NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SECOND EDITION

9 Mab-Mor

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco • Cleveland • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London • Munich

in association with

THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Second Edition

Project Editors

Thomas Carson, Joann Cerrito

Editorial

Erin Bealmear, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus

Permissions

Edna Hedblad, Shalice Shah-Caldwell

© 2003 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale. Gale is an imprint of The Gale Group, Inc., a division of Thomson Learning, Inc.

Gale and Design $^{\scriptscriptstyle{\text{TM}}}$ and Thomson Learning $^{\scriptscriptstyle{\text{TM}}}$ are trademarks used herein under license.

For more information, contact The Gale Group, Inc. 27500 Drake Rd. Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535 Or you can visit our Internet site at http://www.gale.com

Imaging and Multimedia

Randy Bassett, Dean Dauphinais, Robert Duncan, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, Lezlie Light, Dan Newell, David G. Oblender, Christine O'Bryan, Luke Rademacher, Pamela Reed

Product Design

Michelle DiMercurio

Data Capture

Civie Green

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, The Gale Group, Inc. does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. The Gale Group, Inc. accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

Manufacturing

Rhonda Williams

Indexing

Victoria Agee, Victoria Baker, Francine Cronshaw, Lynne Maday, Do Mi Stauber, Amy Suchowski

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia.—2nd ed.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 0-7876-4004-2
1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Catholic University of America.

BX841 .N44 2002 282' .03—dc21 2002000924

ISBN: 0-7876-4004-2 (set)	0-7876-4009-3 (v. 5)	0-7876-4014-x (v. 10)
0-7876-4005-0 (v. 1)	0-7876-4010-7 (v. 6)	0-7876-4015-8 (v. 11)
0-7876-4006-9 (v. 2)	0-7876-4011-5 (v. 7)	0-7876-4016-6 (v. 12)
0-7876-4007-7 (v. 3)	0-7876-4012-3 (v. 8)	0-7876-4017-4 (v. 13)
0-7876-4008-5 (v. 4)	0-7876-4013-1 (v. 9)	0-7876-4018-2 (v. 14)
		0-7876-4019-0 (v. 15)

Printed in the United States of America 10987654321

For The Catholic University of America Press

EDITORIAL STAFF

Executive Editor

Berard L. Marthaler, O.F.M.Conv., S.T.D., Ph.D.

Associate Editor

Gregory F. LaNave, Ph.D.

Assistant Editors

Jonathan Y. Tan, Ph.D. Richard E. McCarron, Ph.D.

Editorial Assistant

Denis J. Obermeyer

Director of The Catholic University of America Press

David J. McGonagle, Ph.D.

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

John Borelli, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Drew Christiansen, S.J., Ph.D., Senior Fellow, Woodstock Theological Center, Washington, D.C.

Anne M. Clifford, C.S.J., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Raymond F. Collins, M.A., S.T.D., Professor of New Testament, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Cyprian Davis, O.S.B., S.T.L., Ph.D., Professor of Church History, Saint Meinrad School of Theology, Saint Meinrad, Indiana Dennis M. Doyle, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of Dayton, Dayton, Ohio

Angelyn Dries, O.S.F., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Cardinal Stritch University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Arthur Espelage, O.F.M., J.C.D., Executive Coordinator, Canon Law Society of America, Washington, D.C.

Eugene J. Fisher, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

- Edward J. Furton, Ph.D., Editor-in-Chief, The National Catholic Bioethics Quarterly, Brighton, Massachusetts
- James F. Garneau, Ph.D., Academic Dean, The Pontifical College Josephinum, Columbus, Ohio
- J. A. Wayne Hellmann, O.F.M.Conv., Dr. Theol., Professor of Theological Studies, St. Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri
- Joseph T. Kelley, Ph.D., D.Min., Director of the Center for Augustinian Study, Merrimack College, North Andover, Massachusetts
- Judith M. Kubicki, C.S.S.F., Ph.D., Assistant Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, New York
 - William P. Loewe, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religion and Religious Education, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

- Rose M. McDermott, S.S.J., J.C.D., Associate Professor of Canon Law, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- R. Bruce Miller, M.S.L.S., Head, Theology/Philosophy, Canon Law Libraries, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Francis J. Moloney, S.D.B., S.T.L., S.S.L., D.Phil., Professor of Biblical Studies, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Katherine I. Rabenstein, B.S.F.S., Senior Credentialing Specialist, American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.
- Joel Rippinger, O.S.B., M.A., S.T.L., Subprior, Marmion Abbey, Aurora, Illinois

Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

Very Reverend David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D.

President
The Catholic University of America

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his storeroom of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research.
Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Interfaith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, "to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace." The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church's teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophers contribute to a comprehensive survey of philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler's Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church's organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus "New Zealand" precedes "Newman, John Henry," and "Old Testament Literature" precedes "Oldcastle, Sir John." Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while "Henry VIII, King of England" precedes "Henry IV, King of France."

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: "Theology, Articles on," "Liturgy, Articles on," "Jesus Christ, Articles on," etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

Jude

1-2 Kgs

Jude

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows:
Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad.
3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.
·

•
к	ΛN	NZ.	2

200115
Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1-2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1–2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate)
Gal	Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Л	Joel
Jn	John

1–2 Kgs	Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1–2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Nm	Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms
1-2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs
Sir	Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1–2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1–2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1–2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah
Versions

1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and

Versions
Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version

Jonah

Joshua

1–3 Jn Jon

Jos

1, 2, and 3 John

ABBREVIATIONS

ERV	English Revised Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible	NT	New Testament
JB	Jerusalem Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	RSV	Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	RV	Revised Version
NAB	New American Bible	RVm	Revised Version, margin
NEB	New English Bible	Syr	Syriac
NIV	New International Version	Vulg	Vulgate

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYLOPEDIA

M

MABILLON, JEAN

Seventeenth century French Maurist; b. Saint-Pierremont (Ardennes), Nov. 23, 1632; d. Saint-Germain-des-Prés, Dec. 27, 1707. He studied at Reims before becoming a Benedictine monk (1654), was ordained at Corbie (1660), and collaborated with Jean Luc d' Achéry at Saint-Germain-des-Prés in the edition of the works of St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, Sancti Bernardi opera omnia (Paris 1667). Following his master's plan, he collected the documents pertaining to the lives of the saints of the Benedictine Order, which, with T. Ruinart, he published in nine volumes in the Acta Sanctorum ordinis sancti Benedicti (Paris 1668-1701). These lives of the Benedictine saints in chronological order (500-1100) served as a commentary for his Annales ordinis sancti Benedicti, which were continued after his death by R. Massuet and É. Martène (1703–39). Mabillon also organized voyages of investigation in search of manuscripts in Champagne, Lorraine, and Flanders (1672); Bourgogne (1682); Germany and Switzerland (1683); and Italy (1685). He described their results in Itinerarium Burgundicum, Itinerarium Germanicum (1685) and the more famous Musaeum Italicum (2 v. Paris 1687–89). The discovery of a Lectionary at Luxeuil was the origin of his study on the Gallican liturgy, Liturgia gallicana (3 v. Paris 1675). He wrote a Traité des études monastiques (1691) and a monograph, devoted mainly to the study of relics, on the cult of unknown saints (1698). When the authenticity of the Merovingian charters of the monastery of Saint-Germain was questioned by the Bollandist D. Papebroch (1675), Mabillon studied the question for six years and published his famous De re diplomatica libri sex (Paris 1681), an exposition of the principles of documentary criticism that laid the foundation for a scientific approach to this discipline. The work was attacked by B. Germon (1703), and Mabillon supplied a supplement by way of a definitive answer (see DIPLOMATICS, ECCLESIASTICAL). The treatise on monastic studies was his response to the rigorism of A. J. de RANCÉ demonstrating the value of scholarly work for monks. Mabillon also supported the claim of John GER-SON for authorship of the Imitation of Christ. He displayed true monastic equanimity in all his undertakings and courageously opened a path for the conscientious and realistic study of church history. He was made a member of the Royal Academy of Inscriptions and considered one of the most learned men of his age.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10.1:427–724; Mabillon, 2 v. (Paris 1953–57). G. HEER, Johannes Mabillon und die Schweizer Benediktiner (St. Gallen 1938); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1254–55. M. D. KNOWLES, The Journal of Ecclesiastical History, 10 (1959) 153–173. A. PRATESI, Enciclopedia cattolica, ed. P. PASCHINI et al., 12 v. (Rome 1949–54) 7:1737–38. J. BERGKAMP, Dom Jean Mabillon (Washington 1928).

[P. ROCHE]

MACARIUS MAGNES

Oriental bishop and apologist, flourished early 5th century. He is author of a dialogue in five books called the Apocriticus, or Response, to the pagans. Macarius is identified by PHOTIUS as an opponent of JOHN CHRYSOS-TOM at the Synod of the OAK in 403 (biblical codex, 59), and he is said to have condemned Heraclides of Ephesus, one of the bishops whom John Chrysostom had consecrated. Nothing is known of his origin or career. His apology represents a fictitious five day dispute with a pagan philosopher; it proves of considerable value for preserving verbatim texts of what seems to be a later redaction of the 3rd century work Against the Christians (15 books) by the philosopher Porphyry. Only half of the Apocriticus has been preserved (2.7-4.30). It was used in the 9th century iconoclast controversy and is cited at some length by the 16th century Jesuit F. Torres (Turrianus). Its interest centers on the type of objection brought against Christianity in early times: the criticism of Old and New Testament texts, and attacks against the doctrines of the Incarnation, Redemption, and the monarchy of God. L. DUCHESNE thought the pagan philosopher quoted was the Neoplatonist Hierocles of Bithynia; but A. von Harnack and later scholars agree that it must be Porphyry. One fragment of a homily on Gn 3.21 by Macarius has also been preserved; other fragments attributed to him are spurious.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster 1950—) 3:486–488. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF, from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 388. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de thélologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 9.2:1456–59. L. DUCHESNE, De Macario Magnete (Paris 1877). T. W. CRAFER, Journal of Theological Studies, 15 (1913–14) 360–395, 481–512; tr., The Apocriticus of Macarius Magnes (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge 1919). A. B. HULSEN, Porphyry's Work Against the Christians (New Haven 1934).

[F. X. MURPHY]

MACARIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, ST.

Ascetic monk and priest; d. c. 394. He was called politicus to distinguish him from his contemporary MACARIUS THE EGYPTIAN, called the Great. Macarius settled in the desert of Cellia at age 40. PALLADIUS met him several times and stated that he was a priest and led an exemplary life (Hist. Lausiaca 18). He was endowed with the gifts of healing and expelling demons and was responsible for the training in severe asceticism of monks in the desert of Nitria. None of the literary works attributed to him is authentic. His life is recorded in the Historia monachorum (ch. 30), and he is named in the anaphora of the Coptic Mass.

Feast: Jan. 2 (West); Jan. 19 (Greek Church).

Bibliography: É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 9.2:1440–41. B. ALTANER, Patrology (New York 1960) 305–306. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster MD 1950) 3:168–169.

[P. ROCHE]

MACARIUS OF JERUSALEM, ST.

Bishop from c. 312; d. Jerusalem, c. 334. Both EUSE-BIUS OF CAESAREA and Macarius attended the Council of NICAEA I, whose seventh canon dealt with the jurisdictional relationship between Caesarea and JERUSALEM, and that condemned ARIUS. Macarius, a stanch Nicaean, differed with his metropolitan, Eusebius, on the Arian question. When Arius was banished from Alexandria, he found hospitality with Eusebius and stigmatized Macarius as a "heretical ignoramus" (Epiphanius, Panar. 69.6.4). Macarius partly directed the erection of the architectural complex on the recently rediscovered sacred sites of Jerusalem that, in addition to churches in Bethlehem and on Mt. Olivet, CONSTANTINE I commissioned c. 326 (Eusebius, Vita Const. 3.25–43). Later Macarius consecrated Maximus, an upholder of Nicaea I, to the See of Diospolis (Lydda), 25 miles from Jerusalem, but he subsequently kept Maximus as his coadjutor and successor (Sozomen, Hist. eccl. 2.20) in acquiescence to the desire of the Jerusalem flock. Later tradition ascribed to Macarius a part in the identification of the true CROSS (Rufinus, Hist. eccl. 10.7.8).

Feast: March 10.

Bibliography: M. LE QUIEN, Oriens Christianus, 3 v. (Paris 1740; repr. Graz 1958) 3:154–155. L. H. VINCENT and F. M. ABEL, Jérusalem nouvelle, 2 v. (Paris 1922) 201–208, 539, 903–904. Martyrologium Romanum, ed. H. DELEHAYE (Brussels 1940); v.68 of Acta Sanctorum 92. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN, 3 v. (Brussels 1957) 1:3002.

[A. A. STEPHENSON]

MACARIUS OF PELECETE, ST.

Byzantine monk and defender of the cult of images; b. Constantinople, c. 750; d. "Aphrysia" (unknown island), c. 829. Orphaned at an early age, Macarius was educated by his uncle. He entered the monastery of Pelecete in Bithynia and succeeded St. HILARION as hegumen, or abbot. His reputation as a saint and wonder-worker earned him the title of Thaumaturgus, and he was ordained a priest by the patriarch of Constantinople, Tarasius (784–806). In the iconoclastic controversy, he resisted the policy of Emperor LEO V the Armenian, and was imprisoned and tortured. Liberated by Michael II (820-829), he returned to Pelecete but did not take over the direction of the monastery. Although the emperor flattered and menaced him to force him to accept ICONO-CLASM, he steadfastly refused, and was finally exiled to the island where he died, a septuagenarian. His vita was written by his successor, Sabas.

Feast: April 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 1:31. J. VAN DEN GHEYN, ed., Analecta Bollandiana 16 (1897) 140–163. C. VAN DE VORST, ibid. 32 (1913) 270–273. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 210, 558.

[F. CHIOVARO]

MACARIUS SCOTTUS, BL.

Benedictine abbot; b. Ireland or Scotland; d. Germany, 1153. A BENEDICTINE at the Abbey of Regensburg, he was called in 1139 by Bishop Embrico of Würzburg to become the first abbot of the monastery of Sankt Jakob. He journeyed to Rome in 1146 to obtain relics for his community. He was esteemed as a holy man even during his lifetime, and in 1615 his body was exhumed and transferred to the choir of the abbey church. Following this, many miraculous cures were alleged, and in 1818 his relics were moved into the Marienkapelle in Würzburg. From 1731 to the time of World War II, a Macarius brotherhood existed in Würzburg. A summary of his life was written by J. TRITHEMIUS, abbot of Sankt Jakob in the early 16th century.

Feast: Jan. 23 or Dec. 19.

Bibliography: I. GROPP Collectio novissima scriptorum et rerum Wirceburgensium . . . , 2 v. (Frankfurt 1741–44) 1:808–812; summary of his life according to J. TRITHEMIUS, 2:123–127. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; suppl. 1901–) 12:400. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:122–124. A. WENDEHORST, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1255–56.

[C. R. BYERLY]

MACARIUS THE EGYPTIAN, ST.

Hermit renowned for his miracles and spiritual counsel; b. Upper Egypt, c. 300; d. Scete, c. 389. He is erroneously considered the author of a collection of spiritual homilies. Macarius, called the Elder or the Great, is known as one of the DESERT FATHERS described in the History of the Monks of Egypt (ch. 28) ascribed to RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA and in the Lausiac History (ch. 17) of PAL-LADIUS. He is mentioned also by Socrates (Hist. eccl. 4.23) and Sozomen (Hist. eccl. 3.14; 6.20). Macarius joined a scattered settlement of hermits in Scete (c. 330), west of the Nile Delta, and became famous for his spiritual maturity and his power over demons. He was ordained c. 340, presumably to celebrate the divine mysteries on Sundays for the hermits to whom he appears to have given spiritual conferences. He met St. ANTHONY OF EGYPT at least once, and his sayings are recorded in the APOPHTHEGMATA PATRUM of the Desert Fathers, although the eight letters and two prayers there cited are not authentic. Under Emperor Valens, Macarius was one of the hermits who was banished by Bp. Lucius of Alexandria to an island in the Nile (c. 374) for his determined anti-Arianism. He was soon allowed to return to the desert and resumed the solitary life until his death.

Neither Rufinus nor Palladius mentions any literary activity of Macarius, although a full volume of writings in Migne's Patrologia Graeca (34) bears his name. Macarius had little, if any, formal education; when Sozomen praised his "divine knowledge and philosophy," he referred to his proficiency in the way of detachment and contemplation. While circles of monks in the north Egyptian desert apparently cultivated the Christian gnosis and could be plausibly suspected of ORIGENISM (c. 400), Palladius represents Macarius as being of the old school in the tradition of Anthony, whose "book was nature" (Socrates, Hist. eccl. 4.23). The monastic ideal proposed in the spiritual homilies is more relevant to the tightly organized communities PACHOMIUS developed to the south of Nitria c. 320. É. Amann noted Stoic and other non-Christian influences in the 50 homilies that have been almost doubled by recent discoveries. It also appears that doctrines connected with the 18 Messalian propositions condemned at the Council of EPHESUS (431) have a considerable representation in these homilies. This would relate them to Mesopotamia or Constantinople. However, W. Jaeger has denied this, arguing that the great letter, which serves as preface to the collection and whose doctrinal homogeneity with the homilies has been questioned, is not Messalian. In fact, the second section of this letter is a compilation culled from GREGORY OF NYSSA's De Instituto Christiano. Apparently the homilies were gradually purged of the grosser errors of Messalianism by later editors; they contain much pure and lofty teaching.

Feast: Jan. 15; Jan. 19 (Greek Menaea).

Bibliography: A. J. MASON, tr., Fifty Spiritual Homilies of St. Macarius the Egyptian (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; 1921). G. L. MARRIOTT, ed., Macarii Anecdota (Cambridge, Mass. 1918). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 9.2:1452-55. G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur, 5 v. (Vatican City 1944-53); Studi e Testi, 118, 133, 146, 147, 172, 1:389-395. H. DÖRRIES, Symeon von Mesopotamien [Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, 55.1; 1941]. W. JAEGER, Two Rediscovered Works of Ancient Christian Literature (Leiden 1954), 145-230. L. VILLECOURT, Revue de l'Orient chrétien 22 (1921) 29-56; Muséon 35 (1922) 203-212. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950-) 3:161-168. H. C. GRAEF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Frieburg 1957-65) 6:1309-10. G. QUISPEL, Makarius, das Thomasevangelium und das Lied von der Perle (Leiden 1967). R. STAATS, Gregor von Nyssa und die Messalianer; die Frage der Priorität zweier altkirchlicher Schriften (Berlin 1968). Finnisch-Deutsche Theologentagung (Goslar, Germany 1980), Makarios-Symposium über das Böse, ed. W. STROTHMANN (Wiesbaden 1983). Bibelauslegung und Gruppenidentität, ed. H.-O. KVIST (Åbo 1992). Grundbegriffe christlicher Ästhetik, ed. K. FITSCHEN and R. STAATS (Wiesbaden 1997).

[A. A. STEPHENSON]

MACAU, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Macau (Aomen in Chinese) is a special administrative region of CHINA located some 40 miles west of HONG KONG, comprising: (1) a small peninsula projecting from the mainland Chinese province of Guangdong (Kwantung) on the western side of the Pearl River estuary, and (2) the two small islands of Taipa and Coloane. The region was settled in the 1550s by Portuguese merchants involved in the trade with Japan and China. Portugal administered the area as an overseas territory until December 20, 1999, when it reverted to Chinese sovereignty, becoming a Special Administrative Region of the People's Republic of China.

The Church in Colonial Macau. With the arrival of the Portuguese, missionaries used Macau as an important haven of rest after a long voyage from Europe and as a strategic base for the evangelization of Japan and China. Franciscans, Dominicans, Augustinians, and above all, Jesuits transformed the small fishing village on the peninsula into a religious stronghold that received the extraordinary name the City of the Name of God. The Jesuit Visitor to the East, Alessandro VALIGNANO, did much of his organization of the Jesuit Far Eastern missions in Macau. It was from Macau that in 1583 he dispatched Michele Ruggieri and Matteo RICCI to China, reversing what had until then been a missionary failure. In 1576, Pope GREGORY XIII detached Macau from Malacca and made it a diocese with jurisdiction over Japan, China, the Moluccas, and other territories. This immense jurisdiction was reduced by the erection of the short-lived diocese of Funai, Japan, in 1588, and the two Chinese dioceses of Beijing (Peking) and Nanjing (Nanking) in 1690.

From the beginning Macau was under the Portuguese padroado. Government intervention in religious affairs frequently caused friction between the Holy See and Portugal and between the bishops and municipal officials in Macau. The papal legate Charles-Thomas Maillard de Tournon died in Macau in 1710 a virtual prisoner after his important but unsuccessful mission to the emperor of China to settle the CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY. In 1594, Valignano founded St. Paul's College. The Jesuits ran it for nearly two centuries as a school for missionaries and as a unique center of cultural and scientific exchange on Chinese and Japanese culture on the one hand and Europe on the other. It closed in 1762 when the Jesuit order was disbanded and their members expelled from Macau. In 1835, the magnificent church that the Jesuits had built next to the college burned to the ground. St. Paul Church, also known in Chinese as Da Sanba, was never restored. Its famous facade still stands and has become a symbol Capital: Macau. Size: 6 sq. miles.

Population: 445,594 in 2000. Languages: Portuguese, Chinese.

Religions: Almost all of the Chinese (comprising some 93% of the total population) practice a mixture of Buddhism, Taoism and Confucianism. About 5% of the total population are Roman Catholics, comprising virtually the entire Portuguese and mixed Portuguese-Asian population, the Filipinos and a small Chinese community. There are also small communities of Southern Baptists, Anglicans and for Macau. In the course of the 19th century the size of the diocese of Macau continued to shrink as new vicariates apostolic were established in mainland China.

Archdiocese: Macau

The Arrival of Protestant Missionaries. Robert Morrison was the first Protestant missionary to arrive in Macau in 1807. His translation of the Bible into Chinese in 1819 was of paramount significance in promoting Christianity in China. From the beginning, Catholic authorities opposed the influx of Protestant newcomers and even today the Protestant community of Macau remains small. The Southern Baptists arrived in 1910. At the beginning of 2001 they ran seven small parishes and a medical clinic called Hope Clinic.

The Catholic Church in Present-Day Macau. In 1990, after more than four hundred years of appointing bishops from Portugal and its territories, the Holy See chose a Chinese priest from Macau, Domingos Lam Katseung (Lin Jianjun), for the position. Bishop Lam, in April 2001, ordained Jose Lai Hangseng, the pastor of the cathedral, as his bishop coadjutor. As of the year 2000, the number of Catholics since 1990 has remained steady, oscillating between 21,000 and 19,000 members (approximately 5 percent of the total population).

Since the handover, the new administration has respected the freedom of religious belief for all the residents of Macau. It has permitted the Catholic Church to continue operating seven parishes and 34 schools unhindered. The Church's influence on education is very significant with half of the school children in Macau studying in the 34 Catholic schools. During Portuguese rule, the Portuguese government financed the Catholic clergy and its schools. Today, the priests' salaries come from the coffers of the diocese, and schools are largely relying on school fees and limited government subsidies. Through its social services, the Church also operates four homes, a hostel and a day center for the aged as well as a small hospice. Caritas Macau maintains a home for the handicapped, a halfway house for ex-prisoners and a center for the homeless.

O Clarim, the diocesan weekly newspaper, founded in 1949, is the oldest newspaper still in circulation in Macau. In 1977, recognizing the power of the media in its missionary work, the diocese of Macau established the Centro Diocesano dos Meios de Communicação Social. It coordinates work on radio and television and produces audio-visual material for educational purposes. Some of the best films shown in Macau are screened in the three cinemas of its Cineteatro. The center also runs a library and a bookstore.

Bibliography: T. B. DA SILVA and W. RADASEWSKY, Macau (Berlin 1992). C. R. BOXER, The Portuguese Seaborne Empire 1415–1825 (London 1969). C. M. B. CHENG, Macau: A Cultural Janus (Hong Kong 1999). R.D. CREMER, ed. Macau: City of Commerce and Culture (Hong Kong 1991). L.G. GOMES, Efeméridas da história de Macau (Lisbon 1954). Pursuing the Dream: Jesuits in Macao (Macau 1990). R. MALEK, ed., Macau: Herkunft ist Zukunft (Sank Augustin, Germany 2000). Papers of the International Conference on Macao at the Eve of the Handover. Held by the Centre of Asian Studies at The University of Hong Kong, October 29–30, 1999. M. TEIXEIRA, Macau e sua diocese no ano dos centenarios de fundação e restauração, 3 vols. (Macau 1940–1963). Macau. Special 92: The Catholic Church at the Gates of China. (1992). Tripod special issue: "Macau in Transition." vol. XIX, no. 114, November-December 1999.

[J.-P. WIEST]

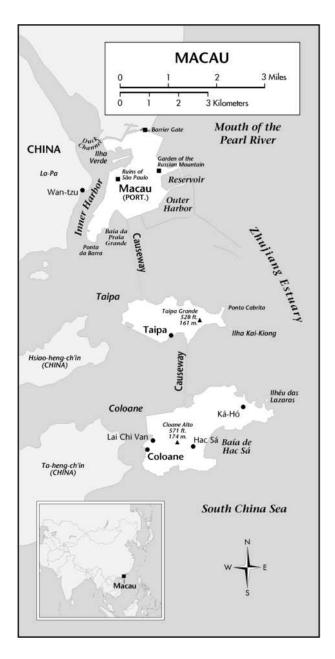

MACCABEES, BOOKS OF

The two books of the Maccabees deal substantially with the same theme: the history of how the Jews, under the inspirational leadership of the Maccabean (Hasmonaean) family, managed to prevail over their Syrian oppressors (the Seleucid Dynasty) and the "Hellenizing party" in Palestine in the second century B.C. (see MACCABEES, HISTORY OF). The two books are not two parts of a history, such as 1 and 2 Samuel, but are independent compositions partially covering the same period. They fall under the deuterocanonical division of the Catholic Biblical canon, and are to be distinguished from the apocryphal works known as 3 and 4 Maccabees. [See APOCRY-PHA, 1. APOCRYPHA OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.]

First Maccabees

The first book embraces events from 175 to 134 B.C. It is divided into four parts: a prelude, followed by three sections treating the activity of three Maccabeans—Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, respectively.

Contents. Part 1 (ch. 1–2) provides a prelude to the history of the Maccabean revolt. The account moves quickly from the advent of Hellenism in the Near East under Alexander the Great to the rise of Antiochus IV Epiphanes in 175 B.C. and the initiation of his program of Hellenization of Judea and consequent religious persecution of the Jews. The prelude concludes with a description of the outbreak of the Jewish rebellion, under the priest Mathathias and his five sons, the Maccabees.

Part 2 (3.1–9.22) presents the military exploits of Judas Maccabee: his victories over Apollonius and Seron in Samaria and at Bethoron, over Nicanor and Gorgias at Emmaus, and over Lysias at Bethsura. Following the account of Judas's recapture and rededication of the Temple, the author describes the death of Antiochus IV, the inconclusive battles of Judas against the Syrian army under Lysias and Antiochus V Eupator at Bethsura and Bethzacharam, the death of Lysias and Antiochus V, and the rise of a new King, Demetrius I, to the throne of Syria. This section concludes with the account of Judas's victory over Nicanor in 160 B.C., and of his defeat and death in battle against Bacchides at Laisa (Elasa) shortly afterwards.

The facade of St. Paul's Cathedral in Macau, 1960. The remainder of the building caught fire after a typhoon in 1835. (©Paul Almasy/CORBIS)

Part 3 (9.23–12.54) describes the diplomatic and military victories of Jonathan Maccabee (160–143 B.C.): his negotiation of a truce with Bacchides, whereby he preserved the battered remnants of Judas's guerrilla army from disintegration; and his later alliance with a new pretender to the throne of Syria, Alexander Balas, who named Jonathan high priest, military leader, and civil governor of Judea. Part 3 concludes with Jonathan's initial support of Demetrius II, his switch to the side of Tryphon and Antiochus VI, and finally his own betrayal and capture by Tryphon at Ptolemais in 143 B.C.

Part 4 (13.1–16.17) deals with the exploits of Simon, the last of the Maccabean brothers (143–134 B.C.): his support of Demetrius II against Tryphon, for which he received almost complete political independence; his initial support of Antiochus VII (successor of Demetrius II), followed by their quarrel; and the defeat of Antiochus's army by Simon's sons, Judas and John. Part 4 concludes with the treacherous assassination of Simon and his two sons, Judas and Mathathias, by Ptolemy near Jericho in 134 B.C. A short subscript relates the escape of Simon's son, John Hyrcanus, who established himself as successor to his father.

Author. Nothing certain is known concerning the identity of the author. His knowledge of Palestinian geography, however, plus his intimate acquaintance with the politics of the period, the military campaigns, the court intrigues, and the Maccabean chieftains, indicate that he was a contemporary of the events about which he has written. His failure to speak of the future life (a doctrine popular among the Pharisees), as well as his tolerant attitude concerning the observance of the Sabbath, suggest that he belonged to Sadducean rather than Pharisaic circles (see SADDUCEES; PHARISEES). His work reflects a notable patriotism and a genuine admiration for the Maccabean family.

Language. Although the book was certainly written in Hebrew, and its Hebrew text was still known to Origen and Jerome, only its Greek translation has survived. The Vulgate retains the Old Latin version unrevised, made from a Greek MS much older than our extant Greek MSS and consequently of great value.

Sources. The author includes in his history a number of letters and documents (dispersed among ch. 5 through 15). Although some critics have considered these entries literary creations, most modern scholars defend their authenticity. A few critics consider ch. 13.31–16.24 a later addition, on the grounds that Josephus, who follows the first part of the book step by step, does not utilize these last chapters; this view is no longer seriously considered. At most, it can be said that the book was completed by other inspired writers who added the subscript (16.18–24) and perhaps added or modified a few other passages. Finally, 1 Mc 9.22 would seem to indicate that the author drew from a "Life of Judas." The reference in 16.23–24 may be to some annals in which official acts of the high priests were recorded.

Date. The book was written after the death of Simon Maccabeus in 134 B.C., and if the subscript (16.23–24) belongs to the original MS, then it probably was written after the death of John Hyrcanus in 104 B.C. Since the author speaks kindly of the Romans, it is likely that he wrote before 63 B.C., when Pompey the Great conquered Jerusalem and outraged Jewish feelings by entering the Holy of Holies. The book must have been completed, therefore, sometime between 104 and 63 B.C.

Literary and Historical Value. The graphic descriptions of events, the exactitude of the topographical and chronological details, the ease with which the author's presentation of his facts fits the contemporaneous history of the Near East, and the honesty of the author in relating the defeats as well as the victories of his heroes, testify convincingly to the historical value of the composition.

The author, nonetheless, was a man of his times. He is not entirely unbiased, nor is he perfectly objective. Since he writes to glorify the Maccabees as "those men by whom salvation was brought to Israel" (5.62), his viewpoint is that of one who writes history, but the history of a propagandist. After the manner of the ancient historians, he has no scruples about exaggerating the size of the armies sent against the Maccabees, in order to enhance their victories. Although he records the defeats as well as the victories of the Maccabees, he does not hesitate to play up the victories and play down the defeats. The Maccabean revolt appears in his eyes as a world-shaking event, of importance to Rome and Sparta, and as the pivotal point of Seleucid politics. Despite such imperfections, common to most historians before the modern age of strictly objective history, there is no reason to doubt the substantial historicity of the book.

Illumination in the Book of Maccabees 1 from the "Great Bible of Demeter Neksei-Lipocz."

Religious Value. The absence of the name of God from the book has led many who refuse to acknowledge its inspired character to consider it a purely secular work devoid of religious value. (There are some passages in the Vulgate in which the words "God" and "Lord" appear, but these are missing in the Greek.) Although the author does not use the name of God (probably out of the scrupulous reverence for the name of God so common in late post-Exilic times), he does use numerous paraphrases for God, e.g., "Heaven" (3.18–19; 4.10, 40; 9.46; 12.15; 16.3), and the personal pronoun "He" (2.61; 3.22; 16.3). His heroes pray before they go into battle (3.46–54; 4.10–11; 7.37–38; 9.49; 11.71; 12.11), and the author speaks about God as the savior of Israel (2.61; 3.19; 4.30; 12.15; 16.3). Despite the author's emphasis on the human rather than the divine element in history, there is no doubt that he is deeply penetrated with the truth that it is God who is guiding the history and deciding the fate of His chosen people. He wishes to impress his readers with the virtues of the heroes of the Maccabean resistance—love of God and nation, fidelity to law, and determination to serve God at any cost rather than man. In its implicit invitation to its readers to emulate the religious zeal and generosity of the Maccabees lies the lasting appeal of the book.

Second Maccabees

The second book is not a sequel to 1 Maccabees; it partially covers the same history (176–160 B.C.). Prefixed to the book are two "festive" letters (1.1–10a and 1.10b–2.19), sent from the Jews in Jerusalem to the Jews in Egypt. Many scholars believe that they were placed there after the composition of the book by some inspired editor because they contain information about the troubles in Palestine during the Maccabean period. The book proper begins with a short foreword, followed by two sections, each ending with an account of the death of a persecutor of the Jews and the institution of a feast.

Contents. Part 1 (2.20–33) is a preface explaining the sources used by the author; namely, the five-volume work of Jason of Cyrene, and the principles that guided him in making his epitome.

Part 2 (3.1–10.9) covers the period from 176 to 164 B.C. The author describes the struggles for the office of high priest (ch. 3–5), the desecration of the Temple, the persecution of the Jews who refused to give up their faith (ch. 6–7), the outbreak of the Jewish rebellion under Judas Maccabee, and the winning back and rededication of the desecrated Temple (8.1–10.9).

Part 3 (10.10–15.40) concentrates on the successful military campaigns of Judas Maccabee in the time of Antiochus V and Demetrius I, concluding with Judas's conquest of Nicanor in 160 B.C. and the institution of a new feast, popularly referred to as "the Day of Nicanor."

Author and Language. Nothing is known about Jason, the author of the original five books condensed in 2 Maccabees, except that he was a Jew from Cyrene in North Africa. Less is known about the anonymous author who abridged the books of Jason to form our present 2 Maccabees. Both authors wrote in Greek, but since the main task of the epitomist was to make a choice of episodes from the longer work of Jason, there is no way of determining how much of the Greek style belongs to Jason and how much to his abridger.

Sources. Many authors judge that Jason's main sources were oral. It is likely that he also used documents from the chronicles of the Seleucid Kings. He includes several letters (cf. 9.18–20; 11.15–17; 11.27–29; 11.34–36) that probably came from the Maccabean archives.

Date. The last event recorded in 2 Maccabees is the death of Nicanor, which took place on March 28, 160 B.C. Since no mention is made of Judas's death, which took place shortly afterwards, it has been suggested that Jason's history was completed in the early part of the year 160 B.C. However, events subsequent to Nicanor's death may have seemed to the writer to be of little value for the purpose of his story. If the letter attached to the composition (1.1–10a) was sent with 2 Maccabees to the Jews in Egypt at the time of the book's first publication, the year 124 B.C., or shortly before, may be established as the date of completion, since this letter is explicitly dated. Many, however, judge that the book was completed sometime after 1 Maccabees.

Literary Form and Historical Value. This book belongs to that category of historical writing popular in the Hellenistic world known as "pathetic history." It is a type of literature that uses every means to appeal to the imagination and the emotions of the reader: colorful descriptions, rhetorical appeals, exaggerated numbers, prodigious miracles involving celestial manifestations, and a preference in general for the edifying and dramatic in place of a straightforward detailing of events. In a way similar to that of the author of Chronicles, the author idealizes his story, arranges chronology to suit his purpose, and concentrates on certain aspects of the general picture to the relative exclusion of others. The substantial historicity of the events recorded can be vouched for safely on the basis of a comparison with 1 Maccabees and with extra-Biblical sources that treat the same period.

Purpose. The general purpose of the author was to edify and instruct his Egyptian compatriots. This he accomplished by extolling Onias III, Eleazar, the seven martyr brothers and their mother, and Judas Maccabee, and by excoriating such enemies of the Jews as Heliodorus, Antiochus IV, the two wicked high priests Jason and Menelaus, Nicanor, and pagans in general.

There are indications that the author also had a specific purpose in mind. From beginning to end he shows a persistent interest in the Temple, the priesthood, and the Temple feasts. Since a rival temple to the Temple of Jerusalem had been erected at Leontopolis in Egypt under Onias IV, it seems not unlikely that the author of 2 Maccabees wished to wean the Egyptian Jews away from the temple of Leontopolis and to secure their allegiance to the one legitimate Temple in Jerusalem. This consideration leads one to suspect a late date for the composition.

Religious Value. Unlike 1 Maccabees, 2 Maccabees not only frequently uses the name of God, but the author visualizes God always close at hand, anxious to answer the prayers of His chosen ones. Throughout the book, the activity and intervention of God in the affairs of His people are constantly highlighted. The author stresses the doctrines of resurrection from the dead (7.9–11; 14.46), the intercession of the saints (15.11–16), and the ability of the living to assist the dead by their prayers and sacrifices (12.39–46). (See PURGATORY.) Faith, hope, and sincere love of God pervade the whole book.

Bibliography: A. LEFÈVRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible suppl., ed. L. PIRROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 5:597–612. F. M. ABEL and J. STARCKY, Les Livres des Maccabées (Bible de Jérusalem (Paris 1948–54) 12; 1962). J. C. DANCY, A Commentary on I Maccabees (Oxford 1954). H. FISCHEL, ed., The First Book of Maccabees (New York 1948). R. H. CHARLES et al., eds., The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English, 2 v. (Oxford 1913) v.1. F. GRZYGLEWICZ, "Paradoxes of the First Book of Maccabees," Scripture 4 (1950) 197–205. H. W. ETTELSON, "The Integrity of I Maccabees," Transactions of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Science 27 (1925) 249–384. E. BICKERMANN, The Maccabees, tr. M. HADAS (New York 1947).

[P. F. ELLIS]

MACCABEES, HISTORY OF THE

The name "Maccabee" is generally given to John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan—the five sons of Mathathias, a Jewish priest of the line of Joarib who died in the year 166 B.C. (1 Mc 2). The name is derived properly from that of the third son, Judas Maccabee. The Greek form, Μακκαβαίος, probably goes back to the Aramaic word maqqābai, the meaning of which is uncertain. The name is generally explained as derived ultimately from the Hebrew word maggebet meaning hammer. Hence, "Judas, the hammer (or hammerer)," because of the hammerlike blows he inflicted on the Syrian oppressors of Israel in the early years of the Maccabean wars. Some scholars, however, maintain that the name is a shortened form of the Hebrew magqab-yāhû (from nāqab, "to mark, to designate"), meaning "the one designated by Yahweh." The name, which was applied first to Judas, then to his brothers, was subsequently used to designate all their kinsmen and adherents, and ultimately given to all the champions of religion during the Greek period.

According to Josephus, Simeon, the grandfather of Mathathias, was called "the son of Hasmonaeus." The family is thus more correctly designated by the name of Hasmonaeans.

This article will treat the remote and proximate background of the Maccabean wars and give an account of the three Maccabean brothers, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon.

Judas Maccabees on medieval manuscript page.

Historical Background

The Maccabees liberated Judea from oppression by the Syrian kings, restored religious freedom, and regained political independence for the Jewish people. To be adequately appreciated these achievements must be seen against the background of the times.

The Hellenization of Palestine. After the return from the Babylonian exile in 538 B.C., Judea was subject for four centuries to the great powers that ruled the Near East: Persia, Alexander the Great, the Ptolemaic kings of Egypt, and finally the Seleucid kings of Syria beginning c. 200 B.C. With the exception of the Seleucid King ANTIOCHUS IV EPIPHANES (175–164 B.C.) and his successors, none of Judea's pagan overlords interfered seriously with the practice of the Jewish religion; their policy had been that of subjection and tribute in temporal affairs, freedom in spiritual affairs. Antiochus IV, however, attempted to unify his domains, and especially Palestine, by imposing upon all his subjects the practice of Hellenistic religion. This included the worship of Zeus and other gods of the Greek pantheon, as well as the king himself as the visible manifestation of Zeus (the name "Epiphanes" meaning "the god manifest").

In its civil and cultural aspects Hellenism was nothing new to the Jews. Hellenization of Palestine had been in progress under both Ptolemaic and Seleucid kings since the era of Alexander. By the time of Antiochus IV, however, serious tensions had come to exist among the Jews between the liberal factions, enthusiastic about Hellenistic culture, and the conservative factions, suspicious of Hellenistic culture and antagonistic to Hellenistic religion. Between 175 and 174 B.C. Jason (the brother of the legitimate high priest Onias III), a leader of the pro-Hellenist faction among the Jews, offered Antiochus IV, in return for the office of high priest, a large sum of money and a promise of cooperation with his policy of Hellenization of Judea. Having been recognized as high priest by Antiochus IV, Jason immediately initiated an active policy of Hellenization. He established a gymnasium in Jerusalem and encouraged Greek sports and fashions (1 Mc 1.13-15; 2 Mc 4.10-15). Three years later a rival, Menelaus, managed to outbid Jason for the office of high priest and began to sell the Temple vessels. When the legitimate high priest Onias III protested, Menelaus had him assassinated (2 Mc 4.23-36). In 169 B.C., with the connivance of Menelaus, Antiochus IV pillaged the Temple. When it became apparent that the religious Jews would not submit voluntarily to Hellenization, Antiochus IV decided to use force. A Syrian army under Apollonius looted and partially destroyed Jerusalem. A Syrian garrison was installed in 167 B.C. in a newly built citadel called the Akra, located on the hill west of the Temple. Antiochus IV then began a systematic persecution of the Jews aimed at destroying the Jewish faith and substituting Hellenistic religion in its place. Regular sacrifices in the Temple were suspended; Jews were no longer permitted to observe the Sabbath and the traditional feasts; it became a crime to possess a copy of the Law or to circumcise Jewish children. Pagan altars were set up throughout the land, and Jews who refused to sacrifice swine's flesh upon these altars were liable to death. In December 167 B.C., the cult of Olympian Zeus was instituted in the Temple, an altar to Zeus was erected, and Jews were compelled to take part in the pagan feasts. A systematic religious persecution of the Jews was in full progress (1 Mc 1.43-67; 2 Mc 6.1-11).

The Outbreak of the Maccabean Wars. Israelite response to Antiochus's program of enforced Hellenization and the suppression of the Jewish faith was threefold. Those enthusiastic about Hellenism apostatized. Some through fear of torture and death unwillingly complied and forsook the faith of their fathers. Others, however, defied the persecutors and either died for their faith or went into hiding (2 Mc 6.8–11).

Meanwhile, in the hill towns and in the desert resistance smoldered, awaiting only a spark to ignite active rebellion. In the little town of Modin, in the foothills northwest of Jerusalem, sometime in late 167 B.C. the spark was struck. The King's officers came to Modin and urged the old priest Mathathias and his five sons to be the first to offer sacrifice on the pagan altar. Mathathias refused vehemently, but while he was still speaking, another Jew approached the altar to sacrifice and abjure his faith. Inflamed with righteous anger, Mathathias slew the man on the spot; turned and killed the King's men; tore down the pagan altar; and then fled to the hills with his sons, where they were joined by the HASIDAEANS and others who refused to accept Hellenization. In a short time the nucleus of a guerrilla army had taken form. Shortly afterward, having confided the leadership of the resistance to his third son, Judas Maccabee (1 Mc 1.66), Mathathias died.

The Maccabean Brothers

Of the five sons of Mathathias, Eleazar and John played only minor roles in the Maccabean wars. Eleazar, called "Abaron," was killed in battle at Bethzacharam (Bethzacharia) in 163 B.C., crushed to death beneath an elephant that he had attempted to kill, believing that it was carrying the Syrian King Antiochus V (1 Mc 6.43–46). John, called "Gaddis," was killed by raiders from Medaba in Transjordan shortly after the death of Judas in 160 B.C. (1 Mc 9.35–42). Judas, Jonathan, and Simon played major roles in the Maccabean wars. They will be treated at length.

Judas Maccabee (166–160 B.C.). When Judas took over the leadership of the Jewish resistance in 166 B.C., there was no army; there were no supplies, no weapons, and no plans. When he died in battle six years later, his name was a byword throughout the Near East. He had formed a close-knit, hard-hitting guerrilla army, armed them with the weapons of defeated Syrian troops, repulsed a series of Syrian armies sent against him, won back Jerusalem and the Temple, and re-established the daily sacrifices. He had set the stage for the eventual return of religious and political freedom to Judea.

A man of contagious courage, invincible confidence, and extraordinary ability, Judas infected his troops with his own indomitable faith and won battle after battle against almost insuperable odds. His fortress was the hills; his strategy, guerrilla tactics—the unsuspected slashing attack followed by a swift retreat and disappearance into the hills.

Judas's first victory was over Apollonius, sent by Antiochus IV from Samaria to subdue the rebellion (1 Mc 3.10-12). A short time later he reduced and scattered a second Syrian force under Seron at the pass of Bethhoron (1 Mc 3.13-24). Neither defeat was a disaster for the Syrians, but the effect of the victories on the morale of Judas's guerrilla army was dramatic. When Lysias, the regent of Antiochus IV, sent an army into Judea in the following year (165 B.C.) under Nicanor and Gorgias, Judas met the enemy near Emmaus and was victorious again (1 Mc 3.38-4.25). Lysias then took charge himself and approached Judea from the south. The battle took place near Bethsura, and again Judas was able to secure a victory (2 Mc 11.1-2). Lysias was forced for a time to recognize Jewish interests in order to give himself to his duties as regent. An account of the diplomatic negotiations between Judas and Lysias, as well as those between Judas and Rome at that time, is preserved in the 11th chapter of 2 Maccabees.

When Antiochus IV died in the autumn of 164 B.C., Lysias seized the government in the name of Antiochus V, the nine-year-old son of Antiochus IV. On December 14 of that same year, Judas purified and rededicated the Temple at Jerusalem. In the following summer, he was able to extend his influence in Palestine by rescuing faithful Jews in Galilee and Galaad, and by punishing pro-Hellenistic Jews throughout the land (1 Mc 5).

In the autumn of 163 B.C. Judas besieged the Syrian citadel in Jerusalem, intending to rid Judea of all Syrian influence. Forced into action by Judas's actions, Lysias and the young King came from Antioch with a large army and besieged Judas's base of operations at Bethsura, forcing Judas to quit the siege of the citadel. When Judas came south to assist the garrison at Bethsura, his army met the Syrians at Bethzacharam, but was forced back to Jerusalem, where refuge was taken in the fortress of the Temple. When Bethsura fell, Lysias's army besieged the Temple fortress. Fortunately for Judas, Lysias was forced to make peace when news arrived that Philip, the rival regent who had been designated by Antiochus IV on his deathbed, was advancing toward Antioch. Lysias successfully disposed of Philip's threat, but was later executed, along with Antiochus V, by Demetrius I Soter (161-150 B.C.), nephew of Antiochus IV (1 Mc 6.17 - 7.50).

In the meantime, the Hellenistic faction in Jerusalem persuaded Demetrius I to recognize Alcimus, a Hellenistic Jew, as high priest and to send an army against Judas. Demetrius sent Nicanor, and in the ensuing battle near Adarsa (Adasa), Judas had his last victory. Shortly afterward, a Syrian army under Bacchides defeated Judas's army at Laisa (Elasa), and Judas died on the field of battle (1 Mc 9.1–22).

Jonathan Maccabee (160–143 B.C.). The youngest of the Maccabees, Jonathan, also called "Apphus," took command after the death of Judas and wisely withdrew to the desert with the remnants of the shattered Jewish army. With Judea once more under Syrian control, Bacchides returned to Antioch, leaving to the triumphant Hellenistic Jews the task of patrolling the country and keeping the peace. After some time Bacchides returned to Judea to annihilate Jonathan's guerrilla army. Having failed in his first attempts, he made a truce with Jonathan. Quarrels with the Hellenistic Jews and internal difficulties in the Seleucid state may have prompted him to negotiate (1 Mc 9.23–73).

Unhindered by the Syrians from 157 to 152 B.C., Jonathan increased his army and his influence. When Alexander Balas, a pretender to the throne of Syria, contended with Demetrius I for Jonathan's support, Jonathan wisely supported Alexander, who named him high priest, dubbed him 'friend of the king,' and made him both military and civic governor of Judea.

When Demetrius II in 145 B.C. succeeded with the help of Ptolemy IV of Egypt in deposing Alexander, he at first accepted the friendship of Jonathan. Later, however, Demetrius II broke his promise to Jonathan to remove the Syrian troops from the Akra in Jerusalem, and Jonathan went to the side of Tryphon, who was regent to a new pretender to the throne, Antiochus VI, son of Alexander Balas. However, when Jonathan built a high wall between the Syrian-occupied Akra and the rest of Jerusalem, Tryphon became distrustful. He invited Jonathan to a parley, took him prisoner, and later executed him in the land east of the Jordan at a place called Bascama whose location is now unknown (1 Mc 11–12;13.23).

Simon Maccabee (143–134 B.C.). The last of the Maccabees, Simon (also called "Thasi") rallied the Jewish army after the capture of Jonathan and succeeded in preventing Tryphon's army from assisting the Syrian garrison in Jerusalem. Later, when Tryphon executed Antiochus VI and declared himself king of Syria, Simon went over to the side of Demetrius II, who gave him, in return for his support, almost complete political freedom along with the abolition of all tribute past and future. Simon himself was acknowledged as "the high priest, the great captain, and Prince of the Jews" (1 Mc 13.42). It is from Simon, therefore, that the Hasmonaean dynasty arose, for his less scrupulous sons took the name of king and ruled an independent Judea for the better part of a century (1 Mc 13–14).

In the meantime, Demetrius II had been captured by the Parthians, and when his brother Antiochus VII requested Simon's aid in destroying Tryphon, Simon complied with alacrity. Not long after, however, the two allies quarreled. Antiochus VII sent his general, Cendebeus, to attack Judea. In a battle at Cedron, south of Jamnia, the Jewish army under the leadership of Simon's sons, Judas and John, routed the army of Cendebeus, and Judea was at peace once more. Simon enjoyed the peace for only a few years. In 134 B.C., while at a banquet in the fortress of Doch near Jericho, he was treacherously assassinated along with his sons Judas and Mathathias, by his son-in-law Ptolemy. His remaining son, John Hyrcanus, succeeded him and carried on the Hasmonaean dynasty (1 Mc 15–16).

See Also: HASMONAEANS; MACCABEES, BOOK OF.

Bibliography: JOSEPHUS, Antiquities (Loeb Classical Library [London-New York-Cambridge, Mass. 1912–]) Bks. 12–13. J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959) 407–412. G. RICCIOTTI, The History of Israel, tr. C. DELLA PENTA and R. T. A. MURPHY, 2 v. (2d ed. Milwaukee 1958) 236–279. F. M. ABEL, Histoire de la Palestine depuis la conquête d'Alexandre jusqu'à; l'invasion Arabe, 2 v. (Paris 1952) 1:108–206. M. NOTH, The History of Israel, tr. and rev. P. R. ACKROYD (2d ed. New York 1960). E. BICKERMANN, The Maccabees, tr. M. HADAS (New York 1947). H. A. FISCHEL, ed., First Book of Maccabees (New York 1948). W. R. FARMER, Maccabees, Zealots and Josephus (New York 1956). A. BEVAN, "The Origin of the Name Maccabee," Journal of Theological Studies 30 (1929) 191–193.

[P. F. ELLIS]

MACDONALD, ALEXANDER

Highland Scottish patriot, Gaelic poet, and lexicographer (Gaelic name, Alasdair mac Mhaighstir Alasdair); b. Dalilea, Argyllshire, 1700?; d. Sandaig, Invernesshire, 1770? He was the son of Alexander MacDonald, nonjuring minister of Ardnamurchan, Scotland. The younger MacDonald is known to have been employed (1729–45) by the Protestant SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE and to have served in his native district as catechist and schoolmaster. The aims of this society were so wholly at variance with the sentiments of MacDonald's chief, Allan MacDonald of Clanranald, and his Catholic fellow-clansmen, that one can only conclude that Alexander worked for it because of some personal quarrel.

Around 1730 he was asked to prepare for the society a Gaelic-English vocabulary in an effort to introduce English more widely into the Highlands. After revision by the Presbytery of Mull, this work, A Galick and English Vocabulary, the first Scottish-Gaelic vocabulary to be separately printed, was published at Edinburgh (1741). MacDonald's increasing absences from his school and his alleged composition of "Galick songs, stuffed with obscene language" caused his dismissal from the society on July 4, 1745.

Prince Charles landed (July 25, 1745) at Loch nan Uamh not far from Ardnamurchan. About this time Mac-Donald is said to have been received into the Catholic Church. He served throughout the Rising of 1745 as an officer in the Jacobite army [see JACOBITES (ENGLISH)]. There is strong internal evidence that he was the "Highland Officer" who wrote the "Journall and Memoirs of P. C.'s Expedition into Scotland, etc. 1745–6." If so, he was one of the first persons to greet the Prince, whose Gaelic tutor he became, and he received the first commission given by the Prince in Scotland. After the Battle of Culloden (April 16, 1746) he became, in effect, an outlaw.

After the Act of Indemnity (1747), MacDonald was appointed Baillie of the Island of Canna by Clanranald. He visited Bishop Forbes in Edinburgh (1747, 1748), and in April of 1751 brought him an account of the Hanoverian atrocities on the islands of Eigg and Canna. His book of Gaelic poems, Ais-Eiridh na Sean Chánoin Albannaich (The Resurrection of the Ancient Scottish Language), published at Edinburgh probably during this visit in 1751, was reportedly destroyed by official order because of its vehement Jacobite sentiments; only one copy of a 1764 reprint is known to exist.

MacDonald's Gaelic verse is distinguished by the vigor and breadth of its vocabulary, its depth of outlook, and the passion with which it expresses the Highlanders' attachment to the Jacobite cause. MacDonald had great if uneven talent for descriptive poetry; he merits a high place in the literature of abuse, though his ribald verses are sometimes obscene. His Ais-Eiridh, the first book of original verse in Scottish Gaelic, has influenced the style and vocabulary of Scottish Gaelic poets even to the present. He left poems in manuscripts, since included in nine later editions, the latest in 1924.

Bibliography: A. MACDONALD, Poems, tr. A. and A. MACDONALD (Inverness 1924). J. REID, Bibliotheca Scoto-Celtica (Glasgow 1832). J. L. CAMPBELL, "Some Notes on the Poems of A. MacDonald," Scottish Gaelic Studies, 4 (1934) 18–23; "Some Words from the Vocabulary of A. MacDonald," ibidem, 6 (1949) 27–42; "The Royal Irish Academy Text of Birlinn Chlann Raghnaill," ibidem, 9 (1961) 39–79; "A. MacDonald: Portrait of a Traditionalist," Scots Magazine, 24 (1935) 61–76; tr. and ed., Highland Songs of the Forty-Five (Edinburgh 1933).

[J. L. CAMPBELL]

MACDONELL, ALEXANDER

Missionary, bishop; b. Invernesshire County, Scotland, July 17, 1762; d. Dumfries, Scotland, Jan. 14, 1840. After early education at Strathglass, he attended a little seminary at Scalan in the Braes of Glenlivat, the Scot's

College in Paris (1778), and the Scot's College of Valladolid, Spain, where he was ordained (1787). He returned to Scotland as a missionary in Badenoch. In 1792 he embarked upon a plan to improve the plight of his Highlanders by securing employment for them in Glasgow. He organized (1794) the Glengarry Fencibles, a Roman Catholic Highland regiment that saw service on the island of Guernsey (1795-98) and in Ireland (1798-1802). Macdonell's appointment as chaplain to the regiment made him the first Catholic chaplain in the British army since the Reformation. When his regiment was disbanded (1802), he successfully negotiated with the British government (1803) to secure grants of land in Upper Canada for as many of the men as desired them. He sailed from Ayr, Scotland, Sept. 5, 1804, and on his arrival was appointed to the Glengarry district by the bishop of Quebec. In 1807 he was appointed vicar-general of Upper Canada. He organized and acted as chaplain to the Second Glengarry Regiment, which served in the War of 1812. Between 1815 and 1826 he fought with the government authorities in Britain to obtain assistance for the Catholic Church in Upper Canada, particularly in the fields of education and support of the clergy.

In a papal brief of Jan. 12, 1819, never executed, he was appointed bishop of Rhosina and vicar apostolic. A new brief in February 1820 preconized him bishop of Rhosina without any specific territory; he was consecrated Dec. 31, 1820, at Quebec. Macdonell was named first bishop of Kingston, Ontario, on the erection of that see, Feb. 26, 1826. He took formal possession of the cathedral April 26, 1829. In 1831 he was appointed a member of the Legislative Council of Upper Canada. On May 29, 1839, he embarked from Kingston for Europe to seek aid for a new college, to promote British immigration to Canada, and to seek a division of his diocese. His remains were interred at St. Mary's Church, Edinburgh, Scotland, and later (1861) reinterred in Kingston. Alexandria, Glengarry County, Upper Canada is named in his honor. His Reminiscences were published posthumously (Toronto 1888).

Bibliography: H. J. SOMERS, The Life and Times of the Hon. and Rt. Rev. Alexander Macdonell (Washington 1931). J. A. MACDONELL, A Sketch of the Life of the Hon. and Rt. Rev. Alexander Macdonell (Alexandria, Ont. 1890); Sketches Illustrating the Early Settlement and History of Glengarry (Montreal 1893).

[J. T. FLYNN]

MACEACHEN, EVAN

Scotlish Gaelic scholar and translator; b. Arisaig, Scotland, 1769; d. Tombae, Scotland, Sept. 9, 1849. Ordained in 1798 at Scots College, Valladolid, Spain, he was sent to the seminary of Lismore, Scotland in 1806 as a professor. In 1814 he was appointed to the mission of Aigeas in Strathglass, and was transferred in 1818 to Braemar in Aberdeenshire, Scotland. Nearly all the devotional literature extant in Scottish Gaelic before 1850 came from MacEachen's pen. He translated The Abridgement of Christian Doctrine (1815); Lorenzo Scupoli's Spiritual Combat (1835); Thomas à Kempis's The Imitation of Christ (1836), of which an earlier Gaelic translation had been published in 1785 by Robert Menzies; the Declaration of the British Catholic Bishops (1838); the New Testament (published in 1875 after revision by C. C. Grant); and Bishop Challoner's Meditations (still in manuscript). There is reason to believe that MacEachen was the original editor of the Scottish Gaelic prayer book Iùl a' Chrìosdaidh, which first appeared in 1834 (8th ed. 1963). He also published (1832) a treatise (in English) on arithmetic and a Gaelic-English dictionary, based on his native dialect of Arisaig, in 1842.

From 1814 MacEachen lived and worked in the eastern district of Scotland, though the great majority of Gaelic-speaking Catholics (about 13,000 as against 3,000) were in the western district. Bitter criticism by certain western-district clergymen of MacEachen's Gaelic orthography and style led Bishop Scott of the western district to insist that MacEachen's writings be revised by two of the bishop's clergy before publication, a step that MacEachen resented. Some of MacEachen's usages show a reaction against the influence of literary Irish and Argyllshire Gaelic in favor of his Invernessshire dialect.

Bibliography: D. MACLEAN, Typographia Scoto-Gadelica (Edinburgh 1915). The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 12:513.

[J. L. CAMPBELL]

MACEDO COSTA, ANTÔNIO DE

Brazilian bishop and active opponent of regalism; b. Maragogipe, Bahia, Aug. 7, 1830; d. Barbacena, Minas Gerais, March 21, 1891. He was educated in Maragogipe and Salvador, finished his seminary training at Saint-Sulpice in Paris, and was ordained on Dec. 19, 1857. He received the degree of doctor of Canon Law in Rome on June 28, 1859, and entered teaching when he returned to Brazil the same year. Dom Antônio was nominated to fill the vacant See of Pará, and was consecrated in Petrópolis on April 21, 1861, and took formal possession of his see in August.

Dom Antônio is remembered for his memorials directed to the imperial government condemning the interference of the state in the spiritual jurisdiction of the Brazilian church. He involved himself early in the controversy over FREEMASONRY's infiltration of the religious brotherhoods. Such action brought about his arrest on April 28, 1874. He was tried and sentenced on July 28, 1874. During his imprisonment, Dom Antônio continued his fight against Freemasonry and carried on his episcopal ministry: on Oct. 22, 1874, he issued a pastoral giving the reasons behind the Religious Question and on Jan. 6, 1875, he ordained two candidates for the priesthood. Dom Antônio was amnestied with Dom Vital GONÇALVES DE OLIVEIRA on Sept. 17, 1875, and visited Pius XI in February of 1877.

Some historians maintain that Pedro II granted this amnesty because he and his ministers recognized in the actions of these prelates, signs of a growing independent ecclesiastical leadership that threatened regalism. To quash such a movement the Religious Question had to be quickly and effectively settled. When Dom Antônio returned to his remote diocese of Pará, he had a much less advantageous platform from which to carry on his battle against imperial regalism; nevertheless, he did protest, and apparently won the intense dislike of Dom Pedro II.

After the fall of the empire on Nov. 15, 1889, it was Dom Antônio and not the archbishop of Bahia, the primate of Brazil, who wrote the Pastoral colectiva, March 19, 1890, enunciating the Church's acceptance of the republic and explaining its relation to the Church. When the bishops of Brazil convened in Sãao Paulo on July 16, 1890, Dom Antônio presided. He had been transferred to the primatial see of Bahia on June 26, 1890. In September of 1890, despite his failing health, Dom Antônio went to Rome to apprise the pope of conditions in the Brazilian church. He returned in early November because he wanted to be in Rio de Janeiro when the Constituent Assembly convened later that month. Responsibility for shaping the political events weighed heavily on Dom Antônio. It was one of his sorrows that his involvement in government affairs prevented his going to his new See of Bahia. He never took official possession of his archdiocese even though he assumed the presidency of the Brazilian hierarchy.

Government statements at the time of Dom Antônio's death as well as general newspaper comment reveal the high regard in which he was held in his own country. He made a positive contribution to ecclesiastical vigor and to the prestige of the Church at the advent of the republic.

Bibliography: F. GUERRA, A questãao religiosa do segundo império brasileiro (Rio de Janeiro 1952). F. DE OLÍVOLA, Um grande brasileiro (Recife 1936).

[M. C. THORNTON]

MACEDONIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, located in the Balkan Peninsula, is bordered on the north by SERBIA, on the east by BULGARIA, on the south by GREECE and on the west by ALBANIA. A plateau, the region also features heavily forested mountains and enjoys a moderate climate. Three large lakes and the Vardar River provide water to this landlocked region. Natural resources include chromium lead, iron, ore, zinc, tungsten and nickel, while cereals, rice, tobacco and livestock are among Macedonia's agricultural products.

In 1913, following the Balkan War, the Balkans were divided between Greece (Greek Macedonia) and Serbia. The Serbian portion, known as South Serbia until 1947, became a constituent of the Yugoslav Republic under its new name, Macedonia. The region declared its independence in 1991, although conflicts with Greece over its flag, certain Hellenic symbols and the potential for confusion with Greek Macedonia to the south delayed full recognition and membership in the European Community until 1995. Most Macedonians worked as migrant laborers in the economically advanced nations of Germany and Switzerland.

Early History. In 379 the Roman Empire divided Illyricum into east and west. Eastern Illyricum, which includes modern Macedonia, was ruled by the Eastern Roman Empire, where Greek Byzantine culture predominated. It belonged ecclesiastically to the Rome Patriarchate until 732, when Emperor Leo III made it subject to the CONSTANTINOPLE Patriarchate. Slavs settled in the region during the 7th and 8th centuries and avoided assimilation with Greek culture. The region would be independent under Czar Samuel (980-1014), but otherwise was almost continually subject to Byzantine, Serbian or Turkish overlords. The centuries of domination by the Ottoman Turks in particular left Macedonian culture unrefined, and the Macedonian people uneducated and lacking a strong sense of ethnic identity. Even in the 20th century Bulgaria claimed Macedonian Slavs were actually Bulgars, while Greece countered that the inhabitants of Aegean Macedonia were ethnic Greeks who happened to speak a Slavic language.

Macedonia received Christianity from its Byzantine neighbors during the 8th and 9th centuries. The disciples of Saints Cyril and Methodius were mostly Macedonians. After they were banished from Great Moravia they returned to their homeland and promoted the Slavonic liturgy and culture. One of them, St. Clement of Ohrid (d. 916), was consecrated in 893 as the first Slav bishop. After the destruction of the first Bulgarian Empire in 971 the Bulgarian patriarch sought refuge in independent Macedonia and fixed his residence in Ohrid, Czar Samuel's capital. The Byzantine Emperor Basil II Bulgaroktonos defeated Macedonia in 1018 and annexed it to Byzantium, but in 1019 he decreed that Ohrid should remain an autocephalous major archiepiscopate with jurisdiction over the dioceses in the western part of the Balkan peninsula. This status lasted until 1767, when the Turks suppressed and subjected Ohrid to Constantinople. Not until 1958 did the Macedonian Orthodox Church regain autonomous status within the Serbian Patriarchate. In 1859 a movement toward union with the Catholic Church began in Macedonia and soon enrolled about 50,000 people. This led the Holy See in 1883 to erect a vicariate apostolic in Thessalonike.

By the 19th century Bulgars, Serbs and Greeks entered the region, creating an ethnic mix. After Bulgaria's defeat in the Second Balkan War, an anti-Bulgarian campaign began in the region causing Bulgarian schools and churches to close and thousands of Macedonians to flee to Bulgaria. Yugoslavia, which came into being on Dec. 1, 1918, as the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, included Serbia, Macedonia, Croatia, Slovenia, Dalmatia, Montenegro and Voivodina. Between the world wars Macedonian terrorist groups, supported by Bulgaria, fought the Serb-controlled Yugoslav government. While Yugoslavia refused to recognize a Macedonian nation, many Macedonians accepted that country's control. During World War II Bulgaria occupied Macedonia, but their occupation proved little better. After the war communists seized power and in 1946 established the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia, let by Josip Broz Tito. Macedonia was the poorest nation in the new federation.

Under Yugoslav Domination. While Yugoslavia promulgated a constitution (Nov. 30, 1946) that guaranteed religious liberty, it concurrently demonstrated its opposition to all religions by openly persecuting them. Leaders from Catholic and Muslim congregations were imprisoned on charges of treason, Catholic and other religious schools were closed, Church property was confiscated and religious associations were suppressed. Fortunately such persecution diminished after the late 1940s as Tito attempted to court favor with Western powers, although they did not cease altogether until the 1980s.

In Macedonia's case, the government's fight against religious faith took a different course, due to Yugoslavia's desire to develop Macedonian nationalism. Several years after taking power, the government recognized Macedonian nationhood by making the region a separate republic with its own parliament. Through this action Yu-

Capital: Skopje. Size: 9,928 sq. miles.

Population: 2,041,460 in 2000. Languages: Macedonian, Serbo-Croat.

Religions: 60,420 Catholics (3%), 613,050 Muslims (30%),

1,367,990 Macedonian Orthodox (67%).

Diocese: Skopje-Prijren, suffragan to Vrhbosna (Sarajevo), in

Bosnia-Herzegovina.

goslavia countered claims by Greece and Bulgaria that "Macedonian" was merely a territorial signifier. The government continued to encourage the development of a uniquely Macedonian consciousness through use of the Macedonian language (the first standardized Macedonian grammar was published in 1948). Federal support for Macedonian cultural institutions included funding a university in Skopje.

The Macedonian Orthodox Church. While the Orthodox community at first refused to recognize an independent Macedonian Orthodox Church, in 1958 the Serbian Orthodox hierarchy recognized the Macedonian dioceses by consecrating a Macedonian bishop. The activities of Macedonian Orthodox remained under the authority of the Serbian Orthodox Church until 1967, when the church was proclaimed independent. After that point, the Serbian Orthodox Church discontinued further relations. Aware that a self-governing Macedonian church would enhance the sense of Macedonian ethnicity and nationhood they were attempting to develop, the Yugoslav political authorities in Belgrade awarded the Macedonian Orthodox Church favored status. Without recognition from the Serbian hierarchy, however, the Macedonian church remained isolated from the international Orthodox community. By the late 20th century it had six dioceses in Yugoslavia and two abroad, 225 parishes, 102 monasteries, about 250 priests and about 15 monks, and one school of theology.

Into the 21st Century. In 1990 a democratic party won elections in Macedonia, and the nation gained independence on Sept. 17, 1991, under a new constitution. President Kiro Gligorov was injured in an assassination attempt in 1995, after winning his second election. As violence against ethnic Albanians accelerated in neighboring Kosovo, the Kiro government feared that the significant Albanian population in Macedonia would demand that the country take action. After U.N troops stepped in, a newer threat emerged: the stress of tending for thousands of Kosovar refugees that was falling on a Macedonian economy weakened by a three-year trade blockade by Greece. Fortunately, nations such as Great Britain, Saudi Arabia, Israel and Iran ultimately stepped in to help. In 1999 Boris Trajkovski was elected president, his primary task was to boost the region's stillsagging economy and deal with a pending border dispute with Serbia.

As a Latin-rite church in an Eastern Orthodox region, Macedonia's Roman Catholic Church continued to be a minority faith, although the Macedonian Church did not have official status under the constitution. By 2000 Catholics in Macedonia lived primarily in or near Skopje; they had 30 parishes tended by 58 secular and two religious priests, while 120 sisters administered educational and medical assistance. Macedonian Catholics shared their diocese with Catholics in Kosovo, and provided much needed assistance in efforts to care for Albanian refugees during Serbian efforts to ethnically cleanse the area of Muslim influences in the late 1990s. During the air strikes by NATO, the region's Catholics aided British troops and international aid agencies in tending to the thousands of Kosovars' forced over the Serbian border into Macedonia. The government encouraged relations between the nation's three major faiths by hosting ecumenical functions on a regular basis.

Bibliography: Monumenta spectantia historiam Slavorum meridionalium (Zagreb 1868–), 46 v. to 1951. M. SPINKA, A History of Christianity in the Balkans (Chicago, IL 1933). R. RISTELHUE-BER, Histoire des peoples balkaniques (Paris 1950). P. D. OSTROVÍC, The Truth about Yugoslavia (New York 1952). W. MARKERT, Jugoslawien (Cologne 1954). F. DVORNIK, The Slavs: Their Early History and Civilization (Boston 1956); The Slavs in European History and Civilization (New Brunswick, NJ 1962). K. S. LATOU-RETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 v. (New York 1958-62) v.1, 2, 4. B. KONESKI, Toward the Macedonian Renaissance, tr. I. KOVILOSKA (Skopje 1961). S. P. RAMET, Nihil Obstat: Religion, Politics, and Social Change in East-Central Europe and Russia (Durham, NC 1998). J. MATL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 5:1191-94. B. SPULER and H. KOCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 3:1054-60. Bilan du Monde 2:914-928. Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses and apostolic administrations.

[P. SHELTON]

MACEDONIUS, ST.

Anchorite renowned throughout Syria, Phoenicia, and Cilicia; d. near Antioch, c. 430. THEODORET (Hist. relig. 13) furnishes information about Macedonius, who was called Critophages because for 40 years, refusing bread, he lived on barley moistened with water. For the first 45 years of his desert life (360–430 according to L. de Tillemont) Macedonius disdained a tent or hut and lived in a cave which the crowds, flocking to see him, often forced him to change. He worked many miracles with water and the sign of the cross, and Theodoret, whose mother had been childless for the first 13 years of her marriage, attributed his own birth to the hermit's prayers. Macedonius was persuaded by Patriarch Flavian of Antioch to accept priestly ordination (after 381), and his counsels of moderation profited the Antiochenes in their peril from the riots over the imperial statutes in 387 (see JOHN CHRYSOSTOM).

Feast: Jan. 24.

Bibliography: THEODORET OF CYR, Historia religiosa, Patrolofia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 82:1399. Acta Sanctorum Jan. 3:207–212. S. C. TILLEMONT, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles (Paris 1693–1712) 10:533; 12:487, 681. C. HOLE, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE (London 1877–87) 3:778. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:161.

[A. A. STEPHENSON]

MACELWANE, JAMES BERNARD

Educator, geophysicist, and founder of the Jesuit Seismological Association; b. Port Clinton, Ohio, Sept. 28, 1883; d. St. Louis, Missouri, Feb. 15, 1956. The son of Alexander and Catherine (Carr) Macelwane, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1903 and was ordained in 1918. After receiving his doctorate in physics, with a dissertation in seismology under Elmer E. Hall, at the University of California, Berkeley, in 1923, he was appointed assistant professor of geology at Berkeley, where he helped to organize a chain of seismograph stations in California. He was named professor of geophysics and director of the new department of geophysics at St. Louis University in 1925. Macelwane published his first paper, "Physics of the Seismograph," in 1911. He was interested in the physical state of the core of the earth and studied microseisms and their relation to the earth's surface and to regional atmospheric conditions and explored geophysical methods of prospecting for oil. He published 133 technical papers and two books besides contributing chapters to several other books. During World War II he was a member of the research and development board of the Department of Defense and was appointed a member of the board of the National Science Foundation in 1954. At the time of his death he was serving his third year as president of the American Geophysical Union and was chairman of the United States Technical Panel on Seismology and Gravity for the International Geophysical Year. He was a member of the National Academy of Sciences.

Bibliography: P. BYERLY and W. V. STAUDER, "James B. Macelwane, S.J.," Biographical Memoirs, National Academy of Sciences, 31 (1958) 254–281.

[P. H. YANCEY]

MACEVILLY, JOHN

Archbishop and exegete; b. Louisburgh, County Mayo, Ireland, April 15, 1818; d. Tuam, Ireland, Nov. 26, 1902. He was educated at St. Jarlath's College, Tuam, and at Maynooth, and was ordained in 1842. Appointed professor of Sacred Scripture at St. Jarlath's in 1844, he was its president from 1852 to 1857. He was elected bishop of Galway in 1857, appointed apostolic administrator of Kilmacduagh and Kilfenora in 1866, and attended the Vatican Council I (1869–70). H was made coadjutor of Tuam in 1877, and he became archbishop in 1881, a post he held till his death. In spite of his many episcopal cares, he found time to engage in serious Scripture studies and has the honor of being the first English-writing Catholic commentator on all the New Testament Books (except Revelation). His works, formerly in wide use in the English-speaking world, are now largely outmoded.

Bibliography: J. J. TWOMEY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 6:1256-57. J. HEALY, Maynooth College: Its Centenary History (New York 1895) 622-624.

[K. O'SULLIVAN]

MACHALE, JOHN

Archbishop of TUAM and Irish patriot; b. Tubbernavine, County Mayo, March 6, 1791; d. Tuam, County Galway, Nov. 4, 1881. He was the son of Patrick MacHale, a tenant farmer and innkeeper of Tirawley, County Mayo, and Mary (Mulchiarian) Hale. His native tongue was Gaelic and his primary education was at the local hedge school. The uprising of 1798 in Ireland, particularly the execution of Andrew Conroy, the priest who had baptized him, fired young MacHale's patriotism. After studying at the preparatory school in Castlebar (1803-07), he was granted a scholarship at St. Patrick's College, MAYNOOTH, the national seminary. MacHale excelled in theology and languages and lectured in theology while still a subdeacon. He was ordained in 1814 and then taught theology at Maynooth as an assistant and later as a professor (1814-25).

In 1820 he began a series of letters that appeared in various newspapers. Under the pseudonym "Hieropolis" he articulated the discontent of many Irish Catholics concerning the established Church of Ireland and the system of vestry taxes and tithes paid by Catholics to support its clergy and church edifices. MacHale appealed for Catholic EMANCIPATION and the repeal of the political union of Great Britain and Ireland. This series of letters attracted the notice of Daniel O'CONNELL; soon MacHale became one of his most prominent allies. In 1825 MacHale became coadjutor bishop of Killala, but he continued to participate in the agitation for emancipation. He was instrumental in breaking the stranglehold of a Tory family, the Brownes, on the political life of County Mayo (1826). MacHale was constantly involved in controversies over the Protestant Bible societies and proselytism among the tenant farmers. In 1830 he wrote open letters to Charles Grey, the prime minister, seeking famine relief and describing the hardships inflicted by the decline of the linen trade and by the exorbitant rents paid by Irish tenant farmers. He also joined a delegation to impress upon the prime minister the urgency of conditions in western Ireland.

MacHale began the construction of a cathedral in Ballina (1827), but in 1831 poor health compelled him to reside in Rome, where he won the friendship and confidence of Pope Gregory XVI. He became bishop of Killala (May 1834), but in July he was transferred to the Archdiocese of Tuam, despite strong governmental opposition because of his fiery nationalism. His vigorous denunciations of London's neglect and maladministration of Ireland and his enthusiastic advocacy of Irish culture and the use of the Irish language gave some credibility to beliefs that he was anti-English. The English Catholic Lords Clifford and Shrewsbury engaged in a bitter newspaper controversy with him over the fairness of his criticisms (1835). Although MacHale disagreed with O'Connell on many points, he approved the latter's agitation for repeal of the Act of Union of 1801 and for the establishment of an Irish parliament in Dublin. However, MacHale disapproved of the violent methods of Young Ireland. During the terrible famine of 1847 he was indefatigable in seeking relief for his starving flock by appealing abroad for assistance and by urging the government to more effective measures. His episcopal residence became a center for distributing food. This experience strengthened his interest in the tenants right movement and in the Irish Land League as means of alleviating the situation.

MacHale's persistent opposition to any system of education that mixed Catholic with Protestant children and that excluded the teaching of religion led to the rejection by the Irish hierarchy of the plans for national schools and queen's colleges as advocated by the governments of Robert Peel and John Russell (1847–50). Within his own archdiocese, MacHale laid the foundation for a Catholic school system by utilizing the Irish Christian Brothers, Third Order Regulars of St. Francis, and Sisters of Mercy. MacHale's views prevailed in Rome, although they did not have the assent of all the Irish bishops. At the Synod of Thurles (1850) MacHale joined forces with Paul CULLEN, Archbishop of Armagh (later of Dublin), to win a majority of one vote in favor of rejecting the government's educational system and forbidding Catholic attendance and cooperation. In 1869 the Irish hierarchy formally condemned the system of mixed education, and Pius IX ratified their decision. MacHale also approved the projected Catholic University in Dublin, but his opposition to the selection of John Henry NEWMAN as first rector and to Newman's management was in good part responsible for the failure of the plan.

After 1854 MacHale's influence on the Irish hierarchy and in Rome declined as Cullen's grew. The archbishop of Tuam was considered too independent and too immoderate. In his declining years, he withdrew completely from political controversy. At VATICAN COUNCIL I he was among the minority of bishops who considered a solemn definition of papal primacy and infallibility inopportune, but he accepted the conciliar decisions without difficulty.

Among the Irish-speaking people of Connaught, MacHale was cherished for his kindness, charity, and zeal for their spiritual and material welfare. His practice each Sunday was to preach in Gaelic, and he used this language regularly in addressing his flock. He published poems, textbooks, catechisms, prayerbooks, and devotional works in Gaelic; but his most significant publications were his translations of the Pentateuch (1861) and Homer's Iliad (1841–71). The archbishop was austere, energetic, and industrious. Not until 1879, when he was 88 years old, did he receive a coadjutor to aid him in administering the see. At the age of 90 he preached regularly at Sunday Mass.

Bibliography: U. J. BOURKE, The Life and Times of the Most Rev. John MacHale (Baltimore 1882). O. J. BURKE, The History of the Catholic Archbishops of Tuam (Dublin 1882). B. O'REILLY, John MacHale, Archbishop of Tuam, 2 v. (New York 1890). E. A. D'ALTON, History of the Archdiocese of Tuam, 2 v. (Dublin 1928). N. COSTELLO, John MacHale, Archbishop of Tuam (Dublin 1939), lists MacHale's pubs. in the Irish lang. J. F. BRODERICK, "The Holy See and the Irish Movement for the Repeal of the Union with England," Analecta Gregoriana 55 (1951). N. MOORE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 12:550–552.

[P. K. EGAN]

MACHAUT, GUILLAUME DE

14th-century poet and ars nova composer (also Machault, Machault, Machault, France, c. 1300; d. Reims, c. 1377. Sometime secretary to John of Luxembourg (king of Bohemia) and later a canon of Reims cathedral, he achieved renown for his secular lais, ballades, rondeaux, and chansons, for the remarkable structure of his motets, of which six are of undoubted liturgical intent, and for the masterly design of his Messe de Notre Dame. The motets, because of their use of isorhythmic tenors and resulting long-held notes (see MOTET), sometimes recall earlier techniques such as organum. In rhythmic subtlety and harmonic interest they are forward-looking. In the Mass, he unified the Kyrie, Sanctus, Agnus Dei, and Ite missa est by skillful use of isorhythm; the Gloria and Credo were set in a direct and declamatory style, thus providing contrast in texture and the necessary freedom demanded by longer texts. His poetry was influenced by Ovid, St. BEDE, and other Latin poets, and in its turn became a source for Chaucer and other writers. In style it is a step away from the generalized romanticism of the trouvères in the direction of the more personal idiom of Villon, with a certain preoccupation with form that marks the decline of medieval poetry and the beginnings of a new French school.

Bibliography: G. MACHAUT, Musikalische Werke, ed. F. LUDWIG, 4 v. (Leipzig 1926–54); Opera, ed. G. DE VAN (Corpus mensurabilis musicae 2; 1949–); Oeuvres, ed. E. HOEPFFNER (Paris 1908–21). A. MACHABEY, G. de Machaut, 2 v. (Paris 1955). s.

LEVARIE, Guillaume de Machaut (New York 1954). S. J. WILLIAMS, The Music of Guillaume de Machaut (Doctoral diss. unpub. Yale U. 1952). G. REANEY, "Ars Nova in France," New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP, 11 v. (New York 1957-) 3: 1-30. L. SCHRADE, ed., Polyphonic Music of the 14th Century, 4 v. (Monaco 1956-58), v.2-3, with comment. G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940) 347–359. W. A. NITZE and E. P. DARGAN, A History of French Literature (3d ed. New York 1938). L. M. EARP, Guillaume de Machaut: A Guide to Research (New York, 1995). Machaut's World: Science and Art in the Fourteenth Century, conference proceedings (New York 1978). W. CALIN, A Poet at the Fountain: Essays on the Narrative Verse of Guillaume de Machaut (Lexington, Ky. 1974). D. LEECH-WILKINSON, Machaut's Mass: An Introduction (Oxford 1990). Y. PLUMLEY, "Guillaume de Machaut 700 Years On," Early Music, vol. 28, no. 3 (2000) 487. D. LEECH-WILKINSON, "'Le Voir Dit' and 'La Messe de Nostre Dame': Aspects of Genre and Style in the Late Works of Machaut," Plainsong and Medieval Music 2, no. 1 (1993) 43.

[D. STEVENS]

MACHEBEUF, JOSEPH PROJECTUS

Bishop and missionary; b. Riom, France, Aug. 11, 1812; d. Denver, Colorado, July 10, 1889. He was educated by the Brothers of the Christian Schools. After pursuing classical studies at the College of Riom, he entered the Grand Seminary of Montferrand; he was ordained on Dec. 21, 1836. He arrived in the United States on Aug. 21, 1839, with John Baptiste Lamy. After serving in the Ohio missions, where he was known as a church builder and temperance advocate, he became pastor of Lower Sandusky in 1841. In 1851 he went to Santa Fe, North Mexico to serve under Lamy, the first vicar-general of the territory and later its bishop and archbishop. Between adventurous missionary journeys, which took him into Mexico and Arizona, Machebeuf acted as pastor at Albuquerque and Santa Fe, where he helped to restore discipline to the native clergy. In 1860 he was sent by Lamy to Denver to care for the mining population of the new community. He soon established churches and became a familiar figure in every boom town in the territory. On Aug. 16, 1868, Machebeuf became the first vicar apostolic of Colorado, a jurisdiction that then included Utah and Wyoming territories.

The vicariate of Colorado was made a diocese on Aug. 16, 1887, with Denver as the see city and Machebeuf as the first bishop. In a diocese that embraced the entire state of Colorado, he established churches at Central City (1863), Trinidad (1865), Golden (1863), Walsenburg (1869), and Colorado Springs (1876). He invited the first teaching and charitable orders to Colorado and established the Catholic educational system in the state. In 1873, he founded St. Joseph's Hospital, the first permanent hospital in Denver. He was responsible for the establishment, in 1888, of Colorado's first Catholic college for men, the College of the Sacred Heart (later Regis College, Denver). The state's first Catholic charitable institutions, St. Vincent's Orphanage and the Good Shepherd's Home, were built in his time. By 1889 there were 102 churches and chapels, 16 parish schools, nine academies, one orphanage, one protective home, one college for men, and 40,000 Catholics in his diocese.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of Denver. W. J. HOW-LETT, Life of the Rt. Reverend Joseph P. Machebeuf, D.D. (Pueblo, Colo. 1908).

[W. H. JONES]

MACHIAVELLI, NICCOLÒ

Political theorist and historian; b, Florence, Italy, May 3, 1469; d. there, June 2, 1527. The Machiavelli family belonged to the old rural nobility, which, on taking up residence in the city, gave the Commune numerous magistrates, priors, and gonfaloniers. Despite Machiavelli's distinguished lineage, Niccolò's own father counted among the poorest members of the family. He was an attorney, forbidden to practice law in the city of FLORENCE, because he had been for a time imprisoned as a debtor. His father eked out a living in genteel poverty on the city's outskirts, administering the few lands that he had and furtively practicing the law. These straightened circumstances affected Niccolò Machiavelli's early years. Although he was educated, he was never trained as a humanist, nor could he read or speak Greek, one of the chief signs of social and educational distinction in late fifteenth-century Florence.

Life. Niccolò's life may be divided into three periods: the first, the time of study and preparation that ended in 1494 when he entered public office of the Republic; the second (1494–1512), a period of political activity; the third, from 1512 to his death. In the last period he devoted himself to intense literary activity, apart from the last two years of his life, when he was again occupied with affairs of state.

First Two Periods. No reliable information is available for his first period. His works contain very little autobiographical data, and his letters do not refer to the years of his youth. From 1494 he emerges as an official of the Republic of Florence. In 1498, Niccolò Machiavelli was made head of Florence's second chancery, an important office for one who was then only 29 years old. The town's second chancery was concerned with foreign policy, military organization and in part with internal affairs (e.g. police matters). Machiavelli made more than 30 diplomatic missions while serving in this capacity. His associations with the first chancery were also important:

it was headed by the learned humanist Marcello Virgilio Adriana, who perhaps exercised some influence on Machiavelli's cultural formation.

In the midst of political events and intrigues, Machiavelli reflected on them and derived inspiration for his future thought. He was constant in his devotion to experience as an effective teacher and in his daily observation of men and things, a habit he was still to retain even at San Casciano after his political disgrace. All this is clear from a letter to his friend Francesco Vettori (Dec. 10, 1513): "Then I betake myself to the street and go to the inns. I talk with those who pass, asking them for news about their localities. I hear various things and I note the different tastes and diverse thoughts of men" (Letter 137).

Some of the embassies exercised a decisive influence on Machiavelli's mind, such as the two (June and October 1502) to Cesare Borgia (Il Valentino), the astute and unscrupulous prince in whom the young secretary saw the type of statesman needed in a divided Italy overrun by foreigners, or the two missions to the Court of Rome (1503, 1506), which gave him an opportunity to study the temporal government of the Church. When entrusted with a mission to Pisa, that rebellious city within the Tuscan state, he conceived the plan of establishing a citizen militia that would replace Florence's untrustworthy mercenary troops. He began to enroll soldiers throughout the territory of Florence, and in 1506 he obtained the establishment of a special magistracy, the Nove di Milizia, and became its secretary. In 1509, in the final phase of the siege of Pisa, Machiavelli himself employed the first detachments of his ordinanza, or new militia. During these years Machiavelli also appears to have been involved with the artist Leonardo da Vinci in an illfated plan to divert Tuscany's Arno River away from the restive city of Pisa.

New matter for observation and meditation was offered to Machiavelli by his missions outside of Italy to Louis XII of France (1500, 1504, 1510) and to the Emperor Maximilian I in the Tyrol (1507). For this intense activity as a functionary, diplomat, and penetrating observer, there is copious documentation extant in the form of official correspondence and of reports.

Third Period. When the Republic of Soderini fell in 1512 and the Medici reentered Florence with the aid of the forces of the Holy League, Machiavelli, the devoted functionary and republican at heart, was put aside. He was exiled in the territory of the state and condemned to forced leisure at San Casciano, precisely in the country (the "four houses") of Sant'Andrea in Perussina. For his life in this period there is extant correspondence with his friend Francesco Vittori, the Florentine orator close to Pope LEO X (DE' MEDICI). It is especially important for an understanding of the origins and value of Machiavelli's major works and for his judgments on the particular events of the time. He was born for political action-or so at least he believed—and did not resign himself to the role of an idle spectator, even if his writings are owed to this period of political inactivity. He entertained the false hope that his friend could influence the pope so that he might be recalled to Florence and enter the service of the Medici. But his republican past stood in the way. There was nothing left for him to do except to unbosom his angry despair to Vettori, play practical jokes with his friends in the shop of Donato Del Corno, or find consolation in good dinners—although his means were limited. Machiavelli himself describes his day in detail in the letter to Vettori cited above.

In 1520 came the first sign of benevolence from the Medici. Cardinal Giulio (the future Pope CLEMENT VII) requested Machiavelli to write a history of Florence, but he was not given any position of even modest importance before 1525, when, at the request of Clement VII and Medicean Florence, he was entrusted with two missions to his friend Francesco Guicciardini, lieutenant general of the papal army in the war against the Spaniards. After the pope had decided to strengthen the defenses of Florence, Machiavelli was asked to work out a plan for the fortifications and was appointed chancellor of the five procurators for the walls. This was a modest post, in which he experimented again with his citizen militia (ordinanza), entrusted to the command of Giovanni dalle Bande Nere.

Events, however, took a rapid and disastrous turn. The German mercenaries (lanzichenecchi), under the command of the Lutheran Georg Frundsberg, invaded and sacked Rome. Clement VII shut himself up in the Castel Sant' Angelo; Florence rebelled against the Medici, and they were forced to leave. Machiavelli, who had come to intimate terms with them, found himself again put aside. He did not survive long following this second embarrassment. His son wrote to Nelli that "he confessed his sins to Friar Matteo, who stayed with him until his death" ("lasciossi confessare le sue peccata da un frate Matteo"). His remains lie in S. Croce in Florence near those of Galileo, Alfieri, and Foscolo. His monument bears the inscription "tanto nomini nullum par elogium"; it was erected only in 1787 on the initiative of the Englishman Lord Cooper.

Works. The first significant work was Descrizione del modo tenuto dal Duca Valentino nell' ammazzarre Vitellozzo Vitelli, Oliverotto da Fermo, il signor Paolo e il duca di Gavina Orsini (written perhaps 1509). It describes with cold and penetrating observation the massacre at Senigallia that was skillfully prepared and carried out with deliberate ferocity by Cesare BORGIA. As Norsa has noted [Machiavelli (Milan 1948) 47], this short piece exhibits one of Machiavelli's characteristic procedures: "his tendency to transform reality by interpreting and evaluating it according to the principles of his political doctrine. History has value in so far as it furnishes experimental confirmation of these principles." His most famous work, Il Principe, a brief treatise in 26 chapters, was composed between the second half of 1513 and the first days of 1514. The author delineates with artistic power the figure of the prince, resolved without any scruple whatever to attain his end, i.e., to rescue Italy from ruin and even to unify the peninsula politically. The Prince is completed by the Discorsi sulla prima Deca di Tito Livio, in three books. Begun in this period and continued to the end of 1517, it is a free political commentary on certain passages of Livy and of other ancient historians, an unsystematic but effective exposition of the political thought of its author. The fundamental importance that Machiavelli attached to the army in relation to the government of the state is revealed, especially by the systematic exposition and the very careful form in which he presents his ideas, in the treatise L'arte della guerra, written between 1516 and 1520. The Vita di Castruccio Castracani (1520) is a kind of historical novel, representing as an ideal warrior prince a condottiere of Lucca. But Machiavelli wrote genuine historical works. His Istorie florentine, composed between 1520 and 1525 in eight books, covers the city's history from its beginning to the death of Lorenzo the Magnificent (1492). Even here Machiavelli applies his political doctrines to historical facts in such a way that the latter serve to demonstrate the former.

In these works he already reveals himself also as a powerful and original writer, taking a high place among the great prose artists of the Italian tongue. His artistic propensities and qualities are more prominent in works more explicitly literary. Il Decennale primo and Il Decennale secondo (incomplete) are chronicles in terza rima dealing with Florentine events from 1494 to 1504 and from 1504 to 1509. These and other verse compositions, e.g., I Canti Carnascialeschi, give him no claim to be called a poet. His I Capitoli morali have little interest as compared with his incomplete L'Asino d'Oro, written between 1516 and 1517. His authorship of Il Discorso o dialogo intorno alla nostra lingua is dubious. The Favola del demonio che prese moglie, better known as Novella di Belfagor Arcidiavolo, is a mordant satire on women, but a reworking of a traditional story. His La mandragola, the masterpiece of Cinquecento comedy, was first played at Florence, perhaps in 1520, and often elsewhere, with great success, and continues to live. His other comedy, La Clizia, is an imitation, being a verse translation of Terence's Andria; its influence was marked. Except for L'arte della guerra and Mandragola, all his works were published posthumously; during his lifetime the principal works circulated in MSS among friends.

Thought. In 1531 and 1532 the printers Baldi at Rome and Giusti at Florence published Il Principe and the I Discorsi respectively, the two basic texts containing the political thought of Machiavelli, "the first theorist on the interests of the state," as Meinecke calls him, and the founder of modern political science. Machiavelli establishes this science in its own autonomous domain, free from all moral implications and religious influence. His method relies upon historical and empirical observation of political events, either those he is familiar with from contemporary Europe or stories drawn from the works of the ancients. From these events he attempts to derive universal scientific observations about politics. He thus reduces politics to a series of technical problems, to the essential theory of power that is obedient to certain perennial laws that either ensures failure or success in the exercise of power. This is the originality of Machiavelli's concept of politics. Even if it has its limits by what it excludes (all moral and religious implication) and what it includes, politics is regarded as the body of practical rules and immutable laws to be applied coldly to obtain or preserve power, for affirming one's own will to power and for achieving success, and all this "technically" and "scientifically."

Corruption of Nature. Human nature has always been and is, immutably, corrupt and turned toward evil, Machiavelli affirms, in accordance with a Christian tradition of original sin. Man is ruthless in seeking what he regards as useful to him, but is never satisfied. He abandons himself blindly to the most insane passions, to the lust for riches, pleasures, power, and success. He follows the blind determinism of his natural instinct (and this permits us to make use of "the experience of the ancients" for understanding modern affairs and for providing for the present and, in some measure, even for the future), which is turned not only to cupidity, but also to meanness, cowardice, duplicity, etc. Christianity has not redeemed humanity; on the contrary, it has promoted man's decline by its glorification of humble and contemplative men: "And if our religion demands that you have fortitude in you, it means that you should be able to suffer bravely rather than to do anything bravely. This manner of life, therefore, seems to have made the world weak and to have given it only as a prey to wicked men. . . '' (Discorsi 2.2).

On the one hand, the remedy lies in the few good men—exceptions to the rule of human wickedness—who think of the common good and not of themselves alone; on the other, it lies in the state, understood as a power of dominion and coercion. This power should be employed in such a way that the ruler takes no thought about the means he uses to enforce order. Machiavelli understands order as a superior end that justifies the use of political power. In this way of thinking, religion is only an instrument of rule, a means to an end. It is not privileged among all means at a prince's disposal, but only one means on the level of all the others.

Fortune and virtù. Thus the effective prince imposes his will over the human passions so that he can curb and govern them. Machiavelli defines "fortune" as all that is unforeseeable and irrational, all that is chaotic and contingent in human experience. By contrast those things that fall within the sphere of human action—whatever is knowable, foreseeable and controllable—is what he identifies as virtù. Virtù, he also defines as vigor and physical health, heroic fortitude of spirit, astuteness and ability, the capability of foreseeing events and of controlling them through one's will. These allow the prince to establish order in chaos and in evil. Fortune "shows its power where there is no ordered virtù to resist it and it turns its force where it knows that no embankments or barriers have been made to hold it" (Principe ch. 25).

Decline of States. But order is always partial and temporal; as soon as the master loosens his grip, the chaos of the passions reassumes its sovereignty. The iron and ruthless will of the statesman can restrain, control, and build an order by fear and force, but it cannot educate and redeem corrupt humanity. States, created by the virtù of a few men and by the purpose of virtù itself, are a temporal triumph of superior wills over the chaos of the unbridled mass. However, because of the irreparable corruption of man, states are destined to decline and decay. Hence the necessity for other dominating wills to put the blind forces of fortune back into their proper channels—and to this end any and every means is legitimate—and thus bring them under the laws of order. The study of the means best adapted to achieve this purpose is precisely what constitutes "technical politics," or the totality of the maxims that the statesman ought to follow and that, basically for Machiavelli, are suggested by the practice of his age and of all ages. It would be better if men were good, but this is not possible. Therefore, "men are so far removed in how they live from how they ought to live, that he who abandons what is done for what ought to be done will soon learn to bring about his own ruin rather than his preservation. Accordingly, a man who wishes to make a profession of goodness in all respects, invites his own ruin since he is among so many who are not good" (Principe ch. 15).

It has been said that to understand fully the Machiavellian principle that every means is legitimate to secure order, it is necessary to keep in mind the Italy of Machiavelli's time, with its attendant strains caused by political disunity and foreign invasion. It must also be remembered that Machiavelli wrote The Prince in part to rehabilitate his fortunes with the MEDICI following the collapse of Florence's republic. Scholars have long debated whether Il principe represents an ironic document, one in which Machiavelli subsumed his republicanism to curry favor with the Medici. Whatever the source of the ideas in Machiavelli's Principe—whether they derived from his deep concern about the course of Italian politics or from his exile from the center of power in Florence the ideas of that work have long been seen as one of the most troubling products of early-modern European political theory. When they are viewed from one direction, Machiavelli helped to establish the modern science of political theory, a science that emphasized observed political behavior and eventually natural law. Yet seen from another, his works gave birth to a tradition of Machiavellianism in which the ends of political order and stability were to be justified with any and all means.

Bibliography: Works. A complete critical ed. and a comprehensive systematic bibliog. do not exist. Opere, ed. P. FANFANI et al., 6 v. (Florence 1875-77), contains the Legazioni and other official correspondence; Lettere familiari, ed. E. ALVISI (Florence 1883); ed. G. LESCA (Florence 1929); ed. F. GAETA (Milan 1961); Tutte le opere storiche e letteraria, ed. G. MAZZONI and M. CASELLA (Florence 1928); Opere, ed. A. PANELLA, 2 v. (Milan 1939); Tutte le opere, ed. F. FLORA and C. CORDIE (Milan 1949-); Opere, ed. M. BONFANTINI (Milan 1954); Istorie florentine, ed. P. CARLI, 2 v. (Florence 1927); Dell' arte della guerra, ed. P. PIERI (Rome 1937); Il Principe, ed. L. A. BURD (Oxford 1891), with full commentary; ed. M. CASELLA (Rome 1929); ed. F. CHABOD (Turin 1924; new ed. L. FIRPO 1961); Discorses, ed. and tr. L. J. WALKER, 2 v. (London 1950), with English tr. and full, accurate commentary. Literature. A. NORSA, Il principio della forza nel pensiero di Niccolò Machiavelli (Milan 1936), a bibliog. of 2,113 items. L. RUSSO, Machiavelli (4th ed. Bari 1957). A. H. GILBERT, Machiavelli's Prince and Its Forerunners (Durham, NC 1938). H. BUTTERFIELD, The Statecraft of Machiavelli (New York 1956). A. RENAUDET, Machiavel (new ed. Paris 1955). U. SPIRITO, Machiavelli e Guicciardini (2d ed. Rome 1945). G. SASSO, Niccolò Machiavelli: Storia del suo pensiero politico (Naples 1958). J. NAMER, Machiavel (Paris 1961). F. GILBERT, Machiavelli and Guicciardini (Princeton 1965). J. H. HEX-TER, "The Loom of Language and the Fabric of Imperatives: The Case of Il Principe and Utopia," American Historical Review 69.4 (1964) 945–968. P. GODMAN, From Poliziano to Machiavelli (Princeton 1998). J. HEXTER, The Vision of Politics on the Eve of the Reformation (New York 1973). J. NAJEMY, Between Friends: Discourses of Power in the Machiavelli-Vettori Letters of 1513-1515 (Princeton 1993). J. G. A. POCOCK, The Machiavellian Movement (Princeton 1975). R. RIDOLFI, Vita di Niccoli Machiavelli (Florence 1969). Q. SKINNER, Machiavelli (New York 1981).

[M. F. SCIACCA]

MACKILLOP, MARY HELEN, BL.

Known in religion as Mary of the Cross, born Maria Ellen MacKillop, educator, foundress of the Josephite Sisters; b. Jan. 15, 1842, Fitzroy (near Melbourne), Australia; d. Aug. 8, 1909, Sydney, New South Wales.

The daughter of Highland Scottish immigrants, she was working as a governess when in 1861 she met Father Julian Tenison Woods, a missionary from England and one of the chief architects of Australia's Catholic education system. He inspired her to dedicate her life to teaching the children of the bush. In 1865, Mary and two younger sisters began teaching in an abandoned stable at Penola, South Australia.

Moving to Adelaide, Mary MacKillop and Father Woods founded the Institute of the Sisters of St. Joseph of the Sacred Heart. Together with her companions Mary pronounced the vows of religion Aug. 15, 1866, and took the name of Mother Mary of the Cross. Her efforts to adapt the new community to a colonial environment encountered a decade of lay and clerical misunderstanding and opposition. In 1871, the bishop of Adelaide excommunicated her and disbanded the sisterhood. A Jewish person gave the homeless nuns a house rent free, until their restoration in 1872.

In 1874, Mother Mary traveled to Rome and submitted her rule to Pope Pius IX. Rome's eventual decision was a compromise but the foundress won her principal point of central government for the sisters throughout the Australian colonies. She established 160 Josephite houses and 117 schools attended by more than 12,000 children. When she died after a long illness, her congregation numbered about 1,000.

Her tomb is in a vault donated by a Presbyterian woman in front of Our Lady's Altar in the Mount Street Josephite Chapel, North Sydney. At her beatification by John Paul II Jan. 19, 1995, at Randwick Racecourse in Sydney, she became the first Australian beata. Patron of Australia.

Feast: Aug. 7.

Bibliography: M. MACKILLOP, Julian Tension Woods, A Life (Blackburn, Vic., 1997). Australian Catholic Truth Society, Mother Mary of the Cross: Her Personality, Her Spirit (Melbourne 1973). C. DUNNE, Mary MacKillop: No Plaster Saint (Sydney 1994). P. GARDINER, Mary MacKillop: An Extraordinary Australian (Newtown, N.S.W. 1993). A. HENDERSON, Mary MacKillop's Sisters: A Life Unveiled (Sydney 1997). D. LYNE, Mary MacKillop, Spirituality and Charisma (Sydney 1983). W. MODYSTACK, Mary MacKillop: A Woman Before Her Time (New York 1982). F. O'BRIEN, Called to Love (Homebush, NSW 1993). L. O'BRIEN, Mary MacKillop Unveiled (N. Blackburn, Vic. 1994). L. STAUB-STAUDE, The Anatomy of A Saint (Naracoorte, S. Aust. 1993). O. THORPE, Mary MacKillop, (3d ed. Sydney 1994).

[J. G. MURTAGH/EDS.]

Bl. Mary Helen MacKillop. (Catholic News Service)

MACLOVIUS, ST.

Bishop also known as Machutus and Malo; b. Gwent, in southern Wales; d. near Saintes, France, c. 640. Educated in the monastery of Llancarfan, Maclovius became a monk there despite his parents' resistance. After ordination he wandered from Britain to Brittany, where he established several monasteries, among them Aleth (Saint-Malo), and reportedly visited COLUMBAN at LUX-EUIL. Legend also connects him with the fabulous voyages of St. BRENDAN. Bili, a deacon of Aleth and author of two of the several extant medieval lives of Maclovius, relates that he was consecrated bishop by an archbishop of Tours. Toward the end of his life he lived as a hermit near Saintes.

Feast: Nov. 15.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 2:5116–24. Deux vies inédites de S. Malo, ed. F. PLAINE and A. DE LA BORDERIE (Rennes 1884). L. DUCHESNE, "La Vie de Saint Malo: Étude critique," Revue Celtique 11 (1890) 1–22. F. DUINE, Memento des sources hagiographiques de l'histoire de Bretagne (Rennes 1918). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10.1:1293–1318. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:310–311. BILI (9th cent.), The Old English Life of Machutus, ed. D. YERKES (Toronto 1984); with Fr. tr. G. LE DUC (Rennes 1979).

[R. T. MEYER]

MACMAHON, EVER

Irish bishop and national leader; b. district of Farney, County Monaghan, 1600; executed Sept. 17, 1650, Enniskillen, County Fermanagh. Son of Loughlin Mac-Mahon, he was a scion of the ruling family of the Gaelic territory of Oriel. He studied at the Irish College at Douai, and at the Pastoral College in Louvain where he obtained his D.D. degree and was appointed superior. In 1633 he returned to Ireland as vicar apostolic of his native Clogher. On the Continent he had engaged in plots to secure aid for an Irish uprising, and later was active in enlisting troops in Ireland for Owen Roe O'Neill's regiment of the Spanish army in Flanders. After his appointment to the See of Down and Connor in 1641, he was involved in insurrection and was one of Ulster's representatives on the Supreme Council of the Confederation of Kilkenny and counselor of Owen Roe O'Neill. He opposed the Ormond Peace of 1646, since he rejected any settlement with Charles I's representative that did not provide religious freedom and the restoration of confiscated Catholic property. On O'Neill's death he was in 1650 chosen to lead the Ulster army, and was defeated at Scariffhollis on June 21 of that year. Wounded and captured in a skirmish with Cromwellian troops, he was executed and his head was impaled outside Enniskillen Castle.

Bibliography: J. T. GILBERT, ed., Contemporary History of Affairs in Ireland from 1641 to 1652 (Dublin 1879–80). P. F. MORAN, Spicilegium Ossoriense (Dublin 1874–84). S. P. Ó MÓRDHA "Ever MacMahon," Studies 40 (1951) 323–333; 41 (1952) 91–98. Commentarius Rinuccinianus, ed. J. KAVANAGH, 6 v. (Dublin 1932–49).

[S. P. Ó MÓRDHA]

MACNUTT, FRANCIS AUGUSTUS

Papal courtier, author; b. Richmond, Ind., February 15, 1863; d. Bressanone, Italy, December 30, 1927. He was the son of Joseph and Laetitia Jane (Scott) MacNutt, well-to-do Episcopalians. MacNutt attended Philips Academy, Exeter, N.H. (1878–80), and Harvard University Law School (1880–81), spending also many months in foreign travel and the study of languages. He was received into the Catholic Church in Rome on March 22, 1883, and first began ecclesiastical training as an associate of the "Priests of Expiation," an abortive religious society projected by Rev. Kenelm Vaughan of England. While a student (1887–89) of the Pontifical Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics, Rome, he concluded that he was not called to the priesthood and secured appointments as first secretary of the U.S. legations at Constantinople (1890-92) and Madrid (1892-93). In 1898 he married Margaret van Cortlandt Ogden of New York and took up residence in Rome. Leo XIII, who in 1895 had made MacNutt an honorary papal chamberlain "of cape and sword," assigned him to active service in the papal court. He was the first American to hold such a post. In 1904 Pius X named him one of four ranking chamberlains. However, since he had become the object of a defamatory campaign in certain lay circles, MacNutt decided to resign his Vatican post in 1905. He succeeded in vindicating his good name, but declined invitations to reassume his court functions. Settling in Schloss Ratzötz, his Tyrolese home near Bressanone, he spent the rest of his life in social activities and writing. Of his seven books, the most important were: Letters of Cortes (1908); De orbe novo, The Eight Decades d'Anghera (1912); and Bartholomew de las Casas (1909). His posthumously published memoirs, A Papal Chamberlain (1936), are the recollections of a U.S. expatriate who found himself at home in the courtly society of a bygone era.

[R. F. MCNAMARA]

MACPHERSON, JOHN

Pioneer of Catholic periodical literature in Scotland; b. Tomintoul, Banffshire, August 29, 1801; d. Dundee, July 16, 1871. He was born of crofter parents in one of the continuously Catholic districts of Scotland. He studied for the priesthood at Aquhorties College, Aberdeenshire, the seminary of the Lowland Vicariate of Scotland, and at Paris, where he was ordained in 1827. Returning to Scotland that year, he was appointed a professor at Aquhorties. On the College's small handpress he produced (1828) the first issue of The Catholic Directory for the Clergy and Laity in Scotland. Macpherson was not, of course, the first to use the printing press on behalf of the Church in Scotland: throughout the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries there had been a small, but steady and interesting, production of polemical works. Macpherson, however, produced the first periodical devoted to the service of the Church.

During its first three years, this 40-page publication provided the liturgical calendar for Mass and the Divine Office. In 1831, it grew to 84 pages, printed by John Johnstone of Edinburgh, and in addition to the liturgical calendar, provided information about Catholic churches and clergy in Scotland. From letters in the Scottish Catholic archives it is evident that in the mid-19th century, the Directory was being used in such faraway places as Tasmania and the West Indies.

Macpherson served the Church in Scotland in many capacities: he built St. Andrew's church in Dundee, where he was pastor from 1832 to 1847; he was president of St. Mary's College, Blairs, from 1847 to 1858; from 1858, when he received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity from Pope Pius IX, until his death, he was vicar-general to two bishops. He continued until the last year of his life to edit the Directory, which is the only publication dealing with the Catholic Church in Scotland that has appeared uninterruptedly since 1828. Its rich historical, biographical, and statistical material makes it an indispensable source for the study of the Catholic Church in modern Scotland.

[D. MCROBERTS]

MACRINA, SS.

Macrina the Elder; d. Neocaesarea, c. 340. Grand-mother of BASIL and his holy siblings, and disciple of GREGORY THAUMATURGUS, Macrina was a Christian witness and exile during DIOCLETIAN's persecution. She had a great influence on the early education of her grandson Basil.

Feast: Jan. 14.

Macrina the Younger, granddaughter of Macrina, the Elder, superior of one of the earliest communities of women ascetics; b. Neocaesarea, Cappadocia, c. 330; d. by the river Iris in Pontus, December of 379 or 380. Macrina was the eldest daughter of SS. Basil and Emmelia, and sister of SS. Basil the Great, GREGORY OF NYSSA, and Peter of Sebastea (d. c. 391). She had a great influence in this remarkable family, chiefly with her brothers Basil and Peter, both of whom she persuaded to a religious vocation. She rejected a proposed marriage and simultaneously with Basil chose the ascetic life, becoming locally renowned as a nun and spiritual directress. Returning from a synod of Antioch (379), Gregory of Nyssa visited her and wrote her life at the request of the monk Olympus. An unusual number of manuscripts of this biography coming from the environs of Pontus suggest a strong local cult after 379, which spread through the East in the Greek, Egyptian, Syrian, and Arab Churches. She is mentioned or elaborately described in numerous calendars and menologies. Her cult in the West is late since the life was not translated into Latin until the 16th century.

Gregory's Life of Macrina is a remarkable piece of early hagiography that provides information on contemporary monastic and liturgical life and furnishes biographical details concerning her brothers. Gregory's Macrinia, or dialogue "On the Soul and Resurrection," purports to be a record of deathbed conversation. She is the principal interlocutor and is described as "the Teacher." While the theological views are undoubtedly Gregory's, it is revealing that he can represent her with verisimilitude as so learned.

Feast: July 19.

Bibliography: GREGORY OF NYSSA, "Vita S. Macrinae," ed. V. W. CALLAHAN, in Gregorii Nysseni Opera, ed. W. JAEGER (Leiden 1960–) 8.1:347–414; The Life of St. Macrina, tr. and ed. W. K. L. CLARKE (London 1916); Vie de sainte Macrine, Fr. tr. P. MARAVAL (Paris 1971). J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminister, MD 1950–) 3:261. Acta Sanctorum July 4:589–604. J. DANIÉLOU, "La Résurrection des corps chez Grégoire de Nysse," Vigiliae christianae 7 (1953) 154–170. F. J. DÖLGER, "Das Anhängekreuzchen der hl. Makrina," Antike und Christentum 3 (1932) 81–116. R. ALBRECHT, Das Leben der heiligen Makrina auf dem Hintergrund der Thekla-Traditionen (Göttingen 1986). J. PELIKAN, Christianity and Classical Culture: The Metamorphosis of Natural Theology in the Christian Encounter with Hellenism (New Haven 1993). F. DÍAZ, La hermandad más santa y fina: Basilio el Magno y Macrina, ed. M. DEL MAR VENEGAS (Madrid 1994).

[D. MEEHAN]

MACROBIUS

Ambrosius Theodosius, Latin writer, born toward the end of the 4th century, probably in Africa. It is unlikely that he was a Christian, since his works are entirely pagan. All his theology derives from cult of the sun. His treatise comparing Greek and Latin verbs, dedicated to SYMMACHUS, is known by excerpts in the works of a certain John, perhaps Scotus Erigena. His commentary in two books on Cicero's Dream of Scipio is an encyclopedia written for his son Eustachius. In it he shows little respect for Aristotle and defends Platonism, which was for him a religion gleaned probably from Porphyry. The work, which was long popular as a source for data on many topics, accepts the Stoic division of moral, physical, and rational philosophy. Macrobius's most important work, the Saturnalia (seven books), was written to impart antiquarian lore to his son. It imitates the literary device of Plato's Banquet and is eclectic in its philosophical outlook. There are lacunae in the work. Along with Calcidius and Martianus Capella, the Saturnalia and the Commentary on the Dream of Scipio were used as source books in the Middle Ages and early Renaissance. They were known to Bernard of Tours and to Bede. Macrobius borrows frequently from other encyclopedists, especially from Aulus Gellius and Plutarch, often without acknowledgment. The subject matter and presentation illustrate pagan culture at the beginning of the 5th century. The style is simple, the exposition of Neoplatonic themes oversimplified. The exaggerated praise of Vergil as an orator and a philosopher was responsible for many of the interpretations of Vergil throughout the Middle Ages and early Renaissance.

Bibliography: Macrobius. Opera, ed. J. WILLIS, 2 v. (Leipzig 1963); Commentary on the Dream of Scipio, tr. W. STAHL (New York 1952); Saturnalia, tr. H. BORNECQUE and F. RICHARD, 2 v. (Paris 1937–38). H. KEIL, ed. Grammatici Latini, 7 v. (Leipzig 1857–80) v.5. P. COURCELLE, Les Lettres grecques en Occident, de Macrobe à Cassiodore (new ed. Paris 1948). W. STAHL, Isis 50 (1959) 95–124, F. EYSSENHARDT, ed., Macrobius (Leipzig 1893).

[J. R. O'DONNELL]

MACRORY, JOSEPH

Cardinal, Scripture scholar; b. Ballygawley, Tyrone County, Ireland, March 19,1861; d. Armagh, Ireland, October 13, 1945. After his education at Armagh and Maynooth, he was ordained in 1885. He was the first president of Dungannon Academy (1886-87), professor of moral theology and Sacred Scripture at Olton Seminary, England (1887-89), professor of Oriental languages at Maynooth (1889-1905), professor of NT exegesis at Maynooth (1905–15), and vice president of that college (1912–15). He was appointed bishop of Down and Connor in 1915, consecrated archbishop of Armagh in 1928, and raised to the cardinalate in 1929. One of the founders of the Irish Theological Quarterly (1906—), he served for a time as its coeditor. Besides his many articles for periodicals, he published commentaries on St. John's Gospel (1897) and the Epistles to the Corinthians (1915). These practical works went through several editions.

Bibliography: J. J. TWOMEY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 6:1262. J. J. MURPHY, The People's Primate (Dublin 1945) 10.

[K. O'SULLIVAN]

MADAGASCAR, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The fourth largest island in the world (excluding Australia), the Republic of Madagascar is located in the Indian Ocean, 260 miles east of MOZAMBIQUE in Africa. The terrain alternates between plateaus and mountains, rising to the volcanic Ankaratra range near the island's center, thence to the highest point, the Tsaratanana Massif, in the north. Many streams cross the forested inland terrain, while Madagascar's coastline is dotted by numerous small islands. Natural resources include graphite, mica, chromite, salt and bauxite, while agricultural products consist of rice, sweet potatoes, tobacco, coffee, sugar and cloves. The climate, which is tropical near the eastern coast, is characterized by cyclones and heavy rains.

Formerly known as the Malagasy Republic, Madagascar was formed by federated kingdoms and remained Capital: Antananarivo. Size: 226,657 sq. miles. Population: 15,506,470 in 2000. Languages: Malagasy, French.

Religions: 4,460,000 Catholics (29%), 1,250,490 Muslims (8%), 5,960,500 Protestants (38%), 3,835,480 follow indigenous beliefs.

under Portuguese domination until the 17th century, when it was formed into a native empire. During the 19th century, English and French interests battled for the region. Three years after the succession of the last native monarch, Queen Rànavàlona III, in 1883, French forces laid claim to certain coastal areas, establishing a protectorate in 1890 and annexing the island and its dependencies as a colony in 1896. Madagascar became an autonomous member of the French Community in 1958 and an independent republic in 1960.

History. Detached from Africa as a result of continental drift, the island of Madagascar was originally inhabited by Indo-Melanesian and Malay peoples, while Bantu, Arab, Indian and Chinese immigrated to the island between the 10th and 14th centuries. Madagascar was discovered by Portuguese Captain Diego Dias in 1500 and was named by Marco Polo after the island kingdom of Mogadisho he described but never visited. From 1500 until mid-18th century Catholic missionaries, especially the Vincentians from 1648, made futile attempts at evangelization, their efforts disrupted due to pirate activity along the coast. Bishop Henri de Solages, the prefect apostolic, labored for a few years with little success until his death in 1832. Despite continued hostility from the monarch of the region's most populous and powerful tribe, the Hova, who was influenced by English Protestants, the Jesuits arrived in 1845 and penetrated to the capital city of Antananarive. In 1850 the Jesuits were entrusted with the Prefecture Apostolic of Madagascar, which became a vicariate apostolic in 1885, after the region had been proclaimed a French colony.

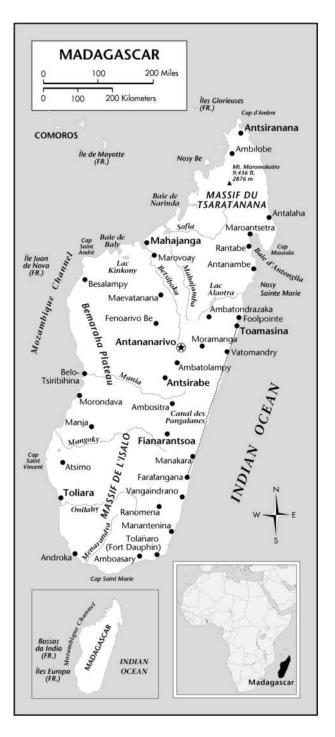

During her reign, Queen Rànavàlona I actively persecuted Catholics and other Christians, expelling foreign missionaries and putting many Catholics to death. Her own death in 1861 brought the Protestant King Rànavàlona II to power and finally permitted open evangelization throughout the island. In 1885 and 1895 wars between native tribes and French troops interrupted the mission, but otherwise evangelization progressed without interruption, missionaries often attempting to assimilate facets of native religions into the Catholic faith to make it more understandable. In 1896, a year before the monarchy of Rànavàlona II was abolished, the southern part of

Archdioceses	Suffragans
Antananarivo	Ambatondrazaka, Antsirabé,
	Miarinarivo, Tsiroanomandidy
Antsiranana	Ambanja, Fenoarivo Atsinanana,
	Mahajanga, Port-Bergé, Toamasina
Fianarantsoa	Ambositra, Farafangana, Ihosy,
	Mananjary, Morombe, Morondava, Tôlagnaro, Toliara.

the island was detached and confided to the Vincentians as the Vicariate of Southern Madagascar. The Vicariate of Northern Madagascar, created in 1898, was given to the Holy Ghost Fathers. Other religious active in the region included Trinitarians, La Salette Missionaries, Montfort Fathers, Capuchins, Holy Family Fathers and Assumptionists.

By 1900 there were nearly 100,000 Catholics living on the island. After World War I and the reorganization of the island's political administration, more vicariates were created and entrusted to various religious orders. The first nine Malagasy priests were ordained in 1925, and the first native bishop was consecrated in 1936. A rebellion that broke out in 1947 in response to Madagascar's entry into the French Union had little effect on the missions, and agitation for independence likewise did little to stir up anti-Catholic sentiments. The hierarchy was established in 1955, with Antananarive as the sole metropolitan see. A reorganization in 1958 divided the island into three ecclesiastical provinces, with the capital city entrusted to the Jesuits. After the region gained political independence from France on June 26, 1960, and became the Malagasy Republic, a special apostolic delegation was created for Madagascar and the islands of Réunion and Mauritius. The region was renamed Madagascar in 1975.

Evangelization on the island continued to be successful throughout the 20th century, and men and women found their vocation in the Church in increasing numbers. During the second half of the 20th century, the island was beset by economic problems that resulted in several changes in governments and a decaying infrastructure. In the 1980s and 1990s the Church added its voice to those advocating that President Didier Ratsiraka focus his attention on social programs. Although Ratsiraka abolished one-party rule in 1990 and established free elections two years later, the political climate continued to be volatile; a period of rioting resulted in the abolishment of the country's national assembly and a new constitution in August of 1992 that protected freedom of religion. In February of 1997 Ratsiraka resumed the presidency, promising to continue efforts to stabilize Madagascar's sagging economy. In April of 2000 Ratsiraka responded to a call by Church leaders and released 3,000 Madagascar prisoners—many of them minors or men and women over age 65—as a response to Pope John Paul II's plea that the plight of prisoners be considered during Jubilee 2000. The country's bishops praised the president's effort as a "significant gesture of reconciliation for the Holy Year."

By 2000 there were 379 secular and 581 religious priests, 392 brothers and 3,363 sisters on Madagascar, a preponderance of whom were native Malagasy. The Catholic schools located throughout the island included 2,209 Primary and 316 secondary schools, while religious also administered orphanages and other humanitarian concerns. The Benedictines and the Cisterians each had a monastery. In addition to a strong Catholic press, the lay movement Catholic Action remained involved in its grass-roots humanitarian efforts. The influence of the Church was most marked in the southern part of the island, and it continued to wield political influence due to its strong humanitarian presence and its status as one of Madagascar's largest landowners. The Protestant population on Madagascar consisted of members of the Church of Jesus Christ, located in Fianarantsoa North.

Bibliography: H. DESCHAMPS, Histoire de Madagascar (Paris 1960). K. S. LATOURETTE, A History of the Expansion of Christianity, 7 v. (New York 1937–45) v.5. Le missioni cattoliche: Storia, geographia, statistica (Rome 1950) 196–202. A. BOUDOU, Les Jésuites à Madagascar au XIXe siècle, 2 v. (Paris 1943). Bilan du Monde, 2:574–58 I. Annuario Pontificio has statistics on all dioceses.

[J. BOUCHAUD/EDS.]

MADAURA, MARTYRS OF

Martyrs of Madaura is a title given to four African martyrs grouped together in the letter written c. 390 by Maximus of Madaura to St. AUGUSTINE, in which Maximus complained that Miggin is preferred by Christians to Jupiter; Sanam, to the four goddesses; and the archimartyr Namphano, to all the immortal gods. A fourth, Lucitas, is said to enjoy no less cult. In reply to this letter, Augustine stated that the names are Punic indeed, but that pagans also admit this type of name. He contents himself with dwelling on the name of Namphano, which he explains means a person whose coming brings good luck. Had these four persons been known as Donatist or Circumcellion martyrs, as some have claimed, Augustine certainly would have pointed this out to the pagan Maximus, who had criticized the Christians in his letter. That he did not do so indicates that the four martyrs were venerated by the Catholic Church in Africa, even though the Donatists may have accepted them, according to their custom of retaining what the Catholics had practiced before the outbreak of the Donatist schism.

The title archimartyr, given by Maximus to the slave Namphano, may mean that he was the protomartyr of Africa or Numidia. More probably it proves that he enjoyed a great veneration. The names of both Namphano and Miggin are frequent in African inscriptions; those of Sanam and Lucitas less so. The name Martyrs of Madaura comes from the Roman MARTYROLOGY, where Baronius placed them for July 4. In the MARTYROLOGY OF ST. JEROME, on June 15 the name of Miggin is cited along with Saianus and Iovianus. By the error of a copyist, this entry is found, in garbled form, also on May 16 in the same work, which refers to Namphano on December 18. Their existence and early veneration seem assured, though the year of their martyrdom, usually placed in 180, cannot be substantiated.

Bibliography: A. GOLDBACHER, ed., Epistulae S. Augustini 16–17 [Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 34.1; Vienna 1895] 37–44; Acta Sanctorum July 2:6. Martyrologium Hieronymianum, ed. H. DELEHAYE (ibid. Nov.2:2; 1931) 257, 320, 652. P. MONCEAUX, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, 7 v. (repr. Brussels 1963) 1:42–43. W. H. C. FREND, The Donatist Church (London 1952). J. ZEILLER, in A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 1:318. J. H. BAXTER, "The Martyrs of Madaura, A.D. 180" Journal of Theological Studies (1923–24) 21–37. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md., 1950–53) 1:178–179, confuses these martyrs with the martyrs Scillitani.

[J. J. GAVIGAN]

MADELEVA, MARY, SISTER

Poet and educator; b. Mary Evaline Wolff, Cumberland, Wisconsin, May 24, 1887; d. Boston, Massachusetts, July 25, 1964. She attended public elementary and high schools in Cumberland (1893-1904) and spent one year at the University of Wisconsin, before entering St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana, in1906. She received her A.B. in 1909, a year after joining the Congregation of the Holy Cross. After a period of teaching at St. Mary's, she took her M.A. (University of Notre Dame, 1918) and taught at Sacred Heart Academy, Ogden, Utah, until she went to the University of California at Berkeley (1922–25). There she was awarded a Ph.D. in English. She was president of St. Mary-of-the-Wasatch (Salt Lake City, Utah) from 1926 to 1933, spent a year at Oxford University, England, and in travel in Europe and the Holy Land (1933-34), and was appointed president of St. Mary's College (1934), holding that post until 1961.

Sister Madeleva was the first of the U.S. nun-poets to achieve national and international fame. Her 12 volumes of verse, for all their modernity, reveal her wide knowledge of medieval culture and manifest, in their deliberately colloquial diction, a kinship with the religious poems of John Donne, one of her favorite authors. Her interest in the Middle Ages led to studies on Chaucer, the Pearl, Julian of Norwich, and Hilda of Whitby. Her prose works appeared in some 36 publications and covered a wide variety of topics—the familiar essay, poetic composition, 19th century poetry, and many authors.

Sister Madeleva's influence on education was stimulating and widespread, through membership in educational associations, lecturing, and writing. Her vision was evident in the establishment at St. Mary's of the first graduate program in sacred doctrine for women and the interdepartmental major in Christian culture; she helped begin the SISTER FORMATION MOVEMENT. Her published works include Chaucer's Nuns and Other Essays (1925), Pearl: A Study in Spiritual Dryness (1925), A Lost Language and Other Essays (1951), My First Seventy Years (1959), The Four Last Things: Collected Poems (1959), and Conversations with Cassandra (1961). The whole of Sister Madeleva's work and notes are currently kept at both St. Mary's College Archives and at the Holy Cross Sisters Provincial Archives in Notre Dame, Indiana.

Bibliography: K. KENNELLY, "Wolff, Sister Madeleva (Mary Evaline)," Notable American Women: Modern Period, A–Z (Cambridge 1980). M. E. KLEIN, Sister M. Madeleva Wolff, C.S.C., Saint Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana: A Study in Presidential Leadership 1934–1961 (Ph.D. diss., Kent State University, 1983).

[M. J. RAUH]

MADRUZZO

The Madruzzo is an illustrious family of Trent, whose recorded history can be traced to 1155. Of note are the four bishops who occupied the See of Trent from 1539 to 1658 without interruption.

Cristoforo; b. Trent, July 5, 1512; d. Tivoli, July 5, 1578. After studies at Padua and Bologna he began his rapid rise in the hierarchy, becoming a canon of Trent (1529), Salzburg (1536), Brixen (1537), and then prince bishop of Trent (1539). In 1542 he was ordained a priest and consecrated a bishop, and in the next year, named administrator to the See of Brixen and created a cardinal by Paul III. He resigned the See of Trent in 1567 to become in turn cardinal bishop of Sabina, Palestrina, and Porto. A man of ability and conviction, though no thorough theologian, Cristoforo was entrusted with several diplomatic missions, including his appointment as governor of Milan by Philip II of Spain (1556) and the legation of the Marches by Pius IV (1561). His friendship with Emperor Charles V and the Emperor's younger brother and successor, Ferdinand, suited his role as mediator between the Hapsburgs and the Curia. His most notable achievement centered on the first convocation of the Council of Trent (1545–47), where as bishop he was responsible for the details that would assure its tranquil progress. In the Council he insisted with success that Church reform be discussed in each session together with the theological debates, being hopeful that such measures would win the Protestants. He strongly opposed the Council's transfer to Bologna. His friendship with cardinals Jacopo SADOLETO, Giovanni MORONE, Reginald POLE, and Ercole Gonzaga place him justly among the forces of Catholic reform, although his own career is marred by pluralism. He governed his diocese well and wrote a constitution of reform for his clergy.

Sister Mary Madeleva.

Lodovico; b. Trent, 1532; d. Rome, April 2, 1600. Following ecclesiastical studies at Louvain and Paris, he became ambassador to France and, in 1561, was created a cardinal. Nephew of Cristoforo, he succeeded to the See of Trent at his uncle's resignation in 1567. As prince bishop, he participated in the third session of the Council of Trent (1562–63), where he joined the party advocating the chalice for the Bohemians, and the obligation of residency for bishops. He proved his diplomatic skill as papal legate to the imperial court (1581), the Diet of Augsburg (1582), and the Diet of Regensburg (1594).

Carlo Gaudenzio; b. Issogne in the valley of Aosta, 1562; d. Rome, Aug. 4, 1629. The course of his education brought him to Munich, Ingolstadt, and ultimately, to Pavia where he received his laureate in theology in 1595, He was named titular bishop of Smyrna, then coadjutor at Trent to his uncle Lodovico, whom he succeeded (1600). He was created a cardinal in 1604. During his episcopate he erected a seminary, and became an ardent opponent of trials for WITCHCRAFT. As legate to the Diet of Regensburg (1613), he spoke against the confessional policy toward Protestants that had been advocated by the powerful Cardinal Melchior KLESL.

Cardinal Cristoforo Madruzzo, painting by Titian.

Carlo Emanuele; b. Trent, 1599; d. there, Dec. 15, 1658. His studies at Monaco, Ingolstadt, and Perugia were followed with his appointment (age 21) as coadjutor to his uncle Carlo Gaudenzio at Trent. He succeeded to the see in 1629. In order to prevent the extinction of the Madruzzo line, he made long and futile efforts to secure the legitimatization of his children by his mistress, Claudia Particella. This scandal marred his episcopate and gave the occasion for elaborate legends.

Bibliography: A. GALANTE, La corrispondenza del cardinale Cristoforo Madruzzo (Innsbruck 1911). Jedia Trent v. 1, 2. T. GAR, Cenni biografici di 4 vescovi di Trento (Trent 1857). A. POSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1265–67. M. MORSELETTO, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 2:771, K. D. SCHIMDT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegeuwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:575. G. GEROLA. Enciclopedia Italiana di scienzi, littere ed arti 21:854–855, bibliog.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

MAES, BONIFACE

Franciscan spiritual writer; b. Ghent, East Flanders, 1627; d. there, October 3, 1706. Maes entered the Recollect province of St. Joseph in 1647. From 1653 to 1665 he was lector of philosophy and theology; he then became guardian at Iperen (c. 1665–77); provincial of the Flemish province (1677–90), commissary general of the provinces of Belgium, Germany, France, and Ireland (1690–96), and then definitor general.

His writings include eight works on the spiritual life (1668–80), two on the practice of Franciscan poverty (1675), and a Vocabularium psalterii (1705). One of his principal ascetical treatises is Mystieke Theologie ofte verborghen Godtsgheleertheyt (Ghent 1668), which had at least 20 editions—nine in Flemish (the last ed. H. Mahieu, 1921); six in Latin (1st ed. Ghent 1669); three in French (Cologne 1677; Ghent 1687; Paris 1927); one in German (Innsbruck 1704); and one in English [Mystical Theology or Spiritual Life, tr. B. Whelan (New York 1928)]. This work excels in succinctness of style as well as in simplicity and clarity of thought. It does not treat of mystical theology in the strict sense, but contains maxims and practical rules to bring Christians by ordinary ways to contemplation and moral perfection. Its three parts consider the notion of mystical theology, the active life with its three exercises, and the contemplative life with its preparation, its three exercises, and its five effects. It treats also of the trials, austerities, and perils of contemplatives. In conformity with Franciscan spirituality, the humanity of Christ and especially the Passion occupy a central place, with emphasis on the affective element. Its principal sources are the Franciscans HENRY OF HERP and Alfonso of Madrid.

Another of his ascetical treatises is Consolatorium piorum (Ghent 1672), which asserts that every Christian, and especially every religious, is obliged under mortal sin to be perfect. However, Maes distinguished two degrees of perfection: the observance of the Commandments, and a perfection that consists in the continual progress in moral perfection. He taught that every Christian is obliged only to the first degree.

The importance of Maes does not lie in the originality or depth of his thought, but rather in the didactic qualities of his writings and in their charitable and even cheerful spirit.

Bibliography: S. DIRKS, Histoire littéraire et bibliographique des Fréres Mineurs (Antwerp 1885) 337–344. P. NAESSEN, Franciscaansch Vlaanderen (Mechelen 1895) 275–278. J. B. POUKENS, "De Mystieke Theologie van P. Bon. Maes," Ons geestelijk erf 2 (1928) 413–419. H. BRINK, Theologisch Woordenboek, v.2 (Roermond 1957) 3053.

[A. EMMEN]

MAES, CAMILLUS PAUL

Bishop; b. Courtrai, Belgium, March 13, 1846; d. Covington, Ky., May 11,1915. His parents, John Baptist and Justine (Ghyoot) Maes, had him educated at St. Amandus College in Courtrai, the seminaries in Roulers and Bruges, and the American College in Louvain. He was ordained for the Diocese of Detroit, Mich., December 19, 1868, at Mechlin, Belgium. His appointments in Michigan included pastorates at St. Peter Church in Mount Clemens (1869–71), St. Mary Church in Monroe (1871–73), and St. John the Baptist Church in Monroe (1873–80), as well as chancellorship of the Diocese of Detroit (1880-85). He was consecrated third bishop of Covington, Ky., January 25, 1885, at the Covington cathedral. During his episcopate, Maes conducted an extensive building program and erected in Covington the Cathedral of the Assumption. He labored for conversions in the Appalachian Mountain area of his diocese, issued numerous pastoral letters, and founded two diocesan papers, the New Cathedral Chimes and the Christian Year. For many years he served as secretary (1900–15) of the board of trustees of The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., which he had helped to establish, and as president (1897–1915) of the board of bishops for the American College at Louvain, Belgium.

In the 1890s, Maes opposed the leasing of Catholic schools to state authorities. He resisted proponents of the state's right of compulsory education, although in the related controversy over Cahenslyism (see CAHENSLY, PETER PAUL) he aligned himself with the Americanizers. He was among the first to advocate publication of The Catholic Encyclopedia and the Catholic Historical Review, and to encourage the organization of the United States Catholic Historical Society. Among his personal literary achievements was a biography of the early Kentucky missionary Rev. Charles Nerinckx. Maes was a member (1905–15) of the board of governors of the Catholic Church Extension Society and honorary president (1908–15) of the Belgian and Holland section of the society. He was the organizer of a national Eucharistic movement and became the first president (1893–1915) and protector (1894–1915) of the Priests' Eucharistic League; he was also founder and editor (1895–1903) of the league's journal, Emmanuel; and president of the first five Eucharistic Congresses in the U.S. Although seriously considered for promotion to rectorships at The Catholic University of America and at the American College of Louvain, as well as to the archbishoprics of Milwaukee, Wis., New Orleans, La., and Cincinnati, Ohio, Maes remained bishop of Covington until his death.

Bibliography: P. E. RYAN, History of the Diocese of Covington, Kentucky (Covington 1954).

[E. J. BAUMANN]

MAFFEI

Noble Italian family with two branches: that of Verona-Rome and that of Volterra. The Verona-Rome branch was especially distinguished by its scholars.

Verona-Rome Branch. Three members of the Verona-Rome Maffei were important in the Canon Regulars of the LATERAN. Paolo, b. Verona; d. Venice, 1480, was superior in Padua and Venice and general of the order in 1425. Timoteo, b. c. 1400; d. Rome, 1470, was prior in Fiesole, general three times, and bishop of Ragusa. He traveled to many cities on preaching tours, was a most effective speaker, and taught others how to preach. His sermons exerted a wide influence on the laity of his day. Celso, b. Verona, c. 1425; d. Verona, 1508, nephew of Timoteo, was general of his order eight times. Besides writing, he collected manuscripts and books for monasteries.

In the 16th century there were three very able Maffei in Rome. Bernardino, b. Bergamo, 1514; d. Rome, 1553, one of the most learned men of his day, had charge of the education of the younger Cardinal Alessandro FARNESE, whose grandfather, Pope PAUL III, appointed Bernardino bishop of Massa Marittima in 1547 and then of Chieti, creating him cardinal in 1549. Held in great esteem by the new pope, JULIUS III, Cardinal Maffei served as a member of two reforming commissions and as legate to Parma. When he died, his brother Marcantonio, b. Rome?, 1521; d. Rome?, 1583, succeeded him as bishop of Chieti and became its archbishop in 1566. Pope PIUS IV selected him to restore the churches of Rome. His ability was recognized also by Pope PIUS V, who put him in charge of the datary, which he administered well. The pope also appointed him a member of two commissions: one, to examine the quality and character of prospective bishops and abbots; another, to prepare written defenses against Lutheran teachings. He was created a cardinal in 1570. Giampietro, b. Bergamo, c. 1535; d. Tivoli, 1603, taught in Genoa, was secretary for the Republic of Genoa (1563–64), and then became a Jesuit. He lived in Portugal (1572–81), preparing a history of Jesuit missions in India (Florence 1588). His biography of IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA was published in 1585. Pope CLEMENT VIII valued these writings so much that he gave Giampietro rooms in the Vatican. His collected works were later published (Bergamo 1747).

Francesco Scipione, b. Verona, 1675; d. Verona, 1755, was a versatile author and scholar, most of his early writings being poems and plays. He visited contemporary poets in Milan, Genoa, and Rome (1698–99). His play Merope, first presented in 1713 and later translated into several languages, was an important production in the history of Italian tragedy. His comedies, however, were not successful. He then turned to history and other subjects. His four-volume Verona illustrata (Verona 1731-32) included information about his family, especially those members who were writers. In 1733 he went to France, where he stayed for more than three years, visiting England, Holland, Germany, and Austria before returning home in 1736. The theological discussions he heard in Paris led him to write about the early Church. In his travels he studied Roman remains, a subject that had interested him as early as 1711, when he arranged some ancient sculptures in Turin. He wrote a work on antiquities in France and another on ancient amphitheaters and founded the Museo Lapidario Maffeiano in Verona. His defense of taking interest on loans, his history of journals, and his analysis of the decline of the Venetian Republic are other examples of the wide range of his intellectual curiosity. His discovery and study of early medieval MSS in Verona led him to be one of the first to realize the essential unity of Latin writing and to recognize majuscule, minuscule, and cursive script (see PALEOG-RAPHY, LATIN). His collected works were published in 21 volumes (Venice 1790). Honored at home and abroad, he was a member of academies in Berlin, Paris, and London and received a degree from Oxford.

Volterra Branch. The Volterra branch of the Maffei family included the scholar Raffaele, b. Volterra, 1451; d. Rome, 1522. Having spent some of his early years in Rome while his father taught at the university there, Raffaele returned to Volterra, where he wrote on the history of Rome and translated the Odyssey, the Koran, and the works of Xenophon into Latin. Paolo Alessandro, b. Volterra, 1653; d. Rome, 1716, published a biography of Pope Pius V in 1712.

Bibliography: F. VESPASIANO DA BISTICCI, Vite di uomini illustri del secolo XV, ed. P. D'ANCONA and E. AESCHLIMANN (Milan 1951) 152–153. Moroni 41:229–232. Pastor 17:82, 129, 168, 220. F. S. MAFFEI, Opere drammatiche e poesie varie, ed. A. AVENA (Bari 1928); Epistolario, 1700–1755, ed. C. GARIBOTTO, 2 v. (Milan 1955). G. SILVESTRI, Un europeo del settecento, Scipione Maffei (Treviso 1954). G. GASPERONI, Scipione Maffei e Verona settecentesca (Verona 1955). F. L. CROSS The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 842. L. FIORE et al., Enciclopedia cattolica 7:1811–13. A. POSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1267–69.

[M. L. SHAY]

MAGALLANES JARA, CRISTÓBAL (CHRISTOPHER), ST.

Martyr, priest; b. July 30, 1869, La Sementera Ranch, Totatiche, Jalisco, Archdiocese of Guadalajara, Mexico; d. May 25, 1927, Colotitlán near Durango, Jalisco, Diocese of Zacatecas. Cristóbal was raised in a humble family and worked in the fields until he entered Guadalajara's seminary (1888). Following his ordination in Santa Teresa's, Guadalajara (Sept. 17, 1899), he was chaplain and assistant director of a school in Guadalajara. He was also parochial priest in his hometown for seventeen years before his death. In that capacity he organized catechetical centers and schools on the outlying ranches, constructed an irrigation system, founded an orphanage, and established garden plots to help the poor. He also evangelized the native Huicholes and propagated the Rosary. When the government closed Guadalajara's seminary, he founded one in his parish to ensure the formation of future priests. En route to celebrate Mass on a farm (May 21, 1927), he was caught in a gun battle between Cristeros and the troops of President Calles commanded by General Goñi. He was arrested, taken to the municipal prison at Totatiches, and later transferred to Colotitlán. He died with St. Agustín CALOCA. Magallanes was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) by Pope John Paul II. [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MAR-TYRS OF, SS.].

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979). V. GARCÍA JUÁREZ, Los cristeros (Fresnillo, Zac. 1990).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MAGDALEN ALBRICI, BL.

Augustinian; b. Como, Italy, end of 14th century; d. Brunate (near Como), May 13 or 15, 1465. When orphaned by the death of her parents, the nobly born and piously reared Magdalen entered the Convent of St. Andrew at Brunate. Admired for her many virtues, she was soon elected abbess there. Besides effecting the incorporation of the convent into the Augustinian Reform Congregation of Lombardy (see AUGUSTINIAN NUNS), she promoted holiness among her nuns in many special ways, notably by encouraging frequent reception of Communion. Distinguished by her great charity, humility, and trust in God, she reputedly obtained miracles for others and at times foretold the future. She was beatified on Dec. 10, 1907.

Feast: May 13, 15, or 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 3:252–261. G. B. MELLONI, Vita della beata Maddalena Albrici, nobile comasca dell'Ordine di S. Agostino (Bologna 1764). A. M. CONFALONIERI, La beata Maddelena Albrici, badessa del convento di S. Andrea in Brunate (Como 1938). W. HÜMPFNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1263. C. JUST, ibid. 1269–70.

[J. E. BRESNAHAN]

MAGDALENS

Called also Penitents or White Ladies (they wore white), a religious order of women, some of them converted public sinners, founded to reform or protect women and girls. Although St. DOMINIC had organized a short-lived cloistered community of penitent women at Toulouse in 1215, the Order of Magdalens proper was founded at Metz by Rudolf of Worms and confirmed by Gregory IX in 1227. After 1232 most houses changed from the original Cistercian rule to a Dominican form of the rule of St. AUGUSTINE. A male branch following the original Dominican constitutions was attached to the Magdalens for direction and government: each house had a prior, three priests, and laymen, as well as a prioress. There were provincial priors, and a general prior for the entire order (Rudolf was the first, until 1235).

The order spread quickly in Germany (Worms, 1224; Strasbourg, 1225; Mühlhausen and Würzburg, 1227; Speyer, 1228; Mainz, Cologne, Goslar, 1229), France, Italy, Spain, and Portugal, with more than 40 convents in Germany in the 13th century. It was placed under the direction of the DOMINICANS in 1286, was incorporated by them in 1287, and in 1291 again became independent. After 1370, however, it declined: the male branch and General Chapter had little meaning; unity was lacking and noble women without vocation were accepted in great number. Many houses passed to the Dominicans and FRANCISCANS. Most convents were lost at the Reformation. A few Magdalen public health institutes still exist: at Lauban (founded 1320) and Studenz. There is also a convent in Seyboldsdorf (Bavaria).

Small communities of Magdalens, once connected with the Order and with the same purpose, developed independently. A foundation of Magdalens at Marseilles, with the approval of Nicholas III, became a religious congregation under the rule of St. Augustine (c. 1272). The so-called Magdalens of the Rue Saint-Denis were founded early in the 17th century. Similar communities were founded at Naples (1324), Paris (1592), Rome (1520), and Seville (1550). A community called the Madelonnettes, which had the same purpose, was founded in 1618 by the Capuchin Athanase Molé; it is no longer in existence. This group was permitted to take religious vows by FRANCIS DE SALES, who placed it successively under various women's congregations. It was raised to monastic status by Urban VIII and augmented by branches at Rouen and Bordeaux. It contained three congregations: Magdalens proper with solemn vows; Sisters of St. Martha with simple vows; and Sisters of St. Lazarus, who had once been public sinners confined against their will.

Bibliography: P. HÉLYOT, Dictionnaire des ordres religieux, 4 v. (Paris 1847–59). A. SIMON, L'Ordre des Penitents de Ste. M.-Madeleine en Allemagne (Fribourg 1918). Heimbucher 1: 646–648. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1270–71.

[A. CONDIT]

MAGI

Magi is the plural form of a little-used singular, magus (from Old Persian magu), that designates a member of an ancient Near Eastern priestly caste.

According to the ancient Greek historian Herodotus (Histories I), the Magi were originally a Median tribe. Herodotus described their peculiar customs, that they neither buried nor burnt their dead, but exposed them to the birds, that they practiced consanguineous marriage and were specialists in oneiromancy, i.e. divination through dreams, astrology, and magic—this last art taking its name from them. They forbade the killing of certain animals, but made the killing of certain others obligatory. Their view of the world was dualistic.

When the Persians displaced the Medes, DARIUS the Great (521–486 B.C.), put to death several Magi who challenged his power, an event commemorated by an annual feast called "The Killing of the Magi." Nonetheless, their political influence grew steadily until they obtained a religious monopoly, for Herodotus reports it was not permitted to offer a sacrifice without the assistance of a Magus.

Zoroaster, engraving from a bas relief at Persepolis. (The Gamma Liaison Network)

The Magi and Zoroastrianism. That the Magi were specialists in magic and astrology, according to the Greeks, is hardly characteristic of Zoroastrianism. The relationship between the Magi and the reform which found expression in ZOROASTER's Gāthās is problematic. Probably by the time of Artaxerxes I (465–425 B.C.), but certainly under Seleucus I (306–280 B.C.), the fusion was complete between the religion of the Achaemenids and that of Zoroaster. The Magi, as they enjoyed a religious monopoly, called themselves the disciples of Zoroaster. Thus, many Greek sources call Zoroaster a Magus, as did Xanthus (5th century B.C.) and Dinon (4th century B.C.) who were cited by Hermippus (3rd–2nd centuries B.C.).

The Magusaioi. The word is a Semitic and Greek adaptation of the Iranian term magus, and it designates the "Hellenized Magi" to whom a vast lore of pseudoscience, written in Greek, was attributed. In the dialogue Alcibiades, ascribed to Plato, two kinds of magic are distinguished: popular magic, which was tantamount to sorcery, and the authentic, or Persian magic, which was a form of religion. Although the philosophers maintained the distinction, it was lost to the general public, and the Magi in Hellenistic and Roman times were commonly considered as astrologers and sorcerers.

The Old Testament book of Daniel ascribes to magoi, in the Bablyonian kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, occult powers, such as divination and dream interpretation (Dan 1.20, 2.2, 4.4, 5.7). In the New Testament the term $\mu \acute{\alpha} \gamma o \varsigma$, outside of the Gospel of Matthew, has a perjorative connotation, with reference to SIMON MAGUS in Acts 8.9–24 and Bar–Jesus in Acts 13.6–12. The Magi ($\mu \acute{\alpha} \gamma o \iota$) in Mt 2.1–12, however, represent wise pagans who do homage to Jesus as Messiah.

Popular Traditions. Traditions about the Magi concern their social rank, their number, their names, and their place of origin.

Rank of the Magi. Popular tradition, by c. 500 A.D., knew the Magi as kings, although no historical evidence justifies this belief. Nor did any Father of the Church hold the opinion that the Magi were kings. In the liturgy of the Feast of EPIPHANY the Magi are associated with Psalms 71(72).10: "The kings of Tharsis and the Isles shall offer gifts," a Psalm to which Matthew alludes in 2.7–12. From such an association it was an easy, if uncertain, step to confer kingship upon the wise men.

Number and Names of Magi. In the West, at least, the "three kings" has become so common a synonym for the Magi that few people are aware that in Matthew's Infancy Narrative no mention is made of their number. The idea that the Magi were three in number seems to have grown from the number of gifts (gold, frankincense, and myrrh) offered to the infant Christ. In the East, however, the number of the Magi is set at 12. In art they are depicted as two, three, four, or even eight.

Regarding the names of the wise men, again, popular tradition embellishes where the evangelist is silent. In Western tradition the names Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthasar appear only in the 8th century. In Syrian tradition such names as Larvandad, Harmisdas, and Gushnasaph occur, while the Armenians refer to Kagba, Badalima, etc.

Place of Origin. Matthew's narrative states only that the Magi were from the East, which could mean Mesopotamia or Persia, though the gifts seem to indicate South Arabia (Is 60.6; Ps 72.15). Along these lines Maximus speculates Babylon; Clement and Cyril of Alexandria, Persia; Justin and Tertullian, Arabia. Bede thought that the three represented the continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa. The Magi are sometimes considered descendants of the three sons of Noah. As offspring of the families of Sem, Ham, and Japheth, they would represent the major families of humanity. Although it can only be a later elaboration, this interpretation suggests the call of all people to Christ.

Relics of the Magi. The cathedral of Cologne possesses and venerates the relics of "the holy three kings."

The relics were brought to Cologne from Milan in the 12th century, but little is known about them before that date.

Magi in the Gospel. In the Christian tradition, the theological significance of the Magi's visit is more important than its historical significance. The visit of the Magi is the first of two episodes in Matthew 2. The evangelist fashioned the chapter by drawing from two Old Testament stories. The visit of the Magi is modeled after Numbers 22–24 while the second episode (Mt 2.13–23) draws upon the Exodus story, as told in the Old Testament (Ex 1–4) and supplemented by midrashic expansions of the kind recounted by the Jewish historians Josephus and Philo. The Exodus motifs, in the latter, draw a parallel between Moses and Jesus.

The use of Numbers 22–24 in the episode concerning the Magi, prepares the stage for the Exodus to follow. In Numbers 22-24, the wicked king Balak of Moab seeks to destroy the Israelites under Moses just as the wicked king Herod sets into motion, in vv.1–12, a plot to destroy Jesus, which will be carried out explicitly in due time (vv.13, 18). In Numbers, a seer, Balaam, called a magus by midrashic lore, and coming "from the east," delivers favorable oracles, predicting prosperity for Israel and a strong, royal leader, thus thwarting the malicious designs of the wicked king. Similarly, the Magi in the Gospel come from the East (Mt 2.1) and, in virtue of visionary gifts, recognize and pay homage to Jesus as Messiah (vv.2, 11), thus auguring well for the defeat, in the next episode, of King Herod's plot. Numbers 24.17, concerning a star that will come forth from Jacob, was a well-known messianic text in Judaism; it furnishes the star in the Magi episode (Mt 2.2, 9, 10).

Matthew weaves scripture citations into the episode. Verse 6 blends Micah 5.1 and 2 Samuel 5.2 to articulate a Davidic messianic theme, for the Messiah was to be born in Bethlehem. Although the Magi are not so well schooled in Jewish scriptures as the Jewish king and rulers would be, they, by contrast to the rulers, are able to recognize the fulfilment of Jewish scripture: that Jesus is King of the Jews, Messiah. Their homage to him (v.11) alludes to Psalms 72.10–11 and Isaiah 60.6, which features foreigners bearing gold and frankincense in homage to Israel's anointed ruler. This allusion demonstrates that the Magi are representative of the world outside of Israel, the Gentiles to whom the kingdom is given once Israel refuses the Messiah (Mt 21.42–43).

Bibliography: M. M. BOURKE, "The Literary Genus of Matthew 1–2," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly (Washington 1939–) 22 (1960) 160–175. J. E. BRUNS, "The Magi Episode in Matthew 2," ibid., 23 (1961) 51–54. E. J. HOUDOUS, "The Gospel of the Epiphany," ibid., 6 (1944) 69–84. D. DAUBE, "The Earliest Structure of the Gospels," New Testament Studies (Cambridge,

"Adoration of the Magi," whale bone relief carving, English or northern French, c. 1120–1130. (Victoria & Albert Museum, Crown Copyright/Art Resource, NY)

Eng.—Washington 1954—) 5 (1958–59) 174–187. R. LEANEY, "The Birth Narratives in St. Luke and St. Matthew," ibid., 8 (1961–62) 158–166. A. M. DENIS, "L'Adoration des Mages vue par S. Matthieu," Nouvelle revue théologique (Tournai–Louvain–Paris 1869–) 82 (1960) 32–39. S. M. IGLESIAS, "El género literario del Evangelio de la Infancia en San Mateo," Estudios biblicos (Madrid 1941–) 17 (1958) 243–273. P. A. KING, "Matthew and Epiphany," Worship, 36 (1961–62) 89–95. G. MESSINA, "Ecce Magi ab Oriente venerunt," Verbum Domini (Rome 1921–) 14 (1934) 7–19. H. J. RICHARDS, "The Three Kings," Scripture 8 (1956) 23–28. D. SQUILLACI, "I Magi," Palestra del clero, 39 (1960) 16–20. R. E. BROWN, The Birth of the Messiah, rev. ed. (New York 1999). The Pontifical Biblical Commission, The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church (Vatican City 1993).

[J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN/E. J. JOYCE/M. STEVENSON]

MAGIC

On the basis of its appearance and manifestations the phenomenon of magic (from Greek μαγία, WITCHCRAFT) falls primarily in the realm of human thought and action. The man concerned with magic wishes to overcome the threatening powers of nature and to enlist the help of the good or favorable forces. Above all he wants to be master over earthly life by being able, apparently, to banish uncertainty and to meet the unforeseen. Magic accordingly appears in a causal connection (cause-effect relation) with practical daily life as a special manner of "dominating" it.

"Adoration of the Magi," tempera painting on panel by Bartolo di Fredi.

Since the powers and forces in question are beyond visible control and its efficacy, it is necessary for the causal sequence to have its own special character. Hence, its beginning extends to the whole scale of possible symbols, from concrete manipulation in things magical, to rites and knowledge, insofar as the cause producing the effect is seen in them.

Both the idea of magical causal connection and the symbolism of its domination signify an implicit assumption of a transcendent dimension of invisible reality, an assumption based immediately on intellectual and religious conviction. Accordingly, magic may be understood very broadly as an actualization of transcendence, in the sense that transcendence is drawn into causal-empirical existence and that the latter is carried over into the former. Magic, therefore, is nondifferentiating and leveling delivery of the invisible, spiritual, and hidden into the power of the dominant pragmatism and automatism of everyday life, or the attempt to control without distinction or difference the transcendent reality in the interests and purposes of a visibly pragmatic conduct and fulfillment of life. In this sense, it is "a kind of mechancial compulsion of power" (E. S. Brightman). If one wishes to give a precise definition of the phenomenon from the ideological point of view, magic ideology is present when it is believed that life can be ordered or controlled by the help of certain manipulations, incantations, prayerlike practices, amulets, and rites, or through special knowledge.

Magic is not restricted to specific levels of culture or to specific peoples, but exists as a possibility in all cultures and among all peoples, although in different ways. For this reason, it is absurd to see magic as a preliminary stage leading to religion (J. G. Frazer) or as the source of religion (E. DURKHEIM). However, the boundaries between magic and religion are often fluid in concrete instances.

Magic and Religion. They have a certain connection, and in a given case it is often difficult to determine whether an action or attitude is magical or religious. The explanation is this: on the one hand, there is transcendent reality that is more or less identical with that of religious experience and is implicitly assumed as a postulate for giving actuality to magical actions; on the other hand, even the religious man, in accordance with his nature and existence, needs tangible or concrete signs (cult, rites, symbols, prayers, knowledge) in order to establish himself in actual relation with God and the Divine.

In the first case, it depends essentially on the determination and understanding of the spiritual-dynamic dimension whether the attitude or action based upon it is to be spoken of as magical or religious. The highest being may be worshiped, for example, as the "greatest magician." The vital energy coming from him, as in a sense the megbe of the Bambuti Pygmies, the wakanda of the Sioux, or the manitu of the Algonquins, may be experienced and employed in such a way that-as among the Algonquins—the highest being is identified with the name of the power itself. In such a case, the structural difference that is essential for religion (God is the holy one, who is free in His giving and taking and cannot be compelled or forced) is thought of concomitantly in some way and enters, accordingly, more or less as a religio-mythical element into the magical action. The situation is different if, as in the instance of the mana of the Melanesians, the power is regarded as independent—a phenomenon that is found especially in disintegrating cultures. This power, or control, like that over an extremely fine material, can be possessed and used, provided that one knows the proper techniques. The procedure built upon it is entirely under the control of man's "knowledge" and "capability," of human machinations, and is ipso facto magical.

In the second case, it is the given attitude of man at a given time that determines whether there is religion or magic. Thus, the wearing of an amulet or the veneration of any object whatever (for example, a relic) can be a symbol for a religious idea or attitude, but it can also become an effective magical means of protection, or, if the "power" in the object is thought of as vital and real in itself, a form of fetishism. Among the Semang-Negrito, a blood sacrifice silences a violent storm, but only if the angry divinity is reconciled. Their neighbors, the Senoi, on the other hand, believe that the storm dragon is put to flight by the pouring out of a blood mixture in six places. In the first instance the rite reveals a symbolism that expresses a definite religious conviction, while in the second it becomes a necessarily effective cause. However, the Semang also, in the given situation, may think very much as the Senoi do.

Official and Private Magic. It is a characteristic feature of magic everywhere that it is employed not only to produce tangible results through automatically effective rites, but also to order and determine every last detail in the life of the individual.

Official Magic. Insofar as it is concerned with things that affect either the community as a whole or only the individual, a distinction can be made between official and private magic. Official magic is present—and in this case the boundaries between religion and magic are quite fluid—when public affairs are conducted in accordance with a magically effective ritual. This happens when, e.g., in a region of South Africa, public ceremonies are held in time of drought and those present give effectiveness to their wishes by means of imitative magic (in this instance by the sprinkling of water) or when public fertility ceremonies of a magic character are performed to guarantee better crops.

Such ceremonies are conducted by the community and also by an official priesthood or a professional magician (a medicine man). The latter can be called to his office by spirits or dreams without shamanism proper necessarily being already present or without shamanism being identical with magic. The one qualified to serve in this capacity is usually trained according to rules so that he can carry out his function publicly. Institutions of this kind are found where certain callings have a special significance for the community (e.g., smiths) or where the community has a primarily religious organization. It is natural in the case of the sacred kingship, actually founded on a religious basis, that the king himself is thought of in terms of magic. The king or chief is endowed with power and is responsible for the weal or woe of his subjects. He, or persons designated by him, fulfills this responsibility in the community by magically effective practices and rites. Not only actions of an institutional nature, but also those that through general use are regarded as more or less public and with which every one is naturally concerned, may be designated as official magic. The individual examples are legion. It is enough to think merely of the actions of hunters or planters, which each individual can perform or with which he must be concerned, within the framework of traditional usage.

Private Magic. In contrast to public magic there is private magic, which is employed in a secret manner by individuals (magicians) or groups, whether for exclusive personal use or to harm others (witchcraft). In extreme cases and in contrast to the white magic described above, one also finds black magic, which can be fittingly designated by the Bantu word bulozi. The term signifies the employment of magical knowledge completely separated from any connection with religion for the purpose of harming others by destroying their magico-divine vitality, and it is regarded as the worst of sins in the Bantu area. Bulozi therefore is no longer like magic, in a kind of neutrality outside religion, but is brought into religion as its contradiction (sin).

Anyone can practice private magic. Since, however, secret knowledge is assumed, special traditions (schools or families) arise in connection with it. Very often parapsychological factors may also play a role in it; or, insofar as there is question of bulozi, even something like the "compact with the devil" is found.

Kinds and Forms of Magic. The universal diffusion of magic exhibits basic ways in which magic intent is active. On the basis of the degree and clarity of the symbolism employed in magic and its manner of operation, the following successive stages can be worked out. Symbolism as such must always be present, since there is always a question of a transcendent form of reality. The boundaries between types are again very fluid.

Object Magic. This is based on the idea that the part serves for the whole and operates of itself and immediately by means of power-laden objects (human bones, hair, and nails, but also stones, tools, fetishes, etc.). If a man possesses anything at all belonging to another—in Australia even a footprint suffices—he has the other in his power. Object magic is employed especially in bulozi.

Contagious Magic. Magical effect is attained by the touching of power-laden objects. The immediate command over the power itself gives way to an indirect mastery. Magic objects can be stones, animals, plants, etc. Mythical ideas are often present in the background, and these create a magic interest respecting individual objects. Such transfers of power can also take place from man to man, an idea that is not without importance for the phenomenon of cannibalism. As distinguished from object magic, contagious magic is closer to symbolism. Thus the power of the lion is concealed in the lion's tooth worn as an amulet, or the strength of bast is concealed in rings made of this material (in Papua). The power, which in the last analysis possesses a certain independence and unavailability of its own, is not only received, but by means of contact for the purpose, can also be employed, for example, to carry offerings placed upon a stone to one's ancestors (as among the Corumba in West Africa).

Sympathetic Magic. Magical causal sequence is thought of here in its parallel relation to the sympathetic capacity of man. When once the sympathetic analogue is established, the desired effect is attained or the conditio sine qua non is fulfilled, without which the effect cannot take place. The analogue itself ranges from the picturelike setting (J. G. Frazer's "magic by similarity") to the imageless, but sense-fixed magic word of expression (see CURSE; BLESSING). When the hunter strikes the animal drawn in the sand, he effects the presumption of a successful hunt. Likewise is the belief that a man can kill another by looking down on the water—as is done among the Ovambo (S.W. Africa)—until he sees the image of his enemy; he then spits at it and curses it. Conversely, one obtains the presence of the divine or of the divinity when in the possession of a pertinent image or picture. In ancient Egypt, usebtis (little figurines) were buried with the dead. By means of magic formulas, which were written for the dead, the usebtis could be summoned to work in their place. The use of curse figurines or "dolls" is also common. They represent human beings upon whom the magic work is to take effect (tight and intricate tying of the "doll," strangulation; and pricking of the "doll," death). Here too belongs every kind of fear in respect to pictures.

Gnosiological Magic. In this kind of magic one no longer attains his results primarily by the performance of object-related or of sympathetico-analogous actions. Rather it is in the intellectual sphere, in the knowledge of the magical constellations connected with the universe and of the actions harmonized with them, that he sees the sound and appropriate establishment of existence guaranteed. It is also possible to speak under this head of negative, or passive, magic. Here belongs the setting of an action at the right time (e.g., at the waxing or waning of the moon), and likewise the discovery of in what manner the favor and blessing of the gods can be obtained (see DIV-INATION; ASTROLOGY). Worship, which is religious in origin, and religious (ascetico-mystical) conduct, under the influence of automatism and the object itself of the given rite, slip thereby imperceptibly into the magical, as for example in the use of the meaningless repetitions and heaping up of prayers in the belief that this makes prayers themselves more efficacious.

This phenomenon is to be noted especially in the syncretistic combining and mutual acceptances of different religions. Thus, in Hellenistic-Roman syncretism, as well as in that of the Far East, existence is ruled and ordered in a certain measure by one's knowing to what god he must turn (deus certus) and what appertains in particular to each god. Cicero speaks appropriately of the iustitia adversus deos. The sacred in the strict sense sinks, in the syncretistic process and under the influence of magic, into a state of impersonal anonymity and loses much of its transcendent character.

Magic and Science. The gnosiological form of magic, which ranges in time from the teachings and practices of the ancient BRAHMANS to modern THEOSOPHY, has not been without influence on the development of science. The magical attitude or outlook not only shaped those presuppositions that were the foundation for the elaboration and use of logical thinking and that exhibited the inherent possibility of employment for the domination of nature; but also, running parallel with the development of quasi-magical knowledge (the invention and use of writing, the use of numbers and measuring methods in the observation of the stars), it helped to make possible the external crystallization of knowledge as knowledge. Naturally, the further progress of knowledge by the recognition of causal-empirical relations signifies at the same time the discovery of the laws of science. However, a belief in gnosiological magic can only be vanquished by knowledge if that knowledge is combined with a positive faith.

See Also: HOROSCOPES; SUPERSTITION; ALCHEMY; SHAMAN AND MEDICINE MAN.

Bibliography: G. LANCZKOWSKI et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957-65) 6:1274-80. A. BERTHOLET and C. M. EDSMAN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957-65) 4:595-601. R. R. MARETT et al., J. HASTINGS, ed. Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics (Edinburgh 1908-27) 8:245-321, a systematic world survey. H. WEBSTER, Magic: A Sociological Study (Stanford 1947). W. GOODE, "Magic and Religion: A Continum," Ethnos 14 (1949) 172-182. C. H. RATSCHOW, Magie und Religion (2d ed. Gütersloh 1955). B. MALINOWSKI, Magic, Science and Religion (New York 1955). G. B. VETTER, Magic and Religion (New York 1958). R. ALLIER, Magie et Religion (Paris 1935). A. E. JENSEN, Myth and Cult among Primitive Peoples, tr. M. T. CHOLDIN and W. WEISSLEDER (Chicago 1963). G. VAN DER LEEUW, Religion in Essence and Manifestation, tr. J. E. TURNER (London 1938). L. THORNDIKE, A History of Magic and Experimental Science (New York 1923-58). M. ELIADE, Patterns in Comparative Religion, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1958), Index s.v. "Magic, Magico-religious powers."

[W. DUPRÉ]

MAGIC (IN THE BIBLE)

The common Hebrew verb meaning to practice magic or sorcery is $ki\check{s}\check{s}\bar{e}p$ (Ex 7.11, 22.17; Dt 18.10; 2 Chr 33.6; Dn 2.2; Mal 3.5). That magic was practiced in Israel is clear from the denunciation of it in the Bible. Seemingly there were many varieties of magicians (Lv 19.26; Dt 18.10; 1 Sm 15.23, 28.3; 2 Kgs 17.17, 21.6). There are also references to the practice of magic in Is 3.2; Mi 3.11; Jer 27.9 and 29.8; Ez 13.6, 9; 22.28; and Zec 10.2.

Magic played a much less important role in Israel than elsewhere. Yet the many prohibitions of the use of magic by law and the zealous struggle of the Prophets against it show that it had quite a hold on the people (Ez 13.18-21; Mi 5.11; Mal 3.5). Saul at one time banished the "mediums and wizards" but later sought their help (1 Sm 28.3–7). From Is 3.2–3 it is evident that diviners and magicians were influential on the people of Judah. King Manasseh availed himself publicly of the service of the magicians (2 Chr 33.6). Jeremiah (27.9) warns the people against putting any trust in "diviners, soothsayers and sorcerers." Magic as such was alien to Yahwism; the Israelites were too profoundly aware of God as creator and of their own insignificance and total dependence on Him. In Dt 18.10 mention is made of eight different varieties of magic, all of which were forbidden by Yahweh (Dt 18.14).

The New Testament writers held the same views on magic. SIMON MAGUS, a raw neophyte (Acts 8.9–24), and Elymas (Bar–Jesus), a Jewish magician, pretended to foretell the future (Acts 13.6–12), and reference is made to the legendary magicians of Pharaoh, Jannes, and Mambres, who tried to counteract the marvels worked by Moses (2 Tm 3.8). These are the only magicians mentioned in the New Testament. St. Paul berates Elymas, calling him an "enemy of all justice, full of deceit and villainy" (Acts 13.10), and places the sorcerer with the immoral, the licentious, and the idolatrous (Gal 5.19–21); St. John puts him with liars and murderers (Rv 9.21, 18.23, 21.8, 22.15).

Bibliography: A. LEFÈVRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al., (Paris 1928–) 5:732–739. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 1417–18. H. GROSS and J. SINT, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1277–78.

[M. J. HUNT]

MAGISTRI COMACINI

Magistri Comacini is a term applied in the early Middle Ages to the master architects who supervised the construction of medieval cathedrals. It first appears c. 643 in a charter [L. A. Muratori, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, cont. by G. Carducci and V. Fiorini (Città di Castello 1900-) 1.2:25; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Leges (Berlin 1826-) 4:33] of the Lombard King Rotharius, and later in a document (ibid. 4:176) of King Liutprand to a group of builders (741). The term is derived probably from Comacina, an island in Lake Como; the area was known for the skill of its architects during this period. It is unlikely that the magistri comacini can be linked with the organized collegia of builders under the Roman Empire, who are said to have taken refuge on the island during the barbarian invasions. By the 9th century, the terms magister marmorarius and magister casarius also describe those in the building trades.

Although the north Italian style had great impact on Romanesque architecture, it was not the only source of inspiration or craftsmanship; the magistri comacini appear elsewhere throughout medieval Europe. They often were granted charters and were organized along the lines of a corporation or guild, but their history is obscure, perhaps due to a secrecy that excluded outsiders. A few monks served as architects, such as the Benedictine Winidharius at SANKT GALLEN c. 835 [Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae (Berlin 1826-) 1:89-90], but most master builders were laymen; mastership seems to have passed from father to son. The masters moved from place to place and developed an international style in their work. Their artistic canons tended to break with classical and Byzantine traditions. Some, however, spent years on a large edifice, and several generations of a family might work on the construction of one cathedral complex. Miniatures in the codex of the Relatio translationis sancti Geminiani in Modena offer a view of the masters' duties in the reconstruction of the cathedral there (1099–1106); the master builder, Lanfranc, was a figure of authority and dignity, supervising diverse assistants, artisans, and laborers.

The Lombard magistri, who were fond of signing their work, are better known than others. The highly organized Italian lodges of architects and masons continued in existence to early modern times and played an important part in the development and spread of Baroque architecture in Italy and south Germany. With the decline of European cathedral building (16th–17th century) many lodges began to initiate nonmasons into their secret ritual and organization in order to maintain their membership and treasury; it is with these groups that modern FREEMA-SONRY claims affinity.

See Also: CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.

Bibliography: G. MERZARIO, I maestri Comacini, storia artistica di mille duecento anni 600–1800, 2 v. (Milan 1893). G. T. RIVOIRA, Le origini della architectura lombarda, 2 v. (Rome 1901) 1:127–131. W. RAVENSCROFT, The Comacines, Their Predecessors and Successors (London 1910). A. K. PORTER, Lombard Architecture, 4 v. (New Haven 1915–17) 1:8–20. A. M. ZENDRALLI, I magistri Grigioni (Poschiavo 1958). C. CORDIÉ "I Maestri commacini (impresari construttori e non comensi)," Annali di Scuola normale superiore di Pisa, 2d ser., 31 (1962) 151–172. L. E. BAXTER, The Cathedral Builders, the Story of a Great Masonic Guild (New York 1899).

[B. J. COMASKEY]

MAGLIONE, LUIGI

Cardinal, papal secretary of state; b. Casoria (Napoli), Italy, March 2, 1877; d. there, Aug. 22, 1944. After ordination (1901) he received doctorates in theology (1902) and Canon Law (1904) and studied at the papal diplomatic academy (1905–07). From 1907 until 1918 he worked in the section dealing with extraordinary affairs in the papal secretariate of state and taught diplomatic history at the papal diplomatic academy. He was sent as provisory papal representative to Bern, Switzerland (February 28, 1918), and also as representative for ecclesiastical matters at the League of Nations. After the resumption of diplomatic relations between the Holy See and Switzerland (August 1, 1920), Maglione occupied the nunciature there and was named titular archbishop of Caesarea. He was appointed nuncio to Paris (May 24, 1926) and remained there during a period of controversy concerning the ACTION FRANÇAISE. His successor Valerio Valeri was appointed June 3, 1936. After becoming cardinal (Dec. 3, 1935), Maglione was named prefect of the Congregation of the Council in 1938. From March 10, 1939, until his death, he was secretary of state. In 1939, in pursuit of Pius XII's attempt to keep peace, he sought to arrange a conference with England, France, Germany, Poland, and Italy in order to compose the differences between Germany and Poland, and between France and Italy. Maglione warned Joachim von Ribbentrop, the German foreign minister, that England and France would not abandon Poland in the event of an attack. When Ribbentrop visited the Vatican (March 1940), the cardinal handed him a memorandum containing seven points listing actions inimical to the Church in Poland and in other areas under German control. As a statesman Maglione was highly esteemed for his realistic judgments in ecclesiastical and political matters. Pius XII valued his assistance in the settlement of problems that beset the Holy See continually from the outset of World War II.

Bibliography: L'Osservatore romano (Aug. 23, 1944), necrology. W. SANDFUCHS, ed., Die Aussenminister der Pápste (Munich 1962) 124–130 by K. WÜSTENBERG.

[R. LEIBER]

MAGLORIUS, ST.

Bishop and abbot also known as Magloire and Maelor; b. Britain (probably Wales), sixth century; d. Island of Sark (English Channel), c. 595. His predominately legendary vita (from the tenth century) claims that Maglorius was a pupil of ILLTUD in the monastery of Llantwit Major in Glamorgan and a companion of Samson of Dol. He supposedly accompanied the latter to Brittany, where he succeeded him as abbot and bishop of Dol. It is further alleged that he spent the last years of his life as abbot of the monastery that Lascon, the chieftain of the island of Sark, gave him in gratitude for a miraculous cure. Legend ascribes many posthumous miracles to Maglorius. His relics were translated (c. 850) from Sark to the Abbey of Lehon near Dinan and subsequently (c. 963) to Paris to the former Abbey of St. Magloire. Maglorius is specially venerated as a Breton saint, but his cult spread into Italy. He is pictured as a pilgrim or as a monk being crowned by an angel.

Feast: Oct. 24.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 5139–47. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 10:772-793. A. DE LA BORDERIE, Les Miracles de Saint Magloire (Rennes 1891). The Book of Saints (4th ed. New York 1947). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935-56) 10:823-825. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:192-193. G. LUCCHESI, Il culto di s. Maglorio a Faenza (Faenza 1957). L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955-59) 3.2:860-861. D. ATTWATER, A Dictionary of Saints (new ed. New York 1958). M. BATESON, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885-1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908-09, 1921-22, 1938; suppl. 1901-) 12:767-768. F. DUINE, Memento des sources hagiographiques de l'histoire de Bretagne (Rennes 1918).

[M. CSÁKY]

MAGNA CARTA

In May 1215 King JOHN put his seal to the articles of peace that his rebellious barons presented to him. A few days later a formal charter based on these articles was granted to the people of England by the King. The charter was known as the Great Charter because of its size; in its final form it represents the influence, not the actual composition, of STEPHEN LANGTON, Archbishop of Canterbury. The charter has always been recognized as one of the great documents of English history. It stands at the head of the Statutes of the Realm, it was repeatedly reissued by later medieval kings, and in the 17th century was an inspiration to those who opposed the personal rule of Charles I. Its origin is popularly supposed to lie in the shortcomings of King John, but there is more to the charter than that.

John is not the medieval ruler with the most savory of reputations. He inherited a remarkable collection of countries, stretching from the Spanish border to the German marches, with England at the heart of this "empire." Within a few years he had lost all his northern French possessions. He had then taxed the English to an unheard of extent to mount a counteroffensive, which duly met with disaster at Bouvines (1214); the campaign emptied his treasury but did not restore his overseas possessions. The result was a baronial rebellion that the King could stave off only at the price of the concessions embodied in the Magna Carta. It is true that John was treacherous, unstable, greedy, and unlucky, but it is doubtful if a better man could have met with greater success. In spite of his reputation with his contemporaries, he was within limits an able ruler, conscientious, hardworking, and surprisingly just where his own interests were not concerned. Unfortunately for him the ties between his English and Norman subjects were now growing looser while the King of France, PHILIP II AUGUSTUS, was pressing relentlessly on John's French possessions. More and more the English exchequer had to pay for expensive campaigns that did no more than preserve the status quo. John used comparatively new and very efficient methods of taxation, which, unlike most royal taxes at that time, lay heavily on the rich as well as on the poor. Consequently he was blamed for problems he did not create and which no one could have solved.

The charter was not merely a demand for redress of grievances. There had been many previous baronial revolts that represented little more than gangs of disaffected nobles seeking remedies for individual grievances. However, in 1215 for the first time the opposition united as a party with the common program of demanding general and responsible reforms.

The problem they had to face was how to preserve the manifest good which efficient government under the last three kings had brought to the English, while restraining the increasing power of that government within reasonable limits. The barons in 1215 were quite frank in stating that it was the tyranny of HENRY II, as well as that of John, that they were opposing. They were equally clear that they did not wish to destroy the elaborate structure of law and courts and the powerful, if crude, civil service these kings had built up. However it was intolerable to find Henry II using his servants, not to put down injustice, but to hound his archbishop out of the kingdom; or that John used the legal weapon of distraint for debt to drive one of his magnates into penniless exile while starving his wife and son to death. The King's excuse in this case had been the enormity of his debt; but everyone knew that the real reason was that the magnate, William de Briouse, and his family knew too much about the death of Prince Arthur, who had been captured by John.

King John "Lackland" (seated), after signing the Magna Carta. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

The charter reflects these concerns. It contains many particular grievances and even some attempt to turn the clock back in a most undesirable way. For the most part, however, the Angevin legal reforms were accepted and their scope even extended. The royal right to tax at will was heavily circumscribed. The heart of the charter however, was an attempt to put the King under the law. His power of arbitrary distraint was abolished. In future the king could imprison nobody without a judgment according to the law of the land in a case decided by the defendant's social equals. The barons, it is true, failed to establish any workable machinery for enforcing the charter, but even so, despite the fact that within a few weeks of its sealing war had broken out again, the King took care to observe its rules, as did his successor Henry III. The barons had only begun the building of the characteristic English constitution; but they had shown once and for all that tyranny could be checked if the will to check it were there.

Bibliography: W. S. MCKECHNIE, Magna Carta (2d ed. Glasgow 1914). H. E. MALDEN, ed., Magna Carta Commemoration Essays (London 1917). F. M. POWICKE, Stephen Langton (Oxford 1928). V. H. GALBRAITH, Studies in the Public Records (New York 1948). S. PAINTER, The Reign of King John (Baltimore 1949). J. E. A. JOLLIFFE, Angevin Kingship (London 1955). J. C. HOLT, The Northerners: A Study in the Reign of King John (Oxford 1961); King John (London 1963). J. C. HOLT, Magna Carta, 2nd ed. (Cambridge, England 1992). A.E.D. HOWARD, Magna Carta: Text and Commentary (Charlottesville 1998).

[E. JOHN/EDS.]

MAGNANIMITY

A moral virtue, classified as a potential part of the virtue of fortitude, that perfects a person by inclining him reasonably to perform excellent works of virtue that are worthy of great honor. The proper object of the virtue of magnanimity is great works of virtue, but secondarily and indirectly, magnanimity moderates the pleasure taken in present honor and the desire of future honors, because these are necessarily associated with the accomplishment of great works.

Other virtues also incline a person to seek and to achieve difficult and excellent works. It is the precise function of the virtue of magnanimity to moderate and control an individual's inclination to shy from works of this kind because of the difficulty involved in them.

Magnanimity involves a general inclination to nobility of spirit because it inclines a man to direct his efforts at great and outstanding deeds. The magnanimous man is a superior type of person. He is never overcome by envy or covetousness, nor is he embarrassed or humiliated when others do great things. He is open and frank; he is primarily concerned about virtue and noble works, and is untroubled by the petty things that disturb others. He is neither overjoyed by the praise of others, nor saddened by criticism. He is a man intent upon following the precept of Christ: "You, therefore, are to be perfect, even as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Mt 5.48). The truly magnanimous man is more intent upon the excellence at which he aims than on the honors which may come to him from men on its account. As to honor itself, he values most that which he hopes to receive from God.

It may seem that magnanimity is opposed to Christian humility, for the seeking of honor appears to be incompatible with humility. Actually, these virtues complement one another. "There is in man something great which he possesses through the goodness of God, and something defective which comes to him through the weakness of nature. Accordingly, magnanimity makes a man deem himself worthy of great things because of the gifts he has from God. . . . On the other hand, humility makes a man think little of himself in consideration of his own deficiency" (ST. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae,129.3 ad 4).

There are four vices opposed to the virtue of magnanimity-three by excess: presumption, ambition, and vainglory; one by defect: pusillanimity. Presumption inclines a person to attempt actions or projects that are beyond his strength and ability. (This is different from the vice of presumption that is opposed to the theological virtue of hope). Presumption is the result of a culpably erroneous judgment a person may have of his ability or virtue, or of an erroneous judgment of the works that are worthy of honor, causing a person to seek honor in the wrong kind of works. Presumption always implies an unreasonable reliance on one's own powers. AMBITION impels a person to seek honors that are not due to his state or to his merit. VAINGLORY is a vice by which a person seeks fame and popularity without sufficient reason, or without directing them to their true goal, i.e. the glory of God and the good of neighbor. PUSILLANIMITY, which is opposed to magnanimity by defect, is a vice by which a person tends unreasonably and erroneously to think his abilities insufficient to justify attempting difficult works. Magnanimity is a virtue that must be possessed by all Christians if they would strive for the greatest work of all, the perfection of the Christian life. It is expressed in the words "I can do all things in him who strengthens me" (Phil 4.13).

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 129–133. A. THOUVENIN, Dictionnaire de théologie, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–) 9.2:1550–53. J. PIEPER, Fortitude and Temperance, tr. D. F. COOGAN (New York 1954). F. L. B. CUNNINGHAM, ed., The Christian Life (Dubuque 1959). F. ROBERTI et al., comps., Dictionary of Moral Theology, ed. P. PALAZZINI et al. (Westminster, Md. 1962).

[R. DOHERTY]

MAGNERICUS OF TRIER, ST.

Archbishop; b. early sixth century; d. 596. He was from childhood a protégé of St. NICETIUS, whom he succeeded in the See of TRIER before 570. Like his young friend at Poitiers, Venantius FORTUNATUS, he had a deep devotion to St. Martin of Tours, to whom he dedicated several churches and an abbey (in which Magnericus is buried). Through his pilgrimages to Tours he came to know Bp. GREGORY OF TOURS. Magnericus died of a fever at an advanced age. Eberwin, abbot of St. Martin of Tours at Trier, included the verses Fortunatus had written to Magnericus in his copious Vita s. Magnerici. His disciples included GÉRY OF CAMBRAI.

Feast: July 25.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 6:168–192). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 2:5149–50. E. EWIG, Trier im Merowingerreich (Trier 1954). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 3:188–189.

[W. A. JURGENS]

MAGNI, VALERIANO

Capuchin priest, diplomat, and missioner; b. Prague, Bohemia, October 15, 1586; d. Salzburg, Austria, July 29, 1661. Valeriano, although of the noble family of Magni of Milan, entered the Capuchin Order in 1602. He spent his first years as lector. In 1627, as diplomat, he was commissioned by Emperor Ferdinand to implement the Edict of Restitution. Pope Urban VIII appointed him missionary apostolic to Bohemia in 1629. As the pope's delegate he attended the Diet of Ratisbon (1630). As missionary, Valeriano reestablished the Church in Saxony and Hesse (1652). Between 1635 and 1661, he was often a controversial figure. However, history testifies to his orthodox Catholic spirit. He wrote penetrating and progressive philosophical writings, together with apologetical-theological works, but Valeriano the philosopher and theologian was overshadowed by Valeriano the diplomat and missionary.

Bibliography: Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 1776–77. C. PULVERMACHER, "Missionary, Scholar, Diplomat: Valerian the Great," Round Table of Franciscan Research 23 (1958) 56–65. FATHER CUTHBERT, The Capuchins, 2 v. (London 1928). I. DA MILANO, Enciclopedia cattolica 7:1844–45.

[L. MILLER]

MAGNIEN, ALPHONSE

Educator; b. Bleymard, Mende, France, June 9, 1837; d. Baltimore, Md., December 21, 1902. After early classical studies at the minor seminary of Chirac, he did his philosophical and theological studies at the Sulpician diocesan seminary of Orléans (1857-62), the diocese to which he had become affiliated after an appeal for clerical recruits by Msgr. F. A. P. Dupanloup. For two years after ordination in June 1862, he taught at the minor seminary of La-Chapelle-Saint-Mesmin. Magnien then began his Sulpician work, first as a teacher of science at Nantes (1864-65) and then, after his novitiate at Issy near Paris, as professor of theology and Scripture at Rodez (1866-69). In the fall of 1869, he went to St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Md., where he taught philosophy and then liturgy, dogma, and Scripture. Although Magnien became the sixth superior of St. Mary's Seminary in 1878, he continued his teaching until 1886. After that he had to confine his efforts solely to the administration of the seminary, where his position made him also superior (not provincial) of all the Sulpicians in the U.S.

During his administration, St. Mary's grew in size and in prestige as the oldest and largest major seminary in the country; a new wing was added to the building; its six-year course of studies was thoroughly revised; St. Austin's College for the graduate training of Sulpician novices was established at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.; the Sulpician fathers assumed the disciplinary and spiritual direction of the young priest students at the University; and the direction of major seminaries in the Archdioceses of New York, Boston, and San Francisco was turned over to the society. Meanwhile, the Abbé Magnien, as he came to be called, was appointed by Cardinal James Gibbons of Baltimore to his archdiocesan council (1879) and made director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith (1896). For almost 25 years Magnien was the confidant and advisor of the cardinal, and was intimately involved in national and international ecclesiastical affairs. When his health began to fail in the summer of 1897, Magnien went to France, where he underwent a serious operation. After he returned to Baltimore in May 1898, it soon became evident that his strength was failing; he resigned his office in the summer of 1902 and died a few months later.

Bibliography: Bulletin Trimestriel des Anciens Elèves de S. Sulpice (Paris 1903) 160–169. P. J. DONAHUE et al., Very Rev. A. L. Magnien: A Memorial (Baltimore 1903). J. T. ELLIS, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1952). M. F. FOLEY, "Very Rev. Alphonse L. Magnien," Catholic World 76 (March 1903) 814–822. C. G. HERBERMANN, The Sulpicians in the United States (New York 1916). Memorial Volume of the Centenary of St. Mary's Seminary (Baltimore 1891).

[C. M. CUYLER]

MAGNIFICAT (CANTICLE OF MARY)

Mary's song of thanksgiving and praise for the mighty act that God had wrought in her and for the salvation that has been given to Israel (Lk 1.46–55) is called the Magnificat after the first word of its Latin text. The canticle, which was sung by the Blessed Virgin Mary when greeted by her cousin Elizabeth as the mother of Our Lord (Lk 1.46–55), comprises three parts. In 1.46 to 1.50 Mary, the eschatological personification of her people, sings praise to God her Savior; in 1.51 to 1.53 she recalls what God has done for Israel, and in 1.54 to 1.55 she sings of the divine plan foretold in Abraham and perfected in herself. In Mary a new beginning has been made as well as a fulfillment.

The Magnificat is used in the Eastern liturgies on certain days in the morning Office, while in the Western Church it has been, from a very early date, the canticle of VESPERS (Evening Prayer) in the Catholic, Anglican and Lutheran traditions. In solemn Vespers in the Catholic tradition, the ceremonies accompanying its singing in choir, such as incensation of the altar (as at the beginning of solemn Mass), are impressive. By reason of its daily use in medieval times a number of antiphons have been associated with the Magnificat, among them the notable O ANTIPHONS of the week preceding CHRISTMAS.

Bibliography: R. C. TANNEHILL, "Magnificat as Poem," Journal of Biblical Literature 93 (1974) 263–275. F. FLECKENSTEIN, "Marienverehrung in der Musik," in Handbuch der Marienkunde (Regensburg 1984) 622–663. R. E. BROWN, "The Annunciation to Mary, the Visitation, and the Magnificat (Luke 1:26–56)," Worship 62 (1988) 249–259. R. F. TAFT, The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West: The Origins of the Divine Office and Its Meaning for Today, 2d rev. ed. (Collegeville, Minn. 1993). G. GUIVER, Company of Voices: Daily Prayer and the People of God (New York 1988). P. F. BRADSHAW, Daily Prayer in the Early Church: A Study of the Origin and Early Development of the Divine Office (London 1981).

[M. E. MCIVER/L. J. WAGNER/EDS.]

MAGNIFICENCE

A moral virtue annexed to the virtue of fortitude that disposes a person to moderate his love for money in such a way that he is reasonably inclined to incur heavy expenses in order to carry out great projects. The virtue of magnanimity inclines a man to carry out great works of virtue; magnificence is concerned with external works—great buildings, celebrations, endowments, great social works, etc. These projects are the proximate matter of the virtue of magnificence; the remote matter is the money that is involved. Because the attraction for money is so strong, there is a special difficulty when a man must expend a large amount of money on some project; it requires a special disposition of soul to dispose a person to perform such a work easily and connaturally.

Because it is a virtue that is concerned with great sums of money, it is especially the virtue of the rich and of those in charge of large and important enterprises. The ordinary person can exercise only relative magnificence. He does not expend large sums of money, but there are times when he must spend money in sums large in proportion to his means. When the ordinary family celebrates a wedding or buys a new home, the expenditure involves a relatively large outlay. Every Christian, no matter how poor he may be, ought to develop a readiness of soul to expend relatively large sums of money when circumstances require it. It requires the same disposition of soul for a person of small means to contribute $25 to the construction of the new parish school as it requires for a richer person to contribute $2,500. Even externally, there is something magnificent about the widow contributing her mite to the temple, a magnificence somehow lacking in a million-dollar grant from a foundation.

Opposed to magnificence at one extreme is the vice of stinginess or meanness; at the other extreme is the vice of prodigality or wastefulness. Stinginess is particularly distasteful; it is the vice of those who are unreasonably attached to their money and spend it so sparingly that their projects cannot be carried out in a manner commensurate with their importance. It is the vice of those who would build a smaller, less magnificent church or cut down the guest list for their daughter's wedding merely in order to save money that they really do not need. The prodigal or wasteful person disregards the due proportion between the task and the amount he spends. He either has such a disregard for wealth or is so desirous of praise that he scatters money foolishly. He celebrates his daughter's wedding with unreasonable extravagance, and gives a casual beggar a needlessly large gift. Stinginess and prodigality are, in themselves, venial sins, but they may become grave by reason of circumstances, especially by reason of sinful motives.

There are no divine precepts concerning magnificence because it is a virtue that pertains to excellence, but we find that Mary Magdalene was eulogized by Our Lord after she had anointed him with a costly ointment: "Amen I say to you, wherever in the whole world this gospel is preached, this also that she has done shall be told in memory of her" (Mk 14.9).

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 134–135. F. L. B. CUNNINGHAM, ed., The Christian Life (Dubuque 1959). F. ROBERTI et al., comps., Dictionary of Moral Theology, ed. P. PALAZZINI et al., tr. H. J. YANNONE et al., from 2d ltal. ed. (Westminster, Md. 1962).

[R. DOHERTY]

MAGNOBOD OF ANGERS, ST.

Bishop, b. c. 574; d. after 635. According to his biographer MARBOD, archdeacon of ANGERS and later bishop of Rennes, Magnobod was the son of a prominent family in the region of Angers. His aptitude for studies and his love of prayer attracted the attention of the local bishop, LICINIUS, who ordained him to the priesthood and later placed him in charge of the monastery situated in Challones-Sur-Loire (Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés 1:675). About the year 610 Magnobod was consecrated bishop of Angers, and he proved himself to be a competent and holy shepherd of his flock. He took part in synods at Paris in 614, and at Clichy in 627 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia 1:191, 201; Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 10:594). Magnobod wrote the life of St. Maurilius (d. 453), one of his early predecessors in the See of Angers (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores antiquissimi 4.2:82–101), and is said to have built a large church in honor of St. Saturninus (third century), in which he was later buried. In the region of Segré, Magnobod is invoked as the patron of livestock. There are those who see the foundation for this cult in a popular play on words among the peasants, for the French for Magnobod is Mainbeuf, and thus the last syllable in the saint's name, -beuf, rhymes easily with $b\alpha uf$, ox, bullock, beef.

Feast: Oct. 16.

Bibliography: Gallia Christiana (Paris 1856–65) 14:550, 598. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 7.2:928–950. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.2:863. J. CAMBELL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1286. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 5151–53. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 10:498–500.

[H. DRESSLER]

MAGNUS, JOHANNES AND OLAUS

Johannes, Swedish archbishop and historian; b. Linköping, Sweden, March 19, 1488; d. Rome, March 22, 1544. Olaus, historian and geographer; b. Linköping, Oct. 1490; d. Rome, Aug. 1, 1557. Sweden became Lutheran during their lifetime.

They were sons of a burgher of Linköping and were educated at the cathedral school of Västerås and at European universities. In 1523 Adrian VI sent Johannes, his former student at Louvain, to Sweden as papal legate to investigate the accusations of Gustavus Vasa, the newly elected king, that Abp. Trolle of Uppsala was treasonably supporting the Danish king's claims to the Swedish throne. In 1524 Clement VII refused the request of the canons of Uppsala to depose Trolle and to make Johannes archbishop, but Johannes was made administrator of the archdiocese. By 1526 Vasa began to support Lutheranism openly, partly because the pope supported Trolle. Johannes resisted the religious changes. He was arrested for treason, but he was released eventually and allowed to leave Sweden. He and Olaus, who had been away from Sweden since 1534 on missions for the king, lived in Danzig until they moved to Rome (1541). Johannes was consecrated archbishop of Uppsala in 1533 but never resided in his see. When he died (1544), Olaus was named archbishop of Uppsala. Olaus distinguished himself at the Council of Trent.

Both men were renowned scholars. Johannes wrote a history of Scandinavian kings, edited and published by Olaus (Rome 1554), and a history of the metropolitan See of Uppsala (Rome 1557) with a biography of him by Olaus. Olaus published a Carta marina (Venice 1539), a work remarkable for its description of the physical features of Northern Europe. It furnishes much information on the type of geographic data available in the 16th century. Olaus published a companion volume (Rome 1555) on the topography, natural history, ethnography, and the economic and political conditions of the Scandinavian world, of which there is an abridged English translation (Antwerp 1658) and an Italian translation (Turin 1958).

Bibliography: E. LYNAM, The Carta Marina of Olaus Magnus (Jenkintown, Pa. 1949). H. JÄGERSTADT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1287.

[E. RENNER]

MAGNUS OF FÜSSEN, ST.

Apostle of the Algäu; b. c. 699; d. Füssen, Germany, Sept. 6, 772. A legend-clouded vita confuses him in part with St. Magnoald (or Magnus, d. 666), student of St. GALL. Magnus was called from SANKT GALLEN by Bp. Wichpert of Augsburg to Christianize the region of the Algäu. About 746 he established a cell at Füssen on a site that later became the monastery of Sankt Mang. With the support of King PEPIN he converted the heathen, cleared lands for cultivation and settlement, and opened the region to iron mining. Buried at Füssen, he was recognized as a saint between 838 and 847 and became the patron of Füssen and Kempten. Under the name of St. Mang he is a popular folk saint, especially in southern Germany, Tirol, and Switzerland, where his aid is invoked against snakes, vermin, and mice. A chalice, stole, maniple, and staff, which he is said to have used, are still preserved.

Feast: Sept. 6.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, including the vita, Sept. 2:700–781, second part, 745–756, contains historic core. F. ZOEPFL, Das Bistum Augsburg und seine Bischiöfe im Mittelalter (Munich 1956), passim. A. BIGELMAIR, Lebensbilder aus dem bayerischen Schwaben, ed. G. VON PÖLNITZ, v. 2 (Munich 1953) 1–46. Festschrift zum 1200 jährigen jubiläum des heiligen Magnus (Füssen 1950). M. COENS, "La Vie de S. Magne de Füssen par Otloh de Saint-Emmeran," Analecta Bollandiana 81 (1963) 159–227.

[D. ANDREINI]

MAGUIRE, CHARLES BONAVENTURE

Missionary; b. Dungannon, County Tyrone, Ireland, December 16, 1768; d. Pittsburgh, Pa., July 17, 1833. Maguire, a priest of the Order of Friars Minor, studied at the Catholic University, Louvain, Belgium, and taught theology at the College of St. Isidore, Rome. For eight years he ministered to the Germans in the Netherlands, narrowly escaping death at the hands of French Revolutionists and Napoleon's troops. In 1817 he arrived in the U.S. as a missionary apostolic with faculties from Cardinal Lorenzo Litta, Prefect of the Congregation de Propaganda Fide. These faculties were endorsed by Ambrose Maréchal, Archbishop of Baltimore, whereupon the missionary was sent to Ebensburg in western PENNSYLVA-NIA. He was soon appointed to succeed the German Capuchin, Rev. Peter Helbron, as pastor of Sportsman's Hall. In 1820 Maguire's name was recommended by the hierarchy of Ireland as a suitable candidate for a bishopric in the U.S, but he was instead chosen to replace Rev. William F. X. O'Brien as pastor of St. Patrick's Church, Pittsburgh. Under Maguire's guidance the Catholic population of Pittsburgh increased in the 1820s to about 4,000 and baptisms for the decade numbered 1,214. With the influx of German Catholic immigrants into the area, Maguire decided on a second church for the Catholics of Pittsburgh. He bought property at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Grant Street and on June 29, 1829, he laid the cornerstone of what the newspapers called "the cathedral." He did not live to see the completion of the church. The church, dedicated under the patronage of St. Paul the Apostle on May 4, 1834, became the cathedral of the newly erected Diocese of PITTSBURGH on August 11, 1843. Maguire's zeal won the admiration of the Catholics and non-Catholics of Pittsburgh, as his learning won him a professorship at the academy that became the University of Pittsburgh. In 1825, he published a representative apologetic: A Defense of the Divinity of Jesus Christ and of the Mystery of the Real Presence.

Bibliography: A. A. LAMBING, A History of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Pittsburgh and Allegheny (New York 1880).

[D. F. SWEENEY]

MAGUIRE, JOHN WILLIAM ROCHFORT

Educator, labor arbitrator; b. County Roscommon, Ireland, Aug. 11, 1883; d. Miami, Florida, Feb. 11, 1940. His parents, William Thomas and Caroline (Geoffcott) Maguire, sent him to All Hallows School near Lyme Regis, England. He emigrated to Canada, entered the United States, and found employment as a reporter for the Spokane Spokesman Review. His most notable work as a journalist was his coverage of the trial of William Dudley Haywood (1869–1928), founder of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Maguire entered Western Theological Seminary in Chicago as a candidate for the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Chicago; but he was not satisfied with the branch theory of the church expounded by his professors. He was introduced (1908) to Peter J. MULDOON, Auxiliary Bishop of Chicago. It was on Muldoon's advice that he made a retreat at the Passionist Monastery in Chicago, where he was received into the Catholic Church.

Maguire was advised to study philosophy at St. Viator College, Bourbonnais, Illinois, where he came into contact with the Clerics of St. Viator, the religious community that he eventually joined. In 1914 he was sent to The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., and on Dec. 18, 1914, he became the first priest to be ordained by Bp. Thomas J. Shahan, Rector of the University. Upon receiving his master's degree in 1915, he returned to St. Viator College, where for over 20 years he taught economics and sociology. Maguire, an advocate of social reform, became closely associated with such organizations as the Social Reform party and the Illinois State Federation of Labor. During World War I he served as a U.S. Army chaplain.

After his return from Europe in 1918, he gave conspicuous public support to the Bishops' Program of Social Reconstruction. During his later years he was a frequent arbitrator of strikes. In 1934 he was appointed arbitrator of the long and bitter strike of the Kohler Company in Wisconsin, and in 1939 he succeeded in settling a labor dispute between five American Federation of Labor unions and the Warner Construction Company. He was known as one of labor's best friends.

Bibliography: Archives, Clerics of St. Viator. L. V. RYAN, 'John Maguire, Seeker after Justice,' 'Social Order 6 (May 1956) 217–221.

[J. T. ELLIS]

MAHAYANA

Literally, "Great Vehicle," the name adopted by a series of movements in Buddhism between the first centuries B.C. and A.D. that came together to form a new synthesis of BUDDHISM. The movements involved represented revolutions in practice, morality, and philosophy.

In both the liturgical and moral arenas, these movements reacted against earlier ways of thinking about what it meant to be a buddha and to engage in religious practice. Earlier, it was thought that one's religious practice benefitted only oneself beyond teaching others methods of cultivation, there was no way for others to receive the direct results of one's own practice, any more than one could practice a musical instrument so that another might be able to play. They questioned the view that the enlightened one, or buddha, simply vanished from the phenomenal world upon the achievement of final nirvana, passing beyond the realm of conditioned existence in such a way that was completely ungraspable by the conventional mind.

The Mahayana movement developed a comprehensive teaching of compassion that denied both of these premises. They believed that one could express the intention to "transfer the merit" of one's religious practice so that others could indeed enjoy its fruits, and that not to do so showed a miserly spirit. In addition, they reasoned that a buddha, having perfected the virtue of compassion, would surely not simply abandon suffering beings, but would remain in the world and continue offering help and salvation. Thus, early Mahayana texts such as the Lotus Sutra began teaching that buddhas exist in great numbers, and that their lifespan is immeasurable. If they seem to die, it is an illusion deployed in order to spur followers on to greater efforts, but not ultimately real.

This led to the adoption of the "bodhisattva ideal" as the model for the average practitioner. The BODHISATTVA came to be seen as the one who expressly rejected nirvana as long as other beings remained caught in the cycle of suffering. Instead, the bodhisattva would continue refining and perfecting his practice virtually forever, and would dedicate the merit of his practices to the direct benefit of other beings.

Concomitant with the rise of Mahayana Buddhism was the growth of Buddhist devotional cults. As buddhas and bodhisattvas came to be seen more as direct agents of salvation by their practice of merit-transfer, individuals began devoting themselves to one particular buddha or bodhisattva, calling upon them for assistance both with immediate problems and dangers, and with the larger issue of escape from the world of suffering. The most popular bodhisattva in this regard was Avalokiteshvara, who protected devotees from danger, and the most popular buddha was Amitabha, who dwelt in the "Pure Land" to the west, a place to which he would bring devotees upon their death and in which they would have ideal conditions for practice.

Philosophically, Mahayanists raised objections to the "dharma" theories of the earlier philosophical texts known generically as "Abhidharma." One of the core teachings of Buddhism from the start was the radical impermanence and insubstantiality of things, and one way of accounting for this state was to posit "dharmas," which functioned much like "atoms" in ancient Greek thought. That is to say, they were infinitesimal building blocks of reality. Eternal and permanent in themselves, they combined and recombined with each other to form the phenomena of the world, thus accounting for the arising and decay of things.

Buddha, Tin Hau Shrine. (@Buddy Mays/CORBIS)

However, many philosophers such as Nāgārjuna (2nd century A.D.) objected to even this degree of permanence, and critiqued these theories for not being radical enough. Following his lead, Mahayana came to accept "emptiness" as the ultimate state of things, meaning that they were "empty" of any kind of permanent or independent existence. Thus, all schools of Mahayana came to accept the idea that all phenomena whatsoever are radically impermanent and insubstantial, and exist only by virtue of their dependence upon causal conditions and relations with other phenomena.

In its earliest stages, the movement that grew from the convergence of all these trends called itself the "bodhisattvayana," or vehicle of the bodhisattva. However, later on the term "Mahayana," or "greater vehicle" came into popular use. This term, opposed to "Hinayana" or "lesser vehicle," was intended to depict a form of religious practice that was greater both in the goal toward which it directed individuals and the means of conveyance by which it took them to that goal. Its greater compassion and keener philosophical insights, it claimed, would enable it to carry many to the "farther shore" of liberation, while the small compassion and wisdom of their opponents would carry only the single individual.

This form of Buddhism came to predominate in Northern India, Central Asia, Tibet, China, Korea, Japan, and parts of Vietnam, and is currently the dominant form of Buddhism in North and South America and Europe.

See Also: BUDDHISM; HINAYANA.

Bibliography: B.L. SUZUKI, Mahayana Buddhism (London-Boston 1981) P. WILLIAMS, Mahayana Buddhism: the doctrinal foundations (London-New York 1989).

[C. B. JONES]

MAHDĪ, AL-

Al-Mahdī is a Muslim title. In Arabic the term al-mahdī (passive verbal adjective from hadā, to guide) means literally "the guided one," technically "the divinely guided one." The verb hadā with its multiderivatives, especially meaningful to desert people, is used frequently in the QUR'ĀN, where God is called al-Hādī ("the guiding one": 22:53; 25:33). The form mahdī, however, does not occur there.

Less than 25 years after the death of the Prophet, civil wars broke out, the Muslim community was irreparably split into two, and a dark period of perplexities and uncertainties, theological and political, set in. Among the masses of both groups—SUNNITES and SHĪ'ITE—the idea that a restorer, a renovator (mujaddid), would come took root. The hope became personified in a future deliverer. The Sunnites, however, did not go far beyond that. Certain theologians among them included even 'Isa (Jesus) among the awaited restorers. When the term Mahdī was used by them, it carried no eschatological connotation. The suppressed minority, however, the Shī'ites, developed the theory that a descendant of 'ALI and Fatimah would appear in due course, fill the ungodly world with righteousness and justice, and rule for a short millennium, which would be followed by the ending of the world and final judgment. Clearly this is a reflex of Judeo-Christian messianic belief. In Shī'ite theology the creed became central. To give it sanction, a tradition was ascribed to the Prophet foretelling the advent of a descendant of his at the end of time.

The theory lent itself to imposture. Pretenders appeared from time to time. Finally the bulk of the Shiī'ites, known as the Twelvers, fixed on a son of the 11th IMĀM, Ḥasan al-'Askarī, who died in 874—as the Mahdī. Not much is known about al-Mahdī other than his name Muḥammad and that he was short-lived. He disappeared mysteriously in or about 878 in a cellar at al-Ḥillah, according to some, or in a mosque at Sāmarrā, according to others. But all of the Twelvers agree that he is 'the expected one'; hence, his surname al-Muntaẓar. As such he will reappear as the infallible guide and absolute ruler. Then 'Īsa will descend and slay the false prophet

(al-dajjāl, antichrist). One tradition makes 'Īsa himself al-Mahdī.

In ISLAM, where the admixture of religion and politics is inextricable, Mahdism has through the ages been exploited by ambitious conquerors. Noteworthy among these was 'Ubaydullāh al-Mahdī (909–934), founder of the Fāṭimid caliphate in North Africa. The last was Muḥammad al-Mahdī of Sudan, who from 1883 to 1885 warred against Egyptian misgovernment in his country. It should also be remembered that Mahdī was used as a proper name with no eschatological connotation, one example of this use being the name of the third 'Abbāsid caliph al-Mahdī (775–785).

Bibliography: Shorter Encyclopedia of Islam, ed. H. A. R. GIBB and J. H. KRAMERS (Leiden 1953) 310–313. IBN KHALDŪN, The Muqaddimah, tr. F. ROSENTHAL, 3 V. (New York 1958) 1: 407–408; 2:156–157, 184–186.

[P. K. HITTI]

MAHLER, GUSTAV

Late romanticist conductor and composer; b. Kalischt, Bohemia (Austria), July 7, 1860; d. Vienna, May 18, 1911. His musical gifts became apparent when he was very young. Between four and six years he was already able to sing more than 200 folk songs, and he loved to listen to military marches—these two influences were to play an elemental role in his work. In 1875 he was accepted as a pupil at the Vienna conservatory, where he won prizes in piano and composition. His rise as a conductor began after graduation, and culminated in his appointment as director of the Vienna Court Opera. His ten years there (1897–1907) mark an artistic peak in that organization's history. Intrigues and ill health, however, drove him from Vienna. In the U.S. he conducted the Metropolitan Opera (1907-09) and the New York Philharmonic (1909–11). In April 1911 he returned to Vienna mortally ill; he died the following month. Mahler excelled as song writer and symphonist, in the expansive post-Brucknerian style. In his nine massive symphonies, the unfinished Tenth, and The Song of the Earth, he exhausted the instrumental and vocal resources of post-Wagnerian romanticism and cleared a way for the modern idiom. In his use of texts and of "progressive tonality" his influence on Arnold Schoenberg (1874–1951) was especially strong.

Mahler's conversion to Catholicism in 1897 stirred considerable speculation, some of it to the effect that this was merely a "Catholicism of convenience." He no doubt realized that his Jewish origin was an obstacle to his gaining directorship of the Vienna Court Opera, but he could not have made this decision without an inner attraction to Catholicism. He considered writing a Mass, but confessed that he would never be able to set the Credo as he could not bring himself to such an affirmation of faith. Later, speaking of his Eighth Symphony (which uses Veni, Creator Spiritus and the closing scene of Goethe's Faust as texts), he proclaimed, "This is my Mass!" Opinions have differed as to whether his work benefited by the conflict between his heritage and his adopted religion. His own attitude was characteristic: "I am a musician. That covers everything."

Bibliography: B. WALTER, Gustav Mahler, tr. L. W. LINDT (New York 1958). D. MITCHELL, Gustav Mahler: The Early Years (London 1958). H. F. REDLICH, Bruckner and Mahler (2d ed. New York 1963); Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 8:1489-1500. D. NEWLIN, Bruckner, Mahler, Schoenberg (New York 1947); "Alienation and Gustav Mahler," Reconstructionist, 25 (1959) 7:21-25. T. REIK, The Haunting Melody: Psychoanalytic Experiences in Life and Music (New York 1953). P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). D. COOKE, "The Facts Concerning Mahler's Tenth Symphony," Chord and Discord 2/10 (1963) 3-27. C. FLOROS, "Prinzipien des Liedschaffens von Gustav Mahler," Österreichische Musik Zeitschrift 45 (1990) 7-14. E. E. GARCIA, "A New Look at Gustav Mahler's Fateful Encounter with Sigmund Freud," Journal of the Conductors' Guild 12 (1991) 16-30. S. A. GOTTLIEB, "Gustav Mahler's Rückert Lieder and the Art of Error in Interpretation," Journal of the Conductors' League 14 (1993) 107-115. S. E. HEFLING, "Das Lied von der Erde: Mahler's Symphony for Voices and Orchestra-or Piano," Journal of Musicology 10 (1992) 293-341. S. OECHSLE, "Strukturen der Katastrophe: Das Finale der VI. Symphonie Mahlers und die Endzeit der Gattung," Die Musikforschung 50 (1997) 162–182. A. P. SIMCO, "The Timpani Parts to Mahler's Symphony No. 2, Resurrection," Percussive Notes: The Journal of the Percussive Arts Society 37/3 (1999) 46-54. S. WILENS, "Zum werkbegriff Gustav Mahlers und der Entstehungsgeschichte der Fünften Symphonie," Studien zur Musikwissenschaft 43 (1994) 273-295. J. L. ZYCHOWICZ, "Toward an Ausgabe letzter Hand: The Publication and Revision of Mahler's Fourth Symphony," Journal of Musicology 13 (1995) 260-276.

[D. NEWLIN]

MAHZOR

Jewish term (Heb. maḥăzôr, cycle) designating originally the calendar encircling the lunar year and enumerating the appropriate prayers for all the days of the year. Gradually more and more synagogal poems, called piyyuṭim, were added. Eventually these became allimportant, and the original calendar motif faded into obscurity; thus the maḥzor became the prayerbook for feasts only, while a separate prayerbook, called a siddur, came into use for Sabbaths and weekdays.

The evolution of the maḥzor prayer structure may be regarded as a wheel whose hub was the recitation of the Shema (derived from Dt 6.4–9; 11.13–21; Nm

Gustav Mahler.

15.37–41)—the essence of Jewish worship—fortified, on the one hand, by the benedictions and prayers preceding and following the Shema and the prayers and 18 benedictions forming the Amidah (literally, the "standing") formulated by the so-called men of the Great Assembly (from the 6th century B.C. to the 1st Christian century) and enhanced, on the other hand, by lyrical Psalms that had been taken over from the ritual of the Jerusalem Temple. The spokes emanating from the wheel were the specific services designated for the various parts of the day: Shaharit (morning), Musaph (addition), Minhah (afternoon), Arvit (evening), and (for the Day of Atonement only) Neilah (closing). The outer rim of the wheel, the variable factor, consisted of layer after layer of hymns, litanies, poems, selections from oral law, meditations, and piyyutim that were gradually added to the "cycle of prayers" as it rolled through century after century, country after country, through eras of glory and tragedy. This material varied greatly in accordance with the custom and rite of the particular locale in which it developed (at least 60 different texts have been counted), each certainly influenced by its chronological niche in history. Two general roads were traveled. One originated in the Jewish community of Babylonia in the period of the important academies of the Geonim (see GAON) and wound down through the Arabic-Spanish civilizations. This became known as the Sephardic version of the maḥzor. The second stemmed from the Holy Land and came down through the Roman-German areas, branching off into Germany, France, and England on the West and Poland, Russia, Austria, Hungary, Bohemia, and Moravia on the East (with the Elbe River being the dividing boundary). This became known as the Ashkenazic maḥzor.

