1991. The son of Harry and Myra McKenzie, John McKenzie entered the Society of Jesus after high school in 1928 and was ordained a priest in 1939. He received an M.A. in philosophy from Saint Louis University in 1934 and an S.T.L. from Saint Mary's College, Kansas, in 1940. His superiors wished him to earn an S.S.D. at the Pontifical Biblical Institute after his tertianship year, but, unable to go to Rome because of the war, he studied for an S.T.D. at Weston College, Weston, Massachusetts, 1941–42, learning Semitic languages on his own and preparing himself for biblical research through a rigorous and systematic study of the history, art, and literature of the ancient Near East.

McKenzie served as book review editor of The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 1953–54, was associate editor from 1955 to 1971, and was a member of the monograph series board from 1976 to 1984. He was president of the Catholic Biblical Association of America 1963–64, and in 1966 he became the first Roman Catholic scholar to be elected president of the Society of Biblical Literature.

He was in the forefront of American Catholic biblical scholarship once Pius XII's encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu (1943) allowed Catholics to apply the tools of language, history, archaeology, and literary criticism to the study of the Bible. McKenzie's first book, The Two-Edged Sword: An Interpretation of the Old Testament (1956), held up by Jesuit censors for more than three years, presented the fruits of recent scientific techniques in Old Testament research to the general Catholic reading public. Nine years later he published a companion volume on the New Testament, The Power and the Wisdom: An Interpretation of the New Testament (1965). In between, he produced singlehandedly his monumental 954page Dictionary of the Bible, which for years remained a standard reference work of the field. Three more books appeared in 1966, including Authority in the Church, in which he argued that service of the people of God rather than approaches found in secular governments underlies Church authority. Others books followed, including The Roman Catholic Church (1969) and his last, The Civilization of Christianity (1986), in which he argued in light of wars of aggression and widespread moral degeneracy that Christian principles had never permeated Europe during the Middle Ages. In all, he wrote 15 books, 175 articles, and 250 reviews; he also composed countless audio tapes and study aids. McKenzie directed numerous Ignatian retreats, conducted institutes for religious women, taught weekly Bible classes to archdiocesan chancery officials in Chicago, and wrote extensively for newspapers and magazines.

McKenzie was a brilliant and world-renowned biblical scholar who considered it a duty to use his professional skills to bring the religious and spiritual values of the Bible to the ordinary believer. As a teacher he was a mine of information for serious students but unsympathetic to disinterested ones; as a much-sought after lecturer, he was witty, incisive, and trenchant, as well as sharp in his retorts; as an author he was a craftsman of superb prose: lucid, cogent, thought-provoking, and reflective. Through his popular writings, in which he was outspoken and a master of the memorable phrase, he frequently provoked controversy. In the late 1960s he opposed the war in Vietnam because he saw in Jesus' teaching a total repudiation of the use of arms and violence. He viewed current affairs in the light of radical biblical texts, and he felt that the Church had accommodated itself to a way of life that was a compromise between the world and the Gospel. He had a keen sense of the differences between the Church of the New Testament and the contemporary Church, which he perceived to be deficient especially in the areas of peace, poverty, and charity. He consequently encountered some opposition in the Church and in his own order, which he left in 1970, becoming incardinated in the diocese of Madison, Wisconsin. McKenzie's fundamental conviction was that the Gospel lives in the Church or it does not live anywhere.

MCLAREN, AGNES

Physician and promoter of medical missions; b. Edinburgh, July 4, 1837; d. Antibes, southeastern France, April 17, 1913. Because the University of Edinburgh did not at the time grant medical degrees to women, she got her doctorate at the University of Montpellier in France and qualified for practice in the United Kingdom by passing the examinations at the Royal College of Physicians in Dublin. She became a Catholic Nov. 30, 1898, and was later received into the secular Third Order of St. Dominic. She became interested in medical mission work through her association with Dominic Wagner, a Mill Hill Father. In Rawalpindi, Pakistan, she founded a hospital to be run for women and by women exclusively. This was necessary because Muslim law prohibited women from being visited by men outside their own family. In order to obtain sufficient staff for the hospital, Dr. McLaren hoped to use a religious order. This was impossible because Canon Law forbade religious to practice medicine. Five times Dr. McLaren went to Rome to plead for a change of legislation. This was eventually obtained by a decree in 1936. Her ideals, however, were realized through Anna Dengel, an Austrian, who by the patronage of Dr. McLaren became a doctor and worked in the hospital at Rawalpindi. Anna Dengel later became foundress of the Medical Mission Sisters.

