris. A dozen of the most important universities of the United States invited him to lecture or teach. A lover of books and a serious historian, he searched for rare and precious volumes everywhere and built up one of the most valuable collections of books and documents on Brazilian and Portuguese history. He did much to make his country known in foreign lands. He tried to strengthen cultural links between the Americas and Europe and Japan. He was an admirer of German culture and of monarchy and a pacifist who received a great shock with the outbreak of World War I. Professor at The Catholic University of America in his last years, he donated his library to that university and endowed a chair for Portuguese and Brazilian language and culture. He was an advocate of Pan Americanism and hoped that this would help to unite the Americas and to make The Catholic University in Washington, D.C., an international center of learning.

Among his best scholarly historical works are D. João VI no Brasil (Rio de Janeiro 1919), O Imperio Brasileiro (São Paulo 1928), and Historia da Civilização (São Paulo 1921).

Bibliography: M. DE OLIVEIRA LIMA, Memórias (Rio de Janeiro 1937).

[T. BEAL]

LIMA TEXT

A statement of the Faith and Order Commission of the World Council of Churches (WCC) on "Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry" (BEM) unanimously approved at the Commission plenary meeting at Lima, Peru, on Jan. 12, 1982. It purports to be a statement of convergence rather than full consensus, and is submitted to the churches for their reception and response.

The roots of the Lima Text go back to discussions in the Faith and Order Movement since the First World Conference at Lausanne in 1927, when efforts were made to find common ground on questions concerning sacraments and ministry. The Faith and Order Commission meeting in Louvain in 1971 reviewed earlier consensus statements on the Eucharist and on Baptism dating from 1967 and 1968 and a new draft report on the Ordained Ministry. At the Accra meeting of the Faith and Order Commission (1974) the reports on Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry were revised and combined in a single brochure. The Nairobi Assembly of the WCC (1975) asked the member churches to submit their reactions to the three reports. Taking account of these reactions, a small committee of experts headed by Max Thurian composed the draft for Lima, which considered and voted on many amendments to produce the final text.

The very dense text cannot be adequately summarized. The language adheres closely to that of previous Faith and Order documents and, in general, that of the Bible. Where there are clear disagreements among the churches, an effort is made to give a fair statement of each position. The disagreements are explained in a running commentary which is part of the official text.

The chapter on Baptism has 23 paragraphs, with commentary. Baptism is described as a participation in Christ's death and Resurrection, as an event of conversion and cleansing, as a bestowal of the Holy Spirit, as incorporation into the Body of Christ, and as a sign of the Kingdom. Infant and adult ("believers") baptism are presented as "equivalent alternatives." The unusual practice of baptizing without water is noted as requiring further study.

The chapter on Eucharist contains 33 paragraphs, with commentary. The Eucharist (or Lord's Supper) is depicted as thanksgiving to the Father, as a memorial of Christ, as invocation of the Holy Spirit, as communion of the faithful, as an anticipation of the eschatological meal. It is described as "the sacrament of the unique sacrifice of Christ," a memorial wherein the Church intercedes in union with the great High Priest. Transubstantiation is mentioned in the commentary, with the remark that many churches do not link Christ's presence so definitely to the consecrated elements. Intercommunion is encouraged as a manifestation of "the catholicity of the Eucharist" (Comm. 19).

The chapter on Ministry (55 paragraphs with commentary) begins with a treatment of the ministry of the whole people of God and states that a special or ordained ministry is constitutive of the life and witness of the Church. The ordained are described as heralds and ambassadors, as leaders and teachers, and as pastors who direct the community. Disagreements about the ordination of women are noted in the commentary.

The threefold pattern of bishop, presbyter, and deacon is recognized as ancient and as holding promise for Church unity. Bishops are portrayed as charged with preserving continuity and unity in the Church and with pastoral oversight of a given area. The apostolicity of the whole Church is held to be served and symbolized by the continuous succession of bishops. Churches that have maintained this succession are, however, urged to recognize the "apostolic content" of the ordained ministry in other churches.

Responses. The Lima text is preceded by a preface (not technically part of the Text) in which all churches are asked to respond officially to four questions: To what extent can you recognize in this text the faith of the Church throughout the ages? What consequences can you draw for relations with other churches? What guidance can you find in the text for your worship, life, and witness? How should Faith and Order make use of this text for its future research? The Vancouver Assembly of the WCC (1983) reaffirmed the request that the churches respond to these questions.

The official response of the the Catholic Church to BEM issued by SPUC on July 21, 1987, was basically positive, characterizing the Lima texts as "perhaps the most significant result of the [Faith and Order] movement so far." "The study of BEM," it asserted, "has been for many Catholics an enriching experience." Noting that "BEM demonstrates clearly that serious progress is being made in the quest for visible unity," the response encouraged Faith and Order "to continue its valuable work of seeking unity in faith as a basis for visible unity."

While observing that BEM converges with Catholic doctrine and practice on a broad range of issues, the response noted that there are occasional passages which suggest options in theology and practice not consistent with Catholic faith. Some of these may here be indicated under the headings of Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry.

On Baptism, the SPUC found the Lima text to be "grounded in the apostolic faith received and professed by the Catholic Church." The trinitarian, sacramental, and missionary dimensions of Baptism, according to the response, are well stated. But the text was faulted for its failure to treat a number of points that Catholics consider important; e.g., the necessity of Baptism for salvation, original sin, the Baptismal character, and the completion of initiation through Confirmation (as a distinct sacrament) and the Eucharist. The SPUC response also considered that the value of infant Baptism and the importance of nurture in a Christian community should have been given more emphasis.

On the Eucharist the SPUC response praised, among other things, the strong trinitarian and christological dimensions of the text, its use of patristic and liturgical sources, and its rich ecclesiological and eschatological context. The Secretariat, however, found unfortunate ambiguities in the treatment of the Eucharist as sacrifice and in the handling of Christ's real presence through the conversion of the elements, which Catholics regard as a matter of faith. The report also objected that the problem of eucharistic sharing among churches was discussed without sufficient attention to the ecclesial significance of Holy Communion. Lima's treatment of reservation of the consecrated species was also found deficient.

On the Ministry text, SPUC was likewise positive.

Well aware of the complexity of the ecumenical dialogue on ministry, we are grateful for the work achieved on it by the Commission and we appreciate especially the fact that its presentation goes in the direction of the major lines of what we recognize 'as the faith of the Church throughout the ages'.

On the ordination of women, SPUC took the position that this is excluded by apostolic tradition, which the Church has no authority to change. The response expressed regret that BEM is unclear as to whether the threefold ministry of bishop, presbyter, and deacon is a constitutive feature of the Church or a historically contingent disposition. It would have welcomed more emphasis on the collegiality of the bishops and on the papacy as the "focus of unity." While acknowledging that ordination is in effect treated as a sacrament (without the word being used), SPUC took the position that "ordained ministry requires sacramental ordination by a bishop standing in the apostolic succession"—a point not affirmed by BEM. For this reason SPUC considered the proposals of BEM on the mutual recognition of ministries premature.

In proposing future work for Faith and Order, SPUC called attention to three areas needing further treatment: first, sacrament and sacramentality, including (it would seem) the Church as a real and effective "icon of the presence of God and His Kingdom in the world"; second, apostolic tradition, which should be clearly distinguished from the particular "traditions" that develop in the separate churches; and third, authority in the Church, including the power of definite persons and bodies to discern and make binding decisions.

On Aug. 31, 1987, Günther Gassmann, the director of Faith and Order, welcomed this response by SPUC as the first official response ever given by the Catholic Church to an ecumenical document. He interpreted this response as an unambiguous commitment of the Catholic Church to the one ecumenical movement. He also applauded the support given in the response to multilateral dialogue as complementary to the bilateral dialogues that the Catholic Church has vigorously sponsored since Vatican Council II.

Bibliography: Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry, Faith and Order Paper 111 (Geneva 1982). J. GROS, ed., "Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry and Its Reception in the U.S. Churches," Journal Ecumenical Studies 21, no. 1 (Boston 1984). SECRETARIAT FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN UNITY, "Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry: An Appraisal," Origins 17, no. 23 (Nov. 19, 1987) 401–16. M. THURIAN, ed., Ecumenical Perspectives on Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry, Faith and Order Paper 116 (Geneva 1983); Churches Respond to BEM. Official Responses to the "Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry" Text, 6 v. (Geneva 1986–88). M. A. FAHEY, ed., Catholic Perspectives on Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry. A Study Commissioned by the Catholic Theological Society of America (Lanham, Md. 1986). G. LIMOURIS and N. VAPORIS, Orthodox Perspectives on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, Faith and Order

The Descent into Limbo, fresco by Fra Angelico, cell 3 in the convent of San Marco, Florence. (@Massimo Listri/CORBIS)

Paper 128 (Brookline, Mass. 1985); also printed in The Greek Orthodox Theological Review 30, no. 2 (1985).

[A. DULLES]

LIMBO

A word derived from the Latin limbus, literally meaning the "hem or border" as of a garment. The word is not employed by the Fathers, nor does it appear in Scripture. Since the time of Thomas Aquinas theologians have used the term to designate the state and place either of those souls who did not merit hell and its eternal punishments but could not enter heaven before the Redemption (the limbo of the fathers') or of those souls who are eternally excluded from the beatific vision because of original sin alone (the children's Limbo).

The Limbo of the Fathers. Inhabiting the "limbo of the fathers" (our ancestors in the faith) are those who led a righteous life before Jesus' earthly existence and death. They could not enter heaven even though righteous, however, because of Adam and Eve's sin. This is the limbo (the Hebrew Sheol, the Greek Hades) referred to in the Apostles' Creed—the "hell" into which Christ descended after his crucifixion. Jesus' experience of a true human death included his entering this realm of the dead, but his descent there redeemed the just and brought them to salvation. The "limbo of the fathers" explained how the righteous who died before Christ's death could attain salvation, while maintaining that their salvation depended upon and was effected by Christ's death. The same difficulty is addressed today more generally in the question of the possibility of salvation for the adult non-Christian.

The Limbo of Children. In the patristic era there was apparently little concern with the problem of infants dying without baptism. St. Augustine thought that unbaptized infants went to hell, although he conceded that, due to their lack of personal responsibility and guilt for original sin, the pains of hell were in some way diminished for them. Subsequent theologians distinguished between a pain affecting one's senses (the pain of sense), and the pain caused by the absence of the perfect joy of the Beatific Vision (the pain of loss). The scholastics of the 12th century departed from Augustine's viewpoint. St. Thomas Aquinas freed the doctrine of the idea that unbaptized infants suffer from any pain of sense; indeed, he held that, though deprived of the Beatific Vision, they enjoy a natural bliss. The problem was not handled in any explicit manner by the Council of Trent, though there was some preliminary discussion about the punishment of original sin in the next life.

From Trent to Pistoia. During this period theologians were absorbed in attempting to determine exactly what punishment is allotted to unbaptized infants in the next life. The vast majority believed them immune from the pain of sense and transferred to a special place, or state, called Limbo. Although this was without doubt the common teaching of the period, the question was considered open to discussion. Others believed these infants were consigned to the fire of hell, obviously denying the existence of Limbo. The defenders of the existence of Limbo found their strongest arguments in the teaching of Aquinas and his concept of original sin as a sin of nature and not of the person. As a result they viewed the punishment of original sin and that of personal sin as entirely different. Only personal sin involves a conversion to some forbidden created good that deserves the pain of sense. Traces of this doctrine are found in the teaching of Innocent III in 1201 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 780) as well as in that of the Second Council of Lyons (ibid. 858) and the Council of Florence (ibid 1306).

Pistoia and the Bull Auctorem Fidei. The Jansenists in Italy based their idea on the teaching of St. Augustine. They said that Limbo as taught by the scholastics is a fable invented by Pelagius and that the teaching that infants dying without Baptism are condemned to the fire of hell is revealed doctrine. They boldly proclaimed it at the Synod of PISTOIA in 1786, and implied that the defenders of the existence of Limbo are heretics. The reply of Rome is found in Pius VI's bull Auctorem Fidei (1794). This is the last declaration of the Church in regard to this problem and the only official document containing the word Limbo. From the history of this document it is certain that the Church merely wished to defend the common teaching from slander. As such it is not a defense of the existence of Limbo. The question of Limbo's existence openly disputed by Catholic theologians at the time of the bull—was not touched upon directly in any way by Pius VI. The open denial of Limbo by the Jansenists was tolerated and merely their manner of denial censured. Auctorem Fidei, in fact, dealt the deathblow to the teaching of St. Augustine. For all purposes, no one defended any longer the opinion that infants who die without baptism are condemned to the fire of hell.

Recent Church Teaching. While limbo was mentioned in a 1951 address given by Pius XII to Catholic midwives, of far greater significance is its absence in recent Church documents in the very context where mention of it might be expected. Examples include the 1979 "On Certain Questions Concerning Eschatology" and the 1980 "Instruction on Infant Baptism," both published by the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) quotes from and affirms the 1980 "Instruction": "As regards children who have died without Baptism, the Church can only entrust them to the mercy of God, as she does in her funeral rites for them. Indeed, the great mercy of God who desires that all men should be saved, and Jesus' tenderness toward children which caused him to say: 'Let the children come to me, do not hinder them' (Mk 10:14), allow us to hope that there is a way of salvation for children who have died without Baptism. All the more urgent is the Church's call not to prevent little children coming to Christ through the gift of holy Baptism" (1261).

Most theologians today regard the "limbo of children" as a once-popular, but now inert, theological opinion that attempted to resolve the theological tension between the Church's teaching on the necessity of baptism for salvation and the acknowledgment that infants and young children are innocent of personal sin. While some theologians have devised sophisticated theories attempting to reconcile the two (for example, that an infant would receive supernatural knowledge at the moment of death and thus be able to choose for or against God), today most would support the theological and pastoral approach suggested by the CCC. The possibility of an eternal state of natural bliss, separate from the Beatific Vision, is not treated directly in official Church teaching, while among theologians it is addressed more generally in the discussions of the relationship between nature and grace.

Bibliography: G. J. DYER, Limbo, Unsettled Question (New York 1964). P. GUMPEL, "Unbaptized Infants: May They Be Saved?" Downside Review 72 (1954) 342–458. P. J. HILL, The Existence of a Children's Limbo According to Post-Tridentine Theologians (Shelby, Ohio 1961). V. WILKIN, From Limbo to Heaven (New York 1961). L. G. WALSH, The Sacraments of Initiation (London 1988), 104–109. K. STASIAK, "Infant Baptism Reclaimed: Forgotten Truths about Infant Baptism," Living Light (1995): 36–46. C. BEITING, "The Idea of Limbo in Thomas Aquinas," The Thomist 62 (1998): 217–244.

[P. J. HILL/K. STASIAK/EDS.]

LIMITATION

The term limitation is used in philosophy and theology to explain why some being or some property of a being is only limited or finite, as in the case of creatures, and not unlimited or infinite, as in the case of God. A principal problem in scholastic philosophy is to explain, in terms of causes or principles, the limitation of one creature compared to another (e.g., man to angels), and more especially of all creatures compared to God.

Thomists usually assign a twofold reason for the qualitative limitation of a given being. First, every limited being requires some external agent or efficient cause to determine its capacity or limit, and to communicate the corresponding degree of perfection. Second, the result or effect in the being of the determining action of its cause is some internal principle of limitation within the being itself. This inner principle of limitation fixes the being's inner capacity for receiving so much and no more of a given attribute or perfection. To borrow an analogy from the quantitative order, if a person wishes to fill a pitcher with water, he must pour so much water; likewise the pitcher (the recipient) must itself have a certain shape or capacity to be able to receive the water. This inner cause or principle of limitation St. THOMAS AQUINAS called a POTENCY for receiving a perfection or ACT (see POTENCY AND ACT). Both of these terms he borrowed from ARIS-TOTLE, the original proponent of potency and act, though Aristotle himself applied his theory only to the problem of CHANGE and not to that of limitation, St. Thomas argues that no positive qualitative perfection, such as knowledge, goodness, or power, can be identically its own limiting principle, i.e., the reason why it is possessed by a particular being to a limited degree and not in its fullness. Therefore, wherever there is limitation there must be an internal duality or real metaphysical distinction of elements within the limited being: one principle to take care of the positive perfection that is received or participated; the other to limit the capacity of the subject that receives or participates. This philosophical doctrine, referred to as the limitation of act by potency, may be summarized thus: No act (or perfection) can be found in a limited state unless it be received into a really distinct limiting potency.

Other scholastic philosophers, such as John DUNS SCOTUS and F. SUÁREZ, agree with St. Thomas on the need for an external agent to determine the limitation of a being, but deny that any internal principle of potency within the limited being need be really distinct from the perfection it limits.

See Also: FINITE BEING; PARTICIPATION; PERFECTION, ONTOLOGICAL.

Bibliography: W. N. CLARKE, "Limitation of Act by Potency," The New Scholasticism 26 (1952) 167–194. G. GIANNINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 3:54–58.

[W. N. CLARKE]

LINACRE, THOMAS

English physician and priest, founder of the Royal College of Physicians in London; b. Canterbury, c. 1460; d. London, Oct. 20, 1524. He was educated at the Priory School in Canterbury under William of Selling (later prior), through whose influence he enrolled in All Souls College, Oxford. He studied also in Florence, Padua, and Rome. In 1488 Henry VII sent Prior Selling to Rome as ambassador to the pope, and Linacre accompanied him. In Florence he met Lorenzo de'Medici, who invited him to share in the instructions given by Angelo Poliziano and Demetrius Chalcondylos to the two young princes Piero and Giovanni de' Medici. Giovanni later became Pope LEO X. Linacre studied medicine in Padua, where he received his M.D. After years of practice on the Continent, he returned to England, where he became royal physician to HENRY VIII and regular medical attendant to many of the highest nobility of the country. He used most of his fortune to found the Royal College of Physicians. The charter for the college was granted by Henry VIII on Sept. 23, 1518, upon the petition of Linacre, several other physicians, and especially Cardinal Wolsey. This charter gave the college the sole power to give medical licenses. His important contribution to medical science was his translation of GALEN's work from Greek into Latin. Linacre was highly esteemed by his contemporaries. He began to receive ecclesiastical preferments, even before he was ordained in 1520. After this he gave up his medical career in order to devote himself to priestly work. Johnson says that he seems to have had no enemies.

Bibliography: J. F. PAYNE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 11:1145–1150. J. N. JOHNSON, The Life of T. Linacre, ed. R. GRAVES (London 1835).

[M. A. STRATMAN]

LINCOLN, ANCIENT SEE OF

The largest and most populous diocese in medieval England, extending from the Humber to the Thames. An old Roman town, it may well have had a bishop in the 4th century; St. PAULINUS OF YORK built a stone church and consecrated Honorius Archbishop of Canterbury there in 627. It became a see in 1072 when Remigius, Bishop of Dorchester-on- Thames, moved his headquarters to Lincoln in obedience to the policy of WILLIAM I and LANFRANC, of erecting sees in fortified towns. In 1086 Remigius began the cathedral, superbly situated on a steep hill; it was added to by Alexander the Magnificent (1123–48) and rebuilt by St. Hugh and his successors. It is probably the finest example of 13th-century Gothic architecture in England. Lincoln was often fortunate in her bishops. St. Hugh's example inspired a series of reforming bishops such as Hugh of Wells (1209-35), ROBERT GROSSETESTE, the pastoral canonist Oliver Sutton (1280–99), and the saintly John Dalderby (1300–20), while Richard Fleming (1420–31) and William ATWATER were among the most devoted bishops of their time. John LONGLAND was confessor to Henry VIII and advised him to seek a divorce from CATHARINE OF ARAGON. Religious houses in the diocese included Peterborough, Bardney, and Crowland (Benedictine); the exempt abbey of St. Albans; Louth Park and Revesby (Cistercian); and several GILBERTINE nunneries. Besides the cult of St. Hugh, whose shrine was in the "Angel Choir," there were popular cults of Remigius, Grosseteste, Dalderby, and "Little St. Hugh," none of whom were ever officially canonized. At the Reformation, the territory of the old diocese was divided among Lincoln, Oxford, and Peterborough.

Bibliography: Registers of: Hugh of Wells (Eng. Publications of the Lincoln Record Society 3, 6, 9; Lincoln 1912–14); Oliver Sutton (ibid. 397; Hereford 1948–); Richard of Gravesend (ibid. 20; Horncastle 1920); R. Grosseteste and H. Lexington (ibid. 11; Lincoln 1914). C.W. FOSTER and K. MAJOR, The Registrum Antiquissimum of the Cathedral Church of Lincoln (ibid. 27–; 1931–). A. H. THOMPSON, ed., Visitations of Religious Houses in the Diocese of Lincoln, 1420–1449 3 v. (ibid. 7, 14, 21; Horncastle 1914–29). J. H. SRAWLEY, The Story of Lincoln Minster (London 1933). R.M. WOOLLEY, comp., Catalogue of the Manuscripts of Lincoln Cathedral Chapter Library (London 1927). K. MAJOR, "The Finances of the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln," Journal of Ecclesiatical History 5 (1954) 149–167. K. MAJOR, ed., Lincoln Minster Pamphlets (Lincoln 1948–). A. SCHMITT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1061–62.

[H. FARMER]

LINDAU, CONVENT OF

Founded by Count Adalbert of Raetia (Tirol) c. 817 for Benedictine nuns. The convent, also known as St. Marien, was generously endowed with lands, privileges, and immunities. In 948 it was destroyed by fire but was rebuilt. The convent enjoyed a spiritual growth in the 11th century and adopted the rule of St. AUGUSTINE in the 12th. A hospital was founded at Lindau sometime before 1237. Around 1470 the abbess of the convent was granted the title "Princess of the Realm." There were, however, jurisdictional disputes between the convent and the city of Lindau that lasted into the 18th century. Despite considerable pressure from the Lindau governors, who had embraced Protestantism, the convent persevered in the old faith. On Sept. 16, 1728, its buildings were once again leveled by fire. Although the convent was secularized in 1805, the convent church, rebuilt during the years 1748 to 1852, has served Lindau's Catholic parish since 1813.

Bibliography: Liber anniversariorum monasterii Lindaugiensis, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Necrologia (Berlin 1826–) 1:179–197. K. WOLFART, Kurze Geschichte der Reformation in Lindau, Aeschach, und Reutin (Lindau 1917); ed., Geschichte der Stadt Lindau am Bodensee, 2 v. in 3 (Lindau 1909). A. HORN, Die Kunstdenkmäler von Schwaben: Stadt und Landkreis Lindau (Munich 1954).

[D. ANDREINI]

LINDISFARNE, ABBEY OF

Former English abbey on Lindisfarne Island, or Holy Island, off the coast near Berwick-upon-Tweed, England. This early abbey and bishop's seat in northern England was of Celtic origin for, although Christianity had first been brought to the north through King ETHELBERT OF KENT's daughter, ETHELBURGA, who had married EDWIN, the pagan king of Northumbria (627), and through her chaplain, Paulinus, who had become the first bishop of YORK, the Queen and Paulinus had fled south to Canterbury when Edwin was slain by the heathen king of Mercia in 632. Edwin's immediate successors apostatized, and the infant church in Northumbria collapsed. But when the Christian, OSWALD, who had been educated in an Irish school, became king of Northumbria, he asked the community of Celtic monks at IONA to undertake the conversion of his Northumbrian domains. One of the monks, AIDAN, was consecrated a bishop and together with a group of missionaries, went to Northumbria (635), where he chose Lindisfarne for his abbey and episcopal seat. Aidan was succeeded (651) as bishop by another monk of Iona, FÍNÁN. His successor was COLMAN, who withdrew to Iona and then to Ireland after the Synod of WHITBY opted for the Roman rather than the Celtic Easter date. By this time the missionaries from Lindisfarne had penetrated even beyond Northumbria into Mercia. In 685 St. CUTHBERT was consecrated sixth bishop; he was a man of the Iona tradition of spirituality, who retired to the neighboring island of FARNE to live as a hermit. Lindisfarne was the first monastery to suffer from Viking attacks, which began in 793. It continued as a bishopric until 875, when raids forced the monks to flee with Cuthbert's body to Chester le Street (c. 883). In 995 the see was finally transferred to DURHAM. In the 11th century Lindisfarne Abbey was granted to the Benedictines of Durham, who supplied the island with monks until the suppression in 1536, when the property passed into the hands of the dean and chapter of Durham. The famous Book of Lindisfarne, or LINDISFARNE GOSPELS, dating from c. 700, is now in the British Museum, London.

Bibliography: BEDE, Histoire ecclesiastique 3.4, 5, 17, 23, 26; 4.17, 27, 28; 5.1, 12, 23. G. F. BROWNE, The Venerable Bede (new ed. New York 1919). W. LEVISON, England and the Continent in the 8th Century (Oxford 1946). B. COLGRAVE, ed. and tr. Two Lives of Saint Cuthbert (Cambridge, Eng. 1940); Life of Bishop Witfrid by Eddius Stephanus (New York 1927). J. EARLE and C. PLUMMER, eds. Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, 2 v. (Oxford 1892–99). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church 811.

[J. RYAN]

LINDISFARNE GOSPELS

The Lindisfarne Gospels is a vellum codex of the four Gospels (British Museum, Cotton MS Nero D IV), with Canon-tables and prefaces, written in a noble Anglo-Saxon majuscule script and splendidly decorated in Hiberno-Saxon style by Eadfrith (bishop of Lindisfarne, 698–721) on the island of Lindisfarne off the northeast coast of England, probably between 695 and 698. Complete and exceptionally well-preserved, it comprises 259 folios (13.8 inches by 9.8 inches). About 970 a word-by-word interlinear translation of the Latin text into the Anglo-Saxon was added by Aldred, a monk of the Lindisfarne community. This is one of the longest Old English texts and a very important linguistic document. Aldred added also a colophon (on fol. 259r) giving details of the making of the Gospels. The binding, now lost, was by Aethelwald (bishop, 721-740) and was enriched with gold, silver, and gems by Billfrith (Bilfrid), an anchorite of the community. The codex was thus made on Lindisfarne in the monastery founded (635) by the Irishman AIDAN but by Saxon hands. The Gospel text is a pure Vulgate of the Italo-Northumbrian family very close to that of the Codex Amiatinus. Its exemplar appears to have come from Naples. Italian influence appears also in the setting-out of the text, in the Canontable arcades, in the Evangelist portraits, and even in the character of the script. Eadfrith is the first known name in British art history. The text was issued in editions by J. Stevenson and G. Waring (1854–65) and by W. W. Skeat (1871–87).

See Also: MANUSCRIPT ILLUMINATION.

Ruins of Lindisfarne Priory, Holy Island, England. (@Patrick Ward/CORBIS)

Bibliography: Codex Lindisfarnensis, ed. T. D. KENDRICK et al., 2 v. (Olten 1956–60), color fac. and commentary. S. F. H. ROBINSON, Celtic Illuminative Art in the Gospel Books of Durrow, Lindisfarne and Kells (Dublin 1908). E. G. MILLAR, The Lindisfarne Gospels (London 1923). F. HENRY, Irish Art in the Early Christian Period, to 800 A.D. (Ithaca, N.Y. 1965). J. BACKHOUSE, The Lindisfarne Gospels: A Masterpiece of Book Painting (San Francisco 1995).

[R. L. S. BRUCE-MITFORD]

of reformers; and in June of 1559 under John KNOX's leadership they utterly desecrated it. The last abbot, the historian John Leslie, who was also bishop of Ross, died in exile in 1596; and the abbey was erected into a temporal lordship for Patrick Leslie in 1600. It is now a ruin.

Bibliography: Chartulary of the Abbey of Lindores, 1195–1479, ed. J. DOWDEN (Edinburgh 1903). J. WILKIE, The Benedictine Monasteries of Northern Fife (Edinburgh 1927). D. E. EASSON, Medieval Religious Houses: Scotland (London 1957) 60.

[L. MACFARLANE]

LINDORES, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery of the Tironian congregation (see TIRON, ABBEY OF) in Fifeshire, Scotland, within the Diocese of St. Andrews. Founded and richly endowed in 1191 by David, earl of Huntingdon and grandson of DAVIDI, the abbey was colonized from Kelso and dedicated to St. Mary and St. Andrew. Like DUNFERMLINE and BALMERINO, Lindores was popular with, and frequently visited by, English and Scottish monarchs in the 13th century and emerged almost unscathed from the wars of independence. One of its monks, Laurence of Lindores, was a distinguished teacher at the nearby University of St. Andrews in the early 15th century. In 1543 the abbey was sacked and its monks expelled by an army

LINE, ANNE, ST.

Martyr; b. Dunmow, Essex, late 1560s; hanged Tyburn, Feb. 27, 1601. Her parents, William and Anne Heigham, were ardent Calvinists, enriched by monastic spoils. When Anne was still in her teens, she and her brother William became Catholics with the result that they were disinherited and driven from home. Soon afterward Anne married Roger Line, also a convert of a good family, and they agreed to observe the virtue of continence. In 1585 Roger, then 19 years old, and William were arrested for assisting at Mass. While Roger was in prison, his father or uncle (he was heir to both) sent him a message that if he refused to attend the Protestant Church, his patrimony would go to his younger brother. Roger refused and, like Anne, was disinherited. He was released and sent into exile in Flanders where he died in 1594. William became a Jesuit brother in Spain.

Anne found herself bereft of both husband and brother, and of her home; although young, she was an invalid. When John Gerard, a Jesuit missionary, decided to establish a house for priests in London, he asked Anne to take charge of it. She gladly accepted, although it was a dangerous work. She managed the finances, did the house-keeping, answered inquiries, taught children, and embroidered vestments. The priests called her Mrs. Martha. She longed for martyrdom, and the martyr (Ven.) William Thompson had once promised her that if he should be martyred, he would "pray for her that she might obtain the like happiness."

After Gerard's escape from the Tower in October 1597, Anne moved to another house, for hers had become too well known to be safe. There, she made vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. On Candlemas Day, 1601, Anne invited an unusually large number of Catholics for Mass which attracted attention, and constables arrived. The celebrant, Francis Page, SJ, escaped, but Anne and some of the congregation were arrested. She came up for trial on February 26 before Lord Chief Justice Popham and was sentenced to death for harboring a priest; but since the priest had not been found, the charge was unproved. The next day, she was drawn from Newgate to Tyburn. (Bl.) Mark Barkworth, OSB, and (Bl.) Roger Filcock, SJ, who had long been a friend and confessor of Anne, were martyred at the same time. The Countess of Arundel, Bl. Philip Howard's widow, lent her carriage for the rescue of Anne's body from the communal grave. Anne was beatified in 1935 and canonized in 1970.

Feast: Feb. 27.

Bibliography: J. GERARD, The Autobiography of a Hunted Priest, tr. P. CARAMAN (New York 1952). M. O'DWYER, Blessed Anne Line (Postulation pamphlet; London 1961).

[G. FITZHERBERT]

LINGARD, JOHN

English historian; b. Winchester, Feb. 5, 1771; d. Hornby, Lancashire, July 17, 1851. Lingard received a Catholic education at the English College in DOUAI, France, which he left shortly before the final expulsion of the English community during the French Revolution (1793). In England he rejoined a group of Douai professors and students in Durham County, where they dwelt at Tudhoe and then at Crook Hall (1794). After his ordination (1795), Lingard became vice-president, professor of moral and natural philosophy, and prefect of studies at Crook Hall and from 1808, at Ushaw College, site of the permanent establishment. From May of 1810 until June of 1811, he was acting president of Ushaw College. For the remainder of his life he was a zealous pastor in charge of the mission in Hornby.

Lingard, who came of old English stock, was very proud of English Catholic traditions and wished to retain them. Forthright and intensely English, he was, in his correspondence, critical, at times very critical, of bishops, of Rome, of Italian missionaries to England, and of the pious practices that they introduced. He was distressed because English Catholics remained subject to the penal laws and lacked a clergy with a tradition of learning and culture. The popular concept of the Catholic Church in England as an Italian mission to Irish immigrants disturbed him. In his many writings, his chief aims were to restore the good name of English Catholics and to effect the conversion of that country.

At Crook Hall, Lingard composed his History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church (2 v. 1806), a valuable work that is still cited frequently by specialists. At Hornby he engaged in controversy with leading Anglican divines and published a version of the New Testament with a critical introduction (1836) and several devotional books. But his fame rests principally on his eight-volume History of England, from the First Invasion by the Romans to the Accession of William and Mary in 1688 (1819-30; the 5th ed., enlarged, 1849-51, was the last one revised by the author; the much later edition by Hilaire BELLOC added nothing of value). The work was a general history intended to attract non-Catholic readers by its impartiality and accuracy. His method was, as he described it, "to take nothing on trust; to confine my researches in the first instance to original documents and the more ancient writers; and only to consult the modern historians when I have composed my own narrative." Original documents were, however, difficult of access at that time, when scientific history was in its infancy. To obtain them Lingard went to Italy in 1817 and visited Venice, Milan, Florence, and Parma. In Rome he worked for several weeks in the Barberini and Vatican archives; he found there a useful collaborator in Robert Gradwell, rector of the English College, who supplied him with materials for the next ten years. Publication of the first few volumes of the History of England established Lingard's reputation as an original and critical historian. Thereafter materials and offers of help came from all parts of Europe. Alexander Cameron and Thomas Sherburne, rectors at the English College in Valladolid, did research for Lingard in the archives of Simancas. The archbishop of Paris aided him in discovering the important dispatches of Simon Renard, Spanish ambassador during the reign of Mary Tudor.

The extensive use of original sources brought the work a success that was immediate and enduring. Lingard was one of the first to utilize diplomatic materials for sixteenth- and seventeenth-century English history. Thereby he was able to present this controversial period in an entirely new light. The History was translated into French, German, and Italian and earned its author a European reputation. It was rumored that LEO XII created Lingard a cardinal in petto but died before actually conferring the red hat. Today the work is almost in its entirety out of date, particularly for the pre-Reformation period. The treatment of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is the best section; the chapters on Queen MARY TUDOR still constitute one of the better studies of this reign.

Lingard's voluminous correspondence, as yet unedited, constitutes an important source for English Catholic history.

Bibliography: M. HAILE and E. BONNEY, Life and Letters of John Lingard (London 1911). E. BONNEY, The Catholic Encyclopedia, 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 9:270–272, with photo. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902) 4:254–278. T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 33:320–323. G. CULKIN, "The Making of L.'s History," Month 192 (1951): 7–18. D. MILBURN, A History of Ushaw College (Durham 1964).

[G. CULKIN]

LINUS, ST. POPE

Pontificate: 68 to 79; first successor to Peter (See CLEMENT I). All early lists of Roman bishops and the Canon of the Roman Mass agree that Linus was the immediate successor of Peter as head of the Roman Church. Possibly he was Peter's "coadjutor." St. Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. 3.3) identifies him with a disciple of St. Paul (2 Tm 4.21), which is likely. The epistle's unknown author tried to give his work a Pauline pedigree by addressing it to a known Pauline disciple, by setting it in Rome (1:16-7), and by mentioning Prisca and Aquila (4:19). He probably mentioned Linus because he was known to be a Roman associate of Paul. The dates of his episcopacy vary according to Eusebius (67–79), Jerome (Chron. a. Abr., an. 70), the Liberian catalogue, and the Liber pontificalis (56–67), the only source to call him a martyr. The Annuario Pontificio of 2001 gives the date of 68 for the beginning of his pontificate. This late date suggests some disorganization in the Roman community following the Neronian persecution of 64 and the deaths of Peter and Paul. Linus's feast follows the tradition of the Liber, which claims that he was a Tuscan and reports that he decreed, at the direction of Peter, and possibly under the inspiration of 1 Cor. 11.1–16, that women must veil their heads in church. Modern excavations under the Vatican do not bear out the account in the Liber of his burial next to Peter.

Feast: Sept. 23.

Bibliography: Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 3:2, 4, 13, 21; 5:6. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:cii, 2, 52, 121. Acta Sanctorum Sept. 6:539–545. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 9.1:1195–98. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:772. A. P. FRUTAZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 6:1068. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986). E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity, 2d. ed. (New York 1997) 2:682. J. HOFFMAN, "Linus: erster Bischof von Rom und Heiliger der orthodoxen Kirche" Ostkirchliche Studien (Würzburg 1997) 105–41.

[E. G. WELTIN]

LIOBA, ST.

Anglo-Saxon abbess, aide to Boniface in Germany; b. Wessex, England; d. Schornsheim, near Mainz, Germany, Sept. 28, 782. The daughter of Dynne and Ebba, West Saxons related to St. BONIFACE, she was placed in Thanet Abbey when young and was professed at WIM-BORNE ABBEY when she came of age. Literature was for her a world of delight, and she wrote a letter to Boniface that concluded with a poetic passage and asked him to correct her writing and to pray for her. As a result of ensuing correspondence, some of which survives, 30 nuns including Saints Lioba (or Liobgytha), THECLA, and WALBURGA, were sent to Boniface in Mainz. Lioba was placed in charge of a monastic establishment called Tauberbischofsheim (735), and from that base she set up other convents in Germany. She was highly respected by the early CAROLINGIANS and was often invited to attend at court, especially by Charlemagne's wife, HILDEGARD OF KEMPTEN. Boniface's regard for her carried over to his successors, especially to LULL OF MAINZ, and she alone was allowed to enter Fulda to pray, all other women being excluded. She was buried at Fulda at the specific behest of Boniface.

Feast: Sept. 28.

Bibliography: Vita by RUDOLF OF FULDA, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 15.1:118–131, Eng. trans. in The Anglo-Saxon Missionaries in Germany, ed. and tr. C. H. TALBOT (New York 1954). Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae selectae (Berlin 1826–) 1:nn. 29, 67, 96, 100, letters. W.

LEVISON, England and the Continent in the Eighth Century (Oxford 1946) 70, 76–77, 150. T. SCHIEFFER, Winfrid-Bonifatius and die christliche Grundlegung Europas (Freiburg 1954) 162–166.

[J. L. DRUSE]

LIPSIUS, RICHARD ADELBERT

German Protestant theologian; b. Gera (Thuringia), Germany, Feb. 14, 1830; d. Jena, Aug. 19, 1892. Lipsius came from a Saxon family long noted for producing theologians. He studied at the University of Leipzig and there became lecturer (1855) and professor (1859). In 1861 he moved to the University of Vienna and in 1865 to Kiel, where the Lutheran bishop attacked him for alleged theological LIBERALISM. From 1871 until his death Lipsius was professor of systematic theology at Jena. Hegelian influences on his thought gave way to a NEO-KANTIANISM that opened a new understanding of SCHLEIERMACHER. But Lipsius never completely shook off traces of the approaches of HEGEL and F. C. BAUR. He found himself constantly in critical dialogue with the old Protestant scholasticism and with RITSCHL. Because of his biblical and patristic studies, along with his interest in practical Church affairs, Lipsius strove to develop a universal speculative theology that would blend scientific and religious perceptions. In this endeavor he did not succeed; he reduced his efforts to the exposition of his concepts of religious cognition as subjective experience. Despite this allowance for "mysticism," he moved close to Ritschl's theology, which eventually overshadowed his own. His principal work, the Lehrbuch der evangelischprotestantischen Dogmatik, demonstrated in its three editions between 1876 and 1893 the development of his thought. Besides his numerous historical studies, his Apokryphe Apostelgeschichten und Apostellegenden (2 v. 1883-90) deserves attention, as well as his text edition of Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha (1891; new ed. 1959). Lipsius was also a man of action, being a cofounder of the Evangelical Alliance and the Evangelical Prostestant Missionary Union.

Bibliography: M. SCHEIBE, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie 52:7–27. J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK, eds. Realencycklopädie für protestantische Theologie, 24 v. (3d ed. Leipzig 1896–1913) 11:520–524. S. M. JACKSON, The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, 13 v. (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1951–54) 6:493–494. H. WEINEL, R. A. Lipsius (Tübingen 1930). H. HOHLW-EIN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 6:385–386. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Frieburg 1957–65) 1072.

[D. RITSCHL]

LISBOA, CRISTÓVÃO DE

Missionary and natural historian of Brazil; b. Lisbon, Portugal, c. 1590; d. convent of St. Anthony of Curral, April 19, 1652. He was the son of Gaspar Gil Severim, executor-môr of Portugal, and the brother of the celebrated antiquarian Manoel Severim de Faria, chanter of the Cathedral of Évora. He joined the reformed Franciscan province of Piedade, and after four years transferred to the Province of St. Anthony. After ordination he became a noted literary figure and preacher and, after 1640, a favorite of King John IV. Frei Cristóvão held important positions in the Church and order, including that of first custos or vice provincial of the Franciscan vice province of Maranhão-Pará in northern Brazil (1624-36). When the king divided Portuguese America into two independent states in 1621, he also ordered an ecclesiastical division. In lieu of a new bishop, Frei Cristóvão was sent there with quasi-episcopal authority, arriving with 18 friars, 5 of whom were Brazilians. He became the foremost champion of the rights of the indigenous peoples in the area, traveling extensively in both Maranhão and Pará. The difficulties of enforcing the humane aldeiamento laws were enormous: he succeeded partially in Maranhão, but not in Pará. He returned to Portugal in 1636 in broken health. In 1644 he was named Bishop of Angola, but he was never consecrated. Among his works are many printed sermons. While in Brazil he wrote and illustrated in color the "Historia dos animais e arvores do Maranhão," which was never published. The only copy is in the Arquivo Histórico Ultramarino in Lisbon.

Bibliography: L. DA FONSECA, "Frei Cristóvão de Lisboa, O.F.M., Missionary and Natural Historian of Brazil," Americas 8 (1951–52): 289–303. M. C. KIEMEN, The Indian Policy of Portugal in the Amazon Region, 1617–1693 (Washington 1954).

[M. C. KIEMEN]

LISMORE, ABBEY OF

Early Irish abbey, County Waterford, Ireland (Gaelic; Lis Mór; Latin, Lismorensis). According to the Annals of Inisfallen, it was founded the year Mo-Chutu was expelled from Raithen (County Westmeath), in 638. The nature of this entry and the obit of Mo-Chutu in the same annals imply that Mo-Chutu was also its founder. The Annals of Ulster place Mo-Chutu's expulsion a year earlier and are silent about the foundation of Lismore. It was the principal religious center of the Déissi clan (County Waterford). Although sacked six times by the Scandinavians, it flourished and continued as a center of learning. Many of its community were venerated as saints. In time it became one of the strongholds of the CULDEES. Its later history is that of the origins of the Diocese of Lismore, which was joined to that of Waterford in 1362.

Franz Liszt. (The Library of Congress)

Bibliography: Annals of Inisfallen, ed. and tr. S. MACAIRT (Dublin 1951), Annals of Ulster, ed. and tr. W. M. HENNESSY and B. MACCARTHY, 4 v. (Dublin 1887–1901). Kenney, this with the indexes to annals cited gives the most reliable synopsis of its history. E. H. L. SEXTON, Descriptive and Bibliographical List of Irish Figure Sculptures of the Early Christian Period (Portland, Maine 1946). F. HENRY, Irish Art in the Early Christian Period (2d ed. London 1947).

[C. MCGRATH]

LISZT, FRANZ

Romanticist musician whose artistic achievements substantially influenced music history, b. Raiding (Doborján), Hungary, Oct. 22, 1811; d. Bayreuth, Germany; July 31, 1886. His father, Adam, administrator of an Esterházy estate and a skilled music amateur, was presumably of Hungarian descent; his mother, Anna (Laager) Liszt, was of Austrian-German background. Although physically frail, the boy genius was playing in public at nine. His first and most important teachers were Carl Czerny (piano) and Antonio Salieri (theory) in Vienna; later he studied composition and counterpoint with F. Paër and A. Reicha in Paris. His prodigious talent and winning manners made him society's darling, and his father exploited him, though not excessively, in England and on the Continent. Franz produced an opera, Don Sanche, in Paris in 1825; it was not successful and he never wrote another, although he figured factorially in operatic history, particularly vis-à-vis Richard WAGNER, as conductor, producer, and promoter. In 1827, upon the death of his father, he began teaching piano in Paris. In 1830 he met BERLIOZ, whom he championed, and in 1831 he heard the violinist Paganini, whose virtuosity changed his whole concept of pianism. In 1832 he met CHOPIN and was strongly influenced by his musical style. From 1839 to 1847 he toured all Europe in concert, acknowledged the greatest of all pianists (albeit something of a showman).

As a youth Liszt had at times desired to enter the priesthood but had been dissuaded by his father. In the 1830s he fell in love with Countess Marie d'Agoult (the writer "Daniel Stern") and became the father of three children: Blandine; Cosima, later Wagner's wife and widow; and Daniel. In 1848 he settled with the Polish princess Carolyne Von Sayn-Wittgenstein in Weimar, where for 12 years he served the court as Kapellmeister and produced his major orchestral works. He had hoped to marry the princess in Rome on his 50th birthday, but the union was forbidden by the Church when her existing marriage could not be dissolved. In 1865 he took minor orders from Cardinal Hohenlohe at the Vatican and was thenceforth known as the "Abbé" Liszt. In 1875 he became president of the New Academy of Music in Budapest and thereafter divided his time among Budapest, Rome, and Weimar, as elder statesman in the world of art.

Liszt was one of the great creators and innovators of 19th-century music. He expanded its expressiveness, organized new forms, justified new sources of inspiration, illumined the value of nationalism, and set the pattern of present-day concert life. He wrote a vast amount of original music, some utilizing Hungarian elements and, in later years, dissonance and atonality pointing to 20thcentury idioms. His keyboard pieces are daringly emotional and chromatic, if sometimes overly sentimental. He originated the "symphonic poem" and made opulent transcriptions of songs and opera airs. Less familiar is his sacred music; yet he wrote an impressive amount, nonliturgical but of an uncommonly high quality and consonant with his fundamental piety. Two massive oratorios (Die Legende von der heiligen Elisabeth and Christus) head the list, which includes several Masses, psalms, part-songs, and other religious settings.

His essay "On the Church Music of the Future" (1834), with its thesis of "humanistic religious music," inspired Wagner's later interest in church music, and its exemplification in Liszt's own music led to Wagner's Parsifal as well as to a Lisztian type of instrumental church composition. Moreover, he took a lively interest in the reform objectives of the CAECILIAN MOVEMENT and corresponded with its leader, F. X. Witt, over the creation of the Kirchenmusikschule in Regensburg. His many books (some of them probably the work of Marie d'Agoult and Princess Carolyne) reflect his broad interest in literature, philosophy, and social reform. During the early 20th century Liszt's music fell into critical disfavor along with the whole corpus of romanticist expression. The current reappraisal of romanticism has, however, returned his work to the honorable place among the scholars that it had never lost in the popular reckoning.

Bibliography: Gesammelte Schriften, ed. L. RAMANN, 6 v. in 7 (Leipzig 1881–99); Briefe, ed. LA MARA (I. M. LIPSIUS), 8 v. (Leipzig 1893-1905); "Vierzehn Original Briefe Liszts an Witt," Musica Sacra 46 (1913) 289-295. E. NEWMAN, The Man Liszt (New York 1935). R. HILL, Liszt (New York 1949). H. SEARLE, The Music of Liszt (London 1954). W. BECKETT, Liszt (New York 1956). S. SIT-WELL, Liszt (rev. ed. New York 1956). H. ENGEL, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 8:964–988. K. G. FELLERER, The History of Catholic Church Music, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Baltimore 1961). R. WOODWARD, The Large Sacred Choral Works of Franz Liszt (Doctoral diss. microfilm; U. of Illinois 1964). W. WIDMANN, "Witt und Liszt-Wagner," Caecilienvereinsorgan 65 (1934) 192-195. J. M. BAKER, "The Limits of Tonality in the Late Music of Franz Liszt," Journal of Music Theory 34 (1990) 145-173. S. GUT, "Le profane et le religieux dans les différentes versions de l'Ave Maria de Franz Liszt," Revue de Musicologie 76 (1990) 95-102. J. KANSKI, "Problem formy w sonacie h-moll F. Liszta: Przemiany formy sonatowej w okresie romantyzmu," Studia Muzykologiczne (1955) 276-294. G. KENNEL, "Weinen, Klagen, Sorgen, Zagen: Franz Liszts Variationen-ein musikalischer Trauerprozeß," Musik und Kirche 69 (1999) 316–325. W. KIRSCH, "Franz Liszts Requiem für Männerstimmen," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch 71 (1987) 93-108. V. MICZNIK, "The Absolute Limitations of Programme Music: The Case of Liszt's Die Ideale," Music and Letters 80 (1999) 207-240. R. SATYENDRA, "Conceptualising Expressive Chromaticism in Liszt's Music," Music Analysis 16 (1997) 219-252. D. SCHMIDT, "Liszt und die Gegenwart: Versuch einer theoretischen Schlußfolgerung aus der Lektüre dreier Analysen zum Klavierstück Unstern!," Musiktheorie 11 (1996) 241-252. L. R. TODD, "The 'Unwelcome Guest' Regaled: Franz Liszt and the Augmented Triad," 19th Century Music 12 (1988) 93-115.

[E. N. WATERS]

LITANY

Definition. A litary is a repetitive prayer form, usually characterized by the announcement of varying invocations (e.g. lists of divine titles, names of saints) or supplications by a leader, each of which is followed by a fixed congregational response. Examples of such responses in the Christian tradition are "Lord have mercy," "Pray for us," or "Amen." The genre of litanies as a form of public worship may be distinguished from other responsorial forms by their relative brevity and somewhat insistent quality. The word "litany" also designates a procession of intercessory prayer, such as those used on rogation days. Examples of liturgical litanies are the Kyrie eleison, Agnus Dei, solemn orations of Good Friday, and litany of the saints. This entry discusses the origin and development of litany as prayer.

Origin. Chants resembling litanies can be traced to both Christian and non-Christian religions and cultures. Litanic patterns are found in the Hebrew Scriptures (e.g., Ps 136: Praise the Lord, who is so good; God's love endures forever, and Dn 3:52-90: Blessed are you, O Lord, the God of our ancestors, praiseworthy and exalted above all forever). These patterns are also discernible in extra-biblical Jewish litanies, such as the hashanot procession for the Feast of Tabernacles and the selichot. In the first century B.C. papyrus, Tebtunis Papyri 284.9, the Greek noun litaneia—derived from the verb litaneuo, meaning to "entreat" or "implore"—was used to refer to a pagan prayer. Early Christian writers often used litaneia and the related noun lite to signify public and corporate rather than private and individual prayer, especially for forgiveness of sins and the general welfare. These prayers were often invoked on occasions of earthquakes, plagues, and other disasters, and they soon came to be associated with public processions. The diverse forms of the term litaneia underwent a shift of meaning. In the fifth- and sixth-century documents, for example, an epistle of the Council of Ephesus (431) and a report on the Council of Tyre (518), these word forms seem to connote the procession itself. In the Greek Orthodox Church, the primary meaning of the word litaneia remains "procession."

As early as the year 396, the Latin form of litania was in use. In medieval Latin, it was spelled letania and connoted some meanings not found in the Greek. Due to the fact that processions came to be commemorated on certain fixed days of the calendar, the Latin word was frequently used to indicate the procession days customary in the West, such as the rogation days celebrated on April 25 and the weekdays before Ascension. In a separate development, the word also designated the te rogamus, audi nos, the repetitive prayers that were chanted during these processions by a deacon or cantor, to which the people would respond: "Kyrie eleison" or "ora pro nobis." This latter meaning becomes the more prominent one in Latin, and it is from this that the final sense of the Western "litany" derives its meaning.

Eastern liturgies. An early manifestation of the litany in the East is in the diaconal liturgies, in which the deacon expresses an intercession and the people respond Kyrie eleison. While it may go back as far as the prayer of the synagogues, it was already in use in Antioch in the time of John Chrysostom. This form of prayer still occupies a large place in Eastern liturgies.

Byzantine liturgical rites contain five main types of texts that, according to Western terminology, may be called litanies: (1) the synapte, (2) the aitesis, (3) the ektene, (4) the dismissal litanies, and (5) the prayers of the lite. Each is led by a deacon. Synapte (Greek for "joined together") is a Byzantine term in which the deacon proposes petitions and the assembly responds "Lord have mercy" or "Grant this, O Lord." The "great synapte" begins with the deacon chanting "In peace, let us beseech the Lord." Because the first three petitions commence with an intercession for peace, the great synapte is also called the eirenika. The "little synapte" is an abridged version beginning with "Again and again in peace let us beseech the Lord."

The aitesis (request) is a litany in the Byzantine divine office consisting of two petitions with the response "Lord have mercy," six petitions with the response "Grant it, O Lord," and an acclamation to the Mother of God and to all the saints. It was also called the "Angel of Peace" litany from its characteristic fourth petition.

The ektene (fervent supplication) is a unique litany form in that the deacon prays directly to God rather than proposing petitions to the assembly. The deacon sings this litany after the reading of the gospel in the Divine Liturgy and as the conclusion of the daily orthos and hesperinos. It is called "intense" because the people respond by singing three times "Lord have mercy." Its use at processions and its persistent repetition of the Kyrie cause the ektene to be perhaps the most typical genre of litany. In the Slavonic rites all litanies are called ekteniya, even the synapte and aitesis.

Reporting on the fourth-century Jerusalem liturgy, Egeria observed that at the dismissal litany, unbaptized catechumens were dismissed before the great entrance to the Mass and at the liturgy of the Presanctified. The deacon begins by instructing those being prayed for to pray silently and then asks the already baptized to respond to the litany. Fully developed dismissal litanies are found in the Apostolic Constitutions in which the deacon is instructed to mention the name of each individual. After each petition, the assembly, especially children, shouted: Kyrie eleison. The Apostolic Constitutions also assign the use of the dismissal litany at every morning and evening prayer. Two other dismissal litanies were included: for those undergoing canonical penance and for those possessed by demons.

In the Byzantine liturgical rite, lite is a procession of clergy and people to an appointed church in celebrating a feast for the purpose of intercession or thanksgiving. It sometimes involved a procession at the end of Vespers in which a litany is chanted when the procession pauses in the vestibule of the church. The deacon begins with "O God, save your people and bless your inheritance" and then continues with a long list of prayers for the welfare of the Christian people, often invoking the names of many saints. Depending on the liturgical source one consults, the assembly responds to each group of petitions by answering Kyrie eleison as many as three, eight, twelve, forty, or fifty times. Incessant repetition of the Kyrie has a long history in the liturgy of the Eastern churches.

Various other Eastern rites use or formerly used litanies that may appear to be similar in form to Byzantine litanies, but they may be diverse in content. But for a few exceptions, Eastern rite litanies are practiced as public forms of worship. Private litanic prayers are more characteristic of the Western Church.

Western litanies. Some scholars propose a very early date for the use of the Kyrie eleison in the West. The fourth century hymn, Miserere Domine, miserere Christe by Gauis Marius Victorinus (d. after 363), bears witness to not only the Kyrie but also to the Christe eleison that was never used in the East. Judging from an anti-Arian tract of uncertain date, there is indication that Greeks, Latins, and Goths each prayed the Kyrie in their own language. The first dateable evidence of the practice of the Kyrie in the West is canon 3 of the Council of Vaison in Gaul (c. 529). The canon directs that since the custom of saying "Kyrie eleison" has been introduced "in Rome, and in all the provinces of Italy and the Orient," it should be introduced in all the churches for morning and evening Office and the Mass, being sure to say it "repeatedly with great sorrow and remorse." This instruction recalls the fervor of the Greek ektene and perhaps the council's desire for Latin litanies to be similar in structure to the Greek. Such Latin litanies are called preces or *depreca*tiones.

There are three witnesses to these preces in the litanies of the West. The first is known as the Deprecatio Gelasii, used in Rome and attributed to Pope Gelasius (492–496) after whom it is named. The opening phrase of the Deprecatio recalls the Greek ektene, "Let us all say: Lord, hear and have mercy." This was followed by an invocation to the Trinity, peculiar to the West. The content differs from the Eastern-type petitions, resembling the intentions of the solemn prayers of the faithful of the early Roman liturgy.

The next most important group of preces comprises two that were prayed in Milan during Lent, immediately after the entrance chant of the Ambrosian liturgy. These two litanies were prayed on the first two Sundays of Lent, respectively. They closely resembled the Greek ektene with "Let us all say: Kyrie eleison," followed by three Kyrie for the first week and one Kyrie for the second week.

The third Western source, the Mozarabic rite, had the most extensive body of preces-type litanies. They were used in the Lenten Masses, within the Office on penitential days, and for burial services. This group was the least dependent on Greek models and evidenced great creativity: many are metrical, some are acrostic, and a few even use rhyme. The Good Friday veneration of the Cross recalls the Eastern rite of the Exaltation of the Cross, with its profuse repetitions of "Kyrie eleison".

The most distinctive preces was the Tenebrae Service of Holy Week. It incorporated both the responses "Kyrie eleison" and "Domine miserere" with verses referring to the passion of Christ.

Litany of the saints. The Middle Ages witnessed the development of probably the most well known type of litany in the Western Church—the litany of the saints. This litany is composed of a list of holy men and women, each name intoned by a leader, with the assembly's response "Ora pro nobis (pray for us)." Following the list of saints' names came a second list of calamities from which the petitioner sought deliverance, with the response "Libera nos, domine (deliver us, Lord)." A Greek antecedent to the litany of the saints may be seen at the end of the aetesis, in which the names of saints were often multiplied after the commemoration of the Virgin Mary.

Seventh-century testimony indicates that the litany of saints was a processional litany, connected particularly with the rogation days. The Greater Litany was the name of the procession for April 25, and the Lesser Litany for the three days preceding Ascension Thursday. In addition to rogation days, processional litanies took place on many other occasions: Holy Saturday and the Pentecost vigil, fixed days during Lent and other penitential seasons, before stational liturgies in which the bishop and assembly would gather at one church and process to the next church where the Mass was to be celebrated, and in times of drought, famine, earthquake, and other calamities. The particular litany that accompanied the procession was indicative of the interior attitude and intent of the procession itself.

Until an imposed uniformity in 1570, the text of the litany of saints varied greatly from one locale to another in elements such as the number and selection of saints, and other material at beginning and end. Some forms of the litany of the saints had special functions. The commendatio animae, for example, was prayed over a dying person. The laudes regiae was usually sung at ceremonies at which the bishop or king took part, and was joined to the Kyrie in the beginning of Mass. This litany often began with "Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat" (Christ conquers, Christ reigns, Christ commands), and the response to each saint's name was frequently "Tu illum adiuva (you help him)."

The Protestant Reformers of the sixteenth century, espousing a strong belief in justification by faith, rejected the mediatory and intercessory role of the saints and therefore purged the Reformation liturgies of any invocation of the saints. The Anglican archbishop, Thomas Cranmer, greatly influenced by Luther and Zwingli, retained the invocation of the saints initially, but he followed the example of the continental reformers in his 1549 Book of Common Prayer and omitted it.

Devotional litanies. Litanies addressed exclusively to the Virgin Mary began to emerge beginning in the twelfth century. Names of saints were replaced with Marian titles such as "Mater purissima" (Mother purest), "Regina apostolorum" (Queen of the apostles), and "Rosa Mystica" (Mystical Rose). The most well known Marian litany is probably the so-called Litany of Loreto, named for the Italian village where a revered house is reported to have been miraculously transported from Palestine by angels.

By the sixteenth century similar devotional litanies developed, such as one for the Holy Eucharist. Succeeding centuries saw the growth of other approved litanies, namely the Litanies of the Holy Name (1862), Sacred Heart (1899), St. Joseph (1909), and Most Precious Blood (1960).

Current liturgical usages. In the Missal of Paul VI, the Kyrie Eleison, long a litanic and musical element in the Mass, is sung after the penitential rite or takes the form of the penitential rite itself. In this case, a short verse (trope) addressed to Christ is interpolated by the minister to which the assembly alternates, "Lord, have mercy, Christ have mercy, Lord have mercy." When it follows the penitential rite, the acclamation is alternated by the assembly and choir or cantor. While it is customary to repeat each acclamation twice, the number of repetitions may be increased according to circumstance (The General Instruction of the Roman Missal 52).

The prayer of the faithful, or "general intercessions" have been restored to their original place at the conclusion of the liturgy of the Word. While there is no prescribed form or response stipulated, supplication is to be made for the needs of the Church, public authorities, the salvation of the world, those in need, and the local community (GIRM 45–47). The General Intercessions for Good Friday follow the general order given for all intercessions but are more expansive in scope to include catechumens, those preparing for baptism, the Jewish people and those who do not believe in Christ or in God. Some liturgists suggest that an effective use of sung response, silence, and postures of kneeling and standing, as allowed for in the sacramentary, could greatly enhance this litanic prayer.

The Agnus Dei (Lamb of God) is another example of an ancient litany in the Mass. According to a statement from the Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne 1:376), Pope Sergius I (687–701) directed that the Agnus Dei should be sung by the presider and people for as long as the consecrated bread was being divided for distribution in Communion. When the extended fraction rite was abandoned, the Agnus Dei was shortened to a litany of three petitions, and came to be reduced to a pre-Communion song. In the Mass of Paul VI, this litany is returned to its original function of accompanying the breaking of bread and the commingling. It may be repeated as often as needed; the final response being "grant us peace" (GIRM 56e).

Formularies of supplication litanies varying in text and melody according to the situation or circumstances are also included in various sacraments and sacramentals. Litanies of the saints are prescribed for the sacramental celebrations of adult and infant baptism and the ordination of a deacon, presbyter, or bishop. An intercessory form of litany is prayed during the anointing of the sick, following the Liturgy of the Word. The sacramentals that include a liturgical litany are as follows: religious professions, consecration of virgins, blessing of an abbot or abbess, dedication of a church or altar, Christian burial, and exorcism. In the Morning and Evening prayer, a litanic prayer form called preces follows the Gospel canticle.

Popularity of litanies. Between the years of the Council of Trent and Vatican II, popular devotions including various forms of litanies, often provided religious experience to the faithful in a more affective and intelligible manner than did the official services. Litanies were able to be prayed communally by ordinary people without the aid of liturgical office holders. At certain periods of history as well as today, they appealed to a large proportion of church members whatever their religious status and function, or their ethnic, educational, or socioeconomic background.

Contemporary composers, following the norms of the instruction Musicam Sacram (March 5, 1967), have retrieved the traditional form of litany to foster liturgical music that both respects the integrity of the rites and promotes active participation. The community of Taizé has taken the lead in composing litanic forms for such Mass parts as the gloria and credo, as well as hymns appropriate for other parts of the liturgy. Other composers have begun to utilize litanies as a way for assemblies of diverse languages to sing together with refrains and/or invocations of alternating languages. The short and repetitive nature of litanies is also being recognized by church musicians as useful for processional chants.

Bibliography: E. BISHOP, Liturgica Historica (Oxford 1962). P. JOUNEL, "Les oraisons du propre des saints dans le nouveau missel," La Maison-Dieu 105 (1972): 181–98. A. MARTIMORT, ed., The Church at Prayer: An Introduction to the Liturgy, tr. M. O'CONNELL (Collegeville MN 1987). F. RAINOLDI, Psallite Sapienter (Rome 1999) 39–40. D. RIMAUD, "The Litany: Biblical and Liturgical Use," Pastoral Music 12:6: 32–35. The Rites of the Catholic Church, v. 2 (Pueblo 1980) 292–93. L. WEIL, "The History of Christian Litanies," Liturgy: With All the Saints 5:2 (Fall 1985): 33–37. M. WHALEN, "The Litany of the Saints—Its Place in the Grammar of Liturgy," Worship 65 (1991): 216–223. J. WILKENSON, Egeria's Travels (3d ed. Warminster, England, 1999).

[M. A. CLARAHAN]

LITANY OF LORETO

The litany in honor of the Blessed Virgin Mary in common use in the Western Church. It derives its name from its association with the shrine at Loreto, where it was known and commonly used from the mid-16th century. Earlier litanies or comparable series of laudes, eulogies, and invocations honoring the Blessed Virgin Mary are known to have existed, a Gaelic example of which was in use as early as the 8th century. The Litany of Loreto did not originate at the shrine, but is traceable, according to the researches of G. G. Meersseman, to the early Middle Ages, and shows the influence of Marian devotion in the East, where lists of titles of the Blessed Virgin Mary were not uncommon. The earliest known manuscript copy of a litany approximating that of Loreto dates from c. 1200 [Der Hymnos Akathistos im Abendland, 2 v. (Freiburg 1958–60) 2.220–225]. This form of the Marian litany no doubt found favor and displaced others with longer and more elaborate invocations because of its beauty and because its brevity was better adapted to public devotion. When it came into use at Loreto, thousands of pilgrims became familiar with it, and returning to their homes spread its popularity throughout Europe. Its association with the shrine at Loreto was already well established in 1558, when it was printed and published by St. Peter Canisius at Dilligen, Germany, under the title Letania Loretana. This is the oldest known printed copy of the litany, and its text, probably taken from an earlier Italian publication, is identical with that in use down to modern times, except for two minor variations in the titles by which the Blessed Virgin Mary is addressed, and its omission, perhaps by editorial oversight, of two titles.

For a short time in the 16th century it appeared that the Litany of Loreto would have to give way to a new version that was drawn up containing invocations taken more directly from the Scriptures and liturgy and thought to be more in accord with the motu proprio of Pius V of March 20, 1571, prohibiting unapproved forms of the Little Office and some litanies of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Sixtus V, however, granted his approval to the old form used at Loreto and recommended preachers to propagate its use. In time there were new titles introduced: Pius VII added that of Queen of All Saints on his return to Rome after his long captivity; Leo XIII, the titles Queen of the Most Holy Rosary, Queen Conceived without Original Sin, and Mother of Good Counsel; Benedict XV, during World War I, Queen of Peace; and Pius XII, on the occasion of the definition of the dogma of the Assumption, that of Queen Assumed into Heaven [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 42 (1950) 795].

The titles of the litany fall into four categories. In the first 20, after being saluted as Holy Mary, The Blessed Virgin Mary is addressed first as Mother, then as Virgin, by titles indicative of the dignity of her relationship to God and to man, and of her excellence as prototype, after her divine Son, of Christian perfection. She is mother of God, of our Creator and Savior, and hence mother most pure, most admirable, possessed of perfect integrity of heart and perfect harmony of mind and body, of unalloyed goodness and perfect love, wise, powerful, gentle, and true. Then follow 13 beautiful titles associated with Old Testament prophecy and symbolism, and four whose origins are lost in antiquity tell of her power and office. Finally she is addressed 12 times as queen in terms that declare the broad extent and character of her queenship. The litany ends with the Collect from the common Mass of Blessed Virgin Mary, which prays for health of body and spirit and deliverance from present sorrow to a future joy.

In an attempt to draw continuities between the ordinary life of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the lives of women today, some communities have added contemporary Marian invocations that call on the Blessed Virgin Mary as "Mother of the homeless, widowed mother, mother of a political prisoner, oppressed woman, first disciple . . ." Such images can lend dignity to the lives of those devalued by society as well as call attention to God's liberating activity in the life of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Bibliography: A. DE SANTI, Le litanie Lauretane (Rome 1897); The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 9:287–290. G. VANN, "Notes on Our Lady's Litany," Worship 30 (1955–56) 437–441. J. F. SULLIVAN, The Externals of the Catholic Church, rev. J. C. O'LEARY (2d ed. New York 1959) 362–364.

[C. H. BAGLEY/EDS.]

Capital: Vilnius. Size: 25,170 sq. miles. Population: 3,620,755 in 2000.

Languages: Lithuanian, Polish, Russian.

Religions: 3,041,435 Catholics (84%), 144,830 Orthodox (4%), 17,680 Muslims (.5%), 37,460 Protestants (1%), 25,350 Jews (.7%), 354,000 without religious affiliation.

Archdioceses: Kaunas, with suffragans Siauliai, Telšiai and

Vilkaviškis; Vilnius, with suffragans Kaišiadorys and Panevėžys. A military ordinariate also exists in the country.

LITHUANIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Lithuania is located in northeastern Europe, east of the Baltic Sea. The largest of the Baltic States, it is bordered on the north by Latvia, on the east by the Kalinigrad Oblast of Russia, on the south and southeast by Belarus and on the south by Poland. Benefited by a moderate climate, Lithuania is comprised predominately of lowlands, with numerous lakes. Natural resources include peat, while the nation's fertile soil produces such crops as grain, potatoes, sugar beets, vegetables and flax.

A grand duchy from the 13th century until 1795, Lithuania became subjected to Russia until claiming independence in 1918. Except for the years it was occupied by German troops during World War II, between 1940 and 1990, Lithuania was incorporated as part of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR). Ethnic Lithuanians are Baltic Indo-Europeans who entered the region before the Christian era. Lithuania is the most nationally homogenous Baltic state: 80 percent of the population is Lithuanian, while the remaining 20 percent are divided between Russian and Polish.

Early History. The early Lithuanians followed a form of ANIMISM, based on belief in the supranatural character of natural phenomena and a cult of the dead. The region's first encounter with Christianity was likely through Western merchants, Christian Danes or Swedes, who at times entered Lithuania. The missionary journeys of Bishop ADALBERT OF PRAGUE and Bruno of Querfurt at the turn of the 10th century ended with martyrdom for both in Prussia. Missionaries and knights came from North Germany c. 1200 and evangelized, partly by preaching the Gospels, partly by force. The land of the Prussians, to the west, was given c. 1230 to TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, recently expelled from Palestine, to evangelize and colonize. Meanwhile the Lithuanian tribes united and moved eastward into the former Kiev kingdom. Pressure from the German KNIGHTS OF THE SWORD, founded in Livonia in 1202, and from the Teutonic Knights in Prussia (both merged into one order in 1237), threatened the independence of Lithuania and forced Grand Duke Mindaugas to negotiate with the master of the Christian order of Livonia. In 1251 Mindaugas, his family and many of his retinue were baptized, and a delegation sent from Lithuania to Pope Innocent IV. The pope recognized Mindaugas as king and his coronation in 1253, and also established the Diocese of Lithuania immediately subject to the Holy See. Christian, a Teutonic Knight, became the first bishop of Lithuania. In 1257 Vitus, a Dominican, was consecrated as bishop for southern Lithuania. The populace was instructed in the faith by Franciscans, Dominicans and other priests (see DACIA).

The desire for power among the Teutonic Knights, dissension among the princes and the strong adherence to paganism among the masses prevented an easy transition to the new religion. In 1263 a pagan faction murdered Mindaugas and assumed control of the region for the next century. Attempts to Christianize Lithuania during the 13th and 14th centuries were unsuccessful, in part because of the eagerness of the Teutonic Knights for territorial conquest. Lithuanians realized that to become Christian was to lose their freedom. The region's permanent conversion was effected by grand dukes JAGIEŁŁO and Vytautas. In 1385 Jagiełło united Lithuania and PO-LAND, through his marriage with Jadwiga, heiress to the Polish throne. Baptized with a number of Lithuanian princes, he was crowned King Władysław II Jagiełło of Poland on March 4. Early in 1387 he and his cousin Vytautas went to Vilnius, where nobles as well as many common people converted to Christianity. Jagiełło and his Catholic retinue translated several holy texts into Lithuanian and explained Catholic doctrine to the populace. Jagiełło founded the diocese of Vilnius in 1387; the diocese of Medininkai (later Samogitia) was erected in 1417, the same year all of Lithuania was converted. Both Vilnius and Medininkai were subjected to the metropolitan of Gniezno. Latin dioceses were erected in the eastern part of the grand duchy, along with a few eparchies under the Orthodox metropolitan of Kiev. In 1320 a Latin diocese was established in Kiev and in 1358 another in Vladimir, which was transferred to Lutsk in 1428.

Growth and Danger: 1387–1569. When Catholicism became the state religion, Catholic nobles became leaders in the senate and in the administration of the state, and as a result mixed marriages were forbidden by law. A long period of peace under Kazimieras IV contributed much to the establishment of religion throughout both Lithuania and Poland. Kazimieras' second son, Kazimieras (CASIMIR, d. 1484), was canonized and is venerated as the principal patron saint of Lithuania. Despite the spread of the faith among the upper classes, the small number of churches and priests, the lack of schools for higher education and the influx of the Polish clergy seeking better Benefices but unable to speak the language, left the common people ignorant of their faith and encouraged their reliance on pagan customs.

By the mid-16th century, most of Lithuania's influential noble families had become followers of CALVINISM or ARIANISM, while several merchants and townsmen adopted LUTHERANISM. While most rural folk remained loyal to the Church, they were pressured by their landowners to accept the new beliefs. Soon a vigorous Catholic counteraction began, led by Cardinal Stanislaus HOSIUS, bishop of Ermland. The conversion of Prince Mikalojus Radvilas in 1567 brought many leading noble families back to the Church. Also effective in turning the tide were the JESUITS, who entered East Prussia in 1564 at the invitation of Hosius and arrived in Vilnius in 1569 at the call of Bishop Valerijonas Protasevičius.

Great Development: 1569–1795. The Jesuits opened their first college in Lithuania at Vilnius in 1570; nine years, as a university, it became the only institution of higher learning in northeastern Europe, a situation lasting until 1755. As an important Catholic center of learning, the influence of the University of Vilnius stretched beyond Lithuania to Sweden, Kiev and Moscow. The Lithuanian Jesuits formed their own province in 1608 and continued establishing colleges in the country, with 21 colleges by 1756. Jesuits were also active as theologians, confessors of bishops and princes, preachers and writers of theological, polemical, ascetical and devotional literature. Due to their efforts, Catholic written works such as the catechisms of St. Peter Canisius (1585) and Ledesma (1595) were translated into Lithuanian. The Jesuits also popularized Lithuanian hymns and religious customs, such as the singing of the rosary, the chanting of the Little Office of the Immaculate Conception, solemn processions and pilgrimages. Dramatic productions in Jesuit schools were highly esteemed. Of the other orders engaged in education and in literary work, the PIARISTS, BASILIANS and VINCENTIANS were the most active.

St. Catherine's Church, Vilnius, Poland. (@Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

Several bishops played a significant role in the development of the Lithuanian Church. Merkelis Giedraitis, bishop of Samogitia (1576–1609), was responsible for building new churches, teaching the faith to the common people and increasing the number of native clergy. Jurgis Radvilas, bishop of Vilnius (1579–91) and cardinal (1584), founded the first major seminary in Vilnius in I582. In the same year a second seminary, the Seminarium Pontificum, was established there by Gregory XIII to train missionaries for the eastern territories. Seminarians for the Diocese of Samogitia were also trained in Vilnius until their own seminary was opened, first in the Jesuit college at Kražiai (c. 1620), then at Varniai (1740). In 1611, after Smolensk fell to Lithuania, a Latin diocese was established there; in 1636 it received its first bishop. After Smolensk was retaken by Moscow in 1654, there remained only three parishes on the Lithuanian side. Nevertheless, the diocese survived until 1798; the bishops of the diocese resided generally in Vilnius.

Pilgrims from Lithuania pray during a Mass celebrated by Pope John Paul II in Elk, Poland. (Photo by Czarek Sokolowski; AP/ Wide World Photos)

For the union with Rome of members of the EASTERN CHURCHES living in Lithuania, see BREST, UNION OF; ISIDORE OF KIEV.

Under Czarist Control: 1795–1918. In the partitions of Poland and Lithuania, almost the entire Grand Duchy of Lithuania fell to Russia while lands south of the Nemunas River went to Prussia. The authoritarian attitude of the Russian rulers—even toward the popes—hindered free communication with Rome. To Russianize the Lithuanians, the czars tried to convert them to the Orthodox Church through the abolition of Catholic schools, the dissolution of almost all monasteries and religious orders, and continual state interference in religious matters.

In 1798 Czar Paul I created a new church organization with a Catholic Church province of Mogilev containing six Latin-rite and three Eastern-rite Catholic dioceses, among them the existing dioceses of Samogitia and Vilnius. Pope Pius VI could do nothing but give a post factum approbation. In those lands incorporated into Prussia, Pius VI created a new diocese with its seat in Vygriai, later moved to Augustavas, and in 1818 to Seinai. At St. Petersburg the Collegium Ecclesiasticum Romano-Catholicum was founded in 1801; a kind of consistory, it was composed of Catholic priests but completely controlled by the government. The Catholic Academia Ecclesiastics, at which many Lithuanian priests studied and taught until 1917, was moved from Vilnius to St. Petersburg in 1842. Although the Holy See tried to help Catholics in Russia by signing a concordat in August of 1847, the agreement went unobserved and Catholics continued to be treated harshly.

The increasingly oppressive czarist regime sparked revolts in Poland and Lithuania in 1831 and 1863, that were brutally suppressed and resulted in even greater restrictions. In 1864 the episcopal seat was moved to Kaunas to allow the czar closer supervision of the bishop. However, these new laws only served to increase Lithuanian nationalism and resistance. Church leaders such as Motiejus Valančius, Bishop of Samogitia (1850–75), stood out as courageous and dauntless champions, promoting the Lithuanian language and culture and helping Lithuanian Catholics survive persecution without suffering great harm.

The Interwar Period: 1918 to 1940. Lithuanian independence was restored by the legislature on Feb. 16, 1918. Poland's seizure of Vilnius two years later caused bitter enmity between the two countries, which had formerly shared a common destiny. Because of the dispute over Vilnius, relations between Lithuania and the Holy See became strained. Normal relations were finally restored in 1925, after Pius XI appointed Archbishop Jurgis Matulaitis (1871–1927) as apostolic visitor to Lithuania, and then established the country as a distinct ecclesiastical province. The Archdiocese of Kaunas became a metropolitan see, with suffragans Telšiai, Panevėzys, Vilkaviškis and Kaišiadorys, and the Prelature nullius of Klaipêda (Memel), all created in 1926. (Part of the territory of the Metropolitan See of Vilnius was restored later to Lithuania.) With the signing of a concordat on Dec. 10, 1927, relations with Rome were completely regularized, although tensions remained between the governing party and the Holy See.

Catholic life now progressed rapidly. Religious education was made compulsory in the country's public schools. There were three seminaries and, from 1922, a Catholic faculty of theology and philosophy at the University of Kaunas. Catholic intellectuals founded the Lithuanian Catholic Academy of Science, while Catholic students and academicians participated from 1910 in public life as members of Ateitis (Future). Numerous noteworthy members of the laity also supported the Church.

World War II and Occupation. In 1940 Lithuania became the first Roman Catholic country to come under Soviet rule when it was annexed to the USSR. The new communist government began a policy of secularization that included the abolition of religious instruction in public schools and the end of government support for religious institutions. It also instituted civil marriage, legalized divorce and abolished religious holidays. The Catholic press was closed and Catholic societies outlawed, and priests were recruited to work for the political police. Thousands were arrested or deported, including many active clergy. By 1941 the communist regime had closed virtually all Catholic institutions and confiscated the Theological Seminary in Kaunas.

The Nazi invasion of June 22, 1941 was met by large-scale anti-Soviet uprising in Lithuania. Initially, the Church hierarchy welcomed the departure of the Communists, urging the people to remain calm and carry on under the new occupation. As the Nazis showed relatively little interest in purely religious matters, some seminaries were reopened, and religion was allowed back into the schools. In March of 1942 the Germans deported Archbishop Romuald Jałbrzykowski (1876–1955) of Vilnius, replacing him with Archbishop Mečislovas Reinys (1884–1953) and marking the end of Polish control over this historic diocese.

Nazi genocidal policy posed a moral challenge to the people of the Baltic States. By the end of 1941, the majority of the Jews living in the area, nearly a quarter million from Lithuania's culturally vibrant Jewish community, were dead. Attempts by Church leaders to request German and Lithuanian military commandants to intercede on behalf of the Jews, as well as proposals by the Lithuanian bishops' conference to address the Jewish issue fell on deaf ears. The bishops also protested the forced resettlement policies of the Nazi and in 1943 successfully opposed the planned killing of the disabled and mentally impaired. Hundreds of Lithuanians, many of them Catholic laymen and religious, assisted the persecuted Jews in many ways. However, in the end only several thousand Jews survived the war in Lithuania, and the relative attitude—collaboration, resistance or indifference—of Lithuanian society, as well as that of the Church during the Holocaust, remained a controversial response. The accounts of survivors revealed that many who risked their lives to save Jews were motivated by a desire to do their Christian duty; on the other hand, some clergy did not escape the prevailing anti-Semitic attitudes partly motivated by the widespread belief that Jews had been active supporters of the hated Soviet regime.

The Church under Communism. Following Germany's defeat, Soviet armies returned in 1944 and under Josef Stalin immediately reactivated their atheistic and anticlerical policies. Soviet propaganda portrayed the Church as fascist, and an agent of the West. This spiritual oppression occurred against a backdrop of economic losses and violence within a totalitarian system alien to the religious traditions of Lithuania. The horrors of Stalin's rule represented a nadir in the modern history of the region. Mass deportations between 1945 and 1953 sent hundreds of Catholics, including several bishops, westward, or to Siberia and other remote regions of the USSR. Collectivization and a particularly bitter anti-Soviet guerrilla war raged in Lithuania during the late 1940s and early 1950s. Prohibitive taxes were levied against the Church and religious instruction in churches was banned. Church properties were nationalized and the buildings "leased" to the religious communities. In 1946, after Church leaders spoke out against the government's introduction of a system of government-controlled religious communities designed to subvert the parish system and undermine the clergy, Telšiai Bishop Vincentas Borisevičius was arrested and executed, Archbishop Reinys was exiled and the outspoken Bishop Teofilis Matulionis (1873–1962) of Kaišiadorys was imprisoned. By mid-1947, Kazimieras Paltarokas (1875-1958) was the only active bishop remaining in Lithuania.

Indicative of the greatly altered status of the Church in Lithuania, under Communist rule, was the decline in the number of churches, which dropped from 716 in 1940 to 604 by 1965. In all, about a third of the country's Catholic clergy were imprisoned or deported during the late 1940s. All the 324 chapels open in 1940 and all monastery churches had been closed by 1948. The 1,448 priests that worked in the country in 1940 had dropped to 869 by 1965.

A brief respite from oppression occurred under the government of Nikita Khrushchev (ruled 1953–64). In 1956 two bishops were restored (two others had died in prison); many priests and about 30,000 laymen were allowed to return to Lithuania. In 1955 two new bishops, Petras Maželis (1894–1966) and Julijonas Steponavičius (1911–92) were ordained and assigned to Telšiai and Vilnius respectively. For the first time since the war, limited official contact with the Holy See was permitted, and some Lithuanian clergy—although no bishops—were allowed to attend the Second Vatican Council. Unfortunately, Khrushchev's "thaw," as it was known, was short-lived, and repressive policies were again in place by the late 1950s, albeit without the mass terror of the Stalin years. By 1961 bishops Matulionis, Vincentas Sladkevičius (1920–2000) and Steponavičius were exiled from their dioceses, and a number of priests arrested. Atheist propaganda was reactivated. Even as the Soviet government sought to normalize relations with the Vatican, and the Holy See sought an "opening to the east," the Lithuanian Soviet regime launched an anti-Catholic campaign which reached its height in the 1960s and 1970s.

The Church Resists. In response to Soviet repression, a Catholic dissident movement emerged and gained strength in the 1970s. Its main vehicle was the Lietuvos Katalikų Bažnyčios Kronika ("The Chronicle of the Lithuanian Catholic Church"), which was one of the most important samizdat publications in the Soviet Union between 1972 and the late 1980s. Along with the Catholic Committee for the Defense of the Rights of Believers, organized in 1978, it detailed abuses of religious freedom, as well as the violation of human and national rights in Lithuania. Despite arrests, imprisonment and harassment of Catholic activists by the KGB, Soviet authorities were unable to eliminate the dissident movement. Catholic resistance to Soviet religious policy also opened up a split within the Church between elements in the hierarchy and clergy, who favored accommodation with the Soviet regime, and the Catholic dissident movement, which was closely allied to the growing Lithuanian movement to restore national sovereignty.

The upheavals of the Gorbachev era (1985–1991) in the USSR altered the role of the Church in Lithuania. The most egregious restrictions on religion were lifted in the late 1980s and effectively eliminated by 1990. Imprisoned Catholic activists and exiled prelates were released and allowed to resume their work, and Pope John Paul II appointed bishops to the country's diocese. Bishop Sladkevičius, named the country's first modern cardinal in June of 1988, joined other Church leaders in actively advocating for greater religious and national rights as embodied in the Lithuanian reform movement until his death in 2000. The Cathedral of Vilnius, which had been turned into an art gallery by the Soviets, was returned to the Church, and by 1989 virtually all legal restrictions on the Church were removed.

In March of 1990 the Lithuanian government proclaimed independence from the USSR. Under its constitution promulgated on Oct. 25, 1992, freedom of religion was guaranteed and traditional religions were granted government support. Among the new government's tasks, in the wake of decades of communist rule, was the need to restore Church property seized by the Soviet government, although lack of available government funds made this a lengthy process. Meanwhile, Church life began to return to normalcy. The Holy See opened a nunciature in Vilnius in 1992, and in May of 2000 signed accords establishing the juridical status of the Church in Lithuania. In September of 1993, Pope John Paul II visited Lithuania. Catholic instruction was once again permitted in public schools, and a number of private Catholic primary and secondary schools opened during the early 1990s. The Theological Seminary in Kaunas was expanded, and a new seminary opened in Telšiai. A rejuvenated Catholic press issued several popular periodicals, the largest being Katalikų pasaulis (Catholic World). In 1992 the Vatican appointed a career Vatican diplomat, Audrius Bačkis, as archbishop of Vilnius, that archdiocese now recognized as part of the Lithuanian ecclesiastical province.

By 2000 there were 649 parishes tended by 658 diocesan and 951 religious priests, and over 100 brothers and 990 sisters worked actively in the country, although an increase in evangelical Protestant and fundamentalist groups continued to challenge the Church's evangelical efforts. Although their numbers decreased dramatically as a result of the Holocaust, Lithuanian Jews opened a new synagogue in Vilnius in 1990. Reminded by this of their nation's role in the Holocaust, Church leaders publicly apologized in 2000, both for the indifference of some Catholics, as well as for all crimes committed against Jews by the Lithuanian people as a whole. Reemerging into capitalist society provided Church leaders with other causes of concern; during a 1996 statement, the Lithuanian Bishop's conference stated that problems such as organized crime, a declining birth rate, drug use, alcoholism and increased promiscuity would lead to "social depression, distrust of the government, and political indifference." Echoing these words, the pope noted during his 1999 ad limina visit with Lithuanian bishops, that after vanquishing communism, their task was now to battle "the seductive power of secularizaed and hedonistic models of life."

Bibliography: General literature. A. ŠAPOKA, Lietuvos istorija (Fellbach, Ger. 1950); Lithuania through the Ages (2d ed. Los Angeles 1955). C. R. JURGLA, History of the Lithuanian Nation (New York 1948). A. VISCONT, La Lithuanie religieuse (Geneva 1918). A. ALEKNA, Kataliku Bažnyčia Lietuvoje (Kaunas 1936). S. SALKAUSKIS, Sur les confins de deux mondes (Geneva 1919). A. M. AMMANN, Storia della Chiesa russa (Turin 1948), Ger. tr. (Vienna 1950). J. VAIŠNORA, Marijos garbinimas Lietuvoje (Rome 1958). P. RĖKLAITIS, Einführung in die Kunstgeschichtsforschung des Grossfürstentums Litauen (Marburg 1962). Bilan du Monde 2:890–893. Special topics. W. C. JASKIEWICZ, "A Study in Lithuanian Mythology," Studi Baltici, 9 (1952) 65–106. V. GIDŽIŪNAS, De Fratribus Minoribus in Lituania (Rome 1950). Z. IVINSKIS, "Mindaugas und seine Krone," Zeitschrift für Ostforschung, 3 (1954) 360–386. H. JABLONOWSKI, Westrussland zwischen Wilna und Moskau (Leiden 1955). O. HALECKI, From Florence to Brest, 1439-1596 (Rome 1958) 13-444. S. ROSTOWSKI, Lituanicarum Societatis Iesu historiarum libri decem (Paris 1877). A. ŠAPOKA, Lietuva ir Lenkija po 1569 metu Liublino unijos (Kaunas 1938). S. KOT, "La Réforme dans le Grand-Duché de Lithuanie," in Pankarpeia: Mélanges Henri Grégoire, ed. J. MOREAU, 4 v. (Brussels 1949-53) 4:201-261. J. LEBEDYS, Mikalojus Daukša (Vilna 1963). L. LESCOEUR, La Persécution de l'Église en Lithuanie (Paris 1873). A. BOUDOU, Le Saint Siège et la Russie, 1814-1883, 2 v. (Paris 1922–25). M. J. ROUËT DE JOURNEL, Nonciatures de Russie, 5 v. (Studi e Testi, 166-69, 194; 1922-57). J. PRUNSKIS, Comparative Law, Ecclesiastical and Civil, in Lithuanian Concordat (Washington 1945). W. KOLARZ, Religion in the Soviet Union (New York "Catholic Lithuania, Bishoprics and (1939–1961)," Expulsus, 9.2 (Konigstein Taunus, Ger. 1961) 8-19. J. SAVASIS, The War against God in Lithuania (New York 1966). A. KUČAS. "JAV lietuviai," in Lietuviu enciklopedija, v.10 (Boston 1957) 36-71. Lithuania under the Soviets, ed. V. S. VARDYS (New York 1965); "Human Rights Issues in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania," Journal of Baltic Studies, 12 (fall 1981) 275-98. M. BOURDEAUX, Land of Crosses (Chulmleigh UK 1980). P. DAUKNYS, The Resistance of the Catholic Church in Lithuania against Religious Persecution (Rome 1981). D. KINSELLA and R. TAAGEPERA, "Religious Incident Statistics for Soviet Lithuanian Schools," Journal of Baltic Studies, 15 (spring 1984) 27-47. A. LIEVEN, The Baltic Revolution: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and the Path to Independence (New Haven, CT 1993). R. J. MISIUNAS and R. TAAGEP-ERA, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence 1940-1990 (2d ed. Berkeley 1993). T. REMEIKIS, Opposition to Soviet Rule in Lithuania (Chicago 1980). A. E. SENN, Lithuania Awakening (Berkeley 1990). S. SUŽIEDĖLIS, The Sword and the Cross: A History of the Church in Lithuania (Huntington, IN 1988).

[P. RABIKAUSKAS/EDS.]

LITTA, ALFONSO AND LORENZO

Cardinals from a noble Milanese family; their careers touched the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries.

Alfonso; b. Milan, 1608; d. Rome, Aug. 28, 1679. He was governor of the Marches under Innocent X; he was created archbishop of Milan in May of 1652, and cardinal on Jan. 14, 1666. An intelligent and energetic prelate, he visited his diocese, held two synods (1659 and 1669), corrected disciplinary abuses of his clergy, and bravely defended ecclesiastical rights against representatives of the king of Spain. During his tenure, the Helvetic College, envisaged by St. Charles BORROMEO, was completed, and its administration reorganized. Alfonso attended the conclave that elected Innocent XI.

Lorenzo, diplomat; b. Milan, Feb. 23, 1756; d. Monteflavio, Sabina, May 1, 1820. After being educated at the Clementine College in Rome, he was ordained in 1789 and made titular archbishop of Thebes on June 23, 1793. When sent to Warsaw in 1794, he persuaded Tadeusz Kościuszko to respect the rights and liberties of the Church in Poland. In 1796 he attended the coronation of Paul I and was appointed legate to St. Petersburg. Greatly concerned with obtaining guarantees of Church rights, he persuaded Czar Paul to restore the Basilian Order and the Church property confiscated by Catherine II. Six dioceses of the Latin rite and three of the Ruthenian were reorganized, and on Nov. 15, 1798, the metropolitan sees of Mohilev and Polotsk were established. Forced to leave Russia in 1799, Lorenzo returned to Rome, where he held the office of papal treasurer and was made a cardinal by Pius VII on Oct. 23, 1801.

Loyal to the pope and opposed to Napoleon, expelled from Rome by Napoleon, he was exiled to Saint-Quentin on the Seine (1809), following his refusal to attend the second wedding of the emperor. While residing in Saint-Quentin, Fontainebleau, and Nimes, he translated the Bible into Italian and wrote letters refuting the Gallican Articles of 1682, which were published pseudonymously in Lyons (1818) as Lettres diverses. In 1814 he returned to Rome, was appointed prefect of Propaganda and suburbicarian bishop of Sabina; later, he became cardinal vicar of Rome (1818).

Bibliography: Alfonso. A. MONTI, Tre Secoli di Vita Milanese (Milan 1955). E. CAZZANI, Vescovi e Arcivescovi di Milano (Milan 1955) 257–260. A. POSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1083. Lorenzo. M. F. ROUÉT DE JOURNEL, Nonciature de Russie (Studi e Testi 167; 1943). V. MEYSZTOWICS, De archivio nuntiaturae varsaviensis quod nunc in Archivio Secreto Vaticano servatur (Vatican City 1944). P. PIERLING, La Russie et le Saint-Siège, 5 v. (Paris 1896–1912). A. POSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1083. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 9:785–787.

[E. J. THOMSON]

LITTLE, ANDREW GEORGE

British historian; b. Manchester, Oct. 10, 1863; d. Sevenoaks, Oct. 22, 1945. Lecturer and professor of history at Cardiff (1892–1901) and reader in paleography at Manchester (1904–28), he was the founder and general editor of the British Society of Franciscan Studies. Between 1907 and its dissolution in 1937 the society published 22 volumes, the last being Franciscan History and Legend in English Franciscan Art, which Little edited. His chief works were The Grey Friars at Oxford (Oxford 1892); Initia operum latinorum (Manchester 1904), a collection of 6,000 incipit of medieval manuscripts; Studies in English Franciscan History (Manchester 1917); and Oxford Theology and Theologians 1282–1302 (Oxford 1934, with F. Pelster). He also edited THOMAS OF ECCLESTON'S Tractatus de adventu Fratrum Minorum in Angliam (2d ed. Manchester 1951); the Liber exemplorum, a medieval Franciscan manual for preachers; part of JOHN PECKHAM's Tractatus de paupertate; and some hitherto unknown Leonine material concerning St. FRAN-CIS that he himself discovered (in Collectanea Franciscana 1). Most of the histories of the English friaries in the Victoria County Histories were by him, and he contributed to the Cambridge Medieval History, v. 6; the Archivum Franciscanum Historicum; and Proceedings of the British Academy; the Transactions of the Royal Historical Society; and the English Historical Review, for which, between 1889 and 1945, he wrote 50 articles. His more important essays were republished in his last book, Franciscan Papers, Lists and Documents (Manchester 1943). Little was a witty and brilliant teacher and inspired many books besides his own. His kindliness, unselfishness, and generosity won him many friends among his colleagues and pupils and among foreign scholars such as Paul SABATIER and the Franciscans of QUARACCHI.

Bibliography: Annual Register n.s. (Toronto 1945) 428–429. F. M. POWICKE, A. G. Little, 1863–1945 (London 1947).

[D. L. DOUIE]

at the foot of the cross on Calvary in the company of Mary. In union with the maternal heart of Mary, the sisters devote themselves to nurse the sick and the dying with maternal care. The foundress, Mother Mary POTTER, was born in London. In 1877 she and five companions founded the first convent of the Little Company of Mary in an abandoned factory in Hyson-Green, Nottingham, England. From this humble beginning in home nursing, the institute has spread throughout the world and now maintains many modern hospitals in North and South America, Australia, New Zealand, Korea, Scotland, England, Malta, Ireland, South Africa, and Italy, including one at the motherhouse in Rome.

In 1893 the sisters accepted a foundation in Chicago, Ill., where they opened their first U.S. mission. For many years the house in Chicago was the center of busy home nursing activities. In 1930 the sisters transferred to the suburban area of Evergreen Park, where they staffed their first hospital in the U.S., and where the U.S. provincialate is located. The generalate is in London, England.

[M. J. SCHLAX/EDS.]

LITTLE BROTHERS OF JESUS

(LBJ) A religious congregation with simple, perpetual vows, founded in 1933 by Father René Voillaume in South Oran, Algeria. It was made a diocesan congregation in 1936 by Bishop Nouet, Prefect Apostolic of Ghardaïa, Algeria. Its ideals are those of Charles de FOUCAULD. In their apostolate the Little Brothers seek to conform to the economic and social milieu where they live. Their stress is on manual labor among the laboring classes. They dwell in communities of three to five members and work mostly in factories and fisheries, among the poor and marginalized. The Little Brothers had established communities in Europe, Africa, Asia, and South America.

Bibliography: R. VOILLAUME, Seeds of the Desert, tr. W. HILL (Chicago 1955); Lettres aux Fraternités, 2 v. (Paris 1960). M. CARROUGES, Le Père de Foucauld et les fraternités d'aujourd'hui (Paris 1963).

[A. J. WOUTERS/EDS.]

LITTLE COMPANY OF MARY

(LCM, Official Catholic Directory #2270); a papal institute of nursing sisters familiarly known as Blue Nuns, in many parts of the English-speaking world, because of their distinctive blue habit. The sisters have adopted their official title from the small group who stood

LITTLE HOURS

Historically, the Divine Office of the Roman Catholic Church comprised the Little Hours of Prime, Terce, Sext, and None. These hours have been so called because they have never had as great an importance in the daily cursus as LAUDS and VESPERS. In fact, for centuries they were commonly not prayed at all outside of monasteries. It was only in the middle of the eighth century that their obligatory recitation by all clerics in the West started.

In the Roman Empire, daytime was divided into twelve hours. These hours varied in length according to the season of the year. The third hour, terce, began at midmorning; the sixth, sext, at midday; and the ninth, none, at midafternoon. Since these were the principal divisions of the day, it was only natural that some effort be made to raise the mind to God at these times.

Terce, Sext, and None are older than Prime. Already at the beginning of the third century Hippolytus (d. c. 235) and Tertullian (d. c. 220) commended private prayer at these hours. Tertullian cited the example of the Apostles in Acts 2.15, 10.9, and 3.1–7 as justification for consecrating these hours to prayer. Hence, they were frequently called the apostolic prayers. By the fifth century the monks and the devoti had turned these prayer times into formal periods of public prayer in many places. The sixth-century Rule of St. Benedict shows that these hours then had practically the same format as they have today. After the usual introductory versicles there is a short hymn, whose content is determined by the time of day for the recitation of that particular hour. The rest of the hour follows the customary pattern: psalmody, a short reading, responsory, and prayer. The three Psalms of each hour are taken in order from the Psalter without reference to the time of day or the festal theme.

Prime was the last hour introduced. John Cassian (d. 435) tells of its introduction in a monastery in Bethlehem. The monks had formed the habit of returning to bed after Lauds until time for Terce. To get them up earlier for the morning work the abbot introduced Prime. Its quasiprivate nature was long evident from the fact that it was prayed not in the oratory but in the dormitory. For some time it had the same structure as the other Little Hours. Chrodegang of Metz (d. 766) is the first witness to the addition of the Officium Capituli, the appendix that is peculiar to Prime; it was in reality a monastic chapter meeting. The day's martyrology was read, the day's work was distributed, a chapter of the rule was read, and the abbot closed the meeting with his blessing. Thus, as the hymn for Prime indicates, this hour became a consecration of the day's work and activity.

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (89) of Vatican Council II decreed a revision of the Office, and ordered the suppression of Prime in the revision. It also said it will be lawful outside choir to select one of the other three Little Hours according to the respective time of day. This change came about because historical studies had pointed up the fact that Prime was an unnecessary duplication of Lauds and, along with the other Little Hours, had not been binding on the secular clergy for a long time.

Bibliography: P. SALMON, The Breviary through the Centuries, tr. D. MARY (Collegeville, Minn. 1962). J. A. JUNGMANN, Pastoral Liturgy (New York 1962); Public Worship: A Survey, tr. C. HOWELL (Collegeville, Minn. 1957). P. PARSCH, The Breviary Explained, tr. W. NAYDEN and C. HOEGERL (St. Louis 1952). S. CAMPBELL, From Breviary to Liturgy of the Hours: The Structural Reform of the Roman Office 1964–1971 (Collegeville 1995). G. GUIVER, Company of Voices: Daily Prayer and the People of God (New York 1988). R. TAFT, The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West: The Origins of the Divine Office and Its Meaning for Today, 2d rev. ed. (Collegeville 1993).

[G. SCHIDEL/EDS.]

LITTLE MISSIONARY SISTERS OF CHARITY

(LMSC, Official Catholic Directory #2290); in Italian, Piccole Suore Missionarie della Carità, a congregation with papal approval (1957), founded at Tortona, Italy, in 1915 by Don Luigi Orione as a part of his program called the Little work of Divine Providence. The purpose of the congregation was to perform works of charity among the poor, orphaned, aged, and the mentally and physically handicapped. The sisters are engaged in teaching, nursing, and social and catechetical work in Italy, Poland, Spain, England, Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, and Brazil. The sisters first arrived in the U.S. in 1949. The general motherhouse is in Rome. Don Orione founded a cloistered branch within the community when, in 1927, he organized the Perpetual Adorers of the Most Blessed Sacrament. This group is made up of blind persons who live a contemplative life, devoted mainly to prayer before the Blessed Sacrament.

[T. F. CASEY/EDS.]

LITTLE OFFICE OF THE BVM

An abridged version of the Common Office of the Blessed Virgin in the Divine Office that was historically recited on most feasts of Our Lady. It began as a votive office in the early Middle Ages. Alcuin (d. 804) composed and propagated votive Masses for the various days of the week and included a Saturday Mass in honor of Our Lady. A complementary votive office also may have been introduced, for usages adopted during this period of the Carolingian renaissance were longlasting. At any rate, there is 10th-century evidence of the daily recitation of this office by Bernerius, provost of the Cathedral of Verdun, and by Ulric, bishop of Augsburg (d. 973), which would indicate that the devotion was already widespread.

Peter Damian (d. 1072), one of the most influential churchmen of his century, reorganized this office and strongly commended its daily recitation. By the 12th century it was in use throughout Europe and was often made obligatory for both regular and secular clergy except on greater feasts. This office was also the core of the various Books of Hours, the popular prayer books of the laity in the Middle Ages. Pius V (d. 1572) removed all general obligation, limiting it to certain monastic groups. Pius X abolished the obligation. The 1952 revision of this office retained the same psalms, canticles, and hymns, but offered greater variety than the old edition by adding special lessons, responsories, little chapters, antiphons, and collects.

See Also: MARIAN ANTIPHONS

Bibliography: L. EISENHOFER and J. LECHNER, The Liturgy of the Roman Rite, tr. A. J. and E. F. PEELER from the 6th Germ. ed., ed. H. E. WINSTONE (New York 1961) 473–474. J. H. MILLER, Fundamentals of the Liturgy (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960) 343–344. A. HÄUSSLING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1119.

[G. E. SCHIDEL/EDS.]

LITTLE ROCK, DIOCESE OF

The Diocese of Little Rock (Dioecesis Petriculana), upon the recommendation of the Fifth Provincial Council of Baltimore, was erected by Pope Gregory XVI on Nov. 28, 1843. It is coextensive with the boundaries of the state of ARKANSAS, and until 1891 when a vicariate apostolic was established in Oklahoma, it included the Indian Territory. In its early years it was a suffragan see of the Archdiocese of New Orleans, but in 1972 it was transferred to the newly created province of Oklahoma City. In its more than 150 years of existence, Little Rock has only had six bishops, with the sixth assuming his position in 2000.

Bishop Byrne Era, 1844-1866. Arkansas's first bishop, Andrew BYRNE, like his successor, was born in Ireland, but the exact date is unknown. Given that he was baptized Andrew, it is likely that he was born on or near Nov. 30, 1802, the feast day of St. Andrew the Apostle. While still a seminarian, he was brought by Bishop John England to Charleston and the famed South Carolina prelate ordained him to the priesthood on Nov. 11, 1827. Nine years later he left to became a diocesan priest for the New York Diocese, where he founded St. Andrew's Church in Manhattan. Byrne's abilities as a pastor, his connection with Bishop John Hughes of New York, and his previous experience in the South made him the natural choice to be a prelate on the southwestern frontier. Consecrated on March 11, 1844, in old St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City, Byrne arrived in Arkansas with just two priests. Byrne raised the money necessary to build Arkansas's first Catholic Cathedral at Second and Center Streets in Little Rock and dedicated it on Nov. 1, 1846.

Throughout his 18 years as bishop, Byrne never had more than ten priests to work with him and his diocese, which was sustained basically by the Leopoldine Society in Vienna and the Paris-based Society for the Propagation of the Faith. With funds from these societies, he purchased land near Fort Smith and there placed Arkansas's first Catholic college, St. Andrew's. Byrne judiciously avoided religious disputes with fellow Arkansans, and this was not easy during the Know-Nothing uproar in the 1850s. Byrne owned no slaves and never expressed any views on the peculiar institution, probably accepting it as part of the economic landscape of the American South. Byrne sought to augment his minuscule Catholic flock by attracting immigrants from famine ravaged Ireland. The Religious Sisters of Mercy, a newly formed Irish-based community, answered his call. In February 1851 the first groups of sisters arrived and that fall founded St. Mary's Academy in Little Rock. This Mercy academy became Arkansas's oldest educational institution, celebrating its sesquicentennial in 2001. The Mercy sisters also founded St. Anne's Academy in Fort Smith (1853), and St. Catherine's Academy in Helena (1858).

At first, the Diocese of Little Rock was attached to the archdiocesan province of Baltimore. In 1850 the diocese became part of the newly created province of New Orleans, together with dioceses that then covered the states of Mississippi, Alabama, and Texas, and, after 1853, northern Louisiana. Byrne attended provincial councils in New Orleans early in 1856 and 1860.

The American Civil War brought about the close of Arkansas's first Catholic college in 1861 and Byrne died the next year on June 10, 1862, in Helena. At first buried in the courtyard of St. Catherine's Mercy convent, his remains were removed and placed under a newly constructed St. Andrew's Cathedral in 1881. Due to the exigencies of the Civil War, communications between Rome and the embattled Confederacy were difficult. Arkansas would not see another bishop for almost five years, one of the longest times in American history for a diocese to be without a bishop. Until Rome named a new bishop, it would be the responsibility of New Orleans Archbishop Jean Odin to name an apostolic administrator. Yet Odin was in Europe at that time and was not expected to return until the spring of 1863. It was then up to the senior bishop in the province and that was Bishop Auguste Martin of Natchitoches, Louisiana. Martin appointed Fr. Patrick Reilly, vicar general for the diocese, as the administrator for the Arkansas diocese.

Born on March 10, 1817, in County Meath, Ireland, Reilly was a seminarian in Ireland when he heard Bishop Byrne plead for missionaries for Arkansas. Reilly arrived in 1851 with two other seminarians and the Mercy sisters; the Arkansas bishop ordained him on St. Patrick's Day, 1851. Reilly began serving as vicar general in 1855 and as rector of the Cathedral of St. Andrew in 1858. He tried earnestly to keep the diocese going and its institutions open during the Civil War. All three Mercy academies in Little Rock, Fort Smith, and Helena remained opened throughout the war. Mercy sisters ministered to both Union and Confederate troops in the fall of 1863 when the battle raged around Arkansas's capital. Between 1863 and 1866, there would be only four priests working in the state. News arrived in the summer of 1866 via a Catholic newspaper in Cincinnati that Fr. Edward M. Fitzgerald of St. Patrick's Church in Columbus, Ohio, would become Arkansas's second Catholic prelate. Reilly remained vicar general under the new bishop until poor health moved him to return to Ireland in 1881. He died in his native village on April 29, 1882.

Bishop Fitzgerald Era, 1866–1906. Edward M. FITZGERALD was born in Limerick of an Irish father and a German mother sometime in October 1833. He arrived in America with his family in 1849 and the following year entered St. Mary of the Barrens Seminary in Perryville, Missouri. Two years later he transferred to St. Mary's Seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio, where Archbishop John Purcell of Cincinnati ordained him to the priesthood on Aug. 22, 1857. His only assignment as a priest was at a parish in Columbus, Ohio. On June 22, 1866, he received a letter from the Vatican naming him the second bishop of Little Rock. The 32-year-old priest initially rejected the appointment in a written response two months later. That December he received from Pope Pius IX a mandamus, an order to accept the position under holy obedience. Fitzgerald had by that time already changed his mind after attending the Second Plenary Council of the American Catholic bishops at Baltimore with Archbishop Purcell in October 1866. Consecrated bishop on Feb. 3, 1867, in Columbus, Ohio, Fitzgerald made it to Little Rock by St. Patrick's Day. Barely 33, he was the youngest prelate in the Catholic hierarchy of the United States, if not the world.

In late 1869 Fitzgerald was called to the First Vatican Council and needed financial assistance from Rome to attend. The Little Rock prelate earned a footnote in Catholic history by being one of only two bishops in the whole world—and the only English-speaking bishop—to vote against the declaration of papal infallibility made at this council. He was the first negative vote after 491 affirmations. Immediately after the vote he went to the front and submitted to the council's decision. In a public address a decade later, Fitzgerald explained that while he always believed in the doctrine, he did not think it expedient to declare it as it might hinder Catholic evangelization in the United States. His vote did not damage his career in the church. Pope Leo XIII, successor to Pius IX, offered him the archdioceses of Cincinnati and New Orleans, along with three or four other dioceses. Fitzgerald, however, stubbornly spurned all efforts to promote him or transfer him out of Little Rock.

Fitzgerald's career as bishop was an active one that spanned more than three decades. When he came in 1867 he had only six priests; by 1900 that number was 21 diocesan priests and 22 religious order priests belonging to the Order of St. Benedict or the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. New women's religious orders also arrived; what would become the Fort Smith Benedictines came in 1878, and the women who would become the Olivetan Benedictines arrived late in 1887. By the end of the 19th century, he had four women's religious orders, with 150 religious sisters, serving in the state. He had only two seminarians in 1867; by 1900 he had 25 studying at Subiaco Benedictine Monastery in Logan County, Arkansas. Arkansas's first Catholic hospital, St. Vincent's, opened in Little Rock in 1888, staffed then by the Sisters of Charity from Nazareth, Kentucky; it is still the state's oldest medical facility. The Mercy sisters opened St. Joseph's in Hot Springs in 1888, and the Olivetan Benedictines in Jonesboro opened St. Bernard's in 1900. Five years later, the Mercy sisters would open another hospital, St. Edward's, in Fort Smith. Fitzgerald constructed Arkansas's present St. Andrew's Cathedral at Seventh and Louisiana and dedicated it on Nov. 27, 1881.

Fitzgerald was instrumental in attracting some Catholic migration to the state and attempting to convert African Americans to Catholicism. Fitzgerald opened Arkansas's first black Catholic parish, in Pine Bluff in 1895, and had six black Catholic schools opened by that date, but only two were still operating a decade later. All his efforts yielded few results as the Arkansas Catholic population still stood at just one percent, virtually unchanged since 1860. On Jan. 17, 1900, Fitzgerald's active career came to an end; he suffered a stroke that kept him confined to St. Joseph's Hospital for the rest of his life. He celebrated his fortieth anniversary as bishop from his hospital bed in Hot Springs, just 18 days before he died on Feb. 21, 1907. His remains were placed under the cathedral he had built a quarter century earlier.

During Fitzgerald's confinement, the affairs of the diocese were conducted by Vicar General Fr. Fintan Kraemer, O.S.B. Kraemer was not an apostolic administrator because Fitzgerald was still alive and there was hope that he might recover. When that was no longer deemed likely, bishops of the New Orleans province recommended that the Vatican name his successor. On May 14, 1906, John B. Morris, then the vicar general for the Diocese of Nashville, Tennessee, received word that he was to become coadjutor bishop for Little Rock with right of succession upon Fitzgerald's death.

Bishop Morris Era, 1906-1946. Born near Hendersonville, Tennessee, on June 29, 1866, John Morris's parents were Irish immigrants; his father was a veteran of the Union army. They sent their eldest son to St. Mary College in Lebanon, Kentucky, where he earned a degree in 1887 and a year later entered the seminary to study for the Nashville diocese. Bishop Joseph Rademacher sent him to Rome where he was ordained to the priesthood on June 11, 1892. He returned to Tennessee in 1894. Bishop Thomas S. Byrne named him his personal secretary in 1895 and then rector of the cathedral in Nashville. In 1900 Morris was given the rank of monsignor and made vicar general for the Nashville diocese. Consecrated Arkansas's third bishop in Nashville on June 11, 1906, he was the first native-born Tennessean to be a member of the Catholic hierarchy.

Morris served as coadjutor bishop, running the diocese as soon as he came in the summer of 1906. When Fitzgerald died the following February, Morris automatically became his successor. Morris inherited a great deal of money from Fitzgerald and he used it to build up many Catholic institutions in the state. He started Little Rock College in 1908 in downtown Little Rock; it moved eight years later to Pulaski Heights, seven miles away. This attempt at Arkansas's second Catholic college would last only 22 years, as the outset of the Great Depression closed it. St. Joseph's Orphanage near North Little Rock opened in the fall of 1909 and it lasted for more than 60 years. Morris launched St. John's Home Mission Seminary in 1911 to train seminarians for both his diocese and others. When Little Rock College closed in 1930, Morris moved the seminary to the campus in Pulaski Heights. During the depression Morris opened St. Raphael's, a black Catholic orphanage near Pine Bluff, in 1932, but the institution was forced to close five years later. Blacks were reluctant to send their children to an organization run by whites and operated by a church to which they did not belong. St. Raphael's operated as a trade school until 1961. One heritage from Morris that has survived is the weekly diocesan newspapers that began publishing in 1911 and continued to operate at the start of the 21st century.

Institutionally, the Diocese of Little Rock grew during the four decades Morris was its bishop. In 1906 there were 60 priests and 200 sisters; four decades later there were 154 priests and 582 sisters. Where in 1906 there 29 schools with 2,702 students, by 1946 there were 80 schools with 7,750 students. And these schools were not only white schools. Morris had found only two black Catholic schools operating in 1906; by 1946 there were nine black Catholic parishes and seven of them had schools. From 1905 to 1945, the number of Catholic hospitals operating in the diocese increased from four to nine, with a bed capacity of a thousand. The number of Catholics in Arkansas did increase somewhat, going from just 1 percent in 1900 to 1.7 percent by 1940.

Known as a gifted orator, Bishop Morris was often asked to make speeches inside and outside of the diocese. In October 1932 he spoke at the dedication of the new building at Xavier University in New Orleans, the only predominately black Catholic college in the United States. In 1937 he gave one of the main addresses on the pope at the 1937 Eucharistic Congress in New Orleans. After an invitation from the American Legion in Arkansas, Morris gave a sharply worded attack on Nazi anti-Semitism after Kristallnacht in November 1938. Although his remarks were hardly noticed outside of Arkansas, no other American Catholic prelate made such a verbal broadside against Nazism at that time.

Morris's declining health forced him to ask for an auxiliary bishop. The Vatican agreed and they named the Little Rock bishop's candidate, Vicar General Albert Lewis Fletcher. Fletcher was born in Little Rock on Oct. 28, 1896. His father was a member of one of Arkansas's most prominent families and his mother was of German background. Both his parents were converts and Albert was their oldest child. His father was a physician who moved his family from Little Rock to Paris (Ark.) in Logan County and Tontitown in Washington County. Albert Fletcher was graduated in 1917 from Little Rock College with a degree in chemistry. He immediately entered St. John's Seminary and was ordained to the priesthood on June 4, 1920. He then attended the University of Chicago, which awarded him a master's degree in chemistry in 1922. He taught chemistry at Little Rock College and eventually served as its president for two years. In 1926 he became chancellor for the diocese and seven years later Morris appointed him vicar general. He was notified of his appointment on Dec. 11, 1939, and, on April 25, 1940, at a ceremony at St. Andrew's Cathedral in Little Rock, he became auxiliary bishop. He was the first native-born Arkansan to be raised to the American Catholic hierarchy.

Morris continued to head the diocese over the next six years, yet day-to-day operations were performed by his auxiliary bishop. The aging prelate lived to witness the centennial of the diocese on Nov. 28, 1943, and he celebrated his fortieth anniversary as bishop in June 1946. He died a few months later on Oct. 22, 1946, and his remains were placed under the cathedral. As auxiliary bishop, Fletcher did not have the right of succession. On Dec. 11, 1946, he was notified by telephone that he was to be the fourth bishop for the Diocese of Little Rock. He was formally consecrated on Feb. 11, 1947, at St. Andrew's Cathedral.

Bishop Fletcher Era, 1947–1972. Both his predecessors, Fitzgerald and Morris, had been builders who had each served as bishop for 40 years. Fletcher, a mildmannered, soft-spoken gentleman, came to serve as Arkansas's Catholic prelate in a tumultuous quarter century of racial and religious change.

Fletcher's first decade rather quiet, the seminary was expanded, a Catholic bookstore opened, and the number of Catholics in Arkansas topped two percent in 1860 for the first time in history.

A major storm erupted over the integration of Little Rock public schools in the fall of 1957. Though often cautious and slow, Fletcher believed in gradual peaceful integration. He published a catechism deploring racial segregation and discrimination as violations of justice and charity. He oversaw the integration of Catholic schools and hospitals, but one unintended consequence was the closing of several black Catholic parishes and schools between 1962 and 1972.

Fletcher attended all four sessions of the Second Vatican Council, which met during the autumns of 1962-65. While he never addressed the council, he wrote 13 interventions or amendments, and nine were accepted by the council. After the council, Bishop Fletcher and a priest professor at St. John's seminary got into a dispute concerning a series of articles the priest published in the local newspaper. The priest asserted incorrectly in the spring of 1967 that the papacy would change its views of birth control, which would lead to the "demythologizing" of the papal office. Bishop Fletcher suspended him and the priest appealed to Rome, which decided in favor of the bishop the following year. That summer of 1967, Bishop Fletcher closed St. John's because of the difficulty in getting new qualified faculty to teach. The old seminary grounds became home to the chancery, diocesan offices, and the Catholic newspaper.

Like Morris, Bishop Fletcher asked for an auxiliary bishop and the Vatican agreed to name Fletcher's close associate, Lawrence P. Graves to the position. Graves was born in Texarkana, Arkansas, on May 16, 1916. He entered St. John's Seminary in 1936 and was sent to Rome for his theological education in 1938. He returned from Rome in 1940 and was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Morris in June 1942. Graves eventually went to Catholic University of America to earn a master's degree in 1947 in canon law. He returned to begin teaching in the seminary until 1961 when Bishop Fletcher choose him to travel with him to the Second Vatican Council; Graves was also serving then as chancellor. On April 25, 1969, at St. Andrew's Cathedral, he became the second native Arkansan to become a Catholic bishop. New rules mandated that a bishop retire at the age of 75. Bishop Fletcher submitted his resignation to Rome in January 1972, perhaps hoping that the Vatican would name his auxiliary bishop his successor. History did not repeat itself as Rome named a priest from Savannah, Georgia as Arkansas's fifth bishop. After his retirement, Fletcher lived in his home in Little Rock until declining health forced him to be moved to the rectory next to St. Andrew's Cathedral. He collapsed at a local diner on Dec. 6, 1979, and was rushed to hospital where he was pronounced dead. He was buried with his predecessors under the cathedral. Auxiliary Bishop Graves was later named bishop of Alexandria-Shreveport in 1973, but he had to retire after nine years due to ill health. He died in Alexandria, Louisiana, in January 1994.

Bishop McDonald Era, 1972–2000. Andrew J. McDonald was the 11th of 12 children and was born on Oct. 24, 1923, in Savannah, Georgia; he attended major and minor seminaries in Baltimore. On May 8, 1948, he was ordained a priest for the Diocese of Savannah. He earned a degree in canon law at the Catholic University of America in 1949 and then was sent to Rome for two additional years of theology. Returning to Savannah in 1951, Mc-Donald served as chancellor and pastor at one of the largest parishes in Savannah. Notified of his appointment as bishop of Little Rock on June 11, 1972, he was consecrated bishop at Savannah's St. John the Baptist Cathedral on September 5 of that year.

In time McDonald became noted for his concern for the poor, the unborn, and immigrants, and as one who made a strong effort to better relations with non-Catholic religious groups. In 1982 the Catholic Diocese of Little Rock became a member of the Arkansas Interfaith Conference of Churches and Synagogues. During McDonald's era a lay couple, Fred and Tammy Woell, launched the Little Rock Scripture Study Program in the summer of 1974. Aided by diocesan priests and Benedictine Jerome Kodell, a scripture scholar, they prepared materials for individual and group study. In 1977 Bishop McDonald gave his official approval for the program and it offices moved into the old seminary, the headquarters for the various diocesan agencies. By 1986 the program entered a partnership with the Liturgical Press in Collegeville, Minnesota, which distributes the program across the United States and throughout the Englishspeaking world. On Nov. 28, 1993, the diocese began a year-long celebration of its sesquicentennial anniversary. Along with the celebration, the diocese published the first history of Catholic Church in Arkansas. On Nov. 1, 1996, Bishop McDonald commemorated the 150th anniversary of the dedication of the first cathedral and the 296th anniversary of the first Mass ever said in the state of Arkansas.

Although Bishop McDonald reached the age of 75 in October 1998, the mandatory retirement age, he continued in office until January 2000, when it was announced that his successor would be the Reverend J(ames) Peter Sartain, a pastor in the Diocese of Memphis. Born June 6, 1952, in Memphis, he began his seminary training in 1971 at St. Meinrad Archabbey in Indiana. He studied theology in Rome and was ordained to the priesthood in October 1978. Up to the time he was named the sixth bishop for the Diocese of Little Rock, Sartain had served in various capacities in Memphis—pastor, chancellor, and vicar general. It would be up to this native of Memphis, Tennessee, to lead the Diocese of Little Rock into the second millennium.

Bibliography: DIOCESAN HISTORICAL COMMISSION, The History of Catholicity in Arkansas (Little Rock, Ark. 1925). J. M. WOODS, Mission and Memory: A History of the Catholic Church in Arkansas (Little Rock, Ark. 1993).

[J. M. WOODS]

LITTLE SISTERS OF JESUS

An international religious congregation of religious women founded in 1939 in the Sahara at Touggort, Algeria, by Little Sister Magdeleine of Jesus. Characterized as contemplatives living in the world, the sisters pursue a simple life, after the examples of Charles de FOUCAULD. Their spirituality, centered around the adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, is modeled on the hidden life of Jesus at Bethlehem and Nazareth. They do not undertake an organized apostolate, but earn their living by manual labor on farms, in factories, and in hospitals. They live in ordinary dwellings in small communities comprising persons of diverse races and nationalities. Located in many countries throughout the world, the Sisters seek to live especially among the Islamic peoples. The motherhouse is in Rome; in the U.S., the principal house is in Baltmore, Maryland. At the beginning of the 21st century, the Sisters numbered some 1,300 in about 70 countries.

Bibliography: Official Catholic Directory, #2330.

[A.-M. BOUCHER/A.J. WOUTERS]

LITTLE SISTERS OF THE ASSUMPTION

(LSA, Official Catholic Directory #2310); a congregation of nursing sisters who bring relief to the homes of the needy sick, gratuitously, and regardless of race or creed. The congregation was founded in Paris, France, in 1865 and approved by Leo XIII in 1897. The cofounders were Étienne PERNET, an Assumptionist, and Marie Antoinette Fage (1824–83).

Mlle. Fage was a member of the Association of Our Lady of Good Counsel, a charitable society in Paris. When Pernet met her, he put her in charge of the work of nursing the sick poor, which he had inaugurated. Out of this movement the sisterhood grew; Mlle. Fage, as Mother Marie de Jesus, became the first superior. Along with complete nursing care, the Little Sisters also assume the responsibility of the management of the home whenever necessary, and give assistance where family life is threatened with disunity. The community follows the Rule of St. Augustine and is governed by a superior general who resides in the motherhouse in Paris, France. The U.S. provincialate is in Walden, NY.

[J. IONE]

LITTLE SISTERS OF THE HOLY FAMILY

(Les Petites Soeurs de la Sainte Famille, PSSF, Official Catholic Directory #2320); a congregation with papal approbation, founded in Canada in 1880 for the purpose of providing domestic help for the clergy. The foundress, Alodie Virginie Paradis (1840–1912), was born in Nova Scotia and joined the Holy Cross Sisters at the age of 13. After 20 years as a teacher, Mother Marie Leonie (her name in religion) was put in charge of the domestic work at St. Joseph's College, Memramcook, New Brunswick. Finding that there were many young women eager to join her in this work, Mother Leonie decided, with the advice and help of Camille Lefebvre, a Holy Cross priest, to form a new community. In 1895 the novitiate was transferred to Sherbrooke, Quebec, where the motherhouse was later established. The sisters devoted themselves exclusively to work in the kitchens, laundries, and sacristies of colleges, seminaries, and episcopal residences. The first foundation in the U.S. was made in 1890. The motherhouse is in Sherbrooke, Quebec. The U.S. headquarters is in Lowell, Mass.

[A. J. ENNIS/EDS.]

LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR

The Congregation of the Little Sisters of the Poor (Official Catholic Directory #2340) was founded in 1839 at St. Servan, Brittany, France, by Jeanne JUGAN. The spirit of the Congregation is that of humility, evangelical simplicity, and confidence in Divine Providence. Its apostolate is the care of the elderly poor.

Jeanne Jugan, a 47-year-old Cancalaise woman, founded the Congregation some time during the winter of 1839 when she opened her small St. Servan apartment to an elderly, blind, paralyzed woman who had no one to care for her. Jeanne and Françoise Aubert, a pious woman with whom she shared her apartment, soon welcomed a second woman; by 1843 there were forty old women under their care, and the group had moved to larger accommodations. Three young women came to help with the work, and they were aided materially by sympathetic persons in the community. In 1841 Jeanne herself began the practice of going from town-to-town and door-todoor to beg alms for her poor. In 1842 Jeanne Jugan was elected superior of the young community, which adopted the name "Servants of the Poor." This name changed to "Sisters of the Poor" in 1844, and then "Little Sisters of the Poor" in 1849.

As the community grew, the work quickly spread to other towns and cities in France and beyond. Formal diocesan approbation was given by the bishop of Rennes in 1852, and papal approbation was accorded by Pope Pius IX on July 9, 1854. At that time the Congregation numbered 500 Little Sisters and 36 houses, including foundations in England and Belgium. The motherhouse was established at La Tour St. Joseph, in the village of St. Pern, in 1856. The Constitutions of the Congregation were approved by Pope Leo XIII on March 1, 1879. Jeanne Jugan died at La Tour St. Joseph on August 29 of the same year. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II in Rome on Oct. 3, 1982.

The first American foundation of the Congregation was made in Brooklyn, New York, in 1868. Within four years, thirteen homes were established in the United States. At the end of the 20th century, there were more than 30 homes in North America. Worldwide, there were about 3,600 Little Sisters caring for the elderly in 30 countries in addition to the United States: Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Benin, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Congo, England, France, Hong Kong, India, Ireland, Italy, Kenya, Malaysia, Malta, New Caledonia, New Zealand, Nigeria, Portugal, Scotland, Singapore, South Korea, Spain, Sri Lanka, Taiwan, Turkey, and Western Samoa.

The Little Sisters practice the three traditional vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, and a special fourth vow of hospitality, by which they devote their lives solely to the care of the aged poor. An association of consecrated lay women, known as the Fraternity Jeanne Jugan, was begun in 1958 for those who wished to collaborate closely with the Little Sisters in their apostolate while retaining their lay status. This collaboration with the laity was expanded in 1998, with the approbation of statutes for a new initiative, the Association Jeanne Jugan, which offers to lay men and women the opportunity of sharing in the spirit and apostolate of the Little Sisters of the Poor and of deepening their Christian faith.

The Congregation is governed by a Superior General and a Council of six Assistants General. Each of the 20 provinces is governed by a Provincial Superior, in close collaboration with the Superior General and her Council. Provincial houses for the United States are located in Queens Village, NY, Baltimore, MD, and Palatine, IL.

[C. CAROLYN]

LITURGICAL ACCLAMATIONS

Origin and history. The word acclamation originates from the Latin, acclamation, adclamation, conclamation, vox, etc.; and the Greek euphēmia, euphēmēsis, polychronion, polychronisma. The term was used to designate a formula pronounced or sung by a group to express a common sentiment or to address a specific person or object. Acclamations, widely used in the ancient world in pagan cults, have also been in evidence in Judaism, Islam, and Buddhism. In both Western and Eastern Christendom, acclamations developed independently as expressions of homage and recognition of both spiritual and temporal dignitaries. They have been an important element in Christian liturgy throughout its development.

From early usage, acclamations were simple refrains or exclamations which were often sung. Ideally, an acclamation is an expression of the religious unison, or koinonia, of the faithful community. Werner identifies three functions of acclamations: (1) demonstrating the active participation of the community; (2) loudly confirming and professing a common faith; and (3) providing outlets for spontaneous expressions of religious emotion.

Several places in the Hebrew Scriptures record the use of "Amen" as an expression of affirmation or oath. Examples include Dt 27:15-26 and 1 Chr 16:36 or Ps 72:19 and Ps 106:48. All four Gospels record the public acclamation of "Hosanna" with which the crowds greeted Jesus at his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. Early Christians with Jewish roots naturally carried over their use of "Amen" in Jewish worship into their celebration of Christian liturgy.

Contemporary Usage. The liturgical renewal begun by Vatican II was instrumental in retrieving the important role of acclamations in Roman Catholic worship. Music in Catholic Worship (article 53) describes liturgical acclamations as "shouts of joy which arise from the whole assembly as forceful and meaningful assents to God's Word and Action." Because of their key role in the liturgy and because they enable the assembly's active participation, acclamations are most successful when they are "rhythmically strong, melodically appealing, and affirmative." The primary liturgical acclamations in the Eucharist include the Gospel Acclamation, the Holy or Sanctus, the Memorial Acclamation (with its four options), the Great Amen, and the Doxology of the Lord's Prayer. Such responses as "Thanks be to God" at the end of the readings and the "Amens" at the end of the various prayers are also considered acclamations.

In many ways, liturgical acclamations are an example of liturgical music as truly music of the liturgy. That is, acclamations are ritual music in the best sense of the term, providing the assembly with the opportunity to be actively engaged in the liturgical rite and in dialogue with the presider. In this sense, acclamations aptly suit the genius of the Roman Rite in a way that hymnody, for example, does not. This is because acclamations are intimately tied to the liturgical texts and the liturgical action. In fact, all of the important climaxes of the liturgical action are highlighted by the sung acclamations of the people. Through these acclamations, the worshiping assembly actively expresses their faith in the mystery being celebrated.

The General Instruction of the Roman Missal (article 39) and the Introduction to the Lectionary for Mass (article 23) also highlight the importance of singing the Gospel Acclamation. Such directives acknowledge the difficulty of uniting a group of people in an enthusiastic and unified expression of faith through mere speech. Indeed, Liturgical Music Today (article 17) highlights the musical nature of all of the acclamations when it describes them as "the preeminent sung prayers of the eucharistic liturgy."

Bibliography: G. CHEW, "Acclamation," in New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians (London 1980) v.1, 35–36. L. DEISS, Visions of Liturgy and Music for a New Century (Collegeville 1996). J. GELINEAU, Voices and Instruments in Christian Worship: Principles, Laws, Applications (Collegeville 1964). E. WERNER, The Sacred Bridge: The Interdependence of Liturgy and Music in Synagogue and Church during the First Millennium (New York 1959).

[J. KUBICKI]

LITURGICAL ART, HISTORY OF

Part 1: Definition of Liturgical Art

The term liturgy is derived from the composite Greek word λειτουργία, meaning a public duty or a work undertaken by a citizen for the state. Today the term liturgy is applied to the public worship of the Church and is generally distinguished from private devotion, which occurs outside of the official community worship. The administration of Sacraments, the Mass, and public ritual are all part of the LITURGY.

The fashioning of objects, such as vessels and vestments for liturgical use, and the programming of worship space, or the planning of the architecture of a church for liturgical worship are commonly designated liturgical art. The use of ritual and devotional objects is common in the rites also of religions other than Christianity and in cult ceremonies that go back to primitive times (see ART, 1). This article confines itself to aspects of the use of art in Christian worship.

Terminology. The term liturgical art is often used interchangeably with the term sacred art (art sacré, ars sacra). However the term sacred art, in current usage, tends to overflow the boundaries of what is more restrictively called liturgical art. The term liturgical has a precision that is not shared by the obscure term sacred. All liturgical art are sacred, but not all sacred art are liturgical.

The use of the term sacred art is carried over from the Tridentine interest in sacred image when the concern was more strictly de sacris imaginibus. The term was applied to images or representations of sacred subjects that were set aside for devotional purposes; these were distinguished from paintings and images of subjects that were profane (profanum, e.g., not devoted to religious ends). The concern of the council was twofold: (1) to uphold the legitimate use of images for devotional purposes and (2) to purge existing abuses (and prevent additional ones) that tended to introduce a questionable iconography into religious art. The council wished to exclude what was profane (profanum) and immodest (inhonestum) from the churches because pagan iconographic themes became common during the Renaissance and often found their way into churches. It wished, furthermore, to restrict unusual innovations (the insolitum) in the representation of dogma (e.g., that of the Trinity) because heretical interpretations easily crept in. The question was not one of style or aesthetics but of subject matter (iconography). It was fidelity to these Tridentine principles that encouraged the extreme caution of the succeeding period regarding innovation in art and architecture. By the end of the 19th century, with fidelity to "historical styles" prevailing, ars sacra within the Catholic Church was channeled in a mode of artistic production quite distinct from modern movements of art in general. The separation of general artistic currents from that kind of art used in churches created the understanding that art in the service of religion has a unique character inherent in its style and form that makes it "sacred" as distinct from the "profane."

With the introduction of modern art and architecture into churches, the term sacred came to be applied indiscriminately to elements of art and architecture that serviced the Church. Within the modern liturgical movement both in the U.S. and Europe this usage has been relatively common in descriptive expressions such as "sacred space," "sacred inwardness," and "sacral meaning." Such usage has led some to lodge a sacredness or an undefined sense of the sacred in objects, decoration, and architectural space that has an implied religious value. The term sacred, which was earlier applied to a distinction of subject matter, has come to be applied to the art form itself. The undefined "sense of the sacred" provides a tenuous basis for the scope of usage of the term; as a consequence sacred has been used to include meditative garden sculpture and abstract compositions that, however suitable, may or may not be employed in places of worship (e.g., some works in the Exposition Internationale d'Art Sacré, Royan, France, 1964).

More loosely employed are the terms "Christian art" and "religious art," which can be understood only within the context of the intentions and understanding of their users. Generally the term Christian art is applied

Baptismal font carved with Apostles sitting on the shoulders of Prophets, 12th century, in the cathedral at Merseburg, Germany. (Marburg-Art Reference, Art Resource, NY)

The 'Imperial Dalmatic,' Byzantine, probably 13th century. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY.)

broadly to artistic production by and for Christians in cultures predominantly Christian; such art might be quite removed from immediate devotional or ritual ends (e.g., a pilgrim's water flask). The term "religious art" is used even more universally and often takes on the sense of art sacré in its wider meaning, designating any art that is perceived to have some religious interest. (For consideration of the concept of a Christian art see ART, 2.)

The term liturgical art might properly be understood in the same sense as the term sacred art in the constitution issued by Vatican II (chapter 7); it refers to art that is in the service of the official worship of the Church. So understood, the term extends not only to objects and vesture but also to the plastic arts and architecture. Thus a painting by A. Manessier hanging in the Museum of Modern Art in Paris is not a work of liturgical art, but it may be if it is transferred to a sanctuary space as suitable articulation for a sanctuary wall. A medieval water flask may have an ornamental iconographic theme articulated in the same character as that of a chalice; the chalice is proper subject matter to liturgical art whereas the flask is not.

Function. Liturgical art is determined in part by its functions. It serves to create the instruments and places of worship used for the liturgy. The sacred vessels, the altar, and the distribution of elements in the worship space itself are all specified to some extent by their instrumental service. Art may serve also to create the appropriate signs or images related to devotion; these are determined somewhat by their significative functions (cross, icon). Often liturgical items are both instrumental and significative (the baptismal font, the altar). When either the significative or instrumental function of a liturgical object is not realized in the work then it falls short of its characterization as liturgical art. Liturgical art assumes the burden of serving a function that is larger than the specific ends of the art engaged in fashioning it. A fine art engaged for the service of liturgy fills a function proper to worship that is not possible to it, for example, in a gallery. The larger function given to liturgical art is to serve the specific needs of public worship and private devotion. The artist himself may not, by reason of his art, fix the functions of liturgical art, though he might, by the combining of his perception of liturgical needs and his artistic sensibility, create a more complete or useful realization than was earlier employed.

The function of liturgical art may not be known by the disciplines of art and architecture in themselves. Just as the architect expects to be supplied with specific information concerning the needs and purpose of a research laboratory he might build, so also does he rightly expect that the Church will specify the needs and purposes of its liturgy for the church he might build. The architect and artist, understanding these ends, may then create adequate solutions according to their proper creative abilities and skills. It is for this reason that clarifications have been issued concerning the use of image and the functions of elements in the church; these instructions, discussed below have the function of pointing out the needs of the liturgy for the understanding of the pastor, the artist, and the architect.

In recent times such instruction has become necessary since often professional designers and builders are employed from a society that is not oriented to the needs of the Christian community. Furthermore, modern technical abilities along with architectural and artistic theory of the past hundred years have posed problems that have affected religious art considerably.

[R. J. VEROSTKO/EDS.]

Part 2: Legislation before Vatican II

An important piece of legislation published in recent years was the instruction De arte sacra issued by the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office on June 30, 1952. Since this document was meant to be a summary of the legislation on sacred art in force at the time, it may serve as a point of reference for the subject up until its date of issuance.

The opening paragraph of the instruction defined sacred art in terms of its function: "It is the function of sacred art... to enhance the beauty of the house of God and to foster the faith and piety of those who gather in the church to assist at the divine service and to implore heavenly favors." The instruction then expressed the same ideas in a negative manner by recalling St. Pius X's remarks in his motu proprio on liturgical music, Tra le sollecitudini (Nov. 22, 1903): "Nothing should have a place in the church which disturbs or even merely diminishes the piety and devotion of the faithful, nothing which reasonably might be considered in bad taste or be the cause of scandal, nothing which might be unworthy of the house of prayer and the majesty of God."

This pastoral attitude of the Church toward sacred art has been at the core of its instruction throughout the centuries. The instruction De arte sacra cited the action of the Council of Nicaea II (787) in condemning the Iconoclasts and confirming the cult of sacred images (see ICON-OCLASM). It also mentioned session 25 (1563) of the Council of Trent, which issued directives on Christian iconography, as well as the norms of Pope Urban VIII issued on March 15, 1642, providing for the execution of the decrees of the Council of Trent. The council had concluded its exhortation to the bishops with these words: "Let bishops exercise much diligence and care concerning these matters, that nothing disordered may meet the eye, nothing distorted and confused in execution, nothing unfitting and unbecoming, since sanctity belongs to the house of God."

The instruction then listed the canons of the 1917 Code of Canon Law that gathered all the ecclesiastical legislation on sacred art under summary headings: canons 485, 1161, 1162, 1164, 1178, 1261, 1268, 1269.n1, 1279, 1280, 1385, 1399. Special mention was made of the prescriptions of canon 1261, which obliges ordinaries to see that nothing foreign to the faith or not in harmony with ecclesiastical tradition be introduced into divine worship, and canon 1399.n12, which prohibits the production of all images that are foreign to the mind and decrees of the Church. In the event that there be any doubt that contemporary art has a legitimate place in the liturgy, the instruction recalled the words of Pius XI on the occasion of the inauguration of the new Vatican Gallery of Paintings (Oct. 27, 1932): "open wide the portals and tender sincere welcome to every good and progressive development of the approved and venerable traditions, which in so many centuries of Christian life, in such diversity of circumstances and of social and ethnic conditions, have given stupendous proof of their inexhaustible capacity of inspiring new and beautiful forms."

The instruction also adverted to the words of Pius XII in Mediator Dei (Nov. 20, 1947) on the place of contemporary art in the liturgy. While confirming the place of modern art in sacred edifices and rites, Pius XII reproved those images and forms that were contrary to Christian piety, but there was no clarification of what forms these might be. After reasserting these points, the instruction proceeded to enumerate a number of nebulous directives of its own, first concerning architecture and then concerning descriptive art.

A wood sculpture of Saint Barbara decorates the altar of the Franciscan mission named for her, Santa Barbara, California. (©Richard Cummins/CORBIS)

Besides the instruction issued by the Holy See on sacred art several episcopal directives were formulated after World War II to serve as a guide to church construction. Most important and earliest of these, usually referred to as the directives of the German bishops, was an official document entitled Richtlinien für die Gestaltung des Gotteshauses aus dem Geiste der römischen Liturgie (Liturgical Institute, Trier 1947). The document was drawn up by T. Klauser in collaboration with the liturgical commission appointed by the German bishops. This document not only influenced the rebuilding of churches in postwar Germany, but served as a valuable guide to diocesan liturgical commissions elsewhere. The directive clarifies five fundamental purposes of the Christian church and presents 21 concise conclusions based on theological and liturgical principles that bear importantly on church architecture. A similar directive based on the German one and resembling it in outline was issued by the diocesan commission at Superior, Wis., in 1957 (Diocesan Church-Building Directives). The German document and the Superior document are presented with a brief commentary in the appendix to Towards a Church Architecture, ed. P. Hammond (London 1962) 245–262.

Baptismal font in the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore, Rome, designed by L. Valadier in 1825, with figures by Carlo Spagna. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

In April of 1952 the French hierarchy issued a directive in 11 short articles. This directive, however, was not an instruction on church building like the German one, but concerned itself more with the plastic arts and the role of the artist.

[R. K. SEASOLTZ/R. J. VEROSTKO/EDS.]

Part 3: Twentieth-Century Renewal Efforts

In Western Christian cultures art and architecture in general underwent radical changes following the Counter Reformation. Art was affected not only by the advent of modern technical abilities but also by the shifting of philosophical thought, the growth of the city, mass communications, and modern economic systems. After the mid-19th century the artistic world was in the upheaval of the disagreements between the academies and the independents, and the force of creative thinking that was to mold 20th-century art and architecture grew independently of institutional patronage, often opposing the Church. The 19th-century revivalisms in church architecture such as that of PUGIN, the attempts to revive the simple purity of Christian fresco painting by the Nazarenes, and the efforts of the later 19th-century BEURONESE school all failed to initiate the regeneration of religious art and architecture.

Separation of Art and the Church. By the turn of the century independent creative thinking had prepared the way for radical innovations in the art and architecture of the 20th century. In architecture F. L. Wright had already built homes on the freely spread ground plan (1890s), and L. H. Sullivan's skeletal structure in the Carson, Pirie, Scott & Company building in Chicago (1899-1904) had already broken with tradition. While skeletal structure and free space were successfully experimented with in America, the early work of T. Garnier (1861-1948) and A. PERRET led to the design of structures of genuine and specific character. Garnier's work in Rome in 1901 was directed toward the new industrial city; it was exhibited in 1904 and published in 1917. Efforts in architecture and industrial design by de Stijl, the Bauhaus, etc. were independent of any ecclesiastical patronage or interest. Similarly the plastic arts had already assimilated the contributions of the Impressionists and the Postimpressionists by the turn of the century; Fauvism, German Expressionism, Cubism, and Futurism all preceded World War I and contributed to a transforming vision that widened the gap between the art world in general and the Church. The failure of the Church to patronize creative art in its places of worship and the seeming indifference of ecclesiastics to the progress being made by modern art and architecture in general shaped a reaction within Christianity early in the century.

Renewal Efforts up to World War II. At the end of the 19th century the Spaniard A. Gaudí undertook at Barcelona the grandiose Sagrada Familia (still under construction), which, beyond its reminders of the past, opened the way to imaginative church construction. At the same time painters, following the insights provided by Gauguin and Cézanne, investigated the possibilities of renewing the treatment of religious themes. This earliest attempt led to the establishment in Paris after World War I of several studios of sacred art; here Maurice Denis and Georges Desvallières attempted to liberate Christian art.

It was not until after World War I that the French architect Auguste Perret built the first decidedly modern church, at Raincy, near Paris. In its construction, reinforced concrete was used on the basis of its functional adaptability and was successfully shaped to fit the needs of a program of worship. Denis and Bourdelle were called on to participate in the realization of the work.

At the same time two German architects contributed their efforts: Dominikus Böhm in the renewal of architectural expressionism and Otto Bartning in that of architectural rationalism.

In Switzerland K. Moser, at Saint-Antoine in Basel, continued the construction principles of A. Perret and trained pupils whose works would contribute to the future of church architecture. The churches that Fritz Metzger and Hermann Baur designed in German-speaking Switzerland from 1930 on, in particular at Zurich and Basel, inspired in other countries a type of rectangular building with plain walls, flanked by a chimney-like bell tower. These churches were characterized by a purity of line, a precision of volume, and a brightness of space, all of which accommodated the liturgical disposition of the interior. They created a style that was often repeated in modern church building.

These churches and certain works of art, such as stained-glass windows, paintings, and statues that were created to be used in them, were the occasion of the first controversies over modern religious art. A quarrelsome climate, with its collision between partisans and adversaries of "modern sacred art," surrounded also the creative work of A. Cingria in French Switzerland; M. Denis, J. Barillet, and Le Chevallier in France; Thorn Pryker in Germany; and Joep Nicolas in Holland. In France and central Europe the movements initiated shortly after the turn of the 20th century (expressionism, Cubism, and even pure abstraction) had made considerable progress by 1914. The artists mentioned above, active after World War I, served only to bridge the gap that separated artistic progress in general from the Church.

Renewal Efforts after 1945. It was not until after World War II that a decisive confrontation took place between modern art and the Church. The periodical L'Art sacré, founded in 1935 by Joseph Pichard, which from before the war had been the organ for much activity in modern sacred art, published important postwar studies by the Dominican Fathers P. COUTURIER and P. Régamey. These pointed the way to new possibilities. They encouraged the construction of several chapels, which, while of modest dimensions, quickly acquired worldwide renown because of their bold though sensitive innovations in the retarded area of religious art. At ASSY, in a chapel serving several Alpine sanatoriums, a host of artists was engaged: P. Bonnard, G. Rouault, G. Braque, F. Léger, H. Matisse, Germaine Richier, J. Lipchitz, M. Chagall, and J. Lurçat. At Audincourt, in a working-class neighborhood, Léger and J. Bazaine contributed abstract compositions in stained glass and mosaic to the church of the Sacred Heart. At the same time Matisse initiated work on the chapel at VENCE that was to contribute to the growing modern sensibility. The architect Le Corbusier began the chapel of RONCHAMP, which provided an unparalleled articulation of sanctuary space and light. Most of these accomplishments were realized (directly or indirectly) through the work of Father Couturier.

It was a time when plans for building or rebuilding churches were being undertaken; many had been seriously damaged or destroyed during the war, especially in France and Germany. Special commissions for historical monuments were able to take charge of the more ancient churches (Romanesque, Gothic) that could be restored. For the others it was necessary to rebuild. At the same time the growth of cities, with the formation on their outskirts of entirely new working-class districts, required the preparation of building programs that included new churches. Especially important as a guide, in regard to contemporary styles and the liturgy, were the directives of the German bishops (1947). Postwar church building was significant in Germany in Cologne, Berlin, and Frankfurt; in France, major churches were rebuilt at Le Havre, Brest, Lorient, Royan, and Baccarat, and many smaller churches were begun; in England, a new COVEN-TRY CATHEDRAL was constructed.

Two contrasting trends were in evidence in postwar church architecture. On the one hand, the functional rationalism that Perret, Bartning, and the Swiss architects had promoted in the period between the world wars was continued; on the other hand, a search for expressive forms, especially after 1950, developed both in the Americas and in Europe.

Architects who worked in the more functionalist and rationalist style were not only Swiss; there were in France, Le Donné, Pinsard, Pierre Vago, the brothers Arsène and Henry Lods, and Maurice Novarina (who was interested at the same time in regionalism); in the U.S., Eliel and Eero Saarinen, Ciampi, M. Breuer; and in Germany, R. Schwarz and Emil Steffann (who was particularly attached to simple and austere designs).

Among those who introduced the expressive into architecture, Le Corbusier must be given first place as demonstrated in his church of Ronchamp (completed 1955) and later in the monastery of L'Arbresle, near Lyons. These works achieved a new flexibility in concrete disciplined by a mature knowledge of human elements and physical processes (light, structural forces, landscape) and adjusted well to liturgical and monastic needs. Among others who searched for plastic expression were: in France, Guillaume Gillet (Royan), Rouquet (Metz and Nantes), N. Kazis (Baccarat), Bourbonnais, and Perrouin (around Paris); in Germany, Hans Schädel (Berlin), D.

Böhm, and J. Lehmbrock; in Finland, Aalvar Aalto; and in the Americas, Frank Lloyd Wright (U.S.), F. Candela (Mexico), and O. Niemeyer (Brazil).

The plastic arts had preceded architecture in their religious interest, but necessarily followed architecture in actual use within the church. The curiosity and emotion stirred up by the chapels at Assy and Vence provided ground for intelligent inquiry into the appropriate use of modern styles in the Church. At the same time the Church became receptive to modern styles in painting and sculpture (1952 instruction De arte sacrale). For more than 50 years artistic movements in general had tended to liberate the plastic arts from any representational function. By the mid-century artists were engaged with pure abstract art that sought expressive value in structure and response to plastic values (color, light, spontaneous calligraphy, etc.). First adaptations of abstraction in churches occurred notably in stained glass, which easily abandoned narration and iconography to concentrate on the creation of a suitable atmosphere through controlled design of light. Abstract reliefs and paintings emerged also in an effort to give plastic articulation to interior and exterior surfaces; J. Bazaine, A. Manessier, Léon Zack, G. Meistermann, P. Szekely, and many others were active in this regard.

The Americas. The efforts to renew liturgical art did not occur in Europe alone. The work of Virgil MICHEL (1890–1938) with the LITURGICAL MOVEMENT led to an awareness of the importance of religious art at ST. JOHN's ABBEY, Collegeville, Minnesota, which was to make that abbey a center of renewal in the U.S. More important was the work of the LITURGICAL ARTS SOCIETY (founded in 1928). Both before and after the war its publication, Liturgical Arts, and the personal efforts of its secretaryeditor, Maurice LAVANOUX, served to create a liaison between those interested in renewal in religious art and ecclesiastics. Through the lectures and articles of M. Lavanoux and others a climate had been created for the years following World War II that made significant progress possible. As early as 1946 the renovation of the basilica crypt at ST. VINCENT ARCHABBEY (Latrobe, Pa.) was carried out through the efforts of Father Quentin Schaut, including a remarkable series of 14 stained-glass windows by Emil Frei.

Though the mediocrity of derivative modernism occurred in liturgical ornamentation and church architecture during the 1940s and 1950s, a number of significant projects were undertaken. Most notable of these was the abbey church at St. John's (Collegeville, built in 1960 but planned earlier) by Marcel Breuer. This project included careful planning and articulation of every detail in terms of liturgical need and architectural expression. A number of monastic projects quickly followed the pattern of renewal that issued from St. John's: Hellmuth, Obata, and Kassabaum designed the St-Louis Priory of St. Mary Church (1962), and P. Belluschi (b. 1899) designed the Priory of St. Gregory the Great, Portsmouth, R.I. (1961), which includes the sculpture above the altar by R. Lippold. Of note also are the St. Mary Abbey Church and Monastery at Morristown, N.J. (1965), by Victor Christ-Janer, and the new St. Vincent Monastery, Latrobe, Pa., by Tasso Katselis. Contributions in Latin America were made by O. Niemeyer (b. 1907) and L. Costa (b. 1902), F. Candela (b. 1910), and E. de la Mora y Palomar.

Painting and sculpture in the service of church architecture have made less progress in the U.S. than in Europe. In general the postwar tendency has been to employ in churches a kind of pseudomodern articulation of figural work that is partly Cubist or expressionistic and sometimes primitive. With few exceptions the main currents of the artistic world have been either misunderstood or avoided by patrons of liturgical art in the U.S. (e.g., abstract expressionism and recent programmed art). However, the recent consultant work of F. Kacmarcik (St. Paul, Minnesota) has managed to point a direction by engaging J. Albers to design an abstract altar screen (St. Patrick's, Oklahoma City) and stained glass (St. John's, abbot's chapel). Others, not mentioned above, who have contributed promising conceptions are M. Goeritz (Mexico, stained glass), H. Bertoia (Massachusetts Institute of Technology chapel, sculpture), J. Reynal (mosaic), A. Rattner (stained glass), and Sister Mary Corita (illuminated texts).

Bibliography: A. CINGRIA, La Décadence de l'art sacré (Paris 1919; new ed. 1930). M. DENIS, Nouvelles théories sur l'art moderne, sur l'art sacré, 1914-1921 (Paris 1922). J. KREITMAIER, Beuroner Kunst: Eine Ausdrucksform der christlichen Mystik (5th ed. Freiburg 1923). M. BRILLANT, L'Art chrétien en France au XX e siécle (Paris 1927). E. GILL, Art-Nonsense and Other Essays (London 1929). M. A. COUTURIER, Art et catholicisme (Paris 1948). R. HESS, Moderne kirchliche Kunst in der Schweiz (Zurich 1951). P. R. RÉ-GAMEY, La Querelle de l'art sacré: Assy et Vence (Paris 1951); Religious Art in the Twentieth Century (New York 1963). M. OCHSÉ, La Nouvelle querelle des images (Paris 1953). J. PICHARD, L'Art sacré moderne (Paris 1953). G. J. AUVERT, Défense et illustration de l'art sacré (Paris 1956). A. HENZE and T. FILTHAUT, Contemporary Church Art, ed. M. LAVANOUX, tr. C. HASTINGS (New York 1956). A. HENZE, Neue kirchliche Kunst (Recklinghausen 1958). J. PICHARD, Images de l'invisible (Tournai 1958). W. WEYRES and O. BARTNING, eds., Kirchen: Handbuch für den Kirchenbau (Munich 1959). M. OCHSÉ, Un Art sacré pour notre temps (Paris 1959). W. S. RUBIN, Modern Sacred Art and the Church of Assy (New York 1961). A. CHRIST-JANER and M. M. FOLEY, Modern Church Architecture (New York 1962), illus., bibliog. with each section. G. MER-CIER, L'Art abstrait dans l'art sacré (Paris 1964) includes app. of directives, bibliog. 219-228. G. E. KIDDER SMITH, The New Churches of Europe (New York 1964). R. SOWERS, Stained Glass: An Architectural Art (New York 1965), ch. on content, notes. Periodicals and yearbooks. Ars sacra (Basel 1927-). Jahrbücher der Deutschen Gesellschaft für christliche Kunst (Munich 1951-). Kunst und Kirche (Berlin 1924–). L'Art d'église (Bruges 1932–), Eng. summaries. L'Art sacré (Paris 1935–39; 1946–). Liturgical Arts (New York 1931–). Das Münster (Munich 1947–). Chiesa e quartiere (Bologna 1957–). Arte cristiana (Milan 1913–). Art Chrétien (Paris 1934–). Catholic Art Quarterly (Buffalo 1937–59), superseded by Good Work (1959–). Christliche Kunstblatt (Munich 1904–). Fede e arte (Vatican City 1953–). Módulo (Rio de Janeiro 1955–). Formes sacrées (Lombreuil 1964–), trimestrial.

[J. PICHARD/R. J. VEROSTKO/EDS.]

Part 4: Renewal Societies

The growth of the LITURGICAL MOVEMENT effected the establishment of a number of organizations concerned with the spirit and function of the arts as employed in the service of the Church in the age of 20th-century liturgical renewal. Better known among these renewal societies during this period were: the Central Pontifical Commission for Sacred Art in Italy (founded by Pius XI, 1924; Msgr. Giovanni Fallani, president); the LITURGICAL ARTS SOCIETY, New York (founded 1933, Maurice Lavanoux, secretary); Pro Civitate Christiana (founded 1939, Giovanni Rossi, president); and Istituto internazionale di arte liturgica (International Institute of Liturgical Art), Rome (founded 1954 by Vittorino Veronese). Essentially concerned with the arts (architecture, sculpture, painting, and other liturgical objects, these groups generally attempted to promote a more intelligent church patronage of the arts. Their most common aim was to provide commentary and direction for those engaged in building and decorating places of public worship. Such work has become more meaningful since the publication of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Dec. 4, 1963; ch. 7).

In the U.S. the most important single influence in creating a consciousness of need for renewal in liturgical art until its demise in 1972 was the Liturgical Arts Society (and its active editor-secretary, Maurice Lavanoux); the LITURGICAL CONFERENCE, though not specifically oriented to art, became important for auxiliary conferences and exhibitions at its annual meetings after 1940.

The rise of a more art-conscious public in the U.S. caused groups founded for apostolic purposes at various levels of society to develop, within their structures, committees or sections that concentrated on evangelization through various art media. In the early post-World War II years, the GRAIL (founded in the Netherlands, 1920 and U.S., 1940) encouraged local artists to work in religious themes by providing exhibit space (and consequently forums and markets) in the Grail shops. Associations of professional artists and art educators also attempted to implement the spirit of the Liturgical Movement. Such associations were: the Catholic Art Association (founded 1937), which published the quarterly Good Work; the Catholic Fine Arts Society (founded 1955, an association of college and secondary school educators, and artists); and finally the National Conference of Catholic Art Educators (an offshoot and almost a branch of the National Art Education Association, a secular group of professional art educators).

Bibliography: J. KARLIN, "Contemporary Art and the Church in Italy," Liturgical Arts 30.1 (1961) 26–28. See also collective statement of aims issued in the 1960s by the Istituto internazionale di arte liturgica (Rome).

[B. T. LUCEY/EDS.]

Part 5: Impact of Vatican II.

As a pastoral guide to the teaching, doctrine, and theory in regard to the promotion and reform of the liturgy the fathers of Vatican Council II issued the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Dec. 4, 1963). Chapter 7 of this document concerns itself with the role of liturgical art in the first phase of the Church's reform, the renewal of worship.

There are two other documents that provide a fuller understanding of the meaning of chapter 7 of the constitution. One, usually referred to as the "appendix," contains declarations of the preparatory commission for a clearer explanation of certain constitution articles; the "appendix" to article 128 of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy is of particular importance because it serves as a basis of interpretation for chapter 7 and also as background for other instruction on liturgical art that has been, or will be, issued by the Liturgical Commission. The instruction of Sept. 26, 1964, was issued to implement effectively what was broadly outlined by the council; chapter 5 of this instruction provides the first official implementation of article 128 of the Constitution.

Thus three documents are directly relevant to liturgical art and the renewal issuing from Vatican Council II: (1) chapter 7 of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy; (2) the appendix to article 128 of that Constitution (an appended illustration on the meaning of the text); and (3) chapter 5 of the instruction of Sept. 26, 1964, issued by the Liturgical Commission.

In regard to the interpretation and understanding of these documents two factors must be kept in mind: (1) the norms and regulations issued in regard to art in the liturgical renewal attempt to give official expression to the principles and doctrine underlying the structure of the liturgy: (2) meaningful employment of the norms can come only from a study of the reasons for which they were issued in the context of the aggiornamento. The practical implications of the "appendix" to article 128 and the instruction of Sept. 26, 1964, are discussed under section 5 below.

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, (CSL) although chapter 7 on sacred art is brief (articles 122–130), contains a number of valuable clarifications that may be summarized as follows:

1. A strong point concerns style. "The Church has not adopted any particular style of art as her very own"; free scope is to be given to contemporary art of every race and region provided it serves with due reverence the holy rites and the enrichment of sacred buildings (CSL 123).2.

Veneration of images is to be maintained by the faithful but the sacred images placed in the church are to be moderate in number; relative positions of images, when used, are to reflect an order that does not create confusion among Christian people; neither should it foster devotion of doubtful orthodoxy (CSL 125).

- 3. Noble beauty rather than sumptuous display is to be sought. Works that are mediocre or pretentious and those which offend true religious sense or are repugnant to faith, morals, and Christian piety are to be carefully removed from churches by the bishops (CSL 124).
- 4. When churches are to be built care is to be taken to implement the celebration of liturgy and the participation of the faithful (CSL 124). Statutes and regulations concerning the building and appointment of furnishings in the church are to be revised for this purpose. "Laws which seem less suited to the reformed liturgy are to be brought into harmony with it, or else abolished; and any which are helpful are to be retained if already in use, or introduced where they are lacking" (CSL 128). The instruction of Sept. 26, 1964, was the first official implementation of this article. Chapter 5 of this instruction concerned itself mainly with the construction of the church and the appointment of its furnishings in order to facilitate the active participation of the faithful. These instructions form a basis for flexibility in building in anticipation of changes yet to come. As a working principle, older legislation and instruction was to be viewed in the light of the reformed liturgy and the instruction issued thus far.
- 5. Judgments on works of art are not a personal matter. The local ordinary is to give hearing to a diocesan commission on sacred art, which is to include experts on art (CSL 126.44, 45).
- 6. To facilitate sound judgment and appreciation in matters of sacred art, clerics are to be taught its history and development during their philosophical and theological studies (CSL 129). Bishops are enjoined to have a special concern for artists (CSL 127) and see to it that works of value are preserved (CSL 126).

Summary. In viewing the instruction and legislation of the Church in regard to sacred art it is important to bear in mind the reason for which the instruction was issued. The councils of Nicaea (787), Constantinople (869–870), and the 25th session of Trent (1563) all concerned themselves with problems related to the use of images. Instruction was issued to uphold the legitimate and healthy use of images for devotional purpose against those who would deny their use (see IMAGES, VENERATION OF). Where abuses were prevalent, such as iconographic schemes that threatened the understanding of doctrine or excesses of imagery that might introduce superstition and false worship, the Church issued clarifications to protect Christian doctrine and piety. None of this legislation provides judgment of quality or aesthetic and stylistic norms since such judgment is neither the intention nor the province of the fathers. Both older and recent instruction has, at root, a pastoral concern.

More recent instruction has concerned itself with the function of liturgy and the critical role of art in the proper fulfillment of that function. Consequently there is a greater interest in architecture. The concern of the earlier councils over images has been replaced in the 20th century by a concern over the intelligent employment of new artistic abilities in the liturgy. With the advent of abstract art another kind of question has been posed in regard to image. Also new concepts and abilities with regard to architectural space have appeared in church architecture (see CHURCH ARCHITECTURE, HISTORY OF, 1). Vatican II clearly did not wish to frustrate healthy progress in the intelligent use of contemporary abilities (LCS 123). Subsequent norms and instructions attempted to maintain a flexibility that embraces the wealth of contemporary creative thought, and in a way that would complement and fulfill the proper function of the liturgy.

Bibliography: K. B. FRANK, Fundamental Questions on Ecclesiastical Art, tr. M. NATHE (Collegeville, MN 1962), pt. 2 gives account of instructions up to the 1952 document. "La legislazione ecclesiastica sull'arte," Fede e Arte nos. 10-11 (Oct.-Nov. 1957), special issue with pertinent acts of the popes, council decrees, and acts of the Roman Congregation up to 1957. Congregation of the Holy Office, On Sacred Art (Instruction, June 30, 1952), Acta Apostolicae Sedis 44.10 (1952) 542-546. Vatican Council II, Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, ch. 7, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56.2 (1964) 130-133; Eng. ed. G. SLOYAN (Glen Rock, N.J. 1964). Sacred Congregation of Rites, Instructio, ch. 5 (Sept. 26, 1964) Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56.14 (Nov. 10, 1964) 897–900. F. R. MCMANUS, "Recent Documents on Church Architecture," in Church Architecture: The Shape of Reform (Washington 1965), proceedings of a meeting on church architecture conducted by the Liturgical Conference in Cleveland, Feb. 23-25, 1965, includes app. of the recent documents, 95–104. R. K. SEASOLTZ, The House of God: Sacred Art and Architecture (New York 1963).

[R. J. VEROSTKO/EDS.]

Part 6: Church Furnishing

The furnishing of the church is directly related to its architecture since the total ensemble of the edifice and the program of worship elements are necessarily interdependent. Although this mutual reliance of liturgical function and architectural conception has always been important in the appointment of church furniture it has become more relevant since the turn of the century, owing to two almost parallel modern movements: the new phase in the development of architecture and design and renovation within the Church of its liturgy.

Modern Art and Architecture. Modern architecture has an increase of possibilities at its disposal for the articulation of space. The flexibility of reinforced concrete, the visual openness provided by the use of glass, and the strength of steel and new alloys all contributed to a technical facility that enabled designers to add new structural procedures to the old, or in some cases to substitute them. There has been considerable speculation in architectural theory concerning the integrity of form and its relationship to function (L. Sullivan, F. Wright, and Le Corbusier; see CHURCH ARCHITECTURE, HISTORY OF, 1). The influence of this thinking on industrial design has been felt especially in the work of the Bauhaus and men such as L. Moholy-Nagy and the Saarinens. Modern theory and technical capacities have contributed to radical changes in the structure and design of architecture, furniture, and mass-produced items. Their effects have been felt also in liturgical art and bear on the design of many elements of the church.

Division of the Arts. Permanent utility elements that were formerly designed by the artists of their separate crafts have become rather the domain of the architect whose architectural forms evolve from the nuances of function and the architect's sensitivity to plastic qualities. Thus the structure, disposition, and design, for example, of altar, confessionals, pews, entry and exit systems, and lighting systems are considered an integral part of the architectural conception. Yet the design of these elements cannot proceed without a clear understanding of their purposes and interrelationship. The role of the liturgist in this regard is discussed below.

Although painting, sculpture, and the minor arts continue to maintain their distinctive abilities and qualities, their interchange on the conceptual level makes the differences between them less discernible. Thus the Rosary Chapel at VENCE by H. Matisse has been referred to as a painter's architecture. The passage from painterly conception to architectural conception is hardly noticeable in the organic totality of the structure. An example of what is referred to at times as architectural sculpture is the shrine chapel at RONCHAMP by Le Corbusier. Light apertures, altar, pew units, and sanctuary cross all participate in the interior sculptural sense; on the outside the water spill, the outdoor altar, and the pulpit are an organic part of the structure that may be viewed for its sculptural qualities. The metal altarscreen by H. Bertoia in the chapel at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology creates a sanctuary environment from the interaction of architecture and sculpture. The use by A. Manessier of stained glass for a wall in the chapel at Hem is conceived architecturally to create a suitable light environment for the nave.

Because of the interrelationship of artistic conceptualization and liturgical function, the intelligent appointment of furnishings can proceed only on the basis of organic solutions achieved through the cooperation of designer, architect, and liturgist.

Ornamentation and Expression. Modern architects rarely give specific expression to a structure through ornamentation that represents narrative, descriptive, or historical subjects. The artist tends to derive expressive strength from the character of materials and the plastic or spatial articulation of the functions and quality of the structural elements themselves; this is applied to the creation of chalice, tabernacle, church pew, and vestment as well as to architecture.

Function includes the significative and spiritual purposes of specific liturgical elements. Joint efforts of liturgists and architects after World War II (especially in Germany and France) attempted to create a church architecture with all its appointments that would at once serve liturgical needs and be expressive of the purpose of this service. The altar, for example, was given its signification through the architectural disposition and the strength of its form; the main altar in R. Schwarz's church of Maria Königin (Saarbrücken, 1959) receives the focus of light and centrality to the assembly so that its significative presence is seen in the actuality of itself. Without further explication it becomes a fitting symbol of Christ in the strong architectural statement of a table around which the assembly is gathered for the Eucharistic service.

Relevance of the Liturgical Movement. In regard to church furnishing there are two abilities of fundamental importance that must be distinguished. On the one hand, the architect has the special knowledge, sensitivity, and ability necessary to create structures and establish the internal relationship of worship spaces. In doing so he is able to make such relationships meaningful to the degree that he has understood the function of the liturgy he serves. On the other hand the liturgist has the special knowledge of the precise purpose of liturgy, but this knowledge does not give him the ability to perceive how an architectural solution might be best realized. The role of the liturgist in the design and appointment of a specific church building is to relate the total complex of liturgical functions to the particular place where it will be performed; the aim of the architect and designer is to create adequate functional and aesthetic solutions in terms of their special creative abilities.

Just as the arts of architecture, painting, and sculpture are intimately related to the sensibilities of the specific cultural milieu where they are created, so also is the liturgy, which presupposes a dynamic prayer life with a ritual center whose form receives specification from the cultural milieu where it is actualized. The view of the dynamic aspect of the liturgy and thus of its adaptability to modern times grew clearer owing to the LITURGICAL MOVEMENT, which early in the 20th century presented the liturgy as a source for the formation of Christian life. The restoration of this view was initiated by PIUS X (motu proprio, Nov. 22, 1903) and received an important impetus through the proposals of Dom Lambert BEAUDUIN at a national Catholic congress at Malines in 1909. In his lecture ("Il faudroit democratiser la liturgie") he explained the importance of taking practical measures to live the liturgy in order to share the life of Christ in His body, the Church. The subsequent work of the Liturgical Movement to create a more effectual liturgy was pioneered in Europe by P. PARSCH, R. GUARDINI, J. JUNGMANN, Odo CASEL, and I. HERWEGEN, and in the U.S. at Collegeville, Minn., by Virgil MICHEL. In his essay Art Principle of the Liturgy [tr. W. Busch (Collegeville 1931) 16] Herwegen noted that "the idea of Christian transfiguration is the artprinciple of the liturgy." In order to realize the transforming power of the liturgy it was necessary to re-form community worship on livable terms. Work was begun to free the liturgy of irrelevant historicisms, the language barrier (Latin), and burdensome minutiae of rubrics whose functions were no longer meaningful. Concomitant with the advance of the movement was the rediscovery of the Bible and Biblical theology, which complemented the liturgy.

The relevance of the new findings to the programming of the worship elements in the Church was first felt, on a broad scale, in the rebuilding in Europe after World War II, particularly in Germany, where new church construction was greatly affected by the 1947 "Directives for the Building of a Church" approved by the German bishops. Of the 21 succinct articles, the first sums up the several purposes of the building according to their relative importance, noting the Eucharistic celebration as primary. The third article focuses on the problem of crucial importance for liturgist, architect, and designer:

These various purposes [e.g., Eucharistic celebration] which the church building must serve present a peculiar problem in its construction. The Eucharistic Sacrament requires an arrangement of space different from that required by the administration of the sacraments of baptism and penance; the requirements in the administration of these sacraments differ from those which preaching demands; and differences appear again as between preaching and eucharistic adoration, as between eucharistic adoration and community worship, as between community worship and private devotion. It is the task of the architect to find a solution of the problem which will best satisfy these several purposes of the church edifice.

Before the architect or designer can provide these solutions he must understand the nature of these various functions in the context of the community they serve. The work of the Liturgical Movement provided the groundwork for explicating liturgical functions and making them meaningful. The 1947 directives represented the first joint episcopal recognition of the work of the liturgists on church architecture; their work has been of unquestionable value to patrons and designers.

Vatican Council II. The reform measures taken by VATICAN COUNCIL II in regard to the liturgy were issued in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Jan. 25, 1964). Guidelines for the furnishing of the church were indicated in article 128.

Along with the revision of the liturgical books, as laid down in Article 25, there is to be an early revision of the canons and ecclesiastical statutes which govern the provision of material things involved in sacred worship. These laws refer especially to the worthy and well planned construction of sacred buildings, the shape and construction of altars, the nobility, placing, and safety of the eucharistic tabernacle, the dignity and suitability of the baptistery, the proper ordering of sacred images, embellishments, and vestments. Laws which seem less suited to the reformed liturgy are to be brought into harmony with it, or else abolished; and any which are helpful are to be retained if already in use, or introduced where they are lacking.

According to the norm of Article 22 of this constitution, the territorial bodies of bishops are empowered to adapt such things to the needs and customs of their different regions; this applies especially to the materials and form of sacred furnishings and vestments.

In order to implement this article a directive based on the present reformed liturgy and sufficiently flexible to provide for reforms that may come in the future was issued in the form of an instruction on Sept. 26, 1964 [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 (Nov. 10, 1964) 14]. It is a refinement of the Preparatory Commission's declaration that was added as an appendix to explain certain articles. The "Appendix" relevant to article 128 appeared in Liturgical Arts (33.1, February, 1964) and also in Church Architecture, The Shape of Reform, (Liturgical Conference, Washington 1965). The fifth chapter of the September 26 instruction, without usurping the domain of architect and designer, provides a clear and flexible directive relevant to the disposition of the major elements in church furnishing; it is the practical explicative in effect at this time (1965) concerning the liturgical intelligence necessary for properly furnishing a church.

This fifth chapter, "The Proper Construction of Churches and Altars in order to Facilitate the Active Participation of the Faithful," taken from the Instruction for the Proper Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, reads as follows:

I. The arrangement of churches

90. In the new construction, repair, or adaptation of churches, great care shall be taken that they are suitable for the celebration of divine services according to the true nature of the services and for the active participation of the faithful (cf. constitution, article 124).

II. The main altar

91. It is proper that the main altar be constructed separately from the wall, so that one may go around it with ease and so that celebration may take place facing the people; it shall occupy a place in the sacred building which is truly central, so that the attention of the whole congregation of the faithful is spontaneously turned to it.

In choosing the material for the construction or ornamentation of the altar, the prescriptions of law shall be observed.

Moreover, the presbyterium or sanctuary area around the altar shall be of sufficient size that the sacred rites may be conveniently celebrated.

III. The seat of the celebrant and ministers

92. The seat for the celebrant and ministers, according to the structure of individual churches, shall be so placed that it may be easily seen by the faithful and that the celebrant may truly appear to preside over the entire community of the faithful.

Nevertheless, if the seat is placed behind the altar, the form of a throne is to be avoided, as this belongs to the bishop alone.

IV. Minor altars

93. The minor altars shall be few in number. In fact, to the extent permitted by the structure of the building, it is highly suitable that they be placed in chapels in some way separated from the principal part of the church.

V. Ornamentation of altars

94. The cross and candlesticks, which are required on the altar for the individual liturgical services, may also, in accordance with the judgment of the local ordinary, be placed next to it.

VI. The reservation of the most holy Eucharist

95. The most holy Eucharist shall be reserved in a solid and inviolable tabernacle placed in the middle of the main altar or of a minor, but truly outstanding, altar, or, according to lawful customs and in particular cases to be approved by the local ordinary, also in some other noble and properly adorned part of the church.

It is lawful to celebrate Mass facing the people even if there is a tabernacle, small but suitable, on the altar.

VII. The ambo

96. It is fitting that there be an ambo for the proclamation of the sacred readings, so arranged that the ministers can be easily seen and heard by the faithful.

VIII. The place of the schola and organ

97. The place for the schola and the organ shall be so arranged that it will be clearly evident that the singers and the organist form a part of the united community of the faithful and so that they may fulfill their liturgical function more suitably.

IX. The places of the faithful

98. The places for the faithful shall be arranged with particular care, so that they may participate in the sacred celebrations visually and with proper spirit. It is desirable that ordinarily benches or seats be provided for their use. Nevertheless, the custom of reserving seats for certain private persons is to be reprobated, in accordance with article 32 of the constitution.

Care shall also be taken that the faithful may not only see the celebrant and the other ministers but may also hear them easily, with the use of present day technical means.

X. Baptistry

99. In the construction and ornamentation of the baptistry, care shall be taken that the dignity of the sacrament of baptism is clearly apparent and that the place is suitable for the community celebration of the sacrament (cf. constitution, article 27).

The first published commentaries on this instruction were those of a meeting on church architecture conducted by the Liturgical Conference in Cleveland, Ohio, Feb. 23–25, 1965 [Church Architecture, The Shape of Reform (Washington 1965)].

Although much of the postwar building in Europe revealed a sensitivity to liturgical need, few of the structures are flexible enough in their arrangement to accommodate all the desirable provisions of the 1964 instruction. Churches built before Vatican II (and the 1964 instruction) often present the following difficulties: (1)

The altar in the sanctuary space is usually designed for the celebration of Mass with the celebrant's back toward the people; consequently the space more central to the people and more suited for the altar is occupied by the priest and ministers. (2) The tabernacle is usually placed on the main altar and provision for a repository or a Blessed Sacrament altar is neglected. (3) The place of the ambo for the proclamation of the readings is not clearly articulated architecturally. (4) The seat of the celebrant and ministers in the churches mentioned is not easily adapted to the reformed liturgy.