At the apex of the golden age of Spain, much of the Hebrew liturgy was enhanced by such poets as Solomon ibn Gabirol (AVICEBRON), Judah Ben Samuel Ha-Levi, and Moses ben Jacob Ibn Ezra; their elegant verse, in the style of the Arabic poets, is still part of the maḥzor. Less polished but more poignant is much of the East European piyyuṭim—penitential prayers and epics of tragic community experiences calling for divine forgiveness and blessing. Among the composers were the famed Gershom Ben Judah, Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg (c. 1220–93), and RASHI. Many of the earlier prayers for Rosh ha-Shana (New Year's Day) had been composed by Rabbi AKIBA BEN JOSEPH; in the 3d century in Babylonia, Rav (early 3d century) and Samuel (c. 177–257) contributed voluminously to the High Holiday prayers.

The earliest-known mahzor is the Mahzor Yannai. Yannai (c. A.D. 550), one of the early paytanim (composers of piyyutim;), was the first to use the name acrostic and rhyme. Eleazar Kallir (7th century) found a warmer reception to his piyyutim;, for, in contrast with the legalistic material used by Yannai, he used legends and homilies suited for prayers. One of the oldest preserved mahzorim is the Seder Ray Amram, prepared by Rav Amram bar Sheshna, Gaon of the Sura academy, at the request of Spanish Jewry about A.D. 870. The manzor of Gaon SA'ADIA BEN JOSEPH was compiled in the 10th century. The famous Mahzor Vitry (11th century) combined elements of both Ashkenazic and Sephardic. In Venice and Constantinople the Mahzor Romaniya (known also as Grigos) was edited (1573–76) by Elijah ben Benjamin ha-Levi. After the invention of the printing press, the texts began to be more stabilized. Gradually, translations into the spoken language of the various countries were made, starting from the Judeo-German translation in 1571 by Abigdor ben Moses. In 1852 Elhanan Durlocher made a French translation, and the earliest English translation was by A. Alexander in 1787. A Russian translation was made by Rabbi S. Hurwitz in 1880.

During the Middle Ages new influences, such as the CABALA movement, were reflected in the maḥzor. The modern era added readings and petitions, as in the Yizkor memorial service; prayers for heads of state; and prayers connected with the rebirth of the State of Israel. New prayerbooks have been produced by the newer movements of Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist belief of JUDAISM. Across the span of the centuries, the prayers of the maḥzor have formed a network of "bridges leading from the heart to God."

Bibliography: I. BROYDÉ, Jewish Encyclopedia 8:262–264. I. ELBOGEN, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia 8:619–621. T. H. GASTER, Festivals of the Jewish Year (New York 1953). S. GREEN-BERG, The Jewish Prayerbook: Its Ideals and Values (United Synagogue of America; New York 1957). A. Z. IDELSOHN, Jewish Liturgy and Its Development (New York 1932) ch. 7. E. MUNK, The World of Prayer, tr. H. BIBERFELD and L. OSCHRY (New York 1954). I. ABRAMSON, A Companion to the Authorized Daily Prayerbook (London 1922). H. KIEVAL, The High Holy Days (New York 1959–). J. ROSENTHAL, "Toldot ha-maḥzor," in Sefer ha-shanah l'yehude Amerikah (New York 1947). Isaac ben Jacob, Otsar hasefarim: Maḥzor (Vilna 1880).

[E. SUBAR]

MAI, ANGELO

Cardinal and paleographer; b. Schilpario, Italy, March 7, 1782; d. Castelgandolfo, September 9, 1854. He became a Jesuit in 1799 and taught at Naples from 1804 until the anti-Jesuit policy of Joseph Napoleon forced him to Rome and then to Orvieto, where he was ordained in 1808. As scriptor of the Ambrosian Library in Milan in 1813, he discovered numerous texts of lost works of Cicero, Fronto, Homer, Plautus, and others. In visits to other European libraries he discovered more lost works. He left the Jesuits in 1819 to become the first Vatican librarian and in 1838 was made a cardinal. In all, he discovered 359 lost texts of ancient pagan and Christian authors, for the most part published in his four collections: the Scriptorum veterum nova collectio (10 v., 1825–38); Classici auctores (10 v., 1828–38); Spicilegium Romanum (10 v., 1839-44); and the Nova patrum bibliotheca (8 v., 1852-57). He arranged and catalogued MSS of the Vatican Library. Unfortunately, owing to imperfect methods of restoring palimpsest texts, some MSS were damaged in his work.

Bibliography: A. MAI, Epistolario, ed. G. GERVASONI (Florence 1954). G. POLETTO, Del cardinale Angelo Mai (Siena 1886). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 10.1:1196–1202. S. TIMPANARO, "Angelo Mai," Atene e Rome NS 1 (1956) 3–34. V. VIETTI, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER Dizionario ecclesiastico 2:781–782.

[F. X. MURPHY]

MAIER, ANNELIESE

Historian of science, b. Tübingen, Nov. 17, 1905; d. Rome, Dec. 2, 1971. Born of Lutheran parents, she was the daughter of Anna Sigwart and Heinrich Maier, a distinguished philosopher. After early studies in Tübingen, Göttingen, and Heidelberg, she studied philosophy, physics, and the history of art at the Universities of Zurich and Berlin, where she presented her doctoral thesis Kants Qualitätskategorien. In 1936 she went to Italy to work on the letters of Leibniz preserved in the Vatican Library. In 1938 she published her first major work, Die Mechanisierung des Weltbildes im 17. Jahrundert, which was reedited in 1968. Under the influence of Auguste Pelzer she turned her attention to medieval science, publishing her first efforts in 1939 concerning intensive quantities.

During World War II she lived in Rome, thanks to the generosity of Cardinal Angelo Mercati, and made it her home. In 1945 she became a collaborator of the Vatican Library, publishing her catalogue of Latin Borghese MSS in 1952 and MSS Vat. lat. 2118-92 in 1961. In 1954 she became research professor of the Max-Planck-Gesellschaff with full title and subsidy. Between 1943 and 1958 she published five major volumes on the history of medieval science under the general title of Studien zur Naturphilosophie der Spätscholastik. Becoming a Catholic in 1943, she was baptized by Placido M. Niccolini, bishop of Assisi. Maier was deeply devoted to the Barnabite Fathers in Rome. At the time of her death she was working on a project, approved by John XXIII, to publish with Giuseppe de Luca documents concerning the beatific vision controversy involving John XXII.

Bibliography: Studien: 1. Die Vorläufer Galileis im 14. Jahrundert (1949; 2d ed. 1966). 2. Zwei Grundprobleme der scholastichen Naturphilosophie (1951; 3d ed. 1968). 3. An der Grenze von Scholastik und Naturwissenschaft (1943; 2d ed. 1952). 4. Metaphysiche Hinter-gründe der spätscholastichen Naturphilasophie (1955). 5. Zwischen Philosophie und Mechanik (1958). Ausgehendes Mittelalter, 2 v. (1964–67). Works about Maier, M. CLAGETT, Speculum 48 (1973) 626–627. E. GRANT, Archives intern. d'hist. des sciences. J. BIGNAMI ODIER, Rivista di Storia della Chiesa in Italia (1972) 245–248. S. V. ROVIGHI, Rivista di Filosopia Neo-Scholastica, (1972) 353–354.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

MAILLA, JOSEPH ANNE MARIE MOYRIA DE

Missionary, historian, and cartographer; b. Maillat (Ain), France, December 16, 1669; d. Beijing, China, June 28, 1748. The young noble entered the Society of Jesus on September 12, 1686, and departed France for China in 1701. After arrival at Macau in 1703, he took up residence in Canton, where he acquired marked proficiency in the language. His religious writings were mainly Chinese translations of the Sunday Gospels, lives of the saints, prayers for Communion, devotions to the Sacred Heart, and the SPIRITUAL EXERCISES of Ignatius Loyola. When Emperor Khang-hi commissioned the Jesuits to make a cartographical survey of China, Mailla was selected with two other Jesuits to map the provinces of Henan, Jiangsu, Zhejiang, Fujian, and Taiwan. For this he received the rank of mandarin. Later he learned the Manchurian language and translated the annals of the empire into French. The completed manuscript was sent to France in 1737, but was not published until Abbé Grosier incorporated it into a Histoire générale de la China . . . (13 v. Paris 1777–85). Mailla also wrote the early history of Formosa, translated into English in 1774, and an account of the persecution of Christians in China that was published in the Lettres édifiantes. Having been in imperial favor, Mailla was honored with a state funeral at his death.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 5:330–334; 9:629; 12:564. Lettres édifiantes, ed. C. LE GOBIEN and J. B. DU HALDE, 34 v. (Paris 1707–73) 2.19:327—. R. STREIT and J. DINDINGER *Biblioteca missionum*7:503. L. PFISTER, Notices biographique et bibliographique sur les Jésuites de l'ancienne mission de Chine, 1552-1773 (Shanghai 1932-34).

[J. V. MENTAG]

MAIMBOURG, LOUIS

Church historian, controversialist, and preacher; b. Nancy, France, January 10, 1610; d. Paris, August 13, 1686. He was admitted to the Jesuit novitiate, May 20, 1626, completed his theological courses at Rome, and then taught humanities at Rouen for six years. Maimbourg developed a skill for polemics and was known for his preaching and writings against Jansenists and Protestants. He criticized Antoine Arnauld, and under the pseudonym François Romain, he wrote a reply to the circular letter written on April 25, 1668, by Bps. Nicolas Pavillon of Alet, François Caulet of Pamiers, Henri Arnauld of Angers, and Nicolas Buzenval of Beauvais, in which they explained their refusal to sign Alexander VII's formulary, Regiminis apostolici (February 15, 1665). Seeking common ground for discussion and possible agreement with Protestants, he wrote: La Méthode pacifique pour remaner sans dispute les protestants à la vraie foi sur le point de l'eucharistie . . . (Paris 1670); Traité de la vraie Église . . . (Paris 1671); and Traité de la vraie parole de Dieu . . . (Paris 1671). Maimbourg's reputation rests principally upon his historical works, some of which because of their sympathy for Gallican Liberties were placed on the Index. These include: *Histo*rie du grand schisme d'occident . . . (Paris 1678; condemned May 23, 1680); Histoire de la décadence de l'empire depuis Charlemagne . . . (Paris 1679; condemned May 23, 1680); Traité historique de l'etablissement et des prérogatives de l'Église de Rome et de ses évêques (Paris 1685; condemned June 4, 1685); Histoire du pontificat de St. Gregoire le Grand (2 v. Paris 1686; condemned February 26, 1687). His Histoire du luthéranisme (Paris 1680) was similarly censured by a decree of December 12, 1680, for its treatment of indulgences. On Feb. 10, 1682, he left the Jesuits at the order of Innocent XI. Louis XIV granted him a pension of 3,000 livres and a lodging in the Abbey of Saint-Victor at Paris. At the time of his death from apoplexy he was working on a history of Anglican orders. Among Maimbourg's works that escaped proscription by the Index are: Histoire de l'arianisme . . . (2 v. Paris 1673); Histoire de l'hérésie des iconoclastes . . . (3 v. Paris 1674); Histoire des croisades pour la déliverance de la Terre Sainte (2 v. Paris 1675); Histoire du schisme des Grecs (2 v. Paris 1677); Histoire du calvinisme (2 v. Paris 1682); and a book of his sermons, Sermons pour le carême . . . (2 v. Paris 1672).

Bibliography: H. REUSCH, Der Index der verbotenen Bücher, 2 v. (Bonn 1885) 2:583–586. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 5:343–356. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de la Théologie Catholique 9.2:1656–61, bibliog. and description of Maimbourg's major works. F. STEGMÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 6:1298. H. LIEBING, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3 4:610–611.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

MAIMONIDES (MOSES BEN MAIMON)

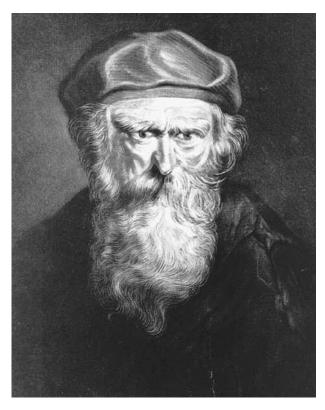

Medieval Jewish scholar; b. Córdoba, Spain, March 30, 1135; d. Fosṭāṭ, Egypt, Dec. 13, 1204. In Jewish circles often called ''the second Moses'' or ''the RaM-BaM'' (an acrostic composed of the initial letters of the title Rabbi and his name), Moses Maimonides was known to the Islamic world as Abū 'Imrān Mūsā ibn Maimūn ibn 'Ubayd-Allāh and to medieval Latin theologians as Rabbi Moyses (Aegyptius).

Life. He was born on the Preparation Day of Passover. Maimonides's first instruction was at the hands of his father, Rabbi Maimon ben Joseph, a mathematician, astronomer, and author of Talmudic commentaries, a study on the ritual, and notes on the Pentateuch. To a thorough formation in rabbinics, Moses was able to add the wealth of Greco-Arabian learning accessible in Islamic Spain and North Africa. With the fall of Córdoba in 1148 to the Almohades, Muslim zealots from Morocco, both Judaism and Christianity were proscribed, and the Maimon family entered upon 12 years of wandering through Spain before attempting to settle at Fez in Morocco. But persecution raged in Morocco as well as in Spain, and the family escaped only through the good offices of a friendly Muslim poet and theologian, whose name is given as Abū-'l-'Arab ibn Ma'īšah. On April 18, 1165, they left Fez for Palestine. Landing at Acre, they made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem and Hebron but, disappointed by the unhappy state of Judaism in the Holy Land, finally established themselves at Fostāt in Egypt, an ancient settlement "two Sabbath-day-journeys" south of Cairo. There Maimon ben Joseph died in 1166, and David, a younger brother of Moses, who had been supporting the family by trading in jewels, was drowned in the course of a voyage to the Indies. With him were lost the family resources, and funds entrusted to him by other merchants. Prostrated for a time by this disaster, Moses recovered to undertake the practice of medicine and rose to become personal physician of A-Qāḍī al-Fāḍil, Vizier of Saladin. Al-Qiftī has recorded that Maimonides declined the offer of a comparable post with "the King of the Franks at Ascalon," Richard I of England. More than 20 years after he had rescued the Maimon family at Fez, Abū'l-'Arab ibn Ma'īšah encountered Moses in Egypt living openly as a Jew and there denounced him as having lapsed from Islam. This has suggested that the Maimons had passed as Muslims while residing at Fez. But the charge was dismissed, and Maimonides was granted the office of $n\bar{a}g\hat{i}d$, chief of all the Jewish communities in Egypt. Maimonides was active both as a physician and as nāgîd until his last illness. Jews and Muslims alike observed three days of public mourning at Fostat; a funeral service and a general fast were kept at Jerusalem; and the body of the great rabbi was entombed at Tiberias in Galilee.

Works. Maimonides's writings include an Arabic Treatise on Logic, said to have been published when the author was but 16 (1151), and translated into Hebrew by Moses IBN TIBBON (c. 1240-83). In 1158 he produced a treatise in Hebrew on the Jewish Calendar. A "Letter on Apostasy," written in Arabic and addressed to the persecuted Jews of Morocco, the authenticity of which is not uncontested, belongs to the year 1160. In 1168 after a decade of labor, he published his Sirāj (Enlightenment), an Arabic commentary on the MISHNAH that may be the earliest application of scientific method to the interpretation of that collection. In 1172 Maimonides answered a plea for counsel from the suffering Jews of Yemen with his "Letter to the South." His personal "deuteronomy," the Mishneh Torah (Repetition of the Law), later known as "The Strong Hand," an echo of Dt 34.12, appearing in 1180, was intended to introduce systematic order into the centuries-old accumulation of the laws and commentaries of Judaism. Written in Hebrew, this took the form of a vast codification of Jewish legislation, both Biblical and rabbinical. A "Book of Precepts," published in Arabic at an undetermined date, deals with the traditional 613 precepts of the Mosaic Law. Maimonides's major influence outside Judaism has been exercised through his Guide of the Perplexed. Published in Arabic in 1190, the Guide appeared with the author's approval in the Hebrew version of Samuel ibn Tibbon on Nov. 30, 1204, and under the title Môrēh Nebûkîm. The Latin version of the Guide, Dux dubiorum, Dux neutrorum, known to 13thcentury Christian theologians, seems to have been produced before 1240; it stems from a Hebrew translation by Judah Al-Harīzī. In 1520 a printing of the medieval Latin version, with revisions characteristic of Renaissance editions, was published in Paris by Augustinus Justinianus, and a Latin translation of the ibn Tibbon version was published as Dux perplexorum by John Buxtorf the Younger at Basel in 1629. It was in the Buxtorf edition that the Guide was known to Leibniz, whereas Spinoza possessed the Hebrew version of ibn Tibbon. Maimonides responded to accusations that he had denied the resurrection of the body with a treatise on the subject in 1191. Unlike the immortality of the soul, for which rational demonstrations are possible, he explained, this doctrine is held exclusively on faith. A request from the Jews of Marseilles was the occasion of his Letter on Astrology in 1194, in which he totally rejected the pseudo-scientific subordination of human affairs to celestial phenomena. To these may be added collections of his Responsa and Letters. A treatise on the unity of God, ascribed to him, is of uncertain authenticity. Maimonides's practice as a physician is reflected in a series of medical treatises that includes his translation into Hebrew of the Canon of AVICENNA and his annotated extracts from GALEN.

Doctrine. Persuaded that faith has nothing to fear from a circumspect application of reason to Scripture, Maimonides acknowledged the value of a preparation in the quadrivium and in logic for the believer who must contend with the metaphysical questions broached by the mutakallimün, Muslim devotees of the rational discussion of faith called KALAM (discourse). Although few in number, erudite believers deserve guidance, for the confrontation of science and Scripture can beget grave perplexity; hence his Guide of the Perplexed (see the introduction to the English translation by S. Pines, p. lvii; and 2.23, ibid., pp. 321–322). Biblical terms must be understood correctly, and the arguments that seem to militate against the Mosaic Law must be classified as apodictic, merely probable, or fallacious if they are to be solved (ibid. 2.16, p. 293). In his Treatise on Logic, Maimonides had taken into account not only the books usually assigned to the Organon of ARISTOTLE, but also the Rhetoric with its probable reasonings and the Poetics with its discussion of fiction and imitation. The purpose of the Guide is to illumine Scripture (ibid., introductory essay by Leo Strauss, p. xiv; 2.2 pp. 253-254); the first part recalls Maimonides's youthful interest in precise terminology, while the second and third parts elaborate the Talmudic themes of "Creation" and the "Divine Chariot." The Guide stated, in 26 propositions, the main theses from which philosophers proved the existence of God, and Maimonides rejected only the one that asserts the eternity of the world. The point in Aristotle, he claimed, is held as merely probable, whereas, according to his commentators, the Philosopher had demonstrated the proposition. On the other hand, the mutakallimun tried to demonstrate temporal creation. Maimonides thought both commentators and mutakallimūn wrong (ibid. 2 Introd., pp. 235-241). Should reason demand it, the scriptural passages on temporal creation could be explained figuratively (ibid. 2.25 pp. 327-328), but the philosophical objections to the eternity of the world are stronger than those urged against the doctrine of creation as "held by our Father Abraham and our Teacher Moses' (ibid. 2.22 p. 320); hence the Bible account prevails (ibid. 2.23 p. 322). Since we cannot demonstrate that the world is not eternal, philosophical integrity demands that we give such proofs of God's existence as would be valid even if it were; Aristotelian demonstrations meet this challenge (ibid. 2.1 pp. 245–246) and, what is more, support the Biblical teaching that God is One: His essence and existence are identical (ibid. 1.57 p. 132). God has no essential attributes, and because He has nothing in common with creatures, human language is radically inadequate to express Him (ibid. 1.50–53 pp. 111–123). Even in Scripture, terms predicated of God are but metaphors (ibid. 1.26 pp. 56–57). The true attributes of God are negative ones (ibid. 1.58 pp. 134–135), but those based on His many actions are permissible since they do not compromise the divine unity (ibid. 1.54 pp. 123–128).

Maimonides (Moses Ben Maimon). (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

The eternity of the world apart, Aristotle is reliable on what transpires under the sphere of the moon (ibid. 2.22 pp. 319–320), but later thinkers have improved upon his teaching concerning what is above. These have shown that there are nine intelligences to animate the nine spheres and a tenth, the agent intellect, which reduces to act our individual possible intellects (ibid. 2.4 pp. 257-258). These intelligences are philosophical analogues of Scripture's angels (ibid. 2.6 pp. 261–262). Nor were the philosophers wrong to say that Providence does not extend to every individual, for Providence has regard for a man in direct proportion to his merits (ibid. 3.18 pp. 475–476) and departs from those who occupy themselves with creatures (ibid. 3.51 pp. 624-626). Prophecy, itself susceptible of many grades and most fully realized in Moses, is the height of human knowledge (ibid. 2.37–48 pp. 373–412). Intellectual perfection bespeaks moral perfection (ibid. 1.34 pp. 75-78), and the possession of intellectual qualities assures a man of immortality (ibid. 3.54 p. 635). Knowledge through union with the agent intellect is identified with the eternal life promised by faith: the souls of the pious will not die (ibid. 2.27 p. 333).

Familiar from his youth with persecution, Maimonides counseled patience and even flight in his "Letter to the South," addressed to the Jews of Yemen, and warned them at the same time against a fatuous messianism. If the "Letter on Apostasy" is indeed his, it may reflect the straits of his own family at Fez, where some Jews had made an external profession of faith in Islam but continued to practice Judaism in secret. Against the condemnation by a rigorous rabbi of this dissembling, the second letter likens the Law to a rope let down from heaven to earth: to grasp it firmly with both hands offers the best hope, but to hold on with the tips of the fingers is better than to let go altogether (Cahiers juifs, 8–12).

Influence. Maimonides's theological and exegetical works soon counted as classics in Egypt, Arabia, Palestine, Spain, and France; but the author's alleged pretension to supremacy in the rabbinate, his freedom in interpreting venerated texts, and his policy of omitting his authorities, all invited attack. To the distress of those who deplored dogmatism, Maimonides had formulated in his "Enlightenment" 13 articles of faith as the minimum that would guarantee every Israelite a part in the world to come. The disciple to whom the Guide was addressed expressed his disappointment with Maimonides's reconciliation of faith and learning, while readers who found the resurrection of the body in neither the "Repetition of the Law" nor in the Guide did not miss the echoes of Averroës and Aristotle when the Rambam dealt with the immortality of the soul. Judah al-Fakhar of Toledo and Moses ben Nahman declined his leadership. By about 1230, the anti-Maimonists Solomon ben Abraham, David ben Saul, and Jonas ben Abraham led an assault in the name of the letter of the Mosaic Law against the Maimonists of Lunel, Béziers, and Narbonne. LEVI BEN GERSON (1288-1344) and Hasdāi Crescas (1340-1410) were to subject Maimonides to severe critiques, and Cabbalists managed to mark his tomb as that of "an excommunicate and heretic' (Levy, 233-235). The sympathetic use of the Guide by Christian theologians makes it tempting to exaggerate his influence on St. Albert the Great, St. Thomas Aquinas, and John Duns Scotus; but it remains true that in the Christian universities no other master of Judaism was so much esteemed as Rabbi Moses. Despite all controversies, the Rambam has inspired the popular saying: "From Moses to Moses, there has been no one like Moses."

Bibliography: Texts and translations. Le Guide des égarés, tr. and ed. S. MUNK, 3 v. (Paris 1856-66; reprint 1960), contains Arabic text and Fr. tr.; Dalālat al-hā'irīn, ed. I. JOEL (Jerusalem 1930-31); Guide of the Perplexed, tr. with introd. and nn. S. PINES, introd. essay L. STRAUSS (Chicago 1963), the best tr.; Guide for the Perplexed, tr. m. FRIEDLÄNDER, 3 v. (London 1881, abr. 1904; repr. Gloucester, Mass. 1962), older rendering; The Code of Maimonides (Mishneh Torah) (Yale Judaica Ser.; New Haven 1949-), to date Bks. 3-14, ann. Eng. trs.; Treatise on Logic, ed. and tr. I. EFROS (New York 1938), contains orig. Arabic text and three Hebrew trs. I. EFROS, "Maimonides' Treatise on Logic: The New Arabic Text," Jewish Quarterly Review 53 (1963) 269-273. R. LERNER and M. MAHDI, eds., Medieval Political Philosophy; A Sourcebook (Glencoe, Ill. 1963), contains Letter on Astrology and further references. C. P. FARRAR and A. P. EVANS, Bibliography of English Translations from Medieval Sources (New York 1946) 2790-2807. Literature. A. HESCHEL, Maimonides: Eine Biographie (Berlin 1935). L. G. LEVY, Maïmonide (Paris 1932). I. MÜNZ, Maimonides: The Story of His Life and Genius, tr. H. T. SCHNITTKIND (Boston 1935). "Maïmonide, sa vie, son oeuvre, son influence," Cahiers juifs 16-17 (1935). A. COHEN, The Teachings of Maimonides (London 1927). J. GUTTMANN, Das Verhältniss des Thomas von Aquino zum Judenthum und zur jüdischen Litteratur (Göttingen 1891).

[E. A. SYNAN]

MAINE, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Maine is unique among New England states in that it alone can trace its Catholic roots back to the era of the earliest European colonization. It was in 1604 that the French established a settlement on an island near the mouth of the St. Croix River. This settlement, Holy Cross, was the first European colony in New England.

Though primarily a business venture headed by the Calvinist Pierre du Guast, Sieur de Monts, and Samuel Champlain, it included a Catholic chaplain, Nicholas Aubry. The colony failed to endure the first harsh winter, but its fate was no deterrent to further exploration. In 1613 the Jesuits Peter Biard and Enemond Masse accompanied a colonizing venture of Pierre La Saussaye bound for the Penobscot River (which they had earlier visited in 1611, offering Mass in the vicinity of present-day Bangor), but dense fog forced the ship to land sooner than planned. At Fernald Point near Southwest Harbor on Mount Desert Island they planted their colony of St. Sauveur. They were welcomed by the indigenous people, and prospects for the young colony seemed good, but within two months it had been destroyed by the Englishman Samuel Argall, Admiral of Virginia, who had been given instructions to frustrate French attempts to colonize the Penobscot region.

The territory known as Acadia would be exchanged nine times by the French and English in subsequent decades. The history of the settlement at the town on Penobscot Bay, now known as Castine, is typical of this instability. The Plymouth Pilgrims had a trading post there by 1629. In 1632 the area reverted to French control, and the Capuchin Franciscans arrived in 1635, establishing the mission of Our Lady of Hope at the site the French called Pentagoet. The cornerstone of a substantial church was laid in 1648, but its existence was fragile. The English would regain control of the territory from 1654 to 1667 and the mission collapsed, though the French were once more in charge from 1667 to 1703. Franciscans returned during these years when the post was in the hands of John Vincent d'Abbadie, Baron of Saint-Castin. The baron encouraged pastoral work among the natives, and it was by his patronage that a chapel dedicated to St. Ann was erected for their use on an island in the Penobscot river ("Indian Island"), the first of a succession of chapels at a mission that endures to this day.

More enterprising work among the indigenous peoples was carried out by Fr. Gabriel Druillettes, S.J., sent to work among the natives of the Kennebec region in 1646. He established a mission to the Abenakis near present-day Augusta, and lived among them till 1647. Following a diplomatic mission to the English at Plymouth and Boston in 1650, he again carried out missionary work with the tribes along the Kennebec in the winters of 1651 and 1652, establishing the village of Norridgewock as his headquarters.

Druillettes work was continued after a lapse of a few decades by his intrepid brother-Jesuit Sebastian RÂLE, who arrived in Norridgewock in 1694. Proficient in native dialects, he worked tirelessly among the Abenakis, catechizing, adjudicating disputes, caring for the sick, and teaching music, all amidst the ongoing political tensions between the English and the French. Norridgewock village was destroyed in a raid by the Massachusetts colony in 1705; another attack followed in 1722 during which the village was again destroyed. Finally, in 1724, an assault was launched during which Râle himself was murdered, and his scalp sent with 26 others back to Boston. Many of the surviving Abenakis fled north towards Canada.

The next century, with its ongoing political tensions and reversals, saw little activity by Catholics. Most of the state had been included in the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Diocese of Boston when it was erected in 1808.

Maine Becomes a State. In 1820 the State of Maine was admitted to the Union. At this time there were three centers of Catholic life in the state, which would serve as the building blocks of the Church in Maine: the surviving native peoples, grouped at Indian Island and Pleasant Point (near Eastport); a group of Acadians at Madawaska by the St. John River; and Irish immigrants living near Damariscotta and Whitefield. It was thanks to the intervention of some prominent citizens of the latter group that the new state constitution contained no anti-Catholic restrictions, unlike those of MASSACHUSETTS (from which the state was carved) and New Hampshire.

By the 1800s only 750 native peoples remained in Maine. Members of the Penobscot tribe were restricted to Indian Island, while Passamaquody lived near Pleasant Point. Three exiled priests from revolutionary France worked among these tribes from 1792 to 1818. One of the three, Jean CHEVERUS, visited both tribes in 1797 and 1798. He was replaced by James ROMAGNÉ, who built a church at Pleasant Point, and labored among the natives till 1818. A learned, pious, affable man, he introduced farming to his flock, and translated a prayer book into the native dialect.

By 1820 there were about 108 Catholic families living near Damariscotta and Whitefield. Fr. (later Bishop of Boston, 1808–23) Cheverus first visited the community in 1798, and returned almost every summer from Boston until 1818, using it as a base from which to search the surrounding countryside for isolated Catholics. James Kavanagh and Matthew Cottrill, who had arrived in Newcastle as young Irish immigrants in the early 1790s, and had prospered as merchants and shipbuilders, were the leaders of this prosperous district, which boasted its own church, St. Patrick's. This edifice, built in the year 1808, is the oldest extent Catholic church in New England. Kavanagh's son Edward, though preparing for ordination in 1813, turned his attention to his father's failing businesses, later distinguishing himself as a state legislator, congressman (1831–35), and governor (1843), the first Catholic in New England to hold these latter offices.

Meanwhile, in the far north of Maine, 20 Acadian families, displaced from St. John, New Brunswick, by American Loyalists, had settled near the St. John and Madawaska Rivers. Between 1790 and 1794 they were joined by Acadians from Nova Scotia, and about this time asked the Bishop of Quebec for a priest and church. An influx of new arrivals swelled their numbers to 2,000 by 1831. Most of the Madawaskans were deeply religious Catholics, and could boast of a resident priest after 1808. In 1842 the boundary between the United States and Canada was fixed at the St. John River, leaving the Madawaskans divided. Forty days after the treaty was signed, Rome assigned the care of the Catholics in the region to the Diocese of Fredericton, New Brunswick, including St. Bruno's parish on the southern (U.S.) side of the river, which had been established in 1838. In 1860 the Catholics of Maine Madawaska were given over to the care of the Diocese of St. John, New Brunswick. Not until 1870 and the First Vatican Council was Bishop Bacon of the Diocese of PORTLAND given the spiritual care of the Catholics of northern Maine (though the state had been providing education there since 1843).

Maine's earliest Catholic churches were built where the immigrant Irish settled. Fr. Dennis Ryan, ordained by Bishop Cheverus in 1817 (the first ordination in New England), spent 25 years pastoring, first at Damariscotta and later at Whitefield (where he built a brick church in 1838). He ministered to Catholics from the Kennebec to the Penobscot, including the towns of Bath, Augusta, and Bangor. Already in 1836 there were 1,000 Irish in the latter town, drawn by jobs in the lumber industry. St. Michael's church there was dedicated in 1839. In Augusta, Ryan made do with a converted Unitarian church purchased in 1836, which served till St. Mary's was built in 1847.

Another intrepid Maine pastor was Fr. Charles Ffrench. His assignment was to care for the large numbers of Irish emigrating into Maine, and settling along the seacoast. He based his ministry first in Eastport—the immigrant's gateway from New Brunswick—where St. Joseph's was dedicated in 1835. It was from the flock in Eastport that John E. BARRY, the Portland diocese's first native vocation, would hail. Ffrench later moved the focus of his pastoral activity to Portland, where St. Dominic's church had been dedicated in 1833. The Catholic population of Maine's largest city was growing, bolstered by a large number of converts including Josue Young, the future bishop of Erie, Pennsylvania.

Growth and Trials. Despite the growing Catholic population, not all communities were as fortunate as Bangor, Eastport, or Portland. There was a Catholic presence in Belfast from 1827, but there would be no permanent church until 1894 (a rented hall was used until 1851, and then again from 1870 to 1885). A lack of priests and resources meant that congregations were slow to grow, and loss of faith was common.

The growing numbers of Irish immigrants, and the squalid conditions of the urban slums in which many were forced to live, moved Bishop Benedict FENWICK of Boston to propose and promote a Catholic immigrant colony in northern Maine. In 1834 the bishop purchased 11,358 acres in northern Maine, and by 1840 about 65 families had taken up residence there. Though Benedicta (as it was named) boasted a church, sawmill, and orphanage, and was soon a thriving farming town, it never developed sufficiently to support the college and seminary that Fenwick had envisioned.

In 1848 Bishop Fenwick's successor in Boston, John Fitzpatrick, obtained two Jesuits from the Maryland province for work in Maine. Fr. John Bapst, a 35-year-old exiled Swiss, was the first to arrive and the last of his brethren to leave in 1859. Bapst worked for two years at Indian Island north of Bangor. Divisions among the tribe, however, led to his being transferred to Eastport in 1851. By 1852, he had promoted the construction of three new churches (at Oldtown, Waterville, and Ellsworth), and was regularly visiting 33 stations on his mission circuit. In Ellsworth his pastoral work resulted in a number of prominent converts (including a young lady, Mary Agnes Tincker, who would become a prominent novelist of the Victorian age), but also stirred up the ire of local Nativists. Incensed by his vocal support for the rights of Catholic children to withdraw from public schools that promoted the King James Bible, and egged on by Bapst's obvious "foreigness" and success as an evangelist, a local mob assaulted, robbed, tarred, and feathered the Jesuit on a visit to Ellsworth in October of 1854. Public sentiment in Bangor and Portland was outraged, and prominent citizens offered him a gold watch to replace one which had been stolen from him, and a purse of $500 to aid him in his work (nonetheless, not all were repentant—the Catholic Church in Ellsworth was burned in 1856).

Bangor and Eastport were now the centers of the Jesuits' mission. Bangor was growing rapidly (Catholics alone numbered 6,000), and in 1856 a new church, St. John's, was dedicated. Though the site chosen for the church was deliberately inconspicuous (given the recent wave of anti-Catholicism), the building itself was in the grandest Gothic style, and was acclaimed one of the most beautiful churches in New England. Ironically, the very success of the Jesuits in Bangor and down east Maine led to the first bishop of Portland's desire to reclaim St. John's as a diocesan parish. Fr. Bapst and his fellow Jesuits departed the diocese in 1859, and would not return for almost a century. They had, however, overseen the construction of seven churches: Waterville, Oldtown, Ellsworth, Winterport, Rockland, Trescott, and Bangor. Churches in Machias and Calais, though started prior to their ministry in Maine, were completed during their watch.

A Diocese for Maine. The Diocese of PORTLAND was established on July 29, 1853 (the same day as Brooklyn and Burlington, Vermont), encompassing the states of Maine and NEW HAMPSHIRE. The first candidate named to fill the see, Henry Coskery of Baltimore, declined the appointment, and so there was delay before David William BACON's (1813-74) name was announced. A priest of the New York archdiocese, he was an energetic pastor and builder in his native Brooklyn before being appointed to Maine. He was consecrated at St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York on April 22, 1855, and installed at St. Dominic's in Portland on May 31. As there were only six priests working in Maine, the bishop's first task was to find clergy; nine new arrivals from Europe and America would swell the rolls by year's end. Bacon was a talented administrator, and worked to remedy a number of deficiencies. Land was purchased in Portland for a cathedral in 1856, and a small chapel constructed. Tragically, work begun on the main structure in 1866 was destroyed in the great fire that struck the city on July 4 of that year. Spurred on by Bacon, funds for construction were sought once more, and work was resumed in 1868. When dedicated on September 9, 1869, the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception was declared one of the finest in the country.

No parochial schools greeted Bacon upon his arrival in the diocese, but by the year of his death they numbered 20, in addition to six private academies. The bishop was aided in his work by the Sisters of Notre Dame, who came to Portland to run St. Aloysius school in 1864. Mother M. Xavier Warde and four SISTERS OF MERCY arrived in Manchester, New Hampshire, in 1858, and soon opened three houses in Maine, at Bangor (1865), Whitefield (1871) and Portland (1873—replacing the Notre Dame Sisters).

After almost 20 years of vigorous labor, the bishop died on November 5, 1874, while in transit to Rome for his ad limina visit, his life ended by a painful bladder ailment that had plagued him throughout his tenure in Portland.

New Arrivals in Maine. On February 12, 1875, James A. HEALY, pastor of St. James Church in Boston, the largest parish in New England, was appointed to the see of Portland. A native of Georgia, Healy and his brothers had been sent north to attend Holy Cross by their father, who realized that their status as sons of a mulatto slave mother was an insurmountable obstacle to their advancement. The Healy sons prospered: James and Sherwood studying for the diocesan priesthood, Patrick joining the Jesuits. Healy's 25 years as bishop of Portland were years of growth: in population, churches, priests, schools and religious. Besides a heavy indebtedness of $110,000, another challenge to the diocese during Healy's tenure was the massive influx of French-Canadians who arrived during the last quarter of the 19th century. Facing continual economic distress in Quebec, tens of thousands of these deeply religious migrants came to New England in search of work, bringing with them their strong attachment to "la foi, la langue, et les moeurs" (faith, language and customs). A few towns in Maine were completely transformed; Biddeford, for example, was 80 percent French-Canadian by the 1880s. Healy was zealous in his efforts to obtain compatriot clergy and religious to serve the newcomers. Ten new communities of religious women entered the diocese at Healy's invitation, as well as the Dominican and Marist priests and Brothers, all of them French-speaking. Lewiston was an outstanding Franco-American center, where the Dominican priests staffed the parish, Marist Brothers taught the boys, Daughters of Sion instructed the girls, and Sisters of Charity ran the orphanage and hospital. Healy's undertakings did not blind him to the contentious nature of some of the new arrivals, who he found to be quite forceful in their demands.

The year 1884 saw the state of New Hampshire removed from the territory of the Diocese of Portland and formed into the Diocese of Manchester. It was the same year that the Sisters of Mercy in Maine achieved their independence, with Sr. Mary Teresa Pickersgill as superior. Two years later the Marist Fathers opened St. Mary's College in Van Buren, the first Catholic college in Maine, enrolling a large number of French-Canadians among its students.

Healy celebrated his 70th birthday in 1900, his silver jubilee as bishop of Portland. Sadly, his labors for the church in Maine had sapped his strength, and he died on August 5, after feeling unwell for a few days. The Boston Pilot eulogized him as "humble, considerate [and] generous." He left behind 86 churches, 76 diocesan priests, and a Catholic population of approximately 96,400.

Healy was followed in the see of Portland by a rising star, William O'CONNELL, rector of the North American College in Rome, and a native of Lowell, Massachusetts (born 1859). His appointment did not come till 1901, as deliberations at the Vatican were complicated when Franco-American priests and laity wrote opposing the terna of names forwarded by the consultors and advocating the nomination of a French-speaker. O'Connell was installed on July 4, and brought a flamboyant touch to the diocese (he employed an Italian valet and coachman). As bishop he was highly visible, and used public appearances to enhance the self-esteem of Maine Catholics. He was lionized by the Protestant community and Portland society; chosen to deliver a public oration on the death of President McKinley, he was accepted for membership in the exclusive Cumberland Club. Insisting on an intensely personal management style, he scrutinized parish reports, exercising minute oversight of liturgy and devotions. In 1903 he issued a pastoral on the new wave of immigrants arriving from Eastern Europe and Italy, asking that they be made welcome by the Church in Maine.

An avid traveler (e.g. the winter of 1904 to 1905 was spent in Rome), O'Connell was away on a diplomatic mission to Japan on behalf of the Vatican when word arrived that he had been appointed as coadjutor to Archbishop Williams in Boston. He bid farewell to the Portland diocese on September 9, 1906 and became archbishop of Boston on August 30, 1907, and was made a cardinal in 1911.

Love of the Past and Work for the Future. Rome lost no time in appointing a new bishop for the diocese of Portland. Louis Walsh (1858–1924) was a priest from Boston, known for his work at the Seminary of St. John and as an administrator of the archdiocesan schools. A dignified, scholarly, affable man, he was a builder for the future who had a love of Maine's rich history. He restored a monument Bishop Fenwick had erected for Fr. Râle, celebrated the centenary of St. Patrick's church in Damariscotta in 1908, and honored the 300th anniversary of the Mt. Desert mission with commemorations in 1913 (August 6 in Bar Harbor, October 12 in Portland). He founded the Maine Catholic Historical Society in 1908, and promoted the Maine Catholic Historical Magazine (1913–28).

During Walsh's 18-year tenure, 36 new parishes were founded (four in Portland, three in Lewiston). To deal with the vast number of immigrants, the bishop encouraged pastors to schedule visits of compatriot priests at least a few times a year to assist the foreign-born among their flocks. Such consideration did not prevent him from stirring up dissension in Biddeford over his reorganization of a French parish and measures to curb the activities of ethnic societies.

Walsh was no stranger to political action. He watched the state legislature closely, always a vocal advocate for state aid to what he referred to as his "Catholic Public Schools." His efforts to obtain a portion of the "State Public Fund" for schools, however, were rejected in 1915. The bishop was also a prominent figure on the national stage, serving as chairman of the Press and Publicity Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC), successfully working to reverse that organization's suppression by the Holy See in 1922. The energy devoted to that cause, and his energetic defense of the Church against the attacks of the Ku Klux Klan in 1922 and 1923 led to the bishop's increasing exhaustion. Walsh died on May 12, 1924, four days after suffering a cerebral hemorrhage.

Connecticut Natives for Maine. Maine's fifth and sixth bishops were both natives of Waterbury, Connecticut, and boyhood friends, attending Crosby High School and Holy Cross College. John Gregory Murray (born 1877), ordained after studies in Louvain, was a brilliant administrator of the diocese of Hartford, and served as its chancellor and auxiliary bishop. On October 11, 1925 he was installed as Bishop of Portland. A friendly and informal man, he continued Walsh's tradition of involvement on the national stage, serving on administrative committees of the NCWC. In Maine he faced a growing number of Catholics in a state whose population growth was modest overall. In 1930, 60 percent of Maine residents lived in rural areas, yet the number of non-Catholic churches was declining rapidly outside the cities. The bishop worried about his flock's vulnerability to the rising tide of indifferentism, and spoke out against mixed marriages and birth control.

The number of vacationers in Maine was increasing, however, and these visitors "from away" brought not only a financial windfall for struggling parishes but also edified natives by their faith and devotion. Thirty new parishes were established by Murray, the number of churches rose from 168 to 183, and the number of priests from 172 to 216. Sadly, St. Mary's College in Van Buren closed its doors in 1927, but a Catholic collegiate presence was maintained by St. Joseph's College (for women), opened in Maine in 1915 by the Sisters of Mercy (by century's end it would become co-ed and move to a suburban site in Standish). Catholics in the diocese were kept informed on Church news more effectively after the appearance of the Church World, a diocesan paper that debuted in July of 1930.

Murray responded aggressively to the dislocation occasioned by the Great Depression by committing the diocese to the needs of the poor. He borrowed heavily to maintain the Church's charitable foundations, and ordered that relief committees be established in every parish to oversee fundraising for the assistance of the homeless, destitute and unemployed. His work in Maine was brought to an abrupt conclusion in November of 1931 when he was transferred to the Archdiocese of ST. PAUL, Minnesota. He was hailed by all as a man of compassion who had worked to ease religious prejudice.

His friend Joseph McCarthy (born in 1876) was consecrated on August 24 of 1932, the first such ceremony to be carried on radio. A kind and courteous man, he had served both as a seminary teacher and administrator, as well as a parish priest (with many French-Canadians in his congregations). His primary task upon becoming bishop was to deal with a diocesan debt, which had mushroomed during the Depression to dangerous levels, totaling nearly $5 million. He devised a funding plan, approved by Rome in 1935, which authorized a bond issue and scheduled annual payments on the debt. Though construction was curtailed, 12 new churches were built by 1948, and a Catholic hospital erected in Portland in 1940. Even with the restricted finances, the diocese was able to respond to ruinous fires in Ellsworth and Auburn in 1933 with state-wide collections.

The bishop was heartened by the arrival in the diocese of two contemplative communities of nuns, the Adorers of the Precious Blood in Portland, and the Sisters of the BLESSED SACRAMENT in Waterville. The Jesuits returned to the diocese after an absence of 83 years to staff Cheverus High in Portland in 1942, and a group of exiled Lithuanian Franciscans were welcomed in 1944, ultimately settling on a beautiful property in Kennebunkport. McCarthy's declining health necessitated the appointment of an auxiliary, Daniel Feeney (a Portland native), on June 22, 1946, the first native-son to be elevated to the episcopacy. In July of 1948 Feeney was given administrative control of the diocese, and appointed coadjutor in 1952. Bishop McCarthy died in the fall of 1955, the centenary of Bishop Bacon's consecration.

The Second Vatican Council and Beyond. Bishop Feeney labored to eradicate the Diocese's indebtedness, and sought to implement the pastoral provisions of the Second Vatican Council. His successor, Peter Gerety, though bishop for only five years (1969-74), was responsible for a progressive interpretation of the conciliar decrees that reshaped the diocese before his departure for the see of Newark, New Jersey. Bishop Gerety was succeeded by the second native-son, Edward O'Leary (1974–88), who, assisted by his auxiliary Amedee Proulx (1975–93) sought to guide the church in Maine through an era of declining numbers of clergy and religious. Bishop Joseph Gerry, the former abbot of the Benedictine community of St. Anselm's in Manchester, New Hampshire, the third Maine native to shepherd the Portland diocese has, since 1988, sought to revitalize and renew his flock of some 140 parishes through a varied and active ministry, aided by auxiliary bishop Michael Cote, appointed in 1995, and about 150 active priests and around 400 women religious. This task has had to take account of a shrinking population in Maine's northern and eastern counties, and growing suburban communities in the central and southern counties. At the beginning of the new millennium, Catholics comprise some 18 percent of the total state population.

The Catholic Church in Maine has a rich heritage and has been a vibrant force for evangelization amidst ever-present challenges. Besides those mentioned above, other Maine Catholic notables include Donald Pelotte, S.S.S., bishop of Gallup, New Mexico (the first native American to be ordained a bishop), and politicians such as Emery San Souci, elected governor of Rhode Island in 1920 (the first Franco-American to be elected a governor in New England), Joseph Brennan (governor of Maine, 1979–87), and Margaret Chase Smith (the first woman to serve in both houses of the U.S. Congress).

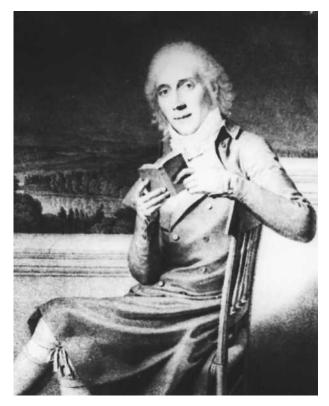

Bibliography: D. LIPTAK, R.S.M., "French-Canadians Plead for Survivance," in Immigrants and Their Church (New York 1989), 160–170. R. H. LORD, J. E. SEXTON, and E. T. HARRINGTON, The History of the Archdiocese of Boston in the Various Stages of Its Development, 3 v. (New York 1944). W. L. LUCEY, S.J., The Catholic Church in Maine (Francestown, N.H. 1957).

[J. C. LINCK]

MAINE DE BIRAN

French philosopher who defended the importance of inward experience as a source of knowledge; b. Marie-François-Pierre Gonthier de Biran, Bergerac, southern France, Nov. 29, 1766; d. Paris, July 20, 1824. After attending the College of Périguex, he moved between the two poles of public and private life, occupying important public offices during and after the French Revolution, while pursuing in solitude his mathematical, psychological, and philosophical researches. In 1813 he became a member of the famous "Committee of Five," which tried to curb Napoleon's international ambitions; and under the first Restoration he was in charge of the liaison between the king and the National Assembly on financial matters.

Teaching. In 1802 Biran's essay "The Influence of Habit on Thought" won first prize in a contest sponsored by the Institute of France, then dominated by the "ideologists," who reduced all experience to the outward data of sight, touch, and the like. In 1805 he was elected to the institute mainly on the strength of his essay "The Analysis of Thought." In the course of his association with such ideologists in the institute as A. L. C. Destutt de Tracy and P. J. G. Cabanis, he gradually clarified and deepened his own doctrines. Because of the originality of his opposition to the ideologists, and despite the personal and philosophical friction this opposition created, he came to be acknowledged by many French philosophers as their leader and teacher.

Maine De Biran.

His thought went through stages. When he was close to the ideologists (1800-03), he viewed outward sensations as basic to most knowledge. Then, developing his own philosophy (c. 1805), he taught that (1) all experience has an inwardly felt, volitional, and kinesthetic component (when man sees, he moves his eyeballs, keeps his eyelids apart, etc.); (2) the self is felt by man to be primarily this inward experience of willingly moving the body; (3) man's belief in effective causation (as against the mere compresence or succession of disparate external objects) is a result of this inward experience of causing his body to move; and (4) in experiencing this voluntary bodily movement (effort voulu) through his inward sense (sens intime), man acquires his belief in freedom, since such movement is frequently unhindered by external objects and is even independent of those objects. This development influenced, among others, V. COUSIN, J. LACHELIER, and J. Ravaisson in the nineteenth century, and M. BLONDEL and H. BERGSON in the twentieth century. On the basis of these four doctrines, Maine de Biran has been described as the father of French EXISTENTIAL-ISM.

In his last years (1819–24), Biran wrote a great deal about la croyance—faith in God who is spiritual, like the self revealed in inward experience, but who, unlike this self, is not temporal but eternal, not individual but universal. This last rather mystical stage has not had much influence because of its ambiguities; for instance, it is difficult to know whether he thought he was presenting a proof of God's existence or taking that existence as an article of faith. This is an undeveloped part of his philosophy.

Appreciation. More generally speaking, the philosophy of Biran is anthropocentric. His Journals, which he kept scrupulously, are as substantial a part of his lifework as his formal essays, and this is so because the basis of his philosophy was the experience of voluntarily moving his own frequently frail and always changing body. More important to him than impersonal, external objects (stressed by J. LOCKE, É. B. CONDILLAC, D. HUME, and the philosophes in general) was his own intimately felt awareness of willing and his experience of bodily resistance to that willing. This inwardly felt give-and-take convinced Biran that R. Descartes' dualism was an arbitrary separation of two entities deeply and intimately involved with each other. Only by starting from abstract words such as "mind" and "body," and defining these terms as negations of each other, did Descartes create his dualism. Biran found as a matter of experience that mind and body are intimately related with each other and, in emphasizing experience, he opposed his own kind of empiricism to the rationalism of Descartes. There was little of the system builder in Biran and much of the introspective psychologist; he was not so much trying to prove elaborate metaphysical conclusions as he was trying to clarify and personalize the basic terminology of psychology and philosophy. To sensationalism, materialism, and rationalism Biran opposed the descriptions and analyses of his own experience. It is a mistake to think of him primarily as a spiritualistic metaphysician; he was an empirical philosopher, at least in his rich middle period.

See Also: ENLIGHTENMENT, PHILOSOPHY OF.

Bibliography: Works. Journal, ed. H. GOUHIER, 2 v. (Neuchâtel 1954–55); Oeuvres, ed. P. TISSERAND and H. GOUHIER, 14 v. (Paris 1920–49). Literature. A. HUXLEY, Themes and Variations (New York 1950), a good intro. to the journals. P. P. HALLIE, Maine de Biran: Reformer of Empiricism, 1766–1824 (Cambridge, Mass. 1959). H. GOUHIER, Les Conversions de Maine de Biran (Paris 1947). G. LE ROY, L'Expérience de l'effort et de la grâce chez Maine de Biran (Paris 1937).

[P. P. HALLIE]

MAISTRE, JOSEPH MARIE DE

Philosophical writer, proponent of TRADITIONALISM, who influenced the antirevolutionary movement in France; b. Chambéry, Savoy, April 1, 1754; d. Turin, Italy, February 26, 1821. Austerity and unquestioning obedience were demanded both in his noble family and in his schooling with the Jesuits. He made the early acquaintance of the philosophes whom he, like LOUIS DE BONALD, combated all his life. After studying law at Turin, he entered the magistracy of Savoy in 1774, rose in the civil service, and in 1788 became a member of the Senate, of which his father was president. When the French revolutionary army occupied and annexed Savoy in 1792, he fled to Lausanne. There he wrote first his Lettres d'un royaliste savoisien (1793), published anonymously, to warn his countrymen that the horrors of the revolution would produce no lasting benefits. The wealth of ideas he gained in exile inspired him to produce "a work which would be read with avidity," the Considérations sur la France (1796), which established his reputation as an enthusiastic defender both of the divine mission of France and of the principle of authority. On the restoration of Charles Emmanuel IV in 1799, Maistre became regent of the Sardinian kingdom. In 1802 Victor Emmanuel I appointed him ambassador at St. Petersburg, and there, for 14 years, his profound learning and frank judgment enabled him to exercise considerable influence on Czar Alexander and the leading Russian nobility. Although he published only a single treatise during this time, it was in Russia that he wrote most of his notable works.

In his Essai sur le principe générateur des constitutions politiques (1814), he elaborated his theory of the divine origin of constitutions. His masterpiece, Du pape (1819), contained his doctrine of papal supremacy and became the charter of ULTRAMONTANISM. He translated and expanded Plutarch in Sur les délais de la justice divine (1816) and wrote De l'Église gallicane dans son rapport avec les Souverains Pontifes (1821), and the posthumously published Soirées de St. Pétersbourg (1821) and L'Examen de la philosophie de Bacon (1836). The unfinished Soirées exemplified the versatility of his intellectual and religious interests through 11 "conversations" on virtue and vice and the divine management of the world, conducted between a young and impetuous French officer, a serious and stubborn Russian senator, and a Sardinian count, Maistre himself. The last years at St. Petersburg were not agreeable because of the Czar's suspicion of Maistre's religious activities. He returned to Turin in 1817 to serve as regent of the kingdom, a position that allowed him some leisure to attend to the publication of his works, the task in which death overtook him.

The idea of a superintending Providence is the dominant theme in Maistre's interpretation of history. In his view, religious truth was not to be discovered in individuals but in tradition, which God revealed steadily throughout the development of history. BOSSUET had pictured Providence as erasing empires and writing the gospel in the hearts of the gentiles or the monogram of Christ on Constantine's banners. Maistre placed more emphasis on a divine equation; he held that the great amount of wrong done in the world required a proportionate quantity of punishment to satisfy the justice of a stern Judge. For example, having found "the most striking feature" of the French Revolution to be "the sweeping force that curbs all obstacles, the revolution guiding men more than being guided by them" (Considérations), he saw the Reign of Terror as God's way of chastising the assault against SOVEREIGNTY in the execution of Louis XVI. In promoting the doctrines of the philosophes and independence of God, France had abused its influence and demoralized Europe; therefore, "one must not be surprised that she be brought back by terrible means" (ibid.). The mysterious power of redemption by suffering and war-called "divine" in the Soirées-was Maistre's law of expiation: good results from evil.

He defended papal INFALLIBILITY ardently, especially in Du pape, declaring that "no sovereign pontiff has ever made a mistake in speaking on matters of faith." Moreover, the papacy better than any other sovereignty could serve as arbiter in settling the mutual differences of nations, because the popes had always promoted progress in European civilization.

Maistre's clear, forceful style proclaimed obedience as the highest political virtue, in order to restore the power of God, the pope, and the monarch. His influence on 19th-century philosophy and history was unquestionably important.

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes (Lyons 1884–86). L. AR-NOULD, La Providence et le bonheur d'après Bossuet et Joseph de Maistre (Paris 1917). F. BAYLE, Les Idèes politiques de J. de M. (Paris 1945). A. CAPONIGRI, Some Aspects of the Philosophy of J. de M. (Chicago 1945). G. COGORDAN, J. de M. (Paris 1894; 2d ed. 1922). J. LACROIX, Vocation personnelle et tradition nationale (Paris 1942). J. LIVELY, Works of J. de M. (New York 1965).

[L. DU S. C. MERCIER]

MAJELLA, GERARD, ST.

Redemptorist lay brother and mystic; b. Muro Lucano (Potenza), Italy, April 6, 1726; d. Caposele (Avellino), Oct. 16, 1755. Left fatherless at an early age, he was apprenticed to a tailor, Martin Pannuto, and endured the persecution of a journeyman who did not understand his gifts of grace and ascetical practices. Later as a servant of the irascible bishop of Lacedonga, he bore with patience three years of misery. After he was refused admission to the Capuchins because of his youth, he lived for a while as a hermit, and then applied for entrance into the Redemptorists. Paul Cafaro rejected him at first because of his frail health but gave way to his persistence, sending him to the novitiate at Deliceto in 1749 with the written message, "I send you a useless laybrother." At Deliceto as porter, sacristan, and tailor, he startled all with his zeal and ability. After his profession (July 16, 1752), the phenomena of his mystical life commenced. He had powers of bilocation, could discern spirits, and control the forces of nature. His many miracles and conversions earned him the title of wonder-worker. At one time he was accused of immorality by a young woman, Neria Caggiano, and his forbearance and trust until his innocence was established further tested his sanctity. He died of consumption when he was 29, at the day and hour he had foretold. He was beatified by LEO XIII, Jan. 29, 1893, and canonized by St. PIUS X, Dec. 11, 1904.

Feast: Oct. 16.

Bibliography: A. M. TANNOJA, The Lives of the Companions of St. Alphonsus Liguori, tr. London Oratory (London 1849) 241–453. J. CARR, To Heaven through a Window, St. Gerald Majella (New York 1949). N. FERRANTE, Storia meravigliosa di San Gerardo Majella (Rome 1955). J. H. M. EVERS, Historisch repertorium met betrekking tot Wittem als bedevaartsoord (Heerlen 1986). San Gerardo tra spiritualità e storia, ed. G. DE ROSA (Materdomini, Italy 1993). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:131–134. D. DE FELIPE, San Gerardo Mayela (Madrid 1954).

[M. J. CURLEY]

MAJOLUS OF CLUNY, ST.

Fourth abbot of Cluny; b. Valensolle or Avignon, France, c. 906-15; d. Souvigny, May 11, 994. Majolus (or Mayeul) studied at Lyons and became archdeacon of Mâcon. He refused the bishopric of Besançon and was instead admitted to CLUNY as a BENEDICTINE monk. There Abbot Aymard made him apocrisiarius and librarian and appointed him coadjutor abbot in 954 when Aymard himself went blind. Majolus held that post until Aymard's death in 965, when he succeeded him as abbot of Cluny. Under Majolus's rule the CLUNIAC REFORM spread widely. He reformed monasteries in the Kingdom of Burgundy, in Italy (at Pavia, Ravenna, and Rome), and in France (Saint-Maur-des-Fossés and Saint-Bénigne-de-Dijon, to which he sent WILLIAM OF SAINT-BÉNIGNE). In 974 Emperor OTTO II offered Majolus the papal tiara, which he refused. In 991 Majolus appointed ODILO his coadjutor abbot at Cluny so that he could devote the rest of his life to prayer. He died at the Abbey of SOUVIGNY, while traveling to Paris to reform SAINT-DENIS at the request of Hugh Capet; he was canonized by popular acclaim.

Feast: May 11.

Bibliography: Two lives, one by the monk Syrus, the other by Odilo, Acta Sanctorum May 2:653–698. Recueil des chartes de l'abbaye de Cluny, comp. A. BERNARD and ed. A. BRUEL, 6 v. (Paris 1876–1903). E. SACKUR, Die Cluniacenser, 2 v. (Halle 1892–94) 1:205–256. L. M. SMITH, The Early History of the Monastery of Cluny (Oxford 1920) 100–143. P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l'Ordre de Saint-Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous, Bel. 1942–56) v.1, 2, passim. S. HILPISCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1307. D. IOGNA-PRAT, Agni immaculati: recherches sur les sources hagiographiques relatives à Saint Maieul de Cluny (Paris 1988).

[B. HAMILTON]

MAJOR, GEORG (MAIER)

Lutheran theologian; b. Nuremberg, April 25, 1502; d. Wittenberg, Nov. 28, 1574. He studied under Martin LUTHER and Philipp MELANCHTHON. After eight years as rector in Magdeburg (1529-37), he served as court preacher in Wittenberg till 1545, when he became a professor of theology there. In 1546 he took part in the Conference of Regensberg, where he was befriended by Martin BUCER. After brief intervals in Magdeburg as a refugee from the Schmalkaldic War and in Merseburg for church affairs, he was back in Wittenberg in 1547. In 1548 his support of Melanchthon's concessions involved him in the Interim controversy which became more heated when he ceased opposing Maurice of Saxony and favored state measures against anti-Interimists (see INTERIMS). For his Interimism he received a princely favor of the superintendency at Eisleben (1552). Because the Gnesiolutherans opposed any conciliatory interpretations of pure Lutheranism, Major was compelled to make a public defense of himself, and this led to his having to flee to Wittenberg the same year. There he remained as a foremost leader of PHILIPPISM, and also as dean of the theological faculty from 1558 till his death.

Bibliography: Opera, 3 v. (Wittenberg 1569–70), incomplete. O. RITSCHL, Dogmengeschichte des Protestantismus, 4 v. (Leipzig 1908–27) v. 2. R. BRING, Das Verhältnis von Glauben und Werken in der lutheranischen Theologie (Munich 1955). H. W. GENSICHEN, Damnamus: Die Verwerfung von Irrlehre bei Luther und im Luthertum des 16. Jahrhunderts (Berlin 1955). R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1307–08. F. LAU, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:617

[Q. BREEN]

MAJORISTIC CONTROVERSY

Named after Georg MAJOR, pertained to most of the 16th-century disputations between the exponents of Philipp MELANCHTHON's conciliatory interpretations of the theology of Martin LUTHER, and the Gneisolutherans, who resisted any modifications of the original or pure Lutheranism (see PHILIPPISM; GNESIOLUTHERANISM). The debates ranged over the acceptance by Lutherans of certain Catholic religious practices as indifferent matters (Adiaphorism), the nature of the Real Presence in the Lord's Supper (see CRYPTO-CALVINISM), and chiefly the role of good works in the process of justification (Solafideism). The original setting of the controversy was supplied by the Interim conferences, in which some rapprochement was sought with Catholics (see INTER-IMS). While Major held that good works have no merit in justification as such, still they are necessary because they are divinely commanded and are evidence of faith. He was attacked by Nickolaus von AMSDORF in 1551 and by other Gnesiolutherans, notably Matthias FLACIUS IL-LYRICUS and Nikolaus Gallus (1516–70). By 1553 it was agreed that Major had not erred in doctrine, but in expression only, and that among themselves Lutherans might not insist upon the words "by faith alone," although they would when among Catholics, as in the Interim conferences, to avoid misunderstanding.

For bibliography, see MAJOR, GEORG.

[Q. BREEN]

MAKEMIE, FRANCIS

Presbyterian minister, missionary, and businessman, a leader of the PRESBYTERIANS in the American Middle Colonies; b. Ramelton, County Donegal, Ireland, 1653; d. 1708. He was trained at Glasgow, Scotland, and ordained (1682) for service in America. From correspondence with Increase MATHER, the Boston, Puritan leader, who helped English Presbyterians unite with Congregationalists after the breakdown of English state Presbyterianism, Makemie derived some of the concepts that formed American Presbyterianism. He was sent to Maryland (1683) by the Presbytery of Laggan, Ireland, and resided in Accomac County, VA, and Rehoboth, MD (1691, 1698– 1708). He disputed with the Quaker, George Keith, advocating a reformed ecclesiology. Beginning in 1698, Makemie organized Presbyterian congregations in Maryland, recruited clergy in England, and took the lead in founding the Presbytery of Philadelphia (1706), the parent body of American Presbyterianism. He was its first moderator (chairman). In a famous incident, Makemie was arrested by Lord Cornbury, Governor of New York, and imprisoned six to eight weeks on a charge of being a "strolling preacher." Makemie claimed the protection of the English Act of Toleration of 1689 and the validity of his previous license to preach, issued in the Barbados, British West Indies. His victory disgraced Cornbury, who was recalled, to the advantage of religious liberty in the colonies.

Bibliography: L. J. TRINTERUD, The Forming of An American Tradition (Philadelphia 1949). Journal of the Presbyterian Historical Society (Philadelphia 1901–) v.4, 15, 18. Some materials are deposited in the Presbyterian Historical Society, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

[E. A. SMITH]

MALACHI, BOOK OF

The last of the 12 MINOR PROPHETS. The Prophet's name Malachi, as it appears in the Hebrew Bible $(mal'\bar{a}k\hat{i})$, meaning "my messenger," was borrowed from Mal 3.1; an editor inserted it at the beginning of the book when the three chapters of Malachi were separated from Zechariah. The original title, therefore, seems to have been simply "an oracle" or "a burden" (Heb. $mass\bar{a}$), conformable to Zech 9.1 and 12.1. The Greek Septuagint leaves the Prophet anonymous, reading $mal'\bar{a}k\hat{o}$ in Mal 1.1, which it translates as a common word, not a proper name, "through the hand of his messenger [or angel]." The Vulgate calls the author Malachis (Heb. $mal'\bar{a}k\cdot y\bar{a}h$, messenger of Yahweh).

Author. The Prophet, however, is not lost in complete anonymity, for we can assess his personality from the spontaneous reactions and considered judgments in the book. A staunchly patriotic Jew, he assailed the practice of mixed marriages, especially when these involved the divorce of "the wife of your youth" (Mal 2.14), in order that the Jewish man could be joined to a young foreign girl. This act was "an abominable thing . . . [for it] profaned the temple" (2.11). Not only did it endanger Judaism with idolatrous practices, but it also struck at the strong religious spirit of the home. Malachi's loyalty to his religion kept him well acquainted with its ancient traditions, and he frequently alludes to Deuteronomy and Ezekiel.

Malachi was no literary artist like Isaiah or even like the less gifted Zechariah. His vocabulary remained very limited and his style colorless, without appeal to the imagination. As a result, however, he did speak simply, clearly, and forcefully. The most notable literary characteristic about Malachi's prophecy is its catechetical style of question and answer. A lead-off statement is generally questioned or challenged by the listeners, thereby providing Malachi with a good opening for a blunt reply.

Date. The Prophet exercised his ministry after 515 B.C., because the Temple had been rebuilt (Mal 1.10; 3.1, 10; Ezr 6.15), but sometime before the religious reforms instituted in Jerusalem by Ezra and Nehemiah toward the end of the 5th century B.C. What Malachi condemned these two leaders energetically and successfully removed: mixed marriages and unworthy liturgy. (See HAGGAI, BOOK OF; ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF, for further details about postexilic Judaism.) For this reason Malachi's ministry is usually placed around the middle of the 5th century B.C.

Francis Makemie.

Contents. This prophecy is best remembered for its announcement of a liturgical sacrifice in which all men of every nationality would participate (Mal 1. 10–11). In this passage Malachi could not have been thinking of contemporary pagan sacrifices, for he remained adamantly loyal to the Levitical priests, despite their many shortcomings (2.4–7; 3.4). Malachi, in fact, did not advance beyond earlier prophecies that had expected a great day when all men of every country would share in the messianic blessings (Gn 12.1–3; Is 41.20) and even take an active part in the new and perfect liturgy (Is 2.2–5; 66.18–3; Zec 8.23).

The other important aspect of his messianic hopes is his preoccupation with "the great and terrible day" of the Lord (ch. 3). It will dawn at the Temple of Jerusalem, where the Lord will be wondrously present among His people (3.1–2), completely burning away all uncleanness

(3.3, 19) and granting the fulfillment of all promises(3.20). Either the original editor of the prophet's words or a later redactor added a note (3.22–24) that "the great and terrible day" would be inaugurated by the return of Elijah (2 Kgs 2.11–12).

The book consists principally of six oracles: (1) God's special love for Israel (1.2–5); (2) the sins of the priests (1.6-2.9); (3) against divorce and mixed marriages (2.10–16); (4) Yahweh, God of justice (2.17–3.5); (5) ritual offenses (3.6–12); and (6) triumph of the just (3.13-21). Sometime after the oracles were collected, perhaps at the time when they were cut off from the oracles in Zechariah ch. 9-14 to form the 12th book of the Minor Prophets, someone added a superscription (1.1) and two appendices (3.22-24). Note that 3.19-24 of the Hebrew text and Confraternity of Christian Doctrine Version are considered ch. 4 in the Septuagint, the Vulgate, the Douay, the Authorized, and the Revised Standard Version. The last lines, found in most translations, are absent from the Hebrew; they reflect the Jewish practice of repeating verse 23a, lest the scroll of the Minor Prophets should end on the word "doom" in verse 24a.

Bibliography: L. H. BROCKINGTON, Peake's Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. BLACK and H. H. ROWLEY (London 1962) 573–575.

T. CHARY, Les Prophètes et te culte á partir de l'Exil (Tournai 1955) 160–189. A. GELIN, Aggée, Zacharie, Malachie (Bible de Jérusalem; 3d ed. 1960). T. H. ROBINSON and F. HORST, Die zwölf Kleinen Propheten (Handbuch zum Alten Testament 14; 2d ed. 1954) 261–275, with complete bibliog. C. LATTEY, The Book of Malachy (Westminster Version; New York 1934). E. F. SUTCLIFFE, Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture, ed. B. ORCHARD et al. (London–New York 1957) 555–558.

[C. STUHLMUELLER]

MALACHY, ST.

Archbishop of Armagh; b. Armagh, Ireland, c. 1094; d. Clairvaux, France, Nov. 2, 1148. Born Máel Máedoc Úa Morgair (Servant of St. M' Áedóc, descendant of Morgar), he had at least one brother, Gilla Críst, bishop of Clogher (d. 1138). His father appears to have been Mugrón, chief professor at Armagh, who died (1102) at the monastery of Mungret near Limerick. Malachy received his early education at an unnamed hamlet near Armagh, later studying in ARMAGH, then ruled by the reforming Bp. (St.) Cellach Úa Sínaig. There, a formative influence on his spiritual life was an austere anchorite, probably one of the CULDEES, called Ímar Úa Áedacáin. Malachy was ordained in 1119.

Reform. When appointed vicar in Armagh during the absence of Cellach in 1120, Malachy began his career as a reformer. On Cellach's return (c. 1122), he retired to the monastery of LISMORE to learn the Benedictine way of life from Máel Ísu Úa Ainmire, formerly archbishop of Cashel. Shortly afterward Malachy was recalled to reinvigorate decayed monastic observance in BANGOR, County Down, and was appointed bishop of Down (probably in 1123) and of Connor (1124). But powerful opposition forced him to leave (c. 1127), and he became abbot of Iveragh, County Kerry. In 1132, Máel Ísu of Lismore and the papal legate Gilla Epscuip prevailed upon Malachy to return to Armagh as bishop. Once there Malachy came immediately into conflict with hereditary customs by which Muirchertach Úa Sínaig had already been installed as Comarba Pátric (lay abbot) in Armagh. Malachy succeeded in establishing himself there only in 1137, when he immediately resigned and returned to Down as bishop, living a monastic life at Bangor. He was regarded as the leading Irish ecclesiastical figure of his day and was responsible for introducing the Roman liturgy into Ireland. He went to Rome to request the PALLIUM for Armagh and for Cashel from INNOCENT II. The pope refused to grant them until requested by a general council of Irish bishops, clergy, and nobles, but he appointed Malachy papal legate. Malachy returned to Ireland, where he called at CLAIRVAUX and Arrouaise in Flanders, leaving some of his monks in each place to learn the Cistercian and Arroasian rules, with a view to establishing these orders in Ireland. MELLIFONT, the first Irish Cistercian abbey, was founded in 1142. In 1148 a synod was held at Inis Phátric (County Dublin) that again requested the pallia and appointed Malachy as its agent. Malachy departed for Rome but died on the way, surrounded by St. BERNARD and his monks. He was canonized by CLEMENT III on July 6, 1199. Bernard vouched for his exalted sanctity, characterized by a love of poverty, which he called his spouse.

Prophecy of St. Malachy. A "prophecy" attributed to Malachy designates the 111 successors of Pope CELESTINE II (elected 1143) not by name but by short epithet. The prophecy first appeared in the Lignum vitae (ed. A. Wion, Venice 1595). For the period from 1143 to 1590, when GREGORY XIV was elected, the epithets were obviously derived from the popes' family or baptismal names, native places, or cardinalatial titles. After 1590 the epithets become very vague. The prophecy is a 16th-century forgery.

Feast: Nov. 3.

Bibliography: BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, Vita Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 187:1073–1118; Eng. tr.. The Life and Death of Saint Malachy, the Irishman, tr. R. T. MEYER (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1978). H. J. LAWLOR, ed. and tr., St. Bernard's . . . Life of St. Malachy . . . (New York 1920). J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland (New York 1929) 1:764-765, for Bernard's writings to and about Malachy. A. J. LUDDY, Life of St. Malachy (Dublin 1930, repr. Felinfach 1994). J. O'BOYLE, Life of St. Malachy (Belfast 1931); cf. Analecta Bollandiana 51 (1933) 179-180, 318-324. E. VACANDARD, "La prophetie de Malachie . . . ," Revue apologetique 33 (1922) 657-671. P. J. DUNNING, "The Arroasian Order in Medieval Ireland," Irish Historical Studies 4 (1945) 297-315. A. GWYNN, "St. Malachy of Armagh," The Irish Ecclesiastical Record 70 (1948) 961-978; 71 (1949) 134-148; "Armagh and Louth in the Twelfth Seanchas Ardmhacha 1 (1954) 1-11. J. LECLERCQ, "Documents of the Cult of St. Malachy," ibid. 3 (1959) 318-332. G. MURPHY, "St. Malachy of Armagh," Month 18 (1957) 219–231. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London-St. Louis 1938–61): v.1, 6th ed.; v.2, 7th ed.; v.3-6, 5th ed.; v.7-8, 11-12, 3d ed.; v.9-10, 4th ed.; v.13-40, from 1st German ed. Geschichte der Päpste seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters, 16 v. in 21 (Freiburg 1885-1933; repr. 1955-) 22:349.

[C. MCGRATH]

MALAGRIDA, GABRIEL

Missionary and preacher; b. Menaggio, Italy, Dec. 5, 1689; d. Lisbon, Sept. 21, 1761. He made his first studies in Como and Milan and joined the Society of Jesus in Genoa, Oct. 23, 1711. After having taught humanities in Nizza, Bastia, and Vercelli, he was sent to Portugal. In 1721 he left Lisbon for the missions of northern BRAZIL. Malagrida was a teacher of theology and humanities, spiritual counselor in the colleges of the society, missionary among the native people, popular preacher in towns and villages from Bahia to Pará, and the founder of convents, seminaries, and retreat houses. He was a zealous apostle, though somewhat theatrical and very credulous, and he soon acquired the fame of a saint. In 1750 he went to Portugal to discuss with John V the affairs of the missions in Pará; he returned to Maranhão in 1751 as royal councilor for the Portuguese overseas possessions, entrusted with royal powers to conduct missions. Three years later he was again in Portugal, this time as confessor of Queen Mariana of Austria and spiritual guide of many noble men and women. When the earthquake of 1775 almost destroyed Lisbon, Malagrida wrote a book called Juizo da verdadeira causa do Terremoto (Lisbon 1756), which attributed the earthquake to God's punishment. This attracted the wrath of the powerful minister Pombal, more interested in the rebuilding of the city than in prayers and idle laments. Malagrida was exiled to Setúbal, where he continued to gather people together for Spiritual Exercises. In 1758 Malagrida was unjustly accused of having instigated an attempt on the life of Joseph I. He was put in jail, where he became quite insane. Nevertheless, the Marquis of Pombal, who disliked Malagrida because he had opposed his policy in regard to the missions, denounced the missionary to the Inquisition. Condemned as a heretic, Malagrida died at the stake in 1761, in one of the saddest episodes of the Portuguese Inquisition. The basis for his condemnation was taken from two books he had written after he was no longer mentally responsible: Life of St. Ann, Mother of Mary and Kingdom of the Antichrist. Many of Malagrida's letters are extant, and there is a vast bibliography on his trial by the Inquisition.

Bibliography: S. LEITE, História de Companhia de Jesús no Brasil, 10 v. (Lisbon 1938–50).

[T. BEAL]

MALASPINA, GERMANICO

Papal nuncio and promoter of Tridentine reform; b. place and date unknown; d. San Severo, Italy, 1604. He showed diplomatic skill as nuncio for Gregory XIII at Graz (1582), at the imperial Diet of Augsburg (1582), and at Cologne (1583). During his nunciature at Prague, where Emperor Rudolf II (reign 1576–1612) usually resided, Malaspina, together with Giovanni Francesco Bonhomini, nuncio at Cologne, worked with energy to move the timorous emperor toward a plan of effective reform. They achieved success at Breslau, Paderborn, and Münster, and were aided by the Jesuits. In June 1592, Clement VIII entrusted Malaspina with the difficult nunciature of Poland. There he brought peace between King Sigismund III (reign 1587–1632) and his chancellor, Jan Zamojki (1587–1605), winning the confidence of both. At the death (Nov. 17, 1592) of Sigismund III's father, John III of Sweden, Sigismund became the claimant for the throne of Sweden. Malaspina accompanied him to Uppsala, witnessed the crowning (Feb. 19, 1593), but saw his hopes for a Catholic restoration in Sweden destroyed by strong religious opposition and the ambitions of Sigismund's uncle Charles, Protestant Duke of Södermanland, who in July 1599 assumed power. Malaspina was instrumental in the negotiations for the return of the Ruthenian Church to the See of Rome (1595) and the restoration of peace in Transylvania after the abdication of King SIGISMUND BÁTHORY (1599). From 1599 until his death he remained in his Diocese of San Severo.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages 23:282, 308–309; 24:87–95, 97–101, 117–122. R. SPIRITO, Dizionario ecclesiastico 2:790. A. POSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 6:1324, bibliog.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

MALATESTA

A family of Rimini, Italy, considered by the historian Jacob Burckhardt to be a representative RENAISSANCE ruling house. Descended from the counts of Carpegna, their line can be traced from 1150 on. In Rimini, where they had been granted citizenship in recognition of their support against Cesena, the Malatesta gained such power that Giovanni Malatesta became podestà in 1237. He was succeeded in 1247 by his long-lived son Malatesta da Verucchio, who ruled until 1312 and was leader of the GUELFS in the Romagna. Malatesta was succeeded by Malatestina (1312–17), the eldest of four sons. The second son, Giovanni (d. 1304), married the beautiful Francesca de Pollenta, daughter of Guido, seigneur of Ravenna. Giovanni surprised his handsome brother Paolo, who had seduced Francesca, and killed them both, a tragedy immortalized by Dante (Inferno 5.73–142). The deformed Pandolfo (d. c. 1326) succeeded his brother in office. In the following decades the Malatesta conquered Cesena, Pesaro, Fano, Fossombrone, Cervia, and other territories, but were caught in an uncomfortable position between Venice on one side and the expanding STATES OF THE CHURCH on the other. The family divided into three lines, and produced some of the leading condottieri and patrons of the arts and letters in Renaissance Italy. Cardinal ALBORNOZ forced Pandolfo II (d. 1373) of the main line to submit to papal dominance, but Pandolfo retained the Malatesta territories as a vicar of the Apostolic See. Carlo (d. 1429) was an ardent supporter of the popes, representing Gregory XII at the Council of CON-STANCE. His brother Pandolfo III left three sons, Galeotto Roberto (d. 1432), Sigismondo di Pandolfo (d. 1468), and Domenico di Pandolfo, known as Novello (d. 1465). Of these three, Bl. Galeotto (feast, Oct. 10), a pious and gentle person, married Margarita d' ESTE. Sigismondo was a notorious, but typical, Renaissance prince: well educated, an amateur poet, philosopher, and patron of the arts, a skeptical and immoral man, yet the builder of the beautiful Renaissance style cathedral of S. Francesco in Rimini. This powerful and tyrannous ruler, capable of cruelty and frivolity, took advantage of Pope Eugene IV's preoccupation with CONCILIARISM to expand his territories. In 1460 he attacked the States of the Church and was excommunicated, burned in effigy in Rome, and defeated after a two-year struggle by Pope PIUS II. He fought for and against the Venetians, for and against the Aragonese, for and against the Sienese, and against the Turks. The third brother, Domenico, is perhaps best remembered for the famous library, the Malatestiana, that he founded in Cesena; it still contains a priceless collection of manuscripts and incunabula. An illegitimate son of Sigismondo named Roberto (d. 1482) murdered Sigismondo's widow, Isotta, and their son, Salustio, and succeeded to the inheritance. He served as field marshal for Pope SIX-TUS IV in his war against Naples. His son, Pandolfo IV (d. 1523), was defeated by Caesar BORGIA in 1500, and in 1503 sold the Malatesta rights in Rimini to Venice.

Bibliography: L. TONONI, Storia civile e sacra di Rimini, 5 v. (Rimini 1860–82). C. É. YRIARTE, Un Condottiere au XV e siècle (Paris 1882). E. HUTTON, Sigismondo Pandolfo Malatesta (New York 1906). L. BIGNAMI, Splendori ed ombre alla corte di Malatesta di Rimini (Milan 1942). R. WEISS, Il primo secolo dell'Umanesimo (Rome 1949) 67–102. P. ZAMA, I Malatesti (Faenza 1956).

[L. W. SPITZ]

MALAWI, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Malawi is a landlocked, largely agricultural country located in southeast Africa. It is bordered by on the north and east by TANZANIA, on the southeast and southwest by MOZAMBIQUE and on the west by ZAMBIA. Predominately plateau, the terrain rises from rolling plains to low mountains with the region's sub-tropical climate characterized by a winter rainy season and a dry summer. Natural resources include limestone and deposits of uranium, coal and bauxite, although these minerals remained unexploited at the end of the 20th century. Agricultural products, which served as the basis for the Malawian economy, consisted of tobacco, sugar cane, cotton, tea and cassava.

Capital: Lilongwe. Size: 46,055 sq. miles.

Population: 10,385,849 (est.) in 2000.

Languages: English, Chichewa, Tumbuku; tribal languages are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 2,285,750 Catholics (22%), 2,077,180 Muslims (20%), 5,712,150 Protestants (55%), 310,769 follow indigenous beliefs.

Archdiocese: Blantyre, with suffragans Dedza, Lilongwe,

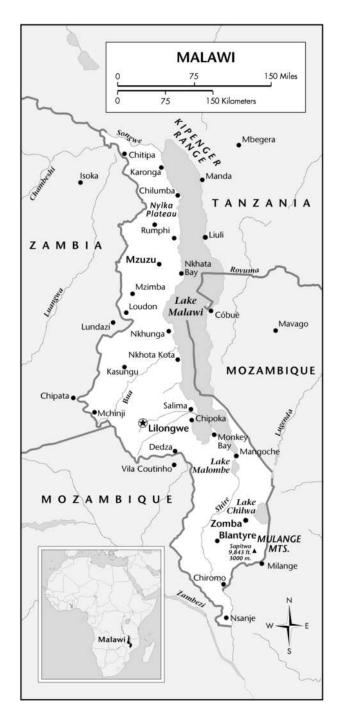

Zomba, Mzuzu, Chikwawa, and Mangochi.

Formerly known as Nyasaland, the region became a British protectorate in 1891 and was part of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland from 1954 to 1963. In 1964 it became the independent state of Malawi within the Commonwealth. Following three decades of dictatorial rule, the nation held its first multi-party elections in 1994. The average life expectancy of a Malawian was estimated at 37.5 years in 2000.

Early History. Jesuit missionaries from Mozambique penetrated the area around Lake Nyasa in the late 16th and early 17th centuries. In 1861, two years after British explorer David Livingstone reached Lake Nyasa, Anglican missionaries entered the area. The White Fathers began evangelizing Malawi in 1889, but tribal wars, disputes between the British and the Portuguese, and disease compelled them to leave after a year. The Vicariate Apostolic of Nyasa, erected in 1897 with jurisdiction over part of modern Zambia, was entrusted to the White Fathers. The Montfort Fathers founded a mission in the south (1901) that became the Prefecture Apostolic of Shire in 1903 (vicariate in 1952, then Archdiocese of Blantyre in 1959). The hierarchy was established in 1959, with Blantyre as the metropolitan see for the country.

The Church as a Vehicle for Change. By the late 20th century the Church had grown in Malawi, in part due to the availability of a translation of the Bible in the two main local languages, Chichewa and Tumbuka, which was completed in 1971. Other factors included the achievement of political independence, the Church's emerging role as a leader in the push for a democratic society and the influence of the Second Vatican Council in shaping Church life and pastoral activities in Malawi during the first decades of independence.

On July 6, 1964 Malawi achieved independence from Great Britain. Hastings Kamuzu Banda, who was elected president in 1966, extended his term of office to a life-presidency in 1971 amid charges of corruption. While professing the desire for a partnership with the Church, Banda acted to restrict the role of the Church in public life by suppressing all forms of public dissent. Although Malawian bishops issued annual Lenten pastoral letters, they avoided publicly discussing serious moral and social issues for fear of imprisonment. Similarly, priests focused their attention away from government issues during sermons. The growing tension reached a peak in 1982, when Archbishop James Chiona was harassed for his outspokenness.

A few years later, in May of 1989 Pope John Paul II visited Malawi and encouraged Church leaders to take an active role in righting the wrongs perpetrated by the Malawi government. In 1992 the bishops issued the pastoral letter Living Our Faith, condemning the extensive human rights abuses of the Banda dictatorship. The letter served as a catalyst for political change: while government action was taken against the bishops, it prompted such public defiance as student marches and strikes, while Malawians of all faiths showed solidarity by attending overcrowded Catholic masses. The bishops were soon joined by Protestant leaders, and in 1992, an ecumenical public affairs committee was organized to campaign for democratic reforms.

As a result, Western relief agencies suspended much-needed aid to Malawi, forcing the government to address reform issues. In an attempt to improve relations with the Church, Banda met Archbishop Chiona in December of 1993, and elections were scheduled for the following spring. In March of 1994 Malawian bishops published a pre-election pastoral letter, Building Our Future, and distributed over 30,000 copies throughout the country. The bishops adopted a nonpartisan approach by encouraging citizens to vote responsibly and stressing the need to accept the election results. On May 17, 1994 the first multiparty election was held amid charges of fraud and Banda's government was unseated. A new constitution went into effect, guaranteeing freedom of religion.

In addition to speaking out on a national level, beginning in the 1970s the Church was active on the grassroots level through small Christian communities. These groups, which met to pray, study the scriptures and examine ways to help their local community, were viewed by the government as potentially subversive and were banned. A decade later they began to reappear and by the 1990s were flourishing. Among the challenges to such groups were the social consequences to the spread of AIDS in the region; government estimates showed 30 percent of the population infected with HIV by 2000, leaving thousands of children homeless.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 Malawi had 162 parishes tended by 270 diocesan and 160 religious priests. Religious included over 90 brothers and 710 sisters, who operated the nation's 1,110 primary and 58 secondary Catholic schools. The Church was estimated to staff over half of all health care facilities in Malawi, among them 19 mission hospitals and seven orphanages. Every diocese had at least one minor seminary, and the Inter-Congregational Seminary at Balaka provided philosophy studies for Malawians wanting to join a particular order. Retreats for young people gained in popularity and each diocese had a full-time youth chaplain. In 1994 a Chichewa edition of the Liturgy of the Hours was published. A weekly Catholic newspaper and a monthly Catholic magazine were published in the country.

In 1994 newly elected Muslim President Bakili Muluzi publicly acknowledged the leading role of the Church in the fight for democracy. Pope John Paul II's directive to identify areas of injustice continued to bear fruit as Church leaders monitored the country's human rights situation. By 2000 Muluzi' efforts to promote Islam within the public schools was suspended after criticism from Church leaders, although tensions between Christians and Malawi's Islamic minority were increasingly visible elsewhere.

Bibliography: AFRICA WATCH, Where Silence Rules: The Suppression of Dissent in Malawi (London 1990). AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL, Malawi: Preserving the One-Party State (London 1993). T. CULLEN, Malawi: A Turning Point (Cambridge 1994). J. LWANDA, Kamuzu Banda of Malawi (Glasgow 1993). B. PACHAI, The History of the Nation (London 1973). P. SHORT, Banda (London 1974). T. D. WILLIAMS, Malawi: The Politics of Despair (London 1978). Bilan du Monde, 2:735–744. Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses. For additional bibliography, see AFRICA.

[J. F. O'DONOHUE/T. CULLEN/EDS.]

MALAYSIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Background. Located above the Equator in Southeast Asia, Malaysia comprises two distinct regions separated by a 400-mile span across the South China Sea. West Malaysia is located on the Malaya peninsula extending southward from Thailand, and East Malaysia, which comprises the two states of Sabah and Sarawak, lies in the northern region of the island of Borneo.

The earliest Malay kingdom was the Buddhist kingdom of Langkasuka in the northern region of the Malay peninsula during the 4th to the 6th centuries A.D. Between 682 and 692, the Buddhist Srivijava empire from Palembang conquered the Malay peninsula to control maritime traffic across the Straits of Malacca. From the 13th century onward, the Siamese-Buddhist Ayudhia Empire and the Javanese-Hindu Majapahit Empire claimed competing suzerainty over the Malay peninsula as the Srivijaya empire crumbled. These empires bequeathed a lasting socio-religious legacy, significant traces of which are still present in the language, customs and court ceremonies of the Malay-Muslim community. The Islamization of the Malay community began from the 13th century onward. Indian-Muslim Gujerati missionary-traders carried out much of the Islamic missionary work, promoting a Sufi form of Islam that blended orthodox Islamic teachings with existing animistic, Hindu and Buddhist elements. Islam was firmly entrenched when a Hindu prince of the port kingdom of Melaka, Parameswara, embraced Islam in 1414 and adopted the name Megat Iskandar Shah. In Capital: Kuala Lumpur. Size: 128,727 sq. miles.

Population: 22,229,040; the population is highly diversified. About 58% are ethnic Malays and other indigenous tribal groups, 26% are ethnic Chinese, 7% ethnic Indians. There are small minorities of Eurasians, Arabs, Filipinos and transient aliens.

Languages: Bahasa Melayu (official), English, Chinese dialects, Tamil, Telugu, Malayalam, Panjabi, Thai; in East Malaysia several indigenous languages are spoken, most commonly Iban and Kadazan.

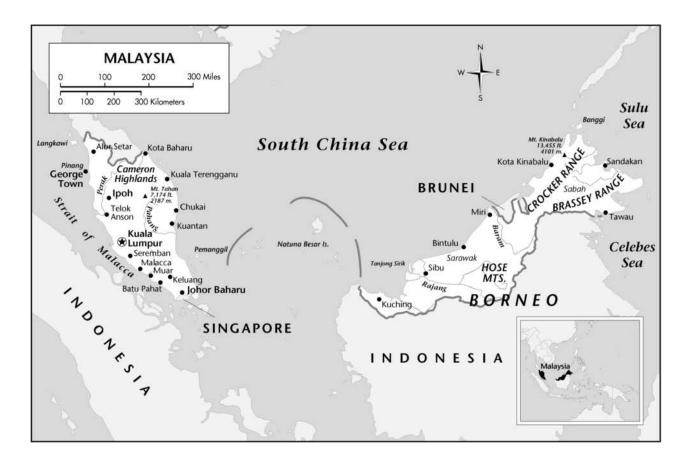

Religions: Islam is the official religion of Malaysia. Ethnic Malays are Muslim by law, as the Federal Constitution defines a "Malay" as one who professes the Islamic religion and practices the Malay culture. Most Chinese practice a syncretic mix of the Chinese religions of Taoism, Confucianism and Buddhism, while most Indians are adherents of Hinduism, Jainism or Sikhism. Christians are exclusively non-Malays and comprise about 8% of the population. Approximately half of the Christian population is Catholic.

Metropolitan Sees: Kuala Lumpur, with suffragans Melaka-Johor and Penang; and Kuching with suffragans Keningau, Kota Kinabalu, Miri, and Sibu.

1445, Muzaffar Shah assumed the title of sultan and decreed Islam as the official religion of the Melakan empire. Under the patronage of successive sultans, Islam spread throughout the Malay peninsula.

The early years of the 16th century saw successive flotillas of warships bringing the European colonial powers and Christian missionaries: the Portuguese in 1511, the Dutch in 1641 and the British in 1786. In 1511, Alfonso d'Albuquerque captured Melaka for Portugal. Portugal lost control of Melaka to the Dutch in 1641. In 1786 English influence was extended to the Malay peninsula when Sir Francis Light claimed Pulau Pinang for the British. The British took control of Singapore in 1819, Melaka in 1824 and Perak, Selangor, Negeri Sembilan and Pahang in the 1870s and 1880s. With the transfer of the four northern states of Kedah, Kelantan, Perlis and Terengganu from Siamese suzerainty to England in 1909 as well as Johor's acceptance of a British adviser in 1914, the entire Malay peninsula came under British control.

Sabah and Sarawak, the two northern states of Borneo island, were part of the ancient Brunei sultanate that controlled the entire island of Borneo until the 19th century. Sabah came into existence as a commercial venture when Claude Lee Moses, the American consul to Brunei, secured a 10-year lease for a vast tract of land from the Sultan of Brunei in 1865. After changing hands several times, the British North Borneo Company acquired the land in 1880 and named it British North Borneo. In 1946, British North Borneo was turned over to the British government. Sarawak was given by the Sultan of Brunei to the English adventurist, Sir James Brooke in 1844 as a reward for pacifying the marauding pirates who plundered costal settlements. Brooke made himself the "White Rajah" and founded a dynasty that lasted three generations. Sarawak remained the private fiefdom of the Brooke family until 1946, when Sir Charles Vyner Brooke, the last "White Rajah" abdicated and surrendered the state to the British Crown.

Modern-day Malaysia is a federation of 13 states (Johor, Kedah, Kelantan, Melaka, Negeri Sembilan, Pahang, Perak, Perlis, Pulau Pinang, Terengganu, Selangor, Sabah and Sarawak) that was formed on September 16, 1963, following a United Nations supervised referendum that was bitterly contested by Indonesia. Originally a member of the federation, Singapore seceded in 1965 over racial and political differences.

Portuguese Missionary Activities. The coming of Christianity to the Malay archipelago is conventionally dated to the Portuguese conquest of 1511. Along with Alfonso D'Albuquerque and his fleet came eight Catholic chaplains under the flagship of the Military Crusading Order of Christ. Full-scale missionary activities began with the arrival of the Jesuit missionary St. Francis XAVIER to Melaka. Not only did he emphasize preaching and Christian instruction, he also built the first school during his five visits to Melaka from 1545 until his death in 1552. Converts to Christianity also came from among the resident Chinese, some local Muslims and many Indian Hindu merchants. The diocese of Melaka, which encompassed the whole of the Malay peninsula, was formally constituted and made a suffragan see of the Padroado Archdiocese of Goa by Pope Paul IV in the papal bull Pro excellenti preeminentia dated Feb. 4, 1557. When the Dutch captured Melaka from the Portuguese in 1641, they destroyed most of the churches and chapels, killed or deported most Portuguese, and enacted anti-Catholic laws. Through it all, the Catholic community survived as a result of the clandestine activities of the Catholic clergy and lay movements, including the Confraternity of the Holy Rosary. The Portuguese bishops of Melaka resided in exile either in Timor or Flores, and barely exercised their apostolic ministry in the face of a Dutch blockade of all Portuguese missionaries. In 1818, the diocese of Melaka was dissolved and its territories were placed under the direct rule of the Padroado Metropolitan of Goa.

French Missionary Activities. The arrival in Melaka and Kedah of two MEP missionaries expelled from the Vicariate Apostolic of Siam in 1780 marked a revival of Catholic missionary activity in the region. The MEP missionaries quickly established themselves, working tirelessly to evangelize the local populate, thereby filling the void left by the Portuguese. The prolific activities of the MEP missionaries did not sit well with the Padroado Metropolitan of Goa, who claimed jurisdiction over the defunct Padroado diocese of Melaka and strongly opposed the MEP Vicar Apostolic of Siam's claim of jurisdiction pursuant to a decree of Pope LEO XII in 1827. Pope GREGORY XVI intervened in 1838, removing the Malay peninsula and Singapore from the jurisdiction of the Padroado Metropolitan of Goa and placing them under the Vicar Apostolic of Ava and Pegu pursuant to the papal bull Multa praeclare of 1838. Subsequently, the region was made an independent vicarate apostolic pursuant to the papal bull Universi dominici gregis dated Sept. 10, 1831. Nevertheless the Portuguese refused to surrender their existing missions in Melaka and Singapore. This impasse was finally resolved by a concordat signed between Pope Leo XIII and the Portuguese Crown on June 23, 1886, whereby the Portuguese missions in Melaka and Singapore were transferred to the jurisdiction of the Padroado Metropolitan of Macao. On Aug. 10, 1888, Pope Leo XIII re-established the Diocese of Melaka as a suffragan see of the Pondicherry Archdiocese and under the direct control of Propaganda Fide. The Malay Peninsula and Singapore came under the jurisdiction of Propaganda Fide, except the existing Portuguese missions in Melaka and Singapore, which remained under the Padroado Metropolitan of Macau.

Borneo Missions. While there are reports of brief Portuguese and Spanish missionary visits in the late 16th century, it was not until the late 17th century that Theatine missionaries were commissioned to spearhead the mission to Borneo. The Borneo mission was made a vicariate apostolic in 1692. Missionary activities received a new impetus when Don Carlos Cuarteron, the Prefect of northern Borneo, arrived in Borneo in 1857 with two Milan Foreign Missionaries and worked there for more than twenty years. Upon his withdrawal, the Mill Hill Missionaries, who arrived in Borneo in 1881, were given charge of northern Borneo. After World War II, the Catholic Mission in East Malaysia grew rapidly, with mass conversions of the indigenous people. In the aftermath of the war, the general dislocation of society undermined some of the animistic customs and ancestral traditions of these indigenous people. In addition, the suppression of head-hunting required new patterns of leadership to take over its function as a stabilizing force in longhouse life. This stabilizing force was supplied by education and a new system of religious beliefs which the missionaries were able to provide. By the 1960s, Christianity became the largest religious denomination in East Malaysia.

Renewal of Church Life. In the wake of VATICAN COUNCIL II, the Catholic Church in Malaysia has enthusiastically embraced the use of vernacular languages at Mass. However, the introduction of local cultural elements into the Church's liturgical life has been limited. BASIC CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES (BCCs) have mushroomed as a way of circumventing governmental restrictions on the construction of new churches. Lay catechists play a major role in pastoral and missionary work, especially among rural and indigenous and tribal communities. In 1975, the Catholic Church in Peninsula Malaysia organized a month-long renewal convention for its clergy. The convention's recommendations include the development of indigenous models of church life, greater laity-clergy-religious cooperation, better clerical and lay formation, efforts at youth outreach, dialogue with adherents of other religions, and engagement in integral human development. These recommendations were affirmed at the Peninsula Malaysia Pastoral Conventions of 1986 and 1996.

Challenges. Although the federal constitution designates Islam as the official religion of Malaysia, it also guarantees freedom of religion for all, albeit with an express prohibition against the propagation of non-Muslim religions among the Muslims. Apostasy from the Islamic religion is a criminal offense under various state legislation. As a result, Christian missionary activity is effectively restricted to non-Muslim Malaysians. In addition, from the 1970s onwards the government refused to issue or renew entry permits for foreign Christian missionaries. Mission schools were nationalized in the name of integration. Permits for building new churches became almost impossible to obtain. Since the 1980s, the circulation of Malay language translations of the Bible has been restricted to Christians. Anti-Christian sentiments were greatest in Sabah from the mid-1960s to the mid-1970s. Sabah's chief minister, Tun Mustapha Harun, suspended civil liberties and initiated a systematic campaign of forced Islamization. He expelled all foreign missionaries and most of the clergy, and even prohibited the Vicar Apostolic, Bishop Peter Chung, a Malaysian citizen, from residing in his see. A group of dedicated lay Catholic leaders filled the leadership void by forming the Persatuan Agama Katolik Sabah, or PAX, a "parliament" comprising lay representatives and the remnant of the local clergy who escaped expulsion. PAX was formed from the statewide federation of parish councils and took over effective leadership of the Catholic Church in Sabah. With the laity stepping forward to assume pastoral and leadership roles, Tun Mustapha's plan to destroy the Catholic Church by expelling its clergy and forbidding its bishop to reside in the state failed miserably. A unique situation developed in 1976 when Pope PAUL VI erected the diocese of Kota Kinabalu by the decree Quoniam Deo Favente. In recognition of its efforts during the darkest days of persecution, PAX was incorporated into the diocesan leadership structure, thereby creating a unique phenomenon of a diocese that is administered jointly by a bishop and a diocesan parliamentary assembly of lay and clerical leaders.

Ecumenical Collaboration. In the face of the continuing efforts of the Malaysian government to restrict the rights of Christians to practice and propagate their faith, representatives of the Catholic Church in Malaysia, the Council of Churches of Malaysia (CCM) representing the mainline Protestant Churches, and the National Evangelical Christian Fellowship (NECF) representing the Evangelical, Brethren and Pentecostal churches met on Feb. 6, 1985 and voted unanimously for the establishment of the Christian Federation of Malaysia (CFM). CFM came into existence on Jan.14, 1986 with the Catholic Church, CCM and NECF as equal partners, and with leadership positions rotated among representatives from these three organizations. CFM seeks to promote Christian unity, foster mutual collaboration among the various Christian churches, defend the rights and interests of the Christian community as a whole and present a united voice for the Christian community. The CFM is also an active member of the Malaysian Consultative Council of Buddhism, Christianity, Hinduism and Sikhism (MCCB-CHS), which was formed in 1983 to promote understanding and cooperation among different religions, study and resolve problems affecting all interreligious relationships, and make representations regarding religious matters. The MCCBCHS has become an organized channel for dialogue between the non-Muslims and the Malaysian government on religious freedom and Islamization.

Bibliography: M. CHEW, The Journey of the Catholic Church in Malaysia (Kuala Lumpur 2000). F. G. LEE, The Catholic Church in Malaya (Singapore 1963). K. P. GOH, ed., The Malaysian Church in the 90s (Kuala Lumpur 1992). R. HUNT et al., eds., Christianity in Malaysia (Petaling Jaya 1992). J. ROONEY, Khabar Gembira: A History of the Catholic Church in East Malaysia and Brunei, 1880–1976 (London, 1981). M. TEIXEIRA, The Portuguese Mission in Malacca and Singapore (Lisbon 1961–63). K. WILLIAMS, The Church in West Malaysia and Singapore (Leuven 1976).

[E. CHIA/J. TAN]

MALDERUS, JOHN

Bishop and theologian; b. Leuw-Saint-Pierre, near Brussels, Aug. 14, 1563; d. Antwerp, July 26, 1633. John Malderus, also called Malder or Van Malderen, studied humanities at Brussels, learned philosophy at Douai, and received his theological training at Louvain, where he was the student of Leonard LESSIUS. In 1596 he was the first to hold the chair at Louvain endowed by Philip II for explaining the text of St. Thomas Aquinas. He became director of the seminary of Louvain in 1598 and was appointed rector of the university in 1604. Malderus was consecrated bishop of Antwerp in 1611, and his episcopacy was marked by unusual pastoral zeal. He labored energetically to provide adequate instruction for the laity and to prevent the encroachments of Calvinism. For this purpose he prepared in 1613 a catechism in the vernacular, carefully supervised the training of priests, and wrote many letters of pastoral direction. Among his theological writings were notable commentaries on the Summa theologiae of Thomas Aquinas: De virtutibus theologicis et justitia et religione, commentaria ad 2am2ae D. Thomae (Antwerp 1616); In 1am2ae commentaria de fine et beatitudine hominis, de actibus humanis, de virtutibus, vitiis et peccatis, de legibus, de gratia, de justificatione et meritis (1623); and Commentaria de S. Trinitate, creatione in genere et de angelis ad 1 am partem D. Thomae (1634).

Bibliography: Biographie nationale de Belgique 13:223–226. A. PASTURE, La Restauration religieuse aux Pays-Bas catholiques sous les archiducs Albert et Isabelle, 1596–1633 (Louvain 1925). H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 3:882. E. VANSTEENBERGHE, Dictionnaire de thèologie catholique 9.2:1766–72.

[J. C. WILLKE]

MALDONADO LUCERO, PEDRO (PETER) DE JESÚS, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. June 15, 1892, Sacramento, Chihuahua, Mexico; d. Feb. 11, 1937, Chihuahua. At seventeen he entered the archdiocesan seminary at Chihuahua. When political upheaval interrupted his schooling (1914), he studied music. Following his ordination (1918) in El Paso, Texas, he dedicated himself to catechizing children, and promoting all–night vigils and Marian associations at S. Isabel, Chihuahua. In 1934, Pedro was imprisoned, mistreated, and exiled to El Paso, but he soon returned. A group of drunk soldiers apprehended him after Ash Wednesday liturgy, beat him and shot him. He died later from the injuries he sustained. Fr. Maldonado was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. H. CONTRERAS OROZCO, El mártir de Chihuahua: persecución y levantamientos de católicos: Vida y martirio del P. Pedro Maldonado (Chihuahua, Chih., Mexico 1992).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MALDONATUS, JOHANNES

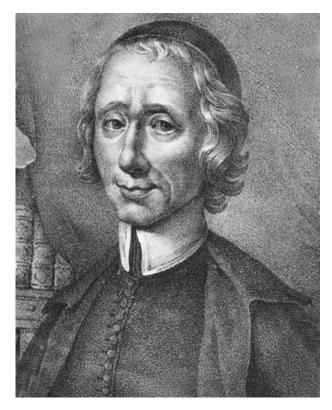

Spanish exegete and theologian, also known as Juán de Maldonado; b. Casas de la Reina, Estremadura, 1534; d. Rome, Jan. 5, 1583. After his studies at Salamanca (1547-58) and Rome (1558-62), he became a Jesuit (1562) and was ordained (1563). After having taught philosophy at the Roman College (1563) and at Paris (1564–65), he was professor of theology at Paris for nine years (1565–74). For the first five of these years he lectured in the traditional way by commenting on the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD, but in 1570 he initiated his own, original theological course. His teaching was interrupted in 1574 by the accusation of the Sorbonne professors that he denied the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. Although defended by the Archbishop of Paris, Pierre de Gondi, by the papal nuncio, and by the Holy See, he withdrew to Bourges and there composed his celebrated commentaries, highly prized until modern times, on the four Gospels. Having served for a period (1578–80) as visitor of the Society of Jesus in France, he was called to Rome in 1581 by Gregory XIII to work on the critical edition of the Septuagint. Here he also collaborated on the Jesuit RATIO STUDIORUM. His more important works are the Comment. in IV Evangelia (2 v. Pont-à-Mousson 1596–97, and many later editions), Traité des anges et demons (Paris 1606), Comment. in Prophetas quatuor (Lyons 1609), and the Miscellanea de Maldonado (lectures given at Paris) ed. R. Galdos (Madrid 1947).

Bibliography: J. I. TELLECHEA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 6:1326, esp. bibliog. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 5:403–412; 9:631.

[J. I. TELLECHEA IDÍGORAS]

MÂLE, ÉMILE

Art historian who raised the study of medieval iconography from an antiquarian interest to a scholarly discipline; b. Commentry, France, June 2, 1862; d. Châteaude-Chaalis, Oct. 6, 1954. Early medieval writers such as ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, BEDE, and RABANUS MAURUS were used by Mâle to identify and interpret religious imagery and to assign symbolic or theological meanings accurately. Religious Art in France of the Thirteenth Century was the title of his dissertation (1899) and first published book (1902). This study won him immediate acclaim and a post at the Sorbonne as professor of medieval art. He published similar studies for the end of the Middle Ages (1908), the 12th century (1922), and the three centuries following the Council of Trent (1932). The last book dealt with the diffusion and continuity of Christian themes in the art of Italy, Spain, and Flanders, in addition to France. In 1924 Mâle left the Sorbonne to become director of the French Archeological Institute in the Palazzo Farnese, Rome, a post he held until his retirement in 1937.

Nicolas Malebranche, lithograph.

He expanded the comprehensive design of his earlier publications with volumes on The Early Churches of Rome (tr. D. Buxton, Chicago 1960) and La Fin du paganisme en Gaule, et les plus anciennes basiliques chrétiennes (Paris 1950). He was a member of the French Academy, a Grand Officer of the Legion of Honor, and a director of the scholarly journal Monuments et memoires.

Bibliography: M. AUBERT, in Monuments et memoires 48.2 (Paris 1956) 1–7.

[P. GOULD]

MALEBRANCHE, NICOLAS

French philosopher and priest of the Oratory; b. Paris, Aug. 5, 1638; d. there, Oct. 13, 1715. A son of King Louis XIII's secretary, Malebranche studied philosophy at the Collége de la Marche and theology at the Sorbonne. He entered the ORATORIANS in 1660 and was ordained in 1664. Except for a few vacations in the country, he lived and died at the motherhouse in Paris. His philosophical search for, and defense of, truth culminated in religious meditation. As a scientist, he made detailed observations of insects, was well versed in mathematics, and presented the first analysis of colors in terms of frequencies of vibration at his election to the Académie des Sciences in 1699.

Works and Polemics. Disgusted with scholasticism, Malebranche renewed his interest in philosophy upon reading R. Descartes's Traité de l'homme in 1664. The editors of this work accentuated the spiritualist counterpart of its mechanistic physiology and certain affinities with the thought of St. Augustine. Malebranche's first work, De la Recherche de la Vérité (Paris 1674-75, 6th ed. 1712), espoused Cartesian dualism, stressing the opposition between thought and bodily extension. Sensible qualities, for Malebranche, are only a modification of the soul, a warning of what is or is not suitable for the conservation of life. Like other Cartesians, he explained the correspondence between sensations and bodily changes, as well as the soul-body union in general, in terms of the regularity of the laws of occasional causes, and held that God alone exercises true efficacy (see MIND-BODY PROB-LEM). Malebranche was to extend this solution to all relations between creatures. Although continuing the Cartesian criticism of scholastic physics and of human errors as originating in the senses, the imagination, and the passions, he parted company with Descartes by basing his rational argumentation on certain facts of faith and by rejecting the Cartesian doctrine of innate ideas. In Malebranche's view, the soul is directly linked to universal Reason and sees the essence of bodies in God.

Abbé Simon Foucher (1644–96), in his Critique de la recherche de la vérité (Paris 1675), disputed this mixture of reason and faith and, through his hasty interpretations, led Malebranche to clarify his differences with Descartes over eternal truths as uncreated and over ideas as essences and not as modes of human thought. Dom Robert Desgabets (1620-78) intervened but defended Malebranche clumsily in his Critique de la critique de la recherche. . . (Paris 1675). Malebranche himself replied in volume two of the Recherche (1675, 2d ed. 1676). After the Conversations chrétiennes (Paris 1677), the third edition of the Recherche adds a volume of Eclaircissements that contains, among other things, an explanation of "intelligible extension." Between 1680 and 1682 Malebranche engaged in a polemic with the Jesuit Le Valois (pseudonym, Louis de La Ville) on reconciling Cartesian physics with the doctrine of Tran-substantiation.

Malebranche's Traité de la Nature et de la Grâce (Amsterdam 1680; placed on the Index in 1690) evoked marked reservations from BOSSUET, FÉNELON, and especially ARNAULD; the better to undermine it, Arnauld first attacked the theory of knowledge (Traité des vraies et fausses idées, Cologne 1683), then the entire system. The writings of the two rivals multiplied; Malebranche later reedited his answers to Arnauld in Recueil de toutes les réponses. . . à M. Arnauld (4 v. Paris 1709). The principal points of the dispute are pointed out in the Méditations chrétiennes (Cologne 1683), the Traité de morale (Cologne 1684), the Entretiens sur la métaphysique et la religion (Rotterdam 1688), which is Malebranche's principal work, and the Entretiens sur la mort (Paris 1696).

In 1686 Malebranche engaged in a brief polemic with Bernard le Bovier de Fontenelle (1657-1757) over occasionalism and, in 1692, 1700, and 1712 successively, reworked his laws of impact in response to the criticisms of G. W. LEIBNIZ. Criticized also by P. S. REGIS in the latter's Système de la philosophie. . . (Paris 1690), Malebranche replied with his Réponse (1693), which dealt with the perception of distance, the beatific vision, and the intrinsic goodness of pleasure. Called upon to endorse QUIETISM by Dom François LAMY, he opposed it in his Traité de l'amour de Dieu (Lyons 1697), and again in three Lettres and a Réponse générale to Lamy in 1699 and 1700. His Entretien d'un philosophe chrétien et d'un philosophe chinois (Paris 1707) reveals some of his dealings with the Jesuits; in 1712 he dealt with them again in a review of Fénelon's Traité de l'existence de Dieu. but in both cases avoided polemics. Despite his distaste for argumentation, he replied to the Traité de l'action de Dieu sur les créatures of L. F. Boursier (1679-1749) in his Réflexions sur la prémotion physique (Paris 1715).

Though often fierce in controversy, Malebranche showed mildness and spiritual elevation in his works of piety, which were always nourished by philosophical reflection. Among these his Petites méditations pour se disposer à l'humilité et à la pénitence (Paris 1677) is noteworthy.

Teaching. Malebranche's occasionalism finds divine action everywhere, but this is not the "perpetual miracle" for which Leibniz reproved him. Malebranche distinguishes the true miracle, which depends on the particular will of God, from the general laws of occasional causes, which, for him as for other Cartesians, explain the communication of mechanical motion to bodies and the union between soul and body. To these laws of occasional causes Malebranche added the laws that regulate, through the intermediary of the attention, the mind's access to ideas in God, and, on the supernatural level, those that give to the angels control over bodies and to Christ omnipotence for the distribution of graces to souls and bodies. In conformity with the Christocentrism of Pierre de BÉRULLE, the Second Person of the Trinity, as the Eternal Word and as Christ Incarnate, is at the very heart of Malebranchism.

As Universal Reason, Christ illumines man's mind by giving it, on the occasion of the "natural prayer" of attention, the intellectual intuition of essences. It is here that one can see how Malebranche's AUGUSTINIANISM converges with CARTESIANISM, which reduces all modalities of bodies to extension. The absence of interaction between souls and real bodies and the absolute freedom of God with respect to creation makes the existence of bodies both indemonstrable and inaccessible. But faith makes clear that God really has created such bodies; and occasionalism establishes the correlation between the vision in God of their essences, where they appear as determinations of intelligible extension, and the sensations that concretely diversify extension and correspond to cerebral modifications.

Because Malebranche places intelligible extension in God, he has been compared with B. SPINOZA; yet he sharply criticized Spinoza and insisted on a difference between intelligible extension, the spiritual archetype of corporeity, and materially created extension. The first ideally comprises the infinity of geometrical figures; only the second is actually divided and changing. Therefore, man sees the essence of God only "as participable by corporeal creatures," that is, according to an order of determined perfections but without understanding how these perfections are reconciled with God's transcendent unity; vision in God is not vision of God. Malebranche, however, has been accused of ontologism (A. Fonck, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 11.1:1046). Certainly he grants to the human mind the vision of the infinite or indeterminate being as a condition of all determinate thought. But Malebranche rejects the basic error of ontologism, viz, the confusion between man's knowledge in the present life and the beatific vision. He insists that no one can see God without first having died.

Again, on earth man does not see the essences of souls. Malebranche limits the Cartesian cogito to the unquestionable awareness of the existence of spirit, while denying that spirit is more clearly known than body. Man, in his view, experiences his own attributes in a confused way and will contemplate his archetype only in the future life; the vision of God, however, will then prevent him from being absorbed by his own perfections. He holds that immortality is sufficiently founded on spirituality and is confirmed by revelation.

As the Incarnate Christ, Jesus unites in Himself both corporeal and spiritual substance and makes creation infinitely priceless. Original sin, foreseen by God, enriches the plan of the Incarnation—which in itself is independent of the Redemption, following the Scotist tradition. Malebranche holds that evil is positive; contrary to St. Augustine, he refuses to explain disorder as a simple dis-sonance contributing to universal harmony. A man of his time, he excludes from salvation pagans, heretics, and children who have died unbaptized, and is shocked by the great numbers of the damned. An almighty and infinitely good God can save all men and wills to save them (against Jansenism), but He must in His wisdom reconcile the perfection of the work with the simplicity of the means available. Just as physical evils (monsters, cataclysms, etc.) are the consequence of the simplicity of mechanical laws, so inequalities in the distribution of grace are traceable to the cause that best glorifies God, viz, the desires of the soul of Christ, subject as it is to the succession of human thoughts. Bossuet and Fénelon protested against this limitation of the soul of Christ, and Arnauld saw in it an intimation of the Nestorian heresy. Yet through it, Malebranche sought to avoid the opposed errors of Jansenism and Pelagianism. As he viewed the matter, original sin did not destroy nature, and every man who discovers his true Good has access to the graces of light. But through sin the soul is subject to concupiscence and, without the grace of reparation, is incapable of always preferring the good. Malebranche, like St. Augustine, considers this grace as a "prevenient delectation" that opposes itself to the attraction of concupiscence and reestablishes man's freedom. Its proper use follows on the distribution of grace by Christ, and neither commands this giving of grace (contrary to Pelagianism) nor follows from it necessarily (contrary to Jansenism). For human freedom, which conditions man's access to clear ideas through the agency of his attentiveness, permits man to follow or not to follow the divine impulse that draws him toward the Good. God gives man the impulse always to go farther, to the infinite, but sin stops man at false particular goods. The love of God includes beatitude (contrary to quietism), and the queen of virtues, charity, includes the love of God and that of neighbor. The resulting morality is "Christian," as is all of Malebranche's philosophy. It is also rational, however, and is founded on the intellectual vision of the order of perfections. Malebranche applied its principles to defend the dignity of all human beings and the rights of conscience, and concerned himself with concrete efforts in the fields of social relations and of pedagogy.

Influence. Through the breadth of his synthesis and the richness of his psychological and moral analyses, Malebranche attracted many readers. There have been numerous reeditions and translations of his major works, both in his lifetime and after his death. His philosophy was developed by his disciples to the end of the 18th century, principally in France by the Oratorian Bernard LAMY and the Benedictine François Lamy, both contemporaries of Malebranche, and later by the Jesuit Yves Marie André (1675–1764) and, in the second half of the 18th century, by Charles Hercules of Keranflech; in England, by John Norris (1657–1711); and in Italy, by the Franciscan Michelangelo Fardella (1650–1718) and, at the end of the 18th century, by Cardinal H. S. Gerdil (1718–1802). Malebranchism appeared, at that time, as the best bulwark of SPIRITUALISM against unbelief.

See Also: OCCASIONALISM; ONTOLOGISM.

Bibliography: Works and translations. Oeuvres complètes, gen. ed. A. ROBINET, 20 v. (Paris 1958-66) v.1-3, ed. G. RODIS-LEWIS; v.5, ed. G. DREYFUS; v.17.1-2, ed. P. COSTABEL; Treatise concerning the Search after Truth. Treatise of Nature and Grace. . . Defense against Accusations of Mr. De La Ville, tr. T. TAYLOR, 2 v. (Oxford 1694), 2d ed. with Discourse upon Light and Colours (1700); Search after Truth, tr. R. SAULT, 2 v. (London 1694-95); Christian Conferences (London 1695); Treatise of Morality, tr. J. SHIPTON (London 1699); Dialogues in Metaphysics and on Religion, tr. M. GINSBERG (London 1923), pref. by G. D. HICKS, exposition of M.'s epistemology and metaphysics by Ginsberg. Studies. A. DEL NOCE, "Bibliografia malebranchiana," Malebranche nel terzo centenario della nascita spec. suppl. of Revista de filosofia neo-scolastica 30 (1938) 361-380. G. SEBBA, N. Malebranche: A Preliminary Bibliography (Athens, Geo., 1958). A. RO-BINET, Documents biographiques et bibliographiques, v.20 of MALEBRANCHE, Oeuvres complètes, op. cit. Copleston v.4. J. MO-REAU, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:272-277. J. WEHRLÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-50) 9.2:1774-1804. G. RODIS-LEWIS, Nicolas Malebranche (Paris 1963). R. W. CHURCH, A Study in the Philosophy of M. (London 1931). B. K. ROME, The Philosophy of M.: A Study in His Integration of Faith, Reason and Experimental Observation (Chicago 1963). V. DELBOS, Étude de la philosophie de M. (Paris 1924). H. GOUHIER, La Vocation de M. (Paris 1926); La Philosophie de M. et son expérience religieuse (2d ed. Paris 1948). M. GUEROULT, Malebranche, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1955–59) v.1 La Vision de Dieu; v.2 Les Cinq abîmes de la Providence. Y. DE MONTCHEUIL, M. et le quiétisme (Paris 1946). G. DREYFUS, La Volonté selon M. (Paris 1958). A. ROBINET, Systéme et existence dans l'oeuvre de M. (Paris 1965). L. VERGA, La filosofia morale di M. (Milan 1964).

[G. RODIS-LEWIS]

MALI, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

One of the world's poorest nations, the Republic of Mali is a tropical, landlocked country in west Africa. Located south of ALGERIA, it is bound on the east by Niger, on the south by BURKINA FASO and the IVORY COAST, on the southwest by GUINEA, on the west by SENEGAL and on the northwest by MAURITANIA. Known as the French Sudan until 1958, Mali joined with Senegal and as the Federation of Mali, gained increasing political autonomy until it was granted political independence by French Prime Minister Charles de Gaulle in 1960. A flat, semiarid region, Mali suffers from desertification by the encroachment of the Western Sahara to its north. To the south it is crossed by the Upper Niger, allowing for the seasonal cultivation of rice, millet, cotton and peanuts Capital: Bamako. Size: 465,040 sq. miles.

Population: 10,685,948 in 2000.

Languages: French; Bambara, Fulani, and local dialects are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 125,800 Catholics (1.2%), 9,617,353 Muslims (90%), 192,350 Protestants (1.8%), 750,445 adherents to indigenous pagan beliefs.

Archdiocese: Bamako, with suffragans Kayes (created 1963), Mopti (1964), San (1964), Ségou (1962), and Sikasso (1963).

along the river. Mali's population consists mostly of Bambara, Fulani, Snufo, Soninke, Tuareg and other tribes, although Berbers and a European minority are also represented. Cotton, account's for most of the nation's agricultural exports, while government efforts to attract international mining operations to the region bode well for its future as a major gold exporter.

History. Islam entered the area in the 11th century, and an empire was established by conqueror Sundjata Keita 200 years later, made rich through its control of the gold trade across the Sahara. From the 15th through the 18th century Mali fell under Moroccan rule, and then was ruled by native tribes. While Christianity appeared during the 19th century, brought by French colonists who renamed the region French Sudan c. 1899, it made slow progress. In 1868 the Prefecture Apostolic of the Sahara and Sudan was erected, with Cardinal Charles LAVIGE-RIE, Archbishop of Algiers, as superior and apostolic delegate. The first two groups of White Fathers to enter the region were massacred by local tribes as they traveled the Sahara (1876, 1881); a later group successfully entered Mali from Senegal and established missions at Ségou and Tombouctou in 1895. The White Sisters arrived in 1898 and established hospitals at Kati and Ségou. From 1904 to 1920 Mali was joined with other French territories to form the colony of Upper Senegal-Niger.

Until 1921 the growth of the mission in Mali was hampered by the hostility of French colonial officials, epidemics of yellow fever and the mobilization of missionaries during World War I. The mission began to develop with the creation of the Vicariate Apostolic of Bamako in 1921, whose limits were practically the same as those of Mali. Following World War II the region was reorganized as the French overseas territory of the Sudan. The Church established a hierarchy there in 1955, with Bamako as its archdiocese and metropolitan see. Despite native Malian's increasingly vocal movement for independence from French rule, the region agreed to join the other five nations comprising French West Africa in 1958 and accept the political status of a republic within the French Community. On Sept. 22, 1960 the Sudanese Republic and Senegal achieved political independence as the Mali Federation; when Senegal withdrew less than a year later, the region was renamed Mali. The first Malian bishop, Luc Sangaré, became archbishop of Mali in 1962.

Mali's first independent government was socialist in its leanings, and it was overthrown by a military coup led by Lieutenant Moussa Traoré in 1968. This military dictatorship lasted for the next 23 years, although Traoré held mock elections beginning in 1972. In 1991 Touré was arrested, and Mali held its first democratic, multiparty elections in 1992. President Alpha Oumar Konare held the position of president through 2000

The 28 parishes established in the region in 1964 had grown to 42 parishes by 2000, reflecting the work of Church evangelicalism. In addition to 71 secular and 83 religious priests, 22 brothers and 206 sisters tended the region. During the second half of the 20th century the Church worked to promote the role of women within this predominately Sunni Muslim nation, freeing them from their traditional cloistered life. In 1998 President Konare traveled to the Vatican for a respectful audience with Pope John Paul II, a reflection of Konare's willingness to promote cooperation among his people's diverse faiths. As Mali entered the 21st century, tribal warfare in Mali's northern region, the nation's heavy reliance on foreign aid and the social and economic devastation caused by desertification and drought were the problems most directly confronting this nation. In 2000 the average life expectancy of a Malian was only 47 years, a situation that troubled the Church hierarchy. Through his personal charity, distributed by Core Unum, the Pope continued in his efforts to combat the effects of the spread of the Sahara, donating $5.5 million to Mali and other nations in the Sahel region in 1999 alone.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde, 2:587–590. Annuario Pontificio has annual data for all dioceses. For additional bibliography, see AFRICA.

[J. DE BENOIST/EDS.]

MALINES CONSERVATIONS

A series of five unofficial talks between Roman Catholics and Anglicans at Malines (Mechelen), Belgium. The first took place Dec. 6-8, 1921, and the last Oct.11–12, 1926. The chief Anglican representatives were Charles Lindley Wood, second Viscount HALIFAX; Dr. Armitage Robinson; Rev. Dr. B. J. Kidd; Rev. W. H. Frere; and Rev. Dr. Charles GORE. The Catholics were represented by Cardinal MERCIER, Cardinal Joseph van Roey, the abbés Fernand Portal and Hippolyte Hemmer, and Msgr. Pierre BATIFFOL. The moving spirits were Halifax and Portal, who were encouraged by a declaration of the sixth Lambeth Conference that the Anglican bishops were prepared, in return for the recognition of their ministry, to accept "from the authorities of other churches a form of commission or recognition." Halifax approached Mercier, who agreed to a series of talks. The proceedings were clouded by the hesitancy of Dr. Randall DAVIDSON, Abp. of Canterbury, and the hostile attitude of the English Catholic hierarchy. Initially Pius XI was not opposed to the Malines meetings, although he made it clear that they were confidential and that the Catholic representatives had no other function than to discuss the differences dividing the two churches.

In the first discussion it was clear that both churches had much in common. The most difficult point to reconcile concerned ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Both groups readily admitted that bishops held office by divine right (jure divino), but the Anglicans feared Roman centralization. The most notable advance during the conversations was made by Mercier who in the fourth session presented a memoir entitled "The English Church United Not Absorbed," which suggested that the archbishop of Canterbury be established as patriarch with broad powers, that Latin Canon Law not be imposed in England, that the English Church have its own liturgy, and that all the historic sees of the English Church be maintained and the recent Catholic ones suppressed. Between the fourth and fifth conversations the irenical atmosphere darkened; Cardinal BOURNE expressed displeasure because English Catholics had been so little consulted. More significant were the deaths of both Mercier and Portal in 1926. Cardinal van Roey, whose ecumenical interests were far less intense than Mercier's, presided over the anticlimactic fifth conversation. All those present agreed that conditions were distinctly unfavorable for further talks. Rome's attitude had cooled partly as a result of the negative attitude of Cardinals Bourne and GASQUET. The encyclical MORTALIUM ANIMOS (1928) did not explictly mention the Malines Conversations; but it placed restrictions on Catholic participation in such matters. With the progress of the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT, particularly since the pontificate of JOHN XXIII, Rome has relaxed such restrictions.

Bibliography: J. DE BIVORT DE LA SAUDÉE, Anglicans et catholiques, 2 v. (Paris 1949). C. L. WOOD, SECOND VISCOUNT HALIFAX, ed., The Conversations at Malines (London 1930). W. H. FRERE, Recollections of Malines (London 1935). H. M. HEMMER, Fernand Portal (1855–1926) Apostle of Unity, tr. A. T. MACMILLAN (New York 1961).

[S. J. MILLER]

MALLINCKRODT, PAULINE VON, BL.

Foundress of the Sisters of CHRISTIAN CHARITY, also known as Marie Bernadine Sophia Pauline Mallinckrodt; b. June 3, 1817, Minden, Westphalia, Germany; d. April 30, 1881, Paderborn (near Münster), Germany.

Her mother was a devout Catholic; her father, a high-ranking civil servant, was a Protestant of tolerant views. Her brother, Hermann, became a Catholic leader in public life. In Aachen, where she spent her earlier years, Pauline frequented the circle of the poet Louise Hensel (1798–1876), who became a Catholic in 1818. When she was 18, she declined to marry a well-to-do Protestant. In Paderborn, where she lived from 1839, Pauline dedicated herself to works of charity, founded an association of women to help the impoverished sick in 1839, and in 1840 established a day nursery. In 1842, Pauline opened a school for blind children. She persuaded St. Madeleine Sophie BARAT to have her institute take charge of this school, but the Prussian government would not grant admittance to the French religious congregation.

As a result Pauline founded her own congregation Aug. 21, 1849, and served as its first superior general. During her lifetime the institute extended its apostolate to include teaching in elementary and secondary schools. When the Kulturkampf caused the closing of 17 houses in Germany, Pauline moved the motherhouse to Mont-Saint-Guibert near Brussels, Belgium, and also began to establish houses abroad. She visited the U.S. in 1873 shortly after the first group of her sisters arrived in New Orleans, and again in 1879 after journeying to her foundation in Chile. She traveled also to England, where houses were started. By the time of her death from pneumonia in 1881, the Sisters of Christian Charity had 492 members in 45 houses.

Mother Pauline is buried in the motherhouse in Paderborn. The decree introducing her cause for beatification was issued in 1958, which ended with her beatification by Pope John Paul II, April 14, 1985.

Feast: April 30.

Bibliography: P. VON MALLINCKRODT, Kurzer Lebensabriß unserer teuren Würdigen Mutter und Stifterin Pauline v. Mallinckrodt, von ihr selbst verfaßt (Paderborn 1889). T. BARKEY, Damit ihr Leben gelingen kann (Paderborn 1984). A. BUNGERT, Pauline v. Mallinckrodt, (Würzburg 1980). K. BURTON, Whom Love Impels: The Life of Mother Pauline von Mallinckrodt, Foundress of the Sisters of Christian Charity (New York 1952). J. J. DEGENHARDT, Dienstbereit in der Liebe Christi (Paderborn 1985). BR. ERNEST, A Happy Heart: A Story of Mother Pauline von Mallinckrodt (Notre Dame, Ind. 1956). C. FRENKE, Pauline v. Mallinckrodt in ihrer Zeit (Paderborn 1984). A. HÜFFER, Pauline von Mallinckrodt 2d. ed. (Münster 1902). The Life of Mother Pauline von Mallinckrodt, Foundress of the Sisters of Christian Charity (New York 1917). A. METTE, Die Liebe zählt nicht-nur die Liebe zählt (Paderborn 1985). L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 19 (1985): 6-8. K. SANDER-WIETFELD, Pauline von Mallinckrodt: Ein Lebensbild nach ihrer Briefen und Aufzeichnungen (Paderborn 1985). A. SCH-MITTDIEL, Pauline von Mallinckrodt (Paderborn 1949). SISTERS OF CHRISTIAN CHARITY (U.S.), Enriching Many (Mendham, N.J. 1942). D. WEDMORE, The Woman Who Couldn't Be Stopped (Mendham, N.J. 1986).

[N. BACKMUND]

MALMÉDY, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of LIÈGE in the Province of Liège, Belgium (Latin Malmundariense). The abbey was founded on the banks of the Ambleve near the forest of the Ardennes c. 650 by Sigebert III of Austrasia, at the instance of St. Remaclus of Aguitaine (d. 672), former monk of LUXEUIL and former abbot of SOLIGNAC. The church was dedicated to SS. Peter and Paul, Our Lady, and St. John the Baptist. At a site near Malmédy, Remaclus simultaneously created the sister abbey of STAVELOT. This double MONASTERY, embracing a territory 12 miles in circumference, first followed the Columban-Benedictine Rule. A single abbot generally ruled both monasteries, but in the course of centuries the primacy was disputed between the two communities. In 862 LOTHAIR II began to distribute the considerable goods of the double abbey and to name lay abbots. St. Odilo, monk of GORZE and then abbot of Stavelot-Malmédy (938–954) introduced the monastic reform, and Emperor OTTO I granted the monks freedom to elect their abbot. Abbot Werinfrid (954–980) obtained from Bp. Notker of Liège a charter that promoted the supremacy of Stavelot over Malmédy.

When Malmédy was restored and reconstituted, the Council of Ingelheim in 980 imposed on both monasteries a single abbot who was chosen by the monks of Stavelot. From 1020 to 1048, POPPO, first auxiliary to Richard of Saint-Vanne (d. 1046), ruled the double abbey and distinguished himself by his reforming activity in Belgium and Germany. The monastery entered a period of intense artistic and literary activity during the 11th century. In the following century, Abbot WIBALD maintained discipline, continued the abbey's literary activity, and put its finances on a solid footing, serving at the same time as an imperial administrator. Wibald was abbot also of MONTE CASSINO (1137) and CORVEY (1146); he died on mission to the Byzantine Emperor Manuel I Comnenus, leaving an important correspondence. In the 15th century, the monastery declined at a rapid pace. Under Henry of Mérode (d. 1460) there were only eight monks at Stavelot and nine at Malmédy. In the 16th century the abbey was administered by princes of the House of BA-VARIA and in the 17th century by the Fürstenberg family. Both monasteries were sacked during the wars between the empire and France in 1689. Abbot Nicholas Massin (1731–37) worked at restoring discipline; and in 1784 under Jacques de Hulin, the abbey church of Malmédy, which still stands today, was consecrated. During the FRENCH REVOLUTION the monks were expelled, and on Oct. 1, 1795, France annexed the principalities of Liège and Stavelot-Malmédy. The monastery buildings today house a school and a law court.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:1719–20. J. MABILLON, Annales ordinis s. Benedicti . . . , 6 v. (Lucca 1739–45), v. 1–5, tables. Gallia Christiana, v. 1–13 (Paris 1715–85) 3:724. U. BERLIÈRE, Monasticon belge, 2 v. (Bruges 1890–1955) 2:84ff. N. PIETKIN, ''Vieux Malmédy,'' Terre Wallonne 2 (1920) 407–421. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 15.2:1669–73. A. DELVAUX DE FENFFE, Les Abbés et princes-abbés des abbayes de Malmédy du XIIe au XVIIe siècle (Tongres 1935).

[J. DAOUST]

MALMESBURY, ABBEY OF

Malmesbury Abbey, located on a hilltop at the southern edge of the Cotswolds, had its origins in a monastery built in the late seventh century. An Irish monk, Maidulph, arrived in England around the year 642 and established a hermitage and school there near the river Bladon. He chose a very strategic location for his school; in the sixteenth century, the antiquarian John Leland wrote "The toun of Malmesbyri stondith on the very toppe of a greate slay rok, and ys wonderfully defended by nature." Several years after Maidulph established his school, a young monk named ALDHELM, who was a relative of King Ine of Wessex, came to study with him. Ald-helm also studied at Canterbury under St. Adrian the African, and later in Rome. William of Malmesbury, who in the twelfth century chronicled the Abbey's history, wrote that after Aldhelm returned to England, he received a land grant at "Meildulfesburh" (Malmesbury) from Leutherius, bishop of the West Saxons, in 672. In the document, Bishop Leutherius praised Aldhelm for his education and devotion to the church, and he gave him land "for the purpose of leading a life according to strict rule." Aldhelm returned to the site of his old school, and there founded a flourishing Benedictine monastery. As Aldhelm was much revered by his contemporaries, the site soon became a popular center of pilgrimage.

Malmesbury Abbey. (©Philippa Lewis; Edifice/CORBIS)

Malmesbury claims to be the oldest borough in England, having allegedly received a charter in 880 from King Alfred (r. 871–899). Half a century later, Alfred's grandson, King Athelstan (r. 925–939) used Malmesbury as a base of operations from which to fight the Danes that had encroached upon southern England. He contributed many religious relics and other gifts to the abbey, further enhancing its appeal to pilgrims and scholars. After Athelstan died at Gloucester, his body was brought to Malmesbury for burial; legend has it that he was buried under the High Altar.

In 1010, an extraordinary event happened at Malmesbury. Eilmer, a young monk, fastened wings to his arms and feet, and flew from the top of the abbey tower. According to WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, who most likely had heard the story as a youth, Eilmer flew about 600 feet before he panicked, lost altitude and landed rather suddenly, breaking both legs. He was undeterred, however, and was planning his second flight, this time with a tail to provide him with more stability, when his abbot declared there were to be no further attempts at flight.

Malmesbury's most famous occupant was the historian William of Malmesbury, (c. 1095–1143) author of De Gestis Regem Anglorum (Deeds of the Kings of the English), which chronicled England's history from the arrival of the Saxons to 1120; De Gestis Pontificium Anglorum (Deeds of the Archbishops and Bishops of the English), which recorded the ecclesiastical history of England from the arrival of the missionary St. Augustine of Canterbury to 1125; and the Historia Novella (Recent History), which recounted King Stephen's reign. A student of the Scriptures, hagiography, theology, the classics, and civil and cannon law, William represents a "golden age" for Malmesbury Abbey. He was perhaps the most popular English historian of his time; son of one Norman and one English parent, he was educated at Malmesbury under Abbot Godfrey (ruled 1087–91?), and later he became a monk there. As a child he had helped Abbot Godfrey in the library and apparently learned to love such work. William collected many historical and legal documents, and while he might have been Abbot of Malmesbury, he apparently preferred the the library, holding the office of librarian. He is considered the finest and most accurate historian of his generation; certainly he was one of the most prolific. Among his other works were the Life of St. Wulfstan of Worcester, On the Antiquity of the Church of Glastonbury, and the Life of St. Dunstan, among many other saint's lives.

The present building was begun shortly after William's death and consecrated in 1180. This Romanesque church was renowned for its remarkable sculptured friezes of biblical history and of the apostles in the South Porch. It was expanded over the next few centuries, and eventually had one of the tallest spires in England. This spire, along with the east end choir, lady chapels and several other areas of the abbey, were destroyed in a great storm of 1470; they were not replaced for lack of money. In 1539, HENRY VIII dissolved the monastery and sold the land and buildings to William Stumpe, a wealthy clothier. Stumpe used the monastery as a textile manufacturing site for two years, and then he decided to donate it back to the people of Malmesbury. On August 20, 1541, Malmesbury became a parish church.

Over the ensuing centuries, the abbey began to decay, until it was finally being used to store hay and keep animals. In the early twentieth century, however, major renovations were begun on the abbey. The local landowners and manor houses contributed greatly toward the upkeep of the abbey, as they were, according to the Curator of Malmesbury, the only ones with the money to do so. In 1928, the floor, which was said to have had a surface like a ploughed field, was taken down six inches to its original level; the choir stalls were then introduced, the long pews removed, and King Athelstan's tomb moved to a more convenient position. That same year, the building was re-consecrated and a Bishop of Malmesbury was appointed. Today, while Malmesbury is still referred to as an abbey historically, it does not function as such.

Bibliography: D. DUMVILLE, Wessex and England from Alfred to Edgar (Woodbridge 1992). J. MORRIS, ed. Domesday Book: Wiltshire (Chichester 1977). R. THOMSON, William of Malmesbury (Woodbridge 1986). R. THOMSON and M. WINTERBOTTOM, ed. William of Malmesbury: Gesta Regum Anglorum (Oxford 1999).

MALONE, SYLVESTER

Parish priest, social reformer; b. Trim, County Meath, Ireland, May 8, 1821; d. Williamsburg, N.Y., Dec. 29, 1899. His parents, Laurence and Marcella (Martin) Malone, sent him for his early education to an academy run by the Protestant Carroll brothers. He later said that this offered him an early breadth of viewpoint. In 1838 Rev. Andrew Byrne of New York induced him to study for the priesthood. He started his theological studies at St. Joseph's Seminary, New York, and he was ordained on Aug. 15, 1844, for that diocese, which included the states of New York and New Jersey. In September of 1844 he was assigned to a parish in Williamsburg (later part of Brooklyn, N.Y.), a village of 5,000 that included 500 Catholics. He reported 37 years later that 25 parishes had been erected within his original parish of SS. Peter and Paul. As pastor he constructed a Gothic church, the first designed by Patrick C. Keely, leading architect of the time; zealously cared for immigrants; and increased his flock to 5,000 within a decade. In 1866 he was Bp. John Loughlin's theologian at the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore.

Malone attracted wide attention by his public positions. He was an abolitionist and a Republican. When he received word of the surrender of Fort Sumter to the Confederates, he ran up an American flag at the foot of the cross on his church steeple. He later recalled that no parishioners protested, despite the crosscurrents of opinion in the area. After the Civil War, he toured the South and, when he returned, spoke on behalf of the rights of African Americans. Although he visited and admired Cardinal Henry Manning, he became a strong supporter of the Irish Land League. Malone adopted liberal views on a variety of civic subjects, and these were widely publicized in the New York press. He was himself, as he wrote to Leo XIII in defense of Dr. Edward MCGLYNN, "the advocate of temperance and of every good cause that works for the public good." As a defender of the public schools, he was supported by Hamilton Fish and Abp. John Ireland for a Catholic vacancy on the New York Board of Regents. Because the bishops of the state had supported Bp. Bernard MCQUAID, some interpreted his election in 1894 as a victory for the anti-Catholic faction. When he died, he was still pastor of the parish that he had founded.

Bibliography: J. K. SHARP, History of the Diocese of Brooklyn, 1853–1953, 2 v. (New York 1954).

[L. A. LEHTOLA]

[F. E. FITZPATRICK]

MALTA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Malta is located 58 miles south of Sicily, in the central Mediterranean. The Maltese islands comprise Malta, Gozo (26 square miles), Comino (1 square mile) and a number of uninhabited rocky islets. Low, rocky plains characterize the region, which contains deposits of limestone, with cliffs edging the sea. With its Mediterranean climate, the region produces a variety of crops, including vegetables, grapes, wheat, barley, citrus and cut flowers, although the lack of fresh water continues to be problematic.

Allotted to Constantinople in A.D. 533, the islands fell to Saracens in the late 9th century, and with the Norman conquest in 1090 became a dependency of SICILY. In 1530 CHARLES V gave the region to the KNIGHTS OF MALTA, an equestrian order who were for the most part French. Under the Knights, Malta served as a Christian bulwark against the OTTOMAN TURKS. Napoleon expelled the Knights in 1798 but, with the failure of his expedition to Egypt, could not hold Malta itself. A British protectorate from 1800 to 1964, Malta flourished but suffered heavily from Italian and German bombing in World War II. Independent in the British Commonwealth after 1964, Malta became an independent republic in 1974 and by 2000 was debating a decision to join the European Union. The capital of Malta, Valletta, is named after Jean de LA VALETTE, who led Malta's heroic defense against a siege of the Turks in 1565. By the late 20th century, Malta was the most densely populated country in Europe; more than half the population was under 40 years of age.

History. With large prehistoric monuments, Malta was held by Phoenicians from the 16th to 10th centuries B.C., and perhaps also by Greeks, before it came under the sway of CARTHAGE c. 480 B.C.. The region was conquered by Rome 200 years later and named Melita. In A.D. 60, after being shipwrecked, St. Paul stayed on Malta for three months and founded the region's first Christian community under Publius. Several early Christian catacombs and a few Christian inscriptions in Latin and Greek survive. Maltese Bishop Julianus (Lucianus) sided with Pope Vigilius in the THREE CHAPTERS Schism (553), bringing Malta to the Byzantine Church which controlled the region for the next 300 years; Lucillus was deposed by Pope Gregory the Great (598) and was succeeded by Trajanus, formerly the abbot of a monastery in Syracuse. In 870 the Ottoman Turks invaded the region. Manas (868-874) was imprisoned in Palermo, and no further bishops appear, for freedom of religion was restricted and church buildings were neglected.

Following the Norman conquest of the region in the 11th century, Malta was linked with Sicily and fell under Capital: Valletta. Size: 95 sq. miles.

Population: 391,670 in 2000.

Languages: English, Maltese (a Semitic language). Religions: 382,870 Catholics (98%), 2,500 Muslims (.6%), 379,370 Protestants (1.2%), 1,000 Jews (.2%).

Archdiocese: On the main island of Malta, with suffragan on the island of Gozo (created 1864).

a series of rulers: Hohenstaufen from 1194, Angevins from 1266, Aragon from 1283, Castile from 1412 and the Hapsburg empire from 1516. In 1090 Roger I of Sicily initiated a Christian revival in the islands. The cathedral and its chapter became famous, and from Walter (1090), Malta's bishop list is nearly complete. At first immediately subject to the Holy See, the diocese became suffragan to Palermo in 1154. Maurus Calì (1393–1408) was a prominent jurist. Five mendicant orders founded houses in the 14th and 15th centuries, and two convents of Benedictine nuns were established.

The 1530 cession of Malta to the Knights and the 1575 apostolic visitation by Pietro Duzina opened a new era in the island's ecclesiastical, political and cultural history. Friction between the bishops and the Knights concerning jurisdiction, together with the spread of heresy and superstition, led to the establishment of the Inquisition (1574–1798). The reforms of TRENT, under resident bishops brought about general religious improvement. Baldassare Cagliares (1615–33) convoked three synods and performed five visitations. Priests were well trained in religious novitiates at the seminary (from 1617), and the Jesuit college (1592), which became the university (1769). Parishes and religious foundations increased in number. In 1797 Pius VI added the titular archbishopric of Rhodes to Malta but kept Malta suffragan to Palermo. In 1797 Czar Paul I of Russia asserted his protection of the Knights, of whom he was elected grand master in 1798. Napoleon, who promised to safeguard Malta's Catholicism, sanctioned the expulsion of foreign clerics and the closing of several monasteries, transferred marriages to the civil authorities, prohibited appeals to the pope and despoiled the churches of their riches. The angry Maltese, under Canon Francis X Caruana (who became bishop in 1831) and aided by British and Portuguese fleets, forced the surrender of the French in 1800.

In 1814 Malta formally came under the protection of British commissioners and governors, who maintained peaceful and amicable relations with the Church but occasionally encroached on its rights. When the king of Naples and the British disputed the right to appoint the bishop of Malta in 1829, Gregory XVI removed the see from the jurisdiction of Palermo and again made it immediately subject to the Holy See. The British sanctioned laws contrary to Canon Law, which was observed in Malta. The rights of sanctuary and clerical immunity, except for bishops, were abolished; ecclesiastical jurisdiction was restricted to purely spiritual matters, and a law controlling MORTMAIN was introduced. A political-religious clash in 1928 followed the appointment of Lord Strickland to office. Negotiations between the British and the Holy See failed, and the constitution was suspended (1930–32) and revoked (1933–36). A new constitution (1939–46) was followed by self-government in 1947. In 1944 the hierarchy was established. A political crisis in 1958 caused the revocation of the constitution a year later and the issuance of a new constitution in 1961. Malta became independent on Sept. 14, 1964.

Following independence, the new government adopted a more secular policy, which was reflected by the constitution promulgated on Dec. 13, 1974, when it became a republic. Under this constitution, Roman Catholicism was still declared the state religion, divorce continued to be banned and Catholic instruction in all schools was compulsory. While conflicts arose between the Church and the government over the funding of Catholic schools and the ownership of Church property, a 1985 commission was established that resolved many of these conflicts. While the state continued to subsidize Church schools, it did so through a foundation with contributions from both the state and the Church. Under the 1991 Ecclesiastical Entitles Act, the Church transferred ownership rights of its non-pastoral property to this foundation. By 2000 there were 80 parishes tended by 491 diocesan and 451 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 90 brothers and 1,310 sisters, who aided in the Church's educational programs. Estimates showed that in 2000, 65 percent of Maltese Catholics attended mass on a regular basis. In 1998 the Knights of Malta celebrated their 900th anniversary, which event was honored by the Vatican through a gift of fort St. Angelo, where Maltese hero La Valette repulsed a Turkish siege in 1565. The Order, founded in the 12th century to protect pilgrims traveling to the Holy Land, had 11,500 members worldwide and engaged in humanitarian efforts that included operating hospitals in the Middle East. Pope John Paul II visited the region for the second time in May of 2001, during a pilgrimage in the footsteps of St. Paul.

Bibliography: A. BONNICI, Church and State in Malta: 1800–50 (La Vallette 1958); Ecclesiastical History of Malta (Malta 1966). A. A. FERRIS, Storia ecclesiastica di Malta (Malta 1877). P. DE BONO, Sommario della storia della legislazione a Malta (Malta 1897). W. HARDMAN, History of Malta: 1798–1815 (London 1909). A. V. LAFERLA, The Story of Man in Malta (Malta 1935); British Malta, 2 v. (Malta 1938–47). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, eds., F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10.1:1318–42. Bilan du Monde 2:590–593. Annuario Pontificio.

[A. BONNICI/EDS.]

MALTHUS, THOMAS ROBERT

English economist; b. near Guildford, Surrey, England, Feb. 14, 1776; d. Bath, England, Dec. 29, 1834. Malthus was an Anglican clergyman but devoted much attention to economics. In 1805 he became professor of history and political economy at the East India Company's college in Haileybury. Although best known for his theory of population, Malthus also contributed to other topics in economics, especially the theory of market gluts.

Malthus's Essay on Population (1st ed. 1798) was primarily an answer to the "Utopian" writings of William Godwin, who argued that poverty and misery were the result of social institutions and could be cured by the elimination of private property, inheritance, and social classes. In rebuttal, Malthus argued that there is a "natural tendency" for population to increase at a geometric rate. Food production, however, would grow less rapidly, being governed by the law of diminishing returns. The result would be increasing misery, pestilence, and war, which would increase the death rate to match the birth rate and hold population stable. Although without optimism, later editions of the Essay discussed the possibility that "preventive checks" on birth rate could lessen the need for the previously mentioned "positive checks" on the population. Among the preventive checks discussed were moral restraint and postponement of marriage. Contraception, as advocated by later neo-Malthusians, was not mentioned by Malthus and would probably have been opposed by him.

In his theory of market gluts Malthus emphasized effective demand and the necessity to keep purchasing power sufficiently high in order to purchase the output that can be produced. J. M. Keynes gives Malthus credit for being the major forerunner of the ideas he put forth in his General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money (London 1936). Malthus has been both praised and condemned, especially for his population theory, but there is little doubt of his significant contributions to the understanding of the economic process.

Bibliography: T. R. MALTHUS, An Essay on the Principle of Population (London 1798); Principles of Political Economy (London 1820). J. M. KEYNES, Essays in Biography (New York 1933). J. BONAR, Malthus and His Work (London 1885).

[J. P. MCKENNA]

MALVENDA, TOMÁS

Dominican theologian, historian, and exegete; b. Játiva, Spain, May 1566; d. Valencia, May 7, 1628. While still a young professor of sacred sciences, Malvenda so impressed C. BARONIUS with his critique (published in 1600) of that scholar's Annales Ecclesiastici that he was invited in the following year to Rome, where he assisted in emendations on this work and on Baronius's recension of the Roman Martyrology. At Rome Malvenda was the principal reviser of the Dominican Breviary, Martyrology, and Missal; and here he annotated Brasichelli's Librorum prohibitorum index expurgatorius, edited M. de La Bigne's Biblotheca SS. Patrum, gathered material for his Annales O.P. (published in 1627 without his approval), and wrote De Antichristo libri XI (1604) and De paradiso voluptatis (1605). After returning to Spain in 1608, when he was made provincial of the Aragon Dominican province, he undertook a literal Latin translation of the Hebrew OT, with commentary, which reached Ez 16.16 at the time of his death. It was later published as Commentaria in S. Scripturam, una cum nova de verbo in verbum ex hebraeo translatione . . . (5 v. Lyons 1650).

See Also: MARTYROLOGIES.

Bibliography: J.QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.1:454–457. Monumenta Ordinis Fratrum Praedicatorum Historica 11:62, 77, 84. H. HURT-ER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 13 3:763–767.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

MALVERN, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE monastery dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, in the county and Diocese of WORCES-TER, England. St. WULFSTAN, bishop of Worcester, inspired its foundation c. 1085 under Prior Aldwin. It became c. 1090 a dependency of WESTMINSTER ABBEY under the BENEDICTINE RULE and was known as Great Malvern priory. This connection with Westminster led to frequent disputes with the bishop of Worcester, until in 1283 Edward I ruled in favor of the priory's independence. Much fine building there was directed by Henry VII's architect, Sir Reginald Bray. Windows were filled with beautiful glass, some panels depicting the priory's history. In 1540, despite Bishop LATIMER's pleading, the priory was suppressed and pensions granted to the prior and ten monks. The church was bought by the townsmen for use as their parish church.

Bibliography: W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73); best ed. by J. CALEY et al., 6 v. (1817–30) 3:440–454. The Victoria History of the County of Worcester, ed. J. W. B. WILLIS-BUND et al., 4 v. (Westminster, Eng. 1901–24) v. 2.

[F. R. JOHNSTON]

MAMERTUS OF VIENNE, ST.

Bishop of Vienne, France, c. 461–475. Nothing certain is known of his early life or family except that he was the brother of CLAUDIANUS MAMERTUS. He was rebuked by Pope HILARY for appointing a bishop to Die, a suffragan diocese of ARLES; he was condemned by a synod at Arles, and apparently submitted. In his own diocese he promoted the cult of St. FERREOLUS. Mamertus is best known for organizing ROGATION processions, or Minor Litanies, the prayers of the people in time of calamity. It is not known whether his Rogations were held before or after Ascension Day, but it is certain that they were continued by his successors and prescribed for all Gaul by the Council of Orléans in 511. He is buried in the church of St. Peter at Vienne.

Feast: May 11.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. F. KALTENBRUNNER, 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1:76. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (2d ed.

Paris 1970–15) 1:205. Acta Sanctorum May 2:628–631. SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, Epistulae, bk. 4, ch. 11; bk. 5, ch. 1 in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores antiquissimi (Berlin 1826–) v.8. HILARY, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistulae (Berlin 1826–) 3:28–32. GREGORY OF TOURS, De passione et virtutibus sancti Iuliani martyris, ch. 2 in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 1:565. AVITUS, "Homilia de rogationibus," Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 59:289–294. H. G. J. BECK, The Pastoral Care of Souls in South-East France during the Sixth Century (Analecta Gregoriana 51; 1950) 104–108, 290.

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

MAMMON

New Testament term for wealth, derived through the late-Latin mammona from the Greek μαμωνάς, a transliteration of the Aramaic māmônā', "emphatic state," corresponding to the late-Hebrew māmôn, "financial gain, riches," probably a contraction of hypothetical ma'ămōn, "thing entrusted, deposit, security." The Hebrew word māmôn occurs in the Old Testament only in Sir 31.8 ("gain"), but it is found in the Dead Sea Scrolls, the TALMUD, and modern Hebrew. In the New Testament the term occurs in Mt 6.24; Lk 16.9, 11, 13. In Lk 16.9–13 it serves as a catchword to connect three sayings of Jesus. Verse 9 serves to explain the preceding parable: the disciples too, are to exercise cleverness, but in their case, by giving in charity to the poor their wealth (called "wicked" because acquired so often unjustly) in order to provide an eternal home for themselves. In verses 10 through 12 earthly goods are called "a very little thing,""wicked mammon," and "what belongs to another." Those who rightly use them will be entrusted with heavenly goods, which, by way of contrast, are called "much," "true," and "what is your own." A different aspect is expressed in Lk 16.13 and Mt 6.24: riches are here personified and contrasted with God. This personification, however, is purely literary; there actually never was a pagan god or demon called "Mammon," as is sometimes wrongly supposed.

Bibliography: E. HAUCK, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935) 4:390–392. J. SCHMID, Das Evangelium nach Lukas (4th ed. Regensburg 1960).

[C. BERNAS]

MAN, ARTICLES ON

In the Encyclopedia, "man" is frequently used in a non-gender-specific way, most typically when man is considered as a theological or philosophical entity. The principal article is MAN (1. In the Bible; 2. In Philosophy; 3. In Theology). For the science that examines the Christian understanding of man, see ANTHROPOLOGY, THEO-LOGICAL and CHRISTIAN ANTHROPOLOGY. For articles that deal specifically with women, see WOMAN; WOMEN IN THE BIBLE; WOMEN AND PAPAL TEACHING.

Throughout the Encyclopedia man is considered from a variety of perspectives. For the origin of man see, e.g., CREATION; SOUL, HUMAN, ORIGIN OF. There are several articles that deal with human nature and its supernatural fulfillment, e.g., MAN, NATURAL END OF; SUPERNATURAL: GRACE AND NATURE: PURE NATURE. STATE OF; DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; SUPERNATURAL EX-ISTENTIAL; DESIRE TO SEE GOD, NATURAL; ELEVATION OF MAN. In the area of moral theology the principal articles are MORAL THEOLOGY and MORAL THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF; see also NATURAL LAW. There are in addition general articles on social justice (SOCIAL THOUGHT, CATHOLIC; SO-CIAL THOUGHT, PAPAL), sexual morality (SEX; SEX [IN THE BIBLE]), and medical ethics (MEDICAL ETHICS), as well as individual articles on various virtues, vices, and ethical issues (e.g., JUSTICE; LYING; HUMAN GENOME). Spirituality is understood in the Encyclopedia as part of anthropology. The general article is SPIRITUALITY, CHRISTIAN; there are also articles on various approaches of spirituality (e.g., CARMELITE SPIRITUALITY; SPIRITUALITY, RHE-NISH; LAY SPIRITUALITY) and terms and concepts important in the history of Christian spirituality (e.g., EC-STASY; RAPTURE; HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF).

[G. F. LANAVE]

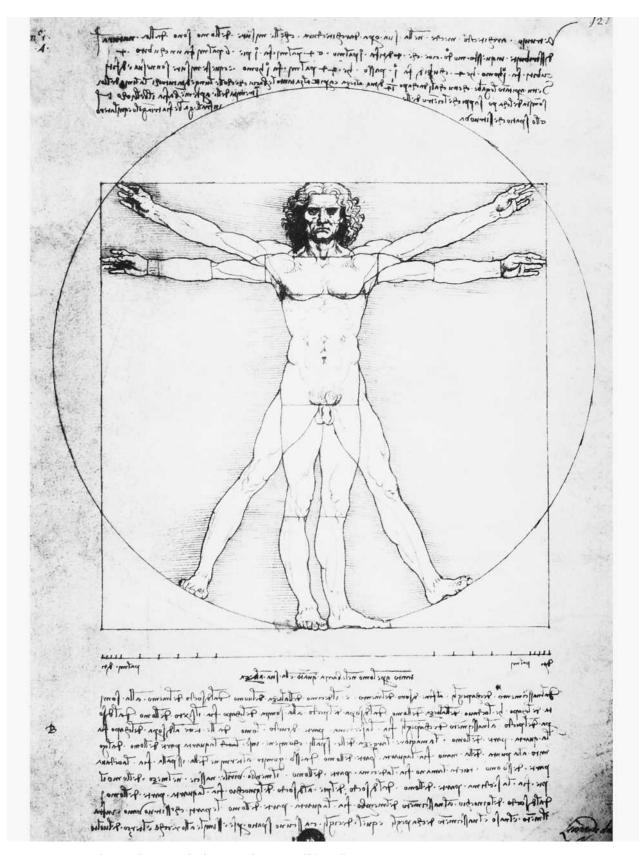

MAN

Man here is an inclusive term taken to mean the human being or humankind in general. This article treats of man (1) in the Bible, (2) in philosophy, and (3) in theology.

IN THE BIBLE

The Bible views man existentially, not essentially. In the Bible there is no dichotomy of body and soul. The man is the "I" who receives, feels, thinks, and loves. Thus, such concepts as soul [see SOUL (IN THE BIBLE)], spirit [see SPIRIT (IN THE BIBLE)], heart [see HEART (IN THE BIBLE)], flesh are all designations of the "I" under different aspects. The Bible teaches that man is the highest creature and the center of the visible universe. In the Old Testament, until late, man's destination is SHEOL (see AFTERLIFE, 2). In the New Testament man's end is eternal happiness or sorrow.

The Old Testament concept of man may be considered under two headings: that of Gn ch. 1–3, and the idea as found in the rest of the Old Testament. In Gn 1.1–2.4a man is the epitome of creation. He comes at the end of creation. Introduced by God's deliberation—"let us make" (Gn 1.26)—man names the animals, a manifestation of his mastery. Man alone is made to the IMAGE OF GOD (Gn 1.26–27). In the anthropomorphic account of Gn 2.4b–3.24, man is the center of creation around whom all other creatures revolve. All things are made for man. Raised to friendship with God [see GRACE (IN THE BIBLE)], man disobeyed and was punished. Thus, Genesis ch. 1–3 teaches man's excellence, friendship with God, his fall, and the divine promise of help.

"Vitruvian Man," drawing by Leonardo da Vinci. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

The rest of the Old Testament considers man's destiny, his maker, and his holiness in the sight of God. Both good and bad are destined for Sheol, a place where all go after death. The notion of an afterlife of happiness or punishment is not found in revelation until c. 160 B.C. in the books of Wisdom, Daniel, and Maccabees. Reward in the Old Testament came in the form of God's blessings here on earth; the divine blessing guaranteed a long life, prosperity, property, and progeny. Responsibility was corporate as well as individual [see RESPONSIBILITY (IN THE BIBLE)].

Man's maker was ultimately God. The conception of man was considered a marvelous event [see Jb 10.8–12; Ps 118(119).73]. The conservation of man depended on Almighty God.

After the Fall, man was inwardly renewed and spiritually transformed by the grace of God and faith [Gn 15.6; Ps 23(24).3–4]: "Be holy, for I, the Lord, your God, am holy" (Lv 19.2; 11.44; 20.26). He is a jealous God who demands holiness of His people (Jos 24.19) and punishes those who violate His holiness (1 Sm 6.20; 2 Sm 6.6–12). In messianic times, according to Deutero-Isaiah, man's spiritual renewal would be mediated by the Servant of the Lord (Is 41.14; 43.3, 14; 47.4; see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF). God's people were obliged to be holy because they were closely bound to Him by the covenant. This collective holiness (Lv 20.26; Dt 7.6; 26.19; Is 63.18; Jer 2.3) presupposed individual holiness, for the pious are called holy by reason of the holiness of their personal lives [Ps 15 (16).3; 33 (34).10; Is 4.3; 6.13; Dt 7.18, 27]. [See FAITH, 1; HOLINESS (IN THE BIBLE); HOLI-NESS, LAW OF.]

In the New Testament many of the terms and expressions regarding man were borrowed from the Old Testament. However, such concepts as immortality, a deeper and wider revelation about the supernatural life, and heaven [see HEAVEN (IN THE BIBLE)] and hell [see HELL (IN THE BIBLE)] were more developed in the New Testament.

Paul moreover distinguishes the "old man" and the "new man," the "outer man" and the "inner man," and lastly the "first Adam" and the "last Adam." According to St. Paul, the old man was fallen human nature; the new man was a new creation that was effected by Baptism. By this Sacrament man was gifted with the Holy Spirit and was already risen with Christ. In sum, the old man—that is, fallen human nature—was recreated into Christ (Rom 6.6; Eph 4.22; Col 3.9). Again, according to St. Paul, the outer man designates man's tendency to sin; the inner man his tendency to virtue. There is a struggle between the outer man and the inner man, that is, between the two tendencies in man. The struggle, when victorious, will complete the new creation so that a person will live in holiness and justice toward God (2 Cor 4.16; Rom 7.22; Eph 3.16). Paul uses the terms "first Adam" and "last Adam." The first Adam was earthly and actually sinful; the second Adam is the heavenly Christ and sinless. The first Adam brought sin into the world. The second or last Adam reverses what the first Adam had done and achieves justification and glorification for those who accept Him (1 Cor 15.45, 47; Rom 5.12, 18; 8.1–39).

Thus, man in the Bible is the total existing being. With the fullness of Christ's revelation, man knows his final dwelling is not Sheol but heaven or hell. Raised after the first man's fall, he is aided against the tendency to sin by God's grace. His struggle is not without assurance of victory since he is risen (1 Cor ch. 15) with "The Man, Jesus Christ" (1 Tm 2.5).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1426-29. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 7:284-287. A. S. KAPELRUD and N. A. DAHL, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 4:861-867. W. EICHRODT, Man in the Old Testament, tr. K. and R. GREGOR SMITH (Chicago 1951); Theology of the Old Testament, tr. J. A. BAKER (Philadelphia 1961-). R. BULTMANN, Theology of the New Testament, tr. K. GROBEL, 2 v. (New York 1951-55) 1:190-259. M. BAILY, "Biblical Man and Some Formulae of Christian Teaching," The Irish Theological Quarterly 27 (1960) 173-200. E. HILL, Being Human: A Biblical Perspective (London 1984). U. SCHNELLE, The Human Condition: Anthropology in the Teachings of Jesus, Paul, and John, tr. O. C. DEAN, JR. (Minneapolis 1996).

[W. E. LYNCH]

IN PHILOSOPHY

The term man seems to be derived from a Sanskrit root meaning to think. Should this etymology be correct, it gives an indication that thought was early considered a distinctive characteristic of man. For the Greek $\alpha\nu\theta\rho\omega$ no convincing etymological explanation is given. Some consider it to signify "the one that looks up (i.e., to the gods) from below"; if so, this would express both a distinction and a certain kinship between man and God. The etymology of the Latin homo is more certain: it is derived from humus meaning earth or soil. The meaning seems to be either genetic, that man had his origin from the earth or was made out of earth; or more general, that man by his very nature is akin to earth. The same etymological connection and derivation is found in the Hebrew: Adam-adama. [See ADAM]

"Judgement of Adam and Eve," engraving by William Blake. (©Burstein Collection/CORBIS)

From such indications one learns that on the one hand man has an essential relation to earth, that he belongs to the earthly sphere below, and on the other that he is a thinking being, and so has contact with the gods, although he is different from them. This shows that man is something of a paradox—he is bound to earth by his nature, and yet transcends earth by his mind. This kind of dualism, more explicitly expressed as that between mind and body or between soul and body, constitutes one of the most difficult and constant problems in a philosophical understanding of man. (See SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP.)

Similarly, reflection about himself shows man that he has something in common with other realities: he is a body, a living being, an animal, akin to the transcendent world of divinity—in a word, he is a microcosm, containing all things within himself. On the other hand, he is aware of his unique nature and searches for proper characteristics that distinguish himself from other beings. Such reflection gives further indication of a duality in man's nature.

Early Greek Thought. The Greek conception of man is derived from two distinct sources: one, mythology, explains man's origin, nature, and condition as the result of the activity of the gods; the other, cosmology (partly dependent upon mythology and partly opposed to it, but becoming increasingly independent), offers a profane, realistic, and rational consideration of man. This awakening philosophical reflection was focused on the phenomenal world and thus studied man in the context of a philosophy of nature.

Although somewhat opposed, both the religious-mythological and the rational-naturalistic approaches led to a cosmic conception of man. In this context various an-thropina or human characteristics, later useful for an accurate determination of man's nature, were developed in a half-mythological, half-philosophical way. Protagoras (5th century B.C.) stressed how animals are well equipped to defend themselves against enemies, are protected from cold by their furs, and have food available for them, whereas man lacks all these natural advantages. Instead he possesses wisdom, and this enables him to provide, by art and industry, what nature had not provided (see Plato, Prot. 321). Similar considerations are to be found, for example, in Diogenes of Appolonia (5th century B.C.). This author describes man as privileged by the gods, both in bodily equipment and in mental capacity. His upright position is superior to that of other animals, his vision is freed and broadened, his hands enable him to make tools and useful or beautiful objects, and his mouth and tongue are so disposed as to give the capacity for speech. More important still are the endowments of his mind: man has received a soul and is able to know the gods, to find remedies against illness, to acquire new knowledge, and to build human society. All of this makes man, although an earthly being, akin to the gods.

Aristotelian View. These ideas greatly influenced the further elaboration of a philosophical notion of man, particularly by Aristotle. Applying his hylomorphic and teleological conceptions to these and other data, Aristotle regarded man as the supreme being on earth, primarily spirit and capable of intellectual knowledge, but with a bodily constitution adapted to, and informed by, the spiritual soul in a type of matter-form composition (see MATTER AND FORM). Since FORM (here the human soul) is the dominant and determining factor from which every disposition and activity of matter flows, all features stressed by his predecessors, including those of the body, became so many manifestations of the spiritual nature of man.

Although he continued the cosmological tradition, regarding the study of man as part of the Physics, Aristotle stressed man's spiritual nature as transcending material conditions. He even considered the Nous as immaterial, as belonging to a nonbodily or spiritual realm, as coming from without, and as not mixed with the body. If such notions do not seem to fit into his hylomorphic doctrine, it should be noted that Aristotle not only discusses man in natural philosophy, but also treats of him in his Ethics and Politics; in the latter works, he develops more spiritual conceptions, defining man, for example, as ζῶον πολιτικόν. Difficulties of interpretation notwithstanding, one finds in Aristotle's works a highly technical, complex, and well-balanced conception of man that has had an immense influence on Western philosophy. The Stoa continued this Aristotelian line of development, stressing the logos as the most important element in man; their classical definition of the human being was ζῶον λογικόν.

Platonic Conceptions. The view of man offered by Plato, while not ignoring bodily aspects, had insisted more on man's spiritual nature and had tended to depreciate his body. This explains why the Platonic view appealed more than that of Aristotle to thinkers with a spiritualist orientation, particularly among the early Christians. In an oversimplified, almost Manichean way, the body was often considered as the enemy of the spiritual soul, and sexual pleasure in its human form—praised by Diogenes of Apollonia as one of man's privileges—began to be viewed as contrary to human dignity. St. GREGORY OF NYSSA, for example, taught that man originally had neither body nor sex and that both are due to sin. In St. Augustine and his school one finds similar exaggerations, overemphasizing the spirit and usually underestimating the role of the body in human nature.

Thomistic Synthesis. With the development of scholastic philosophy and the reintroduction of Aristotle in the West, a more classical view of man gradually reasserted itself. This conception found its most adequate expression in the doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas. Guided by the light of Christian revelation, Aquinas worked out a synthetic conception of man that was fundamentally Aristotelian, but also assimilated spiritualist notions that had not been completely integrated into the original Aristotelian position.

Substantial Unity. The body is an essential part of man, and has a positive value. Yet the body exists, not in its own right, but by virtue of the spiritual soul, which is a form in the most real sense and the unique substantial form of the body. This implies a type of DUALISM in the ontological structure of man that at the same time does not destroy his substantial unity. Since the body is only human through the soul, and the soul in turn determines the body, the body-soul union is not a mere juxtaposition of parts but rather the unity of a complex being. Notwithstanding its ontological function as a substantial form that is essentially related to the body, the human soul transcends the material world by its spirituality, and has in itself the adequate reason for its own existence. In this way the absolute primacy of spirit in man is safeguarded, without neglecting the essential role of the body. Such ontological transcendence of the human soul explains its immortality, notwithstanding its essential union with a mortal body. Again, despite a bodily conditioned earthly existence, man is called to an eternal destiny; and this is not only a tenet of Christian faith, but a property of human nature itself. (See SOUL, HUMAN; IMMORTALITY.)

Mind and Spirit. Since man's mind is capable of universal, unlimited knowledge, his perfection cannot be limited to earthly experiences. His mind has a capacity for the infinite. This kinship with divine reality, already stressed in Greek mythological conceptions of man, here becomes part of a philosophy of man. In this way it also becomes evident how man belongs both to the material and to the spiritual world. Sharing in materiality through his body and in spirituality through his mind, he is, in a way, the meeting place of both: the horizon et confinium spiritualis et corporalis naturae, the meeting point of time and eternity (C. gent. 2.68). Thus man, by that which is most noble in him, is essentially related to a world of spiritual values, which also includes God.

Free Will. The very fact of existing in a concrete, materially conditioned situation, and of discovering in and through this an unlimited degree of being and value (ens et bonum), is itself the ontological foundation of human freedom. Because man encounters different realities and situations not only as biological correlates, as is the case with animals, but under the transcendental notion of BEING, these do not appeal to him merely as limited biological values that stimulate determined reactions. And just as they appear to man's INTELLECT under the transcendental notion of being, to be delimited only on the horizon of being, so they appeal to man's WILL under the transcendental aspect of GOOD, on a universal horizon where their limited goodness becomes apparent. For this reason their appeal is always a limited one. While there is sufficient reason for desiring them, since they present man with a certain goodness, at the same time there is sufficient reason not to desire them, because the good they represent is itself limited. Thus man, by his very nature, is free—situated as it were at the intersection of material limitation and determination and of spiritual illimitability and transcendental openness. He is not compelled to act by any particular object that appeals to him. Dominating, as it were, every single appeal by his transcendental openness to good in the broadest possible sense, he has every particular appeal under his control. In other words, he is capable of autodetermination; he is free. (See FREE WILL; FREEDOM.)

Ethics and Morality. Human freedom opens up the entire realm of ETHICS or MORALITY, and this not by the mere introduction of a CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE, but by man's very nature as capable of active self-determination toward what he recognizes as good and suitable. When this is seen not only through philosophical reflection but also in the light of divine revelation, morality becomes more than an anonymous obligation; it is God's personal appeal to man's personal decision.

Nature and Supernature. Precisely because of this connatural openness to the transcendental, man is capable of knowledge and values beyond the limits of his natural possibilities, all the way to the supreme Transcendental, God Himself. This is not to be understood in the sense that man by his own capacities can actually attain God as He is in Himself. Yet, while lacking the active capacity to reach God in His intimate nature, man has the possibility of intimacy with God, provided that God Himself actively communicates Himself to man. Here is the link between man's natural and supernatural perfection. Thus, literally speaking, man by his own nature has the promise of a superhuman destiny. Seen in this light, the supernatural end of man that is revealed by Christian faith is not something inhuman, but appears as the highest achievement of human nature. In the Thomistic synthesis man is not only an animal rationale; he is also capax divinitatis, conceived and designed by the Creator to enter into personal contact with Him and to share in His own intimate life. Thus, what the Greek thinkers obscurely hinted at as man's kinship to the gods here becomes a profound philosophical synthesis that is open to theological development.

The Thomistic conception of man is thus philosophically complete and balanced, and at the same time agrees with the tenets of Catholic faith, thereby providing a framework for an understanding of the interplay between the natural and supernatural elements in man. To have explained this conception at length, however, need not imply that with St. Thomas thought about man came to a standstill, or that the following ages had nothing valuable to say about him.

Modern Thought. With R. DESCARTES, man's unity was replaced by a dualistic conception that sharply distinguished the res extensa from the res cogitans. In a way this stressed the spiritual nature of man; it also prepared the way for the homo noumenon of Kant, and, in general, for idealist conceptions that describe man as a manifestation of Absolute Spirit. Proposed at a time of limited religious and theological influence on philosophical thought, this led to a very high appreciation of human dignity. It also led, however, to an overemphasis of man's autonomy, resulting in the dangerous exaltation of Nietzsche's superman. In fact, the newly found autonomy appeared to be a burden too heavy for man to bear. One might consider the existentialist despair—describing man as "being unto death" (Heidegger) or stressing his absurdity, "man is a useless passion" (Sartre)—as a logical consequence of this overevaluation of man's autonomy, the breakdown of an illusion that was impossible to maintain. In this rather negative way, EXISTENTIALISM has contributed to a renewed and more realistic view of man, replacing an unreal rationalistic and idealistic, and ultimately inhuman, conception with the body-conditioned concept of an "incarnate spirit."

Paralleling this spiritualist Cartesian heritage there was also a mechanistic and materialistic heritage that was taken up by those interested in modern science and its development. This led, through the "hommemachine" concept of J. O. de La Mettrie, to L. Feuerbach's "Der Mensch ist was er isst (man is what he eats)." Marxist MATERIALISM is, in a way, the ultimate consequence of this materialistic conception, for here man is regarded as nothing but the highest form of organized matter. Scientific studies, especially the theory of human EVOLUTION, seemed at first to support a purely biological conception of man, explaining him in terms of his animal origin. More accurate study and analysis, however, have shown that an evolutionistic interpretation of man's origin does not explain away man's spirituality, but on the contrary, poses the problem of man's spiritual nature in a new and more urgent way. Some evolutionistic thinkers, such as P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, find in evolutionism a new and outstanding testimony of man's unique spiritual nature and destiny, thus making him the ultimate goal and achievement of the cosmos.

Karol Wojtyła. In the 1950s and 1960s, Father Karol Wojtyła (later Pope JOHN PAUL II) wrote several books dealing with the nature of man from the perspective of a personalist philosophy. Archbishop Wojtyła was influential in the writing of Vatican II's Gaudium et spes, which speaks at length of the person in the modern world. Many of his papal writings (e.g., the encyclicals REDEMPTOR HOMINIS, VERITATIS SPLENDOR, and LABOREM EXERCENS) reflect this same personalistic view.

In his philosophical writings Wojtyła argued that it is neither reason alone nor experience but the whole person who deliberates, selects, decides, and performs a moral action. It is with the integrity of the whole person in mind, therefore, that in his Lublin Lectures the young professor undertook a tour through the history of philosophy, gathering up the factors that enter into the constitution of the person who acts. He gathered these metaphysical factors first from Plato, who highlighted the Good as the supreme value in which the person is called to participate. While Aristotle retained the finality of the good, he also inscribed it in the rational nature of the individual. Moreover, Aristotle provided an account of how one becomes good, moving from the potentiality to the good to its actualization through action. Augustine drew upon Plato, but recognized the highest good as personal, so that Platonic participation is transformed into Augustinian love. The significance of Thomas Aquinas for Wojtyła is that he rooted the foregoing dynamic structure in the deepest source of actuality: in existential act (esse), so that what is good and true is so by virtue of its actual existence. Wojtyła continued his tour, spending considerable time in a critical study of Hume and Bentham; but the positive elements of his analysis are drawn from the metaphysical philosophers already mentioned. In sum, it is not the will or the consciousness, but the person, constituted in the unity of his being, who is the suppositum, the concrete, existing agent of moral action.

Having assembled his metaphysics of the person as the underlying foundation of ethical action, Wojtyła turned to phenomenology in order to analyze the action from within the agent. Because the horizon of understanding in metaphysics, and consequently its vocabulary, is comprehensive, embracing everything insofar as each is a member of the community of being, the intimate and interior experience of action itself does not fall within the principal concern of metaphysics. PHENOMENOLOGY, on the other hand, in its adaptation to the experience of values by Scheler, provides a method by which reflection can articulate ethical action precisely as experienced from within the action itself.

In Wojtyła's view, human action is a dramatic affair in which the fulfillment or non-fulfillment of the human person is at stake. Since action is a positive fulfillment of the person, his analysis implies the possibility that we may fail in the task of integration and transcendence with the consequent diminution of our personhood. Fortunately, we are not called upon to act in isolation. As persons we are open to intersubjective, interpersonal relations. What is more, our very fulfillment as persons is to be realized in "acting together with others," who are not simply members of this or that organization, but whose wellbeing is inscribed in our motivation (solidarity). Each is our neighbor, and in acting together with others, we realize our own personhood as participants in the community of persons. In sum, the interplay of metaphysics and phenomenology in Wojtyła's thought has resulted in grounding the person objectively in the community of beings, while at the same time permitting him to enter into the lived experience of the person as an existential subjectivi-

See Also: MAN, NATURAL END OF; PSYCHOLOGY

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed. The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v.2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World 2:1–41. J. E. ROYCE, Man and His Nature (New York 1961). G. P. KLUBERTANZ, The Philosophy of Human Nature (New York 1953). R. E. BRENNAN, The Image of His Maker (Milwaukee 1948). M. J. ADLER, What Man Has Made of Man (New York 1937). K. L. SCHMITZ, At the Center of the Human Drama, The Philosophical Anthropology of Karol Wojtyla/Pope John Paul II (Washington, D.C. 1993).

[N. A. LUYTEN/K. L. SCHMITZ/EDS.]

IN THEOLOGY

In a sense, all revelation and, consequently, all theology is a theology of man (2 Tm 3.16). But here the term theology of man is used in a restricted sense: the supernatural understanding of man's nature and destiny found in revelation and systematized in theology. The theology of man does not exclude man's natural knowledge of himself, but (1) throws new light upon his nature and (2) gives him knowledge of new realities and of a destiny he could not otherwise know. Moreover, implicit in a theology of man is a SUPERNATURAL view of all visible creation and of temporal existence. The created universe can only be fully and rightly understood in the light of divine revelation (see MATTER, THEOLOGY OF).

Man before the Fall. Man, in the whole of his being, was created—his soul by immediate (first) creation; his body in a manner that has not been precisely revealed, i.e., the possibility of evolution is not excluded. In addition, man received supernatural gifts of GRACE and virtue that made him a partaker of the nature of God (2 Pt 1.4) and other prerogatives and powers transcending ordinary human nature (see ORIGINAL JUSTICE).

Potentiality of Man. Despite the diversity of elements in man, he was a unity, an ensouled body, an incarnated spirit; he was a divinized unity of body and spirit. Equally important, man, although the pinnacle of visible creation, was, in all elements of his nature, eminently perfectible. He was not created in a fully developed state. Instead, there were almost unlimited potentialities left for him to exploit and bring to reality. God sketched in man the lineaments of a divine image, the most perfect visible image He made. Then He left to man himself the task of evoking by his life and work the potentialities inherent in himself to be the most expressive possible reproduction of his Creator's infinite perfection.

Furthermore, because man was a horizon between matter and spirit, time and eternity, material creation and God, he was, under God, lord and builder of creation. Because he was partly material, he could act on matter. Because he was a divinized, spiritual being, he could understand both creation and God's divine plan. As a result, he was capable of discerning those potentialities in creation that depended on his initiative and bringing them to reality. He could see God, as He was then expressed in the cosmos, and sense the further revelations that were implicit in the virtualities of what God has made.

This is not to say that man always knows the full implications of his work upon nature. He works within the dual context of his own nature and of the possibilities in the materials he uses. His purpose may be primarily concerned with his own needs: seeking food, shelter, or the fulfillment of any of his needs. But so long as he works within the designed capacities of nature, his efforts will result in the mutual development of himself and of nature. (Sinful action will be considered later.)

Elevation. Moreover, his entire nature was elevated by grace and the virtues to a divine level. Consequently, he was able to know divine realities, including God's plan for man himself and the whole of visible creation, and to direct his activities in accordance with that plan. His purpose was not completely achieved within creation. His destiny was eternal and divine. He was intended to possess God beatifically throughout eternity precisely to the degree that he developed the potentialities of his existential nature. Man had no natural end. His end was divine.

To this extent philosophy, that is, human reason, is radically incapable of understanding man or his destiny.

The philosopher's view of man is crucially incomplete and, thus, most open to error. Man has no merely temporal, intramundane purpose or meaning. There is no merely human, natural scale according to which his actions can be evaluated. Neither before nor after the Fall nor consequent upon the Redemption is there any situation in which man is the proper object of consideration for the philosopher alone. The purely natural man of the philosopher never existed. Nor is the end that the philosopher assigns to man existentially meaningful. Man and his destiny are totally supernatural. Man will either be with God eternally or, by his own catastrophic choice, cut off from God eternally. And every human action will contribute to man's beatification or to his exclusion from God.

Potentiality of Cosmos. The cosmos was, as the term implies, a unified, organized, purposive system. Each kind of being in the cosmos was an expression of God; it taught man something about God. And the total cosmos was simultaneously a further expression of God (St. Thomas, Comp. theol. 102). But the cosmos, including man, was radically perfectible at the outset. This does not mean that God made a defective cosmos, but rather that He produced a world rich in potentialities. These potentialities were to be realized partly by the internal dynamisms of the cosmos and partly by man's rational action. And, as the cosmos achieved its own possibilities, it would at each step be a more expressive reproduction of God.

More important still, unfolding the potentialities of the cosmos was not only one of man's chief temporal duties but was also a primary instrumentality of his own development. Man's work upon nature—growing crops, caring for animals, developing resources of the mineral kingdom—was never a unilateral action. Provided he worked in ways consonant with his own and creation's natures, his work perfected not only material creation, but himself as well. Man was to grow by helping nature grow.

Thus, both the dynamisms of nature and man's work were ordained constantly to make creation a more perfect reproduction of God's perfections. Working in personal communion with God, man was to be the instrument of God's creative power, continuing His work upon creation, thus preparing himself for eternal beatitude. This total perfective system had as its mediate objective the perfection of man. [See GLORY OF GOD (END OF CREATION).] Creation was intended in various ways to contribute to man's development and to his ultimate beatification through eternal union with God. This truth was strikingly put by Henri BERGSON: "The universe is a machine for making gods" [The Two Sources of Morality and Religion (2d ed. New York 1954) 317].

Toward the Pleroma. Knowing God by faith and seeing Him revealed in creation, man was able to grow in likeness to God both by contemplating God and by all his operations upon the world in which he lived.

But men were not intended to work in isolation. United together by sharing a common nature and destiny and above all by participation in the one life of God, men were to be One Man, a Mystical Body. In charity aiding each other to grow and in the process corporately building Man by their endlessly varied evocations of the species' possibilities, men were to carry out God's creative will. Making Man in the plenitude of his divinized human nature is willed by God as the chief created good of the universe. This was to have been the pleroma, the fulfillment, toward which all of its purposiveness was directed.

Man, then, is unique within the cosmos. He alone of all kinds of beings is the object of God's personal solicitude both for his own sake and for the sake of his species. "Now a rational creature exists under divine providence as a being governed and provided for in himself, and not simply for the sake of his species, as is the case with other corruptible creatures" (St. Thomas, C. gent. 3.113.1).

Adam. This was man's work in time. In addition, ADAM, the first man, had a unique responsibility. By his decision he was to determine what man was to be. Adam was created more than man, as a human being to whom had been given by God's free gift preternatural and supernatural prerogatives. Adam was to determine in perpetuity whether his descendants were to begin existence with the full complement of nature and its supplementary gifts (with which it would be possible to attain their eternal destiny) or with denuded and deprived nature. If he fulfilled his personal injunction of fidelity to God's ordinance, his descendants would come into existence possessing nature and grace. But if he failed to fulfill his personal role as head of the human race, those gifts added to human nature that were either necessary or useful for attaining a supernatural destiny would be lost. Adam's original sin would radically change the model according to which all men were to be fashioned.

The Fall. Adam's sin forfeited the supernatural endowments of human nature not only for himself but for all his descendants, since he was the primeval man from whom and according to whom others were to be formed. St. Paul says: ". . . through one man sin entered into the world and through sin death, and thus death has passed into all men because all have sinned [in Adam]" (Rom 5.12). Moreover, the order that had existed in the cosmos, both within man and in creation as a whole, was shattered. Neither man nor creation through him could attain the eternal destiny ordained by God. Yet the destiny remained: "[Man] is born in a fallen state, while all the time retaining his place in the supernatural order" (Mouroux 136). This does not mean that all development was frustrated. But it does mean that the purposive development that should ultimately have flowered in the pleroma was absolutely frustrate (see ORIGINAL SIN).

Personal sin can be defined as a word, deed, or desire contrary to the eternal law of God. From the restricted point of view of a theology of man, it is an act that fails, by man's willful decision, to contribute to the pleroma. While it is obvious that it is not under this precise formality that men sin, since not all have cognizance of this effect of sin, this is its concrete effect with respect to man's supernatural temporal responsibility.

Incarnational Redemption. The Son of God became man to restore God's plan by redeeming mankind by His passion and death.

In a sense one can say that God's purpose was accomplished by the INCARNATION itself, even if one prescinds from its redemptive effects. This is not the place to discuss the Incarnation. Yet one can note that the HYPOSTATIC UNION of Christ's sacred humanity with the Person of the Son of God effected results in creation infinitely transcending the gifts given by God when He made the cosmos. Even more, Christ equally transcends the perfection that would have been achieved if there had been no Fall and mankind had attained the fullest conceivable fruition. This is the meaning of the liturgy's exultant cry: "O felix culpa. O happy fault, that merited a Redeemer so holy and so great!" (Holy Saturday, Exultet).

The God-Man, Christ Jesus, is Himself the pleroma. "For in him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (Col 2.9). For it has pleased God the Father that in him all his fullness should dwell" (Col 1.19). Man was created as an image of God. His work in time was to perfect that image with the help of grace by all his actions. This was the work of the first man, of each man, of all men corporately. In this work man failed. Yet in Christ at the Incarnation man had become par excellence "the image of the invisible God" (Col 1.15). "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. And we saw his glory—glory as of the only-begotten of the Father—full of grace and of truth" (Jn 1.14; cf. 14.8–11).

Son of God and fullness of man, Christ is endowed with a plenitude of dignity and perfection so immeasurably surpassing the worth of all other creatures that His sacred humanity is adorable with the latria due to God alone.

He who is the Son of God and is God incarnate was born of the Virgin. He is not merely a man bearing God, but is God made flesh. He is anoint-ed not by action, as a prophet, but by the presence of the anointing Person, so that He who anointed has become man, and that which was anointed has become God, not by any change of nature but by a union of hypostasis. [St. John Damascene, On Orthodox Faith 4.14; Patrologica Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne 94:1160–61]

Although Christ more than achieved the pleroma by the Incarnation, He did not intend to remain alone. He did two further things that made participation in Him and His work accessible to other men.

First, He offered superabundant satisfaction for the sins of all mankind. "But when the fullness of time came, God sent his Son . . . that he might redeem those who were under the Law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal 4.4–5; see SATISFACTION OF CHRIST).

Second, and for our purpose more important, He became a unique archetype, a life-giving spirit, according to which and into whom redeemed man is reborn by a second genesis [echoing both the rebirth of Jn 3.5 and the primordial Genesis; see REBIRTH (IN THE BIBLE)]. He is, as St. Paul insists, the second Adam, new head of divinized man (1 Cor 15.44–49; Rom 5.12–21). Those who are united in Christ, the second Adam, while remaining discrete human beings, possess one common divine life, lived initially and shared with them by the Head of the MYSTICAL BODY. In the supernatural order all who possess grace constitute one living organism.

Redeemed Man. Those who died in the first Adam have access to grace and life through the second Adam. But man must receive life voluntarily, as it was voluntarily lost. There must be an aversion from sin and self and a conversion to Christ and God, if life is to be received. This is the sense of Acts: "Therefore to the Gentiles also God has given repentance unto life" (11.18). In the grace of that repentance unto life, man is to "Strip off the old man with his deeds and put on the new, one that is being renewed unto perfect knowledge 'according to the image of his Creator" (Col 3.9–10).

Two considerations about "repentance unto life" are important here. (1) Even at the outset of the Christian life, man's own actions are significant. God gives repentance unto life, but man must repent; he must freely die to his old life and freely rise with and in Christ. (2) Man is to live a new divinized life that has dimensions in both time and eternity. The Christian is to live a life one sees demonstrated in the two great principles of action: "without me you can do nothing" (Jn 15.5); and "I can do all things in him who strengthens me" (Phil 4.13; see CONVERSION AND GRACE, CONTROVERSIES ON).

The newborn Christian is like an infant (1 Pt 2.2), undeveloped but rich in inestimable potential. He is to grow.

The various faculties of the supernatural life are to be developed, and this development is the principal purpose of time and activity.

Ideally, every moment of life and every action is developmental; actually, many will be wasted through negligence or malice. The Christian effort for perfection could be described as a constant attempt to minimize the number of wasted or harmful actions and to maximize the number and quality of those that develop man. Thus, the only theoretical limit to human development for the Christian is the injunction, "You therefore are to be perfect, even as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Mt 5.48).

Redeeming the Cosmos. The Redemption inaugurated a regime the same in essentials as that before the Fall. Salvation is once more accessible to man in Christ. But there are differences. The most obvious is that the preternatural gifts are not restored. More significant, ultimately, is the fact that the order of the cosmos is not reinstated. This is to be slowly and painfully reconstituted by man's effort. Man must make his personal contribution to his own justification; so he must work out the Redemption of the cosmos. St. Paul's testimony on this is profoundly obscure, but it makes plain that man, somehow, is to achieve the Redemption of material creation that fell with man's sin.

For the eager longing of creation awaits the revelation of the sons of God. For creation was made subject to vanity—not by its own will but by reason of him who made it subject—in hope, because creation itself also will be delivered from its slavery to corruption into the freedom of the glory of the sons of God. [Rom 8.19–21]

The precise meaning of the passage is obscure, but clearly it affirms the solidarity of man and creation. By man's sin the cosmos was disrupted and rendered frustrate of its destiny. By redeemed man it can be restored. Man can progressively reconstitute the cosmos, i.e., an ordered, purposive system, by using material creation in accord with its nature and his, once he has himself been redeemed—or he can further subject creation to vanity by misusing it.

The noblest examples of the right use of creation are found in the liturgical uses: water in Baptism, wine and bread in the Eucharist; oil, wax, linen, incense. By such uses matter receives a great dignity and becomes both sanctified and sanctifying. But the redemptive and incarnational principle is not restricted to sacred uses. Everything that a Christian does can be redemptive: "Whatever you do, work at it from the heart as for the Lord and not for men" (Col 3.23).

Life in Christ. The Christian's work, then, is to prolong Christ's redemptive work. Having risen with Christ, he is to "mind the things that are above, not the things that are on earth" (Col 3.2). Yet he is not to flee from the world of men and work. The passage just quoted is followed by a lengthy exhortation to live daily life holily, including the advice to slaves quoted earlier: "Whatever you do, work at it from the heart as for the Lord."

Clearly, then, no human action is irrelevant to the work of Redemption and SALVATION, whether performed by Christian or pagan. Christian works can actively build the KINGDOM OF GOD; those of pagans can be steps toward justification. Justified man is thus seen as an intensely dynamic being, informed and divinized by grace. Good actions not only perfect him but dignify and sanctify matter on which he works. This is the fundamental insight regarding man and creation. Man exists in an imperfect, fallen—but redeemable and perfectible—system, a system that is dynamic and purposive, whose order and perfection are to be as perfect a replica of God as man, guided by the wisdom and grace of Christ, can make it. And in building the cosmos, he builds himself—and Man.

Christ is the pleroma. But He is a pleroma, paradoxically, that can grow. It grows by the extension of divine life to men, by their incorporation into and growth in Christ. And among the means by which men grow in life, grace, and fullness, not least is the work they do in time and upon the cosmos.

Teaching of the Church. The Church's solemn teaching concerning the composition of man is not extensive. It has defined that souls are not of the substance of God, did not preexist their bodies (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 455–456), do not result from transformation of sensitive souls, and are not generated (Enchiridion symbolorum 3220; see TRADUCIANISM). Each man has a unique, created soul, which is the form of the body (Enchiridion symbolorum 1440). The soul is created by God from nothing (Enchiridion symbolorum 685).

See Also: MAN, ARTICLES ON; CHURCH, ARTICLES ON; DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; ELEVATION OF MAN; GRACE AND NATURE; RECAPITULATION IN CHRIST; SECULARISM; SUPERNATURAL ORDER; TEMPORAL VALUES, THEOLOGY OF

Bibliography: P. OVERHAGE et al., Lexikon für Theologie, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:278–294. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique: Tables générales, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1951– 2:2100–06. P. HERMAND et al., Catholicisme 5:853–886. T. AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a, 75–88. J. MOUROUX, The Meaning of Man, tr. A. H. G. DOWNES (New York 1948). R. GUARDINI, Freedom, Grace, and Destiny, tr. J. MURRAY (New York 1961). J. FICHTNER, Theological Anthropology (Notre Dame, Indiana 1963). G. THILS, Théologie des réalités terrestres, 2 v. (Bruges 1946–49). L. J. LEBRET, Human Ascent, tr.

R. and M. FAULHABER (Chicago 1955). E. SUHARD, Growth or Decline?, tr. J. A. CORBETT (South Bend, Indiana 1948). Social Order 3 (May-June 1953) 193–288, on Christian humanism. E. I. WATKIN, The Bow in the Clouds (New York 1932). F. D. WILHELMSEN, The Metaphysics of Love (New York 1962). H. DE LUBAC, A Brief Catechesis on Nature and Grace (San Francisco 1984). W. PANNENBERG, Anthropology in a Theological Perspective, tr. M. J. O'CONNELL (Philadelphia 1985). POPE JOHN PAUL II, The Theology of the Body According to John Paul II. Human Love in the Divine Plan (Boston 1997).

[F. J. CORLEY]

MAN, NATURAL END OF

End here means purpose or objective, not extinction or last state; thus END of man means the general objective of human action or the final purpose of life. Catholics believe that besides the natural reality God has given human beings through creation, He has offered them the further gift of a share of His own life. God gives this special gift within the soul by GRACE. God is not only the source but also the end of the life of grace; its consummation is the soul's enjoyment of God's goodness in union with Him in heavenly beatitude, the BEATIFIC VISION. Hence, the end that Catholic faith indicates is above human NATURE. The achievement of this end transcends every ability naturally inherent in man, and the entire life of grace is SUPERNATURAL.

Because the end of Christian life is supernatural, Catholic thinkers have wondered about the natural end of man. The problem is important for two reasons: (1) If God had created man without giving him grace, would there have been any end for human life proportionate to man's abilities? (2) Since grace does not abridge what belongs to the natural reality of man, is there an end implicitly required by human nature that might help even Christians to direct their lives?

This article presents a historical introduction to the problem, a summary of the state of the question among contemporary Catholic thinkers, and some suggestions for its resolution.

HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION

Because the history of this problem is so extensive, only a few of the most important positions can be outlined in detail. Major consideration is therefore given to the thought of Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas, after which follows a summary treatment of the thought of modern philosophers on this subject.

Aristotle. ARISTOTLE begins his study of the end of man by observing that every activity implies a definite objective, since every effort presupposes a good at which it aims. Different spheres of activity have different ends, but each is unified and guided by its final objective. The basic question of ETHICS, then, concerns the single, final objective of the inclusive sphere of action called "human life as a whole."

Everyone agrees that the end of man is HAPPINESS—living or doing well—but people differ on what constitutes happiness. Some people think it is bodily PLEASURE, or such external goods as wealth and status, or good character. Aristotle maintains that happiness must be examined precisely as the end of action. So considered, whatever true happiness is, it must be the ultimate objective, sought always for itself and never for anything else. Moreover, in order to organize all of life, happiness must be complete in itself, requiring no addition to be an adequate principle of organization. Hence, Aristotle rejects the popular ideas of happiness, for they indicate only what belongs to the lower part of man (bodily pleasure), or what is only a means (external goods), or what is not desirable apart from action (character).

Platonic Solution. Although Aristotle follows PLATO up to this point, he rejects Plato's answer to the main question. To eliminate RELATIVISM, Plato posited as ultimate end a pure form of goodness—the Good itself—independent of everything else. But an ideal goodness that is not a good something seemed to Aristotle unintelligible. Moreover, if there were a Good itself, either it would remain irrelevant to the peculiar good for man, or it would conflict with the differences among goods appropriate to man and to other things.

Still, Aristotle agreed with Plato that happiness must not be defined subjectively by the desires one happens to have; that approach would lead to relativism. Aristotle's solution is to define happiness objectively by what fulfills the capacities from which human action arises. He concludes that man's true happiness lies in his distinctive action, the use of reason, which best realizes specifically human capacities.

Reason, Virtue, and Contemplation. Many use reason without becoming happy because they do not use it fully. For maximum use, reason must be cultivated until it reaches habitual excellence. The Greek word for habitual excellence is translated as VIRTUE, and so we find Aristotle concluding that the happiness that is man's end consists in continuous activity of the soul according to its highest virtue.

For Aristotle, the highest excellence of reason is philosophical WISDOM, and so he considers the philosophical life best. The truest human happiness is in the CONTEMPLATION of the truths the philosopher can know about the highest realities. Such a life is godlike, since it belongs to man only because he has intelligence like that of immaterial beings. But it is not supernatural in the theological sense, for it belongs to the higher part of man himself and is attained by his own efforts.

Prudence and Active Life. All human feelings, actions, and social life should be organized as a preparation and foundation for the philosophical life. But in organizing the rest of life, reason also functions in a properly human way; in this practical capacity, reason has a special excellence distinct from philosophic wisdom. This virtue, practical wisdom or PRUDENCE, is best exemplified in the great lawgivers and founders of cities. The practical life of affairs, then, also is a fulfillment of man's proper capacities, and it constitutes happiness secondarily.

The goods people mistakenly think are the end of man are not altogether excluded by Aristotle. Good fortune and external goods take a subordinate place. Friendship is important to happiness, but true friendship is a shared virtuous life. Moreoever, the truly happy life is the most pleasant, for pleasure is merely the conscious aspect of the perfect functioning of any capacity. Since happiness is the perfect use of man's highest capacity, it includes the deepest and most human pleasure.

For Aristotle, then, man's end is not a quality or a state, and it is not found in any good above man himself. Rather, happiness is in life itself, in the fulfillment of human capacities, chiefly in philosophical contemplation, for there man's best capacity is used to its fullest extent, not for any practical result beyond itself but simply for its own sake.

St. Augustine. AUGUSTINE did not ask whether man has a natural end or whether God could have created man without offering him grace. Augustine did not deny a natural end; he simply did not consider the possibility. Nevertheless, he is of interest because he presented the Christian doctrine on heaven in contrast with the philosophers' teachings on happiness and the end of man.

In his youth Augustine read in Cicero's Hortensius, which is the earliest, most Platonist version of Aristotle's ethics. The ideal of happiness in philosophical contemplation inflamed Augustine's heart, and he set out in quest of wisdom. But for many years he lived in error and immorality. Nothing ended his inner conflict and frustration until he received the grace of conversion to Christ.

From the vantage point of faith, Augustine reflects that all along he has sought Christianity, and he sees heavenly beatitude, the hope of Christians, as the only fully satisfying end of his previously fruitless quest. Thus from personal experience Augustine knows that only God can satisfy man's yearning for happiness, and this psychological discovery dominates his thinking about the end of man. Man's heart is made for God and shall not rest except in Him.

Pagan Neoplatonism. Augustine ridicules the pagan philosophers who placed happiness in natural goods or in virtue, and who valued the social life of man in this world. The present life is full of miseries; true happiness will be found only in the peace of eternal life with God. Thus Augustine contrasts this life to the next as false happiness is contrasted to heavenly beatitude.

One sees better why Augustine took this step in noting that he greatly respected one pagan philosophy—NEOPLATONISM. Itself indebted to Christianity as well as to GREEK PHILOSOPHY, GNOSTICISM, and perhaps also to Indian thought, to which it is similar, Neoplatonism teaches a natural mysticism. The basic notions are that man's mind comes from the divine by emanation, a kind of necessary creation, and that in this life the mind is unnaturally restrained (see EMANATIONISM). The practical conclusion follows: man should free himself from the world by an ascent to philosophical wisdom, and eventually he can redissolve into his divine source.

Augustine corrected Neoplatonism by insisting that God creates freely, that in heaven man is united to God by knowing Him rather than by dissolving into Him, and that man's return to God depends upon divine grace through Christ rather than upon a human effort of philosophical ascent. Augustine found Neoplatonism, so corrected, a useful framework for exploring Christian faith in a way that would satisfy his own experience and ideas.

End as Final State. Aristotle defined happiness in terms of the end of action and identified this end with the highest perfection of man himself. Augustine, on the other hand, defined happiness as the fulfillment of man's fundamental desire and identified this fulfillment with heavenly beatitude, in which man's mind attains the perfect goodness of God by knowing Him just as He is. Although the two approaches are quite different, they are not directly opposed. Indeed, Augustine was not concerned primarily with the end in relation to action, but with perfect happiness in the attainment of the supreme good. He does not use "end" precisely in Aristotle's sense—an objective of action sought as a fulfillment of the agent. Rather, Augustine thinks of the end as the absolute limit and the final state. Thus he contrasts the "end of good," heavenly beatitude, with the "end of evil," eternal separation from God; in both cases "end" means supreme instance, and the two absolute limits are final states. Aristotle would not speak of an "end of evil," because no one acts for the sake of evil.

Effect on Boethius. BOETHIUS, a Christian philosopher who followed Augustine, also determined the end of man by examining man's desire for happiness. Man wants happiness and he does not find it in any particular good. Only complete happiness (beatitude), a state perfected by the conjunction of all goods, leaves nothing to be desired. Nowhere but in God, whose perfect goodness is the source of every created and partial good, are all goods present together. Hence man's desire for happiness cannot be satisfied unless he shares in the beatitude of God.

St. Thomas Aquinas. THOMAS AQUINAS used Aristotle's doctrine to bring the theological theory of the end of man to a new stage of development. The resulting teaching is complex; several points in it are disputed among scholars. Three points must be noted: (1) Aquinas teaches that there is a twofold end or beatitude of man. One is proportioned to his natural abilities; the other is supernatural and becomes proportionate to man only if he is given divine grace (De ver. 14.2, 10; 27.2; In 2 sent. 41.1.1; Summa theologiae 1a, 62.1; la2ae, 62.1–2). (2) He presents only one end, heavenly beatitude, as the absolutely ultimate goal of human life (C. gent. 3.1–63). (3) Beatitude means the perfect and stable attainment of a perfect good; it is a happiness that leaves nothing to be desired. Only the supernatural end is perfect beatitude. The natural end is an imperfect beatitude, a happiness that is somewhat like perfect beatitude but lacks the perfection required for it (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 3). To understand these points and the disputes that have arisen, it is necessary to notice how Thomas transformed Aristotle's notion of end and his theory of man.

Notion of End. The transcendent aspect of end that Aristotle excluded by rejecting Plato's ideal goodness is restored by Thomas. He identifies perfect goodness with the reality of God, and he explains that God directs creatures to Himself by creating them as an expression of His own goodness, i.e., of Himself. Thus the ultimate end of all creatures is God. Creatures lacking intelligence attain divine goodness merely by reflecting it in their own perfection; intelligent creatures may attain it more directly by knowing God and loving Him (C. gent. 3.17–25; In 2 sent. 1.2.1–2). The end of every creature's action thus has two aspects. On the one hand, it is a perfection within the creature itself. On the other hand, it is the transcendent perfection of God.

Man and the Good. Aristotle held that man is complete in his own reality and that human desire is limited to human good. Thomas teaches that man's will is not oriented primarily toward himself but toward the good in general. Even by nature, man should not seek his perfection because it is his, but because it is good and a reflection of divine goodness (De ver. 22.1–5). Because God is the end of all creation, He should be loved above all things, and but for original sin, man would so love Him naturally (Summa theologiae 1a, 60.5; In 3 sent. 29.3). Man necessarily desires happiness, which he understands generally as the good that would satisfy his will. In fact, man's will is indefinitely open toward good and is naturally oriented toward God. But men do not necessarily recognize and accept this fact (Summa theologiae 1a, 82.1-2). Moreover, the greatest perfection man can receive, heavenly beatitude, would fulfill and surpass his capacities in a way he can neither suspect nor wish for without faith and grace. Man's desire for happiness thus has two aspects as well. On the one hand, it implicitly refers to the perfect goodness of God. On the other hand, it refers to man's capacity for perfection, which may be considered either according to the limits of attainment established by man's natural powers or according to what man can receive from God and achieve with supernatural aid (In 3 sent. 27.2.2).

Issues of Interpretation. The following five issues arise in the interpretation of Thomas's teaching:

- 1. Does Thomas consider Aristotle's doctrine an adequate account of the natural end of man? Thomas never describes the natural end of man in detail; rather, he constantly refers his readers for details to Aristotle or, more vaguely, to "the philosophers." In commenting on Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, Thomas seems to accept the teaching as correct within its limitations (In 1 eth. 9). At the same time, in his own works Thomas so transformed Aristotle's notions of end and of will that most Thomists have not considered Aristotle's teaching to be an adequate account of the natural end of man.
- 2. Does Thomas restrict the natural end to the present life? His references to Aristotle, whose treatment deals with this world exclusively, and his use of the contrast between earthly and heavenly beatitude suggest that he does. On the other hand, Thomas knows that some philosophers have put the end of man after death (In 4 sent. 49.1.1.4). He teaches that the separated soul naturally can attain a certain perfection (De anim. 17–20). And he holds that the souls of unbaptized infants enjoy goods proportionate to natural abilities, although they do not attain heavenly beatitude (In 2 sent. 33.2.2; De malo 5.3).
- 3. What is the meaning of Thomas's teaching that man ''naturally'' desires perfect happiness in a knowledge of God that in fact can be achieved only in supernatural beatitude? Thomas argues from natural desire that the beatific vision is not impossible and that the hope of Christians is not mistaken and perverse (C. gent. 3.50–57; Comp. theol. 1.104; Summa theologiae la, 12.1; la2ae, 3.8). But he also teaches constantly that without grace man can neither know nor desire heavenly beatitude (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 114.2; De ver. 14.2). How could a natural end be a true objective of human action if the desire of nature itself goes beyond all that man can achieve by his own abilities? In what sense does man "naturally" desire that which is in fact his supernatural end? These questions have been debated from the time of Thomas's first commentators to the present day.

4. If man were created without grace, could he ever be truly happy? The explanation of the meaning of beatitude—the attainment of perfect goodness (God) by a perfect and permanent act-and the presentation of the supernatural end alone as absolutely ultimate suggest a negative answer (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 1-3). But Thomas explicitly considers the possibility that God could have created man without grace (De malo 4.1 ad 14; Quodl. 1.4.3). His teaching that man necessarily seeks happiness in something he knows and accepts as an ultimate end (In 4 sent. 49.1.3.3) suggests that a man created without grace could achieve a true happiness that would be an imperfect likeness of beatitude. The account of the state of unbaptized infants—they exist without pain and frustration despite original sin-indicates the minimum of which human nature is capable.

5. Given grace, does man have a natural last end as well as a supernatural one? The negative answer is indicated because man cannot have two ultimate ends. But Thomas's derivation of a complete doctrine on natural virtues and natural law from a consideration of goods proportionate to human nature (Summa theologiae la2ae, 61, 94) suggests that man's natural end is not removed by grace; therefore, the natural end must take a subordinate place within Christian life. This conclusion agrees also with Thomas's general teaching that grace presupposes and complements nature but does not abridge it.

Aquinas's teaching has given rise to many controversies because it is inherently complex and because the synthesis he presents is not wholly complete and explicit. The works of other great schoolmen have hardly been examined by scholars in relation to this problem. All the positions now current among Catholic thinkers plausibly claim some support from Thomas Aquinas.

Modern philosophy. A few early modern philosophers continued to treat the problem of the end of man according to its classic formulation. SPINOZA is one example; his position is somewhat like that of Neoplatonism. Generally the old concept of end is unknown, and happiness is equated with the subjective feeling of satisfaction.

The main British thinkers from LOCKE and HUME through those holding utilitarianism (Bentham and Mill) to RUSSELL and other recent empiricists have assumed that pleasure or the lessening of psychic tension is the sole effective motive of human action. Their chief problem in moral science is to show how selfishness can be limited by social restraint. Many other philosophers, following KANT, renounce happiness as a principle of ethics precisely because they consider it merely subjective. For the guidance of an end they substitute moral law derived from some source independent of good and desire, e.g., from reason in Kant, from freedom itself in Sartre. Such theories recognize that man seeks ends, but they consider these ends to be in themselves morally indifferent.

It must be noted that evolutionary theories of human life do not necessarily exclude an end, although the doctrine of end implicit in such a theory can be uncovered only by interpretation. Every evolutionary theory of man assumes that development implies progress, and although evolutionists consider the possibilities of progress unlimited, the principle that measures progress serves in fact as an end, i.e., a guiding principle that gives human life a purpose.

HEGEL and his followers teach an evolutionary PAN-THEISM that views the whole of things as a process developing toward an absolute reality. The end of man is simply his place in the system. In the last analysis, man takes his place willy-nilly, since human freedom is ultimately unreal.

Dialectical MATERIALISM derived from Hegel, but by discarding the Absolute it radically transformed man's relationship to reality. Like American PRAGMATISM (which adopted evolution from natural science but also owed much to Hegel), dialectical materialism teaches in effect that the end of man is within man himself and consists in the realization of the possibilities of human nature. This view is similar to Aristotle's position, but the contemplative ideal is omitted in favor of rationally guided activity and work, mankind's social solidarity is emphasized, and human capacities are believed to enlarge as evolution progresses.

During the past century, work in psychology and the social sciences more and more obviously has needed a conception of the end of man as a standard for human health and well-being and as a guide for social reform and intercultural communication. Much recent psychology uses a concept of the mature, integrated, and effective personality—again an end somewhat like Aristotle's—and many social scientists assume that values such as health, technological efficiency, and political freedom are standards for human welfare. Contemporary philosophers have hardly noticed this aspect of psychology and social science, and have contributed little to it. Catholic moralists also, on the whole, have been unfortunately isolated from these developments in the sciences of man.

CONTEMPORARY CATHOLIC POSITIONS

The state of the question concerning the natural end of man among Catholic thinkers can be indicated by summaries of five positions representative of the present spectrum of views.

Farrell and Adler's view. Walter FARRELL and Mortimer Adler, collaborating in a series of articles entitled "The Theory of Democracy," showed the superiority of democratic government on the ground that it best subserves the natural end of man. In so doing, they had to discuss this end. That there is a natural end, they argue from the naturalness of the state, of social virtues, and of natural law. They criticize those who identify the natural end with the social good, identifying it instead with the perfection of individual lives to which the good of society is merely a means.