MCMAHON, THOMAS JOHN

Mission director; b. Tuxedo Park, N.Y., April 5, 1909; d. New York City, Dec. 6, 1956. His parents, James J. and Bridget (Brennan) McMahon, had him educated at Cathedral College, N.Y., and St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, N.Y. He then enrolled at the North American College in Rome, where he was ordained for the New York Archdiocese on Dec. 5, 1933. After receiving a doctorate in sacred theology from the Gregorian University, Rome, in 1936, he was appointed to teach church history and patrology at Dunwoodie. On May 24, 1943, he became master of ceremonies to Abp. (later Cardinal) Francis Spellman and national secretary of the Catholic Near East Welfare Association (CNEWA), New York. He was made a papal chamberlain in 1945 and a domestic prelate in 1947.

On May 13, 1949, McMahon was named president of the Pontifical Mission for Palestine, erected by Pius XII to care for Palestinian Arab refugees of the Arab-Jewish war. He spent many months in the Middle East forming committees, directing the assignment of supplies, and opening schools and medical centers. He was praised for his work by Cardinal Eugene Tisserant, and he was made a Canon of the Holy Sepulchre, a Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Holy Sepulchre, and a prothonotary apostolic. McMahon's health was badly affected by the rigors of Middle East life, and he resigned his missionary assignment in 1954 to become founder and first pastor of the Church of Our Savior in New York City.

McMahon served in 1948 as moderator of St. Paul's Guild, which was organized to help converts. He also directed the Morgan Fraternity, an association for alumni of Cathedral College and St. Joseph's Seminary who do not continue to ordination. As one of the organizers of the Fordham Conference on Eastern Rites, he wrote "Islands of Christianity in the Rising Moslem Sea" (America, March 4, 1944). In 1951 he published Silver Threads, a booklet describing CNEWA on its 25th anniversary.

MCMASTER, JAMES ALPHONSUS

Editor; b. Duanesburg, N.Y., April 1, 1820; d. Brooklyn, N.Y., Dec. 29, 1886. The son of Gilbert Mac-Master, a Presbyterian minister, and Jane (nee Brown), he graduated from Union College, Schenectady, N.Y., in two years (1839) and read law at Columbia College, N.Y., until studying for the Episcopal ministry at General Theological Seminary, New York City (1840-44). Professors and students alike were under surveillance because of "Romanizing influences"—a phase of the "American Oxford Movement." McMaster was outspoken against such repression and was forced to leave. Under the influence of the Redemptorist priest Gabriel Rumpler, he was converted to Catholicism (1845) and resolved to become a Redemptorist. With Clarence Augustus WALWORTH and Isaac Thomas HECKER he sailed to the novitiate at Saint-Trond, Belgium, visiting John Henry NEWMAN on the way.

Advised that he had no vocation, McMaster returned (1846) to New York City practically friendless and took up journalism. His association with the New York Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register, the official paper of Abp. John HUGHES edited by James Roosevelt BAY-LEY, was a turning point in his life; in July 1848, he became sole owner and editor until his death. He married Gertrude Fetterman (1856) and had seven children, three of whom became nuns.

McMaster was a militant editor; he fought Protestantism and free thought as vigorously as he denounced the policies of Lincoln. His paper was called treasonable and seditious by the U.S. Postmaster General and withheld from the mails (August 24, 1861–April 19, 1862), and he was imprisoned at Ft. Lafayette (September 16–October 23, 1861). He criticized the handling of VATICAN COUNCIL I by the secular press. His "Jus" letters (1868–70), which urged full canonical rights for U.S. pastors, put him at odds with members of the hierarchy, notably Bishops Bernard MCQUAID, Peter Baltes, John L. SPALDING, and Amadeus Rappe.