However problematical the rearrangement of older structures and the development of satisfactory solutions may seem, the 1964 instruction remains a lucid document on questions relevant to the architectural program of the church for the reformed liturgy that were unanswerable at an earlier date.

Bibliography: For specific liturgical objects see bibliog. under subject titles; for legislation on sacred art see LITURGICAL ART, 3; for select general bibliography on liturgical and ritual objects see Encyclopedia of World Art 9:314-315. General. History and handbooks. R. GARRUCCI, Storia dell'arte cristiana, 6 v. (Prato 1872–81), illus. C. ROHAULT DE FLEURY, La Messe . . . , 8 v. (Paris 1883-89), illus. F. WIELAND, Mensa und Confessio, 2 v. (Munich 1906-12). DACL. V. THALHOFER, Handbuch der katholischen Liturgik, 2 v. (2d ed. Freiburg 1912). K. M. KAUFMANN, Handbuch der christlichen Archäologie (2d ed. Patterborn 1913). W. F. VOLBACH, Metallarbeiten des christlichen Kultes (Mainz 1921). J. BRAUN, Der christliche Altar in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 2 v. (Munich 1924); Das christliche Altargerät (Munich 1932). A. MUNIER, Construction, décoration, ameublement des églises, 3 v. (Paris 1926) v.2 L'Église à notre époque, sa décoration son ameublement. E. TYRRELL-GREEN, Baptismal Fonts (London 1928). V. CASA-GRANDE, L'arte a servizio della Chiesa, 2 v. (Turin 1932-38). D. DURET, Mobilier: Vases, objets et vêtements liturgiques (Paris 1923). L. EISENHOFER, Handbuch der Katholischen Liturgik v.1. E. ROULIN, Nos Églises: Liturgie, architecture moderne et contemporaine, mobilier, peinture et sculpture (Paris 1938). E. SHORT, A History of Religious Architecture (4th ed. London 1955). A. L. DRUMMOND, The Church Architecture of Protestantism (Edinburgh 1934). G. W. O. ADDLESHAW and F. ETCHELLS, The Architectural Setting of Anglican Worship (London 1948). Contemporary church furnishing. P. R. RÉGAMEY Religious Art in the Twentieth Century (New York 1963). A. HENZE and T. FILTHAUT, Contemporary Church Art, ed. M. LAVANOUX tr. C. HASTINGS (New York 1956), illus. P. WINNINGER, Construire des églises (Paris 1957). R. SCH-WARZ, The Church Incarnate, tr. C. HARRIS (Chicago 1958), influential theoretical work. W. WEYRES and O. BARTNING, eds., Kirchen: Handbuch für den Kirchenbau (Munich 1959), diagrams, illustrations, bibliography. J. CHÉLINI, La Ville et l'église (Paris 1958). J. PICHARD, Modern Church Architecture, tr. E. CALLMANN (New York 1962), illustrations, commentary and history of modern renewal. P. HAMMOND, Liturgy and Architecture (New York 1961), bibliography, illustrations, most useful on relation of liturgy to architecture; ed., Towards a Church Architecture (London 1962), illus., app. of useful directives. A. CHRIST-JANER and M. M. FOLEY, Modern Church Architecture (New York 1962), includes Protestant and Jewish structures, useful bibliog., illus. for each entry. R. K. SEASOLTZ, The House of God (New York 1963), structured after the 1952 instruction but precedes Vatican Council II contributions. G. MERCIER, L'Art abstrait dans l'art sacré (Paris 1964), illustrations, bibliography, appendices with legislation and instruction. G. E. KID-DER SMITH, The New Churches of Europe (New York 1964), profusely illustrated, floor plans. R. GIESELMANN and W. AEBLI, Kirchenbau (Zurich 1960). R. BIEDRZYNSKI, Kirchen unserer Zeit (Munich 1958). E. D. MILLS, The Modern Church (New York 1956). F. PFAMMATTER, Betonkirchen (Einsiedeln 1948). A. HENZE, Neue kirchliche Kunst (Recklinghausen 1958). R. SOWERS, Stained Glass: An Architectural Art (New York 1965). A. BIELER, Liturgie et architecture (Geneva 1962). Kirchenbau von heute für morgen, introd. W. M. Förderer (Sakrale Kunst 7; Zurich 1964).

[R. J. VEROSTKO/EDS.]

Part 7: Liturgical Vessels

This article offers considerations on the artistic structure of the principal vessels used in the liturgy of the Eucharist. For more detailed information on other aspects of liturgical vessels in general, see LITURGICAL VESSELS.

The Chalice. In early Christian times people drank from an ordinary drinking vessel in the celebration of the Eucharist and the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper took place at a citizen's house; the celebrant did not yet wear ritual dress. The architectural structure of the church evolved from existing structures and the priest's vestments from the ordinary garments. In the same way the shape of the chalice developed from the former Roman drinking bowl.

Stylistically the chalice can be traced back by way of the Roman drinking bowl to the Greek two-handled bowl, this in its turn having been derived from the prehistoric cup of Aegean cultural origin. The Greek drinking vessel shows a low base and a broad bowl beneath which a nodelike support is inserted. The most typical features of this bowl were adopted for liturgical use, including the small intermediate section, from which decorative motif the node later developed.

The oldest vessels still extant and which, some assume, served as sacred vessels since early Christian times are Roman quartz bowls set in copper or silver gilt, provided with two handles and set on a small base (St. Mark's, Venice). It would thus appear that the Eucharistic vessel originated in the ordinary drinking bowl without a base.

Old vessels that may have served for the Sacrament were of semitransparent bluish glass; there are still fragments of such vessels showing a picture of Christ melted into the bottom of the bowl (British Museum, London).

From early times up to the late Middle Ages chalices were made of various materials: glass, as mentioned above, metal, horn, and wood. As time went on copper and silver gilt were increasingly employed.

The chalice, just as architecture, painting, and sculpture, underwent the changes of styles and tastes proper to the age of its makers. The handles gradually disappeared, and the node, as we see it on many chalices today, became a functional part of the chalice during the 13th century.

In the Romanesque-Byzantine period the chalice was made low and round in shape; in the Gothic period it was higher with a conical cup and a smaller and narrower base; its stem and node were more frequently ornamented with sexfoils. The node, hitherto mostly spherical, became flatter until the latter part of the 15th century when it was frequently broken up into six projections. The Renaissance altered the composition of the chalice very little, though articulation of detail and ornamental motifs changed. During the 17th and 18th centuries its shape became more fanciful with a clumsy and heavy foot, but a more delicate node, which was most often tripartite. The cup was more cylindrical with a rounded bottom, and the whole chalice was richly ornamented and covered with tracery. In the later baroque era three-quarters of the cup was concealed beneath a filigree basket.

At all times all manual processes related to vesselmaking have been employed in the making of chalices embossing, casting, engraving, enameling, and the application of filigree-work.

The modern chalice is characterized by a large and forceful shape with dignity in its simplicity and lack of ornament. Stress is laid on the most important part, the cup. The size of the foot is limited to that demanded by its function, while the node has tended to disappear in the search for a purer and more harmonious line.

A chalice is typically made of precious metal, usually silver and rarely of gold. The General Instruction to the Roman Missal allows other materials to be used, so long as they are appropriate and tasteful. Since the 1980s, transparent crystal chalices that allowed the faithful to see the wine have been popularized.

The Paten. The paten is the Eucharistic dish; the Latin word is derived from the Greek πατάνε. In early Christian times this vessel was usually of glass (blue molten glass). Copper and silver were used in the pre-Carolingian period. In the early days of the Church a large dish was presumably used to collect the bread brought by the faithful from their homes, but with the introduction of the small hosts in the 11th century the paten became smaller. The oldest extant patens indicate the shape the early patens must have had; they were made large and deep since a big loaf of bread was cut up and placed upon them. Patens from the late Middle Ages until the 16th century were strong and vigorous in line. The hollow in the middle was frequently decorated with sexfoils and richly ornamented. In the late Gothic period patens became flatter and almost dish-shaped.

The modern paten has again become larger, and has a deep hollow; it is free of ornament and has a smooth surface; its shape once more conforms to that of the bread dish. Like the chalice, the paten is mostly in silver gilt. In recent times we often find the surface rhodium-plated or enameled; rhodium does not oxidize and provides a surface that is easily cleaned.

The Ciborium. The name, derived from Latin cibus signifying nourishment, refers to the function of the ciborium as a dish for bread.

The ciborium and the paten probably originated in the same vessel, the bread dish. This vessel is assumed to have served in the early days to distribute the consecrated bread among the faithful, and later also for reservation of the Eucharist. Nothing is known of the shape of this vessel in early Christian times. A symbol, fish and bread, found in the Roman catacombs, provides only a vague indication. In very early times it was customary to reserve the Eucharist, and the pyx was made for this purpose.

No vessels from the Middle Ages are extant, or if they still exist we fail to recognize them as such. We know only that containers made of wood, ivory, glass, and parchment served for the reservation of the consecrated bread. The 12th century provides more clarification; extant vessels dating from this period indicate that suspended ciboria were employed. These were flat or spherical in shape, with a very small foot. The 13th century brings further elucidation; in this century were made the enameled copper host containers of Limoges, still to be found in a number of old churches and museums. They are small pyxes, about 2 1/2 to 3 inches in diameter, that seem from their conical lids and the cross top to have evolved from the earlier hanging ciboria. The suspended vessels often in the shape of a dove are also enameled copper work from Limoges. The hanging up of such vessels may well have come from the ancient practice of preserving and protecting foodstuffs in this manner.

Later it would seem that the vessels were kept in the sacristy or in a wall niche that could be closed with an iron or wooden door. In the 15th century the vessels for reservation were of greatly varying types; some resembled a cylinder with a conical lid and were obviously a further development of the Limoges pyx; others were bowl-shaped and had a spherical lid. These vessels, so dissimilar in type, were set upon a stem that became increasingly high in the early Gothic period. The shape of foot, stem, and node varied in detail, but remained parallel with the style of the chalice. The ciborium retained the character of a drinking vessel from the 15th century until the present day, its general structure changing little in the baroque era; only its ornamentation was adapted to the style trend of the time. The small cross already seen on the small medieval pyx has been placed unchanged on almost all ciboria from the 15th century until today.

The fundamental conceptions of modern ciboria differ very considerably. We see ciboria in the usual chalice shape with foot, node, and cup, while at the same time attempts are made to design bowl-shaped vessels of various types. The shape of the modern vessel tends to revert to that of the original bread dish. (See CIBORIUM).

The Pyx. The pyx is the name usually given to the vessel used to carry the consecrated host to the sick. The word comes from ancient Greek πυξίς and signifies a container made of boxwood.

The oldest pyxes that would seem to have fulfilled this purpose are the enameled copper vessels from Limoges. Since the 13th century pyxes of the most varying kinds have been made in different countries. They frequently resemble a reliquary or small monstrance. This latter type was customary when the visit to the sick took place in procession and with an escort.

In recent times a small silver-gilt box has become the most generally used, in which the receptacle is enclosed in a small patenlike plate, frequently enameled to facilitate cleaning. (See PYX).

The Monstrance. The monstrance or ostensory (ostensorium), is a container used for fixed or processional exposition of the Eucharist. The monstrance was unknown in the early Christian Church; it was introduced in the 14th century with the Feast of Corpus Christi.

The monstrance gradually became more widely used. Its shape developed slowly from that of the pyx, which had hitherto served for liturgical ceremonies and was then partially replaced by the monstrance; as a consequence the latter has taken over part of the function of the pyx. The lid of the pyx vessel is enlarged by decorative elements and raised above the bowl. A receptacle is inserted between vessel and lid.

A similar vessel developed simultaneously from the reliquary, particularly from the type with the vertically inserted glass cylinder. From these forebears came the Gothic monstrance with its typical towerlike superstructure, showing an influence of the architecture of the period. The depository for relics became the sacred vessel, the pyx the ostensory.

There are few monstrances from this early period still extant; however, many 15th-century ones of varied types have survived. Renaissance monstrances have still greater variety. Toward the close of the 16th century the flat disk became increasingly common, and in the baroque period they were more uniform in shape, a richly ornamented flat surface being usually combined with the ray motif. In the 19th century, when there was a general decline in applied art, all historical forms were reproduced; even monstrances with Romanesque style elements were constructed although this vessel did not exist in the period of Romanesque art.

See Also: MONSTRANCE; CHALICE, PATEN, AND VEIL

Bibliography: See bibliography under specific vessels. J. BRAUN, Das christliche Altargerät in seinem Sein und in seiner Entwicklung (Munich 1932), standard work on vessels and altar furnishings. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 2.2:1595–1645; 13.2:2392–2414; 14.2:1983–95. J. BAUDOT, ibid. 2.2:1646–51. M. RIGHETTI, Manuale di storia Liturgica, 4 v. (Milan 1949–53) 1:461–476. F. N. ARNOLDI, Encyclopedia of World Art 9:297–300. W. W. WATTS, Catalogue of Chalices and Other Communion Vessels: Victoria and Albert Museum (London 1922). A. HENZE and T. FILTHAUT, Contemporary Church Art, ed. M. LAVANOUX, tr. C. HASTINGS (New York 1956). Sakrale Kunst, v.1 (Zurich 1957), a yearbook, this issue discusses problems of contemporary sacred vessels. M. BURCH, Sacred Vessels (Zurich n.d.), pamphlet, issued as guide to contemporary design problems.

[M. BURCH/EDS.]

Part 8: Liturgical Vestments

The style of liturgical vestments is derived from that of the common secular dress worn in early Christian times. From the fourth to the ninth century, garments became formalized in use, took on symbolic meanings, and, as popular styles changed, became distinct from the dress of the ordinary citizen. Eventually some vestments became insignia of an officiant's rank or function, and prescriptions developed regarding materials, color, use, and design.

The vestments discussed here are the main ones used in Roman rite (chasuble and cope, stole, amice, maniple, dalmatic, tunic, alb, and cincture), but counterparts of these, which had a somewhat different evolution, exist in the Eastern Churches. Contemporary trends represent a return to the original form of vestments, approximating these more closely now than in the past 600 years.

Specific vestments are considered historically and from the aspect of prescribed liturgical use under their specific titles. (See LITURGICAL VESTMENTS; ALB; AMICE; CHASUBLE; DALMATIC; MANIPLE; STOLE; SURPLICE; and COPE AND HUMERAL VEIL). For papal vesture (see PAPAL CEREMONY AND VESTURE); for episcopal vesture (see EPISCOPAL CEREMONY AND VESTURE).

The Principal Vestments. Alb. The alb is a straight garment with close-fitting sleeves, hung from the shoulders, and extending to the ankles. Usually it is white linen, although originally it was made of wool, and during the Middle Ages it was any color. The alb was derived from the Roman tunica alba, worn during the first and second centuries, and is the most unchanged in form of all the liturgical vestments. Originally a baptismal garment in the early church, it gradually became worn by all grades of clerics and monks. When its use became still more restricted from the 12th century onwards, the rochet and surplice developed to replace it. Ungirt, it was an inconvenient garment to wear and became associated in the ancient world with a life of culture and ease. By the addition of a girdle the folds were more controlled, and it could be shortened by being raised above the girdle.

Cincture. The cincture, cingulum, is the girdle that is worn with the alb. It was originally a flat band, secured with a clasp or buckle, and made of leather or cloth. Although included with the linen vestments, it can actually be of wool, linen, or silk, the latter being reserved for prelates. It is usually white but can be the color of the outer vestments.

Amice. The amice is a rectangular piece of white linen, to the two upper corners of which are attached long tapes. It was worn under the alb, around the neck like a muffler and secured by tying the tapes around the body. It serves the functions of protecting the other garments.

Stole. The long narrow scarflike vestment worn around the neck and hanging down the front to the waist or crossed in front, is the stole. Several authorities claim that it evolved from the Greek homophorion or orarium, a linen drape used as a facecloth and worn around the neck or on the head by people of rank. Stoles gradually became ornamental in insignia, and their practical function was fulfilled by the amice. The stole is conferred on the deacon at his ordination. He wears it on his right shoulder and crosses it under his left arm; the priest and the bishop wears the two sides parallel in front. This is the only vestment indicating rank by the manner in which it is worn. Stoles were enlarged during the Middle Ages, developed wide flanging ends, and were heavily ornamented with embroidery, fringe, gold, and jewels. They seem to have been in general use in Gaul as early as the 6th century and not to have come into wide usage in Rome until the 12th century. Recently there has been a tendency to return to a full length, narrow, less ornate stole. The color of the stole denotes the color of the liturgical season.

Maniple. The Roman mappula was a table napkin; the mappa was a cloth worn on the arm by women to wipe their faces. Both terms were eventually used to refer to the ceremonial napkin, the prototype of the maniple, which was used by persons of rank in pre-Christian times. This item of personal luxury was employed by officials to signal the beginning of public events. The origins of the maniple were then both practical and ceremonial. It was worn on the left arm and used at the Eucharistic banquet until the 12th century. As it became more ornamental and less useful, its function was assigned to the purificator. Like the stole, it became stiff, ornate, and fringed. Short maniples became inconvenient appendages in danger of dragging on the altar. The liturgical reform of Vatican II rendered the use of the maniple obsolete.

Chasuble. The form of the chasuble, outermost garment of the celebrant, has gone through successive alterations. Liturgical books traditionally referred to it as the planeta, the term applied to the earlier paenula by the fourth century. By the seventh century it was called the chasuble from a popular nickname associating it with the casula, the small tent of shepherds. This term is understandable considering that the early paenula and its liturgical derivative was an enveloping cone-shaped garment with an opening at the top, which permitted the head to emerge. Ancient representations of both the secular paenula and the early sacerdotal vestment show that it was semicircular in pattern, with the two flat edges sewn together to establish a single front seam and a conical shape. This accounts for the characteristic horizontal drape of the fabric, freeing the arms. It is seen in statues, mosaics, manuscripts, and paintings up to the high Renaissance.

Human clothing has usually consisted of two basic garments, an undergarment draped to the figure in vertical folds, and an overgarment draped horizontally across the body as a cloak for warmth and protection, or as a mark of distinction or pure ornamentation. The ancient mantle, worn over the toga and open in front, was the garment of ordinary citizens. It was both a mark of distinction and a protective garment. This evolved into the cope. The ancient paenula was a protective garment also, distinct from the mantle, having a front seam and being made of less refined fabric. It was always colored and was associated with the poor and travelers. Although admitted into Rome by the third century, it never became an imperial garment. Thus the chasuble is derived from the encompassing garment that gave warmth and protection.

As early as the sixth century it began to show changes. They resulted in the loss of its original shape and meaning as a garment, turning it more and more into an elaborate costume. First the sides were shortened, the front was cut to a point, and eventually both front and back were shortened. During the Middle Ages abbreviation of size continued and elaborate embroidery and heavy fabrics began to be used. After changes from the 13th to the 17th century, the chasuble resembled two stiff panels joined at the shoulders. Post-Reformation models evolving into this form exhibited national variations—Italian (Roman), Spanish, French (Gallican), and German. The orphrey, which had originated as a decoration covering the front seam, became enlarged and ornamental, adorning both front and back panels. The so-called "Gothic" chasuble is actually neo-Gothic coming from the period of the Gothic revival. It was an attempt at an ample embracing vestment, made at a time when relationship with the original paenula was lost. It was simply a fuller version of the derivative fiddle-back panel form. It has two unadorned shoulder seams allowing for the vertical draping of the fabric, and, compared to the original chasubles, it was considerably abbreviated in length. Often a Y-shaped cross served as the orphrey.

In the wake of the liturgical reforms of Vatican II, the design of the chasuble gradually returned to its traditional origins, a return to the style of the original chasuble developed. Ornamentation, for which there is no regulation, became more simplified and restrained. The enveloping function of the garment and the color of the liturgical season now assumes a primary role in its design.

Dalmatic. The outer garment of the deacon, the dalmatic was derived from a woolen garment originating in the Greek province of Dalmatia; they displaced the awkward Roman toga for general wear during the first half of the 4th century. The early Christians are usually pictured wearing the dalmatic in catacomb paintings. These frequently show two clavi, vertical bands of decoration, which, even today, should be the only ornamentation of the dalmatic. The dalmatic was conferred on Roman deacons as early as the 4th century even though it still remained a secular garment for emperors, consuls, and even the French kings through the 7th century. Throughout the 10th century it was usually of white linen or wool; by the 12th century silk prevailed. Today it is prescribed as an outer garment, usually matching the chasuble, and differing from the tunic by being longer and having wider sleeves. In the past the sides were split to facilitate walking, and eventually the split extended to the under seam of the sleeves. Now there is a tendency to restore the normal pattern.

Liturgical Colors. The liturgical colors for vestments are white, red, green, purple, violet, and rose, with gold as a substitute for white and, if necessary, for other festive colors. No shade or tint of these colors is prescribed, and there is no limitation of colors used for ornament or lining. The first color sequence was established by Innocent III in the 13th century, printed in Burckard's Ordo Missae in 1502, and made obligatory in the General Rubrics of the Missal of 1570.

Prescriptives and Regulations. As early as the reign of St. Stephen I in the 3d century there were Church regulations regarding the use and appearance of vestments. Today these appear principally in the General Instruction to the Roman Missal, and adaptations by local bishops' conferences.

The Art of Vestments. Throughout history there have been numerous examples of precious vestments. Although some are beautiful in their form as garments, more often it is the ornamentation that distinguishes them, sometimes to the detriment of their symbolism as garments. They combine richness of fabric with refinement of embroidery.

Early Christian. After the Edict of Milan in the early fourth century public services of worship were held more openly, and enriched versions of the dress of the times began to be reserved for the celebration of the Eucharist. There is record of a golden cloth cloak given by Constantine in 330 to a church in Jerusalem for use at Easter. With Constantinople established as the capital of the empire there began a long period of Byzantine influence on the art of the West, extending to the 12th century. An indescribable delicacy and richness of embroidery developed, which harmonized with the glory of the mosaics in church interiors. These, frequently depicting clerics, showed the type, shapes, and decoration of the vestments as well as the woven patterns of the fabrics. Gold and silver threads as well as silk and jewels were used with rich variety. Sometimes the backgrounds were so well filled that the original fabric was almost completely obscured.

Byzantine work at its finest is seen in the Imperial Dalmatic, sometimes known as the dalmatic of Charlemagne or of Pope Leo III. It is probably the most important medieval object in the treasury of St. Peters, and is variously dated from the 9th to the 15th century. It is most likely a work of the 13th-century Byzantine renaissance. The embroidered iconography includes the Transfiguration, Last Supper, and Second Coming of Christ. The design in gold and silver, with some silk, almost obscures the basic steel-blue silk fabric. The cut is that of the Greek homophorion, similar to a modern dalmatic.

One of the earliest extant examples of embroidery is a sixth-century roundel, Coptic in origin, in the collection of the Victoria and Albert Museum. It has three figures stitched in silk and is characteristic of the ornamental embroidery and tapestry weavings that were used by the Copts as orphreys, stoles, and ornaments on sacred vesture. Extant fragments indicate a well-developed tradition of the use of figures of Christ, the Virgin, angels, and saints, as well as an interesting variety of symbols.

Romanesque and Gothic. In the West there is sparse evidence of the ornamental development of vestments through the Romanesque period, although manuscripts and sculptures depicting them suggest a vigor comparable to that of the architecture.

But it was during the Gothic age that a flourishing textile production joined with the skill of designers and craftsmen to produce precious and elaborate works of vesture. Large textile centers were frequently attached to monasteries of the Cistercians in England, the Humble Fathers of Saint Michael, who moved from Egypt to Florence, and the great centers at Lyons and Seville. The Benedictines and Humiliates joined forces in Florence making it a powerful textile center. More than 200 communities existed in Florence, where there were 30,000 craftsmen producing 100,000 pieces of cloth per year, exclusive of cotton and linen. In the same period designing skills were applied to objects ranging from the refined manuscript to the sculptures in majestic cathedrals. The embroidered and woven designs of vestments harmonized with the other artistic works of the time. The tradition of the Eastern Churches was well known. Varied fabrics and dyes were available, and embroideries were ingenious. Artists were usually anonymous. Though several persons might be engaged on a piece, apparently individuals often did a single work. Embroidery was undertaken by both men and women, laymen and religious alike. Much time was given to it in certain convents, and gifts were often made by noble ladies.

From 1250 to 1350 the English embroidery that became internationally prized for its perfection was Opus Anglicanum. Successive popes commissioned or were given vestments and copes of Opus Anglicanum, and there are numerous records of such works on inventories in France, Italy, and Spain. Bearing some similarity in design to early manuscripts such as KELLS and LINDIS-FARNE, the background was originally covered with circles or other geometric figures, which were filled with figures of saints and angels. Later an architectural division of the background into a series of arches radiating from the center of the vestment developed. A characteristic mode of treating figures evolved, which is especially apparent in the manner of embroidering the faces, split stitches being made in spiral patterns on the cheeks and chin, across the forehead and down the nose. The S-curve posture, the folds of drapery, and the gestures are similar to those found in the manuscripts and sculptures of the same period. Although a number of fine examples of Opus Anglicanum vestments, orphreys, and borders exist, the most impressive example is the Butler-Bowden cope, a 14th-century piece in the Victoria and Albert Museum. It is somewhat unusual in that the basic material is not hard surfaced, but is a crimson velvet that has been embroidered with silks, gold, silver gilt, and seed pearls. The whole was covered with a fine material on which the design was first traced. The embroidery was then worked through both layers and the linen backing, the fine material being cut away once the embroidery was completed. Eight figures are embroidered into the orphrey, some of them prelates garbed in full liturgical vesture of the time.

Although the Opus Anglicanum represented advanced development during the medieval period, on the Continent similar work was being done, an especially inventive tradition prevailing in Germany. Many of the continental works lack the gold dominant in the Opus Anglicanum but show greater variety of stitches.

Renaissance to Baroque. From the 13th to the 17th century, vestments changed repeatedly in form and ornamentation. Three major phases of change took place, each a mistake being corrected by an additional error. In the late Middle Ages the magnificent materials used (heavy brocades, elaborate embroideries, gems) were unsuited to the function of the garment and the manner of draping desired. The overweight material was retained in the Renaissance, and the form was sacrificed, being cut away more and more at the shoulders. Finally, in more recent times, the neo-Gothic began to restore the length and shoulder width but neglected the true form and nature of the chasuble.

In the late 14th and in the 15th century embroidery work lost some of its earlier perfection. The figures embroidered into pillar and cross orphreys were less graceful and symbolic emblems were meager. Refinement of design and execution tended to disappear. By the end of the 16th century secular subjects predominated, judging from inventory lists: griffins, columbines, waterlilies, oak leaves, pheasants, and hawks. At the same time new techniques were admitted into textile weaving in the West along with velvets, brocades, and damasks. Embroidered units were worked separately on linen and sewn onto the vestment separately, the edges being broken with rays of gold. Repetitions of design suggests the poverty of inspiration. By the late 15th and the early 16th century, chasubles were generally fiddle-shaped, many of the earlier vestments having been cut down. Sumptuous materials of wearing apparel were often donated for the use of the Church. During the Reformation quantities of vestments were destroyed; some were burned and the gold reclaimed, the jewels removed; others were distributed and cut up for wearing apparel and furnishings.

The amice and alb, when decorated, were adorned by the adding of rich fabrics sewn in strips to the linen. On the amice they formed an outer collar around the neck and outside the chasuble. They served as outer cuffs for the alb and ornamented the center front and back hem. Apparels usually had some embroidery added that harmonized with but did not necessarily duplicate the liturgical color of the outer vestments. Sometimes the stole and maniple matched the apparels. The rise of the lace industry in Europe had its effect on the comparatively untouched alb. Needlepoint lace is first mentioned in an Italian inventory of 1493, and within the next century pattern books for laces appeared. Soon albs were decorated with borders, cuffs, and collars of lace until the border decoration eventually assumed the appearance of an entire skirt of lace. Some of the finest laces adorn such albs: punto in aria, gros point de Venise, rose point, and point de France. Although these usages constituted a degeneration of the form of the alb, they occasioned exquisite lacemaking. The use of apparels has never been completely lost; they are still found in Milan, Lyons, and Spain.

In the late 16th century, St. Charles BORROMEO tried to prevent the curtailment of the form of vestments, which was already under way. His "Directions" comprise the most copious and detailed prescriptions in the history of liturgical propriety. His prescriptions did not regard shape but were concerned with size, requiring ample, floor-length, simple vestments. Various changes in style that affected the integrity of vestments after his time were optional.

The worldliness of the Renaissance and the elaborate display of the baroque and the rococo caused a fashion of meaningless decor, bountiful flowers, over-high miters, large hoods, over-wide ophreys, stiff and heavy copes, all rendered in gorgeous, brilliant textiles, technically remarkable for raised figures, "needle painting," and shading. The post-Reformation up to 19th-century revivalisms saw the ascendance of a kind of theatrical vestment-making; the flare for display reached its height in the Rococo.

The 20th Century. The Gothic revival was discernible in the neo-Gothic vestment-making of the earlier part of the 20th century. The style did not achieve the goal of restoring the traditional form of vestments, but it did lead to this restoration by replacing the fiddle-back chasuble. The postwar renaissance, especially in continental Europe, had evidenced a return to the classic paenula shape; artisans tend to employ modern materials, ample but light, with simple trim and contrasting fabric. These vestments complement the simplicity and clarity of the best of contemporary church architecture. The modern renewal of the liturgy has been supported by the interest of vestment-makers both in Europe and America; however, in general, the vestment has received less attention than architecture. Some European churches, planned with attention to liturgical service, reveal awareness of architectural form that extends to every detail of the church including the appointment of vestments. The harmony is observable in the chapel by H. Matisse at VENCE, St. Kuris (Bruges), and St. Thérèse (Audincourt). The Abbey of Sainte André in Belgium produced vestments that show awareness of their function, and since 1948 has provided a steady stream of scholarly articles and inspiring illustrations in L'Ouvroir liturgique, the regular supplement to L'Art d'église. The works of Sister Augustina Flüeler at the Paramentenwerkstätte Sancta Klara in Stans, Switzerland, combine the best elements of both the contemporary and the traditional. Artistic embroidery has been revived at the German Saarbruecker Paramente-Manufaktur of Ella Broesch and encouraged by the works and writings of Beryl Dean in England.

Chapter 7, section 128, of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy calls for "an early revision of the canons and ecclesiastical statutes which govern the provision of material things involved in liturgical worship," and specifically mentions vestments.

Bibliography: A. W. PUGIN, Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament and Costume (London 1846). E. E. VIOLLET-LE-DUC, Dictionnaire raisonné du mobilier français de l'époque carlovingienne à la renaissance, 6 v. (Paris 1868–75). J. BRAUN, Die liturgische Gewandung im Occident und Orient (Freiburg 1907); Die liturgische Gegenwart und Vergangenheit: Ein Handbuch der Paramentik (Freiburg 1912). E. A. ROULIN, Vestments and Vesture, tr. J. MCCANN (St. Louis 1931; Westminster, MD, 1950). R. JAMES, Origin and Development of Roman Liturgical Vestments (2d ed. Exeter, 1934). P. F. ANSON, Churches, Their Plan and Furnishing (Milwaukee, 1948). H. NORRIS, Church Vestments (New York, 1950). B. DEAN, Ecclesiastical Embroidery (London 1958). R. LESAGE, Vestments and Church Furniture, tr. F. MURPHY (New York, 1960). Righetti 1:488–524. L'Art d'église (Bruges 1927–), quarterly.

[J. BECKER/EDS.]

Part 9: Episcopal and Abbatial

The origin and development of the use by prelates of the miter, ring, crozier, and coat of arms as marks of dignity and authority, is of interest to the history of forms of art.

Miter. The use of headgear as a symbol of regal, or of priestly status antedates Christianity. The prelatial miter takes its name from the word mitra, meaning in Greek a headband, or diadem, also a conical Persian cap, and in Latin, a bonnet secured to the head by a band. From the conical cap of Oriental origin is derived the papal tiara, and, according to Galbreath, the miter shares the same prototype. A distinctive official headdress was not used by bishops before the 11th century. It first appears as a round bonnet secured by a headband, fastened at the sides, the loose ends depending like lappets. Early in the 12th century this bonnet developed lobes, or points to right and left. By the end of the same century the points shifted to back and front, and the lappets fell at the back. In this form the miter appears on the seal of William, Archbishop of Bourges (1201).

Originally of white linen with embroidery (orphrey) the miter was progressively elaborated until three distinct types emerged in the Middle Ages, differentiated by the quality of the materials used in their construction: (1) the mitra simplex, of plain white linen or silk damask, with red fillets; (2) the mitra aurifrigiata, of silk damask, cloth of silver or gold, embroidered but without jewels, except seed pearls; and (3) the mitra pretiosa, adorned with jewels and plates of precious metal. Before the ornamentation of the miter was standardized greater freedom in its adornment was possible. Woodward mentions a Swedish miter of the 14th century from the cathedral of Lenköping bearing plates of silver gilt enameled with figures of saints and with the arms of the bishop and his diocese.

Keeping its essential form the miter has accommodated itself to changing fashions. In early examples the points were comparatively low, but in the later Middle Ages they began to soar until with the advent of the baroque style they reached the exaggerated height that still largely prevails. An example of a modern miter that reflects the taste of an earlier period is the very pleasing abbatial miter used at the Benedictine abbey at Fort Augustus in Scotland, a low miter richly embroidered in designs that recall the intricacies of Celtic illumination. A good example of the late medieval miter of the heightened form appears as part of the reliquary of St. Lambert in the cathedral at Liège.

The abbatial miter was first conceded in 1063 to Engelsinus, abbot of the monastery of St. Augustine at Canterbury. This was no doubt the mitra simplex. In 1267 exempt abbots were conceded the use of the aurifrigiata. The pretiosa, however, was generally reserved to prelates of at least episcopal rank. (See MITER.)

Rings. Rings of a distinctly Christian character, bearing symbols of the faith and figures of saints, were in use among the faithful at an early date, but the ring as a mark of episcopal dignity and authority appears to have come into use no earlier than the sixth century. St. Isidore, Bishop of Seville (593–633), mentions the bestowal of a ring as "signum pontificalis honoris," as one feature of the consecration ceremony. The bishop's ring, besides being a mark of honor, stands as a symbol of the espousal by the prelate of the flock over which he presides. Some early prelatial rings appear to have been signet rings. It was only later that the custom of adorning the official ring of bishops and abbots with some semiprecious stone became common. The stone most often used appears to have been the amethyst (see RINGS, LITURGICAL USE OF).

Crozier. The crozier as a symbol of spiritual authority antedates both the ring and the miter, its use going back to the 4th century. The nature of this authority is suggested by its form, which is that of the pastoral staff, or shepherd's crook. The earliest examples of the crozier that appear on episcopal and abbatial seals are extremely simple, approximating very nearly the staff actually used by shepherds. With changing fashions in taste, however, the pastoral staff, like the miter, gradually became ornate. Decorative elaboration occurs chiefly on the curved section, or crook. An early example of the tendency to elaborate is the crozier of carved wood used by St. Boniface, the Apostle of Germany (d. 754), which is still preserved at the monastery of Fulda. The curved section of the staff encloses the figure of a lamb surmounted by a cross, presumably a simpler version of the more elaborated Agnus Dei, which in the baroque period is often seen depending from the crook. The crozier, while keeping its essential character of pastoral staff or shepherd's crook, has undergone many accidental changes dictated by the changing taste of successive periods. The transition from late Gothic to baroque produced the type that is in fairly general use today. An example of late medieval taste can be seen in the reliquary of St. Lambert at Liège, mentioned above. An interesting modern crozier designed in the spirit of an earlier period is in use at the Benedictine abbey at Fort Augustus (Scotland). The staff is of a dark wood and the silver crook is elaborated into the form of a dragon, recalling fantasies of medieval illumination.

Episcopal Coat of Arms. Armorial insignia came into fashion in the 12th century. They were adopted at first as a means of identification on the field of battle, where warriors of both sides were encased in nearly identical armor. As a convenient means of identification it began to appear on seals and to serve also as a device for authentication. As such the cognizance of the warrior was adopted by prelates, and in time the custom of displaying a coat of arms as a mark of rank as well as a means of identification became permanently established among churchmen (see HERALDRY).

Normally the personal arms only, inherited or assumed, are to appear upon the shield. A deviation from this rule has become customary in the U.S., where the bishop impales his arms with those of his diocese, the abbot his personal coat with that of his monastery. Behind his shield of arms the bishop places the processional cross. This cross in the case of an archbishop has two traverses. Behind an abbot's shield is placed the crozier, with the "sudarium," a sort of protective scarf, attached to the staff. In the U.S. both the bishop and the abbot place a miter on top of the shield to the left; the bishop places a crozier to the right of his cross behind the shield. Above the shield is placed the ecclesiastical hat with its cords and tassels depending to either side. The rank of the prelate is indicated by the color of this hat and the number of tassels depending from it. The hat of the bishop and of the archbishop is green, that of the abbot, black. A bishop's hat has 12 tassels depending, six to either side of the shield, so also that of an abbot. The number of tassels for an archbishop is increased to 20, 10 to either side of the shield. If the bishop, or archbishop, is also a cardinal the hat is red, the number of tassels 30, 15 to either side of the shield.

The prelatial coat of arms, like the miter and crozier, has reflected current trends in taste; fashions in its design range from the vigor and grace of the best heraldic art of the Middle Ages to the overloaded extravagances of the 18th century. In the latter period the shield was often abandoned in favor of the cartouche, usually oval in shape. Prelates of noble birth often placed over the shield, or cartouche, a coronet indicating their secular rank. In recent times this practice has been forbidden by Rome. The prince-bishops and abbots of the ancien régime, being temporal as well as spiritual rulers, placed behind their shields of arms a sword crossed in saltire with the crozier. Crests are not normally used by ecclesiastics, but there is a curious exception to this rule to be seen in the arms of a medieval bishop of the Palatine See of Durham, where the crest of the bishop's family appears issuing from the top of the miter.

As an art form the ecclesiastical coat of arms has many decorative uses in the embellishment of vestments, sacred vessels, monuments, churches, and other buildings connected with diocesan activities. It has also a modest place in the liturgy for it is customary to display upon the two small kegs of wine presented by a bishop to his consecrator, the consecrator's arms and his own.

Bibliography: W. SMITH and S. CHEETHAM, A Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, 2 v. (Hartford 1880). J. WOODWARD, Ecclesiastical Heraldry (London 1894). D. L. GALBREATH, Papal Heraldry (A Treatise on Ecclesiastical Heraldry 1; Cambridge, England, 1930). B. B. HEIM, Coutumes et droit héraldiques de l'église (Paris 1949). M. RIGHETTI, Manuale di storia liturgica, 4 v. (Milan 1949–55) 1:531–539.

[W. W. BAYNE]

LITURGICAL ARTS SOCIETY

A national organization which existed from 1928 to 1972 for the renewal of liturgical art and aesthetics. The ideals of the society were drawn from the following propositions: (1) the official public worship of the Church has infinite spiritual value and a unique and majestic beauty; (2) this value and beauty demand that the products of artistic endeavor used in the service of the Church embody the highest quality of art and architecture that is free from commercialism and sentimentality. Its principal contribution to the Liturgical Movement among Roman Catholics in the United States was the quarterly journal Liturgical

Arts, which served an important role in promoting the renewal of liturgical art and architecture and stimulating conversation among artists, architects, artisans, liturgists and clerics. In its latter years, the society suffered from a chronic lack of funds, leading finally to its demise in 1972.

Bibliography: S. J. WHITE, Art, Architecture and Liturgical Reform: The Liturgical Arts Society (1928–1972) (New York 1990).

[M. LAVANOUX/EDS.]

LITURGICAL BOOKS OF THE ROMAN RITE

The term liturgical books means the official books of the ROMAN RITE published by authority of the Holy See. The official text of a liturgical book is contained in what is called a typical edition (editio typica), one that is produced by the authority and under the supervision of the Congregation of DIVINE WORSHIP AND THE DISCIPLINE OF SACRAMENTS.

ORIGIN AND HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENTS

It seems clear that in the earliest days the only book used at Christian worship was the Bible from which the lessons were read. The account of Justin Martyr (d. c. 165) in his first Apology (67; J. Quasten, ed., Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima [Bonn 1935–37] 19-20) speaks of reading the memoirs of the Apostles or the writings of the Prophets before the Eucharist, but for the latter he mentions only that the president offered up "prayers and thanksgivings" to the "best of his power." This means that he improvised in accordance with a central theme, and although such solemn prayers would have been prepared in advance, there does not seem at first to have been any written formula that was used. The first written evidence of a formulary for the Eucharist, or at least for its anaphora (eucharistic prayer), is to be found in the Apostolic Tradition, although this, it appears, was not an official book (4; B. Botte, ed., La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte: Essai de reconstitution [1963] 10–16). It is possible that certain formulas became more or less stereotyped before they were written down, and after the Edict of Milan and the peace of the Church (313), the development of a systematic liturgy can be discerned. At the end of the fourth century St. Ambrose (De Sacramentis 4.5, 6) quotes what is clearly the central part of the Roman Canon.

Early Roman Books. The point had been reached when certain of the formulas were being written down; once this happened formulas naturally tended to become fixed. Little books (libelli) were provided for some celebrants as a form of aide-mémoire and appear to have been used in conjunction with the Roman stational churches and for domestic celebration of the Eucharist. The libelli were the immediate forerunners of the Sacramentaries. The most famous collection of Roman libelli is the LEO-NINE SACRAMENTARY (Veronense), a private compilation of various libelli missae collected outside Rome. An interesting feature of this collection is that certain sections of it are made up of libelli forming self-contained units that seem to belong to a transitional period, when formulas were gradually becoming fixed. The Old GELASIAN SACRAMENTARY (Vat Reg Lat 316) was an official compilation with both Roman and Gallican elements. In the evolution of the Roman liturgical books, the Sacramentaries are characteristic in that they are books for the use of a person performing a function and contain solely those formulae that were proper to the celebrant. The Sacramentaries contained the rite as used by the bishop in the celebration of the Eucharist, the conferring of Baptism, Orders, etc. The parts read or sung by others—the choir, reader, deacon, etc.— are found in other books and it is these that must now be examined.

"The Hours of Jeanne d'Evreux": Folio 154. "St. Louis Receives Breviary in Prison," Folio 155. (@Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

Primitively, a Bible was used for the scripture readings. The readings were not yet fixed at this stage; the lector or reader concluded each reading at a signal from the president. As time went on and the course of Scripture readings tended to become fixed, points of beginning and conclusion were marked so that the PERICOPES could easily be found. This book was called the Comes or Liber comicus; from this developed the Evangeliarium (EVANGELARY or Book of Gospels) and Lectionarium (Lectionary) for use by the lector. Similarly there emerged the book containing the parts for the choir (Antiphonarium Missae, Liber antiphonarius, or Gradalis).

The Biblical lessons for the Office, the sermons of the Fathers, and the acts of the martyrs were gradually collected into separate books. The Lectionary, the Homiliary, the Legenda, etc. The last named, distinct from the Martyrology which was primarily a list of anniversaries, contained the account of the sufferings of each martyr; it was read at Rome up to the eighth century at the cemetery basilica of the martyr during the night Office. It was also called the Passionale. The Psalter was written out in the order that the Psalms were to be sung, and for the responsories and antiphons there were the Liber responsorialis and the Antiphonarium Officii. Hymns appeared in the West as part of the Church worship service in the fifth century. They were often included in the Antiphonary, but a separate collection also existed (Hymnarium). At a later date when sequences were introduced, they were added to the Liber antiphonarius or Gradualis. Similarly when parts of the Ordinary of the Mass came to be padded with musical phrases, these pieces were added to the Gradual or Antiphonary, or else contained in a separate book, the Troper, as it was known in medieval England (or Troparium); the earliest known example is the tenth-century St. Martial Troper (Cod. Par. 1240).

The early liturgical books contained very few ritual or ceremonial directions, although some of the Sacramentaries occasionally add a word or two in this respect. The rubrics were probably the last elements of the liturgy to be written down since tradition governed the ceremonial for some time. With increasing elaboration of the papal ceremonial and the use of the Roman rite all over Europe, particularly in Gaul, it became necessary to provide precise directions. This guidance was provided by the Ordinals (Ordines Romani), the first of which was intended as an accompaniment in Gaul of the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries. There is a series of 15 of these Ordines, dating from the seventh to the fourteenth centuries; they were printed first by J. Mabillon in his Musaeum Italicum (reprinted in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878-90] 88:851-1408; critical edition, M. Andrieu, Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge [Louvain 1931-61]) and form the basis for any study of the development of the ceremonial of the Roman rite. The earliest is probably Ordo VII, the greater part of which is to be found in the Gelasian Sacramentary. Ordo I is of great importance and value for its depiction of a papal mass of the Roman Rite circa 700.

Medieval Developments. From around the beginning of the ninth century, the Sacramentary was divided into three books, and thus eventually emerged the Pontifical, Ritual, and Missal, the last named absorbing the parts of all ministers, choir, and people at Mass as well as the celebrant's part. Thus, the whole of the rite was in one book and could be used for low Mass, which was at that time becoming common. The Pontifical contained the complete text of all rites peculiar to a bishop and the Ritual (known also a century or two later as Manuale, Alphabetum Sacerdotum, Sacerdotale, Pastorale), those rites ordinarily performed by a priest (see PONTIFICAL, ROMAN; RITUAL, ROMAN; AND MISSAL, ROMAN).

On the other hand, the various books required for the Divine Office, by means of an abbreviation of the lessons, were finally contained within the covers of a single volume in the 12th and 13th centuries. Thus emerged the BREVIARY, which, as its name indicates, was an abbreviation (at least of the lessons) of the choir Office, although it was not long before the shortened lessons were used in the choir also. Side by side with the Missal and Breviary, however, the use of separate books (Psalter, Hymnal, Antiphonary, Gradual) continued in use to provide the musical (plainchant) settings needed for the singing of the Office and Mass.

COUNCIL OF TRENT'S REFORM OF LITURGICAL BOOKS

It would be a mistake to regard the emergence of these various medieval liturgical books as a sign of liturgical uniformity throughout the West. While the general pattern of the Roman rite as it had evolved was followed everywhere, there were great differences in detail: local "uses" of the Roman rite in whole provinces, dioceses, or religious orders, proliferated. In addition, the great number of feasts of saints observed in the local calendars, and particularly those of the religious orders, practically obscured the proper celebration of the LITURGICAL YEAR, and the text of the liturgical books in many instances (e.g., lessons at Matins and of the Martyrology) was in a corrupt state. Moreover, there were elements in some of the Breviaries and Missals, hymns and antiphons especially, that were really unworthy of worship in the Church. By the beginning of the sixteenth century the time was ripe for reform.

The Council of Trent decreed the general reform that was needed and appointed a commission to deal with the matter, but when the Council closed (December 1563), the commission had not finished its task; the matter was remitted to the pope, Pius IV. He died (1565) before the work was concluded, and the first of the reformed books of the Roman rite were issued by his successor, Pius V (d. 1572). The Roman Breviary appeared in 1568; the Roman Missal, in 1570. At the same time the pope abolished all rites and uses that could not show a prescription of at least 200 years.

In 1588 Sixtus V established the Congregation of RITES for the purpose of carrying out the decrees of the Council of Trent regarding the public worship of the Church. Since that date this Congregation has been a potent influence for uniformity, particularly in watching over the correction and orthodoxy of text of the liturgical books. The first book to be issued as a result of this Congregation's work was the Roman Pontifical in 1596, which was made obligatory on all bishops of the Roman rite. The Ceremonial of Bishops was published by order of Clement VIII in 1600. The immediate source for this book was the Ceremoniale Romanae Ecclesiae of 1516, but as an official liturgical book the Ceremonial of Bishops was an innovation, giving directions for episcopal functions, as well as norms for the daily liturgy in cathedrals and collegiate churches. The reform that Trent initiated was complete with the issuance of the Roman Ritual by Paul V in 1614.

As they were issued in compliance with the instructions of the Council of Trent, the principal books of the Roman Rite remained essentially the same up to the twentieth century. Both Missal and Breviary underwent reform at the hands of Pius X in 1911 and Pius XII in 1955. A further change was the promulgation of Pius XII's Ordinal for Holy Week in 1955 (Ordo hebdomadae sanctae instauratus), containing the restored Holy Week services. This necessarily entailed changes in the liturgical books affected. The Code of Rubrics (1960) resulted in the publication of new typical editions of Missal and Breviary in 1962.

VATICAN II'S REFORM OF LITURGICAL BOOKS

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of the Vatican Council II, promulgated in 1963, called for revision of the liturgical books of the Roman Rite, with a view to simplifying the rites so that the texts and rites "express more clearly the holy things which they signify" and that "the Christian people, as far as possible, be enabled to understand them [the texts and rites] with ease and to take part in them fully and actively" (21). This reform marked the first revision of the official Roman liturgical books after a lapse of four centuries.

The task of reform through revision of service books was entrusted to the CONSILIUM for the Implementation of the Constitution in 1964, and subsequently in 1969 to the Congregation for Divine Worship. With permission being granted for vernacular translations of Latin editones typicae, bishops' conferences established language groups to facilitate the production and publication of vernacular editions of liturgical books. In the English-speaking world, the INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY was established by some dozen English-speaking episcopal conferences. Following the principles set forth in the Instruction on Translation of Liturgical Texts, (Comme le prévoit), ICEL had produced the English version of liturgical texts of the Roman Rite that were adopted by the individual bishops' conferences.

These postconciliar liturgical texts, as all previous official books of the Roman Rite, are published by the authority of the Holy See. However, much distinguishes them from the liturgical books of the past: in variety of options, alternatives, and suggestions; in liturgical theory; in simplicity; and in pastoral concern. Apparent is the conciliar concern for intelligibility and careful restoration, as well as emphasis upon corporate action of the local church.

Bibliography: L. C. SHEPPARD, The Liturgical Books (New York 1962). T. KLAUSER, The Western Liturgy and Its History:

Some Reflections on Recent Studies, tr. F. L. CROSS (New York 1952). C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources (Washington, DC 1986). E. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books from the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century (Collegeville, Minn 1998).

[L. C. SHEPPARD/J. A. WYSOCKI/J. M. SCHELLMAN/EDS.]

LITURGICAL CALENDAR, I: CATHOLIC

Although from the beginning of the Christian Era, the Christians followed the Julian solar calendar of 46 B.C. for general purposes, and with it adopted the Roman usage of counting the days of the month in a continuous series in relation to nones, ides, and kalends, they also evolved a specifically Christian calendar, the center of which was the day of the Resurrection.

Easter. Since the majority of the early Christians were Jewish converts, it is understandable that from the outset the Christian calendar was governed by the fact that the death and Resurrection of Christ had taken place at the time of the chief Jewish feast, the Pasch, or Passover, celebrated on the 14th day of the month of Nisan, i.e., at the full moon following the Spring equinox. However, rather than literally follow the Jewish Passover, since this would necessitate the commemoration of the Resurrection on a different day of the week each year, Christian custom (sanctioned at the Council of NICAEA I in 325; Concilorum occumenicorum decreta [Bologna-Freiburg 1962] 2–3, n.6) fixed the anniversary of Christ's Resurrection on the actual day of the week (the first day) on which the Resurrection had taken place. As a result, Easter falls on the first day of the week (Sunday) after the first full moon following the spring equinox, and can be as early as March 22 and as late as April 25.

The Christian Week. The Christians also adopted from the Jews the seven-day week, dividing it the Christians much as the Jews did, but with some striking differences. Since Christ had died on the eve of the Passover Sabbath and had risen from the dead on the first day of the week following that Sabbath, the sacred character of the Jewish Sabbath (the last day of their week) was now transferred, in memory of the Resurrection, to "the first day of the week" (Acts 20.7), "the Lord's Day" (Rv 1.10), "the day named after the sun" (St. Justin, First Apology, ch. 67; c. 150). Likewise the Jewish tradition of a day of rest was transferred from the Sabbath to SUN-DAY, becoming law in the fourth century. Again, the traditional Jewish fasts on Tuesday and Thursday were advanced by a day to Wednesday (the day of the betrayal of Christ in Passover week) and Friday (the day of the Crucifixion). Apart from the first day of the week, however, Christian usage retained Jewish designations for all the days of the week, thus the second day (Monday) became feria secunda and the Sabbath became Sabbathum (Saturday).

Movable Feasts. By the mid–fourth century there was a cycle of commemorations that had evolved around the feast of Easter, again paralleling Jewish usage. Pentecost, the celebration of the descent of the Holy Spirit, was related to Easter much as the Jewish Pentecost (Feast of Tabernacles, or First-Fruits) related to the Passover, and at the same interval of 50 days. Likewise, the penitential period before Easter, said by LEO I (d. 461) to be of apostolic institution, was modeled on that observed by the Jews before the Passover. Ascension Day, however, was determined by the fact that, as the Acts of the Apostles testify (Acts 1.3), the event had taken place 40 days after the Resurrection.

Computation of Easter. In the early centuries the diversity of rules for observing Easter was the cause of much strife among the churches (see EASTER CONTROVER-SY; COMPUTUS). If various computations of the lunar cycle were current (e.g., those of Alexandria and Rome), the matter was further complicated by the adherence of some Christians (QUARTODECIMANS) to the variable weekday. The Council of Nicaea, however, imposed Sunday as the fixed day of the commemoration of the Resurrection; the universal acceptance of the Alexandrian 19year cycle or COMPUTUS of Easter is due to the Scythian monk DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS at Rome in 526, although the Celtic Church still clung to the Roman computation until 664 (see WHITBY, ABBEY OF). The introduction of a chronological Christian Era is also the work of Dionysius; for, when continuing the Easter tables of CYRIL OF ALEXAN-DRIA for another 95 years, he counted for the first time the years from the birth of Christ, which, however, he wrongly dated to 754 A.U.C., at least four years too late.

The Dionysian cycle was universally followed until the Gregorian reform, which altered the cycle so as to predict the date of full moons more accurately. Belief in the Nicene origin of the Dionysian cycle was one reason for opposition to the Gregorian reform by the Orthodox Churches which still use the old cycle, making their Easter sometimes differs by as much as five weeks from that of the Latin Church. The full moon computed by the Gregorian cycle may differ from the date of the astronomical full moon, so that occasionally the Gregorian Easter differs from that determined astronomically (e.g., 1962). This was well known to the authors of the reform and is inherent in any form of cyclical computation. It could be avoided by using the astronomical full moon, but this solution was rejected, for it would bring its own difficulties; e.g., full moon may fall on different days on either side of the date line.

The fact that the dates of Easter on the Gregorian and Julian Calendars do not correspond has been perceived as a source of scandal and a sign of disunity among Christians on the holiest of days. In the 1990s, the World Council of Churches made several unsuccessful attempts to come up with a common date for Easter for Orthodox, Catholics, and other Christians.

The Christmas Cycle. A second cycle of feasts, this time a fixed one, was introduced some time after the movable Easter cycle. The earliest mention of an anniversary of the birth of Christ on CHRISTMAS Day (December 25) is in the Philocalian Calendar. The entry, which may be dated to 336, reads: VIII.kal. Ian. natus Christus in Betleem Iudeae. Many scholars think that the date was chosen to offset the imperial feast of the Natalis solis invicti (the birthday of the unconquered sun). The Christological controversies of the fourth and fifth centuries doubtless contributed to the feast's growth in importance; it also aided in lessening the importance of the feast of the EPIPHANY, originally a more important feast, to the point that it became part of the Christmas cycle, a position that evolved in Africa sometime between 380 and 530, passed from there into Spain, and then to Italy. AD-VENT, which now prefaces the cycle, appears to have been introduced at Rome by Pope SIMPLICIUS or Pope GELASIUS I in the second half of the fifth century.

Other Fixed Commemorations. In Asia Minor from the end of the second century and at Rome from at least the third, the anniversary of a martyr's death was kept as a feast, with a liturgical celebration at his tomb. This day was the dies natalis of the martyr, possibly meaning his "heavenly birthday." These commemorations, together with a brief indication of the time, place, and circumstances of the martyr's death or burial, were often entered into registers roughly known as MARTYR-OLOGIES. The oldest extant compilation of this nature occurs in a commonplace book of Furius Dionysius Filocalus. Begun at Rome in 336 and completed in 354, it contains an invaluable list of popes (Depositio episcoporum) and martyrs (Depositio martyrum), together with indications of other Roman commemorations, e.g., Christmas. From an examination of the three most ancient martyrologies (Philocalian; Syrian, 411; Carthaginian, c. 450) and of other martyrologies such as the Hieronymian, the Gallican of Polemius Silvius, the Mozarabic, and the Andalusian, it may be concluded: (1) that although the celebrations of martyrs were occasioned initially by local cultus, the more celebrated of these martyrs soon obtained favor outside their own localities; (2) that from an early date, feasts were granted to the Apostles; (3) that feasts of Our Lady (see MARIAN FEASTS) were not general until c. 650, although the PURIFICATION OF MARY was kept locally at Jerusalem on Feb. 14 (later Feb. 2) from c. 350.

Reforms and Revisions. The multiplication of lists of martyrs (to which non-martyrs were added in time) and the emergence of liturgical books (of the Roman rite) such as sacramentaries, LECTIONARIES, and Gospel books (see: EVANGELARY) contributed greatly to the decline of the ferial day, especially during the Carolingian period, when continuators of the classic martyrology of BEDE (d. 735) rushed to fill in every blank space. The inclusion of new saints and new devotional interests led, well before the end of the Middle Ages, to overcrowded and chaotic calendars. A greater uniformity throughout the Church was ensured by the reformed calendar of PIUS V (1568–70), inasmuch as all churches and religious orders that could not prove a prescription of 200 years were obliged to conform to the new disposition of the calendar. An instruction of the Congregation of Rites of Feb. 14, 1961 [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 53 (1961) 168-180], reducing considerably the commemoration of saints, now allows the ferial day much of its original Paschal connotation. However, the most far-reaching reform of the liturgical calendar was effected by the 1969 General Norms of the Roman Calendar, which drastically pruned the number of commemoration of saints from 338 to 191.

Particular Calendars. The General Norms of the 1969 Roman Calendar allow the formation of particular calendars, i.e. the insertion of special celebrations into the general calendar by individual regions, countries, dioceses, and religious families. In June of 1970, the Congregation for Divine Worship issued an instruction giving specific norms for the establishment of such calendars.

Particular calendars may include saints proper to a region or religious community, as well as those saints listed in the universal calendar to whom a higher rank will be given. To insure historical credibility, proper hagiographical studies must, when necessary, be conducted regarding the life and deeds of the saint. Whenever possible, the saint should be commemorated on the day of death; otherwise, on a day of importance in the cult of the saint. If the feast already occurs in the general calendar, it should generally be observed on the same day. Permission is granted for a more solemn celebration of the saint in some parts, rather than in the whole of a diocese or religious family.

In addition to commemorating those saints having a special connection with a particular diocese, the diocesan calendar may include a proper liturgical celebration of the principal and secondary patrons of the diocese, as well as the anniversary of the dedication of the cathedral.

Bibliography: The three earliest martyrologies in H. LIETZ-MANN, ed., Die drei ültesten Martyrologien (Bonn 1903). See additional bibliog. under MARTYROLOGIES, MARTYROLOGY, ROMAN, MARTYROLOGY OF ST. JEROME. L. DUCHESNE, "La Question de la Pâque au concile de Nicée," Revue des questions historiques 28 (1880) 5-42. N. NILLES, ed., Kalendarium manuale utriusque ecclesiae, orientalis et occidentalis, 2 v. (Innsbruck 1896-97). W. H. FRERE, Studies in Early Roman Liturgy, 3 v. (Oxford 1930-35) v.1. B. BOTTE, Les Origines de la Noël et de l'Épiphanie (Louvain 1932). H. DELEHAYE, Les Origines du culte des martyrs (2d ed. Brussels 1933). P. JOUNEL, "Le Sanctoral romain du 8e au 12e siècles," Maison-Dieu 52 (1957) 59-88. Sacred Congregation for Divine Worship, "Normae universales de anno liturgico et de calendario," Notitiae 46 (Apr.-June 1969) 165-176 (Eng. tr., USCC pub. v-453). "Instructio de calendariis particularibus atque officiorum et Missarum propriis recognoscendis," Notitiae 58 (Nov. 1970) 348-370. T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (Collegeville, 1991); A. J. MARTIMORT, ed. The Church at Prayer IV: The Liturgy and Time (Collegeville 1986); A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year: Its History & Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy (New York 1981). J. F. BALDOVIN, "The Liturgical Year: Calendar for a Just Community," in Liturgy and Spirituality in Context, ed. E. BERNSTEIN (Collegeville, Minn 1990) 98-114. "Towards a Common Date for Easter: WCC/MECC Consultation," Saint Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 41(1997) 235-247. B.L. MARTHALER, "The Date of Easter, Anno Domini, and Other Calendar Considerations: Chronology or Eschatology?" Worship 73 (1999) 194-211.

[L. E. BOYLE/EDS.]

LITURGICAL CALENDAR, II: ECUMENICAL

The liturgical year is not the result of a direct and conscious arrangement of the annual cycle for pedagogical purposes about some such thematic scheme as the life of Christ or salvation history. Rather, it is the result of a long and complex evolution in which many cultic and cultural forces have shaped times of feast and fast into a pattern that not only celebrates the several dimensions of the Christian kerygma, but constitutes an epitome of the entire Christian tradition. Critically reviewed in the 16th century, with widely divergent results ranging from slight to radical reform, the calendar has received fresh attention since Vatican Council II along lines manifesting more ecumenical convergence. Calendars of Western Christian Churches in the United States today agree in beginning the year with four Sundays of Advent leading to Christmas, and all observe the feast of Epiphany on January 6 or an adjacent Sunday, with the Sunday after Epiphany kept as the Baptism of Christ. Omitting the former three pre-lenten Sundays (Septuagesima, Sexagesima, Quadragesima), all begin Lent on Ash Wednesday and distinguish the days of Holy Week. Easter is celebrated for 50 days, terminated by the one-day celebration of Pentecost, from which the following Sundays are numbered.

Such are the norms for the liturgical year issued with the new Roman Calendar (1969). They were adopted by the Presbyterian Worshipbook (1970), the Episcopal Book of Common Prayer (1979), and the Lutheran Book of Worship (1978). The same norms govern the lectionary prepared for the Consultation on Church Union (1974), now approved for use by the Methodist Church. The Disciples of Christ and the United Church of Christ follow the calendar of the Presbyterian Worshipbook. In the United Kingdom, on the other hand, calendar reform began somewhat earlier and along different lines. In 1963 a Joint Liturgical Group composed of representatives of the churches of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales (Anglican, Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregationalist, and Churches of Christ, with an observer from the Roman Catholic Church) undertook the formulation of a common calendar and lectionary along new lines. The result, published in 1967, arranged the Sundays of the year thematically about three major festivals: Christmas and Easter, each preceded by nine Sundays and followed by six, and Pentecost, followed by 21 Sundays. Although the earlier (1962) calendar of the Church of South India had treated Septuagesima as the Ninth Sunday before Easter, the parallel arrangement before Christmas was an innovation of the Joint Liturgical Group. Traditional themes of Epiphany were set on the first and third Sundays after Christmas, but that feast itself did not appear. Since its publication this radical proposal has undergone further development in a more conservative direction in individual churches. In The Calendar and Lessons (1969) the Church of England added feasts of Christ and of the saints, and the Methodist Service Book (1975) restored Epiphany and All Saints' Day. Both retain the three pre-lenten Sundays as well as the distinctive nine Sundays before Christmas, although alternative titles show that these are coming to be seen either as Sundays before Advent (Methodist) or as the last five Sundays after Trinity or Pentecost (Church of England). A period preceding Advent has also characterized the Methodist calendar in the United States, the time after Pentecost giving way to a season of Kingdomtide from the last Sunday of August. Roman and Lutheran calendars designate the last Sunday after Pentecost as Feast of Christ the King, and the same lessons are given in other lectionaries.

While the number of observances in the sanctoral cycle has been reduced in the reform of the Roman Calendar, it has been increased in calendars of the Lutheran Church to 127 and of the Episcopal Church to 152; for both the latter these are divided between feasts (Lutheran, 30; Episcopal, 33) and optional commemorations. Like the Roman, the Lutheran Calendar occasionally places more than one optional memorial on the same day. The General Roman Calendar has 33 feasts of fixed date (10 designated Solemnities) with others of moveable date, as well as 64 obligatory memorials. All modern calendars strongly emphasize SUNDAY as a weekly feast of Christ that is accorded precedence over all but the most important feasts of fixed date, an emphasis that casts doubt on the acceptability of any universal calendar reform (such as the World Calendar), which would interrupt the independent cycle of the week.

Bibliography: R. C. D. JASPER, ed., The Calendar and Lectionary: A Reconsideration by the Joint Liturgical Group (London 1967). The Standing Liturgical Commission of the Episcopal Church, The Church Year (Prayer Book Studies 19; New York 1970). The Inter-Lutheran Commission on Worship, The Church Year: Calendar and Lectionary (Contemporary Worship 6; Minneapolis, Minn; Philadelphia, Pa; and St. Louis, Mo. 1973). R. NARDONE, "The Roman Calendar in Ecumenical Perspective," Worship 50 (1976) 238–246. H. M. DANIELS, "Recent Changes in the Presbyterian Celebration of the Liturgical Year," Reformed Liturgy and Music 16 (Fall 1982) 153–158.

[T. J. TALLEY/EDS.]

LITURGICAL CATECHESIS

Liturgical catechesis seeks to lead communities and individual members of the faithful to maturity of faith through full and active participation in the liturgy, which effects and expresses that faith. As the name itself suggests, liturgical catechesis is only one of several forms of catechesis, although all forms have a liturgical dimension. Liturgical catechesis has certain identifying characteristics. It is trinitarian-paschal, ecclesial, sacramental and transformative. The paschal mystery is the heart of all catechesis, the cornerstone of Christian faith and paradigm of the Christian life, both for individuals and for a community of faith. Liturgical celebration is an ecclesial action. It is not simply a series of actions but the celebration and expression of relationships: relationship to God and to one another in Christ through the Spirit.

Liturgical catechesis takes place in the midst of the community because the Church's faith precedes the faith of those who are invited to believe. Catechesis is the responsibility of the whole church. Liturgical catechesis is sacramental. It aims to initiate people into the mystery of Christ "by proceeding from the visible to the invisible, from the sign to the signified, from the sacrament to the mysteries" (CCC, no 1075). The central symbols such as the assembly, the water, wine, oil, imposition of hands, reading and interpretation of scripture and the sign of the cross are constituent of the liturgy and are contextualized within the liturgical year. Liturgical catechesis aims to uncover the meaning of these symbolic actions so that the faithful may gradually realize that by participation in the sacramental action they participate in the saving action of Christ. The liturgy supports conversion, a transformation that takes place throughout the individual's life, that results in a life lived in charity, justice and peace making.

Strictly speaking, liturgical catechesis is MYSTAGO-GY. Mystagogy is a reflection upon the symbols, actions and scriptures of the liturgical rite in terms of one's daily life. It is dependent upon the celebration of the assembly, and the celebration in turn is deepened by a preparation for the liturgy that builds up a lexicon of images, concepts, scriptural stories, ritual action and symbols.

The first dimension, preparation for the liturgy, begins with the human values that are present in the liturgical celebration including "community activity, exchange of greetings, capacity to listen, to seek and grant pardon, expression of gratitude, experience of symbolic actions, a meal of friendship and festive celebration" (DMC, 9). Liturgical catechesis fosters reflection on the rites and prayers of the liturgy in the light of these human values. The rites and prayers are seen within the framework of the scriptures, the doctrinal and liturgical tradition, the liturgical year and of necessity include attention to the social and cultural context of the community. The theological principles for catechesis are drawn from the theology in the Introduction to the Rite. Liturgical catechesis takes place within a celebration of the word (RCIA, 85–89). The preparation for the liturgy is essential in building up a storehouse of images, rituals, symbols, gestures, music and sacred space that serve as a source for interpreting the experience of the liturgy and enabling the community to attend to the ways in which the liturgy reveals the presence of God in their lives.

The second phase is catechesis through the liturgy. Liturgy conveys its meaning not through explanation but through participation. Liturgy is experiential and liturgical catechesis opens up and brings to awareness what is known intuitively. The mystagogical reflection, catechesis from the liturgy, occurs after the celebration but the celebration of the rite and mystagogy is all of piece. It takes place in the midst of the community and brings together the human values, the received tradition, and the experience of the individual within the context of the community. Mystagogy is about making meaning. It is a way of interpreting life and responding to the mystery celebrated. The process then, progresses from reflection on the community's experience of the liturgical action in light of human values, to the interpretation of the experience in terms of the Scriptures and the Christian tradition; to an exploration of the meaning in their own lives and its ethical implications for living a life of peace and justice. Celebration followed by reflection, and then action, returns to celebration with new insight and new meaning.

This form of catechesis is not new but rather is a restoration of a relationship between liturgy and catechesis that existed in the early church and is so well illustrated by the mystagogical homilies for example, of St. AMBROSE, CYRIL of Jerusalem, THEODORE OF Mopsuestia and St. AUGUSTINE. It is again given prominence by the 1963 Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (48) and other liturgical and catechetical documents such as the 1967 Instruction on the Worship of the Eucharistic Mystery ([Eucharisticum mysterium] (14–15), the Apostolic Exhortation of John Paul II, Catechesis in our Time (23), The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (75), the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1074–1075) and The General Directory for Catechesis (1997).

Bibliography: C. DOOLEY, "Liturgical Catechesis: Mystagogy, Marriage or Misnomer?" Worship 66 (1992): 386–397. G. OSTDIEK, "Catechesis, Liturgical" in The New Dictionary of Sacramental Worship, ed. P. FINK (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 1990), 163–172. G. OSTDIEK, "Liturgy as Catechesis For Life," Liturgical Ministry 7 (1998): 76–82. T. MORRIS, "Liturgical Catechesis Revisited," Catechumenate 17 (May 1995): 13–19. G. F. BAUMBACH, Experiencing Mystagogy: The Sacred Pause of Easter (New York: Paulist, 1996).

[C. DOOLEY]

LITURGICAL COLORS

All Church vesture achieves its effect by its cut, color, and texture. Color appeals most quickly to the emotions, and the proper use of it can help the priest and people to feel the mood and spirit of a particular feast day. Colors of the spectrum may be associated with two moods: the warm, active, and exciting qualities of red and the cool, passive, and calming qualities of blue, violet and green. Because of these associations, it is not surprising that a color sequence proper to particular feasts of the Church year became the subject of ecclesiastical legislation.

The first such legislation known is that of the 12thcentury crusaders written for their Church at Jerusalem. Innocent III (1198-1216) prescribed five colors for liturgical use in the Roman Rite: white, red, green, black, and violet (De Sacro Altaris Mysterio 1.65). Although the directive is precise about what colors are to be used, it leaves the choice of shades of these colors to the vestment maker. Innocent III's color scheme forms the basis for contemporary practice. White is worn on Sundays in Eastertide, on solemnities of Our Lord and the Blessed Virgin Mary, and for funeral masses; red is used for Pentecost and the feasts of apostles and martyrs; violet for Advent and Lent; and green for Sundays in ordinary time. From the 13th century onward, the practice of wearing rose-colored vestments on the 3rd Sunday of Advent (Gaudete Sunday) and the 4th Sunday of Lent (Laetare Sunday) caught on.

Bibliography: W. H. HOPE and E. G. ATCHLEY, Liturgical Colors (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; London 1918).

[M. MCCANCE/EDS.]

LITURGICAL CONFERENCE

The Liturgical Conference began as the Benedictine Liturgical Conference, under the sponsorship of the Benedictine abbots of the United States in 1940. The first of these meetings, called Liturgical Weeks, was held in Chicago in 1940, and they were held annually in major cities throughout the United States and Canada. In 1943, the leaders of the Benedictine Liturgical Conference decided to dissolve it as a Benedictine enterprise and to reconstitute it on a broader basis. In 1944, the Liturgical Conference was incorporated as a voluntary association of American clergy and laity, formed to promote understanding of the liturgy among Catholics and to assist in leading the people to a full, active participation in the Church's public worship.

The Instruction on Sacred Music and Liturgy (Sept. 3, 1958) requiring the active participation of the people in liturgical rites, gave new impetus to the work of the conference. Its activities were expanded to serve the growing needs of parishes and dioceses. Under the presidency of F. R. McManus, a central office was opened in Washington, D.C., in February of 1960. Relations were established with diocesan liturgical commissions, and programs and publications were produced for laity and clergy.

The tremendous impetus given to all movements for ecclesial reform and renewal by the Second Vatican Council led to the expansion of the conference's membership and activities. The Liturgical Weeks drew large crowds of people, peaking at about 15,000. In 1964, the conference launched a major publishing and educational program to promote liturgical renewal and reform. This "Parish Worship Program" (1964) of books, kits, pamphlets was followed by the publication of a popular commentary on the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy in 1965. Regional groups developed in New England, the Southeast, and the Southwest.

At the same time, ecumenical activity was accelerating. A number of Anglican, Lutheran, and other Christian liturgists became involved in the conference's activities. They participated in the one-day institutes preceding the Liturgical Weeks, and subsequently in the programs of the Liturgical Weeks themselves. Some were nominated and elected to the Board of Directors. Membership became opened to all Christians who share the conference's concerns. The conference's character evolved to one that is consciously and deliberately ecumenical.

The 1970s witnessed a great flourish in the conference's publications and activities. The conference sponsored specialized conferences on church architecture and music, and initiated a number of new periodical services: Living Worship, Homily Service, Parish Council, Today Songs for Today's People, and Major Feasts and Seasons. Short educational films on liturgical renewal were produced in cooperation with other agencies. Corresponding to the rapid postconciliar development of liturgical renewal and with the evolving ecumenical character of the conference, the range and focus of publications broadened. Problems of adapting reformed liturgical rites were addressed in the Manual of Celebration and its supplement; The Rite of Penance (a three-volume collection comprising: (1) Understanding the Document, (2) Implementing the Rite, and (3) Background and Directions); It Is Your Own Mystery: A Guide to Communion Rite; Celebrating Baptism; Children's Liturgies; Signs, Songs and Stories; There's No Place Like People; and Parishes and Families. The conference also produced liturgy resource materials: Liturgy Committee Handbook (1971); The Lector's Guide (1973); The Ministry of Music (1975); There Are Different Ministries (1975); Strong, Loving and Wise: Presiding in Liturgy (1976); The Spirit Moves: A Handbook of Dance and Prayer (1976); and Touchstones for Liturgical Ministers (1978). The particular gifts and contribution of the black worship experience in the United States is the subject of This Far By Faith: American Black Worship and Its African Roots. Other resource collections included Simple Gifts (a two-volume collection of articles from Liturgy); Dry Bones (a collection of articles from Living Worship); The Rites of People (a popular study of ritual questions); and the more recent From Ashes to Easter: Design for Parish Renewal (Years A, N and C) and Preaching on Death.

The Conference continues to publish Liturgy and Homily Service. Liturgy is now a quarterly resource for parish liturgy planning, with practical aids for clergy, musicians, educators, and planners. Homily Service is ecumenical in focus, covering readings from the Revised Common Lectionary, the Book of Common Prayer and Lectionary for Mass.

[J. B. MANNION/R.W. HOVDA/V. SLOYAN]

LITURGICAL GESTURES

Bodily gestures are the principal means by which one expresses the highest forms of one's spiritual, intellectual, and artistic experiences, and the principal ways in which humans communicate with each other. Rite and ceremony have been used by all religions both to intensify and to communicate the interior dispositions of the soul. Gestures, no less than words, are a part of human language, the one appealing to sight, the other to hearing—the two senses closest to the intellect and therefore closest to the spiritual life. Each is a language unto itself, yet normally they depend upon each other for the full expression of one's inner self—words calling upon gestures to give them greater force, intensity, and eloquence, and gestures calling upon words to make their meaning more articulate. Any act or movement of the human body becomes a gesture when it gives expression to meaning within an interpersonal relationship. Liturgical gestures in their turn express specific meanings within the relationship between God and human persons in community celebrations.

Christian Use. Christian prayer demands a profound engagement of the human body because the mystery of the Incarnation—the Word became flesh and gave humanity a share in the social life of the Trinity, expressed in the communal life of the Mystical Body. For Christians, the mystery of the Incarnation is the reason for sacramentalizing the human body. Human gestures play an extensive role throughout the entire liturgy. The use of bodily gesture in the prayer life of the Church is simply an imitation of Christ himself who in prayer lifted his eyes to heaven, prostrated himself, etc.; who used gestures as a means to perform his miracles when a simple word would have sufficed; who taught by means of such gestures as the washing of the feet of his disciples; and who finally offered his entire body in the perfect act of worship on the cross.

In particular, there are three ways in which the human body, through the use of gestures, enters into the liturgical action of the Church: by giving expression to the sentiments and dispositions of the soul, as in extending the hands, bowing, or kneeling; by performing an action upon an external object, as in anointings and blessings; and by being acted upon in such a way that it becomes sanctified, as in baptismal immersion or the laying on of hands.

However, if gestures are to be meaningful and our use of them intelligent, their real significance must be properly understood. For this two extremes must be avoided. One is the excessively allegorical interpretation found in a number of medieval authors, such as AMALARIUS of Metz (d. 850) and Bernold of Constance (d. 1100), which was popular up to the 17th century. Like the allegorical exegesis of the Bible characteristic of some of the early Church Fathers, this method projects into liturgical gesture arbitrary, subjective, mystical, and piously moralistic significance that ignores its actual historical origin or its objective basic symbolism. Thus, to cite only one example, a great variety of meanings were attributed to the gesture of breaking the host into three parts: the Blessed Trinity, the three parts of the Church, the wounds of Christ in the three parts of His body, the three travelers on the road to Emmaus, etc. The other extreme is exemplified by Dom Claude de Vert [Explication simple, littérale et historique des cérémonies de l'Église, 4 v. (Paris 1706–13)], who tried to eliminate all symbolism from liturgical ceremonies by explaining their origin in terms of practical necessity or convenience. Later, Pierre Le Brun succeeded in avoiding these two extreme positions by taking into account both symbolic and functional aspects [Explication littérale, historique et dogmatique des prières et des cérémonies de la Messe, 4 v. (Paris 1716–25)].

Kinds. In the light of objective and realistic analysis, liturgical actions can be grouped into three main categories. First of all, there are actions that serve functional purposes of utility, convenience, or fittingness, such as the ablutions of the chalice and the fingers of the priest after Communion. Then there are interpretative actions that express the natural human inclination to communicate by combining words and gestures, such as kneeling as a sign of penitence. Third, there are purely symbolic actions, such as the presentation of the white robe and the lighted candle to the newly baptized. It is also possible to divide all liturgical actions into postures and gestures.

Standing. In modern times kneeling has become generally accepted as the most appropriate attitude for prayer. In antiquity, however, and for many centuries in the Church, standing was considered to be the most normal posture, and it is still so considered by the liturgy, except for times and ceremonies that call for a special expression of penance and humble adoration. Even today many of the older basilicas do not have pews or kneelers. Standing was considered by the Jews as the most fitting attitude in praying to the Lord (Ex 33.8, 10; Sir 50.12–13; 1 Sm 1.26; Ps 135.2; Mt 6.5; Mk 11.25; Lk 18.11) and in listening to Him speak (Ex 19.17; Neh 8.5). That the early Christians adopted this custom as the normal attitude for prayer is evident not only from the many images of the "orante" in the catacombs and on ancient sarcophagi, but also from the testimony of early ecclesiastical writers: Justin (Apologia 1.67; J. Quasten, ed., Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima 19), Tertullian (De corona militis 3; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 2:99), and Cyprian (De dominica oratione 31; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3.1:289). St. Benedict made standing the official posture for chanting the psalms.

For the early Christians, as for the pagans and the Jews, standing was a natural expression of respect and reverence. But for the Christians, as is evident in the writings of the Fathers, it had the added significance of the new dignity, the liberty of the children of God, the freedom from slavery and sin through Baptism and participation in the Resurrection, which makes it possible to stand confidently before God with eyes and arms uplifted to Him. As the Second Eucharistic Prayer of the Roman Rite puts it: "We thank you for counting us worthy to stand before you and serve you." For Tertullian (De oratione 23; Patrologia Latina 1:1191) kneeling was a sign of atonement and penance, whereas standing signified joy, and for this reason standing was customary throughout the Easter and Pentecost season; it was contrary to Church discipline to kneel on Sundays (De corona militis 3; Patrologia Latina 2:99). As a matter of fact, the first Council of NICAEA explicitly made standing obligatory on Sundays and during the Easter season (c.20; J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 2:719-20). Something of this prescription still exists in the custom of standing for the Angelus on Saturday evening and throughout Sunday, and also for the REGINA CAELI during paschal time. Because the day consecrated to the Resurrection is a kind of image of the future world, the attitude of standing had for the early Christians an eschatological meaning: it was considered the proper attitude for those awaiting with confidence the Parousia. In a very special way, standing was considered proper for the exercise of the priesthood.

Sitting. This is the normal position of an official teacher, of a presiding officer, of a judge, and of a person of special dignity in the presence of others of lower rank. The word "cathedral" comes from the Latin word cathedra, a throne or seat, which, as the place where a bishop presides and teaches, symbolizes his jurisdiction and his functions. When the pope teaches infallibility he speaks ex cathedra. And formerly, rubrics provided for the bishop and priests to be seated during certain liturgical functions, but excluded all other ministers, even the deacons, from assuming this position. Sitting is a normal attitude for both speaker and listener. The Child Jesus was found seated in the midst of the doctors of the temple (Lk 2.46). Mary sat at the feet of Jesus listening to His words (Lk 10.39). There are indications in Scripture that, for both the Jews and the early Christians, a sitting position was customary for listening to readings and the sermon, while standing was the usual practice for prayer (Lk 4.16-20; Jn 8.2; Acts 20.9; 1 Cor 14.30). Similar indications are found in Justin (Apologia 1.67; Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima 19) and in the Apostolic Constitutions (8.6.2; Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima 199). Sitting has become a more common attitude in prayer in modern times, especially since pews were introduced into churches after the 16th century, as a result of the influence of the Reformation, whose services concentrated almost exclusively on the hearing of the Word of God. More recent rubrics have emphasized the position of sitting as the proper attitude for listening to God's Word, except for the Gospel, when the special dignity of the Word of God calls for the more respectful attitude of standing.

Kneeling. Though it is especially in the last few centuries that kneeling has become the most popular position of the body in prayer, the almost instinctive practice of kneeling at prayer goes back to the Old Testament (1 Kgs 8.54; Dn 6.11) and is found in many pagan religions. This has been especially true in private prayer, and more particularly in times of especially intense prayer. Christ Himself prayed on His knees during the agony in the garden (Lk 22.41); Stephen knelt to pray before his martyrdom (Acts 7.60). The kneeling posture was introduced in the liturgy principally as a sign of humble supplication, sorrow, and a penitential spirit, incompatible with a time of joy, such as Eastertide, but especially suitable for times of fasting (Tertullian, De oratione 23; Patrologia Latina 1:1191). Reminders of the special connection between kneeling and fasting still exist in the liturgy, as, for example, the Flectamus genua of Good Friday. In the course of time, kneeling was reinterpreted more and more a sign of profound adoration, and this is now its most predominant meaning. For this reason the rubrics now prescribe this posture especially for adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. It would seem that the growing practice of adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, resulting from the effort of the Counter Reformation to emphasize the Real Presence, has been one of the main reasons why kneeling, rather than standing, has in modern times become the most characteristic attitude of prayer.

Genuflection. The gesture of bending the knee is of ancient origin dating back to pre-Christian times. Its primary significance among the pagans, especially those of the Roman Empire, was that of adoration and worship, and it was used as a salutation to the gods and to the "divine" rulers, particularly the emperor. Because of this pagan religious significance, it was not used by the early Christians. When, however, it eventually lost this religious significance and began to be used simply as a sign of respect and courtesy for those in high authority, it was first used by Christians as a sign of reverence for popes and bishops [T. Klauser, The Western Liturgy and Its History (London 1952) 27], later for the altar, the crucifix, and relics and images of Christ and the saints. During the early centuries the profound bow, rather than genuflection, was prescribed by the Church as the customary act of adoration, and this practice has persisted in the Eastern Churches. In some places in the West, genuflection was explicitly forbidden since it recalled the mockery of Christ in his Passion. In the 11th century, however, it began to be introduced as an act of adoration of the Blessed Sacrament in reaction to the errors of BERENGARI-US OF TOURS. It was not until the 16th century that it entered the liturgy of the Mass. In 1502 it was introduced into the Ordo Missae of John Burchard and 70 years later into the Missale Romanum of Pius V.

Bows. Bowing is a gesture that is, in a sense, something between standing erect and genuflecting, and it has, generally speaking, the same significance as the latter: humble supplication and above all adoration when directed toward God, reverence and veneration when directed toward persons of high rank or objects. An instinctive expression of one's inner feelings and a common gesture in ancient pagan rites, it was introduced early into Christian prayer and became one of the most commonly used gestures in the liturgy, often on occasions for which genuflection has now been substituted in the Latin Church. It is used both to express and to intensify a variety of religious sentiments: adoration and reverence in prayer, and respect for sacred objects, particularly the altar and the crucifix.

Prostration. This is a more intense, total, and dramatic way of expressing the same sentiments expressed in genuflection: adoration, penance, and supplication. It was common among ancient peoples and especially the Jews (Gn 17.3; Dt 9.18; Neh 8.6; Tb 12.16; Jdt 9.1; 10.1; 2 Mc 10.4). It is also found in the New Testament (Mt 17.6; 26.29). There are indications that it was a fairly common form of penance during the early centuries of the Church (Tertullian, De poenitentia 9.2; Patrologia Latina 1:1243-44). For a time and in certain places, it was the customary way of venerating the altar at the beginning of Mass. It is now restricted to only a few ceremonies of special solemnity: the beginning of the Good Friday liturgy (probably a relic of the ancient prostration before Mass), ordination to major orders, the blessing of abbots, and monastic profession.

Facing the East. A special orientation at prayer, particularly in the direction of the rising sun, was extremely common in ancient pagan rites, especially in those which worshiped the sun as a god. The Jews turned toward the Temple in Jerusalem when they prayed (Dn 6.11). In adopting this custom the Christians gave it a number of new meanings: the sun was the symbol of the light that is Christ; He is the Oriens ex alto (Lk 1.79), the Sun of Justice; He had ascended into heaven in the east and was expected to return from there (Mt 24.27); the Garden of Paradise was supposed to be located in the east (Apostolic Constitutions 2.57.14; Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima 184-85). This practice remained largely Eastern and it gained only a limited and temporary acceptance in the West, through Byzantine and Gallican influences, in the construction of churches oriented toward the east, and in the custom of celebrants facing in that direction while at prayer. It fell gradually into disuse with the lessening of expectancy of the second coming of Christ, though in some places it lingered on in private devotion in the Middle Ages.

The Orans Position. Since it has always been a universal feeling that the dwelling place of God is above the sky, the upward movement of the soul is naturally accompanied by corresponding gesture of standing with outstretched hands, a.k.a. the orans position. These gestures were common among the pagans and the Jews (Ex 9.29; Ps 28.2; 63.5; Is 1.15). They were used by early Christians [1 Tm 2.8 Tertullian, Liber apologeticus 30 (Patrologia Latina 1:422); Clement of Rome, Epist. 1 ad Cor. 29 (Patrologica Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 1:270)].

Among all the organs of the body, the hands, after the tongue, are the most effective instruments for communicating the thoughts and sentiments of the soul. It is not surprising, then, that the liturgy pays a great deal of attention to the movements of the hands and tries to make full use of their capacity to express the relations of the soul with God. Just as the modern practice of kneeling has obscured the fact that standing is the much more traditional attitude, so the modern custom of joining the hands makes us lose sight of the fact that formerly the orans position was a much more common gesture. There are evidences that joining the hands was known in private prayer in the 9th century; there are no examples of it in Christian monuments until the 12th century; and it was about this time that it began to be used in the liturgy. It seems to be derived from the Frankish feudal custom for a vassal to present himself to his lord with folded hands, and in that context it signified subjection and submission (M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica 1:231). It may also be taken to symbolize recollection and fervor.

Standing erect with arms outstretched was the favorite posture in the early ages of the Church. This gesture was taken to represent the posture of Christ on the cross when He offered the supreme prayer of sacrifice (Tertullian, De oratione 14; Patrologia Latina 1:1169-70). For this reason, until the end of the 15th century, it was prescribed for the Mass, particularly during the Canon, and more especially during the time immediately following the Consecration. In a somewhat modified form it perdures in the present Mass at the orations, the Canon, and the LORD'S PRAYER. It is also found in the ascetical practices of some religious communities. Thus, through the raising of his hands, one is able to express in an intense manner, one's identification with the sacrifice of Christ, the lifting up of one's whole being to God, one's dependence upon God, and confident waiting for God's answer, and the opening out of one's soul to God.

Imposition of Hands. This gesture is, in a sense, the primary and most important of all the liturgical gestures because of the essential role it plays in the sacramental action of the Church. Though widely used outside its sacramental role, its special importance and dignity is evidenced by the fact that its use has always been restricted to bishops and clerics. The human hands play such an important role in almost all human activities that they have traditionally been considered symbols of strength, power, and dignity, and of the communication of these qualifies. This is why Scripture speaks so frequently of the arm of God and of the right hand of the Lord. The IMPOSITION OF HANDS, not unknown among the ancient pagans, was widely used in the Old and New Testament.

Striking the Breast. Already familiar to the ancient Hebrews and pagans, this gesture is found in the New Testament in the well-known parable of the tax collector (Lk 18.13) and in the reaction of the Jews to the death of Christ on the cross (Lk 23.48). At an early date it became a part of Christian piety as a symbol of sorrow for sin, the root of which was considered to be in the heart (Augustine, Sermo 67.1; Patrologia Latina 38:433). It is always with this meaning that it is prescribed by the rubrics of the Mass for the Confiteor (I confess).

Vatican II. Vatican Council II in the Constitution on Liturgy gave clear directives that liturgical gestures be expressive of the divine realities that they signify, and at the same time that these gestures be adapted to contemporary needs (Sacrosanctum Concilium 21, 62; Gaudium et spes 4–10 shows that implementation means more than simply changing a former ritual for a revised one).

It is evident that Baptism by immersion more clearly expresses the inner faith reality of dying and rising with Christ (Sacrosanctum Concilium 6) than does Baptism by pouring a trickle of water on the forehead. Christian Initiation admits the non-Christian into the mysteries of Christ and into the faith community as well (ChrInitAd 19, 2). This is expressed very well when celebrant and members of the assembly—at least sponsors and catechists—sign each of the five senses of the candidate when he/she is admitted to the first step of the catechumenate (ibid. 85).

The General Instruction of the Roman Missal also concerns itself with Vatican II's call for more authentic liturgical gestures. The kiss of peace has been reinstated as an expression of the state of full reconciliation and forgiveness (GenInstrRomMissal 56, b). There is mention that "the sign of Communion," as the eschatological banquet, "is more complete when given under both kinds" (ibid. 240). Also "the nature of the sign demands that the material for the Eucharistic celebration appear as actual food" (ibid. 283).

Emphasis on the gesture of laying on of hands in the Sacrament of Reconciliation further carries out the Council's concern for meaningful gestures. The Praenotanda of the revised Rite of Penance, give the directive: ". . . the priest extends his hands or at least his right hand, over the penitent and pronounces the formula of absolution" (Rite of Penance Intro 19). This gesture is encouraging as it reassures the penitent in a kindly human way of safety from evil by the power of Jesus' death and resurrection. Such directives on meaningful gestures exemplify the richness of the instructions accompanying the liturgical rites in their revisions since Vatican II.

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGMANN, The Early Liturgy, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Notre Dame, Ind. 1959). C. VAGAGGINI, Theological Dimensions of the Liturgy, tr. L. J. DOYLE, 2 v. (Collegeville, Minn. 1959) v.1. B. I. MULLAHY, "The Raising of My Hands," Orate Fratres 21 (1946–47) 241–49. L. MITCHELL, Meaning of Ritual (New York 1977). H. CAFFAREL, The Body at Prayer: An Introduction (London 1978). J. L. LEONARD and N. MITCHELL, The Postures of the Assembly during the Eucharistic Prayer (Chicago 1994). E. E. UZUKWU, Worship as Body Language: Introduction to Christian Worship: An African Orientation (Collegeville, Minn. 1997).

[B. I. MULLAHY/M. P. ELLENBRACHT/EDS.]

LITURGICAL HISTORY

Early

A survey of the early history of the liturgy reveals great richness in both its plurality and its organic dynamism, defying any neat categorizations of universal linear development. Even the definition of "early" can vary from geographical area to area, ranging from subapostolic to anywhere between the 6th and the 10th centuries. For the purposes of this essay, "early" will cover the development of the liturgy from the sub-apostolic period to the 8th century.

LITURGICAL CENTERS AND PRIMARY SOURCES

Modern scholarship on early liturgical history can be described as a movement from the quest for the "original" liturgy to the recognition that the first four centuries represent a movement from tremendous pluriformity to regional uniformity. While the three great branches of Christian liturgy (Greek, Syriac and Latin) are rooted in these early centuries we can also see the regional, cultural and linguistic liturgical rites taking shape by the late third and early fourth centuries.

Jerusalem. From Jerusalem, the birthplace of Christianity, we have evidence of liturgical practices and understandings that reflect the multilingual and multicultural center of Christian pilgrimage, resulting in liturgical practices both influenced by and influential throughout the Christian churches in late antiquity and beyond. The bulk of the written evidence dates from the fourth and fifth century, revealing a marriage of the indigenous Semitic and cosmopolitan Greek influences. The primary texts are those of CYRIL, Bishop of Jerusalem (the Catecheses of the mid-4th century and possibly the Mystagogical Catecheses of the 380s), and EGERIA, whose travel diary is calculated to date from 381 to 384 and compares in interesting ways to the earlier travel diary of an anonymous pilgrim from Bordeaux (c. 330). In addition, the Armenian and Georgian lectionaries from the first half of the fifth century give evidence of liturgical continuity and change, as does the Georgian chantbook (the Iadgari, 7th century). The earliest Eucharistic liturgy (The Liturgy of Saint James) with roots in Jerusalem is quite late from a manuscript perspective (9th century) but may reflect late 4th/early 5th century practices of Jerusalem intertwined with those of other Eastern Christian areas. Archaeological work has also contributed to our understanding of the central Christian complex in Jerusalem built around Constantine's martyrion (now Holy Sepulchre) and how it was used liturgically.

Rome. From Rome, one of the earliest and most prominent centers of Christianity, we have evidence from varied types of sources, but not as comprehensive as those of Jerusalem. First is the valuable description of JUS-TIN MARTYR, who defends Baptism and Eucharist to the emperor in his First Apology, c. 150. Another voice from a Roman church, although disputed as to authorship and dating, is the church order Apostolic Tradition, an edited document probably covering two centuries of information on how to perform different rites, making it one of the earliest ordines. In addition, the Philocalian Calendar, dating from 354, and the Liber Pontificalis of the sixth century both contribute to our understanding of the liturgical calendar. Later resources, such as the sermons of Leo the Great (440-61) and Gregory the Great (590-604) and the earliest collections of liturgical texts (libelli, lectionaries, and sacramentaries) which emerge in the 6th and 7th centuries, give scholars a clearer sense of the characteristics of liturgy in the city of Rome and its environs. (For further information on the liturgy in the city of Rome, see ROMAN RITE.)

Alexandria. Alexandria and Lower Egypt represent another of the great early centers of Christianity and have yielded multifaceted sources for understanding liturgy, but rarely in the form of actual liturgical texts. Two early Christian theologians, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (c. 150–215) and ORIGEN (c. 185–254), both refer to liturgical practices and reveal a fascination with symbolic meanings, especially in the poetic texts of Clement's hymns. The Trinitarian and Christological controversies that tore the fabric of Coptic Christianity in these early centuries also contributed to descriptions or clarifications of liturgy, particularly in the writings of ATHANASIUS, sometimes bishop of Alexandria (c. 296-373), whose festal letters help our understanding of the development of Lent and Easter in Egypt and elsewhere. EPIPHANIUS, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus (367-403), contributes to our understanding of the origins of Epiphany and Christmas in 4th century Egypt. From the Egyptian monastic writers, particularly PACHOMIUS (c. 290-346) and CAS-SIAN (c. 360-435), we have descriptions of monastic daily prayer that contribute to our later understandings of how non-Eucharistic prayer grew. Liturgical texts from Egypt include the Canons of Hippolytus (dating disputed, but perhaps as early as mid-4th century), a collection of liturgical directions with clear roots in the Apostolic Tradition of Rome. One of the most important documents is the so-called Sacramentary (or prayer book) of Sarapion, a 4th-century bishop of Thmuis (lower Egypt). Sarapion's texts include Eucharistic prayers and a number of blessings. The early Egyptian church has also contributed three fragmentary Eucharistic prayers; the first is the prayer included in the Strasbourg papyrus 254 (late 4th to early 5th century), the related Anaphora of Saint Mark (mid-5th century) and finally the Liturgy of Saint Basil, possibly 4th century, which could either be indigenous to Egypt and borrowed by Basil of Cappadocia, or brought to Egypt by Basil himself. Egyptian or Coptic liturgical practices are fundamental to the development of the liturgy of Ethiopia, which preserves many similarities in its ancient Ge'ez language rites.

Syria. The liturgies of Syria form a major liturgical family, although differences exist between Western and Eastern Syria. Syria yields some of the earliest liturgical ordines, or practical instruction books on how to do liturgy, which parallel the family tree of the Roman document, the Apostolic Tradition. The Didache (late 1st century), the Didascalia (c. 230), the Apostolic Constitutions (c. 380), the Epitome (5th century) and the Testamentum Domini (5th century) are all from the Syrian Christian tradition with links to other Christian centers. Each ordo hands down to us valuable information on prayer patterns, initiation, Eucharist, appointment of community leaders and their duties, and eventually the layout of liturgical space and the unfolding of the liturgical year. The related West Syrian Synodicon (7th century) contains additional information on the sanctoral cycle. From East Syria, the Acts of John (c. 200) and the Acts of Thomas (c. early 3d century) offer evidence of different patterns of Baptism and similar patterns of Eucharistic celebration, as does the 5th-century Armenian Ordo, which preserves much of the East Syrian liturgical pattern. From the environs of Antioch in West Syria comes a series of episcopal writings which include extensive liturgical descriptions or explanations. JOHN CHRYSOS-TOM's (c. 347-407) writings contain information on initiation (including the catechumenate), Eucharist and ordination. THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA (c. 350-428) also writes extensively of Baptism, Eucharist, and the catechumenate. The letters and sermons of SEVERUS OF AN-TIOCH (bishop from 512 to 518) preserve information on the cult of martyrs, the liturgical year and the meaning of Lent. Two Eucharistic liturgies, the Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles and the Liturgy of John Chrysostom, both have roots in this area, whether or not the two related anaphorae are from the hand of Chrysostom or not. Finally, the Syrian Martyrology of 411 provides a parallel liturgical calendar to the Philocalian of Rome and helps organize the various sermons preached on the feasts of martyrs. From Eastern Syria, the writings of APHRAATES (early 4th century) and EPHREM (c. 306-73) often reveal in poetic form many of the important images underlying the Syriac Christian understanding of the meaning of initiation and Eucharist (as well as penance, anointing of the sick, and leadership in the churches). The Anaphora (Eucharistic prayer) of Addai and Mari, dating perhaps from the 3rd century, reflects some of the key differences in the East Syrian church. Later writings, such as the anonymous Liber Graduum (late 4th century) and the Liturgical Homilies of Narsai (d. c. 503) deal with the interpretations of meaning for Baptism and Eucharist. The 6th-century Sogitha on the Temple of Edessa contains a valuable discussion on the meaning of liturgical space in relation to the liturgical action. Finally, some local Eastern councils contain legislation regarding various aspects of liturgy, especially the Synod of Laodicea (c. 370) and the Canons ascribed to Maruta of Maipherqat (7th century).

Constantinople. The imperial city of CONSTANTINO-PLE was a late but important player in the development of early church liturgy. Beginning in the 4th century with the move of the emperor Constantine to the city, Constantinople became the recipient of a major imperial building project (beginning about 328), which changed the landscape of the city to fit the needs of Christian liturgies and processions. This use of stational liturgy, also seen in Jerusalem and Rome, made the city the church, with processions gathering in public places and moving from dedicated Christian building to building, shifting with the liturgical year. The Great Church, or Hagia Sophia, first dedicated in 360, was the heart of the system of stational liturgy and remained so through the rebuilding projects of the emperor Justinian (527-65), who continued developing the "Christian topography" of the city. The written sources that tell us how these spaces were used are primarily those of two bishops; GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (bishop from 379-81), John Chrysostom (bishop from 398–403); two 5th-century church historians, SOCRATES and SOZOMEN; a 6th-century church historian, THEODORE LECTOR; the 7th-century Chronicon Paschale, which makes reference to a number of liturgical processions and liturgies from 330 to 533; the Byzantine chronicler THEO-PHANES CONFESSOR (752-818); and a number of 10th and 11th-century sources which witness to the continuity of Constantinople's stational liturgy. Within the unique pattern of liturgy in this city, the sources mentioned above yield a rich display of chants, popular religious practices, eucharistic liturgies, the cult of saints, daily office and the unfolding of the year according to the Byzantine liturgy. One notable liturgical text that has its origins in the Constantinopolitan stational liturgy is the TRISAGION, a chant originating in the 5th century and spreading from here to many other Christian liturgies.

North Africa. The North African church was crucial to the development of Latin language theology and liturgy because of several extremely influential writers. TER-TULLIAN (Christian from c. 195–230) gives us the earliest description of Baptism related to Easter and some of the elements of Baptism (De Baptismo), as well as reflecting on Eucharist, agape, evening prayer and other daily prayers. CYPRIAN, bishop of Carthage from 248 to 258, wrote extensively on leadership within the church, particularly the roles of presbyters and bishops, the requirements for an efficacious baptism, the Eucharist as sacrifice and memorial, and what would later be called "public" or "canonical" penance, the process whereby serious sinners (especially apostates in times of persecution) were to be admitted back into the church. AUGUS-TINE, bishop of Hippo from 396 to 430, gives us an extensive collection of sermons from which we know a great deal about the catechumenate, the celebration of the rites of initiation, the seasons of the year, the setting of the Eucharist, the cult of the martyrs, and funerals for Christians, as well as the current theological arguments regarding penance, orders and Baptism. The liturgical information gleaned from these three is corroborated by several local synods; Hippo (393) and Carthage (397, 407 and 419) all of which reflect a growing tendency toward "official" prayers and collections of prayers to offset misleading or possibly heretical liturgical texts. Unfortunately, none of these texts in question survives. In addition to these writings, the other important "voice" for liturgical information is archeology; there are many remains of churches, baptistries, cemeteries, inscriptions and mosaics. These all contribute to a better understanding of the setting for Baptism and Eucharist, the latter especially as it intersects with funerals and the cult of martyrs.

Northern Italy. A number of bishops from northern Italy provide information on 4th- and 5th-century liturgical practices. The most prominent is AMBROSE, bishop of Milan from 373/374 to 397. Ambrose wrote extensively on Baptism and Eucharist; his mystagogical catecheses known as De Sacramentis (preached to the newly baptized in Milan c. 391) reveals invaluable information on how he and his community understood the rituals of initiation (anointing, Baptism, chrismation, foot-washing and Eucharist). The practices reveal continuity with some Roman traditions in later centuries and also link to the East. Ambrose was a prolific hymn and antiphon writer also, and his poetic compositions preserve a theology of liturgy with regard to daily prayer, Christmas, Easter and other occasions. The continuation of an extended and elaborate catechumenate and rites of initiation are captured in the writings of other less-known bishops such as CHROMATIUS, bishop of Aquileia (c. 388-407), GAUDEN-TIUS, bishop of Brescia (c. 397), ZENO, bishop of Verona (362-c. 375), MAXIMUS, bishop of Turin (died c. 423) and PETER CHRYSOLOGUS, bishop of Ravenna (c. 400-50). In addition, several early Western liturgical texts come from the north of Italy, including the Rotulus of Ravenna (c. 5th-7th century), and a number of lectionaries, gospel books, or lists of scripture readings for the Eucharist, such as the Lectionary of Sélestat, c. 700; Bobbio Missal, c. 6th; and the Gospel Book of Vercelli, c. 4th-8th centuries.

Spain. The early liturgical evidence from Spain is not as extensive as other geographical centers. Aside from a number of local synods concerned with funerals Eucharists held at the cemetery and the cult of martyrs, it is not until the primary Spanish liturgical books, the Liber mozarabicus sacramentorum and the Liber ordinum, that we have extensive knowledge of the Mozarabic rite (materials date from the 5th to the 10th centuries). One of the great early poets and hymn writers in the Latin language was a Spaniard, PRUDENTIUS (348–c. 410), whose texts covering the feasts and seasons of the liturgical year are still sung today.

Gaul. The great explosion of liturgical texts from Gaul occurs in the late 7th and 8th centuries, but several different sources inform our knowledge prior to that. The earliest references are from IRENAEUS, Bishop of Lyons (c. 177–200), who, while not a native of Gaul, reflected local practices in his extensive writings on the meaning of Baptism, Eucharist and Christian death. Other early liturgical references come from the canons of local Gallican councils and synods, of which there were many between the 4th and the 7th centuries, and the canonical collection, Statuta ecclesia antiqua, of the late 5th century. The writings of various bishops reveal a great deal about liturgical practice, especially those of CAESARIUS OF ARLES (c. 470–542) and GREGORY OF TOURS (bishop from 573–94). A rare source for liturgical detail is the disputed (as to author and date) Expositio antiquae liturgiae gallicanae, perhaps written by Germanus, Bishop of Paris (555-76). The document contains a wealth of information which supports other evidence of the strong Eastern (and particularly Syrian) influences in Gallican liturgy and the cult of the martyrs. There are extensive hagiographical resources from Gaul, including the Life of Martin of Tours by Sulpicius Severus (c. 401) and the History of the Franks, Glory of the Martyrs, and Glory of the Confessors all by Gregory of Tours, which contain information about daily prayer, healing and anointing, Eucharist, Baptism, funerals, the liturgical year and the rise of monastic influence on parish liturgy. Finally, two early lectionaries, the Wolfenbüttel Palimpsest (c. 500) and the Lectionary of Luxeuil (c. late 7th century) contribute to our understanding of how the developing cycle of the liturgical year was arranged.

Out of this regional variety emerges the great liturgical families of rites in the 5th to 7th centuries: the ROMAN RITE, which in a hybrid form would eventually dominate in Europe; the GALLICAN RITE; the MOZARABIC RITE of Spain; the AMBROSIAN RITE of Milan; the CELTIC RITE; the COPTIC and ETHIOPIAN Rites; the various Syrian Rites (EAST SYRIAN, MARONITE, SYRO-MALABAR); the ARMENIAN RITE; and the BYZANTINE RITE (and later related national rites).

Early Historical Shifts in Initiation and Eucharist. The early history of the church is the setting for some of the most dramatic shifts in the two major liturgical actions of the church, initiating new members and the ongoing center of ecclesial identification, the Eucharist. Without forcing an artificial uniformity in the early rites of initiation, there are still some generalizations which can be made with regard to ritual and interpretation in Christian initiation. The scriptural evidence reveals a simplicity of profession of faith, minimal preparation, water bath and, of course, a changed life. This pattern soon develops from a sequence of more deliberate preparation, water bath and Eucharist (Didache and Justin Martyr) to the addition of anointings, sometimes multiple (Tertullian and the Apostolic Tradition) and finally to the large-scale and rigorous catechumenate of the 4th century (see especially the catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem, Ambrose of Milan, John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia). As the church moved through the 4th century, the "cost" of baptism began to shift dramatically, from the potential danger of being martyred to the reality that baptism could lead to status and position in worldly affairs. While not outwardly reflected in the rites themselves, certainly this dramatic shift changed the understanding of what was happening in initiation. The elaboration of ritual and ritual process reaches an apex by the 5th centuries, however, at which time the complex rites begin to change, either taking place within a considerably shorted amount of time (Greek and Syrian) or, fractured into distinct actions separated by years (Latin). This shift goes hand in hand with another major change, adults to infants as the subject of the initiation process. This is a shift with wide-ranging ramifications, most notably the reversal of catechesis first-initiation second, to initiation first-weak catechesis second. This shift affects understandings of what initiation does, the role of personal affirmation of faith, the meaning of Lent, and the unity of the rites of initiation, to name just a few. Shifts in Eucharist during the early centuries of the church will also result in dramatic changes in practice and understanding. The textual shift from a preference for blessing in Judaism to a preference for thanksgiving and offering in Christianity will impact the construction of fixed prayers; the shift from domestic settings to public spaces will change the view of who participates and who leads; the move from small groups of people who knew each other to larger and larger gatherings removes Eucharist from the meal setting and changes the fabric of relationships; the legalization of Christianity opens the door to the increasing inculturation of the ritual to the imperial cult, rivaling the glories of the court; the change in design of buildings, removing the action of the Eucharist from access and sight parallels the shift in understanding of Eucharist as meal to Eucharist as awe-filled mystery and sacrifice. In the West, the evolution of language will result in a distancing of comprehension from a liturgical language which did not change, and the stratification of ranks of Christians within the church will affect understandings of access and worthiness. Finally, in spite of great continuity in the shape of the Eucharistic liturgy, reductions in primary rituals and expansions in secondary rituals will result in a liturgy which appears quite different by the late 7th- to early 8th-century description of Roman papal liturgy detailed in the Ordo romanus primus. Parallel shifts in the early rites of reconciliation, ordination, anointing of the sick and eventually marriage can be traced through these same pivotal centuries of the church.

Bibliography: J. BALDOVIN, The Urban Character of Christian Worship (Rome 1987). P. BRADSHAW, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship (New York 1992). M. JOHNSON, ed., Living Water, Sealing Spirit (Collegeville 1995). G. MACY, The Banquet's Wisdom: A Short History of the Theologies of the Lord's Supper (New York 1992). E. MAZZA, The Celebration of the Eucharist: The Origin of the Rite and the Development of Its Interpretation (Collegeville 1999). F. PAXTON, Christianizing Death: The Creation of a Ritual Process in Early Medieval Europe (Ithaca 1990). T. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (Collegeville 1986). P. TURNER, The Hallelujah Highway: A History of the Catechumenate (Chicago 2000). C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources trans. and rev. by W. STOREY and N. RASMUSSEN (Washington, D.C. 1986). E. YARNOLD, The Awe-Inspiring Rites of Initiation: The Origins of the RCIA (Collegeville 1994).

[L. LARSON-MILLER]

Medieval

For the purposes of this entry, "medieval liturgy" will refer to the development of the liturgy from the mid-8th century to the early 16th century in the Latin West, from the rise of the Carolingian monarchy to the 95 Theses of Martin Luther.

Some trends in the complex history of medieval liturgy may be observed from the outset. The first is that of two broad periods of Romanization: the Carolingian renaissance and the propagation of the liturgy of the Roman curia. The second is a general movement from widely variant customs, through a sense of unity, to the uniformity of a single Roman liturgical practice.

THE PRE-CAROLINGIAN SITUATION

To appreciate the importance of the Carolingian liturgical renaissance, some background is needed. The liturgical centers of the early church developed under the aegis of the Roman Empire. With the fall of Rome in the early 5th century, those provinces whose wellbeing depended on the pax romana were thrown into chaos. Moreover, the boundaries of the known world continued to expand North and East into regions lacking historical liturgical centers.

Gaul, nominally Christian since the baptism of Clovis (496), experienced scattered integration of Roman liturgical culture as a result of initiatives of private individuals, primarily monks and pilgrims, bringing back books and mementos from Rome. The Gallican church was organized on a local basis, and with the exception of early conciliar efforts to unify provinces with the same liturgical practice, there was little concern about liturgical unity.

When, with papal approval, the Carolingians usurped the Frankish throne in the mid-8th century, they sought to reorganize church life as an aid to unifying the realm and expanding into pagan territories. They had long sponsored the work of Anglo-Saxon missionaries (e.g., Boniface) who had strong ties to Rome and had restored ecclesiastical discipline via episcopal councils. The organization of a unified liturgical practice in Gaul was more difficult as available liturgical materials were varied and often threadbare. Years of constant warfare had interrupted the output of books by monastic workshops, and the Carolingians turned to Rome for help.

THE FIRST ROMANIZATION OF EUROPE

The Carolingian Synthesis. With the reign of Pippin III (741–768) the church became the focus of the Carolingian renaissance, and the enterprise of Romanization shifted from assimilation to substitution. In attempting a revival of old Roman culture, the Frankish monarchs created something new, a church-state led by an emperor thoroughly reliant upon monks and bishops (e.g., Alcuin, Theodulf). The leadership of the Frankish church took up the task of renewal with great energy and creativity, producing an explosion of liturgical materials. They, like their emperor, set about to restore the Roman liturgy, and ended up producing a hybrid of old and new. With the revival of monasticism, the Carolingians made it possible for Frankish scribes to set about assembling and systematizing liturgical texts. The 9th through 11th centuries were centuries of the book.

Liturgical Books. A significant Carolingian achievement was the development of the Sacramentaries, a book containing the words spoken by the liturgy's presider. Sacramentaries evolved from libelli missarum, small booklets containing the presider's prayers (excepting the canon missae) for one or more masses. Sacramentaries occasionally included ritual comments that became known as rubrics after the custom of writing them in red to distinguish them from the spoken words. By the early 8th century, two principal types of Roman sacramentaries were circulating in Gaul: GELASIAN and GREGORIAN. These types were differentiated both by their origin and organization of material. Gelasians originated in the presbyteral liturgies of the Roman parish churches (tituli) and were organized into distinct cycles: Sundays and feasts celebrating events in life of Jesus (Temporale), and feasts of the saints (Sanctorale). Gregorians were a presbyteral adaptation of the papal liturgy used at St. Peter's, and the materials appeared in a single series according to the movement of the liturgical year. These two types were blended together with older Gallican material to form the so-called Frankish (or, 8th-century) Gelasian Sacramentaries.

To make sense of the confusing proliferation of resources, the Carolingians imported both books and liturgical personnel from Rome. The principal example was Charlemagne's request for "pure" Roman sacramentary from Pope Hadrian (r. 772-795). After considerable delay, the pope sent a book that represented a papal liturgy from the early 8th century. The Hadrianum, a type of Gregorian sacramentary, was received with some confusion as it contained no formulae for many Sundays. To provide missing materials and address local circumstances, Frankish liturgists under the guidance of BENE-DICT OF ANIANE (d. 821) assembled a supplement of optional texts. Charlemagne issued the Hadrianum and its supplement-known by its incipit Hucusque-with a decree requiring the use of the former, and recommending the latter. In subsequent copies the division between the sacramentary and the supplement was blurred, and the entire work took on royal authority. The Carolingians had succeeded in cataloging liturgical texts, but not systematizing them. Use of the Hadrianum spread sporadically as it was too expensive to replace old manuscripts that were still usable. But the sacramentary was a book for the presider only, and other books, each with its own complex history, were required to conduct the liturgy.

An ORDO (pl. ordines) contained ceremonial directions for conducting a service (Eucharist, Baptism, Ordination, etc.) and was a necessary accompaniment to a sacramentary. Various ordines migrated north of the Alps independently to be gathered into collections by Frankish liturgists. Like the sacramentaries, ordines were adapted for local use.

The lectionary, a list of readings for specific services, developed in several ways. Readings could simply be noted in the margins of a book of Scripture; a separate list could be made, indicating where readings began and ended (capitulary); readings could be written out in full, and assembled in an independent book; or they could be written out in full and assembled with the other texts required for the liturgy. An EVANGELARY was a type of lectionary containing only readings from the Gospels.

The antiphonary contained all of the things to be sung for either the office or the Eucharistic liturgy. The Roman antiphonary and members of the schola cantorum brought from Rome by Pippin were vital to the Frankish liturgical reform as cantors also served as masters of ceremony and liturgical experts. The book of music for the Eucharist was sometimes called the gradual.

The PONTIFICAL included material needed by a bishop for non-eucharistic services (e.g., Baptism, Ordination). The pontifical—a much later term—was a practical combination of non-eucharistic ordines with corresponding prayers from the sacramentary, and took many centuries to evolve into the Pontificale Romanum of 1596. An important Carolingian landmark was the Romano-Germanic Pontifical (RGP) from about 960. Compiled by Frankish liturgists, it played an important role in the Ottonian reform of Roman liturgical life in the 10th century The development of pontificals illustrates the presumption that the ordinary liturgical presider is no longer the bishop, and we see an analogous development of the RITUAL, a resource providing priests with materials needed for the non-eucharistic services for which he was responsible (baptism, penance, marriage, anointing, burial).

The Church's Worship: Calendar. The seasons before and after Easter were the first to develop in most liturgical traditions; Sundays bore a direct connection to the celebration of the Resurrection. By the Carolingian period the unity of the Paschal celebration had begun to break apart, with each of the three days of the ancient Triduum developing a distinct character. The everpresent strain of liturgical interest in the course of Jesus' earthly life found great room for growth, and we see the roots of Western drama in the development of liturgical drama (e.g., Quem quaeritis and Passion plays). A similar piety will flourish around the Nativity cycle. The Carolingians also introduced the preface De Trinitate (Concerning the Trinity) that became the permanent Sunday preface and marked a decisive shift of the Sunday Eucharist from resurrection memorial to doctrinal formulation. The bulk of medieval additions to the calendar were in the Sanctorale, with saints' days providing holidays.

The Church's Worship: Daily Prayer. Two different traditions of daily prayer had developed in the early period, the so-called cathedral and monastic traditions. Meant for different audiences, each was a combination of psalmody, readings, song, and prayer. The cathedral office was celebrated morning and evening, ideally in the presence of the bishop, and included large amounts of unchanging material. It was time-related, with the rising sun and the evening lamp becoming images of Christ as the light of the world. Another feature of the cathedral office was a weekly resurrection vigil, held on Saturday evening. By the 12th century, the establishment of parish churches contributed to the demise of the cathedral office as the people were less able to gather at local cathedrals.

The monastic office was an eight-fold structure: matins, lauds, prime, terce, sext, none, vespers, compline. The psalter was sung (or recited) weekly, and the office included scripture readings, canticles, hymns, hagiography (histories of saints), patristica (writings by church fathers), prayers, responses, and the Apostles' Creed. Eventually, so-called little offices in honor of Mary and the dead were attached to the daily cycle.

The monastic reforms of Benedict of Aniane were important building blocks of the Carolingian revival. Monasteries served as cultural and educational centers, vital to the production of liturgical books and reflection on liturgical practice. Benedict's reforms were to have an effect on the regular (i.e., non-monastic) clergy as well. At Metz, CHRODEGANG issued a Rule (c. 753) requiring priests to live in community and recite the office daily. He even directed them to say the office in private if unable to do so in common. Such a practice, novel for regular priests, set a trend toward a wider privatization of the church's official prayer.

The Church's Worship: Sacraments. Christian Initiation. In the Old Gelasian Sacramentary (Frankish redaction c.750) we see textual evidence of a central shift in Christian initiation—the presupposition of baptizing children rather than adults. Despite this change, the questions addressed to those being baptized were still aimed at those able to answer for themselves. The ancient multiyear catechumenate had become mostly ceremonial with its various rites all taking place within Lent. To the traditio (handing over) of the Gospels, Lord's Prayer and Creed to catechumens, the Carolingians added exorcism and the presentation of the Gospels. Baptism took place at the Easter Vigil or Pentecost, and included the laying on of hands by the bishop and communion. In the Romano-Germanic Pontifical (10th century) there was also a new order of Baptism combining many of the prebaptismal and baptismal rites together for the baptism of children outside of Easter or Pentecost.

Eucharist. The Carolingian reforms had a vast influence on the celebration of the Eucharist in the West. Latin was becoming a specialized religious language, and the liturgical books were in constant flux. In addition to the increasing monasticisation of clerical life, the emperors laid down strict standards of clerical education, including regular examinations. Such particular attention to what the priest said and did at the Eucharist was to have a profound impact. Two immediate results were the rise of Mass commentaries (expositiones missae) and Eucharistic controversies.

Expositiones missae, a genre of liturgical exegesis whose origins were found in the mystagogical catecheses, found new life in the Carolingian educational program. The foremost figure was AMALARIUS of Metz (c. 775–850), who applied a fully developed vocabulary of symbolic interpretation to such commentaries; his principal work was the Liber officialis. Though officially condemned in his own day, Amalarius's work became the cornerstone for most subsequent medieval liturgical expositors, culminating in the Rationale divinorum officiorum of William Durandus the Elder (c. 1230–1296).

Already in the 9th century questions arose about the Eucharist that would influence the experience and the theology of the sacrament for centuries. Around 825, a Frankish monk at the monastery of Corbie, RATRAMNUS had proposed an understanding of the real presence of Christ in the eucharistic species based on an Augustinian conception of the reality of symbolic presence. His abbot, PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS preferred a more physical conception in the literal sense. BERENGARIUS OF TOURS revived the issue about 150 years later. Prayers by priests to be made worthy to celebrate the Eucharist began to appear at many points in the liturgy. These prayers (apologiae) soon formed part of the unchangeable Order of Mass (ordo missae) that began to take on the tone of a privatized devotional experience for the priest.

Priests began to fill roles of other liturgical leaders (e.g., deacon, lector, psalmist), often becoming the sole liturgical minister. Increasing attention was paid to the canon missae and institution narrative ("words of consecration"), a natural if problematic by-product of the eucharistic controversies. If what happened at the Eucharist was of great concern, when it occurred was equally important. The canon missae became inaudible to the people, though most did not understand Latin, and was gradually punctuated with gestures and bells to highlight its solemnity. The increase of such ritual elements throughout the liturgy accompanied the impoverishment of essential elements, e.g., the communion of the faithful.

In this period, we also see the beginnings of the private mass—priests celebrating the Eucharist without a congregation. The exact origins of this practice are unclear but, given the recent proliferation of ordained monks, one possibility is that it might have been monastic in origin. The great Carolingian monastic churches developed around the idea that each church, with its principal altar and many side altars, was a miniature copy of urban Rome with its many churches. While full privatization of the mass would come later, the Carolingian age provided the necessary tools: many priests and many altars. Some scholars have suggested that the side altars grew when pilgrimages to the Holy Land were no longer possible under Muslim rule. The side altars became substitutes, each altar representing a particular pilgrimage shrine. Others have identified the proliferation of side altars with the rise of private solitary masses and the notion of the mass as an opus bonum (good work) that each priest was obligated to perform.

Penance. In the pre-Carolingian period, penance was a multi-stage and public experience, including admission to the Order of Penitents, and eventual public reconciliation (cf. Old Gelasian Sacramentary). It was non-repeatable, and was used only for those considered to be in grave sin. Frankish liturgists added elements including vesting in a penitential garment and imposing ashes (cf. Ordo Romanus 50). In time, penitents were expelled from the congregation. These developments roughly coincided with the advent of private penance, introduced to the Frankish church by Irish and Anglo-Saxon monks though resisted by the Frankish bishops. In this new system now administered by priests, there was no order of penitents, no communal prayer, no liturgy of penance, and no need for bishops. A tariff system developed along with private penance, wherein certain offences had prescribed penalties, including monetary fines.

Conclusion. The Carolingians imported what they thought was the Roman liturgy into the chaotic liturgical world of 8th century Gaul. Finding it insufficient to their needs they added to it, forming a hybrid European (often known as the Romano-Frankish or Romano-Germanic) liturgy. They also turned their considerable creativity to adapting other remnants of Roman culture: language, music, script, architecture, painting and sculpture. By focusing on educating an increasingly monasticized clergy, they created a highly developed clerical culture that became more insular. This clerical and sacral class became the liturgical representatives of the observing laity. After Charlemagne's death, Carolingian culture declined quickly in the West, but was well preserved in the monasteries of the Eastern ("German") part of the Empire. It was from here that the Ottonian emperors were able to impose the hybrid European liturgy on Rome in the middle of the 10th century.

THE SECOND ROMANIZATION OF EUROPE: THE LITURGY OF THE PAPAL COURT

The Roman curia. After the Ottonian period, there were great changes in the administration of the church. During the Investiture Controversy, Pope GREGORY VII (pope from 1073 to 1085) vastly increased his authority in relationship to the Emperors. The administrative workings of the church were systematized and, with important developments in canon law, the church became a governmental system with the pope at its head. Rome had long laid claim to the imagination of Western Christians; now it was also the seat of a powerful monarch. In the late 11th century, the papal court (curia Romanum) developed to assist in the governmental affairs of the church. Within the Lateran complex, the pope had his own chapel, and the celebration of the liturgy with pope and people of Rome in stational churches gave way to pope and court in the curial chapel. Special books were needed, and it was the European liturgy brought to Rome by the Ottonians that was adapted for this purpose.

Liturgical Books. Missal. A number of factors accompanied the growth of the missal, including an increasing number of churches and ordained priests. Additionally, new legislation obliged priests to recite to themselves all the parts of the Mass, even when performed by other ministers (e.g., deacon, psalmist). A practical book, the missal was a combination of sacramentary, lectionary, gradual and ordo. An important exemplar was the missal created for the curial chapel by Honorius III (pope from 1216 to 1227). In the Missale plenum (full missal), a later adaptation, texts were combined into mass formularies for each celebration. The Missale plenum would evolve into the Missale Romanum of 1570. (For a further discussion, see MISSAL, ROMAN.)

Pontifical and Ritual. The pontifical continued to evolve, heavily reliant on the RGP. The two principal pontificals of the 13th century were that of the Roman curia under the influence of INNOCENT III, and that of William Durandus (c. 1230–1296). With additional editing the latter became the Pontificale Romanum of 1596. Unlike the pontifical, the ritual was more adaptable to local circumstances, and there was considerable crosspollination with the pontifical for services not reserved to bishops. Sometimes bound with sacramentaries, rituals became discrete books in the 11th century, and were made mandatory for priests from about the 12th century. (For more information, see PONTIFICAL and RITUAL, ROMAN).

Breviary. Analogous to the missal, the breviary began to appear in the 11th century, a practical compilation from many sources (Psalter, Collectar, Lectionary, and Antiphonary). Legislation of the Fourth Lateran Council (1214) bound the entire clergy to recite the Office. Innocent III (pope from 1198 to 1215) compiled the Ordinale, a prototype of the breviary, for curial use. Up until this time the Office had been marked by great creativity, and much material was omitted to form the breviary. The mendicant Orders of the 13th century, especially the Franciscans were instrumental in popularizing the breviary.

The Church's Worship: Daily Prayer. Official Prayer. From the 8th to the 12th centuries, monastic communities were the principal elaborators and transmitters of the divine office. The new mendicant orders such as those founded by Dominic (1170–1221) and Francis (1181–1226) found the complex monastic liturgical style unsuited to their itinerant lifestyle and pastoral work in urban areas. The liturgical books available at the cathedral of Assisi were those of the papal court and were used as models for a new style of liturgical books carried across Europe by the Franciscans. Still more revisions were made by Favo of Haversham (d. 1244).

In the same era, time demands upon priests attached to the new universities increased the pressure for private recitation. By the 15th century private recitation had become the norm for non-canonical priests. Although no synod before Trent obliged private recitation, the trend toward privatization begun in the Carolingian period had continued to escalate, with the result that the official prayer of the church was seen as an individual obligation of the ordained representative of the faithful.

Popular Prayer and the Saints. In the face of the increasing clericalization of official prayer, popular piety found ever-new modes of expression. Shortened versions of the divine office—especially LITTLE OFFICE OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY and the Office of the Dead—became popular with lay people. Members of the upper classes commissioned sumptuous Books of Hours. New celebrations of Mary and the saints and their relics continued to be added to the liturgical calendar. The sense of the year's progress and the Mass itself as a dramatic representation of salvation history also contributed to the proliferation of piety that the Council of Trent attempted to address.

The Church's Worship: Sacraments. Christian Initiation. Since the Carolingian period, infant baptism had become increasingly normative. The multi-year catechumenal rites, collapsed into Lent by the Carolingian period, had been further folded into one rite. Over the course of the Middle Ages the initiation process was gradually divided into three stages (Baptism, Confirmation, Communion) often separated by numbers of years, and involving different ministers. Several developments contributed to these changes. Eucharistic controversies contributed to misgivings about communing infants, although this varied widely. Additionally, the reigning theology of Baptism had become one of washing away Original Sin, resulting in an urge to baptize children as soon as possible after birth, and a final disconnection from Easter.

From the 14th century on, councils decreed that children be baptized within eight days of birth. Under these circumstances, it was unlikely for a bishop to be present for Confirmation, and later theologians began to assert that Confirmation augmented the grace of Baptism, and determined that it should administered at the age of reason—seven years old. Once Confirmation was an independent rite, more elements were added. Anointing becomes the central act of confirmation.

Eucharist. By the 12th century, the Eucharist had become the domain of the people's ordained representatives, rather than the people themselves. Latin was no longer a vulgar tongue in Europe. The Eucharistic table had become an altar at the east end of the church with only a small space for plate and cup. The faithful had become onlookers and liturgical details with visual interest were introduced. The most important of these was the elevation of the host in the middle of the canon missae. Officially prescribed in 1209, the so-called minor elevation spread rapidly. Such a visual focus on the consecrated Host opened the door to a preoccupation with ocular rather than oral communion. The evolution of tabernacles, rites of Exposition and Benediction, stories of miraculous (or bleeding) hosts, and the Feast of Corpus Christi (1264) were extensions of this highly specific and visual eucharistic piety.

Over time, the notion of the Eucharist as opus bonum (good work) gave rise to an elaborate stipendiary system, whereby a monetary offering is given to priests to say a mass for a specific intention. An elevated sense of unworthiness on the part of the laity, and the increasing emphasis on the priest celebrating the private mass (missa privata) hastened this development. In many places, the stipendiary system evolved into a full-blown system of remuneration for priests. Rich lay persons began to endow chantry chapels, setting up a trust to pay a priest to say a mass a day in perpetuity for the donor's soul.

Penance. By the first half of the 13th century, the tariff system had developed to such an extent that it was possible to exempt oneself from penance (e.g., fasting) with monetary payments (redemptiones), often in the form of paying mass stipends. In an attempt to curb such abuses, private confession was introduced into the rite of penance. This new focal point of the rite was soon overshadowed by the priest's absolution. All of this did not do away with the tariff system, and redemptiones developed into indulgences.

Conclusion. The liturgy of Rome, imported to Gaul in the 8th century and amended by Frankish liturgists, was re-imported to Rome in the 10th century. This hybrid, European liturgy was simplified for use in the Papal court, and further adapted by the mendicant orders of the 13th century who would popularize it across the face of Europe where it replaced a wide variety of traditions. This loose unity of liturgical practice would become codified at Trent, becoming the obligatory, uniform use of the Roman Catholic Church until the late 20th century.

Bibliography: R. CROCKER, An Introduction to Gregorian Chant (New York 2000). G. DIX, The Shape of the Liturgy, with notes by P. V. MARSHALL (San Francisco 1982). M. E. FASSLER and R. A. BALTZER, eds. The Divine Office in the Latin Middle Ages: Methodology and Source Studies, Regional Developments, Hagiography (New York 2000). J. HARPER, The Forms and Orders of Western Liturgy from the Tenth to the Eighteenth Century: A Historical Introduction and Guide for Students and Musicians (New York 1991). J. A. JUNGMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite: Its Origins and Development (Missarum sollemnia), tr. F. A. BRUENNER (New York 1950). L. LARSON-MILLER, ed., Medieval Liturgy: A Book of Essays (New York 1997). R. MCKITTERICK, The Frankish Church and the Carolingian Reforms 789-895 (London 1977). E. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books from the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century, tr. M. BEAUMONT (Collegeville, Minn. 1998). R. W. PFAFF, Medieval Latin Liturgy: A Select Bibliography (Toronto 1982). C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources, tr. and rev. W. STOREY and N. RASMUSSEN (Washington, D.C. 1986).

[P. A. JACOBSON]

From Reformation to Vatican II

The period from the Reformation to the beginning of the Second Vatican Council consisted of times of comparative peace and tranquility interspersed with political and religious upheaval, and industrial and economic turmoil. For the Catholic Church, reform took place in the liturgy at the beginning of the period and was followed by several centuries in which little changed. Toward the end of the period it was clear that growing dissatisfaction indicated the need for a rethink and for reforms in the ways that the Church's prayer was celebrated. This entry breaks the period into four reasonably distinct historical sections: the 16th century; the 17th to 19th centuries; and the 19th and 20th centuries, and also considers developments in the Reform Churches.

16TH CENTURY

Liturgical Reforms of Luther and Calvin. It is important to take account of the significance of the Lutheran Reform for the history of liturgy during this time. In his ecclesiology, Martin LUTHER (1483-1546) identified the church as a communion of saints in both spiritual and institutional form. For him, the Spirit was not restricted by the institution but remained free to act. Of particular importance for Luther was his sense of the church as a local community, and so the assembly played a much greater role than had been usual before. Naturally, these elements were reflected in their communal prayer and worship, and we find this particularly in the emphasis upon the clarity of the spoken word in the vernacular, the encouragement of the participation of the congregation in all aspects of worship, including the music, and the involvement of the assembly in all other areas of church life. The focus on the word of God in scripture, both proclaimed and preached, is particularly noteworthy. For Luther, good preaching makes the church, and the liturgical ministry of greatest merit is that of the preacher, who inspires all Christians to preach the good news through the power of baptism. Turning away from the kind of individual piety that Luther identified as one of the signs of the failure of Christian liturgy up to his time, Luther encouraged fuller participation. His Formula Missae et Communionis of 1523 was followed by a much more radical service in the vernacular in 1526, including Communion under both species, hymns, texts and prayers in German, the abandonment of all language referring to sacrifice and the turning of the presiding minister to face the people over the altar table.

Among those who followed Luther in the history of the reform churches, the key figure for liturgical reform was John CALVIN (1509–64) of Geneva, Switzerland. His most influential liturgical work was his Form of Church Prayers . . . according to the Custom of the Ancient Church, published in 1542. In this, and in his more formally theological work, the Institutes of 1559, Calvin places a great deal of emphasis on the holiness of God and on the primacy of God's will. He emphasizes the importance of discipline, and on the ordered activity of the church community as it moves toward holiness. Calvin's views on liturgy are an important continuation of Luther's ideas, but show the influence of his own theology: baptism is our initiation into saving faith and the Lord's Supper is the symbol of unity of the community; the ministry of the Word of God governs all things; the promotion of good order should govern all liturgical practices, as all other aspects of the life of the faith community: peace and good order are the signs of the presence of a "true" Church; the sacraments and public worship are to be overseen by elected pastors, whose ordination, including the ceremony of the laying on of hands, is given considerable importance; liturgical variation is encouraged, with love as the guide for what is best.

Anglican Liturgical Reforms. Alongside the reform of the liturgy in Lutheran and Reformed Churches, there were important developments in the Anglican liturgy in England, led by the work and inspiration of Thomas CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury in 1532. During the short reign of Edward VI, Cranmer saw worship become strongly Protestant, and was responsible for two key texts before his execution in 1556: the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER of 1549, and its second edition of 1552. Both these texts display important principles of theology for liturgy: the people's offering of themselves is a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; the sacrament of the Eucharist is a memorial of the passion and death of Christ; Christ's death on Calvary was to be regarded as unique, perfect, and all-sufficient; we are called to receive the Eucharist in a worthy manner. This second edition suffered under a ban from 1645 and reappeared in revised form in 1662. Another area of influence of Cranmer's liturgical reform was in music. Because of the requirements of the new rite, liturgical music underwent a revolution: paramount in the requirements of the music was to be the transmission of the text, clearly and with no doubt as to its intention; music thus now performed a key role in the proclamation of the word of God. Yes, the music in cathedrals still tended to be sophisticated and more elaborate than that found in most parishes, but the fundamental aim remained in force throughout. From this moment onward, then, we see the clear musical break between the churches of the Reform and Roman Catholicism: the Reform Churches recognized that the primary reason for singing hymns and psalms in the vernacular was as a tool for evangelization and the teaching of theology. This development was to find even greater encouragement through the inspiration of John WESLEY (1703-91) and his Methodist Church.

The Catholic Response: Council of Trent. A careful study of documents of the Council of TRENT reveals some level of pastoral concern on the part of the bishops who participated. Preference was given to "conventual" or communal Masses over private Masses lacking in music and other liturgical ministries; indeed, the solemn sung Mass was to be normative over the ferial "low Mass." Communion received by the lay faithful during the Mass that they had attended was recognized as important, and we even find discussion on the possibility of the assembly's drinking from chalice at Communion.

The seventh session of the council (1547) treated the sacraments, particularly baptism and confirmation, and the canons appear to be primarily directed against Luther and Melanchton. Seven sacraments were affirmed as having been instituted by Christ and containing "the grace which they signify," as opposed to Luther who would eventually affirm only baptism and confirmation as sacraments "instituted by Christ."

The thirteenth session (1551) affirmed the doctrine of transubstantiation, i.e., that at the moment of consecration the bread and wine is converted into the body and blood of Christ, "truly, really, and substantially," and that with the body and blood of Christ are His soul and divinity where the "whole Christ" is contained in its entirety in each species and in every part of each species. The sacrament was also to be reserved in churches for adoration and also for pastoral care of the infirmed.

In 1562 the twenty-first session treated the topic of Communion under both species for the laity, stating that laity and clerics who do not celebrate Mass are not obliged to drink from the chalice. As for the communing of little children, while the ancient practice of small children was not to condemned, it was neither required for salvation "before the age of reason."

The twenty-second session of the council (Sept. 17, 1562) addressed liturgical abuses in its disciplinary decree De observandis et evitandis in celebratione missae: the magical treatment of the host was to cease; Mass was to be celebrated only in consecrated oratories or churches; bishops were to better control their clergy regarding the number of Masses celebrated so that they did not profit inappropriately from an excessive number of Masses stipends; superstition around the fixed number of Masses was to stop as was the use of inappropriate liturgical music. Music had been used inappropriately in the liturgy prior to the council (e.g., as background to the priest's silent praying of the canon).

There was, indeed, widespread corruption within the Catholic Church of the 16th century, and much of that corruption centered around the liturgy and sacraments. The priest's Communion had come to be seen as sufficiently symbolic of the whole Church, and Eucharistic adoration became more important than the Eucharistic celebration itself. Some of those abuses might be attributed to ignorance on the part of clergy, since there was a tremendous lack of priestly formation; indeed, it was only at the Council of Trent that each diocese was required to have its own seminary. Whatever the reasons, abuses were rampant. There were problems with the exaggerated cult of the saints, along with an abuse of Mass stipends where some clergy celebrated as many as 30 Masses per day to receive the stipend; in some cases up to 1,000 Masses would be celebrated for a deceased person. Some clergy accepted two or three stipends for the same Mass while repeating the first part of the Mass two or three times up to the preface, but praying the canon only once. The abuse of indulgences and the large numbers of clergy living in concubinage only contributed to a decline in the Church's credibility.

The council's twenty-second session also affirmed the propitiatory nature of sacrifice of the Mass as a response to Protestant reformers who could only affirm that the Mass was a "sacrifice of praise," or a "testament" of God's forgiveness. Rather, Christ offered himself in bread and wine to reveal himself as a priest in the order of Melchizedek. Indeed, the third canon of that session stated that if one holds that the Mass is nothing more than a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving or a mere commemoration of the sacrifice on the cross and not a proprietary sacrifice, "let him be anathema." Moreover, against the reformers, priests were reminded that water was to be mixed with wine in offering the chalice, as already decreed in the Council of FLORENCE.

The use of the vernacular was another item on the agenda also discussed at length in the twenty-second session. Council records show that some bishops spoke out in favor of the vernacular, at least for some parts of the Mass. They did so out of concern for large numbers of their congregations who were unable to grasp the richness of what was taking place since they were unable to understand Latin. These participants did not deny the centrality of Latin as the official language of the Church, nor did they deny its beauty as a language of mystery, but argued, rather, out of pastoral sensitivity for their constituencies. Thus, in the twenty-second session, it was decided that the liturgical readings and the mystery of the Eucharist should be explained to the people in the local language, at least on Sundays and feast days.

It was in the twenty-fifth session of the council when the reform of the missal and breviary were discussed, but the complexity of such a task and lack of time prompted the council fathers to delegate the task to the reigning pontiff, PIUS IV. He, in turn, delegated the project to a commission whose proceedings are no longer extant. Although the Council of Trent limited its liturgical mandate only to the reform of the missal and breviary, it is appropriate to refer to the subsequent revision of other liturgical books as part of the Tridentine reform, since those revisions were very much influenced by the council's spirit. In both the breviary and missal reforms, a primary goal was liturgical uniformity. Thus, for the first time, these liturgical books contained carefully prescribed rubrics printed at the beginning of each text, despite requests for regional differences to be respected with variations in the Roman rite to be determined by the local bishops involved. The source for these rubrics was the 1502 Ritus servandus in celebratione missae of Johannes Burckard, papal master of ceremonies.

The postconciliar liturgical commission was led by Cardinal Guglielmo Sirleto. In a relatively brief period, revision of the breviary and missal was completed; the breviary the first to be promulgated. Following the publication of a new postconciliar Index (1564) and a new Roman Catechism (1566), the Roman Breviary followed two years later in 1568: the Breviarium romanum ex decreto sacrosancti Concilii Tridentini restitutum Pii V. Pont. Max iussu editum.

Prior to the council, Pope CLEMENT VII (1523–34) had commissioned the Spanish Cardinal Francisco de QUIÑONES to undertake a revision of the breviary, which he published in 1535. Quiñones intended his edition of the breviary for private use and divided the psalter into weekly segments, eliminating repetitions; saints' legends; votive offices; hymns; and other elements more appropriate to the choral office. Scripture readings were lengthened and read sequentially. The simplicity of the Quiñones text held great appeal and was reprinted 11 times in the first year alone, and more than 100 times in its 30-year history. It was ultimately supressed by the conciliar breviary of 1568. The sanctoral calendar was restructured in the new breviary, bringing about greater balance between ferial days and feasts and a more ordered praying of the psalter. Localized customs that could not demonstrate an ancient tradition of at least two centuries or more were eliminated.

Some of the concerns evidenced in the breviary reform were seen yet again in the reform of the missal. The Roman Missal (Missale Romanum ex decreto ss. Concilii Tridentini restitutum, Pii V. Pont. Max iussu editum) was promulgated on July 14, 1570. This was not a new rite of the Mass, but rather a lightly revised edition of the 1474 missal used by the Roman Curia. In the Tridentine revision, the liturgical calendar was restructured. Saints' days were diminished as Sirleto's commission gave priority to the principal liturgical seasons and feasts of the Church year and to those saints' days celebrated in Rome prior to the 11th century; numerous minor (often local) feasts and memorials were excised, resulting in 157 free days on the liturgical calendar with the exception of octaves. Some votive masses and sequences were also removed. Private prayers and gestures of the priest-celebrant that found their way into the Roman Rite through Gallican influence were also reordered.

As the new breviary was to be the primary tool for the centralization of the Divine Office for the Church, so the Missale Romanum of 1570 was to be the definitive text for the celebration of the Roman Rite. Like the criteria used for the breviary reform, the new missal was to suppress all other local rites less than 200 years old. Thus, such religious orders as the Dominicans, and certain dioceses (e.g., Milan and Lyon) were given permission to continue using their own missals, each with its own distinctive rites.

Twelve years later, in 1582, the liturgical calendar was revised under Pope Gregory XIII, followed by the revision of the Roman martyrology in 1584. Using the 9th-century martyrology of Usuard as the source, hagiographical accretions that were either historically inaccurate or undocumented were removed. The work was completed by a commission of ten, including the noted historian Cardinal Cesare Baronius whose further revisions of the text were published in 1586 and 1589. The martyrology was meant to be read in religious communities during the daily office of Prime. The making of new saints and ongoing research made the martyrology the most revised liturgical book of all, with frequent new editions.

The Congregation of RITES was established by Pope Sixtus V in 1588 along with 14 other congregations. This new congregation was to oversee the celebration of the rites themselves; the restoration and reform of ceremonies; the reform of liturgical books; the canonization of saints and regulation of the office of patron saints; the celebration of feasts; and the reception of dignitaries to Rome. It was also responsible for dealing with liturgical problems raised by local circumstances. While the Congregation of Rites had varied responsibilities, the primary focus of that office was clearly to promote liturgical unification throughout the world and to assure that the newly included liturgical rubrics were carefully followed.

The reform of other liturgical books begun at Trent was continued with the Congregation of Rites. Based on the 13th-century pontifical of French bishop William Durandus, a new Roman Pontifical (for the use of bishops) was published in 1956 and made universally mandatory by Pope CLEMENT VIII. The first Caeremoniale Episcoporum (a book of rubrics for bishops and Episcopal masters of ceremonies) followed in 1600. The Roman Ritual (a pastoral manual for deacons, priests, and bishops) was published in 1614, containing texts for the administration of baptism, penance, marriage, extreme unction, processions, and for the blessings of persons, places, and things. The source for the 1614 text was largely the 1523 manual for priests by Dominican Alberto Castellani, as well as Cardinal Guilio Antonio Santori's 1601 ritual. The Roman Ritual was not obligatory, although its use was encouraged by Pope PAUL V. The fact that the text never received a universal mandate meant that it was hardly known outside of Italy until the middle of the 19th century, and even then, many dioceses had their own appendixes included until Vatican II.

17TH TO 19TH CENTURIES

Revision, Development, and Stagnation. The revision of the Catholic rites after the Council of Trent shows the effects of the theological debates between Catholicism and the Reform Churches. Of particular importance is the emphasis on the nature of Christ's presence in the Eucharist, the significance of the verba Iesu during the Eucharistic prayer, and the ecclesial centrality of Rome. Certain texts were removed altogether (for example, all but four sequences were removed) and the list of feast days and saints' days was simplified. Alongside this simplification and regularization came inevitable rubricism, indicating the desire to maintain the rituals and to apply them uniformly across the realm of Catholicism through the use of instructions of great detail. Thus, for the first time, the Missal was printed with an introduction composed by the papal master of ceremonies, providing a detailed list of rules to be followed in the celebration of Mass. There is little doubt that the printing of these texts greatly enhanced the possibility of uniformity in ritual. Only churches with ritual whose provenance could be proved to be more than 200 years old were exempt.

The reforms of the Missal and the Breviary were successful and effective, and these were soon followed by revision of the other books of worship: the Ritual, the Martyrology, the Ceremonial, the Pontifical. This process of reform and development seems to have come to a standstill, and the effectiveness of the reform lasted only about 50 years. As the decades went by, the original aim of simplification of rites and especially of liturgical music, as encountered in the compositions of Palestrina and Victoria for example, was ignored in some places as cathedrals vied with one another for the splendor of their ritual and music. Along with the leap in artistic and musical sophistication, we also see a rise in the number of liturgical feasts. It is during this period (about 1580 to 1903) that we find the introduction of major religious feasts such as Sacred Heart and Corpus Christi, the enhancement of the role of Mary with the construction of new rites for the celebration of the Immaculate Heart of Mary and the Immaculate Conception, and the addition of over 100 other feast days. As the rites continued to grow and proliferate, it was clear that further reform was required, but in fact it was only in France that anything significant was achieved. During the 18th century as many as 50 dioceses adopted the reformed Parisian liturgy for Mass and the Divine Office of c. 1736. these too, however, came under attack from several influential church figures, including Prosper GUÉRANGER, and the attack was ultimately successful.

Synod of Pistoia (1786). A significant attempt at liturgical reform in the 18th century came with the initiative made by Scipione de' RICCI (d.1810), bishop of PISTOIA. In that Jansenist-influenced synod, the call was made for a return to the pristine liturgy of the early church, encouraging active liturgical participation by the laity and in the vernacular, gathered around only one common altar in every church. There was emphasis on only one principal Sunday Mass where the priest proclaimed the presidential prayers in loud, clear voice. Communion given to the faithful should be consecrated at that Mass and not given from the tabernacle. Baptismal preparation for parents and godparents was insisted upon, and it was preferable that baptisms took place during the Easter Vigil. Marriage preparation was also decreed. The synod was ahead of its time and lacked the movements and years of preparation that preceded Vatican II. De' Ricci was deposed as bishop in 1790 and the synod was condemned four years later by Pope PIUS VI in the bull AUCTOREM FIDEI.

19TH AND 20TH CENTURIES

From Solesmes to the Liturgical Movement. More recent centuries saw important development in liturgy throughout Christianity. The reform of the liturgy within the Anglican Church was given much impetus by the Parish and People movement (1949–68) and its most popular cause, the Parish Communion movement. Most prominent among its members was A. G. Hebert, author of Liturgy and Society in 1935. The work and inspiration of these groups fostered and ultimately led to the production of the continued adaptations of the Book of Common Prayer, the Alternative Service Book (1980), and Common Worship (2000). (See OXFORD MOVEMENT.)

The four key figures during this period in the Catholic Church were Prosper GUÉRANGER (1805–75), founder of the Abbey of SOLESMES, Lambert BEAUDUIN (1873–1960), one of the founding figures of the modern LITURGICAL MOVEMENT, Pope PIUS X (pope 1903–14) and Pope PIUS XII (pope 1939–58). Guéranger's influence on the liturgy in France and across Europe was immense, fostered by the fame of the liturgy at his abbey, continued on through the liturgical prayer in monasteries in Germany (BEURON) and Belgium (MAREDSOUS and Mont César) and through his publications, principally his Année Liturgique, (1841–66). Perhaps Solesmes's greatest influence was its restoration of plainchant to the celebration of the liturgy, mainly thanks to the efforts of André MOCQUEREAU, fostered through the benefits of printing and greatly indebted to the Vatican for its official approval.

PIUS X's motu proprio Tra le sollecitudini of 1903 has commonly been credited with starting off the reform of the liturgy toward the possibility of a fuller participation by the assembly, which reached its zenith at the Second Vatican Council. While he limited his aim to the education of the laity in singing Gregorian Chant, it was the statement of the philosophy behind this intention that was so important—they should learn the chants in order to take part in the celebration more fully, and thus to be drawn toward sharing in the Eucharist. Above all, Pius reformed the liturgical laws to enable more frequent Communion (Sacra Tridentina, 1905), and recommended the reception of Communion for children. In addition to these important reforms, Pius also regularized the primacy of the celebration of the Lord's Day over other feasts, as well as the order of the recitation of psalms in the Daily Office.

Among those who responded to these reforms by Pius X, the most significant was Dom Lambert Beauduin, of the monastery of Mont César. Beginning with liturgical conferences and courses, Beauduin founded the Centre du Pastoral Liturgique in Paris, published the influential journal Questions Liturgiques and founded an ecumenical (Roman Catholic and Orthodox) monastery.

It is important to note the theological atmosphere prevalent at this time. Grave measures were taken to ensure that theological developments were in line with the prevaling notion that theological questions were to be dealt with according to the classic scholastic method. Any theological speculation based on contemporary values or philosophical techniques or discoveries came to be seen as a dangerous threat to the traditional teaching of the Church. The same Pius X who had promoted active participation in the liturgy also issued the decree LAMENTABILI and the encyclical PASCENDI in 1907, condemning the errors of "MODERNISM" and establishing an oath to be taken by all priests and theologians in the Catholic Church, one not rescinded until 1967. Thus speculative or experimental theology became difficult if not impossible, and this may have helped to spur theologians to turn to the tradition and the historical sources. Yet this too was dangerous, if the discoveries made seemed to threaten the status quo: the power of the neo-Thomistic method and the authority of the established tradition. We should therefore admire Beauduin's dogged determination to base his studies of the liturgy on as many historical texts as he could find. Beauduin gradually built up a collection of texts that was to be an important archive of materials concerning the liturgy and many other theological subjects. An important part of Beauduin's approach was that the study of historical texts demanded that one try to understand the intellectual and social milieu of the writer of the original text. Although he did not publish more than a single book, Beauduin's many talks, lectures, and articles in Questions Liturgiques, as well as his influence on the many priests he trained about the liturgy, represent an abiding source for the movement toward the reform of the liturgy that came after him. Elements typical to the reforming work and influence of Beauduin were mirrored in Germany through the efforts of Romano GUARDINI (1885-1968), Odo CASEL (1886-1948) and Pius PARSCH (1884–1954), who have left to posterity a much more extensive range and depth of liturgical writing.

For some time during this first half of the 20th century, there was considerable support for the fostering of good liturgy from the Vatican. PIUS XI (pope 1922–39) sought to promote effective liturgy through his Apostolic constitution of 1928, Divini cults sanctitatem. PIUS XII was regarded as the primary patron of pastoral liturgy during his pontificate, and paid particular attention to increased participation by the laity in liturgy, the fostering of good liturgical music, congregational singing, and the like. His most important liturgical statement, the encyclical MEDIATOR DEI (1947), sought to encourage the fostering of worthy liturgical rites and more frequent Communion. Pius XII's commitment to the process is shown by his creating a special commission to oversee the reform of the liturgy, his acceptance of the need for the use of the vernacular, even if under carefully controlled conditions, and his request for the rubrics to be simplified. Of particular importance was the revision of the rites of Holy Week from 1956 onward. Taking their cue from the Vatican, many dioceses around the world supported the continuing reform, and there was a growing sense that the liturgy would have to be examined in greater detail, fostering another, albeit this time more thorough, "return to the sources." (For a further discussion on the incipient trends in liturgical renewal that formed the basis of Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, e.g., dialogue masses; see LITURGICAL MOVEMENT, I: CATHOLIC.)

The Second Vatican Council and Sacrosanctum Concilium. JOHN XXIII's calling of the Second Vatican Council gave the foremost liturgical scholars and historians of the day a powerful forum in which to provide the bishops and other delegates with the fruits of their research and experience, and to ensure that the reforms that were put in place would be far-reaching and effective. The work of the preparatory commission was long and arduous, but resulted in the constitution Sacrosanctum Concilium, issued on Dec. 4, 1963.

Bibliography: B. BOTTE, From Silence to Participation (Washington, D.C. 1988). A. BUGNINI, The Reform of the Liturgy: 1948-1975 (Collegeville, Minn. 1990). J. D. CRICHTON, Lights in the Darkness (Collegeville, Minn. 1996). H. DAVIES, Worship and Theology in England, Combined Edition, Book I, "From Cranmer to Hooker" (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1996). G. DIX, The Shape of the Liturgy (London 1945, 1993). E. FOLEY, From Age to Age: How Christians Celebrated the Eucharist (Chicago 1992). R. JASPER, The Development of the Anglican Liturgy, 1662–1980 (London 1989). J. A. JUNGMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite: Its Origins and Development, 2 v. (Blackrock/Dublin 1950). E. KILMARTIN, The Eucharist in the West: History and Theology, ed. R. J. DALY (Collegeville, Minn. 1998). D. MACCULLOCH, Thomas Cranmer (New Haven, Conn. 1996). A. G. MARTIMORT et al., ed., The Church at Prayer, v. 1-2, (Collegeville, Minn. 1986). M. METZGER, History of the Liturgy: The Major Stages (Collegeville, Minn. 1997). K. F. PECKLERS, "History of the Roman Liturgy from the Sixteenth to the Twentieth Centuries," Handbook for Liturgical Studies I, ed. A. J. CHUPUNGCO (Collegeville, Minn. 1997) 153–178. D. N. POWER, The Sacrifice We Offer: The Tridentine Dogma and Its Reinterpretation (Edinburgh 1987). S. A. QUITSLUND, Beauduin, a Prophet Vindicated (New York 1973). F. C. SENN, Christian Liturgy: Catholic and Evangelical (Minneapolis 1997). G. S WAKEFIELD, An Outline of Christian Worship (Edinburgh 1998). J. F. WHITE, Roman Catholic Worship, Trent to Today (New York 1995). J. F. WHITE, Protestant Worship: Traditions in Transition (Louisville, Ky. 1989). S. J. WHITE, "Christian Worship since the Reformation," The Making of Jewish and Christian Worship ed. P. BRADSHAW and L. HOFFMANN (Notre Dame 1991). M. T. WINTER, Why Sing?: Toward a Theology of Catholic Church Music (Washington, D.C. 1984).

[A. CAMERON-MOWAT/K. F. PECKLERS]

Vatican II's Program of Liturgical Reform

The program of liturgical reform initiated by the Second Vatican Council was delineated in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, promulgated Dec. 4, 1963.

Principles of Liturgical Reform. The paramount purpose of this reform was to restore to the faithful "that full, intelligent, active part in liturgical celebrations which the nature of the liturgy itself requires, and which, in virtue of their Baptism, is their right and duty" (Sacrosanctum Concilium 14). This essentially pastoral concern as the supreme norm for liturgical reform is repeated over and over throughout the Constitution, and is given solid doctrinal support in the rich theological introduction on the nature of the liturgy and its importance in the life of the Church (ibid. 5–13). This theological and pastoral foundation for reform, likewise prefaced to each of the seven remaining chapters of the Constitution, was to become one of the insistent and increasingly profound characteristics of the major documents of liturgical reform. Posited on the assumption that the liturgy consists of "a part that is unchangeable because it is divinely instituted and of parts that can be changed," the reform clearly involved giving to "texts and rites a form that will express clearly the sacred content they are meant to signify, a form such that the Christian people will be able to grasp this content as easily as possible and share in it in a full, active, congregational celebration" (ibid. 21).

Three areas were explicitly singled out for a revision based on an understanding that liturgical services were "not private activities, but celebrations of the Church" (ibid. 26): (1) the hierarchical and communal nature of the liturgy, by which the diverse ministerial roles of the entire liturgical assembly were to be fostered (ibid. 26–32); (2) the pastoral and didactic nature of the liturgy, by which, through the clear, concise, and simple conjuncture of word and rite, the faith of the participants is nourished (ibid. 33–36); (3) the cultural diversity of various groups, regions and peoples, which, while still preserving the "substantial unity of the Roman rite," would profit by "legitimate variations and adaptations" (ibid. 37–40). In light of the pastoral and theological objectives of the Constitution, these were the three fundamental directional principles that were to govern the reform of the Eucharistic Liturgy, rites for the other Sacraments and sacramentals, the Liturgy of the Hours, the calendar, church music, and sacred art.

Vehicles of Reform. To carry out this reform, Paul VI established, Jan. 25, 1965, a commission known as the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy, under the direction of Cardinal Giacomo Lercaro. This body of highly-qualified experts retained its quasi-autonomous identity until late in 1969, when it was reconstituted as the Special Commission for the Completion of the Liturgical Reform within the newly created Congregation for Divine Worship, with Cardinal Benno Gut as first prefect. From July 11, 1975, competency for liturgical reform passed to the newly constituted Congregation of Sacraments and Divine Worship, which Pope John Paul II renamed as the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments in 1982. Whereas the overall revision of the Roman liturgy was centralized under the direction of the Holy See, legitimate adaptation was to be channelled through the competent regional and national episcopal conferences. In the United States the liturgical reform has been under the guidance of the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, which, since 1970, has been in consultation with the Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions. The English translations of the Latin editio typica of the various reformed liturgies have been provided by a separate entity under the English-speaking episcopate, the International Commission on English in the Liturgy.

Major Achievements of Vatican II's Liturgical Reform. The reform of the liturgical books mandated by the Constitution (Sacrosanctum Concilium 25) is now substantially complete, with the publication of the editio typica for the rite of exorcism in 2000. A general assessment of the reform process reveals the following elements.

(1) The Liturgy, Locus of Encounter. Fundamental throughout the entire liturgical reform has been the conviction that the Church celebrates in her liturgy, through ritual transposition, the Trinitarian economy of salvation, celebrating, that is, the mysteries "in which are set forth the victory and triumph of Christ's death, and also giving thanks to God for his inexpressible gift in Christ Jesus, in praise of his glory through the power of the Holy Spirit' (ibid. 6). The dialogic perception of the liturgy as being the locus par excellence where God speaks to his people through Christ and where they, in return, respond to the Father by actualizing the priestly mission of the same Christ is expressed not only in the Constitution (ibid. 7), but also in the theological statements introducing the reformed rites. In this regard, the General Instruction on the Roman Missal, the General Instruction of the Liturgy of the Hours, the General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar, for example, marked an extraordinary advance over the juridical, rubrical directives of the analogous sections of the unreformed books. This theological understanding of the liturgy as being "the very exercise of the priestly office of Jesus Christ" and therefore "preeminently a sacred action, the efficacy of which no other act of the Church can equal on the same basis and to the same degree" (ibid. 7) became the raison d'être of the Church's repeated emphasis on liturgical re-

(2) Other Theological Aspects. The ressourcement (return to sources) of the reform also brought with it a rediscovery or restoration of certain theological aspects of the Christian tradition which through the centuries had fallen into the background: the totality of the paschal mystery in every liturgical celebration; the multimodal presence of Christ in all of the liturgy and not only in the Eucharistic elements; the Trinitarian economy of prayer to the Father, through the Son, in the power of the Spirit; the role of the Holy Spirit in the formation and sanctification of the Church as People of God set apart to sing praises to God within their liturgical assembly; the eschatological hope of the pilgrim Church awaiting the day of the Lord; liturgical remembrance of the deeds of the Lord of history and their recovery in the Kingdom; the relationship of faith, repentance, conversion, reconciliation and their sacramental realization; the incarnational and worldly dimension of Christian life; and many more areas which have hardly begun to be explored. In no small measure is this theological recovery due to the Constitution's stipulation (ibid. 92) that the Scriptures be made readily accessible in greater fullness, and that patristic and other ecclesiastical writers be represented more authentically.

- (3) The Liturgy, Prayer of the Whole People. The hierarchical and ecclesial aspect of the liturgy described in the Constitution (ibid. 26–32) has restored the precious value that liturgy is not the private province of the clergy, but is indeed the prayer of the whole people who, while under the leadership of the ordained minister, all exercise the shared priesthood of Christ. In this context, the multiple functions of readers, cantors, acolytes, choir and other ministers, as well as the active participation of the congregation are to be regarded as a true liturgical ministry.
- (4) A Pastoral Liturgy. Regarding the pastoral and didactic nature of the liturgy (ibid. 33-36), three reformed areas have produced incalculable benefits: introduction of the vernacular far beyond the expectations of the conciliar Fathers; restoration of the Liturgy of the Word almost to the point of surfeit; and transparency of rite. More than any other change, perhaps, the use of the vernacular has made the liturgy into an active and conscious part of Christian spirituality. In place of the spare rites of the Tridentine liturgy there is now accessible to the people in their own language a copious, amplified liturgy with God's Word poured forth in abundance. The use of the mother tongue consequently makes immediately available the astonishing increase of Scripture reading, not only in the Lectionary at Mass with its three cycles of judiciously selected pericopes and responsorial psalms, but also in the cycle of readings prepared for the Liturgy of the Hours and the sacramental celebrations, so that every liturgy allows God to speak to his people and Christ to proclaim the good news (ibid. 33). Drawing upon this source, the HOMILY, regarded as an integral part of the liturgy, becomes "like a proclamation of God's mighty deeds in redemptive history" (ibid. 35), with the mystery of Christ always present and at work in the Church. In addition, cathechetical insights, brief commentaries, and instructions are encouraged to make of the prescribed liturgy a more cohesive and effective celebration. Finally, the ritual symbolic actions and gestures have been pared down so that the dominant liturgical symbol becomes more immediately understandable, pruned of its former repetitive and allegorical overlayer-
- (5) Adaptation and Inculturation. The most revolutionary liturgical reform, in comparison with the previous 400-year static uniformity, has been, without doubt, the acceptance of the principle of liturgical adaptation required by the needs and cultural differences of various groups, regions, and peoples (ibid. 38), with an even more radical adaptation proposed for mission lands (ibid., 40). Regarding cultural adaptation, the Praenotanda of the reformed liturgical books make special provision for regional adjustments to be determined by episcopal conferences working together with the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of Sacraments. The question of adaptation and inculturation is perhaps the most difficult question to deal with is how to resolve, or keep in creative tension.

Bibliography: D. BONDIOLI et al., "Situazione della liturgia riformata e futuro della pastorale liturgica," Rivista di Pastorale Liturgica 13 (1976) 3-36. P. M. GY, "La reforme liturgique de Trente et celle de Vatican II," Maison-Dieu 128 (1976) 61-75. H. SCHMIDT, "Liturgy and Modern Society-Analysis of the Current Situation," H. SCHMIDT, ed., Liturgy in Transition: Concilium 62 (New York 1971) 14-29. H. SCHMIDT and D. POWER, eds., Politics and Liturgy: Concilium 92 (New York 1974). R. G. WEAKLAND, "The 'Sacred' and Liturgical Renewal," Worship 49 (1975) 512-29. P. C. FINN and J. M. SCHELLMAN, eds., Shaping English Liturgy: Studies in Honor of Archbishop Denis Hurley (Washington, D.C. 1990). W. J. GRISBROOKE, "Liturgical Reform and Liturgical Renewal," Studia Liturgica 21:2 (1991) 136-54. A. A. HÄUSSLING, The Meaning of the Liturgy (Collegeville, Minn. 1994). D. N. POWER, "Liturgy and Culture Revisited," Worship 69 (1995) 225-43. N. MITCHELL, "The Renewal That Awaits Us," Worship 70 (1996) 163-72.

[G. M. COLESS/EDS.]

LITURGICAL LANGUAGES

The Catholic Church uses many languages in its official worship of God, though LATIN is the one most intimately associated with the Roman liturgy. This article will consider primitive practice, the Churches of the East, the Church in the West, and the reforms of Vatican Council II.

Primitive Practice. The earliest liturgical language in the Church was almost certainly ARAMAIC, this being both the native tongue of the Apostles and their first Jewish converts and the one used by the Lord. These first Christians seem never to have adopted a hieratic use of Hebrew, with which they would have been familiar from the reading of the Law and the Prophets in the Temple, nor is there any evidence that the first missionaries attempted to preserve Aramaic as a sacred liturgical language in non-Aramaic–speaking communities. In rural districts people had their own native forms of speech, but in urban areas they used Greek, and this koine, the usual cosmopolitan language of everyday affairs, became the foremost language of the liturgy (see GREEK LANGUAGE, EARLY CHRISTIAN AND BYZANTINE.).

There is ample evidence that the language of the people to whom Christianity was preached from the beginning was also the language used in their liturgy (cf. O. Korolevsky). Only three languages, however, were of importance in the development of the liturgy: Syro-Aramaic, Greek, and Latin. Syro-Aramaic was used in Jerusalem, in the Judeo-Christian communities of Palestine, and in those territories to the north and east that had not come under Hellenistic influence. Thus EDESSA became the center of a national Aramaic or Syrian Christianity. The Syriac liturgy has survived to the present day, though much of it is a translation from the Greek. Until the 4th century Greek was the lingua franca in the whole of the eastern half of the Roman Empire and was therefore the language of the liturgy in those areas. Even in Rome Greek was the common language. It was not until c. 250 A.D. that Latin predominated there and gradually became the official language of the Western Church by the 4th century.

The Churches of the East. In the East the principle of retaining the Byzantine liturgy in Greek as the official liturgical language was not maintained so rigidly as Latin in the West. When the Melkites around Antioch adopted Arabic as their vernacular, their liturgy was accordingly translated into Arabic. The Georgians in the Caucasus used Georgian. The Byzantine liturgy is also celebrated in Hungarian, Finnish, Chinese, and Japanese. Other Oriental liturgies are celebrated in Syriac, Coptic, and Armenian.

"We do not," wrote PIUS XII, "hold the venerable liturgies of the Eastern Church in less esteem; on the contrary these ancient and traditional rites are equally dear to us" (Mediator Dei 11). In 1929, when conceding that reconciled Orthodox clergy in Estonia might use their native language in the liturgy, PIUS XI emphasized that as a matter of principle Eastern Catholics must be accorded full liberty to use in the liturgy languages that are suited to the good of souls, once the Holy See approves their use (cf. Korolevsky, 54). On April 1, 1960, JOHN XXIII approved a decision, taken the previous day at a plenary session of the Holy Office, that recognized the right of Byzantine priests to use vernacular, even non-Oriental, languages in celebrating the liturgy anywhere in the world. (For the background to this decision, arising out of an attempt to impose restrictive norms on the use of English in the United States, see Maximos IV Saigh, ed., Eastern Churches and Catholic Unity [New York 1963].)

The Church in the West. After the transfer of the imperial capital from Rome to Constantinople, and the political dismemberment of the Western empire, a common understanding of Latin was one of the chief means whereby Christian culture was transmitted to the new barbaric peoples. There is strong evidence that Rome abandoned Greek in favor of Latin some time in the second half of the 4th century, more precisely between 360 and 382. Klauser (469–473) points to DAMASUS I as probably the most influential person in making the language of Rome the language of the liturgy. Vernacular liturgies were feasible only in the later Middle Ages, as the dialects of the barbaric peoples assimilated the vulgar Latin, admittedly the less thoroughly as they were farther from the Mediterranean, and emerged as modern European languages. For more than 1,000 years Latin remained the language of cultured people and hence was the obvious language for the Church's meetings and quite naturally continued to be the language of the liturgy.

At the Council of TRENT suggestions that Latin should be canonized by name, or that vernacular languages should be indiscriminately approved, were equally rejected, and the Fathers anathematized in a canon those who said "that the Mass must be celebrated only in the vernacular" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 1759), explaining in the preceding chapter that "although the Mass contains a great deal of instruction for the faithful, it does not seem expedient to the Fathers that it be indiscriminately in the vernacular" (ibid. 1749).

The easy identification of the liturgical use of the vernacular with Protestant ideals led to a grave suspicion of heresy, or at least disloyalty, attaching to any tendency among Catholics to champion that use. PIUS VI, in the apostolic constitution AUCTOREM FIDEI (1794), spoke of the Synod of PISTOIA's proposal to use the vernacular in the liturgy as "false, temerarious, disruptive of the prescribed manner of celebrating the mysteries, and easily productive of many evils" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 2666). PIUS X, in his motu proprio Tra le sollecitudini (1903), reaffirmed that "the language proper to the Roman Church is Latin and hence it is forbidden to sing anything whatsoever in the vernacular in solemn liturgical functions—much more to sing in the vernacular the variable or common parts of the Mass and Office" (7; A. Bugnini, Documenta pontificia ad instaurationem liturgicam spectantia [Rome 1953] 18). John XXIII, in the apostolic constitution Veterum Sapientia (1962), asked that "no one, moved by an inordinate desire for novelty, should write against the use of Latin either in the teaching of the sacred disciplines or in the sacred rites of the liturgy" (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 54 [1962] 133).

In spite of this rigorous official attachment to Latin, the Church occasionally admitted other languages into the Roman liturgy, usually when missionaries from the West had to collaborate with their Eastern counterparts. The best known was the permission given in the 9th century by ADRIAN II (d. 872) and JOHN VIII (d. 882) for the use of Old Slavonic in Moravia. Despite its withdrawal by STEPHEN VI (d. 891), this ancient custom, secured by SS. CYRIL AND METHODIUS, has survived down to our own times in parts of central Europe. Similarly in 1398 BONIFACE IX allowed the Dominican missionaries in Greece to celebrate Mass in the liturgical Greek. The Armenian Catholics of the Order of St. GREGORY THE ILLU-MINATOR, an Armenian association (1330–1794) that worked for reunion with the Holy See, celebrated according to the Dominican rite in the classical Armenian tongue, and Carmelite priests also made extensive use of the same language. In the 18th century the Capuchin missionaries in Georgia read the Epistle and Gospel in the vernacular, and the Carmelites in Persia were permitted to celebrate one Mass in Arabic every day. In India councils at Goa (1585) and DIAMPER (1599) authorized private Mass in Syriac.

There is evidence that CLEMENT V, when he established a bishopric at Beijing (1307), gave permission for Chinese in the liturgy. The Jesuit missionaries 300 years later persuaded the Holy Office to support the use of this vernacular, and in 1615 PAUL V granted to Chinese priests a faculty of using their own language for Mass and the Sacraments. Whether the permission had ever been put into effect, it was later withdrawn by the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH (founded in 1622). In the Caughnawaga and Saint-Regis Indian reservations, not far from Montreal in Canada, a Mohawk Iroquois tongue is still used by the people in their parts of the Mass, thanks to concessions obtained by Jesuit missionaries in the 17th century.

In the West Latin was retained as the liturgical language of the Catholic Church in spite of strong protests at the time of the Reformation. The Council of Trent ruled that "it was not expedient" that Mass should be celebrated in the vernacular language (sess. 22, ch. 8; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1749). The beginnings of a change are discernible in the encyclical MEDIATOR DEI (Nov. 20, 1947) which, while reiterating the statement that the use of Latin is a sign of the Church's unity, admitted that the use of the mother tongue was frequently of great advantage to the people. It did not specify what parts of the liturgy could be rendered in the mother tongue, and in fact hardly any permissions were given until after Vatican Council II, with the notable exception of the Deutches Hochamt (high Mass) in Germany.

For several centuries German peoples had a custom of singing in their own language at Mass, so that, in Germany and Austria and parts of Switzerland and Luxembourg, the choir and congregation sang many of their parts in German, and the Epistle and Gospel were read in both Latin and German. A similar order using Hindi was approved for the province of Agra in 1958, and in the same year the use of Hebrew was authorized in Israel for the whole of the Mass before the Offertory. These changes as well as the various approvals given by the Holy See in the first part of the 20th century for the use of bilingual versions of the Rituale Romanum are now largely of historical interest only, since they were superseded by the work of liturgical reform accomplished at Vatican Council II.

Vatican Council II. In 1947 PIUS XII had said that "the use of the Latin language prevailing in a great part of the Church affords at once an imposing sign of unity and an effective safeguard against the corruption of true doctrine. Admittedly the adoption of the vernacular in quite a number of functions may prove of great benefit to the faithful. But the Apostolic See alone is empowered to grant this permission" (Mediator Dei 60). The conciliar Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy goes further. Whereas it insists that "the use of the Latin language is to be preserved in the Latin rites" (36.1), Latin is not called, as some Fathers during the debates in the council had desired, the official language of the Roman rite. And although the principle, familiar in Eastern rites, that the living language can be the normal liturgical language, is not conceded, nevertheless all the practical results of such a concession are made possible. "Since the use of the mother tongue, whether in the Mass, the administration of Sacraments, or other parts of the liturgy, frequently may be of great advantage to the people, the limits of its employment may be extended. . . . It is for the competent territorial ecclesiastical authority . . . to decide whether, and to what extent, the vernacular language is to be used; their decrees are to be approved, that is, confirmed, by the Holy See" (36.2-3). Later it is said that at "Masses celebrated with the people, a suitable place may be allotted to their mother tongue. This is to apply in the first place to the readings and the 'common prayer,' and also, as local conditions may warrant, to those parts which pertain to the people. . . . And wherever a more extended use of the mother tongue within the Mass appears desirable" (54), the competent territorial authority should submit the matter to the Holy See (40). The vernacular language may be used for the entire rites of Sacraments, sacramentals, and for the Divine Office.

The principle behind this reform was well formulated by Vatican II: "In this restoration [of the liturgy], both texts and rites should be drawn up so they express more clearly the holy things they signify; the Christian people, so far as possible, should be able to understand them with ease and to take part in them fully, actively, and as befits a community" (21).