Farrell and Adler consider the natural end only in respect to the happiness of this life. This happiness they consider to be a true conjunction of all the goods man naturally desires by active desire. They solve the Thomistic problem of natural desire by holding that Thomas's arguments refer to a passive desire. Happiness applies analogously to heavenly beatitude and to the natural end; natural happiness is true happiness proportionate to human abilities. The natural end is subordinate to supernatural beatitude but is not a means to it. The natural end is absolutely ultimate in its own order.

These authors explain the nature of happiness very much as did Aristotle. However, they reject interpretations of Aristotle that equate philosophical contemplation with happiness. Philosophical activity is only the best among many goods that constitute the perfect human life. Moreover, they deny that the good life is a stable act; instead, they consider it a constant process. Hence, they reject a distinction between contemplative and active in the life connatural to man. Moreover, although admitting that the attainment of God is man's supernatural beatitude, they deny that God is the good attained (the objective aspect) in man's natural end.

Ramirez's traditional position. Beginning in the 16th century, Catholic theologians, faced with heresies that confused nature and grace, tended to sharpen the distinction between the two principles and to insist on the completeness of nature in its own order. This development included extensive use by post-Reformation theologians of the notion of a logically possible state of pure nature. To make this notion consistent and complete, the doctrine of the natural end of man, already present in Thomas, was greatly developed.

Although details vary in different authors, the teaching still most generally found in manuals of Catholic moral theology and philosophy is that there is a natural end of man that gives true happiness proportionate to human abilities. This end would naturally be attained by a natural knowledge and love of God after death. In this teaching, the natural end approximates the supernatural end as closely as possible, for the natural end objectively consists in God. Moreover, its attainment is referred to the next life, often rather as a reward than as a result of man's life on earth.

Santiago Ramirez gives a careful and complete theological statement of this position. Even according to nature, God is the objective good that man should seek as his end. The attainment of God is effected by an act of speculative knowledge that is man's highest perfection. The essential difference between heavenly beatitude and the natural end is the kind of knowledge by which God is attained—in heavenly beatitude by an intuitive vision that surpasses man's natural abilities, in the natural end by natural knowledge through creatures.

From a theological standpoint, Ramirez carefully distinguishes the conditions under which the natural end of man could give perfect happiness. He maintains that if human nature is considered in itself rather than in comparison with the order of grace, under ideal conditions (integral nature) the natural end of man would give a perfect natural happiness. This perfect happiness would be attained fully, however, not in the present life but in an undisturbed knowledge of God after death.

Maritain's thesis. Although in his earlier writings Jacques MARITAIN sometimes seemed to hold that the only natural end of man is the temporal COMMON GOOD that is the objective of political action, in his Neuf Leçons he treats the problem more carefully. He concludes first that God, as absolute and complete goodness, is the objective aspect of the end both of man and of the whole of creation. But in the natural order the goodness of God is reached only imperfectly and mediately, since the natural happiness of man is not found in sharing with God in His own life, but in man's fulfillment through action. Natural knowledge of God is only one aspect of this humanly perfective end.

The good that man can attain naturally does not constitute beatitude, because imperfect beatitude is not really beatitude at all. Natural happiness is imperfect, never finished, and always capable of increase. Hence the natural end of man is somewhat indeterminate; it would involve an endless progress even after death in the perfection of intelligence.

Man naturally desires to know what God is, but this desire is merely the thrust of human curiosity seeking to know the causes of things as fully as possible. This natural desire is not a desire for supernatural beatitude. Since natural happiness is never perfect in any case, the satisfaction of this particular natural desire, which is only one among many, is not necessary for the natural end of man.

Only the believer recognizes that man's natural desires are transformed by grace into the Christian's hope for perfect happiness in the beatific vision of God. But a philosopher may investigate religious teachings as a supplement to the other available sources of information. From Christianity he can learn that man in fact is called to perfect and supernatural beatitude. Thus the natural, indeterminate end has been replaced, but it is virtually contained in the supernatural end, for heavenly beatitude is the determinate attainment of perfect good. Hence Maritain rejects the parallelism between the natural and supernatural ends suggested by the common view of which Ramirez is representative.

Buckley's proposal. Joseph Buckley's Man's Last End is the only book in English devoted exclusively to the problem of the natural end of man. His position is like Maritain's in its denial of a definite end of man in the natural order analogous to heavenly beatitude in the supernatural order. Buckley sharply distinguishes the metaphysical view of ends, in which God is seen as the creator directing all things to the expression of His own goodness, and the moral or psychological view of ends, in which man directs his own action toward a good. Man's end, considered psychologically, is not the divine goodness itself, except supernaturally; naturally, man's will is ordered to the aspect of goodness in all things. God is included in the object of the will only as the primary and causal source of the entire realm of goods.

Buckley concludes that according to nature there is no concrete and determinate last end for man. If there were such an end, it would have to be a supreme good capable of fulfilling all desires and organizing the whole of life. But no single good, not even God as we naturally conceive Him, can meet these requirements. Thus, the ultimate natural end of man is his indeterminate fulfillment in the indefinite realm of the whole of goods. Man naturally acts for ends that are concrete and determinate goods, but no such end is a last end, for none of these goods is adequate to the indefinite capacity of the will for whatever is good, and hence none of them can constitute perfect happiness or the fulfillment of all desires. Happiness considered indeterminately remains the only natural ultimate end of man from the psychological point of view.

Buckley is at pains to emphasize that although his view of the natural end reveals how fitting the supernatural perfection of man by divine grace is, this elevation is not necessary. God could have created man without calling him to a life of grace, but in that case human life would lack the definiteness of direction and pervasive unity of purpose that only a concrete and determinate end can give. Buckley assumes that moral standards are established apart from the consideration of the ultimate end.

De Lubac's position. Unlike Buckley, who developed his position within the framework of Thomistic philosophy, Henri de LUBAC considers the problem of the end of man from an Augustinian viewpoint and offers his Surnaturel: Études historiques as a contribution to the history of theology. De Lubac tries to show that in man, an intelligent and free being created in the image of God, openness to God transcends the restrictive limits of determinate nature. De Lubac emphasizes the freedom with which God offers grace and the freedom with which man accepts it. He thinks that passages in St. Thomas that seem to teach a natural end of man really only assert that there are some goods accessible to man in this life, not that there is or could be an ultimate end of man other than heavenly beatitude. De Lubac goes so far as to reject the entire notion of a possible purely natural order. His conclusion is that it is entirely impossible that there be a natural ultimate end of man.

Although De Lubac did not deny that heavenly beatitude is above man's nature and his own abilities of attainment, his position was widely regarded by theologians as a threat to the gratuity of the supernatural. His critics offered many arguments to show that De Lubac's position is incompatible with the teaching of faith that the life of grace is in no way required by or necessary to human nature. Much of this debate was quieted by the appearance in 1950 of the encyclical HUMANI GENERIS in which certain unnamed theologians were criticized: "Others destroy the gratuitous character of the supernatural order by suggesting that it would be impossible for God to create rational beings without ordaining them for the beatific vision and calling them to it" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 42 (1950) 570].

TOWARD A SOLUTION

The present disagreement among Catholic thinkers concerning the natural end of man indicates that there is not yet a completely satisfactory resolution of this problem. However, Catholic theologians and philosophers who have studied the problem do generally agree that there is a natural end of man. All agree that the supernatural end, concerning which faith teaches, either replaces or subordinates the natural end. The present trend of thought is away from the position that had become common since the 16th century, toward a view that accentuates the lack of parallelism between the natural and the supernatural ends.

Natural Desire and Happiness. No one approaching the problem of the natural end within the Christian tradition can avoid being influenced by St. Augustine. Thus Catholic thinkers have tended to focus upon happiness and man's desires rather than upon human action and the principles of its moral quality. Generally they have tried to determine what in fact would give man the greatest happiness of which his nature would be capable if he were not called to the supernatural life of grace. This emphasis has significant consequences. If attention is focused upon the restless heart and the real possibility of absolutely perfect happiness, the comparative imperfection of any natural end is clarified, but its positive character remains obscure.

Of course, even Aristotle considered happiness the ultimate end of man, and Aristotle did not identify this end with supernatural beatitude. This fact should be a reminder that an examination of the meaning of happiness is necessary if the problem of the end of man is to be formulated as an inquiry into what constitutes true happiness.

The universality of the human desire for happiness shows that man naturally and necessarily seeks something as an ultimate end in the enjoyment of which his will might rest. But the variety of goods that different men in fact accept as their ultimate ends proves that the human will is not determined to any definite good, even the highest. From this point of view, Buckley's analysis of the natural end appears to be correct. Perhaps, however, a different formulation of the problem of the natural end of man would lead to a more positive result.

Nature and moral obligation. From a psychological point of view, what each man seeks as a concrete last end is determined by himself; but from an ethical point of view, what last end every man should seek is predetermined by the nature of man and by his inescapable place in reality. This consideration suggests the following formulation that avoids the difficult notions of happiness and natural desire: Consider man strictly according to the requirements and possibilities of his nature. To what end ought he to direct his entire life? What good should man seek for its own sake, while rightly treating all other goods either as its constituent elements or as mere means to it?

Because Catholic philosophers generally accept Aristotle's thesis that choice is only of means, never of ends as such, some object to this formulation of the problem. But Aristotle lacked a clear notion of will and had only a limited understanding of freedom of choice. Moreover, one need not suppose that the last end is directly an object of choice, but only that man either chooses to consider and act for the good he should accept as his last end, or that he chooses to ignore the end to which he is obliged in favor of some other good that he prefers. A basic commitment to the morally required end is the first and most fundamental means for attaining it. Obligation with respect to the end need not be explained by any ulterior principle, for the last end is itself a first principle, the source of all obligations and primarily of the obligation to accept its own primacy.

Infinite and finite good. In attempting to describe the morally required natural last end, the first task is to determine whether the perfect goodness of God belongs to the objective aspect of man's natural end. As previously mentioned, there is disagreement among Catholic thinkers on this point. Some confusion seems to arise from a tacit assumption, most obvious in De Lubac, that if God is the end of man even according to nature, man's natural relationship to God would be the personal association that only grace can open to man.

But the orientation to God that belongs to man according to mere nature is other than the Christian's relationship to his Lord, Redeemer, and Sanctifier. Even by nature, man should not love any finite good as if it were the perfect goodness of God, or commit himself to any particular good as if his will could rest content in the enjoyment of it alone. Human reason can discern the limitations of finite goods, and man is obligated by nature to act according to reason. It seems to follow that finite goods belonging to man's natural end may rightly be sought only so far as they are participations in the perfect goodness of God, although no act within man's natural ability can attain God as He is in Himself, since intimate sharing in divine life depends upon divine grace.

Specific perfective goods. However, even if it is agreed that finite goods directly attainable by man belong to his morally required natural last end only so far as they are participations in the perfect goodness of God, it still must be determined exactly what goods accessible to human abilities coalesce to form the organizing principle of a good human life. Aristotle thought that the highest perfection of man is some action desirable only for itself and perfect by itself alone. However, human actions receive value from the goods attained in and by them, and no single natural mode of human action has the perfection that Aristotle required of the end. The fact that human nature can be elevated by grace indicates that man is less closed upon himself than Aristotle believed.

Hence, it seems that Farrell, Adler, and Maritain are correct in holding that all goods truly perfective of man have a place in his natural end. Most noble among these is the truth man can know about God and about his own place in reality, but most fundamental is man's physical and psychological health. Health truly perfects man; it deserves cultivation and demands respect, even when no further perfection happens to be accessible. Truth, health, and other perfective goods underlie the fundamental precepts of NATURAL LAW, for as constituents in the natural end, such goods first require that man act and first guide human action.

As already noted, especially in Maritain and Buckley, the present trend among Catholic thinkers is to admit a certain indeterminacy in the natural end. The ensemble of perfective goods has this characteristic, both because none of them is perfectly attained in any single act and because among them there is a twofold priority: that of nobility centering upon truth, and that of necessity centering upon health. Moreover, since each of these accessible goods must sometimes be subordinated to others and since none of them is self-sufficient, the dispositions of upright character, by which man avoids subservience to any particular good and maintains his openness toward God, are themselves desirable for their own sake. Thus the natural end of man includes complete moral virtue, a good in principle accessible to man's natural abilities, although fallen man cannot attain it without healing grace. To determine the precise relationship within the ensemble of perfective goods between substantive goods, such as truth and health, and the peculiar good of moral virtue remains one of the most difficult tasks in the investigation of man's natural end.

See Also: END; FINAL CAUSALITY; FINALITY, PRINCIPLE OF; GOOD; COMMON GOOD; NATURAL LAW; DESIRE TO SEE GOD, NATURAL; BEATIFIC VISION; WILL; NATURE; GRACE, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: ARISTOTLE, L'Éthique à Nicomaque, tr. R. A. GAUTHIER and J. Y. JOLIF, 2 v. (Louvain 1958-59). L. ROBIN, La Morale antique (2d ed. rev. and corr. Paris 1947). G. DE BROGLIE, De fine ultimo humanae vitae: Tractatus theologicus, pars prior, positiva (Paris 1948). J. ROHMER, La Finalité morale chez les théologiens de saint Augustin à Duns Scot (Paris 1939). V. CAUCHY, Désir naturel et béatitude chez saint Thomas (Montreal, Canada 1958). W. R. O'CONNOR, The Eternal Quest (New York 1947). A. R. MOTTE, "Désir naturel et béatitude surnaturelle," Bulletin Thomiste 3 (1930-33) 651-676; "La Possibilité de la vision béatifique," ibid. 4 (1934-36) 573-590. M. J. ADLER and W. FARRELL, "The Theory of Democracy," Thomist 4 (1942) 121-181. THOMAS AQUINAS, De hominis beatitudine tractatus theologicus ad primam secundae Summae theologicae, ed. J. M. RAMIREZ, 3 v. (Madrid 1942-47). V. CATHREIN, "De naturali hominis beatitudine," Gregorianum 11 (1930) 398-409. J. MARITAIN, Neuf Lecons sur les notions premières de la philosophie morale (Paris 1951) 89-117. J. BUCKLEY, Man's Last End (St. Louis, Mo. 1949). H. DE LUBAC, Surnaturel: Études historiques (Paris 1946); "Duplex hominis beatitudo," Recherches de science religieuse 35 (1948) 290-299. P. J. DONNELLY, "Discussions on the Supernatural Order," Theological Studies 9 (1948) 213-249; "A Recent Critique of P. de Lubac's 'Surnaturel," ibid. 554-560. T. DEMAN, "Surnaturel," Bulletin Thomiste 7 (1943-46) 461-472. P. M. DE CONTENSON, "Surnaturel," ibid. 8.2 (1947-53) 794-804.

[G. G. GRISEZ]

MANASSES I OF REIMS

Archbishop, patron of letters; b. Champagne, France, c. 1040; d. between 1081 and 1100. This archbishop cannot be traced with certainty before his election in 1070 or after May 1081. It is established that Manasses was a well-educated noble, had a taste for Latin verse, possessed some knowledge of Canon Law, and was eager to continue the reputation of the cathedral school of Reims. That he was bellicose, avaricious, narrow-minded, and unreliable can be proved also. It was his defiance of the GREGORIAN REFORM and his refusal to appear in council to answer charges of uncanonical conduct that led to his deposition (1077) and excommunication (1080). Last mentioned by BENZO OF ALBA, he is remembered as the patron of FULCOIUS OF BEAUVAIS.

Bibliography: J. R. WILLIAMS, "Archbishop Manasses I of Rheims and Pope Gregory VII," American Historical Review 54 (1948–49) 804–824. A. BECKER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1342.

[S. WILLIAMS]

MANCE, JEANNE

First Catholic lay nurse in North America and first director of the Hôtel-Dieu, Montreal, Canada; b. Langres, Picardy, France, 1606; d. Montreal, June 18, 1673. She was 35 when she joined the first Montreal colonists, and she was present at the Mass celebrated by the Jesuit B. Vimont on May 17, 1642, during the founding ceremonies of the city. The initial plan for Montreal included the establishment of a hospital; Jeanne was its first administrator under conditions that constantly demanded heroic acts. In 1658 she made her second trip to France and brought back from La Flèche the hospital nuns of St. Joseph to staff the Hôtel-Dieu. The reputation for sanctity that she enjoyed during her lifetime continued to grow after her death. In 1909 a monument to her memory was erected in front of Hôtel-Dieu. In 1942 at a congress in Montreal, the Catholic nurses of the U.S. and Canada asked that her cause be introduced at Rome; the process of diocesan inquiry was subsequently initiated.

Bibliography: ABBÉ FAILLON, Vie de Mlle. Mance et histoire de l'Hôtel-Dieu de Villemarie, 2 v. (Tours 1854). J. K. FORAN, Jeanne Mance, or the "Angel of the Colony," Foundress of the Hôtel-Dieu Hospital, Montréal, Pioneer Nurse of North America (Montreal 1931). M. MONDOUX, L'Hôtel-Dieu: Premier hôpital de Montréal (Montreal 1942). M. C. DAVELUY, Jeanne Mance (2d ed Montreal 1962).

[L. POULIOT]

MANDAEAN RELIGION

The syncretistic, Gnostic religion of the pagan baptist sect of Mandaeans who survive in small numbers in southern Iraq and Iran. They were first brought to the attention of the West by 16th- and 17th-century merchants and missionaries and erroneously called Christians of St. John because of their veneration for John the Baptist. Scientific study of Mandaeism began in the 19th century with the travels and writings of H. Petermann and the grammar of Mandaean, a dialect of East Aramaic, by T. Nöldeke (1875). The works of W. Brandt and M. Lidzbarski and, more recently, the many manuscripts obtained and published by Lady E. S. Drower, furnish copious documentation for Mandaeism but do not fully solve its problems.

The name Mandaean means "gnostic," from the Aramaic maddā'<mandā' "knowledge." Other names used are Sabaeans, "baptizers," and Nasoraeans, probably "observers" (of the code and cult). The name observers is more properly reserved for the priests who are fully initiated into the esoteric doctrine. The sect won toleration from the conquering Muslims as a "people of the book" because they possessed their own literature, which may have been set down or at least first collected for that purpose in the 7th and 8th centuries A.D. Their principal works include the Ginza (Treasure) or Book of Adam, the Book of John, the Canonical Prayerbook, and many esoteric works of varying antiquity. Generally, these are not unified compositions but loose collections of cultic and other materials, many of them traditional and very ancient.

Mandaean ritual life is more important than its mythological framework and may indeed be more primitive. The two principal rites are the maṣbūtā or baptism, a frequently repeated ritual washing in "living" (i.e., running) water, and the masiqtā, a ceremony for the dead which includes a sacred meal. The teaching combines elements of Jewish, Iranian, Babylonian, Gnostic, and Christian origin into a nonphilosophical synthesis with an underlying dualism contrasting light and darkness, the world of spirits (Uthras) and the earth, the supreme being Great Life or Lord and the evil Holy Spirit, the human soul and the body. Salvation is possible by an ascent of the soul to the world of light, which is to be achieved by knowledge, ethical living, and practice of the cult. The savior figure is called Hibil-Ziwa (Abel-radiance). The strict moral code of Mandaeism is of Jewish origin.

The antiquity and provenance of the Mandaeans are disputed. Extrinsic evidences make it reasonably certain that the sect existed in the 4th or 5th century A.D. and some scholars are reluctant to go any further. T. Säve-Söderbergh [Studies in the Coptic-Manichean Psalmbook (Uppsala 1949)] has argued that the 3d-century Manichean Psalms of Thomas depend on Mandaean hymns, which are therefore older. Other arguments based on the peculiar Mandaean script, certain elements of cultic practice, etc., would place Mandaeism in the earliest Christian or even pre-Christian times. It was once thought to have originated in Mesopotamia or Iran, where it certainly flourished at an early date, but most authorities now think it had Palestinian or Syrian origin. For the sect's migration to the East under persecution, a date around A.D. 38 has recently been proposed [R. Macuch, "Alter und Heimat des Mandäismus nach neuerschlossenen Quellen," Theologische Literaturzeitung 82 (1957) 401–408]. The Mandaeans probably developed from a heretical Jewish baptist sect under Gnostic influence. Mandaean influence upon the NT is improbable, though remote parallelism is to be expected from their common Palestinian background.

See Also: GNOSTICISM; ARAMAIC; MANICHAEISM.

Bibliography: Texts and translations. M. LIDZBARSKI, Ginza: Der Schatz oder das Grosse Buch der Mandäer (Göttingen 1925); Das Johannesbuch der Mandäer, 2 v. (Giessen 1915). E. S. DROWER, The Canonical Prayerbook of the Mandaeans (Leiden 1959); Diwan Abatur or Progress through the Purgatories (Studi e Testi 151; 1950); The Haran Gawaita and the Baptism of Hibil-Ziwa (Studi e Testi 176; 1953); The Thousand and Twelve Questions (Berlin 1960). Bibliographies. S. A. PALLIS, Essay on Mandaean Bibliography 1560-1930 (London 1933). S. SCHULZ, "Die Bedeutung neuer Gnosisfunde für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft," Theologische Rundschau 26 (1960) 301-329. Studies. W. BRANDT, Die Mandäer, ihre Religion und ihre Geschichte (Amsterdam 1915). J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 6:1343-47. C. COLPE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957-65) 4:709-712. E. S. DROWER, The Mandaeans of Iraq and Iran (Oxford 1937; reprint 1962); The Secret Adam (Oxford 1960). K. RUDOLPH, Die Mandäer, 2 v. (Göttingen 1960-61) v. 1 Prolegomena: Das Mandäerproblem, v. 2 Der Kult. E. S. DROWER and R. MACUCH, A Mandaic Dictionary (Oxford 1963).

[G. W. MACRAE]

MANDATUM, ACADEMIC

According to Canon 812 of the 1983 Code of CANON LAW, those who teach theological disciplines in Catholic institutions of higher learning must have a mandatum from the competent ecclesiastical authority. The Application of Ex Corde Ecclesiae for the United States, approved by the bishops of the United States in 1999 and granted recognitio by the Holy See in 2000, defines the mandatum as "fundamentally an acknowledgment by Church authority that a Catholic professor of a theological discipline is a teacher within the full communion of the Catholic Church." It "recognizes the professor's commitment and responsibility to teach authentic Catholic doctrine and to refrain from putting forth as Catholic teaching anything contrary to the Church's magisterium." Guidelines for granting the mandatum, approved by the bishops in 2001, define the theological disciplines as Sacred Scripture, DOGMATIC THEOLOGY, MORAL THEOLOGY, Pastoral Theology, Canon Law, LITURGY, and Church History. The competent ecclesiastical authority for granting the mandatum is the bishop of the diocese in which the Catholic university or college is located. The bishop may also grant it through a delegate.

[J. STRYNKOWSKI]

MANDIČ, LEOPOLD BOGDAN, ST.

Baptized Bogdan (Adeodato in Italian); also known as Leopold da Castelnovo (Castronovo); Capuchin priest; b. May 12, 1866, Castelnuovo of Càttaro (Herceg Novi, Kotor Bay in Croatian), southern Dalmatia, Bosnia-Hercegovina; d. July 30, 1942, Padua, Venetia, Italy. Bogdan was the 11th of 12 children in a noble but poor family headed by Peter Mandič, who owned a fishing fleet, and Carlotta Zarevič, daughter of Countess Elena Bujovič. Bogdan began his seminary studies at Udine, Venetia, Italy Nov. 16, 1882, with the desire to work for the unification of Orthodox and Catholic Christians in foreign lands, but his Capuchin superiors knew that his frail health could not withstand the hardships. He received the habit and took the name Leopold at Bassano del Grappa, Vicenza in 1884. After pronouncing his vows in 1885, Leopold studied for the priesthood at Padua, where he made his solemn profession in 1888, and Venice, where he was ordained in 1890. Following assignments in various friaries, in 1906 he was transferred to Padua, where he remained for the rest of his life, except for one year's incarceration during World War I because he would not renounce his Croat nationality. In Padua, he was known for his cheerfulness, modesty, care for the sick, and his patient compassion in the confessional, where he heard confessions extended hours every day, and his penances and prayer "for the full reunification of the separated Oriental and Latin Churches" (canonization homily). Leopold was beatified by Pope Paul VI May 2, 1976, and canonized by Pope John Paul II Oct. 16, 1983.

Feast: May 12 (Capuchins).

Bibliography: L. MANDIČ, Spisi Svetoga Leopolda Bogdana Mandiča, ed. O. H. BORAK (Zagreb 1992). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 68 (1976) 548–550; 76 (1984) 937–944. L'Osservatore Romano Eng. ed. 1976, n. 20, 6–7; 1983, n. 43, 1, 3. T. CATTAROSSI, Leopoldo Mandič: valori umani nell'azione pastorale (Rome 1980). L. GUTWENGER, Pater Leopold Mandič, der Heilige zwischen Ost und West: ein charismatischer Beichtvater (Stein am Rhein 1983). F. DA RIESE PIO X, Beato Leopoldo Mandič da Castelnovo: servì i pecca-tori per l'unità della Chiesa (Rome 1976). U. SUMAN, C'era una volta padre Leopoldo: la bontà di un santo in 50 racconti (Padua 1993).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MANDONNET, PIERRE

French Dominican historian and medievalist who zealously promoted the history of the DOMINICANS, THO-MISM, and ARISTOTELIANISM in the 13th century; b. Beaumont (Puy-de-Dôme), Feb. 26, 1858; d. at the Saulchoir, Jan. 4, 1936. Mandonnet entered the Dominicans in 1882, was ordained in 1887, and from 1891 to 1918 was professor of church history at the University of Fribourg, Switzerland. He withdrew to Paris in 1919 and to the Saulchoir in 1927.

His Siger de Brabant et l'averroïsme latin au XIII e siècle (2 v., 2d ed. Louvain 1908-11) marked an era in the study of doctrinal history. Among other notable works are Le Décret d'Innocent XI contre le probabilisme (Paris 1903) and Dante le théologien (2d ed. Paris 1935). He established a solid foundation for Thomistic studies with Des Écrits Authentiques de saint Thomas d'Aquin (2d ed. Fribourg 1910); Bibliographie Thomiste, written in collaboration with J. Destrez (Paris 1921); and the periodical Bulletin thomiste, which he also established, together with Société, Bibliothèque, and Institut historique d'études thomistes. In collaboration with Father Coconnier, in 1893 he founded the Revue thomiste at Fribourg, where in 1925 he published a series of studies on the life of St. Thomas. In addition to his numerous books, articles, and historical notes on Dominican history, including Les Dominicains et la découverte de l'Amérique (Paris 1893) and the posthumous collection compiled by M. H. Vicaire, S. Dominique, l'idée, l'homme et l'oeuvre (2 v. Paris 1938, Eng. St. Dominic and His Work tr. M. B. Larkin, Milwaukee 1944), are his studies on the Order of Penance, especially Les Règles et le gouvernement de l'ordo de Poenitentia au XIII e siècle (Paris 1902).

Bibliography: Année Dominicaine 72 (1936) 41–48. "In Memoriam," Analecta Sacri Ordinis Praedicatorum 22 (1935–36) 370–374. Nova et Vetera 13 (1938) 158–168. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 6:1348. Mélanges Mandonnet, 2 v. (Bibliothèque Thomiste; Le Saulchoir 1930) 13, 14; 1:7–17.

[M. H. VICAIRE]

MANEGOLD OF LAUTENBACH

Canon regular; teacher and polemical writer on the papal side in the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE; b. Lautenbach (Alsace), c. 1030; d. Marbach, soon after 1103. At first he was a wandering master in France. He entered the monastery of Lautenbach shortly before 1084, although he had previously been married. He became known as the prefect of the schools in Alsace. Against the Emperor HENRY IV he wrote Manegoldi ad Gebhardum liber (ed. K. Francke, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Libelli de lite 1:308-340), a violent polemical treatise defending a contractual theory of kingship. His Opusculum contra Wolfelmum Coloniensem (Patrologia Latina 155:147-176) warns Christians against the dangers of the study of pagan poets and philosophers. In 1086, he fled from his opponents to the monastery of Raitenbuch (Bavaria); he became dean there, and later, prior of the monastery of MARBACH in Alsace. After attending the synod of Tours (1096) with Pope URBAN II, he was imprisoned by the imperialist party in 1098. Among his numerous writings were commentaries on Scripture, Plato, and Ovid.

Bibliography: F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi (Madrid 1949–61) v.3. M. T. STEAD, "Manegold of Lautenbach," English Historical Review 29 (1914) 1–15. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 3:25–28, 175–180. F. CHÂTILLON, "Recherches critiques sur les différents personnages nommés Manegold," Revue du moyen -âge latin 9 (1953) 153–170. T. GREGORY, Platonismo medievale (Rome 1958). J. GROSS, "Die Erbsündenlehre Manegolds von Lautenbach nach seinem Psalmen-Kommentar," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschicte 71 (1960) 252–261.

[F. COURTNEY]

MANETTI, TERESA MARIA DELLA CROCE, BL.

Baptized Teresa Adelaida Cesina, also known as Teresa di Firenze (Teresa of Florence), foundress of the Third Order Carmelite Sisters of Saint Teresa (Congregazione delle Carmelitane di S. Teresa); b. March 2, 1846, San Martino a Campi Bisenzio (near Florence), Tuscany, Italy; d. there, April 23, 1910. Daughter of Salvatore Manetti and Rosa Bigali, Teresa sought to alleviate the difficulties of others. In 1872, she retired with a few friends to the countryside, where they could pray, work together, and provide a Christian education to local children. Their formal religious community, founded July 15, 1874 with the arrival of other young women, combined the contemplative Carmelite spirituality of prayer and Eucharistic Adoration with apostolic work in parishes, schools, and mission fields. On July 16, 1876, Teresa was admitted to the Third Order of Discalced Carmelites and changed her name to Teresa della Croce. In 1877, the sisters opened their home to orphans. The first twenty-seven sisters were veiled in the Discalced Carmelite habit, July 12, 1888. In 1902, her special desire to have perpetual adoration was granted. Before her death, Teresa saw the institute receive approbation by Pope Saint Pius X (Feb. 27, 1904) and the first sisters leave to establish missions in Lebanon (1904) and Palestine (1907). The woman of fervent devotion and "angelic innocence" died at age sixty-four. Her writings were approved Nov. 27, 1937, and the beatification process opened in Rome in 1944. She was declared venerable in 1975 and a decree issued on the approval of a miracle in Nov. 1985. Pope John Paul II beatified her at Florence, Italy, Oct. 19, 1986.

Feast: April 23 (Carmelites).

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1986) 1144. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 39 (1986) 9.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MANHARTER

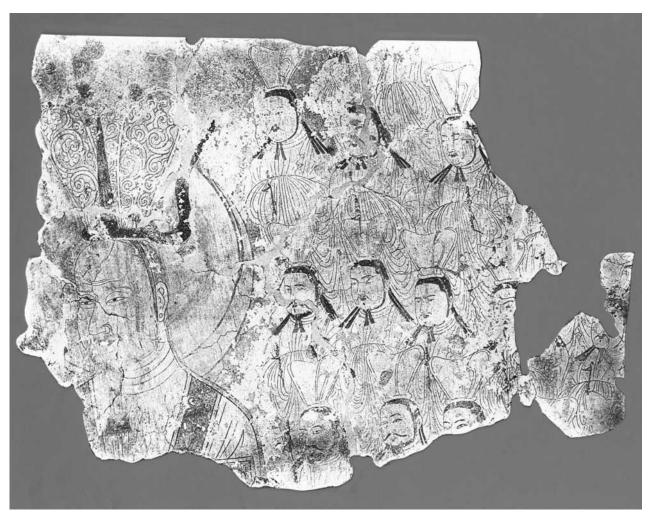

Known also as Hagleitnerianer or as Michaelsbrüder, members of a small, short-lived schismatical sect in the Austrian Tirol. The Tirolean uprising of 1809 found religious expression in the refusal of the peasants, particularly in the Brixenthal, to accept the ecclesiastical changes introduced by the Bavarians or to receive the ministrations of priests who had taken the oath of allegiance to Napoleon despite his excommunication by Pius VII. Taking its name from a farm called Untermanhart that belonged to one of its key figures, Sebastian Manzl, the group found a powerful advocate in a local priest, Kaspar Hagleitner (1779-1836). Its members refused to attend local churches and held services of their own; they even traveled long distances to receive the Sacraments from Hagleitner. When the area was restored to Austrian rule in 1816 and placed under the jurisdiction of the See of Salzburg, the sect continued to exist, because it protested also against innovations and mitigations in Austrian Church discipline. Manzl led a deputation to Rome in 1825 to seek reconciliation, which was achieved in 1826 through the efforts of Archbishop Gruber of Salzburg. But a small group at Inntal refused to submit and persisted in its sectarianism. Not until the end of the 19th century did the Manharter disappear.

Bibliography: A. FLIR, Die Manharter (Innsbruck 1852). W. SCHATZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1350–51.

[W. B. SLOTTMAN]

MANICHAEISM

Once considered a Christian heresy, Manichaeism is now regarded as a complex dualistic religion essentially Painting fragment believed to depict Mani and followers, 8th or 9th century, Turfan region of China.

gnostic in character. Its founder, Mānī, Manes, Μάνης, Μανιχαίος, Manichaeus, was born in the year 527 of the Babylonian astronomers, and the year 4 of Artaban V, last of the Arsacids, probably April 14, A.D. 216. His father, Patek (Πατήκιος, Fātak, Futtak), who came apparently from Hamadan, the ancient Ecbatana in Media, descended from the Haskanyas, a dynasty of the Arsacids, a Parthian stock. His mother, Mēis, Utākhim, Taashit, Karossa, or Maryam (the name best attested by the Arabic, Syriac, and Greek traditions) came from the family of the Kamsarakan, likewise a dynasty of the Arsacids. Mānī, of Armenian race and of aristocratic lineage, became a Babylonian through his place of birth. There are two traditions regarding its locality. The first and better tradition insists on Mardīnū, in the district of Nahr Kūthā in Northern Babylonia, a city situated on the canal that connects the Euphrates and the Tigris, south of Al-Madain (Ctesiphon-Seleucia) and Daīr-Qunna. The second tradition, represented by Theodore Bar Khonai (8th century A.D.), holds for Abrūmya near Gaukhai, in the center of Mesene in Southern Babylonia.

The father of Mānī, a religious man, had left his country as an émigré very probably after the decisive victory of the Sassanids over the Arsacids. He became a member of a baptist sect in Babylonia, the Mughtasilas. This sect, which abstained from meat, held views hostile to wine and marriage, and was, perhaps, related to the Mandaeans, made a definite impression on the young Mānī.

He owed his faith to a double revelation. According to the Arabic and Coptic traditions, in 539 and 551 of the Seleucid Era (A.D. 228–229 and 240–241), Mānī, at the ages of 12 and 24, respectively, received from the angel at-Taum, the messenger of the King of the Paradise of Lights, his mission as preacher of a gnosis, a definitive and ultimate divine revelation. At the age of 24 the preacher left Babylonia, the crossroads of the religions of East and West. He reached India by boat just at the end of the reign of the Persian King Ardashīr, when his son, Shāpūr I, conquered the banks of the Indus.

India, the farthest point of Mānī's first missionary journey, influenced the subsequent development of his thought. He returned by boat to Persia, from Persia he went to Mesene, then to Asōrestān (classical Babylonia), and thence to Media and Parthia. He sojourned also for some time at Karka at the head of the Persian Gulf.

After this great missionary tour, Mānī, now well known as a young religious reformer, was summoned to court by Shāpūr I, successor of Ardashīr in 553 of the Seleucid Era (A.D. 241–242). In the same year Shāpūr declared war on Rome, against the Emperor Gordian III. Probably he saw in Mānī a man who, thanks to his power of synthesis and his talent as a religious leader, would be capable of serving his political designs toward the Roman Empire, and he took Mānī into his entourage. This circumstance marks the first expansion of Manichaeism in the West, and perhaps also the definitive synthesis of the Manichaean gnosis through the addition of the Christian element, after the missionary travels in Babylon and India.

Manichaean missionaries subsequently infiltrated the Roman Empire, especially Egypt, but they were harried and persecuted as enemies of the Roman people. Mānī continued his religious activity during 30 years, enjoying the protection of Shāpūr. This protection, combined with Mānī's unusual personality, explains the great expansion of the movement. In April 273, Hormisdas succeeded his father and likewise protected the prophet; from April 274, to July 277, Bahrām I, his brother, ruled the Persian Empire. Under Bahrām the leaders of Mazdaism assumed control, accused Mānī of heresy, and convinced the King of his guilt. The King ordered Mānī's arraignment. He was thrown into prison at Gundēshāpūr (Belāpāt), in Susiana, and, worn out, he died 26 days later, at the end of March 276 or 277. His head was exposed above the gate of the city. Later his disciples buried his remains at Ctesiphon.

Mānī had attained his 60th year. As the founder of a revealed religion, a book religion, a missionary religion, and as the prophet of Babylon, he attracted a large number of apostles and disciples who subsequently traversed the world, preached in the languages of Asia, Africa, and Europe, and made Manichaeism a universal religion, of which a few living vestiges remain in the 20th century.

Missionary Routes of the Religion of Light

"I have come from the land of Babel to make my cry heard throughout the whole world" (Frag. Turf. M4).

The Routes in Central and Eastern Asia. The sojourn of Mānī in India is attested by all the traditions. Archeological traces of the existence of his religion are found near the ancient Bāmiyan, on the confines of Bactriana, Persia, and India. Numerous influences on the religions of Tibet were noted by missionaries in the 18th century. At the beginning of the 20th century some thousands of fragments of Manichaean literature, found at Turfan in western China, furnished information on the spread of the religion in Asia. In 621 a Manichaean temple was erected at Singanfu in China. The king of the Uighurs, a Turkish people of Central Asia, in 762 accepted the Religion of Light as the official religion of his state. He became a proselyte and influenced some Chinese princes, so that in 768, an imperial edict gave the Manichaeans authorization to erect temples in China. When the Khirghiz came down from Siberia, and in 840 destroyed the kingdom of the Uighurs, the Manichaean missionaries took advantage of the situation, pushed into Siberia, and established themselves in the valley of the Yenisei River. The via Serica was the main route of their penetration from Persia into China. Under the pressure of the peoples of the North, the Uighurs fell back upon the Chinese Empire, bringing with them so many apostles of Manichaeism that an imperial edict of 843 made Manichaeism a forbidden religion. This was a signal for an emigration to the South, where, in the province of Fukien, traces of Manichaeism were discovered in the 17th centu-

In Central Asia the Mongols of Genghis Khan definitely ruined the sect in the 13th century. However, it maintained itself in Manchuria until an edict of 1646 completely suppressed it. Recent discoveries, supplementing the ancient traditions, attest the presence of Mānī in India. He himself or one of his disciples sojourned in Christian communities of Malabar c. 270. Thus Babylon, for more than a 1,000 years, covered Asia with an unceasing flow of missionaries.

Routes to the West. Although driven from Babylonia by persecutors, the Manichaeans returned, as to their home port, in each period of calm. From Babylon their missionaries set out also for the West, where Mānī had made his first tour during the Persian Wars (242–243). In any case, the route from Mesopotamia to the West can be clearly traced through the anti-Manichaean Christian and pagan polemics written to stem the spread of the doctrine of Mānī. Syria, which had been prepared by the gnosis of Bardesanes, was a fertile ground for Manichaeism, but the treatises of "Mānī, apostle of Jesus Christ," written in or translated into Syriac, met a formidable adversary in St. EPHREM (d. 373). In his struggle against the heresy, Ephrem himself composed popular polemic songs or hymns. The existence of a flourishing Manichaean community at Edessa in the 5th century bears witness to the persistence of this teaching. The Acta Archelai [GCS] constituted in 325 a first anti-Manichaean summa by Manichaeism's Christian opponents. This work and its MS tradition show that in the period of Constantine, 50 years after the death of its founder, Manichaeism had spread widely in the Roman Empire. TITUS, Bishop of Bostra (d. 371), read the "Mysteries of Mani" and wrote a refutation of it for the Christians of the Decapolis [Patrologia Graeca 18:1069–1264; R. P. Casey, Harvard Theological Review 21 (1928) 97-111]. To combat the Manichaeans, Titus found it necessary also to compose a Christian commentary on the Gospel [Homilies on Luke, ed. J. Sickenberger (Leipzig 1901) Texte und Untersuchungen zur Gerschicte der altchristlichen Literatur 21].

In 390 at Antioch, JOHN CHRYSOSTOM fulminated in his powerful eloquence against Mānī ("Homilies on Matthew," Patrologia Graeca 58:975–1058). About 348 CYRIL OF JERUSALEM instructed catechumens who had renounced Manichaeism (Catech. 6, Patrologia Graeca 33:331–1180). In 376 EPIPHANIUS, Bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, devoted the largest section in his book against heresies to the Manichaeans [GCS].

Manichaeism entered Egypt very early. Already in 297, following a revolt against Rome in which the Manichaeans participated, a harsh edict of Diocletian had ordered the annihilation of the sect. The Manichaeans came from Mesopotamia by sea, disembarked on the shores of the Red Sea, and followed the route of merchants engaged in transporting goods from Asia. The center from which they spread was probably Hypsela, south of Assiut in the Thebaid. From Upper Egypt they went down the Nile to engage in their apostolate in the Mediterranean lands. At the end of the 3d century a bishop of Alexandria published a pastoral letter against them, which coincided in time with the edict of Diocletian [C. H. Roberts, Catal. Gk. and Lat. Papyri 3 (Manchester 1938) no. 469]. The 3,000 Manichaean leaves found in 1930 at Medīnēt-Mādi [C. Schmit and H. J. Polotzky, Mani-Fund (Berlin 1931)] prove that Diocletian's edict did not stop the new religion. About 339 SERAPION, Bishop of Thmuis, wrote a refutation of Manichaeism [ed. R. P. Casey (Cambridge 1931)]. In the same years a pagan, Alexander of Lycopolis, having given up Manichaeism, refuted it on the basis of reason [ed. A. Brinkmann, (Leipzig 1895)]. Like Serapion, Didymus of Alexandria, about the end of the 4th century, found it necessary to write a commentary on those sacred texts the Manichaeans were citing in support of their position (Patrologia Graeca 39:1085-1110).

From Egypt Manichaeism passed to Africa Proconsularis, and from 373 to 383 AUGUSTINE was a Manichaean hearer. MONTANISM had prepared the way for the new religion, and Africa, furthermore, was receptive to teachings from Asia. Following his conversion to Christianity, Augustine fought for some 15 years to save the Bible from Manichaean interpretation (J. Ries, RevÉtAug 231–243). After being driven from Africa, the Manichaeans went to Spain, where in 434 VINCENT OF LERINS attacked them in his Commonitorium (Patrologia Latina 50:637–686). A formula of abjuration (Patrologia Latina 65:23–28) from Lyons shows that Manichaeism was regarded as a danger to Christians in 526. In this period St. CAESARIUS OF ARLES denounced the immundissimi Manichaei to his flock.

Meanwhile, Rome and Italy were infected, and imperial edicts were issued against the sect by Valentinian I in 372 (Codex Theodosianus 16.5.3) and Theodosius I in 382 (ibid. 16.5.9). Theodosius II (408–450), Anastasius I (491–518), Justin I (518–527), and Justinian (in 529) attacked the Manichaeans without mercy. From 440 on the Manichaeans, in fleeing from the Vandals, surged back into Italy. The letter of Pope LEO I in 444, ad episcopos per Italiam, indicates that there were Manichaean infiltrations of the Catholic clergy. In the same year the Pope had the error condemned by a Roman synod. An inscription at Salonae in Dalmatia gives proof of the presence of Manichaean communities in the Balkans from the 4th century.

Secondary Routes. A later neo-Manichaean current came from Asia, perhaps from Armenia, where Bishop Eznik of Kolb opposed Mānī c. 441. The various new dualistic teachings called Paulicianism, Bogomilism, or Catharism were attacked as Manichaean doctrines by Christian polemical writers of Byzantium and the West from the 6th to the 15th century. Many doctrinal analogies and practices seemed to connect them with Manichaeism. These dualistic systems penetrated deeply into every social milieu of western Asia, the Balkans, Italy, and France. Their history is known in detail, but their direct connection with the doctrine of Mānī is far from established.

Here again the writings of Christian opponents make it possible to follow the expansion of the sects. The decree of Justinian (529) occasioned the dissemination of a Manichaean tract that led to a reply and refutation by ZACHARIAS THE RHETOR (d. 553), Bishop of Mytilene [ed. A. Demetrakopoulos, Bibl. Ecc. (Leipzig 1866) 1:1–18]. In the 9th century an important body of Byzantine literature attacked the dualistic heresy and reused certain documents of the 4th and 5th centuries. Peter Higumenos [Epitome, ed. J. C. L. Gieseler, in Appendix ad Petri Siculi historiam (Göttingen 1849)], George the Monk (Patrologia Graeca 110:883–891), Peter of Sicily (History, Patrologia Graeca 104:1305–50), and Photius (Patrologia Graeca 102: 15–264) strove to uproot the evil, while the Byzantine Church refined and imposed formulas of abjuration [G. Ficker, ZKirchgesch (1906) 27:443–464].

In this period of Paulicianism at Byzantium, another neo-Manichaean movement was spreading in Bulgaria, namely, Bogomilism. Michael Psellos [1018-78 (Patrologia Graeca 122:818-876)] and Euthymius of Zigabenos [early 12th century (Patrologia Graeca 130:305-325)] wrote against it. But the heresy had a stubborn life and flourished in the Second Bulgarian Empire during the 13th century. The treatises of Cosmas the Presbyter [10th century, ed. H. C. Puech and A. Vaillant (Paris 1945)] and of John of TORQUEMADA [1388-1468 (ed. N. Lopez Martinez and V. Proaño Gil, Burgos 1958)] indicate that contemporaries were convinced that they were dealing with a form of Manichaeism. The history of the manuscript of the Acta Archelai is significant in this regard, and the Manichaean routes can be traced through this history alone. A Latin translation of the original text circulated in Rome and Africa c. 400. New copies existed in Italy in the 6th century, in the period of the condemnations by Gelasius I and Gregory the Great. From the 9th century copies of the MSS of the Acta Archelai were numerous in France—a sign that they were utilized against the ALBIGENSES and the CATHARI [L. Traube, Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenshaften zu München, (1903) 533-539.

The doctrine preached by Mānī is not dead. The Swiss Rudolf STEINER (1861–1925), founder of ANTHRO-POSOPHY, attracted numerous disciples. Thus, having adopted Manichaean and Catharian teachings, they wish to unite again in an esoteric way with the prophet of Babylon who, according to them, is the true continuator of the message of Jesus.

The Elements of Manichaean Doctrine

These elements can best be analyzed and summarized under the respective headings given below.

Revealed Dualistic Gnosis. Like all forms of gnosis, Manichaeism has a dualistic conception of the structure of the world. It emphasizes this concept to the extreme, admitting from the very beginning of everything a radical duality and opposition, Light-Darkness, Good-Evil. The origin of the material world, of evil, of sin, is found in this duality of the two uncreated principles, the central point in Manichaeism's doctrine. There was a first time, the initium, the time of the total separation of the two kingdoms, Light-Darkness. Following a struggle of Darkness against Light, a cosmogonic movement resulted in the mingling of the two substances. This is the medi- um or middle time, the present universe. Through the ambassadors of Light who have succeeded one another since Adam, the third time, finis, is being prepared, the eschatological age in which will take place anew the separation that existed in the beginning. These ambassadors are called Seth, Abraham, Sem, Enos, Nikotheos, Henoch, perfect men. Light's great ambassadors of the revelation of the kingdom of Light are Buddha, ZOROASTER, Jesus, and the final seal of all revelation, Mānī. The definitive revelation came to Mānī through the angel, atTaum. All Manichaean texts exhibit a multitude of marvelous details as a kind of halo around the personality of the founder.

Totalitarian Gnosis. As a revealed religion and a dualistic system in its explanation of the beginning of the universe, Manichaeism proposes a tripartite conception of the world's history. Thus, totalitarian gnosis embraces all human knowledge—theology, theogony, cosmology, astronomy, geology, botany, anthropology, history, soteriology, and eschatology. The structure of the system is markedly intellectual and postulates knowledge and understanding as the first condition of salvation for its followers. Gnosis is a message destined for men, destined to make a redeeming church. It was necessary, therefore, to give it a popular aspect and make it acceptable to simple minds. It is in this popularizing that Mānī's personal work is so amazing; it gave his teaching the power to win the masses.

Living Gnosis. Mānī, endowed with the ability to make a religious synthesis and with a fertile imagination, worked out a series of cosmogonic and soteriological myths capable of arousing the enthusiasm of the West as well as of the East. He had the art of adapting these myths to the religious conceptions of the various peoples. There are two basic types of Manichaean myths. (1) The first describes a struggle between two trees, one of Good, the other of Evil. Titus of Bostra and Severus of Antioch especially have noted this presentation of the myth, and it is frequent also in the Coptic texts of the Fayum. This form, moreover, is mingled with the second. (2) The Manichaean cosmogony is presented, too, under the form of an epic in which the creation of the world is the result of a battle in three phases between the powers of Good and Evil, the celestial spirits and the infernal powers. This is the myth of the two kingdoms, each governed by a head, the Father of Greatness and the Prince of Darkness, respectively.

These two types resume the Biblical history from the creation of Adam and Eve, which is regarded as an element at the beginning of the second historical time. Each myth presents basic information intelligible to all, the antithesis Good-Evil, Light-Darkness. In brief: a very simple cosmic experience served as the foundation for a religious structure at once cosmogonic and soteriological.

Perfect Gnosis. Manichaean dogmatics is concerned with the explanation of these myths directed to a practical end: an attitude of knowledge, a grasp of the mysteries, a perfect gnosis (τέλεια γνῶσις)—at once knowledge, acceptance, and moral conformity. Since humanity is living in the second historical time, the cosmogony of current development is already in part a soteriology, a process of salvation, and of liberation of Light, the prisoner of Darkness in Creation.

Manichaean ethic or morality is based on this dogmatic foundation. It too is a soteriology, but oriented entirely toward eschatology, to the liberation of light. Eschatology governs all moral life and gives the Manichaeans, in a perspective of hope, the strength to endure the difficulties and persecutions inherent in the missionary life imposed on the elect.

Duality, present everywhere in the visible world, dictates the moral attitude to be adopted in effecting a necessary division in daily realities. Light resides in knowledge, revelation, spirit, soul, heaven, the heights, repose, endurance—in all that is characterized by the Good. Darkness is ignorance, matter, body, depth, unrest—briefly, Evil. The Manichaean learns to understand and adopt these antitheses, and he proceeds to salvation, to the kingdom of Light, which will be totally free after the final destruction of the cosmos by an eschatological fire.

Practical and Missionary Gnosis. Creation continues to take place. It is indispensable that salvation be accomplished even in the very process of creation. In other words, the cosmogonic myth and the soteriological myth compenetrate each other on this dualistic background. The whole cosmos is engaged in a struggle. Cosmic mechanisms, history, human life, religious message—all are found in the microcosm that is constituted by each man and that has to assume a twofold attitude. (1) Negative morality, abstention. This morality is dictated by the acute knowledge and consciousness of evil, of sin residing in matter as in its substance. This morality is a form of asceticism rather than an ethic: withdrawal, separation, abstinence from meat, wine, and sexual contacts; renunciation of property and work, frequent repose, war, hunting, business, and agriculture. The elect must live this ascetic life to the highest degree. (2) Positive morality. Manichaeism goes further. It wishes to give a consciousness of evil that impels to positive liberation and urges the need of redemption, the liberating action of the particles of Light. Every Manichaean is charged with this message of salvation. He must make known around him the method and the means of salvation. This method has its repercussions in all the details of daily life, even down to the menu of the disciple, who must distinguish luminous foods (melons, fruits) from dark foods (wine, meat). Manichaean gnosis makes its devotees carriers of revelation, conscious of their role in a dualistic world that is to be saved by them. The refusal to accept truth—Manichaean dualism—is one of the greatest of human faults; it is the refusal of salvation and means certain damnation.

From all this it is easy to understand both the enthusiasm of the Manichaean church and its violent clash with other religions and, especially, with civil authority charged with the organization and regulation of social life

The Principal Elements in the Manichaean Myth.

The fundamental mythical element in the struggle of the two kingdoms, Primus Homo, Primal Man, is an emanation of the Father of Greatness, king of the Paradise of Light. Through the Great Spirit, the Sophia of the Father and Mother of the Living, the Father orders Primal Man to engage in battle against Darkness in its attack on the kingdom of Light. The Primal Man is clothed in an armor of five luminous elements: Light, Wind, Fire, Water, and Air. These five elements constitute his soul, his life. The struggle ends in the defeat of Primal Man. He is knocked senseless and lies unconscious in the midst of Darkness. which takes away his armor and swallows his soul, the five luminous elements. By this soul Darkness gives birth to matter, ὕλη. On coming to himself Primal Man cries out and calls for help. When his cry is repeated seven times, it is heard in the kingdom of Light. This is the first cry of salvation that every Manichaean must repeat to the end of the second time. Through this cry salvation begins. The Father of Greatness, through the Mother of the Living, causes the emanation of a second luminous power and sends it forth, the Living spirit armed with his five sons. He reaches the frontier of the kingdom of Darkness and shouts out an appeal to Primal Man, who is a prisoner there.

The dark matter is poisoned and put to sleep by the five luminous elements taken from Primal Man, who hears the cry of the Living Spirit and replies. The cry and response, these two divine hypostases, meet and form the prototype of Manichaean salvation: message and acceptance. The Living Spirit, with the help of the Mother of the Living, gives his right hand to Primal Man and leads him back into the Paradise of Light. The savior is saved; he suffered, and he had need of salvation.

The Primal Man left his soul, namely, the five luminous elements, a prisoner of Darkness. These elements, too, must be freed and brought back to the Paradise of Light. This is again the work of the Living Spirit, who is charged with punishing the Archons of Darkness, with building a prison for them, and with liberating the particles of Light.

The Living Spirit seizes Light from Darkness; he thus creates the sun and the moon in order to make them two conveyors of Light. Then he tears off the skins of the Archons to spread out the ten firmaments. From their bones he makes the mountains, and from their flesh and excrement he makes the earth. The universe is arranged in eight regions and is the result of a mingling of Light and Darkness. As long as all the luminous souls are not liberated, it is necessary to mount guard in the universe. The Living Spirit gives this guard duty to his five sons: Splenditenens holds the firmaments; the King of Honor is charged with collecting again the particles of Light; Adamas, armed with sword and shield, holds back Darkness; the King of Glory keeps the vault of the sky turning; and Atlas, the Giant, bears on his shoulders the eight regions of the world. The Living Spirit creates also three giant wheels charged with effecting the ascent of the liberated particles of Light.

The Third Messenger. This myth describes the temptation of the Archons. The problem is how to liberate the luminous particles in this universe. The Father of Greatness sends a third emanation, the principal personage in which is called the Third Messenger, Tertius Legatus, the father of the 12 Virgins of Light (the 12 signs of the Zodiac). The Third Messenger puts in motion the three liberating wheels of Light and creates a luminous column (the milky way), which is to conduct the particles of Light to the Moon. The Moon will pour them into the Sun (lunar phenomena). During the work of putting the celestial machinery into operation, the bodies of the Virgins of Light appear to the Archons, who are both male and female. These, aroused by their concupiscence, let fall upon the earth their semen and abortions, respectively. Vegetation, trees, and fruits are the products of the demoniac semen of the male Archons. The abortions of the female Archons develop, become demons, devour the fruits, copulate, and give birth to the animals.

The Myth of Adam and Eve. The Prince of Darkness and the leaders of the Archons, always under the influence of their concupiscence for the Virgins of Light, try to collect all the light particles seized from their kingdom. The image of the Third Messenger has impressed them and will serve as a model for creating a living couple, male and female. Saklas and Nebroel, the chief pair of Archons, devour the demons filled with Light. They create a pair of dark origin but made to the image of the Tertius Legatus. This pair is Adam and Eve, and their first-born, Seth, will be the Father of the Human Race. Procreation, then, is of demoniac origin and has as its purpose the enslavement of the luminous particles. These myths of the temptation of the Archons and the creation of Adam and Eve are the basis for all the accusations of eroticism and immorality cast at the sect.

The Third Messenger has put in operation the liberating machine, salvation, while the struggle between Light and Darkness continues. Adam has already received a message from the Kingdom of Light. The prophets will follow and announce the mysteries of the universe and of redemption. After the three great messengers, Zoroaster, Buddha, and Jesus, will come Mani, charged with the last message, with the definitive teaching on origins and eschatology, and with the organization of the Church of Light. This world will last only for a time. Some day the five bearers, sons of the Living Spirit, will receive a signal from the Kingdom of Light, and they will let the universe fall. It will be destroyed in an infernal crash and will be consumed by a fire lasting for 1,468 years, after which all the luminous particles will have rejoined the Paradise of Light. This is the final stage in the Manichaean eschatology.

The Manichaean Church

The church $M\bar{a}n\bar{\imath}$ founded has two aspects under which it can be considered, both stemming from the nature of its message.

A Missionary Church. The appeal of Primal Man, the reply to this appeal, the emanation of liberating powers of Light, and the necessity of continuing this liberation in this created world were the principles upon which Mānī founded his church. The need to transmit the message made it a missionary church, the heir of the prophets, especially Zoroaster, Buddha, and Jesus, and the announcer of the Paraclete and of the final seal of revelation, Mānī. Mānī completed the earlier messages before teaching the origins and the end, and he organized his church, which was charged with making the message known. His disciples were to go through the world proclaiming the revealed mysteries and establishing and maintaining everywhere the state of redemption and of liberation.

A Religion of the Word. The call to salvation occupied an important place in the life of the Manichaean. Teaching was given first in the assembly of the community of the brethren, where an exposition of the mysteries of the world and salvation was presented, interspersed with liturgical chants that are filled also with doctrinal content. The Kephalaia and euchology of Medīnēt Mādi shed a new light on these assemblies, which were very calm, pious, and mystical. The popular and animated theology and liturgy, inspired perhaps by the method of Bardesanes, must have made a deep impression upon the elect and the auditors during these assemblies, which were the real center of the missionary life of the sect. These assemblies were the whole secret of the expansion of Manichaeism, for the eschatological hope, renewed by each liturgical meeting, rendered members capable of enduring indifference, hostility, and even persecutions.

An Organized Church. It was a fully organized church with two categories of members, the elect (electi, fideles, the perfect) and the auditors.

The Elect. These were the liberators of Light. They lived the whole doctrine, traveled, and preached. Three principles of abstinence marked their lives: the signaculum oris, watch over the senses, avoidance of blaspheming, and abstinence from meat and wine; the signaculum manus, watch over actions, abstention from work and from destruction of plants and animals; signaculum sinus, abstinence from all sexual contact. The elect took a ritual meal every day. This meal was necessary for the liberation of the light particles contained in their food. It was taken in an atmosphere of prayers and chants after the auditors had brought the elect fruits and melons gathered by their hands. Some scholars have considered this meal the eucharist of the sect. Fasts were frequent; every Sunday and Monday and during the whole month that preceded the Manichaean Easter, the great annual feast of the throne of the Master, the Bēma, the high point of the Manichaean liturgy. This feast, a commemoration of the death, the staurosis, of Mani, by the magnificence of its liturgical pomp and by the consciousness of the invisible but real presence of the Master upon his throne, placed at the top of five steps, gave unquestionably a new "paschal stimulus" to the Manichaean Church. The elect members led a priestly life, with all nature and all the auditors in their service. They awaited death as liberation in the certitude that they were going immediately to join the Paradise of Light.

The Auditors, or Catechumens. They represented a lesser perfection and were much more numerous. One of their functions consisted in participating in the liberation of the Light by procuring for the elect the necessary foods for their daily ritual meal. The moral code for them was less strict. They had to fast one day a week, on Sunday, and to abstain from procreation. Marriage was tolerated, concubinage was permitted, but the procreation of children was to be avoided. This life, unlike that of the elect, was not free from sins. It did not prepare the auditor for immediate entrance into the Kingdom of Light. After his death, he entered into transmigration (Greek, μεταγγισμός; Syriac, $ta\check{s}$ $p\bar{t}k\bar{a}$), a method of purification and means of liberation for the souls of auditors. By passing through a series of revolutions-metempsychosis in the true sense of the word—and by reincarnation in the luminous bodies of fruits, especially melons, and finally in the body of an elect, the souls of auditors were gradually liberated. The rapidity of this liberation was directly related to their usefulness in the service of the Manichaean community. Men who refused to accept this dualistic system were reincarnated in the souls of beasts and ended finally in hell. For them no salvation was possible.

This church also had a hierarchy, although the texts give little information about it. A supreme head, the successor of Mānī, 12 magistri, and 72 bishops governed the whole church. Manichaean priests were in charge of the local communities.

A Religion of the Book. Mānī reproached the founders of religion for not having written their doctrine themselves. He wished to avoid this omission in the case of his own church, which was charged with transmitting the last revelation. He himself was its sole author or transmitter. To be such, he invented an alphabet, a Western Aramaic script very close to the Syriac of Edessa, the literary and religious language of the Sassanid Empire and of the eastern provinces of the Roman Empire. He translated his works himself, or had them translated, into the languages of the peoples evangelized. According to the best established tradition, he wrote seven works.

The Shāpūragān was written in Middle Persian for King Shāpūr. Some fragments of this treatise on cosmogony and eschatology have been found at Turfan in Chinese Turkestan. All his other writings were probably composed in Syriac. The Gospel of Life, a doctrinal exposition in 22 chapters corresponding to the letters of the Syriac alphabet, was composed probably against the Diatessaron of Tatian, which enjoyed a wide dissemination in Babylonia. Some fragments of this work are found in the Turfan texts. The Treasure of Life, a treatise on anthropology and psychology, is known through some fragments preserved in the De fide contra Manichaeos of Augustine (Patrologia Latina 42:1143-44). A book entitled Pragmateia has not yet been found, and the same is true of the famous Book of Mysteries, which was written especially against the teachings of Bardesanes and seems to have been widely known in the Christian East. The Manichaean mythology is described in the Book of the Giants, of which a fair number of fragments were found at Turfan. There is also the precious corpus of the Letters of Mani. A collection of these in a Coptic version was discovered at Medīnēt Mādi and deposited in the Berlin Museum, but was carried off by the Soviets at the end of World War II. It seems definitely lost. Al-Bīrūnī (973–1048) read these seven books of Mānī, which in his time were difficult to find.

The discoveries of the 20th century at Turfan and in the Fayum have cast a new light on the literary importance of the disciples of Mānī. The production and the ornamentation of the religious books were very noble activities in the Religion of Light.

Historiography of Manichaeism

The investigation of Manichaeism since the Renaissance can be divided into three main periods. It is only in the 20th century, however, that, owing in part to new discoveries, Manichaeism has become properly understood and evaluated not as a Christian heresy but as a complex gnostic religion.

Manichaeism, a Christian Heresy (16th to 18th Centuries). During the whole medieval period there was a tendency to apply the term Manichaean to every heretic. The various dualistic doctrines, from Mānī to the Cathari and the Albigenses, seemed to be branches of the same tree. Following the publication of Luther's teachings on sin and free will, Catholic opponents spoke of a Manichaeus redivivus. This led some Protestant historians to investigate the life and work of the reformer of Babylon in order to clear the Reform of such accusations. Protestant controversy thus gave birth to the study of Manichaeism.

During two centuries apologetic works, historical researches, and Catholic and Protestant polemical books followed and refuted one another. Thus the 17th century became the first important period in the publication of sources and in the knowledge of Manichaeism, and more precisely of its so-called Western sources. To the work of anti-Manichaean writers already known (Augustine, Pope Leo the Great, and Fabius Marius Victorinus) were now added important texts: the Acta Archelai, works of Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius of Salamis, Alexander of Lycopolis, Serapion of Tmuis, Titus of Bostra, Didymus of Alexandria, Zacharias of Mytilene, John Damascene, Photius, and Peter of Sicily; and some formulas of abjuration against Manichaeism. This copious documentation, coming from the great Christian adversaries of Mani, permitted the development of a conception of the prophet's work in the perspective of Christian heresiology. Mānī, regarded as a Christian heretic, was repudiated by the Protestants, but in the eyes of Catholics he remained one of the founders of Luther's thought. From the end of the 17th century, however, investigation turned to other sources, especially Arabic and Syriac, which were independent of the struggle against Manichaeism.

In 1734 Isaac de Beausobre, a Calvinist historian, modified completely the Protestant concept of Manichaeism during the two previous centuries. He did his best to show that the teachings of Mānī were not the absurd collection of doctrines refuted by Western opponents, but constituted indeed, in the Church of Christ, a brilliant attempt at liberation, and that Mānī was a harbinger of the reform of Luther. His severe criticism of the Western authorities, his emphasis on the Oriental sources that were all but unknown, and his study on the use of the Apocrypha by the Manichaeans were all new elements that helped the subsequent research of the 18th century to disengage gradually the religion of Mānī from the simple cadre of Christian heresiology.

Manichaeism, a Great Oriental Religion (19th Century). In 1831 F. C. BAUR took a decisive step. He introduced Manichaean studies into the history of Oriental religions by presenting Mānī as the founder of a new faith. Baur gave full value to the known sources, Western as well as Oriental. Through these he got back to the origins of the dualism of the Babylonian prophet: Oriental forms of paganism, nature religions, and some traces of idolatry purified by contact with Parsiism, but especially the religion of India. According to Baur, Mānī took the essentials of his thought from Buddhism and later added some superficial elements from Christianity, especially his myth of a cosmological Jesus.

The research of Baur and his school was followed by the second important stage in the publication of sources shedding light on Manichaeism. The discovery of the Arab historians, and especially of the two great encyclopedias of the literature and religious ideas of the Orient, brought Manichaean studies into the sphere of Oriental studies. The two Arab authors who dominated this period of research were Sharastānī (A.D. 1086-1152) with his religious encyclopedia, Kital al-Milal wan-Nih'al, and the historian an-Nadīm, whose Fihrist (A.D. 987) gives a long account of the religion of Mānī based on the prophet's books themselves. These two authors worked on original documents and were free from all polemics. According to them, Marcion and Bardesanes were among the spiritual masters of Mānī. The study of these documents led G. Flügel to propose a new hypothesis: Manichaeism was an Asiatic religion that had its origins in the teaching of Zoroaster and in the Sabaism of the Mughtasilas. Mānī seized upon these religious currents and turned them into Biblical channels.

Toward the end of the 19th century Assyriology furnished new orientations. K. Kessler claimed that the Manichaean synthesis contained a current going back to the ancient Babylonian religion. Mānī had wished to give the Iranian peoples a more perfect teaching than that of the Sassanid priests. He went back, therefore, to the source itself of Zoroaster's thought, the Chaldeo-Babylonian beliefs. His thought developed in a framework that was very close to Zoroastrianism. In his final synthesis of a new universal religion, Mānī adopted the moral teaching of Buddhism and some elements from Christian vocabulary. To all this, it was necessary to add an indispensable popular element, namely, a cult. The religion of Mithra was at hand for this purpose. Manichaeism presents itself, accordingly, as a gnosis born at Babylon, the cradle of all the Asiatic gnoseis. A. HARNACK and W. BOUSSET adopted this hypothesis of Kessler.

The Great Discoveries of the 20th Century. The scientific expeditions of Grünwedel, Huth, A. von Le Coq, Sir Aurel Stein, É. Chavannes, and P. Pelliot, at the beginning of the 20th century, brought from the oasis of Turfan in Chinese Turkestan numerous Manichaean writings that were employed by Oriental communities in the 8th century A.D. The texts, written in Arsacid and Sassanid Pahlevi, in Sogdian, in Uighur, and in Chinese, shed full light on the beliefs and cult of the Manichaeans in Asia, which had spread from the center in the kingdom of the Uighurs (A.D. 762–840). The manuscripts of Turfan furnish examples of the Manichaean form of writing, which was derived from a Palmyrian alphabet.

The essential texts from Central Asia have been published. The most important documents are: (1) the Khuastuanift (ed. A. von Le Coq), a formulary of confession giving the list of sins against the ten commandments of the Manichaeans and the ceremonies of their confession; (2) a dogmatic treatise in Chinese found at Tuen-Huang (ed. É. Chavannes and P. Pelliot), which is a kind of collection of extracts taken from the various works of Mānī and intended for the instruction of the community; (3) liturgical texts, among them several collections of hymns. F. C. Burkitt, E. Waldschmidt, and W. Lentz have demonstrated the marked Christian influence on these Asiatic Manichaean texts.

In 1930 Egypt made an important contribution through the discovery (made at Medīnēt Mādi, in the Fayum) of a Manichaean library containing about 3,000 leaves in Coptic and dating from the period of St. Augustine. These texts, written on papyrus and bound into codices, have cast a new light on the "Religion of the Book" and on the respect that the sect gave to its sacred texts. The texts were divided between London (Chester Beatty) and Berlin (Carl Schmidt).

These Coptic texts are the most precious sources to date for the knowledge of Manichaeism. The Kephalaia, or capitula, a collection of the utterances of the Master, are presented under the form of discussions between Mānī and his disciples, and they date probably from the first generation. A collection of homilies on the Gospel of Life and an important collection of hymns furnish information on the apostolic life and life of prayer of the Manichaean communities in Egypt. A historical work and a collection of the founder's letters were, unfortunately, in the Berlin group of texts.

The publication of these various texts employed by flourishing Manichaean communities in Asia and Africa, and a comparative study of the patristic and Arabic sources published in the 17th and 18th centuries, have made possible a more exact knowledge of the Religion of Light. The new documents of the 20th century complete and often confirm the data of the earlier sources. They have moved the study of Manichaeism into a new and decisive phase, and from this stage it will help to clarify the history of gnostic movements in the early Christian centuries.

Bibliography: G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 9 (1927) 1841-95. H. J. POLOTSKY, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der Klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893-) Suppl. 6 (1935) 240-272. C. H. BEESON, Die grieschischen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (Leipzig 1905). A. A. MOON, The De Natura Boni of St. Augustine (Catholic University of America, Patristic Studies 88; Washington 1955) esp. xiv-xvi, 8-41. F. C. BURKITT, The Religion of the Manichees (Cambridge, Eng. 1925). A. V. WILLIAMS JACKSON, Researches in Manichaeism (New York 1932). H. C. PUECH, Le Manichéisme (Paris 1949). G. WIDENGREN, Mani und der Manichäismus (Stuttgart 1961). P. ALFARIC, Les Écritures manichéennes, 2 v. (Paris 1918-19). J. RIES, "Introduction aux études manichéennes," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 33 (1957) 453-482; 35 (1959) 362-409, with bibliography. C. SPANGENBERG, Historia Manichaeorum (Ursel 1578). I. DE BEAUSOBRE, Histoire de Manichée, 2 v. (Amsterdam 1734-39). F. C. BAUR, Das manichäische Religionssystem (Göttingen 1831; reprint 1928). G. FLÜGEL, Mani (Leipzig 1862). K. KESSLER, Mani (Berlin 1889). H. J. POLOTSKY and A. BÖ-HLIG, Kephalaia I (Stuttgart 1940). A. BÖHLIG, Probleme des manichäischen Lehrvortrages (Munich 1953). T. SÄVE-SÖDERBERGH, Studies in the Coptic Manichaean Psalmbook (Uppsala 1949). M. BUSSAGH and L. HAMBIS, "Manichaean Art," Encyclopedia of World Art (New York 1959-) 9:433-443, plates 281-287.

[J. RIES]

MANIFESTATION OF CONSCIENCE

Manifestation of Conscience is the revelation of intimate and personal matters made to another in order that the revealer might be guided more efficaciously by his director in the spiritual life. Intimate and personal matters alluded to would include such phenomena as good intentions, secret acts of virtue, special lights and graces, and also sins, faults, imperfections, weaknesses, propensities to evil, and special repugnances and attractions.

History. References to extrasacramental revelation of intimate matters are found as early as A.D. 300 in the Rules and Precepts of St. ANTHONY the Great of Egypt, and in the writings of St. BASIL the Great, St. JEROME, and JOHN CASSIAN, all of whom wrote in the late 4th or early 5th centuries.

St. Benedict, the patriarch of western monasticism, makes several references to the manifestation in his Rule.

He incorporates the manifestation of conscience into his monastic legislation as an implicit instrument of spiritual advancement. The significance of his testimony is primarily an extension of the area embraced by the manifestation to include not only imperfections and propensities to evil, but also all tendencies and aspirations to a more perfect observance.

Throughout the first 1,000 years of the Church's history the sole purpose of the manifestation of conscience was the spiritual advancement of the individual. There is no explicit awareness of any social benefits that the manifestation might effect or even occasion.

St. BONAVENTURE (1221–74) compares the provincial and local superiors of religious orders to Aaron and his sons, remarking that they ought to know the internal dispositions of each of their subjects. This intimate knowledge may be utilized by the superiors to apportion the burdens of religious observance according to the varying capacities of their subjects.

It is under the aegis of the Society of Jesus that the manifestation of conscience has come to its full term. For by adopting this now familiar yet still rather generic implement, and by effecting a number of adjustments, St. IGNATIUS (1491–1556) and the first legislators of the Society transformed the manifestation into a rigidly controlled yet rewarding apparatus of the spiritual life.

Within the framework of the legal system of the Society the manifestation of conscience underwent several modifications. These changes were not concerned with the nature or internal structure of the practice. They dealt with certain extrinsic features: the relation of the manifestation to the social order in the community; the obligation and frequency of the manifestation; and the numeric extension of qualified recipients.

Canonical History. The role of canon law in the development of the manifestation has been largely a negative one. Its relation to the subject at hand can be described under two historical divisions of unequal duration.

Throughout the first 18 centuries, the pope had limited his activity to the approbation of particular religious laws prescribing the manifestation. The attitude of the Church may be summarized as abstention from direct legislation on the matter—an extended silence, as it were, interrupted by a single isolated reference. This occurs in the constitution Cum ad regularem, issued by Clement VIII, March 19, 1603. Although this document does not use the phrase "manifestation of conscience," it prescribes that a daily opening of the interior movements of the heart and a manifestation of temptations be made by novices to their masters. Practically speaking, therefore, over the first 1,800 years of Church history the manifestation was prescribed by particular religious law and by ascetical writers.

The second historical phase of the manifestation's legal development begins with the mid-19th century. At this time the increasing interest of the Church in the manifestation finds expression successively in the regulation, de-emphasis, and ultimate abrogation of the obligatory or elicited manifestation.

The direction of souls is an exacting art, necessitating great prudence as well as an appreciable knowledge of theology and of human nature. It becomes an especially sensitive matter when the manifestation of conscience is involved, and all the more so when the recipient of confidential information is also a superior in the external forum. It is not difficult to envision misuses, such as violations of liberty of conscience and infringement upon the jurisdiction of the confessor.

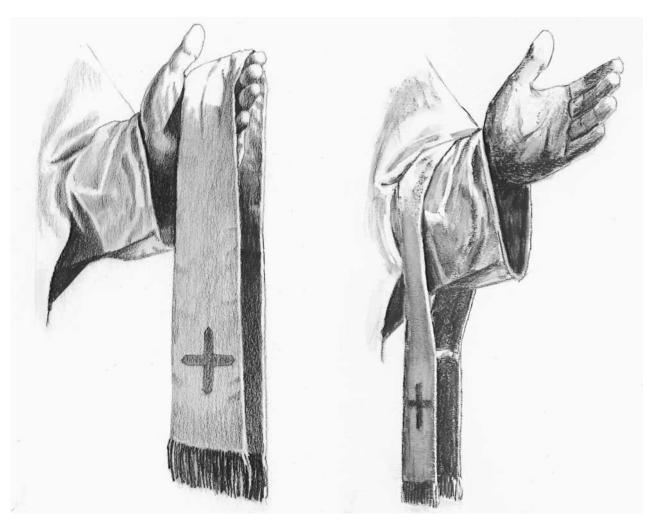

By a gradual positive process proper law had, in the course of the centuries, altered the manifestation from an optional ascetical aid to a legally imposed practice. But by a corresponding negative process on the part of the Holy See, from 1850 to 1917, the manifestation reverted to its free and spontaneous character.

A number of particular replies from the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars demand that all references to the obligatory or elicited manifestation be expunged from the constitutions of lay institutes sent to it for approval. The second phase of legal development is represented by the decree Quemadmodum of 1890, which, being much broader in purpose, abrogated the obligatory or elicted manifestation in all lay religious communities.

Code of Canon Law. The most comprehensive legislation on the manifestation of conscience is found in canon 630 §5 of the Code of Canon Law. This canon proscribes the obligatory or elicited manifestation of conscience in all religious institutes, clerical as well as lay.

The text of the fifth paragraph of canon 630 reads: "With trust members are to approach superiors, to whom they can freely and on their own initiative open their minds. Superiors, however, are forbidden to induce members in any way to make a manifestation of conscience to them." It should be clear that the Church does not intend to interdict the manifestation of conscience as such. The code condemns the manifestation in its solicited and obligatory form, but allows it as an aid to spiritual progress in its free and spontaneous form.

Bibliography: J. CREUSEN, Religious Men and Women in Church Law (Milwaukee 1958) 99–104. G. NICHOLAS, The Spiritual Prefect in Clerical Religious Houses of Study (Catholic University of American Canon Law Studies 216; Washington 1945). J. F.

The maniple held in left hand, and worn on left forearm.

LOVER, The Master of Novices (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 254; Washington 1947). F. N. KORTH, The Evolution of "Manifestation of Conscience" in Religious Rules, III–XVI Centuries (Rome 1949). F. HUYSMANS, La Manifestation de conscience en religion d'après le canon 530 (Louvain 1953). D. DEE, The Manifestation of Conscience (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 410; Washington 1960).

[D. DEE/EDS.]

MANIPLE

The maniple was originally a cloth used by Roman high society to dry moisture from the hands and face during oppressive summer heat and to wipe the mouth after eating. Servants used it to assure the cleanliness of vessels used at meals. It was carried in the hand or tied to the left arm when not needed. In time it became also a mark of social etiquette. The use of the maniple at meals offers some explanation as to why it is worn by the priest only when he is fulfilling some function directly connected with the Eucharistic meal. It is noteworthy that the celebrant is asked to leave off the maniple on Good Friday when the Communion rite is followed without the usual receiving and offering of gifts. However, monasteries have known the practice in centuries past of having all the monks wear it in choir on great feasts simply to look dressed up for the solemnity. No longer made from absorbent materials, the maniple was cut from richer fabric and had become a mere ornament having only ceremonial significance. In the passage of time, the meaning of the maniple has been lost. By a notice published in Notitiae 30 (1967), the use of the maniple at Mass was declared no longer necessary.

Bibliography: H. NORRIS, Church Vestments (London 1948). E. A. ROULIN, Vestments and Vesture, tr. J. MCCANN (Westminster, MD 1950). J. BRAUN, Die liturgische Gewandung im Occident und Orient (Freiburg, 1907). J. MAYO, A History of Ecclesiastical Dress (London: B.T. Batsford, 1984) D. HINES, Dressing for Worship: A Fresh Look at What Christians Wear in Church (Cambridge 1996).

D. PHILIPPART, ed., Clothed in Glory: Vesting the Church (Chicago 1997).

[M. MCCANCE]

MANKIDIYAN, MARIAM THRESIA CHIRAMEL, BL.

Baptized Thresia Mankidiyan (or Mankudian), virgin, mystic, founder of the Congregation of the Sisters of the Holy Family; b. April 26, 1876, Trichur, Puthenchira, Kerala, India; d. June 8, 1926, Kuzhikattusery. When Thresia was 12, her once-wealthy mother (Thanda) died leaving her with a father (Thoma) and elder brother who were alcoholics, along with three other siblings. Even as a child Thresia fasted four times weekly, kept all-night vigils, and, at age ten, consecrated her life to God, the poor, sick, lonely, and orphaned. Beginning in 1909, Thresia experienced many mystical phenomena. She joined the Carmelite tertiaries in 1910. Three years later she received long-awaited permission from her bishop, Apostolic Vicar Mar John Menachery, to enter consecrated community life with three friends, who also dedicated themselves to prayer and penance. They defied convention by venturing into the streets unaccompanied to serve those in need. The Congregation of the Holy Family was canonically established May 14, 1914 with Mariam Thresia as superior and the Rule of the Holy Family Sisters of Bordeaux. In 1915, she founded a girls school in Puthenchira. At the time of her death 11 years later, the congregation had 55 sisters in three convents running four schools, a study home, and an orphanage. By 2000, the congregation had grown to more than 1,500 members serving the poor in Germany, Ghana, India, and Italy. Thresia, considered the forerunner of Mother Teresa of Calcutta, was beatified by John Paul II, April 9, 2000.

Feast: June 6.

Bibliography: K. C. CHACKO, Mother Mariam Thresia (Trichur 1992). Mother Mariam Thresia Committee, Gharhika sabhayute pravācika (Trichur, Kerala, India 1989).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MANN, HORACE KINDER

Priest, educator, and historian of the medieval papacy; b. London, England, Sept. 27, 1859; d. Edinburgh, Scotland, Aug. 1, 1928. After being educated at St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw, Durham, England, he was ordained in 1886. For the next year he taught at St. Cuthbert's Grammar School, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where he became prefect of discipline from 1887 to 1890, and then headmaster, an office he retained until 1917. On the occasion of his sacerdotal silver jubilee in 1911, Pius X bestowed on him the honorary pontifical degree of doctor of divinity. In 1917 he was appointed rector of the Collegia Beda in Rome and received from Benedict XV the rank of domestic prelate. He remained at the Beda until his sudden death while on vacation. Mann devoted his intellectual activity to the medieval papacy and became the outstanding English historian in this field in the 20th century. His major work is the Lives of the Popes in the (Early) Middle Ages (18 v. in 19, London 1902-32), treating the popes from Gregory I through Benedict XI; the last four volumes were issued posthumously. Although still valuable, the Lives has been largely superseded by later research. Mann wrote also an independent biography of Nicholas Breakspear (Hadrian IV) A.D. 1154-1159 (London 1914), Tombs and Portraits of the Popes of the Middle Ages (London 1929), articles for the Catholic Encyclopedia, and numerous essays and reviews. He held memberships in the Accademia d'Arcadia, the Royal Historical Society of Spain, and the R. Società Romana di Storia Patria.

Bibliography: Tablet 152 (London 1928) 186. Who Was Who, 1916–1928 (London 1929) 698. The Catholic Encyclopedia and Its Makers (New York 1917) 111–112.

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

MANNA

Manna is food provided for the Israelites in the desert by God in reply to one of their chronic murmurings (Ex 16.4–36; Nm 11.6–9; Dt 8.3). This "bread from heaven" appeared first in the second month after the Exodus as fine flakes on the ground. It was "like coriander seed, but white, and it tasted like wafers made with honey" (Ex 16.31). Ground into flour, it made palatable loaves, and it helped sustain the people for 40 years.

The manna of the Exodus was certainly providential and may even have been miraculous with reference to the times at which and the quantity in which it was supplied. Basically, however, it is a natural product, widely found in the Near East to this day. It is produced by excretion by two scale insects (Trabutina mannipara Ehrenberg and Najacoccus serpentinus Green) and is similar to the honeydew of many types of plant lice; it falls to the ground as drops and there hardens into the grains described in the Bible.

That a deeply religious significance was seen in the providential supply of manna is already evident in the accounts in Exodus and Numbers and becomes more apparent in Dt 8.3, in the midrash in Wis 16.20–29, and in the

Moses ordering the Jews to gather manna. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

New Testament. In 1 Cor 10.1–6 the manna is termed "spiritual food" and is referred to Christ, together with water from the rock. St. Paul concludes: "Now all these things happened to them as a type . . ." (v. 11); then, in v. 15 he turns his attention to the Eucharist (see TYPE AND ANTITYPE). In Jn 6.32, 48 Jesus contrasts the manna with the "true bread from heaven" given by His Father. He leads his audience from physical bread (the loaves multiplied for them) to divine teaching, and finally, to the Sacrament of His flesh (6.51–56). Part of the background of this miracle was the rabbinic belief that the manna would reappear in the messianic era.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1434–36. J. SCHILDENBERGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg, 1957–65) 6:1360–61. R. MEYER, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 4:466–470. F. S. BODENHEIMER, "The Manna of Sinai," The Biblical Archaeologist, 10 (1947) 2–6. A. DE GUGLIELMO, "What Was the Manna?" The Catholic Bible Quarterly 2 (1940) 112–129.

[M. K. HOPKINS]

MANNA, PAOLO

Founder of the Pontifical Missionary Union of the Clergy, mission author, b. Avellino, Italy, 1872, d. 1952. He was a member of the Missionaries of SS. Peter and Paul who served in Burma between 1895 and 1907. Upon his return to Italy, he published several books over the next years to promote the missionary vocation and to encourage the cooperation of missionary clergy. The latter was achieved when, with the approval of the Congregation for the Propagation of Faith, Manna inaugurated the Missionary Union of the Clergy in 1916. By 1934, eighty-four percent of Italian clergy were members.

At the time Manna wrote Operarii autem pauci (The Workers Are Few, 1908), most of Catholic mission literature was written in German and Italian. Translations and adaptations of this book and The Conversion of the Pagan World (1921) provided English-speaking audiences with a popularized form of mission theology and practice and encouraged missionary vocations for clergy, women religious, and the laity. In the United States, the adaptations of Manna's two books were done by Father Joseph P. McGlinchey, the director of the Boston Archdiocesan Office of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. Mc-Glinchey was the successor in that office to James A. Walsh, co-founder of the Catholic Society of Foreign Missions (Maryknoll), who had decried the dearth of mission materials in English. Manna's works in Italian and, especially the English translations, alerted Catholics not formally engaged as missionaries, to the centrality of mission in the life of the Church.

Bibliography: P. MANNA and N. MAESTRINI, Forward with Christ: Thoughts and Reflections on Vocations to the Foreign Missions (Westminster, MD 1954); J. F. MCGLINCHEY, Conversion of the Pagan World: A Treatise upon Catholic Foreign Missions. adapted from P. MANNA (Boston 1921); J. F. MCGLINCHEY, The Workers Are Few, translation and adaptation of P. MANNA (Boston 1912); F. GERMANI, P. Paolo Manna, vol. 1, Da Avellino alla Birmania, (1872–1907) (Rome 1989), vol. 2, L'Unione Missionaria del Clero e il. Seminario Meridionale per le Missione Estere (1907–1924) (Rome 1990), vol. 3, Superiore Generale (1924–34) (1992), Paolo Manna maestro di spiritualita missionarie (Rome 1993).

[A. DRIES]

MANNING, HENRY EDWARD

Cardinal, archbishop of WESTMINSTER; b. Copped Hall, Totteridge, Hertfordshire, July 15, 1808; d. London, Jan. 14, 1892. He was descended from a family of merchant-bankers. His father, William Manning, was a member of Parliament, and married twice. Henry was the youngest son of William's second wife, Mary, daughter of Henry Leroy Hunter of Reading. At 14 the boy entered Harrow Public School and matriculated (1827) at Balliol College, Oxford. There he distinguished himself in the debating society and in studies, taking a first-class degree in classics (1830). In 1832 he was elected to a fellowship at Merton College and was ordained to the Anglican ministry. The following year he was presented to the rectory of Lavington-with-Graffham in Sussex and married Caroline, daughter of the Rev. J. Sargent of Lavington. His wife died, childless, in 1837.

Anglican Career. Manning's original destination was politics. Briefly in 1831 he worked in the colonial office, but attractions of an ecclesiastical career proved irresistible. Soon he established himself as one of the leading Anglican thinkers of his day. Before reaching the age of 33 he became archdeacon of Chichester. His reforming influence was quickly felt. Life in a country parish had removed him from direct contact with the OXFORD MOVE-MENT, but he kept in touch with its leading protagonists. At the same time he kept developing a keen perception of contemporary social evils. In his pastoral "charges" he attacked the abuses of wealth, the poverty of the agricultural poor, the lack of educational provision for the new middle classes, the practice of reserved family pews in the Anglican Church. He warred relentlessly against RATIONALISM. Unceasingly he urged the clergy to personal sanctification. By 1848 a note of disillusionment had crept into the charge he delivered in defense of his creed upon Renn Hampden's appointment to the See of Hereford. This uneasiness spread until in 1851, as a direct result of the Gorham Judgment by the judicial committee of the privy council, he became a Catholic. The privy council had ordered the bishop of Exeter to appoint the Calvinist theologian George Gorham to the living of Brampford Speke despite the bishop's grave misgivings concerning Gorham's views on baptismal regeneration. This decision was palpable proof to Manning of the supremacy of the temporal over the spiritual in the Church of England.

Catholic Years. Manning was received into the Church (April 6, 1851) at the Jesuit Church, Farm Street, London. Within ten weeks Cardinal WISEMAN ordained him to the priesthood. In the autumn he proceeded to Rome, where he spent three years at the Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici, which he entered at the wish of Pius IX.

Wiseman in 1856 appointed Manning diocesan inspector of schools. In this, his first important post after conversion, he began the long, successful career in education that is perhaps his most permanent claim to fame. This career enabled him to organize a network of elementary schools throughout the Archdiocese of Westminster and to make the first provision for university education for Catholics, besides special training courses, chiefly in science, for Catholics of the middle class. Honors and work went hand in hand. By 1854 Manning had received the degree of D.D. from the Pope and had succeeded Dr. R. Whitty as provost of the Metropolitan Chapter. At the instigation of Wiseman, he established (1851) in England the OBLATES OF ST. CHARLES. At the new church of St. Mary of the Angels, Bayswater, Manning was the first superior. Many "old Catholic" families manifested great jealousy of his rapid advancement. They also resented his endeavors to arouse Catholics from their long torpor. Despite these attacks, Manning always regarded his eight years as superior of the infant community as the happiest of his life. In 1860 Pius IX made him a prothonotary apostolic and domestic prelate in recognition of his staunch defense of the papal temporal power, at that time seriously threatened.

One of Manning's heaviest crosses was imposed by the titular archbishop of Trebizond, Dr. Errington, whose attacks on the Oblates flowed from a desire to remove from the diocesan seminary those professors who had entered the new community. Manning defended his group with spirit at Rome. Complicating the dispute was the poor relationship between Wiseman and Errington, his coadjutor, who had led the Metropolitan Chapter in open revolt against the archbishop. Manning, as provost and adherent of Wiseman, necessarily became involved. The incident caused much unhappiness and led eventually to Pius IX's removal of Errington from the coadjutorship.

Archbishop of Westminster. Two months after the See of Westminster fell vacant through the death of Wiseman (February 1865), Pius IX appointed Manning his successor. The London Times greeted the news with contempt; but the Pope's choice proved admirable, for Manning became one of the outstanding occupants of the see, which he occupied for 27 years. His constant effort was to make the Church more social-conscious and to bring English Catholics into the full stream of national life. He made friends with all the public figures of his day, men as diverse as William BOOTH, John Burns, GLADSTONE, Archbishop CROKE, RUSKIN, W. G. WARD, and J. E. C. Bodley.

Social Work. Manning always claimed that to work for the good of the soul it was necessary also to work for amelioration of social ills. Many lived vicious lives, he held, because of evil social conditions. He considered education one of the best remedies. Much of his energy was devoted to promoting total abstinence, better education, improved labor relations, and social welfare in Ireland. His intervention in 1889 ended the Great Dock Strike. He rejoiced that he lived to welcome Leo XIII's social encyclicals IMMORTALE DEI and RERUM NOVARUM.

Relations with Newman. The great aim of Manning's life was his determination to ally the new scientific liberalism to the Church and thus to Christianize it. This brought him into conflict with NEWMAN, a conflict never fully resolved. Newman's refusal to have anything to do with London University or with the Metaphysical Society, his distrust of a scientific education, and his sympathy with the old privileged Catholic families alienated Manning. The lack of sympathy between the two men cannot simply be explained as a clash of personalities. It owed more to the deep and fundamental philosophical conflict that divided them.

Religious Orders. Manning's desire to enhance the status of the pastoral clergy, many of whom were of Irish extraction, led him into conflict with the religious orders and not least with the JESUITS, whom he described as "a mysterious permission of God for the chastisement of England." Yet the papal document Romanos Pontifices (1881), which regularized relations between the English bishops and religious, was largely due to Manning's influence.

Henry Edward Cardinal Manning. (Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

Vatican Council I. Manning was one of the leading figures in VATICAN COUNCIL I. His activities in promoting the definition of papal primacy and infallibility have been criticized severely. His motivation was not personal ambition, but a conviction that a principle of authority was the only satisfactory antidote to the excesses of Continental nationalism, the attacks of French anticlericals, and the widespread decline in moral standards. He fought for his "principle of authority" with characteristic thoroughness, alienating many by his firmness. Later he defended the conciliar decisions against the attack by Gladstone.

In 1875 he was raised to the cardinalate. At the conclave in 1878 he supported from the start Cardinal Pecci, who emerged as Leo XIII.

Administrator, Preacher, Writer. Manning's administrative talents were of a very high order. As a society preacher he was always in demand. His writings were voluminous and sufficiently popular to be translated into several languages during his lifetime. The Eternal Priest-hood, dealing with the rights and duties of the pastoral clergy, is still widely read.

Character. Manning has emerged from the pages of Lytton Strachey as a cold, ruthless schemer and an austere ascetic. His physical appearance was gaunt and emaciated, but the exterior was deceptive. Ruskin testified to his warmth of heart and to his qualities as a host in glowing terms.

Bibliography: J. E. C. BODLEY, Cardinal Manning and other Essays (London 1912). J. FITZSIMONS, ed., Manning, Anglican and Catholic (London 1951). A. W. HUTTON, Cardinal Manning (London 1892) contains complete list of Manning's publications. S. LES-LIE, Henry Edward Manning: His Life and Labours (London 1921). V. A. MCCLELLAND, Cardinal Manning: His Public Life and Influence, 1865–1892 (New York 1962). E. S. PURCELL, Life of Cardinal Manning, Archbishop of Westminster, 2 v. (4th ed. London 1896).

[V. A. MCCLELLAND]

MANNING, TIMOTHY

Cardinal, archbishop of Los Angeles; b. Nov. 14, 1909, Ballingeary, County Cork, Ireland; d. June 23, 1989, Los Angeles, California. One of four children of Cornelius and Margaret (Cronin) Manning. He studied at the local National School and under the Christian Brothers at nearby Cork. His preparation for the priesthood began in 1923 at Mungret College, a secondary school staffed by the Society of Jesus for the foreign missions. Attracted to California by an appeal on behalf of the Diocese of Los Angeles-San Diego, Manning left Ireland in October of 1928 for Menlo Park, where he joined the student body of Saint Patrick's Seminary. He was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop John J. Cantwell on June 16, 1934, in Saint Vibiana's Cathedral. The following year, Fr. Manning was sent to Rome for post-graduate studies at the Pontifical Gregorian University, where he received a doctorate in canon law in 1938. Upon his return to southern California, Manning was named secretary to Archbishop Cantwell, a post he occupied for eight years. On Aug. 17, 1946, he was appointed auxiliary of Los Angeles, with the titular see of Lesvi. With the appointment of Archbishop J. Francis A. McIntyre to Los Angeles in 1948, Manning was named chancellor, and on Nov. 29, 1955 he became vicar general for the archdiocese.

Upon realignment of ecclesial boundaries in central California, Bishop Manning was named to the newly erected Diocese of Fresno, Oct. 24, 1967. In 18 brief but intensely fruitful months, he created a diocesan housing commission, established four new parishes and five missions, approved the formation of a priest's senate, authorized a task force to marshal resources for inner city and minority groups, shared the bitter anguish of the Delano labor dispute, and visited each of the 80 parishes scattered through the 35,239 square mile jurisdiction. He was recalled to the scene of his earlier priestly labors on May 26, 1969, as coadjutor to Cardinal McIntyre, whom he succeeded on Jan. 21, 1970. He received the gallium, symbolic of the metropolitan office, on June 17, 1970. Paul VI named him a cardinal in 1973.

In addition to pursuing administrative and expansionary policies, Archbishop Manning energetically supported a host of ecumenical involvements and warmly endorsed the Cursillo movement. He personally chaired the commission for liturgy, established a spirituality house and erected an archival center. He made a solemn pilgrimage to Mexico City's National Shrine of Our Lady of Guadalupe where it all began for California, where he thanked the Hispanic people for their role in bedrocking the faith along the Pacific Slope. In his concern for and identification with the archdiocesan founded and sponsored Lay Mission Helpers, Manning visited missionaries in South Africa, Rhodesia, Ghana, Kenya, Malawi, and Uganda. Though the Catholics of Orange County were given their own diocese in 1976, Los Angeles continued to expand and, by 1984, was acknowledged as the largest ecclesial jurisdiction in the United States. In 1985, with the acceptance of his retirement by Pope John Paul II, Cardinal Manning turned the reins of leadership over to his successor, Archbishop Roger M. Mahony.

A popular speaker and writer, Bishop Manning published a chapter of his doctoral thesis dealing with Clerical Education in Major Seminaries, a 50-page treatise on The Grey Ox (a biography of Fray Junipero Serra) and the entry for the "Archdiocese of Los Angeles" in the New Catholic Encyclopedia. A number of his sermons and addresses appeared in various ecclesiastical journals over the years; his collected homilies, addresses, and talks appeared in two volumes, Days of Change, Years of Challenge and Times of Tension, Moments of Grace. In 1990, Manning's invocations, blessings, and dedications were published under the title Hours of Consecration, Minutes of Prayer.

Manning remained active in his retirement years. In addition to working a day each week in the archdiocesan archives and spending another visiting infirm priests and religious, he traveled widely and gave numerous retreats throughout the West. He died on June 23, 1989, of a cerebrovascular accident due to marantic endocarditis, and was buried at Calvary Cemetery in East Los Angeles.

Bibliography: F. J. WEBER, comp., Days of Charge, Years of Challenge: The Homilies, Addresses and Talks of Timothy Cardinal Manning (Los Angeles 1987); Times of Tension, Moments of Grace: The Homilies, Addresses and Talks of Timothy Cardinal Manning (Los Angeles 1990); Hours of Consecration, Minutes of Prayer: The Invocations, Blessings and Dedications of Timothy Cardinal Manning (Los Angeles 1990); Magnificat: The Life and Times of Timothy Cardinal Manning (Mission Hills 1999).

[F. J. WEBER]

MANNIX, DANIEL

Archbishop; b. Charleville, County Cork, Ireland, March 4, 1864; d. Melbourne, Australia, Nov. 6, 1963. After studies at St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, he was ordained (1890). He was appointed junior professor of philosophy there (1891), professor of theology (1894), and president of the college (1903). During his term as president, until 1912, Maynooth acquired the status of a university college, a constituent of the newly created National University of Ireland, in whose senate Mannix sat as a member. Mannix became coadjutor archbishop of Melbourne in 1912 and archbishop in 1917. During World War I he was a controversial figure as Australia's spokesman for Irish independence and a leader of the successful opposition to conscription of Australians for overseas military service. At the height of the troubles in Ireland Mannix went to Rome (1920) for his ad limina visit by way of the U.S., where he was greeted by large crowds in cities across the country. He sailed from New York amid scenes of extraordinary enthusiasm, and proposed to visit Ireland next, but two British destroyers intercepted his vessel off the Irish coast. The archbishop was removed, landed at Penzance, England, and forbidden to speak at the main centers of Irish population in England. In Australia Mannix gained a reputation as a national ecclesiastical leader, far-sighted, zealous, creative, and inspiring. During his 46 years as archbishop he established 108 parishes, more than 150 grade schools, 17 high schools, and 14 specialized schools for technical, commercial and domestic arts training. He founded Newman College for men and St. Mary's Hall for women at the University of Melbourne as well as the provincial seminary of Corpus Christi College. He also promoted Catholic Action, the Catholic press, the liturgical movement, and the Catholic social movement. He is buried in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Melbourne which he saw completed in 1939.

Bibliography: F. MURPHY, Daniel Mannix, Archbishop of Melbourne (Melbourne 1948). R. SPEAIGHT, "Some Recollections of a Great Pastor," Tablet 217 (Nov. 16, 1963) 1233.

[J. G. MURTAGH]

Daniel J. Archbishop Mannix.

MANOGUE, PATRICK

Missionary, first bishop of Sacramento, Calif.; b. Desart, Kilkenny, Ireland, March 15, 1831; d. Sacramento, Feb. 27, 1895. One of seven orphaned children, all of whom became noted clergymen, he received his early education at Callan, Ireland. His eldest brother, Michael, preceded him to America in an effort to provide for the family. Manogue himself arrived in the U.S. in 1848. After living in Connecticut for two years, he left for Chicago, Ill., where he spent three years studying for the priesthood at the College of St. Mary of the Lake. By this time the entire family had settled in Connecticut and were in great need of money. Manogue felt that he could help them and further his own plans for the priesthood by going to California and the gold mines. There he worked for three years as a common laborer before saving enough money to go to Paris to continue his theological studies at the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice. After being ordained there by Cardinal François Morlot on Christmas Day 1861, Manague returned from Europe (1862) to the Sierra Nevadas. Eugene O'Connell, Bishop of Grass Valley, requested Manogue to take the whole of northern Nevada for his parish. After touring his new parish he settled in Virginia City, where he lived with one of the old Irish families; he said Mass and conducted other services in a log cabin. By the middle of 1863 Manague had collected

Patrick Manogue.

$12,000 and had erected a new church. He converted many native peoples, who could always be distinguished by their Irish names, and made long trips into the wilderness, sleeping on the floor of log cabins. He once traveled more than 150 miles to hear the confession of a condemned man, for whom he subsequently gained a pardon. His favorite method of teaching religion to wandering bands of native peoples was to gather them into the church and explain the significance of such things as the altar and tabernacle.

After 20 years of such ministry, Manogue was named (1870) vicar-general of the Diocese of Grass Valley. On Jan. 16, 1881, he was consecrated titular bishop of Ceramos and coadjutor of Grass Valley by Abp. Joseph Alemany in St. Mary's Cathedral, San Francisco, Calif. He succeeded Bishop O'Connell on March 17, 1884. That same year Leo XIII changed the diocesan boundaries to include ten additional counties and moved the episcopal see to Sacramento. Manogue's first work as bishop was to build the Cathedral of the Blessed Sacrament, designed in Italian Renaissance style by the architect Brian J. Clinch. With a seating capacity of 1,600, the cathedral was built in memory of those who had sustained the faith during the early years of the Church in California. Before his death the bishop became very active in public affairs, exerting considerable influence among the miners and mine owners.

Bibliography: H. L. WALSH, Hallowed Were the Gold Dust Trails: The Story of the Pioneer Priests of Northern California (Santa Clara 1946).

[J. L. MORRISON]

MANRÍQUEZ Y ZÁRATE, JOSÉ DE JESÚS

Mexican bishop and militant defender of the Church; b. León, Guanajuato, Nov. 7, 1884; d. Mexico City, June 28, 1951. He studied at the seminary of León and the South American College in Rome. Ordained on Oct. 28, 1907, he obtained his doctorate in theology, Canon Law, and philosophy, and returned to Mexico on June 19, 1909. He was vicar of the sacristy and prefect of the seminary of León (1909-11). As pastor of Guanajuato (1912–22), he founded nine parochial schools, a secondary school for boys and one for girls, the school of higher studies for men, the Ketteler Workers' Circle, and the League for Catholic Social Action (which supplied clothing for the poor, loan and saving facilities, medical service, and libraries). He was nominated first bishop of Huejutla on Dec. 11, 1922. After being consecrated on Feb. 4, 1923, he organized his diocese, evangelized 60,000 Indians, and multiplied schools and Catholic social works, showing intransigence toward the Revolution. A fearless defender of the Church, he challenged the actions of President Calles (March 10, 1926), who imprisoned him for one year and exiled him to the United States (April 24, 1927). There he was an apologist for Mexican Catholic armed defense and put an end to the revolutionary "Arreglos" (June 21, 1929), which, suppressing all Catholic counterrevolutionary resistance, consolidated the power of the revolutionary group. Bishop Manríquez y Zárate called them a "shameful modus vivendi." This abrogation gave life to the crusade (1934), which was stimulated by the prelate, whom José Vasconcelos called "the standard-bearer" of the persecuted faith, de facto leader of the militant Church. Manríquez y Zárate had to resign his bishopric on July 6, 1939. Gravely ill, he was permitted to return to Mexico, March 8, 1944, after 17 years in exile. He regained his health and preached all over the country (1944-49). On Nov. 7, 1949, he was named vicar-general of the archbishopric of Mexico City, representing it in Rome (1950) at the declaration of the dogma of the Assumption. He made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land on his way back to Mexico City. When he died, thousands of Catholics venerated his body and attended the burial, at which they sang the hymn to Christ the King and waved the flag of the National League for Defense of Liberty. In 1963 his remains were transferred to the national monument to Christ the King. He left 23 pastoral letters; the books En la hora de suprema angustia, Jesucristo a través de las edades, Luchando contra la bestia, and El socialismo; and a great many sermons, addresses, statements, articles, prefaces, and personal letters. He preached a strong, bold Catholicism as the only way of religious survival and insisted that it should be combined with a love of the traditions of Mexico.

[A. BARQUIN Y RUÍZ]

MANSI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO

Catholic theologian; b. Lucca, Italy, Feb. 16, 1692; d. Lucca, Sept. 27, 1769. With his entry in 1710 into the MARIAN FATHERS, Mansi began his career as a theologian. He taught moral theology for several years in Naples; then Abp. Fabio Colloredo recalled him to Lucca, where Mansi founded an academy for Church history and liturgy. In 1765 he was named archbishop of Lucca by CLEMENT XIII. The only one of Mansi's independent works of note is his Tractatus de casibus et excommunicationibus episcopis reservatis (Lucca 1724). Mansi's real importance lies in his work as an editor, publishing about 90 volumes during his lifetime. His famous collection of the acts of the councils down to 1440 was based substantially on the older collections of N. Coletti, Philippe LABBE, and G. Cossart. The older editions, especially the 12-volume Acta Conciliorum of Jean HARDOUIN (down to 1714), are better than Mansi's work; but despite its editorial shortcomings, the Amplissima collectio, which Mansi himself brought only up to volume 14, is the most useful source for conciliar history because of its exhaustiveness. The most important of the other authors brought out in new editions and commented on by Mansi are C. BARONIUS (with O. Raynald's continuation and A. Pagi's critique), PIUS II, and É. BALUZE. Mansi also translated into Latin A. CALMET's exegetical writings.

Bibliography: Works. Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1759–98); repr. and continued by L. PETIT and J. B. MARTIN, 53 v. in 60 (Paris 1901–27; repr. Graz 1960–61); microcard ed. from the Microcard Foundation (Washington 1961). Literature. H. QUENTIN, Jean-Dominique Mansi et les grandes collections conciliaires (Paris 1900). G. FRANCESCHINI, Vita in v. 19 of the Amplissima collectio. D. PACCHIUS, Vita in v.1 of J. A. FABRICIUS, Bibliotheca latina, 6 v. in 3 (Florence 1858–59). R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 6:1365. C. TESTORE, Enciclopedia cattolica 7:1979.

[H. RUMPLER]

MANTELLATE SISTERS

Also called Servants of Mary (OSM), they were founded in 1861 by Sisters M. Filomena Rossi and M.

Giovanni Ferrari in Treppio, Italy. They chose as their model St. Juliana FALCONIERI, the traditional foundress of the several communities of Servite Sisters (see SER-VANTS OF MARY). The motherhouse of the congregation, a pontifical institute, was transferred to Pistoia and later to Rome. The Mantellate Sisters are engaged in kindergartens, elementary and high schools, colleges, hospitals, orphanages, homes for the aged and for working girls, and catechetical and social work. In 1913 the first house in the U.S. was established in Chicago, Ill., but the American motherhouse and novitiate are in Blue Island, Ill. The original foundation is known as the Mantellate Sisters of Blue Island (Official Catholic Directory #3570), with its headquarters in Blue Island, Ill. There is a separate branch, the Mantellate Sisters of Plainfield (Official Catholic Directory #3572), which was established in 1977. It has its headquarters in Plainfield, Ill.

[M. F. DE MATO/EDS.]

MANTRA

A sacred formula believed to have a magic power. The term was used originally of the verses of the VEDAS, the sacred books of the Hindus, chanted at the time of sacrifice. However, certain verses were believed to have a special power, of which the most famous is the $G\bar{a}yatr\bar{\iota}$, the invocation of the Sun-God, used on all the most solemn occasions. The most sacred word of all is the syllable Om, which is held to contain in itself all sounds and to symbolize the universe, so that by its repetition it is possible to realize one's identity with the Absolute. The theory of the mantra, developed in later times, is that the sacred word or sound makes present what it signifies. Thus, by repetition of a mantra under proper conditions it is possible to obtain all power. A mantra can absolve from sin, avert danger, secure success, and confer sanctity. In certain mantras, it is believed, all wisdom is contained.

See Also: HINDUISM.

[B. GRIFFITHS]

MANUEL II PALAEOLOGUS, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Theologian; b. Constantinople, June 27, 1350; d. Constantinople, July 21, 1425. The second son of Emperor John V, he was named successively despot (c. 1355) and governor of Thessalonica in 1369. The following year he sailed to Venice to help his father in his financial difficulties. After the rebellion of his older brother, An-dronicus IV, Manuel was given the title of emperor, Sept. 25, 1373. But from 1376 to 1379 he was imprisoned by Andronicus, who had usurped the throne. His escape in 1379 began a civil war that ended with a compromise in May 1381, by which Andronicus was again named heir to John V.

In the fall of 1382 Manuel sailed secretly to Thessalonica where he ruled as an all-but-independent emperor. After a four-year siege by the Turks (1383–87) the city surrendered and Manuel was forced into exile to Lemnos; but as Andronicus had died in 1386, Manuel was again recognized as heir to the throne. In 1390 he prevented John VII, Andronicus's son, from assuming control of the capital; but he was compelled to lead a Byzantine force in the service of the Ottoman Emir Bajezid in Asia Minor. On the death of John V on Feb. 16, 1391, Manuel became sole emperor. At first he followed a conciliatory policy, but c. 1394, events made him take a strong anti-Turkish position.

In hope of obtaining Western aid, he visited northern Italy, Paris, and London between December 1399 and June 1403. Although received with great honor, he returned with little more than promises. The defeat of the Turks at Ankara by Tamerlane in 1402 provided a respite, and Manuel used the time to strengthen Byzantine military positions, particularly in the Peloponnesus. In 1421 he suffered a stroke and retired from active government.

Along with his diplomatic and military activities, Manuel was genuinely interested in theology and literature and composed an impressive array of theological tracts including an Apology for Christianity in the form of 26 dialogues with an Islamic disputant (written 1392–96, probably while on a military campaign near Ankara). The first series controverted Islamic theology, and the second justified Christian faith and moral teaching. Manuel also wrote 156 chapters against the Syllogism of a Latin monk of Saint-Denis, Paris, and a dissertation on the Palamite Teaching addressed to Alexius Iagupes. He strongly encouraged the work of the Byzantine humanists, who played an important role in the beginnings of the Italian RENAISSANCE.

Bibliography: G. T. DENNIS, The Reign of Manuel II Palaeologus in Thessalonica, 1382–1387 (Orientalia Christiana Analecta 159; 1960). G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State (New Brunswick, NJ 1957) 481–498. J. BARKER, Manuel II Palaeologus (1391–1425) (New Brunswick, N.J. 1965). H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinische Reich (Munich 1959) 747–749.

[G. T. DENNIS]

MANUEL II, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Reigned 1244-1254; d. 1254. Because of the Latin occupation of Constantinople (1204–61), Manuel resided at the temporary Byzantine capital in Nicaea. He worked in close collaboration with Emperor JOHN III DUCAS VATATZES, particularly in negotiations concerning possible union with the Roman Church. In 1247-48 he wrote to the Armenian King and the Catholicos regarding their relations with the Byzantine Church, and in July 1250 he composed a series of responses to canonical questions. About the same time he sent envoys to Pope INNOCENT IV to discuss ecclesiastical union in the summer of 1253, and renewed these negotiations. In 1253-54 he received solemn assurance, under pain of censure, from the regent MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS, that he would not intrigue against the Emperor of Nicaea, Theodore II Lascaris (1254-58); and early in 1254 he addressed a letter to the emperor instructing him on his duties. Manuel died in office that year, before November 3.

Bibliography: V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarchat de Constantinople v.1.4. W. NORDEN, Das Papsttum und Byzanz (Berlin 1903) 368–378, 756–759, letter to Innocent IV.

[G. T. DENNIS]

MANUEL CALECAS

Byzantine theologian and rhetorician, opponent of HESYCHASM, and advocate of union with the West; b. Constantinople; d. Lesbos, 1410. There is evidence of his relationship to John Calecas, Patriarch of Constantinople (1334–47). What little is known of his life is gathered mainly from his letters. While still a layman, he conducted a school that did not flourish, partly because of his extreme gentleness. About 1390 he came under the influence of Demetrius CYDONES, who introduced him to Aristotelian philosophy. Later Calecas taught himself Latin in order to read Thomas Aquinas. Forced to leave Constantinople because of his opposition to Hesychasm, he traveled through Italy and the Orient, entering the DO-MINICANS at Lesbos toward the end of his life. Latin SCHOLASTICISM (medieval) is very evident in his works, which include: On Faith and the Principles of the Catholic Faith (Patrologia Graeca 152:429–661), a systematic explanation of theology in nine books written at the request of friends, and containing the pseudo-Augustinian Sermo de purgatorio and sermons concerning the Holy Eucharist attributed to Aquinas; treatises On the Substance and Operation of God (PG 152:283-428), against Gregory PALAMAS; Against the Errors of the Greeks (PG 152:11-258); Against Joseph BRYENNIOS [G. Mercati, Notizie . . . ed altri appunti (Vatican 1930) 454–473]; Concerning the Procession of the Holy Spirit (PG 144:864–958), formerly attributed to Cydones; and also Greek translations of Boethius's De Trinitate, Anselm of Canterbury's Cur Deus homo, a Christmas Mass of the Ambrosian rite, and a Mass of the Holy Spirit from the Roman Missal.

Bibliography: Correspondance, ed. R. J. LOENERTZ (Studi et Testi 152; 1950). R. J. LOENERTZ, "Manuel Calécas: Sa vie et ses oeuvres," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 17 (1947) 195–207. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 1.2: 718–720. K. KRUMBACHER Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur 110–111. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich 740–741.

[M. C. HILFERTY]

MANUSCRIPT ILLUMINATION

The illustration of manuscript pages, in whole or in part, by miniature painting and drawing was a major technique of medieval Christian art. The greater proportion of the painting that survives from the Middle Ages is in the form of manuscript illumination, which frequently provides the only evidence of the style of painting of a particular place or time.

EASTERN

Byzantine manuscript texts of the Bible were as richly illuminated as Byzantine church interiors that were decorated with painting and mosaics. From the 6th to the 10th century, artists adapted the techniques of Hellenistic artists who illustrated the Greek classics. The Gospel Book of Rabbula contains one of the first representations of the Crucifixion. Outstanding works of Byzantine manuscript illumination are the Vienna Genesis, the Paris Psalter, the Joshua Roll in the Vatican Library, and the sermons of St. Gregory of Nazianzus (Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris). The 46 miniatures of the last reflect the practices of contemporary fresco painters. In later Byzantine manuscripts the pictorial background of the Hellenistic manuscripts was replaced by gold. The 430 miniatures in the Menologium of Basil II were the work of eight painters. Many of them show resemblances to the larger icons. In the 11th and 12th centuries, miniature painting, after having earlier assumed an independent character, began to reflect a strong classicizing tendency, as in the sermons of St. John Chrysostom (Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris).

WESTERN

In western Europe the earliest examples of manuscript illumination are among the most brilliant and original. Three masterpieces of Anglo-Irish art of the 7th and Charles II the Bald, illumination from miniature in psalter, c. 842–869.

8th centuries are the Books of DURROW and KELLS (Trinity College, Dublin) and the LINDISFARNE GOSPELS (British Museum, London). The Book of Durrow was decorated c. 675; its ornamentation bears resemblance to Irish and Saxon work in metal of the mid-7th century. Its intricate interlace patterns, curvilinear designs, and animal ornament are characteristic of the books produced in the British monastic establishments of the period. The volume of the Lindisfarne Gospels, dating from the closing years of the 7th century, survives complete, in 258 folios. The beautiful decoration of the text is the work of the artist Eadfrith, the first known by name in the history of the British Isles. The Book of Kells is a vellum Gospel Book like the others. An authentic masterpiece of European art, it was illuminated in the last quarter of the 9th century. The style is derived from the Book of Durrow and the Lindisfarne Gospels, though a greater sophistication is demonstrated than in either of them. The pages are covered with fantastic ornament, intricately drawn and colored. A remarkable series of ornamented initials, all different, runs through the text. The decoration of the book was the collaborative work of not less than four artists. Though their virtuoso work varies in style, the color is uniformly rich.

Guillaume de Machaut (visited by angels), manuscript illumination. (@Bettmann/CORBIS)

Manuscripts are among the principal art works of the Carolingian period. The Gospels of Godescalc, done at Charlemagne's capital of Aachen (781-783; Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris), inaugurated the style perfected at Trèves under the Abbess Ada; the principal manuscript of the so-called Ada group is the Gospels of Saint-Médard-de-Soissons (Bibliothèque Nationale), which shows Eastern, particularly Syrian, influence. The Vivian Bible of the mid-9th century is a product of the school of Tours, whose manuscripts are notable for their script and narrative scenes. The Utrecht Psalter (University Library, Utrecht), written at Hautvillers near Reims about 832, is the most creative of all 9th-century manuscripts. The illustration consists of line drawings of extraordinary liveliness. No color is used, and the pictorial narrative has a cumulative epic quality. Also noteworthy are the Sacramentary of Drogo (855) in Paris and the Codex Aureus from Regensburg (870), now in Munich. Under the influence of Carolingian miniatures the school of Winchester in England produced drawings in the vivacious manner of the school of Reims but with more body to the total design of the page and with an exciting use of color and lush scrollwork in the frames around the picture.

The center of manuscript production during the Ottonian period in Germany was the island of Reichenau in Lake Constance, on the imperial route to Rome. Illuminated books from its scriptorium, executed in a new regal style, were sent to important towns of the empire such as Trier, Fulda, Bamberg, Regensburg, and Echternach. The outstanding surviving works are the Codex Egberti (980; Trier) and the Evangeliary of Otto III (Staatsbibliothek, Munich), the most lavishly decorated of the Reichenau manuscripts. The Sacramentary of Henry II (c. 1010; Staatsbibliothek) shows, like the others, a richness of color and use of gold suggestive of Byzantine influence. The Codex Aureus (c. 990; Landesbibliothek, Gotha) and the Gospels of Speyer (Escorial, Madrid) were commissioned at Echternach by emperors. The Munich Evangelistary illuminated in the early 11th century at Regensburg is one of the most complex manuscripts surviving from the Ottonian period.

The expansion of monasticism in the Romanesque period afforded additional opportunity for the copying of manuscripts and their adornment. Manuscript copies of the Commentary of the Apocalypse written by the Spanish monk Beatus of Liébana (c. 776) are noteworthy for their remarkable coloring. The manuscripts were copied for three centuries after the original composition of the text and had a wide influence on the work of schools of illumination throughout Europe. The earliest of the 24 manuscripts that survive dates from 926 (Pierpont Morgan Library, New York City). The illustrations are marked by a sure grasp of design elements and an intense feeling for color. The program of illumination for the Beatus Apocalypse influenced the imagery of later medieval art work.

In the high medieval period, the work of the Paris miniaturists rivaled the stained glass in the windows of Gothic cathedrals in richness of color. Illumination, being a more flexible medium, surpassed stained-glass work in freedom of handling of elements, subtlety of expression, and capacity for exploring, interpreting, and recording natural phenomena. In the 13th century, devotional books intended for personal use were handsomely decorated by the miniaturists. The accentuation of human traits in Gothic sculpture is evident in the style of manuscript illumination. In the margins of the manuscript pages artists were able to give full rein to their inventiveness. Gothic manuscript illumination culminated in the famous Psalter Les Très riches heures du Duc de Berry (Musée Condé, Chantilly), executed at the outset of the 15th century by the Flemish miniaturist Jacquemart de Hesdin. The illumination techniques of Jacquemart's Psalter constitute a summary of the stylistic elements of International Gothic. The great tradition ended with the minutely realistic work of the Limbourg brothers and Jean Fouquet, who was also a panel painter.

With the advent of printing in the 15th century and the perfection of new means of pictorial representation in the 16th century, the art of manuscript illumination declined and by the end of the 16th century ceased to exist as a vital mode of artistic expression.

For further discussion and additional illustrations, see ANGLO-SAXON ART; CAROLINGIAN ART.

Bibliography: J. A. HERBERT, Illuminated Manuscripts (London 1911). Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERQ, and H. I. MARROW (Paris 1907–53). 11.1:1225–1374. S. DE RICCI and W. J. WILSON, Census of Medieval and Renaissance Manuscripts in the United States and Canada, 3 v. (New York 1935–40). L. RÉAU, La Miniature: Histoire de la

Illuminated page from the "Lindisfarne Gospels," c. 700.

peinture au Moyenâge (Melun 1946). K. WEITZMANN, Roll and Codex (Princeton 1947). D. MINER, Illuminated and Illustrated Books (Baltimore 1949).

[L. P. SIGER]

MANUTIUS

An Italian family that distinguished itself in early printing and publishing. Aldus Manutius (also known as Teobaldo Manucci; Aldo Manuzio); b. Bassiano, 1450; d. Venice, Feb. 6, 1515. He was a Venetian publisher, noted for well-edited versions of Greek and Latin classics, especially the five-volume folio edition of Aristotle (1495-98) and a total of 28 editiones principes, or first printed editions of MSS. His development of an italic type, designed by Francesco Griffo, made possible and popular small octavo volumes, often produced in editions of 1,000 copies. The Aldine Hypernotomachia Poliphili (1499), by Francesco Colonna, is considered the best example of a 15th-century printed illustrated book. Aldus's printer's mark, a dolphin entwined around an anchor, became identified with high-quality printing. The establishment at his home of an academy of scholars, such as ERASMUS and Marcus Musurus, helped make Venice a center of classical culture.

Paulus Manutius, Aldus's son; b. Venice, June 12, 1512; d. Rome, April 16, 1574. Following an interim during which Andreas Torresanus was in charge of Aldus's enterprises, Paulus continued the tradition, especially in the printing of Cicero's works. In 1561 he was invited to Rome by Pius IV to establish a press to publish the Church Fathers for apologetic use against the Protestant reformers. Under Pius V (1566–72), he published the Canones et Decreta of the Council of Trent and similar works.

Aldus the Second, son of Paulus; b. Venice, Feb. 13, 1547; d. Rome, Oct. 28, 1597. Under Clement VIII he was appointed director of the Vatican press in 1590. The history of the Manutius family as printers terminated with his death.

Bibliography: H. R. BROWN, The Venetian Printing Press (London 1891). A. A. RENOUARD, A Bibliographical Sketch of the Aldine Press at Venice . . . translated and abridged from Annales de l'Imprimerie des Aldes, ed. E. M. GOLDSMID (Edinburgh 1887). J. E. SANDYS, A History of Classical Scholarship (New York 1958) 2:98–101.

[E. P. WILLGING]

MANYANET Y VIVES, JOSÉ (JOSEPH), BL.

Priest, founder of the Congregation of the Sons of the Holy Family and the Institute of the Missionary Daughters of the Holy Family of Nazareth; b. Jan. 7, 1833, Tremp, Pallars Jussá, Catalonia, Spain; d. Dec. 17, 1901, San Andres de Palomar, Barcelona, Spain.

José Manyanet, the youngest of nine children born to farmers Antonio Manyanet and Bonaventura Vives, was baptized on the day of his birth. Following the death of his father in 1834, José informally became the ward of Father Valentín Lledós, who influenced his future vocation, as did his mother Bonaventura's piety. At age 12, he left home to begin his education in the Piarist school at Barbastro from 1845 to 1850. He continued his study of philosophy at the seminary of Lleida (1850–53) and theology at Seu d'Urgell (1853–59), where he was mentored by Bishop José Caixal and ordained as priest April 9, 1859.

From his ordination until 1865, Manyanet successfully served Bishop Caixal in several offices while engaging in pastoral ministry as confessor, spiritual director, preacher, catechist, and promoter of several associations. Because he had a heroic concern for the family, which he recognized was threatened by divorce and personal independence, he founded two institutions: Hijos de la Sagrada Familia (1864 in Tremp) and Hijas de la Sagrada

Familia (1874 in Talarn). Manyanet and his first companions made their religious profession in Barcelona Feb. 2, 1870, and received pontifical approval June 22, 1901. The order operates schools for the Christian education of children and promotes devotion to the Holy Family in Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Italy, Mexico, Spain, the United States (from 1920), and Venezuela. They also publish the periodical Revista La Sagrada Familia.

The founding of the female branch was more difficult. Bishop Caixal placed a new community of women founded by Ana María Janer in 1859 under the direction of Manyanet. The order was consumed by crisis until it was again recognized by Bishop José Morgades of Vich in 1892, under the direction of the co-foundress, Mother Encarnación Colomina. She gave the order its new name Misioneras Hijas de la Sagrada Familia de Nazaret, which was approved by the Vatican May 10, 1958.

In addition to writing the constitutions of both the orders he founded, Manyanet contributed several books: Meditaciones: El espíritu de la Sagrada Familia (Meditations: The Spirit of the Holy Family); La Escuela de Nazaret (The School of Nazareth); and Preciosa joya de familia (The Precious Jewel of Family). He also advocated for the liturgical celebration of the Feast of the Holy Family, which was instituted by Pope Leo XII in 1892. For many years before his death Father Manyanet secretly bore the stigmatization of Jesus.

His mortal remains are enshrined in a bronze urn in the Beato José Manyanet Chapel in the School of Jesus, Mary, and Joseph of Saint Andrew of Palomar (Barcelona). The ordinary informative process for his beatification began in 1931, and his cause was formally introduced by Pope Pius XII in 1951. Pope John Paul II declared Manyanet venerable July 12, 1982, and beatified him Nov. 25, 1984.

Bibliography: D. MORERA, Among the Stars: The Life of Father Joseph Manyanet (New York 1957). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 77 (1985) 935–39. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 50 (1984): 2, 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MARANATHA

Maranatha is an Aramaic expression used by St. Paul in 1 Cor 16.22 in its transliterated form μ αραναθα. It must have originated in the early Aramaic–speaking Church of Palestine. The DIDACHE (10.6) indicates that it was apparently a liturgical acclamation like the Hebrew expressions HOSANNA and AMEN. Perhaps it was also used frequently by the charismatics who had the gift of tongues.

Since the Apostle did not translate or explain maranatha for his Greek–speaking readers, he must have presumed that they understood its significance. Now, however, its exact meaning and usage is uncertain. All agree that it is composed of two Aramaic elements: $m\bar{a}r\bar{a}n(a)$, "Our Lord" [from $m\bar{a}r$, "lord," and $-\bar{a}n(a)$, the suffix meaning "our"], plus ('ǎ) $t\bar{a}$ ', which, if read as $t\bar{a}$ ', would be the imperative "come!" but which, if read as 'ǎt\bar{a}', would mean ''has come.''

If understood as an invocation, maranatha would be a prayer for the Parousia. Because of the liturgical context in which it occurs both in 1 Corinthians and in the Didache, this interpretation seems the more probable one and is confirmed by the closing words of the Revelation, "Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!" (Rv 22.20). Maranatha would then express both the Church's belief in the risen Jesus as the Lord (Phil 2.11) and its hope in His glorious coming at the last day, already anticipated and guaranteed by His presence in the Eucharist.

However, since maranatha occurs in 1 Cor 16.22 immediately after anathema ("If any man does not love the Lord, let him be anathema. Maranatha. The grace of the Lord Jesus be with you."), some scholars prefer to regard the expression as part of the preceding curse formula, confirming the anathema by an appeal to the Lord who either has come or will come in judgment. This interpretation is already met with in the 4th century [AMBRO-SIASTER, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1878-90) 17:276] and it seems to have led to the use of maranatha in formulas of excommunication or cursing. Thus, a 4th- or 5th-century inscription from Salamis threatens with ANAOEMA MAPANAOA anyone who dares to place another body in a certain tomb (A. Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. Gr. 4: 9303), and an excommunication formula of the Fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) is anathema maranatha, which is explained as perditio in adventu Domini (perdition in the coming of the Lord). Nevertheless, this interpretation seems less probable than the one that understands the expression as a prayer for the Parousia.

Bibliography: C. F. D. MOULE, "A Reconsideration of the Context of Maranatha," New Testament Studies 6 (1959–60) 307–310. S. SCHULZ, "Maranatha und Kyrios Jesus," Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der Älteren Kirche 53 no. 3–4 (1962) 125–144. J. A. EMERTON, "Maranatha and Ephphatha," Journal of Theological Studies 18 (1967) 427–431. M. BLACK, "The Maranatha Invocation and Jude 14,15 (1 Enoch 1:9)," in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, S.S. SMALLEY, ed. (Cambridge, Eng. 1973) 189–196.

[R. KUGELMAN/EDS.]

MARAÑÓN, DAVID CARLOS, BL.

Martyr, lay brother of the Order of Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (Piarists); b. Dec. 29, 1907, in Asartam, Spain; d. July 28, 1936. David was professed as a lay brother in 1932 and made his solemn profession in 1935. He was the cook and gardener for the community at Peralta. After refusing an offer of freedom in exchange for abandoning his religious habit, he was shot along with Manuel SEGURA LÓPEZ. He was beatified on Oct. 1, 1995 by Pope John Paul II together with 12 other Piarists (see PAMPLONA, DIONISIO AND COMPANIONS, BB.).

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: "Decreto Super Martyrio," Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 651–656. La Documentation Catholique 2125 (Nov. 5, 1995): 924.

[L. GENDERNALIK/EDS]

MARBACH, ABBEY OF

A former foundation of CANONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE near Colmar, in the Diocese of Bale, Department of Haut-Rhin, France. It was founded in 1089 by Burkhard of Geberschweier (d. 1120); its first dean was MANEGOLD OF LAUTENBACH (d. 1103). Papal approval came in 1096. The beautiful triple-naved church was consecrated Nov. 15, 1119. The Romanesque main portal with its two towers and two choir apses remained intact until 1830. Deans had assumed the title of abbot since granting of pontifical rights by Pope HONORIUS III c. 1216, and from 1463 they were called priors in accordance with the statutes. The abbey buildings were often destroyed during the Middle Ages by fire and pillage. Until 1462, Marbach was head of a congregation to which 13 monasteries belonged. It was attached to the WINDESHEIM congregation from 1462 to 1769. Marbach flourished under Prior Petrus Kroppenberg (1650-80). In addition to the canonry, there was from 1117 a women's convent that was moved in 1149 to Schwarzenthann but continued to be subject to the abbey. In 1786 Marbach became a convent; it was dissolved in 1790. Its buildings are used today as a sanatorium. The Codex regulae of Canon Sintram, written c. 1150, is famous for its numerous and valuable miniatures. The Marbach Annals are an important source for the history of the empire in the 12th and 13th centuries; they were compiled about 1210 in the Convent of Hohenburg (see MONT SAINTE-ODILE, CONVENT OF).

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:1735–36. J. CLAUSS, Historischtopographisches Wörterbuch des Elsass (Saverne 1895–1914) 636–637. A. M. BURG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1371–72. F. A. GOEHLINGER, Historie de l'abbaye de Marbach (Colmar 1954).

[P. VOLK]

MARBECK, PILGRAM

Anabaptist leader and engineer; b. Rattenberg, Tyrol, c. 1495; d. Augsburg, 1556. He attended the Latin school at Rattenberg, became an engineer in the mines of the lower Inn Valley, and was a member of city council and a mine judge. He lost the last position because he refused to prosecute some ANABAPTISTS at the end of 1527. He joined the movement and fled to Strassburg (1528), where he built a complex water system and wood floating flumes in the valleys of Alsace and Baden, whereby Strassburg gained access to the wealth of the Black Forest. Because of his leadership in Anabaptist circles, he was soon under suspicion and pressure by Martin BUCER and the city council, which led to his imprisonment, a colloquium before the assembled city council, and his expulsion in January 1532. He traveled extensively and even returned to Strassburg before he found labor as a well engineer and Anabaptist leader and writer in Augsburg (1544–56). He was a prolific writer of books, pamphlets, and correspondence, and gained a leading position among the south German Anabaptists. He rejected Caspar Schwenckfeld's spiritualism and emphasized the significance of the visible church of Christ (see SCH-WENCKFELDERS). With Hans Denck he stressed the consecrated, disciplined Christian life, but he was not as rigid as the Swiss Anabaptists. Only recently, through the discovery of new sources and writings by Marbeck, has his significance as Anabaptist leader become fully established.

Bibliography: W. KLASSEN, The Hermeneutics of Pilgram Marbeck (Doctoral diss. microfilm; Princeton 1960). J. J. KIWIET, Pilgram Marbeck (Kassel 1957), bibliog. H. TÜCHLE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 6:1372. H. FAST, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart ³ 4:733.

[C. KRAHN]

MARBOD OF RENNES

Bishop, teacher, poet; b. Angers, France, c. 1035; d. Angers, Sept. 11, 1123. After completing his studies at the CATHEDRAL SCHOOL of ANGERS under Rainald, a pupil of FULBERT OF CHARTRES, Marbod became a teacher in the school, and c. 1067, its master. He became also chancellor of the Diocese of Angers c. 1069. In 1096 Pope Urban II appointed Marbod Bishop of Rennes in Brittany. He resigned his bishopric at the age of 88, and died soon after in the Benedictine Abbey of Saint-Aubin.

A product of the educational revival of the 11th century as originally promoted by such men as SYLVESTER II and Fulbert, Marbod marks the transition to the Christian humanism of the 12th century. His skill as a Latin poet was especially admired, though he was outranked in this field by his younger admirer, HILDEBERT OF LA-VARDIN. Marbod was fond of the leonine hexameter and he versified every kind of topic, though his poems became more serious with advancing years. He could write simple lyrics, such as Upon a Beautiful Girl and To a Devout Virgin, as well as long Biblical narratives in verse. He wrote poems on the lives and virtues of the saints and the Mother of Christ, such as On St. Lawrence, On the Passion of St. Victor, To the Virgin, and On the Annunciation. He composed poetic eulogies, such as those To Queen Mathilda, the wife of Henry I, and To Countess Ermenegarde, as well as metrical philosophical reflections On Old Age, On Time, On Fate, etc. One of his more extensive poems won him a place in the history of science, viz, The Book of Stones (or Gems), which describes the qualities and virtues (real and imaginary) of some 60 different stones. This very popular work was translated into several languages. Marbod composed also a treatise on versification entitled De ornamentis verborum (On Verbal Ornamentation).

Two lives of Marbod have been published, one in French by L. Ernault (Rennes 1890), the other in Latin by C. Ferry (Paris 1899). Marbod's works were edited by J. Mayeux (Rennes 1524) and A. Beaugendre (Paris 1708) and were reprinted in Patrologia Latina 171:1451–1780.

Bibliography: Histoire littéraire de la France 10:343–392. Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886-1922) 50:388–403. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 3:719–730. A. WILMART, "Un nouveau poème de Marbode . . ." Revue Bénédictine 51 (1939) 169–181, L. THORNDIKE, A History of Magic and Experimental Science (New York 1923-58) v.1. J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XIIe siècle (Brussels-Paris 1946) 2:239–240. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 273–277. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages (Oxford 1957) 1:329–337.

[D. D. MCGARRY]

MARCA, PIERRE DE

Prelate, public servant, canonist, historian; b. Gan in Béarn, France, Jan. 24, 1594; d. Paris, Jun. 29, 1662. He was the son of Jacques de Marca, a merchant-noble, one of the leaders of the Catholic party in Béarn. Pierre studied letters at the Jesuit College of Auch and law at the University of Toulouse. He served as lawyer and councilor at Pau (1615); and when the council at Pau was converted to a parliament by Louis XIII in 1621, Pierre was appointed to preside. After the death of his wife, Marguerite de Forges, he entered the priesthood and was ordained April 2, 1642. He was consecrated bishop of Conserans on Dec. 20, 1648. Before his consecration Marca had been appointed intendant in Catalonia, in which position he continued for seven years, giving distinguished service to the Crown. On May 28, 1652, Cardinal Jules MAZARIN had him appointed to the archiepiscopal See of Toulouse. Rising rapidly in royal favor, he was made minister of state (1659) and nominated to succeed Cardinal Jean de RETZ as archbishop of Paris (1662). He never assumed the duties of that office, since he died on the same day he received the papal bull of appointment.

Next to his accomplishments as civil and ecclesiastical administrator are his writings in Canon Law and local history. His Rélations des déliberations du clergé de France (1661), against the Jansenists, demanded their adherence to the decrees of Innocent X and Alexander VII. As a historian he is credited with works of great erudition in his Histoire de Béarn and his Marca Hispanica, the latter a description of Catalonia.

Marca is important also for his attempt, at Richelieu's orders, to formulate a statement of Gallicanism that would reconcile the authority of the Roman pontiff with the full exercise of sovereign functions in the state. His treatise, De concordantia sacerdotii et imperii (1641), stated that the infallibility of the Church rests in the pope, but it can be exercised validly only cum aliquo consensu ecclesiae (with a certain consent of the Church); an ecclesiastical law must receive the consent of the nation that has to apply it; and the king has the right to censure the action of an ecclesiastic who violates canons and decrees confirmed by the royal power. The work did not meet with approval at Rome and was put on the Index. Marca then tried to extenuate his views in a subsequent publication, Dissertatio de primatu Lugdunensi et aliis primatibus (1644), which won him enough favor to be confirmed and consecrated as bishop in 1648.

Bibliography: The most noted editions of his writings are by É. BALUZE (Paris 1641, 1663), P. DE FAGET (Paris 1668, 1669), and V. P. DUBARAT (Pau 1894–1912). A prefatory life is found in the Dissertationes de concordia, ed. É. BALUZE (1663) and Dissertationes posthumae, ed. P. DE FAGET (1669). F. GAQUÈRE, Pierre de Marca, 1594–1662 (Paris 1932). J. CARREYRE, in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 9.2:1987–91, bibliog. R. METZ, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1375. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3rd edition Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:1179–84.

[J. W. BUSH]

Gabriel Marcel. (Archive Photos)

MARCEL, GABRIEL

Christian existentialist philosopher; b. Paris, Dec. 7, 1889; d. Paris, Oct. 8, 1973. Since his father was at one time French minister to Stockholm, Marcel benefitted from a multilingual milieu and from extensive foreign travel. He studied at the Sorbonne but did not complete his doctorate, and as a philosopher was unusual in not pursuing an academic career. He did some teaching, but for most of his life devoted himself to free-lance intellectual work as essayist, critic, editor, and lecturer. Marcel wrote that unpleasant aspects of his childhood, including the death of his mother when he was four, led him to take up idealistic philosophy in an attempt to transcend his situation. But experiences as a Red Cross worker in World War I, he wrote, shattered his idealism and turned him toward an existentialist approach.

Though he had little religious influence in his upbringing—his father being a Catholic-turned-agnostic and his stepmother a Protestant whose religion was primarily ethics—he began developing a deep interest in the religious dimension of experience. In 1929 he converted to Catholicism and later came to exert a considerable influence in Catholic intellectual circles.

Rejecting the atheistic existentialism of Camus and Sartre, he moved along lines closer to such theistic existentialists as KIERKEGAARD and BUBER. Although usually reckoned among existentialists, Marcel himself did not relish this designation. He was largely an underivative thinker; not only was the influence of the progenitor of existentialism, Kierkegaard, next to nil, but the direction of Marcel's thought was quite fully determined prior to that of other 20th-century existentialists such as HEIDEG-GER, JASPERS, and SARTRE. He also rejected the systematic approach of academic philosophy and developed what he called "concrete philosophy," contending that a philosopher must do his work as a participant in life rather than as an observer. The author of several plays, he found drama a congenial form in which to express his existentialist viewpoint. He was also a composer of music. It is symptomatic of the radically integral character of his thought that he ranked music as one of the most important influences on his philosophy. In 1933 he became involved in Moral Re-Armament and in 1958 edited a book of testimonies, Fresh Hope for the World, in which he and others expressed support for the movement.

Participation and Presence. The leitmotiv of Marcel's philosophy is the notion of PARTICIPATION; this slowly emerged as Marcel defined his thought in opposition both to Descartes and to the early influence of the German idealists. The aspiration toward system so prominent in the idealists was not acceptable to him, for a system would be available only for a thought that could view reality as a detached observer. However, the human self is not a spectator of reality, but a participant: for man, "to be" is to participate in being. Hence, too, there is no problem of breaking through to realism, for the Cartesian private ego is an abstraction: the concretely experienced SELF is "founded" by participation and can claim no precedence over other selves.

Human thought tends to withdraw from the immediacy of participation, to treat the presence there met as an object confronting an autonomous subject, or, as Marcel says, to transform being into having. Man even thinks of his body as something that he "has," whereas the primordial experience of incarnation is better conveyed by his saying "I am my body." An object, in Marcel's sense, is something that one can regard as external to himself. Here is the basis for Marcel's already classic distinction between a problem and a mystery. A problem is an inquiry into an object in this strict sense, typified by the scientific inquiry. But some data do not permit objectification of this type. The meaning of being, for instance, cannot be revealed objectively. For one cannot treat being as "outside" oneself: being includes the self that thinks it. The question of being is thus a mystery and not a problem. Again, all influences that crystallize man's habit of conceiving the real in an exclusively objectified way weaken his awareness of being. Thus the very virtues and successes of the present rationalist-technical civilization constitute a threat to the sense of mystery. For the more man treats reality in an objectified manner, the more he is tempted to regard himself, too, as an object, a set of functions that can be tabulated and manipulated. It is no accident that, in an age often succumbing to this temptation, human existence is emptied of depth and falls prey to anxiety and absurdity.

Human Communion. Marcel attempts in his "concrete philosophy" and in his plays to recover by "secondary reflection' the presence that objectifying primary reflection has forsaken. In particular, he attempts to recover the special dimension of being revealed in human communion. That is why he concentrates on novel philosophical themes such as love, hope, and fidelity. For it is in these experiences that the "thou" is delivered to the perceiver; and the "I-thou" relation is a pivotal form of participation. The "thou" is not an "it," a characterizable object about which one speaks, but a unique presence; and this makes possible a unique self-presence. The tenuous and fugitive nature of this communion, stressed also by M. Buber, is the prevailing theme in Marcel's plays: openness to the "thou" is the human access to the peace of being, but egoism and insincerity wall one up in his own self.

In awakening to the ontological plenitude of human communion, one awakens to the aura of the eternal and inexhaustible that pervades communion. It is among Marcel's deepest convictions that the transcendent dimension of human existence cannot be revealed to an impersonal thought; rather it is the intelligible epiphany of an authentic human existence. God is the Absolute "Thou" who lurks in the truncated experience of presence felt in human communion. To "prove" the existence of God is simply to raise to speculative recognition a truth already present to participation. Marcel speaks of a "blinded intuition" of the plenitude of being, but this intuition is not an object of vision. It is a presentiment or intimation: it is like the artist's creative idea that is revealed in the work itself. The intuition of transcendence must be read back out of the works it makes possible: chiefly this reading-back is accomplished in the "I-thou" experiences. Finally, the truth of transcendence is not something that is imposed upon a person "automatically." Since, in the area of mystery, the presence affirmed cannot be externalized vis-à-vis the singular self, the affirmation of such a presence involves personal singularity-and hence personal freedom. The transcendent haunts human existence as an appeal, and one's recognition of its presence is at the same time a creative response.

Works. Marcel's main philosophical works are Metaphysical Journal, The Mystery of Being (2 v.), Being and Having, Homo Viator, and the essay "On the Ontological Mystery." Among his plays are: Un homme de dieu, Le chemin de Crête, Le dard, and La soif (Les coeurs avides).

Bibliography: R. TROISFONTAINES, De l'existence à l'être: La philosophie de Gabriel Marcel, 2 v. (Namur 1953). K. T. GAL-LAGHER, The Philosophy of Gabriel Marcel (New York 1962). S. KEEN, Gabriel Marcel (Richmond, Va. 1967). G. MARCEL, The Philosophy of Existence, tr. M. HARARI (New York 1949). D. APPEL-BAUM, Contact and Attention: The Anatomy of Gabriel Marcel's Metaphysical Method ([Pittsburgh, Pa.] 1986, c1987). J. C. MCCOWN, Availability: Gabriel Marcel and the Phenomenology of Human Openness (Missoula, Mont. [1977]). C. PAX, An Existential Approach to God: A Study of Gabriel Marcel (The Hague 1972).

[T. EARLY/K. T. GALLAGHER/EDS.]

MARCELLA, ST.

Widow, ascetic; b. c. 325-335 of the noble Roman family of the Marcelli; d. late 410 or early 411. Her father died while she was young, and although she was left a childless widow after a marriage of only seven months, she declined an opportunity to remarry and instead consecrated herself to God. In her home on the Aventine, where she lived with her mother, Albina, she gathered together a number of noble Roman widows and virgins interested in pursuing the religious life. This group was given instruction by St. JEROME during his stay in Rome (382-385). A zealous student of scripture, Marcella directed a flow of philological and exegetical questions to Jerome, and his extant correspondence includes a number of letters addressed to her. Marcella took a vigorous interest in the dispute over ORIGENISM. During the plunder of Rome (410), she was beaten by soldiers of Alaric and died not long thereafter. Jerome left (Ep. 127) a touching account of her life.

Feast: Jan. 31.

Bibliography: I. HILBERG, Sancti Eusebii Hieronymi epistulae (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 54–56; 1910–18), esp. nos. 23–29, 32, 34, 37, 38, 40–44, 46, 59, 127. F. CAVALLERA, Saint Jérôme, 2 v. (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 1, 2; 1922), passim. S. LETSCH-BRUNNER, Marcella: discipula et magistra (Berlin 1998).

[T. C. LAWLER]

MARCELLINUS, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: June 30, 296 to Oct. 25, 304. The Libe pontificalis calls Marcellinus a Roman, the son of Projectus, and places his pontificate during the persecution of Diocletian. It repeats the story, circulated later by the Donatists (see DONATISM), that the pope, when apprehended and ordered to sacrifice to the gods, complied and handed over the sacred books to the persecuting authorities. Torn with remorse, the pope is said to have repented and sought martyrdom several days later. His body was buried by the priest Marcellus in the private cemetery of Priscilla on the Via Salaria.

The accusations of apostasy brought against Marcellinus and other Catholic bishops, including the future popes Miltiades, Marcellus, and Silvester, are acknowledged and rejected by St. Augustine (Contra Litteram Petil. 2.92.202; De unico baptismo 16; Brev. coll. 3.18) and repeated in the Acts (c. 500) of the alleged Council of Sinuessa, which lays great stress on the pope's repentance and martyrdom. Eusebius states that the pope "was overcome by the persecution" and locates his grave in the cemetery of Priscilla (Ecclesiastical History. 7.32); but Pope DAMASUS I ignored him when he composed the epitaphs of past Roman bishops, and neither the MARTYR-OLOGY OF ST. JEROME nor the Gelasian Sacramentary mentions Marcellinus.

The Eastern bishop Theodoret of Cyrus records that Marcellinus bore a distinguished role in the persecution (Ecclesiastical History. 1.2), however, scholars consider the Western evidence decisive and believe that somehow Marcellinus compromised himself during the persecution, although they also take his repentance seriously. The Depositio episcoporum names a "Marcellinus," but it is evident from the dates given that Pope MARCELLUS I, not Marcellinus, was meant. A late fifth—century passio and the seventh—century ITINERARIA credit him with martyrdom and witness to the veneration of his tomb. While the Annuario Pontificio (2001) lists the dates of Marcellinus as June 30, 296, to Oct. 25, 304, historians hesitate to distinguish him from his successor Marcellus.

Feast: April 26.

Bibliography: A. STUIBER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 7:1. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 9.2:1999–2001. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1: LXXIII–LXXV, 32–36, 72–73, 162–163. E. H. RÖTTGES, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie (Vienna 1877–) 78 (1956) 385–420. E. FERGUSON, Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 2:713. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 24–25.

[E. G. WELTIN]

MARCELLINUS, FLAVIUS

Fifth-century Roman tribune and notary, friend of St. Augustine; d. Carthage, c. 413. He was a correspondent of St. AUGUSTINE, having made his acquaintance during the conference of Carthage (411) between the Catholics and Donatists. Marcellinus presided and upheld the Catholic cause. On the charge, which was put forward by the Donatists, that he and his brother Apringius were implicated in the revolt of Heraclian, Marcellinus and his brother were arrested by Marinus, Count of Africa, who had them condemned and decapitated. Augustine visited him in prison and testified to his upright character. Subsequently Emperor Honorius exonerated his name and recognized his work in the interests of peace. Augustine praised Marcellinus highly in several letters and dedicated his De civitate Dei to him. Cardinal Baronius added his name to the Roman Martyrology.

Feast: Apr. 6.

Bibliography: Orosius, Hist. 7:42; 17. Jerome, Adv. Pelag. 3:19. Augustine, Epist. 128; 129; 133; 136; 143. W. Ensslin, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft 14.2 (1930) 1445–46. H. W. PHILLOT, A Dictionary of Christian Biography 3: 806–807. F. Van der Meer, Augustine the Bishop, tr. B. Battershaw and G. R. Lamb (New York 1962).

[P. ROCHE]

MARCELLINUS AND PETER, SS.

Martyrs under Diocletian in Rome, 303. Marcellinus, a priest, and Peter, an exorcist, were, according to the MARTYROLOGY OF JEROME and itineraria of the seventh century, buried in the cemetery ad duas lauros on the Via Labicana. They are also commemorated in the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries. Constantine had a basilica built in their honor over the crypt in which they were buried. The crypt, with a fresco of the martyrs from c. 400, was discovered in 1896. Pope DAMASUS I (366–384) composed a poetic epitaph for them that was apparently founded on the report of their executioner. This epitaph seems to be the source of a legendary passio, composed perhaps when Pope VIGILIUS (537-555), who introduced their names into the Canon of the Mass, restored their tomb. The legend states that the martyrs were beheaded after they had dug their graves in a woods, but their relics were miraculously discovered and brought to the crypt.

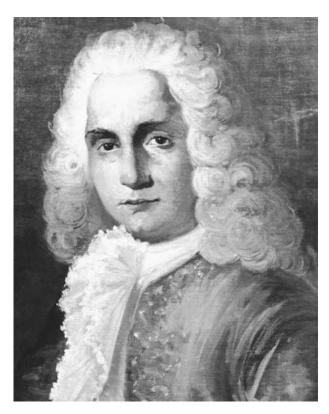

Feast: June 2.

Bibliography: EINHARD, The History of the Translation of the Blessed Martyrs of Christ, Marcellinus and Peter, tr. B. WENDELL (Cambridge 1926).

[E. G. RYAN]

MARCELLO, BENEDETTO

Baroque composer and satirical writer; b. Venice, Aug. 1, 1686; d. Brescia, July 24, 1739. Though a student of Gasparini and Lotti, he referred to himself as nobile

Benedetto Marcello, painting by Pasquale Ruggiero. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Veneto dilettante di contrappunto, thus implying that he did not consider music his principal vocation, and in fact he was successful as a lawyer and state employee. Yet he made a considerable contribution to sacred music too. His compositions certainly belong to the stile moderno typical of Venice, but like many musicians of his time he wrote with equal skill in the stile antico. Marcello composed Masses, motets, and oratorios. His great work is the Estro poetico-armonico, parafrasi sopra i primi 50 psalmi, poesia di Girolamo Giustiniani (Venice 1724–26). Here he set the Psalms for from one to four voices with thorough bass, and at times with two violins and cello as obbligato instruments, using such concertato devices as question and answer and contrast of solo and choral singing, so that each Psalm became really a cantata. Very little of his music is available in modern transcription, but his pamphlet Teatro alla moda (c. 1720), a seriocomic satire on the state of the opera, has become a minor classic of stage literature.

Bibliography: F. GIEGLING, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 8:1616–1619. F. GEHRING, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 5:563–564. O. STRUNK, ed., Source Readings in Music History (New York 1950) 518–531. M. F. BUKOFZER, Music in the Baroque Era (New York 1947) Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, ed. N. SLONIMSKY (5th, rev.

ed. New York 1958) 1025. D. J. GROUT, A Short History of Opera, 2 v. (2d, rev. and enl. ed. New York 1965) W. S. NEWMAN, "The Keyboard Sonatas of Benedetto Marcello," Acta Musicologia 29 (1957) 28–41. R. G. PAULY, "B. M.'s Satire on Early 18th Century Opera," Musical Quarterly 34 (1948) 222–233. E. SELFRIDGE-FIELD, The Music of Benedetto and Alessandro Marcello: A Thematic Catalogue, with Commentary on the Composers, Repertory, and Sources (Oxford 1990). C. S. FRUCHTMAN, Checklist of Vocal Chamber Works by Benedetto Marcello (Detroit 1967).

[T. CULLEY]

MARCELLUS, SS.

In addition to Pope MARCELLUS I and MARCELLUS AKIMETES, there are several other saints of that name, notably the following.

Marcellus of Chalon-sur-Saône, priest, martyr; d. c. 178. According to his legendary passio he was martyred under Marcus Aurelius. A cult and church in his honor are first mentioned by GREGORY OF TOURS [In glor. martyr. 52; Hist. Franc. 5.20 (27); 9.3.27]. His name appears subsequently in calendars, martyrologies, and sacramentaries.

Feast: Sept. 4.

Marcellus of Die, bishop; b. Avignon; d. Bareuil in Provence, 510. Following his consecration by St. MAMERTUS, bishop of Vienne, who had ignored the rights claimed by the metropolitan of Arles, he was imprisoned and exiled by Gundiok, the Arian king of the Burgundians. Later he was permitted to return to his see and became distinguished for his piety and pastoral zeal. His cult at Die began very early and was confirmed for the Diocese of Valence by Pope Pius IX.

Feast: April 9 (formerly Jan. 17).

Marcellus of Paris, bishop; fl. early fifth century. His vita, which depicts him as a zealous pastor of souls and a miracle worker, was composed, at the request of St. Germain of Paris (see GERMAIN, SS.), by Venantius FORTUNATUS who apparently relied on vague oral tradition.

Feast: Nov. 3 (formerly 1).

Marcellus the Centurion, martyr; d. Tingis (Tangier), 298. At a banquet held in honor of the emperor's birthday, he suddenly arose to protest against pagan practices and threw down his belt and arms, declaring that it was not right for a Christian, who serves Christ, to serve in the armies of the world. When he maintained the same position at his trial, he was condemned to death and beheaded. The fragments of the original acts are preserved in two later reworked versions that are extant.

Feast: Oct. 30.

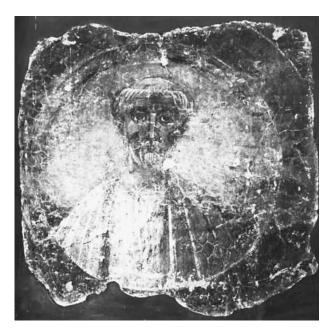

Bibliography: Marcellus of Chalon-sur-Saône. Acta Sanctae Sedis (Sept. 2, 1868) 187–202. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina

antiquae et mediae aetatis. (Brussels 1898-1901) 5245-47. H. LE-CLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCO and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907-53) 9.2:2568-75. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris (Paris 1935-56) 9:103-105. Marcellus, Bishop of Die. G. KIRNER, Studi storici 9 (Pisa 1900) 289-327. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907-15) 1:234. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris (Paris 1935-56) 4:212-213. Marcellus, Bishop of Paris. Acta Sanctae Sedis (Nov. 1, 1887) 259–267. Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Berlin 1826-) division Auctores antiquissimi. 4.2:49-54. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 5248–50. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907-15) 2:470. W. BÖHNE, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCO and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907-53) 13.2:1839. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:238. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris (Paris 1935-56) 11:45-49. Marcellus the Centurion. H. DELEHAYE, "Les Actes de S. Marcel le Centurion," Analecta Bollandiana 41 (1923) 257-278. B. DE GAIFFIER, "L'Elogium dans la passion de S. Marcel le Centurion," Archivum latinitatis medii aevi 16 (1942) 127-136; "S. Marcel de Tanger ou de Léon: Évolution d'une légende," Analecta Bollandiana 61 (1943) 116–139. G. LAZZATI, Gli sviluppi della letteratura sui martiri nei primi quattro secoli (Turin 1956) 141-146. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:220-221. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris (Paris 1935-56) 10:990-993.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

MARCELLUS I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: 306? to January 16, 309?. Marcellus is not mentioned in the Church history of Eusebius, and it is possible that the similarity of his name with his predecessor's caused confusion. His ascension occurred two years after his predecessor's death. This delay resulted from the disorder caused by pagan persecution and by the civil war among Roman generals to become emperor. It seems that Marcellus governed the Christian community during the strife and was eventually chosen bishop. According to the Liber pontificalis Marcellus reorganized the Church of Rome into twenty-five parishes, founded a new cemetery, ordained twenty-five priests, and consecrated twenty-one bishops. According to the verse epitaph composed by Pope DAMASUS I, his authority was challenged by a faction under Heraclius when Marcellus imposed a penance on the LAPSI or apostates of the persecutions. Because of the public disorder resulting from this dissension, the Emperor Maxentius exiled Marcellus from the city as a disturber of the peace, and he died shortly afterward. His body was returned to Rome for burial in the cemetery of Priscilla. A fifth-century Passio Marcelli and the Liber pontificalis contain the legend that Maxentius turned the title church (titulus) of Marcellus into a stable, and that the Pope died there as a result of his labors as a stable boy.

Pope Marcellus I, fresco from 9th-century series of papal portraits, formerly at basilica of St. Paul, Rome.

Feast: January 16.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:LXXIII–LXXIV, LXXIX, CCXLIX, XCIX–C, 72–75, 164–166. Acta Sanctorum Jan. 2:3–14. A. FERRUA, ed., Epigrammata Damasiana (Rome 1942). E. H. RÖOTTGES, "Marcellinus-Marcellus," Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 78 (1956) 385–420. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 10.2:1753–60. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 7:3. J. N. D. KELLY Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 25–26.

[E. G. WELTIN]

MARCELLUS II, POPE

Pontificate: April 9, 1555, to May 1, 1555; b. Marcello Cervini, Montepulciano, Tuscany, May 6, 1501. His father, Ricciardo, served as scriptor in the Apostolic Penitentiary in the reign of Innocent VIII and vice-treasurer of the Marches of Ancona under Alexander VI. Marcello studied humanities at Siena, and was called to Rome by Clement VII to continue the work of correcting the calendar, begun by Ricciardo. His interest in the New Learning brought him into familiarity with many of the humanists in the Curia, such as Lampridio, Tebaldeo, Lascari, and Bembo. He also gained the patronage of the powerful Cardinal Alessandro Farnese, who, upon his election as PAUL III in 1534, made Marcello tutor of his young nephew, Alessandro Farnese. When Paul III entrusted much of papal affairs, including foreign policy, to Alessandro, Marcello, as his private secretary, was brought into ecclesiastical politics. At the end of August 1539 he received the See of Nicastro in Calabria and in December, the cardinal's hat with the title of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme. The next year he was made administrator of the See of Reggio Emilia. In these offices he was active in promoting reform and took interest in his role of protector of the Servites and the Augustinian hermits, winning praise from the Augustinian general, Girolamo SERIPANDO. In 1540 he accompanied Alessandro as papal legate a latere on legations to Francis I, King of France, at Amiens and to the Emperor Charles V at Ghent, in an effort to interest these monarchs in a general council. The next year he was with Paul III in the meeting with Charles at Lucca, and in 1543 was appointed papal legate to the imperial court. On Feb. 6, 1545, in a general consistory he was chosen to share the presidency of the Council of TRENT with cardinals Giovanni Maria Ciocchi del Monte (afterward JU-LIUS III, 1550-55) and Reginald POLE. Until the prorogation of the council in 1547, he opposed the emperor in favor of papal policy, thereby earning imperial disfavor. In 1548 he was appointed Vatican librarian and a member of the reform commission of Paul III. He became president of this commission under Julius III, until his outspoken criticism of the pope's NEPOTISM forced him to retire to his See of Gubbio, which he had administered since 1544. In the conclave that started on April 4, 1555, he was not considered a papal prospect because of the contravention of the emperor, but after four days he was elected, consecrated bishop, and crowned. As pope, he was one of the few in the modern period to keep his baptismal name. During his short reign of 22 days, he appointed Angelo Massarelli as secretary to the Council of Trent and entrusted him to gather all the reform documents drawn up by Julius III, his predecessor, seeking to have them quickly published. He attempted a posture of neutrality in politics, initiated police measures for peace in Rome, and befriended the Jesuits, who had frequently been his confessors.

Bibliography: G. B. MANNUCCI, Il conclave di papa Marcello (Siena 1921). H. JEDIN, History of the Council of Trent, tr. E. GRAF, (St. Louis 1957–60) v.1. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 14:1–55. H. LUTZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:3–4. G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 9.2:1992–93. W. HUDON, Marcello Cervini and Ecclesiastical Government in Tridentine Italy (De Kalb, Ill. 1992). E.G. GLEASON, "Who Was the First Counter-Reformation Pope?" Catholic Historical Review (April 1995) 173–184.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

MARCELLUS AKIMETES, ST.

Abbot of the acoemetic monastery of Eirenaion on the Bosporus; d. c. 469. Marcellus, who had been born of rich parents, probably at Apamea, studied at Antioch and copied manuscripts at Ephesus before joining the Akoimeti monks (literally, the "insomniacs" or "watchers," hence of perpetual ADORATION), who sang the Divine Office in relays day and night. Marcellus was one of the score of archimandrites who, undaunted by Emperor Theodosius II and Eutychian bishops, signed the condemnation of EUTYCHES at a synod at Constantinople in 448. Before the Council of CHALCEDON (451), he petitioned Emperor MARCIAN against Eutyches. Two letters to him from Theodoret of Cyr (Epist. 141, 142) congratulate him, apparently on his stand for orthodoxy in the troubles following the Robber Council of EPHESUS (449). At Chalcedon, during the session of October 17, he gave evidence against the Eutychian abbots.

Feast: Dec. 29.

Bibliography: J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio. (Florence-Venice 1757-98) 6:753; 7:61, 76. J. PARGOIRE, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. (Paris 1907-53) 1.1:315-318; Échos d'Orient 2 (1898-99) 304-308, 365-372.

[A. A. STEPHENSON]

MARCELLUS OF ANCYRA

Bishop and controversial figure in the Trinitarian debate after Nicaea; b. c. 280; d. 374. As bishop of Ancyra he attended the council there in 314 and that of NICAEA in 325, where he strongly opposed ARIANISM. He published a major work against ASTERIUS the Sophist c. 330, in which he not only attacked both Eusebius of Nicomedia and Eusebius of Caesarea but also laid himself open to the accusation of SABELLIANISM. Consequently he became one of the main targets of the anti-Nicene party. EU-SEBIUS OF CAESAREA attacked him in his Contra Marcellum and De ecclesiastica theologia. At a synod of Constantinople, Marcellus' book was condemned, and he was deposed and exiled. After the death of Constantine I in 337, when all exiled bishops were repatriated, Marcellus regained his see but was soon forced to leave again. He took his case to the West, where both a synod in Rome (340) and the Western assembly of SARDICA (343) declared his doctrine orthodox.

The Eastern Councils of Antioch (341) and Sardica (343), however, reaffirmed their condemnation in strong terms. The openly heretical doctrines of Photinus of Sirmium, a disciple of Marcellus, finally induced ATHANA-SIUS OF ALEXANDRIA and his Western allies to sever communion with Marcellus. Nothing is heard of him after 345, but many continued to write against him. EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS included him in his list of heretics (Panarion 72.1), as did the first canon of the Council of Constantinople I in 381.

Although Marcellus' treatise against Asterius is no longer extant, the numerous citations in Eusebius prove that his trinitarian doctrine was definitely unorthodox and closely related to a pre-Nicene type of dynamic MONAR-CHIANISM. While he admits the eternity of the Logos as such, he denies an eternal generation in God, holding that the Logos became Son at the Incarnation only. Similarly, at the consummation of the world, both the Son and the Spirit will reenter the Godhead, and there will be the absolute Monad again. Hence the affirmation against Marcellus in many creeds: ". . . of Whose Kingdom there will be no end."

According to St. Jerome (De vir. ill. 86) Marcellus wrote several other volumes against the Arians, but nothing remains of them, unless one agrees with F. Scheidweiler, who recently defended the Marcellan authorship of the pseudo-Athanasian treatises Sermo maior de fide and Expositio fidei. Also, a small treatise, De sancta ecclesia, formally attributed to Anthimus of Nicomedia, has been restored to Marcellus by M. Richard.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology 3:197–201, with bibliog. F. LOOFS, Sitzungsberichte der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin 764–781. J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK, eds., Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie 12 (1903) 259–265. M. D. CHENU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 9.2:1993–98. J. M. FONDEVILLA, Ideas trinitarias y cristologicas de Marcelo de Ancyra (Madrid 1953); Estudios Eclesiasticos 27 (1953) 20–64. Eusebius Werke, ed. E. KLOSTERMANN, Die greichischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 4 (1906) 183–215. F. SCHEIDWEILER, Byzantinische Zeitschrift 47 (1954) 333–357. M. RICHARD, Mélange de science religieuse 6 (1949) 5–28.

[V. C. DE CLERCQ]

MARCH MESA, NAZARÍA IGNACIA, BL.

In religion, Nazaría Ignacia of Santa Teresa of Jesús; foundress of the Missionary Crusaders of the Church (Las Misioneras Cruzadas de la Iglesia); b. Jan. 10, 1889, Madrid, Spain; d. July 6, 1943, Buenos Aires, Argentina. Nazaría was the fourth of the ten children of José March

y Reus, a sailor and later businessman, and his wife Nazaría Mesa Ramos. She first sensed a call to religious life while she was preparing for her first communion (1898) and made a vow of perpetual virginity at age 11. Desiring to be a Jesuit missionary like Saint Francis XAVIER, she formed her young friends into a secret missionary society of the Sacred Heart; they prayed and offered sacrifices for the missions. Her family moved to Mexico due to economic reasons in 1906. En route, Nazaría became acquainted with two members of the Hermanitas de los Ancianos Desamparados (Little Sisters of the Abandoned Elderly) with whom she began her religious life (1908). In 1912, she went to Bolivia, where with the approval of the nuncio, the Bolivian Church hierarchy, and 40 centavos, she founded at Oruro the Missionary Crusaders. Nazaría was soon joined by others, elected superior general, and began to evangelize workers in cities, mines, and the countryside. Among other works she organized the first syndicate for female workers in Latin America, opened soup kitchens for the unemployed, and advocated for the advancement of women. Her foundation with houses in Argentina, Bolivia, Spain, and Uruguay, received definitive approval, June 9, 1947, four years after her death. Her mortal remains were enshrined in her community at Oruro in 1972. Nazaría, the patroness of Mexican barrios, was beatified by Pope John Paul II, Sept. 27, 1992.

Bibliography: A.-M. MAC AS LÓPEZ, La fuerza del si: semblanza de M. Nazaria-Ignacia. . . . (Sevilla 1992). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1992): 919.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MARCHANT, JACQUES

Pastoral theologian; b. Couvin, Namur, c. 1585; d. there, 1648. After his ordination he taught theology in the Abbeys of Floreffe and Lobbes and became pastor in his native village in 1616 and administrator of the Canton of Chimay in 1630. His writings in pastoral theology were highly esteemed, especially his Hortus pastorum sacrae doctrinae (3 v. Mons 1626–27), which adapted theology to the teaching of the catechism, to preaching, and to the confessional. He added a treatise on the Sacraments. Several other works of this type had numerous editions, and a 13-volume edition of his works was published in a French translation (ed. Vivès, Paris 1865–67).

Bibliography: Biographie nationale de Belgique 13:447–450. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 3.1204.

[M. M. BARRY]

MARCHANT, PIERRE

Franciscan theologian; b. Couvin, Liège, 1585; d. Ghent, Nov. 11, 1661. He became a Franciscan in 1601 and taught for some years in the schools of his order. While still young he held a series of high offices in the order, becoming provincial, definitor general in 1625, and commissary general over the provinces of Germany, Belgium, Holland, England, and Ireland in 1639. The last office involved him in Irish politics during the era of the Kilkenny Confederation. Being deceived by false reports on the situation, he took sides with the Ormondists and supported Peter Walsh and those who opposed the nuncio, Giovanni Rinuccini. When called upon to justify this policy, he read his Relatio veridica et sincera status Provinciae Hiberniae to the 1661 general chapter at Rome. This book was condemned by the general chapter and ordered to be destroyed.

Marchant was a prolific writer. His principal work, Tribunal sacramentale (3 v. Ghent 1642), is a full treatise on moral theology for the use of confessors. Avoiding all disputed positions, he states the Church's teaching and draws his arguments from Sacred Scripture, the councils, the constant tradition of the Church, and the writings of the Doctors. The principles underlying his distinguished treatise on probabilism are in accord with the restrictions later imposed by the decrees of Alexander VII and Innocent XI

His Sanctificatio S. Joseph Sponsi Virginis in utero asserta (Bruges 1630) involved him in a lively controversy with Claude d'Ausque of Tournai, and was placed on the Index in 1633. His other writings include Baculus pastoralis sive Potestas episcoporum in regulares exemptos ab originibus suis explicata (Bruges 1638), Resolutiones notabiles variorum casuum et quaestionum a multis hactenus desideratae (Antwerp 1655), and many treatises on Franciscan history and legislation that are of particular importance within the order.

Bibliography: L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum (Rome 1650). H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 3:1202–04. É. D'ALENÇON, Dictionnaire de thèologie catholique 9.2:2004–06. Bulletin de l'Institut archéologique liègeois 68 (1951) 59–62.

[F. C. LEHNER]

MARCHISIO, CLEMENTE, BL.

Priest, founder of the Institute of the Daughters of Saint Joseph; b. March 1, 1833, Racconigi, near Turin, Italy; d. Dec. 16, 1903, Rivalba, Piedmont, Italy.

Clemente was the eldest of the five children of a cobbler of modest means. His secondary education and study of philosophy was made possible with the financial help of Fr. Sacco. Following his ordination (Sept. 21, 1856), Marchisio continued his ministerial training for two years at a boarding school founded by St. Joseph CAFASSO. Although his first assignment was an easy one in a small town full of pious Christians, his second was a challenge. As pastor in the anti–clerical Rivalba, his mettle was tested and proved strong. His strong sermons, unwaveringly proclaiming the truth, caused many to leave the Church and others to interrupt the Mass, but after ten years of persecution his example of Christian charity and virtue won souls.

Father Marchisio is known for his assiduous attention to duty, his devotion to the Holy Eucharist, and his concern for the poor. He gave away any of his possessions to help those in need, even his own bedding. Between 1871 and 1876, he established a home for children and a weaving mill to provide work for young girls.

Together with Rosalia Sismonda, who died just two hours before him, he found the Daughters of Saint Joseph to extend his care of the needy. He stressed to the sisters the necessity of prayer to support the congregation's apostolate. Later, wounded by the neglect of liturgical vestments and linens, he tasked the sisters with a new mission. The work of the Congregation now centers around the altar: making hosts and wine for the Eucharist, and preparing and maintaining linens for the liturgy.

Pope John Paul II beatified him on Sept. 30, 1984.

Feast: Sept. 20.

Bibliography: N. SARALE, Teologia della semplicità: biografia di don Clemente Marchisio. . . . (Rome 1975). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 77 (1985) 931–35. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 44 (1984): 6–7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MARCIAN, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reigned 450 to 457; b. Thrace c. 392; d. Constantinople, Jan. 26, 457. Marcian, an aide-de-camp of the emperor-maker Aspar and a retired tribune, was 58 when THEODOSIUS II died leaving no heir. The Empress Pulcheria, elder sister of Theodosius, chose Marcian as her consort; he was proclaimed emperor (Aug. 26, 450) with the aid of the barbarian patrician, Aspar, and immediately informed VALENTINIAN III and Pope LEO I of his assumption of office. Having executed the eunuch Chrysaphius, who had exercised effective power since 443, Marcian and Pulcheria proceeded to reverse his politics in domestic, foreign, and religious affairs. The pope had confided in Pulcheria since 443; hence papal legates were well-received by Marcian. The body of the patriarch of Constantinople FLAVIAN, who had been maltreated after the Robber Council of EPHESUS (Aug. 449), was brought to Constantinople, and THEODORET OF CYR was recalled from exile.

In September 450 Leo had expressed a desire for a council. Unaware that with the change of emperors Leo had decided against holding a new council in the Orient, Marcian convoked an ecumenical council to meet at Nicaea in the fall. Despite misgivings, the pope acquiesced and sent his legates. Having decided to restrain Attila and the Huns by force instead of tribute, Marcian held the council at CHALCEDON where he could follow its actions at first hand, and in the sixth session (Oct. 25) he proclaimed the definition of the council, whereupon the assembly saluted him as a "new Constantine."

Marcian supported the disciplinary legislation of the council and in particular the so-called 28th canon, which gave the patriarch of Constantinople a primacy after that of the pope, as well as jurisdiction over the metropolitans in the civil dioceses of Thrace, Asia, and Pontus. This action was repudiated by Pope Leo, who delayed giving approbation to the council until Marcian informed him of the use the Eutychians were making of his hesitation (Feb. 15, 453). In a letter addressed to the bishops as if they were still assembled in council (March 21, 453), Leo confirmed its doctrinal decrees but condemned the 28th canon. When this letter was published by Anatolius, Patriarch of Constantinople, he left out the condemnation (cf. Leo, Epist. 127, Jan. 9, 454).

In Palestine Marcian repressed the rebellion started by the monk Theodosius, who had forced Bp. Juvenal of Jerusalem to flee. He requested Pope Leo to intervene with Eudocia, the estranged widow of Theodosius II, who had been in the Holy Land since 443 and was encouraging the anti-Chalcedonians. In Egypt he supported Proterius of Alexandria as successor of the deposed DIOSCORUS (d. Gangra, Sept. 4, 454). After the death of Pulcheria (July 453). Aspar suggested a tempering of the anti-Chalcedonian measures, since the enemies of Proterius had appealed to the imperial legate in Alexandria; upon the death of Marcian, Proterius was murdered by Monophysites. During the reign of Anastasius I (491–518) Marcian was still looked upon by the people as the ideal type of emperor.

Bibliography: E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire tr J. R. PALANQUE (Paris 1949-59) 1:311–315, 351–353. W. ENSSLIN, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft 14.2 (1930) 1514–29. F. HOFMANN, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte un Gegenwart 2:15–24. R. HAACKE, ibid. 95–107. H. BACHT, ibid. 235–257. A. H. M. JONES, The Later Roman Empire . . . , 4 v. (Oxford 1964).

[H. CHIRAT]

MARCIAN OF CYR, ST.

Monk and ascetic; b. Cyr, Syria, c. 300; d. in the desert of Chalcis, north Syria, c. 381–391. He was the son of patricians, but he preferred the life of a hermit, alone with God, praying and fasting. After some time he acquired as disciples Eusebius and Agapetus, who later initiated other monks to his spiritual and ascetic doctrine. Out of humility he refused to be ordained a priest and sought to hide his miraculous gifts. Before his death, friends built oratories to receive his relics, but he ordered his body concealed, and it was not discovered until 50 years after his death. THEODORET discusses Marcian in his History of the Monks 3 (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne 83:1324–40).

Feast: Nov. 2.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Nov. 1:532–542. C. BARONI-US, Annales ecclesiastici 5:535. "Le Synaxaire de Sirmond," Analecta Bollandiana 14 (1895) 420. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints det des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 11:84–86. J. LEBON, Le moine saint Marcien. Étude critique des sources, ed. A. VAN ROEY (Leuven 1968).

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

MARCION

Christian Gnostic of the 2d century, founder of heretical Marcionite sect; d. c. 160. Marcion was probably the son of the bishop of Sinope, and c. 130, as a prosperous shipowner, left Pontus to spend some years in Asia Minor and Syria. It was there apparently that he encountered POLYCARP, and on asking "Do you recognize me?" was told "I recognize you for the firstborn of Satan" (Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 3.3.4); but this exchange may have taken place in 154 or 155 after Marcion's excommunication at Rome, where he certainly arrived in 139 or 140. At Rome Marcion was at first the disciple of the heretic Cerdo, but soon developed his own system and outshone his master. Summoned before the Roman presbyterium in July 144, Marcion steadfastly maintained that the Church had been mistaken in retaining the OT and in regarding Jesus as the Messiah foretold by the Prophets. He cited Luke (5.36-38 and 6.43) to show that Jesus's message was entirely new. Marcion was promptly excommunicated; he then gained many disciples among those who found the OT unconvincing or unattractive. He required baptism, celibacy, and a rigorous asceticism as the condition of salvation. From Rome the heresy spread rapidly throughout the empire. The dates and geographical locations of its orthodox opponents attest the extent and duration of its success. When Marcion died, his movement was powerful in Rome: "invaluit sub [Pope] Aniceto"

(c. 154–166) says Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 3.4.3); and although c. 200 it was gradually checked, it still flourished in the East in the 5th century, especially in Syria, and groups of adherents survived down to the Middle Ages. Its influence (c. 200) among Latin-speaking Christians appears from the facts that it is still uncertain whether the first Latin translation of the NT was Marcionite or orthodox and that the genuineness of the "Marcionite Prologues" to ten of St. Paul's epistles found in the Codex Fuldensis and some 13 other ancient MSS of the Vulgate is increasingly accepted by scholars.

System. In his moral earnestness and special concern with the problem of evil, Marcion was impressed by Paul's denunciations of the Mosaic Law as the cause of sin and the principle of injustice. Concluding that the Law could not be the work of the Christian God, Marcion in his Antitheses (lost) repudiated the Demiurge or Creator God of the OT, who was not wicked, but who was the cause of the world and of evil. He considered this god as legal-minded, offering material rewards, capricious, violent, vindictive, a tyrant, and a petty-minded bungler, while the absolutely perfect God, the God of pure love and mercy, was visibly embodied in Jesus. Marcion characterized the former as "just," "the ruler of this aeon," "predicable," and "known" through the creation and the OT. The latter he confessed to be the forgiving and saving God, as "the Father of Jesus," "good" and "unknown," "the hidden or Stranger God," "other," "different," and "new." He was unknown and new, because He was revealed only in Jesus; stranger and good because, despite John the Evangelist, He came not unto His own but, out of disinterested love, to save those who were strangers and for whom He had no reason to be concerned. Marcion's further description of Him as "unperceivable" and "unpredictable" supports H. A. Wolfson's suggestion based on Origen (Cont. Celsum 6.19) of a debt to such passages in Plato as Phaedrus 247C, with its contrast between Zeus's Olympus and "that supercelestial place" where dwells "true Being, colourless, formless, impalpable, visible only to the intelligence, the soul's master, and the object of true knowledge."

Able to see nothing in common between the God of the OT and the God of the NT, Marcion concluded that the Gospel must be dissociated from Judaism and Jewish apocalyptic eschatology. He repudiated the OT as devoid of any revelation of the Christian God. Yet the NT manifestly claims a certain continuity with the OT. Marcion found the answer in Paul's claim (Gal 1.1, 11–12; one Cor 11.23) to have received revelation not from man, but directly from the Lord. Paul alone, then, had correctly understood Jesus, though even his epistles had been interpolated. The earlier disciples had misunderstood Him, and their Gospels showed how their Jewish preconceptions had contaminated Jesus's message. However, the Gospel of Luke, who was the friend and companion of Paul, proved an exception. Moreover, his account of the Last Supper clearly derived from Paul's.

Since Marcion believed himself to be recovering authentic Christianity, he needed an organon. He framed a canon of Scripture that contained for its gospel an expurgated Luke and for its Apostolikon 10 Epistles of St. Paul. Hebrews and the Pastorals were excluded as manifestly non-Pauline. Luke's Infancy Narrative was among the discarded passages, for Marcion's soteriology was Docetic insofar as he thought that Christ had appeared suddenly, unannounced, and full-grown in the 15th year of Tiberius. Yet according to Tertullian (Cont. Marcionem 1.14), Marcion could say that "the better God chose to love, and for man's sake he laboured to descend. . . . " Moreover, quoting Galatians (3.13), Marcion interpreted the Redemption as a "buying free" in which the purchase price was Christ's blood, given not as an atonement, but for the cancellation of the Creator's legal claim to his property. It was thus that he interpreted Paul.

Reaction. The orthodox Christians, in reaction, established the true canon, and their apologists were not slow to appeal to tradition and to point to the arbitrary and implausible character of Marcion's procedure. The Alexandrine school developed the allegorical interpretation of the OT, and distinguished between the literal and the spiritual sense. The great body of Christians declared themselves in favor of life, for the goodness of the world, and the unity of the God of the creation and the redemption. IRENAEUS of Lyons developed his theory of a gradual revelation whereby God treated men as servants before He made them sons, and they first learned the duty of obedience before they could respond to love.

Bibliography: A. VON HARNACK, Marcion (2d ed. TU 45; 1924). G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de la Bible Suppl 5:862–877. F. L. CROSS, The Early Christian Fathers (London 1960) 64–65. H. JONAS, The Gnostic Religion (2d ed. Boston 1963) 137–146. H. A. WOLFSON, The Philosophy of the Church Fathers, v.1 (2d ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1956–) 571–573. J. H. CARPENTER, "The Bible in the Early Church," in The Interpretation of the Bible, ed. C. W. DUGMORE (London 1944). J. QUASTEN Patrology, v.1–3, passim.

[A. A. STEPHENSON]

MARCUS AURELIUS, ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned A.D. 161 to March 17, 180; b. Rome, April 26, 121; d. Sirmium (Mitrovica) or Vindobona (Vienna). Marcus Aurelius Antoninus was originally named Marcus Annius Verus. He was the son of Annius Verus and Domitia Lucilla. His father, who was of Spanish descent and had been three times consul and prefect of Rome, died when Marcus was only three months old. Adopted by his paternal grandfather, he was enrolled among the equestrians by Hadrian at the age of six and made a Salian priest at eight. Of a serious and retiring temperament, Marcus was given the best education available. He studied literature and rhetoric under Herodes Atticus and Marcus Cornelius Fronto, but later abandoned these pursuits to take up philosophy under the Stoic Rusticus and law under Lucius Volusius Moecianus. In 138, shortly before his death, Hadrian adopted Antoninus Pius on the condition that he would in turn adopt Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus.

Marcus Aurelius, Roman Emperor, sculpted bust. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Marcus was quaestor in 139 and consul for the first time in 140 and married the daughter of Antoninus Pius, Faustina the Younger, in 145, when he was consul for the second time. After living for years in the household of Antoninus, Marcus succeeded him as emperor on March 7, 161. He immediately asked the Senate to appoint Lucius Aurelius Verus as his colleague and gave him his daughter Lucilla in marriage. Verus, who proved to be an ineffective ruler, died early in 169, leaving Marcus as sole ruler of the Empire.

Marcus Aurelius was undoubtedly one of the best of the "good emperors." He tried valiantly to live up to Plato's ideal of the philosopher-king (Julius Capitolinus, Marcus Antoninus 27.7), but his reign was marked by continued misfortunes: a pestilence that swept through the empire, revolts in Britain and Asia Minor, and frequent incursions of Germanic tribes in Pannonia and Noricum. It was while engaged in defending the frontiers in 172 that Marcus began his Meditations. Written in Greek, these reflections are a kind of philosophical diary in which Marcus gives a Stoic interpretation to the meaning of life and the practice of virtue. They reveal the nobility of his soul in the face of suffering, but also the shortcomings of STOICISM for a man of affairs.

Among Marcus's most important civil acts was a reform of the judiciary. As a natural conservative and official protector of the traditional religion, he looked with disfavor upon the introduction of superstitious practices (Modestinus, Dig. 48.19.30; Paulus, Sent. 5.21.2). He attributed the refusal of Christians to offer sacrifice to "mere obstinacy" (Meditations 11.3). Though no general persecution can be attributed to him, he seems to have done nothing during his reign to stop the popular uprisings against the Christians in various parts of the empire. When consulted by the governor of Lyons and Vienne on what to do with Roman citizens accused of Christianity, he replied that they should be executed if they did not recant (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 5.1.47). Among those known to have suffered for the faith at this time may be numbered Sagaris of Laodicea; Thraseas of Eumenus; Publius, Bishop of Athens; and JUSTIN MARTYR and his companions.

The extent of the persecutions is indicated by the protests made in the apologies of Justin, Melito, Apollinaris, and ATHENAGORAS. Despite his many natural virtues, such a policy was consistent with Marcus's convictions, which placed the good of the state over that of individuals: "What is not good for the swarm is not good for the bee" (Meditations 6.54); "The end of rational animals is to follow the reason and the law of the most ancient city and polity" (ibid. 2.16). As M. J. Lagrange has observed, "paganism laid her hand upon this man, naturally good, to make of him the minister of her works" [RevBibl 10 (1913) 584].

Bibliography: H. VON ARNIM, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft (Stuttgart 1893–) 1.2:2279–2309. M. J. LAGRANGE in Revue biblique 10 (1913) 243–259, 394–420,568–587. H. D. SEDGWICK, Marcus Aurelius (New Haven 1921). ROBERTO PARIBENI, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienzi, littere ed arti (Rome 1929–39; suppl. 1938–) 22:256–259.

[M. J. COSTELLOE]

MARDUK

Marduk, chief god of the Babylonian pantheon from the 18th century on, is a relative a newcomer in the genealogy of the gods of ancient Mesopotamia (see MESOPOTA-MIA, ANCIENT, 3). Originally Marduk (from Sumerian amar-utu-ka, "calf of the sun") was the god of the rising sun and spring vegetation and the local city god of Babylon. But with the establishment of the First Dynasty of Babylon c. 1830 B.C. by the AMORRITES and the development of Babylon into a capital of an empire under HAM-MURABI, Marduk became the chief god of Mesopotamia. On the one hand, he was identified with En-lil of Nippur, the leading god of the ancient Sumerian pantheon, and as such was called BEL (from ba'al, "lord"); on the other hand, he was identified with Asaru of the city of Eridu, who, as the son of En-ki, the lord of the abyss, was "the lord of wisdom," i.e., of the knowledge of the magical properties of the life-giving waters of the abyss. Because of this double character, Marduk was represented Januslike with two faces. The main temple of Marduk was the É-sag-ila (Sumerian, "the house that raises high its head"), with its famous step tower (ziggurat; see TOWER OF BABEL), the \acute{E} -temen-an-ki (Sumerian, "house of the foundation of heaven and earth"). The temple's great eastern portal, the holy door, bricked up the whole year, was opened only on Marduk's principal feast, the Akitu feast on New Year's Day, the first day of Nisan, when in a solemn procession his image was carried through it (see the application to Yahweh in Ez 44.1–3). On this day, Marduk's wedding with his bride Sarpanitu (Zēr-bānītu, "seed-creating") was celebrated by bringing their two statues together and by sexual intercourse of the king, Marduk's representative on earth, with a priestess representing the goddess. This was to ensure the land's fertility for the coming year. The ENUMA ELISH creation epic was recited, thus pantomimically reenacting Marduk's enthronement as creator and king, and finally Marduk determined the fate of the gods and of men for the coming year. Toward the end of the Neo-Babylonian period (6th century B.C.), Marduk's son, the scribe god Nabu (Biblical NEBO), began to supplant his father in popularity. The only mention of Marduk by name is in the Old Testament (besides the proper names Merodach-Baladan; Mardochai is in Jer 50.2 in reference to Marduk's overthrow at the coming capture of Babylon; here the name of the god appears as Merodach ($m^e r \bar{o} d\bar{a} k$, perhaps by taking the vowels of $m^e b \bar{o} r \bar{a} k$, "accursed"). In Jer 51.44, Is 46.1, and especially in Dn 14.1-22 and Baruch ch. 6, Marduk's helplessness as god of Babylon under the name of Bel is ridiculed.

Bibliography: M. JASTROW, Die Religion Babyloniens und Assyriens, 2 v. (Giessen 1905–12) 1:110–111, 493–495. B. MEISSNER, Babylonien und Assyrien, 2 v. (Heidelberg 1920–25) 2:15–17.

H. ZIMMERN, Das babylonische Neujahrsfest (Leipzig 1926). J. BOTTÉRO, La Religion babylonienne (Paris 1952) 40–41. F. M. T. DE LIAGRE BÖHL, Die fünfzig Namen des Marduk (Gröningen 1953) 282–312; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl. Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 7:15–16. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 1443–45.

[H. MUELLER]

MARÉCHAL, AMBROSE

Third archbishop of BALTIMORE, Md.; b. Ingres, near Orléans, France, Aug. 28, 1764; d. Baltimore, Jan. 29, 1828. After early classical studies at Orléans, he yielded to his parents' desires and chose the law as his profession. Shortly thereafter, however, he entered the priesthood, and began his theological studies at the diocesan seminary of Orléans. He joined the Sulpicians, and was ordained at Bordeaux in 1792. Then, accompanied by fellow Sulpicians Gabriel Richard and François Ciquard, he sailed for America and arrived at Baltimore on June 24, 1792. He first ministered to the Maryland Catholics in St. Mary's County (1792–93) and then went to Bohemia on the Eastern Shore of MARYLAND, where he served as pastor and administrator of the manor until 1799. He returned to St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, to teach theology (1799–1801), and then he taught philosophy at Georgetown College, Washington, D.C. (1801-02). In 1803 he was recalled to France because his superior general was discouraged with the Baltimore attempt and needed Sulpicians for the diocesan seminaries of France, where Napoleon's government had recently allowed them to return. Between 1803 and 1811 Maréchal taught in the diocesan seminaries of Saint-Flour, Lyons, Aix, and Marseilles. In 1811 the Sulpicians were again expelled from the French seminaries; Maréchal returned to the U.S. in 1812 as professor of theology in the Baltimore seminary; he later acted as temporary president of St. Mary's College (1815).

Although he had previously declined episcopal nomination to New York and Philadelphia, Maréchal was named coadjutor with right of succession to Abp. Leonard Neale of Baltimore (1817). However, the bulls did not arrive until November 10, more than five months after Neale's death. Hence on Dec. 14, 1817, Maréchal was consecrated archbishop of Baltimore by Bp. Jean Cheverus of Boston, Mass. The new archbishop immediately visited his extensive diocese, which included 100,000 Catholics in Maryland, Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, and the territory west of Georgia to the Mississippi. He restored order where both clerical and lay insurgents were causing trouble; and he advanced the work on the Baltimore cathedral, begun under Abp. John CARROLL in 1806, and dedicated it on May 31, 1821. During his ad limina visit to Rome later that year, he suggested to the Holy See that nominations for American bishoprics should come from the provincial bishops of the U.S., a policy still followed. He also succeeded in securing advice on the government of lay trustees and managed, temporarily, to quiet the problems of trusteeism. Finally, he persuaded Pius VII to raise his diocesan seminary of St. Mary to the rank of a pontifical university by letters dated April 18, 1822.

To secure the uniform development of the Church in the U.S. and plan for its future growth, Maréchal envisioned a provincial council, but ill health and eventually death intervened. After a journey to Canada in 1826 he was taken ill while confirming at Emmitsburg, Md.; he never recovered fully. His writings consist almost entirely of letters and documents, called "scholarly in style," which may be found in T. A. Hughes's History of the Society of Jesus in North America.

Bibliography: R. H. CLARKE, Lives of the Deceased Bishops of the Catholic Church in the U.S., 4 v. (New York 1887–89). C. G. HERBERMANN, The Sulpicians in the United States (New York 1916). T. A. HUGHES, History of the Society of Jesus in North America: Colonial and Federal, 3 v. in 4 (New York 1907–17). Memorial Volume of the Centenary of St. Mary's Seminary of St. Sulpice (Baltimore 1891). J. W. RUANE, The Beginnings of the Society of St. Sulpice in the United States, 1791–1829 (Catholic University of America, Studies in American Church History 22; Washington 1935).

[C. M. CUYLER]

MARÉCHAL, JOSEPH

Belgian Jesuit philosopher; b. Charleroi, July 1, 1878; d. Louvain, Dec. 11, 1944. He entered the society in 1895, received a Ph.D. in biology from the University of Louvain in 1905, and was ordained in 1908. He taught biology, experimental psychology, and philosophy in the Jesuit house of studies, Louvain. Maréchal's main work is Le Point de départ de la métaphysique, essentially a vindication of Thomistic realism in five volumes-Maréchal called them cahiers (notebooks). The first three volumes were published together (Bruges-Paris 1922–23; 3d ed. Brussels-Paris 1944). The first two volumes try to show that some of the main inconsistencies of modern philosophy derive from a breakdown of the Thomistic synthesis under WILLIAM OF OCKHAM. The third is a remarkable reevaluation of I. KANT. Volume four was published posthumously (Brussels 1947). The famous fifth cahier is a study of THOMISM in the light of critical philosophy. Its leading idea is that, although Kant's objections are unanswerable if the human intellect is conceived as a static power, they can be overcome if that faculty is conceived dynamically, as St. THOMAS AQUINAS conceived it. Maréchal has influenced such philosophers as A. Marc, J. de Finance, G. Isaye, K. Rahner, J. B. Lotz, E. Coreth, and B. F. Lonergan.

Bibliography: Work in Eng. Studies in the Psychology of the Mystics, tr. A. THOROLD (pa. New York 1964). Studies. Mélanges Joseph Maréchal, 2 v. (Brussels 1950), biog. and bibliog. B. F. LONERGAN, "Metaphysics as Horizon," Grey 44 (1963) 307–318. J. F. DONCEEL, Philosophical Psychology (2d ed. New York 1961) ch. 16; Natural Theology (New York 1962) pt. 1.

[J. F. DONCEEL]

MAREDSOUS, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey in the Diocese of Namur, Belgium, since 1920 part of the Belgian Benedictine Congregation, formerly part of the Congregation of Beuron. Founded in 1872 by monks from BEURON, with aid from the Desclée family, it became an abbey in 1878. The buildings are neo-Gothic. Abbots Placidus Wolter, later Archabbot of Beuron, and Hildebrand de Hemptinne (1890-1909), made primate of the Benedictines by Leo XIII (1893), were followed by Columba Marmion (1909), Célestin Golenvaux (1923), and Godefroid Dayez (1950). The abbey restored the Benedictine Congregation of Brazil (1895) and founded the abbeys of Mont César in Louvain (1899) and Glenstal in Ireland (1927) and the priory of Gihindamuyaga in RWANDA (1959). It publishes Revue bénédictine (1884-), the accompanying Bulletin d'histoire bénédictine (1897-), Bulletin d'ancienne littérature chrétienne latine (1921–), Bible et vie chrétienne (1953–), and Lumière du Christ (1960-). Patristic, liturgical, and monastic studies have been specially cultivated, notably by Germain MORIN, Ursmer BERLIÈRE, Donatien de Bruyne, Bernard CAPELLE, C. Charlier, Gerard VAN CALOEN, H. Duesberg, and Cyril Lambot. The abbey has a college of Greco-Latin humanities (1882) and an art school for gold work, ebony, and ceramics (1900).

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:1744. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1962): v. 1, author part; v. 2, subject part, 2:228. D. MISONNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:17. H. DE MOREAU, Dom Hildebrand de Hemptinne (Maredsous 1930).

[D. MISONNE]

MARELLO, GIUSEPPE (JOSEPH), BL.

Bishop of Asti, Piedmont, Italy, founder of the OB-LATES OF SAINT JOSEPH; b. Dec. 26, 1844, Turin, Italy; d. May 30, 1895, of a cerebral hemorrhage in the bishop's residence at Savona, Italy. While still a child, Giuseppe (Joseph) moved from Turin to Santi Martino Alfieri with his father, Vincenzo, after the death of his mother, Anna Maria. He entered the minor seminary at age 12 and was ordained priest in 1868. While in the seminary he was miraculously cured of typhus by the Blessed Virgin. In his capacity as secretary to Bishop Carlo Savio of Asti for 13 years, Father Marello attended Vatican Council I from 1869 to 1870. During this time he also assumed responsibility for a retirement home, served as spiritual director, and taught catechism. He founded the Oblates of St. Joseph in 1878 to be "hermits at home" in order to be "effective apostles away from home." Marello wanted his followers to be humble servants of the Church, ready to serve the bishops in whatever tasks were assigned them. The congregation was approved in 1909 by the Vatican after Marello's death. They opened their first mission in the United States in 1929. Following his episcopal consecration Feb. 17, 1889, Bishop Marello dedicated his work especially to youth and the abandoned. His remains were enshrined at Asti. He decisively opposed "materialism, Masonry, and anti-clericalism, which prevailed at the time" (decree of canonization, Dec. 18, 2000). Marello was beatified by John Paul II, Sept. 26, 1993, in the Campo del Palio at Asti, Italy. He was canonized on Nov. 25, 2001.

Bibliography: G. MARELLO, Los escritos y las enseñanzas del bienaventurado José Marello, ed. M. PASETTI (Santa Cruz, Calif. 1993). J. B. CORTONA, Brief Memories of the Life of Joseph Marello, Bishop of Acqui, and of the Congregation He Founded . . . (Santa Cruz, Calif. 1993). G. SISTO, I, the Undersigned Poor Sinner: The Life of Blessed Joseph Marello (Santa Cruz, Calif. 1993). L. M. TOSCHI, Holiness in the Ordinary: Three Essays on the Spirituality of Blessed Joseph Marello (Santa Cruz, Calif. 1993).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MARENZIO, LUCA

Renaissance composer, renowned for his madrigals; b. Coccaglio (near Brescia), Italy, 1553; d. Rome, Aug. 22, 1599. As a boy he may have studied with Giovanni Contino at Brescia cathedral. While serving Cardinal Luigi d'Este in Rome (1579–86), he often visited the brilliant ESTE court in Ferrara. From 1591 to 1595 Cardinal Aldobrandini was his patron, and from 1596 to 1598 he was at the Polish court of Sigismund III. He was one of the rare Italian musicians of the period who never held a church appointment. His influence as a composer of matchless Italian madrigals is directly responsible for the flowering of the English madrigal school. Although his secular works are most numerous, his sacred music includes a Mass for 8 voices, two books of 4-voice motets (1588,1592), a book of 12-voice motets (1614), a book of Sacri concenti for 5 to 7 voices (1616), and a series of motets for church festivals. Reprints of his sacred works include: Luca Marenzio: Motetten (ed. H. Engel, 1926); motets in F. X. Haberl's Repertorium Musicae Sacrae (1886–1925); and other items in K. Proske's Musica Divina (1853–63).

Bibliography: Sämtliche Werke, ed. A. EINSTEIN (Leipzig 1929–). There are modern eds. of the motets by M. HALLER in Repertorium Musicae Sacrae, ed. F. X. HABERL (1886-1925) and H. ENGEL (Vienna 1926). H. ENGEL, Luca Marenzio (Florence 1956). A. EINSTEIN, The Italian Madrigal, tr. A. H. KRAPPE et al., 3 v. (Princeton N.J. 1949), v. 2. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). J. RAVELL and S. BROMAN, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 5:574-576. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (5th ed. New York 1958) 1028. O. CULLIN, "Luca Marenzio: Madrigaux à 5 voix, Livres 5 et 6, Part 1," Analyse Musicale, 25 (1991) 53-64; "Luca Marenzio: Madrigaux à 5 voix, Livres 5 et 6, Part 2," Analyse Musicale, 26 (1992) 65-71. R. FREEDMAN, "Marenzio's Madrigali a quattro, cinque et sei voci of 1588: A Newly Revealed Madrigal Cycle and Its Intellectual Context," Journal of Musicology, 13 (1995) 318-354. S. LEDBET-TER and R. JACKSON, "Luca Marenzio," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 11 (New York 1980) 667-674. B. JANZ, "Die Petrarca-Vertonungen von Luca Marenzio" (Ph.D. diss. Frankfurt am Main 1987). L. MACY, "The Late Madrigals of Luca Marenzio" (Ph.D. diss. University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill 1991). J. STEELE, "Marenzio: From Mannerist to Expressionist," Miscellanea Musicologica, 11 (1980) 129-153.

[L. J. WAGNER]

MARESCOTTI, HYACINTHA, ST.

Virgin of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis; b. Vignanello, Papal States, 1585; d. Viterbo, Italy, Jan. 30 1640. Daughter of Count Marc Antonio di Mariscotti and Ottavia Orsini, Clare entered the convent of St. Bernardino in Viterbo and received the name Hyacintha. Taken ill after ten unhappy years, she was persuaded by a confessor to give up her well-furnished cell and follow a strict religious life. Devotion to the Passion, harsh penance, poverty, and humility flowered in mystical prayer and charity. She became mistress of novices. During a plague she founded two congregations, Oblates of Mary, to care for the sick and orphaned. She followed the common life even during a long exhausting illness. She left a small diary. Cardinal G. Mariscotti requested her beatification, and BENEDICT XIII, an Orsini, beatified her in 1726. PIUS VII canonized her in 1807. Her incorrupt body lay in the convent in Viterbo until the church was destroyed by aerial bombardment.

Feast: Jan. 30.

Bibliography: G. VENTIMIGLIA, Vita di s. G. M. (Rome 1695; 2d ed. 1907). C. R. HALLACK and P. F. ANSON, These Made Peace, ed. M. A. HABIG (Paterson, N.J. 1957). A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 2:95–96.

[M. O'CALLAGHAN]

MARET, HENRI LOUIS CHARLES

French bishop, theologian; b. Meyrueis (Lozére), April 20, 1805; d. Paris, June 16, 1884. Studies at Saint-Sulpice Seminary, Paris, preceded his ordination (1830). After spending a short time in the circle of Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS, he became chaplain of St. Philippe du Roule in Paris (1832) and then professor (1841) and dean (1853) in the theology faculty at the Sorbonne. With OZANAM and LACORDAIRE he founded the journal L'Ère nouvelle (1848). When the government nominated him to the See of Vannes (1860), Pius IX refused to confirm the appointment because he was wary of Maret's GALLICAN-ISM and his association with Catholic liberals. In 1861, however, Maret became titular bishop of Sura. During the Second Empire (1852-70) Maret, an acquaintance of NA-POLEON III, exercised considerable influence in the government's nominations to bishoprics. He continued his efforts to obtain outstanding professors for the Sorbonne theology faculty, whose degrees Rome did not recognize.

Maret was zealous and pious, well acquainted with contemporary intellectual movements, and an effective opponent of pantheism and atheism. He did not regard a breach between the Church and modern society inevitable and tried to deter Pius IX from publishing the SYLLA-BUS OF ERRORS. In a letter to the pope on the eve of its appearance, he argued that the separation of Church and State could be reconciled with the Church's traditions, rights, and doctrines. After VATICAN COUNCIL I was announced, he published his best-known work, Du concile général et de la paix religieuse (2 v. 1869), which opposed a definition of papal INFALLIBILITY and stressed the place of bishops in the Church's constitution and the vital importance of holding general councils at regular intervals. At the council he was a leading opponent of the definition of the papal prerogatives. He voted non placet in the definitive ballot (July 13) and absented himself from the solemn session (July 18) that promulgated the constitution Pastor aeternus; but he subscribed to the conciliar decisions the following month. At the insistence of Pius IX he retracted publicly everything in his book contrary to the above constitution (Aug. 15, 1871).

Bibliography: G. BAZIN, Vie de Mgr. Mater 3 v. (Paris 1891). C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council, 2 v. (New York 1930). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 9.2:2033–37. S. LÖSCH, Döl- linger und Frankreich (Munich 1955) 209–229. R. THYSMAN, "Le Gallicanisme de Mgr. M. et l'influence de Bossuet," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 52 (1957) 401–465. U. BETTI, La costituzione dommatica "Pastor aeternus" del Concilio vaticano I (Rome 1961).

[V. CONZEMIUS]

MARGARET, SS.

The name of several martyr saints in the early Church. An early passio of St. Margaret is intimately related to a series of legends that had Pelagia of Antioch as their heroine. Probably a martyr of Antioch under Diocletian, Margaret (Marina in the East) quickly became the subject of a cult that spread throughout Christendom in the Middle Ages. One of the voices heard by JOAN OF ARC was that of Margaret. As one of the 14 helper saints, Margaret is prayed to in difficult childbirth (feast, July 20).

St. Ambrose (Patrologia Latina, 16:241, 1093) and St. John Chrysostom (Patrologia Graeca, 50:579–585) knew of the historical Margaret, or Pelagia, a 15-year-old virgin of Antioch who preserved her chastity from violation by jumping off a building. Mistakenly identified with this Margaret of Antioch was an actress, also known as Margaret, or Pelagia, who left a dissolute life to become a Christian penitent. So many legends were based upon the account of the actress's conversion that the true story of Margaret of Antioch has been distorted beyond recognition.

Bibliography: St. Margaret. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:152–153. H. DELEHAYE, The Legends of the Saints, tr. D. ATTWATER (New York 1962) 51, 56, 151. St. Margaret of Antioch. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:510–511; 4:59–61. H. DELEHAYE, The Legends of the Saints, tr. D. ATTWATER (New York 1962) 152–153.

[E. DAY]

MARGARET COLONNA, BL.

Mystic; b. Rome, Italy, c. 1254–55; d. there, Dec. 30, 1280. She was the daughter of Odo Colonna and Margaret Orsini and first cousin to the future NICHOLAS III (see COLONNA). Left an orphan about the age of 11, she was placed under the guardianship of her oldest brother, Giovanni, who later became a Roman senator. On the advice of her brother Giacomo (d. 1318), she refused all marriage proposals and left Palestrina on March 6, 1273, for the castle of San Pietro. She took the habit and adopted the way of life of the POOR CLARES without actually entering into the order, and some pious young ladies soon joined her. Margaret, an intelligent and practical girl, led an exemplary life nursing the sick and giving generously of her resources to the poor. She was blessed with mystical visions, and after her death many miracles were observed at her grave. Her brother Giovanni reputedly wrote her biography, and Giacomo, after 1278 a cardinal, promoted her cause for canonization. On Sept. 24, 1285, the sisters who had joined her were transferred from the castle of San Pietro to the convent of San Silvestro in Rome, where they adopted the rule followed by the Clares of the Abbey of Longchamp near Paris. In 1875 they moved to the convent of S. Cecilia in Trastevere, Rome. Margaret's cult became widespread, but all proceedings for her canonization came to a standstill during the crisis of 1297–98 between the Colonna and BONIFACE VIII. In the 15th century her relics were venerated in San Silvestro, and in 1605 a silver reliquary bust was donated by Giovanna Pignatelli-Colonna. In 1847 an immemorial cult was approved, and the following year her feast was included in the Franciscan Breviary. The same Office has been used in the Diocese of Palestrina since 1883.

Feast: November 7 (formerly December 30).

Bibliography: G. COLONNA, B. Margherita Colonna, ed. L. OLIGER (Rome 1935). LEO OF CLARY, Lives of the Saints and Blessed of the Three Orders of St. Francis, v.4 (Taunton 1887) 70–73. Vies des saintes et des bienheuruex 12:798–799. F. BOCK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:10.

[J. CAMPBELL]

MARGARET OF CORTONA, ST.

Franciscan tertiary, penitent; b. Laviano, 1247(?); d. Cortona, Italy, Feb. 22, 1297. At the age of sixteen Margaret fled an unhappy family life to live for nine years as the mistress of a nobleman of Montepulciano. Upon his death, she returned to Cortona with her young son and put herself under the guidance of the Franciscans. Abandoning her son (who later became a Franciscan) to charity, she was allowed to join the Third Order of Penance of St. Francis in 1275. The major source for her life is the Legenda de vita et miraculis beatae Margaritae de Cortona written by her confessor, the friar Giunta of Bevegnati. It consists in ten chapters depicting the life and virtues of the saint, as well as one chapter dedicated to the miracles she performed while she was still alive and after her death. There is no doubt that the Legenda follows the typology of the classic hagiographical genre, which makes it difficult to sort out fact from fiction. It was meant to present Margaret as a "new Mary Magdalene" and provide a complete program of Christian living in particular for Franciscan lay women for whom she was set up as a model. She no doubt lived a harsh ascetical life and was gifted with exceptional mystical graces. She was also involved in peace-making activities and is credited with founding a hospital for the poor. Pope Benedict XIII canonized her on May 16, 1728. Her incorrupt body is venerated in her church at Cortona.

Feast: Feb. 22.

Bibliography: F. IOZELLI, ed., Legenda de vita et miraculis beatae Margaritae de Cortona (Grottaferrata 1997). T. RENNA, St. Margaret of Cortona intro. and trans. (St. Bonaventure, NY 2001). E. MENESTÒ, "La mistica di Margherita da Cortono," in Temi e problemi nella mistica feminile trecentesca (Todi 1983), 183–206. R. RUSCONI, "Margherita da Cortona, Peccatrice redenta e patrona citadina," in Umbria sacra e civile (Turino 1989), 89–104. J. CANNON and A. VAUCHEZ, Margherita of Cortona and the Lorenzetti: Sienese Art and the Cult of a Holy Woman in Medieval Tuscany (Philadelphia 2000).

[P. LACHANCE]

MARGARET OF HUNGARY, ST.

Dominican contemplative; b. 1242–43; d. Budapest, Jan. 18, 1270. She was a daughter of King Béla IV of Hungary and Mary Lascaris, and a sister of Bl. Jolenta and St. KINGA. At an early age Margaret took the habit at Veszprém, Hungary. In 1254 she made profession at the monastery of St. Mary of the Isle, built by her father near Budapest. After refusing offers of royal marriages three times, Margaret went through the solemn ceremony for the consecration of virgins. A true contemplative, endowed with mystical gifts, she spent an austere life in expiation for her people and manifested heroic charity, especially for the poor. Her cult began at her death and was approved in 1789. PIUS XII canonized her in 1943.

Feast: Jan. 26 (formerly 16).

Bibliography: Congregatio Sacrorum Rituum, Extensionis seu concessionis officii et missae ad universam ecclesiam . . . B. Margaritae ab Hungaria (Rome 1943), contains vita and depositions. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 36 (1944) 33–34. C. BÖLE, Margherita d'Ungheria (Rome 1938). M. CATHERINE, Margaret: Princess of Hungary (Oxford 1945). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:176–178. I. KIRÁLY, Árpádházi Szent Margit és a sziget (Budapest 1979). I. BELLUS and Z. SZABÓ, eds., Árpád-házi Szent Margit legrégibb legendája és szentté avatási pere (Budapest 1999), legends.

[C. MULLAY]

MARGARET OF LORRAINE, BL.

Widowed duchess of Alençon; b. Vaudemont in Lorraine, France, 1463; d. Argentan, Brittany, France, Nov.

2, 1521. Her parents, Ferri of Lorraine and Yolande of Anjou, having died when she was a child, Margaret was reared at the court of her grandfather, René of Anjou. In 1488 she married René, duke of Alençon, to whom she bore a son and two daughters. Widowed in 1492, she ruled the duchy with considerable skill during her son's minority. It was at this period that she came under the influence of St. FRANCIS OF PAOLA and began living a life of asceticism. When her responsibility to her children was discharged, she joined the Third Order of St. Francis, withdrew from court life, and devoted herself to the care of the poor in the neighborhood of Mortagne. Sometime after 1513 she founded at Argentan a convent whose inmates observed the Rule of St. Clare. In 1519 she entered this convent but refused to accept the office of abbess. She was buried in the convent at Argentan where her incorrupt body was venerated until profaned by the Jacobins in 1793. Her cult was confirmed by BENEDICT XV in 1921.

Feast: Nov. 6.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 13 (1921) 231–233. R. GUÉRIN, La Bienheureuse Marguerite de Lorraine, duchesse d'Alençon et religieuse clarisse (Paris 1921); Vie de l'aïeule d'Henri IV, 1463–1521. Bienheureuse Marguerite de Lorraine (Paris 1953).

[C. J. LYNCH]

MARGARET OF METOLA, BL.

Virgin; b. Metola, Italy, 1287; d. Città di Castello, Italy, Apr. 13, 1320. She was of noble birth, but because of her deformities (she was dwarfed, blind, lame, and hunch-backed), her parents kept her hidden in a prison from the age of six to 16. She was then taken to a "miraculous" shrine in Città di Castello. As no miracle occurred, her parents abandoned her in that city. Her cheerfulness, based on her trust in God's love and goodness, was extraordinary. She became a Dominican tertiary and, despite her severe handicaps, devoted herself to tending the sick and the dying. Her solicitude for the prisoners in the city jail was remarkable. After her death more than 200 miracles testified to her heroic sanctity. She was beatified in 1609.

Feast: Apr. 13.

Bibliography: Bologna, Dominican Monastery, MS A. Paris, Bib. Nat. Ital. 2178. W. R. BONNIWELL, Margaret of Castello (Dublin 1955). M. C. LUNGAROTTI, Le Legendae di Margherita da Città di Castello (Spoleto 1994).

[W. R. BONNIWELL]

MARGARET OF ROSKILDE, ST.

Local Danish saint; d. Ølse, near Køge, Denmark, Oct. 25, 1176. She was of the great Sjaelland noble family of Skjalm the White and thus a relative of Abp. ABS-ALON OF LUND. Her husband Herlog strangled her and so hung her body as to simulate suicide. But when she was buried on the beach of Køge in unconsecrated ground, a miraculous light shone on her tomb and caused people to believe in her sanctity. After an investigation ordered by Absalon, Herlog confessed his crime. The archbishop had Margaret's body transferred to the Cistercian Abbey for nuns of Our Lady of Roskilde on July 19, 1177. Her cult remained purely local, limited to the Island of Sjaelland (Zealand), being especially popular at Køge, where a chapel was built in her honor. She was never officially canonized.

Feast: Oct. 25.

Bibliography: Vitae sanctorum Danorum, ed. M. C. GERTZ (new ed. Copenhagen 1908–12) 387–390. E. JØRGENSEN, Helgendyrkelse i Danmark (Copenhagen 1909).