MCNABB, VINCENT

Dominican theologian, spiritual writer, and preacher; b. Portaferry, County Down, Ireland, July 8, 1868; d. London, June 17, 1943. He was baptized Joseph, one of 11 children of Joseph McNabb, sea captain, and Ann Shields. After early education at St. Malachy's, Belfast, and St. Cuthbert's, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, he entered the Dominican Order at Woodchester, Gloucestershire, and was given the name Vincent. He studied at Woodchester until his ordination in 1891 and then at Louvain (1891–94), where he took his lectorate in theology. After the completion of his studies he returned to England and taught in the Dominican studia at Woodchester and Hawkesyard until 1906. He was then assigned to parish work, first in London (1906-08) and then in Leicester (1908–14). This was followed by another period of teaching at Hawkesyard (1914-20), after which he returned to London, where he spent the remainder of his life occupied with preaching, lecturing, and writing.

Much of his writing and preaching was concerned with the social question, but he was also a popular retreat master and wrote a number of popular works on the spiritual life and some books on theological and scriptural subjects. In 1916 McNabb began a long association with Hilaire BELLOC, Eric GILL, and Hilary Pepler—and later with G. K. CHESTERTON—through which he came to see in DISTRIBUTISM, the land and craft movements, the solution to many contemporary social problems. In his last years he became less utopian and accepted some elements of industrial society. He was relentless in selfdiscipline and in his practice of poverty, going everywhere on foot if that were possible, and wearing his homespun habit; his open-air preaching made him a well known figure in London. His character remains enigmatic: he was a holy man and an eccentric, a zealot and a romantic, humble and pugnacious, loving and intolerant, sincere and histrionic; but always a pastoral priest, a lover of the poor, a conscientious religious, and a man of prayer.

His principal published works include: Oxford Conferences on Prayer (London 1903; reedited as The Science of Prayer, Ditchling 1936) and Oxford Conferences on Faith (London 1905), both of which were republished in one book as Faith and Prayer (London 1953); From a Friar's Cell (Oxford 1923); The Church and the Land (London 1926); Thoughts Twice-Dyed (London 1930); The Craft of Prayer (London 1935); The Craft of Suffering (London 1936); and A Life of Jesus Christ our Lord (London 1938).

MCNEIL, NEIL

Educator and missionary, archbishop; b. Hillsborough, Inverness County, Nova Scotia, Canada, November 23, 1851; d. Toronto, May 25, 1934. The eldest son of Malcolm McNeil and Ellen Meagher, he was educated at St. Francis Xavier University, Antigonish (1869–73), and the Propaganda College, Rome (1873–79), where he received his Ph.D. and D.D. After ordination in Rome April 12, 1879, he attended the University of Marseilles, France (1879-80). On his return to Canada he was appointed to the faculty of St. Francis Xavier University, Antigonish, where he served as rector from 1884 until 1891. In 1881 he founded and edited the Aurora, a weekly newspaper, and he later edited the Casket. In 1891 Mc-Neil went to Cape Breton as parish priest of West Arichat and in 1893 was transferred to the parish of D'Escousse. On October 20, 1895, he was consecrated titular bishop of Nilopolis at Antigonish and named vicar apostolic of the West Coast of Newfoundland, which afterward was established as the Diocese of St. Georges (February 18, 1904). He became its first bishop. He was appointed archbishop of Vancouver, British Columbia (1910-12), and there concerned himself with development of the diocese and Catholic colonization. As archbishop of Toronto (1912–34) he dedicated himself to the development of the Extension Society and St. Augustine's Seminary. St. Michael's College and the Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies there received valuable support from him, and he worked for more equitable distribution of taxes to Ontario's separate schools.

MCNICHOLAS, JOHN TIMOTHY

Fourth archbishop of CINCINNATI, Ohio, archdiocese; b. Kiltimagh, County Mayo, Ireland, Dec. 15, 1877; d. Cincinnati, April 22, 1950. The youngest of the seven sons and one daughter of Patrick and Mary (Mullanny) McNicholas, Timothy (John was his name in religion) was brought to the U.S. in 1881 by his parents who settled in Chester, Pa. He received his early education at Immaculate Heart of Mary School, Chester, and at St. Joseph's Preparatory College, Philadelphia. At 17, he entered the Dominican Order at St. Rose's Priory, Springfield, Ky., and made simple profession of vows on October 10, 1895, followed by a solemn profession three years later. He completed his philosophical and theological studies at St. Joseph's House of Studies, Somerset, Ohio, where on October 10, 1901, he was ordained by Bp. Henry Moeller of Columbus, Ohio.