Even the council did not envisage an entire vernacular liturgy. It decreed that though existing special exemptions are to remain in force, the use of the Latin language is to be preserved in the Latin rites. Nevertheless, in view of the advantage accruing to the people through the use of the mother tongue, in the first place the readings and directives and some of the prayers and chants could be translated at the discretion of the competent local authority (Sacrosanctum Concilium 36). This decree was later clarified by the Instruction of the Congregation of Rites Inter oecumenici (40; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 [1964] 897–900). It was left to the episcopal conferences to decide which texts were to be translated. Permission was not given for the translation of the Roman Canon until June 29, 1967, with the Instruction Tres abhinc annos (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 59 [1967] 442–448). Thus gradually in the whole of the liturgy the vernacular became permissible as pastoral needs became evident.

All translations have to be authorized, i.e. confirmed, by the Congregation for Divine Worship before use in the liturgy and on June 25, 1969, the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy published important guidelines for liturgical translators in an Instruction on Translation of Liturgical Texts (Comme le prévoit). In 2001 the Congregation for Divine Worship issued new guidelines on the translation of liturgical texts, Liturgicam authenticam. Among other things, Liturgicam authenticam called for a more literal translation of the Latin into vernacular languages.

Bibliography: A classic introductory survey for the general reader is C. KOROLEVSKY, Living Languages in Catholic Worship, ed. and tr. D. ATTWATER (Westminster, Md. 1957). C. MOHRMANN, Liturgical Latin: Its Origins and Character (Washington 1957). G. T. KLAUSER, "Der Übergang der römischen Kirche von der griechischen zur lateinischen Liturgiesprache," Miscellanea Giovanni Mercati, 6 v. (Studi e Testi 121-126; 1946) 1:467-482. s. SMRŽIK, The Glagolitic or Roman-Slavonic Liturgy (Cleveland 1959). D. ATTWATER, Eastern Catholic Worship (New York 1945). F. E. BRIGHTMAN, Liturgies Western and Eastern (Oxford 1896). J. A. JUNGMANN, The Early Liturgies to the Time of Gregory the Great (Notre Dame, Ind. 1959). A. A. KING, Liturgies of the Primatial Sees (Milwaukee 1957). A. RAES, Introductio in Liturgiam Orientalem (Rome 1947). H. SCHMIDT, Liturgie et langue vulgaire (Rome 1950). P. D. GARRETT, "Problem of Liturgical Translation: A Preliminary Study," Saint Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 22:2-3 (1978) 83-113; "The Problem of Liturgical Translation: An Addendum," Saint Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 24:1 (1980) 37-50. N. MITCHELL, "Christine Mohrmann (1903-1988): The Science of Liturgical Language," Liturgy Digest 1:2 (1994) 4-43 (with extensive bibliographies). P. F. BRADSHAW, ed., "Liturgical Language" (symposium, 15th Cong of Soc Liturgica, Dublin, Aug. 14-19, 1995), Studia Liturgica 26:1 (1996) 119-143. A. A. R. BAS-TIAENSEN, The Beginnings of Latin Liturgy (Louvain 1997). A. CHIROVSKY, ed., "Papers and Discussions of the International Symposium on English Translations of Byzantine Liturgical Texts, Part I," Logos 39:2-4 (1998) 155-402.

[C. R. A. CUNLIFFE/H. E. WINSTONE/EDS.]

LITURGICAL LAWS, AUTHORITY OF

This article considers the authority of liturgical laws in the Latin church sui iuris, since each of the Eastern Catholic churches has its own liturgical patrimony and canonical discipline. Liturgical law may be understood broadly as the law regulating the liturgy. Liturgical laws are mainly ecclesiastical (human) laws, so their promulgation, binding force, interpretation, dispensation, and revocation are subject to the same canonical rules as any other ecclesiastical law. Some liturgical laws are based on divine law, for example, many requirements for the validity of sacraments. No one may dispense a divine law or validly enact a human law contrary to it.

The legislators for the liturgy are the same as those for any other area of ecclesiastical law. The supreme legislator is the pope, acting on his own, or the college of bishops, which exercises its power in an ecumenical council. The Second Vatican Council's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy established the foundations and directions for the most comprehensive liturgical reform in the history of the Church, which was implemented by the legislation of Popes Paul VI and John Paul II.

Universal and Particular Law. The pope issues universal liturgical laws for the entire Latin church. These are found principally in the introductions and rubrics of the official liturgical books. Universal liturgical laws are also found in the Code of Canon Law, in Book IV, "The Sanctifying Office of the Church." Other sources of universal liturgical law are apostolic constitutions and apostolic letters motu proprio of the pope, if treating a liturgical matter, and the decrees of the Congregation for DIVINE WORSHIP AND DISCIPLINE OF THE SACRAMENTS (CDWDS) issued by mandate of the pope. Although rare, an administrative document of the Roman Curia may have legislative force by specific papal approval, indicated at the end of a document with the precise words, in forma specifica approbavit.

The supreme authority may issue particular law for a part of the Church, but normally particular law is issued by lower legislators. Below the supreme authority is the plenary council and conference of bishops of a nation or other territorial grouping of dioceses. At the next level is the provincial council made up of representatives of the dioceses that comprise an ecclesiastical province. Finally, there is the level of the diocese or equivalent particular church.

Plenary and provincial councils and diocesan bishops are free to enact laws regulating any kind of liturgical matter, provided their laws are not contrary to a higher norm (ius), whether this be a higher law, administrative norm, or legal custom (c. 135, §2). There are additional restrictions on the legislative power of conferences of bishops. The conference of bishops may enact laws only for specific matters as permitted in the universal law or by prior authorization of the Holy See. To be binding, the decrees of the conference must be approved by at least two-thirds of the total membership and must obtain the recognitio (a kind of approval) of the Holy See (c. 455). The legislative competence of conferences of bishops includes the approval of vernacular translations of the liturgical rites, many liturgical adaptations, and policies on numerous liturgical matters, such as lay preaching, the age for confirmation, holy days of obligation, the catechumenate, etc.

Customs. Unlike laws, which are issued by legislative authorities, customs originate within the community itself (parish, religious community, diocese, etc.). During the first millennium, the liturgy was regulated more by custom than by law, whereas law tended to predominate in the second millennium, especially in the centuries after the Council of TRENT when liturgical development ossified and a mentality of rigid rubricism prevailed. The role of custom is regaining momentum since Vatican II due to the recovered theology of the local church within the communion of churches; the stress on the dignity of all the faithful, their participation in the threefold munera of the Church, and their right and duty to participate meaningfully in the liturgy; and the imperative of inculturation. Many aspects of the liturgy are today subject to local customs as well as laws, for example, lay ministers, art and architecture, music and dance, gesture and posture, observances of feasts days and seasons, inclusive language, etc.

The customs of a community obtain the force of law if they are specifically approved by the competent legislator, or if they are observed by the majority of the community for thirty continuous and complete years. This applies both to customs contrary to the law and customs on matters not treated in the law (praeter legem). No custom can attain the force of law if it is contrary to divine law or if it is not reasonable (cc. 23–26). A legal custom (one that has the force of law) must be observed in those communities where it is in force, even if it is contrary to the law. Customs with the force of law can be revoked only by the competent legislative authority (c. 28).

Administrative Norms. Executive authorities, especially the congregations of the Roman Curia, may issue general administrative norms within their competence, as does the CDWDS for the liturgy. These norms are contained in non-legislative documents, such as directories, instructions, circular letters, etc. There is no consistent difference between legislative and administrative norms as to their content or style, but laws (leges) and legal customs have the greater juridic value. An administrative norm in a document of a Roman dicastery, which is contrary to universal law, is null. A curial document cannot revoke particular laws or legal customs. This can only be done by an act of the competent legislator that expressly revokes the particular law or custom (cc. 20, 28).

Vicars general and episcopal vicars may also issue general administrative norms, including norms for the liturgy, but they would not do this without a mandate from the bishop. The liturgical commissions of dioceses and conferences of bishops have no power to issue binding norms. Their documents are advisory only, except for those provisions within them that are citations of other binding norms.

Bibliography: A New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, ed., J. P. BEAL, J. A. CORIDEN, and T. J. GREEN (New York/Mahwah, NJ 2000). J. M. HUELS, "Assessing the Weight of Documents on the Liturgy," Worship 74 (2000) 117–135. J. M. HUELS, "A Theory of Juridical Documents Based on Canons 29–34," Studia Canonica 32 (1998) 337–370.

[J. M. HUELS]

LITURGICAL MOVEMENT, I: CATHOLIC

Grounded in the theology of the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST, the Liturgical Movement aimed at recovering full and active liturgical participation for all members of the Church. This part treats the Movement's origin, purpose, and history within the Catholic Church.

Origin. The 19th century was a time of tremendous intellectual activity in Europe. While great thinkers like DARWIN, HEGEL, HUME, MARX, and ENGELS were developing their own theories and philosophies, theological giants like J. M. SAILER, J. HIRSCHER, and especially J. A. MÖHLER and M. SCHEEBEN were calling for a return to the Pauline concept of the Church as the mystical body of Christ. As the biblical movement and biblical theology served to focus the attention of liturgical pioneers on Sacred Scripture and salvation history, the patristic movement recovered a rich understanding of the Church and its communitarian sacramental system. The Liturgical Movement in Europe was born within such a milieu.

The founding of the Liturgical Movement is usually attributed to Dom Prosper GUÉRANGER (1805–75), the restorer of the French Benedictine Congregation at SOLESMES in 1833. It must be stated, however, that even prior to Guéranger, one finds considerable movement toward liturgical reform through efforts at increasing lay participation in the Eucharist and the Liturgy of the Hours. The 17th through 19th centuries in France was a time of great liturgical creativity. Although these innovations began only as minor additions to the Roman liturgy, each diocese in France eventually had its own liturgy. Moreover, proposals for greater participation within the liturgy were voiced by the Fathers present at the Synod of PISTOIA (1786), although without success.

Finally, as we consider the birth of the Liturgical Movement in 19th-century France, similarities with the Anglican Communion's OXFORD MOVEMENT should not be overlooked. Both movements were concerned with a return to the sources; both exerted an influence outside the churches in which they were born; both were influenced to some degree by the Romantic movement; and in the end, both were concerned with a more profound understanding of the mystery of the Church.

The French liturgical movement. It is ironic that Guéranger is usually considered the founder of the Liturgical Movement. His approach was highly subjective, often leading him to inaccurate liturgical conclusions, e.g. calling for a return to the Middle Ages as the period of the highest liturgical development. Moreover, he saw in the French liturgical innovations a lack of fidelity to tradition, attributing the state of the French Church to JANSENISM and GALLICANISM. Thus, rather than continuing the liturgical experimentation found elsewhere in France, the Eucharist and Divine Office at Solesmes were celebrated strictly according to the Roman Rite. Despite Guéranger's fierce critique, however, some of the very innovations he criticized were later incorporated into the liturgical reforms of Pope Pius X at the beginning of the 20th century, and eventually into the Roman liturgy itself. Without denying his limitations, Guéranger's contribution to the liturgical and monastic revival in Europe cannot be underestimated. His goal was to restore the liturgy with the Eucharist as primary focus, making it more central to the cenobitic monastic life. Further, the church year became the paradigm for the daily life and rhythm of the monastery. Accordingly, he developed his famous work L'Année Liturgique (begun in Advent of 1841), with the intention of writing a pastoral commentary on the entire liturgical year at the service of parish priests and their parishioners. He completed only nine of the proposed twelve volumes prior to his death. In that same year, he founded Institutions liturgiques, a more scholarly journal offering serious articles that would respond to liturgical problems and abuses within France, and offer a solid, proper instruction in the Roman liturgy. Guéranger promoted a return to Gregorian chant as the official liturgical music of the Catholic Church. He encouraged chant in place of popularized liturgical music in vogue at the time. Although the Liturgical Movement in France did not grow until years later, Guéranger's influence held sway throughout the 19th century, not only in France, but also in Germany and Belgium, especially in those monasteries founded by Solesmes.

The German liturgical movement. The German movement began at the Benedictine monastery of BEURON, re-founded in 1863 by the brothers Maurus and Placidus Wolter, who desired to offer the Church in Germany the same spirit of monastic and liturgical reform that Solesmes had offered the Church in France. Maurus Wolter spent several months at Solesmes in 1862, and was impressed both by the monastic observance and the monastic liturgy celebrated there. When he returned to Germany and joined his brother in re-founding the monastery at Beuron the following year, the influence of Guéranger could be seen. A study of the early years at Beuron reveals a great admiration and respect for the classic Roman liturgy, not unlike Solesmes. Both the monastic liturgy and overall governance were strictly controlled by Solesmes in the early years, leaving its distinctive mark on that monastery's life and worship. The nascent Liturgical Movement in Germany soon bore fruit. In 1884 Dom Anselm Schott published the first German-Latin Missal, Das Messbuch der Hl. Kirche; the Vesperbuch followed in 1893. Each volume contained explanations taken from Guéranger's L'Année Liturgique. Beuron was also known for its famous art school founded by Dom Desiderius Lenz, which had tremendous influence on Church art well beyond the shores of Europe. Lenz worked at establishing artistic unity within one liturgical space, thereby fostering a harmonic relationship between liturgy and art.

In 1893, the monks of Beuron re-founded the German monastery of MARIA LAACH (near Cologne) that had been suppressed by Napolean in 1803. Under the leadership of Abbot Ildefons Herwegen and two of his monks, Kunibert MOHLBERG and Odo CASEL, in collaboration with the young diocesan priest, Romano GUARDINI, and with the aid of two professors, Franz J. DÖLGER and Anton BAUMSTARK, the Liturgical Movement in Germany gained momentum. They organized a three-fold series of publications which were begun in 1918: Ecclesia Orans, Liturgiegeschichtliche Quellen and Liturgiegeschichtliche Forschungen. Moreover, the wellknown journal Jarbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft was founded at the monastery in 1921. There is no question that Odo Casel (+1948) was the theologian of the German movement and one of its key players. He came under the influence of Herwegen while studying at the University of Bonn, and entered the monastery in 1905, at least in part through Herwegen's mentorship. In the thirty years that followed, he wrote hundreds of articles and a number of books, and not unlike other great minds, his writings were initially considered highly controversial. His classic text, Das christliche Kultmysterium, argued that the pagan mystery cults were a preparation for the mysteries of the Christian sacraments. Even though Casel's theory is no longer espoused by sacramental theologians, his work gave way to a rich understanding of the Church as the mystical body of Christ which expresses itself symbolically through sacramental participation. While Maria Laach was known for its cultivation of liturgical science, it did not limit its activities to the academic. With the permission of Abbot Herwegen, the first Missa recitata was celebrated in the monastery's crypt chapel on Aug. 6, 1921, under the presidency of Prior Albert Hammenstede. The celebration took place in Latin, but included the praying of the Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei in common, as well as responses involving the entire assembly. Those who attended the Mass also participated in the Offertory procession, reviving the ancient practice of bringing their own bread to the altar. Despite episcopal approval for the liturgical experiments, rumors quickly spread in the Rhineland that the monks of Maria Laach were advocating a lay priesthood and attempting to "Protestantize" the Church and its worship.

There was other pastoral involvement registered in those years, thanks to the strength of the German youth movement and related organizations. Johannes Pinsk (+1957), university chaplain in Berlin, and Romano GUARDINI (+1968) at Burg Rothenfels were pastorally involved in promoting participative liturgy, especially for the more significant feasts of the Church years. Leaders like Guardini were also involved in collaborating with leading secular architects of the day in creating liturgical architecture that facilitated participative worship. With the founding of the Liturgical Institute at Trier after World War II, the movement saw other names emerging like Balthasar Fischer and Johannes Wagner. Austrian liturgist Josef Andreas JUNGMANN, S.J. (+1975), did his own part to collaborate with his German colleagues. Liturgical pioneering in Germany was not limited to men, as demonstrated in the recent study by Teresa Berger of Duke University. Aemiliana Löhr (+1972), a Benedictine nun of the Abbey of Holy Cross at Herstelle, was greatly influenced by the monastery's chaplain and her mentor, Odo Casel, and she carried the torch through her own writings—more than three hundred articles, not to mention books. There were other women in that same monastery who, even though trained in philosophy or medicine, soon took up the task of promoting the liturgical renewal upon entrance into the convent. Like their male counterparts, these Benedictine women were encouraged and promoted in their own pioneering and scholarship by monks like Herwegen and Casel.

It must be noted, however, that Germany was not the first country to witness the effect of an organized Liturgical Movement. Prior to the founding of Maria Laach, the monks of Beuron were already planting seeds of liturgical renewal elsewhere in Europe: Maredsous in Belgium, Emmaus-Prague in Czechoslovakia, and Seckau in Austria. Maredsous, and later Mont César (also in Belgium) were the most liturgically significant of these new monastic foundations.

The Belgian liturgical movement. The Benedictine monastery of MAREDSOUS was founded by Maurus Wolter (then Abbot of Beuron) in 1872. It soon became famous for its liturgical publishing and would later inspire the young American Benedictine student Virgil MI-CHEL to initiate a similar publishing venture in the United States. In 1882 Dom Gérard van Caloen, rector of the Abbey School at Maredsous, published the first French-Latin missal, Missel des fidéles. One year later, in a talk at a French Eucharistic congress, he advocated lay participation in the Mass, bringing about his removal as school rector. Two years later, he founded the review Messager des fidèles (later Revue bénédictine), the first publication intended to be an instrument of promoting the Liturgical Movement. The monastery of Mont César was founded in 1899 by Robert Kerchove (+1942), along with several other monks from Maredsous. The liturgical influence of Solesmes, Beuron, and Maredsous was influential, and liturgical publishing quickly became an apostolate of that new monastic foundation, as well. In 1910 Les Questions liturgiques was founded, and in the summer of 1912 the monastery initiated the famous sémaines liturgiques held each year—the primary means of communicating the message of the Liturgical Movement.

The Belgian movement is known principally for its pastoral focus, thanks to the leadership of Lambert BEAUDUIN, O.S.B. (+1960). Beauduin had been a labor chaplain with the Aumôniers du Travail as a diocesan priest in Liége, and was deeply influenced by the workers whom he served and their social problems. Even prior to his association with the Aumôniers, he was known for his strong social consciousness and his compassion for the downtrodden. In 1906 he left his labor chaplaincy and diocese, and entered the monastery of Mont César, where he came into contact with the Irish Benedictine Colomba Marmion (+1923). Like Beauduin, Marmion had also been a diocesan priest prior to entering the monastery. Both monks saw liturgical prayer as foundational to their monastic life and shared a deep love for the liturgy of the hours. Beauduin soon became convinced of liturgy's transformative power within a secularized world and as the necessary grounding for Christian social activism.

The official beginning of the Liturgical Movement in Belgium is usually traced to September of 1909, during the National Congress of Catholic Works at Malines. In fact, many chroniclers of the Liturgical Movement prefer this event to mark the beginning of the European Liturgical Movement, rather than Guéranger and Solesmes. At that conference, Beauduin delivered a talk entitled "La vraie prière de l'Eglisé" in which he called for full and active participation of all people in Church life and especially in its worship. He based his remarks on the Motu Proprio of Pius X (Nov. 22, 1903) which described the liturgy as the Church's true and indispensable source. During the conference, he met Godefroid Kurth, an historian and prominent Catholic layman at the time, who shared Beauduin's dream of full and active liturgical participation. Together, they devised a practical plan to launch the Liturgical Movement. In 1914 Beauduin published La piété de l'Eglise (Louvain, 1914), intended to be a public declaration of the Liturgical Movement with a solid theological and ecclesiological foundation. Beauduin's success as a liturgical pioneer is due in large part to his capacity to integrate his liturgical vision with a healthy pragmatism.

Through Beauduin's efforts and the collaboration of others—among them, his confrére Dom Eugéne Vandeur (+1968), Bernard Botte (+1980), and the Benedictine nuns at the monastery of Ancilla Domini at Wépion (founded in 1917 by Vandeur)—the liturgy in Belgium was restored to the assembly. Complex theological ideas were popularized, providing greater access for ordinary Catholics to the Church's rich theological treasury. Eucharistic adoration during Mass was opposed since it conflicted with the Eucharist being celebrated. Influenced by his experience as a labor chaplain, Beauduin advocated a shorter eucharistic fast allowing for greater participation at the principal sung Eucharist on Sunday mornings. Ahead of his time, he promoted the controversial "dialogue Mass." Beauduin's vision included a great passion for ecumenism, particularly regarding Anglican and Orthodox Christians. He was convinced that the Anglican Church should be invited to return to communion with the bishop of Rome without having to be completely absorbed in the Roman Catholic Church. He suggested that Anglicans might continue to maintain their liturgical and disciplinary autonomy in much the way Eastern Catholics preserved that same autonomy while remaining in communion with Rome. In 1925 he founded a monastery at Amay sur Meuse (later CHEVETOGNE) as a monastic contribution to the unity of the churches, directed to the relationship between eastern and western Christianity.

The Austrian liturgical movement. Under the leadership of Augustinian Canon Pius PARSCH (+1954) the Austrian movement registered similar pastoral concerns as evidenced in Belgium. Greatly influenced by developments at Maria Laach, Parsch gave German liturgical scholarship a pastoral expression, using his own parish church of St. Gertrude (near his monastery of Klosterneu-burg) as testing ground. Taking the best of the biblical, catechetical, liturgical, and patristic movements, he brought about an integration on the pastoral level that was largely unmatched elsewhere in Europe. In 1923 he initiated Das Jahr des Heiles, a pastoral commentary on the Eucharist and Liturgy of the Hours for the entire liturgical year. An even more significant publication was Bibel und Liturgie, founded in 1926, as an attempt to encourage wider readership of the Bible among Catholics, and to promote the relationship between liturgy and Scripture. He preached that the Eucharist is a sacrifice offered by the entire parish community and a sacrificial meal eaten in common; he also insisted on a proper and expanded use of Sacred Scripture within the liturgy.

Elsewhere in Europe. In England, significant developments included the founding of the Henry Bradshaw Society (1890), "for the purpose of printing liturgical MSS and rare editions of service books and illustrative documents on an historical and scientific basis"; and the Alcuin Club (1899) with its series of Tracts and Proceedings that have been an invaluable service to liturgical scholars throughout the entire 20th century. Also in 1899, the classic address of Edmund BISHOP (+1917) at Oxford, "The Genius of the Roman Rite," has had profound impact on liturgical scholarship. Years later, the Society of St. Gregory was founded in 1929 with its periodical Music and Liturgy and its summer schools; the English Liturgy Society (1943) founded by Samuel Gosling focused largely on the promotion of vernacular liturgy, and the collaboration of British liturgical pioneers Donald Attwater; Charles Cunliffe; C. C. Martindale, S.J.; and Clifford Howell, S.J..

Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Ireland did not witness the same level of participation as seen in other parts of Europe. There are, however, several key developments worth noting. In 1914, Italian Benedictines at Finalpia, Savona, inaugurated Rivista Liturgica as the chief organ of communication for Italian liturgical pioneers. A leading figure in the Italian movement was Abbot Emmanuele Caronti, O.S.B., whose text La pietà liturgica (Turin, 1921) promoted an ecclesial piety grounded in a solid liturgical spirituality. An even greater contribution, however, was his Messale festivo per i fedeli (Turin, 1921), opening up the riches of the Church's liturgical treasury to large numbers of Italian Catholics. In 1961 Pope John XXIII established the Pontifical Institute of Liturgy at Sant'Anselmo, Rome, for the scientific study of liturgy. Under the leadership of an international faculty, the school continues to grant numerous doctoral and licentiate degrees to students from around the world.

In Spain, the Catalonian Benedictine monastery of MONTSERRAT became a center of liturgical renewal, through the founding of a pastoral liturgical center and publishing, all in the Catalonian language; even there, the influence can be traced back to Maria Laach. During the repressive era of Franco, monks at Montserrat were divided up and sent away to different monasteries for their own safety. Those who were sent to the Rhineland were steeped both in the beauty of the monastic liturgy celebrated at Maria Laach, but also in the rich liturgical theology being done by German monks like Casel and Herwegen. Upon returning to Montserrat, these monks took the best of what they learned and experienced in the Rhineland and applied it to the cultural context of Catalonia. The result was an inculturated form of worship both grounded in the tradition and at the same time, uniquely Catalonian. Even today, visitors to Montserrat are struck by the participative liturgy celebrated daily in Catalan, while in Barcelona, the Center for Pastoral Liturgy continues to blend the best of Catalonian cultural and liturgical traditions in service of the Church.

In Ireland, the Benedictines at Glenstal Abbey (near Limerick) played a leading role in the pastoral liturgical revival after World War II, while at St. Patrick's College, MAYNOOTH, the pastoral journal, The Furrow, took up many of the liturgical themes being promoted by Glenstal and did its part in promoting a participative liturgy. Finally, thanks to the leadership of the Rev. Sean Swayne, the founding of the Irish Institute of Pastoral Liturgy at Carlow provided a year-long sabbatical program with diploma for clergy, religious, and laity, interested in a deeper understanding of the liturgy and its pastoral implications.

Switzerland pioneered modern liturgical architecture in the late 1920s by using a one-room type plan in designing liturgical space, creating a living church architecture that rivaled some of the best secular architecture of the day. Early examples include the Church of St. Anthony, Basel (1927) designed by Karl Moser, and Fritz Metzger's St. Charles Church, Luzerne. In the Netherlands, the first Liturgical Congress took place at Breda in 1911. In this century, France, like Switzerland and Germany, led the way in a new type of liturgical architecture. 1923 marks the beginning of the movement in modern liturgical architecture with the church building of Notre-Dame du Raincy, designed by secular architect Auguste Perret; significantly, it was the first church building to use reinforced concrete construction.

For its part, the French Liturgical Movement in this century notes several key events: the founding of the Centre de Pastorale liturgique in Paris (1943), and the launching of an important liturgical periodical, Le Maison-Dieu (1945). While Dom Gaspar Lefebvre contributed in popularizing the liturgy for French parishes, Bernard Botte, A.G. Martimort, Pierre-Marie Gy, Louis Bouyer, and Joseph Gelineau all made significant contributions to the movement well beyond the confines of that country. France was also a leader in the restoration of the catechumenate and the full implementation of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) in places like Paris and Strasbourg, only to be superseded by the Church in the United States and England with active catechumenal programs on the parish level.

The Americas. As German Benedictines initiated the South American Liturgical Movement with their pioneering in Brazil, publishing leaflet missals and pastoral commentaries, it was German Benedictines from ST. JOHN'S ABBEY in Collegeville, Minnesota, who pioneered the renewal in the north. The movement in the United States demonstrates two fundamental elements: 1) a concern for social justice, thus, a strong link with social movements of the day; and 2) the involvement of large numbers of lay people, both women and men.

As a young monk, Virgil MICHEL (+1938) was sent to Rome for studies at the Benedictine university of S. Anselmo. During those several years, he had the opportunity to travel throughout Europe, visiting the great Benedictine monasteries and liturgical centers like Maria Laach and Montserrat, and observing their life and worship. Moreover, during studies at S. Anselmo, he came into contact with Belgian pioneer Lambert Beauduin, who was his professor. Beauduin's passion for justice coupled with his love of the liturgy left a tremendous mark on Michel, and returning to Collegeville in the Autumn of 1925, he founded the Liturgical Movement with the help of William Busch (St. Paul, Minn.), Gerard Ellard, S.J. (St. Louis, Mo.), and German-born Martin Hellriegel (St. Louis, Mo.). Other Germans soon arrived on the scene: Reynold Hillenbrand of German ancestry (Chicago), and Hans Anscar Reinhold, who fled Germany because of the Nazis. The movement was headquartered at St. John's Abbey, Collegeville, with the founding of the liturgical periodical Orate Fratres (later Worship) and the Liturgical Press (both in 1926). Following Michel's death, the editorship of Orate Fratres was taken over by confrere Godfrey Diekmann, O.S.B., later a peritus for liturgy at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

Unlike its European counterpart, however, the United States' movement soon moved from monasteries into the hands of lay activists who were to play a key role in the movement. Even before Michel arrived on the scene, Justine WARD (+1975) and Georgia Stevens, R.S.C.J., were busy at work at the PIUS X SCHOOL OF LITURGICAL MUSIC, which they founded in 1916 on the grounds of the College of the Sacred Heart in Manhattanville, N.Y. A frequent visitor to Solesmes, Ward was largely responsible for popularizing Solesmes chant in the United States using her "Ward Method." With Ward and Stevens at the helm, the school was a leading force both in the restoration of chant and in liturgical renewal for many years until it closed in 1969. Another example of lay involvement was the founding of the LITURGICAL ARTS SOCIETY in 1928 by Maurice LAVANOUX and several others, drawing the participation of many artists and architects, among them the British artist Eric Gill. Except for their chaplain, Jesuit John La Farge, the group was largely a lay association, attracting women and men dedicated to art and architecture that would assist the participation of the liturgical assembly and give artistic expression to what their participation professed, as seen in their journal, Liturgical Arts. The Liturgical Arts Society ended in 1972.

The strong presence of the LITURGICAL CONFERENCE (founded in 1940), famous for its annual liturgical weeks which drew up to 12,000 people each year for the threeday meeting, is another example of lay participation in the movement. Women pioneers like Sara Benedica O'Neill, Elizabeth Johnson, and Mary Perkins Ryan, and artist Adé Bethune were all involved, along with Joseph Morrisey, Gerard Sloyan, William Leonard, S.J., Frederick McManus, Thomas Carroll, Robert Hovda, John Mannion, Virginia Sloyan, Gabe Huck, and Rachel Reeder. The published Proceedings of the annual Liturgical Weeks bear testimony to the fundamental role that the Conference played in the American movement. The Conference (now ecumenical) continues today with its journals Liturgy and Homily Service and is headquartered in Washington, D.C. The St. Jerome Society (later Vernacular Society) was founded in 1946 by H. A. Reinhold during the Liturgical Week in Denver, Colo., to promote vernacular in the liturgy. Reinhold soon persuaded retired Colonel John K. Ross-Duggan, then editor of Quick Frozen Foods magazine in Chicago, to assume responsibility for the group. That he did until his death in 1967, leaving his full-time job to devote all his energies to the vernacular cause, launching their periodical Amen in 1950; making frequent visits to Rome to meet with Vatican cardinals and bishops, while maintaining a lively correspondence with many others throughout Asia, Africa, and South America. Despite numerous presidents and other officers of the Vernacular Society over the years, Ross-Duggan remained in control. The Vernacular Society merged with the Liturgical Conference in 1965. At its peak, the organization had several thousand members (including 84 bishops); leaders included Dr. Joseph Evans, John Agathen, Irwin St. John Tucker, Dr. Jack Willke, Rev. Joseph Nolan, and Elaine and Reinhold Kissner. Other examples of lay participation included social activists from the CATHOLIC WORKER; CATHOLIC ACTION; FRIENDSHIP HOUSE; the GRAIL; CHRISTIAN FAMILY MOVE-MENT, most notably, Dorothy DAY (co-founder of the Catholic Worker) and the Baroness Catherine De Hueck DOHERTY (founder of Friendship House). Around the country, a number of women opened book stores as a way of promoting the liturgy and educating American Catholics; most famous was the St. Benet's Bookshop in downtown Chicago, under the leadership of Sara Benedicta O'Neill and Nina Polcyn. Places like St. Benet's became centers of activity—either for the praying of compline together on Saturday evenings, or for the occasional lecture when Dorothy Day or Godfrey Diekmann or other well-known figures were passing through. The Vernacular Society held its first organizational meeting in the back of St. Benet's.

The issue of immigration is crucial in evaluating the Movement's growth and success. The Liturgical Movement grew in the German Midwest (St. Louis; Chicago; Collegeville, Minn.) and was less successful on the Irish east and west coasts of the United States. Steeped in congregational participation in Germany, those immigrants often brought with them a rich understanding both of liturgical participation and of social outreach. Not surprisingly, it was Germans who founded the first Churchbased social outreach program in 1855, the German Catholic Central Verein. Irish immigrants, on the other hand, were not accustomed to such participation. They had come from an experience of oppression where they were often forced to celebrate the Mass quietly and expeditiously (often behind barns) so as not to be discovered. That tradition was then passed down and gradually found its way into Irish-American parishes in the United States. Thus, when Irish immigrants made their way to these shores, they were quite at home with the "low masses" that had very little congregational singing, if any.

The movement came of age with the founding of academic programs in liturgy. In Indiana, Michael Mathis, C.S.C., founded the Summer School of Liturgy at the University of NOTRE DAME in 1947. In 1965 it was expanded into the graduate program in liturgical studies, an ecumenical program that trained many liturgical scholars from the Catholic Church and other churches. The program continued to thrive, along with a strong graduate program in liturgical studies at the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA in Washington, D.C.

Over the years, the Liturgical Movement had its critics. It was not until papal documents like MYSTICI CORPORIS or MEDIATOR DEI that the movement and its agenda gained respectability. The bilingual Collectio Rituum of 1954 was another notable advance, allowing for greater use of the vernacular and containing significant reforms of some of the rites. The 1955 restoration of the Holy Week rites to their proper place pushed liturgical advocates onward toward a participative Conciliar liturgy, which was only several years away. In 1956 liturgical experts gathered at Assisi from all around the world, including Godfrey DIEKMANN, O.S.B., Monsignor Frederick McManus, William Leonard, S.J., and Colonel John K. Ross-Duggan. Expecting a major announcement on the vernacular, delegates were greatly disappointed during their audience in the Vatican with Pope Pius XII, who assured them that Latin would remain the language of the Church's worship. The 1958 "Instruction for American Pastors on Sacred Music and Liturgy" provided renewed hope for a vernacular liturgy with the "dialogue Mass" (Missa recitata), but that hope was only to be dashed in 1961 with the Papal document Veterum Sapientia, which again upheld Latin as the official language of the Church and cautioned against the vernacular. Indeed, it was following that document that Bishop Mark Carroll of Wichita, Kans., was told by the anti-vernacular apostolic delegate, Archbishop Vagnozzi, that his association with the Vernacular Society was to cease; other members of the clergy also resigned from the group.

The Second Vatican Council. On Dec. 4, 1963, the bishops of the Second Vatican Council, together with Pope Paul VI, solemnly promulgated their first document of Vatican II—the Liturgy Constitution, Sacrosanctum Concilium. The formal vote taken that day was 2,147 bishops in favor, four opposed. The Vatican then issued a pastoral instruction on Sept. 26, 1964, to assist with implementing the new document on the local level and gave the first Sunday of Advent 1964 as the effective date for implementation. This was the crowning achievement of the Liturgical Movement and the fulfillment of a dream for liturgical pioneers who were still alive at the time to see the dream come true. While the Constitution endorsed the efforts of the pioneers, it only marked the beginning of work to be undertaken by the whole Church in subsequent years. National liturgical commissions and institutes of pastoral liturgy would be formed; liturgical experts would need to be trained.

The CONSILIUM for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy—a commission of experts—was established in 1964 to carry out the revisions of the Roman liturgical books. Except for the section of the Roman Ritual on blessings, all of the Church's liturgical books were published before 1978; a number were subsequently revised. Each language group was charged with the task of translating the Latin edition into the vernacular, and the creation of original texts (with the help of linguists, poets, anthropologists, etc.) that reflected the culture and experience of the particular local church. Those liturgical texts had to be approved by each episcopal conference and confirmed by the Congregation for DIVINE WORSHIP AND THE DISCIPLINE OF THE SACRAMENTS.

Actual sacramental formulae were approved by the pope for each language group. In 1963 the English-speaking world formed the INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON EN-GLISH IN THE LITURGY (ICEL), which was incorporated in Canada (1967) with Washington, D.C., as the site of its secretariat. In the U.S., the Bishops' Commission on the Liturgical Apostolate was formed in 1958 under the leadership of Archbishop Paul Hallinan (Atlanta) and Msgr. Frederick R. McManus (Boston). The Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy (BCL) had a full-time secretariat at the offices of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington, D.C. As dioceses established liturgical commissions in keeping with the directive of Sacrosanctum Concilium (no. 44), the FEDERATION OF DIOCESAN LI-TURGICAL COMMISSIONS (FDLC) was founded in 1969 to create a network of diocesan liturgy directors, promoting leadership in pastoral liturgy. Two members were elected from each of the twelve regions of the country to serve on its board of directors. Together with the BCL and a local diocese, the FDLC sponsored a national meeting annually. It promoted the appointment of full-time trained liturgical personnel in most large dioceses around the country.

In the area of the arts, a Composers' Forum for Catholic Worship was established in 1970 to promote the composition of new music, but was discontinued in 1977. In 1976, the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF PASTORAL MUSICIANS (NPM) was founded by Rev. Virgil Funk to include both pastors and musicians. NPM annual conferences drew thousands of people from around the country and its journal, Pastoral Music was widely acclaimed. Another organization on the scene was the Society for Catholic Liturgy, founded in 1995 by Msgr. M. Francis Mannion of Salt Lake City, Utah. This group of 160 Catholic liturgical specialists held annual meetings at the end of September.

Certain places were also designated as centers for liturgical research, among them the Notre Dame Center for Pastoral Liturgy (1970) and the Georgetown Center for Liturgy, Spirituality, and the Arts (Washington, D.C.). The Chicago Office of Divine Worship instituted the widely acclaimed Liturgy Training Publications (now independent) which provided a tremendous service to the Church in publishing excellent liturgical material (both in English and Spanish) that was accessible both to clergy and parishioners alike.

Bibliography: J. ARIOVALDO DA SILVA, O Movimento Litúrgico No Brasil: Estudo Histórico (Petrópolis 1983). W. BARUANA, The Liturgy of Vatican II: A Symposium in Two Volumes (Chicago 1966). T. BERGER, Women's Ways of Worship: Gender Analysis and Liturgical History (Collegeville 1999). B. BOTTE, Le mouvement liturgique: témoignage et souvenirs (Paris 1973). English trans. From Silence to Participation: An Insider's View of Liturgical Renewal (Washington 1988). A. BUGNINI, The Reform of the Liturgy (Collegeville 1990). W. R. FRANKLIN, "The Nineteenth Century Liturgical Movement," Worship 53 (1979), 12-39. K. HUGHES, How Firm a Foundation. v. 1: Voices of the Early Liturgical Movement (Chicago 1990). C. JOHNSON, Prosper Guéranger, 1805–1875, A Liturgical Theologian: An Introduction to his Liturgical Writings and Work (Rome 1984). E. B. KOENKER, The Liturgical Renaissance in the Roman Catholic Church (Chicago 1954; 2nd ed., St. Louis 1966). L. MADDEN, ed. The Awakening Church: 25 Years of Liturgical Renewal (Collegeville 1992). T. F. O'MEARA, "The Origins of the Liturgical Movement and German Romanticism," Worship 59 (1985), 326-53. K. F. PECKLERS, The Unread Vision: The Liturgical Movement in the United States of America: 1926-1955 (Collegeville 1998). R. L. TUZIK, How Firm a Foundation. v. 2: Leaders of the Liturgical Movement (Chicago 1990). S. J. WHITE, Art, Architecture, and Liturgical Reform: The Liturgical Arts Society, 1928-1972 (New York 1990).

[K. F. PECKLERS]

LITURGICAL MOVEMENT, II: ANGLICAN AND PROTESTANT

Since the Reformation, the Anglican and Lutheran traditions have used and cherished liturgies that are essentially revisions of medieval Latin rites. In the Anglican churches these liturgies have always been officially and canonically prescribed; in the Lutheran churches, they have been accepted as models of proper liturgical order, but greater freedom has been allowed to local or regional churches in adapting them to particular times and circumstances. Both the Anglican and the Lutheran liturgies preserve the ancient structures of the sacramental rites—including the traditional propers of collects and readings at the Eucharist, the structure of Morning and Evening Prayer, and the celebration of the principal feasts and seasons of the liturgical year. They have also continued many of the external ceremonies and ornaments and arrangements of liturgical space that existed prior to the Reformation. Thanks to the liturgical renewal shared by all the mainline Protestant churches, and in particular, to a recovery of patristic sources, one finds other churches, e.g. those of the Reformed (Calvinistic) tradition; Methodists etc.; calling for a more frequent celebration of the Eucharist with a ritual structure (use of liturgical vesture etc.) that had largely been unknown in those churches prior to the renewal.

Led by liturgical scholars like John M. Neale, J. Wickham Legg, Walter H. Frere, and F. E. Brightman in Britain and Paul Drews, Julian Smend, and Georg Rietschel in Germany, the Liturgical Movement in Protestantism and Anglicanism focused on the same conditions and concerns that affected the affected the beginnings of liturgical renewal in Catholicism: a desire to recover the ancient liturgical tradition and heritage of the Church.

Anglican Communion. The revival of liturgical interest within Anglicanism must be viewed in light of the growth of the OXFORD MOVEMENT with its own emphasis on the sacraments; an increased frequency in the celebration of the Eucharist; an increase in ceremonial; and a widespread favor for Gothic architecture, Gregorian chant, and popular hymnody that relied heavily on Latin and Eastern sources. The revision of the BOOK OF COM-MON PRAYER—the first time since the Reformation grew within such a milieu, first with the American revision in 1892, then with revisions in Scotland, Canada, England, South Africa, and the United States in the 1920s. Interestingly, one of the leading British Anglican pioneers of the 1930s, A. Gabriel Hebert, attributed his own liturgical influence to the Roman Catholic Benedictine monks at Maria Laach in Germany.

Episcopal Church. The Liturgical Movement in the EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the United States came into its own in 1946 with the Associated Parishes for Liturgy and Mission. Founded by John Patterson (+1988), Rector of Grace Church, Madison, Wisconsin, in collaboration with Massey Shepherd, Samuel E. West, and John H. Keene, Episcopal priests in the movement used their parishes as testing ground for liturgical experimentation and renewal. The fundamental goal of the movement was the restoration of Sunday Eucharist as normative for Episcopal parishes, with congregational participation that included an offertory procession; the gospel proclaimed in the midst of the assembly; liturgical music that invited participation and no choir procession. Public celebrations of Morning and Evening Prayer were restored and baptisms, marriages, and funerals again became public events. Like its Catholic counterpart, Associated Parishes promoted a greater unity between liturgy and social justice. Through the publishing of pamphlets and annual conferences, this organization promoted a renewed liturgy within the Episcopal Church, paving the way for the 1979 revised Book of Common Prayer. It also served as a catalyst for ecumenical efforts by inviting Catholic speakers and others to participate in their liturgical weeks. In recent years, the Associated Parishes Movement expanded its activities to include the restoration of the catechumenate and the diaconate, as well as the defense and promotion of inclusive language within worship. Associated Parishes' quarterly journal "Open," has assisted its efforts.

Lutheran Churches. A similar development can be seen within the Lutheran movement, with its recovery of liturgical orders inspired by the Kirchenordnungen of the Reformation era as a reaction against attempts to downplay those orders in the 18th and early 19th centuries, thanks to Pietism and rationalism. Wilhelm Loehe (1808–72) and Theodor Kliefoth (1810–95) led the revival. Loehe's writings influenced those in the United States who produced the 1888 Common Service (revised in 1917). By the beginning of the 20th century, Lutherans on both sides of the Atlantic were already forming societies and institutes for the study and reform of liturgy, e.g., the Lutheran Liturgical Association (1907); the Hochkirchliche Vereinigung, founded by Friedrich Heiler (1919); the Berneuchen Circle (1923), from which came the Michaelsbruderschaft (1931) and the Alpirscbacher Circle (1933). Similar societies have emerged in Scandinavia. In the United States, Lutheran liturgical renewal took shape in the 1950s, e.g. with altars being turned toward the people for the Eucharistic celebration. The revised Lutheran Book of Worship, (1978) bears testimony to years of fruitful pioneering in Lutheran circles. More recently, the text, With One Voice: A Lutheran Resource for Worship (Minneapolis 1995) brings the renewal to full stature.

Reformed Churches. The Reformed (Calvinistic) churches experienced their own liturgical renewal, beginning in the 1840s and 1850s, with the Liturgical Movement of the German Reformed Church in the United States led by Philip Schaaf (+1893) and John Williamson Nevin (+1886) at the seminary in Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. In 1865, the Church Service Society was founded in the Church of Scotland. Its Euchologion (many editions since 1867) was quite influential, culminating in the 1928 Book of Common Order (revised 1940). Its counterpart among American Presbyterians was the Book of Common Worship (1905; revised 1931, 1946). The recently revised edition of 1993 is consistent with the liturgical structure found in the United Church of Christ's 1986 Book of Common Worship, the United Methodists' 1992 Book of Worship, and the revised service books of the other churches.

Characteristics. The recovery of traditional liturgical structures in the churches separated at the Reformation era was matched during the 20th century by widespread adoption within the 'free' Protestant churches of more formal rituals and ceremonials borrowed or adopted from the ancient and classical rites. Most of the major Protestant denominations had official worship commissions responsible for the revision and production of service books and hymnals. As Sunday celebrations of the Eucharist became more frequent, so, too, was the observance of traditional feasts and liturgical seasons (e.g., the celebration of Ash Wednesdays with the imposition of ashes). Standards of liturgical music were greatly improved. The prejudice against formalized worship significantly diminished.

The contribution of biblical scholarship to the Liturgical Movement was significant in the Protestant liturgical renewal as well as regarding ecumenical liturgical collaboration. By 2000 there was much greater agreement among Catholic and Protestant biblical and liturgical scholars on the meaning of worship in the Christian Scriptures and the Patristic period than ever before. Influential Protestant and Anglican leaders included Hans Lietzmann, Joachim Jeremias, Oscar Cullman, Gregory DIX, and Charles H. Dodd. Research produced consensus in two significant areas: 1) the inseparable relationship between word and sacrament as the normative pattern of Christian worship; and 2) the eschatological understanding of sacraments in the context of the Christian scriptures.

Liturgical societies formed in most of the Protestant and Anglican churches in Europe and North America. A long list of Protestant and Anglican liturgical leaders had significant influence on the liturgical reforms of their respective churches, among them Massey Shepherd, Thomas Talley, Geoffrey Wainright, Kenneth Stevenson, Brian Spinks, Paul Bradshaw, James White, Don Saliers, Hoyt Hickman, S. Anita Stauffer, Gordon Lathrop, Frank Senn, and Horace Allen.

Bibliography: R. K. FENWICK and B. D. SPINKS, Worship in Transition: Highlights of the Liturgical Movement (Edinburgh 1995). D. GRAY, Earth and Altar (Norwich 1986). A. G. HEBERT, Liturgy and Society (London 1935). M. H. SHEPHERD, "The Liturgical Movement in American Protestantism," Yearbook of Liturgical Studies 3 (1962) 35–61. M. J. TAYLOR, The Protestant Liturgical Renewal (Westminster, Maryland 1963). J. F. WHITE, Protestant Worship: Traditions in Transition (Louisville 1989).

[M. H. SHEPHERD JR./K. F. PECKLERS]

LITURGICAL MOVEMENT, III: ECUMENICAL CONVERGENCES

Efforts at ecumenical liturgical cooperation began in 1937 when the Edinburgh Conference on Faith and Order established a Commission on Ways of Worship, whose work has continued since the formation of the World Council of Churches at Amsterdam in 1948 through various theological commissions. The reports and papers of these commissions have covered a wide range of topics, including sacramental theology; the relation of word and sacrament in worship; the meaning of priesthood; the significance of Christian Initiation; and the relationship between liturgy and culture. Together, they have squarely faced the often divisive issues of eucharistic presence and sacrifice. Orthodox and Roman Catholic theologians have often made significant contributions to these dialogues.

The Church of South India offers another example. Formed in 1947 from Anglican, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, and Methodist churches, the Church of South India published a first edition of its liturgy in 1950 with the title An Order for the Lord's Supper or Holy Eucharist; it has undergone subsequent revisions. It is an interesting rite precisely from an ecumenical perspective.

Following upon the ecumenical initiatives of Vatican Council II, the CONSILIUM for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium) invited observers from other traditions to be present in the work of reforming the calendar and lectionary. Moreover, the INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY (ICEL), entrusted with the preparation of authorized English translations of the new Latin liturgical documents, was assisted in its work by consultants from other churches to review proposed translations from an ecumenical viewpoint. One of the more important examples of ecumenical liturgical cooperation has been the work of the INTERNATIONAL CONSULTATION ON COMMON TEXTS (ICET), a cooperative drafting of modern English versions of frequently used liturgical texts by representatives of the Anglican, Baptist, Congregational, Lutheran, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic churches in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Canada, Australia, South Africa, and the United States. Begun in 1969, this group of 25 scholars in regular consultation with the bodies represented, both produced and revised texts of the Lord's Prayer, the Creeds, and the ordinary chants of the Eucharist and Liturgy of the Hours, texts which have been widely adopted in recent liturgical reforms. When ICET dissolved in 1975, a new group, the ENGLISH LAN-GUAGE LITURGICAL COMMISSION (ELLC) was subsequently established to continue ecumenical efforts at common liturgical texts. In addition to these official bodies, the international meeting of SOCIETAS LITURGICA was a forum for Catholic and other Christian liturgical theologians and scholars to meet and collaborate in research and other projects.

Perhaps the greatest ecumenically liturgical document of the century came in 1982 at the historic meeting of the World Council of Churches at Lima, Peru. It was there that the Faith and Order Commission's statement, "Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry," was agreed upon and accepted by all the member churches represented. Such agreement on issues of baptismal participation; eucharist and sacrifice; and church ministry would have been impossible back in 1937 when the Ways of Worship Commission first met at Edinburgh, but the historical and theological insights of the liturgical movements in all the Christian churches made such doctrinal accord possible. It was precisely the fact that scholars used the same sources for their liturgical revisions that the mainline Christian churches developed a marvelous unity regarding liturgical structure, both in Eucharistic celebrations and the Liturgy of the Hours, often using the same or very similar texts, thanks to the efforts of ICET and then ELLC.

As ecumenical liturgical cooperation continued to be more the norm than the exception, increasing numbers of Protestant churches are asking for a more frequent (e.g. weekly) celebration of the Eucharist, while Catholics slowly rediscovered non-eucharistic forms of liturgical prayer (e.g. the Liturgy of the Hours) for parochial use. Catholics also recovered the importance of biblically based preaching; congregational singing; and a revival of various liturgical ministries long a mainstay in Protestant churches. The Common Lectionary also held great promise; despite the sad division at the table of the Eucharist, there was no reason why the churches needed to remain divided at the table of God's Word. Indeed, increasing numbers of Christian churches read the same lessons on Sunday morning, and pastoral commentaries that assist preachers in their preparation such as the "Homily Service" published by the ecumenical Liturgical Conference (Silver Spring, Md.) directed their reflections accordingly. On the experiential level, liturgical cooperation was modelled in the prayer rituals organized and hosted by the ecumenical community of Taizé, France. Founded in 1949 and including brothers from a variety of Christian traditions in Europe and North America, Taizé united Christians of many different churches in ecumenical rituals and in the lived experience of Christian community. This was true, not only for the thousands of young people who flocked to Taizé each year for week-long experiences of prayer and meditation, but also for the the many ecumenical experiences of "Taizé Prayer," or "Prayer around the Cross' scheduled in parishes throughout Europe and in North and South America.

The United States had more academically qualified liturgists than any other country representing a wide variety of churches and traditions, and as a result, in 1973, the ecumenical North American Academy of Liturgy (NAAL) was founded by John Gallen, S.J. By 1999 NAAL had grown to over 400 members from Canada and the United States. At the 1999 meeting in Vancouver, B.C., a campaign was launched to seek out qualified candidates from Mexico to better represent its North American identity. The Academy also became interfaith, and enjoyed a growing number of Jewish liturgical scholars, the first of whom was Rabbi Lawrence Hoffman, Professor at Hebrew Union College, New York.

On the international level, Societas Liturgica was founded through the initiative of Dutch Reformed pastor Wiebe Vos, when in 1962, he launched Studia Liturgica "an international, ecumenical quarterly for liturgical research and renewal." In 1965, Vos called a meeting of 25 liturgists from Europe and North America in Neuchâtel, Switzerland. Chaired by J. J. von Allmen, the group discussed Christian Initiation and agreed to found Societas, "an associaton for the promotion of ecumenical dialogue on worship based on solid research, with the perspective of renewal and unity." The first meeting took place in 1967 at Driebergen, Holland, where Vatican II's Sacrosanctum Concilium was studied, along with recent liturgical work completed by the Faith and Order Commission of the World Council. Although the over 400 members remained largely from Europe and North America, there was growing interest among the membership to attract new members from Asia, Africa, and South America. Societas continued to meet every two years with a particular topic chosen for each congress. The 1999 meeting held in Kottayam, Kerala, India, under the leadership of President Jacob Vellian (Syro-Malabar), addressed the topic of "Liturgical Theology." Proceedings of the biannual meeting were published in Studia Liturgica.

Bibliography: T. F. BEST, and D. HELLER, eds. So We Believe, So We Pray: Koinonia in Worship, Faith and Order Paper No. 171 (Geneva 1995). T. F. BEST, and D. HELLER, eds. Eucharistic Worship in Ecumenical Contexts: The Lima Liturgy and Beyond (Geneva 1998). G. LATHROP, "New Pentecost or Joseph's Britches? Reflections on the History and Meaning of the Worship ordo in the Megachurches," Worship, 72 (Nov. 1998) 521–538. G. LATHROP, "The Worship Books in Mutual Affirmation and Admonition: Liturgy as a Source for Lutheran–Reformed Unity," Reformed Liturgy and Worship, 21(2) (1997) 88–92. F. SENN, Christian Liturgy (Minneapolis 1997). WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, FAITH AND ORDER COMMISSION, Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry (Geneva 1982).

[T. J. TALLEY/K. F. PECKLERS]

LITURGICAL MUSIC, HISTORY OF

PART 1: EARLY CHRISTIAN MUSIC

The historical development of music in Christian worship is intimately connected with the history of liturgy on the one hand and with the general history of music on the other. Until the late Middle Ages there is no history of music except that related to the liturgy. After that time, in addition to liturgical music, religious music that was not intended primarily for public worship can also be found. Such music, then, is a part of the history of church music, although it does not form part of the history of liturgical music.

Music in Apostolic Times. There is no doubt that the early Christian communities simply continued the musical practices of the Jewish synagogues that they had been accustomed to attend. For the Synaxis (Liturgy of the Word) the synagogue practice served as the model. Readings from Scripture were followed by Psalm singing. At least the differentiation between the roles of the Cantor and congregation was a clear one. The cantor was also permitted a kind of improvised, charismatic song of joy. It is difficult to determine whether in Ephesians 5.19 St. Paul is referring to three different types of musical pieces in the Christian community or using three terms to describe the same phenomenon: ψαλμοῖς καὶ ὕμνοις καὶ ὑδαῖς πνευματικαῖς. In Colossians 3.16, however, he uses the same division. It must be remembered that the Jewish synagogues in the diaspora had already adopted the Greek language, and Hellenistic musical practices could also have made inroads into the traditional chants.

Theories of Jewish Origins of Gregorian Chant. All critics agree that the descriptions of musical practice in the Jewish temple have nothing in common with the Christian chant. The most difficult problem is to ascertain the degree to which the Gregorian chant as known today has been influenced by Jewish chants, specifically from the synagogue practices of the time of Christ. In answering this question, certain facts must be considered: the first notated sources for the Gregorian chant come from the ninth century (before that time only literary references to music exist); there is no way of finding out the exact nature of Hebrew chants in the early Christian centuries. Even if one assumes that the Gregorian melodies, as written down for the first time in the ninth century, go back in basic form for several centuries as an oral tradition, there is no exact parallel in the Hebrew chant with which to compare it. The assumption that several Jewish groups have retained an oral tradition untampered by Western practice for almost two millennia seems difficult to accept. The Hebrew literary forms, especially the antithetical structure of the Psalms, were carried into early Christian practice. Beyond this, all one can say is that the general musical system common to the Jewish, Syriac and Hellenized communities became the musical system for early Christianity. The fragment of the Oxyrhynchos papyrus (third century), which contains the fragment of a hymn written in classical Greek notation, shows that the musical practice was of the type associated with the Near East basin, i.e., diatonic and based on modal formulas related to the octoechos, and had nothing in common with the descriptions and few musical fragments of classical Greek music that have survived.

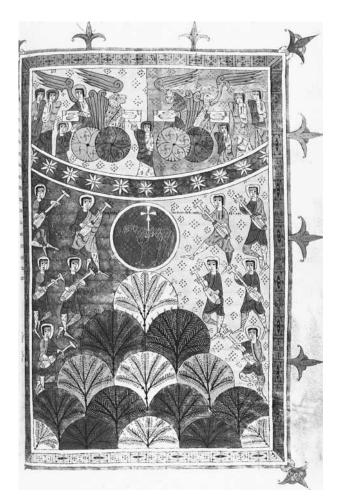

Descriptions of Musical Practices in the Early Patristic Period. The improvised, charismatic song—associated especially with the Alleluia—continued in Christian worship, although the dangers of pride and theatricality are often alluded to. A distinction in this regard between the roles of cantor, lector and deacon is often difficult. In the West, it was Gregory who took the melismatic song from the deacon. The general musical practice, however, was of the litany or refrain type (see RESPONSORIAL PSALM). After verses of the Psalms sung by a cantor, the congregation sang a simple refrain. In addition to this practice, there is an allusion in St. Basil to the practice of dividing the congregation into two groups for alternating verses of the Psalms; Basil maintains that this practice was not unique to his region. Various sources for the origin of this practice are given, with Ambrose being cited as the originator of the practice in the West (Augustine, Conf. 9.7). Although the Eastern Church had developed free hymnody and poetry as a part of the liturgical service (especially St. Ephrem), the West was slower to adopt such a practice. After the time of Ambrose, hymnody became a structural part of the Divine Office in addition to Psalms and Biblical lessons. The first allusion in the West to the manner of Psalm singing, which was to become the standard medieval practice, namely the taking over of the responsorial refrain into the antiphonal or alternating style, is found in Cassian (early fifth century). From the fifth century on, less is known of the manner in which the people participated at services; the reason for this lack of knowledge is that the purpose of the surviving descriptions was to recount monastic and basilical practices.

Attitudes toward Music among the Fathers. The rejection of all musical instruments from Christian worship is consistent among the Fathers. These were associated with pagan, orgiastic rites. For this reason the descriptions in the Old Testament of the temple worship with different kinds of instruments were interpreted allegorically. The heavy influence of Platonic musical aesthetics can be found in the Fathers, especially in Clement of Alexandria and Chrysostom (probably through the writings of Philo). Plato insisted on the need to control the music of the community in order to protect morals. Once the proper number for music was found, it should not be abandoned. The Psalms, thus argued Chrysostom, were divinely given to the Church and were the inspired word. They were the earthly reflection of the divine harmony. In general, the Fathers could be divided into two classes in their attitude toward music: those who accepted it and its beauty, provided the vox and mens were in agreement (Basil, Cassiodorus and Benedict); and those who feared the pleasures of music as contrary to the ascetical Christian ideal (Jerome is the supreme example).

Families of Chant. Concommitant with the rise of the various families of Western rites there arose families of Western chant: AMBROSIAN, GALLICAN, MOZARABIC and GREGORIAN. They all show musical relationships to the contemporaneous BYZANTINE chant and a certain interdependency among themselves that musicologists have not accurately determined.

Bibliography: H. HUCKE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:429–433. T. GEORGIADES, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1207–17. H. LECLERCQ, Plucked-fiddle players before the Lamb of God, miniature from a manuscript of Beatus' Commentary on the Apocalypse, written for the Abbey of Santo Domingo de Silos, Spain, c. 1091–1109.

"Chant romain et grégorien," Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, eds., F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 3.1:256–311. B. STÄBLEIN, "Choral," Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 2:1265–1303; "Frühchristliche Musik," ibid. 4:1036–64. E. WERNER, The Sacred Bridge (New York 1959). T. GÉROLD, Les Pères de l'Eacute; glise et la musique (Strasbourg 1931). E. WELLESZ, Eastern Elements in Western Chant (Oxford 1947). H. ANGLÈS, "Latin Chant before St. Gregory," New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP, 11 v. (New York 1957–) 2:58–91. J. QUASTEN Musik und Gesang in den Kulten der heidnischen Antike und christlichen Frühzeit (Münster 1930).

[R. G. WEAKLAND/EDS.]

PART 2: MONOPHONIC MUSIC TO 1200

The oral traditions of the Christian communities and monasteries (until the invention of musical notation in the ninth century) must have varied greatly one from another. If Pope Gregory the Great at the beginning of the seventh century supposedly attempted to bring some order into the liturgical makeup, it is hardly conceivable, given the lack of means of communication of the times, that any uniformity could have been attained in music. The founding of the Roman SCHOLA CANTORUM and the erecting of monastic chapters at the major basilicas gave life to a Roman chant tradition that became more and more subtle and complex. Darkness still shrouds much of the story, as no musical manuscripts from the period are available. That the reign of the Byzantine popes in the seventh century also had an influence on music can only be surmised.

The Carolingian Period. Before the Carolingian period there was no attempt to keep a musical unity in Christendom, but the concept of Holy Roman Empire included liturgical—and thus musical—imitations of Roman usages. Cantors and liturgical books were brought up to the Carolingian court for diffusion of the Roman practice throughout the empire. The different Gallican usages were to be suppressed in favor of the cantilena romana, although Walafrid Strabo (b. 808), a generation later, mentions that those with an ear for music could still recognize the old Gallican tunes in the revised hymnody.

The first Western music that is written down and can be subjected to a critical analysis is GREGORIAN CHANT. Manuscripts containing the chant appear all over the Empire beginning with the late ninth century. Whether it was the original Roman chant brought north, or a hybrid of Roman and local Gallican practices remains a disputed question, although more scholars favor the latter theory. From the theoretical treatises beginning with the midninth century, the actual fragments from the same century, and the full manuscripts of the tenth century, it is clear that the musical repertoire of that time was a vast and highly developed one. The Ordines romani show the numerous adaptations of Roman liturgical practice as well as the need for skilled cantors and leaders (called primicerius and secundicerius). The music recorded is not that sung by the people, but by the trained scholae of clerics and monks. The antiphonale missarum or Graduale for the Mass chants and the antiphonale for the Office chants contained most of the music needed for the complete year. When the teaching of this standard repertoire resulted in considerable inconvenience, tonaria were developed. The chants were arranged by modal similarities in them for easier memorization and reading. The special chants reserved to the soloists were written in the cantatorium. The survival of many copies of these books from the tenth century onward makes possible an accurate history of liturgical music from that time. However, not only do we know nothing of the music of the people at this point of history, but we are also totally ignorant of nonliturgical or folk music before the 12th century.

Additions to the Standard Repertoire. The chant repertoire was soon augmented by freely composed additions of texts and melodies that gave birth to TROPES and SEQUENCES. The need for new outlets for the creative imaginations of the post-Carolingian cantors must have come as a result of the rigidity of the standard repertoire. The tropes and sequences permitted the introduction on a given feast of more popular elements and more local allusions. Although there is some evidence that a basic repertoire of these new pieces somehow made its way across the Empire, the differences in the extant collections from various abbeys are large. It is clear that the lengthening of the services by long processions and incensations may have contributed to the need for more music not provided by the standard repertoire. St. Martial at Limoges, France, and Sankt Gallen in present Switzerland were renowned sources for this activity.

Liturgical Drama. Out of the dialogue trope, especially that which preceded the Introit, there arose the liturgical drama. Again, it permitted more popular and more didactic elements to enter the liturgy and provided opportunity for freer creativity on the part of the composer. These dramas became larger and larger until they separated entirely from the liturgy.

Other New Compositions. The special talents of the composer from the Carolingian period until the 12th century and beyond also found outlets in the composition of RIMED OFFICES. As new feasts were introduced, experimentation with verse texts and rhythmical patterns found its counterpart in music. The numerous processions connected with monastic services gave birth to a special book called the processionale. In it could be found new responsories and antiphons to be sung on special feasts as well as metrical conductus or processional hymns. The influence of the growing secular forms that culminated in the troubadours could also be seen in the Latin planctus or laments (reaching their peak in those by Abelard) and the new vernacular laudi, cantigas and Geisslerlieder. These new popular forms became especially prominent after the 13th century. During this entire period new compositions of the Ordinary of the Mass in chant continued, both troped and untroped.

Special Chant Traditions. Within the Gregorian tradition one cannot distinguish families as markedly different as were the Gregorian and Ambrosian, for example, but different religious orders and different localities did develop traits peculiar to themselves. Thus the Beneventan tradition in Italy differed from the German not only in notation but also in many particular usages. In England the early Gregorian practices merged with new elements after the Norman invasion to form a chant dialect called Sarum (see SARUM USE). The Cistercian reform also affected music and many of the more elaborate chants were brought into simple patterns. The Dominican chant also has its peculiar flavor.

Gregorian chant continued to be used in services long after the new elements listed above and the use of polyphonic music took over the major interests of composers. As it came down through the centuries, this chant was constantly affected by secular music of the times and by contemporary styles and idioms. Attempts to restore it to its pristine vigor have been constant. It can be said, however, that it reached its apogee in the Carolingian and post-Carolingian period and never regained the subtlety evidenced in the earliest manuscripts of that time. It was only natural that composers, after exhausting the musical means of one style, should have turned so avidly to the possibilities of the new polyphony.

Bibliography: W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Ind. 1958). H. ANGLÈS, "Gregorian Chant," New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP, 11 v. (New York 1957–) 2:92–127. J. HANDSCHIN, "Trope, Sequence, and Conductus," ibid. 128–174. S. CORBIN, L'Église à la conquête de sa musique (Paris 1960). A. GASTOUÉ, Les Origines du chant romain (Paris 1907). O. URS-PRUNG, Die katholische Kirchenmusik (Potsdam 1931). P. WAGNER, Einführung in die gregorianischen Melodien, 3 v. (Leipzig).

[R. G. WEAKLAND/EDS.]

PART 3: POLYPHONIC MUSIC, ORIGINS TO 1450

The ninth century, the era of the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, with its palace school and liturgical reforms, had also provided the first example of written counterpoint in the anonymous treatise Musica enchiriadis [M. Gerbert, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum, 3 v. (Milan 1931) 2:168]. There is no certain evidence as to what extent either written or unwritten part music may have existed before then.

Early Organum. The examples in Musica enchiriadis are all syllabic, note against note and very short. They are called organum, the name given until c. 1250 to all the various styles of polyphony that involve a liturgical melody and added voice parts. Some, called "strict," proceed in simple parallel motion at the fourth or fifth; others, called "free," have oblique motion as well.

A gap of more than 100 years occurred before the next important treatise, a chapter in GUIDO OF AREZZO'S Micrologus (c. 1040), where counterpoint is more firmly established by introducing the concept of planned contrary motion at the cadences (occursus): major second or third to unison. Examples reveal also the crossing of parts; and free organum is preferred to strict. Outside the theoretical treatises, the largest number of examples of polyphony—about 164 organa—is found in the 11th-century manuscript Corpus Christi College 473, called the Winchester Troper.

The music of Winchester confirms the theorists' statements on contrary motion, but the pitches cannot be transcribed accurately since the example are written with staffless (cheironomic) neums. Two other manuscripts, Lucca 603 and Chartres 109, are written with neums on staves; hence their music can be transcribed accurately with regard to pitch but not to rhythm. The striking example from the Chartres manuscript ignores the theorists' rules of perfect consonances in order to build lines with color and strength.

Toward the year 1080, the start of a renaissance that was to last through the 12th century made its appearance with some of the finest Romanesque buildings, the Chanson de Roland, the earliest troubadours, and the first substantial growth in polyphony. Four manuscripts from the Limoges district, probably from the monastery of St. Martial [Bibliothèque Nationale lat. 1.1139 (late 11th century), BN 1.3459, 3749 (12th century), and British Museum add. 36881 (early 13th century)] contain polyphonic works. Most are written with neums that are heighted or on a staff (diastematic), so that the pitches are clear. Transcription of rhythm, however, involves so much guesswork that scholars differ widely in their interpretation. The most striking device is the lengthening of the chant, or tenor, notes to sometimes as long as 26 notes of the added voice (as in Jubilemus exultemus, BN 1.1139, fol. 41), so that actual perception as melody is excluded. It sounds more like a series of drones at various levels, a method later developed by the Notre Dame school. On fol. 60' of BN 1.1139, the upper voice of the Benedicamus Domino is troped, i.e., has its own separate text added to the melody and text of the liturgical tenor (see TROPE). This device qualifies it as an example of the early MOTET, a polyphonic form that was to become prominent during the 13th century. In the melismatic passages of many pieces the beginnings of masterful contrapuntal technique appear. These passages alternate sensitively with the note-against-note passages and lose the angularity of more primitive counterpoint. The quality of melody, however, differs from chant, with many melodic sequences and sweeping descents. Extraordinary passages like those below contain some of the earliest examples of exchanged voices, called Stimmtausch, as well as imitation.

Another manuscript, copied c. 1140, the Codex Calixtinus in the cathedral library in Compostela, Spain, has 20 two-part organa and the oldest known three-part piece, Congaudeant catholici. The middle voice appears to have been interpolated later; some parts of it function as a filler, being without melodic interest.

The Ars Antiqua (The Old Art). The first contrapuntal school to produce music of international acclaim was that of Notre Dame, which flourished in and near Paris during the late 12th and early 13th centuries. Its music may be found in three 13th-century manuscripts: Florence Biblioteca Laurenziana Pl. 29.1 (F), Wolfenbüttel Bibliothek 677 (W¹) and 1206 (W²), each containing over 190 closely written pages of polyphony. As this music was performed in monasteries and cathedrals throughout Europe, large and small collections may be found in 60 or more other manuscripts copied as far away as Spain, England and Bavaria. Although not all the rhythmic problems have been worked out, most of the transcriptions done recently are faithful enough to convey the poetical aspects of the music and warrant performance in church, concert, or recording.

The original Notre Dame collection was called the Magnus liber organi (Great Book of Organa), and, according to the English theorist known to musicologists as Anonymous IV [H. Coussemaker, Scriptorum de musica medii aevi nova series, 4 v. (Paris 1864-76) 1:342], it included settings for the feast days of the entire ecclesiastical year written by the composer LÉONIN and partly rewritten by his successor, PÉROTIN. Anonymous IV stated that the Magnus liber was in use at the cathedral of Paris until his own day (c. 1280); this, however, is not proof that it originated there. The Magnus liber has not survived, but the organa common to all three Notre Dame manuscripts, as well as those common to F and W2, are considered by Husmann to have belonged to that original collection [Musical Ouarterly (New York 1915-) 49:311-330]. Léonin and his successors set the Proper rather than the Ordinary of the Mass, together with the solo parts of the Gradual and Alleluia and some responsorial sections of the Office, leaving the choral parts of the service to be sung in unison as on the nonfestive days of the year.

The chief difference between a Saint-Martial and a Notre Dame organum was that the latter was organized according to one of six repeated patterns of rhythm called modi. These patterns were varied at irregular intervals by omitting a weak beat (fusio modi), inserting a rest (pausatio), or by breaking a note into several quick ornaments (fractio modi); these variations, however, never obscured the patterns. The syllabic sections of the tenor could stretch out beneath the upper melisma in even longer drones than at Saint-Martial, sometimes lasting 40 measures. The added voice or voices crossed and recrossed one another as in the earlier styles of organum, though by Pérotin's time the phrases had become short and clearcut. Phrases usually began and ended on perfect consonances, touching unisons midway. The perfect consonances appeared, too, on most accented beats, the other beats carrying any of the other intervals.

New in Notre Dame was the treatment of the melismatic sections of the chant tenor, reshaped rhythmically into one of the modi, often a slower modus than that of the added voice. These sections were called discantus or clausulae. The measuring of both or all voices, together with the heritage of unifying devices from Saint-Martial and Léonin, made possible the construction of really interesting works in three parts by Pérotin and his contemporaries. Before the turn of the century, Pérotin wrote the first four-part works, Viderunt (F, fol. 1) and Sederunt (W1 fol. 1). The clausulae form the link with the two later periods of the Ars antiqua, as many were transformed into motets by adding texts to the upper voices. Later, original motets were composed. Starting as a sacred form, the motet underwent secular influence, and love songs, often frivolous and imaginative, were added to the liturgical tenors or even combined with sacred verse in another voice. The counterpoint continued to gain its marvelous linear liberty, which combined with increasing vertical subtlety.

The rhythmic changes occurring during the 12th and 13th centuries kept the notational systems in an almost constant state of flux. Among the theorists were John of Garland, Walter Odington, Johannes de Grocheo, as well as the above mentioned Anonymous IV. Two theorists undertook important reforms of notation. In the mid-13th century, FRANCO OF COLOGNE facilitated exactness in reading by assigning definite time values to the conventional note forms then in use (Ars cantus mensurabilis; Scriptorum de musica medii aevi nova series, 1:117). At the end of the century, PETRUS DE CRUCE introduced further notational innovations to facilitate distinction among the smaller note values.

The Ars Nova (The New Art). A new musical spirit appeared early in the 14th century. The six rhythmic patterns of the 12th- and 13th-century modi, which had long served as means of unification, now became a prison. The musical idea of the 14th century usually found expression in complicated rhythms, often with iambic and trochaic figures in the same phrase. Triple rhythm had been the norm during the time of the ars antiqua, with duple as the exception; now both were the norm, with the duple indicated at first by red notation (e.g., manuscript BN 1.146, Le Roman de Fauvel), later by time signatures. Sometimes one voice alternated rapidly with rests in the other (the "hocket"). The first musical canon had appeared in France in 1288 and was followed by many others.

The traditional employment of rhythmic figures as unifying devices continued, however, in a new way. The 13th-century patterns (ostinati) were replaced by whole complicated phrases, sometimes as long as ten measures, which were repeated several times with fresh pitches (isorhythm). The working out of so much that was new in counterpoint and organization involved a temporary neglect in the setting of words, the latter becoming a mere pretext, sometimes, for the setting of multiple lines.

In a time of profound change it is inevitable that there be modernists and conservatives. Many of the innovations were condemned by the Docta sanctorum (1322) of Pope John XXII. Composers were accused of arbitrary interruptions in melody, addition of frivolous vernacular texts to the sacred chants, and, in general, of preferring modern to ancient music. The Docta sanctorum went so far as to regulate technical details, permitting only the Pythagorean fourth, fifth and eighth (octave) in counterpoint, over a chant tenor that must be rhythmically unaltered. Although parts of this letter are understandable in view of the bold procedures that were just beginning, it is unfortunate that it was written before the characteristic 14th-century works had appeared. Those who drafted it could not realize how the new style would be made to speak in a work as august as Guillaume de MACHAUT's Mass (transcribed in 1949 by G. Van, in Corpus mensurabilis musicae, ed. American Institute of Musicology, 2). This great monument of the 14th century, the first known polyphonic Mass to be written by one person, combines solid tradition, in its isorhythmic foundation, with wild audacity, especially in its astounding rhythms and intervals. The Kyrie, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei have sections with isorhythm in all voices, some contrasting sharply with others in speed. The Gloria and Credo prolong the conductus tradition, alternating between marching block chords and held chords. The whole disconcerting and exalting work is united by five or more motifs, some appearing in each movement. Machaut brought high refinement, astonishing melodies, and unexpected chromatics to the other forms that he inherited the lai, complainte, virelai, rondeau, and ballade. His double ballade has two simultaneous texts. His motets, like the Mass, have the traditional base of isorhythm, though in extremely complex phrases, which are sometimes repeated in diminution. His works can be found in over 30 manuscripts, most of them transcribed by Friedrich Ludwig.

Among composer-theorists, two leaders of the new movement were Philippe de VITRY and Johannes de Muris. Vitry introduced the term Ars nova (c. 1325) as the title to a treatise that, however, deals mainly with notational rather than musical innovations (see Scriptorum de musica medii aevi nova series). In his compositions there are numerous complete chords, some tonal cadences and passages with consecutive thirds. Both composers frequently raised the seventh degree to function as leading tone (musica falsa), and sometimes even the fourth degree in the same cadence, as leading tone to the dominant, forming a cadence with a strangely modern sound (Burgundian cadence). The tracts of Johannes de Muris are available in Scriptorum de musica medii aevi nova series by H. Coussemaker, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum by M. Gerbert and Source Readings in Music History edited by O. Strunk.

The period between Machaut and DUFAY, known as that of the mannerists [W. Apel, The Notation of Polyphonic Music (4th, rev. ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1949) 403–435], produced much secular and some sacred music with even more complicated rhythms than before, with a tendency for recherché combinations and picturesqueness. Composers in France were Baude Caurdier (fl. c. 1400), Jean Tapissier, Cesaris, Grimace and many others.

Some music for religious dance, appearing in a manuscript at Sens, consists of a liturgical Gradual reshaped isorhythmically, with indications for the steps (J. Chailley, 21:18).

In Italy the first part of the 14th century saw French ars nova influence, with copies of French works in Italian manuscripts; later there was influence of French on Italian forms. This period is represented by Giovanni da Cascia (1300-50) and Jacopo da Bologna. Little sacred music has survived. Composition in the last part of the century was dominated by the blind organist of Florence, Francesco LANDINI (1325-97), who astonished and moved everyone by the speed and delicacy of his playing on the portative organ and who won the laurel crown reserved for poets and emperors. He introduced some of the complexities of Machaut's style, to which he added an Italian sweetness of melody. His contemporaries were Partolino da Padua, Paolo Tenorista, Ghirardello da Firenze and Johannes CICONIA, among many others. A typical style involved moving two voices together, the upper one with added ornaments, as in Bartolino's setting for the Credo (in G. de Van, Les Monuments de l'Ars Nova). The consecutive thirds are noteworthy. For further examples of this music, see N. Pirrotta and L. Ellenwood (in bibliog.). Important manuscripts are manuscript Torino Bibl. Naz. J II 9 (ed. Hopper) and manuscript Firenze Bibl. Laur. Squarcialuppi Pal. 87 (ed. J. Wolf). The chief theorists were Marchettus of Padua, who wrote a comparison of French and Italian notation, Pomerium musica mensurata (Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum, 3:121), Prosdocimo de Beidemandis (Scriptorum de musica medii aevi nova series, 3:218) and Ugolino of Orvieto (see F. X. Haberl, in bibliog.). Ugolino clarified some of the rules of musica falsa.

In 14th-century England, Worcester appears to have been the important center. The chief English contribution was the use of the sixth chord in parallel motion, with the liturgical chant in the lowest voice (discant). There was much reciprocal influence between England and France. The composer who dominated early 15th-century England was John DUNSTABLE (d.1453), musician and astronomer. His music, although essentially in the style of the French ars nova, avoided that school's artificial modernism, having a transparent beauty and naturalness destined later to characterize the works of the early Renaissance. Others of the early 15th-century English school were the insular composers Cooke, Damett and Sturgeon, and the Continental ones, Lionel POWER and Bedingham. A manuscript known as Old Hall, at the Catholic College of St. Edmonds, contains Mass parts and hymns by many of these composers (ed. A. Ramsbotham and H. Collins). Dunstable's complete works were edited by M. Bukofzer for Musica Britannica. Also in Musica Britannica (v.55) is a collection of 15thcentury English carols in two and three parts, which were assembled from a number of manuscripts. Most are in English, the rest in Latin.

Bibliography: F. LUDWIG, Repertorium organorum . . . et motetorum . . . (Leipzig 1910), descriptive catalogue of the Notre Dame and allied manuscripts. F. GENNRICH, Bibliographie der ältesten . . . Motetten (Darmstadt 1957). Polyphonia sacra, ed. C. VAN DEN BORREN (rev. ed. University Park, Pa. 1963). Music of Fourteenth-Century Italy, ed. N. PIRROTTA, [Corpus mensurabilis musicae, ed. American Institute of Musicology, v.1– (Rome 1947–) 8; 1954]; Early Fifteenth-Century Music, ed. G. REANEY, (ibid. 11; 1955). Les Monuments de l'Ars Nova, ed. G. DE VAN, fasc. 1 (Paris 1938). The Earliest Motets, ed. H. TISCHLER, Corpus mensurabilis musicae, ed. American Institute of Musicology, v.30 (in press), 12th- and early-13th-century motet collections. F. LANDINO, Works, ed. L. ELLINWOOD (Cambridge, Mass. 1939). J. CHAILLEY, Histoire musicale du moyen âge (Paris 1950); "Un Document nouveau sur la danse ecclésiastique," Acta musicological, 21 (1949) 18-24. W. G. WAITE, The Rhythm of Twelfth-Century Polyphony (New Haven 1954), with transcriptions of two-part organa in W1. H. HUSMANN, Die Drei- und vierstimmigen Notre-Dame-Organa (Leipzig 1940), with transcriptions of three- and four-part organa; "The Origin and Destination of the Magnus liber organi," tr. G. REANEY, Musical Quarterly, 49 (1963) 311-330. E. THURSTON, The Conductus Compositions in Manuscript Wolfenbuttel 1206 (Doctoral diss. microfilm; N.Y.U. 1954), with transcriptions of conductus in W2. Y. ROKSETH, Polyphonies du XIII e siècle, 4 v. (Paris 1935-39), with transcriptions of a large 13th-century motet collection. U. KORN-MÜLLER, "Musiklehre des Ugolino von Orvieto," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch, 10 (1895) 19-40. F. X. HABERL, "Biobibliographische Notizen über Ugolino von Orvieto," ibid. 40-49. J. HANDSCHIN, "The Two Winchester Tropers," Journal of Theological Studies, 37 (1936) 34-49, 156-172. L. TREITLER, "The Polyphony of St. Martial," Journal of the American Musicological Society, 17 (1964) 29–42. G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940). New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP, 11 v. (New York 1957-) v.2. W. APEL, The Notation of Polyphonic Music (4th, rev. ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1949) 201-202, list of medieval theorists who discussed notation. Source Readings in Music History, ed. O. STRUNK (New York 1950). H. COUSSEMAKER, Scriptorum de musica medii aevi nova series, 4 v. (Paris 1864-76). M. GERBERT, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum, 3 v. (Milan 1931). H. HÜSCHEN, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegen*wart*, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 1:679–702. H. BESSELER, ibid. 702–729.

[E. THURSTON/EDS.]

PART 4: POLYPHONIC MUSIC, 1450-1600

The Middle Ages developed a strong organized and measured rhythm. The 15th and 16th centuries saw this trend enhanced by melodic as well as rhythmic fluidity into a contrapuntal art never surpassed.

Music of Northern France and the Low Countries. With the coming of the Guillaume DUFAY generation, paraphrasing of the chant in Mass compositions became widespread. Often, however, the chant melody was so extensively elaborated as to be hardly recognizable. Composition in the treble-dominated style continued. Complete Mass Ordinaries began to appear in profusion and the cantus-firmus treatment became a chief method of unification. In a cantus-firmus Mass of this period, the chosen melody, sacred or secular, was normally presented by the tenor in relatively long time-values, while the other voices wove constantly fresh polyphony about it.

One method of composition much utilized, especially in hymns, was fauxbourdon, in which the unwritten middle part moved in parallel fourths with the upper part. The result was largely a series of 6/3 and 8/5 chords, in contrast to later Italian falso bordone, which, commonly applied in 16th-century psalmody, employed mainly chords in root position but was similarly chordal (with florid cadences), recitativelike, and given to repetition. Common cadences in the period were the "under-third" (sometimes wrongly called the "Landini sixth"); the "octave-leap," in which the bass leaps up an octave while the tenor crosses below it, and the so-called "Burgundian cadence," which has two different, simultaneously sounding leading tones. The polyphonic flow might occasionally be interrupted by fermata-marked block-chords to emphasize words of special importance.

Sources. The most extensive sources for sacred polyphony dating from c. 1420 to c. 1480 are seven codices compiled at Trent, then under Germanic control. They contain over 1,800 compositions, most of them sacred. An example of a more accurate but smaller source (containing 339 works) is the famous manuscript Q15 at Bologna.

Composers. Jean Brassart and Arnold de Lantins joined the papal choir in 1431. Arnold's three-voice Mass is among the early complete settings of the Ordinary after MACHAUT. Guillaume Dufay was one of the greatest exponents of French music, regardless of period. He wrote in all the forms and used all the techniques of his day. His Mass on L'Homme armé may be the first in the long list of cantus-firmus Masses based on that celebrated tune. Cantus-firmus style gradually replaced the trebledominated in the Masses of Dufay. His compositions in sequence- and hymn-form illustrate the systematic alternation of plainsong and polyphony, a technique also applied in some of his separate Mass movements.

The tenors of a number of chansons of Gilles Binchois and Antoine Busnois were used as cantus firmi in Masses by later composers. Binchois's motets and Magnificats contain much fauxbourdon-like writing. Johannes Okeghem, who enjoyed a reputation for excellence among his contemporaries, is the acknowledged master of the latter part of the 15th century, as well as the composer of the earliest surviving polyphonic Requiem setting. Okeghem often conspicuously avoided the clear phrase formation found in compositions by Dufay and Busnois and preferred to keep the flow of polyphony constant. His style is characterized by grand, sweeping melodic lines.

Renaissance Style. The small total range that was typical of medieval polyphony, and abetted the frequent crossing of voices, went hand in hand with a sharp differentiation of the individual parts—whether in rhythm, in melody, or in the timbres of the performing media. As a wider range came into use, crossing became less frequent and differentiation between the voices less sharp. The growing homogeneity of the voices eventually resulted in the establishment of imitation as the standard technique of the late Renaissance. As to form, the larger structures that were widely cultivated included not only the Mass but also the MAGNIFICAT, of which whole cycles were written in all the modes (often two examples of each).

Mass Compositions. During the Renaissance, a tendency developed to write complete Mass Ordinaries. The cyclic Mass, in which the sections are related to each other, resulted from an effort to unify the Mass as a whole. Two main types, the cantus-firmus Mass and the "motto" Mass (which involves the use of a head motif), were already being used in the early 15th century. The parody Mass, which is based, not on a single melody, but on the several voices of a polyphonic model, came to be favored by 16th-century composers. The 15th and 16th centuries are notable also for the development of the organ Mass. Here, in certain movements, alternate verses were represented by music solely for organ, the other verses being sung in plainsong.

Theorists. The 12 treatises of Johannes Tinctoris (c. 1435–1511) form a summa that affords insight into the musical theory of the entire Renaissance. Other theorists active c. 1480 were Franchino Gaforio, whose important contributions include his eight rules of counterpoint and theory of proportions, the Spanish Bartolomé Ramos de Pareja and the German Adam of Fulda. Pietro Aaron, who wrote in the vernacular, desired consistent indication of accidentals and emphasized practical terminology. The Swiss Henricus Glareanus gave separate identity to the Ionian, the Aeolian and their plagals in the traditional system of ecclesiastical modes. Virtually all these provided equivalents for major and minor. Giuseppe Zarlino recognized the difference in effect of major and minor harmonies. He also gave ten rules for underlying words to polyphonic music. Among other important Renaissance theorists were Francisco de Salinas, Domenico Pietro Cerone and Adrianus Petit Coclico.

Music Printing. The first important printer of music other than plainsong was Ottaviano dei Petrucci of Venice. His sacred publications include some 15 collections of Masses and about 15 of motets and other sacred works, such as lamentations and laude.

Franco-Netherlandish Composers (c. 1490-c. 1560). In the period of Josquin DESPREZ practically every basic feature of Renaissance music that did not already exist made its appearance. A fusion of the art impulses of Italian and Franco-Netherlandish music was in process and produced the underlying musical style of the late Renaissance. The characteristic qualities of the new music were molded by a large group of singularly gifted composers, all vigorously active at about the same time. Of these, Jacob Obrecht, Alexander Agricola, Heinrich Isaak, Loyset Compère, Josquin Desprez, Antoine Brumel, Pierre de La Rue, Antoine de Févin, Jean Mouton and Carpentras were outstanding. One of the prominent features of Obrecht's Masses is his breaking of a cantus firmus into segments and employing each one repeatedly, reserving a complete consecutive presentation for the tenor or some other voice toward the end. Isaak's monumental Choralis Constantinus (Constantiensis) is the first comprehensive polyphonic setting of Propers of the Mass spanning the whole Church year. It includes the Propers for all Sundays and for certain feast and saints' days. Of interest among the works of Compère are two "substitution" Masses. Such works consist of a series of motets, each intended to replace a liturgical Mass movement. Josquin Desprez was the foremost composer of the early Renaissance, serving also as a transition to the late Renaissance. Although he is at his very best as a motet composer, where he is not restricted to one text, Desprez is still a central figure in the field of the Mass. His works in this form collectively illustrate all the basic Mass techniques of the entire Renaissance. Here, as elsewhere, his technical virtuosity is such that contrapuntal complexity in no way interferes with apparent spontaneity.

Post-Josquin Period. After Josquin's death, his style was further developed and disseminated throughout Europe by Netherlandish composers. The Franco-Netherlandish style took root on foreign soil, producing masters such as Palestrina in Italy, Victoria in Spain, Senfl in Germany and Byrd in England. A general trend toward simplicity in French writing is evident in the post-Josquin period. A distinct tradition that developed in the French Mass showed a tendency toward chordal writing and a resulting clarity of text. "Word painting"—an attempt to depict actual words through musical devices gained in popularity. All these trends were evident in the works of a group now known as the "Paris school," of which Claude de Sermisy and Pierre Certon, both of the Sainte-Chapelle, and Clément Jannequin were the leading representatives. The three most important composers of sacred polyphony in the period between Josquin and Lasso were Nicolas Gombert, Clemens non Papa and Adrian Willaert. In the sacred music of Gombert, pervading imitation is a pronounced trait. Clemens, a prolific writer of motets, composed three-part settings for the Souterliedekens, or "Little Psalter Songs," an extremely popular collection of monophonic settings of the 150 Psalms in Dutch rhymed verse, originally intended for Catholic use outside the church. Willaert spent his last 35 years at St. Mark's in Venice. His main contributions to sacred polyphony in Italy were: (1) the establishment of Franco-Netherlandish technique in church music; (2) the development of choral antiphony; and (3) the cultivation of a "modern" style emphasizing faultless declamation of the text. Other important composers of sacred music in Italy during this period were Costanzo Festa (who spent nearly 30 years in the papal service), Jakob Arcadelt, Nicolò Vicentino, Philippe Verdelot, Jachet Berchem, Jacques Buus and Cipriano de RORE. Claude Goudimel, who remained for the most part in France, composed works for Catholic use prior to his becoming a Huguenot c. 1460.

Council of Trent and Church Music. In 1562 a canon was approved at the Council of Trent that banned from church music all seductive or impure melodies, all vain and worldly texts, all outcries and uproars, and decreed that the words be clearly understandable. A minority attempt to restrict the Mass to monophonic setting was rebuffed. Tendencies, already present, toward carefully observing Latin accentuation and curtailing melismas purely on artistic and humanistic grounds, were confirmed by the Commission of Cardinals, which sat following the Council. In response to a need for shorter and simpler polyphonic Masses, the Missa brevis, which happened to conform to the requirements of the Commission, became common. The prestige of plainsong temporarily declined, partly owing to a change in musical ideals to which Gregorian chant no longer conformed.

Late Renaissance Music in Italy (c. 1560–c. 1600). Probably one of the influences persuading the Council to retain polyphony in the Church was the frequent performance at its early sessions of the Preces speciales of Jacobus de Kerle, Kerle, Palestrina, Animuccia, Lasso and Rosselli contributed to the investigation by composing contrapuntal Masses. Among the works of Giovanni Animuccia are two collections of laude spirituali. Laude were canticles of praise to be sung in the evening before the image of the Virgin, a practice dating from the 13th century. The sacred works of Palestrina have long been regarded as embodying the ideal application of polyphony to music for the Catholic Church. They represent the last stage in the development of a style that systematized the handling of dissonance and the use of certain time values in particular rhythmic contexts. Palestrina's predilection for symmetrical structure and quiet harmonies is reminiscent of the Josquin style. Although Palestrina's 105 surviving Masses are, as a group, his greatest contribution, his numerous motets and related works include some of his finest compositions. Among other composers of sacred music active at Rome were the madrigalist Luca Marenzio, Giovanni Maria Nanino, Felice Anerio and Annibale Zoilo.

Other Italian centers made noteworthy contributions. At Modena, Orazio Vecchi wrote sacred works much affected by secular traits. Mantua fostered Giaches de Wert and Giovanni Gastoldi. At Milan, Vincenzo Ruffo, encouraged by Cardinal Borromeo, wrote much in a preponderantly choral style with the specific purpose of meeting the wishes of the Council of Trent, while Orfeo Vecchi, foreshadowing the 17th century, provided his Masses with basso continuo. Among other important composers were Marco Antonio Ingegneri at Cremona, Carlo Gesualdo (Prince of Venosa) at Naples and Giovanni Matteo Asola and Costanzo Porta in cities near Venice. The Venetian composers, as a group, dedicated their best efforts to the motet rather than to the Mass. Andrea Gabrieli and his nephew, Giovanni, both organists at St. Mark's, wrote distinguished polychoral motets.

Renaissance in Spain and Portugal. Spanish music in the 15th century was strongly influenced by that of France, and, increasingly, of Italy. The two greatest Spanish composers of sacred music in the late Renaissance were Cristóbal de Morales and Tomás Luis de Victoria. Although Morales based his work on Franco-Netherlandish models, he achieved an individual style marked at the same time by starkness and richness. Victoria belongs stylistically with the Roman school, though his writing tended more toward abrupt and vigorous lines and leaps uncharacteristic of the Palestrina style. Other composers of sacred music in 15th- and 16th-century Spain were Johannes Cornago, Johannes Urredo (actually Wreede, a Fleming), Juan del Encina, Diego Ortiz, Francisco Querrero and Juan Pablo Pujol.

In Middle Europe. German sacred music with Latin text shows, on the whole, extreme conservatism in the 15th century, while leaning heavily on Franco-Netherlandish precept. Three features characterize the sacred polyphony to about 1500: (1) a tendency to fall into closed, uneven periods, as opposed to the smooth, unceasing flow of Franco-Netherlandish music; (2) continuous activity of all four voices, as opposed to the Western preference for varying the texture by means of passages for two or three voices; and (3) awkwardness in the treatment of rhythm. The most important sacred composer in the early period was Heinrich Finck, who quite transcended the general run. German sacred composition of the 16th century continued to be strongly influenced by Franco-Netherlandish models, and later also by Italian. The leading native Germanic composers of the century were Ludwig Senfl and Hans Leo Hassler. More important and influential, however, was a Walloon at the court of Albert V of Bavaria, Orlando di Lasso. His motets for four or more voices display much chordal writing mingled with the polyphony (the breakdown of pervading imitation being well under way); a feeling for harmonic propriety, made evident by the many chord roots that progress by leaps of fourths and fifths; and the inclusion of the third or fifth of a chord much oftener than in Palestrina. Lasso, unlike Senfl, employed Gregorian chant in very few of his Masses, the great majority of them being parodies of works by himself and other composers. Among the Netherlanders active at the Hapsburg court were Kerle, Jacob Vaet, Philippe de Monte, Jacques Buus, Jacques Regnart and Carl Luython. The Slovene Jacob Händl (Jacobus Gallus), also in Hapsburg employ, was active principally in Bohemia. His Opus musicum is a collection of motets for the whole liturgical year. The German Thomas Stoltzer was active mainly in Hungary. By far the most brilliant native musical development in the East was that of the Poles, among whom Waclav of Szamotuł, Nicholas Gomółka and Nicholas Zieleński are outstanding.

Music in England. England was one of the leading musical nations about 1450. After mid-century, however, the English tended increasingly toward an insular conservatism, culminating in the works of William Cornysh, Robert Fayrfax and others. Fayrfax, relying heavily on pure counterpoint, made much less use of imitation than Josquin. The greatest English composer in the early 16th century was John Taverner. The polyphonic lines in his Masses show greater freedom and complexity than those of his contemporaries, yet many of the same technical features are evident—frequent changes in vocal registration, repetition of melodic fragments by varying voice groups, and instances of fermata-marked block chords. Important composers of the period after the formal break between England and the papacy in 1534 were Christopher Tye, Robert White, John Shepard and Thomas Tallis. All wrote works with both Latin as well as English texts, and it is not always possible to tell whether a piece of Tudor church music with Latin text was intended for the Roman Catholic Mass or the Anglican Communion Service, in its earlier stages. The finest Elizabethan composer of Latin Church music was William Byrd. His Gradualia is the last of the great Renaissance Proper cycles, the others being those of Isaak and Händl. Among other Elizabethan composers of Latin sacred polyphony were Alfonso Ferrabosco I, Thomas Morley, John Wilbye, Richard Deering and Peter Philips.

Bibliography: G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP, 11 v. (New York 1957–) v.3. K. G. FELLERER, The History of Catholic church Music, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Baltimore 1961).

[E. THURSTON/G. REESE/EDS.]

PART 5: THE BAROQUE PERIOD

All the music of the baroque period is dominated by opera, which began with the early favole in musica of J. Peri (1561–1633), G. Caccini (c. 1546–1618) and especially MONTEVERDI (1567–1643) and which, with the opening of the first public opera house in Venice in 1637, became the first music to appeal to large audiences and hence to be influenced by popular taste. Nothing in baroque music, from Monteverdi to J. S. BACH, can be understood without knowing something of the overwhelming popularity of opera and the way in which all other music reflected its influence to a greater or less degree. Baroque style, in the words of W. Apel, is characterized chiefly by the thorough-bass technique, leading to a texture of two principal contours, melody and bass, with the intervening space filled in by improvised harmony [on a keyboard instrument-organ or harpsichord, the so-called 'continuo']. In Germany, however, the contrasting style of true polyphony not only persisted but reached, in Bach, its very acme of perfection and greatness. A third principle of Baroque [music] style is the stile concertante, that is, contrasting effects, a principle which expressed itself in the abrupt changes of the early canzona as well as in the solo-tutti alternation of the concerto grosso and in the echo-effects of vocal and of organ music. Other basic conceptions of Baroque music are improvisation and ornamentation. Lastly, mention must be made of the final establishment of tonic and dominant as the principal chords of harmony [W. Apel, Harvard Dictionary of Music, 1950, 77]

In Italy. Composers of liturgical music in the first decades of the 17th century followed two methods of composition: the stile antico, which preserved features of the 16th-century style of choral writing and the stile moderno. All the leading composers of the 17th and 18th centuries, from Monteverdi to Antonio Lotti, wrote works in stile antico. The stile moderno first appeared in G. GABR-IELI's polychoral motets for St. Mark's, Venice, which blend and contrast solo, choral and instrumental groups—large-scale motets containing many striking effects of chromatic harmony and instrumental color. A representative collection of liturgical music published by Monteverdi in 1610 includes a Mass in stile antico with organ continuo, Vespers of the Blessed Virgin (responsory, five psalms, hymn, and two settings of the Magnificat) and other pieces designed, according to the title page, "for princely halls and chapels." The Vesper items are much influenced by Gabrieli. In the psalms the musical treatment is changed for each verse, the verses being frequently separated by ritornelli. Generally the psalm tones are retained as canti firmi, accompanied by vocal and instrumental counterpoints; but they are also set in falso bordone, i.e., reiterated chords under the melody in the rhythm of the words. In the other pieces of the collection the new style of writing for solo voices is evident; virtuoso ornamental passages underlie the meaning and mood of the texts. The Sonata sopra Sancta Maria shows the growing importance of instrumental music for church use. Although it is not a liturgical work, the 11-fold repetition of a plainsong by a solo soprano gives it a quasiliturgical air almost completely belied by the independent music for two violins, viola, cornetti, trombones and organ.

Monteverdi's contemporaries and successors generally abandoned the use of the plainsong cantus firmus. They preferred two concertato styles: the one using only solo voices with or without instruments, which came to resemble the secular cantata in its forms and its use of instrumental ritornelli; and the "grand" concertato, employing one or more choirs and groups of instruments, mainly intended for the new baroque churches. André Maugars (c. 1600-40), a French viol player visiting Rome in 1624, has left descriptions of performances of such works with as many as eight lofts erected around the nave, each containing its own instrumental or vocal group, and all directed by the composer from the middle of the church. Despite their apparent complexity, these compositions were held together by a very simple, even banal, harmonic structure. The most extravagant work of this sort was the 53-part Mass of Orazio Benevoli (1605–72) for the consecration of Salzburg cathedral, requiring two eight-part choirs, two string ensembles, two of wind instruments, and two of brass.

By the end of the 17th century the operatic styles reigned supreme. The rise of Neopolitan opera saw the introduction of solo arias in the motet, which by this time could mean any piece of music set to a Latin text (other than those of the Mass Ordinary) and often denoted forms that were in fact cantata's of several movements. In the hands of Leo (1694–1744), Durante (1684–1755), Feo (1685–1745) and other 18th-century composers, the Mass was expanded into a huge cantata in which independent choruses and arias were combined with instrumental movements. An overture frequently served as an introduction. The liturgical consequences were disastrous. As J. A. Jungmann describes it:

The liturgy was not only submerged under this ever-growing art but actually suppressed, so that there were festive occasions which might best be described as 'church concerts with liturgical accompaniment'. . . . Texts which could be chosen at random—as was permitted after the elevation—were transferred to other places in the Mass. On the other side, the celebrant often tried to continue with the offertory even while the choir was still singing the Credo, or to restrict the singing of the preface and Pater noster to the initial words so as to leave the rest for the music and the organ. [The Mass of the Roman Rite (New York 1951) 1:149]

The church music of the Austrian and south German composers of the baroque was deeply influenced by that of the Italians, many of whom visited or resided for long periods in the chief cities. The works of the Germans, however, and particularly those of J. J. FUX, show a more strongly contrapuntal approach.

In France. The development of church music in France was much influenced by the requirements of the court, the artistic and cultural center of the nation. Louis XIV preferred to attend a low Mass, which did not allow time for elaborate settings of the Ordinary. Yet, since music was considered an essential part of a ritual performed in the King's presense, a compromise was made in the so-called Messe basse solonnelle: the performance of motets for voices and instruments during certain parts of the service. The influence of the Italian concertato may be seen in the motets of Henri Dumont (1610-84), director of the Chapelle Royale from 1663. From the mid-17th century, Italian styles and forms dominate French music. Marc Antoine CHARPENTIER (1634–1704), a pupil of CARISSIMI and director of the Dauphin's chapel, wrote Masses, motets and Leçons des Ténèbres for soloists, chorus and instruments. The Tenebrae settings are a remarkable example of musical interference with the liturgy: texts intended to be chanted by a lector are set as cantatas and drawn out to ten times their length by constant verbal repetition. Jean Baptiste LULLY (1632–87) brought to the motet the pomp and brilliance of the French form of opera, of which he was virtually the sole creator: the tragédie-lyrique. His Miserere and Te Deum are scored for full operatic band including trumpets and drums. Operatic overture, double choirs, solo aria and recitative are blended with instrumental interludes to produce some of the most elaborately brilliant church music ever written. Michel de Lalande (1657-1726) extended the style of Lully's motets to the Mass Ordinary, of which he wrote 12 settings. Despite an almost Handelian grandeur, his music has a seriousness and a perception of the religious meaning of his texts and their relevance to the liturgy that Lully's works lack. François COUPERIN (1668–1733) wrote in the highly ornamental style called rococo (or stile galante); his chief works for liturgy are psalms (treated as cantatas, each verse having a separate movement) and Leçons des Ténèbres.

Protestant Music. The music for all Protestant churches in this period contrasts sharply with that composed for the Catholic liturgy in that it includes vernacular music for the congregation as an essential part of liturgical worship.

Lutheran Germany. The development of German Lutheran choral music was profoundly influenced by the congregational hymn, or chorale (as it came to be called when used in choral compositions). Michael PRAETORIUS (1571–1621) published nine volumes entitled Musae Sioniae containing 1,200 of his compositions based on chorales, using concertato styles, contrapuntal forms and simpler treatments such as duets and solo arias. Johann Schein (1586-1630) and Samuel Scheidt (1587-1654) continued the concertato treatment, emphasizing the textual meaning by melodic and harmonic features. The greatest figure before Bach, Heinrich SCHÜTZ (1585–1672), seldom used chorale melodies (though he made a book of harmonizations for a metrical PSALTER), preferring, by reason of his Italian training under Gabrieli, a dramatic approach that, while indebted to both Gabrieli and Monteverdi, was profoundly personal and deeply felt. The works in Sacrae Symphoniae, published in three volumes (1628, 1647 and 1650), utilize all the techniques of the early Italian baroque, ranging from solo settings of Psalms to mighty polychoral motets.

The Lutheran Church had continued the older method of reciting the Passion narrative to a special chant while punctuating it by polyphonic settings of the "crowd" portions of the text. Later composers developed this into the "oratorio-Passion" by introducing orchestral and organ accompaniments and inserting sections with nonliturgical texts. Stages in this development are represented by the St. John Passion (1643) of Thomas Selle (1599–1663); St. Matthew Passion (1667) of Christian Flor (1626–97); and St. Matthew Passion (1673) of Johann Theile (1646–1724). Schütz's Passions stand apart: they have no instrumental accompaniment, and, apart from the opening and concluding movements, the chorus sings only "crowd" passages, the rest being sung to a quasi-Gregorian type of recitative.

By the end of the 17th century Italian opera was a strong influence on German church music. The blending of the various choral forms based on chorale tunes had produced a large composite type of composition that later came to be called cantata. A Hamburg pastor, Erdmann Neumeister (1671–1756), published texts for what he called "reformed" cantatas. Regarding the cantata as a "fragment of an opera," he discarded all Biblical passages and hymn texts in favor of poetical paraphrases that could be set as recitatives and da capo arias. His texts roused much opposition, and many composers mingled them with texts and musical forms from the older style; the cantatas of J. S. BACH are the greatest representatives of this. The Passion story was also given "operatic" treatment and poetical paraphrased texts; such works, however, were no longer liturgical but concert hall music. Bach's Passions represent a compromise between the earlier and the new forms; he retained the complete Biblical text but added chorales, choruses, and arias that had non-Biblical texts.

Anglican Music. English composers were slow to incorporate the new vocal styles of the Continent. Up to the civil war, despite some experiments in music for the Chapel Royal by William Child (1606-97) and Monteverdi's pupil Walker Porter (1595-1659), the older polyphonic style continued in the "full" and "verse" forms of the anthem and service. At the Restoration (1660) Charles II imported music "in the French style," with instrumental sections for violins, and had Pelham Humfrey (1647-74), John Blow (1649-1708) and Henry PURCELL (1659-95) trained in up-to-date European techniques. The church music of these men and particularly of Purcell is equal to anything of its period on the Continent in technical expertise, while preserving a peculiarly English type of melody and harmony. After Purcell and with the appearance of Italian opera in London, Anglican church music speedily copied Italian models. HANDEL's Chandos Anthems, while revealing acquaintance with Purcell's work, are wholly Italianate in style and form.

Bibliography: M. F. BUKOFZER, Music in the Baroque Era (New York 1947). S. CLERCX, Le Baroque et la musique (Brussels 1948). R. HAAS, Die Musik des Barocks (Handbuch der Musikwissenschaft 3; New York 1928). A. HARMAN et al., Man and His Music (New York 1962). P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). W. APEL, Harvard Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1958).

[A. MILNER/EDS.]

PART 6: THE CLASSICAL STYLE

Characteristics peculiar to the classical period emerged around 1750, reached a high point of artistic expression in the works of Haydn and Mozart, and evolved into Romanticism in the works of Beethoven and Schubert.

New Style Sources. Sources of the style were the experiments of the Mannheim composers with new orchestral devices, the interest of the Viennese composers in formal structures, and the melodic and harmonic freedoms of the Italian composers of opera and cantata. The Church composer assimilated all of these styles—often more instrumental and theatrical than religious—and applied them to liturgical texts. The style is basically dramatic, and is founded on a balanced formal structure that permits the tensions inherent in musical contrasts, both tonal and melodic, to evolve in a logical but emotionally moving way. Historically, the style is cast against the intellectual background of the ENLIGHTENMENT: it combines the rational temperament of that movement with its JOSEPHINISM, and reflects both its strained Church-State relationships and its attempts at reform.

The Mannheim School. Musical activity reached tremendous heights throughout Europe. Composition, performance, and circulation of new music in general showed clearly the intense musical life Europe was experiencing at this time. The rise of the Mannheim School in the mid-18th century brought a new orchestral style and performance into music that would be as important as the Viennese interest in sonata form in building the Viennese classical style. Two leading composers of religious music in the Mannheim circle who attempted a combination of formal aspects and high expressiveness were Franz X. RICHTER and George Vogler. The period around 1750 and shortly thereafter provides a transitional stage in Church music from the baroque contrapuntal style with thorough-bass accompaniment to a more expressive vocal and instrumental style that also emerged with national elements. The orchestral concept dominated the Masses, Vespers, litanies, Offertories and psalms written in the new style.

Southern Influences. The influence of Italian opera and cantata conventions moved north during the middle part of the 18th century. The Neapolitan use of simple harmonies with highly ornamented melodic lines rendered the liturgical texts dramatic and full of pathos. Niccolò JOMMELLI, Baldassare GALUPPI, Domenico CIMAROSA and Giovanni PAISIELLO wrote in this style. By building on the foundations of the cantata form and its sectional structure, these Italian composers lost sight of the unity of liturgical texts and imposed on them the concerto principle. Vivid orchestrations, the aria and bel canto—all characteristic of the Neapolitan stage—found their way into liturgical music since the same composers who wrote for the theater wrote for the church. It was a simple process to combine this trend with Empfindsamkeit (highly expressive technique) of Germany to achieve a new style, neither baroque nor yet fully classical. Typical of the merging of the operatic with the instrumental idioms are the works of Johann Adolph HASSE, a German composer who, like many others, lived and studied in Italy. He wrote his 100 operas in the same style as his many oratorios and Masses. But not all composers favored the new style. Many still wrote in the strict contrapuntal style of "stile antico." For example, Johann ALBRECHTSBERGER and Georg Pasterwitz and others continued to write in the polyphonic idiom of previous generations. Their works show but slightly the influence of the new melodic concept.

The Viennese Classics. A reconciliation of the Italian operatic tendencies with Northern instrumental writing matured in the Viennese composers. Here, the element of balance in a logical form combined with expressionism in melody reached its peak. After 1770 religious music also was affected by these elements. For example, to give balance and unification, parts of the Mass received cyclic treatment, i.e., the music of the first Kyrie would be repeated for the third Kyrie and again for the Dona nobis pacem of the Agnus Dei. This created an A-B-A form in the Kyrie and made that Mass a rounded form. The first and final sections of the Gloria and the Credo were treated in similar fashion. Sonata and rondo forms were worked into the larger sections with a fugue acting as a coda. The cantata elements remained, however, and arias were standard fare for the Et incarnates est, and the Benedictus; the orchestral accompaniment knits the work into a homogeneous whole. All joined to form in the classical period a definite ecclesiastical style that was both religiously inspired and musically satisfying. These composers were writing church music in their own contemporary style and were using their talent and craft to produce artifacts that were consistent with the philosophy that surrounds the celebration of the liturgy during the Classical period. For this reason they were musically superior to the uninspired, academic compositions of those composers adhering to the old polyphonic style.

Mozart and Haydn. With the emphasis given to symphonic writing, it is not surprising that Classical sacred music found its zenith in Wolfgang Amadeus MOZART and Franz Joseph HAYDN. In early works they were careful to express the general meaning of the text, repeating syllables, words and sections of the text when musical reasons demanded. Haydn experimented with techniques of form and even tapped the store of folk song. In the case of Mozart, one can discern a marked change in his style after he left Salzburg. His first compositions reflected the examples of Johann Eberlin and a stronger influence from chamber music and the Neapolitan style. The Masses he wrote from 1758 to 1782 show a unique ability to blend elements of German classicism and form with Italian lyricism. The unfinished C-Minor Mass (K.427) illustrates the new church style: it is a successful assimilation of the forementioned principles. His great Requiem is considered to be the epitome of his church style, if not of all Viennese sacred music. The vocal idiomatic writing that Mozart gave to his religious music can be compared with the symphonic and orchestral principles that Haydn contributed. The vocal solo did not interest Haydn as much as did the vocal quartet. Using remnants of the concertogrosso form, he contrasted the quartet against the tutti of the full choir. In his earlier works, he had used polyphony infrequently, with the exception of specific choral fugues. After a 14-year lapse, Haydn returned to writing sacred music, using a polyphony integrated into the expanded use of the orchestra. His six monumental Masses written between 1796 and 1802 make extensive use of sonata principles, canon and fugue—all with a full participation of the orchestra. Unlike Mozart, Haydn wrote two oratorios. After his visit in England, he returned to write his Creation, a work that reflects the exuberance of Nature, an idea characteristic of the Enlightenment. Although the naïve representation of natural phenomena was criticized, the oratorio was tremendously successful as a combination of symphonic and choral elements. Because of its success, Haydn composed his second, The Seasons, that was equally well received. In these last works of Mozart and Haydn the pinnacle of classical sacred music was reached: the emergence of a style that united the polyphonic choir and the symphony orchestra is significant. If operatic traces can be detected, it is only because these elements were necessary parts of the composer's vocabulary.

Beethoven and Schubert. The Viennese classical style was carried on by Ludwig von BEETHOVEN and Franz SCHUBERT. Beethoven's C-Major Mass (1803) is so reminiscent of the Viennese style that it could be called a companion Mass to Haydn's works. It has all the fresh, heroic ideals of Beethoven's early creative period. Even in his Missa Solemnis one can see the influence of Haydn's symphonic cohesion. The large individual parts of this Mass are conceived with oratorio principles of grandness. Schubert, too, participated in this direct stylistic line with the Viennese church style. His early Masses exhibit the sectional treatment of the text, but show the lyrical quality peculiar to all of his works. In his last two Masses (A flat and E flat), the music tends to be Romantic because of the harmonic color and moving lyricism characteristic of Schubert's writing. Classical elements, however, can be seen in the balance and reserve inherent in the structural make-up of the works.

The Influence of Josephinism. The high classical Viennese church style was not without its opponents. The conservatives who favored the "stile antico" have already been mentioned. The restoration of liturgical propriety took place under the decrees of Joseph II of Austria (see JOSEPHINISM). As a child of the Enlightenment's philosophy, he wanted to simplify the celebration of the liturgy in Austrian churches. Because of the large number of churches in Vienna, schedules were devised to regulate the hours of worship to avoid duplications. Vespers and Compline were curtailed considerably in diocesan churches together with many popular pious exercises. To establish a vernacular hymnody during the celebration of liturgical functions, a German hymnal was prepared by Johann Kohlbrenner in 1777; it was promulgated in all of Austria by 1783. The German sung mass (Singmesse) can trace its origins to this decree. While instrumental church music was not totally restricted, the use of concerted music was regulated. The symphonic Mass was too well rooted to be easily discouraged and dispensations were occasionally granted for its performance. Archbishop Collaredo (see MOZART) suppressed instrumental music in his see, but later (1787) permitted its performance on special feasts. It was under his direction that Michael HAYDN reinstituted the sung Gradual (1782). Haydn composed many Graduals in a simpler chordal style with instrumental accompaniment that replaced the "Epistle sonatas." The whole trend of Josephinism reform of church music was the simplification of the liturgy to encourage better communal worship. It did not deter, however, countless second-rate composers from imitating the Masses of Haydn and Mozart well into the middle of the 19th century.

Bibliography: D. J. GROUT, A History of Western Music (New York 1960). K. G. FELLERER, The History of Catholic church Music, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Baltimore 1961). P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). R. G. PAULY, "The Reforms of Church Music under Joseph II," Musical Quarterly, 43 (1957) 372–382; Music in the Classic Period (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1965). O. URSPRUNG, Die katholische Kirchenmusik (Potsdam 1931).

[F. J. MOLECK/EDS.]

PART 7: ROMANTICISM AND ITS AFTERMATH

The revival of religious interest that took place during the opening years of the 19th century is mirrored in the music of the period. The most important romanticist trend was the use of all musical devices to project a subjective attitude toward religion in sacred music. Especially among French and Italian composers opera was the most popular means of musical expression, and the line between what was appropriate for the stage and what for the choir loft was not sharply drawn. The new harmonic resources developed by C. P. E. Bach and Mozart, most clearly evident in Mozart's Ave Verum Corpus and Requiem, widened the range of emotional expression but also led to secular and sentimental styles. The romanticist interest in exoticism found religion an "effect," as is shown by inclusion of church scenes on the operatic stage or the use of the Dies Irae in secular instrumental compositions by Berlioz, Liszt and Rachmaninoff. Although "national styles" in church music were discernible, nationalism as such played a minor role in Catholic church music during this century.

Concerted Mass. The aesthetic of symphonic church music, dominant in the later 18th century, remained in force during most of the 19th. In the typical concerted Mass of these periods, liturgical considerations were subordinated to musical exigencies: the chorus sang to orchestral accompaniment; passages of text were excised, troped, or repeated for subjective emphasis or to round out musical forms; and sections were allocated to soloists whose parts sounded like operatic arias or ensembles. The degree of romanticist content in concerted church music varied from composer to composer. Latent in Mozart's later works, it was developed by Cherubini, Lesueur and Hummel, continued in the music of Schubert and Weber, and reached its peak in the works of Thomas, Gounod and Rossini. Later composers such as Liszt, Franck and especially Bruckner, Dvořák and Fauré, treated the musical devices of the time with more restraint and better taste.

Concerted Masses are objectionable on liturgical grounds because of text repetition, settings of the priest's intonations, virtuoso demands on the musicians, orchestral accompaniment and length—all of which distract the congregation from the action of the Mass; yet the works in this genre by Schubert, Bruckner, Dvorřák and Fauré are an integral part of the musical treasure of Catholicinspired music and are eminently suitable for concert performance. The merits of concerted Masses should be judged by comparison with the Masses of Maillart and Farmer, early editions of St. Basil Hymnal, and the Tantum Ergo derived from the Sextet in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor. The Missa Solemnis of BEETHOVEN and the rediscovery of J. S. Bach's B-minor Mass inspired the composition of large concerted Masses and similar works for the concert hall rather than for the church. The Requiems of Cherubini, Berlioz, Schumann, Verdi and Dvořák, despite their liturgical texts, should be classed as oratorios.

Oratorio. The rise of choral societies and music festivals during the 19th century provided a steady demand for new oratorios. The founders of the romantic Protestant oratorio were Spohr and Mendelssohn. The sentimental chromaticism of Spohr and the "Victorian" complacency of Mendelssohn's religious music permeates most of these later works. Brahms, with his roots in the older German contrapuntal tradition, created in his German Requiem the best Protestant successor to the great works of Schütz, J. S. Bach and Handel. Oratorio was less popular in Catholic countries. Deserving of study are the oratorios of Lesueur, which anticipate those of Dubois, Saint-Saëns, and Massenet. Fauré's Requiem is a virtual transfiguration of these intimate oratorios. Gounod's Rédemption and Mors et Vita (written for England) and Franck's Les Béatitudes are the leading largescale French oratorios. The greatest Catholic oratorios of the period are those by Elgar. Also of interest are "religious" operas such as Saint-Saëns' Samson et Dalila, Massenet's Le Jongleur de Notre Dame, and d'Indy's monumental La Légende de Saint Christophe.

Organ. The rediscovery of J. S. Bach's organ works served to rescue organ music from the virtual desuetude into which it had lapsed during the classical period. Protestant organ music is best represented by the sonatas of Mendelssohn, the late chorale preludes of Brahms and the works of Reger and Karg-Elert. Liszt's organ works are significant among those by Catholic composers. During the latter part of the 19th century, France was the center of organ playing. Though Franck's works stand at the peak, many excellent organ compositions were written by Guilmant, Widor and Vierne. Subsidiary centers of organ composition and performance were in Brussels (Lemmens), Munich (Rheinberger) and Rome (Bossi).

Other Forms. Concerted Masses were generally restricted to court and cathedral churches with professional singers and musicians. In smaller parishes the principal music consisted of the simple Landmessen and Masses in the style of Michael Haydn and Hummel of the Viennese classical school. Though Catholic hymns continued to be written during the 19th century, little of enduring value was created. Most of them contain sentimental chromatic harmonies, are operatic in style, or resemble salon romances (e.g., Lambillotte's hymns with pianostyle accompaniments); and for these reasons they are proscribed in many U.S. dioceses.

Protestant church music assumed a variety of forms. Spohr and Mendelssohn were the models for the "Victorian" Anglican church music of Goss, Barnby and Stainer. Excellent hymns, especially of the processional type, were written in England. In popular Protestant hymnody the rugged "Sacred Harp" and the sentimental or martial GOSPEL SONGS were peculiarly American contributions (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). A major revival of sacred music occurred in Russia. About 1830 Bortniansky's Italianate anthems began to be supplanted by the Germanic tonal chant harmonizations of Lvov and Bakhmetieff. The influence of Glinka and "The Five" (Balakirev, Borodin, Cui, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov), especially in their scoring of folk songs, led to modal harmonizations of the traditional chants and of compositions in modal style by Kastalsky, Rachmaninoff, Ippolitov-Ivanov, Grechaninov, and others.

Reform of Catholic Music. Notable attempts were made during the century to reform Catholic church music, chiefly by reintroducing Renaissance sacred polyphony, which had been rediscovered through such sources as Baini's biography of Palestrina; the studies of Renaissance polyphony by Thibaut, Kiesewetter, and Winterfeld; the collections of 16th-century vocal music by Choron, Commer, Proske, Maldeghem and others; and the composition of new music in this restrained contrapuntal style (see CAECILIAN MOVEMENT). Munich (Aiblinger, Ett. Rheinberger) and Regensburg (Proske and Haberl) were the focal points of reform, and the Caecilian Society, founded by F. X. Witt in 1868, was the most influential reform group; but parallel movements were found in every land, and the reform ideal was formally approved by Pius IX in 1870. The most enduring monument of 19th-century Catholic musical scholarship was the restoration of Gregorian chant, largely through the labors of the Benedictine monks of SOLESMES under the leadership of Dom Guéranger. The chief legacies of Solesmes are the Paléographie musicale (1889-), a collection of facsimiles of early manuscripts; a theory of chant rhythm; and the Vatican edition of the chant (see CHANT BOOKS, PRINTED EDITIONS OF).

Musicology. Neither the Caecilian reforms nor the Solesmes studies would have been possible without the emerging discipline of historical musicology. Musicology's task was not to illustrate how music had "progressed," but to investigate the music of the past on its own merits and to publish collections and scholarly studies of early music. Besides the publications cited above in the fields of Renaissance and Gregorian music, other landmarks of 19th-century research and publishing activity were the incomplete general histories by Ambros and Fétis; Fétis's Biographie universelle of musicians; Eitner's Quellen-Lexikon, a census of music manuscripts; Coussemaker's anthology of medieval treatises on music; and the prolific writings of Riemann. Nationalism stimulated the publication of Denkmäler (monuments of music) in the Germanic lands, and in England, France, Italy and Spain.

Although the 19th-century investigations of Renaissance church music were handicapped by an almost total misunderstanding of 16th-century performance practice, this was outweighed by the creation of a climate of opinion in which music of the past was found worthy in its own right and, because of its lack of association with the 19th-century styles of the concert hall, opera house, or salon, was best suited for divine worship. The labors of the musicologists were crowned by Pope St. Pius X when he declared in his motu proprio of 1903 that the most suitable styles of church music were Gregorian chant and Renaissance polyphony—in that order.

The Church Composer. Relations between the Church and the composer, however, had reached a low point by the beginning of the 20th century, and only in organ music was significant creative work produced. On the one hand, the Church was devoting her resources to more urgent educational, missionary and social endeavors; on the other hand, congregational (and too often, clerical) preference was for melodious Masses and sentimental hymns. Then, too, the individualism implicit in romanticism tended to alienate the composer from the emerging emphasis on the doctrine of the Mystical Body, with its corollary in "collective," participated worship. Composers of stature disdained to write for the limited uses of the parish church, and in their sacred compositions they favored Gregorian chant and Renaissance polyphony, thus reflecting both Caecilian ideals and the romanticist penchant for the archaic, but also rejecting the idiom of the day and the role of style-setter of music to come.

Bibliography: K. G. FELLERER, The History of Catholic Church Music, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Baltimore 1961). A. EINSTEIN, Music in the Romantic Era (New York 1947). O. URSPRUNG, Die katholische Kirchenmusik (Potsdam 1931). A. OREL, "Die katholische Kirchenmusik seit 1750," Handbuch der Musikgeschichte, ed. G. ADLER, 2 v. (2d ed. Tutzing 1930; repr. 1961) 2:833–864. A. SCHERING, Geschichte des Oratoriums (Leipzig 1911) 382–624.

[R. M. LONGYEAR/EDS.]

PART 8: POST-ROMANTICISM

Post-Romanticism in music signifies, basically, both an idiom (advanced tonal chromaticism) and a historical period of transition. It bridges 19th- and 20th-century styles and ends, approximately, with the death of Gustav MAHLER in 1911. It is therefore introductory to the history of sacred music in the 20th century, which is a period more properly characterized by the development of new technical resources, including atonality and polytonality, and the application to music of such aesthetic concepts as Impressionism and Expressionism. For liturgical music the motu proprio of St. Pius X, Inter pastoralis officiae (Nov. 22, 1903), was the key document. Its influence, while profound, was less complete than had been hoped, and attention to its ideal of "the restoration of all things in Christ' was seriously retarded by World War I. Nevertheless it must ultimately be assessed in terms of its permissive if reserved attitude toward modern music, its effect on later papal pronouncements, and three general developments accelerated by its impetus: (1) the revival of chant as an ideal for choral and congregational singing, (2) the practical study of chant in seminaries, and (3) the establishment of schools for the professional study of chant as well as of church music in other styles.

The "Traditional School." The musical idioms of Romanticism and Post-Romanticism achieved a valid and permanent popularity that impeded any mass espousal of later styles. That a "traditional school" of Catholic church-composers should gain ascendancy was therefore not surprising; but musicians such as Refice, Perosi and Yon, competent and dedicated though they were, remained apart, both from major figures of the era (SCHOENBERG, BARTÓK, STRAVINSKY) and from such minor but still "mainstream" composers as K. Szymanowski (1882-1937), Charles Ives (1874-1954) or VILLA-LOBOS (1887-1959). Contributing further to the Church's loss of vital contact with contemporary trends were: her global concern with problems other than those of an often esoteric new music, the almost total secularization of 20th-century musical art and changing sociological patterns, particularly that of patronage.

In France the transition from a lingering Romanticism to authentically modern liturgical styles was facilitated by continuing interest in the organ as a church instrument. Conservatives such as VIERNE and WIDOR prepared the way for progressive successors as diverse as the gifted but essentially minor Jean Langlais (1907–) and the more controversial but influential Olivier Messiaen (1908–). The latter's organ cycles have attracted particular attention (e.g., La Nativité du Seigneur, 1935). He has produced important orchestral, chamber and didactic works and numbered among his composition pupils such members of the later avant-garde as Pierre Boulez (1925–) and Karlheinz Stockhausen (1928–).

After Debussy. Impressionism offered composers of liturgical music a break with Romanticism free from involvement with expressionism and unmitigated dissonance; clear roots in the modality of chant and the structural principles of Gothic polyphony; and seemingly unlimited possibilities of adaptation to a continuing chant revival. Claude DEBUSSY (1862–1918), as the genius of French Impressionism, evolved a highly distinctive, sensuous, musical language, sometimes with neopagan implications (he was once rebuked by the archbishop of Paris for a production of Le Martyre de Saint-Sêbastien). "Les Six," following Debussy, Ravel and Satie, developed sophisticated personal styles that were indebted, in part, to the neoclassic elements in the work of Stravinsky. Three of the "Six" took some account of religious values, as can be seen in such works as Darius Milhaud's setting of texts from Pope John XXIII's encyclical Pacem in terris (1963); Arthur Honegger's Le Roi David (1921) and POULENC's Mass in G Major (1938), Gloria (1961) and Sept Répons des Ténèbres (1963).

Bibliography: P. COLLAER, A History of Modern Music, tr. S. ABELES (Cleveland 1961). J. MACHLIS, Introduction to Contemporary Music (New York 1961), contains bibliog. of 161 titles and works in Eng. K. G. FELLERER, Soziologie der Kirchenmusik (Cologne 1963). J. SCHELL, Aesthetische Probleme der Kirchenmusik im Lichte der Enzyklika Pius' xii. Musicae sacrae disciplina (Berlin 1961). Musical Quarterly, 51 (Jan. 1965), a special issue: "Contemporary Music in Europe." J. GÉLINEAU, Voices and Instruments in Christian Worship, tr. C. HOWELL (Collegeville, Minn. 1964) 199–203. Liturgy for the People, ed. W. J. LEONARD, (Milwaukee 1963)

[F. J. BURKLEY/EDS.]

PART 9: UNITED STATES

The history of liturgical music in the U.S., like that of general music, is a study as variegated as the plurality of cultural and religious backgrounds represented in the nation's early settlers and later immigrants. While American music thus was far from being indigenous in its first manifestations, in its development it has exhibited a continuing (if uneven) surge for freedom from its European motherland together with a growing self-awareness and involvement with native sources of inspiration. Colonial America's first music was music related to denominational worship; today, significantly influenced by current liturgical, theological and ecumenical developments, the music of America's churches continues its process of adaptation.

Music in the Missions. The music of 16th- and 17th-century Europe was brought to America by Spanish and French missioners, chiefly Franciscan, Dominican and Jesuit.

In Spanish Domains. Spanish foundations dating from 1598 in New Mexico achieved a high degree of development in the areas of organ music, choir schools and vocal polyphony that involved "note" singing a century before it was practiced on the Eastern seaboard. Fray Cristóbal de Quiñones (d. April 27, 1609) and numerous other friars were responsible for these initial musical endeavors. One of the first collections of authentic Indian melodies was that of Fray Felipe Arroyo de La Cuesta. Again in the California missions the Franciscan padres introduced the music as well as the language and customs of their native Spain. Plainchant predominated, but some figured Masses and motets, also homophonic in structure and with a high incidence of thirds, sixths, dominant sev-enths and occasional diminished chords, were in the mission repertory. The absence of ornamental solo sections and of repetitions of text helps to distinguish this mission music from its later liturgical counterpart in Eastern centers. Part-music was written on a single five- or six-line staff, with a system of colored notation to distinguish voice parts: tiple (soprano), white notes outlined in red; contralto, white notes outlined in black; tenor, solid red notes; bass, black notes.

Mission life in the 18th and early 19th centuries dictated the musical usage, since natives were encouraged to live within the mission compound. The daily musical program was scheduled as follows: Cantico del Alba (morning prayer), chanted upon rising; the Alabanza (the Commandments, Sacraments and other catechetical material recited or sung in Spanish); the Mass in plainsong or figured Latin settings; the Alabado (song of divine praise); the Bendito (grace before and after meals); and the Angelus. At sundown the mission populace gathered for the Doctrina and the Alabado in the native Indian tongue, and during the day chosen singers chanted the Divine Office. The whole day was thus permeated with sung prayer, and even after sundown an evening of song and dance was common. Instruments used were the violin, viola, cello, bass, flute, trumpet, horns, guitars, drums and triangle. After congregational singing in the form of simple psalm tones and antiphonal chants was established, a formal choir was trained. The repertory consisted of Propers for Sundays and principal feasts (simplified settings by Padre Narciso Durán). Masses in chant or homophonic settings, and Latin hymns for Benediction and special feasts. Padre Durán encouraged instrumental accompaniment to sustain pitch and wrote in simplified scale patterns using the F clef with needed accidentals. Although concrete evidence of the music in the Southwest, Texas and Florida is scarce, it may be assumed that the same pattern was followed wherever the Spanish missioners penetrated. With the collapse of the Spanish missions (1833-34) their music fell into obscurity and therefore failed to influence directly the course of church music in America.

In French Domains. The pattern of mission life prevailing on the West Coast was unknown in northeastern U.S. and Canada. The missioner spent his days in the midst of the Native American nations. Tribes remained tribes, not guests of the mission enclosure. As in Spanish territory, however, one of the chief problems was that of communication—especially of religious truths. Often the basic facts were imparted through hymns—either the setting of Christian texts to native melodies or, as later happened, native dialects to European melodies. Various teaching aids were devised, such as the Quipii, a knotted cord signifying certain doctrinal ideas; the Order of Songs, pictures suggesting the subject of each hymn stanza; the Notched Stick, arbitrary engraved characters used to direct prayers and hymns; and Syllabaries, which were signs used to indicate sounds, thus obviating the task of teaching the natives a foreign tongue. Extant hymnals (1830-70) use the Native American vernacular with the title of the melody indicated in a European language. Contents include Latin hymns, cantiques (common tunes), English hymns and some original tunes. In use today is the Huron carol Jesous Ahatonia, probably composed by Jean de Brébeuf, one of the NORTH AMERICAN MARTYRS. One Midwestern missioner, the Italian Samuel MAZZUCHELLI, OP, made such headway with his Wisconsin Winnebagos that they learned to chant Sunday Vespers with alternating verses in Latin and their vernacular. Because of the language barrier, however, none of these apostolic-cultural endeavors had any influence on the course of American church music.

Protestant Beginnings (17th Century). The pilgrims of New England relied upon English hymnals for their worship services. The Ainsworth Psalter contained unaccompanied unison settings of metrical psalms-one note to each syllable in binary rhythm (see PSALTERS, MET-RICAL; HYMNS AND HYMNALS). When the Salem and Plymouth communities joined the Massachusetts Bay Colony (1691), the BAY PSALM BOOK gained ascendancy and continued to constitute New England's singing staple for the next century. In the Anglican settlements there was a struggle for popularity between the "Old Version" (Bay Psalm Book) and the more poetic New Version of the Psalms of David (1696) of Tate and Brady. Both versions were later replaced by the hymnody of English writers, such as Isaac Watts. Two non-English communities, the Ephrata Cloister, near Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and the Moravians (Unity of Brethren) centered in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, maintained a high level of musical activity in the 18th century. Relying heavily on European material, the Ephrata group developed antiphonal singing to an art, whereas the Moravians performed choral, chamber and symphonic works (not necessarily religious) of European masters. Another center of musical activity was the camp meeting. The revival movement among various denominational dissenters generated the folk hymn, a combination of secular folk tune and religious text, as leaders sought to replace the "placid" Puritan psalm with a heartier type of group singing. Folk hymns in turn were succeeded by the popular GOSPEL SONG, a commercial, individually composed hymn.

Catholic Hymnody (18th Century). Formal publication of hymnals for Catholic use was not initiated until 1787. Credit is due to Benjamin Carr (1768–1831), influential musician, teacher, hymn composer and music publisher, for his pioneer publications. Numerous other hymnals, however, came with immigrating Catholics, and with this influx of hymnals came a threefold western European influence: (1) postbaroque concerto style with its specified elements, i.e., melodic and harmonic reiteration, alternation of solo and chorus sections, and ornamentation of melodic lines (in this way a pseudo-Neapolitan bel canto style was implanted in the hymnals); (2) Viennese classical form and presentation of thematic material, whose unskilled and inartistic handling resulted in a monotonous tonic-dominant harmony with "Alberti Bass" accompaniment; thus Viennese orchestral idiom was exploited in the form of numerous orchestrated Masses, but, in an attempt to imitate the masters, most composers simply exaggerated the means; and (3) adulation of the self-styled composer who was the enthusiastic and zealous but all too often untrained hymn tune writer and compiler. Catholic hymnody suffered both musically and textually as a result of one or more of these factors. Moreover, the defensive mood of the post-Tridentine period penetrated liturgical music, and at the same time Catholics were deprived of the heritage of the German chorale. Congregational singing was almost entirely replaced by the solo voice, quartet choirs and lengthy organ solos. Degeneration became complete when hymnals proudly displayed "religious" texts set to popular secular compositions.

Nineteenth-Century Trends. The 19th century felt the surge of political and artistic nationalism. Composers, such as GOTTSCHALK, incorporated "American" elements in their works, e.g., Native American melos, spiritual tunes, rag-time rhythms. Arthur Farwell (1872-1952), recognizing the role of imitation in the early stages of creativity, sought freedom from European domination and answered DVOŘÁK's challenge to explore native folk music with the foundation of the Wa-Wan Press for the advancement of American music. Henry Gilbert (1868–1928) shared Farwell's interest, his deep love for all folk music manifesting itself in a heavy reliance on American Indian lore. Gilbert preferred to "seek his own hat" rather than wear "a borrowed crown." An 18thcentury predecessor, William Billings (1746-1800), had championed the same cause with an unusual display of musical creativity and his fuguing tunes became basic source material for later composers, such as William Schuman. Charles Ives (1874-1954), successor to Farwell and Gilbert, realized their ideals. Rejecting conventional musical structure, Ives introduced polytonality, polyrhythms, tone clusters, functional intervals and jazz effects, and his use of native folk music as his germinal musical idea initiated a truly creative trend in American music.

Protestant Churches. Protestant church music reflected a twofold trend during the Victorian period: the use of the dignified hymn and the popularity of gospel songs. Three basic elements in the religious milieu are recognizable: (1) the evangelical movement headed by the Wesleys; (2) the OXFORD MOVEMENT, fostering a return to ancient faith and practice; and (3) the Modernist movement, which sought complete involvement of man in liturgical worship. Hymnody drew heavily on the poetry of Cardinal J. H. NEWMAN, E. Caswall, F. W. FABER and John Mason Neale; initially, however, less attention was focused on the music. The Oxford Movement encouraged the revival of the Latin hymns, folk song carols, plainsong hymns and German chorales, which were adopted according to local American needs. A simultaneous concern for performance led to the utilization of secular part-song techniques as evidenced in the works of the English composers J. B. Dykes, J. Barnby and J. Stainer. The Victorian feeling for antiquity led to extreme sentimentalism, musical and religious. Lowell Mason (1792-1872), well known for his hymns "Nearer My God To Thee," "My Faith Looks Up to Thee" and "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," stands in the forefront of American musicians of this period, by reason of his labors for music education in the public schools, with special emphasis on sound choral training. Other major composers included Thomas Hastings (1784-1872) and W. B. Bradbury (1816–68). The oratorios St. Peter (John Knowles Paine, 1839-1906) and Hora novissima (Horatio Parker, 1863–1919) represent the peak of religious music of the period. The Parker work, for mixed chorus and orchestra, and based on St. Bernard's poem Contemptor mundi, was his first internationally recognized success. Critics paid Parker the highest of 19th-century accolades in comparing it with the works of such composers as Palestrina, J. S. Bach and Josquin Despres, while choral societies in England and America performed the work frequently.

Catholic Church. Catholic music of the 19th century seemed as deeply entrenched in European operatic style as ever. The influx of English and Irish Catholics, lacking valid liturgical traditions, continued the deterioration of Church music. Quartet choirs and orchestral ensembles seemed the ideal at this time. Gregorian chant was scarcely known in the U.S. Mass composers of the period assumed the romanticist symphonic style, with no attempt to differentiate between secular and church expression. The CAECILIAN MOVEMENT, initially a reform group in the German-speaking countries, found strong support in German parishes of the Middle West. Restoration of plainsong and classic polyphony was their main concern, and their desire for objectivity of expression challenged the lush romantic composition of the period. While the group fostered revival of the older German hymns, the vernacular hymn was relegated to extraliturgical services. The movement must be credited with stemming the tide of shallow, operatic church composition; by severing itself from the general musical development of the country, however, it gradually deteriorated to a system of stereotyped reproduction of musical patterns.

Early 20th Century. At the turn of the century, American church musicians resisted the influx of secular tunes as a basis for liturgical music, while leading secular composers have turned to religious themes for their inspiration. Within the churches themselves there has been a multiple development: (1) congregational music using German chorale form and sung in unison; ancient motets adapted to congregational singing; Gregorian chants and hymn settings by contemporary writers; and (2) selections for the trained choir—an artistic repertory capable of expressing meaning congenial to the worship by the larger group. The Episcopal Hymnal (1940) contains the old Latin Office hymns in English, hymns by American authors, translations from Orthodox and German Pietist sources and German chorales.

The motu proprio of Pope St. Pius X (1903) restated the role of music in Catholic worship, admitting for use "everything good and beautiful . . . in the course of the ages." This decree, on the one hand, gave a final impetus to the revival of Gregorian chant, initiated earlier by the Benedictine monks of Solesmes. On the other hand, it heralded the return of Renaissance polyphony and encouraged modern composition. The LITURGICAL MOVE-MENT, through its interest in the congregation's participation, occasioned the reexamination of musical means and materials. The chant has come to be recognized as the highly artistic and difficult work it is, demanding the appropriate assignment to choir or partial use by the congregation. Hymnody received perhaps the closest scrutiny. A purging of 19th-century romanticist endeavors and a reconsideration of the wealth of Reformation and pre-Reformation hymns caused an artistic advance in hymnal publication. Contemporary composers, native and European, began to explore the area of congregational music for Catholic liturgies, a development that hastened after the liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican Council were implemented.

Bibliography: K. G. FELLERER, The History of Catholic Church Music, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Baltimore 1961). W. DOUGLAS, Church Music in History and Practice (rev. ed. New York 1962). R. N. SQUIRE, Church Music (St. Louis 1962). R. M. STEVENSON, Patterns of Protestant Church Music (Durham, N.C. 1953). L. W. ELLINWOOD, The History of American Church Music (New York 1953). Music in America, eds., W. T. MARROCCO and H. GLEASON, 1620–1865 (New York 1964). H. W. FOOTE, Three Centuries of American Hymnody (Cambridge, Mass. 1940, repr. Hamden, Conn. 1961). G. CHASE, America's Music (New York 1955). One Hundred Years of Music in America, ed. P. H. LÁNG, (New York 1961). Mission Music of California, ed. O. DA SILVA, (Los Angeles 1941). J.

V. HIGGINSON, "Hymnody in the American Indian Missions," The Papers of the Hymn Society XVIII, ed. W. W. REID (New York 1954). A Short Bibliography for the Study of Hymns, ed. J. R. SYDNOR, ibid. XXV (1964). C. VERRET, A Preliminary Survey of Roman Catholic Hymnals Published in the U.S. of Amer. (Washington, D.C. 1964). Alonso de Benavides' Revised Memorial of 1634, ed. F. W. HODGE et al., (Albuquerque 1945). L. M. SPELL, "Music Teaching in N. Mex. in the 17th Century," New Mexico Historical Review, 2 (1927) 27–36. L. B. SPIESS, "Benavides and Church Music in N. Mex. in the Early 17th Century," Journal of the American Musicological Society, 17 (1964) 144–156. L. SAMINSKY, Living Music of the Americas (New York 1949).

[C. VERRET/EDS.]

PART 10: PRE-VATICAN II LEGISLATION

Since apostolic times the Church has been careful to regulate the use of music in liturgical worship, encouraging fitting music and prohibiting unbecoming songs and chants.

History of Legislation. The directions of the Church on liturgical music during the early Christian centuries are contained in documents of a liturgical and disciplinary nature, rather than in separate acts of legislation on music. The first successor of St. Peter to write on music was Pope St. Clement (92–101), who regulated the use of chant. Only after Pope Leo IV (847–855) are separate documents on music to be found. In his Una Res he commanded Abbot Honoratus of the monastery of Farfa and his monks to sing only Gregorian chants.

In the Fathers. The Fathers of the Church forbade worldly and pagan music but commended worthy Christian songs and chants. They prohibited musical instruments that were associated with pagan music—the harp and lyre—and excluded lascivious and worldly songs as well as chanting by women, since this was a characteristic of pagan worship and was thought to foster sensuality rather than piety. The Fathers sought to encourage spirituality and devotion by the use of psalmody, for this allowed participation of the faithful in the worship of the church.

Conciliar Action before Trent. The Councils and synods of the Church have frequently legislated on liturgical music. Those held before the 14th century concerned themselves with the following questions: the entry of laymen into the office of singing the liturgical chant, the preservation of texts from Sacred Scripture and the exclusion of hymns and songs that contained heretical teachings, the preservation of the traditional chant of the Church, the condemnation of worldly and theatrical songs in church and cemetery (especially on the occasion of vigils and funerals) and the exclusion of worldly dances and themes. Principal among these councils and synods were those at Laodicea (343–381), Braga (561), Tours (567), III Toledo (589), Autun (650), Cloveshoe (747), Aachen (816), Rome (853), Trier (1227) and Rouen (1235). In 1324–25 Pope John XXII spoke from Avignon in the bull Docta sanctorum patrum and warned against the introduction of unbecoming elements in polyphony. Subsequent synods and councils reiterated the need to guard against the introduction of profane songs in the vernacular and unbecoming and worldly texts.

The Council of Trent. The reform of the liturgical books following the Council of TRENT (1545–63) involved the reediting of the missal and breviary. Further, the Ceremonial of Bishops, which contains directions for the conducting of pontifical ceremonies, was revised under Clement VIII and published in 1600. It described the rites and ceremonies to be observed at Masses, Vespers and other liturgical functions, as well as the rights of precedence. It contains many references to music.

The legislation of the Council of Trent concerning music was enacted at the 22d, 23d and 24th sessions. The principal points discussed centered upon the nonliturgical character of some church music, the curtailment and unintelligibility of liturgical texts and the insertion of nonchurchly vernacular songs, as well as worldly and lengthy organ compositions. These abuses were to be eliminated from the churches and care was to be given to the musical and liturgical education of clerics. Provincial councils were to determine the legislation in these matters, as seemed fitting according to particular circumstances.

After Trent. Legislation following the Council of Trent may be divided into two classes: general laws and particular indults for religious communities or dioceses. Only the laws that had general applicability will be listed here. They are the following: Alexander VII, Piae Sollicitudinis, 1657; Congregation of the Apostolic Visitation, 1665; Declaration of Cardinal Carpegna, 1692; Roman Council at the Lateran Basilica, 1725; Instructio Clementina, 1731; Clement XII, "Musicians in Pagan Worship," 1733; Benedict XIV, Annus Qui, 1749; Pius VI, "Choral Functions," 1791; Declaration of Cardinal Zurla (1824); Cardinal Odescalchi, "Notification," Declaration of Cardinal Patrizi, 1842, and Nov. 18 and 20, 1856; Congregation of Sacred Rites, Romanorum Pontificum, 1883; Congregation of Sacred Rites, "Regulations for Sacred Music," 1884; Congregation of Sacred Rites, Quod Sanctus Augustinus, 1894; Congregation of Sacred Rites, "Regulations for Sacred Music," 1894; and Congregation of Sacred Rites, encyclical letter to the bishops of Italy, 1894.

It can be said that the sources for the legislation on church music in effect at mid-20th century began with the motu proprio of St. Pius X, Nov. 22, 1903. The important documents between 1903 and the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican Council II are the following:

Canon 1264 of the 1917 Code of Canon Law; Divini cultus sanctitatem; Plus XI, Dec. 20, 1928; Musicae sacrae disciplina, Pius XII, Dec. 25, 1955; and "Instruction on Sacred Music and Sacred Liturgy," Congregation of Sacred Rites, Sept. 3, 1958.

Spirit of the Legislation. It is the mind of the Church that the faithful take an active part in both sung and recited Masses.

Sung Mass. Specific directions for participation in sung Mass are found in the 1958 "Instruction on Sacred Music and Sacred Liturgy" (par. 24–27), in which these three stages in the progress of the faithful toward active participation are given: (1) chanting of the liturgical responses, (2) singing of the parts of the Ordinary and (3) chanting some of the Proper of the Mass.

Recited Mass. The 1958 instruction (paragraphs 28–34) outlines four stages by which the participation of the faithful in recited Mass may be accomplished: (1) by saying the easier liturgical responses, (2) by answering the parts said by the server, (3) by reciting with the celebrant parts of the Ordinary and (4) by reciting sections of the Proper, i.e., Introit, Gradual, Offertory and Communion. Moreover, participation is to be effected by the singing of "hymns clearly suited to the respective parts of the Mass."

Basic Norms. The pre-Vatican II norms for music used at liturgical services were laid down by Pius X in the motu proprio of 1903. They are "holiness, true art, and universality." The specific types recommended are GREGORIAN CHANT, classical polyphony and approved modern compositions. Pope Pius XI repeated these principles in 1928, as did Pius XII in Musicae sacrae disciplina. But Pius XII enumerated distinctions between liturgical music and non-liturgical sacred music, and made provision for the performance of sacred music at nonliturgical occasions. The 1958 Instruction clarifies certain points on sacred concerts (par. 55), but in general preserves the norms of Pius X, Pius XI, and Pius XII.

Bells and the Use of Instruments. Pius X opposed the use of instruments in church (motu proprio, par.15–21) and Pius XI continued this policy, but Pius XII in Musicae sacrae disciplina (par. 58–61) relaxed this prohibition, allowing instrumental music that was executed artistically.

Use of the Organ. The motu proprio of Pius X (par. 15–18) encouraged the use of the ORGAN both as an accompaniment for the singing and as a solo instrument. Divini cultus sanctitatem (ch. 8) gave specific directions as to the correct manner of playing the organ. Musicae sacrae disciplina (par. 58) stated that the organ holds preeminence over all other instruments in church. The 1958 instruction (par. 61–64) distinguishes between the pipe organ, harmonium and electric organ. The electronic organ had previously (July 13, 1949) received a broader sanction from the Congregation of Sacred Rites than was stated in the 1958 "Instruction," according to which "the electronic organ may be tolerated temporarily." The 1958 instruction (par. 80) restricted the playing of the organ during those parts of the Mass when the celebrant prayed in a loud voice, in order that the readings might be heard clearly by the faithful.

Choirs and Women in Choirs. The motu proprio of Pius X stated that whatever singing does not pertain to the celebrant and sacred ministers "belongs properly to the choir of clerics, and that if singers are laymen they are substitutes of the ecclesiastical choir." Pius X stated that the singing must be, for the greater part, choral music, and that solos must never absorb the greater part of the liturgical text. In paragraph 13 he stated that "women cannot be admitted to the choir." This law was not well obeyed, especially in the U.S., where, as a result, women sang in choirs with the tacit permission of the bishops. Pius XI refrained from speaking on the subject, but Pius XII in Musicae sacrae disciplina (par. 74) modified the legislation of St. Pius X and allowed the use of mixed choirs or choirs of women or girls, so long as they remained outside the sanctuary and behaved in a suitable manner. The 1958 instruction especially mentioned choirs of men and women or of women or girls as being allowed.

Concerning Personnel. The motu proprio of Pius X (par. 12–14) described the office of choir members as a liturgical one and mentioned the high moral and spiritual qualities that should be possessed by those who sing in church, since they are substitutes for clerics. Pius X spoke of the proper attire of singers as that of cassock and surplice. He advocated the training of boys for the singing of the soprano and alto parts. Boys were to be trained in choir schools at cathedral and parochial churches, and they were to sing with the men. The 1958 instruction outlined the Christian qualities that should be present in the lives of singers, directors, organists, musicians and composers, as well as the necessary musical and liturgical training required for the proper performance of their duties.

Bibliography: P. M. FERRETTI, Papal Documents on Sacred Music (Washington 1928). A. HANIN, La Législation ecclésiastique en matière de musique religieuse (Paris 1933). R. F. HAYBURN, St. Pius X and the Vatican Edition of the Chant Books (Los Angeles 1964); Digest of Regulations and Rubrics of Catholic Church Music (rev. ed. Boston 1966). J. F. MYTYCH, Digest of Church Law on Sacred Music (Toledo, Ohio 1959). A. PONS, Droit ecclésiastique et Musique sacrée, 4 v. (St. Maurice 1958–61). F. ROMITA, Jus musicae liturgicae (Turin 1936). Les Enseignments pontificaux: La Liturgie, ed. Moines de Solesmes (Tournai, France 1954). Liturgical Conference, Manual for Church Musicians, ed. P. J. HALLINAN (Baltimore, Md. 1964). K. WEINMANN, Das Konzil von Trient und die Kirchenmusik (Leipzig 1919). G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). K. G. FELLERER, The History of Catholic church Music, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Baltimore 1961).

[R. F. HAYBURN/EDS.]

PART 11: SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL

Vatican Council II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Dec. 4, 1963) in ch. 4 gives a concise code of sacred music (musica sacra), without all the details given in previous Roman documents (notably Pius XII's encyclical Musicae sacrae disciplina, Dec. 25, 1955; and the Instruction Sacred Music and the Sacred Liturgy, Sept. 3, 1958).

The Role of Music in Liturgy. Chapter 4 begins by reaffirming the role of liturgical music: "The musical tradition of the universal Church is a treasure of inestimable value, greater even than that of any other art. The main reason for this pre-eminence is that, as a sacred song united to the words, it forms a necessary or integral part of the solemn liturgy." Thus any discussion of Catholic Church music must turn in great part on its function. This is described by the Constitution as triple: "expressing prayer more delightfully" (orationem suavius exprimens), "fostering unity of minds" (unanimitatem fovens) and "enriching sacred rites with great solemnity" (ritus sacros maiore locupletans sollemnitate). While this division of functions is neither complete nor devoid of overlapping, it does call attention to several values found in music generally, and it relates them to worship: the first suggests the role of music as "true art," insisted on in Pius X's motu proprio of 1903; the second stresses the socializing function of the liturgy; the third is a reminder of the stately and sacral qualities that befit public worship.

The Constitution speaks of the "ministerial function of music in the liturgy," rather than of "the handmaid of the liturgy," as Pius X had done earlier. This ancillary role and some of its implications had often been resented by musicians, who were pleased with the more significant term "ministerial." Both words, however, throw light on an obscure area. For while music must not be belittled as something adventitious, neither can its place in liturgy be altogether autonomous. Music for worship must be controlled by the requirements of those who are to use it as a means of prayer. Thus, in the normal heterogeneous parish, if music is to fulfill its ministerial function, it must not be entirely unrelated to the people's preparation of sensitivity. Nor, on the other hand, should the artistic level of liturgical music be low, and this for obvious reasons. It seems evident that this artistic-vs.-popular tension implies a zone of relativity, and can hardly be expected to achieve more than an unstable, shifting resolution.

The Role of the People. At the same time, the Constitution insists, more explicitly than its predecessors had done, on the role of "God's people" in the liturgy, recalling also the "hierarchical" (art. 28, 30, 32). Gregorian chant is acknowledged as specially suited to the Roman liturgy (liturgiae romance proprium), and "other things being equal" (ceteris paribus) should be given "pride of place" (principem locum). In this context it is not clear what ceteris paribus means; however, in view of the notably smaller stress placed on Gregorian chant in the Constitution, as compared with previous documents, it would appear that its place of honor is in great part speculative. At the same time, article 117 expresses the desire for new chant editions and for "an edition containing simpler melodies, for use in small churches."

Article 121 invites composers to "produce compositions which have the qualities proper to the liturgy, not confining themselves to works which can be sung only by large choirs, but providing also for the needs of small choirs and for the active participation of the entire assembly of the faithful." While in previous Roman documents popular hymnody had been allowed and occasionally encouraged, this new statement extends the use of music sung by the people. Following the Constitution's appearance and to fill its demands, a great number of "People's Masses" in the vernacular have appeared.

The Choir. "Other kinds of sacred music, especially polyphony, are by no means excluded from liturgical celebrations" (art. 116). It is evident that such music presupposes choirs, and the Constitution insists that "choirs must be diligently promoted" (art. 114). The earlier stress on Palestrina does not appear. To what extent this more elaborate music belongs in the liturgy will depend very much on the choral resources of individual churches; thus, article 114 adds "especially in cathedral churches." The same article insists, too, that "whenever the liturgy is to be celebrated with song, the whole body of the faithful be able to contribute that active participation which is rightly theirs, as laid down in Art. 28 and 30" (these two articles do not specify the parts, though they include at least responses and acclamations).

Instrumental Music. Instrumental music is given a wider range of use, following the severe restrictions set down (but, in subsequent practice, unevenly obeyed) by the motu proprio of Pius X. The special privilege of the pipe organ in the Latin Church is upheld, "for it is the traditional musical instrument which adds a wonderful splendor to the Church's ceremonies and powerfully lifts up man's mind to God and to higher things."

Other instruments require "the knowledge and consent of the competent territorial authority" and may be used "only on condition that the instruments are suitable, or can be made suitable, for sacred use, accord with the dignity of the temple, and truly contribute to the edification of the faithful." This article (120) gives cross references that indicate a deemphasis on uniformity in favor of fostering "the genius and talents of the various races and peoples." This broad missiological principle will need special application when Western countries are had in mind. Accordingly, after the Constitution appeared, the use of popular instruments (guitar, percussion and others) arose in several countries.

Bibliography: J. GELINEAU, Voices and Instruments in Christian Worship, tr. C. HOWELL (Collegeville, Minn. 1964). J. SAMSON, Musique et chant sacrés (Paris 1957). J. QUASTEN, Musik und Gesang in den Kulten der heidnischen Antike und christlichen Frühzeit (Münster 1930). C. J. MCNASPY, "The Sacral in Liturgical Music," in The Renewal of the Liturgy (New York 1963). J. MCKINNON, The Church Fathers and Musical Instruments (Doctoral diss. unpub. Columbia U. 1965). F. ROMITA, Jus musicae liturgicae (Rome 1947).

[C. J. MCNASPY/EDS.]

LITURGICAL MUSIC, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF

Introduction. In all official Vatican documents, the term "sacred music" is used to name the music used at. or appropriate for the liturgy. Musicam sacram (1967) expanded the current definition of sacred music beyond GREGORIAN CHANT and polyphony to include music indigenous to missionary countries. Like the categories "religious music" and "church music," "sacred music" has a broad and rather nebulous meaning which does not necessarily relate to the liturgy at all. The phrase "liturgical music" was introduced to correct the older understanding. Some liturgists have argued that the term "liturgical music" tends to subordinate liturgy to music, and have suggested an alternative term, "musical liturgy." Another term, "pastoral music," as used by the National Association of Pastoral Musicians, refers to all music used at the parish level (including music used in religious education, evangelization, social ministry, and music education), though the bishops' document Liturgical Music Today (1982) restricts the term to a liturgical context (#63-64). In order to clarify music's role in the liturgy, some writers toward the end of the twentieth century settled on the term "Christian ritual music," while others chose "Catholic liturgical music." In this entry, the term "liturgical music" encompasses all types of music used in all Christian liturgies.

This entry covers developments in the theology and practice of liturgical music in the Roman Catholic Church since the end of the Second Vatican Council. For the history and practice of Roman Catholic church music before Vatican II, see LITURGICAL MUSIC, HISTORY OF. The Second Vatican Council had paved the way for an interaction between reflection on liturgical music and the practice of liturgical music which was one of the most creative, challenging, and confusing in the history of church music. The new energy sparked by this interaction was reflected in musical composition and experiments in musical performance as well as in a fundamental shift in understanding both the liturgy itself and, subsequently, the role of liturgical music. That shift was caused not only by the introduction of the vernacular but also by the shift in primary responsibility for music from the choir to the whole assembly, and, more subtly, by the subsequent influence of culture on the music and the rite itself. Finally, this period engaged countless new musicians, trained or simply inspired, in the pastoral practice of church music.

The theoretical reflection on music took place in official documents issued by the Vatican and by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops as well as non-episcopal initiatives, both international and specifically American. The major Vatican documents, reflecting both the theology and practice of liturgical music, include Sacrosanctum Concilium (the Constitution of the Sacred Liturgy, 1962), the General Instruction of the Roman Missal (1969 and revisions), Musicam sacram (1967), and The Roman Liturgy and Inculturation: IVth Instruction for the Right Application of the Conciliar Constitution on the Liturgy (1994). The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops issued, either as a statement by the whole conference or by one of its committees, documents that also reflected both theory and practice. They include: Music in Catholic Worship (1972, rev. 1983), Liturgical Music Today (1982), and Plenty Good Room (1990). Documents issued as nonepiscopal initiatives include the Manifesto of Universa Laus (1980), the Milwaukee Symposia for Church Composers: A Ten-Year Report (1992), and the Snowbird Statement on Catholic Liturgical Music (1995).

The theology of liturgical music is embedded in the ecclesiology that is the foundation for Christian liturgy and in liturgical theology built on that foundation. While the development of ecclesiology and liturgical theology, which influenced the theology of liturgical music during this period of renewal, owed a great debt to individual theologians such as Dom Odo CASEL, Edward Schillebeeckx, OP, Karl RAHNER, SJ, and Edward KILMARTIN, SJ, this article examines the theology of liturgical music expressed in the literature described above. The few attempts by individual authors to craft a theology of liturgical music did not significantly influence the practice reviewed in this entry.

As important as the documentary reflection, therefore, was pastoral practice. The opportunities for new compositions, the involvement of new persons in ministry, the shift in a basic understanding of liturgy from the action of the priest, assisted by various ministers, to the action of the gathered assembly were not worked out only on paper; they were shaped and reshaped by pastoral practice. Musical practice significantly influenced both official and non-official documents, and, no doubt, the documents influenced practice. In addition to the major blocks of pastoral practice described here there are less noticed, but equally true, positions articulated in the documentation, including the Vatican documents, that advocate specific pastoral practices.

An Overview of the Theology of Music and Its Practice. Theology is the study of God and, in a Christian context, of God's involvement with humanity, including specific divine interventions on behalf of particular people in certain historical periods. The theological purpose or ultimate end of liturgical music falls within the general purpose of all liturgical action, which is to associate the church with Christ in the "great work wherein God is perfectly glorified and the recipients made holy (Sacrosanctum Concilium 7). The end of liturgical music, therefore, is "the glorification of God and the sanctification of the faithful" (SC 112, MS 4). Diverse interpretations of the way music is to accomplish this goal, using diverse approaches to music, have developed within the Catholic Church in the past 100 years. While all of these would agree that the ultimate end (finem) of liturgical music is its twofold transcendental and incarnational purpose, the ways in which God becomes personally manifests is widely debated. One approach focuses on an incarnational ecclesiology: By becoming fully human, one achieves the completion of humanity's teleology and reaches, through divine grace, participation in the divinity of God. Another believes that by transcending normal experience through participating, e.g., in an aesthetic experience, one is lifted toward union with the divine.

The function of liturgical music or, to use a scholastic theological term, its proximate end (the way music moves toward achievement of its ultimate end) is also debated among these various approaches. Within the official documents, the function (munus ministeriale) has been stated in diverse terms, reflecting the differing approaches to the theology of liturgical music which influenced those developing a particular document. One such approach would maintain that the three elements of holiness, beauty, and universality are key elements of any art used in the liturgy to achieve the transcendent goal of the act, so they are required as well of the musical art form used in liturgical worship. Another would maintain that "sacred music will be the more holy the more closely it is joined to the liturgical rite" (SC 112), emphasizing an incarnational approach to music. In short, there are disagreements even within the official documents regarding the function or proximate end of liturgical music.

By way of introduction, the theology of liturgical music has been profoundly influenced by "the doing" of music. For example, the use from 1907 to 1963 of the Liber Usualis, a collection of the official chants for the Eucharist and the daily offices prepared by the Benedictines of Solesmes "to ensure uniformity in the rendering of the Chant of the Church," profoundly determined an understanding by those who used this resource of the purpose (ultimate end) and function (proximate end) of liturgical music—not because of any theoretical statement or a rational reflection on experience, but because of the actual singing of the chants themselves and the experience of God which they created (or failed to create) in the participants. The theology of liturgical music, clearly, is shaped by its pastoral practice.

Second Vatican Council and Its Aftermath (1962–1972). The documentation for this period begins with Chapter VI of Sacrosanctum Concilium, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, approved by the bishops on Dec. 4, 1962. This chapter reflects two positions on sacred music which existed prior to the Second Vatican Council, drawn from two papal documents—Tra le sollecitudine (1903) and Mediator Dei (1947)—and especially from pastoral practice influenced by use of the Liber Usualis. Chapter VI, as already noted, defines the purpose of sacred music to be "the glorification of God and the sanctification of the faithful" (SC 112). The two positions mentioned above dealt with the ritual function (the munus ministeriale) of sacred music to achieve that purpose. The first position affirms that the treasury of sacred music is to be preserved and Gregorian chant is be fostered (SC 112, 114); the second states that the people's own songs are to be encouraged and due importance is to be attached to their music (SC 118, 119). So while the basic trust of the Council was to develop full, conscious, and active participation of the whole assembly as "the aim to be considered before all else" (SC 14), and despite the encouragement given to new compositions (SC 121), in accord with existing documentation the bishops gave pride of place to music from a treasury containing products of ages that, on comparison with the theology of liturgy articulated in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, do not represent an ideal in theological-liturgical thinking. That tension between the liturgical theology articulated at the Council and the recommended musical practices to express that theology did not take long to reveal itself.

In fact, the tension surfaced in 1966, at two important meetings of liturgical musicians in the United States.

The Fifth International Congress on Sacred Music of the Consociatio Internationalis Musicae Sacrae (Milwaukee, Wis., and Chicago, Ill., August 21–28) brought musicians from other nations into contact with liturgists and musicians in the United States for the first time since the Council. Later that year, a joint meeting of The Liturgical Conference and The Church Music Association of the United States (November 29-December 1, Kansas City, Mo.) brought together American liturgists and musicians representing two approaches to liturgical music: a recovery of the treasury of the past and the creation of a new repertoire based on the new theology of liturgy. Both meetings proved to be heated exchanges. The then Abbot Rembert Weakland, OSB, who chaired the U.S. Bishops' Advisory Board on Music, and who was present at both meetings, challenged the participants with an analysis of the Romantic influences underlying the assumptions regarding Gregorian chant and polyphony that existed in past historical documents as well as in Chapter VI of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy: "We cannot preserve the treasures of the past without coming to terms with the false liturgical orientations that give birth to this music, nor can we preserve them according to the false aesthetic judgments of the last century." The result of these meetings, particularly of the second, was that church music in the United States was committed to endorsing the innovative aspect of the Second Vatican Council regarding music, namely, the challenge to create a repertoire suitable for assembly participation through music in the vernacular. American musicians took up the challenge, whether they were classically trained composers such as C. Alexander Peloquin, ethnically based musicians such as Rev. Clarence Jos. Rivers, or popularly oriented writers such as Joe Wise and Carey Landry.

The growing struggle over correct application of the Council's principles did not go unnoticed by the Vatican. On March 5, 1967, the Sacred Congregation of Rites issued Musicam sacram, whose purpose was to provide clarification regarding "some problems about music and its ministerial function" (munus minsteriale, Musicam Sacram 2). Musicam sacram first reiterated the transcendent and imminent purpose of music, "for the glory of God and the sanctification of the faithful" (MS 4), then it expanded the definition of "sacred music" by including both Gregorian chant and sacred polyphony as well as the "sacred, i.e., liturgical or religious, music of the people" under one heading (MS 4). It thus united paragraphs 114-116 of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy with 118-119. Further, it offered a new description of sacred music: "Music is 'sacred' insofar as it is composed for the celebration of divine worship and possesses integrity of form" (MS 4). It followed this intentional definition of sacred music with a description of such music functions (or proximate ends) of sacred music (#5). Such music is used: (i) to provide a more graceful expression to prayer; (ii) to bring out more distinctly the hierarchic character of the liturgy and the specific make-up of the community; (iii) To achieve a closer union of hearts through the union of voices; (iv) to raise minds more readily to heavenly realities through the splendor of the rites; (v) to make the whole celebration a more striking symbol of the celebration to come in the heavenly Jerusalem.

Previously, in Tra le sollecitudine, Pius X had described the functions of sacred music to be holiness, beauty, and universality which produce an art form. In MEDIATOR DEI (1947), Pius XII stated a more emotional and eschatological view:

A congregation that is devoutly present at the sacrifice, in which our Savior together with His children redeemed with His sacred blood sings the Nuptial Hymn of His immense love, cannot keep silent, for "song befits the lover," and, as the ancient saying has it, "he who sings well prays twice." Thus the Church militant, faithful as well as clergy, joins the Hymns of the Church triumphant and with the choirs of angels, and all together, sing a wondrous and eternal Hymn of praise to the most Holy Trinity (#192).

A close reading of the functions named in Musicam sacram in comparison with these earlier statements, especially Pope Pius XII's evocation of the divine nuptial song and the heavenly liturgy, shows how the list of functions reflects an understanding of music that has shifted from Pius X's extra-liturgical measure of liturgical music as an art form to the more intra-liturgical understanding of music as "the more holy the more closely it is joined to the liturgical rite" (SC 112). In addition, Musicam sacram added a third element to the discussion, clearly influenced by pastoral practice: "The choice of the style of music for a choir or congregation should be guided by the abilities of those who must do the singing" (MS 9).

The revised Ordo Missae of Pope Paul VI and the accompanying General Instruction of the Roman Missal were first published in 1969, with a revised edition appearing in 1975. Unhesitatingly, the GIRM affirmed that "great importance should be attached to the use of singing at Mass" (General Instructions of the Roman Missal 19). Itself influenced by the experience of the previous five years, the General Instruction in turn influenced the developing theology of liturgical music by focusing its directives on a functional approach to music, as to other liturgical elements, providing specific directions regarding practice. This functional approach suggested that the theology and practice of liturgical music was to be determined by the liturgy itself and not by extra-liturgical factors. Therefore, the Instruction describes the function or purpose of each section of the liturgy and follows it with a set of practical instructions on how that function is to be expressed. For example, the general aim of the introductory rites is to help the faithful who have come together to "take on the form of a community and prepare themselves to listen to God's word and celebrate the eucharist properly" (GIRM 24). Within that general purpose, the role of the entrance song is "to open the celebration, intensify the unity of the gathered people, lead their thoughts to the mystery of the season or feast, and accompany the procession of priest and ministers" (GIRM 25). Then follows the practical instruction "The entrance song is sung alternately either by the choir and congregation or by the cantor and the congregation, or it is sung entirely by the congregation or by the choir alone . . . etc." (GIRM 26). By establishing a ritual function followed by the celebrative model, the General Instruction provides not only specific directives about what should be done but establishes the criteria by which the ritual act may be judged to be accomplished or not. Each element of the liturgy is similarly described in the General Instruction, providing criteria based on history and purpose whereby ritual participation can be measured against theological purpose. Slowly, but deliberately, these principles guided the creative development of the rite, freed from a false rubrical rigidity.

Liturgical music practice during this period in the United States was driven by three factors: the official generic encouragement of singing, especially congregational singing, the legal expectation of the General Instruction that at least some singing would be normative in the Roman Rite, and the need to discover or create a repertoire with vernacular texts. In the United States at this time, the focus was on English texts, though the need for musical settings of Spanish texts quickly became obvious as well. But there was little or no repertoire with English texts and certainly not settings of official liturgical texts in English. There was a significant effort to adapt Gregorian chant for use with vernacular texts, but it failed, and composers were ill-equipped to launch a massive and coordinated program of creating new music for English liturgical texts. Some settings of biblical texts, such as an English translation that used the psalmody developed by Joseph Gelineau, SJ, were used successfully, but interest soon turned in another direction. Urged on by the social and political climate of change in secular society, the primary influence on composers came from pop-folk music, either as an inspiration for "instant song" that could be readily learned (e.g. Ray Repp's "Here We Are" or "Sons of God") or as a direct borrowing from secular sources for liturgical use (e.g. "Michael, Row the Boat Ashore"). Universal and national legislation in 1969 permitted the use of "another song" for the entrance, presentation, and communion processions in place of assigned liturgical texts and the chant models that existed, e.g., in the Liber Usualis (see GIRM 26, 50, 56i; U.S. Appendix 2650, 56i). An available repertoire of such songs, and one that had already been used to a limited extent and masses before Vatican II, was the huge collection of Protestant hymnody, which became the mainstay of worship aids produced to support congregational participation. Once such resources became available, pastoral practice began to reinterpret the Council's call for full participation. While the liturgical documents envisioned participation as an engagement through ritual activity in the divine mysteries, with music as one way to assist such participation, pastoral practice often focused on participation as a call to get the people "more involved" in singing-mistakenly making singing the final end of the liturgy.

The Influence of Music in Catholic Worship. In 1972, the U.S. Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy issued the statement Music in Catholic Worship (MCW), confirmed by the full Conference of Bishops (and subsequently revised in 1983). This document established a theology of music based on a theology of celebration: "We are Christians because through the Christian community we have met Jesus Christ, heard his word in invitation, and responded to him in faith. We gather at Mass that we may hear and express our faith again in this assembly and, by expressing it, renew and deepen it" (MCW 1). Interior and exterior participation are understood as aspects of one act: "We are celebrating when we involve ourselves meaningfully in the thoughts, words, songs, and gestures of the worshipping community when everything we do is wholehearted and authentic for us-when we mean the words and want to do what is done" (MCW 2). And, boldly, echoing Pope Pius XII and subsequent documents: "People in love make signs of love, not only to express their love but also to deepen it. Love must be expressed in the signs and symbols of celebration or [it] will die" (MCW 4). Perhaps the most challenging statement for practicing musicians as for other liturgical ministers appeared in MCW 6: "Good celebrations foster and nourish faith. Poor celebrations may weaken or destroy it."

This document had the most significant influence on the American theology of music and its practice in the decades immediately after the Council, because it was profound and practical, and it engaged the American religious imagination. It also offered a threefold practical judgment as a way to "determine the value of a given musical element in a liturgical celebration" (#25): The judgement has three aspects—musical, liturgical, and pastoral: Is it good music? Does it relate to the liturgical function? Does my community sing it? This was, for the Catholic Church in the United States, the first document on inculturation.

As a result of the widespread influence of Music in Catholic Worship, pastoral practice began to shift. Whereas some communities had been invited to sing anything at the key processional moments of entrance, preparation, and communion (plus a closing song), now music was more often chosen to accord with the threefold judgment. There was additional attention paid to music with texts rooted in the Bible, especially to new responsorial settings of the psalms. In many parishes, communities began to sing the texts of the liturgy—especially the psalm and gospel acclamation in the liturgy of the word and the acclamations of the eucharistic prayer—and not simply sing at the liturgy.

Compositional practice also changed after 1972. In 1974, for example, the music of the group that came to known as the St. Louis Jesuits—John B. Foley, Dan Schutte, Roc O'Connor, Tim Mannion, and Robert Dufford—began to reshape an understanding of the kind of compositions that used contemporary popular musical idioms. Their texts grew from the Scriptures, poetically adapted but written specifically for use in the liturgy. Their musical craft was used to develop congregational song rather than choral or solo repertoire, and their melodic resonance with many assemblies was often instantaneous.

Through the selection of repertoire they print and distribute it, music publishers contribute significantly to pastoral practice and, therefore, to a developing practical theology of liturgy. In the decades after Vatican II, World Library Publications, later joined to the J. S. Paluch Co.; the Gregorian Institute of America (later GIA Publications); and The Liturgical Press served as the major sources of repertoire for hymnals and for choirs. They were soon joined by North American Liturgy Resources (NALR), the leading publisher of pop-contemporary music, which subsequently merged with Oregon Catholic Press (OCP). The publication of monthly or seasonal worship aids, including the Paluch Missalette and similar resources, provided a vehicle for the rapid turnover of repertoire as new approaches developed, but it also firmly established an experience of "disposable" music in many parish communities. Liturgical texts and practices as well as the sacred music repertoire developed a transient character as a result of the multiple ritual changes during these times, which encouraged a kind of congregational approach to the liturgical books: If Rome is changing things so rapidly, then there is little to which we must hold ourselves accountable in ritual practice, and we are free to craft our own approach. This attitude was only reinforced by the changing repertoire which, in turn, reflected a rapidly changing society. The identification of liturgical music with these necessary transitions from Latin and chant to vernacular texts and music, and from a priest-centered to an assembly-centered liturgy, united to the developing performance style of liturgical leadership in which the leaders, aided by sound enhancement technology, sang new materials with which the rest of the assembly was unfamiliar, created an experience of music in the liturgy closely identified with the role of music in secular society.

Eventually, about twenty years after Vatican II, progress toward a more stable repertoire, a better incorporation of the sense of assembly participation, and a focus on singing the liturgy, not just singing at the liturgy, combined with the increasing interest in a more stable parochial liturgical experience, began to shape parish communities in a commitment to ritual unity without uniformity, a stronger and richer understanding of the nature of ritual, and a better appreciation for the unique role that music plays in ritual celebration.