[L. MUSSET]

MARGARET OF SAVOY, BL.

Widow, abbess and foundress; b. Pinerolo, Piedmont, 1390?; d. Alba, Italy, Nov. 23, 1464. Margaret, a member of the house of Savoy-Achaea, married Marquis Theodore II of Montferrat in 1403. At his death in 1418, she went to her estate in Alba where eventually she and her companions became Dominican tertiaries, taking simple vows and living in community. She founded the Monastery of St. Mary Magdalen 25 years later and made solemn vows as a nun of the Second Order of St. Dominic (see DOMINICANS). She ruled as abbess until her death. In 1566 Pope Pius V authorized her cult; Clement IX confirmed it in 1669. Her body is incorrupt. In art she is represented as either holding three arrows or receiving them from Christ. There is usually a deer in the background. The symbol of the arrows derives from her mystical experience; that of the deer, from the tradition that she kept a domesticated deer in her monastery.

Feast: Nov. 23.

Bibliography: F. G. ALLARIA, Vita della beata Margherita di Savoia, 2 v. (Alba, Italy 1877). S. SOLERO, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 2:826. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York, 1956) 4:603–604. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:22.

[M. E. CASALANDRA]

MARGARET OF SCOTLAND, ST.

Queen; b. Reska, Hungary, 1046; d. Edinburgh, Scotland, Nov. 16, 1093. Margaret, the daughter of the Anglo-Saxon Prince Edward Atheling and Princess Agatha of Hungary, spent much of her youth at the court of her great-uncle EDWARD THE CONFESSOR. While attempting to return to Hungary in 1067 after the Battle of Hastings, she was shipwrecked off the Scottish coast, and in 1070 she married the Scottish King Malcolm III. She was the mother of St. DAVID I OF SCOTLAND. With the cooperation of Malcolm and the advice of LANFRANC, she initiated a series of ecclesiastical reforms that transformed the religious and cultural life of Celtic Scotland. A great benefactress, she founded Holy Trinity Abbey at DUN-FERMLINE, restored IONA and other Celtic churches, and especially devoted herself to the care of the sick and the destitute. She was canonized by INNOCENT IV in 1249, and named patroness of Scotland in 1673. Her cult was widespread throughout medieval Scotland, where she is still venerated. Her body was translated from Dunfermline to a chapel in the Escorial in Madrid during the Reformation, but her head is with the Jesuits of Douai.

Feast: Nov. 16; June 19 (translation).

Bibliography: The Gospel Book of Queen Margaret, ed. W. FORBES-LEITH (Edinburgh 1896). Acta Sanctorum June 2:316–335. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 2:5325–29. A. C. LAWRIE, ed., Early Scottish Charters (Glasgow 1905). J. R. BARNETT, Margaret of Scotland (London 1926). R. L. G. RITCHIE, The Normans in Scotland (Edinburgh 1954). G. W. S. BARROW, Innes Review 11 (1960) 22–38. K. NAGY, St. Margaret of Scotland and Hungary (Glasgow 1973). W. M. METCALFE, tr. Lives of the Scottish Saints (Felinfach 1990). N. G. TRANTER, Margaret the Queen (London 1979, repr. London 1993). A. J. WILSON, St. Margaret, Queen of Scotland (Edinburgh 1993).

[L. MACFARLANE]

MARGARET OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT, VEN.

Discalced Carmelite nun and promotor of the devotion of the Divine Infancy (name in the world, Margarite Parigot); b. Beaune, France, 1619; d. Beaune, May 26, 1648. When she was 11 years old she received her first Holy Communion; she took the Discalced Carmelite habit in the convent of her native city on June 6, 1631, and was professed June 24, 1634, with the name of Margaret of the Blessed Sacrament. The wise and prudent direction of two Oratorians, Fathers Parisot (1637–43) and Blase Chaduc (1643–48), greatly aided her spiritual progress. She was the main apostle of devotion to the Infancy of Jesus that rapidly spread throughout France. She died a holy death; her cause for beatification was immediately introduced. The Congregation of Rites has decreed the heroicity of her virtues (Dec. 10, 1905), the first step toward eventual beatification, which is still under consideration.

Although she wrote nothing, her spiritual message soon had extraordinary success in the Church, especially in France, through the active and intelligent cooperation of her prioress, Mother Elizabeth of the Trinity (Quatreverbes), who gathered her spiritual experiences and confidences for publication (1631–40). This work has been the source of numerous biographies translated into the principal European languages.

Bibliography: D. AMELOTE, La Vie de Soeur Marguerite du Saint Sacrement (Paris 1654). ANTOINE-MARIE DE LA PRÉSENTA-TION, La Vénérable servant de Dieu: Soeur Marguerite du S. Sacrement (Bar-le-Duc 1929). J. AUVRAY, L'Enfance de Jésus et sa famille, honorées en la vie du Soeur Marguerite du Saint Sacrement (Paris 1654). P. FLICHE, Année de l'Enfant Jésus, d'après les instructions de la Soeur Marguerite du Saint-Sacrement (Paris 1866).

[O. RODRIGUEZ]

MARGIL, ANTONIO, VEN.

Franciscan missionary, promoter of missionary colleges in Spanish America; b. Valencia, Spain, Aug. 18, 1657; d. Mexico City, Aug. 6, 1726. Margil had been a Franciscan since 1673 and had been ordained (1682) when he arrived, with 22 other friars, in Veracruz, Mexico, on June 6, 1683. His name is linked inseparably with the development of the missionary college of the Propagation of the Faith. This institution, an autonomous community of friars dedicated to missionary work, was planned to meet the changed circumstances in 17th-century Mexico.

The natives, now dispersed from the pueblos where Christianization was carried on in the 16th century, required that the Church come to them, rather than that they come to the Church. This necessitated the development of highly mobile missionaries trained in new methods, and supported from outside the area where they worked. The missionary college was designed to meet this need. The first college, founded by Antonio Llinás in 1683, was Santa Cruz de Querétaro. Since its founder left Mexico in 1684 and never returned, Margil was responsible for the transformation of the college into an effective reality. He guided the college of Querétaro through its formative years and developed two other missionary colleges as well: Cristo Crucificado, Guatemala City, founded in June 1701, and Our Lady of Guadalupe, near Zacatecas, in July 1708.

In addition to his administrative work at these colleges, Margil worked out from them in the missions in

Antonio Margil preaching to Native Americans. (The Granger Collection Ltd.)

Mexico, Central America as far south as Cartago near Panama, and north to present-day Louisiana and Texas. He was an indefatigable missionary and a powerful preacher. At his death his reputation for sanctity was widespread. His remains, buried in the Franciscan church, were transferred to the Cathedral in 1861. The formal canonical investigation of his life was begun in 1771; Pope Gregory XVI issued the decree that his virtues were heroic in 1836.

Bibliography: E. E. RIOS, Life of Fray Antonio Margil, O.F.M., tr. B. LEUTENEGGER (Washington 1959).

[B. LEUTENEGGER]

MARGOTTI, GIACOMO

Journalist; b. San Remo, May 11, 1823; d. Turin, May 6, 1887. He was ordained in 1846 at Turin, and began working two years later with the Armonia della religione con la civiltà, the first Catholic Italian newspaper (at first biweekly, then triweekly, and finally a daily after 1855). The paper had been founded through the efforts of Bishop Moreno of Ivrea and a group of Piedmontese Catholics that included Antonio Rosmini and Gustavo Benso, elder brother of Camillo Benso di CAVOUR. In those years, Margotti also published several short works against the liberal ministries. In September 1849, he joined the staff of Armonia as editor and substitute for Guglielmo Audisio, whom he succeeded that same year as publisher.

Under Margotti's direction, the paper became increasingly more polemical as it expressed the thinking of the "intransigent" Catholics; its editorial attitude was contrapuntal to the development of the anticlerical, antipapal, and anti-Catholic impetus of the Italian drive for independence. Margotti, a polished and brilliant writer, also continued the publication of shorter works and books in which he amplified the arguments made in the newspaper, especially in defense of the suppressed religious congregations and of bishops arrested or exiled from their sees. Armonia had the largest circulation in the Piedmont region, but it was also the paper most frequently seized by the police. On Jan. 27, 1856, Margotti was assaulted and injured; in the same year, he stood trial. In 1857, he was elected deputy to the Subalpine Parliament, but his election was predictably annulled by the government under hardly legal pretexts. In 1859 Armonia was under governmental suspension for several months. During the election of 1861, Margotti used the paper to urge Catholics to be "neither elected, nor electors" until free voting and elections were guaranteed, and until a Parliament was chosen that did not seek to take Rome from the pope.

Margotti left Armonia (1863) after feuding with its owners and founded L'Unità cattolica wherein he continued the most uncompromising policy toward the Italian state. From 1870 to 1898, Margotti issued his journal bordered in black to protest the occupation of Rome by Italian troops. Armonia, transferred in 1866 to Florence (then the capital of the Kingdom of Italy), ceased publication in 1870. L'Unità cattolica, which became the property of the Holy See and moved to Florence in 1893, ceased publication in 1929.

[E. LUCATELLO]

MARIA CRISTINA OF SAVOY, VEN.

Queen; b. Cagliari, Sardinia, Nov. 14, 1812; d. Naples, Jan. 31, 1836. She was the youngest of five children whose devout parents were Victor Emmanuel I (1759–1824), King of Sardinia (1802–21), and Maria Theresa (1773–1832), of the house of Hapsburg-Lorraine. From early years Maria displayed the kind, charitable, and pious traits that characterized all her life. Relinquishing her own wish to enter religion, she bowed to the will of her sovereign, Charles Albert, and married Ferdinand II, King of Naples. While fulfilling the obligations of her state in the Bourbon court, she continued unchanged her religious practices and exercised an exemplary influence on her husband and others about her. Neapolitans referred to her as a saint, even though they were unaware of the full extent of her good deeds. Stories circulated about her ill treatment by her husband, but these were the inventions of liberal political opponents of the ruler. She died in giving birth to her only child, who became Francis II, the last Bourbon king of Naples. The decree introducing her cause was issued in 1859, and the decree approving the heroic nature of her virtues, in 1937.

Bibliography: C. TESTORE, Beati e venerabli di Casa Savoia (Turin 1928). A. BRESCIANI, "La Venerabile Maria Cristina di Savoia," La civiltà cattolica ser. 4, v.4 (1859) 129–144, 309–325, the first biog. pub.; rev. ed. E. ROSA (Rome 1936). B. CROCE, Uomini e cose della vecchia Italia, ser. 2 (2d ed. Bari 1943) 268–308, important essay. H. M. ACTON, The Last Bourbons of Naples (1825–1861) (London 1961). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 29 (1937) 349–352.

[M. L. SHAY]

MARIA LAACH, ABBEY OF

Benedictine foundation in the Rhineland, near Andernach, West Germany. Founded in 1093 by Count Palatine Henry II and his wife and settled with monks from St. Maximin in TRIER and later from AFFLIGEM, it had possessions on the Rhine and Moselle and in the Eifel. The Romanesque church (patrons, Our Lady and St. Nicholas), consecrated by Abp. Hillin of Trier (1156), is almost unchanged despite several restorations. The abbey flourished under the customary of CLUNY. After a late medieval decline, it joined the BURSFELD union (1474) in which it had a leading role after the Reformation. Prior Johannes Butzbach (d. 1516), influenced by Abbot J. Trithemius, was a prominent humanist author. The abbey was suppressed during the French Revolution and secularized (1797–1802), the state holding the church (1815–1924) and private individuals holding the property and the buildings (damaged by fire in 1855). Jesuits acquired Maria Laach (1862), establishing a collegium maximum and building a library (1864) and gatehouses (1869). They produced there Philosophia Lacensis (13 v. 1888–1919), Collectio Lacensis of councils (7 v. 1870–90), and Stimmen aus Maria Laach (1871–1915), since called Stimmen der Zeit. Expelled in the Kulturkampf, they kept an administrator at the abbey until they sold it to Benedictines of BEURON (1892), title and rights of the old abbey being restored in 1893. Willibrord Benzler (bishop of Metz in 1901), Fidelis von Stotzingen (to 1913), Ildefons HERWEGEN (d. 1946), and B. Ebel have served as abbots. Under Abbot Herwegen, the abbey became a center of the liturgical reform: Odo CASEL (d. 1948), Kunibert MOHLBERG (d. 1963); the collection Ecclesia orans (1918–); and a German missal (1929–). Besides liturgical studies have appeared studies in Benedictine history, hymnology, and art. Since 1948 scholarship has been concentrated in the Abbot Herwegen Institute for Liturgical and Monastic Research. Pius XI made the abbey church a minor basilica.

Bibliography: H. EMONDS, ed., Enkainia. Gesammelte Arbeiten zum 800 jährigen Weihegedächtnis der Abteikirche Maria Laach am 24 August 1956 (Düsseldorf 1956). T. BOGLER, Maria Laach: Vergangenheit und Gegenwart der Abtei am Laacher See (4th ed. Munich 1961); Benedikt und Ignatius: Gesammelte Aufsätze (Maria Laach 1963). E. VON SEVERUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:45–46.

[E. VON SEVERUS]

MARIA LAURENTIA LONGO, VEN.

Foundress of the Capuchinesses (see FRANCISCAN SISTERS); b. Barcelona, 1463; d. Naples, 1542. Her husband, the Catalan Juan Llonc, royal chancellor in Naples, died in 1507. As a widow, she was active in the Oratory of Divine Love of St. CAJETAN and founded (1521–22) a hospital for incurables in Naples. To the convent of nuns she instituted in 1535 she gave first the rule of St. CLARE OF ASSISI and then statutes inspired by those of the Capuchin monks: personal sanctification by work, poverty, and humility, and the service of one's neighbor with sacrifice and works of charity. Pope Paul III approved the order in December 1538. In 1576 a house was founded in Rome, and in 1599 (Ven.) Angela Serafina de Manresa founded the first convent outside Italy, in Barcelona. The process for Maria's beatification was introduced in 1892.

Bibliography: J. A. DE HARSBERG, Die Maria Laurentia Longo, Stifterin der Kapuzinerinnen (Munich 1903). F. S. DA BRUSCIANO, "M. L. L. e l'opera divino amore a Napoli," Collectanea Franciscana 23 (1953) 166–228, sources, literature. Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 1049.

[J. PÉREZ DE URBEL]

MARIA-MÖDINGEN, CONVENT OF

Former house of Dominican nuns now occupied by Franciscan teaching sisters, near Dillingen, Bavaria, Germany. The convent was founded by Hartmann IV of Dilligen before 1239 and affiliated to the DOMINICANS in 1246. At first it was one of the most noted convents of southern Germany and the home of the mystic Margaret Ebner. Religious observance there, however, declined late in the 14th century. It was restored in 1468. The nuns resisted all attempts to protestantize them, but they were driven out when the monastery was confiscated in 1546. Duke Wolfgang Wilhelm of Pfalz-Neuburg, a Catholic, returned the monastery to the Dominicans; it was reconstituted by nuns from St. Catherine's in Augsburg in 1616. It was again suppressed in 1802. Since 1842 Franciscan teaching sisters have occupied the buildings. The present church, built from 1716 to 1718, enshrines the tomb of Margaret Ebner in a chapel built in 1755.

Abbey of Maria Laach. (@Vanni Archive/CORBIS)

Bibliography: F. ZOEPFL, Jahrbuch des historischen Vereins Dillingen . . . (Dillingen 1960) 7–77; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:47–48. J. SCHÖTTL, Kloster M.-M. (2d ed. Zurich 1961).

[J. A. DOSHNER]

MARIA THERESA OF AUSTRIA

Reigned Oct. 20, 1740, to Nov. 29, 1780; Empress, Queen of Hungary and Bohemia, Archduchess of Austria; b. Vienna, May 13, 1717; d. Vienna. She was married (1736) to Duke Francis Stephen of Lorraine-Tuscany (later Emperor Francis I 1745-65). The sudden death of her father, the Holy Roman Emperor Charles VI, forced the inexperienced heiress to assume the government of the Hapsburg domains, which had shortly before her accession been united by the Pragmatic Sanction. This document (1720) decreed that the Austrian Empire was indivisible, and that upon the failure of a male heir, it should devolve upon the eldest daughter of Charles VI. Within a few months, war broke out. During this war Frederick II of Prussia claimed the province of Silesia, and Charles Albert, Prince Elector of Bavaria, who did not recognize the Pragmatic Sanction, claimed other parts of the Hapsburg monarchy. The young queen soon familiarized herself with the heavy responsibilities of high office, took up the challenge to battle her enemies, and ended the struggle honorably, notwithstanding the loss of Silesia. Once peace was established (1748), she started to reorganize, with prudence and fortitude, her heterogeneous domains, which, in response to the demands of her time, she sought to transform into a centralized bureaucracy. In trying to raise financial means and to increase the capacity of the whole population to pay taxes, she met opposition from the Catholic Church. The Church would not and could not relinquish its constitutional position, dating from the Middle Ages, and the economic privileges attached thereto. The resulting disputes between the Catholic Austrian state and the Catholic Church, which had important consequences for both, cannot be understood without knowing the background of the preceding reign.

"Maria Theresa, Empress of Austria," painting by Martin Mytens the Younger. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Church and State. While still a 12-year-old princess, Maria Theresa had received a false picture of the Church. Her teacher of history, the jurist Gottfried Spannagl, had represented the medieval struggle between Emperor and Pope as caused solely by the Pope's lust for power. A few days after her accession to the throne, Maria Theresa wrote to the Pope asking for his moral support. Her letter, however, had not been countersigned by the responsible minister, thereby giving the impression that the young ruler wanted to write a mere private letter; but from this procedure, the inference could also be drawn that the Austrian government intended to infringe upon papal sovereign rights, something that the Queen's ancestors had occasionally attempted. This unfortunate circumstance caused ill feeling and the belated recognition of Maria Theresa by the HOLY SEE. The election of Albert of Bavaria to the imperial inheritance, and the War of the Austrian Succession (1740-48) that followed, furthered the estrangement. Notwithstanding repeated protests from the court of Vienna, Pope Benedict XIV could not refuse to recognize this election, since it had met all legal requirements. Maria Theresa allowed herself to be influenced to such an extent by the enmity of her ministers against the papal court that she ordered the sequestration of all benefices on the Austrian territory of the Cardinal Secretary of State Ludovico Valenti, himself an Austrian. Added to this was the violation of papal neutrality by the warring parties, who invaded the Papal States and harrassed papal subjects, especially in Ferrara, Pesaro, Rimini, and Bologna.

All these factors caused new complaints and protests from the Roman Curia. Only years later did the Austrian governor of Milan, Count Beltrame Cristiani, who enjoyed the fullest confidence of the Empress, succeed in convincing her of the injustice of her action against the Pope and his secretary of state and in moving her to release the confiscated properties. Renewed protests by the Roman Curia were provoked by such other imperial ordinances as the enactment that the Lombard clergy could appeal to Rome only by imperial permission. The Republic of Venice was not slow to quote this article as a precedent in its concurrent conflict with Rome. Notwithstanding repeated requests from Benedict XIV, Maria Theresa steadfastly refused to repeal this ordinance; the most she did was to give it an interpretation that would pacify the Pope. At this time, Count Cristiani had entered into promising negotiations with the Holy See about the creation of a church fund for the increase of parishes; to this fund the great foundations and monasteries should contribute. When it appeared, however, that Maria Theresa intended to administer this fund through her civil servants, the Pope feared the disadvantages more than the advantages that would come of state control. The whole undertaking came to nought after the start of the Seven Years' War (1756–63).

The Origins of Josephinism. The tensions between Vienna and Rome were only the symptoms of a fundamental conflict between Church and State in Austria. At the same time, they show clearly the monarch's conception of sovereignty, which was cleverly exploited by Prince Wenzel Anton von Kaunitz, her chancellor. At his counsel the empress initiated the new ecclesiastical policy by ordering an investigation into the privilege Pope Nicholas V had granted Emperor Frederick III in 1451–52. This privilege concerned taxation of the Austrian clergy under certain conditions. The Minister of the Interior, Count Johann Chotek, an upright soldier, explained to her how this privilege had been exercised during all those years. He stressed that the supervision of a papal representative, provided for in the document and exercised subsequently, had in no way harmed the state so that the established practice could safely be continued. The Empress, however, corrected her minister, whom she soon changed in favor of his more adaptable brother, "that in this as in other privileges of my archducal house many rights have been sacrificed." She then ordered a research into all royal archives to discover relevant tax privileges granted by various popes and confirmed as late as 1523 by Adrian VI. But since all these documents presupposed on principle the assent of the Holy See, it was impossible to prove the right of the state to tax the clergy independently of the pope.

The Empress, however, regardless of precedent and without previous negotiations with the Holy See remained firm—and this is a decisive point for the judgment of her unjust and revolutionary action. After 1763, she had her court lawyers construct a new canon law. The teachers of this subject, the JESUITS, were replaced by lay professors. In 1767 she signed in effect the first decrees for the Austrian provinces in Italy. The first of these decrees restricted the freedom of communication of the Lombard clergy with the Roman Curia and appointed two political agents to watch over such movements. The second degree created the so-called Giunta Economale, which greatly interfered with episcopal jurisdiction. The third decree renewed the notorious laws against MORT-MAIN, interpreting them so that the Church could no longer acquire any considerable real property without the consent of the state. The Cardinal Archbishop of Milan, Giuseppe Pozzobonelli, the leading churchman of Lombardy, thereupon protested and warned the Empress that she could not in conscience promote these laws. Maria Theresa, after hesitation, rejected this protest, and a year later approved the general principles underlying State-Church relations as laid down by Kaunitz and already in effect through the above-named decrees in Austrian Lombardy, which he administered. Again it was Kaunitz who made the Empress reject the representations of the Pope himself. Instead, the new State-Church system was soon formally extended over all Austrian dominions.

Suppression of the Jesuits. Among the numerous decrees and ordinances "in publico-ecclesiaticis" harmful to the Church that followed each other rapidly in the last decade of Maria Theresa's reign and that touched the religious orders in particular, must be counted the suppression of the Society of Jesus (1773). The attitude of the Empress in the affaire célèbre of the age was fateful for religion and government in Austria. The Bourbon courts had used powerful threats to force the Pope to suppress the JESUITS. But Clement XIV for a long time could point out that Maria Theresa, as advocata ecclesiae, took the opposite standpoint and had assured the menaced Society of her protection. The Bourbons then intimidated Maria Theresa by reminding her that, in view of her friendly attitude toward the Jesuits, her daughter, Maria Antonia (later Marie Antoinette) could not become queen of France. Thereupon the Empress broke the word she had given the Jesuits. She even wrote to Charles III, King of Spain, who had been the driving force behind the suppression of the Society, that she was glad to be able to oblige him in a matter so close to his heart. At the same time she put such pressure on the Pope, already hard pressed from all sides, that the Pope in the end abandoned to her all Jesuit assets. In the last years of her reign her physical powers failed and her life was darkened also by the conflict with her son and successor, JOSEPH II, of whose character and reign she had no great hopes.

Bibliography: F. MAASS, ed., Der Josephinismus: Quellen zu seiner Geschichte in Österreich 1760–1850, 5 v. (Fontes rerum Austriacarum II.71–75; Vienna 1951–61); "Maria Theresia und der Josephinismus." Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 79 (1957) 201–213. H. VON ARNETH, Geschichte Maria Theresias, 10 v. (Vienna 1863–76). E. GUGLIA, Maria Theresia, ihr Leben und ihre Regierung, 2 v. (Munich 1917). P. REINHOLD, Maria Theresia (Wiesbaden 1958). G. P. GOOCH, Maria Theresa and other Studies (New York 1951). G. DORSCHEL, Maria Theresias Staats- und Lebensanschauung (Gotha 1908).

[F. MAASS]

MARIAN ANTIPHONS

A somewhat inexact term for several chants with texts about the Blessed Virgin, or addressed to her. They originated during the Middle Ages when feasts of the Virgin were provided, and when the custom arose of celebrating special offices honoring her, which also required special music. The chants were used in different ways in different places; they might be used as antiphons in the ordinary sense—to introduce and to follow the chanting of a psalm or canticle in the office (see LITURGY OF THE HOURS); alone as processional chants; or singly as a votive antiphon after one of the offices, particularly after Compline.

The four Marian antiphons remaining in use today are ALMA REDEMPTORIS MATER, AVE REGINA CAELORUM, REGINA CAELI, and SALVE REGINA. One of them is sung every day after Compline, according to the season. Other medieval Marian antiphons are *Ibo mihi ad montem myr*rhae, Quam pulchra es et quam decora, Speciosa facta es, Sancta Maria succurre miseris, and 0 gloriosa genetrix virgo; all are found in the late 13th-century MS Cambridge University Library Mm. ii. 9, as reproduced in Antiphonale Sarisburiense, ed. W. H. Frere (1901–25); Nesciens mater and Mater ora filium (used at Lincoln, England, 1380); Sancta Maria virgo (used at Salisbury, 1395); and Sub tuam protectionem, Haec est regina, and Tota pulchra es (used at Senlis, France, late 14th century). J. DUNSTABLE (d. 1453) set the second, third, and fourth Cambridge texts for three voices, but did not quote their chant melodies.

Composers of the later Middle Ages and Renaissance frequently set the texts of Marian antiphons, occasionally quoting the melody in the process. Nesciens mater by Byttering (English, active c. 1420) involves the chant theme in all three of its voices in turn; Sancta Maria virgo, in an English source from the second half of the 14th century, is composed for three voices, the lower two sharing the cantus firmus. These settings were in rather simple style, but others were more elaborate, e.g., Lionel POWER's Mater ora filium, Plummer's Tota pulchra es, and Forest's Tota pulchra es-all from the early 15th century. Composers continued setting these antiphons polyphonically well into the 16th century. Perhaps the most remarkable of all Renaissance compositions in which Marian antiphons are quoted is a motet by GOMBERT (prefaced by the words "Diversi diversa orant") in which both words and melodies of seven Marian chants are enveloped in rich polyphony.

Bibliography: "Les Auteurs présumés du Salve Regina," La Tribune de Saint-Gervais 18 (1912) 76. F. L. HARRISON, Music in Medieval Britain (New York 1958). G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940). B. STÄBLEIN, "Antiphon," Die Musik in Geschchte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 1:523–545. P. WAGNER, Einführung in die gregorianischen Melodien, 3 v. (Leizig); repr. (Hildesheim 1962). W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Ind. 1958).

[R. STEINER]

MARIAN FATHERS

The Congregation of Marians of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary (MIC, Official Catholic Directory #0740), popularly called Marian Fathers, were founded in Poland in 1673 by Stanislaus of Jesus and Mary PAPCZYNSKI to honor the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, to teach the poor, and to pray for the souls in purgatory. The Marians first began as a diocesan community with simple vows. Within six years of their founding, King John III Sobieski granted permission to establish houses throughout his dominions. In 1699 Innocent XII gave the Marian Fathers the Rule of Ten Evangelical Virtues of Our Lady (approved by Alexander VI in 1501) and designated the community as an order with solemn vows. This rule was complemented by statutes composed by the founder. The distinctive religious garb of the Marians was a white habit with cincture and cape.

The Marians made foundations in Lithuania, Portugal, and Italy, but religious persecutions gradually forced them out of Rome in 1798, Portugal in 1834, and Poland and Lithuania in 1864. Most Marians were either exiled to Siberia or absorbed into the diocesan clergy by 1864. Those who remained were permitted to live in the monastery of Mariampole, Lithuania, but were forbidden to accept novices. In 1908 there remained in Mariampole the last surviving Marian, Vincent Senkowski-Senkus, superior general. However, the order was saved from extinction by two Lithuanian priests, professors of the Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical Academy in St. Petersburg, Russia, who appealed to the Holy See to be admitted secretly into the order. In order to facilitate restoration, Pius X approved the change from solemn to simple vows, and from the conspicuous white habit to the black cassock of a diocesan priest. On Aug. 29, 1909, by papal dispensation, George Matulaitis-Matulewicz made his religious profession without the required novitiate, and Rev. Francis Bucys was admitted into the novitiate. To rescue the reborn congregation from Russian persecution, the novitiate was transferred in 1911 from St. Petersburg to Fribourg, Switzerland. In 1910 a new constitution (revised in 1930) was approved by Pius X and supplanted the original rule. In 1930 Pius XI confirmed the former status of the Marians as exempt religious.

In 1913 the Marian Fathers first settled in Chicago, Ill., and from there spread to Wisconsin, Michigan, New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Washington, D.C. Some of them minister in the Byzantine-Slavonic rite. In the spirit of their founder, they preach missions, teach, administer parishes, and publish newspapers, books, and periodicals.

The generalate is in Rome. There are two American provinces: St. Casimir (with its headquarters in Chicago, IL) and St. Stanislaus Kostka (with its headquarters in Stockbridge, MA).

[M. RZESZUTEK/EDS.]

MARIAN FEASTS

Although Marian liturgical cult appeared at mid-5th century, it was slow in growth and gained momentum only at the end of the 7th.

History

Marian devotion originated very early; for prayers to Mary, such as the Sub tuum of Greek origin, were already known in Egypt in the 3rd century, and some paintings of her and the Child in the Roman catacombs date probably from the middle of the 2nd century. This devotion, however, was not at first accompanied by liturgical worship. When, at the end of the 4th century, the anniversary celebrations for martyrs and bishops began to multiply, there was still no feast of the Blessed Virgin. The reason for this was the fact of the ASSUMPTION. No church claimed possession of her tomb, and at that time veneration of the saints started only at their tombs.

Beginnings of Liturgical Cult. During the 4th century, however, veneration of Mary discreetly entered the liturgical year because of Christmas. This feast, introduced at Rome toward the middle of the 4th century, commemorates not only the Savior's birth but also the virginal maternity of Mary. This theme held an important place in the 13 Christmas sermons of St. AUGUSTINE, for example. Moreover, St. Augustine insisted on it because the perpetual virginity of Mary had been denied by Helvidius and Jovinian at the end of the 4th century. This apologetic concern, as well as the desire to present Mary as a model for consecrated virgins, led preachers in their Christmas sermons to accentuate Mary's role and the privilege of her virginity. In the latter part of the 5th century, i.e., after the Council of EPHESUS (431) had defined the divine maternity, a liturgical commemoration of the MOTHER OF GOD appeared in many places. Its date varied, but generally it was close to Christmas: December 18 in Spain; January 18 in Gaul; January 1, the octave of Christmas, in Rome. The Marian Mass at Rome was composed of the Introit Vultum tuum, the Epistle Sir 24.11-13, 15-20, the Gradual Diffusa est, the Gospel Mt 13.44–52, and the Communion Simile est (taken from the Gospel). The first Marian feast was therefore a feast of the divine maternity of Mary. And since, at that time, Christmas celebrated the manifestation of the Son of God, who came to save the world, more than the birth of the Child Jesus, the Marian feast honored Mary especially as the Mother of the Savior, as the one through whom salvation came to the human race.

The Ancient Feasts. Until the middle of the 7th century the West does not seem to have known any other Marian feast than this commemoration of the Mother of God. Sometime between the pontificate of Theodore I (642–649) and that of Sergius I (687–701), the feasts of the Assumption and the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary were introduced. These feasts, of Oriental origin, were brought to Rome by those Christian communities that had been banished from the East by the Muslims.

Assumption of Mary (August 15). This feast comes from Jerusalem. In the Old Armenian Lectionary (early 5th century) modeled on the Jerusalem Lectionary for August 15, the title is "Day of Mary, Mother of God." And the readings indicated there are: Is 7.10–15 (the Emmanuel prophecy), Gal 3.29-4.7 (which contains the phrase "God sent His Son born of a woman"), and Lk 2.1–7 (the Nativity). Therefore, the first feast for August 15, undoubtedly instituted after the Council of Ephesus in 431, celebrated the divine maternity. At the beginning of the 6th century it was transformed into a feast of the Dormitio. Toward 600 a decree from the Emperor Maurice extended this feast to the whole Byzantine Empire. Shortly after 650 it was accepted at Rome, where it was generally called the feast of the Assumption. From Rome it spread in the West-not, however, without having to surmount certain obstacles, notably in Gaul, where Mary's eminent glory was readily admitted but also where the basis for the affirmation of her corporeal Assumption was not clearly seen. Following the definition of the dogma of the Assumption in 1950, the Mass on August 15 was given a new formulary that explicitly celebrates Mary's Assumption and the power of her intercession.

Nativity of Mary (September. 8). This feast, witnessed to in the East by Romanos Melodos toward 550, appeared at Rome shortly before the pontificate of Sergius I, but it spread somewhat slowly in the West. The date, September 8, is that of the dedication of a Marian church in Jerusalem. The object of the feast is the eternal predestination and the "blessing" of her who one day would become the Mother of the Son of God rather than Mary's birth itself.

Presentation of Mary (November 21). According to the Proto-Gospel of James, an apocrypha without value, Mary was supposed to have been led to the temple in Jerusalem at the age of 3 to be consecrated to the service of the Lord. Despite this purely legendary basis, the Feast of the Presentation has been celebrated in the Christian East since the 6th century in connection with the dedication of the church of St. Mary the New in Jerusalem. It was introduced in the West at a late date and rather hesitatingly; conceded to the Franciscans in 1371 by Gregory

XI, it became quite widespread in the 15th century. Although suppressed by Pius V, it was reestablished and extended to the whole Church by Sixtus V in 1585. The object of this feast, precious to Christian piety, is Mary herself as the true temple where God dwells rather than the legendary fact of the Presentation.

Modern Feasts. Whereas the ancient Marian feasts were of Oriental origin and commemorate the essential facts of Mary's life, the object of almost every feast instituted in the West since the 12th century is one of Mary's attributes or the commemoration of some marvelous intervention. The feasts arose and developed, in most cases, under the influence of the medieval religious orders or of private devotion.

Immaculate Conception. Since the 8th century the East has known a feast called "the conception of Ann," celebrating the miracle, related by the Apocrypha, of Ann conceiving Mary after a long sterility. However, the feast did not long endure in the West. The Western feast of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION appeared in England in the 12th century. It was promoted by some spiritual writers, such as the English monk Eadmer, but energetically opposed by others, such as SS. Bernard and Thomas Aquinas, who deemed such a privilege to be irreconcilable with the doctrine of universal redemption. It was only in 1476 that Sixtus IV introduced the feast at Rome; at the same time he ordered the composition of a new formulary for the Mass and Office. In 1708 Clement XI extended the feast to the whole Church. Finally, in 1863, nine years after the definition of the dogma, Pius IX promulgated the Office and Mass formulary for the feast, celebrated on December 8.

Queenship of Mary. This feast was instituted by Pius XII in 1954 "so that all may more clearly recognize and more zealously venerate the kind and maternal rule of the Mother of God" [Ad Caeli Reginam, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (1954) 639]. This idea of Mary's royalty is already expressed in the Feast of the Assumption. Originally, this feast was celebrated on May 31. The 1969 reform of the liturgical calendar transferred the feast to August 22.

Visitation. Already in the 8th century the Roman liturgy commemorated the mystery of the VISITATION on Friday of the Advent Embertide. The feast, originally celebrated on July 2, celebrated by the Franciscans since 1263, was extended to the whole Church by Boniface IX in 1401. A revised Mass formulary was approved by Clement VIII in 1608. The 1969 revision of the liturgical calendar transferred the feast to May 31.

Immaculate Heart of Mary. Since the beginning of the 19th century, certain dioceses had celebrated a feast of the Most Pure Heart of Mary. After having consecrated the world to the IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY in 1942, Pius XII instituted the feast in 1944 and set its celebration on the octave of the Assumption. Originally celebrated on August 22, the 1969 reform of the Roman Calendar transferred the feast to the Saturday after Pentecost Sunday.

Seven Sorrows of Mary. Celebrated on September 15, this feast has been celebrated by the SERVITES since the 17th century. After his return from captivity in France, Pius VII extended it to the universal Church in 1814 in memory of the sufferings he had endured.

Our Lady of the Rosary. This feast was already celebrated on October 7 at the end of the 15th century by some confraternities of the Rosary. Its wide diffusion was due initially to the fact that Pius V ordered the feast to be solemnized in thanksgiving for victory over the Turks at LEPANTO (Oct. 7, 1571). It was extended to the universal Church by Clement XI (1716) after Prince Eugene's victory at Peterwardein.

The Revised Roman Calendar (1969)

In the revised Roman Calendar (1969) there are 13 Marian feasts included for universal observance. The Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God (January 1), restores the octave day of Christmas to its original character as a Marian celebration. Two other Marian feasts rank as solemnities: the Immaculate Conception (December 8) and the Assumption (August 15). The Birth of Mary (September 8) and the Visitation (May 31) now rank as feasts. The Queenship of Mary (August 22), Our Lady of Sorrows (September 15), Our Lady of the Rosary (October 7), and the Presentation of Mary (November 21) are celebrated as obligatory memorials. Four Marian feasts remain on the universal calendar as optional memorials: Immaculate Heart of Mary (Saturday after Pentecost), Our Lady of Mount CARMEL (July 16), Our Lady of LOURDES (February 11), Dedication of St. Mary Major (August 5).

In the past, popular piety celebrated the Feast of the Annunciation (March 25) and the Presentation (February 2) as Marian feasts. The revised Roman Calendar stresses these feasts as primarily celebrations of the Lord in which Mary as His Mother is intimately associated. The full titles of the two feasts indicate their non-Marian character: Annunciation of the Lord, Presentation of the Lord (formerly called the Purification of Mary).

The particular liturgical calendar for the United States includes one additional Marian feast: Our Lady of GUADALUPE (December 12). It ranks as an obligatory memorial. The Proper for this feast was approved by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in November 1973.

According to the general norm of the Roman Calendar: "On Saturdays of the year when there is no obligatory memorial, an optional memorial of the Blessed Virgin Mary may be observed." The texts for the liturgical celebration of the Marian feasts witness to the general euchological enrichment brought about in the revision of the Roman Missal (1970). In addition to the Marian feasts already outlined, the Roman Missal includes seven other sets of Mass formulas as Commons of the Blessed Virgin Mary to be used for the Saturday celebrations and for votive Masses of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Theology

To grasp adequately the meaning of the Marian feasts, one must avoid placing them all on the same level. They can be divided into three groups, which more or less correspond to the three chronological stages of the history of Mary's liturgical cult: the feast of the divine maternity, the feasts that commemorate the events of the Blessed Virgin's life, and those that celebrate one of Our Lady's attributes or interventions.

Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God. Since the 4th century, the Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God (January 1) has remained the greatest Marian feast. The Church venerates the one through whom the Savior was given to the whole world, thereby clarifying what is fundamental to Mary's role and the cause of all her privileges.

Feasts of the Blessed Virgin. This second group comprises those feasts whose objects are real or legendary events from Mary's life: her Nativity, her Presentation, and her Assumption. These feasts point up Mary's personal holiness rather than her role in the history of salvation; they strive to show the reflection of her exceptional vocation in her life and soul. With various nuances, they all proclaim Mary's beauty and sanctity.

Feasts of Our Lady. This last group is composed of those feasts that celebrate Mary especially as model, advocate, and protectress of the world. They venerate in Mary "Our Lady" more than her divine maternity or her virginity. It is quite significant that, at least in current usage, many of these feasts justly bear the name of "Feast of Our Lady of" The same is true of most of the local Marian feasts that celebrate Mary as patron or protectress of a particular place or community. The purpose of these feasts is only to distribute, according to local needs, the truth of faith that Mary is the one by whom the Savior is given to the human race—a truth that is expressed on the human level in the mystery of the Incarnation, celebrated at Christmas.

Bibliography: F. G. HOLWECK, Calendarium liturgicum festorum Dei et Dei matris Mariae (Philadelphia 1925). B. BOTTE,

"La Première fête mariale de la liturgie romaine," Ephemerides liturgicae 47 (1933) 425-430. P. BRUYLANTS, "Les Origines du culte de la Sainte Vierge à Rome," Questions liturgiques et paroissiales (1938) 200-210, 270-281. A. RAES, "Aux origines de la fête de l'Assomption en Orient," Orientalia Christiana periodica 12 (1946) 262-274. B. CAPELLE et al., "Marie dans la liturgie," Maria: Études sur la Sainte Vierge, ed. H. DU MANOIR (Paris 1949–) 1:215–413. M. RIGHETTI, Manuale di storia liturgica (Milan 2d. ed. 1955) 2:265-303. E. FLICOTEAUX, Mystères et fêtes de la Vierge Marie (Paris 1956). A. CHAVASSE, Le Sacramentaire gélasien (Strasbourg 1958) 375-402. B. CAPELLE, "Les fêtes mariales," L'Èglise en prière, ed. A. G. MARTIMORT (Paris 1961) 747-765. J. PASCHER, Das liturgische Jahr (Munich 1963) 611-659. J. H. MIL-LER, Fundamentals of the Liturgy (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960) 419–423. E. BISHOP, Liturgica historica (Oxford 1918; repr. 1962) 238-259. C. BOUMAN, "The Immaculate Conception in the Liturgy," in The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception: History and Significance, ed. E. D. O'CONNOR (Notre Dame, Ind. 1958) 113-159. United States Catholic Conference, Roman Calendar, rev. by decree of Vatican Council II (Washington, D.C. 1970); Lectionary for Mass, the Roman Missal rev. by decree of Vatican Council II (Washington, D.C. 1969)—both published by authority of Pope Paul VI. Missale Romanum, Ex decreto Sacrosancti Oecumenici Concilii Vaticani II instauratum auctoritate Pauli PP. VI promulgatum (Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis 1970).

[P. ROUILLARD/T. KROSNICKI/EDS.]

MARIAN PRIESTS

Although the term strictly applies to priests beneficed during the reign of MARY (1553–58), it is usually applied to all holding ecclesiastical preferments during her reign, including those ordained under HENRY VIII and Edward VI. In law, Marian priests suffered less than seminary priests. The former came only under the law that inflicted penalties on all who maintained the spiritual jurisdiction of any foreign prelate, or that made it high treason to maintain the authority of the bishop of Rome or to refuse the Oath of Supremacy. Because of this, fewer Marian priests lost their lives for religion. Those who did so are Bl. Thomas Plumtree, rector of Stubton, Lincolnshire (d. Durham, 1570), Bl. James BELL (d. Lancaster, 1584), and Ven. Richard Williams (d. Tyburn, 1592). As late as 1596, there were 50 Marian priests still working on the English Mission, among them William Ely, who died in a Hereford jail in 1609. It has been reckoned that, in the early years of ELIZABETH I, about 2,000 priests were either deprived, ejected, or resigned their ecclesiastical offices for the sake of conscience.

Bibliography: H. GEE, The Elizabethan Clergy and the Settlement of Religion, 1558–1564 (Oxford 1898). H. N. BIRT, The Elizabethan Religious Settlement (London 1907). The First and Second Diaries of the English College, Douay (Publications of the Catholic Record Society 1; London 1878). G. R. ELTON, ed., The Tudor Constitution (Cambridge, Eng. 1960).

[C. W. FIELDS]

MARIANA, JUAN DE

Spanish theologian and historian; b. Talavera, Spain, April 2, 1536; d. Toledo, Feb. 16, 1624. He entered the Jesuits in 1554; studied philology, theology, and history at ALCALÁ; taught theology in Rome (1561), Sicily (1564), and Paris (1569); and preached in Italy, France, and Flanders. In 1574 he returned to Toledo and devoted himself to writing. His history of Spain, first published in Latin in Toledo in 1592, was augmented, revised, and translated into Spanish by him in later editions. It is somewhat uncritical. His Re rege et regis institutione (Toledo 1599), written at the request of Philip II and dedicated to Philip III, did not attract much attention until the assassination of Henry IV of France in 1610. In the work Mariana held that power was conferred on monarchs and sanctioned by the people, who in the last analysis, as he saw it, had the right of tyrannicide. Kings, therefore, should be educated so that this extreme may be avoided. Henry's assassin, however, had never heard of Mariana. There was an outcry in France against Mariana and the Jesuits, and the Jesuit general threatened any approval of tyrannicide with severe penalties. In his De monetae mutatione, one of the Tractatus VII theologici et historici (Cologne 1609), Mariana attacked monetary debasement and openly accused Spanish fiscal officials of fraud. He was imprisoned in a Franciscan monastery for a year, where he is supposed to have composed a discourse on the ills of the Jesuits. Some scholars hold that this work is not entirely his; others hold that he had completed it in MS by 1605 and that it was confiscated by the government when he was imprisoned in 1610. It was published in Bordeaux in 1625, the year after Mariana's death, and was frequently used as a weapon against the Jesuits. Mariana was one of a group of Spanish Jesuits who, by splitting from the rest of the society in its early years, would almost have destroyed the society. He composed the Scholia in Vetus et Novum Testamentum (Madrid 1613). A monument was erected to him in Talavera in 1888.

Bibliography: A. ASTRAIN, Historia de la compañia de Jesús, 7 v. (Madrid 1902–25) v.3–4. J. LAURES, The Political Economy of Juan de Mariana (New York 1928). L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon 1163–65. C. TESTORE, Enciclopedia cattolica 8:146–147. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954-58) 2:849. D. MANSILLA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7:48–49.

[M. B. MARTIN]

MARIANIST SISTERS

Or Daughters of Mary, popular title for the Congregation of the Daughters of Mary Immaculate (Filiae Mariae, FMI, Official Catholic Directory #0870), a religious congregation founded in 1816 in Agen, France, by Guillaume CHAMINADE and Adèle de Trenquelléon (1798–1828). Like the MARIANISTS, this institute developed from the sodality of the Blessed Mother organized in 1800 by Chaminade. The Holy See gave final approval to the constitutions in 1888. The sisters engage chiefly in primary and secondary education; they also work as catechists, retreat directors, and youth ministers. In the U.S., the first house was established in 1949 in Somerset, Texas. The generalate is in Rome. The U.S. provincialate is in San Antonio, Texas.

[G. J. RUPPEL/EDS.]

MARIANISTS

(SM, Official Catholic Directory #0760); formally known as the Society of Mary (Societas Marie); founded in Bordeaux, France, in 1817 by William Joseph CHAMINADE (1761–1850), a priest who had initiated a distinctive sodality movement in post-revolutionary France (1800). He and Adéle Trenquelléon co-founded the Daughters of Mary (Marianist Sisters) in 1816. In 1817, after several sodalists had made private vows under Chaminade, seven of them professed vows on Sept. 5, 1818. Marianist schools were then opened in Bordeaux and Agen. The former, with its faculty of sodalists, enjoyed an excellent reputation while the latter was intended as a primary school for new children, but people of the better classes contrived to obtain certificates of indigence permitting their boys to enter the school. The French government recognized the work of the Marianists by subsidizing the school that opened at St. Remy, although it was not a state school. In 1834 a school was opened at Colmar. Two years later, the Brothers of Christian Doctrine merged with the Marianists, with the result that the College of Sant Hippolyte, and schools in Ribeauville and Ammschwir were opened in Alsace.

When Chaminade retired as superior general in 1848 the Marianists were conducting schools in France and Switzerland, and before his death (1850) they had spread to the United States. By 1963 there were more than 3,300 Marianists in ten provinces centered in France, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, Spain, and Japan. The European branch of the society maintains missions in Tunis, the Central African Republic, Congo Republic (French), Spanish Morocco, Togo, Argentina, and Chile, and schools in Belgium, Hungary, and Germany. The Americans serve missions in Peru, Kenya, Nigeria, Nyasaland, Lebanon, Korea, and supply religious to Canada, Japan, and various missions of European provinces. The apostolic mission of the Marianist is characterized by his total consecration to Mary, while the society is designed on an egalitarian spirit among priests, teaching brothers, and working brothers.

Symbolic of the spirit to dispel ANTICLERICALISM, the Marianists have never worn a religious habit, but rather the rule prescribed a simple black suit. The Marianists received papal approval on Aug. 11, 1865; but final approbation of the constitutions was finally granted by Leo XIII only on July 24, 1891. To the usual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the Marianists add the vow of stability. As an outward sign of this fourth vow, which is consecration to Mary, they wear a gold ring on their right hand. Marianists, including priests, teaching and working brothers, are governed by a superior general, who with his council, appoints all superiors. The vast majority of the Marianists are teaching brothers.

The American Experience. The foundation period opened in July 1849. Francis X. WENINGER, S.J., an Austrian Jesuit familiar with the Marianist schools in Alsace, wrote to the superior general in Bordeaux on behalf of two pastors of German-speaking parishes in need of Marianists to staff the parish schools in Cincinnati. Leo Meyer, an Alsatian Marianist priest eager to be missioned to the United States, arrived in Cincinnati in July; the following December four brothers arrived to take charge of the parish schools and assist Meyer, who had purchased property in Dayton upon which was built St. Mary's Institute. With accommodations for postulants and novices, Nazareth, as the Marianist center in Dayton was called, was adjacent to St. Mary's (later University of Dayton) and housed a normal school. With the establishment of the U.S. province in 1855 Nazareth was the provincialate as well as the motherhouse where Marianists would make their annual retreat and receive their teaching assignments.

Bishop (after 1850, Archbishop) John B. Purcell of Cincinnati, who had witnessed ethnic rivalry between German- and Irish-Americans, promoted German national parishes such as Holy Trinity in 1834 and St. Mary's in the Over-the-Rhine area of Cincinnati in 1840. During the 1850s the Marianists staffed these schools and taught catechism in German illustrative of the prevailing principle: the German language preserves the faith of the people.

The French-born bishop of Galveston, Jean-Marie Odin, made two visits to Bordeaux searching for Marianists to staff a school. In 1852 three brothers arrived in San Antonio, where they met Br. Edel from Cincinnati, to form a community that laid the foundation of St. Mary's College, today called St. Mary's University. Another French bishop, Amadeus Rappe of Cleveland, successfully sought brothers to teach at St. Patrick's, the school of the Irish parish. Rappe was a self-styled Americanizer who alienated both the German-American and Irish-American communities. The Marianists, who had made a significant impact upon the school, remained at St. Patrick's for several years.

Adèle de Trenquelléon.

Expansion into Pittsburgh, New York, Baltimore, Chicago, and New Orleans occurred principally in response to Redemptorist pastors of German-speaking parishes. In 1880 the Marianists opened a school in Winnipeg, Manitoba, and as a result of a request from the community for missions in the Hawaiian Islands in 1882 the brothers opened schools in Honolulu, Wailuki (1883), and Hilo (1885). In 1884 the brothers responded to a call from a priest of the Archdiocese of San Francisco and opened a school in Stockton, California. The provincial associated with this national expansion was Fr. John N. Reinbolt; by the end of his 20-year administration in 1886 there were 40 Marianist houses with 350 brothers and priests.

Modernization and Professionalization. In 1897, at the request of the German-American pastor, the Marianists opened their first high school at SS. Peter and Paul parish, which represented their entrance into the St. Louis area where they established several high schools. The Marianists opened Spalding Academy in Peoria, Illinois, named after John Lancaster Spalding, the bishop who invited them into the diocese. Many of their parish schools evolved into high schools such as St. Michael's in Chicago.

With the growth of the society by more than 50 schools and over 500 members—from New York to California, Texas to Manitoba—a western province centered in St. Louis was established in 1908. The Hawaii and California houses remained the Cincinnati Province.

While provincials were priests, the provincial inspectors of schools, a position first created in 1869, were brothers. Brother John Waldron was inspector of the St. Louis province and a dominant presence in the early years of the National Catholic Education Association (NCEA). Inspectors were associated with the society's adaptation to the development of diocesan school systems, particularly its central Catholic high school movement. During this period the University of Dayton and St. Mary's College in San Antonio achieved modernization and professionalization. Illustrative of the significance of education in their provinces of the United States, American brothers have dominated the position of assistant superior general in charge of instruction from the late 19th through the 20th century. The MARIANIST SISTERS opened their first house in the United States in 1949; their continuous growth led to the establishment of a U.S. province in 1969.

In 1946 the general chapter elected its first American superior general, Sylvester P. Jurgens, former provincial of the western province. In 1948 he announced the creation of the Pacific province with houses in California and Hawaii. By this time there was a trend to focus almost entirely upon secondary education; the Pacific province was in the vanguard of that movement. Also during the early phase of modernization the sodality movement was revitalized in tandem with the renewed devotion to the founder, William Joseph Chaminade. Father William Feree, even before he became Provincial of the Cincinnati Province (1968-1993) was a dynamic leader in the sodality and the retrieval of the founder's charism. During the late 1940s the Marianist accepted their first African-American candidate and by 1960 there were a few Black Brothers of Mary. The continuous growth of the Marianists during 1950s led to the foundation of the New York Province in 1961, which included St. John's Boys' Home in Brooklyn, Chaminade High School in Mineola (Long Island), other high schools, and Colegio San Jose, Rio Padres, Puerto Rico. In 1961 there were about 1,500 Marianists in the North American provinces, which represented nearly a 100 percent growth in 25 years.

Vatican II and After. The period, 1960 to 1995, followed a pattern etched into the post-Vatican II trends of renewal and reform: the composition of a new constitution based upon the principles of collegiality, subsidiary, personal responsibility, and a scripturally based spirituality. Since the early 1990s brothers were allowed to be appointed provincials. Some of the missions that were founded between the 1930s and the 1950s in Latin America and Africa are flourishing today.

The general decline in traditional vocations has entailed removing brothers and priests from several schools in each of the provinces. However, the rise of Marianists' lay communities dedicated to a way of life infused with the Society's spirituality as a positive force on the horizon. Subsidiarity was severely tested in a conflict between the Marianists of the community of Chaminade High School in Mineola eager to maintain traditional structures in the school and community life (which they perceived as in accord with the best in Marianist life) and the New York Provincial Council with its commitment to reform or renewal in post-Vatican II and based upon contemporary anthropological and ecclesiological understandings of personal development, authority, and subsidiarity. The dispute, which originated in 1968, was resolved by the Vatican Congregation of Religious in 1976; Mineola became the independent Meribah Province with self-determination to pursue its own identity within Marianist traditions.

Lay Marianists, sisters, brothers, and priests form the Family of Mary in the 21st century. In 2001 the Cincinnati, New York, St. Louis and Pacific Provinces merged to form one Province. The Meribah Province, with two high schools and a retreat center, retains its separate status

Bibliography: J. E. GARVIN, Centenary Book of the Society of Mary (Dayton, Ohio; 1917). C. J. KAUFFMAN, Education and Transformation: Marianist Ministries in America since 1849 (New York 1994). E. PAULIN and J. A. BECKER. New Ways: The History of the Brothers of Mary (Marianists) in Hawaii, 1883–1954 (Milwaukee 1959). J. W. SCHMITZ, The Society of Mary in Texas (San Antonio 1951). G. J. SCHNEPP, Province of St. Louis 1908–1983, The First Seventy-Five Years (St. Louis 1985).

[C. J. KAUFFMAN]

MARIANITES OF THE HOLY CROSS

A congregation of religious women (MSC, Official Catholic Directory #2410) founded in Le Mans, France, in 1841 by Basil Anthony MOREAU, who was also the founder of the Fathers of the Holy Cross and reorganizer of the Brothers of the Holy Cross. Mother Mary of the Seven Dolors Gascoin (d. 1900), the first superior, and her early companions received their training in religious life from the Good Shepherd nuns in Le Mans. At first Moreau intended his little community to be housekeepers in the seminaries and boarding schools staffed by the Holy Cross fathers and brothers, but the sisters' field of activity expanded to include teaching, nursing, caring for orphans and elderly people, and laboring in foreign missions. In 1869 Pius IX approved their constitutions.

Four Marianites began work in Indiana in 1843; others came to Canada in 1847, to Louisiana in 1848, and to New York in 1855. The sisters are engaged in education, healthcare, parish ministries, youth ministries, social work, and pastoral work. The U.S. headquarters is located in New Orleans, LA.

[M. L. DORSEY/EDS.]

MARIANNHILL MISSIONARIES, CONGREGATION OF

The Congregation of Mariannhill Missionaries (CMM, Official Catholic Directory #0750) traces its origin to Mariannhill Monastery, established in 1882 near Durban, South Africa, by a group of TRAPPIST monks headed by Father Franz PFANNER. It became an independent society in 1909.

The first foundation, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. Ann, combined their names into Mariannhill, and grew so rapidly that by 1885 it was raised to the status of an abbey with Pfanner as first abbot. Although the first missionary efforts were limited to the Zulu natives in the immediate area of Mariannhill, by 1899 there were 22 mission stations and 285 members of the congregation. The mission stations were centers of learning and civilization where the priests and brothers taught the natives to read and trained them in farming and other skills and trades. Colleges to train native teachers were set up at Mariannhill and Mariazell. In much of their work, the missionaries were ably assisted by the Sisters of the Precious Blood, a community also founded by Pfanner.

The missionary work had been undertaken with the approval of the general chapter of the Trappists held at Sept-Fons, France, in 1879, but it became increasingly clear that the monastic and the missionary ways of life were incompatible. When the problem was referred to the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith in Rome, it directed that a general chapter of the Mariannhill monks should be held to discuss their situation. This chapter, which met on May 11, 1908, under Bp. William Miller, vicar apostolic of the Transvaal, recommended that the 300 Mariannhill monks be banded into a new missionary society loosely tied to the Trappist Order. However, the Holy See decided that the Mariannhill Society should be entirely independent of the Trappist Order and a decree of separation was approved by Pius X on Feb. 2, 1909. The constitutions for the new Congregation of Mariannhill Missionaries, approved June 24, 1914, set up a modern religious congregation, to be governed by a superior general and his councilors. Because of World War I, the first general chapter was not held until 1920, when Adalbero Fleischer was elected as first superior general. The distinctive garb of the society then adopted consisted of a simple black cassock with a red cincture for priests, a black cincture for clerics, and a black belt for the brothers.

After the separation from the Trappist Order, the society expanded to the rest of the world. The first European seminaries were opened in Germany, Switzerland, and Austria. Subsequently establishments were made in the United States, England, Canada, and Spain. The Mariannhill fathers continued to work in South Africa, among the people of Natal and Southern Rhodesia. Mariannhill and Umtata in South Africa and Bulawayo in Southern Rhodesia were raised to the status of dioceses.

The Mariannhill fathers, always interested in furthering a native clergy and native religious life, established an indigenous religious order of priests and brothers and another order of sisters under Fleischer, their first superior general. The first native priest from Mariannhill was ordained in Rome in 1898.

In the United States, the Mariannist Missionaries are found in the Archdiocese of Detroit. The U.S. provincialate is in Dearborn Heights, MI. The generalate is in Rome.

Bibliography: B. HOFMANN, The Founder of Mariannhill (Detroit 1946). B. HUSS, Mariannhill: Half a Century of African Mission Life (Detroit 1935). F. SCHIMLEK, Mariannhill: A Study in Bantu Life and Missionary Effort (Mariannhill, Natal, South Africa 1953).

[T. MOCK/EDS.]

MARIANUS SCOTUS

The name of two Irish monks on the Continent. Marianus Scotus of Mainz, chronicler; b. Ireland, 1028; d. Mainz, Germany, Dec. 22, 1082 or 1083. Marianus (in Irish Móel Brigte) entered the monastery of Mag Bile (Moville, Co. Down) when he was 24 years old. He left Ireland in 1056, during the abbacy of Tigernach Bairrcech, who apparently banished him for some trifling fault. He next appeared on the Continent, at the Irish monastery of St. Martin in Cologne. In 1058 he was in FULDA; in 1059, having been ordained priest at the Irish church of St. Kilian at Würzburg, he had himself walled up as an incluse. In 1069, however, he was moved to Mainz by order of the abbot of Fulda and the bishop of Mainz. There he continued as an incluse in the monastery of St. Martin until his death. He left behind him a chronicle, preserved in MS Vat. Pal. 830, which is, in part, apparently his own autograph. A work of great value for the history of the Irish in Germany in the 10th and 11th centuries, it is also of some importance in the history of AN-NALS and chronicles and was used extensively by SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOUX and later writers.

Marianus Scotus of Regensburg, Bl., monastic founder, scribe; b. County Donegal, Ireland; d. Regensburg, Germany, April 24, 1088 (feast, Feb. 9). Marianus (in Irish Muirchertach Mac Robartaig) came from a learned family. In 1067 he set off on a pilgrimage to Rome with two companions, John and Candidus. Having spent some time at the monastery of Michelsberg at Bamberg, they proceeded to Regensburg (1072-73). There they were persuaded by an Irish incluse named Muirchertach to take up a permanent abode. Inspired perhaps by the example of Muirchertach, John chose to become an incluse at Göttweich in Lower Austria. The abbess of Obermünster gave Marianus the priory of Weih-Sankt-Peter, outside Regensburg, which he restored (c. 1076). His community increased, and he built another monastery. He spent his life copying the Scriptures and works of devotion, not only for monasteries but also, as an act of charity, for anyone in need. Of the many manuscripts he must have written, there is certain knowledge of only one that is extant. It is a copy of the Epistles of St. Paul according to the Vulgate text (MS Vienna 1247) that contains the spurious Epistle to the Laodiceans.

Bibliography: M. S. of Mainz. Stenzel, "Über Marianus Scotus," Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde, $5\ (1824)\ 768-779.$ G. WAITZ, "Hersfelder Annalen. 2. Annales Fuldenses, Lobienses, Monasterienses, Marianus Scotus," ibid., 6 (1838) 670-675. J. F. KENNEY, Sources for the Early History of Ireland 605, 614-616, 786. L. GOUGAUD, Christianity in Celtic Lands, tr. M. JOYNT (London 1932) 172. O. DOERR, "Das Institut der Inclusen in Süddeutschland," Beiträge zur Geschichte des alten Mönchtums und des Benediktinerordens, fasc. 18 (1934) 19, 27, 53, 57, 69, 107, 126, 135. M. S. of Regensburg. For his life, written by an Irish monk of Regensburg about a century after his death and the extant MS, see J. F. KENNEY, Sources for the Early History of Ireland 618-619. D. BINCHY, "The Irish Benedictine Congregation in Medieval Germany," Studies 18 (1929) 198-199. L. GOUGAUD, op. cit. 180-182. M. DÖRR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7:52-53.

[C. MCGRATH]

MARIAVITES

A Polish religious sect with pronounced national characteristics. It was founded in 1906 in Warsaw, Poland, by Jan Kowalski, a diocesan priest, and Sister Maria Felicja Kozłowska (1862–1921) of the Third Order Franciscans. It developed out of the community of sisters founded by the latter in Plock in 1888 and the community of secular priests organized at her instigation by Kowalski in 1893. Both groups adopted the Franciscan Rule and aimed at a religious, moral, and social renewal of clergy and people. They stressed the veneration of the Eucharist and the Blessed Virgin Mary (Mariae vitam imitantes). Because of their mystical bent they were not approved by Rome. On Sept. 4, 1904, the Holy Office condemned the community of priests and on Dec. 5, 1906, excommunicated Kozłowska, Kowalski, and 40 priests. As minister general, Kowalski then organized a Mariavite union, which was given recognition as a "religious sect" by the ministry of the interior at St. Petersburg (Nov. 28, 1906). Negotiations with the members of the UTRECHT SCHISM culminated in the reception of the Mariavites into the OLD CATHOLICS (1909–24) at the Old Catholic Congress held in Vienna in 1909. Kowalski was consecrated bishop Oct. 5, 1909. The Polish Duma recognized the Mariavites as a Christian confession. After the death of Kozłowska, whom Kowalski described in 1922 as the "bride of the Lamb and the espoused wife of Christ," the fanaticism of the Mariavites became more pronounced. This trait was revealed especially by "mystic marriages" between priests and nuns whose children would be conceived without original sin and would be destined to constitute the beginning of a new and sinless humanity. In 1935 Archbishop Kowalski was divested of his offices. A split developed among the Mariavites. A small group, which regarded the monastery of Felicianów as its main center, continued to adhere to Kowalski. The latter was arrested by the Nazis and died in the concentration camp of Dachau. The great majority of the Mariavites placed themselves under the jurisdiction of Bp. Clemens Philipp Feldmann (1935-45). During World War II the Mariavites were suppressed by the National Socialists. Since 1957 their leader has been Bp. Michał Sitek.

In 1911 there were about 200,000 Mariavites, but by the end of World War II their number was reduced by half. In 1962 the main group comprised 25,000, including 25 priests and about 200 sisters. They were organized into three bishoprics with 41 parishes. The motherhouse of the sisters was located at Płock. The Felicjanów group numbered 5,000, distributed over 22 parishes.

Bibliography: K. ALGERMISSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:55. I. RHODE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 4:752–754; Die Mariaviten: Gestalten und Wege der Kirche im Osten (Ulm 1959). J. GRÜNDLER, Lexikon der christlichen Kirchen und Sekten, 2 v. (Vienna 1961) 2:867–869. C. P. FELDMANN, Die altkatholische Kirche der Mariaviten (2d ed. Płock 1940), Mariavita (Płock 1962), Jubilee issue. É. APPOLIS, "Une Église des derniers temps: L'Église Mariavite," Archives de sociologie des religions 10 (1965) 51–67.

[B. STASIEWSKI]

MARIE DE L'INCARNATION, BL.

Discalced Carmelite nun and mystic, baptized Barbé Avrillot; b. Paris, France, Feb. 1, 1566; d. Pontoise, France, April 18, 1618. At 16 she married the viscount of Villemor, Pierre Acarie. A mother of six children, three boys and three girls, Mme. Acarie, characterized as La Belle Acarie, was popular and respected in society at the French capital. However, her husband met with misfortune; his property was confiscated and he was exiled by the king for his part in La Ligue. Mme. Acarie bore this adversity with faith and courage, and dedicated herself to the education of their children. Deepening her spiritual life, she took an active part in various religious enterprises, especially the introduction of the Discalced Carmelite nuns into France (1604). Her three daughters entered the Reformed Carmel; upon the death of her husband, she herself took the habit of St. TERESA OF ÁVILA as a lay sister in the convent of Amiens, with the religious name of Marie of the Incarnation. Shortly afterward she was transferred to the new foundation of Pontoise, and died there with a reputation for holiness.

She wrote two small works: Les Vrays exercises (Paris, 1622) and Oraison, resembling the works of St. JOHN OF THE CROSS in tone; she inserted both into the Constitutions of Pontoise. Her influence in that period of French Catholicism, which H. BRÉMOND calls "L'invasion mystique" of the Teresian Reform in France, was enormous, because of her social position, her personality and spirituality, and her connections with the élite of French spirituality: St. FRANCIS DE SALES, Jean Duval, Cardinal PIERRE BÉRULLE, Brétigny, and others.

PIUS VI signed the decree of the heroicity of her virtues (Sept. 27, 1788), and she was beatified in 1794. Her cause has recently been resumed.

Feast: April 18 (Discalced Carmelites).

Bibliography: A. DUVAL, La Vie admirable de Soeur Marie de l'Incarnation (Paris 1621). BRUNO DE JÉSUS-MARIE, La Belle Acarie, bienheureuse Marie de l'Incarnation (Paris 1942). L. C. SHEP-PARD, Barbe Acarie, Wife and Mystic (New York 1953). GABRIEL DE JESÚS, La Beata María de la Encarnación (Madrid 1923).

[O. RODRIGUEZ]

MARIE MARTIN DE L'INCARNATION, BL.

The first woman missionary to the New World; b. Tours, France, Oct. 28, 1599; d. Quebec, Canada, April 30, 1672. The daughter of middle-class parents Florent and Jeanne (Michelet) Guyard, Marie acceded to her father's wishes and in 1617 married Claude Martin, despite her own attraction to religious life. When her husband died less than three years later, she became housekeeper for her sister, Madame Paul Buisson. Shortly after, Marie received revelations concerning the Incarnation, the Sacred Heart, and the Blessed Trinity. Influenced by the unusual caliber of Marie's interior life, her spiritual director, Dom Raymond of St. Bernard, agreed to her desire for religious consecration. On Jan. 25, 1632, she entered the Ursuline monastery at Tours, leaving her 12-year-old son in the care of her sister. During her novitiate Marie wrote a full account of her spiritual life in obedience to her Jesuit director. Known as the Relation of 1633, this account, along with that written later from Canada as the Relation of 1654, provide the most important documents for a study of her mystical life.

In 1635 Marie received in a dream the first hint of her missionary vocation. Four years later she finally set sail, accompanied by two other Ursulines and Mme. Madeleine de la Peltrie (1603-71), their lay foundress and chief financial support. Arriving in Quebec on Aug. 1, 1639, the missionaries immediately opened their first school in the Lower City. Despite sickness, poverty, and persecution by native tribes, the school grew, and in 1642 the Ursulines moved to a larger monastery. In 1648, when Iroquois hostilities endangered Quebec, Marie was advised to return to Europe, but she and her nuns chose to remain in New France. Her letters to her son Claude, a Benedictine monk, were collected and published by him in 1681 [2d ed., 2 v. (Paris 1876), 3d ed. by Albert Jamet, 4 v. (Paris 1929-39)] and provide a valuable source for 17th-century Canadian history. She also composed catechisms in Huron and Algonquian and a dictionary of French and Algonquian. She was beatified on June 22, 1980.

Feast: April 30 (Canada).

Bibliography: Écrits spirituels et historiques, ed. A. JAMET, 4 v. (Paris 1929–39). The Autobiography of Venerable Marie of the Incarnation, tr. J. J. SULLIVAN (Chicago 1964). D. MAHONEY, Marie of the Incarnation, (Garden City, N.Y. 1964). D. DESLANDRES, "L'éducation des Amérindiennes d'après la correspondance de Marie Guyart de l'Incarnation," Studies in Religion/Sciences religieuses 16 no 1 (1987) 91–110. G. M. OURY, "Le recueil des Retraites des Ursulines de Québec," Église et Théologie 9 (1978) 271–289. A. BÉLANGER, "Une éducatrice d'hier pour aujourd'hui: Marie Guyart de l'Incarnation," Société Canadienne d'Histoire de l'Église Catholique v. 39 (Ottawa, 1973) 55–64.

[D. MAHONEY]

MARIENBERG, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey in the Tirol, Diocese of Bressanone, north central Italy. After being founded in 1090 near Schuls, Switzerland, by Eberhard and Ulrich of Tarasp, it moved to St. Stephen in the Upper Vintschgau (1146) and to its present location near Burgisio (1150), where it was settled from OTTOBEUREN. Never wealthy, the abbey had as advocati the barons of Matsch and (from 1421) Austria. From 1440 the abbots were mitered. The abbey was reduced to one monk in 1598, but Mathias Lang (1615–40) proved a second founder. In the suppression by Bavaria (1807) many precious art objects and properties were alienated and could not be recovered after the abbey's restoration by Emperor Francis I of Austria (1816). Marienberg joined the Benedictine congregations of Swabia (1834), Austria (1889), and Switzerland (1931). In 1960 the abbey had 31 monks, a college in Merano, and four incorporated parishes. The Romanesque church (made baroque) has 12th-century paintings in the crypt.

The former Cistercian Abbey of Marienberg in Burgenland, Austria, was founded by the Hungarian Ban Dominic of the Miskolc family and settled from HEILI-GENKREUZ. Destroyed by Turks (1532), it was given to LILIENFELD (1680), which still maintains pastoral care there.

Bibliography: T. WIESER, "Abt Matthias Lang von Marienberg," Studien und Mitteilungen zur Geschichte des Benediktiner-Ordens und seiner Zweige, 34 (1913) 315–342, 424–450, 700–722. J. WEINGARTNER, Die Kunstdenkmäler Südtirols: Vintschgau (Augsburg 1930; 2d ed. Innsbruck 1957). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:1750–51. S. PAMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:57–58.

[N. BACKMUND]

MARÍN-SOLA, FRANCISCO

Theologian; b. Carcar (Navarre), Spain, Nov. 22, 1873; d. Manila, Philippine Islands, June 5, 1932. He entered the Order of Preachers and received the habit at Toledo, Spain, in 1897. On completion of his philosophical and theological studies, he was assigned to the Philippines, ordained on Sept. 18, 1897, and posted to the parish in Amulung, Province of Cagayan. While there he was imprisoned during the revolution of 1898. He returned to Manila in 1900, joined the staff of the Colegio de San Juan de Letran, and won recognition for his articles in Libertas. After seven years, the ill effects of his imprisonment caused his superiors to send him to Spain to teach in the house of studies in Avila. In 1908 he was back in Manila and received a doctorate in theology at the University of Santo Tomás. He was then appointed to its faculty and to the moderatorship of Libertas. In 1910 he returned to Avila and again crossed the ocean to found the Dominican College in Rosaryville (Ponchatoula), La. He taught there and also at the University of Notre Dame (Indiana). In 1917 the University conferred on him an honorary doctor of laws degree. He returned to Europe in 1918, occupied the chair of theology at the Catholic Francisco Marín-Sola.

University of Fribourg (Switzerland), and acted as the dean of its faculty of theology. Ill health forced his resignation in 1927. During the remaining years of his life he divided his time and labors between Spain and the Philippines.

Marín-Sola was a theologian of vitality and resourcefulness. His outstanding work is L'Evolution homogéne du dogme catholique (Fribourg 1924). In this work he expanded upon the idea of a Dominican confrere, A. GARDEIL, and in doing so restored the correct notion of another Dominican, Melchior CANO, on the subject of theological conclusions. While many theologians deny that there is a homogeneity between a revealed principle and a conclusion deduced from it, when that deduction has been made by reason in a strictly illative process, and hold that such a theological conclusion cannot represent an objective truth susceptible of being incorporated into dogma, Marín-Sola held that strictly illative theological reasoning can discover truths capable of being defined as dogmas of the faith. Two propositions with the same subject (God) differ or are identical in meaning, only by reason of their predicates. If therefore, their predicates are identical, so will be the meaning and likewise the doctrine. Marín-Sola is noted also for his concept of the role of instrumental causality in relation to the REVIVISCENCE of the Sacraments and for his notion of divine premotion. His Spanish brethren revere him as the classical personification of a Spanish Thomistic theologian.

Bibliography: T. TASCÓN; Ciencia Tomista 46 (1932) 132–135. M. J. CONGAR, Bulletin Thomista 3 (1930–33) 679–681. Analecta Sacri Ordinis Praedicatorum 20 (1931–32) 776–778. G. GIERATHS, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:83.

[F. D. NEALY]

MARINUS, SS.

Marinus is the name of several saints mentioned in the MARTYROLOGIES.

Marinus of San Marino, patron of the Republic of San Marino, Italy; b. on an island near Dalmatia; d. San Marino, fourth century. According to a 10th-century legend, Marinus and Leo (Feast Day: Aug. 1) were Dalmatian Christians who were condemned to work on the walls of Rimini during the DIOCLETIAN persecution (c. 304), and used the opportunity to preach the Gospel successfully in that city. Later they became hermits—Marinus on Mt. Titano, and Leo at Montefeltro—and were raised to orders by St. Gaudentius of Rimini in 359.

Feast: Sept. 4 (Roman MARTYROLOGY); Sept. 3 (San Marino).

Marinus of Anazarbus, in Asia Minor; d. c. 305. He is said to have been decapitated in the Diocletian persecution.

Feast: Aug. 8.

Marinus of Caesarea, in Palestine; d. c. 262. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 7.15) mentions him as an officer in the Roman legion stationed at Caesarea who suffered martyrdom in the VALERIAN persecutions. He does not seem to be identified with the St. Marinus cited by the MARTYROL-OGY OF JEROME for March 3.

Marinus of Rome; d. 283. The story of St. Marinus, connected with the son of a Roman senator and put to death in the Numerian persecution, is sheer legend.

Feast: Dec. 26 (Roman MARTYROLOGY).

Bibliography: A. GAROSCI, "La formazione del mito di San Marino," Rivista Storica Italiana 71 (1959) 21–47. R. KNOPF and G. KRÜGER, Ausgewählt Märtyrerakten (3d ed. Tübingen 1929). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux

selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56). 12:683–684. R. BURIGANA, La leggenda "Sancti Marini": una storia religiosa tra Rimini e il monte Titano (San Marino 1992), legends.

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

MARINUS I, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 16, 892 to May 15, 884. Born at Gallese, near Rome, Marinus entered the service of the Roman Church at the age of 12. In that capacity he enjoyed a distinguished career. As a deacon he was one of three legates sent by Pope ADRIAN II to Constantinople to represent the papacy at the Fourth (Eighth Ecumenical) Council of CONSTANTINOPLE, 869–870. With Marinus playing a leading role in guiding the Council's proceedings, Partriarch PHOTIUS was deposed and IGNATIUS was confirmed as patriarch. Marinus subsequently became an archdeacon and treasurer (arcarius) of the Roman Church and then was made bishop of Caere in Etruria by Pope JOHN VIII.

Upon the assassination of John VIII, Marinus was quickly elected pope but did not receive imperial confirmation of his election until later. Since he was the first bishop from another see to be elevated to the bishopric of Rome, some viewed his election as uncanonical. Although the evidence is vague, perhaps his election was marked by bitter partisanship soon to disrupt order in the Papal State. Despite the fact that he had played a key role in deposing Photius at the Council of Constantinople in 869-870, Mariunus did nothing to challenge the decisions of a council held in Constantinople in 879-880 which had confirmed Photius' return as patriarch of Constantinople. Thereby he continued the conciliatory policy toward the Byzantine church that had been instituted by Pope John VIII as a means of reducing tension between Rome and Constantinople. In an attempt to quiet partisan rivalry in Rome, Marinus reversed John VIII's condemnation of the leaders of a faction that opposed John's policies; among those favored was FORMOSUS (later pope) whose excommunication was lifted and his office as bishop of Porto restored. In 883 Marinus met with Emperor Charles III, the Fat, seeking help against the aggressions of Italian princes, especially Guido (Guy), duke of Spoleto, but the emperor was able to do little to constrain Guido's growing threat to the Papal State beyond declaring him deposed from his office as duke and ordering him to surrender properties illegally seized; to enforce these decisions Charles was forced to seek the services of another Italian potentate. On occasion the Pope was in contact with important ecclesiastical officials in Francia who sought his help in resolving disputes. At the request of the Anglo-Saxon king, ALFRED THE GREAT, he granted exemption from taxes to the Schola Saxonum in Rome.

Bibliography: Le Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 3 v., 2nd ed. (Paris 1955–1957), 2: 224. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v., 2nd ed. (Leipzig 1885-1888) 2:425-426. Flodoard von Reims, Die Geschichte der Reimser Kirche, Liber IV, ch. 1, ed. M. STRATMANN, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores 36 (Hannover 1998) 363–364. L. DUCHESNE, The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes, A.D. 754–1073, tr. A. H. MAT-THEW (London 1908) 1403-202. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte des Papsttums. Eine Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zum Tod Pius X, v. 2: Das Papsttums im Frühmittelalter. Geschichte des Päpste von Regierungsantritt Gregors des Grossen bis zum Mitte des ll. Jahrhundert (Leipzig 1934) 321-323. É. AMANN, L'époque carolingienne, Histoire de l'Église depuis les origines jusqu'a nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN 6 (Paris 1947) 436-441. P. LLEWELLYN, Rome in the Dark Ages (London 1993) 286-315.

[W. GELLHAUS]

MARINUS II, POPE

Pontificate: Oct. 30, 942 to April or May 946. The cardinal priest Marinus was one of several popes designated by Alberic II, a member of the family of Theophylactus, who in 932 had seized control of Rome and the Papal State from his mother, Marozia, and her son, Pope JOHN XI, said by some to have been fathered by Pope SERGIUS III. Alberic II, "glorious Prince and Senator of all the Romans," ruled the Papal State with an iron hand until his death in 954. Of Marinus II it was said by a contemporary chronicler that he did nothing except by order of Alberic II.

Despite his dictatorial actions, Alberic II did select a succession of popes whose activities were inspired by genuine religious motives. Marinus II was one of them. He devoted his brief pontificate to promoting discipline among the Roman clergy and monks, restoring churches, and helping the poor. He was especially concerned with protecting monasteries against depredations by bishops and nobles, thereby helping to provide the proper setting for monastic reforms, already under way at such places as Cluny, that would transform the Church by the end of the tenth century. His concerns for reform reached beyond Rome, as demonstrated by his appointment of Frederick, archbishop of Mainz, as papal vicar charged with rooting out the abuses of clergy and monks in France and Germany.

Bibliography: Sources: Le Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 3 v., 2nd ed. (Paris 1955–1957) 2: 245. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v., 2nd ed. (Leipzig 1885–1888) 2: 458–459. Papsturkunden, ed. H. ZIMMERMANN, v. 1, 896–996, 2nd ed. rev., Denkschriften, Österreichische Akademie der Wissenschaft, Philosophisch–Historische Klasse 174 (Vienna 1989) 172–191. Literature. A. FLICHE, in vol. 2, L'Europe occidentale de 888 à 1125, in Histoire générale: Histoire du Moyen Age (Paris 1941)

41–59, 110–131. É. AMANN and A. DUMAS, L'Église au pouvoir des laïques (888–1037), in vol. 7 of Histoire de la Église depuis les origines jusqu'a nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1948) 41. P. LLEWELLYN, Rome in the Dark Ages (London 1993) 286–315.

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

MARIOLOGY

Since the 17th century, Mariology has designated the part of dogmatic theology that concerns the Blessed Virgin Mary in her relation to God and to her fellow creatures under God.

Origin and History. Revelation provides the primary data. "In the books of both the Old and New Testaments, the Sacred Scriptures tell us many glorious things about the Blessed Virgin. . . her virginal motherhood and unspotted holiness are expressly asserted" [Pius XII, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (1954) 678]. However, it is not "possible to define adequately and to explain correctly the Blessed Virgin's great dignity and sublimity from the Sacred Scriptures alone . . . without taking into account Catholic tradition and the teaching authority of the Church' (ibid.). Hence the importance of tracing the faith of the Church in the evidences of Christian tradition. Solemn pronouncements concerning Mary are few—only four doctrines are certainly dogmatically defined: divine motherhood, virginity, IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, AS-SUMPTION.

Development in Early Christian Authors. Early writings concerning Marian theology are in reflections on the Scriptures. The Pauline comparison of Jesus Christ to ADAM (Rom 5.15) is amplified in the 2d-century description of Mary as the new EVE, bringing forth in obedience the Holy One, in contrast to the first Eve who brought forth disobedience and death (St. Justin, St. Irenaeus).

Evidence of the first three centuries reflects a clear conviction of Mary's virginity in conceiving Christ, ante partum (before childbirth), but does not yet show acceptance of Mary's virginity in partu (in childbirth), and post partum (after childbirth). Ambrose (d. 397) and Augustine (d. 430) defend Mary's virginity in and after the childbearing of Christ as well as in His conception (see VIRGIN BIRTH).

The holiness of Our Lady has an equally slow maturation in Christian consciousness. Some accuse her of fault; for example, of importunity at Cana (Irenaeus), of vainglory during her Son's public life (Chrysostom; cf. Mt 12.46), and even of doubt on Calvary (Origen). The patristic conviction of Mary's total freedom from personal sin is gradually strengthened; no serious question is raised about it after the definition of the divine maternity by the Council of EPHESUS (431; Enchiridion symbolorum, 251).

The delay in emergence of these Marian truths is explained in various ways. Christological and Trinitarian truths receive first attention. Possibilities of erroneous interpretation sometimes make the publication of a Marian truth inopportune. The Mediterranean pagan world knows of mother goddesses, and so Christianity cannot risk calling Mary MOTHER OF GOD prematurely. To hold Mary free of even the least personal sin seems to take away from Christ's unique holiness. Similarly, to state the virginal childbearing incautiously might play into the hands of Docetism, which denies a real body to Christ.

It is only in 649 that a Lateran council under Pope St. Martin I proclaims the perfect and perpetual virginity of Mary—before and after the birth of Jesus (Enchiridion symbolorum, 503). Historians of dogma disagree as to whether or not this council affirmed also the virginity in partu, although it is taught explicitly by Pope Paul IV (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1880). The Church has never specified the precise meaning of virginity in partu, but a common theological opinion is that it was a further miraculous sign of the divine origin of Christ.

Late Patristic, Early Medieval Times. By the 6th century the Assumption is being discussed, though there is need to distinguish between the exaggerations of the apocryphal Transitus Mariae (Passing of Mary) literature and authentic tradition. Other points of Marian doctrine are considered only in passing. Belief in the heavenly mediation of Mary underlies appeals to her intercession, as in the familiar prayer Sub tuum praesidium confugimus (We fly to thy patronage), traceable to at least a 4th-century Greek version. The title mediatrix appears in the 8th-century East with St. Andrew of Crete and St. Germanus of Constantinople; about the same time it comes to the West through Paul the Deacon's translation of "The Life of Theophilus" (although it might be said that recognition of the dates of the title's appearance varies).

An at least indirect spiritual maternity is found in early texts. Origen, for example, says that the Mother of Jesus can be called mother of those who are joined to Christ as John the beloved disciple was (Jn 19.26). St. Ambrose Autpert (d. 784) regards Mary as mater gentium (mother of the nations), mater credentium (mother of believers), and mater electorum (mother of the elect), whom she has generated in generating Christ.

As early as Epiphanius of Constantia (d. 403) Eve's title, mother of the living, is extended to Mary, but Mary's spiritual motherhood of the members of the MYS-TICAL BODY appears clearly only in the 12th century, e.g., in Hermann of Tournai. A factor here is the mutual enrichment of Mariology and the theology about the Church. The maternal meaning that has always been part of the concept of the Church as new Eve is applied now also to Our Lady as new Eve. "Like the Church of which she is the figure, Mary is mother of all those who are born again to life" (Guerric of Igny, d. 1155; Patrologia Latina, 185:188).

Sculpture of the Virgin Mary, Tuscany, Italy. (©Gary Braasch/CORBIS)

From the 12th century onward the meaning of Mary's compassion with Christ on Calvary becomes part of Mariology, e.g., in Rupert of Deutz, on "Woman, behold your son." In harmony with belief in the Assumption a stronger consciousness develops also of Mary's power to intercede for men's SALVATION, e.g., in John the Geometer in the 10th century.

Systematic Mariology. Systematic Mariology has its beginnings in St. ANSELM (d. 1109), father of scholasticism. His axiom is famous: "It was becoming that the Virgin should shine with a purity so great that nothing greater under God can be imagined. For to her God determined to give His only Son" (De conceptu virginali 18; Patrologia Latina, 158:451). St. Anselm relates Mary's sanctity and virginity, her mediation and INTERCESSION to the divine maternity.

"Annunciation," painting by Andrea del Sarto, archangel Gabriel kneeling, facing the Virgin Mary, 16th century. (©Arte & Immagini sri/CORBIS)

St. BERNARD (d. 1153) preaches a sober, spiritual Marian theology in De laudibus beatae virginis (Patrologia Latina, 183:55–88), consisting of homilies on the Annunciation Gospel, Missus est (Lk 1.26). He compares Mary's mediation to an aqueduct bringing graces from Christ, the source. Never avant-garde in his Mariology, he does not call Mary spiritual mother; she is rather "Our Lady"—a powerful, yet tender queen of mercy. His opposition to the feast and doctrine of the conception of Mary sets a pattern followed by even the greatest scholastics (Patrologia Latina, 182:332–336).

Peter Lombard's Sentences devotes to Our Lady only a few questions by way of corollary to Christology. The commentaries of other schoolmen on the Sentences follow the lead of Lombard (d. 1160): St. Bonaventure's, St. Albert the Great's, St. Thomas Aquinas's. To appreciate the full Marian theology of the scholastics, their other writings need to be taken into account. The unknown author of the contemporary Mariale super missus est, once attributed to St. Albert, takes a step forward when he describes Mary in her compassion as "the associate of Christ, the helpmate similar to Him (Gn 2.21)."

St. Thomas shows deep insight into the divine maternity in the Summa theologiae. Starting from the revealed truth that Mary is Mother of Jesus, St. Thomas examines the holiness of Mary, her virginity, her dignity. His homiletic writings, on the Hail Mary, for example, introduce also Mary's mediation and queenship (see MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF). He does not attempt a Mariological synthesis, and the necessity of Mary's Redemption inhibits him in the matter of the Immaculate Conception.

For centuries there is to be no significant advance in the overall approach to Mariology, although individual questions continue to be agitated. The prime example of these is the Immaculate Conception. DUNS SCOTUS intuits the theological solution of the main problem besetting what the Church will eventually proclaim a dogma—the preservative Redemption of Mary from ORIGINAL SIN.

J. Gerson (d. 1429) is a conspicuous exception in a mediocre period. In his sermons and in an explanation of the MAGNIFICAT there is a rich Mariology-Mary's mediation, her queenship, her role in the Eucharist. The sermons of St. Bernardine of Siena (d. 1444) offer a sound theology of the mediation and Assumption. He attributes to Mary jurisdiction over all graces without exception.

Reformation and Aftermath. In accord with their theology of the communion of saints, the early reformers deny a privileged intercession on Mary's part; in practice, they forbid the invocation of Mary as prejudicial to the unique mediation of Christ. The Council of Trent devotes only slight attention to Our Lady, stating it has no intention of including her under the universal law of original sin, mentioning her freedom from actual sin (some theologians consider Trent to define this, e.g., J. de Aldama, SJ), and defending veneration of her images.

In the post-Tridentine theologians a great period opens for Mariology-not only in Spain, where Protestantism is not a domestic threat, but also in Germany, where the defense of Marian doctrine and devotion is a pressing need. St. Peter Canisius (d. 1597) refutes the Centuriators of Magdeburg with a wide use of quotations from Scripture and the Fathers, in a pioneering work of documention, De Maria virgine incomparabili. Francisco Suárez, SJ (d. 1617), deserves the title father of scientific Mariology. Suárez's Roman lectures (1584-85), Quaestiones, are an approach toward a full and separate tract of Mariology, although he is less bold in his definitive Marian theology, De mysteriis vitae Christi (1592). Both works contain extensive considerations on Mary's HOLI-NESS. Suárez studies Mary's life as one of love of God, of GRACE demanded by the dignity of the divine maternity.

The 17th century is a high point in Marian theology. The relationship of Mary to the redemptive work of Christ is a prominent theme, e.g., in F. Q. Salazar, SJ (d. 1646), S. Saavedra, Mercedarian (d. 1643?), and D. Petau, SJ (d. 1652). In Cardinal Pierre de Bérulle, founder of the French school, the central notion of Mariology is the "state of the Mother of God." Bérulle proposes a reverent admiration of the place of Mary in the mystery of the INCARNATION. St. John Eudes (d. 1680) writes of the doctrine underlying devotion to the Heart of Mary (see IM-MACULATE HEART OF MARY). St. Louis Grignion de Montfort (d. 1716) develops the ideas of the French school in the direction of Mary's spiritual motherhood. In The Love of Eternal Wisdom Montfort mentions devotion to Mary as a preferred way to obtain Wisdom Incarnate, Jesus Christ. True Devotion elaborates this means.

By the end of the 17th century, however, the cold wind of JANSENISM is blowing strong. Jansenists are accused of minimizing devotion to Mary by denying her mediation and spiritual motherhood. A. Widenfeldt's controversial but often justly critical brochure, Monita salutaria (Ghent 1673; soon tr. into English as Wholesome Advices from the Blessed Virgin to her Indiscreet Worshippers, London 1687) provokes a storm in which the original work is often lost sight of. St. Alphonsus Liguori (d. 1787) advocates, especially in The Glories of Mary, the universal mediation of Mary, not only against Jansenism and Protestantism, but also in reply to the hesitations of L. A. Muratori.

1854 to 1962. The definition of the Immaculate Conception (1854) inspires a flowering of Marian studies, exemplified in Newman and Scheeben. Writing in defense of the Immaculate Conception, Newman cites the patristic sources on Mary as the new Eve (Letter to Dr. Pusey). His studies on the development of doctrine enrich Mariology as well, e.g., On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine, 1859 (see DOCTRINE, DEVELOPMENT OF). Matthias Scheeben makes a place for Mariology in his Dogmatik (1873-82); C. Feckes (d. 1958) and E. Druwé, SJ (d. 1950), do much to make it known. The identifying feature of Scheeben's Marian theology is "bridal motherhood"; this is Mary's "personal character" and the foundation of her privileges and mission. Worthy of mention at the turn of the century is J. B. Terrien, SJ, Marie, la mère de Dieu et la mère des hommes, 4 v. (Paris).

The main themes of the first half of the 20th century are the mediation of Mary and the Assumption. The first international Marian congress (Lyons 1900) holds a study, session on the role of Mary in the plan of salvation. At subsequent conventions, national and international, many papers on mediation are offered, e.g., by R. de la Broise, SJ, J. V. Bainvel, SJ, and E. Hugon, OP. Cardinal A. Lépicier, OSM, in 1901 and C. Van Crombrugghe in 1913 reflect the trend in their manuals of Mariology. The movement gains momentum when the Brussels Marian Congress (1921) takes Mary's mediation as its motif.

Cardinal Mercier forms an episcopal committee to study the definability of the mediation; pontifical commissions are appointed for this purpose in Belgium, Spain, and Italy. Around Mercier gathers a group of distinguished theologians, e.g., B. M. Merkelbach, OP (d. 1942), author of Mariologia (Paris 1939); J. Bittremieux (d. 1950), founder of the Flemish Mariological Society in 1931, author of De mediatione universali B. Mariae Virginis quoad gratias (Bruges 1926); J. Lebon (d. 1957), indefatigable protagonist of mediation in many writings.

After the definition of the Immaculate Conception, interest grows in a definition of the Assumption. With regard to both truths, however, the Church is moved to solemn definition more by the faith of the Christian people than by the state of theological study. In the intellectual doldrums of the mid-19th century the definition of the Immaculate Conception settles questions that once had Christian thinkers at loggerheads. In 1950, at a thriving time for Marian studies, the Church defines the Assumption, a doctrine that has not been the main focus of attention in Marian theology. Not surprisingly, the definition has called attention to differences between Catholics and other Christians, because the Assumption is a test case for intricate questions of Scripture and tradition and their relationship to each other and to the teaching authority of the Church.

The progress made in mariological studies during this period also owed much to the guidance of the popes. In addition to the definitions of the Immaculate Conception (Ineffabilis Deus) and Assumption (MUNIFI-CENTISSIMUS DEUS), many other Marian documents have emanated from the Holy See. Leo XIII is remembered for his encyclicals on the rosary and its doctrinal meaning (e.g., Iucunda semper, 1894); St. Pius X for Ad diem illum (1904), on the spiritual motherhood; Benedict XV for Inter sodalicia (1918), on Mary's compassion; Pius XI for Lux veritatis (1931), on the Ephesus anniversary. The acts of Pius XII contain an immense amount of material, e.g., the encyclicals Fulgens corona (1953), for the Marian year, and Ad caeli reginam (1954), on the queenship. Pius XII wrote of Our Lady's place in the general theology of Christ and the Church in his great doctrinal encyclicals: MYSTICI CORPORIS (1943), MEDIATOR DEI (1947), and Haurietis aguas (1956). In his Marian messages Pope John XXIII spoke frequently of the spiritual motherhood, e.g., to the eighth French National Marian Congress at Lisieux, C'este bien volontiers, July 6, 1961 [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 53 (1961) 504–506]; also in placing under Mary's patronage VATICAN COUNCIL II.

Vatican II and Beyond. The mystery of the Blessed Virgin Mary was further developed by Vatican Council II, meeting from 1962 to 1965. The Council mentioned Mary in many documents, initially in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (No. 103), but particularly in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (ch. 8). It was most significant for the renewal of Mariology and of devotion to Mary that the Council Fathers voted, October 29, 1963, in favor of making the Marian schema a part of the document on the Church. The very title of the chapter, "The Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, in the Mystery of Christ and the Church," placed her in close relationship with her Son (CHRISTOCENTRIC Mariology) and with his Mystical Body (ecclesiotypical Mariology). This is the proper setting in which to assess Mary's role in the work of Redemption. The true ecumenical importance of the Council's decision is derived not from minimizing her place in Catholic faith and piety, but from emphasizing a sharing-oriented Mariology instead of one that is privilege-centered.

Vatican II resulted in a shift in mariological studies, moving away from a privilege-centered to a sharing-oriented consideration of Mary, in association to Christ (Christocentric) and in relationship to the Church (ecclesiotypical). In contrast to the discussions in the early 20th century, the postconciliar period witnessed few studies on such themes as principles of Mariology or Marian mediation, but many positive investigations, especially into biblical and patristic sources. The Mary-Church relation attracted serious notice.

Ecumenical concern has affected theological exploration also; among the operative factors here was Vatican II's reference to the "hierarchy of truths" which "vary in their relationship to the foundation of the Christian faith" (Decree on Ecumenism, 11, 20). In 1967 the English Ecumenical Society of the Blessed Virgin Mary was founded, and along with regular meetings and publications (the pamphlet series, Mother of Jesus), it sponsored several international conferences. Its American branch was established in 1976 and has brought together Roman Catholic, Anglican, Orthodox and Protestant Christian scholars to explore the thorny differences for which the Virgin Mary often served as a symptom: the bonds between Scripture and tradition, and the Church's teaching authority; the legitimacy within the communion of saints of calling on the saints in prayer (invocation). A theologian in the Reformed tradition, Dr. J. A. Ross Mackenzie (Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Virginia) received the president's patronal medal at Catholic University, Washington, DC, December 7, 1977. The medal, founded in 1974, recognizes promotion of study and veneration of Mary (previous recipients were Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen, Mother Mary Claudia, IHM, and Theodore Koehler, SM, curator of the Marian Library at the University of Dayton).

Postconciliar theological developments showed a two-fold orientation in Mariology: continuation of the directions of Vatican Council II; new areas, as explorations in the devotional life of the faithful. Study was spurred by important papal documents and joint pastorals by national episcopal conferences, as in the United States, the NCCB's Behold Your Mother, Woman of Faith (November 21, 1973), Switzerland (1973), Puerto Rico (1976), and Poland (1977).

Pope Paul VI's apostolic exhortation Marialis cultus (February 1, 1974), "for the right ordering and development of devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary," showed Mary's place in the revised Western liturgy and included significant points on anthropology, on the Virgin Mary in respect to women's rights, and on human dignity.

In the ensuing decades after Vatican II, Mariological societies in various countries continued to function. In the United States, the Mariological Society of America met for the 25th time, January 1974. Its speakers and subjects showed an increasing ecumenical orientation, e.g., the virginal conception of Jesus was discussed at the 1973 St. Louis convention, with A. C. Piepkorn (Lutheran) and H. W. Richardson (Presbyterian) giving papers [Marian Studies 24 (1973)]. National societies concerned with Marian theology continued to meet, for example, French (Bulletin de la soliété française d'études mariales), Spanish (Estudios Marianos), Canadian (French-speaking, occasional publication) and American (Marian Studies). The topics of the French society during this period illustrated postconciliar concerns: "Mary's place in religious congregations of Marian Inspiration" (1972); "Mary and the Question of Women" (1973 and 1974); and "Representations of Mary in Popular Piety, Historically, Iconographically, and Psychologically" (1976 and 1977). The Spanish society has reached its 40th volume of proceedings; recent themes have been: "The Psychology of Mary" (1972); "Mary and the Mystery of the Church" (1973); "Marian Dogmas and the Interpretation of Dogma'' (1976).

Marian Library Studies (Dayton), the international Marianum (Rome) and Ephemerides Mariologicae (Madrid), and other periodicals, both scholarly and general, illustrate present centers of Mariological interest: popular piety; Scripture, especially the infancy narratives; catechetics; Mary and ecumenism; Mary as model of the Church, Mary and women, and Mary in popular devotion. The popular cult of the Virgin Mary has increasingly become a topic of investigation. Research interest has focused on the origins and significance of folk devotion in various cultures, both in the Old World (pilgrimage sites and shrines like Czestochowa and Lourdes, more visited than ever), and in the New World (Guadalupe, Argentina, and other countries). An associated theme is the place of Mary in the "way of beauty," complementing the "way of the intellect," as Pope Paul suggested to the Roman congress of May, 1975.

John Paul II and Redemptoris Mater. The papacy of John Paul II marked another important milestone in mariological studies, with the publication of the encyclical REDEMPTORIS MATER on March 25, 1987. Redemptoris Mater was a comprehensive scriptural, conciliar, and theological meditation on the Mother of God, directed to all Christians. The encyclical explained her subordinate mediatorial role, her role as model of mother and obedient expectant follower of the divine will. It cited the Marian piety as a common tradition binding Catholics and the Orthodox together.

Theological Aspects. Under the impetus of Vatican II the theology of Mary stresses the truth that her special graces and prerogatives are to be seen as primarily for the sake of her Son and his redeemed-redeeming Body, the Church. Divine Revelation about Mary makes the central mysteries of faith more intelligible and meaningful for Christian living.

The Christocentric and ecclesiotypical emphases of contemporary Mariology are mutually complementary and not in conflict. For Mary cannot be related to Christ without being intimately associated with the ecclesial Body that he received through his redemptive activity. At the same time, she is the archetype of the Church only because her unique relationship with Christ is the basis for the Church's share in his redeeming work (see Semmelroth 1963, esp. 80–88). Consequently, concentration upon the ecclesiotypical significance of Marian doctrine and devotion should not obscure their basic Christocentric character.

Theologians today are more inclined to include the Mary-Church analogy within the basic Marian idea or fundamental principle of Mariology. "Her concrete motherhood with regard to Christ, the redeeming God-Man, freely accepted in faith—her fully committed divine motherhood—this is both the key to the full understanding of the Marian mystery and the basic Mariological principle, which is concretely identical with Mary's objectively and subjectively unique state of being redeemed" (Schillebeeckx 106). Within one organic principle the two emphases are contained, i.e., both the Christocentric (Mary's "fully committed divine motherhood"), and the ecclesiotypical (her "objectively and subjectively unique state of being redeemed"). Her vocation to be the mother of the Word incarnate must be considered in close connection with the graces that reveal her calling to be the prototype of the Church.

Immaculate Conception. Accordingly, Mary's Immaculate Conception is God's special favor preparing her to accept freely the invitation to be the Reedeemer's mother and so to share in the redemption. Following St. Bernard, St. Thomas Aquinas taught that her consent was given "in place of the whole human race" (Summa Theologiae 3a, 30.1). Because she was so completely receptive to God's loving plan, the members of Christ's Body can receive the fruits of Christ's redeeming love into their own lives. Being the first fruit of her Son's Redemption, Mary is uniquely redeemed objectively (preservation from all sin through the grace of the Immaculate Conception). Responding to her vocation with total commitment, she is uniquely redeemed subjectively. Since she received the Savior into her own life of loving faith, Mary cooperated maternally in Christ's objective redemption of the human race. Indeed Christ alone is the Redeemer who reconciles the world to the Father in the Holy Spirit. Mary's "fully committed divine motherhood," however, gives her free act of identifying with his objective redemption a redemptive meaning and value for all the members of the Church.

Divine Maternity. The truth that Mary's motherhood of Christ is both bridal and virginal has rich ecclesiotypical significance (see Semmelroth 1963, esp. 117–142).

Her vocal fiat of free consent at the annunciation and her silent fiat at the foot of the cross make Mary the spiritual bride of the Redeemer. In her compassion she received the fruits of her Son's sacrifice both for her own redemption and for that of the whole Church. Concomitantly, and as a result of this creative receptivity to grace, her bridal motherhood is also virginal. Her maternal fruitfulness cannot come from human power but from the breath of the Holy Spirit. Had she conceived Christ other than as a virgin, her bridal relationship with the Logos incarnate would have been obscured. Without her perpetual virginity, the revelation of her complete and continuous fidelity to Christ and his messianic mission would have been blurred. Mary then is the archetype of the Church as the Church is also the virginal bride of Christ. As the community of persons redeemed by him, the Church is called to be constantly faithful to his word. The Immaculate Conception is the perfect exemplar of a grace-filled Church. As the sacramental community called to mediate Redemption to the world, the Church also images the bridal motherhood of Mary. The Assumption makes her "the sign of sure hope, and comfort for the pilgrim people of God" (Lumen gentium 68—69). All the Marian dogmas, therefore, converge toward a theological and prayerful contemplation of Mary as the archetype of the Church.

As bridal and virginal mothers, both Mary and the Church are to be dynamically united together with the Holy Spirit. The sole source of their spiritual fecundity is the abiding presence and activity of the risen Lord's Spirit. A closer connection between Mariology and Pneumatology will contribute greatly to a balanced Christology, ecclesiology, and Christian anthropology. Much remains to be done in this regard, especially by theologians of the Western Church who have begun to study more seriously the magnificent heritage of the Eastern tradition on the Holy Spirit.

New Eve. A portion of the patristic patrimony common to East and West is the image of Mary as the New Eve. Its rediscovery, under the special inspiration of Cardinal Newman's Marian writings, has led to a renewed research into the witness of the Fathers who made use of this image in their teaching about Mary. After the Scriptures, it reflects the most ancient meditation upon Mary and is a very fertile source of the Mary-Church analogy and typology. The National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) in the pastoral on the Blessed Virgin Mary points out: "Even more anciently, the Church was regarded as the 'New Eve.' The Church is the bride of Christ, formed from his side in the sleep of death on the cross, as the first Eve was formed by God from the side of the sleeping Adam" (NCCB 41). From her earliest days the Church has seen herself symbolized in Mary and has come to understand her mysterious self more profoundly in light of Mary as archetype. Mary "personifies" all that the Church is and hopes to become.

The impact of an ecclesiotypical Mariology upon Marian devotion has been most salutary. Pope Paul VI in his apostolic exhortation for the right ordinary and development of devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary, stated: "She is worthy of imitation because she was the first and most perfect of Christ's disciples. All of this has a permanent and universal exemplary value" (Paul VI 35). Mary, of course, is not an exemplar in the sense of being a stereotyped blueprint upon which contemporary Christians are to model their lives. Nevertheless, if Christians are to mature as members of Christ's living Body, the Church, they must prayerfully penetrate the perennial meaning of Mary-like faith, courage, concern, constancy, etc.

Still a stumbling block for many, especially members of other Christian Churches, is the concept of Mary's mediation and intercession. It seems to interfere with the unique mediatorship of Christ. Vatican II's Marian chapter clearly teaches: "Mary's function as mother of men in no way obscures or diminishes this unique mediation of Christ, but rather shows its power" (Lumen gentium 60). Reconceptualization of the mystery must remove from Mary's mediatory role any image of her being a gobetween, as though the risen Lord were made remote. Such a misconception misses the basic meaning of the Incarnation and true grandeur of Mary, namely, that God the Son has chosen to become man in her and to be an abiding presence in human history in his risen humanity forever. Her spiritual motherhood primarily helps dispose believers to encounter the ever-present Christ more intimately in their daily Christian lives. Both by her example as archetype of the Church and by her intercessory ministry in glory, Mary enlightens and inspires her spiritual children to grow more docile to the direct action of her Son's spirit and to cooperate more generously with the special graces of God's redeeming love.

Bibliography: Marian Studies (1950-), annual proceedings of the Mariological Society of America. J. B. CAROL, Fundamentals of Mariology (New York 1956). P. F. PALMER, Mary in the Documents of the Church (Westminster, MD 1952). M. THURIAN, Mary, Mother of All Christians (New York 1964). G. PHILIPS et al., De Mariologia et oecumenismo (Rome 1962). O. SEMMELROTH, Mary, Archetype of the Church, tr. m. VON EROES and J. DEVLIN (New York 1963); National Conference of Catholic Bishops, Behold Your Mother, Woman of Faith, a pastoral letter on the Blessed Virgin Mary November 21, 1973 (Washington 1973). D. FLANAGAN, commentary on ch. 8 of Lumen Gentium, in Vatican II: The Constitution on the Church, ed. K. MCNAMARA (Chicago 1968). H. DU MANOIR DE JUAYE, ed., Maria: Études sur la Sainte Vierge 8 v. (Beauchesne, Paris 1949-71). R. LAURENTIN, Court traité sur la Vierge Marie (5th ed. Lethielleux, Paris 1968). J. C. DE SATGÉ, Down to Earth: The New Protestant Vision of the Virgin Mary (Wilmington, NC 1976). R. E. BROWN et al., eds., Mary in the New Testament (New York, Philadelphia, Toronto 1978). E. R. CARROLL, Understanding the Mother of Jesus (Wilmington, DE 1978). L. DEISS, Mary, Daughter of Sion tr. B. T. BLAIR (Collegeville, MN 1972). D. FLANA-GAN, The Theology of Mary (Hales Corners, WI 1978). F. M. JELLY, "Marian Dogmas within Vatican II's Hierarchy of Truths," Marian Studies 27 (1976) 17-40; G. F. KIRWIN, "Mary's Salvific Role Compared with That of the Church," Marian Studies 25 (1974) 29-43. T. A. KOEHLER, "Mary's Spiritual Maternity after the Second Vatican Council," Marian Studies 23 (1972) 39-68. J. A. R. MACKENZIE, "The Patristic Witness to the Virgin Mary as the New Eve," Marian Studies 29 (1978) 67–78. G. A. MALONEY, Mary: The Womb of God (Danville, NJ 1976). J. H. NEWMAN, The New Eve (Westminister, MD 1952). PAUL VI, Marialis cultus, apostolic exhortation, February 2, 1974, Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Rome 1974) 66 113-168; tr. Devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary (USCC Publ. Office, Washington, DC 1974). E. SCHILLEBEECKX, Mary, Mother of the Redemption, tr. N. D. SMITH (New York 1964). A. SCHME-MANN, "Our Lady and the Holy Spirit," Marian Studies 23 (1972) 69-78. F.M. JELLY, Madonna: Mary in the Catholic Tradition (Huntington, IN 1986). Ibid., "The Theological Context of and Introduction to Chapter 8 of Lumen Gentium," Marian Studies 37 (1986) 43-73. Mary: God's Yes to Man-John Paul's Encyclical "Redemptoris Mater." Introduction by J. CARDINAL RATZINGER, commentary by H. URS VON BALTHASAR, San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1988. F. M. JELLY, O.P. "Ecumenical Aspects of Redemptoris Mater." Marian Studies 39 (1988): 115-129. J. PELIKAN, Mary Through the Centuries: Her Place in the History of Culture (New Haven, CT 1996)

[E. R. CARROLL/F.M. JELLY/EDS.]

MARION-BRÉSILLAC, MELCHIOR MARIE JOSEPH DE

Founder of the Society of the AFRICAN MISSIONS; b. Castelnaudary (Aude), France, Dec. 2, 1813; d. Freetown, Sierra Leone, June 28, 1859. Born of penurious, pious, and intelligent former aristocrats, and educated at home until his 18th year, de Brésillac was ordained (1838) and worked in a parish until 1841, when he joined the PARIS FOREIGN MISSION SOCIETY (MEP). As a missionary in India (1842–54) he was disliked by other missionaries because of his advocacy of an indigenous CLERGY and his opposition to caste. He became superior of the seminary at Pondicherry (1844) and provicar apostolic (1845) and vicar apostolic (1850) of Coimbatore. The continued resistance to his policies led him to resign (1854) and to leave the MEP. His report to Rome, however, served as the basis for later changes in missionary policies. Bishop de Brésillac was attracted to the mission field in AFRICA and founded his own congregation at Lyons (1856). He was appointed vicar apostolic of Sierra Leone (1858) and journeyed to Africa (1859). He went first to Dakar and then to Freetown, where he insisted on going ashore despite a yellow fever epidemic. He and his four companions died within six weeks. His body was returned to Lyons. De Brésillac's ideals of a native priesthood and the adaptation of culture became the mainstay of his religious institute.

Bibliography: M. LE GALLEN, Vie de Mgr de Marion Brésillac (Lyons 1910). L. LELOIR, Marion de Brésillac (Namur 1939). M. J. BANE, Catholic Pioneers in West Africa (Dublin 1956). J. BONFILS, L'Oeuvre de Msgr. De Marion Brésilliac en faveur du clergé local dans les missions de l'Inde au XIXe siècle (Lyons 1959).

[J. M. TODD]

MARIST BROTHERS

Officially known as Marist Brothers of the Schools (FMS, Official Catholic Directory #0770), also called the Little Brothers of Mary, a pontifical congregation of lay religious of men; it was founded Jan. 2, 1817, near Lyons, France, by St. Marcellin CHAMPAGNAT for the Christian education of French youth. Champagnat, ordained in 1816, was relieved of his parochial duties in 1824, to spend all his time in furthering and guiding the work of the brothers. At the time of his death (1840), there were 280 brothers teaching about 7,000 pupils in 48 schools in France. In 1851, the French government approved the congregation, and in 1863, it was officially recognized and approved by Pius IX.

Champagnat himself was one of the first members of the Society of Mary, or MARIST FATHERS, and he originally envisioned a single congregation of priests and brothers under one superior. This union never materialized, since the Holy See judged that the size and diversity of purpose of the two congregations would make such a union impractical. In the course of their history, the Marist Brothers have absorbed several other congregations of brothers: in 1842 the Brothers of Saint-Paul-Trois-Châteaux in France; in 1844 the Brothers of Christian Instruction of Viviers, France; in 1956 the Brothers of St. Peter Claver, a congregation composed entirely of native Nigerians; and in 1959 the Brothers of St. Francis Regis, in Canada and France.

In the United States, the Marist Brothers have operated schools since 1886, when Canada and the United States formed a single province. In 1911 the United States became an independent province, which was divided into two (Esopus and Poughkeepsie) in 1959. The brothers provide Christian education to students on the primary, secondary, college, and university levels. They maintain academic, vocational, technical, and agricultural schools. The congregation is governed from the motherhouse in Rome.

Bibliography: J. COSTE and G. LESSARD, Origines Maristes, 1786–1836, 4 v. (Rome 1960–61). M. COTÉ, The Historical Growth and Development of the Marist Brothers in the United States (Poughkeepsie, N.Y. 1961).

[L. A. VOEGTLE/EDS.]

MARIST FATHERS

The Society of Mary (SM, Official Catholic Directory #0780), whose members are known as Marists, is distinct from another congregation of the same title, the members of which are called Marianists, although both societies began in France at about the same time.

History. The founders of the Marists were Jean Claude Courveille and Jean Claude Marie COLIN. The idea of the society and its initial propagation are credited to Courveille. He was born at Usson-en-Forez in the Diocese of Le Puy on May 15, 1787 and became as a child very devoted to the Blessed Virgin Mary. In 1812 he felt convinced that Mary wanted to help the Church, in great need at that time, through a congregation especially dedicated to her and bearing her name, the Society of Mary. During his last year of theology at the major seminary of Lyons, he discussed this project with other seminarians there. In 1816 seven priests, on the day after ordination, and four seminarians consecrated themselves to Mary and pledged themselves to the founding of her society. Only four of these ever became Marists. Courveille himself remained for ten years the reputed leader and filled what might be called, in modern terms, the role of a public relations expert. He finally disappeared from Marist history in 1826, and he was eventually received by the Benedictines at the Abbey of SOLESMES, where he died in 1866.

Colin, one of the 11 who had promised to work for the foundation of the society, was also ordained in 1816. Overcoming the hesitancy and timidity that had characterized him during his seminary days, he became a truly apostolic man while assisting his brother who was pastor of Cerdon, a small village east of Lyons. During this time he was able to put into writing the basic ideas of the constitutions for the priests, sisters, and secular third order of the society. After having written twice to Rome, he received the initial approval on March 9, 1822, which was addressed to Courveille at Cerdon. In 1836, upon Colin's acceptance of the Oceania missions, the Society of Mary was given final approval by Rome. The first missionaries left for the South Seas that same year. During his generalate (1836-54), Colin sent 74 priests to Oceania and began new establishments in France, chief among which were residences for home missionaries and educational institutions.

During the administration of Julien Favre (1854–84), the society grew to 512 members and began its foundations in the United States. Under his successor, Antoine Martin (1885–1905), the congregation established itself in Spain, Italy, and Belgium. Martin also opened houses of formation outside of France.

At first Colin had tried to obtain approval for a single, four-branched society, composed of priests, brothers, religious sisters, and a third order. A series of refusals from Rome, however, forced him to surrender this idea of one multiple family. Colin's original concept has since developed in the form of four independent congregations: the Marist Fathers (aided by Marist lay brothers), the MARIST BROTHERS, the MARIST SISTERS, and the MARIST MISSIONARY SISTERS. The Marist Third Order, is also attached to the Marist Fathers. These are united by one common spirit and are appropriately designated today as the Marist Family.

Spirit and apostolate. The particular spirit that unites and characterizes the members of the society is the spirit of Mary. Through meditating upon her personality as presented in the Gospels and through a prayerful union with her now reigning with her Son, the Marists attempt to bring that spirit into their lives and works. Another point of reference for the development of this spirit is an intuition of their founder, according to which he was conscious of the obstacle to the religious life created by selfseeking and by an apostolate that is not oriented to the spreading of God's kingdom. These thoughts of the founder serve as guidelines to the society's tradition, as it tries to adapt itself to the ever new needs of the Church. The Marist constitutions recount the purpose of the congregation, the means to attain that goal, and a description of the spirit. The subsequent chapters describe the training of the religious, the works of the apostolate they engage in, the rules of government, and the virtues vital to the existence of the congregation.

The society engages in parish work, high school teaching, catechetics, youth ministries, retreats, spiritual direction, and chaplaincies. In the United States, where the society first arrived in 1863, there are three provinces: Boston (1924), Washington, D.C. (1924) and San Francisco (1962).

Bibliography: J. COSTE, The Spirit of the Society, tr. S. FAGAN (Rome 1963). J. COSTE and G. LESSARD, eds., Origines maristes, 4 v. (Rome 1960—). N. WEBER and J. L. WHITE, The Marists: A History (privately printed; Washington 1959).

[J. L. WHITE/EDS.]

MARIST MISSIONARY SISTERS

Also know as Missionary Sisters of the Society of Mary (SMSM, Official Catholic Directory #2420), was founded in 1845 at Saint-Brieuc, France, as the first society of women formed solely for the apostolate in foreign missions. The first missionaries departed for the South Sea Islands in 1845 and 1857. The sisters have maintained a significant presence in the Southwest Pacific, devoting their efforts to catechetical, medical, educational, and social service work. The generalate is in Rome, the U.S. provincialate in Waltham, Mass.

[M. A. KERBY/EDS.]

MARIST SISTERS

Popular name for the Sisters of the Congregation of Mary (SM, Official Catholic Directory #2430), a religious congregation founded in 1817 in Cerdon (Ain), France, by Jean Claude COLIN and Jeanne Marie Chavoin (Mother St. Joseph), who acted as superior general (1824–53). The Holy See approved the institute in 1884 and the revised constitutions in 1958. The sisters engage mainly in educational and catechetical work, pastoral ministry, counseling, youth ministry and social outreach. The sisters arrived in the United States in 1956, opening a school in Dearborn, Mich. The generalate is in Rome; the U.S. provincialate is in Abilene, TX.

Bibliography: L. DE ROUVRAY, Origines et histoire des religieuses Maristes (Paris 1951). E. LEONARD, Enriching Many: Jeanne-Marie Chavoin (London 1956).

[S. W. HOSIE/EDS.]

MARITAIN, JACQUES

French Catholic philosopher; b. Paris, Nov. 18, 1882; d. Toulouse, April 28, 1973. Maritain was one of the great Catholic thinkers of the 20th century, and a leading figure in the revival of Thomism within both Catholic philosophical tradition and the public sphere. He was the author of some 70 books, among them the widely read and influential The Degrees of Knowledge, Integral Humanism, The Person and the Common Good, Man and the State, Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry, The Range of Reason, Approaches to God, Education at the Crossroads, and The Peasant of the Garonne. Pope Paul VI, long a student of his work, presented his "Message to the Men of Thought and of Science" to Maritain at the close of Vatican II.

Life. Maritain was the son of Paul Maritain, a lawyer, and Geneviève Favre, daughter of Jules Favre (one of the founders of the Third French Republic). He was raised in a progressive Protestant environment, and received his education at the Lycée Henri IV (1898–99) and at the Sorbonne, where he prepared a licence in philosophy (1900–01) and in the natural sciences (1901–02). Initially interested in the philosophy of Spinoza, he soon fell under the spell of teachers convinced that science alone could provide the answers to all questions of the human condition.

Jacques Maritain, 1948. (AP/Wide World Photos)

At the Sorbonne, Maritain met a young Russian Jewish student, Raïssa Oumansoff (see MARITAIN, RAÏSSA OU-MANSOFF), who was to share his life and his quest for truth. (Over 50 years later, in 1954, Jacques wrote: "The aid and the inspiration of my beloved Raïssa have penetrated all my life and all my work. If there is something good in that which I have done, it is to her, after God, that I owe it.") Jacques and Raïssa became engaged in 1902. Shortly thereafter, because the scientism of their teachers had left them with a profound sense of the meaninglessness of life, they went through a period of depression. At the urging of a friend, Charles Péguy, Jacques and Raïssa attended the lectures of Henri Bergson at the Collège de France (1903-04); Bergson's philosophy offered an alternative to scientific materialism and, for a time, Jacques was attracted by bergsonisme. In 1904 Jacques and Raïssa married and, through the influence of another friend, Léon Bloy, were received into the Catholic church on June 11, 1906. A few months later, in August, the Maritains moved to Heidelberg, where Jacques studied biology under Hans Driesch (1906–08).

In 1908, Jacques and Raïssa, together with Raïssa's sister Véra, returned to France. Véra was to live with the Maritains continuously until her death. Within a few months, at the suggestion of Raïssa, Jacques began to read some of the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas; Raïssa had, during a period of convalescence, herself been introduced to St. Thomas's works by Father Humbert Clérissac, a Dominican. Jacques described the effect of reading St. Thomas's Summa Theologiae as a "luminous flood," and definitively abandoned bergsonisme.

In 1912, Maritain began teaching at the Lycée Stanislaus. In his early philosophical work (e.g., "La science moderne et la raison," 1910, and La philosophie bergsonienne, 1913), he sought to defend Thomistic philosophy from its Bergsonian and secular opponents. He was soon named Assistant Professor at the Institut Catholique de Paris (attached to the Chair of the History of Modern Philosophy), became full Professor in 1921 and, in 1928, was appointed to the Chair of Logic and Cosmology, which he held until 1939.

Beginning in the mid-1920s, Maritain developed a strong interest in applying philosophy to social concerns. Initially attracted by the social movement L'ACTION FRANÇAISE, he left it when it was condemned by the Catholic Church. Maritain's ideas were especially influential in Latin America and, largely as a result of the character of his political philosophy, he came under attack from both the left and the right, in France and abroad. Lectures in Latin America in 1936 led to him being named as a corresponding member of the Brazilian Academy of Letters, but also to being the object of a campaign of vilification.

Beginning in December 1932, Maritain travelled annually to North America, often to teach in Toronto at the Institute (later, the Pontifical Institute) of Mediaeval Studies. Following his lectures in Toronto at the beginning of 1940, he moved to the United States and, by June, decided to stay. During the Second World War, he taught at Princeton (1941–42) and at Columbia University (1941–44). He was instrumental in the establishment of a French university in exile in New York—the École Libre des Hautes Études—and active in the war effort, recording broadcasts destined for occupied France.

In December 1944, Maritain was named French ambassador to the Vatican, and was involved in discussions that led to the drafting of the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Upon the completion of his appointment in 1948, Maritain returned to Princeton as professor emeritus where he lectured annually on topics in moral and political philosophy, though in the summers he frequently returned to France to give short courses in philosophy—notably at L'Eau vive. A few months following Véra's death, on January 1, 1960, Jacques and Raïssa returned to France. But Raïssa herself soon fell ill, and died on November 4, 1960. Jacques moved to Toulouse, to live with a religious order, the Little Brothers of Jesus. He had long loved the Little Brothers, who pursued an essentially contemplative life in the very midst of the world and "at the core of the masses"; he had attended their Mass of foundation in the Basilica of Sacré-Coeur in 1933, and from the beginning had a great influence on their intellectual and spiritual formation. It was in this "fraternity" in Toulouse that Maritain wrote his celebrated and controversial book The Peasant of the Garonne on what he considered to be some of the confusions in the post-Vatican II world. He completed several other books— God and the Permission of Evil, On the Grace and Humanity of Jesus, and On the Church of Christ: The Person of the Church and Her Personnel. In 1970, he petitioned to join the order, and died in Toulouse on April 28, 1973. He is buried alongside Raïssa in Kolbsheim, Alsace, France.

Works and Thought. In his many books, articles, and lectures, Maritain developed and deepened the classical doctrines of Thomistic philosophy. He insisted that Catholic philosophers had to do more than merely repeat St. Thomas's views, and his own efforts to engage problems raised by contemporary philosophy and culture often presented St. Thomas's insights in a highly original way. While the most profound inspiration of many of Maritain's ideas was the work of St. Thomas, his epistemology and aesthetics show other influences as well, particularly that of St. JOHN OF THE CROSS. Maritain never swerved from his conviction that in St. Thomas's thought are to be found the principles of a realistic and existential metaphysics and the bases of a political and ethical philosophy that does justice to the dignity of human beings and their relationship with God.

Throughout his work, Maritain repeatedly called attention to there being in every aspect of modern culture art, poetry, science, philosophy, and even in the spiritual life—a prise de conscience, a growth in self-awareness. He saw this striving for autonomy and a fuller identity as a characteristic feature of the modern age; at the same time, he deplored the loss of the sense of being and of love in modern life. Although Maritain consistently made trenchant criticisms of modern culture (e.g., in Antimoderne, 1922), he recognized and placed even greater emphasis on its positive contributions. The task ahead for Christian philosophers of the future, as he envisioned it, was to become aware of their mission, their resources, and their methodology, and the importance of restoring a philosophy of being and a social and political philosophy that is open to the evangelical message of love.

Moral, Social, Political Philosophy. In Moral Philosophy, Maritain turned to the great moral philosophers of the past and assessed the problems they considered fundamental in ethics. In his Neuf leçons sur la philosophie morale and his posthumously published La loi natu- relle ou loi non-ecrite (lectures given, in 1949 and 1950 at L'Eau vive, and which, together, would have been the basis for the projected second volume of Moral Philosophy), Maritain provided a positive account of a moral theory, based on natural law, that is both truly philosophical and yet wholly consistent with the Christian tradition.

In Integral Humanism, Maritain provided a charter for a Christian social philosophy. Starting with the concrete situation of human beings before their destiny, Maritain envisaged a form of civilization that would be characterized by an integral HUMANISM, theocentric as opposed to anthropocentric, and that would strive toward the ideal of true community by showing respect for human dignity and human rights. In this and other works (Freedom and the Modern World, Christianity and Democracy, The Rights of Man and the Natural Law), Maritain called for a Christian humanism to achieve the goal of a New Christendom. In Man and the State, he redefined basic political concepts—e.g., body politic, state, the people, and sovereignty—and defended democratic principles and institutions for all nations. To show that certain basic rights are recognized by all, he pointed to the general agreement on those rights found in the 1948 United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Maritain recognized the rights of workers as well as those of the human and the civic person.

Throughout Maritain's ethics and social and political philosophy runs the leitmotiv of FREEDOM. By "freedom" he does not mean license, but the full development of the human person in accord with his or her nature specifically, the achievement of moral and spiritual perfection which is a "common good." In works such as The Person and the Common Good, Maritain importantly distinguishes between the human being as an individual and as a PERSON. Human beings are individuals so far as they are part of a material, social order, and have responsibilities to it. Yet, because they are part of a spiritual order, they are also persons. The person is a whole, has dignity, "must be treated as an end," and has a transcendent destiny. Maritain's PERSONALISM is a via media between individualism and collectivism, and has been influential in the writings of Edith Stein (Blessed Teresa Benedicta) and Karol Wojtyła (Pope JOHN PAUL II).

Knowledge. Since the movement of humanity is, Maritain says, towards freedom, it is no surprise that the primary goal of education is the conquest of interior freedom (Education at the Crossroads). Such freedom is one of fulfillment and expansion and is analogous to that enjoyed by those united to God in the BEATIFIC VISION. For Maritain, the pursuit of the highest freedom and of the highest contemplation are but two aspects of the same quest (Confession de foi). This search after wisdom and freedom are the goals of his.

In The Degrees of Knowledge Maritain surveyed a wide range of issues in order to show the diversity and essential compatibility of the various areas of knowledge, from science and philosophy to religious faith and mysticism. He argued that there were different orders of knowledge and, within them, different degrees determined by the nature of the object to be known and the "degree of abstraction" involved. Yet all are organically related. Maritain called his own view "critical realism," and maintained that, despite the differences among them, KANTIANISM, IDEALISM, PRAGMATISM, and POSITIVISM all reflected the influence of NOMINALISM—that universal notions are creations of the human mind and have no foundation in reality.

Throughout his writings on theoretical philosophy, and particularly in A Preface to Metaphysics and Existence and the Existent, there is an emphasis on the existential character of a realistic philosophy of being; in Maritain's view, knowledge as well as love is immersed in existence.

Like St. Thomas, Maritain held that there was no conflict between faith and true reason, that religious belief was open to rational discussion, and that the existence of God and certain fundamental religious beliefs could be philosophically demonstrated. There are many ways for human beings to approach God, Maritain says, but in Approaches to God he insisted on the importance of restating the five ways of St. Thomas for the modern mind and of discovering new approaches based on poetic and other concrete experiences. In addition to developing a 'sixth way,' Maritain argued that human beings also have a prephilosophical knowledge or intuition of God that, while rational, cannot be expressed in words.

Art and Poetry. In the areas of art and poetry, on which he reflected over his lifetime, Maritain's major work is undoubtedly Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry. Here, he sought to shed light on the "mysterious nature of poetry" and on the process of creativity with its sources in "the spiritual unconscious." In this book, and in Art and Scholasticism, Maritain drew frequently on the artistic and poetic opinions of Raïssa, herself an artist and poet.

Influence. At the time of his death, Maritain was likely the best-known Catholic philosopher in the world. The breadth of his philosophical work, his influence on the social teachings of the Catholic Church, and his ardent defenses of human rights made him one of the central figures of his times.

Maritain's philosophy is marked by a deeply religious impulse and on occasion takes on a theological and even contemplative dimension. His calling, as Yves

Simon pointed out, is that of the Christian philosopher who examines philosophical issues without losing sight of their relation to faith and theology. Maritain was "scarcely enchanted" by the expression "Christian philosophy," but accepted the notion as legitimate so far as it indicates a philosophy that exists in a climate of explicit faith. Nevertheless—and this is a point Maritain himself stressed in his later works—his own work is philosophical, not theological; it pursues philosophical ends by means of strictly philosophical methods. His work is intended to bear witness on behalf of the autonomy of philosophy and to investigate "the mystery of created existence." At the same time, he says, philosophy cannot be isolated from concrete life and faith. It achieves its goals only when totally united to every source of light and experience in the human mind. Only a Christian philosophy that conceives and pursues such an ideal is capable of "ransoming the time and of redeeming every human search after truth."

Maritain's philosophical work has been translated into some twenty languages. Its popularity was due, in part, to it being written for a general, rather than an academic, audience. Some of Maritain's writings are polemical and, because his concern was often to address very specific issues of his time, they occasionally have a rather dated tone. In his own time, controversy swirled around the following topics in particular: the distinction between personality and individuality in relation to the common good (e.g., Charles de Koninck), the empiriological vs. ontological distinction within the first degree of abstraction (see PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE), the independence of moral philosophy from theology, and the notion of Christian philosophy itself (e.g., Étienne GILSON). Other topics to which Maritain made valuable contributions include authority and freedom in a pluralistic society, the nature and exercise of free will, the existential intuition of subjectivity, the intentional being of love, and the analogy of being and its perfections—which Maritain saw as a principle operating in the most diverse regions of reality and thought. He himself hoped that he made some contribution to a deeper understanding of the mystery of evil (God and the Permission of Evil).

Nevertheless, it is not easy to place Maritain's thought within the history of philosophy in the 20th century. Clearly, the impact of his work was strongest in those countries where Catholicism was influential. Although his political philosophy led him, at least in his time, to be considered a liberal and even a social democrat, he eschewed socialism and, in The Peasant of the Garonne, was an early critic of many of the religious reforms that followed the Second Vatican Council. He is therefore often considered by contemporary liberals as too conservative, and by many conservatives as too liberal. Again, though generally considered to be a Thomist, according to Gilson, Maritain's "Thomism" was really an EPISTEMOLOGY and, hence, not a real Thomism at all.

Since 1958, the Jacques Maritain Center has operated at the University of Notre Dame in the United States; the Cercle d'Études Jacques et Raïssa Maritain, in Kolbsheim, France, also holds an extensive collection of manuscripts, and has been active in producing both books and articles on Maritain's work and the Oeuvres complètes de Jacques et Raïssa Maritain, 15 vols. (Fribourg, Switzerland: Éditions universitaires, 1982-95). There are several academic journals devoted to Maritain's work, such as Études maritainiennes/Maritain Studies, the Cahiers Jacques Maritain (edited by the Cercle d'Études in Kolbsheim), and Notes et documents (in international and in Brasilian editions). In addition to the Institut International Jacques Maritain (Rome), there are currently some twenty national associations which meet regularly to discuss Maritain's work. The continuity of interest in Maritain's thought in the English-speaking world has led to the publication of a 20-volume set, in English, of The Collected Works of Jacques Maritain under auspices of the University of Notre Dame Press.

Bibliography: The most comprehensive list of books and articles on Maritain's philosophy and life is found in J.-L. ALLARD and P. GERMAIN, Répertoire bibliographique sur la vie et l'oeuvre de Jacques et Raïssa Maritain (Ottawa, 1994). The Achievement of Jacques and Raïssa Maritain: A Bibliography, 1906–1961 (Garden City, N.Y. 1962), by D. and I. GALLAGHER, also lists approximately 1,600 items by and about the Maritains in many languages. An exhaustive list of the various editions of Maritain's writings and of their translations is being compiled in occasional supplementary volumes of the Cahiers Jacques Maritain. Principal Works. Bergsonian Philosophy and Thomism, tr. M. L. and J. G. ANDISON (New York 1955); Art and Scholasticism and The Frontiers of Poetry, tr. J. W. EVANS (New York 1962); Distinguish to Unite, or The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN (New York 1959); An Essay on Christian Philosophy, tr. E. FLANNERY (New York 1955); A Preface to Metaphysics: Seven Lectures on Being (New York 1939); Philosophy of Nature, tr. I. C. BYRNE (New York 1951); Integral Humanism: Temporal and Spiritual Problems of a New Christendom, tr. J. W. EVANS (New York 1968); Education at the Crossroads (New Haven 1943); Existence and the Existent, tr. L. GALANTIÈRE and G. B. PHELAN (New York 1948); The Person and the Common Good, tr. J. J. FITZGERALD (New York 1947); The Range of Reason (New York 1952); Man and the State (Chicago 1951); An Introduction to Basic Problems of Moral Philosophy (Albany, N.Y. 1990); Approaches to God, tr. P. O'REILLY (New York 1954); Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry (New York 1953); On the Philosophy of History (New York 1957, London 1959); Moral Philosophy: An Historical and Crtical Survey of the Great Systems, tr. M. SUTHER et al. (New York 1964); The Peasant of the Garonne, tr. M. CUDDIHY and E. HUGHES (New York 1968); Lectures on Natural Law, tr. W. SWEET (Notre Dame 2002).

[D. A. GALLAGHER/J. W. EVANS/W. SWEET]

MARITAIN, RAÏSSA OUMANSOFF

Author; b. Rostov on the Don, Russia, Sept. 12, 1883; d. Paris, Nov. 4, 1960. To escape persecution of the Jews, the Oumansoff family left Russia for Paris, where Raïssa studied at the Sorbonne. She married Jacques Maritain in 1904, was converted to Catholicism in 1906 under the influence of Léon BLOY, and with her husband played an important role in the French Catholic revival. Both in France and in the U.S. (since 1940) she shared Jacques Maritain's lifelong labor to make known to the 20th century the wisdom of St. THOMAS AQUINAS. Her works include four volumes of poetry; her memoirs, We Have Been Friends Together (New York 1942) and Adventures in Grace (New York 1945); several books with Jacques Maritain, notably The Situation of Poetry (New York 1955); and (posthumously) Notes on the Lord's Prayer (New York 1964) and Journal de Raïssa (Paris 1963).

Bibliography: D. A. and I. J. GALLAGHER, The Achievement of Jacques and Raïssa Maritain: A Bibliography, 1906–1961 (Garden City, N.Y. 1962).

[I. J. GALLAGHER]

MARIUS MERCATOR

Fifth-century Latin polemicist; b. probably Africa; d. probably Thrace, after 431. Marius Mercator, known only through his writings and translations, was a friend of St. AUGUSTINE, to whom he sent, apparently from Rome, two anti-Pelagian tracts (now lost) in 418. He seems to have visited Constantinople and joined a Latin community of monks in Thrace. During the Nestorian troubles in 431 he composed another work against PELA-GIUS and supplied his monks with several tracts and translations in reference to both Pelagianism and NESTO-RIANISM. His theological knowledge reflects that of St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA and St. Augustine, and his contribution consisted in making Augustine's position known in the East while supplying the West with translations of Nestorius's sermons. His known writings are preserved in the so-called Collectio Palatina (ed. E. Schwartz, Act-ConOec 1.5:5–70), published by a Scythian monk after 533. They include the Commonitorium super nomine Caelestii (Greek version 429, Latin 431); Commonitorium contra Pelagium, Caelestium et Julianum; the translations of four anti-Pelagian sermons of Nestorius together with the latter's Letter to Caelestius; the Refutatio symboli Theodori Mopsuestii; the Comparatio dogmatum Pauli Samosateni et Nestorii; and translations of five sermons of Nestorius on the THEOTOKOS and of excerpts made by St. Cyril from the writings of Nestorius.

Bibliography: K. BAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7:89. W. ELTESTER, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der Klassischen Alter- tumswissenschaft 14.2 (1930) 1831–35. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 9.2:2481–85. Altaner 534–535. A. LEPKA, "L'Originalité des répliques de Marius Mercator à Julien d'Éclane," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 27 (1931) 572–579. S. PRETE, Mario Mercatore (Turin 1958).

[F. X. MURPHY]

MARIUS OF AVENCHES, ST.

Chronicler and bishop of Avenches from 574; b. Autun, 530-31; d. there, Dec. 31, 594. As bishop he transferred the episcopal see from Avenches to Lausanne, Switzerland. Marius's Chronicle of the years 455–581, a continuation of the work of PROSPER OF AQUITAINE, reported important contemporary events in Italy and the Orient and is especially valuable for its account of Burgundian affairs after 533-534, which it uniquely transmits. Books 2-4 of GREGORY OF TOURS's Historia Francorum show striking textual similarities with Marius's Chronicle, indicating their dependence on common sources (Burgundian annals). He was thoroughly Roman in his culture and, despite contemporary barbarian rule, was convinced that the Roman Empire, "the fourth empire of Daniel," would continue till the end of time. He was buried at Lausanne, where the church first consecrated to St. Thyrsius was renamed for him. His cult was approved in 1605.

Feast: Dec. 31; Feb. 9 (Basel); Feb. 12 (Lausanne).

Bibliography: M. BOUQUET, Recueil des historiens des Gaules et de la France (Rerum gallicarum et francicarum scriptores), 24 v. (Paris 1738–1904) 2:12–19. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 82:21–25. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores antiquissimi (Berlin 1826–) 11:227–239. G. J. J. MONOD, Études critiques sur les sources de l'histoire mérovingienne, 2 v. (Paris 1872–85) 1:147–163. J. FAVROD, tr. La Chronique de Marius d'Avenches (Lausanne 1991). L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (2d ed. Paris 1970–15). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10:2167–77. É. BROUETTE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) (1966) 7:88.

[B. D. HILL]

MARIUS VICTORINUS

Roman rhetorician, whose conversion to Christianity influenced St. Augustine; b. Caius Marius Victorinus (the surname "Afer" seems to be a Renaissance addition) c. the end of the third century; d. after 363. He had published many works on grammar and rhetoric, as well as translations of Aristotle's tracts on logic and Neoplatonic books before his conversion (c. 354).

In his Confessions (bk. 8), Augustine gives a moving account of the intellectual evolution and conversion of Victorinus, based on information he received from the priest Simplician. Between 357 and 363, in his old age, Victorinus composed several theological essays in refutation of ARIANISM. He opposed successively the Anomoean doctrine of Ursacius and Valens expressed in the symbol of Sirmium (357); the Homoiousian doctrine of Basil of Ancyra, expressed in a memoir published during the summer of 358 at Sirmium; and finally the Homoean doctrine of the Credo of Sirmium (May 22, 359) and Rimini (July–November 359).

Together with the traditional theological arguments against Arianism, Victorinus employed Neoplatonic notions probably taken from Porphyry to present a systematic explanation of the Trinity. The Father is identified with the first Neoplatonic hypostasis wherein, according to Porphyry, the One and Being is the first term of the triad Being-Life-Thought. The Son is identified with the second hypostasis, which, according to the Porphyrian schema, is constituted by the dyad Life-Thought. In this dyad, Life is identified with Christ, and Thought with the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit leads toward the Father, through a process of conversion, those souls to whom Christ has given life in a movement of emanation and procession.

The Holy Spirit is "of the Father" in the Son, although Victorinus does not have a real theory concerning His procession. The consubstantiality of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit is assured in two ways; originally the Son and the Holy Spirit were identified with the Father in the same fashion as Life and Thought preexist in the state of potency in the core of Being. At the same time the three divine hypostases, Being, Life, and Thought, are mutually identified—the three are in the three, and are distinguished only by a predominance of particular aspects in the total Being.

This attempt at a systematic explanation of the Trinity had no influence on the history of theology. St. Augustine either was unaware of its existence or ignored it. However, there are traces of it in ALCUIN. In fact, Victorinus's synthesis oscillates between SUBORDINATIONISM (the Son is a second hypostasis inferior to the Father) and MODALISM (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are distinguished only by predominance).

Victorinus composed the first Latin commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul: Galatians, Philippians, and Ephesians. In referring to Victorinus as "an Augustine before Augustine," Harnack had in mind particularly his doctrine on predestination, which has received considerable attention in recent studies.

Bibliography: MARIUS VICTORINUS, Traités théologiques sur la Trinité, ed. P. HENRY, tr. P. HADOT, 2 v. (Sources Chrétiennes 68, 69; 1960). P. SÉJOURNÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique

15.2:2887–2954. P. MONCEAUX, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, 7 v. (Paris 1901–23) 3: 377–422. E. BENZ, Marius Victorinus (Stuttgart 1932). A. SOUTER, The Earliest Latin Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul (Oxford 1927). R. SCHMID, Marius Victorinus Rhetor und seine Beziehungen zu Augustin (Kiel 1895). P. HADOT, "Marius Victorinus et Alcuin," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 29 (1954) 5–19; "Les Hymnes de Victorinus." ibid., 35 (1960) 7–16; "L'Image de la Trinité dans l'éme," Studia Patristica 6 (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 81; 1962) 409–442. G. HUBER, Das Sein und das Absolute (Basel 1955).

[P. HADOT]

MARK, EVANGELIST, ST.

There is no reason to doubt that the Mark or John Mark mentioned in the NT is the same person to whom the tradition, following PAPIAS OF HIERAPOLIS, ascribed the authorship of the second Gospel (see MARK, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO). For knowledge of Mark, except for the statement of Papias, one is completely dependent on the NT. Mark was a member of the first Christian community in Jerusalem. His mother, Mary, owned a house in Jerusalem, which the Christians used as a place of prayer during Peter's imprisonment under Herod AGRIPPA I (Acts 12.12). When Paul and Barnabas returned from their visit to Jerusalem (11.30), they took Mark back with them to Antioch in Syria (12.25). Later they brought him along as their ὑπηρέτης (servant or assistant) on their first missionary journey from Antioch (13.5). However, after he had accompanied the Apostles through Cyprus, Mark chose to leave them rather than continue on to the mainland of Asia Minor (13.13). Luke offers no explanation for Mark's departure, but the fact that he returned to Jerusalem, not Antioch, suggests homesickness. He is mentioned later in Acts as again in Antioch and the subject of dispute between Paul and Barnabas as they made their preparations for a return journey to the churches they founded in Asia Minor; Barnabas, Mark's cousin (Col 4.10), was sympathetic to him, but Paul would not hear of his again accompanying them (Acts 15.36–38). The disagreement ended in the separation of Paul and Barnabas. Mark accompanied Barnabas by ship to Cyprus, while Paul took an overland route with another companion (15.39-40). Eventually, Mark redeemed himself in the eyes of Paul, and the Apostle became dependent upon him during one of his imprisonments (Col 4.10; Phlm 24). Writing to Timothy during his final Roman imprisonment, Paul asked for Mark's assistance (2 Tm 4.11). The reference in 1 Pt 5.13 to Mark as "my son" indicates that he was an associate also of St. Peter.

In Christian iconography medieval artistic representations of Mark as an EVANGELIST depict him with his Gospel and frequently, though not always, as having a winged lion as a distinguishing feature. The image of the lion seems to be derived from Mark's description of John the Baptist as "a voice crying in the desert" (Mk 1.3), which artistic tradition came to compare to a roaring lion. The wings come from the application of Ezekiel's vision of the four winged "living creatures" to the four Evangelists. Following the datum of 1 Pt 5.13, artists sometimes associate Mark with St. Peter. Other representations of Mark follow the legends of his association with Alexandria. According to these legends he was bishop of Alexandria, cured a shoemaker there, and suffered martyrdom in the streets of the city.

Scene from the legend of St. Mark, detail of the 13th-century mosaics in the vaults of S. Marco, Venice.

Feast: April 25.

See Also: PAUL, APOSTLE, ST.

Bibliography: H. B. SWETE, ed., The Gospel according to St. Mark (London 1920) xiii–xxviii. V. TAYLOR, ed., The Gospel according to St. Mark (London 1952) 27–31. C. E. B. CRANFIELD, ed., The Gospel according to Saint Mark (Cambridge, Eng. 1959) 5–6. J. SCHMID, ed. and tr., Das Evangelium nach Markus (3d ed. Regensburg 1954) 6–7. J. BLINZLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:12–13.

[C. P. CEROKE]

MARK, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO

Background

Questions concerning the authorship, date, place of composition, audience, and purpose of Mark's Gospel continue to receive a variety of answers from contemporary scholars. The shortest of the three Synoptic Gospels (661 verses as compared to 1,068 in Mt and 1,149 in Lk), the Gospel of Mark was probably the first of the three to be written, and Matthew and Luke made use of it as a major source in composing their own Gospels.

Authorship. Although the Gospel is attributed to "Mark," the author of the Gospel never explicitly identifies himself. The superscriptions or titles of the Four Gospels ("According to Matthew," "According to Mark,") come from the late 1st, or early 2d, century when it became necessary to distinguish one Gospel from another. Eusebius (263–339), however, preserves an important quotation from Papias, a 2d century bishop of Hieropolis in Asia Minor, that identifies Mark as the author of the Gospel and associates him with Peter. In this text, Papias relates a quotation from someone called the PRESBYTER.

This, too, the presbyter used to say. "Mark, who had been Peter's interpreter, wrote down carefully, but not in order, all that he remembered of the Lord's sayings and doings. For he had not heard the Lord or been one of His followers, but later, as I said, one of Peter's. Peter used to adapt his teaching to the occasion, without making a systematic arrangement of the Lord's sayings, so that Mark was quite justified in writing down some things just as he remembered them. For he had one purpose only—to leave out nothing that he had heard, and to make no misstatement about it." Ecclesiastical History (3, 39, 15)

Manuscript illumination of Saint Mark inspired from the "Gospel Book of Ebbo" (©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

This text is difficult to interpret since it is not clear if the entire quotation is from the Presbyter. Part of this quotation may represent Papias's commentary on the Presbyter's words. If this is so, where does the quotation from the Presbyter end and the commentary of Papias begin? Moreover, the statement that Mark was Peter's interpreter (hermeneutes Petrou) can have a number of meanings ranging from translator to some kind of authorship. Nonetheless, this text stands at the origin of a constant tradition that relates the author of this Gospel to Peter and thus anchors the Gospel in the witness of an apostolic figure. For example, Justin Martyr speaks of Peter's memories (en tois apomnemoneumasin autou; Dialogue with Trypho, 106, 3), probably referring to Mark's Gospel. Irenaeus says that Mark, "the disciple and interpreter of Peter' (ho mathetes kai hermeneutes) wrote after the deaths of Peter and Paul (Against Heresies, 3.1.1). An ancient Latin prologue to the Gospel says that Mark was Peter's interpreter (Iste interpres fuit Petri) and that he wrote in the regions of Italy after the death of Peter. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, on the other hand, says that Mark, a companion of Peter, wrote during Peter's lifetime at the urging of the people of Rome where Peter preached (Ecclesiastical History, 6, 14, 6–7). Origen maintains that the Gospel of Mark was written by Mark as Peter instructed him (Ecclesiastical History, 6, 25, 5), and Jerome says that "the interpreter of the Apostle Peter" (Interpres apostoli Petri) was the first bishop of Alexandria (Commentary on Matthew, Prooemium, 6). Who, however, was this person called Mark?

The ACTS OF THE APOSTLES speaks of "John Mark," the cousin of Barabbas (12.12,25; 13.5; 15.37–39) and several of the Pauline letters mention someone named "Mark" (Col 4.10, Phlm 24; 2 Tm 4.11). In 1 Pt 5.13, "Peter" speaks of Mark as his son (though some scholars question the Petrine authorship of this letter). Although there is no conclusive evidence that the person mentioned in these writings was the author of the second Gospel, early tradition identified this "Mark" or "John Mark" as the evangelist who composed the Gospel.

Place and Date. In light of the tradition noted above, most scholars argue that the Gospel was written in Rome. Others, however, maintain that it originated in Galilee, Syria, or Asia Minor. Although the exact date of the Gospel is disputed, there is general agreement that it belongs to the period of the Jewish revolt against Rome, A.D. 66–70. The point of contention is whether the Gospel was composed before or after A.D. 70, when the Romans entered Jerusalem and destroyed its temple. The answer to this problem, which cannot be resolved with certainty, depends upon the interpretation of Jesus' final discourse (Mark 13), in which He prophesies the temple's destruction (13.2, 14). While some believe that this chapter indicates that the temple was already destroyed at the time that the Gospel was composed, others do not. Thus it may more prudent to give the Gospel an approximate date of A.D. 70, acknowledging that it may have been written shortly before, or after, the Romans destroyed Jerusalem and its temple.

Audience. Most scholars believe that Mark wrote for a Gentile audience since the evangelist explains Jewish customs (7.3–4), and makes an important side comment that Jesus declared all foods clean (7.19). This comment, which comes from the evangelist and is omitted by Matthew, suggests that the audience of this Gospel did not observe the Jewish dietary prescriptions. Moreover, the fact that a Gentile, a Roman centurion, makes the most important confession of the Gospel (that Jesus was truly the Son of God; 15.39) may also suggest a Gentile audience.

Purpose. The purpose of the Gospel is to announce, in narrative form, the gospel of Jesus Christ: what God accomplished in the ministry, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ (1.1). If the Gospel was written in Rome for a Gentile community, shortly before, or shortly after, the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple, it undoubtedly responded to the needs of the Christian community at Rome, which had already suffered persecution under Nero (64) and was bracing for yet another period of persecution because of the Jewish revolt against Rome. Thus, Mark may be writing to strengthen a fledgling community of Gentile Christians by reminding them that Jesus was a crucified Messiah who suffered persecution. Therefore, those who follow Him in the way of discipleship can expect no less.

Composition. The tradition that originates with Papias suggests that the evangelist received some of his material from Peter. The actual composition of the Gospel, however, was probably more complicated, and Mark undoubtedly had access to other sources of information, for example, traditions about Jesus' controversies with the religious leader (2.1-3.6; 11.27-12.37), parables (4.1–34); miracles (4.35–5.43); teachings on discipleship (9.33–10.31); sayings about the temple's destruction and Jesus' return at the end of the ages (13.1-37); and an early version of the Passion Narrative (14.1-15.47). Mark edited and arranged this material and his Petrine traditions into a coherent narrative of Jesus' ministry that culminated in His death and Resurrection. In doing so, Mark was the first to compose a gospel that, in the view of many scholars, represents a literary genre without an exact parallel in the ancient world.

The Ending of the Gospel. There are four endings to the Gospel of Mark. (1) In the oldest and best manuscripts (Vaticanus and Sinaiticus), the Gospel ends at 16.8, the story of the women at the empty tomb. (2) Some manuscripts expand this ending to include a brief report of the Risen Jesus sending His disciples to proclaim the gospel to the whole world. This is called the "shorter ending." (3) Mark 16.9-20 represents the so-called longer ending of the Gospel. Found in the majority of manuscripts and accepted as inspired Scripture by the Council of Trent, it is absent from the two oldest Greek codices (Vaticanus and Sinaiticus). Moreover, Clement of Alexandria and Origen were not aware of this ending, and Eusebius and Jerome say that the passage was absent from almost all Greek copies of Mark known to them. (4) The Washington manuscript contains this longer ending with an expansion after v. 14, the so-called Freer logion, named after the gallery where the manuscript is kept in Washington, D.C. Overall, the best manuscript tradition concludes at 16.8 with the account of the empty tomb. While some have argued that the original ending of the Gospel was lost, others maintain that the evangelist purposely concluded his work at this point to emphasize the need for the disciples to return to Galilee, the starting point of Jesus' ministry, and make their own "way" to Jerusalem as He did.

Narrative

Structure. The Gospel of Mark is difficult to outline, and scholars structure it in various ways. Most would agree, however, that after a brief introduction (1.1–13), the Gospel falls into three parts. In the first (1.13-8.26), Mark describes the beginning of Jesus' ministry in Galilee. This ministry is characterized by Jesus' proclamation that the time of waiting is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand. Consequently, people must repent and believe in God's own good news that the kingdom is making its appearance in Jesus' ministry (1.14–15). After this initial announcement, Jesus calls His first disciples (1.16-20) and proclaims the kingdom by mighty deeds of casting out demons and healing the sick (1.21–45). Although the religious leaders oppose him (2.1–3.6), people throughout Galilee and beyond receive Jesus favorably (3.7-12).

Eventually Jesus summons "the Twelve" to be with Him (3.13–19) and sends them on mission to cast out demons, heal the sick, and preach repentance (6.7–13). Before sending them on mission, however, Jesus reveals the mystery of the kingdom of God to them (4.1–34) and manifests His power over nature, demons, sickness, and death (4.35–5.43).

After the disciples return from their missions, the question of Jesus' identity takes center stage. While some think that Jesus is ELIJAH or one of the prophets, Herod mistakenly believes that Jesus is JOHN THE BAPTIST returned to life. By feeding the crowds in the wilderness on two occasions (6.30–44; 8.1–10), Jesus shows that He is Israel's Shepherd and MESSIAH, and Peter eventually confesses that Jesus is the Messiah (8.27–30).

In the second part of the Gospel (8.27–10.52), Jesus explains that as the Messiah He must suffer, die, and rise from the dead. Thus, His fate is the fate of the Son of Man. The disciples, however, fail to comprehend this dimension of discipleship and its implication for following Jesus. Thus, after each of Jesus' passion predictions, there is a misunderstanding on their part about the meaning of discipleship, and Jesus must instruct them anew. The entire section is built on a pattern of prediction, misunderstanding, and teaching that is repeated three times: Cycle one (8.31; 8.32–33; 8.34–9.1); Cycle two (9.30–31; 9.32–34; 9.35–10.31); Cycle three (10.32–34; 10.35–41; 10.42–45).

The third part of the Gospel (11.1–16.8) describes Jesus' ministry in Jerusalem, which becomes the proximate occasion for His Passion and death. Jesus enters Jerusalem (11.1–11) and cleanses the temple (11.15–19), which leads the religious leaders to challenge His authority (11.27-33). After a series of controversies with the religious leaders (12.13-37), Jesus pronounces a final discourse in which He prophesies the destruction of the temple and His return at the close of the ages as the glorious SON OF MAN (13.1–37). Jesus' Jerusalem ministry, then, becomes the proximate occasion for the religious authorities to arrest and hand Him over to Pilate, who condemns Him to death as a messianic pretender, "the King of the Jews." At Jesus' death, the curtain of the temple is torn from top to bottom (15.38), and a Roman centurion confesses that Jesus was truly the Son of God (15.39). The tearing of the temple's curtain indicates that the death of Jesus, the Messiah, is the perfect sacrifice that makes all other sacrifices irrelevant. The new temple will consist of those who believe in Jesus. The confession that Jesus was truly the Son of God indicates that Jesus' sonship cannot be understood apart from His shameful death upon the cross. The Gospel concludes with the angel instructing the women to tell the disciples that Jesus has gone ahead of them to Galilee (16.7). There the Risen Lord will gather His scattered flock as He promised (14.28).

The Plot. Read as a narrative, the Gospel is driven by a plot of conflict that operates on three levels. On the first, there is a conflict between the kingdom of God that Jesus' ministry inaugurates and the rule of Satan, which oppose God's kingship. By casting out demons, Jesus shows that God's rule is displacing that of Satan. On the second level, there is a conflict between Jesus and the religious leaders over the question of authority: who has the authority to speak in God's name: the religious leaders or Jesus? On the third level, there is a conflict between Jesus and His own disciples over the meaning of messiahship and discipleship. While Jesus speaks of a suffering Messiah and calls His disciples to selfless service, the disciples think in terms of a glorious Messiah and seek seats of honor at Jesus' right and left (10.35–40).

The question of Jesus' identity lies at the heart of the conflict between Jesus and the religious leaders, and Jesus and His disciples. Who is He? Throughout the Gospel the identity of Jesus (that He is the Messiah, the Son of God) is hidden from the characters of the story. Thus, even when Peter correctly confesses that Jesus is the Messiah, he does not know that Jesus is the Messiah who must suffer, die, and rise. It is only after Jesus has died that the centurion, a Gentile, correctly confesses that this Man was truly the Son of God (15.39).

This mystery of Jesus' identity is the Gospel's "messianic secret." This expression, first introduced by W. Wrede (The Messianic Secret, 1901), properly refers to a literary motif whereby Jesus' identity is hidden from the characters of the narrative. Only after He dies and is raised from the dead is His identity fully disclosed. Thus the death of Jesus as the crucified Messiah plays a crucial role in this Gospel that proclaims a theology of the cross.

Theological Themes

Among the most important theological themes of the Markan Gospel are Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God; the mystery of Jesus' identity, which is expressed through three titles (Messiah, Son of God, Son of Man); and Jesus' teaching on the nature of discipleship.

The Kingdom of God. The central theme of the Gospel and of Jesus' teaching is the appearance of the kingdom of God, by which Jesus means God's rule over history and creation. Although the precise term does not occur with any frequency in the Old Testament, the concept of God as king over history and creation does, especially in the Psalms of Enthronement (Psalms 47, 93, 95–99) and 2 Isaiah, see Is 52.7. Within the Gospel, Jesus proclaims that the kingdom of God has made its appearance in His ministry. Thus, He summons people to repent and believe in this good news. In addition to preaching that the kingdom has arrived, Jesus effects the presence of the kingdom by His mighty deeds. These deeds of casting out demons, healing the sick, and raising the dead point to the in-breaking of God's kingdom and the destruction of Satan's rule. Although the kingdom has made its appearance in Jesus' ministry, Jesus is aware that it has not yet come in power. Therefore, in a series of parables (4.1-34), He explains the mystery of the kingdom to His disciples: namely, at the present time the kingdom is a hidden from those who do not believe, but when it is finally revealed (at Jesus' parousia as the Son of Man), its presence and power will be known to all, whether they believe or not. Although Jesus' Jerusalem ministry was the proximate occasion for His Passion and death, His claim to be the authoritative spokesman for the inbreaking kingdom of God was the ultimate reason for His death, inasmuch as this proclamation informs the whole of His ministry.

Messiah, Son of God, Son of Man. The Gospel of Mark begins by identifying Jesus as the Christ (Messiah), the Son of God. At Caesarea Philippi, Peter correctly confesses that Jesus is the Messiah (8.29), and at Jesus' trial the high priest asks Jesus if He is the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One (14.61). Jesus' own understanding of His messiahship, however, was dramatically different from that of the high priest and Peter. Whereas the high priest thought in terms of a Davidic Messiah who would deliver Israel from its enemies and establish justice in Jerusalem (Psalms of Solomon 17, 18), and whereas Peter could not countenance that Jesus must suffer and die as the Messiah (8.32), Jesus referred to Himself as the Son of Man who must suffer and die before entering into His glory.

From the point of view of the evangelist, Jesus the Messiah is the Son of God because He enjoys a unique relationship to God shared by no one else. Although the title does not occur frequently, it does appear at strategic moments in the Gospel: the opening verse (1.1); Jesus' baptism (1.11); the transfiguration (9.7); and the centurion's confession (15.39). At Jesus' baptism, in a private theophany, God addresses Jesus as His beloved Son, in whom He is well pleased. At the transfiguration, God reveals to Peter, James, and John that Jesus is His beloved Son, and He instructs them to listen to Him. Finally, after Jesus' death, a Roman centurion becomes the first person within the Gospel narrative to confess that Jesus was the Son of God.

The key to understanding how the Gospel comprehends Jesus' identity as the Messiah, the Son of God, is found in a number of sayings in which Jesus refers to Himself as the Son of Man. This strange expression probably goes back to a similar expression in Daniel 7 that speaks metaphorically of "one like a son of man" who received power and kingship from God after a period of intense persecution (Dn 7.9–14). By referring to himself as the Son of Man, Jesus points to His destiny as the Messiah, the Son of God. As the one like a son of man in the Book of Daniel, Jesus will be vindicated by God despite His sufferings. Thus, the fate of the Messiah, the Son of God, is to be rejected, suffer, die, and rise (8.31; 9.9; 13.31; 10.33; 14.21,41) and return as God's eschatological agent at the end of the ages (8.38; 13.26; 14.62). While "Son of God" and "Messiah" are confessional titles that point to Jesus' identity (Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God), "Son of Man" points to Jesus' destiny as the Messiah, the Son of God, who must suffer, die, and rise. This is what neither Peter nor the high priest understand.

The Path of Discipleship. Discipleship is a central theme of the Markan Gospel. After His initial proclamation of the Gospel, Jesus calls His first disciples (1.16–20). Gathering still other disciples, He chooses 12 to represent the 12 tribes of Israel. While the disciples show themselves to be generous in their response to Jesus

(10.28), they misunderstand Him on a number of occasions (6.52; 8.14–21; 9.32). Moreover, they often manifest a desire for prominence and positions of authority (9.33–34; 10.35–41). Consequently, Jesus must teach them that greatness in the kingdom of God consists in service to the least important (9.35–37; 10.42–44). Jesus, the Son of Man, came not "to be served but to serve and to give His life as a ransom for many" (10.45). Here Christology and discipleship intersect, since true discipleship is patterned after the life of Jesus. Thus, authentic disciples know that Jesus, the Son of God, is the Messiah who must suffer, die, and rise.

In brief, the Gospel of Mark develops a theology of the cross that proclaims that no one can know Jesus and live as His disciple apart from embracing a path of service that leads to rejection, suffering, death, and resurrection. Such disciples will enter the KINGDOM OF GOD.

Bibliography: Commentaries. H. ANDERSON, The Gospel of Mark (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1981). J. GNILKA, Das Evangelium nach Markus, 2 v. (Zürich 1978, 1979). R. A. GUELICH, Mark 1-8.26 (Dallas 1989). M. D. HOOKER, The Gospel According to Mark (Peabody, Mass. 1991). J. MARCUS, Mark 1-8 (New York 1999). R. PESCH, Das Markusevangelium, 2 v. (Freiburg 1984). V. TAYLOR, The Gospel According to Mark (2d ed. New York 1966). L. WIL-LIAMSON, Mark (Atlanta 1983). Studies. P. J. ACHTEMEIER, Mark (Philadelphia 1986). E. BEST, Mark the Gospel as Story (Edinburgh 1983). M.-E. BOISMARD, Jésus un homme de Nazareth: raconté par Marc L'évangeliste (Paris 1996). A. Y. COLLINS, The Beginnings of the Gospel: Probings of Mark in Context (Minneapolis 1992). M. HENGEL, Studies in the Gospel of Mark (Philadelphia 1985). M. D. HOOKER, The Message of Mark (London 1983). D. JUEL, Messiah and Temple: The Trial of Jesus in the Gospel of Mark (Missoula, Mont. 1977). H. C. KEE, Community of the New Age: Studies in Mark's Gospel (Philadelphia 1977). J. D. KINGSBURY, The Christology of Mark's Gospel (Philadelphia 1983); Conflict in Mark: Jesus, Authorities, Disciples (Minneapolis 1989). J. MARCUS, The Way of the Lord: Christological Exegesis of the Old Testament in the Gospel of Mark (Louisville 1992). C. D. MARSHALL, Faith as a Theme in Mark's Narrative (Cambridge, Eng. 1989). R. MARTIN, Mark-Evangelist and Theologian (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1973). B. D. SCHILDGEN, Power and Prejudice: The Reception of the Gospel of Mark (Detroit 1999). W. R. TELFORD, The Theology of the Gospel of Mark (Cambridge, Eng. 1999). M. A. TOLBERT, Sowing the Gospel: Mark's World in Literary-Historical Perspective (Minneapolis 1989).

[F. J. MATERA]

MARK, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Jan. 18 to Oct. 7, 336. Virtually nothing is known about Mark who is described by the Liber pontificalis as "a Roman by birth, son of Priscus." According to the Liberian catalogue, he was consecrated on Jan. 18, 336. He died after a reign of less than ten months, and was buried, according to the Depositio Episcoporum, in the cemetery of Balbina on the Via Ardeatina (Oct. 7, Pope St. Mark, effigy from 9th-century series of papal portraits, formerly at basilica of St. Paul, Rome.

336) in a basilica that he had probably built; its ruins survived until the seventeenth century. He may be the Mark mentioned in a letter of the Emperor CONSTANTINE to Pope MILTIADES in 313; if so, he was a longtime member of the Roman clergy before his election.

Mark founded the Titulus Marci (S. Marco), incorporated in the Palazzo Venezia during the Renaissance; S. Marco was at first named after him, and later placed under the patronage of the Evangelist. The Liber pontificalis states that this pope decreed that the bishop of Rome was to be consecrated by the bishop of OSTIA who was privileged to wear the PALLIUM. St. Augustine testifies (c. 400): "The Roman pontiff is wont to be ordained by three bishops of whom the first is the bishop of Ostia" (Coll. c. Don. 3.16); but ecclesiastical use of the pallium is attested only for the middle of the fifth century, as illustrated on the celebrated Ivory of Trier.

Feast: Oct. 7.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:202–204; 3:81. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1198–99. A. FERRUA, "La basilica del papa Marco," La civiltà cattolica 99.3 (1948) 503–513, excavations. DAMASUS I, Epigrammata Damasiana, ed. A. FERRUA (Rome 1942). R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei Papi (Rome 1957). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictonary of Popes (New York 1986) 28–29. C. PIETRI, Roma Christiana (Rome 1976) 154–160.

MARK OF ARETHUSA, ST.

Bishop; b. 250–270; d. Arethusa?, Lebanon, after 362. He is known only as a bishop active in the dispute over ARIANISM. Like many others, he shrank from the new term of CONSUBSTANTIALITY and so joined the Semi–Arians. He attended their synods and drafted the creed of SIRMIUM (351), approved at Rimini in 359. Under JULIAN THE APOSTATE he destroyed a beautiful pagan temple and was cruelly tortured by his fellow townsmen (362). His eulogy by St. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS indicates that he died in orthodoxy. CLEMENT VIII approved his cult in 1598. He is mentioned in the Church histories of SOZOMEN (5.10) and THEODORET (3.3).

Feast: Mar. 29; Mar. 28 (Eastern Church).

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca 35:616–634; 42:443, 451. Acta Sanctorum Mar. 3:771–775. C. BARONIUS, Annales ecclesiastici 5:83–84.

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

MARK OF THE NATIVITY

Carmelite of the Touraine Reform, whose secular name was Mark Genest and whose religious name in more complete form was Mark of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin; b. Cuno near Saumur (southeast of Angers), Jan. 9, 1617; d. Feb. 23, 1696. After being educated by the Benedictines, then by the Jesuits at La Flèche, Mark entered the Carmelites in 1631 at Rennes, where earlier in the same century the TOURAINE REFORM had been inaugurated. He was influenced by the Carmelite Bernard of Saint-Magdalen and by the lay brother mystic JOHN OF SAINT-SAMSON of the same order. Taking prominent part in the reform, Mark completed and edited directories for novices (1650-51), which became the official manuals of the reform and influenced the Directorium Carmelitanum vitae spiritualis (Vatican 1940; Eng. tr. The Carmelite Directory of the Spiritual Life, Chicago 1951). Mark edited directories for external conduct (1677–79), wrote a manual for the Carmelite Third Order, served as confessor to the archbishop of Tours (Victor le Bouteiller), and at various times was novice master, prior, definitor, visitator, and provincial. He was also involved in a bitter dispute with the Jansenist Antoine Arnauld (d. 1694).

Bibliography: C. DE VILLIERS, Bibliotheca carmelitana, ed. G. WESSELS, 2 v. in 1 (Rome 1927) 2:312–330. Méthode claire et facile pour bien faire l'oraison mentale et pour s'exercer avec fruit en la présence de Dieu, rev. INNOCENT DE MARIE IMMACULÉE (Bruges 1962). K. HEALY, Methods of Prayer in the Carmelite Reform of Touraine (Rome 1956) 27–28, 30–38.

[K. J. EGAN]

[J. CHAPIN]

MARK THE HERMIT

Ascetic, polemicist, and theological author; d. after 430. Nicephorus Callistus (Hist. eccl. 14) says Mark was a disciple of JOHN CHRYSOSTOM (d. 407) and a contemporary of NILUS OF ANCYRA (d. c. 430). He was abbot of a monastery in Ancyra, but later became an anchorite, probably in the Judean desert. Although Nicephorus speaks of 40 treatises, only nine were known to Photius (Bibl. cod. 200). A 10th treatise, the important Contra Nestorianos, was published by J. Cozza-Luzi. In this work Mark used Scripture and the baptismal CREED to refute the NESTORIANS. Mark's works show an ascetic preoccupation, but their importance was attributed to their polemic and dogmatic character. He combatted the Nestorians and Messalians. He energetically repudiated the identification of grace with mystical experience. He saw the role and efficacy of Baptism in the Christian life in relation to Adam's sin and its consequences; but he rejected any explanation or excuse for sins committed after Baptism because of the corruption of human nature, the devil's influence, or Adam's sin. For him Baptism both destroyed original sin in man and infused into the soul a power of the Holy Spirit by which, with the free cooperation of man's will, he can resist evil tendencies and live as God would have him live. Photius (loc. cit.) suspected Mark of Monophysitism; but his doctrine, particularly in the treatise De Melchisedech, is correctly based on the unity of person in the two natures of Christ.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca 65:893–1140. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 9.2:1964–68. M. JUGIE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 12.1:358–361. K. JÜSSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 7:11. J. QUASTEN, Patrology 3:504–509. M. F. ARGLES, Dictionary of Christian Biography 3:826–827.

[P. W. HARKINS]

MARKS, MIRIAM

Executive Secretary of the National Office of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) in Washington, DC, 1935–1960; b. Tacoma, Washington, April 26, 1890; d. Apalachicola, July 18, 1961. The daughter of Charles and Anna Ryan Marks, she grew up in Apalachicola, Florida, and attended Florida College for Women. After a year of study at Columbia University in 1919, she supervised art for the public schools of Garland County, Arkansas (1920–23). Upon graduating from the National Catholic School of Social Service in Washington, DC in 1926, Marks began social work in Newark and Paterson, New Jersey. It was while working as an editor for St. Anthony's Guild in Paterson that she made the acquaintance of Father Edwin O'HARA, then working with the Rural Life Bureau of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference. When O'Hara became bishop of Great Falls, Montana, he asked Marks to organize the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) in his diocese, and between 1931 and 1933 Marks developed CCD programs for three other dioceses. When the U.S. bishops established the National Office of the CCD in Washington, O'Hara, in his capacity of episcopal chairman, named Marks executive secretary, a position she held for 25 years. In that capacity Marks organized the Confraternity in 72 dioceses in the United States and Canada. She contributed essays to magazines, directed the CCD Office of Publications, and organized and spoke at various national conventions of the CCD. She taught at St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana in the summers of 1938, 1939, and 1943, and at the Catholic University of America in 1949 and 1950. She was awarded the Papal Medal Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice, in October of 1937. Marks retired in 1960 and died at her home in Apalachicola on July 18, 1961. A plaque in Memorial Hall at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, DC, commemorates her work with the CCD.

Bibliography: CCD Files in the Archives of the Catholic University of America, Washington, DC; The Confraternity Comes of Age: A Historical Symposium (Paterson, NJ 1956).

[C. D. CLEMENT]

MARKS OF THE CHURCH

The problem of the scientific demonstration of the Catholic Church—or, concretely, the verification of the claims of the Catholic communion to be in total conformity with the intentions of Christ, founder of the Church—was raised, in principle, as soon as the schisms that the Apostle had announced appeared among the followers of Our Lord. Arguments and signs were proposed haphazardly according to circumstances. It was only in the 15th and 16th centuries, when Western Christianity was torn asunder, that the treatise De ecclesia was truly constituted and with it the three classical viae that should lead to Catholicism and that later received the names via notarum, via historica, via empirica [see C. Walter, Tentamen historicum circa notas verae ecclesiae (Würzburg 1792); G. Thils, Les Notes de l'église dans l'apologétique catholique depuis la réforme (Gembloux, Belgium 1937)].

Name, Number, Grouping. These marks were almost indiscriminately called notae, argumenta, signa, proprietates, conditiones, caracteres, insignia, criteria, praerogativae (Thils, 2–8). The names, however, became more precise in the course of the 16th and 17th centuries. Thus, when apologetics in two stages was introduced—De vera religione for unbelievers and then De ecclesia for separated Christians—the term sign was generally reserved for the first treatise, whereas for the De ecclesia, the term notes, or marks, was preferred. On the other hand, the term property was reserved, preferably, for essential qualities such as VISIBILITY, infallibility, and INDEFECTIBILITY.

The number of these marks has varied. The apologists of the 16th century proposed 2, 4, 7, 10, 15, and even 100. In this varying number four groups can be discerned: the scriptural group, composed of the marks menin the inspired writings—indefectibility, infallibility, visibility, holiness, unity, and miracles; the Augustinian group, taken from an enumeration by St. Augustine—perfect wisdom, general accord in faith, miracles, pastoral succession, and even the name Catholic (C. epist. fund. 4; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 25.1:196); the Lerinian group—namely, universality, antiquity, and universal accord-which was inspired by the quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus of Vincent of Lerins (Commonit. 2; Enchiridion patristicum, 2168); and, last, the creedal group, taken from the ninth article of the Creed of Constantinople unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. Since the 17th century the marks have been stabilized in this group to form the four marks of the Church (Thils, 97-120).

Marks as Proof. The argument based on the marks can be summarized as follows. Christ endowed His Church with certain features that should permit it to be recognized among all Christian communions. But these characteristics are to be found in the Roman Catholic Church; therefore, it is the true Church. The major premise of this reasoning has never varied, although the manner-dogmatic or rational-of understanding it has at times caused some confusion. On the contrary, the minor premise has been presented by turns under three forms: (1) positive and absolute, when the polemicist affirms without restrictions that the Catholic Church, and it alone, possesses the characteristics or marks of the true Church; (2) negative and also absolute, when one limits himself to denying them to non-Roman communions; and (3) comparative, when, more circumspectly, the apologists declare that the marks are verified in the Catholic Church in a superior manner, that is, more perfectly than in other Christian communions.

Recognizing the type of argumentation used in the via notarum is of great importance to its understanding. One can emphasize the four marks—unity, holiness, catholicity, apostolicity—as an argument from Scripture or the Fathers, thus giving it a dogmatic value. One can also emphasize these same four marks for their intrinsic value, for the probative force they have either from their very nature or as evidencing a moral miracle; in this case, the argumentation belongs to the rational type. The preparation of a dogmatic argument differs considerably from the preparation of a rational argument, even when the matter of the argument is the same.

In the case here the following evolution is evident. In the 16th and 17th centuries, the argumentation of the polemicists belonged to the dogmatic type. In the 18th century, because of the rationalist spirit and of even unbelief in many spheres, the argumentation became rational. Catholic unity, it was said in the 18th century, natura sua, in itself, by its intrinsic value, is an argument for the true Church. At the end of the 19th century, after Vatican Council I and the constitution Dei Filius ("Quin etiam ecclesia per se ipsa, ob suam . . . magnum quoddam et perpetuum est motivum credibilitatis"'-H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3013), it was argued as follows: Catholic unity, as a moral miracle, shows where the true Church is. There are always the four marks, but the argumentation is different; it belongs to the rational type, to the via empirica, and no longer to the dogmatic, to the former via notarum. The material is the same; the marks, therefore, are not called into question, but the method and type of argumentation has changed.

Marks as Dynamic. In the second half of the 20th century the most important advance in understanding the marks of the Church was to emphasize the marks as those signs of the apostolic witness which, imperfectly realized as they are in any given moment of history, provide the Church with a starting place as it makes its way through time towards full eschatological realization in Christ. Thus, theologians put much stronger emphasis on the need to become more catholic (i. e., universal) rather than on the de facto universality of the Church measured by some numerical or statistical calculus. In that reading of catholicity, the emphasis is not on the present of universality of the Church but in its as yet unfilled task "which speaks all tongues, which lovingly understands and accepts all tongues and thus overcomes the divisiveness of Babel" (Ad gentes, n. 4). Likewise, in a similar fashion, the Church strives for that greater unity which Christ demands of the Church, just as it seeks to be ever more faithful to the apostolic witness on which is based while pursuing that holiness which will be fully realized only in the eschaton. Needless to say, the notion of unity pertains not only to the inner life of the Roman Catholic Church but to the wider communion of all Christian churches.

Marks as Realizable. The emphasis on the marks of the Church as realizable rather than as fully realized does not mean that the Church as it now exists is devoid of the characteristics of unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. The creedal affirmations in the liturgy both announce what the Church is and what it hopes to be. Recent ecclesiologists have focused on the marks in the local church where the Church is historically realized in the concrete. It is only in the lived experience of the worshiping community that the abstract notion of unity or holiness becomes experienced and valued. In that sense the marks of the Church exist in a dialectical fashion touching both the local and universal Church. It must be underscored, then, that the local church must, like the universal Church, be one, holy, catholic, and apostolic.

When in the creed we affirm our belief that the Church is one holy, catholic, and apostolic we are implicitly affirming three things: a belief that we hold about the nature of both the local worshipping community and the Great Church; an aspiration of what we would like the Church to be; and an act of faith that the spirit dwells within the Church and can make such an aspiration a reality.

See Also: UNITY OF FAITH; MIRACLE, MORAL; MIRACLE, MORAL (THE CHURCH); MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF); CHURCH, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-), Tables générales 1:113-14. A. KOLPING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957-65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 7:1044–48. J. C. FENTON, "The True Church and the Notes of the Church," American Ecclesiastical Review 114 (1946) 282-297. T. SPÁČIL, "Ist die Lehre von den Kennzeichen der Kirche zu ändern?" Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 36 (1912) 715-741; "Zur Lehre von den Merkmalen der Kirche," ibid. 39 (1915) 231-255. L. BOFF, Church, Charism, and Power (New York 1985). A. DULLES, The Catholicity of the Church (Oxford 1985). Y. CONGAR, I Believe in the Holy Spirit, v. II (New York 1983). B. MARTHALER, The Creed (Mystic, Conn. 1987). J. MOLTMANN, The Church in the Power of the Spirit (San Francisco 1977).

[G. THILS/L. S. CUNNINGHAM]

MARLEY, MARIE HILDA, SISTER

Scottish teacher, educator, and leader in child guidance; b. Durham, England, Oct. 13, 1876; d. Glasgow, Scotland, Nov. 19, 1951. After attending school in Sheffield, Hilda Gertrude Marley studied at Our Lady's Training College for Teachers in Liverpool and at London University; she then entered the Congregation of the Sisters of Notre Dame of Namur. As Sister Marie Hilda, she was assigned to Notre Dame Convent of Teignmouth, South Devon, and later to Notre Dame Training College in Glasgow. While teaching she continued her studies and graduated in honors history from London University. She emphasized psychology in the training college curriculum, and prepared a textbook and established a laboratory for her psychology classes. In 1931 Sister Marie Hilda founded the Notre Dame Child Guidance Clinic in Glasgow and quickly became the chief pioneer of child guidance in Scotland. Upon retirement from teaching (1941), she lectured extensively throughout Europe. In 1947 she was awarded the cross Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice by Pope Pius XII. Her writings were few. She served as vice president of the Scottish Branch of the British Psychological Society, and was a fellow of the Educational Institute of Scotland and of the British Psychological Society. In 1951 Sister Marie Hilda was elected vice president of the International Congress of Catholic Psychotherapists.

Bibliography: H. MISIAK and V. M. STAUDT, Catholics in Psychology (New York 1954).

[V. S. SEXTON]

MARMION, JOSEPH COLUMBA, BL.

Abbot of Maredsous and spiritual writer; b. April 1, 1858, Dublin, Ireland; d. Jan. 30, 1923, MAREDSOUS, Belgium. Born of an Irish father and a French mother, Joseph studied at Belvedere College in Dublin and at Holy Cross seminary of Clonliffe. He was then sent to the Irish College in Rome and studied at the College of Propaganda Fide.

In the year following his ordination (June 16, 1881), he returned to Ireland, where he was assigned to the parish of Dundrum. Soon afterward he became professor of philosophy at Holy Cross seminary. In 1886, with the permission of Cardinal Edward MacCabe, he entered the Benedictine monastery at Maredsous in Belgium. In 1899 he became prior and then professor at Mont-Cesar in Louvain, and in 1909 was made abbot at Maredsous.

Marmion became recognized as a master of the spiritual life, and his reputation further increased after his death. His books have gone through numerous editions in ten languages and are considered classics on the spiritual life. His teaching was drawn essentially from the Gospels, the Epistles of St. Paul, and the Rule of St. Benedict. Emphasizing the doctrine of the adoption of the children of God, Marmion exalts the person of Christ, the center of the whole interior life.

Along with his writing, Marmion carried on an extensive apostolate. He occupied himself by giving fatherly guidance to a large Benedictine monastery; hearing confessions and preaching retreats especially to priests and religious in Belgium, England, and Ireland; and keeping up an enormous correspondence. He was the close friend and spiritual director of Cardinal D. S. MERCIER, Archbishop of Malines, who held the abbot in highest esteem.

His writings (in Eng. tr.) include: Christ the Life of the Soul (London 1925), Christ in His Mysteries (London 1925), Christ the Ideal of the Monk (London 1926), Sponsa Verbi (London 1939), Union with God (London 1949), Words of Life on the Margin of the Missal (London 1940), Come to Christ, All You Who Labour (London 1946), and Christ the Ideal of the Priest (London 1953).

Veneration of Dom Marmion began immediately after his death, and his reputation for sanctity gave rise to the opening of the process of his beatification in 1954. Pope John Paul II beatified Dom Marmion on Sept. 3, 2000. Two Benedictine monasteries have been placed under his patronage: Marmion Abbey in Aurora, IL, and Glenstall Abbey in Eire.

Feast: Oct. 3.

Bibliography: T. DELFORGE, Columba Marmion: Servant of God, tr. R. L. STEWART (London & St. Louis 1965). M. M. PHILIPON, The Spiritual Doctrine of Dom Marmion, tr. M. DILLON (Westminster, MD 1956). R. THIBAUT, Abbot Columba Marmion, tr. M. ST. THOMAS (St. Louis 1949). M. TIERNEY, Dom Columba Marmion (Blackrock, Co. Dublin 1994).

[J. C. WILLKE]

MARMOUTIER, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey founded at Tours by St. MARTIN, c. 372, near the grotto where St. Gatian celebrated Mass. In 853 Marmoutier (Majus Monasterium) was sacked by the Norse, and 116 monks were slain; 20 managed to escape and were sheltered by the canons of St. Martin, who rebuilt the abbey. In 986 it was transferred to St. MA-JOLUS, abbot of Cluny, at the request of Eudes I, count of Blois, who himself became a monk of Marmoutier. The great church was dedicated by Urban II in 1096. At this time the abbey was placed under papal protection and prospered during the 11th century, when at one time it had 101 priories in its affiliation, ten of them in England. In 1105 Abbot William succeeded Hilgotus and quarreled with Archbishop Rudolph II of Tours over jurisdiction. William went to Rome and received from Paschal II the abbatial benediction refused by Rudolph. In 1253 St. Louis IX protected it against the attacks of the counts of Blois. During the religious wars it was pillaged by Calvinists. In 1637 RICHELIEU made it a commendatory abbey of the Benedictine Congregation of St. Maur. The French Revolution effected its destruction and suppression in 1792. At Marmoutier was kept the ampulla of miraculous oil said to have cured St. Martin and used by Nicolas de THOU, bishop of Chartres, in the anointing of King Henry IV (1553-1619) on Feb. 27, 1594.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39)

2:1762–66. S. HILPISCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 7:100. Gallia Christiana, v. 1–13 (Paris 1715–85), v. 14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 14:192–236.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

MARO OF CYR, ST.

Syrian monk and spiritual father of the Maronites; b. near Apamea on the Orontes River, Syria, date unknown; d. there, before 423. He lived an ascetical life of penance and prayer on a mountaintop. His miraculous gifts and extraordinary spiritual knowledge attracted many disciples who became holy hermits, such as SS. James of Cyr, Limnaeus, Thalassius, and Zebinas (Theodoret, History of the Monks, Patrologia Graeca 82:1431, 1451, 1458). The whole development of monasticism at Cyr derives from Maro. Whatever position later Maronite authors held in the dispute over MONOTHELITISM, Maro, a friend of St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, had always supported orthodoxy (Patrologia Graeca 52:630). Possession of his relics was contested after his death. A church was built on his tomb, and the monastery of St. Maro, which became the center of the Maronites, was later founded there. Maro's cult was approved by BENEDICT XIV in 1753.

Feast: Feb. 14.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 2:767–768. F. NAU, "Opuscules Maronites," Revue de l'Orient chrétien 4 (1899) 175–266, 318–353. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10.2:2188. P. DIB, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 10.1:1–2. F. A. AL-BUSTĀNĪ, Mār Mārūn (s.l. 1965). P. NAAMAN, Théodoret de Cyr le monastère de Saint Maroun (Sin el-Fil, Lebanon 1971).

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

MARONITE CHURCH

The hermit Maron (Maroon) lived on a mountain in the region of Apamea (Aphamiah) the actual Qal'at Al-Modiq, capital of Syria Secunda. His biographer, Theodoret, bishop of Cyr (d. 458), says that he pursued a life of prayer and that he had consecrated a pagan temple as a church (Religiosa Historia 16, 21; Patrologia Graeca 82:1418–31). Later historians (see P. Dib, Histoire . . . 4) place his death in 410. The group of disciples who gathered around Maron during his lifetime and, after his death, around the monastery erected to his memory formed the nucleus of the Maronite Church.

Monastery of St. Maron. This was located on the banks of the Orontes in northern Syria and, according to the Arabic historian Ma'soudi [Livre de l'avertissement, et de la révision (Kitāb at-Tanbīh Wal-Ischrāf), ed. M. J. de Goeje, in Bibliotheca geographorum arabicorum, v. 8 (Leiden 1894) 153], by the tenth century was of considerable size and wealth, a necessary stop on the imperial road from Antioch to Damascus.

Abbey church, Marmoutier, Alsace, France. (©Leonard de Selva/CORBIS)

During the early sixth century, the Maronite monks were foremost among the defenders of the doctrine of CHALCEDON, in defense of which 350 monks were slain and many monasteries burned by the MONOPHYSITES. (They are commemorated by the Maronite Church on July 31.) This is known by a memorandum sent to Pope Hormisdas by the monks of Syria Secunda and signed by Alexander, archimandrite of St. Maron (dated 517; J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. [Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960—] 8:425–429, 1023–30). The pope replied on Feb. 10, 518. Papal recognition of the Maronites is revealed in these documents, which also make it clear that the grand monastery of St. Maron was foremost among the monasteries of Syria Secunda and that together they formed a cohesive group.

The grand monastery was enlarged during the time of the Emperor Marcian (452) and under Justinian I. Until the mid-seventh century, the monastery of St. Maron was the stronghold of the Chalcedonians and the center of missionary activity in northern Syria. The preaching monks traveled about the villages, calling for a spiritual renewal and strengthening the faith of the people who often came to them for guidance. The attempted suppression of the Chalcedonians by civil and religious authorities served to strengthen the unity between the Maronite monks and their lay followers. This was further strengthened by the use of the Syriac language in the liturgy for this was the language of the people in the villages outside of the larger cities. On the eve of the formation of the Maronite patriarchate, the monachal way of life had shaped Maronite society. The heads of the monasteries were usually invested with the episcopal character, and the people of the surrounding area were under the direct jurisdiction of the monasteries. Over a period of time, the religious life of the people was shaped by monachal customs and traditions. This became an important and an enduring characteristic of the Maronite Church, and its canon law and church government still bear the marks of this influence. The jurisdiction and power of the Maronite patriarchs through the centuries have their origin and meaning in the power and jurisdiction given to the superior of St. Maron's Monastery. This monastic origin explains the influence, to the present day, of the patriarch in civil and religious matters, making him in fact an actual leader of his people who often acts as the representative of the whole Maronite "nation."

Maronite Monastery of Deir el Nourieh, Lebanon. (©Roger Wood/CORBIS)

Constitution of the Maronite patriarchate and the monothelite controversy in Syria. Patriarch Anastasius II, the last Chalcedonian patriarch to reside in Antioch, was killed in 609. Titular patriarchs of Antioch were appointed by Constantinople until 702, but after that the see remained vacant until 742, when the caliph Hisham allowed the elected patriarch, Stephen III, to take possession (see C. Karalevski, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, [Paris 1912—] 3:563–703). During the vacancy, the Chalcedonian group was leaderless and the Maronite patriarchate was formed. Maronite monks had elected a bishop from their monastery before 745. See La Chronique de Michel le Syrien ou le Grand (1166–1199), ed. J. B. Chabot (1899–1910) 2:511; this text lends solid proof to the Maronite tradition that the patriarchate had been established in the last years of the seventh century. [See Al-Douaihi, Chronology of the Maronite Patriarch, ed. Shartooni (Rashid, Beirut 1902); Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, v. 3; P. Chebli, Biographie du Patriarche Étienne Douaihi (Beirut 1913) 210]. Maronite sources place the election of the first Maronite patriarch, St. John Maron, in 685.

With the Antiochene see vacant, the Maronite monks realized the need for a leader and elected a bishop from their monastery to fill the vacant see. The election was certainly canonical; had it not been so, the Holy See would have condemned it as it did in the case of Macedonius, patriarch of Constantinople in 649 (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. [Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960—10:811). All available documents indicate that the Maronite patriarchs from the beginning held the title of "Antioch" (e.g., a document from the year 1141 in J. A. Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis 1:307).

Historically, the Maronites were the staunchest defenders of the Council of CHALCEDON, although in the eighth century they had never been informed officially of the condemnation of MONOTHELITISM at the Council of Constantinople in 680 (see Dib, Histoire . . . , 40). The annals of Eutyches (Sa'Id Ibn Batriq), Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria (933–940), contain many erroneous passages concerning the origin of the Maronites, including the actual dating of the life of St. Maron and the date of the Monothelite heresy itself. Unfortunately, Eutyches misled many later writers, such as William of Tyre, the standard authority on the Crusades (Historia Rerum in Partibus Transmarinis Gestarum; Patrologia Latina, 217 v. [Paris 1878–90] 201:855–856). William attributes Monothelitism to the Maronites and St. Maron and says that at the sight of the Crusaders they were divinely inspired to reject their ancient heresy and to enter the Catholic Church with their patriarch and bishops. Specifically citing Eutyches as his source, William merely repeats his errors (ibid.).

The position of the Maronites on the question of the two wills in Christ is best understood against the background of the circumstances in Syria at that time. On the eve of the Arab invasion, the Byzantine emperors were attempting to unify their subjects by offering a compromise acceptable to both Chalcedonians and Monophysites, founded in the duality of nature in Christ and the oneness of will. This doctrine was published in the Ecthesis (638) and displeased both parties. Some Chalcedonians had appealed to the pope, and although the pope had approved the project of the Ecthesis, the Ecumenical Council of Constantinople (680) condemned Pope Honorius and Patriarch Sergius and their Monothelite followers, without, however, any mention of the Maronites. The position of the Maronite party concerning the issue remained as it was prior to the council as the Maronites had not been informed of the council's actions. They learned of the council only through prisoners of war captured by the Arabs. The oldest Maronite documents prove that, in spite of a material Monothelitism, the Maronites believed that in Christ, ontologically speaking, there are two wills (see Dib, Histoire . . . , 30). When speaking of one will in Christ, they mean one practical will, which is equivalent to action in the terminology used by Bishop Thomas Kephartab [Ten Chapters, manuscript Syr. 203, fol. 21, v. 31, dated 1089; Metropolitan David, Kitāb al-Hudā, or Book of Guidance, 1059, ed. P. Fahed (Aleppo 1935) 44-48]. All of these texts stress the unity of action in Christ in that it is not possible to contemplate two opposing wills in Him. What was regarded as heresy was merely controversy over semantics.

The Maronites, under persecution by the caliphates of Damascus and Baghdad aided by the Maximites, began some time in the early eighth century to seek refuge from Muslim attacks in the inaccessible mountains of Lebanon, cut off from all contact with both old and new Rome.

Early middle ages. The juridical literature of the Maronite Church of the Middle Ages has been reduced to the compilation of the NOMOCANON known as Kitāb al-Hudā (Book of Guidance). The only copies available are written in Karshuni (Arabic written in Syriac characters). P. Fahed edited Kitāb al-Hudā at Aleppo in 1935, giving all the variant readings of the text in footnotes.

The Nomocanon is prefaced by a letter written by the priest monk Joseph, dated from 1058 to 1059, asking Metropolitan David to translate the canons into Arabic. The book is composed of two sections. The first 13 chapters treat doctrine, morality, and liturgy. Chapters 14 to 57 reproduce previous juridical sources.

The Maronites in Lebanon: First contact with Rome through the crusades. It is apparent from a study of the text of the Arab historian Mas'oudi (d. 956) that before the first half of the tenth century the bulk of the Maronites had left northern Syria. The first Maronite Church in the mountains of Lebanon was established around 749. Safeguarded by the mountains, they organized a feudal system of government under the combined leadership of clergy and nobility. The patriarch appears to have been the supreme head in religious and civil matters, aided by bishops who acted as his vicars.

When the crusaders journeyed along the Levantine coast en route to Jerusalem, the Maronites greeted them as natural allies and close relations grew from the first.

The Maronites occupied the first place after the Franks [see Ristelhueber, Les Traditions françaises au Liban (Paris 1925) 58]. The CRUSADES made possible the first contact of the Maronites as an independent Church with the Holy See. The last communication had been the reply of Pope Hormisdas to the Maronite monks in 518; since then the Muslim tide had inundated all of Syria and half of Asia Minor, and the eleventh century had witnessed the Great Schism between East and West. The sixthcentury persecution of the Maronites had faded from the memory of the West, and it considered the entire East as either heretic or dissident. The so-called return of the Maronites, which took place in Tripoli (1180-81) and was reported by William of Tyre (op. cit., Patrologia Latina, 217 v. [Paris 1878-90] 201:855-856), was apparently a profession of faith in recognition of the jurisdiction of Alexander III against an antipope. It seems highly unlikely that any church would, as a unit, leave the unity of the Catholic Church and return to it without any member remaining in heresy; it seems even stranger for the Maronites, after their cordial reception of the crusaders, to delay a century to make the so-called return, especially during a period when the Frankish Empire was divided from within and on the very eve of disaster.

Jeremias Al-Amshitti (1199–1230), who personally attended the Lateran Council (1215), was the first Maronite patriarch to visit Rome and take part in an ecumenical council. He returned to Lebanon in 1216 and received the bull Quia Divinae Sapientiae, signed by Innocent III, and the pallium. The Maronites began to strengthen their ties with the Holy See, remaining steadfast despite the persecutions suffered after the departure of the crusaders. The Latinizing of the Maronites began during this period.

Period of the crusades (1098–1291). There is a lack of documents concerning the juridical and ecclesiastical life of the Maronites in these times because members of the Maronite hierarchy, especially the patriarch, were the targets of persecution by the civil authorities. The patriarch lived in hiding. Many times he was discovered and jailed. Consequently the only documents that refer to the existence and activity of a few patriarchs of the eleventh and twelfth centuries are contained in notes found on the marginal spaces of certain manuscripts. The principal documents concerning the relations of the Maronites with the popes can be found in T. Anaissi's Bullarium Maronitarum. This edition is not critical, but it is the only one in existence. Other documents are found in Anaissi's Collectio documentorum Maronitarum. The first part of this collection relates to a period prior to the relations with the Holy See, and the second is made up of documents covering modern times until 1913. These are cataloged according to numerical order: the Bullarium bears Roman numerals, and the Collectio, Arabic numerals. This article will refer to these publications by abbreviations: AB to indicate the Bullarium; AC, the Collectio.

Pope Innocent III. Two bulls of Innocent III concerned the Maronites (AB 1–2). The first, dated April 18, 1213, convoked the forthcoming ecumenical council (1215). The second bull, dated January of 1216, was addressed to Patriarch (or Primate) Jeremias (Al-Amshitti), to the archbishops and bishops, men of note, clergy, and Maronite people. This bull enumerated a few points of doctrine and discipline that the Holy See wished to introduce into the Maronite Church: in the triple baptismal immersion, the Holy Trinity should be invoked only once; confirmation should be conferred only by the bishop, and Holy Chrism should be made of balm and oil; the faithful should go to confession once a year to their own priests and receive Holy Communion three times; there are two wills in Christ; chalices should not be made of glass or wood but only of gold, silver, or tin; and the churches should have bells.

In the Eastern Christian tradition, priests had had the power to confirm. Holy Chrism was made of various aromatic substances. In spite of the recommendation made to the Maronites to go to Confession and Communion once a year, it was not evident that this was not the practice among the Maronites. The notion of a proper pastor was not known in oriental canon law. Bells were not used in the East; instead the custom was to use a mallet on a wooden or iron board to announce the time of prayer.

The bull imposed on the Maronite bishops the use of the Latin vestments and enumerated the Maronite sees, two archbishoprics and three bishoprics. Jeremias Al-Amshitti (1199-1230) was granted the pallium, but with the stipulation that it was to be given to him by the Latin patriarch of Antioch. It extended the privilege of the canon (decreed by canon 15 of the Lateran Council, 1135) to the Maronites, but the patriarch was given the power of lifting the excommunication incurred by the violation of this privilege. It is noteworthy that the pope, while granting all these concessions, recognized the validity of customs and laws approved by the patriarch and his predecessors in the Church of Antioch. This bull, in spite of its expression of the benevolent attitude of the pope, constituted the first attempt at Latinization of Maronite canon law.

Pope Alexander IV. The same prescriptions of Innocent III were sent by Alexander IV (1254–64) in 1256 to Patriarch Simon (1245–77). In this bull the pope limited the power of the patriarch to absolve the censure incurred by violation of the privilege of the canon. Each case had to be referred to Rome (AB 3–4). These attempts at Latinization encountered partial success in the Maronite Church; however, it seems that the Maronite Church followed the practice of the Latin Church only in certain prescriptions. In making Holy Chrism it started to use only oil and balm; in the consecration of a bishop, the imposition of the miter was introduced. Certain ordinations were modeled after the Latin Pontifical. It is to be noted that none of these bulls of Innocent III and Alexander IV prescribed the use of the unleavened bread. Rather they expressed a general invitation to conform the liturgical usages of the Maronite Church to those of the Church of Rome.

Some of the Crusaders, after their defeat and the fall of their Syrian Empire, took refuge among the Maronites and were warmly welcomed by Patriarch Simon, who received a letter of thanks from Pope Alexander IV, addressing him as "Maronite Patriarch of Antioch." Benedict XIV confirmed the title in 1744.

The Mamelukes tightened their watch on the Levantine coast after the departure of the crusaders in order to prevent a return; this rendered contact with the Holy See extremely difficult. Pontifical emissaries were sent to the Maronites during the fifteenth century, and under the government of the Moogaddameen they enjoyed a semi-independent political life.

Mamelukes (1291–1516). The Mamelukes were slaves of the Turks brought by the sultans of Egypt to be officers in their army. One of them succeeded in taking over the sultanate, becoming the first of a long line. The last Mameluke sultan was put to death by Salim I, the sultan of Constantinople, in 1517. The Mamelukes practiced a policy of devastation and destruction in order to impede the return of the crusaders. Thus the cities on the Lebanese coast were sacked and destroyed. The Maronites of this period lived in isolation and enjoyed an autonomous political life. This strengthened the judicial power of the patriarch and bishops over their subjects. The Book of Guidance, or Kitāb al-Hudā, became insufficient to guide them in their new role. The Maronites then adopted the Collection of Canons of the Coptic Ibn Al-'Assāl, whose second book treats the private law of Christians. A critical edition of this Nomocanon was published at Cairo, Egypt, in 1900 by Philouthaous 'Awad.

The relations of the Maronite patriarchate with the Holy See were interrupted because of the watching eye of the Mamelukes, who had occupied all the sea coast of Lebanon. During this period, the Maronites were grouped in the northern part of Lebanon in the regions of Batroom, Jobail, Ehden, and Besharree. Some of them had taken refuge on the islands of Rhodes and Cyprus, where their community was prosperous at the time of the Lusiganans (1192–1489).

In spite of the new prescriptions that Innocent III and Alexander IV introduced, and which the Maronites partially followed, it seems that the discipline and the liturgy of the Maronite Church kept its oriental physiognomy. It is probable that the Maronites at that time took back some of the oriental customs that they had somewhat abandoned at the time of the crusades. The danger of Latinization became less imminent because of the interruption of communication with Rome and the West.

Relations with the Holy See were reestablished during the reign of Patriarch John Al-Jaji (1404-45), who sent his profession of faith to Pope Eugene IV. The pope answered in general terms (AB 6). Another bull of Pope Eugene IV, dated Aug. 7, 1445 (AB 7), contained the following disciplinary prescription: the dough to make the Eucharistic bread should not be mixed with oil; the patriarch should replace Maronite liturgical and disciplinary custom with those of the Latin Church. It was after the Maronites abided by these prescriptions that the power was granted to Maronite bishops to excommunicate and absolve in the external forum, both clergy and faithful of the Maronite Church. This was the first time Rome asserted officially, although indirectly, the personal jurisdiction of the Maronite bishops. At the same time, the Maronite clergy were allowed to celebrate Mass in Latin churches and the Latin clergy to celebrate Mass in Maronite churches. Maronite clergy and laity were allowed to be buried from a Latin church. They were allowed to marry Latins, but the ceremony of marriage was to be held in the liturgical rite of the Latin Church.

Pope Paul II was the first pope to mention the title of Antioch used by the Maronite patriarch (Patriarchae Maronitarum Antiochaeno nuncupato). The bull is dated 1469 (AB 11). During the thirteenth century, the title of Antioch had been given only to the Latin patriarch; but when the crusaders left Syria, the title of patriarch of Antioch was given to a prelate who resided in Rome. During the sixteenth century, the general principle of unity of jurisdiction was abandoned; however, some popes addressed the Maronite patriarchs as patriarch of the Maronites; and others, for example, Pius IV, as patriarch or primate. Paul V, in his bull of 1608, was the first to address Joseph Al-Reezzee as Patriarchae Maronitarum Antiocheni (AB 55). In the four bulls addressed to his successor, John Makhloof, the same title was used, as it was in all other bulls that followed.

In August of 1515 Pope Leo X answered a letter from Patriarch Simon and told him that his profession of faith did not contain the FILIOQUE (the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and Son) and that the rule prescribed once to Patriarch Jeremias in the making of Holy Chrism was not observed. He indicated also that the Maronites should go once a year to confession and Communion. Pope Leo finally confirmed Simon in his dignity as patriarch of the Maronites and granted him the palli-

Turkish domination. The period that followed was marked by the conquest of Syria and Cyprus by the Ottoman Turks under Salim I and by the rise to power in Lebanon of the Ma'nee family (1516–1697). It was marked religiously by the Catholic renewal of the Church through the Council of Trent and the introduction of its decisions into the Maronite canon law.

Modern times: 1515–1918. The Turks, under Sultan Salim I, in 1516 conquered all of Syria, Lebanon, and Egypt; in 1527 the patriarch, offering the aid of 50,000 troops, unsuccessfully asked Charles V, the Holy Roman Emperor, for aid in liberating the land [Rabbath, Documents inédits pour servir à l'histoire du Christianisme en Orient, v. 2 (Paris, Leipzig 1905–21) 616–623]. In 1562 Pius IV urged Patriarch Moses to follow the Roman Rite in the administration of the Sacraments and prescribed that the Maronite patriarchs should, thenceforth, after their elections, send with the letter of obedience a profession of faith (AC 32). In the last years of the sixteenth century, the Holy See sent three missions to the Maronites; at the suggestion of the papal legates, the Maronite patriarchs held three synods (1580, 1596, and 1598).

It was under the reigns of the three patriarchs of the Al-Reezzee family that the decrees of Trent were introduced into the Maronite Church through the successive missions sent by the pope to Lebanon. Michael Al-Reezzee was elected patriarch in 1567. Ten years later he sent emissaries to Rome to present his profession of faith (AC 42). Gregory XIII answered on Feb. 14, 1578 (AB 33), reminding the patriarch of the reforms that the popes wanted to introduce into the Maronite Church. It was the old request: the phrase "who was crucified for us" was to be suppressed from the Trisagion; Holy Chrism was to be made in the Latin style; conferring of Confirmation was to be reserved to the bishops; Holy Communion was not to be given to little children; and the Latin impediments to marriage of consanguinity and affinity were to be adopted.

Synods. John Baptist Eliano and John Bruno were pontifical legates to Lebanon when a synod was held at Qannoobeen from Aug. 15 to 18, 1580. The delegates had prepared a slightly modified text of the decrees. The first nine chapters treated dogma and the Sacraments; these were inspired principally by the Council of Florence with a few additional canons concerning the situation of the Maronites. The reform proposed by Gregory XIII was taken into consideration; but relative to the marriage impediments, only the complicated impediment of affinity was suppressed. Chapter 10 treated discipline and was inspired mainly by the Council of Trent. These decrees remained "dead letters" because it was practically impossible to change well-established customs among the Maronites.

Pope Gregory XIII in his brief Humana Sic Ferunt (1584) erected the Maronite College in Rome, under the Jesuit Fathers. This institution played an important role in the Maronite Church and in fostering oriental studies in the West. Gabriel Sionita (1577–1648), biblical scholar and linguist, Abraham Ecchellensis (d. 1644), and Joseph Simon Assemani (1687–1768), famous orientalist and custodian of the Vatican Library, are among its most famous students.

In 1584 Gregory XIII erected a college for the Maronite students in Rome and gave its direction to the Jesuits (AB 43-45; AC 55). The next pontifical delegation sent to the Maronites was headed by Jerome Dandini, SJ, who was accompanied by Father Fabio Bruno. Both delegates brought with them 200 copies of the new Missal (strongly Latinized) edited in Rome in 1592. Not knowing the oriental languages, they used as interpreters some Maronite students of the Roman college. The first session was held from Sept. 22 to 28, 1596, and decreed 21 canons. In comparison with the legislation of 1580, this one was fragmentary and lacked systematization; conferring Confirmation was definitely reserved to the bishops and the use of the new Maronite Missal was imposed; Communion under both species was still allowed; and the use of the unleavened bread was imposed. There is no record that this synod was ever approved by Rome. After the death of Patriarch Michael, his nephew Joseph was elected on Nov. 13, 1596. The new patriarch promulgated six canons that encouraged the celibacy of the secular clergy. They decreed also that monasteries and convents be under separate administration.

Patriarch Joseph Al-Reezzee held a new synod at the village of Da'yat Moossa in 1598, which decreed 31 canons. The major part of these canons treated the Sacraments and repeated the prescriptions of 1580 and 1596. Another canon reduced the time of the three periods of fasting used in the East. The acts of this synod were not sent to Rome.

Clement VIII sent a letter to Patriarch Joseph, dated Aug. 17, 1599 (AB 52), in which he defined the extent of the Latin impediments of consanguinity, affinity, spiritual relationship, public propriety, and crime, and he asked the patriarch to introduce them into Maronite canon law, granting the patriarch broad faculties of dispensation. Patriarch Joseph tried in 1606 to impose the Gregorian calendar on the Maronite Church. He succeeded in Lebanon but failed in Cyprus. The other reforms were not accepted or enforced. These synods did not treat the organization of the hierarchy. As before, the bishops remained as delegates of the patriarch and not residential prelates.

After his election in 1644, Patriarch Joseph Al-Aqoori called a synod in Hrash. The canons of this synod were divided into 7 sections: Baptism, 6 canons; Confirmation, 6; marriage, 22; priesthood, 7; Extreme Unction, 3; inheritance, 3; and commandments of the Church, 6. The complicated way of computing the impediment of affinity was taken back along with the marriage impediments; the reduction of the three fasting seasons was maintained. There is no record of any other synods held in the seventeenth century.

The later half of the seventeenth century saw an era of religious toleration during which monasteries multiplied and many European missions were established. Under the reign of Patriarch Al-Douaihi, the Maronite Order of St. Anthony was established (1700; see ANTONINES), along with the Antonine Order of St. Isaias (1704).

From 1697 to 1841. A number of canonical collections were made in the early eighteenth century. Simon Awad, nephew of the patriarch James Awad, in collaboration with Joseph Assemanni, edited a collection in four parts: the number and authority of the patriarchs, their relationship with the Holy See and with the bishops, and the list of the patriarchs of the four great sees. Peter Toulawi, a Maronite priest, translated (c. 1720) the acts of the Council of Trent with its history and added to it the decisions of the two Maronite synods of 1596, underscoring their relationship with the Council of Trent. Abdulla Qarā'āli (1716-42) wrote a resume of civil law based on the ancient oriental canons, but it also contained some Muslim jurisprudence. This resume was divided into 31 chapters. Qarā'āli also wrote a manual of civil law in the form of questions and answers entitled Al-Fatawui or Pandectes. Both books were inspired by Ibn Al-'Assāl.

Synod of Mt. Lebanon. In July of 1734 Patriarch Joseph Al Khazen, with his bishops, requested the Holy See to send them an apostolic visitor in order to help them reform their Church. They suggested the name of Joseph Simon Assemani, who was prefect of the Vatican Library. Assemani was sent by the pope as his personal legate to call a synod of the Maronite hierarchy and to take part in it with the right to vote (AB 111–114).

Assemani prepared, in Latin, a wide project of canons to be adopted by the future synod. He had the Maronite priest Andrew Scandar translate it into Arabic (Vatican Manuscript Syr. 399, in Karshuni). It was the work of a scholar, containing learned dissertations inspired by Eastern and Western sources, for example, the Trent legislation and that of the 1720 Synod of Zamost.

Assemani also used the correspondence of popes and patriarchs and the acts of the 1596 Synod of Qannoobeen. Reference was made to the Book of Guidance and to the Nomocanon of the priest George.

The synod was opened at Ryfoon on Sept. 14, 1736; but because of dissensions, the patriarch left the assembly the following day. The synod then moved to Louaizee on September 30 of the same year and remained in session until October 2. Before the assembly adopted any canons, Assemani had to modify his project in many ways. The canons of this synod marked the ratification of liturgical and canonical Latinization that the Holy See had tried to introduce into the Maronite Church since the time of the crusades. The first part treated faith, feast days, and fasting; the reduction of the three seasons of fast was definitively approved; the compilation of collections of civil and canon law for use in the diocesan tribunals was decreed; and a decision was made to revise all liturgical books. The second part treated the Sacraments: most of the marriage legislation of the Latin canon law was accepted; the use of the unleavened bread was imposed; for the forms of Baptism, Confirmation, and Extreme Unction both Latin and oriental formulas were accepted, but for the form of absolution only the Latin formula was tolerated; finally, that part of the ritual of Al-Douaihi dealing with ordination was accepted. The third part dealt with the hierarchical organization: bishops became true hierarchs of eparchies; rights of the patriarch were made precise and limited; he was to be elected by bishops only and through secret ballot; election by acclamation was valid only when there was unanimity; he was answerable only to the pope; and the number of eparchies was limited to eight, with their limits drawn by mutual accord. The fourth part dealt with the churches, monasteries, convents, and schools: the obligation of keeping registers in the parishes was introduced; monasteries and convents had to be separated; and the constitutions of autonomous monasteries (which did not join the Lebanese congregation of the Antonines) were added to the acts of the synod. At the end of October of 1736, Assemani published an instruction containing a resume of the essential prescriptions of the synod concerning secular clergy, laymen, and churches.

On Sept. 1, 1741, Benedict XIV approved in forma specifica the Latin text of the decrees of the synod of 1736, after making some 15 minor corrections in it (AB 118–119). In another constitution dated Feb. 14, 1742, he approved the accord of the Maronite bishops concerning the eight Maronite eparchies (AB 120). Finally, on Oct. 15, 1742, the pope approved in forma specifica the declarations of the superiors of the Maronite congregations of St. Anthony, made in 1737, that their constitutions would be adjusted to the new legislation of the synod (AB 122).

Because of the scarcity of copies of the synod proceedings and because of the opposition that it encountered in many fields, its decrees remained in practice unobserved.

Subsequent Synods. Patriarch Simon Awad and the Maronite bishops had made a very important decision on July 19, 1744: In civil matters the bishops had to use the two works on civil law by Qarā'āli. Benedict XIV, anxious to see the canons of the Synod of Mt. Lebanon applied, called this decision to the attention of Patriarch Simon. Simon called a synod from Nov. 28 to 30, 1755, which decreed 15 canons; the pontifical prescriptions of Benedict XIV were renewed and some new prescriptions were given, and the ritual of Al-Douaihi was to be observed, not the Book of the Priestly Rites, the work of Peter Moubarack, a Maronite Jesuit (d. 1742).