After ordination, McNicholas spent three years at the Minerva University in Rome where he received a doctorate in sacred theology. In 1904 he returned to St. Joseph's, Somerset, as master of novices. A year later when the Dominican House of Studies, Immaculate Conception College, was opened at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., he was named regent of studies and professor of philosophy, theology, and Canon Law, a post he held until 1909. In that year he was appointed National Director of the Holy Name Society with headquarters in New York City, and first editor of the Holy Name Journal. While holding this position, he was pastor of St. Catherine of Siena Church and first prior of the convent attached to the parish. McNicholas was recalled to Rome in 1917 as socius (assistant) to the master general of the Dominicans. As socius he taught Canon Law and theology at the Angelicum University, was named a master of theology, and was awarded the honorary office of provincial of Lithuania. On July 18, 1918, Benedict XV named McNicholas bishop of Duluth, Minn.; he was consecrated at San Clemente church in Rome by Cardinal Tomaso Boggiani on September 8. Seven years later, in May 1925, McNicholas was named to the Diocese of Indianapolis, a see he never actually occupied, since on July 8, he was appointed to the Archdiocese of Cincinnati and installed there on August 12.

During his 25-year episcopate in Cincinnati, McNicholas established about 50 mission chapels, encouraged a convert program and the apostolate among the Negroes, championed the rights of labor and promoted lay retreats and the organization of Holy Name Societies. The number of schools was increased until the archdiocese became a model for Catholic education on the elementary, secondary, and college level. The Athenaeum of Ohio, incorporated by the state of Ohio in 1928, was organized for the control, direction, and supervision of all colleges, seminaries, academies, and institutions of higher learning in the archdiocese. A teachers' college was founded for training priests, sisters, and lay persons. Four Latin schools, wherein boys began the study of Latin in the seventh grade, were opened. An intensified program of higher education for the clergy resulted in 120 priests doing graduate studies. The Institutum Divi Thomae, a postgraduate school of theology, was opened in 1935.

On the national level, McNicholas was chairman of the pontifical commission for the sacred sciences of The Catholic University of America from 1934 until his death, and also a member of the board of trustees of the University. He served as the episcopal chairman of the department of education of the National Catholic Welfare Conference from 1930 to 1935 and again from 1942 to 1945, and was president general of the National Catholic Educational Association from 1946 to 1950. Other national offices of prominence held by McNicholas included the 10-year chairmanship (1933–43) of the episcopal committee on motion pictures that founded the National Legion of Decency; five terms (1945–50) as chairman of the administrative board of the NCWC; national chairman of the Catholic Students Mission Crusade; and 13 years' membership on the episcopal committee for the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine.

The annual statements issued in the name of the Catholic hierarchy of the U.S. for many years owed much of their form and forcefulness to McNicholas. In 1948, in endorsing the fundamental American principle of separation of Church and State, he declared: "We deny absolutely and without qualification that the Catholic Bishops of the United States are seeking a union of church and state by any endeavors whatsoever, either proximate or remote." A preacher of renown and a Church historian, McNicholas was also a national figure in the fields of apologetics and of social and racial justice. In his later writings, he excoriated the communism of Soviet Russia.

MCPHERSON, AIMEE SEMPLE

American evangelist and founder of the International Church of the FOURSQUARE GOSPEL; b. Ingersoll, Ontario, Canada, Oct. 9, 1890; d. Oakland, CA, Sept. 27, 1944. As a girl of 17, Aimee Kennedy experienced a religious conversion at a revival conducted by Robert Semple. She later married Semple, and the couple worked as missionaries in Hong Kong until his death. Mrs. Semple returned to the United States in 1911 with her infant daughter and began her preaching career. She married Harold McPherson, a grocer in Florida, but the marriage did not last. "Sister" McPherson settled in Los Angeles, CA in 1918 and built a 5,300-seat auditorium called Angelus Temple. Her flamboyant preaching attracted thousands of followers and considerable newspaper publicity. She founded the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel in 1927 and established a radio station and a bible college to advocate her fundamentalist, adventist, and pentecostal theology. A third marriage in 1931 to a singer in her temple choir lasted four months. After her death, her son Rolf assumed leadership of the denomination.