Founded July 1, 1976, in response to the need for training and supporting the growing number of parish musicians needed to serve a liturgy in which "great importance should be attached to the use of singing" (GIRM 19), the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF PASTORAL MUSICIANS has emerged as the major U.S. association of liturgical musicians and parish liturgists, providing a national resource for the formation of a wide and diverse range of pastoral musicians at the parish level. Annual meetings provide a forum in which current teaching regarding musical liturgy is presented and new repertoire and resources are reviewed. Pastoral Music magazine provides ongoing formation in the development of the theology of liturgical music and the clarification of pastoral practice, as well as providing a venue for identifying and developing leaders in the field of pastoral music.

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that this post-conciliar period was faced with several very practical tasks: (1) develop a repertoire in the vernaculars used in the nation; (2) teach the whole assembly—the congregation as well as its ministers—to participate; (3) revise the average parishioners' notion of God, the church, sacraments, and their own baptism. These tasks made use of and reshaped the theology of liturgical music. MCW's musical-liturgical-pastoral judgment provided a guideline for each parish community. Internationally, though it was not expressed by other hierarchies as it had been by the U.S. bishops, this threefold judgment in effect became the standard by which development of liturgical music was measured, though its application was influenced in various nations by tendencies in the national culture. So, for example, in the German community, with its history of great composers, from Bach through Beethoven and into the modern era, and its familiarity with great musical literature, instinctively approached the task of congregational singing through the use of quality music organically related to its tradition as uppermost in its musical consciousness. The French, on the other hand, with a strong background in contemporary scriptural and liturgical scholarship, enthusiastically took on the task of relating the music to the liturgy and began to emphasize music's ritual function. The Americans, characteristically, took a pragmatic approach, asking: Does the assembly sing it? These different approaches reflect an emphasis on one or another aspect of the threefold judgment as well as an understanding of music for the liturgy as "sacred," "liturgical," or "pastoral."

The International Attempt at a Theology of Liturgical Music (1980 to 1990). In 1980, UNIVERSA LAUS (UL), an international group for the study of singing and instrumental music in the liturgy, published a report of its work since its formal organization in 1966. The first part of the document, "Music in Christian Celebration," contains "points of reference" by which to view the relationships between music and Christian liturgy. The second part of the document—"Beliefs Held in Common"—establishes 45 one-line statements reflecting the international community's view of such music. This document provides a wealth of information regarding the developing theology of Christian ritual music in the 25 years after Vatican II.

First, the document names the "ultimate goal" of this music:

The demands made by Christian ritual music spring from the ultimate goal of this music, which is to make manifest and make real a new humanity in the risen Jesus Christ. Its truth, worth, and grace are not only measured by its capacity to arouse active participation, nor by its aesthetic cultural value, nor its long history of acceptance in the church, nor by its popular success, but because it allows believers to cry out the Kyrie eleisons of the oppressed, to sing the Alleluias of those restored to life, and to uphold the Maranatha of the faithful in the hope for the coming of the Kingdom' (UL 10.1).

It also draws a conclusion about how one is to judge the appropriateness of music for incorporation into the liturgy. The UL Document and its official commentary explain that "common expressions such as 'sacred music,' 'religious music,' or 'church music' have broad and rather nebulous meanings which do not necessarily relate to liturgy at all." It concludes: "No type of music is itself profane, or sacred, or liturgical, or Christian: but there do exist types of ritual music in Christian worship. Christians do not possess a kind of music separate from other people, but they make use of each type of music in their own particular way."

The overall theological premise of Universa Laus regarding ritual music is stated in the following terms. (1) Christian worship consists of: (a) the proclamation of salvation in Jesus Christ; (b) the response by the assembly of believers; and (c) the making real, by action, of the Covenant between God and humankind. (2) Music is integrated into these different components of worship: (a) to support and reinforce the proclamation of the Gospel in all its forms; (b) to give fuller expression to professing one's faith, to prayer (intercession) and to the giving of thanks; (c) to enhance the sacramental rite in its dual aspect of action and word (UL, "Points of Reference" 1.2).

Further, the document affirms:

Music is not indispensable to Christian liturgy, but its contribution is irreplaceable. A celebration is a whole; and all of its elements—musical and non-musical—are interdependent. When music takes place within a rite, it always affects the form and the signifying power of the rite As a symbolic sign, singing and music play a role above and beyond determined ritual functions (UL, "Beliefs Held in Common," 21–26).

As the new vernacular versions of Roman Catholic worship began to take hold and reshape our understanding and practice of worship, a new era has been opening up in the continuing encounter between worship and culture. This new era has directed the main thrust of UL's work toward the study of "ritual function" within the Roman Rite. But the recognition of the continuing impact of culture has shifted that focus to a deeper study of the effective "functioning" of these same musical moments within particular cultures. Thus, the fields of human behavior, social customs, and cultural differences became a focus for studies of ritual music. This meant that the fields of semiology, cultural anthropology, and sociopsychology had to be incorporated, as well, into a study of music under the sign of faith.

The statement Liturgical Music Today (LMT), published by the U.S. Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy in 1982, was an attempt to articulate principles governing the function of music in the liturgy and function and form of various musical elements (LMT 6–11). In fact, Liturgical Music Today provided practical directives for new situations which had arisen since the publication of Music in Catholic Worship.

This statement appeared at a time when the successes as well as the failures of pastoral practice with the revised rites were causing a re-examination of the experience as well as the theory that was operative before the Council. "On the eve of the Council," LMT summarized the pastoral practice since 1903, "few parishes were performing the authentic repertoire recommended by Saint Pius X in his famous motu proprio on music" (LMT 51). Conceding that most parishes used only a limited amount of the chant and polyphony repertoire that had been encouraged by every pope from Pius X to the Second Vatican Council, and many parishes since the Council have failed to embrace this commended repertoire, LMT notes that many parishes are employing diverse styles of liturgical music within the same celebration. Affirming this eclectic approach to repertoire which had grown up in practice, LMT proposed a new understanding of the traditional repertoire and its use. Rather than commending it as high art, and therefore the most appropriate music for Roman Rite liturgy, LMT placed this repertoire in the context of historic faith and worship: "Singing and playing the music of the past is a way for Catholics to stay in touch with and preserve their rich heritage. A place can be found for this music, a place which does not conflict with the assembly's role and the other demands of the rite" (LMT 52). A blend of music from the past and new music composed for congregational participation was proposed as both a pastoral ideal and a practical application of liturgical music's function (munus ministeriale).

This was also a time when the Church in the United States and throughout the world was becoming aware of the impact of various cultures on the way liturgy is celebrated. So Liturgical Music Today also affirmed the value and significant impact of diverse languages and cultural differences on liturgy in the United States (LMT 54–55).

On the matter of music ministry, LMT begins with a theological statement that would have been highly controverted just twenty years before: "The entire worshiping assembly exercises a ministry of music" (LMT 63). The document then turns its attention to pastoral practice by addressing the musicians in terms of a theology of their ministry:

Some members of the community, however, are recognized for the special gifts they exhibit in leading the musical praise and thanksgiving of Christian assemblies. These are the pastoral musicians, whose ministry is especially cherished by the Church. What motivates the pastoral musician? Why does he or she give so much time and effort to the service of the church at prayer? The only answer can be that the church musician is first a disciple and then a minister. The musician belongs first of all to the assembly; he or she is a worshiper above all. Like any member of the assembly, the pastoral musician needs to be a believer, needs to experience conversion, needs to hear the Gospel and so proclaim the praise of God.

Thus, the pastoral musician is not merely an employee or volunteer. He or she is a minister, someone who shares faith, serves the community, and expresses the love of God and neighbor through music' (#63–64).

In these years, pastoral practice in the United States was influenced by more sophisticated composition and by a wide range of styles in musical repertoire. The British St. Thomas More Group, with Christopher Walker and Paul Inwood, brought to the U.S. a new level of craft in popular pastoral music. Together with U.S. composers J. Michael Joncas, Marty Haugen, and David Haas, they introduced into the liturgy music techniques from secular culture, especially from Broadway-style musical forms. More classical forms were also being reshaped based on the renewed liturgical theology and pastoral practice. These included attempts at a new style of chant for use with English texts. Richard Proulx's Community Mass and Marty Haugen's Mass of Creation began to create an "American standard" for common eucharistic acclamations. A wide range of styles setting responsorial psalms was being published, though most compositions followed the pattern of providing an antiphon for the congregation with verses for the cantor or choir. Liturgical music practice was beginning to stabilize in many parishes.

American Attempts at a Theology of Liturgical Music in the 1990s. Following the nation's experience with the civil rights movement, the immigration of Vietnamese and Hmong people following the Vietnam War, Cuban immigration, the arrival of Mexican and other Spanish-speaking immigrants, and a new wave of immigrants from Asian Pacific nations, existing American liturgical practice was severely challenged to develop an appropriate way to deal with multi-lingual and multicultural/multi-ethnic expectations for pastoral liturgy. The Vatican Council had directed openness in these matters: "Even in the liturgy the Church has no wish to impose a rigid uniformity in matters that do not affect the faith or the good of the whole community; rather, the Church respects and fosters the genius and talents of the various races and peoples" (SC 37).

Though Music in Catholic Worship (1972) may be considered the first document to address liturgical inculturation for the Catholic Church in the United States, the first document to address the multi-cultural challenge to worship in U.S. Catholicism appeared in 1990. Plenty Good Room: The Spirit and Truth of African American Catholic Worship (PGR, Aug. 28, 1990), produced by the Black Catholic Secretariat of the United States Conference of Bishops, contained reflections on music in the Black Church. It notes, especially, that people of African-American heritage "do not sing only to make music" (PGR 3).

Like most of the American Catholic documents, PGR affirms the symbolic nature of liturgy: "First, one cannot arbitrarily make symbols—they are not merely things. They become symbolic because of their resonating with the members of a given historical, cultural, ethnic, and racial community. They can assume levels of meaning that make sense of birth, life and death—by means of tradition, community and grace" (PGR 5). The statement applies this symbolic understanding to liturgical music:

A person may be particularly moved by the singing of a certain hymn . . . Were they asked, "what do these symbols mean?" they respond "I don't know. I didn't even know they were symbols." This would not imply that they have not experienced meaning in their symbolic activity. They have, for symbols are truly multidimensional phenomena (#9).

In other words, the measure of successful repertoire is not whether a particular piece is a "hit" but whether it succeeds in the order of religious symbolism.

As described in PGR, the theology of African American music (PGR #101–104) centers on the active presence of the Spirit and on improvisation. Singing becomes the effective sign of the Spirit's presence and also the ritual act that evokes the Spirit: "This congregational response becomes a part of the ritualized order of the celebration. The deadly silence of an unresponding assembly gives the impression that the Spirit is absent from the community's act of praise" (PGR 102).

The function (munus ministeriale) of African American sacred song, as Sister Thea Bowman noted, is holistic, participatory, real, spirit-filled, and life giving. She describes those characteristics this way: (i) Holistic: Challenging the full engagement of mind, imagination, memory, feeling, emotion, voice and body; (ii) Participatory: inviting the worshiping community to join in contemplation, in celebration, and in prayer; (iii) Real: celebrating the immediate concrete reality of the worshiping community—grief or separation, struggle or oppression, determination or joy—bringing that reality to prayer within the community of believers; (iv) Spirit-filled: energetic, engrossing, intense; and (v) Life giving: refreshing, encouraging, consoling invigorating, sustaining.

In part as an attempt to analyze the experience of multi-cultural and multi-repertorial musical liturgy, a group of composers met for ten years in Milwaukee (1982–1992) at the suggestion of Sister Theophane Hytrek, SSSF, and under the sponsorship of Archbishop Rembert Weakland, OSB. On July 9, 1992, they issued The Milwaukee Symposia for Church Composers: A Ten-Year

Report (MS). This document brought the elements connected with Christian ritual music contained in the Universa Laus Document to the attention of musicians in the United States and set out to describe a theology of ritual music, since it affirmed that "a theology of Christian ritual music is necessary." While such a theology "may be implicit in some of the official documents," MS states, "there has been little explicit attempt in these documents to fashion such a theology" (MS 10).

MS attempts to establish the major elements of such a theology in articles 11-17. The paschal mystery, of course, is central, though it is to be seen as the climax of the "'liturgy of the world . . . which God celebrates' through the length and breadth of human history" (MS 11). This mystery is expressed and shaped in symbols: "While our words and art forms cannot contain or confine God, they can, like the world itself, be icons, avenues of approach, numinous presences, ways of touching without totally grasping or seizing." Christian liturgy is a symbolic event, and music takes part in that symbolic activity, particularly in four ways: (i) music as sound, the raw material of music, reveals God in a non-localized, symbolic way; (ii) music is rhythmic and, therefore, timebound; it "underscore[s] the temporality of human existence into which God has intervened." In this temporal aspect, music becomes one with the very nature of the liturgy; (iii) music heightens words. Because word reveals God in the liturgy, music has a heightened role in the liturgy; and (iv) music uniquely unites singer to song, singer to those who listen, and singers with each other: "Christian ritual song joins the assembly with Christ, who is the source and content of the song. The song of the assembly is an event of the presence of Christ. What fuller expression of the sacramental nature of Christian ritual music, especially the song of the assembly?"

In its theology of liturgical music, the Milwaukee Statement abandons the scholastic language of purpose and function. In addressing a wide range of issues connected with pastoral practice, MS reflects the concerns of the composers about liturgical formation, liturgical preparation, liturgical structures and forms, textual considerations, cross-cultural music making, models of music making, and technology. It describes accurately how pastoral practice and the theology of music interacted in the years after the Council:

First we experienced an effort to translate Latin chants into English. We then moved from vernacular chant to attempts at contemporary composition in popular idioms. Other developments included emphasis on scripturally based texts, the adoption of repertoire from the broader Christian community, and a growing awareness of the need for improved standards in musical and textual composition. In each of these developments, a primary concern has been music's ministerial role. Increasingly, we are coming to understand how a rite and its sound, its music, are inseparable: serving, enabling and revealing aspects of our belief that would otherwise remain unexpressed' (MS 4).

The statement also offers a way to treat the musical-liturgical-pastoral judgment of MCW as one integrated judgment rather than as three separate judgments (MS 81–86), finally uniting efforts that had previously been divided by a concentration on one aspect of this judgment as primary, leaving the other two as secondary: "An integrated approach to the musical-liturgical-pastoral judgment demonstrates that no single musical element can be evaluated apart from the whole of the liturgical-musical contour" (MS 84).

In 1994, issues raised by inculturation received a formal response from the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments in the Instruction The Roman Liturgy and Inculturation (RLI). This document affirmed the importance of music and singing and reiterated the liturgical importance of music native to "mission lands" (RLI 40). The statement also noted the importance of paying attention to the text that is to be sung: "It is important to note that a text which is sung is more deeply engraved in the memory than when it is read, which means that it is necessary to be demanding about the biblical and liturgical inspiration and the literary quality of texts which are meant to be sung (RLI 40). Recognizing the growth of the church in areas less influenced by European Catholicism and Western music, such as Asia and Africa, RLI commented not only on the use of indigenous "musical forms, melodies, and musical instruments" but also on the incorporation of "gestures and postures" appropriate to the culture, including "hand-clapping, rhythmic swaying, and dance movements on the part of the participants. Such forms of external expression can have a place in the liturgical actions of these peoples on condition that they are always the expression of true communal prayer of adoration, praise, offering and supplication, and not simply a performance" (RLI 42). This document also expressed a growing concern on the part of Vatican officials that an approach to music as "entertainment" was replacing a legitimate respect for religious "delight."

The American dialogue on the purpose and function of music in the liturgy continued with the publication, on Nov. 1, 1995, of a statement by a small group of liturgists and musicians meeting in Utah. Titled The Snowbird Statement, this document entered into dialogue with the Milwaukee Symposia report and current pastoral practice. Snowbird affirmed the category of ritual music as an appropriate way to describe music in the liturgy, but it warned against reducing that category to a kind of practical functionalism.

As a corrective to perceived problems with current practice, the Snowbird Statement offers a series of principles that serve to articulate an underlying theology of music in the liturgy. (1) Beauty is essential in the liturgical life and mission of the Church. (2) Standards of excellence in composition and performance must be affirmed. (3) Of the three judgments described in MCW, the musical judgment has not been advanced with sufficient development, indicating a belief by the signatories that an objective judgment may be made about musical quality. (4) While endorsing cultural adaptation, the statement rejects any approach that would inject an entertainment attitude or a therapeutic ethos into the liturgy. The Snowbird signatories encourage singing music from the Church's treasury, and they emphasize the need to develop or re-develop choirs for Catholic liturgy.

Many of the points made in Snowbird are based on the premise that there is a Catholic liturgical "ethos":

We believe there exists a characteristic ethos of Catholic liturgical music, although we acknowledge that such is difficult to define. To identify the ethos narrowly with any specific period or genre in liturgical-musical history would be a mistake. The church is not intrinsically limited to any particular "sacred" style of music for the celebration of the liturgy. Still, we believe that a Catholic ethos is discernible, for instance, in music that elaborates the sacramental mysteries in a manner attentive to the public, cosmic and transcendent character of religion, rather than in styles of music that are overly personalized, introverted or privatized. Music employed by countless generations of Catholic Christians is the starting point for discerning the characteristics of a Catholic ethos in liturgical music. In response to the church's developing needs and the many new cultural contexts within which the church worships, the ethos of Catholic liturgical music will continue to find new expressions. This process of development, however, should consult pre-existing forms to a greater extent than has generally been the case in recent decades. We advocate that new forms and styles grow organically from extant forms which display a Catholic ethos (#8).

Conclusion. The theology of church music and its practice have profoundly influenced the period immediately following the Second Vatican Council. More Christian believers have participated in the practice of church music in these years, as ministers and as members of the singing assembly, than in almost any other era of Church life. A perfect solution to linking the treasury of sacred music to the requirement for assembly music has not been found, but there is a great awareness that an organic link to the treasury is beginning to develop. An agreed upon theology of ritual music does not exist, but efforts have been made to begin the process of developing such a theology. A new repertoire for assembly participation is not complete, but it is well on its way. Pastoral practice is by no means stable, but considerable effort has been made toward a workable model, and a large core of competent musicians, skilled at the craft of assembly song, are serving the Church. The theology of liturgical music and the pastoral practice associated with it will continue to develop as we strive to make music for the glory of God and the sanctification of the faithful.

Bibliography: W. M. ABBOTT, SJ, ed. The Documents of Vatican II (New York 1966). C. DUCHESNEAU and M. VEUTHEY, Music and Liturgy: The Universa Laus Document and Commentary, tr. P. INWOOD (Washington 1992). R. F. HAYBURN, Papal Legislation on Sacred Music: 95 A.D. to 1977 A.D. (Collegeville, Minn. 1979). E. HOFFMAN, ed. The Liturgy Documents: A Parish Resource. Vol. 1. (Chicago 1991). International Commission on English in the Liturgy. Documents on the Liturgy, 1963-1979: Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Texts (Collegeville, Minn. 1982). C. JONES, G. WAINWRIGHT, and E. YARNOLD, SJ, eds. The Study of Liturgy (London 1978). The Liturgical Conference and the Church Music Association of America, Crisis in Church Music? (Washington 1967). D. A. LYSIK, The Liturgy Documents: A Parish Resource, Vol. 2. (Chicago 1999). The Milwaukee Symposia for Church Composers: A Ten-Year Report (Washington 1992). "The Snowbird Statement on Catholic Liturgical Music." Pastoral Music 20:3 (Feb.-Mar. 1996): 13-19.

[V.C. FUNK]

LITURGICAL RITES

Throughout the ages, the liturgical celebration of the mystery of salvation has received many different ritual expressions, bound historically to various areas of ecclesiastical influence. This article treats the differentiation of rites and the ritual families.

DIFFERENTIATION OF RITES

The starting point in the evolution of Christian liturgical families was necessarily the paschal meal that Christ ate with His Apostles. Despite the simplicity of that scene, the depth and richness of the mystery inaugurated at the Last Supper ultimately accounts for the variety that subsequently adorned its celebration. It is true that up to the fourth century there were no rites in the strict sense of clearly fixed patterns followed by well-defined groups; the extant evidence suggests that extemporization within set patterns was the usual practice (see Bouley, From Freedom to Formula).

The task of tracing the exact path of evolution in the first three centuries is greatly hampered by incomplete sources, but it is more and more agreed that the fourth century was a time of great importance in the development of the liturgy. The increase of Christians after Constantine's rule necessitated further organization, encouraging a trend toward uniformity. The threat of Arianism and other heresies were further causes for standardizing orthodox forms of worship. These factors were intimately intertwined with another fourth-century phenomenon: the emergence of preponderant centers of authority in matters of Church discipline. These great metropolitan or patriarchal sees became centers of more or less particular liturgical rites, and this in turn intensified the trend toward writing down and gathering together the texts used. Liturgical books were thus created. The saying of improvised prayers gave way to the reading of set formulas, so that the borrowing of texts from one church by another was greatly facilitated; and a mother church could easily impose a fixed order of worship on daughter churches. Liturgical books can thus be seen as instrumental in establishing both uniformity and diversity in the history of the liturgy: uniformity among the churches of a province that came to use the same books, and diversity by that very fact among groups of churches that embraced different collections of texts.

Classification. In this evolution of liturgical families it should be noted that the root principle of diversification was not language or doctrine or nationality, although all of these were influences, but geopolitics. Already at the time of St. Paul, the concentration of Christianity was in the chief cities of the Empire, and these became the great centers already spoken of; in general, rite followed patriarchate.

There are different ways of attempting to classify liturgical families, a fact that can create confusion. It is artificial and misleading to select elements other than their historical origins as the basis, but even when this is agreed upon, the outcome can be different, depending on whether one's chief interest is with the past—what rites have existed—or the present—what rites have survived. In the former approach, for example, the Byzantine liturgical rite appears merely as one of several developments of the Antiochene tradition, while in the latter it is set apart in a class by itself as the greatest, most extensive, and most influential of all the modern Eastern rites.

LITURGICAL FAMILIES

The chief division of liturgical families is the same as the chief geopolitical division of the ancient world: East and West.

Eastern Liturgical Rites. Since Christ lived in the East, the oldest practice of the Christian liturgy is also from the East. With the destruction of Jerusalem in 70

A.D., Christianity in the East centered in Antioch and Alexandria.

Antiochene. The Syrian type of liturgy had two traditions in apostolic times. The more Jewish strain kept the traditional language and, as seems quite likely, ultimately centered in Edessa. This is known as the East Syrian (Mesopotamian, Persian) branch, because its members were outside the Roman and within the Persian Empire. This Edessene liturgy retained many of the Semitic traits and was little influenced by Hellenism. The East Syrian liturgy is used by three churches of the Christian East: the ancient Assyrian Church of the East, the Chaldean Catholic Church, and the Syro-Malabar Church.

The West Syrian branch has been the more influential; it blended a fair amount of Greek influences with other elements borrowed from other liturgical families. The splendor of processions, vigils, and singing that characterizes it gives it a markedly different atmosphere than the more Semitic East Syrian branch.

The fifth century, however, brought a division within the West Syrian branch that had a curious and unfortunate outcome. With the condemnation of Monophysitism at Chalcedon in 451, national instincts and political dislikes for Byzantium contributed to the rejection of the Council by many. These Syrian Monophysites, known as Jacobites, soon adopted Syriac as the liturgical language, and a great period of development followed with the borrowing and creating of numerous compositions. The liturgical rite, called SYRIAN, thus acquired a richness and variety unparalleled elsewhere, boasting more than 70 Anaphoras. However, the group that accepted the orthodoxy of Chalcedon formed themselves into the MELKITE CHURCH. This group retained the Greek language and came more and more under the influence of Constantinople, until in the 12th century it finally lost its particular West Syrian liturgy and adopted the Byzantine as its own liturgical rite.

Another church that uses the West Syrian liturgical rite is the MARONITE CHURCH of Lebanon. Its early history is obscure; never Monophysite, this Church has been in direct contact with Rome since the Crusades, and its liturgy has suffered from heavy latinization, especially since the 18th century, although in the wake of Vatican II, steps have been taken to retrieve its rich ancient liturgical heritage.

Of all the Eastern liturgical families, the Byzantine rite is today the most important by far. This leads many to treat it separately, but historically it belongs to the West Syrian family. Since Constantinople was founded by Constantine in the fourth century, it obviously had no primitive liturgy of its own, but had to borrow or create one. The many ties between Antioch and the imperial city naturally led to the liturgical usages of the former being the principal influence upon the latter, and St. John Chrysostom (native of Antioch, but bishop of Constantinople) had much to do with the process.

The mid-ninth century marked the beginning of a period of unification and regulation of this rite throughout the empire. The two most important developments were (1) its translation into Slavonic by SS. Cyril and Methodius, when it was adopted as the liturgy of the newly converted Slavs, and (2) the Baptism of the prince of Kiev, St. Vladimir, more than a century later, opening to this rite a new province that was to become the huge empire of Russia. Subsequently the Russian missionaries carried it across central Asia as far as Manchuria, China, and Japan. The Byzantine rite thus became the most fully developed liturgy of the East, undergoing an evolution of ten centuries. Drawing into itself elements from many sides in its formation, it subsequently reversed the procedure, pushing out to replace all the rest of the liturgies in the churches within the Empire that remained orthodox after Ephesus and Chalcedon. A further development, one of latinization, took place in those dioceses that recognized papal oversight at the end of the 16th century, resulting in a hybrid liturgy.

Armenian. The distinctive ARMENIAN LITURGICAL RITE has a complex and by no means fully known history. Since the Middle Ages, however, it has been considerably modified, first by the Byzantine influence, and since the Crusades, by the Latin.

Alexandrian. Ever since the days of Alexander the Great (three centuries before Christ), Alexandria, in Egypt, was the rival of Antioch. This was so in the early centuries of the Christian Era too. The development of the Egyptian liturgy, known as the Liturgy of St. Mark, parallels the West Syrian development. The reaction after Chalcedon was much the same: mass desertion to Monophysitism and adoption of the vernacular, in this case Coptic. Yet as in Syria, there may well have been two kinds of liturgies from the start, one in Greek, the other in Coptic. After the Monophysite crisis, monasticism exercised an even greater influence on the evolution of the Coptic liturgy than on the Byzantine.

The liturgy of Ethiopia is derived from the Coptic, but with Syrian elements. Its ancient history has been the subject of much ongoing study. The Ethiopian liturgy is of special interest today, since it reveals some remarkable elements of adaptation to African cultures.

Western. The diversity of liturgical forms thus seen in the East was also found in the West. Rome was the outstanding center, although other cities, such as Milan and Carthage, vied for attention. In the third and fourth centuries there was a change from Greek to Latin, and in contrast to what happened in the East, Latin soon became the sole liturgical language of the West. The evolution of liturgical families in the West, except for Rome, is not so clearly tied to metropolitan sees as in the East. There are two broad families: Gallican and Roman-African.

Gallican. The precise origin of the GALLICAN RITES has long been disputed. Within the heterogeneous group loosely called the Gallican liturgy, the following types are usually enumerated, although they were surely not the only forms of this liturgy that were more or less independent.

The old Spanish, later called (inaccurately) MOZARA-BIC RITE or sometimes the Visigothic Rite, is exceptional in that it was built according to clearly stated principles. Its sources are obscure, but it was already fully developed by the sixth century. It shows the influence of the battle against the Arian Visigothic invaders of the fifth century. Suppressed by Pope Gregory VII after the Christian reconquest of the Iberian peninsula from the Muslims, the dying liturgical rite was resuscitated by the decision of Cardinal F. XIMENEZ DE CISNEROS (d. 1517) to preserve this ancient liturgy for use in a chapel of the Toledo.

The CELTIC RITE, the historical liturgical rite used in the British Isles in Ireland and Scotland and propagated by their monks, seems to have had little original about it except its ability to weave together all manner of local and foreign elements. Missionaries and papal legates bearing the Roman Rite dealt a deathblow to this ancient rite, as churches and monasteries were either persuaded or compelled to switch to the Roman Rite.

The GALLICAN RITES, called so because it was used in the Frankish realm, was probably of greater variety than is often supposed. Because of suppression under Charlemagne in favor of the Roman rite, only limited witnesses survive.

Roman-African liturgical rites. The other great Western family is the Romano-African type. Of the liturgy of Africa, however, no complete documents or liturgical books are preserved. Reconstructions from the writings of Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine, and others show that it was closely allied to the Roman.

Ambrosian. The AMBROSIAN RITE, although permeated with elements of the Roman liturgy, has succeeded in preserving the essentials of its traditional practices and has thus kept alive one of the oldest forms of Western liturgy. Scholars often classify it as a Roman-type Latin liturgical rite, with good reason, since it sometimes preserves elements of older Roman usage abandoned at Rome. Indeed, St. Ambrose of Milan wrote that he followed the Roman usage (rite); however, he insisted that it is reasonable to adopt some practices from other Churches (De sacramentis, 3.1.5). Other Italian rites, such as that of AQUILEIA and BENEVENTO, have also flourished.

Roman Rite proper. The earliest liturgical witnesses in Latin of the Roman Rite that are earlier than the seventh century are the LEONINE SACRAMENTARY (Veronense) and Old GELASIAN SACRAMENTARY (Vat. Reg. Lat. 316). Surviving fragments of liturgical texts suggest that the basic text of the Roman Canon was already worked out in the fourth century and the framework of the whole Mass was essentially set by the turn of the fifth. The last major reform, especially of the Mass, was under Gregory the Great. While his name is still connected with the music used in the Roman rite, in reality much of this chant took its origin considerably later in the monasteries of the Rhineland. Whatever the exact nature and scope of his reform, however, this was indeed the golden age of the Roman liturgy, when it was sufficiently evolved to express the manifold aspects of the Christian mystery and was still a rite in which the whole community took conscious active part. It was also the time of its greatest prestige, when it was more and more adopted by other churches. This process of expansion was hastened first by Pepin, then by Charlemagne, who worked energetically to impose it on their whole territory. The pontifical Sacramentary sent by the pope and used as the basis for this unification, the work of supplementing done by Alcuin, the multitude of manuals (Ordines Romani) produced in the reorganization, all this is more fully explained in the article ROMAN RITE. The ancient Roman rite was considerably modified. Curiously enough, a few centuries later history reversed itself when the Germanized Roman Pontifical made its way back to Italy, replacing the older usages by the end of the 11th century.

The liturgical reform undertaken by Innocent III marks a turning point in the history of the Roman liturgy. The period was hampered by a preference for allegory and legalism, under which the original meaning of the actions was lost and yet their smallest details prescribed, so that the appreciation of the liturgy as the communal and hierarchical celebration of the whole Church was more and more replaced by juridical preoccupation with the task to be performed. Under the influence of the Mendicants, the sanctoral cycle grew and theological controversy over the Real Presence abetted new currents of Eucharistic piety that brought new rites such as the Elevation of the Host.

Historically, various religious orders had their own liturgical rites that were derivatives of the Roman Rite with some elements borrowed from the Gallican Rites.

(See CARMELITE RITE, CARTHUSIAN RITE, DOMINICAN RITE and PREMONSTRATENSIAN RITE.) During the Middle Ages, liturgical usage developed adaptations of the Roman Rite in the British Isles, the most famous of which is the SARUM USE. Other examples include the YORK USE and HEREFORD USE.

The riches of the liturgy remained enshrined in the Roman liturgical sources, awaiting recovery, but the misfortunes of the 16th-century division deterred the Council of Trent's reform from doing much more than solidifying the general status quo. Benedict XIV initiated a more critical reform, but it was interrupted, not to be resumed until the 20th century under Pius X, more extensively under Pius XII, and finally on a wholesale basis by Vatican Council II.

Bibliography: A. A. KING, The Rites of Eastern Christendom, 2 v. (London 1950); Liturgies of the Past (Milwaukee 1959). A. KING, Liturgies of the Religious Orders (London 1955). J. A. JUNG-MANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55); The Early Liturgy to the Time of Gregory the Great, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Notre Dame, Ind. 1959). D. ATTWATER, The Christian Churches of the East, 2 v. (rev. ed. Milwaukee 1961–62). B. BOTTE, "Rites et familles liturgiques," L'Église en Priere (Paris 1965). H.A.J. WEGMAN, Christian Worship in East and West: A Study Guide to Liturgical History (New York 1985). C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources (Washington, DC 1986).

[J. J. MEGIVERN/T. RICHSTATTER/EDS.]

LITURGICAL THEOLOGY

The theological task arising from Christian worship is multifaceted. Its starting point is neither dogmatic affirmation, nor, strictly speaking, liturgical text, but rather the living Church actively engaged in the worship of God. Likewise, its final goal is not merely to understand the various dimensions of worship, but in addition to return that understanding to the Church's life and prayer.

Place and Character. Liturgical theology must intersect with other branches of theology, e.g., ecclesiology, Christology, and soteriology, particularly insofar as their own theological truth unfolds in the act of worship. It must examine current and past liturgical texts, as expressions of theological understanding and as texts whose meaning and purpose is to be activated as Christian worship. Liturgical theology must engage many disciplines and many methodologies, but its enduring concrete focus on the living worship of the Church is both its unifying principle and its distinguishing characteristic.

As a branch of theology it is both systematic and pastoral. It is systematic in that it explores the doctrines of faith which liturgy articulates in its own way (lex orandi est lex credendi) and examines these doctrines in relation to their other formulations. Liturgical theology also explores fundamental theological questions relating faith to prayer and Revelation to proclamation. It is pastoral because liturgical theology always speaks from and to the Church at prayer. It cannot rest content with the inner logic of a reflective methodology. The truth which unfolds in liturgical theology must finally be validated in the experience of worship itself.

Development. Liturgical theology evolves upon several relationships which hold between faith, the liturgical event, and reflective theology. These can be specified as: faith related to liturgy and liturgy related to theology.

Faith and Liturgy. A dialectic relationship exists between faith and liturgy. Vatican Council II in the Constitution on Sacred Liturgy articulated the dual movement of this dialectic when it affirmed that liturgy expresses faith (movement from faith to liturgy) and, at the same time, instructs or informs faith (movement from liturgy to faith) (Sacrosanctum Concilium 59). Liturgical theology must engage both movements of this dialectic.

The first movement is addressed in the attempt to understand the inner contours of the faith experience as it comes to expression in symbolic action. This is a complex hermeneutical task, partially fulfilled by phenomenological description, e.g., describing the inner movement of Eucharistic Prayers and the full significance as commitment and surrender of the people's Amen. The task is further advanced by anthropological and psychological studies into the nature and behavior of ritual, and by investigations into the power of language to evoke affections, motivation, and commitment. In short, liturgical theology at this point attempts to determine the conditions under which people successfully enter and engage in liturgical prayer, and the dynamics by which faith seeks ever new modes of liturgical expression.

Liturgical theology likewise seeks to understand the effect liturgy has upon faith. Vatican II gives two directions for this investigation: "In the liturgy the sanctification of the People of God is manifested by signs perceptible to the senses, and is effected in a way which is proper to each of these signs. . "(ibid. 7). Sanctification signals all that God in Christ has done and continues to do for us. It embraces liberation from sin, growth in holiness, and a promise of final victory over death. Vatican II affirms that this is not a mysterious, behind-thescenes activity of God. Rather, it is spoken to human awareness and accomplished in human life in recognizable ways.

Liturgical theology seeks therefore to understand the liturgy as accomplishing this twofold function, viz., to manifest and effect sanctification. For the first, it attempts to understand the nature of proclamation with deep respect for the mystery of God, the evocative thrust of symbolic language, and the cognitive dimension of human awareness. For the second, it investigates the profound truths of the Christian faith, conscious that not only is the liturgy the place where these truths unfold, but that the inner dynamics of the liturgy reveal the process by which they unfold.

Liturgy and Theology. A similar dialectic relationship exists between liturgy and theology, which liturgical theology likewise investigates. The movement toward theology recognizes the liturgy as a privileged source (locus theologicus) for understanding the Church, its sacramental actions, and its fundamental creeds. This line of investigation is perhaps the most developed, and represents the original scope of liturgical theology (see LITUR-GICS). The introductions and texts for the revised rites encourage this kind of investigation, since they embody far more of the Church's rich tradition than the liturgical books they replace.

The converse movement toward the liturgy involves the return of theological insight to the Church at prayer. Reflective theology brings forth explanation which, by the very fact that the liturgy continues to be celebrated in the Church, must likewise take on the nature of promise. The truth of theology must be sought in worship, and its function to give faith something to look for in worship needs to be understood well. Theology's return to worship is the final task of liturgical theology.

Bibliography: A. KAVANAGH, On Liturgical Theology (Collegeville, Minn. 1992). K. W. IRWIN, Context and Text: Method in Liturgical Theology (Collegeville, Minn. 1994). P. F. BRADSHAW, ed., "Liturgical Theology" Studia liturgica 30 no. 1 (2000) [entire issue devoted to the papers on "Liturgical Theology" presented at 17th Congress of Societas Liturgica, Kottayam, India, 19–24 August 1999].

[P. E. FINK/EDS.]

LITURGICAL VESSELS

Containers used in liturgical worship. Most of them originated from practical utensils that, because of their use in the liturgy, came to be set apart from non-liturgical use by blessings or consecrations, and were often elaborated artistically. The most important liturgical vessels are the CHALICE AND PATEN, which contain the Eucharistic elements both before and after Consecration at Mass; the CIBORIUM, to contain the consecrated hosts intended for distribution in Communion; the MONSTRANCE, which enables the faithful to venerate Blessed Sacrament at Exposition, Benediction, or during processions; and the PYX, used for taking Communion to the sick. Cruets are vessels used to carry wine and water to the altar. The censer or thurible is used to contain burning incense at high Masses, at Vespers, Benediction, and other services. At first censers were mere pots fitted with perforated lids, but by the 4th century some were made of metal and suspended on chains so that they could be carried in procession and swung.

Bibliography: J. BRAUN, Das christliche Altargerät (Munich 1932). R. AIGRAIN, "Les vases sacrés." Liturgia (Paris 1930) 261–299, passim.

[C. W. HOWELL/A. D. FITZGERALD/EDS.]

LITURGICAL VESTMENTS

In early centuries of Christianity the dress the clergy used for liturgical functions was the same as the ordinary clothes worn by the laity. It was the attire of Greco–Roman civilization: the tunic, an undergarment fastened at the neck and tied with a belt at the waist, and the mantle, an outer garment wrapped around the body. Even in the 4th century, though clerical liturgical vesture was frequently made of better material and in a more refined cut, it actually varied little from ordinary clothing. During the barbarian invasion there came a change in fashion, but the clergy kept to the old style. With the growing difference in costume, liturgical vesture acquired a symbolic value in much the same way that some modern secular modes of dress have become a sign of a particular profession.

In the Middle Ages vestments gradually became more ornate and colorful with the introduction of brocades. These splendid fabrics tended to be so heavy and unyielding that it became necessary to reduce the cut of the outer vestments in order to allow for freedom of movement. This had its disadvantages, however, for abbreviated garments looked less like clothing and deprived the priest of a very important means of setting off his central role in the sacred action. In the 19th century a movement to restore the ample cut was started for purely aesthetic reasons. Whereas at first (1863, 1925) the Congregation of Rites showed little favor to vestments not in current use at Rome, in a decree of 1957 it left the matter to the judgment of ordinaries.

For more information on specific liturgical vestments, see AMICE, ALB, STOLE, CHASUBLE, MANIPLE, COPE AND HUMERAL VEIL, DALMATIC, BIRETTA, and SURPLICE.

Bibliography: J. BRAUN, Die liturgische Gewandung im Occident und Orient (Freiburg 1907); Die liturgischen Paramente in Gegenwart und Vergangenheit (2d ed. Freiburg 1924). E. A. ROULIN, Vestments and Vesture, tr. J. MCCANN (Westminster, Md. 1950). R. LESAGE, Vestments and Church Furniture, tr. F. MURPHY (New York 1960). E. HAULOTTE, Symbolique du vêtement selon la Bible (Paris 1966). C. E. POCKNEE, Liturgical Vesture: Its Origins and Development (Westminister, Md. 1961).

[M. MCCANCE/A. D. FITZGERALD/EDS.]

LITURGICAL YEAR IN ROMAN RITE

The liturgical year consists of the series of feasts and seasons celebrated by the Church. It begins at First Vespers of the first Sunday of Advent and ends on the Saturday before the First Vespers of that Sunday. It is inserted into the civil solar year without depending on it, for its principal date, that of Easter, is calculated according to the lunar calendar. Easter is the Sunday after the full moon of the Jewish month (Nisan) after the vernal equinox.

Theology

By means of her liturgical year the Church seeks to redeem time and make it serve humanity's quest for union with God. A feast day, the opposite of an ordinary day, was from the very beginning a holy, sanctified day, a special day intended to focus the attention of the faithful on Christ and the mystery of His salvation so that they can live in accordance with His spirit. The celebration of the liturgical year revolves about the person of Jesus Christ and the paschal mystery of his suffering, death and resurrection. The celebration of Marian feast days and the memorial of the saints and martyrs do not detract from this principal focus of the Church's liturgical year in Christ and the mystery of salvation.

Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy explains the relationship of the liturgical cult of Mary and the Saints to Christ in the liturgical year in the following manner: "In celebrating this annual cycle of Christ's mysteries, holy Church honors with special love the Blessed Mary, Mother of God . . . in whom the Church holds up and admires the most excellent fruit of redemption, and joyfully contemplates, as in a faultless image, what she herself desires and hopes wholly to be. The Church has also included in the annual cycle the memory of the martyrs and other saints. . . . By celebrating the heavenly birthdays of these saints the Church proclaims the paschal mystery achieved in the saints who have suffered and been glorified with Christ. She proposes them to the faithful as examples drawing all to the Father through Christ, and through their merits she pleads for God's favors' (ibid. 103, 104).

General Development

In the concrete unfolding of its annual commemorations the liturgical year is identified with the calendar containing the feasts of our Lord (temporal cycle) and of the saints (sanctoral cycle).

Origin of the Calendar. In the beginning the calendar of saints had a strictly local character; it was a catalogue of anniversaries celebrated in a given church or diocese. By means of mutual borrowings of one calendar from another, general calendars arose, thus preparing the way for the 1568 universal calendar of Pius V. Over the centuries saints' feasts were unduly multiplied. Pius V had purged many feasts of saints, retaining only 87 in the Tridentine liturgical calendar, but beginning with Clement VIII (d. 1605) there was an uninterrupted increase of saints' feasts. Despite the recommendations of Vatican Council I, the universal calendar at the beginning of the 20th century listed 266 feasts. In his bull Divino afflatu of 1911, Pius X, without touching the content of the calendar, gave precedence to the temporal cycle. Nonetheless, new feasts were added so that in 1955 there were 338. The decree of March 23, 1955, resulted in somewhat of a reduction: 39 semidoubles became simples, while all simples became commemorations, and the number of octaves were cut. The 1969 reform of the Roman Calendar under the mandate of Vatican II pruned the number of feasts from 338 to a more manageable 191.

Classification of Feasts. A whole hierarchy of feasts was gradually elaborated as their number increased. In the first place a distinction is made between feasts of Our Lord and those of the saints (the Blessed Virgin included, see MARIAN FEASTS). The dedication of a church is classified as a feast of the Lord; several saints' feasts, however, were introduced on the occasion of the dedication of a church (e.g., St. Michael, Our Lady of the Snows, and SS. John and Paul) and were subsequently regarded as belonging to the category of saints' feasts.

Normally, feasts celebrate the anniversary of an event: an historical mystery of Our Lord or Lady, the dedication of a church, and the earthly birth of only three persons, Christ, Mary, and John the Baptist. For other saints the Church commemorates the anniversary of their death, called "birthday" into heaven, sometimes their "exaltation," or the official recognition of their title to veneration, and even occasionally the finding and transfer of their relics.

In the course of centuries idea-feasts have also been introduced. Although once very numerous, only a few remain in the universal calendar: Holy Trinity, Sacred Heart, Corpus et Sanguinis Christi, and Christ the King.

Some feasts are observed on the same day each year; other feasts are movable, as a result of their computation based on the lunar cycle. Among the latter are Easter and feasts that are related to its cycle. Current canonical provisions permit local bishops' conferences, with the approval of the Holy See, to transfer certain solemnities and days of obligations to a Sunday.

Until 1960 feasts were classified as doubles of the first class, doubles of the second class, major and minor doubles, semidoubles, simples, and commemorations. The 1960 reform of liturgical rubrics simplified this system considerably to categories of first, second, third, and fourth class, and commemoration. The 1969 reforms of the Roman Calendar further simplified the system to categories of solemnities, feasts, obligatory memorials and optional memorials.

In a reform promulgated in 1955 the number of octaves—festal celebrations prolonged for eight days—was reduced to three: Easter, Pentecost, and Christmas. Formerly there were 18 in the universal calendar—without counting those in particular calendars—and they were classified in a very complicated fashion. The 1969 reform of the Roman Calendar further reduced the number of octaves to two: Easter and Christmas, the two principal solemnities of our Lord.

Temporal Cycle

The liturgical year actually comprises two principal parts or cycles, the temporal and the sanctoral. Although these two cycles are parallel and intertwined, the temporal, because of its Christological foundations and focus, always takes precedence over the sanctoral.

Over and above the feasts honoring the historical events of redemption and other feasts of Our Lord, this cycle comprises all the Sundays of the year and certain weekday observances.

The Week. Among Christians SUNDAY is nothing else but a weekly celebration of the paschal mystery, that central event of salvation history that marked off for good the first day of the week. Eight days after Christ's Resurrection the apostles assembled to recall the event, and the Jerusalem community remained faithful to this weekly observance. In the beginning Christians participated in the Jewish Sabbath service and had their Eucharistic assembly on Sunday. But toward the end of the 1st century they made the Jewish element a part of the one Sunday observance.

Following the Hebrew idea of sanctifying weeks, the Church designated the days of the week simply by numbers, Sunday being the first day. In reaction to the pagan practice, Christians called them feriae. But it is only in the liturgy that this term was preserved; in everyday life names of pagan origin held sway.

Two weekdays stood out in Christian observance, i.e., Wednesday and Friday. At the end of the 1st century the Didache reported them as fast days; in the following century they were also days of prayer. It was thus that Christian antiquity universally observed them. Friday is just as venerable a Christian institution as Sunday; from the very beginning it bore a penitential character recalling the Savior's death. In the West, however, fasting on these two days began to give way between the 6th and 10th centuries. The fasts on Wednesday and Friday of Ember weeks alone remained, but even in this case the fast was mitigated. (See EMBER DAYS; FAST AND ABSTINENCE.) They were also days of prayer; at first the prayer was private, but soon it was held in common and enjoyed a variety of forms according to time and place. In most places these liturgical stations (see STATIONAL CHURCH) were held without the celebration of Mass; Mass was allowed on these two days in the West beginning only with the 6th century.

The attitudes of the churches toward Saturday were quite divergent. Some areas, out of aversion for Jewish practices, allowed no religious observance at all; others—at least in the West—from the 3d century on made it a fast day in commemoration of the Holy Saturday fast. Beginning with the 10th century there spread in the West the custom of honoring the Mother of God in a special way on Saturday. The votive Mass of the Blessed Virgin for Saturdays was inserted in the Carolingian Sacramentaries. In the 12th century it was to be found in the Missal of the Lateran, and the devotion was definitively approved by Pius V.

Paschal Cycle. The most important celebration of the Liturgical Year is that of Easter. (See EASTER AND ITS CYCLE.) In the beginning, Christians commemorated the death and Resurrection of Christ every Sunday, but in the 2d century they began to celebrate this central mystery of redemption on its anniversary. Since the 3d century its celebration has lasted for 50 days, the final day of which, Pentecost, enjoys a solemnity on a par with Easter. Very soon a fast went before and coincided with the observance of Christ's Passion and death. The duration of the fast was lengthened, and thus arose the period of preparation.

Triduum. Originally Thursday of HOLY WEEK was not regarded as part of the Sacred Triduum (three-day observance); only Friday, Saturday, and Sunday were included in this term. The term "Pasch" also has changed meaning; it was not restricted to Easter Sunday. In the first three centuries Pascha designated the annual commemoration of the Passion and death of Christ, in the 4th century the EASTER VIGIL too, and in the 5th century, only Easter Sunday. According to A. Baumstark there were two primitive conceptions of Easter: the Pasch of the cross and the Pasch of the Resurrection (Comparative Liturgy, tr. F. L. Cross [London 1958] 168–174; see B. Botte's critique of this in "Pascha," L'Orient syrien 8 [1963] 213-226). As O. Casel has shown ("Art und Sinn der ältesten christlichen Osterfeier," Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft 14 [1938] 1-78), Easter was an indivisible feast of the events of salvation; it celebrated the Redemption achieved by both the Passion and the Resurrection. In the course of the centuries the ceremonies of the Easter Vigil were removed from the night of Holy Saturday, and it was then that Thursday came to be regarded as part of the Triduum. This led people to see only the death of Christ in the Triduum and thus to dissociate His death and Resurrection, two aspects of the unique salvific mystery.

Easter Vigil. Until 1951 the rites of the Easter Vigil had been anticipated on Saturday morning. Returned to the night time, they regained their true significance. The two essential parts of the celebration are baptism, by which all peoples are initiated into Christ's Church and the mystery of Christ's dying and rising is realized in them, and the Eucharist, the living memorial of this death and Resurrection. The other ceremonies—the blessing of the new fire, paschal candle and Exsultet, the readings, blessing of baptismal water, the Christian initiation of catechumens and the profession of faith—revolve about these two pivotal points.

Good Friday. The Passion is more specifically stressed in the GOOD FRIDAY celebration. To the elements peculiar to the ancient aliturgical synaxis (the readings and prayer of the faithful) are added the Veneration of the Cross and the Communion service.

Holy Thursday. Holy Thursday was the last day of the 40-day fast, later the first day of the Easter Triduum. The restored rite of 1955, combining elements of both the ancient papal liturgy and the Roman parish liturgy of the 7th-8th centuries, comprises a Mass for the consecration of holy oils and an evening Mass with the Mandatum, or washing of feet, and a Eucharistic procession.

Palm Sunday. Eight days before Easter the Church begins Holy Week with a celebration of PALM SUNDAY. In 1955 the special ceremonies of this day too were simplified in order to bring out more pointedly the Messianic theme of Christ bringing victory and life out of defeat and death and to thus set the stage for the dramatic unfolding of the events of Redemption.

Preparation for Easter. In order to take part in the Easter celebration more worthily, the early Christians observed an especially rigorous fast during the Sacred Triduum. Later this fast was gradually extended to three weeks, to the 40 days of LENT (at the end of the 4th century), and to seven weeks beginning with Quinquagesima Sunday (at the start of the 6th century). Toward the end of the 6th century Sexagesima week appeared, and at the beginning of the 7th century Septuagesima week. In addition to the Sundays, the weekdays of Lent were gradually fitted out with liturgical celebrations, first the Wednesdays and Fridays, then (in the 5th century) the Mondays, Tuesdays, and Saturdays. From the 6th century on these synaxes included the Eucharistic celebration, but the Thursdays remained aliturgical until the 8th century. From the very beginning this period had a double aspect: baptismal and penitential. The 1969 reforms removed the Sexagesima and Septuagesima weeks, returning the observance of Lent to its ancient pattern beginning with Ash Wednesday.

Paschal Time. The Easter octave existed already in the 4th century; the formularies of this week center around Christ's Resurrection and the faithful's share in it through baptism. Originally paschaltide was a continuous 50-day celebration of the Resurrection (the word "Pentecost" means 50 days). Formularies of this season pursue the general theme of the divine life coming to the human race through Christ. The jubilation of Easter is manifest in the constantly repeated alleluias, the use of white vestments even on ferias, and—in ancient times—the prohibition against kneeling and fasting. This joyful season is brought to a glorious conclusion in celebrations of Christ's ASCENSION and His sending the Holy Spirit on His Church.

Christmas Cycle. The series of feasts whose object is a special commemoration of Christ's infancy and childhood made its appearance rather late under a variety of influences. (See CHRISTMAS AND ITS CYCLE.)

Christmas and Epiphany. These are the two Christian feasts of the winter solstice. The celebration of Christmas is of Roman origin and dates from around 330. It had been customary for Roman pagans to gather at Vatican hill to worship deities of the East; the choice of December 25 (Natalis Invicti) and St. Peter's Basilica for the celebration of the feast shows that the Church's aim was to oppose a Christian feast to that of the Sol invictus (unconquered sun), the symbol of paganism's resistance. The Feast of EPIPHANY, although arising in similar circumstances, was of Eastern origin. It appeared in the West first in Gaul (c. 361), then at Rome. By the middle of the 5th century both feasts had been accepted practically everywhere, for they complemented each other, their themes changing slightly in the process. In both East and West the Christmas season came to a close with the Feast of CANDLEMAS.

Advent. The term was one of profane origin, but for the early Christians (as in the Vulgate) it meant the coming of Christ into the human world: His coming in the flesh to inaugurate the Messianic era and His coming in glory to initiate the eschatological age. Advent designated also the same reality as natalis (birthday) and epiphania (manifestation). Little by little, however, the term came to be applied to the liturgical period preceding Christmas. During the 5th century there evolved in Spain and Gaul an ascetical preparation for the feast. At Rome Advent made its appearance in the second half of the 6th century as a liturgical institution from the first, and went from six to four weeks. Although it was intended from the start as preparation for Christmas, Advent did not appear as the beginning of the year in liturgical books until the 8th-9th centuries. Today, although it is intended as a joyous preparation for the feast of the Lord's birth, Advent naturally turns the thoughts of Christians toward His glorious return at the end of the world.

Ordinary Time. The term tempus per annum (literally, "time through the year," generally translated as "Ordinary Time," or sometimes as "Ordinal Time") is officially used by the Church to designate the days from the day after the Feast of the Baptism of Our Lord (usually January 13) to Ash Wednesday and from Monday after Trinity Sunday to the Saturday before the First Sunday of Advent. Thematically, however, the Sundays after Epiphany really belong to the Christmas cycle. The same cannot be said of the Sundays after Pentecost; the history of the liturgy sufficiently proves that they have no direct link with Pentecost. The system for numbering these Sundays varied from church to church; it was the Carolingian liturgical books of the 9th and 10th centuries that started numbering them as Sundays after Pentecost. Furthermore, the very structure of these Sundays reveals a system of continuous reading of at least the Epistles (see PERICOPES). Historically, the ancient processional chants of the Mass are divided into two blocks: those from the 1st to the 17th Sunday are taken from the Psalms according to the order of the Psalter; those from the 18th to the last Sunday are antiphons habitually composed from other books of the Bible. On the other hand, the ancient orations for the 5th to 20th Sundays are borrowings from the older stratum for Sunday Masses in the GELASIAN SACRAMENTARY. Hence one cannot even claim that there is an internal unity that exists the cycle of the post-Pentecost Sundays in Ordinary Time.

Sanctoral Cycle

Alongside the temporal cycle run the feasts of the saints; the series of their anniversaries is called the SANC-TORAL CYCLE.

Martyrs. The origin of the cult of martyrs is not to be found in the hero-honor paid heroes and gods in pagan antiquity. Already SS. Jerome (Contra Vigilantium; Patrologia Latina, 23:342–343) and Augustine (Civ. 22.10; Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 48:828) raised their voices against such an interpretation. Early reports show that uppermost in the minds of Christians was the desire to provide a decent burial for the victims of persecution. At least at first the funerals of Christian heroes were not essentially different from those of other deceased Christians; the same is true of the observance of their anniversaries. But after the peace of Constantine, Christian worship underwent a great development, manifested, among other ways, in the celebration of martyrs' feasts. Their names were inscribed on the DIPTYCHS, and the dates of their anniversaries were carefully noted in local calendars.

In the 4th and 5th centuries the veneration of martyrs began to shed its local character as Christian communities began to admire the heroes of other churches. Many factors contributed to this evolution: the diffusion of relics, the panegyrics of great orators of the 4th and 5th centuries, the Passionaria of martyrs, the books of their miracles, and pilgrimages. Furthermore, the churches of Gaul, under the influence of Charlemagne, copied the Roman liturgical books and the calendar of saints contained in them.

Confessors and Ascetics. The ancient Church paid a martyr's honors also to those who, even though they had not shed their blood for Christ, had nonetheless suffered torture, imprisonment, or exile for Him; they were called confessors. This broadening of the concept of "martyr" marked the first step in the extension of the cult of saints. From honoring such confessors as martyrs the Church soon went to honoring as confessors first ascetics and then bishops.

When the persecutions were over, generous souls still sought ways and means of attaining to the perfection of charity even though it was no longer possible to shed their blood for the Lord. The Desert Fathers looked upon their isolated and penitential life as a substitute for martyrdom. It is not to be wondered at that upon their death such heroes of asceticism received the same veneration as martyrs.

Virgins and Holy Women. Consecrated virginity is a superior form of asceticism. Hence very early the faithful venerated a number of holy nuns. Widowhood, when spent in the service of the Church, is also a form of asceticism that merits to be honored as martyrdom. For a long time, however, virgins and holy women received the Church's official honors only because they were martyrs, e.g., the two Felicitys, Perpetua, Agnes, Agatha, and Lucy. Others were inserted in the calendar with the title of martyr thanks to legend; still others, as foundresses of Roman titular churches, came to be thought in time as having suffered martyrdom, e.g., Pudentiana, Praxedes, Sabina, and Cecilia.

Bishops. The great bishops of the first centuries often crowned their episcopal administration by means of martyrdom. Others were ranked among the confessors of the faith because they either suffered torture, undertook their grave responsibilities in time of full persecution, or engaged in heavy, demanding missionary endeavors. St. Gregory the Wonder Worker (d. 270) was the first bishop not a martyr to receive the honors of cult. Other bishops, e.g., SS. Basil, Martin, and Paulinus, attracted the veneration of the crowds mainly because of their monastic activity. Alongside the calendar containing the anniversaries of martyrs, each church kept a distinct list of bishops' anniversaries for celebration. Practically speaking, the difference between these two types of anniversary must have been rather vague, since the title of saint had not yet been clearly determined, and the liturgical formularies were still improvised.

Marian Feasts. Although devotion to Mary began very early, there is no evidence of a feast in her honor until the middle of the 5th century. This is perhaps because liturgical veneration of the saints was always in connection with their tomb; Mary had none.

The octave day of Christmas seems to have been the first feast of Our Lady in the Roman rite, commemorating the Feast of Mary, Mother of God. Although suppressed in the Middle Ages, the feast was restored in the 1969 reform of the Roman Calendar. The emperor Maurice (d. 602) made the Feast of the Assumption obligatory. Pope Sergius I (d. 701) made the Feast of Mary's Nativity one of the four calling for a stational procession.

Marian feasts became increasingly numerous in the course of the centuries. In fact, one even spoke of the "liturgical year of Mary." Idea-feasts became more numerous in honor of Mary than in honor of the Lord, especially in the last few centuries. Many of these feasts were reduced to optional memorials in the 1969 reform of the Roman Calendar.

Vatican II's Reform of the Roman Calendar.

Mysterii paschalis, the title of the accompanying motu proprio of Paul VI, well described the general thrust of the revised Roman Calendar published by decree of the Congregation of Rites on March 21, 1969. In accordance with the terms of reference given in chapter 5 of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, the feasts of the Lord that commemorate the mysteries of salvation are given preference over the feasts of the saints. In order that the Proper of the time may truly take precedence, the number of saints' feast days for the universal Church has been sharply reduced. The Calendarium Romanum consists of General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar and the General Roman Calendar, both of which correspond to the revised Roman Missal in which they are reprinted and to the revised Liturgy of the Hours. An unofficial commentary prepared by the Consilium and two simplified forms for the Litany of the Saints are also included in the editio typica of the Roman Calendar.

Proper of the Time (Temporal Cycle). The weekly observance of the paschal mystery occurs every Sunday, the first day of the week, the Lord's day, "the original feast day" commemorating Christ's Resurrection. Because of its primordial significance, the celebration of Sunday is replaced only by solemnities and feasts of the Lord, and not even these during the seasons of Advent, Lent, and Easter. Although the liturgical day normally extends from midnight to midnight, the Church following biblical usage observes Sundays and solemnities beginning with the evening of the preceding day: an observance that explains the rationale behind First Vespers and the anticipated Sunday Mass on Saturday evening.

Paschal Cycle. What Sunday is to the week, the solemnity of Easter is to the liturgical year. So that the faithful may properly appreciate the Easter triduum not simply as a preparation for Easter Sunday, but as a unit commemorating in Augustine's words the sacratissimum triduum crucifixi, sepulti et suscitati—the total paschal mystery of Christ's Passion and Resurrection, the Easter triduum begins with the evening Mass of the Lord's Supper on Holy Thursday, reaches its high point in the Easter Vigil, and closes with Vespers on Easter Sunday.

The original meaning of the Easter season has been restored: 50 days between Easter Sunday and Pentecost celebrated as one feast day, sometimes called "the great Sunday." The Sundays of this season are reckoned as Sundays of Easter and following the Sunday of the Resurrection are appropriately called the Second, Third, Fourth, etc., Sundays of Easter. In order that Pentecost Sunday might recover its pristine importance as the culmination of the Spirit-filled Easter season, and not specifically the anniversary of the coming of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles, the Octave of Pentecost as well as the celebration of the Vigil of Pentecost on the preceding Saturday morning have been suppressed.

The season of Lent, the 40 days beginning with Ash Wednesday, has been underscored as a time of preparation for Easter with its ancient twin motif of baptismal preparation/recommitment and penitential conversion. To this end the superfluous Septuagesima season and misleading period of Passiontide have been deleted.

Christmas Cycle. Second only to the annual celebration of the Easter mystery is the Christmas season, which celebrates the birth of the Lord and his early manifestations and extends from First Vespers of Christmas until Sunday after the Epiphany or after January 6 inclusive. The Feast of the Holy Family is now celebrated on the Sunday within the Octave of Christmas. The most ancient of Roman Marian feasts, the solemnity of Mary, Mother of God, has been restored as the content of the celebration on January 1, the octave day of Christmas. The Epiphany, January 6, where not a holy day of obligation, is assigned to the Sunday between January 2 and 8. Sunday after January 6 is the Feast of the Baptism of the Lord. The Feast of the Most Holy Name of Jesus, of comparatively recent origin, has been dropped.

The season of Advent is no longer so much a penitential season as one of expectation: a reminder of Christ's second coming at the end of time (from the First Sunday of Advent to December 16) and more immediately a preparation for the memorial of the first coming at Christmas (December 17 to 24).

Season of the Year. In addition to the seasons of Easter, Lent, Christmas, and Advent, the other 33 or 34 weeks of the year celebrate no particular aspect of the mystery of Christ, but rather this mystery in its fullness, especially on Sundays. These Sundays and weeks numbered consecutively constitute the season of the year and thus replace the earlier clumsy arrangement of time after Epiphany and time after Pentecost. The Feast of Christ the King has been assigned to the last Sunday of the Church year. The Rogation and Ember Days have been left to local custom to be determined by the conferences of bishops.

Proper of the Saints (Sanctoral Cycle). Because of the priority given to the temporal cycle and to the feasts of the Lord, there is a considerable reduction in saints' feast days and a simplification of their categories. In addition to the movable solemnities (Trinity Sunday, Corpus Christi, Sacred Heart, Christ the King), there are only 10 "solemnities" corresponding to the earlier feasts of class 1. There are 23 "feasts" corresponding to the earlier feasts of class 2, and 63 "obligatory memorials" or feasts of class 3. The category of "optimal memorials," some 95 in number, round out the reclassification.

Five principles were involved in revising the sanctoral cycle: the curtailment of feasts of devotion or "ideafeasts" that celebrate no particular mystery of salvation; a critical examination of the historicity of the saints; the selection of saints of greater importance; the recognition, wherever possible, of the anniversary day of death or martyrdom; and a more universal or catholic approach to the calendar so as to include saints from all peoples and ages.

National episcopal conferences are to draw up particular calendars that may include local celebrations and "memorials" of local saints, as has been done in this country since 1972 with the inclusion of memorials of Bl. Elizabeth Ann Seton (January 4), Bl. John Neumann (January 5), St. Isidore (May 15), St. Peter Claver (September 9), St. Isaac Jogues and companions (October 19), St. Frances Xavier Cabrini (November 13), and Our Lady of Guadalupe (December 12).

There are also votive masses provided for the civic observances of Independence Day (July 4) and Thanksgiving Day.

Bibliography: Calendarium Romanum (Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis 1969). J. DUBOIS, "Les saints du nouveau calendrier: Tradition et critique historique," Maison-Dieu 100 (1969) 157–178. P. JOUNEL, "L'organisation de l'année liturgique," Maison-Dieu 100 (1969) 139–156. T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (Collegeville, Minn. 1991). A. G. MARTIMORT, ed. The Church at Prayer IV: The Liturgy and Time (Collegeville, Minn. 1986). A. NOCENT, The Liturgical Year, 4 v. (Collegeville, Minn. 1977) J. M. PIERCE, "Holy Week and Easter in the Middle Ages," in Passover and Easter: Origin and History to Modern Times, eds. P. F. BRADSHAW and L. A. HOFFMAN (Notre Dame, Ind. 1999) 161–185. A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year: Its History & Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy (New York 1981).

[R. VAN DOREN/C. W. GUSMER/EDS.]

LITURGICS

The scientific study of the liturgical rites and ceremonies of Christians and Jews. This field, sometimes called liturgical studies, is comprised of the historical, theological, and pastoral study of public worship activity. Although a great deal of work has been done since the Reformation in the recovery and publication of liturgical sources, liturgics has been a scientific field of research only in the past century or so. The liturgical reform of the Second Vatican Council was itself largely a product of liturgical investigation and in turn spurred further scientific advances both in the Roman Catholic and in other churches. In addition, the Jewish background of Christian worship has been the focus of renewed interest among both Jewish and Christian scholars. Finally, since the council much attention has been paid to the relation between liturgy and theology as well as liturgy and the arts and ritual studies in the social sciences. This last topic as well as the interest in social history has been the most significant advance in liturgics in the past 25 years. Not only the texts but the contexts of worship have been the increasing focus of serious scholars.

Comparative Liturgy. One of the most fruitful paths of liturgics has been the comparative study approach, first inspired by Anton BAUMSTARK (d. 1948).

The study of Catholic worship has been increasingly enriched by scholars plumbing the depths of other liturgical traditions and especially by those who have discerned connections in the historical development of the various liturgical families.

Jewish Liturgy. The Jewish roots of Christian worship have been an important source of liturgical study since the beginning of the 20th century, especially in the contributions of F. Gavin, W. E. Oesterly, G. DIX, C. W. Dugmore, and L. Finkelstein. During the late 20th century Jewish liturgical study was advanced by the ground breaking study of the development of Jewish prayer forms, significant for the development of the eucharistic prayer, by J. Heinemann [Prayer in the Talmud (New York 1977)]. Also important for comparative studies is the work of L. A. Hoffman in early and medieval Jewish liturgical worship.

Eastern Liturgy. Baumstark's own comparative work focused on the relations between the Christian liturgical traditions of East and West. His method was advanced in particular by the "school" centering on Juan Mateos of Rome's Pontifical Oriental Institute [M. Arranz, W. Macomber, G. Winkler, and especially R. F. Taft, whose Beyond East and West: Problems in Liturgical Understanding (rev. ed. Rome 1997) deals above all with methodology]. The comparative study of eastern and western liturgy was also advanced by I. H. Dalmais, H. J. Schulz [The Byzantine Liturgy (2nd ed. New York 1986)] and the publication of the annual conferences of the Saint Sergius Institute in Paris (published as Ephemerides Liturgicae Subsidia in Rome). Finally a major aid in the study of the liturgical theology of the Byzantine Church is René Bornert's Les commentaires byzantins de la divine liturgie (Paris 1966).

Anglican and Protestant Liturgy. The Second Vatican Council's liturgical reform not only inspired practical liturgical renewal in the Anglican and Protestant churches but also encouraged the further development of liturgics among scholars of those traditions. Names like W. H. Frere, G. Dix, and F. E. Brightman, all early-20th-century scholars, show that this is not a new field for Anglican scholars. Building upon these early scholars were G. J. Cuming, R. C. D. Jasper, and P. Bradshaw in England, and Massey Shepherd, M. Hatchett, L. L. Mitchell, and Louis Weil in the United States who produced important critical studies on Anglican liturgical rites.

On the strictly Protestant side scientific liturgical studies also advanced. Significant here was the publication of the Lutheran Jahrbuch für Liturgik und Hymnologie (Kassel, since 1955). In addition a valuable handbook of the liturgy from the point of view of the Lutheran tradition was published as Leitourgia in five volumes (Kassel 1954–70). For the English churches an invaluable tool is H. Davies five-volume work, Worship and Theology in England (Princeton 1961-75) which treats music, architecture, preaching, worship, and theology in all of the Catholic and Protestant traditions represented there from the Reformation to the mid-20th century. The origins of the Reformed (Calvinist) tradition of worship have long been in need of scientific study. H. O. Old began this task in The Patristic Roots of Reformed Worship (Zurich 1975). An important contextual study of Protestant liturgy in one of the Reformation cities was provided by R. Bornert, La réforme protestante du culte à Strasbourg au xvi siècle (1523-1598) (Leiden 1981). A little studied field of investigation, the Free Church tradition of worship, was opened up by D. Adams, From Meeting House to Camp Meeting (Austin, TX 1979). Increasing ecumenical collaboration between liturgical scholars bore remarkable fruit, with important comparative studies produced by G. Lathrop, F. Senn, S. A. Stauffer, M. Johnson, B. Spinks and J. White.

The Eucharist. Since the beginning of the 20th century, a great deal of attention has been paid to research on the origins and development of the anaphora or eucharistic prayer. The pathbreaking research of J. P. Audet, T. J. Talley, and L. Ligier paved the way for a better understanding of the berakah (blessing) form of Jewish prayer, especially the birkat-ha-mazon (grace after meals) in relation to the primitive forms of the Eucharistic Prayer. This Jewish form provided the basis for the extended argument of L. Bouyer [Eucharist (Notre Dame 1968)] as well as the study of the lexical problems involved in the relation between Hebrew and Greek euchological vocabulary by R. Ledogar [Acknowledgement: Praise Verbs in the Early Greek Anaphoras (Rome 1968)]. A significant challenge to understanding the origin of the Eucharistic Prayer solely in terms of the berakah was raised by the investigation of an Israelite covenant/thanksgiving formula (todah) by C. Giraudo in his La struttura letteraria della preghiera eucaristica (Rome 1981). Further studies in the anaphoral developments of the early Church were undertaken by J. Fenwick, A. Tarby, B. Spinks, E. J. Kilmartin, and A. Gerhards [Die griechische Gregoriosanaphora (Münster 1984)]. An important study by A. Bouley, From Freedom to Formula (Washington, D.C. 1981), deals with the question of the improvisational character of the primitive eucharistic prayers. Other important studies on the eucharistic prayers were carried out by E. Mazza and P. Bradshaw.

The study of the Eucharistic Prayer was also aided significantly by the publication of a number of prayer collections. The most valuable was A. Hänggi and I. Pahl, Prex Eucharistica (Fribourg 1968), comprising the classic prayers of the eastern and western traditions. Another volume, Coena Domini (Fribourg 1983), edited by I. Pahl, carried this project through the prayers of the reformation churches. An English translation and introduction to a number of the Eucharistic Prayers appears in R. C. D. Jasper and G. J. Cuming, Prayers of the Eucharist: Early and Reformed (3rd ed. New York 1987).

In terms of the liturgical books, the edition of the Roman sacramentaries begun by L. C. Mohlberg was complemented by the magisterial critical edition of the Gregorian sacramentaries by J. Deshusses [Le sacramentaire grégorien, 3 v. (Fribourg 1971-82)]. The same scholar together with B. Darragon produced a valuable concordance for the major sacramentaries in six volumes (Fribourg 1982-83). The study of the Milanese or Ambrosian tradition was aided by the edition of a number of its representative sacramentaries, e.g., O. Heiming's Sacramentarium triplex (Münster 1964). Work on the Mozarabic rite was furthered by J. Pinell's edition of the Liber missarum de Toledo (Toledo 1983). The important 8th century Gelasian sacramentaries were represented by the long-awaited edition of the Gellone Sacramentary by A. Dumas and J. Deshusses [Liber sacramentarum Gellonesis, 2 v. (Turnhout 1981)]. The vital Romano-Germanic Pontifical, responsible for the reintroduction of the mixed Roman-Frankish liturgical tradition to Rome in the 10th century, was edited by C. Vogel and R. Elze [Le Pontifical Romano-Germanique du dixième siècle, 3 v. (Vatican City 1963-72)]. This represents an important addition to the work of M. ANDRIEU on the medieval pontificals. Another complement to that research was provided by S. J. P. van Dijk and J. H. Walker in The Ordinal of the Papal Court from Innocent III to Boniface VIII, and Related Documents (Fribourg 1975) and their Origins of the Modern Roman Rite (New York 1960).

Finally, a number of scholars furthered the understanding of the historical development of the eucharistic liturgy. Notable are G. Kretschmar ["Abendmahl" and "Abendmahlsfeier," Theologische Rëal-Encyclopädie I (Berlin 1977) 59-89, 229-278)] and E. Cattaneo [Il culto cristiano in occidente (Rome 1978)]. Various aspects of the Eucharist were investigated as well, for example by P. DeClerck on the prayers of the faithful [La prière universelle dans les liturgies des églises latines anciennes (Münster 1977)], by A. Häussling on the relation between monastery and eucharistic celebration in the early Middle Ages [Mönchskonvent und Eucharistiefeier (Münster 1973)], by G. G. Willis on various aspects of the ancient Roman eucharist [Essays in Early Roman Liturgy (London 1964) and Further Essays in Early Roman Liturgy (London 1968)], by K. Stevenson on the sacrificial aspects of the Eucharistic Prayer [Eucharist and Offering (New York 1986)], as well as numerous works by the German scholar K. Gamber. Investigation of the Byzantine tradition of the Eucharist was brought to an extremely sophisticated level by J. Mateos [La célébration de la parole dans la liturgie byzantine (Rome 1971)], R. Taft [The Great Entrance (Rome 1975)], F. van de Paverd [Zur Geschichte der Messliturgie in Antiocheia und Konstantinopel gegen Ende des vierten Jahrhunderts (Rome 1970)], and G. Wagner [Der Ursprung des Chrystomus liturgie (Münster 1973)]. The manuscript tradition of the liturgy of St. John Chrysostom has been definitively studied by A. Jacob [Histoire du formulaire grec de la liturgie de S. Jean Chrysostome (Louvain 1968)].

Initiation. One of the most effective reforms of the Second Vatican Council was the restoration of the catechumenate and the promotion of the Rite of Christian Initiation for Adults. This reform was itself based on the important historical research of the century preceding the council and in turn engendered much further research and theological reflection. The historical texts of Christian initiation were collected and edited by E. C. Whitaker [Documents of the Baptismal Liturgy (2nd ed. London 1970)]. The classic mystagogical catecheses of the 4th century were translated by E. Yarnold in The Awe-Inspiring Rites of Initiation. In addition, the baptismal homilies of John Chrysostom were made available in P. W. Harkins' St. John Chrysostom: Baptismal Instructions (New York 1963). A thorough study of the classic mystagogical homilies can be found in H. Riley's Christian Initiation (Washington, DC 1974). Several studies in the Medieval and Reformation texts and practice of Christian initiation were done by J. D. C. Fisher, with an up-date by P. Jagger.

A classic book-length presentation of the various rites of initiation in the early Church were provided by G. Kretschmar in Leitourgia, v. 5. One of the more important findings of historical research on initiation in the primitive Church were the discovery of traditions that emphasize the royal anointing and Jordan-event motifs of initiation as opposed to the Pauline and paschal aspects, which so clearly dominate the current western rites. Noteworthy here are the contributions of S. Brock on the Syrian baptismal ordines and especially G. Winkler [Das armenische Initiationsrituale (Rome 1982)]. Much of this material was ably summarized by A. Kavanagh and M. Johnson in their studies on the history and practice of the initiation of adults.

Confirmation continued to be the object of both research and perplexity. One of the most important historical studies in this regard was L. A. Van Buchem's L'Homélie Pseudo-Eusebienne de Pentecôte (Nijmegen 1967) which deals with the crucial homily of Faustus of Riez and its dissemination in early medieval Gaul. Other important contributions were made by L. L. Mitchell, L. Ligier, J. Ysebaert, P. Turner, and G. Winkler.

Increasing attention was paid after the 1960s to the liturgical development of the various sacraments on the principle that theological development goes hand in hand with ritual history. In the field of research on Penance, a major contribution to historical understanding was made with the publication of C. Vogel's two works of text and commentary Le pécheur et la pénitence dans l'église ancienne (Paris 1966) and Le pécheur et la pénitence au Moyen-Age (Paris 1969). The Rites of Ordination was the focus of a number of liturgical scholars participating in the 1979 congress of the international Societas Liturgica [W. Vos and G. Wainwright, eds., Ordination Rites (Rotterdam 1980)]. A thorough study of the rites of Christian Marriage was undertaken by K. Stevenson [Nuptial Blessing (London 1982)]. The rites of anointing, radically transformed by the conciliar reform, was studied by two American scholars, C. Gusmer and J. Empereur. Finally, an extended historical study of the western history of Christian burial rites was published by D. Sicard [La liturgie de la mort dans l'église latine des origines à la réforme carolingienne (Münster 1978)].

The Liturgy and Time. Two of the most fruitful areas of scientific liturgical research in the 20th century were the liturgical year and the liturgy of the hours. The question of the origin of the Christian observance of Sunday was hotly debated by W. Rordorf [Sunday (Philadelphia 1968)] and C. Mosna [Storia della domenica dagli origini fino al inizi del quinto secolo (Rome 1977)]. A radically new theory of the origins of the liturgical year that challenged G. Dix's historicization hypothesis was proposed by T. J. Talley (The Origins of the Liturgical Year.) Studies in the sources of the liturgical year have also been aided by the publication of the following: a newly discovered Easter Homily of Origen [P. Nautin, ed., Origène: Peri Pascha (Paris 1979)], a new manuscript of the early-5th-century Armenian lectionary, which details the Jerusalem services [A. Renoux, ed. Patrologia Orientalis, v. 35–36 (Turnhout 1969–71)], the Easter homilies of the 4th-century Cappadocian Asterios Sophistes [H. J. Auf Der Maur, Die Osterhomilen des Asterios Sophistes (Trier 1967)], a new translation and edition of the pilgrimage diary of Egeria by J. Wilkinson in Egeria's Travels, and especially helpful for understanding the liturgical year in Constantinople, the ordo (typikon) of Hagia Sophia in the 10th century [J. Mateos, ed., Le typicon de la grande église, 2 v. (Rome 1962-63)]. R. Cantalamessa, W. Rordorf, and A. Strobel provided collections of texts that deal respectively with the early Pascha, Sunday, and the Quartodeciman crisis.

In addition several works on individual aspects of the liturgical year advanced scientific scholarship considerably. Among them: R. Cabié on the great 50 days of Easter [La Pentecôte (Paris 1965)], R. Zerfass on the Jerusalem stational services [Die Schriflesung im Kathedraloffizium Jerusalems (Münster 1968)], G. Bertonière on the development of the Byzantine paschal vigil [The Historical Development of the Easter Vigil and Related Services in the Greek Church (Rome 1972)], and P. Jounel on the sanctoral calendars of the medieval Roman basilicas [Le culte des saints dans les basiliques du Latran et du Vatican au douzième siècle (Rome 1977)].

With the renewed interest on the liturgy of the hours as the prayer of the whole Church, a good deal of research went into the historical development of daily prayer. Based on A. Baumstark's distinction between monastic and cathedral (or parochial) office, a number of scholars including M. Arranz, G. Winkler, W. Storey, J. Pinell, and especially J. Mateos investigated the daily office in various traditions. A. Veilleux transformed the understanding of the Egyptian cenobitic liturgy of the hours in his La liturgie dans le cènobitisme pachomien au quatrième siècle (Rome 1968). P. F. Bradshaw [Daily Prayer in the Early Church (London 1981)] and R. F. Taft [The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West (Collegeville, MN 1986)] reflected on contemporary research into the liturgy of the hours in comprehensive studies.

Liturgy and the Arts. Late-20th-century liturgical renewal also spurred interest between worship and other fields of study. While not strictly speaking investigations of the development and nature of liturgy itself, such studies became indispensable for a deeper understanding of the development and meaning of liturgical forms as well as their context. Most prominent among the arts studied in conjunction with liturgy was architecture. The work of R. Krautheimer was most significant for describing and evaluating architectural space on the basis of its liturgical functions, for example, in his Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture and the invaluable Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae, 5 v. (Vatican City, 1937-77). Krautheimer's student, T. F. Mathews, published an in-depth study of the relation between liturgy and architecture in his The Early Churches of Constantinople: Architecture and Liturgy (University Park, PA 1971). J. Baldovin explored the relationship between stational churches and their liturgies in his groundbreaking work, The Urban Character of Christian Worship in Jerusalem, Rome, and Constantinople from the Fourth to the Tenth Centuries: The Origins, Development, and Meaning of Stational Liturgy (1982), and a shorter work, Liturgy in Ancient Jerusalem (1989). The influence of the architecture and topography of Jerusalem on the medieval Frankish church and its liturgy was investigated by C. Heitz [Rapports entre architecture et liturgie à l'époque carolingiènne (Paris 1963)]. J. G. Davies and S.A. Stauffer produced important studies on baptisteries and baptismal fonts.

The relation between liturgy and drama was studied by J. G. Davies and D. Adams; between liturgy and music by R. A. Leaver and E. Routley. In addition, an English translation of J. QUASTEN'S classic, Music and Worship in Pagan and Christian Antiquity, appeared (Washington, DC 1983).

Liturgy and Social Science. In terms of new directions for liturgics the most important turn the field took after the Second Vatican Council is undoubtedly an interest in the relation between Christian and Jewish worship and the social sciences. Inspired by sympathetic thinkers like E. Erickson and C. G. JUNG (psychology), V. TURNER and M. Douglas (anthropology), and B. Wicker and D. Martin (sociology), liturgical scholars began to take seriously the date provided by this relatively modern field of research. An early and comprehensive approach to this mode of research was J. Shaughnessy, ed., The Roots of Ritual (Grand Rapids 1973), followed by R. Grainger [The Language of the Rite (London 1974)], F. Isambert [Rite et éfficacité symbolique (Paris 1979)], R. Grimes [Beginnings in Ritual Studies (Lanham, MD 1982)], and L. A. Hoffman [Beyond the Text: A Wholistic Approach to Liturgy (Bloomington, IN 1987)]. A number of important studies were published by M. Searle, M. Collins, M. M. Kelleher, and N. Mitchell.

In sum, the scientific study of Jewish and Christian worship clearly progressed both in terms of content and methodological turns during the 20th century. Liturgical institutes and programs of study continued to flourish in Rome (San Anselmo and the Pontifical Oriental Institute); Trier, West Germany; Paris (Saint Serge [Orthodox] and the Institut Superieur de Liturgie); Washington, DC; Notre Dame; Collegeville, Minnesota; and Berkeley, California. Updates of ongoing research continued to be published in journals such as the Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft (Regensburg), Questions Liturgiques (Mont César, Belgium), and Studia Liturgica.

Bibliography: C. JONES, et al., eds., The Study of Liturgy (New York 1992). S. MARSILI, ed., Anamnesis: Introduzione storico-teologico alla liturgia, 5 v. (Turin 1974–). A. G. MARTIMORT, ed., The Church at Prayer, 4 v., tr. M. W. O'CONNEL (rev. ed. Collegeville, MN 1986–87). C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources, tr. and rev. by W. STOREY and N. RASMUSSEN (Washington, DC 1986). H. J. WEGMAN, Christian Worship in East and West, tr. G. LATHROP (New York 1985). G. LATHROP, Holy Things: A Liturgical Theology (Minneapolis 1993). F.C. SENN, Christian Liturgy: Catholic and Evangelical (Minneapolis 1997).

[J. F. BALDOVIN/EDS.]

LITURGY, ARTICLES ON

In this encyclopedia, the two principal articles in this area are LITURGY, which discusses the definition and nature of liturgy, and LITURGICS, which surveys the field of liturgical studies, i.e., the historical, theological and pastoral study of the Church's liturgical rites, ceremonies and other public worship activities. The entry LITURGICAL THEOLOGY treats the systematic and pastoral theologies of liturgical worship. LITURGICAL HISTORY, a comprehensive four-part entry, discusses historical developments in the Church's worship. Other specific issues in liturgical history include EASTER CONTROVERSY. Twentieth-century endeavors to restore the liturgy to its place of primacy in the life of the Church are described in LITURGICAL MOVEMENT; LITURGICAL CONFERENCE; MEDIATOR DEI; and MYSTERY THEOLOGY.

The principal entry on the Mass is EUCHARIST IN CON-TEMPORARY CATHOLIC THEOLOGY. Related entries on the various categories of Masses, communion services and eucharistic devotion outside of Mass are: BENEDICTION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT: COMMUNION SERVICE: EUCHA-RIST OUTSIDE MASS, WORSHIP OF THE; EUCHARISTIC DE-VOTION; EUCHARISTIC ELEVATION; FORTY HOURS DEVOTION; MASS, DRY; MASSES, VOTIVE; RED MASS; RE-QUIEM MASS; and TRIDENTINE MASS. The following special treatments of the individual parts of the Mass are provided: AGNUS DEI; ANAMNESIS; ASPERGES; COMMIN-GLING; CREED IN EUCHARISTIC LITURGY; EMBOLISM; EPI-CLESIS; EUCHARISTIC ELEVATION; FERMENTUM; GENERAL INTERCESSIONS; HOMILY; INTROIT; KISS OF PEACE; LORD'S PRAYER, THE; ORATIO SUPER POPULUM; PREFACE; SANC-TUS; and SEQUENCE.

The use of specific items in the liturgy are covered in the following entries: ASHES, LITURGICAL USE OF; BREAD, LITURGICAL USE OF; DIPTYCHS, LITURGICAL USE OF; INCENSE, LIGHT, LITURGICAL USE OF; PALMS, LITURGICAL USE OF; WATER, LITURGICAL USE OF; and WINE, LITURGICAL USE OF. For general information on various liturgical rituals, ceremonies, actions, formulas, rubrics and laws, see ANTIPHON; APOLOGIES, LITURGICAL; BLESSINGS, LITURGICAL; CONCELEBRATION; DOXOLOGY, LITURGICAL; LITANY; OREMUS; PROCESSIONS, RELIGIOUS; LITURGICAL ACCLAMATIONS; LITURGICAL COLORS; LITURGICAL GESTURES; LITURGICAL LANGUAGES; LITURGICAL LAWS, AUTHORITY OF; ANOINTING OF THE SICK, LITURGY OF; COMMENDATION OF THE DYING; FUNERAL RITES; VIATICUM; and ORDINATIONS IN THE ROMAN RITE.

The liturgical year, calendars and feasts of the Church are covered in LITURGICAL YEAR IN THE ROMAN RITE; LITURGICAL CALENDARS; ALL SAINTS, SOLEMNITY OF; ALL SOULS' DAY; BAPTISM OF THE LORD; CANDLEMAS; CHRIST THE KING, FEAST OF; CHRISTMAS AND ITS CYCLE; CORPUS ET SANGUINIS CHRISTI; EASTER AND ITS CYCLE; EASTER VIGIL; EMBER DAYS; EPIPHANY, SOLEMNITY OF; GOOD FRIDAY; HOLY THURSDAY; HOLY WEEK; LENT; MAR-

IAN FEASTS; MARTYROLOGY, ROMAN; SANCTORAL CYCLE; SUNDAY; TENEBRAE; and TRIDUUM.

The liturgy of the hours is treated in the general articles LITURGY OF THE HOURS; BREVIARY, ROMAN; LITTLE OFFICE OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY; and OFFICE OF THE DEAD. Specific hours are discussed in MATINS; LAUDS; LITTLE HOURS; VESPERS and COMPLINE.

The various roles exercised in the celebration of the liturgy are discussed under ACOLYTE; CANTOR IN CHRISTIAN LITURGY; DEACON; LECTOR; MASTER OF CEREMONIES; PAPAL CEREMONY AND VESTURE; and SACRISTAN. Service books used in the Roman rite receive a general treatment in LITURGICAL BOOKS OF THE ROMAN RITE and specific treatment in CEREMONIAL OF BISHOPS; EVANGELARY (BOOK OF GOSPELS); LECTIONARIES; LECTIONARY FOR MASSES WITH CHILDREN; MISSAL, ROMAN; PONTIFICAL, ROMAN; RITUAL, ROMAN; and SACRAMENTARIES, II: CONTEMPORARY. Historical developments are discussed under their respective titles, e.g., GELASIAN SACRAMENTARY; GREGORIAN SACRAMENTARY; LEONINE SACRAMENTARY; LIBELLI MISSARUM; ORDINALS, ROMAN; PERICOPES; SACRAMENTARIES, I: HISTORICAL; and STOWE MISSAL.

The liturgical families of Christendom are introduced by the overview article LITURGICAL RITES. The liturgical families of the East are treated in ALEXANDRIAN LITURGY; ANTIOCHENE LITURGY; ARMENIAN LITURGY; BYZANTINE LITURGY; COPTIC LITURGY; EAST SYRIAN LITURGY; ETHIOPIAN (GE'EZ) LITURGY; MARONITE LITURGY; RUSSIAN LITURGY; SYRIAN LITURGY; and SYRO-MALABAR LITURGY. The liturgical families of the West are discussed in LATIN RITE; ROMAN RITE; AMBROSIAN RITE; BANGOR USE; CARMELITE RITE, CARTHUSIAN RITE; CELTIC RITE; CISTERCIAN RITE; DOMINICAN RITE; GALLICAN RITE; HEREFORD USE; LYONESE RITE; MOZARABIC RITE; and PREMONSTRATENSIANS (RITE).

The relations between liturgy and culture are treated in the essay INCULTURATION, LITURGICAL. The principal entry on liturgical art is the nine-part essay LITURGICAL ART, while the principal entry on liturgical music is LITURGICAL MUSIC, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF. For a survey of the history of liturgical music, see the 11-part entry, LITURGICAL MUSIC, HISTORY OF. Specific entries on liturgical chant are: AMBROSIAN CHANT; BYZANTINE CHANT; GALLICAN CHANT; GREGORIAN CHANT; MOZARABIC CHANT; and RUSSIAN CHANT.

The church building and all its appurtenances are described in CHURCH ARCHITECTURE, HISTORY OF and related articles such as ALTAR IN CHRISTIAN LITURGY; AMBO; BAPTISTERIES AND BAPTISMAL FONTS; CORNERSTONE, CHURCH; and TABERNACLE. Liturgical vestments are treated in LITURGICAL VESTMENTS; ALB; CHASUBLE; COPE

AND HUMERAL VEIL; DALMATIC; FANON; MANIPLE; MITER; STOLE; and SURPLICE. For information on the liturgical vessels, see the general entry LITURGICAL VESSELS and the specific entries CHALICE, PATEN AND VEIL; CIBORIUM; PYX; and RELIQUARIES.

Biographical information on prominent liturgical scholars and theologians are treated under their respective names. For information on international bodies that have contributed significantly in the production of liturgical texts for the English-speaking world, see: CONSULTATION ON COMMON TEXTS; ENGLISH LANGUAGE LITURGICAL CONSULTATION (ELLC); INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY (ICEL); and INTERNATIONAL CONSULTATION ON ENGLISH TEXTS (ICET).

[J.Y. TAN]

LITURGY

Term for the official worship of God by the Church in the West for centuries. In the East, however, the tendency to restrict the word to the Eucharist arose at an early date. This article uses the expression to designate the Church's liturgical worship as distinct from its other devotions, whether practiced by groups or individuals.

Meaning of the Term. Etymologically the word means any service done for the common welfare of the people. It is derived from the Greek λειτουργία, which is a combination of λειτός, an adjective meaning pertaining to the people (λάος), and ἔργον, a noun meaning work.

History of the Word. For the Greeks liturgy designated any public service rendered to the community at personal expense or at least without remuneration: education, entertainment, or defense. The word referred even to forced labor done for the common good and, later, to any action that had repercussions in the social and political sphere.

The term made its way into revealed literature through the Septuagint translation of the Hebrew text of the Old Testament. The translators used it almost exclusively for the chosen people's prime purpose for existence, the worship of Yahweh. The word liturgy was used also, though less frequently, for something done for state (1 Kgs 19.21; 2 Chr 17.19; 22.8).

The same practice was followed by the New Testament writers. Luke, for example, speaks of Zechariah's liturgy in the Temple (1.23). Paul calls himself "the liturgist of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles" (Rom 15.16) and also uses the word liturgy to refer to the collection taken up for the poor in Jerusalem (2 Cor 9.12) and to the services rendered to his own person (Phil 2.30). The Letter to the Hebrews employs the term for the priestly work of Jesus Christ, liturgy in its specifically Christian sense: "We have such a high priest . . . a minister [λειτουργός, liturgist] of the Holies, and of the true tabernacle which the Lord has erected and not man. . . . But now He has obtained a superior ministry [λειτουργίας, liturgy], in proportion as He is the mediator of a superior covenant, enacted on the basis of superior promises" (8.1–6). This is properly the work of the Christian People of God, for through Christ's liturgy they are able to offer acceptable worship to God and receive from Him the fruits of Christ's redemptive work.

Whereas Christian antiquity applied the term to prayer and sacrifice in general, writers of early centuries made it serve more frequently to denote an official or community service as opposed to devotions of purely private piety [Didache 15.1 (Enchiridion patristicum, ed M. J. Rovët de Journel 4); Clement of Rome. Epist. ad Corinthios, 40.2-5. 41.1 (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 1:288-289); Synod of Antioch, chapter 4 (K. Kirch, Enchiridion fontium historiae ecclesiasticae antiquae, ed. L. Ueding 490)]. Subsequent development in the East restricted the word to the Eucharist, as in the Liturgy of Saint James or the Liturgy of Saint Basil. During the Middle Ages the West preferred terms such as ministerium, munus, servitus, and officium. It was left to the Renaissance period to adopt the word liturgy in the titles of collections describing the Church's worship. Since then the term has been thus employed consistently.

Definition. Vatican Council II in The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Dec. 4, 1963) describes liturgy as the carrying out of the work of redemption, especially in the paschal mystery (Sacrosanctum Concilium 2, 6); the exercise of the priestly office of Christ (ibid. 7); the "presentation of man's sanctification under the guise of signs perceptible by the senses" (ibid.); and a sacred action surpassing all others because it is the action of Christ the priest and of his Body the Church (ibid.). The liturgy is viewed as a foretaste of the heavenly liturgy (ibid. 8), "the summit toward which the activity of the Church is directed"; and the "fount from which all her power flows' (ibid. 10). Liturgy is seen as the source of grace and sanctification in Christ as well as the glorification of God (ibid.). The Council said also: "Liturgical services are not private functions, but are celebrations of the Church . . . the holy people united and ordered under their bishops. Liturgical services pertain to the whole body of the Church; they manifest it and affect it" (26). Thus the constitution builds upon and goes beyond the classic Thomistic definition of liturgy as "common worship that is offered to God by ministers of the Church in the person of all the faithful" (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.12), as well as Pope Pius XII's definition of liturgy as the "public worship of the Mystical Body, Head and members" (Mediator Dei 20).

Nature

Sacramental Worship. All liturgical actions are sacramental; that is, they are signs and symbols that give expression to the conferring of divine life by Christ on His Church and the offering to the Father, through Christ, of the homage and worship of His people. The foundational basis of this sacramental quality of liturgical worship is the Incarnation. Christ is the first of all Sacraments. As the Word Incarnate, He clothes in visible, tangible form and shape the unseen and transcendent God; He is the dynamic embodying of the living and life-giving God. The hypostatic union means precisely that the Son of God in person unites to Himself a real human nature, in order, in it and through it, to pervade and transform all human beings with the power and glory of His divinity. Through the Incarnation, Christ's humanity becomes the direct personal instrument of God the Father's eternal plan to redeem the whole human race. Thus Christ is the Sacrament of God in the most perfect sense.

The paschal mystery is the internal content of every liturgical action, for the latter is simply an external sign enabling the worshiper to participate in that supreme act of worship in which God's plan of salvation was brought to fruition by Christ's suffering, death, and resurrection. Without this internal reality of the paschal mystery, liturgical worship would be an empty shell. Although worshippers might be quite sincere in their own interior sentiments, the objective religious action would be incapable of uniting them with God, for saving union with God comes only through Christ's redemptive work. A mere human act of the will does not suffice to make us adopted daughters and sons of God; all must participate in the resurrected body of Christ. It is precisely in the sacramental, liturgical worship of the Church that we are assimilated into Christ's risen body.

This understanding of the liturgy is beautifully expressed by Vatican Council II in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (5–7). After speaking of the paschal mystery as the core and kernel of the liturgy, it says that the liturgy is but a complex of "sensible signs through which the sanctification of man is signified and brought about in a way proper to each."

Priestly Worship. The worship of the Church has no meaning except as an action of Christ the Redeemer; from Him it receives its content and efficacy. It is nothing less than Christ's worship of His Father, His worship done through His Mystical Body.

According to the Epistle to the Hebrews, through His transfiguring sacrifice Christ exercised a priesthood, a priesthood that is eternal. "Because He continues forever, He has an everlasting priesthood. Therefore He is able at all times to save those who come to God through Him, since He lives always to make intercession for them" (7.24–25). Through the liturgy Christ's Priesthood becomes a continuous and living reality throughout the ages (Mediator Dei 22; Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 7).

This priesthood He chose to share with His followers, so that they would be able to continue Him as the Sacrament of redeeming worship. In his first Epistle Peter urges Christians to draw near to Christ, "a living stone, rejected indeed by men but chosen and honored by God. Be you yourselves as living stones built thereon into a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. . . . You are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people purchased by God to proclaim the great deeds of Him who has called you out of darkness to His marvelous light' (2.4, 5, 9). The power of this royal priesthood enables all Christians to associate themselves and their lives with Christ's sacrifice, which alone can make of their act of worship pleasing to God the Father. It is this priesthood of Christ, present and active within the Church, that empowers the Church to be an efficacious sign of the redeeming worship of Christ at the instant of His dying and rising.

In its liturgical worship, then, the Church acts as one, since everything it does is done precisely as the action of the one Body of Christ, with Him as head, as priest. Christ's priesthood, present and active in the members of His body, is so essential that without it there would be no liturgy; in it the members of the Church act as the one people of God in its proper condition of the divinely chosen holy cult community, the single, unified expression of the priestly movement of Jesus Christ back to His Father.

The dignity of the liturgical assembly is no small thing, for it is the concrete realization of the Mystical Body of Jesus Christ, the organ of the Mystical Body, expressing its union with its Head in His most sublime role as mediator between God and humanity. By its very nature, then, the liturgy demands full, conscious, and active participation of all the faithful; and they have a right to participation by reason of their Baptism (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 14). Since Liturgical functions are not private actions but celebrations that pertain to the whole body of the Church, the Sacrament of unity, the Church officially desires that their communal celebration—with the full active participation of the faithful—be observed as something preferred over what might be called a "private' use of these functions (ibid. 26, 27). In order to bring out externally and more adequately the real and necessary diversity of function in the Church's worship, Vatican Council II insisted that everyone, whether cleric or laity, do all and only those parts that pertain to his or her office by the nature of the rite (ibid. 28).

That the liturgy is the source of Christian sanctity follows from its being the divinely intended means for achieving assimilation to Christ and insertion into His redemptive action. Vatican Council II was clear on this. Although the Council admitted that the liturgy does not exhaust all the activity of the Church, "as the action of Christ the priest and of His body the Church, every liturgical celebration is an action of such excellence that no other action of the Church can equal its efficacy by the same title and to the same degree . . . of piety. . . . The liturgy is the summit toward which the activity of the Church tends, and the fount from which flows all her power" (ibid. 6, 13, 10).

See Also: LITURGICAL BOOKS OF ROMAN RITE; LITURGICAL MOVEMENT; LITURGICAL RITES; LITURGICAL THEOLOGY; LITURGICAL VESTMENTS.

Bibliography: A. G. MARTIMORT, ed. The Church at Prayer: An Introduction to the Liturgy (rev. ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1992). A. A. HÄUSSLING, ed., The Meaning of the Liturgy (Collegeville, Minn. 1994). A. J. CHUPUNGCO, ed., Handbook for Liturgical Studies, 5 v. (Collegeville, Minn. 1997–2000).

[J. H. MILLER/D. W. KROUSE/G. AUSTIN/EDS.]

LITURGY OF THE HOURS

The Liturgy of the Hours (Divine Office), composed of Psalms, hymns, scriptural, patristic, and hagiographical readings, and prayers, is the public liturgical prayer of the Church, destined by her for the sanctification of specific parts of the day. This article treats the meaning, history, and renewal of the Liturgy of the Hours in the Roman rite.

Overview. Without frequent and fervent prayer the life of the Christian soon can easily become directionless and empty. In the absence of communal prayer, relying solely on private devotion, Christian witness becomes individualistic and ultimately devoid of any ecclesial sense. The development of the Liturgy of the Hours (or Divine Office) through the ages was predicated on the necessity for Christians to gather as often as possible not only to sanctify the day through the celebration of various hours, but to strengthen the community's capacity and resolve to give witness to Christ as the gathered faithful. So 'like all liturgical celebrations, the Liturgy of the Hours is not a private act. As a public sign of the Church, it belongs to the whole Church and has impact on all its members' (General Instruction of the Liturgy of the Hours 20). By its very nature the Liturgy of the Hours is a communal action of the Church, since it is the Church's daily round of prayer celebrated in common. Private recitation of any or all of the hours is always exceptional rather than normative. The primary responsibility of "those in sacred orders or with a special canonical mission" is to direct and preside over the prayer of the community (ibid. 23). As the prayer of the Church, the Liturgy of the Hours is a common prayer that is much more than the sum total of individual prayers of the participants; it is the result of that transcendent reality uniting all the faithful among themselves. During the exercise of this prayer, the ecclesia is reunited as such in Christ.

The distribution of the Office throughout the day is the Church's response to the Lord's commandment to pray always (Lk 18.1). The words of the Psalmist, "Seven times a day I praise you" (Ps 119.164), inspired development of the hours. The two moments of the rising and setting of the sun were the first chosen for prayers— LAUDS (Morning Prayer) and VESPERS (Evening Prayer). The divisions formerly marking the day served to determine the minor hours of Terce, Sext, and None, at the third, sixth and ninth hour respectively. To imitate Christ's example and to follow His teachings, there was established a night Office (MATINS) divided into several nocturns, a remnant of the ancient divisions of the night. Very early in the Church, the memory of a moment of the Passion was linked with each of these hours; in some countries, the memory of the great stages of salvation history was added to them. Such a prayer retains its full meaning in the traditional organization of the Office when the latter is celebrated at the liturgical hours. However, when it is recited at any time of the day or anticipated before its prescribed time, it loses much of its value and efficacy for those who recite it.

History. The prayer of the first Christians had its roots in Jewish prayer. From the first centuries there were three kinds of prayer: morning and evening prayers, day prayers, and night prayers. Only the first two were practiced regularly by the Christian community; they were liturgical—as the others could have been—when they were celebrated by the local ecclesia under the authority of the bishop. These services, inasmuch as they were public, were composed of hymns, prayers, and readings, accompanied by explanations or exhortations. In the 3d century, the Psalms of the Old Testament were permanently adopted and sung in a responsorial manner.

After Constantine recognized the Church's place in society (313), the Church organized her prayer by establishing the times of celebration and determining the formulas to be used. Two tendencies were brought to bear on this. The first came from cathedral or parish communities, the other from monastic communities' and led to two types of cursus for the Office.

The monks who led a cenobitic life were the first to organize a complete Office with determined times for the reunions of the community and with established formulas and the recitation of the whole Psalter. Nocturnal prayer was the most characteristic use of monasticism, whence vigils were introduced in the churches, first in the East and then in the West. The most ancient monastic cursus known to us are those of Jerusalem, Lower Egypt, Palestine, Gaul, St. Basil, St. John Chrysostom, St. Caesarius, St. Columban, the Regula Magistri, and St. Benedict. For the last two the Office is complete and daily; the monks are obliged to take part in it, and, if they cannot, they must recite it privately.

In cathedral and parish churches, on the contrary, the community, with the presidency and active collaboration of the different orders of the clergy, celebrated each day a simpler Office (the so-called "cathedral Office") that was usually composed of Lauds and Vespers. Between the 5th and 9th centuries, the liturgies received their permanent structure. We know little about the primitive Roman Office, but we must distinguish between that of the tituli (the presbyteral churches) and that of the basilicas (cared for by more or less regular communities). The latter Office probably served as model for St. Benedict's Rule. In these basilica communities, the Office was composed of Psalms, antiphons, readings from Scripture and the Fathers, responsories, and, in certain churches as well as in monasteries, of hymns. The anniversaries of martyrs and confessors began to be celebrated at their tombs by means of a votive Office that was without relationship to the Office of the day.

From the end of the 6th century, at the time of St. Gregory the Great, the liturgy of the basilica was spread to the rest of Rome and even further: to Gaul, England, and Germany. The Office of the Roman basilicas thus became that of the clergy of those countries. Then in the middle of the 8th century, the complete cursus of all the hours, including the lengthy Matins, became general practice, and the clerics were obliged to participate in it entirely. The kind of canonical life necessary for this celebration received its organization principally from St. Chrodegang (d. 766) and the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (816). With Pepin the Short (751 to 768), the Frankish monarchy openly favored, and Charlemagne sought to impose officially, the adoption of the Roman uses in his Empire. Amalarius and the schola cantorum of the Church of Metz played an important part in the correction and diffusion of the Antiphonary of the Roman Office. Taken as a whole, the Office also underwent certain adaptations and additions such as the chapter Office, supplementary psalms after each hour, offices such as those of the dead and the Blessed Virgin, and several commemorations and preces. All these additions burdened the Office; decadence was the result. In the 10th century an attempt was made to shorten the old Office, especially by reducing the psalmody and the readings of Matins.

As early as the 11th century there appeared the first signs of a reform that was to be accentuated with the renaissance of the 12th century and the Gregorian reform. On the one hand, the common life of clerics and the solemn choral celebration of the Office were gradually abandoned. On the other hand, the Office of the Papal Curia began to take shape, and all the elements of the Office were gathered in a single book, the BREVIARY. The Office of the Curia was adopted and propagated by the Friars Minor, and private recitation of the Office spread. Little change was made in the old texts, but numerous ad libitum sections disappeared. Moreover, trends in spirituality had great repercussions on the evolution of the Office; they were manifest in the multiplying of feasts and historical legends and by the diminishing of the number of readings as well as of certain old elements little in accord with the devotions then characteristic of piety. Finally, in the 13th century, canonists and theologians began to justify the practice of private recitation.

Tridentine Reform. In the 16th century, the necessity for a reform was felt because of all the successive but somewhat confused transformations of the Office. Clement VII gave Cardinal Francisco de QUIÑONES the responsibility of preparing a new breviary with a simpler office that would be more in conformity with tradition and historical truth. His work first appeared in 1535. It contained a completely new organization of the Office, but the old texts were hardly modified, except for the historical readings. However, it was attacked by theologians and suppressed by the Council of Trent. A new edition of the Roman Breviary was prepared by a pontifical commission and was published in 1568 by Pius V who imposed it on all churches that did not possess a liturgy at least 200 years old. The printing press was a powerful instrument for its rapid diffusion. This edition was characterized by a reduction of the calendar, the hour of Prime, the preces, and the supplementary offices.

At the end of the 16th century, the Jesuits were the first religious order to abandon the choral celebration of the Office, and their theologian, F. Suárez, taught that the obligation bore directly on private recitation. Thus the latter became the rule for the secular clergy and the modern congregations. In the 17th and 18th centuries, a certain number of churches, especially in France and Germany, readopted and corrected their old liturgies. Benedict XIV decided to reform the Breviary, but he died before realizing his project.

In 1911 Pius X began a reform of the Office by redistributing the Psalms throughout the week—shortening the lengthy Matins of Sunday, giving Sundays precedence over numerous feasts, and favoring the Office of the feria before that of feasts of inferior rank. The reform was furthered in 1955 and 1960 to favor the "temporal" Office and to obtain greater simplification.

Vatican Council II. In calling for a systematic and comprehensive reform of the liturgy of the Roman rite, Vatican Council II was motivated by deep pastoral concern. The aim of the entire endeavor was to enable Catholics once again to recognize the liturgy of the entire Church as the ritual expression of their union with Christ, and thus be moved to participate in it more actively, intelligently, and fruitfully. The same pastoral solicitude which prompted modification of the Mass, the other Sacraments, and the Calendar, was no less operative in the revision of the Divine Office—now called the Liturgy of the Hours. As plainly stated in the conciliar document Sacrosanctum Concilium on the sacred liturgy, the Office was to be reformed in order that it "may be better and more worthily prayed in existing circumstances" (art. 87; Abbott, Documents, 164).

In the estimation of the Council fathers, the chief obstacle to prayerful recitation of the Divine Office was the widespread practice of not observing the component Hours at their proper times, thereby frustrating the whole purpose of the Office, which is to sanctify the various moments of the day and night. To some extent this practice was caused by a conflict between the Office as it was then constituted and the demands of active ministry in the modern world. The Hours were simply too numerous to be prayed separately and in order; hence the almost inevitable urge to bundle them together. Furthermore, the length and arrangement of certain Hours militated against their being observed at the appointed times. But an inadequate theology of the Office, coupled with poor understanding of the psalms and other biblical elements, were also responsible for the Breviary being considered merely as an undifferentiated body of official prayers to be read within a 24-hour period by clerics in major orders and solemnly professed religious.

Recognizing this unfortunate state of affairs, the Council stipulated that "the traditional sequence of the Hours is to be restored so that as far as possible they may once again be genuinely related to the time of day at which they are prayed" (Sacrosanctum Concilium 88; Abbott, Documents, 164). To this end, Lauds and Vespers, consecrating the morning and evening, respectively, were to be celebrated as the two chief Hours around which the rest of the Office turns. Prime, a second morning prayer, was to be suppressed. The minor Hours of Terce, Sext, and None were to be retained only in choir. Outside of choir one of the three was to be selected as a prayer during the work day. It has been termed the Middle Hour. Compline was to be maintained as a prayer before going to bed. Matins, originally a night vigil, and hence the most problematic of all the Hours, was to be transformed into an atemporal Hour, now known as the Office of Readings, suitable for use at any time of day or night. In addition, the Council recommended that the component elements of the various Hours be revised. In particular, psalms were to be distributed over a longer period than I week; readings and hymns were to be more judiciously chosen and arranged.

Responsibility for the actual revision of the Office lay, of course, with the postconciliar liturgical commission and later with the Congregation for Divine Worship. The results of their work were disclosed on Feb. 2, 1971, with the publication of the General Instruction of the Liturgy of the Hours, accompanied by the Apostolic Constitution of Pope Paul VI, Laudis canticum. The General Instruction was placed at the head of the four volumes containing the texts of the new Office. It must not, however, be equated with the General Rubrics which introduced the Breviary of Pius V. Although it describes the external format of the Hours and tells how they should be executed, it also explains their theological significance. By doing so it intends to impart a spirit, to arouse and shape an attitude, to orient an approach to the Office and so facilitate its being prayed more profitably. Fruitful celebration of the Hours was after all the goal toward which the reform was directed. The objective of the General Instruction on the Liturgy of the Hours, then, is no different from that of the General Instruction on the Roman Missal.

Theology. The renewed appreciation of the Divine Office is unmistakably evident in the new term applied to it by the General Instruction: Liturgia Horarum, the Liturgy of the Hours. This designation emphasizes, first, that the Office is a liturgical act in the full sense and, second, that it is intimately bound to periods of time. As liturgy it is by nature a public and communal action of the entire people of God, faithful as well as clergy. Hence private recitation by individual clerics, though praiseworthy, is seen to be far from satisfactory. Besides referring to the action itself, the phrase Liturgy of the Hours also serves as the title of the volumes containing the texts to be employed in the celebration of the Hours. Thus the term Breviary, with all its semantic ambiguity and impropriety, has been resolutely discarded. In the not too distant past praying the Office was habitually spoken of as reading the Breviary. The changed vocabulary of the General Instruction clearly implies that the Liturgy of the Hours involves more than dutifully scanning a little book.

Building on the encyclical MEDIATOR DEI of Pius XII and the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, the General Instruction on the Liturgy of the Hours teaches that all Christian prayer is the prolongation of Christ's prayer, the principle characteristics of which are praise and intercession. The Eucharist, the other Sacraments, and the Divine Office are simply various modes whereby the Church, as Spirit-filled body of the risen Lord, is united with its Head in His one great act of glorifying the Father and pleading with Him for the needs of mankind. While the Office is a preparation for the Eucharist as well as an extension of it, it also renders present in its own way the same reality which lies at the heart of the Eucharist: the sacrifice of Christ.

Understood as a continuation of Christ's priestly work in the Church, the celebration of the Hours is no longer considered a form of liturgy belonging primarily to those in Holy Orders or solemn vows. It is recommended to all the faithful on the basis of their baptismal union with Christ. This is a most important development and presumes no slight evolution in ecclesiology. Ecclesial sensitivity is maintained throughout the General Instruction. In treating those who celebrate the Liturgy of the Hours, for example, the Instruction first discusses communal celebrations involving bishop, priests, and faithful, or various groups within the Church; only then does it take up the subject of private observance by individuals.

The obligation of ordained ministers to pray the Office is likewise presented in an ecclesial perspective:

The Liturgy of the Hours is entrusted to sacred ministers in a special way so that it is to be recited by each of them—with the necessary adaptations—even when the people are not present. The Church deputes them to say the Liturgy of the Hours in order that at least through them the duty of the whole community may be constantly and continuously fulfilled and the prayer of Christ may persevere unceasingly in the Church [General Instruction 28].

This obligation, however, should not be interpreted casuistically. Nor should it engender scruples. In reciting the whole sequence of the Hours each day, ministers should preserve "as far as possible the genuine relationship of the Hours to the time of day" (General Instruction 29). Presumably there is no obligation to recite the Hours at inappropriate times. Furthermore, the Instruction recognizes that all the Hours are not of equal weight. Lauds and Vespers are more important than the others and should not be omitted except for serious reason (General Instruction 29). The implication is that other Hours may be omitted for less than serious reason.

Structure. With few notable exceptions the general structure of each Hour is the same: opening verse, hymn, psalms, reading, and concluding prayer.

The first office of the day opens with an invitatory consisting of the verse "Lord, open my lips; and my mouth shall proclaim your praise," and Psalm 94. Subsequent Hours begin with the verse "O God come to my aid; Lord, hasten to help me." Instead of being linked to one particular Hour regardless of the time at which it is said, the invitatory now serves as a call to praise at the beginning of the day. This, after all, is its true function.

At every Hour a hymn follows the introductory verse. Besides being particularly well suited to popular participation, the hymn immediately directs attention to the spirit of the Hour or feast. Episcopal conferences are authorized to secure vernacular adaptations of the Latin hymns given in the typical edition of the Liturgy of the Hours and to introduce other appropriate compositions.

Lauds includes a morning psalm, an Old Testament cantitle, and a psalm of praise. At Vespers there are two psalms followed by a canticle from the Epistles or the Book of Revelation. Although Old Testament canticles always found place in the Divine Office, the use of canticles drawn from the Epistles and the Book of Revelation is an innovation. Psalmody at the Middle Hour usually consists of three sections of Psalm 118, or three gradual psalms. The Office of Readings also includes three psalms. One or two psalms expressing trust in God are chosen for Compline each night. Psalms 4, 90, and 133, traditional at this Hour, figure among them.

In keeping with the recommendation of the Council fathers, psalms are now distributed over a period of four weeks rather than one. Compared to the Roman Breviary the number of psalms presently employed at any Hour is reduced. Far from minimizing the importance of the Psalter, the new arrangement is intended to encourage a slower, more prayerful pondering of the sacred texts. The Liturgy of the Hours furnishes three aids for this purpose. First, each psalm bears a title indicating its general theme. A phrase from the New Testament or the Fathers is added to the title in order to evoke a specifically Christian interpretation of the Psalm. Second, a collection of psalmprayers is provided in a supplementary volume of the Liturgy of the Hours. These prayers enable the content and application of a given psalm to be savored in the form of a short oration. Third, each psalm is prefaced by an antiphon. As explained in the General Instruction,

The antiphons help to illustrate the literary character of the psalm; turn the psalm into personal prayer; place in better light a phrase worthy of attention which may otherwise be missed; give special colour to a psalm in differing circumstances; while excluding arbitrary accommodations, help considerably in the typological and festive interpreting of the psalm; and can make more attractive and varied the recitation of the psalms [113].

In the past psalmody had been a serious stumbling block on the path of many who took up the Breviary. It would be foolish to think that the aids mentioned above will automatically eliminate the problem. Appreciation of the psalms must be acquired by systematic study, and by surrender to the Spirit who inspired them. This is plainly enunciated in Numbers 100 to 109 of the General Instruction, which comment on the role of the psalms and their close relationship with Christian prayer.

Turning to the reading material of the Office, Lauds and Vespers provide a choice between two types of Scripture reading: short and long. The short readings are not mere snippits from the Epistle of the day's Mass as were many capitula of the Roman Breviary. They are carefully selected to highlight certain brief but noteworthy sayings which claim less attention when they form part of more ample pericopes. The longer reading is recommended for celebration with the people, in which case, a homily may be added. The Middle Hour and Compline always have short readings. Two long readings are given for the Office of Readings. The first is scriptural; the second is taken from the Fathers, modern authors, or the lives of the saints. At Lauds and Vespers the customary Gospel canticles succeed the readings.

Formerly every Hour of the Office ended in identical fashion: Kyrie, Lord's Prayer, oration of the Mass. The Liturgy of the Hours modifies this pattern. It suppresses the Kyrie, reserves the Lord's Prayer for Lauds and Vespers, and allows considerable diversity in the final oration. The most significant change, however, is the return of intercessions before the Our Father at Lauds and Vespers. Petitions (Latin: preces) on behalf of all were a characteristic feature of morning and evening prayer in ancient times. They took the form of a litany, the response to which was usually Kyrie eleison. With the passage of time the intentions disappeared, leaving only a thrice-repeated cry for mercy. Thus the restoration of intercessions is consistent with the suppression of the Kyrie.

Parish Catechesis on the Liturgy of the Hours.

The obligation of bishops, priests, and deacons to pray the hours is linked to their duty to assure the celebration of this liturgy by local communities, particularly on Sundays and solemnities. Deacons and priests, together with parish liturgy planning teams, were encouraged to devise programs of creative catechesis and implementation of the Liturgy of the Hours, aware of the possibilities and needs of the particular parish. Pastoral adaptation of the hours, as well as parish catechesis on the Office, drew its direction from the General Instruction on the Liturgy of the Hours, a theological and pastoral document.

Parishes learned from experience in the implementation of new liturgical rites that catechesis was not only desirable but necessary before and during that implementation. While the Liturgy of the Hours, particularly Morning and Evening Prayer, did not represent a great innovation, American Catholics did not have much experience with this form of common prayer, especially the common recitation or singing of the Psalms. Experience with the Responsorial Psalm in the Eucharistic Liturgy demonstrated the need for a thorough-going catechesis on the nature of the Psalms, the tradition of their use in the Church's liturgy, and the various forms of singing them. Thus instruction on psalmody benefited the celebration of the Eucharist as well as the Office. The General Instruction of the Liturgy of the Hours provided a sound basis for parish catechesis since it offered a pastoral theology of the praying Church. Central is the relationship between prayer and witness: "When one takes part in the Liturgy of the Hours, he contributes in a hidden way to the growth of God's people, for he makes the apostolate more fruitful" (ibid. 18). Frequent communal prayer is therefore intrinsic to parish life, for such prayer strengthens and nourishes the resolve of the Church to persevere in its witness to Christ in the world. "Prayer is of the very essence of the Church. The Church is a community and should express in prayer its communal nature" (ibid. 19). Some of the following principles and themes might be included in a parish catechesis:

- (1) the relationship of communal prayer and Christian witness (ibid. 19);
- (2) the consecration of time and the sanctification of the Church (ibid. 10–11, 14);
- (3) the Liturgy of the Hours as preparation for the Eucharist (ibid. 12);
- (4) participation in Christ's priestly work of praise (ibid. 13, 15–16);
- (5) developing the prayer of supplication and intercession (ibid. 17);
- (6) the Psalms as Christian prayer, and the nature of psalmody (ibid. 100–109, 121–139);
- (7) the place of God's Word, its reading, and celebration in the life of the Church (ibid. 140–158);
- (8) the nature of the various hours of prayer, and the intrinsic importance of Morning and Evening Prayer;
- (9) the celebration of the liturgical year through the Liturgy of the Hours.

These are only some of the themes with which a pastoral catechesis on the Liturgy of the Hours might deal. The General Instruction is rich in a great variety of subjects that clergy were encouraged to study carefully.

Pastoral Considerations in the Implementation of the Hours. "Perhaps the most difficult and challenging task is to make the liturgy of the hours in fact and practice, as well as in theory and doctrine, the prayer of the entire Church" (United States Bishops' Committee on the Liturty, A Call to Prayer). Extraordinary efforts are indeed required to implement the celebration of the communal prayer of the Church. Likewise hard pastoral questions regarding the priority of prayer in individual parishes need to be asked. One such question involves scheduling. Given the pastoral practice of daily Eucharists, for example, when does one schedule and celebrate Morning and Evening Prayer, "the hinges of the Office," in a local parish?

(1) Scheduling the Hours. Obviously the most important days for celebrating the hours are Sundays and solemnities; secondarily, feasts and weekdays. The greatest obstacle, oddly enough, is the multiplicity of Masses on those days. Parishes need to reexamine their Mass schedules in order to strike a proper balance between the principles of convenience and the presence of a community at the Eucharist. Too often in large urban or suburban parishes weekday and Sunday Eucharists are multiplied in the name of convenience for the people, when in fact very few people are present at certain celebrations, especially in the early morning hours. The question of stipends and support of the clergy, a legitimate concern, frequently intervenes in the problem of scheduling. The Eucharist needs to be scheduled according to need and the actual presence of an assembly. Once that is accomplished, Morning and Evening Prayer may take their proper places. The liturgical day ought to begin, especially on Sundays, with Morning Prayer and conclude with Evening Prayer. For example, Sundays might begin with Evening Prayer I ("First Vespers") on Saturday before the anticipated Masses and might be celebrated as a vigil to prepare those who are present for the Sunday Eucharist. Late Sunday evening may seem more suitable nowadays for the celebration of Evening Prayer II, rather than late afternoon as in the past. However, this may vary from place to place.

(2) Which Hours to Celebrate? As Morning and Evening Prayer are the hinges of the Church's daily round of prayer, they are naturally the most important of all when scheduling the celebration of the hours. However, the other hours of the Office should find some place in a parish's prayer life. Daytime Prayer (mid-morning, midday, or mid-afternoon) and Night Prayer (Compline) are as easily celebrated by small groups as they are by large groups. Rather than beginning a parish meeting "with a prayer," one of the hours might be recited or sung. Thus an evening parents' meeting might end with Night Prayer; a school faculty meeting in the afternoon might end or begin with one of the daytime hours. Even on a diocesan level, those who plan meetings and congresses ought seriously to consider solemn celebration of one of the hours instead of the Eucharist, especially on weekends; in this way people are not taken away from their parish Eucharistic celebration. Even the Office of Readings can be profitably celebrated in a parish on important occasions, since it enables people to delve more deeply into the Scripture and become acquainted with the rich theological tradition which the second reading of that Office represents. Marian, Eucharistic, and other devotions can be carefully joined to the celebration of some of the hours from time to time.

- (3) Who Leads the Celebration of the Hours? Those who are obliged to the Office also have the responsibility to lead the people in its celebration. Thus priests and deacons, and even the bishop in his cathedral, should lead in the celebration of each of the hours. However, the leadership of prayer in the celebration of the Liturgy of the Hours is not limited to those in Orders. Lay men and women and religious should be trained in the ministry of prayer-leadership to assure the daily celebration of the hours. Families should likewise be encouraged to pray the hours at home, especially Morning, Evening and/or Night Prayer.
- (4) Participation Materials. The publication of materials suitable for the celebration of the hours is still in process. While the four-volume edition of the Liturgy of the Hours, and its one-volume excerpt, Christian Prayer, are available, these are too expensive for most parishes. However, excerpts from the hours are being published (e.g., Shorter Christian Prayer) and made available. Parish liturgy committees should investigate what is available.
- (5) Musical Choices. In celebrating any of the hours, planners ought to keep in mind certain principles with regard to music. Obviously the hymn which begins Morning or Evening Prayer must be sung and must reflect the character of the feast. A choice must be made with regard to PSALMODY, to sing or not to sing the Psalms, to use Psalm tones (e.g. Gregorian, Anglican, Gélineau, etc.), or metric Psalms. If Psalm tones are chosen, then the type of psalmody is important; responsorial, antiphonal, or indirectum. While the Psalms need not be sung on weekdays, it would seem inappropriate merely to recite them on Sundays and solemnities. In parish celebration consideration ought to be given to the question of using a constant repertory of Psalms, rather than varying them every day. As with the Eucharist, care, planning and competent musical leadership are required. The simplest of chants are quite accessible to most congregations nowadays and ought not to be rejected out of hand as too difficult or out of date. Music in the Liturgy of the Hours is not ornamental—the Psalms are songs before all else—for the "sung celebration of the Divine Office is the form which best accords with the nature of this prayer" (General Instruction of the Liturgy of Hours 268).

(6) Ritual Elements in the Celebration of the Hours. The celebration of any of the hours may be as simple or as elaborate as the needs of a particular community or occasion may require. The use of such ritual elements as water, light, incense, flowers, processional banners, vestments, or electronic media (e.g., visuals) ought carefully to be integrated in the celebration of the Office and in the proper places. For example, the use of incense is traditional during the singing of the Magnificat or Benedictus. At times incense may be used as a penitential act in the celebration of Evening Prayer. A light service or lucernarium can sometimes be joined to Evening Prayer as well, just as a rite of sprinkling to recall Baptism might find a occasional place in Morning Prayer.

(7) Other Occasions in Celebrating the Hours Solemnly. There are many occasions when the Liturgy of the Hours ought to be celebrated with solemnity, not as an alternative to the Eucharist, but rather as more fitting than the Eucharist. (a) At ecumenical gatherings, such as are held during the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity or on Thanksgiving Day, Christians from many different backgrounds can draw on the common tradition of Morning or Evening Prayer of the various Churches to create a truly ecumenical and unifying service of prayer. Many of the Churches are in the process of revising or already have revised their rites for the Liturgy of the Hours. These revisions, as with the Roman Catholic reform of the Office, are based on the common tradition and demonstrate an already achieved liturgical unity. Thus an ecumenical gathering ought to be celebrated in this Liturgy that all can call their own and in which unity may already be perceived. (b) During the seasons of Advent, Epiphany, Lent, and Easter special celebrations of Morning or Evening Prayer, or even the Office of Readings, might be adapted without prejudice to the normal celebration of the hours or the Eucharist. For example, on the third Sunday of Advent the celebration of Evening Prayer might be lengthened and adapted to resemble a ceremony of lessons and carols. An Evening Prayer in Lent might be joined to a celebration of the Stations of the Cross. Evening Prayer on the feast of the Epiphany might include a dramatic reading or dramatization (through dance, mime, etc.) of the theophany of the Messiah. During Eastertide, a longer Office of Readings might be devised for the neophytes during their mystagogia, stressing the communal nature of their newly acquired faith. Such adaptations, of course, ought to be accomplished without doing harm to the course of prayer or the liturgical year as provided in the liturgical books and must be carefully planned.

The Liturgy of the Hours as Family Prayer. The need for families to pray together is important not only that children might grow up in an atmosphere of prayer and devotion, but also because through prayer a family can find nourishment for its faith and strength for its unity. The Liturgy of the Hours does provide, especially in the "little hours" (Daytime Prayer and Night Prayer), a varying form of prayer for parents and children that is adaptable to the needs of each particular family. Members of the family can participate in Night Prayer, for example, in a variety of ways. The Psalm is constant for each day of the week. The Nunc dimittis (Canticle of Simeon) is unchanging. After a while these invariables can be learned by heart and become a part of each person's "repertory" of prayer. The Marian antiphons at the end of Night Prayer, like the opening hymn, can be easily sung by a family. Prayerful silence is likewise learned from this prayer, as is a sense of penitence and reflection on the day's activities during the examination of conscience. Instead of a hastily recited formula for grace before meals, Prayer at Midday might be recited in common around the table before the start of Sunday dinner. The celebration of the Liturgy of the Hours by a family has many merits, e.g. familiarity and use of the Psalms as Christian prayer, the singing of simple hymns, but most of all the development of prayer in the life of a child that prepares the child for Sunday worship and eventually for Christian witness.

Communal Prayer and Personal Prayer. The goal of the Liturgy of the Hours is the development and growth of a praying Church, a Church united to the communion of saints who worship in the presence of God. Communal prayer ultimately develops an intense life of personal prayer. The Liturgy of the Hours will always need to be adapted; thus Paul VI noted that the 1971 revision has provided "various forms of celebration that can be accomodated to the various groups, with their differing needs" (Paul VI, Laudis Canticum 1). There is no opposition between communal and personal prayer, especially when the latter draws its nourishment from the former. "When the prayer of the the Office becomes real personal prayer, then the bonds that unite Liturgy and the whole of Christian life are manifested more clearly. The whole life of the faithful, during the single hours of the day and the night, constitutes a leitourgia, as it were, with which they offer themselves in a service of love to God and to men, adhering to the action of Christ, who, by staying among us and offering himself, sanctified the lives of all men' (ibid. 8).

See Also: COMPLINE; LITTLE OFFICE OF THE BVM; LITTLE HOURS; OFFICE OF THE DEAD; MATINS; LAUDS; VESPERS; BREVIARY, ROMAN.

Bibliography: P. SALMON, The Breviary through the Centuries, tr. D. MARY (Collegeville, Minnesota 1962). J. A. JUNGMANN, Pastoral Liturgy (New York 1962); Public Worship: A Survey, tr. C. HOWELL (Collegeville, Minnesota 1957). P. PARSCH, The Breviary Explained, tr. W. NAYDEN and C. HOEGERL (St. Louis 1952). H. ASHWORTH, OSB, "The New Patristic Lectionary," Ephemerides liturgicae 85 (1971) 306-22. "La liturgie des heures: le renouveau de l'office divin," Maison-Dieu 105 (1971). Liturgia Horarum, typical ed., 4 v. (Vatican City 1971). A. G. MARTIMORT, "L' 'Institutio generalis' et la nouvelle 'Liturgia Horarum,'" Notitiae 7 (1971) 218-40. A. ROSE, "La répartition des lectures bibliques dans le livre de la Liturgie des Heures," Ephemerides liturgicae 85 (1971) 281-301. W. G. STOREY, "The Liturgy of the Hours: Principles and Practice," Worship 46 (1972) 194-203. United States Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, A Call to Prayer. The Liturgy of the Hours (Washington, D.C. 1977). P. BOTZ, "Praying the Psalms," Worship 46 (1972) 204-13. Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments, General Instruction of the Liturgy of the Hours (Washington, D.C. 1975). J. D. CRICHTON, Christian Celebration: The Prayer of the Church (London 1976). PAUL VI, Laudis Canticum, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 63 (1971) 527-35; tr. Laudis Canticum. Apostolic Constitution on the Breviary (Washington, D.C. 1977). F. C. QUINN, "Music and the Prayer of Praise," Worship 46 (1972) 214-19. A. M. ROGUET, The Liturgy of the Hours: The General Instruction with Commentary, tr. P. COUGHLAN and P. PURDUE (Collegeville, Minnesota 1974). W. G. STOREY, "Parish Worship: The Liturgy of the Hours," Worship 49 (1975) 2–12. W. G. STOREY, et al., eds., Morning Praise and Evensong. A Liturgy of the Hours in Musical Setting (Notre Dame, Indiana 1973). P. F. BRADSHAW, Daily Prayer in the Early Church: A Study of the Origin and Early Development of the Divine Office (London 1981). G. GUIVER, Company of Voices: Daily Prayer and the People of God (New York 1988). R. TAFT, The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West: The Origins of the Divine Office and Its Meaning for Today 2nd rev. ed. (Collegeville, Minnesota 1993).

[P. SALMON/P. REGAN/J. A. GURRIERI/EDS.]

LITZ, DAMIAN

Marianist educator and columnist for various Catholic newspapers, whose teaching and writing influenced many German-speaking Catholics in the U.S.; b. Eschenbach, Baden, Germany, Aug. 15, 1822; d. San Antonio, TX., Feb. 24, 1903. He entered the Society of Mary in 1844 in France (see MARIANISTS). Five years later he volunteered with three other brothers, Andrew Edel, Maximin Zehler, and John Stintzi, to pioneer the educational work of the Society of Mary in America. For more than half a century he established or consolidated schools conducted by his congregation in ten of the principal cities in the U.S. At St. Michael's in Baltimore, MD, Litz began a 35-year apostolate of the press, a supplementary work of zeal and instruction. His articles for the German Catholic Volkszeitung of Baltimore were so much in demand that Catholic papers in Philadelphia, PA; Cincinnati, Ohio; and later in San Antonio, carried his weekly column. Published under the title Unter Uns, they helped spread his literary fame.

Bibliography: J. E. GARVIN, The Centenary of the Society of Mary (Dayton 1917). J. W. SCHMITZ, The Society of Mary in Texas (San Antonio 1951).

[J. W. SCHMITZ]

LIU ZIYN, PETER, ST.

Lay martyr, potter; b. 1843. Zhujiaxie, Shen County, Hebei (Hopeh) Province, China; d. there, July 17, 1900. At the height of the Boxer persecution, many of the Christians in the predominantly Catholic village of Zhujiaxie sought refuge in Tangqui in Ningcing County. The bachelor Peter Liu Ziyn (also given as Tzu-yü, Tzeu-U, or Zeyu) determined to remain and trust in God. He was captured, ordered to apostatize, and beheaded and disemboweled upon refusal. Because of his courage before his tormentors, he was beatified by Pope Pius XII on April 17, 1955 and canonized on Oct. 1, 2000 by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Bibliography: L. MINER, China's Book of Martyrs: A Record of Heroic Martyrdoms and Marvelous Deliverances of Chinese Christians during the Summer of 1900 (Ann Arbor 1994). J. SIMON, Sous le Sabre des Boxers (Lille 1955). C. TESTORE, Sangue e Palme Sul Fiume Giallo. I Beati Martiri Cinesi Nella Persecuzione Della Boxe Celi Sud-Est, 1900 (Rome 1955). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 40 (2000): 1–2, 10.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LIUTBIRG, ST.

Virgin, anchoress; d. c. 876 or 882. Little is known of Liutbirg's origin. Her family appears to have lived in the neighborhood of the Altmühl River (southern Germany). She spent some time in the household of Gisla, daughter of the east Saxon Count Hessi. About 824 she had herself enclosed (see ANCHORITES) in a hermitage attached to the cloister at Wendhausen by Bishop Thiatgrim of Halberstadt. She instructed young girls in church music and handiwork. HAYMO OF HALBERSTADT often sought her prayers and counsel. Since the fifteenth century the day of her death has been variously assigned to February 28 and December 22, 30, or 31. She was buried at Wendhausen. In the eleventh century she was venerated in Quedlinberg.

Feast: Feb. 28.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 3:723, 768. O. MENZEL, Das Leben der Liutbirg (Leipzig 1937); "Die heilige Liutbirg," Deutsches Archiv für Geschichte des Mittelalters 2 (1938): 189–193; "Das Leben der Liutbirg," Sachsen und Anhalt 13 (Magdeburg 1937): 78–89. W. GROSSE, "Kloster Wendhausen, sein Stiftergeschlecht und seine Klausnerin," ibid. 16 (1940): 45–76.

[M. B. RYAN]

LIUTPRAND OF CREMONA

Bishop of Cremona, historian; b. probably in Pavia, Italy, c. 920; d. probably 972. He was a scion of a noble Lombard family, and both his father and stepfather had served as ambassadors from King Hugh of Italy to Constantinople in 927 and 942. Liutprand was admitted to the court school in Pavia and later became a deacon in that city. After the overthrow of King Hugh, the family became partisans of King Berengar II of Italy, who sent Liutprand as an envoy to Constantinople in 949. On his return, Liutprand quarreled with Berengar and fled to the court of the Roman Emperor OTTO I THE GREAT. In Frankfurt am Main (956) Liutprand was encouraged by Bishop Recemundus of Elvira, the ambassador of Caliph Abd ar-Rahman II of Córdoba to Otto the Great, to compose a history of his times, and it was there that he wrote his Antapodosis (Retribution). Liutprand took part in Otto's second Italian campaign and was installed as bishop of Cremona by the emperor. He continued in Otto's service and was much in evidence when Otto intervened in affairs of the Holy See in 963 and 965—it was these events he described in his Historia Ottonis. In 968 Otto sent Liutprand to Constantinople to obtain a bride for his son and heir, OTTO II; Liutprand's third work, the Relatio de legatione Constantinopolitana, describes this unsuccessful mission. There is repeated evidence of Liutprand's presence both at court and in his diocese after he returned home, but the date of his death is not known with certainty. However, the first documented date in the career of his successor is March 5, 973.

Liutprand was no theologian, but his historical works show great rhetorical talent. He mixed verse with his prose in the fashion of the satire of Menippus, probably imitating Boethius's De consolatione philosophiae in this matter; he often cited Latin classical writers and delighted in demonstrating his knowledge of Greek, an uncommon achievement in his time. His works reveal a man of turbulent temperament. His pride, his hatred of political opponents, his scorn for clerical and secular Rome as well as for the Byzantine court, led to drastic distortions in his accounts of situations and personalities. Liutprand's political goal was the growth and freedom of the Lombard kingdom. Although he approved of the emperor's intervention in Italy, he was willing to grant the Lombard crown only to the person of Otto, and not to the German king per se. Furthermore, for Liutprand, the office of emperor had only canonical, not civil, function, and its universality derived only from its protection of the Roman church, which was the head of the universal Church.

Liutprand's Antapodosis (in six books written between 955 and 962 and left incomplete) claims to portray "the deeds of emperors and kings of all Europe," but in fact it confines itself to events in Germany, Italy, and Byzantium beginning with the year 888. The work lacks chronological detail and is anecdotal in style, but it remains a valuable medieval source. Its initially sober style gives way to violent invective against Berengar II and Queen Willa (hence the title). Beginning in 935, the work is based on personal experience; it breaks off in the midst of the description of the 949 embassy. The Antapodosis may well have prompted Adalbert of Magdeburg to write his history of the years from 907 to 967 as a continuation of REGINO OF PRÜM's chronicle. The Historia Ottonis (to 964) describes Otto I's clashes with the Roman nobility and with their papal nominees JOHN XII and BENEDICT V. The work is a semiofficial apologia of Ottonian policy for the years from 960 to 964 and is based partly on documents. The Relatio de legatione Constantinopolitana is a diatribe against Emperor Nicephorus II Phocas, calculated to incite Otto to a new war against Byzantium in southern Italy. The Chronicon (Patrologia Latina 136:967-1134), the Adversaria (Patrologia Latina 136:1134-1180), and the Opusculum de vitis Romanorum pontificum (Patrologia Latina 129:1149-1256) ascribed to Liutprand are spurious.

Bibliography: Works. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826-) 3:273-363. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878-90) 136:787-938. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (Berlin 1826-) (3d ed. 1915) 41:1-212. L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, 25 v. in 28 (2d, new ed. Città di Castello 1900–) 2.1:425-489, except for the Historia Ottonis, Eng. tr. by F. A. WRIGHT (London 1930). Literature. A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca historica medii aevi (2d ed. 1896: repr. Graz 1954) 1:742-744. J. BECKER, ed., Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (3d ed. Berlin 1915) 41:vii-xl. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911-31) 2:166-175. F. C. DAHLMANN and G. WAITZ, Quellenkunde der deutschen Geschichte (9th ed. Leipzig 1932) 5946. M. LINTZEL, Studien über Liutprand von Cremona (Berlin 1933), reprt. in Ausgewählte Schriften 2 (1961): 351-398. S. PIVANO, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienzi, littere ed arti, 36 v. (Rome 1929-39, suppl. 1938-) 21:316. A. CUTOLO, ed., Tutte le opere (Milan 1945) 1-43. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Deutsche Kaiserzeit (3d ed. Tübingen 1948) 1.2:318-321. G. E. FONTANA, Annali di Bibl. govern. e Libreria civica di Cremona 1 (1948): 75-; 2 (1949): 78-. G. ARNALDI, "Liutprando e l'idea di Roma nell'lato medioevo," Archivio della Società romana di storia patria 79 (1956): 23-34. J. E. REXINE, "The Roman Bishop Liutprand and Constantinople," Greek Orthodox Theological Review 3 (1957): 197–211.

[H. M. KLINKENBERG]

11.1:810–817. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 7:377.

[W. A. JURGENS]

LIUTWIN OF TRIER, ST.

Founder, bishop; d. Reims, Sept. 29, 717–722. Liutwin was descended from Frankish nobility that had considerable prerogatives under the CAROLINGIANS. In 690 Liutwin founded his monastery of Mettlach. Upon the death of his uncle, Basinus, in 705, he succeeded to his See of TRIER. He also became bishop of the dioceses of REIMS and Laon, probably through the grace of CHARLES MARTEL (716–741). Liutwin's son Milo succeeded him as bishop of Trier and of Reims. Liutwin was buried at Mettlach; his remains were translated some time after 1483. His life was written by THIOFRID OF ECHTERNACH (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores [Berlin 1826–] 15:1261–1268).

Feast: Sept. 29.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (2d ed. Paris 1907–15) v. 3. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901) 2:4955–4959. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:115–116. E. EWIG, "Milo et eiusmodi similes," Sankt Bonifatius: Gedenkgabe zum zwölfhundertsten Todestag (Fulda 1954) 412–440.

[G. J. DONNELLY]

LIVARIUS OF METZ, ST.

According to a twelfth-century legend, a knight, Livarius (Livier), along with Saints Purgentius and Agentius, was martyred by the Huns at Marsal, south of Metz, in Lorraine, where there is a chapel dedicated to them. Other accounts would place the martyrdom of Livarius at Lyons. If there is any historical basis to the legend, it will most likely be found in the Hungarian incursion of the ninth and tenth centuries. Late in the tenth century the relics of Livarius were removed to the abbey church of Saint-Vincent in Metz by Bishop Theodoric I. In the eleventh century they were translated to the church of Saint-Polyeucte in Metz, which was rededicated to Livarius in the twelfth century.

Feast: July 17.

Bibliography: R. HARMAND, "Les Miracles de Salival: La Légende de Saint Livier . . . ," Bulletin Mensuel de la Société d'Archéologie Lorraine 7 (1907): 190–212, notice of this article in Analecta Bollandiana 27 (1908): 226–227. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 15 v. (Paris 1907–53)

LIZÁRRAGA, REGINALDO DE

Dominican bishop and author; b. Medellín, Extremadura, Spain, 1539; d. Asunción, Paraguay, Nov. 1609. Baltasar de Obando, as he was born, went to America with his parents. In 1560 he became a Dominican in Lima. He went to Chile for the first time as head of the province of St. Lawrence Martyr. His trip from Callao, Peru, to Coquimbo, Chile, was exceptional because it took him only 22 days. His second trip took place in 1587, and he was still in Santiago when Bishop Medellín, a relative of his, died (1593). Later he lived in the Jauja Valley, where he first planned his book. In 1599 he was made bishop of Imperial, Chile, but he remained in Lima until the middle of 1602. His see city had been ravaged by a native uprising begun in 1598, and he had to move to Concepción (1603). He did not stay there long. By the beginning of 1608 he was on his way to the Bishopric in Rio de la Plata, with headquarters in Asunción. Fray Reginaldo was both a man of action and an author. Meléndez, his biographer, mentions six of his works. Only two are extant: one report and the extensive Descripción breve de toda la tierra del Perú, Tucumán, Rio de la Plata y Chile, also called Descripción y población de las Indias (C. A. Romero, ed., Lima 1908; R. Rojas, ed., Buenos Aires 1916). Caillet-Bois characterizes this work as a "little encyclopedia of practical knowledge." The report entitled "Una opinión relativa a la guerra contra los indios chilenos," written in Lima in 1599, has been published in Cuerpo de documentos del siglo XVI (Mexico City 1943).

Bibliography: J. T. MEDINA, Historia de la literatura colonial de Chile, 3 v. (Santiago de Chile 1878). R. ROJAS, Los coloniales, v. 3, 4 of Historia la literatura argentina, 9 v. (4th ed. Buenos Aires 1957). J. CAILLET BOIS, Historia de la literatura argentina (Buenos Aires 1958).

[A. M. ESCUDERO]

LLANDAFF, ANCIENT SEE OF

Llandaff, Ancient See of, one of the four ancient Welsh dioceses, near Cardiff, Wales. Like other ancient churches of WALES, Llandaff was founded by the missionary activity of Celtic monks of the 5th and 6th centuries. St. Oudoceus (d. c. 590), to whom with SS. Dubricius and Teilo the church was originally dedicated, is believed to have founded Llandaff. Though doubts have been expressed whether it was the seat of the pre-Norman bishops of Morgannwg (modern Glamorgan), there is good reason for thinking it an ancient foundation. But its early history is as much confused as illuminated by Liber Landavensis, a 12th-century compilation containing authentic material that purports to tell the history of the diocese but is perhaps chiefly concerned with validating the territorial and other claims of its post-Norman bishops. After the Norman Conquest Llandaff's boundaries were determined, not without bitter controversies, and covered most of the modern counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth. Cathedral dignitaries and capitular organization, archdeaconries, rural deaneries, parish boundaries, and Roman discipline were introduced at the same time. Urban of Llandaff (1107-33), first builder of the cathedral, was the first Welsh bishop to take the oath of canonical obedience to Canterbury. The fortunes of the see were closely controlled by the lords of Glamorgan until 1290, when Edward I asserted royal rights over it. Tension was created in the 14th century by conflict between the claims of the pope, who succeeded in providing many bishops, and those of the king and the almost invariably royal nominees. Much damaged during the Glyn Dwr Rebellion (1400–10), the see remained in poverty-stricken condition during the 15th century. It was valued at £144 in Valor Ecclesiasticus, but suffered heavy losses of its possessions under Bp. Anthony Kitchen (1545–63), the only Marian bishop to accept the Elizabethan settlement. Today Llandaff, as well as the Dioceses of Monmouth and Swanseand-Brecon, which were formed from it, is one of the six dioceses of the Church of Wales (see also ST. ASAPH; ST. DAVIDS).

Bibliography: A. Bibliography of the History of Wales (2d ed. Cardiff 1962). J. C. DAVIES, Episcopal Acts Relating to Welsh Dioceses, 1066–1272, 2 v. (Cardiff 1946–48). E. T. DAVIES, ed. The Story of the Church in Glamorgan, 560–1960 (London 1962). C. BROOKE, "The Archbishops of St. Davids, Llandaff and Caerleon–on–Isk," Studies in the Early British Church, ed. N. CHADWICK (Cambridge, England 1958) 201–242. G. WILLIAMS, The Welsh Church from Conquest to Reformation (Cardiff 1962).

[G. WILLIAMS]

LLANTHONY, MONASTERY OF

House of CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE, situated in the remote valley of the Honddu (hence its name Llanhonddu or Church-of-the-Honddu) in the Black Mountains of southeastern Wales. The priory began as the hermitage of William de Lacy, a knight turned hermit in the time of William Rufus (1090–1100). A church was consecrated in 1108 and evolved into an Augustinian priory c. 1118. It flourished until the turmoil in WALES following the death of Henry I (1135). A second priory,

The ruins of Llanthony Priory in Gwent, Wales. (©John Heseltine/CORBIS)

Llanthony Secunda, was then founded near Gloucester. At Llanthony Prima new buildings of great beauty were begun c. 1175 to 1190 and completed by 1230. The two priories became independent by agreement c. 1205. Llanthony Prima, though holding considerable possessions in its own vicinity and in Ireland, suffered a marked decline during the difficult period of the 14th and 15th centuries. In 1481 Henry DEANE, prior of Llanthony Secunda, obtained a royal grant for the merger of Llanthony Prima with his own priory. Abp. William WARHAM visited Llanthony Prima in 1504. It continued to maintain a prior and four canons until the Dissolution, when its income was estimated in Valor Ecclesiasticus as £112. On March 10, 1538, the deed of surrender of both priories was signed by Richard, prior of Llanthony Secunda, and David, prior of Llanthony Prima, as well as 23 others.

Bibliography: A Bibliography of the History of Wales (2d ed. Cardiff 1962). G. WILLIAMS, The Welsh Church from Conquest to Reformation (Cardiff 1962). O. E. CRASTER, Llanthony Priory (London 1963).

[G. WILLIAMS]

LLORENTE, JUAN ANTONIO

Spanish historian; b. Rincón del Soto, Aragon, March 30, 1756; d. Madrid, Spain, Feb. 5, 1823. Llorente was educated in Tarragona and continued his studies in Roman law and Canon Law at Zaragoza. He was ordained in 1779, and in 1781 became an advocate at the Council of Castile. The following year the bishop of Calahorra appointed him vicar-general of that diocese. Although in his religious views Llorente was already strongly influenced by JANSENISM and the ideas of the Enlightenment, he was appointed a commissioner of the Inquisition. In 1794 his plan for a reform of the Holy Office was used by the royal minister, Gaspar Jovellanos, and later Manuel de Godoy used it for the initial steps in the establishment of a schismatic church. Llorente's program envisaged the restoration of the Spanish Church to conditions that had prevailed in the sixth and seventh centuries, and this was set forth in his Collección diplomatica de varios papeles antiguos y modernos sobre dispensas matrimoniales y otros puntos de disciplina ecclesiástica. During the French occupation of Spain, he gave his allegiance to Joseph Bonaparte and was finally put in charge of the property confiscated from the Church by the French regime. The French defeat in Spain forced Llorente to go to France, and he took with him a good part of the archives of the Aragonese Inquisition. Although he wrote many books, a major part of them polemical in character, his most valuable work is his Histoire critique de l'Inquisition d'Espagne. . . (4 v. Paris 1817-18).

[S. J. T. MILLER]

LLOYD, JOHN, ST.

Welsh priest, martyr; b. Brecon, Wales, 1630?; d. Cardiff, July 22, 1679. Nothing is known of his life before he entered the seminary at Valladolid in 1649. He was ordained on June 7, 1653. On April 17, 1654, he left for England, and he worked on the mission in his native Wales. He was marked out as a victim by the Calvinist John Arnold, a justice of the peace, and after the outbreak of the Oates persecution, Lloyd was arrested in Glamorgan, Nov. 20, 1678. It was reported that he used to say Mass at Treivor, Llantilio (where there were many Catholics), and at Penrhos. No other charges were made against him. On his capture he was confined to Cardiff Castle in the same underground dungeon as Philip EVANS, with whom he was later tried and executed. Although many Catholics were brutally treated in an attempt to make them testify that they had witnessed these two priests performing their sacred functions, none did; eventually an old lady and her daughter were bribed into testifying against them. On their false evidence, Lloyd and Evans together were indicted and condemned (May 3, 1679), on the sole ground of their priesthood. They were not executed until July 22. Lloyd had first to witness the barbarous sentence of death carried out on his companion, Philip Evans. On the scaffold, in Gallows Field, he explained, "I never was a good speaker in my life"; and in a simple manner proclaimed his own faith, asked forgiveness of any persons he may have offended, and urged his fellow Catholics to bear their sufferings with patience. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929 and canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970.

Feast: July 22; Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: T. P. ELLIS, The Catholic Martyrs of Wales (London 1933). J. STONOR, Six Welsh Martyrs (Postulation Pamphlets; London 1961) 13–14. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:166–167. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time (London and New York 1855–1902) 4:289–290.

[G. FITZHERBERT]

LOAYSA, JERÓNIMO DE

First archbishop of Peru; b. Trujillo or Talavera, Spain, 1498; d. Lima, Oct. 25, 1575. In 1540, eight years after the conquest of Peru, the Spanish found it necessary to enlarge the ecclesiastical organization for the area; the bishopric of Cuzco, the only one created thus far, was not enough. That year the Castillan monarch asked papal approval for the erection of a new diocese in Lima, already the seat of the government and later the capital of the viceroyalty. The pope acted on the request in May of 1541 and appointed as first bishop the Dominican, Jerónimo de Loaysa. Loaysa, born of a noble family, had entered the Dominican convent in Córdoba, probably influenced by family connections with the order: his cousin was Fray García de Loaysa, cardinal primate of Spain, master general of the order, and president of the Council of Indies. After making his profession, he studied humanities in Coria and theology in Seville, completing his theological studies at the Dominican college of San Gregorio in Valladolid under some of the outstanding theologians of the period, who were occupied with the moral problems involved in the conquest of the Indies. This influence, added to his Thomistic background, served him well when he was put in charge of the religious organization of the viceroyalty of Peru. After teaching at Córdoba and Granada and serving as prior in Carboneras, he decided to go to the Indies and devote himself to missionary work. He arrived in the New World late in 1529 or early in 1530, but within the year he was back in Spain as missionary commissary of the order, raising funds for the missions. While there, he was nominated bishop of Cartagena and consecrated in Valladolid in June of 1537. He made his solemn entrance into the diocese at the end of 1538 but was there only a few years until his appointment as bishop of Lima.

Loaysa arrived in Lima on July 25, 1543, in the middle of the civil wars in which the viceroy had just been taken prisoner. The bishop tried in vain to reconcile the quarreling factions. In Panama, he met the new governor, La Gasca, sent by the king to pacify the area, and returned to Lima with him. He then proceeded to the canonical organization of the Church, giving it the same constitutions as those of the Diocese of Seville. The civil wars were hardly over, and he was involved in building the cathedral and laying plans for the conversion of the indigenous peoples, when he received the bulls of Paul II raising Lima to an archbishopric and appointing him first archbishop. In December of 1549 he published a muchneeded Instrucción in which he set forth in a concrete fashion the means to be followed in missionary work. To further inspire missionary activity and to discuss the problems involved in it, he called the First Provincial Council of Lima in October of 1551. From this council came regulations for systematic evangelization and a code for canonical discipline that remained fundamentally in force until the Third Council of Lima in 1583. With the publication of the Tridentine decrees, Loaysa called the Second Provincial Council in March of 1567 to incorporate them into the ecclesiastical regulations of Peru. This council followed the decrees of Trent very closely, making some attempt to adapt them to the reality of Peru. However, the enforcement of its regulations was negligible.

Bishop Loaysa founded many parishes and furthered the building of many convents. Perhaps his most important work was the founding of the Hospital de Santa Ana, where natives were cared for and given religious instruction. In 1550 he provided for a school there in which the children of caciques were educated. He lived there himself until his death.

Bibliography: M. DE MENDIBURU, Diccionario histórico-biográfico del Peru, 11 v. (2d ed. Lima 1931–34) 7:38–66.

[F. DE ARMAS MEDINA]

LOBBES, ABBEY OF

A Benedictine monastery near Thuin in Belgian Flanders, founded between 636 and 654 by St. Landelin in honor of St. Peter. Lobbes (Laubias, Laubacum) enjoyed a period of prosperity until the 9th century, when it fell victim to the custom of appointing laymen as abbots, and its possessions and reputation began to decline. From 885 to 960 the bishops of Liège held the abbatial office, and during this period the abbey's life was disturbed also by invasions of the region by the Normans and Hungarians. In 960 the abbey's independence was restored and it was again allowed to choose its own abbots. Under a succession of great leaders—Folcwin (965–990), Heriger (990-1007), Richard (1020-32), and Hugh (1033–53)—Lobbes again prospered. From its flourishing theological school came future bishops and abbots for other monasteries. Several important historical works were produced during this period: the Gesta abbatum Lobbiensium, written by Abbot Folcwin, and the Annales Laubacenses, a history of the Carolingian kingdom. The period of prosperity continued until the second half of the 12th century, when a decline set in, accompanied by continual financial difficulties which were not overcome until the accession of William Cordier to the abbacy in 1495. The monastery was almost totally destroyed by fire in 1546, but it was soon rebuilt under the energetic Abbot William Caulier (1520–50). In 1569 Lobbes united with other Benedictine monasteries in the Congregation of Exempt Monasteries of Flanders. When the French revolutionary armies destroyed the monastery and its rich library in 1794, there were still 43 monks in the community.

Bibliography: J. WARICHEZ, L'Abbaye de Lobbes depuis les origines jusqu'en 1200 (Tournai 1909). J. VOS, Lobbes, son abbaye et son chapitre, 2 v. (Louvain 1865). U. BERLIÈRE, Monasticon belge (Bruges 1890–) 1:179–228. M. DIERICKX, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1108–09. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1632.

[C. FALK]

LOBO, DUARTE

Prominent Portuguese composer; b. Alentejo(?), c. 1563; d. Lisbon, Sept. 24, 1646. As a choirboy studying in Évora cathedral with Manuel Mendes, he attracted the attention of Cardinal Henry (archbishop 1574–76), brother of King João III. After serving as chapelmaster for the Hospital Real in Lisbon, he was Lisbon cathedral chapelmaster from c. 1594 until his death. During his later years, he was also rector of the Seminário de São Bartolomeu in Lisbon. His numerous pupils included such erudite theorists as António Fernandes (Arte de Musica, Lisbon 1626) and João Álvares Frovo; but his own works published at Antwerp—Natalitiae noctis Responsoria (1602), Magnificat (1605), and books of Masses (1621 and 1639)—indicate less learning than the liturgical collections of Francisco Garro (1609) and Manuel Cardoso (1613, 1621, 1636, 1648). The spread of Lobo's fame is attested by copies, both manuscript and printed, of his works found at Seville and Mexico City cathedrals. Alonso Lobe, sometimes confused with Duarte, was a Spanish contemporary (b. Osuna, c. 1555; d. Seville, April 5, 1617) who published Liber primus missarum at Madrid (1602) and was chapelmaster at Toledo (1593–1604) and Seville (1604–17).

Bibliography: M. DE SAMPAYO RIBEIRO, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 8:1073–74. M. JOAQUIM, Vinte livros de música polifónica (Lisbon 1953) 57–59. G. BOURLIGUEUX, "Duarte Lobo" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 11, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 102–103. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 512. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, 8th ed. (New York 1992) 1072.

[R. STEVENSON]

LOBO, JERÓNIMO

Portuguese missionary, travel writer; b. Lisbon, 1595; d. Portugal, 1678. Lobo entered the Society of Jesus in 1609 and was ordained in 1621. He made a dangerous voyage to Goa (1622) and spent the following year completing his theological studies. He began his long missionary work in Ethiopia in 1625; the steps that led to it are necessary as background.

After the Portuguese embassy to Ethiopia, of which Dom Rodrigo de Lima was the head and Francisco Álvares, chaplain, rather close military and ecclesiastical relations between the two Christian nations continued for a century. At first the Portuguese Catholics respected the Ethiopian Eastern rite. Later, however, the Portuguese manifested considerable intolerance, and about 1550, the Jesuits assumed the delicate task of instructing the Ethiopians in "orthodox" Christianity. A Portuguese Jesuit, João Nunes Barreto, was consecrated in Lisbon in 1555 as Patriarch of Ethiopia, but, although other Jesuits reached Ethiopia, he never got farther than Goa, where he died in 1562. Growing Turkish pressure in the Red Sea area made access to Ethiopia increasingly difficult for Western missionaries. Finally, in 1603 Father Pero Páez reinforced the earlier Jesuits. Before Páez's death in 1622, the emperor was baptized.

At Páez's suggestion, Father Afonso Mendes became patriarch of Ethiopia on March 4, 1623, the first such prelate since André de Oviedo, Barreto's successor (1562) who died in Ethiopia in 1580. Mendes set out at once for the East, and Lobo joined him in India. They reached Ethiopia in 1625 and began a fruitful apostolate.

The Catholic emperor died in 1632, and the ecclesiastical picture changed at once; in 1634 all the Jesuits were expelled.

Lobo returned to Goa and then went on to report to Madrid and Rome the desperate plight of the Ethiopian mission. He went back to Goa in 1640 and remained there for almost 20 years. He spent the last years of his life in Portugal.

Lobo wrote in Portuguese two unpublished works concerning Ethiopia, one of which, translated into English by Sir Peter Wyche and published in London in 1669, survives in the library of the Royal Society. The other, much more extensive, was lost for many years. A manuscript has recently been discovered, however, and is now being readied for publication. The Abbé Joachim Le Grand translated a different manuscript of this longer work into French (Paris, 1728). Young Samuel Johnson adapted Le Grand's work in his English translation (London, 1735); this early Johnsonian interest in Ethiopia reached full flower in Rasselas (London, 1759).

Bibliography: D. M. LOCKHART, Father Jeronymo Lobo's Writings concerning Ethiopia, Including Hitherto Unpublished Manuscripts in the Palmella Library (Doctoral diss. unpub. Harvard U. 1958); "'The Fourth Son of the Mighty Emperor': The Ethiopian Background of Johnson's Rasselas," Publications of the Modern Language Associations 78 (1963): 516–528.

[F. M. ROGERS]

LOCATION (UBI)

One of the ten Aristotelian CATEGORIES OF BEING (Gr. π oû, Lat. ubi) that answers the question "where?" Although ARISTOTLE only gives examples (Cat. 2a 1, 11b 14), St. THOMAS AQUINAS defines location as the state of being in place (In 11 meta. 12.2376). By analogy with time (cf. In 4 phys. 20.11), this means that location, being in place, is the same as being measured by or commensurate with place (In 3 phys. 5.15). The implications of this definition are a subject of controversy among scholastics. There are three fundamental views: that location adds an intrinsic, nonrelative MODE to bodies (F. Suárez); that it adds only a relative mode, based on extrinsic denomination (John of St. Thomas); or that it is a pure extrinsic denomination—considered to be enough to constitute it a true category (modern authors).

See Also: PLACE; SITUATION (SITUS); BILOCATION; IMPENETRABILITY.

Bibliography: R. MASI, Cosmologia (Rome 1961). P. H. J. HOENEN, Cosmologia (5th ed. Rome 1956).

[P. R. DURBIN]

LOCCUM, ABBEY OF

Cistercian monastery near Nienburg, Lower Saxony, in the former Diocese of Minden; founded by Count Wilbrand of Hallermund and colonized by monks from Volkenrode in 1163. It is the best-preserved monastic structure in northern Germany. The basilica, which has three aisles, was built between 1240 and 1280 (length about 200 feet; height about 60 feet). The east end corresponds to the second church of CLAIRVAUX; its lines are austere and somber. Noteworthy are the gatehouse, with chapel, and the chapter house (both 13th century), the cloister, built c. 1300, and the late Gothic refectory. One of its foundations is the monastery at Reinfeld, near Lübeck (1190). Loccum, under the leadership of Abbot (Bl.) Berthold, participated in the evangelization of Livonia, where the abbot died a martyr's death in 1198. The monastery made progress under Abbot John VII about 1593. However, it accepted the Confession of AUGSBURG and became a Lutheran monastery, but in so doing it retained many old monastic traditions, such as the abbot, prior, customs, and the Opus Dei. Vespers, now called Hora, are still said today in the ancient choir by the community and hospites (candidates for the seminary). The abbot of Loccum is the present bishop of Hannover and follows pontifical rubrics at certain solemnities. In the 18th century the learned Abbot Gerhard Molanus (1677-1722) participated in theological discussions with LEIBNIZ, BOSSUET, and SPINOZA in an effort to realize a reunion of the Lutheran and Catholic faiths. The Lutheran Academy, which moved to Loccum in 1952, has won ecumenical acclaim for its annual interconfessional dialogues (see ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT).

Bibliography: O. KARPA, Kloster Loccum 800 Jahre Zisterzienser Abtei (Hanover 1963).

[A. SCHNEIDER]

LOCI THEOLOGICI

A term made classical by Melchior CANO (d. 1560) in De locis theologicis, published 1563. The principles underlying Cano's work were traced by St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa theologiae 1a, 1.8 ad 2), but no treatise had ever undertaken such an extensive study of the principles presupposed by the work of THEOLOGY. An argument from authority is essential to theology, since theology is a derivative of supernatural faith. Cano's treatise studies the loci (places) in which this authority may be found. (The term locus, reflecting Renaissance interest in classical rhetoric, is commendably flexible as defined by Cano. See De locis 1.3: "domicilia omnium argumentorum theologicorum"; Moran, 80). Cano enumerates ten loci. Seven are proper to theology: (1) Sacred Scripture, (2) apostolic traditions, (3) the universal Church, (4) Church councils, (5) the papal magisterium, (6) Church Fathers, and (7) theologians and canonists. Three are borrowed by theology: (8) natural reason, (9) philosophers and jurists, and (10) history and human tradition. Among the proper loci he distinguishes those that are fundamental, containing the deposit of revelation (1, 2), from those that are declarative, articulating the content of the fundamental loci in successive ages. Declarative loci may provide an efficacious argument, since they involve the infallible magisterium (3, 4, 5), or they may provide a probable argument (6, 7). Associated with his loci, Cano developed a code of theological NOTES, employed to categorize the conclusions of theological argumentation (De locis 12.6-10).

A notable contributor to theological science, Cano reflects shortcomings of his age (see Y. M. J. Congar, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15.1:422-423). His distinctions are unquestionably valid, but his neglect of the wisdom character of theology (whereby it preserves its living unity by concerning itself primarily with the mysteries enunciated in its principles and the light they shed one upon the other, rather than with argumentation from the principles) permitted these distinctions to establish a precedent of codification and dissection that has characterized subsequent theology. In particular, Cano and later theologians had a superficial view of the mystery of the Church, a view that has made possible a progressive dissociation of Scripture, tradition, and magisterium. Revived awareness in mid-20th century of the mystery of the Church made possible, in the view of many, a renewal of theology's understanding of the presence in the world of the living Word of God that it must interpret to men (see the debates of Vatican Council II). Moreover, contemporary theology's awareness of historical perspective in revelation and the life of the Church makes it possible to deal with the problem raised by Cano in a more adequate manner.

See Also: DEPOSIT OF FAITH; DOGMATIC THEOLOGY; DOGMATIC THEOLOGY, ARTICLES ON; METHODOLOGY (THEOLOGY); REVELATION, FONTS OF; THEOLOGY, ARTICLES ON; TRADITION (IN THEOLOGY).

Bibliography: A. GARDEIL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 9.1:712–747. A. LANG, Die Loci Theologici des Melchior Cano und die Methode des dogmatischen Beweises (Munich 1925). G. MORAN, Scripture and Tradition (New York 1963), summary of contemporary controversy concerning the two principle loci of Cano, throwing light on the whole question.

[J. THORNHILL]

LOCKE, JOHN

British philosopher, generally regarded as the founder of EMPIRICISM; b. Wrington, near Bristol, Aug. 29, 1632; d. Oates, Essex, Oct. 28, 1704. Locke was educated at home until he attended Westminster school in 1646. He later went to Oxford, where he received the B.A. and M.A. degrees. At Oxford he read philosophy, became interested in physics and chemistry, and took his medical degree (1674); he never practiced medicine, however, turning his attention to public affairs instead. In 1665 he took a position as secretary to Sir Walter Vane and two years later entered the service of Lord Ashley, afterward the first Earl of Shaftesbury. Because of his involvement in political intrigue with Shaftesbury, Locke was forced to flee to Holland. He did not return until 1688, when William of Orange became king of England.

Locke's is a plain historical method by which he hoped to achieve an empirical analysis of knowledge based on EXPERIENCE and devoid of the pretensions of RATIONALISM. He applies this analysis to ethics, politics, and religion.

Theory of Knowledge. As his main work, The Essay concerning Human Understanding (1690), indicates, Locke is no radical empiricist. The Essay is characterized by a plain, commonsense approach and its rational reflection on ordinary experience. In it, Locke rejects all innate ideas and insists that the sources of knowledge are experiential, viz., sensation and reflection. From sensation the mind derives ideas, while from reflection it becomes aware of such internal operations as thinking, willing, and desiring. Locke divides ideas into two different classes: simple and complex. Simple ideas are produced in the mind in various ways: (1) some are formed by an external object acting on one or more of the external senses, for example, the idea of hardness or sweetness; (2) others are caused by the internal actions of thinking and willing; (3) still others are produced by a combination of internal and external activity, such as the ideas of pain and pleasure. Complex ideas are combinations of simple ideas, and of these Locke lists three different classes: (1) ideas of modes, which are collections of simple ideas conceived of as modifications of substance; (2) ideas of substances; and (3) ideas of relations.

Ideas and Understanding. Whatever the nature of the idea, simple or complex, it is the idea that the mind understands. Man knows ideas, and knowledge is nothing else but an apprehension of the agreement or disagreement of ideas (Essay, bk. 4, ch. 1). This conception leads Locke into an almost complete SUBJECTIVISM, against which he struggles in vain throughout the various parts of the Essay. The agreement or disagreement of ideas can take various forms: (1) identity and diversity, (2) relation between ideas, (3) coexistence of ideas, and (4) ideas of real existence (Essay, bk. 4, ch. 3). It is in examining the different kinds of ideas composing knowledge that Locke discerns the meaning and structure of reality.

Cause of Ideas. Having rejected the doctrine of innate ideas, Locke is forced to posit something as the cause of simple ideas. Hence he argues that things or substances that affect man in certain ways must exist. Since what man knows is the effect on him, substance must remain an unknown that is supposed to exist as a substratum for the various qualities and powers through which the thing is able to act. Here, however, a distinction must be made. Since man experiences certain affections that are consistently the same in relation to all material things, such things must really possess these qualities. All bodies, for example, appear as solid, as having some shape and magnitude, and as being in motion or at rest. These are primary qualities and are real modifications of bodies. There are, however, other affections that differ from individual to individual, such as sweet and bitter, hot and cold. These subjective affections, corresponding to the sensations of the external senses traditionally affirmed color, taste, odor, touch, and sound-Locke calls secondary qualities. The only objective references such qualities have are the powers bodies have to cause such affections in a sensing subject. From this viewpoint SUBSTANCE is merely a name given to a collection of secondary sense qualities. Gold, for example, means merely a combination of the simple ideas of yellow, hard, shiny, etc. This name is the nominal essence, as distinguished from the real essence, which is supposed to exist beneath the primary qualities and powers, but which can never be known (Essay, bk. 2, ch. 23; bk. 3, ch. 6).

Locke, however, always remains a realist—if an inconsistent one—because he never denies the existence of this unknown substratum. He holds, too, the reality of primary qualities and their real power to affect man. He also makes use of several so-called commonsense arguments to establish the reality of a material world distinct from the knowing subject. He refers to the idea of cause as an idea with a foundation in real existence, and he appeals to the real idea of fire as opposed to the imaginary idea of fire. Let one put his hand into a real fire, Locke notes, and he straightway understands the difference (Essay, bk. 4, ch. 11).

Divisions of Knowledge. Locke divides the mind's knowledge of ideas on the basis of degrees of intensity. First is intuitive knowledge, which is an immediate apprehension of the agreement or disagreement between ideas; e.g., the idea of bitter is not the same as that of yellow. Then there is knowledge of ideas attained through the mediation of other ideas apprehended intuitively; this is demonstrative knowledge, although Locke is careful to point out that intuition must accompany each step in the demonstrative process. Mathematical knowledge is of this sort. On the level of the natural sciences, however, Locke does not think that necessary connections can be established between ideas. He sees only a de facto connection in this area; hence, he does not regard the conclusions of the natural sciences as demonstrable, but only as enjoying high degrees of probability.

Existence of God. Under demonstrative knowledge Locke includes also the knowledge of God's existence. His proof begins with an intuition of one's own existence. Since nothing cannot produce something and since man is aware that he had a beginning, he must have been produced by something else. If there is not some eternal being, the problem simply regresses indefinitely. Therefore, something eternal must exist, and this is God. Furthermore, not only does God produce that which has a beginning, but He also produces it as the kind of being that it is. Again, there are created beings that have intelligence and the capacity to love. Hence, God must also be intelligent and loving and, therefore, a personal being.

Ethical Theory. Locke continues his empiricism in his ethical theory. For Locke, all moral ideas are grounded in experience, but these ideas can be clearly grasped and just as clearly related to one another. They can then serve as norms for judging the morality of activity. Moral good consists in the conformity of voluntary actions to these established norms. From this viewpoint Locke sees no reason why ethics cannot be as clear and certain a science as mathematics.

Norms are of different kinds, and Locke enumerates them as divine law, civil law, and the law of opinion or reputation. In relation to the divine law, actions are judged to be duties or sins. In relation to the civil law, actions are called innocent or criminal. In relation to the law of opinion, actions are judged as praiseworthy or blameful, depending on the manners or customs of the place. Since it is obvious that these laws can and do conflict with each other, Locke holds that the divine law must be the ultimate norm of moral activity. He maintains that this divine law can be known by human reason, and to this extent he seems to hold for the existence of a basic moral absolute, to which man has the obligation to conform.

Political Theory. In his political philosophy Locke attacks both the theory of the divine right of kings and of the nature of the state as understood by T. HOBBES. According to Locke, the original state of nature was not a state of war and license but one of peace, in which natural rights and obligations prevailed. However, because such a situation could not adequately supply man's needs or protect him from abuses, he entered into a political state, by either explicit or tacit consent; such a state could then make laws for him, as the public good or society required. Hence, sovereignty resides in the people and is delegated by them to their authorities. For him, as for Hobbes, authority in the state is supreme; but, unlike Hobbes, Locke insists that governing authorities are bound by both civil and "natural law." Hence, such authority is validly exercised only as long as it respects the "common good." There is therefore an authority superior to civil authority.

One of the chief goods to be achieved in the state is the right to the acquisition of private property. Locke sees this right as founded in labor. The laborer, in working on the land or on some natural product, contributes something of himself and thus acquires a title to it. Such a right, however, is not unlimited; it is restricted to as much property as a man can reasonably put to use.

Approach to Religion. In his approach to religion Locke gives the impression of being a sincere Christian who sees no discrepancy between reason and Christianity. In bk. 4, ch. 17, of the Essay, Locke distinguishes truths according to reason, those above reason, and those contrary to reason. Christianity deals with truths that are above reason, and it is to these that the Christian makes an assent of faith. Such truths must be proposed by God for man's belief, and it is here that Locke encounters difficulty. How is one to know that God is really the author of such truths? Locke's answer refers to the outward signs that accompany them, i.e., miracles. But how is one to know that such signs are really miraculous? It seems that Locke must either settle for some sort of probability here or else have recourse to an intuition of the connection between a given sign and the proposition of faith that it is supposed to justify. In neither case is the solution satisfactory, since it makes faith in the first instance only a probable proposition or, in the second, makes reason itself the criterion of Christian faith. Locke's approach is at best naturalistic and at worst rationalistic, in the sense that it makes reason the ultimate criterion even of truths that are above reason (Essay, bk. 4, ch. 19).

Influence. Locke has had a lasting influence on modern philosophy. Berkeley's empirical IDEALISM is a direct outgrowth of Locke's epistemology, as is Hume's later SKEPTICISM. Locke himself attempted to hold a commonsense middle position between these two extremes, but both Berkeley and Hume represent the logical consequences of the position. The systems of D. Hartley and J. S. MILL are clearly indebted to Locke. And through Hume, the Kantian doctrines of the unknown thing-initself, the nature of substance, the intellectual categories reveal either Kant's acceptance of Locke or his attempt to overcome what he considered an extreme empiricism.

There is good reason to believe that Locke's theory of government influenced the founders of the American Constitution, and Thomas Jefferson especially. The American people were establishing a government after their successful Revolution, and Locke had sought to justify the Glorious Revolution in England. Some of Locke's ideas—e.g., on natural rights, the rule of the majority, property rights, and the obligation of government to secure and preserve these rights—appear in the Constitution, at times exactly in Locke's phrasing. And 19th-century American laissez-faire individualism was rooted in the Lockean notion of natural rights, indirectly by way of constitutional interpretation.