Another synod held by Tobias Al-Khazen at Beq'ata (Aug. 25 to 31, 1756) promulgated 18 canons. Patriarch Joseph Estephan held a synod at Ghosta (Sept. 16 to 21, 1768) attended by a Franciscan delegate of the Holy See to establish peace among the members of the Lebanese congregation. Among the important decisions of this synod was the decree requesting the patriarch to appoint two examiners before whom all candidates for the priesthood, secular and regular, would be examined. In the same synod, the separation between Lebanese and Aleppian congregations was decreed and later approved by Clement XIV on July 19, 1770 (AB 168).

A synod called by Bishop Michael Al-Khazen was held at Mayfooq (July 21 to 28, 1780) in the presence of the apostolic delegate. It promulgated 13 new canons, one of which was the condemnation of superstitious practices. The other canons referred to matters of discipline for the clergy and laymen. Patriarch Estephan held a synod in Ain-Shaqiq (Sept. 6 to 11, 1786), attended by few bishops and some of the Maronite nobility. The most important decision of this synod was to return to the old custom of having the bishops reside with the patriarch. On Dec. 15, 1787, Pius VI condemned this synod and asked Germanos Adam, Melkite bishop of Aleppo, to hold another synod in the name of the Holy See (AB 179). It was held at Bkerke from Dec. 3 to 18, 1790. Patriarch Estephan and his bishops attended it. Bishop Adam made them revoke the decisions of Ain-Shaqiq that were contrary to the decisions of the Synod of Mt. Lebanon. The synod reached a compromise decision concerning the juxtaposition of monasteries and convents. The Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith (AC 106) made a pronouncement about each one of the synod's disciplinary canons and ordered complete separation of religious houses for men and women.

On Nov. 1, 1816, Pius VII complained to the Maronite hierarchy about the abuses of the juxtaposition of religious houses for men and women, especially of autonomous monasteries unaffiliated with the Lebanese congregations (AB 188), and about bishops not residing in their eparchies despite the reinforcement of this obligation made in 1790. He ordered them to hold a synod in the presence of the apostolic delegate and to abolish these two abuses. The synod was held at Louaizee (April 14 to 15, 1818) and decreed 19 canons. The synod reserved certain convents to the nuns and ordered them to follow the rules decreed in 1736 for the autonomous convent of Hrash, with the exception of the rising at night for prayer. It assigned, for residence of the bishops, a monastery located in their eparchy. On March 25, 1819, Pius VII transmitted to the Maronite hierarchy a decree of the Congregation of the Propagation of Faith reproducing and making precise the decisions of this synod (AB 192-193).

In 1820 the Holy See edited an official Latin text of the Synod of Mt. Lebanon. In 1833 the Congregation of the Propagation of Faith declared that only the Latin edition of the Synod of Mt. Lebanon had force of law. It imposed in 1839 and 1840 a new edition of the Maronite ritual, which was a strongly Latinized edition, in major part inspired by that of Peter Moubarack.

From 1841 to 1955. At the request of the pope, Patriarch Paul Massad convoked a synod at Bekerke (April II to 30, 1856), but the acts of this synod were never approved by the Holy See.

In 1891 Leo XIII, with Bishop Elias Hoyek (later patriarch), erected the new Maronite College in Rome; the original college had been suppressed by the armies of Napoleon in 1808. In 1895 the same bishop founded the Congregation of the Sisters of the Holy Family, a teaching order. In 1900 Bishop Joseph Nejm edited in Arabic a translation of the Synod of Mt. Lebanon, conforming to the Latin original. Father George Manaš published in Aleppo in 1925 The Canon Law of the Maronites, a comparison of the three editions of the Synod of Mt. Lebanon (1796, 1820, 1900). Elias Az-Zaynati published in Beirut in the following year The Canon of the Lebanese Synod, a systematic presentation of the canons of the synod similar to those of the Latin code.

The Maronite patriarch is held in great esteem and exercises great influence among Christians and non-Christians alike. His residence is at Bkerke during the winter and at Deeman during the summer.

Maronite church in the United States In the 1880s and 1890s, Maronite Catholics were already to be found throughout the United States. They had immigrated primarily from Lebanon but also from Syria and other parts of the Middle East. By the beginning of World War I, Maronite communities were to be found all over the United States, and there were at least 22 permanent Maronite parishes. Ten years later, the Maronite presence had grown to 37 churches and 46 priests.

Through the efforts of Maronite clergy and laity, and the assistance of the achbishop of Washington, Our Lady of Lebanon Maronite Seminary was established in Washington, D.C in 1961. In 1966 the Holy Father established the Maronite Apostolic Exarchate for the United States and appointed Bishop Francis Zayek as the exarch. The see city was Detroit, Michigan. In 1971 the exarchate was raised to the rank of diocese, and the see was transferred to Brooklyn, N.Y. in 1978. At the time of the exarchate's establishment, there were 43 Maronite parishes in the United States.

To solidify Maronite identity and to respond to the needs of the new generations of American Maronites, a vast program of liturgical reform and translations was inaugurated in the 1970s. This resulted in the publication in English of a Maronite Lectionary, Book of Anaphoras, several editions of the books of the Divine Liturgy, Ritual, Divine Office, and liturgical music. Catechetical texts for all twelve grades based on the Maronite tradition have been published.

On March 1, 1994, as a sign of the progress of the Maronite Church in the United States, the Holy Father established a second eparchy or diocese. The new Eparchy of Our Lady of Lebanon of Los Angeles incorporates all the territory west of the Ohio-Pennsylvania border. Bishop John Chedid, who had been auxiliary bishop since 1980, was named eparch of the new jurisdiction. The new eparchy comprises 24 parishes and 9 missions. The Eparchy of St. Maron of Brooklyn consists of 33 parishes and 5 missions. With the retirement of Archbishop Zayek, Stephen Hector Doueihi was appointed as the second bishop of the Eparchy of St. Maron.

Aside from second- and third-generation American Maronites, many Maronite parishes today have experienced a large influx of immigrants who have come to the United States and to other countries since the fighting began in Lebanon in 1975 and have chosen to remain. They are not only a significant presence, but have brought with them a new injection of contemporary Maronite and Lebanese culture.

Bibliography: P. DIB, Histoire de l'Église maronite, v. 1 (Beirut 1962). P. ABRAHAM, The Maronites of Lebanon (Wheeling, W.Va. 1931). G. DANDINI, Missione apostolica al patriarca dei Maroniti del Monte Libano (Cesena 1656). P. SFAIR, La Messa siromaronita (Rome 1946); A. RABBATH, Documents inédits pour servir à l'histoire du christianisme en Orient, 2 v. (Leipzig 1905–21). T. ANAISSI, ed., Bullarium Maronitarum (Rome 1911); Collectio documentorum Maronitarum (Leghorn 1921). I. 'AOUWĀD, Le Droit privé des Maronites au temps des émirs Chihab, 1697–1841

(Paris 1938). J. A. ASSEMANI, Codex liturgicus ecclesiae universae, lib. 1-4, 8 v. in 13 (Rome 1749-66) v. 5, 7; Bibliotheca iuris orientalis canonici et civilis, 5 v. (Rome 1762-66). J. S. ASSEMANI Bibliotheca orientalis, 3 v. in 4. IBN AL-'ASSĀL, Nomocanon: Kitāb al Quwānīn, ed. M. GUIRGUIS (2d ed. Cairo 1927). A. QARĀ'ALI, Muhtaşar as-Šarī'āt, ed. P. MAS'AD (Beirut 1959), a resume of the law. C. DE CLERCQ, Conciles des orientaux catholiques, 2 v. (Paris 1949-52), 1:1575-1849. A. COUSSA, Epitome praelectionum de iure ecclesiastico orientali, 3 v. (Grottaferrata-Rome 1948-50; suppl. 1958) v. 1, 3. P. DIB, "Les Conciles de L'Église Maronite," Revue des sciences religieuses 4 (1924) 193-220, 421-439 and pub. sep. (Strasbourg 1926). F. GALTIER, Le Mariage: Discipline orientale et occidentale (Beirut 1950). P. MAS'AD, ed., Le Concile Baladi of 1856 (Beirut 1959). P. FAHED, ed., Kitāb al-Hudā (Aleppo 1935), Maronite Nomocanon. G. MANAŠ, At-Tuhfa al-adabīya fī talāta magami' māraūnīya (Juniya 1904), three Maronite synods; Al-Haq al-qānuni 'indal-Mawarina (Aleppo 1925), the canon law of the Maronites. S. ŠARTŪNĪ, "The Maronite Synods," Al-Mashriq 7 (1904), in Arabic. J. FÉGHALI, Histoire du droit de l'Église Maronite, v. 1 (Paris 1962). J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collection, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757-98) v. 2, 14, 25, 33, 35, 38.

[E. EL-HAYEK/S. BEGGIANI]

MARONITE LITURGY

The Maronite Church traces its origins to the fourth-century hermit, St. Maron, and the fifth-century Monastery of St. Maron, which was founded by his disciples. These Syriac-speaking monks and the laity who gravitated around them eventually succeeded in organizing an independent hierarchy. Located in a region that straddled both Antioch and Edessa, the MARONITE CHURCH was heir of both the liturgical practice of the church of Antioch and of the Semitic liturgical tradition that arose from Edessa and the region to the East.

The earliest extant manuscripts of the Maronite Missal highlight the Anaphora of Third Peter (also known by its Syriac name of Sharar), which shares a common root with the Chaldean Anaphora of Addai and Mari. The Maronites and CHALDEANS also share common Edessene elements in other prayers of the Divine Liturgy, in parts of the baptismal rite, and in the hymns of the divine office.

Living within the region of Antioch, the Maronites were also influenced by that tradition. With the establishment of the Maronite Patriarchate in Lebanon at the end of the seventh century, the Maronite Church adopted many Antiochene anaphoras and became a part of the Antiochene liturgical tradition. Besides the Anaphora of Third Peter, the Maronite Church employs the ancient Antiochene Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles, which became the foundation for the Byzantine Anaphora of John Chrysostom.

The first edition of the Maronite Missal was printed at Rome from 1592 to 1594. It contained some significant Latinizations. Instead of preserving the words of institution which differed in the various anaphoras, the words of institution of the Roman Missal were substituted in all the anaphoras of the Maronite Missal. The meaning of the epiklesis (invocation of the Holy Spirit) was changed. Rather than the celebrant invoking the Holy Spirit to transform the gifts into the body and blood of Christ, he prays that the effects of the Eucharist be applied to the faithful.

The most recent edition of the Missal was promulgated in 1992. It bears the title The Book of Offering (Qorbono in Syriac) According to the Tradition of the Antiochene Syriac Maronite Church. In this new edition all Latinizations and accretions have been removed. It contains six anaphoras. The traditional words of institution of the Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles have replaced those of the Roman rite in all the anaphoras. Also promulgated were a Book of Gospels and a Book of Epistles.

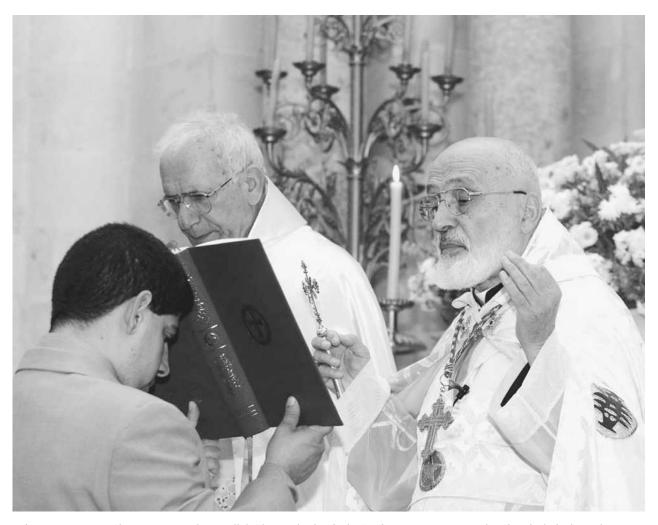

From its life in Lebanon over the centuries, the Maronite Church has also incorporated the poetry, prose, and music of the native culture and produced a rich legacy of festal rites, prayers, music, paraliturgical practices, and pious devotions. Alongside the simple, haunting melodies of Syriac chant are found the more polyphonic tones of Arabic music, and even a borrowing of European chants. The same may be said of religious art and architecture.

Bibliography: W. MACOMBER, "A Theory on the Origins of the Syrian, Maronite, and Chaldean Rites," Orientalia Christiana Periodica 39 (1973) 235–242. B. GEMAYEL, Avant-Messe Maronite Orientalia Christiana Analecta. v. 174 (Rome 1965). M. HAYEK, Liturgie Maronite (Paris 1964). S. BEGGIANI, The Divine Liturgy of the Maronite Church (New York 1998).

[S. BEGGIANI]

MAROZIA

An important figure in papal politics; fl. early tenth century. A member of the influential family of the CRES-CENTII, she was the daughter of THEOPHYLACTUS, leader of the Roman nobility, and the elder THEODORA. If the reports of LIUTPRAND OF CREMONA (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 3:312) and the Liber pontificalis are accurate, she was the mistress of Pope SERGIUS III. She was married in turn to Alberic I, Marquess of Spoleto (c. 905); Guido, Marquis of Tuscany (925); and Hugh of Italy (932). This ambitious woman reached the zenith of her power over Rome and the papacy during the first three decades of the tenth century. She imprisoned Pope JOHN X in CASTEL SANT' ANGELO, where he died in 928 either by assassination (Antapodosis 3.45) or from other causes (Annales Flodoardi MGS 3.378). In 931 she had her son, probably by Sergius III (Duchesne, Liber pontificalis 2; 243), elected to the papacy as Pope JOHN XI. During an uprising of the Roman nobility (932) led by Alberic II, her son by her marriage to Alberic of Spoleto, she was captured and imprisoned in Castel Sant' Angelo. How she died is unknown.

Lebanon's Maronite Christian Patriarch Nasrallah Sfeir (right) heads the Sunday Divine Liturgy at the Chapel of Bkerke in the mountains northeast of Beirut, November 26, 2000. (©APF/CORBIS)

Bibliography: L. BRÉHIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:1404–06. A. FLICHE, L'Europe occidentale de 888 à 1125 (Histoire du moyen âge 2; Paris 1930) 54, 112, 113, 116, 120. A FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 7:35–40. J. HALLER, Der Papstitum 2:201–202, 548–549. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von dem Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20.Jhr. 2:354–356. Cambridge Medieval History 2d new ed., 3:151–154. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 6:480–482.

[H. DRESSLER]

MARQUETTE, JACQUES

Missionary and explorer; b. Laon, France, June 10, 1637; d. near Ludington, Mich., May 18-19, 1675. He entered the Jesuit novitiate at Nancy in 1654, studied philosophy and mathematics at the University of Pont-à-Mousson (1656-59, 1664-65), and taught at the Jesuit colleges of Reims (1659-61), Charleville (1661-63), and Langres (1663–64). Shortly after ordination at Toul, France, March 7, 1666, Marquette departed for the missions of New France, reaching Quebec on Sept. 20, 1666. The following month he set out for Trois Rivières to study Algonquian under Gabriel Druillettes, SJ. Three years later he assumed charge of the Holy Ghost mission at La Pointe, on the western end of Lake Superior, ministering to native peoples of numerous tribes—the Illinois, Pottawatamis, Foxes, Sioux, and others. When the Sioux routed his charges from La Pointe, Marquette founded a new mission for them at Michilimackinac (Mackinac), renamed by him Saint-Ignace. In 1673 he set out with Louis Jolliet on the expedition to explore the Mississippi River, during which they followed the shore of Lake Michigan to present-day De Pere, Wis., then ascended the Fox River, crossed overland to the Wisconsin, and at its mouth descended the Mississippi, which Marquette named River of the Conception (Rivière de la Conception), to the Arkansas River. The expedition furnished proof that the great river did not flow westward into the Gulf of California, but southward into the Gulf of Mexico. In accordance with the promise made to the Illinois native peoples on his first expedition, Marquette set out in November 1674 to found the mission of the Immaculate Conception, Ill., offering Mass there on Holy Thursday and Easter Sunday 1675. When serious illness befell him, he decided to return to Saint-Ignace, but died en route. A statue of Marquette by Trentanove is in the Hall of Fame of the Capitol, Washington, D.C.

See Also: STECK, FRANCIS BORGIA.

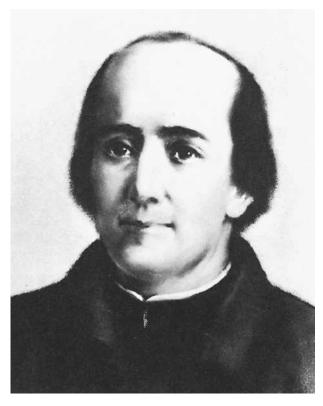

Bibliography: Jesuit Relations, ed. R. G. THWAITES, 73 v. (Cleveland 1896–1901). A. HAMY, Au Mississippi: La Première exploration (Paris 1903). C. DE ROCHEMONTEIX, Les Jésuites et la Nouvelle-France au XVIIe siècle, 3 v. (Paris 1895–96) v.3. J. DE-LANGLEZ, Life and Voyages of Lords Jolliet (Chicago 1948). "The Statue of Father Marquette in the National Capitol: Its Acceptance by the Senate," Woodstock Letters 25 (1896) 467–494. E. J. BURRUS "Father Jacques Marquette, S.J.: His Priesthood in the Light of the Jesuit Roman Archives," Catholic Historical Review 41 (1955) 257–271.

[E. J. BURRUS]

MARQUETTE LEAGUE

A mission society founded in New York City, May 1904, by Henry George Ganss, then chaplain (1890-1910) of the U.S. government Indian School at Carlisle, Pa. At the time of organization, it was decided that the league should be directed by a board of 25 members chosen from the councils of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. In the early 1960s, however, membership in a St. Vincent de Paul Society was no longer a requisite for membership in the board of directors, who were chosen from the general ranks of Catholic laity in the New York City and Brooklyn area. The purposes of the Marquette League were: to convert the indigenous people of the U.S. and to help preserve the faith among Catholic natives; to contribute to the support of native missions, mission schools, and chapels; to maintain trained catechists; and to improve the spiritual and physical condition of the Native American communities.

[M. MCDONNELL/EDS.]

Jacques Marquette.

MARRANOS

Opprobrious name given to those Jews (and, to a lesser degree, Muslims) of SPAIN and Portugal who, after being baptized under duress, practiced Judaism secretly while outwardly professing Catholicism. This crypto-Judaism was considered heretical by the Church, and the Inquisition was introduced to stamp it out. Three tragic centuries passed during which thousands died at the stake or were otherwise penanced before it disappeared. To the theologian, the Marranos posed the problem of the validity of so-called forced baptisms. The term Marrano came into popular use in the early 16th century, derived from the Spanish marrano (pig). The word does not appear in formal writings, in which the Marranos are called New Christians (Nuevos Christianos) or are simply referred to as converts (conversos).

Early History. A forerunner of Marranism is found in seventh-century Spain under the Visigoth kings, who presented the Jews with the alternative of Baptism or banishment. Many converted but Judaized secretly. The Councils of Toledo (third to 17th), A.D. 589 to 694, legislated that they must be forced to remain Christians. Again, during the First (1096–99) and Second (1147–49) CRUSADES many Jews were baptized under threat of death, but they later lapsed openly.

Marranism, however, as generally understood, dates from 1391 in Spain. During the 14th century the prosperity of Spain's highly integrated Jewry had become a source of scandal to the clergy and envy to the populace. The fanatical anti-Jewish preaching of Archdeacon Ferrand Martinez, whom neither king nor pope could silence, set off a wave of massacres in 1391, which swept over the Jewish communities of Spain. Faced with the option of death or Baptism, many Jews perished, but many more received Baptism. Estimates put the dead at 50,000 and the converts between 100,000 and 200,000. The number of the latter was further swelled by the impassioned preaching of St. VINCENT FERRER, who, passing from synagogue to synagogue with his followers, baptized about 35,000 Jews.

As things returned to normal, it became evident that not all the New Christians had broken with their former faith. Not all, of course, were insincere. Three categories are distinguishable: (1) the truly convinced, including many of Ferrer's converts; (2) lax Jews, who, having accepted Baptism from mere indifference, though insincere Catholics, could not be accused of Judaizing; (3) the Marranos properly speaking. Forced or frightened into the Church, but inwardly loyal to Judaism, the Marranos began to lead a double existence. Observing the externals of the Church and presenting their children for Baptism (which they "washed off" at home), they practiced Judaism whenever unobserved, abstaining from pork, observing Jewish holydays, circumcizing their children, etc. Throughout the 15th century, as evidences of their Judaizing multiplied, the pulpits rang out against them, and popular resentment rose. Why should these hypocrites, it was reasoned, enjoy high station unmolested, while professing Jews lived miserably because of their faith. Outbreaks, begun in 1449, culminated in the carnage of 1473-74, which fully matched the brutality that had occurred during 1391.

The Inquisition. It was now believed by many that one resort remained to restore order—the INQUISITION. The Church had always regarded Judaizers as heretics and hence subject to the discipline of the Church, and for several years the religious orders had been calling for the introduction of the Inquisition. It was formally established in 1478 by a bull of Sixtus IV under the auspices of Ferdinand and Isabella. The first AUTO-DA-FÉ (Act of Faith) was held in 1481 in Seville, where 12 Marranos were burned. Thus began the operations of the tribunal that for more than three centuries in all major Spanish cities condemned thousands of Marranos to confiscation, prison, penances, and burnings. In 1492, chiefly because of their ties with the Marranos, all Jews were expelled from Spain. About 100,000 of them crossed into Portugal, where, for a price, they were accepted. King Emanuel I (1495–1521), pressed by the Spanish monarchs to reexpel them but unwilling to forego the economic benefits they represented, literally drove them, along with their children, to the baptismal font.

Thus a new colony of Marranism was founded. The pattern set in Spain recurred: Marrano prosperity, popular resentment, massacres, and the introduction of the Inquisition. Proof of "pure blood" (limpieza) was required for admission to most professions in the Peninsula until the 18th century. Fugitives from the Iberian tribunals made their way to many European countries, to Turkey, North Africa, and the New World, thus forming a large Marrano DIASPORA. The Inquisition followed them to many of these places, even to the New World. At the end of the 19th century its task was complete: all Marranos had been exterminated or assimilated, with the surprising exception of numerous survivors discovered in northern Portugal in the 20th century.

Question of Marranos' Baptisms. The official policy of Judaism toward the Anusim (Heb. 'ănûsîm, 'the forced'') was lenient. Since their conversions were considered unwilling, the conversos were looked upon as Jews. Renowned rabbis, such as Gershom Ben Judah (d. 1028) and RASHI (d. 1105), set the tradition of reinstating them without punishment or embarrassment. The attitude of the Church was not so simple. Pope Gregory I (590–604) had formulated the classical policy toward the Jews by prohibiting molestation of them or their worship and urging kindness and persuasion alone to convert them—a policy accepted in principle but not always observed in practice.

Baptisms elicited by force were always condemned; but when administered, they were deemed spontaneous and therefore valid and binding. For invalid ministration it was required that the recipient should have openly expressed opposition at the moment of reception, though at times this could mean instant death. The Councils of Toledo in the seventh century were rigorous in this respect. So also was Innocent III, who wrote in 1201: "Whoever is led to Christianity by violence, by fear and torture . . . receives the imprint of Christianity and can be forced to observe the Christian faith" (Potthast, Bibliotheca historica medii aevi, 1479). Not all popes were of this mind, however. Honorius I (625-638) apparently doubted the validity of such Baptisms and allowed Jews so converted to return to Judaism (Patrologia Latina 80:667–670). St. Thomas demonstrated the necessary role of intention and will in receiving Baptism (ST 3, 68.7) and concluded that "since God does not force men to justification, it is clear that whoever approaches Baptism insincerely [ficte] does not receive its effects" (ST 3, 69.9). Benedict XIV (1740-58) seems also to have been of this opinion, inasmuch as he considered Baptism received without sufficient understanding to be at least doubtfully valid (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 2558–62).

Contemporary theology takes a still dimmer view of Baptisms in which violence or ignorance is involved. More concerned with the subjective requirements of the Sacraments, it concedes a more decisive role to inner dispositions and free consent. In pastoral practice, converts from sects that have lost a clear notion of the supernatural must be rebaptized at least conditionally. The present Code of Canon Law requires for validity that the subject must be "knowing and willing" (sciens et volens). It is doubtful that the Baptisms of many Marranos would satisfy these standards.

Bibliography: C. ROTH, A History of the Marranos (New York 1959). F. BAER, Die Juden im christlichen Spanien (Berlin 1929). L. POLIAKOV, Histoire de l'antisémitisme, v. 2 De Mahomet aux Marranes (Paris 1961). B. BLUMENKRANZ, Juifs et chrétiens dans le Monde Occidental (Paris 1960) 97–158. H. ERHARTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:106. E. H. FLANNERY, "The Finaly Case," The Bridge 1 (New York 1955) 292–313.

[E. H. FLANNERY]

MARRIAGE ENCOUNTER

Marriage Encounter, both a program and a movement, is an opportunity for married couples to explore their lives in the presence of God. Although the term "encounter" signifies a confrontation or even a clash, Marriage Encounter (a literal translation of the Spanish Encuentro Conjugal) means "to rediscover" or "to meet again." The program, which usually takes place on a weekend, helps couples to search for and rediscover their vision of love. With this program, God's presence is essential, because the gift of love given by the couple becomes fruitful only in God's presence through the discovery of the place of God within their lives. This belief, then, underlies Marriage Encounter's conviction of the sacredness of the covenant, the Sacrament, of marriage. Fr. Gabriel Calvo, the founder of Mariage Encounter, puts it this way: "There is within each couple a divine energy of love. It has to be released by a deep sharing between husband and wife, through the communication of their feelings and of the whole of their lives together. It cannot be done in just one moment."

The Marriage Encounter weekend provides the first moment for this release of the energy of love. During the weekend, the couples have the opportunity to search their own lives for their feelings, dreams, and desires. As they share, the Lord's presence enables the release of the energy of love. Also, as they share, they come to the discovery of God's vision for marriage, which, simply stated, is a call to become united with each other and with God.

Marriage Encounter has its origins in Spain in 1953 through the combined efforts of Fr. Calvo and several married couples (Mercedes and Jamie Ferrer; José and Marguerite Pick; Diego and Fina Bartimeo). The inspiration of the "Marriage Teams of Pope Pius XII" came from the weekly talks then being given by Pope Pius XII to newly married couples in Rome. Fr. Calvo and the couples would first read the pope's talk, along with several verses from Scripture. Then, after searching their own individual life's experience, each couple would meet to share their reflections. Afterwards, the couples would meet as a group and share these common reflections to deepen their commitment to marriage and the family. The papal talks and the reflections that flowed out of them eventually became the core topics for the presentations that are still given on Marriage Encounter weekends. The first Encuentro Conjugal was held in Barcelona in 1962. The program began in the U.S. in 1967, under the aegis of the Christian Family Movement. Marriage Encounter has also spread in Latin America, Europe, Africa, Oceania and Asia.

Within this initial group was also developed the method of communicating—a presentation based on the experience of life, a reflection on each individual's life experience, followed by a mutual sharing of this individual reflection. This is the method of dialogue as it is now practiced within Marriage Encounter, as well as such other offshoots as Family Encounter, Retorno, Priests' Encounter. The method is best summarized in another statement of Fr. Calvo: "There is no unity without reconciliation. There is no communication without communication. There is no communication without first encountering (discovering) oneself."

Marriage Encounter has had a powerful impact on thousands of couples and enabled them to renew their commitment to marriage as a ministry. Because of Marriage Encounter, these same couples who in the past saw their lives more as confusion, now see their marriages as the means for grace and life for themselves and others. Inspired by this vision, they acquire a new understanding of the Gospel and its meaning for everyday life. Ultimately, however, the final goal of Marriage Encounter is much broader than the couples themselves. There is a natural outflow of love from the couple to family, relatives, friends and, finally, to the larger communities of Church and society. Through the gift of self, there occurs an inner conversion both in the individual and the couple. This conversion becomes the basis of understanding and acceptance, out of which flows the unity of love. Marriage

Encounter presents its method as a free sharing which can be accepted or rejected. Marriage Encounter helps a couple to explore their experience of life. As they share this individual experience, they begin a journey, a search toward unity with each other and with the wider community in order to build together the new creation promised by Jesus Christ. Together, couples and their families join in a new Exodus toward the promised land which will be built on the foundation of love they have rediscovered.

See Also: WORLDWIDE MARRIAGE ENCOUNTER.

[T. HILL/J. J. KAISING]

MARRIAGE LEGISLATION (CANON LAW)

The valid law of Matrimony found in the 1983 Code of CANON LAW, is significantly different from that of the 1917 Code. The inspiration for the change derives from the documents of Vatican Council II. The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et spes) which proclaimed marriage to be a covenant or foedus, ordered for the mutual help of the spouses and for the procreation and education of children. Other important documents, such as the Decree on Ecumenism (Unitatis redintegratio), which acknowledged the existence of Christian churches and ecclesiastical communities outside of the Catholic Church, the Declaration on Religious Freedom (Dignitatis humanae), which upheld the value of the individual conscience, and above all, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium), which declared the universal call of the faithful to holiness, no matter what their state of life, each had its specific impact on the 1983 legislation on marriage. Each took a major step toward the integration of canonical traditions with the vision of the council. For detailed information about the 1983 law on marriage, a commentary should be consulted, but the spirit of the 1983 norms can be summed up in a few points.

Significant Changes. The law has been inserted into a broader theological context. Since the 12th century, canon law has used the model of Roman consensual contract to define marriage. Now the principal model is Yahweh's covenant (alliance) with his people, or Christ's union with his Church. The idea of "religious covenant" dominates the definition of marriage and provides an important hermeneutical principle for the interpretation of the new body of laws: their full and correct meaning can be grasped only if they are read and explained in their proper theological context. Although the Code continues to use the term "contract," it no longer regards it as an adequate description of Christian marriage.

The doctrine of a hierarchy of ends has been abandoned. Previously, the law viewed procreation and education of children as the primary ends of marriage; mutual help and remedy of concupiscence were its secondary purpose. In practice, however, it gave much greater importance and support to the former than to the latter. The new code presents marriage as ordered to the same ends, but it does not grant priority to either of them, although interestingly, it does treat of mutual help first (c. 1055). This shift in the understanding of ends echoes throughout the marriage canons: the importance of a close union, consortium, between the spouses has been given new prominence in the legal order.

There is a new openness in the law towards the findings of empirical psychology. This is most obvious in the rule that those who lack the capacity, due to psychological causes, to fulfill their matrimonial obligations cannot contract validly, (cf. c. 1095n.3). While canon law is competent to define the obligations, it has no competence to discover the psychological causes of the inability to fulfill the obligations. For this it must turn to the science of medicine.

The law is animated by new ecumenical spirit. Mixed religion is no longer an impediment to marriage, hence no dispensation is required for a Catholic to marry a non-Catholic Christian, although a more easily obtainable permission is still necessary. The Catholic party alone should make the promise that the Children will be educated in the Catholic faith, but he or she is bound by such a promise "as far as it can be done" (pro viribus), that is, without doing violence to the conscience of the non-Catholic partner. Further, in the case of a "mixed marriage" the local ordinary can grant a dispensation from the canonical form, provided the marriage will be celebrated in some public form. The invalidating impediment of "disparity of cult" (marriage between a Catholic and a non-baptized person) remains, but once the necessary dispensation has been granted, analogous accommodations can be made regarding the baptism and education of the children and the celebration of the marriage.

The new law is simpler than the old, and the number of impediments have been reduced. There are no prohibiting impediments any more; 12 invalidating impediments remain, but the scope of several of them has been diminished. The dispensing power of the local ordinary has also been extended. The rules for the celebration of the marriage (e.g., place and time) are now much simpler; and it is easier to delegate a priest stranger to the parish or the diocese to receive the consent of the parties.

In general, the 1983 code represents a shift towards a more personalistic and less institutional approach to marriage. The old law was conceived with the goal of protecting the indissolubility of marriage even if that meant little attention would be paid to the personal disposition of the parties, such as their mistaken knowledge, their acting under duress, or their lack of maturity. The new law continues to uphold the permanency of marital commitment, but it goes a long way toward providing remedies in case of misguided or defective consent.

The complexity of the procedural norms in nullity cases have been reduced. Provided the diocesan tribunals take advantage of the new rules, the "trials" can be made more expeditious. The law allows the judges to give more weight to the depositions of the parties, and in exceptional circumstances it allows one (not three, as usual) judge to conduct the case and to decide it. It also permits the substitution of a "review" of the first sentence instead of a formal trial by an appellate court.

Remaining Uncertainties. On balance the 1983 code as a whole is a significant improvement over the 1917 code. Some notable problems, however, remain. Christian marriages are not distinguished with sufficient clarity from natural marriages. The result is that the unique character and effects of the sacramental covenant between the parties, and between God and the couple, remain obscured. This leads to some ambivalence, e.g., the code states that all marriages are indissoluble, yet it provides ways and means to dissolve any natural marriage "for the sake of the faith"; methodologically it would have been better to speak of the indissolubility of the Christian covenant only.

The drafters of the new law did not find a solution for the case of the baptized unbelievers. According to sound theology, faith is necessary for the valid reception of a Sacrament. According to canon law, the reception of the Sacrament is necessary for the valid marriage of baptized persons, believers or not. This divergence between doctrine and law creates an absurd situation: the Church appears to be forcing the Sacrament on unbelievers.

The code displays an uneasy and precarious compromise between the principles of medieval metaphysical psychology and the findings of modern empirical psychiatry. Scholastic philosophy based on Aristotle's theories assumes a much sharper distinction between the "faculties of the soul" (that is, between the mind and the will) than the modern student of the human psyche accepts. Yet, the validity of a marriage must be determined, to a significant extent, by applying the ancient conceptions. The result is an uneven administration of justice.

There is still more centralization than necessary. For no apparent theological reason, most of the ordinary cases of the "privilege of the faith" cannot be handled by the diocesan bishop but must be submitted to the Holy See, which usually means expense and delay. The law offers no assurance of the speedy resolution of nullity cases, and the parties have no remedy in case of delays. The result is again an uneven administration of justice, depending on local circumstances. In general, the procedure still remains cumbersome, demanding an outlay in personnel, energy, and money that many churches, especially in developing countries, can ill afford.

Bibliography: J. P. BEAL et. al., eds. The New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York 2000). T. MACKIN, Marriage in the Catholic Church: Divorce and Remarriage (New York 1984). R. MALONE and J. R. CONNERY, eds., Contemporary Perspectives on Christian Marriage: Propositions and Papers from the International Theological Commission (Chicago 1984). L. ORSY, Marriage in Canon Law: Text and Comments, Reflections and Questions (Wilmington, Del. 1986), B. A. SIEGLE, Marriage According to the New Code of Canon Law (New York 1986). L. WRENN, Annulments (4th rev. ed. Wash., D.C. 1983). I. GRAMUNT, J. HERVADA and L. WAUCK, Canons and Commentaries on Marriage (Collegeville 1987). L. WRENN, The Invalid Marriage (Washington, DC 1998). R. M. SABLE, ed. Incapacity for Marriage: Jurisprudence and Interpretation (Rome 1987).

[L. M. ORSY/EDS.]

MARROQUÍN, FRANCISCO

First bishop of Central America; b. probably in valley of Toranzo, Santander, Spain, 1477; d. Guatemala City, April 18, 1563. In November 1528, already ordained, he arrived in Mexico City with Bishop-elect ZU-MÁRRAGA, who named him his first vicar-general. As such, Marroquín acted with great firmness at the time of the riot in the cathedral on Pentecost, May 16, 1529. The riot had been begun by the members of the royal court and their leader Nuño de Guzmán when Zumárraga had their cruelties against the native Mexicans publicly condemned. Marroquín excommunicated all of them. Because this action imperiled his life, Marroquín was sent by Zumárraga shortly thereafter to Central America as provost for Guatemala, Honduras, and El Salvador. His first task was to learn the languages of the indigenous people of his new jurisdiction. He welcomed Dominicans (1535) fleeing from Peru and brought Mercedarians (1537) from Mexico City and Franciscans (1540) from Spain. Marroquin personally taught the native languages to his priests and friars.

On April 7, 1537, Zumárraga consecrated him bishop of Guatemala: the first episcopal consecration in the New World. Using largely his own funds, Marroquín began the construction of churches and a cathedral, set up dowries for poor girls, and in 1553, a special school for Spanish orphan girls. In 1559 he tried to get royal permission to found a university. When this project failed, he founded the Colegio de Santo Tomás with the Dominicans. In his will he set aside generous sums for the future university. As bishop, Marroquín was protector of the indigenous people and to this task he devoted his best efforts. He often freed those unjustly enslaved and endowed them with lands to support themselves. He promoted the plan of the Dominicans to evangelize Tezulutlan through peaceful means. Marroquín, however, was far from an admirer of bishop Bartolomé de LAS CASAS and his impetuous methods and put his criticisms on record in a famous letter to the king, which the friends of Las Casas usually quietly ignore. In general, Marroquín tried to integrate the indigenous people in the spiritual, economic, and social life of the young colony.

Bibliography: F. A. DE FUENTES Y GUZMÁN, Recordación florida: Discurso historial y demostración natural, material, militar y política del Reyno de Guatemala, 3 v. (Guatemala 1932–33). L. LAMADRID, "Bishop Marroquín-Zumárraga's Gift to Central America," Americas 5 (1948–49) 331–341.

[L. LAMADRID]

MARSEILLES

Marseilles is the chief seaport of France on the Mediterranean; capital of Bouches-du-Rhône department; and since 1948 seat of an archbishopric (Massiliensis) immediately subject to the Holy See.

City. Founded c. 600 B.C. by a Greek colony from Phocaea and taken by Julius Caesar in 49 B.C., it was a Gallo-Roman civitas occupied by Visigoths (480), Burgundians, and THEODORIC THE GREAT (507–537), and finally ceded to the Frankish kingdom. In 879 it was incorporated into the kingdom of Boso, later the kingdom of Arles. In feudal times it was divided among the seigneuries of the bishop, viscount, and Abbey of Saint-Victor. Louis of Anjou conquered it (1246), and Louis XI annexed it to the crown of France (1486). Rebuilding in the 17th century increased its area from 161 to 482 acres. Trade with the Levant made it rich, and in the 19th century it became an industrial city and France's main port.

Marseilles must have known Christianity early through its contact with the East, but its first bishop was not LAZARUS, risen from the dead in the Gospels, as 12th-century legends say (see AIX). A 2d-century inscription seems to be its oldest relic of Christianity. It probably had a bishop in the 3d century, but Oresius at the Council of Arles (314) is the first-known bishop. Marseilles had several famous priests and religious c. 400, including SALVI-AN and John CASSIAN, who founded there c. 415 the oldest and most famous monastery in Gaul, SAINT-VICTOR, through which Eastern spirituality entered the West. The writer GENNADIUS died there c. 500.

Saracen raids and the establishment of a Saracen military colony on the coast of Provence ruined Marseilles.

During the obscure period from the 6th to the 10th century, the bishops are said to have left the city for the Abbey of Saint-Victor; at least they administered the abbey's goods. Bishop and viscount divided the city c. 1069, and the walled episcopal part became a fortress. The Cathedral of Notre-Dame-la-Majeure, outside the walls from the 6th century (almost the only such instance known), was rebuilt c. 1150 in Romanesque within the bishop's quarter. In 1257 the bishop had to cede his seigneurial rights over the city to Charles of Anjou, but in 1275 he still regarded himself as a subject of the emperor.

As a military port, Marseilles was a center of galley slaves. St. VINCENT DE PAUL performed a mission of charity among them (1622) and contributed to a hospital founded for them (1643). The 19th century brought a profound change in the religious life of the city. Napoleon's fall was regarded as a blessing; his continental system had ruined trade. The city became legitimist, afire with a traditional and exuberant Catholicism. Caulkers and stevedores formed brotherhoods; there were penitents, and a mission in 1820 had great success. The episcopacies of the Mazenods (1823–37, 1837–61) were conservative, after the Old Regime. Then the population increased, and a new bourgeoisie, less faithful, arose; but the masses kept their faith, however little they practiced it (12 to 15 percent in 1953).

Archdiocese. From the 4th century Marseilles, the chief Greek colony in Provence, acted like a metropolitan. Its bishop created the Diocese of Nice, another Greek colony but not a Roman civitas; installed a bishop in Toulon; and then in the 5th century tried to do the same in two nearby villages, Cithariste and Garguier, dependent on the civitas of ARLES but cared for by Marseilles. Arles protested this invasion of its rights, and the papacy intervened. Marseilles had to yield, but these quarrels filled the whole episcopacy of Proculus (380–428), who at the Council of Turin (398) secured recognition of himself, for life, as a metropolitan (of Narbonensis II?). Pope Zosimus, however, withdrew the rights and finally forbade him to exercise his episcopal functions (417–418). But Proculus did as he wished and died (428) in the peaceful possession of his see. The incident shows Rome's wish to judge as a final court of appeal and to fix metropolitan boundaries according to civil provinces. Its metropolitanate ended, Marseilles had to content itself with being a suffragan of Arles. It was the only diocese in Gaul to be almost entirely urban.

Marseilles' bishops include: Honoratus I (d.c. 500), who wrote a vita of St. HILARY OF ARLES; the doubtful St. Cannas; St. Theodore (566–591), who was involved in the intrigues and quarrels of Frankish kings; William Sudre (1361–66), cardinal legate of Urban V; Philip Ca-bassole (1366–68), who performed many missions for the popes of Avignon and was patriarch of Jerusalem, cardinal, rector of the county of Venaissin, and the friend and patron of PETRARCH; the Oratorian Jean-Baptiste Gault (1642–43), who in his four months in Marseilles made a lasting impression by his active and personal charity to galley slaves and by his care to restore the holiness of the priestly life; and Henri de BELSUNCE (1709–55), a converted Protestant and adversary of the Jansenists, whose heroic charity during the plague of 1720 and 1721 was marked by his consecration of the city to the Sacred Heart and who never left his diocese, of which he wrote a history. Suppressed as a suffragan of Arles by the CONCORDAT OF 1801, the see was restored in 1822 as a suffragan of Aix with its present borders (250 square miles).

Notre-Dame de la Garde. (©Michael Freeman/CORBIS)

Bernard, abbot of Saint-Victor (1065–79), was the legate of Gregory VII to the Diet of Forcheim (1077). St. ELZÉAR OF SABRAN (1286–1323) and his wife St. Delphine (1284–1360) were canonized by their nephew Urban V in 1369. Several modern programs for the education of youth prospered under the direction of priests [Fathers Allemand (1772–1836) and Caire]. Father Timon-David (1823–91) from 1847 to his death inspired the Work of Youth for the Working Class with the need for a deeply Christian life. The Work, which educated 15,000 children, had 17 affiliates during his lifetime.

Marseilles' monuments include Saint-Victor (11th century), the old cathedral (12th–15th century), and the new Byzantine style cathedral (1852–93). Its great shrine is the Romanesque Notre-Dame de la Garde (1214) on a hill overlooking the city. There are pilgrimages to Notre-Dame du Château, to Allauch, to Notre-Dame de Toussaint, and to Ste.-Marthe.

Bibliography: ALBANÈS and CHEVALIER, Gallia christiana novi ssima: Marseilles (Valence 1899). Les Bouches-du-Rhône: Encyclopédie départementale, 17 v. (Marseilles 1913–37). P. BROU-TIN, La Réforme pastorale en France au XVII^e siècle, 2 v. (Tournai 1956). J. B. DUROSELLE, Les Débuts du catholicisme social en France (1822–1870) (Paris 1951). J. LEFLON, Eugène de Mazenod, Bishop of Marseilles, Founder of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, tr. F. D. FLANAGAN (New York 1961–), with recent bibliog. L. H. LABANDE, "L'Église de Marseille et l'abbaye de Saint-Victor à l'époque Carolingienne," in Mélanges F. Lot (Paris 1925) 307–329. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10.2:2204–93; 8.2:2044–86. L. GROS, La Pratique religieuse dans le Diocese de Marseille (Marseilles 1954). O. ENGELS and L. VOEKL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); 7:107–108. Annuario Pontificio (1965) 265.

[E. JARRY]

MARSILIUS OF INGHEN

Scholastic philosopher and theologian; b. near Nijmegen, Holland, c. 1330; d. Heidelberg, Aug. 20, 1396. A disciple of JOHN BURIDAN, he taught arts at Paris with notable success and was twice elected rector (1367, 1371). In 1377 he represented the English nation of the university at Avignon. He was again in Avignon in 1378 and traveled to Italy. Studying theology at Paris, he became a master before 1382. When the University of Heidelberg was founded in 1385 by Urban VI, he was appointed its first rector and began lecturing in 1386. Through his efforts Heidelberg quickly became a center of nominalism and a cultural influence in Germany.

In logic he followed the via moderna of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, denying the reality of UNIVERSALS and the traditional meaning of suppositio simplex, which he classified under material supposition. His nominalist revision of the Summulae logicales of Peter of Spain was published many times under the title of Textus dialectices (Vienna 1512, 1516, etc.) and used as a text in many German universities. He also commented on the Prior Analytics of Aristotle (Venice 1516).

In natural philosophy he followed Buridan rather than Ockham, teaching the new theory of IMPETUS to explain projectile motion and acceleration. He also adopted the graphic coordinate method of describing intension and remission of forms proposed by NICHOLAS ORESME. Because of the condemnation of Latin AVERROISM in 1277, he admitted the possibility of infinite magnitudes and of rectilinear movement of the universe as a whole. Accepting the proportions of velocities proposed by THOMAS BRADWARDINE, he combined the Mertonian calculationes with the new Parisian physics in his commentaries on Aristotle's Physics (Lyons 1518), De generatione et corruptione (Strasbourg 1501), and in his Abbreviationes libri physicorum (Venice 1521).

In his Quaestiones supra quatuor libros sententiarum (Strasbourg 1501) he was less skeptical than Ockham regarding the ability of reason to prove the existence of God, preferring the arguments of DUNS SCOTUS. However, since nothing can come from nothing, he insisted that philosophy cannot demonstrate the creation of the universe from nothing. Regarding free will, he followed Buridan in teaching a modified determinism, insisting that the will is not always free to choose. With ALBERT OF SAXONY, he promoted nominalism in German universities.

Bibliography: G. RITTER, Studien zur Spätscholastik, v.1 of Marsilius von Inghen und die ockhamistische Schule in Deutschland (Heidelberg 1921). J. HANSLMEIER, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); supplement, Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., part 1 (1966) 7:108. B. NARDI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:330. A. C. CROMBIE, Augustine to Galileo: The History of Science, A.D. 400–1650 (Cambridge, MA 1953). M. CLAGETT, The Science of Mechanics in the Middle Ages (Madison, WI 1959).

[A. MAURER]

MARSILIUS OF PADUA

Medieval political philosopher; b. Padua, Italy, probably between 1275 and 1280, the son of a Paduan notary.

Life. The details of his early life are obscure. It seems likely that he began his education at the University of Padua and subsequently studied medicine and philosophy at Paris. Certainly he was rector of the University of Paris in 1313, and he was teaching there in 1324 when he completed his one major work, a treatise called Defensor pacis (crit. ed. R. Scholz, Hanover 1932–33, and C. W. Previté-Orton, Cambridge, Eng. 1928; Eng. tr. A. Gewirch, New York 1956). This book was vehemently antipapal in tone, and when Marsilius's authorship of it became known he was forced to leave Paris. He took refuge at the court of the German king, Louis IV of Bavaria, who was engaged in a dispute with Pope JOHN XXII.

In 1327 Marsilius accompanied Louis on an expedition into Italy. The imperial forces occupied Rome early in 1328 and a series of assemblies of the Roman people was held (a procedure entirely in accordance with Marsilius's political theories). These assemblies acclaimed Louis as emperor, denounced the pope as a heretic, and approved the installation of an antipope. Marsilius himself was appointed vicar of Rome and vigorously persecuted the clergy who remained loyal to Pope John. Within a few months, however, the Roman mob turned against its new emperor and Louis was forced to leave Rome. Marsilius accompanied him back to Germany and spent the rest of his life at the imperial court. In 1342 he produced a brief treatise entitled Defensor minor, in the main a restatement of the conclusions of the earlier book. He died a few months after completing this work.

Teaching. Marsilius grew up at a time when the political role of the popes was a matter of intense controversy. During the 13th century the theory of a universal temporal dominion inhering in the papacy had come to be stated more and more explicitly by canonists, theologians, and popes. Some reaction against such a claim was natural and, perhaps, desirable. But with Marsilius the reaction was carried to a point where he advocated a radical secularism and denied to the pope any legitimate jurisdiction, even in ecclesiastical matters. The Defensor pacis was divided into three books. The first presented a philosophy of the state; the second, a theology of the church; and the third, a brief summary of conclusions.

In Book one Marsilius followed Aristotle in asserting that the state existed to enable men "to live and live well." The only authority competent to enact law for the state, he maintained, was a legislator humanus composed of "the whole body of citizens or the weightier part (pars valentior) thereof" (1.12.3). This was because laws were made to promote civil justice and the common welfare, and the whole body of citizens was the best judge of the common utility of a law. Moreover, "That law is better observed by every citizen which each one seems to have imposed upon himself . . ." (1.12.6). Marsilius held that, for the preservation of peace, there had to be one single supreme "governing part" to enforce the law, and he insisted that it should be chosen by the whole community. Powers of government could be vested in one man or several and a people might even choose to install a line of hereditary monarchs, but, whatever the precise form adopted, legitimacy of government depended on popular consent. A ruler who persistently violated the laws established by the community was to be deposed and punished.

Book two is strikingly different in tone and in manner of argument. The author began by rebuking the papacy for its "ardent desire for rulership" (2.1.1), and, against the papal claims to temporal power, he quoted texts such as Jn 18.36, "My kingdom is not of this world." According to Marsilius, Christ conferred on the Apostles only a power to administer Sacraments, not coercive jurisdiction of any kind. Marsilius would have liked to see the Church stripped of all its power, privileges, and property. His argument went even further, however, for he attacked root and branch the whole Petrine theory of papal primacy and indeed the whole conception of any divinely ordained hierarchical structure in the church. All the Apostles shared equally the same priestly power, he maintained, and Peter was given no jurisdiction over the rest. In any case, the bishops of Rome were not necessarily successors to any authority that might have inhered in Peter.

It remained true that there was a need for some regulation of ecclesiastical affairs. Marsilius argued, therefore, that the same legislator humanus (the whole community) that appointed the civil government should also control ecclesiastical appointments. All candidates for ordination as priests were to be selected by the community; so were the bishops. If a community wished to punish religious unorthodoxy, it was for the community to enact appropriate legislation and for the civil government to enforce it. If doubtful matters of faith had to be decided, the appropriate tribunal was a general council in which laity as well as clerics were represented. And, again, the summoning of such a council pertained to the legislator or an official to whom the legislator had delegated this authority (Marsilius had in mind the emperor). It was these views on the structure of the Church, not the preceding political argumentation, that John XXII condemned as heretical.

Critique. The significance of Marsilius's contribution to political theory has been sharply debated in modern times. He has been regarded as both a forerunner of modern democracy and a prophet of the modern totalitarian state. Some scholars argue that Marsilius rejected the whole preceding tradition of a rational natural law to substitute instead the theory that the will of a sovereign people was the sole source of law. Others point out that Marsilius did require law to conform to principles of justice and that he approvingly quoted Aristotle's dictum, "Law is reason without desire" (1.11.4). The view of Marsilius as a radical democrat cannot be sustained since he explicitly stated that the quality of persons as well as their numbers should be considered in determining the "weightier part" of a community. On the other hand, his insistence that rulers had to govern according to the law indicates that he was not intending to propound a theory of political absolutism. Marsilius's theory of the state was in fact firmly rooted in the earlier tradition of medieval constitutionalism. If it contains elements of thought that seem strikingly modern that is perhaps because the jurists and philosophers who preceded Marsilius had already begun to formulate the concepts of law and sovereignty that would be developed into the theory of the modern state. Marsilius certainly selected for emphasis just those ideas that would be most important in the future.

The very bitter antipapal polemics in Book two were of course far removed from the main stream of earlier medieval thought, though one can find anticipations of them among the Spiritual Franciscans and the legists of Philip the Fair. These views retained a considerable notoriety during the next two centuries. Several Catholic critics of Luther accused him of espousing the heresies of Marsilius, and the Defensor pacis was translated into English in 1536 to provide ideological support for the policies of Henry VIII.

Bibliography: C. K. BRAMPTON, "Marsiglio of Padua: Life," English Historical Review 37 (1922) 501–515. R. W. and A. J. CARLYLE, A History of Mediaeval Political Theory in the West, 6 v. Edinburgh 1903–36; repr. New York 1953). A. GERWITH, Marsilius of Padua: The Defender of the Peace, 2 v. (New York 1951–56); "John of Jandun and the Defensor Pacis," Speculum 23 (1948) 267–272. E. LEWIS, "The 'Positivism' of Marsiglio of Padua," ibid. 38 (1963) 541–582.

[B. TIERNEY]

MARTÍ, MARIANO

Spanish bishop and educator; baptized Bafrim, Tarragona, Spain, Dec. 14, 1721; d. Caracas, 1792. The details of Martí's life are sketchy and hard to obtain. He was the son of a rural physician of Bafrim. He studied in the provincial seminary and took the doctorate in civil and Canon Law at the University of Cervera, no longer in existence. He was vicar-general of the archbishopric of Tarragona in 1761 when his name was suggested by the King of Spain for the See of Puerto Rico, left vacant on the death of Bp. Pedro Martínez de Oneca. As soon as the appointment was confirmed, Martí left for his diocese and he was consecrated on Jan. 17, 1762, in La Guaira, Venezuela, by Bp. Diego Antonio Díez Madroñero, to whose see Martí succeeded eight years later. In Puerto Rico he began his pastoral visits almost at once. On Nov. 26, 1763, he was in Arecibo and on Jan. 17, 1764, in Coamo and Río Piedras. The report of that visit, no longer available, contained important statistical data indicating that the island had 6,440 citizens and 46,197 residents. Martí gave special attention to the problem of education. By a decree of 1764, schools were established in Bayamó and Guaynabo and, according to Cuesta Mendoza, he was responsible for starting schools in 20 other towns on the island. The same year he began his visits to the overseas territories of the diocese: Trinidad, Margarita Island, and the vast expanse of eastern Venezuela, which later became part of the Diocese of Guiana. On Aug. 19, 1764, he arrived in Cumaná and on March 18, 1766, in Nueva Guayana or Angostura (now Ciudad Bolívar), Venezuela. In June he returned to Cumaná and then to Margarita where he survived an earthquake on Oct. 21, 1766. He stayed on the island until May 1767, possibly helping to repair the ravages of the disaster. Unfortunately the report of this visit has not been preserved. In poor health because of his arduous journeys, he renounced the episcopacy. The king would not accept the resignation, but instead ordered the Council of the Indies to find another diocese for Martí. On Dec. 9, 1768, he signed a confidential report on the clergy of Puerto Rico. The bishop of Caracas died on Feb. 3, 1769, and Martí was appointed in November to succeed him; he arrived in Caracas in June 1770 to take possession of the diocese. More is known of his work in Venezuela than of that in Puerto Rico. While he was bishop, part of the diocese was separated to form the bishopric of Mérida. During his 21 years in Caracas, Martí ordained 532 priests. His most memorable accomplishment was the pastoral visit that took from 1771 to 1784. A monument to his untiring zeal and spirit of sacrifice, the visit also supplied the most complete collection of geographical, demographical, statistical, and artistic data on Venezuela at that time. Martí's extant works are: the final Relación; the Compendio; manuscripts of two volumes of administrative suggestions and five volumes of inventories; and his "personal" or "secret" papers, which contain valuable confidential reports and references.

Bibliography: J. SURIA, El eximo prelado doctor Mariano Martí, obispo de Caracas y Venezuela (Caracas 1962). A. CUESTA, MENDOZA, Historia de la educación en el Puerto Rico colonial, 2 v. (Mexico 1946–48).

[L. G. CANEDO]

MARTIALL, JOHN (MARSHALL)

Controversialist; b. Daylesford, Worchestershire, 1534; d. Lille, France, April 3, 1597. He was educated at Winchester and at New College, Oxford, where he graduated as a bachelor of civil law in 1556. He left a teaching post at Winchester in 1560 and joined the group of English religious exiles studying at Louvain. He dedicated his Treatise of the Cross (Antwerp 1564) to Queen Elizabeth, who retained a crucifix in the royal chapel. Martiall wrote a reply to James Calfhill's attack on his work (Louvain 1566) and was corrector for the press of Thomas Harding's Answer to Jewell's Challenge (1566). He later received a bachelor of divinity degree at DOUAI (1568), and was one of the group of scholars WILLIAM ALLEN gathered there for the English College. But Martiall, always pressed for funds, returned to Louvain. His financial distress was relieved when Owen Lewis obtained for him a canonry in Lille. Because of civil disturbances in Flanders, however, he was not installed in the canonry till 1579. Little is known of his later life.

Bibliography: J. GILLOW A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time 4:476–479. A. C. SOUTHERN, Elizabethan Recusant Prose, 1559–1582 (London 1950).

[T. H. CLANCY]

MARTILLO MORÁN, NARCISA DE JESÚS, BL.

Lay mystic; b. 1832, at Daule (Nobol) near Guayaquil, Ecuador; d. Dec. 8, 1869, Lima, Peru. Narcisa's parents, Pedro Martillo Mosquera and Josefina Morán, were peasant farmers who died while Narcisa was very young. The middle child of nine, Narcisa moved to Guayaquil to find work as a seamstress to help support her siblings. For more than fifteen years, with a short break (c. 1865) in Cuenca, she dedicated her life to manual labor, prayer, teaching catechism, and caring for the neediest residents of the capital. In Cuenca, she was invited by the bishop to enter the Carmelites, but discerned that her vocation was in the world. In 1868, she travelled to Lima, Peru, where she lived as a lay woman in the Dominican convent. A pious woman, Narcisa did penances and was devoted to the Cross of Christ. Soon after her death pilgrims began praying at her tomb in Lima. Her cause for beatification was opened in 1889. In 1955, her body was translated to Guayaguil and now rests in her native town of Nobol under the altar of the Santuario de la Beata Narcisa de Jesús. During her beatification ceremony (Oct. 25, 1992), Pope John Paul II praised her as the glory of Ecuador.

Feast: Aug. 30.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 21 (1992): 1017.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MARTIN, GREGORY

Scripture scholar, best known for his Rheims-Douay Version of the Bible; b. Maxfield, Sussex, England, c. 1540; d. Reims, France, Oct. 28, 1582. One of the original scholars of St. John's College, Oxford (1557–69), Martin became an expert in Greek and Hebrew. Among his fellow students was Edmund CAMPION, whom he helped to bring into the Catholic Church. Martin then spent about a year (1569–70) in the household of Thomas Howard, fourth Duke of Norfolk, as tutor to his sons, one of whom later became Bl. Philip HOWARD. But always a stanch Catholic, Martin left this post when the Howard family began to be influenced by Protestantism. In 1570 he entered the college at DOUAI (Douay) that William ALLEN had founded (1559) for English Catholics. After his theology course there, he was ordained at Brussels (1573). Having taught at Douai for three years, he spent two years in Rome, assisting Allen in founding the English college (Venerabile Collegio) there. In July 1578, when Allen's college was removed from Douai to Reims, Martin moved to Reims, where for the next four years he taught Scripture, Greek, and Hebrew. During these years he produced, at Allen's request, an English translation of the whole Bible from the Latin Vulgate.

Although he received valuable assistance, mainly in the revision and the notes, from his Reims colleagues Thomas WORTHINGTON, Richard BRISTOW, John Reynolds, and Allen himself-all Oxford men-the bulk of the translation was a result of Martin's incredible industry. The pressure, however, was too much for him, and he died of consumption at the age of 42 as his NT was coming off the press at Reims. For lack of funds his OT, in two volumes, was not printed until 1609-10 at Douai. The statement on the title page of Martin's NT that this version was "diligently conferred with the Greeke" was no idle claim. Though made directly from the Latin, his translation shows the influence of the original Greek in several respects, notably in its correct use of the article. Despite its numerous Latinisms, caused partly by a desire for extreme fidelity to the Vulgate and partly by the current fashion in English literature, the Rheims-Douay Version often has original fine turns of expression, many of which were borrowed by the makers of the King James NT (1610); see J. G. Carleton, The Part of Rheims in the Making of the English Bible (Oxford 1902). As revised by R. CHALLONER (1749-50), Martin's Rheims-Douay Version was the only standard Bible used by Englishspeaking Catholics until the 20th century, when it was supplanted by new versions.

Bibliography: H. Hurter, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 3:278–280. E. Vansteenberghe, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.1:216–217. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time 4: 484–491. B. Ward, Catholic Encyclopedia 9: 727–728.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

MARTIN, KONRAD

Bishop, theologian; b. Geismar, Prussia, May 18, 1812; d. Mont-Saint-Guibert, Belgium, July 16, 1879. He studied at Munich under DÖLLINGER and afterward at Halle, Würzburg, and Münster. After ordination (1836) he became professor of moral and pastoral theology at the University of Bonn (1844) and wrote extensively on dogmatic and pastoral questions. As bishop of Paderborn from 1856, he was a leader in the Catholic revival in Germany, noted for his apostolic zeal and promotion of Christian unity. He founded a religious congregation of women, improved his diocesan government at a synod (1867), and advanced the education of his clergy. His concern for the Protestants within his diocese led him to publish Ein bischöfliches Wort. . . über die Kontrover

spunkte (1864). It was written in a conciliatory spirit and won considerable attention, but also led to passionate controversy. Wozu noch die Kirchenspaltung? (1868) also caused much discussion by questioning Catholics and Protestants concerning the continued divisions within Christianity, but the outbreak of the KULTURKAMPF deprived it of its chances for success. Pius IX held Martin in high esteem and had him as a guest in the Quirinal in 1867 and again in 1869. At VATICAN COUNCIL I Martin was a prominent figure; as a member of the deputation on faith he had an important role in formulating the conciliar constitution on faith and the doctrine of papal infallibility, which he supported. During the Kulturkampf he was imprisoned (1874–75) and removed from office by the government. After his release he spent his remaining years in exile in Belgium. Several of his numerous works were translated into French, Dutch, Italian, Polish, and Hungarian.

Bibliography: W. LIESE, Konrad Martin (Paderborn 1937); 'K. M.'s kirchliche Bedeutung,'' Theologie und Glaube 30:44–51. P. HADROSSEK, Die Bedeutung des Systemgedankens für die Moraltheologie in Deutschland seit der Thomas-Renaissance (Munich 1950) 107–115, passim. C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council, 2 v. (New York 1930). N. MIKO, ''Publikation des Dogmas von der Unfehlbarkeit des Papstes durch das dt. Episkopat,'' Römische Quartalschrift für Christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte
58 (1963) 14–30.

[K. HONSELMANN]

MARTIN, MOTHER MARY

Founder of the MEDICAL MISSIONARIES OF MARY; b. Marie Helena Martin, in Dublin, Ireland, Apr. 25, 1892; d. Jan. 27, 1975, Drogheda, Ireland. During World War I, she trained as a Voluntary Aid Defense nurse and was posted to hospitals in Malta and in France, during which time she became inspired to continue her healing work after the war. It became her dream to found a religious congregation and do medical work as a missionary. Hearing of an opportunity to work in a mission in Calabar, South Nigeria, she trained in midwifery in Dublin and went to Africa for three years, primarily caring for women and maternity cases. Her commitment to the life of a religious healer deepened, but she had many years to wait until the Holy See decided to let religious do obstetrics and surgery. Martin and two companions received religious training from the Benedictines of Glenstal Abbey, County Limerick, in return for their housekeeping services at the abbey school. The abbey was founded in honor of Dom Columba Marmion who had always been a spiritual inspiration for her.

Permission for religious to practice medicine came in 1936 with the instruction Constans ac sedula of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith and in May of that year the Holy See gave its consent to the founding of a new congregation. Miss Martin and her two companions sailed for Calabar in early 1937, but soon after arrival she contracted malaria and nearly died. Her sickbed profession, Apr. 4, 1937, in Port Harcourt, marked the founding of the Medical Missionaries of Mary. Still severely ill, Sister Mary of the Incarnation, or Mother Mary, had to leave Africa under medical instructions, never to return. Her two companions remained behind in noviceship and worked to build the first mission.

At home and improved in health, Mother Mary's efforts were turned to getting support for her fledgling congregation. Her brother gave her a house called Rosemount in Dublin to be a house of studies for the new novices, and in December of 1938, the novitiate at Collon, County Louth, was canonically erected and five novices were received. The following December, a maternity hospital, Our Lady of Lourdes, was opened in Drogheda. The congregation, growing rapidly, needed a larger novitiate by 1940, and a new one was built in Drogheda, which also is the motherhouse. In 1942, the hospital received state recognition as a training school for sistermidwives, and today the International Missionary Training Hospital is in full operation.

Mother Mary continued as mother general until January of 1969 when she resigned. She was confined to bed for many of her last years and died at the motherhouse. Much of the growth and success of the Medical Missionaries of Mary throughout the world was due to the unflagging zeal of Mother Mary, who was able to excite the interest and cooperation of many supporters and vocations. Her community continues to expand, working on four continents with over 25 mission hospitals, many outpatient clinics and field stations.

[A. M. HUBBARD]

MARTIN, RAYMOND JOSEPH

Theologian; b. Neerpelt, Belgium, Sept. 27, 1878; d. Étiolles, France, Aug. 19, 1949. He entered the Dominican Order in 1896 and was ordained in 1902. He served as master of novices at La Sarte near Huy, Belgium, from 1906 until 1909, then as professor of theology at the Dominican theologate in Louvain until 1940. Specializing in medieval theology, he published an edition of the works of Robert of Melun, Oeuvres de Robert de Melun (3 v. Louvain 1932–41), and of Peter Comestor's work on the Sacraments, Pierre Mangeur, De sacramentis (Louvain 1937). In 1921, in collaboration with J. Lebon and J. de Ghellinck, he founded the well-known collection of patristic and theological studies, Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense. In his work La Controverse sur le péché; originel au debut du XIVe siècle (Louvain 1930), Martin worked out a new opinion regarding the essence of original sin according to medieval theologians. He also wrote a few articles in defense of the Thomistic doctrine of the divine influence on human acts. With Martin the historical study of theology had its first representative among the Belgian Dominicans.

Bibliography: Studia mediaevalia in honorem . . . R. J. Martin, O.P. (Bruges 1948), see bibliog. of Martin's works, 27–37, two bio-bibliog. notices: L. VAN HELMOND, 7–8, and G. DE BRIE and S. BROUNTS, 9–25.

[J. COPPENS]

MARTIN, RICHARD, BL.

Gentleman, lay martyr; b. Shropshire, England; hanged at Tyburn (London), Aug. 30, 1588. Martin, who was educated at Broadgates Hall, Oxford, was condemned to execution for aiding a priest. For having paid sixpence for the supper of Bl. Fr. Robert MORTON, he died with BB. Fr. Richard LEIGH, Edward SHELLEY, Richard FLOWER, John Roche, and St. Margaret Ward. Richard Martin was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MARTIN, VICTOR

French canonist and historian; b. Saint-Clément (Allier), May 23, 1886; d. there, Sept. 7, 1945. He was the youngest of seven children in a rural family. After studying in Moulins at the minor seminary (1899–1903) and major seminary (1903–06) and at the university seminary in Lyons (1906–10), he was ordained (1910) and then served as curate in Saint-Cosne d'Allier parish in the Diocese of Moulins (1910–14) and as chaplain in the church of Saint-Louis des Francçis in Rome (1914–19). He gained the degrees of doctor in Canon Law (1914) and doctor of literature (Docteur ès Lettres, 1920). In 1919 he became a professor in the major seminary in Moulins. In 1921 he went to the University of Strasbourg as professor of Canon Law on the faculty of theology and acted as dean of this faculty (1923–45). In the latter capacity he reorganized the theology faculty when it was renewed after World War I and made numerous trips to Central Europe.

From 1928 to 1945 Martin was codirector of the 26-volume Histoire de l'Église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, founded by Augustin FLICHE. He wrote the following books: Le gallicanisme et la Réforme catholique. Essai historique sur l'introduction en France des décrets du concile de Trent, 1563–1615 (1919); Le gallicanisme politique et le clergé de France (1929); Les origines du gallicanisme (2 v. 1939); Les negociations du nonce Silingardi . . . relatives à la publication du concile du Trent, 1599–1601 (1919), a collection of documents; Les cardinaux et la Curie (1930); and Les Congrégations romaines (1930). Martin's works on Gallicanism and its origins are regarded as the best on the subject.

Bibliography: A. FLICHE, "Mgr. Victor Martin," Revue d'histoire de l'Église de France 32 (1946) 221–225.

[E. JARRY]

MARTIN I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: July 5, 649 to June 17, 653 (when he was deported to Constantinople) or Sept. 16, 655 (when he died). He is venerated as a martyr.

Martin was born at Todi in Tuscany. After serving the Roman Church as lector and deacon, he was sent to Constantinople as apocrisiarius for Pope THEODORE. In that role he became aware of the efforts of the imperial court, including the patriarchs of Constantinople, to find a formula that would reconcile the opposing parties in the long-standing quarrel over the relationship between the divine and the human nature of Christ. On one side stood the those who accepted the decision of the Council of CHALCEDON (451) emphasizing the coexistence of the two natures; on the other were the adherents of MONOPH-YSITISM who insisted on the preeminence of Christ's divine nature. At a time when Muslim forces were engulfing the Asian provinces of the Eastern Roman Empire, where the Monophysites predominated, the imperial government was desperate to find a dogmatic formula that would reconcile the Chalcedonian and the Monophysite positions and thus restore the religious unity of the Christian empire led by the emperor in Constantinople. The result was the promulgation in 638 of a decree called the Ecthesis, which established MONOTHELITISM as the official doctrine on the issue of the two natures of Christ. Since approval of the pope was crucial to the imperial quest for doctrinal unity, pressure was put on Rome to accept Monothelitism. Although Pope HONORIUS (625-638) took a compromising stand, his successors refused to accept the imperial position; so also did Christians throughout Italy and Africa. Faced with prospect of the loss of the West over a theological issue, the imperial government issued the Typos in 648, forbidding further discussion of the Christological issue. The new order was sent to Pope Theodore for his approval, but he died before it arrived.

Upon his election as pope, Martin I disregarded traditional usage and was consecrated without seeking approval of the imperial government, an act that perhaps suggested his decision to defy the emperor. Convinced that the time was at hand to reinforce orthodoxy by an official, public action that would make Rome's position clear on the Christological dispute, the new pope summoned a Lateran synod which opened in October 649 with 105 bishops, mostly from Italy, in attendance. Also present was Maximus the Confessor, an accomplished theologian outspokenly opposed to Monothelitism and well qualified to assist the synod in defining orthodoxy. After five sessions during which the teachings of the fathers on Christ's divine and human natures were reviewed in detail, the synod issued a symbol of faith which confirmed the ruling of the Council of Chalcedon on Christ's nature, twenty canons condemning specific aspects of Monothelistism, and a judgment anathematizing the patriarchs of Constantinople—but not the emperors responsible for promulgating the Ecthesis and the Typos. A letter was sent to the Emperor Constans II informing him of the decisions of the synod. Martin also circulated an encyclical summarizing the acts of the synod not only in the West but also in the East, where he sought to counter the disarray in ecclesiastical governance resulting from the Muslim conquests by designating apostolic vicars to act in the name of the pope in the cause of orthodoxy.

Even before the end of the Lateran synod Constans II moved to counter Martin's acts of independence. He ordered the exarch of Ravenna, Olympius, to arrest the pope and compel the acceptance of the Typos from all bishops and clerics, but only if the army in Rome agreed to such an action. Olympius found wide support for Martin's position, one indication among many that by the mid-sixth century imperial authority was waning in Italy, even in the army which was increasingly led and manned by native Italians whose interests were local. Olympius then contrived an assassination plot as a way of disposing of the pope, but that too failed, some believed because of divine intervention showing God's favor on the pope. Olympius then made peace with Martin and took his forces to Sicily, ostensibly to aid in the defense against Muslim attackers but more like to ally with the invaders as a step in seizing the imperial office; whatever plans he had ended shortly with his death. Freed for the moment from imperial threats, Martin devoted his energy to a farflung correspondence attempting to defeat Monothelistism and to rally the Christian community around Rome.

But the pope's truce with the imperial government did not last long. In 653 Constans II ordered the new exarch, Theodore Calliopas, to arrest the pope and bring him to Constantinople for trial. Despite continued support from the Romans, Martin refused to resist the exarch for fear of violence. In June 653 he was taken prisoner and put aboard a ship for Constantinople. After a yearlong trip during which he was treated brutally, the pope arrived in Constantinople in September 654. During that interval, the Romans elected a new pope, Eugenius I, an act that seemed to indicate the acceptance of Martin's deposition by the imperial government and a recognition of the emperor's willingness and ability to take action against those who defied his commands.

Upon his arrival in Constantinople Martin was publicly humiliated and imprisoned for three months. Although badly weakened from the treatment extended him during his long trip from Rome, he was eventually brought to trial as an usurper charged with treason stemming from his relationship with Olympius and for providing aid to the Muslim attackers of Sicily. Martin's efforts to introduce religious issues into the proceedings were rebuffed by the court. He was judged guilty, stripped of his insignia of office, and sentenced to death. On the plea of the patriarch, the death sentence was commuted to exile. Martin was sent to Cherson in the Crimea, where after more suffering he died on Sept. 16, 655. His colleague in defending orthodoxy against Monothelitism, Maximus the Confessor, suffered a like fate soon after. While Martin's career provided dramatic evidence of the extent to which the papacy was under imperial control at mid-sixth century, it also demonstrated the decisive role of the papacy in the definition of doctrine and thus on the unity of the Christian community, an issue crucial to the wellbeing of the imperial government. And it brought to light signs of the decline of imperial influence in the West in a context which gave the bishop of Rome a significant place as a rallying point in defying imperial control.

Feast: Nov. 12 (Western Church); April 13 (Greek Church).

Bibliography: Le Liber Pontificalis ed. L. DUCHESNE, 3 v., 2nd ed. (Paris 1955–1957) 1: 336–340, Eng. tr. in The Book of Pontiffs (Liber Pontificalis). The Ancient Biographies of the First Ninety Roman Pontiffs to A.D. 715, tr. with intro. by R. DAVIS, Translated Texts for Historians 5 (Liverpool 1989), 68–71. P. PEETERS, "Une vie grecque du Pape S. Martin I," Analecta Bollandiana 51:299–346. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v., 2nd ed. (Leipzig 1885–1888) 1: 230–234. Sancti Martini Pontificis Romani Epistolae, Migne, Patrologia Latina 87 (Rome 1863) cols. 111–204; 89 (Rome 1879) cols. 591–604. Concilium Lateranense a 649 celebratum, ed.R. RIEDINGER, Acta conciliorum oecumeni-corum, Series secunda, v. 1 (Berlin 1984). Literature. C. J. HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d''après les documents originaux, tr. H. LE-CLERCO, v. 3, part 1 (Paris 1905) 434-461. W. M. PEITZ, "Martin I und Maximus Confessor," Historisches Jahrbuch 38: 213-238, 429-548. É. AMANN, "Martin I,er (Saint)," in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10/1 (Paris 1928) cols. 185-194. E. CASPAR, "Die Lateransynod von 649," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 51: 75-137; Geschichte des Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft, v. 2: Das Papsttum unter byzantinisches Herrschaft (Tübingen 1933) 553-574. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte des Papsttums. Eine Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zum Tod Pius X, v. 2: Das Papsttums im Frühmittelalter. Geschichte des Päpste von Regierungsantritt Gregors des Grossen bis zum Mitte des ll. Jahrhundert (Leipzig 1934) 59-65. O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Langobardi, Storia di Roma 9 (Bologna 1941) 337-350. L. BRÉHIER and R. AIGRAIN, Grégoire le Grand, les États barbares et la conquête arabe (590-757), Histoire de l'Église depuis les origines jusqu'a nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, 5 (Paris 1947) 165-179, 402. J. HALLER, Die Grundlagen. V. 1 of Das Papsttum: Idee und Wirklichkeit, (Basel 1951) 305-327. P. LEMERLE, "Les répercussions de le crise de l'empire au VIIe sur les pays d'Occident," and O. BERTOLINI, "Reflessi politici delle contorversie religiose en Bisanzio nelle vicende del sec. VII in Italia," both in Caratteri del secolo VII in Occidente, 2 v., Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'alto medieovo 5 (1958) 2: 713-731; 733-789, 791-810. J. RICHARDS, The Popes and the Papacy in the Early Middle Ages, 476-752 (London, Boston, and Henley 1979) 181-200. T. F. X. NOBLE, The Republic of St. Peter. The Birth of the Papal State, 680-825 (Philadelphia 1984) 1-14. P. CONTE, Il Sinodo Lateranense dell'ottobre 649: la nuova edizione degli atti a cura de Rudolf Riedinger: rassenga critica di fonti dei secoli VII-XII, Collezione Teologica 3 (Vatican City 1989). Martino I papa (649-653) e il suo tempo. Atti del XXVIII Convegno storico internazionale, Todi, 13-16 ottobre 1991 (Spoleto 1992). P. LLEWELLYN, Rome in the Dark Ages (London 1993) 141-172, especially 150-156. S. COSETINO, "Dissidenzia religiosa e insubordinazione militare nell'Italia bizantina: Martino I papa (649-653) e il suo tempo," Rivista di storia della Chiesa de Italia 48: 496-512. B. NEIL, "The Lives of Pope Martin I and Maximus the Confessor: Some Reconsiderations of Dating and Provenance," Byzantion 68: 91-109.

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

MARTIN IV, POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 22, 1281 to Mar. 29, 1285; b. Simon de Brion, or Brie, near Angers; d. Orvieto. In 1260 he became chancellor of LOUIS IX. As cardinal (1261) he was papal legate in France under Urban IV, Clement IV, and Gregory X and supported the advancement of Louis's brother, Charles of Anjou, to the Sicilian throne. It was to Charles that he owed his election to the papal throne at Viterbo (1281) and his coronation at Orvieto, where he resided since he was not allowed to enter Rome. Martin in turn reinforced Charles's position in Italy by making him Roman senator and endorsing his Eastern projects. In 1281 he excommunicated the Emperor MICHAEL VIII PALEOLOGUS, thereby ruining any chance for the reunion of the Eastern and Western Churches before 1437. The anti-French rebellion in Sicily, the Sicilian Vespers (1282), forced Charles to abandon the hoped-for conquest of Constantinople in favor of the reconquest of Sicily. The Sicilians tried to place their League of Free Communes under papal suzerainty but later called in King Peter III of Aragon, who had long plotted to invade the island. Pope Martin reciprocated by excommunicating the Sicilians, declaring their new King deposed, and organizing a crusade gainst Peter under Philip III of France. Sicily and Aragon successfully resisted, but the papacy long remained committed to the reconquest of Sicily. Martin was deeply interested in the work of the FRANCISCANS, granting them the right of preaching and hearing confessions in the bull Ad fructus uberes (1281) and relaxing their rules on poverty in the Exultantes (1283).

Bibliography: MARTIN IV, Les Registres de Martin IV, 3 pts. (Paris 1901-35). H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902-32) v. 16. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950-53) v. 5. J. R. STRAYER, "The Crusade against Aragon," Speculum 28 (1953) 102-113. H. WIERUS-ZOWSKI, "Politische Verschwörungen . . . König Peters von Aragon . . . ," Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 37 (1957) 136-191. D. J. GEANAKOPLOS, Emperor Michael Palaeologus and the West, 1258–1282 (Cambridge, MA 1959). E. BOSHOF and F. R. ERKENS, Rudolf von Hapsburg (1373–1291). Eine Königsherrschaft zwischen Tradition und Wandel (Cologne 1993). E. BIGGI, "Un intervento inedito di Martino IV tra frati minori e clero di Piacenza nel 1282," Archivum Franciscanum Historicum (1997) 349-53. O. CARTELLIERI, Peter von Aragon und die Sizilianische Vesper (1977). P.-V. CLAVERIE, "L'ordre du Temple au coeur d'une crise politique majeure: La 'Querela Cypri' des années 1279–1285," Le Moyen Âge (1998) 495–507. A. FRANCHI, I Vespri Siciliani e le relazioni tra Rome e Bisanzio. Studio critico sulle fonti (Assisi 1997). R. KAY, "Martin IV and the Fugitive Bishop of Bayeux," in Councils and Clerical Culture in the Medieval West (1997). K.B. MCFARLANE, England in the Fifteenth Century (London 1981). E. PÁSZTOR, "Per la storia dell'amministrazione dello Stato Pontificio sotto Martino IV," in Onus Apostolicae Sedis. Curia romana e cardinalato nei secoli XI–XV (Rome 1999) 265–76. A. PAPADAKIS, Crisis in Byzantium: The Filioque Controversy of the Patriarchate of Gregory II of Cyprus (1283-1289) (New York 1982). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 202.

[H. WIERUSZOWSKI]

MARTIN V, POPE

Pontificate: Nov. 11, 1417 to Feb. 20, 1431; b. Oddo COLONNA in Genazzano, Italy, 1368; d. Rome. The only pope from this old Roman family, Martin was elected at the Council of CONSTANCE after a long discussion on electoral procedure and a very brief conclave, in which 22 cardinals and 30 deputies from the five nations participating in the council voted. He soon won general recognition, except in Aragon, where a minor schism (antipopes

"Tomb Effigy of Pope Martin V," bronze sculpture by Simone di Giovanni Ghini, located in the Basilica of St. John Lateran, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

BENEDICT XIII and Clement VIII) lasted until 1429. Emperor SIGISMUND attempted to detain the pope in Germany; the French offered him AVIGNON as a residence. But the council ended on April 22, 1418, and the pope left for Rome on May 16. However, he had to wait more than a year in Florence before he could finally enter Rome on Sept. 28, 1420. His return was of crucial importance for the future of the PAPACY and of the STATES OF THE CHURCH.

The pope energetically addressed himself to restoring the prestige of the papacy, which had suffered grievously during the WESTERN SCHISM. He initiated an extensive correspondence with all European sovereigns and sent numerous embassies on peace missions, especially to England and France, which were involved in the Hundred Years' War. He devoted special attention to the campaign against the HUSSITES. The Roman CURIA was reorganized in accord with the decrees of Constance, the curial officials of both Rome and Avignon were united, and a model administration built up. When the five-year concordats made at Constance expired, Martin returned to the old policy of papal reservations as far as the ecclesiastical policy of the individual states allowed. In the protracted and stubborn negotiations with Aragon, Martin made great concessions to the king; the Concordat of Genazzano (1426) with FRANCE contained provisions favorable to the Curia; Martin failed to get the hated regulations on the award of benefices in England revoked (see PRAEMUNIRE, STATUTE OF; PROVISORS, STATUTE OF). Yet the net result of these negotiations proved tolerable in practice. Of greater importance for the history of the papacy was Martin's restoration of papal power and hegemony in the Papal States—a restoration he pursued with the greatest energy and with all the means at his disposal. First of all, the dangerous condottiere Braccio di Montone was blocked and then overcome at the battle of Aquila by a great array of papal troops. Next, the pope successfully countered the attempt of King Alfonso V of Aragon to take Naples. He put down by force of arms the revolt in Bologna in 1429. To secure his power the pope maintained strong troop concentrations, and a large portion of papal revenues went to paying these troops.

In Rome the VATICAN and Lateran basilicas were again restored and the streets widened. Rome and Constantinople were in constant contact, the Greek embassy at the Council of Constance having already held forth prospects of reunion and of a council in Constantinople. But the negotiations foundered on the political situation and on the emperor's demand that every controversial question be exhaustively examined at such a council. In exact accord with the decree Frequens, the pope convoked a council in Pavia in 1423, moved it to Siena, and then dissolved it because of poor attendance and its tendency to adopt radical decrees. Likewise in accord with Frequens, he announced a council in BASEL for 1431 and named Cardinal CESARINI presiding officer. Though Martin had been a strong supporter of the Council of PISA (1409) and its CONCILIARISM, and though as pope he devoted himself to the program outlined at Constance, especially to the reform of the Church, he wisely and successfully opposed any overly strict limitation of papal power.

Bibliography: Acta Concilii Constanciensis, ed. H. FINKE, 4 v. (Münster 1896–1928) v. 4. Repertorium Germanicum (Berlin 1916) v. 4 Martin V., 1417–1431, ed. K. A. FINK (Berlin 1943–58). K. A. FINK, ''Die politische Korrespondenz Martins V. nach den Brevenregistern,'' Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 26 (1935–36) 172–244; ''Martin V. und Bologna, 1428–1429,'' ibid. 23 (1931–32) 182–217; ''Die Sendung des Kardinals von Pisa nach Aragon im Jahre 1418,'' Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 41 (1933) 45–59; Martin V. und Aragon (Berlin 1938); ''Papsttum und Kirchenreform nach dem grossen Schisma,'' Theologische Quartalschrift 126 (1946) 110–122; ''Zur Beurteilung des grossen abendländischen Schismas," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 73 (1962) 335-343; "Die Wahl Martins V.," in Das Konzil von Konstanz, ed. A. FRANZEN and W. MÜLLER (Freiburg 1964) 138-151. J. HALLER, "England und Rom unter Martin V.," Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 8 (1905) 249-304. R. LOENERTZ, "Les Dominicains byzantins . . . et les négociations pour l'union . . . 1415 à 1430," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 9 (1939) 5-61, P. PART-NER, The Papal State under Martin V (London 1958). W. J. KOU-DELKA, "Eine neue Quelle zur Generalsynode von Siena 1423-1424," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 74 (1963) 244-264. P. DE VOOGHT, "Le Conciliarisme aux conciles de Constance et de Bâle," in Le Concile et les conciles (Chevetogne 1960) 143-181, but see Irénikon 36 (1963) 61-75; "Le Concile oecuménique de Constance et le conciliarisme," Istina 9 (1963) 57-86. R. BÄUMER, "Das Verbot der Konzilsappellation Martins V. in Konstanz," in Das Konzil von Konstanz, op. cit. 187-213. V. LAURENT, "Les Préliminaires du concile de Florence. Les Neuf articles du pape Martin V et la réponse inédite du patriarche de Constantinople Joseph II (Octobre 1422)," Revue des études byzantines 20 (1962) 5-60. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 239-241.

[K. A. FINK/L. SCHMUGGE]

MARTIN OF BRAGA, ST.

Distinguished missionary archbishop and writer; b. Pannonia, c. 515; d. Braga (ancient Bracara), c. 579. After a long pilgrimage to Palestine, where he learned Greek, Martin acquired good training in theology and entered the monastic life. He decided to go to the extreme West, to Gallaecia (modern Galicia and northern Portugal). In 550, he founded and was first abbot of a monastery at Dumio, not far from Bracara, the capital of the Suevian kings. In 557, he was elected first bishop of Dumio. He presided over the second synod of Bracara in 572, and, at the death of the metropolitan Lucretius, he became archbishop of that city. His life ambition, the conversion of the Suevian kings and people from Arianism to Catholicism, was crowned with success, and the poet Venantius FORTUNATUS could hail him justly as "the apostle of Gallaecia."

In spite of his active life as a zealous pastor, his extant writings reflect a remarkable breadth of knowledge and a high level of culture for his age. His Aegyptiorum Patrum sententiae, dealing with the lives of the Desert Fathers, is a translation from the Greek made for the edification of his monks. His Formula vitae honestae, addressed to King Miro, contains a series of precepts and expositions connected with the four cardinal virtues. It is based in large part, apparently, on the lost De officiis of Seneca. His De ira, as the title indicates, is likewise based on Seneca. On the other hand, his Pro repellenda iactantia, De superbia, and, especially, Exhortatio humilitatis, owe much to John CASSIAN's monastic Instituta as well as to Seneca.

His pastoral instruction, De correctione rusticorum, written deliberately in a plainer and more familiar Latin style, is of special interest because it furnishes so much information on the old Roman superstitions and practices that still persisted in Spain. For its content, he drew material from sermons of St. CAESARIUS OF ARLES dealing with the same theme. The canonical collection called the Capitula Martini contains some elements at least that belong to him. He also wrote a work on Baptism, Epistola ad Bonifacium episcopum de trina mersione. Finally, he tried his hand at metrical composition. Of the few verses extant, the most interesting are the six which he composed for his own epitaph. Collections of his sermons and letters are lost.

Feast: March 20.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, ed. C. W. BARLOW (Papers and Monographs of the American Academy in Rome 12; New Haven 1950). O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–32) 5:379–388. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 10.1:203–207. J. MADOZ, "Martín de Braga," Estudios Eclesiásticos 25 (1951) 219–242. C. P. CASPARI, Martin von Bracaras Schrifs De correctione rusticorum (Christiania 1883), still important for its introduction. S. MCKENNA, Paganism and Pagan Survivals in Spain Up to the Fall of the Visigothic Kingdom (Washington 1938). H. HASEL-BACH, Sénèque des IIII vertus: la Formula honestae vitae de Martin de Braga (pseudo-Sénèque), tr. J. COURTECUISSE (Bern 1975), critical ed.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

MARTIN OF LEÓN, ST.

Ascetic and theologian; b. near León, Spain, c. 1125; d. León, Jan. 12, 1203. Martin's biography, attributed to Lucas of Túy, says that Martin spent his childhood in a monastery but then went on a long pilgrimage before returning to León. In 1185 he began a series of 58 sermons for his fellow CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE, in which, at times, he argued vehemently against Jews and heretics. The many Biblical quotations in Martin's writings have caused them to be called a Concordia of the Bible. He relies heavily on ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, AUGUSTINE, GREGORY I THE GREAT, and CASSIODORUS, while his doctrine on the Trinity is copied from PETER LOMBARD. He quotes no Arabic authors. His cult, authorized in 1632, was later suppressed and Martin has fallen into obscurity.

Feast: Feb. 11(?).

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 208–209. J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essor de la littéature latine au XIIe siècle, 2 v. (Brussels-Paris 1946) 1:224–225. A. VIÑAYO GONZÁLEZ, San Martín de León y su apologética anti judía (Madrid 1948). BP. LUCAS OF TÚY, Santo Martino de León: vida y obras narradas por el Tudense, tr. A. VIÑAYO (León, Spain 1984).

[E. P. COLBERT]

MARTIN OF TOURS, ST.

Monk and bishop of Tours (371 to 397), patron of France; b. Sabaria (Szombathely, Hungary), c. 316; d. Candes, Nov. 8, 397. The assertion of Sulpicius Severus [Dialogues 1 (2).7] that he was a septuagenarian when he visited Emperor Maximus at Trier (c. 385), taken with that of Gregory of Tours (Historia Francorum 1.36), who dates his birth in the 11th year of the Emperor Constantine (counting from July 306), suggests that he was born c. 316–317, though scholars differ in the matter of Martinian chronology. Martin's pagan parents reared him in Pavia, Italy, and he became a catechumen; at 15 he took the military oath and at 18 (c. 334–335) received Baptism (Sulpicius Severus, Vita 2.3). While one interpretation limits Martin's soldierly career to 5 years, the Vita supports the view that it was JULIAN THE APOSTATE (Caesar, 355–360) who gave him his discharge at Worms in 356.

HILARY OF POITIERS (c. 350–367) ordained Martin an exorcist following his discharge (Vita 5). Hilary's exile (356–360) by Arian Emperor CONSTANTIUS II (353–361) paralleled Martin's visit to his parents and his activity against ARIANISM in the Illyrian province, after which he embraced the monastic life, first at Milan and later on the island of Gallinaria (Vita 5.6).

Upon Hilary's restoration to his see, Martin returned to France, where at Ligugé, 8 kilometers south of Poitiers, he established c. 360-361 what may have been the first French monastery (Vita 7). Thence, drawn by a ruse to TOURS, he was consecrated bishop, probably on July 4, 371 (Vita 9; Historia Francorum 1.48; 2.14; 10.31). For a time the new bishop resided at his cathedral, until with 80 disciples he reassumed a monastic way of life at Marmoutier outside Tours (Vita 10) and established rural parishes (Historia Francorum 10.31). Occasionally consulted by Emperor Maximus (383-388) at Trier [Dialogues 1 (2).5, 6], Martin received a pledge from him that PRISCILLIAN, following his appeal from the synod of Bordeaux (384), would not be executed. Priscillian, however, was put to death (fall 386), and Martin broke communion with Bishop Ithacius and the Spanish bishops until he received a promise that measures against the Priscillianists would be dropped. Martin joined Ithacius at the consecration of Bishop Felix of Trier (c. 386–387), though afterward he reproached himself for weakness [Dialogues 2 (3).11–13]. He died on a pastoral visitation at Candes; three days later, a vast crowd of mourners attended the burial at Tours (Historia Francorum 1.48; 2.14; Sulpicius Severus, Epistles 3). His successor, Bishop Brice (397–c. 444), erected a small chapel that was replaced during the pontificate of Perpetuus (461–491) by a more pretentious edifice (Historia Francorum 10.31). Relics were dispersed three times—in the 9th century, in 1562, and in 1793—before the rediscovery of the saint's tomb on Dec. 14, 1860. The confessio formerly attributed to him is not considered authentic.

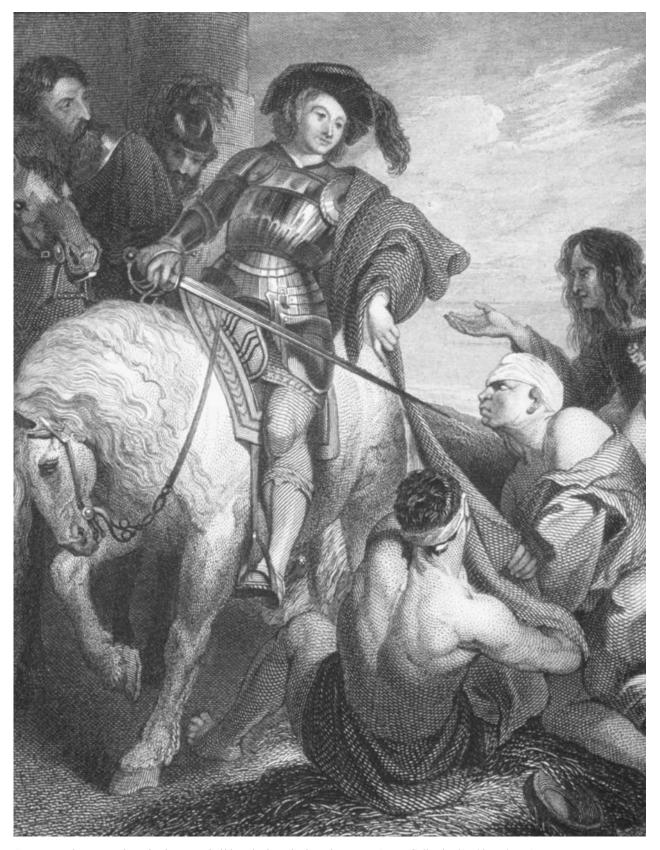

Feast: Nov. 11.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS 1748a. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 5610–66. SULPICIUS SEVERUS, Vita s. Martini, ed. C. HALM (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 1; 1866). GREGORY OF TOURS, Historia Francorum, 1:36–38, 43 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 1.1; 1884). E. C. BABUT, Saint Martin de Tours (Paris 1913). H. DELEHAYE, "Saint Martin et Sulpice Sévère," Analecta Bollandiana 38 (1920) 5–136. É. GRIFFE, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine (Paris 1947) 1:199–220; "La chronologie des années de jeunesse de s. Martin," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 62 (1961) 114–118. L'Année Martinienne à Tours, Revue d'histoire de l'Église de France 47 (1961), memorial issue. J. FONTAINE, "Chronologie," S. Martin et son temps (Studia anselmiana 46; 1961) 189–236.

[H. G. J. BECK]

MARTIN OF TROPPAU

Dominican in Prague, papal chaplain and apostolic penitentiary; b. probably Troppau (Silesia, then part of the kingdom of Bohemia), after 1200; d. Bologna, after June 22, 1278. Although the surname "Polonus" has another explanation besides his nationality, he was probably of Slavic origin. In any case, he was consecrated archbishop of Gnesen by Nicolas III on June 22, 1278, but died on the way to his see. Widely traveled, he was highly esteemed as a preacher (Sermones de tempore et de sanctis) and canonist (Tabula decreti); he revised and improved the format of the Italian catalogs of emperors and popes in his Chronicon summorum pontificum imperatorumque (ed. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 22:377–475) and thereby achieved an extraordinary reputation as a historian during the late Middle Ages. As a practical workbook for canonists and as an aid for preachers, Martin compiled a summa of historical material (cf. Flores temporum by a Franciscan of apparently the same name) until 1288, in which critical research and scholarship were singularly lacking. This work had been suggested by CLEMENT IV and reflected the point of view of the MENDICANT ORDERS. Fables, e.g., the story of the popess JOAN and popular legends, e.g., the establishment of the electoral college by Otto III, have survived as a result of this literary work and served as a source for later uncritical historiography. The chronicle saw numerous recensions and translations. Martin's name became a byword for unknown chroniclers.

St. Martin of Tours on horseback, giving half his cloak to the homeless poor. (Kean Collection/Archive Photos)

Bibliography: A. POTTHAST, Regesta pontificum romanorum inde ab a. 1198 ad a. 1304 2:1726, n. 21340. W. WATTENBACH,, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter bis zur Mitte des 13.Jhr. 2:466–472. O. LORENZ, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter, 2 v. (Berlin 1886–87) 1:3–12. P. DAVID, Les Sources de l'histoire de Pologne à l'époque des Piasts (963–1386) (Paris 1934) 243–244. B. SCHMEIDLER, Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters 3:282–289. H. GRUNDMANN, "Geschichtsschreibung im Mittelalter," Deutsche Philologie im Aufriss, v.3 (2d ed. Berlin 1962) 2238–39, 2278. B. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7:119.

[H. WOLFRAM]

MARTINA, ST.

Virgin martyr. Her vita is an adaptation of the legend of St. Tatiana, according to which she was the orphaned daughter of a former consul, a deaconess, and a virgin martyr under Alexander Severus (222–235), tortured and beheaded for her faith. Her cult goes back to the seventh century in Rome, where she had an oratory near the Mamertine prison (Patrologia Latina 75:237). A church in her honor, built in the secretarium of the Roman senate by HONORIUS I (625–638) and enlarged by ADRIAN I (772–795), was reconstructed under URBAN VIII when her relics were discovered there in 1634. She is mentioned in the Roman Capitularia evangeliorum (mid–eighth century), in the martyrologies of St. Jerome, ADO, and US-UARD, and in the Roman MARTYROLOGY.

Feast: Jan. 30 (formerly Jan. 1).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum. Jan. 1:11–19. J. W. LEGG, ed., The Second Recension of the Quignon Breviary, 2 v. (London 1908–12). M. ARMELLINI, Le Chiese di Roma, ed. C. CECCHELLI, 2 v. (Rome 1942). "Des publications hagiographiques," Analecta Bollandiana 23 (1904) 344.

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

MARTINDALE, CYRIL CHARLES

Jesuit scholar, writer, and preacher; b. London, May 25, 1879; d. March 18, 1963. The son of Sir Arthur Martindale, a civil servant who spent most of his active life in India and Ceylon, Cyril was educated at Harrow School. He was received into the Catholic Church by the Jesuit fathers at Bournemouth and soon afterward entered the English Jesuit novitiate. After philosophical studies at St. Mary's Hall, Stonyhurst, he matriculated at Pope's Hall (afterward Campion Hall), Oxford, in 1901 and had a distinguished academic career, receiving first-class honors in literae humaniores and numerous prizes and scholarships in classics and theology. He taught at Stonyhurst College and at Manresa House before returning to Oxford. He was ordained in August of 1911.

Despite his great scholarship, Martindale spent little time in formal teaching. At Oxford during World War I, he did much to help the wounded Australian soldiers in the hospital there, and so began an apostolate that reached the ends of the earth and every class of people. He was uniquely equipped to stimulate the awakening apostolic spirit of English Catholics, and in many fields he was prophetic in his understanding of the religious needs of his times. Thus, his work with university students (he was a tireless supporter of PAX ROMANA, for which he did much to establish) encouraged the intellectual development of Catholic life throughout the world.

He was an enthusiastic and informed pioneer of the liturgical revival, especially through his books on the Mass. His position on the Permanent Committee of the International Eucharistic Congresses took him to Australia, Africa, and South America and brought him close to the realities of missionary work. Deeply rooted in the Greco-Roman culture of the West, he saw very clearly that the future must bring great changes. The APOSTLESHIP OF THE SEA was established largely through his efforts. He was a preacher and speaker of unique appeal, lacking of rhetoric, but with a personal sympathy that later made him the most popular of broadcasters. An army of converts, from dukes to dustmen, bear witness to his patience as a teacher. He was never surprised by human folly, and he was never so much at home as in the East End of London, where he did an immense amount of work in clubs and settlements to manifest the Church's concern for the poor.

During World War II, he was in Denmark at the time of its invasion and was held captive until the end of the war. After his release he returned to England and, despite recurring illness, kept up a large correspondence and showed a lively interest in the new manifestations of Catholic life he had done so much to stimulate. Although he wrote some books and articles that were scholarly, his greater achievement was as a popularizer, in the best sense of the term; and his numerous lives of saints, books of travel, biographies, and spiritual writings, despite a discursive style, were always rooted in an exact intellectual discipline. He responded best to a subject that compelled compassion: Lourdes has found no truer interpreter, and St. Benedict Joseph Labre no more faithful friend.

Bibliography: T. D. ROBERTS et al., "C. C. Martindale: A Symposium," Month 30 (1963) 69–90. I. EVANS, "C. C. Martindale, S.J. 1879–1963," America (6 Apr. 1963) 466–467.

[I. EVANS]

MARTINEAU, JAMES

English Unitarian divine; b. Norwich, April 21, 1805; d. London, Jan. 11, 1900. Martineau, the brother of Harriet Martineau the writer, was of Huguenot descent. In 1822 he was converted from Presbyterianism to Unitarianism and entered Manchester College in York. After serving as minister in Dublin and Liverpool, he became in 1840 professor of philosophy and of political economy at Manchester New College. He became principal in 1869, by which time the college had moved to London. During these years he continued his pastoral activities. At the Little Portland Street chapel in London, his preaching aroused wide interest. Martineau was a prolific writer. Among his better-known books are Rationale of Christian Enquiry (1836), Ideal Substitutes for God (1879), Types of Ethical Theology (2 v. 1885), A Study of Religion (1888), and The Seat of Authority in Religion (1890). His philosophy was rationalistically theistic, but he excluded divine foreknowledge of contingencies in order to preserve human free will. Along with his natural religion, he combined a mystic spirituality that resulted from his poetic temperament rather than from his philosophy. His political views were unusual among Nonconformists because he opposed free education, favored the South in the American Civil War, and supported the continued establishment of the Church of England, hoping that it would evolve into a truly national Church.

Bibliography: J. DRUMMOND and C. B. UPTON, The Life and Letters of James Martineau, 2 v. (London 1902). A. H. CRAUFURD, Recollections of James Martineau (Edinburgh 1903). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 865–866.

[W. HANNAH]

MARTÍNEZ, JUAN DE PRADO

Moral theologian; b. Valladolid, first quarter of the 17th century; d. Segovia, Feb. 25, 1668. He studied theology at Alcalá, where he later was a professor. He was a man of vivacious spirit and a prolific writer; in 1662 he was elected provincial of the province of Spain. While he was provincial, his devotion to study led him to foster a love for study in the students. His work on the Immaculate Conception, Notitia veridica doctrinae ordinis praedicatorum de praeservatione Deiparae Immaculatae Virginis Mariae a peccato originali, attempted to show that diverse pontifical decisions left the position of St. Thomas intact. It was suppressed by the Spanish Inquisition, and brought Martinez into difficulty with Philip IV.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 2.2:624–625. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.1:218–219.

[R. J. POWERS]

MARTÍNEZ, LUIS MARÍA

Archbishop of Mexico, author, preacher, and peace-maker; b. Molinos de Caballero, Tlalpajahua, Michoacán, June 9, 1881; d. Mexico City, Feb. 8, 1956. Before he was quite ten years old, Martínez entered the seminary in Morelia where he performed brilliantly, winning prizes in Latin, philosophy, theology, and law. While he was a subdeacon, he became prefect of the Instituto del Sagrado Corazón, and in 1903, vice rector. In 1904 he returned to the seminary as prefect of discipline, and was ordained that fall. Much of Martínez' life was associated with this seminary; he was made vice rector in 1905 and rector in 1919, the same year he became a canon of the cathedral. Dominating the institution for more than a generation, his spirit and his learning exerted a major influence on many priests.

In 1922 Martínez was appointed apostolic administrator of Chilapa and the next year made titular bishop of Anemurio and auxiliary to the archbishop of Morelia. Having been consecrated Sept. 30, 1923, he was designated vicar general (1925), at the height of the religious persecution that forced Abp. Ruiz y Flores into exile. Martínez was in charge of the Church until the archbishop returned in 1929. During this time he skillfully negotiated with the government and saved many churches in Michoacán from being seized for nonreligious purposes. He was named coadjutor with the right of succession in Morelia in 1934, but Feb. 20, 1937, he was nominated as archbishop of Mexico; he took possession of his see in April. In Mexico City his diplomatic skill, simplicity, and compassion helped to bring about better relations between Church and State, bringing an end to active persecution, and even gaining the friendship of President Miguel Alemán. Under such improved circumstances he was able to build the new seminary and to continue the work of restoring the cathedral, a project for which he enlisted the active support of the laity.

Martínez was a renowned preacher and writer. Among his published works are El espíritu santo, Simientes divinas, A propósito de un viaje, Santa María de Guadalupe, Jesus, and La pureza en el ciclo litúrgico. He was a member of the Academia Mexicana de la Lengua. Its director, Alejandro Quijano, receiving him into membership for his literary work, his preaching, and his teaching, described his prose as beautiful and elegant, imbued with his love of God, his extraordinary sensitivity, and that most rare of virtues, a universal sympathy. Martínez was a friend of letters generally and a patron of many publications. He traveled widely and was highly esteemed both outside and within Mexico. A politician in the best sense of the word, he transformed an embattled, restricted Mexican Catholicism into a living part of the community, ready for action and change.

[J. GUISA Y AZEVEDO]

Bibliography: J. M. PÉREZ AYALA, Baltasar Jaime Martínez Compañón y Bujanda: prelado español de Colombia y el Perú (Bogotá 1955). R. VARGAS UGARTE, Historia de la iglesia en el Perú, v.4 (Lima 1961).

[E. T. BARTRA]

MARTÍNEZ COMPAÑÓN Y BUJANDA, BALTASAR JAIME

Bishop of Trujillo, Peru, and archbishop of Bogotá, Colombia; b. Cabredo, Navarre, Spain, Jan. 10, 1737; d. Bogotá, Aug. 17, 1797. He was ordained in 1761. In 1767 he went to Peru after being appointed canon of the cathedral of Lima. He was rector of the seminary and secretary of the provincial council of Lima of 1772. He was consecrated bishop of Trujillo in Lima on March 25, 1779. Taking over his see on May 13 of that same year, he governed it for ten years with such great talent and zeal that he became one of the outstanding bishops of Latin America. He spent five years, almost uninterruptedly, inspecting his vast diocese with excellent results, not only from the religious standpoint, but scientifically and culturally as well. Well ahead of his time, he raised the two basic problems of modern Peru, universal public education and the means of development, and stated the bases for realistic solutions. He also gave to the parish priests rules for the education of the people in faith and morals, as well as in manners and hygiene. At the same time he improved clerical training, reorganizing the major seminary and erecting three more seminaries, which became centers of enlightened pastoral ideas. He restored and erected numerous elementary schools and founded three centers for vocational and literary training for young indigenous children. He founded some 20 new villages and moved others to better locations. He built bridges and roads, opened sewage systems, promoted agriculture, and concerned himself with the improvement of mining conditions. He also increased the number of missions among indigenous people. He built 27 churches and restored 30 others, including his own cathedral.

A document that demonstrates his pastoral concern, his humanism, and his knowledge is the Historia natural, civil y moral de Trujillo por mapas, planos y estampas con sus memorias para ella, an interesting description of his diocese written between 1780 and 1785. He used material obtained at his request by the parish priests and other persons and also material collected during his pastoral visits. Of his work only the graphic part is known. Nine volumes include approximately 1,400 sketches on a great variety of subjects from folklore to natural sciences. It is of great value to history and ethnography. In 1788 he was transferred to the See of Bogotá. As archbishop there he continued to show his concern for raising public moral and educational standards.

MARTÍNEZ DE ALDUNATE, JOSÉ ANTONIO

Chilean prelate and scholar; b. Santiago, 1730?; d. there, April 8, 1811. A member of an aristocratic Chilean family, Martínez de Aldunate studied at the Convictorio of San Francisco Javier under the direction of the Jesuits. He received the master's degree in philosophy and the doctorate in theology. Subsequently, he received the doctorate in Canon and civil law from the University of San Felipe in 1755. That same year he was designated fiscal for the bishopric of Santiago; he was ordained in 1756. He served for many years as a professor at the University of San Felipe and became rector. He held most ecclesiastical positions in the diocese at one time or another, becoming dean in 1797. On a number of occasions he served as vicar-general. In 1804 he was made bishop of the Peruvian Diocese of Guamanga, where he served until 1809 when the Spanish regency proposed him for the bishopric of Santiago de Chile. On Sept. 18, 1810, the cabildo abierto, the first Creole government, had named him vice president of the junta on which all institutions of the area were represented. However, by the time he arrived in Santiago in November 1810 he was already mentally ill and could not serve.

Bibliography: L. F. PRIETO DEL RÍO, Diccionario biográfico del clero secular de Chile (Santiago 1922).

[M. GONGORA]

MARTINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA

Influential music authority and church-music composer; b. Bologna, April 24, 1706; d. there, Oct. 4, 1784. After musical studies, first with his father and later with Predieri, Riccieri, G. A. Perti, and F. A. Pistocchi, he became a Franciscan at Lugo di Romagna (1722) and was ordained the next year (hence his familiar title, Padre Martini). An avid student of music history and theory, he amassed a large music library and produced numerous scholarly works, among them the three-volume Storia della musica (Bologna 1757–81) and the two-volume Saggio fondamentale pratico di contrappunto (1774–75), which had a decisive influence on current teaching of counterpoint. He had close professional relations with musicians and scholars all over Europe, and as a teacher he attracted a whole generation of musicians, among whom were J. G. Naumann (composer of the "Dresden Amen"), GRÉTRY, GLUCK, JOMMELLI, J. C. BACH, and MOZART. Church music and oratorios shared his creative activity with operas and instrumental music. His knowledge of Renaissance polyphony enabled him to employ the stile antico in strict A CAPPELLA polyphony, thus laying the foundation for the 19th-century church-music reform (see CAECILIAN MOVEMENT). At the same time he employed stile moderno in orchestrally accompanied sacred music characterized by the galant manner of the time. His own contrapuntal skill is evident in numerous canonic compositions. The breadth of his scholarly efforts, his discernment, and his clear presentation of the historical and artistic problems of his time are revealed clearly in his musical and historical studies (which, like his music, are largely unpublished). He had the same kind of appreciation for J. S. BACH as he had for PALESTRINA, the same understanding of the requirements of liturgical music as for those of opera and instrumental music. He was a leading figure in the Accademia dei Filarmonici in Bologna and the Accademia dei Arcadi in Rome.

Bibliography: G. B. MARTINI, Carteggio, ed. F. PARISINI (Bologna 1888); Musikerbriefe (Leipzig 1886) v. 1. L. BUSI, Il Padre G. B. Martini (Bologna 1891). A. PAUCHARD, Ein italienischer Musiktheoretiker (Lugano 1941). L. F. TAGLIAVINI, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 8:1719-24. O. URSPRUNG, Die katholische Kirchenmusik (Potsdam 1931). P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (5th ed. New York 1958) 1037. I. CAVALLINI, "L'idée d'histoire et d'harmonie du Padre Martini et d'autres penseurs de son temps," International Review of the Aesthetics and Sociology of Music, 21 (1990) 141-159. F. GONIN, "Mozart et le Padre Martini: histoire d'une légende?," Revue de Musicologie 85 (1999) 277-295. N. LU-CARELLI, "Sulla condizione sociale di un musicista del settecento: Vincenzo Carmanini e un raccomandazione di Padre Martini," Esercizi: Musica e Spettacolo, 12 (1993) 69-86. A. POMPILIO, ed., Padre Martini: Musica e Cultura nel settecento europeo (Florence 1987). A. SCHNOEBELEN, ed., Padre Martini's Collection of Letters in the Civico Museo Bibliografico Musicale in Bologna: An Annotated Index (Hillsboro, N.Y. 1979). M. VANSCHEEUWIJCK, "Mozart en Padre Martini (Bologna 1770)," Musica Antiqua 8 (1991) 63-67.

[K. G. FELLERER]

MARTINI, MARTINO

Jesuit missionary, sinologist, and author, a central figure in the CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY; b. Trent, 1614; d. Hangchow, China, June 6, 1661. Martini entered the Society of Jesus, Oct. 7, 1632, and after studies at the Roman College, he embarked for the Orient (March 23, 1640). From 1643 he exercised the apostolate in Chekiang Province during the upheaval caused by the Ming overthrow. Commissioned as procurator to Rome, he first stopped at Amsterdam and Antwerp to publish his two best-known works, Novus atlas sinensis (based largely on Chinese geographies) and De bello tartarico in Sinis historia, on the then current Manchu invasion. At Rome (fall 1654), besides pressing for the overland route to China and education of Chinese youth, he successfully defended the Jesuit position on the Rites, under fire since Propaganda's adverse responsa of 1645. Without waiting for Alexander VII's favorable decision of March 23, 1656, Martini sailed from Genoa in January with ten mission recruits, but their ship was captured by corsairs in a bloody battle in which the procurator played a heroic part. Back finally in his Hangchow center (June 11, 1659), he began construction of China's most imposing church, but within two years he succumbed to a lingering illness. His piety, learning and aristocratic stature (he was known by the sobriquet "Admiral") won him the esteem of the mandarin class and the common people alike. When 17 years after burial the watersoaked coffin was disinterred, the body and its robes were found perfectly preserved.

Giovanni Battista Martini. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Bibliography: L. PFISTER, Notices biographiques et bibliographiques sur les Jésuites de l'ancienne mission de Chine 1552-1773 1:256–262, with an analysis of Martini's Chinese and foreign compositions that completes C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 5: 646-650.

[F. A. ROULEAU]

MARTINUZZI, GYÖRGY (JURAJ UTJEŠENOVIĆ)

Cardinal, Transylvanian statesman (popularly "Friar George''); b. Kamičic, Croatia, 1482; d. Alvinc, Transylvania, Dec. 17, 1551. Though he was the son of a Croatian father (Utiešenović), he preferred to use the name of his Venetian mother. After a brief military career he joined the Paulite Order and later became the close adviser of King JOHN I ZÁPOLYA (1526–40) of Hungary. In 1534 he was appointed bishop of Nagyvárad and negotiated the Treaty of Nagyvárad (1538), in which King John agreed to Hapsburg succession after his death and thus to the unification of Hungary under Ferdinand I. But the dying John repudiated the agreement and made Friar George swear allegiance to his newborn son John Sigismund. Martinuzzi, as governor of Transylvania, attempted to maintain the infant's position with the support of Sultan Suleiman I. After the capture of Buda (1541) by the Turks, Martinuzzi returned to the original plan of unification of Hungary under the Hapsburgs in order to resist Turkish expansion. After lengthy negotiations the new treaty was ratified in 1551, and Martinuzzi was rewarded with the archbishopric of Esztergom (Gran) and the cardinal's hat. Meanwhile, to forestall the expected attack of the Sultan, he maintained friendly relations with the Turks. Such secret contacts raised the suspicions of Ferdinand's military commander, Castaldo, who, with the connivance of Ferdinand himself, arranged the Cardinal's assassination in the castle of Alvinc.

Bibliography: M. HORVÁTH, Frater György, élete (Budapest 1868). O. M. UTIEŠENOVIĆ, Lebensgeschichte des Cardinals Utiešenović genannt Martinusius (Vienna 1881). K. JUHÁSZ, "Kardinal Georg Utjesenovich (T1551) und das Bistum Tschanad," Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 80 (1961) 252–264.

[L. J. LEKAI]

MARTY, MARTIN

Bishop, missionary; b. Schwyz, Switzerland, Jan. 12, 1834; d. St. Cloud, Minn., Sept. 19, 1896. He was the son of a shoemaker and church sexton, Jacob Alois Marty, who had him educated at the Jesuit college of Klösterli at Hofmatt, at St. Michael's College, Fribourg, and at the Benedictine College of Einsiedeln. Marty was professed as a Benedictine monk at Einsiedeln on May 20, 1855, and ordained on Sept. 14, 1856. Before volunteering for the American missions, Marty taught at his abbey, Einsiedeln (1856-60). In the United States he served as prior of the St. Meinrad foundation in Indiana and became its first mitred abbot in 1871. After directing his abbey from missions in the Dakota Territory for three years, he was appointed vicar apostolic of Dakota by Leo XIII on Aug. 12, 1879. His episcopal consecration took place at Ferdinand, Ind., on Feb. 1, 1880. Marty at once attempted to secure laborers for his vicariate. Temporary help came with the arrival of the Sisters of the Holy Cross for hospital work in the Black Hills and of Benedictines for mission work at Standing Rock, the Sioux agency in Dakota. The staff at Standing Rock became permanent in 1880 with the arrival of additional Benedictine sisters and priests. Other workers in the vicariate included the foundations of Presentation sisters at Aberdeen and Benedictine sisters at Sturgis; Jesuit fathers and Franciscan sisters at the Rosebud and Pine Ridge Indian reservations; and Sisters of Charity (Gray Nuns) at Fort Totten. By 1884 the vicariate had 13 parochial schools and 82 churches served by 45 priests.

After the division of Dakota Territory into states, Marty was assigned as bishop to the new Diocese of Sioux Falls, S.D. (Nov. 15, 1889). He convened diocesan synods in 1892 and 1893, cooperated with other western bishops in securing Catholic immigrants, and served on the board of trustees of The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., and on the Federal Board of Indian Affairs (1893). Marty had a great interest in the Sioux tribe, which had been placed under the care of his abbey in 1876. He established strong missions for the Sioux on their reservations. Tribe members were encouraged to participate in liturgical chants and to take part in discussions in parish societies and the annual Indian congresses that he originated. Although transferred to the See of St. Cloud on Jan. 21, 1895, he retained jurisdiction over the Dakota tribes. He published a revision of Augustine Ravoux's Sioux ritual (1890), as well as a biography of Bp. John Martin Hennie of Milwaukee, Wis. (1888).

Bibliography: M. C. DURATSCHEK, Beginnings of Catholicism in South Dakota (Washington 1943). A. KLEBER, History of St. Meinrad Archabbey, 1854–1954 (St. Meinrad, Ind. 1954). R. F. KAROLEVITZ, With Faith, Hope and Tenacity: The First One Hundred Years of the Catholic Diocese of Sioux Falls, 1889–1989 (Mission Hills, S.D. 1989).

[M. C. DURATSCHEK]

MARTYR

A person who has given or exposed his life in testimony to the truth or relevance of the Christian faith. The word comes from the Greek μάρτυς (witness); and the theological concept is made precise by St. AUGUSTINE; Martyrem non facit poena, sed causa (It is the reason why, not the suffering that constitutes the martyr: Epist. 89.2). But it was only with the development of Christian teaching in the postapostolic Church that the words μάρτυς, μαρτυρείν, μαρτύριον took on this specific significance. According to Judaism, martyrdom was considered a work of individual piety and resistance to evil, perfecting the victim and serving as edification for the chosen people. In the Acts of the Pagan Martyrs and the Soliloquies of Epictetus, the stoic meaning of the term was rather that of the function of the philosopher who not only teaches by words, but confirms the truth of his message by deeds, particularly by showing indifference to the movements of passion, worldly experience, and even death.

In the Bible. Never in the OT and only rarely in the NT does the term extend beyond its basic, often juridical, meaning of witness, to embrace what later centuries have commonly understood by the word "martyr." Yet such an extension was inevitable because of the fierce opposition to the Christian witness from the beginning, and it is clearly reflected in the NT.

Thus, in Acts 22.20 St. Paul acknowledges his complicity in the first Christian martyrdom "when the blood of Stephen, thy witness [τοῦ μάρτυρός σου] was shed." In Rv 2.13 Christ reminds the Church at Pergamum of "Antipas, my faithful witness [ὁ μάρτυς μου ὁ πιστός μου] who was slain among you." In Rv 11.3 reference is made to the two witnesses of Christ (τοῖς δυσὶν μάρτυσίν μου) slain by the beast from the abyss; and in Rv 17.6, the woman Babylon is described as "drunk with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the martyrs [τῶν μαρτύρων] of Jesus."

Finally, two passages, Rv 1.5 and 3.14, identify Christ Himself as "the faithful witness [ὁ μάρτυς ὁ πιστός]." That here also the meaning may include the technical one of martyr is confirmed by (1) the parallel expression noted above in Rv 2.13; (2) the title "firstborn of the dead" that follows immediately in 1.5; and (3) the popular designation by the early Church of Christ Himself as "the first martyr."

In the Early Church. The postapostolic Epistle of CLEMENT I (c. 96) the verb μαρτυρείν (to witness) is used to describe the endurance of SS. Peter and Paul in their sufferings. "Peter who because of unrighteous jealousy suffered . . . and having given his testimony [μαρτυρίσας] went to the glorious place" (5.4); and "Paul showed the way to the prize of endurance. . . . He taught righteousness to the whole world, and gave testimony [μαρτυρίσας] before the rulers . . . and passed from the world to the holy place" (5.5, 7). The reference in both these instances stresses the endurance of the Apostles almost in a stoic sense of the word; it stresses their indifference to suffering as the result of their faith rather than as a sign of its truth.

Jean de Brébeuf and Gabriel Lalemant being martyred by the Iroquois in Canada, 1649.

With IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH (c. 116) the Christian sense of giving testimony to the belief in Christ as God by shedding one's blood appears; but Ignatius used the words μιμητής (imitator: Phil. 7.2; Rom. 6.3) and μαθητης (disciple: Rom. 5.3; Mag. 9.1) rather than μάρτυς; for according to his thinking the martyr was one who perfectly imitated Christ in his suffering and death. Ignatius further insisted on the bodily suffering of the martyr as an antidote to docetist (see DOCETISM) teaching that denied that Christ had a real body. He employed the term $\pi\alpha\theta\dot{\eta}\mu\alpha\tau\alpha$ or sufferings of the witnesses to Christ as proof that Christ ''was clothed in flesh'' (Smyr. 5.1–2).

In the account of the martyrdom of Polycarp (c. 165 or 170) the words "martyr" and "martyrdom" took on the full significance of witnessing belief that the life and death of Christ was that of the Son of God: and they were so employed subsequently in the passions and legends of the martyrs. However, the martyrdom of James recorded by HEGESIPPUS $(c.\ 170)$ seems to have ignored this meaning (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 2.23.4–18). The Letter of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne (ibid. 5.1–4) explicitly used the term μ άρτυς to describe the shedding of blood in persecution as a witness to Christ. The use of the word "martyr" for confessors who had not shed their blood was protested (ibid. 5.2.2–4); and Tertullian (De cor. 2), Hippolytus of Rome (Comm. in Dan. 2.36.6), and Cyprian of Carthage (Epist. 5.2; De laps. 3–4) likewise applied to living witnesses only the word "confessors" (ὑμόλογοι).

"Torture of St. Hippolyte," by Dieric Bouts the Elder, c. 1470, St. Salvator Cathedral, Bruges, Belgium. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

The Shepherd of HERMAS stated that those who "suffered for the name [of the Son of God] are glorious; all their sins have been taken away" (Sim. 9.28.3); and he further spoke of only those sitting on the right hand of God who had suffered stripes, imprisonments, crucifixions, and wild beasts for the sake of His name (Vis. 3.2.1). In the Epistle to DIOGNETUS the author insisted that the superhuman courage of the martyrs and the greatness of their sacrifice could be explained only as a manifestation of the power of God, acting in and through them (7.7–9). The author further warned of the contrast between a death that is the guarantee of eternal life in martyrdom and real death of eternal fire (10.7). The Christian assurance of the presence of God with the martyr was echoed in the passio of SS. Perpetua and Felicity, as well as in JUSTIN MARTYR (Dial. Tryph. 110.4), Tertullian (Apol. 50.13), and Lactantius (Div. inst. 5.13.11). But this fortitude was considered a scandalous carelessness by the pagans, as Marcus Aurelius (Med. 13.31) and Justin Martyr (2 Apol. 12.1) testify.

Although Cyprian spoke of the treasures that the Church enjoyed in its martyrs (Epist. 10.5), the cult of martyrs had a comparatively late and slow development. The earlier Christians had merely attempted to bestow on them a fitting burial in a pagan or private cemetery. The first martyr whose bones received known veneration with a yearly commemoration was POLYCARP of Smyrna (d. c. 155 or 165). The record of his martyrdom describes the gathering of his bones after the body was burned and their emplacement in a fitting depository and speaks of "celebrating the birthday of his martyrdom" (Mart. Poly. 18.1–3). JULIAN THE APOSTATE compared the veneration of martyrs with the cult of pagan gods and heroes (c. 360), but Jerome (Cont. Vigil. 4-5), Augustine (Civ. 22.10), Theodoret of Cyr (Graec. aff. cur. 8.34), and CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA (C. Jul. 10) repudiated the comparison and clarified the specifically Christian concept in relation to a defense of the Christian faith and the value of Christian virtues, such as chastity.

Tertullian had considered martyrdom the secunda intinctio or second baptism (De paenit. 13) since it removed all sin and assured the martyr of his eternal crown. In this Tertullian echoed the Shepherd of Hermas. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 4.9.75) said the martyr was assured of an immediate entrance into glory since Christ was present with the martyr in his suffering. For Origen, martyrdom was a proof of Christianity, not only because the Christian showed himself capable of dying for his faith but because the Christian defiance of death was a testimony of the victory already achieved over the evil powers and an assertion of the resurrection that would render him immune to suffering (C. Celsum 1.24; 2.47; Comm. in Jn. 6.54). Thus the martyr's life was the fulfillment of the Christian striving for perfection. For Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 4.7.43) likewise, both the preparation for martyrdom and the martyrdom of the passions were equivalent to the actual shedding of one's blood; and Origen acknowledged that there were many Christians who suffered a daily martyrdom of conscience by willingly carrying their cross behind the Savior (Hom. in Num. 10.2). Cyprian stated that if someone were unwillingly prevented from achieving martyrdom, he would receive the crown for which he had prepared (Ad. Fortun. 13) and admitted that "peace also has its crown" (De zelo 16). METHODIUS of Olympus maintained that the virgin who had preserved her chastity with patience was worthy of the same honor as a martyr (Conviv. 7.3.156); and DIONYSIUS of Alexandria believed that one who had given his life tending the sick during a pestilence should be considered a martyr (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 7.22.7).

Soliders capture Joan of Arc, manuscript illumination.

The notion of a white martyrdom was common among the desert fathers as the APOPHTHEGMATA PATRUM attest. Rufinus of Aquileia with his translation of the Rules of Basil of Caesarea (Praef. in hom. Bas.), Jerome (Epist. 108.31), Augustine (Serm. de mart.), and Caesarius of Arles (Serm. 41.) popularized the idea in the West, and GREGORY I (Dial. 3.26; Hom. in Evang. 2.36.7) handed it on to the Middle Ages. The Irish monks spoke of a white martyrdom "in giving up what one loved for the love of God"; and of a green martyrdom that consisted in suppressing the passions and doing penance ceaselessly.

In dealing with abuses that surrounded the cult of the martyrs on pilgrimages and the celebration of banquets at the martyrs' tombs, Augustine changed the emphasis on the sufferings and tortures suffered by the martyrs to a reconsideration of the martyr. He considered him to be one who professed his faith in Christ by the perfection of his virtues and the living of a life in full conformity with the spiritual teachings of the Church. Despite the wonders and extravagances attributed to the martyrs in the Glories of the Martyrs by Gregory of Tours, and even in the Dialogues of Gregory I, the latter insisted essentially on the life of the Christian as a spiritual martyrdom.

The Number of Martyrs. Since at least the 17th century, efforts have been made to modify the extravagant notion of an almost unlimited number of martyrs in the early Church. H. Dodwell published a tract De paucitate martyrum (Oxford 1648) in which he greatly reduced the estimate of early martyrs; but T. Ruinart, in his Acta primorum martyrum (Paris 1689), while selective in his research, held to the tradition of an immense number. In recent times L. Hertling estimated the number as close to 100,000, while H. Grégoire believed it closer to 10,000.

Tacitus had spoken of an ingens multitudo in the 1st century (Annal. 15.44.4); and it is certain that large numbers were put to death especially under Decius and Diocletian, as well as by the Persians. Reliable statistics are simply not available.

Bibliography: J. S. CONSIDINE, "The Two Witnesses: Rv 11: 3-13,"The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 8 (1946) 377-392. I. FRAN-SEN, "Jésus, le témoin fidèle," Bible et vie chrétienne 16 (1956) 66–79. A. P. FRUTAZ and J. BECKMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65); 7: 127-133. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907-53) 10.2:2359-2512. E. PETERSON, Zeuge der Wahrheit (Leipzig 1937). H. DELEHAYE, Origines des cultes des martyrs (2d ed. Paris 1933); Analecta Bollandiana 39 (1921) 20-49. P. PEETERS, ibid. 50-64. M. VILLER, Aszese und Mystik in der Väterzeit, rev. and tr. K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1939) 29-40, 256, 308-315. G. JOUASSARD, Recherches de science religieuse 39 (1951) 362-367. E. E. MALONE, The Monk and the Martyr (Washington 1950). T. KLAUSER, Christlicher Märtyrerkult (Cologne 1960). N. BROX, Zeuge und Märtyrer (Munich 1961). A. J. VER-MEULEN, The Semantic Development of Gloria in Early Christian Latin (Nijmegen 1956) 53-96. H. MUSURILLO, Traditio 12 (1956) 55-67, asceticism. A. RUSH, Theological Studies 23 (1962) 569-589, Gregory I. H. GRÉGOIRE et al., Bulletin de la Classe des Lettres de l'Académie Royale de Belgique 38 (1952) 37–60, 62–70, number of martyrs.

[F. X. MURPHY/W. F. DICHARRY]

MARTYRDOM, THEOLOGY OF

From μαρτύριον (testimony, proof), the condition of being a MARTYR, of enduring suffering or having undergone death for a cause, and, in theology and in this article, of having been put to death as a witness to Christ. Classically, three conditions were required: (1) that physical life has been laid down and real death undergone; (2) that death has been inflicted in hatred of Christian life and truth; and (3) that death has been voluntarily accepted in defense of these. Hence, on the first count those who ardently desire to die for Christ, or who accept or choose a life of suffering for His sake, are not technically martyrs; nor, on the second count, those who die from disease or in consequence of the accepted risks attendant on the way of life they have chosen for Christ, or from devotion to the cause of scientific research, or for their country, or, however exalted their motives, for error or by suicide; nor, on the third count, those who have not reached the age of reason or who are slain without making a choice. Such is the general teaching of theologians, although the final point is not beyond question if it is taken to mean that there must be a conscious act of deliberate choice. Cajetan, characteristically, allows that a man might be martyred in his sleep, and for the same underlying reason he holds that unbaptized babies can be saved in the faith of their parents; thus also is explained why the Church enrolls the Holy Innocents among the martyrs without crediting them with a miraculous precocity, and by common teaching that the blood that is shed takes the place of the water that flows in Baptism.

The second condition calls for some comment. Many of the martyrs in the calendar have been killed in odium fidei, that is, in direct witness to the truths of faith, but others, such as SS. JOHN THE BAPTIST and Maria GORET-TI, have offered their lives in defense of Christian virtue. and some, such as St. THOMAS OF CANTERBURY and JOHN OF NEPOMUC (long popularly credited with martyrdom), for the sake of Church order and discipline. What is required is that the cause is the living truth of Christ. How transcendent this is, and consequently how wide are the fields in which martyrdom can be found, will vary according to the reading of theologians on the interpenetration of grace and nature. Some will tend to reserve it to orthodox confessional formularies, and of course liturgical celebration and the process of canonization will observe this restriction, while others, taking to heart the Ambrosian saying that all truth whatever it is and whoever utters it is from the Holy Spirit, will be quicker to recognize all heroic witness to the extremity of death as Christian martyrdom. Those who die for infidelity, or heresy, or schism, are in a special case. It may be doubted whether error as such ever evokes heroism: what happens is that men such as HUSS and CRANMER at the end die with dignity, not for such an abstraction, but in a concrete situation of mixed causes where they are prepared to affirm a value with their lives. The personal respect and admiration they deserve cannot amount to public and official recognition within the system of the Church's worship; and the same, it seems, should be said about non-Catholic missionaries who have been killed for preaching the gospel.

The rule of thumb for the martyr was stipulated by St. Augustine: martyrdom derives, not from the punishment inflicted, but the reasons for the punishment (non poena sed causa). Although such a rule seems straightforward, it is not always so in actual practice. Thomas Aquinas, for example, points out that John the Baptist was a martyr because he denounced adultery; hence he was a martyr for the sake of the "truth of faith" (Summa Theologiae, IIa IIae, q.124 art. 5). Pope Paul VI extended this further in beatifying Maximilian KOLBE (1971) as a "martyr of charity." Kolbe witnessed in the ultimate gesture of love or charity. In that sense, he died for the "defense of the faith" as Aquinas described it. In the canonizations of Kolbe (1982) and Edith STEIN (1998), Pope John Paul II manifested an even more nuanced view of martyrdom. Martyrdom may be a public witness even unto the death for the truth of the Gospel, even when the explicit reason for the martyr's death is not a refusal to apostasize by denying the faith. Neither the sacrifice of a life for the sake of another (Kolbe) nor the death of one out of racial hatred (Stein) is what makes them martyrs. The reason(s) why the pope sees them as martyrs is that their lives stood in direct and dramatic counterpoint to forces of evil and untruth.

Martyrdom is treated by moral theologians as the chief act of the virtue of FORTITUDE. The inclusion of such an ultimate and final confession of love for Christ under the heading of a moral virtue can be partly explained for methodological reasons. Yet its heroism is elicited from man's emotional organism, and it is there that the pain and terror is mastered by the commanding virtues of religion, faith, and above all, charity. It is the constant teaching of the Church that such an intensity of love is expressed as to justify the sinner, baptized or unbaptized, and bring to him the forgiveness of all his sins, removing all guilt and stain, pardoning all debt of temporal punishment, and adorning him with a special crown, or aureole. He who prays for a martyr does him an injury, said Innocent III.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 124. R. HEDDE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 10.1:220–254. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis (8th ed. Paris 1949) 2:859–862.

[T. GILBY/L. S. CUNNINGHAM]

MARTYRIUM

The edifice honoring the grave or memorial (memoria) of a martyr or witness for Christ. In the early Church the term came into usage with the cult of the martyrs, but was also applied to places where witness had been given by biblical happenings or by Christ himself in His birth, death, Resurrection, and Ascension. Primarily, however, martyrium signified the monument in a grave or cemetery in which a martyr was interred and where his cult was commemorated.

Proud of their martyrs, the primitive Christians strove to provide them with decent burial and the honors accorded the dead that were a feature of life in the ancient world. While the pagans attempted to conceal the fact of death by commemorating the dies natalis, or birthday of the deceased, the Christians quickly changed the meaning of dies natalis from earthly birth of the deceased to the day of entrance into eternal life.

By the middle of the 3rd century there is evidence of a formal veneration of the martyrs that accompanied the development of Christian worship. Prayers originally said for the martyrs came to be directed to the martyrs for their intercession. Likewise the gathering in the cemetery or at the grave site that was accompanied by a liturgical celebration soon dictated the need for a memorial in the form of a room as in the catacombs or a separate building. The graffiti acclamations honoring SS. Peter and Paul in the Memoria Apostolorum on the Via Appia are the earliest indications of the special martyr cult and of a triclia, or hall-like room, in which ceremonies were performed. The site is an originally pagan cemetery used by Christians, but the origin of the cult cannot be traced with certainty to either an original burial of the Apostles or a possible stay in a house there during their lifetime.

Three martyr saints, detail of 8th-century fresco in the chapel of San Quirco of the church of Santa Maria Antiqua, Rome.

There is question whether the 2d-century monument over the grave of St. Peter in the VATICAN and the mausoleums and graves of martyrs in Salona and North Africa were originally considered martyria, although they became such in the Constantinian age when churches were built over them.

It is with Constantine and St. Helena that the tradition of erecting a monument over the remains of a martyr truly begins. In Rome basilicas were built over or close to the graves of the martyrs MARCELLINUS and Peter, LAWRENCE, and AGNES, which were originally hidden in the catacombs; and on the Vatican and on the Via Ostiense the graves of St. PETER and St. PAUL were likewise so honored. These martyria apparently had no fixed altars and were not used originally for Sunday worship. They were places for begging the intercession of the martyr, and early were used for burial by the imperial family desiring to rest ad sanctos, close to the saints.

The basilicas built as martyria in Palestine to commemorate Christ's birth, Crucifixion, and Ascension were likewise not originally intended for community acts of worship but quickly became places of pilgrimage where the Eucharist was celebrated. At Constantinople, the Church of the 12 Apostles, built by either Constantine I or Constantine II, was enriched with the remains of relics of the Apostle St. Andrew and SS. Luke and Timothy. Further impulse was given to the on-site cult of the martyrs by Pope DAMASUS I (366–384), who composed verses in honor of the martyrs found in the catacombs.

In Milan basilicas were constructed for the remains of SS. Nazarius and Celsus and SS. GERVASE and PROTASE, which were transferred with solemn rites to their new martyria. The same was done for St. Babylas at Antioch. A rich martyrium was erected at Alexandria for St. Menas, and another at Chalcedon for St. Euphemia at the end of the 4th century; later a basilica in honor of St. John the Evangelist in Ephesus. That the function of witness to Christ was still an important feature of a martyrium is indicated by the fact that the first certain imposition of an altar over the martyr site is met with in the Miracle of the Loaves Church at Genesareth.

In the 5th and 6th centuries the spread of the cult of martyrs led to the reconstruction of older churches and the building of new basilicas as martyria; thus St. PAULINUS OF NOLA rebuilt the church honoring St. Felix, and at Marusina near Salona a martyrium was built behind the altar over the mausoleum of the original church. This practice led to the attaching of chapels for the relics or remains of saints to older churches. Reliquary chapels were common in North Syria after the 5th century and gradually the custom spread of enclosing parts of the remains of martyrs and saints in mausoleums or beneath the altars of churches in ROME, Constantinople, and RAVEN-NA and led to the search for martyr graves as is indicated at Padua, Corinth, and CYPRUS. The architecture of the martyrium seems originally to have imitated the ancient sepulcher architecture, particularly that of the Heroiën, but there was no set style as the various types of basilicas throughout the Christian Empire attest.

See Also: RELIQUARIES.

Bibliography: T. KLAUSER, Vom Heroon zur Märtyrerbasilika (Bonn 1942). A. GRABAR, Martyrium 3 v. (Paris 1943–46), F. W, DEICHMANN and A. TSCHIRA, "Das Mausoleum der Kaiserin Helena . . . , "Jahrbuch des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts 72 (1957) 44–110. J. JEREMIAS, Heiligengräber in Jesu Umwelt

(Göttingen 1958). R. KRAUTHEIMER, "Mensa, coemeterium, martyrium," Cahiers archéologiques 11 (1960) 15–40. H. M. COLVIN, Architecture and the After-life (New Haven 1991).

[F. X. MURPHY]

MARTYROLOGIES

Lists of martyrs in the order of their feasts. The oldest catalogs of saints were also calendars that indicated the feasts of interest to particular churches. In Christian antiquity, each church had its own calendar that indicated what martyr or saint was to be commemorated in what church according to that specific local church's custom. A martyrology lists the names of a number of martyrs and saints whose anniversaries are reckoned on the same day, borrowing from among the more prominent ones of neighboring churches. One of the most ancient, which became the basis for the later Roman sanctoral, was that of the CHRONOGRAPHER of 354. This document was an almanac written and illustrated by Furius Dionysius Filocalus. It was compiled in 336 and completed down to 354. It contains, along with other listings, a Deposition episcoporum and a Depositio martyrum—lists of the anniversaries, as well as the dates and places of burial, of the bishops and of martyrs honored each year at Rome, the first martyr-pope of which is St. Callistus in 222 and the last martyrs of which suffered in the persecution under Diocletian at Rome that ended during 305. Still extant likewise are the calendars of the Churches of Tours (5th century), Carthage and Carmona (6th century), and Oxyrhynchus.

The martyrologies evolved through a combination of several such lists of martyrs to include the saints of the Church universal. The menology and SYNAXARY of the Oriental Churches correspond to the Latin martyrologies that were read during the canonical hours, specifically Prime, since the 8th century. While some orders preserved the reading of the martyrology at extraliturgical times, the suppression of the office of Prime by Vatican II mostly resulted in the disuse of the martyrology.

Historical Development. The oldest extant martyrology is the Syriac Breviary or Calendar of Antioch compiled between 362 and 381 with the title: "The names of our masters, the Martyrs and Victors, with the dates on which they received their crowns." The Greek text is lost, but a synopsis in Syriac dating from 411 has been preserved. To the names of martyrs anterior to the epoch of Diocletian it adds those of the great persecution, during which there were thousands of martyrs in the East, down to 313; those of the Licinian persecution in 320 and 361 to 363. To the martyrs of the eastern Mediterranean basin it added the Orientals of Armenia and Mesopotamia. In particular, mention is made of Stephen (December 26); John and James (December 27); Peter and Paul (December 28); Epiphany (January 6); Polycarp (February 23); Perpetua, Saturninus, and 10 other confessors (March 7); a memorial of all the confessors (Friday after Easter); the Machabees (August 1); Sixtus, bishop of Rome (August 8); and Ignatius of Antioch (October 17).

In the middle of the 5th century (c. 431) another martyrology appeared in northern Italy whose preface claimed falsely that it was the work of St. JEROME, thus known as the Hieronymian Martyrology. This martyrology, given a critical edition by H. Delehaye in 1931, is a basic document for hagiographical studies. The oldest manuscripts of the work go back to the 8th century and depend upon a single Gallican recension that was made in Auxerre between 592 and 600 (according to L. Duchesne) or at Luxeuil between 627 and 628 (B. Krusch). By the eliminating of later additions, it becomes comparatively easy to reconstruct the original text, which was compiled from three principal sources: the work of the Chronographer of 354 continued to 420, the Syriac Breviary, and an African calendar, as well as several other as yet unresolved sources. To give an air of authenticity to the work, the author added an apocryphal exchange of letters between Bps. Chromatius of Aquileia, Heliodorus of Altinum, and St. Jerome. Like the calendars, the martyrologies ordinarily mention only the martyr or saint's name, date of commemoration, and the place of martyrdom or cult. Sometimes, however, a brief notice is supplied concerning the circumstances of martyrdom.

A new development in the formation of martyrologies occurred in the 8th and 9th centuries with the compilation of "historical" martyrologies, which added two elements to the information furnished by the martyrology of St. Jerome: a brief account of the saint's life and a large number of names taken from Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, the Scriptures, legends, and the writings of the Fathers. Thus they filled in the empty dates left in the earlier martyrologies. The Venerable BEDE (d. 735) was the first to compose such a martyrology, using his competence and knowledge as an historian. The historical martyrologies also added more detailed accounts of the martyr. Bede's work was continued at Lyons, first by an anonymous cleric who compiled a new martyrology (c. 800) by adding numerous notices to those of Bede (J. Dubois, Edition pratique des martyrologes de Bède, de l'anonyme lyonnais et de Florus [Paris 1978]) and later by the deacon FLORUS OF LYONS who completed the former's work (c. 850). Until then all went well. The number of notices was augmented from one redaction to another, and it was done conscientiously. But c. 865 a falsifier, ADO OF VIENNE, published a "Small Roman Martyrology," which he claimed was an ancient papal martyrology that he had discovered in Italy (see J. Dubois, Le Martyrologe d'Adon, CNRS [Paris 1984]). As a matter of fact, he had manufactured it by unscrupulously changing the dates in the earlier martyrologies. Thus he fixed the date for Ignatius of Antioch on February 1 and that for St. Basil on June 14. In 875 USUARD of Saint-Germain, by reducing certain sections of the martyrology of Ado, and augmenting others, while retaining a substantial part, composed the martyrology that bears his name. This was long in use among the Benedictines of Rome and is still employed by the Cistercians. Practically speaking, it is the direct ancestor of the Roman Martyrology.

Roman Martyrology. The official record of saints and martyrs recognized by the Roman Church was officially published by Pope Gregory XIII in 1584. Having reformed the calendar of the Church with the bull Inter gravissimas (Feb. 14, 1582), Gregory formed a commission (7-10 members) under Cardinal Sirleto (d. 1585) with the future cardinal BARONIUS as leading light, to bring out a thoroughly revised edition of the Martyrology of Usuard then in use in Rome. A provisionary edition was printed in 1582 covering the period from October 15 to December 31. One dealing with the annual cycle of saints and martyrs was published (1583) without a letter of papal approbation. This edition had at base the Martyrology of Usuard, with additions from those of St. Cyriacus (MS F85 bibl. Vallicelliana), Bede, Florus, and Ado, and from the Greek menologies translated into Latin by Cardinal Sirleto, the Dialogues of St. GREGORY I, and calendars of individual churches, particularly those in Italy. After emendations this text was published as official for the universal Church by Pope Gregory XIII on Jan. 14, 1584, with the bull Emendatio. In 1586 it was republished under Sixtus V with the notes and treatise on the Roman Martyrology by Baronius, who had been encouraged by Sirleto to publish the fontes and documentation in anticipation of critical reaction. Though far from the standards required by modern hagiography, this edition was a first attempt at achieving historical accuracy. It was frequently revised, particularly in 1630 under URBAN VIII, and reorganized also under CLEMENT X in 1681 and BENEDICT XIV in 1748. Benedict studied many of the problems personally in view of his precisions on the beatification and canonization of saints. The edition of 1913 is a revision of that of Benedict XIV. Between 1913 and 1956 several further editions were published; that in 1924, known as the editio prima post typicam, contains many changes based on attempts at complete reform. It was, however, strongly criticized by Dom H. Quentin (Analecta Bollandiana 42 [1924] 387-406). Since then, other editions merely added new feasts and newly canonized saints. A thorough revision has been underway since 1984. John Paul II stimulated renewed interest in compiling local martyrologies in his apostolic letter Tertio millenio adveniente. Noting that the Church of the second millennium had once again become a church of the martyrs, the pope urged that, "As far as possible, their witness should not be lost to the Church . . . The local Churches should do everything possible to ensure that the memory of those who have suffered martyrdom should be safeguarded" (no. 37).

Bibliography: R. AIGRAIN, L'Hagiographie (Paris 1953). B. DE GAIFFIER, "De l'usage et de la lecture du martyrologe: témoignages antérieur au XIe siècle," Analecta Bollandiana 79 (1961) 42–47. H. DELEHAYE, ed., Commentarius perpetuus in martyrologium hieronymianum, (Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2:2; 1931) ix–xxiii. J. DUBOIS, "Introduction à la revision du Martyrologe romain," Notitiae 21 (1985) 90–100; "Les martyrologes du moyen âge latin," Typologie des sources du moyen âge occidental 26 (Brepols 1978). H. QUENTIN, Les Martyrologes historiques du moyen âge (Paris 1908). H. A. SCHMIDT, Introductio in liturgiam occidentalem (Rome 1960).

[J. LE BRUN/EDS.]

MARTYROLOGY, ROMAN

Roman martyrology is the record of the saints and martyrs recognized by the Roman Church and used in the liturgy. It was officially published by Pope Gregory XIII in 1584. Having reformed the calendar of the Church with the bull Inter gravissimas (Feb. 14, 1582), Gregory formed a commission (7-10 members) under Cardinal Sirleto (d. 1585) with the future cardinal BARONIUS as leading light, to bring out a thoroughly revised edition of the Martyrology of Usuard then in use in Rome. A provisionary edition was printed in 1582 covering the period from October 15 to December 31. One dealing with the annual cycle of saints and martyrs was published (1583) without a letter of papal approbation. This editon had as its base the Martyrology of Usuard, with additions from those of St. Cyriacus (MS F85 bibl. Vallicelliana), Bede, Florus, and Ado, and from the Greek menologies translated into Latin by Cardinal Sirleto, the Dialogues of St. GREGORY I, and calendars of individual churches, particularly those in Italy. After emendations this text was published as official for the universal Church by Pope Gregory XIII on Jan. 14, 1584, with the bull Emendatio. In 1586 it was republished under Sixtus V with the notes and treatise on the Roman Martyrology by Baronius, who had been encouraged by Sirleto to publish the fontes and documentation in anticipation of critical reaction. Though far from the standards required by modern hagiography, this edition was a first attempt at achieving historical accuracy. It was frequently revised, particularly in 1630 under URBAN VIII, who reorganized also under CLEMENT X in 1681 and BENEDICT XIV in 1748. Benedict studied many of the problems personally in view of his precisions on the beatification and canonization of saints. The so-called Editio Typica of 1913 is a revision of that of Benedict XIV. Between 1913 and 1956 several further editions were published, and that published in 1924 contained many changes based on attempts at complete reform. It was, however, strongly criticized by Dom H. Quentin [Analecta Bollandiana, 42 (1924) 387–406] and more recent editions have merely added new feasts and newly canonized saints. A thoroughly reworked edition was published by the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments in October 2001.

Bibliography: H. LÄMMER, De Martyrologio Romano (Ratisbon 1878). R. AIGRAIN, L'Hagiographie (Paris 1953) 91–99.

[J. LE BRUN/EDS.]

MARTYROLOGY OF ST. JEROME

The martyrology of St. Jerome is a calendar recording of the feast days of saints in the early Roman, African, and Oriental Churches, whose authorship was falsely attributed to St. Jerome. The original source of its notations is a general martyrology, probably of Nicomedian origin, closely related to the earliest Syrian maryrology. During the early 5th century, the Greek text of this Eastern martyrology was translated into Latin by an unknown northern Italian cleric, and combined with several Western church calendars. The name of St. Jerome was employed to give the work value, and it was supplied with two spurious letters by way of a preface; the first supposedly from CHROMATIUS OF AQUILEIA and Heliodorus of Altinum, who asked Jerome to send them a list of feasts contained in the Feriale of Eusebius; the second, Jerome's response stating that he had shortened the list because of the plethora of names in the original, which cited between 500 and 800 saints for each day.

Besides the Oriental martyrology, L. Duchesne indicates two other principal sources found in the martyrology: the CHRONOGRAPHER OF 354, which furnishes the data under the rubric Romae, and an African martyrology of the 4th century with the names under the rubric In Africa.

The original Latin version of the martyrology was prepared for use in the daily liturgy as a supplement to the DIPTYCHS; but whether it was actually used as such is not known. In the 6th century the Martyrology of St. Jerome served as a book of edification in monasteries (Cassiodorus, De inst. divin. lect. 32) and was cited by GREGORY I in 598 (Epist. 1.8, 29). In the 7th century it disappeared from the Church of Italy; between 592 and 600, according to Duchesne; and before 627, according to J. Kirsch. Meanwhile, it was brought to Arles, and from there it spread to the rest of Gaul. This Gallican re-cension is the source of all the extant manuscripts, a fact that is verified not only by the mention of the local French saints, but also by the appearance of certain feasts of Christ, Our Lady, and the Apostles proper to the Gallic church such as the depositio beatae Mariae on January 18.

Many mistakes in the manuscripts were caused by the carelessness of copyists or by the juxtaposition of documents, as when saints or groups of saints are repeated two, three, or even as many as ten times. Long and difficult study regarding the source and provinience of the martyrology yielded few results until the principal key was found with the discovery by F. Wright of the Syrian Martyrology.

The Martyrology of St. Jerome begins with December 25 and gives, in calendar form, the names of saints commemorated each day, with a notation regarding the city where their cult or grave is located. Information is also supplied concerning the translation of RELICS, the consecration of bishops, and the dedication of churches.

Bibliography: Editions. J. B. DE ROSSI and L. DUCHESNE, eds., Acta Sanctorum, Nov. 2.1 (1894), new ed. H. QUENTIN, Acta Sanctorum, Nov. 2.2 (1931), with comment. by H. DELEHAYE. J. B. DE ROSSI and L. DUCHESNE, "Les Sources du Martyrologe hiéronymien," Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 5 (1885) 115-160. J. P. KIRSCH, Der staatsrömische christliche Festkalender im Altertum: Textkritisch Untersuchungen zu den römischen "Depositiones" und dem Martyrologium Hieronymianum (Münster 1924). W. H. FRERE, Studies in Early Roman Liturgy, 3 v. (Oxford 1930–35) v.1 The Kalendar. Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907-53) 10.2:2523-2619. R. AIGRAIN, L'Hagiographie (Paris 1953). B. DE GAIFFIER, Analecta Bollandiana 79 (1961) 40-59. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 247–248. R. STIEGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 7:138-140.

[R. BRYAN]

MARULIĆ, MARKO

Croatian humanist, poet, moralist, and "father of Croatian literature"; b. Split, Aug. 18, 1450; d. there, Jan. 6, 1524. He was the son of a lawyer who belonged to the nobility, and he studied classical languages and literature, poetry, rhetoric, and philosophy at Padua, Italy. Equipped with this wide culture, Marulić returned to Split and dedicated his life to study and literature. He was also proficient in painting and sculpture. At 60 he withdrew to a Franciscan monastery on the nearby island of Solta, but, disillusioned at the religious life he encountered there, he returned after two years to Split, where he continued to live an ascetical life. His reputation rests primarily on his Latin didactic-moral works, which were widely diffused, being translated into Italian, French, Spanish, Portuguese, German, and Czech; numerous editions of the works appeared up to the 19th century.

The most important of these works are De institutione bene vivendi per exempla sanctorum (1506), a treatise that St. Francis XAVIER carried on all his journeys; Evangelistarium (1506); Quinquaginta parabolae (1510); De humilitate et gloria Christi (1519); and Dialogus de laudibus Herculis (1524). His Sermo de ultimo Christi judicio remains in MS. In all these, inspired by the doctrine of St. Bernard and St. Bonaventure, he inculcated a practical Christian morality based on the Gospels and the examples of the saints. He wrote the Carmen de doctrina Jesu Christi pendentis in cruce in Latin verse, and his major Latin poetic work, the remarkable epic Davideidos libri XIV, is in Vergilian style. His archeological and historical studies led to the translation of a medieval Croatian chronicle under the title Regum Dalmatiae et Croatiae gesta and to a polemic piece, In eos qui beatum Hieronymum ltalum esse contendunt. Both of these were published in De Regno Dalmatiae et Croatiae (1666) by the historian J. Lucius, who also included Marulić's *In*scriptiones Salonitanae antiquae in his Inscriptiones Dalmatiae (1673). Marulić's In epigrammata priscorum commentarius is extant in MS.

Marulić's vernacular poetry marks the coming of age of Croatian literature. His most important work in this genre, Istorija svete udovice Judit u versih hrvacki složena (The History of the Holy Widow Judith), was written in 1501, published in 1521. It is an epic in six cantos, in whose classical structure lyrical Petrarchian elements and strains from popular Croatian poetry mingle. Marulić sought by the example of Judith to strengthen his people in their conflict with the Turks. The same impulse to save Christianity from the Turks inspired Tuženje grada Hjeruzolima, a summons to the Christian nations to organize a crusade; Molitva suprotiva Turkom (Prayer against the Turks); and the Latin Epistola . . . ad Adrianum VI. . . de calamitatibus . . . et exhortatio ad communem omnium Christianorum unionem et pacem (1522).

Marulić's moralistic and didactic bent is evident in other vernacular poems, e.g., the epic Istorija od Suzane (History of Susanna), Urehe duhovne (Spiritual Adornment), and Dobri nauci (Good Teaching). Writing for his nun sister and her convent companions, Marulić adopted at times a humorous-satiric tone, as in Poklad i Korizma (Carnival and Lent), Spovid koludric od sedam smrtnih grihov (Nuns' Confessions and the Seven Capital Sins), and Anka Satira. Finally, he wrote some dramatic pieces on the life of Christ and the saints, and translated De Imitatione Christi, the Disticha moralia Catonis and some selections from St. Bernard and St. Bonaventure.

As a poet, Marulić was not distinguished for profound inspiration or creative imagination, but he was kindly, cultured, deeply patriotic, endowed with a fine sensitivity to the demands and challenges of life and with an extraordinary, rich idiom. In him are epitomized all the elements that characterized subsequent Croatian literature: the strains of popular poetry, a Christian spirit, classical culture, and the consciousness of the Turkish threat.

Bibliography: Complete vernacular works, Pjesme, v.1 (1869) of Stari pisci hrvatski, 29 v. (Zagreb 1869); Latin works, Zbornik u proslavu petstogodišnjice rođenja Marka Marulića, ed. J. BADALIĆ and N. MAJNARIĆ (Zagreb 1950), contains complete bibliog. M. KOMBOL, Poviest hrvatske književnosti do narodnog preporoda (Zagreb 1945). F. TROGRANČIĆ, Storia della letteratura croata (Rome 1953).

[P. TIJAN]

und Kirche 2 7:140. O. RÜHLE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3d ed., 4:785. DENHĀ, Histoire de Marouta, ed. and tr. F. NAU (Patrologia orientalis 3; 1909) 52–96. M. KMOSKO, "Homilia in Dominicam novam," Oriens Christianus 3d ed., (1903) 384–415. E. RENAUDOT, Liturgiarum Orientalium collectio, 2 v. (2d ed. Frankfurt a.M. 1847) 2:260–268. A. BAUMSTARK, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1922) 245. Patrologia syriaca ed. R.

sor, Denhā (see MONOPHYSITISM).

obite liturgy and extended his jurisdiction over 12 suffragan sees to Azerbaijan, Herat, and Segestan. Of his writings an anaphora and fragments of homilies have been preserved. His biography was written by his succes-

Bibliography: E. HAMMERSCHMIDT, Lexikon für Theologie

[F. X. MURPHY]

MARUTHAS OF MARTYROPOLIS

Fifth-century Persian bishop of Martyropolis (modern Maipherqat); d. before 420. Maruthas took part in the Synods of Constantinople (381) and Side (382), and the Synod of the Oak in 403; he served as imperial ambassador to the Persian court in 399–400 and 409–410. During the latter sojourn he helped reorganize the Church in Persia at the Synod of Seleucia-Ctesiphon and collected the Acts of the Persian martyrs put to death by King Shapur II (d. 379). His Tractatus de haeresibus and Homilia in Dominicam novam have been preserved; but there is question as to whether Maruthas was actually the author of the Hypomnemata of Oriental Martyrs.

Bibliography: Tractatus de haeresibus, ed. I. RAHMANI, (Studia Syriaca 4; 1909) 98–103, 76–80; Homilia, ed. M. KMOSKO in Oriens Christianus 3 (1903) 384–415; Acts of the Martyrs, ed. R. MARCUS in Harvard Theological Review 25 (1932) 47–71. E. HAMMERSCHMIDT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7:140. G. TISSERANT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.1:142–149. J. M. VOSTÉ, Orientalia Christiana periodica 12 (1946) 201–205. Patrologica syriaca 43, 48–51.

[F. X. MURPHY]

MARUTHAS OF TAGRIT

First maphrian or archmetropolitan of the Persian Monophysite church (629); b. Surzaq, near Balad in modern Iraq, c. 565; d. Tagrit (Taghrith), in modern Iraq, May 2, 649. He was a monk and teacher in the monastery of Mar Mattai near Nineveh in 605. Patriarch Athanasius I Gammàlā consecrated him bishop of Tagrit, the only Monophysite community among the Nestorians of Sassanid Persia, when the Persians began to bring back Monophysites from Byzantine lands. He influenced the Syriac Jac-

MARX, KARL

GRAFFIN 163-164.

German political philosopher; b. Treves, Prussia, May 5, 1818; d. London, March 14, 1883. He was the second of seven children of Hirschel (changed to Heinrich after conversion from Judaism to Protestantism in 1824) and Henrietta Marx; the male forebears of both his parents had been rabbis in Germany and Holland for many generations. As the first son of a well-to-do, smalltown lawyer, Marx had the advantage of an intellectual background that was considerably broadened by access to the library of, and frequent conversations with, the cultivated Baron von Westphalen, to whose daughter, Jenny, he was betrothed in 1836 and married in 1843. This marriage took place shortly before his flight to Paris to avoid Prussian authorities who disapproved of his inflammatory writings as editor of Rheinische Zeitung (1842), an organ of Young Hegelians opposed to any kind of authoritarianism. The same unorthodoxy had prevented Marx from following his chosen academic career after receiving his doctorate in philosophy from the University of Berlin in 1841.

Collaboration with Engels. Although he was already recognized as a contributor to revolutionary causes, Marx's social philosophy did not reach fruition until 1844, when he renewed his acquaintance with Friedrich ENGELS (1820–95) in Paris. Their collaboration was destined to father Marxism, a curious combination of dialectical materialism and revolutionary socialism that, adherents claim, has changed the world and that even opponents credit with influencing investigation and thought in related social sciences. It was as expatriates in Paris that Marx and Engels were invited by the newly formed Communist League—the forerunner of the First International (1865–71), a small worker-education group dominated by German intellectuals—to compose a convention resolution that could be used to propagandize and incite the working classes to improve their conditions during the then current period of political and economic unrest on the Continent. Thus, the Communist Manifesto was born in 1848, labeled "communist" to dissociate its authors from such utopian socialists as Saint-Simon, Fourier, and Owens.

During the next 20 years in London, Marx devoted himself exclusively to research and writing. He was supported in his poverty by charity, particularly that of Engels, who helped manage his own family's textile mill in Manchester while assisting Marx in his campaign to overthrow capitalism. Working at the British Museum library from dawn to dusk, Marx augmented his German philosophical background [I. KANT (1724–1804), G. W. F. HEGEL (1770–1831), Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–72)] with English political economy [Adam SMITH (1723-90), Ricardo (1772–1823), and James MILL (1773–1836)] and made a systematic search through the classics, literature, and history for facts and ideas to support the three main tenets of Marxism: (1) that economic events shape history (economic interpretation of history); (2) that the class struggle underlies these economic events; and (3) that communism will conclude the struggle (proletarian revolution). See MATERIALISM, DIALECTI-CAL AND HISTORICAL.

Marx did not live to see his creed promulgated throughout the world; much less did he benefit financially from it. His family of six children suffered constant deprivation, which ultimately contributed to the death of all but three girls, who married late and unhappily: Jenny (Mrs. Charles Longuet), Laura (Mrs. Paul Lafargue), and Eleanor (Mrs. Edward Aveling). After the break-up of the First International Workingmen's party in 1872, Marx's failing health prevented him from any further active part in the movement, but he continued his studies in such widely divergent areas as American agriculture, Russian stock exchange, geology, and higher mathematics, as well as arranging manuscripts and the second volume of Das Kapital (the first volume had been published in 1867). After his wife's death in 1881, he steadily lost ground until his own end came in London, caused by various complications (liver disorder, bronchial catarrh, asthma, overexertion, heartbreak, and neuroticism have all been mentioned).

Major Contributions. Of Marx's theory of social classes, the late Joseph A. Schumpeter (1883–1950) said, "If we get from Marx an ideologically warped definition of classes and class antagonisms, and if in consequence we get an unsatisfactory description of political mechanisms, we nevertheless get something very much worth having, namely, a perfectly adequate idea of the importance of the class phenomenon. If in this field there existed anything like unbiased research, Marx's suggestions would have led long ago to a satisfactory theory of it' (History of Economic Analysis, 440). Of his interpretation of history, "for which neither Hegelianism or materialism is necessary or sufficient," Schumpeter also said, "If we reduce it to a working hypothesis and if we carefully formulate it, discarding all philosophical ambitions that are suggested by the phrases Historical Materialism or Historical Determinism, we behold a powerful analytic achievement" (ibid.).

Marx is also considered the patriarch of the Institutional School of Economics that in the United States merged the human and social elements of economics with its purely scientific tools, especially in its application to the labor market. Marx would not have approved this association (he ridiculed utopian and so-called Fabian Socialists for a somewhat similar attempt), because institutionalism gave social reform a respectability and an impulse that made the proletarian revolution not only unnecessary but totally undesirable, even to the workingmen it was meant to free. And this is Marx's final unwitting legacy: stimulated by his exhaustive description and analysis of the birth, growth, and prospective inevitable demise of capitalism, a whole new team of economic, political, and social doctors took over the case, made a new diagnosis, devised new remedies, and proposed new injections to stimulate its growth, so that today a vigorous capitalism looks forward to a brighter future for all classes of society than at any time in the past.

Among Marx's published works are The Holy Family, [with Engels (1843)], The German Ideology [with Engels (1845)], The Poverty of Philosophy (1847), Communist Manifesto [with Engels (1848)], Critique of Political Economy (1859), Capital, v. 1 (1867), and Capital, v. 2 and 3 [with Engels, ed. (1885-95)]. As editor of Rheinische Zeitung (1842), contributor to the German Yearbook (1844), editor of Neue Rheinische Revue (1850), contributor to the New York Tribune (1852), and writer of innumerable pamphlets in support of socialist and communist causes throughout Europe, as well as a prolific correspondent with most of the social reformists throughout Europe [Engels, P. J. Proudhon (1809-65), Ferdinand Lassalle (1825-64), M. A. Bakunin (1814–76)], Marx left a tangible legacy of his thought and activity. Ardent followers [K. Kautsky (1854–1938), N. Lenin (1870-1924), H. Laski (1893-1950)] as well as vehement critics [Eugene Bohm-Bawerk (1851–1914), B. Croce (1866–1952), Tugen-Baranowsky] have swelled the literature on Marxism beyond enumeration. A few selective samples must suffice.

Bibliography: M. BEER, The Life and Teaching of Karl Marx, tr. T. C. PARTINGTON and H. J. STENNING (New York 1929). M. M. BOBER, Karl Marx's Interpretation of History (2d ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1948). S. HOOK, From Hegel to Marx (New York 1936; repr. pa. Ann Arbor 1962). O. RÜHLE, Karl Marx, His Life and Work, tr. E. and C. PAUL (New York 1943). F. MEHRING, Karl Marx: The Story of His Life, tr. E. FITZGERALD, ed. R. and H. NORDEN (New York 1935). E. WILSON, To the Finland Station (New York 1940). J. A. SCHUMPETER, History of Economic Analysis, ed. E. B. SCHUMPETER (New York 1954).

[G. W. GRUENBERG]

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, ARTICLES ON

The Encyclopedia contains articles devoted to the Blessed Virgin Mary from a variety of perspectives: scriptural, theological, and devotional. Many of the articles blend these aspects, treating, for example, the scriptural background and theological meaning of a Marian dogma, or a scriptural event concerning Mary and the liturgical feast that celebrates it. The principal article on Mary in Scripture is MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, I (IN THE BIBLE); see also ALMA; PROTO-EVANGELIUM; NATIVITY OF MARY; ANNUNCIATION. In theology, the principal article is MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, II (IN THEOLOGY), a five-part article that discusses the holiness of Mary, her knowledge, her spiritual maternity, her relationship to the Church, and her mediation of grace. Related articles in theology include MOTHER OF GOD; VIRGIN BIRTH; IMMAC-ULATE CONCEPTION; ASSUMPTION OF MARY; THEOTOKOS; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF; DORMITION OF THE VIRGIN; MARY IN PROTESTANT-CATHOLIC DIALOGUE. For the history and methodology of the theology of Mary, see MARIOLOGY (see also MOTHER OF GOD). Mary has been the subject of several papal encyclicals: see MUNIFICENTISSIMUS DEUS; REDEMPTORIS MATER. For her cult, see MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO and MARI-AN FEASTS; see also LOURDES; FATIMA; IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY; GUADALUPE, OUR LADY OF; LA VANG, OUR LADY OF: OUR LADY OF THE SNOW: MIRACULOUS MEDAL; SORROWS OF MARY. There are articles on ROSA-RY and HAIL MARY, and an article on Mary in art (MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, ICONOGRAPHY OF).

[G. F. LANAVE]

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, I (IN THE BIBLE)

Biblical data on the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Mother of Jesus, is naturally found primarily in the New Testament (NT). But also certain passages of the Old Testament (OT) as interpreted by inspired writers in the NT concern her. By way of conclusion this article sums up the historical data on Mary and the inferences that can be drawn from it.

In the New Testament. The references to Mary in the NT are divided here into those that are merely allusions to her and those that speak directly of her and present theological reflections on her.

Allusions to the Mother of Jesus. In Gal 4.4. St. Paul alludes to Mary when he says that "God sent his Son, born of a woman." Other indirect references to her are found in the Synoptic Gospels, which are treated here primarily as they are given in Mark, the earliest of the Synoptic Gospels.

Galatians 4.4. When St. Paul established the churches in Galatia, he did not impose circumcision and the resulting observances of the OT Law upon his converts. Judaeo-Christian missioners, perhaps from Jerusalem itself, who later visited these communities, urged them to adopt the OT Law. According to them St. Paul's proclamation of the gospel was incomplete as long as it failed to incorporate the religious culture of the OT into the lives of Christians (cf. Acts 15.5). The burden of Paul's exposition in his Epistle to the GALATIANS in defense of his teaching is that the redemptive death and Resurrection of Christ unveiled the true meaning of the OT: in OT times the Israelites were justified, i.e., remade to live in accordance with the will of God, by the merciful action of God received through their faith in His word of salvation to them and not by their endeavor to observe the OT Law (Gal 2.16). With this understanding of the significance of Christ, which Paul insists is Apostolic teaching rather than doctrine personal to himself (Gal 2.1-10), he did not instruct the Galatians in OT observances.

Paul's exposition of the meaning of the OT in Gal 2.15–3.18 naturally raised the question of the purpose of the Law: if the Law did not justify, what value did it have? He replied that one purpose of the Law was to keep man more conscious of his sinfulness than of his justice (Gal 3.19). The function of the Law was to stress man's inability to justify himself by its observance (Gal 3.22; see Rom 3.10-28). In this sense it was a preparation for man's clear understanding revealed in Christ, that the sanctifying power of God alone was the source of man's justice. Christ not only introduced the justifying power of God into history in a new way, i.e., through faith in His redemptive death and Resurrection, but at the same time liberated man from a source of anguish-his violation of the Law he agreed to observe as the presumptive condition of his salvation (Gal 2.15–16). One function of Christ's mission was to remove the burden of violations of the Law from the conscience of man (see Acts 15.10) by enabling him to center his faith in the justifying power of Christ, through whom he receives the strength and inspiration to live a life in the justice that he knows in his heart befits his human dignity (see Rom 7.13–25).

In this context concerning the liberative effect of Christ's death and Resurrection, Paul focuses attention on the reality of the human existence of Christ, Son of God, so that the Galatians might better understand why he did not instruct them in OT observances. In Gal 4.4 Paul traces Christ's redemptive mission to an eternal decree of God concerning the Son that became effective in history ("But when the fullness of time came") in the birth of His Son ("God sent his Son, born of a woman"). To effect the liberation of man from sin, the Son identified Himself fully with humanity through His birth of a human mother (see Heb 4.15). Further, He was "born under the Law," i.e., He identified Himself with the chosen people, Israel under the Covenant Law, so that the liberation from sin might include the Law itself: ". . . That he might redeem those who were under the Law" (Gal 4.5).

Since in Gal 4.4 Paul wished to emphasize the reality of Christ's humanity, he did not refer to the mother of Jesus by her proper name, "Mary," nor did he use "woman" as a religious title. He designated her as "woman" to make clear that Christ, despite His divinity, possessed full humanity because He was born like all men from a human mother from whom His humanity derived. Paul's allusion to the reality of Mary's maternity of Christ presupposes some knowledge about her both on the part of Paul as well as the Galatians. But the allusion is so restricted that it is not possible to determine the extent of this knowledge or its nature. Nothing more need be assumed to account for Paul's reference to Mary in this passage than the knowledge that Christ accepted her as His mother in the ordinary sense. The words of Gal 4.4 are valuable as a reflection of the mind of the first Christian generation that Mary is the mother of Christ, Son of God, in the commonly accepted sense of motherhood, i.e., she conceived Christ and gave Him birth. Paul presented Mary's maternity as a fact of Christian faith without raising the further issue of the virginal conception of Christ, recorded by Luke and Matthew. Even if Paul was aware of the virginal conception, it would not have served his purpose to mention it in this passage. He was concerned only with the fact of Mary's maternity as the deliberate will of God that provided the Son of God with the same humanity He died to save and with the very subjection to the Law from which He freed men.

Mark 3.20–21 and 3.31–35. According to Mk 3.20–21, a group of people determined to exercise a certain control over Christ's conduct of His mission, for they concluded from information they had received that He was "beside Himself," i.e., acting imprudently, or perhaps strangely. This group is designated by Mark as of $\pi\alpha\rho$ ' $\alpha\dot{\nu}\tau o\dot{\nu}$, literally, "those with him." The phrase is commonly taken to mean the relatives of Jesus, but it can also mean friends or neighbors. (On this phrase and the relationship between it and "his mother and brethren" in Mk 3.31, see the commentaries on the Gospel of Mark.) While it seems more probable that the group is composed chiefly of the relatives of Jesus (see Jn 7.5 for the incredulous attitude of His relatives toward Him), it is doubtful that the mother of Jesus is included in it. The second evangelist is particularly concerned to indicate the attitude of various groups of people toward Jesus (e.g., Mk 1.22; 2.16; 3.6, 22). In Mk 3.20-21 he indicates a reaction of the relatives that is hostile toward Him, perhaps out of fear that His actions will lead to family embarrassment. But this reference to the attitude of the relatives of Jesus does not warrant ascribing the same sentiments to His mother, whom Mark does not here specifically mention and who may be presumed to have rendered her own judgment on the question of her Son's conduct.

Modern scholarship of the Gospels has questioned whether the visit of Jesus' "mother and brethren" in Mk 3.31–35 (parallel passages in Mt 12.46–50; Lk 8.19–21) was the historical outcome of the efforts of the relatives to control His ministry. From the literary standpoint it is clear that Mark connects the two events ("they went forth" in Mk 3.21; the mother and brethren "come" in Mk 3.31). The specific mention of the presence of the mother of Jesus made in Mk 3.31 lends support to the older view assuming the events to be historically connected. Although it is true that according to Jewish family custom Jesus was no longer under the rule of His mother, neither was He subject to His other relatives. If, as the Catholic tradition holds (see on "the brethren of Jesus" below), He was Mary's only child, it is comprehensible why the relatives might have enlisted her presence, the more readily to secure access to Him in view of His constant preoccupation with crowds (Mk 3.20). The announcement conveyed to Jesus in Mk 3.32 concerning the arrival of His mother as well as His brethren has an authentic historical ring when viewed in the entire context.

These observations allow the inference that Mary permitted herself to be pressed into service by the relatives so that they might have their confrontation with Jesus; but they do not allow the further inference that she thereby shared their sentiments concerning His conduct of the ministry. The evangelist provides no data from which a conclusion can be drawn concerning her own state of mind on the issue raised by the relatives. He affords only a basis for the judgment that in a matter of family concern Mary made the contribution for which the family asked.

Mark concludes his account of the visit, not by recording the meeting between Jesus and the relatives, but by citing His comment in the context of the hostility of the relatives. Jesus takes occasion of the announcement of the arrival of His mother and brethren to observe that His mother and brethren are those who "do the will of God" (Mk 3.35) like the audience before Him listening to His teaching (Mk 3.34). In Mark's context this saying of Jesus constitutes a telling response to His relatives who are disturbed at His acceptance of the crowds (Mk 3.20–21): His own relatives are unwilling to accept His teaching as prophetic (Mk 6.4). Not only do they feel free to instruct Him; they also refuse to be instructed by Him. Were they to accept His teaching themselves, they would discover a bond between Him and themselves of greater significance than ties of blood. (For the ultimate acceptance of Jesus and His teaching by His relatives, see Acts 1.14.)

This incident revealing Jesus' experience of rejection by His relatives may owe its recall to the persecution Judaeo-Christians underwent at the hands of their Jewish brethren (Acts 4.1–2; 5.17–18), in which Paul himself eventually played a leading role before his conversion (Acts 8.3; 22.4). The Gospel of Matthew (Mt 12.46–50) places the visit of Jesus' mother and brethren in close connection with the parables on the kingdom of God (Mk 13.1–52) in order to associate the rejection of Christians and the Christian message with the mystery of the kingdom of God. (On Lk 8.19–21, see below.)

Mark 6.1–4. In Mk 6.1–4 (parallel in Mt 13.54–57) the people of Nazareth refuse to accept Jesus and His message (see Lk 4.16-30). Apparently, they are insulted that His preaching and miracles were not presented first to themselves. In their opinion their familiarity with His family circle entitled them to this consideration. According to the parallel passage in Mt 13.55, they know Him as "the carpenter's son." These were probably the original words in the early oral catechesis from which the Synoptic Gospels are derived. The best manuscripts in Mk 6.3 have: "The carpenter, the son of Mary." But this does not accord with the Jewish custom of describing a man as the son of his father rather than of his mother, a practice well illustrated in the title given Jesus in Jn 6.42. A third reading, in a few manuscripts, "the son of the carpenter and of Mary," is probably the result of a conflation of the other two variant readings. The title, "the carpenter's son," implies no knowledge among the Nazarenes of Jesus' virginal conception, as is to be expected.

The family circle of Jesus is further described in Mk 6.3 as composed of His ''brothers'' and ''sisters,'' four of the brothers being explicitly named. The Greek words ἀδελφοί and ἀδελφοί that are used to designate the relationship between Jesus and these relatives have the meaning of full blood brother and sister in the Greek-speaking world of the evangelist's time and would naturally be taken by his Greek reader in this sense. Toward the end of the 4th century (c. 380) Helvidius, in a work now lost, pressed this fact in order to attribute to Mary other children besides Jesus so as to make her a model for mothers of larger families. St. Jerome, motivated by the Church's traditional faith in Mary's perpetual virginity, wrote a tract against Helvidius (A.D. 383) in which he developed an explanation of the Gospel usage of ἀδελφοί and άδελφαί for the relatives of Jesus that is still in vogue among Catholic scholars. In the Septuagint (LXX) άδελφόί is used in the sense of "kinsman." In Gn 13.8; 14.14, 16 Abraham's nephew LOT is called his "brother"; the same term is applied to Jacob's nephew Laban in Gn 29.15. In 1 Chr 23.22 the sons of Cis (Kish) are called the "brothers" of Eleazar's daughters, though they were their cousins. This usage of ἀδελφός in LXX derives from the fact that Hebrew is deficient in terminology for blood relationships (as is also Aramaic, the language behind the Greek of the Gospels). Both Hebrew and Aramaic were forced to use āḥîm, "brothers," in the sense of "kinsmen" to supply for the deficiency. The translators who produced LXX transferred this broader meaning of Semitic $\bar{a}h\hat{u}m$ to ἀδελφοί and thus established a usage that the evangelists could follow.

It is important to note the point of St. Jerome's argument. He did not contend that the only possible linguistic meaning for "brothers" and "sisters," used of Jesus' relatives in the Gospels, is "cousins." To establish the relatives as cousins of Jesus he worked from other, complicated evidence in the Gospels that indicated that the James and Joseph of Mk 6.3 were children of a Mary who was a different person from the mother of Jesus (cf. Mt 13.55; 27.56, Mk 15.40). The validity of this argument depends on the assumption (probably correct) that the James and Joseph of Mk 6.3 are the same persons who are mentioned in Mk 15.40. On this supposition the mother of James and Joseph who is called Mary in Mk 15.40 was a relative of the mother of Jesus. Jerome considered her a sister of Jesus' mother and concluded that James and Joseph were His cousins. This conclusion, although reasonably probable, is less certain than the central point of Jerome's argument against Helvidius. Helvidius assumed that ἀδελφοί and ἀδελφαί in the Gospels, when used of blood relationships, had no other possible sense than full blood brother and full blood sister. Jerome's argument does not deny that such would be the normal usage of these terms in the Greek-speaking world, but he adduces evidence to show that the evangelists wrote within a linguistic tradition that enabled them to use the terms in a broader sense. There is, then, no necessary incompatibility between the Church's doctrine of Mary's perpetual virginity, in vogue long before Helvidius's time, and the Gospel usage of "brothers" and "sisters" for the relatives of Jesus.

The texts here under consideration, as well as Mk 3.31 and its parallels, reflect the view of Mary as the natural mother of Jesus that prevailed during His public ministry. Even those on familiar terms with the family circle of Jesus were unaware of the virginal conception. Since they regarded Jesus as the son of Mary and Joseph in the fully natural sense, they could not possibly have attached any particular religious significance to the fact that Jesus was the only child of Mary and Joseph. All the texts so far considered, including perhaps Gal 4.4, mirror a historical milieu that made no religious reflection on the person of the mother of Jesus.

Theological Reflections on the Mother of Jesus. When Mary is spoken of in the NT its inspired writers often convey a deeper theological meaning by their words than may be seen by the average modern reader. Such passages, which are treated here, are (1) Mt 1.18–25; 2.11, 13–14, 20–21; (2) Lk 1.26–38; 1.39–56; 2.1–7; 2.16, 19; 2.33–35; 2.41–51; (3) Lk 8.19–21; 11.27–28; (4) Rv ch. 12; (5) Jn 2.1–12; 19.25–27.

Matthew 1.18–25; 2.11, 13–14, 20–21. The theological conceptions that govern the thought of Matthew's INFANCY GOSPEL are expressed in his genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1.2–16). The genealogy invokes the messianic hope of Israel in recalling the divine promises to the patriarchs (Mt 1.2) and to David (Mt 1.6). It acknowledges Israel's sinfulness by pointing to David's murder of Uriah (Mt 1.6) and the disaster of the Babylonian captivity (Mt 1.11). It emphasizes the presence of God in Israel as continuously sustaining the faith and hope of the people (the sense of ἐγέννησεν, ''begot,'' constantly repeated throughout the genealogy).

It is in this context of God's continuous and beneficent presence in Israel that the events in Mt 1.18–2.23 are set. The evangelist's main purpose in these chapters is to declare that the saving action of God, begun in Abraham and carried forward throughout Israel's history, continues in Christ for the benefit of Israel and the world. Jesus is declared the Savior of His people (Mt 1.21); the King of the Jews (Mt 2.1); the Son of David (Mt 1.1), i.e., descended from the Davidic line in accordance with Nathan's prophecy (2 Sm 7.12–13); and the Son of Abraham (Mt 1.1), i.e., the one through whom the divine promise that all the nations are to be blessed in Abraham is fulfilled (Gn 12.3; Gal 3.8–9).

Matthew's concept of Jesus as the bearer in history of the messianic saving action of God clarifies the meaning of the evangelist when he sets out to explain the "origin" of Christ (Mt 1.18): he aims to show how God's presence in Israel produced the person of Christ. The salvific action of God (1) caused a virginal conception of Jesus in Mary, the fiancée of Joseph (Mt 1.18); (2) it resolved Joseph's perplexity over this event by directing him to marry her so as to give the Child legal status as a descendant of David (Mt 1.20); and (3) it provided the Child and His mother with necessary protection (Mt 2.11, 13–14, 20–21). As conceived by Matthew, the action of God involved a divine choice of the person of Joseph, since his role as legal father of the child had specific purposes.

The evangelist adds his own comment upon the events by citing Is 7.14 as here receiving its "fulfillment," i.e., as revealing the continuity of God's saving action in history. In the virginal conception of Jesus, God acted in accordance with what He had planned all along, as faith perceives when it reads Is 7.14 in the light of Mary's virginal maternity and the meaning of her child as the bearer of salvation to the world ("Emmanuel," which is interpreted 'God with us'"). This position of Matthew that Is 7.14 already stated (so far as God is concerned) the virginal conception of Jesus that occurred in Mary implies a divine choice of her person to be the virgin mother of the Savior. The evangelist reenforces this point by stating that Joseph "did not know her" until the birth of the child; that is to say, Joseph recognized that Mary was divinely chosen to be Virgin Mother of the Child, and fully respected the divine will that she remain a virgin.

It is universally recognized that Matthew's famous "until" ("he did not know her until she brought forth a son"; Mt 1.25) is not a term of chronological intent: it neither affirms nor denies marital intercourse after the child's birth. The Evangelist is not looking forward in time through the history of the marriage between Joseph and Mary, but rather backward to his own citation of Is 7.14. He stresses this prophecy as being operative especially for the religious understanding of Joseph and Mary. This fact is important for the interpretation of the story of the Magi (Mt 2.1-12). The Magi learn that the messianic king of the Jews has been born, and they worship Him. [See MAGI (IN THE BIBLE).] But Matthew's readers are better informed than the Magi. The readers know that the king is EMMANUEL; in Him is found the salvific presence of God (2 Cor 5.19). They know also, as the Magi do not know, that the mother of the Child is the virgin mother of God's salvific plan. Matthew's Christian readers can perceive, not merely a continuity between the virginal conception of Christ and Is 7.14, but also a continuity in history: in God's design the virgin mother whom He destined to appear in Israel gave birth to the Savior in whom the Gentiles are to believe. God's plan is to bridge the gap between Jew and Gentile; this Israelite mother of divine choice becomes associated through her child with the Gentile world.

Joseph's further role in Mt 2.13–14, 20–21 is to care for the Child in whom the Gentiles are to believe and for the virgin mother whose maternity is ultimately to make their faith possible. These considerations indicate that in Matthew ch. 1–2 Mary's maternity is related to the Gentile world through faith in Christ, and it is not oriented to the question of the personal family of herself and Joseph. In the theological thought of Matthew, her maternal role is fully accounted for in her virginal maternity of Christ and its significance for the Gentile world. For the first evangelist Mary is the virgin mother of the Emmanuel whose salvific presence, once He is conceived, remains in the world forever (Mt 28.20).

Luke 1.26-38; 1.39-56; 2.1-7; 2.16, 19; 2.33-35; 2.41-51. The Lucan Infancy Gospel (Luke ch. 1-2) is a conscious product of literary artistry that offers a series of religious reflections on John the Baptist and Jesus, and on Zechariah, Elizabeth, and Mary. Considered as a whole, Luke's Infancy narrative is made up of two diptychs. The first diptych parallels the annunciation of John to Zechariah (Lk 1.5-25) with the ANNUNCIATION of Jesus to Mary (Lk 1.26–38). The second diptych parallels the birth of John (Lk 1.57-58) with the birth of Jesus (Lk 2.1–20). In addition to this broad scheme of parallelism, there is comparison and contrast of scene and detail throughout Luke ch. 1-2. The more detailed use of parallelism is evident in the Annunciations; it is less evident but clearly detectable elsewhere (e.g., in the contrast between Mary in Lk 1.39-46 and Zechariah in Lk 1.20-23). The purpose of the parallelisms in ch. 1-2 is to show adroitly the superior dignity in the order of the divine gifts of Jesus over John, and of Mary over Zechariah and Elizabeth.

In certain portions of ch. 1–2 the literary style draws heavily upon words, expressions, and figures of the OT, not by direct citation of them but by an interweaving of the OT elements into the Lucan narrative. In this way the author alludes to past prophecies, personages, and momentous events of the sacred history of Israel in order to bestow life, warmth, and relevance upon the events and people he describes. Beneath the surface of his Annunciation narratives, and the MAGNIFICAT especially, lie unusually rich undercurrents of theological thought.

All the personages and events of Luke ch. 1–2 derive their importance and meaning from Jesus. He is Son of the Most High, the Davidic messianic King (Lk 1.32–33; cf. 2 Sm 7.13–14), miraculously conceived by the power of God (Lk 1.35); He is Savior, Christ, and Lord (Lk 2.11), the very bearer of salvation (Lk 2.30), the light of the Gentiles and the glory of Israel (Lk 2.32). John's greatness consists in the fact that he was appointed by God to prepare the way for Him (Lk 1.15a). To fulfill this task John was consecrated to the Lord from birth [an idea conveyed by a combination of OT allusions taken from 1 Sm 1.11 (see especially the LXX); Jgs 13.2–5, 7] and endowed with the spirit and power of Elijah (Lk 1.17; cf. Mal 3.23). He is the last and the greatest of the OT Prophets because it was his function to prepare Israel for the immediate appearance of Jesus through his baptism for the remission of sins (Lk 1.76–77).

In the thought of the Lucan narrative, the mother of Jesus likewise derives her dignity from Jesus. The evangelist introduces her as a παρθένος (virgin) and the fiancée of Joseph (Lk 1.27). His judgment concerning her virginity is based not on historical data but on the more certain terrain of the action of God making choice of her, much in the line of thought of Mt 1.23 (see above). According to Luke, she is κεχαριτωμένη (highly favored, traditionally rendered as full of grace), the favored object of the divine choice, because of the person of Jesus she is about to conceive and bear (Lk 1.28). This title, ascribed by Luke to the angel Gabriel, is bracketed by χαῖρε (hail, greetings; literally "rejoice") and ὁ κύριος μετὰ σοῦ [the Lord (is) with you]. The entire "greeting," as Luke terms it (Lk 1.29), is not to be interpreted conventionally, for the evangelist describes Mary as pondering it, attempting to penetrate its meaning (Lk 1.29).

A growing number of NT scholars concede that the greeting is a subtle allusion to a set of OT prophecies that invite Israel, under the figure of a woman, the "daughter Sion," to rejoice at the prospect of the action of God bringing about the promised salvation of the people (Jl 2.21–27; Za 9.9–10; Zep 3.14–17). Luke's χαίρε parallels the χαίρε (rejoice) of Zep 3.14 (LXX). His κεχαριτωμένη parallels the OT figure, the "virgin daughter Sion" (Is 37.22), "virgin Israel" (Jer 31.4), an abstract personification of God's favored people Israel, directed in these prophecies to rejoice at the fulfillment of their messianic hope. The expression, "The Lord [is] with you," as used in the OT (Gn 26.24; 28.15; 46.4; Ex 3.12; Jgs 6.12, 16), expresses the idea of God's salvific presence, here to inaugurate the messianic era by allusion to Zep 3.15b: "The King of Israel, the Lord, is in your midst." After his notation on the necessity of reflection concerning the greeting, Luke introduces a parallel of contrast: "Fear not, Mary" (Lk 1.30), to parallel "Fear not, Sion" (Zep 3.16); "you have found grace with God" (Lk 1.30), to contrast with, "you have no further misfortune to fear" (Zep 3.15b). As the Prophet Zephaniah invites Israel to rejoice over the presence of God within it to save it from all its misfortunes (Zep 3.14-17), so the angel invites Mary to rejoice because she is favored with the presence of God who saves her from all its misfortunes. Whereas the prophecy of Zephaniah refers globally to Israel, or more exactly to the faithful Remnant of Israel, under the figure of a woman, the angelic greeting concretizes the prophecy in Mary: she receives in her person the fulfillment of the messianic hope of her people.

The angel explains that Mary is to receive the fulfillment by conceiving and bearing a son whom she is to name Jesus ("Yahweh is salvation"; Lk 1.31). The Evangelist employs conventional language to allude to women favored by God with sons (Sarah: Gn 21.2; Samson's mother: Jgs 13.3; Anna: 1 Sm 1.19; the young woman of Is 7.14; see also the terms used in regard to Elizabeth: Lk 1.24, 57). After the Child is described as the Davidic Messiah, Mary presents her famous question, "How shall this happen, since I do not know man?" (Lk 1.34). Since Mary is fiancée to Joseph, since there is no historical background sustaining the possibility that she and Joseph would have entered a virginal marriage of their own accord, and since there is no evidence in the Biblical texts that, they were divinely enlightened to make such a decision at the time of their bethrothal, it is necessary to conclude that the thought in Lk 1.34 does not refer to a "vow" of virginity Mary would have already made.

The interpretation of Mary's question has not achieved a consensus among NT scholars. It is clear that Luke intends it to contrast with Zechariah's question (Lk 1.18). He requests evidence to verify the truth of Gabriel's prophecy concerning Elizabeth's child. Mary, however, does not challenge Gabriel's prophecy that she will be mother of the messianic King. Her question reflects upon the angel's announcement that it is out of the divine favor toward herself (Lk 1.30) that she will be mother of this King (Lk 1.31–33). She inquires how she is to understand the divine favor toward herself in this messianic maternity ("How shall this be"), for she is not married, and unlike women of the past favored with children she has no evidence that she is barren ("since I do not know man").

The angel replies that the divine favor is to be shown her through a virginal conception of the child by the divine presence residing within her (Lk 1.35a). This divine action will be comparable to the cloud, the symbol of the divine presence, that settled down on the Meeting Tent housing the ark [Ex 40.35; to describe a special divine presence the Lucan text uses the verb $\dot{\epsilon}\pi\iota\sigma\kappa\iota\alpha\zeta\omega$, overshadow, the same word employed by LXX to translate the Hebrew verb $\dot{s}\bar{a}kan$ (to settle down, to abide) in Ex 40.35, where Yahweh's residence in the sanctuary is explained].

In consequence of God's action within her the Child to be born will be holy with the holiness of Yahweh, and the special divine presence within Him will come to be recognized (Lk 1.35b). Since the divine favor shown

Mary, and through her to the Child, is concealed by the virginal conception, the angel gives her a sign, i.e., a pledge, that God's favor will be manifested in His own time. The sign is Elizabeth's pregnancy (Lk 1.36). Whether it is the case of the barren woman, Elizabeth, or the case of Mary, the virgin, God shows His favor when and as He chooses: "because nothing shall be impossible with God" (Lk 1.37).

Mary accepts the angelic message in its entirety, expressing her confidence in the virginal conception as an action of God, in the mystery of the divine presence in the Child, and in the pledge of God that the divine favor toward her and her Child will be manifested: "Be it done to me according to your word" (Lk 1.38). The Lucan scene ends on the note that in the chosen woman, Mary, the divine presence resides as it resided in a similar manner in the midst of Israel in the sanctuary.

Luke's scene of Mary's VISITATION (Lk 1.39–45, 56) utilizes 2 Sm 6.1-11, 15 to draw out the theological implications of the divine presence in child and mother that the Annunciation narrative has prophesied. Mary, carrying the Child in her womb, is compared to the ark of the covenant, the site of the permanent presence of Yahweh among His people. As the ark was brought to Jerusalem in David's time, so the mother of Jesus departs in the direction of the Holy City to visit Elizabeth (Lk 1.39; cf. 2 Sm 6.2). As Israel honored the presence of Yahweh in the ark during its trip toward Jerusalem, so Elizabeth recognizes at Mary's greeting that the mother of Jesus carries in herself the divine presence. But unlike David's (2 Sm 6.9), her reaction to the presence of the Lord is one of joyful awe, not reverential fear (Lk 1.43); for Mary carries the presence of God that sanctifies (Lk 1.41) in contrast to the terrible presence that dealt Uzzah a mortal blow (2 Sm 6.7). As the ark stayed in the house of Obededom for 3 months (2 Sm 6.11), so Mary remains with Elizabeth for about three months (Lk 1.56).

Despite her exalted role as bearer of the divine presence, the ark of the new covenant, Mary is characterized by Luke in the MAGNIFICAT (Lk 1.46–58) as the perfect representative of the 'ānāwîm (lowly, humble, poor), the spiritual community of the poor, the remnant, whom God was to prepare to receive His expected salvation (cf. Zep 3.12). God has taken into consideration Mary's ταπείνωσις (humiliation, humble station, lowliness; Lk 1.48), both material and spiritual, and has looked favorably upon her longing for deliverance from this condition, as He promised to Abraham (Lk 1.55). Following the OT tradition of ascribing canticles to the person honored by them, Luke attributes the Magnificat to Mary. Essentially, it is a series of religious reflections invoking various OT ideas that concern the mystery of God's salvific plan come to term in Mary, through whose maternity of Jesus the generations to follow (the new Israel; Lk 1.50) will receive the blessings of the messianic era. All generations, recognizing the divine favor bestowed upon them through her, i.e., through her maternal role in the creation of the new Israel, will call her blessed (Lk 1.48).

The second chapter of Luke shifts its orientation somewhat away from consideration of the mother of Jesus to focus upon the mystery of salvation to occur through her Child, Jesus. However, the reader is invited to reflect upon this mystery through the eyes of the mother. The Child's birth occurs in simple and lowly surroundings that reflect the condition of the parents as classic examples of the ' $\check{a}n\bar{a}w\hat{n}m$ (Lk 2.6–7). The Lucan text makes discrete reference to Mi 5.1–5, with which it associates the birth of the Child at Bethlehem. It makes a second allusion by the use of $\varphi\acute{a}\tau\nu\eta$ (crib, manger) to Is 1.3–4 (see especially the LXX, where the same Greek word is used) to give meaning to the circumstances surrounding the birth as forecasting the rejection of Jesus.

True to His pledge, God overcomes the poverty and isolation of the birth by the angelic revelation to the shepherds (Lk 2.8–15). Mary ponders the divine message to these 'ănāwîm attempting to fathom its meaning as well as the circumstances of the birth (Lk 2.19; cf. Dn 7.28; Gn 37.11). In accordance with the Magnificat she remains among the 'ănāwîm. It is in this capacity that she presents the Child to the Lord in the Temple and makes the offering of the poor, two turtledoves (Lk 2.22–24). Again God acts to manifest the significance of the Child as Savior both of the Gentiles and of Israel, fulfilling a pledge to Simeon (Lk 2.32). When the parents marvel at the ingenuity of the divine plan, Simeon foretells the rejection of the Child (Lk 2:33-34) and addresses himself to the mother: "And thy own soul a sword shall pierce, that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed" (Lk 2.35). This prophecy has not been convincingly interpreted. It appears to allude to Ez 14.17, where the sword is the sign of division that the action of God produces in Israel to separate the faithful remnant from the rest of the people. In the Lucan theology Mary is addressed as a member of the 'ănāwîm. The probable meaning of the prophecy is that she, together with her Child (Lk 2.34), will be separated from her people. She is here envisioned by Luke in her representative capacity, already indicated in the Magnificat, as mother of the new Israel. Since Luke does not place Mary at the cross (cf. Lk 23.49 with Jn 19.25), it is improbable that he sees the prophecy as a direct reference to her compassion. He does associate her, however, with the primitive Christian community in Jerusalem (Acts 1.14).

Luke concludes his Infancy narrative with a cryptic allusion to the death and Resurrection of Jesus ("after three days''; Lk 2.46) in his account of the parents' discovery of Him in the Temple. Joseph and Mary are counted among the 'ănāwîm (who properly belong in the Temple, according to OT thought). The mother is left in a state of reflection on all the events of the childhood of Jesus, prayerful and awaiting expectantly the deliverance of Israel through her Son (Lk 2.51).

Luke 8.19–21; 11.27–28. The first of these passages has parallels in Mk 3.31–35; Mt 12.46–50 (see above). From the Lucan designation of Mary as the perfect representative of the 'ănāwîm it is evident that in both these passages the Evangelist intends to allude to the mother of Jesus as the perfect hearer of the word of God. In the Lucan theology she is the model of all Christians, who must respond to the word of God, and in this sense is already the figure or type of the Church.

The theological portrait of Mary in the Gospel of Luke as a whole exhibits a sweep of thought that takes the Christian reader from the lofty pinnacle of the symbolic ark of the new covenant in whose person the Son of God was conceived and resided, down to the humble station of the 'anawîm and finally leaves her as an invitation to all Christians to allow the word of God to fructify in themselves through an obedient faith as it fructified in the woman chosen to be the mother of Jesus. Since for Luke the divine favor shown Mary and her child is at first concealed and only gradually manifested, it appears quite incompatible with his theology that Mary would have other children by Joseph. To be the virgin mother of Jesus, the messianic King in whom the divine presence resides, is her personal, religious mission. Luke does not propose her virginity as a moral ideal, but as a determination of the divine will, a mystery of faith requiring that she hear the word of God and keep it.

Revelation ch. 12. The image of the woman in ch. 12 of Revelation is a symbol of the people of God, Israel of the OT and the new Israel of the NT (see Gal 6.10). In a highly subtle and complex manner the author of Revelation ch. 12 transforms the OT comparisons of Israel to a woman from metaphor to symbol. The OT Prophets compare Israel to a faithless bride (Jer ch. 2; Ez ch. 16), to a mother (Hos 2.4; Is 66.7), to a woman in labor (Jer 6.24; 13.27; Is 37.36). Selecting the woman image itself, ch. 12 of Revelation draws further upon the imagery of the OT Prophets to produce an original symbol that is remarkable for its ambivalence. New Testament scholars are in virtual agreement that the woman symbol of Rv. 12.1 stands for the people of God of both Testaments; but on the development of the symbol in the remainder of the chapter opinions diverge considerably. (See WOMAN CLOTHED WITH THE SUN.)

The allusion to the Israel of the OT in the symbol of the woman is evident from the unmistakable relationship between Rv 12.2 and Is 26.17. The thought and language of the two passages coincide. In Is 26.17 the Prophet likens Israel's suffering under divine chastisement to a woman in labor who is writhing and crying out. Like the metaphorical woman of this passage in Isaiah, the symbolic woman of Rv 12.2 is with child, cries out, and writhes. But in Isaiah the pregnancy, like the woman, is metaphorical: the whole figure of the Isaian woman is meant to depict the incapacity of Israel to save itself from its sufferings (Is 27.18). God Himself must intervene if Israel is to be saved (Is 27.20–22). The symbol of the woman in Rv 12.2 pertains to the Israel of the OT yearning for salvation but unable of itself to fulfill this yearning.

The inclusion of the Christian Church under the symbol of the woman appears clearly from Rv 12.5, 13–18, when these passages are understood in the context of the entire Book of Revelation. In Rv 12.5 the woman bears a son who is described in terms that unmistakably designate Him as the Christ of Christian faith. Once born, the Child is taken up to God's throne, a plain reference to the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ. But the woman is separated from Him by the threat of a dragon. She escapes the dragon through the protection of God, who prepares a place for her on earth (Rv 12.6, 14). Frustrated in his attempt to destroy the woman, the dragon awaits reinforcements before launching himself against the rest of the woman's offspring (Rv 12.17). In the context of the Book of Revelation, the woman who flees the dragon and is protected from harm by God can only be the Christian Church, for it is the Church at once divinely protected and persecuted that is the main theme of Revelation.

The ambivalent meaning of the woman symbol in the broad sweep of Rv ch. 12, symbolizing both Israel and the Christian Church, is clear also from the imagery of Rv 12.1. There, at the opening of the chapter, the woman is described as clothed with the sun, having the moon at her feet, and crowned with 12 stars. The imagery of sun and moon is taken from Is 60.1-2, 19-20, where the Israel of the future is envisioned, under the figure of a mother, as illuminating the entire world. Placed in heaven, i.e., immediately below God's throne, she reflects the light of God Himself. She is, as it were a new luminary for the earth, comparable to the sun and moon (cf. Gn 1.14–15). This imagery of the woman illuminating the world combines the people of God of the OT and the people of God of the NT into a unity: the promise made to the Israel of the OT in Is ch. 60 finds its fulfillment in the Church of the NT. The crown of 12 stars probably refers to the 12 tribes of Israel, who are sealed in Rv 12.4-8, and to the 12 Apostles, whose names are inscribed on the foundation stones of the New Jerusalem in Rv 21.14. This interpretation corresponds perfectly to the ambivalence of the woman symbol.

The interpretation of the woman symbol meets with its greatest difficulty in the passage of thought from Rv 12.2, the portrait of the woman in labor, to Rv 12.4-5, the portrait of the woman bearing the child. Because of the utilization of Is 26.17 to describe the labor of the woman in Rv 12.2, it is necessary to conclude that the labor here is fruitless: the portrait reflects the Isaian contention that Israel cannot save itself from its sufferings, but must await the act of God (Is 26.20-22). In Rv 12.4–5, however, the woman, who is no longer specified as being in labor but instead is confronted by the dragon, is fruitful and bears the child. Since Rv 12.5 designates the child as Christ and as immediately seized to be brought to God's throne, it is legitimate to conclude that behind this allusion to the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ lies the Johannine concept of the ὑψωσις "lifting up" (Jn 3.14; 12.32), i.e., the Passion-death and Resurrection-Ascension of Jesus. This allusion to the historical Jesus is on the high plane of the theology of the Johannine Gospel: the reference is to the historical Christ who is glorified by the Father (Jn 12.28; 13.31–32). In the Johannine theology Christ always possesses this glory. It is gradually revealed at the determination of the Father (Jn 2.11; 8.54). The woman of Rv 12.5 gives birth to the Christ who is glorified by the Father because He possessed this glory, i.e., His self-revealing divine power, before creation (Jn17.5), and lived among men to manifest it (Jn 1.14), especially through His Resurrection and Ascension (Rv 12.5b). In Rv 12.5 an extremely complex set of ideas in the realm of Johannine theology is propounded: (1) by an act of God the OT Israel (the woman of Rv 12.5) received in herself the fulfillment of her longing for deliverance (Is 26.20); (2) the OT Israel (the woman of Rv 12.5) gave birth to the messianic King (Ps 2.7), whose proper dwelling is at the throne of God, where He now resides (Rv 12.5b); (3) but since Christ always possessed the divine glory He now enjoys, it must be recalled that it was through the Virgin Mary (the woman of Rv 12.5) that He first "became flesh and tabernacled among us" (Jn 1.14) for the purpose of manifesting this glory ("and we saw his glory"; Jn 1.14). (The Johannine ἐσκήνωσεν, "tabernacled," has the same overtone of the divine presence as the "overshadow" of Lk 1.35.)

Through its complex symbolism Revelation ch. 12 combines into a single picture the mystery of God's salvific plan now operating through the Christian Church whose historical dependency on Israel lies in Christ, born of the Virgin Mary.

John 2.1–12; 19.25–27. The mother of Jesus appears in the Fourth Gospel in roles unequaled for their prominence in the synoptic accounts of the public ministry of Jesus. At CANA she takes an active role in Jesus' changing of water into wine at a marriage feast. On Calvary she is present beneath the cross, where she is instructed by her own dying Son to receive the beloved disciple as her son.

Attempts to interpret the Cana narrative (Jn 2.1–12) simply on the historical level have failed to account for all the data of the passage. Jesus' reply to Mary, "What wouldst thou have me do, woman? My hour has not yet come" (Jn 2.4), lacks coherence with Mary's confident instruction to the waiters, "Do whatever he tells you" (Jn 2.5). The expression τί ἐμοὶ καὶ σοί (literally, "What to me and to thee") is invariably used in both the OT and the NT to imply a certain rejection (Jgs 11.12; Jos 22.24; 2 Sm 16.10; 19.22; 1 Kgs 17.18; 2 Kgs 3.13; 2 Chr 35.21; Mt 8.29; Mk 1.24; 5.7; Lk 4.34; 8.28). The hour of Jesus in John is a technical term for His glorification through His Passion (Jn 7.30; 8.20; 12.23, 27;13.1; 17.1). Even if "hour" is read as part of a question ("Has my hour not yet come?") as some of the Fathers have understood it, an allusion to the Passion cannot be excluded from the text.

The impossibility of satisfactorily interpreting the Cana narrative on the assumption that it is solely the historical record of an objective event has forced exegetes to study the OT background to the account. It is obvious that an OT background saturates the Evangelist's thought in his Prologue (Jn 1.1–18), which alludes to Gn 1.1 and to the concept of the LOGOS in certain Psalms and in the Book of Wisdom. But the OT background is even more evident in Jn 1.19-51: the messianic expectancy (v. 19, 41), the citation of Is 40.3 in v. 23, and the allusions to Is 53.7 in v. 29 and v. 36, to the Law and the Prophets in v. 45, to the Davidic Messiah (2 Samuel ch. 7) in v. 49, and to Dn 7.13 ("Son of Man") and Gn 28.12 in v. 51. The Cana narrative alludes to the OT water of ritual purification in Jn 2.6, and Mary's statement to the waiters closely parallels Gn 41.55. Moreover, in Jn 1.19–51 titles are important to clarify the religious significance of personages: the Baptist is not Messiah, Elijah, or the Prophet, but "a herald's voice in the desert"; Jesus is Lamb of God, the Chosen One, teacher, Christ, Son of God, King of Israel, Son of Man; Simon is Rock; Nathanael is "a genuine Israelite." The use of titles is a procedure followed also in the case of Mary in the Cana narrative. The Evangelist avoids the use of her proper name, designating her instead as "the mother of Jesus" (four times, including Jn 2.12) and "woman" (once). The title, "the mother of Jesus" is to be understood according to the thought of Jn 1.14: the logos became flesh and "tabernacled" in her in order to manifest His glory.

Since the reply of Jesus to Mary in Jn 2.4 must be interpreted on a theological rather than a historical level, the title γυνή (woman) cannot be taken simply for the respectful term of address it represented in the Greek world of the Evangelist's time. Except for the possible correlation with "Son of Man" in Jn 1.51 no direct indication of the religious sense of "woman" is provided in the first two chapters of John. It is necessary to judge the sense of the title on the basis of the Cana narrative as a whole.

The narrative concerns the manifestation of the glory of Christ (Jn 2.11). The transformation of the ritual water of purification into wine is symbolic of the messianic benefits coming through Christ (for wine as one of the symbols of the messianic benefits, see Am 9.4; Is 25.6; Jer 31.12; JI 4.18). The miracle is a prophetic action fulfilling Jesus' prophecy that Nathanael would see evidence that the messianic benefits promised to the Patriarchs are fulfilled in Him (Jn 1.51; Gn 28.12). The setting of the miracle is a γάμος (wedding banquet), a Christian term portraying the joys of the messianic kingdom (Mt 22.2; 25.10; Lk 12.36). Mary's declaration, "They have no wine" (Jn 2.3), petitions, or at least hints, that Jesus should bestow the benefits of the kingdom on Israel. Although He replies that the time for such action has not yet arrived, He responds by the performance of the miracle. The ambiguity between Jesus' reply and His action suggests that the term "woman" shares in this equivocation.

The only sound explanation presenting itself for this peculiar usage of "woman" in Jn 2.4 is the varied senses in which the same term is utilized in the Johannine theology of Revelation ch. 12. The reply of Jesus views Mary's petition eschatologically, i.e., in the light of His future action inaugurating the kingdom with finality through His death on the cross. In this final sense He cannot now act; Mary is "woman" in accordance with Is 26.17, the figure of the metaphorically pregnant woman, yearning for the kingdom but unable to bring it about. However, in Christ's ministry the kingdom has really arrived (Mk 1.15). Thus He can respond to her request with a prophetic miracle indicating the future advent in Himself; from this standpoint Mary is the future mother-Israel of Is 60.4, i.e., the figure of the future people of God. Through her participation in the miracle at Cana she is beginning to experience the joy of the gathering of the new people of God (Is 60.5) in the kingdom that Christ will finally establish. The title "woman" in the Cana narrative makes of Mary's person the figure of the people of God: first of the old Israel yearning for salvation through Christ, yet completely dependent on the action of God through Him; and secondly of the new Israel to come into existence through His Passion and Resurrection.

The Johannine scene of Mary at the cross (Jn 19.25–27) completes his gospel theology of the mother of Jesus as "woman." That the Cana and Calvary narratives involving the mother of Jesus are intended to be mutually explanatory is clear from several considerations: the theological sense of the word "hour" in Jn 2.4, meaning the glorification of Jesus through His Passion: the absence of the proper name in favor of the titles "the mother of Jesus" and "woman" in both passages, and the phrase "the third day" in Jn 2.1, probably in itself an allusion orienting the Cana narrative to the Calvary scene (cf. Mt 16.21; Lk 9.22).

On Calvary Jesus addresses His mother from the cross, before He declares the Scriptures fulfilled (Jn 19.28), to inform her that she has a son in the beloved disciple. The promise of Cana here comes to term: the transition from the old to the new Israel, prefigured in Mary at Cana, is completed. The messianic fulfillment she yearned for in her declaration, "They have no wine," is the gift to her of her Son: the gift is the new people of God, typified in the beloved disciple. The yearning of Israel for messianic salvation, so often spoken of by the Prophets under the imagery of the woman in labor, is concretized on Calvary in the historical mother of Jesus. Just as she is the woman chosen by God to be the tabernacle of the Logos become flesh so that He might manifest His saving power among men, so she depicts in her person the faith, the expectancy, the suffering, and the final mysterious destiny of the Christian Church.

IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

When the OT is interpreted from the standpoint of its literal historical meaning, i.e., the sense intended by the inspired human author for his OT audience, a Marian meaning is not discoverable in it. Such is true also of the Christological sense. Neither Christ nor Mary can be discovered in the books of the OT by the method of critical, historical exegesis of their literal sense.

Relation of OT Prophecy to NT Messianism. Messianic prophecy both in origin and in fulfillment is an event dependent upon the will of God; God prophesies, and God fulfills the prophecy according to His own free determination and wisdom. The messianism of the NT derives from the prophetic proclamation of the Twelve concerning Jesus of Nazareth: God raised Him from the dead so that the world might be saved from its sins through faith in Him (Acts 2.14-36). The entire NT is a prophetic elaboration of this fundamental prophecy. The messianism of the NT is a divinely instituted fulfillment of that of the OT, just as OT messianism is in itself of divine institution. The sense of the NT is that it possesses an essential bond with the OT as the divinely caused fulfillment of the messianic expectancy of the old Israel. Under the prophetic light of Christ, the Apostles, and the Church the NT endeavors to provide its own prophetic messianism with intelligibility, depth, and color by understanding itself, not as the logical outcome of the expectancy of the old Israel, that is, a result deducible by reason from OT texts, but rather as the divinely determined outcome of this expectancy.

To interpret the OT the authors of the NT begin with their own prophetic messianism; understanding the OT in this light, they show the unity and wisdom of the divine plan of salvation that courses through both Testaments. The NT quest into the OT has as its main objective the illumination of Christ, but of Christ as head of the Church; its quest is principally, if not exclusively, Christological and ecclesiological. In principle, the NT quest into the OT is not a Marian search, for the apostolic kerygma proclaims Christ alone to be the cause and source of salvation.