MCQUAID, BERNARD JOHN

Bishop, educator; b. New York, N.Y., December 15, 1823; d. Rochester, N.Y., January 18, 1909. His parents, Bernard and Mary (Maguire) McQuaid, were Irish immigrants. Orphaned of both by 1832, Bernard was confided to St. Patrick's Orphan Asylum in New York City, where Sister Elizabeth Boyle encouraged his priestly vocation. He attended Chambly College, near Montreal, Canada, and New York's diocesan seminary, then located at Fordham, New York City. Bp. John Hughes ordained him on January 16, 1848, in old St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York. Designated pastor of St. Vincent's Church, Madison, N.J., McQuaid built two churches within five years and planned a third. In keeping with Hughes's policy, he also started two parochial schools, and taught for six months at one, St. Vincent's, Madison, the first parochial school in New Jersey.

The Diocese of Newark was established in 1853, and James R. Bayley, chancellor of the New York Diocese, was appointed its first bishop. Bayley named McQuaid rector of St. Patrick's Cathedral in Newark where he organized the St. Vincent de Paul Society and set up a Young Men's Catholic Association with a large recreational center. During the Civil War he made a brief visit to Fredericksburg, Va., to minister to the wounded and dying soldiers. He founded Seton Hall College and Seminary (1856) and the Sisters of Charity of St. Elizabeth, Madison, N.J. (1859). Bayley appointed him vicargeneral of the diocese and a theologian of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1866.

Bishop of Rochester. McQuaid was named first bishop of Rochester, N.Y., on March 3, 1868. He was consecrated in St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, on July 12, 1868, and installed at St. Patrick's, Rochester, on July 17. He became deeply attached to his small diocese, declining subsequent offers of the bishopric of Newark, N.J., and archbishopric of Cincinnati, Ohio. He founded 69 parishes, enlarged orphanages, established the Home of Industry for dependent girls, the Excelsior Farm for dependent boys, the Young Men's Catholic Institute (recreational), and St. Ann's Home for the Aged. He secured admission of Catholic chaplains to the Western Home of Refuge, an institution for juvenile delinquents in Rochester. Through his influence, a state law was passed to provide paid chaplains at all state penal and welfare institutions. He took an active part in the Fourth Provincial Council of New York (1883), the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884), and Vatican Council I (1869–70). At the last he voted against the definition of papal infallibility as inopportune and perhaps incapable of definition. After the definition he proclaimed his complete adherence from his own cathedral pulpit on Aug. 28, 1870.

Because of his positive views and tenacity of purpose, McQuaid became involved in several of the conflicts over policy that divided the American hierarchy of his day. He and his metropolitan, Abp. Michael A. CORRI-GAN, of New York, held positions among the "conservatives" comparable to those of Abp. John IRELAND and Bp. John KEANE among the "liberals." Both parties dissented from the extreme nationalistic ideas of some of the German-American clergy. But McQuaid, who had achieved rapport with his German diocesans, preferred gradualism to the accelerated Americanization of the "liberals." He favored strict episcopal surveillance over secret societies, political or social, suspected of falling under the ban of Church law. When the U.S. archbishops took a more lenient stand regarding certain societies, Mc-Quaid, blaming Ireland as their presumed leader, began to speak of current trends toward "false liberalism." This charge was to reverberate widely during the controversy over what was called "AMERICANISM."

Interest in Education. McQuaid's support of Catholic education was his most significant contribution to the Church in the U.S. In his diocese he founded about 40 parochial schools and two high schools. To staff most of them he established the Rochester Sisters of St. Joseph. He instituted a preparatory seminary, St. Andrew's (1870), and a theological seminary, St. Bernard's (1893). He excluded from the Sacraments parents who sent their daughters to non-Catholic colleges; but at the time of his death he was projecting a Catholic college to be affiliated academically with Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y. From 1871 on he also wrote and lectured on "Christian Free Schools."