In contemporary philosophy most systems of naturalism, LOGICAL POSITIVISM, and analytical philosophy are sympathetic to Locke. They generally accept his position on the object of knowledge, the nature of substance, the lack of innate ideas, and the nominalistic interpretation of the function of the idea.

Critique. The basic difficulty with Locke's experiential approach is the assumption from which it begins: what is known is only an affection of the knowing subject. This subjectivism puts Locke into a position where he is forced to prove the reality of an external world and God. He himself recognized the difficulty and strove in vain to overcome it. Berkeley showed him the impossibility of demonstrating the existence of material reality, and Kant made clear the inadequacy of his proof for the existence of God. Such a subjectivism had to end where it began—in the mind. The ease with which such an approach slips into a complete idealism and even into SO-LIPSISM is only too apparent in the history of philosophy. Man's basic experience is of things, not of ideas. Any theory of knowledge denying that basic experience is bound to lead to the bankruptcy of all knowledge.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF.

Bibliography: Works, 10 v. (rev. ed. London 1823); The Philosophical Works of John Locke, ed. J. A. ST. JOHN, 2 v. (London 1854); An Essay concerning Human Understanding, ed. A. C. FRA-SER, 2 v. (Oxford 1894); The Reasonableness of Christianity, ed. I. J. RAMSEY (Stanford 1958); Two Treatises of Government, ed. T. I. COOK (New York 1947); The Correspondence of John Locke and Edward Clarke, ed. B. RAND (London 1927); Selections, ed. S. P. LAMPRECHT (New York 1928). Literature. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1959) v.5. A. CARLINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:96–112. P. K. KING, The Life of John Locke, 2 v. (London 1830). R. I. AARON, John Locke (2d ed. Oxford 1955). D. J. O'CONNOR, John Locke (Baltimore 1952). J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954).

[H. R. KLOCKER]

LOCKWOOD, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Sowerby, North Riding, Yorkshire, England, c. 1555; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, April 13, 1642. John was the eldest son of Christopher Lockwood and Clare Lascelles of Sowerby and Brackenborough Castle, Yorkshire. He and his brother Francis arrived at Rheims on Nov. 4, 1579. John was immediately sent to Douai to study philosophy. While Francis was ordained in 1587, John did not finish his studies at the English College in Rome until Oct. 4, 1595. He was ordained on Jan. 26, 1597, then sent on the English mission, April 20, 1598. He was arrested several times, imprisoned, and even banished (1610), but managed to minister to his flock for 44 years before he was captured at Wood End, Gatenby, the residence of Bridget Gatenby, and executed with Bl. Edmund CATHERICK. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), II, 168. J. FOSTER, Visitation of Yorkshire (London 1875) 61, 549. T. F. KNOX, First and Second Diaries of English College, Douai (London 1878) 157. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LOCULUS

Latin diminutive of locus, "place"; a small grave or chamber cut out of the rock sides of a gallery, usually in a catacomb. Loculus is the term used to distinguish a small individual grave from the larger and more imposing ones, called arcosolia, which were large enough to receive a coffin or sarcophagus. The loculus was a horizontal niche scooped out of the soft rock of the tunnels running through the catacombs. In Roman law, all cemeteries and burial places were certified as loci religiosi and, like churches and temples, were inviolable. The term loculus, thus, came to be applied to any small grave sacred to the dead. The term was also applied to the small cavity prepared in an altar stone to receive the relics of martyrs as required for the celebration of Mass. The term sepulcher is also used for loculus in this sense.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1934–43) 9.2. E. DIEHL, Inscriptiones Christianae latinae veteres, 3 v. (Berlin 1925–31) 222–232.

[E. E. MALONE]

LOCUTIONS

Affirmations or statements supernaturally effected in the external sense, internal senses, or directly in the intellect. They often accompany visions and they are divided in the same manner: corporeal (auricular), imaginative, and intellectual. Auricular locutions are words perceived by the bodily sense of hearing, and are generally caused by supernaturally produced acoustical vibrations. They sometimes seem to emanate from a vision or a religious object such as a statue or crucifix. As extraordinary phenomena they could be caused by God or the devil or proceed from natural causes. Imaginative locutions are words perceived in the imagination during sleep or in waking hours. Since they, too, could be supernatural, diabolical, or natural in origin, the rule for discernment is to study the effects produced in the individual. Locutions of supernatural origin cannot be produced at will; they are distinct, causing fervor, peace, humility, and obedience. Intellectual locutions are words or statements perceived immediately by the intellect without the aid of the external senses or imagination. Sometimes they are directly infused; at other times they are a supernatural coordination of naturally acquired ideas. It is beyond the power of the devil to produce truly intellectual locutions. St. John of the Cross divides intellectual locutions into successive, formal, and substantial.

Successive intellectual locations are a kind of dialogue or conversation between the Holy Spirit and the soul. It is a discursive reasoning rather than an instantaneous intuition, and although it is under the direction of the Holy Spirit, the human intellect plays its part. Therefore the actual functioning of the human intellect in this type of locution requires the operation of the imagination, with the result that error can proceed from the human side of the dialogue. The devil can indirectly affect successive locutions by influencing the imagination. Similar locutions occur in the natural phenomenon of the dual personality, although the effects are noticeably different from the effects of truly supernatural successive locutions.

Formal intellectual locutions are those words or statements which come to the mind from without and do not involve the activity of the intellect itself, except to receive them. Unlike the successive locutions, they may be infused into the mind when it is thinking of something entirely different. When they are truly supernatural, they produce virtuous effects in the soul and impart great illumination and certitude. Although the devil cannot directly influence the intellect, an individual may be deceived by the devil, so that the phenomenon itself cannot easily be distinguished by its effects. St John of the Cross advises that souls should never act according to their own opinions or accept the locutions without much reflection and the counsel of others.

Substantial intellectual locutions are basically the same as formal locutions, but with this difference: what is stated is effected immediately. They are similar to the creative word of God. According to St. John of the Cross, there is no possibility of deception or the influence of the devil in substantial locutions.

Since locutions are often closely associated with visions, the same rules applied to locution (see VISIONS). Locutions are unmerited and freely given graces in the sense that they do not proceed from the normal development of the spiritual life; they differ somewhat from the usual charismatic gifts given for the benefit of others in the sense that they can bring much consolation and many blessings to the soul that receives them. They should not be desired, except for the substantial locutions, of which St. John of the Cross says: "Blessed is the soul to whom the Lord speaks the substantial locution."

Bibliography: JOHN OF THE CROSS, Complete Works, ed. SILVERIO DE SANTA TERESA and E. A. PEERS, 3 v. (Westminster, MD 1953) v.1 Ascent of Mount Carmel, Bk. 2, ch. 28–31. TERESA OF AVILA, Complete Works, ed. SILVERIO DE SANTA TERESA and E. A. PEERS, 3 v. (New York 1946) v.1 Life ch. 25 R. GARRI-GOU-LAGRANGE, The Three Ages of the Interior Life, tr. T. DOYLE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1947–48) 2:589–595. J. G. ARINTERO, The Mystical Evolution in the Development and Vitality of the Church, tr. J. AU-MANN, 2 v. (St. Louis 1949–51) 2:304–333. A. ROYO and J. AU-MANN, The Theology of Christian Perfection (Dubuque 1962) 658–660. A. F. POULAIN, The Graces of Interior Prayer, tr. L. L. SMITH (6th French ed. St. Louis 1950) 266–297. E. UNDERHILL, Mysticism (12th rev. ed. New York 1960).

[J. AUMANN]

LOGIC, HISTORY OF

Western formal logic began among the Greeks of the 5th and 4th centuries B.C., who developed syllogistic and prepositional systems. The Greeks of the Hellenistic age and the Romans did nothing to advance these beginnings, but injected a stream of rhetoric that was to plague the subject until quite recent times. It also began a long sequence of sketchy textbooks. After the Dark Ages logic began to revive in the 12th century, and by the middle of the 13th century scholastic logic was well developed. While borrowing much from Aristotle and a little from Roman hints about Stoicism, it developed original methods in propositional and quantificational logic and in regard to logical antinomies. It borrowed rather little from rhetoric but was a good deal influenced by grammar. About mid-15th century the impetus failed and within 100 years had died completely, giving place to a centuries-long crop of incompetent handbooks, often infected with rhetoric, entirely lacking in originality or serious investigation. Only occasionally was the monotonous desert interrupted by something of interest, notably, by the great genius of G. W. LEIBNIZ. In mid-19th century the modern period began with G. Boole and with renewed authority through the immense analytical acumen of G. Frege. Their work brought new understanding of the past and a huge increase in doctrine, presented with an altogether new completeness, strictness, and critical control. One thus has four periods to consider: (1) the Greco-Roman, (2) the medieval, (3) the post-Renaissance, and (4) the modern.

Greco-Roman Period

Aristotle claimed to be the founder of logic, saying that he could find nothing like what he had done among his philosophic predecessors. The claim seems to be justified. One can, of course, find a climate of intense discussion that favored such a development. Both in the school founded by Euclid of Megara, who was a pupil of SOCRATES, and in the Platonic Academy descended from the same source, as also in the tradition of the 5th-century SOPHISTS, discussion was so strongly cultivated that it is not surprising that people should have begun to reflect on the processes of argument, to notice patterns of recurrence, and to generalize in a reflective way about conclusive and inconclusive methods.

Already in PLATO one can see intimations of what would become, in the hands of Aristotle, the syllogism, and, in the hands of the Megarians and Stoics, propositional logic. Roughly speaking, Athens gave birth to the former, Megara to the latter. Plato was surely influential in that he developed the notion of universal law, already in evidence among the pre-Socratics, but it was left for Aristotle to achieve the first conscious, general, explicit system of formal logic, so that Leibniz could say of him that he was the first to write mathematically outside of mathematics.

Aristotelian Logic. The logical works of ARISTOT-LE, known as the Organon, have been handed down in a systematic order: Categories, dealing with the TERM; On Interpretation, the PROPOSITION; Prior Analytics, the SYLLOGISM in general; Posterior Analytics, Topics, and Sophistical Refutations, apodictic, dialectical, and sophistical syllogisms, respectively. Surely this list does not represent the order of composition, but attempts to ascertain this through the varying complexity of doctrine are somewhat uncertain, since a thinker's development may not be continuous and homogeneous. Thus the Topics and Sophistical Refutations, though lacking the doctrine of the syllogism, contain some insights that belong to a more advanced area.

Syllogistic is a theory of whole or partial inclusion between classes, its laws being presented in schematic form, the use of letters instead of words from ordinary language being a brilliant device to secure generality and isolate form. (The device would not be fully exploited until Frege.) Aristotle begins by presenting his syllogisms listwise, classified by patterns called "figures," those that are valid being alternated in each figure with those that are inconclusive, the latter being rejected by counterexample. His incomplete definitions of the figures would give much trouble to later writers, and those who paid more attention to the letter than the spirit would be troubled by the incompleteness of the explicit list. Aristotle reworked his system in several ways, propounding alternative methods of deduction from axioms (thus showing that there is nothing inflexible about a given set of axioms) and making some metalogical statements. The deductions are either direct, by laws of conversion, or indirect, by reductio ad absurdum. They are carried out in an intuitive, not in a formalized way, for Aristotle states only two or three laws of propositional inference, though it is noteworthy that he does there consciously use propositional variables.

Especially to be distinguished from the nonsyllogistic laws are some belonging to the logic of relations, e.g., "if knowledge be conceiving, then an object of knowledge is an object of conceiving," a principle that A. De Morgan in the 19th century would adduce against contemporary would-be Aristotelians as unprovable syllogistically. Also from the Topics and Sophistical Refutations come laws about identity that add up to the "principle of the identity of indiscernibles" commonly ascribed to Leibniz. The presence of such things in Aristotle has been more often ignored than noticed, and they are fragmentary in character. Even the assertoric syllogistic is not treated with the thoroughness and generality currently accorded to the systematic investigation of logical ideas. Aristotle's modal syllogistic is even less fully elaborated and still awaits definitive investigation and assessment. But he got logic off to an astonishingly good start, and in spite of the undoubted merits of some medieval treatises, there is no extant work (in the absence of full Stoic texts) of comparable promise until Leibniz.

Theophrastus. Aristotle was succeeded as head of the Peripatetic school by Theophrastus of Eresos. He is known chiefly for having made explicit the five syllogistic moods later known as Baralipton, Celantes, Dabitis, Fapesmo, and Frisesomorum. He introduced a non-Aristotelian modal syllogistic in which the assertoric law that the conclusion follows the weakest premise holds; and he offered an extensional proof, perhaps with a spatial model before him, of the convertibility of universal negative propositions. Only fragments of his work remain. They contain references to his work on syllogisms "from hypotheses," i.e., with conditional premises, initiated by his predecessor. It is possible that Theophrastus stimulated the Megarian-Stoic work on propositional logic.

Megarian-Stoic School. Materials exist only in fragmentary and often hostile reports. Among the Megarians, Eubulides of Miletus is credited with the discovery of the PARADOX called "the Liar," or the "Epimenides," noted by Aristotle and much pondered over by Theophrastus and Chrysippus. A new form was claimed as late as 1937, but it has been found to have existed in the Middle Ages. One early version goes: "If you say that you lie, and in this say true, do you lie or speak the truth?" Eubulides is reported to have been hostile to Aristotelian doctrine, thus depriving later Aristotelians of a progressive and complementary influence.

Diodorus Cronus of Iasus (end of 4th century B.C.) held views on modality, the accounts of which have proved difficult for modern interpreters. His definition of the necessary introduced a time variable, "that which neither is nor will be false." Although it is tempting to think that his definition of implication was that at no time ever is its antecedent true and its consequence false, the text does not certainly justify this. He was the author of a "master argument" about the incompatibility of three modal propositions, which it has proved impossible to reconstruct satisfactorily. Stilpo of Megara was influential in drawing new adherents, including Zeno of Citium, who founded the Stoa (c. 300 B.C.). Philo of Megara was the first to formulate the truth conditions for the material conditional, true except when its antecedent is true and its consequent false.

The Megaric school seems to have disappeared with the rise of STOICISM, and the logical history of the latter is overshadowed by Chrysippus of Soli, its second founder, who died shortly before 200 B.C. The most important contribution to logic made by the Stoics was a deductive system of propositional logic. It was based on five "indemonstrable moods" (one should not say "axioms," for this word is kept by them for the objective meanings of declarative sentences) and four "themes" or rules, only two of which have been preserved. Instead of letters they used ordinal terms as variables. W. Kneale has suggested a convincing reconstruction of the system, for which the Stoics claimed completeness, but it is not clear what they could have intended by such a claim.

Later Developments. For the remainder of ancient logic, one should mention CICERO—no logician indeed, but his rhetorical syllogism influenced logic in the Renaissance and after; the handbooks of Galen and Apuleius of Madaura (2d century A.D.); the Greek commentators on Aristotle, especially Alexander of Aphrodisias (3d century) and JOHN PHILOPONUS (6th century)

ry). GALEN was later credited with the invention of a fourth figure of syllogism, but J. Lukasiewicz has shown that this was a mistake. Apuleius gave the square of OP-POSITION, which has become traditional. Alexander showed how to derive a law of conversion from a syllogism and a law of identity by reductio ad absurdum, which offered to medievals and to Leibniz new possibilities in syllogistic axiomatics. Philoponus suggested resolving doubts about how to define syllogistic figures by calling the subject (predicate) of the conclusion the minor (major) term and denominating the premises thence. This is the most economical method, but it did not come into general use until the end of the 17th century. Porphyry of Tyre (3d century) contributed his "tree" or scheme of genera and species, of which he took an extensional view, the species being contained in the genus predicated of it (see PORPHYRIAN TREE).

Boethius was the great transmitter of ancient logic to the medieval world. He was a peripatetic but preserved some Stoic doctrines, translated most of the Organon, and composed works on Topics or Loci, as had been done in the domain of rhetoric by Cicero and Marius Victorinus (4th century). His translations of the Categories and On Interpretation constituted the logica vetus of the early medievals, the other parts of the Organon being the Logica nova. The variables in his treatise on hypothetical syllogisms have been taken as propositional, but since the doctrine is basically Theophrastan, and in view of Boethius's Aristotelian convictions, they are probably term variables.

Medieval Period

Study in the field of logic began to revive toward the end of the 11th century, amid a great deal of fruitful activity, of which much remains to be learned through the publication of further texts. The full logic of Aristotle, notably the Prior Analytics, became available only in the course of the 12th century. Boethius was influential, as was Cicero, but the grammarians seem to have been more influential than the rhetoricians.

Twelfth Century. ABELARD, remembered by his contemporaries as "the Aristotle of our time, the equal or superior of all logicians there have been," noted that logic is not a science of using arguments but of discerning their validity. In his Dialectica he distinguishes "antecedent" and "consequent" as referring both to subject and predicate within simple propositions and to the parts of hypothetical propositions. This and other passages show the emergence of medieval propositional logic in distinction from a logic of terms. Abelard knew that these were different and that there are analogies between them—he reports a view that propositional connectives and their term analogues have the same sense, and he rejects it. The statement that a hypothetical proposition is called both a "consequence" and a "conditional" may raise a doubt whether relations of implication and inference were yet clearly distinguished, and the fact that AL-BERT OF SAXONY (14th century) distinguishes si and ergo only by their positioning should engender caution in viewing the theory of "consequences" in one or the other light. Abelard already has a number of valid consequences, and some are even deduced from others, but the Middle Ages never attained an axiomatized system of propositional logic. One of Abelard's most elaborate consequences is "of whatever hypotheticals the antecedents are concomitant, the consequents are concomitant." This is the theorem that Leibniz would rediscover and call praeclarum. One should note the metalogical formulation, a style that would remain standard and that is perhaps derived from the De differentiis topicis of Boethius, who distinguished the maxim or metalogical formulation of a class of truths from the instances.

In the 12th century, Adam of Balsham also wrote a highly original work, Ars disserendi, in which one sees the rise of a concern with sophismata or logical puzzles, which became very characteristic of the period. While, under an inventive hand, sophismata could produce a rich body of doctrine, the medium favored the perpetuation of a fragmented treatment rather than a genuinely systematic one. Adam made a rare attempt to begin a logic of questions, in the course of which he reached the conclusion that an infinite set could be equinumerous with a proper part of itself.

Thirteenth Century. The best-known works of the 13th century are the Introductiones in logicam of WILLIAM OF SHERWOOD (Shyreswood), the Summulae logicales of Peter of Spain (Pope JOHN XXI), and the commentaries on the Prior Analytics by St. ALBERT THE GREAT and ROBERT KILWARDBY. This last shows that consequences were already a normal part of logical teaching. Peter of Spain became a standard author throughout the 15th century. Curiously his summary handbook does not have a chapter on consequences, but it does have a well-developed doctrine of proprietates terminorum, as does the earlier and similar book of Shyreswood. The origins of this can be faintly detected in the previous century, where more can surely be found. The property that came to be chiefly discussed is SUPPOSITION, the reference that the subject (and later also the predicate) has in a proposition. The De suppositionibus dialecticis (1372) of St. VINCENT FERRER shows a wide selection of disparate logical material discussed in this connection, including some points of quantification theory. Once again the necessity of considering numerous examples from ordinary speech favored the fragmented approach.

Later Centuries. WILLIAM OF OCKHAM sparked an intensification of activity, partly because of the very comprehensiveness of his Summa totius logicae. His influence can be seen even in those who repudiated his epistemology. WALTER BURLEY, JOHN BURIDAN, Albert of Saxony, MARSILIUS OF INGHEN, the Mertonians, WILLIAM OF HEYTESBURY (HENTISBER) and RALPH STRODE, and Richard Ferabrich were some of the notable writers. Besides the areas already mentioned, they paid much attention to insolubilia, or logical paradoxes, developing many versions of the Epimenides, which was already known to Adam of Balsham. Numerous solutions were proposed, including the outlawing of self-referring propositions from meaningful language (see ANTIMONY).

The 15th century was unoriginal; toward its end there was the encyclopedic Logica magna of Paul of Venice (Paolo VENETO), who with Peter of Mantua and Paul of Pergolae formed a school known to their contemporaries as the Sorticolae.

From the 13th century on, syllogistic was considered as a special department and even rather a small one. The supposedly Aristotelian idea that developed in the next period—that valid arguments are always syllogistic was quite foreign to the medievals. The subject was of course treated at length in the Aristotelian commentaries and required detailed treatment in commentaries on the Summulae, but in the more general treatises, syllogisms are just one kind of consequence. The usual method of defining terms was a generalization of that of Boethius, the first premise stated being the major premise by definition, and the extreme term therein the major term. This is quite different from the method of Philoponus, and there are signs that some people could work out its consequences correctly, but again a unified and systematic presentation was lacking. Mnemonics of various kinds were experimented with in the 13th century, and the familiar "Barbara, Celarent, etc." occurs in Shyreswood.

Post-Renaissance Period

It was about 1440 that the first recorded voice of the new age, or non-age, in logic made itself heard. L. VALLA, a renowned humanist scholar, then rejected the third figure of the syllogism on the grounds that women, children, and nonlogicians generally, do not argue that way. Perhaps this is the first time that ordinary language was claimed as the standard of logical doctrine. Evidently all sense of syllogistic as a deductive system had been lost; indeed Valla said that conversion, Aristotle's chief means of deduction, is only a "remedy for sick syllogisms." R. Agricola's De dialectica inventione swung the ambivalent "topical" tradition firmly into the path of rhetoric, in contrast with Abelard. P. MELANCHTHON, writing in 1521, expounded Cicero's syllogism before Aristotle's. Older doctrines were quickly dropped or ridiculed. G. SAVONAROLA kept telling the 16th century in numerous reeditions that anyone arguing from a conjunction to one of its parts was dignus explosione.

Ramist Controversy. In the mid-16th century, vernacular logics began to appear, for example, T. Wilson's The Rule of Reason (1551) and the Dialectique (1555) of Peter RAMUS. This last writer's views on logical reform provoked widespread and long-lasting controversy. His simplified syllogistic and novel terminology occasioned long commentaries on very little and a new technical scholasticism. Aristotelians found little to discuss besides the iniquities of Ramism and the fourth figure of the syllogism, few recognizing that this was a matter to be settled by definition. Sextus Empiricus appeared in Latin in 1569, but led to no rediscovery of Stoic logic.

There was an occasional break in the clouds. J. Hospinianus (1515-75) thoroughly investigated syllogistic on a combinatory basis, and G. Cardano illustrated his Dialectica with geometrical arguments. J. Junge (Logica Hamburgensis, 1638) showed a deductive interest in the syllogism and some appreciation of Aristotle's logic of relations. In 1662 A. GEULINCX pleaded for the restoration of medieval doctrines. In that year the "Port Royal Logic" of A. ARNAULD and P. NICOLE was published. Anti-rhetorical and anti-Ramist, the authors idolized geometry and did much to tighten up syllogistic theory. At the same time they opened the way to introducing epistemological and psychological discussions into books of logic. H. Aldrich, in his Artis logicae compendium (1691), correctly tabled 24 moods of syllogism in four figures and methodically proved all others invalid.

Leibniz and After. Meanwhile G. W. LEIBNIZ had begun to develop quite new ideas. A polymath famous in philosophy for his Monadology, and in mathematics for his invention of the infinitesimal calculus, he was not yet 20 years old when he began to be haunted by the idea that logic might be developed in a mathematical way. Others before him had discerned a kinship (e.g., ROGER BACON), but mathematical notations had not been used. Leibniz experimented with various versions of a logical calculus that he wanted used in association with a rationally constructed universal language. He also envisioned an encyclopedia that would be progressively perfected as the sciences advanced and at any one stage would unify the whole body of achieved human knowledge. In forming these projects Leibniz found his interest caught by J. Wilkins, G. Dalgarno, and other contemporaries for the language, T. Zwinger and J. H. Alsted for the encyclopedia, and Raymond LULL for the calculus. But his own ideals went beyond any of theirs, especially in regard to the analysis of ideas into their simplest parts; this the language would mirror, the encyclopedia present, and the calculus reverse so as to be effective for the discovery of new combinations. Leibniz's efforts with his calculus of logic were frustrated by difficulties with empty terms (which the medievals had also noticed) and by doubts about the relationship between extensions and intensions. He anticipated the circular diagrams of L. EULER and the ruled or dotted lines of J. H. Lambert (1728–77).

After Leibniz a number of attempts were made to construct a satisfactory symbolic calculus, e.g., by Lambert, his contemporary G. J. Holland, and G. F. Castillon. Sir William Hamilton claimed priority in quantifying the predicate, but this had been done by Leibniz and those just mentioned. A real breakthrough was achieved by A. DE MORGAN, whom C. S. Peirce called "unquestionably the father of the logic of relatives."

Modern Period

In the same year (1847) that De Morgan's Formal Logic appeared, George Boole published The Mathematical Analysis of Logic, which was followed in 1854 by An Investigation of the Laws of Thought. From this time on there was a steady clarification of ideas interdependent with the perfecting of a calculus. Thorough systematization and investigation of logical notions became possible as never before.

Boolean Algebra. Boole's algebra, in which 1 - xrepresents the class of objects in the universe of discourse, 1, which are not in the class x, and in which the equation x(1-x) = 0 expresses the principle of noncontradiction, is rich enough for all the traditional modes of class reasoning, though some (e.g., subalternation) require statement that the classes involved are not empty. The system can be interpreted as well in the domain of truth functions or that of probabilities. W. S. Jevons (1835-82) showed that inclusive alternation offered some advantages over the exclusive used by Boole; it gives the law x + x = x, getting rid of coefficients. In 1869 he used the new methods to make a logical machine; the logical diagrams proposed by J. Venn in 1881 also mirror the new methods. C. S. PEIRCE, a very original and inventive thinker, augmented the Boolean algebra with the now customary symbol of inclusion (similar ones had been used by Lambert and J. D. Gergonne), which he also interpreted prepositionally as material implication. In 1885 he devised the truth-table test for the necessary truth of a formula, and by the introduction of essentially new notions, "expanded" the Boolean system into a logic of relations; here he also developed De Morgan's work, with the help of O. H. Mitchell. Peirce also showed how all truth-functional connectives can be defined by joint exclusion (neither . . . nor . . .), which was rediscovered more than 30 years later by H. M. Sheffer. The Vorlesungen über die Algebra der Logik of E. Schröder incorporated the various improvements made in Boole's system in the interval and further developed Peirce's ideas about relations. Since this represents the peak of the Boolean line of thought, the resulting system is now known as the Boole-Schröder algebra.

Frege and After. Meanwhile, in 1879 there appeared the Begriffsschrift of G. Frege, perhaps the most penetrating and original logical work ever published. Frege was explicitly concerned with banishing all rhetorical and even traditional grammatical influence, on the one hand, and, on the other, providing for an accurate analysis of reasoning in a more thorough way than was possible by means of an equational system such as Boole's. The Boole-Schröder system utilized an unexpressed intuitive logic, as Aristotle's syllogistic had done. This fundamental logic was successfully formalized by Frege, with the use only of the rules of modus ponens and substitution for variables to derive valid propositional formulas from axioms (which later were seen to be unduly lavish). Frege's connectives were built out of vertical and horizontal lines; and while his expressions can be read quite mechanically in terms of negation and conjunction, the space they occupy has prohibited their general use. There are more compact notations, for example, the "wheels" of S. Lesniewski, which are diagrammatically closer to the intended meaning and serve calculation more readily. Applying his propositional system to propositional functions, and analyzing such functions, Frege gave rules for the use of quantifiers and discussed the differing nature of variables according to whether they are governed by quantifiers or not. In these systems logic at last reached its maturity.

Frege's aim was to analyze and codify mathematical reasoning in a deductive way. G. Peano actually brought the new methods to bear on mathematics and introduced improvements in symbolism. B. RUSSELL and A. N. WHITEHEAD joined the ideas of Frege and Peano to produce Principia Mathematica (1910-13), the most comprehensive exposition of logical and mathematical thought ever effected. In 1917 J. Lukasiewicz announced his first views on many-valued logic (inspired by Aristotle, and published in 1920, when E. Post's independent investigation in the same field also appeared). The natural deduction systems of S. Jaskowski and G. Gentzen, and K. Gödel's proof of the completeness of predicate logic, appeared in 1930. Gödel's epoch-making adaptation of the Epimenides in 1931 to show that the system of Principia Mathematica is undecidable continues to be adapted to show the same for many other systems, especially by A. Tarski. In 1936 A. Church showed that the predicate calculus has this property.

See Also: LOGIC, SYMBOLIC; AXIOMATIC SYSTEM.

Bibliography: General. H. SCHOLZ, Abriss der Geschichte der Logik (2d ed. Freiburg 1959). I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, A History of Formal Logic, tr. and ed. I. THOMAS (Notre Dame, Ind. 1961). W. and M. KNEALE, The Development of Logic (Oxford 1962). P. H. NIDDITCH, The Development of Mathematical Logic (London 1962). A. N. PRIOR, Formal Logic (2d ed. Oxford 1962). J. T. CLARK Conventional Logic and Modern Logic (Woodstock, Md. 1952). Ancient Period. J. LUKASIEWICZ, Aristotle's Syllogistic from the Standpoint of Modern Formal Logic (2d ed. Oxford 1957). G. PATZIG, Die aristotelische Syllogistik (Göttingen 1959). I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, Ancient Formal Logic (Amsterdam 1951); La Logique de Théophraste (Fribourg 1947). B. MATES, Stoic Logic (Berkeley 1953). Medieval Period. P. ABELARD, Dialectica, ed. L. M. DE RIJK (Assen 1956). ADAMUS BALSAMENSIS, Ars disserendi, ed. L. MINIO-PALUELLO (Rome 1956). P. BÖHNER, Medieval Logic (Chicago 1952). E. A. MOODY, Truth and Consequence in Mediaeval Logic (Amsterdam 1953). C. VON PRANTL, Geschichte der Logik im Abendlande, 4 v. (Leipzig 1855-70; repr. Graz 1955). Post-Renaissance Period. W. RISSE, Die Logik der Neuzeit (Stuttgart 1963-) v. 1. W. J. ONG, Ramus: Method, and the Decay of Dialogue (Cambridge, Mass. 1958); Ramus and Talon Inventory (Cambridge, Mass. 1958). I. THOMAS, "Medieval Aftermath," Oxford Historical Society, Oxford Studies Presented to Daniel Callus (Oxford 1964). L. COU-TURAT, La Logique de Leibniz après des documents inédits (Paris 1901; repr. Hildesheim 1961). J. VENN, Symbolic Logic (2d ed. London 1894). C. I. LEWIS, A Survey of Symbolic Logic (rev. ed. New York 1960). Modern Period. A. CHURCH, Introduction to Mathematical Logic (Princeton 1956—) v. 1; "A Brief Bibliography of Formal Logic," Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences 80 (1952) 155-172; "A Bibliography of Symbolic Logic," Journal of Symbolic Logic 1 (1936) 121-218; 3 (1938) 178-192; additional bibliog. in issues to date. E. W. BETH, The Foundations of Mathematics (Amsterdam 1959). H. B. CURRY, Foundations of Mathematical Logic (New York 1963).

[I. THOMAS]

LOGIC, SYMBOLIC

A modern version of formal logic, referred to variously as logistic, mathematical logic, and the algebra of logic; it may be described generally as the set of logical theories elaborated since the mid-19th century with the aid of symbolic notation and a rigorous method of DE-DUCTION. Symbolic logic differs from traditional logic in its extensive use of symbols similar to those used in mathematics, in its lack of concern with the psychology and epistemology of knowledge, and in its FORMALISM. It is concerned mainly with the analysis of the correctness of logical laws, such as the law of contradiction, that of the hypothetical syllogism, and so on. Symbolic logicians attempt to deduce logical laws from the smallest possible number of principles, i.e., axioms and rules of inference, and to do this with no hidden assumptions or unexpressed steps in the deductive process (see AXIOMATIC SYSTEM). This article provides a brief survey of the history of the discipline and discusses its basic concepts and principal divisions, viz, propositional logic, the logic of predicates and of classes, and the logic of relations.

History. G. W. LEIBNIZ is usually regarded as the forerunner of symbolic logic, largely for his attempt to formulate a mathesis universalis and for his discovery of several theorems that later assumed importance. Historians of symbolic logic, mainly of the Polish school (J. Lukasiewicz, J. Salamucha, I. M. Bocheński), have pointed out that the principal concepts utilized in the new logic are to be found in the works of ARISTOTLE, who introduced variables and the idea of the deductive system. Similarly, they have shown that the logic of propositions was extensively treated by the Stoics and by the later scholastics, and that even some aspects of the problem of antinomies had their counterparts in the medieval concern with insolubilia. Yet it was not until the mid-19th century, with the work of G. Boole and A. DE MORGAN, that systems of symbolic logic similar to those used in the 20th century were developed. The history of this development may be conveniently divided into three periods, the first (1847-90) dominated by the work of Boole, the second (1890-1930) principally under the influence of G. Frege, and the third (1930-60s) devoted largely to metalogical considerations.

Boolean logic had two characteristics: it was a logic of classes and it was developed using a rigorous mathematical method. It was Boole's intention, in fact, to apply the method of algebra to logic—whence the designation of his system as 'the algebra of logic.' De Morgan furthered the development, discovering some new laws, doing work on the SYLLOGISM, and making a pioneer study of the logic of relations. C. S. PEIRCE likewise belongs to this period. The most ample development of logic according to Boole's method, however, is to be found in the work of E. Schröder, Vorlesungen über die Algebra der Logik (3 v. Leipzig 1890–1905).

The Fregean period was characterized by a more formal development of the new discipline. Frege himself discovered a new logic of propositions and developed the first axiomatic system for such a logic; this has been regarded as a fundamental work on the foundations of mathematics. Improving on Frege's symbolism, G. Peano invented a form of symbolic writing that was later adopted by B. RUSSELL and A. N. WHITEHEAD in their Principia Mathematica (3 v. Cambridge, England 1910–13). Another notational advance was made by the Polish logician J. Lukasiewicz, who also invented polyvalent or many-valued logics and did research in the history of formal logic. Also worthy of note, although extending somewhat beyond this period, is the work of the German logicians D. Hilbert and P. Bernays on the foundations of mathematics (Grundlagen der Mathematik, 2 v. Berlin 1934–39).

The metalogical period was inaugurated by K. Gödel, who showed that many propositions in the Principia Mathematica and in equivalent systems were formally undecidable, i.e., that their truth or falsity could not be proved within the formal structure of the system. Noteworthy in this period is the work of A. Tarski on the semantic definition of truth and that of K. Popper and R. Carnap on the methodology of the exact sciences. Additional applications of the methods of mathematical logic have been made in theology (Bocheński, I. Thomas), in analytical philosophy (A. Church, N. Goodman, W. V. O. Quine, C. G. Hempel), in physics (H. Reichenbach, C. E. Shannon), in biology (J. H. Woodger), and in economics (J. von Neumann, O. Morgenstern). See LOGIC, HISTORY OF.

Basic Concepts. A fundamental distinction in symbolic logic is that between constants and variables. Variables are symbols (usually the letters x, y, z) that can be replaced by constants (usually the letters a, b, c) or by complex formulas. If a constant is replaced by a variable in a sentence, or proposition, the result is a function; this is a schema for a sentence, or proposition, and in itself is neither true nor false. Thus, "x is a student" is a function and is neither true nor false, whereas "a is a student" and "John is a student" are sentences and may be true or false. Functions may be transformed back into sentences, or propositions, by prefixing a quantifier to them. There are two types of quantifiers: universal quantifiers, of which an example would be "for all x,..." [written (x)]; and existential quantifiers, of which an example would be "there is at least one x such that . . ." [written $(\exists x)$].

Symbols are generally divided into basic categories and functor, or predicate, categories. The basic categories are either names (substantives) or sentences. Functors, or predicates, are symbols (usually designated by the Greek letters φ , ψ , χ , or by specially invented characters) that determine other symbols, which are referred to as arguments. Thus, "Peter" is the argument of the functor "walks" in the sentence "Peter walks," which may be written "φa," where "a" stands for "Peter" and "φ" stands for "walks." Functors are divided in three different ways, each based on a different principle of division. (1) First there is the division into sentence-forming and name-forming functors. Thus, "walks" is sentence forming because "Peter walks" is a sentence, whereas "brilliant" is name forming because "brilliant student" is a name. (2) A second division is that into namedetermining and sentence-determining functors. Thus,

"walks" is a name-determining functor, as in the example "Peter walks"; on the other hand, "it is not the case that" is a sentence-determining functor, as in the example "It is not the case that Peter walks." (3) Finally, functors are distinguished according to the number of arguments that they determine into one-place, two-place, three-place, or, in general, n-place functors. An example of a one-place functor is "walks" in the sentence "Peter walks"-"walks" here determines only one argument, viz, "Peter." An example of a two-place functor is "loves" in the sentence "Paul loves Joan"-here "loves" determines two arguments, viz, "Paul" and "Joan." An example of a three-place functor is "gives" in the sentence "Paul gives Joan a ring"—here "gives" determines three arguments, viz, "Paul," "Joan," and "ring." And so on.

In accordance with these principles of division, symbolic logic may be seen as divided into three main parts: (1) propositional logic, in which all functors are sentence-determining; (2) the logic of predicates and of classes, which treats of name-determining functors; and (3) the logic of relations, which is concerned with special properties of functors that determine two or more arguments.

Propositional Logic. Propositional logic is concerned exclusively with sentences, or propositions, that may be constructed by means of so-called truth functors. Truth functors are sentence-forming, determining, generally one- and two-place functors that can be used to form sentences whose truth value depends exclusively on the truth value of their arguments and not upon their meanings. Truth value in propositional logic which is a two-valued logic—is twofold: it may be either the value of truth (usually written T or 1) or the value of falsity (usually written F or 0). An example of a truth functor is negation, since the value of a negated true sentence is falsity and the value of a negated false sentence is truth, and this independently of the sentences' meanings. The most widely employed truth functors are negation ("it is not the case that . . . ," usually written ~), the logical sum ("either . . . or . . ." in the sense of "either or both"), the logical product (". . . and . . . ," usually symbolized by a period or dot), material implication ("if . . . , then. . . ," usually written ⊃), equivalence ("if and only if . . . , then . . . ," usually written \equiv), and disjunction ("either . . . or . . ." in the sense of "not both. . . and . . . ," usually written I).

The truth functor known as material implication is most important for understanding how symbolic logic differs from traditional formal logic. Although material implication is taken to mean "if . . . then . . . ," it has a different significance from the conditional compound of ordinary discourse. Because of its ordination to a truth-value type of VERIFICATION, material implication abstracts from, ignores, or leaves behind some of the ordinary elements of meaning of the conditional compound. Some authors (e.g., H. Veatch) make this abstraction the central point of their evaluation of material implication, arguing that it cannot express the intentional character of the conditional, which must lie in the relation of meaning between the component propositions, viz, the antecedent and the consequent. Other authors, while recognizing differences between the ordinary conditional compound and material implication, attempt to point out an element common to both. Thus I. M. Copi argues that material implication expresses a partial meaning of the conditional. Every conditional whose antecedent is true and whose consequent is false must be considered a false proposition; it is this element of the conditional that is expressed by material implication. Since material implication has a "weaker" meaning than the conditional compound, material implication can always be asserted when a strict conditional obtains, although the converse is not true. The essential value of material implication appears to lie in its permitting one to state that if the antecedent proposition has been assigned the value of truth, the consequent proposition must also be assigned the same value; this makes possible a purely mechanical operation that resembles a deductive process based on the recognition of meanings of what is stated in the antecedent and the consequent.

Using the concept of deduction thus associated with material implication, one may derive all the sentences, or propositions, of propositional logic from very few axioms and rules. Propositional logic is the most completely developed part of symbolic logic; it is regarded by mathematical logicians as the simplest and most basic part of their science, which provides the framework, so to speak, for all other types of logical analysis and deduction.

Logic of Predicates and of Classes. The second branch of symbolic logic falls into two divisions: the logic of predicates, which gives an intensional interpretation of its formulas, and the logic of classes, which gives an extensional interpretation.

 x). φx . ψx ." Use of these modes of writing and the deductive methods of the logic of propositions has led to a considerable extension of Aristotelian syllogistics.

The logic of classes is the extensional counterpart of the logic of one-place functors or predicates. A class or set (generally designated by the Greek letters α , β , or γ) is always defined by a predicate; it is the set of all objects that possess a given property. For example, the class of human beings consists of all objects to which the predicate "is a man" can be attributed. The most important concept of the logic of classes is that of class membership, " $x \in \alpha$," which is usually read "x is a member of α " or "x belongs to α ." Another concept—one that has caused considerable controversy among philosophers—is that of the null class, i.e., the class that contains no elements. On the basis of the definition of class and the theorems of the logic of predicates, as well as those of propositional logic, various combinations of classes can be effected and the relationships between them ascertained.

Logic of Relations. The logic of relations may be described as an extensional counterpart of the logic of predicates (or functors) that determine two or more arguments, just as the logic of classes may be regarded as an extensional counterpart of the logic of predicates that determine one argument. The reason for this is that relations can hold only between two or more arguments. In this branch of symbolic logic, relations are conceived extensionally, i.e., as relating to groups of objects. A relation, in a manner completely analogous to the defining procedure for a class, may be defined by a two-place predicate. Thus one may define the relation "in love with" as "the set of pairs of persons who love each other." The symbol usually employed is R, which is generally written between the two variables it relates, e.g., xRy. Every relation may be conceived as having a converse; thus "to the right of" is the converse of "to the left of," and "the author of" is the converse of "the work of." It is common also to distinguish various relational descriptions: (1) individual, e.g., the husband of the Queen of England; (2) plural, e.g., the authors of the New Catholic Encyclopedia; (3) double plural, e.g., the authors of English poems; and (4) the domain, which is the most general type of relational description, e.g., all authors. Of considerable importance are the concepts used for the purposes of compounding several relations, such as the relative product (e.g., the square of the half, the brother of the mother) and the relative power (e.g., the father of the father, or father "squared"). Another group of useful concepts is provided by the properties of relations: some are reflexive, i.e., xRx; others are symmetrical, i.e., if xRy then yRx; and still others are transitive, i.e., if xRy and yRz, then xRz. A concept of great use in the investigation of series is that of ancestral relation (R or R^2 or R^3 , etc.).

See Also: ANTINOMY; MATHEMATICS, PHILOSOPHY OF: SEMANTICS.

Bibliography: A. CHURCH, "A Bibliography of Symbolic Logic," Journal of Symbolic Logic 1 (1936) 121-218; 3 (1938) 178-192, continued in subsequent issues; "A Brief Bibliography of Formal Logic," Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences 80 (1952) 155-172. History. W. and M. KNEALE, The Development of Logic (Oxford 1962). H. SCHOLZ, Concise History of Logic, tr. K. F. LEIDECKER (New York 1961). I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, A Précis of Mathematical Logic, tr. O. BIRD (Dordrecht, Netherlands 1959), select bibliog.; A History of Formal Logic, ed. and tr. I. THOMAS (Notre Dame, IN 1961); Ancient Formal Logic (Amsterdam 1951). J. LUKASIEWICZ, Aristotle's Syllogistic from the Standpoint of Modern Formal Logic (2d ed. enl. Oxford 1957). P. BOEHNER, Medieval Logic: An Outline of Its Development from 1250-c. 1400 (Chicago 1952). E. A. MOODY, Truth and Consequence in Mediaeval Logic (Amsterdam 1953). Studies. W. V. O. QUINE, Mathematical Logic (rev. ed. Cambridge, MA 1958); From a Logical Point of View (2d ed. rev. Cambridge, MA 1961). I. M. COPI, Symbolic Logic (New York 1958). R. CARNAP, Introduction to Symbolic Logic and Its Applications (New York 1958). S. K. LANGER, An Introduction to Symbolic Logic (2d ed. New York 1953). I. M. BOCHEŃSKI et al., The Problem of Universals: A Symposium (Notre Dame, IN 1956). J. A. LADRIÈRE, Les Limitations internes des formalismes (Louvain 1957). H. VEATCH, "Aristotelian and Mathematical Logic," Thomist 13 (1950) 50-96; 14 (1951) 238-258; 15 (1952) 624-641.

[W. A. WALLACE]

LOGICAL POSITIVISM

A contemporary philosophical movement that aims to establish an all-embracing, thoroughly consistent empiricism based solely on the logical analysis of language. Because of its anti-metaphysical bias, militantly propagated by its founders and some prominent adherents, the movement constitutes a serious challenge to traditional philosophy and religion. In what follows, consideration is given to its historical development, its principal proponents and some of their antecedents, its philosophical tenets and how these evolved, and a critical evaluation.

Origins with the Vienna Circle. The logical positivist movement began with a small group of philosophers and scientists later known as the Vienna Circle (Wiener Kreis). The group had formed itself around Moritz Schlick, a former physicist who was appointed to the chair of philosophy of the inductive sciences at the University of Vienna in 1922. Meetings to discuss logical and epistemological problems were held regularly. Among those who joined Schlick were Rudolf Carnap, Hans Hahn, Otto Neurath, Herbert Feigl, Philipp Frank, Freidrich Waismann, and Edgar Zilsel. Most of these men had developed an interest in philosophy as an outgrowth of their work in physics, mathematics, or mathematical logic.

In the fall of 1929 the Vienna Circle published a document written by Carnap, Hahn, and Neurath, and dedicated to Moritz Schlick, titled Wissenschaftliche Weltauffassung: Der Wiener Kreis. In this statement of "scientific outlook" they set forth the two aims of the group: (1) to establish a firm foundation for the sciences, and (2) to demonstrate the meaninglessness of all metaphysics. The method proposed for accomplishing these aims was the logical analysis of statements.

A decisive influence in the early years of the Vienna Circle was that of Ludwig WITTGENSTEIN, whose Logisch-Philosophische Abhandlung had been published in 1921. Although he did not attend the meetings, Wittgenstein was in personal contact with Schlick and Waismann, and his views provided the basis for many discussions.

Convinced that their cooperative efforts were producing results, the members of the Vienna Circle reached out to form alliances with other rising positivist groups in Germany, Scandinavia, Poland, and England. Hans Reichenbach of the Berlin school of scientific philosophy was among those who became closely associated with the growing movement. A series of international congresses was inaugurated in 1929. An existing journal, Annalen der Philosophie, was taken over in 1930, renamed Erkenntnis, and edited by Carnap and Reichenbach as the organ of the new positivism. Other cooperative publishing ventures were also undertaken.

In the next decade, however, the Vienna Circle disintegrated. Schlick had died in 1936; Hahn, before him. The departure of many original members—among them Carnap, Frank, Waismann, Neurath, and Feigl—for universities in England and the U.S. led to a new development. Its influence all but over in central Europe, logical positivism was to become, along with its variant forms, such as analytical philosophy, the dominant philosophical movement in Scandinavia and the English-speaking world.

Basic Teachings. Logical positivism is not unique in the history of philosophy for its rejection of metaphysics. Early British EMPIRICISM had developed in this direction, culminating in the doctrine of HUME with its decisive influence on KANT. On the European continent, Auguste COMTE had proclaimed the end of the ''metaphysical stage'' in human intellectual history (see POSITIVISM). American pragmatism, in doctrine and spirit, and the whole scientific temper of the 20th century favored a strict empiricism.

What distinctly characterizes the logical positivists is their explicit resolve to eradicate metaphysics and to make empiricism a matter of logical necessity. Not content merely to abandon metaphysics as beyond human grasp, nor to cast it aside as having outlived its usefulness, they set out to show that every attempt to make a metaphysical statement, or even to ask a metaphysical question, results inevitably in nonsense. They questioned not the limits of human knowledge but the limits of meaningful linguistic expression.

Logical Foundations. This approach to philosophy was made possible by the development of modern mathematical logic from Peano and Frege to Bertrand RUSSELL and Ludwig Wittgenstein. Of particular importance to logical positivism is the doctrine of propositions worked out by Russell and Wittgenstein, but based upon earlier suggestions in the writings of LEIBNIZ, Hume, and Kant (see LOGIC, SYMBOLIC; LOGIC, HISTORY OF).

Logical positivists, following Wittgenstein, hold that there are two distinct types of propositions: (1) tautologies, which are evidently and necessarily true, but say nothing about the world; and (2) factual propositions, which refer to the world of experience, but are at best probable. These latter are either elementary statements, corresponding to absolutely simple "atomicfacts," or complex statements constructed from, and resolvable into, the first. No logically necessary proposition says anything about reality. The propositions of logic and mathematics, though certain and necessary, are devoid of factual content; they are all tatuologies, that is, so many varied ways of saying "A is A."

The function of factual propositions is to enable us to "anticipate the course of our sensations." Unavoidably hypothetical, they must repeatedly be put to the test of experience, and they are verified whenever the observations they lead one to expect are forthcoming. This predictive character is essential to factual propositions.

Verification and Metaphysics. By classifying all genuine propositions into tautologies and those empirically verifiable, logical positivists so define meaningful discourse that metaphysics becomes logically impossible. They proceed, nonetheless, to "demonstrate" the meaninglessness of metaphysical statements by invoking their criterion of meaning, the "verification principle" (see VERIFICATION).

The formulation of this key principle has been a continuing point of contention in the logical positivist movement. It was soon recognized that to demand conclusive verifiability for meaningfulness was to exclude empirical hypotheses. So this requirement was quickly abandoned. Another formulation of the principle required that a statement at least be supportable by some elementary statements.

Schlick himself had held that the meaningfulness of a proposition depends upon the "logical possibility" of verification, not upon its actual confirmation. By this he meant that the existence of circumstances in which a statement might be verified must not be contradictory. To state the meaning of a sentence, he held, is to describe the circumstances in which it is to be used, for "the meaning of a proposition is the method of its verification" (see SE-MANTICS). This assertion is quite fundamental to logical positivism. From it the meaninglessness of any discourse about objects transcending the empirical order follows directly. Thus the term "metaphysical," used by logical positivists to cover all non-empirical attempts to speak about reality, becomes equivalent to "nonsensical." In their understanding, the whole of reality is the exclusive domain of empirical science.

Ethics and Religion. At first logical positivists disagreed on the status of ethics. Schlick held that ethical statements are factual propositions about what people approve or disapprove, their actual standards of behavior, and their actual motives. This would make ethics an empirical science, in no essential way distinct from the physical sciences. Such a position never won general acceptance in the movement.

The view of ethics that gradually prevailed is based upon the notion of "emotive meaning." According to this theory, the normative statements of ethics are cognitively meaningless but have "emotive" significance. This means, in A. J. Ayer's terms, that they are "pure expressions of feeling," "moral sentiments" that "do not say anything." C. L. Stevenson, who later developed the emotive theory at greater length, describes ethical statements as expressions of approval or disapproval that are intended to exert persuasive force upon others.

The majority of logical positivists considered that they had sufficiently disposed of religious and theological questions by their treatment of metaphysics. Ayer, however, applies the positivist criterion of meaning to the question of God's existence in an effort to disassociate the logical positivist position from ATHESIM and AGNOS-TICISM. Rather than asserting the nonexistence of God, as does the atheist, or proclaiming himself, like the agnostic, ignorant as to whether or not God exists, the positivist rejects the very question of God's existence as meaningless, and declares the atheist's answer, no less than the theist's, nonsensical. The theist is thus offered the "comfort" of knowing that he can never be accused of saying anything false. Furthermore, there can be no conflict between religion and science, since there are no genuine theological propositions to oppose the propositions of science.

Such complete frankness makes superfluous any further exposition of the incompatibility of logical positivist doctrines with any religious doctrine that is proposed as true.

From the first, logical positivists were aware that their doctrines were being attacked as destructive of religion, morality, and even of philosophy. The charge of opposition to religion they readily admitted, Ayer observing only that this puts them in excellent philosophical company. With morality itself they had no quarrel. Their interest in denying the cognitive significance of ethical propositions concerns simply a point of logic—the distinctness of the emotive from the scientific order.

Role of Philosophy. The question of what function remains for philosophy now that it has lost its former domains never ceased to disturb logical positivists. One answer with support from the start was that philosophy is simply a branch of logic. This was the position of Rudolf Carnap, who declared without hesitation that the only proper task of philosophy is the logical analysis of scientific concepts and propositions.

For Schlick, a "great turning point" came when philosophy ceased to be regarded as a science in its own right with propositions of its own. With nothing to say itself, philosophy becomes the "activity" of making scientific propositions clear, leaving to the sciences the task of stating the truth about things.

This conception of philosophy grew, at least in part, out of Wittgenstein's early teaching that philosophy's total function is negative: it exposes lapses into metaphysical utterance thereby rescuing man's intelligence from its "bewitchment" by language. Philosophical problems are not solved; they just "dissolve." Yet Wittgenstein's final advice to discard even the propositions of his book as nonsense (after having made use of them) disturbed some of his disciples. Carnap charges him with inconsistency, and Ayer suggests that there are philosophical propositions after all, viz, those that constitute books such as Ayer's own. Holding these to be tautologies, Ayer rejoins Carnap in making philosophy a branch of logic.

Critique and Evaluation. This did not end the logical positivists' struggle, in the grip of their own basic principles, to create a role for themselves as philosophers. Friedrich Waismann, prominent in the original discussions of the Vienna Circle, was moved, by 1956, to observe that it is "nonsense" to say that metaphysics is nonsense. Later, considering again the frequently voiced objection that the verification principle is itself unverifiable, Ayer continued to shun the suggestion that it might be nonsense, but could offer little in its defense, He conceded that, if a metaphysical statement is neither a tautology nor a scientific hypothesis, it does not follow that it is meaningless, unless one "makes it follow"—a procedure that, he observes, has proved useful for banishing metaphysicians from the domain of science.

This is a telling observation. It points to the practical concern behind the logical positivist movement and dispels the image of a doctrine growing out of inexorable laws of logic. It calls attention to the circumstance that the early founders of logical positivism were predominantly men of a scientific outlook, chiefly concerned with what they regarded as metaphysical encroachments within science.

Apart from this, however, there are valuable truths to be drawn from the movement. By insisting upon clarity of thought and precision in the use of language, and by calling into question rationalist and idealist modes of philosophizing, logical positivists have served both philosophy and science. Many of them have shown themselves to be exceptionally competent philosophers. Their analyses have, at times, placed them firmly on the side of common sense. But what is more important, by their radical challenge to the survival of traditional philosophy they have compelled those who would resist them to take seriously their obligation to be true philosophers.

None of these factors, however, removes the basic philosophic weaknesses of logical positivism; nor do they mitigate its basic incompatibility with a religion that promises anything to the mind of man.

See Also: METAPHYSICS, VALIDITY OF.

Bibliography: A. J. AYER, Logical Positivism (Glencoe, IL 1959); Language, Truth and Logic (2d ed. New York 1957). J. R. WEINBERG, An Examination of Logical Positivism (New York 1936). C. L. STEVENSON, Ethics and Language (New Haven 1944). V. KRAFT, The Vienna Circle: The Origin of Neo-Positivism, tr. A. PAP (New York 1953). O. NEURATH et al., Wissenschaftliche Weltauffassung: Der Wiener Kreis (Vienna 1929).

[M. F. GRIESBACH]

LOGICISM

The philosophical conviction that logic alone can solve all problems, whether scientific, philosophical, or theological, because these are reducible to logical problem. Although sometimes opposed to PSYCHOLOGISM as a tendency to construct a logic independently of psychology or to reduce psychology to logic, it is more commonly contrasted with mathematicism as an attempt to reduce all of mathematics to logic (see MATHEMATICS, PHILOSO-PHY OF).

Historically, logicism made its appearance in the 12th century with the efforts of Peter ABELARD to solve the problem of UNIVERSALS. It later developed into NOMI-NALISM and SKEPTICISM towards the close of the Middle Ages. In recent times its revival parallels the growth of symbolic or mathematical logic, and the related movements of LOGICAL POSITIVISM and analytical philosophy (see LOGIC, SYMBOLIC).

While logic is a universal discipline that has important contributions to make to both science and philosophy, its overemphasis can have harmful effects. One of these is the confusion it generates between method and content. More important is its failure to recognize any distinction between logic and metaphysics. Logic concerns itself with ideas, judgments, laws of reasoning, and their expressions as these exist formally in the mind, whereas metaphysics concerns itself with reality as this exists in itself. Logical beings are actually contents of the mind as universals of second intention that are univocal in meaning; ontological being is transcendental and analogical in meaning. Logic emphasizes the extension of concepts, whereas metaphysics is more concerned with intension and hierarchies of content.

By confusing ontological being with logical being, logicism makes logic overreach itself and thus become indistinguishable from other forms of thought.

See Also: METHODOLOGY (PHILOSOPHY); METAPHYSICS, VALIDITY OF.

Bibliography: E. H. GILSON, The Unity of Philosophical Experience (New York 1937). J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite, or The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN from 4th French ed. (New York 1959).

[E. Q. FRANZ]

LOGOS

The word Logos (λόγος) has various meanings in Greek: reckoning, account, explanation, reason, narrative, saying, term, word, etc. But it is the use of this word in the expression, λόγος θεοῦ, "Word of God," as employed in the Johannine writings of the New Testament, that makes it a term of prime theological significance.

1. In the Bible

For a better understanding of this term as used by St. John it is necessary to begin with a consideration of its similar usage in the works of PHILO JUDAEUS, who preceded the author of the Fourth Gospel in the employment of this expression.

Logos in Philo. Like most of his thought, Philo's theory of the Logos was a combination of Biblical and Greco-philosophic themes. The developing poetical personification of the WORD OF GOD in the Old Testament [cf. Ps 32(33).4, 6; 106(107).20; 147(147B).15; Wisdom 18.15-16] was the basis for his synthesis. This Biblical personification was augmented in the Targums of the post-Biblical period, works whose contents go back far into the Old Testament oral traditions. In these homiletically expanded translations of the Old Testament the term Memra (Aram. memrā', corresponding to Heb. dābār, "word") was often used as a synonym for the divine name Yahweh. Originally, this was intended to safeguard the transcendence of the divine name, especially when this was used in anthropomorphic contexts. [See AN-THROPOMORPHISM (IN THE BIBLE).] Thus the Targum of Genesis 3.8 says that Adam and Eve, "heard the sound of the Memra walking in the garden." From this use of Memra for Yahweh's anthropomorphic seeing, hearing, feeling, becoming angered, etc., the Memra becomes a poetic intermediary between Yahweh and His people. The result is that from its usage as a word created to guard the divine transcendence, it becomes a term that intensifies the divine immanence. The Memra becomes God's instrument in creation and in history, and in the ruling of both. Here the theme of personified Word and personified Memra meet and unite. It is difficult to decide the exact line between poetics and metaphysics in these personifications.

Thus Philo would have found the poetic personification of the word $(d\bar{a}b\bar{a}r)$ of Yahweh not only in the Old Testament itself, but united with the rabbinical theories on the Memra in contemporary Judaic tradition. This supplied the Biblical stratum for Philo's theories on the Logos. The Greco-philosophic concept was a combination of the Logos of Heraclitus and the Stoics with the idea world of Plato; it is no wonder that the Logos theory of Philo defies organization into perfectly coherent unity.

Logos as Image of God. The Platonic thesis of the idea world was equated by Philo with the Logos. Plato considered the visible, sensible world an image (εἰκών) of the idea world (Timaeus 92); Philo knew from Genesis 1.26 that man was created "according to the image" (κατ' εἰκόνα) of God and he took this to mean that man was the image of the Image (εἰκὼν εἰκόνος) of God. The Image, then, must be the Logos (De opificio mundi 25). This understanding of the Logos as Image of God seems to be accepted by Philo as a first principle, and this is his ordinary way of describing the relation of the Logos with God: "the Image of God is the Logos through whom the whole universe was framed" (De specialibus legibus 1.81); "the divine Logos is Himself the Image of God, chiefest of all beings intellectually perceived, placed nearest, with no intermediary distance, to the truly Existent One" (De fuga et inventione 101); "it well befits those who have entered into comradeship with knowledge to desire to see the Existent if they may, but, if they cannot, to see at least his Image, the most holy Logos' (De confusione linguarum 97). The Logos, then, is the Image of God; it is the personified divine Reason binding creation to the divine.

Logos Image as Wisdom. At times Wisdom (σοφία) seems greater than Logos (De fug. et inv. 109; legum allegoriae 1.65; 2.49; De somniis 2.242); at other times Logos seems superior to Wisdom (De fug. et inv. 97). In reality, however, Logos and Wisdom are but two terms for the same divine Reason as intermediary for creation (Leg. all. 2.86; De fug. et inv. 51, 101; De migratione Abrahami 40 and De som. 185; De fug. et inv. 109 and De cherubim 125–127; De con. ling. 146 and Leg. all. 1.43). Logos is Wisdom, but this latter term is more "feminine" and can be used for divine Reason in a receptive role, e.g., as mother of creation (De fug. et inv. 109; Leg. all. 2.49).

Logos Image as Divine "Man." In an allegory on Genesis 42.11 Philo explains, "You have all enrolled yourselves as children of one and the same Father, who is not mortal but immortal—God's man, who being the Logos of the eternal. . ." (De con. ling. 41). In another allegory, on Zechariah 6.12, he identifies the "man" with "the Incorporeal One who differs not a bit from the divine Image" (ibid., 62). Thus the Logos who is the Image of God, the personified divine Reason (vovocensightarrowerdensity), can also be called Wisdom (vovenedensity)) and Man (vovenedensity), divine Man.

Logos Image and the World. The same Logos who is Image (εἰκῶν) with regard to God is Model (παράδειγμα) in relation to the sensible world (κόσμος). The Platonic theory that the sensible world is the visible image of the idea world ($De\ con.\ ling.\ 172$) is incorporated into Philo's synthesis by the equation of the Logos and the idea world: "the world discerned only by the intellect is nothing else than the Word of God when He was already engaged in the act of creation" ($De\ op.\ mun.\ 15-25$). Thus, for Philo, the material universe is the image of the Logos, which is itself the Image of God.

Logos Image and Mankind. Since the world is the image of the Logos, what of man who is himself part of this world? Man has reason ($vovecent{vovecenter}$), whereby he is a very special part of the universe. This reason of man's, "which is in the true sense and full sense man, is the image of the Logos, the cast, as it were, of the Image of God" (Quis reum divinarum Heres 230–31; cf., De fug. et inv. 68; De op. mun. 69). Whatever the term used for man's reason, whether $vovecent{vovecenter}$, or $vovecent{vovecenter}$, or some of their derivatives, it is always through this faculty that man is the image of the Logos (Quod det. pot. insid. sol 82–84; De fug. et inv. 69; Quis rer. div. Her. 234; De mutatione nominis 223; De spec. leg. 1.171; Leg. all. 3.95; De spec. leg. 1.81; 3.207; De plantatione 5). It is here that Philo's Biblical conceptions seem to break through his philosophical framework. At times the Logos intermediary fades from the picture and man becomes directly the Image of God by himself (De spec. leg. 3.207; De somniis 1.74; Quod. det. pot. insid. sol 82–83; De decalogo 134). It should be noted that this is never said of the world itself, but only of man.

For Philo, then, the Logos is the poetic personification of divine Reason, the Image of God. Logos is also termed, at times, divine Wisdom and divine Man. The sensible world is the image of the Logos as the creational mind of God, but this point is not too fully developed by Philo; it was possibly too un-Biblical. Finally, man, through his reason, is the image of the Logos, which is divine Reason; it is reason that makes man most perfectly and fully man. Philo's Biblical heritage, however, often makes him ignore the Logos's role in this last point, and he speaks of man as the Image of God Himself.

Logos in St. John. The term Logos appears as a technical term in the Johannine writings. Leaving aside the detailed problems of authorship, it will be here presumed that Revelation, 1 John, and John stem from the same theological mentality and may be studied together.

Logos in Revelation 19.13. The general context of this passage is the eschatological judgment (19.11–21; 20.7-15) and salvation (21.1-22.5) of mankind. The judgment is shown as a battle (19.11-21; 20.7-10), after which sentence of condemnation is passed on the vanquished evildoers (20.11-15). In this battle the forces of the just are led by a Rider on a white horse among whose many names is that of "The Logos of God." This vision is of Christ as the eschatological Victor and Judge. It is obvious that the title Logos in such a context owes nothing to Philo. It is also clear from the description of the Rider in Revelation 19.11-16 that the seer bases his vision on the Old Testament conception of the Logos of Yahweh as an avenging force in history. The destruction of Egypt, whereby Israel was liberated from bondage (Ex 12.23), was later described (Wisdom 18.14-16) as a visitation of the wrathful Logos of God-the Logos as sword of Yahweh (see also Rv 19.15 and 1 Chr 21.16). Thus, the Old Testament theme of God's judgment and God's visitation in wrath (Is 11.4; Ps 2.9) is here given to the Logos as eschatological Victor and Judge. The Logos of God exterminates the unjust.

Logos in 1 John. The problem of chronological sequence of 1 John and John is still disputed; for the present purpose, it is presumed that 1 John preceded John. The prologue of the Epistle describes Christ as the "Logos of life." This sudden and unexplained title probably means that the first readers of 1 John were already familiar with the oral catechesis that lay behind the later writing of John 1.1–18. In Deuteronomy the Law was preached as a source and way of life, and at times it was simply termed "the word" ($d\bar{a}b\bar{a}r$: 4.1–2; 32.47). The revelation of Yahweh in the Law was the word that gave life to Israel; so 1 John sees the incarnate Christ as the full and perfect revelation and communication of divine life to mankind (1 Jn 1.2; 5.20; Jn 14.6; see also Jn 1.17). The Logos of God vivifies the just.

Logos in John 1.1–18. In his magnificent prologue John mentions the Logos four times under this title; the term is used here without any genitival qualifications. The functions of the Logos as eschatological avenger (Revelation) and as revelatory vivifier (1 John) are here overshadowed as the Logos appears in the fullness of both being and function.

In the Old Testament the hymns to personified Wisdom in the sapiential literature followed a three-point schema: Wisdom was with God from all eternity; Wisdom was with God at creation; Wisdom has come down with gifts to mankind (Prv 8.22–35; Sir 1.1–35; 24.5–31; Wis 9.9-12). In John 1.1-18 the Logos is described in this same pattern except that it is done in inverse parallelism: the Word with God (1-2, 18); the Word at the old and new creation (3, 17); the gifts that the Word brings to men, centered on divine sonship through the Incarnation (4-16). But despite the Wisdom framework, John terms Christ the Logos and not the Wisdom of God. In this, John is reverting to the earlier word-of-Yahweh theology of the Old Testament while including in the term all the activity in creation and history attributed to Wisdom in the sapiential books.

The Logos appears immediately as eternal, already existing when God came to create the world. He was both distinct from the Father ("with God," where the divine name has the definite article, \dot{o} $\theta\epsilon\dot{o}\varsigma$) and yet one with God ("was God," where God, $\theta\epsilon\dot{o}\varsigma$, lacks the definite article). The Logos's preexistent divine being is at the height of the descent that terminates in the Logos becoming flesh and giving to the people of God a new Tent in which the divine can dwell (1.14).

Logos in Philo and in St. John. One can hardly state that John did not know the thought of Philo on the Logos; yet it is equally difficult to show any real dependence on it or influence from it. The two syntheses described above have their common roots deep in Biblical and rabbinical thinking on the word and the Memra of God, and this is sufficient to explain their similarities. Their differences arise from the fact that Philo depends on Plato to help him develop the theme of the Logos, whereas John develops the theme from what the Spirit reminds him concerning what he had heard, seen, and felt of the Logos become flesh.

Bibliography: PHILO JUDAEUS, Philo, tr. F. H. COLSON and G. H. WHITAKER, 10 v. (Loeb Classical Library; London-New York-Cambridge, Mass. 1929–62). É. BRÉHIER, Les Idées philosophiques et religieuses de Philon d'Alexandrie (2d ed. Paris 1925). M. E. BOISMARD, St. John's Prologue, tr. Carisbrooke Dominicans (Westminster, Maryland 1957). J. STARCKY, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 5:465–75, 479–96. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1364–68.

[D. M. CROSSAN]

2. Theology of

Because it is decidedly Trinitarian in its historical and logical implications, the present question is intimately connected with CHRISTOLOGY as well (see GOD [SON]). By way of an introductory definition, the latter may be taken to designate a particular way of understanding and expressing the reality-activity of Jesus of Nazareth—this in terms of a definite function attributed to Him; in the present case, that of Logos, or Word. To view Him in such a perspective is to adopt a frame of reference that was originally Biblical, however much it may have been developed in the course of subsequent Christian thought. Consequently, the proclamation of Jesus as the preexisting, divine, creative Logos on the part of the postapostolic Church had its source not directly and certainly, not exclusively in Hellenistic philosophy but rather in the Jewish-Christian Scriptures. The development of this faith and its understanding in the long ages of meditation on the mystery of God's Word is the subject under consideration here; in other words, the theology of the Logos in the postapostolic Church.

Precondition. The diversity found in the ways Jesus is presented in the New Testament is a fact. One of those Christic theologies—indeed a most important one—is that of the Logos. Preexistent and intimately related to the Father eternally; divine; the Guide or Word of all creation; incarnate among men in time—such is Jesus as Logos according to the Scriptures, especially in the Johannine corpus (Jn ch. 1; 1 Jn ch. 1).

Faith in Jesus—which was also faith concerning Jesus—was formulated in diverse, if mutually compatible, ways within the New Testament, that of the Logos being numbered among them. In view of this, one might consider antecedently probable the occurrence of a similar situation in later times as well. Such was in fact the case.

Of relevance here are such efforts insofar as they terminated in new modes of presenting the Logos doctrine and its implications. These were attempts on the part of individuals or the magisterium to express the same Biblical faith concerning Jesus in terms more immediately familiar to men of post-Biblical times. Implicit in the whole phenomenon were a consciousness and conviction on the part of the Church. It was aware that its mission to preach the one gospel of and concerning Jesus to all men would entail retaining its truth undiluted, though adapted to vastly different mentalities. The Church also came to the conviction that professing the faith in union with all other believers no more involved the necessity of adopting a particular philosophical system than it involved the necessity of conforming one's eating habits to certain dietary prescriptions of the Mosaic Law.

Realization as Continuation. A most noteworthy characteristic found in the early theology of the Logos was that it involved the homogeneous development of a Biblical truth. If in the New Testament Jesus as Logos had truly transcendent qualities, He was nevertheless presented as very much endowed with a cosmic function at once illuminative and productive (see WORD, THE). His preexistence with the Father was clearly asserted, but even more in focus were the implications this had regarding the entire universe in its relation of dependence on Him. In this, the scriptural perspective was one of transient or functional interpersonalism. It was this aspect that was elaborated further when Christian apologists came into contact with an intellectual milieu concerned with a logos as the explanation of all order and rationality in the world.

Striking evidence of this is present in the ideological connection they made between the creative word of Elohim in the first chapter of Genesis and Jesus as Logos in the prologue of the Fourth Gospel [Theophilus of Antioch, Autol. 2.10, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 6:1066; Tatian, Orat. 5, Patrologia Graeca 6:814-818; Justin, Dial. 61, Patrologia Graeca 6:614-615; Justin, 2 Apol. 6, Patrologia Graeca 6:454; Tertullian, Adv. Praxean 5, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 47:232–33; Clement of Alexandria, Str. 6.7.58.1, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (Stählin) 461; Clement of Alexandria, Str. 6.5.39.2, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 451; Origen, Hom. 1 in Gen. 1, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (Baehrens) 6.1:1-10]. The grammatical and exegetical presuppositions this involved were commented on by later Fathers too (Hilary, Tract. in Psalm. 2, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 22.2:39; Jerome, Liber heb. quaest. in Gen. 1.1, Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 67: 3).

It was a common thing for such writers to distinguish between the eternal reason or mental word of God and its external utterance (Theophilus in the place cited; Justin in the place cited in the Dial.; Tertullian in Adv. Praxean 6-8, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 47:233 and following; Hippolytus, Noët. 10, Patrologia Graeca 10:818). Here one cannot but note the definite resemblance with the λόγος ἐνδιάθετος-προφορικός of contemporary philosophy, particularly Stoicism. The immanent procession of the Logos in the Godhead and His temporal mission are closely connected; the creativeredemptive οἰκονομία is not divorced from that within the Deity. If the unified picture thus obtained is a decided advantage, there is a difficulty as well. Saving cosmic process threatens to become a necessary element in the divine origin of the Logos. Such theological endeavors were not enthusiastically received by all even at the time (Irenaeus, Haer. 2.28.6; Harvey 1:355).

In effect, these efforts to describe the origin of the Logos from the Father were motivated by a desire to win a sympathetic hearing for the faith. Despite its mysterious character, the doctrine of Jesus as Logos was not without any affinity with elements of non-Christian thought prevalent at the time. There was a willingness on the part of the Fathers in question to search out examples or images from daily life to show that the origin of the Logos from God the Father (\acute{o} θε \acute{o} ς) was not totally unlike anything man could encounter in the world of his experience. In this way one understands better the intention behind their use of such images as the origin of the external word by which man expresses one already in his mind and also the case of the fire giving rise to another without diminution on its own part.

To put it another way, these Fathers used natural analogues to illustrate one aspect of the Jesus-Logos profession—His distinction from the Father and His creative-illuminative-redemptive relation to the world from the very beginning. Examples from the realm of created being could not but limp when applied to the clarification of a mysterious communication of life from Father to Son-Logos in the Godhead. In this case, the distinction between an eternal word in the mind of God and one uttered in time could be understood to make the Logos temporal in the strict sense and therefore not equal to the Father. Such a procedure errs on two counts.

First, it attributes to the writers in question the intention of doing a great deal more than offering helps to understand the meaning and implications of the faith concerning Jesus-Logos. It assumes they thought they had discovered the real equivalent of this mystery in the everyday life of man. There is not the slightest indication that this was the case; they distinguished between this faith and their attempts to render it more intelligible [Justin, Dial. 48, Patrologia Graeca 6:579, 582; Tertullian, De praescr. haer. 7.12–13, Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 1:193; Origen, Princ., praef., 2–4, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (Koetschau) 5:8–10]. Second, it also takes for granted that these Fathers, besides considering their examples completely adequate, saw as well and immediately the consequences to which the latter would lead. In this case that would amount to the temporal generation of the Son, or utterance of the Word. Such a view is clearly anachronistic.

It also overlooks the fact that these same authors insisted on the Word-Son's equality in dignity with the Father [Justin, 1 Apol. 63, Patrologia Graeca 6:426; Athenagoras, Leg. 10, Patrologia Graeca 6:907, 910; Theophilus, Autol. 2.22, Patrologia Graeca 6:1087; Origen, Princ. 5, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (Koetschau) 5: 10]. In other words, neither of the two Biblical poles indicating the mystery of Christ as Logos was forgotten. It was very difficult to find the formula to express both simultaneously; emphatic assertion of one seemed to exclude the other. The distinct character of the Logos-Son was presented by use of such examples; His divinity was not for that fact being questioned—at least according to the intent of the authors involved. It may be another question to ask whether there is objective compatibility between the assertion that the Word is not fully generated as Son until time begins and that He is nevertheless always God in the full sense. The way one understands what is meant by God will have much to do with determining the answer. It has been suggested that a philosophical theory of participation (the Logos being God by sharing in the Father's substance) and an intellectual attitude at once realist and acritical (permitting partial appropriation of the divine reality by the Word-Son) may have influenced men such as Origen and Tertullian respectively in the systematic replies they gave [B. Lonergan, De Deo Trino 1: Pars dogmatica (Rome 1964) 45–48, 54–62, 93]. One thing is sure: this era of Christian thought included efforts to achieve a limited understanding of the Biblical doctrine of the Logos as dependent on the Father. Involved was a willingness to use a non-Biblical distinction between immanent word in God's mind and Son or Logos arising fully with reference to creation. Nor is there any doubt that in the minds of those who so reasoned, this was compatible with asserting the transcendence-divinity of the Word.

Realization as Diversity of Perspective. Even in noting the definite continuity the postapostolic theology of the Logos has with the Biblical presentation, one sees that marked differences have appeared as well. The most obvious is this: a growing preoccupation with preexistence. This was definitely among the Biblical data, but there the reason for its introduction was the central, temporal function of the Word. It was almost as if to say that what the Logos incarnate does for man in time is only one part of the truth; that with the Father He has actually been preparing for this from all eternity. That prior state of existence becomes very much the center of attention as Christian reflection on the mystery increases. This was a logical development; it is perfectly understandable that in a culture very much concerned with the supertemporal, the pretemporal aspect of Christ would come sharply into focus.

To put this more concretely, the contrast between the relation of the Logos to the Father and that of other realities (τὰ πάντα) to the same Father became an object of direct concern. That such a contrast exists and is Biblical, there can be no doubt. How it is to be accurately expressed is something else. Sooner or later someone was bound to ask the question whether Jesus in His preexistent state was God or creature in the strict sense. If the first, then the Logos might seem to be no more than another name for the Father (MODALISM), and no real dependence of Jesus on the Father could antedate the Incarnation. Then, too, it would be the Father who suffered (PATRIPASSIANISM), or else merely the man Jesus, no more a son than the rest of His followers (ADOPTION-ISM). But if the second, then assertions that before His human birth He was as Logos equal to the Father would appear to be mistaken piety and in reality blasphemous. Such a mode of considering Jesus-Logos was expressed most explicitly and forcibly in the 4th century by ARIUS (see ARIANISM). One major difficulty was that he and his followers accepted the entire New Testament. This made it difficult for bishops such as Alexander and later St. ATHANASIUS to show them that asserting the creaturehood of the Logos was at variance with the apostolic faith.

Frustrated and not entirely happy with the alternative such circumstances forced them to accept, the Catholic bishops at the Council of NICAEA I introduced into the structure of a preexisting creed elements asserting the divinity of the Son. He is begotten and not made (in counterdistinction to the invisible beings proposed as made by the Father), originating from the latter's own being and not from something else or from nothing, consubstantial [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 125-26; cf. Ortiz de Urbina, El símbolo niceno (Madrid 1947) 25–61]. No one can deny that this dogmatic formulation deals with an aspect of the mystery of Jesus as Logos; nor can there be serious question that it views His preexistence in a new frame of reference. The assertions of the Creed of Nicaea I were made contingently in history because of the Arian challenge. They would, however, have been true of the Logos-Son in relation to the Father whether or not there was ever a world to create, sustain, redeem. This is a definitely new turn in the exposition of the Logos doctrine.

Nature of the Development in Question. The aim of the present study is not to discuss the nature of dogmatic development in general. Still, to ask what precisely took place in this transformation is hardly something indifferent in a consideration of Logos theology.

The first thing is that the progress from the Bible to Nicaea I cannot be reduced to one of deducing a conciliar conclusion from scriptural premises. That is not to say that any laws of deductive reasoning are violated; they are not. But the phenomenon in question was simply not an example of that sort of thought process. This should be clear from the fact that the assertion that would serve as conclusion (conciliar definition of consubstantiality) views Jesus as Son-Logos in a very different frame of reference than is the case with strictly Biblical premises. This would be very much like having four terms in a syllogism. To put it more concretely, the Bible sees Jesus as Logos related to the Father before time—His divinity appears there insofar as He is, in His activity, on the Father's side of the dichotomy between God and τὰ πάντα. In terms of creative function rather than strict metaphysical identity of nature, He is associated with the Father. To speak of a unity of being involving consubstantiality may very well be an equivalent way of stating this doctrine. It is not, however, to remain within the Biblical perspective or frame of reference, nor is it to come to a logical conclusion from two strictly Biblical premises. It is to see the compatibility of what is said about Jesus in relation to the Father in the scriptural exposition with that which the Council of Nicaea I asserts. The former is in terms of function regarding men and their salvation; the latter deals rather with being in a manner that more closely approximates the systematic and metaphysical.

Clearly a cultural transformation is involved as well. The Semitic becomes Hellenistic. Still the relation of the Logos to the Father was created by neither though variously expressed by each. It was presupposed by both and was there to be formulated in different but non-exclusive ways. The development in question implied more than a change from one culture to another. Consequently, the truth communicated by both will remain when they have left no more than traces of themselves in human history. When man in a religion based on a real divine revelation attempts to theologize, he makes use of the cultural instruments within his reach. What happened in this case was that a Greek culture served to express the answer to a question inspired by a Greek mentality about a revealed relation between Logos and Father. That there are abundant traces of the Hellenistic Weltanschauung in the reply should come as no surprise. One has only to recall that recourse to such a mode of thought and expression was had by the Church because a real question about the faith did not seem to be answerable otherwise at the time.

In comparing the doctrine of Jesus as Logos-Son in Bible and conciliar documents of the 4th and 5th centuries, it may serve a useful purpose to say that the same relation is viewed from two different perspectives. In the first the mode of presentation is concrete and historical; the other is systematic, abstracted from and contrasted to cosmic process, and much closer to what could be termed logical-metaphysical. This is by no means to imply that the transit from the first to the second was from the imperfect to the perfect. It is simply asserted that the transit was required at the time to make the Christian message concerning Jesus as Logos relevant, or so at least it seemed to the principals involved. That introduced theological considerations as well as articles of faith.

Nor is it in any way indicated that the prior mode may not in other circumstances be called for in doctrinal pronouncements. If many subsequent examples of the latter imitated the method introduced at Nicaea I (Enchiridion symbolorum 150, 250–51, 301–02, 426), no one can deny (prescinding from the question of definitions) that Vatican Council II in the first chapters of its constitutions on the sacred liturgy and Church treated of Christ as Son and Logos in a way far more akin to the Biblical than to that of these earlier Councils [Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 5, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 (1964) 99; Dogmatic Constitution on the Church 2–5, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 5–8].

Strictly Theological Consequences. The previous consideration involved a theology of the Logos that was formulated pari passu with a development of faith. There was, however, as well, a development of Logos-theology that did not find for itself a definitive approbation of the Church in a doctrinal pronouncement. It rather dealt with scriptural, patristic, and magisterial expressions of the faith and sought to unify them for the purpose of their assimilative understanding. This attempt characterized the Middle Ages in western Europe. It had its inspiration in Augustine's notion that man is the image of God insofar as he has in his psychological life created representations of the Trinitarian processions of knowledge and love (Trin. 12.6.6, 15.11.20; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 42:1001, 1072).

The doctrinal data concerning the Logos—His origin by way of generation; His reality as a relation opposed to paternity and passive SPIRATION; His personal character; His ability to be sent temporally into the world—seem often to be merely juxtaposed in the Scripture and magisterium. Medieval theologians made an effort to see these aspects of the mystery as one unified whole (cf. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 27-44). This involved a theologizing that started out with the hypothesis that something not altogether unlike the human process of knowing was found in the Trinity. In the light of it the data in question fell into an intelligible pattern. Thus, reflection on the faith concerning Christ as Logos led to the discovery of something with regard to theological method in general. In confrontation with the certainty of Christian faith, THEOLOGY has the function not merely of repeating old formulas (however true and authentically guaranteed) and of searching for new ones, but also to see the old and new as interrelated and forming one intelligible whole. This shows that theology at least under one of its aspects is a science far more like the natural ones than has often been suspected.

If contemporary theology has turned, like the magisterium itself in Vatican Council II, to a consideration of the Logos in SALVATION HISTORY, modern concerns have made themselves felt in the process. Distinct personal relations to the Logos, Spirit, and Father in the just are one [see P. de Letter, SJ, "The Theology of God's Self-Gift," Theological Studies 24 (1963) 402-22]. Another is the question of divine consciousness in the Word [see JESUS CHRIST (IN THEOLOGY) (SPECIAL QUESTIONS), 10]; this is closely connected with inquiry concerning the new aspect of perfection that the revelation of the Logos within the Godhead opens to man [B. Lonergan, SJ, De Deo Trino 2: Pars systematica (Rome 1964) 186-93, 208-15]. Finally, the question has been raised as to whether assuming that any Divine Person could have become man does full justice to the implications of the fact that only the Son-Logos did [K. Rahner, SJ, "Natur und Gnade," Fragen der Theologie Heute (Zurich, Cologne 1958) 218-19].

See Also: CONSUBSTANTIALITY; FILIATION; GENERATION OF THE WORD; JESUS CHRIST IN THEOLOGY; NICENE CREED; PROCESSIONS, TRINITARIAN; SON OF GOD; JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON; TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: C. Huber, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. Hofer and K. Rahner, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1125–28. J. Barbel, Christus Angelus (Bonn 1941). O. Cullman, Die Christologie des Neuen Testaments (Tübingen 1957), tr. S. C. Guthrie and C. A. M. Hall (rev. ed. Philadelphia 1963). A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, tr. J. S. Bowden (New York 1965). K. Rahner, "Chalkedon: Ende oder Anfang?," A. Grillmeier and H. Bacht, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 3:3–49. P. McShane, "The Hypothesis of Intelligible Emanations in God," Theological Studies 23 (1962) 545–68.

[C. J. PETER]

LÖHE, JOHANN KONRAD WILHELM

German Lutheran theologian; b. Fürth, Feb. 21, 1808; d. Neuendettelsau, both near Nuremberg, Bavaria, Jan. 2, 1872. After attending the Melanchthon Gymnasium in Nuremberg, he studied theology at the universities of Erlangen and Berlin. As pastor of several different congregations (1831-37), he became known as a forceful advocate of Lutheran orthodoxy. His ideas on Church government, the efficacy of works, self-denial, and celibacy closely resembled those of Roman Catholicism; so also did his suggestions for liturgical reform, private confession, and frequent communion, which he promoted by scholarly studies and pastoral work. Löhe also labored to provide religious care for German emigrants, particularly those going to the United States, and he was involved in the founding of the Lutheran Missouri Synod. His interest in practical works of charity led him to found a Society for inner mission (1844) and a Society of Deaconesses (1853). In 1854 he established a deaconess motherhouse in Neuendettelsau, where he served as pastor from 1837 until his death.

Bibliography: Gesammelte Werke, ed. K. GANZERT, 7 v. (Neuendettelsau 1951–58). S. HEBART, W. Löhes Lehre von der Kirche, ihrem Amt und Regiment (Neuendettelsau 1939); H. KRESSEL, Wilhelm Löhe als Prediger (Gütersloh 1929); Wilhelm Löhe als Liturg und Liturgiker (Neuendettelsau 1952); Wilhelm Löhe als Katechet und als Seelsorger (Neuendettelsau 1955). K. GANZERT, Evangelisches Kirchenlexicon: Kirchlich-theologisches Handwörterbuch, 4 v. (Göttingen 1956–61) 2:1151–1152.

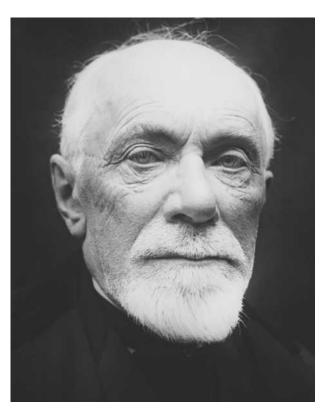

[L. J. SWIDLER]

LOHELIUS, JOHANN (LOCHEL)

Archbishop of Prague; b. Ohře (Eger), Bohemia, 1549; d. Prague, Nov. 2, 1622. He was educated at the abbey school of Tepl, received the Norbertine habit in 1573, and was ordained in 1576. Much of Lochel's early career was spent restoring the historic Premonstratensian Abbey of Strahov, from 1578 as prior, from 1586 as abbot. He colonized it with monks from other monasteries and rebuilt the church. In 1604 he was appointed auxiliary to Archbishop von Lamberg of Prague, succeeding him in the post in 1612. Lochel showed himself a resolute opponent of Calvinist encroachment, and was driven from his see at the time of the Defenestration (1618). With the imperial victory over the Protestant forces at White Mountain, Lochel was able to return to Prague in 1621. He died the following year.

Bibliography: J. SEIBT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1129. K. PICHERT, Analecta Praemonstratensia 3 (1927): 125–140, 264–283, 404–22.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

Alfred Loisy. (Corbis/Bettmann)

LOISY, ALFRED

Leading exponent of biblical MODERNISM; b. Ambrières, France, Feb. 28, 1857; d. Paris, June 6, 1940. After theological studies in the seminary at Châlonssur-Marne (1874-79) and ordination (June 29, 1879), he was sent to the Institut Catholique of Paris for higher studies (1881). Abbé L. DUCHESNE became his principal teacher. He remained there as professor of Hebrew and later of exegesis (1884-93) until he was dismissed, somewhat unfairly, because of a controversy over biblical inerrancy. The step seems to have been taken to save his rector embarrassment, and it initiated the bitterness Loisy afterward held toward Church authority. Five of his books were placed on the INDEX OF FORBIDDEN BOOKS (Dec. 19, 1903). With his excommunication as vitandus on March 8, 1908, he publicly gave up his Catholic faith and all Christianity, professing a vague "Religion of Humanity." He obtained a professorship of the history of religions in the Collège de France (1909–26) and the École des Hautes Études (1924–27). Active throughout his long life, he kept writing about "problems of religion" even after his jubilee (1927) and retirement. The high point of his career (1900–10) was followed by a period of gradual decline into oblivion. He never recanted his positions and died without being reconciled to the Church.

In his Choses Passées (1913) and Mémoires pour servir a l'Histoire religieuse de notre Temps, 1860-1931 (3 v. 1930-31), there is a wealth of information about the history of Modernism and autobiographical details that show the tortured variations of his thought, his difficulties of conscience, and his relationship with scholars and ecclesiastics of his time. He traced everything to a crisis of faith 29 years before his formal excommunication (1886): although practicing his priesthood, he was a complete atheist. He rejected all Christian dogmas in their traditional sense. His concept of God was that of a vague, indefinable Ego furnishing obscure solutions for the mystery of the universe. In these books are seen his independence of mind, his deep-rooted conviction of a lack of intellectual sincerity within the Catholic Church, and a deficiency in solid philosophical formation.

His most characteristic biblical writings concerned the Gospels. L'Évangile et l'Église (1902) was his first "little red book." In a critique of A. von HARNACK'S Essence of Christianity, he maintained that Christianity underwent a historical evolution that had not been foreseen by its Founder, Jesus Christ. His Quatrième Évangile (in which he maintained that the Apostle John is not the author and that everything is purely symbolic) was followed by Autour d'un petit Livre, the second "little red book" (both in 1903). The latter is a defense and exposition of the positions taken in the former. His third "little red book," Simples Reflexions sur le Décret du Saint-Office 'Lamentabili' et sur l'Encyclique 'Pacendi,' was an expression of insolence and defamation of the authorities in Rome, particularly Cardinal Merry del Val. This was followed by Les Évangiles Synoptiques (2 v. 1907–08), which contained some judicious remarks and radical criticism.

Bibliography: J. BONSIRVEN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1935–65) 5:530–544. O. SCHROEDER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1134. J. ROTH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1857–65) 4:445–446. S. LEBLANC, in Congrès d'histoire du christianisme: Jubilé de Alfred Loisy, ed. P. L. CHOUCHOUD, 3 v. (Paris 1928). J. LEVIE, Sous les yeux de l'incroyant (Paris 1946) 191–215. F. HEILER, Der Vater des katholischen Modernismus, Alfred Loisy (Munich 1947).

[L. A. BUSHINSKI]

LOLLARDS

Lollards is the name given to the English followers of John WYCLIF, the Oxford theologian and heretic who died in 1384. A derogatory term, it was meant to convey the attributes of a lollaerd (in Middle Dutch, a mumbler) and a loller (in Middle English, an idler). At first the sect was confined to a small group of educated priests, such as Nicholas HEREFORD, Philip REPINGTON, and John Aston, who had known Wyclif at Oxford and had been attracted by his radical views on lordship, grace, the Sacraments, and the temporal power of the papacy. In 1382, however, the Archbishop of Canterbury, William COUR-TENAY, moved swiftly and firmly to suppress the activities of these Oxford scholars, and in consequence the sect was soon deprived of its vigorous intellectual leaders, and passed into the hands of the more discontented and less literate elements of English society. Such poorly educated, unlicensed preachers as William Swinderby, who for one reason or another had failed to obtain a benefice, then formed the backbone of the movement. Many laymen, including burgesses, small freeholders, artisans, and tradesmen, were attracted by its nonconformist doctrines, and while it would be unrealistic to suppose that these gave much thought to Wyclif's theological ideas, many were seriously perturbed by the practical shortcomings and laxity of church dignitaries, religious corporations, mendicants, and secular clergy in their midst, not to mention the scandal that the contemporary WESTERN SCHISM gave to all the faithful. Thus from the first the movement provided a focal point for the more reactionary antipapal and anticlerical elements within the country, but it also included many sincerely religious people, however illinformed or self-opinionated. On the whole there were few Lollards among the nobility and lesser gentry, for two reasons: first, heresy was by then an offense in English common law, so that if indicted, the higher ranks of society stood to lose more; second, the Lollard belief that dominion or lordship should be exercised only by those in a state of grace appeared to the nobility as a threat to their feudal authority. The one notable exception in this class was the Lollard knight, Sir John Oldcastle, who was finally hanged as a traitor and heretic in 1417. Thus proscribed, discredited, and leaderless, the sect gradually disintegrated and after 1431 ceased to exist effectively. Being popular among semiliterate people, the movement had a literature of its own. Tracts and sermons echoing Wyclif's ideas in simple, forceful English passed rapidly and enthusiastically among Lollards throughout the country, although a more permanent achievement was the English translation of the Bible by Wyclif's followers, which became known as the Lollard Bible.

See Also: HUSSITES.

Bibliography: J. GAIRDNER, Lollardy and the Reformation in England, 4 v. (London 1908–13) 1:1–242. J. WYCLIF, Selected English Writings, ed. H. E. WINN (London 1929). M. DEANESLY, The Significance of the Lollard Bible (London 1951). K. B. MCFARLANE, John Wycliffe and the Beginnings of English Nonconformity (New York 1953). V. H. H. GREEN, The Later Plantagenets (London 1955) 191–209. M. E. ASTON, "Lollardy and Sedition, 1381–1431," Past and Present, 17 (1960) 1–44. J. A. F. THOMSON, The Later Lollards 1414–1520 (New York 1966). M. ASTON and R. COLIN, eds., Lollardy and the Gentry in the Later Middle Ages (Stroud, Eng. 1997). J.I. CATTO, "Wyclif and Wycliffism at Oxford 1356–1430," in The History of the University of Oxford, v. 2, ed. B. HARRISON (Oxford 1992) 175–261. M. ASTON, Lollards and Reformers: Images and Literacy in Late Medieval Religion (London 1984).

[L. MACFARLANE]

LOMBARD LEAGUE

A federation of north Italian cities formed in 1167 to resist the attempts of the Holy Roman Emperor FREDER-ICK I BARBAROSSA (1152–90) to organize and consolidate imperial rule in northern and central Italy. It was a defensive alliance of changing membership, and became active during the century and a half following its foundation whenever emperors attempted to enforce imperial rule in Italy. Although the League theoretically never claimed independence of the Empire, its very reason for existence was to defend communal autonomy against the emperor.

At the Diet of Roncaglia (November 1158), Barbarossa made it clear that the reconstruction of imperial administration and rule in Italy constituted a major part of his program for restoring the Empire, shattered by the IN-VESTITURE STRUGGLE. He undertook military operations against recalcitrant north Italian cities, the foremost among them being Milan. These cities created numerous coalitions to defend their de facto autonomy. One of the important confederations, the League of Verona (1164), comprised Verona, Vicenza, Padua, and Venice. Frederick's enemy, Pope ALEXANDER III (1159-81), sided with the allied cities. During the spring and summer of 1167, other alliances which included Cremona, until then a loyal imperial city, were concluded. Earlier historians called the League of Pontida (April 7, 1167) the origin of the Lombard League, but this was only one of many coalitions.

By Dec. 1, 1167, the Lombard League had taken shape. Its 16 members included the adherents of the leagues of Verona and Pontida. The signers protected their individual interests by special provisos, but all were bound to make war, truce, and peace only by unanimous consent. The League arrogated to itself such imperial prerogatives as the right to raise and support an army and to hear judicial cases on appeal. At League meetings each member acted through a rector, ordinarily chosen from among the chief communal magistrates. On Dec. 1, 1168, the League strengthened its organization and established regulations to prevent discord among its members.

In defiance of Frederick, the League founded a new city (1168) named Alessandria in honor of the pope. At Legnano (1176) the League army inflicted a crushing defeat on Frederick. This induced him to negotiate with Alexander III the Truce of Venice (1177), a six-year truce that included the League members. In 1183 at the "Peace of Constance" (technically an imperial privilege, not a "peace"), although Frederick reasserted some imperial prerogatives, the League and other allied communes won imperial recognition of their autonomy. The regulations of Roncaglia were set aside. The emperor ceded the communes considerable self-government, including authority to exercise regalian rights, raise armies, make alliances, and wall themselves. This concluded the League's greatest era, though it was revived (with fluctuating membership) whenever imperial rule threatened to become a reality in northern Italy. It actively opposed Emperor FREDERICK II (d. 1250) after 1226, and supported his papal opponents GREGORY IX and INNOCENT IV. The military fortunes of the League and its Guelf allies varied. Although defeated at Cortenuova (1237), they received solace from the victory at Vittoria (1248). The League was revived (1310-13) and joined a coalition against the Emperor HENRY VII.

Bibliography: G. VOIGT, Storia della lega Lombarda . . . (Milan 1848). C. VIGNATI, Storia diplomatica della lega Lombarda (Milan 1867). C. MANARESI, Atti del comune di Milano fino all'anno 1216 (Milan 1919). E. JORDAN, L'Allemagne et l'Italie aux XII^e et XIII ^e siècles (Paris 1939). G. TRECCANI DEGLI ALFIERI, ed., Storia di Milano, v.4, Dalle lotte contro il Barbarosa al primo signore (Milan 1954).

[W. M. BOWSKY]

LOMBARDS

A nation of Germanic barbarians who entered the Italian peninsula in 568. Their kingdom survived until 774, when it fell to Frankish conquest under CHARLE-MAGNE. The invading Lombards are thought to have been Arian Christians (although some may still have been heathen), but their settlement among a Catholic population, the influence of a series of Catholic queens (especially the Bavarian Theodolinda), and steady pressure from the papacy produced conversion to the Roman form of Catholicism by the mid-7th century.

Settlement. The Lombards entered the western Roman world at a time when the earlier barbarian invaders of the Empire had been settled on Roman soil for many years and had absorbed a considerable amount of Latin culture. In contrast with these other Germanic peoples, the warlike Lombards were uncouth and barbarous, and they impressed the peoples among whom they settled as well as those with whom they came into less intimate contact as being harsh and cruel—these descriptive terms appear frequently in contemporary records. Such charges, however, were undoubtedly exaggerated, due in no small part to political opposition from the papacy, fearful of Italian unification under Lombard rule. Most of the northern and central portions of Italy became part of the Lombard kingdom, but the conquest never extended into the extreme southern part of Italy. Even in the northern and central sections the Lombards did not succeed in establishing a consolidated state. It was not until late in the mid-8th century that the Exarchate of RAVENNA fell to Lombard conquest; some of the land in the vicinity of Rome—under the political control of the pope—was never secured by the Lombards, although they did hold the duchies of Spoleto and Benevento immediately to the east and south.

Iron Crown of the Lombards, now in the cathedral at Monza, Italy. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

The Lombard kingship was not a powerful institution, and shortly after the death of Alboin, who had led them into the peninsula, the Lombards failed to elect a king for some 12 years. During this interval effective leadership was in the hands of a series of dukes who furthered the conquest by carving out more or less independent duchies for themselves. The weakness of this decentralization soon became apparent, however, and after 584 the Lombards never allowed a regnal vacancy to be prolonged. It should be noted that the Lombard kingship remained elective to the end, although royal heirs were normally preferred.

The Kingdom. The story of the Lombard kingdom is told by the 8th-century Lombard historian, PAUL THE DEACON. Paul's history, together with a series of legal edicts and a number of land charters (dating primarily from the 8th century), provides considerable internal information about the Lombard kingdom; the LIBER PONTIFICALIS and the Frankish chroniclers are the chief external sources. The legal records are especially important: Rothair (636–656) attempted to codify the unwritten customs of the Lombard nation. Liutprand (712–744) issued a long series of supplements that, together with Rothair's Edict and a few additional laws issued by Grimwald, Rachis, and Aistulf, make up the body of laws usually known as the Leges Langobardorum. These leges reveal that the private law of the Lombards was still essentially Germanic, based on wergelds and COMPURGATION, but property law (and to a lesser extent public law) had been considerably influenced by Roman law.

Liutprand was the most important of the Lombard kings. As a Catholic Liutprand favored certain Romanizing influences in the kingdom; as a military leader he reconsolidated the Lombard conquests in Italy and extended them; and as one of the major barbarian rulers of Western Europe he maintained peace and friendship with the Franks and cooperated against the Moors who threatened Provence. During his reign the centralization of the kingdom reached its greatest extent and royal officials successfully counterbalanced the dukes whose interests were primarily local.

When Liutprand died in 744, the Lombard kingdom appeared to have been built into a consolidated whole with a sufficiently centralized administration to ensure its continuing success. Not only had Liutprand subdued the duchies of Spoleto and Benevento, where he installed his own followers, but he had also conquered most of the Exarchate of Ravenna and added its territory to his own. He had expanded the Lombard territory at the expense of the Church lands in the vicinity of the Duchy of Rome and even remained on friendly terms with CHARLES MARTEL and his son PEPIN, the Frankish mayors of the palace, to whom successive popes had appealed in vain for aid against 'the most wicked Lombards.''

Yet despite the successes of Liutprand and the seeming strength of the kingdom, and despite the fact that his successors Rachis, Aistulf, and DESIDERIUS were fairly able although not very diplomatic rulers, the Lombard kingdom did not long survive. The last Lombard kings proved unable to hold the kingdom together, and upon their final defeat by the Franks in 774, the Frankish ruler, Charlemagne, assumed the Lombard iron crown.

Italy was not incorporated into Francia, however, but remained organized as a separate subkingdom with its own CAROLINGIAN DYNASTY. Thus Lombard influence was preserved (through the continued use of Lombard custom supplemented by Carolingian CAPITULARIES), but the political vitality of the Lombards was gone, and with it any hope of bringing all of Italy under a single unified control.

Lombard King Rachis, depicted in an illumination in the Codex Matrittensis. (@Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Bibliography: PAULUS DIACONUS, History of the Langobards, tr. W. D. FOULKE (Philadelphia 1907). Leges Langobardorum, ed. F. BLUHME, Monumenta Germaniae Historica Leges v.4. Codice diplomatico Longobardo, ed. L. SCHIAPARELLI, 2 v. (Rome 1929–33). F. BEYERLE, ed. and tr., Die Gesetze der Langobarden (Weimar 1947). T. HODGKIN, Italy and Her Invaders, 8 v. in 9 (Oxford 1892–99) v.5–7. L. M. HARTMANN, Geschichte Italiens im Mittelalter, 4 v. (2d ed. Stuttgart 1923) v.2. N. F. ÅBERG, Die Goten und Langobarden in Italien (Uppsala 1923). G. ROMANO et al., Le dominazioni barbariche in Italia, 395–888 (3d ed. Milan 1940). G. PEPE, Il medio evo barbarico d'Italia (3d ed. Turin 1945). G. P. BOGNETTI, Santa Maria di Castelseprio (Milan 1948); G. P. BOGNETTI et al., Dall'invasione dei barbari al governo vescovile, 493–1002, v. 2 of Storia di Milano (Milan 1953-). E. PONTIERI, Le invasioni barbariche e l'Italia del V e VI secolo (Naples 1960).

[K. F. DREW]

LOMBERS, COUNCIL OF

Meeting in May or June 1165, in the French castle of Lombers, about ten miles south of Albi, France. Here, for the first time in Languedoc, the CATHARI, then called Bonshommes and later known as ALBIGENSES, were prosecuted for HERESY. Neither a colloquium nor a provincial council, the assembly was a trial conducted by authority of the bishop of ALBI, a suffragan of Bourges, with the bishops and abbots of neighboring Narbonne province, several great nobles, and the local populace in attendance. Assisted by four assessores, the bishop of Lodève examined the accused and found them heretical on seven counts. All present approved these findings, although their action did little to check the growth of the movement.

Bibliography: Sacrosancta Concilia, ed. P. LABBE and G. COSSART, 17 v. (Paris 1671–73) 10:1470–79, under the year 1176, original ed. of complete acta; Chronica magistri Rogeri de Houedene, ed. W. STUBBS, 4 v. (Rerum Brittanicarum medii aevi scriptores 51; 1868–71) 2:105–117, xvii–xxii, abr. version under the year 1176. C. DE VIC and J. VAISSETE, Histoire générale de Languedoc, ed. E. DULAURIER et al., 16 v. in 17 (new ed. Toulouse 1872–1904) 6:3–5 and esp. 7:1–5, n.l for place (not Lombez) and date. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 5:1006–10, for bibliog., otherwise unreliable. A. BORST, Die Katharer (Schriften der Monumenta Germaniae Historica 12; Stuttgart 1953) 95–96, with bibliog.

[R. KAY]

LOMÉNIE DE BRIENNE, ÉTIENNE CHARLES DE

French prelate, minister of Louis XVI; b. Paris, Oct. 9, 1727; d. Sens, Feb. 16, 1794. His family had included ministers of state since the time of Henry III. He studied at the college of Harcourt and at the Sorbonne, which he left in 1751 after sustaining theological theses of doubtful orthodoxy. He was ordained in 1752 and was preferred rapidly, becoming in 1760 bishop of Condom and in 1763 archbishop of Toulouse, where he was an able civil and religious administrator and a philanthropist. Besides the Brienne canal that connects the Garonne with the canal of the Midi, he sponsored other public works, education and libraries, and hygienic reforms. However, his faith came to be suspect at this time. As a friend of the philosophes and overly tolerant, he was reputed to be an atheist.

As president of the committee of jurisdiction of general assemblies of the clergy, he worked diligently and exerted a decisive influence, especially beginning in 1766 as part of the committee responsible for the ruinous reform of the religious orders. In 1780 he was replaced by the archbishop of Arles. Joseph II and Marie Antoinette failed to secure his appointment as minister in 1783, but in December of 1787 he replaced Calonne. A few good measures marked a mediocre ministry, and in August of 1788 he was succeeded by J. Necker. He was compensated with the archbishopric of Sens and the rich Abbeys of SAINT-OUEN and CORBIE. He went to Italy, was made cardinal in December of 1788, and returned to France at the end of 1789. He took the oath of loyalty to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy on Jan. 30, 1791, without ceremony, but not without raising a strong reaction. After being reproved by the pope, he resigned his cardinalate and was expelled by the college of cardinals on Sept. 26, 1791. He was then elected bishop of Yonne and passed the last two years of his life at the Abbey of Saint-Pierre-le-Vif. He was twice arrested during the French Revolution, resigned his ecclesiastical income and functions on Nov. 15, 1793, and died, perhaps of apoplexy, while being interrogated. Writers in his own day and since have attacked him with bitterness and contempt, but his clergy at Toulouse and at Sens were fond of him.

Bibliography: J. PERRIN, Le Cardinal de Loménie de Brienne (Sens 1896). M. MARION, Histoire financière de la France depuis 1715, 3 v. (Paris 1914–21). C. LAPLATTE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART, et al. (Paris 1912–) 10:693–698, bibliography.

[W. E. LANGLEY]

LONDON, ANCIENT SEE OF

Medieval English diocese with its seat at London; suffragan see of the Archdiocese of CANTERBURY. The earliest unequivocal sign of Christianity in London is the reference to Restitutus, Bishop of London, who attended the Council of ARLES in 314; the lists of his predecessors and successors given by GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH are worthless. Almost three centuries later, after the Roman withdrawal and the defeat of the Romano-Britons at the hands of the ANGLO-SAXONS, London was designated by Pope GREGORY ITHE GREAT as the see from which AUGUS-TINE OF CANTERBURY, as archbishop and metropolitan, was to govern the 12 dioceses of southern England just as YORK would govern 12 in the northern province, the primary alternating between York and London. Gregory's scheme, based on memories of Roman Britain, could not be put into effect because London was resolutely pagan in 597 and this Augustine settled on Canterbury as the primatial see. Only in 604 was he able to found the Diocese of London, appointing MELLITUS as its first bishop. Three years later King ETHELBERT of Kent built a cathedral there dedicated to St. PAUL. This see of "London and the East Saxons," however, proved fragile, for with the death of King Ethelbert, Bishop Mellitus and his disciples were driven out by the pagans (617). The see remained vacant until, in 654 (?), it was occupied by the dubious bishop Wini, and it was not until the time of Bishop ERCONWALD (c. 675–c. 693) that the diocese was organized on the dignified lines befitting the city of London. In the preconquest period London's bishops were mainly undistinguishing personages, except possibly for Robert of Jumieges. There has survived from this period a Rule of St. Paul's, which regulated the lives of the canons serving the cathedral and which was probably introduced by Bishop Theodred (926–c. 951). The rule affords a unique insight into the life of an old English cathedral community, disclosing a group of canons living together in chapter and choir, probably sharing a dormitory, yet having jobs to perform outside the cloister, and each enjoying a private stipend. DUNSTAN who was briefly bishop of London (958–960), is supposed to have restored the diocese's WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

In the century after the conquest of 1066, St. Paul's, the heart of the diocese, became very much a center of worldly business, its chapter of 30 prebendaries being regarded as a valuable recruiting ground for royal servants, sheriffs, judges, and curial bishops. Since many of the canons were married, family interests often outweighed pastoral considerations, especially throughout the long dominance by the Belmeis family. Nevertheless, by the middle of the 12th century the diocese was sensibly divided into the four archdeaconries of London, Middlesex, Essex, and Colchester. In many ways in this century the diocese was at the height of its fame, for the burning of the Saxon cathedral (1087) gave Bishop Maurice the opportunity to rebuild his cathedral on a magnificent scale: when completed in 1332 St. Paul's was the largest building in England, its immense spire stretching as loftily as that of Salisbury. It was at this time that the historian of London William FitzStephen (d. c. 1190) wrote: "It was once a metropolitan see, and will so again . . . if the citizens have their way.'' In an attempt to have their way the Londoners induced Arcoid, nephew of Bishop Gilbert the Universal (d. 1134), to write a new life of St. Erconwald, whose bones were then translated (1148) to a new and splendid shrine behind the high altar of St. Paul's. This glorification of its history gave some countenance to London's claim to metropolitan status, which was pressed as far as possible by Gilbert FOLIOT (1163–87) in his rivalry with the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas BECKET. But whatever chance of acceptance this claim might have had was effectively snuffed out by Becket's martyrdom.

For the rest of the medieval period the Diocese of London played a secondary role in the English Church. Its bishops were appointed for their administrative and secular skills rather than for outstanding churchmanship, e.g., RICHARD OF GRAVESEND, SIMON OF SUDBURY, William WARHAM, and Cuthbert TUNSTALL. Nor did it help the diocese that it was comparatively poor, being assessed at £1,000 per annum in the Taxatio of NICHOLAS IV (1291). Also, its benefices were particularly easy targets for pluralists and nonresidents, nonresidence being extremely frequent in St. Paul's, from the 12th century in. One exception to the spiritually mediocre bishops of the period was Roger Niger, bishop from 1229 to 1241, who was popularly canonized as "Saint Roger" because of his sanctity and defense of the oppressed. MATTHEW PARIS characterized him as "a man of venerable life and admirable holiness, distinguished for his learning, a brilliant preacher—joyful in speech, urbane in his home, of open and happy countenance." The cathedral later saw great days under the inspiration of its humanist dean John COLET (1466-1519). His efforts to reform the crown of canons, vergers, and chantry priests who had by this time a vested interest in the business conducted in and around St. Paul's were unsuccessful, but he did establish St. Paul's School in the east end of the church, where 153 boys were given free tuition. Up to the early 15th century St. Paul's had its own liturgical rite, the Usus S. Pauli, but after 1414 the SARUM rite prevailed.

Edmund BONNER, the last Roman Catholic bishop of London, died in prison in 1569 during the reign of Queen ELIZABETH I. Thereafter Roman Catholics in England relied on priests and sometimes an apostolic vicar appointed by the pope for their guidance. In 1688 Pope INNOCENT XI divided England into four vicariates, including that of London, which eventually acquired jurisdiction over all Catholics in the British possessions of North America and the West Indies. Bishop Richard CHALLONER was one of the memorable apostolic vicars of London, When Pope Pius IX restored the Roman Catholic hierarchy in England in 1850 the London vicariate became the Archdiocese of Westminster and the Diocese of Southwark; some of its area went to the Diocese of Brentwood.

Bibliography: W. S. SIMPSON, Registrum statutorium et consuetudinum ecclesiae cathedralis sancit Pauli Londinensis (London 1873). H. WHARTON, Historia de episcopis et decanis Londiniensibus (London 1695). E. BESANT, Medieval London, 2 v. in 3 (London 1906). W. D. NEWTON, Catholic London (London 1950). E. I. WATKIN, Roman Catholicism in England: From the Reformation to 1950 (New York 1957). W. R. MATTHEWS and W. M. ATKINS, eds., A History of St. Paul's Cathedral (London 1957).

[D. NICHOLL]

LONDON CHARTERHOUSE

A former Carthusian foundation formally established by Sir Walter Manny in 1370, the London charterhouse is on land near Smithfield and Aldersgate bought for a chapel and cemetery for victims of the Black Death. It is famous principally for its 18 monks who were martyred in 1535 for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, which recognized HENRY VIII as sole and supreme head of the Church in England. The first prior was John Luscote of Hinton, and the community first numbered ten. Knights and ecclesiastics endowed cells, and by 1532 there were 29 choir monks and 13 lay brothers, 20 of whom were under 38 years of age. They were an unusually distinguished, happy, and fervent community, with a reputation for the especially devout rendering of the Divine Office. They were rich by Carthusian standards, having a fine library and splendid ornaments in the church and an income of £643; notable benefactors were buried in the enclosure. St. Thomas MORE as a young man had lived there for four years as a guest. In 1533 the prior John HOUGHTON accepted the Act of Succession, but soon realized that the subsequent Act of Supremacy involved a denial of the Catholic faith. He prepared his community for the alternative of death or apostasy by a triduum of prayer and penance. The death sentence was passed on him and two other Carthusian priors, April 29, 1535, and in their habits they were dragged on hurdles to the scaffold at Tyburn and hung, drawn, and quartered there on May 4. Before its suppression in 1537, 15 other London Carthusians were martyred; their deaths constitute one of the finest episodes in English monastic history. In the reign of ELIZABETH I, Thomas Sutton refounded the London Charterhouse as an almshouse and school. In spite of extensive war damage during World War II, much still remains of the Tudor buildings, serving as the almshouse. Charterhouse school is now near Godalming in Surrey.

Bibliography: W. H. ST. JOHN HOPE, History of the London Charterhouse (New York 1925). E. M. THOMPSON, The Carthusian Order in England (New York 1930). M. CHAUNCY, Passion and Martyrdom of the Holy English Carthusian Fathers, tr. A. F. RAD-CLIFFE (New York 1936). D. KNOWLES and W. F. GRIMES, Charterhouse (New York 1954). A. QUICK, Charterhouse: A History of the School (London 1991).

[H. FARMER/EDS.]

LONERGAN, BERNARD

Theologian, university professor, author, member of the Society of Jesus; b. December 17,1904, Buckingham, Quebec (Canada); d. Pickering, Ontario, November 26, 1984. The eldest of three sons born to Gerald J., a land surveyor, and Josephine Helen (Wood) Lonergan, Bernard showed himself a precocious youngster. He was educated by the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS at the elementary level in his hometown, and later acquired a solid grounding in classical languages, the humanities, and mathematics at Loyola High and Loyola College in Montreal. He entered the Society of Jesus at age 17 (1922), received his philosophic training at Heythrop College in England (1926-29), and earned an external Bachelor of Arts in classics at London University (1929–30). By his own account, it was the basic honesty and modesty of his Jesuit professors in philosophy that made the greatest impact on him at the time. He was especially influenced by the genial instruction in mathematics he received from his tutor. Charles O'Hara, S.J., and seriousness with which Lewis Watt, S.J. approached questions about economics and morality in the social encyclicals. He confessed that NEW-MAN's An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent, "made (him) something of an existentialist' (Second Collection, 271). Letters of the period attest to Lonergan's fascination with methodology; and one can discern his budding interest in cognitional theory from the titles of three of his works from this period: Blandyke Papers: "The Form of Mathematical Inference" (1928); "The Syllogism" (1928); "True Judgment and Science" [on Newman's illative sense] (1929).

Early Career and Insight. After a three-year period teaching at Loyola College in Montreal, Lonergan attained a licentiate in theology at the Gregorian University in Rome (1937), where he had been ordained a priest in 1936. There he went on to do doctoral work on THOMAS AQUINAS's theory of grace and human freedom (1938–40), though he was not actually awarded the doctorate until after World War II (1946). The next 13 years were evenly split as professor of theology at Jesuit theologates in Montreal and Toronto. His intensive research on the thought of Aquinas gave rise to an impressive flow of publications in theological journals, principally of his reworked doctoral thesis, "St. Thomas's Thought on Gratia Operans," which appeared in installments in Theological Studies (1941–1942); and "The Concept of Verbum in the Writings of St. Thomas," in five parts in the same journal between 1946 and 1949.

During these years Lonergan labored to find in economics, sociology, and history the theoretic basis that might underpin a concrete realization of the conditions required to achieve the ends envisioned in the great social encyclicals of LEO XIII and PIUS XI. This work is documented in unpublished manuscripts, including the final version of an "Essay on Circulation Analysis" (c. 1943–44), a topic to which Lonergan returned in his later works.

In a series of courses taught during the late 1940s at the Thomas More Institute for Adult Education in Montreal (founded by his life-long friend and collaborator, R. Eric O'Connor, S.J.), Lonergan attempted to transpose what he had learned from Aquinas about human understanding and knowledge into the world of the twentieth century, addressing issues in mathematics and sciences undreamt of by St. Thomas. The result was Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (1957).

Method in Theology and Post-Method Interests.

In 1953 Lonergan had taken up duties as professor of dogmatic theology at the Gregorian University in Rome during which time he published several works in Latin related to his courses on Christology and the Trinity. He characterized them as products of teaching in a situation that "was hopelessly antiquated" (Second Collection, 212). These maps for the 650 students attending his lectures include De constitutione Christi ontologica et psychologica supplementum (1956), Divinarum personarum conceptionem analogicam (1957), De Verbo incarnato (1961, with later revisions), and De Deo trino (1964).

The main challenge to which Lonergan responded in his Roman years "came from the Geisteswissenschaften, from the problems of hermeneutics and critical history" (Second Collection, 277). His concern to take seriously the 19th-century emergence of scholarship and to think out the implications of human being as constituted by meaning in history is most explicitly documented in the notes from his exercitatio courses (graduate seminars devoted to specialized topics)—De intellectu et methodo, De systemate et historia, and De methodo theologiae—as well as in summer courses on topics such as mathematical logic, existentialism, philosophy of education, and method in theology.

After 12 years in Rome, he returned to Toronto to be treated for cancer in 1965. Following his recovery from the surgical removal of one of his lungs, his superiors at Regis College made it possible for him to complete his Method in Theology. The period after 1964–65 witnessed the reformulation of Insight's preoccupation with experience, direct understanding, and reflective understanding in terms of "intentionality analysis" (Method, ch. 1), blossoming into what Lonergon would at last affirm to be the primacy of the practical and existential level of human consciousness on which we evaluate, decide, act and love. This change supplements his sensibility for historical mindedness cultivated in Rome with new developments regarding the role of the dynamic unconscious, feelings, images and symbols, and religious experience.

The sweep of these developments permit Lonergan in Method to situate his intentionality analysis of the fourfold cognitional structure of attentiveness, intelligence, reasonableness, and responsibility into ever more concrete and complex contexts. Accordingly, Insight's chapter 18, in which "the good was the intelligent and the reasonable" (Second Collection, 277), shifts into the context of "The Human Good" (Method, ch. 2) with its elaboration of feelings as intentional responses to vital, social, cultural, religious, and personal values. Again, Insight's idea of meaning as "a relation between sign and signified (x)" gets plunged into "Meaning" (Method, ch. 3), with its types, elements, functions, realms, and stages. Similarly, Insight's account of mystery and myth and of God's existence and nature (ch. 19) are shifted into the context of "Religion" (Method, ch. 4) where "the question of God is considered more important than the precise manner in which an answer is formulated, and our basic awareness of God comes to us not through our arguments or choices but primarily through God's gift of . . . love" (Second Collection, 277).

Both on the way to Method and after its publication Lonergan published a series of essays and lectures clarifying, applying, drawing the implications of, and further working out the implications of the 1964–65 shift to the primacy of the practical and existential (Second Collection and Third Collection). In the academic year of 1971–72 Lonergan was the Stillman Professor at Harvard Divinity School in Cambridge, Mass., where he put the finishing touches on Method, which finally came out in 1972. From 1975 until 1983 he taught at Boston College, alternating each year between courses having to do with issues in Method and those devoted to the last great preoccupation of his productive years, economics and the dynamics of history.

Of his post-Method work most students of Lonergan would probably agree with Frederick E. Crowe, S.J., that the chief fruit is his ever sharper elucidation of the two complementary rhythms of human development with the healing vector moving from above downwards (i.e., of being-in-love with God [with love's eyes of faith], believing, evaluating, judging, understanding, experiencing); and the creative vector moving from below upwards (i.e., experiencing, understanding, reflecting, deliberating, believing, loving). Next in importance would probably be his analysis of the "pure cycle" of the rhythms of money circulation within and between economic factors producing things for producers (surplus circuit of capital formation) and those producing goods and services for consumers (basic circuit). This analysis lays bare the normative intelligibility of exigencies underlying people's free and moral accommodations to the antiegalitarian and egalitarian flows of money, goods, and services required by industrial exchange economies. Lonergan saw the intelligibility of the economy as dependent upon people's intelligence, reasonableness, responsibility—and so convertedness—in a way unsuspected by and unaccounted for by either Marxist or "supply-side/ demand-side" conventions in economic theory.

Achievement. The Christian faith is now undergoing a hermeneutical crisis diagnosed by Lonergan as rooted in Christianity's inability to make the transition to modern society and culture. As a Roman Catholic theologian he was critical of the failure of Catholic philosophy and theology to pass from the fixist norms espoused by a mentality he named "classicist" towards a transcultural normativity compatible with historical consciousness. To be sure, he was no less critical of the historicist or positivist drift towards relativism on the part of those who more or less renounced any kind of normativity along with the heritage of scholasticism. Lonergan's life was dedicated chiefly to helping Christian theology meet this hermeneutical crisis and make the transition to modernity without losing its integrity.

Both Lonergan's execution of this task and the results of his work are profoundly and uniquely hermeneutical, especially in the way his lifework pivots on his nuanced historical relationship to the paradigm-figure of the Middle Ages, Thomas Aquinas. He concluded that "in the practice of Aquinas (theology) was . . . the principle for the molding and the transformation of a culture." The lesson Lonergan learned from St. Thomas' practice was that besides "reflecting on revelation" by "investigating, ordering, expounding, communicating divine revelation," theology "has somehow to mediate God's meaning into the whole of human affairs" (Second Collection, 62).

One thing that makes the meaning of "method" for Lonergan so profound and so unprecedented, therefore, is the manner in which his project of method flows out of the way he paid attention to, understood, judged, and appreciated the practice of Aquinas as a theologian. As he insisted in Method, such "encounter is the one way in which self-understanding and horizon can be put to the test" (247). Whereas ordinary ideas about method tend to be technical in the Enlightenment vein of DESCARTES or BACON, and so are focussed on "a set of verbal propositions enunciating rules to be followed in a scientific investigation" (Second Collection, 64), Lonergan placed method in the context of Aquinas's dictum that "it is characteristic of the wise person to bring about order in all things." By reconceiving the Thomist viewpoint of highest wisdom in terms of the phenomenological notion of horizon, Lonergan makes method in the most serious sense a matter of at once utmost radicality and complete concreteness. To do method for Lonergan comes down to appropriating and articulating the grounds of theological (and any) practice in one's own total and basic horizon.

Hence, on account of his engagement with the thought of Aquinas, method in its plainer but quite important sense of "distinguishing different tasks, and thereby eliminating totalitarian ambitions" (Second Collection, 212) was realized by Lonergan to be anchored in the human subject's appropriation of method as 'transcendental'—i.e., the thematization of our own ultimate (and so transcultural) set of operations of experiencing, understanding, reflecting, deliberating, deciding, and loving. Thus, at root, "method" means 1) appropriating the structures of one's own conscious intentionality that specify our horizon as total and basic; and 2) consciously living in accord with one's horizon by following the transcendental precepts: Be attentive. Be intelligent. Be reasonable. Be responsible. Be loving.

The cognitive dimension of consciousness became most clear to Lonergan while writing the Verbum articles, especially the implications of the dependency of that dimension of consciousness upon the practical and existential levels. Deliberation, decision, and loving action presuppose and complement knowing, but the way knowing presupposes and complements those operations is even more crucial. Lonergan was increasingly able to express in terms of the notion of intentionality the metaphysical explanation of human freedom and divine grace that he had earlier retrieved in the 1930s and 1940s from St. Thomas.

In Insight Lonergan had tended to equate the breakthrough to the total and basic horizon with the appropriation of rational consciousness in one's affirmation of oneself as a knower (ch. 11) (fourth-level rational self—consciousness takes center-stage only at ch. 18); with one's clear recognition that knowing is a compound dynamic structure of experiencing, understanding, and judging; and especially with one's ability 'to discriminate with ease and from personal conviction between one's purely intellectual activities and the manifold of other 'existential' concerns that invade and mix and blend with the operations of intellect to render it ambivalent and its pronouncements ambiguous" (intro., xix). Already in his lectures on "Intelligence and Reality" (1950-51) he had indicated that the key to Insight's breakthrough was "radical intellectual CONVERSION" (27) because it involved a revolution in oneself and a purification of oneself from what he there calls "inhibiting and reinforcing (i.e., reductively utilitarian) desires' (19) in order to liberate the pure, disinterested, and unrestricted desire to know being, and to make this desire normative in one's actual living. By the time of writing Method, however, what was implicit before was fully explicated: on account of the primacy of the practical and existential levels of conscious intentionality intellectual conversion (as uncovery of one's horizon as total and basic) presupposes both moral conversion (from one's spontaneous likes to the truly good or right) and religious conversion (from stupid self-centeredness to being-in-love with God).

But, as was already altogether clear in Grace and Freedom, religious conversion is the result of the gift of God's self-communication, beyond the horizon of finite human knowing and choosing. God's Spirit and Word are sent to make moral and intellectual conversion possible. Those conversions in turn demand the exercise of our liberty by which we reorient ourselves and bring the horizon of our day-to-day living into ever closer attunement with the infinite potentiality of our total and basic horizon. Openness as Gift heals us to transform our sinful closedness and elevates us to the factual, healing and creative openness of divine adoption.

Bibliography: The Lonergan Research Institute, Toronto, has a complete archive of Lonergan's works. The Collected Works of Bernard Lonergan is being published by the Lonergan Research Institute and the University of Toronto Press. B. LONERGAN. "Insight Revisited." In Second Collection (London 1974). P. BYRNE. "The Fabric of Lonergan's Thought." Lonergan Workshop 6 (Atlanta 1986). F. E. CROWE, Lonergan (Collegeville, Minn. 1992). J. FLANA-GAN. Quest for Self-Knowledge: An Essay in Lonergan's Philosophy (Toronto 1997). V. GREGSON. The Desires of the Human Heart: An Introduction to the Theology of Bernard Lonergan (New York 1988). R. LIDDY. Transforming Light: Intellectual Conversion in the Early Lonergan (Collegeville, Minn. 1993).

[F. G. LAWRENCE]

LONG-SUFFERING

Long-suffering, a moral virtue that perfects the irascible appetite so that one is able to continue in good action over an extended period of time in spite of difficulties arising from external obstacles. It is also called constancy. Long-suffering is very similar to the virtue of PERSEVERANCE; it differs, however, by reason of the difficulties that must be sustained. Perseverance strengthens the appetite against the difficulty that exists simply because a course of action must be continued for a prolonged period; constancy is concerned with withstanding the hardships that may come from external causes when virtuous action is extended over a period of time.

St. Peter attributed long-suffering to God: "The Lord does not delay in his promises, but for your sake is long-suffering, not wishing that any should perish, but that all should turn to repentance" (2 Pt 3.9). The human virtue imitates its divine model by a willingness to endure the sufferings imposed from external impediments to the Christian life such as bad example and the onslaught of special temptations from the world. The vices of inconstancy and pertinacity are opposed to the virtue of longsuffering. Inconstancy is the vice of those who are unwilling to endure the tedium of prolonged action in the face of obstacles. They are "soft" and easily abandon the pursuit of virtue in the face of exterior difficulties, such as the jibes of others. Pertinacity is the vice of those who refuse to desist from some course of action even after persistence has become unreasonable. Pertinacity is usually found in self-opinionated and stubborn people who, because of vanity, refuse to abandon a position once they have assumed it.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae. 137.3. A. ROYO, The Theology of Christian Perfection, tr. and ed. J. AUMANN (Dubuque 1962).

[R. DOHERTY]

LONGLAND, JOHN

Bishop of Lincoln; b. Henley-on-Thames, Oxfordshire, 1473; d. Woburn, May 7, 1547. Educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, he was ordained in April of 1500. He became principal of Magdalen Hall (1505), and in 1511 earned the doctorate of divinity. His first major ecclesiastical appointment came in 1514 when he was appointed dean of Salisbury and confessor to HENRY VIII. In 1521 Henry appointed Longland Lord Almoner, and in May of the same year he was elevated to the bishopric of Lincoln. As bishop he continued to exercise severe repressive measures against the LOLLARDS and other heretical groups in his diocese. Cardinal Thomas WOLSEY, however, prevailed upon him to support Henry VIII's divorce proceedings. In 1533 Bishop Longland sat as an assistant judge in the divorce hearings at Dunstable Priory, with Thomas Cranmer, whom less than two months previously he had consecrated archbishop of Canterbury. Longland's stand on the divorce question and his support of the royal supremacy made him one of the principal targets, after Cranmer himself, of the rebellions that arose shortly, and that had their center in his diocese (See ASKE, ROBERT; PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE). Later in life he repented ever having taken part in the king's divorce question.

His sermons, though marked with "rhetorical repetitions" and "prolixity" were powerful and justly famed. ERASMUS dedicated several treatises to Longland; Thomas MORE referred to him as a "second Colet." A Benedictional was written for his use and printed in London in 1528 by Richard Pynson; extant copies are at Lambeth and the British Museum. It is edited by R. M. Wooley, The Benedictional of John Longlande, Bishop of Lincoln (London 1927). Longland's published works include Tres conciones; Quinque sermones; printed by Pynson (London c. 1527); Expositiones concionales, on the Penitential Psalms; and a Good Friday Sermon, spoken before Henry VIII at Greenwich and printed by Thomas Petyt (London c. 1536).

Bibliography: A. H. THOMPSON, ed., Visitations in the Diocese of Lincoln, 1517–1531, 3 v. (Lincoln Record Society Publications 33, 35, 37; Hereford 1940–47) v. 2–3. P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. in 1 (5th rev. ed. New York 1963). J. H. LUPTON, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 12:120–121.

[J. G. DWYER]

LONGO, BARTOLO, BL.

Also known as the "Man of Mary" and "Brother Rosario," Dominican tertiary, founder of the Shrine of Our Lady of Pompeii, and of the Daughters of Saint Rosario of Pompeii; b. Feb. 11, 1841, Latiano, Apulia, southern Italy; d. Oct. 5, 1926, Pompeii, Italy.

Son of a prosperous physician named Bartolomeo Longo and his wife, Antonietta Luparelli, Bartolo Longo received a good education from the Piarists at Francavilla Fontana and Lecce, then studied law at the University of Naples, where he received his degree in 1864. During his university years, Bartolo was influenced by the anticlericalism of the time and involved himself in popular occult spiritism. After a severe depression, Dominican Father Alberto Radente led him to conversion on May 29, 1865. Thereafter he devoted himself to charitable works. Bartolo became a Dominican Tertiary with the name Brother Rosario March 25, 1871.

In 1872, Longo went to Pompeii valley on business for the Countess Marianna Farnararo de Fusco (Feb. 9, 1924), whom he married in 1885. Observing the despair and lack of faith in the region and recalling Father Alber-to's devotion to the rosary, Bartolo decided to encourage it there, while continuing his works of mercy and teaching the catechism. With much difficulty he established a Confraternity of the Holy Rosary and sought to build a shrine of the Blessed Mother. After several unsuccessful attempts to raise funds, he took up Bishop Formisano of Nola's suggestion to collect a "soldo" (penny) a month from each of 300 donors. The cornerstone was laid in 1876. Fortuna Agrelli provided a major contribution after her miraculous healing in 1884, which led to the consecration of the Shrine of Our Lady of the Rosary May 7, 1891. Pope Pius X raised it to the status of a pontifical basilica in 1894. About 1900, Bartolo was falsely accused of financial mismanagement, but he was later cleared of the charge.

Longo promoted a unique "Rosary of the Fifteen Saturdays" and 54-day Novena Rosary of Our Lady of Pompeii. He also advocated the definition of the Assumption of Mary as dogma and founded the Dominican Daughters of Saint Rosario. He and his wife built an orphanage for girls in 1887, hospices for the children of prisoners in 1892 and 1922, a typesetting workshop and printing press to publish pamphlets, a hospital, music school, and two houses for Dominican tertiaries near the shrine. Other charities have grown up in the "City of Mary" around the shrine where hundreds of miraculous cures are alleged to have occurred. Before his death, Bartolo also wrote The Fifteen Saturdays, Petition (1883), and began the magazine The Rosary and the New Pompeii (founded 1884). His mortal remains now rest in the basilica of Pompeii under the throne of Our Lady's shrine (1983).

He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 26, Feast: Oct. 6 (Dominicans).

Bibliography: Bartolo Longo e il suo tempo: atti del convegno storico promosso dalla Delegazione pontificia per il Santuario di Pompei sotto l'alto patronato del Presidente della Repubblica, ed. F. VOLPE. M. J. DORCY, Saint Dominic's Family (Dubuque, Iowa 1964), 580–83. P. M. FRASCONI, Don Barolo Longo (Alba 1941). A. ILLIBATO, L'archivio Bartolo Longo: guidainventario (Naples 1986). I. LÜTHOLD-MINDER, Die Rosenkranzkönigin von Pompei und ihr Advokat Bartolo Longo (Hauteville, Switz. 1981). N. TAMBURRO, Bartolo Longo, pioniere di civiltà: nel centenario di Pompei (2nd ed. Pompei 1975). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1981) 529–32. L'Osservatore Romano (English edition) 44 (1980) 10–11.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LOOR, ISIDORE OF SAINT JOSEPH DE, BL.

Passionist priest; b. April 18, 1881, Vrasene, eastern Flanders, the Netherlands; d. Oct. 6, 1916, Kortrijk

(Courtrai) Monastery, Belgium. As the eldest of three children of subsistence farmers, Isidore received six years of elementary education at the local school. At the suggestion of a Passionist missionary, Isidore joined the PASSIONISTS at Ere, Belgium (April 7, 1907) and became brother Isidore of Saint Joseph. After his religious profession in 1908, he served the community as cook, gardener, custodian of the preparatory school, and later (1914) as porter. Intense penitential prayer helped Brother Isidore to cope with several crises: cancer that required the removal of his right eye (1911); the conversion of the monastery into a German military hospital and its abandonment by all but five brothers and three priests during World War I; and the metastasis of cancer to his intestines (1916). This simple, diligent "Brother of the Will of God" suffered his final illness with great fortitude. He was buried next to the Passionist Church, where those remembering him came to pray for his intercession and received his help. The official process for his beatification was opened in 1950, leading to his beatification by Pope John Paul II on Sept. 30, 1984.

Bibliography: Isidore of St. Joseph (Kortrijk 1960). M. CLAYES, The Life of Brother Isidore de Loor (Chicago 1976). H. GIELEN, Het diepste lied zingt binnenin: de zalige broeder Isidoor de Loor (Tielt, Netherlands 1984). C. VAN HEMELEN, Blessed Isidore de Loor, Passionist (Dublin 1984). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 78 (1986): 965–968. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 44 (1984): 6–7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LOOS, CORNELIUS

Theologian; b. Gouda, c. 1546; d. Brussels, Feb. 3, 1595. Loos (Callidius) studied at Louvain, received Holy Orders, and became professor of theology at Mainz, where he had an active literary career, upholding the Catholic cause and denouncing the rebellion in the Low Countries. He also wrote Illustrium Germaniae scriptorum catalogus (Mainz 1581), a collection of literary biographies. After becoming a professor at Trier, he came under attack for denouncing the burning of witches, and upon the instigation of the nuncio, Ottavio M. Frangipani, he was imprisoned and on March 15, 1592 compelled to recant. He left Trier for Brussels, where he served briefly as a pastor, but again he spoke out against the witchcraft delusion and was twice imprisoned. He died before his third trial. His work on this topic, De vera et falsa magia, was printed in Cologne, but the authorities prohibited its publication. His political writings were De tumultuosa Belgarum rebellione sedanda . . . (1579) and Apologia in orationem Philippi de Marnix pro Archiduce Austriae Matthia (1579).

Bibliography: É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.2:930–933. F. ZOEPFL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1139–1140. Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, (Leipzig 1875–1910; Berlin 1953–) 19:168–169.

[C. G. NAUERT, JR.]

LÓPEZ, LUDOVICO

Dominican moral and pastoral theologian; place and date of birth unknown; d. Spain, Sept. 27, 1595. He received the Dominican habit and was professed at Atocha, Madrid. Lopez taught theology for many years in Spain and then in the Province of St. Antoninus, Colombia. The encomenderos (plantation owners) persecuted him for championing the rights of the Indians. Apparently he died in Spain while pleading their cause at the court. His principle works are: Tractatus de contractibus et negotiationibus sive Instructorium negotiantium (1592) and Instructorium conscientiae (1585).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.1:316. M. D. CHENU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:934.

[R. J. POWERS]

LÓPEZ DE MENDOZA GRAJALES, FRANCISCO

Founder of the first permanent mission in the United States; b. Jerez de la Frontera, Spain, date unknown; d. place and date unknown. He accompanied the expedition of Pedro Menéndez de Avilés, which sailed from Cádiz for Florida on June 29, 1565. On Friday, Aug. 10, 1565, the expedition reached Puerto Rico, where López was offered, but refused, a chaplaincy. Menéndez's fleet reached St. Augustine on the Florida coast on Sept. 8, 1565. After military ceremonies accompanying the landing, solemn Mass was chanted in honor of the Blessed Virgin on the feast of her nativity; the site is marked on the grounds of the Mission of Nombre de Dios, St. Augustine. In 1565 López accompanied a group sent by Menéndez to start a colony at Santa Lucia, on the east coast of Florida. The party was attacked by natives, nearly died of starvation, and was driven back by storms when it attempted to reach Havana, Cuba. Eventually, the expedition was rescued by Menéndez. In 1566 new colonists, including five priests, arrived at St. Augustine. From this date López acted as pastor of the first white settlement in the United States. In a letter to the king of Spain, written on Aug. 6, 1567, López designated himself "vicar of Florida' and "chaplain and vicar." In the same letter he spoke of a slight illness that troubled him. It is not known how long he remained in St. Augustine after this.

Bibliography: F. LÓPEZ DE MENDOZA GRAJALES, "Memoria" in E. RUIDIAZ Y CARAVIA, La Florida: Su conquista y colonización por Pedro Menéndez de Avilés, 2 v. (Madrid 1893) 2:431–465.

[J. P. HURLEY]

LÓPEZ Y VICUÑA, VICENTA MARÍA, BL.

Foundress of the Daughters of Mary Immaculate for Domestic Service; b. Cascante (Navarra), Spain, March 22, 1847; d. Madrid, Dec. 26, 1890. Vicenta was reared by her pious, middle-class parents until 1854, when she was sent to Madrid for schooling. She lived there with her aunt, Eulalia de Vicuña, who conducted a hospice for young, unemployed servant girls. This charitable work so attracted Vicenta, that she took a private vow of chastity (1866) and dedicated herself to the welfare of working girls, despite her parents' urging that she marry or join the Visitation Nuns. Together with her aunt and a few others, she lived a communal life (1871-76). Under the guidance of Father Hidalgo y Soba, she drew up a constitution that was approved by the auxiliary bishop of Toledo, Sancha y Hervas (July 1876). With three others, Vicenta pronounced her vows in August of 1878. The work of the congregation was to conduct hospices for working girls and to teach domestic arts. Despite early financial difficulties and the foundress's poor health, the institute flourished in Spain and soon spread to Europe and Latin America. The Holy See gave its approval in 1888. By 1961 the Daughters had more than 2,000 members and 81 houses. Vicenta was beatified on Feb. 19, 1950.

Feast: Dec. 26.

Bibliography: E. FEDERICI, La Beata Vicenta María Lopez y Vicuña (Rome 1950). C. TESTORE, La Beata Vicenta María Lopez y Vicuña (Isola del Liri 1950). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 12:709–712.

[I. BASTARRIKA]

LORAS, JEAN MATHIAS PIERRE

Missionary and educator, first bishop of DUBUQUE, Iowa; b. Lyons, France, Aug. 30, 1792; d. Dubuque, Feb. 19, 1858. He was the tenth of eleven children of Jean Matthias and Étiennette (Michalet) Loras. His father, one of the councilors of Lyons during the unsuccessful Girondist revolt against Jacobin Paris at the height of the French Revolution, was guillotined on Nov. 3, 1793. Although 16 other relatives also died during the Reign of Terror, the widow Loras continued to shelter fugitive priests and to reject the extremes of the French Revolution.

Early Career. In 1799 Jean Mathias, in the company of his brother-in-law, was received in audience by PIUS VI, in exile in Valence. With his brother Jacques, he enrolled (1803) in the presbytery school of Rev. Charles Balley at Ecully, where he formed a lifelong friendship with his schoolmate (St.) John B. VIANNEY. As a student at St. Irenaeus Seminary, Lyons, he was associated with two future archbishops of Baltimore, Md., Ambrose Maréchal, professor of dogmatic theology, and James Whitfield, an Englishman and fellow student. Although ordained for the Archdiocese of Lyons on Nov. 12, 1815, he continued on at the minor seminary at Meximieux, to which he had been sent as instructor the previous year, and became superior in 1817. In 1824 he was appointed superior of the larger minor seminary at L'Argentière, but he resigned three years later to work as a home missioner in the Lyons archdiocese. When Bishop Michael Portier of Mobile, Ala., returned to his native Lyons in 1828 in search of clergy and funds, Loras decided to volunteer for service in America. He sailed from Le Havre on Nov. 1, 1829, and for seven years worked in Alabama as pastor of the cathedral in Mobile, vicar-general of the diocese, and superior of the newly founded (1830) Spring Hill

Bishop of Dubuque. Loras, chosen first bishop of the newly created see at Dubuque, was consecrated on Dec. 10, 1837, by Portier in the cathedral at Mobile. The new bishop did not arrive in Dubuque until April 18, 1839, having spent the intervening months in Europe in search of clergy and funds. Almost immediately he began his long series of missionary voyages among whites and natives living in the isolated outposts of his vast diocese, and in the area east of the Mississippi River provisionally in his charge. During these years, his closest friends were Bishop Joseph ROSATI of St. Louis, Mo.; Joseph CRÉTIN, a former pupil of his at Meximieux, who served as vicargeneral of Dubuque and whom Loras nominated as first bishop of St. Paul, Minn.; and the missionary Samuel MAZZUCHELLI, OP, who had come to Dubuque in 1835 and continued to work in the diocese after the arrival of Loras.

When government resettlement of Native Americans outside of Iowa ruined what had at first been a fruitful mission field, particularly among the Winnebagoes at Fort Atkinson, and French Canadian immigration virtually ceased, Loras conceived a plan to people Iowa with Irish and German Catholic settlers. As early as 1841 he sent Judge Charles Corkery and two other Dubuque laymen to establish contacts with Irish immigrants in the East. Although acute tension between the preponderantly French clergy and the Irish laity marked the years from 1843 to 1845, Loras finally succeeded in recruiting Irish missionaries, and the crisis passed. To further assuage the Irish grievance, Loras in 1853 initiated plans to have Clement Smyth, the prior of the Irish Trappists whom he had induced to settle at New Melleray near Dubuque in 1849, chosen as his successor. Smyth was consecrated coadjutor with right of succession on May 3, 1857.

With generous grants from mission societies in Lyons, Vienna, and Munich, Loras was able to build numerous mission churches and, with unusual foresight, to buy parcels of land for future parishes. As early as 1839, despite a chronic shortage of priests, he had organized a diocesan college with a view to training a native clergy and shortly afterward, a cathedral boys' school, which was matched in 1843 with a cathedral girls' school, staffed by the newly arrived Sisters of Charity of the Blessed Virgin Mary. During 1850 and 1851 he directed the building of Mt. St. Bernard Seminary south of Dubuque.

Although he retained great affection for his native Lyons, to which he paid a final visit during a trip to Europe in 1848 and 1850, Loras nevertheless stoutly rejected the offer of a French bishopric and developed through the years a genuine love and understanding for the United States. His gracious manners and accent were always those of a Frenchman, but his breadth of view and directness reflected the influence of the American frontier. He is buried in the crypt of the cathedral in which he had offered the first Mass on Christmas Day 1857, when his final illness was already upon him.

Bibliography: M. M. HOFFMANN, Church Founders of the Northwest: Loras and Cretin, and Other Captains of Christ (Milwaukee 1937); "The Roman Catholic Church in Iowa," Palimpsest 34 (Aug. 1953): 337–400.

[W. E. WILKIE]

LORD, DANIEL ALOYSIUS

Teacher, author, editor, composer, playwright, and propagator of the Sodality movement, chiefly among youth; b. Chicago, Ill., April 23, 1888; d. St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 15, 1955. He was one of two sons of George Douglas Lord and Iva Jane (Langdon) Lord. He attended De La Salle parochial school, St. Ignatius High School, and St. Ignatius College, Chicago. In 1909 he entered the Society of Jesus at Florissant, Mo., and he was ordained on June 24, 1923. It is impossible to categorize Lord's talents and work, but certainly it can be said that his superb gift for teaching characterized all his achievements. It is evident in most of his writings: 30 books, almost 300 pamphlets, 66 booklets, 50 plays, 12 musicals, 6 pageants, his syndicated column "Along the Way," and the 900 transcripts he prepared for radio presentation. In his years as editor of the Queen's Work (1925–48), that magazine never failed to face current social issues. He taught at St. Louis University and its corporate high school from 1917 to 1920, working mostly in the English departments; he also co-founded, administered, and taught in the university's department of education.

As time went on, Lord often won praise from experts in the theater and music fields. The Social Action Follies (1937) and Matrimonial Follies (1939), like his other pageants, employed casts of as many as 1,000 and were viewed by audiences of 17,000 at a time. With his unique combination of talents, it was not surprising that Lord was frequently called on for technical advice by movie producers, among them Cecil B. DeMille. He was coauthor of the original Motion Picture Code, and his ability to get young people to act on their objections to crudity and immorality on the screen had at least an indirect influence on the establishment and success of the National Legion of Decency.

Lord's preeminent accomplishment was the revival of the moribund Sodality movement. He presented the Sodality, not as just another devotional practice, but as a challenge and a way of life wherein one uses every means to bring oneself and one's neighbor to God. He had assisted Edward GARESCHÉ, SJ, in establishing the Sodality magazine, the Queen's Work, in 1913. Beginning in 1925, when he himself became editor and national Sodality director, he toured the United States, seeking, as he put it, to make the Sodality the laboratory of the religion class. In the summer of 1928 he organized the first national Leadership School and in 1931, the first Summer School of Catholic Action (SSCA) on a national scale. By the end of 1963, some 190 sessions of the SSCA had been held in all sections of the country, with just under 300,000 participants. In 1948 Lord was cited by PIUS XII for his successful Sodality work. In 1943, still another demand was made on his time and talents, when he was made director of the Institute of Social Order of the Society of Jesus. His article "Cancer Is My Friend" was his characteristic reaction to news of his impending death.

Bibliography: D. A. LORD, Played by Ear (Chicago 1956). J. T. MCGLOIN, Backstage Missionary (New York 1958). M. FLORENCE, The Sodality Movement in the United States: 1926–36 (St. Louis 1939). W. B. FAHERTY, "A Half-Century with the Queen's Work," Woodstock Letters 92 (1963): 99–114.

[J. T. MCGLOIN]

LORD, THE

There are many important connotations of the name "the Lord" applied to God in both the Old Testament and the New Testament.

In the Old Testament. The term 'ādôn, a common Hebrew word parallel to ba'al (see BAAL) and signifying lord or master, is often used of persons having some kind of superiority, e.g., a king (1 Sm 24.11), a husband (Gn 18.12), or a tribal patriarch (Gn 24.10), sometimes as a polite form of address (2 Sm 1.10), but most importantly for this article as a divine epithet. In Israelite tradition there are two distinct usages, namely, as one of God's honorific titles and as a substitute for God's sacred proper name YAHWEH.

As an Honorific Title for God. The word 'ādôn entered into many theophoric names, e.g., Adonisedec and Adoniram (Jos 10.3; 1 Kgs 4.6), but was not used as a proper name of Israel's God, Yahweh. As a divine epithet it expressed the sovereign power and dominion of God and was often used with the definite article to mean the ultimate Lord [Ex 23.17; 34.23; Is 1.24; Mal 3.1; Ps 113(114).7], Lord of all the earth [Jos 3.11, 13; Mi 4.13], and Lord of lords [Dt 10.17; Ps 135(136).3]; 'ādôn was preferred to ba'al to express God's lordship since the latter was used as the proper name of many Canaanite gods.

In the period of the writing of Prophets, the title was frequently linked to the holy name of Yahweh, e.g., in Amos 19 times and in Ezechiel no less than 122 times. The Prophets thereby emphasized God's supreme authority and the subjection of Israel to God as His servant.

Substitution of the Lord for Yahweh. Because of the destruction of Jerusalem and Solomon's Temple (586 B.C.), the Exile in Babylon, and the continued dispersal of the Jews throughout the Near East, a new place of worship and instruction, the SYNAGOGUE, emerged where Jews faithfully recited their Psalms and had the Scriptures read and explained to them. In this environment the sacred name Yahweh was treated with growing reverence and respect, so that eventually it became too sacred even to be pronounced. When it appeared in the Sacred Text, 'ădōnāy, the Lord (plural form of 'ādôn with the first person singular possessive suffix, meaning literally my Lord), was usually substituted. This reverence for the sacred tetragrammaton was so carefully fostered during the postexilic period that Yahweh does not occur at all in Job, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Chronicles, or the second and third collections of the Psalms. The usual substitute, Adonai, itself became so revered that it acquired substitutes of its own, Heaven, Father of Heaven, the name, etc.

Because of this habitual substitution, the pronunciation of Yahweh was gradually lost. In the seventh century A.D. when a complete system of vowel signs was added to the mainly consonantal text of the Hebrew Bible, the vowel signs for the word ' $\check{a}d\bar{o}n\bar{a}y$ (a long '' \check{a} '' to distinguish the sacred word from the profane ' $\check{a}d\bar{o}nay$, my lords) were placed under the consonants of Yahweh in accordance with the Masora and eventually led to the erroneous transcription of Yahweh as JEHOVAH.

A profound theological relationship between the terms Lord and Yahweh was thus established by the reverent usage of the synagogue. The Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, published during the second century B.C. and known as the Septuagint (LXX), bears witness to this tradition by never transcribing the sacred name but rather writing for it $\kappa\acute{o}$ ptoς, the Greek translation of $'\check{a}d\bar{o}n\bar{a}y$. The usage later led to the frequent Dominus for Yahweh in Latin versions and the Lord (usually printed in small capitals) for Yahweh in English Bibles. The substitution's most important result, however, is found in the meaning given to $\kappa\acute{o}$ ptoς when it refers to Jesus Christ in the New Testament.

In the New Testament. The authors of the Gospels and Epistles whose Bible was mainly the Greek LXX continued to refer to God as "the Lord" or "Lord" and to substitute κύριος for Yahweh, but they more frequently applied the title in a specific way to Jesus Christ.

Lord Used for God. Jesus Himself and Paul called the Father Creator, "Lord of heaven and earth" (Mt 11.25; Lk 10.21; Acts 17.24), and also "the Lord of lords" (1 Tm 6.15). The title's most frequent usage for God, however, is found in its substitution for Yahweh, either with the definite article, the Lord (Mk 5.19; Lk 1.6; etc.), or without it, as God's name, Lord (Mk13.20; Lk 1.17, 58; Acts 7.49; etc.). It also substitutes for Yahweh in such expressions as the "ANGEL OF THE LORD" (Mt 1.20; 2.13; 28.2; Lk 1.11; Acts 5.19; etc.), the "glory of Lord" (Lk 2.9), and the "Lord's handmaid" (Lk 1.38). Of course, κύριος appears in place of Yahweh also in citations from the Greek Old Testament (cf. Mt 4.7 with Dt 6.16).

Lord Used for Jesus Christ. In Mark and Matthew Jesus is called "the Lord" only once (Mk 11.3, parallel to Mt 21.3; see Mk 16.19-20, a non-Marcan but inspired appendix). The vocative form κύριε is frequently applied to Him in all four Gospels but may originally have meant only "Sir." Luke refers to Him as "the Lord" (ὁ κύριος) 15 times, but this usage is commonly recognized as coming from a later stage in the Gospel tradition, when Christians began to speak of Jesus while He was on earth with the understanding that they had of Him long after Pentecost. In the fourth Gospel Jesus is called "the Lord" mainly in texts describing post-Resurrection events (Jn 20.2, etc.; "the Lord" of 6.23 and 11.2 appear to follow the Lucan usage mentioned above). Thomas's cry, "My Lord and my God" is intended as a doctrinal climax to John's Gospel, affirming the Lordship of the victorious and glorified Son of Man (Jn 20.28). It is improbable, then, that "the Lord" in its theological connotation was predicated of Jesus before His Resurrection. Until then He was called RABBI, Master, or Sir; "the Lord" was reserved for the risen Jesus.

Jesus is called Lord more than 20 times in the Acts and more than 130 times in the Pauline Epistles. Even in its earliest application there is no hint of any doctrinal innovation in the title. That Jesus is "the Lord" represents the belief of the earliest Christian communities of Jerusalem, Damascus, and Antioch. The Aramaic communities of Palestine used, of course, the title mārānā', Our Lord (1 Cor 16.22; see MARANATHA). Jesus received this Lordship, according to St. Paul, because He humbled Himself by becoming obedient even to death on the cross, and therefore God exalted Him and gave Him the name that is above every name, so that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is "Lord" for the glory of God the Father (Phil 2.8–11). In this text the name that transcends any other name is not Jesus, which He received at His circumcision, but κύριος, the substitute for the name Yahweh; and thus this ancient hymn affirms Christ's equal rank with the Father.

The Resurrection revealed Jesus to be the victor over death and sin, and to be the Prince of this world (Rom 1.4), and as a result the terms by which He had formerly been designated (SON OF MAN, MESSIAH, Master, Prophet, etc.) were now inadequate to express the new dimension that was manifested by His exaltation. "The Lord," however, was adequate to express Jesus' exaltation to the glory He had with the Father before He became flesh. It recalled Jesus' prediction that He would come with His Father's glory to judge all men (Mt 16.27; 25.31), His conundrum about the Messiah's being David's Lord (Mt 22.41–45), and His confession that He was the mysterious Son of Man who would establish God's final kingdom (Mt 26.64; cf. Dn 7.13). Jesus thus suggested even before His exaltation that His Messiahship was more than that of the awaited Davidic king and that He was Himself the divine judge, the Lord. In the light of the Resurrection His followers understood that He was really the Lord and applied to Him other passages of the Old Testament that they previously referred only to Yahweh [cf. Acts 2.34-36 with Ps 109(110); See Also 1 Cor 10.9, where "Neither tempt the Christ" may well have been the original reading, and cf. Nm 21.5-6; See Also the illation made in Acts 2.14-41, Peter's sermon at Pentecost, between vv. 21 and W. 36-39].

Unlike $\theta \epsilon \delta \zeta$, κύριος does not express Jesus' divine nature as much as His divine Lordship. A Christian must acknowledge that Jesus is the Lord (1 Cor 12.3) and must recognize that there is only one Lord (1 Cor 8.6). In Paul's doctrine, God the Father and the Lord Jesus are on the same level; both are divine, and the Father acts through the Lord, His Mediator.

The New Testament writers agree on the doctrine of Jesus' Lordship. Unless He was worshiped by them as the divine Lord, at the right hand of the Father, it is impossible to explain how these ardent Israelite monotheists could have attributed to Him the incommunicable name and the functions of the Lord God Yahweh.

Bibliography: P. VAN IMSCHOOT, Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1369–74. L. CERFAUX, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 5:200–228; Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (New York 1959). W. EICHRODT, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. J. A. BAKER (Philadelphia 1961–). V. TAYLOR, The Names of Jesus (New York 1953).

[R. T. A. MURPHY]

LORD'S DAY, THE

The only explicit mention of the Lord's Day in the New Testament occurs in Rv 1.10: "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day ἐν τῆ κυριακῆ ἡμέρα." From this single reference alone, it would be impossible to conclude that the early Christians celebrated the first day of the week, Sunday, as their special day of devotion and rest. However, there are several indications in the New Testament, which, taken in conjunction with other early Christian writings, provide strong cumulative evidence to that effect.

First, there is the clear emphasis in all the Gospels (Mt 28.1; Mk 16.2; Lk 24.1; Jn 20.1, 19) on the fact that the RESURRECTION OF CHRIST took place on the first day of the week. (The quasi-technical expression used by all, μία σαββάτων "number one of the Sabbath," i.e., the week, is explained by most authors as a double Hebraism.) Then, St. Luke in Acts 20.7 connects the first day of the week (μία τῶν σαββάτων) with the "breaking of bread" (κλάσαι ἄρτον), i.e., the celebration of the Eucharist, as appears evident from Acts 2.42, 46; 1 Cor 10.16. Finally, St. Paul indicates the first day of each week (κατὰ μίαν σαββάτον) in his directive for the alms collection in 1 Cor 16.2.

These New Testament allusions, however inconclusive by themselves, find clarification and confirmation from early Christian writings. In the Didache, for example, it is said:

On the Lord's own day, assemble in common to break bread and offer thanks; but first confess your sins, so that your sacrifice may be pure. However, no one quarrelling with his brother may join your meeting until they are reconciled; your sacrifice must not be defiled. For here we have the saying of the Lord: In every place and time offer me a pure sacrifice; for I am a mighty king, says the Lord; and my name spreads terror among the nations (ch. 14).

See also the references in the Epistle of Barnabas (15.8, 9), St. Ignatius of Antioch (Magn. 9), and St. Justin (1 Apol. 67). These writings provide ample evidence that the Jewish SABBATH was early replaced by the Christian Sunday, the Lord's Day, in honor of the Resurrection of Christ. Exactly how this came about is not clear, but Acts 20.7 indicates that the observance of Sunday may have begun at sundown on Saturday evening as an addition to the Jewish Sabbath, whose observance was eventually discontinued, perhaps upon the destruction of Jerusalem.

For the New Testament Christians, the expression "the Lord's Day" probably suggested a wealth of meanings largely overlooked today: (1) the glorious Resurrection that established Jesus of Nazareth as LORD and Christ (Ps 2.7; Acts 2.36; Phil 2.11); (2) the revelation of Christ as identified with Yahweh, God of Israel and Lord of the earth (Jos 3.11; Rom 1.4); (3) the "DAY OF THE LORD," a day of judgment and salvation, death and resurrection (Jl 3.4-5; Acts 2.20); (4) the unique and universal Lordship of Christ (1 Cor 8.6) as opposed to the "many lords" (1 Cor 8.5) of the pagans; (5) His fullness (πλήρωμα), His headship over His body, the Church, and His lordship over the world to come (Col 1.15-20; Eph 1.20-23). The Lord's Day was, for the early Christian, not simply a day of devotion and rest, but one of renewed commitment and consecration to Christ, Our Lord.

See Also: SUNDAY.

Bibliography: W. FOERSTER, G. KITTEL Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 3:1095–96. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 2362–63. H. RIESENFELD, "Sabbat et Jour du Seigneur," N.T. Essays: Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson, ed. A. J. B. HIGGINS (Manchester, Eng. 1959) 210–217. W. RORDORF, Der Sonntag: Geschichte des Ruhe- und Gottesdiensttages im ältesten Christentum (Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments 43; Zurich 1962).

[W. F. DICHARRY]

LORD'S PRAYER, THE

The model prayer, so named because it was taught by Jesus to his disciples. From its first words in Latin it is commonly called the Pater Noster (Our Father). It is treated here according to its form, its contents, and its use in the liturgy.

FORM

The Lord's Prayer is found in the Gospels of Matthew (6.9b–13) and of Luke (11.2b–4), but in different contexts and with considerable variations.

In Matthew. In the first Gospel the Lord's Prayer is part of the Sermon on the Mount, following an instruction on prayer and introduced by the words of Jesus, "In this manner therefore shall you pray" (Mt 6.9a). It is composed of an address and six petitions. The verse numbers are included in parentheses.

Address: Our Father in heaven (9b), Petitions: 1. hallowed be your name (9c). 2. your kingdom come (10a). 3. your will be done on earth as in heaven (10b). 4. Give us today our daily bread (11). 5. And forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors (12). 6. And do not subject us to the final test, but deliver us from the evil one (13).

Many manuscripts, but not the best nor the oldest, add the words, in variant forms, "For the kingdom, the power and the glory are yours, now and forever, Amen." This doxology was used by the Jews at the time of Christ. In a more elaborate form it already occurs in 1 Chronicles (29.11–13). The Christians in the East added it to the Lord's Prayer when they said this prayer at divine service, as can be seen in the DIDACHE (8.2) version of the Lord's Prayer. The Greek scribes, accustomed to this liturgical use of the prayer, gradually introduced it into the text of Matthew's Gospel. It is certain, however, that it is not a part of the Gospel text.

In Luke. In the third Gospel the setting of the Lord's Prayer is the prayer of Jesus Himself (11.1). After seeing Jesus in prayer, the disciples ask Him to teach them also how to pray. The Lukan version has an address and five petitions. The verse numbers are shown in parentheses.

Address: Father (2b), Petitions: 1. hallowed be your name (2b). 2. Your kingdom come. (2c)[3 not in Lk.] 4. Give us each day our daily bread (3). 5. And forgive us our sins, for we ourselves forgive everyone in debt to us (4a). 6. And do not subject us to the final test (4b).

In his smaller number of phrases Luke may be closer to the original Aramaic than Matthew, who may have added other words of Jesus: for "in heaven" (cf. Mt 6.1; 6.14; etc.), for "your will be done" (cf. Mt 26.42), for "deliver us from the evil one," (cf. Jn 17.15). In some of his wording, however, Luke may be further from the original, for he shows signs of adaptation to a later Gentile audience: in petition (5) he uses "sins" instead of the more Semitic "debts"; in petition (4) he uses the Greek present imperative $\delta (\delta ov)$, "keep on giving," instead of Matthew's aorist $\delta (s)$, "give (once and for all)." This may show a later emphasis on the present rather than the eschatological needs of the church.

CONTENTS

While the Lord's Prayer contains words used by Jesus himself in prayer, the plural forms indicate that it had already become the liturgical prayer of the Christian community in the first century. Although many of the phrases of the prayer may be found in the Jewish liturgy, there is a new spirit that pervades it. For Christians, Jesus himself was now the way to God. Through the gift of the Holy Spirit, they could now pray to the Father in the same manner he did (Rom 8.15; Gal 4.6). Jesus, however, was not only the way, but the end of the way, the object of hope. So the early Christian community looked forward to his speedy return from heaven. This eschatological atmosphere must be kept in mind for a full understanding of the Lord's Prayer. Lending itself to this interpretation is Matthew's use of the Greek aorist tense with its "once and for all" meaning.

Multilingual tablets of prayer on the cloister walls of the Pater Noster Church, Jerusalem, Israel. (©Hanan Isachar/CORBIS)

Address. The direct "Father" in Luke translates the original Aramaic abba of Jesus. This was his own distinctive and intimate way of speaking with his Father, now shared by Christians (Rom 8.15). The "our" in Matthew shows that the Lord's Prayer has already become a Christian community prayer, since Jesus nowhere addresses God in this manner. "In heaven" (Mt) distinguishes God the Father from any earthly father and may indicate the absence of any localization such as the Temple.

Petitions. First petition. The first petition is literally, "may your name be sanctified." However, the passive Greek forms in the first two petitions really represent Semitic reflexives, with the name of God standing for God Himself, so that the sense is: "May God sanctify his Name." The name in Semitic usage indicates the person as he makes himself known to others. The Greek aorist and the eschatological atmosphere of the prayer point to the last times: that God may sanctify all of humanity through the Holy Spirit. The Jewish Kaddish has a similar prayer: "May God's great Name be magnified and sanctified. . . ."

Second petition. Understanding the passive Greek form as above, the sense would be, "May God establish his reign" (see KINGDOM OF GOD); Jesus came on earth to establish God's rule (Jn 18.36–37). But the final stage of the kingdom can come only at Jesus' return, when he crushes the power of Satan (2 Thes 2.8). So the early Church prayed for the definitive establishment of God's kingdom at the end of time. The wording resembles the verse of the Jewish Kaddish following the one quoted above: "May God establish his reign during your life. . . ."

Third Petition. Parallel to the second petition, the Church prays that God may accomplish his salvific will, which is to redeem the human race (Eph 1.5–12; Jn 6.39–40). "On earth as in heaven": the Semitic expression, "heaven and earth," means the whole universe. Hence the petition refers to the redemption of the whole cosmos through Christ (Col 1.20).

Fourth Petition. Literally, in Matthew, "Give us today our future (?) bread"; in Luke, "Keep on giving us each day our future (?) bread." The word, ἐπιούσιον (modifier of bread), has no proved parallel in Greek writings. Etymology offers two possibilities: (1) ἐπί (on) plus είναι (to be), which could give us "daily" or "for existence," that is, the bread that is needed; (2) ἐπί plus ίέναι, (to go, come), which could give us "the bread of tomorrow" or "the future bread." The Bohairic and Sahidic versions as well as Marcion have the latter reading, and St. Jerome writes that he saw the reading māhār or "of tomorrow" in the Gospel of the Hebrews. The reading "bread of the future," or "tomorrow," would link with other Gospel references to the coming eschatological banquet (Lk 14.15; Mt 8.11). Words very similar to the petition are found in a Eucharistic context in John 6 (particularly 6.31-35). This would also indicate a Eucharistic interpretation in this petition of the Lord's Prayer. Luke has the present imperative δίδου, "keep on giving," and καθ' ἡμέραν, "each day," in place of Matthew's δός, "give" (once and for all), and σήμερον, "today." He thus draws more attention to that daily nourishment which anticipates the eschatological bread.

Fifth Petition. Literally, in Matthew it is, "and forgive us our debts as we have forgiven our debtors"; in Luke, "and forgive us our sins, for we also forgive our debtors." The perfect tense in Matthew, "as we have forgiven," is the attitude of the Christian awaiting a proximate judgment. All Christians are called upon to beg God's forgiveness while disposing themselves by a generous forgiving of others' debts, knowing that if they do not do so, the words of Matthew 18.35 apply to them: "So will my heavenly Father do to you, unless each of you forgives his brother from his heart." Luke, with his present tense, "as we also forgive," emphasizes forgiveness for the sins of each day as a preparation for the future judgment.

Sixth Petition. Literally, in Matthew and Luke it is, "and lead us not into trial," to which Matthew adds, "but deliver us from the evil one." Before the final judgment, the early Church expected a great time of trial, a final terrible onslaught of the devil (2 Thes 2.1–8). All Christians ask to be delivered from this test, knowing that no human power could withstand such a trial (Mt 24.21–22). Only the power of God can accomplish this (Rv 3.10). This final battle is the same basic struggle that Jesus faced by prayer in Gethsemane, where he asked his disciples to pray they might be spared the same trial (Mt 26.41). "But deliver us from the evil one" (Mt): the Greek phrase ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ means either "from evil" or "from the evil one." In John 17.15 Jesus prays, "[I ask] that you keep them from the evil one." Parallels such as this, and the meaning of the first half of the petition, incline us to the second translation, "the evil one." A reference to daily trials and temptations is not eliminated, for these prepare the way for the final test.

USE IN THE LITURGY

The early use of the Lord's Prayer in the baptismal liturgy is witnessed by a variant reading of Luke's second petition as quoted by several Fathers: "May your Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us." The Didache (8.2–3) has the Matthaean form of the Lord's Prayer where it follows the baptism ceremony and precedes the Eucharist. The Didache instructs Christians to recite it thrice daily (8.3). In the ancient rites of the catechumenate there was a traditio of a "handing over" of the Lord's Prayer before baptism. This ancient practice has been revived in the Rite of the Christian Initiation of Adults. The Lord's Prayer is sung or recited at the Liturgy of the Hours, as well as before Communion in the Eucharist.

Bibliography: H. VAN DEN BUSSCHE, Understanding the Lord's Prayer, tr. C. SCHALDENBRAND (New York 1963). R. E. BROWN, "The Pater Noster as an Eschatological Prayer," Theological Studies 22 (1961) 175–208. M. DROUZEY, "Le 'Pater,' prière du Christ," La Vie spirituelle 93 (1955) 115–134. M. E. JACQUEMIN, "La Portée de la troisième demande du 'Pater," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 25 (1949) 61–76. J. ROCHE, "Que ta volonté soit faite," La Vie spirituelle 93 (1955) 249–268. J. B. BAUER, "Libera nos a malo," Verbum Domini 34 (1956) 12–15. G. WALTHER, "Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der griechischen Vaterunser-Exegese," Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 40.3 (1914). P. J. VAN KASTEREN, Was Jesus predigte: Eine Erklärung des Vaterunsers, tr. J. SPENDEL (Freiburg 1920).

[J. A. GRASSI/EDS.]

LORD'S SUPPER, THE

An early name (κυριακὸν δεῖπνον) for the celebration of the Eucharist, found in the New Testament only in 1 Cor 11.20 and perhaps original with St. Paul. The adjective κυριακός (belonging to the Lord, the Lord's) that is employed here in place of the more usual noun in the genitive κυρίου (of the Lord; see also Rv 1.10), is borrowed from Hellenistic governmental and legal language with the meaning "pertaining to the Lord (Emperor); imperial." In Paul's use, the supper "pertains to the Lord" primarily and fundamentally as a liturgical repetition of the LAST SUPPER of the historical Jesus, whom the Christians now recognized as risen Lord ("the Lord Jesus": 1 Cor 11.23). The Jewish PASSOVER meal made ritually present the past redeeming action of God, and at the same time it was an appeal for the decisive coming of the eschatological kingdom. According to Paul (1 Cor 11.23–26), at the Last Supper Jesus sealed a new covenant in His own sacrificial body and blood; the supper's liturgical reproduction, explained by the "do this in remembrance of me," is a proclamation of the death of the Lord, to be repeated until His final coming.

"The Last Supper," c. 1594, painting by Tintoretto in the Church of San Giorgio Maggiore, Venice.

To exploit the riches of this complex mystery, Paul used Old Testament and even pagan parallels and analogies. In spite of verbal similarities, his pagan converts would not have failed to see the utter opposition between the Christian "table of the Lord," "cup of the Lord" (1 Cor 10.21), and such Hellenistic cult terms as "to sup at the table of the Lord Serapis," "cup of the Good Genius" (see G. A. Deissmann, 299); to partake of the latter was to eat and drink at the "table of demons" (1 Cor 10.20-21; see Dt 32.17). A meal was a favorite Biblical image for eschatological realities; see, e.g., Is 65.13; Mt 8.11–12; 22.1–14; 25.10; Lk 14.15–24; Rv 3.20; 19.9. As the "table of the Lord," the Eucharist is sacrificial food (Mal 1.7, 12; for table, supper in the sense of food, see Dn 1.8, 13, 15). The model for the eschatological "great supper of God" in Rv 19.17 has at the same time a cultic character (cf. Ez 39.17–20, where slaughter has the meaning of sacrificial meal).

Paul underlined the sacrificial nature of the supper; that he was no innovator, however, is shown by the traditional character of the report (1 Cor 11.23), its lapidary liturgical tone, and its conformity with other New Testament accounts where sacrificial and eschatological elements are present also (see, e.g., Mk 14.22-25). That his doctrine was not fundamentally different from that of the primitive Jerusalem community, with its joyous "breaking of bread" (Acts 2.42, 46) is shown by the use of this term in 1 Cor 10.16 and in description of the religious assembly of the Pauline community at Troas (Acts 20.7-11). Thus, at the commemorative and eschatological Lord's Supper, the Eucharistic presence of the Lord who has died and risen is an anticipation of His final presence (PAROUSIA) and already a partial answer to the earnest early Christian prayer "MARANATHA, come Lord!" (1 Cor 16.22; see also Rv 22.20).

See Also: AGAPE.

Bibliography: G. A. DEISSMANN, Licht vom Osten (4th ed. Tübingen 1923) 298–99, 304–06. H. SCHÜRMANN, "Herrenmahl," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:271. P. NEUENZEIT, Das Her- renmahl: Studien zur paulinischen Eucharistieauffassung (Munich 1960).

[C. BERNAS]

scudi, a bequest he had received. Lorenzana was a typical regalist Spanish bishop of the eighteenth century.

Bibliography: M. CUEVAS, Historia de la Iglesia en México, 5 v. (5th ed. Mexico City 1946–47).

[C. E. RONAN]

LORENZANA, FRANCISCO ANTONIO DE

Archbishop of Mexico City and Toledo, cardinal; b. León, Spain, Sept. 22, 1722; d. Rome, April 17, 1804. After finishing his studies with the Jesuits in León, he became a cleric and at an early age he was given a canonry in Toledo. In 1765 he was named bishop of Plasencia, and in the following year Charles III appointed him archbishop of Mexico. In his New World diocese he displayed great energy in advancing not only the religious but also the scientific and social interests of those under his charge. He is particularly noted for collecting and publishing the acts of the first three provincial councils of Mexico (1555, 1565, 1585), Concilios provinciales, I, II, III de México (Mexico 1769-70). In 1771, at royal behest, he held the fourth Mexican provincial council. Although he sent the proceedings of the sessions to Madrid, they were never published; moreover, the acts of this synod have never been approved by the Holy See. Lorenzana brought together valuable historical documents relating to Mexico's history and published them in a richly illustrated work called Historia de Nueva España escrita por su esclarecido conquistador Hernán Cortés aumentada con otros documentos (Mexico 1770). In 1772 he was recalled to Spain and made archbishop of Toledo, where he built a fine library for the city and collected and published the works of the principal writers of the Archdiocese of Toledo. These appear in SS. Patrum Toletanorum opera (Madrid 1782-83). He also had published, at his own expense, the works of St. Isidore of Seville, and brought out a beautiful edition of the Gothic Breviary and the Gothic Missal. In his diocese he carried on a number of social works and aided the exiled French clergy during the revolutionary period. In 1789 he was created cardinal by Pope PIUS VI, and in 1797 was appointed by Charles IV of Spain as envoy extraordinary from Spain to the Holy See. In this office he supported the pope in the difficult times that followed on the French invasion of Italy by Napoleon Bonaparte. On the death of Pius VI, he made possible the conclave at Venice in December of 1799 by paying the travel expenses of cardinals who were without funds. After the election he accompanied the new pope, Pius VII, back to Rome and in order to assist the pontiff so sorely tried by political conditions, resigned his archiepiscopal See of Toledo in 1800. In Rome he was one of the founders of a new Catholic academy and was considered a great friend of the poor, leaving them 25,000

LORETTO, SISTERS OF

Officially known as the Sisters of Loretto at the Foot of the Cross (SL, Official Catholic Directory #2360). It was founded in 1812 by Charles Nerinckx, a Belgian priest exiled by the French Revolution. This first native American sisterhood without foreign affiliation had its origin in the educational efforts of Maryland-born Mary Rhodes, who opened a school near St. Charles Church in Hardin's Creek, Ky. With Father Nerinckx's permission, she and Christina Stuart and Anne Havern taught catechism in addition to rudimentary subjects. When the group expressed the desire to live the religious life, Nerinckx received them as novices on April 25, 1812. Two months later, the society was formally organized by the election of a superior according to rule. In the next 12 years the membership increased; six other houses were established in Kentucky, and one in Missouri.