Mary in NT Messianism. The NT conceives of the mother of Jesus as a theologically significant discovery within the compass of its own prophetic messianism: the fact of this discovery is reflected in the Infancy narratives of Matthew and Luke, in ch. 12 of Revelation, and in the Fourth Gospel. The theological significance the NT Church attached to the discovery is that the mother of Jesus is relevant to its new messianism: her messianic maternity serves to flesh out the Church's CHRISTOLOGY and its ECCLESIOLOGY.

The discovery of Mary's messianic maternity, i.e., the fact that she became the mother of Jesus by the open manifestation of the divine mind and will in her virginal conception, led NT thought to search into the OT to forge a stronger bond between its Christological messianism and the messianic expectancy characteristic of the OT.

The bond is forged with theological care, subtlety, and delicacy. It does not consist in a series of affirmations that in the mother of Jesus God chose a salvific companion for Christ. It does consist in the affirmation that the divine plan of salvation included God's choice of a virgin in Israel whom He willed to make meaningful for the comprehension of His Christ and His Church.

The NT quest into the meaningfulness of the mother of Jesus for Christ and the Church relies, as for Christology itself, upon the prophetic grasp of the OT. This prophetic grasp is little, if at all concerned, with drawing a direct correlation between the mother of Jesus and the material content of OT messianic prophecy. The NT authors favor an allusive use of OT messianic texts and symbols to suggest the religious significance of the mother of Jesus against the broad background of OT messianism. The only passage directly applied to the mother of Jesus in the NT (Mt 1.22–23) is Is 7.14. But the Isaian text is not employed here to affirm the truth of the virginal conception by appeal to OT prophecy. It is used to point up the religious significance of the virginal conception in the plan of God: in this way He chose to inaugurate His presence in Christ, which remains permanent in the world (Mt 28.20).

Especially remarkable in the NT is that its quest into the OT to illuminate its Christological messianism does not cite Gn 3.15 directly of Christ and His mother. In Rv 12.9 the NT prefers to use Gn 3.15 to express its conception of the earthly existence of the Church in its struggle against satanic power. However, there is a delicate association of the serpent with the woman who gives birth to the messianic King in Rv 12.5, and therefore a complex Marian allusion to Gn 3.15 (See Also Is 27.1).

The NT preference for utilizing the woman images of the OT to present its conception of the mother of Jesus is the most striking aspect of its theological reflection upon her person and role. It is only through a deeper understanding of the NT's prophetic use of the OT imagery that a more exact appreciation of the Bible's view of Mary's place and function in the divine plan of salvation is attainable.

LIFE OF MARY ACCORDING TO THE GOSPELS

The sparseness of historical detail concerning the mother of Jesus is due to the theologically disciplined writing peculiar to Sacred Scripture: the interest of the inspired writers lies in the salvific action of God in history. Endeavoring to keep the divine activity in history foremost, they content themselves with only that data necessary to provide the minimal historical setting that renders the work of God comprehensible to their readers.

Historical Data. The main piece of historical data offered in the Gospels concerning Mary is the fact that she and Joseph were betrothed at the time of the Annunciation (Mt 1.18; Lk 1.27). Otherwise she is simply located at various places, always in connection with her Son: at Nazareth for the child's conception (Lk 1.26); in the hill country of Judea (near Jerusalem) for Elizabeth's recognition of her unique maternity (Lk 1.39); at Bethlehem for the Child's birth (Lk 2.4, 7; Mt 2.1); at Jerusalem for her own purification in the Temple and the offering of the Child to Yahweh (Lk 2.22); at Nazareth for the Child's rearing (Lk 2.51; Mt 2.23); at Jerusalem for the discovery of Jesus speaking with the teachers in the Temple (Lk 2.42, 46); at Cana for a wedding (Jn 2.1); end finally at Jerusalem when Jesus is crucified (Jn 19.25), where Luke places her at the origin of the Church (Acts 1.8). The datum of Mt 2.13 that Mary spent some time in Egypt is difficult to interpret and need not be pressed historically.

The Biblical texts offer no information on the proximity of Mary's virginal conception of Jesus and her impending marriage to Joseph. It is legitimate to presume that the Annunciation occurred shortly before the wedding date, and that the wedding took place at its predetermined time so that the shadow of scandal (quite likely in Galilee) over the conception of the Child would have been excluded. It is unnecessary to suppose from Mt 1.18-20 that Mary suffered from Joseph's suspicion of her adultery. The text of Matthew is better comprehended as a reflection on the fact that Joseph accepted the Child's paternity as the divine will in his own regard since in the actual circumstances he could not exercise his legal right of divorce without casting the suspicion of adultery upon her, and thus also injuring the Child. Luke's Annunciation narrative appears rather to exclude Mary from the Davidic line. If she were of Levitical descent, a possibility raised by her relationship to Elizabeth, the Evangelists have attached no importance to it; nor have they attempted to derive religious significance from her name. Her life seems to have been spent in the quiet and obscurity of Nazareth (Mk 1.9), where she acquired no other reputation than that of being the mother of Jesus.

Historical Inferences. The most important historical inferences to be drawn from the Gospel data about Mary's life are the religious implications of the Lucan Annunciation scene. According to the Lucan theology, her understanding of herself and of her future underwent profound alteration due to the virginal conception of the messianic King. She was required thereafter to live in the obscurity of faith, awaiting the realization of the angelic prophecies concerning her Son. In the thought of Mt 1.18–25 Joseph agreed to share this religious life of faith with her. That their married life would have pursued the normal course of preparing for other children besides Jesus seems excluded by the Lucan theology. This theology demands of Mary that she await the time for the manifestation of her choice by God as the Virgin Mother of His Son, the divine Messiah.

Bibliography: P. F. CEUPPENS, De Mariologia Biblica (Rome 1951). P. GAECHTER, Maria im Erdenleben (Innsbruck 1953). A. KASSING, Das Verhältnis von Kirche und Maria (Düsseldorf 1958). R. LAURENTIN, Structure et théologie de Luc I–II (Études Biblique; 1957). B. J. LE FROIS, The Woman Clothed with the Sun (Rome 1954). G. MIEGGE, The Virgin Mary, tr. W. SMITH (Philadelphia 1955). M. THURIAN, Mary, Mother of All Christians (New York 1964). G. F. WOOD, The Form and Composition of the Lucan Annunciation Narratives (Doctoral dissertation, Catholic University of America, microfilm; Ann Arbor 1963). M. M. BOURKE, "The Literary Genus of Matthew 1-2," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 22 (Washington 1960) 160-175. R. J. DILLON, "Wisdom Tradition and Sacrament Retrospect in the Cana Account," ibid. 24 (1962) 268-296. S. LYONNET, Le Récit de l'Annonciation et la maternité divine de la Sainte Vierge (Rome 1956). Marian Studies, v.11 (Paterson, NJ 1960), v.12 (1961). B. F. MEYER, "But Mary Kept All These Things," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 26 (Washington 1964) 31-49. J. A. FITZMYER, "The Virginal Conception of Jesus in the New Testament," Theological Studies 34 (1973) 541-75. J.

"The Virgin of the Cherries," painting by Titian, c. 1516–1518. (@CORBIS)

MCHUGH, The Mother of Jesus in the New Testament (Garden City 1975). J. M. REESE, "The Historical Image of Mary in the New Testament," Marian Studies 28 (1977) 27–44. J. LAMBRECHT, "The Relatives of Jesus in Mark," Novum Testamentum 16 (1974) 241–58. R. F. COLLINS, "Mary in the Fourth Gospel: A Decade of Johannine Studies," Louvain Studies 3 (1970) 99–142 R. E. BROWN, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives of Matthew and Luke (Garden City 1993). R. E. BROWN, "Roles of Women in the Fourth Gospel," Theological Studies 36 (1975) 688–99. R. E. BROWN et al. Mary in the New Testament: A Collaborative Assessment by Protestant and Roman Catholic Scholars (Philadelphia 1978).

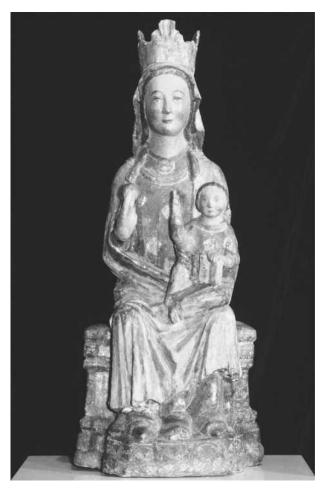

[C. P. CEROKE/EDS.]

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, II (IN THEOLOGY)

In this encyclopedia, the theology of Mary and its methodology is more generally treated under the heading MARIOLOGY. Throughout this encyclopedia, there are specific entries dealing with Mary under her various titles or gifts: see ASSUMPTION OF MARY; DORMITION OF THE VIRGIN; IMMACULATE CONCEPTION; IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY; MOTHER OF GOD; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF; THEOTOKOS. For ecumenical developments in Marian theology, see MARY IN CATHOLIC-PROTESTANT DIALOGUE. The historical developments of Marian theology is dealt with under MARIOLOGY. This entry discusses the specific theological questions about Mary as traditionally presented in the the Roman Catholic theological tradition over the centuries under the following subheadings: (1) Holiness of Mary; (2) Knowledge of Mary; (3) Mary and the Church; (4) Mediatrix of all Graces; and (5) Spiritual Maternity.

PART 1: HOLINESS OF MARY

Supernatural holiness involves beyond a special union with God through sanctifying grace the identification of one's will with the will of God, evidenced through the practice of virtue and the exclusion of sin. In the case of the Mother of the Savior, the degree of supernatural holiness bestowed upon her and achieved through her meritorious life was most extraordinary and can be properly demonstrated through a consideration of her peculiar offices and privileges. Mary's freedom from sin, her fullness of grace, her virtues and gifts, and her final confirmation in grace at the end of her life were special factors of her sanctity, and each of these realities, considered in order below, contributed and gave testimony in its own way to the holiness of the Mother of God.

14th-Century Spanish Devotional Image of the Virgin and Child Enthroned, polychromed and gilded wooden sculpture. (©CORBIS)

Freedom from Sin. Both the Scriptures and the teaching Church clearly indicate that the Blessed Virgin Mary, immaculately conceived, received the gift of sanctifying grace and other special gifts in an unparalleled manner. The Archangel Gabriel's words, "Hail, full of grace" (Lk 1.28), represent a unique salutation. They imply that Mary was adorned with an abundance of heavenly gifts from the treasury of the divinity, to a degree beyond that of all the angelic spirits and all the saints. In fact, official Catholic teaching holds that God's grace was bestowed on Our Lady "in such a wonderful manner that she would always be free from absolutely every stain of sin, and that, all beautiful and perfect, she might display such fullness of innocence and holiness that under God none greater would be known . . ." (Pius IX, Ineffabilis Deus; Denz 2800).

Mary's Immaculate Conception, therefore, was a unique and particular privilege. To be immaculately conceived, or to be ever without sin, is to possess grace; just as to be conceived without grace is to begin life in the state of sin. Catholic doctrine teaches, consequently, that Mary's predestination as the worthy mother of God postulates a fitting preparation in her soul and that from the very first moment of her existence she was filled with grace.

This positive aspect of holiness, measured in terms of her possession of grace, stands in contradistinction to what is termed Mary's perfect sinlessness, the negative aspect of her sanctity. In the case of Our Lady, this perfect sinlessness implies more than merely the absence of sin; it implies also a complete indefectibility in the moral order, or the actual inability to sin.

Mary's sinlessness, therefore, is properly described as absolute, and this as the consequence of several factors. Her freedom from the assaults of CONCUPISCENCE alone would not have been sufficient to ensure it, for the angels, free from the weaknesses of a fallen Adam were still able to revolt against God. Two other special factors constituted Mary perfectly impeccable. The first was her constant awareness of God, living always in His presence, and the second was her reception of special and extraordinary graces. These particular graces represented the most important factor, for they enabled Mary to maintain a perfect harmony in her mind, will, affections, and appetitive powers, and to recognize always, where error plagues lesser mortals, that true good and happiness are found only in union with God's will.

Such sinlessness in Our Lady, however, does not mean that Mary was intrinsically impeccable, but rather that the grace of her Immaculate Conception and her divine motherhood made sin utterly impossible in her life. She was free, as a consequence of her predestination, not only from all personal sin and from every voluntary imperfection but also from every involuntary moral fault and from even the first movements of concupiscence.

The fact and propriety of Mary's complete sinlessness, recognized in the Church long before other Marian mysteries were explored, can be established also through the theological axiom that the nearer one approaches to a principle of truth or life the more deeply one partakes of its effects. Hence, Mary's unique proximity to God and the possession of grace made her immune to any kind of personal sin. Her maternal relationship with her divine Son was more than a mere physiological relationship and even more than an office endowed with special graces. It was, in fact, a supernatural, sanctifying union, implying a highly intimate affinity and relationship with the Most Holy Trinity. It is evident, therefore, that Mary's relationship to the hypostatic order demanded that God, out of what was due Himself, bestow the grace of IMPECCABILITY upon His Mother.

Fullness of Grace. This fact of Mary's complete sinlessness implies conversely what is termed the fullness of grace. The teaching Church, therefore, in referring traditionally to Our Lady as full of grace, has never felt justified in attributing to Mary anything less than a supremacy of holiness. Whatever in providence has been given in any degree to individual saints must have been given to Mary in plenitude. If the first parents received an exceptional amount of grace from the moment of their creation, Mary must have possessed a far greater degree of sanctity from the time of her conception.

Even before papal authority confirmed their teaching, ecclesiastical writers and Doctors of the Church were unanimous in holding that from her very creation Mary possessed a greater degree of sanctity than any angel or other merely human being. Many theologians have not hesitated to claim for Mary a sanctity surpassing, even from the beginning, the combined holiness of all angels and other men, excluding, of course, that of her divine Son.

Traditionally, therefore, the Church has always attributed to Mary any grace that has been granted to a lesser saint, either in its own form or in some more eminent and fitting manner. Certain graces, of course, could not be directly bestowed on Mary. The priesthood, for an instance, was not appropriate for Our Lady as a woman, but the divine maternity brought her the local, not simply the sacramental, presence of Christ's body; and physical martyrdom, not providentially in God's plan for His Mother, was superseded by her participation in a singular manner in the Passion of her divine Son.

Our Lady's fullness of grace, however, preeminent as it was, was not comparable to the plenitude of grace in Christ. Our Savior is the source of grace; moreover, by reason of the hypostatic union, the plenitude of grace was complete in Our Lord from His conception. In Mary's case, grace was susceptible to growth. As Our Lady dealt with Christ, witnessed the events in the work of Redemption, and experienced one by one the episodes in her life linking her with the work of the Savior, her capacity for grace increased. In reference to the Blessed Mother, therefore, one speaks of the fullness of grace in a relative, not absolute, sense. No matter how extraordinary the graces granted her were, there would always remain an infinite distance between her greatest perfection and the ineffable HOLINESS OF GOD. No creature can possibly possess absolute perfection, and even though Our Lady fulfilled perfectly the will of God in every instance, her grace was perfect only in proportion to that degree to which God destined her.

Our Lady of Guadalupe is depicted on tiles in the garden of Mission San Gabriel in southern California, founded in 1771. (©Richard Cummins/CORBIS)

Therefore, even though properly described by the Archangel Gabriel before the Incarnation as full of grace, Our Lady was destined to advance in grace according to God's providential designs. This she did more abundantly and perfectly than any other pure creature, and, inasmuch as grace begets grace, in her this sanctifying quality was multiplied throughout her life in geometric proportions.

Neither from Sacred Scripture nor from the teaching of the Church can it be proved, however, that Our Lady's meriting an increase in grace began from the very instant of her conception, though many theologians advance reasons indicating that such was the case. Certainly she advanced in grace with the attainment of the use of reason, whenever, prematurely or normally in God's arrangements, that occurred, and she especially advanced in grace at the time of the INCARNATION. From that moment on an ineffable relationship existed between the incarnate Word and His Mother, and whereas Mary gave Christ His humanity, Our Lord gave His Mother a constantly increasing participation in His divinity.

Besides Mary's unique degree of habitual grace as a permanent mode of being, she surpassed all other creatures, too, in the reception of actual graces. God granted her all the graces of intellect and will necessary to perform each action in her life with the greatest possible perfection.

Virtues and Gifts. Beyond sanctifying grace and its increase, beyond her actual graces, Our Lady received also the infused theological and moral VIRTUES, and the gifts of the Holy Spirit. The infused virtues enabled her to perform supernaturally meritorious acts, and the gifts aided her in perfecting her acts in complete accord with the inspirations of the Holy Spirit. The cooperation of the human will with divine grace in seeking that which is good results in progress and growth in the virtues. If they are properly developed they constitute holiness, not so much because of the quality of the exterior act as because of the perfection of the inner dispositions. In the case of our blessed Mother, her inner dispositions were of such special excellence that her power to live a supernatural life surpassed that of all the saints even at the end of their lives. The least of Mary's interior acts were animated by the purest motives and dispositions of love and realized with a perfection of charity beyond that of the most heroic efforts of even the greatest of God's other servants. No one denies, therefore, that the Blessed Virgin Mary practiced virtue in a most exemplary manner. The Scriptures give testimony to as much. Note her stalwart faith (Lk 1.45), her profound humility (Lk 1.38-55), and her prompt obedience (Lk 2.5, 22). Because of her freedom from sin she did not exercise such virtues as continence and penance, but this is not to deny that she possessed the habit of these virtues.

Both from the limited but pointed details of Sacred Scripture and from theological reasoning Mary is seen first of all as the perfect exemplar of the theological virtues. Her faith, strong, certain, and prompt in its assent, was enlightened by the gifts of wisdom, understanding, and knowledge. Extraordinary at the time of the ANNUN-

CIATION, it increased at CANA and throughout the public life of Our Lord until it reached its perfection on Mount Calvary. The point should be made, moreover, that Mary possessed the virtue of faith in the highest degree experienced by any soul on earth, for Our Lord, possessing the beatific vision from the very moment of His conception, never needed faith or hope. He already possessed what these virtues lead to—vision and possession.

Beyond this deep faith, since Mary firmly believed in the promises of the infallible Almighty, she awaited the fulfillment of these promises concerning herself and the human race with a perfect trust and confidence, displaying the greatest hope of the eternal possession of God. Despite the trials and forebodings in the life of Christ and the seeming contradictions in what had been promised, her hope never faltered. In fact, it was later in life evidenced in its preeminent perfection by its relation to that of the Apostles, who, after the Ascension of Our Lord were sustained by Mary's hope in the early and difficult days of the announcing of the gospel message.

If Mary's faith was singularly ardent and her hope so firm and sure, these virtues were perfected only in keeping with her love of God, her extraordinary charity. Mary, being intimately united with the Blessed Trinity, corresponded most perfectly with God's love for her. No human disorder or imperfection ever impeded her growth in the love of the Almighty. Especially at the moment of her cooperation in the mystery of the Redemption and all that it implied, a perfect example of heroic charity was evidenced. At the time of the Incarnation, Mary not only offered an extraordinary sacrifice for men, she offered that which was dearer than her own life, the life of her Son. Her charity was, in fact, of such abundance that her sacrifice lasted not only for a few moments at the Incarnation and on Calvary but throughout the whole of Christ's life

It must be noted, too, that since the infused moral virtues exist in a soul in the state of grace with a perfection in proportion to its possession of charity, Mary possessed also the virtues of prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance in an extraordinary degree. The full hierarchy of virtues along with her special intellectual endowments, constitute Mary, then, the model of both the contemplative and the active life. Her devotion to the Word incarnate, her charity, and her observance of the Law make her the exemplar of the Christian life.

In Catholic theological writings, a discussion is also sometimes found concerning Mary's reception of the Sacraments. Since the Sacraments were instituted as a chief means of growth in grace for the Christian, the graces gained by Our Lady would be immense since she was prepared to receive the Sacraments with ideal dispositions. Of course, not all the Sacraments were necessary in the case of Our Lady; some she could not even validly receive. The Holy Eucharist, however, for the time after its institution must have been for Mary the source of great consolation and increase in grace. The enormous graces that can be procured by an ordinarily devout soul from a single reception of the Eucharist bring one to understand what the Sacrament must have brought by way of an increase in grace to the absolutely perfect communicant, the Blessed Mother.

There are also special graces granted to certain individuals in particular situations not for the sanctification of the individual himself but for the sanctification of others. These are called by theologians, gratiae gratis datae. It would not have been necessary that Mary possess all such graces herself, because her duties in providence did not require them. However, it is likely that most of them were granted her, for it was fitting that she as queen of the Apostles, possess in an eminent degree these various charisms.

Consummated Fullness. Mary's special gifts and the marvels that grace and Divine Providence produced in her soul led Our Lady to an ultimate perfection in the supernatural life that is called her final perfection, or consummated fullness of grace. At the end of Our Lady's life, consequent upon the fulfilling of her sacred offices and fruition of her special privileges, her cooperation and growth in grace led to a culmination anticipating her heavenly glory. Although the final plenitude of grace in Mary was of an ineffable degree, it must never be, as indicated earlier, conceived as infinite. The possibilities of the state of grace itself were not exhausted in Mary, nor were all the possible effects of grace realized in her life. Of necessity, grace in Mary remained a created, accidental entity and consequently a finite reality. Hence, the plenitude of grace in Our Lady was limited in comparison with that of Christ, although it was still, in comparison with that of any other creature, inexpressibly superior.

For ordinary Christians, there are two general factors in supernatural growth. The one is fidelity to duties of state involving the Commandments and the practice of the virtues, the other is the reception of the Sacraments. These are the common ways of sanctification. In the case of our blessed Lady, however, there existed a third factor, her divine maternity and the offices and privileges consequent upon it. Since she was called to this special relationship with God, there followed for her the bestowal of extraordinary graces for extraordinary sanctification. These graces, like any others, became more and more numerous as Mary corresponded with them in greater charity and fidelity. Her perfect correspondence with grace, especially at the moment of the Incarnation and again on Calvary, produced in Mary's soul an increase, and plenitude, of grace that exceeds human description.

Hence, in an attempt to describe the holiness of Mary, the words of St. John Chrysostom in the Roman Breviary have become classical. "A great miracle . . . indeed was the blessed ever-virgin Mary. What greater or brighter has ever been found or will ever be found? . . . What is holier than she? Neither Prophets nor Apostles . . . neither seraphim nor cherubim . . . nor any created being, visible or invisible . . ." (Lesson 5, Common of the Feasts of the Blessed Virgin Mary).

Bibliography: E. DUBLANCHY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 9.2:2413-30. I. A. ALDAMA, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. Fathers of the Society of Jesus (3d ed. Madrid 1958) 2:335-367, 128-130. J. B. CAROL, Fundamentals of Mariology (New York 1956). C. FRIETHOFF, A Complete Mariology, tr. Religious of the Retreat of the Sacred Heart (Westminster, MD 1958). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The Mother of the Saviour and Our Interior Life, tr. B. J. KELLY (St. Louis 1957). W. G. MOST, Mary in Our Life (3d ed. New York 1959). E. N. NEU-BERT, Mary in Doctrine (Milwaukee 1954). L. J. SUENENS, Mary the Mother of God, tr. A. BRENNEL (New York 1959). S. BONANO, "Mary's Immunity from Actual Sin," Carol Mariol 1:395-410. F. P. CALKINS, "Mary's Fulness of Grace," ibid. 2:297-312. W. J. MC-DONALD, "Holy Mary," American Ecclesiastical Review 140 (1959) 289–292. P. G. RHODES, "Our Lady's Endowments," in Our Blessed Lady, ed. C. LATTEY (London 1934). G. F. VAN ACKEREN, "Does the Divine Maternity Formally Sanctify Mary's Soul?" Marian Studies 6 (St. Louis 1955) 63-101.

[J. F. MURPHY/EDS.]

PT. 2: KNOWLEDGE OF MARY

The mystery of Mary, as any mystery of faith, is beyond the comprehension of the human mind in this life [see MYSTERY (IN THEOLOGY)]. This impenetrability becomes apparent when one tries to probe the nature and extent of Mary's knowledge. One finds that some conclusions concerning her knowledge are certain. With regard to others one can attain only probability, while a third group of assertions can be classified only as possible. They will be considered in that order.

Certain Conclusions. Since the time of her Assumption, Mary enjoys the beatific vision. She does not know all that can be known, for such knowledge would demand the infinite intelligence found only in God. The intensity and extent of Mary's vision, however, is second only to that possessed by the humanity of her Son. The degree of intensity of this vision is proportionate to the degree of sanctifying grace possessed at the end of earthly life. Since her grace surpassed that of any other blessed creature, her vision is superior to that of any other blessed. Further, she surpassed the other blessed in her knowledge of creatures, particularly in her knowledge of her fellow men. Those enjoying the beatific vision see in it the events in the lives of those who in some way pertain to them. Since all are related to Mary, the spiritual mother of men, Mary's knowledge of man is absolutely universal.

While on earth Mary exercised her natural powers of reason. Although there are limits to her naturally acquired knowledge, one is sure that she was never in ignorance. Here one must distinguish carefully between nescience (a lack of unnecessary knowledge) and ignorance (a deficiency in obligatory knowledge). Ignorance could never be in Mary because it results from original sin, from which she was preserved. She did not know such things as the structures of the atom, the nature of disease, or the full implications of philosophy and mathematics, since such knowledge was not necessary for her office of Mother and Mediatrix.

Probable Conclusions. Probability involves more than mere possibility. It is a mental commitment to one of two contrary propositions in which the mind is still aware of the possibility of error. About Mary's knowledge the following conclusions are probable.

On numerous occasions Mary received divine illumination through the infusion of concepts, charismatic gifts, and the operation of the cognitive gifts of the Holy Spirit. The reason is that these gifts were necessary for her exalted office.

At the time of the Annunciation she was illumined so that she had a knowledge of the divinty of her Son. Some have argued against this by pointing out, quite correctly, that Luke's account of the angel's visit to Mary contains no clear assertion of the divinity of Christ. Further they appeal to the text of Luke dealing with the finding of the boy Jesus in the Temple. "Did you not know that I must be about my Father's business?' And they did not understand the word that he spoke to them" (Lk 2.49–50). This text does not necessarily indicate a lack of knowledge about His divinity, but rather a failure to see the full implications of His providential mission. Further, although it is true that Luke's account of the Annunciation does not clearly state the divinity of Jesus, nevertheless it did contain an assertion of His office as Messiah and the fact of His miraculous conception. The Scriptures do not disprove that Mary learned of His divinity at the time of His conception. Furthermore, if as St. Thomas contends (Summa theologiae 3a, 30.1) and as Pope Plus XII confirms in the encyclical Mystici corporis (epilogue), Mary represented the whole of humanity, giving her consent to a spiritual marriage between the Son of God and human nature, then she needed some knowledge of the divinity of her Son. Such knowledge could have come from a divinely enlightened understanding of certain Old Testament texts. Much of the difficulty here arises from a failure to distinguish between clear and distinct knowledge as opposed to hazy and confused knowledge. The latter, although lacking precision, is certain in the mind of its possessor.

Possible Conclusions. Some conclusions about Mary's knowledge must be listed as merely possible. Of these some have good reasons militating against their actuality, while others have good reasons neither against nor for their actuality. When dealing with the latter, one must recall the limitations of the human when faced with mystery. Although one can recognize them only as possibilities, it may well be that de facto Mary did possess such knowledge.

It is possible that Mary could have had the beatific vision in this life as a permanent possession. Endowed with an intellect, capable of being raised to this vision, Mary could have received this privilege. Yet tradition has always asserted that she was a wayfarer, who during her earthly life merited increases of grace, which would not be possible if she permanently possessed the beatific vision.

It is possible that on certain occasions Our Lady was granted temporarily the BEATIFIC VISION. Formerly many theologians thought this to be probable, arguing that since this gift was granted to Moses and St. Paul (Ex 33.19; 2 Cor 12.2–4), then by reason of Mary's preeminence she must have received the same gift. However, modern Scripture scholarship has established that these passages do not imply anything more than mystical experience such as that granted to St. Teresa of Avila. Although one cannot offer good reasons for asserting the probability, there are no strong reasons for denying it.

It is possible that Mary had as a permanent possession infused concepts. However, there are convincing reasons neither for asserting nor for denying the conclusion.

At the time of the VISITATION, Mary spoke of her lowliness and her exalted blessedness. Theologians must keep both in mind when dealing with her privileges. They must never fear to assert what her preeminent office demands, and yet they must temper their enthusiasm by the realization of the limitations of the human mind when faced with the supernatural.

Bibliography: E. DUBLANCHY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 9.2:2409–13. F. J. CONNELL, "Our Lady's Knowledge," J. B. CAROL, ed., Mariology 2:313–324. With regard to Mary's knowledge at the time of the Annunciation, see bibliog. in Connell, 320.

[P. J. MAHONEY/EDS.]

PART 3: MARY AND THE CHURCH

In the modern development of Mariology, considerable interest focuses on the relationship between Mary and the Church. Such relationship was perceived even in the early centuries of the Christian era. The Fathers pointed out that, as the Virgin Mary is the mother of Christ, so also the Church is virginal mother of men. Their reflections were deeply influenced by their perception of the likeness that both Our Lady and the Church have with Eve, mother of all the living. However, the parallelism between Mary and the Church was not a major theme in the patristic period. The same may be said of the Middle Ages. Some medieval authors presented the Blessed Virgin as the image and type of the Church, its most eminent member, and its loving mother; some had nothing to say on the subject. After Albert the Great, the idea was neglected. The present age has returned to the inquiry because of a conviction that the analogy between Mary and the Church, far from being a secondary theme situated on the surface of Catholic teaching, is necessary for understanding the dogma of the Redemption.

The meaning of the terms used in the comparison is clear. Mary is the Blessed Virgin, mother of Jesus Christ. The Church is the Catholic Church, the community of the baptized that was founded by Jesus, the society that is known as the Mystical Body of Christ. To carry out the comparison, one must set the Blessed Virgin apart from the rest of the Church. That is, the Church is regarded, not as a totality composed of Mary and all other Christians but only as that part of the Church which is made up of the latter. More exactly, the comparison is between two parts of the same whole, Mary on one side, and all the rest of the members on the other.

Maternity of Mary and the Church. In the supernatural order, the Mother of Christ is also the mother of the Church and therefore of all the members of the Mystical Body. Mary's basic relationship to the Church is maternal. This truth is taught by St. Pius X (see above). By the very fact that the Blessed Virgin is the mother of Christ the head, she is the mother of the whole Body.

The Church, too, is the mother of men, for from her they receive supernatural life and education. The Church is the mother of men mainly by the administration of the Sacraments. Mary is the mother of men because grace, which is conferred by the Sacraments, is deposited in the treasury of the Church through her cooperation in Christ's redemptive sacrifice. When one compares Mary's spiritual motherhood with that of the Church, he perceives that the former is the nobler and is the source of the latter. But these two mothers do not have separate families or give birth to different children. They have the same sons and daughters whom they cherish with a common love. Mary brings forth the whole Body of Christ, the Church, which is also the mother of Christ's members.

The New Eve. The theme of the new Eve is developed by the Fathers in their reflections on the notion of recapitulation, which is prominent in St. Irenaeus. God's plan had been clear from the outset; a man and a woman, Adam and Eve, were to transmit the supernatural life of grace to all mankind. Restoration of the plan that was compromised by sin was to be made by another man and another woman. The man is Jesus Christ, the new Adam. A woman had to have a place in the restoration; from an early period, the Fathers of the Church recognized this woman. The new Eve is Mary and the Church.

Evil and death have been introduced into the world by the disobedience of the first Eve. The second Eve is the Church, formed from the side of the second Adam sleeping in death on the cross, as the first Eve had been formed from the side of the sleeping Adam. But the new Eve as a definite person who repaired by her obedience what the first Eve had devastated by her disobedience is Mary. Thus both Mary and the Church are celebrated in tradition as the new Eve, mother of all who live the new life brought by Christ. As Eve contributed to the ruin of men, Mary and the Church contribute to their Redemption.

Later ages made a further application. If Mary is mother of all the living, she is associated with her Son in His redemptive work. The consent that she freely gave at the Annunciation to be the mother of Christ was enlivened anew at the Crucifixion. By cooperating in the redeeming sacrifice, she is the new Eve in the most perfect sense, source of men's life, mother of the Body as she is mother of the head.

Virginity of Mary and the Church. From ancient times, Mary, mother and virgin, has been likened to the Church, which is also mother and virgin. This comparison involves great differences. Mary is the mother of Christ; the Church is the mother of Christians who are "other Christs." Mary is literally a virgin; the Church is virginal because it has never adulterated the faith but has always been true to Christ. Maternity and virginity are literal for Mary, but analogous and metaphorical for the Church.

In Judeo-Christian writings, a virgin is a person or a community that is dedicated to God and remains faithful to Him. In the Old Testament union with God consecrates virginity and at the same time makes it maternally fruitful, as long as Israel does not abandon its divine bridegroom for false gods. Virginity is fidelity; heresy and apostasy are adultery. Union with God hallows virginity by enriching it with fecundity; its fruit is imperishable life.

As applied to the Church, virginity is linked with the purity of faith. The very maternity of the Church is vir-ginal because, loyal in faith and undefiled by heresy, it brings forth God's children by the activity of the Holy Spirit.

When the Biblical notion of virginity refers to persons, it implies bodily integrity, especially as a sign of spiritual fidelity and complete consecration to God. Mary, virgin of virgins, is the ideal of all virginity. She conceived and bore her Son with unimpaired virginity by the action of the Holy Spirit. Her spiritual maternity, too, is wholly virginal; like Christ, the members of His Body, which is the Church, are born of Mary as children of God solely by the Holy Spirit's power.

The virginity of the Church aids one to understand the virginity of Our Lady. The Church is not only one flesh, but one spirit, with Christ (1 Cor 6.17). Though real, the union is spiritual and mystical. Similarly, Mary's virginity is not only the absence of carnal association with any man, but is her spiritual and mystical union with God. By the perfection of its virginity, therefore, the Church draws very close to the virginal Mother of God.

Holiness of Mary and the Church. As the virginity of the Church helps one to understand Mary's virginity, so Mary's holiness assists one to grasp the HOLINESS OF THE CHURCH. The sanctity of both is caused by the same grace of God. The main difference lies in the receptivity of Mary and the Church. No refusal or reluctance ever marred Mary's acceptance of God's advances; but the Church is a collectivity of men and women who never hold their souls completely open to God's generosity.

All men are called to holiness in the Church. The Church is holy because it has received from God the means of holiness, faith and the Sacraments, which produce holiness in the members. However, although the Church is entirely holy, its members are subject to defects and sins that hamper the diffusion of its holiness.

Comparison between Mary's holiness and the holiness of the Church brings out Mary's superiority. She was redeemed by way of preservation, and her Immaculate Conception involved her freedom from concupiscence. But the Church is formed of members who all, with the exception of Mary, contract original sin. Consequently, although they are purified from all guilt by Baptism, they are burdened with the weight of concupiscence, which slows down the growth of grace.

The Blessed Virgin's progress in sanctity was constant and rapid. Her whole life and all her actions were unfailingly directed toward God. She mounted from holiness to holiness, always full of grace because each grace increased her capacity for further grace that promptly filled her soul to repletion. The Church also grows in grace, aspiring to the full stature of Christ (Eph 4.13). But the Church is an assembly of sinners, who must unceasingly repent and be converted anew; its progress is menaced by the members' sluggish response to grace.

Sanctity flowers into glory and resurrection, the final triumph. On earth, the Church plods along in the order of terrestrial holiness, with all its setbacks; in heaven, it has not yet attained resurrection, the ultimate radiation of holiness. But Mary is now in glory; prior to the Church, she was taken up to heaven, body and soul. Yet her Assumption, coming at the climax of her last fullness of grace, prefigures and anticipates the assumption of the Church. Thus the Blessed Virgin, who excels the Church by her Immaculate Conception and by her progress in sanctity, also precedes it by her resurrection.

Coredemptive Mission of Mary and the Church. Mary's maternal relation to Christ's Person has occupied the attention of theologians for centuries; recently their efforts concentrate on her relation to her Son's work. They seek a clearer insight into the part assigned by God to the Blessed Virgin and to the Church in the economy of salvation.

As representative and personification of the Church, Mary collaborated with Christ in the three great steps of the mystery of Redemption: the Incarnation, the cross, and the Resurrection. Both Mary and the Church have a redemptive mission; but Mary's was exercised on an essentially higher level than that of the Church.

God's Son became man that the Redemption might be a human as well as a divine achievement. But from the beginning He required the consent of the human race and the donation of its flesh and blood. Mary, acting in the name of all mankind, gave that consent and donation.

During the first phase of her salvific activity, Mary preceded the Church. In response to God's proposal she replied: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord." St. Thomas Aquinas says that her consent was given in the name of the whole human race (Summa theologiae 3a, 30.1), and this insight has been consecrated by the teaching authority of the Church: "In the name of the entire human race, she gave her consent for a spiritual marriage between the Son of God and human nature" (Pius XII, Mystici corporis 108).

The activity exercised by the Blessed Virgin at the time of the conception and birth of Christ was carried on all during her life and reached its culmination on Calvary. In His supreme hour of sacrifice, the Redeemer drew His mother into His suffering to associate her with His redeeming act. He received her dedication, love, and merits, and integrated her agony into His own Passion in order to offer them to the Father for the salvation of mankind.

Mary's suffering endowed her maternity over men with a new dimension. Her first childbearing, by which she became the mother of God, was without pain; her second childbearing, by which she became fully the mother of sinners, was painful in the extreme. While Jesus was offering Himself in sacrifice for men's Redemption, His mother offered her Son for the same purpose and, thus cooperating in men's birth to supernatural life, became in a heightened sense the mother of the Church.

The Mother's contribution to the work of Redemption far surpasses that of the Church. Not only did she precede the Church during Christ's mortal life, but she was integrated into the very Passion that procured men's reconciliation with God. She who was one with her Son at the Incarnation was one with Him at the moment of Redemption. The activity of the Church is exercised on the lower plane of application of the merits and atonement of Calvary.

A second phase of Mary's salvific mission extended from Pentecost to the Assumption. During this period she lived in the Church as its first and most important member, and by her intercession and merits collaborated in applying the Redemption. She had preceded the Church but was now in the Church, without official voice in its councils. Her hand did not hold the keys of the kingdom, but her prayers sustained the Apostle's hands that held them. She conferred no Sacraments, but their power derives from the sacrifice of the cross, in which she had her part.

During the final phase of her mediatory activity, from her Assumption to the end of the world, Mary again goes before the Church, assists it with supernatural aid, and awaits its triumph. The mystery of Christ's Resurrection and Ascension is the culmination of the mystery of Redemption. The Church is implicated in the mystery, and has inaugurated its own resurrection in its head. Mary has already risen; the resurrection of the collective Church at the end of time is personified in her, whose Assumption is the prelude of the future bodily victory of the rest of men.

Mary's coredemptive activity, obviously, has no gap to cover up in her Son's redemptive work. All she has, she received from Christ. What she received was power to act with the Redeemer for mankind's salvation. She stands next to the Redeemer, as coredemptress subordinate to Him, and she can act only in dependence on Him. But dependence does not exclude productivity. Mary's redemptive office is wholly derived from Christ, for it is the cooperation of a subordinate associate, which supposes His activity; yet she truly acts with Him.

Vatican II and Beyond. Vatican Council II's Marian doctrine in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church

(Lumen gentium ch. 8) was most significant for the renewal of Mariology. The Council Fathers voted, Oct. 29, 1963, in favor of making the Marian schema a part of the document on the Church. The very title of the chapter, "The Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, in the Mystery of Christ and the Church," placed her in close relationship with her Son (Christocentric Mariology) and with his Mystical Body (ecclesiotypical Mariology). This is the proper setting in which to assess Mary's role in the work of Redemption. The true ecumenical importance of the Council's decision is derived not from minimizing her place in Catholic faith and piety, but from emphasizing a sharing-oriented Mariology instead of one that is privilege-centered.

Under the impetus of Vatican II the theology of Mary stresses the truth that her special graces and prerogatives are to be seen as primarily for the sake of her Son and his redeemed-redeeming Body, the Church. Divine Revelation about Mary makes the central mysteries of faith more intelligible and meaningful for Christian living.

The Christocentric and ecclesiotypical emphases of contemporary Mariology are mutually complementary and not in conflict. For Mary cannot be related to Christ without being intimately associated with the ecclesial Body that he received through his redemptive activity. At the same time, she is the archetype of the Church only because her unique relationship with Christ is the basis for the Church's share in his redeeming work (see O. Semmelroth, Mary, Archetype of the Church 1963, esp. 80–88). Consequently, concentration upon the ecclesiotypical significance of Marian doctrine and devotion should not obscure their basic Christocentric character.

Theologians today are more inclined to include the Mary-Church analogy within the basic Marian idea or fundamental principle of Mariology. "Her concrete motherhood with regard to Christ, the redeeming Godman, freely accepted in faith—her fully committed divine motherhood-this is both the key to the full understanding of the Marian mystery and the basic Mariological principle, which is concretely identical with Mary's objectively and subjectively unique state of being redeemed" (E. Schillebeeckx, Mary, Mother of the Redemption 106). Within one organic principle the two emphases are contained, i.e., both the Christocentric (Mary's "fully committed divine motherhood"), and the ecclesiotypical (her "objectively and subjectively unique state of being redeemed"). Her vocation to be the mother of the Word incarnate must be considered in close connection with the graces that reveal her calling to be the prototype of the Church.

Divine Maternity. The truth that Mary's mother-hood of Christ is both bridal and virginal has rich ecclesiotypical significance (see O. Semmelroth, Mary, Archetype of the Church 1963, esp. 117-142). Her vocal fiat of free consent at the annunciation and her silent fiat at the foot of the cross make Mary the spiritual bride of the Redeemer. In her compassion she received the fruits of her Son's sacrifice both for her own redemption and for that of the whole Church. Concomitantly, and as a result of this creative receptivity to grace, her bridal motherhood is also virginal. Her maternal fruitfulness cannot come from human power but from the breath of the Holy Spirit. Had she conceived Christ other than as a virgin, her bridal relationship with the Logos incarnate would have been obscured. Without her perpetual virginity, the revelation of her complete and continuous fidelity to Christ and his messianic mission would have been blurred. Mary then is the archetype of the Church as the Church is also the virginal bride of Christ. As the community of persons redeemed by him, the Church is called to be constantly faithful to his word. The Immaculate Conception is the perfect exemplar of a grace-filled Church. As the sacramental community called to mediate Redemption to the world, the Church also images the bridal motherhood of Mary. The Assumption makes her "the sign of sure hope, and comfort for the pilgrim people of God'' (Lumen gentium 68-69). All the Marian dogmas, therefore, converge toward a theological and prayerful contemplation of Mary as the archetype of the Church.

As bridal and virginal mothers, both Mary and the Church are to be dynamically united together with the Holy Spirit. The sole source of their spiritual fecundity is the abiding presence and activity of the risen Lord's Spirit. A closer connection between Mariology and Pneumatology will contribute greatly to a balanced Christology, ecclesiology, and Christian anthropology. Much remains to be done in this regard, especially by theologians of the Western Church who have begun to study more seriously the magnificent heritage of the Eastern tradition on the Holy Spirit.

New Eve. A portion of the patristic patrimony common to East and West is the image of Mary as the New Eve. Its rediscovery, under the special inspiration of Cardinal Newman's Marian writings, has led to a renewed research into the witness of the Fathers who made use of this image in their teaching about Mary. After the Scriptures, it reflects the most ancient meditation upon Mary and is a very fertile source of the Mary-Church analogy and typology. The National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) in the pastoral on the Blessed Virgin Mary points out: "Even more anciently, the Church was regarded as the 'New Eve.' The Church is the bride of Christ, formed from his side in the sleep of death on the cross, as the first Eve was formed by God from the side of the sleeping Adam" (NCCB 41). From her earliest days the Church has seen herself symbolized in Mary and has come to understand her mysterious self more profoundly in light of Mary as archetype. Mary "personifies" all that the Church is and hopes to become.

The impact of an ecclesiotypical Mariology upon Marian devotion has been most salutary. Pope Paul VI in his apostolic exhortation for the right ordinary and development of devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary, stated: "She is worthy of imitation because she was the first and most perfect of Christ's disciples. All of this has a permanent and universal exemplary value" (Paul VI 35). Mary, of course, is not an exemplar in the sense of being a stereotyped blueprint upon which contemporary Christians are to model their lives. Nevertheless, if Christians are to mature as members of Christ's living Body, the Church, they must prayerfully penetrate the perennial meaning of Mary-like faith, courage, concern, constancy, etc.

Bibliography: F. L. B. CUNNINGHAM, "The Relationship between Mary and the Church in Medieval Thought," Marian Studies 9 (1958) 52-78. B. J. LE FROIS, "The Mary-Church Relationship in the Apocalypse," ibid. 79-106. J. F. SWEENEY, "Theological Considerations on the Mary-Church Analogy," ibid. 31-51. C. O. VOL-LERT, "The Mary-Church Analogy in Its Relationship to the Fundamental Principle of Mariology," ibid. 107-128; "Mary and the Church," J. B. CAROL, ed., Mariology 2:550-595; A Theology of Mary (New York 1965), esp. 113-155. Q. QUESNELL, "Mary is the Church," Thought 36 (1961) 25-39. G. F. KIRWIN, "Mary's Salvific Role Compared with That of the Church," Marian Studies 25 (1974) 29-43. T. A. KOEHLER, "Mary's Spiritual Maternity after the Second Vatican Council," Marian Studies 23 (1972) 39-68. J. A. R. MACKENZIE, "The Patristic Witness to the Virgin Mary as the New Eve," Marian Studies 29 (1978) 67-78. G. A. MALONEY, Mary: The Womb of God (Danville, NJ 1976). J. H. NEWMAN, The New Eve (Westminister, MD 1952). PAUL VI, Marialis cultus, apostolic exhortation, Feb. 2, 1974, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 66 (1974) 113-168; tr. Devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary (USCC Publ. Office, Washington, DC 1974). E. SCHILLEBEECKX, Mary, Mother of the Redemption, tr. N. D. SMITH (New York 1964). A. SCHMEMANN, "Our Lady and the Holy Spirit," Marian Studies 23 (1972) 69-78. O. SEMMELROTH, Mary, Archetype of the Church, tr. M. VON EROES and J. DEVLIN (New York 1963); "Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Chapter 8," Vorgrimler, 1:285-296 (New York 1967).

[C. O. VOLLERT/F. M. JELLY/EDS.]

PART 4: MEDIATRIX OF ALL GRACES

By Mary's mediation Catholics designate, in general, that functional prerogative that embodies Our Lady's unique share in the soteriological mission of her Son. The belief of the faithful in this Marian role has found expression in Christian literature in a variety of ways from time immemorial. The genesis of the title Mediatrix itself, as applied to the Mother of God, is rather obscure. Perhaps the earliest sure witnesses are St. Andrew of Crete (d. 740), St. Germanus of Constantinople (d. 733), and St. Tarasius (d. c. 807). From the East the title was introduced into the literature of the West around the 9th century through a translation by Paul the Deacon of the Life of Theophilus, in which the term is used. From the 12th century on, it is applied to Our Lady with ever-increasing frequency until it becomes generally accepted in the 17th century.

Generally speaking, a mediator is one who interposes his good services between two physical or moral persons in order to facilitate an exchange of favors (e.g., an alliance). In most cases, the mission of a mediator is to bring about a reconciliation between parties at variance. In Catholic theology the title Mediatrix is applied to Our Lady for three reasons. First, because, owing to her divine motherhood and plenitude of grace, she occupies a middle position in the hierarchy of beings between the Creator and His creatures. This is known technically as her ontological mediation. Second, because during her earthly career she contributed considerably, through specific holy acts, to the reconciliation between God and man brought about by the Savior. Third, because through her powerful intercession in heaven she obtains for her spiritual children all the graces that God deigns to bestow on them. The last two phases constitute Mary's moral mediation. It should be borne in mind, however, that the mere use of the term Mediatrix need not always convey the above threefold meaning. In the more ancient writers that expression is restricted sometimes to the first, sometimes to the third phase of Mary's mediatorial office. The exact meaning in each case must be determined by the context and parallel passages.

Theologians are always careful to emphasize that Mary's mediation differs substantially from that of her Son. The latter is primary, self-sufficient, and absolutely necessary for men's salvation; the former is secondary, wholly dependent on Christ's, and only hypothetically necessary. However, Mary's mediation differs also, and indeed essentially, from that of other creatures (e.g., the angels, the saints, the priests of the New Testament). The latter avails only in particular cases and for particular graces; it is exercised dependently on Mary's will, and exclusively in the sphere of the actual application of graces. The former is universal, dependent on Christ only, and has a definite bearing on the acquisition (meriting) of graces, as well as on their application.

The actual exercise of Our Lady's mediatorial function may now be considered. The two phases of her moral mediation are treated in two separate sections.

Our Lady's Coredemption. As indicated, the first aspect of Mary's moral mediation refers to her active and formal share in the redemptive work brought about by Our Lord while still on earth. To express this complex activity in one single word, Catholic theology has coined the Latin term Coredemptrix. This title first appears in Catholic literature toward the end of the 14th century (e.g., in an orationale of St. Peter's in Salzburg). It was used quite frequently during the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries. Since the Holy See itself has made use of it in its documents [Acta Sanctae Sedis 41 (1908) 409; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 5 (1913) 364; 6 (1914) 108], its legitimacy is no longer questioned by Catholics.

Meanings Attached to the Term. Apart from the question of the term's appropriateness, theologians are divided as to the nature and extent of the doctrine conveyed by that title. Their views may be summarized as follows.

A first group claims that Our Lady, by knowingly and willingly making possible the coming of the Savior into the world, cooperated only remotely in the objective Redemption. (By objective Redemption is meant the initial reconciliation of God and man as accomplished through the sacrifice of Calvary.) She has, besides, a direct share in the subjective Redemption, i.e., the dispensation of graces through which the objective Redemption is actually applied to individuals. The theologians of this group concede that Our Lady suffered and merited much for men's salvation during her life, but they contend that these sufferings and merits contributed not to bring about the Redemption itself but only to make it applicable to men. Such is the opinion of H. Lennerz, W. Goossens, G. D. Smith, and several others.

A second view, called the receptivity theory, has been advanced by a group of German theologians among whom H. M. Köster and O. Semmelroth are the most prominent. According to them, Christ alone redeemed the human race. Mary, however, may be said to have cooperated in the objective Redemption in the sense that at the foot of the cross she accepted the effects or the fruits of her Son's redemptive act and made them available to the members of the Mystical Body, whom she officially represented on Calvary. This theory has appealed to some outside of Germany (e.g., C. Dillenschneider) as a plausible explanation of the relationship between Mary and the Church.

A third group, representing the vast majority of theologians, considers the above explanations insufficient and unsatisfactory. According to them, Our Lady is to be styled Coredemptrix because she cooperated directly and immediately in the redemptive process itself (i.e., the objective Redemption) and not merely in the application of its effects to individual souls. In this third view Christ and Mary constitute one single principle of salvation for the whole human race in such a way that the restoration of mankind to the friendship of God as consummated on Calvary was the result of their joint causality. This joint causality does not place Our Lady on the same level with the Savior. In the orbit of primary, independent, and self-sufficient causality Christ remains utterly alone: men's only Redeemer. Mary's merits and satisfactions contributed to bring about objective Redemption only after the manner of a secondary cause, and as deriving their redemptive value wholly from the infinite merits and satisfactions of her Son.

In justification of the opinion just summarized, a few further clarifications are in order. The first truth to bear in mind is that, since Our Lady herself was redeemed by Christ, she could cooperate in the objective Redemption only after its effects had been applied to her. How could she cooperate to bring about something that had already produced its effects and that, therefore, must have been regarded by God as having been already accomplished? This becomes possible by distinguishing two logical stages (signa rationis, as the schoolmen say) in Christ's Redemption. First, He redeems Mary alone with a preservative Redemption; then, together with her, in a subsequent logical stage (in signo posteriori rationis), He redeems the rest of mankind with a liberative Redemption. Obviously, there is no chronological before and after in this process; merely a twofold acceptance of the Redemption on the part of the eternal Father, with a logical priority in favor of Mary.

Again, Our Lady's merits and satisfactions cannot be regarded as having enhanced the value of the infinite merits and satisfactions of her Son. Nevertheless, they were accepted by God as constituting a new title for the granting of pardon to the human race. Nothing prevents God from decreeing to cancel men's debt in view of a twofold title, each of them operative in its own sphere. On the contrary, this divine disposition seems most fitting in the light of the Church's teaching, which considers Our Lady as the Savior's intimate partner and as man's official representative in God's redemptive alliance with mankind.

Does it follow from the above that Our Lady's cooperation was an essential element of the Redemption? Here a distinction is in order. Mary's share may be said to have been essential in the sense that, without it, the Redemption would not have been what God decreed it to be. But it was not essential if by that is meant that Christ's merits and satisfactions were, by themselves, insufficient to redeem men. Something analogous happens when the Christian cooperates with divine grace in order to perform some meritorious action. That cooperation is essential only insofar as it meets a divine requisite.

Of course, in order to establish that Mary's coredemption, as championed by the majority of theologians, is a true Catholic doctrine resulting from divine revelation, it is not sufficient to show that it is theologically possible and even fitting. Two further questions remain to be answered. Is it also attested to in the sources of revelation, i.e., Sacred Scripture and divine tradition? Is it accepted by the magisterium, or teaching authority of the Church, as pertaining to the deposit of revelation?

Papal Teaching. Recent popes, beginning with Leo XIII in his rosary encyclical Jucunda semper (1894), have expressed their views on this question with everincreasing forcefulness. The classical passage in this connection is from Benedict XV's apostolic letter Inter sodalicia (1918), wherein he states: "To such an extent did [Mary] suffer and almost die with her suffering and dying Son, and to such an extent did she surrender her maternal rights over her Son for man's salvation, and immolated Him—insofar as she could—in order to appease the justice of God, that we may rightly say that she redeemed the human race together with Christ" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 10 (1918) 182]. In a radio broadcast by Pius XI (April 28, 1935) one finds the following words addressed to Our Lady: "O Mother of love and mercy, who, when thy dearest Son was consummating the Redemption of the human race on the altar of the Cross, didst stand by Him, suffering with Him as a Coredemptrix . . . , preserve in us, we beseech thee, and increase day by day the precious fruit of His Redemption and of thy compassion" (L'Osservatore Romano, April 29-30, 1935). In his encyclical Haurietis aquas (May 15, 1956) Pius XII affirms unequivocally that "in bringing about the work of human Redemption, the Most Blessed Virgin Mary was, by the will of God, so indissolubly associated with Christ, that our salvation proceeded from the love and sufferings of Jesus Christ intimately joined with the love and sorrows of His Mother" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 48 (1956) 352]. The doctrine was briefly summarized by Vatican II as follows: "In the work of the Savior, she [Mary] cooperated in an altogether singular way, by her obedience, faith, hope, and burning love, to restore supernatural life to souls' (Constitution on the Church 8.61).

Sacred Scripture. Interpreted in the light of papal pronouncement, Sacred Scripture itself lends weight to the doctrine under discussion. The words addressed by almighty God to the devil in the Garden of Eden, "I will put enmity between you and the woman, between your seed and her seed" (Gn 3.15), are generally cited by Catholic theologians as a pertinent biblical argument. They see in the singular struggle between Christ and Satan, as related in the text, a prophetic announcement of the Savior's redemptive work. Since "the woman" spoken of is the mother of Christ in a true biblical sense, as Pius IX and Pius XII interpret it, and since her struggle with Satan is identical with her Son's, as Pius IX states, it follows that the prophecy foreshadows also Our Lady's coredemptive mission.

Another relevant passage is the Annunciation pericope. By her generous fiat to the angel's proposal (Lk 1.38), Our Lady willingly and knowingly made possible the redemptive Incarnation of the divine Word, and thus may be said to have formally participated in the soteriological mystery that was then being inaugurated. An insight into the concrete manner in which she was to share in that mystery is furnished by Simeon's prophecy: "And thy own soul a sword shall pierce" (Lk 2.35). This allusion to Mary's compassion found its dramatic fulfillment as she stood by the cross of her dying Son, sharing His bitter agony for the salvation of mankind. It was at this juncture that the Savior, pointing to St. John, addressed Our Lady saying: "Woman, behold thy son" (Jn 19.27). Recent popes, particularly Leo XIII in his encyclical Adiutricem populi (1895), have seen in the beloved disciple a representative of all the redeemed, and they have for this reason interpreted Christ's words to Our Lady as a proclamation of her spiritual motherhood of men. Since the regeneration of mankind to the life of grace was brought about by Christ precisely by means of His redemptive act, theologians reason that Mary's direct share in the former is inconceivable without her direct cooperation in the latter.

Tradition. If biblical passages in support of the coredemption are relatively meager, the data yielded by Catholic tradition, as a whole, are copious indeed. As in the case of so many other doctrinal theses, this one also had rather modest beginnings, but gradually attained its full development through an ever-increasing awareness of its implications. Chronologically, the first germ of the doctrine may be traced to the striking antithetical parallelism between Mary and Eve, so frequently described by ancient writers, specifically St. Irenaeus of Lyons (d. c. 202). Contrasting the episode of the Fall with the scene of the Annunciation, they pointed out that, just as the first woman, through her disobedience, had shared Adam's responsibility in the original prevarication, so likewise Mary, through her voluntary surrender to God's designs, was instrumental in bringing about men's supernatural rehabilitation in Christ. It is scarcely likely, however, that these early writers intended to attribute to Mary an immediate cooperation in the objective Redemption. They seem to have had in mind exclusively her conscious role in bringing the Savior into the world. At the end of the 10th century in the East, and the first half of the 12th in the West, the strictly soteriological character of Mary's cooperation begins to receive explicit notice, due particularly to the intervention of John the Geometer and Arnold of Chartres (d. 1156), respectively. The latter's remarkable teaching on this point actually became a locus classicus in the Marian literature of subsequent centuries. By the beginning of the 18th century virtually every aspect of Mary's coredemption (merit, satisfaction, ransom, sacrifice) had been studied at some length, and the doctrine accepted quite generally in its present formulation. The Jesuits Ferdinand Q. de Salazar and Maximilian Reichenberger, the Franciscans Roderick de Portillo and Charles del Moral, the Augustinian Bartholomew de los Rios, and the Dominican Lazarus Dassier are only a few of those deserving of mention for their notable contribution in this connection. From that time on, particularly in the decades of mid-20th century, the theory of Mary's coredemption in the strict sense has won so many adherents that it is rightly regarded as the opinion of the vast majority of theologians. After centuries of careful analysis and theological reflection, the complex doctrine, which had such modest beginnings in Christian antiquity, seems at last to have entered its final phase of scientific systematization. Indeed, in the judgment of some, the doctrine has attained sufficient maturity even to be solemnly sanctioned by the ecclesiastical magisterium. The first to voice these sentiments in an official petition to Pope Pius XII (Nov. 26, 1951) was the Cuban hierarchy, headed by Cardinal Manuel Arteaga y Betancourt, archbishop of Havana.

Controverted Points. While awaiting the official pronouncement of the Church, the theologians who champion the theory of a strict coredemption are divided among themselves concerning some secondary aspects of this doctrine. Thus, for example, a growing number of Mariologists hold (correctly, it seems) that Our Lady's soteriological merit was not merely based on fittingness (i.e., de congruo), as the majority still believe, but rather based on simple justice (de condigno ex mera condignitate). This latter is not to be confused with Christ's merit, which alone was condign in strict justice (de condigno ex rigore justitiae). The former involves a certain equality between the meritorious work performed and its reward, while the latter supposes, besides, an equality between the person giving the reward and the person meriting it.

Another phase of the coredemption that has given rise to prolonged discussion is the nature of Mary's share in the sacrifice of the cross qua sacrifice. Was her offering of the Victim on Calvary a sacrificial action in the proper sense? Some authors, such as H. Seiler, G. Petazzi, E. Sauras, and M. Llamera, claim that it was. Others, following N. García Garcés, G. M. Roschini, and C. Friethoff, believe that it was a sacrificial action only in a broad sense. The Holy See, by repeatedly cautioning against the use of the controversial title Virgin-Priest given by some to Our Lady, would seem to favor the latter view.

A third point of discrepancy concerns the exact relationship between the soteriological actions of Our Lady and those performed by the Savior Himself. Precisely in what sense did Mary cooperate immediately with her Son to bring about the Redemption? Some theologians, such as B. Merkelbach, H. Seiler, and P. Sträter, explain it in the sense that Our Lady's will directly determined (i.e., had some influence on) the will of her Son to perform His redemptive actions. Others, such as D. Bertetto, R. Gagnebet, and M. J. Nicolas, contend that Our Lady's cooperation was redemptive, not because it directly influenced or determined the soteriological actions of Christ, but rather because the actions of Christ conferred a redemptive value on her merits and satisfactions thus enabling them to concur (in a subordinate though direct manner) in bringing about the self-same effect, namely, men's reconciliation with God in its initial phase (in actu primo). This second position seems better to safeguard the unencroachable rights of the unique Redeemer, without in the least compromising the reality of Mary's immediate cooperation in His redemptive work.

Dispensation of Graces through Mary. The second phase of Our Lady's moral mediation concerns her share in the actual distribution of graces, that is to say, in the enduring process of applying to individual persons the supernatural merits acquired by Christ (and secondarily by herself) through the redemptive work. This is what theologians designate technically as Mary's cooperation in the subjective Redemption.

Meaning. Briefly stated, the meaning of this Marian prerogative is that all favors granted by God to all men are granted in view of and because of Our Lady's actual intervention. This causality of hers, which is totally subordinate to that of Christ in the same process, is universal as far as its beneficiaries are concerned, and likewise from the point of view of its object. That means that Mary's mediatorial intervention affects every member of the human race with the sole exception of Christ and herself. To those living before the objective Redemption was accomplished, including Adam and Eve, God made graces available in view of Mary's future merits, which were eternally present to Him. To those living after the objective Redemption was accomplished, graces are granted through Mary's secondary efficient causality. Her mediation is likewise universal in that it involves the granting of every single grace without exception: sanctifying grace, the infused virtues, the gifts of the Holy Spirit, all actual graces, and even favors of the natural order insofar as they are related to the supernatural order. Our Lady does not, of course, produce the sanctifying grace given to men through the Sacraments. She does, however, intervene in its infusion in a twofold manner: (1) remotely, inasmuch as that grace was merited by her (together with Christ) as coredemptrix; (2) proximately, inasmuch as the very desire to receive the Sacraments, and the proper dispositions to do so worthily are made possible only through actual graces obtained through Mary's intercession.

Concerning the precise nature of this causality there is a difference of opinion among theologians. Some, such as Cardinal Lépicier, E. Hugon, G. M. Roschini, and R. Garrigou-Lagrange, designate it as physicalinstrumental. The majority, however, believe that it is a moral causality by way of intercession. The arguments in favor of a physical-instrumental causality are based mostly on the traditional references to Mary as the channel, aqueduct, almoner, and treasurer of grace. But the proponents of moral causality point out that since these are obviously metaphors, they can hardly constitute sufficient grounds for the theory in question. The manner, then, in which Our Lady discharges her office as dispensatrix of all graces is specifically her intercession. She intercedes for men either expressly, by actually asking God to bestow a certain grace on a certain person, or interpretatively, by presenting to God her previous merits in men's behalf. While it is highly commendable that one implore Our Lady's intercession in his prayers, it is not necessary that he do so. The graces he obtains from God are granted through her intercession whether she is invoked or not. As spiritual mother of men, Our Lady in Heaven is well aware of their spiritual needs and ardently desires to help them. Being the mother of God, the queen of all creation, and the coredemptrix of mankind, her appeal on men's behalf is most efficacious and always produces the intended results.

Position of the Magisterium. That Our Lady intervenes in the distribution of all heavenly favors to all men emerges quite clearly from the teaching authority of the Church as represented especially by the popes of the past two centuries. Thus Benedict XIV, in the bull Gloriosae Dominae (1748), likens Mary to "a heavenly stream through which the flow of all graces and favors reach the soul of every wretched mortal" [Opera omnia, v. 16 (Prato 1846) 428]. Among the frequent allusions made by Leo XIII to this doctrine, the passage in the encyclical Octobri mense (1891) is particularly trenchant. After recalling that God had not wished to become incarnate in Mary's womb without first obtaining her consent, the Pope adds: "It may be affirmed with no less truth and precision that, by the will of God, absolutely no part of that immense treasure of every grace which the Lord amassed . . . is bestowed on us except through Mary" [Acta Sanctorum Sedis 24 (1891) 195-196]. St. Pius X in his encyclical Ad diem illum (1904), Benedict XV in his Inter sodalicia (1918), and Pius XII in his Superiore anno (1940) and Doctor mellifluus (1953) explicitly corroborate the traditional theme: it is the will of God that one obtain every grace through Mary.

Liturgy. The liturgical books of the Church, always a reliable index of Catholic belief, faithfully echo the familiar strain found in papal documents. Thus the official prayer books of the Byzantines, Copts, Syrians, Armenians, and Chaldeans abound in references to Mary's role as dispensatrix of all graces. As to the Latin liturgy, its most notable witness is embodied in the Office and Mass of Mary Mediatrix of All Graces. The text was composed by J. Lebon of the University of Louvain at the suggestion of Cardinal Mercier, archbishop of Malines, and approved by Benedict XV in 1921. The privilege to celebrate this feast on May 31 of each year was originally granted to the dioceses of Belgium, but it was soon extended to numerous other dioceses and religious orders throughout the world. When in 1954 Pius XII ordered the universal observance of Mary's queenship on May 31, the feast of Mary's mediation was discontinued by some and transferred by others.

Scripture. What the popes and the liturgy proclaim in express terms, Sacred Scripture teaches by implication. It has been indicated above how the prophecy known as the Protoevangelium (Gn 3.15) already foreshadows the intimate association of Our Lady with her Son in the entire process of man's supernatural rehabilitation. Since the actual application of graces to the members of the Mystical Body is but the specific way in which they, as individuals, benefit from the redemptive work of the Savior, it seems logical to infer that Our Lady should have a share in it. In other words, if Our Lady, as coredemptrix, earned or acquired these graces with and under Christ, it is highly fitting that she should have a part in their actual dispensation to men. The unity of the divine plan would seem to demand it.

Another biblical passage bearing on the subject is Our Lord's testament from the cross (Jn 19.26–27), in which, according to the documents of recent popes, the Savior proclaimed His mother as mother of the entire human race. This motherhood of Mary implies a communication of grace (spiritual life) to her spiritual children, not only at the initial phase of regeneration on Calvary, but also in the subsequent process of conservation and development of that supernatural organism in the soul of her children.

Tradition. From the point of view of tradition the doctrine under discussion has undergone a gradual development very reminiscent of other Marian theses. In the early period, representing the germinal stage, the doctrine was taught only implicitly by the numerous Fathers and ecclesiastical writers who portrayed Our Lady as the second Eve, the mother of all the living in the supernatural plane, the associate of Christ as savior of mankind. Appropriate references may be found, for example, in St.

Irenaeus (d.c. 202), St. Epiphanius (d. 403), St. Jerome (d. 420), St. Augustine (d. 430), and St. Modestus of Jerusalem (d. 634). The 8th century yields the explicit testimony of St. Germanus of Constantinople (d. 733), who assures one that "there is no one to whom the gift of grace is given except through Mary." It was, however, through the influence of St. Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153) that this doctrine became widely accepted during the Middle Ages. His statement that "God has willed that we should have nothing that did not pass through the hands of Mary" became a familiar apothegm in the Marian literature of subsequent centuries. The Franciscan St. Bernardine of Siena (d. 1444), who shares with St. Bernard the title doctor of Mary's mediation, summarizes the teaching of his age in these words: "I do not hesitate to say that she [Mary] has received a certain jurisdiction over all graces. . . . They are administered through her hands to whom she pleases, when she pleases, as she pleases, and as much as she pleases." During the 17th and 18th centuries the doctrine was not only generally accepted, but also the object of extensive treatment within the province of both dogmatic theology and devotional literature. The leading champion of the Catholic thesis during that period was St. Alphonsus Liguori (d. 1787), whose classic treatise Glories of Mary contains a vigorous refutation of the objections raised by L. Muratori (d. 1750). In more recent times those who have contributed most to the clarification of Mary's role as mediatrix are the Spanish Jesuit J. M. Bover (d. 1954) and J. Bittremieux of the University of Louvain (d. 1950). Despite a few scattered adversaries, the traditional doctrine is generally regarded as definable by the Church. Shortly after World War I, and on the initiative of Cardinal Mercier, numerous petitions began to be addressed to the Holy See urging the definition of the doctrine as an article of faith. These requests have multiplied in more recent years. For example, the already mentioned petition of the Cuban hierarchy (1951) urged Pius XII to define both Our Lady's coredemption and her actual intervention in the distribution of absolutely every grace.

Bibliography: E. DUBLANCHY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50). J. MICHL et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:25–32. K. RAHNER, ''Mariologie,'' ibid. 84–87. G. BARAÚNA, De natura Corredemptionis marianae in theologia hodierna (1921–1958) disquisitio expositivocritica (Rome 1960). J. B. CAROL, De Coredemptione B. V. Mariae disquisitio positiva (Vatican City 1950); ''Our Lady's Co-redemption,'' J. B. CAROL, ed., Mariology 2:373–425. J. A. ROBICHAUD, ''Mary, Dispensatrix of All Graces,'' ibid. 426–460. H. M. KÖSTER, Die Magd des Herrn 2d ed. (Limburg 1954). H. LENNERZ, De Beata Virgine (Rome 1957) 157–289. G. D. SMITH, Mary's Part in Our Redemption, rev. ed. (New York 1954). W. G. MOST, ''Mary, the Coredemptrix,'' The Marian Era 1 (1960) 8–11, 121.

[J. B. CAROL/EDS.]

PT. 5: SPIRITUAL MATERNITY OF MARY

Of all the titles given to Mary by the faithful there is none more common than the one used to indicate her spiritual maternity—Mother; yet paradoxically there is perhaps no other prerogative of the Blessed Virgin that is less understood.

Two reasons may be advanced in explanation. There is, first of all, the nature of the terminology. When one calls Mary his mother in the supernatural order he is making use of analogy, a comparison between the divine and human levels. A failure to develop the full force of the comparison results in the deficient idea that Mary is spiritual mother of men simply because of the love she has for them or because of her adoption of mankind at the foot of the cross. Second, there is the neglect of an essential element of every maternity—a relationship with a person of the opposite sex. In the spiritual maternity this simply means the failure to associate Mary with Christ in the divine plan to give men spiritual life. Both of the above dangers have been avoided by the papal magisterium.

Reality of the Spiritual Maternity. Since Feb. 27, 1477, when Sixtus IV in his apostolic constitution Cum praecelsa became the first pope to allude to the spiritual motherhood of Mary [J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 32.373; crit. ed. C. Sericoli, Immaculata B.M. Virginis conceptio juxta Xysti IV constitutiones (Rome 1945) 153], the doctrine has been taught with ever-increasing emphasis. It can safely be asserted that this doctrine, having been taught clearly and repeatedly by the ordinary and universal magisterium since Sixtus IV's time, is certainly definable as a doctrine of faith. [See the extensive articles by W. Sebastian, "Mary's Spiritual Maternity," J. B. Carol, ed., Mariology 2:325-376, esp. 352; G. W. Shea, "The Teaching of the Magisterium on Mary's Spiritual Maternity," Marian Studies 3 (1952) 35–110]. It is important, therefore, to ascertain the meaning given to the spiritual maternity in the explanations of the papal magisterium. There are three possible significations: (1) metaphorical—Mary acts in men's regard as a mother acts toward her children; she prays for them, she obtains grace for them, etc.; (2) adoptive—Christ willed that Mary adopt men as her children and that she possess the rights and fulfill all the duties of a mother toward men; and (3) real—Mary in some way transmits spiritual life to men by a kind of generation in the spiritual order and is, therefore, truly, the mother of men.

In the present state of research it cannot be affirmed with certitude that the sovereign pontiffs from Sixtus IV to Pius IX went beyond the metaphorical signification. While it is true that Leo XIII and his successors speak most often about Mary's action in men's regard and their filial attitude toward her, yet for them these complementary attitudes are based on a most stable reality. At least twice, in his encyclicals Quamquam pluries (August 1889) and Adiutricem populi (September 1895), Leo XIII affirms that Mary "has brought us forth to life" [Leonis XIII P.M., Acta (Rome 1881–1905) 9:175; 15:300].

Although it cannot be denied that Leo XIII went beyond the simple metaphorical sense, some are inclined to think that he stopped at the juridical notion of an adoptive motherhood. It is true that this pope placed great stress on Christ's donation of His mother as the spiritual mother of all mankind [see Quamquam pluries, ibid. 9:175; Octobri mense, ibid. 11:341; Magnae Dei matris, ibid. 12:221; Jucunda semper, ibid. 14:305; and Amantissimae voluntatis, ibid. 15:138]. Nevertheless, it must not be imagined that adoptive sonship necessarily excludes the idea of real filiation, for supernatural adoption surpasses a merely human adoption in one essential way: it really makes the person upon whom it is conferred a true son, for along with it comes a true participation in the nature and life of the Person adopting. In other words, if Mary cooperates with her Son in meriting the divine life of grace for mankind, she is really the spiritual mother of men.

Leo XIII's successor, St. Pius X, is explicit on the reality of Mary's spiritual motherhood. For him the foundation is men's incorporation in Christ and the role of Mary in the Incarnation.

Is not Mary the mother of Christ? She is therefore also our mother. It must be stated as a principle that Jesus, the Word made flesh, is at the same time the savior of the human race. Now, inasmuch as He is God-Man, He has a body like other men; inasmuch as He is redeemer of our race, He has a spiritual body, or, as it is called, a Mystical Body, which is none other than the society of Christians bound to Him by faith. . . . But the Virgin did not conceive the Son of God only in order that, receiving from her His human nature, He might become man, but also in order that, by means of this nature received from her, He might become the savior of mankind. . . . And thus, in the Virgin's chaste womb itself, where Jesus took to Himself mortal flesh, He joined to Himself a spiritual Body formed of all those who were to believe in Him; and it can be said that, bearing Jesus in her womb, Mary bore there also all those whose life was included in that of the Savior. And so all of us, united to Christ, are, as the Apostle says "members of his body, made from his flesh and from his bones" (Eph 5.30); we ought to consider ourselves as having come forth from the womb of the Virgin, from which we once issued as a Body attached to its head.

That is why we are called, in a truly spiritual and entirely mystical sense, the children of Mary, and why she, on her part, is the mother of the members of Jesus Christ that we ourselves are. [Ad diem illum; Le encicliche mariane, ed. A. Tondini (Rome 1950) 310–312]

The emphasis here is on Mary's free consent to the Incarnation, the first source of divine life in the present economy of salvation. This idea is taken up with one accord by St. Pius X's successors [see Benedict XV, Cum sanctissima Virgo, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 9 (1917) 324; Cum annus, ibid. 11 (1919) 38; Pius XI, Lux veritatis, ibid. 23 (1931) 493; Pius XII, Mystici corporis, ibid. 35 (1943) 247; Mediator Dei, ibid. 39 (1947) 521]. However, neither St. Pius X nor any of his successors rests his case for the spiritual maternity on her part in the Incarnation. All stress Mary's role at the foot of the cross, by which she participated directly with Christ in the act of Redemption through which the divine life of grace was won for all men. They see it as the logical consequence of her union with Christ from the moment of the Incarnation. Pius XI and Pius XII, it would seem, solve definitively the problem of an adoptive motherhood depending upon Christ's words from the cross, "Woman, behold thy Son. . . . Behold thy mother' (Jn 19.27), for they see in these words of the dying Redeemer not a creation but a "proclamation" and "ratification" of a spiritual motherhood begun at the Annunciation [Pius XI, allocution of Nov. 30, 1933, to the pilgrims of Vicenza, Osservatore Romano, Dec. 1, 1933; Pius XII, allocution of July 17, 1954, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (1954) 491].

Association of Mary with Christ. The magisterium in the use of sources, Scripture and tradition, associates Christ and Mary in the doctrine of the spiritual maternity.

Scripture. Four major texts are commonly adduced. The first of these is the Proto-Evangelium (Gn 3.15): "I will put enmity between you and the woman, between your seed and her seed; he shall crush your head, and you shall lie in wait for his heel." If, as an increasing number of modern writers affirm (and their opinion seems to be supported by both Pius IX's Ineffabilis Deus and Pius XII's Munificentissimus Deus), the prophecy is to be understood of Mary alone, then one may certainly use it as an argument to prove Mary's spiritual maternity, for the text then prophesies that Mary with her divine Son is to crush Satan's head. It is known that this takes place on Calvary at the objective Redemption, which marks the rebirth of mankind to the spiritual life. Therefore Mary by her share in this work can truly be called men's spiritual mother.

Second, there is the Annunciation pericope (Lk 1.26–38). The references cited above from St. Pius X, Benedict XV, Pius XI, and Pius XII are ample evidence of the importance attached to this passage by the magisterium. Pius XII can well speak for all:

But when the little maid of Nazareth uttered her fiat to the message of the Angel . . . she became not only the Mother of God in the physical order of nature, but also in the supernatural order of grace she became the Mother of all, who through the Holy Spirit would be made one under the Headship of her divine Son. The Mother of the Head would be the Mother of the members. [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 39 (1947) 268; the English is the pope's own, his address to the Marian Congress at Ottawa, Canada]

Third, there is Christ's testament (Jn 19.26–27): "When Jesus, therefore, saw his mother and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he said to his mother, 'Woman, behold thy Son.' Then he said to the disciple, 'Behold thy mother.' And from that hour the disciple took her into his home." This passage has been so frequently used by the sovereign pontiffs as a strictly biblical support of the spiritual maternity that it seems impossible to maintain that Christ's words refer to Mary's spiritual motherhood only by accommodation [see W. Sebastian, 357; J. B. Carol, Fundamentals of Mariology (New York 1956) 51].

The final text of those commonly adduced concerns the vision of the woman clothed with the sun (Rv 12). Although St. Pius X in his encyclical Ad diem illum (Feb. 2, 1904) explicitly stated that "no one is ignorant of the fact that this woman signified the Blessed Virgin" and then made a direct application to Mary's spiritual maternity, still one cannot claim for this interpretation the support of the universal magisterium, for none of his successors has repeated this meaning.

Tradition. From the time of St. Justin and St. Irenaeus in the 2d century it has been traditional to use the Eve-Mary comparison to illustrate Mary's part in the Redemption of mankind. The popes of the last 100 years have frequently used the term new Eve or its equivalent (associate of Christ, coredemptrix, cooperatrix) to elucidate Mary's role in the lifegiving Redemption. The epilogue of Pius XII's encyclical Mystici corporis is a summary of the teaching on the spiritual maternity as well as a compendium of the Church's Mariological doctrine:

". . . in the name of the whole human race" she gave her consent for a "spiritual marriage between the Son of God and human nature" (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 3a, 30.1). Within her virginal womb, Christ our Lord already bore the exalted title of head of the Church; in a marvelous birth she brought Him forth as source of all supernatural life. . . . Free from all sin, original and personal, always most intimately united with her Son, as another Eve she offered Him on Golgotha to the eternal Father for all the children of Adam, sin-stained by his fall, and her mother's rights and mother's love were included in the holocaust. Thus she, who corporally was the mother of our head, through the added title of pain and glory became spiritually the mother of all His members. . . . and she continued to show for the Mystical Body of Christ . . . the same mother's care and ardent love with which she clasped the infant Jesus to her warm and nourishing breast. [Pius XII, Mystici corporis 108]

Bibliography: E. DUBLANCHY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 9.2:2405–09. F. J. KENNEY, Mary's Spiritual Maternity According to Modern Writers (Catholic University of America Studies in Sacred Theology, 2d ser., 93; 1957). Marian Studies (1950–), Annual Proceedings of the Mariological Society of America 3 (1952). E. N. NEUBERT, "The Spiritual Maternity," Mary in Doctrine (Milwaukee 1954) 45–71. D. J. UNGER, "The Meaning of John 19:26–27 in the Light of Papal Documents," Marianum 21 (1959) 186–221.

[W. J. COLE/EDS.]

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO

In popular usage, "devotion to Mary" is synonymous with the "cult of Mary." Technically, however, "cult" in reference to Mary means the external recognition of her excellence and of the superior way she is joined to God; and "devotion" adds the notion of an interior readiness for cult. This article uses the words "devotion" and "cult" interchangeably.

Devotion to Mary "proceeds from true faith, by which we are led to recognize the excellence of the MOTH-ER OF GOD, and by which we are moved to filial love toward our mother and to imitation of her virtues" [Lumen gentium 67; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 66]. It comprises "the duties of redeemed mankind toward the Mother of God, who is mother of Christ and mother of men" (ibid. 59). Three elements enter into devotion to Mary: (1) veneration, or the reverent recognition of the dignity of the holy Virgin Mother of God; (2) invocation, or the calling upon our Lady for her motherly and queenly intercession; and (3) imitation, which may take such forms also as dedication and consecration. In addition to devotion in a generic sense, there are devotions to Mary, i.e., particular practices of piety, both liturgical (feasts, litanies) and nonliturgical (the rosary, the scapular, and private prayers)—the "various forms of piety approved by the Church" (Lumen gentium 66).

The singular cult of Mary is based on her special role in God's plan: by grace she is Mother of God-made-man.

Associated in the mysteries of Christ's earthly life, she remains by her presence with the glorified Christ "inseparably joined to the saving work of her Son" [De sacra liturgia 103; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 (1964) 125].

Yet devotion to Mary differs essentially from the cult of adoration ("worship" in American usage) offered to God alone, such as is given to Christ and to the Father and the Holy Spirit. The cult of the Blessed Virgin is called hyperdulia to distinguish it both from latria (adoration) and dulia (veneration of the other saints).

The cult of Mary is the response of the Christian people to the role of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the mystery of Christ and His Church, the reaction of "redeemed mankind toward the Mother of God, who is mother of Christ and mother of men, particularly of the faithful" [Lumen gentium; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 59].

Scripture. The first evidence of response to the dignity of the Mother of Jesus is found in the NT, as part of the pattern of salvation history. Mary is involved in the mysteries of the Savior's life. The Gospels proclaim Mary blessed in her maternity—the Nativity narratives and indirectly Gal 4.4. Elizabeth hails Mary as "Mother of my Lord" (Lk 1.43) meaning "queen-mother of the Messiah-king," likely the oldest Christian greeting of praise to the Mother of Jesus. The Johannine accounts of Cana and Calvary show her role as type of the believing Church, as do also, obliquely, the "difficult sayings" of the public life on keeping God's word (Mk 3.35; Lk 11.28; note the use made of these texts in Lumen gentium 61).

Early Church. Homage to Mary's holiness progressed further in the 2nd century with the conviction of her role as "new Eve" associated with Christ the "new Adam' (SS. Justin, Irenaeus). The art of the catacombs and the early apocrypha also bear witness to the increasing veneration of the Mother of Jesus; and as early as the 2nd century "born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary" was used in baptismal creeds. A Eucharistic anaphora in the Apostolic Tradition (traditionally attributed to Hippolytus of Rome) mentioned Mary. A manuscript fragment in Greek from the 4th century asks the "Mother of God" for protection—an ancient form of our "We fly to thy patronage, oh holy Mother of God" (Latin: Sub tuum praesidium confugimus), which influenced in turn the medieval Memorare ("Remember, oh most gracious Virgin Mary, that never was it known that anyone who fled to your protection . . . '').

St. Epiphanius (d. 403), who calls Mary "mother of the living," mentioned an obscure sect, the Collyridians, that gave divine honors to the Virgin. Developing a line of thought hinted at in Origen (d. 253) a century before,

"Our Lady of Grace and the Grand Masters of the Military Order of Montesa." (©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

Our Lady of Guadalupe Chapel, shrine where Juan Diego claimed visions of Virgin Mary in 1531, Guadalupe Hidalgo, Mexico. (Archive Photos)

St. Athanasius (d. 373) proposed the Virgin Mary as an example to dedicated virgins. St. Ambrose (d. 397) devoted a series of writings to Mary, model of Christian virginity.

From the dogmatic definition of the divine mother-hood [(THEOTOKOS) at Ephesus (431)], the cult of Mary took on assurance and extension. Sixtus III (432–440) rebuilt St. Mary Major in Rome to commemorate the Ephesus event. Churches were dedicated to Our Lady as early as the 4th century. Severian of Gabala (d. after 408) called the praise of Mary a daily custom—she was called on before the apostles and martyrs. St. Nilus (d. 430) said the praise of Mary was found in every land and every language. Leaden seals have come down from the 5th and 6th centuries with the inscription servus Mariae—servant (or slave) of Mary.

Early Liturgical Cult. The first evidences of a liturgical cult are from the East and show the same Christocentric orientation as EPHESUS. The oldest feast was a "remembrance of Mary," corresponding to the dies natalis (birthday into heaven) of the martyrs. This primitive memoria Mariae celebrated the return to God of the Virgin Mother of the Savior, who is the new Eve. It was probably kept as early as the 5th century, and was part of the Christmas liturgy, perhaps on December 26 at first, then on January 1 (as natale S. Mariae). The ANNUNCIA-TION was recalled in Advent, as is still done on the Advent Wednesday Ember day, but by the mid-6th century was celebrated on March 25. Emperor Maurice (d. 602) made universal in his territory the feast on August 15 of the "falling-asleep of the Mother of the Lord" (DORMI-ΤΙΟΝ, κοίμησις), the later ASSUMPTION feast. The NATIVI-TY OF MARY (Sept. 8) dates from the late 6th century. In the 7th century Oriental monks introduced these feasts to the West; all four were kept in Rome under the Greekborn Pope Sergius I (d. 701). Other feast days followed: the PRESENTATION OF MARY (8th century in the East, 1372 in the West); the "conception of St. Anne" (8th century in the East, eventually developing into the IMMAC-ULATE CONCEPTION in the Christian West).

In the Roman liturgy Our Lady has had a place in the first prayer of remembrance (communicantes) before the consecration since the 6th century. This has been called the highest expression of the official Marian devotion of the Church, and is used to good effect in both the introduction and the conclusion to the Marian final chapter of the dogmatic constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 58–67].

8th to 15th century. Distinguishing marks of Marian devotion from the 1st through the 7th century were reverent admiration of Mary's holiness as Mother of God (Theotokos). In the next period there was greater concentration on Mary's present role as heavenly queen, spiritual mother, and all-powerful intercessor. Her "suppliant omnipotence" became the dominant object of attention. The Eastern homilists, SS. Sophronius (d. 638), Germanus of Constantinople (d. 733), defender of icons, and Andrew of Crete (d. 740) extolled Mary's power of intercession as they praised her assumption. In Carolingian times Alcuin (d. 804) promoted Saturday as Mary's day. Ambrose Autpert (d. 784) developed the theology of the spiritual motherhood. During the decadence after the Carolingian renaissance, religious life survived around the great abbeys. Marian prayers and sermons survive from Cluny (e.g., Odo of Cluny, d. 942) and Reichenau (a late 10th-century translation from the Greek of nine sermons on the Dormition).

The Marian devotion of the High Middle Ages accorded with general devotion to the saints; it was based on a sense of community between the Church on earth and the Church triumphant, with growing emphasis on the humanity of Jesus, e.g., the holy name of Jesus, the passion, the Real Presence in the Eucharist (see SACRED HUMANITY, DEVOTION TO THE). By this time the West was showing increasing independence of the East, the more so after the break-off of intercommunion between Orthodoxy and Rome in the mid-11th century.

There is a rich 11th-century Marian literature: sermons, prayers (as the SALVE REGINA), liturgical Offices (LITTLE OFFICE OF THE BVM) and Masses (especially for Saturday), and public proclamations of being "servants or slaves of Mary" (as by Odilo of Cluny, d. 1049, and also by Bl. Marinus, brother of St. Peter Damian). St. Peter Damian (d. 1072) wrote of Our Lady helping the poor souls in purgatory; by the 15th century this took the form in popular piety of the sabbatine privilege of the SCAPULAR.

The 12th century showed two doctrinal trends, strongly influencing devotion: (1) attention to Mary's compassion on Calvary and the interpretation of the Savior's words, "Woman, behold your son" (Jn 19.26) as signifying Mary's spiritual motherhood of Christ's brethren typified in the beloved disciple; (2) under the influence of the doctrine of the Assumption, emphasis on Mary's present assistance to all Christian people. St. Bernard (d. 1153) was noted for the Marian piety of his homilies, yet he remained bound to tradition; he called Mary not mother, but Our Lady, and he opposed the feast of the "conception of holy Mary" as an innovation.

In the 13th century doctrine and piety were intimately interwoven in the praise of Mary. Along with the great cathedrals of Marian dedication, Marian devotion was manifest in the lives of SS. Francis (d. 1226) and Dominic (d. 1221) and in the theological masterworks of SS. Bonaventure (d. 1274), Albert the Great (d. 1280), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), and of Duns Scotus (d. 1308). The familiar prayer, the HAIL MARY, combining the scriptural greetings (Lk 1.28, 42) of the first part to the petition of the second part, attained its current form only in the 15th century, but variants were in use from the 12th century and the Ave's were repeated to form the Psalter of Mary or the rosary. At this same time, independent litanies of Our Lady developed out of lists of Marian titles in the form of a litany—one of which has been preserved in the LITANY OF LORETO.

15th Century. The invention of printing in the 15th century put at the service of Marian devotion means of rapid diffusion, for example, the many editions of the Marian sermons, at once tender and terrible, of St. Bernardine of Siena (d. 1444); and early xylography helped spread the confraternities of the rosary.

The artistic representation of the "mantle Virgin" was characteristic of the devotional outlook of the 15th century. Under her protecting mantle, Mary, Mother of Mercy, kept in her care all peoples, nobles and humble folk alike. This picture was rejected by the Reformation, and disappeared in the Renaissance. Pope Sixtus IV gave the feast of the "conception of Mary" limited approval and the favor of indulgences (1477). In the late 14th century the Presentation of Mary (Nov. 21) and the Visitation (July 2, since 1969 transferred to May 31) were introduced in the West. In Christian spirituality meditation on the life of Mary, as on the life of Jesus, was a prominent note. The ideal was a deeper, richer interior life, well-expressed by J. Gerson (d. 1429) in his counsels for a truly Christian attitude to Mary.

The Reformation. Marian devotion became an object of attack for the Reformers not directly, but in inevitable connection with positions on doctrine and cult regarded by them as essential and evangelical. Neither Luther nor Calvin rejected totally the veneration of Mary, but they limited it to imitation of the humble, obedient, Virgin Mother of the Gospels (even as type of the believing Church). The Reformers and early Reformation confessions uniformly rejected calling upon the saints for assistance; such invocation (especially by the titles, queen of heaven and spiritual mother) was regarded as derogatory to the unique mediatorship of Christ, even as blasphemous to God, the one source of grace. The cult of the saints, especially of the Virgin Mary, has remained a point of division between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, reflecting a differing understanding of the traditional and creedal COMMUNION OF SAINTS.

Trent defended the cult of Our Lady and the other saints—invocation as well as admiration and imitation, for the blessed who reign with Christ can intercede for men on earth. Both Catholic and Protestant positions hardened in the subsequent struggles of the Reformation and Counter Reformation, and the cult of Mary, like the doctrine of the Real Presence, became a favorite subject for controversy. St. Peter Canisius (d. 1597) replied to the Protestant positions in a long work, De Maria virgine incomparabili, which proved a veritable arsenal for Catholic apologists. Iconographically, the triumph of Mary—the Immaculate crushing the serpent's head—often represented victory over Protestantism.

The internal development of devotion continued within the Church. The Sodality of Our Lady was founded under Jesuit guidance in 1563; many Marian sodalities and associations developed from this prototype. High points of sodality history include the "golden bull" of Pope Benedict XIV (Gloriosae Dominae, 1748) and the bicentenary commemorative constitution of Pius XII (Bis saeculari, 1948).

17th and 18th Centuries. The 17th-century flowering of Marian studies, especially in Spain and France, had a corresponding development in devotion. Practices of the "slavery of Mary" grew up, variously rooted in the queenship and in imitation of the child Jesus in his dependence on Mary. The "sanguinary vow" was a pledge to defend to the death the Immaculate Conception, when it was still being debated within the Church. Some of these customs were carried to excess and aroused protest, even condemnation, e.g., certain forms of the "slavery of Mary," complete with chains. A. Widenfeldt lashed out against foolish practices in his storm-provoking Monita salutaria (1672).

In the French school of spirituality founded by Cardinal de BÉRULLE, the cult of Mary was intimately joined to the mystery of the Word-made-flesh. J. J. OLIER developed the role of Mary in the interior life, especially of seminarians for the priesthood. St. John Eudes preached the Immaculate Heart of Mary. From the mystical life came the remarkable testimony of the laywoman Marie Petyt (d. 1677) and her director Michael of St. Augustine Ballaert, OCarm (d. 1684).

This period possessed the sense both of God's majesty (extending to Mary, as so close to God) and of the need for total commitment as is manifest in the practice of consecration to Mary, which is really to Jesus Christ through Mary. The most famous form of consecration is the 'holy slavery of Mary' of St. Louis GRIGNION DE MONTFORT (d. 1716) even though it did not become generally known until the finding in 1842 of the book since called True Devotion. Popular exaggerations of Mary's intercessory role led to strong reactions, such as that of L. A. MURATORI. St. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI defended Marian devotion with solid arguments, especially in the widely spread Glories of Mary (1750).

19th Century. In the aftermath of the Enlightenment and the French Revolution the newly founded religious congregations and the restored older orders showed a special concern for Mary's role in the apostolate. Apostolic zeal was recognized as an authentic note of Marian dedication (cf. Lumen gentium 65). This was especially true of the missionary orders, founded in such numbers in this period, e.g., Marists, Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Claretians, and Scheut Fathers. Lay efforts were also made, such as that of G. J. CHAMINADE (d. 1850), who worked with lay sodalists some years before he founded the Society of Mary (Marianists). The apostolic pattern has continued in the 20th century with the Legion of Mary (from 1921), reactivated sodalities, etc., and is manifest also in the strong Marian devotion of the new secular institutes.

Another factor in the Marian devotion of the 19th century was the shrines of Lourdes (1858), LaSalette (1846), both in France, Knock (1879) in Ireland, and elsewhere (in the 20th century, e.g., Fatima, 1917), all of which continue to attract pilgrims. The Church has approved these practices particularly because of the good fruits of prayer and penance and the frequenting of the Sacraments by the pilgrims. Many other claims of private revelations, however, have been rejected by the Church and public devotions at such sites forbidden, e.g., Heroldsbach in Germany, Necedah in Wisconsin, and Bayside, New York. There was a general warning on these matters by Cardinal Ottaviani of the Holy Office in 1951 (Osservatore Romano, Feb. 4, 1951).

20th Century. Devotion to Mary in the 20th century was stimulated by many factors. Continuing the practice of Pius IX (who defined the Immaculate Conception) and Leo XIII (who issued encylical letters on the devotion of the rosary), St. Pius X wrote on the spiritual motherhood ["Mary is our sure way to Christ," Ad diem illum, Acta Sanctae Sedis 36 (1903-04) 451]. Benedict XV addressed incessant appeals to the Queen of Peace during World War I. Pius XI commemorated the Ephesus anniversary (Lux veritatis, 1931) and related Our Lady to the jubilee of the Redemption (1933–34). Pius XII showed his great interest in Marian doctrine and cult by the following acts: the definition of the Assumption (1950); the consecration of the world to the Immaculate Heart of Mary (1942), which was further explained in the encyclical on the Sacred Heart (Haurietis aquas, 1956); the inclusion in the encyclical on the Mystical Body, MYSTICI CORPORIS, of its Marian epilogue (1943); the proclamation of the Marian Year (1945), and its memorialization by the new feast of the queenship of Mary (May 31, transferred in 1969 to August 22); and the proclamation of the Lourdes centennial (1958). Particularly important for devotion were the directives of Mediator Dei, his encyclical on the sacred liturgy (1947): the liturgy was declared to be the norm of Marian cult, though other approved forms of piety were also encouraged. Devotion to Mary is an indication of our firm hope of salvation; indeed "according to the opinion of the Saints it is a sign of predestination" [Mediator Dei; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 39 (1947) 584-585].

Features distinctive of the 20th-century devotion to Mary included Marian congresses, local, national, international; and great pilgrimages to many Marian shrines, even through times of political unrest and wars.

The renewal of Biblical and patristic studies has focused attention on the Mary-Church analogy, especially after World War II. This has affected Marian devotion, as was obvious from the orientation of Vatican Council II as this appeared in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, in the decree on ecumenism, Unitatis redintegratio [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 101, 104–105], and in the constitution on the liturgy [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 (1964) 125]. Vatican II reassessed Marian devotion in the light of scriptural, pastoral, and ecumenical perspectives. The role of Mary in the liturgy was proposed as the norm of devotion to Mary in chapter 8 of Lumen gentium, the dogmatic constitution on the Church from Vatican Council II. Traditional practices of devotion to Mary, e.g., the rosary, scapular, novenas and pilgrimages underwent searching examination and restatement in terms of current needs of Christian life—stronger emphasis on their integral relationship with the Scriptures, the Sacraments, and the Church itself.

In addition to Vatican II, Pius XII called for correct balance in MARIOLOGY and Marian devotion, in Inter complures, the message to the international Mariological and Marian Congress of Rome [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (1954) 679], and also in Ad caeli reginam, the encyclical on the queenship of Mary [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (1954) 637]. Pope John XXIII sounded the same note. In a discourse to the clergy of Rome, he warned of "particular practices or devotions, which may be excessive in their veneration of Jesus and our mother —who will not be offended by these words of Ours' [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 52 (1960) 969]. He cautioned the French National Marian Congress (Lisieux, July 9, 1961) to "look rather to the most traditional Marian devotion, as it has been handed down to us from the beginning in the prayers of successive generations in East and West' [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 53 (1961) 506]. Pope Paul VI also urged a sound, biblically and pastorally oriented devotion to Mary that is faithful to tradition [Nous sommes heureux, Osservatore Romano (Sept. 13, 1963), English translation from The Pope Speaks 9 (1964) 164-167] declaring that "It is in the history of salvation, in the Gospel, that you will find Mary. . . . "See also the encyclical Ecclesiam suam (Aug. 6, 1964), Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 (1964) 635; and the commentary on "Mother of the Church," the allocution La ceremonia dell'offerta of Feb. 2, 1965, Osservatore Romano (Feb. 3, 1965). In his 1974 apostolic exhortation, Marialis cultus, Paul VI encouraged the development of a devotion to Mary that was biblical, liturgical, ecumenical and anthropological, as well as integrated into the mysteries of the Trinity, Christ, and the Church. The U.S. Catholic Bishops' letter Behold Your Mother: Woman of Faith (1973) also called for creativity on the part of the American peoples and their pastors in shaping a devotion to Mary suitable to this age. While there was a downtrend in devotion to Mary in the ensuing decades after Vatican II, such devotion remains strong and vibrant wherever the figure of Mary is intrinsically linked to national, ethnic, communal or cultural identity, e.g., Mexico (Our Lady of GUADALUPE), Poland (the Black Madonna of CZESTOCHOWA), Ireland (Our Lady of Knock), England (Our Lady of Walsingham), Portugal (Our Lady of FATIMA), France (Our Lady of LOURDES), continent of Africa (Our Lady of Africa), Vietnam (Our Lady of LA VANG) and India (Our Lady of Vellankani).

Bibliography: H. GRAEF, Mary: A History of Doctrine and Devotion, v.1 From the Beginning to the Eve of the Reformation

(New York 1963), v.2 From the Reformation to the Present Day (London 1965). L. BOUYER, Devotion to Mary in the Church (Marian Library repr. No. 63; Dayton, Ohio 1959). B. CAPELLE, "La Liturgie mariale en Occident," Maria: Études sur la Sainte Vierge, ed. H. DU MANOIR (Paris 1949-) 1:215-245. A. DAVID, "La Dévotion à la Sainte Vierge," ibid. 5:689-720. I. CECCHETTI, "Sub tuum praesidium," American Ecclesiastical Review 140 (1959) 1-5. J. F. MURPHY et al., Carol Mariol v. 3, E. NEUBERT, La Dévotion à Marie (Le Puy 1942). W. TAPPOLET, ed., Das Marienlob der Reformatoren (Tübingen 1962). J. LECLERCQ, "Grandeur et misère de la dévotion mariale au moyen âge," Maison-Dieu 38 (1954) 122-135. L. BOUYER, "Le Culte de Marie dans la liturgie Byzantine," ibid. 79–94. Maria im Kult (Mariologische Studien 3; Essen 1965). National Conference of Catholic Bishops, Behold Your Mother Woman of Faith, a pastoral letter on the Blessed Virgin Mary Nov. 21, 1973 (Washington 1973). D. FLANAGAN, commentary on ch. 8 of Lumen Gentium, in Vatican II: The Constitution on the Church, ed. K. MCNAMARA (Chicago 1968). H. DU MANOIR DE JUAYE, ed., Maria: Études sur la Sainte Vierge 8 v. (Beauchesne, Paris 1949–71). R. LAURENTIN, Court traité sur la Vierge Marie (5th ed. Lethielleux, Paris 1968). E. R. CARROLL, Understanding the Mother of Jesus (Wilmington, DE 1978). L. DEISS, Mary, Daughter of Sion tr. B. T. BLAIR (Collegeville, MN 1972). D. FLANAGAN, The Theology of Mary (Hales Corners, WI 1978). PAUL VI, Marialis cultus, apostolic exhortation, 2 Feb. 1974, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 66 (1974) 113-168; tr. Devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary (USCC Publ. Office, Washington, DC 1974). F. M. JELLY, Madonna: Mary in the Catholic Tradition (Huntington, IN 1986). "The Theological Context of and Introduction to Chapter 8 of Lumen Gentium," Marian Studies 37 (1986) 43-73. R. HARRIS, Lourdes: Body and Spirit in the Secular Age (New York 1999)

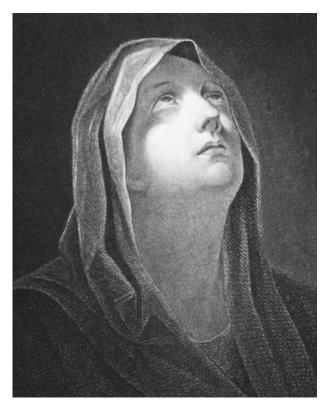

[E. R. CARROLL/EDS.]

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, ICONOGRAPHY OF

Marian iconography is an element of Christian art that has been of great importance, from the 3d century to the present day, in all Orthodox and Catholic countries. It is not, as has often been thought, a special development of the Gothic period of the Middle Ages. Actually, it has deep roots in early Christian thought and art and a continuous history through the centuries. It embraces single representations and liturgical Marian art; narrative cycles of her life, death, and glorification; portrayals of her miracles and apparitions; and symbolic Marian themes. For a guide to pertinent material see MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, ARTICLES ON.

Single Images and Liturgical Marian Art

The oldest portrayal is thought to be that of a mother and child from the CATACOMB of Priscilla (3d century), perhaps connected with the prophecy of Isaiah (Is 7.14). The theme of the mother seated with her child on her lap occurs again in the Cappella della Velata in the same catacomb, of a somewhat later date, and in the 4th century,

Mary, mother of Jesus Christ. (Archive Photos)

in the Cemeterium Majus, full-face, more hieratic and with a chrisom. Mary appeared also as praying on the bottom of gilt glasses. The 5th-century portrayals of Mary become more regal in the wake of the Council of EPHESUS (431), which initiated the veneration of the THEOTOKOS. A mosaic in St. Mary Major in Rome, inspired by Sixtus III and since lost, showed the Virgin enthroned with the Child. The clothing is stereotyped; the Virgin wears an oriental maphorion and red slippers (586, Gospel Book of Rabbula Laurentian Library, Florence). The solemn full-face pose of Mary in the Adoration of the Magi in S. Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna, foreshadows the style of portrayal on the ivory diptychs. The type appears early in apses, surrounded by angels (Parenzo).

Eastern Types. From this point many modes developed, the most ancient in Byzantium being those of the liturgical icons, thought to be connected with relics such as portraits of Mary from life and articles of her clothing.

The Virgin Odigitria. The Odigitria or Our Lady Guide of Wayfarers was reputed to be St. Luke's portrait of the Virgin brought from Jerusalem to the Odigôn monastery in Constantinople. It represents a standing Madonna with the Child in the act of blessing held on her left arm; her right arm is either touching the Christ Child or raised (Gospel Book of Rabbula; early 7th-century icon of the Pantheon, Rome). There is another version of the Madonna seated, in the diptych of Etschmiadzin. The Madonna often has an angel on either side of her. The Odigitria, which is the most frequently encountered type, is enthroned in the apses or votive panels of churches (Hagia Sophia, Constantinople); she is standing in the mosaics of Kiti, Cyprus; later she is depicted without the angels at Torcello. This Madonna is found on icons, ivories, and larger reliefs.

The Virgin Blacherniotissa. The Blacherniotissa, preserved in the Blachernae monastery (founded by Pulcheria in the 5th century in honor of the Blessed Virgin) shows the Virgin in an attitude of prayer, alone or with a medallion of the Child on her breast. The ORANS or Praying Madonna, an ancient and widespread type, may be found in some apses (St. Sophia, Kiev). The Orans with medallion occurs full-length (12th-century icon from Kiev; Tretiakov Gallery, Moscow) or half-length. Another type is the Nikopeia, Our Lady of Victory. The Kyriotissa is standing and holds in front of her breast the Child, who is sometimes in a medallion.

The Virgin Chalcopratia. The Blachernae monastery was reputed to house the maphorion of Our Lady, while the Chalcopratia monastery was supposed to be in possession of her cincture, whence the type of the Virgin Hagioritissa or Chalcopratia, an intercessory Madonna, portrayed in three-quarter profile and with hands upraised, as in a Deësis, where Mary is at the right and John the Baptist at the left of Christ. The Deësis may be represented in apses and in tombs.

Other Greek and Russian Types. The Nursing Madonna or Galaktotrophousa appears very early in Egypt and is an adaptation of Isis nursing Horus. The Eleousa is a Virgin of Tenderness (9th-century ivory, Syrian or Egyptian; Walters Art Gallery, Baltimore), the Glykophilousa depicts the Child kissing the Mother. The latter types are predominantly folkloric in nature; although they are sometimes discovered in churches, they are found more often in the minor arts.

All the aforementioned types of the Virgin, alone or with the Child, are encountered on Byzantine seals. The Virgin with Child appears in the symbolic theme of the Zôodochos Pigi (Source of Life) in the illustration of the AKATHISTOS. The portrayals of Mary that illustrate her principal feasts drawn from the cycle of her life and death can also be classed with liturgical Marian art.

Russian art adopted to a large extent the Byzantine motifs. The Blacherniotissa becomes in Russian the Znamenie, i.e., Sign; the Virgin of Tenderness becomes the Umileniye. A large number of other Russian types were derived from Byzantine originals, especially that of

Madonna holding the Christ Child, detail of mosaic in the Istanbul Hagia Sophia. (©Charles and Josette Lenars/CORBIS)

"Mountain Sanctuary: Mother Mary of the Church," painting by A. Poz. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

the Pokrov or Protection of the Mantle of Our Lady, from a Greek type, the Episkepsis, which is closely allied to the Blacherniotissa.

Western Types. Western iconography of the Virgin borrowed heavily from Byzantium. However, the picture of her as crowned like an empress, or Maria Regina (S. Maria Antica), originating in the 6th century, was a Western conception (see MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF). The Regina appears in an attitude of prayer in the mosaic of the Oratory of John VII (early 8th century, now in Florence). The motif of the crowned Madonna reappears during the Middle Ages in Romanesque and Gothic art. But the Virgin in Majesty, Majestas Mariae, derived from the Odigitria, occurs enthroned in the apses of Roman churches, in Romanesque statuary, and on the tympanums of cathedrals. The Italians adopted the Byzantine modes of portrayal, initially retaining the Eastern manner of treatment, then picturing the Blessed Virgin according to the Renaissance canons of idealized beauty. Gothic art has given us a multitude of graceful examples of the Madonna standing with the Child. It is typical of the representations of Mary in the West that they have personified the ideal woman down to the present-day ("Mother and Child" by Henry Moore). The Italian Madonnas are so numerous that the name has passed into other languages as well.

Western artists have created a number of types of the Virgin that are often linked with a particular place or group such as a sanctuary, shrine, or association. Mary has been symbolically assimilated to the Church, Ecclesia, and the Woman of the Apocalypse. Some motifs have taken their inspiration from the events of her life. The Immaculate Conception, developed especially in the 17th century by Spanish artists, the Virgin of Expectation or Our Lady of Good Hope, the Virgin of the Ears of Corn, the Vierges ouvrantes, recalling Mary before the Birth of Christ, the Sorrowful Virgin, and especially the Virgin of the Pietà, inspired by the Passion. The Black Madonna is a folk creation. A frequent depiction is that of the Mother and Child shown with donors (see CHURCH, SYMBOLS OF; IMMACULATE CONCEPTION; PIETÀ).

Sources of the Life of Mary

The sources for the life of Mary are the Gospels and the apocryphal accounts of her life and of the childhood of Christ. The basic text for the childhood of Mary is the Book of the Nativity of Mary or Protoevangelium of James, as it was called by Guillaume Postel who brought back a manuscript of this book from Constantinople to the West in the 16th century and saw in it a prelude to the Gospels. The oldest manuscript (early 4th century) is complete from its title Génnaus Marías to the colophon naming as author James of Jerusalem (the "brother" of Christ), whence the name Book of James. The manuscripts have various title pages but always include a mention of the nativity of Mary. The account covers the time from the events preceding her birth to the Massacre of the Innocents. The texts present original material up to the Annunciation, then duplicate the narrative of the canonical Gospels. There are numerous versions of early date in the Christian East, in Syriac, Armenian, Georgian, Coptic, Ethiopic, Arabic, and Old Slavonic. Divergent amplifications such as are found in the Syriac and Armenian versions may, by their original features, have exerted an influence on iconography.

In the West there are two main Latin revisions, the Gospel of the Pseudo-Matthew and the Gospel of the Nativity of Mary. The former, which seems no earlier than the 7th or 8th century, amplifies the Protoevangelium and shows a propensity for the miraculous and the didactic, focusing on the life of Mary in the Temple. It is supplemented in some manuscripts by an account of the Childhood of Christ, inspired chiefly by the Pseudo-Thomas. The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, apparently the work of Paschasius Radbert (9th century), is an adaptation of the Pseudo-Matthew, which eliminates the shocking or obscure passages; it ends with the first Dream of Joseph. Both texts were wrongly held to be translations by St. Jerome from the Hebrew. The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary became widely disseminated, especially from the 13th century on, when it was incorporated into the Golden Legend (see JAMES OF VORAGINE, BL.) and other pseudo-historical works. But the Pseudo-Matthew was the principal source for the narrative representations and for literary works such as the medieval French and English mystery plays (see DRAMA, MEDIEVAL).

The accounts of the Death of Mary, or Transitus Mariae, likewise go back to a very ancient tradition that was diffused throughout the entire Christian world. The Transitus, like the De Nativitate and other accounts of the Childhood of Christ, is mentioned in the Decretum gelasianum (6th century). The source of the Latin Pseudo-Melito goes back at least to the 5th century. The Greek account of Pseudo-John the Theologian is the best known because of its use in the liturgy. The homiletical writers preferred other texts, notably that used by John of Thessalonica (early 7th century), because these are clearer in their description of the Assumption. The most widely disseminated Latin versions are the Pseudo-Melito, which was incorporated into the Golden Legend and some of the mystery plays, and the account of the Pseudo-Joseph of Arimathea. The narrative in the Codex Augiensis 229 (early 9th century) is closest to the original tradition. The different texts contain variants that are of great importance for the iconography of Mary. The story of the Transitus was translated into all the languages listed above. In the West there are, apart from the Latin texts, Irish versions of the Childhood and Death of Mary.

Some texts, especially the Syriac ones, group the accounts of the childhood and of the death into a complete Life of Mary that is partly independent of the Gospel narratives. This procedure engendered whole cycles of the Life of Our Lady. In the West, the apocryphal legends were written off, in principle, by the Council of Trent. But although they have no foundation in historical fact, the apocrypha are orthodox in character, for they aim at mitigating the silence of the Gospels on the Mother of God. The accounts of her childhood were intended to buttress the dogma of her virginity. They exercised a profound influence on religious beliefs and writings, which in turn gave rise to a series of liturgical feasts and to innumerable figural representations throughout the course of Christian art. The liturgy played a considerable role in the development of Marian art through the transmission of its texts, for the majority of the Greek and Latin manuscripts we know are liturgical in origin, and by the introduction of scenes and cycles into the liturgical books and into churches. Many churches are dedicated to the ANNUNCIATION, the NATIVITY, the PRESENTATION in the Temple, and the DORMITION or ASSUMPTION of Mary. For apocrypha of the New Testament, see BIBLE, III (CANON), 5.

Historical Note. The narrative depictions of the Childhood of Mary preceded the institution of exactly defined liturgical feasts, within the general framework of veneration, in the East and in the West. We find them as early as the 6th century (the Annunciation to Anne is displayed by an ivory of Leningrad, and a cycle is depicted in column A on a ciborium at St. Mark's, Venice). Traces of narrative scenes in S. Maria Antiqua and S. Sabbas in Rome (8th century) and archaicized Cappadocian frescoes (9th or 10th century) prove the existence of a preiconoclastic cycle. The frescoes in S. Maria de Gradellis, Rome (late 9th century), belong to well-developed cycles of the Life and Death of Mary according to the Latin versions. In the absence of illustrated manuscripts, these early cycles are attested by the Homilies of James of Kokkinobaphos (early 12th century), based on the Protoevangelium, and by the Wernherlied von der Magd (early 13th century; Staatsbibliotek, Berlin), inspired by Pseudo-Matthew. The icon of Pisa called the Madonna of San Martino exemplifies the medieval Italian tradition. In the West, there is often a quite marked divergence between Italian and Northern iconography. Relatively few themes survived in the West after the condemnation of the apocryphal accounts by the Council of Trent, but they have been represented continuously. In the East, the tradition became impoverished after the Turkish conquest.

Iconography

Some iconographic motifs are common to all of Christian art, whereas others are peculiar either to the Byzantine or to the Western tradition. The principal sources for scenes before the Annunciation are the Protoevangelium, the Pseudo-Matthew, and the Gospel of the Nativity of Mary.

The Life of Anne and Joachim. The Munificence of Joachim, showing the youthful Joachim distributing alms, appears for the first time in the Wernherlied von der Magd. The scene is represented on the icon of Pisa and in 14th-century Lombard works. In the later French and Flemish pictures, Anne is added to broaden the theme to that of the Charity of Anne and Joachim. The Marriage of Anne and Joachim is rare, the earliest example being in the Wernherlied; it appears to have been unknown in Italy. The scene is modeled on the Marriage of Mary and Joseph and shows Anne and Joachim pressing each other's right hand before the priest. Both the charity and the marital themes were introduced into Flemish works of the late 15th and early 16th centuries, devoted to the life of St. Anne. There is no trace of either subject in the Byzantine tradition.

The Rejected Offerings of Joachim usually introduce the cycle. Although the texts rarely mention Anne, she figures in Byzantine images and in many Western pictures outside Italy. In Byzantine pictures closely linked with the texts (Homilies of James; frescoes of Mistra), other bearers of offerings also are shown. But the refined subject was reduced to three protagonists from the 12th century on in churches. The Italians show Joachim's eviction from the Temple rather than his offering (G. D. Tiepolo, 18th century; Morgan Library, New York). There have always been background figures in these pictures and by the end of the Middle Ages they had infiltrated all the Western compositions. Less commonly found themes related to the Rejected Offerings include the Consultation of the Twelve Tribes by Joachim and the Return of Joachim to his home, a subject derived from Eastern accounts and sometimes depicted in the West (Chartres Cathedral).

The Byzantine Annunciation to Anne includes the Threnody in the garden, near the tree where a bird is feeding its young, and the Annunciation of the angel. The Threnody itself is seldom represented. The ancient Annunciation pictures show Anne seated, but beginning with the 11th century she is shown standing before her house where her servant is sometimes shown waiting; nearby is the tree with the birds above and below is the fountain where the angel appears. Anne's stance is like that of Mary at her Annunciation in post-Byzantine compositions; in later Russian art, as a result of Western influence, she sometimes is shown kneeling. The Western iconography of the Annunciation to Anne is quite varied. Anne is generally kneeling but only rarely under the tree with the birds. Though she may be seated, as in Byzantine art or standing before the angel, the kneeling position is the most customary. The scene is not very personalized because of its assimilation to various types of the Annunciation to Mary. The rare scene of the maid reproaching Anne for her barrenness precedes the Annunciation in some ancient cycles.

The Annunciation to Joachim comprises the Threnody and the Annunciation, combined in the pictures at Daphni but also on occasion figured separately in the same composition. Joachim is shown seated, lamenting among his shepherds, then standing to listen to the words of the angel. Joachim is traditionally seated in a rustic hut, often against a background of mountains. Later he is sometimes shown kneeling like Anne. Other scenes, such as the Departure for the Desert, the Conversation with the Shepherds, and the Return of Joachim to his Home, are encountered in only a few well-developed cycles. The Pseudo-Matthew is the source of the Sacrifice and the Dream of Joachim, which were taken up by Giotto. The Annunciation itself is frequently depicted. The 13th century was to adopt widely the synthesized Byzantine type showing Joachim seated on the mountain with his shepherds and flock. There is considerable variety in landscape and human figures. The Annunciation to Joachim may be combined with that to Anne. These events have been the basis of the most picturesque compositions having to do with the Childhood of the Blessed Virgin.

In Byzantine art, the Meeting of Anne and Joachim, or the Conception, is symbolized by the kiss of the spouses who meet before Anne's house. In the West, the scene occurs before the Golden Gate of Jerusalem and, especially in Italian art, in the presence of Anne's attendants and Joachim's shepherds (Taddeo Gaddi, 14th century; Baroncelli Chapel, S. Croce, Florence). Although the tender kiss of the Byzantine artists is depicted by Giotto and others, the embrace is often portrayed as reserved and even distant.

In the cycles, the Conception is symbolized by the Meeting down to the 16th century. Beginning with the 14th century, in liturgical and devotional books or volumes of piety, certain features allude more overtly to the Immaculate Conception, e.g., Mary crowned by a halo in Anne's womb. The symbolic theme of the Immaculata with her attributes, descending to earth on a cloud and a crescent moon, was created at the end of the 15th century. Two centuries later the painter MURILLO produced the most famous examples. In the detailed Byzantine cycles, the scene of the Meeting is sometimes preceded by Anne and the Messengers, who announce her husband's return, and followed by the Accepted Offerings or the Conversation of Anne and Joachim in their House. With the exception of the Accepted Offerings, these scenes appear also in the detailed Western cycles.

From the Birth of the Virgin to Her Marriage.

The Nativity of Mary is the motif from the Childhood of Mary most frequently encountered in art. Since the texts recite the event without going into detail and since the parents of Mary were held to be rich, the Byzantine artists adopted the birth motif of antiquity, as found on the sarcophagi of children or in the illustrations of the lives of heroes and demigods. The mother is lying or sitting, sometimes assisted by a maidservant; the women bear gifts; and the child is being bathed. The ceremonial surrounding the birth of the porphyrogenite princes is reflected in the luxuriousness of the Daphni composition, the presence of the phylarchs and the child's cradle in the miniature of the Homilies of James, and the depiction of the gift table in the mosaic of Kariye Djami. The bathing motif comes to be rivaled by that of the cradle in the 12th century. In the art of Macedonia, the realistic motif of a young spinner rocking the child's cradle with her foot replaced that of the midwife of the bathing. The presentation of the baby to Anne, which is derived from early Christian art, occurs in the East in a fresco of Kizil Çukur, Cappadocia. The three or four women bearing gifts are shown presenting dishes and a fan; Joachim is often introduced into compositions after the 14th century.

In the West, the ancient depictions have not been preserved, and the miniatures of the 11th and 12th centuries are more symbolic than narrative. From the 12th century on, however, the bathing motif is found and tends more and more to supplant that of the cradle. The presentation of the baby to the mother, which seems to be a primitive illustration of the Pseudo-Matthew, is employed in the Wernherlied. In Italy, where the bathing motif persists, Giotto combined it with the presentation. Owing to the development of picturesque features and of the laws of perspective, it became the chief motif of later compositions. The component elements were borrowed from Byzantine art and were treated in either a symbolic or a realistic manner.

The early childhood of Mary, in Byzantine tradition, comprises three events: the First Steps, the Caresses, and the Blessing by the Priests. The first is an ancient but infrequently encountered theme. Anne, seated, holds the hands of the infant Mary who is walking toward her, followed by a maidservant. The Caresses, a motif showing Eastern influence, is quite widespread in the art of the Paleologi. Anne and Joachim, seated on a bench, are playing with the child; one or two serving maids are often pictured also in this touching scene that is found mostly in Macedonian painting. The Blessing by the Priests takes place on the occasion of the banquet offered by Joachim for the first birthday of Mary. In the detailed cycles, priests and laity are represented; the refined motif is reduced to Anne or Joachim, or both, carrying the child who is being blessed by three priests disposed behind a table spread with a banquet. The table sometimes has the appearance of an altar. In the West, there is an unusual depiction of the First Steps on an embroidered English orphrey (14th century; Victoria and Albert Museum, London) and in a Catalan fresco (15th century; Barcelona Museum). The Blessing by the Priests is introduced into some cycles as a first Presentation in the Temple, closely paralleling that of Christ.

Anne and the Child Mary are represented together in single pictures, modeled on those of the Virgin and Christ Child. In Byzantine art, Anne holds Mary on her arm, caressing her or nursing her. These pictures are not part of the narrative cycles, although they may accompany them. The motif of Anne carrying the Child Mary occurs quite early in Rome (S. Maria Antiqua); in the 13th century it appears on the north portal of Chartres and on Byzantineinfluenced icons in Italy. The typically Western theme of Anne teaching Mary to read is widespread from the 14th century in England and France, both in the cycles and in single representations in miniatures and on small statuary. It also served as inspiration for artists, such as Rubens (c. 1625; Antwerp Museum) and Delacroix (The Reading Lesson, 1842). The addition of Jesus to the group produced the St. Anne Trinity, a very widely represented subject at the end of the Middle Ages and during the Renaissance (Leonardo da Vinci; Louvre, Paris). From there, artists went on to depict the Progeny of St. Anne in a family portrait, grouping Anne, Joachim, the Virgin, Mary Cleophas, Mary Salome (following the legend of Anne's Trinubium), and their children.

The Presentation in the Temple is a major theme of the childhood of the Blessed Virgin, especially in Byzantium, because of the importance of the liturgical feast. Numerous episodes are added in the developed cycles: Anne and Joachim Talking of Mary, the Preparations for the Presentation, the Train accompanying Mary, the Presentation and Greeting by the High Priest, the Placing of Mary in the Holy of Holies, Mary Fed by the Angel, the Visions of Zacharias, and the Visit of Anne and Joachim to their Daughter. Some of these scenes were introduced into the church decoration, but the prevailing composition is the synthesized one created for the Eastern menologium. Near the entrance to the building, the group of young girls carry candles; in the center, Anne and Joachim introduce the Virgin Child to the High Priest who receives her eagerly; in the choir, the Virgin is seated on the steps and receives the bread from the angel. The iconography is remarkably homogeneous with the exception of the mode of representation peculiar to Macedonia and Serbia, where the young girls are grouped in the center.

In the West, this scene is encountered only in the cycles but it is always present there, even in the most limited ones. The nourishment by the angel is generally not shown. Except in a few Byzantine-influenced pictures in Italy, the train is not shown; but the future companions of Mary in the Temple are depicted in Italy. Although the High Priest, who is accoutered as a bishop or a Jewish priest, is always shown in Italian art, he is often omitted in Western European pictures. The number of steps Mary is climbing varies from three to 15, and she is shown as a child or a young adolescent with long hair, not as the little adult of Byzantine art. Mary sometimes turns back toward her parents, contrary to the statements of the textual sources; in Flemish works, she is sometimes assisted by a small angel. Italian artists discovered in this motif a pretext for theatrical compositions far removed from the Byzantine spirit (Titian, 1538; Accademia, Venice).

The Life of Mary in the Temple is narrated at length in the Latin accounts with a didactic aim in view. The scenes include her work of weaving in the Temple, her encounters with angels, and her miracles. She is shown with companions and not as the unique child of destiny in Byzantine art. All these events are illustrated in the Wernherlied, and some of them in 14th-century works (ivory casket in the Paul Dupuy Museum, Toulouse). As late as the 17th century, Guido Reni shows Mary sewing in the Temple with her companions (Hermitage, Leningrad), whereas Zurbarán depicts her alone, abandoning her embroidery for prayer.

The Marriage of Mary and Joseph is represented in Byzantine art in an arrangement similar to that of the Presentation. The young Virgin is committed to Joseph, both of them submissive to the will of God, by the High Priest Zacharias. The revealing miracle is indicated by the presence of the dove or of the flowering rod, inspired by Aaron's Rod. The suitors are present at this scene, which is found only in the cycles. It is often preceded by the Prayer of Zacharias, who is generally prostrated before the altar on which have been placed the staffs of the suitors. The episode gave rise to numerous illustrations in the Homilies of James and to the Peribleptos of Mistra: the Meditation of Zacharias and the Council of the Priests. the Oracle, the Choice of Joseph who tries to decline, the Warning of the Priest, and finally the Entrusting of Mary to the Keeping of Joseph. Allied subjects, proper to the Latin textual tradition, are found also in the Wernherlied. They are encountered elsewhere only very rarely; the Prayer of Zacharias by Giotto is an exception.

The Marriage scene, on the contrary, is found very frequently in the West, where artists adopted a secular schema for the Marriage scene: the joining of the right hands (dextrarum junctio) in the Northern composition; the ring put on the finger in Italy; and the two partners standing on either side of the priest, who is seen full-face. The oldest depictions are linked with the Nativity of Christ (4th-century sarcophagus of Puy), and even the 11th-century miniatures are little influenced by the apocrypha. Soon Anne and Joachim are introduced (14th century, Sano di Pietro; Vatican Museum); so, a little later, are the suitors who in Italian art are shown breaking their staffs in anger. This scene gave rise to very elaborate compositions, especially in Italian art (Raphael, Il Sposalizio; Brera, Milan).

The episodes following the nuptials are illustrated in Byzantine art by the Farewell of Mary to the Priest, Joseph Leading Mary Away, the Lodging of Mary in Joseph's House, and Joseph's Exhortations before his Departure. Only a few of these exceptional scenes appear in church paintings. In Western illustrations Mary is tended by five of her companions in Joseph's house, where Byzantine art shows the four sons of Joseph. Mary's return to her parents' home after the ceremony, based on the Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, where it is a case of betrothal rather than marriage, is represented in several pictures in the Sienese tradition.

The Purple or the Distribution of the Skeins intended for the weaving of the veil of the temple is the final purely apocryphal episode of the life of Our Lady. Eastern examples show Mary, followed by a group of virgins, receiving from the hands of the priests the purple and the scarlet. In the West, the illustration of the event occurs in the Wernherlied. Some temple messengers are entering the house where Mary is waiting in the company of the five virgins. When the purple is alloted to her, the girls ironically call her "Queen of Virgins," but an angel appears and terrifies them so that they beg Mary to pardon them. The subject is rare in both Eastern and Western art. Mary spinning the purple has sometimes been confused with Mary weaving in the Temple, a theme that is encountered frequently in art of the West.

From the Annunciation to the Death and Glorification. The Annunciation is the first event of the life of Mary that is related in the canonical Gospels (Lk 1.26–38); it opens the cycle of the Childhood of Christ (see ANNUNCIATION). This subject is extremely widespread, occurring both in cycles and independent representations, since it marks the inception of the processus of the Incarnation and recalls a very important feast. The apocryphal sources admit a dual Annunciation. Mary, who has gone to draw water, turns around surprised at the voice of an angel visibly present; then Mary, terrified, returns to her house and sets to work spinning the purple, at which point the angel appears to her. The two iconographic types, both going back to early Christian art, occur together in the apocryphal cycles (frescoes in St. Sophia, Kiev). The Annunciation in the house, with Mary spinning the purple, figures in the great feasts of the Byzantine Church. Mary is seated in the ancient images; later she is shown seated or standing. In the Homilies of James, the episode is narrated in detail from Gabriel's commission by the Court of Heaven to the recipient's joy in acceptance.

In Western art, the two Annunciations figure in the Wernherlied but this is a rare exception. The motif of the purple is more frequently encountered; that of the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove is still more frequent. Mary is often surprised at prayer or pious reading in a great variety of stances and settings. The angel and Mary are both standing in the Pisa icon, both kneeling in the fresco by Giotto; the angel kneels before Mary in the picture by Simone Martini; all the possible combinations are found painted by Fra Angelico. The Flemish painters show the scene in a room, but sometimes also in a garden, a palace, or a church. The Incarnation also may be recalled together with the Annunciation, by a scene of solemn veneration in the Akathist Hymn, or in the West, by the Plunging of Jesus into the womb of Mary. After the Council of Trent the renderings of the Annunciation lost some of their intimacy; the angel appeared above on a cloud.

The Visitation includes Mary Going over the Hills to Visit Elizabeth, the Meeting between them, and the Return to Nazareth and Justification of the Virgin. The two women are shown greeting each other from a distance, or embracing. Elizabeth is sometimes represented kneeling before the Virgin (15th century, D. Ghirlandaio; S. Maria Novella, Florence). The subject was especially popular in the 15th and 16th centuries (see VISITATION OF MARY).

The Reproaches of Joseph follow upon his return and discovery of Mary's condition. In Byzantine art, this is represented by a conversation between Joseph, staff in hand, and Mary. In the Wernherlied, Joseph speaks to the companions of Mary who protest that she is innocent. The Dream of Joseph (Mt 1.20–24), which occurs as early as the 4th century (sarcophagus of Puy), is surprisingly undifferentiated in Byzantium and the West. Joseph is asleep on his bed when the angel appears to him; Mary is sometimes represented symbolically in the scene. Some Western works show Joseph later kneeling before Mary to beg her pardon for his doubts.

The Ordeal by Water is portrayed at length in the Homilies of James and the Wernherlied. The Ordeal is frequently encountered in early Christian ivories where Mary alone, according to the ordeal reserved for adulteresses, drinks from the goblet of foul water handed to her by the priest; in the Byzantine apocryphal cycles, Mary and Joseph are both subjected to the ordeal. There is scarcely any trace of the theme in the West.

The Journey to Bethlehem (Lk 2.4) is an ancient motif going back to the primitive Church; in time it comes to be used less frequently, being too akin to the Flight into Egypt. On the throne of Maximian in Ravenna, an obviously pregnant Mary is seated on a donkey being led by an angel; Mary is supported by Joseph. In an apocryphal context, one of the sons of Joseph leads the animal. Mary's vision of a people in the depths of despair and of a people whose sorrow has been turned to joy is depicted in the Wernherlied.

The Census (Lk 2.1–5) provides the reason for the journey to Bethlehem, but in the apocrypha the Nativity occurs before the arrival in Bethlehem. Though the Census motif is represented only in a canonical context, the sons of Joseph may be introduced into the scene, as at Kariye Djami. The governor Cyrinus is present as those arriving are being registered by a scribe.

The Nativity of Christ is one of the most ancient themes from the New Testament (4th-century sarcophagi), and so is the Adoration of the Magi (catacombs; St. Mary Major, Rome), both having been represented in mosaics in the church of the Nativity, Bethlehem (4th century). The Virgin, sitting, or more often reclining, on a mattress, Joseph sitting, and Jesus in the cradle, or, after the 6th century, bathed by midwives, were later joined by shepherds and Magi offering presents in a synthesized composition. The scene was depicted in all the Byzantine churches, since the Nativity of Christ is one of the great feasts in the Eastern Church. In ancient cycles (Coptic frescoes at Bawît), but primarily in mid-Byzantine manuscripts and Paleologan painting, the scene may be shown in a narrative context, which includes various features, both canonical and apocryphal, concerning the Magi and the Massacre of the Innocents, as at Kariye Djami. From the 14th century on, the Adoration of the Child became the most favored representation in the West. The Virgin kneels before the Child, and frequently there are adoring angels present, hovering above the scene or, like the Virgin, also kneeling (c. 1475, Antonio Rossellino, marble relief; Monte Oliveto, Naples). The Adoration of the Shepherds (Lk 2.15-21) appeared in European art at the end of the 15th century (Giorgioni; National Gallery of Art, Washington). The Adoration of the Magi was represented in sumptuous proportion during the Renaissance (15th century, Botticelli; National Gallery, Washington). (See JESUS CHRIST, ICONOGRAPHY OF; NATIVITY OF CHRIST.)

The Presentation of Christ in the Temple, or Purification of the Virgin (Lk 2.22–38), includes Mary presenting the Infant to the priest Symeon, Joseph bearing two doves, and the prophetess Anna. The theme is widespread in Byzantine art. In the West, the artists frequently showed the act of the Circumcision with the Infant struggling in His mother's arms (Mantegna; Uffizi, Florence).

The Blessed Virgin appears again in the Return from Egypt (Mt 2.19–23), where the Holy Family is shown approaching the walls of Nazareth, Joseph carrying the Child on his shoulders. She appears also in the Arrival of the Holy Family in Jerusalem (Lk 2.41–42) for the celebration of the Passover when Jesus is 12 years old, and in the episodes of Jesus among the Doctors of the Temple (Lk 2.43–49). These subjects are well depicted in the mosaics of Kariye Dajmi. The Return from Egypt is sometimes portrayed in the West. The Apprenticeship of Jesus is recalled in a few pictures of a rather late date, where Mary sometimes is shown. She is absent from the episodes of the Sojourn in the Wilderness and the Public Life of Christ, except for the Wedding Feast in Cana. She appears again in the cycle of the Passion (Crucifixion, Deposition, Entombment, and Ascension). In the Pentecost scene, where the New Testament only hints at her presence (Acts 1.13–14; 2.1–39), she occupies a place of honor in the midst of the Apostles. The episodes of the Dormition are again inspired by apocryphal accounts. [See CRUCIFIXION (IN ART); PENTECOST, ICONOGRAPHY OF; PASSION OF CHRIST; ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST; DORMITION OF THE VIRGIN.]

The Annunciation ante mortem, recounted at the beginning of various pericopes dealing with the Dormition, is made by Gabriel, or more often by Michael the Psychopompos, who extends a palm branch to the Virgin while she is at prayer. The earliest monument preserved, a fresco in S. Maria de Gradellis, reveals a rare tradition in which Christ Himself appears to his aged Mother who is stretched out on her bed. In Byzantine art, Mary is standing in prayer at Golgotha. After the announcement of her impending destiny, she sometimes distributes her clothing to the women attending her. In the West, where the subject appears in the 12th century (York Psalter), Mary is usually kneeling in her room.

The Arrival of the Apostles is ordinarily found in the large-scale compositions of the Dormition in Byzantine art (10th century and after; Tokalikilise II, Cappadocia) under the Paleologi. The disciples are positioned on clouds singly, in small groups, or in files of six, and are generally conducted by angels. This scene is rarely encountered in the West. An unusual picture in S. Maria de Gradellis shows three of the disciples being carried off from the site of their missionary activity. The Farewell of the Virgin to the Apostles is the subject of a remarkable composition in the Brontochion of Mistra. Mary is seated fully dressed on her bed and in a solemn posture, holding the palm branch in her right hand and surrounded by the praying Apostles. Mary's conversation with the Apostles may be rendered in a more intimate manner as at Cračanica. In the York Psalter she gives John the palm branch, a special symbol and prerogative of the Blessed Virgin at the hour of her death. The Communion of Mary, which has no textual basis, begins to appear in the 16th and 17th centuries in the West as an image of piety promoted by the Counter Reformation (Alonso Carlo; Palazzo Bianco, Genoa).

The Death of Our Lady or the Dormition constitutes a major theme in Byzantine iconography, figuring in all churches among the cycle of the Great Feasts, and also depicted on various artifacts. On 10th-century ivories, Mary is reclining on her bed, surrounded by the Apostles, with Peter censing her; Christ stands behind her, holding aloft in his arms her soul in the form of a doll swaddled in white. One or two angels are descending from heaven to receive her. On the Brummer Gallery ivory an angel descends at the left and then reascends on the right with the soul, while the three women attending Mary appear among the Apostles. The synthesized compositions of a later date show not only the Apostles arriving on clouds but also the orders of angels. Sometimes there appears the episode of the Jew Jephonias who was desirous of carrying off the body of Mary; his hands, cut off by the angels, are still gripping the bed.

The 12th century saw the addition of the three hierarchs Dionysius the Areopagite, Hierotheus, and Timothy (following a commentary of Andrew of Crete). John Damascene and Cosmas the Poet, who significantly contributed to Marian literature, sometimes flank the composition. The Romanesque (tympanum of Senlis) and 14thcentury (Duccio, Maestá; Siena) compositions owe much to Byzantium. The Byzantine influence continues to prevail in Italy in the 15th century, but the composition becomes more animated. In art of the northern Renaissance, Mary is shown lying or sitting on her bed surrounded by the Apostles and holding a candle. The scene is rendered intimately as the death of a pious bourgeois woman (c. 1480, painting by Hugo van der Goes; Bruges Museum). Christ and the angels, sometimes shown in the upper part of the picture, cease to appear.

The Funeral of the Blessed Virgin shows the Apostles carrying the body on a litter. It is here that the episode of Jephonias is inserted; in a Jean Fouquet miniature (c. 1450; Musée Condé, Chantilly), the Jews have been blinded by the angels. In the Interment the Apostles lower the body into a sarcophagus, with Peter in his traditional place supporting the head.

The Resurrection of the Virgin scarcely occurs in the Byzantine tradition, but the scene of the disciples finding the tomb empty on the third day inspired 12th- and 13th-century Western artists. The Blessed Virgin rises from the tomb aided by angels, who sometimes carry her in a shroud; occasionally she is assisted by Christ Himself. The Assumption of the Virgin is not often treated in Byzantine art; but the motif of the girdle thrown to Thomas to convince his doubting nature of the authenticity of the event is less rare than has been thought (St. Clement; Ohrid, Yugoslavia). In the West, the Assumptio animae, perhaps depicted on a fabric in Sens (8th century), derives from the Byzantine conception of the taking up of the soul of the Virgin to heaven. The true theme is the Assumptio corporis, showing Mary rising to heaven on a cloud borne by angels. The scene occurs with outstanding frequency in Italian art (15th century, Masolino; Naples Museum). Mary rising by her own power indicates a borrowing from the Ascension (1643, Philippe de Champaigne; Marseilles Museum).

The Coronation, a theme more symbolical than narrative, seems to have evolved in the 12th-century Paris circle of Suger. In the oldest pictures the Blessed Virgin sits crowned at the side of Christ who is blessing her; later representations show her being crowned by Christ and sometimes by God the Father; the 15th century originated the presence of the Trinity at the Coronation. The earlier works show Mary seated, while later ones depict her kneeling. The Assumption and the Coronation may be combined in a single composition showing the Virgin being crowned upon her arrival in heaven (17th-century engraving by J. Callot).

Miracles and Apparitions of the Virgin. The miracles of the Virgin are derived from quite varied and often local sources. They are all posthumous, except for those attributed to Mary by a limited Latin tradition and supposed to have occurred during her stay in the Temple. There are collections in Latin and the vernaculars from the end of the 11th century in the West. In France, for example, there is the 14th-century illuminated manuscript of Gauthier de Coincy's Miracles Notre-Dame (Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris); in Ethiopia, the Book of the Miracles of Mary. The most famous miracles are, in France, the Miracle of Theophilus, which appears in the stainedglass windows of the great Gothic cathedrals; and, in Italy, the Madonna with the Club or Madonna del Soccorso (1506, Giovanni da Monte Rubrano; Montpellier Museum).

The miracles are often linked with local apparitions, the most important of which include: Our Lady of the Snows in Rome; the Holy House of Loretto; the Virgin of the Pillar in Saragossa, Spain (c. 1654, Poussin; Louvre); the Lactation of St. Bernard; the Holy Candle of Arras; and apparition as the Immaculate to Bernadette SOUBIROUS at Lourdes. The iconography of the miracles has been influenced by the visions of such mystics as St. BRIDGET OF SWEDEN.

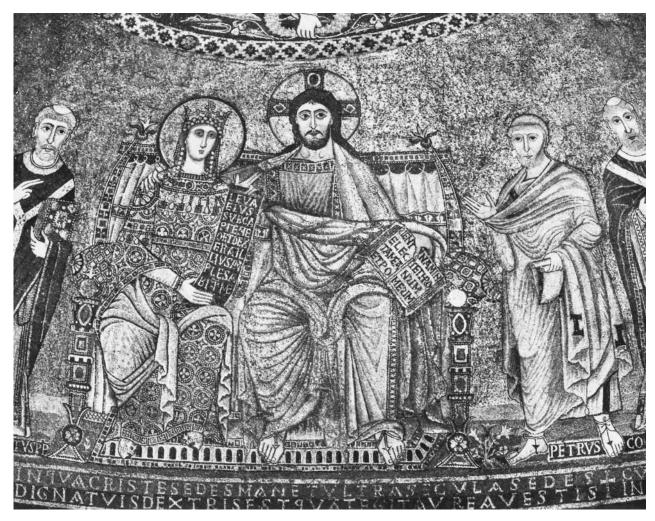

Symbolic Representations. These are based on prefigurations drawn from the prophetic passages of the Old Testament. Initially they were literary motifs used by the homiletical writers; certain of these motifs became concretized by an image: the Burning Bush, the Rod of Aaron, Gideon's Fleece, the Closed Gate of the vision of Ezekiel. Typological motifs also were furnished in the Stone sealing up the Lions' Den of Daniel, the Revolving Stone in the Dream of Nebuchadrezzar explained by Daniel, and the Three Young Men in the Fiery Furnace. The Song of Solomon inspired the Enclosed Garden and the Sealed Fountain. The Virgin does not appear in person in these scenes, though she may be suggested in a medallion, as an apparition, notably in the Burning Bush.

The Byzantine art of the Paleologan renewal assigned a very important place to the symbolic cycles in the churches. The tradition of typological representations is perhaps more widespread in the West, particularly in the Speculum historiale, except in Italy where the subjects never really took root. Other symbolic portrayals show Mary assimilated to the Woman of the Apocalypse, in the West, or to the Bed of Solomon, in Byzantium.

Bibliography: Sources. For bibliography on apocrypha of the New Testament, see BIBLE, III (CANON), 5. Liturgical Marian Art. A. MUÑOZ, Iconografia della Madonna (Florence 1905). N. P. KON-DAKOV, Ikonografua bogomateri, 2 v. (St. Petersburg 1914-15). v. N. LAZAREV, "Studies in the Iconography of the Virgin," Art Bulletin 20 (1938) 26–65. M. TRENS, Maria: Iconografia de la Virgen en el arte español (Madrid 1946). M. VLOBERG, La Vierge et L'Enfant dans l'art française, 2 v. (2d ed. Grenoble 1934, repr. 1954). L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955-59) 2.2:70-128. C. BERTELLI, Enciclopedia dell'arte antica (1961) 2:839-51. V. I. ANTONOVA and N. E. MNEVA, Katalog drevnerusskoj živopisi, I.XI-načalo XVI v (Moscow 1963). Narrative cycles. O. SINDING, Mariä Tod und Himmelfahrt (Christiana 1903). C. STORNAJOLO, Miniature delle Omilie di Giacomo Monaco (Rome 1910). G. MILLET, Recherches sur l'iconographie de l'Évangile aux XIVe, XV e et XVIe siècles (Paris 1916). H. DEGERING, Des Priesters Wernher drei Lieder von der Magd (Berlin 1925). H. A. OMONT, Miniatures des Homélies sur la Vierge du moine Jacques (Paris 1927). S. ROSSI, L'Assunzione di Maria nella storia dell'arte cristiana (Naples 1940). J. DUHR, "La Dormition de Marie dans l'art chrétien," Nouvelle revue théologique (February 1950) 134-57. v. BENNET and R. WINCH, The Assumption of Our Lady and Catholic Theology (London 1950). Iconographie de l'art chrétien 2.2:155-94, 597-626. J. LAFONTAINE-DOSOGNE, Peintures médiévales dans le temple dit de la Fortune Virile à Rome (Brussels 1959); Iconographie de l'Enfance de la Vierge dans l'Empire byzantin et en Occident, 2 v. (Brussels 1964-65). P. UNDERWOOD, The Art of the Kariye Djami, 3 v. (New York 1966-). Miracles and apparitions. G. DE COINCY, Les Miracles de la Sainte Vierge, ed. M. POQUET (Paris 1857). E. A. W. BUDGE, The Miracles of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the Life of Hannâ (London 1900). E. LEVI, "I Miracoli della Vergine nell' arte del medio evo," Bollettino d'arte 12 (1918) 1-25. A. C. FRYER, "Theophilus, the Penitent, as Represented in Art," Archaeological Journal (1935). E. CERULLI, Il libro etiopico dei Miracoli di Maria (Rome 1943). L. RINIERI, La Verità sulla Santa Casa di Loreto (Turin 1950). Iconographie de l'art chrétien 2.2:626-35. Symbolic themes. E. MÂLE, "L'Art symbolique à la fin du moyen âge," Revue de l'art ancien et modern 28 (1905) 81-96, 195-209, 435-45. J. LUTZ and P. PERDRIZET, Speculum humanae salvationis, 2 v. (Leipzig 1907-09). Iconographie de l'art chrétien 2.2:85-87. S. DER NERSESSIAN, "Le Lit de Salomon," Zbornik Radova Vizantološkog Instituta 8 (1963)

[J. LAFONTAINE-DOSOGNE]

"Christ and the Blessed Virgin," detail of the 12th-century mosaic in the apse of the Basilica of Santa Maria in Trastevere, Rome.

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF

Christian piety knows few titles for the Virgin Mary older than queen, and such equivalents as empress, lady, and notre dame. "The mother of my Lord" in Elizabeth's greeting to Mary (Lk 1.43) is an Old Testament phrase for the queen-mother ($g^eb\hat{r}\hat{r}\hat{a}$, e.g., 2 Kgs 10.13). In the Gospel it reflects the faith of the early Church that Jesus is the royal MESSIAH.

"Queen" is applied to Mary both in the wide sense because of her excellence, her holiness, and in the strict sense, for her real dominion in Christ's kingdom of GRACE. Mary is queen both in the sense that she excels all other saints and in the sense that she shares in a subordinate and analogous way Christ's rule.

Our Lady's titles to queenship are principally two: (1) divine motherhood (see MOTHER OF GOD); (2) "right of conquest." Christ is king both as Son of God made man and as Redeemer. He had a native right to be king from the INCARNATION, but He won His crown also by the conquest of Calvary. Mary is queen because she is Mother of Christ and also because by God's will she played a unique part in the Savior's work of Redemption (Pius XII).

In extent, Mary's queenship is as vast as that of her Son and God, nothing is excluded from her dominion. ". . . like her Son before her, she conquered death and was raised body and soul to the glory of heaven, where as queen she sits in splendor at the right hand of her Son, the immortal king of the ages" [Pius XII, Munificentissimus Deus; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 42 (1950) 768–769]. As "sovereign suppliant" she shares forever in the distribution of graces that flow from her Son's sacrifice.

Mary's power as queen has always been described in terms of mercy. In a perfect society the powers of government are legislative, judiciary, and executive. Theologians differ in their application of the threefold power to the queenship of Mary. All agree that Mary's queenly power is at least in the legislative category, that is, that the inner law of the kingdom of Christ is grace, and that she is the royal dispenser of grace. About her share in the executive and judiciary aspects there is no agreed opinion, except that punishment (coercive falls under executive) is not part of Mary's role. The voice of Christian tradition is that Mary rules with a mother's love.

The fact, titles, extent, and maternal character of Mary's queenship are all stated in documents of the Church, especially in Pius XII's Ad caeli reginam [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (1954) 625–640]. The precise nature of the queenship is still discussed by theologians. Two approaches predominate. In the 1930s L. de Gruyter and C. Friethoff, OP, likened Mary's queenship to the kingship of Christ, because of her association in His redemptive work. M. J. Nicolas, OP, C. Dillenschneider, CSSR, and others reacted by emphasizing the intercessory nature of Mary's royal role, appealing to the feminine character of all queenship. Just as the consort of the king in an earthly monarchy can wield immense power, not by her presence in the council chamber, but by her influence over the heart of the king, so Our Lady has a comparable influence over her Son, and intercedes for the needs of all her spiritual children and subjects. The solution to the question of the nature of the queenship lies between the extremes of both views. The analogy of the queen's place in a monarchy is not enough, for the queenship of Mary has no earthly counterpart, no more than has her Son's kingdom. At the same time she must not appear as a royal figure on the same plane as Christ the Redeemer-King.

Our Lady's queenship has much in common with other Marian beliefs. The same person, the Virgin Mary, is associated with Christ the Mediator, with Christ head of His MYSTICAL BODY, and with Christ the King. Yet the doctrine that Mary is queen emphasizes the extent of her involvement in Christ's kingdom in a manner different from her other doctrinal titles of spiritual mother and mediatrix.

Pius XII affirmed strongly the queenship of Mary, inserting in the calendar for May 31 a new feast of Mary Queen, in place of Mary, Mediatrix of All Graces. The 1969 reform of the liturgical calendar transferred the feast to August 22. The new liturgical feast of the queenship could be regarded as a sequel to the definition of the ASSUMPTION, and as an implicit affirmation of Marian mediation. Pius XII consecrated thee world to the IMMAC-ULATE HEART OF MARY, Mother and Queen, Oct. 31, 1942, as a public recognition of her queenship, just as consecration to the Sacred Heart of Jesus openly acknowledges the kingship of Christ. The consecration formula was as follows: "As the Church and the entire human race were consecrated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus . . . so we in like manner consecrate ourselves forever also to you and your Immaculate Heart, our mother and queen of the world, that your love and patronage may hasten the triumph of the kingdom of God" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 34 (1942) 318–319].

Bibliography: Souveraineté de Marie (Compte rendu du congrès marial Boulogne-sur-Mer; Paris 1938). A. LUIS, La realeza de Maria (Madrid 1942). Marian Studies, v. 4 (1953). Estudios Marianos, v. 17 (1956). La Royauté de l'Immaculée (Ottawa 1957), esp. E. LAMIRANDE, ''Bibliographie sur la royauté universelle de Marie,'' 223–232. Mariae potestas regalis in Ecclesiam, v. 5 of Maria et Ecclesia (Lourdes Congress Proceedings of 1958; Rome 1959). S. G. MATHEWS, ed., Queen of the Universe (St. Meinrad, Ind. 1957), an anthology on the Assumption and queenship of Marv.

[E. R. CARROLL/EDS.]

MARY (IN CATHOLIC-PROTESTANT DIALOGUE)

Since Vatican II, Catholic and Protestant theologians have engaged in an historic series of irenic dialogues, conferences, and joint writings that have addressed differences in doctrine and devotion over Mary, the mother of Jesus, the mother of God, that have divided the churches since the Reformation. The turning point was the council's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church which in its lengthy, concluding chapter eight firmly integrated teaching about Mary with truth about Christ (he alone is Mediator and Savior) and the church (of which she is preeminent member and for which she is model of faith and charity), and warned of excesses in preaching and piety. Paul VI's letter calling for sound renewal of Marian devotion (Marialis Cultus 1973) also contributed to an open, sober atmosphere where long-standing disagreements could be addressed.

Basic to this dialogue is the testimony of Scripture, which provides significant common ground for understanding Mary's theological importance. The volume Mary in the New Testament (1978), produced by a team of Catholic and Lutheran scholars, broke through ignorance on this score, delineating wide areas of agreement about biblical material while identifying other areas where later ecclesial traditions diverged. Inviting participation by interested persons from different churches, Catholic international Mariological congresses in Saragossa, Spain (1979), Malta (1983), and Kevelaer, Germany (1987) produced noteworthy statements of agreement regarding Mary's role in the incarnation and salvation history. The English-speaking Ecumenical Society of the Blessed Virgin Mary, founded in 1967, promotes study and devotion in an inter-church setting; its published papers reflect growing rapprochement.

As the twentieth century ended, two high-profile dialogues on Mary made exceptional contributions. From 1983 to 1990 the U.S. Lutheran-Catholic Dialogue discussed the person and role of Mary in the context of Christ, who is the one mediator, and the whole communion of saints. The published study (Anderson 1992) contains a common statement of convergences and divergences explained by historical background and buttressed by 15 supporting papers. In France the interconfessional body of 40 theologians known as the Groups des Dombes issued a two-part study (1999) based on biblical, historical, and systematic theological analysis. While each of these dialogues took place in the venue of particular nations, the incisive character of their final documents has had international impact.

The substance of agreement about Mary in ecumenical dialogue finds the Catholic and Protestant traditions together at the very center of Christian faith as expressed in Scripture and creed. As the woman whose "yes" to God's invitation brought about the birth of the Messiah "for us and for our salvation," her story has significance for both Christ and the church. Her historic pregnancy is a bulwark of his genuine humanity against all DOCETISM; the title THEOTOKOS affirmed at the Council of EPHESUS signals that the one she bore is indeed the Son of God. At the same time her own life, fraught with difficulties, was a "journey of faith" from Nazareth to Bethlehem to Jerusalem. In this she is a type and outstanding model of the church as it seeks to follow Christ on the path of discipleship. This is more than example, however. LUTHER's insight that Mary embodied God's unmerited grace signals the fundamental relationship of faith in which every believer stands. Thus reference to Mary is not merely ornamental but serves to solidify profession of faith in the incarnation and to guide active living according to the gospel.

Serious differences remain, rooted in differing Catholic and Protestant historical experiences, sensibilities, and spiritualities. Of these, four stand out. One is the Catholic interpretation that Mary cooperated with grace and thereby with God's plan of salvation. This contradicts Protestant understanding of the relation between divine grace and human freedom in which the human will is totally dependent on God's initiative and can do nothing on its own merit apart from Christ. Another issue is the perpetual virginity of Mary, insisted upon by Catholic teaching but not clearly attested in Scripture and not considered essential by Protestants for appreciating Mary's holiness. Even more thorny is the issue of the two Marian dogmas defined by popes in the past two centuries: the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION (1854) and the ASSUMPTION (1950). Not only are the grounds in Scripture for these beliefs highly debatable, and not only do they appear to Protestant eyes to place Mary on a level with Christ, but they issued forth by infallible papal decree. Thus they are inseparably united with the question of authority in the church, which in these two instances Protestants judge to have bound consciences without legitimate warrant.

A final issue, perhaps the most nettlesome because connected with popular piety, is the practice of invocation, or calling upon Mary in her mediating role as an intercessor. To the Protestant mind, this is nothing short of religiously dangerous for in addition to not being commanded in Scripture it tends to displace the heart's trust from Christ to Mary, and thus substitute her for the One who alone is mediator. To the Catholic mind, however, Mary and all the saints form a community with us in Christ; pilgrimages, shrines, the rosary, the "Hail Mary," and myriad artistic representations are concrete ways of expressing solidarity together in intercession before God (see MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO).

The question now emerges of whether any of these obstacles needs to be finally church dividing. Dialogue groups note the need for a process of conversion—Catholics from uncritical engagement in excessive Marian expressions, Protestants from unwarranted silence and atrophied devotion toward Mary's role in Scripture and creed, and both toward respectful acceptance of legitimate differences. The process of dialogue itself seems to indicate that not uniformity but ecumenical conversion toward the Spirit-inspired insights of each other will overcome the effects of centuries of divisive opposition over teaching and devotional practice regarding Mary.

Bibliography: G. ANDERSON et al., eds., The One Mediator, the Saints, and Mary: Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue VIII (Minneapolis, 1992). R. BROWN et al., eds., Mary in the New Testament: A Collaborative Assessment by Protestant and Roman Catholic Scholars (New York, Philadelphia 1978). GROUPE DES DOMBES, Marie dans le dessein de Dieu et la communion des saints (Paris 1999). J. MACQUARRIE, Mary for All Christians (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1990). H. KÜNG and J. MOLTMANN, eds., Mary in the Churches (New York 1983). T. O'MEARA, Mary in Protestant and Catholic Theology (New York 1966). J. PELIKAN et al., Mary: Images of the Mother of Jesus in Jewish and Christian Perspective (Philadelphia 1986). A. STACPOOLE, ed., Mary's Place in Christian Dialogue (Wilton, Conn. 1982). G. TAVARD, The Thousand Faces of the Virgin Mary (Collegeville, Minn. 1996). S. ZIMDARS-SCHWARTZ, Encountering Mary: From LaSalette to Medjugorje (Princeton 1991).

[E. A. JOHNSON]

MARY DE CERVELLÓN, ST.

Mercedarian foundress; b. Barcelona, Spain, Dec. 1, 1230; d. Barcelona, Sept. 19, 1290. Born of the noble family of Cervelló, Mary was educated at home and directed by Bernardo de Corbera, the first Mercedarian priest. After making a vow of chastity at 18, she began to wear the Mercedarian habit at home. After her parents died she established the second order of MERCEDARIANS, devoted to an active apostolate toward the sick and the poor. She reputedly enjoyed gifts of counsel and prophecy, and foretold the outcome of battles and her own death. She had thaumaturgic powers, especially toward seamen in danger who called her Sor María del Socos (Sra. Mary of Help) and frequently claimed they saw her (at the time in deep ecstasy in her convent) walking on the waters or hovering over their stricken ships. Her body, buried in the Mercedarian church in Barcelona, was found to be incorrupt and was exposed for public veneration in 1904 and 1939. Her cultus was confirmed in 1692. She is depicted in art holding an oar or a ship.

Feast: Sept. 19.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 7:152–171. Enciclopedia del la Religión Católica, ed. R. D. FERRERES et al. (Barcelona 1950–56) 5:108–109. V. VIETTI, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 2:838.

[C. M. AHERNE]

MARY IMMACULATE, SISTERS SERVANTS OF

(SSMI, Official Catholic Directory #3610); a congregation in the UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (EASTERN CATHOLIC), founded in Western Ukraine on Aug. 15 1892, under the guidance of Rev. Jeremias Lomnitskyj, a member of the Basilian Fathers (Byzantine), and Rev. Cyril Seletskyj, a diocesan priest who provided the first house for the sisters in Zhuzhel. Nine sisters started their novitiate in that house under the spiritual direction of the Basilian fathers. In 1893 the novitiate was transferred to the town of Krystynopil. The metropolitan of Lvov, Cardinal Silvester Sembratovych, approved the first sketch of the constitutions on May 5, 1892. Later the constitutions were enlarged and approved in 1907 by the metropolitan of Lvov, Andrew Sheptyckyj. In Rome the Congregation for the Oriental Church granted initial approval in 1932, and final approbation was given by Pius XII in 1956. The first superior general of the congregation (Veronica Gargil) was elected at the general chapter held in Lvov in 1934. The sisters established their first foundation in the United States in Stamford, Conn., in 1938. The general motherhouse was later located at

"The Repentant St. Mary Magdalene," surrounded by eight scenes from her life, 13th-century Tuscan painting.

Rome. The U.S. regional headquarters is in Sloatsburg, NY.

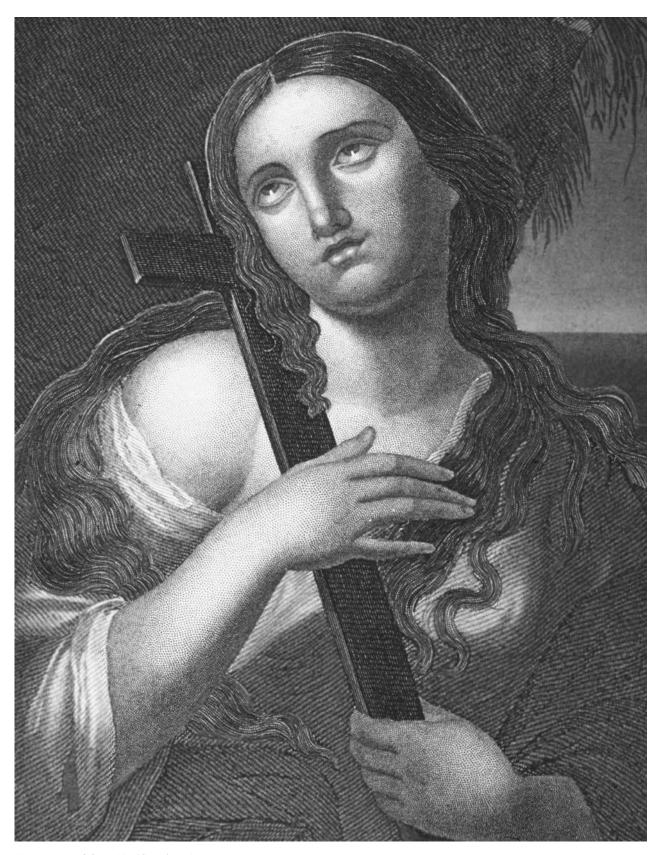

The purposes of the congregation are to educate children and youth; nurse and care for the sick and aged in hospitals and homes for the aged; care for orphans and the homeless; do pastoral ministry and social work.

[M. M. WOJNAR/EDS.]

MARY MAGDALENE, ST.

A holy woman who ministered to Jesus and His disciples during His public ministry (Lk 8.2–3) and who, according to Jn 20.1–2, 11–18 (see also Mk 16.9–11), was the first person to see the empty tomb and the resurrected Christ. She has been identified, without adequate justification, with the repentant woman of Lk 7.36–50 and with Mary of Bethany (Jn ch. 11).

Life and Character. Mary was a native of Magdala, a prosperous and somewhat infamous fishing village on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, four miles north of Tiberias. Sometime after she had been freed by Jesus from a demoniac possession by seven devils-an expression that probably describes a violent and chronic nervous disorder, rather than a sinful state-she and other women gave of their own wealth and service to provide for the material needs of Jesus' apostolic company (Lk 8.2–3). In the Passion narratives of the Synoptic Gospels Mary was a witness to Jesus' Crucifixion and burial (Mt 27.55-56, 61; Mk 15.40, 47; Lk 23.49-56; 24.10); in John's account of the Passion she stood near the cross with Jesus' mother and the Beloved Disciple (Jn 19.25–26). When she came, with other women, to anoint Jesus' corpse on Easter morning, she received the Resurrection proclamation from angels and the commission to transmit it to the APOSTLES (Mk 16.1-8 and parallels). Finally, she actually saw the risen Lord, who personally told her to report His Resurrection to His brothers (Mt 28.9-10; Jn 20.16-18). God thus exalted her kind service for the apostolic college to the highest ministry, the proclaiming of Jesus' victory over death to the Apostles and, through them, to the world.

St. Mary Magdalene. (Archive Photos)

Mary's character appears in the Gospels as that of a practical woman, anxious to serve Jesus and His Apostles. Since, along with her companions, she was prevented from completing Jesus' burial anointing because of the SABBATH (Mk 15.42; Jn 19.42), she returned to the tomb, as soon as permissible, to perform this service (Mk 16.1). Immediately on finding the empty tomb, thinking that Jesus' corpse had been stolen, she reported the fact to the Eleven (Jn 20.2). Later, when she saw Jesus, she was still searching for a corpse to be anointed (Jn 20.14-15). Only after Jesus pronounced her name, probably in a familiar way, did she "turn" from looking for a dead body to see and recognize the living "Rabboni," the Master who could no longer be "detained" on earth by her material and emotional service, but who must now be served by her proclamation to the Apostles that He had ascended to His God and Father and theirs (Jn 20.16–18).

These are not the actions of a contemplative and impractical person like Mary of Bethany who, because of her mystical grasp of the life-through-death mystery of Christ, had already anointed Jesus for His burial a week before He died (Jn 12.1–8), nor those of a penitent woman who on one occasion had gratefully shown so much affection to Jesus when He forgave her all her sins (Lk 7.36–50). They are the actions of a practical, material-minded woman, not given to mystical reverie, who would be an unshakable witness to the Resurrection and who reported it in a most matter-of-fact way, "I have seen the Lord, and these things he said to me" (Jn 20.18).

False Identification with Other Women. One can understand why a commentator could have inadvertently identified Luke's sinful woman of ch. 7 with Mary of Bethany, as, in fact, Tertullian did (De pudicitia, 11.2), for each were said to have anointed Jesus' feet and wiped them dry with her hair, while He was reclining at a banquet (Lk 7.38, 46; Jn 12.3). A more careful commentator such as Origen clearly distinguished between the two anointings and the different women involved (In Matthaeum, series 77). It is more difficult to understand how the repentant sinner, and therefore Mary of Bethany, following Tertullian, was identified with Mary Magdalene by Gregory the Great (Hom. 25.1.10), since St. Luke introduces Mary by name immediately after finishing the story of the penitent woman, whose name he either does not know or wishes not to reveal. Following Gregory, the Latin Church, generally but not universally, has continued to identify the three women and honors them and their different virtues under the title of St. Mary Magdalene on July 22. Following Origen, the Greek churches honor them, more appropriately, as separate and distinct saints. The late legend that Mary Magdalene, combining the virtues of repentant sinner, contemplative, and practical servant who was the primary witness of the Resurrection, was miraculously transported to southern France in an oarless boat deserves no credence.

Most modern Scripture scholars agree with Origen's opinion that the anointings in Luke and John (see also Mt 26.6-13; Mk 14.3-9) were distinct happenings, despite their partial and mutual assimilation (the anointing of the feet in Luke and John in contrast to that of the head in Matthew and Mark) by oral transmission. Further, they hold that the anointings described in John, Matthew, and Mark were the same occurrence, although there is an apparent chronological inexactness in Mark and Matthew (cf. Mt 26.2 and Mk 14.1 with Jn 12.1). The anointings were made in different places, Luke's in Galilee, John's in Judea; were performed by different women, a repentant, notorious sinner in Luke, an old and very close friend of Jesus in John; and had different purposes, the expression of a loving, tearful gratitude to Jesus for His having forgiven the sinner in view of her great faith, in Luke, the solemn and tearless honoring of Jesus for Lazarus' resurrection and the preparing of His body for burial, in John. Mary of Bethany was certainly not Luke's penitent, therefore, although she may have heard of her poignant gratitude and been prompted to imitate it.

The reasons for not identifying Mary of Magdala with Mary of Bethany are clear also, especially in John's Gospel. There the two Marys are patently distinguished one from the other and given markedly different roles to play in the inexorable movement toward the Johannine concept of Jesus' glorification, which included both His Passion and His Resurrection. Mary of Bethany apparently had a mystical premonition of His death and its victorious value; the Magdalene could only weep because of His stolen corpse, and the duties still to be done for it, until, through His voice calling her name, she was convinced by her senses, as was Thomas (Jn 20.24–27), that He had conquered death.

Iconography. Because the Latin Church fused the characteristics of the nameless penitent with the other two women and because the story of her conversion is so appealing and beautiful, most of the Christian art depicting Mary Magdalene portrays her as a penitent weeping at Jesus' feet. However, there are ancient examples of Resurrection scenes on ampullae, stone coffins, and various other materials, in which Mary can be clearly distinguished as the first witness of the RESURRECTION. She was often depicted carrying a vase and with her hair flowing freely. From the medieval period many of her images were inspired by the numerous popular legends that spread from southern France to all of Europe.

Feast: July 22.

Bibliography: V. SAXER, Le Culte de Marie Magdeleine en Occident des origenes à fin du moyen âge, 2 v. (Paris 1959). P. KETTER, The Magdalene Question, tr. H. C. KOEHLER (Milwaukee 1935). K. KÜNSTLE, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst (Freiburg 1926–28) 2:426–433. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 2.2:556–559; 3.2:846–859. Anchor Bible Dictionary 4 (New York 1992) 579–581. C. M. GRASSI and J. A. GRASSI, Mary Magdalene and the Women in Jesus' Life (Kansas City 1986).

[J. E. FALLON]

kissed the relic of the cross; she was moved to seek a solitude beyond the Jordan, where she did penance for her sins. After some 47 years Zosimus, a priest and monk, met her there; she called him by his name and asked him to meet her at the Jordan on Holy Thursday evening with the Holy Eucharist. Zosimus did so and was met by Mary, who walked upon the waters to his side of the river. She received Communion and asked that he come within the following year to the spot where he had first met her. There he found her corpse and beside it, written in the sand, a request for burial with the explanation that she had died the evening he gave her Holy Communion.

Feast: April 2 (Roman Martyrology); April 1 (Greek Church).

Bibliography: J. GAMMACK, Dictionary of Christian Biography (London 1877–87) 3:830. F. L. CROSS, Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church 868. Acta sanctorum Apr 1:68-90. Bibliographica hagiographica latina (Brussels 1898-1901) 5415-21. Bibliotheca hagiographica orientalis (Brussels 1910) 683-687. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 10.2:2128–36. Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 435. A. B. BUJILA, ed., La Vie de sainte Marie l'Égyptienne (Ann Arbor, Mich. 1949). A. BUT-LER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:14-16. M. S. DE CRUZ-SÁENZ, The life of Saint Mary of Egypt: An Edition and Study of the Medieval French and Spanish Verse Redactions (Barcelona 1979). S. BRUSAMOLINO ISELLA, ed., La leggenda di santa Maria egiziaca (Milan 1992). The Legend of Mary of Egypt in Medieval Insular Hagiography, ed. E. POPPE and B. ROSS (Blackrock, Co. Dublin 1996).

[E. D. CARTER]

MARY OF EGYPT, ST.

Penitent and ascetic; b. probably 344; d. c. 421. An early account of Mary of Egypt is in CYRIL OF SCYTHOPOLIS's Life of Cyriacus (ed. E. Schwartz, Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 49.2:233.4–234.19). It was developed in legendary fashion by later Byzantine hagiographers using details from JEROME's Life of Paul the Hermit, and was falsely attributed to SOPHRONIUS of Jerusalem (634–638). A similar story was told by John Moschus (Pratum Spirituale); and JOHN DAMASCENE quoted the developed Life of St. Mary of Egypt, apparently regarding it as authentic.

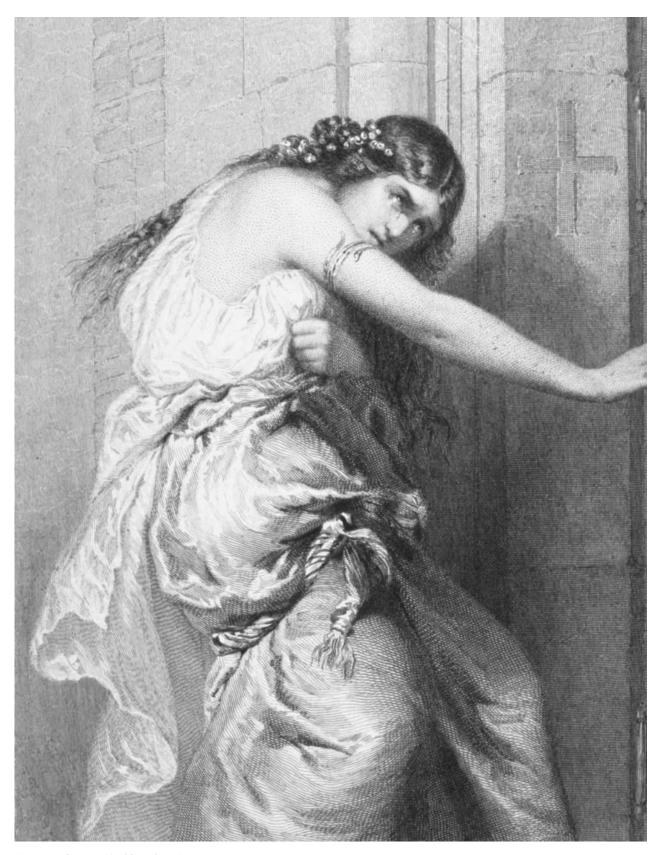

Mary led an evil life in Alexandria for seventeen years after the age of twelve; then she accompanied a pilgrimage to Palestine for further adventure. In Jerusalem, on the Feast of the Exaltation of the Cross, she joined the crowd converging on the church in which the sacred relic was being venerated; but she was repelled by some secret force when she attempted to enter the church. In the courtyard of the church, near a statue of the Blessed Virgin Mary, she promised to repent her evil ways if allowed to enter the church. Her prayer was granted, and she

MARY OF OIGNIES, BL.

Mystic; b. Nivelles, Brabant, 1177; d. Oignies, June 23, 1213. Married at 14, she persuaded her husband to distribute their possessions, to practice continence, and to assist her in nursing lepers in their house. Her mystical life, conversation, and miracles attracted so much attention that, with the consent of her husband, she moved to Oignies, where she could live under the direction of the Augustinian canons. James de Vitry, later cardinal, was her director and considered her his spiritual mother. Since he is a reliable witness of sober judgment, his account of her unusual gifts (which perhaps would now be called psychic) and of her miracles is not unworthy of credit. Mary is important with other mystics among the BE-GUINES in anticipating the change in Catholic devotion, which is usually associated with the FRANCISCANS, in particular the development of devotion to the Passion of Christ and to the Holy Eucharist.

Feast: June 23.

Bibliography: JACQUES DE VITRY, Vita, Acta Sanctorum June 5:547–572. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURS-

St. Mary of Egypt. (Archive Photos)

TON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:623–626. J. L. BAU-DOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 6:384–386. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 2:5516–17. I. GEYER, Maria von Oignies: eine hochmittelalterliche Mystikerin zwischen Ketzerei und Rechtgläubigkeit (Frankfurt am Main 1992).

[M. J. BARRY]

MARY OF ST. JOSEPH SALAZAR

Associate of St. TERESA OF AVILA and writer; b. Toledo, 1548; d. Cuerva, Oct. 19, 1603. She came of a noble family linked with the ducal house of Medinacelli. As a child she entered the service of Doña Luisa de la Cuerda in Toledo where, at the age of 14, she met Teresa. Attracted to the Teresian enterprise by Teresa herself, Mary took the habit (May 6, 1570) and made her profession at Malagon (June 10, 1571). Teresa took her to her new foundation of Beas (1565), then to Seville (1565–66). The many extant letters of St. Teresa to Mary testify to the great affection and love that the mother foundress had for her. After the death of St. Teresa, Mary made the foundation of the Lisbon house (1588), where she soon became very popular. In 1603 she was sent to the new foundation of Talavera and Cuerva. Her writings remained unpublished until 1913, when they were published at Burgos in a single volume. They are unpretentious and of no great importance from a spiritual point of view. However, they do possess considerable historical value because of what she has to say about St. Teresa, especially in the declaration she made in the process of beatification.

Bibliography: SILVERIO DE SANTA TERESA, Historia del Carmen Descalzo en España, Portugal y América, 15 v. (Burgos 1935–49) 8:436–454. A short introduction to her writings by Silverio de Santa Teresa contained in MARÍA DE SAN JOSÉ, Libro de Recreaciones, Ramillete de Mirra, Avisos, Máximas y Poesías (Burgos 1913).

[O. RODRIGUEZ]

MARY REPARATRIX, SOCIETY OF

The Society of Mary Reparatrix (SMR) is a religious community of women with papal approbation in the spirituality of St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA. The sisters engage in contemplative prayer, catechetics, retreats and spiritual direction, pastoral ministries, social outreach, and making altar breads.

The foundress of the congregation was Baroness Emilie d'Hooghvorst (1818–78), daughter of Count d'Oultremont of Liège, Belgium, later (1840) Belgian minister to the Holy See. At 19 years of age Emilie was married to Baron Victor d'Hooghvorst. She bore four children before her husband's early death ten years later. Two of her children subsequently joined Mother Mary of Jesus (Emilie's name in religion) in establishing her community. Under the spiritual direction of the Jesuits, particularly that of Paul Ginhac (1824–95), the Society of Mary Reparatrix was canonically established in Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine, in May of 1857. The congregation later made foundations throughout Europe and in the Americas. The generalate is in Rome; the U.S. provincialate is in Riverview, Michigan.

[M. LAVIN/EDS.]

MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS

Oueen Consort of France, Queen of Scotland; b. Linlithgow Castle, Scotland, Dec. 7, 1542; d. Fotheringay Castle, England, Feb. 8, 1587. As the daughter of James V of Scotland and Mary Guise, she became queen when six days old, and at ten months (September 1542) was crowned by Cardinal Beaton. During her minority Scotland faced frequent invasions from HENRY VIII, who deployed a policy known as the "Rough Wooing," to try to secure Mary as bride for his son Edward VI. To safeguard Scotland's traditional alliance with France, her Guise uncles arranged her betrothal to the Dauphin Francis and in 1548 she was brought to France for her own safety. Here she became admired for her linguistic abilities and charm. In 1559, one year after her marriage, she became Queen Consort of France and also laid claim to the crowns of England and Ireland on the grounds of the illegitimacy of her cousin Elizabeth. Elizabeth's reply was quick and decisive. Soon after her accession in the same year, she sent armed aid to Scotland's Protestants who soon overturned the Catholic policies of Mary's mother, Mary of Guise. In December 1560 Mary was widowed, and despite the troubles in Scotland, she remained in France trying to find a suitable husband. In August 1561, she finally returned to face a country badly divided by religious strife. Although Mary was a nominal Catholic, she initially proclaimed her intention not to interfere with the religious status quo in the country. She promulgated an edict of toleration that led to violent diatribes from John KNOX and Scotland's growing Protestant faction on the one side and from Scottish Catholics on the other. In 1562, the lives of two of her Catholic advisors, her chaplain and the Jesuit Nicholas de Gouda, a papal observer and advisor sent to Mary by Pius IV, were threatened. As a result of the confused religious and political situation in these early years of her reign, Mary relied on her half-brother, James, Earl of Moray, and her secretary, William Maitland, to administer her government. The Protestant policies both pursued angered Scotland's Catholics.

Marriage to Lord Darnley. In 1565, Mary married Henry Stewart, Lord Darnley, following a long search for a suitable spouse. Darnley proved a poor choice. Politically inept and a drunkard, his status as a nominal Catholic irritated Moray, Maitland, and Scotland's Protestant nobles. Their union did produce an heir (the future James VI of Scotland and I of England) but otherwise proved disastrous and was marked by numerous intrigues. Darnley's weak and quarrelsome nature made many enemies and the murder of Mary's devoted secretary, Rizzio, alienated her as well. During the years that Mary was married to Darnley her policies first favored Catholics and then Protestants. Finally, the Queen came under the influence of James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, who saw the removal of Darnley as his path to power. Mary persuaded Darnley, recovering from severe illness, to go with her to Kirk-o-Field, near Edinburgh, to rest in a rented house, while she, under Bothwell's escort, moved on to Holyrood Palace. In the early morning of Feb. 10, 1567, the house was blown up and Darnley killed. Although her opponents implicated Mary and accused her officially of murdering her husband, 20th-century scholarship has cast doubt on her guilt. The evidence is too contradictory for a definitive judgment.

Coercion by Bothwell. Bothwell was charged after a superficial inquiry and the Queen now came under his influence. In order to secure his marriage to Mary he obtained a divorce from the Protestant Kirk Courts, apparently with the collusion of his wife, Lady Jane Gordon. On May 15, 1567, Bothwell married Mary in a Protestant ceremony, but his triumph was short-lived. The couple quarreled and Scotland's Protestant lords, Bothwell's former allies, rose in armed revolt. In June they defeated Mary's forces at Carberry Hill and she surrendered on condition of being treated as a sovereign. Bothwell escaped, later fleeing to Denmark where he was imprisoned and died insane. In the meantime, Mary, too, escaped her captors, raised an army, and was defeated in May 1568. She signed an abdication that named Moray regent.

Imprisonment in England. Having fled to England, she refused to vindicate herself of complicity in Darnley's murder except before Elizabeth in person. Elizabeth commanded that she was to be treated with respect but, to prevent her becoming the rallying point of English Catholics in the north, she was to be kept under close guard. She was imprisoned for 19 years. Cecil's immediate plan was to put her on trial, producing at York and Westminster the so-called Casket Letters, alleged to have been written to Bothwell by Mary and which blatantly in-criminate her both in the Darnley murder and in sexual subjection to Bothwell. The authenticity of the letters was then (as now still) hotly contested, and an open verdict returned, which was generally accepted as one of not guilty (January 1569). In the wake of this acquittal, Mary considered plans for another marriage, with Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk. In November and December 1569 Northern English Catholics rose in support of Mary, but the revolt quickly collapsed. The following February Pope St. PIUS V hoped to encourage rebellion by excommunicating Elizabeth, but this show of support came too late and ultimately had the reverse effect. Norfolk, implicated in the schemes of Ridolfi, an Italian banker, to finance a Spanish invasion, was executed in June 1572. Parliament petitioned for Mary's head, but Elizabeth prudently declined, while ordering a close guard on her cousin, whose liberty would always prove a threat to the throne. For the next 14 years, Mary was implicated in a number of ill-conceived plans for revolt and she was moved from place to place in conditions of increasing harshness. In January 1586, a plot to set her free and assassinate Elizabeth was uncovered. The chief conspirators, Anthony Babington, Mary's former page and John Ballard, a priest, were executed, and Mary's complicity in the scheme was revealed to Walsingham.

Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots.

Trial and Execution. Mary was moved to Fotheringay Castle and put on trial on Oct. 14–15, 1586. She was condemned, and Elizabeth eventually signed the warrant of execution. That document referred to her as "Mary Stuart, commonly called Queen of Scotland," her royal status denied in the warrant of execution that beheaded her on Feb. 8, 1587. Before her death she reputedly praised God for the privilege of dying for the "honour of his name and of his Church, Catholic, Apostolic and Roman." Mary Stuart may have long been accepted in some quarters as a martyr for the Catholic cause, but recent historical scholarship has been less charitable in that regard. Scholars have questioned the depth of Mary's religious commitment, and they have treated her as a tragic figure, who lacked political competence and judgment.

Bibliography: Mary Stuart remains, in a phrase attributed to Elizabeth, "the Daughter of Debate," so that historical judgment on her is vast, continuous, and still not definitive. A. BELLESHEIM, History of the Catholic Church of Scotland, tr. D. O. HUNTER-BLAIR 4 v. (Edinburgh 1887-90) v.3. S. S. MACNALTY, Mary, Queen of Scots (New York 1961). G. R. TURNER, Mary Stuart: Forgotten Forgeries (London 1933), all four translations of the Casket Letters in parallel columns; also the Simonds and Conference Letters; notes and comments on the opinion of various authors concerning Mary. T.F. HENDERSON, Mary, Queen of Scots, 2 v. (New York 1905), best complete scholarly biography. A. M. MACKENZIE, The Scotland of Queen Mary and the Religious Wars, 1513-1638 (London 1936). T. F. HENDERSON, Dictionary of National Biography (London 1885-1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908-09, 1921-22, 1938; suppl. 1901-) 12:1258-75. J. H. POLLEN, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907-14; suppl. 1922) 9:764-766. G. DONALDSON, All the Queen's Men (London 1983). A. FRASER, Mary Queen of Scots (London 1969). M. LYNCH, Mary Stewart. Queen in Three Kingdoms (Oxford 1988). J. WOR-MALD, Mary Queen of Scots: A Study in Failure (London 1988).

[G. ALBION/P. SOERGEL]

MARY TUDOR, QUEEN OF ENGLAND

Reigned, July 6, 1553, to Nov. 17, 1558; b. Feb. 18, 1516; d. Nov. 17, 1558. She was the only surviving child of HENRY VIII and CATHERINE OF ARAGON. Henry had hoped for a son who would perpetuate the fledgling Tudor dynasty. Although disappointed, he was sanguine. "We are both young," he told the Venetian ambassador, Giustinian. "If it is a daughter this time, by the grace of God the sons will follow."

Early Years. Henry, 25, and Catherine, 31, took the greatest interest and delight in their infant daughter. Both sovereigns were devout Catholics. The king was an enthusiastic sportsman, generous, affable, much concerned about theological questions, dedicated to peace, and universally beloved by his subjects. The queen was well educated and practiced an uncompromising austerity that was remarkable for a Renaissance sovereign. She fasted regularly and was accustomed to having religious books read to her. Henry and Catherine selected as Mary's first governess a widow of considerable discretion, Margaret POLE, Countess of Salisbury. Until she was 12, Mary's health and education were a constant concern of her parents. She received an excellent musical training and spoke French, Latin, Italian, and Spanish with great fluency. She was well versed in the writings of St. Ambrose and St. Augustine. When Henry expressed his desire to have his marriage to Catherine annulled so that he might marry Anne Boleyn, Mary opposed him.

"During the protracted proceedings of the marriage controversy, both Mary and her mother faced their adversities with dignity." Early in the following year, 1533, Abp. Thomas CRANMER, who had succeeded Cardinal Thomas WOLSEY, pronounced Henry's marriage invalid, making Mary technically illegitimate. With the early arrival of Anne Boleyn's child, the future Queen ELIZABETH I, Mary was no longer recognized as princess of Wales and the identity badges worn by her lackeys on their coats were removed. In the years between the divorce and the execution of Anne Boleyn, Mary's life was unpleasant. She was estranged from her father, because of her support of Catherine's cause. While her father did send his physician to attend her when she was ill, Henry refused to allow Catherine to visit Mary. When Catherine died in 1536, court officials finally were able to secure Mary's signature to a document in which she renounced the pope's "pretended authority" and acknowledged that her mother's marriage had been unlawful. Before signing the document though, Mary made a secret prostration that she acted only under compulsion.

Once again restored to her father's good graces, Mary passed the days pleasantly at court with her books, embroidery, and music. This period of peaceful obscurity ended abruptly with her father's death in 1547. Her sickly half-brother, Edward, son of Henry VIII and Jane Seymour, inherited the kingship at 11, but the real power was exercised by Jane's brother, Edward Seymour, the Protestant Duke of Somerset. The old order was changing inexorably. Frequent attempts were made to force Mary, next in line to the throne, to conform to the new innovations in religion. She refused. Edward VI sent a special commission to insist upon compliance. Mary promised obedience in all things except the novel religious services. The new bishop of London, Nicholas RIDLEY, offered to preach before her. She declined to listen to him or to read any books she regarded as heretical.

Queen Mary I. In 1553 Edward became seriously ill and the ambitious John Dudley, duke of Northumberland, who had gained an ascendancy over the council, persuaded the dying boy to set aside Mary's right to the throne, because it would mean a Catholic restoration, and to name as his successor Lady Jane Grey, a descendant of Henry VIII's sister Mary. Lady Jane became the bride of Northumberland's fourth son, Guilford Dudley, and Northumberland exerted heavy pressure on many prominent men to join the treasonable conspiracy. When Edward died, Lady Jane was proclaimed queen. Nine days later, Mary, having rallied a considerable force, marched on London. The vast majority of the English people decided in her favor and Northumberland's plot collapsed. Lady Jane Grey and her husband were confined to the Tower and later executed. Northumberland was beheaded but other traitors retained their freedom or were allowed to go into retirement. Mary's leniency was partly responsible for Sir Thomas Wyatt's rebellion, early in 1554, in opposition to the proposed marriage of Mary and PHILIP II of Spain. Queen Mary was 38, small, plain and shortsighted. Yet she organized the defense of London and the uprising was put down with little bloodshed. Only about 100 of the ordinary rebels were executed.

Mary Tudor believed that she was predestined and preserved by God for the throne in order that she might be His instrument for the reestablishment of Catholicism. Her principal adviser in religious matters, Cardinal Reginald POLE, declared that it was not enough that she honor God; she must compel her subjects to do likewise and punish the disobedient in virtue of the authority she had received from God. The papal legate expressed the dominant philosophy of the 16th century regarding nonconformity in religion: heresy and schism must be overcome—by peaceful means if possible, by force as a last resort.

Early in her brief reign, Mary was confronted by an indifferent laity, a nobility gorged with abbey lands, a vacillating hierarchy, and a nondescript but intransigent Protestant minority. She proceeded cautiously. It is significant, for example, that the arrival of Cardinal Pole in London was delayed for an entire year after Mary came to power because a violent anti-Catholic reaction was feared.

First of all, the religious legislation of Edward's reign had to be voided. This was followed by the parliamentary repeal of the antipapal legislation of Henry VIII. Finally, papal supremacy was grudgingly acknowledged in England only on condition that confiscated ecclesiastical property in private hands would not be restored to the Church. In a great variety of ways the queen sought to revitalize and strengthen Catholicism in her realm. She called for an active missionary apostolate to acquaint the people with the true nature of the Catholic religion. She secured the return of many English friars who, to avoid earlier persecutions, had been exiles in Flanders. She rebuilt and reestablished hospitals, churches, and monasteries. She subsidized ecclesiastics who had been deprived of their revenues. She sought to allay religious antagonisms, hoping that the passage of time and a policy of leniency, rather than severe punishment, would mitigate the rage of some ardent nonconformists. Her efforts, while aiding the Church, further antagonized the hard core of Protestant resistance. Accordingly, an obsequious Parliament revived the old laws against heresy.

Mary Tudor, Queen of England.

Religious innovations had brought nothing but grief to Mary Tudor in the reigns of her father and half-brother. Heresy, in her single-minded outlook, was an evil thing. In the following year a Catholic episcopal synod was convened to re-establish the Roman Church in England and a Protestant plot was unearthed. The number of executions rose to 90. In 1557, 70 were put to death, and in the final eleven months of Mary's reign in 1558, another 40 perished.

The specter of Mary's persecutions of Protestants survived long after her reign. John Foxe (1517–1587) was the first in a long line of Protestants martyrologists to celebrate the lives and deaths of the Marian matyrs in his Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Times (1570). His work, like many of this genre, called upon nationalist sentiments to denigrate Mary's attempt to re-establish Catholicism and praised the Elizabethan religious settlement. In truth, it must be admitted that Mary's relgious policies did re-invigorate Catholic beliefs in England and sustained the Church's tradition into the reign of Elizabeth I. In addition, the Marian period was marked by a number of positive social and economic developments. Mary tried to reverse the course of inflation and to revalue the country's debased currency. She made strides in dealing with England's deficits, its poverty, and its trade problems. Many of these successes have been credited, not to Mary, but to her half-sister Elizabeth, proof that her record as queen will likely continue to be overshadowed by the persecution she unleashed.

Bibliography: H. F. M. PRESCOTT, Mary Tudor (rev. ed. New York 1953). E. H. HARBISON, Rival Ambassadors at the Court of Queen Mary (Princeton 1940). P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. in 1 (5th, rev. ed. New York 1963) v. 2. B. WHITE, Mary Tudor (New York 1935). J. M. STONE, The History of Mary I: Queen of England (New York 1901). W. SCHENK, Reginald Pole, Cardinal of England (New York 1950). G. R. ELTON, England under the Tudors (London 1955). H. C. WHITE, Tudor Books of Saints and Martyrs (Madison 1963). G. MATTINGLY, Catherine of Aragon (Boston 1941). J. D. MACKIE, The Earlier Tudors (Oxford 1952). G. L. M. J. CONSTANT, The Reformation in England, tr. R. E. SCANTLEBURY and E. I. WATKIN, 2 v. (New York 1934-42) v. 1. A. VERMEERSCH, Tolerance, tr. W. H. PAGE (New York 1913). J. GAIRDNER, The English Church in the Sixteenth Century from the Accession of Henry VIII to the Death of Mary (New York 1902). C. READ, The Tudors (New York 1936). J. A. MULLER, Stephen Gardiner and the Tudor Reaction (New York 1926). D. M. LOADES, Mary Tudor (New York 1989). D. M. LOADES, The Reign of Mary Tudor. Politics, Government and Religion in England, 1553-1558 (New York 1979). R. TITTLER, The Reign of Mary I (New York 1991).

[J. J. O'CONNOR]

MARYKNOLL FATHERS AND BROTHERS

The Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America, popularly known as the Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers, is a community of secular priests and lay brothers dedicated to mission work outside the United States, and to education about the meaning and realities of mission. Founded in 1911 by two diocesan priests, James A. WALSH (1867–1936) of Boston and Thomas F. PRICE (1860–1919) of Raleigh, North Carolina, the society today serves in 30 countries. The headquarters and formation center of the society are at Maryknoll, New York, near Ossining, New York.

Organization, Objectives, and Formation. Canonically a society of Apostolic Life of Pontifical Right, the society comprises secular priests, lay brothers, and candidates. Members commit themselves to missionary work by lifetime oath. Rather than seeking members outside the United States, the society has historically promoted within the local churches the development of their own diocesan, religious and lay vocations, and the creation of their own missionary societies. The society describes its missionary activity as "integral evangelization" carried out "through: presence and witness, human promotion and liberation, liturgical life, prayer and contemplation, inter-religious dialogue, and explicit proclamation and catechesis." (General Chapter, 1996). The formation and education of Maryknoll priest and brother candidates includes one year of spiritual discernment and study at Maryknoll, New York, followed by accredited theological and ministry studies. Ministry preparation includes a supervised two-year intern experience overseas in a Maryknoll mission.

Foundation. It was not until 1908 (decree sapienti consilio of Pope PIUS X) that the church in the United States ceased to be administered as a mission territory under the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH. By that time there was a growing concern by many that, despite religious needs at home, U.S. Catholics should assume without delay an active role in the Church's worldwide missionary effort. It was noted that North American Protestants already had several thousand missioners in overseas fields with millions of dollars in support. Catholic missioners from the United States numbered fewer than 18.

One early manifestation of foreign mission interest was the establishment in the United States of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in 1897. A mission fundraising organization based in France, it was well promoted in the archdiocese of Boston under its director Fr. James A. Walsh. In 1904 Walsh attended a meeting of the Catholic Missionary Union in Washington, D.C., where he addressed priests who were leaders in missionary work within the United States, sharing with them his conviction that promotion of foreign missions would also give stimulus to missionary activity at home. Among his hearers was Fr. Thomas F. Price of Raleigh, North Carolina, an itinerant missioner who was struggling to develop a missionary community of secular priests for service in his home state. Price soon began promoting the foreign mission cause in his national magazine Truth. In 1907 Walsh began publishing his own mission magazine, the Field Afar, which urged the establishment of a foreign mission seminary for secular priests of the United States. Among those who assisted in the production of the magazine was Mary J. Rogers, who would later become foundress of the Maryknoll Sisters.

In September 1910 Walsh and Price met again by chance at a Eucharistic Congress in Montreal. Price urged that they take immediate steps themselves to establish a missionary society and seminary. Walsh accepted the challenge. Price conferred with Cardinal James GIBBONS of Baltimore, who was then the dean of the U.S. hierarchy and with whom Price was personally acquainted. Gibbons was immediately favorable to the project and recommended Price to the apostolic delegate, Archbishop Diomede Falconio, who was also favorable and advised that the society and seminary be national, rather than dependent on a diocese. He asked Gibbons to address a formal proposal to the archbishops that could be acted on at their next annual meeting. Walsh and Price drafted a letter to the bishops, and Price personally canvassed several of the bishops for their support of the proposal.

At their meeting at CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY in Washington, D.C., the project was discussed and on April 27, 1911, the archbishops affirmed unanimously: "We heartily approve the establishment of an American Seminary for the Foreign Missions as outlined in the letter sent by his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons." Walsh and Price were instructed "to proceed to Rome without delay, for the purpose of securing all necessary authorization and direction from [the Congregation of] the Propaganda for the proposed work." The two were readily received at the Roman congregation. On June 29, the feast of Saints Peter and Paul, the cardinal prefect, Girolamo Gotti, formally communicated to them papal authorization for the founding of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America. The following day they were received by Pope Pius X who gave them and the society his apostolic blessing.

On their return to the United States, Walsh and Price accepted the invitation of Archbishop John FARLEY to establish the new institution in the archdiocese of New York. After several months in rented quarters in Hawthorne, they acquired a hilltop tract of 93 acres overlooking the Hudson River near Ossining, New York, 35 miles north of New York City. It would become the permanent location of the headquarters and formation facility of the society. Dedicating the site to the Virgin Mary Queen of Apostles, they named it "Maryknoll," a name that would later be shared with the Maryknoll Sisters' Congregation, the Maryknoll Mission Association of the Faithful, and the Maryknoll Affiliates.

Farm buildings provided living facilities, classrooms, and offices for the Field Afar, which now became the official publication of the society. At Price's request Walsh accepted the role of superior, organizing the society and seminary, while Price, aided frequently by Brother Thomas McCann, traveled throughout the East and

A priest sits outside the Maryknoll School reading to a group of children, near Seoul, Korea. (©Horace Bristol/CORBIS)

Middle West making the new society known and seeking vocations and support. In addition to priesthood candidates, the early community included several young laymen who generously contributed their technical skills and would soon become brothers. A small community of dedicated laywomen, led by Rogers, provided voluntary secretarial and other support services.

First Overseas Missions. By 1918 the young society was able to establish its first overseas mission. Frs. James E. Walsh, Francis X. FORD, and Bernard F. Meyer, under the leadership of Fr. Price, were commissioned to Yangjiang (Yeungkong) in Guangdong (Kuangtung) province, south CHINA, a territory ceded to Maryknoll by the Paris Foreign Mission Society. Fr. Price died in 1919 and was succeeded as superior of the mission by Fr. James E. Walsh. Within a few years the area entrusted to Maryknoll, newly based in Jiangmen (Kongmoon), was expanded to include three neighboring territories of Wuzhou (Wuchow), Guilin (Kweilin), and Jiaying (Kaying). In 1927 Fr. James E. Walsh was ordained bishop of the Jiangmen vicariate; Ford became bishop of Jiaying in 1935. In 1925 the society accepted the extensive mission of Fushun, in Manchuria. The society also assumed responsibility for the territory of Pyongyang in northern KOREA (1922), and in 1934 would undertake work in the area of Kyoto in JAPAN. Limited work among Asian immigrants was likewise accepted in Seattle (1920), the Philippines and Hawaii (1927).

During this time the society expanded its facilities in the United States. Construction of the principal part of the major seminary was completed, and with the cooperation of major local dioceses, five preparatory seminary programs, were organized. From 1931 a separate year of spiritual formation for all candidates was introduced.

World War II. At the onset of Japan's attacks on China's coastal cities in 1937, two Maryknoll missioners in southern China were kidnapped but later released. In 1937 Fr. Gerard Donovan was kidnapped in Manchuria by a group seeking ransom money. When this was not forthcoming he was killed (1938). During the war, the policy of the society was that missioners should remain with their people despite the hazards. During 1940 to 1941 Bishop Walsh and his vicar general, Fr. James Drought, at the request of Japanese authorities and the acceptance of the U.S. State Department, provided an unofficial channel for contacts between the two governments in the interest of finding a means of avoiding war. After Japan's attack on the United States at Pearl Harbor in 1941, Maryknollers in Japan, Hong Kong, and the Philippines were promptly interned as enemy aliens. Some remained in prison camps until the end of the war; others were repatriated in exchange for Japanese prisoners. Monsignor Patrick Byrne, head of Maryknoll's mission in Kyoto, was held under house arrest throughout the war. Only missioners in unoccupied inland China were able to continue their work. Two priests died in captivity, another was murdered at the end of the war, presumably by bandits. In the United States, Maryknollers accompanied their West Coast Japanese parishoners in the isolated relocation camps where they were illegally interned.

During this period, Rome encouraged Maryknoll to consider opening missions in Latin America. The first (1942) was in the Vicariate of the Pando in the northern jungle of Bolivia, followed by missions in Chile, Peru, Ecuador, Guatemala, and Mexico (1943)—all areas marked by deep poverty and long lacking adequate pastoral ministry. By 1945 there were 105 Maryknoll priests and brothers working in Latin America.

Postwar Developments. Japan and China. After the war, Maryknoll was able to return to all its Asian missions except Manchuria and northern Korea, which were under the control of the U.S.S.R. In Japan Maryknoll work included substantial relief programs, and mass media advertisement of Christianity. Service in the diocese of Sapporo began in 1954. In China promising new beginnings were soon blocked by the progressive expulsion of all foreign Church personnel by the communist government, which consolidated its control in 1949. Ninety-eight Maryknoll priests and brothers were expelled. Bishop Francis X. Ford was placed on public trial and mistreated; broken in health he died in a Canton prison in 1952. Bishop James E. Walsh, then secretary of the Catholic Central Bureau in Shanghai, a national service of the Chinese bishops, was placed under restrictive surveillance (1951), and later sentenced to 20 years imprisonment. In 1970, on the eve of the visit to the People's Republic of China of U.S. president Nixon, he was released and expelled. Many of the expelled missioners found new work in Hong Kong and Taiwan.

Korea. In 1949 Monsignor Byrne was named apostolic delegate to Korea and ordained archbishop. He was in Seoul when northern troops invaded the capital in June 1950. Taken prisoner with his secretary, Fr. William Booth, he was brought to the northern border where he died of pneumonia during a forced winter march. After service in Seoul and Pusan, the society accepted care of the South Korean dioceses of Inchon and Cheung-Ju (1958).

Philippines. In the Philippines the society, after initial service in Manila and the diocese of Lipa, accepted the territory of Tagum, in Mindanao (1961). In Tanzania (then Tanganyika) east Africa, the society was assigned the new missions of Musoma (1946) and Shinyanga (1954); later the society would also work in Kenya.

In the United States, the postwar period was a time of intensified mission education and recruitment by the society. New films, books, and teaching materials were produced under the direction of Frs. John Considine and Albert Nevins, and aided by Maryknoll sisters. In 1945 Maryknoll Fr. James Keller launched the Christopher Movement. The society had enjoyed steady growth since its foundation, but the post war period was a time of unprecedented increase in candidates for most communities in the United States, including Maryknoll. New preparatory seminaries were constructed and facilities at Maryknoll, New York, were expanded.

Vatican II. In the light of major changes to the Church's understanding of mission that the Second Vatican Council introduced, at its 1966 General Chapter the Maryknoll Society sought to refocus its vision in light of the council's documents and spirit. The General Chapter emphasized the importance of prophetic public witness in the process of evangelization, of the role of laity in mission, of inculturation, interreligious dialogue, action on behalf of justice, and of the ecclesial appropriateness of collegial structures within the society and the Church. Maryknoll brothers were recognized as equal members. Renewal programs were offered to enable the membership to understand the theological and historical factors underlying the new directions. The society upgraded its language schools in Taiwan, Tanzania, the Philippines, and Latin America and opened them to missioners of other communities.

In 1966 the society opened its ranks to include diocesan and religious priests and brothers as limited term associates by contract. In 1972 first steps were taken to incorporate lay associates into the society's missionary activity; in 1995 the Maryknoll Mission Association of the Faithful, largely lay missioners, became a self-governing branch of the Maryknoll family.

In Latin America many Maryknollers, inspired by the Church's social teaching newly articulated by VATI-CAN COUNCIL II, the encyclical Populorum progressio (1967) of Pope PAUL VI and the documents issued by the Latin American bishops at their meeting at MEDELLIN, Colombia (1968), joined in solidarity with the local churches in denouncing injustices and protesting the deepening poverty of the majorities in many countries. Many welcomed the theologies of LIBERATION that, proceeding from a social option for the poor, engaged the Christian conscience in a critical assessment of the factors causing poverty and repression with a view to taking just action for change. Maryknoll's ORBIS BOOKS (1971) became the principal publisher in English of these theologies. Theology and practice from Latin America was soon shared in parts of Asia, especially in the Philippines and Korea. Maryknollers were anguished and challenged by the suffering endured in these years by their people and colleagues, most notably in Central America where defenders of human rights and others were murdered by military and paramilitary forces. Among the Maryknoll victims were Fr. William Woods (1976) and Sisters Maura Clark and Ita Ford (1980), along with Ursuline Sr. Dorothy Kazel and Cleveland diocesan lay missioner Jean Donovan.

New Commitments. Despite its declining numbers, the society has continued to undertake new mission work in the postconciliar period. The first mission entrusted entirely to Maryknoll brothers was opened in Western Samoa (1976); other new society missions included Venezuela (1965), San Salvador (1966), Brazil (1975), Indonesia (1973), Sudan and Bangladesh (1975), Nepal (1977), Yemen (1978–82), Costa Rica (1981), Honduras (1982), Egypt (1981), Palestine (1988), Thailand (1982), Cambodia (1990), Vietnam (1992), and Mozambique (1997). Some of these commitments were temporary; most have had a more specialized focus rather than involving overall care of a diocese or parish. Many were undertaken with the participation of Maryknoll lay associates. In the Middle East and Asia the work has taken the form of human services witnessing to Christian compassion and is marked by sensitivity to other religious traditions. In China, at the request of educational authorities, Maryknollers are assisting students to improve their communication skills in English. In eastern Russia the society is assisting in the rebuilding of devastated Church communities in an ecumenical spirit.

Maryknoll Affiliates. In 1991, in response to many expressions of interest in sharing in some manner in Maryknoll's mission charism in the context of daily living in the United States, the society and the Maryknoll Sisters jointly established a program of Maryknoll affiliates. Participants are mostly, but not exclusively, lay. Organized in local chapters that meet regularly, affiliates determine their own goals and activities reflecting "global vision, spirituality, community and action." They are currently active in a variety of mission-related activities within and outside the United States.

Mission Education. From its center in the United States the society continues to make available mission education materials for all levels. The society's periodicals Maryknoll (continuation of the Field Afar since 1939) and Revista Maryknoll offer ongoing reporting on the missionary activity of Maryknollers and others around the world. The book division, under the imprint of Orbis Books, continues an unbroken tradition of publishing begun by the Maryknoll cofounders. In addition, the society conducts ongoing research on mission-related issues both historical and contemporary, and offers lectures, workshops, and study programs on these subjects. Discernment workshops and other formational services are offered to persons of other communities preparing for cross-cultural ministries.

Bibliography: A. DRIES, "The Foreign Mission Impulse of the American Catholic Church, 1893–1925," International Bulletin of Missionary Research 15:2 (April 1991) 61–66; The Missionary Movement in American Catholic History (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1998). R. A. LANE, The Early Days of Maryknoll (New York 1951). A. J. NEVINS, The Meaning of Maryknoll (New York 1954). G. C. POWERS, The Maryknoll Movement (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1926). P. R. RIVIERA, "Field Found!" Establishing the Maryknoll Mission Enterprise in the United States and China, 1918–1928," Catholic Historical Review 84 (July 1998) 477–517. J.-P. WIEST, Maryknoll in China: A History, 1918–1955 (Armonk, N.Y. 1988; repr. Maryknoll, N.Y. 1997).

[W. D. MCCARTHY]

MARYKNOLL MISSION ASSOCIATION OF THE FAITHFUL

The Maryknoll Mission Association of the Faithful (M.M.A.F.) is a Catholic community of predominantly, but not exclusively, lay men and women, including families, who commit themselves by contract to participate in the global missionary ministry of the Church. The term of the contract is normally three and a half years and is renewable. Today members are engaged in mission in 14 countries. The headquarters of the Association is at Maryknoll, N.Y., near Ossining, N.Y., 35 miles north of New York City. The mission statement of the Association states:

We are a Catholic community of lay, religious and ordained people, including families and children. We participate in the mission of Jesus, serving in cross-cultural ministries in order to create a more just world in solidarity with the poor.

Admission to the M.M.A.F. is open to U.S. citizens and permanent residents according to established norms. There is a four-month period of formation in the United States before language study and work overseas.

History The Association in its present organization was established in 1994, following a history extending from the beginnings of the MARYKNOLL FATHERS AND BROTHERS and the MARYKNOLL SISTERS. The first Maryknoll Brothers initially volunteered their services as laypersons, as did the laywomen who later became Maryknoll Sisters. Later some single men who were not seeking the priesthood or brotherhood but wished to contribute their skills in meeting the society's needs in the United States were accepted into the life of the community under the designation of oblates. In 1922 cofounder Fr. James A. WALSH made a challenging appeal for lay missioners:

Surely there will be generous souls, in numbers proportionate to the grace of God, who may not feel called to devote their entire lives to a religious work, but who would gladly spend a certain time, say five years or more, in teaching on the missions . . . If non-Catholic laymen are willing to make such sacrifices, is it too much to expect of the Catholic? . . . It should be our business now to prepare an organization that will enable us to accept such volunteers and utilize their services . . . (Field Afar, April 1922, p. 100).

No steps were taken at that time. In 1930 a physician, Dr. Harry Blaber of Brooklyn, N.Y., became the first layman to serve overseas with Maryknoll, treating victims of Hansen's Disease in southern China. After marrying, his wife Constance White, a nurse, served with him. When they returned to the United States in 1937, Dr. Artemio Bagalawis, a Filipino, continued the Hansens work with Maryknoll. Over the decades several other laypersons from the United States served overseas with Maryknollers by individual arrangement.

The Second Vatican Council deepened the Church's theology of the laity and urged all to a wider participation in the Church's mission. At its 1972 General Chapter the Maryknoll Society authorized the experimental beginning of an organized program for Maryknoll lay missioners. In 1975, with the collaboration of the Maryknoll Sisters, the organization was formally established under the Archdiocese of New York, and in 1979 leadership was assumed in part by lay missioners. Within the flexibility offered by the 1983 Code of Canon Law, the M.M.A.F. has sought recognition by the Pontifical Council for the Laity as a public association of the faithful. The association has close cooperative relationships with the Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers and with the Maryknoll Sisters.

[W. D. MCCARTHY]

MARYKNOLL SISTERS

Also known as Maryknoll Missioners (MM), a religious congregation with papal approbation, whose official title is Maryknoll Sisters of St. Dominic (see Official Catholic Directory [2470]). They devote themselves to catechetical, educational, medical, and social work in non-Christian and Christian countries. This first American Catholic community for women devoted exclusively to foreign missions began in 1912 with a group of laywomen who volunteered to help Rev. James A. WALSH, leader of the new Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America (see MARYKNOLL FATHERS AND BROTHERS), with the publication activities of the society's monthly, the Field Afar. By 1920 they numbered about 30, and, aided by Walsh and Father (later archbishop) John T. McNicholas OP, the community received canonical recognition as "The Foreign Mission Sisters of St. Dominic." Sister Fidelia Delaney of the Dominican Sisters of Sinsinawa, Wis., was the first novice mistress. Mother Mary Joseph ROGERS, one of the original helpers for Field Afar, and foundress of the congregation became the first superior and mother general. Twenty-two made first vows in February of 1921. In June, six were assigned to South China to collaborate in the apostolic work of the Maryknoll priests. The Holy See extended papal recognition with a decretum laudes in 1954.

The Second World War and subsequent communist seizure of many Far Eastern areas interrupted or destroyed many of the congregation's most promising endeavors. Nonetheless, numbers increased and by 1965 the sisters were engaged in ministry in Africa, the Far East, Central and South America, the United States, and the islands of the Pacific. The Eucharist and the Liturgy of the Hours are the center of the sisters' prayer life. A firmly established contemplative branch is an integral part of the community. In a number of areas indigenous religious communities have been formed with the congregation's direction. From the very beginning, the Maryknoll sisters were also open to the membership of the Catholic women of all nationalities who were seeking to follow a call to cross-cultural mission.

The post-Vatican II years brought an emphasis to strong educational and professional preparation of the sisters as well as an end to rapid growth. To meet the aggiornamento mandated by Vatican II, the sisters formulated new criteria that reaffirmed their dedication to missionary activity, the "preferential option for the poor," the promotion of women in all cultures, works devoted to peace with justice, a serious commitment to interreligious dialogue and ministries to persons with AIDS. The sisters strive toward more effective evangelization through an integrated witness of Christian presence of life, word, and ministry in service of and to the Gospel. For the congregation, then as now, "Mission is a total way of life."

Bibliography: C. KENNEDY, To the Uttermost Parts of the Earth: The Spirit and Charism of Mary Josephine Rogers (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1980). P. LERNOUX, Hearts on Fire: The Story of the Maryknoll Sisters (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1993). J. M. LYONS, Maryknoll's First Lady: The Life of Mother Mary Joseph, Foundress of the Maryknoll Sisters (Garden City, N.Y. 1967). M. J. ROGERS, Discourses of Mother Mary Joseph Rogers, M.M., Foundress, Maryknoll Sisters, compiled by SR. MARY COLEMAN and staff, 4 v. (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1982). J.-P. WIEST, Maryknoll in China: A History, 1918–1955 (Armonk, N.Y. 1988).

[J. M. LYONS/C. KENNEDY]

MARYLAND, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

One of the 13 original colonies and seventh to ratify the Constitution of the United States (April 28, 1788), Maryland is situated on the Atlantic seaboard, bounded on the north by Pennsylvania and Delaware, on the east by Delaware and the Atlantic Ocean, on the south by Virginia and West Virginia, and on the west by West Virginia. Annapolis is its capital, and Baltimore, Cumberland, and Hagerstown are the state's chief industrial centers. Fishing predominates in the Chesapeake Bay area, and farming and mineral processing are important in the state's economy. In recent decades many high technology and other service industry companies that conduct business with the federal government have set up operations in the state in order to be close to the nation's capital.

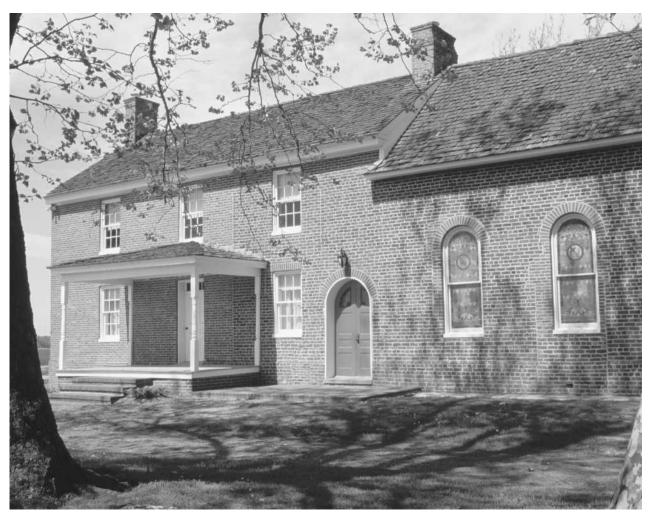

History. The founding of the palatinate and proprietary colony of Maryland (1634), named in honor of Henrietta Maria, queen of Charles I of England, was the work of the first Lord Baltimore, George Calvert, and of his son and heir, Cecil Calvert (see CALVERT).