McQuaid entered vigorously into controversies involving education. The issue was prominent in his contests with two New York priests, Louis A. LAMBERT and Edward MCGLYNN, and in his opposition to Ireland who tended, so McQuaid thought, to concede to the state too much authority over education. It formed the background of the New York State Regency affair in which Father Sylvester MALONE became regent instead of McQuaid. At the time he publicly denounced Ireland's ill-advised intervention in New York State politics, and merited for himself a rebuke from Rome. Fortunately, McQuaid and Ireland were reconciled in 1905, recalling that they had much in common. As a progressive conservative, McQuaid was an important moderating influence in the American Church of his generation.

MCQUAID, JOHN CHARLES

Educator, Archbishop of Dublin; b. Cootehill, County Cavan, Ireland, July 28, 1895; d. Dublin, Ireland, April 7, 1973; eldest son of Eugene McQuaid and Jennie Corry McQuaid. J. C. McQuaid came from a medical family: his father, paternal uncle, sister and half-brother were all doctors. Educated at St. Patrick's College, Cavan, the Holy Ghost school, Blackrock College, in Dublin, and the JESUIT school at Clongowes Wood, he entered the Holy Ghost novitiate at Kimmage Manor in 1913 and was professed in 1914. From the University College Dublin (UCD) he graduated in 1917 with first-class honors in classics. He continued his postgraduate studies at UCD with a master's degree and a teaching diploma, and subsequently he earned a doctorate in theology at the Gregorian University in Rome. Ordained in 1924, the theology in which McQuaid was trained was conservativestrongly neoscholastic and hostile to modernism and liberalism. His hatred of the French Revolution was expressed in several pastorals and speeches throughout his career. He also regarded Protestantism as a fundamental error from which Irish Catholics should be quarantined as much as possible.

Appointed dean of studies at Blackrock, he became a prominent figure in Catholic education and chaired the Catholic Headmasters' Association for several years. In 1931 he was appointed president of Blackrock, in which capacity he became acquainted with Eamon de Valera, the future Irish prime minister whose sons attended the school. In 1936 while drafting a new Irish constitution, de Valera consulted McQuaid, although he rejected Mc-Quaid's draft "One, True Church" clause which stated, among other things, that the Catholic Church was the one true Church in Ireland. When McQuaid was appointed Archbishop of Dublin in 1940, the appointment of a priest from the regular clergy caused considerable surprise. Irish government archives reveal that de Valera, as was suspected at the time, pressed McQuaid's claims at the Vatican. However, it is doubtful whether the Vatican needed much persuasion; there was a dearth of potential episocopal talent and McQuaid had an outstanding reputation as a Catholic educationalist.

Once appointed, McQuaid proved to be one of the ablest administrators in the history of the Irish Church.

In the first two years of his episcopate, McQuaid set up the Catholic Social Service Conference to alleviate the poverty and distress in Dublin which was aggravated by the war, and the Catholic Social Welfare Bureau to help the thousands of Irish emigrants going to Britain for war work. These two organizations filled a much-needed gap and continued to exist after the war. The expansion of Dublin city and its suburbs during McQuaid's episcopate required the building of new churches, schools, and hospitals. Meeting these demands also necessitated a considerable increase in the number of clergy, secular and regular, whose numbers more than doubled in the period from 1941 to 1972.

Given his previous career, the importance McQuaid assigned to education was not surprising. He was critical of the low priority accorded to education by successive governments and was particularly critical of the poor and pay conditions of teachers. His intervention in the primary teachers' strike in 1946 was poorly received by the government and marked the souring of his relationship with de Valera. During his episcopate the number of primary schools increased by a third while the number of secondary schools more than doubled but, as with social welfare, the government increasingly assumed a dominant role in education from the 1960s onwards. Almost immediately after his appointment in 1940, McQuaid took a hardline stand against the attendance of Catholic students at Trinity College Dublin. The ban lasted until 1970, when the increase in student numbers rendered it untenable; McQuaid acceded reluctantly.