Upon the death of Nerinckx in 1824, Bp. Benedict Flaget of Bardstown, Ky., moved Loretto from its original foundation at Hardin's Creek to St. Stephen's Farm, seven miles distant. The convent and church that the sisters erected there, dedicated in 1826 and totally destroyed by fire in 1858, were replaced by more spacious buildings that included the motherhouse.

Loretto's constitutions were submitted to Pius VII for approval in 1816; in 1851 they were again presented to the Holy See; in 1907 Pius X fully and finally confirmed them. An act of the legislature of Kentucky incorporated the Loretto Sisterhood under the title, Loretto Literary and Benevolent Institution. The Loretto Sisters labored in China from 1923 until their expulsion in 1951. The motherhouse is in Nerinx, KY.

Bibliography: Archives of the Motherhouse of the Sisters of Loretto (Nerinckx, Ky).

[M. BARRETT/EDS.]

LORETTO SISTERS (INSTITUTE OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY)

A community of religious women, without enclosure, founded by Mother Mary WARD for the instruction of youth (IBVM, Official Catholic Directory #2370).

They are popularly known as Dami Inglesi, Englischen Fräulein, Loretto sisters, etc., in the countries where they established themselves. In 1609, Mary Ward and seven companions opened a boarding school for English Catholic refugees in St. Omer, Flanders, where they also conducted a free day school. A house was founded in London (1611), and soon the institute spread to Bavaria and Italy. They adopted the rule of the Society of Jesus and received provisional approval from Paul V. Opposition to this novel form of religious life grew and was climaxed by the bull of suppression of Urban VIII in 1631. Soon after, however, Mary Ward was encouraged by Pope Urban himself to open schools in Rome. The foundress then returned to England to encourage her sisters there; she died in York in 1645.

After Mary Ward's death, Mary Poyntz transferred both religious and pupils from York to Paris. Twenty years later Frances BEDINGFELD, a companion of Mother Ward, returned to England and in 1686 opened the Micklegate Bar Convent, York, the first convent founded in England after the Reformation. In 1703 Clement XI granted full approval to the rule. Meanwhile the houses in Germany and Austria had multiplied. The Paradeiser Haus, Munich, having remained open during the suppression by special permission of Urban VIII, was moved to Rome. St. Pölten (1706) became the Austrian generalate, and Mainz, Germany, became an independent motherhouse in 1809. Frances BALL entered the York community in 1814, and in 1821 she became foundress of a house of the same order in Dublin, Ireland. Foundations in Navan and Meath, Ireland (1833), and Australia (1874) were made from Rathfarnham, Dublin. Teresa DEASE established the first North American foundation in Toronto, Canada (1847). In the United States, a convent was opened in Joliet, Ill., in 1880. Pius X in 1909 reinstated Mary Ward to full honor as foundress. Two years later, York and Munich united at Rome, and after World War II they were joined by the St. Pölten and Mainz generalates.

The institute's educational work extends from primary school to university level, in catechetics, adult education, youth ministries, retreats, and pastoral outreach. Despite differences in history and variations in habit and title, there is an essential unity and strength among the many branches of the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary stemming from its constitutions and the spirit of its foundress.

The general motherhouse in North America is in Toronto, Canada. The U.S. regional headquarters is in Wheaton, IL.

Bibliography: Life and Letters of Mother Teresa Dease, by a member of the community (St. Louis 1916).

[M. F. MADIGAN/EDS.]

LORRAINE, CARDINALS OF

They may be considered according to the two houses to which they belonged.

House of Guise. The first cardinal of this house was John, son of René II of Lorraine, and brother of Antoine, Duke of Lorraine, and Claude, Duke of Guise; b. Bar, April 9, 1498; d. Neuvy-sur-Loire, May 10, 1550. At the age of three he was appointed coadjutor of Metz and at 20 was made a cardinal. Altogether he held 12 bishoprics, including Reims, Lyons, Albi, Narbonne, Toul, and Metz. Having been appointed a member of the royal council in 1530, he presided (1536) over an embassy to Emperor Charles V. Francis I, King of France, used his diplomatic services particularly in dealing with the Holy See.

Charles I, nephew and successor of John, and son of Claude of Guise; b. Joinville, Feb. 17, 1524; d. Avignon, Dec. 26, 1574. He was designated archbishop of Reims in 1538 and consecrated in 1545; he became a cardinal in 1547. In diocesan synods (1548, 1549) he attacked absenteeism and enacted rules for testing candidates for orders; he made a visitation of his diocese and preached frequently, though usually on semipolitical themes. He founded the University of Reims on Jan. 6, 1548. He held several bishoprics and was abbot in commendam for 11 abbeys as well as legatus natus under Paul IV. He furthered ecclesiastically the cause for the foundation of the Society of Jesus. At the third session of the Council of Trent (1562-63) he promoted Gallican liberties and episcopal residency (see GALLICANISM); he led the movement for inviting Protestants, but then he changed this policy because of political circumstances. He was active politically under Henry II and Francis II, who appointed him chancellor. He negotiated the Franco-Papal treaty against Charles V on the Parma question.

Louis I, another son of Claude of Guise was known as the cardinal of Guise; b. Paris, Oct. 21, 1527; d. Paris, May 29?, 1578. He became a cardinal in 1553 and bishop of Metz in 1558. Politically he was less active than his brother Charles, and the estimates of his character vary among contemporary witnesses.

Louis II, son of Francis de Guise and Anne d'Este, nephew of Charles, whom he succeeded as archbishop of Reims in 1574 and as cardinal in 1578; b. Dampierre, June 7, 1555; d. Dec. 24, 1588. He was associated with his brother Henry III, duke of Guise and was involved in the formation of the Holy League, in the Treaty of Joinville, and in the disputes among Henry III of France, Henry of Navarre, and his own brother Henry (see WARS OF RELIGION). Henry III of France brought about his death and that of his brother.

Louis III, son of Duke Henry III of Guise, and brother of Charles IV, who succeeded to the dukedom; b. Aug. 11, 1582 (1585?); d. Sainctes, June 21, 1621. Louis was made archbishop of Reims and cardinal in 1615.

House of Lorraine. The earliest cardinal from this house was Frederick, brother of Godfrey I, Duke of Lorraine; b. between 1010 and 1020. Frederick became Pope STEPHEN IX (1057–58).

Charles of Lorraine-Vaudemont, b. Nomény, April 2, 1559; d. Nov. 29, 1587. He became a cardinal in 1578, bishop of Toul in 1580, and also bishop of Verdun in 1585, although he was not ordained and consecrated until 1586. He was noted for piety and ecclesiastical zeal.

Charles II, second son of Duke Charles III of Lorraine; b. Nancy, July 1, 1567; d. Nancy, Dec. 24 (30?), 1607. He was coadjutor to the bishop of Metz, Louis I of Guise, in 1573 and became bishop of Metz in I578. Ten years later he was made cardinal deacon by Sixtus V; in 1591 he became a cardinal priest and apostolic delegate to the Duchy of Lorraine. He was bishop of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and abbot of at least four monasteries. His election as bishop of Strasbourg in 1592 in opposition to Johann Georg von Brandenburg, the Protestant candidate, was the cause of sporadic riots. In 1559 a commission awarded the election to Charles and in 1604 the Protestant party relinquished the diocese and the cathedral to the Catholics.

Nicholas Francis; b. Dec. 6, 1609; d. Nancy, Jan. 25, 1670. He became coadjutor to the bishop of Toul in 1620, bishop of Toul in 1625, and a cardinal in 1627. He disagreed with his brother, Duke Charles IV, who was subservient to France and Cardinal Richelieu. In 1634 he renounced all clerical titles, married his cousin Claudia, and proclaimed himself Duke of Lorraine. When expelled from Lorraine by the French, he went into exile in Vienna and Munich. His son, Charles Leopold, succeeded Charles IV as Duke of Lorraine.

Bibliography: H. O. EVENNETT, The Cardinal of Lorraine and The Council of Trent (Cambridge, Eng. 1940). H. O. EVENNETT and L. JUST, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1146–47.

[J. J. SMITH]

Williswinda, in Altenmünster, and was settled with monks from GORZE. In 772 episcopal EXEMPTION and royal protection were granted by CHARLEMAGNE, and in 774 the cloister was removed to Lorsch. The great numbers who entered, the extraordinarily large grants, the rewards of able administration, the exemplary discipline, and the number of daughter-foundations gave this imperial abbey a vast influence in the 9th century, and for the next 200 years, a period of cultural brilliance. Decline followed in the 12th century, partly because the abbots were so preoccupied with efforts to check episcopal annexation that they were unable to introduce serious reforms within the monastery. Archbishop Siegfried II of Mainz finally secured jurisdiction over Lorsch from Pope Gregory IX in 1229; this was confirmed by Emperor Frederick II in 1232, after which Lorsch became a CIS-TERCIAN house and sank to the rank of a PRIORY. With the permission of Pope Innocent IV, Abp. Siegfried III in 1244 introduced PREMONSTRATENSIAN canons from Allerheiligen. In 1461 Lorsch was handed over to the Count Palatine. During the Thirty Years' War the monastery was burnt to the ground by Spanish troops (1621). In the 17th century the attempts of the Premonstratensians to return to Lorsch were fruitless, and in 1803 the monastic territory was awarded to the state of Hesse-Darmstadt.

The crypt, which was the burial place of two Carolingian rulers, and which contains two important murals, has been restored since 1927. The catalogue of Lorsch's library testifies to the intellectual greatness of the monastery in the 10th and 11th centuries and clearly suggests that it was the best of the medieval libraries in its time. After 1460 under Palatine control, the still-extensive library was removed to Heidelberg, and in 1632 it was sent to the Vatican; in 1815 part of it was restored to Heidelberg.

Bibliography: Annales Laureshamenses, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 1. Gallia Christiana 5:695–714. F. KIESER, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Klosters Lorsch, 2 v. (Bensheim 1908–09). W. M. LINDSAY, "The (Early) Lorsch Scriptorium," Palaeographia Latina, ed. W. M. LINDSAY, 6 pts. in 1 v. (Oxford 1922–29) 3.5–48. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1656–58. P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l'Ordre de Saint-Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous, Bl. 1942–56). W. SELZER, Das Karolingische Reichskloster Lorsch (Kassel-Basel 1955).

[B. D. HILL]

LORSCH, ABBEY OF

More properly called Lorsch on the Bergstrasse, in Hesse, Germany, Diocese of Mainz (Latin, Laureshamense, Laurissa), at one time the foremost German BENEDICTINE abbey, later a Premonstratensian monastery. It was founded in 764 by Count Kankor and his mother,

LOS ANGELES, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Metropolitan see (Angelorum) comprising the counties of Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, and Ventura in California, an area of 8,782 square miles. In 2001 there were 4,121,601 Catholics, about 39 percent, in a total population of 10,449,129. When the diocese was erected April 27, 1840, San Diego was constituted the see city; it was moved to Monterey in 1850, and five years later to Santa Barbara. In 1859, after the episcopal residence had been moved to Los Angeles, the title of the diocese was changed to Monterey-Los Angeles. In 1922 it became Los Angeles-San Diego when Monterey-Fresno was constituted a diocese. The Archdiocese of Los Angeles was established July 11, 1936. Its suffragan sees in 2001 were the Dioceses of Monterey, Fresno, Orange, San Bernardino and San Diego.

Early History. Los Angeles is an abbreviated version of the title El Pueblo de Nuestra Señora de Los Angeles del Rio de Porciuncula, given to the town founded by Gov. Felipe de Neve on Sept. 7, 1781. The area covered by the archdiocese was originally part of the first Diocese of the Californias, which was created by Gregory XVI in 1840 as a suffragan of the See of Mexico, and comprised the state of California, Lower California, and much of present-day Nevada and Utah. Upper California contained the missions founded by the Franciscan, Junípero SERRA; the missions of Lower California were the work of the Jesuit, Juan Maria SALVATIERRA. The first bishop, Francisco GARCÍA DIEGO Y MORENO, OSF, was consecrated on Oct. 4, 1840, in the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe near Mexico City, and arrived in his episcopal city, San Diego, Dec. 11, 1841. A year later, however, he took up residence at Santa Barbara and administered the diocese from there until his death on April 30, 1846. The first priest ordained in California was Miguel Gomez on June 29, 1842, at Mission Santa Barbara.

Before the California diocese was established, the Mexican government had appropriated the PIOUS FUND, upon which the missions depended for support. Thus, the bishop found 12 of the missions, which had been secularized by 1833, in ruins. These were restored to episcopal control; in 1841 García Diego had 17 Franciscans in Upper California and four Dominicans in Lower California. In 1844, Our Lady of Guadalupe Seminary was opened near Santa Ines (now Santa Barbara County) where it survived for 17 years. Two priests and four students were brought from Mexico.

After the flag of the United States was raised over the custom house in Monterey July 7, 1846, disturbed political conditions between Mexico and the United States and revolts in Italy delayed the appointment of a new bishop. At the time when Father Gonzales Rubio acted as administrator of the diocese (1847–50), the Picpus Fathers, who had been temporarily in the area in the 1830's, returned to California. With the discovery of gold in northern California in January 1848, a new era began, trade routes were opened, and California was admitted to the Union as the 31st state Sept. 9, 1850.

Serra's statue and church entrance, San Gabriel Mission, Los Angeles. (©Richard Cummins/CORBIS)

1850 to 1896. In 1850, after the Seventh Provincial Council of Baltimore had proposed three names for the vacant California diocese, Joseph Sadoc ALEMANY, OP, was appointed May 31, 1850, and Monterey was designated his official residence.

Alemany. After his consecration in Rome June 30, 1850, and establishment at Monterey early in 1851, Alemany directed his attention principally to the northern part of the diocese. Since his jurisdiction over Lower California was not recognized by the Mexican government, the Holy See removed the Diocese of Monterey from the Province of Mexico in 1851, and a year later Lower California Peninsula was withdrawn from the diocese. On Dec. 18, 1855, a U.S. Land Commission, after a three-year study, decreed the return of the mission properties to the diocese; in the following six years this was gradually accomplished over the signatures of Presidents James Buchanan and Abraham Lincoln.

Replica of "Virgin of Guadalupe," digitally remastered, on tour at Los Angeles Coliseum. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Amat. When, on July 29, 1853, Alemany was transferred to the new metropolitan See of San Francisco, Thaddeus AMAT, CM, was appointed to Monterey and consecrated in Rome March 12, 1854. In November 1855, he took possession of his see, establishing his residence at Our Lady of Sorrows church in Santa Barbara. Besides the Franciscan and Picpus fathers, he had only nine secular priests. Through him the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul arrived in Los Angeles Jan. 5, 1856, to establish a school, an orphanage, and the city's first hospital. In 1858, envisioning the growth of Los Angeles, Amat moved his residence there. A year later, during a visit to Rome, the bishop succeeded in having the title of the diocese changed to Monterey-Los Angeles. The old Plaza Church of Our Lady of Angels became the procathedral. When, in May 1862, a diocesan synod was held in Los Angeles, there were 13 parishes with resident pastors.

In 1865 the Vincentian fathers opened a school in Los Angeles; four years later it received its charter as St. Vincent's College. A college for lay students, opened by the Franciscan fathers in 1861, lasted until 1877. In 1869 the Pious Fund was again the object of investigation, and when the members of an American-Mexican commission failed to agree, an umpire, in the person of the British Ambassador, gave the verdict in favor of the Catholic bishops of California and the vicar apostolic of Colorado and Utah. Amat attended the sessions of Vatican Council I, returning to Los Angeles in December 1870. The following spring, ground was broken for a cathedral, which was consecrated by Archbishop Alemany April 30, 1876, in honor of St. Vibiana, whose relics Amat had obtained from Pius IX on the promise to honor her with a cathedral as the principal patroness of his diocese.

Mora. When Amat died on May 12, 1878, he was immediately succeeded by Francis Mora, his vicargeneral and pastor of Our Lady of Angels, who had been consecrated coadjutor on Aug. 3, 1873. Mora, a native of Catalonia, Spain, had come to America as a student with Amat; he was ordained for the diocese March 19, 1856. By the time of his succession the diocese had 31 priests in addition to the Franciscan community at Santa Barbara and the Vincentian community at Los Angeles. The city's population of 10,000 included about 2,300 Catholics, while of the 100,000 throughout the diocese, about one-fourth were Catholics. However, with the inauguration of transcontinental railroads (1885), the discovery of oil (1891), and the development of the citrus industry, the population of city and diocese grew rapidly and the Church's progress was marked.

In 1886 the cathedral school was built and entrusted to the Immaculate Heart Sisters who had come to California and located at Gilroy in 1871. St. Vincent's College moved to a more spacious location in March 1887; St. Vincent's parish, also under the direction of the Vincentian fathers, was erected. Sacred Heart parish and St. Joseph's were established. The Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet and the Sisters of the Ho1y Names joined the diocese and opened academies for girls, and the Sisters of Mercy arrived to found a home for working girls and one for the aged. The Daughters of Charity moved their hospital to a new location in 1884, and in 1890 transferred the orphanage to a site in Boyle Heights. St. Mary's Church was built in 1896.

1896–1936. Failing health led Mora to request a coadjutor, and the chancellor of the Archdiocese of San Francisco, George Montgomery, was consecrated for Monterey-Los Angeles April 8, 1894. Two years later Mora resigned the see, returning to Spain where he died Aug. 3, 1905.

Montgomery. When Montgomery succeeded Mora on May 16, 1896, there were in the diocese 72 parish churches and missions, ten religious communities with 183 sisters, and six orphanages, four hospitals, two colleges, four academies, and 18 parish schools, for a Cathopopulation estimated at 52,000. Montgomery's administration, Los Angeles, among other cities, suffered from the anti-Catholic bigotry of the AMERICAN PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION. Its influence was counteracted to some extent, however, by a series of lectures under the auspices of the Catholic Truth Society. In September 1902 Montgomery was appointed coadjutor to Archbishop Riordan of San Francisco, and left Los Angeles on March 27, 1903.

Conaty. Bp. Thomas J. CONATY, second rector of The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., was transferred to Monterey-Los Angeles and took possession of his see June 18, 1903. Two months after his arrival three new parishes were erected in the city. The Claretian fathers took charge of San Gabriel 1908 and the Old Plaza Church in 1910. The St. Vincent de Paul Society was organized. In 1905 the Little Sisters of the Poor arrived in the diocese. By 1911 there were 166 churches and chapels in the diocese, 18 of which were centers of parish life in the city of Los Angeles. Nine new schools had been erected, making a total of 29 parish schools, exclusive of the academies, which still provided elementary school facilities for a number of parishes. The orphanages cared for 1,048 children and the Catholic Indian school at Banning had 118 pupils, while an additional 335 Catholic children attended the two schools for Native Americans in the diocese. Mass was celebrated at least monthly at 43 mission stations. There were five hospitals in the diocese, and three homes for the aged. In 1910 the number of priests had increased to 206, including 73 who were members of the eight religious communities, serving about 100,000 Catholics in the diocese.

Although they retained St. Vincent's parish, the Vincentian fathers gave up their educational work in Los Angeles in June 1911, after 46 years in charge of St. Vincent's College. The Jesuits, who had been in Santa Barbara since 1908, entered the field of education in 1911. Under their direction St. Vincent's College became Loyola University and moved to a new location in 1929. For the benefit of the teaching religious, Conaty inaugurated summer conferences at which educators of national reputation taught the latest methods of administration and instruction. Settlement work in the poorer parts of the city met with immediate success. When religious communities devoted to works of mercy were encouraged, Sisters of the Good Shepherd established a home in Los Angeles. In San Diego and other cities of the diocese new parishes and institutions were founded, and proportionate progress was made. When Conaty died at Coronado, near San Diego, Sept. 18, 1915, the Catholic population of the diocese had grown to 178,000, and the number of priests to 271. The diocese, which remained vacant for two years, was administered by Msgr. Patrick Harnett. Although Bp. Peter J. Muldoon, of Rockford, Ill., was appointed to Monterey-Los Angeles March 22, 1917, he did not take possession of the see, and resigned in June of that year.

Cantwell. On Dec. 12, 1917, John Joseph CANT-WELL, vicar-general of the Archdiocese of San Francisco, who had been appointed bishop of Monterey-Los Angeles Sept. 21, 1917, was installed in Los Angeles, after his consecration in San Francisco on December 5. During his 30-year administration, the diocese shed its Mexicancolonial characteristics and took its place as one of the great metropolitan sees of the U.S. The population increase was a prime factor in diocesan development, which included the erection of the Diocese of Monterey-Fresno on Dec. 3, 1922, comprising the 12 northern counties, while the eight remaining counties received the new title of Los Angeles-San Diego. Many Mexicans, fleeing from their native land during the persecution of the Church under President Plutarco Calles, arrived in Los Angeles, where their total grew to more than 300,000, including 129 expelled priests. There, 50 parishes and missions were erected and Spanish-speaking priests were provided.

The growth of the diocese necessitated the better organization of its departments of administration. The Catholic Welfare Bureau was established in 1919; the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, in 1922; and the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, in 1924. In November 1920, the Holy Name Union was established, while the Council of Catholic Women had its origin in April 1923. The Catholic Youth Organization, with its club and camp programs, came into being in 1936. To ensure a steady supply of priests, appeals were made to the missionary seminaries of Ireland, and the generous response provided the founders of most of the new parishes for half a century. Religious orders were invited; the Augustinians and Capuchins arrived in 1922, and a year later the Passionists began the lay retreat movement, and the Oblate fathers located in San Fernando. The Dominican fathers were established in Eagle Rock in 1921; the Salesian fathers, in 1919; and the Paulists, in 1925. To provide for native vocations, a junior seminary, under the title of Los Angeles College, was instituted in 1926 as a day school, and a major seminary of St. John's at Camarillo was founded in 1939, both institutions under the direction of the Vincentian fathers.

Archdiocese. When in 1936, four southernmost counties were separated from Los Angeles to form the diocese of San Diego, Los Angeles was elevated to the status of an archdiocese, with Cantwell becoming its first archbishop.

1936 to 1947. Even after the division, the Catholic population in the Archdiocese of Los Angeles was estimated at 650,000. By 1947, the archdiocese had 688 priests, of whom 362 were diocesan. There were 217 parishes with resident pastors, four colleges, 35 high schools, 115 parochial schools with an enrollment of 42,877 pupils, and 36 communities of sisters established in the diocese. Five hundred Confraternity teachers were giving religious instruction to 45,000 pupils.

The Legion of Decency, particularly appropriate in view of the vast motion picture industry in Los Angeles, was established in 1934. Other notable events of Cantwell's episcopate included the convocation in 1929 of the first synod since 1889; the great earthquake of 1933, which did considerable damage to Church properties in the Long Beach area; the consecration of two auxiliary bishops, Joseph T. McGucken on March 19, 1941, and Timothy Manning on Oct. 15, 1946; and the visit of Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli in October 1936. Two historic anniversaries were celebrated, with attendance of over 100,000 in the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum—on Sept. 6, 1931, the sesquicentennial of the founding of the city of Los Angeles, and Oct. 13, 1940, the centennial of the foundation of the hierarchy. Other developments included the founding of 18 hospitals and health agencies. An unsuccessful statewide effort was made in 1933 to secure tax exemption for private nonprofit schools. A national celebration of Catholic Action was held in Los Angeles in April 1934, the 150th anniversary of the death of Father Junipero Serra.

McIntyre. At Cantwell's death Oct. 30, 1947, McGucken was elected administrator of the diocese until March 19, 1948, when James Francis A. MCINTYRE was installed in St. Vibiana's Cathedral as the second archbishop of Los Angeles. Archbishop McIntyre who since 1946 had been coadjutor archbishop in New York under Cardinal Spellman, brought experience of administering a large archdiocese with him to Los Angeles. Shortly after his installation, he set about reorganizing the archdiocesen curia and administrative structures of the archdiocese. During his episcopacy, a total of 82 new parishes were established. In 1956, McIntyre formally sponsored the establishment of the Lay Mission Helpers Association, the pioneer organization of lay missioners in the nation.

Cardinal McIntyre is credited with using his influence to repeal the burdensome taxation of parochial schools in California, but he was criticized for his silence on interracial issues. In 1964 the bishop of every diocese in California save Los Angeles issued a statement against the repeal of the Rumford Fair Housing Act. The Reverend William DuBay petitioned the pope to remove McIntyre from office because he had forbidden the priests of the archdiocese from addressing the race issue.

In 1960, on the eve of Vatican II, the cardinal convened an archdiocesan synod. He served on the Central Preparatory Commission, attended all the sessions, and took an active role in the deliberations of the Council. And though he spoke in favor of the continued use of Latin, opposed changes in the Mass, and argued against giving juridical status to liturgical conferences, after the Council he moved expeditiously to implementing its recommendations and complying with its spirit. On the other hand, the archdiocese received a national notoriety because of the Cardinal's opposition to renewal measures taken by the Immaculate Heart of Mary Sisters and because of his highly publicized dispute in 1969 with Catholicos por La Raza, a radical Mexican rights group. McIntyre resigned the archbishopric in 1970 at the age of 88.

Manning. McIntyre was succeeded by Timothy MANNING, who had been appointed coadjutor to McIntyre in May 19, 1969. Before his installation as Archbishop of Los Angeles on Jan. 21, 1970, Manning had been an auxiliary bishop in Los Angeles (1946–1967) before becoming the first bishop of Fresno (1967–1969). Three years later Manning was named a cardinal. Although his administrative style was less confrontational, Manning pursued the expansionary policies of his predecessor, and energetically supported a host of ecumenical involvements and warmly endorsed the Cursillo movement. He continued to encourage the Lay Mission Helpers that Mc-Intyre had established, visiting missionaries in South Africa, Rhodesia, Ghana, Kenya, Malawi and Uganda. Although a portion of the archdiocese was carved out into a new Diocese of Orange County in 1976, the Catholic population continued to grow rapidly, fueled by massive waves of Mexican and other Latin immigrants. A year later, Manning retired and turned over the reins of leadership over to his successor, Archbishop Roger M. Mahony. Manning remained active in his retirement years. In addition to working a day each in the archdiocesan archives and spending another visiting infirm priests and religious, he traveled widely and gave numerous retreats throughout the west. He passed away on June 23, 1989 in Los Angeles.

Mahony. In 1985, Bishop Roger Mahony of the diocese of Stockton was installed Archbishop of Los Angeles. Pope John Paul II named him a cardinal on June 28, 1991. Mahony's active and highly visible leadership put him at the center of some controversies and at the same time enabled him to reach to the farthest outposts of the most populous diocese in the country. His relationship with Los Angeles's powerful media and film industry, initially testy and filled with mutual suspicion, led him to found Catholics in Media, an organization intended to influence, shape, and reward the entertainment industry. A high priority in Mahony's tenure as archbishop was to erect a new cathedral for Los Angeles. When in 1994 the Northridge earthquake so undermined the Cathedral of Saint Vibiana that repairing it was not an option, Cardinal Mahony obtained a prime location in the Los Angeles Civic Center on which to build the Cathedral Center of Our Lady of the Angels in grand contemporary style.

Mahony's friendship with Cardinal Joseph Bernardin of Chicago and his participation in the latter's Common Ground project expanded his view of the Church's need to interact with contemporary society. His personal friendships with other religious leaders in Los Angeles led to the signing of a covenant among Catholics, Lutherans, and Episcopalians. He worked hard to increase lay involvement in the administration of the archdiocese, expanding the services of the archdiocese while simplifying archdiocesan structures. A pastoral letter on the liturgy, Gather Faithfully Together, published on the feast of Our Lady of the Angels, Sept. 4, 1997, served as a call to renewal for the parishes in the archdiocese. The years of Cardinal Mahony's ministry have returned him to his roots in Catholic social activism. He has fostered free and open dialogue in the archdiocese—especially through the expansion of the Los Angeles Religious Education Congress, an annual event that has drawn tens of thousands and became a forum for speakers from all over the Catholic world. Mahony has been a frequent caller on local talk radio, and has used his skill as a ham radio operator to keep in contact with people all around the world. He was quick to grasp the power of the Internet and frequently uses it to hold chat sessions with his people. With funds and friendship he has supported churches in the developing world, especially in Central and South America.

Catholic Higher Education. Los Angeles is home to two Catholic institutions of higher learning, Loyola Marymount University and Mount St. Mary's College. Loyola Marymount University traces its roots to the Jesuit-sponsored Loyola College (established 1911; university status 1930) and Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary-sponsored Marymount College (established 1933). In 1968, Marymount College moved to the campus of Loyola College as an autonomous institution. At this point, the Sisters of St. Joseph of Orange joined the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary as co-sponsors of Marymount College. After five years of sharing faculties and resources, Loyola University and Marymount College merged in 1973 to form Loyola Marymount University, sponsored by the Jesuits, the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary, and the Sisters of St. Joseph of Orange. The other major Catholic institution of higher learning in the archdiocese is Mount St. Mary's College, sponsored by the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of Los Angeles; Archives, Santa Barbara Mission; Archives, University of San Francisco. H. H. BANCROFT, History of California, 7 v. (San Francisco 1884–90). R. E. COWAN, A Bibliography of the History of California and the Pacific West, 1510-1906, 3 v. (San Francisco 1914; new ed. Columbus, Ohio 1952). Z. ENGELHARDT, The Missions and Missionaries of California, 4 v. (San Francisco 1908-15). W. E. NORTH, Catholic Education in Southern California (Washington 1936). F. PALOU, Historical Memoirs of New California tr. H. E. BOLTON, 2 v. (Berkeley, Calif. 1926). Z. ENGELHARDT, The Missions and Missionaries of California, 4 v. (San Francisco 1908-1915). D. WEBER, The Spanish Frontier in North America (New Haven and London 1992). L. HAAS, Conquests and Historical Identities in California (Berkelev 1995), A. L. HURTADO, Indian Survival on the California Frontier (New Haven and London 1988). R. JACKSON and E. CAS-TILLO, Indians, Franciscans and Spanish Colonization (Albuquerque 1995). M. ENGH, Frontier Faiths: Church, Temple and Synagogue in Los Angeles, 1846-1888 (Albuquerque 1992). F. J. WEBER, A Biographical Sketch of the Right Reverend Francisco Garcia Diego y Moreno (Los Angeles 1961). F. J. WEBER, Thaddeus Amat: California's Reluctant Prelate (Los Angeles 1964); Century of Fulfillment: The Roman Catholic Church in Southern California, 1840-1947 (Mission Hills 1990); His Eminence of Los Angeles: James Francis Cardinal McIntyre, 2 v. (Mission Hills 1997). J. M. BURNS, "The Mexican Catholic Community in California," Mexican Americans and the Catholic Church, 1900-1965, J. DOLAN and G. HINOJOSA, eds. (Notre Dame 1994). F. J. WEBER, comp., Magnificat: The Life and Times of Timothy Cardinal Manning (Mission Hills 1999).

[T. MANNING/EDS.]

LOSSKIĬ, NĪKOLAĬ ONUFRIEVICH

Russian philosopher; b. Kreslavka, Province of Vitebsk, Dec. 6, 1879; d. Sainte-Geneviève des Bois, near Paris, Jan. 24, 1965. As a student in the gymnasium he was expelled for spreading atheism and went to Bern to finish his preparatory studies. Returning to Russia, he studied at the University of St. Petersburg, where, later at the age of 29, he was invited to prepare himself for a professorship. Meanwhile, he went abroad again, working under W. Windelband, W. Wundt, and G. E. Müller. In 1903 he received his master's degree for his dissertation on the fundamental doctrines of psychology from the viewpoint of voluntarism and in 1907 his doctorate at the University of Moscow for his dissertation Obosnovanie intuitivizma (The Foundation of Intuitivism). Losskii became docent and later professor of philosophy at St. Petersburg, a post he held until the fall of 1921. In 1922 he was forced to leave, along with some 125 scholars and writers, including N. A. BERDIAEV. He settled in Prague until appointed professor at the University of Bratislava (Slovakia). In 1945 he moved to New Haven, Conn., where he commuted to New York in order to teach at St. Vladimir Orthodox Russian Theological Seminary and Academy. In 1951 he moved to Los Angeles, Calif. The last few years of his life he spent in France.

Losskiĭ constructed his own philosophical system, which he referred to as hierarchical personalism. In metaphysics he advocated a concrete ideal realism. His epistemological theory, which differs profoundly from that of H. BERGSON, he named intuitivism. God and the kingdom of God are the starting point for his moral philosophy and aesthetics.

Bibliography: Works. Die Grundlehren der Psychologie vom Standpunkt des Voluntarismus (Berlin 1905); Grundlegung des Intuitivismus (Halle 1908); The Intuitive Basis of Knowledge (London 1919); Handbuch der Logik (Leipzig 1927); The World as an Organic Whole (New York 1928); N. O. LOSSKIĬ and J. S. MARSHALL, Value and Existence, tr. S.S. VINOKOOROFF (London 1935); Freedom of Will, tr. N. DUDDINGTON (London 1932); History of Russian Philosophy (New York 1951). Studies. S. TOMKIEFF, The Philosophy of N. O. Lossky (Durham Univ. Philos. Society Proceedings 6; Durham, N.C. 1923). A. S. KOHANSKI, Lossk'y Theory of Knowledge (Nashville, Tenn. 1936). Festschrift, N. O. Lossky zum 60. Geburtstage (Boon 1932). J. PAPIN, Doctrina de bono perfecto eiusque in systemate N. O. Losskii personalistico applicatio (Leiden 1946); 'In Memoriam N. O. Lossky' in Most 12 (Cleveland 1965), a quarterly for Slovak culture.

[J. PAPIN]

LOS-VON-ROM MOVEMENT

Literally "away from Rome," a term often applied to a number of modern movements whose purpose was to lead Catholics out of the Catholic Church. Its specific reference here is to a movement in the German regions of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy after 1897 that sought to encourage disaffection among Catholics because of the Church's indifference to nationalistic political goals.

As national tensions mounted in Austria and Bohemia, many Germans were fearful that they were threatened by a coalition of the monarchy, the Catholic Church, and the Slavs. A coalition of German clericals and Slavs had been the basis of the Taafe government (1879–93) and was held responsible for the passing of Count Kasimir Badeni's language ordinances in 1897 that required parity between Czechs and Germans in Bohemia. In the face of this blow to German pride and prestige, demonstrations took place, and during one of them in Vienna a medical student, Theodor Rakus, proclaimed the slogan, "Los von Rom."

The Pan-German movement of Georg von Schönerer was quick to adopt it as a part of its program in the hope that a weakening of Catholicism would increase the chances for Anschluss with Germany. Protestant missionary organizations in the German empire, especially the Evangelical Union and the Gustavus Adolphus Union, actively encouraged Catholics to become converts to Protestantism. Churches were built in Austria, missionaries were sent from Germany, and a lively propaganda developed, with the newspaper Die Wartburg as the movement's chief organ after 1902.

Although the Los-von-Rom movement originated as a political protest, it eventually included a number of people for whom the terms "German" and "Protestant" were identical. An effort to encourage a similar movement among the Czechs by an appeal to their Hussite traditions broke down because of animosity between Czechs and Germans. The movement failed to become widespread; yet 76,000 or more Catholics deserted their Church and joined the Protestants or OLD CATHOLICS between 1897 and 1914. The movement led many others into religious indifference.

During World War I the movement diminished; but it revived under the First Austrian Republic as a form of protest, often without religious overtones, against political Catholicism. German nationalistic feeling was largely responsible for Los-von-Rom, but other factors were involved, such as the huge size of dioceses; the relative scarcity of German priests, which meant that Czech priests often served in German and mixed parishes; and the weakening of adherence to Catholicism among the middle class and the students. Catholic-Protestant relations were strained by this movement. Interaction between churches was not as close to the heart of the movement as was the conflict between one form of European nationalism and a supranational Church.

Bibliography: L. Albertin, Nationalismus und Protestantismus in der österreichischen Los-von-Rom Bewegung um 1900 (Cologne 1953). F. LAU, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:452–455. K. ALGERMISSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 6:1153–55.

[W. B. SLOTTMAN]

LOTHAIR I, MEDIEVAL EMPEROR

Reigned: 817-855. b. 795. The oldest son of Emperor Louis the Pious and a key figure, with his brothers, in the civil wars that marked both the later years of his father's reign and the period immediately following his death. In 814, Lothair was appointed king of Bavaria. In 817, his father named him co-emperor and crowned him at Aachen. In conjunction with the coronation, Louis also enacted his Ordinatio imperrii by which he designated Lothair as successor and placed the latter's younger brothers, Louis of Bavaria and Pipen of Aquitaine, under his authority. Lothair spent the years 822-825, as regent for Italy, significantly reducing the power and independence of his uncle, King Bernard of Italy (812-817), without actually displacing him. While in Italy, Lothair was also crowned emperor by Pope PASCHAL I at Rome (823).

The Ordinatio imperii was apparently intended to preserve the unity of the empire without denying Lothair's siblings their rightful share. In fact, the orderly settlement it envisaged failed to materialize, largely because of the anxiety generated when Emperor Louis remarried and his new wife, Judith, produced yet another son and potential heir. When Judith and her supporters began pressing Louis to allocate a share in the realm to her son, Charles ("the Bald"), the elder siblings rose up in revolt (830). Lothair, whose rights appeared most threatened, took the lead in the rebellion and suffered most heavily when it failed. In the aftermath, his father undertook a new division of the realm that foresaw its division into four roughly equal kingdoms, including one for the young Charles. Lothair was to retain his Italian lands, but lost any authority over his brothers' lands, now understood to be independent realms. This new settlement failed to calm the underlying discontent among the brothers, however, who continued to conspire and vie for greater power and influence. In 833, with Lothair in the lead, the elder siblings rebelled again. This time, they also enjoyed the support of Pope GREGORY IV, but were defeated nonetheless. Lothair continued his resistance, although he was effectively restricted to his Italian lands.

In the civil war that followed the death of Louis the Pious (840), Lothair laid claim to all the rights originally bestowed upon him by the Ordinatio imperrii of 817. Any chance of realizing that claim, however, was effectively ended by his crushing defeat at the battle of Fontenoy (July 25, 841). After much negotiation, the brothers concluded the Treaty of Verdun (August 843), a permanent arrangement whereby Lothair retained the title of emperor (though with no authority over his brothers) and rulership over a middle kingdom stretching from Frisia in the north to Sicily in the south. Lothair's territories included the imperial capitals of AACHEN and ROME. In the period following the Treaty of Verdun, fraternal cooperation and the ideal, at least, of unity were maintained through regular meetings between the now more or less equally ranked monarchs. Although there is no reason to think that Lothair's middle kingdom was doomed to failure, it did suffer heavily from external invasions. From 845 on, the northern part of the realm suffered annual attacks by the Vikings, while the Saracens attacked Italy. Lothair delegated the government of Italy to his eldest son, Louis II, whom he also elevated to the rank of co-emperor (850). His younger sons, Charles and Lothair II, received Provence and Lotharingia, respectively. In 855, Lothair I retired to the monastery of Prüm where he died on September 29.

Bibliography: E. HLAWITSCHKA, Vom Frankenreich zur Formierung der europäischen Staaten—und Völkergemeinschaft, 840–1046 (Darmstadt 1986) 75–80. P. RICHÉ The Carolingians, A Family Who Forged Europe (Philadelphia 1983) 141–196. J. NELSON, "The Frankish Kingdoms, 814–898: The West," New Cambrige Medieval History 2. ed. R. MCKITTERICK (Cambridge 1995) 110–141. J. FRIED "The Frankish Kingdoms, 817–911: The East and Middle Kingdom," ibid 142–68.

[D. A. WARNER]

LOTHAIR II, FRANKISH KING

Reigned: 855-869; d. Piacenza, Italy; the second oldest son of Emperor LOTHAIR I, and brother of Louis II and Charles of Provence. When his father's kingdom was divided (855), Lothair II received the northern part, between Frisia and the Jura mountains, which included AACHEN. At the death of his brother Charles, Lothair received half of the latter's realm as well. This kingdom of Lothair subsequently came to be known as Lotharingia. Lothair's reign was marked by continual tension with his uncles, Charles the Bald and Louis the German, who sought, among other things, to take advantage of his marital difficulties. Those difficulties arose from the childless state of his marriage to Theutberga, daughter of Hubert, lay-abbot of St Maurice-in-Valais, and more specifically, from the serious question that the absence of a legitimate heir opened with regard to the royal succession. From 857 until the end of his reign, Lothair sought to annul his marriage to Theutberga in favor of an earlier, less formal arrangement (Friedelehe) with a certain Waldrada, by whom he had a son, Hugh (b. 860). A synod held at Aachen annulled his marriage to Theutberga on the basis of incest, thereby permitting Lothair to marry Waldrada in 862. Lothair' plans almost immediately aroused the opposition of Archbishop HINCMAR OF REIMS, who rejected the annulment as fundamentally inconsistent with Christian morality and with the responsibilities of a Christian king. It also violated canon law which had come to strongly favor legitimate marriage (muntehe) over any form of combinage. This dispute is particularly noteworthy because of the involvement of the papacy. Pope NICH-OLAS I joined with Hincmar in condemning Lothair's illegal divorce. After a synod held at Metz (863) failed to resolve the matter in an acceptable fashion, Nicholas went so far as to suspend from office the archbishops of Cologne and Trier. In 865, Lothair was forced to return to Theutberga, though this in no way hindered his efforts to proceed with his original plan. Under Nicholas's successor, Pope HADRIAN II, Lothair was readmitted to communion, a hopeful sign which was voided soon by his own death. In 867, Lothair had traded territory to his uncle, Louis the German, in return for recognition of his plans for the succession. In spite of this agreement, the deceased king's uncles proceeded to divide his realm between them, without regard for the claims of his natural son or his surviving brother (Louis II). As Lothair's brother had also failed to produce an heir, the end of the middle kingdom was a foregone conclusion.

Louis the German and Charles the Bald forming alliance against Lothair. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Bibliography: R. KOTTJE, "Kirchliches Recht und päpstlicher Autoritätsanspruch. Zu den Auseinandersetzungen ueber die Ehe Lothars II." Aus Kirche und Reiche. Studien zu Theologie, Politik und Recht im Mittelalter ed. H. MORDEK (Sigmaringen 1983) 97–103. E. HLAWITSCHKA, Vom Frankenreich zur Formierung der europäischen Staaten-und Völkergemeinschaft, 840–1046 (Darmstadt 1986) 80–81. P. RICHÉ, The Carolingians: A Family who Forged Europe tr. M. I. ALLEN (Philadelphia 1993) 177–78.

[D. A. WARNER]

LOTHAIR III, ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned Aug. 30, 1125, to Dec. 4, 1137; Count of Supplinburg; b. 1075; d. Breitenwang, Tirol; buried at Königslutter, Braunschweig, which he founded. He was crowned king in AACHEN on Sept. 13, 1125. Federick, Duke of Swabia, the nephew of the deceased and childless HENRY V, inherited the imperial property and the hereditary claim to the throne, and, as the Hohenstaufen candidate, remained an enemy of Lothair despite his feudal submission. Since the German princes, led by Adalbert I of Mainz, feared the continuation of a Salian ecclesiastical and territorial policy, they decided in favor of a free election.

Lothair seemed to have been the ideal opponent of the Hohenstaufen. His father had fallen in battle against their grandfather, HENRY IV (1075). Appointed Duke of Saxony by Henry V (1106), the once insignificant count diplomatically took advantage of opportunities and increased his power in the duchy and in the border marches through profitable inheritances and successful war against the Slavs east of the Elbe, as well as against the Salians themselves (Welfesholze, 1115). Lothair won over Henry the Black, Duke of Bavaria, by giving his only child, Gertrude, in marriage to the Duke's son, Henry the Proud. As king, he intervened in the Bohemian controversy in 1126 and suffered a military defeat, but by shrewd diplomacy managed nevertheless to attain his goals. Conrad, the younger Hohenstaufen, took advantage of the moment, had himself appointed as rival king, and thus gained a temporary foothold in imperial Italy. The Hohenstaufen, however, had overestimated their strength, although Lothair's wife Richenza and (St.) BER-NARD were unable to arrange a settlement before 1135.

Influenced by Bernard during the schism between Anacletus II (see PIERLEONI) and INNOCENT II, Lothair decided (1130) in favor of Innocent, from whom he had twice, but in vain, demanded a revision of the Concordat of WORMS. In 1133 Innocent crowned Lothair emperor at the Lateran, since Anacletus had taken possession of St. Peter's. Lothair's recognition of papal dominion over the estates of MATILDA OF TUSCANY occasioned anti-imperial propaganda to construe his action as a recognition of feudal supremacy of the pope over the emperor. In 1136 Lothair campaigned against Anacletus and his Norman vassal ROGER II. He died while returning from Italy. Such historically far-reaching developments as the GUELF AND GHIBELLINE controversy, the revival of German eastern colonization and the missions to the Slavs, the consolidation of the southern Italian Norman state, the surrender of further sacral functions on the part of the Empire, and the decay of the royal duchies (Lower Lorraine) either began or took shape during his reign.

Bibliography: Sources. Historia Welforum, ed. E. KÖNIG (Stuttgart 1938). Annales Patherbrunnenses, ed. P. SCHEFFER-BOICHORST (Innsbruck 1870). Literature. H. VOGT, Das Herzogtum Lothars von Süpplingenburg (Hildesheim 1959). H. WOLTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1156–57, the birthdate is incorrect. E. WADLE, Reichsgut und Königsherrschaft unter Lothar III. (1125–1137) (Berlin 1969). K. HAMPE, Germany under the Salian and Hohenstaufen Emperors (Oxford 1973). M. L. CRONE, Untersuchungen zur Reichskirchenpolitik Lothars III. (1125–1137) zwischen reichskirchlicher Tradition und Reformkurie (Frankfurt am Main 1982). H. FUHRMANN, Germany in the High Middle Ages, c. 1050–1200, tr.T. REUTER (Cambridge 1986). T. GROSS, Lothar III. und die mathildischen Güter (Frankfurt am Main 1990).

[H. WOLFRAM]

LOTZE, RUDOLF HERMANN

Physician and philosopher; b. Bautzen, Germany, May 21, 1817; d. Berlin, July 1, 1881. The son of a physician, Lotze studied medicine, psychology, and philosophy at Leipzig under E. H. Weber, G. T. Fechner, and C. H. Weisse (1801-66), receiving his M.D. and Ph.D. in 1838. His dissertation in medicine, De futurae biologiae principiis philosophicis (Leipzig 1838), gave indication of a special competence in philosophy. In Leipzig Lotze wrote his first Metaphysik (1841), became a lecturer in philosophy, and wrote his first Logik (1843). In 1844 he was appointed professor at the University of Göttingen, where he composed his Medizinische Psychologie oder Physiologie der Seele (Leipzig 1852). His Mikrokosmus, 3 v. (Leipzig 1856-58, 5th ed. 1896-1909) is one of the most important documents in modern German philosophy. In 1881 he was called to Berlin and died shortly after his arrival there.

Lotze had an excellent background in the natural sciences and put his knowledge of inductive and experimental methods to use in the modernization of philosophy. At a time when others were hostile to metaphysics, however, he undertook to combine the inductive method of the exact sciences with metaphysical insights, mainly those in the tradition of German IDEALISM. He acknowledged the existence of mechanistic functions in nature, but regarded these as the means by which the Deity actualizes the final good of the entire universe. He also taught the substantiality of the human soul and its freedom of action. The ego, for him, is not merely a logical subject, as it was for I. KANT; rather it is an active principle. Body and soul he conceived to be in constant reciprocal relationship: the body affects the soul (e.g., in perception and feeling), while the soul acts upon the body (e.g., in acts of free will). In this teaching Lotze was opposed to 19th-century determinism. He held that without freedom, morality would have no foundation.

Lotze's impact on contemporary philosophy is perhaps best expressed in his three notions of being, happening, and value. The characteristic of the external world is being (inductive metaphysics); that of man's perception is happening, which is channeled from the without to the within (physiology of the soul); and that of the inner world is thought, truth, and value (axiology). Greatly influenced by Lotze were C. Stumpf, W. Windelband, A. Wenzl, F. BRENTANO, and, through Brentano, E. HUSSERL.

Bibliography: J. HIRSCHBERGER, The History of Philosophy, tr. A. N. FUERST, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1958–59) v.2. F. BARONE, Enciclopedia filosofica 3:168–170. W. ZIEGENFUSS, ed., Philosophen–Lexikon, 2 v. (Berlin 1949–50) 2:80–87. M. WENTSCHER, Lotzes Leben und Werke (Heidelberg 1913). S. HALL, Die Begründer der modernen Psychologie (Lotze . . .) (Leipzig 1914).

[C. E. SCHÜTZINGER]

LOUGHLIN, JAMES F.

Pastor, educator, author; b. Auburn, N.Y., May 8, 1851; d. Barbados, West Indies, March 17, 1911. He attended the Urban College of the Propaganda, Rome, and was ordained on April 4, 1874, attaining a doctorate in theology. After incardination into the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, Pa., he served a brief curacy and was then appointed to teach moral theology and Canon Law at St. Charles Seminary, Overbrook, Pa. He founded (1886) Our Lady of the Rosary parish in Philadelphia, became chancellor (1892), and was made a domestic prelate (1899). In 1901 he became rector of the important parish, Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, Philadelphia, where he concentrated on raising the intellectual level of his parishioners. He improved parochial and commercial schools and conducted Catholic reading circles, one of which, the Baronius Club, founded in his memory a scholarship at Trinity College, Washington, D.C. Loughlin was one of the founders and a trustee of the Catholic Summer School of America and was its second president; he established the first diocesan cottage at Cliff Haven and frequently lectured on Church history at the school. In the late nineteenth-century school controversy, he opposed Archbishop John Ireland's FARIBAULT PLAN. Loughlin was prominent in the formation of the National Union of Catholic Young Men's Societies, serving as its president as well as being spiritual director of the Archdiocesan Union of Young Men.

He wrote many articles and essays in Church history, of a popular rather than scholarly nature. He was coeditor of the American Catholic Quarterly Review, and for several years he contributed sermons to the Saturday edition of a secular newspaper, the Philadelphia Ledger. His articles for the old Catholic Encyclopedia dealt principally with the lives of medieval popes, local Philadelphia history, and religious sects and included one on the Protestant confessions of faith.

Bibliography: W. LALLOU, "Monsignor James F. Loughlin, D.D.," Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia 25 (1914): 277–284.

[H. J. NOLAN]

LOUGHLIN, JOHN

First bishop of Brooklyn, N.Y., diocese; b. County Down, Northern Ireland, Dec. 20, 1817; d. Brooklyn, N.Y., Dec. 29, 1891. His parents, John, a tenant farmer, and Mary (McNulty) Loughlin, immigrated to the United States around 1830 and settled in Albany, N.Y. Loughlin attended Albany Academy, conducted by the classicist Dr. Peter Bullion, and St. Peter's College, Chambly, Montreal, Canada. In February of 1834 he entered the Nyack Seminary, and in October enrolled as a seminarian-tutor at Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md. After a year at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, he was ordained by Bishop John Hughes in old St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, on Oct. 18, 1840. He served as curate at St. John's Parish, Utica, until January of 1841, when he was transferred to St. Patrick's Cathedral, where he became rector in 1844 and vicar-general of the diocese in 1849.

On July 29, 1853, Pius IX erected Long Island as the Diocese of Brooklyn and appointed John Loughlin its ordinary. He was consecrated on October 30 in St. Patrick's Cathedral and installed at St. James, Brooklyn, the mother church of the new diocese, on November 9. Loughlin's pioneer work laid a strong foundation for the future importance of his see. He was under constant pressure from immigration, the unceasing demand for churches, schools, and charitable agencies, and a shortage of priests, religious, and financial resources. Although he planned a cathedral with the architect Patrick KEELY, his parishioner, and laid its cornerstone in 1868, the need for orphanages and hospitals prevented its completion.

Loughlin was the second oldest bishop at the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884) and one of very few who had attended the First and Second Councils in 1852 and 1866 respectively. In 1864, 1873, and again in 1880, he was among the candidates proposed by his fellow suffragans for the archiepiscopal See of New York, but each time he declined the honor.

Bibliography: I. K. SHARP, Priests and Parishes of the Diocese of Brooklyn, 1820–1944 (New York 1944); History of the Diocese of Brooklyn, 1853–1953, 2 v. (New York 1954).

[J. K. SHARP]

LOUIS VI, KING OF FRANCE

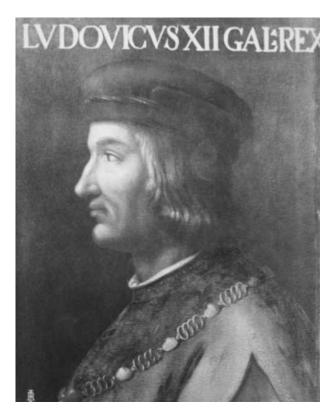

Reigned from 1108 to 1137; b. 1081. The son of PHIL-IPI and Bertha of Frisia, Louis studied at the abbey school of SAINT-DENIS, where he became acquainted with SUGER, the future abbot of Saint-Denis, who became Louis's biographer and chief adviser. His marriage to Lucienne de Rochefort ended in annulment in 1107. In 1115 Louis married Adelaide of Maurienne, who bore him several children, including his successor, Louis VII. Although Louis came to the throne at a time when disputes over elections and investitures remained unsettled, overall, he enacted favorable policies toward ecclesiastical institutions. As he extended royal authority beyond the Ilede-France, he intervened evenhandedly to settle quarrels between ecclesiastics and lay lords. When necessary, he disciplined clerics who had ignored the law, and he punished lay officials who had committed offenses against the church as well. In 1110 Waldric, bishop of Laon, implicated in the murder of Gerard of Quierzy, was tried before the king and exiled. In 1113 Louis forced Arnaud, abbot of Saint-Pierre-le-Vif to return the lands he had unlawfully taken from a royal vassal. In 1122, when William VI, count of Auvergne expelled Amaury, bishop of Clermont, from his bishopric, Louis and his army drove the count from Clermont. Both a benefactor and reformer of monastic houses, Louis favored established Benedictine monasteries such as Saint-Denis and founded the Benedictine convent at Montmartre. He also provided for the establishment of SAINT-VICTOR, which became the center of several Augustinian houses, and gave land to the Premonstratensian abbey at Dilo. Louis's relationship with the papacy remained generally harmonious, especially when the papacy needed an ally against the emperor. Louis allowed Gelasius II to remain in exile at Cluny until the end of his life. In the papal schism of 1130 Louis sided with Innocent II, who had the support of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX and the Cistercians. Innocent II crowned the future Louis VII, and with Louis's support returned to the papal see in Rome. Upon his death, Louis's body was interred at St. Denis.

Bibliography: SUGER, The Deeds of Louis the Fat, ed. and tr. R. C. CUSIMANO and J. MOORHEAD (Washington, DC 1992). R. FAW-TIER, The Capetian Kings of France, tr. L. BUTLER and R. J. ADAM (New York 1960). E. HALLAM, Capetian France (London 1980).

[P. D. WATKINS]

LOUIS VII, KING OF FRANCE

Reigned from 1137 to 1180; b. 1120. The second son of LOUIS VI and Adelaide of Maurienne, Louis's education at the cathedral school in Paris prepared him for an ecclesiastical career; however, upon the death of his brother, Philip, in 1131, he became heir to the French throne to which he succeeded in 1137. Following their return from the Second Crusade (1147-1149), Louis procured an annulment for his marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine on the grounds of consanguinity. He then married Constance of Castile and later Adela of Champagne, who produced a long-awaited male heir, PHILIP II AUGUS-TUS, in 1165. In May 1152, Eleanor subsequently married the future HENRY II of England (r. 1154-1189), whose possessions in France and powerful ambition became a source of rivalry and conflict for Louis. His contemporaries, including Odo de Deuil, Stephen of Paris, John of Salisbury, and Walter Map praised Louis VII for his piety and his favorable disposition toward the church. He undertook pilgrimages to SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA (1154-55), the Grande Chartreuse (1162-63), and to CANTERBURY (1179). Because of a disputed papal election, Alexander III sought refuge in France in 1162, where he received Louis's welcome. Louis's protection of Thomas BECKET, who had fled to France in 1164 to escape the wrath of Henry II, received widespread approval. Louis asserted his rights over the French church, especially regarding episcopal elections in his realm and control over royal churches. To provide continual support for his royal policies, elections to royal bishoprics often went to members of the king's own household or to families loyal to Capetian interests. As a benefactor to the TEMPLARS, Louis gave them the land for their commandery at Savigny, along with sizable rents and privileges. He also made generous grants to smaller monastic houses and created several small perpetual chapels. A patron of the CISTERCIAN order, Louis supported CLAIRVAUX through an annual gift, he founded La Bénisson-Dieu in the 1140s, and he established the major Cistercian abbey at Barbeaux, where he was interred in a magnificent tomb.

Louis VII.

Bibliography: ODO OF DEUIL, De prefectione Ludovici VII in Orientem, ed. and tr. V. R. BERRY (New York 1948). R. FAWTIER, The Capetian Kings of France, tr. L. BUTLER and R. J. ADAM (New York 1960). E. HALLAM, Capetian France (London 1980).

[P. D. WATKINS]

LOUIS IX, ST. KING OF FRANCE

Reigned Nov. 29, 1226, to Aug. 25, 1270; son of Louis VIII and Blanche of Castile; b. Poissy, April 25, 1214; d. Tunis. He married Marguerite of Provence in May 1234; they had ten children. Until her death in 1252, his mother dominated the King and the government, quickly quelling the baronial opposition during his minority and ruling alone during his absence on his first CRUSADE. Louis's personal government between 1254 and 1270 gave him a deserved reputation for promoting peace and doing right. He became a model to his successors. His sense of duty made him punctilious in the asser-

Frontispiece to a "moralized" Bible, showing Queen Blanche of Castile and King Louis IX enthroned in top quadrants and the "author" (a monk) and scribe of the book in lower quadrants, probably written and illuminated for King Louis in Paris, France, c. 1230.

tion of his rights, and his piety and benevolence were a source of strength and not of weakness to the monarchy.

The Crusades. Louis is best known for his crusades, on the first of which he was accompanied by the Sire de Joinville, who has left a memoir of those years, the earliest intimate picture of a French king. Louis took the cross during an illness in 1244 and carefully prepared his campaign. He tried to reconcile INNOCENT IV and FREDERICK II, excommunicated in 1245, in order to help the crusade, but Innocent refused. Louis left in August 1248. The difficulties of the Hohenstaufen Emperor in Italy had a profound influence on the whole episode. After wintering in Cyprus, the crusaders surprised the city of Damietta in June 1249 and awaited there the arrival of further troops. Louis then advanced on Cairo, but the army, weakened by dysentery, was cut off from Damietta when the Egyptian fleet regained control of the Nile. The crusaders were surrounded and captured at Mansura, April 6, 1250. A palace revolution made Louis's situation very dangerous, but he finally negotiated the release of his whole army in return for the surrender of Damietta and the payment of a ransom. He went to Acre to await the completion of the treaty and remained in Syria four years. He encouraged the Christians there by building elaborate fortifications, by attempting to exploit the rivalries of Cairo and Damascus, by hoping to convert the Mongols, and by sending for more men and money from the West. His brothers returned to France for this purpose, but they were unable to do much. Finally Louis himself recognized that he, unaided, could achieve nothing more; so he returned to France, arriving in July of 1254.

France had remained relatively tranquil, in spite of the Pastoureaux movement. However, the ambitions of King Henry III to recover his father's lost French possessions; involved Louis in difficult diplomatic negotiations in Spain, Italy, Germany, and Flanders, while his Hohenstaufen alliance was no help to him. He first arbitrated in the Flemish dispute, but Henry III did not agree to terms of peace until his brother Richard became—nominally king of Germany in 1257. By the treaty of Paris (1259) Henry renounced his claims to the lost provinces, did homage for Gascony, secured the conditional reversion of disputed lands, and obtained a subsidy from Louis. The treaty was unpopular in France and the cause of much later discord. Louis thought that it would promote family concord (the two kings had married sisters); actually it put an end to the immediate danger of English hostility. Louis continued to support Henry III, this time by his arbitration of 1264 against the English barons. He arranged a similar treaty with James I of Aragon at Corbeil (1258), renouncing his claim to the Spanish March in return for James's homage for his French fiefs.

During the 1260s, Louis became increasingly disturbed by Moslem advances in Syria and announced his intention to lead a second crusade in 1267. By the time the crusaders were ready, Louis's brother, Charles of Anjou, had become sole master of Italy, and there was a papal interregnum. Charles is therefore held responsible for the diversion of Louis's crusade to Tunis, to attack Charles' enemy, the emir of Tunis, as a preliminary maneuver. The army was depleted by disease within a month of landing, and Louis himself died. The crusaders promptly returned to France, carrying Louis's bones.

Domestic Policy. Despite the personal example Louis set by his devotion to the crusades, it is arguable that a greater claim to respect was his interpretation of his responsibilities as king, in the light of his faith. After the violence of the two previous reigns, Louis brought peace and promised justice. The greatest troubles were those of the south, where the problem of heresy continued to cause social unrest. Louis's domains in the south were confined to the senéchausées of Carcassonne and Beaucaire, but his brother Alphonse became count of Toulouse in 1249, and the two administrations, if not identical, provided similar advantages for each area. Louis had ordered enquêtes into abuses in the new provinces in 1247, and on his return from crusade he received numerous petitions for justice. In the light of these, he drew up new regulations for his officials that became the first of a series of reforming ordonnances, designed to improve administration, eradicate corruption, and improve the law of his dominions. The latter part of Louis's reign is remarkable for a growing interest in legal affairs. Several attempts were made to write down customary law, and cases coming before the king's court or Parlement were formally recorded after 1254. Louis tried to modify legal procedure by replacing trial by battle with a form of examination of witnesses, a procedure that encouraged the use of written records in the courts. He commissioned several handbooks of political wisdom and composed for his successor his own maxims, the enseignements.

His sense of responsibility made him keen to learn from his clergy, but he did not automatically support his bishops, claiming that he had to make his own decisions. Notably, in the important case of Frederick II, Louis refused to recognize Innocent IV's sentence of deposition. Louis was always respectful of the papacy, but he defended royal interests against the popes during episcopal vacancies and protested against papal expectative PROVISIONS. Although his "PRAGMATIC SANCTION" is not now considered genuine, Louis did in fact defend what he considered the legitimate interests of the Gallican Church. From his youth he showed a deep and sincere piety. He built the Sainte Chapelle in Paris as a shrine for the crown of thorns; he was a friend and patron of the CISTERCIANS and of the new FRANCISCAN and DO-MINICAN orders, from which he selected his confessors; he founded hospitals and patronized learning; he was notable for his humility and his personal examples of Christian service. Many miracles of healing were performed at his tomb at SAINT-DENIS, and after several inquiries, he was canonized in 1297.

Feast: Aug. 25.

Bibliography: J. DE JOINVILLE, The History of St. Louis, ed. N. DE WAILLY, tr. J. EVANS (New York 1938). C. PETIT-DUTAILLIS, The Feudal Monarchy in France and England from the Tenth to the Thirteenth Century, tr. E. D. HUNT (London 1936). L. BUISSON, König Ludwig IX, der Heilige, und das Recht (Freiburg 1954). J. R. STRAYER, "The Crusades of Louis IX," in A History of the Crusades, ed. K. M. SETTON (Philadelphia 1955) v. 2. D. O'CONNELL, The instructions of St Louis: A Critical Text (Chapel Hill, NC 1979). W.C. JORDAN, Louis IX and the Challenge of the Crusade: a Study in Rulership (Princeton, NJ 1979). L. CAROLUS-BARRE, Le process de canonisation de Saint Louis (1272-1297): essai de reconstitution (Rome 1994). J. LE GOFF, Saint Louis (Paris 1996). D. H. WEISS Art and Crusade in the age of St. Louis (Cambridge and New York 1998).

[D. J. A. MATTHEW]

St. Louis IX.

LOUIS XIV, KING OF FRANCE

Called the Great, or le Roi Soleil; b. Saint-Germainen-Laye, Sept. 16, 1638; d. Versailles, Sept. 1, 1715. His reign of 73 years was the longest in European history and marked the political and cultural hegemony of France. As the son of Louis XIII and Anne of Austria, he acceded to the throne at the age of five; he first reigned under the regency of his mother, although real power was exercised by the Italian born protégé of Richelieu, Cardinal Jules MAZARIN. While Louis was still a minor, the civil war known as the Fronde (1648–53) broke out, first manifesting itself as a revolt of the Paris Parlement and subsequently as an uprising of the princes against the Court. This is the last feudal revolt in French history.

Mazarin's Tutelage. At an age when he should have been engaged in formal schooling, Louis was, instead, enmeshed in the tortuous and dangerous maneuvers of Mazarin. A lifelong suspicion and a conviction that all were bent upon lessening his authority are thought to have had their origin in this environment. His education was rudimentary. He became adept at horseback riding, the dance, and the hunt, but measured by even the more modest Renaissance standards he was an ignoramus. He knew no Greek, very little Latin, and history and mathematics were virtually unknown to him. In later life he astounded foreigners with his knowledge of geography, but this he learned from practical experience, not schoolbooks. Louis's religious education was also neglected. The monarch who would be thrust into the midst of the thorniest theological controversies was taught nothing beyond the necessity for pious works and decorous behavior at religious observances. Although his formal, spiritual education was entrusted to Charles Paulin, SJ, more important in Louis's formation was his mother, who frequently attended two Masses a day and spent untold hours at the prie-dieu, but disdained formal theology. To her influence are traced the seeming pangs of conscience that followed his youthful amorous adventures. Contemporary witnesses relate his frequent but generally futile efforts to part from his mistresses. Later, FÉNELON characterized Louis's religion as superstitious, devout, and in the Spanish style.

Louis XIV, King of France.

When Mazarin died in 1661, Louis astounded the courtiers by announcing promptly and emphatically that ministerial rule was at an end and that he was taking charge of all affairs of government. His decision was widely acclaimed. For almost four decades, and in violation of the essence of monarchy, France had been ruled by ministers, one of whom had not even been Frenchborn. It was an auspicious moment in the history of France. For the first time in a century and a half, thanks largely to Richelieu, the monarchy could feel secure against its internal and external foes: the feudal nobility, Huguenots, and Hapsburgs. After imprisoning Nicolas Fouquet, the immensely wealthy superintendent of finances who had been the prime candidate to succeed Mazarin, the 23-year-old Louis turned to the able Jean Baptiste Colbert, to mastermind a program of reform unequaled in the history of the old regime. Both envisaged a France rid of all clumsy feudal survivals, unified and prosperous, united by a fine network of roads and canals, ruled according to the Cartesian ideals of order and method. But the opposition of French society to such a program was too powerful. Louis gradually lost enthusiasm for reform and turned to more bellicose means of ensuring French greatness. Colbert was thrust into the background, as the minister of war; Louvois, emerged as Louis's principal counselor.

Pursuit of Glory. Louis XIV's overriding passion was the pursuit of glory. "The love of glory goes beyond all others in my soul," he once said. He saw himself as Augustus, Constantine, and Justinian, all at the same time. In the internal administration of France, in his patronage of the arts and sciences, and in other ways, this passion had admirable results. In foreign policy, however, it led only to disaster. He fought four wars, all motivated primarily by personal and dynastic considerations. He envisioned himself the acknowledged leader of Christendom, the true successor of Charlemagne. From the start he converted this idea into a principle of international law by inflicting gratuitous humiliations upon the pope, the emperor, and the king of Spain. He also made grandiose plans for a new crusade to destroy the Ottoman power.

Military Ambitions. Louis's principal interest centered in the Spanish Netherlands. Temporarily abandoning his efforts to reestablish his wife's right to the Spanish throne, he fell back on a local right of inheritance, the droit de dévolution, which made Maria Theresa the heiress of the Belgian provinces. This provoked the War of Devolution (1667–68) with Spain. Although his armies were successful, Louis was forced to conclude peace and surrender his spoils because of the unexpected anti-French Triple Alliance, formed by Holland, England, and Sweden in 1668. Blaming John de Witt, pensioner of Holland, and further angered by the refuge given in Holland to French political pamphleteers, he declared war on the Dutch in 1672, after extensive military and diplomatic preparations that included the secret Treaty of Dover with England in 1670. After six years of costly war, the Treaties of Nimwegen (1678-79) brought terms of peace in which Spain lost Franche-Comté and lands in the Spanish Netherlands to Louis. At the height of his power, he established the Chambers of Reunion (1680–83), which exploited the loose terminology of preceding peace treaties so as to acquire additional land along the north and northeast frontiers.

After a short breathing spell, Europe was plunged into the War of the League of Augsburg (1688–97), when Louis laid claim to the Palatinate after the death, without an heir, of the Elector Charles, whose sister was the wife of Louis's brother. Louis committed a major strategic mistake by sending his armies into the Palatinate, thus allowing William of Orange to slip across the channel and receive the English crown, as the exiled James II became the unhappy guest of the French. Years of combat finally ended with the inconclusive Treaty of Ryswick in 1697.

On Nov. 1, 1700, Charles II of Spain died, after making a last-minute will in favor of Louis's grandson, Philip of Anjou, hoping desperately that this move would keep his far-flung empire intact. Instead, the Grand Alliance was renewed and extended, and in the warfare that followed, Louis XIV lost every major battle (Blenheim, 1704; Ramillies, 1706; Malplaquet, 1709). In the Treaty of Utrecht, April 11, 1713, which terminated the war, Louis won recognition for his grandson as King of Spain, but lost Newfoundland, Nova Scotia (Arcadia), and the Hudson Bay territory to England. Louis survived the Treaty of Utrecht by two melancholy years. The old monarch witnessed the death of four members of his family in the direct male line, so that only a frail great-grandson remained as his successor. On his deathbed he admitted to him, "I have loved war too much. Do not imitate me in that nor in the great expenses that I have incurred." His passing caused no great sorrow to an exhausted France.

Gallicanism. Louis's reign is conspicuous for struggles with the papacy over the limitations of ecclesiastical power in France and French power in Rome. Immediately upon his assumption of the government, difficulties arose out of the affair of the Corsican Guard, the Sorbonne thesis defending papal infallibility, and Colbert's efforts to increase the age for final religious vows. But the major quarrel came in the 1670s with the affair of the régale, the king's right to dispose of the revenues and benefices of vacant bishoprics. This ancient royal prerogative had never been disputed in the larger part of France. When a few provinces in the south of France claimed exemptions, earlier kings at least tacitly recognized them. Louis, however, intent on uniformity, extended these regalian rights in 1673 to the hitherto exempted provinces. Only two bishops opposed the move, François Étienne CAULET of Pamiers and Nicolas Pavillon of Alet, men of high moral integrity. The latter soon died, leaving the elderly Caulet to face the King's ire. Caulet obtained support in 1678 from Innocent XI, newly elevated to the papal throne and conscious of the dignity of Rome and past humiliations from Louis XIV. The Pope dispatched a succession of protests to the French monarch, culminating in 1679 with a clear threat of excommunication. This was countered by a declaration of the Assembly of the Clergy in 1680 that they were "bound to His Majesty by ties that nothing can break." Caulet's diocese remained in a virtual state of siege. When Louis convoked the clergy in 1682, there was promulgated the famous DECLARATION OF THE FRENCH CLERGY that, for the rest of the decade, strained relations between Versailles and the Vatican. Only with the death of Innocent XI in 1689 did a compromise become possible. Innocent XII in 1692 received a message from Louis that the "things ordained by my edict of 1682 . . . should not be observed." These Gallican Articles remained legally in force until the end of the old regime, but were a dead letter until revived by Napoleon.

The Huguenots. Louis XIV's relations with the Huguenots center upon his revocation of the Edict of Nantes, by which his grandfather, Henry IV, had granted them religious toleration on April 15, 1598. What motivated Louis's action? The Huguenots were suffering a steady attrition at the start of his reign so that, politically, they were no longer a menace. This had been proved during the Fronde, when the French Protestants remained entirely loyal to the crown. Certainly, the revocation was not the result of any deep religious feeling on the part of the King. The answer probably lies in Louis's conviction that France had to be consolidated. In the same manner that he strove to unify his state politically, economically, and culturally, he had to unify it religiously. The implied challenge of a dissident minority sect could not be tolerated. In justice to Louis XIV it should be acknowledged that the idea of tolerating a religious minority was a strange and unwelcome one in all Europe, and France was no exception. From the start of his reign, Louis was subjected to heavy pressures to solve the Protestant question. As early as 1655, the Assembly of the Clergy demanded a strict interpretation of the Edict of NANTES, meaning that Protestants should be allowed no right not specifically guaranteed. As long as Colbert remained in the ascendency, no great hardships were imposed on the Huguenots. Once he was replaced by Louvois, who was not concerned about the economic impact of the persecution, Louis came under the influence of the zealous Madame de Maintenon, although historical research has absolved her of responsibility for the revocation as it was finally effected. More important were Louis's troubles with Innocent XI. He came perilously close in 1682 to going the way of Henry VIII of England, and it is contended that this anti-Huguenot move was motivated by a desire to prove his orthodoxy to the Catholic world.

In 1682, 68 French prelates issued the Avertissement Pastoral, which was, in effect, a last warning, given with Louis's approval, to abandon Calvinism. Immediately, a large number of Protestant churches were destroyed on one pretext or another, but always under the orders of the courts of law. The following year brought a short respite because of the undeclared war that Louis fought with Spain and the Emperor. By the summer of 1684, Madame de Maintenon was writing that "the King has determined to work for the complete conversion of the heretics." Officially, Louis to the end remained a staunch opponent of the use of force. It was Foucault, the obscure intendant of Béarn, who first, and without permission from Versailles, made extensive use of the dragonnades to achieve mass conversions, at least on paper. Neighboring intendants took up his example, and by the end of the summer Chancellor Le Tellier could show the King that by simple arithmetic no significant number of Huguenots was left in France. On this basis the King signed the revocation on Oct. 18, 1685, forbidding the exercise of the reformed religion in France. Despite the prohibition of emigration, about 250,000 Huguenots left France, causing serious economic repercussions. One significant consequence of the emigration was the growth of anti-French feeling in many countries of Europe, notably England, Holland, and certain German states, with the daily arrival of Huguenot refugees.

Jansenist Question. The problem of Jansenism during the reign of Louis XIV was no older than the monarch himself. Cornelius Jansen died the year Louis was born, and some of the principal elements of the controversy unfolded while the prince was still a child. The AUGUSTINUS appeared in Paris in 1641 and was condemned by Urban VIII in the bull In eminenti in 1642, the same year in which Antoine ARNAULD's De la Fréquente Communion attacked what was universally recognized as Jesuit teaching. For the next two decades, Louis was exposed to the confusing and at times meaningless disputes made more tragic by the great goodwill and virtue of the protagonists of both sides. Louis's attitude at this time reflected the view of Cardinal Mazarin, who saw in the Jansenist movement the same elements that opposed him in the Fronde. When Louis assumed personal rule in 1661, he simply intensified Mazarin's policy. As in the case of the régale, the furor which the opposition aroused seemed disproportionate to the numbers involved. By the mid-1660s only four bishops, including Caulet of Pamiers and Pavillon of Alet, and a handful of nuns and theologians at PORT-ROYAL refused to sign the formulary against Jansenist tenets. To conciliate both sides, Clement IX, weary from the conflict, drew up a compromise statement that even the four bishops and Antoine Arnauld himself could in conscience sign, thus initiating the Clementine Peace of 1669.

The peace of 30 years terminated with the emergence of the rash and intemperate Pasquier QUESNEL. His widely read Réflexions morales sur le Nouveau Testament, restating virtually the whole of Jansenist theology, occasioned an intense battle of pamphlets. Louis XIV saw in revived Jansenism a challenge to his own political authority, since it merged with a movement of growing general criticism aimed at the King. Clement XI was asked by Louis XIV to pronounce formal condemnations, which appeared in the dogmatic constitutions Vineam Domini Sabaoth of July 16, 1705, and most notably in the fateful Unigenitus of Sept. 8, 1713, which censured 101 verbatim propositions of Quesnel. When the nuns of Port-Royal repeated their earlier intransigence, Louis in 1710 ordered the demolition of their ancient buildings and their dispersion. At Louis XIV's death, 2,000 people were held in jail on charges of Jansenism.

See Also: GALLICANISM; JANSENISM.

Bibliography: P. R. DOOLIN, The Fronde (Cambridge, Mass. 1935). D. OGG, Louis XIV (London 1933). J. ORCIBAL, Louis XIV contre Innocent XI (Paris 1949); Louis XIV et les Protestants (Paris 1951). C. GÉRIN, Louis XIV et le Saint-Siège, 2 v. (Paris 1894). L. O'BRIEN, Innocent XI and the Revocation of The Edict of Nantes (Berkeley 1930). P. GAXOTTE, La France de Louis XIV (Paris 1946). W. C. SCOVILLE, The Persecution of the Huguenots and French Economic Development, 1680–1720 (Berkeley 1960).

[L. L. BERNARD]

LOUIS XV, KING OF FRANCE

Reigned 1715 to 1774; b. Versailles, Feb. 15, 1710; d. Versailles, May 10, 1774. Louis XIV's will left him under the care of Marshall Villeroi and Bishop André FLEURY, but the Duke of Orleans assumed the regency. In 1721 Louis fell seriously ill amid rumors that the regent, and heir-apparent, had poisoned him. He recovered and was crowned in 1722 and declared of age in 1723. In 1722 the four-year-old Spanish infanta came to Versailles as the betrothed of the king, but after the death of the Duke of Orleans in 1723, the new regent, the Duke of Bourbon, sent her back to Spain, needlessly angering Philip V and his queen, Elizabeth Farnese. Louis then married Maria Leszczynska, daughter of the deposed king of Poland. France enjoyed peace and prosperity during the administration of Cardinal Fleury (1726–43), thanks to whom Jansenist opposition to the papal bull UNIGENITUS was silenced in 1730. During the War of the Austrian Succession (1740–48) Louis went to the front but fell ill in Metz. On his recovery he was called le bienaimé, but his decline in popularity dates from the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748.

Mistresses had a fair influence in his reign after 1745. The Marquise de Pompadour favored the alliance with Austria before the Seven Years War. Difficulties between the king and Parlement and between Parlement and the Church were not resolved, nor did Louis take any action against the criticism of the philosophes. Du-Barry succeeded Pompadour in 1764 and intrigued against the prime minister, E. F. de Choiseul. The Jesuits were expelled in 1764 and suppressed in 1773. Finances were not repaired, and France lost prestige abroad. Louis died with the Sacraments, repentant of his faults, as his daughter, LOUISE OF FRANCE, had prayed.

Bibliography: P. GAXOTTE, Louis the Fifteenth and His Times (Philadelphia 1934). P. MURET, La Prépondérance anglaise, 1715–1763 (3d ed. Paris 1949). G. P. GOOCH, Louis XV: The Monarchy in Decline (New York 1956).

[W. E. LANGLEY]

LOUIS D' ALEMAN, BL.

Cardinal archbishop; b. Arbent-en-Bugey, c. 1390; d. Salonne, near Arles, France, Sept. 17, 1450. Educated in theology and Canon Law, he rose rapidly in the Church. Pope MARTIN V attached him to his person and entrusted him with difficult assignments at the Council of Siena. Louis later took a leading role at the Council of Basel, nominating Amadeus VIII of Savoy as antipope Felix V (1439). For this he was excommunicated by EUGENE IV. After the death of the pope, Felix resigned in favor of the newly elected NICHOLAS V, who forgave all connected with the schism. Louis recanted and was restored to his dignities. He died the following year with a reputation for sanctity. He was proclaimed blessed by Pope CLEMENT VII in 1527.

Feast: Sept. 16 (formerly 17).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 5:436–462. Gallia Christiana (Paris 1715–85) 3:787–830, 1312–79. G. PÉROUSE, Le Cardinal Louis Aleman, président du concile de Bâle et la fin du grand schisme (Paris 1904). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:573–575. J. GILL, The Council of Florence (Cambridge, England 1959) 67–71, 310–317. J. WODKA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:302–303.

[D. S. BUCZEK]

Louis XV, King of France. (Archive Photos)

to the service of the working people. In order to foster their cause and protect their interest he instituted societies and popular banks and founded also the periodical Union économique. He followed as an ideal the Bl. BERNARDINO OF FELTRE, concerning whose life and social activities he wrote two volumes: Le B. Bernardin de Feltre (Tours 1902). At the same time he was interested also in spirituality. In this field he wrote, among other works: Éclair-cissement sur les oeuvres mystiques de S. Jean de la Croix (Paris 1893), which was translated into English under the title Light on Mount Carmel (London 1926); La Science de la prière (Paris 1903). The persecution of the religious orders (1903) forced him into exile.

Bibliography: HILAIRE DE BARENTON, Le P. Ludovic de Besse, 2 v. (v.1, Paris 1913; v.2, Arras 1935). Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 994.

[G. GÁL]

LOUIS OF BESSE

Capuchin pioneer of the social apostolate; b. Bessesur-Issole, France, Oct. 17, 1831; d. San Remo, Italy, Oct. 8, 1910. Before entering the Capuchins (1851) as alumnus of the Paris province, he was called Alphons Eliseus Chaix. After his ordination (1858) he dedicated himself

LOUIS OF CASORIA, VEN.

Religious founder; b. Casoria (Napoli), Italy, March 11, 1814; d. Posillipo, near Naples, March 30, 1885. After joining the Franciscans (Alcantarines) in 1832, Arcangelo Palmentieri took the name Louis. As a priest he taught physics, mathematics, and philosophy until 1837

when the scope of his apostolic labors broadened. In the following years he established an association for clerical and lay intellectuals to promote a Catholic cultural revival and started the periodical Carità. He also opened a hospital for priests, an institute to house street urchins and another in Assisi for blind, deaf, and mute children, a home for elderly fishermen in Posillipo, and many other centers for charitable assistance and Catholic activities throughout the peninsula.

In Florence, he fostered the building of the first church in Italy dedicated to the Sacred Heart. From 1858 he became much interested in missions and went to Egypt for a time. Pius IX and Leo XIII, who both esteemed him highly, entrusted him with diplomatic tasks. To carry on his apostolate, he founded the Brothers of Charity at Naples in 1859; they were called Frati Bigi because of their gray attire. Originally the members were laymen without vows, but later the founder admitted priests as well as laymen to help educate poor children. The congregation, approved in 1896 by the Holy See, had 63 members in 1963. Louis of Casoria also founded the Gray Sisters of St. Elizabeth (1862). The decree introducing his beatification cause was issued in 1907.

Bibliography: A. CAPECELATRO, Vita del ven. p. L. da Casoria (Naples 1887). L. LE MONNIER, Vie du père L. de Casoria (Paris 1892). L. FABIANI, Vita del ven. p. L. da Casoria (Naples 1931).

[F. G. SOTTOCORNOLA]

LOUIS OF GRANADA

Dominican spiritual writer; b. Louis de Sarriá, Granada, Spain, 1504; d. Lisbon, Dec. 31, 1588. The death of his father in 1509 left Louis and his mother in such poverty that they had to beg food at the Dominican priory of the Holy Cross. On June 15, 1524, Louis received the Dominican habit at the priory of the Holy Cross and after his year of novitiate he spent the next four years at the same priory, studying philosophy and theology. In 1529 he was sent for advanced study to the college of St. Gregory at Valladolid. Here he changed his name to Louis of Granada. During his stay at Valladolid he was exposed to three influences: Thomistic SCHOLASTICISM, Christian HUMANISM as expounded by Francisco de VITORIA, and zeal for the apostolate of preaching as exemplified by SAVONAROLA. Louis preferred to be a preacher rather than a professor. When he was on the point of being sent to the Americas as a missionary, there was a change of plan, and his provincial assigned him to restore the abandoned Dominican priory at Escalacaeli, near Córdoba.

Louis soon became renowned as a preacher in the area of Córdoba and in 1538 he was selected as the Lenten preacher at the cathedral. In 1539 the general chapter of the Dominican Order invited him to a professorship at Valladolid, but Louis declined. Gradually he lost interest in academic life and speculative theology and was drawn more to preaching and writing.

Some time after 1547 Louis became prior at Badajoz and began to preach in neighboring Portugal. The prince cardinal, son of Don Manuel I of Portugal, obtained him as confessor and chaplain in 1551 and Louis soon became confessor to Queen Catherine of Portugal, sister of Charles V. During this period he began to write in earnest, and between 1554 and 1559 he published 12 books. In April of 1556 he was elected provincial of Portugal. Later he was offered the archbishopric of Braga, which carried with it the title of primate of Portugal, but he refused the honor and arranged that it be given to Bartholomew de los Mártires. In 1559, through the efforts of Melchior CANO, books by Louis and his former professor, Carranza, later archbishop of Toledo, were placed on the Index. The books were subsequently approved by Pius IV and in 1562 the chapter of the Dominican Order conferred on Louis the title of master of sacred theology. In his later years, afflicted with failing health and partial blindness, Louis was unwillingly involved in court intrigues in Lisbon. He settled the dispute between Don Sebastian and Queen Catherine in 1568. Shortly thereafter, his book on prayer was again brought before the Spanish Inquisition, but for a second time Louis was exonerated. Queen Catherine died in 1568, and Don Sebastian was killed in battle that same year.

Although the aged cardinal, who had been Louis' penitent, was the successor to the Portuguese throne, the nobility demanded that he abdicate or obtain permission to marry and thus provide a successor. Three pretenders claimed the throne: Catherine of Braganza; Anthony, the natural son of the Infante Louis; and Philip II of Spain. As soon as the cardinal died, Anthony claimed the throne and Philip II sent the duke of Alba to conquer Portugal. A false papal brief was sent to Louis, appointing him vicar provincial, and this action resulted in placing him in disfavor with Philip II. The king pardoned him, however, when he learned of the fraudulence of the document. Another source of distress for Louis was a Dominican nun of Lisbon, Sor Maria de la Visitación, who claimed to have received the stigmata on March 7, 1584. Her statement was accepted by the Inquisition, the master general of the Dominican Order, and even by Gregory XIII. Louis was told to write her biography, which he compiled from documents provided him by the nun and her confessor. But when in 1588 it was discovered that the case involved fraud or delusion, the scandal was the occasion of Louis's last sermon, in which he spoke upon the theme of sinners in public life.

Louis has enjoyed fame as a spiritual writer and especially for his doctrine on the practice of prayer. He was one of the first ascetical writers to formulate a method of prayer for the laity. He used as his sources Sacred Scripture, the Fathers of the Church, Thomistic theology, St. Catherine of Siena, Savonarola, Bautista de Crema, and the spiritual writers of the Rhineland, especially Tauler. Granada's doctrine was primarily Christocentric, and his spiritual methods were seven: the practice of prayer, cultivation of virtue, contempt for the world, contemplation of God in nature, the practice of mortification, obedience to the Commandments and use of the Sacraments, and imitation of the saints. Granada emphasized throughout his writings that all Christians are called to become Christlike and to strive for perfection, and on this point he was condemned by Melchior Cano and the Inquisition. His works are noted for their literary quality. They have been translated into many languages and can be found in every land. The saints who were influenced by his teaching include Charles Borromeo, Francis de Sales, Alphonsus Liguori, Rose of Lima, Teresa of Avila, Louise de Marillac, and Vincent de Paul.

The most important and most widely diffused works of Louis of Granada are Libro de la oración y meditación (1544; definitive text, 1566); Guía de pecadores (1567); Memorial de la vida cristiana (1565); Adiciones al memorial (1574); Introducción del símbolo de la fe (1583).

Bibliography: E. A. PEERS, Studies of the Spanish Mystics, 2 v. (New York 1927–30) 1:31–76. L. DE GRANADA, Summa of the Christian Life, tr. J. AUMANN, 3 v. (St. Louis 1954–58) 1:xvii–xxxvii. R. L. OECHSLIN, Louis of Granada (St. Louis 1962). A. HUERGA, "Ascetical Methods of Louis of Granada," Cross and Crown 3 (1951): 72–91.

[J. AUMANN]

LOUISE DE MARILLAC, ST.

Cofounder of the Daughters of Charity; b. probably at Ferrières-en-Brie, near Meaux, France, Aug. 12, 1591; d. Paris, March 15, 1660. Although she was a member of the powerful de Marillac family and well educated, she led an unhappy childhood as an introspective, melancholy girl of poor health. She was married to Antoine Le Gras on Feb. 5, 1613; in October of the same year, she gave birth to her only child, Michel, who was to cause her much heartache. She was widowed on Dec. 21, 1625. At some earlier time she had come under the influence of St. VINCENT DE PAUL, who was her spiritual director. By 1629 her interior life was firmly established, and Vincent started her in exterior work by sending her to make an inspection tour of the Confraternities of Charity that he had established in the provinces. To better care for the poor, Louise assembled a few country girls in her own home in Paris in 1633, where she trained them in piety and in the service of the poor. Thus began the Daughters of Charity. Louise devoted the rest of her life to the formation of the Daughters of Charity and to the supervision of the works entrusted to her by Vincent: the care of foundlings, galley slaves, aged persons, poor children, and the insane, as well as other charitable activities. Her body now rests under an altar in the motherhouse of the Daughters of Charity, Paris. Having been beatified on May 9, 1920, she was canonized on March 11, 1934, and on Feb. 10, 1960, was named patron of all those who devote themselves to Christian social work.

Feast: March 15.

Bibliography: Letters of St. Louise de Marillac, tr. H. M. LAW (Emmitsburg, Md. 1972). Vincent de Paul and Louise de Marillac: Rules, Conferences, and Writings, ed. F. RYAN and J. E. RYBOLT (New York 1995). A. RICHOMME, Sainte Louise de Marillac (Paris 1961). J. CALVET, Louise de Marillac: A Portrait, tr. G. F. PULLEN (New York 1959). M. D. POINSENET, De l'anxiété à la sainteté: Louise de Marillac (Paris 1958). M. FLINTON, Sainte Louise de Marillac: L'Aspect social de son oeuvre, (Tournai 1957) tr. by Flinton as Louise de Marillac: Social Aspects of Her Work (New Rochelle, N.Y. 1992), bibliography. P. COSTE, Life and Works of St. Vincent de Paul, tr. J. LEONARD, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1952). E. CHARPY, Petite vie de Louise de Marillac (Paris 1991); Spiritualité de Louise de Marillac (Paris 1995). L. SULLIVAN, The Core Values of Vincentian education (Niagara University, N.Y. 1994). K. B. LAFLEUR, Louise de Marillac (Hyde Park, NY 1996).

[M. A. ROCHE]

LOUISE OF FRANCE (THÉRÈSE DE ST. AUGUSTIN), VEN.

Daughter of Louis XV of France and Maria Leszczynska; b. Versailles, July 15, 1737; d. St. Denis, Dec. 23, 1787. She was educated at the Convent of FONTEVRAULT as a child, and at 14 came to court where she led a pious life. In 1770, after the death of her mother, she entered the Carmelite Convent of Saint-Denis. As novice mistress and prioress, she devoted herself to penances to bring about the conversion of her father; she was noted for her devotion to the observance of the rule and to the Church. The cause of her beatification was introduced in 1873. Her Eucharistic Meditations and her spiritual testaments for her Carmelite daughters were published after her death, and her letters were published by M. Faucon in 1878.

Bibliography: C. A. GEOFFROY DE GRANDMAISON, Madame Louise de France (2d ed. Paris 1925). J. LENFANT, Chez Madame Louise de France (Paris 1936). A. HOFMEISTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1930–38) 6:707. G. MESTERS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1202.

[W. E. LANGLEY]

LOUISE OF SAVOY, BL.

Widow, Poor Clare; b. Dec. 28, 1462; d. Orbe, Switzerland, July 24, 1503 (feast, July 24). She was the daughter of Bl. Amadeus of Savoy and Yolanda of France, and thus the granddaughter of King Charles VII and the niece of Louis XI. Louise wished to become a religious but, obedient to her parents' will, married Hugh of Orléans in 1479. They lived an exemplary Christian life together at the Château de Nozeray until Hugh died, July 3, 1490. During the next two years, Louise prepared to retire from the world. After distributing her fortune, she, together with her maids of honor, Catherine de Saulx and Charlotte de Saint-Maurice, entered (June 1492) the monastery of Poor Clares at Orbe, Switzerland, a convent founded by Hugh's mother, and rendered illustrious by the reform of St. COLETTE in 1427. Professed in 1493, she became an exemplary religious and as abbess was noted for her hospitality to the Franciscan friars. Her remains were transferred to Nozeray in 1531 and to the chapel of the royal palace, Turin, in 1842. Gregory XVI confirmed her cult, Aug. 12, 1839.

Feast: July 24.

Bibliography: A.M. JEANNERET, ed., Vie de très haulte. . . Madame Loyse de Savoye . . . escripte en 1507 par une religieuse (Geneva 1860). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 7:601–606. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER. 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:518–519. D. STÖCKERL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1202.

[M.G. MCNEIL]

LOUISIANA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in the south central United States, Louisiana was admitted to the Union as the 18th state on April 30, 1812. The area now comprising the state was once part of the immense Louisiana Territory claimed in 1682 by Robert Cavelier, Sieur de La Salle, for France and was under the successive control of Antoine Crozat (1712–17), John Law's Company of the West (1717–31), and the French Crown (1731–62); it then became a Spanish possession (1762–1801), was returned to France (1800–03), and was sold to the United States and governed as a territory (1804–12). Baton Rouge is the capital and New Orleans is the largest city.

In 2001 Catholics numbered about 1.3 million, slightly more than 31 percent of the total state population of 4,321,980. The ecclesiastical province of New Orleans coincides with the state boundaries. New Orleans is the metropolitan see and the other six Louisiana dioceses—

ALEXANDRIA, BATON ROUGE, Houma-Thibodaux, LA-FAYETTE, Lake Charles, and Shreveport—are its suffragans. Catholics are concentrated mainly in the southern part of the state. Lafayette has a higher proportion of Catholics (65 percent) than any other diocese in the United States, and with New Orleans has one of the highest populations of African American Catholics in the nation.

Colonization and Missionary History. The discovery, colonization, settlement, history, and economic growth of the state are associated with its waterways, principally the Mississippi River. Hernando De Soto discovered it in 1541; La Salle went down the Mississippi from the Illinois in 1682; Pierre Lemoyne, Sieur de Iberville, sailed up the river from the Gulf of Mexico in 1699; and his brother, Jean Baptiste Lemoyne, Sieur de Bienville, in 1722 transferred the capital of French Louisiana from New Biloxi on the Gulf Coast to a bend of the river that gives to New Orleans its sobriquet of "Crescent City." The 1718 plans of the city, laid by Adrien de Pauger, provided for a church and presbytery, but divine services were held only in improvised and inadequate quarters until April 1727, when the first substantial St. Louis parish church was finally completed. Franciscan recollects, Zénobe Membré and Anastase Douay, were with La Salle when he reached the mouth of the Mississippi and the territory was placed under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the bishop of Quebec. Priests of the Quebec Seminary, connected with the Seminary of Foreign Missions in Paris, worked among the Native Americans of lower Louisiana in the late 1600s and early 1700s. François de Montigny, Antoine Davion, and Jean François Buisson de St. Cosmé were outstanding pioneer missionaries. Buisson, regarded as the first American-born missionary martyr, was killed in 1706 by a party of Chitimacha tribe members a few miles below Donaldsonville on the Mississippi River. In 1717 the Franciscan Antonio MARGIL offered the first Mass in Natchitoches, Louisiana's oldest town (1715), and ministered to its French settlers and Native American inhabitants. In 1724, three years before New Orleans had its own substantial church building, a chapel was erected about 35 miles upstream at present-day Killona on the German Coast (Les Allemands). The first chapel of the state was built in 1700 by the Bayagoula tribe under the supervision of Fr. Paul du Ru at the site of present-day Bayou Goula in Iberville Parish (county), which the Jesuit missionary had reached by way of the Mississippi.

Catholicism made little progress during the five years when Antione Crozat, a French financier, attempted to exploit the region. In 1717 the Council of the Marine recommended turning the colony over to John Law's Company of the West and its successor, the Company of the Indies (or Mississippi Company). In accordance with the charter issued by the regent, Philip II, duke of Orleans, religious affairs were included in the activities of the Company of the West from 1717 to 1731. Occasionally, concession chaplains, Jesuits, Capuchins, Carmelites, and other missionaries traveled up and down the river during the early years of colonization. The first Capuchins were Bruno de Langres, who arrived in New Orleans toward the end of 1722, and Plilibert de Vianden, who took charge of the district from the Chapitoulas. The district extended a few miles above the original boundaries of the city, to Pointe Coupée. It included Les Allemands, the German Coast, and the intervening concessions. Les Allemands had a chapel, dedicated to St. John, on the west bank of the Mississippi as early as 1724. Most land grants were along the Mississippi River and other bodies of water, such as Bayou St. John and Lake Pontchartrain. On the Mississippi, itself, the land grants stretched from Chapitoulas to Point Coupee about 140 miles upstream. From the parochial centers established along the river, priests plied the Mississippi and other streams or pushed into the interior to build chapels and start missions from which emerged the later parishes. At the confluence of the Mississippi River and Bayou Lafourche, Capuchins and, later, Vincentians, descended in pirogues from the Plattenville Assumption Church (1793) and Seminary (1838) to lay the foundation of bayou parishes. In 1722 the Jesuits, who contributed notably to the spiritual and economic well-being of the area, undertook the spiritual jurisdiction of the natives in the colony, a responsibility entrusted to them by Bishop Louis DUPLESSIS-MORNAY of Quebec. Their endeavors were supported in large measure by an extensive indigo and sugar plantation adjacent to New Orleans. In July 1763, while Michel Baudouin was superior, the Jesuits were dispossessed of their property and banished from Louisiana. Their departure, some ten years before the society was suppressed, seriously hampered and retarded the growth of the Church in colonial Louisiana.

The arrival of the French-speaking Acadians, expelled from Nova Scotia in the mid-1750s, was a boon to the state and a blessing to the Church in Louisiana. As early as 1758, Acadians reached Louisiana by way of Georgia, the Carolinas, and Maryland. During the following years several hundred—including groups from New England, the Antilles, and French ports—migrated to the state. They settled in St. Martinville (Les Attakapas) on Bayou Têche, in the Poste des Opelousas, a few miles from the Têche, and along the Mississippi below Baton Rouge. At St. Gabriel, Iberville Parish, they deposited the precious parish registers of St. Charles Church, Grand Pré (1688–1755). Those who settled along Les Allemands soon intermarried with the descendants of the original settlers—almost all Catholics—from the Low

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of New Orleans	1850
Diocese of Alexandria	1986
Diocese of Baton Rouge	1961
Diocese of Houma-Thibodaux	1977
Diocese of Lafayette	1918
Diocese of Lake Charles	1980
Diocese of Shreveport	1986

Countries, Switzerland, Alsace Lorraine, and the Rhineland. The Acadians and other French-speaking Louisianians generally retained their Catholic faith, despite a dire shortage of priests and churches. With other settlers, who followed them to Les Attakapas and the Opelousas District, they formed a cluster of parishes in St. Martinville (1765); Opelousas (1777); Grand Coteau (1819); Lafayette, formerly Vermilionville (1821); and New Iberia (1838). In the central and northern areas of the state, the Church made smaller gains than elsewhere. Except in the civil parishes of Natchitoches, Avoyelles, and Rapides, the inhabitants were and still are mostly Protestants of Anglo-Saxon descent.

In 1769, Spanish troops took control of New Orleans and the Louisiana Territory which was ceded to Spain by the Treaty of Fontainbleau. After 1776, Church affairs in New Orleans were greatly influenced by the Spanish. Cirillo de Barcelona, chaplain of the Spanish expedition against the British in West Florida, was consecrated auxiliary bishop for the Louisiana colony on March 6, 1785. Shortly before leaving for his consecration in Cuba, he appointed his assistant, Antonio de SEDELLA, temporary pastor of St. Louis. For decades thereafter, Sedella, known as Père Antoine, was the center of controversy in the area.

Church Expansion. When the Diocese of Louisiana and the Floridas was created in 1793, Luis Ignacio de PE-NALVER Y CARDENAS was consecrated as first ordinary. He arrived in New Orleans on July 17, 1795, marking the beginning of home government in Church affairs. Peñalver noted in a report to the Spanish government, that of the 11,000 Catholics in New Orleans, only about 400 had performed their Easter Duty. He instituted a number of necessary reforms, combated religious indifference, and Voltaireanism, and established parishes in such places as the Poste des Avoyelles, Many (Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe at Bayou Scie), and Monroe. Meanwhile, the parish church in use since 1727 had been destroyed in the great fire of 1788 and a new structure, the future Cathedral of St. Louis, was completed in 1794. Although renovated several times, it remains substantially the same building, still in use as the cathedral. In December 1964 it became a Minor Basilica.

Cemetery candles on All Saints' Day, Lacombe, Louisiana. (©Philip Gould/CORBIS)

In 1801 Peñalver was transferred to the Archdiocese of Guatemala and jurisdictional quarrels, interdiction, and threats of schism marked the next 15 years in New Orleans. Père Antoine was at odds with Fr. Patrick Walsh and Canon Thomas Hasset, who attempted to administer the diocese during the episcopal vacancy. When Hasset died on April 24, 1804, the last canonical link of the Louisiana Church with Spain was extinguished. Walsh claimed to be vicar-general of Louisiana which precipitated a two-year schism between his followers and those of Père Antoine, who was "elected" pastor of St. Louis Cathedral the following year by the majority of New Orleans's citizens under the direction of the church wardens (marguilliers). To complicate matters further, Spain ceded Louisiana back to France, which in turn, sold it to the United States in 1803. Aware of the territorial transfer, the Holy See decided not to send Bishop-elect Francisco Porro y Peinado to Louisiana, and on Sept. 1, 1805, placed it temporarily under the spiritual supervision of Bishop John CARROLL of Baltimore. Carroll, in time, named the chaplain of the Ursulines, Jean Olivier, his vicar-general, but the latter's authority was openly challenged by Père Antione and the cathedral wardens. Finally, on Aug. 18, 1812, Fr. Louis William DUBOURG was named administrator apostolic by Archbishop Carroll. It was DuBourg, complying with Andrew Jackson's request, who officiated at a Te Deum in St. Louis Cathedral following the U.S. victory over the British at the Battle of New Orleans on Jan. 8, 1815. An all-night vigil before Our Lady of Prompt Succor was held at the Ursuline convent chapel before the battle; Jackson personally thanked the nuns for their prayers at the thanksgiving service presided over by DuBourg.

On Sept. 24, 1815, DuBourg was consecrated in Rome and Louisiana finally had a bishop after an interregnum of nearly 15 years. DuBourg, however, remained in Europe for the next two years enlisting the help of priests and seminarians. He successfully acquired the services of St. Rose Philippine DUCHESNE, who visited New Orleans and the Religious of the Sacred Heart, and helped form the organization that eventually became the Pontifical Society for the Propagation of the Faith. Upon arriving in the United States, DuBourg went to St. Louis, MO, and didn't return to New Orleans until late 1820. The next year he called a synod, which was attended by 20 priests. On March 25, 1824, Joseph ROSATI, C.M. was consecrated as DuBourg's coadjutor, but his administration of the Church in New Orleans amounted to supervision at a distance, since he resided in St. Louis. A significant event of the period was the arrival of the Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, MD, to staff the Poydras Asylum in New Orleans. It was the first of numerous educational, social, and health care facilities in Louisiana, including Hôtel Dieu. DuBourg resigned in mid-1826 and returned to France, where he died in 1833 as archbishop of Besançon. A further division of the old diocese took place with St. Louis, MO becoming the see of the northern area, while the Diocese of New Orleans became co-extensive with the state boundaries of Louisiana. DuBourg's resignation left the lower end of the Mississippi Valley without a resident bishop which caused further disorder. Although Rosati visited the area he could not completely control the see. Rosati, appointed bishop of St. Louis in 1827, in time recommended a fellow Vincentian for the See of New Orleans, and Leo de Neckere was consecrated in St. Louis Cathedral on June 24, 1830 at the age of 29. His episcopate was brief, for he was stricken with yellow fever and died on Sept. 5, 1833. A few months before, he had established New Orleans's second parish, St. Patrick's, to accommodate the Irish immigrants and other English-speaking people of the city.

A remarkable period of church expansion coincided with the growing importance of New Orleans as a center of commerce and expanding population. The city, emerging as the fourth largest in the nation, increased in population from 29,737 in 1830 to 102,193 in 1840. The diocese covered the entire state, and had a total population approaching 300,000, served by 26 churches and 27 priests when Antoine BLANC became fourth bishop on Nov. 22, 1835. During the 25 years Blanc administered the see, the number of churches increased to 73 and the number of priests to 92. He established Assumption Seminary on Bayou Lafourche, two colleges, nine academies and schools, four orphanages, a hospital, and a home for girls. Under the guidance of Etienne Rousselon, vicargeneral, the Sisters of the Holy Family was founded by a free African-American woman, Henriette Delille, in 1842. It was a community committed to teaching, caring for orphans, and tending to elderly African Americans. The Redemptorist Fathers established themselves (1843) in Lafayette and New Orleans where German, Irish, and French immigrants had settled. Of the Redemptorists, Blessed Francis Xavier SEELOS died and was buried in New Orleans in 1865. In 1836, while abroad recruiting priests and religious for his diocese, Blanc persuaded the Father General of the Jesuits in Rome to release eight members of the society for service in Louisiana, guaranteeing the return of a Jesuit presence to the area after nearly three-quarters of a century. In 1837 they established themselves in Grand Coteau, building St. Charles College for their novitiate. They also took charge of Sacred Heart Church and parish, which embraced a wide territory in the west. The Jesuit Fathers opened the College of the Immaculate Conception in 1849 on a plot of ground that had once formed part of the plantation of which they had been defrauded in 1763. The Congregation of the Holy Cross came in 1849 to stabilize St. Mary Orphan Boys Home, which had been opened by Fr. Adam Kindelon, first pastor of St. Patrick's. Fr. Cyril de la Croix organized the first conference of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul after a layman, William Blair Lancaster, brought a manual of the society to New Orleans (1852).

Blanc called two diocesan synods and two provincial councils. The death of Abbé Louis Moni, pastor of St. Louis Cathedral in 1842, precipitated a three-year struggle between Blanc and the wardens of the cathedral over the right to appoint clergy; the controversy, which caused the withdrawal of the clergy from the cathedral, eventually was settled in the Louisiana supreme court in favor of the bishop, and shaped the pattern of parish establishment for several decades, abolishing the trustee system.

Diocesan Developments. In 1850, Pope Pius IX raised New Orleans to the rank of an archdiocese and created the Province of New Orleans which included all of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, Alabama, Texas, and part of Indian Territory (Oklahoma). Three years later, the upper part of Louisiana state was erected into the Diocese of Natchitoches with Auguste M. Martin as its first bishop. The new diocese had but five priests and five churches to serve the Catholic population of about 25,000, spread throughout the entire northern half of Louisiana. After Blanc's death on June 20, 1860, the archdiocese was administered by Rouselon until the arrival of Archbishop-elect Jean Marie ODIN from Galveston, TX.

Archbishop Odin took possession of his see only a few days after the bombardment of Ft. Sumter on April 12, 1861. Louisiana had already seceded from the Union and joined the Confederacy. During the Civil War, the archbishop's position was an extremely delicate one, calling for infinite tact and diplomacy; Pope Pius IX appointed Odin and Archbishop Hughes of New York his personal intermediaries for trying to effect a reconciliation between the North and South. The times grew more trying after the city was occupied by Federal troops on May 1, 1862. Union forces wrought considerable damage on Church properties in such places as Vermilionville (Lafayette), Pointe Coupée and Donaldsonville. In addition, the war years witnessed a disruption of religious and educational work in Thibodaux, Convent, Plaquemine, Grand Coteau, and elsewhere. Reconstruction was no less trying, but Odin continued the expansion program of his predecessor. In 1863, Odin went to Europe in search of men and money for his diocese. He convinced the Marist Fathers to come to the U.S. and work in Louisiana. In 1867 the Oblate Sisters of Providence, a Baltimore community of African-American nuns, began staffing a home for dependent children of the newly freed slaves. The Little Sisters of the Poor opened their home for the aged poor after a committee of pious women, called Les Dames de la Providence, asked for their help in maintaining another home for the aged founded in 1840. The Brothers of the Sacred Heart came to New Orleans from Mobile, AL in 1869. The first Benedictine convent in the archdiocese was opened (1870) in the German national parish of Holy Trinity, New Orleans (1847). The nuns arrived from Covington, KY, and later established a motherhouse in Covington, LA. After numerous requests for assistance, Odin finally obtained a coadjutor with right of succession, Napoleon Joseph Perché, who had been chaplain of the Ursulines for many years, founder of the first Catholic newspaper in Louisiana, Le Propagateur Catholique (1842), and vicar-general of the archdiocese. He was consecrated in St. Louis Cathedral on May 1, 1870, and succeeded to the see when Odin died in France on May 25, 1870, after attending the First Vatican Council with Bishop Martin of Natchitoches.

Like his predecessors, Perché invited several communities to the archdiocese: the Sisters of the Most Holy Sacrament (formerly Perpetual Adoration), who arrived at Waggaman in 1872; the Sisters of Christian Charity, who established themselves at St. Henry's Convent, New Orleans in 1873; and the Discalced Carmelite Nuns, who arrived in 1877. In addition, Archbishop Perché approved the founding of a diocesan community, the Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, organized on July 11, 1874 in Labadieville with Elvina Vienne as first superior. Soon after his installation as head of the see, Perché also inaugurated a costly program of church building, school construction, and parish foundations that contrasted sharply with the record of his predecessor. These expenses, plus financial aid to families impoverished by the Civil War, caused the archdiocese's debt to soar. Weakened by age and infirmities, and overwhelmed by the tremendous debt, the archbishop asked for a coadjutor. The Holy See appointed François Xavier Leray of Natchitoches, who became archbishop upon Perché's death on Dec. 27, 1883. Bishop Leray was succeeded in Natchitoches by Bishop Antoine Durier, who was instrumental in establishing a Catholic School Board and Catholic schools near every church in his diocese. Leray's chief concern as coadjutor and as ordinary was the reduction of the archdiocese's debt, so his administration was practically without building or expansion programs. The only new community established in the archdiocese was that of the Poor Clare Nuns (1885). Upon his death on Sept. 23, 1887, Leray was succeeded by Francis Janssens, the Dutch-born bishop of Natchez.

The new archbishop received the pallium from Cardinal James Gibbons on May 8, 1889, although he had actually taken possession of the archdiocese on Sept. 16, 1888. He invited the Benedictines of St. Meinrad's Abbey in Indiana to open a seminary for the training of native priests. Fr. Luke Grüwe, O.S.B. established in 1890, what later became St. Joseph Abbey and Seminary at St. Benedict, LA. Janssens dedicated the seminary on Sept. 3, 1891. The archbishop welcomed St. Frances Xavier Cabrini to New Orleans, and encouraged her in 1892 to establish a school and orphanage to assist the children of Italian immigrants; thousands were entering the city. In 1893, he asked the Sisters of the Holy Family to care for dependent or neglected African-American boys, and thus started the present Lafon Home for Boys, one of several institutions named for the local African-American philanthropist, Thomy Lafon.

Janssens was greatly esteemed throughout the archdiocese, which numbered 341,613 in the centennial year of 1893. The celebration that year attracted many dignitaries to Louisiana, including Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore. He encouraged spiritual ministrations to patients at the leprosarium at Carville, LA. When the hurricane of 1893 swept the Louisiana Gulf Coast, Janssens went among the Italian, Spanish, and Malay fishermen in the island settlements in a small boat to comfort them; he later helped to rebuild their homes. He promoted devotion to Our Lady under the title of Prompt Succor. The structure of the parishes was determined in 1894 when each was legally incorporated with the archbishop, the vicar-general, the pastor, and two lay directors as board members. Janssens was the first ordinary to promote native vocations on a large scale; his predecessors generally had depended on priests and seminarians from Europe, and had leaned heavily on religious to staff new parishes. He sponsored the Catholic Winter School, opened parochial schools, and launched a dozen new parishes. Alarmed at the defections from the faith among African Americans, he established St. Katherine's as an African-American parish, but on a temporary basis, since he did not want to promote racial segregation. He died on June 9, 1897, while traveling to Europe on behalf of the archdiocese.

Placide Louis CHAPELLE, sixth archbishop of New Orleans, was transferred from Santa Fe, NM in February 1898. Concerned about the archdiocese's debt, he ordered the annual contribution of 12 percent of the revenues of each parish for five years. This measure eventually liquidated the longstanding debt, although it aroused the displeasure of some pastors. Chapelle's relationship with the priests in the diocese was strained. Many of them born and educated in France, were upset by his extended, though necessary, absences as Apostolic Delegate to Cuba and Puerto Rico, and later as Apostolic Delegate Extraordinary to the Philippines, where Chappelle was needed to negotiate ecclesiastical problems arising from the Spanish-American War. It was evident that he needed an auxiliary and one was provided when the pastor of Annunciation Church in New Orleans, Gustave Rouxel, was consecrated on April 9, 1899. Archbishop Chapelle opened a theological seminary (1900) with the Vincentian Fathers as professors. Some 12 parishes and missions were established during Chapelle's episcopate and the Dominicans began their ministry in the archdiocese (1903). Chapelle died a victim of yellow fever on Aug. 9, 1905.

The next ordinary, James Hubert Blenk, S.M. was well known to the archdiocese long before his appointment on April 20, 1906. He had served as bishop of Puerto Rico, former auditor and secretary to the apostolic delegation to the West Indies, rector of Holy Name of Mary Church, and president of Jefferson College, Convent, LA. Blenk, an ardent promoter of Catholic education, set up in 1908 the first archdiocesan school board and appointed the first superintendent of schools. In 1914, he hosted the National Catholic Education Association convention in New Orleans, the first major convention of its kind to be held in Louisiana. The preparatory seminary was placed again under the care of the Benedictine Fathers of St. Joseph Abbey, but the theological courses were discontinued in 1907. Most major seminarians of the archdiocese matriculated at Kenrick Seminary in St. Louis and St. Mary Seminary in Baltimore, or studied abroad. In September 1904, the Jesuits started a small college in New Orleans, which in 1911 was amalgamated with the College of the Immaculate Conception and became Loyola University, receiving state charter as a university in 1912. Blenk designated St. Mary's the normal school for women religious engaged in teaching in the archdiocese. In time, St. Mary's Dominican College became an accredited Catholic women's college.

French Benedictine nuns, forced to leave France in 1906, settled in Ramsay under the guidance of Paul Schaeuble, O.S.B., who had become first abbot of St. Joseph Abbey in 1903. The Sisters Servants of Mary, having left Mexico during the Carranza revolution, found refuge also in the archdiocese and in 1914 began their ministrations among the sick and the bedridden in the city. The sisters of the Society of St. Teresa of Jesus, likewise refugees from Mexico, began teaching at St. Louis Cathedral School in 1915. That same year, the archbishop urgently requested St. Katharine DREXEL, foundress of the Sisters of the BLESSED SACRAMENT, to undertake the education of African-American youth in the city and throughout the archdiocese. Accordingly, in 1915 the sisters opened Xavier High School and ten years later opened Xavier College, the oldest continuing African-American Catholic university in the United States. In 1911, the Brothers of Christian Schools purchased St. Paul's College, Covington from the Benedictine Fathers. In 1912 the Ursulines, under the supervision of their chaplain, François Racine, moved from their third convent building to a new site on State Street, where ten years later, the national shrine of Our Lady of Prompt Succor was erected.

Early in his administration, Blenk strengthened lay groups. He organized the state board of Holy Name Societies in 1906, the Louisiana State Federation of Catholic Societies in 1909, and the Federation of Catholic Societies of Women of Louisiana. He promoted the Catholic Order of Foresters, the Knights of Columbus, and the Knights of Peter Claver.

The growth of the population in the archdiocese, especially in Acadian (Cajun) southwest Louisiana, made a division expedient. Shortly before Archbishop John William Shaw was promoted to the New Orleans See on Jan. 11, 1918, Pope Benedict XV established the Diocese of Lafayette, comprising western Louisiana. He also appointed Jules Benjamin Jeanmard administrator of the archdiocese following the death of Blenk on April 15, 1917. Jeanmard became the first native Louisianian to be raised to the episcopate, its founding bishop.

Meanwhile, in New Orleans, one of Archbishop Shaw's first actions was to invite the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, with whom he had worked closely as bishop of San Antonio, TX to administer St. Louis Cathedral and to take charge of the churches and missions in Livingston parish. In 1919 the Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word, from San Antonio, came to teach at St. Francis de Sales parochial school. In 1920 Archbishop Shaw, with his chancellor, August J. Bruening, began to lay plans for a financial campaign for the erection of a major seminary. In September 1923 the Notre Dame Seminary opened and was staffed by the Marist Fathers. That same year, the Sisters of St. Francis of Calais opened Our Lady of the Lake Hospital in Baton Rouge. Franciscan Fathers returned to the archdiocese on July 21, 1925, when they took charge of the newly established parish of St. Mary of the Angels in the city, and the missions of the Lower Coast. The Sisters of the Holy Ghost and Mary Immaculate arrived from San Antonio in September 1926 to teach the African-American children of St. Luke School, Thibodaux. Shaw encouraged the endeavors of Catherine Bostick and Zoé Grouchy to establish the Eucharistic Missionaries of St. Dominic, an organization which would provide religious instruction to children in public schools and offer social relief work. In 1928 the Society of the Divine Word took over the mission stations on both the east and west bank of the lower Mississippi River. In 1931 the Jesuits purchased the old Jefferson College in Convent and converted it into Manresa House, a place for laymen's retreats.

Father (later Bishop) Maurice Shexnayder began Newman club work in 1929 at Louisiana State University, one-third of whose student body was Catholic. Monsignor Peter M. H. Wynhoven established (1925) Hope Haven for orphaned and abandoned boys, later placed under the direction of the Salesian Fathers of St. John Bosco. Opposite Hope Haven, Madonna Manor for small boys replaced St. Mary and St. Joseph Orphanages. Wynhoven, in addition to many other assignments, reorganized the social services and charities of the archdiocese by setting up Associated Catholic Charities in 1924. In 1922 Shaw convoked the sixth synod, the first in 33 years. In 1932 he launched the official diocesan paper, the Catholic Action of the South, with Wynhoven acting as first editor in chief. It replaced the Morning Star, which had been published between 1878 and 1930. Shaw's last years were burdened by problems brought about by the Depression of the 1930s. Some of the archdiocese's funds were frozen in local banks and several parishes found it difficult to meet the high interest due on monies borrowed during the 1920s. Nevertheless, 33 new parishes were opened between 1919 and 1934. After a brief illness, Shaw died on Nov. 2, 1934, and Jean Marius Laval, who had been consecrated auxiliary to Blenk, became administrator.

In 1935, Joseph Francis RUMMEL of Omaha, NB was transferred to the Archdiocese of New Orleans to become its 13th ordinary and 9th archbishop. Rummel intensified and accelerated existing movements; proposed and promoted new projects; sponsored the eighth National Eucharistic Congress in 1938, the largest public demonstration of Catholic faith ever seen in the city to that time; and endorsed numerous regional and national conventions. He also issued authoritative statements on social problems, such as the 1953 letter, "Blessed are the Peacemakers," which deplored racism. Two years later he ordered the planned desegregation of Catholic schools in the archdiocese. Rummel also launched a series of successful financial campaigns, insisted on a sound fiscal policy for each parish and institution, reorganized and expanded the archdiocesan administration, and promptly implemented decrees of the Holy See.

When Rummel was appointed to New Orleans the Catholic population was estimated at 361,882, out of a total population of nearly one million. At that time, there were 132 resident parishes, 97 missions, and 451 secular and religious priests. By 1960, the entire population (Catholic and non-Catholic) had increased by about 66 percent. The number of parishes had grown by 40 percent, and the number of priests had increased by 25 percent. Insufficient vocations to the priesthood prevented the archbishop from establishing more parishes, even though a growing population brought an increased demand for churches, schools, and other institutions, especially in suburban areas. Nevertheless, well over $100 million worth of building contracts were signed, the majority after World War II, and at least half were for schools, convents, and school-allied buildings. The Youth Progress Program was launched on Jan. 21, 1945 for the expansion of high schools for boys, recreational facilities, and a boy's protectory. Twelve years later, the oversubscribed Diocesan Campaign of Progress made possible the construction of a $2 million seminary at St. Benedict to accommodate 400 students, a new central administration (chancery) building, four centers for Newman Clubs at state and private colleges and universities, and a projected home for the aged. Between these two campaigns, which were carried out by volunteer laymen under the guidance of their pastors, parishes of the archdiocese memorialized Rummel's golden jubilee as a priest in 1952 by contributing $1 million for the erection of St. Joseph Hall of Philosophy, which raised the capacity of Notre Dame Seminary to 150.

In 25 years, the Catholic school population more than doubled, reaching 90,546 in 1961. Contributions to the missions totaled $3.6 million from 1935 to 1960. Under the leadership of Msgr. Edward C. J. Prendergast, Fr. (later Bishop) Robert E. Tracy, and (after 1945) Msgr. (later Bishop) Gerard L. Frey, the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) became one of the most dynamic forces in the archdiocese, as did the Cana and pre-Cana conferences to which Rummel gave impetus in 1957.

New communities of men entering the archdiocese were Missionaries of Our Lady of La Salette (1938), the Maryknoll Fathers (1944), and the Brothers of the Good Shepherd (1955). Communities of women returning to the archdiocese, or settling in it for the first time, included the Religious of the Presentation of the Blessed Virgin Mary (1949); the Poor Sisters of St. Francis Seraph of the Perpetual Adoration (1951); the Daughters of Jesus (1952); the Religious of Our Lady of the Retreat in the Cenacle, who opened (1958) Maria Immaculata Retreat House; and the Oblate Sisters of Providence (1958). Rummel organized the Archdiocesan Council of Catholic Men, although in time, its program was more or less assumed by the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies. The Archdiocesan Council of Catholic Women was even more successful as the Catholic Daughters of America and the St. Margaret's Daughters augmented their courts and circles. New organizations, groups, and agencies established since 1935 have been numerous including Serra Clubs, the Catholic Committees for Boy and Girl Scouts, Catholic Youth Organizations, Catholic Physicians and Nurses Guilds, Ozanam Inn, and the St. Vincent de Paul Store.

In addition to the curial posts, the diocesean administration includes an appreciably expanded ecclesiastical tribunal; commissions for sacred music, ecclesiastical art, and the liturgy; a diocesan building commission, appointed at the time of the seventh diocesan synod in 1949; a Catholic Bureau of Information; directors for the Legion of Decency; the deaf apostolate, and hospitals; and a Catholic Council on Human Relations, an organization of Catholic laymen designed to promote justice and charity, which held its first meeting in March, 1961.

Through the years, Rummel was a staunch champion of the underprivileged and a promoter of social justice. He opposed right-to-work bills introduced in the state legislature during the sessions of 1948 and 1954; led a movement to maintain reasonable rent controls after World War II; accepted African-American applicants at both minor and major seminaries; racially integrated the Archdiocesan School Board, the Councils of Catholic Men and Women, the Sodalities, and the Holy Name Societies; recommended African-American laypersons for Papal honors, and spoke out vehemently against segregation, upholding the Supreme Court decision of May 17, 1954, which ruled segregation in public schools unconstitutional. Regrettably, his stand on these socio-moral issues proved unpopular among many, otherwise, representative Catholic laymen.

On Aug. 14, 1961 Pope John XXIII named Bishop John P. CODY of Kansas City-St. Joseph MO, coadjutor archbishop with right of succession and erected the Diocese of Baton Rouge. He also appointed Robert E. Tracey, formerly auxiliary of Lafayette, its first bishop. The Louisiana bishops departed for Rome in 1962 to attend the Second Vatican Council. Tracey, who later published his well-received council diary, formed his diocese according to the norms of the Council, thereby, making Baton Rouge a model for other dioceses in establishing post-Conciliar administrative structure and consultative process. He placed particular emphasis on liturgical renewal and modern catechetical efforts.

On the 60th anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood, May 24, 1962, Archbishop Rummel announced that Archbishop Cody had been appointed apostolic administrator of New Orleans. Cody succeeded to the see at Rummel's death on Nov. 8, 1964. Archbishop Cody was transferred to Chicago, IL on June 16, 1965 and his successor, Philip M. Hannan, auxiliary bishop of Washington, DC was installed in New Orleans on October 13. Prior to this time, Hannan had been helping the victims of the devastating Hurricane Betsy. The following year, Harold R. Perry, the first African-American bishop since 1875, was consecrated as New Orleans's auxiliary on January 6.

During Hannan's administration the Vatican Pavilion at the New Orleans World Exposition was erected in 1984. The treasures of Catholic art assembled in the pavilion drew hundreds of thousands of visitors to the site. Three years later, New Orleans received its first visit by a reigning pontiff. From Sept. 11 to Sept. 13, 1987 Pope John Paul II made a pastoral visit to New Orleans, highlighted by a prayer service in the cathedral, a visit with the young people of the area at the Superdome, a Mass on the grounds of the University of New Orleans, and an address on education at Xavier University. On Dec. 13, 1988, Archbishop Hannan announced that his resignation as archbishop of New Orleans had been accepted by the Holy See. His 24 years as ordinary was marked by an impressive increase in the number and kinds of social services rendered by the archdiocese. During his tenure, three new diocese were created: Houma-Thibodaux (1977) was carved out of the Archdiocese of New Orleans with Bishop Warren Boudreaux as its founding ordinary. The Diocese of Lake Charles was created from the Diocese of Lafayette (1980) with Bishop Jude Speyer as ordinary. In 1986, the Diocese of Alexandria-Shreveport was divided. Bishop William B. Friend became the first bishop of the new Diocese of Shreveport.

On Feb. 14, 1989 Philadelphia native, Francis Bible Schulte, was installed as twelfth archbishop of New Orleans after serving as bishop of Wheeling-Charleston, WV. Alfred C. Hughes, appointed fourth bishop of Baton Rouge in 1993, was named coadjutor with right of succession to Archbishop Schulte on Feb. 16, 2001.

Catholic Population. The history of slavery accounts for the large number of African-American Catholics in South Louisiana, with New Orleans having the highest number of African-American Catholics in the U.S. The slave trade remained brisk in New Orleans from the time the city was founded up to the Civil War. Most slave owners in Louisiana were Catholic and were bound by the prescriptions of the Code Noir, which demanded that slaves be baptized and instructed in the Catholic religion. The economy of the sugar plantations in South Louisiana depended on slave labor up to the time of the Emancipation Proclamation. There were no separate churches for African Americans until the late 19th century. The first one, St. Katherine's, was established in New Orleans in 1895. In 1897, Fr. Pierre LeBeau began the Josephite apostolate in Louisiana, and since then, well over 100 separate African-American churches and chapels have been established in the state, most of which are administered by religious communities, most notably the Society of the Divine Word and the Josephites.

National parishes were established in New Orleans shortly after immigrants from France and Germany arrived in the city in the early 1800s, from Ireland in the mid-1800s, from Italy toward the close of the century, and from Lebanon at the beginning of the 20th. The fall of Saigon in 1975 resulted in the emigration of many Catholic Vietnamese refugees to Louisiana, where they found a hospitable climate and the opportunity to continue working in the fishing industry. Louisiana has the third largest concentration of Vietnamese Catholics, after California and Texas. Since the late 1960s, Hispanic Catholics from Mexico, Central and South America, and the Caribbean have reintroduced Spanish settlement to the state, but in much smaller numbers than in neighboring states. The majority of the diocesan clergy in Louisiana are native born and locally educated, in contrast with the situation a few generations earlier, when bishops continued to depend on European and Canadian priests to staff parishes. Just under half of the clergy in the state belong to religious communities, many of these priests are foreign born, coming from India, Africa, and parts of Asia.

Educational Institutions. The Church in Louisiana has had a stake in education since the 1700s. Presently, there are two Catholic universities and one college in New Orleans-Loyola New Orleans. There is also XAVIER UNIVERSITY OF LOUISIANA, Holy Cross College, and Our Lady of the Lake College in Baton Rouge.

Catholic secondary and elementary schools enroll about 22 percent of all children in the state from pre-kindergarten to 12th grade. Slightly less than half of school-age children, who are Catholic, are in Catholic institutions. The number of students enrolled at Catholic schools remains constant. The Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) is responsible for the religious instruction of Catholic children in public and nonsectarian private schools. Each diocese has its own superintendent of schools and its own CCD director.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of New Orleans. Archives, Diocese of Alexandria. Archives, Diocese of Baton Rouge. Archives, Diocese of Lafayette. Archives, Diocese of Shreveport. Archives, St. Louis Cathedral, New Orleans. R. BAUDIER, The Catholic Church in Louisiana, (New Orleans 1939). H. E. CHAMBERS, A History of Louisiana, (New York 1925) v.1. C. M. CHAMBON, In and Around the Old St. Louis Cathedral of New Orleans (New Orleans 1908). G. CONRAD, ed., Cross, Crozier, and Crucible (New Orleans 1993). E. A. DAVIS, Louisiana, the Pelican State (Baton Rouge 1959). C. L DUFOUR, ed., St. Patrick's of New Orleans, 1883–1958 (New Orleans 1958) commemorative essays for the 125th anniversary. A. E. FOSSIER, New Orleans: The Glamour Period, 1800–1840

(New Orleans 1957). M. GIRAUD, Histoire de la Louisiane francaise (Paris 1953–58) v.1, "Le Regne de Louis XIV, 1698–1715;" v.2 "Annes de transition, 1715–1717." P. J. KENNEDY AND SONS, The Official Catholic Directory (Providence, NJ 2001). E. LAUVRIERE, Histoire de la Louisiane francaise, 1673–1939 (Paris 1940). T. L. SMITH and H. L. HITT, People of Louisiana (Baton Rouge 1952). Louisiana Digest, 1809 to Date (St. Paul, MN 1936–).

[H. C. BEZOU/M. G. GUIDRY]

LOUISMET, SAVINIEN

Missionary, mystical writer; b. Sens, France, April 4, 1858; d. BUCKFAST ABBEY, Jan. 19, 1926. Louismet came from a devout Catholic family and attended choir school at Sens and the Petit Séminaire at Auxerre. He was professed as Dom Savinien at the Benedictine Abbey of La Pierrequi-Vire, Yonne, on Nov. 13, 1877, and ordained at Quimper, Brittany, in 1882. As a young priest he was sent to the Benedictine mission in Indian Territory (now Oklahoma) where he labored for 13 years. Ill health brought him back to Europe, and in 1902 he was temporary superior at Buckfast Abbey. There he spent the rest of his life as a simple monk, engaged in preaching missions and retreats, and writing articles for various periodicals. Six or seven short treatises on the mystical life followed each other at short intervals, the most popular of which were: The Mystical Knowledge of God (1917); Mystical Initiation (1924); Divine Contemplation for All (1922); and The Mystery of Jesus (1922). Dom Louismet was well read in his special subject, but his judgment was not always well-balanced and lent itself to justifiable criticism.

[J. STÉPHAN]

LOUISVILLE, ARCHDIOCESE OF

The Archdiocese of Louisville (Ludovicopolitana), comprising 24 counties in central Kentucky, is the metropolitan see of the states of Kentucky and Tennessee. The Province of Louisville includes the suffragan sees of Covington, Owensboro, and Lexington in Kentucky, and the sees of Nashville, Memphis and Knoxville in Tennessee. Originally created as the Diocese of Bardstown by Pius VII on April 8, 1808, the see was transferred to Louisville on Feb. 13, 1841, and created an archdiocese on Dec. 10, 1937.

When the diocese of Bardstown transferred its see city to the growing municipality of Louisville in 1841, Benedict Joseph FLAGET (1763–1850), the first Bishop of the West, found three churches in his new hometown: one for English speaking, one for Germans and one for French. As Germans and Irish increased rapidly in numbers in the area, anti-immigrant and anti-Catholic feelings exploded in the Bloody Monday Riots of Aug. 6, 1855, when over 20 were killed in mob action.

The earlier history of the city had been (and its subsequent history would be) decidedly more ecumenical. When Louisville's first congregation, Saint Louis, (forerunner to today's cathedral parish) built its primal church in 1811, Protestants made up over half of the contributors. The cornerstone ceremony for the second church building in 1830 was hosted by a Presbyterian congregation. The first resident priest of the parish was Philip Hosten, a Flemish native who died quite young in 1821 as "a victim of his zeal" as his Louisville tombstone reports. He had been nursing his people through the cholera epidemic and succumbed to the disease.

In the years before the Civil War, several traditional aspects of Catholic culture came to the city: a newspaper, The Catholic Advocate; the Jesuit Fathers to found a short-lived school; the Xaverian Brothers to make their first American foundation; a large congregation of teaching Ursuline Sisters from Germany, and the Sisters of the Good Shepherd from France to begin their social works ministry.

Spalding. Flaget was succeeded by his coadjutor, Martin J. SPALDING. Three years after Spalding became the second bishop of Louisville in 1850, the Diocese of Covington was erected by separating the eastern part of Kentucky from Louisville. While in Europe that year, Spalding secured from Belgium several priests and a community of Xaverian Brothers, who in 1854 opened a school in Louisville. That year the Saint Vincent DePaul Society was established in Louisville. Spalding introduced the Ursuline nuns in 1858 and the Christian Brothers in 1860; the Franciscans and the School Sisters of Notre Dame also joined the diocese at his invitation. In his 16 years as bishop, eight new churches were built in Louisville and 22 new parishes erected elsewhere, making a total of 85 parishes in the diocese. On May 1, 1858, the Catholic Guardian began publication; it suspended publication in July 1862 because of the Civil War. The war years were characterized by a weakening of Know-Nothing and other anti-Catholic movements, especially after the sisters of the diocese became active in nursing the soldiers. In 1862 the army closed Saint Joseph College in order to use the building; Saint Thomas Seminary barely managed to remain open. The war caused an interruption of all progress.

Lavialle. On June 9, 1864, Spalding was transferred to the See of Baltimore; his brother and vicar-general, Benedict J. Spalding, was made administrator until the third bishop, French-born Peter Joseph Lavialle, was consecrated Sept. 24, 1868. The new bishop had been ordained to the priesthood in 1844, and then served successively as secretary to Flaget, superior of the diocesan seminary (1849–56), and president of Saint Mary's College (1856–65). During his brief episcopacy, six new churches were started in the diocese; ground for Louis Cemetery was purchased; and a group of Franciscan sisters, formed under the direction of the Trappists, opened a school at Mount Olivet near Gethsemani. Failing health caused Lavialle's retirement to Nazareth where he died, May 11, 1867; he was buried beside Flaget in the crypt of the cathedral.

Thomas Merton at the library of the Abbey of Gethsemani. (©Horace Bristol/CORBIS)

McCloskey. On March 3, 1868, William George MCCLOSKEY, rector of the American College in Rome, was appointed to the vacancy in Louisville and consecrated in Rome May 24, 1868. Four months later, he arrived in his see city for a turbulent episcopate of 41 years. His first major dispute was with Spalding over the terms of the will of Spalding's brother. Shortly thereafter, some of the older priests had some difficulty with their bishop and turned to Spalding for aid. During these years, many priests left the diocese, led by the bishop's secretary and the chancellor, John Lancaster SPALDING (1840–1916), nephew of bishop Martin John Spalding and later first bishop of Peoria. Moreover, many religious establishments were the objects of episcopal disfavor. McCloskey first suppressed Saint Mary's College; as early as 1869 the abbot of Gethsemani complained that the bishop was hostile to the Trappists; in 1898 the SCHOOL SISTERS OF NOTRE DAME withdrew from the diocese and the Sisters of Saint Francis from Mount Olivet left for Clinton, Iowa, because of trouble with the bishop. Nor were the DOMINICAN SISTERS, the SISTERS OF MERCY, the URSULINE nuns, SISTERS OF LORETTO, and the mens' orders left unvexed.

Despite these difficulties, religious advancement marked the four decades of McCloskey's administration. Six new religious orders came into the diocese: Carmelite Fathers, RESURRECTIONISTS, the Society of Saint Joseph for Foreign Missions, the PASSIONISTS, the Sisters of Mercy, and the LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR. In 1870 the seminary was moved from Saint Thomas to a location known as Preston Park, in Louisville. It was closed in 1888, reopened in 1902, and closed again at McCloskey's death. An official diocesan organ, the Record was established in February 1879. In the next decade, about 50 priests and 25 churches were added to the diocese and similar progress marked the next ten years. Between 1900 and 1909, the year of McCloskey's death, 14 churches were established or dedicated in Louisville alone, and a like number elsewhere. By 1909 the Catholics of the diocese had increased to 155,000, the number of priests to 201, and there were almost 100 new churches.

O'Donaghue. Denis O'Donaghue, auxiliary bishop of Indianapolis, Indiana, was transferred to Louisville Feb. 7, 1910, and a month later was enthroned. A year later, the Clerical Aid Society was organized, the orphan boys home was moved from Saint Thomas to Louisville, and the Catholic Orphans Society was organized. Saint Joseph's College was reopened under the Xaverian Brothers. Four new parishes were organized; 21 churches built to replace older or smaller ones; nine new schools were established in the city; and 18 schools were built in country parishes. O'Donaghue's failing health caused the Holy See to appoint an apostolic administrator (1921) and a coadjutor (1923). The next year O'Donoghue resigned and was given the titular See of Lebedus. He died Nov. 7, 1925 and was buried in Saint Louis Cemetery.

The Louisville see was elevated to the status of an archdiocese by the action of Pope Pius XI on Dec. 10, 1937. The first archbishop was John A. Floersh (1886–1969), noted both for his piety and business acumen. In his administration, the amazing post-World War II building boom occurred and new institutions and parishes grew rapidly throughout the archdiocese.

Floersh. John A. Floersh, born Oct. 5, 1886, in Nashville, Tenn., was ordained June 10, 1911, in Saint John Lateran, Rome. After a year in Nashville parishes he was called to Washington, D.C., to act as secretary at the apostolic delegation. On Feb. 6, 1923, he was named coadjutor of Louisville and was consecrated in Rome on April 8, 1923, succeeding to the see on July 26, 1924. In December 1937, Louisville was made a metropolitan see with Floersh as its first archbishop. He consecrated his chancellor, Francis R. Cotton, on Feb. 23, 1938 as first bishop of Owensboro. Floersh instituted the Catholic School Board and the Office of Catholic Charities. He brought the Carmelite nuns to Louisville and founded several new high schools as well as Bellarmine College, with Monsignor Alfred Horrigan as first president.

Archbishop Floersh, for reasons of health attended only the first session of the Second Vatican Council in 1962, while his Auxiliary Bishop, Charles Garrett Maloney (consecrated on Feb. 2, 1955) was in attendance at all four. Mary Luke Tobin, at the time President of the Sisters of Loretto was the only American woman to have official status (auditor) at the conciliar sessions. She would remain a major voice in American Catholicism even into the next century. Another figure from the archdiocese, Passionist Father Carroll STUHLMUELLER, was a peritus in the years of the Council. Of all the residents of the archdiocese in those years, the most internationally known was Father Louis (Thomas MERTON), monk of the Abbey of Gethsemani. Less than two years after the Council's close, on March 1, 1967, Archbishop Floersh resigned his see. He died June 11, 1968.

McDonough. Thomas Joseph McDonough (born in Philadelphia in 1911) was installed as Louisville's second archbishop on May 2, 1967. His early pastoral letters signaled his encouragement of those engaged in addressing racism, poverty and other social evils. He noted in 1967 (echoing a Merton title) that the church and the world could not be "disinterested bystanders" amid social brokenness.

McDonough's tenure helped to initiate not only social, but also ecclesiastical and liturgical change in the light of the Second Vatican Council. He initiated the restored office of permanent deacon in the archdiocese, beginning in 1976. Sometimes the changes of the era were painful—such as the decision to close down the long tradition of the annual Corpus Christi procession involving in some years over 50,000 people at Louisville's famed Churchill Downs. Dwindling attendance caused its suspension after the 1976 event. McDonough announced his resignation in the autumn of 1981, exiting office with the words: "A good bishop today needs big ears and a small mouth" (Courier-Journal, Feb. 4, 1982). He died on Aug. 4, 1998.

Kelly. Dominican Thomas Cajetan Kelly (born July 14, 1931) had seen long service with the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington before he was installed as Louisville's third archbishop on Feb. 18, 1982. Among his first tasks was leading diocesan leaders in the articulation of a mission statement. He also oversaw the restoration of the historic downtown Cathedral of the Assumption through the activity of an innovative, inter-faith Cathedral Heritage Foundation (begun in 1985). The Cathedral was renewed not only architecturally but as a lively inner-city parish where liturgy, the arts, ecumenical understanding and social service—especially to the urban poor—flourish. Visitors to the venerable church have included Dorothy Day, Thomas Merton, Joseph Cardinal Bernardin, Jesuit Karl Rahner, historian Martin Marty, Muhammad Ali, the Dalai Lama and Nobel Laureate Jewish scholar Elie Wiesel.

Kelly encouraged and supported individuals with special leadership skills. In the last third of the 20th century, no fewer than nine clerics, laity and religious of the archdiocese held national presidencies in professional Catholic groups. One, Father Nick Rice, was elected to three separate leadership roles at the national level. At home Renew and other programs enhanced parochial and personal spiritual life.

In 1988, the creation of the new Diocese of LEXING-TON reduced the geographical area of the Louisville archdiocese to 24 counties in central Kentucky. In addition to metropolitan Louisville and the Holy Land counties, this included creative mission programs in southern portions of the diocese where Catholics are few in number. In 2000 the archdiocese had a Catholic population of some 197,000 (about 16% of the total population), served by 112 parishes and 12 missions.

Bibliography: C. F. CREWS, An American Holy Land (Wilmington 1987). M. C. FOX, The Life of the Right Reverend John Baptist Mary David, 1761–1841 (U.S. Catholic Historical Society 9; New York 1925). M. R. MATTINGLY, The Catholic Church on the Kentucky Frontier, 1785–1812 (Washington 1936). V. F. O'DANIEL, A Light of the Church in Kentucky . . . Samuel Thomas Wilson, O.P. (Washington 1932). J. H. SCHAUINGER, Cathedrals in the Wilderness (Milwaukee 1952). M. J. SPALDING, Sketches of the Early Catholic Missions of Kentucky, 1787–1827 (Louisville 1844). B. WEBB, The Centenary of Catholicity in Kentucky (Louisville 1884).

[J. H. SCHAUINGER/C.F. CREWS]

LOURDES

Town on the Gave de Pau River, at the foot of the Pyrenees, southwest France. Since 1912 the See of Tarbes (founded c. 500, perhaps in the 4th century) has been known as the Diocese of Tarbes and Lourdes.

Lourdes was an obscure village until the Blessed Virgin appeared there to the 14-year-old St. Bernadette SOUBIROUS 18 times between February 11 and July 16, 1858. It has since become the location of one of the most popular Marian SHRINES in the world. Bernadette's visits to the grotto of Massabielle on the riverside were accompanied by crowds that reached 20,000 on March 4; only Bernadette, however, saw the visions. After calling for penance on the 24th, the Lady directed Bernadette to drink and wash at a spring which came forth as soon as Bernadette dug (February 25). The water, which now flows at the rate of 32,000 gallons a day, is used for the bath at Lourdes (which is changed twice daily) and is prized as a sacramental by pilgrims. On February 27 and March 2 Bernadette was instructed to have a chapel built and to have people come there in processions. On March 25 the Lady told Bernadette, in the dialect of Lourdes, "I am the Immaculate Conception." The dogma of the IM-MACULATE CONCEPTION had been defined by Pope Pius IX, December 8, 1854. The final apparition occurred on the feast of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. Bernadette, who entered the Sisters of Charity and Christian Instruction at Nevers (1865), died in 1879; she was beatified in 1925 and canonized in 1933.

There was a period of opposition; the grotto and spring were barricaded by the mayor from June to October 1858 "for hygienic reasons." In 1861 the shrine became the property of the See of Tarbes, and in 1862 Bishop Laurence confirmed the apparitions and approved the public cult of Our Lady of Lourdes. Apart from the cures associated with the spring (whose water is chemically the same as Lourdes drinking water), reasons for the approval were the good spiritual effects resulting from the devotion, the evident ecstasy of Bernadette, and the accuracy and veracity of her testimony. In 1862 a marble statue was carved and a Gothic church (in place of a chapel) was begun. In 1871 the first Mass was celebrated in the church, and in 1872 (after the Franco-Prussian War) pilgrims flocked to Lourdes from all parts of France. The church was made a minor basilica and was consecrated by Abp. Guibert of Paris in 1876 in the presence of 100,000 pilgrims, while the statue was crowned by the papal nuncio to France. The increase in the number of pilgrims necessitated another church, the Rosary Basilica with 15 chapels (1883-1901), which became a minor basilica in 1926. Leo XIII, who built a Lourdes grotto in the Vatican gardens, approved an Office and a Mass of Lourdes for the province of Auch (1891), and Pius X extended the feast (February 11) for the whole church (1907). The crypt below the Basilica of the Immaculate Conception and the underground Church of Pope St. Pius X were consecrated by Cardinal Roncalli (later Pope John XXIII) in 1958, a centenary year which attracted six million pilgrims. Two annual PILGRIMAGES, the French national pilgrimage led by the Assumptionists and the Rosary pilgrimage under the Dominicans, date from the 1870s.

The Basilica at Lourdes, France. (©Chris Bland; Eye Ubiquitous/CORBIS)

Development of the Sanctuary. Each year millions of pilgrims visit Lourdes. They come from every continent, every social background and age-group. The sick are particularly prominent. The first cure at Lourdes was reported in 1858, and in 1861 the first commission pronounced 15 of 100 cures miraculous. Of 5,000 reported cures by the end of 1959, 58 were declared miraculous by the Church, but a number of cures are believed not to have been reported. The cures of organic illnesses include the healing of cancers, tuberculosis, and blindness; cases of neurasthemia or nervous disorders are not considered significant. As many cures derive from the processions and the individual blessings of the sick as from the baths and from private prayers at the grotto. Reported cures are first examined at Lourdes by a medical bureau of physicians (since 1882), and valid cases are asked to return a year later. The medical bureau then forwards its conclusions to the International Medical Commission of Lourdes (in Paris) for confirmation. Approved cases then go to a canonical commission in the diocese of the person cured. The bishop of this see pronounces on the miraculous nature of the cure. The sanctuary publishes a monthly magazine translated from the French into four languages that reports news and current events in Lourdes.

Bibliography: R. P. CROS, Histoire de Notre Dame de Lourdes d'après les documents et les témoins, 3 v. (Paris 1925–27). D. C. SHARKEY, After Bernadette (Milwaukee 1945). B. LEBBE, The Soul of Bernadette (Tralee 1946). P. MIEST, Les 54 miracles de Lourdes au jugement du droit canon, 1858–1958 (Paris 1958). G. SIEGMUND, De miraculis atque sanationibus Lourdensibus (Rome 1960). R. LAURENTIN, Lourdes: Histoire authentique des apparitions de Lourdes, 6 v. (Paris 1961–66).R. HARRIS, Lourdes: Body and Spirit in the Secular Age (New York 1999). R. LAURENTIN, V. MESSORI, and M. J. FURIÓ, Lourdes: crónica de un misterio (Barcelona 1997).

[T. F. CASEY/EDS.]

LOUVAIN, AMERICAN COLLEGE AT

The official title is: The American College of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary. It was originally founded in 1857 to train European priests for work in the U.S. The project originated with Martin J. Spalding, Bishop of Louisville, Ky., who was in Belgium in 1852 to recruit priests for the U.S. The idea was warmly received by the Belgian hierarchy but opposed by Francis P. Kenrick, Archbishop of Baltimore, who at that time was more interested in establishing an American College in Rome. Political disturbances, however, made the Roman project impossible. The Rev. Peter KINDEKENS, Vicar-general of Detroit, Mich., who was sent to Rome for that purpose, returned to his native Belgium where he found the Belgian hierarchy still interested in the American College. On his return to the U.S., Kindekens wrote to the American hierarchy pointing out the feasibility of a foundation in Louvain (1) to serve as a seminary for the training of European clergy for mission work in the U.S., and (2) to provide the American bishops with a college to which at least some of their students might be sent to acquire a well-rounded clerical training.

The bishops approved the project but could not offer any financial aid with the exception of Spalding and Peter Paul LEFEVERE of Detroit, who made the project their own and promoted monetary support. In February 1857 Kindekens returned to Belgium as rector, and the college was opened on March 19 in an old Benedictine college that had been founded in 1629. In April 1858 the American College sent its first missionaries to the U.S., two to Detroit and two to Louisville, in gratitude to the two bishops, Spalding and Lefevere, who were regarded as founders.

The students followed the theology courses partly at the College and partly at the University until 1877, when the University course was discontinued and the students attended the lectures in moral theology and Scripture given by the Jesuits. In 1898 the Jesuit courses were discontinued and the Belgian hierarchy established a full course in elementary theology at the University. In 1894 the rules and constitution of the American College were approved; and in 1899 the college was officially affiliated with the University of Louvain.

In 1906 two major events marked the progress of the College: the definitive approval of the rules by Pope PIUS X and the establishment of a department of philosophy. By 1907, the 50th anniversary of its founding, the American College had sent more than 700 priests to the U.S., and counted among its alumni 15 archbishops and bishops. In 1914, under the direction of the rector, Rev. Jules DeBecker, extensive improvements were undertaken—the property was enlarged, and a new building was added. August of 1914 brought the outbreak of World War I, the invasion of Belgium, and a long period of hardship and destruction.

After World War I, DeBecker, with the approval of the American hierarchy, began the reconstruction of the College and classes were resumed in 1919. The first America vice-rector, Rev. Charles Curran of Rhode Island, was named to assist DeBecker, and the first American students arrived—18 in number—in November. From this period onward, the American College passed from a training center for European priests destined for the American missions to a European center of training primarily for American priests.

During the German occupation of Belgium in World War II, the college building was used as a garrison by the occupying forces, and for a time after the war, the university used the American College as a residence for students. At the time a debate was taking place in the United States as to whether or not the American College had outlived its usefulness. The college had prepared over 1,000 priests for the apostolate and gave five bishops to the Church between 1931 and 1939. In 1949 its rector, De-Strycker, died and the college was closed. In the same year the issue of maintaining the college was presented to the American hierarchy. After much deliberation, the college was reopened and the Rev. Thomas F. Maloney of the Providence diocese was appointed as the first American Rector of the college. Maloney's first task was to regain the use of the college buildings.

Maloney worked closely with Msgr. Honoré van Waeyenbergh, rector magnificus of the university, to negotiate the return of the American College to the American hierarchy. The college officially reopened on Sept. 30, 1952 with seminarians from 20 U.S. dioceses. Classes, open to other seminarians, were conducted in the college by the professors of the University's schola minor of theology, including Joseph Coppens. Philosophy students attended courses at the Higher Institute of Philosophy. Under Maloney's leadership and with the continued support of alumni bishops, the college enrollment continued to grow. With the opening of the 1955-56 academic year, the seminary population had reached 114 students sponsored by 26 dioceses. The number was the largest in the history of the college which now had a full complement of two years of philosophy and four years of theology.

Maloney's rectorship was marked by his friendship with the guardian of the Irish (Franciscan) College and the cooperation of van Waeyenbergh, now a bishop and an influential figure in the International Federation of Catholic Universities. Maloney, named an extraordinary professor of the university, lectured in pastoral theology at the university. In May 1960 Maloney was appointed auxiliary bishop of Providence, where he died on Sept. 10, 1962.

Rev. Paul D. Riedl, a 1935 alumnus of the college and priest of the Springfield, Mass., diocese, succeeded Maloney as rector. The early years of his rectorship (1960–1971) were an exciting period in the history of the college. Several of its university professors served as periti during Vatican Council II and many of the American Council Fathers visited the college on their way to or from sessions of the Council. Responsibility for the college was formally entrusted to a committee of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) whose membership consisted of one bishop from each of the 12 episcopal regions in the United States.

The latter years of Riedl's rectorship were a critical period for the college. The rapid decline in the number of American seminarians brought with it a rapid decrease in the number of American seminarians studying in Louvain. The postwar growth of the university and tensions between Belgium's Flemish and Walloon populations threatened and eventually brought about a splitting of the university. Walloon professors hoped that college students would attend classes on the planned campus at Louvain-la-Neuve. Flemish professors of theology, on the other hand, decided to inaugurate a program of theology with courses in English. They would include a number of professors from religious congregations, hitherto barred from university appointment except as "extraordinary professors." The American College remained in Louvain, now commonly called Leuven. Its enrollment of less than 50 seminarians were complimented by a number of priests in graduate studies.

Riedl and the Rev. Clement Pribil, vice- rector of the college, worked closely with university professors in the development of the new English-language theology program. Two alumni of the college, Raymond F. Collins (Providence, '59) and Francis J. Manning (Oklahoma City, '60), were among the four visiting professors appointed in the new program that opened in October of 1969. In 1970, Pribil took over the mantle of leadership from Riedl (d. 1997) who then returned to his Springfield diocese. By that time, Collins had been appointed to succeed Pribil. Pribil's rectorship was marked by efforts to increase the enrollment of the college. In this task he was assisted by his successor, with whom he served as corector during the fall semester of 1971.

Collins' appointment resulted from the shared vision of the college's leadership, its NCCB committee, and the university faculty. Ties with the "English faculty" were the hallmark of Collins' tenure as rector. Collins was appointed a university docent in 1972 and was promoted to ordinary professor in 1977. He would remain in that capacity until he assumed the deanship of the School of Religious Studies at the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA in 1993. At one point college enrollment passed the century mark, with more than 80 seminarians and a score of priests in graduate studies. Almost 100 men were ordained to the priesthood during the Collins years.

When Collins resigned from the rectorship in 1978, he was succeeded by Rev. William Greytak, a priest of the Helena diocese and professor of history at Carroll College. Greytak brought with him the spirit of the West with the result that the college was no longer as oriented towards the U.S. northeast as it had been. He sold the villa property outside the city that had belonged to the college and negotiated with university officials for full title to the college's properties. Greytak returned to his post at Carroll College in 1983, entrusting the college rectorship to Rev. John J. Costanzo, a priest of the Pueblo, Co., diocese. Costanzo's rectorship (1983–88) was marked by stability in enrollment and emphasis on a development program, with the assistance of the Rev. Frank E. Lioi, formerly rector of the Rochester, N.Y., seminary.

In 1988, Monsignor Ivory of the Newark archdiocese became the seventh American rector of the American College. Ivory was an alumnus of the college and served as its spiritual director for a five-year period during Riedl's rectorship. Ivory's rectorship was marked by internal strife, resulting in the appointment of Rev. Melvin T. Long, of Salina, Kan., as interim rector in the spring of 1992. Ivory was the last of four successive American rectors of the college to possess an earned doctorate. Long had served as the college's first full-time director of pastoral formation during Collins' rectorship. At the time of his appointment as interim rector, Long was in charge of the Office of the American College located in the recently built NCCB-USCC building in Washington. He returned to the nation's capital in 1993 when Rev. David Windsor, CM, was appointed as rector.

Windsor was the first American rector of the college who had not been an alumnus. His tenure as rector was marked by the increased organization of the college staff, the use of modern technology, and attention to an American advisory board. His concern for the development of the college prompted Windsor to make repeated trips to the United States. Despite his efforts, enrollment continued to decline. When Windsor relinquished the rectorship to his vice-rector, Rev. Kevin A. Codd, an alumnus of the College and a priest of the Spokane, Wash., diocese in 2001, the college had reached its lowest ebb in enrollment.

Bibliography: V. BRANTS, La Faculté de droit de l'Université de Louvain à travers cinq siècles (Brussels 1917). A. BRUYLANTS, "Louvaina y su Faculdad di Ciencias en el transcuro de los siglos," Afinidad, v.22 (Barcelona 1955-56). F. CLAEYS, BOÚÚAERT, L'Ancienne Université de Louvain: Études et documents (Louvain 1956). J. COPPENS, ed., Le Cinquième centenaire de la Faculté de Théologie de l'Université de Louvain, 1432–1932 (Bruges 1932). V. DENIS, Catholic University of Louvain, 1425-1958 (Louvain 1958); Supplement (Louvain 1965). J. VAN DER HEYDEN, The Louvain American College, 1857-1907 (Louvain 1909). L. VAN DER ESSEN, L'Université de Louvain, 1425-1940 (Brussels 1945). E. LOUSSE, L'Université de Louvain pendant la seconde Guerre mondiale, 1939-1945 (Bruges 1945). G. MALENGREAU, "Lovanium, première expérience universitaire au Congo," Bulletin du Cercle Congo—U.L.B. (1955–1956). R. PIRET, La Faculté de Droit de 1922 à 1952 (n.p. 1952). L. DE RAEYMAEKER, "Les Origines de l'Institut supérieur de Philosophie de Louvain," Revue philosophique de Louvain 49 (1951) 505–633. E. H. S. REUSENS, Documents relatifs à l'Histoire de l'Université de Louvain, 1425–1797, 5 v. (Louvain 1881–1903). J. D. SAUTER, The American College of Louvain, 1897–1898 (Louvain 1959). R. E. CROSS and E. L. ZOELLER, The Story of the American College, extract from The American College Bulletin (Louvain 1957). The American College Bulletin, v.44 (Louvain 1965).

[V. DENIS/R. F. COLLINS]

LOUVAIN, CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF

The Catholic University of Louvain is the popular name in the English- speaking world for the historic Universitas Catholica Lovaniensis, founded in 1425 in the Flemish city of Leuven. It is the oldest university in the Low Countries with six centuries of distinguished contributions in European intellectual tradition. This entry covers its history in four separate phases: (1) the historic "old university" from 1425 to 1797; (2) the state university founded by the Dutch King, William I from 1817 to 1835; (3) the re-established Catholic university from 1834 to 1968; and (4) the division of Leuven into two independent universities in 1968—the Flemish-language Katholieke Unversiteit te Leuven, located in the old university city of Leuven and commonly abbreviated as K.U. Leuven, and the French-language Université Catholique de Louvain, located in the newly established town of Louvain-la-Neuve, commonly abbreviated as UCL. For the American College affiliated with Louvain, see LOUVAIN, AMERICAN COLLEGE AT.

First Foundation. Through the personal efforts of John IV, Duke of Brabant, Pope Martin V issued a bull on Dec. 9, 1425, establishing a university in Leuven, the capital of Brabant. The papal bull called for the creation of four faculties: arts, canon law, civil law, and medicine. The first home for the university was on Hogeschoolplein, "High School Square." The first 12 professors came from the universities of Paris and Cologne. In 1432, Pope Eugene IV granted permission for the establishment of a faculty of theology at Leuven. The city of Leuven donated the 14th-century cloth weavers' hall to this faculty of the university. Since its inception, the student population has been diverse and international; by 1450 most European nations were represented.

In the 16th century, a number of outstanding names dominated Leuven scholarship. Adriaan Floriszoon Boeyens (1459–1523), elected as Pope Adrian VI in 1522, had been a student, professor, rector of Leuven, and tutor to Erasmus and to the future Emperor Charles V. In his will, Adrian VI instructed that his house in Leuven be turned into a college. After it collapsed in 1775, an impressive Pauscollege or the "Pope's College" was built on the same site. Theologians of Leuven defended papal precedence over councils at the Council of Basel (1431–1439). Leuven's faculty of theology was the first to condemn Martin Luther openly (Nov. 7, 1519). Several Leuven professors later took active and even directive roles in the work of the Council of Trent (1545–1563), including Michael Baius (1513–1589) and Cornelius Jansenius (1510–1576), not to be confused with his namesake, Cornelius Jansenius (1585–1638) also a Leuven professor, the so-called "founder" of Jansenism.

Suppression and Second Foundation: The State University of King William I. Like its counterparts elsewhere, Leuven fell victim to the frequent economic and social unrest, religious strife, and political and military exigencies that enveloped Europe from the 16th to the 18th centuries. Matters hit a low point with the French conquest of Belgium in 1794. On October 24 of that year, the Revolutionary French Republic suppressed the university, seized its properties, and appropriated some 5,000 volumes from the library, or about one-tenth of the total holdings. In 1797 the university was officially closed. After the successful Dutch revolt against the French in 1813, King William (1772-1843), son of William V the Prince of Orange, became King William I of the United Netherlands, encompassing modern-day Belgium. One of William's actions, a major irritation to Belgians, was the re-opening the university at Leuven as a secular state university in 1817.

Third Foundation: The 19th-Century Revival of the Catholic University. As soon as Belgium obtained its independence from the Netherlands in 1830, the movement to establish a Catholic university gathered momentum. Pope Gregory XVI approved the project in a papal brief on Dec. 13, 1833. In 1834 the Belgian bishops established a Catholic university in Mechlin. The university was transferred to Leuven in 1835. The 19th century was an especially favorable period for the development of the theology and philosophy at Leuven. In 1898, a Schola Minor was created to provide preliminary theological training. In the general atmosphere of renewal, characteristic of the pontificate of Pope Leo XIII, theologians from Leuven strove for greater scholastic achievement. The historical-critical methodology that would become the faculty's hallmark, i.e., the close association of positive research and speculative theology, was further developed in each of the disciplines of theological research. A first step was taken in 1889 with the creation of a course entitled "Critical History of the Old Testament" by Albin Van Hoonacker. This course was an early attempt to apply the historical critical method to biblical texts. The appointment of Albert Cauchie as professor of Church History six years later had an even more decisive influence on the renewal of methodology and spirit among Leuven theologians. Cauchie, who founded the Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique in 1900, was the inspiration for a scientific approach in the fields of exegesis (as illustrated by the later publications of Lucien CER-FAUX and Joseph Coppens), patristics (with the work of Joseph Lebon, the founder of Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense, and of René Draguet, the dynamic director of the Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium) and Church history (as seen in the efforts of Albert De Meyer who, in 1928, took over the direction of the Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques). The launching of a new theological journal, the Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses in 1923 and the inauguration of the Colloquium Biblicum Lovaniense after the Second World War, increased the reputation of Leuven theology and bore witness to the continuation of its exegetical tradition. The Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium continues to publish, among many other items, the proceedings of the biblical colloquia.

The linking of tradition and contemporary life refection, so important to the Leuven theological tradition, has been equally important for the Leuven philosophical tradition. Founded in 1889, the Institute of Philosophy at Leuven has undergone a steady process of growth and development. During its first decades, the Institute focused on medieval philosophy, especially the thought of Thomas Aquinas. At the same time an ongoing dialogue with the new sciences and their offshoots, positivism and scientism, complemented the study of Thomism.

In his encyclical Aeterni Patris (1879), Pope Leo XIII (1810-1903) had recommended the study of Thomas Aquinas as an impetus for the renovation of Christian intellectual life in modern society. Psychology, anthropology, sociology and other new sciences presented themselves as a challenge to Church doctrine. Leo XIII believed that a revised Thomism would provide a framework within which the Church could address the new sciences and integrate them within traditional Christian belief. Before becoming pope, Leo had been papal nuncio in Brussels and had first-hand knowledge of Leuven. In October 1882, under continued pressure from Pope Leo XIII, the reluctant Belgian bishops agreed to establish a chair of Thomistic Philosophy at Leuven. A young professor from the diocesan seminary in Mechlin, Désiré Joseph MERCIER (1851–1926), later to become the archbishop of Mechelen, was the first to be named to the new chair. Mercier combined a profound sense of Thomas with a lively interest in contemporary issues.

In 1887 Mercier proposed that a specialized institute should be established as a center for instruction as well as research. In 1889 Pope Leo approved Mercier's plan and the Leuven "Higher Institute of Philosophy" was established. The foundation of the Revue Néo-Scolastique in 1894 gave the Leuven school an international forum for its conception of an "open". Thomism. In order to achieve his project of revitalizing Thomism, Mercier recruited a core of specialists from diverse fields. In 1893 he brought in four young professors to assist him: Désiré Nys (1859–1927) who devoted himself to the natural sciences and worked out an open Thomistic cosmology; Armand Thiéry (1868-1955) who had studied experimental psychology with Wundt in Leipzig; and Simon Deploige (1868-1927) and Maurice DE WULF (1867-1947). Deploige, who succeeded Mercier as president of the Institute (1906 to 1927), was primarily interested in social and political philosophy. De Wulf devoted himself to the study of the history of philosophy. His History of Medieval Philosohy was a pioneering investigation into medieval thought.

Leuven in Two World Wars. The city of Leuven and its university suffered greatly in both world wars. The university's greatest physical loss was the August 1914 burning of the university library with its 300,000 volumes, 1,000 or more ancient manuscripts and all its archives. "Ici finit la culture Allemande" was the sign the Belgians attached to the walls of the burned-out library, after German troops left town. As a result of the heroic efforts of Paulin Ladeuze (1870–1940), then rector of Leuven, and of the indefatigable Cardinal Mercier, a new library was established with donations from alumni, individuals, other educational institutions, and the government of the United States of America.

World War II brought new destruction to Leuven and to its university. Not only was there a second burning of the university library in 1940, but also its rector, Honoré van Waeyenbergh, was imprisoned in Brussels by German authorities for refusing to turn over lists of student names as well as refusing to accept German professors at Leuven. The key figure who managed the university's affairs during the war, enforcing the policies of Van Waeyenbergh, was the vice-rector Léon Joseph SUENENS, later cardinal archbishop of Mechlin-Brussels. Following World War II, the rector Van Waeyenbergh effectively carried out a major expansion of programs and facilities at the university and established a Catholic University of Lovanium in the Belgian Congo.

Vatican II. Leuven theologians, under the leadership and inspiration of Cardinal Suenens, played a significant role in the deliberations at Vatican II. These periti worked with the Belgian bishops and with their former students, many of whom were present as Council fathers. A Leuven theologian, Msgr. Gerard Philips, was prominent in the deliberations that led to the formulation of the dogmatic constitution Lumen Gentium. The years following Vatican II witnessed an attempt by Leuven's theologians to enter into dialogue with scientists and others who engage in the study of the human condition, seeking to develop a theological language faithful to tradition and in touch with the mentality and situation of modern times.

Division into Two Universities. In the 1960s, Leuven was caught up in the crossfire between the Frenchand Flemish-speaking communities. In the wake of student riots, ethnic unrest, and government upheavals, Leuven was reorganized into separate Flemish-language and French-language universities in 1968—the Flemish Katholieke Universiteit Leuven in the old university city of Leuven and the French Université Catholique de Louvain on an entirely new campus, Louvain-la-Neuve, about 20 miles away from the historic city of Leuven. On May 28, 1970 the Belgian parliament gave separate legal status to each of these two divisions. In 1972 the first faculties were installed in the new university at Louvain-la-Neuve.

Another result of this linguistic separation was the offering of classes, especially in theology and philosophy, in the English language on the old campus in the university city of Leuven. In later years, the Frenchlanguage university too began to offer some programs in English. Each university, in its own way and to varying degrees, has remained faithful to the original vision and tradition, with a strong international faculty and student presence. Despite the cleave, there came a tremendous growth in student enrollment. By 2000, the student population at Leuven was approaching 26,000, while the student population at Louvain-la-Neuve had reached 21,000.

The tense relations between both universities during the 1970s later gave way to a more congenial and collaborative atmosphere, especially with the joint celebration in 2000 of the 575th anniversary of the first foundation at Leuven. Both universities are united in the common academic tradition of the historic Universitas Catholica Lovaniensis. Although each university has its own rector and academic council, they are united under the archbishop of Mechlin-Brussels, the grand chancellor of each of the universities.

Bibliography: E. LOUSSE, The University of Louvain during the Second World War (Bruges 1946). V. DENIS, Catholic University of Louvain, 1425–1958 (Louvain 1958). L'opinion publique belge et l'université de Louvain. Enquête sociologique sur les problèmes de l'université et divers (Louvain 1967). L. DE RAEYMAEKER, Le Cardinal Mercier et l'Institut supérieur de philosophie de Louvain (Louvain 1952). J. T. ELLIS, The Influence of the Catholic University of Louvain on the Church in the United States (Louvain 1982). U. DHONDT and F. J. BOCK, Leuven, the Institute of Philosophy (1889–1989) (Leuven 1989). E. LAMBERTS and J. ROEGIERS, eds., De Universiteit te Leuven (Leuven 1986). Leuven University, 1425–1985 (Leuven 1990). L. KENIS, The Louvain Faculty of Theology in the Nineteenth Century: A Bibliography of the Professors in Theology and Canon Law: With Biographical Notes (Leuven 1994). D. AERTS and C. COPPENS, Leuven in Books, Books in Leuven: The Oldest University of the Low Countries and Its Library (Leuven 1999).

[J. A. DICK]

LOVE

An affective accord or union with what is in some way grasped as congenial. While almost hopelessly general, this definition has the merit of indicating the dynamic and relational character of all love and of suggesting that its function is to promote wholeness. An effort to specify the levels of wholeness toward which various loves are directed cannot fail to throw light on the ultimate meaning and destiny of human existence. This article considers the various kinds of love, the historical development of theories of love, love at the level of sense, and love at the level of reason.

Kinds of Love

Human beings experience many different kinds of love, corresponding to different levels of existence. The most important distinction is that between sensible and rational love; other types are concupiscent and benevolent love, eros and agape, and appreciative love.

Sensible and Rational. Sensible love, which humanity shares with the animals, is geared to satisfying the needs of biological life. It looks to what is presented by the senses as requisite and congenial to the individual here and now. Since it is intrinsically dependent on matter and consists in the dynamic accord of sensitized potency with what can fulfill it, it is radically subjective.

Rational love, on the other hand, is rooted in human spirituality and openness to BEING. Because he is spiritual, man can grasp the real (both sensible and suprasensible) as independent of the present condition of his organism and affectively relate himself to it on the basis of its own merits. Such love is fundamentally objective. Whereas sensible love is a psychic reaction to stimulus, rational love is a personal response to worth. The first looks to the conservation and promotion of the individual organism or the species. The second looks beyond these to the absolute value of being, which it seeks to promote in all its finite embodiments.

Concupiscent and Benevolent. The fact that rational love is ordered to the continual enhancement of the finite in the light of the infinite leads to a further distinction. For one cannot enhance something without desiring for it whatever is conducive to its growth and development. This facet of love, which is rooted in the limited and potential character of the beloved and seeks goods that will perfect him, is called concupiscent love (amor concupiscentiae). On the other hand, the beloved for whom such goods are desired and whose full growth in being is sought is loved with benevolent love (amor benevolentiae). Concupiscent love and benevolent love are thus two dimensions or aspects of rational love; although not identical with one another, they are nonetheless inseparable.

Eros and Agape. Another important distinction in the language of love is that between eros and agape. Although sometimes confused with the distinction between concupiscent and benevolent love, this is really quite different. It does not arise from the essential polarity within all human love, but regards instead the different orientations such love may assume. For since man is open to Being as absolute, he can serve such Being anywhere. He is not limited to promoting being in himself only, but can do so in others. When, therefore, he focuses on himself and seeks his own full expansion in being, his love is called eros. When, however, it looks to others and devotes itself to their fulfillment, it is called agape. In either case, both the concupiscent and benevolent aspects of all human love are involved. On the other hand, neither eros nor agape taken separately would seem to be equal to love's total drive, for the distinction between self and other is a distinction within being. A love, therefore, looking to Being Itself could not exclude either without falling short. But more about this later.

Appreciative. Mention should also be made of what is sometimes called appreciative love (C. S. Lewis). For in the presence of what is congenial, it sometimes happens that a person's stance is neither one of desire nor one of benevolence but is more akin to sheer gratitude. From the depths of his soul he appreciates simply the excellence of what he encounters. However, although this may appear to be a distinct mode of love, it seems better to identify it with the openness to being that is the root of all rational love. It is precisely because man can appreciate the consummate excellence of being wherever he finds it that he seeks to promote it in himself and others and desires what furthers this work. And he is able to appreciate it because of that basic affinity to being that is the root of his spirituality.

Historical Development

Theories of love have gone through so long a process of evolution that it is impossible to detail their history in brief compass. [M.J. Adler, ed., The Great Ideas: A Synopticon of Great Books of the Western World (Chicago 1952) 1:105–82; R. Eisler, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe (Berlin 1927–30) 2:29–38; Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice Rome 1957) 1:173–180.]. Here only the main stages are mentioned, with emphasis focused on the origin of such theories among the Greeks and on their development within Christianity.

Greek Theories. Among the facets of love outlined above, the first to take systematic shape in a full-blown philosophy was that of ἔρος—not eros as contrasted with agape and as one of the two orientations of rational love, but as the overriding dynamism of the soul. Thus PLATO (Symp. 210A–E) conceives the soul as ordered from the outset to a wholly satisfying contemplation of the GOOD, which it can reach, however, only gradually and by means of a laborious ascent. Stirred by the ideal reality that makes its presence felt in and through the sensible, the soul is moved with longing for the eternal. Beyond the fleeting forms of beauty and goodness in the world around it, it looks for that which does not fade and whose immutable possession can alone quench its thirst. The Good, therefore, for Plato, however nobly and spiritually conceived, remains a term of desire (concupiscent love). It is not loved for its own sake but for its capacity to satisfy the soul's hunger. Love, on the other hand, is basically a matter of longing. It is not benevolence, a generous impulse to enhance the world; it is flight from the world to a changeless noetic heaven that is seen as the soul's salvation.

ARISTOTLE is more down to earth. His analysis of love is directed largely to the question of FRIENDSHIP and is situated in the context of natural finality (Eth. Nic. 1155a–1172a). Like all natural entities, man too has an innate drive toward what will perfect him. This relationship to himself is seen as a kind of friendship, a benevolent attitude aiming at his own promotion in goodness. More importantly, because of man's intellectual nature, he is able to recognize another man as in some sense one with him by likeness and, on the basis of this similarity, to extend the benevolence he has for himself to this other. Friendship is thus a prolongation of self-love and the friend a kind of second self (Eth. Nic. 1166a 1–2).

The importance of Aristotle's theory is that it makes room for a love that is more than mere desire. Because of his likeness to the self, the friend is loved for his own sake. Love becomes generous, a matter of giving as well as of getting. This is what will permit a Christian theologian such as St. THOMAS AQUINAS to make considerable use of Aristotle's ideas in the elaboration of a theory of charity. However, it must be pointed out that because of Aristotle's fundamental naturalism and his lack of a doctrine on creation, the individual substance remains ontologically primary and all its activities, including friendship in the case of man, are necessarily subordinate to its own drive for perfection. Benevolence is therefore rooted in a more radical concupiscence; although one's friend is loved for his own sake, the reason that one enters such a relationship is to satisfy a natural need. Friendship is but a good required for human happiness.

Christian Thought. Christianity brought about a basic shift in man's thinking about love. The abundant generosity of love comes to the fore. Instead of rooting love, as Plato did, in man's spiritual poverty or deriving it, with Aristotle, from the needs of nature, Christian thought sees love's source in the infinite perfection and creativity of Divine Being. God Himself is love (1 Jn 4.8). His very substance is a loving community of three divine Persons. He creates the world out of love. And out of love He sends his Son to redeem man. The Word made flesh is Love incarnate who calls man, made in His image, to a share in His life. Man's basic vocation is now one of generous love, agape. His consuming task is to promote God's kingdom on earth, to spend himself in behalf of the Lord who seeks an ever fuller presence in the world He made. In this perspective, even the search for personal happiness is subordinated to pure devotion to God and His glory (cf. Thomas Aquinas, In 4 sent. 49.1.2.1 ad 3).