Colonial Period. In the charter signed in 1632 by the second Lord Baltimore, the proprietor was granted broad and generous powers, with provision made also for a representative form of government through an assembly of all freemen. Despite opposition from the Virginia Company and the Puritans, the expedition, under Leonard Calvert as governor, sailed from Gravesend on the Ark and the Dove with 128 persons aboard, the usual oaths being administered. Approximately 72 others joined the expedition before the vessels sailed on Nov. 22, 1633, from Cowes on the Isle of Wight. Since the oath contained material objectionable to Catholics, it is likely that many if not most of those boarding at Cowes were Catholics. Two Jesuits, Andrew WHITE and John Altham, accompanied the expedition; White's Relatio Itineris constitutes a prime source for the early history of the colony, which was founded in March of 1634 at St. Mary's, between the Potomac River and Chesapeake Bay.

From the beginning Calvert insisted on religious tolerance and separation of Church and State; all Christians were welcomed to the colony, and Jews were tacitly admitted. Treaties were made with the Native Americans, and for some years relations with them remained friendly. A problem arose, however, when a large element in Virginia headed by William Claiborne, who had already established trading posts on Kent Island in Chesapeake Bay within Baltimore's jurisdiction, refused to recognize Maryland's authority. It took two expeditions (1635 and 1638) to reduce the island; but subsequently (1645), when Richard Ingle, posing as a champion of Parliament and the Protestant cause, attacked and terrorized Calvert's colonists, the governor fled for a time to Virginia. White and his Jesuit companions were seized, their property sequestered, and the priests sent in chains to England to stand trial.

After Leonard Calvert reconquered his colony, increasing numbers of Puritans from Virginia sought and obtained refuge in Maryland, settling mainly near Annapolis, then called Providence. The toleration act of 1649, entitled "An Act Concerning Religion," was designed to protect Catholics and others from the rising Puritan hostility in the colony and in England. In fact, however, it was less liberal than Baltimore's previous religious policy (see TOLERATION ACTS OF 1639 AND 1649, MARYLAND). By 1651 the Puritan element was strong enough to overthrow the authority of Baltimore; and until 1657 the colony, beset by turmoil and invasion, was in the hands of parliamentarians and Puritans. Help came to Cecil Calvert when Oliver CROMWELL began to question the acts of his adherents in Maryland and in 1657 returned the palatinate to Baltimore. When Charles, the heir of Cecil Calvert, became governor in 1660, there were about 12,000 colonists in Maryland, a total that increased to 20,000 during the next 10 years. The tobacco economy became established in the whole Chesapeake area, and there were a few iron furnaces; but the main industry was agriculture.

The Old Saint Joseph's Church, built in 1782, stands in Queen Anne, Maryland. (©Lee Snider/CORBIS)

Under Charles, who became the proprietor in 1675 at the death of his father, the colony enjoyed an era of relative peace and prosperity until the REVOLUTION OF 1688 in England. Thereafter, the proprietary government in Maryland was overthrown, and it became a royal colony, with Sir Lionel Copley as first royal governor (1691). After his arrival in 1692, the assembly abolished the practice of religious toleration and established the Anglican Church, which lasted until the revolution. In 1702 a limited toleration was granted to Dissenters and Quakers. A test act was imposed against Catholics in 1692, and an act of 1704 forbade Catholics to practice their religion. In 1715 and in 1729 laws provided that the Catholic survivor of a marriage should have any children removed from his care for the purpose of Protestant upbringing. In 1718 a severe law forbade to Catholics the franchise and the holding of governmental posts. A law in 1756 provided, among other disabilities, that any property then held by priests should be taken from them; the law provided also for double taxation on all Catholics.

Revolutionary and Post-Revolutionary Years. Charles, Lord Baltimore, died on Feb. 20, 1715, at the age of 85. He was succeeded by his son, Benedict Leonard, who had renounced his faith in favor of Anglicanism. When Benedict died April 15, 1715, his son, Charles II, Lord Baltimore, became proprietor under the terms of the original charter, and Maryland ceased to be a royal colony and again became proprietary. The famous boundary dispute between the Lords Baltimore and the Penns involved prolonged litigation and was not settled until the two proprietors engaged Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, who, between 1763 and 1767, determined the line, later named after them. In the stirring times between 1763 and 1775, Maryland played the usual colonial role, repudiating the Stamp Act and passing resolves denouncing taxation without representation and claiming that the Assembly alone could tax the province. The colony took part also in the nonimportation agreement and in the formation of committees of correspondence. Annapolis had its own tea party in October 1774, with the burning of the Peggy Stewart. During the administration of the last proprietary governor, Sir Robert Eden (1768–76), the famous debate took place between Daniel Dulany and Charles CARROLL of Carrollton over the question of officers' fees. When Carroll, a Catholic, had the better of the argument, not only was the popular side greatly strengthened but sympathy was won for the Catholic cause.

Exterior of Catholic Cathedral, Baltimore. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In June 1774, at the convention at Annapolis, delegates were appointed to the Continental Congress, one of whom was Charles Carroll. On June 28, 1776, the Maryland delegation was empowered to vote for independence. The first state constitution was adopted in 1776; sec. 33 of the Bill of Rights stated that all persons professing the Christian religion were equally entitled to protection of law. In the war that followed, Maryland regiments fought from Bunker Hill to Yorktown; the "Old Line State" is a fitting description of the military services of the Maryland Line during the revolution. The clashing interests of Maryland and Virginia resulted in the Mount Vernon and Annapolis meetings, which in turn resulted in the great Philadelphia Constitutional Convention (May 1787). One of the signers of this document was a third prominent CARROLL, DANIEL. Maryland ratified this document, and Charles Carroll was elected senator from Maryland. In 1791 Maryland ceded to the U.S. government its present site, the District of Columbia. During the War of 1812, the attack on Ft. McHenry in Baltimore harbor inspired Frances Scott Key to write "The Star Spangled Banner." Between 1815 and 1860 the state expanded as a commercial and maritime entity, attracting a large and steady stream of immigrants. In turn a strong nativist sentiment developed, and in 1854 the American party elected a mayor of Baltimore (see NATIVISM, AMERICAN).

The fateful presidential election of 1860 reflected clearly the divided sentiment of Maryland, a border state. With secession Maryland's position was difficult—growing industrial and commercial ties bound the state to the North and the Union; its large and wealthy tidewater was the home of slavery and agriculture. A Marylander, James Ryder Randall, living in New Orleans, gave the state its song, "Maryland, My Maryland," a consequence of the bloody riots in Baltimore on April 19, 1861. The former slave, renowned abolitionist, and civil rights leader, Frederick Douglass, was born in Maryland.

"First Mass in Maryland," which occurred March 25, 1634, from 19th-century engraving. (©The Granger Collection)

Harriet Tubman, the intrepid free black woman, who led hundreds of slaves to freedom, was also a native of the state. In the state constitution drawn up in 1864 provisions were made to end slavery, for increased representation for Baltimore, and for a state system of education. Since the Civil War the growth of the state has paced that of the nation, although after World War II, the state's growth exceeded that of the country. The steel industry, ship building, and aircraft manufacturing contributed heavily to the growth and expansion of the Baltimore area. The expansion of the federal government in Washington during the second half of the 20th century has precipitated rapid population growth in the neighboring Maryland counties. Combined, the Baltimore-Washington corridor is one of the largest metropolitan areas in the country. Improved facilities in transportation and communication have done much to weld Maryland's population and scattered areas into one.

After the Revolution the total population of Maryland was about 319,700, of whom approximately 15,000 were Catholics. The Archdiocese of Washington, erected in 1939, includes in its boundaries five Maryland counties, along with the nation's capital. The Diocese of Wilmington, Delaware, erected in 1868, includes eight Maryland counties on the eastern shore of Chesapeake Bay. The bishops of these three dioceses comprise the Maryland Catholic Conference and together they have lobbied the state government on education and social justice issues. The projected population of the state of Maryland in 2000 was 5,314,450, and it was estimated that the Catholic percentage has remained at approximately 20 percent for some time.

Education. From the foundation of Maryland, the Jesuits have been in the forefront of Catholic education in Maryland. Bishop John Carroll's designs and hopes for a college for his diocese were realized when Georgetown opened in what is now part of the District of Columbia in 1791. Four Sulpicians, including F. C. Nagot, landed in Baltimore in July 1791, and on October 3, St. Mary's Seminary opened. The Sulpicians opened St. Mary's College in 1799 as a preparatory seminary. This institution closed in 1852 to be succeeded by Loyola College. Mt. St. Mary's Seminary and College was opened in 1808. For women, the Georgetown Visitation Academy opened in what is now the District of Columbia in 1799 and St. Joseph's College, St. Elizabeth Ann Seton's establishment, opened in 1808 at Emmitsburg. The Christian Brothers opened Rock Hill College, Ellicott City, in 1865. In the course of time additional educational institutions were opened by various congregations, including a college at Woodstock (1867) by the Jesuits for training their own members, Calvert Hall College (1845) and La Salle Institute in Cumberland by the Christian Brothers, and Mt. St. Joseph's College by the Xaverian Brothers. Prominent among the earlier girls' schools are the College of Notre Dame of Maryland (1873), conducted by the School Sisters of Notre Dame, and Mt. St. Agnes College (1867), conducted by the Sisters of Mercy. The state currently has three Catholic colleges: Mt. St. Mary's, Loyola, and Notre Dame of Maryland, which remains a college for women. These three colleges had a total enrollment of 11,428 students at the end of the millennium.

Bibliography: R. T. CONLEY, The Truth in Charity: A History of the Archdiocese of Washington (Signe 2001). T. W. SPALDING, The Premier See: A History of the Archdiocese of Baltimore, 1789–1989 (Baltimore 1989). P. K. GUILDAY, The Life and Times of John Carroll: Archbishop of Baltimore, 1735–1815, 2 v. (New York 1927). A. M. MELVILLE, John Carroll of Baltimore (New York 1955). R. BRUGGER et al., Maryland: A Middle Temperament, 1634–1980 (Baltimore 1996). R. WALSH and W. L. FOX, Maryland: A History, 1632–1974 (Baltimore 1974).

[J. J. TIERNEY/R. T. CONLEY]

MARYMOUNT COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

A number of institutions of higher education in the United States sponsored by the Religious of the SACRED HEART OF MARY (R.S.H.M.) have their roots in the tradition established by Mother Marie Joseph BUTLER, the founder of Marymount College in Tarrytown, N.Y. Mindful of Father Gailhac's advice to study and adapt to all that is good in local customs, the R.S.H.M. in North America became deeply involved in that uniquely American institution, the parochial school system. Their involvement in higher education dates from the founding of Marymount College in 1907. Butler created a place of learning where women could grow and receive an education that would prepare them for leadership and influence in society. Marymount was the first women's college to establish a study abroad program. A pioneer in women's education, in 2000 Marymount entered into a process of consolidation with Fordham University to become Marymount College of Fordham University.

Marymount Manhattan College began in 1936 as the city campus of Marymount College Tarrytown. Located in New York City, it became a four-year branch in 1948. In 1961 Marymount Manhattan College was separately incorporated. As an urban, independent undergraduate liberal arts college, it offers strong programs in the arts and sciences for students of all ages, as well as preprofessional preparation.

In 1923, the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary expanded to Los Angeles. Ten years later Marymount College opened as a two-year institution which in 1948 was chartered by the State of California as a four-year institution. In 1960 it moved to the Palos Verdes Peninsula, and in 1968 Marymount College moved again, this time to the campus of Loyola University. Five years later, the two became a single institution, Loyola Marymount University. Marymount Palos Verdes, a two-year college, was established at the same time on its present site. In 1983, Marymount College Palos Verdes added a weekend college to its programs.

At the request of Peter Ireton, Bishop of Richmond, Marymount University in Arlington, Va., began as a two-year liberal arts college for women in 1950. In 1973 it became a four-year college. With the inauguration of its first graduate program in 1979, it admitted its first male students. In 1986 Marymount moved to university status and became fully co-educational. As an independent, comprehensive Catholic university, combining a liberal arts tradition with career preparation, Marymount University is marked by the heritage of the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary, by its proximity to the nation's capital, and by its creative and enterprising spirit.

Each of these five institutions has its own relationship to the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary. All R.S.H.M. colleges and universities continue to be marked by an emphasis on a liberal arts education; internationality and respect for all cultures; care and concern for the total growth of the person; attention to justice which respects the rights and responsibilities of all persons; spiritual and ethical formation; and a special commitment to the education of women. Throughout its nearly centurylong involvement in American higher education, the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary have endeavored to collaborate with others in educating students in this heritage, forming them to take responsibility for their own lives and making a positive contribution to the society and culture of their times.

[M. MILLIGAN]

MASÍAS, JUAN, ST.

Dominican brother; b. Rivera, Plasencia, Estremadura, Spain, March 2, 1585; d. Lima, Sept. 26, 1645. Orphaned at an early age, Masías worked as a shepherd to help care for his brothers. He continued in this occupation, leading a life of prayer under the patronage of St. John the Evangelist, until he was 21, when he felt inspired to go to America. He sailed from Seville in the service of a merchant, but was abandoned in Cartagena because he was illiterate. From there he made his way to Lima, where he entered the service of Pedro Jiménez Menacho, who put him to work caring for his cattle and sheep in the foothills of San Cristóbal. Again in the solitude of the fields, he resumed his life of prayer.

Masías (Macías) was inspired to ask for admission as a brother to the Recoleta Dominicana de Santa María Magdalena, and he received the habit on Jan. 22, 1622, from the prior, Salvador Ramírez. From his entrance into the order until his death, he served as porter. Every day the poor would come to him to receive bread. The convent in Lima still preserves the basket that he used for this ministration. He spent his free time praying in a hidden place in the orchard, a place he called Gethsemane. Prayer, penance, and charity unified the life of Juan Masías. He was declared blessed by GREGORY XVI on Jan. 31, 1837, and canonized by Paul VI on Sept. 28, 1975.

Feast: Sept. 18.

Bibliography: J. CIPOLLETI, Vida del Beato Fray Juan Masías (Cuzco 1949). A. LOBATO, Yo, fray Juan Masías, hermano de los pobres (Caracas 1986). V. OSENDE, Vida del Beato Juan Masías (Lima 1918). M. F. WINDEATT, Warrior in White: The Story of Blessed John Masias (New York 1944).

[J. M. VARGAS]

MASS, DRY

The medieval Missa sicca was a quasi-liturgical custom patterned on the Mass. The first certain mention of it is found in the 9th–century pontifical of Prudentius (d. 861), Bishop of Troyes. It was also discussed by William Durand (d. 1296), Bishop of Mende. It consisted of the recitation of prayers and readings from the Mass of the day by a priest, sometimes fully vested, sometimes wearing only a stole, and with the omission of the Mass parts from Offertory to Communion inclusive. It seemed to have enjoyed some popularity in pre-Reformation France, both in monasteries, where priest-monks sometimes celebrated after the conventual Mass as a private devotion, and in parish churches, as an embellishment of, or even a substitute for, the Eucharistic Sacrifice. Instances of the latter usage were at weddings, funerals, a gathering of huntsmen for the chase, or voyaging at seaoccasions when a complete Mass service might have been deemed inconvenient or impossible.

At Milan, the Palm Sunday procession used to halt at various churches in the city for a service resembling a dry Mass. In fact, the blessing of palms on Palm Sunday in the Roman rite was given a place in such a Missa sicca until Pius XII promulgated his Holy Week Ordo in 1956. Because of the danger of extremes, the general practice was condemned by theologians and synods, and eventually died out.

Bibliography: G. DURANDI, Rationale divinorum officiorum (Lyons 1560) 4:1. P. BROWE, "Messa senza consacrazione e commuione," Ephemerides liturgicae 50 (1936) 124–132.

[M. DUCEY/EDS.]

MASSACHUSETTS, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

One of the 13 original colonies, located in northeastern United States, bounded on the north by Vermont and New Hampshire, on the east and south by the Atlantic Ocean, on the south by Rhode Island and Connecticut, and on the west by New York. Boston is the capital and principal metropolis of the Commonwealth, the state's official designation. Other large cities include Worcester, Springfield, and Cambridge. In 2001 the Catholic population of Massachusetts was 2,968,693, about 48 percent of the total. In addition to the Archdiocese of Boston (1808), there were three other dioceses: Springfield (1870), Fall River (1904), and Worcester (1950).

Early History. The area was first settled by English religious dissenters. The Pilgrims, or Separatists, under John Carver and William BRADFORD, founded a colony in Plymouth (1620). The Puritans, or Congregationalists, led by John Endicott and John Winthrop, and under a charter for the Massachusetts Bay Colony, settled in Salem (1628) and Boston (1630). Hundreds of colonists

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of Boston	1875
Diocese of Fall River	1904
Diocese of Springfield in Massachusetts	1870
Diocese of Worcester	1950

followed Winthrop during the 1630s, and by the end of the decade the Bay Colony had 25,000 settlers and was the largest English colony in North America. The Puritan leaders established a Bible commonwealth based on CAL-VINISM. Congregational Church polity was transferred to the political system, and self-government developed in the towns. "No man shall be admitted to the freedom of this body," declared the General Court, "but such as are members of the [Congregational] church." Those who did not subscribe to Congregationalism were permitted to reside in the Bay Colony, but were not allowed to take an active role in the governance of the colony. Roman Catholics, however, along with Quakers and Jews, were not permitted in the colony at all. The Bible commonwealth, as planned, did not survive the 17th century, and control of the Congregational churches was further weakened by the Charter of 1691, ruling that representatives of the general court were to be elected on the basis of property rather than religious affiliation. Nevertheless, the Puritans, with their zeal for religion, intense hostility to the Catholic religion and practices, concern for education, and strict moral attitudes, dominated New England. Massachusetts took the lead in the events that led to the War for Independence, and the Battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill in 1775 marked that war's beginning. Maine remained a district of Massachusetts until 1820, when it entered the union under the Missouri Compromise.

Early Catholicism. Catholics avoided Massachusetts during the colonial period; especially after laws passed in 1647 and 1700 forbade Catholic priests to reside in the colony under pain of imprisonment and execution. The approximately 1,200 exiled Acadians (1755-56) to Massachusetts were scattered among the towns, where they were gradually assimilated or from which they eventually escaped. Thanks largely to an alliance and friendship with France during the War for Independence, Americans became more tolerant of Roman Catholics, and by the time independence was achieved, a small group of French and Irish residents organized a small congregation and began holding services. While the new Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 provided a bill of rights guaranteeing "equal protection of the law" to all religious denominations, it required that all state officials swear that they were not subject to the authority of any "foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate." Since all Protestants still assumed that Catholics were subject to both pope and prelate, this clause automatically excluded them from holding public office in Massachusetts until 1821, when the test was finally removed.

St. Stephen's Catholic Church, Boston. The church was originally Congregationalist. (©Kevin Fleming/CORBIS)

The Diocese of Boston. Despite the continued existence of political limitations, the number of Catholics continued to increase in Massachusetts, and in 1808 the Diocese of Boston was established with Frenchman Jean Lefebvre de CHEVERUS as its first bishop. The first diocese encompassed all of New England, extending from Buzzards Bay and Nantucket Sound in the south to Maine and the Canadian border in the north. Twelve years later, there were an estimated 3,850 Catholics in New England, including several Native American settlements in northern Maine whose members had been converted earlier by the French and who now came under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Boston. When Benedict Joseph FENWICK succeeded Cheverus as bishop of Boston in 1825, he found himself in charge of the smallest and weakest of the nine dioceses that existed in the United States at that time. In all New England there were only eight churches, and the larger part of the Catholic population was still restricted to the Boston area. As the result of repressive land policies in the British Isles after the Napoleonic wars, the number of Irish immigrants coming to the United States grew so rapidly that Fenwick had to build several new churches in the city.

The sudden rise in the number of Irish Catholics created considerable anxiety among native Bostonians, who feared the social and economic impact of unskilled workers and resented their religious beliefs. During the summer of 1825, roving gangs of vandals broke windows, damaged furniture, and actually destroyed several small houses in the Irish district. In 1834, a local mob burned down the Ursuline Convent in nearby Charlestown; and in 1837 groups of Yankees and Irish residents clashed in downtown Boston in what became known as the Broad Street Riot.

Roman Catholicism also began to spread to other parts of Massachusetts during this same period. By the mid-1820s, for example, a number of Irish immigrants were moving some 45 miles north of Boston in search of work at locations along the Merrimack River, where new textile factories were being constructed by Boston investors. Irish workers from Boston, along with Frenchspeaking Catholic workmen from Canada, soon made up a sizeable portion of the work force in such towns as Lowell and Lawrence, digging the canals and constructing the buildings. Acquiring a site of land near the Western Canal, on July 3, 1831, Bishop Fenwick dedicated St. Patrick's Church as further evidence of Catholic expansion. Between 1828 and 1830 he supervised the dedication of churches in Newport and Pawtucket, Rhode Island, as well as in New Bedford, Massachusetts. To serve a group of Irish glasssworkers who had moved to Sandwich, Fenwick had a small frame church constructed in Boston and shipped by water to the Cape Cod town. On June 17, 1830, he dedicated Holy Trinity, the first Catholic church in Connecticut. And all the while, he continued to minister to Native American populations at Old Town and Eastport, Maine.

Failing health did not prevent Bishop Fenwick from traveling incessantly during the 1840s, administering the sacrament of Confirmation in Lowell; dedicating a new church in Fall River; up to Vermont for another new church; down to Providence, Rhode Island, and then to Bridgeport, Connecticut. In September 1842 he dedicated a new church in Quincy, Massachusetts, and the following month he was in Lowell to dedicate St. Peter's Church. In 1842, Fenwick purchased property in Worcester, Massachusetts, for the site of the college he had always dreamed of—the College of the Holy Cross—named after the original church in Boston.

The Famine Years. Even though the Boston diocese lost some ten thousand Catholics when Fenwick detached Connecticut and Rhode Island in 1844, there were still nearly seventy thousand left in the remaining four states that John Fitzpatrick took over when he succeeded Fenwick in 1846. Massachusetts alone contained over fifty thousand Catholics, with nearly thirty thousand in the capital city. "In Boston, we are sadly off for want of churches," complained the new bishop as he proceeded to add to the number of churches in the diocese. In August 1846 he dedicated St. Joseph's Church in Roxbury, and a short time later saw the completion of Holy Trinity Church for German immigrants in the South End. As the terrible aftereffects of the Great Famine brought additional Irish-Catholic immigrants to the shores of America during the late 1840s, Bishop Fitzpatrick was kept busy creating new parishes and dedicating new churches in other parts of Massachusetts. On the north shore, new pastors were sent in to take charge of expanding Catholic populations in Chelsea and Lynn; St. Mary's Church in Salem was made responsible for mission stations in Marblehead, Gloucester, and Ipswich. On the south shore, St. Mary's Church in West Quincy provided a focal point for people in Quincy, Braintree, Weymouth, and Milton, for residents of Randolph and Stoughton, for those in Hingham and Cohasset, and for communities as south as Plymouth. Because of the increase in textile manufacturing, Fall River showed an amazing growth, and in August 1840 the Church of St. John the Baptist was constructed to serve the estimated one thousand Catholics in that area. To the west of Boston, things went even more rapidly. Before 1840, there had not been a single church or chapel west of Worcester. By the time Fitzpatrick took office in 1846, however, there were brand new churches at Cabotville, Pittsfield, Northampton, and Springfield. The number of Catholics in the city of Worcester alone had risen to nearly two thousand, and in June of 1846 Fitzpatrick dedicated the Church of St. John the Evangelist. But it was the region along the Merrimack River that had the most dramatic increase in numbers. The expanding textile center was attracting many Irish immigrant workers, and by 1841 the Catholic population of Lowell was estimated to have reached four thousand, requiring Bishop Fenwick to add St. Peter's Church in 1842 to the original St. Patrick's Church he had constructed ten years earlier. The nearby textile city of Lawrence, too, experienced a population explosion, going from fewer than two hundred Catholics in 1845 to over six thousand by 1848. At this time, the jurisdiction of the bishop of Boston included not only the commonwealth of Massachusetts, but also the states of Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine. Vermont was the most populous of the three, but its five thousand Catholics were widely dispersed, with few churches and only a handful of priests. Most parishes were concentrated in the extreme northwestern parts of the state near the town of Burlington, where Fenwick had dedicated St. Peter's Church in 1841. In New Hampshire, the small number of Catholics received little attention until the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company began its textile operations at Manchester in 1839. After that it became necessary for an itinerant priest to say Mass on a regular basis until the bishop of Boston could work out a more permanent arrangement. With well over forty-five thousand Catholics, Maine ranked second to Vermont in northern New England, and during the 1830s its growing population resulted in new churches at Dover, Portland, and Eastport. As a result of the sale of valuable timber land, the town of Bangor experienced a speculative boom that attracted about a thousand new Catholics for whom St. Michael's Church was built in 1839. There were also small Catholic communities at Ellsworth, West Mathias, and Lubec, with a small church at Houlton meeting the needs of those who lived close to the Canadian border. In addition to Catholics of European lineage, Bishop Fitzpatrick was also responsible for the Penobscot and Passamaquoddy tribes in the northern regions.

The continued influx of foreigners into the United States during the late 1840s and 1850s and the success of Catholic prelates in gaining some measure of social and economic benefits for their parishioners convinced many native-born Americans that they had to stem the immigrant tide. In 1852, a number of nativist groups formed the American party-more popularly known as the Know-Nothing party—to prevent further immigration and to keep immigrant-Americans in a subservient position. Despite an amazing burst of power in Massachusetts and other northern states during 1854 and 1855, the emergence of the slavery issue caused the party to fail completely in its attempt to nominate a presidential candidate in 1856. The slavery controversy continued to provoke hostilities between the states of the North and the South, and in November 1860 the election of Republican candidate Abraham Lincoln led to the secession of southern states from the Union. On the morning of April 12, 1861, with the bombardment of Fort Sumter, a federal fort in Charleston Harbor, the Civil War began. With the outbreak of war, Irish Catholics rushed to join fight to preserve the Union. With the approval of Governor John A. Andrew, Catholic leaders in Boston were encouraged to form a separate regiment of Irish soldiers. Companies from Boston, joined by military units from Salem, Milford, Marlboro, and Stoughton, banded together to form the 9th Regiment, Massachusetts Voluntary Infantry. In response to the gallant efforts of the "Fighting Ninth," Governor Andrew approved recruitment for a second all-Irish regiment—the 28th—that was sworn into service in December 1861 and became one of the five regiments that made up the Irish Brigade. The impressive patriotism displayed by Boston Catholics, the heroism of Irish troops on the battlefield, and the support they received from loyal Catholic citizens did much to create a higher level of tolerance throughout the state. Bishop John Fitzpatrick was awarded an honorary degree from Harvard college, Catholic clergymen were permitted to attend patients in public institutions, and Catholic school children were no longer forced to read the Protestant version of the Bible in the public schools.

Immigration and Diocesan Development. Once the Civil War was over, large-scale immigration resumed, and additional numbers of Catholic immigrants joined earlier arrivals in spreading across the state of Massachusetts. Following the death of Bishop Fitzpatrick in 1866, his friend Fr. John J. WILLIAMS took over as bishop and began making arrangements for an expanding diocese. As early as 1868, he asked Rome's permission to divide the diocese of Boston. He proposed to separate the five counties of western and central Massachusetts and form them into a new diocese with Springfield as its see city. In 1870, Pope Pius IX signed the bull creating the diocese of Springfield. Patrick Thomas O'Reilly (1870–92), a native of Ireland, was consecrated the first bishop of the new diocese and was succeeded by Thomas Beaven, a native of Springfield (1892–1920). At the time the diocese was created there were nearly 100,000 Catholics in the area; that number more than doubled by 1900.

At the same time Bishop Williams suggested another diocese that would encompass Rhode Island and three counties in southeastern Massachusetts. In 1872 Rome established the diocese of Providence, Rhode Island. It grew so fast that in 1904 the three Massachusetts counties were formed into the diocese of Fall River. In his brief tenure, William Stang, the first bishop of Fall River (1904–1907) wrote three pastoral letters, summoned a diocesan synod and, within two months of its publication, began implementing Acerbo nimis, Pope Pius X's instruction on catechesis.

Despite these geographic divisions, the diocese of Boston was still growing at such a remarkable rate that on February 12, 1875, Pope Pius IX approved the transformation of Boston from a diocese into an archdiocese, and Bishop John William was elevated to the rank of archbishop. The new ecclesiastical province included all the dioceses of New England.

As Catholics increased in numbers during the late 1870s and early 1880s they were beginning to move up from political positions at the local level to more significant places in city, state, and even national government. In 1881, for example, the city of Lawrence chose John Breen as its first Catholic mayor; the following year the city of Lowell elected John J. Donovan as mayor; in 1884 Boston chose Hugh O'Brien as the first Irish-born, Roman Catholic mayor of the city. In 1894, John F. Fitzgerald of Boston's North End was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives from the 9th congressional district and Joseph F. O'Connell of Dorchester went to Washington from the 10th congressional district. The impoverished conditions of the immigrants during the 1850s, followed by the disruptive years of the Civil War during the 1860s, had caused earlier prelates to go slow in the building of Catholics schools. Archbishop John Williams, however, undertook the creation of a parochial school system throughout the archdiocese, and in 1884 reported to the Third Baltimore Council that 35 of his parishes had parochial schools, with many more to follow. The two dominant teaching communities in the archdiocese of Boston were the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur, who had arrived in Boston in 1848, and the Sisters of St. Joseph who arrived in 1873.

The New Immigrants. It was in the late 1880s and early 1890s that the character of immigrants to Massachusetts changed dramatically. During the early part of the 19th century, most immigrants to the United States had come from northern and western Europe. In the late 1880s, the bulk of people entering the country came from southern and eastern Europe. Fleeing high taxes, low wages, drought, famine, political oppression, and religious persecution, these new immigrants came to America seeking liberty and opportunity. In the decade between 1900 and 1910, over 150,000 Italians entered the Bay State, along with some 80,000 Poles and nearly 25,000 Lithuanians. Many newcomers were Roman Catholics who settled in various parts of Massachusetts and who posed challenges to a Church that was overwhelmingly Irish in its clerical personnel and its cultural institutions. Sensitive to the desires of these non-English-speaking groups to have their own churches, their own priests, sermons in their own languages, and observances of their own religious feast days, Archbishop Williams permitted them as much national expression as possible in their religious observances, while keeping their new churches and their congregations under his episcopal authority.

There had been a small but active German-speaking community in Boston before the Civil War, and in 1872 Archbishop Williams laid the cornerstone to a new Holy Trinity Church that enlarged the original church that had been constructed in 1844. The number of Frenchspeaking immigrants had also expanded after the Civil War, when the numerous textile mills in the Merrimack Valley began hiring immigrants from Europe as well as from Canada. In 1868, Archbishop Williams recruited French-speaking Oblates of Mary Immaculate to staff the first French parish of St. Joseph (later changed to St. Jean Baptiste) in Lowell. To further accommodate Canadian immigrants, the archbishop brought the MARIST FATHERS to Haverhill in the 1870s. After later assuming responsibility for St. Anne's parish in Lawrence, in 1885 the Marists purchased a site in Boston's Back Bay for the construction of the Church of Notre Dame des Victoires, popularly known as "the French Church." Archbishop Williams also responded to the arrival, between 1899 and 1910, of over 45,000 Portuguese immigrants. He brought in several Portuguese-speaking priests to serve their spiritual needs while they lived in Boston's North End, and later support Portuguese parishes in Cambridge and in Lowell. By the turn of the century, nearly ten thousand Polish immigrants had settled in the Greater Boston area, and in 1894 a Polish-speaking priest named Fr. John Chmielinski dedicated the church of Our Lady of Czestochowa in the Boston area, and also ministered to groups of Polish immigrants in Lowell and Salem. From 1893 to 1918, Archbishop Williams and his successor Archbishop William O'CONNELL sanctioned as many as 15 Polish parishes, despite occasional efforts by separatist Polish groups to establish independent national churches. During the same period, about one thousand Lithuanian immigrants settled in the South Boston peninsula, and were provided with a young Lithuanian priest who established St. Joseph's Church, but whose controversial nature led a number of parishioners to erect a church of their own (St. Peter's). Five other Lithuanian parishes were established in various parts of the archdiocese—in Brockton, Lawrence, Lowell, Cambridge, and Norwoodplaces where Lithuanian immigrants had gone in search of work. The largest of the new immigrant groups arriving in Massachusetts came from Italy. As early as 1886, the average number of Italian immigrants had already reached 222,000, with many of the newcomers settling in Boston. At first they congregated along the waterfront in the city's North End, where the Italian population grew from a thousand in 1880 to seven thousand in 1895. As their numbers grew, it became obvious that steps would have to be taken to meet their spiritual needs. In 1876, St. Leonard's Church was constructed in the North End, with Franciscans providing the services; later, the Church of the Sacred Heart was established and placed under the direction of the Missionaries of St. Charles. Both churches developed parochial grammar schools, and also provided social clubs and religious centers for the predominantly Italian neighborhood that featured yearly outdoor festivals honoring various patron saints.

The Twentieth Century. On Feb. 2, 1907 Bishop Stang of Fall River died; he was succeeded by the Most Rev. Daniel F. Feehan (1907-1934). Later that same year, after 41 years of service as fourth bishop and first archbishop of Boston, Archbishop Williams died (August 30) and was succeed by William Henry O'Connell, bishop of Portland, Maine. Both Feehan and O'Connell came on the scene at a time that the Church in Massachusetts was expanding rapidly. At the time of his accession, Archbishop O'Connell assumed responsibility for an archdiocese that covered about 2500 square miles, and served some 850,000 Catholics. The archdiocese contained almost two hundred parish churches, had nearly six thousand priests, and almost 1600 sisters of various religious orders. Fifty thousand students attended churchrelated schools, from the elementary grades to the college level, and some 70,000 cases a year were being handled by various hospitals and charitable agencies operated by the archdiocese. In addition to increasing the number of parishes in the city of Boston, a series of new churches went up in other parts of the state. From Winthrop and Revere, to Lynnfield, Danvers, and Newburyport, the spires of new churches marked the Catholic movement into north shore areas. The archdiocese was kept busy supplying priests and building churches for new immigrant families moving into the textile centers of Lowell and Lawrence, as well as into the neighboring communities of North Andover, Tewksbury, and Dracut. South of Boston, St. John's Church in Quincy was the basis of a network of other churches and mission stations, while new parishes went up in the nearby towns of Braintree, Weymouth, Milton, and Randolph. Along the seashore areas of Hull, Cohasset, amd Scituate, as well as Plymouth, Kingston, and Duxbury, a number of new churches were constructed, and several temporary missions were converted into parishes. With numerous industries in the Brockton area offering employment for unskilled European immigrants, several large churches went up in Brockton itself, as well as in such nearby towns as Whitman, Bridgewater, and Middleboro. During this same period, the number of non-English-speaking churches also increased. By the time Cardinal O'Connell died in 1944, there were 29 such churches. Many were in such French-Canadian communities as Lowell, Lawrence, Haverhill, Salem, and Beverley; others were in Italian and Polish communities. By 1945 there were a total of 15 Italian churches in the North End, in east Boston, and in such towns as Revere, Somerville, and Everett, as well as Waltham and Salem. The original six Polish churches had expanded to 15 by 1945. During the first 18 months of his episcopacy, O'Connell could point to 31 new parishes, 29 additional priests, nine more parochial schools, two more orphan asylums, and three new religious orders of nuns added to those already serving the archdiocese.

In 1944, Richard J. CUSHING succeeded Cardinal O'Connell as archbishop of Boston, and found the Church in Massachusetts growing at a rate of about 250,000 to 300,000 every five years, with the number of parishes increasing from 325 in 1944 to 396 in 1960. At the time Cushing became archbishop, there were 4,054 young women serving in 44 female religious orders; by 1960 the number had risen to 5,543, representing 63 orders. In 1944 there were 253 seminarians; by 1960 the figure had jumped to 418. The archdiocese had such a surplus of priests that Cardinal Cushing created a program that sent Boston priests to dioceses in parts of the country like Utah, Louisiana, Colorado, and Wyoming, where there were serious shortages of clergy.

The diocese of Springfield was experiencing similar growth. The Catholic population had more than doubled since the turn of century. In January 1950 Worcester county, the central section of Massachusetts, was detached from the diocese of Springfield to form a separate diocese. The first bishop of the new diocese of Worcester was John Joseph Wright, formerly an auxiliary bishop in Boston. When Bishop Wright was transferred to Pittsburgh at the beginning of 1959, Bishop Joseph Flanagan was transferred from Norwich, Connecticut to succeed him.

In 1969 the bishops established the Massachusetts Catholic Conference to serve as the official voice of the four Catholic dioceses in the Commonwealth. The MCC identifies pressing needs in areas of welfare, health, education, and civil rights, and represents the Church's position on social issues and matters of public policy to government agencies.

By the late 1960s and early 1970s changes were evident throughout the state that reflected many of the tensions in the Church and the nation during those disruptive years. Mass attendance declined; the number of parochial schools was substantially reduced; the number of incoming seminarians dropped off dramatically; there were fewer women entering religious orders, and more and more parish priests were retiring because of age. In part, many of these statistical changes resulted from demographic shifts in Massachusetts that saw older populations moving out of the cities into the suburbs, and the arrival of new immigrants from Latin American countries and many parts of Southeast Asia who settled in urban centers. Cardinal Bernard F. Law, who became archbishop of Boston in 1984, confronted these changes as did other bishops in the state, by closing older parishes in depopulated urban districts, and by creating new parishes in recently developed suburban areas. With the decline in the number of priests and religious, the dioceses expanded programs for the training of lay ministers. These developments presented serious challenges for the Church in Massachusetts at the start of the 21st century.

Catholic Institutions of Higher Learning. Founded 1843 as a liberal arts college for men by the Jesuits, Holy Cross College shares the distinction of being the oldest Catholic college in Massachusetts. Its first graduating class included James Augustine HEALY and his brother Hugh, both freed African-American slaves, while the second graduating class included their brother Patrick, the first African-American to be awarded a Ph.D. James Healy, who was the also valedictorian for the first graduating class, went on to become the first African-American to be named bishop when he was appointed Bishop of Portland, Maine in 1875. In addition to Holy Cross College, the Jesuits also administer BOSTON COL-LEGE, established 1863. Other Catholic colleges in the state include Stonehill College in North Easton (sponsored by the Holy Cross Fathers), Emmanuel College in Boston (established 1919 by the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur), Regis College in Weston (sponsored by the Sisters of St. Joseph), College of Our Lady of the Elms in Chicopee (sponsored by the Sisters of St. Joseph), Merrimack College in North Andover (established, 1947, by the Augustinians), Anna Maria College in Paxton (sponsored by the Sisters of St. Anne), Assumption College in Worcester (sponsored by the Augustinians of the Assumption).

Bibliography: R. H. LORD et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston, 1604 to 1943, 3 v. (New York 1944; Boston 1945), T. H. O'CONNOR, Boston Catholics: A History of the Church and Its People (Boston 1998). S. E. MORISON, Builders of the Bay Colony (Boston 1930); The Intellectual Life of Colonial New England (2d ed. New York 1956). A. J. RILEY, Catholicism in New England to 1788 (Catholic University of America Studies in American Christian History 24; 1936). The best study of the impact of the Irish on Boston is O. HANDLIN, Boston's Immigrants 1790-1880: A Study of Acculturation (rev. ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1959). M. L. HANSEN, "The Second Colonization of New England," The Immigrant in American History, ed. A. M. SCHLESINGER (Cambridge, Mass. 1940), corrects some false ideas about the immigrants. L. E. TRUESDELL, The Canadian Born in the United States (New Haven 1943), statistics for Fr. Canadians. R. H. LORD et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston, 3 v. (New York 1944). M. X. SULLIVAN, The History of Catholic Secondary Education in the Archdiocese of Boston (Washington 1946). General Laws (Annotated) (St. Paul, Minn. 1958–59). Massachusetts Digest (Annotated) 1761 to Date (Boston 1933—). J. J. MCCOY, History of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Springfield (Boston 1900). J. G. DEEDY, JR, The Church in Worcester, New England (Worcester 1956). F. J. BRADLEY, Brief History of the Diocese of Fall River (New York 1931).

[T. H. O'CONNOR/W. L. LUCEY]

MASSAJA, GUGLIELMO

Cardinal, missionary; b. Piova (Asti), Italy, June 8, 1809; d. San Giorgio da Cremano (Napoli), Aug. 6, 1889. Massaja, whose baptismal name was Lorenzo, joined the Capuchins in 1826. After ordination he taught philosophy and theology (1836-46) and acted as confessor to the royal family of Piedmont. In 1846 he was consecrated bishop and was sent to southern Ethiopia as the first vicar apostolic of Galla, but he was unable to reach the territory of the Gallas until 1852. Meanwhile he labored along the coast of East Africa, in Egypt, and in the Sudan. Besides winning numerous converts and baptizing more than 36,000, he pioneered in medical missions, developed an indigenous clergy, and consecrated St. Giustino de JACO-BIS as bishop. His knowledge of the country, gained in apostolic journeys, and his aid to travelers won him esteem in Europe. His zeal, charity, and many-sided activities endeared him to the Ethiopians. He was a friend and counselor of Negus (king) Menelik, but in 1879 Negus John, at the instigation of the dissident hierarch, imprisoned him and sent him into exile. In Italy he was deeply venerated by the people. Leo XIII, who created him cardinal (1884), ordered him to complete his memoirs during his final years at the friary in Frascati. The result of Massaja's literary labors was his chief work: I miei trentacinque anni di missione nell'alta Etiopia (12 v. Rome 1885–95). This massive account of his 35 years in Ethiopia is still regarded as a work of great value. Massaja also published grammars and other works in African tongues for the use of his missionaries. Among modern African missionaries he was one of the most successful. His cause for beatification has been introduced.

Bibliography: M. GUGLIELMO, Memorie storiche del Vicariato Apostolico dei Galla, 1845–1880, Vols. 1–6, A. ROSSO, ed. (Manoscritto autografo Vaticano, 1984). C. D. DA SESSANO, Guglielmo Massaja O. F. M. Cap.: Vicario apostolico deo Galla. Cardinale di Santa Romana Chiesa. Saggio storico-critico secondo documenti inediti (Rome 1998).

[T. MACVICAR]

MASSENET, JULES

Romanticist opera composer; b. Montaud, France, May 12, 1842 (baptized Jules Émile Frédéric); d. Paris, Aug. 13, 1912. He was a graduate of the Paris Conservatory, which he had entered at age nine; he won the Prix de Rome in 1863, and in 1878 was appointed professor of counterpoint and composition at the conservatory. Although he was most successful in opera, Manon (1884) being accounted his masterpiece, some of his best early compositions, e.g., Eve and Marie-Magdeleine, were oratorios with religious themes. Marie-Magdeleine, as converted to an opera in 1903, is a travesty on the Gospels. Le Jongleur de Nôtre Dame (1902), in contrast, has a moving libretto and tastefully handled religious episodes, but the absence of a female role and a general lack of austerity are probably the chief obstacles to its revival. All his other operas, notably Hérodiade and Thaïs (from which the popular "Méditation religieuse" of violin repertory is taken), are marked by an authentic lyricism and sense of theater, and marred by a lack of spiritual depth and a too-obvious desire to please the public. His work for the lyric theater influenced DEBUSSY and, even more strongly, PUCCINI.

Bibliography: J. E. F. MASSENET, My Recollections, tr. H. V. BARNETT (Boston 1919). H. T. FINCK, Massenet and His Operas (New York 1910). A. BRUNEAU, Massenet (Paris 1935). Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, ed. N. SLONIMSKY (5th, rev. ed. New York 1958) 1045–46. J.-C. BRANGER, "Mes souvenirs: De nouvelles sources relatives aux Mémoires de Jules Massenet," Revue de Musicologie 83 (1997) 117–135. J. A. FELDMAN, "Manon" in International Dictionary of Opera 2 v. ed. C. S. LARUE (Detroit 1993) 798–799. J. W. HANSEN, "Sibyl Sanderson's Influence on Manon," The Opera Quarterly 15/1 (1999) 38–48. C. HEADINGTON, "Werther" in International Dictionary of Opera 2 v., ed. C. S. LARUE, (Detroit 1993)1456–1457. D. IRVINE, Massenet:

A Chronicle of His Life and Times (Portland, Oregon 1994). S. WILLIER, "Le Roi de Lahore" International Dictionary of Opera 2 v., ed. C. S. LARUE (Detroit 1993)1127–1128.

[R. M. LONGYEAR]

MASSES

The literature of 20th–century psychology, sociology, and political science reflects a variety of conflicting and even contradictory uses of this term. The concept has assumed particular importance as a description of the "prepolitical dispositions" that render a people susceptible to the imposition of totalitarian rule. Psychologists attribute to the mass person such qualities as spatial and temporal rootlessness, affectivity, susceptibility to appeals to blind passion (especially of a negative nature), a lack of felt need for a "personal privacy," a strong impulse to be "like everyone else," and an aggressive assertion of rights without a sense of corresponding duties or responsibilities. Sociologists analyze the dominant characteristics of mass communication media, e.g., the predominance of large-scale organization, the depersonalization of human relationships, the decline of a socially unifying "public philosophy," and the substitution of the irrational dynamism of a social myth exalting a class, a race, or the state.

Contemporary Meanings. Since the concept of the masses is so elusive, its meaning may be better clarified by a series of contrasts than by direct definition. (1) Mass vs. individual: the human person, conscious of his or her own uniqueness and personal worth, is self-directed and self-responsible; seeks to develop his or her own special endowments, to find his or her own life vocation, and to make his or her own contribution to the communities of which he or she is a member [see PERSON (IN PHILOSO-PHY)]. The mass person lacks a sense of personal worth, is "other directed," loses his or her identity in the mass, and seeks fulfillment and meaning for life through total immersion in the collectivity. (2) Mass vs. elite: to theorists of the elitist school (e.g., ORTEGA Y GASSET, Mosca, Pareto), the masses lack quality, culture, and dignity; they are alienated; they have no respect for traditions and do not recognize that the great achievements of civilization have been made possible by hard work and sacrifice on the part of the "creative minority" who have selfdiscipline and a sense of noblesse oblige. The mass person expects to enjoy all the benefits of civilization (and claims them as a right) though he or she lacks the selfdiscipline to make the sacrifices requisite to preserve them and the capacity and sense of responsibility to contribute to their advancement. Many elitists consider DE-MOCRACY to be an unrealistic dream. (3) Mass vs. people:

Guglielmo Massaja.

this contrast describes two distinct prepolitical dispositions in the members of a body politic. Pope Pius XII made use of it as the basis for his analysis of the preconditions for sound democracy in his Christmas message of 1944. The people, he said, "lives and moves by its own life energy"; the masses are "inert of themselves and can only be moved from the outside." The people is made up of persons, each "conscious of his own responsibility and his own views"; the masses are "an easy plaything in the hands of anyone who seeks to exploit their instincts and impressions." The state based on a people possesses a "constantly self-renewing vigor" because it encourages personal initiative and a sense of responsibility for the common good; the mass state utilizes the elementary power of the masses who have been "reduced to the minimum status of a mere machine," and used to impose the whims of manipulators on the whole community. The masses are the "capital enemy of true democracy and of its ideal of liberty and equality." For them, "liberty becomes a tyrannous claim to give free rein to one's impulses and appetites," and "equality degenerates to a mechanical level and becomes a colorless uniformity" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Rome 1909) 37 (1945) 10–23].

Jules Massenet. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Totalitarian Concepts. The theory and practice of totalitarianism give a critical role to the masses. To Marx, the proletarian person, alienated from capitalist society because of his or her lack of property, was destined to be the new revolutionary force. Lenin envisioned the Communist party as the "vanguard of the proletariat," the elite of the "toiling masses" who would spearhead the revolution because they were enlightened and liberated through insight into the dialectical process of history.

The consolidation of power under a dictatorship depends in large part on the incorporation of the masses through the dynamism of social myth. The myth is the core of the secular religion of totalitarianism, the means of "moral regeneration" of the masses through their absolute commitment to the collective goal. Its value as an integrating force lies not in its truth or in its power to fulfill human needs, but rather in its power to stir the masses to a delirium of enthusiasm and hatred that keeps them always in readiness for action against the "enemy" designated by the leaders.

Although totalitarianism is the extreme of the mass society, many of the phenomena of mass psychology are to be found in the so-called free societies; for example, the manipulation of PUBLIC opinion by irresponsible PRO-PAGANDA, sensational journalism, and the encouragement of a climate of hatred and violence by extremist political groups. The "latent masses" can be made active through appropriate leadership and organization and an effective social myth.

Bibliography: PIUS XII, Benignitas et humanitas (Radio address, Dec. 24, 1944); Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Rome 1909) 37 (1945) 10–23; Catholic Mind (Eng.) 43 (Feb. 1945) 65–77. T. A. CORBETT, People or Masses: A Comparative Study in Political Theory (Washington 1950), contains 20 pages of bibliography. J. MONNEROT, Sociology and Psychology of Communism, tr. J. DEGRAS and R. REES (Boston 1960). H. BROCH, Massenpsychologie (Zurich 1959). P. REIWALD, Vom Geist der Massen: Handbuch der Massenpsychologie (Zurich 1946).

[T. A. CORBETT]

MASSES, VOTIVE

In addition to the liturgical cycle of Sundays and feasts, the Roman Missal and Lectionary of Paul VI (1969) provide prayers and readings for Masses to be offered in response to various pastoral situations. There are three kinds of such occasional Masses: Ritual Masses for the celebration of certain Sacraments, Masses for Various Needs and Occasions, and Votive Masses (GenInstrRom-Missal 326-341). In the former Missale Romanum of Pius V (1570), as well as in most sacramentaries from the Roman tradition, the term Missae votivae referred to all three varieties of such occasional Masses. In the present Missal (Sacramentary), however, the term Votive Mass refers only to fifteen Masses which celebrate such objects of devotion as the Sacred Heart, the Holy Name, the Precious Blood, the Holy Spirit, the Virgin Mary, St. Joseph, and the Apostles. In addition, the new Missal contains forty-six Masses for Various Needs and Occasions, and a great variety of Ritual Masses.

The Votive Masses may be celebrated on the following days of the liturgical year: (1) on weekdays in ordinary time when there is either an optional memorial of a saint or no memorial; (2) on obligatory memorials of saints, on weekdays of Advent, of Christmastime and of the Easter Season, only in the case of genuine pastoral need; and (3) by permission of the bishop, when serious need or pastoral advantage dictates, on any day except the Sundays of Advent, Lent and the Easter Season, Ash Wednesday, and during Holy Week. These same directives also apply for Masses for Various Needs and Occasions.

The practice of Votive Masses grew during the Middle Ages after the genesis of the liturgical calendar. Christians who had a special devotion to Jesus, Mary, or a saint would ask priests to offer Masses of petition or thanksgiving in the spirit of that devotion. The faithful would also request Masses for special needs or situations that arose in their daily lives and in society. Ritual Masses also arose from the sacramental needs of the people.

Bibliography: J. D. CRICHTON, Christian Celebration: The Mass (London 1971). G. DIX, The Shape of the Liturgy (London 1945). J. JUNGMANN, Mass of the Roman Rite (New York 1951, 1955).

[J. T. KELLEY]

MASSILLON, JEAN BAPTISTE

Celebrated French preacher and bishop; b. Hyères (Provence), June 24, 1663; d. Beauregard, Sept. 10, 1742. The son of François Massillon, a notary, he pursued his secondary studies in Hyères and Marseilles in the colleges of the Oratorians, whose congregation he entered at Aix in 1681, despite parental opposition. Upon completion of his theological studies, he taught in the Oratorian colleges at Pézenas, Marseilles, and Montbrison (1684–88) and at Vienne (1689–95), where he was ordained in 1691.

His superiors recognized his talent for preaching and in 1693 commissioned him to deliver the funeral orations for Villeroy, archbishop of Lyons, and M. de Villars, archbishop of Vienne. After a brief stay at the Oratory of Lyons, he was named director of the Seminary of Saint-Magloire in Paris (1696). Massillon's reputation as a preacher grew steadily as a result of his conférences to the young clerics and his highly successful Lenten sermons in Montpellier (1698) and at the Oratory in Paris (1699). He was summoned the same year to preach the Advent at Versailles, and his fame as a preacher became solidly established by this signal honor. His Lenten sermons before Louis XIV in 1701 and 1704 were acclaimed by his predecessors, Bossuet and Bourdaloue, and by the king himself, who declared that though formerly well pleased with the preachers, he was now quite displeased with himself. Included in the Lent of 1704 was Massillon's masterpiece "On the Fewness of the Elect." At the apogee of his success, Massillon fell victim to jealousy and suspicion; accused of Jansenism and of compromising relations with certain prominent families, he was never again summoned to Versailles during the lifetime of Louis XIV. Nevertheless, he continued to preach panegyrics, funeral orations, Lent and Advent discourses in important Paris churches, as well as the Advent of 1715 at the court of Stanislas, king of Lorraine. In 1709 he delivered the funeral oration of the Prince de Conti, in 1711 that of the Dauphin, and in 1715 that of Louis XIV, styled "The Great." On that momentous occasion Massillon began thus: "God alone is great, my brethren." Once more in court favor, Massillon was nominated by the regent in 1717 to the bishopric of Clermont (Auvergne) and was consecrated in the Tuileries chapel on Dec. 21, 1718. In the interim he preached before young Louis XV a Lenten course of 10 sermons, which, published under the title Le Petit Carême, became his most popular work. Upon his reception into the French Academy in February of 1719, Massillon was eulogized by Fleury, the king's preceptor. At the regent's request, Massillon was instrumental in securing Cardinal de NOAILLES'S compliance with the bull Unigenitus (1720) and was consequently the object of frequent attacks in the Jansenist publication Les Nouvelles Ecclésiastiques. Before devoting himself entirely to his see, he assisted at the coronation of Louis XV and preached the funeral oration of the regent's mother, the duchess of Orléans (1723).

Jean Baptiste Massillon. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

A conscientious worker, Massillon ably administered his vast diocese with its 29 abbeys, 284 priories, and 758 parishes. In his efforts to promote ecclesiastical discipline and public morals, he made frequent pastoral visits in his diocese, devoted attention to the temporal as well as spiritual needs of all, and held annual synods and retreats of priests. No less pastor than preacher, he eloquently exhorted his clergy to mutual charity and devotion to the poor. His correspondence with the king's intendants and ministers attests to his efforts to defend his flock against ministerial injustice and to improve their material condition.

More a moralist than theologian, Massillon was greatly admired as a preacher by such philosophes as Voltaire and D'Alembert. Less sublime than Bossuet, less logical than Bourdaloue, he excelled in a certain harmonious elegance and subtle persuasiveness not entirely devoid of rhetorical affectation. Even those faults so readily discernible upon literary analysis seem to have been quite transformed by his oratorical art. Described as "the Racine of the pulpit," he was equally gifted in understanding the human heart and analyzing its passions, and he put all his energies into combating the increasing impiety and incredulity of the time. This zeal, in conjunction with his rigorous Oratorian training, explains the severity of some of his sermons. His detractors did not hesitate to point out certain passages in his sermons on "Confession" and on "Communion" and "On the Fewness of the Elect" in which there is doctrinal exaggeration. However, the ensemble of Massillon's life and thought proves him to have been militantly anti-Jansenist, though at times theologically inexact, rather through excess of zeal than through heretical belief.

Although known principally as an orator, Massillon the man and bishop demonstrated in his life and work the teachings he so eloquently and fearlessly propounded to prince and priest alike. During his lifetime only the funeral oration on the Prince de Conti was published (1709). He disavowed unauthorized collections published at Trévoux in 1705, 1706, and 1714. In 1745 his nephew, Joseph Massillon, himself an Oratorian, published a collection of 15 volumes in Paris. The most recent and best edition is that of Blampignon (4 v. Bar-le-Duc 1865–68, Paris 1886), comprising 10 Advent sermons, 41 Lenten sermons, eight on the mysteries, and four on the virtues; 10 panegyrics; six funeral orations; 16 ecclesiastical conferences; 20 synodal discourses; 26 charges; paraphrases of 30 psalms; some pensées choisies; and 50 miscellaneous letters or notes.

Bibliography: J. LE ROND D'ALEMBERT, Éloge de Massillon in his Histoire des Membres de l'Académie Française (Paris 1810) v. 1, 5. L. F. F. THEREMIN, Demosthenes und Massillon (Berlin 1845). A. BAYLE, Massillon (Paris 1867). E. A. BLAMPIGNON, Massillon d'après des documents inédits (Paris 1879); L'Épiscopat de Massillon (Paris 1884); Supplément à la vie et à la correspondance de Massillon (Paris 1892). B. ATTAIX, Étude sur Massillon (Toulouse 1882). M. DE VALOIS COHENDY, Correspondance Mandements de Massillon (Clermont 1883). L. PAUTHE, Massillon (Paris 1908). A. MOLIEN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 10.1:258–265. A. CHÉREL, Massillon (Paris 1943). J. CHAMPOMIER, Massillon (Paris 1942).

[S. J. WASHINGTON]

MASSOULIÉ, ANTONIN

Dominican theologian who participated in the controversies on physical premotion and quietism; b. Toulouse, Oct. 28, 1632; d. Rome, Jan. 23, 1706. After his education in the humanities, he entered the Order April 21, 1647, and studied in the Dominican schools at Toulouse and Bordeaux. He earned his doctorate at Toulouse. He refused the episcopate but held office in the Order as provincial of Occitania (1679); prior of the Novitiate General in Paris (1684–87); visitator general of the priories in Alsace (1687); and socius to the master general until his death. During four pontificates Massoulié served as consultor to papal commissions investigating the questions of philosophical sin, QUIETISM, and CHINESE RITES. He was inquisitor general at Toulouse (1693), and a consultor of the Holy Office. He was called upon to examine the Maximes des Saints (1697) of Fénelon, upon which he passed an unfavorable judgment.

In his two-volume work, Divus Thomas sui interpres de divina motione et libertate creata (v.1) and De divinis auxiliis (v.2) Massoulié sought to prove that physical premotion was not the invention of BÁÑEZ but was true THOMISM, and to disprove the accusation that Thomism was Jansenistic. He wrote three treatises against quietism: Traité de la véritable orasion (1697), Traité de l'amour le Dieu (1703), and Méditations de St. Thomas sur les trois voies (1678). His unpublished manuscripts rest in the Casanatense Library, Rome, where he had been appointed the first professor of St. Thomas in 1701.

Bibliography: C. RAYSSON, Vie du V. P. Antonin Massoulié Dominicain (Paris 1717). A. TOURON, Histoire des hommes Illustres de l'ordre de St. Dominique, 6 v. (Paris 1743–49) 5:751–773. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 2.2:769–770, 827–829.

[J. J. HALADUS]

MASTER OF CEREMONIES

The person in charge of the direction of a liturgical function. The responsibility of the master of ceremonies is to instruct the ministers before liturgical functions and direct them during the functions. The origins of this role can be traced to the deacons whom early documents portray as quasi–masters of ceremonies. Though ceremonial directives had already become very explicit in the 7th-century Ordo Romanus Primus, the first mention of the title of master of ceremonies appears in the 17th–century CEREMONIAL OF BISHOPS.

[J. W. KAVANAGH/EDS.]

MASTRIUS, BARTHOLOMAEUS

Franciscan philosopher and theologian; b. Meldola (Forli), in the Papal States, December 1602; d. there, Jan. 3, 1673. After entering the Order of Friars Minor Conventual at an early age, he studied at Bologna and then at Naples, where he came under the influence of Joseph da Trapani, an eminent Scotist. He completed his studies at Rome and then taught at Cesena, Perugia, and Padua. He was provincial of Bologna from 1647 to 1650 and also held other high positions in the order. His earliest writing was done in collaboration with Bonaventure Bellutus and was aimed at providing a complete course in philosophy based upon Scotist principles. This work was earlier published in individual volumes but was eventually brought together in Philosophiae ad mentem Scoti cursus integer (5 v. Venice 1671). He then turned his attention to examining theology in the light of Scotist teaching and wrote Disputationes theologicae in quator libros Sententiarum ad mentem Scoti (4 v. Venice 1675) and Theologia moralis ad mentem dd. Seraphici et Subtilis concinnata (Venice 1671). His writings reveal a profound knowledge of scholastic philosophy and theology, especially that of Duns Scotus, and his argument is clear, precise, and critical. In controversies with other Scotists, including Matthew Ferchi and John Punch, he was severely sharp and direct. In the question of predestination and divine grace, he found in Scotism the basis of Trapani's theory of concomitant decrees, which he adopted.

Bibliography: B. CROWLEY, "The Life and Works of B. Mastrius," Franciscan Studies 8 (1948) 97–152. É. LONGPRÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.1:281–282. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 4: 20–21.

[J. C. WILLKE]

MASTURBATION

Masturbation is the act or practice of stimulating the external sexual organs by oneself. This article gives an explanation of the nature of masturbation, Scriptural background for the Church's teaching on masturbation, and other factors in the Church's moral evaluation of masturbation.

Masturbation, also called self-abuse, self-pollution, and onanism (see below), is the manipulation of the external sexual organs for the purpose of erotic self-stimulation to the point of climax or orgasm, by movements of the hand or other physical contacts, or by sexually stimulating pictures or imaginations (psychic masturbation), or by a combination of physical and psychic stimulation. When such stimulation takes place during sleep, it is called "nocturnal pollution" or "nocturnal emission." The term "mutual masturbation" is used to refer to the stimulation of the external genitals of one person by another, and vice versa, in order to produce climax or orgasm, but without engaging in sexual intercourse with each other.

Sexual studies done by social scientists show that some experience of masturbation is extremely common among young males at and after the age of puberty, and fairly common among girls and women. Such studies rarely distinguish between voluntary and involuntary acts, which is important for the moral evaluation of a particular masturbatory act.

Biblical Passages. In the tradition of the Church's teaching on masturbation, moral principles were drawn primarily from the interpretation of two Scriptural passages. The first, Genesis 38:8-10, from which the term "onanism" is coined, narrates Onan's unwillingness to produce offspring in the name of his older brother, Er, with his sister-in-law, Tamar. Er had died without an heir, and so Onan, upon the order of his father, Judah, is to take on this duty on behalf of his brother. Onan knew the child would not be considered his, but rather, would be considered his brother's offspring, so although he would lie with Tamar, he would spill his seed on the ground to avoid producing an offspring for his brother. For this sin, the Lord puts Onan to death. Although onanism was traditionally used as a synonym for masturbation, Onan's act could be more properly described as "withdrawal." Moreover, from the biblical author's point of view, Onan's sin was his refusal to fulfill the important responsibility involved in the levirate law (cf. Dt 25:5–10).

The second passage, 1 Cor 6:9–10, is a list of vices, or more specifically, "unjust persons" (ἄδικοι—adikoi) engaged in particular vices that prevent them from inheriting the Kingdom of God. Among the terms is the plural masculine, μαλάκοι (malakoi), of the adjective μαλάκος (malakos), which means "soft (to the touch)," "delicate" (cf. Mt 11:8; Lk 7:25). Paul uses this adjective as a substantive (noun), and thus it could be translated, rather literally, as "the soft," perhaps meaning the weakwilled, or, with its connection to fine clothing in the Gospels, perhaps the economically pampered. It has long been thought, however, that the term refers to some sexual deviance from Paul's point of view, at least in part because of its placement among other sexually related terms. The first term listed is πόρνοι (pornoi), "fornicators," or more generally, "sexually immoral." Paul then lists "idolators" (είδωλολάτραι—eidō lolatrai), followed by the sexually improprietous "adulterers" (μοιξo(v—moichoi). The fourth term is the one under consideration, which is followed by the problematic άρσενοκοῖται (arsenokoitai), a compound word, ἄρσεν + κοίτη $ars\bar{e}n$; male + $koit\bar{e}$; bed), which has been translated "sodomites" and even "practicing homosexuals." Both of these translations, however, are quite anachronistic, in that the former term gets it start from St. Augustine, De Civitate Dei 16:30 (Loader, 136), and the latter reflects very recent understandings of sexual orientation and the moral distinction between the unchosen orientation of homosexuality and freely chosen sexual acts by homosexual persons (whatever Paul's precise concern, he does not perceive people as "homosexually oriented," but rather, is dealing with acts and the blurring of sex roles; cf. Moxnes, esp. 213). Paul rounds off his list with less problematic terms, at least from the point of view of translation, though the precise act(s) meant by each term may be arguable: "thieves" (κλέπται—kleptai), "greedy" (πλεονέκται—pleonektai), "drunkards" (μέθυσοι—methusoi), "revilers" (λοίδοροι—loidoroi), and "robbers" (ἄρπαγες—harpages).

During the Patristic period and the medieval ages, some commentators thought the term μαλάκοι (malakoi) meant "masturbators." This is the only time in his authentic letters that Paul uses both this term as well as the difficult ἀρσενοκοῖται (arsenokoitai), which "Paul may have coined . . . since 1 Cor. 6:9 is the oldest literary indication of its use" (Collins, Ethics, 89; for Paul, this neologism might refer to Lv. 18:22; 20:13; the word is picked up in I Tm 1:10, which probably depends on 1 Cor. 6:9). Current scholarship tends to translate the term μαλάκοι (malakoi) as "catamite" (a boy kept by a pederast), or "boy/male prostitute," and ἀρσενοκοῖται (arsenokoitai) as "sodomites," despite, as noted, its anachronistic character. Additionally, some propose that these terms may, for Paul, refer to those who engage in homoerotic acts, whether in a passive or active role, respectively. Later uses of the latter term, however, can be found in the midst of economic vices, which "seems to suggest that a century or so after Paul first used the word it had the connotation of paying a man for sex. In the light of this, it may well be that malakoi and arsenokoitai denote the passive and active partners in sex for a price among males" (Collins, Ethics, 90). In the end, one must admit that all modern translations are "attempts to understand what Paul meant. It is usage that allows one to understand the meaning of a word. When a term is not used very much, it is very difficult, and sometimes impossible, to know what an author or a speaker intended to say by using a particular word" (Collins, Ethics, 87).

Moral Evaluation. Although it is rather clear that the above two Scriptural passages have little to do with the moral issue of masturbation per se, in addition to principles gleaned from them and others, the application of human reason, most especially to the understanding of the nature of the human person and human sexuality, supports the Church's understanding of human sexuality in general and, specifically, its moral evaluation of masturbation. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) teaches that the sexual function is meant by God to be enjoyed in "the total meaning of mutual self-giving" (CCC 2352) in the marriage relationship of a man and woman for the purposes of begetting children and of mutual pleasure for the building up of the couple's unity. Therefore, any deliberate activation of the sexual function outside the proper state of marriage and the purposes noted is seriously inordinate and, if voluntary and knowing, sinful. Within marriage such self- or mutual stimulation is moral only when it serves in some way to prepare for or to complete a natural act of sexual intercourse.

Within the Church's teaching on human sexuality, masturbation is considered to be objectively disordered or intrinsically evil (in se malum or intrinsece malum); that is, no circumstances or intentions can render the action of masturbation "morally good." The degree or seriousness of the moral culpability of a particular act of masturbation, however, can be judged only in the light of the degree of the moral actor's knowledge, freedom, and intentions; full moral guilt requires a fully deliberate choice of what the person fully realizes is seriously evil, which can then be evaluated as gravely, or mortally, sinful. If the act is performed with only partial realization or only partial choice of the will, the person is guilty of venial sin. If there is no free choice of the will, there is no guilt of sin at all, even if the person is aware of what he is doing. This is true even when a person foresees that sexual stimulation and even orgasm will result from some action that he or she is freely performing, provided that he or she does not intend the sexual stimulation but merely permits it, and has a sufficiently good reason for what he or she is doing (see DOUBLE EFFECT, PRINCIPLE OF). "One must take into account the affective immaturity, force of acquired habit, conditions of anxiety or other psychological or social factors that lessen or even extenuate moral culpability" (CCC 2352). It can also be noted that the sexual instinct is one of the human person's strongest instincts, and the pleasure connected with its activation is one of the keenest of sensual pleasures. For this reason, many normal persons may at times choose this form of self- or mutual gratification when other more natural forms are not available without difficulty or unwanted involvement, though such a deliberate choice is considered in Church teaching a grave matter.

Bibliography: J. C. FORD and G. KELLY, Contemporary Moral Theology (Westminster, Md. 1958) v. 1. H. NOLDIN, Summa theologiae moralis, ed. A. SCHMITT and G. HEINZEL (Innsbruck 1954) v. 1, De principiis (31st ed.) 329; Complementum: De castitate, ed. G. HEINZEL (35th ed. 1955) 29–41, 48–50. A. VERMEERSCH, De castitate et de vitiis contraries: Tractatus doctrinalis et moralis (2d ed. Rome 1921). L. WOUTERS, Tractatus dogmatico moralis de virtute castitatis et de vitiis oppositis (rev. ed. Bruges 1932). R. J. CLIFFORD and R. E. MURPHY, "Genesis," in New Jerome Biblical Commentary, ed. R. E. BROWN et al. (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1990) 8-43. R. COLLINS, First Corinthians (Sacra Pagina 7; Collegeville, Minn. 1999); Sexual Ethics in the New Testament: Behavior and Belief (Companions to the New Testament; New York 2000). JOHN PAUL II, Veritatis Splendor (Vatican City 1993), in Origins 23:18 (Oct. 14, 1993) 297-334. J. A. LOADER, A Tale of Two Cities: Sodom and Gomorrah in the Old Testament, Early Jewish and Early Christian Traditions (Contributions to Biblical Exegesis and Theology 1; Kampen 1990). H. MOXNES, "Honor, Shame, and the Outside World in Paul's Letter to the Romans," in The Social World of Formative Christianity and Judaism. Essays in Tribute to Howard Clark Kee, ed. J. NEUSNER et al. (Philadelphia 1988) 207-218. E. A. SPEISER, Genesis. Introduction, Translation, and Notes (Anchor Bible 1; Garden City, N.Y. 1964). B. VAWTER, On Genesis. A New Reading (Garden City, N.Y. 1977).

[J. J. FARRAHER/T. A. FRIEDRICHSEN]

MATER ET MAGISTRA

An ENCYCLICAL letter dealing with Christian teaching on modern social questions, addressed by John XXIII on May 15, 1961, to all members of the hierarchy, clergy, and laity of the entire Catholic world. Although not officially published until July of the same year, it was dated May 15, to commemorate the 70th anniversary of RERUM NOVARUM. It may be noted that the later and in some ways more famous encyclical Pacem in terris (April 11 1963) was addressed not only to Catholics but to "all men of good will."

The intent of the pope was made clear in the title of Mater et Magistra, "On Recent Developments of the Social Question in the Light of Christian Teaching." Like Leo XIII, John began by emphasizing that the Church is not only a teacher of what is right and wrong, but that she is also a mother who gives herself freely, especially for the "lowly and oppressed." The first section reviews the social conditions and the underlying false social philosophy that induced Leo to write his "complete synthesis of social principles," also referred to as a "compendium of Catholic social and economic teaching" and as the "Magna Charta of social and economic reconstruction." Special consideration is given to Leo's teaching on the social role of the Church, the dignity of the worker and his work, the social aspects of the institution of private property, the rights and obligations of governments to intervene in social questions, the right of workers to form their own associations, and the importance of human solidarity and Christian brotherhood. Pius XI's QUADRA-GESIMO ANNO (April 15, 1931) and Pius XII's radio broadcast La solennità (June 1, 1941) are discussed for their clarification of Leo's thought and their own unique contributions to the growing body of Catholic social thought.

The second section of Mater et Magistra analyzes certain major areas of Leo's teaching, in particular, the principle of SUBSIDIARITY; the importance of cooperation as a basic social and economic principle; the increased dependence of the individual on social groups; the necessity of maximizing the freedom of individuals and the lesser social groups; the demands of the common good; factors determining just wages; reconciliation of modern industrial and technological progress with the needs of all segments of the population; and, finally, questions of private property and public ownership. In this section John first applied the teaching of his predecessors to modern problems and, second, evinced a very real awareness of the importance of the community as an entity and of the interdependence of all men and of all nations.

The third section is the most original part of the document. It explores the problems of predominantly agricultural economies, especially in depressed areas of the world; calls for more vigorous action by public authorities to promote the interest of farmers and farm workers in every possible way, and stresses that the problems of depressed areas are the responsibility of the whole community, of nations, and especially of wealthier nations. Where there is imbalance between population and natural resources, Christian principles demand that the more fortunate nations take action to correct the situation by such measures as emergency aid and scientific, technical, and financial assistance. The autonomy of the receiving nations should be regarded as sacred, and the giving nations should not use the aid they render to develop a new form of colonialism.

The fourth and final section recalls the importance of truth, justice, and love in rebuilding a sound social order. The importance of the Church's social teachings is stressed with the injunction that these principles must not only be taught in all schools, especially seminaries, but that they must be implemented particularly through a vigorous lay apostolate. Furthermore, Catholics are asked not to hesitate to cooperate with people of other faiths in the tremendous task of humanizing and Christianizing modern civilization.

Bibliography: Official Latin text in Acta Apostolicae Sedis 53 (1961) 401–64. English translation in D.J. O'BRIEN and T.A. SHANNON, eds., Catholic Social Thought: The Documentary Heritage (Maryknoll, NY, 1992) 84–128. J. N. MOODY and J.G. LAWLER, The Challenge of Mater et Magistra (New York, 1963). J.F. CRONIN, Christianity and Social Progress: A Commentary on Mater et Magistra (Baltimore, 1965). J. Y. CALVEZ, The Social Thought of John XXIII: Mater Et Magistra (Chicago, 1964). D. J. O'BRIEN, "A Century of Catholic Social Teaching: Contexts and Comments" in J. COLEMAN, One Hundred Years of Catholic Social Thought (Maryknoll, NY, 1991) 13–24.

[T. J. HARTE]

People worshiping the dollar, Thomas Nast cartoon. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

MATERIALISM

A philosophical position that regards MATTER as the only reality. Materialism is principally opposed to SPIRI-TUALISM, which admits the reality of SPIRIT, and to IDE-ALISM, which reduces matter itself to an idea or other manifestation of mind. The various forms it has assumed throughout history may be described as classical materialism and as dialectical and historical materialism. The former, which flourished in antiquity and modern times, proposes that all changes are merely quantitative and that these suffice to explain thought and phenomena otherwise attributed to spirit; the latter, originated by K. MARX and F. ENGELS, places a dialectical process within matter and uses this to explain the evolution of thought and man's history. This article considers only classical materialism, treating it in its Greek and Roman period and in its modern development; the other forms are treated elsewhere (see MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORI-CAL).

Greek and Roman Period

In classical antiquity materialism was foreshadowed in the teaching of the early Greek naturalists who attempted to explain the universal in terms of one or other material principle (see GREEK PHILOSOPHY). It received systematic expression in the work of the atomists Leucippus and Democritus, and was more fully developed by Epicurus, whose doctrine was given wide diffusion through the efforts of the Roman poet Lucretius.

Leucippus and Democritus. For these thinkers, the only thing that really exists is the plenum, although this is not a unity, being divided by the void into a plurality of principles of being. Motion and alteration take place in this void, through processes of rarefaction and condensation associated with variations in the size of empty space. These processes presuppose that two bodies cannot occupy the same space or undergo any type of compenetration.

Atoms. Although Leucippus called the plenum "what is" and the void "what is not," he regarded the latter as being as real as the former and reckoned both as the causes of things. For him, atoms existing in empty space are the basic principles of the universe. These are infinite in number, invisible because of their smallness, endowed with extension and corporeality, and on this account called "first bodies." Physically indivisible also, they are named from this property ἄτομα, meaning indivisibles. They are qualitatively similar in all respects, differing from each other only quantitatively and spatially. From such atoms, themselves ingenerable and uncorruptible, all others things are generated. The different characteristics of such bodies are traceable to the various sizes, shapes, positions, and arrangements of atoms within them. Their generation and corruption is nothing more than a combination and separation of atoms, and their growth and diminution similarly an addition and subtraction of atoms.

The appearances of things do not constitute truth, although truth can be discerned from appearances through a proper understanding of what is perceived. The qualities that appear in things are really qualities of the senses $(\pi \acute{\alpha} \theta \eta \ \tau \mathring{\eta} \varsigma \ \alpha \acute{\alpha} \theta \acute{\eta} \sigma \epsilon \omega \varsigma)$; the various shapes and arrangements of atoms so affect man's senses as to provoke a reaction from them. Thus DEMOCRITUS states: "According to convention $(\nu \acute{\omega} \mu \dot{\omega})$ alone is there sweet, bitter, warm, cold, and color; in reality there are only atoms and empty space" (H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Greichisch und Deutsch, ed. W. Kranz [Berlin 1960–61] 9). The ultimate principles can be grasped only by the mind. Democritus here foreshadowed the distinction between primary and secondary qualities that was to be proposed with the beginnings of modern science.

For Democritus, atoms have properties that are independent of man's mode of conceiving them, viz, shape or form, size, heaviness, hardness, and perpetual motion. Size is immediately dependent upon shape, and heaviness upon size. Atoms are fitted with hooks, loops, and fasteners of various sorts; these make possible their entering into different types of lattice structures and combinations. (See ATOMISM.)

Origins. Little is known of early discussions regarding the initial movement of atoms and the circumstances of the world's origin. Since atoms are in eternal movement, Democritus assigned it no cause; in his view, what never has a beginning needs no cause. Empty space is not the cause of motion, but rather a presupposition or CONDITION for its possibility. Governed by the law that like seeks like, the lighter and finer atoms rose to constitute the rotating mass of the heavens, while the heavier and larger atoms gathered together at the center and formed the body of the earth. The stars were carried upward by a type of vortex motion and made to glow by their rapid rotation. Similar explanations were offered for other cosmic phenomena.

Like Leucippus before him, Democritus taught the necessity (ἀνάγκη) of all events. "Nothing arises without a cause, but everything for a determined reason and from necessity" (frg. 2). Thus CHANCE was banished from the universe. Necessity was conceived mechanically: pushes and pulls propel atoms to and fro in eternal motion. All other types of causality were neglected by these thinkers, so much so that Aristotle could reproach them for their laziness in investigating the origins of motion (Meta. 985b 18).

Spirit. Democritus did not deny the superiority of spirit; he recognized the soul's supremacy over the body, but thought that soul could be explained in terms of atoms. In Aristotle's account, Democritus allowed for soul and spirit without distinguishing between the two, regarding them as composed of atoms of fire that were spherical in shape, the finest and smoothest of the atoms (Anim. 405a 8–13, 406b 15–22). Since there was no qualitative difference between bodily atoms and soul atoms, the soul-body problem posed him no difficulty. Likewise, in his view, no clearly defined boundary separated the living from the nonliving. Man, whom he regarded as a microcosm, abounds in soul atoms that are spread all over his body; between any two bodily atoms there is always a soul atom. The soul is therefore material, the principle of motion in living bodies, and also the principle of perception and of thought. How unity is achieved between the bodily atoms interspersed with soul atoms, or how a peculiar combination of matter can produce the unity of consciousness and of the spiritual life, is left unexplained.

Epicurus and Lucretius. The Socratic philosophers reacted strongly against the doctrines of Leucippus and Democritus, but materialism soon found another supporter in EPICURUS, who developed the system in greater detail and strengthened its foundations. He maintained that nothing comes from nothing, for otherwise everything might come from everything. In his view, bodies alone exist and only the void is incorporeal. Like his predecessors, he distinguished between composed bodies and simple bodies or atoms, which are absolutely unchangeable. Since space is infinite, atoms must likewise be infinite in number. Epicurus ascribed motion to his atoms—a constant motion "downward," although he supplied no referent for this direction. Since, in his view, atoms deviate from their uniform motion, they collide and group themselves in various combinations, thus giving rise to the bodies of experience.

Epicurus conceived soul as a kind of vapor spread throughout man's body and associated with its heat. Bodies surrounding man continually give off minute particles that penetrate to his soul through sense organs and there excite mental images. With the dissolution of man's body, his soul is also dissolved.

Epicurean materialism received poetic expression and further development in the didactic poem De rerum natura of LUCRETIUS. Disturbed by thoughts on death and disquieted by religious faith in the gods and in a future punishment, Lucretius launched an impassioned battle against religion. Among the Epicureans the key problem had already arisen whether fear of death or fear of the gods was the greater evil. Lucretius dispensed with the gods but, in attempting to disprove the immortality of the soul, emphasized the reality of death more strongly than any other philosopher. He himself could not put his speculative ideals to practice. The poet within him fought against his restrictive materialism, and St. Jerome records that he put an end to his own life. His poem, however, still stands as the most appealing and cogent explanation of materialism in classical antiquity.

Modern Development

Christianity provided an effective barrier to the growth of materialism, and only with the humanist revival of the classics in the Renaissance did it again assert itself. It reached the peak of its development in the 18th and 19th centuries, after which it bequeathed its inheritance to Marxism and to the 20th-century development of dialectical materialism.

18th Century. The materialism of the 18th century was never completely disjoined from the materialism of antiquity, particularly that of Epicurus. DEISM sought only to have the universe rid of chaos and the world left alone, but the step from deism to materialism was short. John LOCKE took a skeptical position with respect to the spiritual soul, admitting the possibility that soul was merely matter. René DESCARTES extended his mechanistic explanation of nature to plants and animals, denying any type of soul in either and conceiving both as machines. It remained only for someone to apply this thought to man. J. O. de La Mettrie did this in his Histoire naturelle de l'âme (1745) and L'Homme machine (1748). His thesis that the substance of things is unknowable is similar to agnosticism, but his statement that man knows through the properties of matter and that these properties can explain the higher functions of the soul has broader implications. La Mettrie traced the difference between man and animals to differences in brain size and structure and, with complete lack of evidence, maintained that animals are capable of speech and of having a culture. His atheism was without a theoretical foundation since he regarded it as a condition of human existence.

In 1776 there appeared anonymously in Amsterdam a book entitled Le Système de la nature. Its author was the German Baron P. H. D. von HOLBACH, then living in Paris; his work was destined to become the bible of materialism. Here the basic thought of a radical materialism was systematized and extended over a wider range. For Holbach, the only thing that exists is matter in motion. La Mettrie had previously distinguished between motion and perception as different properties of matter, but now perception came to appear as a particular kind of motion.

The materialistic determinism of La Mettrie and Holbach seemingly did away with evil, guilt, and disorder. Freed of illusions, man could take his fate and his future into his own hand; he could forge his own happiness. With God and immortality, faith and the fear of a future life set aside, the way seemed open for the full development of man. Just how freely obligations and norms could be conceived on the basis of a naturalistic determinism had already occupied the thinking of Diderot, Voltaire, and Frederick the Great. Yet G. W. LEIBNIZ had shown that man, despite mechanical and mathematical explanations of phenomena, could give nature another meaning, while Shaftesbury, J. G. Herder, and Goethe had demonstrated that a mechanical conception of nature need not lead one to atheism.

19th Century. There are various reasons why materialism occupied such an important place in mid-19th-century Germany. For example, the extravagance of Hegel's idealism led his opponents to war against a spiritual metaphysics and even against Christianity. Hegel's a priori construction of nature likewise encouraged those with scientific mentalities to make exact inductive investigations. The younger generation thereupon relinquished the lecture hall of Hegel for the laboratories of the leading natural scientists. As they became more interested in the sensible and material world, their interest in atomistic and mechanistic explanations of nature led them to a mechanistic philosophy.

Science and Technology. The success of the natural sciences and the related rise of technology aided this movement. Already flourishing in France and England, the positivistic, utilitarian, and industrial revolution, with its great discoveries and improvements of living conditions, dulled interest in knowledge of man's inner nature and thereby banished from the universe the living, the besouled, and the spiritual. Contributing to such philosophical consequences were two misinterpreted discoveries of natural sciences: the law of the conservation of energy and the first synthesis of an organic chemical, urea, from inorganic matter.

Young natural scientists, particularly biologists and physicians, including Karl Vogt (1817–95), Jakob Moleschott (1822–93), and Ludwig Büchner (1824–99), were spokesmen for the materialist movement. Büchner's Kraft und Stoff (Frankfurt 1855) went through 20 editions and served as the handbook of German materialism. In it, he used his fundamental principle that every power is joined to some matter to exclude an other-worldly creator. He and his associates directed their battle against any special kind of vital force and against a substantial, spiritual, immortal soul. Denying the basic distinction between living and non-living, they treated the living entirely as a complex problem in mechanics.

German materialism in the 19th century was itself only a further development of the French. Popularized by Descartes and La Mettrie, the mechanistic theory of life had found wide diffusion. The machine generally hypnotized scientists: plants and animals, man himself, and the universe were regarded as machines. Physiologists were at work with phenomenological methods to explain mental processes. Vogt, following the French physician P. J. G. Cabanis (1757–1808), maintained that thought stands in the same relation to the brain as bile does to the liver and urine to the kidneys. Teleology was excluded from the universe; there was no dominion of spirit in and over nature. Belief in God was regarded by such thinkers as L. FEUERBACH as an illusion of man's mind.

Evolution. Advocating an evolutionary materialism and invoking Darwinist principles, D. F. STRAUSS and E. H. Haeckel thereupon assumed prominence in the materialist movement. Strauss, a follower of the Hegelian "left" (see HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM) and already famous for his radical Bible criticism Leben Jesu (Tübingen 1835), passed in his more mature work, Der alte und der neue Glaube (Leipzig 1872), from Hegelian idealism to materialism. For him, as for Hegel, new developments in biology led to a reinterpretation of the whole of nature.

The universe, in Strauss's view, is one mass of matter moving in infinite space and in infinite time. There is nothing outside of it, under it, before it, or after it. It is an infinite summation of universes that contains, in an unending circle of generations and corruptions, an eternally similar source of life within itself, a phoenix that burns itself out only to give birth from its ashes to a new life, a being that can be identified only with God.

For Strauss, as for other materialists, there is no essential distinction between living and nonliving; life is only a particular, though complicated, type of mechanism. Darwin's principles—the survival of the fittest, natural selection, small mutations taking place over a long period of time—he used to explain how various species take their origin. In man the organic evolutionary process reaches its highest point on this planet. All soul activities and spiritual life are traced back to the motion of atoms. Man has not come forth from the hand of God, but has sprung upward from the depths of nature. His first state was not the higher state of Paradise, from which he could fall, but that of an animal from which he has always been rising. There is no longer room for a supernatural God, for a realm of spirit, for a distinction between soul and body.

Haeckel's thought is similar to this. In a series of writings he sought to build Darwinism into a philosophical position. From the time of his Generelle Morphologie der Organismen (Berlin 1866) the fundamental thought behind this position is discernible. Two years later he published Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte, which explained the development of the world from the nebular hypothesis all the way to the origin of the spiritual in man. The work went through ten editions and was translated into 12 languages. A summary presentation of his philosophy was contained in the popularly oriented Die Welträtsel (Bonn 1899), of which 300,000 copies were printed in Germany and which was translated into 15 languages, and Die Lebenswunder (Stuttgart 1904).

Haeckel's theory of substance, in summary, envisioned an unchangeable, infinite matter endowed with eternal, infinite power, developing itself in an infinite and unbounded space and time. The formation of earth is a part of the evolution of the universe; with the appearance of carbon on its surface, organic life begins. In addition to traditional arguments from paleontology and anatomical similarities, Haeckel made extensive use of ontogeny, the basic law of biogenetics, which states that the development of the individual is a miniature reproduction of the development of the species. Knowledge of the animal origins of the human race he regarded as firmly established. He explained the human soul as a natural phenomenon, a physical process brought about by chemical changes and subject to the laws of matter. The material basis for all psychical reality is a body, the psychoplasm; each cell has a soul, and this soul is the sum of the elasticities stored up in the protoplasm. All living souls develop from the soul of the cell and its functions. Haeckel denied any peculiar properties to the human soul and thus any essential distinction between man and animal; he saw in man's gradual and stepwise development from the lower vertebrates his greatest triumph over the rest of nature.

Influence and Critique. The materialist movement reached its peak at the end of the 19th century. At that time SCIENTISM and the rationalist mentality held sway over the minds of men; mechanistic determinism and evolutionism seemed then to supply all the answers that could be asked about the physical universe. With the turn of the 20th century, however, advances in physical science, particularly in relativity and quantum theory, shook confidence in the world picture of Newton and Laplace. Scientists themselves gradually drifted away from mechanism; soon even they were questioning their ability to know matter in all its complexity. In philosophy, phenomenology and existentialism came into prominence, and schools that emphasized the reality of life, spirit, and culture attracted new interest. With the exception of Communist-dominated areas, where dialectical and historical materialism was given official endorsement, materialism ceased to be developed as a systematic philosophy. Antispiritualist thinkers, particularly in English-speaking countries, turned instead to pragmatism, naturalism, LOGICAL POSITIVISM, and analytical philosophy in an attempt to voice anew their materialist prejudices.

The inadequacies of materialism as a philosophy readily manifest themselves to those who examine seriously the concept of matter. Of itself inert and resistive to change, matter is insufficient to explain even motion, let alone life, perception, thought, and the supernatural. Those who maintain that it alone exists or that it alone has explanatory value do so only by blinding themselves to the realities that are most obvious and most intelligible to the human spirit.

See Also: ATHEISM; DEISM; HUMANISM, SECULAR; RATIONALISM; ENCYCLOPEDISTS.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–1963) v. 1, 4–7. s. CARAMELLA, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:407–414. H. KUHN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 7:161–163. H. BRAUN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:800–803. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe (Berlin 1027–30) 2:77–80. F. A. LANGE, History of Materialism, tr. E. C. THOMAS, 3 v. in 1 (3d ed. London 1957), introd. B. RUSSELL. C. J. H. HAYES, A Generation of Materialism, 1871–1900 (New York 1941). I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, Contemporary European Philosophy, tr. D. NICHOLL and K. ASCHEN-

BRENNER (Berkeley 1956). A. BANFI, Storia del materialismo, 2 v. (Milan 1952–53).

[H. MEYER]

MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL

Dialectical materialism and historical materialism are two components of the philosophy associated with Marxism-Leninism, the theory of communism. This theory, apart from its distinctive philosophy, embraces also political economy and scientific socialism. Political economy deals with the analysis of capitalist and socialist economic structures; its theoretical sections overlap those of historical materialism. Scientific socialism, though not fully developed within Marxism-Leninism, is supposed to deal with the realization of theory in practice. Philosophy itself is there defined as the science of the most general laws of nature, society, and human thought. Since it is divided into dialectical materialism and historical materialism, these constitute the main divisions of the present treatment.

Dialectical Materialism

Dialectical materialism is pleonastically defined as the science of the most general laws of nature, society, and human thought. Thus it is given the same definition as philosophy in general, although in actual practice it is concerned only with the formal components that enter also into historical materialism.

General Characteristics. Dialectical materialism, as the central component of Marxist-Leninist philosophy, is purported to be a complete philosophical system, containing all the disciplines necessary for an explanation of reality. Nothing is regarded as outside its purvey. Moreover, it is said to be scientific, and this in two senses. First, it is proposed as the only contemporary philosophical system capable of explaining the world in accord with the results of progress in modern science; secondly, it is scientific in the sense that it operates according to scientific rules and logical procedures. This philosophy is also said to be Marxist, again with two meanings. First, it is Marxist because it is supposedly the doctrine of Karl MARX as developed and passed on by Friedrich ENGELS and V. I. Lenin. Secondly, it is Marxist because it is revolutionary, providing the world outlook of the "revolutionary Marxist party." It is the philosophy of the proletariat, permitting the victorious march toward communism.

Materialist Aspects. As a MATERIALISM, dialectical materialism derives from a long tradition and shares some of the characteristics of previous materialisms, especially those of the 18th and 19th centuries. First, it is a thorough-going RATIONALISM. All that is can be known and explained; what now is unexplained will remain so only temporarily. Secondly, it is a complete SCIENTISM; the natural sciences are proposed as the last word in human knowing, and all philosophical activity must be based on the certitude provided by science. Thirdly, it is antimetaphysical (in the traditional sense of the term metaphysics) and, by the same token, antiphilosophical.

Dialectical Aspects. To these fundamental characteristics that it shares with other materialisms, dialectical materialism adds the new note that it is a completely different materialism—a "dialectical" materialism. This overcomes the basic defect of previous materialisms, i.e., their mechanistic reduction of the higher forms of material reality to lower and simpler forms. Its dialectical character also attentuates the rigidity of the first three characteristics. Thus, dialectical materialism is rationalist, but talks of the "dialectic of absolute and relative truth [knowledge]"; it is scientistic but insists that philosophy cannot be reduced to a mere "science of sciences"; it is anti-metaphysical, yet it develops doctrines on being and other ontological categories.

Monist Determinism. Finally, there are two characteristics that, although they mark previous forms of materialism, are nevertheless distinctive in the form they take in dialectical materialism. The first is MONISM: dialectical materialism is purported to be a materialist monism, meaning that it recognizes one reality—matter. The second is determinism: the complete intelligibility of reality postulated by the rationalism of dialectical materialism is based on the affirmation "for every effect, a cause." In turn, each of these basic principles has a dialectical interpretation that supplies its distinctive flavor; behind the materialist monism there is a "dialectic of being and thought," and behind the determinism there is a "dialectic of chance and necessity."

Basic Doctrines. For dialectical materialism, philosophy begins with the "basic question" as to which is primary, being (matter) or thought (spirit): materialists give primacy to the first and idealists to the second. Accordingly, there are three main chapters to dialectical materialism's exposition of the content of philosophy, dealing respectively with matter, with dialectic, and with thought.

Matter. This is consistently defined in the epistemological terms first used by Lenin: "Matter is the philosophical category for the designation of that objective reality which is given to man in his sensations, and which is copied, photographed, reflected in sensations, [while] existing independently of them" (V. I. Lenin, Works 14.133, in Russian). All matter is in motion. Without motion, there is no matter; without matter, there is no motion. Space and time are existential forms of matter. Again, without space and time, there is no matter; without matter, there is no space and time. The unity of the world consists in its materiality.

Dialectic. The dialectic—the Hegelian element in dialectical materialism—has two different, albeit complementary, meanings. First, the distinct components of reality are all in mutual interconnection: reality forms an organic whole in which the identity of the components is fully recognizable only as a function of the whole. Secondly, this organicity is of a dynamic nature, and the dynamic rhythm is determined by the "basic laws of the dialectic." For Engels, there were three such laws; for Lenin, sixteen (in the form of "points"); for Stalin, four; for mid-20th-century Soviet philosophy, the three that follow.

First, the "law of the unity and conflict of contraries" designates the causa efficiens (and materialis) of the movement of matter. Matter moves because the "real contradictions" it contains are in a triadic conflict that leads from "thesis vs. antithesis" to "synthesis"; this, in its turn, constitutes a new "thesis" for the continuation of the eternal process. Second, the "law of the transition from quantitative changes to qualitative changes" defines the nature of the movement of matter: the accumulation of a series of changes in quantity leads to a leap (skačok), the result of which is a qualitative change. Finally, the "law of negation of negation" explains the continuity of material reality throughout the process of change: in negating the "antithesis" (which is the negation of the "thesis"), the "synthesis" preserves all that was "positive" in the other two, but does this on a (qualitatively) higher plane.

Thought. Thought, or consciousness (soznanie), is for dialectical materialism—again following Lenin—a reflection (otraženie) of material (objective) reality. Knowledge progresses through the attainment of "relative" truths to the possession of "absolute" truths. Absolute truth is an ideal limit, but there are some "absolute truths" already known to man, e.g., the basic laws of the dialectic. Truth is the correspondence of thought to reality; but it is also the process of the accumulation of relative truths. "Practice," or practical transformatory activity, is the basis of knowledge and the criterion of truth. It is the basis of knowledge because only in work does man come into concrete contact with reality and with problems that cognitive activity must solve; it is the criterion of truth because only by verifying his ideas in practical activity can man see if they correspond to reality. Logic, the "logical," is a summary of the essential points of the "historical," which is reality in all its diversity. Thought (the "subjective dialectic") is, as a reflection of reality (the "objective dialectic"), abstract: the opposition of subject and object can be overcome only by an "ascent from abstract to concrete" (vosxoždenie ot abstraktnomu do konkretnogo).

Origins and Development. Although elements of dialectical materialism can be traced to most of the previous materialisms, especially the scientific materialism of 19th-century Germany represented by Karl Vogt, Ludwig Büchner, Jakob Moleschott, et al., its real formation began with the "Hegelian left," M. Stirner, D. F. Strauss, L. FEUERBACH, B. Bauer, and K. Marx (see HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM). This radical reaction to Hegelian idealism stressed a philosophy of action and advocated a pure rationalism. Feuerbach's Das Wesen des Christentums (1841) explained away religion as the creation and worship by man of an "alienation" (God) that was merely his conception of the ideal man. Marx made this notion fundamental, and pushed the analysis of alienation down to its economic roots. For him, all alienations—religious, civic, political—are derived from a basic alienation that is economic, i.e., that of man from his work and its fruits: this is a "dehumanization," because work is the prime property of man. Man is here conceived as the sum of his material needs and work as the means of satisfying them. But, it was Engels, not Marx, who—in his Dialectics of Nature (published posthumously 1925) and Anti-Dühring (1878)—began the development of dialectical materialism as such. Historically seen, dialectical materialism is a distillation made by Engels from Marx's historical materialism. Lenin, while giving a revolutionary twist to historical materialism, developed the epistemology of dialectical materialism in his Materialism and Empirio-Criticism (1909). Stalin's contribution to dialectical materialism (a chapter in the History of the Communist Party of 1938) is a popular presentation of the basic doctrines of Lenin.

Communist philosophy as promulgated by proponents in the Soviet Union falls into three periods: (1) from the death of Lenin (1924) to the decision of 1930; (2) from 1930 to 1947; and (3) from 1947 to the fall of the Soviet Union in 1989. The first period was marked by intense philosophical activity that culminated in the discussion between the "Deborinites" (followers of A. M. Deborin, a Hegelian) and the "mechanicists," or fundamentalist materialists. This discussion was decided by Stalin in favor of an orthodox wing, led by M. B. Mitin. Stalin's intervention discouraged independent philosophical thought, and the second or "quiet" period was marked by the dominance of "quotationism," where Soviet philosophers limited themselves to repeating what the "classics" (Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Stalin) had said. The third period was again one of intense activity. It began with the 1947 discussion of G. F. Aleksandrov's History of Western European Philosophy. Although this book was condemned for its "neutrality," Stalin—through A. A. Ždanov—encouraged Soviet philosophers to develop fresh views and gave them permission to do so.

The final period was marked by several discussions of some importance. The discussion of logic in 1950–51 dealt with the nature of dialectical logic and its relation to formal logic; it was decided that the dialectical logic of the classics is a higher form of logic, of which formal logic represents only a special case. The discussion on psychology (1950) decreed a "re-Pavlovization" of Soviet psychology, but failed to resolve the basic problem of the relationship between matter and spirit. The 1957 discussion on practice as an epistemological category has led to a redefinition of practice as "sense-contact." A large-scale attempt to develop dialectical logic as a logic began in 1958.

The most significant event of this period was Stalin's intervention in 1950 on the question of language. A Soviet linguist, N. J. Marr, had proposed that a theory of proletarian language be developed because of the unique class position of the proletariat. As it has its own art and philosophy, so the proletariat must have its own linguistic superstructure corresponding to its base. Stalin rejected this proposal, maintaining that language was one of the instruments of production, that it was not a part of the superstructure and, therefore, was not class-bound. Soviet philosophers took advantage of this loosening of the dogmatic strictures and argued that since logic is a matter of language, it is not class-bound either; and, since natural science is, like language, directly bound up with production, it too is not subject to class considerations. Thus, there was a general widening in the freedom of movement of Soviet philosophers and a restriction on the party's right to intervene in purely philosophical questions.

Influence and Critique. For better or worse, the influence of dialectical materialism on the philosophical currents of the Western world is almost nonexistent. With the exception of notorious communists or fellow travelers—Roger Garaudy in France, Maurice Cornforth in England, John Sommerville in the United States—only a few Western philosophers pay any serious attention to dialectical materialism. On the one hand, this is understandable since most of the valuable elements in this doctrine have been borrowed and simplified from other philosophers, notably Hegel and Aristotle; on the other, it is regrettable since, through historical materialism, this doctrine had a strong (though indirect) influence on the world's intelligentsia.

Thorough criticisms of dialectical materialism in general and of specific doctrines in particular are to be found in the books of Wetter and Bocheński (see bibliog.). The first thing that strikes one about this doctrine is its naïveté: almost all its affirmations are prephilosophical and commonsensical. Secondly, there is an obvious contradiction between the Hegelian dialectic and the basically realist epistemology. Again, the belligerent attitude of Soviet philosophers not only renders discussion unproductive; it also has a deleterious effect on the doctrine itself, since only the polemically useful parts are developed. Finally, there is a fundamental dishonesty in a philosophy that maintains rank nonsense in order to prove an extraphilosophical point, e.g., its tenacity in affirming the existence of real contradictions in order to eliminate God. Soviet philosophers did not realize that putting the source of movement within matter was no explanation; or that their fear of the introduction of God was unfounded, since the philosopher's concept of deity (prime mover, etc.) does not necessarily entail the personal God of Revelation.

Historical Materialism

Historical materialism is dialectical materialism as applicable or applied to society and history. It is the study of society and history in terms of the categories and laws of dialectical materialism. Like the latter, it is complete, scientific, and revolutionary. It is materialist insofar as it considers the production of material goods basic. It is dialectical because it is "historicist," i.e., history is conceived as the evolution of reality and humanity, and these, as explained above, form an organic whole. Finally, it conforms epistemologically to dialectical materialism, where thought is a reflection of being, since "social thought" (ideology) is defined as a reflection of "social being" (production).

Basic Doctrines. The basic elements of the Marxist-Leninist explanation of society and history are the forces of production (tools, raw materials, muscular power, etc.) and the relations of production (commercial relations like those between worker and employer, creditor and debtor, etc.). The relations of production form the "base" of society and determine the "superstructure" (political and legal doctrines, art, philosophy, and religion). Since the base is in constant evolution (all matter is in movement), and since the superstructure tends by nature to lag, there develops a tension expressing itself in the formation of classes that can be exhaustively divided into two main groups, the "progressive" and the "reactionary." These main classes are the "contradictories" in society and their conflict follows the basic laws of the dialectic.

History falls into five main periods, according to the dominant forces and relations of production and classes:

primitive, ancient, feudal, capitalist, and socialist. The tension between classes builds up (quantitative changes) to a "revolutionary situation": revolution is a leap in which a new qualitative situation comes to be wherein one class negates the other. The ideologies are reflections of the base, i.e., of the class-conditions of their exponents. Thus, bourgeois ideology (philosophy, art, etc.) serves the interests of the exploiters, while proletarian ideology (Marxism-Leninism) serves the interests of the proletarian masses; the latter are the best interests of all of humanity. The Communist party, which is the "vanguard," "conscience," and "honor" of the proletariat, therefore represents the best interests of all of humanity and is entitled to govern all domains. Mankind, finally, is moving toward a final state of paradise on earth, communism, and it is led to this goal by the proletariat, i.e., by the Communist party.

Origins and Development. Elements of historical materialism are to be found in the writings of Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU, SAINT-SIMON, Fourrier, et al., but its true founder was Karl Marx. Engels contributed little to its formulation. Lenin attenuated Marx's economic determinism with his revolutionary voluntarism; he affirmed that revolution did not have to wait for changes in the economic base, but could be effected by a disciplined party of professional revolutionaries. Stalin's only contribution of note was the interpretation of language mentioned above.

Influence and Critique. It is difficult to overestimate the influence that this doctrine had, especially on the nonphilosophical intelligentsia. For those who put a price on certainty in the explanation of social and historical events, historical materialism purported to offer a doctrine that is simple (two basic elements), clear (everything follows from the conflict of these two), inspiring (history has a glorious goal), and directive (one knows what to do to aid history). Add to this the fact that the whole doctrine is couched in seemingly simple terms, and it becomes easy to see why it was most popular among the substitutes for religion in the twentieth century.

Yet historical materialism was also an a priori schematism with a conceptual coherence almost completely lacking in the events it was supposed to explain. Secondly, its conceptual apparatus was much too rough: e.g., the notion of class, which is fundamental, was always left vague. Finally, it was based on several gratuitous assumptions, e.g., on the nature of man, the origin of society, and "communism of the future," which were all unacceptable, the last shown to be false with the fall of the USSR in 1989.

Bibliography: G. A. WETTER, Dialectical Materialism: A Historical and Systematic Survey of Philosophy in the Soviet Union,

tr. P. HEATH (New York 1959), ample bibliography. I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, Der sowjetrussische dialektische Materialismus (3d ed. Bern 1960), ample bibliography. For more analytic treatment of special questions, see the books in the series Sovietica (Institute of East-European Studies, University of Fribourg). Also ref. Studies in Soviet Thought, quarterly of the same institute. T. J. BLAKELEY, Soviet Philosophy: A General Introduction to Contemporary Soviet Thought (Dordrecht, Holland 1964).

[T. J. BLAKELEY]

MATHEMATICS, PHILOSOPHY OF

Philosophy of mathematics is a broad term including any theory on the nature of mathematics as a whole or on the nature of any part or aspect of mathematics. A specialized branch of learning, it deals with the following and related topics: the origin of mathematical knowledge and its relation to the real world; the nature and type of existence peculiar to mathematical entities; mathematics as viewed by mathematicians and by other scientists and this either absolutely, or in terms of its relationship to other human and cultural values (hence the "logic of" or the "psychology of" mathematics). A thorough presentation of the philosophy of mathematics would, then, include a discussion of each of these aspects. The analysis here is restricted to a consideration of various theories on the nature of mathematics and a critical evaluation of these theories.

Various Theories

Since a philosophy of mathematics is based on a given mathematical content, this exposition is divided into three parts, roughly corresponding to the three major developments within mathematics itself: the classical, the transitional, and the contemporary.

Classical Period: c. 3000 B.C. to A.D. 1600. From the time of its origin among the Egyptians and of its development as a science by the Greeks (c. 600 B.C.) until the 16th century, the content of pure mathematics embraced arithmetic and basic number theory, along with geometry, the conic sections, and basic trigonometry. Music, astronomy, geography, mechanics, and hydrostatics constituted applied mathematics.

Greek Theories. It is currently held that the philosophy of mathematics originated with the same Greeks who have also been credited with being the founders of mathematics as a science. Among the Pre-Socratics, the PY-THAGOREANS proposed the first complete theory: the principles of mathematics, number and form, are the principles and the basic reality of all things. Each thing has its own mathematical number and form: justice is the number four (and therefore a square); time is seven; perfection is ten, etc. The Pythagoreans were largely responsible also for the division of mathematics into arithmetic (and music, as applied arithmetic) and geometry (and astronomy, as applied geometry).

PLATO modified this view, placing mathematics within the framework of knowledge in general: ordinary knowledge of material things ("opinion") is unstable because the objects known are constantly changing; mathematics achieves more stable knowledge because its objects, numbers and forms, do not change; while the most perfect kind of knowledge ("dialectic") is the contemplation of ideas or forms of which the sense, and even the mathematical words, are but a participation and imitation. Mathematical entities, then, differ from sense objects in being eternal and unchangeable; they differ from the forms in that there are many alike (many circles), while the form is in each case unique. The Pythagorean-Platonic view is adopted totally or with modifications by PLOTINUS, PROCLUS, NICHOLAS OF CUSA, COPERNICUS, KEPLER, GALILEO, and many others.

The Aristotelian view classifies mathematics as one of three speculative sciences (see SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF). Mathematics arises by means of ABSTRACTION from sense data and deals with "quantified substance" as discrete (number), whence arise the arithmetical branches, or as continuous (form), whence arise the geometrical branches. Mathematics is but one way of fulfilling man's ability to know reality; it has a pedagogical and useful value, but it is not a knowledge necessary for, or leading to, an other-worldly contemplation. BOETHIUS, AVICENNA, AVERROËS, THOMAS AQUINAS, and many medieval scholars support this view with modifications, and the writings of Francis BACON, G. W. LEIBNIZ, Auguste COMTE, and many others, show its influence.

The skeptical view of mathematics is ably expressed by Sextus Empiricus (c. 250 A.D.) whose analysis of mathematical notions denies that they are clear, universal, and necessary, and proposes that they are inexact, empirical, and conventional (see SKEPTICISM). The British empiricists of the 16th and 17th centuries and some contemporaries adopt a similar interpretation.

Medieval Theory. The view of St. Thomas Aquinas is an instance of the medieval theory of mathematics. Essentially that of Aristotle, whose ideas he enriches with insights and refinements of earlier commentators and by his own metaphysical and terminological precision, Aquinas's theory considers mathematics, physics, and metaphysics as the three speculative (pure) sciences. In mathematics, one considers those aspects of things that depend not on their qualitative modifications but only on the fact that they are "quantified," that is, subject to quantity—either the numerableness of things, or the shapes and forms in which quantity is, or might be, arranged.

In common with the other speculative sciences, mathematics is based upon what might be called preliminary knowledge and experience (now referred to as "prereflective" knowledge) of the quantitative aspects of things. This preliminary knowledge must include at least a vague understanding of the terms with which one expresses quantity (one, two; circle, square). After adding to this prereflective data an explicit understanding of logical procedure, one establishes axioms and postulates, defines mathematical objects (e.g., a square), and then proceeds to deduce the characteristics of those objects that are necessarily implied by the given definition (e.g., that a square is equiangular). The conclusions that are thereby reached are restricted only by the scope of man's imagination. Mathematics is the most exact and certain of the three speculative sciences and exercises a certain hegemony over the sciences of nature.

Greek and medieval thought was familiar with several sciences in which the propositions of pure mathematics are applied to other sciences. Aquinas names astronomy and optics as instances of applied geometry, and music, of applied arithmetic. They are called "intermediate" (scientiae mediae) because they employ the mathematical method of DEMONSTRATION (formally mathematical) on subject matter from sensible nature (materially physical).

The liberal arts for Thomas Aquinas are ordered to knowledge and involve some sort of making, working, or producing, as making a syllogism or a speech, composing melodies, and reckoning the course of the stars. Mathematics (arithmetic and music; geometry and astronomy) form the quadrivium (four-ways), while logic, grammar, and rhetoric form the trivium (three-ways) of the seven liberal arts—all of which formed part of the medieval scheme of education, especially aimed at learning philosophy. As a liberal art, mathematics designates the mind's capacity to make concepts symbolic of quantity as discrete (number-symbols) or as continuous (form-symbols).

Transitional Period: 1600 to 1850. During this period, geometry lost its dominance over arithmetic through the invention of analytic geometry. A second significant discovery, the infinitesimal calculus, opened the way for the mathematical study of change and motion. Arithmetic and algebra, trigonometry, and various other branches and aspects of both pure and applied mathematics were either developed or founded anew.

Unfortunately, the philosophy of mathematics was given less attention, and no new and original theories arose to match the new mathematics. The philosopher George BERKELEY, offered some sound criticism of the loose reasoning that accompanied the first invention of the calculus. But the main growth in the philosophy of mathematics consisted in the dream of a universal science and method that haunted such thinkers as F. BACON, R. DESCARTES, B. PASCAL, and especially G. W. Leibniz. At the close of this period, this dream was fulfilled through the formulation of symbolic logic.

Immanuel KANT is well known for his analysis of mathematics and of science, but apparently he was unaware of the basic changes that mathematics had undergone. He considered mathematics as a system of absolute conceptions (synthetic a priori judgments) constructed within and unified by the central and regulative intuitions of space and time. Other theories during this period generally followed the philosophical outlook of their proponents, as in RATIONALISM, EMPIRICISM, IDEALISM, and POSITIVISM.

Contemporary Period: 1850 to the Present. In contrast to its earlier status, mathematics in the contemporary period is characterized by two significant changes. First, the invention of symbolic logic and the refinement of the axiomatic method have endowed it with a richer symbolism and led to its presentation as a system of purely deductive structures based on primitive axioms and propositions. Secondly, the change of outlook on such subjects as algebra and geometry, the development of analysis, and the introduction of the infinite into mathematics through Cantor's theory of sets have greatly enlarged the content of contemporary mathematics. Of special importance today are three theories included under the title of "foundations of mathematics."

Logicism, originating principally with G. Boole, G. Frege, and G. Peano, holds mathematics to be a branch of logic; the identity of mathematics with logic was formally proposed in B. Russell and A. N. Whitehead's Principia Mathematica.

Formalism, deriving mainly from David Hilbert (who claims Euclid as forerunner), originally began as a refinement of axiomatic method (as in Euclid's Elements). It was further developed by Hilbert and his followers to ease the crises caused by the paradoxes of Principia Mathematica, and to demonstrate the consistency of classical mathematics challenged by Brouwer and his school. Hilbert formulated classical mathematics by means of "meaningless" symbols as formal axiomatic theory (especially in his and P. Bernays' Grundlagen der Mathematik); this "meaningless" formalization, in turn, acquires meaning by becoming an object of a mathematical study called "proof-theory" or metamathematics.

Intuitionism, advocated by L. E. J. Brouwer, as a general philosophy holds that man's primordial experience is mathematical, that mathematics is identical with the exact part of human thought, and that no science (not even philosophy or logic) exercises priority or hegemony over mathematics. As a philosophy of mathematics, it holds to the dependence of mathematics on intuition alone and requires constructibility in terms of the natural numbers as the sole method of mathematical proof. Certain parts of classical mathematics and the logical law of excluded middle are rejected. Language and symbols are instruments for communicating mathematical ideas, but are not to be considered mathematics.

Critical Evaluation

It has been traditional in philosophy to view pure mathematics as a science dealing with quantity as discrete (arithmetic) or as continuous (geometry), and to consider astronomy and music as branches of applied mathematics. But this view needs now to be greatly enlarged by a deeper appreciation of tradition, an understanding of the development of mathematics itself, and an integration of current views on the foundations of mathematics.

Foundations. Mathematics can still be considered a highly abstract science having both a pure, or speculative, and a practical, or applied, aspect. As the intuitionists have partly shown, however, there are two ways in which pure mathematics originates from sense data. (1) Before mind actually "abstracts" the notion of circle or number, it must have previously generalized from sense experience such basic notions as structure (quantitative form), correspondence, the notions of singularity (unity) and group (multitude), and of sequence and order—a group of notions that form the basic architecture of the mind's mathematical universe. (2) It is only into this potentially prepared mathematical world that mind can "abstract" and then "localize" such mathematical entities as group, aggregate, circle, or number.

Once the mind has been equipped with these basic laws and foundational entities, it is to the credit of logicism and formalism to have shown that one can "mathematicize" in three ways. (1) Aided by creative imagination and by renewed recourse to sense imagery, the mind can tend to purify and perfect the entities (e.g., figures and numbers), or to embellish and create new instances of them (as inventing new numbers, or constructing topology). (2) The mind can neglect the basic mathematical paradigms themselves—even to the extent of considering them formless and meaningless inhabitants of this universe—and concentrate on their arrangement, i.e., their relations of priority and posteriority or of simplicity and complexity. Once this has been done, one can reintroduce mathematical entities to see if they can be made conformable to this new structural arrangement. At this point, the formalist school is content if no contradiction can be shown, while the intuitionists require that each new mathematical entity must be "shown" or constructed. (3) Another way of manipulating mathematical entities, pointed up by the invention of the infinitesimal calculus, is to consider them as relatively moveable and changeable, and to determine their laws of generation and their mutual reducibility within the mathematical universe. It is here that the import of such mathematical "actions" as squaring and differentiating is made clear, and the possibility of the infinitely small and the infinitely large is seen to be consistent.

Further Integration. A yet further advance is made when mind compares the mathematical with, say, the logical or the metaphysical universes or with the universe of language; or, again, when mind considers the methodology it employs in mathematics as similar to, or as contrasted with, that of other sciences. These considerations form a large area of interest in contemporary philosophy of mathematics.

A final way of considering mathematical entities is that proper to applied mathematics. This is the "projective" technique of matching such entities with, or imposing mathematical structures upon, the world of experience. Tradition has not always been clear on the distinction between pure and applied mathematics, and was given to emphasizing the static and immobile aspect of mathematics and its closeness to sense experience. The fact of various geometries and algebras shows that in pure mathematics, at least, there is no unique geometry or algebra of the real world, and that in applied mathematics the operational or pragmatic definition of truth applies: whatever mathematical system works best for the problem at hand is true.

A clear notion of mathematical abstraction, however, enables one to hold that mathematics is still a science of reality. To say that mathematics studies "quantity" is a traditional but inexact shorthand for stating that it studies any "ordering or structuring of the parts of quantified substance" (since, even in tradition, no "accident" as "quantity" can be the subject of science). The speculative mathematical universe, then, is the world of the traditional "intelligible" (imaginable) matter within which the mind engages in any of the various types of mathematical activity outlined above.

See Also: QUANTITY; CONTINUUM; EXTENSION.

Bibliography: E. W. BETH, Foundations of Mathematics (Amsterdam 1959). W. C. and M. KNEALE, The Development of Logic (New York 1962) 379–688. G. T. KNEEBONE, Mathematical Logic and the Foundations of Mathematics (New York 1963). E. A. MAZ-IARZ, Philosophy of Mathematics (New York 1950). S. KÖRNER, The Philosophy of Mathematics (London 1960). B. R. RUSSELL, Principles of Mathematics, v.1 (New York 1938).

[E. A. MAZIARZ]

MATHER, INCREASE AND COTTON

Father and son, Puritan clergymen.

Increase, b. Dorchester, Mass., June 21, 1639; d. Boston, Mass., Aug. 23, 1723. He was the youngest son of Richard Mather, a prominent Puritan clergyman and Katherine (Holt) Mather. He attended Harvard (B.A. 1656), but spent most of his time in Ipswich and Boston studying under Rev. John Norton. Later he entered Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland (M.A. 1658). In 1661, after serving as chaplain to the soldiers on Guernsey, he returned to Boston and married Maria Cotton, daughter of John. Mather was a leader in Puritan circles, becoming pastor (1664) of the Second Church in Boston, a post he retained throughout his life. From 1685 to 1701 he was president of Harvard, but spent little time in Cambridge, preferring to devote his time to church affairs. In 1688 the colony sent him to England, where, after three years, he finally obtained a new charter. After 1692 his influence declined. His numerous writings include theological, historical, and biographical works. Cases of Conscience Concerning Evil Spirits (1693) appeared during the witchcraft hysteria and cautioned against the abuses of the witch trials.

Cotton, b. Boston, Feb. 12, 1663; d. there, Feb. 13, 1728. He graduated from Harvard (B.A. 1678, M.A. 1681) and was ordained (1685), serving at the Second Church during his father's absences and after his father's death. In 1718, with his father, he assisted at the ordination of a Baptist minister, and three years later he championed the unpopular cause of innoculation against smallpox. He was one of the founders of Yale and was the first native American to be a fellow of the Royal Society. His publications include Magnalia Christi Americana (1702), a collection of materials on the ecclesiastical history of New England; Wonders of The Invisible World (1693); and Essays to Do Good (1710).

[E. DELANEY]

MATHEW, THEOBALD

Known as the apostle of temperance; b. Thomaston, County Tipperary, Ireland, Oct. 10, 1790; d. Cobh, County Cork, Dec. 8, 1856. He was the fourth of the 12 children of James Mathew, of a distinguished Catholic family, and Anne Whyte. From childhood he had personal charm and a spirit of generosity. In 1807 he entered Maynooth College but left. In 1808 he was accepted by the Capuchins. Soon after ordination (1813) he was assigned to Cork. He became Cork's most beloved citizen. In 1822 he was made Capuchin provincial, an office he held for 29 years, when he resigned because of ill health. After continued urging, he became (1838) head of the Cork Total Abstinence Society. Within a short time he enrolled thousands of members. Although it was a time of political unrest, Mathew kept his mission nonpolitical and won support even of non-Catholics. He sought no honors and always tried to correct the popular notion that he had miraculous power. His remarkable preaching drew hundreds of thousands throughout Ireland. In 1842 to 1843 he went to Scotland and England, giving the pledge to more than 200,000. In spring 1848, after the famine years, his untiring zeal (nearly six million had joined the society) took its toll: he had a stroke. Recovering somewhat, Mathew came to America in 1849. Despite ill health, he visited 25 states and gave the pledge to 600,000. In December 1851 he returned to Cork, broken in health and saddened by the failure of many to keep the pledge. His continued patience in the face of suffering and disappointment manifested his personal sanctity. Although his apostolate failed, it became the inspiration of later and more successful movements.

Bibliography: J. F. MAGUIRE, Father Mathew: A Biography (New York 1864), basic source. P. ROGERS, Father Theobald Mathew, Apostle of Temperance (New York 1945), good refs. FATHER AUGUSTINE, Catholic Encyclopedia 10:47–48. J. O'MAHONEY in The Irish Way, ed. F. J. SHEED (New York 1932).

[P. J. KELLY]

MATHEWS, SHAILER

Baptist theologian; b. Portland, Maine, May 26, 1863; d. Chicago, Ill., Oct. 23, 1941. After studying at Colby College, Waterville, Maine, the Newton Theological Institution, Mass., and the University of Berlin, Germany, Mathews taught at Colby College for seven years. Later he joined the faculty of the divinity school at the University of Chicago (1894–1908) and served as dean of the school (1908-33). As one of the early and influential proponents of the SOCIAL GOSPEL, he attempted to apply the teachings of Christ to modern social and economic problems. He was a defender of the modernist point of view and sought to effect a cooperation between science and religion. For him, theology was functional, its purpose being to give a rational statement of Christian attitudes and hopes in a particular era. He maintained that theological thought can be meaningful only when it uses the social patterns of the times as a vehicle of expression.

"Religion," he held, "will have to find a pattern which is as axiomatic for modern man of our day as the pattern of sovereignty was to the modern man of the sixteenth century" (Jackson, 35–36). He was the author of numerous books, including The Social Teachings of Jesus (1897), The Faith of Modernism (1924), Creative Christianity (1935), and The New Faith for Old: An Autobiography (1936). From 1903 to 1911 he was editor of the World Today, and later was editor of the Biblical World (1913–20). He served for four years as president of the Federal Council of Churches (1912–16).

See Also: NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A.

Bibliography: J. H. JACKSON, Many But One (New York 1964).

[E. DELANEY]

MATHIEU, FRANÇOIS DÉSIRÉ

Archbishop of Toulouse, cardinal, historian; b. Einville (Meurtheet-Moselle), France, May 27, 1839; d. London, Oct. 26, 1908. He studied at the minor seminary in Pontà-Mousson and at the major seminary in Nancy. Even before ordination (1863) he taught in the minor seminary. After becoming a doctor of literature (1878), he acted as chaplain (1879) in the boarding school in Nancy run by the Dominicans, and was named honorary canon (1883) and pastor of St. Martin's parish in Pontà-Mousson (1893). He succeeded Charles FREPPEL as bishop of Angers (Jan. 3, 1893). In his diocese he founded the Society of Priestly Vocations, reestablished the titles of archpriest and dean, and strove to assure the prosperity of the Catholic university. In 1896 he was transferred to the Archdiocese of Toulouse, taking possession of the see September 29. After being created cardinal (June 19, 1899), he was called to Rome, but he continued to administer his diocese until March 1900. In the Roman Curia he was a member of several congregations and was also charged with diplomatic missions. His publications included his doctrinal theses, L'Ancien régime dans la province de Lorraine et Barrois and De Joannis abbatis Gorziensis vita (1878). Le Concordat de 1801 (1903) attracted much attention, as did an article by him in the Revue des Deux Mondes (1904) on "Les derniers jours de Léon XIII et le conclave, par un témoin." He was elected to the French Academy (June 1906) and was received into membership (Feb. 7, 1907) by the Count of Haussonville. He died in London, where he had gone to participate in a Eucharistic congress. An original and distinguished personality, good-humored and simple, Mathieu put into effect the directives of Leo XIII, notably those concerning reconciliation between Catholics and the French Third Republic.

Bibliography: E. RENARD, "Un Cardinal de Curie: Le Cardinal Mathieu," Le Correspondant 285 (1921) 224–256; Le Cardinal Mathieu (Paris 1925).

[R. LIMOUZIN-LAMOTHE]

MATHIS, MICHAEL AMBROSE

Liturgist, promoter of missions; b. South Bend, Ind., Oct. 6, 1885; d. University of Notre Dame, South Bend, March 10, 1960. His parents, Jacob P., a carpenter, and Elizabeth (Thome), had immigrated to the United States in 1881 from the Saarland in Germany. He joined the Congregation of Holy Cross in 1901, took his B.Litt. at the University of Notre Dame in 1910, and was ordained in 1914. He studied architecture at the Catholic University of America for a year and then Holy Scripture, earning his S.T.D. in 1920. He was professor of Holy Scripture for seven years at Holy Cross College, Washington, D.C.

Unable to go to the foreign missions because of World War I, he was appointed U.S. procurator for the Holy Cross missions in 1915. He organized the first systematic financial support of these missions, founding in 1917 the Bengal (later Holy Cross) Foreign Mission Society. In 1919 he launched the Bengalese, a magazine that published the work and the needs of the Holy Cross Missions. Mindful too of the importance of properly trained missionaries, he built the Holy Cross Foreign Mission Seminary, Washington, D.C., in 1924 and became its first superior. One of the first missiologists in the United States, he was a recognized authority on India's Catholic missions. In 1930 he was elected president of the Catholic Anthropological Conference. In 1922 he collaborated with Dr. Paluel Flagg and others to form the Medical Mission Committee, which by 1924 became the permanent Catholic Medical Mission Board. Along with Dr. Anna Dengel, he also founded the MEDICAL MISSION SIS-TERS in 1925, the first community of women to combine the religious life and the practice of medicine. From 1933 to 1938 he devoted his time and energy completely to them as their chaplain and ecclesiastical superior. To him more than to any other influence the community owes the liturgical spirit that has characterized it.

Mathis, influenced by Pius PARSCH, came to be known for his contribution to the liturgical apostolate in the United States even more than for his mission work. In the summer of 1947 he started the liturgy program at the University of Notre Dame, leading to an M.A. in liturgy. It was the first graduate school of liturgy in North America. He brought over from Europe outstanding liturgiologists, many of whose courses were published under the general title, Liturgical Studies. In 1954 he organized, as an offshoot of a course on liturgical architecture, an annual seminar for architects and artists at Notre Dame. He was an active member of the Liturgical Conference and a member of its board of directors from 1948 to 1956.

He thus attained distinction in two fields and was a pioneer in each. He was blessed with a tenacity of will that caused him to persevere in spite of difficulties and with a personal warmth and charm that served him well when it came to enlisting the assistance of others in his apostolic works.

Bibliography: G. E. SCHIDEL, "Never Too Much. In Memoriam: Rev. Michael Ambrose Mathis, C.S.C.," Yearbook of Liturgical Studies 3 (1962) 3–34.

[G. E. SCHIDEL]

MATIGNON, FRANCIS ANTHONY

Missionary; b. Paris, France, Nov. 10, 1753; d. Boston, Mass., Sept. 19, 1818. He attended the Sorbonne to prepare for the priesthood, was ordained Sept. 19, 1778, and received a doctorate in theology in 1785. Joining the theological faculty of the College of Navarre in 1786, he remained there until the anticlericalism of the French Revolution closed the college in 1791. When Matignon refused to take the oath to support the civil constitution of the clergy, he was forced to leave France.

After a few months in England, he returned to Paris to prepare for a mission in the U.S. In August 1792 Bp. John Carroll of Baltimore, Md., assigned him to Boston, Mass., where he found the Catholics internally divided into French and Irish parties and externally suffering under the contempt of Protestants. Within a year he healed the schism, resolving all differences between French and Irish Catholics in Boston. His influence with Protestants was also notable; when he applied for American citizenship in 1795, his petition was endorsed by five Protestant ministers. In 1796, his friend, Father John CHEVERUS, joined him in Boston for the difficult mission area that covered all of New England.

Matignon, dissatisfied with renting space for church services, initiated plans for building the Church of the Holy Cross, whose architect was Charles Bulfinch. Funds were scarce and he traveled throughout the Diocese of Baltimore for assistance. He himself gave $1,000 for this purpose, and 140 Protestants contributed to the building fund. Construction began in 1799 and the church was dedicated four years later by Carroll. A small school was operated under Matignon's direction from 1804 to 1807. When Matignon refused to have his name sent to Rome, Cheverus was named first bishop of Boston in 1808. Until he died in 1818, Matignon remained the bishop's closest aide.

Bibliography: R. H. LORD et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston 1604 to 1943, 3 v. (Boston 1945).

[T. F. CASEY]

MATILDA, EMPRESS

Lived from 1102 to 1167. Matilda was born Feb. 7, 1102 to King Henry I of England and his wife, Edith Matilda. At eight years of age she was sent to Germany as the bride of the Holy Roman Emperor, HENRY V. As an adult, she helped her husband govern his Italian lands and acted as regent for him upon occasion in Italy and Lotharingia. When Henry V died of stomach cancer in 1125, Matilda returned to her father's court.

Matilda's only brother, William, had perished in the wreck of the White Ship in 1120, leaving Henry I without an obvious heir. The king was under pressure from his nobles to appoint William Clito, the son of his elder brother and bitter enemy Robert Curthose, as his heir. Therefore, at his Christmas court in 1126, Henry I named Matilda as his heir and required all the barons to swear a solemn oath to support her, an oath that was repeated twice more prior to the king's death in 1135. Seeking an ally in this struggle, Henry betrothed his daughter to Geoffrey Plantagenet, the son of Count Fulk of Anjou. The decision was greeted with consternation by the Anglo-Norman barons, since the Angevins had always been the enemies of the dukes of Normandy.

When Henry I died suddenly in 1135, Matilda and Geoffrey moved at once to secure their possessions in Normandy. Meanwhile, Matilda's cousin, Stephen of Blois, the son of Henry's sister, Adela, dashed at once to England, where he had himself crowned king on Dec. 22, 1135. By 1137 he had consolidated his power sufficiently to confront Matilda and Geoffrey on the Continent, but quarreling among the baronial leaders of his army soon forced him to return to England.

In 1139, Matilda appealed to the Second Lateran Council in Rome for recognition of her right to the English throne, but the Church declined to rule on her case and continued to acknowledge Stephen as king. Supported by her half-brother, Earl Robert of Gloucester, Matilda invaded England in 1139. During the next two years the combatants sparred indecisively, but on Feb. 2, 1141, Matilda's forces routed Stephen's army at Lincoln and took the king himself prisoner. The empress traveled to London to arrange her coronation, but a violent uprising of the citizens forced her to flee to Oxford in June. The sources are vague about the causes of the rebellion, accusing the empress of haughtiness and excessive pride, of demanding money from the Londoners and of failing to listen to the advice of her chief magnates. However, it is more likely that the rebellion was instigated by Stephen's wife, Matilda of Boulogne, who kept the royal cause alive while her husband was imprisoned.

While the Empress Matilda's forces besieged the city of Winchester, a royalist army led by the queen surprised the attackers and captured Robert of Gloucester. Matilda agreed to exchange King Stephen for her chief adviser and military commander, which returned the situation to what it had been before the battle of Lincoln. Afterwards, Matilda's fortunes declined rapidly. In December 1142 she was forced to escape from Oxford by having herself lowered from the castle tower by ropes, and to walk through the snow to Abingdon. She remained in England for six more years, but from that time forward, neither party succeeded in making any inroads into the territory of the other.

In the meantime, Geoffrey of Anjou had fared better, capturing the city of Rouen and becoming duke of Normandy in 1144. Matilda returned to the continent in 1148 and settled at Rouen, where she remained for the rest of her life. Her son, Henry, succeeded peacefully to the English throne in 1154 following Stephen's death. Matilda assisted her son in ruling Normandy for the rest of her life, frequently acting as regent when his duties took him to other parts of his vast empire. She died on Sept. 10, 1167 and was buried at the abbey of Bec.

Bibliography: M. CHIBNALL, The Ecclesiastical History of Orderic Vitalis, v. 6 (Oxford 1978); The Empress Matilda: Queen Consort, Queen Mother and Lady of the English (Oxford 1991). K. R. POTTER, Gesta Stephani (Oxford 1976). E. KING and K. R. POTTER, William of Malmesbury: The Historia Novella (Oxford 1998). E. KING, The Anarchy of Stephen's Reign (Oxford 1994).

[J. TRUAX]

MATILDA, QUEEN OF GERMANY, ST.

Queen of Germany; b. 895; d. Quedlinburg, March 14, 968. Matilda was the daughter of the Saxon Count Dietrich and the lady Reinhild of Danish royalty. She was reared at the Benedictine convent at Herford where her grandmother was abbess. After her marriage in 909 to Henry the Fowler (later King Henry I), she bore him five famous children: OTTO (I) THE GREAT; Gerberga, wife of Louis IV of France; Hedwig, mother of Hugh Capet; St. BRUNO OF COLOGNE; and Henry, duke of Bavaria. Upon her husband's death she at first opposed, but later supported, Otto's succession to the throne. Suffering much from the strife among her sons, she found support in works of piety and in the foundation of several monasteries, notably Nordhausen, and QUEDLINBURG, where she was buried.

Matilda of Tuscany, fresco painting.

Feast: March 14.

Bibliography: Two Vitae, Monumenta Germaniae Historica Scriptores (Berlin 1826—) 4:283–302; 10:575–582. A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca historica medii aevi (Graz 1954) 2:1468–69. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints. rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:592–593. M. LINTZEL, "Die Mathilden-Viten und das Wahrheitsproblem in der Ueberlieferung der Ottonenzeit," Archiv für Kulturgeschichte 38 (1956) 152–166.

[C. DAVIS]

MATILDA OF TUSCANY

Countess of Tuscany and faithful ally of the papacy in the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE; b. 1046; d. Bondeno, near Ferrara, Italy, July 24, 1115. From her father Boniface of Canossa (d. c. 1052) she inherited the marches of Tuscany and Lombardy-Emilia, which she ruled jointly with her mother BEATRICE OF TUSCANY from 1069 to 1076. In 1069 she married Godfrey the Hunchback, Duke of Lorraine, but by 1071 had separated from him. Of mystical temperament and with aspirations toward an ascetic life, she became the ardent disciple of GREGORY VII. At Canossa in 1077 she interceded with Gregory for HENRY IV and guaranteed the Emperor's pledges, but after Henry's breach of faith she dedicated herself completely to the papal cause. For two decades she was the mainstay of the reform party in Italy. In 1081 Henry deposed her from her margraviate and drove her forces from Tuscany. After the election of Pope URBAN II, she resumed open warfare against Henry. In 1089 she contracted a shortlived political marriage with the young Welf V of Bavaria. She supported Conrad of Germany in his rebellion against his father. By an act of 1079 or 1080, confirmed in 1102, she donated to the papacy her allodial lands on both sides of the Alps, reserving the usufruct of them during her lifetime (see STATES OF THE CHURCH). In 1111 she was reconciled with the Emperor Henry V and made him her heir, without prejudice to the prior donation and in the hope of ending the investiture struggle. This donation later gave rise to a prolonged controversy. In 1115 Matilda's body was buried in the Mantuan monastery of SAN BENEDETTO POLIRONE. Five centuries later Pope Urban VIII had her body transferred to St. Peter's in Rome, where it rests in the tomb designed by Bernini in 1635.

Bibliography: DONIZO, Vita Mathildis, ed. L. SIMEONI, Muratori RIS2 5.2 (1940). A. OVERMANN, Gräfin Mathilde von Tuscien (Innsbruck 1895). R. DAVIDSOHN, Geschichte von Florenz, 4 v. (Berlin 1896–1927) v.1. L. TONDELLI, Matilde di Canossa (2d ed. Rome 1926); Studi gregoriani 4:365–371; Il millenario di Canossa (Reggio Calabria 1951). N. GRIMALDI, La contessa Matilde e la sua stirpe feudale (Florence 1928). A. FERRUA, "La donazione della contessa Matilde," La civiltà cattolica 94.1 (1943) 212–223. L. SIMEONI, "Il contributo della contessa Matilde al Papata nella lotta per le investiture," Studi gregoriani 1:353–372.

[C. E. BOYD]

MATINS

The Latin word matutinum means "the morning hours." The term was first used for the morning prayer of praise (subsequently called LAUDS). The night choir Office was not originally called Matins but Vigils, because its proper place was around midnight or in the first half of the night. In the Middle Ages, this night choir Office was called Matins as it was celebrated at the end of the night toward the hour of prayer at dawn, Lauds.

Prayer during the night was already recommended to Christians of the 3d century. According to Tertullian (d. after 220), a vigil was observed by the whole community on many occasions during the year, and lasted throughout the whole of Easter night (Ad uxorem 2.4; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 1:1407). Later, monks held the vigil every night (John Cassian, d. c. 430; De institutione coenobiorum 3.2; Patrologia Latina 49:115), and Emperor Justinian I (527–565) ordered it for all clerics of his empire (Corpus iuris civilis, Codex Iustinianus, ed. P. Krueger, 1.3.1.42). Its recitation remains an obligation for the secular and regular clergy under the 1971 revision of the Liturgy of the Hours.

The vigil that the bishop or priest held with the community consisted in readings with related singing and prayer; here the readings were most important. Monks, on the other hand, placed greater value on the psalmody.

This is shown by the Rule of St. Benedict, since one could, according to it, shorten the readings rather than the psalmody (ch. 10). The form of the public vigil is preserved in the Roman EASTER VIGIL.

The form of the monastic vigil consisted first in the singing of Psalms; the readings and responsories then followed. St. Benedict was acquainted with this form of the vigil in the Roman basilicas, where, already in his time, monks celebrated the hours of prayer. He modified somewhat the form he found there for the benefit of his own monks, so that Roman and monastic Matins were distinguished from that time on.

Traditionally, Matins opened with an Invitatory or invitation to prayer that consisted of Psalm 94, which was sung with intermittent short refrains. After the Invitatory came the hymn of the day. As with all the other hours of the Office, Matins, when separated from Lauds, was concluded with a Collect. Medieval monastic Matins, however, concluded with the Te Deum, the Gospel of the day, and the hymn Te decet laus.

Nocturn. On greater feast days, the medieval Matins was divided into three nocturns, each having three Psalms and three readings. There is disagreement among scholars regarding the origin of this tripartite division into nocturns. J. A. Jungmann claimed that nothing in the sources proves that the three nocturns were originally three separate prayer services; this arrangement was simply a subsequent external division of a single nocturn (Pastoral Liturgy 118). A. Baumstark, on the other hand, maintained that this threefold division came from Syria, where there were three (originally two) independent hours of prayer (Nocturna laus 145–155).

Psalmody. In the medieval Matins, the Psalms were sung by antiphonal choirs: one-half of the choir answers the other. The Psalm was opened by a verse through which the tone was given, the antiphon; the same verse was also sung at the end. At Matins, Psalms 1 to 108 were progressively distributed through the week, i.e., those not used for other hours of the Office. On more solemn feasts (e.g., the feasts of the Apostles), those Psalms were chosen that were suitable for the day.

Readings. The readings were drawn from Scripture, the Fathers, and the lives of the saints. Holy Scripture was read daily according to a determined order. Since the cursus of readings was computed for one year, only a selection of texts was read. During Lent as well as on several other days only a patristic homily on the Gospel of the day was used. The feasts of the saints had, as a rule, a short description of their lives, and often a legend of the saint.

Responsory. The Responsory comprised a response, a verse, and the repetition of half the response. For the individual books on Scripture there exist ancient series of responsories that in the Middle Ages were called "histories" because together they often form ballads about the history of Israel.

Since for priests in the active ministry Matins were too long, Pius X (d. 1914) had already begun to shorten them (nine instead of the 18 or 12 Psalms). Pius XII (d. 1958) and John XXIII (d. 1963) went even further and reduced the number of readings for most feast days. For a long time, priests were allowed to anticipate Matins, i.e., to recite them the previous afternoon, since an hour of prayer during the night was hardly possible for them. In the 1971 Liturgy of the Hours, Matins is called the Office of Readings and may be recited at any time of the day by those not in choir. The complete revision of this hour has resulted in a longer and better selection of readings from scriptural and patristic sources, with a corresponding reduction in legendary materials for the lives of the saints.

Bibliography: A. BAUMSTARK, Nocturna laus (Münster 1957). J. PASCHER, Das Stundengebet der römischen Kirche (Munich 1954); Das liturgische Jahr (Munich 1963). J. A. JUNGMANN, Pastoral Liturgy (New York 1962).

[J. PASCHER/EDS.]

MATRIMONY, SACRAMENT OF

The human experience of matrimony is a saving mystery. Traditional Christianity understands this as a lifelong union of conjugal love between woman and man, and calls this experience sacramental, binding spouses not just to one another but also to God. This entry examines the following topics: (i) the biblical and historical tradition; (ii) the meaning of sacramentality in a new conceptual framework; and, (iii) its pastoral and liturgical aspects.

Mystery and Sacrament

The 2000 years of Christian tradition provide a basis for examining the theology of marriage in order to develop a truly Catholic meaning of its sacramentality. History offers two historical tradition-bound eras of Christian marriage, corresponding to the two millennia. They represent two different theological contexts for the sacramentality of marriage. In the first millennium, the institution of marriage remained, largely, a secular reality. It was considered a holy and sacred state but not subjected to canonical legislation or ecclesiastical intervention. Nevertheless, Christians understood the conjugal partnership from a universal, open-ended and inclusive perspective of the Christian mystery. From the eleventh century onward, wedding celebrations were gradually incorporated into the Church's canonical regulation and liturgical rituals. And the scholastics of the twelfth century developed the concept of sacrament.

An engraving depicting Roman emperor Theodosius I (347–395) officiating at the wedding of his niece's Catholic marriage. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

The First Millennium: A Saving Mystery. The paramount vision of the ancient tradition stems from the consideration of the economy of salvation. Jesus gives marriage its ultimate meaning. He clearly indicates his intention to restore matrimony to the ideal presented in Genesis and to vigorously reinstate the law of marital unity. "Whoever puts away his wife, except for immorality, and marries another, commits adultery; and he who marries a woman who has been put away commits adultery" (Mt 19.9; see also Mk 10.11; Lk 16.18). Both Peter (1 Pt 3.1–7) and Paul (Col 3.18–21; Ti 2.4–5) instruct the faithful in the requirements of married life for Christians. Christian marriage should be lived "in the Lord" (1 Cor 7:39) and this consideration has moral, spiritual and ecclesial implications. The foundational source of the Christian inspiration and symbolism of marriage comes from biblical revelation. It begins in the economy of creation (Gn 2:23-24) and was enlightened by prophetic revelation. Marriage images God's covenant perfected by Christ's covenantal sacrifice, and proclaimed as a reality of grace in the same covenant between Christ and the Church (Eph 5:21–33). This Pauline text presents the Christ-Church relationship as a paradigm of the husbandwife partnership.

The patristic view takes inspiration from this biblical background, developing the spiritual roots of marriage from biblical sources, especially from the heart of the biblical covenant. The patristic terminology used—such as mystery, image and type—have a deeper, broader and analogical meaning of marriage as a revelatory and participatory sign of the nuptial self-giving of Christ for the Church. Very often the Church Fathers' writings on virginity provide opportunity to envisage marriage as a covenant partnership.

St. AUGUSTINE's approach to both marriage ethos and mystery brought about a new stage of development, which influenced decisively the centuries that followed. On one hand, marriage as an institution was good and was elevated by Christ. In this sense it was endowed with three objective goods: procreation, fidelity, and sacrament. On the other hand, the conjugal act, whose purpose was procreation only, was extrinsically evil by virtue of the malice of concupiscence. The concept of sacrament had the broad sense of "mystery" related to Christ. This sacramentality constituted the Christocentric foundation and source of all marriage values, including indissolubility, because "the holiness of the sacrament is more valuable than the fertility of the womb" (De Bono coniungali 18, 21). The development of conjugal spirituality and sacramentality was also influenced and enriched by the Fathers of the Christian East, such as St. Basil and St. John Chrysostom. Again, the sacramental conception is broad, because marriage is seen as a mysterious icon, inserted in the whole of salvation history, centered in Christ rooted in baptism, and sealed by the Eucharist.

The Church's concern is exclusively pastoral because "Christians marry like everybody else" (Epistle to Diognetus 5, 6). They followed the customary folk marriage celebrations, which were also regulated by local traditions and Roman legislation. The pastoral concern of the Church is attested from the beginning: "It is fitting that men and women who want to marry get the approval of the bishop, so that their marriage is according to the Lord, not according to passion" (Letter to Polycarp 5, 2).

An incipient liturgical rite is evidenced from the fourth century onward. It cannot be equated with a formal realization of an ecclesiastical marriage of later centuries. In general, the veiling of the bride with a special blessing by the priest could be considered the Christian nuptial blessing in Rome. Garlanding (stephanoma) came to be the central symbolic rite in the East. Here a richer nuptial liturgy was characterized by the theological depth of the sacramental mystery, exuberant symbolic celebration, and a pastoral realism rooted in the human values of marriage and biblical revelation. Nevertheless, across the ancient world wedding rituals took place in a multiplicity of regional cultures and a variety of local rites under civil jurisdiction. The most important reference is perhaps found in Tertullian, who presented the theological implications and the Christian character of the marital covenant between two baptized believers. This covenant partnership becomes sacramental in the broad sense by virtue of the faith actualized within the participation in a Eucharistic community:

> How shall we ever be able to adequately describe the happiness of that marriage which the Church founds, and the Eucharist confirms, upon which the prayer of thanksgiving sets a consent? For not even on earth do children marry properly without their fathers permission. (Ad Uxorem 2, c.8:6–9)

Some historians see here an indisputable reference to an existing liturgy of marriage integrated into the celebration of the Eucharist. On the contrary, this text is correctly understood only if it is interpreted within the context of an exhortation to shun any contact with marriage with a pagan. The right interpretation of the key words of this text of the Catholic period of Tertullian is crucial.

"The Sacrament of Matrimony," 14th-century sculpture by Andrea Pisano on the campanile of the Cathedral at Florence. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

The Second Millennium: The Catholic Sacrament. Changes in the theological understanding of marriage came about because of social and historical changes, and the development of new religious ideas over centuries. Whereas in the first millennium the emphasis was on spiritual foundations, now it moved to juridical categories of contract and indissolubility. In the beginning, marriage had been seen as secular but was related to the ecclesial community by virtue of Christian dignity. Later, marriage was seen as religious, made holy in a sacred place, and was related to civil society by virtue of a canonical form. A family-centered and civil celebration of marriage remained the norm in Latin Churches until the ninth century. From then until the council of Trent, there was a gradual transfer of the discipline of marriage and the regulations of its ceremonies to the authority of the Church.

The first compilation of Canon Law—the Gratian's Decree—appeared around 1140 while Hugh of St. Victor (1079–1141) made a major contribution to the sacramental definition of marriage. A contract-centered theology of matrimony emerged from the emphasis on consent or copula (consummation) as the essential elements for the validity of the sacrament. In the ensuing centuries, this approach led to the juridical essence of marriage as a sacrament. Changes also took place in the liturgical ritual. The essential element remained consent, but now there was a pre-nuptial investigation made by the priest. All of this led to the development of a canonical and ecclesiastical character of marriage.

The first official declaration of marriage as a sacrament was made in 1184 at the Council of Verona. This was followed by Thomas Aquinas' synthesis of the sacrament of matrimony that combined St. Augustine's values of marriage as its ends within a new conception of its full sacramental dignity. In matrimony, the principal effect is the permanent sacramental bond, and grace is given for the evocation of the living image of unity that is a mysterious reflection of the union between Christ and His Church (Summa theologiae Supplement, 34.2 ad 1, ad 2; 35.1; 42.3).

The Protestant Reformers emphasized the holiness of marriage from the point of view of the Christian vocation as well as the covenantal nature of God's plan for the couple, although the sacramental reality was denied. In response, the Council of Trent (1563) ratified the Augustinian conception of marriage (DS 1797–1812) and this position prevailed until modern times. Trent aimed to lay the social groundwork for the validity and indissolubility of the sacrament. In the process, the biblical, mystical, and relational inspiration of Christian marriage was overlooked. This approach remained the basis of theological and pastoral thinking until Vatican II (1963–1965), supplemented by papal encyclicals such as Pius XI's Casti connubi.

Vatican II. The Second Vatican Council, facing the challenges posed by modern cultures, viewed the whole question of marriage in a much broader way (especially in Lumen Gentium 11, 35,41; and Gaudium et Spes 12, 47-52, 61.) The Council Fathers defined marriage as a personal community, in which partners give and accept each other (covenant), and also as an intimate partnership of marital life and love (personalist perspective). They avoided the legal term "contract" in favor of the biblical and classical term "covenant": Marriage is "rooted in the conjugal covenant of irrevocable personal consent"; it is a "reflection of the loving covenant uniting Christ with his Church, and a participation in that covenant"; it is compared to the "covenant of love and fidelity through which God in the past made himself present to his people" (Gaudium et spes 48).

This line of thinking was reiterated in the Apostolic Exhortation, Familiaris Consortio of Pope John Paul II, 1980 (especially nos. 13 and 51), and in the 1983 Code of Canon law. Canon 105 states:

The matrimonial covenant, by which a man and a woman establish between themselves a partner-ship of the whole of life, is by its nature ordained toward the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring; this covenant between baptized persons has been raised by Christ the Lord to the dignity of a sacrament.

Thus, the communion of the faithful and permanent love of the spouses has gradually replaced the juridical mind-set of past generations.

Postconciliar Theological Understandings of Matrimony

Marriage, like other sacraments, is fundamentally symbolic in nature. The conjugal partnership is a life experience replete with complex meanings and levels of reality, and a symbolic expression of something deep and transcendent. As a sacrament, Christian marriage has a symbolic structure that conveys a deeper meaning of the human mystery, and offers the possibility of self-transcendence. Their end is salvation both as a hope and as a means to it. Love can only be expressed through symbols, whether it is love of God or love of a human person. Although the images, gestures, or words express so deep a reality, they are, in themselves, simple. Simple gestures such as a kiss, a handshake, gift giving, or uttering the phrase "I love you" express in a profound manner a deeper yet readily understood reality.

The pledge of the old Anglican wedding rite, "with my body I thee worship," speaks profoundly of the central meaning of the analogy. Like worship, which etymologically means, "ascribing worth to another being," marriage is a total validation of the other in the devotion and service, celebration and mystery of the relationship. Just as the experience of worship engages the whole person, so too marriage is the total gift of self to the other.

Postconciliar developments in the theology of matrimony have explored the rich complexity of marriage from various overlapping perspectives. These include: marriage as vocation, marriage as communion, marriage as covenant, marriage as sacrament, and marriage as partnership. Taken together, these theological perspectives embrace and express the sacramentality of marriage.

Marriage as Vocation. Marriage is a true vocation. Theologically, a vocation means a call or invitation given by God to the Christian life or to some particular service or state. "The vocation to marriage is written in the very nature of man and woman as they came from the hand of the Creator" (Catechism of the Catholic Church 1603). Theologically speaking, marriage is a divine call, which empowers the couple to set up an intimate community of persons able to love and serve. The Church has always seen marriage as a vocation and has emphasized, especially in more recent times, the "universal call to holiness." All people are called to this holiness, not only those in the monastic or celibate states. Marriage is perhaps the vocation "par excellence," for here the spouses are God's co-creators in the gift of new life.

It is the desire of the Church, in promoting a better understanding of marriage as an on-going process, or an initiation into a vocation, that the spouses come to see that God has initiated a great work in them. An understanding of what it means to be "called" by God and to live out that special "calling" will greatly assist the married couple in dealing with the challenges of married life. God's call always implies a bestowal of grace to meet the challenge of the call, and therefore God's assistance and grace is constantly available to the spouses.

Marriage as Communion. Marriage is God's creative reality raised to the dignity of a sacrament, established as a covenant of intimate communion of life and love, by which the spouses signify and share in the mystery of love and fidelity between Christ and the Church (Rite of Marriage, 1990, Introduction). Communion with another means a mutual sharing of the gift of self. In marriage this means a total sharing of joys, sorrows, pains, and successes in a complete gift of self to the other. Thus, the man and the woman who "are no longer two but one" (Mt 19:6) help and serve each other by their marriage partnership; they become conscious of their unity and experience it more deeply from day to day (Gaudium et spes 48).

Marriage as covenant. "Covenant" is the graced and intimate personal encounter between God and His people fulfilled in Christ. It is the cornerstone of Christian sacramentality. Marriage when it is lived as mutual selfgiving and intimate sharing between a man and a woman exemplifies this biblical concept of covenant.

From earliest times, the Church has regarded marriage in this way (cf. Eph 5:32). Patristic theology drew insights from the biblical paradigm to describe marriage as the "image and likeness" of God's covenant with humanity. This understanding was reiterated at Vatican II: "Just as God encountered his people with a covenant of love and fidelity, so our Savior, the spouse of the Church, now encounters Christian spouses through the sacrament of marriage" (Gaudium et spes 48). The section on Marriage in the Catechism of the Catholic Church begins with the assertion: "The matrimonial covenant, by which a man and a woman establish between themselves a partnership of the whole of life" (Catechism of the Catholic Church 1601). And again, "Christian marriage in its turn becomes an efficacious sign, the sacrament of the covenant of Christ and the Church. Since it signifies and communicates grace, marriage between baptized persons is a true sacrament of the New Covenant" (ibid. 1617). The ultimate prototype of this is the marriage of Christ and his bride, the Church, in which he sacrifices everything for her, even his life. It is the couple's faith as expressed in their lives that renders them people of the covenant and consequently makes their union a sign and a Christian sacrament of the covenant.

Marriage as Sacrament. The idea of marriage as one of the seven SACRAMENTS of the Church was developed by the eleventh-century scholastic theologians and adopted officially by the medieval hierarchy in the following century. This understanding stemmed from the meaning of sacrament as mystery, proposed by the early Church Fathers, especially Augustine, who spoke about the three foods of marriage: offspring, faithfulness, and sacrament. Consequently, "marriage as a sacrament" can be said to have two different, but not separate, dimensions—1) human mystery and 2) saving reality.

Marriage is a human mystery. Faithful love is the very essence of the marital partnership and the heart of its meaning; this unconditional fidelity makes marriage a primary and universal symbol. In addition, all peoples, of all religions, acknowledge marriage as the original, universal sacramentality known to human life. Thus, the sacramental mystery of marriage is fully anchored in human reality; it is a radically human sacrament. The three specific elements of Christian marriage—faith, baptism, and community—stem from the Christ-Church spousal relationship. This is the ecclesial dimension of marriage and what makes a marriage truly Christian.

Marriage as Partnership. Marriage is a life-long journey during which the couple widens its field of love to embrace the children. In this way, a partnership community is built, and a closer and closer union among the members is established: "The intimate partnership of life and love which constitutes the married state has been established by the creator" (Gaudium et Spes 48). This perspective takes into account what happens in the total life experience of husband and wife, and finds here the real sacrament. Although the aspect of partnership has been included in the other understandings of marriage, such as "communion," the conjugal partnership against the background of the sacramentality of all creation, i.e., from the perspective of a renewed Christian anthropology, psychology, and a historical consciousness that envisions marriage as a process. Pope John Paul II articulates the view of marriage as a process in the following terms: "The gift of Jesus Christ is not exhausted in the actual celebration of the sacrament of marriage, but rather accompanies the married couple throughout their lives' (Familiaris Consortio 56). Therefore, the marriage partnership is not a mutual accommodation, but a total, whole-hearted and life-long commitment of each spouse. This implies the larger, inclusive, and life-long journey of the sacramental life of marriage and family.

The Celebration of Marriage: A Grand Feast of Life and Love

The development of the new Order of Celebrating Marriage, promulgated in Rome on March 19, 1990, was the liturgical response to the postconciliar II theological, pastoral and cultural developments. This revised Roman rite was built upon the basic structure and themes of the earlier 1969 rite. The theological focus in both the 1969 and 1970 rites stemmed from the Christocentric and the historico-salvific view of marriage, perceiving the celebration of marriage as a total giving of mutual service, and a sacramental action, which integrates all the aspects of conjugal life and love.

The preparation for the celebration of the Sacrament of Marriage is of paramount importance. In recent years, the Church has laid much greater stress upon this aspect of the whole ritual process of marriage. Within a broad theological and catechetical view of the sacrament, three themes are prominent: 1) marriage is God's creative reality raised to a sacrament of dignity; 2) established as a covenant of intimate communion of life and love; 3) by which the spouses signify and share in the mystery of love and fidelity between Christ and the Church. Here, the idea of a sacred and life-long bond, originating in God and effected by the irrevocable consent of the spouses is stressed, together with the sacramental nature of this bond, rooted in baptism. This human bond makes an indissoluble covenant, which images God's creating and redeeming relationship with us, and raises it to the sacramental dignity and holiness. In contrast with the contractual overemphasis of the past view of marriage, this view emphasizes that the essence of Christian marriage is spiritual, not legal.

The created reality of marriage is presented not simply as a historical fact but in relation to the "great mystery" (Eph 5:32). The 1990 Roman rite affirms that a sacramental marriage signifies and shares in the sacrificial and transformative, healing and fruitful mystery of grace by which Christ encounters the spouses. "Those who marry in Christ are empowered to celebrate effectively with faith in God's word the mystery of Christ and the Church, to live rightly, and to bear witness in the eyes of all" (Rite of Marriage 1990, 11). The theological, pastoral and liturgical content of the introduction to the 1990

Roman rite of Marriage presents the best of the Western patristic tradition, articulating the foundational themes of marriage as vocation and partnership. It offers a vision of the vocation of the spouses, and points out that their celebration actualizes the presence of and the encounter with the total mystery of Christ. Symbols, words and prayers focus on this mystery of graced love and call for its integration into "the intimate community life and love" (Rite of Marriage 1990, 4).

Mutual consent and the nuptial blessing reveal the sacramental meaning of marriage and are the two principal moments on which the whole celebration of matrimony hinges. They express the two essential aspects of the reality of marriage: the anthropological root of love manifested by the consent of the couple, and the covenantal bond that seals the Christian character of the marriage.

In the actual liturgical celebration of matrimony, the entrance rite, which allows for different arrangements of the procession, sets the tone for a joyful and prayerful celebration. The liturgy of the word, an integral and essential part of the sacramental celebration actualizes the mystery of the Bridegroom Jesus in the presence of the couple. The homily focuses primarily on "the mystery of Christian marriage, the dignity of wedded love, the grace of the sacrament, and the responsibilities of married people, keeping in mind the circumstances of this particular marriage" (Rite of Marriage 1990, 57). The function of the priest in receiving the consent, one of the central moments of the entire rite, is more than that of a witness. He is a sign of the presence of Christ, and, by means of his blessing, he ratifies the sacramental action accomplished by God through the couple's covenant. The 1990 rite provides an alternative formula in terms that make present the history of salvation, and emphasizes the sacramental meaning of God's covenantal action.

The symbolic action in which the central meaning of marriage and Eucharist intersect is the couple's sharing in the Eucharist, the nuptial banquet of Christ's love. As Pope John Paul II explains:

The Eucharistic liturgy is the proper way to celebrate marriage, since both realities are intimately connected. The Eucharist is the very source of Christian marriage. . . In this sacrifice of the new and Eternal Covenant Christian spouses encounter the source from which their own marriage covenant flows, is interiorly structured and continuously renewed. (Familiaris consortio, 57)

Bibliography: G. MARTINEZ, Worship: Wedding to Marriage (Oregon 1993), from which much of the content of this essay derives. S. PARENTI, "The Christian Rite of Marriage in the East," in A. CHUPUNGCO, ed., Handbook for Liturgical Studies, v. 4, Sacraments and Sacramentals (Collegeville, MN 2000) 255–274. A. NOCENT, "The Christian Rite of Marriage in the West," ibid.,

275–301. T. BUCKLEY, What Binds Marriage? Roman Catholic Theology in Practice (London 1997). M. LAWLER, Marriage and Sacrament: A Theology of Christian Marriage (Collegeville 1993). W. KASPER, Theology of Marriage (New York 1980). E. SCHILLEB-EECKX, Marriage: Human Reality and Saving Mystery (New York 1965).

[G. MARTINEZ]

MATTER, PHILOSOPHY OF

That of which things are made, an intrinsic determinable PRINCIPLE whose opposite (and correlative) is FORM. As a type of substance, matter is opposed also to SPIRIT. The term is defined differently in the various philosophical traditions and, even as employed by scholastic philosophers, has acquired a wide range of meanings in logic, epistemology, psychology, and ethics. This article is concerned primarily with the concept of matter as used in natural philosophy and metaphysics, and sketches its historical development from the earliest times to the present.

Greek naturalists. Matter is, in a sense, the oldest of philosophical concepts. When man first began to speculate about the world in which he lived and his own place in it, he tended to use concrete terms and images from everyday experience. His language did not possess the wealth of general terms, such as being and relation, that would later become available. So he spoke in terms of simple myth, of gods (who were like men) and processes of making and molding. As time went on, the characteristically human drive to understand the world took the form of reducing the complexity of human experience to some sort of unity. To understand was to make one of the diverse and dispersed many. If the many could be seen in some way as instances of a one, it would then be sufficient to grasp the one. For example, if a person knows what a horse is, he knows something about all horses, and the multiplicity and diversity of the group has been reduced to unity.

When the entire physical universe, and not a single species, is approached in this spirit, it is not at first sight obvious where the one is to be found. The two simplest kinds of unity (in terms of ordinary experience) are the unity of a common origin (e.g., a craftsman-god who is responsible for the diversity and change of man's world) and that of a common stuff (a single stuff that can take on diverse and changing forms). Stress on the former was characteristic of many early religions; however, it rarely led to any sort of speculative clarification of the notions involved (god, making, etc.). The latter approach was adopted by some speculative-minded thinkers of Ionia in the 6th century B.C., who saw the universe as bound together in some sort of material unity. Thales said that it had originally come from water. This first suggestion was undoubtedly influenced by myths of religious origin; Thales did not (as far as is known) go on to claim that the world is constituted of water in different forms. Anaximander held that the universe came from an "indeterminate' (Gr. ἄπειρον) to which it ultimately returns: this indeterminate is both inexhaustible (to allow for unceasing change) and lacking in any intrinsic properties (so that it can take on all properties freely). Anaximenes was the first to suggest that the universe actually consists of a single stuff that takes on different forms. And this stuff was no other than the familiar air that (he thought) could condense into cloud, then water, then earth, then rock. HERACLITUS preferred to think of the primary stuff as fire, though he spoke in allegory and it is difficult to be sure of his meaning. (See GREEK PHILOSOPHY.)

Several points should be noted at this stage. There was as yet no word for matter; to say that these Ionians had begun to articulate the concept of matter means that they were positing a single stuff (usually under some familiar guise such as that of air) as the answer to the central problem of unity-in-diversity. They were explaining diversity and change in terms of an as-yet-unnamed general category of matter-stuff. Second, this stuff was still vague in character. It was sometimes described as divine, sometimes as living. The later contrast between matter and spirit had not yet appeared; their matter-stuff was much too nondescript to allow one to regard them as materialist in the later, much more precise, sense of that term.

Pythagoras to Democritus. A stuff would provide unity. But what could explain change? Why should there be change in the first place? The first answer to this was expressed in terms of contraries such as full and empty, love and strife: the tension between these somehow provided the spring of action. The Pythagoreans were the first to push this to the limit and to posit a contrary of matter-stuff itself, namely, VOID. This was a new philosophical category, one whose history would continue to be bound up with that of matter. The void surrounded the world and served to differentiate things from one another. (See PYTHAGORAS AND PYTHAGOREANS.)

PARMENIDES rejected the entire "matter" approach to explanation of the physical world. He preferred to seek cosmic unity at a much more abstract level, that of BEING, or "what is." Being does not allow of differences of density or of quality, so that diversity and change are alike illusory or at least can be dismissed from serious speculative consideration. But this was much too sweeping a conclusion for Parmenides's successors, even though they were influenced by his ideal of an unchanging Being. EMPEDOCLES argued for four different types of basic stuff. They could combine in endless ways; but each remained forever the same stuff, and each was structurally simple and homogeneous. Thus, instead of a single matter-stuff, he was holding for four elements, as they later came to be called (see ELEMENT). ANAXAGORAS suggested a much more sophisticated view: the universe contains an infinity of elements, each element forever itself but all mixed together in ever-varying proportions. The familiar things man perceives consist of a mixture of the elements; even apparently simple substances, such as water, contain small traces (seeds) of other things that can come to be from them. DEMOCRITUS tried perhaps the most interesting variation of all. Being does not change in itself (Parmenides), and yet change does occur. If void be admitted (Pythagoras), it allows one to have a multiplicity of beings or atoms whose movements explain all the changes of everyday experience. These beings must be below the level of perception, since their motions must explain growth, change of color, etc. They are in themselves unchanging and homogeneous. The atoms are thus a special sort of matter-stuff; the void is described as "rarefied" and appears as a diminished sort of reality—a second kind of stuff, it seems. Diversity and change are explained in terms of these two somewhat different sorts of material.

Plato. Matter plays two quite central roles in the complex metaphysics of PLATO. His analysis of knowledge led him to assert the existence of a realm of Forms on whose stability and immutability science depends. The Forms are imaged in a defective and flickering fashion in a matrix of extendedness or multiplicity. This world of image is the world man perceives. Its intelligibility arises from its relation to Form; the limited character of this intelligibility is traceable to the defective and multiple character of the "space-matter" in which the images occur. What is striking here is that matter, formerly the principle of unity (and therefore of intelligibility) for the Ionians, has become the principle of multiplicity, and thus of nonintelligibility, for Plato. Diversity is not to be understood by a reduction to one or more underlying types of stuff. One facet of diversity, the sheer and indefinite multiplicity of the sensible instances of any Form, is a "given," not something that can be further understood. The other facet, the multiplicity of the Forms themselves, is more mysterious: it is apparently constituted by relations of negation, in which the original unity of the One-Good (the sole locus of true intelligibility) is gradually dissipated.

But there must also be motion. And the principle of this is soul, seen at its purest in man, but working less obviously in all moving things, even those apparently inanimate. The regular motions of the universe, noted in the stars and seasons, the working of all things toward an ordered good, argue to the existence of a WORLD SOUL animating the matter of the universe, just as the soul of man animates his body. Here matter is contrasted with living soul, not with unchanging Form; it is the passive, the resistant, not the empty space on which instances of a Form can be endlessly projected. Matter in this sense actively opposes soul; it is the source of defect, of breakdown in finality. Clearly the two notions are not the same, though they must be closely related. There is an uneasy tension between Plato's two great dualisms, the dualism of Form and the space-matrix of becoming in the Timaeus and that of soul and body in the Phaedo. There are two doctrines of matter here; or to put this in another way, since Soul and Form are not identical, their contrast-principles are not the same either.

Aristotle. ARISTOTLE was the first to coin an explicit term for the general category of material in the domain of scientific explanation. He adapted the common terms for timber, the material on which the carpenter works, ὕλη, to his technical usage, although he frequently made use of other terms as well. Though his analysis sounds like that of the Ionians, it is in reality of a significantly different sort. He begins with an analysis of PREDICATION itself, of how man talks about the kinds of things there are in the world, and claims to distinguish on the basis of this analysis two levels of reference. There are things to which man refers by names, things that are not predicated of anything else. These are the ultimate subjects of all predication about the natural world—SUBSTANCE is their common English designation, although perhaps entity would be a better translation for Aristotle's term. There are, besides, those second-order things that are predicated of entities and do not stand on their own: attributes of any kind, whether "essential" (pertaining properly, and in all cases, to a particular type of entity) or "accidental" (not necessarily belonging to all instances of a particular type of entity)—both commonly designated by the term ACCIDENT.

Principles of Change. Now when this simple distinction is applied to the domain of CHANGE, an interesting thing happens. In any change, there must be a subject of predication; there obviously must be something that can be said to change. Furthermore, if one is to have a truly "scientific" analysis that will remain true in all instances, it will not do to choose attributes at random, and say, for instance, that the musical entity comes to be from the black entity. Only one way of describing this will be "scientifically" true, and that is to say that the musical entity comes to be from the nonmusical entity. This description holds good for any change terminating in the attainment of the attribute "musical." Three conditions are thus necessary and sufficient for any "scientific" description of change: there must be a SUBJECT of the proposition describing the change; this subject must first lack a certain attribute, and then it must come to possess it. Thus, when a nonmusical man becomes musical, the subject of predication is the man. Aristotle calls the man the matter of this change, and the other two conditions he calls PRIVATION and FORM, respectively. The man may be called the "matter-subject" of the change, in order to emphasize the function of the analysis of predication in Aristotle's assertion.

Note what has happened here. It is not that Aristotle has made an empirical inspection of changes, and discovered that in all cases a substratum remains throughout the change. The apparent similarity with the Ionian analysis is misleading. His form and privation are contradictories, not contraries, and thus whereas it would have taken observation to support the Ionian claim that all change involves contraries (e.g., black and white), it is analytic to say that it involves contradictories (white and nonwhite). Aristotle's claim that all change involves a mattersubject, a form, and a privation is, in fact, irrefutable because analytic. An understanding of the concept of change, or more exactly of predication about change, shows this immediately.

But here a major difficulty arises for Aristotle. If the matter-subject above be identified with an entity, or a substance, it seems that entitative change or SUBSTANTIAL CHANGE is impossible. For in any change there must be a common matter-subject of which the privation can first be predicated, and then subsequently the form. This matter-subject is either an entity, or it is not. If it is, then the change is not entitative, or substantial, since the same entity, or substance, is present throughout the change. If it is not, what can the matter-subject be? There are only two possible kinds of referent: entity and attribute, and the matter-subject of a properly entitative, or substantial, change is obviously neither of these.

To put the quandary in a yet sharper way: If there is a truly entitative, or substantial, change, of what can the privation and form be predicated? Can there be a common subject of predication before and after? How can it be named if it is not an entity? And how can it be a subject of predication if it cannot be named? If an acorn becomes an oak (to take one of Aristotle's examples), is there any way of maintaining the matter-subject type of analysis, which requires one to be able to break down "A becomes B" into "X is non-Y and later X is Y"?" "That which was acornlike now is oaklike"—but what does the "that" stand for here?

Primary Matter. It was from this quandary that Aristotle's distinctive (and at first sight paradoxical) doctrine of primary matter took its origin. He wished at all costs to maintain as a basic "given" of experience that entitative, or substantial, changes occur, that entities truly come to be and pass away. He was opposing the Parmenidean tradition in all its varied forms (Empedocles, Democritus, Anaxagoras) on this point. The coming-to-be and passing-away that man perceives is not simply a rearrangement of atoms or elements or seeds, themselves unchanging; for if this were the case, the passing unities they form would be merely incidental, and a true science of the middle-sized objects of human perception would be impossible. Aristotle, as biologist, was quite sure that a science of living things was possible, and this proved to him that biological entities are not simply accidental conformations of more fundamental unchanging entities lying below the level of perception. Experience shows that living things have a unitary τέλος, or goal; one cannot dissolve it into incidental relationships without challenging the validity of perception generally, which Aristotle was determined to safeguard at all costs.

This meant that he had also to oppose the entire Ionian approach to physics. If intelligibility were to be sought through a permanent "stuff" that survives all changes, it would once again imply that the entities of everyday experience are simply complex configurations of a single underlying entity such as air or water. The fundamental reality, unity, and intelligibility would lie at the level of the "stuff," and once again no proper science of the complex entities of everyday experience would be possible. Yet on the other hand, the matter-form-privation analysis had been shown to be fundamental to predication about change. There must be a matter-subject of some sort in entitative changes, but it could not be a "stuff" in the Ionian sense, that is, a material entity with definite properties. Thus Aristotle posits an indefinite matter-subject, itself lacking in all properties, even quality and quantity. It is not an entity, and thus it is not a proper subject of predication, nor can it even be named, properly speaking. It provides a sort of limit to predication itself, even apart from analysis of change. If one carries predication to more and more fundamental levels, there must be an ultimate matter-subject of which the basic form of the entity can (in a special terminal sense) be predicated; otherwise there would be an infinite regress.

The doctrine of primary matter thus depends on an analysis of predication, and especially on the notion of entity or substance. It does not depend on detailed observation of actual entitative changes, and is thus what later thinkers would call a typically metaphysical doctrine. To say that "primary matter exists" is simply to say that the notions of predication and of entity put forward by Aristotle are valid and that entitative changes occur. To say that a particular entity is "composed of primary matter and substantial form" (a popular later way of putting Aristotle's thesis) is to say that it is capable of ceasing to be and that it can give rise to other entities. It does not imply that the form is imposed upon the matter as a shape is imposed upon bronze; though Aristotle uses the bronze analogy in his original analysis of change-in-general, it seems fundamental to his entire ontology that primary matter not be regarded as a sort of limit-case of a quality-less "stuff." Such a substratum would not be a "this," could not individuate, would still be quantified, and so would not satisfy two central criteria of Aristotle's primary matter.

Material Causality. There is a second context in which Aristotle introduces the notion of a "material," and this is in his analysis of the different types of explanation of physical change. He claims that there are four and only four of these, and that for a complete explanation all four ought be given, so that they are complementary to one another. One can "explain" a change (i.e., make it more intelligible) by mentioning the material in which it occurs, the intrinsic form involved, the AGENT responsible for it, or the END toward which it is directed. This division raises many problems, and one of the most difficult is that posed by the "material" mode of explanation (material causality, as it is often called, though the English term CAUSALITY is more often restricted to the category of agency alone). In what way is a change "explained" by specifying its material? To explain a statue in terms of the bronze that went to its making seems to involve the form of the bronze principally. When a nonmusical man becomes musical, is the material cause the man; i.e., is the material cause identical with the mattersubject of predication about the change? If it is, then what is had is description, not explanation. It seems dubious whether one should regard the man as a causal principle of this change.

One alternative would be to take the material cause of a particular physical explanation to be the material elements that are assumed (without any further enquiry into their nature) in this explanation. It would thus be relative to the particular explanation given and correlative to the level of formal explanation chosen as most appropriate. Clearly, material cause comes much closer to "stuff" than matter-subject does, but even here in most changes (other than elemental or artistic ones) the "material" will be a complex structure; yet the emphasis will not be on the structure as such, but rather on its being the substratum for a further structure of a higher order.

Potency. In discussing change, Aristotle introduced another crucial metaphysical category that was, in his mind, closely linked with matter. This was POTENCY. Besides saying of something that it is X or non-X, there is a third choice that the dichotomies of his predecessors had tended to obscure: one could say that though it is non-X, it has the capacity to become X. Potency is something more than mere privation, though it is less than actuality, or ACT. To say that an acorn can become an oak is an important fact about the acorn, one that is not conveyed by saying simply that it is non-oak. Thus a complete analysis of change requires one to introduce potency.

Potency has a dual aspect: it involves both capacity to be acted upon and capacity to act upon another. In both instances, potency is oriented to change; in both instances the complete actuality is lacking, but part of what it takes to bring about the complete actuality is already there. Passive potency can be said to reside in the material cause of the change, in the sense that it is the "material" aspect of the entity that makes it capable of change in the first place, the aspect that makes it part of an order in which outside agencies intervene and the unexpected can happen. Matter is thus in this sense the source of CHANCE and defect, not that there is something within it that (as Plato had suggested) works actively against the agency of form, but rather that it simply renders the entity subject to unpredictable outside interference with its proper intrinsic finality.

Stoics. The Stoic philosophers of the generation after Aristotle were the nearest to being materialist, in the modern sense, of any ancient school. For them, fire is the primary element; life and reason are its highest manifestations. From it issues the more inert elements in an unending cycle of growth and catastrophe. All things are corporeal, i.e., extended and capable of being acted upon by other bodies: this is true of soul and even of the Divinity, which is somehow immanent in the life-tension of the universe itself. Even qualities must somehow be bodies, since only bodies can act. Yet the alleged Stoic MATERIALISM has to be taken cautiously: the Stoics conceded an existence of a nonbodily sort to the void and, interestingly, to propositions; and their fire-stuff is more reminiscent of vitalism than of materialism.

Plotinus to Augustine. The solution to the problem of the one-in-many proposed by PLOTINUS constituted a powerful rethinking of the Neoplatonist themes. The One is beyond Mind and even Being; it is the source of the multiplicity of the world of Form, which is the product of Mind. As the lower contemplates the higher, the movement of contemplation issues in a product; in this way, by a movement of emanation, all multiplicity comes forth from the Mind, faced by One. Below Mind there is a Soul, and over against Mind there is matter, which is the featureless principle not of multiplicity (since each individual entity has its own form, and thus all multiplicity is the result of emanation) but of negation, and ultimately of evil and opposition.

AUGUSTINE inherited this dualism, but the Christian doctrine of creation forced him to modify it. He could not admit emanation, nor could he allow a matter over against, and thus not existentially dependent upon, God. Formless matter is the first and lowest of God's creatures. It is the condition of time, the principle of mutability of all creatures, whether spiritual or bodily, since all of them can turn away from the unity of God to the dispersion of the self. This matter does not exist by itself before the first forms but is concreated with them and has a reality, even though "next to nothing." Multiplicity comes from God rather than from matter, at least in the case of rational creatures, who in some sense individually preexist in the divine mind. Mutability leads to evil and suffering. In the Augustinian tradition of theology, matter was always to have this overtone: it would be something to be turned away from. But matter is only one aspect of the physical world; the intelligibility of the material creation is a sign for man of God's power and love.

Thomas Aquinas. In the medieval period, the Aristotelian doctrine of matter was deepened in several directions. Because of the problem of UNIVERSALS, the question of what constitutes the principle of INDIVIDUA-TION of physical beings became a vital one. Aristotle had had very little to say on this point; since individual entities are prior in being, he seems to have held that "thisness" is rooted in form. But in general, it seems clear that individuation must depend on the multiplicity made possible by matter. Yet primary matter itself is not a "this"; and quantity must be conceded some role in individuation too. THOMAS AQUINAS gradually worked out a complex theory, in which quantity is the principle of multiplicity, and primary matter is what constitutes the individual existentially as part of the physical order and as a unique object of reference.

Matter and Limitations. To the Greek mind, lack of limit meant imperfection; primary matter was the "unlimited," whereas form and perfection lay on the side of limit. Plotinus and Aquinas together reversed this: God's perfection lies in His infinity, so that it is the principle of limit that is now imperfect, lacking (see INFINITY; INFINITY OF GOD). Thus primary matter is now described as a source of limitation, and the limitation is of a sort that escapes formal intelligible expression. What makes the individual unique is also what makes it material. A further development in Aquinas's doctrine comes from his shifting the boundary between Creator and creature from the matter-form distinction to a new essence-existence distinction, and thus implicitly changing the notion of matter itself. What divides the mutable creature from the Creator, according to St. Thomas, is finite essence, not matter, as Augustine had held. Angels are no longer regarded as "spiritual-material." They can change, but they cannot cease to be. Primary matter is what situates certain creatures in an order in which they can cease to be. It is in no way a stuff (a stuff could never be a principle of uniqueness); it is not an entity at all, but rather the aspect of certain entities that marks them off as corruptible.

What, then, of the notion of a matter-substrate that guarantees permanence throughout change and that serves as a material cause of the change? It seems clear that even in entitative, or substantial, changes there are some continuities, of quantity, of location, etc. When a dog dies, most of the chemical substructures appear to remain. How can one speak here of a featureless substratum? Two answers were given to this question in the 13th century. Aquinas argued that there can be only a single substantial form in any being and that if one such form is succeeded by another, no determination can be properly said to persevere in the substratum. For if one does, the substratum itself is a substance, and one does not have substantial change. But he conceded that various subsidiary forms could be "virtually" present, though subordinated to the principal form, and that these could somehow persevere. Others preferred to say that an organized and unified plurality of forms is "actually" present in the composite and that the subsidiary ones could therefore "actually" persevere in entitative change. (See FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF.)

No matter which of these views one follows, it is clear that the substratum of entitative, or substantial, change cannot be regarded as altogether indeterminate, since even the "virtual" form is still a determination. When a dog dies, the substratum of the change must carry certain quantitative and qualitative factors; it is obvious that a dog cannot change into just anything and that this limitation of potency must somehow be borne by the matter-substrate. What Aquinas insists on is the Aristotelian dichotomy between entity (substance) and attribute (accident). The substrate of substantial change cannot be fully qualified by any attribute, or it would have to be itself an entity; no third ontological possibility, he claims, is open. The problem is again one of predication: Can any attribute (e.g., "weighing 20 lbs.") be predicated throughout the change from dog to corpse? Aquinas answers: strictly speaking, no; different substantial forms are involved, and the perseverance of the accidental form of weight is "virtual," not actual.

Matter and Knowledge. One final medieval theme was that of matter as the barrier to knowledge. Some scattered clues in Aristotle were woven into an elaborate theory of ABSTRACTION. Physics became the study of "sensible matter," abstracting only from individual differences but still conceived as mutable and qualitatively defined. Mathematics studies "intelligible matter," when one abstracts from all but the quantitative aspects of physical beings. Materiality here connotes both uniqueness and mutability; the more material an object is, the less knowable, on both scores. The Thomistic doctrine of the "three degrees of abstraction" (physics, mathematics, metaphysics) has an unmistakable Platonic overtone, insofar as it is based on degrees of relative distance from matter. (See SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF.)

Giles of Rome to Newton. The Aristotelian primary matter that was somehow "conserved" in change was not quantified. So how did the notion of a "quantity of matter" conserved through all change arise, the notion that was to give rise in a very complicated way to the concept of mass? The metaphor of materia (stuff) exercised a constant pressure in this direction. Discussions of rarefaction indicated that when bodies expanded and contracted, a factor (often called "quantity of matter") remained the same. GILES OF ROME argued that quantity of matter was the most plausible subject for the accidents that remained in the miracle of TRANSUBSTANTIATION. John Buridan suggested that the IMPETUS given a body by its moving cause is proportional to the "quantity of matter" it contains; here matter is not only conserved precisely in its quantity but it also becomes the source of resistance to change of state. This view of matter as working against impressed force was central to J. Kepler's first formulation of the notion of inertia; the Neoplatonic influence on him is clear. I. NEWTON drew together the threads. The concept of mass was the key to his entire dynamics: it is a measure of the response of a given body to impressed force, and is different from weight. Newton speaks of it as "quantity of matter," but nowhere defines what he means by "matter." He appears to have some intuitive "stuff" view in mind; in practice he defines mass in terms of volume and density, thus risking circularity. Matter in his Principia is simply "that of which mass is the quantity." In actual calculations in mechanics, the notion of mass suffices; matter need never be introduced explicitly. Thus does the notion of matter begin to vanish from natural science, as the latter becomes more and more operational.

Descartes to Bergson. But matter continued to be a central category for most metaphysicians. R. DESCARTES went further than Plato had and equated matter with EXTENSION, thus making it entirely subject to geometrical thought and reducing physics to geometry. For the rationalistic tradition that followed (N. MALEBRANCHE, B. SPINOZA, G. W. LEIBNIZ), the problem of matter was the problem of individuation: how could the individual be secured in a world of purely intelligible relations? In the materialist tradition, on the other hand (T. HOBBES, J. O. de la Mettrie, etc.), the stress was on matter as opposed to spirit. It was identified with extended body operating under purely mechanical laws, and the existence of spirit was denied. J. LOCKE presented matter as a featureless inert substrate of extension.

G. BERKELEY launched the phenomenalist attack on this approach to matter by arguing that all man knows is ideas. These are necessarily mind-dependent, so that there is no reason to postulate an independent substratum over against mind, one in which the qualities of perceived objects are supposed to inhere. I. KANT in turn criticized Berkeley's view, holding that there must be a principle of "appearance," i.e. matter, that furnishes the object for outer sense and that makes physics irreducible to mathematics. Matter is the barrier to the a priori; it is the source of that which cannot be anticipated. Thus, to assert the "materiality" of the world was, for Kant, a compact way of rejecting both RATIONALISM and PHENOMENALISM.

G. W. F. HEGEL opposed this view of matter as the ground of appearance and returned to the Plotinian theme of matter as negation, as the product of spirit positing body and exteriority by way of negation. The tension between the materialist and the Hegelian philosophies is sharpest in their notions of matter, and it is thus no wonder that the dialectical materialism of MARX was unable to provide a satisfactory treatment of the category of matter, and especially of its relation to mind (see MATERIAL-ISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL). Evolutionary philosophers have seen in matter both the repository of the manifold potentiality of the evolutionary process and a barrier to that process. H. BERGSON, for instance, builds a basic dualism between life and matter; the impetus of life carries the universe on, but it tends to be "congealed" by the drag of matter.

It will be noted that the notion of matter differs greatly from one to the other of these philosophers, but that in all cases it is one of the central defining concepts of their entire philosophy. It may be noted also that the themes they introduce are recapitulations, often at a more sophisticated level, of the basic matter-themes of Greek philosophy.

See Also: MATTER, THEOLOGY OF; MATTER AND FORM.

Bibliography: E. MCMULLIN, ed., The Concept of Matter (Notre Dame, Ind. 1963). M. JAMMER, The Concepts of Mass in Classical and in Modern Physics (Cambridge, Mass. 1961). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:80–94. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy, v.1–7 (Westminster, Md.). G. DINAPOLI and V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica 3:376–382. H. DOLCH and M. MOSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 7:163–165. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 10:335–355.

[E. MCMULLIN]

MATTER, THEOLOGY OF

Matter is a key word in the language of the modern technological culture, for it is intimately associated with man's increasing scientific knowledge of the phenomenal universe. THEOLOGY, on the other hand, is discourse about God, supposing both revelation and the knowledge of faith. Yet what is denoted by the word matter in its modern usage comes within the orbit of revelation in the scriptural categories of heaven and earth (Gn 1.1) or things visible (Col 1.16) and within the orbit of theology in the metaphysical category of material being. This article deals first with the teaching of revelation and theology on matter and then with the theological questions arising from man's new scientific knowledge of matter.

Teaching of Revelation and Theology. Matter comes within all three articles of the Christian faith.

In the first article, concerning God the Creator, the Church, against DUALISM in the form of MANICHAEISM (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 1336) and of PRISCILLI-ANISM (ibid. 463), has defined its doctrinal statement of the teaching of revelation that God is the sole author of material being (ibid. 3002). In this same context the Church has further defined that matter is an integral part of God's one work ad extra: the supernaturally elevated NATURAL ORDER. Therefore matter has its role within the divine purpose of the cosmos, which is the manifestation of the glory of God [ibid.; see GLORY OF GOD (END OF CREATION)]. And so the Church rejects (ibid. 433) the Gnostic position taken up by Origenism that matter's place in God's work is incidental, relative to the fall of spiritual being, and will, with the final restoration of spiritual being, disappear (see ORIGEN AND ORIGENISM). Also included in the Church's understanding in faith of revelation's teaching concerning matter is the divinely instituted relation between matter and man. It is one dimension of man's being (Gn 2.7); it is the object of the divine imperative placed on man (Gn 2.16); it is the meaning given by God to secular history (Gn 1.28); and it is involved in man's situation within the salvation history (Gn 3.17; Rom 8.19-23; see MAN). The Church has defined certain points of its doctrine concerning the relation between matter and man (Enchiridion symbolorum 461-464; 3002).

Matter comes within the second article of the Christian faith, which is concerned with God the Redeemer. Against Docetism revelation proclaims the reality (1 Jn 4.2) and the primacy within God's work of the human nature with its material dimension of JESUS CHRIST [Col 1.19–20]. Revelation also teaches (Jn 16.11) that one of the effects of God's redemptive work in Christ is the liberation in principle of matter from the power of sin; not that the ontological goodness of matter is in any way lessened by man's sin; but that, as a consequence of man's sin, matter is a sphere in which the power of sin, hostility to God, is operative.

Finally matter comes within the third article of the Christian faith, concerning God the Sanctifier. That matter is included within the divine work of sanctification is testified by belief in the paradisiacal state of Adam (Gn 2.8), by the Resurrection of Jesus (Rom 1.4), and by the expectation of a new heaven and earth (Rev 21.1) at the end. Then God's Lordship (1 Cor 15.28), the meaning of the divine work ad extra in its unity as a work of creation, Redemption, and sanctification will stand fully disclosed.

To make intelligible what is known from revelation concerning matter, scholastic theology uses the metaphysical concept of potentiality (see POTENCY AND ACT). This concept, together with its correlative concept of actuality, is applied to created being; and the distinction between material and spiritual being is seen as that between potentiality of being and actuality of being. Within the unity of the cosmos, matter and SPIRIT are degrees of being, ordered participations of absolute Being, each in its own manner manifesting the perfection of absolute Being. The theological conception of matter as potentiality of being implies that the proper cause of matter is absolute Being; and so matter in its first production depends immediately on God (Summa theologiae 1a, 65.4). It also implies that matter, as part of the cosmos, has its proper end in God; therefore the final perfection of matter depends immediately on God (Summa theologiae 1a, 66.3). Lastly it implies that the passage of matter from its first production to its final perfection is dependent in the first place on God as author of nature and of grace (Summa theologiae 1a, 73.1 ad 1). The content of this theological conception of matter is drawn from the divine ECONOMY, the theology of the divine work ad extra. Because it establishes the limits containing further theological speculation on matter, this conception of matter worked out in scholastic theology retains its usefulness.

Theological Questions. That matter as made known by modern science raises theological questions is evident from the writings of John XXIII, P. Teilhard de Chardin, and Dietrich Bonhoeffer. It is not primarily a question of reconciling scientific theories, such as those purporting to explain the origin of the universe, with Christian belief (Mascall, 162) but of recognizing the authenticity of matter as a dimension of man, a dimension in which the salvation history is operative, and a dimension in which the Church, the instrument of God's Lordship, is called to work. With this recognition goes the need for a reappraisal of the traditional Christian attitude to matter and to temporal values. In the past this attitude has been influenced by an excessive dichotomy between matter and spirit. The recognition of matter also calls for a theological statement of Christian belief in categories that give an understanding of that belief in its existential reality (Scheffczyk, 151). And with this recognition of matter the need for a new understanding of the Church's catholicity is apparent. The theological conception of the Church's catholicity needs to be enlarged to include the depth of human existence revealed by scientific knowledge of the phenomenal universe.

See Also: MATTER; MATTER AND FORM; CREATION, ARTICLES ON; SOUL, HUMAN; TIME.

Bibliography: M. SCHMAUS, Gott der Schöpfer (his Katholische Dogmatik 2.1; 6th ed. Munich 1962). L. SCHEFFCZYK, Schöpfung und Versehung (Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte 2.2a; Freiburg 1963). E. L. MASCALL, Christian Theology and Natural Science (London 1956). P. OVERHAGE and K. RAHNER, Das Problem der Hominisation (Quaestiones Disputate 12, 13; Frieburg 1961) 44–55.

[E. G. HARDWICK]

MATTER AND FORM

Within the context of an Aristotelian-Thomistic PHI-LOSOPHY OF NATURE, matter and form are considered as the primary essential principles of changeable being. Although MATTER and FORM both merit consideration in their own right, additional problems attend an understanding of the relationship between these two, together with their relationship to PRIVATION, when all three are considered under the formality of PRINCIPLE. This article exposes in detail the teaching of ARISTOTLE concerning these relationships, discusses applications of his doctrine in various areas of scholastic philosophy, and concludes with a brief evaluation of historical controversies bearing on this general subject.

Aristotelian Doctrine

Aristotle's proposal of matter and form, as elaborated in Book 1 of his Physics, was in reply to a question concerning the first essential principles of changeable reality that must be properly understood. Not itself a query about the structure of matter, or a Platonic question of distinguishing between the sensible and the intelligible, Aristotle's is a question concerning primary principle, not ELEMENT in the modern sense. His problem is the nature of the mobile, and only indirectly, though still importantly, the nature of the sensible (see MOTION). The issues he raised were at a general level and consequently led to general solutions. This accords with his conviction that the mind begins with vague and universal notions and increases its knowledge by making these notions distinct and more particular.

Dialectics and induction. In his DIALECTICS, searching for first principles at this universal level, Aristotle is concerned initially with the positions of the pre-Socratics (see GREEK PHILOSOPHY). Though rejecting their views in the explicit form in which he reports them, he finds that all previous thinkers about the principles of nature implicitly affirm that such principles are contraries. For the modern reader, these predecessors of Aristotle may be of only historical interest; in the spirit of the Physics it is Aristotelian to turn also to modern philosophers of nature like Whitehead and Bergson, and to modern scientists who have developed the quantum and relativity theories. Alfred North WHITEHEAD, in his concepts of creativity and eternal objects, and Henri BERG-SON, in noting two divergent aspects of evolution, attest to the existence of a dualism in nature, while the quantum theory, with its wave-particle view of matter, and relativity, with its space-time continuum, may be considered as further intimations of duality in the material universe.

Contraries and a Subject. The second phase of the dialectical search for factors that, when tested by INDUCTION, become the first principles of a natural science, requires a knowledge of the logic of contrariety (see OPPOSITION). Contraries are opposites within the same category. Thus the green is a contrary of the red but not a contrary of the musical. There is no direct CHANGE from not being red to being a musician. Should a man while getting sunburned also be practicing music, two changes are involved; any one change is between opposites in the same immediate genus, i.e., between contraries.

Moreover, and here again induction is invoked, there must be a subject in which the contraries succeed one another, e.g., the fruit that previously lacked a red color and now possesses it, the man who was not a musician and now is, the animal once young but now full grown. According to this analysis, there are three principles of motion, viz, two contraries and a subject.

This same conclusion can be confirmed by an analysis of language. After considering three alternative ways of stating that a man becomes a musician, Aristotle concludes that the most satisfactory sentence is: "The nonmusical man becomes a musical man." Here there is a subject possessing one of the contraries at the beginning of the process, and the same subject possessing the other contrary at the end. To supply inductive evidence from reality that supports this linguistic conclusion, Aristotle introduces an ANALOGY between natural becoming and the making of a statue by human art. The marble—or subject—has, with respect to being a statue, a shapeless character before carving and a recognizable shape after the sculpture is done. This example has led to some misunderstanding, as though Aristotle were putting the carving of a statue into literal correspondence with a motion taking place in nature. In reality statue-making is here only a model taken, like language, from the homely world that man knows best. As a dialectical device, it is not meant to be applied literally to nature but only to suggest the inductions through which the principles of natural change can be truly grasped.

Form and Privation. In technical terminology, the positive principle present in a subject at the end of a change is called form. Although this word originally meant shape and is commonly taken only in this sense, it had acquired a wider meaning even for PLATO. For the Aristotelian it means the positive term (terminus ad quem) of any change, a new shape or size or color. The other term (terminus a quo) has been identified as a contrary of the form. As a first approximation this language is adequate. Yet sometimes, as in the coming-to-be of a dog, the form does not have a contrary. Unlike a new color that comes to be from a positive opposite in the same genus, a dog comes to be from what is non-dog. To describe such changes, the opposite of the form is called privation, and even where a form, like red, has a positive opposite or true contrary like green, the green is regarded as the privation of the red. In this new and more general language, therefore, all natural motion involves a subject, a form, and a privation.

As another refinement of concept, the subject and the form, entering as they do into the intrinsic constitution of the product of change, say, the red apple, are called essential (per se) principles. Privation, on the other hand, does not enter into the thing made, and is thus called an incidental (per accidens) principle of motion.

Accidental and substantial change. Having treated change in general, Aristotle next distinguished two types of change, accidental and substantial (see ACCIDENT; SUBSTANCE). In the first case, as in the wrinkling of paper, the reddening of the human skin, and the growth of a puppy into a dog, a thing changes only in a qualified way. But in the second case, as in the burning of paper or the death of a dog, a thing changes wholly into another thing. This kind of change, which Aristotle called change "in an unqualified sense," came to be known in scholastic language as SUBSTANTIAL CHANGE. It is divided into two types: generation, the change from NONBEING to BEING; and corruption or destruction, the change from being to nonbeing (see GENERATION-CORRUPTION).

Modern Difficulties. In distinguishing the two basic types of change, Aristotle had to do little more than cite examples to make his case. In modern thought, knowledge of substantial change and of substance itself has been called into question by philosopher and scientist alike. A sample objection, for example, would explain what is apparently substantial change as a mechanical motion of atoms from one aggregate or compound to another. In this reductionism, substantial change is only local motion, an accidental change (see ATOMISM; MECHANISM). There is no intention here of minimizing or of oversimplifying such objections. Yet Aristotle had also to contend with similar arguments from ancient atomists like DEMOCRITUS, who viewed substantial change as reducible to local motion. How then can one justify his giving a highly controverted point such brief treatment in the Physics?

Aristotelian Reply. The answer depends upon the much neglected pedagogical principle set down by Aristotle in the first chapter of the Physics. He argued that reason, following its natural tendency, must first consider changeable things at a vague and general level; at this level, the difference between accidental change and substantial change is evident. Moreover, at this level things are most intelligible to man and attainable with greater certitude; thus the evident difference between substantial and accidental change can be manifested by a few examples. When ancient or modern atomism, both envisaging more distinct and particular levels of knowledge, object to the concept of substantial change, they can then be dismissed as irrelevant. Whatever truth such views reflect at more specific levels must be interpreted to meet the demands of prior, more generic, and more certain notions. At specific levels of natural knowledge, where certitude is hard to find, many inductive tests are normally necessary to establish a truth. This is not the case at the more universal level, where certitude is easier to attain. Thus could Aristotle treat in an apparently naive way what becomes an embattled issue when argued, as by many moderns, in areas where certitude is weak and where only doubt, difficulty, and controversy can be expected.

EXPERIENCE, at the level where man's knowledge of nature yields maximal intelligibility and certitude, therefore discloses the difference between substantial and accidental change. Since the accidental, like size or color, depends upon the substantial, such as being a dog or being water, the first principles of changeable reality must be matter, form, and privation in the substantial order. These first principles can now be more precisely identified in the following discussion.

Primary matter. Matter has been generally identified as the subject of change. As such it is a POTENCY or capacity. The subject of substantial change is called primary matter, while the subject of accidental change is known as secondary matter. Secondary matter, such as a dog undergoing the accidental change called growth, is potential with respect to its new size; yet it possesses an actuality of its own insofar as it is a dog. By analogy to the subject in such accidental changes, there must be a subject also in substantial change. Experience manifests an abiding material or substratum in such changes as the burning of coal or the death of a dog. Among the arguments reason can supply for the necessity of such a substratum is the generally accepted principle that nothing can come from nothing. This first subject in any physical thing is primary matter, and its reality is that of potency.

The evidence that primary matter has no actuality of its own but of its nature is potency for substantial being is found in the unity of the so-called composite of matter and form, say a dog. If primary matter, prior to its union with the form or ACT that makes a dog come to be, had an act or form of its own, its composition with the form of dog could yield no more than an extrinsic type of unity. The dog, or the so-called composite, would then be an accidental unity, not the intrinsic and substantial type of unit that experience reveals (see POTENCY AND ACT). Such an argument, while metaphysical in character, serves to explain the nature of the first subject attained by induction in the philosophy of nature.

Substantial form. Form, in general, is the END or term of matter. The term in accidental change is called accidental form; examples would be the color, size, or shape of a thing, or its place. In the substantial order, the form is called substantial form. Accidental form makes its matter to be qualified in this or that way. Substantial form makes its matter to be; it confers BEING in an unqualified way.

From another viewpoint, matter is that out of which a thing is made, like marble in the case of a statue; form, on the other hand, is what makes a thing to be what it is, for instance the shape in the case of the statue. Arguing analogously, primary matter is that out of which a physical thing is made, while substantial form is what makes it to be a dog, a cat, copper, water, or a tomato plant. One limitation of this way of speaking is that such words do not respect the reality of matter in determining the ES-SENCE of a thing. Further, as in the case of assigning a purely potential character to primary matter, the discussion passes beyond the limits of natural philosophy into the area of metaphysics. For form as a principle making a thing to be what it is becomes synonymous with essence, and essence is the proper concern of the metaphysician.

Substantial form, however, has a more particular application in the philosophy of nature. The form of living physical things is called a SOUL. As such it is an animating principle in plants, animals, and men. In the subhuman world (to avoid special difficulties concerning the human soul), modern knowledge of embryology affords striking evidence of form as the end of matter. The matter is gradually prepared in the embryo for the form or soul that makes possible the independent or substantial existence of the offspring. A similar disposition of matter is required for forms in the mineral world. Natural form is, therefore, considered to be the end of matter.

This way of defining form is more appropriate to the philosophy of nature than the metaphysical definition identifying it with essence; for the natural philosopher, substantial form is part of the essence of a mobile being, the other part being primary matter.

Privation. Unlike matter and form, privation is not divided into substantial and accidental kinds; as nonbeing it cannot be divided into species. Privation is contrasted with form but associated with matter, primary or secondary. For matter in either case is never without privation. When it has one form, it lacks all others, and when it acquires a new form, it lacks the one it previously had. Viewed in this second context, privation represents some kind of lack or loss. Thus, it implictly refers to a subject competent to possess the form that is not present. That is why, when contrasted with form, privation is associated with the subject or matter; it is the absence of form in a suitable subject. Finally, privation is an accidental principle insofar as it neither enters intrinsically into the thing produced (perfect act) nor into the motion toward that product (imperfect act).

Plato did not distinguish between matter and privation, regarding matter itself as nonbeing. Aristotle claims to be the first to make the distinction, and by means of it to resolve what he considered to be the great problem bequeathed to Greek speculation by PARMENIDES. If being is and nonbeing is not, how can anything come to be? For from being, which is what is, nothing can come to be; it already is. And in regard to the other alternative, nothing can come to be from nonbeing. The solution to this problem, which according to Aristotle's report led Parmenides to deny BECOMING, requires the distinction between matter (being in potency) and privation (nonbeing). From being that is actual, nothing, it is true, can come to be; but from being in potency, namely, matter, something can come to be. Again, regarding the second alternative in Parmenides' argument, one must distinguish the essential from the incidental. From nonbeing as an essential principle entering into the composition of the product of change, nothing can come to be. But from nonbeing as an incidental principle extrinsic to the change in question, a thing can come to be. Thus, by a recognition of matter and privation in themselves and in their relation to each other, did Aristotle resolve perhaps the most profound problem raised by the Greeks in the philosophy of nature.

Appetite of matter. Aristotle also spoke of the appetite of matter, probably to counteract the view that form alone is good and that matter is evil. The thesis that matter is evil, appearing in modified form in Plato, existed in the Mediterranean world long before and far beyond the confines of classical Greece. Thus, to answer an objection against his position that natural science concerns a subject worth studying, Aristotle was forced to deepen his contrast between matter and privation, even though his pursuit took him, for dialectical purposes, into metaphysics. To summarize his position, appetite is ascribed to matter but denied to privation. This raises the questions: Why is it necessary to recognize appetite in the physical world, and why is such an apparently psychic term as appetite introduced?

The starting point in answering such questions is the ordered character of natural change. If ORDER cannot be reduced to CHANCE, it has to be explained by means of FINAL CAUSALITY. It is in this spirit that form in the philosophy of nature is called an end or term. If such language is justified, then there must be a tendency to a term or end in every natural change. But what is the seat of such a tendency? This cannot be form because form, as the term of change, is not present at the beginning to strive or tend. Nor can it be the previous form, here viewed as a privation of the new form that is the term of the change; for in any change there is a repugnance between the old form and the new one, not an attraction or tendency. The seat of the tendency must therefore be the matter. Such a tendency is called a natural appetite by analogy to the appetite most known to man, namely, the APPETITE or inclination that is the human will. In more univocal language, the appetite of matter, as St. Thomas Aguinas explains it, is the ordination of such matter toward the form that is the term of the particular natural change (In 1 phys. 15.10).

Dispositions of matter. Though indeterminate in its substantial character, the primary matter involved in any change does not take on in random fashion any of the potential infinity of forms it may bear. Carbon, when burned, does not become stone or water. The reason is the so-called "dispositions of matter." In any generation of a new substance, these are first known as the effects of the old form. Second, although substantial change is instantaneous, it is induced by accidental changes, first local motion and then alteration, both of which are exemplified when a source of heat is applied to carbon to be burned. In the third place, as explained by JOHN OF ST. THOMAS (Curs. Phil. 2.3.1.7), who synthesized the references of St. Thomas to the dispositions of primary matter, the final DISPOSITION of matter, in generation, is the effect of the new form.

In natural processes, which are to be distinguished from those occurring by art or by chance, form has to be regarded again as the end of matter, and the form that matter is eventually to bear is the end of all the dispositions of its matter. In this sense, all previous dispositions are the result of the most advanced form achieved, and this is the final cause of what went before. These notions are relevant to the evidences for EVOLUTION, especially with the extension of the evolutionary idea to cosmogony. Form is the end of matter in any given change, and matter in turn has an appetite, gradually disposed, to possess the form. But as in the case of the appetite of matter, the probing of its dispositions must pertain to the metaphysics of substance.

Nominal definitions. In the last chapter of Book 1 of the Physics, Aristotle comes to a nominal DEFINITION of primary matter as studied in the philosophy of nature: "the primary substratum of each thing, from which it comes to be without qualification, and which persists in the result" (192a 31). The "primary" of this definition marks the definiendum off from secondary matter, and "substratum" distinguishes it from form; the last two clauses further distinguish it from privation. The more classic and metaphysical definition of primary matter, expressing its purely potential or indeterminate character in the kind of negative way by which this principle is known, reads: "By matter I mean that which in itself is neither a particular thing nor a certain quantity nor assigned to any other of the categories by which being is determined" (Meta. 1029a 19).

As explained by St. Thomas, "form is the end of matter," and "privation is the negation of form in a subject" (In 1 phys. 15). Both of these nominal definitions, like the characterizations of primary matter above, summarize the long discussions that make up Book 1 of the Physics.

Creation and eduction. Substantial form and its privation, two opposites in the primary genus, substance, are the first principles of change. Everything in the physical world is derived from them, and they are underived in the physical world. Primary matter and its form are essential principles of change, while privation is an incidental principle. None of these principles comes about through natural change; if they did, all of them would be again involved as principles of such change and a vicious circle would result. To account for their origins, it is necessary to go to metaphysics and there to raise the question of CREATION.

Given a world already created and given a thing or things that are informed in some way, new natural form (the human soul excepted) is brought to be from matter by what St. Thomas called eduction (De pot. 3.9)—a term that has the modern connotation of emergence. Eduction or emergence, as illustrated by the kneading of clay, to bring forth, say, a spherical shape from the matter being molded, calls attention to the inadequacy of such expressions as "the union" of form and matter or "the acquisition" or "taking on" of form by matter. On the other hand, eduction itself, it should be stated, is not generation. If it were, it would involve matter, form, and privation again, and the vicious circle would once more be opened.

Nature and causality. It is explained in the second book of the Physics that NATURE is an intrinsic principle or source of motion. As further specifications of their roles, both primary matter and its form fulfill this definition of nature. Matter is the source from which physical things come to be, and as such is an intrinsic principle of change. Form, as terminating matter to give a physical thing an intrinsic and original character, is also entitled to be called nature.

Matter and form, in addition to being principles, are also causes; privation, however, not being a positive reality, can exert no positive influence on the production of a thing and is therefore not a cause. The material and formal causes, though both intrinsic to the effect, are distinct from it since the effect is neither matter nor form but the result of both. There is thus a sufficient difference between matter and the result, on the one hand, and the form and the result, on the other, to preserve the distinction necessary in a cause-effect relationship (see CAUSALITY).

Uses of Matter and Form

In their fundamental meanings, matter and form are properly studied in the philosophy of nature, the only branch of philosophy that considers all four types of cause. The metaphysician also studies form, but form here is already used in a different sense, as synonymous with essence or with the logician's SPECIES This extension of the term has been previously noted; historically it is no doubt earlier than Aristotle's usage, since it appears to be the meaning that Plato had in mind when he developed his notion of matter and form through the contrast of the intelligible and the sensible (Tim. 52). Like form, matter also has many meanings in parts of philosophy other than the philosophy of nature, and sometimes even in the philosophy of nature itself. Thus the breakdown of a whole into its parts is characterized by St. Thomas as a resolution toward matter (In 2 phys. 5.9). But whatever the many applications of matter and form in human science, they received their first scientific formulation, in Aristotle's sense, at the physical level where the problem is change, not at the metaphysical level where Plato made his distinctions between universals and singulars.

Human learning. Some of these applications in other areas of knowledge deserve listing, just to show the uses of matter and form throughout the range of human learning. One of the most crucial areas where matter and form are invoked is in the study of the human soul in its relation to the matter of man (see SOUL-BODY RELATION-SHIP). Following a lead in St. Thomas, LOGIC is divided into material and formal parts. Such special logical entities as definition and SYLLOGISM have each a matter and a form: matter is the content and form the arrangement. Literary works—and in general all artistic products also have a matter and form; in this context there should be mentioned the 20th-century study of the Bible through FORM CRITICISM. In mathematics, there is intelligible matter, e.g., the divisible parts within a triangle, and form, e.g., the three-sided character of the triangle. Even 20th-century thinkers in mathematics and in logic used terms like formalism, which owes its remote origin to the long Western tradition concerning matter and form. A similar residue of this tradition can be found in modern biology, where it is conventional to speak of "living forms."

Metaphysics and ethics. The extended uses of matter and form in logic and in mathematics are analogous to their primary applications in the physical order. So, too, are the impositions of these terms in metaphysics, where form has already been mentioned as a synonym for essence. The recipient of this essence in the physical world is matter—not pure prime matter but matter with one of the modes of quantity. In another context, when relating universals to reality, the metaphysician argues that these are formally in the mind and materially in physical things. Here again, there is a use of matter and form. The metaphysician also uses the various levels of remotion of form from matter to differentiate the sciences; mathematical physics, for instance, is said to be formally mathematical and materially physical (see SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF). As other illustrations of these principles, angels are said to be pure forms, and even the act of EXISTENCE is expressed by St. Thomas as "formal in respect of everything found in a thing" (Summa theologiae 1a, 8.1).

In ETHICS, human acts have matter and form; so do VIRTUE, law, family, society, and government. All these subjects, studied again through the use of matter and form, are considered by the theologian, who adds dimensions of his own to the analogous application of these principles. Thus the relation of the natural to the supernatural is often expressed by the analogy of the material as related to the formal. Within the supernatural order itself charity is called, for instance, the form of all the infused virtues, and all the SACRAMENTS are explicated in terms of matter and form.

Thus, not only in those studies that are available to reason alone but through the whole range of Christian intellectual life, matter and form are truly fundamental principles. The above list has merely provided a sampling of their scope.

Historical Controversies

Like all other claims of human reason, matter and form have been objects of controversy inside and outside the Christian tradition. At least in some of his language, Plato seems to have identified matter and space because both are in some sense receptacles (Tim. 52). With PLOTI-NUS there is something of a return to a pre-Aristotelian view that matter is privation or evil (Enneads 2.4; 3.6.7; 6.3.7). St. AUGUSTINE, though his views on this question are not always uniform, referred to the existence of the so-called SEMINAL REASONS (Gen. ad litt. 6.5.8)—a term of Stoic origin. This has prompted the conclusion that Augustine did not hold to the purely potential character of primary matter. Remnants of Augustine's thought on this point, even though their meanings are not always clear, appear at least as late as St. BONAVENTURE (In 2 sent. 7.2.2.1). However, any attempt to recite even the most important figures in the Middle Ages who expressed views on primary matter would have to enter the complicated question of the plurality of forms (see FORMS, UNICI-TY AND PLURALITY OF). Though some partisans in this controversy, including at times St. Albert the Great (Summa de creaturis, Borgnet, 34:323), expressed the view that primary matter is purely potential, this point was most emphatically and unequivocally defended by St. Thomas. After his time, new interpretations of primary matter appear in the writings of John Duns Scotus (Op. Ox. 2.12.1.10) and Francisco SUÁREZ (Disp. Met. 34.5.36, 42) whose views, though differing from each other, both seem to accord primary matter at least some measure of act.

After the decline of scholastic thought in the Renaissance, matter and form continue to appear in the works of the great original philosophers, including KANT and HEGEL, though in many cases there is little similarity, except in name, with older Greek principles of mobile being. In their explanations of the material world, including living things, post-Renaissance thinkers, scientists and philosophers alike, turned away from matter and form and to either mechanism or dynamism.

Mechanism and dynamism. The typical version of mechanism attempts to explain nature by means of quantity and local motion; with advances in modern science, the raw material in such a mechanical view can be identified not merely as quantity in general but as atoms, in the case of lifeless world, and cells, in the case of the living. Prominent mechanists in the modern world were R. Descartes, P. Gassendi, E. H. Haeckel, J. Loeb, H. von Helmholtz, E. Du Bois-Reymond, Lord Kelvin, and, in general, all who took Newtonian mechanics in physics, and the cell theory in biology, or a Darwinian type of evolutionism, to provide an authentic philosophy of nature. Mechanism tends to deny nature as an intrinsic principle and to affirm that the fundamental stuff of the world is inert.

By contrast, DYNAMISM lays stress on the active, energetic character of the basic constituents of our world. G. W. LEIBNIZ, for instance, held to the existence of the MONAD, which is an indivisible, inextended unit of process having perception. R. Boscovich held to the existence of points of force as the underlying physical realities. Other prominent dynamists were Kant, D. Palmieri, and W. Ostwald, who envisioned physical things as fundamentally energy. More recent proponents of dynamism have been Henri Bergson (Creative Evolution [New York 1911]) with his theory of the élan vital as an all-pervading reality, and Alfred North Whitehead (Process and Reality [New York 1929]), who reduced the universe to units of process called actual entities, themselves manifestations of a still more fundamental principle called creativity.

Though constructive criticism of the modern alternatives to matter and form cannot be undertaken here, it bears mention that, in their typical forms, mechanism tends to see only passivity in the physical world and dynamism, only activity. This suggests that judged merely in the light of alternative philosophies of nature the explanation of change through matter, or the potential, and form, or the actual, would appear as a combination of the positive insights of its rivals, without their extremisms.

Modern Thomism. After the revival of THOMISM in 1879, matter and form, as discussed in the scholastic tradition, were also revived (see SCHOLASTICISM). Most scholastics have accepted the two principles, though for varying reasons. While claiming to be Thomistic in inspiration, many books and articles written in the 20th century presented the philosophy of nature as an applied metaphysics, despite the fact that metaphysics leaves the material cause out of account. Matter and form were thus treated in a rationalistic and even Cartesian spirit. Typical of this was the mathematical approach to matter and form through the nature of the continuum, and as an answer to the question: What is bodily essence? This is far different from the type of question Aristotle raised in the Physics.

In a modern context, the establishment of primary matter and substantial form through the kind of evidence invoked by Aristotle, namely the fact of substantial change, had to face, on the one hand, philosophical arguments like Hume's to the effect that the reality of substance cannot be grasped by the human mind, and on the other, arguments invoking the success of modern science in reducing all change to mechanical principles. Such difficulties led scholastics like P. Descoqs to reduce the status of matter and form to that of a probable explanation (Essai critique sur l'hylémorphisme [Paris 1924]).

Hylosystemism. Other scholastics like A. Mitterer in Germany (Das Ringen der alten Stoff-Form-Metaphysik mit der heutigen Stoff-Physik [Innsbruck 1935]), and C. Bittle in the United States (From Aether to Cosmos [Milwaukee 1941]) proposed a theory of bodily essence called HYLOSYSTEMISM, a term designed to parallel a modern name for matter-form doctrine, namely, HYLO-MORPHISM. While retaining a so-called hylomorphic view of organisms, hylosystemism alleged that the findings of the modern sciences do not require the traditional view of matter and form as principles of inorganic things. In resolving the world into its constituents, hylosystemism argued that inorganic reality can be reduced to atoms and that atoms themselves are broken down into still simpler parts, such as protons, and electrons. These subatomic parts were called hylons, and atoms themselves were regarded as systems of such hylons. Hence the term hylosystemism.

Hylons are considered to be material substances, but not bodies, since they do not tend to exist in an independent status. Similarly, the system peculiar to each type of atom is not regarded as a mechanical sum to be explained by the mere addition of its parts. In comparing hylosystemism to hylomorphism, a critic might note that the former is a theory of an integral WHOLE, while the latter is an account of a physical whole. Thus the two may not be rivals, since they are not genuine alternatives.

Other Views. More recent philosophers who would claim, like the hylosystemists, to stand within the Aristotelian tradition, have also been beset by modern philosophical arguments against the knowability of material substances and by the success of science in accounting for change without recourse to matter and form. Yet F. Renoirte (Cosmology, [New York, 1950]) argued that when all is said and done there is a duality of space and time; this he offered as evidence for the more fundamental dualism of matter and form, even though man cannot designate this or that thing as being a substantial unit, and as thus having a substantial form of its own that informs primary matter. A. Van Melsen (The Philosophy of Nature [2d ed. Pittsburgh 1954]) has similar reservations about the proof of matter and form through change, but he finds evidence for dualism in the existence of discrete individuals that are each bearers of a common specific type.

Detailed criticisms aside, it is necessary to point out that philosophers who invoke modern science to reject the evidence for matter and form based on substantial change all neglect the investigative approach to this problem urged by Aristotle and carefully explained by St. Thomas. Primary matter and substantial form are established at the vague and universal level of knowledge where the mind is most at home and most sure of itself. When knowledge becomes more distinct and detailed, as in modern science, it can clarify fundamental knowledge but never replace it, just as a knowledge of polygons makes more specific man's knowledge of figure without rejecting the generic notion of figure itself. On such grounds, in any synthetic explanation of nature, the findings of science must be adjusted to a well-examined philosophy of nature, and not vice versa. In evaluating hylosystemism and the views of Renoirte and Van Melsen, it must be urged that it is not good methodology in the philosophy of nature to overestimate science as a starting point.

Testimony from scientists. Many of the objections to matter and form, from mechanism to philosophies that try to establish a physical dualism by means other than the evidence of substantial change, eventually became as outmoded as the science on which the objections were based. As the 20th century wore on, the mechanism which, except for scattered opposition from dynamists, had dominated science, had to be discarded in the face of facts. Using these new and non-mechanical theories of science, American naturalism in the early 20th century tried to define a so-called nonreductionist materialism in which a non-mechanical matrix was seen as tending to spawn various levels of reality—inorganic matter of various complexities, life in its various grades, and finally mind—with higher levels irreducible to lower ones, but with only one kind of reality underlying it all. The net result was a species of materialistic dynamism. Dialectical MATERIALISM used the same scientific evidences for dynamism to reexamine its philosophy of nature and, among some authors, to draw close to the principles of matter and form (G. Wetter, Dialectical Materialism [New York 1959]).

From among modern scientists themselves, though no substitute for the older mechanism had emerged, as the second half of the 20th century got under way there were evidences that primary matter and its form were slowly moving back into prominence. Thus W. Heisenberg (Physics and Philosophy [New York 1958]) found that quantum physics, with its emphasis on the indeterminate, restored the Aristotelian notion of potency or matter. Organismal biology also gained ground, suggesting the existence of a whole-making principle. It was also shown that Whitehead, who kept in such close touch with science, used concepts that have affinity with Aristotle's. The synthesis of TEILHARD DE CHARDIN envisioned a fundamental matrix in development toward a term. This list could be enlarged, if only to suggest rhetorically the respectability of matter and form in the light of recent science and philosophy. For withal, the fundamental evidence for primary matter and substantial form must remain the universal level of human knowledge that, in the proper logical order for constructing a synthetic world view, precedes the detailed theorizing of modern thought.

See Also: PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE; PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE.

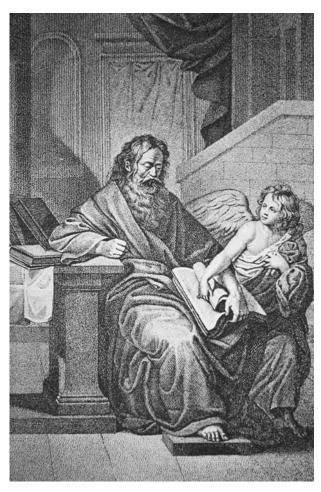

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Commentary on Aristotle's Physics (New Haven, Conn. 1963); An Introduction to the Philosophy of Nature, comp. R. A. KOCOUREK (St. Paul, Minn. 1948). JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, Cursus philosophicus Thomisticus, ed. B. REISER, 3 v. (Turin 1938) 2.1:2-6. V. E. SMITH, The General Science of Nature (Milwaukee, Wis. 1958). J. A. J. PETERS, "Matter and Form in Metaphysics," New Scholasticism 31 (1957) 447-483. W. KANE, "The First Principles of Changeable Being," Thomist 8 (1945) 27-67. D. DUBARLE, "L'Idée hylémorphiste d'Aristote," Revue des sciences philosophiques et religieuses 36 (1952) 205-230. m. de MUNNYNCK, "L'Hylémorphisme dans la pensée contemporaine," Divus Thomas 6 (1928) 154-176. J. C. LA DRIERE, "Form and Style," Dictionary of World Literature, ed. J. T. SHIPLEY (Paterson, N.J. 1960); "Literary Form and Form in the Other Arts," in International Federation of Modern Languages and Literatures, Stillund Formprobleme in der Literatur, ed. P. BOCKMANN (Heidelberg 1959) 28-37.

[V. E. SMITH]

MATTHEW, APOSTLE, ST.

Traditional author of the first Gospel. His name (Gr. Ματθαῖος or Μαθθαῖος) is from Aramaic mattai, a shortened form of the Hebrew mattanyâ or mattatyâ (gift of Yahweh). By deriving it from another root, some give it the meaning of "the faithful." He is named seventh in the list of APOSTLES in Mk 3.18 and Lk 6.15; eighth in Mt 10.3 and Acts 1.13. In Mt 10.3 he is called a τελώνης, i.e., tax collector or PUBLICAN; this fits with his being called by Jesus from the τελώνιον (toll-house) in Mt 9.9. The calling of a tax collector is found also in Mk 2.13–14 and Lk 5.27-29, but there he is called Levi (to which Mark adds, "the son of Alphaeus"). Because all three Synoptics relate the same event, we must conclude that they speak of the same person: Matthew-Levi. This identification has been challenged by some: Heracleon and perhaps Origen (in Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 4.9; Patrologia Graecae 8.1281; Origen, Contra Celsum 1.62; see Patrologia Graecae 14.835). The banquet presented in Mk 2.15-17 and Lk 5.29-32 as given by Levi is also in Mt 9.10-13, where Matthew, however, is not expressly mentioned.

Nothing is definitely known about his later ministry. The Liber de ortu beatae Mariae et infantia Salvatoris attributed to him is a 5th-century apocryphon [see BIBLE, III (CANON), 5]. Tradition relates that he had an early ministry in Judea and later went to Gentile lands, given variously as Ethiopia, Persia, and Parthia. He is revered as a martyr and is commemorated in the Latin Church on September 21, in the Eastern on November 16. In art he is represented with a spear in his hand (an allusion to his martyrdom); his symbol (as EVANGELIST) is a winged man. His relics are said to have been found at Salerno in 1080.

Saint Matthew, engraving by Philippe Chery.

See Also: MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 1479–80. M. BONNET and R. A. LIPSIUS, eds., Acta apostolorum apocrypha (Leipzig 1898) 1.2. E. MANGENOT, Dictionaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 4.1:872–876. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10.2:2682–83. F. HAASE, Apostel und Evangelisten in den orientalischen Überlieferungen (Münster 1922) 102–103; 272.

[J. A. LEFRANÇOIS]

MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO

Traditionally placed first in almost all the texts of the New Testament, the gospel according to Matthew has enjoyed widespread popularity because of its richness of detail, its deliberate catechetical intent, and its special preoccupation with Church order. The liturgies have shown a predilection for the Matthean version of the Lord's Prayer and catechetical texts for the Matthean version of the Beatitudes. It alone gives the epochal Tu es Petrus (Mt 16.17–19), and it would be otiose to underline the magnitude of this text in Christian history.

This article is in two parts. The first, reflecting the approach that was common through the middle of the 20th century, outlines the general plan of the Gospel and discusses it in relationship to the other synoptic Gospels. The second part draws on the scholarship of the latter half of the century that focused more on the historical situation of the Matthean community. It presents the composition as the evangelist's response to challenges facing a Christian community in transition, emphasizes the gospel as narrative and, highlights its view of salvation-history.

Plan and Structure. Based on the simplest analysis of its contents, the gospel, after an introduction (1.1–4.11) that reports the circumstances surrounding the birth of Jesus—the so-called Infancy Narrative—can be divided into three principal sections, each with several divisions and subdivisions: the first section describes Jesus' ministry in Galilee (4.12–13.58); the second section is an account of his journeys (14.1–20.34); and the third, tells of ministry in Jerusalem, his passion and death and resurrection (21.1–28.20).

Modern biblical scholars seeking clues to the author's purpose and intent have undertaken more sophisticated analysis. Approaching the text from different starting points, three schools of thought have emerged as to how the author organized his material: one school argues that it follows a broad geographical-chronological outline that traces Jesus' story from Galilee to Jerusalem, from his birth to his death and resurrection; another school finds topical patterns that highlight and explain the evangelist's basic themes; and a third detects a conceptual structure used by the author to focus on the theme of salvation.

Although scholars have grown more and more critical of the so-called Pentateuchal theory advocated by Benjamin Bacon early in the 20th century, they acknowledge his insight in pointing up the literary formula that clearly marked the boundaries of the five major parts of Jesus' public ministry. Each part is composed of a narrative section followed by a discourse, and all are directed to the progressive unfolding of the central theme of the SYNOPTIC GOSPELS, the good news of the Kingdom: (1) the promulgation of the Kingdom: ch. 3–7; (2) the preaching of the Kingdom: ch. 8–10; (3) the mystery of the Kingdom and its lowliness and inwardness as opposed to the triumphal aspirations of nationalistic theology: 11.1–13.52; (4) its initial growth among a tiny remnant of believers who are the seed of the future Church (13.53–18.35); (5) the divide: rejection of the Jews and admission of the Gentiles (ch. 19–25).

The five discourses (ch. 5–7; ch. 10; 13.1–52; ch. 18; ch. 24–25) all end with a conventional summary that remains fairly consistent: "And it came to pass when Jesus had finished these words. . ." (7.28; 11.1; 13.53; 19.1; 26.1). The formula is Semitic, and it is given here in its Septuagint (LXX) dress (cf. Jos 4.11; 1 Sm 13.10; 1 Sm 24.17; etc.). In Matthew it has a definitive ring, and he scarcely ever uses it outside these contexts; a possible exception is 9.10. All five discourses have the Kingdom of Heaven for their theme, but each in turn shifts the focus and so changes the definition in a marked manner.

The first (ch. 5–7) of the five discourses, commonly called the SERMON on the Mount, constitutes in profane metaphor the Magna Carta of the Kingdom. It embodies inter alia the ideal of what the disciple should be, and it gives an excellent insight into Matthew's method of composition. For him a chosen theme is a magnet that attracts to itself sayings of Jesus, which one knows, from comparing Matthew in loco with the other Synoptics, must belong to different periods in the public life. Not infrequently in fact Matthew himself reproduces such sayings as doublets in what seem to be more satisfying contexts logically.

Thus the Our Father, which is given in Lk 11.2-4 in a very natural context, seems to be placed by Matthew at Mt 6.9-15 by attraction to his theme that at this point is prayer, fasting, and almsgiving. In a similar way the words of Christ on divorce (5.31-32) reoccur as a doublet with no essential change in 19.9 (Mk 10.11-12; Lk 16.18). Matthew places them in the prior setting solely because his theme is adultery at that point. This type of composition is thematic and suits his purpose, but it must of course be carefully born in mind in the overall exegesis of his Gospel. Another case of such thematic attraction seems to be verifiable in Mt 16.13-23, where the Tu es Petrus text seems to have been drawn from a different Sitz im Leben since it is logically difficult to fit it into the total Synoptic context at this point (Mk 8.27-33; Lk 9.18-22; Mt 16.13-23).

The second discourse (ch. 10) is addressed to the missionary preachers of the good news and includes both instructions and a warning about impending persecutions.

Matthew writing the Gospel. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

The third (ch. 13) is on the lowly and hidden nature of the Kingdom and presents a clear rejection of nationalistic messianism. The fourth (ch. 18) is a discourse for the followers of Jesus. They are the little flock through whom the Kingdom will grow, and these Jesus instructs in the way of humility, charity, and mutual support. And from these in fact came the inspired impulse that spread the Kingdom after the dawn of the Resurrection. The fifth (ch. 24-25) enshrines the great apocalyptic tableau that is probably the most mysterious element in the New Testament, here and in the other Synoptics. A double chord runs through it, the rejection of the people of the Old Law and the election of the believers in Christ, Jew and Gentile, the new people of God. There is great emphasis here on the need for vigilance, and all is unrolled against the background of the impending doom of Jerusalem and the Last Judgment.

Matthew separates the discourses by inserting narrative sections. His intention, and it is fairly well sustained, is to use the narrative to anticipate the themes of the discourses. This plan is not fully realized in the case of the first discourse. Here he had to follow inevitably the common beginnings of the Synoptic tradition (John the Baptist, Baptism, and temptations), but even at that his selective hand is visible. He confines himself to the necessary minimum of the common tradition (3.1–4.11), and omitting further elements common to Mark and Luke, e.g., Jesus in the synagogue at Capharnaum and the healing of Peter's mother-in-law, he subtly introduces an audience for the imminent Sermon on the Mount—chosen disciples (4.18–22) and the multitudes drawn by the growing fame of Jesus as a wonder-worker (4.23–25).

The plan is quite clear in the narrative section (ch. 8–9) before the second discourse. Here 10 miracles are grouped together because miracles are signs of the Messiah and His age (4.23–25; 9.35; 11.3–6; 12.28). Thus in the whole missionary context of ch. 8–10 there are not only missionary instructions but also the signs performed by Jesus that His disciples in their turn will do also.

Likewise the narrative section of ch. 11–12 admirably prepares the way for the ensuing discourse in parables. The theme here is the lowliness of the Kingdom, a conception so alien to the majority of the Jews that Jesus elects to speak of it under the veil of parables. To prepare this Kingdom-in-parables notion, the evangelist presents certain events and sayings calculated to justify, as it were, in advance the reason for the use of such a veiled device of divine revelation. The proud who refuse to believe in Jesus are introduced (11.16–24; 12.1–14, 24–45); even John the Baptist seems to have doubts (11.2–6); but the humble of heart are those who receive the message and who become true followers of Christ (11.25–27; 12.23, 46–50).

The narrative section 13.53–17.27 introduces the theme of the fourth discourse less clearly than in the preceding cases. There is, however, in this section a general orientation toward the ecclesiastical subject matter of ch. 18. It contains, for instance, two episodes that are fundamental to the constitution of the future Church: the confession of Peter at Caesarea Philippi and the multiplication of the loaves with its Eucharistic symbolism. In addition, the role of Peter is strongly emphasized in this section: he walks on the waters (14.28–31), he receives the solemn promise of Jesus (16.17–19), and he is closely related to Jesus when the latter pays the Temple tax for both (17.24–27). In fact, one may say that the person of Peter throws a prophetic shadow on the subsequent discourse.

As much may be said regarding ch. 19–23. Here the choice of events intended to introduce the eschatological discourse are not very systematically related to it. Yet the orientation toward it is quite discernible. In view of the supreme crisis that it presents, Jesus is shown calling for the humility that is a condition for entry into the Kingdom (19.10–30; 20.20–28). That a decisive spiritual event is at hand is clearly indicated by the solemn entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday (21.1–11) and by the symbolic cleansing of the Temple (21.12–17). The tone of Jesus is decisive and unprecedented as He rejects official Judaism and its hypocrisy (23.1–36). And the most poignant moment is reached in the "Jerusalem, Jerusalem . . ." passage, 23.37–39. Only the Resurrection can answer this cry of a broken heart.

Sources and Synoptics. St. IRENAEUS attributed to Matthew the "composition of the Gospel" while "Peter and Paul were preaching and founding the Church in Rome" (Adversus haereses 3.1.1, quoted by Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5.8.2). ORIGEN (d. 254) in his commentary on Matthew says: "The Gospel according to Matthew . . . was the first to be composed . . . in the Hebrew language for believers from Judaism" (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 6.25.4). Eusebius himself gives evidence in the same strain (ibid. 3.24.6), and one may note that the little phrase "in the Hebrew language" remains a constant. Early tradition, based on the testimony of Papias of Hieraplis (c. 60-130), held that Matthew composed a Gospel in Aramaic in Palestine. Papias presumably got his information from John the Presbyter since that was the source of his information on Mark (ibid. 23.2). Modern critical analysis, however, changes this view considerably. It shows in fact that the present canonical Greek Matthew and Luke presuppose Greek Mark as a basis. Matthew would therefore have been substantially constructed from a union of Mark with the hypothetical source called Q. The latter, already briefly referred to above, would have been used also by Luke, and this would explain the striking resemblance and at times identity of Matthew and Luke in passages of which Mark shows no trace. Additional critical study has followed this lead but with further modifications.

Some Catholic scholars of the Synoptic problem are loathe to set aside the ancient tradition of Matthew's priority. They see in the Papias tradition a reference not to the canonical Matthew but to an original Matthew in the Aramaic language which is now lost. What follows summarizes P. Benoit's assessment of the situation as he presented it in his Introduction to the Gospel of Matthew in the 1961 Bible of Jerusalem.

Material Common to Matthew and Mark. There exist the closest resemblances in subject matter and form between these Gospels. Matthew includes almost all the narrative material of Mark and adds little to it if one excludes the Infancy narrative. He follows the order of Mark very closely. One may certainly admit with the advocates of FORM CRITICISM that the Synoptic Gospels are the result of the grouping together of originally isolated units (miracle stories, pronouncement stories, novellen, sayings and parables, etc.). But when one finds that the units once grouped have a more or less identical order as between two Gospels, this cannot be due to chance and the conclusion must be drawn that one depends on the other or that both are following a common but anterior source that had already arranged the original units in the present grouping. Must one choose between these alternatives, or somehow suggest a solution by combining them? An Aramaic original could explain the common order but could not explain the resemblances of language, in this case Greek. There are many indications that Greek Matthew depends on Greek Mark.

Dependence of Greek Matthew on Greek Mark. Where the same narrative is in question Matthew's style is spare and dry and concerned only with the doctrinal point at issue, whereas Mark is leisurely and colorful and abounds in touches of realistic detail. If one compares Mt 9.18–26 with Mk 5.21–43, it is more likely that Matthew has made a schematic abstract from the vivid narrative of Mark than the other way around. This could also be explained by suggesting that Mark had embellished a common source that Matthew retained in its original and direct simplicity. But that seems quite unlikely in view of the coherent spontaneity of Mark.

The Greek of Matthew is solid and workmanlike, if not elegant, while that of Mark is rough and not without solecisms. When two parallel texts are compared carefully the refining hand of Matthew is evident as he attempts to improve on the deficiencies of Mark's language. This certainly shows a dependence of Matthew on Mark.

More important, however, are the cases in which Matthew betrays his dependence by keeping inexplicable details in his text on occasions in which he has reworked a Marcan narrative. Thus when he speaks of cures that took place "in the evening" (8.16), he retains a detail that has no meaning in his context, whereas in Mark (1.32) it has meaning since it marks the end of the Sabbath (1.21). In Matthew there had been no reference to a Sabbath, whereas in Mark there had to be since he is showing that Jesus waited until evening ended the Sabbath so as not to violate it by performing miracles, or more likely because the people would have been indoors during the Sabbath. In the same way the dinner with the sinners and the discussion on fasting (Mt 9.10-17) do not fit into the context of the ten miracles where Matthew places them. At this point the reference to the vocation of Matthew (8.9) was the relevant issue for the Evangelist, but that is found elsewhere in Mark (Mk 2.14–22) specifically linked to the two episodes referred to above. Apparently Matthew could see no way, or did not choose, to detach them and thus leaves evidence of his dependence on Mark. These and other indications could be presented to show dependence, but do they prove total dependence? Benoit believes that the matter may be explored even further.

Matthew's Use of the Old Testament. All the New Testament writers are concerned with the fulfillment of the Old Testament in the person of Christ, but none as much as Matthew. He quotes the Old Testament directly at least 60 times (Mark 23 and Luke 25 times), not to mention covert allusions and echoes. Some 10 of these quotations he cites as personal reflections on the event at hand; the rest he places on the lips of others. His Old Testament text is normally the LXX. This whole procedure is somewhat disconcerting to a modern reader, especially when on one occasion he apparently invents an ad hoc citation: "He shall be called a Nazarene" (2.23b). This is not in the Old Testament, nor is Nazareth ever mentioned there. At times he conflates two disparate Old Testament texts, a procedure that appears wholly artificial to the modern reader. Thus in 27.9-10, when showing that Judas is fulfilling a prophecy of Jeremiah, Matthew achieves his purpose by conflating Jer 32.6-15 with Jer 18.2–3 and Za 11.12–13. This is not the way of Western logic, but Matthew was in good rabbinical standing in his methods. The Messiah (the Christ) promised in the Old Testament had come. To Matthew's mentality the whole Old Testament had pointed to this, and therefore it was conceived as so charged with the promise of the Messiah that every word of it somehow ministered to this promise. Any text in it would therefore have some intimation to convey of the future Christ and could be used as such. It may be added that the New Testament use of the Old Testament is generally rather sober when compared to some of the extraordinary elaborations of the rabbinical traditions of exegesis. A selection of Matthean Old Testament citations is appended here to illustrate his spirit and method.

In Mt 1.23, Is 7.14 is quoted according to the LXX: "Behold, the virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son; and they shall call his name Emmanuel'; which is, interpreted, 'God with us.'" The Hebrew has "young woman" and "she shall call."

In Mt 2.15, Hos 11.1 is quoted: "Out of Egypt I called my son." In the original the reference is to the Exodus of Israel from Egypt. Matthew reinterprets the passage messianically.

In Mt 4.15–16, Is 9.1–2 is quoted: "Land of Zabulon and land of Nephthalim, by the way of the sea, beyond the Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles; the people who sat in darkness have seen a great light; and upon those who sat in the region and shadow of death, a light has arisen." Isaiah was thinking of the Mediterranean coast and in terms of the Assyrians. Matthew uses this text quite loosely as a reflection citation to provide a theological reason for Jesus' transfer from Nazareth to Capharnaum on the shore of the Sea of Galilee.

In Mt 11.10, Mal 3.1 is quoted in a somewhat changed form: "Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, who shall make ready thy way before thee." The words of Malachia ("Lo, I am sending my messenger to prepare the way before me") have been changed (as also in the LXX and in Mk 1.2) because of the influence of Ex 23.20 ("See, I am sending an angel before you, to guard you on the way and bring you to the place I have prepared") and are then reinterpreted to refer to John the Baptist. [In Mk 1.2 the adapted citation from Mal 3.1 is attributed to Isaiah because it is followed (Mk 1.3) by a quotation of Is 40.3.]

In Mt 21.5 the evangelist writes: "Now this was done that what was spoken through the prophet might be fulfilled, 'Tell the daughter of Sion: Behold thy king comes to thee, meek and seated upon an ass, and upon a colt, the foal of a beast of burden." This is a combination of Is 62.11 ("Say to daughter Sion, your savior comes") and Za 9.9 ("See, your king shall come to you; a just savior is he, meek, and riding on an ass, on a colt, the foal of an ass"). Matthew or his source misunderstood the parallelism of the Hebrew poetry and spoke of two animals; the ass and colt are to be regarded as one in the original.

Matthew ranges widely over the Old Testament. He loves above all Isaiah, "the prophet of the Gospel," but he makes other Prophets, the Law, and the Psalms as well tributary to his theology of Christ in the Old Testament.

Historical Situation. A resurgent interest in Matthew's Gospel on the part of Scripture scholars has yielded significant studies of Matthean theology (Kingsbury, Meier) and a few commentaries. As already noted, the view that the Gospel according to Matthew was written by one of the Twelve in Hebrew or Aramaic and is the oldest and most complete account of the life and teachings of Jesus is no longer held. Although the Gospel numbers Matthew as one of the Twelve and describes him as a tax-collector (9:9: 10:3), there is a consensus that the evangelist was most likely a second- or third-generation Christian-Jew, probably trained as a scribe in a school where several versions of the Scriptures were available (Stendahl). Modern scholars see an autobiographical reference in Matthew's esteem for the scribe who brings new things and old out of the treasure house of tradition (13:52). Matthew's Gospel can be dated about A.D. 85, about 15 years after the Jewish revolt against Roman rule. It seems to have been composed in a predominantly Jewish-Christian community, probably in Antioch or some other urban center in Syria or Palestine where the postrevolt reform movement, influenced by the Pharisees of Jamnia, affected the religious environment.

In applying the methods of redaction criticism to Matthew's Gospel, scholars have discovered that the evangelist's community was coping with confusion caused by a time of transition. Christians, dispersed from Jerusalem, established communities throughout Palestine (Acts 8:1–3a), and Paul's missionary activities had opened the movement to Gentiles. Key leaders had been put to death: James in Jerusalem (A.D. 60); Peter and Paul in Rome (A.D. 67–68). What had been a predominantly Christian-Jewish movement was becoming progressively more Gentile.

Within Judaism dramatic changes were taking place. Prior to the revolt against Rome which ended with the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple (A.D. 66–70), Christian-Jews had understood themselves as a sect within Judaism, living under the same large umbrella as the Sadducees, the Essenes, the Pharisees, and the Zealots. But after the revolt they found themselves in conflict with the Jewish reform movement strongly influenced by the Pharisees. The movement took steps to control the rising significance of Christian-Jews and caused them to be gradually excommunicated from local synagogues.

These events caused Matthew's community to examine their own actions and their identity as followers of Jesus. Could they continue as a sect within Judaism? Should they continue to focus their missionary efforts on their fellow Jews or shift more to the Gentiles? What attitude should they take toward the Jewish Law, as it was being reinterpreted by the Pharisees? How should this community deal with the tension and hostility—a result of their belief that Jesus was the promised Messiah—between themselves and the synagogue leaders? These questions caused the community disorientation, confusion, tension, and internal conflict, as they wondered how to understand themselves in the world of postwar Judaism.

Important internal issues also included: persecution from Jewish and non-Jewish sources, scandal caused by mutual betrayal, hatred between members, the divisive influence of false prophets, and widespread wickedness causing love to grow cold (24:1–14). In a word, Matthew's community faced the challenges of a threefold transition: from an image of themselves as a sect within Judaism to an image of themselves as an independent movement; from a strong Jewish community to an increasingly Gentile community; and from a movement that included leaders who saw and heard Jesus during His earthly life to a movement more dependent on stories about what Jesus did and on collections of His sayings.

Evangelist's Composition. In response to these tensions, Matthew composed what we know as his Gospel. Weaving earlier traditions together, he retold the story of Jesus, so that his community might know what it meant to be Christian in the changing world of postwar Judaism. He affirmed their roots within Judaism and presented Jesus as the Messiah promised in the Hebrew Scriptures (Mt 1–2). He constructed five discourses to show that Jesus was their authoritative teacher, their Rabbi, not the Pharisees at Jamnia (Mt 5–7; 10; 13; 18; 24–25).

Matthew challenged his community to let Jesus deepen their "little faith," as they encountered the storms of transition (8:18-27; 14:22-33). He taught them to cope with internal dissension by avoiding scandal, by seeking the one sheep gone astray, and by reconciling and forgiving the brother or sister who had sinned against them (18:1–35). Matthew also directed their evangelical mission to both Jews and Gentiles (24:14; 28:16-20) and promised entrance into the kingdom of heaven to those who used their talents properly and remained awake and watching for the Messiah's expected return (24:37–25:30). As he retold the story of Jesus, Matthew highlighted these themes to show his community that they remained rooted in their Jewish heritage, to instruct them on how to deal with their present confusion, and to direct them toward their future life and mission.

Gospel as Narrative. Scholars have used composition and narrative criticism to interpret the Gospel of Matthew as a story about Jesus that begins with His roots in Abraham and David (1:1–18) and ends when He commissions to carry His message into all the world (28:16–20). The Infancy Narrative, the flight from Bethlehem in Judea to Egypt, and the return to Nazareth in Galilee recapitulate the story of Israel (Mt 1–2). Jesus' public life begins in the desert in Judea (3:1—4:11), continues in the towns and villages of Galilee (4:12–18:35) and on the journey to Jerusalem (19:1–20:34), and ends with the events in Jerusalem (21:1–28:15) and his return to Galilee (28:16–20).

The story scenes alternate sequentially with five collections of sayings, but the story as a whole remains a narrative that is structured more by the overall dramatic movement of plot and characters, than by the five distinct discourses. The story pivots on "hinge" scenes that echo what has gone before and announce what is to come: beginning the ministry in Galilee (4:12–25); return to Nazareth (13:52–58); Caesarea Philippi (16:13–28); blind men at Jericho (20:29–34); plot to kill Jesus (26:1–5).

Jesus is the central character in a network of relationships to his followers, to the suppliants who seek his help, to the hostile Jewish religious authorities, and to the larger Jewish crowds. The evangelist shapes these characters so that his community might see themselves in the followers, the Gentiles in the suppliants, the Jamnia Pharisees in Jesus' enemies, and their fellow Jews in the crowds.

Matthew's story begins with scenes from Jesus' infancy that tell the entire story in miniature (1–2). Next, John the Baptist and Jesus meet in the desert of Judea (3:1–4:11). With John in prison Jesus then reveals himself in Galilee as mighty in word and deed (4:12–9:34), and he empowers the 12 disciples to carry his power to the cities of Israel (9:35–10:42). Various reactions for and against Jesus are portrayed (11:1–12:50), and then Jesus teaches about the kingdom of heaven in parables (13:1–58).

Jesus then focuses on forming His disciples by strengthening their faith and increasing their understanding in episodes concerning bread (14:1–16:12) and by revealing the paradox of His suffering, death, and Resurrection on the journey to Jerusalem (16:13–20:34). In Jerusalem, Jesus takes possession of the temple, debates with His enemies, publicly denounces them, and instructs His disciples about the end of the age (21:1–25:46). Finally, He gathers with His followers at the supper, prays in the garden, moves through His passion, death, and Resurrection, and appears to His disciples in Galilee (26:1–28:20).

Salvation-History. In this story the evangelist presents a distinctive view of salvation-history. Apocalyptic signs at Jesus' death and Resurrection (27:51–54; 28:2–3) reveal a significant turning point in that history and Matthew has used his understanding of the postresurrectional era to interpret Jesus' public ministry. (Compare Mt 14:32–33 with Mk 6:51–52; and Mt 16:15–23 with Mk 8:29–33.) In the beginning Jesus limited his mission, like that of John the Baptist and the 12 disciples, to Israel (10:5–6). But as crucified and risen, Jesus has come into all power over heaven and earth, and He sends His followers on a more universal mission, that is, to make disciples of both Jews and Gentiles until the end of the age. It is Matthew's purpose to explain how, in the mystery of God's plan of salvation, the kingdom proclaimed by Jesus is accepted more readily by the nations than by the Jews (8:10–12; 21:43).

Matthew's community looked back on both the death of Jesus and the destruction of Jerusalem as marking the end of one era and the beginning of another. As Christians looked forward, the evangelist challenged them to use the story of Jesus to interpret their experience, to pattern their lives on the relationship between Jesus and His disciples, to live according to Jesus' teachings and teach others to observe His commands, and to devote themselves to the task predicted by Jesus: "And this gospel of the kingdom will be preached throughout the whole world, as a testimony to all nations; and then the end will come" (24:14). The continued presence of Jesus promised to the end of time (28:20) is to be found in a community that is committed to His teaching and willing to live by His commandments.

Bibliography: Commentaries. M. J. LAGRANGE, Évangile selon saint Matthieu (3d ed. Études biblique; 1927). J. SCHMID, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus (2d ed. Regensburger N.T. 3; Regensburg 1952). P. BENOIT, L'Évangile selon saint Matthieu (3d ed. Bible de Jérusalem, 43 v. [Paris 1948-54]; 1961). E. LOHMEYER and W. SCHMAUCH, Das Evangelium des Matthäus (Meyers Kritischexegetischer Kommentar über das N.T.; Göttingen 1956). P. BON-NARD, L'Evangile selon Saint Matthieu (Neuchatel, Switzerland 1963). E. SCHWEIZER, The Good News According to Matthew (Atlanta 1975). J. P. MEIER, Matthew (Wilmington, Del. 1980). D. A. HAGNER, Matthew, 2 v. World Biblical Commentary 33A, 33B (Dallas, 1993, 1995). D. J. HARRINGTON, The Gospel of Matthew. Sacra Pagina 1 (Collegeville, MN 1991). W. D. DAVIES and D. C. AL-LISON, JR., Matthew, 3 v. (The International Critical Commentary; Edinburgh, 1988, 1991, 1997). U. LUZ, Matthew 1-7. A Commentary (Minneapolis 1989). Matthew 8–20. Hermeneia (Minneapolis 2001). Studies. K. STENDAHL, The School of Matthew (Copenhagen 1968). G. BORNKAMM, et al., Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew (Philadelphia 1954). W. D. DAVIES, The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount (Cambridge, England 1966). J. D. KINSBURY, The Parables of Jesus in Matthew 13 (Richmond, VA 1969). M. J. SUGGS, Wisdom, Christology and Law in Matthew's Gospel (Cambridge, MA 1970). W. G. THOMPSON, Matthew's Advice to a Divided Community (Rome 1970). O. L. COPE, Matthew: A Scribe Trained for the Kingdom of Heaven (Washington 1976). J. P. MEIER, Law and History in Matthew's Gospel (Rome 1976). R. A. EDWARDS, Matthew's Story of Jesus (Philadelphia 1985). J. LAMBRECHT, The Sermon on the Mount (Wilmington, DE 1985). G. D. KILPATRICK, The Origins of the Gospel according to St. Matthew (Oxford 1946). B. C. BUT-LER, The Originality of St. Matthew (Cambridge, England 1951). J. DUPONT, Les Béatitudes (new ed. Bruges 1958). W. TRILLING, Das wahre Israel: Studien zur Theologie des Matthäusevangeliums (3d ed. Studien zum A. und N.T. 10; Munich 1964). D. L. BALCH, Social History of the Matthean Community: Cross-Disciplinary Approaches (Minneapolis 1991). J. A. OVERMAN, Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism: The Social World of Matthew's Community (Minneapolis, 1990). D. SENIOR, What Are They Saying About Matthew? (New York/Mahwah 1996).

[J. QUINLAN/W. G. THOMPSON/EDS.]

MATTHEW OF ALBANO

Cardinal; b. in the country of Laon, France, perhaps 1085; d. Pisa, Italy, Dec. 25, 1135. He studied at Laon under the celebrated master ANSELM, then left to become a priest at Laon. The disordered life of the clergy determined him instead to enter the Cluniac priory of St. Martindes-Champs at Paris (1110), where he became prior seven years later. Matthew was one of the leading monastic reformers of the 12th century and was active both in France and in northern Italy. He was a friend of the abbot of Cluny, PETER THE VENERABLE, and defended him against the deposed Abbot Ponce before Pope HONORIUS II, who created Matthew cardinal bishop of Albano in 1125. Honorius's successor, INNOCENT II, sent Matthew as legate to France in 1127 and to Germany in 1128 to restore monastic discipline there. Following the Council of PISA in 1134, he was invited by BERNARD OF CLAIR-VAUX to restore Milan to papal obedience and he died soon after returning to Pisa.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina ed J. P. MIGNE, 189:913–936, vita; 173:1261–68, letters. Histoire littéraire de la France 13:51–55. U. BERLIÈRE, "Le Cardinal Matthieu d'Albano, 1085–1135," Revue Bénédictine 18 (1901) 113–140, 280–303. C. J. VON HEFLE, Histoire des conciles d'apres les documents originaux 5.1:668–672. J. LECLERCQ, Pierre le Vénérable (Paris 1946).

[D. S. BUCZEK]

MATTHEW OF AQUASPARTA

Franciscan cardinal and theologian; b. Aquasparta (Umbria), c. 1238; d. Rome, Oct. 29, 1302. After completing his preparatory studies as a Franciscan, Matthew was sent to Paris to obtain the degree of Master of Theology. In 1268 he was already a baccalarius biblicus, and from 1270 to 1273 he commented on the Sententiae of PETER LOMBARD. By the end of August of 1273, he had received the title of Doctor of Theology and was teaching in Bologna, where he remained for a year or two. He then returned to Paris, and from 1277 to 1279 he was magister regens of the Franciscan studium.

In 1279 Matthew succeeded JOHN PECKHAM as lector of the Sacred Palace, holding this illustrious professorship until 1287 when, at the Chapter of Montpellier, he was elected minister general of the order. In this post Matthew distinguished himself as a peacemaker, settling disputes within the order and reinstating John of Parma and PETER JOHN OLIVI.

On May 16, 1288, Nicholas IV named him cardinal priest, but Matthew was obliged to continue ruling the order until the general chapter, held at Rieti in 1289. In 1291 he was promoted to cardinal bishop of Porto and of San Ruffino. He spent the remainder of his life in the service of the Holy See. He served Boniface VIII (1294–1303) with great fidelity and devotion and thus found himself embroiled in the political struggles of that pontificate. He was appointed pontifical legate to Lombardy, Romagna, and Tuscany, and was assigned to pacify the various contending factions. It is probable that he had a part in the preparation of the famous bull Unam Sanctam, which was published only 20 days after his death.

Although Matthew did not attend St. Bonaventure's lectures in Paris, he was a faithful disciple of the Seraphic Doctor. He was well versed in the works of Aristotle and Thomas Aquinas, but he remained faithful in all respects to the tradition of the Augustinian-Franciscan school. He criticized his adversaries with moderation and set forth his own views with admirable clarity. Yet Matthew had little influence on subsequent thinkers; his great commentary on the Sententiae, for example, was never copied—possibly because of the poor hand in which it was written.

Matthew's literary legacy is truly considerable. It has been described in detail by V. Doucet in Matthaei ab Aquasparta Quaestiones disputatae de gratia, cum introductione critica (Bibliotheca Franciscana scholastica medii aevi [Quaracchi-Florence 1903–] 11). His principal works are a voluminous commentary on the first, second, and part of the fourth books of the Sententiae, which is, with the exception of a few questions, still unpublished; many Quaestiones disputatae, almost all of which have been published at Quaracchi (ibid. 1, 2, 11, 17, 18); quodlibetal questions; two series of Quaestiones de anima; and various scriptural commentaries and sermons (Bibliotheca Franciscana Ascetica Medii Aevi 9–10).

Bibliography: Matteo d'Aquasparta (collected essays) (Spoleto, Italy 1993). J. DOWD, "Matthew of Aquasparta's De Productione Rerum and its Relation to St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Bonaventure," Franciscan Studies 34 (1974), 34–75. Z. HAYES, The General Doctrine of Creation in the Thirteenth Century, with Special Emphasis on Matthew of Aquasparta (Munich 1964). P. MAZZARELLA, La dottrina dell'anima e della conoscenza in Matteo d'Acquasparta (Padua 1969). E. BROCCHIERI, La legge naturale nel pensiero di Matteo d'Acquasparta (Rovigo 1967), bibliography.

[G. GÁL]

MATTHEW OF CRACOW

Theologian and bishop of Worms; b. Cracow, Poland, c. 1330; d. Worms, Germany, March 5, 1410. He should not be confused with another Matthew, also from Cracow, who was active at the end of the 15th century as a university theologian and preacher. The earlier Matthew was the son of a city notary and was first educated at St. Mary's collegiate school, Cracow. He pursued further studies at Charles University of Prague, where he received a bachelor of arts in 1355, a bachelor of theology in 1381, and a doctor of theology in 1387. For a short time, he was professor of theology at Prague and a city preacher. In 1390 he became a canon in Leslau at the church of St. Idzi. In 1391 Matthew returned to his native city and in 1395 left again to become a professor of theology at the University of Heidelberg. He became rector of the University the following year, and confessor and councilor to Rupert, King of the Romans (d. 1410). In 1397, at the request of Włladysłlaw JAGIEŁŁLO, he returned to Poland to reorganize the University of Cracow. In 1405 the emperor nominated him to the See of Worms; in 1408 Pope GREGORY XII created him cardinal, and in the same year he was appointed papal legate for Germany.

Matthew of Cracow left several important theological writings, some published, others still in MS; many of them are preserved in the Cracow University library, but copies are scattered in various European libraries. His most important work, De squaloribus curiae romanae, known also as Moyses sanctus, was submitted to Pope IN-NOCENT VII in 1404 and published in 1551. In it he advocated supremacy of the council over the pope (see CONCILIARISM, HISTORY OF). A treatise, Ars moriendi, xylographed in 1450, is ascribed to Matthew of Cracow, but its authorship is uncertain. Another work, the homiletic Rationale operum divinorum, exists in MS in the University of Cracow library. The other theological treatise, Dialogus rationis et conscientiae, was printed supposedly by Guttenberg in 1459 and has been translated into Czech and German.

Bibliography: G. KORBUT, Polish Literature, 4 v. (2d ed. Warsaw 1929–31) 1:22–24, in Polish. K. MORAWSKI, A History of the Jagiellonian University, 2 v. (Cracow 1900) 1:60–63, in Polish. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.1:389–392. B. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7:174–175.

[B. B. SZCZESNIAK]

MATTHEW PARIS

Monk, artist, and most important of the English chroniclers of the 13th century; b. c. 1199; d. 1259. He received the Benedictine habit in 1217, and was trained as a scribe and illuminator in his abbey of ST. ALBAN's. His first works were illustrated lives of saints (ALBAN, Edward, and later, Thomas and Edmund of Canterbury). He started to write history, in about 1236, by helping Roger of Wendover whom he later replaced. In 1246, he was sent to reform the Norwegian abbey of St. Benet Holm, when the abbot disappeared with the community seal. Matthew arranged for loans from Cahorsin moneylenders and introduced the customs of St. Alban's there, but returned soon afterwards a disappointed man. Thenceforth, he worked tirelessly at writing and rewriting his extensive histories: Chronica majora, Historia Anglorum, Flores historiarum, and Abbreviatio chronicorum. These survive in part or in whole in Matthew's own hand and are enlivened with marginal drawings of coats of arms or of the events he describes. His exceptionally full and well-informed narrative, based often on conversations with royalty and magnates who stayed at the abbey, is at times prejudiced and partial. His illustrated life of St. Alban represents the highest development of the saint's legend, and his drawings of an elephant, and of himself prostrate before the Madonna and Child, are justly famous. One of his lesser literary works, the chronicle of his own abbey, describing several of its monks, and the works of art in the church, is both revealing and successful. He lacked the discipline and patience necessary for a true scholar and historian, but he excelled at retelling contemporary gossip and events.

Bibliography: Works. Chronica majora, ed. H. R. LUARD, 7 v. (Rolls Series 57); Historia Anglorum, ed. F. MADDEN, 3 v. (Rolls Series 44). T. WALSINGHAM, Gesta abbatum monasterii Sancti Albani, ed. H. T. RILEY, 3 v. (Rolls Series 28) v.1. Literature. Illustrations to the Life of St. Alban in Trinity College Dublin ms. E. i. 40, reproduced by W. R. L. LOWE and E. F. JACOB (Oxford 1924). V. H. GALBRAITH, Roger Wendover and Matthew Paris (Glasgow 1944). R. VAUGHAN, Matthew Paris (Cambridge, Eng. 1958).

[H. FARMER]

MATTHEWS, MARY BERNARDINA, MOTHER

First prioress of the Carmelites in America; b. Charles County, Md., 1732; d. Port Tobacco, Md., June 12, 1800. Ann Matthews was born into an aristocratic, religious family; she applied for admission to the English-speaking Discalced Carmelites in Hoogstraeten, Belgium, in 1754. The next year, at the age of 23, she was professed and received the name Sister Bernardina Teresa Xavier of St. Joseph. She was esteemed for her sanctity and her gift of directing souls, and became mistress of novices and later, mother prioress, a position she held for 28 years. In 1782 the suppression of all religious orders in the Netherlands by Joseph II made a new foundation imperative. Mother Bernardina's brother, Rev. Ignatius Matthews, SJ, suggested that a branch of the Carmelite Order be established in Maryland to foster vocations in the U.S. Under the spiritual guidance of Rev. Charles Neale and with financial aid from M. de Villegas, the foundation was made, and Mother Bernardina was chosen as first prioress. In 1790 with two nieces, Sister Eleanora and Sister Aloysia, and Sister Clare Joseph Dickinson of the convent at Antwerp, Mother Bernardina arrived at Port Tobacco, Md., where she established her monastery. This marked not only the site of the first Carmelite monastery, but also the introduction of the first religious order to the U.S. The earlier foundations of the Ursulines in Louisiana were then outside U.S. territory.

Bibliography: C. W. CURRIER, Carmel in America: A Centennial History of the Discalced Carmelites in the United States (Baltimore 1890). Discalced Carmelites, Boston, Carmel: Its History, Spirit, and Saints (New York 1927).

[M. V. GEIGER]

MATTHEWS, WILLIAM

The first native American ordained in the U.S.; b. Port Tobacco, Md., Dec.16, 1770; d. Washington, D.C., April 30, 1854. He was descended from one of Maryland's earliest colonial families and was related on his mother's side to Abp. Leonard NEALE of Baltimore. As a youth he was sent to Liège, Belgium, to begin classical studies. Matthews taught briefly at Georgetown College, Washington, D.C.; in 1797 he entered St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, and was ordained (March 1800) by Bp. John Carroll. After missionary work in southern Maryland, he was named (1804) pastor of St. Patrick's Church, Washington.

During his long career Matthews ably combined the roles of priest, public-minded citizen, educator, and philanthropist. Although not a Jesuit, he was named vice president (1808) and president (1809) of Georgetown College. He was cofounder of Washington's first permanent public library (1811) and became its president (1821), a position he held for 13 years. During Matthews's presidency the library moved into permanent quarters and substantially increased its holdings. From 1813 to 1844 he served also as a trustee of Washington's public-school system. In 1821 the Washington Catholic Seminary (Gonzaga College) was established by the Jesuits on land adjacent to St. Patrick's and donated by Matthews. But the seminary project failed, and the school was reorganized for the instruction of young men who came from prominent families. Ever interested in the plight of the orphan, Matthews established St. Vincent's Female Orphan Asylum "to produce intellectually and emotionally mature young women who could occupy a place of dignity in the community" (Durkin,109). He was a prime mover also in the foundation of Visitation Girls' School, to which he gave $10,000, and he bequeathed $3,000 to the establishment of St. Joseph's Orphan Home for Boys.

Because of his background, Matthews was acquainted with Washington's elite and knew personally A. Jackson, D. Webster, H. Clay, and R. B. Taney. In 1828 he was named administrator of the Diocese of Philadelphia, Pa., and it was thought that he would succeed Henry Conwell as bishop of the see. However, Matthews was reluctant to leave Washington, so he pleaded with Rome and was relieved of the Philadelphia assignment.

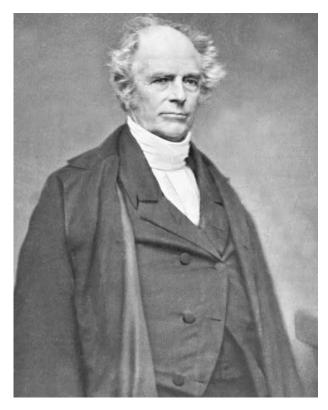

Bibliography: J. T. DURKIN, William Matthews: Priest and Citizen (New York 1963).

[J. Q. FELLER]

MATTHIAS, APOSTLE, ST.

The name $M\alpha\theta\theta$ í $\alpha\zeta$ is an abbreviation of the Hebrew name for "gift of YHWH." The only mention of Matthias in the New Testament occurs in Acts 1:23–26 where he and Barsabbas are selected as candidates for replacing Judas Iscariot among the Twelve. Later traditions about him, including the idea that he was among the group of 70 disciples sent out by Jesus in Lk 10:1, are all legendary.

Modern commentators on Acts have debated the significance of Acts 1:23–26 and whether or not the passage outlines what Luke considers the basic requirements of the apostolic office (i.e., someone who had been part of the group who followed Jesus from the time of his baptism to his Ascension). This opinion, however, fails to account for the fact that Luke, while largely restricting his use of the term "apostle" to the Twelve, does call Paul an apostle even though he scarcely fits the "criteria" outlined here (Lk 14:4, 14). Luke is attempting to demonstrate that the church carries on Jesus' mission to the people of Israel, symbolically represented by the number Twelve, as well as the mission to witness to his life, death, and resurrection "to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:8; cf. 1:22). Acts 1:26 states that the Eleven "gave lots" (ἔδωκαν κλήρους) to the candidates, and "the lot fell on Matthias''' (ἐπεσεν ό κλῆρος ἐπὶ Μαθθίαν). The manner in which the successor to Judas is selected in Acts 1:26 seems odd at first glance, but the use of lots to ascertain the divine will is common in the Old Testament (e.g., Lev 16:7–10, Josh 18:6, Prv 16:33). Some commentators are of the opinion that the Greek text of Acts 1:26 implies that the Eleven voted on the two candidates. This opinion has been rightly challenged by those who claim that the phrase "they gave lots" is a Semitic idiom, and does not convey the idea that the Eleven assigned a "lot" to Matthias. Moreover, the Old Testament use of lots seems to fit in well with this passage, especially in light of the plea for divine guidance in 1:24–25. In the end it is plain that Luke is emphasizing the divine origin of Matthias's selection.

William Matthews, photograph by Matt Brady.

Legends about Matthias's missionary career emerged in latter centuries through the influence of The Traditions of Matthias and The Acts of Andrew and Matthias. No copy of the former work exists, though we have descriptions of the work and some fragments from the early Christian writers. Clement of Alexandria states that the Gnostics were fond of this work (Strom. 7, 13, 82; 7, 17, 108), and the Decretum Gelasianum lists it as a heretical work. The Acts of Andrew and Matthias is preserved in several manuscripts, and tells the story of the adventures of Matthias among "the cannibals."

In iconography Matthias is portrayed either with a halberd or an ax, the instrument of his martyrdom.

Feast: Feb. 24.

Bibliography: W. A. BEARDSLEE, "The Casting of Lots at Qumran and in the Book of Acts," Novum Testamentum, 4 (1960)

St. Matthias the Apostle, terracotta plaque by Andrea and Luca dell Robbia in the Pazzi Chapel, Church of Santa Croce, Florence.

245–252. J. A. FITZMYER, The Acts of the Apostles, in Anchor Bible, v. 31 (New York 1998). T. MARTIN, "Matthias," Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) IV, 644).

[C. MCMAHON]

MATTIAS, MARIA DE, BL.

Foundress of the Sisters Adorers of the Most Precious Blood; b. Vallecorsa (Frosinone), Italy, Feb. 4, 1805; d. Rome, Aug. 20, 1866. Maria's parents, Giovanni and Ottavia (de Angelis) de Mattias, were poor but afforded the girl a good education. During a mission preached in Vallecorsa by St. Gaspare del BUFALO (1822), she was inspired to dedicate her life to prayer and good works. Under the guidance of Giovanni MERLINI, her spiritual director, Mattias organized a group of religious women with special devotion to the PRECIOUS BLOOD, dedicated to the education of youth. The congregation dates its origin from the opening of a school at Acuto on the invitation of the bishop of Anagni (March 4, 1834). Despite habitual poor health and misunderstanding within the community concerning the foundress's intention, Mattias established 63 houses. In part this success was due to the generosity of a Russian widow, Princess Zena Wolkonska. Mattias was beatified Oct. 1, 1950.

Feast: Oct. 1 (See PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS).

Bibliography: M. E. PIETROMARCHI, La beata Maria de Mattias: Fondatrice dell'istituto delle Suore Adoratice del Preziosissimo Sangue (Rome 1950). A. MYERSCOUGH, Redemptive Encounter: The Precious Blood in the Spirituality of Maria de Mattias (Washington 1963). M. A. MASTERSON, Smiling Maria: Blessed Maria de Mattias (Ruma, Ill. 1966). N. BUFALINI, Valore sociale ed assistenziale dell'opera di Maria de Mattias (L'Aquila 1971). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56); v. 13, suppl. and table générale (1959) 13:174–176. Acta Sanctae Sedis 42 (1950) 719–723.

[A. J. POLLACK]

MATULAITIS-MATULEWICZ, JURGIS, BL.

In Polish his name is Jerzy Matulewicz; superior general of the MARIAN FATHERS; b. April 13, 1871, Lugine, Lithuania; d. Jan. 24, 1927, Kaunas, Lithuania.

Matulaitis completed his philosophical and theological studies at Kielce and Warsaw seminaries and at the Catholic Academy in St. Petersburg, Russia, where he was ordained Nov. 25, 1898. He continued his studies at the University of Fribourg (Switzerland) to earn his doctorate in sacred theology "praeclarissime" (1902) for his dissertation Doctrina russorum de iustitia originali. After two years as professor of Latin and Canon Law at the Kielce seminary, he went to Warsaw, where he pioneered the Catholic movement for social betterment among the workers. In 1907 he was nominated to the faculty of the Catholic Academy of St. Petersburg as professor of Sociology and later of Dogmatic Theology.

In 1909, while still professor and vice rector of the Academy, with the permission of Pope St. Pius X, he undertook the clandestine reform of the Order of Marians of the Immaculate Conception (Marian Fathers), which had been founded in 1673 by Stanislaus PAPCZÝNSKI. It was suppressed in 1864 by the Russian Czarist Government, and reduced in 1909 to a single member. Dispensed from the required novitiate, Matulaitis secretly entered the order and adapted it to the needs of the Church in modern times. He composed new constitutions and instructions to govern and direct the life and activity of the congregation, which he served as superior general from 1911 until his death. In 1913 he visited the U.S. and established the first Marian house at Chicago.

In 1918 he was nominated by Pope Benedict XV to the vast and troubled Diocese of Vilnius, which he governed for seven years. In 1925 he was elevated to the rank of titular archbishop and named by Pius XI as apostolic visitator to Lithuania in order to establish an ecclesiastical province and to negotiate a concordat between the Lithuanian government and the Holy See. In addition to being responsible for the renewal of the Congregation of Marian Fathers, he wrote constitutions for some seven other religious congregations. In Lithuania he founded the Congregation of Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, and in Byelorussia, the Congregation of Servants of the Sacred Heart. He died in 1927, and in 1934, his body was translated from Kaunas cathedral to the Marianist church of Marijampolér (where he had been baptized), now a national shrine. He was beatified by John Paul II June 28, 1987, the 600th anniversary of the "baptism" of Lithuania (Apostolic Letter, June 5, 1987).

Feast: Jan. 27 (Marianists); July 12 (Lithuania).

Bibliography: V. CUSUMANO, Innamorato della Chiesa (Milan 1962). T. GÓRSKI and Z. PROCZEK, Rozmilowany w Kosciele: błogosławiony arcybiskup Jerzy Matulewicz (Warsaw 1987). A. KUCAS, Archbishop George Matulaitis, tr. and ed. S. C. GAUCIAS (Chicago 1981). C. A. MATULAITIS, A Modern Apostle (Chicago 1955). S. MATULIS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 2d. ed., 7:183. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., 27 (1987): 6–7.

[W. FOGARTY]

MATURIN, BASIL WILLIAM

Spiritual writer; b. Grangegorman, Dublin, Ireland, February 1847; d. at sea, May 7, 1915. His father, a Tractarian clergyman, was the vicar of Grangegorman. Basil studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and was ordained deacon in the Anglican Church in 1870. On becoming curate in Peterstowe, Herefordshire, England, he was ordained priest there. On Feb. 22, 1873, he entered the novitiate of the Society of St. John the Evangelist (COWLEY FA-THERS) at Oxford. In 1876 he began a mission in Philadelphia, Pa., where he stayed for ten years at the Episcopal church of St. Clement, first as one of the assistant clergy, then as rector. In the U.S. and later in England he was much esteemed as a preacher, retreat master, and spiritual director. After long heart-searching, Maturin joined the Catholic Church on March 5, 1897. He studied for the priesthood at the Canadian College in Rome, was ordained in 1898, and then returned to London to do parish work and preaching. In 1905 he joined the newly formed Society of Westminister Diocesan Missionaries and took charge of the parish at Pimlico. In 1910 he tried his vocation as a Benedictine at DOWNSIDE, but proved too old. When he returned to London he was not attached to a parish, but had a confessional at St. James's Church, Spanish Place, and great numbers of penitents. In 1914 he became chaplain to the Catholic undergraduates at Oxford, but he did not serve long in this capacity, for in the following spring he was one of those who lost their lives in the sinking of the "Lusitania." Maturin published several books of spirituality and sermons: Self Knowledge and Self Discipline (1905); Laws of the Spiritual Life (1907); Practical Studies on the Parables of Our Lord (1908); Some Principles and Practices of the Spiritual Life (reissued 1915); Fruits of the Life of Prayer (1916); and Sermons and Sermon Notes, edited by F. Wilfrid Ward (1916).

Bibliography: B. W. MATURIN, The Price of Unity (New York 1912). M. WARD, Father Maturin (New York 1920).

[E. FALLAUX]

MAUBUISSON, ABBEY OF

A former French abbey of CISTERCIAN NUNS, located in the Diocese of Versailles. Maubuisson Abbey was founded and richly endowed by Queen Blanche of Castile in 1236 and illustrates the finest style of French Gothic. The queen was buried there. The nuns came from the nobility, and its abbesses from the highest French aristocracy. Being near Paris, the abbey enjoyed royal patronage; King PHILIP IV (1285–1314) often used it as his residence. The convent was badly damaged during the Hundred Years' War. After 1543 the appointment of the abbesses by the kings of France for personal or dynastic reasons resulted in the rapid decline of morals, especially when King HENRY IV installed as abbess Angélique d'Estrées (1597-1618), the sister of his mistress. Subsequent reform under the influence of Angélique Arnauld (d. 1661), abbess of PORT-ROYAL, brought only temporary improvement. Maubuisson was suppressed in 1791 and looted. When it was sold to private owners, both the church and cloister were demolished. Only ruins survive.

Bibliography: U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Topobibliographie, 2 v. (Paris 1894–1903) 2:1875–76. O. VERGE DU TAILLIS, Chroniques de l'Abbaye Royale de Maubuisson (Paris 1947). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:1790–91.

[L. J. LEKAI]

MAUNOIR, JULIEN, BL.

Breton missionary and author; b. Saint-Georges de Reintembault, Rennes, France, Oct. 1, 1606; d. Plèvin, Jan. 28, 1683. He entered the Society of Jesus at Paris in 1625 and taught at the college of Quimper, where he dedicated himself to the Bretons. Having been born in the French-speaking part of Brittany, he had no knowledge of Breton language; but within two months after a pilgrimage to the shrine of Ty-Mamm-Doue (the House of the Mother of God) he was preaching fluently in this Celtic tongue. In 1640, after ordination, he began his apostolate and for the next 42 years conducted more than 400 missions in all parts of the duchy, preaching mostly in Breton. He was called universally "An Tad Mad" (The Good Father). Maunoir was the organizer of the Breton missions. He based his program on the Spiritual Exercises of St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, but added catechetical instructions, symbolical charts, didactic hymns, and dramatic presentations of the Savior's life. He was a pioneer of the closed retreat, and was responsible for building at Quimper one of the earliest retreat houses.

At Maunoir's missions, which lasted from four to five weeks, attendance of 10,000 was common. At the great missions the numbers reached 20,000 and 30,000, and the sermons and catecheses had to be given in the open fields. To serve these Pentecostal assemblies he organized assistants from the diocesan clergy; these assistants eventually numbered 1,000 and included five bishops. For a mission he would invite 20 or 30 priests who would preach, hear confessions, catechize, teach hymns, or prepare the grand procession. During the mission they lived in common under his direction. They recited the Office and meditated together and participated twice daily in conferences on mission methods, problems of moral theology, and projects of their own personal holiness. Such itinerant seminaries elevated the standards of the Breton clergy, many of whom lacked formal training. Maunoir published seven works, including ascetical books, collections of hymns, and a Breton-French dictionary and grammar. His hymns became part of the literature of the Breton people. He was beatified by PIUS XII, May 20, 1951.

Feast: July 2 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: A. BOSCHET, Le Parfait missionaire (Paris 1697). X. A. SÉJOURNÉ, Histoire du vénérable serviteur de Dieu Julien Maunoir, 2 v. (Paris 1885). L. KERBIRIOU, Les Missions bretonnes (Brest 1934). H. BRÉMOND, Histoire litteraire du sentiment religieux en France, 11 v. (Paris 1916–33) 5:82–117. Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1951) 225–226, 428–432, 437–440. M. P. HARNEY, Good Father in Brittany, the Life of Bl. Julien Maunoir (Boston 1964). J. N. TYLENDA, Jesuits Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 18–20.

[M. P. HARNEY]

MAURIAC, FRANÇOIS

Novelist, Nobel Prize winner; b. Bordeaux, Oct. 11, 1885; d. Sept. 1, 1970. Mauriac wrote two dozen works of fiction, and also achieved distinction as a political essayist, critic, biographer and writer of spiritual works. Mauriac was the youngest of five children in what can be termed a landed, prosperous, middle-class family. His father died when he was 18 months old and he was raised by his pious mother, who appears as Mme. Dezaymeries in the novel Evil. As a child, Mauriac was frail and shy, admittedly guilt ridden, unhappy, and introverted. Upon leaving secondary school in the region of his birth, Mauriac went to Paris (1906) to study paleography and medieval archeology. He left school to be a writer, however.

François Mauriac.

In November 1909 Mauriac privately published his first work, a collection of poems (Les Mains jointes), that gained favorable notice from influential critics. A second book of poetry followed two years later and then, in 1913, L'enfant chargé de chaines (Young Man in Chains), Mauriac's first novel, appeared. That same year he married. In 1914 he published La robe prétexte (The Stuff of Youth) but did little other writing until well after World War I, in which he served in a medical unit.

Prolific Years. Beginning in 1920, Mauriac published almost a novel a year for two decades (in all, he authored nearly 100 volumes). Among those which served to establish his reputation as a novelist were La chair et le sang (Flesh and Blood); in 1922 Le baiser au lepreux, a story of a destructive yearning for love; in 1923, Genetrix, about the evil effects of possessive maternal love; in 1925, Le desert de l'amour (The Desert of Love), wherein a father and son vie for the attentions of the same, unvirtuous, woman; in 1927, Therese Desqueyroux (Therese), about a sinful woman who shares mankind's common guilt.

What may be Mauriac's masterpiece, Le noeud de vipers (Vipers Tangle), came out in 1932. It is a story of impure human love wherein sinful creatures struggle to find grace. The next year he was elected to the French Academy at the relatively early age of 48. La fin de la nuit (1935) brings Therese Desqueyroux to the brink of salvation, and another major novel, La pharisienne (A Woman of the Pharisees), was published in 1941 concerning a hypocritically religious woman and the evil effects she has on others.

In the 1930s Mauriac wrote some minor dramas and polemical works condemning totalitarianism in all forms. When France fell in World War II he wrote vigorously on behalf of the resistance movement, which he joined. He was a strong supporter of General Charles de Gaulle and wrote a biography of this friend (1964) beginning with "The history of a man is the history of an age." Men I Hold Great (1951) includes biographical chapters on Pascal, Flaubert, Balzac, Graham Greene, and others.

Spiritual Writings and Major Themes. Mauriac's spiritual writings include God and Mammon, The Eucharist, The Mystery of Holy Thursday (the theme of which is Christ lives in individuals as a sacramental reality), and St. Margaret of Cortona, whose martyrdom distracted him from the World War II martyrdom of his nation. What I Believe (with a chapter on "Purity," that illuminates much of his fiction), Life of Jesus, and The Son of Man, in which the author clearly proclaims a Christian hope, are other primarily religious volumes.

In November 1952 Mauriac earned the Nobel Prize for fiction. His major themes may be summarized as including the isolation of individuals, the abuse of maternal authority, the influence of childhood on adulthood (the individual past on the individual present), and the penetration of the human heart by God alone as well as the eternal conflict between good and evil within the soul.

Mauriac never recovered from a serious fall in April 1969 which led to his death. His last novel, Un adolescent d'autrefois, was published posthumously in the U.S. as Maltaverne. It is regarded as an autobiographical work and contains many of his important themes, proving that to the end Mauriac continued to be a brilliant psychologist of the anguished person who is led astray by temptations of the world and passions of the flesh.

Bibliography: A. M. CASPARY, François Mauriac (St. Louis 1968). N. CORMEAU, L'art de François Mauriac (Paris 1951). M. F. MALONEY, François Mauriac: A Critical Study (Denver 1958). E. PELL, François Mauriac in Search of the Infinite (New York 1947).

[H. J. CARGAS]

MAURICE, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reigned: Aug. 13, 582 to Nov. 22/23, 602; b. Arabissus, Cappadocia, 539; d. 602. His origins are obscure (Armenian by legend); he came to Constantinople as a notary and made a career as a military commander during the reign of Tiberius I, who appointed him Caesar and heir to the throne on Aug. 5, 582. After Tiberius' death, Maurice married Tiberius' daughter, Constantina.

At the time of his accession the empire was in trouble financially, and in order to deal with threats posed by foreign powers, Maurice took a number of unpopular measures to save money, for example, cutting the pay of the army in the East and Balkans. However, as he still pursued a lavish building policy and favored his own family with generous patronage, he became increasingly unpopular.

Concerned about imperial control of the provinces, he created the exarchates of Ravenna and Carthage (Africa). The exarchs were mainly military leaders and as they also had authority over most civil officials, their powers were almost unlimited. As Maurice struggled to control the Lombards who were encroaching on Italy, he needed a reorganisation of defense. His aggressive attitude to the Lombards brought him into conflict with Pope Gregory I, who preferred a policy of negotiation.

There was further disagreement between pope and emperor over theological matters, especially the use by the patriarch of Constantinople of the title "oecumenical." In the East, Maurice continued Tiberius' tolerance of the Monophysites until 598, when his kinsman, Bishop Dometianus, unleashed a persecution in north Syria. The emperor dissolved the anti-Chalcedonian Ghassanid Arab client kingdom, while orthodox Christianity made great progress among the Arabs, particularly the Lakhmids, hitherto Persian allies. Roman Armenia was induced to elect a catholicos of its own and break with Persarmenia, from which Georgia also separated to join Constantinople. Maurice himself was very religious; he associated himself with popular cults, especially that of the Virgin, and he fixed the feast of the Dormition (Assumption) on August 15.

Maurice came to the throne during a war with Persia, but in 589 Persian King Hormizd IV was killed in an internal rebellion, and his heir, Chosroes II, sought protection and aid from Maurice, who restored him to his throne. In 591 a treaty was signed which gave Byzantium a larger share of Armenia, a valuable source of manpower, and cancelled Byzantium's contribution for the joint defense of the Caucasian pass. The Persian treaty allowed Maurice to deal with the Slavs and Avars who threatened the Danube frontier. After initial victories, however, there was dissatisfaction among the troops and when they were ordered to winter across the Danube, they proclaimed Phocas (a centurion) emperor and marched to the capital which the Blues handed over. Maurice and his sons were executed.

Bibliography: JOHN OF EPHESUS, Ecclesiastical History, Part III, ed. and tr. E.W. BROOKS (Louvain 1952); also tr. R. PAYNE SMITH as The Third Part of the Ecclesiastical History of John of Ephesus (Oxford 1860). Evagrius Books V and VI; The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius Scholasticus, tr. M. WHITBY (Liverpool 2000), esp. 281ff. R. C. BLOCKLEY, The History of Menander the Guardsman (Liverpool 1985). M. WHITBY and L. M. WHITBY, The History of Theophylact Simocatta (Oxford 1986). C. FARKA, "Räuberhorden in Thrakien. Eine unbeachtete Quelle zur Geschichte der Zeit des kaisers Maurikios," Byzantinische Zeitschrift 86/87 (1993/1994) 462-469. P. GOUBERT, Byzance avant l'Islam, 2 v. (Paris 1951–1965). J. F. HALDON, Byzantium in the Seventh Century (Cambridge 1990). M. J. HIGGINS, The Persian War of the Emperor Maurice (Washington 1939). D. M. OLSTER, The Politics of Usurpation in the Seventh Century: Rhetoric and Revolution in Byzantium (Amsterdam 1993). R. PARET, "Dometianus de Mélitène et la politique religieuse de l'empereur Maurice," Revue des études byzantines 15 (1957) 42-72. I. SHAHÎD, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century (Washington 1995). L. M. WHITBY, "Theophanes" Chronicle Source for the Reigns of Justin II, Tiberius and Maurice (A.D. 565-602)," Byzantion 53 (1983) 312-345. M. WHITBY, The Emperor Maurice and His Historian (Oxford 1988). J. M. WORT-LEY, "The Legend of the Emperor Maurice," Acts of the 15th International Congress of Byzantine Studies (Athens 1976) IV.382-391.

[F. NICKS/M. J. HIGGINS]

MAURICE, FREDERICK DENISON

English theologian and Christian Socialist; b. Normanstown, near Lowestoft, April 29, 1805; d. Cambridge, April 1, 1872. Maurice's father was a Unitarian minister, but others in his family were Calvinists or Anglicans. He was baptized an Anglican (1831) and was ordained (1834). With Whitmore he was joint editor of the Metropolitan Quarterly Magazine, and edited the London Literary Chronicle before and after it was amalgamated with the Athenaeum (1830). In 1840 he was appointed professor of English literature and history at King's College, London, and in 1846 he combined this position with the chair of theology. He was dismissed from both positions in 1853, however, for his denial of the eternity of hell. From 1848 to 1854 he was associated with J. M. F. Ludlow and Charles Kingsley as a leader of the Christian Socialists, and acted as joint editor of their publication, Politics for the People. He drew up a scheme for a workingmen's college in London and became its first principal. From 1866 until his death he taught moral philosophy at Cambridge, and from 1871 he was also incumbent of St. Edward's church in Cambridge. His Christian Socialism was ahead of its time and was largely a failure, although his views later influenced Anglo-Catholics such as Charles GORE and the Lux Mundi school. The most important of his many writings are: The Kingdom of Christ (1838), What is Revelation? (1859), The Claims of the Bible and of Science (1863), and Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy (1871–72).

Bibliography: The Life of Frederick Denison Maurice, Chiefly Told in His Letters, ed. F. MAURICE, 2 v. (New York 1884). A. R. VIDLER, The Theology of F. D. Maurice (London 1948), issued in U.S. as Witness to the Light (New York 1948). F. M. G. HIGHAM, Frederick Denison Maurice (London 1947). F. L. CROSS, Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church 877–878. W. M. DAVIES, An Introduction to F. D. Maurice's Theology (London 1964).

[W. HANNAH]

MAURICE OF CARNOËT, ST.

Cistercian abbot; b. Croixanvec, Brittany, c. 1114; d. Carnoët, Oct. 9, 1191. He entered the abbey of Langonnet (1143) and became its abbot in 1147. Respected for wisdom, he was often consulted by the duke of Brittany, who in 1171 charged him with founding the abbey of Carnoët of which he became abbot in 1176. The abbey was named St. Maurice after his death. He is renowned for his many miracles and is venerated as a saint in Brittany. His cause, introduced at Rome in 1221, was suspended because of technicalities and never resumed. His cultus was approved for the order in 1869 and for the certain dioceses in 1891 and 1893.

Feast: Oct. 5 (Dioceses of Quimper, Vannes, St. Brieuc); Oct. 13 (Cistercians).

Bibliography: Vita I et miracula (by a contemporary), ed. B. PLAINE, in Studien und Mitteilungen aus dem Benediktiner-und Zisterzienserorden 7.2 (1886) 380–393. Vita II (by William of Carnoët, c. 1320), ed. B. PLAINE, ibid. 7.3 (1886) 157–164. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:174. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10: 124–126.

[A. CONDIT]

MAURICE OF SULLY

Bishop of Paris, theologian, preacher, builder of the cathedral of Notre Dame; b. Sully, near Orléans, France, c. 1120; d. Saint-Victor, Paris, Sept. 11, 1196. Born of peasant parents, he was educated in the schools of Paris, where he was a student of ABELARD. By 1147 Maurice was canon and subdeacon of the cathedral chapter at Notre Dame. He became professor of theology at the University of PARIS and was famous as a preacher. PETER LOMBARD, Bishop of Paris, died in July 1160, and Maurice succeeded him in October. Maurice, a practical administrator, quickly decided to replace the 300-year-old, small Carolingian cathedral church with one in the new Gothic style. He developed the financial resources of his wealthy diocese and collected funds for the project for three years before the ground was broken for Notre Dame in 1163. He built also the episcopal palace. Maurice worked hard to reform the clergy of his diocese. While bishop he retained an enthusiasm for study and preaching, and between 1168 and 1175 wrote his Sermons on the Gospels that became models for young priests. They form the oldest original prose in French and are a literary masterpiece. They were later translated into Latin and English. He wrote also a treatise on the Canon of the Mass. A close friend of Kings LOUIS VII and PHILIP II AU-GUSTUS, he acted as a royal legate and a papal judge delegate. In 1196 Maurice retired to the monastery of SAINT-VICTOR where he died the same year. There is no critical edition of his works.

Bibliography: MAURICE OF SULLY, Maurice of Sully and the Medieval Vernacular Homily, ed. C. A. ROBSON (Oxford 1952). V. MORTEX, "Maurice de Sully: Étude sur l'administration épiscopale pendant la seconde moitié du XIIe siècle," Mem. Soc. Hist. de Paris 16 (1889) 105–318. J. B. SCHNEYER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7:189.

[J. A. CORBETT]

MAURIN, ARISTIDE PETER

Cofounder of The Catholic Worker; b. Languedoc, southern France, May 9, 1877; d. New York City, May 15, 1949. Peter, the son of Jean Baptiste and Marie (Pages) Maurin, spent his early childhood working on the family farm. At the age of 14, he went to St. Privat's, a boarding school near Paris run by the Christian Brothers. On Oct. 1, 1893, he was received as a novice, and he took his first vows on Sept. 18, 1895. After interrupting his religious life when he was called to serve in the 142d Infantry regiment of Mende in 1898-99, Maurin left the Christian Brothers on Jan. 1, 1903. At the age of 32 he immigrated to western Canada to take up homesteading. When his partner was killed in a hunting accident, Maurin left the farm and took up unskilled jobs as a wandering worker. In 1925 he went to New York City. While studying history and giving French lessons at an art colony near Woodstock, N.Y., he began to write in a style named after his only book, the much reprinted Easy Essays (1936). His essays were characterized by phrased writing, succinct and easy to remember. In December 1932, he met Dorothy Day and urged her to start a paper devoted to carrying out his message. The first issue (2,500 copies) of The Catholic Worker was printed in May 1933. Maurin wrote every month for the paper, spoke at meetings around New York, and instructed members of the staff. Much of his life was devoted to traveling around the country lecturing to audiences in parks and universities. He was dedicated to making Catholics aware of their spiritual destiny, and he wanted people to do things for themselves, to take care of the poor and the needy, and to work on the land as an antidote for unemployment. He taught also the need for houses of hospitality and farming communes.

Bibliography: A. SHEEHAN, Peter Maurin: Gay Believer (Garden City, N.Y. 1959). R. COLE, "On Moral Leadership: Dorothy Day and Peter Maurin in Tandem." America 178, no. 20 (1998) 5. P. G. COY, ed., A Revolution of the Heart: Essays on the 'Catholic Worker'" (Philadelphia 1988). D. DAY, Loaves and Fishes (London 1963). M. T. ARONICA, Beyond Charismatic Leadership: The New York Catholic Worker Movement (New Brunswick, N.J., 1987). M. PIEHL, Breaking Bread: The 'Catholic Worker' and the Origin of Catholic Radicalism in America (Philadelphia 1982).

[D. DAY]

MAURISTS

French Benedictine Congregation of St. Maur that flourished from 1621 to the time of the French Revolution (1792), and devoted itself to strict observance of the Benedictine Rule, education, preaching, and especially to ecclesiastical and historical scholarship. The Maurists, founded in 1621 as part of the reform movement initiated at the Benedictine Abbey of Saint-Vanne in Lorraine in 1589, established their superior general at SAINT-GERMAIN-DES-PRÉS in Paris. Their name goes back to the Benedictine Abbey founded as SAINT-MAUR-DES-FOSSÉS in 638.

Maurist Congregation. Most French Benedictine monasteries joined the Maurist Congregation—there were 178 by 1675. A superior general with two assistants presided over the congregation. Each of the six provinces had a visitor, and every cloister had a prior. A general chapter of 33 members, meeting every three years, held legislative and executive power and appointed men to all offices. The superior general could be elected for an indefinite number of three-year terms. Priors held office for six years and were assisted by a council of four seniores. Every province had a novitiate and a house of study. Monks could transfer from one monastery to another but only within the same province. There was a general procurator for the congregation in Rome from 1623 to 1733.

Piety and Scholarship. Under the guidance of Dom Gregory Tarisse (1630–48) a project was inaugurated for publishing the history and glories of the Benedictine Order; it was intended primarily to edify the monks themselves through the renewal of a discipline combining piety with scholarship. Tarisse's plan gave the first evidence that the Maurist school followed a uniform method. The Maurist ideal, pursued (1630–1725) by Abbots Tarisse, Audebert, Marsolles, and Ste-Marthe, fashioned many outstanding scholars: J. MABILLON, E. Martène, B. de MONTFAUCON, T. Blampin, J. Martianay, L. d' Achéry, R. Tassin, and C. Toustain—while others remained anonymous.

The Maurists produced such monumental publications as the Gallia Christiana (10 v., Paris 1715–65), Acta SS. Ordinis S. Benedicti (9 v., Paris 1668–1701; Venice 1733–40) Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti (6 v., Paris 1703–39; Lucca 1739–45), and the Spicilegium veterum scriptorum et monumentorum ecclesiasticorum (9 v., Paris 1724–33). The Maurist Histoire littéraire de la France (12 v., Paris 1733–68) is being continued by the École des Chartes. Many of their other publications were continued by learned societies during the 19th century. They likewise edited the works of Fathers of the Church, such as Basil, John Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Augustine (11 v.), most of which were incorporated into MIGNE's Latin and Greek patrologies. Much of their work remains in MS in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris.

In all, some 220 Benedictines working in close collaboration, though scattered in six monasteries, produced 710 scholarly works on asceticism (L. BÉNARD, C. Martin), the history of the Benedictine Order (D'Achéry, Mabillon, T. RUINART, Martène), patrology (J. Garnier, Mabillon, Montfaucon, Touttée), secular history (Bouquet, Vuisette), and the auxiliary sciences of diplomatics (Mabillon), chronology (Carpentier), numismatics, and paleography (Montfaucon).

Scholarly Precision. The essentially edifying and apologetic intent of their research did not interfere with their devotion to truth and scholarly precision. In the edition of ancient documents, particularly the theological writings of the Fathers, and in the deciphering of ancient monuments, they achieved success by a careful search for all available MSS, the scrupulous collation of variant readings, and an objective citation of traditions and testimonies. For each of their editions they provided informative introductions, notes, and indexes.

Despite their conviction that the publication of unadorned historical truth would help do away with the religious controversies of their age, they frequently had to enter disputes concerning the authenticity of their work. The famous Maurist edition of the works of St. Augustine, attacked by the Jesuits, had to be vindicated by papal intervention (letter of Clement XI, April 19, 1706, to Abbot Boistard).

The Maurist school of scholarship proved a turning point in the inauguration of modern philological and historical methods by attempting to achieve a complete accounting of all the materials available; a thorough study of documents using the auxiliary sciences of paleography, diplomatics, chronology, and archeology; and a meticulous citation of sources. Though in general they failed to attain a broad view of the historical process, their research and methods made possible the consideration of history on a world scale.

Aftermath. While some of the Maurists were afflicted with the rigorist ideas of the Jansenists, as a group they combated the propositions condemned by INNOCENT XI in 1679, and despite the inroads of GALLICANISM and a certain worldliness after 1750, they preserved a vigorous observance of the Benedictine Rule down to the French Revolution. On Sept. 2, 1792, the last superior general, Dom Antoine Chevreux, beatified in 1926, marched to the guillotine followed by 40 monks. The Congregation of St. Maur was formally dissolved by Pius VII in 1818.

Bibliography: E. MARTÈNE and F. FORTET, Histoire de la congrégation de Saint-Maur, ed. G. CHARVIN (Annales de la France Monastique 31–35, 42, 43, 46, 47; Ligugé 1928–1943). R. P. TASSIN, Histoire littéraire de la congrégation de Saint-Maur (Brussels 1770), with suppls. by U. ROBERT (Paris 1881) and H. WILHELM and U. BERLIÈRE (Paris 1908). J. DE GHELLINCK, Patristique et Moyen Âge, v.1–3 (Gembloux 1946) v.3. J. BAUDOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.1:405–443. G. HEER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:190–192. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CARROLL, H. LECLERQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53). 10.1:427–724; Mabillon, 2 v. (Paris 1953–57).

[F. X. MURPHY]

MAURITANIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in northwest Africa, the Islamic Republic of Mauritania is bordered on the northwest by Western Sahara, on the east and southeast by Mali, on the southwest by Senegal and on the west by the North Atlantic Ocean. While much of the region's north is desert, in the south alluvial soil lines the border with Senegal. Plateaus in the north and central areas rise to mountains of 1,500 feet. Natural resources consist of iron ore and copper, while agricultural products from the south include millet, rice, and the raising of livestock. Several eastern oases allow for the cultivation of date palms.

A former territory of French West Africa, the region declared independence as the Islamic Republic of Mauritania in 1960. Its inhabitants, many of them nomadic farmers who were later forced into cities to work in the mining and manufacturing industries, were almost all Muslims. The average life expectancy for a Mauritanian was 48.7 years in 2000, and fewer than 38 percent were literate in French or Arabic.

The home of nomadic Berbers since the 1st century, the region was explored by the Portuguese in the 15th century, and trading outposts from many nations soon became established along the coast, leading to territorial disputes. Most of the country became part of the Prefecture Apostolic of Saint-Louis du Sénégal in Senegal, established in 1779. The Senegal treaty of 1817 gave the French official control of the region, although little colonization occurred as a result. Beginning in 1877 care of the region's Catholics was transferred from Senegal to the vicar apostolic of Senegambia. Within 25 years the region had become occupied and was made a part of French West Africa in 1904. Mauritania became a French colony in 1921 and following World War II was reclassified as an overseas territory of France.

By the 1950s, most of the region's Catholics were Europeans, while native Mauritanians remained Muslim. In 1955 the prefecture overseeing Mauritania was entrusted to the HOLY GHOST FATHERS. Seven sisters of the Congregation of St. Joseph of the Apparition served in Atar and Port Étienne. On Dec. 18, 1965 Mauritania became the jurisdiction of the new Diocese of Nouakchott, subject to the Archdiocese of Dakar, Senegal, under the Holy Ghost Fathers.

In 1958 Mauritania became an autonomous republic in the French community, and it gained its independence two years later, on Nov. 28, 1960. In 1963, after mineral deposits discovered in the region boosted the nation's economic outlook, Morocco claimed possession of Mauritania; these claims to territory were withdrawn in 1969. Further disputes occurred in 1976, after Spain withdrew from Western Sahara and both Morocco and Mauritania disputed ownership of the southernmost third of this region. In 1979, a year after its president was replaced by a military government, Mauritania relinquished all claims in favor of Morocco. In 1989 a border war began with Senegal that lasted until early 1992, its basis the continuing ethnic tensions between the black minority farming in the south and the native Arab-Berber population.

In July of 1991 multi-party politics and elections were reestablished, and a new constitution was passed, based on the Constitutional Charter of Feb. 9, 1985. Under this constitution, Muslim law (shari'a) became the basis for law and Islam was proclaimed the state religion. Despite the existence of multiple political parties, the government continued to be controlled by the ruling Democratic and Social Republican Party. Though a minority faith, Catholics remained free to practice their Capital: Nouakchott. Size: 397,955 sq. miles. Population: 2,667,860 in 2000.

Languages: French, Arabic; tribal languages are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 5,300 Catholics (.2%), 2,654,760 Sunni Muslims

(99.5%), 7,500 Protestants (.3%).

Diocese: Nouakchott, directly subject to the Holy See.

faith, although proselytization of Muslims was discouraged. Bibles were not printed or sold in Mauritania, although there was no law against possessing them. Instruction in the Islamic faith was required of all students in public schools, although exemptions were available to parents.

By 2000 Mauritania had six parishes tended by three secular and ten religious priests. Fewer than 40 sisters tended to the five Catholic kindergarten schools and other humanitarian concerns among the nation's small Catholic population, almost all of whom were foreign workers. While increasing fundamentalist sentiment among Muslims led to charges of discrimination in the late 1990s, Church leaders remained cautious about taking an aggressive stand against the nation's majority faith. In addition to a rise in foreign debt, the lack of fresh water due to drought and the encroachment of the Sahara continued to plague this region, prompting Pope John Paul II to contribute funds through his private charity, Cor Unum, and to request amnesty for debts. In 1999, at the urging of the Vatican, Great Britain announced plans to forgive Mauritania all monies owed it in debt service.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde (Tournai 1964) 2:605–607. Annuario Pontificio has statistics on all diocese.

[J. BOUCHAUD/EDS.]

MAURITIUS, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A volcanic island in the Indian Ocean, the Republic of Mauritius is located in South Africa, 500 miles east of Madagascar. The main island is joined politically to the Agalega Islands, the Cardgados Carajos Shoals, and Rodriguez, the last located 350 miles to the east of Mauritius. Containing a central plateau falling from steep hills to flat coastal lava formations that have weathered into fertile plains, the region has agricultural crops that include tea, fruits and vegetables, and sugar cane. In addition to arable land, fish is another important resource. The region contains little or no mineral wealth.

Mauritius was discovered by the Portuguese in 1505 and was occupied by the Dutch from 1638 until 1710.

The French claimed the island in 1715, and it came under British control from 1810 until it gained independence as part of the Commonwealth of Nations in 1968. Since gaining political autonomy, the region has become increasingly industrialized, and by 2000 it had one of the highest per capita income levels in Africa.

After the region came under French control, VINCEN-TIANS evangelized the native tribes living in Mauritius from 1722 to 1819. At that point Port Louis became the center of an immense vicariate entrusted to the Benedictines that embraced Australia, South Africa, and Madagascar until 1837, and also the Seychelles Islands and Saint Helena until 1852. Bishop Collier, the third vicar apostolic, was eminent for his organizing ability. He was responsible for the arrival of Jacques Laval of the Holy Ghost Fathers, whose work among the enfranchised slaves gained him the title "Peter Claver of modern times." Port Louis became a diocese in 1847, and almost all the vicars apostolic and bishops were Benedictines until 1916, when the diocese was confided to the HOLY GHOST FATHERS. Jesuit missionaries worked principally among the native tribes and after an increase in immigration from Asia and India, Chinese secular priests labored among their own compatriots. Pope John Paul II visited Mauritius in October of 1989.

By 2000 there were 49 parishes tended by 57 diocesan and 30 religious priests. Over 25 Christian Brothers and six communities totaling over 270 sisters—one community of native origin—directed the region's Catholic schools and tended to other social service needs. Under the 1968 constitution, the Church benefited financially from government subsidies in proportion to its members and like all other religions was accorded tax-free status. While Catholic life remained active, tensions between the Hindu majority and members of both the Church and Mauritius' Muslim population existed, resulting in rioting in February of 1999. An interreligious council was formed by the government later that year, in an effort to promote understanding among ethnic/religious groups. Many Chinese, while Buddhist, also practice the Catholic faith, a result of their attendance at the island's Catholic schools.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde (Tournai 1964) 2:603–605. Annuario Pontificio has information on the diocese.

[J. BOUCHAUD/EDS.]

MAURRAS, CHARLES

Writer, leader of ACTION FRANÇAISE; b. Martigues, near Marseilles, France, April 20, 1868; d. Saint-Symphorien, near Tours, Nov. 15, 1952. His father was a tax collector who died in 1874, and his mother a pious Catholic and ardent royalist, who sent him to Aix-en-Provence to receive a Catholic secondary education. Deafness, which afflicted him from the age of 14, forced him to abandon hope for a naval career and to pursue his studies privately. He became a literary critic, a well-regarded poet, and an esthete who greatly admired an-Capital: Port Louis. Size: 788 sq. miles.

Population: 1,179,370 in 2000.

Languages: English, French Creole; Hindi, Urdu, Hadda, and

Bojpoori are spoken in various regions.

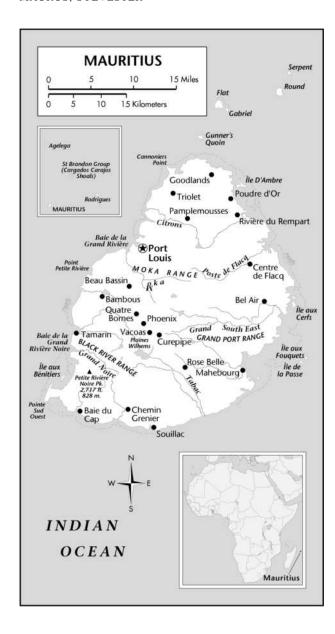

Religions: 306,650 Catholics (26%), 194,600 Muslims (16.5%), 2,125 Protestants (2.3%), 613,275 Hindu (52%), 62,720 without religious affiliation.

Diocese: Port Louis, immediately subject to the Holy See.

cient classical civilization. For the masses and also for Jews he developed profound aversions. From early youth he was an avowed atheist. His fame rests mainly on his connection with Action Française, the nationalist and monarchist movement, which he founded and directed during its life-span, together with Léon DAUDET, and which he publicized with his prolific pen. His articles totaled several thousand, and for years included almost daily contributions to the newspaper L'Action française. He also published some 50 books on politics, philosophy and poetry.

Maurras was consistent and doctrinaire as a teacher, but did not systematically expose his ideas. His thought must be grasped in snatches throughout his writings. Basic to his outlook was an advocacy of nationalism and monarchy. He derived these notions from a study of the monarchy of the ancien régime; from Joseph de MAISTRE, Viscount de BONALD, and other counterrevolutionary doctrinaires; and even more from POSITIV-ISM and EVOLUTION. COMTE and DARWIN convinced him that man is a creature determined by his historical and biological background. Maurras claimed that the observation of phenomena permits political science to establish scientific laws, just as physics and chemistry do. On this basis Maurras derived as a law of French society that its prosperity depends on a return to the political and religious forms that assured this fortunate condition in the past. Darwin's theory on natural selection seemed to Maurras a condemnation of democratic egalitarianism. He concluded that society alone counts, not the individual; and so battle must be fought against the Reformation, the French Revolution, Romanticism, and other champions of individualism. Catholicism won his admiration as the religious form that formerly brought greatness to France; but the supernatural, specifically Christian elements in the Church did not attract him. His political views were based on physical and mechanical laws of social life and were elaborated without consideration for morality or religion. What he wanted to retain were the discipline inculcated by morality and religion and the hierarchical organization with the restraints it facilitates in human affairs. Maurras enjoyed a considerable following among the French Catholic laity and clergy; but Rome disapproved of his views and placed seven of his books on the Index (Dec. 29, 1926).

The violence of Maurras' pen earned him a prison sentence (1936–37) after a letter of his menaced members of the French national assembly with assassination. During World War II he supported the regime of Marshal Pétain. In 1945 he was sentenced to life imprisonment and civil degradation for collaborating with the enemy. This condemnation caused his expulsion from the French Academy, to which he had been elected in 1938; but it did not stop his writing. Ill health motivated his removal in the last year of his life to a hospital near Tours under close surveillance. Shortly before death he returned to the faith of his childhood.

Bibliography: H. TALVART and J. PLACE, Bibliographie des auteurs modernes de langue française (Paris 1928–) v.14. R. ROU-QUETTE, "Charles Maurras et la papauté," Études 277 (1953) 392–405. E. BEAU DE LOMÉNIE, Maurras et son système (Paris 1953). M. MOURRE, Charles Maurras (Paris 1953). A. CORMIER, La Vie intérieure de Charles Maurras (Paris 1956). J. JUILLARD, "La Politique religieuse de C. M.," Esprit 26 (1958) 359–384. A. DAN-SETTE, Religious Histry of Modern France, 2 v. (New York 1961). M. CURTIS, Three Against the Third Republic: Sorel, Barrès, and Maurras (Princeton, N.J. 1959), with extensive bibliog. H. MASSIS, Maurras et notre temps (Paris 1960).

[A. DANSETTE]

MAURUS, SYLVESTER

Philosopher and theologian; b. Spoleto, Dec. 31, 1619; d. Rome, Jan. 13, 1687. Maurus came of a noble and respected family and was given a solid education in grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy at the Roman College. In 1636 he entered the Society of Jesus in Rome. Maurus became notably well versed in Greek and philosophy. After his ascetical and intellectual training, he taught philosophy at Macerata (1649), and, at the Roman College, philosophy (1652), theology (1658), and Scripture (1684). Maurus ranks among the leading teachers of scholasticism. Besides being a man of extraordinary intellectual talents and teaching ability, Maurus was very holy. Not only his pupils but the most illustrious personages of Rome went to discuss their problems with him. His great reputation and prudence merited for him the appointment as rector of the Roman College (1684–87).

Maurus's writings consist of two works in philosophy and two in theology, each of which takes up several volumes. The theological works are mostly compendiums written with great orderliness and clarity, but without any special originality. More famous are his philosophical works. His Quaestionum philosophicarum libri quinque (5 v. Rome 1658) discusses classical problems of philosophy, especially those pertaining to the philosophy of nature. These latter include some nowantiquated arguments in which Maurus attempts to refute the Copernican system. Maurus's greatest contribution, however, is his volumes of paraphrases and commentaries on all the works of Aristotle, Aristotelis opera quae extant omnia brevi paraphrasi ac litterae perpetuo inhaerente explanatione illustrata (6 v. Rome 1668). Whereas most of the earlier commentators had given detailed commentaries on one or other of the works of Aristotle, Maurus gave brief but pertinent commentaries on all of them. He had a gift for ferreting out the meaning of difficult passages and furnishing lucid comments on them. These commentaries are still of great help for an understanding of Aristotelian and scholastic philosophy. It has been claimed that Maurus makes Aristotle say much that he never did say, but perhaps ought to have said. Maurus's commentaries were considered valuable enough to be reprinted (1885) by Franz EHRLE as part of the series projected as an aid to the Leonine Revival of Thomism: the Bibliotheca Theologiae et Philosophiae Scholasticae.

Bibliography: É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.1:447–448. L. MORATI, Enciclopedia filosofica 3:437–438. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 5: 765–769.

[A. J. BENEDETTO]

MAURUS OF SUBIACO, ST.

Pupil and monk of St. Benedict; first half sixth century. He was the son of the Roman noble, Euthicius (Equitius) and is mentioned five times by GREGORY I THE GREAT in the second book of his Dialogues, which seems to be the only reliable source of information about Maurus. At Subiaco he was BENEDICT's trusted companion, though should be noted that Maurus's name does not appear in the Monte Cassino part of the Dialogues. He may have become Benedict's successor at Subiaco. The story of Maurus introducing the BENEDICTINES into France has no validity. Its basis, the Vita sancti Mauri (Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 5772-76), purportedly by the monk Faustus of Monte Cassino, is actually the work of the ninth-century Abbot Odo of Glanfeuil. The St. Maurus blessing of the sick with the particle of the true cross, accompanied by appropriate prayers, is still in use. On March 6, 1959, permission was granted for the use of a Benedictine medal instead of the particle of the cross.

Feast: Oct. 5 (formerly Jan. 15).

Bibliography: GREGORY I, Gregorii Magni dialogi, ed. U. MORICCA (Rome 1924). Life and Miracles of St. Benedict: Book Two of the Dialogues, tr. O. J. ZIMMERMANN and B. R. AVERY (Collegeville, Minn. 1949). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 6.1:1283–1319. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:85–89. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:97. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.2: 932–934.

[V. GELLHAUS]

MAURY, JEAN SIFFREIN

Cardinal, orator, politico-ecclesiastical figure; b. Valréas in the Comtat-Venaissin, France, June 26, 1746; d. Rome, May 11, 1817. He was the son of a poor cobbler. He was ordained (1770) after studies in Avignon and Paris. Maury, vigorous in temperament and plebeian in manners, was noted for remarkable natural eloquence and restless ambition. In Paris from 1766 to 1791, he won renown as a preacher, delivering the Lenten sermons at Versailles before the king and court (1781). His often reprinted Essai sur l'Éloquence de la Chaire (1777) gained him fame as an author and membership in the French Academy (1785).

When the Estates-General met in 1789, he attended as elected deputy for the clergy of Péronne. He revealed himself a determined champion of the "aristocrats" and defended the cause of the privileged classes of nobles and clergy resolutely and passionately. Especially did he oppose the nationalization of ecclesiastical properties and the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY. With his sonorous voice, his witticisms, and skill in repartee, he did not fear to contest Mirabeau himself. When necessary, he addressed the public in the rostrum and in the streets.

Tempted occasionally to flee the Paris populace, he resisted courageously, being one of the last deputies of the Right to leave his post. Not until November 1791 did he join the émigrés, traveling to Belgium, Germany, and finally to Rome, where he was received as a hero. Pius VI showered on him marks of esteem, appointing him (1792) titular archbishop of Nicaea and nuncio extraordinary to Frankfurt, where he animated the zeal of Emperor Francis II for a crusade against the FRENCH REVOLUTION. In 1794 the pope made him bishop of Montefiascone in the States of the Church, and cardinal. King Louis XVIII also utilized him as his representative to the Holy See. Despite this accumulation of honors, he continued to be regarded by both adversaries and partisans as the Abbé Maury, the typical man of plebeian stock, reactionary by conviction, and indefectible as advocate of the union of throne and altar.

Maury returned to Rome after attending the conclave (1800) that elected Pius VII, but suffered from the minor role allotted him and from the prolongation of his exile. When he concluded that the Napoleonic Empire was solidly established and intended to act as protector of religion in the West, he arranged a return to Paris and offered his support to the regime. So clever was he as a courtier, even after the quarrel of NAPOLEON I with the pope, so determined was he to accept all roles that finally the emperor, who scarcely esteemed him, granted him provisorily the administration of the Archdiocese of Paris, which FESCH had turned down. At this point Pius VII sent to the Chapter of Paris a very severe reprobation of Maury and others who dared to promote the emperor's designs on the Church.

The fall of Napoleon definitely ruined Maury's career. He went to Rome, where he was imprisoned for six months and removed from control of his diocese. He passed his last few years in obscurity in the Roman monastery of San Silvestro.

Bibliography: J. S. MAURY, Correspondance diplomatique et mémoires inédits du Cardinal Maury, ed. A. RICARD (Paris 1891). A. G. BONET-MAURY, Le Cardinal Maury d'après ses mémoires et sa correspondance inédits, 1746–1817 (Paris 1892). No satisfactory critical study exists.

[A. LATREILLE]

MAUSBACH, JOSEPH

Moral theologian and apologist; b. Wipperfeld, Feb. 7, 1861; d. Ahrweiler, Jan. 31, 1931. After being ordained in 1884, he labored in the pastoral ministry at Cologne until 1892, when he became professor of moral theology and apologetics at the University of Münster, a position he held for 40 years. Having both a profound knowledge especially of St. Augustine and St. Thomas and an acute sensitivity to modern problems, his teaching drew large numbers of students even from other departments. He advocated the admission of women students to the University, and he was influential in the Weimar National Assembly.

In the introduction to Die katholische Moral (Cologne 1901; New York 1914, under the title Catholic Moral Teaching and Its Antagonists) Mausbach indicated the principles and method that underlie all his work. These include: an examination of the attitudes of scientific Protestant theology toward Catholic morals; a reexamination of the fundamental ideas of Catholic morals, as established in the dogma and in the general consensus of the Church; a comparison of the Catholic and Protestant conceptions of the most important questions of morality; and an attempt to determine whether there were any points of friction or misunderstanding that a more thorough dialogue could eliminate.

Katholische Moraltheologie (3 v. Münster 1915–18) has appeared in successively revised and augmented editions. The 10th (ed. G. Ermecke, three v. Münster 1961) has been brought up to date by discussions of such contemporary problems as atomic warfare, capital punishment, advertising, automation, tax evasion, and new developments in natural-law theory. Other published works of Mausbach include: Die Ethik des hl. Augustinus (2 v. Fribourg 1909); Naturrecht und Völkerrecht (Frankfurt 1918); Thomas von Aquin als Meister christlicher Sittenlehre (Münster 1925); and Dasein und Wesen Gottes (2 v. Münster 1929–30).

Bibliography: P. MENOSSI, Enciclopedia cattolica 8:514. G. SCHREIBER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 7:199–200. K. G. STECK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 4:813–814.

[M. S. CONLAN]

MAXFIELD, THOMAS, BL.

Priest and martyr; vere Macclesfield; b. Enville, Staffordshire, England, c. 1590; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), July 1, 1616. Maxfield was the son of William Macclesfield and Ursula Roos, recusant Catholics who suffered persecution for their faith. Thomas studied at the English College of Douai (1602-10 and 1614) prior to his ordination (1614). He was captured in London within three months of landing in his homeland (1615) and imprisoned at the Gatehouse, Westminster. He unsuccessfully attempted to escape during the night of June 14, 1616, after which he was placed in stocks for 70 hours. While awaiting trial on June 26, he converted two hardened criminals. He was convicted and condemned the following day under 27 Eliz., c, 2. The Spanish ambassador intervened, seeking a pardon or reprieve. When that failed he supported the future martyr by solemnly exposing the Blessed Sacrament during the night before Thomas's execution and providing him with an honor guard en route to Tyburn, where they found the gallows decorated with flowers and the ground strewn with sweet herbs. The sentiment of the crowd of witnesses was such that the executioner delayed Thomas's disembowelment until he was senseless. Some of his relics were taken to Downside Abbey near Bath, England. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). The William Salt Archeological Society's Collections for a History of Staffordshire (London, 1882–1909), III, iii; V, ii, 207; new series, V, 128; XII, 248.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MAXIMILIAN, SS.

The names of two martyrs of the early Church.

Maximilian (or Mamilian), martyr; b. 274; d. 295. The passio of this Maximilian is an authentic, unembroidered, and contemporary account. At Theveste in Numidia (modern Tebessa, Algeria), or near Carthage, during the consulship of Tuscus and Anulinus, Maximilian, the son of Victor, was brought before the proconsul Dion by the public prosecutor Pompeian and presented as suitable for military service. Maximilian refused to serve or to accept the leaden seal of the emperor; he declared himself a Christian and a soldier in the army of Christ, whom alone he served. For his refusal he was beheaded, as the passio states, at the age of 21 years, 3 months, and 18 days. His father was present as he greeted death with joy. The matron Pompeiana carried his body on a litter to Carthage and buried it close to that of St. CYPRIAN.

Feast: March 12.

Maximilian of Lorch, bishop, martyr; b. Cilli, Styria; d. there, c. 284. He was an apostle of Noricum, between Styria and Bavaria, where he was martyred; the particulars of his life are based on unreliable 13th-century acta. Born of a wealthy family of Cilli (modern Steiermark), Maximilian was given at age seven to a priest to be educated. As he grew older, he gave away his inheritance and traveled to Rome. SIXTUS II sent him to Noricum as a missionary; he established an episcopal see at Lorch, near Passau. Then he labored fruitfully for more than 20 years, surviving the persecutions of Valerian and Aurelian. Under Numerian, however, the prefect of Noricum started a persecution during which Maximilian was called upon to sacrifice to the gods. He refused and was beheaded outside the walls of Cilli.

Feast: Oct. 12; with St. Valentine on Oct. 29.

Bibliography: Maximilian, A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 1:571–573. Acta sanctorum March 2: 103. H. DELEHAYE, Les Passions des martyrs. . . . (Brussels 1921) 104–110. Gli Acta s. Maximiliani martyris, tr. E. DI LORENZO (Naples 1975). P. ALLARD, Histoire des persécutions, 5 v. (3d ed. Paris 1903–09), v. 4. P. BROCK, The Riddle of St. Maximilian of Tebessa (Toronto 2000). P. SINISCALCO, Massimiliano, un obiettore di coscienza del tardo Impero (Turin 1974). Maximilian of Lorch. Acta sanctorum Oct. 6:23–58. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 4:93. G. RATZINGER, Forschungen zur bayrischen Geschichte (Kempten 1898). J. ZEILLER, Les Origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes (Paris 1918).

[E. D. CARTER]

MAXIMOS III MAZLŪM

Catholic Melchite patriarch; b. Michael Mazlūm, Aleppo, Syria, November 1779; d. Alexandria, Egypt, Aug. 11, 1855. His ecclesiastical education was influenced by the Gallican ideas of his Catholic Melchite bishop, Germanos Adam. After his ordination in 1806, he acted as secretary of the Council of Karkafe. Elected metropolitan of Aleppo (1810), he took the name of Maximos. This election was contested by the Propaganda (1811); he was declared irregular (1813), but later (1815) made titular bishop of Myra. During his enforced residence in Rome, he obtained from the Austrian and French governments the protection of the persecuted Catholic Melchites in Syria and founded a Melchite church in Marseilles, France. Befriended by Gregory XVI, Maxi-mos returned to Syria in 1831. On April 4, 1833, he was elected patriarch. Previous to the confirmation of this election by Rome (1836), he called the Council of 'Ain-Trāz (1835), which became the only Melchite council approved in forma generali (1841). During his term of office he visited his entire patriarchate, preaching and founding churches. He is known especially for settling the dispute (1847) about the ecclesiastical headdress (kalemavkion) and for securing the complete autonomy of the Melchites under the civil leadership of their patriarch in the Ottoman Empire (1848). Gregory XVI granted him, on a personal basis, the title of patriarch of Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem. In addition to his pastoral work, Maximos composed or translated into Arabic many works of theology, hagiography, and ascetics. Maximos's last years were less successful, when he met with opposition from Rome and some of his bishops. To many historians his life seems controversial, but to his people it was full of glorious accomplishments.

Bibliography: C. KARALEVSKIJ (CHARON), Histoire des Patriarcats Melkites, 3 v. in 2 (Rome 1909–10); Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastique 3:653–655. J. HAJJAR, Un Lutteur infatigable: Le Patriarche Maximos III Mazloum (Harissa 1958). G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur 5:107. E. HAMMERSCHMIDT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 7:210–211.

[J. JADAA]

MAXIMOS IV SAYEGH

Greek Catholic patriarch, cardinal; b. Alep (Syria), April 10, 1878: d. Beirut, Nov. 5, 1967. Maximos studied first at the Episcopal College, then at the College de Terre Sainte des Pères Franciscains in his native town. In 1893, he entered into Seminaire Sainte-Anne de Jerusalem, directed by the White Fathers. There he completed his secondary education and philosophical and theological studies. After three years of professorship at the same seminary, he joined the young Society of Missionaries of St. Paul. He was ordained a priest on Sept. 17, 1905. In 1912, he became superior of the Missionary Society and kept this position until 1919. During this time he also directed Al-Macarrat, the magazine of the Greek Catholic patriarchate.

On Aug. 31, 1919, Maximos IV was consecrated metropolitan of Tyre, in Lebanon. The beginnings of his episcopacy were marked by political troubles, violence, and dangers of massacre. In 1921, he paid a long visit to the United States to organize the ministry for Greek Catholic emigrants from Syria and Lebanon. On Aug. 30, 1933 he was transferred to the See of Beirut, Lebanon. A new period of religious struggles then began. In 1936 he founded the Congregation of the Religious Missionaries of Our Lady of Perpetual Help. He played a major role in the nationalist movement that resulted in the recognition of the full independence of Lebanon in 1943.

At the death of Patriarch Cyrille IX, Maximos IV was elected patriarch of the Greek Catholic Church (Oct. 30, 1947). At least once a year he summoned all his episcopacy to a synod that lasted an entire week. Credit for the founding of a Community Parish Chest is given to Maximos IV, opening mutual diocesan aid designed to help financially deprived dioceses. His liturgical commission worked for 20 years revising and editing liturgical books. He opened his community to new religious institutes of the West. He gave particular attention to emigrants from his jurisdiction, obtaining for them the installations of Eastern hierarchies of their rite in Brazil and in the United States.

Ardent apostle of ecumenicism, he did not spare any effort to create in the Catholic church the psychological and theological atmosphere and indispensable discipline for the reconciliation of the churches, at the same time safeguarding the rights of the Eastern Catholic churches and defending the patriarchal prerogatives. In 1964 he visited Patriarch Athenagoras in Istanbul, and he established cordial relations with the churches of Constantinople, Canterbury, and Etchmiadzin. The Second Vatican Council, where he played a major role, was the supreme effort of his life. His books include, Voice of the Church in the East, published in 1962 and translated into several languages, and The Greek Catholic Church at the Council (1967), which contained the actions, notes, and reports of the patriarch and the prelates of his church at Vatican II.

In Feb. 1965 Pope Paul VI made Maximos IV a cardinal. His last days were clouded by the Israeli-Arab war of June 1967, and the seizure by the Syrian government of the Catholic schools.

Bibliography: MAXIMOS IV, Voix de l'Eglise en Orient (Bâle 1962) translated into several languages; L'Eglise grecque melkite au Concile, ed. D. AL-KALIMA (Beirut 1967). I. DICK, Qu'est-ce que l'Orient chrétien? (Tournai 1965). J. HAJJAR, Les Chrétiens uniates du Proche-Orient (Paris 1962). G. ZANANIRI, Le christianisme oriental (Paris 1966). E. INGLESSIS, Maximos IV: L'Orient conteste l'Occident (Paris 1969). N. EDELBY, Les Eglises orientales catholiques (Paris 1970) Coll. "Unam Sanctam."

[N. EDELBY]

MAXIMUS OF SARAGOSSA, ST.

Bishop; d. Saragossa?, c. 619. He is one of three chroniclers of the sixth century praised and used by ISI-DORE OF SEVILLE (Vir. ill. 46), who notes that Maximus wrote other works both in prose and verse. Of his chronicle, which parallels those of VICTOR OF TUNNUNA and JOHN OF BICLARO, only 33 brief anonymous excerpts are extant. They seem to view Visigothic history (450–568) from Saragossa and constitute a marginal gloss to a MS of Victor's chronicle, which neglects Visigothic history. It is useless to speculate on which passages in Isidore's work derive from Maximus. The chronicle edited by Higuera in 1611 (Patrologia Latina 80:617–632) is a forgery. Maximus signed the acts of councils in Barcelona in 599, Toledo in 610, and Egara in 614.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores antiquissimi 11:221–223. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–32) 5:398–399.

[E. P. COLBERT]

MAXIMUS OF TURIN, ST.

Bishop; place and date of birth unknown; d. c. 408–23. The only source for Maximus' life and work apart from the evidence contained in his own extant sermons—is an early one, GENNADIUS's (d. c. 492–505) De viris illustribus 41. This brief notice lists 24 of Maximus's sermons by title, referring to others as "many," and states that Maximus died in the reign of Honorius and Theodosius the Younger. However, Bp. Maximus of Turin signed the acts of the Council of Milan in 451 and those of the Council of Rome in 465. In the light of this evidence, BARONIUS identified the Maximus of Gennadius with the Maximus of the conciliar acts and maintained that Gennadius was in error about the date. The view of Baronius was widely accepted until the end of the nineteenth century, but since that time it has been rejected. It is now universally recognized that there were two bishops of Turin bearing the name of Maximus. Around the nucleus of the 24 sermons known by title, a large number of others came to be assigned to Maximus in the course of the MS tradition. B. Bruni was the first to attempt to separate the genuine from the false in his edition (Rome 1784; repr. in Patrologia Latina [Paris 1878–90] 57), but of the 240 sermons and treatises accepted as genuine, a large number, including 40 by the Arian bishop Maximinus, were wrongly assigned to Maximus of Turin.

A critical edition of Maximus by A. Mutzenbecher (1962) made it possible to evaluate Maximus and his work satisfactorily for the first time. On the basis of the converging evidence furnished by 16 carefully chosen criteria, the editor has included 119 sermons in his edition, but this number includes two belonging to St. JEROME, one belonging to BASIL (in Latin translation), five that must be regarded as dubious, and six that are labeled as spurious. Mutzenbecher's introduction covers the life and work of Maximus, the history of earlier editions, the MS collections and their relations, and concordance tables indicating the listing and order of the sermons in the MS collections and the printed editions.

Maximus may be described as a zealous and effective pastor of souls. His Latin is clear and direct, if somewhat rhetorical in keeping with the taste of his age. His imagery is rich, vivid, and concrete. He shows a fondness for allegorical interpretation and for seeking Old Testament prototypes for all persons and events in the New Testament. His Lenten and paschal sermons are valuable for the history of contemporary ecclesiastical practice, and his repeated warnings against pagan superstitions and usages indicate that paganism was still very much alive in his area. Sermon 37 employs the story of Ulysses bound to the mast as a symbol of Christ bound to the cross, identifying the cross as the mast that has saved the human race.

Feast: June 25.

Bibliography: A. MUTZENBECHER, ed., Maximi Episcopi Taurenensis Sermones (Corpus Christianorum. Series latina. 23; Tournhout 1962), with bibliog. vi–xiii. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF (New York 1960) 545–546. H. RAHNER, Greek Myths and Christian Mystery, tr. H. BATTERSHAW (New York 1963), esp. 382–383. C. DE FILIPPIS CAPPAI, Massimo: vescovo di Torino e il suo tempo (Turin 1995). M. MODEMANN, Die Taufe in den Predigten des hl. Maximus v. Turin (Frankfurt am Main 1995). A. MERKT, Maximus I. von Turin (Leiden 1997).

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR, ST.

A 7th-century Byzantine theologian and aescetical writer; b. Constantinople, c. 580; d. in exile, Lazica, on the Black Sea, Aug. 13, 662. Of a well-known family, Maximus received an excellent education, entered the civil service, and became secretary to Emperor HERACLI-US I. In 613 or 614 he retired to a monastery near Chrysopolis (Scutari) and later (625) to Cyzicus with his disciple, Anastasius. In flight before the Persian invasion of 626, he made his way to Crete and Cyprus and eventually to Africa (628–630); there he took part in a disputation over MONOTHELITISM with the expatriarch, Pyrrhus I, at Carthage (645). He visited Rome, where Pope MAR-TIN I invited him to participate in a synod of the Lateran (649) that condemned Monothelitism. In 653 he was arrested together with the pope by Emperor Constans II (641-668) and was brought to Constantinople and charged with treason. Condemned on this charge (655), he was exiled to Bizye in Thrace. In 662 he refused to accept an imperial edict that forbade further discussion of the Monothelite heresy and was condemned to have his tongue and right hand cut off. Together with his disciples, the apocrisiarius Anastasius and Anastasius the monk, he was finally exiled to Lazica, where he died.

Writings. Approximately 90 major writings make up the works of Maximus. In his earlier years Maximus wrote commentaries on the Scriptures. In 626 his Quaestiones et dubia appeared in the form of 79 questions and answers concerned with difficult passages in the Bible and with dogmatic questions. He later wrote an explanation of Psalm 59 and the Our Father and dealt with three scriptural problems in his Quaestiones ad Theopemptum Scholasticum. His Quaestiones ad Thalassium appeared between 630 and 633, addressed to a Libyan priest and monk, and contained some 65 answers to scriptural difficulties solved with the aid of patristic material, particularly the observations of GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS and PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS the Areopagite. He also produced two books entitled Ambigua (c. 630). The scholia to the works of Pseudo-Dionysius and of Gregory of Nazianzus are probably not authentic works of Maximus.

Under the title, Opuscula theologica et polemica, some 28 works are attributed to Maximus; they are devoted to refutations of MONOPHYSITISM and of the heresies of the Monergists and Monothelites, as well as to other dogmatic questions. His opuscula on the two natures in Christ were written between 626 and 634. Later, he dealt with speculative problems, including 12 possible types of union in Christ; a number of divergent definitions in Christology; and finally, in a work addressed to the priest Theodore, with the notions of quality, property, and difference in the HYPOSTATIC UNION.

He wrote a short tract against the arguments of the Monergists, then a long treatise addressed to the priest George, concerning the will in Christ. In his Tome to Marinus, written probably c. 640, he dealt with a number of citations of the Fathers that appeared to strengthen the position of Monergism, concentrating on the Patriarch ANASTASIUS I of Antioch, whose work against JOHN PHILOPONUS had favored the monergistic position. He likewise interpreted the letter of Pope HONORIUS I (625–638) to the Patriarch Sergius in an orthodox sense.

The best-known ascetico-moral works of Maximus are his dialogue Liber asceticus, 400 Capita de caritate, 200 Capita theologica et oeconomica, and the first 15 chapters of 500 Diversa capita ad theologiam et oeconomiam spectantia (the remainder of this last work is spurious). The most important liturgical work of the saint is his Mystagogia, a commentary on the mystical meaning of the liturgy that has been published many times and was translated into Turkish in 1799. Finally, over 100 of his letters have been edited; many of them are complete theological tracts.

Doctrine. The theological system of Maximus is a synthesis in which the principles of classical philosophy, particularly that of Aristotle, and the teachings of the Fathers, especially under the influence of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS the Areopagite, are blended into an original exposition of Christian teaching. The center of this new system is Christ. In contradistinction to the teaching of Monophysitism and Monothelitism, he affirmed the existence of two complete and distinct natures—one human, the other divine—in the one Person of the Word.

As Christ is the center of all creation, the history of the universe until the coming of Christ is a preparation for God becoming man; and history after Christ is the story of man becoming divine in and through the Incarnation of the Word. By appearing in the midst of men, Jesus Christ revealed God, who is one by nature in the Trinity of Persons. Man, by his nature, tends toward God. Man's supernatural unification with Christ through baptism gives him the capability of freely realizing this tendency of his nature that urges him to unite with God by avoiding sin and practicing virtue. Thus, the spiritual life of the Christian grows not only morally but also ontologically. This natural disposition of man's nature to tend to God is something more than an intellectual act. It is the basis of an ecstatic experience born of love. This love (ἀγάπη) means the acceptance of the absolute supremacy of God and the interior rejection of the things of this world (ἀπάθεια). Also, it is the denial of one's own personal will (φιλαυτία) and the revelation of actual love for one's neighbor. The writings of Maximus are characterized by their Byzantine boldness in subtle speculation, Roman realism, and deep understanding of the nature of the Church.

In his spiritual counsel, Maximus is the successor of EVAGRIUS PONTICUS. He cultivated the three steps of praxis, or self-control through mortification, theoria, or contemplation of nature leading to God, and theologia, or the contemplation-union with divinity. But he dissociated this procedure from the cosmogony of ORIGEN.

Maximus maintained that the practice of virtue under the leadership of charity had to accompany the steps leading through contemplation (theoria) to perfection. He insisted on the practice of sympathos in dealing with worldly situations; and in the end he admitted two approaches to spiritual perfection: the practical, and the theoretical or contemplative. He insisted, however, that contemplation had to be informed by and achieved in charity. His mysticism preserved a humanistic element that was not always observed by his followers, but that gave a depth and balance to his spiritual teaching seldom equaled by his successors. He has been termed by H. G. Beck as, perhaps, the last independent theologian of the Byzantine Church.

Feast: Aug. 13.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 4:15–576; 19:1217–80, computus; v. 90–91. Maximus

Confessor: Weisheit, ed. and tr. B. HERMANN (Würzburg 1941). The Ascetic Life: The Four Centuries on Charity, ed. and tr. P. SHER-WOOD [Ancient Christian Writers 21, ed. J. QUASTEN et al. (Westminster MD, London 1955)]. P. SHERWOOD, An Annotated Date List of the Works of St. Maximus the Confessor [Studia anselmiana 30 (Rome 1952)]; The Earlier Ambigua of St. Maximus the Confessor (ibid. 36; 1955). H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 436-442. E. VON IVÁNKA. Maximus der Bekenner (Einsiedeln 1961). V. GRUMEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 10.1:448-459. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913-32) 5:28-35. I. HAUSHERR, Philautie [Orientalia Christiana periodica 137 (Rome 1952)]. A. CERESA-GESTALDO, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 7:208-210. R. DEVREESSE, Analecta Bollandiana 46 (1928) 5-49; 73 (1955) 5-16. G. MAHIEU, Travaux préparatoires à une édition critique des oeuvres de S. Maxime le Confesseur (Diss. Louvain 1957). B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF (New York 1960) 629-633. W. VÖLKER, "Der Einfluss des Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita auf Maximus," Universitas Festschrift . . . Albert Stohr, v. 1 (Mainz 1960) 243-254; Maximus Confessor als Meister des geistlichen Lebens (Wiesbaden 1965). H. U. VON BALTHASAR, Kosmische Liturgie (Einsiedeln 1961). I. H. DALMAIS, Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 29 (Toulouse 1953) 123–159, Pater Noster. G. BARDY, Revue biblique 42 (Paris 1933) 332-339. A. CERESA-GESTALDO, Orientalia Christiana periodica 23 (Rome 1957) 145-158, capita de caritate. A. SINAITA, The Life of our Holy Father, Maximus the Confessor, tr. C. BIRCHALL (Boston 1982). L. THUNBERG, Man and the Cosmos (Crestwood, NY 1985); Microcosm and Mediator (Chicago 1995). M. L. GATTI PERER, Massimo il confessore (Milan 1987), bibliography. P. M. BLOWERS, Exegesis and Spiritual Pedagogy in Maximus the Confessor (Notre Dame, IN 1991). V. KARAYIANNIS, Maxime le Confesseur: essence et énergies de Dieu (Paris 1993). A. NICHOLS, Byzantine gospel: Maximus the Confessor in Modern Scholarship (Edinburgh 1993). J.-C. LARCHET, La divinisation de l'homme selon saint Maxime le Confesseur (Paris 1996); Maxime le Confesseur, médiateur entre l'Orient et l'Occident (Paris 1998). A. LOUTH, Maximus the Confessor (London 1996), incl. bibliography. J. P. WILLIAMS, Denying Divinity: Apophasis in the Patristic Christian and Soto Zen Buddhist Traditions (New York 2000).

[M. HERMANIUK]

MAXWELL, WINIFRED

Countess of Nithsdale, Catholic noblewoman famous for the rescue of her husband from the Tower of London after the Jacobite rising of 1715; b. c. 1678; d. Rome, 1749. Lady Nithsdale, daughter of William, first marquis of Powis, lived with her husband at the family seat of Terregles until his capture following the Battle of Preston. After leaving Scotland for England and pleading in vain with King George I to pardon her condemned husband, the intrepid countess smuggled female attire to him in the tower, and he succeeded in escaping on Feb. 23, 1716. She then hid her husband in London until he made his flight in safety to France. Returning to Scotland, Lady Nithsdale retrieved the family papers that she had hidden there. In these activities she had incurred great personal risk, and the wrathful George I declared she had "done him more mischief than any woman in Christendom." She joined Lord Nithsdale abroad and they traveled to Rome, where they ended their days in exile.

Bibliography: J. B. PAUL, ed., The Scots Peerage 9 v. (Edinburgh 1904–14) v. 6. The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 13:136. W. FRASER, Book of Carlaverock (Edinburgh 1873). M. SCOTT, The Making of Abbotsford and Incidents in Scottish History (London 1897).

[H. F. GRETSCH]

MAYA RELIGION

At the time of the Spanish conquest, Mayan civilization extended over much of present-day Guatemala, British Honduras, Honduras, El Salvador, and much of southern Mexico, including the Yucatan. Mayan religion consisted at first of a primitive personification of nature with little formal organization; later, it was fused with a complex philosophy built around the deification of heavenly bodies and the worship of time. In the postclassical period, the Mexicans introduced idolatry and placed a much greater emphasis on human sacrifice. The principal function of religion was to maintain and ensure life, health, and sustenance. The Mayans believed in the immortality of the soul and in an afterlife consisting of a heaven and a hell. Their religious philosophy was dualistic, focusing upon an eternal struggle between the powers of good and evil over the destiny of man. Mayan cosmology described the sky as consisting of 13 layers, the lowest layer being the earth. Beneath the earth were nine underworlds, in the lowest of which resided the death god. Each layer was ruled by its own god. The Mayans worshipped a complex of gods of whom Itzamna, son of the creator god Hunab Ku, was the head. Chacs, the gods of rain, were important deities and were regarded sometimes as a single god and sometimes as the four gods of the cardinal points. All the most important deities were connected with the growth of corn. The extensive priesthood was closely connected in power and goals with that of the nobility. The priestly hierarchy was assigned different duties. High priests were not only concerned with religious matters, but they also functioned as scholars, astronomers, mathematicians, and administrators. Other classes of priests included diviners, nacoms (executioners), and prophets. Religious ceremonies followed a regular yearly calendar and observances consisted of purification, divination, prayers, and sacrifice.

Bibliography: S. G. MORLEY, The Ancient Maya, rev. G. W. BRAINARD (3d ed. Stanford 1958). J. E. S. THOMPSON, The Rise and Fall of Maya Civilization (Norman, OK 1956). D. R. REDFIELD, The Folk Culture of Yucatan (Chicago 1941). M. E. KAMPEN, The Religion of the Maya (Leiden 1981). T. R. ROBERTS, Gods of the Maya, Sculpture of Chichen-Itza, a Mayan god. (@Bettmann/CORBIS)

Aztecs, and Incas (New York 1996). D. GILLETTE, The Shaman's Secret: The Lost Resurrection Teachings of the Ancient Maya (New York 1997). G. COOK, Crosscurrents in Indigenous Spirituality: Interface of Maya, Catholic, and Protestant Worldviews (Leiden 1997). L. SCHELE and P. MATHEWS, The Code of Kings: The Language of Seven Sacred Maya Temples and Tombs (New York 1998). S. MILBRATH, Star Gods of the Maya (Austin, TX 1999). R. BONEWITZ, Timeless Wisdom of the Maya (London 2000).

[J. RUBIN/EDS.]

MAYER, RUPERT, BL.

Priest of the Society of Jesus noted for his anti-Nazi activities; b. Stuttgart, Germany, Jan. 23, 1876; d. Munich, Germany, Nov. 1, 1945.

The son of Kolumban, a prosperous merchant, and Maria (Schäurer) Mayer, Rupert studied in the universities of Fribourg, Munich, and Tübingen before entering the seminary at Rottenburg. He was ordained a priest May 2, 1899, and the following year entered the Jesuits, making his novitiate in Lichtenstein and taking further theological studies at Valkenburg in the Netherlands. Mayer gained a reputation as a preacher of parish missions in Germany, Switzerland, and the Netherlands. During World War I he volunteered to be a chaplain, was wounded and lost his left leg.

In 1921 Mayer was appointed chaplain of the Men's Sodality, a position he held until his death. He cofounded and was spiritual director of the Sisters of the Holy Family, a community that works among the very poor. In 1925, he inaugurated the Banhofsmission, a ministry to travelers.

Mayer was one of the first to recognize the incompatibility of Nazism and Christianity. The Nazi rejection of the Old Testament and the Jewish element in Christianity seemed to him intolerable and absurd. He regarded Hitler as "hysterical." These views made him an object of police attention after the Nazi accession to power in 1933. The Ministry of Justice gave him a warning because of his anti-Nazi position. In April 1936 Mayer was forbidden to preach throughout Germany and later arrested, but released on the condition that he should confine himself to the sacramental ministry and service of the poor. Although he accepted the condition under duress or "obedience," on Nov. 3, 1939, Mayer was again arrested. Confined first to the concentration camp at Sachsenhausen, he spent the duration of the war in Ettal Abbey. On May 11, 1945, he returned to Munich, only days after World War II ended in Germany and began to preach again, but he died six months later at the age of 69. His tomb in the crypt of the Sodality Chapel on Neuhauserstrasse in Munich soon became a place of pilgrimage.

Pope John Paul II beatified Mayer on May 3, 1987, in the Olympic Stadium in Munich.

Feast: Nov. 3 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: A. KÖBLING, ed., Father Rupert Mayer: A Modern Priest and Witness for Christ (Munich 1950; 1975). O. GRITTSCHNEDER, ed., Ich Predige Weiter: Pater Rupert Mayer und das Dritte Reich (Rosenheim, Germany 1987). V. A. LAPOMARDA, The Jesuits and the Third Reich (n.p.). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., 22 (1987) 2, 3. J. N. TYLENDA, Jesuit Saints And Martyrs (Chicago 1998).

[P. HEBBLETHWAITE]

MAYFLOWER COMPACT

An agreement signed by the passengers of the May-flower, while the ship lay at anchor in Provincetown harbor, Mass., on Nov. 11, 1620. Under the compact the settlers agreed to be ruled by the majority and to submit to the laws made by their government. Such an agreement became necessary when the Mayflower inadvertently landed at Cape Cod rather than Virginia, where the Pilgrim Fathers had a royal patent, and some members of the group refused to recognize the legal authority of their leaders, whose jurisdiction under the patent did not extend beyond the borders of Virginia. To ensure the proper ordering of the colony, the signers of the compact pledged to "combine ourselves together in a civil body politic, for our better ordering and preservation and furtherance of the ends aforesaid; and by virtue thereof to enact, constitute, and frame such just and equal laws . . . as shall be thought most meet and convenient for the general good of the Colony, unto which we promise all due submission and obedience." The compact was not a constitution; nor was it a declaration of independence from the king. It was, rather, a social contract, important as an example of government by consent of the governed as well as of the remarkable capacity of the English people for self-government. These so-called Pilgrim Fathers were a group of Puritans, originally from the village of Scrooby, Nottinghamshire, England, who fled to Holland to preserve their religious purity. After a period of unhappy exile in Holland, they immigrated to America. They differed from other Puritans in that they had no wish to remain within the Church of England and broke with it entirely. The Mayflower Compact was the first of many such agreements by which groups of New Englanders established civil governments. These were actually extensions of the religious covenants by which members of each Congregational church mutually bound themselves in a fraternal religious association.

Bibliography: J. T. BLODGETT, "The Political Theory of the Mayflower Compact," Publications of the Colonial Society of Massachusetts 12 (1911) 204–213. A. LORD, "The Mayflower Compact," Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society, NS 30 (1920) 278–294.

[E. DELANEY]

MAYNARD, THEODORE

Poet, critic, biographer, historian; b. Madras, India, Nov. 3, 1890; d. Port Washington, N.Y., Oct. 18, 1956; the son of Protestant missionaries Henry and Elizabeth (Teague) Maynard. His reading (particularly of G. K. Chesterton) led him into the Church in 1913, after which he spent seven months in a Dominican novitiate. On July 8, 1918, he married Sara Katherine Casey; they had seven children. While lecturing in the U.S. in 1920 he was offered a professorship at San Rafael College, California, although he had never taught and had no degree. The next 16 years were spent in remedying both deficiencies. He taught at San Rafael (1921-25); St. John's College, Brooklyn, and Manhattanville College of the Sacred Heart, N.Y. (1925-27); Fordham University, N.Y. (1927-29); Georgetown University, Washington, D.C. (1929–34); and Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md. (1934–36). He received the degrees of A.B. (Fordham), M.A. (Georgetown), and Ph.D. (Catholic University of America).

His De Soto and the Conquistadores (1930) led to a succession of biographies of figures chiefly in the Elizabethan era, among them Queen Elizabeth (1940) and

The Signing of the Mayflower Compact. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Thomas Cranmer (1956). Entering the field of hagiography, he produced popular lives of such saints as Francis Xavier (1936), Mother Cabrini (1945), Francis of Assisi (1948), and Ignatius Loyola (1956). He deemed his greatest prose achievement The Story of American Catholicism (1941), which led him to further studies in American Church history, such as the lives of Orestes Brownson (1943) and Junípero Serra (1954). After his first wife's death (1945), he married Kathleen Sheehan. In 1948 he became president of the Catholic Poetry Society of America. He had been serving as vice president of the Society since its founding some 12 years earlier.

Bibliography: T. MAYNARD, The World I Saw (Milwaukee 1938). J. A. O'BRIEN, Road to Damascus (Garden City 1949) 98–110.

[A. M. MELVILLE]

MAYNE, CUTHBERT, ST.

Protomartyr of the English College, Douai; b. Youlston, near Barnstaple, 1543 or 1544; d. Launceston, Nov. 30, 1577. His uncle, a schismatic priest, who held a rich benefice that he hoped to pass on to his nephew, sent him to Barnstaple Grammar School. At 17, Mayne was presented with the living at the parish of Huntshaw and was later ordained a minister of the new Anglican Church there. Five years later he went to Oxford where he took his arts degree at St. Alban's Hall (later incorporated into Merton College). At Oxford, Cuthbert fell under the influence of Edmund CAMPION and Gregory Martin. After they left, Cuthbert lingered on, torn between his duty to his uncle and the benefice and his wish to become a Catholic priest.

At last the matter was settled for him. Campion and Martin had sent several letters to Cuthbert urging him to join them at Douai. One letter fell into the hands of the bishop of London; he sent men to arrest Cuthbert, who, however, was away at the time. Having been warned by Thomas Ford, he decided to resign his chaplaincy and leave the country. This was toward the end of 1570 and nothing more is heard of him until he arrived at the English College, Douai, in 1573. On Feb. 7, 1575, he was ordained, and the following year he took his degree as a bachelor of theology. In April 1576, he returned to England with John Paine. He made his way to the house of Francis Tregian, Golden Manor in Cornwall, where he posed as a steward.

It was a short ministry. On June 8, 1577, Richard Grenville, Sheriff of Cornwall (the hero of Tennyson's Revenge), with nine or ten justices of peace and 100 armed men, arrived at Golden Manor. He arrested Cuthbert and almost the entire household. The whole party was brought to Truro to be questioned by Bishop Bradbridge, who closely examined Cuthbert's papers, but found nothing incriminating. From Truro, Cuthbert was taken to Launceston Castle and thrown into a foul dungeon. After three month's imprisonment, he was tried as a traitor before the Launceston Assizes on Sept. 16, 1577. This was a test case because Mayne was the first seminary priest to be caught. The prosecution had only circumstantial evidence that he was a priest and the jury returned from its first retirement puzzled and uncertain. However, after a threatening harangue from Grenville, it gave the verdict of guilty.

One of the judges, named Jeffreys, was not satisfied with the justice of the verdict and made a report to the Privy Council. The council submitted the matter to the whole bench of judges whose opinion was divided; whereupon the council ordered the execution to be carried out as "a terror to the Papists." Francis Tregian, then imprisoned in London, was offered his life and Cuthbert's also if he would join the Protestant Church but he replied that "he would not hazard his soul to hell to withhold his man's [Cuthbert's] from heaven."

On Nov. 30, 1577, Cuthbert was bound to a hurdle and drawn to the market square at Launceston. He was allowed to hang only for a minute and was then butchered alive. His skull is preserved at the Carmelite convent at Lanherne. There have been many reported miracles attributed to him. He was beatified by Leo XIII in 1886, and canonized by Paul VI in 1970.

Feast: Nov. 29.

Bibliography: T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 13:161–162. W. ALLEN, A Briefe Historie of the Glorious Martyrdom of Twelve Reverend Priests (Rheims 1582; reprint London 1908). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). P. A. BOYAN and G. R. LAMB, Francis Tregian (New York 1955).

[G. FITZHERBERT]

MAYNOOTH, ST. PATRICK'S COLLEGE

During the 17th and 18th centuries, to counteract the penal laws that prohibited Catholic education, candidates for the Irish diocesan priesthood were educated in seminaries established in the Catholic countries of Europe. During the French Revolution, many of these seminaries were forced to close; access to the Continent became difficult. The Irish bishops petitioned the government to allow the endowment of seminaries in Ireland. An act of Parliament on June 5, 1795 (35 Geo. III, ch. 21) led to the opening of St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, in autumn 1795.

Early Development. Though the discussions between government and bishops had been concerned with the establishment of a seminary, the act of 1795 made general provision "for the better education of persons professing the Roman Catholic religion." In 1801, a lay college was set up in Maynooth operating as a private foundation. It was closed in 1817, however, not only because the government regarded with suspicion this juxtaposition of lay and clerical education, but also because the development of similar institutions elsewhere made it unnecessary. Maynooth then became what it until recently remained, a seminary to educate the majority of candidates for the Irish diocesan priesthood.

The act of 1795 provided a sum of £8,000 "towards establishing the said academy"; in some way which is not altogether clear the provision became an annual parliamentary grant of approximately this amount. This grant was of great help toward the large-scale building necessary in the early years of the college. However, it also gave an opportunity to the more hostile Protestants to voice their suspicions, both during the annual parliamentary debate and outside Parliament and to demand that the College be closely supervised. These annoyances were considerably lessened by Sir Robert Peel's legislation of 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. ch. 25), which provided £30,000 for buildings and increased the annual grant to £26,360, chargeable to the Consolidated Fund and therefore not subject to parliamentary debate.

Administration. Under the act of 1795, the College was governed by a board of trustees, responsible to Parliament and composed of government officials, Catholic laity, and representatives of the Catholic hierarchy. Under a further act of 1800 (40 Geo. III, ch. 85), however, the government officials ceased to be trustees.

After this the trustees, 17 in number, were all Catholics—11 bishops and six lay. The Irish Church Act of 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., ch. 42) freed the trustees from any further responsibility to Parliament. The lay trustees resigned; since then the board has been composed of four Irish archbishops and 13 bishops. While the college is legally vested in these 17 trustees, it is administered by the entire hierarchy. The immediate administration is in the hands of a president, vice president, and three directors of formation, together with spiritual directors and a vocational growth counsellor.

Finance. Under the act of 1869 mentioned above, the annual parliamentary grant was withdrawn. In its place the college received a capital sum of £369,040, equal to 14 years' purchase of the annual grant. While under the general provisions of the act this capital sum was fairly and in some respects generously calculated, the immediate result was to halve the income of the college. This capital sum remained the nucleus of college finances. The heavy inflation of the past century put it under considerable pressure. It has, however, been successfully rebuilt, though student fees now play a bigger part than they did in the past. An appeal for funds by the trustees in 1947 netted about £700,000, but most of this was absorbed by reconstruction and building repair. Further necessary conservation of extensive and ageing buildings has been made possible in more recent years by the establishment of the "Friends of Maynooth." Friends in United States have been particularly generous.

Organization. Since 1906, Maynooth has been a Pontifical University, with faculties of theology, Canon Law, and philosophy. The college was also connected in various ways with the different attempts made in the later 19th century to secure an acceptable plan of university education for Catholics. Finally, under the Irish Universities Act of 1908 (8 Edw. VII, ch. 38) Maynooth became a recognized College of the National University of Ireland, and as such provided courses leading to degrees of the National University in philosophy, arts, Celtic studies, and science.

In 1966 the trustees declared their intention to develop Maynooth as "an open centre of higher studies," with "faculties and courses to meet the needs of priests, nonclerical religious, and the laity." At the time a government commission was evaluating the whole Irish university system. There was a tacit understanding among all parties that Maynooth had to expand to retain its university status, and that "theology should be allowed to take its place in the university system." The Second Vatican Council stirred up much optimistic discussions, but nothing was accomplished until the Universities Act of 1997 established a civil university, the National University of Ireland at Maynooth (NUI Maynooth). St. Patrick's College remained autonomous as a seminary and pontifical university. The pontifical university offers baccalaureate, postgraduate and diploma programs in theology and canon law for seminarians, clergy, non-clerical religious and laity. Students also enroll in the relevant humanities courses at NUI Maynooth.

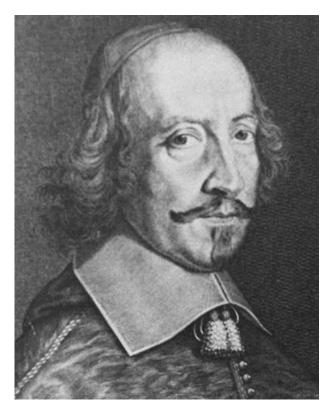

Postgraduate resident priest-students form the Dunboyne Establishment. This takes its name from John Butler, Bishop of Cork, who apostatized from the Church on succeeding to the title of Lord Dunboyne in 1786. He was reconciled on his deathbed in 1800; in his will he left lands that yielded an income of £1,000 per year to Maynooth. This revenue was used to finance post-ordination studies for selected students. Although the "Dunboyne course" carried no academic degree for nearly a century, it was justly regarded as the equivalent of a doctorate in theology. The Dunboyne Establishment now provides courses for all degrees that Maynooth is empowered to grant as a Pontifical University. Postgraduate prieststudents in NUI Maynooth also reside in the Dunboyne Establishment. In the exceptional circumstances of World War II it had as many as 30 extern students (destined to serve in dioceses outside Ireland). Although it is seldom entirely without these externs, Dunboyne students normally graduate through the ordinary college courses.

Library and Publications. Library facilities are shared between St. Patrick's College and NUI Maynooth. The collection comprises over 400,000 volumes, including 60 incunabula and many rare works on Irish history. There are over 300 Gaelic manuscripts, notably the O'Curry, Murphy, and Renehan collections. The college archive also houses the archive of the Irish College at Salamanca, Spain, which closed in 1936.

The College publishes the following periodicals: Irish Theological Quarterly, Furrow, and Archivium Hibernicum, the annual journal of the Catholic Record Society of Ireland.

The Maynooth Union of Irish Priests meets annually in the College. The Catholic Truth Society of Ireland had its origin in a paper read before the Union in 1899, and the Catholic Record Society was similarly inaugurated in 1910. The College museum sprang from a paper read in 1931. In addition to valuable ecclesiastical material there is a collection of historical scientific instruments, assembled as a tribute to the distinguished priest-scientist Nicholas Callan, professor in the college from 1826 until his death in 1864. A paper read in 1955 by Most Rev. Dr. Philbin, then Bishop of Clonfert, led to the Maynooth Union Summer School.

Although Maynooth's primary purpose is the education of priests for Irish dioceses, it has consistently supplied priests to other English-speaking countries. Among its many contributions to mission outreach are the Maynooth Mission to China (St. Columban's Society), founded in 1916, and St. Patrick's Society for African Mission, founded in 1932.

Jules Cardinal Mazarin.

Bibliography: Calendarium Collegii S. Patritii, annually since 1864. J. HEALY, Maynooth College: Its Centenary History (New York 1895). D. HOURIHANE, "College Buildings," The Irish Ecclesiastical Record series 5, 66 (1945) 238–43. D. MEEHAN, Window on Maynooth (Dublin 1949). P. J. CORISH, Maynooth College 1795–1995 (Dublin 1995). Eighth Report of the Commissioners of Irish Education, Roman Catholic College of Maynooth (Dublin 1827). Report of Her Majesty's Commissioners Appointed to Enquire into the Management and Government of the College of Maynooth (Dublin 1855).

[P. J. CORISH]

MAZARIN, JULES

Cardinal, prime minister of France (1643–61) who continued the work of RICHELIEU and prepared for the reign of LOUIS XIV; b. Pescina, in the Abruzzi Apennines, July 14, 1602; d. Paris, March 9, 1661. His father, Pietro Mazzarini, came to Rome from Palermo and entered the service of the COLONNA family. Giulio (Jules) entered the Roman College at about seven years of age and after his studies accompanied Cardinal Colonna in Spain for three years. On his return he began his career in the army of the Papal States. In 1627, as a captain, he performed several diplomatic missions to states that had an interest in the succession of Mantua, and at this time he first visited France, where he met Richelieu (1630). He acquired fame in October 1630 by gaining a truce between Spanish and French troops ready to fight for the fortress of Casale. His work at the Treaty of Cherasco in 1631 allowed France to retain Pignerol.

Rise to Power. In 1632 he left the military for the clergy, became canon of the Lateran, auditor of the legate of Avignon (and later vice-legate), and was nuncio extraordinary in France (1634-36). He gained the trust of Richelieu, who asked Urban VIII to make him ordinary nuncio to Paris. When Urban refused, Richelieu had the king name Mazarin for the cardinal's hat reserved for France in the coming consistory. After three years Urban yielded, and Mazarin became a cardinal in the consistory of Dec. 16, 1641. He was then in France, and Richelieu wanted to send him to Rome to care for French interests, but Richelieu died, and LOUIS XIII appointed him to the royal council. When Louis died three months later, the regent, Anne of Austria, made Mazarin prime minister. France was then in the midst of a war against the empire and Spain. The victories of Rocroy, Fribourg, and Nordlingen enabled Mazarin, after difficult negotiations, to impose on the emperor the Treaties of WESTPHALIA, which gave France control of Alsace and bridgeheads on the Rhine and gave the German princes political and religious autonomy. But Spain continued the war, counting on the exhaustion of France and the discontent caused by taxation.

Opposition from the Fronde. Trouble did break out in the Fronde in 1648 and almost ruined Mazarin several times. When the Parlement of Paris protested against tax laws in 1648, the regent arrested a particularly violent councilor, Broussel. Barricades were then thrown up in Paris, and Mazarin had to yield, promising to suppress the intendants and lettres de cachet. In early January 1649 the court secretly left Paris, as Parlement and the archbishop coadjutor, Paul de Gondi, raised troops against the king, and Mazarin was declared a disturber of the peace. The king's army besieged Paris, but peace was restored only when Mazarin allied with the royal princes, Condé and the king's brother and brother-in-law. When they sought to impose their authority on the royal council, however, Mazarin allied with Parlement and had them arrested. A new Fronde then broke out. The provinces rebelled and the princes' troops confronted those of the king. Parlement finally turned against Mazarin, who had to seek safety in flight to the empire as a price had been placed on his head (1651). The Queen and her ministers continued to receive Mazarin's advice from abroad. The court again left Paris, and troops restored order in the provinces. Mazarin rejoined the court but left a second time to allow the king to enter Paris, Oct. 21, 1652. The die-hard Frondeur Cardinal de RETZ (Paul de Gondi, coadjutor of Paris) was arrested December 19 by order of the young king, and on February 3 Mazarin returned to the capital. Former Frondeurs submitted or went abroad, as did Condé, who went over to the service of Spain.

The Spanish War. Mazarin then had to finish the war against Spain. He gained an alliance with Cromwell, and Turenne's victory over Condé at the Dunes (June 14, 1657) hastened the end of the war. Mazarin persuaded the king to renounce his love for Maria Mancini, the cardinal's niece, in favor of a Spanish marriage to seal the peace. The Treaty of the Pyrenees, signed Nov. 7, 1659, gave France Artois and Roussillon, which Richelieu had already occupied. Louis XIV married the Infanta Maria Teresa, June 9, 1660. For all practical purposes, Austria had lost her preponderance in Europe to France, and the French nobility and parlements gave way to an absolute monarchy.

As the Italian minister of a Spanish regent, Mazarin brought to fruition the work of Richelieu. He was adaptable and better able to raise great hopes than to inspire fear. Aside from his trust in his own destiny, his great strength was that he could always rely on the support of the queen, who was so close to him that there were rumors of a secret marriage between them. This hypothesis had no basis of fact, nor did the attacks in pamphlets (Mazarinades) against the private life of the cardinal.

Relations with Rome. Mazarin, a cardinal deacon, never received Holy Orders. The king made him bishop of Metz, but he resigned the see before he was consecrated. His relations with Rome were not smooth. Innocent X was elected against his explicit instructions, and he could not conceal his irritation. He supported his former protectors, the two cardinals BARBERINI, against the pope. He was unwilling for Cardinal de Retz, who became archbishop of Paris while imprisoned at Vincennes, to govern his diocese. He criticized Innocent X and Alexander VII for sympathy with Spain and kept them out of negotiations for the Treaties of Westphalia and the Pyrenees. Nonetheless, in the Jansenist quarrel he presided over the assemblies of bishops that received the bull condemning the five propositions of the AUGUSTINUS, and he encouraged the Assembly of the Clergy of 1660 to require the clergy to sign its formula (see ASSEMBLIES OF FRENCH CLERGY). During his ministry the Council of Conscience was instituted to assure good episcopal appointments, and at one time VINCENT DE PAUL was called to it. Mazarin obtained the dissolution of the COMPAGNIE DU SAINT-SACREMENT, which vowed a secret fight against libertines and heretics. Protestants could but praise his rule, depending as it did on the Protestant princes of Germany and later on Cromwell.

The Bibliothèque Mazarin. Louis XIV, whose political education Mazarin supervised, let him govern until his death. The immense fortune he amassed and the precious collections he carefully accumulated were divided among his relatives. But the Bibliothèque Mazarin and the Bibliothèque Nationale still hold many valuable books that he acquired and then made available to scholars by bequeathing them to the Collège des Quatre Nations, which he had founded. It was in the Mazarin Library that the famed Latin Bible of 42 Lines was found. This folio of 1282 pages in two columns of 42 lines is known as the Mazarin Bible. Its printing, first ascribed to Johann Gutenberg (d. c. 1468), was more likely set by his partner Johann Fust and his son-in-law Peter Schöffer, who continued Gutenberg's printing establishment in Mainz

Bibliography: J. MAZARIN, Lettres du cardinal Mazarin pendant son ministère, ed. A. CHÉRUEL and G. D'AVENEL, 9 v. (Paris 1872–1906). For lack of a definitive study of Mazarin, one should consult general histories: A. CHÉRUEL, Histoire de France pendant la minorité de Louis XIV, 4 v. (Paris 1879–1880); Histoire de France sous le ministère de Mazarin (1651–1661), 3 v. (Paris 1882). G. DETHAN, "Mazarin avant le ministère," Revue historique 227 (1962) 33–66. Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, Mazarin: Homme d'état et collectionneur (Paris 1961). S. SKALWEITT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:217.

[P. BLET]

MAZENOD, CHARLES JOSEPH EUGÈNE DE, ST.

Also known as Eugène de Mazenod, bishop, founder of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate; b. Aug. 1, 1782, Aixen-Provence, France; d. May 21, 1861, Marseilles, France.

Mazenod was the son of the president of the Board of Excise in Provence, who belonged to the nobility of the robe. During the FRENCH REVOLUTION, he immigrated with his family in April 1791 to Nice, Turin, Venice, and Palermo without being able to undertake regular studies. He returned to France in 1802 and decided, after a grave personal religious crisis, to become a priest. During his three years at Saint-Sulpice seminary, he was profoundly influenced by Msgr. Emery and participated in the Catholic resistance in favor of Pius VII and the black cardinals. Upon returning to Aix after ordination in 1811, the young priest devoted himself to ministering to the poor and to an association for youths.

In 1817, he became interested in popular missions. To promote them he founded a community that was the germ of the OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE. When his uncle, Fortuné de Mazenod, became bishop of Marseilles in 1823, he made Charles his vicar-general. Mazenod became a titular bishop in 1832 and succeeded his uncle as bishop in 1837. During these years Mazenod devoted himself to the restoration and reorganization of the diocese, while acting as superior general of his missionary institute, which received the approval of the Holy See in 1826.

St. Charles Joseph Eugène de Mazenod.

Mazenod played a very active role also in the religious affairs of France and in 1856 became a senator of the Second Empire. In Marseilles he confronted difficult spiritual and material problems created by the changed economic and social situation in the city, whose population had doubled. The bishop established the structures used in the diocese for the next half-century and more. He created 22 parishes, rebuilt the cathedral, Notre-Dame de la Garde, and 25 other churches, increased clerical recruitment, and promoted religious congregations. The most celebrated of the societies inaugurated by him was Timon David for young workers.

Membership in the Oblates remained small until 1843 and then grew rapidly when Mazenod began to accept missions in Canada, U.S., Ceylon, and South Africa. In these lands the Oblate apostolate bore remarkable results.

Mazenod was an ardent ultramontane but displayed moderation in the controversies concerning the classics, the liturgy, Gallicanism, and liberalism. He supported Hugues Félicité de Lamennais in Rome to the end. On the other had, he was intransigent and resolute concerning educational freedom and the Roman Question.

Upon his death in 1861 he was buried in the cathedral of Marseilles. Mazenod's cause was introduced in Rome in 1936. He was beatified on Oct. 19, 1975, and canonized by John Paul II on Dec. 3, 1995. He is the patron of bishops, broken homes, dysfunctional families, evangelizers and missionaries, exiles, families in crisis, founders, those struggling with their vocations, and troubled marriages.

Feast: May 21 (Oblates of Mary Immaculate).

Bibliography: Lettres aux correspondants d'Amérique (Rome 1977). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 68 (1976) 241–243. Beatificationis et canonizationis servi Dei Caroli Iosephi Eugenii de Mazenod (Rome 1968). L. N. BOUTIN, Le double charisme du bienheureux Joseph-Eugène de Mazenod (Montréal 1978). R. ETCHEGARAY, Petite vie de Eugène de Mazenod (Paris 1995). A. HUBENIG, Living in the Spirit's Fire (Toronto 1995). J. LEFLON, Eugène de Mazenod, évèque de Marseille, fondateur des missionaires oblats de Marie Immaculée, 3 v. (Paris 1957–65), Eng. tr. F. D. FLANAGAN (Washington, D.C. 1994). S. C. LORIT, La scelta dei poveri: vita di Eugenio de Mazenod (Rome 1975). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., 44 (1975): 6–7; 49 (1995): 1–2. A. ROCHE, Le Bienheureux Eugène de Mazenod: Évêque de Marseille, fondateur des missionnaires oblats de Marie-Immaculée (Lyon 1975). G. SANTOLINI, Evangelizzazione e missione (Bologna 1984).

[J. LEFLON/EDS]

MAZZARELLA, MODESTINO, BL.

Baptized Domenico, known in religion as Modestino of Jesus and Mary, Franciscan Alcantarine priest; b. Sept. 5, 1802, Frattamaggiore, Naples, Italy; died July 24, 1854, Naples.

Domenico was the fourth child in a pious, workingclass family headed by Nicolà Mazzarella, a cordmaker, and his wife Teresa Espósito, a weaver. In his youth Domenico showed such devotion as an altar boy and as patron of Our Lady of Good Counsel that Bishop Agostino Tommasi sponsored his seminary studies at Aversa (1820–21). After Tommasi's death (1821), Domenico continued his education at home.

In 1822, he joined the Franciscans at Grumo Nevano and received the habit and name Modestino at Piedimon-te Matese in Caserta (Nov. 3, 1822). Following his novitiate at Santa Lucia del Monte, Naples, he was professed (Nov. 27, 1824), completed his studies at the convents of Grumo Nevano, Portici, and Santa Lucia, and was ordained priest at Aversa cathedral (Dec. 22, 1827). Thereafter he served in various roles within the order, including guardian of the friaries of Mirabella Eclano (Avellino) and Pignataro Maggiore (Caserta). In 1839, he was transferred to Santa Maria della Sanità in a populous Neopolitan slum, where he distinguished himself through his defense of life. He worked among the poor until his death from cholera, contracted while ministering to other victims of the epidemic.

A miracle attributed to Modestino's intercession was approved Dec. 23, 1993. Modestino was beatified by Pope John Paul II, Jan. 29, 1995.

Feast: July 24.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 249.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MAZZARELLO, MARIA DOMENICA, ST.

Cofoundress of the SALESIAN SISTERS; b. Marnese (Piedmont), Italy, May 9, 1837; d. Nizza Monferrato, May 14, 1881. Maria's parents, Giuseppe and Maddelena (Calcagno) Mazzarello, were farmers, and she worked in the fields and vineyards as a young girl. As a member of a local sodality, the Pious Union of Daughters of Mary Immaculate, she followed a regular rule of life and taught catechism. An attack of typhoid in 1860 caused her to give up heavy field labor and to work at dressmaking. Soon she was instructing girls in the trade. The sodality impressed St. John BOSCO during a visit to the village (1865). When his scheme for a boys' school at Marnese failed, he installed Mazzarello and her companions in the building. The Daughters of Our Lady Help of Christians, or Salesian Sisters, originated when Mazzarello, with ten companions, received the habit and pronounced first vows (Aug. 5, 1872). She was the first superior general of the congregation, whose rule was written by Bosco. The congregation's work was the education of poor girls, following the same methods and principles as the Salesian Fathers. In 1878 Mazzarello sent the first missionary sisters to Argentina. She moved in 1879 to the new motherhouse at Nizza Monferrato. By the time of her death the Salesian Sisters had opened more than 30 houses in Italy, France, and Latin America, and had 250 members. Mazzarello was beatified Nov. 20, 1938, and canonized June 24, 1951.

Feast: May 14.

Bibliography: H. L. HUGHES, Maria Mazzarello: Life and Times (London 1933). F. MACCONO, Suor Maria Mazzarello prima superiora generale delle Figlie dei Marie Ausiliatrice (4th ed. Turin 1960). A. DE LIMA, A Santa Salesiana Maria Domingas Mazzarello (Belo Horizonte 1971). L. CÀSTANO, Madre Mazzarello: santa e confondatrice delle Figlie di Maria Ausiliatrice (Turin 1981). P. LAPPIN, Halfway to Heaven (New Rochelle, N.Y. 1981). D. AGASSO, St. Mary Mazzarello: The Spirit of Joy, tr. L. PASSERO (Boston 1996). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 44 (1952) 553–565. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:313–314.

[T. P. JOYCE]

MAZZELLA, CAMILLO

Jesuit theologian, cardinal, noted for his contribution to the scholastic revival in the late 19th century; b. Vitulano, Italy, Feb. 10, 1833; d. Rome, March 26, 1900. He studied in the seminary of Benevento, which was directed by the Jesuits, and after his ordination in 1855 he entered the Society of Jesus (1857). At Lyons from 1860 to 1867, he completed his studies and was assigned to lecture in dogmatic theology for three years and in moral theology for two. He was in the U.S. from 1867 to 1878, lecturing on the same subjects at Georgetown University and Woodstock College. Leo XIII raised him to the chair of theology in the Gregorian University in 1878. He held this position for seven years, contributing significantly to the scholastic revival there. He was made a cardinal deacon in 1886, and the cardinal bishop of Palestrina in 1897. His later life was taken up with labors in the Roman Congregations of Studies and Rites, of both of which he was appointed prefect. He was known as an extremely creative theologian and an eminent representative of the neo-Thomistic movement. His period of publication dates from 1880 to his death; his works deal mainly with dogmatic theology, various questions concerning the reunion of the Greek Churches with Rome, and certain contemporary controversies involving Rosmini.

Bibliography: La civiltà cattolica 17.10 (1900) 91–95, obituary. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934); photoduplicated with rev. and suppl., 2 v. (Louvain-Heverlee 1962) 2:1187.

[J. FLYNN]

MAZZOLINI, SYLVESTER

Dominican theologian (known also as Mazolini, Mozolini, or Prierias); b. Priero, Piedmont, 1460; d. Rome, 1523. He entered the Dominican Order in 1475 and manifested a brilliant grasp of the disciplines in his course of studies. He taught theology at Bologna, Pavia (by invitation of the senate of Venice), and was called by Julius II to Rome in 1511. On the advice of Cardinal Cajetan, Leo X named him master of the sacred palace in 1515, an office he held until his death. His voluminous writings include treatises on the planets, the power of the demons, history, homiletics, the works of St. Thomas Aquinas, and the primacy of the popes. Because of his position as master of the sacred palace, Mazzolini was the first theologian to write a forceful attack on the doctrine of Martin Luther. When Luther replied to Mazzolini's arguments, the latter published rejoinders, and a lively controversy thrived between them, especially on the question of papal supremacy, which Mazzolini saw as basic in the disagreement. His principal works are: De juridica et irrefragabili veritate Romanae Ecclesiae Romanique Pontificis (Rome 1520); Epitoma responsionis ad Lutherum (Perugia 1519); Errata et argumenta M. Lutheri (Rome 1520); Summa summarum, quae Sylvestrina dicitur . . . (Rome 1519); Rosa aurea (Bologna 1510), an explanation of the Gospels used during the liturgical year; and In theoricas planetarum (Venice 1513).

Bibliography: M. M. GORCE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 10.1:474–477. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.1:55–58. F. MICHALSKI, De Sylvestri Prieratis . . . vita et scriptis (Munster 1892). H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 2:1344–47.

[F. C. LEHNER]

MAZZUCCONI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, BL.

Missionary priest, martyr of the Pontifical Institute for Foreign Missions; b. March 1, 1826, Rancio di Lecco (near Milan), Italy; d. Sept. 7, 1855, Woodlark Bay, Papua New Guinea.

The ninth of the 12 children of Giacomo Mazzucconi and Anna Maria Scuri, Mazzucconi studied in the seminaries of Monza and Milan. In the summer of 1845, he and his friend Carlo Salerio met the prior of the Certosa of Pavia, who had been a missionary in India. This sparked an interest in the young men, who maintained correspondence with the priest. In the meantime Giovanni was ordained May 25, 1850, and the Pontifical Institute for Foreign Missions (PIME) was established with apostolic approval. Two months later in July 1850, Mazzucconi received an invitation from Msgr. Angelo Ramazzotti to become a charter member of the PIME, together with Father Salerio, three other clergymen (Timoleone Raimondi, Angelo Ambrosoli, and Paolo Reina), and two catechists (Giuseppe Corti and Luigi Tacchini).

They intended to go first to Oceania. Following a three-month journey, the missionaries arrived July 25, 1852, in Australia, where they studied the language and customs of New Guinea under the tutelage of a Marist for two months. Upon their arrival at Woodlark Island Oct. 28, 1852, the mission was divided into three groups with Mazzucconi, Reina, a catechist, and their Marist mentor continuing to Rook Island, where they worked for two years under difficult conditions. The missionaries attempted to gain the trust of the natives by helping and teaching them new agricultural methods.

After their attempts failed, Mazzuconi returned to Sydney January 1855, where he became seriously ill. Upon his recovery, he sailed Aug. 18, 1855, back to Woodlark not knowing that his companions had abandoned the mission stations at Woodlark and Rook. When his schooner ran aground on a coral reef, he was killed with an axe by one of the locals. Eight months later Father Raimondi led an expedition to find Mazzucconi and learned of his martyrdom.

Mazzucconi was beatified by Pope John Paul II, Feb. 19, 1984.

Feast: Sept. 10 (Archdiocese of Milan).

Bibliography: P. GHEDDO, Mazzucconi di Woodlark: un martire per il nostro tempo (Bologna 1983); Missione i Oceania: Giovanni Mazzucconi, martire a Woodlark (Turin 1984). N. MAESTRINI, Mazzucconi of Woodlark: Biography of Blessed John Mazzucconi (Detroit 1983). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1984) 300. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 12 (1984) 3-4.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

MAZZUCHELLI, SAMUEL

Dominican missionary and founder of the Sinsinawa Dominican Sisters; b. Milan, Italy, Nov. 4, 1806; d. Benton, Wis., Feb. 23, 1864. Mazzuchelli was the son of Louis Mazzuchelli, a Milanese banker, and Rachel (Merlini) Mazzuchelli. He was educated by the Somaschi Fathers at Lugano and entered the Dominican Order at St. Andrew's, Faenza, where he made his profession on Dec. 6, 1824. After study at S. Sabina and the Minerva in Rome, he was sent to the American missions in 1828. After being ordained in Cincinnati, Ohio, by Bp. Edward D. Fenwick, OP, on Sept. 5, 1830, he was assigned to Mackinac, Mich., where no priest had resided for 60 years.

Working among the scattered settlers of the Upper Peninsula of Michigan and northeastern Wisconsin, he built the first church in Wisconsin at Green Bay and established a school for Menominee children. Beginning in 1833, he visited the Winnebago near Portage, Wis., and compiled a prayer book for their use, perhaps the first publication in their dialect. When obliged to leave these missions, he settled in Galena, Ill., and Dubuque, Iowa; in 1835 he began churches in both villages. With the erection of the See of Dubuque in 1837 and the arrival of Bp. Matthias Loras in 1839, Mazzuchelli became vicar-general of the diocese. He built more than 20 churches and designed the old Market House in Galena. The courthouses in Galena; Ft. Madison, Iowa; and Dodgeville, Iowa; were his design, and he was responsible in part for the planning and design of the old state capitol in Iowa City, Iowa.

In 1843, after a serious illness, Mazzuchelli returned to Milan, where he published his Memoirs. In 1844, he became a missionary apostolic authorized to establish the Dominican Order on the banks of the upper Mississippi; the following year he founded a novitiate and built several small churches. He opened Sinsinawa Mound College for boys in southwestern Wisconsin, 1846. Three years later, when his collaborators failed him, he turned the foundation over to the Dominican Fathers of St. Joseph's Province. He continued, however, to direct a small community of Dominican Sisters that he had initiated at Sinsinawa in 1847 and that he transferred to Benton, Wis., in 1852. He resided as pastor at Benton from 1849 until he died while ministering to the sick during an epidemic.

Bibliography: R. CREPEAU, Un Apôtre Dominicain aux États Unis: Le Père Samuel Charles Gaétan Mazzuchelli (Paris 1932). S. MAZZUCHELLI, The Memoirs of Father Samuel Mazzuchelli, tr. M. ARMATO and M. FINNEGAN (Chicago 1967). M. N. MCGREAL, Samuel Mazzuchelli O.P.: A Kaleidoscope of Scenes from His Life (Sinsinawa, Wis. 1994).

[J. B. WALKER]

MCAULEY, CATHERINE ELIZABETH

Foundress of the Sisters of MERCY; b. Dublin, Ireland, Sept. 29, 1778; d. there, Nov. 10, 1841. After the death of her parents, Catherine was reared by Protestant foster parents, who left her a large legacy. Gradually she was attracted to helping the poor of Dublin. To this end she built a school for poor children and a residence for working women in Baggot Street, called the House of Mercy, which opened in 1827. Soon after this she added an employment agency and an orphanage as other young women came to help her. After deciding to form a religious congregation, she and two companions went to the Presentation Convent in Dublin to make their noviceship. They took simple vows (Dec. 12, 1831), and the Sisters of Mercy came into existence. When Mother McAuley applied to Rome for approval of her constitution, she stated that "the principal purpose of this congregation is to educate poor little girls, to lodge and maintain poor young ladies who are in danger, that they may be provided for in a proper manner, and to visit the sick poor." In 1839 Mother McAuley established a house in London, the first one outside Ireland. Since then the Sisters of Mercy have grown to be the largest religious congregation ever founded in the English-speaking world.

Bibliography: M. B. DEGNAN, Mercy Unto Thousands: Life of Mother Mary Catherine McAuley (Westminster, MD 1957). M. E. EVANS, The Spirit is Mercy (Westminster, MD 1959). E. A. RYAN, "The Sisters of Mercy: An Important Chapter in Church History," Theological Studies 18 (1957) 254–270.

[E. MCDERMOTT]

MCCAFFREY, JOHN HENRY

Educator; b. Emmitsburg, Maryland, Sept. 6, 1806; d. Emmitsburg, Sept. 26, 1881. He attended Mt. St. Mary's College and Seminary, Emmitsburg, and became a deacon in 1831, but deferred ordination to the priesthood for seven years. Meantime he taught at the college and served as its vice president from 1834 to 1837. In 1837 he entered St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Maryland, and he was ordained to the priesthood on March 9, 1838. Upon returning to Mt. St. Mary's, he was immediately elected president and he served in this capacity until March 21, 1872, when he resigned because of ill health and was named president emeritus. He won notice for his pro-Southern views during the Civil War period. Under his administration, Mt. St. Mary's rose to a position of commanding importance in the Church in the United States. Twenty-six of its clergy were raised to the episcopate, including Cardinal John McCloskey and Archbishops John Hughes, John B. Purcell, Robert Seton, and Michael A. Corrigan. Preferring to train bishops, McCaffrey refused bishoprics for himself (Natchez, Savannah, Charleston). In 1871 archbishop John L. Spalding suggested that a Catholic university of America be established at "the Mt. St. Mary's of John McCaffrey." McCaffrey was also active in the field of theology. Cardinal McCloskey and Archbishops Francis Patrick Kenrick and John L. Spalding chose him to act as their theologian at various Councils of Baltimore. Thirty-four years of pastoral service at the college church enabled him to develop his own Catechism, which was sent in 1865 to the bishops and priests of the country for critical comment. A revised version was proposed to the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore by Spalding, who recommended its adoption as the standard Catechism for the United States. The Baltimore Catechism that was later adopted closely followed the format, arrangement, and wording of Mc-Caffrey's work (see BALTIMORE, COUNCILS OF).

Bibliography: Archives, Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Maryland. M. M. MELINE and E. F. X. MCSWEENEY, The Story of the Mountain: Mt. St. Mary's College and Seminary, 2 v. (Emmitsburg, Maryland 1911).

[G. D. MULCAHY]

MCCLOSKEY, JOHN

First United States cardinal, second archbishop of NEW YORK ARCHDIOCESE; b. Brooklyn, New York, March 10, 1810; d. New York City, Oct. 10, 1885. His parents, Patrick and Elizabeth (Harron) McCloskey, emigrated from Dungiven, County Derry, Ireland, in 1808 and settled in Brooklyn, New York, where his father became a clerk in the firm of H. B. Pierrepont and Company. John received his early education in a school for boys conducted by Mrs. Charlotte Milmoth, a retired English actress, and, after his parents moved to New York City (1817), in a Latin school kept by Thomas Brady. As a member of St. Peter's Church he was guided and influenced by the pastor, John POWER, and his assistant Peter Malou, SJ. Cornelius Heeney, a wealthy and philanthropic merchant, on the death of the boy's father (1820) became his guardian and arranged his entrance into Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Maryland, in September 1821. Here, profiting from direction by and association with John DUBOIS, Simon BRUTÉ, John HUGHES, and John PURCELL, all to become prominent members of the American hierarchy, he completed the college course. In 1827 he returned to Mt. St. Mary's as a seminarian and was ordained by Bishop Dubois of New York in old St. Patrick's Cathedral on Jan. 12, 1834, the first native of New York State to enter the diocesan priesthood. His assignment as professor of philosophy in the new seminary at Nyack, New York, ended as did the school, with the disastrous fire there in the late summer of 1834. In November McCloskey left New York to spend the next three years studying at the Gregorian University in Rome and traveling in Italy, Germany, Belgium, France, England, and Ireland.

Early Career. Upon return to New York in 1837, he was appointed rector of St. Joseph's Church where for nine months he encountered the hostility of pewholders and trustees, to whom Dubois had refused a pastor of their own choosing and who now withheld the pastor's salary. Finally, by mild persistence and gentle forbearance, traits characteristic of his whole career, McCloskey won the affection and loyalty of both congregation and trustees. In 1841 bishop John Hughes added to his responsibilities the post of first president of St. John's College (later Fordham University) which, after he had organized the college, he relinquished in the following year. On March 10, 1844, he was consecrated titular bishop of Axiere and coadjutor, with right of succession, to Hughes.

In a diocese that then comprised the whole of New York State and half of New Jersey, he assisted Hughes by making espiscopal visitations and settling trustee difficulties in numerous parishes. He was instrumental in the conversion of James Roosevelt BAYLEY (1842), later archbishop of Baltimore, and in 1844 he received into the Church Isaac HECKER, subsequently founder of the PAUL-ISTS. When the New York diocese was reduced in size by the creation of the Sees of Albany and Buffalo, McCloskey was transferred and formally installed as first bishop of Albany on Sept. 19, 1847. During his 17-year pontificate, the diocese, including over two-thirds of the area of the state, experienced a threefold growth of churches and priests and a rise in the number of Catholic schools from two to 19. He overcame trustee problems, welcomed various religious communities into the diocese, constructed the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception, and, in cooperation with Archbishop Hughes, prepared the way for the establishment of St. Joseph's Provincial Seminary in Troy. His attempt to prevent passage in the Albany legislature of Putnam's Bill of 1855, which was aimed at prohibiting Catholic bishops from passing on church property to their successors and thus forcing them to depend on the trustee system, was unsuccessful. The law, however, remained a dead letter and was repealed seven years later. Despite the popular anti-Catholic temper of the times, of which Putnam's Bill was a token, the bishop himself won the respect of such prominent state figures as Governor Horatio Seymour, Erastus Corning, Rufus King, and Thurlow Weed.

Archbishop and Cardinal. The metropolitan see of New York became vacant in January of 1864 with the death of Hughes. Although McCloskey had resigned all right of succession when he went to Albany, his name was first on the list of recommendations submitted by the bishops of the province to Rome. After an unsuccessful attempt to avert the honor, he was named archbishop of New York on May 6, 1864, and formally installed in old St. Patrick's Cathedral on August 21. His administration was singularly free of the controversies of his predecessor and of the problems of his successor Michael A. COR-RIGAN. He resumed construction of the new cathedral, begun in 1858 but suspended during the Civil War. He made two trips to Europe to collect funds and furnishings for it and dedicated on May 25, 1879, what was then the largest Gothic structure in the United States. He rebuilt old St. Patrick's Cathedral after its destruction by fire in 1866. News of this disaster reached him just before he ascended the pulpit to preach the opening sermon at the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, where he was the youngest archbishop.

In a pastoral letter of March 1866, he successfully admonished his people, the majority of whom were of Irish descent, against participation in the Fenian movement, with its schemes of armed intervention in Ireland and in Canada. He welcomed numerous religious communities into the archdiocese, settled the longstanding difficulties Hughes had had with the Jesuits, and gave particular encouragement to the Sisters of Charity, to Hecker's new Paulist community, and to the pioneer Belgian priests and brothers who arrived in 1864 to conduct his provincial seminary in Troy. His patronage likewise enabled Dr. Levi Silliman IVES, a noted convert, to establish the New York Protectory and Father John DRUM-GOOLE to set up his Mission of the Immaculate Virgin. At Vatican Council I (1869–70) he was a member of the commission on discipline and opposed a definition of papal infallibility as inopportune. However, at the final session on the subject, he voted in the affirmative.

He was named a cardinal by Pope Pius IX in the public consistory of March 15, 1875, and was invested in old St. Patrick's Cathedral the following April 27, receiving the red biretta from Archbishop Bayley of Baltimore. In September of the same year he visited Rome to take possession of his titular church, Santa Maria sopra Minerva. Three years later, although he arrived in Rome too late to attend the conclave that elected Leo XIII, he assisted at the coronation of the new pope and received formally from him the cardinal's hat in the consistory of March 28, 1878. The cardinalitial rank, which he bore in dignity, was acclaimed throughout the country in gratification that an American citizen had gained the highest honor of the Holy See.

In 1880 he welcomed to New York bishop Michael A. Corrigan of Newark, as coadjutor with right of succession. Thereafter age and declining health compelled Mc-Closkey to withdraw gradually from the more taxing phases of the management of his large archdiocese. Although he convoked and presided over the fourth provincial council of New York in September 1883, the preparation of the agenda and the conduct of the business were largely the work of his coadjutor. His last public act was a successful appeal, again through his coadjutor, to President Chester Arthur and Secretary of State Frederick T. Frelinghuysen to protect the American College in Rome, as property of American citizens, from spoliation by the Italian government (1884). He spent the final year of his life in retirement and died at Mt. St. Vincent-on-Hudson. His body lies beneath the high altar in the new St. Patrick's Cathedral.

Bibliography: J. M. FARLEY, The Life of John Cardinal Mc-Closkey (New York 1918). J. T. SMITH, The Catholic Church in New York, 2 v. (New York 1905) v.2.

[J. A. REYNOLDS]

MCCLOSKEY, WILLIAM GEORGE

Fifth bishop of LOUISVILLE, Kentucky, and first rector of the NORTH AMERICAN COLLEGE, Rome; b. Brooklyn, New York, Nov. 10, 1823; d. Louisville, Ky., Sept. 17, 1909. He was the fifth son of George and Ellen (Kenny) McCloskey; two of his brothers, John and George, also became priests. He was educated at Mt. St. Mary's College and Seminary, Emmitsburg, Maryland. After ordination on Oct. 6, 1852, he spent a year in parish work in New York and four years teaching at his alma mater; in 1859 he was appointed first rector of the newly established North American College at Rome. Although the nine years of his rectorate were successful in the academic and spiritual spheres, the financial administration of the college was rendered difficult by the circumstances of the American Civil War.

On March 3, 1868, McCloskey was named bishop of Louisville, and he was consecrated in the college chapel May 24, 1868. He assumed his episcopal duties on Oct. 11, 1868, and for more than 41 years directed the growth of the mother diocese of the Middle West. During that time the Catholic population of the diocese, comprising 23,000 square miles of central and western Kentucky, increased from 80,000 to more than 155,000; the number of priests grew from 84 to 201; almost 100 new churches were built; and religious and charitable institutions were greatly expanded.

McCloskey's independent and authoritarian disposition led to several unfortunate conflicts with some of his priests over canonical details of their pastorates, as well as to periods of friction with religious institutes. Despite this, he held no rancor toward his contestants and was a zealous shepherd, making frequent visitations of his diocese, directing collections for various appeals even from outside his diocese, and exhibiting a constant personal concern for the poor and for the needs of his priests, especially the aged and infirm.

McCloskey observed his twenty-fifth episcopal anniversary on May 23, 1893, and his sacerdotal golden jubilee in October 1902; he lived to become the dean and nestor of the American hierarchy. He was buried in the cemetery of the Sisters of Charity at Nazareth, Kentucky.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of Louisville, Kentucky. R. F. MCNAMARA, The American College in Rome: 1855–1955 (Rochester 1956). J. B. CODE, Dictionary of the American Hierarchy, 1789–1964 (2d ed. New York 1964).

[C. C. BOLDRICK]

MCCORMICK, RICHARD A.

Jesuit, moral theologian, writer; b. Oct. 3, 1922, Toledo, Ohio; d. Feb. 12, 2000, Clarkston, Mich., the son of Edward J. McCormick, a distinguished physician and sometime president of the American Medical Association, and Josephine Beck McCormick. McCormick entered the Society of Jesus in 1940; he then studied philosophy at the Jesuit seminary in West Baden Indiana. Beginning in 1947 he taught English and Greek at St. Ignatius High School, Cleveland, before returning to West Baden in 1950 to study theology. McCormick was ordained a priest in 1953. He attended the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome (1955-57), where he earned a doctorate in moral theology. From 1957 to 1973, he taught moral theology at the Jesuit theologate, which during those years moved from West Baden to Chicago. In 1974, he was named the Rose F. Kennedy Professor of Christian Ethics at the Kennedy Institute of Ethics at Georgetown University, and in 1986 he became the John A. O'Brien Professor of Christian Ethics at the University of Notre Dame.

McCormick's numerous articles in theological and medical journals as well as in Catholic intellectual journals of opinion, especially the Jesuit magazine America, for which he once served as an associate editor, gained him an international reputation. McCormick's most important publications were the "Notes on Moral Theology" he published annually in Theological Studies (1965-84). These notes were subsequently collected in two volumes-Notes on Moral Theology, 1965-80 (Washington 1981) and Notes on Moral Theology 1981-84 (Lanham, Md. 1984). He authored How Brave a New World? Dilemmas in Bioethics (Garden City, N.Y. 1981) and Health and Medicine in the Catholic Tradition (New York, 1984). The volume he edited with Paul Ramsey, Doing Evil to Achieve Good: Moral Choice in Conflict Situations (Chicago 1978), brings together theologians from different churches and philosophers who discussed McCormick's theory of proportionalism. McCormick was co-editor with Charles E. Curran of eleven volumes in the series Readings in Moral Theology (Paulist Press). His last two books were collections of essays: The Critical Calling: Moral Dilemmas Since Vatican II (Washington, 1989) and Corrective Vision: Explorations in Moral Theology (Kansas City, Mo. 1994).

The time frame in which McCormick wrote witnessed a significant change toward a more academic understanding of the discipline itself. Prior to the 1960s, moral theology was associated with the seminary and the manuals of moral theology had as their purpose the training of confessors. The second VATICAN COUNCIL specifically called for a life-oriented moral theology that would reflect on the totality of the Christian life, including the vocation to perfection and holiness. Vatican II urged new methodological approaches that would give more prominence to the role of the Scriptures, seek to bridge the gulf between faith and daily life as well as the separation between the supernatural and the natural, recognize the importance of historicity, and engage in dialogue with other theological disciplines. The post-conciliar period was a time of great ferment in the theological disciplines. Pope PAUL VI's encyclical HUMANAE VITAE in 1968 reiterated the condemnation of artificial contraception for spouses and raised the two issues that dominated much of Catholic moral theology in succeeding decades, namely, the existence and grounding of absolute moral norms such as the condemnation of contraception, and practical questions of ecclesiology regarding the role and function of hierarchical teaching on moral matters and the proper response of Catholics. With his characteristic clarity and incisiveness, McCormick insisted on the [progresssive?] processive nature of the search for moral truth by all in the church and pointed out that the hierarchical church has a learning function as well as a teaching function. He firmly defended the possibility—and even the need—to dissent from some non-infallible church teaching. Mc-Cormick's early training and extensive knowledge of the manualist tradition continued to influence him, but over the years he modified his position on a number of significant issues. He himself listed ten areas in which his theological views changed: the nature of the church, the importance of lay witness, ecumenism and the search for moral truth, the role of dissent, the changeable and the unchangeable in the church, certainty and uncertainty, effective teaching in the church, the imperative of honesty, and the dynamic nature of faith.

In the course of his academic career, McCormick challenged and disagreed with the hierarchy's positions on specific points of sexual and marital ethics and some conflict situations, but he staunchly defended the very early beginning of the truly human life of the fetus and the condemnation of active euthanasia. In dealing with the question of absolute norms in moral theology, Mc-Cormick developed a theory of proportionalism by which he sought to establish a middle position between the traditional neoscholastic natural law approach, on the one hand, and a utilitarianism or consequentialism, on the other hand. The natural law with its theological acceptance of human sources of moral wisdom and knowledge and its philosophical emphasis on a realistic epistemology formed the basis for his understanding of moral theology. He proposed an understanding of natural law that involved a shift from classicism to historical consciousness with a greater emphasis on human experience, a move to the person and the subject away from the emphasis on the natural and the given, a development away from the teaching of the manuals that tended to identify the human and the moral with the physical structure of the act, and a change from the deontological or law model of the manuals of moral theology. While he recognized the need to incorporate both Scripture and systematic theology into moral theology, these two aspects are more implicit than explicit in his work.

McCormick served as a president of the CATHOLIC THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA and was the recipient of its Cardinal Spellman Award as "Outstanding Theologian of the Year" in 1969. In addition to his service in many Catholic institutions and societies, he was the recipient of numerous honorary degrees. A member of the Ethics Advisory Board of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, he served on ethics committees of the American Hospital Association, the National Hospice Organization, and the American Fertility Society. In 1990, he was elected to membership in the prestigious American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

McCormick never fully recovered from the stroke he suffered in June of 1999, and he died at the Jesuit Health-care Community at Colombiere Center in Clarkston, Mich. The funeral liturgy was celebrated at Gesù Jesuit Church in Toledo, Feb. 17, 2000, with burial in the Jesuit cemetery next door. His papers are at Loyola University of Chicago.

[C. E. CURRAN]

MCDEVITT, JOHN W.

Knights of Columbus executive and educator; b. Malden, Massachusetts, Dec. 27, 1906; d. New Haven, Connecticut, Dec. 6, 1994. John W. McDevitt was eleventh supreme knight of the KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS, a position he held from February 1964 until he retired in January 1977. Having earned B.A. and M.A. degrees from Boston College, between 1942 and 1961 McDevitt taught, served as principal at Malden High School in Malden, and was superintendent of schools in Waltham, Massachusetts. During this period, he chaired the Massachusetts State Board of Education and served on various school boards. Long active in the Knights of Columbus in Massachusetts, he joined the Knights' headquarters staff in New Haven in 1961 as deputy supreme knight and was elected supreme knight six years later following the death of Luke E. Hart.

As head of the Catholic fraternal society in an era of rapid social and ecclesiastical change and frequent controversy, McDevitt encouraged the Knights to abandon admissions practices sometimes used for racial discrimination, place more emphasis on family life, and cultivate improved relations with the U.S. bishops and the Holy See, while continuing to uphold doctrinal and moral orthodoxy and cultural conservatism. Under his leadership, the Knights donated the land for the new audience hall to the Vatican, began a continuing program of funding the uplink costs of satellite telecasts for major papal ceremonies in Rome several times a year, and extended collaboration and support to such U.S. Church entities as the John La Farge Institute, the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate, and the United States Catholic Conference's Task Force on Urban Problems. During McDevitt's tenure, membership in the Knights rose from approximately 1,150,000 to 1,250,000, and the organization's insurance program grew significantly. He was succeeded as supreme knight of the Knights of Columbus by Virgil C. Dechant.

Bibliography: C. J. KAUFFMAN, Faith and Fraternalism: The History of the Knights of Columbus, rev. ed. (New York 1992); "John W. McDevitt," Columbia (May 1983).

[R. SHAW]

MCDONALD, BARNABAS EDWARD, BROTHER

Youth leader; b. Ogdensburg, NY, July 20, 1865; d. Santa Fe, NM, Apr. 22, 1929. Born Edward P. McDonald, he entered the Christian Brothers' schools in 1885. A vocational recruiter (1890–1901), he saw the plight of Catholic boys haphazardly placed by orphanages in rural families—some were exploited for cheap labor while more ran away to roam city streets. When asked by Abp. Michael A. Corrigan to study the problem, Brother Barnabas created a placing-out bureau and in 1902 founded St. Philip's Home for urban working boys. In establishing Lincoln Agricultural School, Lincolndale, NY, in 1909, he pioneered the use of the "cottage system." He attended President Theodore Roosevelt's Child Welfare Conference of 1909. The same year, at Brother Barnabas's suggestion, the National Conference of Catholic Charities was organized. From 1919 to 1922 McDonald was director of Catholic Charities in Toronto, Canada, where he introduced Catholic Scouting. As executive secretary of the Boy Life Bureau of the Knights of Columbus, he founded the Columbian Squires and organized courses in the leadership of boys. At the University of Notre Dame in Indiana, he inaugurated a program for directors of boys' activities—an educational innovation copied by schools of social work in other universities. He was an energetic member of more than 40 organizations for youth and the recipient of numerous awards.

Bibliography: ANGELUS GABRIEL, The Christian Brothers in the United States, 1848–1948 (New York 1948).

[B. R. WEITEKAMP]

MCDONNELL, THOMAS JOHN

Bishop, director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith; b. New York City, Aug. 18, 1894; d. Huntington, West Virginia, Feb. 25, 1961. He was a graduate of St. Francis Xavier's High School and of Cathedral College in New York City, and completed his theological studies at St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, Yonkers, New York. He was ordained Sept. 20, 1919. He served as curate in several New York City churches and in 1923 became secretary to bishop John J. Dunn, Director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in the Archdiocese of New York. In 1936 McDonnell was appointed national director of the society; he held this position until 1950 and firmly established the society throughout the United States. In 1947 he was consecrated auxiliary bishop of New York and titular bishop of Sela. He was appointed coadjutor bishop of Wheeling, West Virginia, with the right of succession, in 1951. In addition to the duties of his office, he served on the national board of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith; he also promoted the diocesan Serra Clubs, the diocesan Holy Name Societies, and the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae. McDonnell was appointed by the governor of West Virginia to various state commissions and was instrumental in having the state legislature enter the name of God in the preamble to the state constitution.

[J. J. SWINT]

MCELROY, JOHN

Chaplain, founder of Boston College; b. Enniskillen, County Fermanagh, Ireland, May 14, 1782; d. Frederick, MD, Sept. 12, 1877. After arriving in the United States on Aug. 25, 1803, McElroy worked as a clerk in the port of Georgetown, D.C. He entered the Society of Jesus as a lay brother on Oct. 10, 1806. At the urging of his superior he studied for the priesthood and was ordained on May 31, 1817. He was an instructor at Georgetown until 1822, when he was transferred to St. John's Church at Frederick, Maryland, where he served for over 23 years. In 1937 he built the new church of St. John there and constructed a boys' school, St. John's Institute (1829), an orphanage (1827), a convent (1825), a girls' free school, and a novitiate for the Society of Jesus. McElroy, responsible for ten parishes in the perimeter of Frederick, was the pioneer of parish missions. A noted preacher, he made many converts and conducted annual retreats of diocesan clergy. He was the personal friend of many bishops and in 1840 served as theologian to Bp. John B. Purcell of Cincinnati, Ohio, during the Fourth Provincial Council of Baltimore.

In 1846 McElroy was chosen, along with Rev. Anthony Rey, SJ, as chaplain to General Zachary Taylor's army at Matamoros, Mexico. He served for 11 months but felt that his mission as chaplain was a failure because the enterprise had been conceived as a political entity. General Taylor, however, had only the highest praise for the two Jesuits who had started a grammar school for the drummer boys and the children of local merchants. In October of 1847, McElroy was appointed pastor of St. Mary's Church in Boston's north end. With the rapid growth of Boston's Catholic population, he saw the need for a school of higher learning and secured property on Harrison Avenue. Boston College, Massachusetts, opened in 1863 and a collegiate church dedicated to the Immaculate Conception was erected. McElroy served as pastor from 1861 to 1863, but he spent his last years in the novitiate at Frederick.

Bibliography: Archives, Georgetown University.

[L. B. KINES]

MCFARLAND, FRANCIS PATRICK

Third bishop of Hartford, Connecticut; b. Franklin, Pennsylvania, April 16, 1819; d. Hartford, Oct. 2, 1874. After attending Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Maryland, he was ordained on May 18, 1845, by bishop John Hughes of New York in old St. Patrick's Cathedral there. He became an instructor at St. John's College, Fordham, New York, and then did pastoral work in Watertown (St. Patrick's) and Utica (St. John's), New York. In 1858, after declining the appointment as vicar apostolic of Florida (1857), he was named bishop of Hartford and consecrated on March 14 in SS. Peter and Paul Cathedral, Providence, Rhode Island (then part of the Hartford Diocese and the city of Episcopal residence). Despite poor health (because of which he sought permission to resign or to be given a coadjutor) and primitive traveling conditions, he visited parishes throughout the diocese and attended Vatican Council I (1869-70). Under the missionary conditions of his diocese he had to function primarily as a pioneer and consolidator; he was successful in obtaining the services of several religious communities expert in education and social service and was instrumental in securing the enactment of a useful state statute concerning the incorporation of Church property. When Providence was made an independent see (Feb. 16, 1872), McFarland returned the episcopal seat to Hartford. Almost immediately he set out to build a convent for the Sisters of Mercy; the convent chapel, dedicated on Nov. 29, 1873, less than a year before his death, became the procathedral for the diocese's approximately 120,000 Catholics.

Bibliography: R. H. LORD et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston in the Various Stages of Its Development, 1604–1943, 3 v.

(New York 1944). J. H. O'DONNELL, History of the Diocese of Hart-ford (Boston 1900).

[D. Q. LIPTAK]

MCGIVNEY, MICHAEL JOSEPH

Founder of the Knights of Columbus; b. Waterbury, Conn., Aug. 12, 1852; d. Thomaston Conn., Aug. 14, 1890. He was the eldest of the six surviving children (13 in all) of Patrick and Mary (Lynch) McGivney, pioneer Catholic settlers in Connecticut. After early education in Waterbury, he attended St. Hyacinth College, Quebec, Canada; Our Lady of the Angels Seminary, Niagara Falls, N.Y.; St. Mary's Seminary, Montreal, Canada; and St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Md., where he was ordained by Archbishop, later Cardinal James Gibbons on Dec. 22, 1877. While a curate at St. Mary's Church, New Haven, Conn., he conceived the idea of a mutual benefit society of Catholic laymen. The four pillars of the fraternal order are charity, unity, fraternity and patriotism and the name chosen by the first members, drawn from the working class and professional men of New Haven, was the "Knights of Columbus." In the atmosphere of anti-Catholic sentiment prevalent in New England at the time, this title was significant for it claimed the discovery of the New World by Christopher Columbus as a Catholic event and expressed the conviction that the ideal of Catholic manhood among the children of immigrants, Catholic Knighthood, could be successfully integrated into American life. McGivney remained active in directing the growth of the fraternal order insofar as this was compatible with his primary mission as a parish priest. In 1884 he was appointed pastor of St. Thomas Church in Thomaston, Conn., where tuberculosis and pneumonia struck him down just two days after his 38th birthday. Always revered as a man of holiness and virtue, his grave in Waterbury soon became a place of annual pilgrimage. In 1982, to mark the centenary of the order, his body was transferred to a place of honor in St. Mary's Church, New Haven, where the organization, the Knights of Columbus, was founded. The formal cause for his canonization was begun in the archdiocese of Hartford, Conn. on Dec. 18, 1997 and was presented to the Congregation for the Causes of Saints in February of 2000.

Bibliography: C. J. KAUFFMAN, Faith and Fraternalism: The History of the Knights of Columbus, rev. ed. (New York 1992).

[C. F. MALONEY/G. O'DONNELL]

MCGLYNN, EDWARD

Social reformer who exerted considerable influence, particularly in New York City, between 1865 and 1900;

b. New York City, Sept. 27, 1837; d. Newburgh, New York, Jan. 7, 1900. His Irish immigrant parents sent him to the public schools of New York until the age of 13, when he was sent by bishop John Hughes to the Urban College of the Propaganda in Rome. He received a doctorate in divinity, and was ordained there on March 24, 1860. On his return, he was assigned as an assistant to Thomas Farrell (1823–80), pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Waverly Place, New York City. Farrell, noted for his interest in social questions, became a counselor to Mc-Glynn and a small group of priest friends. In 1866 McGlynn was appointed pastor of the large and important New York City parish of St. Stephen's, where the plight of his poverty-stricken parishioners moved him deeply. He was disturbed by the widespread unemployment, and began to study political economy. Eventually he accepted the doctrine of Henry George (1839-97) that the single tax was the universal and fundamental remedy for poverty.

McGlynn was active in George's campaign for mayor in 1886, and McGlynn's eloquence and influence among New York's Catholics and Non-Catholics were of inestimable advantage to George. However, on Sept. 29, 1886, McGlynn's ordinary, achbishop Michael CORRI-GAN, forbade him to speak on behalf of George at a scheduled public meeting. When the priest replied that he could not prudently withdraw at such short notice but would refrain from any later meetings during the campaign, he was suspended by the archbishop for two weeks. In late November another temporary suspension was imposed on McGlynn, who refused to cease his public addresses on the single tax, and in January of 1887 he was removed from the pastorate of St. Stephen's. Two days later a cablegram from Cardinal Giovanni Simeoni, Prefect of Propaganda, commanded McGlynn to retract his land theory publicly and to come to Rome immediately. McGlynn's friend and canonical advocate, Dr. Richard BURTSELL, replied that his client would go on certain conditions. Failing to receive a reply from McGlynn, Leo XIII ordered him to come to Rome within 40 days under penalty of excommunication. Unaware that Dr. Burtsell's reply had never reached the pope, McGlynn, on the basis of health, refused to obey the order. He was excommunicated on July 4, 1887.

For the next five years while he was under censure, he defended the single tax doctrine at the Sunday afternoon meetings of the Anti-Poverty Society, which he helped found, and of which he was the first president. In December of 1892, upon the assurance of four professors of The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., that McGlynn's single tax views were not in conflict with Catholic teaching, archbishop (later Cardinal) Francesco Satolli, the papal ablegate in the United States, reinstated McGlynn in the ministry without retraction of his land views. In June of 1893 McGlynn visited Rome and was cordially received by the pope. Meanwhile, Cardinal James GIBBONS and his supporters had been exerting themselves to prevent the Holy See from passing the condemnation of George's works that Corrigan and his followers were equally intent on obtaining. In 1889 the Holy Office stated that George's land theory deserved to be condemned. This condemnation was received by Corrigan in 1893, but it was forbidden to make the decree public. In 1894 McGlynn was appointed pastor of St. Mary's in Newburgh; he continued without censure from his superiors to defend the single tax theory. Six years later his funeral, attended by all the Protestant ministers and the one Jewish rabbi in Newburgh, was termed the most impressive event of its character ever seen in the Hudson Valley.

Although McGlynn was a man of marked intellectual capacity, for the greater part of his mature years he was not a close student, and did not read widely. Although not the most eloquent or effective orator of his time, he was certainly, from 1865 to 1887, the one who was most in demand in Catholic circles. The land theory that brought him into conflict with his superiors continued to find only limited support. His conception of the parochial ministry, emphasizing the paramount importance of doing an apostolic rather than a pedagogic work, and his advocacy of public rather than parochial schools were likewise unconventional views for a Catholic clergyman of his time.

Bibliography: S. L. MALONE, Dr. Edward McGlynn (New York 1918). F. J. ZWIERLEIN, Life and Letters of Bishop McQuaid, 3 v. (Rochester 1925–27); Letters of Archbishop Corrigan to Bishop McQuaid and Allied Documents (Rochester 1946). S. BELL, Rebel, Priest and Prophet: A Biography of Edward McGlynn (New York 1937), partial to McGlynn and largely undocumented but with pertinent factual information. J. T. ELLIS, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1952) 1:547–594. C. A. BARKER, Henry George (New York 1955). Burtsell Diaries (1865–1912), Archives, Archdiocese of New York. J. A. RYAN, Dictionary of American Biography, ed. A. JOHNSON and D. MALONE, 20 v. (New York 1928–36) 12:53–54. B. MITCHELL, Dictionary of American Biography, ed. A. JOHNSON and D. MALONE, 20 v. (New York 1928–36) 7:215–216.

[E. H. SMITH]

MCGOWAN, RAYMOND AUGUSTINE

Expert in industrial relations, and second director of the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC); b. Brookfield, Missouri, June 23, 1892; d. Kansas City, Missouri, Nov. 13, 1962. Son of Augustine and Margaret (Gannon) McGowan, Father McGowan was educated at St. Benedict's College, Atchison, Kansas; St. Bernard's Seminary, Rochester, New York; the North American College, Rome; and The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. Following ordination on Dec. 18, 1915, McGowan served as curate and pastor in Missouri and for a brief period as an Army chaplain in World War I. In 1919 he was assigned as a writer on social and economic matters to the National Catholic War Council, Washington, D.C., which in 1920 became the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC). Shortly after he was appointed assistant director of the Social Action Department, NCWC, under Monsignor John A. Ryan, and became its director on Ryan's death in 1945. He remained in this office until his retirement in 1954.

Father McGowan was a man of unusual vision and initiative, and his perception of needed social reforms in the interest of social justice was far in advance of his time. He strove for a wider understanding of Catholic social principles and for their application to the problems of the American economy. He advocated the industry council idea in the early 1920s, well in advance of its endorsement by Pope Pius XI in Quadragesimo anno. To promote an effective system of labor, management, and government cooperation in American economic life he founded the Catholic Conference on Industrial Problems (CCIP) in the 1920s and subsequently organized conferences on industrial problems throughout the United States. His acceptance in 1923 of an invitation of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, to meet with the executive committee of that body was the first of a long series of conferences that he held with representatives of labor organizations and employer associations in an effort to convince them of the necessity of mutual cooperation for the solution of their problems.

McGowan's assignment in 1933 to the Latin American Bureau of NCWC occasioned his extensive travel in the Latin American countries. His concern for the social, economic, and religious problems he encountered there gave impetus to his work for the improvement of inter-American relations. In 1943 President F. D. Roosevelt appointed him to an advisory committee to study changes in the organic law of Puerto Rico; and after his retirement as director of the Social Action Department, he served for several months as a consultant to governor Luis Muñoz Marín on the problems of longshoremen in Puerto Rico.

McGowan founded, in addition to the CCIP, the Catholic Association for International Peace (CAIP) and the American Catholic Social Action Confederation. He received the Quadragesimo Anno Award of the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists in 1951 and the Peace Award of CAIP in 1957. He was named a domestic prelate in 1952.

McGowan's publications include Towards Social Justice, Europe and the United States, The Church and Social Reconstruction in Puerto Rico, and numerous articles for magazines and periodicals on the papal encyclicals, labor-management, and Latin American relations.

[A. MCPADDEN]

MCGRATH, JAMES

Missionary; b. Holy Cross, County Tipperary, Ireland, June 26, 1835; d. Albany, New York, Jan. 12, 1898. He took his perpetual vows as an Oblate of Mary Immaculate at Sickling-Hall, England, in 1855. After completing his philosophy and theology courses at Oblate seminaries in Galveston, Texas and in Ottawa, Ontario, Canada, he was ordained in 1859. For seven years he divided his time between teaching at the University of Ottawa and the parochial ministry at St. Edward's Church in Ottawa. In 1866, while resident at Holy Angels parish, Buffalo, New York, he began conducting parochial missions throughout the northeastern section of the United States and gained a reputation as a preacher. His missionary labors took him through the dioceses in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois. When the growth of Oblate foundations warranted, he urged creation of a separate Oblate province in America free from Canadian domination, and he was named its first provincial in 1883. McGrath's administration embraced churches in Massachusetts, New York, Texas, and Mexico. After ten years as provincial, he was appointed pastor of Holy Angels Church, Buffalo. As a pastor McGrath was active as a church builder and an early advocate of parochial schools.

[J. H. KENNEDY]

MCGROARTY, JULIA, SISTER

Religious superior, foundress of Trinity College, Washington, DC; b. Inver, Donegal County, Ireland, Feb. 13, 1827; d. Peabody, MA, Nov. 12, 1901. Her parents, Neil and Catherine (Bonner) McGroarty, took Susan and the rest of their 10 children to Cincinnati, OH, in 1831. She was professed as Sister Julia of the Sisters of NOTRE DAME DE NAMUR on Aug. 3, 1848. An able teacher, she served at the Academy of Notre Dame, Roxbury, MA (1848-60), and in Philadelphia, where her school for African Americans (1877–82) attracted the support of St. Katherine Drexel. After the death of Sister Louise Van Der Schrieck in 1886, Sister Julia was appointed superior of all Notre Dame de Namur houses east of the Rocky Mountains and, after 1892, of the California province. Sister Julia founded some 14 convents in her jurisdiction and promoted academic progress in the schools conducted by her community. To this end she prepared a course of studies, introduced a system of general examinations, and arranged for systematic supervision. Her greatest achievement was the establishment of a college for women. The Catholic University of America, Washington, DC, annually refused many applications from women. In 1897, at the request of the authorities of The Catholic University and with the approval of the pope and Cardinal James Gibbons, she established Trinity College in Washington, DC. Although there was resistance by some Catholics, the act of incorporation and permission to grant degrees was signed on Aug. 20, 1897. Sister Julia lived to see the college begin its work on Nov. 7, 1900, and to watch over its first year of development.

Bibliography: H. L. NUGENT, Sister Julia (New York 1928).

[J. BLAND]

MCGUIRE, MARTIN R.P.

Language scholar, editor, educator; b. Whitinsville, Massachusetts, Dec. 30, 1897; d. Washington, D.C., March 15, 1969. He spent his youth on a farm, enrolled in the College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, Massachusetts, in 1916, and during World War I served in the U.S. Army, from which he was discharged as a second lieutenant. He graduated from Holy Cross in 1921 and for the next three years taught at Georgetown Preparatory School in Washington. He received a Ph.D. from The Catholic University of America in 1927 with the published dissertation S. Ambrosii de Nabuthae: A Commentary with an Introduction and Translation. In the same year he was appointed an instructor in the department of Greek and Latin and in 1946 was promoted to the rank of professor. In 1929 he married Florence Mattimore, and they subsequently adopted four boys and three girls.

From 1937 to 1947 he was dean of the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, which he helped to save from dissolution during the war, and from 1949 to 1962 he was repeatedly elected head of the department of Greek and Latin, which was highly esteemed throughout the country. After World War II he was named a member of the President's Commission on Higher Education, the U.S. Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange, and the Fulbright Board of Foreign Scholarships. Besides discharging successfully his administrative and teaching duties, he devoted much time to research and writing. His principal publications are An Introduction to Classical Scholarship: A Syllabus and Bibliographic Guide (rev. ed. 1961), Introduction to Medieval Latin Studies: A Syllabus and Bibliographic Guide (1964), and The Political and Cultural History of the Ancient World: A Syllabus with Suggested Readings (1961). From 1946 on he was chairman of the executive committee of Mediaeval and Renaissance Latin Translations and Commentaries, and a member of the editorial board of The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation. Appointed senior editor of the New Catholic Encyclopedia in 1962, he was mainly responsible for planning and organizing the 15 volumes that appeared in 1967; he not only supervised the staff editors for the various areas but also wrote 114 articles and revised countless others.

Bibliography: R. TRISCO, "In Memoriam: Martin R. P. McGuire," Catholic Historical Review 55 (July 1969) 153–158 (with photograph).

[R. TRISCO]

MCHUGH, ANTONIA, SISTER

College administrator and religious superior; b. Omaha, Nebraska, May 17, 1873; d. St. Paul, Minnesota, Oct. 11, 1944. As the daughter of Patrick and Rose (Welsh) McHugh, Sister Antonia spent her childhood on the Nebraska-Dakota frontier. Her elementary and secondary education in Winnipeg, Canada, and St. Paul, Minnesota, preceded her entering the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet in St. Paul at the age of 18. She pursued baccalaureate and graduate studies in history at the University of Chicago, Illinois, supplementing them with European travel and courses at Columbia University, New York City, and the University of Minnesota.

With the encouragement of Abp. John Ireland and Mother Seraphine Ireland, she developed the College of St. Catherine in St. Paul, where she served as professor of history (1911-14), dean (1914-28), president (1928–37), and religious superior of the sisters (1931–37). She provided for the professional, cultural, and religious preparation of the teaching sisters at leading American and European universities, and she added lay professors to the faculty. By securing endowments, buildings, and equipment for the college, she obtained the approbation of the North Central Association, the National Education Association, and the American Association of Colleges and Universities. For St. Catherine's graduates, Sister Antonia secured eligibility in the American Association of University Women and foreign travel and study through International Institute Scholarships. In 1938 a chapter of Phi Beta Kappa was erected at the College of St. Catherine, which became the only U.S. Catholic women's college where this society was established. Our Lady of Victory Chapel, as well as Mendel Hall for the natural sciences and Fontbonne Hall for physical education, medical care, and athletic recreation, were built during her administration. Sister Antonia was honored by membership in the White House Conference on Child Health (1930), by the Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice medal (1931), and by an honorary degree from the University of Minnesota (1936).

Bibliography: H. A. HURLEY, On Good Ground (Minneapolis 1951).

[A. GLEASON]

MCINTYRE, JAMES FRANCIS ALOYSIUS

Archbishop of Los Angeles, cardinal; b. New York City, June 25, 1886; d. Los Angeles, July 16, 1979. The son of James and Mary (Pelley) McIntyre. After the death of his mother in 1896, James Francis Aloysius was reared by a cousin, Mrs. Robert F. Donley. He spent several years in the employ of H. L. Horton and Company, an investment house on the New York Stock Exchange; and meanwhile, took night courses at New York City College and Columbia. Following the death of his father in 1915, he entered the preparatory seminary for the Archdiocese of New York, and the next year enrolled in Saint Joseph's Seminary at Dunwoodie where he was ordained a priest by Patrick Cardinal Hayes on May 21, 1921.

Father McIntyre served as assistant to the pastor of Saint Gabriel's Church until September of 1923, when he was named vice chancellor and liaison officer between Cardinal Hayes and the curial staff. In 1934, he became chancellor and was designated a private chamberlain by Pope Pius XI. Two years later, on Nov. 12, 1936, he was promoted to the Domestic Prelacy. In 1939, Archbishop Francis J. Spellman appointed Monsignor McIntyre a member of the board of consultors for the archdiocese of New York.

On Nov. 16, 1940, Pope Pius XII appointed McIntyre to the titular see of Cyrene and auxiliary bishop of New York. He was consecrated by Archbishop Spellman in Saint Patrick's Cathedral on Jan. 9, 1941. Bishop McIntyre was made vicar general of the archdiocese on Jan. 17, 1945, and, 18 months later, on July 20, 1946, the Holy Father advanced the prelate to the titular see of Paltus as coadjutor archbishop of New York.

Archbishop. On Feb. 7, 1948, Archbishop McIntyre was transferred to Los Angeles as the eighth occupant of the jurisdiction originally established in 1840 under the title Ambas Californias. Shortly after his installation at Los Angeles, Archbishop McIntyre set about to reorganize the archdiocesan curia, to erect a new chancery, and to refurbish Saint Vibiana's Cathedral—all of which he deemed necessary for the efficient management of a jurisdiction encompassing an area of 9,508 square miles with a rapidly increasing Catholic population.

The new archbishop established secretariats and commissions for vocations, communications, archives, cemeteries and liturgy. He founded the Archbishop's Fund for Charity in 1951, to support otherwise unprovided-for welfare activities. In 1956, McIntyre formally sponsored the foundation of the Lay-Mission Helpers Association, the pioneer organization of its kind in the nation.

Among the prelate's most cherished works was the total revamping of the seminary program and his program for Catholic education. In addition to a new preparatory school in 1954, and expanded facilities at Saint John's Seminary in 1956, the archbishop built a college seminary. In the first 15 years of his tenure, Catholic schools were tripled from 141 to 347, an average of one a month. In addition to widening the scope and influence of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD), McIntyre's influence was a compelling force in two favorable decisions by the electorate to repeal the burdensome state taxation of parochial schools.

Cardinal. Pope Pius XII elevated Archbishop McIntyre to the cardinalate on Jan. 12, 1953, assigned to the titular pastorate of Saint Anastasia in Rome. Growing out of the new position were additional duties such as his delegation as papal legate to the All-Nigerian Marian Congress at Lagos, on the West Coast of Africa, in December of 1954.

At the conclusion of the second archdiocesan synod, held on the Feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Dec. 12, 1960, Cardinal McIntyre was presented with the Golden Rose of Tepeyac by the canons of Mexico's National Shrine of Our Lady of Guadalupe in recognition of his zealous work among the Spanish-speaking inhabitants of California's southland.

In addition to serving a significant role in the central preparatory commission for Vatican Council II, the cardinal attended all the sessions of the council and was active in its deliberation. He made six oral interventions. In the first session, he raised the question of infants dying without baptism, a topic, he noted, that was not treated in any of the schemas. In later interventions he spoke in favor of the original schema on divine revelation, argued for the continued use of Latin, opposed changes in the Mass, and spoke against giving juridical status to episcopal conferences. Nonetheless, a national survey published by America in 1966, revealed that the archdiocese of Los Angeles was far ahead of other American jurisdictions in heeding the suggestions and spirit of Vatican Council II.

After his retirement in 1970, Cardinal McIntyre spent the final years of his life serving as a parish priest at Saint Basil's in midtown Los Angeles. His papers are in the Archival Center of the archdiocese of Los Angeles.

Bibliography: "McIntyre, James Francis Aloysius," Archival Center, Archdiocese of Los Angeles. For an account of Cardinal McIntyre's interventions at Vatican II, see V. A. YZERMANS, American Participation in the Second Vatican Council (New York 1969).

[F. J. WEBER]

MCKENNA, CHARLES HYACINTH

Preacher; b. Fillalea, Co. Derry, Ireland, May 8, 1834; d. Jacksonville, Fla., Feb. 21, 1917. As the son of Francis and Anna (Gillespie-McDonald) McKenna, he came to the U.S. in 1851. At Lancaster, Pa., he continued his limited schooling for two years and then became a stonecutter. Support of his widowed mother delayed fulfillment of his priestly aspirations, but in 1859 he entered Sinsinawa Mound College, Wis., to complete his studies. He made profession in the Dominican Order at St. Joseph's Priory, Somerset, Ohio, April 20, 1863, and was ordained in Cincinnati on Oct. 13, 1867, by Abp. John B. Purcell. Except for a few years as novice master at St. Rose Priory, Springfield, Ky. (1868-70), and as prior and pastor in Louisville, Ky. (1878-81) and in Somerset (1889-91), McKenna was stationed at St. Vincent Ferrer's Church, New York City. There he devoted himself principally to the work of preaching. His lectures were well attended by the working class, and Cardinal James Gibbons considered him the best missionary preacher in the U.S. The Dominican Order conferred on him the rank of preacher general in 1881. McKenna wrote a number of pious manuals during his missionary years; representative titles are: How to Make the Mission (1873) and The Angelic Guide (1899). After 1900 he labored for the promotion of Catholic societies. He was the founder of St. Vincent Ferrer's Union and director-general of the confraternities of the Holy Name and of the Rosary. His efforts were responsible for mitigation of Vatican restrictions on the confraternities and for popularization of the Holy Name Society among American Catholic men. He was widely regarded as the Father of the Holy Name Society. In 1914 he retired to the Dominican House of Studies, Washington, D.C.

Bibliography: V. F. O'DANIEL, Very Rev. Charles Hyacinth McKenna . . . (New York 1917).

[J. L. MORRISON]

MCKENZIE, JOHN LAWRENCE

Scripture scholar, author, teacher, lecturer; b. Brazil, Indiana, Oct. 9, 1910; d. Claremont, California, March 2,