This Christian insight, founded on God's revelation of Himself, represents the high-water mark in man's comprehension of love's scope. Subsequent thinkers, working under its influence, have only partially succeeded in elaborating comprehensive systems consistent with it. Too often, when they have not ignored it and reverted to something inferior, their efforts have resulted only in distorting the sublime vision that Christ's revelation affords.

It is perhaps not too much to say that in the writings of Aquinas, the Middle Ages produced its least unsatisfactory synthesis. Even there, however, some thinkers feel that Aquinas's reliance on Aristotle produced a tension in his thinking on love that he never fully overcame. The other great medieval tradition, represented by RICH-ARD OF SAINT-VICTOR, though more in tune with contemporary PERSONALISM, is, like the latter, too lacking in comprehensive categories to provide an adequate metaphysics. Both, however, are truer to the Christian concept of love than anything found in modern thought until quite recently. Thus, for example, the Italian Renaissance combined the impersonalism of Platonic eros with the creativity of Christian agape to conceive love as an immanent, all-pervasive cosmic force. The rise of EMPIRICISM, on the other hand, stripped away love's transcendental implications and reduced it to the status of a particular, purely natural instinct. While the romantics absolutized the sexual side of love, the objective idealists, once more recognizing its suprasensible orientation, nevertheless saw it as part of a universal, impersonal dialectic. In reaction to all this, recent years have seen the rise of a new personalism, much enriched by the techniques of PHE-NOMENOLOGY, but still, it must be said, in search of a metaphysics. If ever there is to be a philosophy adequate to the Christian message, its best hope seems to lie in the restructuring of Aquinas's metaphysics of being along lines that take more explicit account of the central and comprehensive mystery of the personal.

Love at the Level of Sense

The distinction between sensible love and rational love is rooted in the different types of awareness that give rise to them. Sensible love is aroused by the presence to the animal's senses of something congenial to his nature. Its goal is pleasure, a strictly subjective state that is related to the animal's objective good only as a natural sign. For sensible consciousness is not objective. The animal is wholly guided in its actions by feelings of attraction and repulsion that it is unable to distinguish from the realities stimulating them. Hence those other traits of sensible love: the narrowness of its horizon and its lack of freedom, but also, on the brute level, its sureness and apparent innocence.

Role in Man. With man, the picture becomes more complicated. The sensible level of his nature is radically transformed by the spiritual component it embodies. As SPIRIT, man is at once interior to himself and present to the other as other. He enjoys OBJECTIVITY. Unlike the brute, he is not imprisoned within his own psychoorganic nature but can refer his sensations and feelings explicitly to the objects arousing them. They become revelations of the nature of the situation in which he finds himself and of its harmony or discord with his own concrete being. Thus, even though his sensible love has pleasure for its aim, it is pleasure known as such and as distinct from the things that provide it. This is what J. Guitton means when he remarks that in man's "most fundamental states, even the most bestial, there is always a hormone of spirit sufficient to differentiate these states from their animal counterparts" (113).

Granting, however, this transformation of sense life by its integration in man with objective awareness, its role nonetheless remains basically the same. In both man and beast, the attractions things exert are in the service of biological life—the life of the individual and that, too, of the species. Experiencing his own affective accord with certain objects in his environment, of his desires in their absence and of his pleasure in their presence, man, no less than the beast, is induced to satisfy the objective requirements of his psyche-organic nature that the former reactions signify. But whereas for the beast the inducement is compelling, it is not so for man. His selfpossession and openness to more comprehensive values leave him free to follow the lead of sense or not to follow it. He cannot suppress the feelings that things arouse in him; but he can, when to yield would conflict with pursuit of a higher good, resist their promptings. Moreover, such regulation by reason is necessary if this vital realm of feelings and emotions, which is meant to sustain and promote human life, is not to disrupt it instead. For since nature has relaxed its grip on man to allow for the emergence of personal freedom, man's fund of emotional energy will dissipate itself in chaotic eruptions unless he personally intervenes to restrain and order it.

Need for Passions. But if man's passionate life apart from spirit's control will lack humanity, his spiritual life will be limp and languid unless fired from below by his passions. This is the truth Aquinas saw when he rejected the Stoic view of the passions as enemies of reason and morality (Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 24.2). On the contrary, not only does the rational application of passionate energy not diminish spiritual activity; it enhances and presses it onward (Summa Theologiae la2ae, 24.3). For just as in man the presence of spirit transforms all the levels below it, so also it needs the support and cooperation of all these lower levels to carry out its own work. Here, perhaps, is the germ of truth in views that reduce all love to the level of sense and even to the sexual instinct (H. Spencer, S. Freud). Because spirit can insert itself effectively in the world only through the mediation of psychoorganic energy and because among all his drives the sexual one in man is the most clamorously insistent, the temptation is strong to simplify matters by collapsing all distinctions. One refutation of these views is simply that, in suppressing manifest distinctions, they impoverish experience instead of explaining it. That there is a difference between sensible love whose goal is pleasure and rational love whose term is being itself should become clear in the following section, which is devoted to the latter. Suffice it to say here that when man makes pleasure his overriding concern, not only does he blind himself to all that is valuable in itself, but by that very fact he makes sadness his constant companion. For he condemns himself to the permanent absence of the only good commensurate with the human heart.

Love on the Level of Reason

The root of rational love is the openness and affinity to Being Itself that defines the realm of spirit. To be spirit is to have access to being-as-absolute, i.e., to a value that encompasses both oneself and the other and, while grounding each person in his originality, still transcends him on every side. To be spirit is to be-for-being, to exist, even prior to choice, as sharing in that pure devotion-to-being that is being. Whereas the dynamism of sensible nature is the dynamism of POTENCY seeking its own ful-fillment, the radical dynamism of spirit is one of ACT, of abundance—it is a pure love of excellence, a pure complacency with perfection, rejoicing in its presence and bent on promoting its reign.

Characteristics. On this basis, the characteristics of rational love, as distinct from sensible love, are clearly discernible. For rational love is the individual's free ratification of this fundamental dynamism of spirit. It is a matter of freely orienting one's life in the direction of service. The element of FREEDOM here is important. The individual, to be sure, is not free on the pre-reflective level to determine what will present itself as good to his intellect. Just as the dynamism of the organism assures that whatever is sensibly present and in harmony with that dynamism will be felt as attractive, so also, when what is intellectually perceived presents itself as harmonizing with the spirit's essential drive, it is known as a rational good (cf. J. de Finance). But whereas, on the sensible level, the reactions are automatic, the response of spirit is not. For the absolute value of Being is present to spirit only through the mediation of particular forms, and the ways it may be served are seen as limited and often conflicting. Moreover, given the distinction in man between his psycho-organic drives, which look to his fulfillment as a separate individual, and the spirit's thrust toward a generous service that subordinates separate fulfillment to a more comprehensive good, the need for man to assume the direction of his life becomes manifest. What will he do? Will he pursue his own satisfaction on the organic level even if it means sacrificing his spiritual fulfillment, or will he let spirit be his guide even when to do so entails the curtailment of sensible appetites? This is the choice he must make. To decide for the former is to reject spirit's call and to settle for a life that he knows falls short. To opt for the latter is to undertake a life of discipline and hardship, but one in which even frustration serves a purpose and is redeemed by what it promotes. Reason and spirit, to be sure, are involved in either case since, on this level, even failure is a matter of free decision. But only when reason directs its course is a person's love truly rational.

Disinterested Love. What has been said about love in the preceding paragraphs raises an important question about love's disinterestedness. For if it is its harmony with the spirit's drive that recommends a particular course of action as good—much as sensible attractiveness is grounded in the conformity of an object with the psycho-physical dynamism of the organism—then it seems that love of the good on the level of spirit, no less than on the level of sense, is actually and inevitably simply a form of self-seeking. The reason a person dedicates himself to the service of Being is to achieve himself as spirit, just as the pursuit of pleasure looks to his fulfillment as organism. The one may be a higher and more comprehensive goal than the other, but in both cases the good remains subordinate to self-realization. The question then arises: Is a pure and disinterested love of anything, even God, within the bounds of human possibility? If it is not, then the selfishness of man becomes limitless and incurable, since he cannot help making God Himself a mere means to his own happiness. If, however, such love is possible, how can one even begin to understand it—for it seems to imply that a being can tend to something in no way connected with itself (cf. Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 26.3 ad 2).

In their efforts to resolve this dilemma, philosophers have usually succeeded in holding on to only one of its horns. Thus, for example, there developed among some of the mystics of the 12th century an ecstatic conception of love (see Rousselot). From their point of view, love is not love at all unless it is completely pure and disinterested, unless the subject goes completely outside himself and loses himself in the beloved. An echo of this passion for complete disinterestedness comes up later in the writings of I. KANT (e.g., Critique of Practical Reason), for whom morality is not genuine if the maxims it proposes are in any way connected with the subject's likes or dislikes or with his drive for fulfillment, even spiritual. "Duty and obligation are the only names that we must give to our relation to the moral law." In both of these views something human is lost. The ecstatic conception maintains a disinterested love at the price of foregoing any attempt to understand it. Kant's doctrine sacrifices love itself to preserve the subject from any touch of EGO-ISM.

On the other hand, there are thinkers who are less interested in idealizing selflessness than in giving a rational account of it. Thus P. ROUSSELOT defends as the doctrine of Aquinas a thinly disguised monism wherein God and creature are interpreted as whole and part and the distinction between them is all but collapsed. In this light, selflove is identically a pure and greater love of God, since to love oneself is at the same time and more profoundly to promote the whole in which the self has its being. Such a position is not much different from that of philosophers who are openly pantheistic. B. SPINOZA, for example, likewise collapses the distinction between creature and God. But instead of identifying self-love with a greater love for God, Spinoza ultimately identifies it with God's own love for Himself.

If moves such as these, which account for selfless love by doing away with the self, are philosophically inadequate, they are less so than the ones that either ignore or deny God in their efforts to explain love. For if the individual self is primary and has no ground beyond itself, then in all its relations with others it must ultimately seek itself. Thus, as has been seen, Aristotle was forced to derive an individual's love for another from his natural love for himself. And centuries later, J. S. MILL preached service to others as a source of deepest satisfaction to one-self. There is, no doubt, truth in both positions. But neither is successful in explaining disinterested love. For all they actually do is to make selfless love reasonable by showing that it is really not selfless.

Love of Self and Others. If a rational account of truly generous love can be given, it will have to proceed along lines similar to the ones indicated in L. B. Geiger's brilliant exposition of the Thomist solution. The foundation of Geiger's position is the analogy of appetite consequent upon the different ways in which the good is present to it. The WILL, or intellectual appetite, seeks the good as presented by intellect. But the INTELLECT is man's faculty for objective knowledge. It knows the real not merely in terms of the person's immediate dealings with it but as it is in itself. It presents to the will, therefore, not merely what is good for the individual but what is good in itself. The will thus is seen as naturally ordered to the real on its own merits. It is true to itself only when it loves what is good in itself for its own sake.

To rephrase this in the language used above, one can say that the spirit in man is dynamically ordered to being as an absolute value. In its very roots it is a love of being for its own sake. The perfection of spirit, therefore, is not a matter of acquisition but of orientation. Its fulfillment is to love generously. It is most itself when it is most for the other.

Since, in this light, there is no distinction between self-realization and genuine devotion to being for its own sake, the problem of disinterested love disappears. For now there can be no question of subordinating love for the other to one's own fulfillment (egoism) or of sacrificing that fulfillment to one's love for the other (ecstaticism). Personal fulfillment is identically a matter of generous service. When one loves generously, one is by that very fact fulfilled; one is caught up in Being's embrace. On the other hand, any idea of self-realization as a separate goal to which love is only a means is a misconception. It is to think of the self as something apart from its loving relation to Being and, therefore, able to use this relation for its own advantage. The truth is that the SELF exists only in this relationship and apart from it is nothing at all.

From what has been said, it is clear that no opposition can exist between genuine love of self and genuine love for others. Hence it is misleading to speak of a person's loving God more than himself, as if one could really sacrifice himself for the love of God and not instead be completed by it. What such a phrase means is that, since the root relation of spirit is one of responsiveness to the consummate excellence of Being Itself (God), the created spirit can be concerned for itself only as derivatively sharing in that excellence, not as rivaling, or, much less, surpassing it. So also with the idea that man naturally loves himself more than his neighbor. One can no more subordinate others to oneself than one can sacrifice self to God. On the contrary, one loves himself truly only in willing and spending himself for others.

What lies behind these other views is Aristotle's idea that self-love is the origin of man's love for others—an idea that, in turn, is founded on the Stagirite's conception of the ontological primacy of the individual SUBSTANCE. With one's own substantial reality functioning as the ultimate reason for all one does, it is manifest that one's relation to others must be secondary to the pursuit of one's own perfection. For Aristotle, this is true without qualification. It is only partly so, however, when viewed from the perspective of a metaphysics that takes account of the fact of CREATION. Thus St. Thomas, adopting Aristotle's position regarding man's relations with others who are finite like himself, is nevertheless forced to reverse it when it comes to man's love for God. For God is the ontological ground of man's individual reality and hence is the ultimate reason why man himself is lovable. Hence St. Thomas concludes that naturally man loves God more than himself and himself more than his neighbor. This view is tenable, and indeed irrefutable, so long as finite reality is seen as a collection of individual substances that are only accidentally related to one another. It would not hold, however, if the self is essentially constituted by its relationship to the other. Moreover, this latter position seems to some to be more in line with the Christian contention that love is the root of reality, its first beginning and its last end.

Man's Vocation. Thus, even apart from grace, man's vocation as a person is one of generous love. He completes himself through wholehearted commitment to a work of "reasonable service." The dominant motif of this work is the promotion of being in the beings around him, their continual enhancement in the light of possibilities that the enveloping presence of Being opens up. To this overriding motif, all man's passionate energies must be subordinated. The passions supply the raw material with which spirit works, the vitality it requires for any effective accomplishment. But they must be checked, disciplined, and integrated into the coherent work of love.

Unless spirit truly and vigorously assumes the ascendency, man's lower drives run riot in their strident search for satisfaction. But as part of the larger work of love, even their curtailment and frustration in particular instances can contribute to overall growth. This natural capacity of the person to grow in love and achieve a work of genuine service is what GRACE presupposes and transforms. For the manner and scope of this transformation, which enriches without suppressing what has here been described rather briefly, see CHARITY.

See Also: APPETITE; EMOTION; PASSION; PERSON; SEX.

Bibliography: L. B. GEIGER, Le Problèe de l'amour chez saint Thomas d'Aquin (Montreal 1952). P. ROUSSELOT, "Pour l'histoire du problème de l'amour au moyen âge," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelatlters 6.6 (Münster 1908) 1–102. H. D. SIMONIN, "Autour de la solution thomiste du probléme de l'amour," Archives d'histoire doctinale et littéraire du moyenâge 6 (Paris 1931) 174–276. R. O. JOHANN, The Meaning of Love (Westminster, Md. 1955). J. DE FINANCE, "La Motion du bien," Gregorianum 39 (Rome 1958) 5–42. F. E. CROWE, "Complacency and Concern in the Thought of St. Thomas," Theological Studies 20 (Woodstock, Md. 1959) 1–39, 198–230, 343–395. J. GUITTON, Essay on Human Love, tr. M. CHANNING-PEARCE (New York 1951). C. S. LEWIS, The Four Loves (London 1960). M. C. D'ARCY, The Mind and Heart of Love (New York 1947). F. D. WILHELMSEN, The Metaphysics of Love (New York 1962).

[R. O. JOHANN]

LOVE (IN THE BIBLE)

To understand the place of love in the Bible, one must begin by examining the Biblical usage of the pertinent Hebrew root and of the Greek stem that corresponds to it in the Septuagint (LXX) and in the NT. Love, then, will be treated under three main headings: vocabulary, in the OT, and in the NT.

Vocabulary. Biblical Hebrew has a root ('āhāb or 'āhāb) that corresponds rather closely to the English term love. Like love, it can signify passion, desire, satisfaction, contentment, friendliness, intimacy, attachment, esteem. It regularly implies preference and often vehemence.

Greek has four stems for love: στέργω (affection founded on a natural bond such as family relationship), ἐράω (passionate, possessive love), φιλέω (friendship; intimate, respectful, often tender love), and ἀγαπάω (preference, esteem). The pagan poets and philosophers treat most often of the second (ἔρως) and third (φιλία) the translators and writers of the LXX show marked preference for the fourth (ἀγάπησις or ἀγάπη). Perhaps because ἀγαπάω sounds somewhat like ' $\bar{a}hab$ or because, like the Hebrew root, it implies preference, the translators regularly use it, employing φιλέω much less frequently, ἐράω rarely, and στέργω hardly at all.

The NT follows LXX usage: ἀγαπάω is the usual term for love while ἐράω is absent, στέργω almost so, and φιλέω (except in compound words) relatively rare (usually expressive of friendship, but in John of a particularly warm love).

Old Testament. The Hebrew Bible prefers other terms to describe the relationship between God and man. As partner to a covenant with His people, Yahweh shows them loyal attachment (hsd), fidelity ('mn), tenderness (rhm), and active favor (hnn). But to nuance the notion of covenant, Deuteronomy and Hosea point (ten times) to the gratuitous divine elective love that inspired it and to the enduring character of the divine love that will outlast the repudiation of the covenant at the time of the Exile. Later writers occasionally refer to this strong, gratuitous, preferential, and privilege-conferring divine love for Israel or for certain chosen individuals (e.g., David) or places (e.g., Zion).

The Israelites' relation to Yahweh is one of fear, service, and loyal attachment (the second and third of these terms referring to the COVENANT relationship), but also occasionally of love—most often in the stereotyped formula that usually appears in translation as "those who love Yahweh" but probably means simply "Yahweh's friends." Deuteronomy, however, uses love several times to present the really religious man—the convinced Yahwist—as a man wholeheartedly devoted to the God of the covenant and showing his devotion in obedience to all Yahweh's commands: obedient love is the equivalent of authentic religion.

Love for fellow man appears as a religious duty only three times in the entire Hebrew Bible. In texts that are neither characteristic nor central, it is commanded as the proper attitude toward fellow Israelites and aliens resident within the Israelite community (Lv 19.18, 34; Dt 10.19). The usual terms to designate this proper relation are righteousness ($s^e d\bar{a}q\hat{a}$) and justice ($mi\bar{s}p\bar{a}t$), the former implying active beneficence and coming gradually to signify almsgiving.

The Septuagint contains nothing more than the Hebrew Bible on love for neighbor. It contains several additional references to love for God in the deuterocanonical books, but these are almost always instances of the stereotyped formula referred to above (God's friends). It also contains about twice as many references to divine love because of deuterocanonical usage or the translators' occasional rendering of other terms than ' $\bar{a}hab$ by $\dot{\alpha}\gamma\alpha\pi\dot{\alpha}\omega$. But the idea of divine love in these additional texts is that of the Hebrew books. Most often the participle $\dot{\eta}\gamma\alpha\pi\eta\mu\dot{\epsilon}\nu$ o ζ or the adjective $\dot{\alpha}\gamma\alpha\pi\eta\tau\dot{\epsilon}\zeta$ occurs, and Israel (or some favored individual) is the object of the Lord's elective love.

New Testament. The stem ἀγαπάω occurs well over 300 times in the NT. It rarely designates reprehensible love. It represents a central notion in the NT conception of divine-human relations. The reason lies in the fact that in the NT the notion of covenant gives place to that of divine paternity. Father is the proper name of the God of Jesus. He is Father of Jesus and of all those who become one with Jesus.

Synoptic Gospels. Crucial texts in Matthew, Mark, and Luke (baptismal THEOPHANY, TRANSFIGURATION, parable of the wicked vinedressers) present Jesus as God's "beloved Son," i.e., His Son in a unique sense ("only" Son—Hebrew yāḥîd, Septuagint ἀγαπητός) and the object of His paternal predilection. At the same time Jesus occasionally uses the term love to designate the total devotion to the Father and to Himself that He demands, and He declares Deuteronomy's command to love God (Dt 6.5) the greatest commandment of the Old Law. But above all, with startling originality, He proclaims love of neighbor the second greatest commandment of the Law and like the first; He reinterprets it to extend to all men including religious persecutors; He declares it an imitation of the Father and the behavior that proves a man son of God, and He identifies it as the criterion by which men will be judged.

Pauline Epistles. St. Paul presents the divine beneficence to man as mercy, to emphasize the misery or undeserving nature of its objects; as grace, to underscore its gratuitous character; and otherwise as love (usually thereby implying its magnitude). Christ's Passion-Resurrection is the great manifestation of His own and the Father's love. In imitation of Christ (and God) the Christian, the man who is "in Christ," must love especially fellow Christians but also all men, with a sincere, active, selfsacrificing love. Such love for neighbor is ultimately love for Christ (and God) because of the relation in which the neighbor stands to Christ. Other references to love for God occur rarely, as e.g., the OT cliché, "those who love God" (or "the Lord"). Paul's usual term for man's proper relationship of total surrender to God in Christ is faith. Those who make this surrender then reflect the divine love in their lives by their love for neighbor.

Johannine Writings. St. John almost never uses any term but love for God's beneficence toward men. In His Passion-Resurrection Christ reveals that God is love. The Father shows unique love for the Son, passing on to Him His own glory. The Son shows love for the Father and maintains Himself in the Father's love by obeying His command to show supreme love for the disciples by His Passion-Resurrection. The disciples show love for the Son and maintain themselves in the Son's love by obeying His command to love one another with a self-sacrificing love like His own. Love is a divine reality coming to believers from the Father through the Son, returning from them through Christ to the Father, vivifying them, marking them as Jesus' disciples, and proving the divine origin of His mission.

See Also: FAITH, 1; GRACE (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1377–85. C. SPICQ, Agape in the New Testament, tr. M. A. MCNAMARA and M. H. RICHTER (St. Louis 1963).

[T. BARROSSE]

LOVE, VIRTUE OF

In classical Catholic theology love was understood as the supernatural or theological virtue of CHARITY and its acts. Through divinely infused charity a person is oriented directly to the goodness of God as he is in himself, and God is loved for his own sake; the self and others are loved inasmuch as they potentially or actually participate in the divine goodness.

Since charity intends God as he is in himself rather than as only Creator of the universe, it was understood to be distinct from natural love of God, based on natural knowledge of him as source of the universe. Accordingly, charity presupposes the supernatural knowledge of God that is faith, which in turn exists only as a response to a free, supernatural, divine revelation.

Even this most rudimentary statement of the meaning of charity in classical theology discloses that the concept, "charity," is inseparably bound to the meanings of such other concepts as natural love, natural knowledge, faith, revelation, the natural and the supernatural. Charity is analyzed and its meaning employed as a part of a theological conceptual system; its meaning is assigned in conjunction with the assignments of other meanings within the system.

The direction of contemporary theology that was established by Vatican Council II has passed from a classical world view and into historical consciousness. That has brought about theological developments of the concepts inseparably bound to the notion of charity in classical theology. The meaning of charity itself, it is therefore clear, must evolve similarly.

In the textbook way of pursuing theology, the principal treatise on charity has traditionally been part of MORAL THEOLOGY, a discipline oriented in the past to the preparation of confessors. The orientation towards PRAXIS, it is now generally recognized, was conducive to understanding the Christian life in a minimalistic way. The Christian life as presented in the textbook setting is the life of the precepts or commandments. It is distinct from the life of the COUNSELS, which was classified also as the life of striving for perfection and was studied in another discipline, ascetical theology.

As an element of Christian life, charity did not escape the minimalizing tendency in the science of the life of the precepts. Moral theologians generally maintained that Christ's new law of charity added no moral precepts in a material sense to those already contained in the Decalogue; charity, rather, brought a new "form" to acts in accord with those precepts. Thus moral theology tailored charity to fit the life of the precepts. While the face of charity in ascetical theology was generous and selfsacrificing, mirroring the countenance of its crucified Lord, the face of charity in moral theology was often egocentric and self-serving. Moralists saw charity as love, first, for God; secondly, for self; and only thirdly, for neighbor. Since the Christian life studied by ascetical theology was considered to be extraordinary, and since biblical research had not yet come into existence, the moralists' understanding of charity prevailed in classical Catholic theology.

Models for Understanding Charity. Three models or ways of understanding charity are now discernible in theology. They can be called potency-act, I-Thou, and self-transcendence respectively.

Potency-Act Model. The potency-act model of charity prevailed in moral theology from its beginnings as an independent discipline until the period of Vatican Council II. Basic to this model is the notion that love is an act of the intellectual appetite, the WILL. Man desires happiness, and his beatitude in the order of salvation is the beatific vision of the divine essence, in which man's supernaturally elevated intellectual appetite for the perfect good is completely fulfilled. Love for God is radically love for the perfect good, which God in himself is and to which the human intellectual appetite is ordered, at least when supernaturally elevated by charity. The neighbor is loved inasmuch as she or he is related to the divine goodness.

The strength of the potency-act model is its insistence on God's transcendence. If God is understood as the perfect, universal GOOD, which totally satisfies the human appetite and in which alone the beatitude of man consists (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 2.8), there can be no tendency toward the false immanentism inclined to seek God only as present in the neighbor and not also as the transcendent Mystery and to reduce religion to social service in the secular city.

Nevertheless, this model has several limitations. The uniqueness of the person of the neighbor seems to be undervalued and ultimately superfluous. If the neighbor is loved only inasmuch as he or she participates in the divine goodness, it is difficult to explain how the neighbor is loved precisely inasmuch as he or she is not God but a unique person in his or her "otherness" in relation to God. How or why the neighbor can be loved for his or her own sake is not readily explicable, and there is a tendency to regard the neighbor as a means to one's own final end. St. Thomas himself concluded that the perfection of charity essential to beatitude does not necessarily include a perfection of charity for the neighbor: even if there were only one soul enjoying God, it would be perfectly happy (beata) without a neighbor to love (ibid. 4.8 ad 3).

Another disadvantage of this model is its anthropocentrism. Man is (OBEDIENTIAL) POTENCY for the BEATIFIC VISION, in which God is apprehended directly. God as the perfect good is seen as man's fulfillment, the fulfillment of the human appetite. The charge of regarding God here as a function of man cannot be completely escaped. A theocentric view of reality, it seems, would see man at the ultimate goal of love as a "function" of God.

A third disadvantage is demonstrated by the history of the use of this model. The model is individualistic and hardly conducive to the development of a social consciousness that strives toward the reign of God in working to ameliorate the social order on earth.

I-Thou Model. The second model of charity, the I-Thou, differs from the first in that it sees the love for "a concrete Thou" (Rahner) rather than an explicit love for God as the primary, fundamental act of charity. The love for a human Thou, according to this model, is the human and moral act par excellence. In it a person comes to himself or herself, fulfills his or her personal nature and freedom, and actuates himself or herself totally as a person in relation to all reality. The genuine love for a human Thou, moreover, is a supernatural act of charity and intends, implicitly and unthematically, God as he is in himself; and this implicit intending of God is the basic act of love for God.

Unlike the potency-act model, the I-Thou model emphasizes that love is an interpersonal relation and that, rather than rationally objectifiable goods, persons themselves in their ultimately mysterious depths are intended by love. This model makes clear also that a person is loved for his or her own sake as the unique individual that he or she is. Hence there is little tendency to regard the neighbor as a means to one's own beatitude. Love is seen here also as issuing from the mysterious core of the human spirit, touched by the Spirit of God, where a person freely disposes of herself or himself. As the notion that love is an act of the intellectual appetite is basic to the first model, basic to the second is the idea that love is the personal act par excellence of freely disposing of oneself.

A limitation of the I-Thou model, shared in its own way by the first model, is that it seems to portray a "cheap grace" of personal fulfillment. Fulfillment appears to be located prematurely in the I-Thou relation. To be sure, the love for a human Thou is seen as placing the one who loves in an authentic relation to all reality. What is not indicated, however, is that one who stands in authentic relation to all reality must experience an exigency to work toward the transformation of the social order of the world. Precisely because the person loving a human Thou is seen as actuating herself or himself in the totality of her or his person, it is unclear that authentic universal, social community could add anything essential to the personal fulfillment already realized in the I-Thou communion.

Self-Transcendence Model. A third model sees charity as self-transcendence. Whereas the second model emerged in the decade before Vatican Council II, the third began to appear, chiefly in LIBERATION THEOLOGY, only in the decade following the Council. Still undeveloped, the self-transcendence model sees man, somewhat in the manner of Eastern mysticism, as oriented to transcend himself. Its view differs from Eastern mysticism, however, in that personal individuality is won, not lost, in self-transcendence.

While the potency-act model sees man as an active potency for the good, which, when attained, actuates and fulfills him, the self-transcendence model sees him more as a passive potency, capable of being annexed, indeed through his own cooperation, to the reality greater than himself that envelops him. Man needs to be "converted" (Lonergan) to reality; he must allow himself to be annexed to reality through authentic relations to it. Knowledge, according to this model, is less a drawing of reality into the mind and an actuation of the self (intellectus quodammodo omnia) and more a process of allowing the self to be annexed or joined, in an authentic (cognitive) relation, to the totality of what is. Similarly, love is seen as a state of CONVERSION to reality, in which a person allows herself or himself to be united, in an authentic personal (affective and effective) relation, to the whole of reality.

Defense of the Self-Transcendence Model. The third model seems to possess the strengths but none of the weaknesses of the other two models. The idea of love as the self transcending itself through authentic personal union with the totality of reality, like the first model, certainly safeguards the transcendence of God. Indeed the third model reverses the ANTHROPOCENTRISM of the first and locates the individual properly within the totality of reality, seeing him or her as ultimately annexed to God himself.

Like the I-Thou model, the self-transcendence model sees love as issuing from the depths of a person, from the core of personal freedom; moreover, it recognizes that the basic act of love is the I-Thou relation and that love is directed to the Thou in the mysterious, nonobjectifiable depths of his or her person. However, the third model also makes it clear that the fulfillment experienced in the love for a human Thou is merely relative and that personal fulfillment is ultimately to be found only in the fulfillment of the totality of reality. Only the self-transcendence model, seeing the individual as called to be annexed authentically to the whole of reality, makes clear that the individual's fulfillment is ultimately inseparable from the beatitude of all mankind. Love according to this model becomes, in a word, the seeking of the KINGDOM OF GOD. It becomes an active concern to transform the world by working to transform society into authentic community. When charity is understood as personal commitment to the reign of God, the unity of love for God and love for neighbor is seen in a new, more intimate and universal dimension, concealed from the eyes of the first and second models.

Bibliography: G. GILLEMAN, The Primacy of Charity in Moral Theology, tr. W. RYAN and A. VACHON (Westminister, Md. 1959). B. HĀRING, The Law of Christ (Westminster 1964) 2:83–107, 351–469. R. JOHANN, The Meaning of Love (Westminster 1959). B. LONERGAN, Method in Theology (New York 1972) 101–124, 237–244. K. RAHNER, Theological Investigations 5 (Baltimore and London 1966) 439–459; 6 (London and New York 1974) 231–249. N. RIGALI, "Toward a Moral Theology of Social Consciousness," Horizons: Journal of the College Theology Society 4 (1977) 169–181. P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, The Phenomenon of Man, tr. B. WALL (New York 1959) 237–290.

[N. RIGALI]

LOVERS OF THE HOLY CROSS (LHC)

(Amantes de la Croix, Dòng Mấn Thánh Gia, abbreviated "L.H.C.," Official Catholic Directory, #2390) the first Vietnamese indigenous religious congregation, founded 1670 by Bishop Pierre LAMBERT DE LA MOTTE. This congregation is significant in the history of the Catholic Church in Vietnam for being the mother congregation that gave birth to, or inspired the formation of, all subsequent Vietnamese indigenous women religious congregations, including DOMINICAN SISTERS, Vietnamese Dominican Sisters, and the CONGREGATION OF MARY, QUEEN. The accompanying table lists all the L.H.C. congregations in existence at the beginning of the 21st century.

L.H.C. communities are found in Vietnam, Thailand, Laos, Cambodia, Taiwan, Japan, France, Germany, Norway, Italy, and the United States of America.

THE LOVERS OF THE HOLY CROSS IN VIETNAM

Early History. In his travels in northern Vietnam, Bishop Lambert had come across a group of celibate Vietnamese Catholic women who, on their own initiative, organized themselves into a community and practiced virtuous deeds. Impressed by their faith and perseverence, he decided to reorganize them into a religious congregation. Lambert drafted the original Rule for the fledging congregation, and witnessed the vows of the first two sisters on Feb. 2, 1670. The first community was officially formed at Kiên Lao (Nam Định, Bùi Chu Diocese in northern Vietnam), followed by Bái Vàng (Hà Nam, Hà Nội Diocese) and An Chỉ, Quảng Ngãi. On Aug. 28, 1678, the congregation received the official recognitio from the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Persecutions. The early decades of the young congregation were unsettling times, marked by the Vietnamese rulers' persecutions of Christians (see VIETNAM, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN). Despite these persecutions, the congregation attracted many new members and convents were established in all dioceses in Vietnam. From its inception, the sisters were engaged in a diverse range of ministries: praying for the success of the missionary enterprise in Vietnam and China in the midst of persecution; teaching catechism; educating Christian and non-Christian girls; caring for widows, the sick, homeless, refugees and the destitute; and baptizing infants and children in danger of death. Often, the sisters were the only Catholic presence in the area, working as catechists and ministering to the religious needs of the local Catholic community when foreign missionaries were either expelled or executed on orders of the Vietnamese emperor. At the height of the persecutions during the mid-19th century, over 30 convents were destroyed, about 2,000 sisters were dispersed and some 200 were martyred. In Huế alone, 56 sisters were burnt alive in the local parish church and two other sisters were buried alive.

Revival, Growth and Reorganization. When persecutions ended, the congregation experienced a renaissance, with many new vocations coming in and new convents established. In the early years of the period of reconstruction, the sisters wore lay clothes and worked in the rice-fields. In 1867, the sisters returned to their apostolic ministries, and began wearing religious habits and working as village catechists. With the promulgation of the 1917 Code of Canon Law, steps were taken to regularize the congregation's various diocesan foundations.

In 1925, the Congregation of Phát Diệm became the first to validate its Rule and regularize its vows according to the 1917 Code. Since then, other congregations sought to regularize their status.

First Great Exodus of 1954. The partition of Vietnam into the communist North and the non-communist South pursuant to the 1954 Geneva Agreement resulted in a massive displacement of the various congregations in the North. Many of these congregations were decimated when most of the sisters joined the exodus of Catholics fleeing the incoming communist government. These sisters were welcomed and helped by the congregations in the South to re-establish themselves, often from scratch. In the South, many congregations collaborated closely with the Catholic Relief Services and Caritas International.

The Fall of Saigon and the Second Great Exodus.

The wave of religious persecution that followed in the wake of the fall of Saigon on April 30, 1975 also engulfed the L.H.C. Practically all the properties belonging to the various congregations, especially the schools and centers for social outreach were consficated by the communist authorities. Many sisters fled Vietnam, joining the second exodus of refugees fleeing on rickety fishing boats. Those who remained behind faced great hardships. Deprived of all means of support, the sisters returned to the land, working in rice-fields and raising cattle, as was the case in the 1860s. Under such tumultuous conditions, many sisters died from hunger, malnutrition and sicknesses. Those who had survived struggled to minister to the needs of the faithful. The sisters' solidarity with the common folk earned them much admiration, inspiring many Catholics to hold onto their faith despite the intense persecution.

When persecutions eased in the mid-1980s, many congregations were able to regroup and reorganize themselves with financial assistance from the Vietnamese diaspora. Despite continuing restrictive practices such as registration and reporting requirements, the Sisters were able to re-establish their social outreach ministries gradually, setting up childcare centers, kindergartens and orphanages as a result of new vocations and growth.

Reorganization and New Directions. Under the sponsorship of the late Archbishop Paul Nguyễn Văn Bình of Hồ Chí Minh City (Saigon) and under the guidance of Fr. Phi Khanh Vương Đình Khởi, a Franciscan priest, a Studies Committee on Lambertian Spirituality was formed in 1985 from the seven L.H.C. congregations in the Archdiocese of Hồ Chí Minh city. The principal objective of this committee was the carrying out of research and studies for the purposes of facilitating a return to the roots and a better understanding of the Lambertian

Name of Congregations	Diocese	Date of Foundation
Northern Vietnam
L.H.C. Kiên Lao	Bui Chù	1670
L.H.C. Hung Hóa	Hưng Hóa	1786
L.H.C. Vinh (Xã Đoài)	Vinh	1844
L.H.C. Phát Diệm	Phát Diệm	1902
L.H.C. Hà Nội	Hà Nội	1928
L.H.C. Thanh Hóa	Thanh Hóa	1932
Central Vietnam
L.H.C. Huế (Thủ Đô)	Huế	1719
L.H.C. Nha Trang	Nha Trang	1955
L.H.C. Qui Nhơn	Qui Nhơn	1958
Southern Vietnam
L.H.C. Cái Nhum	Vĩnh Long	1800
L.H.C. Thủ Thiêm	HCM City	1840
L.H.C. Cái Mơn	Vinh Long	1844
L.H.C. Chợ Quán	HCM City	1852
L.H.C. Gò Vấp	HCM City	1902
L.H.C. Đà Lạt	Đà Lạt	1932
L.H.C. Khiết Tâm	HCM City	1938
L.H.C. Cần Thơ	Cần Thơ	1958
L.H.C. Tân Lập	HCM City	1960
L.H.C. Tân Việt	HCM City	1963
L.H.C. Tân An	Mỹ Tho	1963
L.H.C. Bắc Hải	Xuân Lộc	1963
L.H.C. Thủ Đức	HCM City	1965
L.H.C. Phan Thiết	Phan Thiết	1983
U.S.A.
L.H.C. Los Angeles	Los Angeles	1992

charism of the Cross. At the beginning of the 21st century, three important documents were published: The Biography of Pierre Lambert de la Motte, the Manual on Lambertian Spirituality and the Constitution of the Lovers of the Holy Cross. The Constitution was approved by the Vietnamese Bishops and was accepted by most L.H.C. congregations in Vietnam and the United States. At the end of the year 2000, in Vietnam there were about 2,940 perpetual professed, 1,074 temporary professed, 474 novices, and 447 pre-novices. Future plans in Vietnam include the formation of a federation of all diocesan L.H.C. congregations and the pooling of resources for collaborative programs for the training and formation of pre-novices and novices.

THE LOVERS OF THE HOLY CROSS IN THE UNITED STATES

Sisters of the L.H.C. arrived in the United States under terrible, chaotic conditions, their journeys by fishing boats totally unplanned and uncoordinated. The sisters were divided and split into different refugee camps, and were resettled in the United States under the sponsorship of various religious orders. Eventually, the sisters were able to regroup and establish new communities. In compliance with canonical provisions, each community was attached to a Vietnamese L.H.C. congregation.

Despite much hardship coping in a strange land and mastering an unfamiliar language, the sisters were able to settle down and establish new social ministries, healthcare and outreach programs for Vietnamese refugees, as well as religious education programs for Vietnamese children and youth.

The L.H.C. in the United States came of age in 1992, when the motherhouse of the L.H.C. Phát Diệm Congregation in Northern Vietnam, with the approval of the Holy See, granted administrative autonomy to the Los Angeles community, the largest community of L.H.C. in the United States. A new congregation, the L.H.C. Los Angeles Congregation came into existence as an autonomous Institute of Consecrated Life of Diocesan Right under the 1983 Code of Canon Law, with the motherhouse in Gardena, California. The L.H.C. Los Angeles Congregation has continued to maintain close ties with the other Vietnamese congregations, holding steadfastly to the Lambertian charism and spirituality, as well as assisting the Vietnamese congregations by rallying support and raising funds among the faithful in the Vietnamese diaspora for various relief projects.

Bibliography: Published sources on the L.H.C. include the three major works in the Vietnamese language produced by the Studies Committee on Lambertian Spirituality — the Biography of Pierre Lambert de la Motte, the Manual on Lambertian Spirituality, and the Constitution of the Lovers of the Holy Cross. These works were published for the first time in the United States in Thời Điểm Công Giáo, since 1995.

[T. T. PHAN]

LÖW, JOSEPH

Liturgical scholar; b. Vienna, July 23, 1893; d. Rome, Sept. 22, 1962. After having studied at Vienna and Katzelsdorf, Austria, he entered the REDEMPTORIST novitiate at Eggenburg in 1911, took philosophy and theology in the Redemptorist seminary at Mautern, and was ordained July 31, 1919. From 1920 to 1935 he taught liturgy, homiletics, archeology, and history of sacred art at Mautern and Gurk, making three long stays in Rome, where he worked under Johann Peter KIRSCH on the disciplines of Christian antiquity. He contributed valuable assistance in the restoration of the cathedral of Gurk, Carinthia. When called to Rome in 1935, he was named vice relator in the historical section of the Congregation of Rites and worked on hagiographical material, particularly in the preparation of the historical positions for the confirmation of cult and beatification of Hemma of Gurk, Kateri Tekakwitha, Rose Verini, and Herman Joseph. From 1948 he was employed in the preparation of liturgical reform that eventuated in the restored Easter Vigil (1951) and the new Code of Rubrics (1960). His interest in liturgical reform stemmed from a sane pastoral appreciation, which was for him a most important aspect of liturgical cult. He was named relatore aggiunto for the historical section of the Congregation of Rites (Nov. 21, 1959). Meanwhile, he published studies on liturgy, archeology, and the history of the Redemptorists. He was a founder and editor of the Spicilegium historicum CSSR.

Bibliography: F. ANTONELLI and A. SAMPERS, Spicilegium historicum Congregationis Sanctissimi Redemptoris 10 (1962) 305–322, with complete bibliog. A. SAMPERS, Ephemerides liturgicae 77 (1963) 39–45.

[A. SAMPERS]

LOW CHURCH

Low Church is the name applied to the party within the ANGLICAN COMMUNION in general, and the Church of England in particular, that interprets the BOOK OF COM-MON PRAYER in a wholly Protestant sense. This large body in the Church of England took its rise with the evangelicals of the 18th century. The Tractarians, with their lofty views on Catholic doctrine and sacerdotal nature of the priesthood, contrasted with the lower views of the evangelical tradition, and the two groups gradually became distinguished as High Church and Low Church. Both designations, however, had been used in the early 18th century. At that time the term Low Church was used as an alternative name for LATITUDINARIANISM. A small group of evangelical divines contemporary with the Tractarian Movement formed the Broad Church. Today the Low Church party within the Anglican Communion represents the Protestant party, in contrast to the Catholic tendencies of the High Church party.

Bibliography: G. R. BALLEINE, A History of the Evangelical Party in the Church of England, (London 1933). K. HYLSON-SMITH, Evangelicals in the Church of England, 1734–1984 (Edinburgh 1988). C. J. COCKSWORTH, Evangelical Eucharistic Thought in the Church of England (Cambridge, Eng. 1993). R. T. FRANCE and A. E. MCGRATH, Evangelical Anglicans: Their Role and Influence in the world today (London 1993). R. STEER, Church on Fire: The Story of Anglican Evangelicals (London 1998). G. CARTER, Anglican Evangelicals: Protestant Secessions from the Via Media, c. 1800–1850 (Oxford 2001).

[E. MCDERMOTT/EDS.]

LOWE, JOHN

Friar, anti-Lollard bishop; b. c. 1382; d. Rochester, Sept. 3, 1467. He entered the AUGUSTINIANS at Droit-wich, Worcester, and studied at Lincoln where he was ordained deacon on Dec. 20, 1403. After ordination and the earning of his doctorate at OXFORD, he was affiliated with the great house of his order in London (1420). He was the Augustinian provincial in England (1427–33); was appointed confessor of King Henry VI in 1432; became bishop of SAINT ASAPH in 1433, and of ROCHESTER in 1444. A bitter foe of the LOLLARDS, he contributed to the downfall of Bp. Reginald PECOCK both as a judge, and as adviser to John Bury in the writing of the Gladius Salomonis. As a humanist Lowe assisted in the foundation of Eton College (1442) and King's College, CAM-BRIDGE UNIVERSITY (1444) and built the library of the Austin Friars in London (c. 1456). While bishop of Rochester, he rebuilt the episcopal palace. He was involved in politics as a Member of Parliament. Although he had been the confessor of Henry VI, he joined the opposing Yorkist cause in 1460 and served as an emissary to Henry in Northampton without result. After the second battle of St. Alban's (1461) he was a delegate of the city of London to Edward IV.

Bibliography: A. I. PEARMAN, Rochester (Diocesan Histories; London 1897). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1168–69, 3:xxxiii. F. ROTH, English Austin Friars, 2 v. (New York 1961) 1:104–108.

[F. ROTH]

LOWE, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1553 at London, England; d. Oct. 8, 1586, hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn. He was a Protestant minister who was converted to Catholicism and then studied for the priesthood at Douai and Rome, where he was ordained in 1582. He ministered in the London area, where he was a well-known exorcist. He was condemned for his priesthood and executed with BB. Robert BICKERDIKE, John ADAMS, and Robert DIBDALE, who were all beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LOWELL PLAN

An experiment involving an educational compromise between secular authority and Catholic schools from 1831 to 1852 in Lowell, Mass. The first Catholic school in Lowell, which had been opened between 1823 and 1824, for lack of facilities was run haphazardly. At the annual town meeting of May 3, 1830, the citizens voted to expend "for this year only" $50 "for the instruction of the children of the Irish families in this town." The town meeting of April 4, 1831, voted to establish a public school for the purpose and to make a school district of the "acre" on which the Irish Catholics had become accustomed to living. By 1835 the first school, in the basement of St. Patrick's Church, and another, which had been built at Chapel Hill, were adopted into the public school system. The terms set by the public officials were that a town committee approve teacher qualifications, appoint teachers, and pass on curriculum and texts and that these schools be on the same footing as the other schools of the town concerning examinations, inspection, and general supervision. The Catholic terms, presented by Rev. Peter Conelly, were that the teachers must be Catholic and that the textbooks should contain no statements unacceptable to Catholics (Catholics later approving the books that were already in use).

Though town regulations then required Bible reading and prayer in the schools, this arrangement said nothing about religious instruction. Because Bp. Benedict Fenwick of Boston, under whose jurisdiction the plan was devised, wrote in a letter on this matter (March 26, 1831) that he "would not give a straw for that species of education, which is not accompanied with and based upon religion," it is assumed that the Catholic schools gave religious instruction, presumably after school hours, however, since both state and municipal regulations forbade otherwise.

In 1837 the school committee reported that the plan was "eminently successful," and the mayor lauded "these public nurseries of intelligence, freedom, good order, and religion." By 1839 the plan comprised three grammar and two primary schools with a total enrollment of 752 pupils; and in 1840, because of amalgamation and rearrangement, one grammar school and five primaries. The plan brought more Irish children into school than before, lessened the crime rate, avoided prejudice and exclusiveness, and helped alleviate financial burdens of Catholics.

The picture was not completely bright, however, for by degrees Catholic schools lost their distinctive character, becoming "separate but equal" schools for Irish Catholics. The town, moreover, violated its agreement by employing some non-Catholic teachers. In 1844 dissatisfaction with some teachers caused Catholic parents to petition their removal, and brought about a drop in attendance. In 1849 public authorities named the grammar school after Horace Mann—an insult to the Irish and at the same time the chairman of the school committee lauded the plan that had been used to bring the Irish under public school instruction. By 1851 there were almost as many Irish in public as in the special schools. The passions of the Know-Nothing movement further complicated matters (see KNOW-NOTHINGISM). In 1852 the Catholics under Rev. John O'Brien established St. Patrick's school for girls, staffed by the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur, and applied for an extension of the town's plan to provide for it. The civic authorities could not legally employ Catholic religious, with the result that the arrangement was abrogated by the town, the Catholics established private schools, and totally nonsectarian public education received another impetus. Had the experiment remained successful, it might have spread and thus might have helped solve the church-public school problem.

Bibliography: S. M. SMITH, The Relation of the State to Religious Education in Massachusetts (Syracuse, N.Y. 1926) 191–199. L. S. WALSH, The Early Irish Catholic Schools of Lowell Massachusetts, 1835–1852 (Boston 1901).

[H. A. BUETOW]

LOYSON, CHARLES

Apostate French priest, sectarian leader; b. Orléans, March 10, 1827; d. Paris, Feb. 9, 1912. He entered the seminary of Saint-Sulpice in Issy (1845) and joined the SULPICIANS (1850). After ordination (1851) he taught philosophy in Avignon and theology in Nantes until he became a curate in the church of Saint-Sulpice, Paris (1856). In 1859 he entered the Dominicans and took the name Hyacinthe. Five months later he transferred to the Discalced CARMELITES. Père Hyacinthe was a dynamic pulpit orator who won wide acclaim for his sermons in the cathedral of Notre Dame, Paris (1864), and also in Rome. His Advent sermons of 1868 and some exaggerated remarks concerning marriage and non-Catholic groups brought him into conflict with his religious superiors. His connection with a religiously pathological woman from the U.S., Emily (Butterfield) Meriman, whom he converted in 1868, contributed to his difficulties. He seized upon the agitation concerning papal infallibility previous to VATICAN COUNCIL I as an occasion to leave the Church. After he was excommunicated (1869), he entered into a civil marriage with Emily in London (1872). He joined the OLD CATHOLICS and became their pastor in Geneva (1873–1874), but his restless and eccentric nature soon alienated him from them. In 1879 he founded in Paris his own church, the Église catholique gallicane, after fruitless attempts to do so since 1872. Despite his great oratorical gifts, he was unable to give life to the movement, which survived precariously until 1893. Periodic efforts thereafter to revive it failed. After journeys in America and in Palestine, Loyson settled in Paris. MODERNISM did not interest him. More and more he tended toward an undogmatic type of mysticism and rationalism that degenerated into a cult of his wife. His principal writings are listed below.

Charles Loyson. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: Works. De la Réforme Catholique, 2 v. (Paris 1872–73); Ni cléricaux ni athées (Paris 1890); Mon testament . . . (Paris 1893), Eng. tr. F. WARE, My Last Will and Testament (London 1895). Du sacerdoce au mariage (letters and diaries), ed. A. HOUTIN and P. L. COUCHOUD, 2 v. (Paris 1927); synopsis by O. KNAPP, Hochland 24.2 (1927) 520–531. Literature. G. RIOU, Le Père Hyacinthe et le libéralisme d'avant le Concile (Paris 1910). A. HOUTIN, Le Père Hyacinthe, 3 v. (Paris 1920–24). M. DE LANZAC DE LABORIE, Le Correspondant 25 (April 1925) 240–265.

[V. CONZEMIUS]

LOZANO, PEDRO

Jesuit historian; b. Madrid, Spain, June 16, 1697; d. Humahuaca, Argentina, Feb. 8, 1752. He entered the Society of Jesus on Dec. 7, 1711, and 20 days later left from Cádiz as a member of the expedition of Burges en route to Buenos Aires, where he arrived on April 8, 1712. He was ordained in 1721. After spending nine years assisting the sick and dying in Santa Fe, he was appointed in 1730 historiographer of the province. Lozano gives the impression that he remained in Santa Fe or Córdoba; actually he traveled widely through the La Plata area—in what is now Argentina, Paraguay, and Uruguay. In 1751 his fellow Jesuits appointed him their representative to prepare a reply to the Treaty of Limits, which transferred some of the Jesuit Reductions to Portugal.

Numerous books and other writings by Lozano are known. No matter what judgment may be made of his work, he made good use of the 20 years as provincial historiographer. His chief works are: Descripción del Gran Chaco Gualamba (Córdoba, Spain 1733; repr. Tucumán 1941); Historia de la Compañía de Jesús de la Provincia del Paraguay (2 v. Madrid 1754–55); Historia de la conquista del Paraquay, Río de la Plata y Tucumán (5 v. Buenos Aires 1873–75); Historia de las revoluciones de la provincia de la Paraguay (2 v. Buenos Aires 1905).

Bibliography: G. FURLONG, Pedro Lozano, S. J., y sus "Observaciones a Vargas" (1750) (Buenos Aires 1959). E. CARDOZO, Historiografia paraguaya (Mexico City 1959) 1:285–306.

[H. STORNI]

LUBAC, HENRI DE

Theologian, cardinal; b. Cambrai, Feb. 20, 1896. After the study of law, Henri Marie-Joseph Sonier de Lubac entered the Society of Jesus in 1913 at the novitiate of Saint Leonard (Great Britain). During his study of letters (Canterbury 1919-20), philosophy (Jersey 1920-23), and theology (Ore Place, Hastings 1924-26; Lyon-Fourviere 1926–28) he had as fellow students Yves de MONTCHEUIL (1899-1944) and Gaston Fessard (1897–1978). De Lubac published many of their works after their deaths. Stimulated by their friendship, his thought developed through contact with such great masters as the philosopher Maurice BLONDEL (1861–1949), whose more important correspondence he would later publish, and Léonce de GRANDMAISON (1868-1927), Pierre ROUSSELOT (1878-1915), Joseph MARÉCHAL (1878–1944), and Joseph Huby (1878–1949).

After ordination to the priesthood (1927), and following his tertianship (Paray-le-Monial, 1928–29), de Lubac taught fundamental theology at the Catholic Faculty of Lyon (not at Fourvière, as legend has it), where he succeeded Albert Valensin, brother of Auguste, many of whose works de Lubac also published posthumously [notably Auguste Valensin: Textes et documents inédits (Paris 1961)].

Henri de Lubac, Rome, 1969. (AP/Wide World)

The following year, de Lubac founded the chair of the history of religion at Lyon and became acquainted with Jules Monchanin (1895-1957) who initiated him to "Mahayanasutralamkara" and who had a decisive influence over his thought [cf. Images de l'abbé Monchanin (Paris 1967)]. While in residence at the Jesuit theologate at Fourvière (Lyons), he founded in 1940, with J. DAN-IÉLOU the collection Sources chrétiennes, which would become famous. Having fought during World War I and been seriously wounded in 1917, he nurtured and enlivened a spiritual resistance movement against Nazism during World War II with his confreres Pierre Chaillet and Gaston Fessard, publishing the journal Témiognage chrétien [cf. R. Bedarida, Les armes de l'espirit: Témiognage chrétien, 1941-1944 (Paris 1977)]. From its inception he collaborated as advisor and author on the collection of monographs Théologie published at Fourvière. From 1947 to 1950, he was director of Recherches de Science religieuse, a review founded by P. L. de Grandmaison. In 1950, the authorities of his order barred him from teaching (until 1959) and theological research (a measure that would be progressively relaxed). They were not, however, implementing the directive of the encyclical HUMANI GENERIS (1950), but the "mots d'ordre" of a small group of theologians who prosecuted the so-called Ecole de Fourvière and Nouvelle Théologie. Later this same group attempted to have his theology condemned by the Council. Pope PIUS XII, who did not condemn de Lubac or his ideas, sent him words of encouragement through a letter dictated to his confessor, P. A. Bea, S.J.

In August 1960, Pope JOHN XXIII, who knew of the affair as nuncio at Paris, named him consultor of the preparatory commission to the Ecumenical Council of Vatican II. As a peritus on the theological commission, de Lubac participated thereafter in all the work of the council (1962–65). And the same superior general who had prohibited de Lubac from teaching asked him to defend the thought of his friend and confrere, Pierre TEILHARD DE CHARDIN (1881–1955), fearing that it might be condemned by the council. Lubac defense of Teilhard, which demonstrated an exact understanding of his thought, was decisive to his exoneration.

Named as a member of the International Theological Commission (1969-74), de Lubac became a consultor to the Pontifical Secretariats for Non-Christians and for Non-Believers. He sought to understand the true sense of the conciliar teachings, and to guard against a "paracouncil" which would make Vatican II an absolute point of departure for drawing the Church in an unjustified direction. During this period he traveled through North and South America and received numerous doctorates honoris causa. A founding member of the review Concilium, from which he retired in November 1965, he also contributed to the foundation of the international Catholic review COMMUNIO, with the later Cardinal J. Ratzinger, and Louis Bouyer, M. J. Le Guillou, and H. U. von BALTHA-SAR and served as a member of the French editorial committee until May 1977. JOHN PAUL II, who developed ties of friendship with de Lubac during the Council, created him cardinal in 1983.

Works. Like the opening of an opera, de Lubac's Catholicisme (1938; Eng. 1950) brings to our understanding nearly every theme of his truly "organic" theology. He considers in this book how the Spirit of God works through society and history in order to make humanity the Body of Christ according to the design of the Father, Who has created humanity in His image as persons and who has loved them, from that time on, as they are in themselves. The created and incarnated spirit which is man is henceforward an impulse toward God, who is his origin and calls him to Himself, while the Church, as the Body of Christ, is missionary. Moved by "the natural desire for God," the primordial act of the human spirit is the fundamental "certitude" of the original "faith," which in other words is "the knowledge of God' which envelops and critiques (via negativa) affirmations of God.

Correlatively, ATHEISM merits theological reflection. De Lubac treats of oriental and occidental atheism, as well as both the atheism that is anterior to Christ, that of Buddhism, and that which is posterior to Christ and specifically anti-Christian, that of Feuerbach, Nietzsche, and Comte, which he distinguishes from that of Proudhon: this latter is formed through a reaction against a Church dominated by an "unsupportable reactionary narrowness of a certain kind of Catholicism found during the Restoration" (H. U. von Balthasar, Henri de Lubac, 65). Concerning anti-Christian atheism, de Lubac discerns the shadow of Joachim of Flora of the twelfth century. The theory of Abbot Joachim, according to which the spirit realizes the design of God apart from the incarnated Word, in effect inspired Lessing and the Enlightenment which would secularize it, as well the progressive movements up to our day. It risks contaminating the Church when it admits an "atheistic hermeneutic of Christianity" (Athéism et sens de l'homme, 23 ff.).

With a capacity for both affirming and denying God, the human spirit has a history-determining destiny that he beyond at the same time that it belongs to him. According, in effect, as the human spirit considers itself called to filial adoption by God, as rising to the center of the cosmic becoming, or as receiving the revelation of God through Jesus Christ, the created spirit of man is moved by an identical movement in its own depths: it directs itself and is guided toward an end which is gratuitous. This is respectively, elevation to the SUPERNATURAL life; the Spirit; and Jesus, the Son of God. This end is prepared: with regard to supernatural elevation, it is the natural desire of God; with regard to the spirit, the world; and with regard to Jesus Christ, it is Israel and the chosen people. But because it is gratuitous, this end goes beyond all that has been prepared: the desire for God, the world, Israel, and all that transforms within.

It is well suited to de Lubac's purpose to consider separately the problematic of the spiritual, treated in Surnaturel (1946) and Mystére du surnaturel (1956), that of anthropogenesis, undertaken during his studies of Teilhard de Chardin, and that of the connection between the old and the new covenant, developed in Histoire et Espirit (1950) and in Exégèse Médiéval (1959–65). These three problematics clarify one another without ever recurring, though de Lubac treated all three together in his Pic de la Mirandole (1974).

This kind of analogy between movement and structure finds its principle and its end in the Lord Jesus. The universe is Christ-like by its constitution and destination, for man finds his final reality in Christ and knows of no movement of the Spirit that could go beyond Christ (contra Joachim of Flora). Furthermore, as in clear in Corpus Mysticum (1944, 1968), one part of de Lubac's Christology is implicitly eucharistic: in His singular Body through which He places Himself into human history and becomes cosmic, Jesus fulfills the destiny of humanity thanks to the eucharistic offering of Himself through which he is united to the Church, His spouse and body. Consequently, the ecclesiology of de Lubac is also eucharistic. Thence its Marian dimension, the reciprocal interiority of the particular churches within the universal Church is also the human subject who believes in the God of the Trinity, bringing to completion the primordial consciousness of God and the movement of the human spirit toward God; it is in this sense that all believe and become persons [cf. La Foi chrétienne (1969, 1970)].

Influence. Henri de Lubac never defended his work as an original theological contribution. He only gave, he said, his voice to the tradition. As a matter of fact, he showed it to be living. The originality of his work is that of the tradition itself. His influence is both discrete and diffuse—not that of a school, but more that of a master. One can see it in the ecclesiology of Vatican II which is eucharistic (J. Ratzinger), and in the dogmatic perspective—not rationalistic—of Dei verbum. Instead of imposing from outside the ideas of theological reflection, the apologetic of de Lubac is dogmatic, inviting the scientific study of religion to leave its methodological neutrality, which is fallacious, to abandon the idea of a "transcendent unity of religions," as well as that of a diffraction of the religious into the cultural, and to raise in their proper relief and contrast the great spiritual options, which lead the Christian to better perceive the absolute novelty of Christ. In brief, de Lubac's apologetic is dogmatic in being historic [cf. M. Sales in his admirable Der Gott Jesu Christi (Mainz 1982)]. Just as he has overcome the opposition, born in the sixteenth century, between the natural and supernatural ends of the human spirit, de Lubac has also overcome the division between positive and speculative theology, which had appeared in the same century.

Correlatively, all historical questions have been renewed. In effect, de Lubac observes a unity between history and the Spirit everywhere. Exegesis should also become a renewed being [cf. M. van Esbroeck, Herméneutique, structuralisme et exégèse. Essai de logique kérygmatique (Paris 1978); P. Piret, Exégèse et Philosophie (Brussels 1987)], as should moral theology, which can depart from its positivism and its Kantian transcendentalism thanks to his doctrine of the supernatural. For all of these reasons and in diverse manners it is clear that the Modernist crisis is overcome from within and in principle: history and Spirit are reconciled. If one agrees that this crisis recovered vigor after Vatican II and has not since ceased to rage (cf. G. Chantraine, Vraie et fausse liberté du théologien 1969), one will know that de Lubac's work has not ceased to be fertile.

Bibliography: K. N. NEUFELD and M. SALES, Bibliographie Henri de Lubac, S. J. 1925-1974 (Einsiedeln 1974); "Bibliographie de Henri de Lubac (corrections et compléments) 1942-1989,' Théologie dans l'histoire, 2:408-416. J. P. WAGNER, La théologie fondamentale selon Henri de Lubac (Paris 1997). H. DE LUBAC, At the Service of the Church: Henri de Lubac Reflects on the Circumstances That Occasioned His Writings (San Francisco 1993); Théologie dans l'histoire (Paris 1990). H. U. VON BALTHASAR, The Theology of Henri de Lubac: An Overview (San Francisco 1991). J. A. KOMONCHAK, "Theology and Culture at Mid-Century: The Example of Henri de Lubac," Theological Studies 51 (1990): 579-602. S. WOOD, Spiritual Exegesis and the Church in the Theology of Henri de Lubac (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1998). L'homme devant Dieu: Mélanges offerts au père Henri de Lubac, 3 (Paris 1963-64). D. L. SCHINDLER, ed., "The Theology of Henri de Lubac: Communio at Twenty Years," Communio 19 (1992): 332-509.

[G. CHANTRAINE]

LUBIENIECKI, STANISŁAW

Socinian knight, pastor, and historian; b. Raków, Poland, Aug. 23, 1623; d. Hamburg, Germany, May 18, 1675. The son of the pastor in Raków and educated in the academy there, Lubieniecki was appointed traveling tutor to a young count and with him visited Holland and France (1646–48). In 1652 he was ordained in the Minor Church, serving first in Czarków. In 1655 he besought Charles X Gustav of Sweden, whose troops occupied Cracow, for protection of the Minor Church. By 1660 all remaining Socinians were obliged to flee Poland or suffer death (see SOCINIANISM). After brief stays in Fredericksburg, Copenhagen, Stralsund, and Stettin, he settled in Hamburg, where he was opposed by the Lutheran clergy. Of his 32 works, two were published posthumously: Historia reformationis Polonicae (Amsterdam 1685), a major source of Polish religious history from the point of view of an exiled antitrinitarian leader, and Theatrum cometicum (Amsterdam 1688), a history of comets and a demonstration that they had no significance in presaging human affairs.

Bibliography: B. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1167. R. WALLACE, Antitrinitarian Biography, 3 v. (London 1850) 3:294–306. J. TAZBIR, Stanisław Lubieniecki: Przywódca ariańskiej emigracji (Warsaw 1961), with genealogical tables.

[G. H. WILLIAMS]

LUCARIS, CYRIL

Patriarch of Constantinople, theologian; b. Candia, Crete, Nov. 13, 1572; d. Constantinople, June 1638. He studied in Venice, in Padua, and in Geneva, where he absorbed the Calvinist teachings that are reflected in his theological writings. As rector of the Vilna Academy in the 1590s, he strongly opposed the Union of BREST in 1596. Appointed patriarch of Alexandria in 1602, he became patriarch of Constantinople in 1612. He was several times deposed and then reappointed by his Muslim masters, holding office from 1620 to 1623, 1623 to 1630, 1630 to 1633, 1633 to 1634, 1634 to 1635, and 1637 to 1638. The brief intervals in his tenure mark periods of political and religious unrest within the empire. He was often attacked and criticized by his coreligionists because of his Calvinist leanings. Throughout his life he opposed any efforts at reunion with Rome. It was he who gave the Codex Alexandrinus to Sir Thomas Roe, the English Ambassador at Constantinople, who presented it to Charles I; it now lies in the British Museum. In 1638 the troops of the Sultan Murad seized and strangled Lucaris, and cast his body into the sea. His theological writings were numerous and important for their Calvinist influence on Orthodox doctrine.

Bibliography: C. EMEREAU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 9.1:1003–19. R. SCHLIER, Der Patriarch Kyrill Lukaris von Konstantinopel (Marburg 1927). G. HOFMANN, Griechische Patriarchen und römische Päpste, Patriarch Kyrillos Lukaris und die römische Kirche (Rome 1928–).

[F. J. LADOWICZ]

LUCAS, FIELDING, JR.

U.S. publisher and bookseller; b. Fredericksburg, Virginia, Sept. 3, 1781; d. Baltimore, Maryland, March 12, 1854. For almost 40 years Lucas was Baltimore's leading publisher and, after Mathew CAREY's death in Philadelphia (1839), the major U.S. Catholic book publisher. He regularly did business with Carey, with whom he exchanged stereotype plates; historically, Lucas is noted for printing atlases and maps. He began Catholic publications with textbooks written by members of the faculty of Mt. St. Mary's College in Emmitsburg, Maryland. Between 1838 and 1841, the active Lucas catalogue included 154 Catholic titles on popular dogmatic, apologetic, and devotional subjects. Widely circulated in annual editions of 3,000 or more was the Metropolitan Catholic Almanac and Laity's Directory (1833–57), a continuation of the U.S. Catholic Almanac, or Laity's Directory, acquired (1833) from James Myres, also of Balti-Although Lucas attended church services regularly, he became a Catholic only during his last illness.

Bibliography: J. W. FOSTER, "Fielding Lucas, Jr., Early 19th Century Publisher of Fine Books and Maps," American Antiquarian Society Proceedings 65 (1955) 161–212.

[E. P. WILLGING]

LUCAS, FREDERICK

Journalist; b. Westminster, March 30, 1812; d. Staines, Middlesex, Oct. 22, 1855. He belonged to a wellknown Quaker family, attended London University, and read for the bar, to which he was admitted in 1835. He was received into the Church in 1839, but should not be reckoned among the OXFORD MOVEMENT converts. His great contribution to the revival of Catholic life in England was the foundation of the TABLET (1840) as a weekly journal for the educated laity. He did not limit the journal's content to ecclesiastical or religious subjects; the first issue, for example, reported a current murder trial at some length. Lucas's political sympathies were with the Whigs, the party of reform and liberalization, and he was deeply disappointed when Pius IX, after his first liberal phase, became more and more preoccupied with the defense of the temporal power of the Holy See against the rising tide of anticlerical Italian nationalism. The pope became increasingly anxious to keep the friendship of the British government, and the situation in Ireland offered a good bargaining point. Lucas was not an Irishman, but he warmly espoused their cause and was returned to the House of Commons for an Irish seat. He moved the *Tab*let to Dublin (1849) and edited it from there for about three years. The paper's chronic financial difficulties worsened as Lucas could win little English Catholic support for the Irish cause. He was dismayed to discover that the Irish bishops, acting in obedience to Rome, discouraged the clergy from supporting the movement for the repeal of the Union. Lucas went to Rome (1854) to try to get the policy modified, with no success. He returned to England and died in the following year; the Tablet was acquired by another convert, John Wallis, who sold it (1868) to the future Cardinal Herbert VAUGHAN.

Bibliography: J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 4:336–343. E. LUCAS, The Life of Frederick Lucas, M.P., 2 v. (London 1886).

[D. WOODRUFF]

LUCCI, ANTONIO NICOLA, BL.

Baptized Angelo Nicola; Conventual Franciscan, bishop; b. Aug. 2, 1682, Agnone, Isernia (near Naples), Italy; d. July 25, 1752, Bovino, Italy.

Angelo was the fifth of the seven children of Francesco Lucci and Angela Paolantonio. The family owned two vineyards and a copper firm, but Francesco worked as a cobbler. Francesco's unexpected death in 1604 led to some financial difficulties, but he had provided for Angelo's education under the Conventual Friars Minor at Agnone until the age of 15. Despite his mother's objections, Angelo entered the order at Isernia in 1697, professed his vows in 1698, and took the name Antonio. He continued his studies at Venafro, Alvito, Aversa, Agnone, and Assisi, and was ordained a priest in 1705.

After receiving his doctorate in theology in 1709, he was assigned to San Lorenzo (Naples), where he taught and ministered. The profundity of his theological insight gained him several positions, including provincial superior of Sant'Angelo (1718), rector of San Bonaventura, Rome (1719–29), theological advisor for two Roman synods, consultor to the Holy See (1725), and spiritual director to Princess Maria Clementina Sobieski. He was consecrated bishop of Bovino Feb. 7, 1729, by Pope Benedict XIII.

Even after his episcopal consecration, Lucci continued to conduct his life according to the Franciscan Rule in poverty, humility, and charity. He emptied his treasury to provide for the poor and was known to give away the clothes off his back. As bishop, he was known for his pastoral zeal, even to teaching children's catechism classes to prepare them for the sacraments. In addition to reforming the clergy and religious and building schools, Bishop Lucci defended the rights of the poor and the vulnerable in response to the problems of the era. He died in the odor of sanctity after 23 years as bishop and was buried in his cathedral at Bovino.

Lucci's cause was initiated shortly after his death: informative process (1758–60), official introduction (1764), apostolic process (1769–70), and publication of the positios (1793 and 1835). Pope Pius IX declared Lucci venerable in 1847. His cause was reopened recently when a number of miracles were attributed to his intercession. After one was approved June 18, 1989, Lucci was beatified by Pope John Paul II June 18, 1989.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1989): 764.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LUCEY, ROBERT EMMET

Second archbishop of San Antonio, TX, founder of the Bishop's Committee for the Spanish Speaking; b. Los Angeles, CA, March 16, 1891; d. San Antonio, TX, Aug. 1, 1977. He was the fifth of John Lucey and Mary Nettle's eight children. Lucey's lifelong and outspoken advocacy of labor causes may be traced to an early childhood experience. When Robert was nine years old, his father, an employee of the Southern Pacific railroad, was killed in a work-related accident for which the family received only a small compensation from the company. Lucey pursued his theological studies in Rome, where he was ordained on May 14, 1916, and awarded a doctorate in theology.

Lucey returned to Los Angeles and took up the routine of a parish priest until his appointment as diocesan Director of Catholic Charities in 1920. He subsequently acknowledged that this assignment completely changed the direction of his life by giving him direct contact with the poor, an experience that evoked a firm commitment to Catholic social teachings. In 1934, he was ordained bishop of Amarillo, TX, where he remained until his 1941 installation as the sixth ordinary and second archbishop of San Antonio. Lucey remained archbishop until advanced age and conflicts with his priests over his autocratic exercise of episcopal authority forced his retirement in 1969.

Career. During a career that spanned more than four decades in the hierarchy, Lucey earned a solid reputation as a liberal on social issues. In 1941 Time magazine hailed him as the "most socially conscious New Dealer in the Roman Catholic hierarchy." In addition to his outspoken advocacy of unpopular social causes, Lucey was one of the hierarchy's staunchest supporters of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD), an organization that he regarded as the apostolate of the laity par excellence because of its potential to educate informed and socially committed adult Catholics. He served on the Bishop's Committee for the CCD from 1946 to 1969.

The archbishop is further remembered for establishing and directing the Bishops' Committee for the Spanish Speaking from 1945 until 1969. Lucey used his position as chair of this committee to champion the rights of migrant farm workers. His widely publicized efforts in this area won him a 1950 appointment by President Harry Truman to a blue ribbon committee on migrant worker issues. Archbishop Lucey delivered the invocation at the presidential inauguration of Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964. He subsequently served as a member of President Johnson's Advisory Council for the War on Poverty and, more controversially, as a member of the observation team for the 1967 presidential elections in South Viet Nam. The later appointment came in recognition of his strong support for the Johnson administration's unpopular prosecution of the Viet Nam War.

Lucey spent his retirement years promoting the use of telecommunications and space satellites for evangelization and catechesis. In 1969 he hosted an international study week on telecommunications and catechetics that brought recognized experts from all over the world to San Antonio. The last five years of his life were marked by increasingly serious health problems that precluded the retired archbishop's active participation in public life.

Bibliography: S. E. BRONDER, Social Justice and Church Authority. The Public Life of Archbishop Robert E. Lucey (Philadelphia 1982). S. A. PRIVETT, Robert E. Lucey: Evangelization and Catechesis Among Hispanic Catholics (Arbor, MI 1985). V. A. YZERMANS, American Participation in the Second Vatican Council (New York 1967).

[S. A. PRIVETT]

LUCHESIUS OF POGGIBONSI, BL.

First Franciscan tertiary; b. Gaggiano, Tuscany, Italy, c. 1181; d. Poggibonsi, between Florence and Siena, April 28, 1260. A tall Guelf soldier turned greedy merchant and grain speculator, Luchesius underwent a change of heart, probably before meeting St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI c. 1213. With his wife, Buona dei Segni, he distributed his wealth to the poor, retaining only a field that he farmed himself. He then undertook an apostolate of charity, seeking out and nursing sick paupers and begging food for the hungry. Luchesius and Buona were among the first to whom St. Francis, in 1221, gave the long grey habit and strict rule of his Third Order. Luchesius and Buona died the same day. Luchesius had received the graces of ecstatic prayer and levitation, and after his death acquired fame for miracles. Pope Bl. GREGORY X first approved his cult in 1273 at Poggibonsi, and a basilica was built over his tomb c. 1300. The cult was confirmed in 1694. Basilica and town, almost completely destroyed by Allied bombing in 1944, have been rebuilt.

Feast: April 28.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Apr. 3:600–616. C. R. HALLACK and P. F. ANSON, These Made Peace, rev. and ed. M. A. HABIG (Paterson, N.J. 1957) 2–9, 243. G. DUHAMELET, Lucchese, Premier tertiaire franciscain, 1180–1260 (Paris 1960). Quaderni Poggibonsesi (Poggibonsi 1960). O. ENGLEBERT, St. Francis of Assisi: A Biography, tr. E. M. COOPER, 2d augm. ed. by I. BRADY and R. BROWN (Chicago 1966). M. MINGHI, Poggibonsi: repertorio bibliografico delle località e delle persone (Poggibonsi 1986).

[R. BROWN]

LUCIAN OF ANTIOCH, ST.

Martyr, theologian, founder of the school of Antioch; b. probably in Antioch, c. 240; d. Nicomedia, Jan. 7, 312. Suidas said Lucian was born at Samosata of devout parents and studied under Macarius at nearby Edessa. At Antioch Lucian became involved with the Patriarch PAUL OF SAMOSATA and shared his condemnation (269) for holding that Christ was a mere man. As head of a schismatic group, Lucian remained excommunicated during the episcopates of Paul's three successors at Antioch. He made his submission c. 285, was received back into communion, and remained orthodox until his martyrdom.

Few men have had so strong an influence on the history of Christianity. Lucian used his linguistic skill to correct the Septuagint and Gospel texts; and his recension became the common one. He also developed a literal-historical method of exegesis characteristic of the School of Antioch, which he founded (c. 260). He held that each passage of Scripture has a literal sense, either proper or metaphorical, and he found the true sense of scriptural metaphor and parables by considering the special features of Hebrew and Greek literature, by comparing similar Biblical passages, and by grammatical and historical examination. He also allowed a typical meaning based on the literal sense and expressing the relationships between OT and NT. His method opposed the allegorizing practice of the Alexandrian School; but in stressing the importance of the letter, his school sometimes neglected the spirit, that is, the divine element in Scripture. Nonetheless, it later produced such exegetes as DIODORE OF TARSUS and JOHN CHRYSOSTOM.

Lucian's influence in theology was less fortunate. He is called Father of Arianism because ARIUS and almost all the fourth-century Arian theologians were his students. Calling themselves Lucianists and Collucianists, they developed his adoptionist and subordinationist tendencies into a full heresy. Lucian's moral life was blameless, however, and he was revered as saint and martyr by Arian and orthodox alike. Both John Chrysostom and EUSEBIUS provide firm evidence of his cult, confirmed by numerous church dedications.

Feast: Jan. 7 (West); Oct. 15 (East).

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, Maryland 1950) 2:142–144. Acta Sanctorum Jan. 1:357–64. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903-50) 9.1:1024–31; Recherches sur s. Lucien d'Antioche et son école (Paris 1936); "Le Discours Apologétique de s. Lucien d'Antioche (Rufinus Hist. eccl., IX.6)," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 22 (1926) 487–512. C. LATTEY, "The Antiochene Text," Scripture 4 (1951) 273–277. PHILOSTORGIUS, Kirchengeschichte: Mit dem Leben des Lucian von Antiochien und den Fragmenten eines arianischen Historiographen, ed. J. BIDEZ (Berlin 1981). G. ZUNTZ, Lukian von Antiochien und der Text der Evangelien, ed. B. ALAND and K. WACHTEL (Heidelberg 1995).

[P. W. HARKINS]

LUCIE-CHRISTINE

French mystic whose identity is almost completely submerged in her pseudonym; b. France, Feb. 12, 1844; d. France, April 17, 1908. Lucie-Christine married at age 21, had five children, and became a widow after 22 years of married life. During the last 38 years of her life she completed 16 notebooks detailing her spiritual life for her director, the parish priest of the place where she lived. Although he had never known or met Lucie-Christine, Auguste Poulain, SJ, was given the task of editing and condensing these notes because of the prominence of his own book, The Graces of Interior Prayer.

Lucie-Christine began to receive extraordinary graces on April 25, 1873, while she sat alone at her needlework. From that day on she became increasingly adept at dovetailing the demands of her duties as wife and mother with the demands of the mystical life. She prayed in the streets of Paris, on trains, at the theater, and while entertaining her children. She contracted conjunctivitis which eventually resulted in total blindness.

Bibliography: A. POULAIN, ed. and tr., Spiritual Journal of Lucie-Christine (St. Louis 1915). J. VERBILLION, "Married Mystic: Lucie-Christine," Cross and Crown 9 (1957) 148–161.

[J. VERBILLION]

LUCIFER OF CAGLIARI

Bishop of that see (ancient Calaris) in Sardinia; d. c. 370. Along with EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Vercelli, Lucifer represented Pope LIBERIUS at the Synod of Milan (355), at which the Emperor CONSTANTIUS exerted strong pressure on the bishops to condemn St. ATHANASIUS. Lucifer opposed the emperor in such vehement terms that both he and Eusebius were sent into exile. Lucifer was banished to Commagene, and subsequently to Palestine and the Egyptian Thebais. Throughout his career he was an uncompromising defender of the letter, rather than the spirit, of the Trinitarian teachings of the Council of NI-CAEA, and he attacked all opponents—even those who merely questioned these teachings—with a fierceness bordering on fanaticism. While in exile, he wrote five exceedingly bitter polemics: De non conveniendo cum haereticis, De regibus apostaticis, De S. Athanasio, De non parcendo in Deum delinquentibus, and Moriendum esse pro Dei filio.

Although expecting and hoping to be martyred, he was freed from exile by the Emperor Julian's edict of 362 and was soon embroiled in the religious controversies between the followers of Meletius and Eustathius at Antioch. He was invited by St. Athanasius to attend the Synod of Alexandria, which had been called to reconcile, as far as was possible, the differences between the Catholics and Arians of various understandings. He refused the invitation, but sent two deacons to represent him. Ignoring the conciliatory recommendations of the synod, he proceeded to consecrate Paulinus, a priest of Antioch and an adherent of Eustathius, as bishop, thereby founding the Meletian schism. On his return to Sardinia, he continued to attack all who disagreed with or questioned his uncompromising views and ended his career in isolation. That he died in schism is supported by the testimony of St. AMBROSE (De excessu Satyri 47) and St. AUGUSTINE (Epist. 185.47).

Lucifer was a mediocre theologian and exegete. However, his copious citations from the Old Latin versions of Scripture are an invaluable source of Old Latin readings. His deliberately careless literary style reflects many usages of the spoken Latin of his age. His close adherents, the Luciferians, as a more or less schismatic group, continued his rigoristic views, but disappeared in the early 5th century. They are attacked by St. JEROME in his Dialogus contra Luciferianos (c. 379).

Bibliography: Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 14 (1886). G. CERETTI, Moriendum esse pro Dei filio (Risa 1940), with comment. J. L. DAVIES, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE (London 1877–87) 3:749–751. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50). 9.1:1032–44, including Luciferians. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–32) 3:469–477. U. MORRICA, Storia della letteratura latina cristiana, 3 v. in 5 (Turin 1923–35) 2.1:165–181. C. ZEDDA, "La teologia trinitaria di Lucifero di Cagliari," Divus Thomas 52 (1949) 276–329. G. THÖRNELL, Studia Luciferiana (Uppsala 1934), on L.'s language.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

LUCIUS, ST.

Legendary Christian king in England; fl. second century. The LIBER PONTIFICALIS mentions a letter supposedly written to Pope ELEUTHERIUS c. 187 by a British king asking the Holy See to send missionaries to convert his people. The monarch's name is given in a passage reporting a letter from Lucio Britannio rege, and this is the only extant evidence of his existence. Later, unsubstantiated traditions relate that the king was baptized by St. TIMO-THY, who reportedly was working as a missionary in Gaul at the time, and that he then undertook a missionary journey himself to the area around the Swiss canton of Graubünden. His relics are reputed to have been brought to Chur, and a completely unhistorical life of the saint was written by the end of the 13th century. He has been honored since the Middle Ages as the patron of the Diocese of Chur. The story was taken up by BEDE (Hist. Eccl. 1.4; 5.24) and later chroniclers, but it is well to remember that the section of the Liber pontificalis in which he appears was not compiled until c. mid-sixth century, when he was already popular in Switzerland. It is the opinion of present-day scholars that the word Britannio in the text may have been confused by some medieval scribe for Britio, which was the location of one of the strongholds of Lucius Aelius Septimius Megas Abgar IX (see ABGAR, LEGENDS OF), an early Christian king of Edessa in Asia Minor who concerned himself with the conversion of his people in mid-second century.

Feast: Dec. 3.

Bibliography: L. P. DUCHESNE, Liber pontificalis 1:136. The 13th-century life, ed. B. KRUSCH, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 3:1–7. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 2:5024. A. HARNACK, "Der Brief des britischen Königs Lucius an den Papst Eleutherius," Sitzungsberichte der Deutschen (Preussischen to 1946) (1904) 909–916, reviewed by A. H. MATHEW, English Historical Review 22 (1907) 767–770; "Saint Lucien," The Irish Ecclesiastical Record 4th ser., 22 (1907) 457–474. J. G. MAYER, Geschichte der Bistums Chur (Stans 1907) 11–29. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 9.2:2661–63. C. J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (New York 1962) 10.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

LUCIUS I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: June or July 253 to March 5, 254. With his predecessor Pope CORNELIUS, Lucius was banished from Rome to Civitavecchia by the Emperor Gallus. Valerian (253–260) soon succeeded Gallus, however, and allowed Lucius to return to Rome. Cyprian of Carthage (Epistolae 61) salutes him as "dearest brother" and praises him as an honored confessor. Cyprian expressed his regret that the pope had not died a martyr and his hope that this might yet happen, but Lucius apparently died a natural death.

Nothing is known of his pontificate. The LIBER PONTIFICALIS ascribes to him an order that two priests and three deacons should abide with the bishop as constant witnesses of his conduct, but this source also contains an apocryphal account of his martyrdom. Cyprian (Epistolae 6.88) states that Lucius maintained the liberal policy of his predecessor with regard to the LAPSI of the Decian persecution, despite the continued opposition of the Novatianists (see NOVATIAN AND NOVATIANISM), a schismatic group, to the policy by which lapsi were to be readmitted into the church after a suitable penance.

Lucius was buried in the cemetery of Callistus where a portion of his epitaph has been recovered. He is the first bishop whose death is recorded in the Depositio episco-porum (on March 5), thus attesting to the commemoration of Roman bishops that was then being celebrated along with that of other heroic Christians, such as the martyrs.

Feast: March 4.

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 7:2. DUCHESNE, Liber pontificalis, 1:xcvi-xcviii, ccxlviii, 66–69, 153. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al.,

(Paris 1903—50) 9.1:1056–57. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 6:1176. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 2:698. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 19–20.

[E. G. WELTIN]

LUCIUS II, POPE

Pontifcate: March 12, 1144 to Feb. 15, 1145; b. Gerard Caccianemici, Bologna, date unknown. Having been a canon of St. John Lateran, he was named cardinal priest by Honorius II in 1124. As legate to Germany (1125–26) he was present at LOTHAIR III's election and suggested the nomination of (St.) NORBERT as bishop of Magdeburg. IN-NOCENT II, whom he vigorously supported and whom he also served as legate to Germany, appointed him chancellor. No details of his election are known. Lucius acknowledged the homage, but not the royal title, of Alfonso Henriquez of Portugal. An armistice of seven years temporarily stabilized papal relations with Roger II of Sicily; Roger retained Capua, but promised to refrain from attacking Benevento or other papal lands. Meanwhile, in Rome the senate reconstituted itself under the leadership of Jordan PIERLEONI, brother of the former antipope, Anacletus. Since the new Emperor, CONRAD III, was unable to respond to his pleas for assistance, Lucius personally took charge of an assault on the capital. The pope died during this operation, presumably as a consequence of a wound from a stone. Lucius founded monasteries in Germany and Italy and was especially favorable to the PRE-MONSTRATENSIANS. He held a synod in Rome in May 1144.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1978-90) 179:819-938. Pontificum romanorum. . . . vitae, ed. J. M. WATTERICH, 2 v. (Leipzig 1862) 2:278-281. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1958) 2:385–386. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1956) 2:7-19. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902-32) 9:113-126. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale 774-1252 (Bologna 1947). F. X. SEP-PELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1956) 3:187, 604-607. G. DESPY, "Les cathares dans le diocèse de Liège au XIIe siècle. À propos de l' 'Epistola Leodiensis' au pap L(?)," Christianisme d'hier et d'aujourd'hui. Hommage à Jean Préaux (1979) 65-75. G. M. FACHETTI, Ripalta Sicca. Rivolta d'Adda dall'origine all'anno 1300 alla luce delle nuove importanti scoperte (Rivolta d'Adda 1996). E. SAUSER, Biograhisch-Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon 5 (Herzberg 1993). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (3d ed. Freiburg 1997). F. R. SWIETEK, "A Savigniac Forgery Recovered: Lucius II's Bull 'Habitantes in domo' of Dec. 5, 1144," Studisorum speculum: Studies in Honor of Louis J. Lekai, Ocist (Kalamazoo, MI 1993). F. R. SWIETEK and T. M. DENEEN, "Pope Lucius II and Savigny," Analecta Cisterciensia 39 (Rome 1983) 3–25. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 171–172.

[M. W. BALDWIN]

LUCIUS III, POPE

Pontificate: Sept. 1, 1181 (consecrated, Velletri Sept. 6, 1181) to Nov. 25, 1185; b. Hu[m]baldus Allucingoli (?), Lucca; d. Verona; cardinal deacon of Sant'Adriano (1138), promoted cardinal-priest of Sta Prassede (1141) by Innocent II, and cardinal bishop of Ostia and Velletri by Hadrian IV (1158); long thought to have been a Cistercian, but seems never to have become a monk.

Lucius participated in drawing up the Treaty of Constance with Emperor Frederick I Barbarossa (March 1153), but was an important member of the "Sicilian party" of cardinals who favored an alliance with the king of Sicily and the Lombard cities rather than with the emperor. He took part in negotiating the Treaty of Benevento with William I of Sicily (June 1156) and was prominent in the curia of Pope Alexander III, undertaking legations to the Sicilian kingdom (1166–7) and Constantinople (1167, 1168–9). He participated in failed negotiations with Frederick in Pavia in 1175 and, after Frederick's defeat at Legnano (1176), was a leading negotiator of the Treaty of Venice (1177) that ended the papal schism of 1160–77.

On accession, he was the only pope of this period who is known to have refused to bestow beneficia or gifts on the Romans, a failure to respect custom which contemporaries regarded as contributing to the conflict which led to his exile from the city after only five months. He spent the remainder of his pontificate travelling between towns near Rome and moved north to Verona in the summer of 1184. At first he was aided in fighting the Romans by the imperial chancellor, Christian, archbishop of Mainz, but after Christian's death, sought aid elsewhere.

The most pressing issues of his pontificate were undoubtedly reform after the crisis of the schism and disputes left unresolved by the Treaty of Venice. A controversy over the legacy of Matilda of Tuscany, who had left both allodial and imperial fiefs to the papacy, was not resolved, although an imperial letter records that Frederick offered to hand over a tenth of present and future imperial revenues in Italy to the pope and a ninth to the cardinals, to submit contentious possessions to mutually agreed arbitration, and to meet the pope. Frederick was keen to ensure the Hohenstaufen succession and to have his son crowned during his own lifetime. Lucius may initially have planned to accede to this request, but if so, he later changed his mind. The pope was in Verona from July 22, 1184 and met in council with Frederick there from mid-October to early November and again in mid-December.

On Oct. 29, 1184 the betrothal took place in Augsburg of the emperor's son Henry to Constance, posthumous daughter of King Roger II and aunt of King William II of Sicily. The pope's attitude to this match is not known. He certainly favored the Sicilian kings, raising the royal Benedictine foundation of Monreale to an archbishopric (1183), and he could not have known that King William II of Sicily would die childless. He may also have hoped for imperial support against the city of Rome, as suggested by the chronicler Robert of Auxerre.

Frederick was prepared to make concessions to the pope, as demonstrated by his acceptance (November 1184) of the pope's request that Henry the Lion, Duke of Saxony, be allowed to return from exile in England. The emperor and pope agreed on support for a crusade to the Holy Land, urgently sought by ambassadors to Verona from Jerusalem.

Frederick also supported the papal bull Ad abolendam (Nov. 4, 1184), designed to "eradicate the depravity of heresy," by condemning named heretical groups (Cathars, Patarines, Humiliati, Poor of Lyons, Passagines, Josephines, and Arnaldists) and identifying preaching without authority, or any teaching which differed from that of the Roman church on the sacraments, baptism, forgiveness of sins, and marriage as indicators of heresy. A first attempt at a comprehensive papal policy, the decree charged bishops with seeking out heresy and required temporal rulers to take oaths to aid the church against heretics. Sympathizers with heresy were to be penalized and heretics themselves handed over to secular authority for punishment.

Other issues discussed in Verona were more contentious: Frederick sought the recognition of ordinations bestowed by Alexander's schismatic opponents, but this was referred by the papal side to a later council that never took place. Negotiations broke down over the disputed double election to the archbishopric of Trier. Frederick had called the two candidates to his court in Konstanz, had ordered a second election, and had invested the provost Rudolf. The original victor, archdeacon Folmar, appealed to the pope. Lucius supported Folmar, but no definitive settlement was reached during his pontificate.

This sequence of events may have influenced the pope's attitude toward Henry's coronation: whether at Verona or during 1185, Lucius refused to crown Henry, arguing, according to contemporary chroniclers, that it was not appropriate to have two emperors.

Other acts show Lucius's concern for reform. His bull Vestra (X.3.2.7) commended the holy zeal of laypersons who boycotted masses celebrated by notoriously concubinous priests. He remained well-disposed towards the Cistercians: a privilege of November 1184 prohibited bishops from exercising their power of correction over Cistercian houses and forbade the passing of sentences of excommunication, suspension, or interdict against the order. He settled the disputed status of the diocese of Tripoli, allowing that while part of the province of Tyre, it belonged to the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Antioch. On May 17, 1182 he absolved William the Lion, king of Scotland, lifted the interdict on his kingdom which had been imposed because of royal interference in the election of the bishop of St. Andrews, and sent him a golden rose, a mark of papal favor.

His additions to the college of cardinals included four canons and one monk, but he also continued the tradition of his predecessors in appointing magistri, and the majority were from the communal milieu of north Italy whence he himself came. He encountered Joachim of Fiore, who interpreted a prophecy in Veroli. His Registers do not survive (but certainly existed), and during his pontificate the Liber Censuum was begun. In 1183 he canonized Bruno bishop of Segni (d. 1123), whilst the earliest extant canonization process is that carried out at Lucius's request in 1185 for the lay hermit Galganus (d. 1181). He declined to canonize Anno, archbishop of Cologne, founder of the monastery of Siegburg (d. 1175) but sought further information and recommended that details of the life of the Cistercian Peter, archbishop of Tarentaise (d. 1174) be written down. Both were later canonized. Lucius was buried in the Cathedral of Verona.

Bibliography: J. P. MIGNE, Patrologia Latina (Paris 1878–90) 201:1067-1380; IP 7, 247 nr. 8. Initienverzeichnis und chronologisches Verzeichnis zu den Archivberichten und Vorarbeiten der Regesta pontificum Romanorum, ed. R. HIESTAND, Monumenta Germaniae Historica Hilfsmittel, 7 (Munich 1983) 342-82. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, ed. S. LOEWENFELD, 2 (Graz 1956) 431-92. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 22 (repr. Graz 1961), cc. 173-8, 185, 188, 474-94. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Legum Sectio IV, Constitutiones et acta publica imperatorum et regum, tome I (Hannover 1893; repr 1963) nr. 296. G. BAAKEN, "Unio regni ad imperium. Die Verhandlungen von Verona 1184 und die Eheabredung zwischen König Heinrich VI. und Konstanze von Sizilien," QFIAB, 52 (1972), 219-97 (repr. in G. BAAKEN, Imperium und Papsttum [Cologne 1997] 81-142). W. MALECZEK, Papst und Kardinalskolleg von 1191 bis 1216, Publikationen des Historischen Instituts beim Österreichischen Kulturinstitut im Rom, Abt. 1 Abhandlungen 6 (1984). I. S. ROBINSON, The Papacy 1073-1198. Continuity and Innovation (Cambridge 1990). V. PFAFF, "Sieben Jahre päpstlicher Politik: die Wirksamkeit der Päpste Lucius III, Urban III, Gregor VIII," ZRGKA, 67 (1981) 148-212. J. PETERSOHN, "Kaiser, Papst und praefectus Urbis, zwischen Alexander III. und Innocenz III.," QFIAB, 60 (1980) 157-88. S. WEISS, Die Urkunden der päpstlichen Legaten von Leo IX. bis Coelestin III. (1049-1198) (Cologne 1995) 145-147, 149, 273-4, 282-86, 389; W. OHNSORGE, Die Legaten Alexanders III. im ersten Jahrzehnt seines Pontifikats (1159-1169), Historische Studien, 175 (Berlin 1928). B. ZENKER, Die Mitglieder des Kardinalskollegiums von 1130 bis 1159 (1964) 22–25.

[F. ANDREWS]

LUCK

Luck, according to Aristotle, who made the first satisfactory analysis of it, is an accidental cause intervening in things that happen for the sake of an end and according to purpose (see Phys. 195b 31–198a 13). It is a species of CHANCE, differing from other fortuitous causes in that it happens only to created agents having the use of intelligence. Luck may be good or bad. Many things commonly attributed to it, such as winning at so-called games of chance, are not, since they are intended, due to luck in Aristotle's sense, for in his view lucky events are neither intended nor foreseen: they happen to agents seeking other ends. Whatever their immediate accidental causes may be, lucky and unlucky events ultimately result from the indetermination and limitation of natural causes, and from the incompleteness of human knowledge. St. Thomas Aquinas adopted and developed Aristotle's teaching on luck, showing its compatibility with Catholic doctrine concerning PROVIDENCE by explaining God's foreknowledge and control of fortuitous events (see esp. In two phys. 7–10; Summa theologiae 1a, 115.6; 116.1).

Bibliography: C. DE KONINCK, "Chance and Fortune," Laval theologique et philosophique 1.1 (1945) 186–191). M. J. JUNKER-SFELD, The Aristotelian-Thomistic Concept of Chance (Notre Dame, Ind. 1945).

[H. J. FREEMAN]

LUCRETIUS

Roman poet and philosopher; b. c. 98 B.C.; d. 55 B.C. Lucretius was probably an aristocrat and a friend of Gaius Memmius, the patron of Catullus and Cinna. According to St. Jerome, he composed his only poem, De rerum natura (On the Nature of the Universe), in the lucid intervals between bouts of insanity, and he died by his own hand, the unfinished poem being entrusted to Cicero for publication. Yet Lucretius was a poet of great ability and forged a strong link in the chain of Latin hexameter verse between Ennius and Vergil. His poem had earlier models in the works of Xenophanes, PARMENIDES, and especially EMPEDOCLES ("On Nature"). Indeed, the opening invocation to "kindly Venus" who alone has power to subdue Mars, the god of war, may refer to a wish not only for the end of civil strife in Rome, but also for the reconciliation of the cosmic forces of love and strife found in Empedocles.

The general aim of the poem is the elimination of superstitious fear—whether of the gods, unusual happenings, or death—by an account of nature that will be rational and will exclude any divine interference. Thus the poet's main purpose coincides with that of the EPICU-REANISM he professed. In a word it is ethical: it aims at tranquillity and peace of mind. However Lucretius does concentrate upon that division of Epicureanism called physics or philosophy of nature. No capricious agency, but the movement of atoms, eternally falling through the void, accounts for everything. The introduction of an arbitrary swerve (the ultimate source of man's free will) enables them to unite by collision, rebound, and interlinkage. Considerable ingenuity is shown in the naturalistic accounts of the origin of the world, heavenly bodies, man, and speech. Further it is argued that the mind or soul is also corporeal, being composed merely of finer atoms than body, and therefore, equally liable to dissolution. Knowledge comes about through material contact with the effluences or images that are constantly being given off by all things. Explanations of portents and extraordinary phenomena are provided in order to rid the mind of vain fears.

Perhaps, in his lengthy treatment of the emotion of love, Lucretius is speaking from personal experience. He is well aware that it is a pleasure not unmixed with pain and a desire that is sharpened rather than allayed by the attempt to satisfy it. Here he shows evidence of Epicurus's refined critique of pleasure. Man needs to live a life of peace with his soul purged alike from fear and vice, thus imitating the eternal peace and freedom from emotion of the gods, from whom come emanations that announce divine tranquillity.

The attitude of Christians toward Lucretius has been somewhat ambivalent. Early Christian writers, such as ARNOBIUS and LACTANTIUS, although opposed to Epicureanism, borrowed much from Lucretius and even made use of his attacks against the pagan gods. But medieval manuscripts of his work are rare, and the few copies made from one fourth- or fifth-century original seem to owe their existence to the Carolingian literary revival. From the Renaissance onward greater interest was shown, and several printed editions appeared. Although valued as a poet, Lucretius was still opposed on doctrinal grounds; witness the Anti-Lucretius of Cardinal Melchior de POLIGNAC-nine books of hexameter verse De Deo et Natura (On God and Nature), published in Paris in 1747. Since the nineteenth century, however, Lucretius has been studied sympathetically by many Christians.

Lucretius appears as a sensitive man of genius whose aim was to banish from human life the craven fear of deities, unreasoning terror at so-called supernatural phenomena, and anxiety over death. It is incorrect to call him either an atheist or a hedonist in the normal sense of these terms. His end was tranquillity of soul, a tranquillity that he himself perhaps never achieved. It is the Epicurean doctrine of the noninvolvement of deity within man's world that leads to the mechanistic materialism that he so skillfully describes in hexameter verses of great power and even beauty. Such a viewpoint seemed to him vastly superior to the rank superstition that characterized much so-called religion in the first century B.C. Lucretius excites sympathy as a noble character in an evil world; he never lived to see the advent of a religion characterized by a relationship of love and trust between God and man.

See Also: ATOMISM; MATERIALISM.

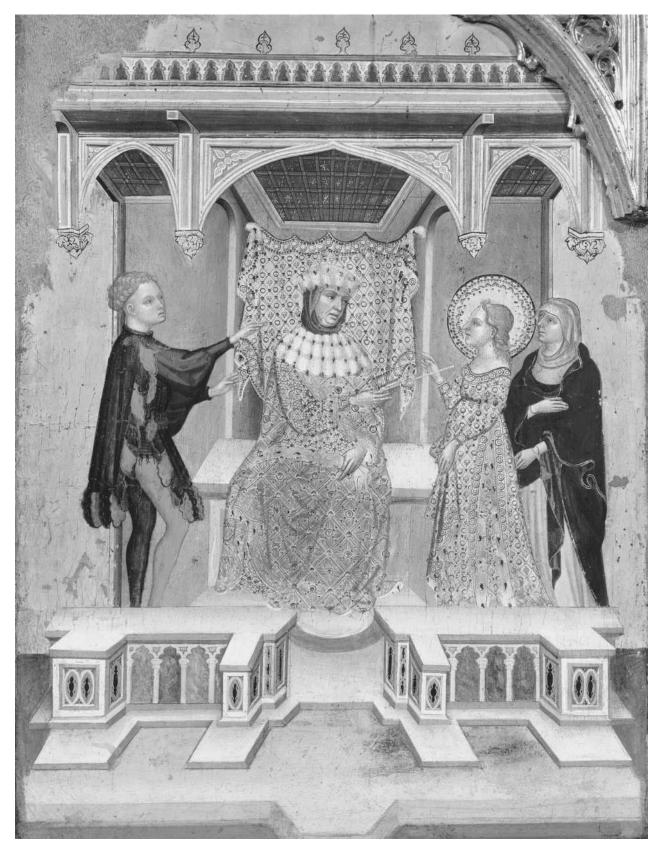

Bibliography: Works. De rerum natura, ed. and tr. C. BAILEY (Oxford 1947); ibid., tr. W. H. D. ROUSE (Loeb Classical Library London-New York-Cambridge 1912); Titus Lucretius Carus on the Nature of Things, tr. T. JACKSON (Oxford 1929); Lucretius on the Nature of Things, tr. R. LATHAM (Baltimore, Md. 1957). Literature. C. A. GORDON, A Bibliography of Lucretius (London 1962). A. D. WINSPEAR, Lucretius and Scientific Thought (Montreal 1963). H. HAGENDAHL, "The Apologists and Lucretius," pt.1 of Latin Fathers and the Classics (Göteborg 1958). L. ALFONSI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:187–190.

[W. H. O'NEILL]

LUCY, ST.

Martyr in Syracuse, Sicily, 304. A fifth-century Greek inscription attests to her cult in Syracuse; she was later introduced into the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries and in the MARTYROLOGY OF ST. JEROME. Her cult spread to Rome, Milan, and Ravenna in the sixth and seventh centuries; GREGORY I (THE GREAT) probably introduced her name and Agatha's, into the Canon of the Mass. A legendary fifth- or sixth-century PASSIO in Greek and Latin tells how in a vision St. AGATHA encouraged her to remain constant to her death in her virginity. Her relics, according to one account, were taken from Syracuse to Abruzzo in the eighth century and from there to Metz in 969, an arm given to Henry III in 1042 going to the monastery of Luitburg. According to the other version, the relics went to Constantinople in 1038 and were brought to Venice in 1204. Lucy, patroness of the eyes, is frequently portrayed with two eyes in a dish. She appears also with a palm of martyrdom, a lamp (or a book), and a sword (or a knife) in her neck. She has frequently been a subject for art. Before the Gregorian calendar reform her feast was the shortest day of the year, and predictions were made for the coming 12 months on the basis of events of the 12 days between her feast and Christmas.

Feast: Dec. 13.

Scene from the Life of Saint Lucy, painting by Jacobello del Fiore, 15th century. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Bibliography: GUERDAL, Santa Lucia, attualità di un messaggio: storia, culto, leggenda (Milan 1976).

[E. G. RYAN]

LUDANUS, ST.

Pilgrim; d. Feb. 12, 1202. Ludanus (Lotten, Luden), who is venerated in the Diocese of Strasbourg, is known only through a 14th-century vita that claims that he was born in Scotland, son of a certain Duke Hiltibold, and that he made a pilgrimage to Rome after the death of his father. He died in Alsace on his return. His tomb in the church of Hipsheim is a fine example of 15th-century Alsatian sculpture, and a popular pilgrimage center of that region.

Feast: Feb. 12 or 16.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 2:5025. Acta Sanctorum Feb. 2:638–639. J. M. B. CLAUSS, Die Heiligen des Elsass (Düsseldorf 1935). J. BRAUNER and K. OHRESSER, "Der Kult des heiligen Ludanus im Elsass," Archives de l'Église d'Alsace 2 (1947–48) 13–61. M. L. HAUCK, "Der Bildhauer Conrad Sifer von Sinsheim . . .," Annales Universitatis Saraviensis. Philosophie-Lettres 9 (1960) 173–179, the tomb of Ludanus.

[J. CHOUX]

LUDGER OF MÜNSTER, ST.

Bishop, missionary to Frisia and Westphalia; b. Frisia, c. 742; d. Billerbeck, Westphalia, Germany, March 26, 809. Ludger became a student of Bp. GREGORY OF UTRECHT and, in 767, of ALCUIN in York, England. The date of a second stay in England is uncertain. In 776 he was made deacon and missionary in Deventer (Netherlands).

After his ordination (777), he spent seven years in Dokkum, West Frisia, which had been Christianized by English missionaries. Bishop Gregory's successor, Alberic of Utrecht, directed Ludger to rebuild the church in Deventer that had been destroyed during a Frisian uprising, and to found a seminary there. However, in 784 the SAXONS under WIDUKIND rebelled against the FRANKS, and Frisia was lost to the Christian faith when the area between the rivers Lauwers and Fli reverted to pagan practices. Ludger was forced to flee and spent more than two years in Rome and Monte Cassino. In 786 CHARLE-MAGNE recalled Ludger and sent him to the defeated Frisians. He rebuilt the churches there and, with the emperor's consent, destroyed the pagan places of worship in Helgoland. These drastic measures incited the Frisians on the Continent, and they ravaged the missions, driving out Ludger.

In 792 Charlemagne sent him to Münster (formerly Mimigardeford), Westphalia, where he organized 40 parishes that he visited yearly. In 804 Ludger was consecrated first bishop of Münster. He founded a convent for women at Nottuln and the abbeys of Helmstedt and WERDEN. Ludger was buried in Werden. Pilgrimages are held in his honor at Billerbeck and Werden. He is depicted as a bishop with either a church or two geese.

Feast: March 26.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum. March 3:626-65. W. WAT-TENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter bis zur Mitte des 13. Jh. (Stuttgart-Berlin 1904) 1:243-245. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 2:361-368, 416-419. H. SCHRADE, Die Vita des heiligen Liudger und ihre Bilder (Münster 1960). B. KLÖSSEL, Vollständige Faksimile-Ausgabe im Original-Format der Vita Sancti Liudgeri (Graz 1993). R. R. POST, Kerkgeschiedenis van Nederland in de Middeleeuwen, 2 v. (Utrecht 1957). Liudger, 742-809: de confrontatie tussen heidendom en christendom in de Lage Landen, ed. A. VAN BERKUM et al. (Dieren 1984). W. FREITAG, Heiliger Bischof und moderne Zeiten: die Verehrung des heiligen Ludger im Bistum Münster (Münster 1995). K. SIERKSMA, Liudger Thiadgrimszoon: leven en voortleven van een Christus-prediker (Franeker 1995). L. VON PAD-BERG, Heilige und Familie: Studien zur Bedeutung familiengebundener Aspekte in den Viten des Verwandten-und Schülerkreises um Willibrord, Bonifatius, und Liudger (2d ed. Mainz 1997). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre de calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935-56) 3: 562-566. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints. rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:686-688.

[S. A. SCHULZ]

LUDLAM, ROBERT, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1551 at Radbourne (near Sheffield), Derbyshire, England; d. July 24, 1588, hanged, drawn, and quartered on St. Mary's Bridge at Derby. Like Bl. Nicholas GARLICK with whom he died, Ludlam (also given as Ludham, Ludleham) studied at Oxford, taught for a time, then engaged in seminary studies at Rheims, where he was ordained (May 1581). After a six-year apostolate in his homeland, he was arrested with Garlick in the home of an ancient Catholic family through the treachery of one of the sons. He and Garlick fortified the flagging faith of their fellow-prisoner, Bl. Richard Simpson. All three were tried, condemned for their priesthood, and executed together. Together they were beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). D. DE YEPES, Historia Particular de la persecución de Inglaterra (Madrid 1599).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

LUDMILLA, ST.

Martyr, patroness of Bohemia; b. c. 860; d. Tetin, West Bohemia, Sept. 15, 921. She was a Bohemian princess, and the wife of Bořiwoj (d. c. 894), first Christian duke of Bohemia. She and her husband were baptized at Velehrad by St. Methodius (see CYRIL AND METHODIUS) in 871. A Christian of great piety and zeal, she became one of the chief promoters of Christianity in Bohemia and was violently opposed by the adherents of national paganism. When her grandson, St. WENCESLAUS, ascended the throne (920) the struggle became particularly acute. He had been raised a Christian by Ludmilla, but since he was still a minor in 920, the regency was exercised by his mother Drahomira, a forceful and ambitious woman in sympathy with the pagan reaction. In her anxiety to eliminate the influence of Ludmilla on the young Wenceslaus, Drahomira instigated Ludmilla's murder at Tetin, where she was living in retirement. Ludmilla was buried at Tetin and later translated to St. George's Church in Prague.

Feast: Sept. 16.

Bibliography: Passio s. Ludmillae, ed. O. HOLDER-EGGER, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 15.1:572–574. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 2:5026–31. J. PEKAR, Die Wenzels- und Ludmilla-Legenden und die Echtheit Christians (Prague 1906). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 3:570.

[O. P. SHERBOWITZ-WETZOR]

LUDOLF OF CORVEY, ST.

Abbot of CORVEY; d. Aug. 13, 983. The son of Corvey's bailiff Hoger, Ludolf entered the monastery of Corvey; in 965 he was elected abbot. Under his direction the monastic school flourished, teachers were excellent, and the pupils good. Ludolf was energetic and deeply spiritual. He was devoted to the poor souls and was reputedly endowed with EXTRASENSORY perception. He saw, for example, the bloody head of Margrave Gero lying before him on the altar during Mass at the very moment it was severed by the executioner in Magdeburg. Ludolf made a pilgrimage to Rome by way of Cologne and earned for his church the reputation of being a true and dutiful daughter of the apostolic see. In 973 OTTO II confirmed the prerogatives of the abbey and agreed also to its engaging in profitable trade. Ludolf was active in building, surrounding the monastery by a high, strong wall. In 1100 his remains, together with those of Abbot DRUTHMAR, were solemnly elevated. Later (1662) they were placed in a gilt shrine and transferred to the mausoleum chapel in Corvey. There is a baroque statue of Ludolf in the choir of the monastery church.

Feast: Aug. 13, Feb. 21, June 5.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 3:139–142. Die Chronik des Bischofs Thietmar von Merseburg, ed. R. HOLTZMANN (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum, Scriptores rerum Germanicarum [new series] 9; 1935). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 8:217–218. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige 2:567, 570. J. E. STADLER and F. J. HEIM, Vollständiges Heiligenlexikon, 5 v. (Augsburg 1858–82) 3:916.

[G. SPAHR]

LUDOLF OF RATZEBURG, ST.

Bishop of Ratzeburg 1236–50; d. Wismar, Mar. 29, 1250. As bishop he continued to observe the PREMON-STRATENSIAN rule and imposed it upon his cathedral chapter. With Prince John of Mecklenburg he established a convent of Benedictine nuns, which in 1319 became a Premonstratensian convent. He is sometimes honored as a martyr because of his conflict with Duke Albert of Sachsen–Lauenburg. During his long struggle the bishop suffered imprisonment, maltreatment, and banishment. His death is attributed to the tortures endured while in prison. His unflinching courage and severe discipline were outstanding. He was canonized in the 14th century, and is venerated at Wismar in Mecklenburg.

Feast: Mar. 30 (formerly 29).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 3:789–791. C. L. HUGO, S. Ordinis Praemonstratensis annales (Nancy 1734–36) 2:599–612. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 1:702.

[M. J. MADAJ]

LUDOLPH OF SAXONY

Carthusian spiritual writer; b. c. 1295; d. Strassburg, April 10, 1377. Ludolph began his religious life as a Dominican, but entered the CARTHUSIANS in 1340 at Strassburg. He was prior at Coblenz from 1343 to 1348, then retired to the charterhouse at Mainz, and finally to that of Strassburg.

Ludolph was the author of one of the most widely read books of the later Middle Ages: Vita Domini nostri Jesu Christi ex quatuor Evangeliis. In this life of Christ, Ludolph dwelt at length upon the events and teachings recorded in the Gospels and commented upon them abundantly from the Fathers of the Church and later spiritual authors, such as St. Bernard, Pseudo-Bonaventure, and James of Voragine. St. Ignatius Loyola was influenced in his conversion by reading the Vita Christi, and Ludolph's method of meditation left its mark on the one adopted in the Spiritual Exercises.

The Vita was first printed in 1474 by the Carthusians of Strassburg, and French translations were circulating in manuscript before 1485. During the 16th century there were innumerable editions in several languages. St. TERE-SA OF AVILA prescribed that a copy of the book should be in every Carmelite house. Ludolph also wrote Expositio in Psalterium Davidis, in which he drew most of his material from the commentaries of St. JEROME, St. AUGUSTINE, CASSIODORUS, and PETER LOMBARD. It was first printed at Paris in 1491 and has since been reprinted frequently. In both the Vita and the Expositio Ludolph's interpretations of Scripture are allegorical and moralizing.

Bibliography: S. AUTORE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50). 9.1:1067–70. A. PASSMANN, "Probleme um Ludolph von Sachsen," Archiv für elsässische Kirchengeschichte, 3 v. (1949–50) 13–34. M. I. BODENSTEDT, The Vita Christi of Ludolphus the Carthusian (Washington 1944). E. R. VON FRENTZ, "Ludolphe le chartreux et les Exercices de Saint Ignace de Loyola," Revue d'ascétique et de mystique (1949) 375–388.

[B. DU MOUSTIER]

LUDWIG MISSIONSVEREIN (LUDWIG MISSION SOCIETY)

Also known as "Missio Internationales Katholisches Missionswerk Ludwig Missionsverein," or more commonly as "MISSIO München (Munich)," with its head office in Munich. The society is one of the two German branches of the pontifical mission society MISSIO that was created by the German Catholic Bishops' Conference in 1972 with the merger of Ludwig Missionsverein (which became MISSIO München) and the St. Francis Xavier Mission Society of Aachen (which became MIS-SIO Aachen). MISSIO München encompasses the Bavarian region of Germany (covering the sees of Augsburg, Bamberg, Eichstätt, München and Freising, Passau, Regensburg, and Würzburg) and the diocese of Speyer. Together with its sister agency, it promotes and sponsors mission and human development projects in partnership with local churches in the Third World, especially in Africa, Asia, and the Pacific.

History. The society was founded through the efforts of Frederick Résé, a German missionary priest originally attached to the Cincinnati diocese, at Munich, Bavaria, on Dec. 12, 1838, for the express purpose of giving financial assistance to the Catholic missions of Asia and America. When Résé, encouraged by his recent success in Austria in founding the LEOPOLDINEN STIFTUNG, first approached King Ludwig of Bavaria in 1828, the king thought the time inopportune. Ten years later Résé, now Bishop of Detroit, obtained Ludwig's consent; and the society, which bore the king's name, was established with headquarters in Munich and St. Francis Xavier as patron.

Initially the Ludwig Mission Society collaborated with the Society for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, which had been founded in France in 1822 for the distribution of funds and as a means of obtaining authoritative information about the missions. Mutual dissatisfaction over the allocation of funds led to a complete separation of the two societies in 1844, after which its efforts were directed especially to the needs of German Catholics in the United States. Valuable aid was also rendered to religious orders in the United States, particularly the Redemptorists and Benedictines, and to a lesser degree the Franciscans, Capuchins, and Premonstratensians. The Austrian Jesuit missionary F. X. Weninger, who worked principally with the Germans in the United States, was the recipient of annual allotments from Munich until his death in 1888 at the age of 83. The society contributed annually from 1862 to World War I to the American College at Louvain and helped to develop a corps of German American priests by promoting St. Francis Seminary in Milwaukee. It helped teaching communities such as the School Sisters of Notre Dame, founded in Bavaria in 1833, and in the United States in 1847. Native American missions also benefited and, through Weninger, some pioneer work among African Americans was undertaken.

The society's magazine, Annalen der Glaubensverbreitung, published about 300 letters pertaining to the United States before it was supplanted in 1918 by a periodical of the Francis Xavier Mission Society of Aachen. More than 2,000 additional letters are still extant in the society's archives in Munich. In 1922, Pope Pius XI elevated the Ludwig Mission Society to a pontifical mission society.

Bibliography: T. ROEMER, The Ludwig-Missionsverein and the Church in the United States (1838–1918) (Catholic University of America, Studies in American Church History 16; 1933); Ten Decades of Alms (St. Louis 1942).

[B. J. BLIED/EDS.]

LÜFTHILDIS, ST.

Virgin known also as Leuchteldis, Liuthild, Lufthold, or Luchtel; fl. ninth century. Place names, inscriptions, and local devotion testify to the influence exerted by Lüfthildis, of whose life there is no other tangible trace. Tradition has it that she was persecuted by her stepmother because of her generosity to the poor, and eventually retired to a hermitage. Lüftelberg, in the Archdiocese of Cologne, is named for her. As a result of the miracles that occurred after her death, her grave in the parish church there became the center of a cult of which the first evidence is in the work of CAESARIUS OF HEISTERBACH in 1222. Her relics were exhumed in 1623 and enclosed in a marble sarcophagus in 1902. Her aid is invoked by sufferers of head and ear maladies.

Feast: Jan. 23.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan. 3:750–753. A. STEFFENS, Die hl. Lüfthildis v. Lüftelberg (Cologne 1903). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:157. J. TORSY, ed., Lexikon der deutschen Heiligen, Seligen, Ehrwürdigen und Gottseligen (Cologne 1959) 358. M. FRANK, Die Volksheilige L. von L. und ihre Attribute in Legende, Kult und Brauch (Düsseldorf 1959).

[M. B. RYAN]

LUGO, FRANCISCO DE

Jesuit theologian and elder brother of Juan de Lugo; b. Madrid, 1580; d. Valladolid, Dec. 17, 1652. His father sent him to Salamanca to study law, but Francisco entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus there in 1600. Though he soon made a reputation as a competent theologian, he requested assignment to the foreign missions and was sent to Mexico. Mission work was never to be his task, however, for his superiors, on learning of his academic achievements, appointed him to teach theology. While teaching he managed to write a commentary on the entire Summa of St. Thomas. He was then recalled to Spain, but the fleet in which he sailed was attacked by the Dutch and in the battle most of his commentary on the Summa was lost. After arriving in Spain he taught both philosophy and theology. His reputation as a theologian grew, and the Jesuit general summoned De Lugo to Rome to be his theologian and censor of books. He was twice rector of the college of Valladolid, where he died well known and respected by the theologians of his time. The confusion of his writings with those of his older brother has led to a certain amount of inaccuracy in theological scholarship. His published works are: the De Principiis moralibus actuum humanorum (Elvire 1642), Theologia scholastica (Lyons 1647), and De septem ecclesiae sacramentis (Venice 1652).

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 5:175. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (3d ed., Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:911.

[G. V. KOHLS]

LUGO, JUAN DE

Jesuit theologian and cardinal of the seventeenth century, especially esteemed as a moralist; b. Madrid, Nov. 25, 1583; d. Rome, Aug. 20, 1660. Juan de Lugo, born of noble parents, seems to have been destined for an ecclesiastical career from his earliest years. Before he was ten years old, he had received the tonsure and he had obtained a benefice from PHILIP II of Spain by the time he was 14. Juan received his early education in Seville, where he obtained a bachelor of arts degree in 1598. Then his parents sent him with his older brother Francisco to Salamanca to study civil and canon law. While in Salamanca, Francisco entered the Society of Jesus. In 1603, Juan also became a JESUIT, against the wishes of his father. After his ordination, he taught philosophy and theology in various Jesuit houses of study.

In 1616 De Lugo received his master's degree and was assigned to teach theology at Valladolid. His fame as a theologian spread quickly within the society, and in 1621 or 1622 the general summoned him to Rome. There he taught theology for the next 20 years.

Although urged by his friends to publish his theological treatises, De Lugo refused until 1631, when he was commanded by his superiors to do so. Within 15 years he prepared five major works for publication: De incarnatione Domini (Lyons 1633); De sacramentis in genere, de venerabili eucharistiae sacramento, et de sacrasancto Missae sacrificio (Lyons 1636); De virtute et sacramento poenitentiae, de suffragiis et indulgentiis (Lyons 1638), De iustitia et iure (Lyons 1642); De virtute fidei divinae (Lyons 1646). Later his Responsorum moralium libri sex (Lyons 1651) was published by his former pupil and friend, Cardinal Sforza PALLAVICINO. In addition to these works, De Lugo wrote a number of other philosophical and theological treatises during his long teaching career. A group of these was published in Cologne in 1716 under the title De Deo, de angelis, de actibus humanis et de gratia. Other compositions are cited in his published works, such as, De anima, Philosophia, Logica, De Trinitate, De visione Dei, De scientia Dei, De praedestinatione, De bonitate et malitia humanorum actuum; the manuscripts of some of these works are still extant in the libraries of Madrid, Salamanca, Karlsruhe, and Mechlin.

The basis of De Lugo's fame as a theologian and of his influence on the development of theology is to be found in his published works, which show him to have been a theologian of considerable stature and an independent thinker. His approach was nonpolemic. It was not his custom to present an exhaustive review of opinion on a topic, nor did he quote many authorities in support of his own position. In direct fashion he stated the question, discussed the problem, and reasoned his way to a solution. In the process he demonstrated his thorough grounding in scholastic philosophy, dogmatic and moral theology, and civil and canon law.

In his discussions the supernatural is seen as built upon the natural order, and moral obligations as flowing from doctrinal truths. He drew the principles of the political order from the nature of man as a social being, but at the same time he pointed out that social life is a most necessary means for the profession of the Christian faith (De iustitia, 10). The supreme jurisdiction of the pope in the Church and his infallibility in regard to faith and morals were deduced from the nature of the Church as the agency of salvation founded by Christ (De virtute fidei divinae, 1).

A comparison of De Lugo's teaching with the social doctrine of the popes from LEO XIII to PIUS XII shows that there are few points on which the seventeenth-century theologian would have to be corrected because of the subsequent development of Catholic social doctrine. His discussion of the rights of slaves could be used as an exposition of the inalienable rights of man (De iustitia, 3). Again, his consideration of the use of torture in judicial processes makes it evident that theologians at the time of the Inquisition were well aware of the moral problems connected with its use.

De Lugo dedicated his fourth work, the monumental De iustitia et iure, to Urban VIII. The pope was so impressed with the work and its author that he determined to make the theologian a cardinal. Although the Jesuit tried to decline, the pope commanded him to accept the cardinalate in 1643. Thereafter, De Lugo became active in the work of the Holy Office and the Congregation of the Council.

When the Jansenist Antoine Arnauld published his book, De la fréquente communion, a violent theological controversy broke out and there developed a strong trend to condemn the entire Jansenistic movement. In a memorial counseling moderation, De Lugo pointed out that the Jansenists still professed to be Catholics and urged that they be treated with as much kindness as the defense of Catholic principles would allow. In spite of his moderate stand, De Lugo was left out of the committee of cardinals commissioned to evaluate the orthodoxy of Jansenism. Since the Jesuits had been active in opposing the Jansenists, it was felt that he would not be impartial in his judgment.

In the conclave of 1655, King Philip IV of Spain declared Cardinal Sacchetti persona non grata and tried to have him excluded as a papal candidate. In the debate that arose among the cardinals of the conclave, it was probably De Lugo who defended the Spanish king's claim to the right of exclusion.

Bibliography: J. DE LUGO, *Disputationes scholasticae et mo*rales, ed. J. B. FOURNALS, 8 v. (new ed. Paris 1891–94). J. E. NIEREMBERG, Varones ilustres de la compañia de Jesús, cont'd A. DE ANDRADE and J. CASSINI, 9 v. (2d ed. Bilbao 1887–92) v. 5. Pastor. G. BRINKMAN, The Social Thought of John de Lugo (Washington 1957).

[G. BRINKMAN]

LUKÁŠ OF PRAGUE

Czech theologian, leader of BOHEMIAN BRETHREN; b. Prague, c. 1460; d. Mladá Boleslav, Dec. 11, 1528. He was reared as an Utraquist; he graduated from Prague University in 1481 and soon afterward joined the Unity of Brethren. In the 1490s Lukáš was instrumental in persuading the Unity to abandon its antistate position. In 1494 he was elected to the Narrow Council; in 1500 he was chosen a bishop of the Unity, which he reorganized. He was a prolific writer of theological and liturgical works, hymns, and catechisms. Although he had contacts with Luther in the early 1520s, the two never reached any agreement.

Bibliography: P. BROCK, The Political and Social Doctrines of the Unity of Czech Brethren (The Hague 1957). J. WEISSKOPF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1207. E. PESCHKE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:473.

[P. BROCK]

LUKE, EVANGELIST, ST.

St. Luke is called by St. Paul, "our most dear physician" (Col 4.14), a description that the vocabulary of the third Gospel and of Acts seems to justify. Luke's medical terms, however, may have been those familiar to any educated man of the period. Paul also calls Luke a fellow worker in Philemon 24. In 2 Tm 4.11 Luke is Paul's only companion shortly before the Apostle's death. These are the only times Luke is mentioned in the NT.

Early Christian tradition identifies him as the author of the third Gospel and the Acts. Luke was a Greek-speaking convert of pagan origin (cf. Col 4.11b with Col 4.14). He was not himself an eyewitness of what he writes (Lk 1.2) and, therefore, not one of the 72 Disciples (Lk 10.1), nor Cleophas's unnamed companion on the road to EMMAUS (Lk 24.8). From the "we sections" of the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, we may conclude that he first met St. Paul at Troas (16.10), rejoined him at PHILIPPI some years later (20.5), accompanied him to Jerusalem

Saint Luke the Evangelist. (Archive Photos)

(21.1–18), and remained with the Apostle during his imprisonment in CAESAREA IN PALESTINE, and Rome (Acts 27.1–28.16).

According to the anti-Marcionite prologue (A.D. 160–180), Luke never married, and lived to the age of 84. After his death in Achaia (or Bithynia or Egypt), his bones were transferred to Constantinople.

In Christian iconography, St. Luke, portrayed either as a man, or a writer, or an ox, appears frequently on various sacred artifacts. The symbol of an ox (Ez 10.14; Ap 4.7), most frequently used for Luke, may have been applied to him because of his calm and strength, or because his Gospel begins and ends in the Temple.

Feast: Oct. 18.

[R. T. A. MURPHY]

LUKE, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO

The third Gospel with the Acts of the Apostles forms a two-volume work about the origins of Christianity. Like the other Gospels that preceded Luke's work, this Gospel follows the outline of the proclamation of the good news (see GOSPEL) of salvation that originated with the preaching of the Apostles in Jerusalem. This treatment will be a consideration of three aspects: contents and division; origin; and literary and theological characteristics.

Contents and Division

Luke has added an account of the birth and infancy of Jesus and resurrection appearances to his edition of Mark's Gospel. In addition to the prologue (1.1-4) the Third Gospel contains seven major sections: the Infancy Gospel, the preparation for the public ministry, the ministry in Galilee, the journey to Jerusalem, the ministry in Jerusalem, the Passion, the Resurrection.

The Infancy Gospel (1.5–2.52). The first two chapters recount in parallel order an angelic announcement of the birth of John the Baptist; an announcement by the same Archangel Gabriel of the conception and birth of Jesus; the birth of John and its circumstances; the birth of Jesus (see NATIVITY OF CHRIST), the joyful prophecies and revelations surrounding it; and one incident of His hidden life. These two double panels are skillfully woven together by the account of the visit of Jesus' mother to John's mother (see VISITATION OF MARY).

In this well-ordered narrative the important places are named: the Temple in Jerusalem (Jerusalem and the Temple will remain central focuses of attention for Luke), Nazareth, the Judean hill-country, David's city of Bethlehem, and again Jerusalem and its Temple. Wellknown Jewish customs and rites play important roles in the story: a priest chosen by lot and according to his class to offer incense, the gathering of the people for prayer at the hour of the incense offering, the practice of circumcision on the 8th day, the purification of mothers (see PURIFI-CATION OF MARY), the offering to God in order to redeem a first-born son, and the pilgrim feast of the Passover. Chronological references are given: "In the days of King Herod of Judea. . . ' (1.5); 'Now in the sixth month. . .'' (1.26); Mary's three-month visit with Elizabeth (1.56); the birth of Jesus in the time of Caesar Augustus and during the census under the governor of Syria, Quirinius (2.1–2). [See CENSUS (IN THE BIBLE).] The key figures appear in due order: Zachary; Elizabeth, too old to have children; Gabriel; Mary, a virgin engaged to Joseph, a descendant of David; the shepherds; Simeon and Anna; and the Jewish teachers in the Temple. Mary is described as one who "treasured all these words and pondered them in her heart" (2.19, 51).

Preparation for Public Ministry (3.1–4.13). Luke begins the story of salvation against a background of profane history. Seven rulers who then held office, from the Emperor Tiberius to Caiaphas, are named (3.1–2). The preaching of John the Baptist sets the scene for the appearance of Jesus as God's beloved Son in whom He is well pleased (3.3–22). The GENEALOGY OF JESUS follows. Jesus is the 77th descendant, i.e., the most perfect offspring, from God through the line of Adam (3.23–38). In contrast to Matthew, who traces Jesus from Abraham through David's son, Solomon, and Joseph as Jacob's son, Luke begins his list with Jesus and ascends from Joseph as Heli's son, through David's son, Nathan, to God Himself, the Father of Adam.

Thus, Jesus is represented as the Son of God (see BAPTISM OF CHRIST). Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit who descended upon Him at His baptism, Jesus is tested in the desert and proves Himself, in this first passage at arms with the devil, to be the humble, obedient, and completely confident adorer of the Father (4.1–13; see TEMPTATIONS OF JESUS). With this victory won, Jesus 'returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee'' (4.14) to begin His work (3.23).

Ministry in Galilee (4.14–9.50). Luke's record of the Galilean ministry is marked by a topographical vagueness. The trend of events, however, is clearly indicated. Summarily telescoping what were different and later visits, Luke shows (4.16-30) how the Savior's mission of grace met with rejection at Nazareth; Jesus' reception at Capernaum, where the crowds were enthralled at His teaching and miracles, was more encouraging (4.31–44). With the call of the first DISCIPLES (5.1–11) and the cure of the leper (5.12-16), however, Jesus aroused the attention of the Pharisees and Scribes (5.17) with whom he was soon involved in controversy because of his association with publicans and sinners (5.27–32) and over fasting and the Sabbath (6.1-11). After a night of prayer, Jesus named 12 chosen disciples apostles (6.12–16). Luke follows this with an inaugural sermon, the Sermon on the Plain (6.17-49). It contains much of the same material as is found in Matthew's SERMON ON THE MOUNT (Mt 5-7).

At Capernaum a centurion shows a greater willingness than the Jews to believe in Jesus (7.1–10). Luke depicts Jesus as the Lord with power over death (7.11–17). The doubts of the Baptist and his disciples are dispelled by an appeal to Jesus' miracles and His preaching of the good news to the poor. John is praised as the greatest prophet, but of less worth than the least in the kingdom of God (7.18–30). In contrast to a wicked generation that closes its ears to His message (7.31–35), Luke relates the touching incident of the penitent woman (7.36–50) and mentions the generosity of other women (8.1–3).

Jesus begins to teach in parables (see PARABLES OF JESUS). The reason for this new method is given; the parable of the Sower is explained; and the parable of the Lamp is recounted. We have reached a crisis in faith (8.4–18). Jesus' true relatives are those who hear and keep His word (8.19-21). After demonstrating His power over nature (8.22–25), demons (8.26–39), death and sickness (8.40-56), Jesus sends the Twelve on their first mission (9.1-10). When they return, he feeds 5,000 men (9.11–17). Then Peter, in answer to Jesus' question, proclaims Him to be "the Messiah of God" (9.18-21). The first prediction of the Passion follows immediately, juxtaposed to the conditions for following Jesus and the coming glory of His kingdom (9.22-27). The Transfiguration is recounted with details proper to Luke, a possessed boy is delivered from his affliction, and a second prediction of the Passion is given (9.28-45). A dispute among the disciples about their relative greatness and about an exorcism performed by someone who had not been with them leads to Jesus teaching about humility and a rejoinder that puts them in their place (9.46-50).

St. Luke.

The Travel Account, Jesus' Journey to Jerusalem (9.51–19.27). Luke's "great interpolation" or "travel document," as the section from 9.51 to 18.14 is called, fills out a vague reference in Mark 10.1 to a ministry outside of Galilee. In it Luke uses traditional materials not found in Mark but found in Matthew in a different version. The exact sequence of events and their location are vague, but there are frequent reminders that Jerusalem is the destination of the journey (9.51, 53; 13.22, 33; 17.11; 18.31). Luke is otherwise content to link things together by "after this," or "in a town," or "in another village," etc.

"The Nativity," from an 11th-century Lectionary from the Abbey of St. Peter, Salzburg, Austria.

This section contains Luke's finest contributions: 18 parables of great beauty and six miracles found only in Luke. Whatever order is followed is logical rather than chronological or topographical: artificially grouped polemical discourses (11.14-14.24); vocation sayings (9.57-62); privileges granted disciples (10.17-24); instructions on prayer (11.1–13); a trilogy of parables on divine mercy (15.1-32); good and bad use of wealth (16.1–15, 16–31); social virtues (17.1–19); sayings about the Law taken out of their original context (16.16–18); sayings about the end-time and the "Day" of the Son of Man (17.20-18.8); sayings about humility and detachment, linked to a third prediction of the Passion (18.9–34). It is in this latter section at 18.15 that Luke rejoins Mark, following him until the Passion story, but with some notable additions, e.g., the Zacchaeus story and the parable of the pounds (19.1–28).

Ministry in Jerusalem (19.28–21.38). On His arrival in Jerusalem, Jesus is accorded a triumphal reception (19.28–40); He predicts the destruction of the Holy City (19.41–44), cleanses the Temple, and continues to preach in the face of mounting opposition (19.45–48). The questioning of his authority, the parable of the vineyard, the trap about tribute to Caesar, a controversy with the Sadducees on the Resurrection and another with the Scribes on the nature of the Messiah, and finally, Jesus' warning against the hypocrisy of the Scribes, lead artfully to the discourse on the destruction of Jerusalem (20.1–21.38).

The Passion Narrative (22.1-23.56). Throughout this section Luke manifests a much greater independence from Mark and manifests many similarities with the Fourth Gospel. Plotting precedes the betrayal of Christ (22.1–6). The Eucharist is instituted in the context of the Jewish Passover meal and the eating of the Passover lamb (22.7-20). Judas's betrayal and Peter's denials are announced (22.21–38). The agony in the garden is narrated with an admirable terseness (22.39-46). Peter's denials occur after the arrest (22.47–62). Sparing in his treatment of violence, Luke gives the impression that Jesus was manhandled only once (22.63-65); the Evangelist dislikes repetition of what has been said already. Christ appears before the Sanhedrin (22.65–23.1) and then before Pilate (23.2–7). He has skillfully prepared for Jesus' appearance before Herod (Antipas) (23.8–12) long before (9.7–9); in similar fashion, the two thieves are introduced before they speak (23.32, 39-42); one of them is promised Paradise (23.43). Jesus' death and burial are succinctly told (23.44–56). [See PASSION OF CHRIST, I (IN THE BIBLE): TRIAL OF JESUS.

The Resurrection Narrative. Luke recounts the empty tomb and the "two men . . . in dazzling raiment" who proclaim the Resurrection to the women; the apostles remain unbelieving (24.1–12). Then, Jesus appears to two disciples going to Emmaus (24.3–35), and to the Eleven gathered in Jerusalem (24.36–43). Next follow Jesus' last instructions to His Disciples (24.44–49) and, very abruptly, the ascension into heaven (28.50–52). See ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST. The Gospel that struck a note of joy in the first two chapters closes on the same note of great joy: the Disciples are continually in the Temple praising God (24.53). Luke has no mention of a Galilean appearance of Jesus in Galilee.

Origin

Luke and Acts are two parts of one work that treats of Christian origins. The close relationship of the two parts, so much alike in style, vocabulary, and grammar, points to a single author. Both works open with prologues addressed to Theophilus, the second referring to a "first book," which it proposes to continue. Luke concluded his Gospel with an account of the Resurrection and ascension; Acts opens with a brief account of the ascension and continues with a description of the coming of the Holy Spirit and the extension of the gospel to the end of the earth (Acts 1.8). The Gospel sequence from Galilee to Jerusalem is balanced by that of Acts, which describes the spread of the gospel from Jerusalem to Rome. The two works may originally have been a single book separated at a very early date so that the faithful might have the four Gospels in a single convenient codex.

Early Tradition about Authorship. The early tradition that holds Luke to be the author of both the third Gospel and Acts is firm and unswerving. His name (see LUKE, EVANGELIST, ST.) appears in neither the two works attributed to him nor in the extant fragments of Papias (Ecclesiastical History 3.39.16). The works of Justin Martyr (100–164) which speak (c. 155) of the "Gospels" read in the liturgical assemblies of the faithful (Apol. 1.66.3), works abound with details that presuppose a knowledge of the third Gospel. Marcion's bid (c. 145) to establish an authoritative collection of genuine Christian writings included one unnamed Gospel that is clearly Luke's. Irenaeus (135-202) is the earliest Christian writer to mention Luke by name as author of the third Gospel. In his Adv. Haer. 3.1.1 (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5.8.2), he writes: "Luke, the companion of Paul, put down in a book the gospel preached by him." Irenaeus was obviously stressing the point that even the Gospels written by disciples of the Apostles had apostolic authority behind them. Tertullian (160-250) insists on the apostolic authority of the third Gospel (Adv. Marc. 4.2.5). The Muratorian Canon attributes the third Gospel to Luke, the physician who accompanied Paul as a juris studiosus (legal consultor?). This fragmentary text states that Luke had never seen Christ in the flesh, nor had he been one of Jesus' disciples. It gives this as the reason why Luke began his Gospel with the announcement of the Baptist's birth. Clement of Alexandria (150-218) frequently quotes the third Gospel and unhesitatingly names Luke as its author (Strom. 1.21.145). Later tradition adds nothing more to our knowledge beyond the doubtful detail that Luke was of Antiochean origin (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.7).

Place and Time of Composition. The oldest attestation pertinent to the geographical origin of the Third Gospel is an ancient Greek Prologue that states that "this Luke is an Antiochene, a Syrian." Eusebius knows the same tradition, affirming that "by descent Luke was of those from Antioch" (Ecclesiastical History 3.4, 6). Jerome affirms that Luke was an "Antiochene doctor" (De vir. ill. 7). This ancient tradition is consistent with what can be gleaned about the provenance of the Gospel from its contents, namely, that the Gospel shows evidence of a concern for Hellenistic Christians and that was directed to Gentiles (1.3) or to a community in which Gentiles were the majority. No convincing arguments have thus far been advanced as to identify the place of its composition. Sites as diverse as Achaia, Boetia, and Rome have been suggested at various times.

Ancient tradition says that Luke's Gospel was composed after the deaths of Peter and Paul (Irenaeus, Adversus haereses 3.1.1). Modern scholarship, which generally acknowledges the dependence of Luke on Mark, holds that the Gospel was written some time after 70 A.D. It was certainly written before Acts (Acts 1.1) but the exact date of composition cannot be determined with any degree of certainty. Most scholars opt for an approximate date in the eighties but some would place the time of its composition in the early nineties.

Sources. Since much of the material contained in the Fourth Gospel is the same as that found in Mark and since Matthew and Luke follow the same sequence of presentation of material only when they share that sequence with Mark, the consensus of contemporary scholarship is that Mark is one of the primary sources of the Third Gospel and furnishes Luke with a narrative framework. Markan material is especially found in five large segments of the Gospel, Fourth 3.1-4.15; 4.31–6.19; 8.4–9.50; 18.15-21.33; and 22.1-24.12. Much of Luke's non-Markan material is found in the Infancy Narratives, the Resurrection stories, and the two interpolations that interrupt Luke's following of the Markan narrative plot, the little interpolation of 6.20–8.3 and the great interpolation of 9.51-18.14.

Scholars generally agree that Luke made use of another source, a Greek-language collection of Jesus' sayings (Q, from the German Quelle meaning "source"). This hypothetical source—for which there is no ancient textual witness—was shared by Luke and Matthew, contributed about 230 verses of discourse material to each of these Gospels, the Sermon on the Plain (6.20–49), among them. In many instances, but not in all, Luke's version of the Q material appears to be closer to the source than Matthew's version.

In addition Luke had his own sources. These special sources are collectively identified as "L" but "L" is not a single source. It may include some written material as well as oral traditions known to and used by Luke (1.1–4). The stories of the raising of the son of the widow of Nain (7.12–17) and of the visit with Martha and Mary (10.38–42) are examples of material that comes from Luke's special sources. "L" is, however, not a source of the Third Gospel in the way that Mark and Q are. Mark and Q are documentary sources; "L" is neither a single source nor is it entirely documentary.

In the history of the interpretation of the Gospel mention is frequently made of Mary, the mother of Jesus, as the primary source for the Infancy Narratives (1.4–2.80). Modern scholarship has generally abandoned this suggestion. It attributes little of this material to any of Luke's special sources, preferring to see the Infancy Narratives as the product of Luke's own composition.

Literary and Theological Characteristics. Luke is a fine Hellenistic writer. His work is generally acknowledged to be the best Greek composition in the New Testament. He follows the style of the Hellenistic prologue in 1.1–4, is familiar with the symposium genre (7.36–50; 11.37-54; 14.1-24), and knows how to write a farewell discourse (22.14-38). The Greek of his Infancy Narratives follows the style of the Septuagint, the common version of the Greek Bible. Luke is creative in his use of his sources, skillfully using material from different sources to weave an artful account of a single narrative. He uses parallelism to good advantage, particularly in the juxtaposition of stories about John the Baptist and Jesus (1.5-2.8) and his side-by-side stories about men and women (1.25-38; 15.3-10). Luke provides unity for his narrative with the use of ring construction (literary inclusion), most notably beginning and closing his account with a Jerusalem narrative (1.8–23; 24.13–53).

His narrative uses time and space effectively, as often as not with manifest theological intention. His time is historical time (3.1–2) to the degree that Conzelmann could sum up Luke's theology as "the center of time," biblical history its prelude, the time of the church its sequel. Luke's "today" is the today of salvation (19.9; 23.43). His space draws attention to Jerusalem (9.51) and the temple (18.9–14) in a way that is found in neither Matthew nor Mark. For theological reasons Luke has creatively exploited Mark's geographic scheme, the ministry in Galilee, the Passion and Resurrection in Jerusalem. The story of Jesus ends in Jerusalem; it is retold to the nations (Acts 1.8).

The Infancy Narratives presents Jesus as a Jew who was properly reared in a pious family. Lk 4.16 provides a further indication of the success of his rearing as a devout Jew, but in the ministry itself Jesus appears as a 'cultured Hellenistic gentleman' (J. O'Grady's phrase). Luke's christology highlights Jesus as son of God and filled with the Holy Spirit (1.26–38; 3.21–4.13; see 4.14, 18, etc.). The Gospel shows an interest in prophecy (6.23, 26; 11.47–51; etc.) and creatively portrays Jesus as prophet (4.24–27; 7.11–17). Jesus is also the one who explains the scriptures (4.16–21; 24.27, 32).

Luke often portrays Jesus at prayer, particularly at the most significant moments in his ministry (3.21; 6.12; 9.18; etc.) His prayer was so impressive that the disciples asked him to teach them how to pray. Jesus's response was to teach his disciples the Lord's prayer (11.1–5; see Mt 6.9–13). Luke's emphasis on prayer is without parallel in the other Synoptic Gospels (11.5–13; etc.), giving examples of prayer formularies that continue to be used in the church, the Magnificat (1.46–55), the Benedictus (2.68–79), the Nunc Dimittis (2.29–32), and some words of the "Hail Mary" (1.28, 42).

Jesus' outreach to outcasts and the marginalized appears in the Third Gospel as it does in no other text. The beatitudes proclaim the blessedness of the poor and constitute a prophetic challenge to the rich (6.20–25). Jesus' feeling for the poor and widows (2.37; 4.25–26; 7.12) is expressed in the story of the poor widow with two small copper coins (21.1–4). The poor, the crippled, the blind, and the lame are invited to the Messianic banquet; for Jesus' disciples, they are to be the focus of concern (14.12–24). Jesus tells the story of the good Samaritan (10.29-37); Luke draws attention to the grateful Samaritan (17.16). Jesus' sympathy for the marginalized is particularly evident in the many stories that Luke tells about women, beginning with the story of Elizabeth (1.24–25) and ending with the women's discovery of the empty tomb (24.22-24, see 24.11). Interspersed throughout the Gospel are narratives about Mary (1.26–56), the widow of Nain (7.11-17), Martha and Mary (10.38-42), the woman in the crowd (11.27–28), the women from Galilee who came to Jerusalem with Jesus (8.1-2; 23.55), and so forth.

These themes are skillfully woven together as the expression of God's eternal and mysterious plan of universal salvation through the Savior who was "taken up" from this world by His Passion and Resurrection in Jerusalem (9.51; 24.25–26; 24.50–53). This salvation, once for all times achieved, is proclaimed through the Holy Spirit, the power from heaven (Acts 1.7–8), the gift to His children from God the Father through the intercession of the only Son of God (Lk 11.13). It is this Spirit who guided Luke to the completion of his masterpiece.

Bibliography: R. LAURENTIN, Structure et théologie de Luc I-II (Études bibliques; Paris 1957). D. L. BOCK, Luke, 2 v. Baker's Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1994, 1996). R. E. BROWN, The Birth of the Messiah (New York, N.Y. 1993). H. CONZELMANN, The Theology of St. Luke (New York, N.Y. 1990). C. A. EVANS and J. A. SANDERS, Luke and Scripture: The Function of Sacred Scripture in Luke-Acts (Minneapolis, Minn. 1993). J. A. FITZMYER, The Gospel According to Luke, Anchor Bible 28, 28A, 2 v. (Garden City, N.J. 1981, 1985). H. FLENDER, St. Luke: Theologian of Redemptive History (Philadelphia, Penn. 1967). L. T. JOHNSON, The Gospel of Luke (Sacra Pagina 3 Collegeville 1991). R. J. KARRIS, Luke: Artist and Theologian (New York, N.Y. 1985). L. E. KECK and J. L. MARTYN, Studies in Luke-Acts (Nashville, Tenn. 1966). J. D. KINGSBURY, Conflict in Luke: Jesus, Authorities, Disciples, (Minneapolis, Minn. 1991). M.

A. POWELL, What Are They Saying about Luke? (New York, N.Y. 1989).

[R. T. A. MURPHY/R. F. COLLINS]

LUKE-ACTS

One of the overarching issues in modern New Testament criticism is the relationship of the Gospel according to Luke and the Acts of the Apostles. As Biblical studies moves beyond historical criticism, scholars began to treat Luke and Acts as a single, two-volume whole. The Third Gospel is interpreted in light of its sequel Acts, not through its differences from Mark and Matthew, though these remain important clues to Lukan intentions.

In last decades of the 20th century, redaction criticism and stylistic criticism dominated approaches to Luke and to Acts respectively. Stress on Lukan theology theology replaced concern for the historicity of Luke and Acts, often bringing with it negative judgments about the latter. For example, few scholars held any longer that Luke and Acts were written before the destruction of Jerusalem; nor did many think the author was Paul's companion Luke. Not being an eyewitness and writing some 20 years after Paul's death, the author's picture of Christian beginnings seemed idealized and the Paul of Acts scarcely reconcilable with the historical Paul and his theology found in his letters. Acts was more and more ignored in theories of the origins of Christianity or as an interpretive guide to Paul's letters. These negative attitudes especially towards Acts filtered down into religious education on all levels.

Then in the 1980s scholarly unrest with this negative picture grew. In his Anchor Bible commentary, Joseph Fitzmyer dated Luke-Acts in A.D. 80-85. Still, he argued that its author was a companion of Paul, though only on the two later journeys where he signals his presence by using "we" in Acts 16:10 and later passages. The differences between Lukan and Pauline theology do not necessarily mean that Luke never knew Paul. They rather suggest that Luke did not use Paul's letters when he wrote 20 to 30 years later. They imply that Luke had less accurate information about Paul's early career before Luke came to know him than Paul's letters had, that he wrote in a later period when Pauline controversies about justification by faith were no longer burning questions, and that he had his own theological concerns that account for many of his differences from Paul (cf. The Anchor Bible, v. 28, 35–57).

Fitzmyer voiced the objection of many to unfair comparisons between Luke and Paul, especially regarding Luke's failure to emphasize Jesus' death as saving, and his substituting a "theology of glory" for Paul's "theology of the cross" and a bland salvation history for his eschatological urgency. As the reaction against these previous negative comparisons spread, first Lukan theology, then his narrative techniques, were studied in their own right. No longer do many scholars label Luke-Acts by the pejorative term "early Catholic," implying a decline from the Pauline-Johannine gospel of salvation by faith into an institutionalization, legalization, and sacramentalization of Church order and discipleship, as well as "bourgeois ethics."

New Approaches. Within historical criticism, sociological and anthropological approaches tried to fill in more first century cultural background and thus remedy some of the historical deficiencies inherent in mere extrapolations from Lukan changes in presumed Markan and Q sources used to reconstruct the situation of the author and his community or communities. Meanwhile, skepticism toward the historical value of Acts increased, bringing on counter-reactions led by Martin Hengel in Germany and English-speaking Evangelicals who defended the basic historicity of Acts according to the standards of its day and in conjunction with its theological concerns.

Historiography. Study of the rhetoric and historiography of the Hellenistic age was an important factor in moderating some of the extremes in debates about the genre, purposes, and historicity of Luke-Acts. By ancient standards, Luke-Acts is reputable and serious history comparable with contemporary works by historians as diverse as Josephus, Polybius, and Dionysius of Hallicarnasus, and with the Biblical books of Sm-Kgs and 1-2 Mc. Luke exhibits terms and methods common in the rhetorical training for writers of that age. His preface uses technical rhetorical terms to indicate his goal to convince his addressee Theophilus of the reliability of what Theophilus had been told about Christian beginnings by structuring an appropriate narrative. This is not a mere chronicle of unrelated facts but an embellishment of these facts in a narrative complete with rhetorical devices like speeches, vivid episodes, prophesies, fulfillments and proofs from prophecy. All ancient historiography had to appeal to general readers, for there was no purely academic history to be read only by historians. Therefore, history had to be interesting and persuasive, not just a factual account. This accounts for the novelistic elements scholars have found in Acts: ancient history did incorporate some such elements.

Comparison of Luke-Acts with both Biblical and Hellenistic forms of history shows its considerable use of elements of both types. Luke was a minor Hellenistic historian who imitated Biblical rather than Attic style because of his special subject matter. The overall structure of Luke-Acts is therefore a "continuation of the Biblical history" to Paul's ministry in Rome, using many Hellenistic motifs and methods familiar to its readers, as 1 and 2 Mc had done. Its universe is the Biblical universe, not that of secular Hellenistic writing. That is, it is dominated by a creator God and his plan of salvation for his people, not by Fate or Chance or a punishing Justice (to which Luke alludes as the thought of pagans on Malta when Paul survived shipwreck and was bitten by a snake; Acts 28:3–4). The events of Luke-Acts fulfill God's promises and prophecies, both from Luke's Greek Bible (OT) and from prophetic figures in the narrative, like John the Baptist, Jesus, Paul, and Agabus.

God as Main Agent. Thus the main driving force in Luke-Acts, as in Gn or 1 Sm, is not Jesus or Peter or Paul but God. God begins the action in the Gospel with his messages to Zachary and Mary, his causing the virgin Mary to conceive Jesus miraculously, his anointing of Jesus with his Spirit and call of him as Son at the Jordan, his raising Jesus from the dead, and the Pentecostal outpouring of his Spirit through the risen Jesus on the community of disciples in Acts. God directs the action by means of his Spirit and prophecies and angels' messages throughout both Luke and Acts, as when he leads Jesus into the desert to be tempted, fills Peter and Stephen with his Spirit to proclaim his word, and forbids Paul to go further into Asia and calls him instead to Macedonia. God continues to work in Luke-Acts the kinds of signs and wonders He had worked through Moses, Elijah, and Elisha. These signs indicate the presence of God's salvation to those healed and raised from the dead especially by Jesus, Peter, and Paul.

Acts traces the spread of God's word from Jerusalem to Judea, Samaria, Asia, Europe, and Rome where it is poised for launching to the end of the earth. The obvious biographical interest and focus on individuals is subordinated to a narrative showing the roots of the contemporary Gentile church in the first community of Jerusalem, and demonstrating God's will in the turn to the Gentiles without requiring the circumcision that would make them first Jews. The narrative demonstrates that after God's people Israel had rejected its prophetic Messiah like Moses, it was restored when thousands of Jewish pilgrims and Jerusalem dwellers accepted the Pentecost preaching (Acts 2:41) and the Jerusalem church grew to "tens of thousands" (Acts 21:20). The narrative also shows that those Jews who rejected the resurrected prophet like Moses preached by the Apostles and Paul were cut off from people and promises (Acts 3:23), thus creating a division among the people and the prophesied "fall and rise of many in Israel" (Lk 2:34). Acts ends with Paul declaring for the third and climactic time, that as Is 6:9–10 had prophesied to "your fathers," this people's heart has grown dull, but the salvation of God has been sent to the Gentiles. "They will listen" (28:28).

Shifts in Scholarship. Unrest among Biblical scholars over the limitations of historical criticism in general has grown dramatically in the 1980s, leading to the paradigm shift beyond mere historical criticism to more holistic and multi-disciplinary approaches. Thus, canon criticism counteracts the atomizing of the Bible by treating all Scriptures in the context of the OT-NT Christian canon. Against the relating of the Bible primarily to ancient cultures it treats it as appropriated by the Church. For Luke-Acts, this means not emphasizing isolated pre-Lukan stages like the "historical Jesus" or Markan and Q communities, or admitting absolute dichotomies between Luke and Paul, but recovering some of the lost patristic emphasis of the unity amidst the plurality of the Bible.

Another source of dissatisfaction with historical criticism is its failure to relate to contemporary religious and social experience. Critiques come from such vastly different sources as liberationist and feminist theologians and from charismatics of all denominations. Historical critics often resist liberationist analyses and applications as anachronistic. And they tend to dismiss as implausible many Lukan descriptions of phenomena like religious healing, community, deliverance from evil spirits, prophecy, and tongues, which look very similar to contemporary charismatic experience.

But not all of the new approaches shed real insight on Luke-Acts. Structuralism seems to most exegetes to be needlessly arcane. Liberationist and feminist uses of Luke-Acts tend to be more marginal to the main concerns of the text, as when applying Lukan concern for the poor to Marxist readings of Scripture or when focusing exclusively on Luke's treatment of women. And insofar as liberationist exegesis uses a "hermeneutics of suspicion" (e.g., in seeing bias toward the economic or patriarchal status quo), it critiques the Lukan Scriptures from non-biblical standards of authority which are themselves not subjected to criticism, more than it explains their intrinsic meaning.

Narrative Criticism. Literary and narrative criticism of Luke-Acts seems more promising for explaining the aims, limits, and dynamics of the Lukan narratives. First applied to OT narratives, narrative approaches began only in the mid-1980s to be applied to Luke-Acts. These analyze such narrative elements in Luke-Acts as deliberate plot gaps, use of irony, the author and readers implied by the narrative, and different narrators (the usual Biblical "omniscient" third-person narrator in most of Luke-Acts; the historian "I" sifting strands of evidence in Lk 1:1–4; and the "we" participating marginally in some passages after Acts 16:10).

These literary and narrative studies have relativized the dogmatism of some historical critics and exposed the lack of evidence and foundation for many popular historical conjectures. Where historical critics have found dichotomies and "seams" between not fully compatible sources, literary critics often see the "gaps" that are needed for any sophisticated narrative to maintain interest by engaging the reader's imagination. Thus the gaps at the end of both Mark and Acts prod the readers to fill in the gaps with information they had. For deliberate ending before foreshadowed outcomes was a common Greco-Roman narrative practice, as St. John Chrysostom noted in his Homilies on Acts 55: "At this point the historian stops his account and leaves the reader thirsting so that thereafter he guesses for himself. This also non-Christian writers . . . do. For to know everything makes one sluggish and dull" (Cadbury 322).

Where historical critics conjecture about who wrote Luke-Acts and whether he could possibly have known Paul, literary critics speak more appropriately of the implied author—those aspects of the real author that have been revealed and included in the text. The abrupt switch in style after the prologue, for example, makes a deliberate claim about the implied author. He reveals himself as someone able to write both in cultivated Greek periodic sentences (the prologue) and in the Biblical paratactic style using "and . . . and . . . and," as in Mark's Gospel. Because of the prologue, his imitation of the cruder Septuagint style does not label his work barbarian, as Mark's Gospel was.

While historical critics hypothesize where and to what communities Luke-Acts was written, literary critics content themselves with the implied reader—those aspects of the real readers imagined and addressed by the real author and discoverable from the emphases in the text. Literary criticism has shown that the real author and readers are outside the text (e.g., anyone in any place and time who can read the text's language could be the real reader, such as we are today). The act of writing creates distance from the original author, setting, and auditors, and requires the writer to imagine his absent audience (Ong). Historical reasoning beyond the authors and readers implied by the text to real authors and readers is necessarily conjectural and at best probable.

Narrative critics have also exposed the dogmatism of some historical judgments that the author of Luke-Acts could not have known Paul. They show that the narrative claim made by using a first person narrator in the Lukan prologue ("events among us . . . to me also," Lk 1:1–4) and the "we" passages of Acts (16:10 and later) is that the real author is analyzing experiences of the community and was present at events narrated with "we." Not all such claims are true (e.g., in Lucian of Samasota's fantastic "True History"), but they are intrinsic to understanding the narrative as it stands and are not fully explained by source theories like use of an itinerary, or claims that the genre of sea voyages has a conventional use of "we." The switch in narrator is always meaningful in literary criticism and not merely a matter of sources or convention. Regardless of how it originated, the effect of switching from third person omniscient narrator to "we" in parts of Acts has been observed from ancient to contemporary times—it claims participation in those events narrated by "we."

Infancy Debate. In the context of dissatisfaction with historical criticism can be mentioned the acrimonious debate about the historicity or midrashic (and fictional) character of the infancy narratives between R. E. Brown and R. Laurentin. Both have written major books with suggestions that tend to balance one another, and both seem to have hypothesized beyond the limited evidence. Studies of narrative do undercut the certitude of some of Brown's historical negativity based on style, differences between Matthew and Luke, silence about some facts in other NT authors, or use of OT in describing an event. Beyond their debate, Luke-Acts makes the narrative claim that Lk 1-2 has some basis in fact and Mary's memory preserved in the early Church: "His mother meanwhile kept all these things in memory," Lk 2:51 (NAB), and her presence in the Acts 1 assembly. This claim seems more plausible than to dismiss all historicity of Lk 1-2 as purely Lukan theology in narrative form, as some do who go beyond Brown.

Text Criticism. Narrative and other holistic approaches to Luke-Acts have contributed to text-critical debates about the authenticity of some key Lukan verses. Fitzmyer, e.g., argues on textual grounds for the authenticity of Lk 22:19b-20 (Luke X-XXIV 1387-88), which to "This is my body" adds "to be given for you. Do this in remembrance of me" (NAB), and the covenant in his blood shed for them. The command to do this in Jesus' memory fits the farewell genre perfectly, and reference to his body and blood given "for you" provide an apologetic for Jesus' Crucifixion appropriate to that genre. On textual grounds, Fitzmyer rejects Lk 23:34a, "Jesus said, 'Father, forgive them; they do not know what they are doing" (NAB). But despite weak manuscript support, most narrative critics consider it more likely to be from Luke than a copyist because of its strongly Lukan language and narrative links with Stephen's dying forgiveness in Acts 7:60b and the ignorance motif in Acts 3:17, 13:27, and 17:30. Fitzmyer also rejects the angel strengthening Jesus and his sweat like blood in Lk 22:43–44 because of its mixed textual evidence (though it is canonical). Besides Duplacy's persuasive textual arguments that these verses are more likely to have been dropped than added because of heresies, Neyrey (pp. 55–65) adds cogent arguments for the narrative appropriateness of their Lukan style, vocabulary and themes, and as the needed follow-up to Lk 4:13 about Satan's return against Jesus.

Lukan Theology. One aspect of the "certainty" about the catechesis of Theophilus that Luke promises to him (Lk 1:4) is the reliability of God's promises and prophecies. Luke-Acts answers a problem of theodicy, defending God's activity in history, by showing that his promises to Israel have not come to naught but have been fulfilled in the events "among us." As in all of Israel's history, some have responded to God's offer of salvation through Jesus, the resurrected prophet like Moses, and many others have rejected and thus excluded themselves from that salvation (Acts 3:23; 7:51–53). Thus Christians like Theophilus can understand how salvation could seem to have passed from God's original people Israel to their Church consisting mostly of Gentiles.

To demonstrate this, Luke-Acts shows that the Biblical history of God's people continues in how Jesus and the community of his followers in Acts fulfill the prophecies. Jerusalem is therefore treated more theologically and literarily than geographically: it is the center, the middle 12 chapters, of the two-volume narrative. The gospel climaxes in Jesus' death and Resurrection appearances in Jerusalem, from where Acts begins and moves out toward Rome and "the end of the earth" (Acts 1:8). Jerusalem provides the paradigmatic expression of the Jewish people's acceptance or rejection of God's prophet (Johnson).

Lukan Christology is subordinated to his demonstration of continuity with Israel through the image of the rejected prophet like Moses. This required stress on Jesus' humanity and prophetic roles of Jesus, rather than on his divinity as in the fourth Gospel's claims against the synagogue.

The image of the Moses-like prophet provides a fundamental structure for Luke-Acts, as suggested by the close parallelism between the story of Moses in Stephen's Acts 7 speech and that of Jesus in Luke-Acts. First God visits his people through this prophet Jesus (e.g., in Lk 7:16 at Naim, "A great prophet has risen among us" and "God has visited his people," RSV). After they reject him, God recalls this prophet to his people a second time (Moses after his exile, Jesus through Resurrection after His Crucifixion). Only those who reject this risen prophet like Moses a second time are cut off from the people's salvation (Acts 3:23), as the generation who rejected Moses a second time by idolatry in the desert (Acts 7:39–43). Thus Paul three times warns Jews who reject his message about Jesus that he will take it to the more receptive Gentiles (Acts 13:46, 18:6, 28:28).

A closely related christological issue is that in God's plan the Christ must (dei) suffer and rise from the dead. The OT prophesied a crucified Messiah. In the NT, only Luke has an explicit rhetorical two-part christological proof from prophecy: the Christ must suffer, and therefore Jesus is the Christ (cf. Lk 24:26–27).

The debate over Lukan eschatology continues to rage, but the programmatic Joel quotation in Acts 2:17–21 seems the key. According to the Joel citation with its Lukan modifications, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit is the inauguration of the eschatological "final days" (2:17) leading up to the manifest day of the returning Lord (2:20). These final days are subdivided into periods including persecution, the destruction of Jerusalem, "times of the Gentiles" (Lk 21:12-24), and false teachers in the community (Acts 20:29–30). This periodization of history is more rooted in the text of Luke-Acts than Conzelmann's three epochs of the time of Israel, the time of Jesus, and the time of the Church. Most scholars have also rejected the notion of a Lukan delay of the parousia prolonged into the indefinite future, so that the Church must "settle down" with "bourgeois ethics" for the long haul. Rather, by the end of Acts all the predictions mentioned in Luke-Acts have come true except for the cosmic signs and return of the Son of Man in judgment (Lk 21:25-28; Acts 1:11). Luke has explained a delay of the parousia by separating it from the fall of Jerusalem, but he continues to expect it soon.

Bibliography: Commentaries. Luke. J. FITZMYER, The Gospel according to Luke I-IX, X-XXIV, The Anchor Bible, v. 28, 28A (Garden City, N.Y. 1981, 1985). J. ERNST, Das Evangelium nach Lukas, Regensburger Neues Testament (Regensburg 1977). C. H. TALBERT, Reading Luke (New York 1982). J. KODELL, The Gospel according to Luke, Collegeville Bible Commentary, v. 3 (Collegeville, Minn. 1983). Acts. G. SCHNEIDER, Die Apostelgeschichte, I. Teil, II. Teil. Herders Theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament, v. 5.1, 5.2 (Freiburg 1980, 1982). E. HAENCHEN, The Acts of the Apostles (Philadelphia 1971). W. KURZ, The Acts of the Apostles, Collegeville Bible Commentary, v. 5 (Collegeville, Minn. 1983). Studies. E. GÜTTGEMANNS, "In welchem Sinne ist Lukas 'Historiker'? Die Beziehungen von Luk 1, 1-4 und Papias zur antiken Rhetorik," Linguistica Biblica 54 (1983) 9-26. E. PLÜM-ACHER, "Acta-Forschung 1974-1982," Theologische Rundschau 48 (1983) 1-56; 49 (1984) 105-169. E. RICHARD, "Luke—Writer, Theologian, Historian: Research and Orientation of the 1970s,' Biblical Theology Bulletin 13 (1983) 3-15. F. BOVON, Luc le théologian. Vingtcinq ans de recherches (1950–1975) (Neuchâtel 1978); "Chroniques du côté de chez Luc," Revue de théologie et de philosophie 115 (1983) 175-189. C. H. TALBERT, "Shifting Sands: The Recent Study of the Gospel of Luke," Interpretation 30 (1976) 381–395. W. GASQUE, A History of the Criticism of the Acts of the Apostles (Tübingen 1975). M. HENGEL, Acts and the History of Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia 1979). J. JERVELL, Luke and the People of God (Minneapolis 1972). W. KURZ, "Narrative Approaches to Luke-Acts," Biblica 68/2 (1987) 195-220. W. ONG, "The Writer's Audience Is Always a Fiction," Interfaces of the Word (Ithaca 1977) 53-81. R. DILLON, "Previewing Luke's Project from His Prologue (Luke 1:1-4)," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 43 (1981) 205-227. R. F. O'TOOLE, "Why Did Luke Write Acts (Lk-Acts)?" Biblical Theology Bulletin 7 (1977) 66–76. R. MADDOX, The Purpose of Luke-Acts (Edinburgh 1982). J. DUPLACY, "La préhistoire du texte en Luc 22:43-44," New Testament Textual Criticism [Festschrift B. M. Metzger], E. J. EPP and G. D. FEE, eds. (Oxford 1981) 77-86. J. NEYREY, The Passion according to Luke (New York 1985) R. E. BROWN, The Birth of a Messiah (Garden City, N.Y. 1977) 25-41, 235-499. R. LAURENTIN, The Truth of Christmas beyond the Myths (Petersham, Mass. 1986) 1-246, 302-562. C. H. TALBERT, ed., Perspectives on Luke-Acts (Danville, Va. 1978). C. H. TALBERT, ed., Luke-Acts: New Perspectives from the Society of Biblical Literature Seminar (New York 1984). L. KECK and J. L. MARTYN, Studies in Luke-Acts (Philadelphia 1980). F. NEIRNYNCK, ed., L'Evangile de Luc (Gembloux 1973). J. KREMER, ed., Les Actes des Apôtres (Leuven 1979). J. DUPONT, Nouvelles études sur les Actes des Apôtres, Lectio Divina, v. 118 (Paris 1984). L. T. JOHNSON, The Writings of the NT (Philadelphia 1986) 197-240. D. AUNE, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (Philadelphia 1987) 77-157. H. J. CADBURY, The Making of Luke-Acts (London 1968 [1927]). N. A. DAHL, Jesus in the Memory of the Early Church (Minneapolis 1976) 66-98.

[W. KURZ/EDS.]

LUKE BELLUDI, BL.

Franciscan; b. probably in or near Padua, c. 1200; d. there, after June 9, 1285. A member of the affluent Belludi family, he is thought to have studied at the University of Padua and to have joined the FRANCISCANS at the age of 20, receiving the habit from FRANCIS OF ASSISI himself. He became the admiring disciple and close companion of ANTHONY OF PADUA, accompanied him on his preaching missions, and attended him on his deathbed at Aracoeli (Rome), 1231. Luke's denunciation of the excesses of Ezzelino (1194–1259) brought heavy reprisals that ended only with the tyrant's death. As provincial superior, Luke continued building the great basilica of St. Anthony where his body now rests in the chapel named for him. PIUS XI confirmed his cult in 1927.

Feast: Feb. 17.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 19 (1927) 213–216. B. MARINANGELI, Cenni sulla vita del b. L. Belludi (Padua 1929). L. GUIDALDI, Il Santo 3 (1930) 59–69. La cappella del beato Luca e Giusto de' Menabuoi nella basilica di Sant'Antonio, photos M. TOSELLO, text G. BRESCIANI ALVAREZ (Padua 1988). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:359–360. G. FUSSENEGGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1206.

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

LUKE OF ARMENTO, ST.

Monastic founder; b. Sicily, early 10th century; d. Armento, Italy, Oct. 19, 993. He entered the Greek monastery of St. Philip of Agira and then retired to a hermitage near Reggio, Calabria, under the spiritual guidance of St. ELIAS OF REGGIO. To escape the Saracen raids, he left Elias about 959 and moved farther north, stopping at Noa in Lucania. There he restored a small church dedicated to St. Peter and organized a monastic community. After seven years full of many charitable activities, he settled near the Agri River at the monastery of San Giuliano, which he restored and enlarged. Not feeling safe even there from the Saracen incursions and the raids of the troops of Otto I, he withdrew to Armento c. 969 and remained there till his death. In the course of his travels Luke built and restored many churches and monasteries. He is also credited with having founded the famous monastery of SS. Elias and Anastasius of Carbone.

Feast: Oct. 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 6:337–342. G. DA COSTA-LOUILLET, "Saints de Sicile et d'Italie méridionale aux VIIIe, IXe et Xe siècles," Byzantion 29–30 (1959–60) 89–173, esp. 142–146. P. E. SANTORO, Historia monasterii Carbonensis (Rome 1601). G. ROBINSON, History and Cartulary of the Greek Monastery of St. Elias and St. Anastasius of Carbone, 2 v. in 3 (Rome 1928–30).

[M. PETTA]

LUKEWARMNESS

Lukewarmness or tepidity, in spiritual theology, signifies the state of soul to which the warmth and fervor of charity is wanting, but has not yet completely deteriorated into the coldness of indifference and hatred. The classical origin of the word is the warning addressed to the Church of Laodicea (Rv 3.16) that has been so frequently quoted by preachers that it is probably the best-known text of Revelation. The preceding verse-"'I know thy works; thou art neither cold nor hot. I would that thou wert cold or hot"-brings out the meaning of lukewarmness in unmistaken fashion. The word χλιαρός, which the Vulgate renders tepidus, is natural enough in the language of love; the metaphor is continued in the threat, "I am about to vomit thee out of my mouth." The following verse apparently indicates that the lukewarmness of the Laodiceans was connected with self-complacency: "because thou sayest, 'I am rich and have grown wealthy and have need of nothing' and dost not know that thou art the wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked

Whatever the local conditions, physical or moral, that occasioned this stern rebuke, Christian theology has adapted the description to those who, while still living the life of grace, are not advancing in the fervor of charity. Such people have been called "retarded" souls by analogy with physical and mental failure to grow. St. John of the Cross gives a brilliant psychological description of the return of the capital vices in a more subtle, spiritual form in those he calls "beginners," and thus argues for a second conversion in the "night of the senses" at the threshold of contemplation (Dark Night, 1.2-6). Nevertheless, tepidity should not be confused with aridity or dryness in prayer, since the Christian experience of grace and charity, although significant, need not correspond completely or perfectly to the reality of their presence and activity. Lukewarmness is apparently caused by venial sins, especially the deliberate variety (acedia is frequently mentioned), and "imperfections" that are unheeded. Although charity cannot be directly diminished, the refusal of further sacrifice and, even more so, acts outside charity not only dispose the will to an act against it, but interrupt the dialogue with God (THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 24.10).

Bibliography: R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The Three Ages of the Interior Life, tr. M. T. DOYLE (St. Louis 1947–48) 1:461–470. A. TANQUEREY, The Spiritual Life, tr. H. BRANDERIS (Westminster, Md. 1945) 592–596. F. W. FABER, Growth in Holiness (Westminster, Md. 1960) ch. 25.

[U. VOLL]

LULL, RAYMOND, BL.

Mystic, missionary, Catalan poet and prose writer; b. Majorca, c. 1235; d. probably Tunis, 1316. He is revered by the Franciscans as Doctor Illuminatus. Though he has never been canonized, his cultus was confirmed by Pius IX in 1858. He was strongly attracted to both the Dominicans and the Franciscans, but he never took Holy Orders; there is a tradition that he joined the Third Order of St. Francis.

Work. Brought up in the southern court of Majorca, Lull had about him something of the troubadour, and he always retained traces of a courtly and chivalrous formation. An English version of his manual of chivalry was printed by William Caxton. From the large Moorish population in Majorca he acquired a knowledge of Arabic, in which he wrote some of his works (though no Arabic texts by him have survived), and an interest in Oriental mysticism. About 1263 he had five visions of Christ on the cross after which he entered on a religious way of life and formed missionary resolutions for which he prepared himself by study. Fruits of these years were the Llibre de contemplació and the Llibre del gentil e los tres savis; the first of these is a mystical and encyclopedic work; the second is in the form of a conversation between a Christian, a Muslim, and a Jew, and shows Lull already investigating common ground between the three religions that could be used as a basis from which to persuade unbelievers of the truth of the Trinity and the Incarnation. This was to be the grand aim of the Art. Lull was a pioneer in using a romance language (Catalan) for theological and apologetic works.

About 1272 Lull had an illuminative experience on Mount Randa in which he saw the whole universe in its relation to the divine attributes, and the principles of his Art were revealed to him. Soon after, he produced the first version of the Art, his system for the discovery of first principles of knowledge and the reduction of all knowledge to unity. The rest of his life was spent in tireless propagation of the Art and in attempting to interest rulers and popes in his projects. One of these was the founding of schools of Oriental languages in order to assist missionary work. King James II of Majorca was persuaded to establish such a school and although it lasted only a few years, the idea of such colleges took root. Lull's missionary journeys included several visits to Tunis; he had always desired a martyr's death, and according to pious legend he suffered martyrdom by stoning on the last of these journeys.

As a mystic, Lull was in the Franciscan tradition, and he was also influenced by Sufi mysticism. His most remarkable mystical work, Llibre d'amic e amat, has great religious and poetic power, and is well known in English translation as The Book of the Lover and the Beloved. As a philosopher, he belongs in the Augustinian tradition, particularly as developed in the twelfth century. Lull is best understood when it is realized that, although his life was passed in the great age of scholasticism, he was in spirit a man of the twelfth century rather than of the thirteenth, a reactionary toward the Augustinian Platonism of St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY and the Victorines (see SAINT-VICTOR, MONASTERY OF; VICTORINE SPIRITUAITY). He was also somewhat tinged with Neoplatonic influences from JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA. The actual channels through which some knowledge of the Scotist divine names as primordial causes reached Lull have not yet been identified, though HONORIUS OF AUTUN may have been one of the intermediaries.

The Art. Lull evolved many versions of his Art, but its principles remained the same. The Arts were always based on divine attributes or names (Bonitas, Magnitudo, etc.), called by Lull the Dignitates Dei. These were designated by letters of the alphabet that were placed on revolving concentric wheels: through the revolutions of the wheels, combinations of the letters were obtained. The Art could work on all the levels of creation, the angelic world, the world of the stars, of man and his activities, of the animal and vegetable worlds, by abstracting the essential bonitas, magnitudo, etc., on each level. There is a kind of geometrical logic of relation in the Art that uses as its basic figures the triangle, the circle, and the square. The purpose of the Art was always, for Lull, a missionary purpose. By basing the Art on religious conceptions common to Christians, Jews, and Muslims—the divine names or attributes-and on the elemental structure of nature universally accepted in the science of the time, Lull believed that he had an instrument for bringing unbelievers to Christianity. The Trinitarian structure of the Art was its basic characteristic; it was to reflect the Trinity and to be used by all three powers of the soul defined by St. Augustine as the image of the Trinity in man. As intellectus it was an art of knowing; as voluntas an art of loving; as memoria an art of memory.

A large proportion of Lull's extremely numerous works are either expositions of the various forms of the Art or else are related in some noticeable way to it. Even the attractive romances or allegorical novels, Blanquerna (c. 1284) and Felix (c. 1288), are, at bottom, popularizations of it. The Arbre de sciencia (1295), which was very widely known in its Latin version, presents the whole encyclopedia of knowledge schematized as a forest of trees whose roots are the principles of the Art, which could be done on all subjects. The Liber de ascensu et descensu intellectus (c. 1305) describes the ascent and descent of the intellect on the ladder of being through the use of the Art.

The vast diffusion of Lullism is only now beginning to be studied in a systematic way. In the Renaissance it took on a new and intense phase of activity, though with a different emphasis, and in the sixteenth century a chair of Lullism was established at the Sorbonne. Lull's use of letter notations for concepts and his attempt to represent movement through his revolving figures are significant features of the Art, the importance of which in the history of method is becoming increasingly realized. Leibniz's schemes for a universal calculus were influenced by the combinatoria.

Feast: July 3 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: M. JOHNSON, The Evangelical Rhetoric of Raymon Lull: Lay Learning and Piety in the Christian West (New York 1996), bibliography. R. LULL, Opera Latina, 19, tr. A. LINARES (Belgium 1993); Raymond Lull's New Rhetoric: Text and Translation of Lull's "Rethorica Nova," tr. M. JOHNSON (Davis, Calif. 1994). L. SALA-MOULINS, La Philosophie de l'Amour de Raymonde Lulle (Paris 1974), bibliography. M. PEREIRA, The Alchemical Corpus Attributed to Raymond Lull (London 1989). R. HERRERA, "Ramon Lull: Mystic Polymath," in Mystics of the Book (New York 1993). E. A. PEERS, Raymond Lull: A Biography (New York 1969), bibliography. F. YATES, Lull and Bruno (London and Boston 1982).

[F. A. YATES]

LULL OF MAINZ, ST.

Missionary, archbishop; b. Wessex, England, c. 710; d. Hersfeld?, Germany, Oct. 16, 786. An Anglo-Saxon like St. BONIFACE, he became a BENEDICTINE at MALMES-BURY ABBEY. He made a pilgrimage to Rome, whence Boniface in 738 took him to Germany. There he became associated in Boniface's missionary efforts. In 751 Lull was sent to Rome, where, having been promised succession to Boniface in the See of Mainz by PEPIN III, he was consecrated a CHORBISHOP in 752. When Lull succeeded Boniface as bishop of Mainz in 754, there developed a long dispute between Lull and Abbot St. Sturmi of Fulda. Lull sought—unsuccessfully—to end Fulda's exemption and direct dependence on Rome and to bring it under the jurisdiction of Mainz. He founded the Benedictine monasteries of HERSFELD and Bleidenstadt and enlarged the Diocese of Mainz by absorbing the Sees of Erfurt and Buraburg. Lull received the PALLIUM from ADRIAN I c. 781 and was thus the first regular METROPOLITAN of Mainz. He was buried at Hersfeld Abbey.

Feast: Oct. 16.

Bibliography: LAMBERT OF HERSFELD "Life," Acta Sanctorum, Oct. 7 (1845) 1050–91. Boniface-Lull letters, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae (Berlin 1826–) 3:215–433. W. LEVISON, England and the Continent in the Eighth Century (Oxford 1946) 223–240. T. SCHIEFFER, Angelsachsen und Franken (Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften und der Literatur. Geistes- und sozialwissenschaftliche Klasse 20.2; Mainz 1950).

[B. D. HILL]

LULLY, JEAN BAPTISTE

Baroque musician, virtual founder of French opera; b. Florence, Italy, Nov. 28, 1632; d. Paris, March 22, 1687. Brought to Paris in 1644, Lully was chamber boy and musical page to Mlle. de Montpensier. The gifted and energetic youth devoted himself to the tastes of his Monarch, Louis XIV, and achieved a position of power in the cultural life of France through a monopoly on musical theater. His early productions were ballets in which the king danced; collaborations with Molière followed. His career culminated in his operas, of which Thesée, Atys, Psyché, and Armide were perhaps best known. His great contribution was the handling of the French language, particularly in recitative, and in instrumental writing specifically the overture, still associated with his name. His church compositions were conservative, following the massive forms of Henri Dumont rather than presaging the newer style. He set for state occasions most of the standard texts, producing a Miserere, a De profundis, a Dies Irae, and a Te Deum.

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes, ed. H. PRUNIÈRES, 10 v. (Paris 1930–39), L. DE LA LAURENCIE, Lully (Paris 1911). E. BOR-

Engraving of Jean Baptiste Lully.

REL, Jean-Baptiste Lully (Paris 1949). W. MELLERS, The Heritage of Music, ed. H. J. FOSS, 3 v. (New York 1927-51) 3:32-52. Histoire de la musique, ed. ROLAND-MANUEL, 2 v. (Paris 1960-63); v. 9, 16 of Encyclopédie de la Pléiade v. 1. D. J. GROUT, A Short History of Opera, 2 v. (2d, rev. and enl. ed. New York 1965). N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (5th ed. New York 1958) 991–992. G. CHOUQUET, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 5:422-427. J. R. ANTHONY, "Towards a Principal Source for Lully's Court Ballets: Foucault vs Philador," Recherches sur la Musique française classique, 25 (1987) 77-104. L. E. BROWN, "Departures from Lullian Convention in the tragédie lyrique of the préramiste Era," Recherches sur la Musique française classique, 22 (1984) 59-78. M. COUVREUR, "La Collaboration de Quinault et Lully avant la Psyché de 1671," Recherches sur la Musique française classique, 27 (1991/92) 9-34. J. NEWMAN, Jean-Baptiste de Lully and His Tragédie Lyrique (Ann Arbor 1979). J. S. POWELL, "Appropriation, Parody, and the Birth of French Opera: Lully's Les Festes de L'Amour et de Bacchus and Molière's La Malade Imaginaire," Recherches sur la Musique française classique, 29 (1998) 3-26. L. ROSOW, "Alceste, ou Le triomphe d'Alcide [Alcestis, or the Triumph of Alcides,]" in International Dictionary of Opera, ed. C. S. LARUE, 2 v. (Detroit 1993) 21-22. J. L. SCHWARTZ, "The passacaille in Lully's Armide: Phrase Structure in the Choreography and the Music," Early Music, 26 (1998) 301-320.

[E. BORROFF]

LUNN, ARNOLD

Catholic convert and apologist, England's leading authority on skiing, b. Madras, India, April 18, 1888; d. London, June 3, 1974. His father was Sir Harry Lunn, who was a Methodist missionary in India, later worked for the Thomas Cook travel agency, and in 1906 formed a successful tour business of his own. His mother was an Irish Protestant devoted to Sinn Fein and Irish independence. In 1908 Lunn founded the Alpine Ski Club and from 1919 was editor of the British Ski Year Book. He introduced the modern slalom course in Muerren, Switzerland, in 1922, thus creating the modern Alpine slalom race. For 15 years (1924–39) he was a member of the executive committee of the Féderation Internationale de Ski (FIS) and later (1946–49) was chairman of the International Downhill Ski Racing Committee.

In The Swiss and Their Mountains, (1963) Lunn credited a particular experience of an Alpine sunset with awakening in him a sense of the spiritual and the supernatural. Lunn's formal education took place at Harrow and at Balliol College, Oxford. He wrote of his conversion in Now I See (London 1934). His defense of Catholicism usually involved collaboration with a friend, such as Ronald KNOX, or with friendly foes, such as the Anglican Garith Lean, or the philosopher C. E. M. Joad, or the scientist J. B. S. Haldane. Lunn's books often took the form of debates. In addition to Difficulties (1932, with Ronald Knox), there should be mentioned his Science and the Supernatural (1935, with J. B. S. Haldane), and Christian Counterattack (1969, with Garith Lean). His reputation as a conservative made him especially useful in World War II, when he traveled extensively in Spain, Portugal, Latin America, and the United States as a spokesman for Britain and the defense of Christian civilization against Nazism.

While refusing to become an alarmist after VATICAN COUNCIL II, he was annoyed by some secularist trends, and especially was saddened by events in the United States. He spoke and continued writing against the new morality, e.g., in The New Morality, with G. Lean (rev. ed., London 1967), which he viewed as an accommodation of the Christian code to secularist sensibilities, a preoccupation with social problems, and a general revolt against authority. The real division, as he saw it, was not between liberals and conservatives, but between those who are and those who are not intimidated by dominant fashions of secularism. He refused to tone down differences between various Christian communions but was in favor of a militant ecumenism, in which all would band together to reverse the triumphant advance of secularism. He summed up his approach in an article in the Tablet dated the day before his death by citing Augustine: "Love men, slay errors."

Bibliography: A. LUNN, Come What May (Boston 1941). Tablet 221 (1967) 90–91, 132–133; 224 (1970) 544; 227 (1973) 654; 228 (1974) 527.

[E. J. DILLON]

LUPOLD OF BEBENBURG

Canon lawyer and political theorist, bishop of Bamberg (1353–63); b. of a Swabian-Franconian ministerial family, c. 1297; d. Bamberg, Oct. 28, 1363. Lupold matriculated in Canon Law at Bologna in 1316, earning the degree of doctor decretorum and returning to Germany c. 1324. After holding several canonries he was elected bishop of Bamberg in 1353.

Although an imperial protagonist in the struggle between the AVIGNON papacy and Emperor LOUIS IV (1314–47), Lupold never assumed an extreme antipapal position. His most important work, Tractatus de iuribus regni et imperii (1340), dealt with the relationship between German kingship and imperial dignity, and attempted to define the roles of spiritual and secular powers in Christian society. During the following year, he expressed the same ideas in verse form in his Ritmaticum querulosum et lamentosum dictamen de modernis cursibus et defectibus regni ac imperil Romanorum. Lupold's third work, Libellus de zelo christianae religionis veterum principum Germanorum (1342), emphasizing the prominence of Germany and the Empire in Christendom, and their ancient and close connection with the faith, is a plea for a modus vivendi between papacy and Empire.

Lupold served Emperor Charles IV (1347–78) in an advisory capacity. The ideas and some of the phraseology of Lupold's Tractatus appear in the GOLDEN BULL of 1356, the constitutional law that, in its broad outlines, regulated the relations between the emperor and the German princes until 1806.

Bibliography: A. SENGER, Lupold von Bebenburg (Bamberg 1905). H. MEYER, Lupold von Bebenburg: Studien zu seinen Schriften (Freiburg 1909). R. MOST, "Der Reichsgedanke des Lupold von Bebenburg," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 4 (1941) 444–485. J. KIST, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1218.

[W. A. ERNEST]

LUPUS OF SENS, ST.

Bishop; b. Orléanais, France, c. 573; d. Brienon (11½ miles southeast of Sens), Sept. 1, c. 623. Lupus (or Leu or Loup) was educated and ordained by his maternal uncles, the bishops of Orléans and Auxerre. In 609, when the bishop of Sens died, the king, at the request of the people, appointed the saintly Lupus to replace him. As an adherent of Sigebert of Austrasia, Lupus was exiled by Chlotar II (613) to Vimeu in the canton of Picardy, where he converted many pagans. Pardoned by Chlotar the following year, he returned triumphantly to Sens, stopping in Paris for the council of 614. He was buried in the monastery of Sainte-Colombe-lès-Sens, which he had founded in Sens. In 853 his relics were transferred to the new church. His cult was of special renown during the Middle Ages. Among the many churches and monasteries dedicated to him in France are Saint-Leu-Saint-Gilles in Paris (1235), Saint-Loup of Naud (Provins), and Saint-Loup of Esserent, near Senlis. He is invoked by epileptics.

Feast: Sept. 1.

Bibliography: Vita Lupi, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 4:176–187, late (790) but of value. Acta Sanctorum Sept. 1:248–265. G. VIELHABER in Analecta Bollandiana 26 (1907) 43–44. H. BOUVIER, Histoire de l'église et de l'ancien archdiocèse de Sens, 3 v. (Paris 1906–11) v. 1. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 9:22–24. Martyrologium Romanum, ed. H. DELEHAYE (Brussels 1940); v. 68 of Acta Sanctorum 374–375.

[P. COUSIN]

LUQUE, CRISANTO

Archbishop of Bogotá and first Colombian cardinal; b. Tenjo, Feb. 1, 1889; d. Bogotá, May 7, 1959. Luque was ordained in 1916, appointed auxiliary bishop of Tunja in 1931, and bishop in 1932. He visited the various parts of his large diocese, built the episcopal mansion, took an interest in the improvement of the seminary and the religious life of the clergy, and undertook important work on behalf of the poor. In 1950 he was named archbishop of Bogotá, primate of Colombia, to succeed Ismael Perdomo. He was made a cardinal in 1953. He was chief chaplain of the Armed Forces and pontifical legate to the Third National Marian Congress, and he took part in the conclave that elected John XXIII. The governments of Colombia, Venezuela, Spain, Ecuador, and Brazil conferred high decorations on him.

While bishop of Tunja, Luque founded, and later protected, the radio schools of Sutatenza that provided the farm workers with lessons in reading and writing and religious and civic training. The radio schools were later extended to other countries and recommended by UNESCO. He founded, in Bogotá, the Parochial Union of the South that brought together parishes of the working-class districts, with their population of half a million faithful, to solve religious and social problems in common. It was an experiment in priestly teamwork that was effective in combatting communism. He convoked and presided over the First National Assembly of Catholic Workers and the First National Pastoral Congress, and encouraged Social Weeks and Congresses of Social Action. He established the Center of Social Research for the guidance of the pastorate. The opening of the new archiepiscopal palace, the creation of numerous parishes, and the intensification of catechistic campaigns were additional achievements of his regime. He was one of the most effective promoters of the CONSEJO EPISCOPAL LA-TINOAMERICANO (CELAM), and presided over various episcopal conferences with great success, winning united support for his undertakings.

Luque collaborated actively with the various civil government administrations to combat the violence that plagued Colombia. In religion and in politics, his actions were prudent and benefited the public generally. In 1953 General Gustavo Rojas Pinilla led a coup d'état that overthrew the conservative Laureano Gómez. The Rojas movement was legalized by the National Constitutent Assembly, and the cardinal, after consulting with the historically important parties, recognized the new government. However, when it took the path of dictatorship, he energetically defended democratic principles and acted on the side of the people and the students, who overthrew the dictator. Luque maintained excellent relations with the new National Front government, headed by Alberto Lleras, and was able through constitutional reform, voted by plebiscite, to secure political recognition of Catholicism as an essential element of the social order.

During his reign, the religious struggle of the parties largely ceased, and the Colombians reconciled themselves somewhat on Catholic principles. Thanks to his work, backed by the bishops, the Church gained prestige, respect, and acceptance. He had a gift for governing and deserved to be called the archbishop of the peasants and the workers.

[R. GÓMEZ HOYOS]

LURIA, ISAAC

Palestinian Hebrew mystic generally acclaimed to be the founder of the school of practical and applied Kabalism and whose doctrines became the theologia mystica of Judaism; b. Jerusalem, 1534; d. Safed, Palestine, Aug. 5, 1572. Because the forebears of Isaac ben Solomon Luria had emigrated from Germany, he was surnamed Ashkenazi (German), and to subsequent generations he was best known by the metonym Ari (Heb. 'arî, lion), which probably was derived from the first letters of his name in the form of Ashkenazi Rabbi Isaac. When Luria was young, his father died, and he was taken to Cairo to live with a wealthy maternal uncle, the tax farmer Mordecai Francis. He studied assiduously under such men as Bezalel Ashkenazi and David ibn Abi Zimra and, while still in his teens, became extremely proficient in Talmudic and rabbinical literature. At age 15 he married his cousin, but not being required to support either himself or his bride, he continued his studies without interruption.

However, he apparently preferred the world of the mystic and the ascetic to that of the Talmud or married life, for at the age of 22 he became a hermit and lived in solitude along the banks of the Nile. He had become absorbed in the ZOHAR, the Cabalist classic that first appeared in print in 1557. The more he delved into its hidden mysteries, the more he craved seclusion and the less desire he had for contact with men. Only on the Sabbath would he return to his young wife. He conversed very little with people; and when he did, his conversations were always entirely in Hebrew. Soon the labyrinth of Cabalistic thought became as familiar to Luria as his daily devotions. His mode of living, which was nurtured by an active, imaginative mind, led to the inevitable result—Luria became a visionary. He intimated that he was the Messiah ben Joseph, who, according to Jewish legend, would be one of the forerunners of the Messiah ben David; that Elijah the Prophet, who would be the immediate precursor of the Messiah, resolved for him many difficult passages of the Zohar; that by night his soul ascended to heaven and there conversed with the ancient Talmudic sages. His adherents attributed to him supernatural powers, the ability to exorcize demons, perform miracles, and communicate with trees, angels, and birds.

In 1569 Luria settled in Safed, Palestine, where he soon began to propagate his mystical doctrines to a group of devoted disciples, among whom were such men of renown as Moses Cordovero, Hayyim Vital, Solomon Alkabetz, and Joseph CARO. Although he left no written legacy, a great deal of his life and thought is known through the writings of Vital, his biographer. From copious lecture notes that Luria's followers had made, Vital produced numerous posthumous works of Luria that present the Lurianic concepts; the most important of these works is his six-volume magnum opus entitled 'Es Hayyim (Tree of Life).

Luria's system is based primarily on the threefold doctrine of ṣimṣûm (originally "concentration," "contraction," better translated in Cabalistic parlance as "withdrawal" or "retreat"), ševîrat hakk elîm (breaking of the vessels), and 'ôlām hattiqqûn (the "repaired world," i.e., the ideal state of the world). Before creation, the 'en sôph (the Endless; the Infinite One) was omnipresent and occupied the entire world. Therefore, in order to make creation possible, God had to contract and withdraw into Himself. In the space created by this withdrawal (simsûm) Luria believed a residue ($r^e sîm\hat{o}$) or beam of divine light remained, like the residue of oil left in a bottle after most of its contents have been poured out. Creation takes place by the emanation of this light flowing from God. When in its turn the resîmô retreated, a void appeared in the center encircled by ten spheres ($s^eph\hat{i}r\hat{o}t$) or vessels $(k^e l \hat{i} m)$ that represented the infinite manifestations and radiations of the 'en sôph. The return of some divine light to the center caused the breaking of the innermost six vessels and to a lesser degree the seventh. Since the outer three were closer to the 'en sôph, they were of purer substance and were able to withstand the light. With the fracturing of the $k^e l \hat{i} m$, confusion, evil, and darkness entered the cosmos; and everything, the good and the bad, intermingled.

Primordial man ('ādām qadmôn) emanated from the essence of the 'ên sôph as a consequence of simsûm. Man's soul unites the infinite with the finite. When Adam was created, the soul for each human being was simultaneously created with the organs of Adam's body. Each human being, therefore, is a spark (nîşôş) of Adam, and just as there are inferior and superior organs, so there are inferior and superior souls in keeping with the organs with which they are coupled. Because of Adam's sin, men's souls, in their various gradations, were cast into turmoil and could not be distinguished from each other. The purest soul, therefore, has become intermingled with the impure or, as Luria calls it, with the element of qelippôt (shells, i.e., forces of evil). No person is any longer entirely good or wholly bad. Man's soul, therefore, cannot find peace by returning to its source until it expiates its imperfections and seeks purification through the process of METEMPSYCHOSIS, that is, by passing through animate and inanimate bodies: humans, animals, wood, and stone. Luria and his followers (known as "the lion's whelps") would refrain from killing even worms for fear these carried human souls.

With the separation of the holy from the profane, the 'ôlām hattiqqûn will be reestablished and the advent of the Messiah will be at hand. This can be accomplished only through the observance of God's Commandments and the study of the Torah.

Bibliography: G. G. SCHOLEM, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (3d ed. New York 1954). The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–06) 8:210–212: W. DUCAT, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, 10 v. (New York 1939–44) 7:237–239. M. MARGOLIS and A. MARX, A History of the Jewish People (New York 1927; repr. pa. 1958). H. H. GRAETZ, History of the Jews, ed.

and tr. B. LÖWY, 6 v. (Philadelphia 1945) 4:618–627. E. L. RAPP, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:479. K. SCHUBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1220–1221.

[N. J. COHEN]

LUST

The vice opposed to the virtue of chastity. Called luxuria in Latin and commonly referred to as impurity in English, lust always indicates an excessive, that is, irrational, attachment to venereal pleasure. Because of the wide variety of vicious acts and habits it causes, Christian tradition classifies it as one of the seven capital SINS. The malice of lust is shown in the vices to which it leads: blindness of mind, rashness, thoughtlessness, inconstancy, self-love, and excessive attachment to the material world. It destroys man's humanity by subjecting sexual activity not to its proper ends recognized by reason, that is, the procreation of children and the promotion of the mutual love of spouses in marriage, but instead to mere bodily pleasure. This article considers lust (1) as spoken of in Sacred Scripture, (2) in its relation to the natural law, (3) in its opposition to chastity, (4) as a violation of the sexual order, (5) according to its gravity as a sin, (6) in the moral imputability of its acts, and (7) in relation to natural and supernatural remedies.

Scripture. Although Scripture does not provide an exhaustive list of the types of lust and describe the malice of each, both the OT and NT condemn sexual misbehavior in a number of its forms. The OT, for example, condemns ADULTERY, incest, the seduction or rape of a virgin, bestiality, and prostitution, especially the cultic prostitution practiced in the Canaanite sanctuaries. Further, in the Sixth and Ninth Commandments it forbids improper sexual acts and desires. In the NT, the OT teaching is elevated and refined by the delineation of lust as a profanation of a mutual love that can be humanly expressed only in the sanctity of marriage. The profanation is the greater for the dignity of the married union, which is so sacred as to be a symbol of Christ's union with the Church (Mt 19.3-9; Eph 5.25-33). Christ Himself, declaring and reinforcing the primitive inviolable sanctity of the marital bond, brands as adulterous any quasimarital association of a married person with another man or woman. Paul denounces the "uncleanness" of the pagans, declaring that God has abandoned them to "shameful lusts" or unnatural vices because of their idolatry (Rom 1.24-28). Among the "works of the flesh" that exclude from the kingdom of God are sexual immorality, uncleanness, and licentiousness (Gal 5.19-20); nor shall the kingdom be possessed by adulterers, the effeminate, or sodomites (1 Cor 6.9-10).

"The Fall of Man," oil painting by Hendrick Goltzius, 1616. (© Christie's Images/CORBIS)

In a noteworthy passage (1 Cor 6.12–20) the Apostle points out the immorality of promiscuity, arguing from the dignity conferred on a Christian by his vocation as one destined to rise with Christ, whose members are the members of Christ and the temple of the Holy Spirit, bought at a great price so that he should glorify and bear God in his body.

Natural Law. Paul's strong condemnation of the pagans for their unnatural vices indicates that the natural law itself, written in the heart of man (Rom 2.14), imposes certain essential restraints on the pursuit of pleasures of the flesh. The sex appetite is one of the most powerful of human urges, needing rational control lest the indulgence of it destroy the basis of society. The possibility of such destruction has been shown by the rationalist scholar J. D. Unwin in his statistical survey of more than 80 civilized and uncivilized communities (Sex and Culture, Oxford 1934).

Customs concerned with sex and marriage differ widely with various peoples, but their universal existence is irrefutable testimony to the common conviction of mankind that the sex instinct must be controlled and that, therefore, prohibitions of sins of lust are part of the natural law.

Lust as Opposed to Chastity. Integrating into his Christian moral synthesis the Aristotelian concept and catalog of moral virtues, St. Thomas Aquinas designates lust as the vice opposed by excess to chastity (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 153.3 ad 3), chastity being that part of temperance which moderates the concupiscible appetite in its inclination for the pleasures that go with the use of the generative faculty (ibid. 2a2ae, 151.3). In contemporary language, chastity governs the use and the pursuit of the pleasures of sex. Hence lust refers to the unbridled enjoyment of them. In the terminology of Aristotle and St. Thomas, one commits a sin of lust by seeking or enjoying these pleasures in a way that exceeds the measure of right reason; in a Christian context one can add in a way that contravenes the sacred significance of sex and marriage in the order of Redemption.

Thus, on the one hand, chastity controls the enjoyment of sex pleasure according to the dictates of right reason and the Christian moral law, forbidding, permitting, or approving according to circumstances and especially according to the objective and subjective purpose of such pleasure. Lust, on the other hand, indulges in sex pleasure without regard to these necessary controlling factors.

Although this narrows the concept of chastity, and hence of lust, to the use and abuse of sex and of sexual pleasure, the pleasure itself must be considered in a very wide context of human sensations, emotions, and reactions. A lustful action is a disordered use or pursuit of sex pleasure not only because it defeats the biological, social, or moral purpose of sex activity, but also because in doing this it subjects the spiritual in man to values of the grossly material order, acting as a disintegrating force in the human personality.

Against this background one can consider the careful distinctions traditionally made by theologians between pleasure that is merely sensible, pleasure that is sensual, and pleasure that is venereal, only the last being immediately attached to the exercise of sex in its narrow physical sense. Merely sensible pleasure, such as delight in the touch of a soft object, is relevant only insofar as such pleasure can become venereal, as when there is pleasure in physical contact between adult persons of opposite sexes, especially in kisses and embraces, because the deliberate and prolonged seeking of such pleasure is apt to arouse venereal pleasure, even when there is no intention that it should, and cause a danger of consenting to it (cf. Alphonsus Liguori, 1.3 n.416).

Love, especially between members of opposite sexes, can express itself on the three levels of sensible, sensual, and venereal, and lapses into lust only when it expresses itself inordinately on the last of them. The difference is enormous between venereally pleasurable activity when absorbed into the full meaning of sex, and when it escapes from the control of reason and spirit. This difference is due to the nature of the sex drive considered as a creative force. Of itself it reaches out to another person as, under God, a coprinciple of new life. Thus it comes from and tends to the core of man's fruitful nature, understanding the term not only of man's physical power to procreate his kind, but also of his responsibility for the moral and spiritual formation of offspring.

These responsibilities belong to man as a person, one who is made to God's image and recognizes the divinely imprinted pattern of human sexual activity, and the obligation to accept with his reason and execute with his will and its attendant emotions what this pattern requires. Thus sex activity outside the framework that alone provides for the loving and responsible care of children converts the force of sexual activity into one that tends to personal disintegration. In marriage itself, sexual actions must conform to the divine pattern; they have a disintegrating effect when they are performed irresponsibly, most conspicuously when the creative nature of sex is positively defeated by acts that are unnatural or when in varying degrees according to circumstances cogent reasons for avoiding pregnancy are carelessly neglected or when sheer pleasure seeking upsets the balance of intimate friendship. There are no hard and fast rules, but human lovers will know for themselves whether what they do is a descent to a merely animal condition or an ascent to a graciously human dignity and delight.

Distinctions must be made between sex, eros, and agape, indicating respectively the appetite or instinct for sexual pleasure in the narrow sense common to animals and human beings; an affective sympathy toward another human being based on qualities that are psychical and spiritual as well as physical; and a love that is a self-giving and committal to the other. Thus lust, the violation of chastity in the high Christian context emphasized by St. Paul, violates charity, the soul of the Christian order (cf. J. Fuchs, De Castitate, 21–22).

Violation of the Sexual Order. Lust as a disordered enjoyment of sexual pleasure generally involves a violation of the sexual order. That it necessarily does so seems the fairly general assumption of moralists. They assume also that chastity is a virtue whose essential function is the protection of the sexual order, i.e., the direction of sex activity to its specific purpose.

Both assumptions have been questioned by J. Fuchs, who introduces alongside chastity another virtue whose scope is the preservation of the right order of sex, whereas chastity is concerned with controlling the appetite for the pleasures of sex. Sex activity is possible without the pleasurable experience normally accompanying it, and the right order of this activity can be preserved even when one enjoys or seeks its characteristic pleasure in a disordered way. He instances the case of a prostitute who plies her trade for monetary gain without any physical enjoyment, and that of a married man enjoying normal conjugal intimacy but with no motive except that of physical pleasure. Thus in one case there is a sin against the sex order without a sin of lust, and in the other a sin of lust without a sin against the sexual order (loc. cit. 17–18).

This view can claim a shadow of support in St. Thomas, especially in his Quaestiones disputatae de malo, where he distinguishes between inordinate concupiscence in the normal use of marriage and a disorder in the external act, as when there are sex relations outside marriage (De malo 15.1). However, in each case he speaks explicitly of a sin of lust. The disorder proper to such a sin is to be found primarily in the failure of the natural appetite for sex pleasure to be guided by man's reason. Reason is the norm truly constitutive of morality, not indeed the highest and transcendent one, which is the eternal law in the mind of God, but a true and proximate norm sharing as man does by his practical reason the directive power of God's mind and will, directing all created activity to its end (cf. Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 19.3). By accepting the objective order of finality whereby sex pleasure is integrated into sexual activity for the sake of this activity, reason as a norm of right action actively ordains both the pleasure and the activity to the purposes for which the latter exists. Thus the moral rightness that gives chastity its specific motive as a controlling and restraining influence on the appetite for sex pleasure is founded immediately on the exigencies of the human sexual order. The fundamental disorder the virtue holds at bay is that of separating sex pleasure from the order to which it belongs by right. This one does essentially as often as he seeks or accepts such pleasure in this disordered way, whether his concupiscence contains itself within the external framework imposed by the objective ordering of sex activity, as when a man performs the normal conjugal act exclusively for pleasure, or whether this disordered concupiscence motivates a disorder in the external act as such which, because performed outside marriage or in a solitary or some other unnatural way, is found deprived of its divine ordination to the generation and education of children (cf. De malo 15.1).

At first sight it may be difficult to see how the prostitute plying her trade without seeking or enjoying sex pleasure, which is entirely absent, commits a sin of lust in an isolated and technical sense. There is, however, the consideration that she formally cooperates in the lustful action of her partner; but more fundamentally there seems to be a sin of lust because an action and its proper pleasure are identically related to the moral order, seeing that such pleasure exists for the sake of the action and is included in its total concept (Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 2.6 ad 1). What regulates the pursuit of pleasure is the finality of the action. If, therefore, in a particular and exceptional case the pleasure is lacking, it does not follow that the same virtue does not come into play when the act is performed with a conscious submission to the right order inscribed in its very nature, or that this virtue is not positively violated when this right order is voluntarily disregarded. A woman who is unresponsive to sex stimuli can still have chaste motives for abstaining from sinful sexual actions, as the prostitute can act lustfully by admitting them. A further problem, i.e., the concrete virtue or vice acquired and developed by such actions in accord with or contrary to the norms of chastity, is here irrelevant.

On the other hand, it does not seem necessary or desirable to discard the ordinary definitions of chastity and lust and to place their essence primarily in a disposition to perform sexual acts only according to their purpose or to abuse them in contravention of that purpose, as do certain modern theologians (cf. Vangheluwe, "De temperantia stricte dicta eiusque partibus subiectivis," Coll. brug. 47 [1951] 38-48; Zalba, 1.1372). It is true, indeed, that the nature of the act regulates the morality of the pleasure, but the difficulty to be overcome in the use of sex activity comes precisely from the attractiveness of the pleasure that goes with it. Hence chastity facilitates the practice of a rightly ordered sex life and controls the appetite for sex pleasure. Lust primarily inclines this appetite to rebel against the order imposed by reason. Thus St. Thomas, and with him most moral theologians, teaches that lust consists primarily in the use of venereal pleasure other than according to right reason: "in hoc quod aliquis non secundum rectam rationem delectatione venerea utitur" (Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 153.1, 154).

Gravity of Sins of Lust. It is clear that all deliberately sought sex activity must be properly oriented, and that if it is not, the pursuit or acceptance of its pleasure is sinful

For centuries theologians have emphasized the essential ordination of sex and its use to the generation and education of children, and from this they deduce the unlawfulness of all deliberate sex activity outside marriage (ST 2a2ae, 154.2). This is confirmed by the magisterium of Pius XI (in the encyclical Casti connubii, Dec. 31, 1930; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 3705) and that of Pius XII [cf. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 43 (1951) 852].

Recently there has been much emphasis on the personal values of sex, and hence on sexual intercourse as expressing a mutual personal giving. From this some deduce the exclusive right of married partners to exercise it, since without an indissoluble bond between them, this mutual giving cannot be verified. Hence follows the unlawfulness of fornication, adultery, and all sex activity outside marriage as well as anything in marriage that contradicts or sets aside this mutual, complete giving (cf. Hildebrand, 35–42; Häring, 3:296–303). The magisterium of Pius XII recognized this personal aspect of the conjugal act according to the scriptural phrase that man and wife become "two in one flesh" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 43 (1951) 850].

These considerations as well as the strong condemnations of various sins of impurity in the NT make it clear that, in general, acts of lust are gravely sinful.

The common teaching of theologians can be summed up thus: outside marriage, every movement of lust as here defined or pleasure directly provoked or consented to is objectively a mortal sin; but venereal movements foreseen but not intended can be without sin, venially sinful, or mortally so, according to principles governing the permission of an evil effect.

Lustful Movements Directly Provoked or Consented To. Parvity of matter is not possible in the deliberate indulgence of sexual acts that defeat the generative purpose of the sex faculty, as in contraceptive or other unnatural practices; however, there may be slightness of matter when the acts indulged in retain their due ordination to this purpose, even though they might be, as we have seen from St. Thomas, acts of disordered concupiscence because they are sought only for pleasure. The necessary subordination of this pleasure to higher values is present at least implicitly in the ordinary moderate exercise of conjugal rights. On the other hand, a selfish desire for venereal pleasure can be the occasion of serious sins against justice or charity, as when conjugal relations are sought that are gravely injurious or strain the companionship of marriage.

Outside marriage the distinction between complete and incomplete acts is relevant, the former indicating a venereal movement brought to its term usually accompanied by pleasure amounting to a climax, the latter indicating movements or pleasure short of this completion.

The possibility that complete acts might be venially sinful is excluded because there is the full exercise of sex activity or the full enjoyment of its pleasure in a way that contradicts its specific, lifegiving purpose, intended by God Himself, the sole Author of human life. Solitary or other unnatural acts exclude the physical result of conception; moreover, so-called natural sins, such as fornication or adultery, contradict the purpose of sex in human beings, for those who exercise the full normal sex act are responsible for the proper care of any resulting offspring that is effectively guaranteed only by the marital bond (ST 2a2ae, 154.2.11). In both cases, there is introduced into the exercise of a faculty that is for the good of the whole human race a perversion by which it serves the pleasure or interest of an individual only. This subordination of the race to the individual is not a light matter.

In an incomplete act the perversion is still grave, and the best reason for this seems to be the one implied by St. Alphonsus and other classical moralists when they speak of it as the beginning of a complete act"quaedam inchoata pollutio, seu motus ad pollutionem" (1.3.416).

This is to be understood in the sense that an incomplete venereal act is of its nature the beginning of a complete act insofar as the actuation of the generative or sexual faculty is one complete, indivisible process. There can be light matter in other sins, such as theft, because a man who steals $1 does not by that fact commence a process whereby he steals $1,000. In sex activity one who performs an incomplete act necessarily begins the process of total actuation, even though he stops before it is complete. Consequently, the complete act is virtually present so that its grave malice is shared by the incomplete act (see authors such as Fuchs and Vangheluwe).

It is to be noted that the Church has condemned a proposition that states that a kiss indulged for the sake of carnal pleasure and that does not involve danger of further consent is only venially sinful (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2060); recent attempts to defend similar views have been officially censured by the Holy See.

Finally, the gravity of both complete and incomplete venereal acts outside marriage arises from the nature of the normal sex act as a personal intercommunion. But this argument may be inconclusive if it is proposed separately from the argument given above (cf. Fuchs, De castitate 38–44).

Lustful Movements Provoked or Willed Indirectly. In speaking of the absence of sin or the presence of light sin only in certain actions (or omissions) whose foreseen but unintended result are venereal movements, it is understood there is no consent or proximate danger of consent by the will to these pleasurable movements themselves. If there is a sufficient reason for performing such an act, the resultant movement is lawfully permitted, a sufficient reason being a motive whose reasonable necessity is such as to counterbalance the evil of a movement that can never be desired in itself. Thus a moderate cause is sufficient to justify the permission of an incomplete movement, for its incompleteness indicates that this cause is not apt to disturb one profoundly; but a grave cause is required if the movement is foreseen as most likely to be complete: thus necessary study for a medical student, the fulfillment of one's duty in looking after the sick. However, as a general rule, attention to the interest of the study itself or the conscientious fulfillment of one's duty tends to diminish the likelihood of gravely disturbing venereal movements.

Actions apt of their nature to arouse only incomplete movements and performed without reason are venially sinful. In individual cases this aptitude, combined with other factors, can form a total cause of complete movements, but in general one can regard things such as reading from mere curiosity matter that is not notably suggestive, or passing embraces that, although sensual, are not venereal in character, as venially sinful only.

Actions apt to arouse full movements, if performed without reason, are serious sins. Usually the mere absence of any sufficient reason tends to make certain acts provocative of full venereal movements. Thus what could be read without any sin by reason of necessary study could be seriously provocative if read from mere curiosity. Similarly, close and prolonged embraces between adult persons for sensual pleasure are apt to cause grave disturbances, which, if the parties are not husband and wife, are not truly expressive of lawful love. Thus they must be regarded as seriously sinful.

Imputability. It is a commonplace in moral theology that strong passion that a person has not himself deliberately aroused tends to diminish or even destroy freedom, and hence the moral imputability for actions in themselves seriously sinful.

This has an obvious application in the matter of lust because of the strong character of the sex urge together with temperamental, psychological, and even psychiatric factors that weaken the resistive power of individuals to unlawful sexual inclinations. It is especially relevant when, as so frequently happens, they are exposed to innumerable external influences concentrating attention on sexual enjoyment.

Modern theologians are inclined to take seriously the claims of contemporary depth psychology that in sexual aberrations one must extend, perhaps considerably, the boundaries of diminished responsibility and admit the possibility of even total lack of imputability. Thus to the extent that actions in themselves seriously sinful are performed not from full deliberation, or to the degree that a man is the victim of uncontrollable forces that impel him so that he is passive rather than active, these are not human actions but actions of a man-actiones hominis (cf. Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 1.1). While warning strongly against the tendency to generalize as if it were a universal assumption that sexual sins are never fully imputable, Pius XII accepted in several of his allocutions the practical possibility of diminished or totally absent imputability [radio talk, March 23, 1952, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 44 (1952) 275; allocution, April 9, 1953, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 45 (1953) 279]. Hence a confessor should not be hesitant to judge as free from mortal sin a penitent who falls into sin by solitary impure actions only after a struggle and because, as he asserts, he felt physically incapable of further resistance, when he is otherwise of good moral dispositions. Such a judgment can be made even when a penitent of prayerful habits protests that he knew at the time he was committing sin and felt he was sinning freely. However, each case must be taken on its merits.

Remedies. It is usual to list various remedies, natural and supernatural. To the first belong such things as bodily cleanliness, the taking of suitable exercise, cultivating interest in hobbies or study, as well as the avoiding of stimulants and of erotic reading and erotic experiences in general, and self-discipline in food and in the hours of sleep. To the natural order belongs also an intelligent understanding of the significance of sex, and hence of the natural virtue of chastity. It is not necessary to stress the need, imperative in many cases, of medical and psychiatric assistance for one who has difficulty controlling his sexual inclinations.

These means cannot ordinarily be fully effective unless they are supernaturalized; complete chastity is, in the state of fallen nature, practically impossible for the average person without the help of grace. Therefore, the means of grace must be stressed, that a life of prayer and frequentation of the Sacraments. Another remedy is the appreciation of the sublime significance of sex and marriage in the supernatural, Christian order, and hence the need for cultivation of the Christian virtue of chastity.

Because grace truly builds on nature and is not merely superimposed upon it, it is important that natural and supernatural remedies work together as one whole. For want of this integration, supernatural means are sometimes insufficiently effective. When prayer and the Sacraments are used as though they were automatic preservatives, these means of grace flow over the soul, so to speak, without the grace itself finding a point of entry ample enough to take possession of a man's life.

Chastity must be seen and accepted in its natural personal values, but in such a way that these values form at the same time a basis for the supernatural. In this way both the natural and supernatural virtues become integrating parts of one harmonious principle of human action, whereby sex and its pleasures are sought and accepted or generously renounced in accordance with one's vocation in the Mystical Body of Christ.

Bibliography: General treatises. J. ADLOFF, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:1339–56. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI, Theologia moralis, ed. L. GAUDÉ, 4 v. (new ed. Rome 1905–12) 1:655–707, clearly summarizes and applies to particular cases the classical teaching de sexto praecepto et nono. A. VER-MEERSCH, De castitate et de vitiis contrariis: Tractatus doctrinalis et moralis (2d ed. Rome 1921) 300–413. B. MERKELBACH, De castitate et luxuria, rev. G. DANTINNE (8th ed. Brussels 1956). L. WOUTERS, Tractatus dogmatico-moralis de virtute castitatis et de vitiis oppositis (rev. ed. Bruges 1932) 23–75. J. FUCHS, De castitate et ordine sexuali (Rome 1963) 99–108, with strong emphasis on the antipersonal and the antigenerative aspects of lust. Useful seminary manuals. M. ZALBA, Theologiae moralis compendium, 2 v. (Madrid 1958) 1:1372-1509. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology (New York 1958) 2:204–221. Scriptural references. H. LESÊTRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, (Paris 1895-1912) 4:436-437. A. VAN DEN BORN, Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, (New York 1963) 1056. B. ORCHARD et al., eds., Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture (London 1953), index. Personal aspects. D. VON HILDEBRAND, In Defense of Purity (New York 1931; repr. Baltimore, Md. 1962). B. HÄRING, Das Gesetz Christi, 3 v. (6th ed. Freiburg 1961). Notion of the sexual order. J. FUCHS, Die Sexualethik des heiligen Thomas von Aquin (Cologne 1949). Gravity of matter. J. FUCHS, De castitate, op. cit. 138-142. M. ZALBA, op. cit. 1382-83. V. VANGHELUWE, "De intrinseca et gravi malitia luxuriae imperfectae," Collationes brugenses 48 (1952) 36-44. J. J. LYNCH, "Notes on Moral, Theology," Theological Studies 21 (1960) 225-227. G. A. KELLY, "A Fundamental Notion in the Problem of Sex Morality," ibid. 1 (1940) 117-129. Imputability. J. C. FORD and G. A. KELLY, Contemporary Moral Theology (Westminster, Md. 1958-) 1:174-276. J. S. DUHA-MEL, "Moral and Psychological Aspects of Freedom," Thought 35 (1960) 179-203.

[A. REGAN]

LUTGARDIS, ST.

Cistercian mystic and stigmatic; b. Tongres, Belgium, 1182; d. Aywières (near Brussels), June 16, 1246. Lutgardis was born of bourgeois parents. She received the habit at the Benedictine convent of Saint-Trond in 1194, was professed about 1200, and was elected prioress there in 1205. Because of the relaxed observance of this community, she transferred to the Cistercian convent at Aywières in 1208. There, sustained only by bread and weak beer, she engaged in three seven-year fasts in reparation for the Albigensian heresy then at its height. In apparitions, Christ usually was represented as showing her his heart, and she was perhaps the first saint in whom the mystical "exchange of hearts" was effected. Her frequent communions antagonized the community. The Passion was the center of her religious life, and in her 29th year she received the spear wound; she carried the scar to her death. She often experienced the sweat of blood. From 1235 she was totally blind, and the ideal of vicarious suffering in reparation for sin was highly developed in her spirituality. She predicted the day of her death.

Feast: June 16.

Bibliography: T. MERTON, What Are These Wounds? (Milwaukee 1950). G. HENDRIX, Ontmoetingen met Lutgart van Tongeren: Benedictines en Cisterciënzerin 5 v. (Leuven 1996–98). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:557–558.

[J. VERBILLION]

Martin Luther. (New York Public Library Picture Collection)

LUTHER, MARTIN

German Reformer; b. Eisleben, village in Thuringia, Nov. 10, 1483; d. there, Feb. 18, 1546. His parents, Hans Luder and Margaret Ziegler, had recently emigrated from the farming community of Möhra, where the Luder family had lived for many generations. As was the practice of the time, the child was baptized the following day by the pastor, Bartholomew Rennebecher; and since it was the feast of St. Martin of Tours, he was named after the sainted Roman soldier.

Early Years. Within a year after his birth the family moved to Mansfield, where the father was employed as a laborer in the copper mines. Luther's father was a strict disciplinarian and in his early childhood the family was beset by poverty. There is little evidence to argue, as Erik Erikson once did, that the atmosphere of the household was abnormal. By the turn of the 16th century his father's financial situation had improved, and in 1511 he became owner in a number of mines and foundries in the area. He had been elected to the city council in 1491. Young Martin was enrolled in the local Latin day school in 1488 and there began the traditional study of Latin grammar. In 1496 he was sent to Magdeburg, where he remained until Easter of the following year at a school conducted by the BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE. The next semester he transferred to Eisenach because he had relatives there.

Student at Erfurt. In April 1501 Luther matriculated at the University of Erfurt and enrolled in the bursa of St. George. Two of his professors, Jodocus Trutvetter and Bartholomew Arnold von Usingen, were followers of the via moderna. Whether Luther was deeply influenced by NOMINALISM is still disputed. The picture drawn by Heinrich DENIFLE, OP, that portrays Luther as an ossified Ockhamite is no longer tenable. Although Luther, in his later life, remarked that he belonged to the school of William of Ockham, he did not, on other occasions, hesitate to refer to the nominalists as "hoggish theologians." Nor was Luther, as his Dominican biographer contends, a "crass ignoramus." He received his baccalaureate in 1502 and immediately began the required studies for a master's degree. In January 1505 he passed the examinations after the shortest period of study possible, standing second in his class. Although the young Luther had but a slight knowledge of Greek, he was well acquainted with the classical Latin authors. Ovid, Vergil, Plautus, and Horace were well known to him. He was also fairly well acquainted with humanism. The humanist Hieronymus EMSER had lectured at Erfurt during the summer of 1504; and Luther was familiar with the Eclogues of the Latin humanist Baptista Mantuanus. Grotius Rubeanus, a close friend of young Luther, was painfully shocked at his decision to enter the monastery.

The Call to Religion. In the summer of 1505 Luther, influenced no doubt by his father, began the study of law. Sometime in July of the same year, while returning to Erfurt from a visit to Mansfield, he encountered a severe thunderstorm near the village of Stotternheim; as a lightning bolt threw him to the ground, he vowed to St. Anne in a sudden panic that he would become a monk. To assume that the decision to enter the monastery was as impromptu as it is often depicted does Luther an injustice. His strict religious upbringing, his natural bent toward piety, and above all the experiences of the last few years at the university were unquestionably factors of his move. In 1503 he had severely wounded himself by accidentally cutting the artery in his thigh and had spent many weeks in meditative recuperation. In the same year one of his closest friends, a fellow student, had died suddenly. The plague that struck the city of Erfurt in 1505 made him keenly aware of the preeminence of death. All of this indicates that a call to religion was something that had been in his thoughts for a long period.

Nor is it without significance that he chose to enter the monastery of the Hermits of St. Augustine. The city of Erfurt boasted a Dominican, a Franciscan, and a Servite monastery in addition to the Black Cloister, a member of the Observant, or stricter Augustinian, congregation of Saxony, which was by far the most severe religious house in the city. On July 16, 1505, much to the chagrin of his parents, who were already selecting a bride for the student of law, Luther entered the novitiate. Soon after his profession, the exact date of which is not known, he was told to prepare himself for the reception of Holy Orders. He was ordained a deacon by the suffragan bishop, Johann von Laasphe of Erfurt, on Feb. 27, 1507; he received the priesthood in the Erfurt cathedral on the following April 4th.

Professor at Wittenberg. Soon after ordination, Luther was sent to WITTENBERG, where the order held two professorships at the Elector Frederick's newly founded university. Johann von STAUPITZ, vicar-general of the Saxon congregation of the Augustinians, held the chair of scriptural theology; Luther was given the chair of moral philosophy in the arts faculty. In addition to lecturing on the Nicomachean Ethics, Luther was also obliged to continue his theological studies. He received his baccalaureate in theology in the spring of 1509. The following autumn he returned again to Erfurt, where he continued with his study of the Sentences of Peter of Lombard and lectured on philosophy to the Augustinian students there. Luther's studies were interrupted in 1510, when he was chosen to accompany Staupitz to Rome. The vicargeneral had for years been identified with the reform group in the order who sought to unite both the observant, or stricter, group in the order with the more numerous conventuals. Luther probably spent a month in Rome, visiting its shrines and churches. He was not edified with the horde of unlettered clergy whom he encountered there, many of whom were unable to hear confessions. He later observed that the priests said Mass in such an irreverent fashion that it reminded him of a juggling act. Yet there is little evidence that the scandals of Rome had any bearing on the gradual religious transformation that was taking place in his mind.

After his return to Erfurt he was again sent to Wittenberg in the late summer of 1511. In October of 1512 he received the doctorate in theology and was assigned to the theological faculty succeeding Staupitz as professor of Scripture. The next five years were of vital importance in the development of Luther's theological ideas. During this period he lectured on the Psalms (1513–15), on the Epistle to the Romans (1515–16), the Epistle to the Galatians, and the Epistle to the Hebrews (1517–18). One gains some idea of the competence of the man in considering that in addition to following a monastic and academic schedule, he also preached at the castle church and held the office of Augustinian vicar of the district of Meissen and Thuringia.

Inner Conflict. If Luther had sought peace of mind in entering religion, he found it illusory. He gradually grew aware of the vast abyss between what he felt himself to be in his innermost self and the demands of God. He was increasingly conscious of the power of sin, and repeated confession brought him no peace. Further, the complacency that he felt at doing good seemed, as he said, "to poison his soul as the frost nips flowers in the bud." There were times when he felt on the brink of hell and the verge of despair. He tells us that while contemplating the righteousness of God in the monastery tower, probably in 1512, a new concept, a new illumination came to him, and "the gates of paradise were opened."

The study of the Epistle of Paul to the Romans had convinced him that the justice of God before which he trembled is not exacting, does not condemn, but is wholly beneficent. It is a justice that reinstates the sinner qua sinner in the eyes of God, in virtue of Christ's redemption. In explaining how this phenomenon is produced, Luther logically rejected the traditional teaching of the Church. For justification, no longer an objective transformation, is produced by the word of God, the Gospel. It is in, with, and through the Gospel that God works upon the soul through His Spirit. The soul remains passive and receptive. Thus Luther made an extremely personal experience the center of a new theory of salvation that was no longer in harmony with the one traditionally taught by the Church. These ideas were only gradually formed, but a study of the glosses and the notes kept by Luther's students during the years 1513 to 1518 leaves no doubt that they had formed the basis of his religious thought. They would probably have remained within the depths of his own inner spiritual struggle and never spread beyond the confines of the classroom where he lectured were it not for a series of events that brought the focus of all Christendom on the Wittenberg monk and changed the course of history.

The St. Peter's Indulgence. ALBRECHT OF BRAN-DENBURG, brother of the elector Joachim, at the age of 23 was elected archbishop of Magdeburg and was, at the same time, given the administration of the diocese of Halberstadt. Both his age and the accumulation of two bishoprics were in direct violation of Canon Law; nor was his personal life beyond reproach. The Holy See condoned the appointment and a year later the same pluralist was elected archbishop of Mainz, a position that automatically made him prince elector, Reich-chancellor, and primate of all Germany. The move was undeniably inspired by political aspirations since it gave the Hohenzollerns two votes in the electoral college. Yet the price was incredibly high. For the dispensation to hold benefices in three dioceses Albrecht had to pay the Curia a sum of 10,000 golden ducats. Another 14,000 was demanded to pay up the arrears in pallium taxes for the See of Mainz. An agreement was made with the Curia whereby, for allowing the Peter's Indulgence to be preached in his episcopal territories, the bishop would receive one half of the income and the other half would go toward the construction of St. Peter's.

As principal agent for this sordid simoniacal act, the Fuggers chose the well-known indulgence preacher Dominican Johann TETZEL. Of the indulgence agreement between the House of FUGGER, the Curia, and the archbishop of Mainz, Luther knew nothing. It was only when Tetzel began to preach the indulgence in the towns of Jüterbog and Zerbst on the northern boundary of Saxon territory that Luther felt it his duty to admonish his electoral highness, the archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg, regarding the difficulties Tetzel was causing. He wrote him on October 31, 1517: "Papal indulgences for the building of St. Peter's are hawked about under your illustrious sanction. I am not denouncing the sermons of the preachers who advertise them, for I have not seen them, but I regret that the faithful have conceived some erroneous notions about them. These unhappy souls believe that if they buy a letter of pardon they are sure of their salvation; also that souls fly out of purgatory as soon as money is cast into the chest, in short, that the grace conferred is so great that there is no sin whatever which cannot be absolved thereby, even if, as they say, taking an impossible example, a man should violate the mother of God. They also believe that indulgences free them from all guilt of sin."

The Ninety-five Theses. At the same time as Luther approached Tetzel with his criticisms he also wrote and circulated his attack upon indulgences, the so-called 95 theses, and announced his intention to hold a debate on their value. What had been for years a question in the mind of Luther, a matter of theology, now became a matter of reform. Most of the theses were not opposed to traditional Catholic doctrine.

Tetzel, who was in Berlin at the time the theses were published, was supported by the members of his order, and to confirm their confidence in his theological competence they later gave him an honorary degree in theology from their Roman college. Luther's own attitude toward his antagonist was anything but hostile. Later, when he heard that Tetzel was stricken with a fatal illness, he wrote him a consoling letter stating that the unfortunate affair was in no way the Dominican's responsibility. The roots of the controversy lay much deeper.

In early February 1518, Luther presented the bishop of Brandenburg with a series of Resolutiones on the theses, requesting that the bishop strike out whatever he found displeasing. He wrote, "I know that Christ does not need me. He will show His Church what is good for her without me. Nothing is so difficult to state as the true teaching of the Church, especially when one is a serious sinner as I am." He ended his letter of explanation by urging reform of the Church and pointing out that, as recent events proved, namely, the Lateran Council, the reform is the concern not of the pope alone or of the Cardinals but of the entire Christian world. The bishop answered Luther, informing him that he found no error in the Resolutiones and that in fact he thoroughly objected to the manner in which indulgences were being sold.

Denunciation from Rome. Rome had already been alerted to the dangers contained in Luther's novel doctrine by the archbishop of Mainz. In view of the recent negotiations between Albrecht and the Curia, it is understandable that his protest was interpreted in terms of declining revenues rather than threatened dogma. However, with the powerful Dominican Order now denouncing the Wittenberg professor, Rome had no alternative but to act. Following an established pattern, the Roman authorities, having failed to silence Luther through his own order, instigated a formal canonical process against him. The provincial of the Saxon province of the Dominicans, Herman Rab, induced the fiscal procurator, Marius de Perusco, to have the pope instigate charges against Luther. At the procurator's request, an auditor of the Curia, Girolamo Ghinucci, was entrusted with the preliminary investigation, and a Dominican, Sylvestro Prierias, Master of the Sacred Palace and censor librorum of Rome, was commissioned to draw up a theological opinion on Luther's doctrinal writings.

A thorough Thomist, Prierias handled Luther's writings as if he were conducting a scholastic disputation. His Dialogus was nothing more than a polemic tagging the various theses as erroneous, false, presumptuous, or heretical. A citation, which reached Luther on August 7, 1518, was drawn up demanding that he appear personally in Rome within 60 days to defend himself. The citation and the dialogue were dispatched to the general of the Dominican Order, Tommaso de Vio, commonly known as CAJETAN, probably the outstanding theologian of the century.

The Meeting with Cajetan. During the same month, the pope, now informed of Emperor Maximilian's willingness to prosecute Luther, instructed Cajetan, whom he had appointed as his legate to the Diet of Augsburg, to cite the accused to appear before him. An order of extradition was also sent to Frederick the Wise, Luther's territorial sovereign, and also to his provincial, Gerhard Hecker, who was commanded to arrest him. Upon receipt of the citation, Luther immediately moved to forestall his appearance before what he considered anything but an impartial tribunal. Supported by Frederick the Wise, he demanded that his case be tried in Germany and by a group of competent scholars. Frederick managed to obtain a promise from Cajetan of a fair hearing and pledged safe-conduct to the young monk. On October 12, Luther appeared before the Dominican cardinal and his entourage of Italian jurists. It was Cajetan's hope to obtain recantation by paternal exhortations, but Luther obstinately refused to make an act of revocation, maintaining that he would not do so as long as he was not convinced of his errors on a basis of scriptural proof. He flatly denied the validity of Pope Clement VI's decretal on indulgences, Unigenitus. When Luther suggested that the decretal be submitted to the opinion of a Council, Catejan accused him of being a Gersonist. (See GERSON, JEAN; CONCILIARISM, HISTORY OF.)

On October 16, Luther informed the cardinal of his willingness to stop commenting on indulgences and his readiness to listen to the Church. He apologized for his violent outbursts against the pope. Yet there was not a word of recantation. To his brethren at Wittenberg he wrote: "The Cardinal may be an able Thomist, but he is not a clear Christian thinker, and so he is about as fit to deal with this matter as an ass is to play the harp." Cajetan, thwarted in his attempt to reconcile Luther, demanded that the Elector Frederick extradite Luther and send him to Rome for trial. On November 28, Luther appealed to a general council. The appeal was actually a legal device intended to stay the civil effects of the excommunication that was now imminent.

Rome and the Impending Imperial Election. The delay of the excommunication of Luther was not a result so much of this legal maneuver as it was of a developing political situation that involved the papacy once again in the affairs of Germany. The Emperor Maximilian had since 1513 been planning the election of his grandson, Charles, Duke of Burgundy and King of Castile and Aragon, as Holy roman emperor. The election of Charles would have constituted a threat to the territorial independence of the pope because of the latter's sovereignty over Naples. Hence the Curia, favoring an election of either Francis I of France or, preferably, Frederick, Luther's sovereign, made efforts to delay any move that would antagonize the elector. To win the support of Frederick, Karl von MILTITZ, a swaggering, alcoholic Saxon, holding the office of papal notary in the Rome court, was sent to the elector with a plan to have Luther tried in a German ecclesiastical court, preferably in Trier. In addition he was to present the elector with the Golden Rose, as well as a letter of legitimization for Frederick's two children. None of the supporters of Luther were, however, deceived by the boastful Saxon. In fact, his presence in Germany supported their conviction that politics, not theology, was behind Rome's denunciation of Luther.

Leo X's Bull of Excommunication. A bull of excommunication, Exsurge Domine, was issued in Rome on June 15, 1520, and Johann ECK, Luther's opponent in his debates with KARLSTADT at Leipzig in July 1519, was commissioned to promulgate it throughout the empire. In September he published the bull in the diocese of Brandenburg and in the diocese of Saxony. Before the 60-day time limit, within which he had to submit, Luther again appealed to a general council. The appeal did not delay, however, the final bull of excommunication, Decet Romanum Pontificem, which pronounced sentence on Luther on January 3, 1521. In April of that year he appeared before the Diet in Worms; and although protected by a writ of safe-conduct, he was declared henceforth a criminal in the Empire.

It is one of the strange turns of history that Luther was never officially prosecuted in his own country, although excommunication, by labeling him a heretic, made him liable to the death penalty in the Empire. A number of circumstances combined to render the ecclesiastical and civil penalties ineffective. In the first place there was strong public reaction that rebelled at the prospect of condemning a man who had become the outright spokesman for their own grievances against corruption in the Church. The conviction that until a council had actually pronounced against him, he and his followers were not definitely cut off from the Catholic Church was widespread. Finally, the majority of the German bishops, still influenced by conciliarism, were hardly inclined to stand in the way of a man whose attacks on papal claims to ecclesiastical supremacy expressed their own opposition to Romanism.

Almost everywhere the publication of the bull met with strong opposition. In Luther's home diocese of Brandenburg, the local ordinary, Hieronymus Schulz, did not dare to publish it. The University of Wittenberg brushed it aside as a further example of Eck's skullduggery. There, on Dec. 10, 1520, before an assembly of students, Luther had consigned the bull to the flames together with a copy of Canon Law. In Erfurt the document was cast into the river, and in Leipzig a riot of the students at the University forced the executor to flee the city.

Writings of 1520. During the summer and fall of 1520, Luther wrote what many consider, after the translation of the Bible, to be the most important of his works. In a series of pamphlets, An Appeal to the Nobility of the German Nation, On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church, and the Liberty of a Christian Man, he outlined what he felt would be a program for reforming and revitalizing the Church. The first edition (some 4,000 copies) of the Appeal to the Nobility was sold out between August 18 and 23. In this work he pointed out the three walls the Romanists have built about themselves that constitute the main obstacles to true reform and are responsible for the decline of Christianity: the claim that civil government has no rights over them, the superiority of papal decrees over Scripture, and, finally, the superiority of the pope over a council.

In early October Luther penned his second famous work, On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church. While the first had been an attack on the century-old abuses of the Church and contained little that was novel, this next work openly struck a blow at the sacramental system and the Sacrifice of the Mass. Written in Latin, it was intended for theologians and scholars and opened the eyes of many, for the first time, to the radical elements in his new doctrines. Erasmus declared that it precluded all possibility of peace with the papacy. The third great work of this period, On Christian Liberty, continued to strike out at the roots of papal Christianity by emphasizing the primacy of Scripture, the priesthood of the laity, and the doctrine of justification by faith alone. In emphasizing Christian liberty, Luther stresses the freedom expressed in obedience to God and service to one's neighbor. He traces the religious implications of justification by faith and impugns the idea that good works are the mechanical performance of ecclesiastical laws. Rather, they are the fruit of faith from which they flow. Although these three writings in a certain sense epitomize the salient features of the early Lutheran movement, it would be unjust to say that they are the very heart and soul of Luther's doctrine. Neither would it be correct to assert that Luther or his followers felt that they had in any way separated themselves from the Catholic Church by condemning the abuses within it. But the three treatises of 1520, widely circulated in the next decade, did win large numbers of converts for the evangelical movement.

Progress of the Lutheran Reform. While returning from Worms Luther was kidnapped by the agents of Frederick the Wise and placed in hiding at Wartburg, where he continued to pour forth his scriptural and reformatory writings. The years between 1521 and 1525 were the most decisive period in the growth of Lutheranism. Since neither the bull of excommunication nor the Edict of Worms were actually put into effect in the empire, the reform movement continued to flourish. A number of events, however, caused a loss in its original momentum. As a popular uprising it was thwarted by the very forces that Luther had originally hoped to liberate. For several generations the peasants in the south and west of Germany had threatened local governments with grievances arising out of the economic and sociological changes of this transitional period. The doctrines of Luther, particularly his teaching on Christian liberty, were quickly transformed into demands for social reform. Eventually, peasant uprisings broke out in the Black Forest region in June 1524 and spread throughout Swabia, Franconia, Thuringia, and parts of the Rhineland. Luther firmly opposed the revolt, asserting that rebellion would stir up more ills than it would cure. The subsequent failure of the revolt and the urging of Luther that the civil authorities step in to stop the political anarchy that was threatening large areas of the Empire gave a definite impetus to the formation of territorial or state churches. See PEASANTS' WAR (1524–25).

In the fall of 1526 PHILIP OF HESSE summoned a synod in Homberg. There, under the direction of former Franciscan Franz Lambert of Avignon, a new church ordinance was imposed on the territory of Hesse. Monasteries and other ecclesiastical properties were confiscated, Catholic pastors were removed, and the Lutheran adaptation of the Mass was introduced. The following year in Saxony a commission of lawyers and theologians, after a series of visitations to the parishes in the area, published regulations governing divine service and the establishment of schools to instruct the faithful in the new gospel teaching.

To implement the new state church regulations Luther wrote his Large Catechism—a manual of instruction for pastors—and his Small Catechism—both a devotional work and an instruction for the faithful in the fundamentals of the Christian religion.

A loss of humanist support inflicted on the cause of Lutheranism a blow even more severe than that incurred with the disaffection of the peasants. Luther's De Servo Arbitrio, an attack upon free will, heightened the difference between his own position and that of his earlier humanist sympathizers. In denying freedom of the will it must not be assumed that Luther intended to deny individual responsibility. Throughout his life, beginning with the theses, his appeal to the Church had been one of repentance. A denial of responsibility would have completely nullified this call.

The Confessio Augustana. The break with humanism and the growing interference of German political leaders turned the attention of the reformer to the more practical implementations of his design. The controversy on the Eucharist that arose at the same time that Luther wrote his De Servo Arbitrio made it obvious that some strong clarification of doctrinal position was necessary if the movement was not to dissolve into warring parties. Doctrinal divisions within the reform movement accentuated by the Eucharistic controversy at Marburg in 1529 had their counterpart in the political sphere. Between 1524 and 1529 the political leadership of the Lutheran movement gradually passed from the Saxon electors to the Landgrave Philip of Hesse. At the Diet of Speyer (1526) it was already apparent that a division between the Catholic and the Lutheran princes within the empire was taking shape. In 1530 at Augsburg, Luther's closest associate at Wittenberg, Melanchthon, who had already attempted to systematize Luther's teachings in his Loci communes in 1521, drew up the Confessio Augustana, the final embodiment of the basic Lutheran, or reformed, doctrine. An examination of the document gives some insight into the perplexities of the religious situation as it stood after almost 12 years of religious controversy. It also demonstrated the ambivalence that invested the expression "reform" long after the Edict of Worms. Melanchthon maintained the conviction that he had not departed from the teaching of the Catholic Church in a single dogma, and Elector John of Saxony strongly rejected the accusation that the signers of the Confession had separated themselves from the Church. The Confession addressed to the emperor laid down the fundamental points of the new doctrine and repudiated all rival doctrines.

After the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, which Luther was not permitted to attend (being refused safe-conduct by the emperor), he tended to remain more and more aloof from the political developments that continued to detract from the religious aspect of the reform movement. The Augustinian monastery in Wittenberg had become secularized and was finally deeded to Luther in 1532. With few interruptions Luther continued to teach at the university until his death.

Luther's Marriage and Later Years. In 1525 Luther married Katherina von Bora, some 16 years his junior. She came from the town of Lippendorf, near Leipzig, and at the age of five she had been sent to the Benedictine nuns near Brehana. Four years later she transferred to a Cistercian cloister near Grimma, where her aunt was abbess and an older sister, a nun. She took her vows here in 1515 but during the generally troubled times in 1523 joined in the exodus from her convent. Wittenberg had become a refuge for hundreds of monks and nuns who left their monasteries during these years, and it was there that she met Luther. Their marriage caused a great stir in Europe. ERASMUS, in correspondence with Luther at that time on the Diatribe, attributed the failure of Luther to answer his letters to his marriage, He wittily remarked that in comedies troubles are wont to end in marriage with peace to all. He added that he felt the marriage was timely as he heard that a child was born ten days afterward. It was his hope that Luther would be milder in his attacks on the Church since even the fiercest beasts can be tamed by their female mates. Later on he apologized for his inference about the child, remarking that he had always been skeptical about the old legend that the antichrist would be born of a monk and a nun. Were this true, there would have been too many antichrists in the world already. The Luther household became a gathering place for needy priests, poor relatives, and indigent students. In addition to his own six children, four of whom survived their parents, Luther brought up eleven orphaned children. Luther's almost reckless hospitality and generosity to friends necessitated income greater than his professor's salary provided. He constantly refused the honorarium demanded of students in the German universities and turned down frequent offers for the sale of his manuscripts.

During these years Luther continued his commentaries on the New Testament and revised many of his earlier writings. During his lifetime he published more than 400 works, which fill more than 100 volumes. With the possible exception of Goethe, no single writer influenced the development of German literature as did Luther.

Luther's support of Philip of Hesse in the celebrated case of bigamy did little to enhance the reformer's cause. He had approved the marriage on March 4, 1540, of the duke to Margaret von der Saal, even though Philip was married to Christina, daughter of Duke George of Saxony. Luther's recommendations to Philip of Hesse were virtually the same as those he had made to Henry VIII of England: he should take a mistress rather than divorce. They were also consonant with the arguments he had made about marriage as early as The Babylonian Captivity of the Church in 1520. There he had argued that divorce and annulment were contrary to divine law, but that the problems of a barren marriage might be resolved in the manner of the Old Testament Patriarchs, that is, through the employment of a concubine. In so arguing he was not entirely at variance with many contemporary Catholic theologians, including Cajetan. The convocation of the Council of Trent gave him little hope that any reconciliation between Protestants and Catholics would result. In one of his final works against the papacy he refers to the Council as a juggling contest. Luther died of a stroke on the morning of Feb. 16, 1546, at Eisleben, where he had been attempting to arbitrate a disagreement between the courts of Mansfield.

Evaluation. It is an exaggeration to identify the Reformation solely with the person of Luther and to equate all of Protestantism with his doctrines. Nevertheless, one must admit the enormous influence that he exercised upon the movement. The survival of Luther's own brand of evangelicalism was greatly aided by the rise of numerous reformers elsewhere in Northern Europe, that is, by the rise of figures like Zwingli, Bucer, Calvin, and a host of others. Lutheranism's success as a protest against the Church's dominant teachings concerning salvation, and its later growth as a church independent of Rome, is also in part attributable to Luther's long and productive life.

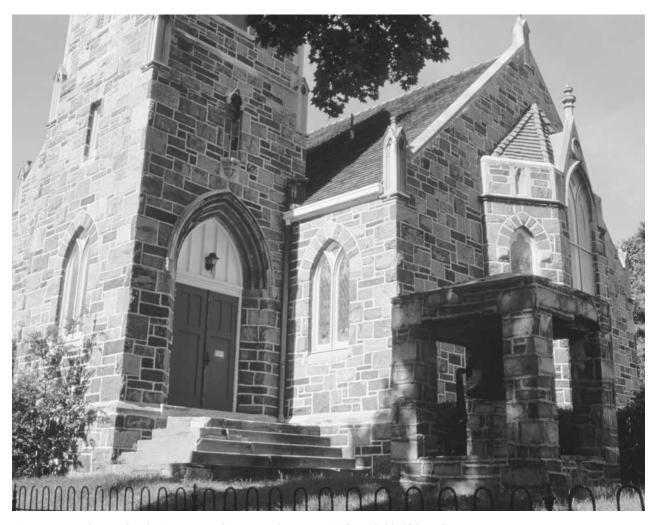

He continued to exert his stamp upon the evangelical cause for a quarter century after the movements birth. And upon his death in 1546, he had trained large numbers of pastors and theologian who were prepared to carry on his legacy.

Bibliography: His writings are found in several large collections. Wittenberg ed., 19 v. (12 v. in German, 7 v. in Latin; 1539-59); J. G. WALCH ed., 24 v. (Halle 1740-53); Erlangen ed., 105 v. (67 v. in German, 38 v. in Latin; 1826-86); Weimar ed. by J. K. F. KNAAKE et al. (1883-); Luthers Werke in Auswahl, ed. O. CLEMEN et al. (5th ed. Berlin 1959-); an Engish ed. by J. PELIKAN and H. P. LEHMANN (St. Louis-Philadelphia 1955-). Career of the Reformer, v.31, ed. H. J. GRIMM, v.32, ed. G. FORELL, arranges his writings about his life in chronological order. K. ALAND et al., Hilfsbuch zum Lutherstudium (Gütersloh 1957), an analytical listing of all Luther's writings. Literature. K. SCOTTENLOHER, Bibliographie zur deutschen Geschichte im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung, 1517-85, 6 v. (Leipzig 1933-40) 1:458-629. H. JEDIN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65); suppl., Das ZweiteVatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 6:1223-30, bibliog. H. BORNKAMM and H. VOLZ, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 480-495, 520-523, bibliog. J. PACQUIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 9.1:1146-1335, bibliog. G. RITTER, Luther, Gestalt und Tat (Munich 1959). K. A. MEISSINGER, Der katholische Luther (Munich 1952). E.G. RUPP, The Righteousness of God: Luther Studies (New York 1954). H. BÖHMER, Road to Reformation, tr. J. W. DOBERSTEIN and T. G. TAPPERT (Philadelphia 1946). H. S. DENIFLE, Luther und Luthertum, 2 v. (Mainz 1904-09), Eng. Luther and Lutherdom, tr. R. VOLZ (Somerset, Ohio 1917-), a polemical, unsympathetic view. H. GRISAR, Martin Luther: His Life and Work, ed. F. J. EBLE and A. PREUSS (2d ed. St. Louis 1935; repr. Westminster, MD 1950), a psychological study. P. J. REITER, Martin Luthers Umwelt, Charakter und Psychose, 2 v. (Copenhagen 1937-41). R. H. FIFE, The Revolt of Martin Luther (New York 1957). E. H. ERIKSON, Young Man Luther: A Study in Psychoanalysis and History (New York 1959). E. W. ZEEDEN, Martin Luther und die Reformation im Urteil des deutschen Luthertums, 2 v. (Freiburg 1950-52) v.1 tr. R. M. BETHELL, The Legacy of Luther (Westminster, Md. 1954). A. HERTE, Das katholische Lutherbild im Bann der Lutherkommentare des Cochläus, 3 v. (Münster 1943). J. LORTZ, Die Reformation in Deutschland, 2 v. (Freiburg 1949). R. BAINTON, Here I Stand: A Life of Martin Luther (New York 1950). J. M. TODD, Martin Luther (London 1964). J. P. DOLAN, History of the Reformation (New York 1965). M. BRECHT, Martin Luther, J. L. SCHAAF, trans. (Philadelphia 1985). G. EBELING, Luther, R. A. WILSON, trans. (London 1970). H. A. OBERMAN, Luther, E. WALLISER-SCHWARZBART, Trans. (New Haven 1989). D. STEINMETZ, Luther and Staupitz (Durham, NC 1980). D. STEINMETZ, Luther in Context (Bloomington, IN 1986).

[J. P. DOLAN/EDS.]

LUTHERAN CHURCHES IN NORTH AMERICA

A century after the beginning of the Protestant REF-ORMATION the first Lutherans migrated from Europe to North America. During the 17th century there were relatively few of them in the New World, but in the next century their numbers increased and they came to be scattered along the entire Atlantic seaboard. In the course of the 19th century and down to the beginning of World War I, large waves of immigration carried even more Lutherans to North America, and many of them settled in the Middle West and then the Far West. As a consequence, Lutheran churches were in time established in all states of the United States and most provinces of Canada.

Georgetown Lutheran Church, Georgetown district, Washington D.C. (©Lee Snider/CORBIS)

Just as the appearance and the numerical strength of Lutherans in North America can be accounted for largely by colonization and immigration, so the structures of church life that developed can be understood only against the background of the successive waves of immigration from a variety of European countries. More than any other Protestant family of churches, Lutherans in North America were distinguished by great diversity of national origins. The language and culture of each national group were perpetuated for several generations, and not until the process of acculturation enabled all to adopt the same tongue and similar patterns of life was it possible to express in unity of ecclesiastical organization the remarkable unanimity that had all along existed in faith and doctrine.

Colonial Beginnings, 1619–1775. Apart from a short-lived settlement of Danes on Hudson Bay (1619), the earliest Lutheran colonists were in New Netherland, on the Hudson River (1623), and in New Sweden, on the Delaware River (1638). In the former there were Norwegian and German as well as Dutch Lutherans, but all accommodated themselves to the Dutch language and Dutch models of congregational organization and worship, although ministers were sent to them from Hamburg as well as Amsterdam. In New Sweden, on the other hand, the colonists were Swedish and Finnish, their ministers were sent to them from Sweden, and the whole complexion of church life was colored by the traditions of the Church of Sweden. After both colonies had been lost to England (1664) and in time became predominantly English in character, the descendants of the early colonists gradually became Anglicized and demanded church services in their adopted tongue. This in miniature is what happened again and again among Lutherans in North America.

More Lutherans made their way to America in the 18th century, and the vast majority were German speaking. Entering the New World through the ports of Halifax, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, and Savannah, they soon moved inland along water courses and in time established settlements as far west as the Appalachian mountain range. Some colonists, such as the Palatines in New York and the Salzburgers in Georgia, were accompanied by clergymen; but for the most part laymen conducted public worship until clergymen were sent to them. Most ministers came from Halle, in Saxony, the center of German PIETISM, and helped give colonial Lutheranism a pietistic stamp. The recognized leader was Henry Melchior MUHLENBERG, who journeyed often from his home in southeastern Pennsylvania to instill hope and introduce order among his scattered fellow Lutherans. He was a personal link between the descendants of the older Dutch- and Swedish-speaking Lutherans and the newer German-speaking colonists. He made provision for a better supply of ministers and for a form of congregational organization adapted to American conditions. He also helped create the Lutheran Ministerium of North America (1748), intended to unite all the ministers, and through them the congregations, in fellowship and common action. Between 1700 and 1775 the enrolled membership of Lutheran churches increased from an estimated 3,000 to about 40,000, although there were many more nominal Lutherans.

Uncertainty and Compromise, 1775–1855. From the beginning of the American Revolution to about 1830 Lutheran immigration was at a virtual standstill. Contacts with the Old World and its Lutherans became more and more attenuated. Descendants of the German colonists, especially in the larger towns and wherever they were in a minority, adopted English speech by the third generation. As a consequence German services began to be replaced by English services in many churches. The adoption of English often was accompanied by an imitation of practices current in other Protestant churches—a change that was in a measure prepared for by the earlier pietism.

Although there was little new immigration, there was migration westward and northward to new frontiers. Such geographical expansion was accompanied by the reduction of the original ministerium to eastern Pennsylvania and the organization of additional district synods: New

William H. Cardinal Keeler nailing "Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification" on the doors of Christ Lutheran Church in Baltimore. (AP/Wide World Photos)

York (1786), North Carolina (1803), Ohio (1818), Maryland-Virginia (1820), Tennessee (1820), South Carolina (1824), West Pennsylvania (1825), Pittsburgh (1845), Illinois (1851), and Iowa (1855). In order to prevent such a proliferation of synods from destroying Lutheran unity, the General Synod was formed in 1821 as a union of synods. For the training of ministers it established a theological seminary (1826) in Pennsylvania and sent missionaries to fields at home and abroad. Samuel Simon SCHMUCKER was the outstanding leader of this period in educational and missionary projects. Other theological seminaries were founded in New York (1815), Ohio (1830 and 1845), and South Carolina (1830), in addition to a half-dozen colleges. Among other less enduring periodicals a weekly church paper, the Lutheran Observer, was launched in 1831, and another, the Lutheran Standard, in 1843. Enrolled Lutheran membership rose from about 40,000 in 1775 to approximately 225,000 in 1855.

Confessional Revival, 1855–1914. With the resumption of immigration about 1830, the way was prepared for a new epoch. The tide of immigrants crossing the Atlantic between 1830 and 1914 changed the social and religious complexion of North America in many ways. In addition to the unprecedented influx of Roman Catholics, probably four million people of at least nominal Lutheran background made their way to the New World from Germany, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. Toward the end of the period smaller numbers of Icelandic, Finnish, Slovak, and Hungarian Lutherans joined the movement. Although the descendants of Lutherans who had come to America before the Revolution had been developing more effective ecclesiastical organizations and had been erecting educational and other institutions, they were ill prepared for the avalanche of new immigrants. The Americanization in doctrine and practice as well as in language had progressed so far that the newcomers appeared to be not only cultural foreigners but also ecclesiastical strangers.

The consequence was that (apart from the many who were not reached by the church at all) the new immigrants usually established church organizations of their own, especially in the Middle West, where they settled in largest concentrations. The Missouri Synod was formed in 1847 by Lutherans from Germany, under the leadership of Carl Ferdinand William WALTHER. Some withdrew from this synod and founded the German Iowa Synod in 1854, when Walther was charged with undue rigidity in questions of ecclesiastical polity. The Joint Synod of Ohio, which had before been associated with Missouri, also broke away in 1881 after disagreement about the doctrine of predestination, and before this, in 1850, the Wisconsin Synod came into being. Although these four German synods carried state names in their titles, they quickly expanded far beyond the frontiers of the states in which they were organized. Meanwhile several synods were formed by immigrants from Norway; one reflected the opposition of its leader to anything that suggested the state church in his homeland, and another represented greater sympathy with the traditions of the Church of Norway. In 1860 the Augustana Synod was organized by Swedish immigrants under the guidance of Lars P. ESBJÖRN; this body at first included some Norwegians, but it soon became exclusively Swedish. Danish immigrants inherited two divergent tendencies from their homeland and formed separate bodies in America in 1872 and 1896. In 1890 the Suomi Synod was organized among Finnish immigrants, but in this case, too, there were dissidents who established independent bodies. In addition, two Slovak synods and an Icelandic synod were formed.

Two things characterized this proliferation of independent synods. One was the establishment of congregations and then of synods along national lines. This was almost inevitable if the immigrants were to be ministered to in their own languages and in accordance with the practices to which they had been accustomed. A second was a tendency toward separation even within national groups. The absence of ecclesiastical supervision from Europe and the spirit of free enterprise in America contributed to such division. The fact of the matter is that more of the immigrants would have been lost to the church than was the case if laymen and ministers had not taken initiative and assumed authority to act.

Further division occurred during the Civil War, when Lutheran synods in the South withdrew from the predominantly northern General Synod and in 1863 formed what later came to be called the United Synod in the South. After the Civil War, in 1867, some other synods withdrew from the General Synod and united with several independent synods (notably the Swedish Augustana Synod) to form the General Council in protest against what was regarded as an extreme accommodation in the former general body to American REVIVALISM and puritanism. Another, and looser, federation of synods came into being in 1872, when the Missouri Synod joined with what was to be called the Joint Synod of Wisconsin, a small Norwegian group, and for a time the Joint Synod of Ohio to form the Synodical Conference. These four general bodies of Lutherans-General Synod, United Synod in the South, General Council, and Synodical Conference-continued to exist to the time of World War I. Although many large synods remained outside and independent of them, these general bodies were testimonies, however muted, to a longing for Lutheran unity.

In spite of organizational fragmentation, such unity was actually in the making, although it usually remained concealed under linguistic and other differences that occasionally exploded in controversy. The second half of the 19th century was marked by a recovery, on the part of virtually all Lutherans, of the theology of 17th century orthodoxism and by a reintroduction of the forms of worship of that and the preceding century. The CONFESSIONS OF FAITH included in the Book of CONCORD (1580), especially the AUGSBURG CONFESSION and Luther's Small Catechism, were not only appealed to but diligently studied, and this strengthened the inner bonds of unity. Such confessionalism was combined with pietism, which marked most of the Lutheran immigrants of the 19th century as well as those of the 18th. This combination produced zealous activity in domestic missions, which reached to the Pacific coast, and in foreign missions. In these same years baptized membership increased from about 225,000 to about three million.

Growing Unity and Enterprise in the 20th Century. The unity that was a hope before World War I became more and more of a reality after 1914. By this time the second and third generations of 19th-century immigrants were adopting the English tongue, and the war itself gave a tremendous impetus to the abandonment of languages other than English. The linguistic barriers that had separated English-speaking from German-speaking Luther-Norwegian-speaking from Finnish-speaking ans, Lutherans, etc., now broke down. In 1917 all Lutherans were able to join hands in preparation for and the celebration of the 400th anniversary of the Reformation. This commemoration of Martin Luther's posting of the 95 Theses made Lutherans more aware of their common heritage. When the United States became a participant in World War I, most Lutheran bodies joined in the creation of the National Lutheran Commission for Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare, and in 1918 this agency was enlarged in its scope and transformed into the National Lutheran Council. The Missouri Synod and a smaller synod that were not originally associated in the National Lutheran Council joined their fellow Lutherans in 1967 in a reorganization of the agency, named the Lutheran Council in the U.S.A. This unity, however, lasted for only two years, when in 1969 the Missouri Synod broke away to go on its own.

While these things were happening, a series of mergers reduced the number of Lutheran church bodies from 25 to 3. In 1917 three bodies of Norwegian provenance united to form the Norwegian Lutheran Church, soon called the Evangelical Lutheran Church. The following year the General Synod, General Council, and United Synod in the South merged to establish the United Lutheran Church and were shortly joined by small Icelandic and Slovak synods. In 1930 the Joint Synod of Ohio, the Iowa Synod, and the Buffalo Synod-all of German extraction and predominantly Middle Western—united to form the American Lutheran Church. In 1960 the two bodies that had just come into being through mergers in 1917 and 1930 entered a new union together with smaller synods of Norwegian and Danish origin to comprise the American Lutheran Church. In 1962 the United Lutheran Church merged with the Augustana (of Swedish origin), the Suomi (of Finnish), and the American Evangelical Lutheran (Danish) Churches to form the Lutheran Church in America. In this way, more than 90 percent of the Lutherans in North America in the 1960s and 1970s came to be organized in three churches: the Lutheran Church in America (LCA), the American Lutheran Church (ALC), and the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod. What was especially significant is that these mergers brought together Lutherans of diverse national origins and ended the previous tendency toward isolation of different language groups.

Hopes for Lutheran unity, however, received a setback when at the 1969 convention of the Missouri Synod the newly organized conservative wing succeeded in electing J. A. O. Preus to the presidency. His election meant an opposition to ecumenism except through confessional agreement. In spite of Preus's opposition the agreement on pulpit and altar fellowship with the ALC was passed. Nevertheless, Preus took his election as a mandate for restructuring the Missouri Synod along conservative lines. This attempt led to a major floor fight at the 1971 convention over how strictly binding were synod doctrinal statements. Preus also saw the agreement of both ALC and LCA on the ordination of women as reopening the whole fellowship question. While the Missouri Synod did not rescind its agreement of fellowship with the ALC, the resulting turmoil pushed the ALC closer to the LCA position on Lutheran unity, i.e., the Lutheran confessions are sufficient basis for unity and extraconfessional agreements are not necessary. As the Missouri Synod's doctrinal position hardened, several churches broke away from the Missouri Synod in 1976 to form the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches (AELC).

The gradual rapprochement between the LCA and the ALC sowed the seeds for further developments in Lutheran unity in the early 1980s. On January 1, 1988, three Lutheran churches—the LCA, the ALC, and the AELC—merged to form the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA (ELCA). The ELCA plays an active role in the Lutheran World Federation, the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A., and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In 1997 the ELCA entered into full communion with the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), the United Church of Christ, and the Reformed Church in America. This was followed in 1999 by full communion relations with the Moravian Church in America and the Episcopal Church, U.S.A.

Bibliography: A. R. WENTZ, A Basic History of Lutheranism in America (Philadelphia 1955). F. W. MEUSER, The Formation of the American Lutheran Church (Columbus, Ohio 1958). E. C. NELSON and E. L. FEVOLD The Lutheran Church among Norwegian-Americans, 2 v. (Minneapolis 1960). W. O. FORSTER, Zion on the Mississippi (St. Louis 1953). G. E. ARDEN, Augustana Heritage (Rock Island, Ill. 1963). P. C. NYHOLM, The Americanization of the Danish Lutheran Churches in America (Minneapolis 1963). E. SCHLINK, The Theology of the Lutheran Confessions, tr. P. F. KOEHNEKE and H. J. A. BOUMAN (Philadelphia 1961). L. D. REED, The Lutheran Liturgy (Philadelphia 1960). C. J. I. BERGENDOFF, The Doctrine of the Church in American Lutheranism (Philadelphia 1956). F. S. MEAD, S. S. HILL, and C. D. ATWOOD, eds., Handbook of Denominations in the United States (Nashville 2001).

[T. G. TAPPERT/J. K. LUOMA/EDS.]

LUTHERANISM

The term, Lutheranism, can mean either the churches that emerge from the reform movement that Martin Luther founded, or the theological doctrines that these churches profess and from which their life and particular forms of piety take their origin. This article will (1)

Luther's grave inside Schlosskirche, the Castle Church, where he posted his 95 Theses. Wittenberg, Germany. (©Dave Bartruff/CORBIS)

sketch historically the profile of Lutheran church life, including theological development, to the present time; and (2) summarize the fundamental doctrines of Lutheranism as derived from documents recognized as normative by the Lutheran churches themselves.

For information on Lutheran churches in North America, see LUTHERAN CHURCHES IN NORTH AMERICA; EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA.

History of Lutheran Institutions and Church Life

Lutheranism came into being in Europe between 1520 and 1570. At the end of this period two-thirds of the people living in what today is modern Germany called themselves Lutherans, and the movement had taken root in several other countries on the Continent.

Germany. The conquest of Germany for Lutheranism was guaranteed by the Peace of AUGSBURG (1555) after much political and religious strife. The various princes were empowered to establish either the Catholic or Lutheran religion within their respective realms. Under the stress of rapid change, Martin Luther and his supporters formed a church polity that made it easy for Lutheran princes to set up state churches where Lutheranism was preached and they themselves remained in control of affairs.

Scandinavia. Outside Germany the most radical and successful dominion of Lutheranism came about in Scandinavia. In Denmark the movement was first supported by Frederick of Holstein (1523-33), who allowed the preaching of Lutheranism in 1527. Two years later it became by royal decree the sole religion of the land; Catholic doctrine and worship were banned. Christian III (1533-59), his successor, seized Church properties and replaced the seven bishops of his state with "superintendents," becoming himself the summus episcopus. A church disciplinary code was constructed by Johann BU-GENHAGEN in 1537 and promulgated by force throughout the state, which included Norway and Iceland. In Sweden the transformation of the state into a Lutheran religious body was accomplished through the cooperation of a preacher, Olaus PETRI, who had studied in Wittenberg (1516-18), and a politician, Gustavus Eriksson Vasa, who obtained Sweden's political independence from Denmark in 1523 and founded a dynasty, ruling as king from 1523 to 1560. He used Petri, then preaching in Stockholm, to effect the gradual transformation of the religious life of the people, with the intention of making his own power absolute. In 1527 the Diet of Väterås voted to break with Rome. In the new independent church the title of bishop and the apostolic succession were retained, but the king became its head, with the Lutheran archbishop of Uppsala his first lieutenant. Olaus published the first Swedish service book, Een Handbock pää Swensko, in 1529; the Catholic religion was banned from Sweden in 1544. Vasa was able to accomplish a similar change in Finland with the help of Michael Agricola and Peter Särkilathi.

Other Countries. The support of Polish nobles, whose sons had studied in Wittenberg, helped Lutheranism make inroads there. The reform of the Teutonic Knights according to a Lutheran pattern in 1525, under the aegis of its grand master, ALBRECHT OF BRANDEN-BURG-ANSBACH, opened the way to the imposition of Lutheran doctrine and practice along the Baltic. In Bohemia, students who had imbibed the spirit of the Lutheran Reformation, were welcomed by the calixtin descendants of John Hus and Bohemian Brethren. In Hungary, Matthew D. Biro, friend of Philipp MELANCHTHON, promoted Lutheranism among the Magyars until a visit to Switzerland in 1543 inclined him to Calvinism. Italy and the Iberian Peninsula were practically untouched by any form of the Reformation, while the rest of the Continent, especially Switzerland, parts of France, and the Low Countries, came under the almost exclusive sway of Calvinism (see REFORMED CHURCHES).

Doctrinal Controversy. During this period of expansion, the doctrinal basis of Lutheran life and belief was being melted down in the crucible of controversy. Its crystallization in the Formula of CONCORD (1577) was achieved after a series of adjustments and disputes that had lasted for almost a half-century from the date of Luther's break with Rome. The antitheses were several, for it was not merely a question of opposing Catholicism, but of finding agreement with non-Lutheran movements of reform, as well as doctrinal unanimity among Lutherans themselves.

As regards the ANABAPTISTS, who were the radicals or enthusiasts among the Reformers, no real controversy arose, for it was clear to those in the mainstream of the Lutheran movement that these were extremist groups. With the Calvinists it was otherwise. Though their orientation was basically the same as that of the Lutherans, disagreement arose particularly over the presence of Christ in the Eucharist. Martin BUCER, the leader of the Reformation at Strasbourg, who was subject to both Lutheran and Calvinist currents, acted as mediator in effecting the Wittenberg Concord (1536). Stauncher Lutherans

A plaque dedicated to Martin Luther in the Schlosskirche, the Castle Church, where Luther posted his 95 Theses and where he is buried. Wittenberg, Germany. (©Dave Bartruff/CORBIS) opposed the agreement, and their suspicions were voiced in accusations leveled against such advocates of conciliation as Melanchthon. These they branded as Crypto-Calvinists.

Before the death of Luther, controversy had divided his disciples. Most notable of the debates was concerned with the relationship between the law and the gospel. Johann Agricola (J. Schnitter), the first champion of Antinomianism, rejected the Decalogue as unworthy of Christians and stated that faith sets the Christian free of law. Luther, himself, responded that the Commandments are altogether necessary, since the Church includes some not yet reborn, and since those who have experienced rebirth are still sinners. In Der Grosse Catechismus (1529) he included a long commentary on the Decalogue.

Resistance to Compromise. The most serious and bitter disputes arose after the death of Luther (1546). They involved two parties: the rigid conservatives led by Nikolaus von AMSDORF and Matthias FLACIUS ILLYRICUS; and the Philippists, who, as disciples of Melanchthon, urged doctrinal compromise and adaptation. The extent, though not the depth, of the disagreements appears in the Formula of Concord, where they were ostensibly resolved. Its structure shows that the contentions concerned mostly soteriological problems, which were the main concern of the Reformers. The articles of the epitome of the Formula treat of original sin, free will, righteousness before God through faith, good works, the law, and the gospel, as well as the Eucharist and questions concerning the Person and the work of Christ.

According to a temporal sequence, the first of the important differences involved the adiaphora. In the two Interims of the year 1548, the Lutherans were called upon to make certain doctrinal and ceremonial compromises in lieu of a final resolution of the problems by an ecumenical council. Melanchthon supported these proposals with the notion that there are certain factors in the Catholic religion that are, at very least, innocuous. As regards the Sacraments, he and other conciliatory theologians held that the rites of confirmation and the anointing of the sick are permissible. They showed similar tolerance for the veneration of the saints and other liturgical ceremonies and customs. The conservatives, proclaiming themselves Gnesio-Lutherans (of a pure and genuine strain), GNE-SIOLUTHERANISM, rejected Melanchthon's adiaphorism as well as his doctrine of synergism, which stated that man could exercise his innate power to accept or reject the prevenient grace of God. This position was attacked by members of the rigid party, who, appealing vigorously to the authority of the young Luther, stressed the radical corruption of man's nature, which made it necessary for him to receive a new will before he is even capable of accepting grace.

Connected with this basic disagreement in Lutheran doctrine of subjective redemption was the Osiandric controversy. Named after Andreas OSIANDER, it touched the notion of justification itself; is it merely forensic acquittal of man, the sinner; or is it an actual infusion of righteousness? Osiander taught that the sinner is made just by an infusion of the divine nature of Christ. The place of good works in the process of justification brought on the "Majoristic" controversy. Georg MAJOR, a disciple of Melanchthon and professor at Wittenberg, taught that good works following justification are necessary for salvation. Amsdorf countered that good works are, on the contrary, dangerous to salvation. Even Melanchthon considered Major's position extreme and preferred to state simply that good works are necessary.

Search for Orthodoxy. In the meantime, the confessional literature of the Lutherans had grown extensively. To the Confession of AUGSBURG and the Apology thereof (written by Melanchthon, with the approval of Luther) were added the Articles of Schmalkald, Melanchthon's treatise on the power of the papacy, and the two catechisms of Luther. None of these documents had been canonically approved, however; and little by little the leaders of the Lutheran Reformation felt the need for a document, especially since the Lutheran theologians were divided into two camps, those of the University of Jena (the self-styled Gnesio-Lutherans) and those of the University of Wittenberg. The Formula of Concord is, then, the result of the attempt to mediate and unite Lutherans. Its redaction was due in great part to theologians of the Gnesio-Lutheran type, although not of the extreme right: Jakob Andreä (1520–90), Martin CHEMNITZ, Nikolaus Selnecker (1530–92), and David CHYTRAEUS. Paradoxically, although Lutheran orthodoxy had been present in embryo during this formative period, the Formula made it possible for it to develop systematically.

The orthodox theologians aimed at systematizing the established teaching of the confessional writings. The existence of a certain canonized consensus was a prerequisite to such an endeavor. Lutheran orthodoxy, therefore, was born from the apparent resolution of the controversies that took place in the second generation of Lutheranism. Agreement on the Formula of Concord in 1580 effected both a cohesion of the parties previously at odds with each other and a concern for accurate expression of doctrine. The vehicles of this accuracy were biblical proofs and an elaboration of their meaning according to Aristotelian categories. Another factor in the emergence of orthodoxy was the continuing and ever sharper polemic against the Church of Rome and various Protestant groups. The authority of Luther was at high tide; and the paradox of orthodoxy itself consists in its virtual equation of his dicta with those of the Bible. The representatives of this school were not so much interested in him as a person, as in a witness of true doctrine.

The orthodoxy in embryo that was represented by Flacius Illyricus found its full emergence in the works of Johann GERHARD. His Loci theologici (9 v. compl. in 1622) is the best specimen of what Lutheran orthodoxy says. It is more than a body of doctrinal writings, and must be understood from its motives. The orthodox theologians were certainly intent on defending the honor of Luther and the truth of his teaching. The rigidity of this defense, however, can only be explained by the fact that the system gradually began to be considered as inviolable. This development eventually jeopardized both the apology for the validity of Luther's vocation to reform the Church and the claims for absolute parity of doctrine. The rigidity soon produced a protest in the form of Lutheran Pietism.

Even during the age of the orthodox ascendancy, the humanist tradition was present in the bosom of Lutheranism, for example, in the person of Georg CALIXTUS, who insisted on the consensus quinquesaecularis, the agreement of the Church during the first five centuries on certain fundamental articles of faith. Thus, he evoked the notion of tradition and brought down upon himself from orthodox quarters the accusation of syncretism. The ecumenical labor of Calixtus was stillborn, but it helped maintain a certain awareness within the Lutheran community that the Reformation and its continuation was for the sake of the Church.

Pietism. PIETISM was in great measure a reaction against what seemed to be the unrealistic speculation of orthodox theology, and also against the formalistic church life that followed from it. The need for more vitality was felt, especially at the end of the devastating Thirty Years' War (1618–48). On the other hand, Pietism was also a continuing expression of the humanist strain in German Lutheranism. Veit von Seckendorf (1626–92) and Gottfried W. LEIBNIZ did not belong to any Pietist school, but their lives exhibit an openness that does not accord with the spirit of orthodoxy.

Most representative of the Pietists is Philipp Jakob SPENER. For 20 years (1666-86), he served as pastor for a congregation in Frankfurt am Main; and it was there that the movement came alive. Spener organized small Bible study-circles (ecclesiolae), the work of which was almost exclusively ethically oriented. The Scriptures were treated not as the sources of proof-texts for speculative theological conclusions, but as the immediate font of spiritual enlightenment and strength-experience. The name, Pietist, was first given to these groups in derision. Spener later went to Berlin and spent the last ten years of his life at the recently founded University of Halle (1694), which thus became the center of Pietism. To Halle also came August H. FRANCKE, who at Leipzig had organized groups similar to the ones Spener had founded in Frankfurt. The separatism his disciples manifested toward other Lutherans at Leipzig brought friction and eventually caused him to leave. Halle, thus, became to Pietism what Wittenberg had been to the early Reformation.

Lutheran Pietism was never a tightly organized movement; therefore, it took various forms according to the milieu in which it developed. For example, whereas in Halle the Pietists tended to be rigoristic and ecclesiologically separatist, in Würtemberg they were more attached to the Lutheran Church and to deeper theological reflection. Elsewhere, eccentric groups such as the Herrnhuter of Nikolaus L. ZINZENDORF (see MORAVIAN CHURCH) emerged from the movement, as did also sectarian assemblies such as the Engelbrüder.

Personal Experiences of Salvation. Pietism was more than a reaction against orthodox rigidity. As with the other manifestations of Lutheranism it accented one of the other principles emphasized by the Reformers. In this case, stress was on the personal experience of salvation. The pessimism concerning human nature that characterized earlier Lutheran thought was softened, and the priority of experience over speculation of any kind was affirmed. At the same time the Pietists departed slightly from a tightly formulated scriptural principle in the direction of the independence of the individual in making his religious judgments and decisions. By this avenue a species of pure subjectivism made its appearance, and, even though the Pietists did give the Bible to the people, by their disregard for dogma they smoothed the way for the Aufklärung.

The Enlightenment. What Pietism conceived, the Aufklärung brought forth. During this 18th-century period, Lutheranism was besieged by rationalism and was thereby transformed. The object of belief became of less and less moment, for the criterion of religiosity according to the rationalists was conscientiousness. The Lutherans of the Aufklärung still revered Martin Luther as their patriarch; not as the expounder of the biblical doctrine of justification by faith, however, but as the patron saint of the principle of the absolute independence of the individual in religious matters. Thus appeared the cleavage within Lutheranism itself, that is implicit in the simultaneous proclamation of biblical doctrine and affirmation of the principle of undetermined independence in its interpretation.

The leaders of the Aufklärung did not abandon the Bible; they put it to the test of the kind of criticism that dominated the next century. Johann S. Semler laid the foundation for this new approach to the Scriptures. At the same time Gotthold E. LESSING led the attack against orthodoxy with his notion of a formal Lutheranism, which consisted in the exercise of the right of every man to absolute religious freedom, after the example of Luther. These orientations met the whole-hearted approval of political leaders, including Frederick the Great.

Neo-Lutheranism. The first reaction to rationalism was heralded at the very apex of the Aufklärung in the life and work of Johann G. HERDER and Johann G. HAMANN. The "back to Luther" movement that they represented was a revival of the doctrine of justification by faith. These neo-Lutherans, who appeared when the spirit of romanticism was flourishing, appealed to the fundamental beliefs of the Reformation and made them meaningful by providing access to the Bible, as the source of preaching and teaching, without unwarranted concessions to the rationalism of that era.

Liberalism. As a result of the rationalist revolution, however, the spirit of the Aufklärung was translated into the liberal theology of the 19th century, represented by Ernst TROELTSCH and Adolf von HARNACK, and thence into the 20th under the leadership of such theologians as Rudolf BULTMANN. At the same time a more conservative line was held by other churchmen and deepened theologically by a more critical view of Reformation sources, e.g., the work of Edmund Schlink.

Thus, the general pattern of the history of Lutheranism has been affected radically by the interaction of two opposing forces that were present from the beginning: Martin Luther's emphasis on religious experience and Flacius Illyricus's penchant for rational systematization of doctrine. Subsequently the former emphasis, always as a reaction against overrationalization, has appeared in Pietism, romanticism, and the more contemporary forms of Lutheran existentialism. The rationalizing tendency has been mostly a reaction against excessive confidence in experience. The Pietists, for example, unwittingly and certainly unintentionally permitted rationalism itself to play a role in the history of Lutheranism; just as romanticism ceded to the more modern attempts to control religion rationally.

Ecumenism. The political upheaval, especially in Europe, after 1850, plus a half-century of ecumenism have continued to modify the status of Lutheranism as an institution. Politics has had its greatest effect in Germany, where the Lutheran churches are no longer state churches. In other countries too, there is evidence of a reconsideration of the relevance of establishment.

The drama of the rise and fall of the Third Reich is a conspicuous factor in the growth of the ecumenical trend among Lutherans. The first effect was the split of German Lutherans into several groups, on the basis of their varied view of the political regime. Common persecution, however, produced a unifying force, especially in the Una Sancta movement, which in postwar years has made Germany a lively center of ecumenical activity. Lutherans of such various tendencies as Otto Dibelius, Martin Niemöller, Hanns Lilje, and Franklin C. Fry played important roles in the formation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In the dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church, of special significance is a postwar group of Lutheran theologians who have advocated corporate reunion with the Church of Rome. This "League for Evangelical-Catholic Reunion" has no official status within Lutheranism. Its principles have been stated and are currently being developed in the writings of Max Lackmann, Hans Asmussen, and Richard Baumann.

Another effect of ecumenism within Lutheranism was the formation of the Lutheran World Federation (Der Lutherische Weltbund) in 1947. A free association of Lutheran churches, it is bound together by the traditional Lutheran confessional writings. Under its auspices a center of interconfessional research is maintained in Strasbourg.

Fundamental Doctrine of Lutheranism

Historians and theologians alike are accustomed to presenting the Reformation as grounded in a material and a formal principle. The former is the doctrine of justification by faith (sola fide); the latter is Scripture, which certifies this doctrine (sola Scriptura). They further assign one of the principles to each of the two leaders of the Reformation: Martin Luther as the champion of the sola fide, while John Calvin is responsible for the strong scriptural emphasis.

If this simple presupposition were adequate, then a sufficient knowledge of Lutheranism could be found in an analysis of what Luther and his immediate disciples understood by "justifying faith," together with an account of subsequent variations in its understanding. The reality is otherwise, however; for, despite the obvious differences in the orientation of Luther and Calvin, the Reformation represents a certain unity in which several confessions have become interpenetrated. Hence Lutheran doctrine—as the articulation of the particular Lutheran experience—takes in much more than a statement of Martin Luther's insight concerning justification. Nor can it be sealed off from the so-called Calvinist scriptural principle, even though, admittedly, the Lutheran interpretation of this principle appears to be (at least implicitly) more radical than that of either Calvin himself or the majority of his adherents.

On the condition that these cautions are observed, however, it is not impossible to apply the twofold principle to Lutheran doctrine itself. Comprising the material element are such things as justification by faith and the church as the "assembly of believers." Each of these factors is complex. The Lutheran concept of justification presupposes a particular understanding of the condition of the human will (servum arbitrium) before the advent of justifying faith. It also includes a comprehension of the relationship between law and gospel as well as the distinctive grasp of the meaning of faith. Likewise, Lutheran doctrine on the church is a complexus of convictions having to do both with factors constitutive of the church and with mutual relationships of the church with other societies. On the one hand, the formal element is the insistence on the primacy of the canonical Scriptures in matters of doctrine, and on the other, it is the right of the individual conscience to determine freely its adhesion to or separation from a given doctrine.

Despite the tensions, if not contradictions, that have occurred in the development of this Lutheran body of doctrine, and have prevented it from achieving a cohesive and changeless form, the main doctrinal points can be described.

Sinful Man before God. The principal concern of all Lutheran theology—and this in accord with the concern of Luther himself—is the relationship of God and man. As a son of Adam, man is under the power of Satan. What is his status before God? The language Lutherans use in answer to this question is very strong. The Formula of Concord approvingly attributes the following statement to Luther himself: "Our free will has no power whatsoever in virtue of which man could prepare himself for justice or even seek it out. On the contrary, blind and captive man gives exclusive obedience to Satan's will and perpetrates thereby things offensive to God'' (Solids declaratio 2; Die Bekenntnisschriften der evangelischlutherischen Kirche [BSLK] 889). On this basis alone one might be inclined to use the term "totally depraved" in reference to the Lutheran concept of human nature. That, however, would not be just in light of this further statement: "Fallen man does not cease to be a rational creature . . .; furthermore, in civil and external matters he is able somewhat to discern the good from the bad and even freely to do some things and desist from others" (ibid. 879). The entire matter is viewed in a religious context; fallen man, on his own, is absolutely helpless, as far as the God-relationship is concerned. "Before conversion man is, indeed, a rational creature, having intellect and will (though no understanding of divine realities nor will to do what is good and salvific). He is, nonetheless, able to contribute nothing to his own conversion" (ibid. 895-896).

A difficulty that pervades the Lutheran synthesis of the God-man relationship appears here. If man is unable to contribute anything to his own conversion, is he really able to be converted? This Lutheran doctrine, as proposed in the confessional writings and traditionally explained by theologians, is susceptible to being understood in a sense consonant with the teaching of the Council of Trent (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1551–53; cf. 1554–55, 1557, 1559), although the accent is indeed heavy upon the notion of human impotence and depravity.

Law and Gospel. The omnipotent Word of God breaks through the impotency of fallen man in two distinct forms: (1) in the preaching of the law, which makes man aware of his sins and the wrath of God, for "the Law, properly so-called, is any divine doctrine wherein is set forth the most just and changeless will of God, concerning the obligations incumbent on man as regards his being, and his thoughts, words, and deeds, with a view towards his attaining God's approval and acceptance" (Formula of Concord, Solida declaratio 5; BSLK 957); and (2) in the heralding of the Gospel, which consists exclusively in the proclamation of God's graciousness and clemency, made visible in the forgiveness of sins; this leads to faith, because the Gospel consists in the "doctrine which states what a miserable sinner must believe in order to be forgiven his sins by God'' (ibid. 958).

This is the familiar Lutheran distinction between law and Gospel. Both deserved to be proclaimed, the former as subordinate and directed to the latter. And the force of the Lutheran witness is accented by the observation that to confuse law and Gospel with each other leads to an obscuring of the merit and good works of Christ, and a transformation of Gospel into law, "such as we see has happened under the Papacy" (ibid. 961).

The Lutherans protested that in the Church of the late Middle Ages the Gospel was presented as a set of obligations, which, when fulfilled, ensure God's approval and acceptance of man. This charge has been transmitted in the confessional writings, as well as in the thought of contemporary Lutheran theologians. For them, universally, the word productive of faith is the proclamation that "the son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, took upon himself the burden of the Law's curse; that he offered altogether adequate satisfaction for our sins, in such wise that through Him alone are we reconciled with God, receiving forgiveness of sins through faith, freedom from death and the other punishments of sin and eternal salvation" (ibid. 958).

Fiducial Faith. In the process of justification, man's response to God is shown in his firm confidence in the merits of Christ. "Justification calls for three things, and three things only: God's grace, Christ's merit, and faith. Faith, moreover, takes hold of the very gifts which God promises in the Gospel; and on its account the righteousness of Christ is deemed ours. Through it also we have our sins forgiven; we are reconciled with God; and we become his adopted children and heirs of eternal life" (Formula of Concord, Solida declaratio 3; BSLK 922). When the Gospel is proclaimed, both the grace of God and the merit of Christ are set forth openly, and this in the form of a promise: the graciousness of God the Father belongs to the man who trusts solely in the merit of Christ. Fiducial faith, then, according to the Lutheran position, is an attitude of total confidence in the merit of Christ; and its correlative is justification or righteousness.

Although this position does not accord altogether with the description of faith as furnished, for example, by Vatican Council I (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3008), in which both the gratuity of this divine gift and the revealed truth to which faith clings are emphasized, still the Lutheran concept of faith is not devoid of reference to the content of the Gospel. "Faith is a gift of God whereby through the word of the Gospel we rightly acknowledge [agnoscimus] Christ as our Redeemer and put our trust [confidimus] in him . . ." (BSLK 917–918). Thus two elements are necessary, but any mere knowledge (Melanchthon called it otiosa notitia) of revealed dogmas is not worthy of the name faith. "Faith is not mere knowledge, but much more the will to receive or take to oneself whatever is offered in the promise concerning Christ" (Apology for the Confession of Augsburg 4; BSLK 203). Lutherans, furthermore, distinguish between conversion and justification. The latter involves solely and exclusively the faith described above. Conversion, on the other hand, includes such realities as sanctification and the renewal of one's life—good works. These latter are never thought of as meritorious, but rather, as the natural fruit and sign of true righteousness.

All of the factors of the Christian life set forth by St. Paul and synthesized in the tradition of the Church are present also in the Lutheran doctrine of justification and conversion, but with the additional element that produces the radically different order given to the doctrine, namely, the Lutheran preoccupation with the personal certitude of justification. This accounts for the emphasis upon confidence or trust as an element of faith and the insistence that good works are not properly a part of justification. It also illumines the meaning of the Lutheran slogan, simul justus et peccator. In the Lutheran conception, justus refers properly to the man of faith who has trust in the promises made in Christ, and not to the man of faith inasmuch as he is "converted," i.e., interiorly, though imperfectly, renewed.

Ecclesiology. Lutheran ecclesiology takes its origin from Martin Luther's interpretation of the common priesthood of the faithful. From it stems the description of the church provided by the Confession of Augsburg, "The assembly of believers where the Gospel is preached in its purity and the sacraments are rightly administered." To be a believer is to be a constitutive member of the holy people of God, whom St. Peter calls "a chosen race [and] a royal priesthood" (1 Pt 2.9). The sense attached to these propositions was affected by the situation in the early years of the Reformation. As it appeared to Luther and his disciples, the crucial hindrance to reform in the Church was the attitude of the bishops, including the Roman Curia. This view took the form of a dilemma; either cede to the bishops and abandon the movement for a reform or proceed without them. By choosing the latter course, Lutherans radically affected their ecclesiology. However, because the Gospel must be preached and the Sacraments administered, the assembly of believers requires "ministering men." These are provided for by choice and ordination in such ways that they are considered representatives of the congregation. There is an ambiguity in such an arrangement, but Lutheran theologians have, for the most part, been satisfied to continue the emphasis upon the common priesthood of the faithful, leaving the doctrinal basis for a ministry uncertain.

Church and State. In 16th-century Germany the bishops of the Church as temporal lords were key figures in determining the balance of political power. Lutheran denouncement of episcopal hegemony in the Church, therefore, constrained them to depend on princes and nobles for the support of their religious views. This led eventually to the cujus regio ejus religio settlement of the Peace of Augsburg. More significant was the tendency to put the choice of the ministers of their church into the hands of Lutheran princes and thus to make way for the state church. The Augsburg Confession teaches that "ecclesiastical power and the power of the sword are different one from the other. Furthermore, both of them, according to God's command, are to be revered religiously and treated with honor as the highest gifts of God on earth'' (art. 28). In Lutheranism, therefore, political society and the assembly of believers differ, one from the other, but the differences are not explicitly enunciated. As a result of this lack of clarity in doctrine, Lutheran churches became subjected to the control of the "venerable" political authority as state churches, with the restrictions this implies. The condition of Lutheranism in North America and in Germany in the 20th century indicates that it is viable in a more pluralistic society. There is a tendency today to question the relevance of the state church in Europe, which might lead to a reassessment of the notion of the "two powers."

From the Lutheran idea that faith creates the church, it might be concluded that the church is an invisible reality. However, the audible word of the gospel and the visible sign of the Sacraments are to be witnesses to the divine promise—remission of sins through the merits of Christ, whose sacrifice the Father accepts on our behalf. "Just as the word [of the Gospel] falls upon the ear and thus strikes the heart, so the [sacramental] rites are set forth before our eyes also to move the heart The eyes take in the rite which is a picture of the Word, as it were, signifying the same thing as the Word. So they have exactly the same effect" (Apology for the Confession of Augsburg 13; BSLK 292–293).

Therefore the church is visible, but only to those who have this faith in the promises of God. And the real church has as members those who hear the Gospel and see the Sacraments fruitfully. Wherever the Gospel is heard and the Sacraments are seen, faith is conceived in some: this is the church.

Sacramental System. The term sacrament refers to three rites, all of which, according to the Lutheran view, have their divine origin guaranteed in the Scriptures: baptism, penance, and the Eucharist (Apology for the Confession of Augsburg, loc. cit.). Notwithstanding the conviction that faith is a requisite factor for the fruitfulness of the Sacraments (ibid.), the practice of infant baptism is retained on the grounds that the church owes them the proclamation of the promises on which the church's life is based.

Lutheran doctrine concerning the Eucharist was formulated first in opposition to certain dogmatic positions of the Roman Catholic Church and became more defined in debates with Calvinistic and Zwinglian divines. Thus the following two composite theses are paramount: (1) in the Eucharist the Body and Blood of Christ are present in, with, and beneath [the forms] of bread and wine; and thus they are our souls' real meat and drink; (2) only those who believe actually profit from reception of the Eucharist; and faith is at the same time awakened and bolstered in them. Nonbelievers, moreover, receive the Body and Blood of Christ to their condemnation.

In the 16th century, Lutherans inveighed strongly against the Mass as a sacrifice; their objection was in keeping with the first principle of their ecclesiology, the common priesthood. The debate suffered from misunderstanding concerning the teaching of the Catholic Church on the sacrificial character of eucharistic worship. Hence this has become a lively topic in 20th-century ecumenical dialogue.

Present-day Lutheran theologians are mostly silent about the sacrament of penance; and, although the dicta of the Apology stand as such, the practice of confession is rare in the Lutheran churches.

Scripture and Tradition. The "formal" part of Lutheranism is a complex of convictions about the way the doctrinal content of its confession of faith is received. preserved, and developed. The first element of this complex consists in authoritative documents, especially the Old and New Testaments. According to the Formula of Concord, the Scriptures are the one and only rule and norm (norma normans), according to which all dogmas and all teachers, living or dead, are to be judged. Other documents are enumerated, but with careful emphasis on their circumstantial and, therefore, temporary character in relation to the Scriptures. Just as the ancient creeds were formulated to combat primitive heresies, so too the Lutheran confessional writings (a list is given in which the Confession of Augsburg and its companion Apology rank first in authority) were necessarily constructed to clarify the religious questions of the 16th century. These latter documents are designated as normae normatae. They stand as authoritative but in subjection to the judgment of the Scriptures.

Besides the Scriptures, however, Lutheranism admits a notion of tradition, composed of two factors: (1) the authority of the university professors, who de facto have served as quasi-official interpreters of Lutheran doctrine, and (2) the observation of what has occurred in the Lutheran churches through the centuries, as various influences and currents of thought affected them.

Perhaps this can be understood initially through reflection on Martin Luther's own protest before the Diet of Worms: "Unless I am convicted by Scripture and plain reason—I do not accept the authority of popes and councils, for they have contradicted each other—my conscience is captive to the word of God. I cannot and I will not recant anything, for to go against conscience is neither right nor safe. God help me. Amen." [R. H. Bainton, Here I Stand (New York 1950) 195].

The formal element in Lutheranism, therefore, is Holy Scripture as authoritatively interpreted through the Lutheran confessional writings and as understood through the "Lutheran conscience"—however that may be formed in a given epoch, and to the exclusion of any exterior constraining norm. Note that any explicit reference to the "interior testimony of the Holy Spirit" as a normative factor is practically absent from the Lutheran tradition.

Bibliography: K. ALGERMISSEN, Konfessionskunde (Celle 1957), extensive bibliog. and full treatment; Eng. tr. J. W. GRUND-NER, of an earlier edition, Christian Denominations (St. Louis 1945). Die Bekenntnisschriften der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche. S. GRUNDMANN, Der lutherische Weltbund: Grundlagen, Herkunft, Aufbau (Cologne 1957), with bibliog. E. SCHLINK, Theologie der lutherischen Bekenntnisschriften (Munich 1946). H. H. W. KRAMM, The Theology of Martin Luther (London 1949). J. PELIKAN, From Luther to Kirkegaard (St. Louis 1950). W. ELERT, The Structure of Lutheranism, tr. W. A. HANSEN (St. Louis 1962—). A. K. SWIHART, Luther and the Lutheran Church (New York 1960). L. FUERBRINGER et al., Concordia Cyclopedia (St. Louis 1927). G. W. FORELL, Faith Active in Love: An Investigation of Principles underlying Luther's Social Ethics (New York 1954). H. WEINEL, Die Deutsche evangelische Kirche (Gotha 1933). H. SASSE, Was heisst lutherisch? (Munich 1934); Here We Stand: Nature and Character of the Lutheran Faith, tr. T. G. TAPPERT (New York 1938); This Is My Body (Minneapolis 1959). H. W. GENSICHEN, Damnamus. Die Verwerfung von Irrlehre bei Luther und im Luthertum des 16. Jahrhunderts (Berlin 1955). F. UHLHORN, Geschichte der deutschen-lutheranischen Kirche, 2 v. (Leipzig 1911). E. G. RUPP, The Righteousness of God: Luther Studies (New York 1954). E. M. CAR-LSON, The Reinterpretation of Luther (Philadelphia 1948). The Book of Concord, tr. H. T. DAU and F. BENTE (St. Louis 1921). The Lutheran Churches of the World, ed. A. R. WENTZ (Geneva 1952). H. E. JACOBS and J. A. W. HAAS, eds., Lutheran Encyclopedia (New York 1899). E. ROTH, Sakrament nach Luther (Berlin 1952). H. GRASS, Die Abendmahlslehre bei Luther and Calvin Gütersloh 1954). H. BORNKAMM, Luther im Spiegel der Deutschen Geistgeschichte (Heidelberg 1955). E. W. ZEEDEN, Martin Luther und die Reformation im Urteil des deutschen Luthertums, 2 v. (Freiburg 1950-52), v.1 tr. R. M. BETHELL, The Legacy of Luther (Westminster, MD 1954). H. ASMUSSEN et al., The Unfinished Reformation, tr. R. J. OLSEN (Notre Dame, IN 1961). H. E. JACOBS, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908-27) 8:202-204. J. PACQUIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 91:1183–1335, with bibliog. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 833–835. K. ALGERMISSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER (Freiburg 1930–38) 6:732–739. E. W. ZEEDEN and E. KINDER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1231–40. E. W. ZEEDEN and J. P. MICHAEL, Staatslexikon, ed. GÖRRES-GESELLSCHAFT (Freiburg 1957–63) 5:475–482. G. EBELING, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:495–520, with bibliog.

[M. B. SCHEPERS/EDS.]

LUX MUNDI

Lux Mundi is the title of a book of theological essays published in 1889 (4th ed. 1890), subtitled A Series of Studies in the Religion of the Incarnation. It was edited by Charles GORE, Anglican Bishop of Oxford, and did much to transform the Anglo-Catholic movement in the Church of England (see ANGLO-CATHOLICS). The book was written after a group of young Oxford men had become impatient with the superficial "Romanizing" tenof the ritualists and the obscurantist fundamentalism in which Edward PUSEY and others would have imprisoned the OXFORD MOVEMENT. This group was also deeply concerned with the social question and with the sense of responsibility for the well-being of all men, including the poor and underprivileged, that Gore had learned from B. F. WESTCOTT, and Westcott from the Christian socialism of F. D. MAURICE. The most memorable pages in Lux Mundi occur in the essay "The Holy Spirit and Inspiration," written by Gore himself. This essay marked the beginning of Liberal Catholicism in the Church of England, because its author affirmed that it is not inconsistent with the Catholic faith to accept the reasonable results of higher criticism of the Scriptures and the well-founded discoveries of science. The brief preface to the book, also written by Gore, explained the purpose of this "new look" in Anglo-Catholicism: "We have written in this volume not as 'guessers of truth,' but as servants of the Catholic creed and Church, aiming only at interpreting the faith we have received." All the authors of Lux Mundi were extremely conscious of continuity with the Catholic past and also of the need for "great changes in the outlying departments of theology" to meet the "new needs, new points of view, new questions" of the times. Other contributors to Lux Mundi were canons H. Scott Holland and Aubrey Moore, J. R. Illingworth, E. S. Talbot, R. C. Mobberly, Arthur Lyttelton, W. Lock, F. Paget, W. J. H. Campion, and R. L. Ottley. Lux Mundi was severely attacked by such prominent High Church leaders as Henry Parry Liddon and was publicly assailed in Convocation.

Bibliography: J. K. MOZLEY, Some Tendencies in British Theology from the Publication of Lux Mundi to the Present Day (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge 1951). A. M. RAMSEY, From Gore to Temple (London 1960). J. CARPENTER, Gore: A Study in Liberal Catholic Thought (London 1960).

[W. HANNAH]

LUXEMBOURG, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg is bordered on the east by Germany, on the south by France and on the west by Belgium. Located in the plateau region of the Ardennes, the region's terrain consists of rolling hills rising to low mountains in the east, and falling to the Moselle river valley in the southeast. Wooded areas abound and natural resources include iron ore, which is no longer mined; agricultural crops, nourished by the region's mild climate and grown on small, family-run farms, include barley, oats, wheat, grapes, fruits and potatoes. Luxembourg exports steel, rubber and chemical products throughout Europe, the United Kingdom and the United States, and was one of the original founders of the European Economic Community (now the European Union). In the late 20th century banking grew into a major component of its economy. In 1999 it entered the agreement to utilize the Euro currency.

Founded in 963 and with its roots in the Holy Roman Empire, the grand duchy passed through German, Spanish and Habsburg control before coming into formal existence in 1815 at the Congress of Vienna. It remained part of the kingdom of the Netherlands until 1839, when a revolt by neighboring Belgium resulted in the loss of half its area to that country. Political control was retained by the Netherlands, and then Germany until World War I. The region—neutral through both world wars— was occupied by German forces from 1940 to 1944, and joined NATO following World War II. Luxembourg is a constitutional monarchy in which legislative power resides in a chamber of deputies composed of one representative for every 5,500 inhabitants. There is an executive council with seven ministers. The Nassau-Weilbourg family, Catholics, have ruled since 1912. Ecclesiastically, Luxembourg has an archdiocese located in the city of Luxembourg that is immediately subject to the Holy See. Our Lady, Comfort of the Afflicted, whose miraculous image has been venerated since 1624, is the patroness of the city and Duchy of Luxembourg. The image continues to attract many pilgrims, especially during the octave of her feast on the 3d to 5th Sundays after Easter.

Catholic Church to 1500. Christian communities established themselves in the region during the 5th and 6th centuries under the influence of the important Christian centers in TRIER and LIÈGE. The consolidation of Christianity continued until the end of the 8th century; it owed much to the activities of St. WILLIBRORD, the English Benedictine missionary. The parish system developed in the 9th century. Most of Luxembourg pertained to the See of Liège and, still more, to the See of Trier; smaller sections belonged to the dioceses of Metz, Verdun, REIMS and COLOGNE.

Monasteries were established early and exercised political and cultural as well as religious influence. Saint Hubert was founded in 687 (occupied by Benedictines in 817), Saint Maximin in Trier in the 7th or 8th century, Prüm in 721 and Münster in the town of Luxembourg in 1083. Orval, founded in 1071 by the Benedictines, passed to the Canons Regular of St. Augustine in 1110 and to the Cistercians in 1132.

The Abbey of ECHTERNACH, founded in 698, gained wide renown for its school of copyists, which flourished in the 11th century, when it produced such masterpieces as the Golden Gospel Books, now in Nuremberg, Uppsala and the Escorial. The church and monastery built (1016–31) over the grave of St. Willibrord in Echternach remained a notable example of early Romanesque architecture. A dancing religious procession continued to take place annually on that site since the 14th century on Whit-Tuesday still attracted thousands of pilgrims into the 21st century.

Soon after their foundation Teutonic Knights and Knights Hospitallers established houses in Luxembourg, as did Dominicans, Franciscans and their respective orders of nuns. The best-remembered medieval religious women are St. KUNIGUNDE (d. 1033), daughter of Duke Siegfried II of Luxembourg and wife of Emperor Henry II, and Blessed Yolanda of Vianden (d. 1283).

Since 1500. In 1354 the Duchy of Luxembourg was created; during the Middle Ages its rulers sometimes attained European significance as heads of the Holy Roman Empire while losing contact with Luxembourg itself. This phenomenon left its mark on the historical development of the Church, as political alliances were arranged with Burgundy (1441–43), the Spanish Hapsburgs (1506) and then Austria (1714). During the FRENCH REVOLUTION the duchy was incorporated into the French Republic as a department. Not until the 19th century would the region's political autonomy prompt the development of a unified diocesan ecclesiastical structure.

During the 15th and 16th centuries abuses invaded many monasteries and lowered the religious and moral life of the clergy. Since Luxembourg was part of the southern province of the Spanish Netherlands and had the Archdiocese of Trier to the east acting as a spiritual bulwark, it was protected from the influence of the Protestant Reformation. The establishment of Luxembourg as a separate diocese was urged from the time of King Philip II, but the request was not granted partly because of the opposition of the bishops of Liège and Trier, both eager to preserve their feudal rights. The Jesuit College in the town of Luxembourg benefited the entire duchy (1602–1773). The Jesuits had a special devotion to the Blessed Virgin, which they spread by their teaching, preaching and missionary labors.

The 17th-century Gothic Cathedral of Notre Dame in Luxembourg city. (©Carmen Redondo/CORBIS)

In the 17th and 18th centuries priestly vocations, especially to the Jesuits, were numerous. Some of these Jesuits became influential advisers at European courts, notably Karl von Mansfeld and Wilhelm LAMORMAINI. The brothers W. and A. Wiltheim, J. Reuter, C. Lacroix, F. X. de Feller and others gained fame as writers.

Neither JOSEPHINISM nor the ENLIGHTENMENT made much impact on the loyal Catholic Luxembourgers. The French Revolution, however, resulted in the confiscation of almost all the goods of nobles and monasteries. This great political and social upheaval also created a new class, composed often of foreigners with newly acquired wealth, that conducted, mildly at first and then ever more aggressively, a campaign of ANTICLERICALISM, using political means to create a new ideological climate. In the transitional period the intellectual quality of clerical education deteriorated.

Luxembourg fell under first the dioceses of Metz (1801–23) and then Namur (1823–40). Its ecclesiastical status was finally stabilized in 1840 with the creation of the Vicariate Apostolic of Luxembourg. J. T. Laurent, the first vicar apostolic, was a distinguished prelate, firm on matters of principle, who had been exiled from the country (1842–48). The vicariate became a diocese in 1870. Until 1908 it was subject to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, and was recognized by the state in 1873. A state-funded seminary was opened in 1845.

Beginning in the late 19th century, numerous vocations to the priesthood and to missionary religious orders developed in the diocese. From 1880 until World War II diocesan priests traveled to German and French dioceses, to Norway and to the United States. However, vocations dropped sharply after the mid-1900s. By 2000 there were 215 diocesan and 80 religious priests administering to the duchy's 275 parishes, while 17 brothers and 734 sisters performed educational and other social ministrations. Because of the shortage of clergy, the Church began to increase the level of participation among lay Catholics.

In addition to funding private religious schools, the state mandated religious instruction in public primary and secondary schools. A convention signed in 1997 provided local autonomy in such religious education, and allowed parents to choose between Roman Catholicism or ethics. In accordance with the Napoleonic French CONCORDAT OF 1801 and the Luxembourg constitution of Oct. 17, 1868, Catholic churches, as well as churches of other denominations, were funded by the state. Despite its majority status, Catholicism was not a state religion. Protestants in Luxembourg were predominately of Lutheran and Calvinist denominations; minority faiths included Jews, Greek and Russian Orthodox, Muslim and Anglican.

Luxembourg's influential role within the European community was stressed by Pope John Paul II during an ad limina visit by Luxembourg Archbishop Fernand Franck in December of 1997. The pope had special praise for Luxembourg's support of Catholic social doctrines amid a materialist society. Archbishop Franck continued to remain an active voice in Europe's Catholic community, noting at the 1999 European Synod that the focus of the Church in the 21st century should be to assist in the creation of stable ''multicultural and multi-religious societies'' that would benefit people of all faiths.

Bibliography: C. WAMPACH, Urkunden- und Quellenbuch zur Geschichte der altluxemburgischen Territorien bis zur burgundischen Zeit, 10 v. (Luxembourg 1935–55). R. M. STAUD and J. REUTER, Die kirchlichen Kunstdenkmäler der Diözese Luxemburg (Luxembourg 1935–). C. J. HERSCHEN, Manuel d'histoire nationale, rev. N. MARGUE and J. MEYERS (5th ed. Luxembourg 1947), Eng. tr. A. H. COOPER-PRICHARD (Luxembourg 1950). E. DONCKEL, Die Kirche in Luxemburg von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart (Luxembourg 1950). A. HEIDERSCHEID, Aspects de sociologie religieuse du diocèse de Luxembourg, 2 v. (Luxembourg 1961–62). Bilan du Monde, 2:570–572.

[V. CONZEMIUS/EDS.]

LUXEUIL, ABBEY OF

One of the most illustrious Irish foundations of the medieval period in east central France, Archdiocese of Besançon. In c. 590 the Irish missionary St. COLUMBAN established a monastic foundation on the site of the old Roman fort of Luxovium and dedicated it to St. Peter. He was succeeded as abbot by EUSTACE OF LUXEUIL and then by Waldebert, who introduced the BENEDICTINE RULE at Luxeuil. The abbey became an influential religious and cultural center of eastern France. During the Arabic invasion (732), however, the monastery suffered a lapse and dispersal of its members. This epoch of destruction appears to have been the occasion also of a loss of a number of valuable MSS from the abbey's library. Fortunately, several of them have been recovered and are presently preserved in various libraries. Among these works is the Lectionary of Luxeuil, dating from the 7th century and first recognized by the Benedictine scholar Mabillon in 1685. The Lectionary (Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale lat. 9427) is important for its evidence of Mozarabic and Bobbian liturgical influences and practices of the time. (See P. Salmon's critical edition, Le Lectionnaire de Luxeuil, 2 v. Rome 1944-53.) Luxeuil's SCRIPTORIUM seems to have been an important paleographic center, originating a distinctive book known as the "Script of Luxeuil" (E. A. Lowe, Revue Bénédictine 63:132–142).

The abbey was restored under CHARLEMAGNE but was again subject to incursion, this time from the NOR-MANS, who sacked it in 888. From the 10th century, the abbots were princes of the empire. The abbey's discipline and economic status declined toward the end of the 15th century as a result of COMMENDATION. This condition of affairs continued until a reformation was instigated in 1631 by Abbot Philip of Baume and the abbey incorporated into the BENEDICTINE congregation of Saint-Vanne. With the coming of the French Revolution, Luxeuil, like most of the religious houses of France, was suppressed (1790). Today, Luxeuil's main buildings still stand and house a diocesan minor seminary. The abbey church, which dates from the 14th century, dominates the scene and has, since 1926, been designated a minor basilica.

Bibliography: Gallia Christiana 15:144–162. E. DE BEAUSÉJOUR, Le Monastère de Luxeuil, l'église abbatiale (Besançon 1891). H. BEAUMONT, Étude historique sur l'abbaye de Luxeuil, (590–1790) (Luxeuil 1895). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 9.2:2722–87. A. BOSSUAT, "Philippe le Bon et l'abbaye de Luxeuil," Annales de Bourgogne 9 (1937) 7–23. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1684–85. B. DELLA CHIESA, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 2:756. D. MIS-ONNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1246–47.

[B. F. SCHERER]

LWANGA, CHARLES, ST.

One of the 22 UGANDA MARTYRS; b. Buddu County, Uganda, c. 1860; d. Namugongo, Uganda, June 3, 1886. Lwanga first learned of the Catholic faith from two retainers in the court of chief Mawulugungu. While a catechumen he entered the royal household of the Kabaka of Buganda in 1884 as the assistant to Joseph Mukasa, the majordomo in charge of the young court pages. On the night of Mukasa's martyrdom by order of the new Kabaka, Mwanga, Lwanga requested and received baptism (Nov. 15, 1885). During the succeeding months, when it was most difficult to communicate with priests, he protected the pages from Mwanga's perverted demands. He instructed and encouraged the youths and, at the moment of crisis, baptized the catechumens. When persecution started anew (May 1886), Lwanga was arrested with the Christian pages, after making with them a public profession of faith. During the march to Namugongo he was roughly treated. He was singled out for a particularly cruel death by slow fire. With 21 others he was beatified (June 6, 1920) and canonized (Oct. 18, 1964). Pius XI declared him patron of youth and Catholic Action for most of tropical Africa (June 22, 1934).

Feast: June 3.

Bibliography: J. P. THOONEN, Black Martyrs (London 1941). J. F. FAUPEL, African Holocaust (New York 1962). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 (Rome 1964) 901–912.

[J. F. FAUPEL]

LYING

An act contrary to TRUTHFULNESS, or the virtue of veracity, consisting in the communication to another of a judgment that is not in accord with what the one who communicates thinks to be true.

Nature. In its most common and explicit form, lying involves either spoken or written words; but it is possible to lie in using other forms of communication, for example, in gestures or in actions that involve a pretension to distinguished qualities which a person does not possess. The communication of something other than what one holds to be true is essential to lying, although what is said need not be contrary to objective truth. A lie differs from an erroneous statement. It can exist even though what is said happens to be in accord with fact; on the other hand, despite objective error, a communication is not a lie unless the speaker is aware that what he says is false.

It has been disputed whether the intention to deceive is essential to a lie. Actual deception, of course, is not, since this is the effect of lying rather than the act itself. But as to the intention, some Scotists have taken St. Augustine's words (De mend. 4) "with a will to deceive" as equally essential to lying as the other part of his statement, "the enunciation of something false." Judged in its immediate context, as well as in that of his other writings, St. Augustine's statement is a restricted affirmation about harmful lying rather than a definition of lying in general. St. Thomas clearly taught that the will to deceive was not essential to lying (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 110.1), and Scotus appears to have been in accord with this view. Some Scotists, however, claiming the authority of St. Augustine, taught that the intent to deceive is of the essence of lying rather than a property of it. Almost all theologians, nevertheless, follow St. Thomas in his interpertation of St. Augustine upon this point, and affirm that a deliberately false utterance is the essence of a lie, but that the intention to deceive belongs to the perfection of lying, not to its essence.

If deception or the intent to deceive is not essential to lying, there can be a lie that deceives no one, and that is told without an intention to deceive. On the other hand, deception can occur where no lie is actually told. For example, a person could tell a truth with sufficient clarity to avoid making a false statement and sufficient ambiguity and evasiveness to avoid revealing a truth which he wants to keep hidden. The hearer might misinterpret what is said and so be deceived, yet the speaker has not lied (see MENTAL RESERVATION).

Kinds of Lying. From the point of view of the virtuous "mean," formally constitutive of truthfulness, lying is opposed to truthfulness by excess or defect. Excess consists in boasting, or in the willful exaggeration of a truth. Defect occurs in disparagement or "irony."

The more important division of the lie is based upon its effect, or the motive of the one who lies. Least among lies is that which is told in jest or for the purpose of amusement (mendacium iocosum). If a story is obviously fiction, then there is no lie, since the literary genre of a story requires only internal consistency, not conformity to reality. But if illusion is allowed to substitute for reality, or if a story leaves a reader confusing fact with fiction, there has been a violation of truthfulness.

A more serious offense against truthfulness is the lie whose author intends some useful good, and to achieve it is willing to speak falsely. Useful and harmless according to strict justice, the so-called "officious" lie (mendacium officiosum) is intended to gain some good or to protect oneself or others from harm. The motive in this case could be commendable from a moral point of view. This would mitigate the malice of the act, but if a lie is intrinsically evil, it cannot become a good act, however virtuous its motive, for the end cannot justify the means. The most malicious kind of lie is that which is directly and explicitly intended to do harm to another. This is the "pernicious" lie (mendacium perniciosum).

Moral Evaluation

The morality of lying can be considered either from the point of view of authority, or from that of rational argument. In surveying the opinion of moral authorities, profane and sacred, account must be taken of the fact that different authorities, in condemning the lie, may have had in mind some specific form of lying, and not the lie in general.

Plato and Aristotle. Plato, in the Republic, appears to have regarded lying as a socially subversive practice when indulged in by private citizens, but that the privilege of lying for the public good should be accorded to rulers (Republic, 388). Aristotle, on the other hand, declared that falsehood was of its own nature (intrinsically?) bad and reprehensible (Eth. Nic. 4.7).

The Scriptures. The sinfulness of lying is attested to in a number of passages in Sacred Scripture: in the OT, Prv 6.12, 17; Ps 5.7; Sir 7.13; Wis 1.11; in the NT, Eph 4.25; Col 3.9. The scriptual evidence, however, is not satisfactory, because it is not clear that what is condemned is the lie as such, i.e., as unqualified by the malice of injustice. In some cases, at least, the sacred writer must have had in mind only the pernicious lie, since the degree of malice he attributes to it is far greater than traditional doctrine and common sense would allow for a lie that intends or causes no harm. For example: "You destroy all who speak falsehood; the bloodthirsty and the deceitful the Lord abhors" (Ps 5.7). And: "A lying mouth destroys the soul" (Wis 1.11). Thus the ambiguity of the Scriptures upon this matter has left room for debate both in patristic and in modern times.

In Patristic and Scholastic Times. In the patristic age, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and St. John Chrysostom in the East, and St. Hilary and Cassian in the West seem to have held (but not without some ambiguity) that in certain exceptional cases a lie was justifiable. St. Augustine held to the stricter view that a lie is intrinsically evil. In this he was followed by SS. Thomas Aquinas, Raymond of Peñafort, and Antoninus, as well as by Scotus, Cajetan, Suárez, John of St. Thomas, and by all but a few modern Catholic theologians.

Moral Gravity. Although Christian tradition has, in the main, held firmly to the conviction that a lie is intrinsically evil, the judgment of moralists is relatively lenient with regard to the degree of malice inherent in the lie. The common teaching is that a lie, deliberately told, is per se no more than venially sinful. It is damaging in some degree to man's social good, but it does not strike at the very existence of that good, as do theft, adultery, and murder. However, circumstances might involve the violation of virtues other than truthfulness in a particular lie. For example, the pernicious lie violates justice and charity as well as truthfulness, and for that reason is a grave sin when the damage done or attempted is notable. Similarly, a lie could be a mortal sin because it causes serious SCANDAL, or because it is contrary to faith or to the virtue of religion (see PERJURY), or because, in serious matter, it violates another's strict right to be informed of the truth.

Modern Controversy. Dissatisfied with the theory and the use of mental reservations in order to conceal the truth in difficult cases, some authors have accepted the admissibility of an intentionally false statement whenever the hearer has not a strict right in justice to know the truth. For them the malice of lying is not the violation of a personal obligation to veracity, but a violation of a strict right on the part of another to be informed of a particular truth. H. Grotius and S. Pufendorf, among Protestant thinkers, as well as some Catholics have maintained that in a case of necessity a false statement, falsiloquium, may be without moral fault. The falsiloquium is for them a "psychological" rather than a "moral" lie, and the latter they continue to reprobate along with all other Christian thinkers. Since the strict obligation not to lie does not depend upon the strict right of another to know a truth but upon one's nature as a rational social being, theologians generally have rejected the distinction between psychological and moral lies as unfounded in sound moral theory, at least if it is made to rest upon the hearer's right to be accurately informed.

Others, acknowledging the obligation to speak the truth, if one speaks at all—and this independently of any right on the part of the one to whom a statement is made—nevertheless point out that a person obliged to speak only the truth may also be under an obligation to conceal a truth, and this latter obligation may in some cases be more urgent and more sacred than the former. If we suppose a case in which the truth, or evasion, or silence, would bring harm upon a neighbor, the obligation in charity to prevent this, they say, would take precedence over the obligation in veracity, and the latter would be suspended and cease for the time being to bind.

However, this theory provides escape from moral perplexity only when a strict obligation exists to conceal the truth; it does nothing to enable an individual to protect his privacy against prying or intrusive people, a thing that most of those who defend lying in certain circumstances would like to do. But the more important objection to it is that it cannot be adopted without abandoning the traditional doctrine that a lie is intrinsically evil, so that the reaction of the Christian conscience to it is likely to be that of St. Augustine: "He who says that there are some just lies must be regarded as saying that there are some just sins, and, consequently, that some things which are unjust are just. What could be more absurd?" (C. mend. 15.31.)

Argument from Reason. The most fundamental argument is that drawn from man's social nature. The social order that human nature requires for its proper development and fulfillment demands that mutual trust and confidence and a general friendly good will should prevail between men. This, however, is undermined not only by the pernicious lie that damages the rights and reputations of others, but also by officious and jocose lies, because if one were under no obligation to refrain from such lies, an individual's confidence in the communications made to him would be considerably lowered. Every statement would have to be weighed with suspicion, and this would, in effect, debase the currency of communication. Man's faculty of speech or communication would be perverted in the sense that the prevalent mendacity would make it impossible or difficult to communicate with others. This is a situation that has in fact come to pass in matters with regard to which "white" or "social" lies are in common use. Words lose their meaning and their capacity to convey thought. Richard Cabot has pointed out the dilemma that physicians create for themselves when, for humane reasons, they lie to patients suffering from incurable disease (see bibliography). When this practice comes to be generally known, the physician has no effective way of reassuring a patient who suspects that he has contracted such a disease and that his physician is concealing this fact.

Difficult Cases

It cannot be denied that the doctrine of the intrinsic malice of the lie can involve a conscientious person in moral dilemmas. However, the frequency and seriousness of these troublesome situations should not be exaggerated, and from most of them escape of one kind or another is available without lying.

The "Social" Lie. In many cases a statement, whose literal sense is not in accord with facts as the speaker knows them, is nevertheless not a lie because social convention permits certain kinds of expressions to be used, and requires people of good sense to understand them, in other than a literal sense. This conventional meaning is not false; ultimately all meaning that attaches to words is determined by convention. No prudent person would take in their strict and literal sense complimentary forms of address such as "your devoted servant" or even "yours." Nor would a serious person take seriously many of the amenities common in social intercourse: compliments about dress or appearance, or the remarks about the pleasantness of an evening made by a departing guest.

Similarly the statement made by one answering the door or the telephone that a member of the family is not at home has acquired by general use (or misuse) a certain objective ambiguity. It may either mean that the person is literally not at home, or that, though at home, he does not want to see or talk with the caller, but wishes to signify his refusal in the polite manner sanctioned by social custom. In this situation, however, the status of the person calling could affect the objective sense of the statement. If he is a person who should not be refused, he will be entitled to understand the statement in its literal sense, and if the speaker knows it to be untrue, it will be a lie.

Professional Secrecy. Mental reservation, or the restriction of one's understanding of the meaning of a question put to him, and the sense of his reply, will enable a person to avoid other difficulties. Clergymen, lawyers, physicians, nurses, pharmacists, secretaries, and others are obliged to professional secrecy with regard to certain information that they may possess. This is understood by all reasonably well-informed people. When such a person is questioned about matter he knows only under professional secrecy, he can legitimately (and charitably) interpret the inquiry to mean: Have you any communicable knowledge about this subject? He may, consequently, frame his answer accordingly, and deny that he has knowledge of it. Because of the objective nature of the situation, the hearer ought to understand the statement to be ambiguous. It may be an absolute denial of knowledge, or it may only be a denial of communicable knowledge.

Non-Professional Secrets. It seems unreasonable to restrict the use of this kind of evasion to the protection of professional secrets. Others besides professional people have in their keeping secrets it would be sinful, even gravely so, to reveal. For example, revelation of the hidden sin of another could amount to a mortal sin of DETRACTION. Everyone should be aware of the obligation to secrecy that exists in certain cases, and should be sensitive to the possibility that questions he asks might put another in a moral quandary. A well-intentioned and reasonable man can therefore be understood, when he puts a question, to be asking for information that his hearer is morally free to divulge. Hence a denial of knowledge could reasonably be understood as objectively ambiguous, just as in the case of the professional secret.

Other Dilemmas. There is another type of difficulty in which ambiguity provides no refuge. For example, let us suppose that a man is hidden from a gang of murderers intent upon killing him, and his friend is questioned concerning his whereabouts, or that a person working with the underground in an area occupied by the enemy is interrogated by enemy officials about the resistance movement. No doubt the type of evasion discussed above could legitimately be used in these cases also, but their particular difficulty consists in this that no simple denial of knowledge would be likely to suffice to put the miscreants off the scent. Denials would need to be backed by strong, circumstantial affirmations that no stretch of ingenuity could classify as ambiguous, and perhaps positive misinformation would have to be invented and palmed off for true. If one holds to the doctrine of the intrinsic malice of the lie, there would seem to be no escape possible in these cases, unless it lies in questioning whether, in such circumstances, the idea of true human speech or communication is verified.

A lie is essentially a false communication. A man, speaking falsely to himself, does not lie. Similarly, it could be argued, it is no lie to speak falsely to another when some circumstance prevents one's speech from being, in a true sense of the word, a communication. As has been shown, false communication is immoral because it subverts the mutual trust and confidence that should exist between men, and tends to make communication impossible. Now in the extremely difficult situations being considered, there is no mutual trust or confidence to destroy. In fact, a maximum of distrust prevails between the parties, and no man in such a position could prudently take the words of the other at their face value. In such a case, words would cease, to a degree, to be a medium for the exchange of thought. Communication would be broken down, and to the extent in which the communication of mind with mind has become impossible, it would be equally impossible to realize the idea of a lie. In particular cases the breakdown of communication or its degree might be difficult to determine, but it seems incontestable that if no communication in the ordinary sense of the word is possible, there can be no lie.

However, these cases are altogether exceptional, and if special norms are found to apply to them, these must not be extended to include situations in which one cannot refrain from lying without involving himself (or even others) in trouble and difficulty. The practice of virtue of any kind is likely to require a measure of heroism in some circumstances. At times the obligation to truthfulness may impose some hardship, but the endurance of this is a small price to pay for the blessings which society and individuals enjoy when its members "speak the truth each one with his neighbor" (Eph 5.25).

Bibliography: Augustine, "Lying" (De mend.), tr. M. S. MULDOWNEY, Treatises on Various Subjects, ed. R. J. DEFERRARI (Fathers of the Church, 16; New York 1952); "Against Lying" (C. mend.), tr. H. B. JAFFEE, ibid. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 110; Quodl. 8.6.4; In 5 eth. 4.15. J. A. DORSZYNSKI, Catholic Teaching about the Morality of Falsehood (CUA Stud. Sac. Theol. 2d ser. 16; Washington 1948). J. H. NEWMAN, Apologia pro vita sua (Garden City, NY 1956). J. BROSNAN, "The Malice of Lying," The Irish Ecclesiastical Record 4 (1914) 377–392. L. GODEFROY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 10.1:555–569. R. CABOT, Honesty (New York 1938).

[D. HUGHES]

sion of uniting African-American culture and the Catholic Church. While Lyke's service to the People of God was cut short by cancer, he is remembered as an outstanding leader whose sagacity continues to inspire African American Catholics.

Bibliography: Lyke's writings include: "When the Poor Evangelize the Church," Origins 11:3 (June 5, 1980) 33-38; Say Not "I Am Too Young!," (Cleveland 1990); "The Family in the Black Community," Origins 16:28 (Dec. 25, 1986) 511-516; "So Stood Those Who Have Gone Down Through the Ages," Pastoral Reflection on the Black Family (Cleveland 1986); "A Black Perspective on the National Catechetical Directory" (Ph.D. diss., Union Graduate School, 1981); in collaboration with others: What We Have Seen and Heard (Cincinnati 1984) and Lead Me, Guide Me: The African American Catholic Hymnal (Chicago 1987).

[G. DOLAN]

LYKE, JAMES PATTERSON

Fourth archbishop of Atlanta, GA; b. Chicago, Illinois, Feb. 18, 1939; d. Atlanta, Dec. 27, 1992; educ. Quincy College, Quincy, Illinois, and Antonianum, Rome. James Patterson Lyke professed in the Order of Friars Minor on June 21, 1963 and was ordained a priest on June 24, 1966. In 1967, St. Joseph's Theological Seminary granted him the Master of Divinity degree. Lyke served from 1972 to 1977 as a member of the committee that drafted the National Catechetical Directory, Sharing the Light of Faith [1979]. He was also president of the National Black Catholic Clergy Caucus. On Aug. 1, 1979, Lyke was ordained bishop to minister as auxiliary in the Diocese of Cleveland, Ohio, and episcopal vicar of its Urban Region. In 1990 the Holy See named Lyke apostolic administrator, sede vacante, for the Archdiocese of Atlanta, and he was installed as archbishop of Atlanta on June 24, 1991.

Lyke's interest in liturgical life spurred him, in 1987, to coordinate the development of a new hymnal, Lead Me, Guide Me, which unites Roman Catholic hymnody and the rich tradition of African-American music. He took note of the values that had originated among and been handed down by the Swahili-speaking tribes of Africa, developing them in a pastoral reflection, Say not, "I am too young!," addressed to African-American Catholic Youth. In addition to pastoral letters on the sanctity of the family, "So Stood Those Who Have Gone Down through the Ages," and on the sanctity of the unborn, "Precious Lord, Precious Life," he cooperated with other African-American bishops in a joint pastoral letter, published in 1984, on evangelization in the black community, What We Have Seen and Heard.

The strong thread connecting the pastoral efforts of James Patterson Lyke, the pastor and bishop, was his vi-

LYNCH, BAPTISTA, MOTHER

Ursuline foundress; b. Cheraw, S.C., Nov. 2, 1823; d. Columbia, S.C., July 28, 1887. Ellen was the daughter of Conlaw and Eleanor (Neison) Lynch, and the sister of Patrick N. Lynch, Bishop (1858-82) of Charleston, S.C. She attended the Ursuline Academy in Charleston. When the community transferred to Ohio, she entered the novitiate in the Ursuline Convent of the Assumption, Banks Street, Cincinnati, in 1848. As Baptista Aloysius, she made her profession on Nov. 15, 1850. This community disbanded and she was transferred to St. Martin's Convent, Fayetteville, Ohio. When Bishop Lynch invited the Ursulines to South Carolina in 1858, she led a group of sisters to Columbia to take over the Immaculate Conception Academy and Convent. The daughters of important Catholic families in the South attended the academy during the Civil War, but it was destroyed when Columbia was burned by Gen. William T. Sherman's army. As refugees, the nuns and their pupils moved to a farm, called Valle Crucis, outside the city of Columbia. Subsistence was difficult, and in an effort to lessen the burden, Mother Baptista sent some of her nuns to open a school in Tuscaloosa, Ala., in 1866. This venture failed and in 1872 a parochial school was begun in Columbia. In 1887 a convent sufficient for the whole community was obtained in the city, and the Valle Crucis Convent was closed. Mother Baptista died ten days after bringing the nuns back to the city.

Bibliography: Archives, Diocese of Charleston.

[R. C. MADDEN]

LYNCH, JOHN JOSEPH

Missionary, archbishop; b. near Clones, County Monaghan, Ireland, Feb. 6, 1816; d. Toronto, Canada,

May 12, 1888. He was educated at the Academy of St. Joseph, Clondalkin, entered the College of the Lazarists at Castleknock (1835), and was sent to France to the Seminary of Saint-Lazare, Paris (1837). After ordination at Maynooth, Ireland, June 9, 1843, he worked as a home missionary until 1847, when he was sent to the U.S. He served as president of St. Mary's of the Barrens (1847-54), a Lazarist college in Missouri, and founded the Seminary of Our Lady of the Angels at Niagara Falls, N.Y. (1856). Lynch was named coadjutor to Bp. Armand F. M. de Charbonnel of Toronto, and consecrated titular bishop of Echynos (Nov. 20, 1859). After succeeding to the See of Toronto in April 1860, he concerned himself with developing education within the diocese. At Vatican Council I (1869-70) he supported immediate definition of papal infallibility. He became the first archbishop of Toronto on March 25, 1870, receiving the pallium at Rome. Under his direction the First Provincial Council (1873) adopted the decrees of the Council of Quebec. He promoted charitable institutions and was active in securing the passage of the Separate School Bill (1863).

Bibliography: Jubilee Volume: The Archdiocese of Toronto (Toronto 1892). H. C. MACKEOWN, The Life and Labours of Most Rev. John Joseph Lynch, D.D. Cong. Miss., First Archbishop of Toronto (Toronto 1886).

[J. T. FLYNN]

LYNCH, PATRICK NELSON

Third bishop of Charleston, South Carolina; b. County Monaghan, Ireland, March 10, 1817; d. Charleston, Feb. 26, 1882. Lynch was the son of Conlaw Peter and Eleanor (Neison) Lynch, who emigrated to the United States in 1819, settling in Cheraw, South Carolina. He attended the local primary school and then Cheraw Academy until 1829, when he entered the Seminary of St. John the Baptist in Charleston. In 1833, Bp. John ENGLAND sent him to the College of the Propaganda in Rome, where he distinguished himself in languages, on one occasion giving the annual address in Hebrew before the Holy Father. He was ordained in Rome on April 4, 1840, by Cardinal Jacob Fransoni, prefect of the Congregation of the Propaganda.

Lynch was became assistant at the Charleston cathedral, editor of the diocesan paper, the United States Catholic Miscellany, and professor at the Seminary of St. John the Baptist. Upon England's death in 1842, Abp. Francis P. KENRICK of Baltimore considered Lynch as a possible successor to England, but he judged his ill health and youth as obstacles. From 1845 to 1847 Lynch was pastor of St. Mary's Church; he then became rector of the cathedral and of the Seminary of St. John the Baptist, a position he held until the seminary closed in 1851. In December of 1845 he was appointed, with James CORCORAN and Augustine HEWITT, to collect the writings of John England for publication. He supervised the erection of the Cathedral of St. John and St. Finbar (1850) and was treasurer and chaplain of St. Mary's Relief Hospital, a special project for the aid of fever victims (1852–53). In November of 1854, Bp. Ignatius Reynolds, who was failing in health, appointed him administrator of the diocese, an office he held until he was appointed to the see on Dec. 17, 1857.

Lynch was consecrated in the Cathedral of St. John and St. Finbar, March 14, 1858, by Archbishop Kenrick. During the Civil War, a fire in Charleston on Dec. 11, 1861, destroyed church property, notably the cathedral; the later siege of Charleston and the march of Sherman's army across the state added to the losses. The war brought new duties, no small part of which was attending prisoners of war. In 1864 the Confederate Government prevailed upon Lynch, as special commissioner of the Confederate States, to put its cause before Pius IX. Lynch accepted the commission, hoping his efforts might be conducive to peace. By the time he reached Rome, however, the Confederacy was failing, and he deemed it inadvisable to present his credentials, so he was received by the Holy Father simply as the bishop of Charleston. He was pardoned for his complicity by Pres. Andrew Johnson on Aug. 4, 1865, but he was not able to get back to his diocese until late November.

To repair the losses in his diocese, Lynch proposed to raise the necessary funds by begging in the metropolitan areas of the country, a program that occupied him the rest of his life. The establishment in 1868 of the vicariate of North Carolina relieved him of some of his responsibility. He attended VATICAN COUNCIL I (1869–70) and prepared a series of articles that were published in Catholic World. His published work also included many articles in American Catholic Quarterly Review.

Bibliography: Lynch Papers, Archives of the Diocese of Charleston.

[R. C. MADDEN]

LYNDWOOD, WILLIAM

Bishop and canonist; b. Linwood, Leicestershire, England, 1375; d. Oct. 21, 1446. Lyndwood was educated at Gonville Hall, Cambridge, where he obtained a doctor's degree in both civil and Canon Law. After ordination in 1407 he held benefices, some concurrently, in various dioceses. On occasions between 1417 and 1441 he was king's envoy to Castile, Burgundy, etc.; in 1432 he became keeper of the privy seal; and in 1442, bishop of St. David's until his death.

Lyndwood's only extant work is his great Provinciale, begun in 1422 and completed in 1430; it is a digest with commentary of the synodal constitutions of 14 archbishops of Canterbury, from Langton in 1222 to Chichele (to whom the work is dedicated). As chancellor of the archbishop of Canterbury and an auditor of causes (1414–17), as a prolocutor of the clergy in convocation (1419-21, 1424-26), and as an official of the Court of Canterbury (1417–31), Lyndwood had a wide experience of the workings of the Canon Law in England. His Provinciale, therefore, has the practical object of helping lawyers to understand the most frequently quoted texts of provincial legislation, and, in general, of seeing whether and how the edicts of a non-sovereign legislator, such as an archbishop, could be harmonized with a large body of law that the legislator has no power to repeal or to override.

The Provinciale (seu Constitutiones Angliae) was printed at Oxford about 1485 to 1490; at Westminster, by Wynkyn de Worde in 1496 and 1499; and then eight times between 1501 and 1534 at Paris, Antwerp, and London. The last and best-known edition is that of Oxford, 1679, to which there was attached JOHN OF ACTON'S gloss on the Legatine Constitutions.

Bibliography: F. W. MAITLAND, Roman Canon Law in the Church of England (London 1898) 1–50. A. OGLE, The Canon Law in Medieval England: An Examination of William Lyndwood's Provinciale in Reply to the Late Prof. F. W. Maitland (London 1912). C. R. CHENEY, "William Lyndwood's Provinciale," The Jurist 21 (1961) 405–434. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Cambridge before 1500 (Cambridge 1963) 379–381, 679. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1191–93.

[L. E. BOYLE]

LYONESE RITE

The historical pre-Vatican II liturgical rite of the Archdiocese of Lyons. This article treats the rite's history and liturgical specialties.

History. Before the 4th century there is no evidence of a stereotyped liturgy in Lyons; the early Christian immigrants from EPHESUS did not initiate the Lyonese rite. Except for some few details, the rite owes nothing to the Gallican rite, even though the latter prevailed in Lyons from the 5th to the 7th century. The Church at Lyons suffered much from the Saracen invasion (725) and the levies of CHARLES MARTEL. For a number of years Lyons did not even have a bishop. While Bishop Ado (c. 767–c. 797) possibly attempted to introduce the Roman rite, the recognized father of the Lyonese rite was LEIDRADUS (798–814). Charlemagne directed this monk from his school at Aachen to introduce liturgical worship at Lyons according to the usage of Aachen's chapel. Aachen followed the rite of the Church at Metz, a Roman liturgical center after the return of St. CHRODEGANG OF METZ from Rome in 751. A cleric from Metz assisted Leidradus in his liturgical reforms at Lyons. Hence the Lyonese rite is not Ephesine or Gallican, but Roman in origin.

Leidradus's successor, Bishop Agobard (814–840), maintained local customs and introduced corrections that made the rite a Carolingian variant of the Roman rite. In the 11th century the Romano-German pontifical exerted the last significant influence on the formation of the rite of Lyons. The prototype of the Lyonese liturgical books is the 10th-century Alcuin edition of the Gregorian Sacramentary, which continued to be reproduced with minor variations down to the Missal of Bishop De Marquemont (1620).

The neo-Gallican period for the Lyonese liturgy began with Archbishop C. de Neuville's Breviary (1695). A pandering to neo-Gallican tastes also appeared in Archbishop C. de Rochebonne's Missal (1737). Archbishop A. de Montazet further destroyed Lyons's traditional rite by introducing the liturgical books of Paris (Missal, 1768; Breviary, 1772) while retaining the Lyonese rubrics and sanctoral. In 1776 Parliament's enforcement of these books brought about their general use in Lyons.

The Lyonese liturgy reached its nadir during the FRENCH REVOLUTION. Bishop A. Lamourette established constitutional worship in 1791. His destruction of the cathedral's apse altar and erection of a new altar at the transept confused rubrics in the cathedral ceremonial books until 1936, when the altar was restored to its original position. Pagan worship of the goddess of reason, begun in 1793, was followed by a restoration of the Catholic religion and Montazet's neo-Gallican books in 1799.

Pius IX resolved a three-way controversy regarding the future of the Lyonese liturgy (return to the traditional, Gallican, or Roman liturgy) in favor of Cardinal M. de Bonald's traditional position (1863). Although the 1866 Missale Romano-Lugdunense retained many of Montazet's Prefaces, Proses, and Propers, it used Marquemont's Missal (1620) as its model. A revised edition approved by the Congregation of Rites appeared in 1904 as the Missale Romanum in quo antiqui ritus Lugdunensis servantur.

In 1864 the Roman Breviary of Pius V, with a diocesan Proper, replaced Montazet's Breviary; the ancient ceremonial for the Office, however, was kept. The Ritual had nothing distinctive about it except for an unusually prolix rite for the Sacrament of the Sick (12 anointings).

Liturgical Specialties. Although basically the same as that of the classical Roman rite, the Lyonese Mass had enough variants to make it distinctive. Such variations could be seen in the shorter prayers at the foot of the altar, in more frequent proses (20), in the slightly varied Offertory prayers with an Epiclesis-like prayer before the Suscipe, sancta Trinitas. The 1904 Missal contained, besides the Roman Prefaces, seven others. From the Unde et memores to the Canon's doxology, the celebrant assumed a cruciform position. He held the Host over the chalice from the doxology to sicut in caelo of the Pater, at which point the little elevation occurred. The Pater's embolism was said or sung aloud. The Agnus Dei preceded the Commingling and was said with the Host particle held above the chalice. Lyons reversed the order of Rome's ablution prayers.

At solemn Mass the three official ministers were assisted by extra priests, deacons, and subdeacons, each properly vested. Each official minister had from two to six co-ministers, depending upon the solemnity of the feast. This ceremonial CONCELEBRATION occurred on important feast days. Between the Epistle and Gospel there was a rite for testing the wine at a pontifical Mass. After the Gospel all the clergy in choir kissed the Gospel book. The subdeacon held the paten as usual but with his maniple. At the beginning of the Offertory the priests offered the celebrant a host; after the incensing of the oblation, chapter members offered a coin. The celebrant incensed above the altar; the deacon incensed below. A solemn blessing followed the Pater's Embolism at a pontifical Mass. After reception of Communion at solemn Mass, the sacristan administered wine as a mouth ablution. The Blessed Sacrament after Communion was carried in procession to a repository altar.

Bibliography: D. BUENNER, L'Ancienne liturgie romaine: Le Rite lyonnais (Lyons 1934), the basic work. A. A. KING, Liturgies of the Primatial Sees (Milwaukee 1957). L. MOILLE, "The Liturgy of Lyons," The Month 151 (1928) 402–408.

[R. X. REDMOND/EDS.]

LYONNET, STANISLAUS

Biblical scholar; b. 1902; d. 1986. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1919, and was ordained a priest in 1934. After taking a licentiate in classics, Lyonnet taught Greek for three years at the Haute-Études (Paris) where he afterwards took up the study of ancient languages under the guidance of two famous linguists, A. Meillet and E. Benveniste. He graduated in 1933 with a doctoral dissertation on "Le parfait en arménien classique." After theological studies at the Jesuit theologate in Lyon-Fourvière, he went to the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome. In 1943

he defended his thesis on "Les origines de la version arménienne de la Bible et le Diatessaron" (published in 1950). He remained at the Institute, where he was appointed a professor, and taught until 1980.

During his very long and prolific career he wrote several books and many articles. Among his works are La vie selon l'Esprit, condition du chrétien (Paris 1965) with I. de la Potterie; Les étapes du salut selon l'épître aux Romains (Paris 1969); Sin, Redemption and Sacrifice: A Biblical and Patristic Study, Analecta biblica 48 (Rome 1970), with L. Sabourin; Le message de l'épître aux Romains (Paris 1971); "Péché—dans le judaïsme, le Nouveau Testament; péché originel" Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplément, v. VII (1966) 480-567. He is best known, however, for his translation of the Epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians in the Bible de Jérusalem (1953). At a time when most scholars saw the key to the interpretation of the New Testament in the Mysteries and Gnosis, Lyonnet was one of the first to recognize the importance of the Jewish background. Although he did not himself study the Jewish translations (Targumim) and commentaries (Midrashim) of the Old Testament, nevertheless, he introduced some of the famous experts (M. McNamara, J. A. Fitzmyer, R. Le Déaut) to the study of Intertestamental Judaism.

Lyonnet's openness to the views of others was well known but was unacceptable to some of his Roman colleagues who had rejected literary criticism. His articles "Le sense de eph'hō en Rm 5,12 et l'exégèse des Pères grecs," Biblica 36 (1955) 436-456, and "Le péché originel et l'exégèse de Rm 5,12-14," Recherches de Science Religieuse 44 (1956) 63-84, both gave rise to criticisms from conservative scholars. He was at one time suspended from teaching for two years (1962-64), but endured that trial with a sincere obedience and a real spiritual freedom. He took advantage of that period to give many talks to the French-speaking bishops who participated in Vatican Council II, and to assist them in many ways. A few years later, Pope Paul VI appointed him consultor to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. At the request of Pope John Paul II he gave the annual retreat at the Vatican during Lent, 1982.

[J.-N. ALETTI]

LYONS, COUNCILS OF

Two ecumenical councils held in Lyons, France. The first was concerned chiefly with Frederick II's struggle with the papacy, and the second, 29 years later, with the reunion of the Eastern and Western Churches.

The First Council. Pope INNOCENT IV summoned a General Council to meet at Lyons in June 1245. Innocent had fled from Emperor FREDERICK II, who like Barbarossa was bent on asserting imperial supremacy and had seized much papal territory, not to mention 100 prelates who were captured on their way to a Roman council in 1241. The emperor was ordered to appear at Lyons in order to defend himself from the charge of heresy.

The council opened June 26 and had three sessions: June 28, July 5, and July 17, 1245. In the first public session Innocent addressed an assembly of three patriarchs, 140 bishops, and a number of religious and seculars, including Baldwin II, the Latin emperor of Constantinople. The pope spoke on the "five wounds" of the Church: the sins of the clergy, the loss of Jerusalem, the Greek threat to the LATIN EMPIRE OF CONSTANTINOPLE, the Mongol (Tatar) invasion of Hungary, and especially Frederick's persecution (evident from the fact that few German or Sicilian bishops dared to attend). On July 5, Frederick's ambassador, Thaddeus of Suëssa, ably defended his lord, urging that no one should be condemned for heresy without being heard. Thaddeus could scarcely refute, however, the charge of Frederick's violence toward the bishops. A delay of 12 days (to July 17) was allowed for Thaddeus to consult with the emperor. Innocent spent the interval interviewing the bishops, allowing further time for the emperor's defense. When Frederick did not appear on July 17, the pope reviewed the case, and pronounced sentence of excommunication and deposition; most of the prelates signed the document. MATTHEW OF PARIS states that the electors were left free to choose a successor to Frederick but that the pope would arrange for Sicily (of which he was suzerain).

Plans were made to be ready for the Tatars; taxes were voted to aid the Holy Land as well as the Latin Empire. Some of the 22 constitutions dealt with judicial reform (those against usury and too frequent use of excommunication). The appeal of Thaddeus to a future general council met with a rebuke from Pope Innocent. Indeed the First Council of Lyons has been accepted as general only since the time of BELLARMINE (1542–1621).

The Second Council. Pope GREGORY X called the Second Council of Lyons in 1274. Considerable strife accompanied the extinction of the Hohenstaufen line, when Charles of ANJOU became king of Sicily. When Pope CLEMENT IV died in 1268, the cardinals allowed almost three years to pass before they could agree on the election of Teobaldo Visconti, who was away on a crusade in Acre. He returned to Rome to be ordained and crowned, and manifested great zeal for a crusade, reunion, and reform. Emperor MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS, who had retaken Constantinople in 1261, warmly welcomed legates from Gregory X. Charles of Anjou, however, was bent on a restoration of the Latin Empire in the East. It seemed to Michael that only the pope could control Charles, and that union of the Greeks with Rome was therefore vital to the safety of the Greek Empire. He wrote submissively to Gregory, but at the same time minimized the matter of reunion in dealing with his own churchmen.

On May 7, 1274, Gregory addressed some 200 prelates about the problems of the Holy Land, of union with the Greeks, and of reform, but the Greeks did not arrive until June 24 because of a shipwreck. GERMANUS II, the former patriarch of Constantinople, the archbishop of Nicaea, the chancellor, and others came in the emperor's name. They brought a letter from him giving his views and purporting to represent those of 50 archbishops and hundreds of bishops. At the fourth session (July 6) reunion was formally effected, the Greek representatives raising no objection to the FILIOQUE (defined in the last session), papal PRIMACY, PURGATORY, and the seven Sacraments (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 850-61). Michael's letter read publicly at this session declared his full acceptance of Roman faith, primacy, and the rest, but urged that "the Greek church be permitted to retain its symbol (creed) and its own rites." Gregory's tolerant attitude was appreciated by the emperor, who was convinced that he could gradually overcome the aversion of his clergy and people for Rome. The Franciscan cardinal St. BONAVENTURE, a leader in dealing with the Greeks, died July 15. Some four months earlier THOMAS AQUINAS had died en route to the council.

Gregory strove mightily to finance the crusade by a ten percent tax on clerical incomes. Dealing individually with the bishops he avoided a concerted outcry. The problem of clerical reform involved disputes and bickering between the friars and the bishops, and required judicious handling. The prohibition of 1215 against new religious foundations had been neglected, and restrictions were placed on certain orders, with an exception made for the FRANCISCANS and DOMINICANS, "known for their great service to the church." Another phase of reform emanating from the council was the famous rule of the conclave, meant to obviate delay of election after the death of the pope. It was decided that ten days after the pope dies, the cardinals must assemble to choose a successor. If after three days they have not reached a decision, their diet was to be curtailed. With some modification, the basic regulations of Gregory X are still followed.

The great khan of the Mongols sent legates to ask for help against Egypt. Efforts were made for the spread of the faith into the Far East through missionaries such as JOHN OF MONTE CORVINO. Three bishops were deposed for unworthiness. The union of Greeks and Latins proved unpopular in the East, and lasted until the death of Emperor Michael in 1282 (see EASTERN SCHISM). A change of personnel at Rome and Constantinople effected a change of heart; and crusading efforts proved ineffectual.

The 31 decrees usually attributed to Lyons II were actually published several months later (Nov. 1, 1274). H. Finke discovered (1891) that three decrees (13, 14, and 18) were added by Gregory X after the council had ended. He also found and edited the long-lost constitution, Zelus fidei, a series of decrees relating to Gregory's proposed crusade. The text of the constitution was further emended by the discoveries of S. Kuttner.

Bibliography: C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 5.2:1633–79; 6.1:153–209. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:1361–91. v. GRUMEL, ibid. 1391–1410. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K.

RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 6:1251-52. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304, 18 v. (London 1902-32) 14:60-80; 15:361-454. D. J. GEANAKOPLOS, Emperor Michael Palaeologus and the West, 1258-1282 (Cambridge, Mass. 1959) 258-304. H. JEDIN, Ecumenical Councils of the Catholic Church, tr. E. GRAF (New York 1960). F. DVORNIK, The Ecumenical Councils (New York 1961). H. J. SCHROEDER, Disciplinary Decrees of the General Councils (St. Louis 1937) 297-364, 585-606. H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖNMETZER (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 830-39, 850-61. Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta (Bologna-Freiburg 1962) 249-307. R. W. EMERY, "The Second Council of Lyons and the Mendicant Orders," American Catholic Historical Review 39 (1953-54) 257-71. J. M. POWELL, "Frederick II and the Church: A Revisionist View," ibid. 48 (1962-63) 487-97. S. KUTTNER, "Conciliar Law in the Making," Miscellanea Pio Paschini, 2 v. (Rome 1948-49) 2:39-81. D. M. NICOL, "The Byzantine Reaction to the Second Council of Lyons, 1274," Councils and Assemblies, ed. G. J. CUMING and D. BAKER (Cambridge 1971) 113-46.

[O. MCKENNA]