McQuaid had a formidable list of achievements in health care, especially maternity and pediatric services, physical and mental handicap services, and the treatment of alcoholism. It was ironic, therefore, that the most controversial episode of his career occurred in this area—the Irish hierarchy's rejection in 1951 of a free mother-and-child health service. This led to the resignation of the health minister, Dr. Noel Browne, and was a watershed in Church-State relations in Ireland. With Irish tuberculosis and infant mortality statistics ranking among the highest in the world, the hierarchy, and particularly McQuaid, lost considerable support by lining up with the conservative medical establishment to resist efforts at socialized medicine.

From various pastorals that he issued at the time, it was clear that McQuaid did not see the need for the second VATICAN COUNCIL. As its deliberations proceeded, his unease grew, and he became increasingly preoccupied with the issue of episcopal power and independence that he believed were being threatened by the council. In the areas of liturgical reform, greater lay participation, and ecumenism, McQuaid was slow in implementing the Vatican II reforms. His views on ecumenism had always been lukewarm and had led to allegations that he was anti-Protestant. His personality and policies were criticized by a more assertive Dublin laity, but McQuaid, a shy, reserved man who increasingly felt the isolation of office, never responded to such comments. In 1968 the reaction to Humanae Vitae caused open rebellion in the Dublin diocese, the force of which caught McQuaid unaware. His last pastoral as archbishop in 1971 betrayed his anger and bemusement at the response to Humanae Vitae in Dublin.

At the age of 75, he submitted his resignation to the Vatican and it was accepted. His resignation was announced in January of 1972, when he was replaced by Dermot Ryan. McQuaid died the following year. His substantial archives were released by the Dublin Diocesan Archives in the late 1990s. In 1999 journalist John Cooney published a hostile biography of McQuaid, which made controversial allegations of sexual abuse against McQuaid. The allegations were based on tenuous evidence gathered by McQuaid's nemesis from the 1951 Mother and Child controversy, Dr. Noel Browne, who had died in 1997. No corroborating evidence was produced or has since emerged.

MEAGHER, PAUL KEVIN

Dominican moral theologian and editor; b. Clarion, Pennsylvania, May 14, 1907; d. Washington, D.C., Jan. 2, 1977. Meagher's family moved to Portland, Oregon, from Pennsylvania. He joined the Holy Name Province of DOMINICANS at Ross, California in 1924. His novitate was spent in St. Rose Priory, Springfield, Kentucky; his philosophy course at River Forest, Illinois and Benicia, California; his theology at the Collegio Angelico (now the University of St. Thomas Aquinas) in Rome and at Blackfriars, Oxford, where he was ordained by Bp. Alban Goodier on May 30, 1931. At Blackfriars his mentor was Thomas GILBY, OP, and the two became life-long friends and collaborators. There also, Fr. Meagher and Fr. Gerald VANN, OP, became friends; in later years they coauthored

The Temptations of Christ (London 1966; first published as Stones Are Bread, London 1957).

Fr. Meagher's teaching career was spent chiefly at St. Albert's College, Oakland, California, a house of studies of his province. He was professor of moral theology, lector primarius (1946), and, when it became a studium generate (1949), regent of studies. He received the highest Dominican degree in 1946, being made Master of Sacred Theology by Master General Emmanuel Suárez. During these teaching years Fr. Meagher was confessor and spiritual director to the Dominican students, preached retreats, and lectured in theology to many communities of women. He also taught at the Dominican College of San Rafael and assisted in establishing a graduate program in theology there in 1946.

Fr. Meagher left St. Albert's in 1961 to join Thomas Gilby at Blackfriars in launching the 60-volume English-Latin edition of St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae (completed in 1976). The following year, however, he took on the editorship of the area on moral theology for the New Catholic Encyclopedia at the request of Card. Patrick O'BOYLE and Rev. John P. WHALEN, managing editor. In 1967 he received the annual Cardinal Spellman award for excellence in theology. From 1966 to 1970 he conceived, planned, and was editor-in-chief of the dictionary program of Corpus Instrumentorum, Inc. This work, suspended for a period between 1970-73, led to the publication of the Encyclopedic Dictionary of Religion (3 v. 1979), on which he worked until the eve of his death in spite of ill-health. The period from 1970 to 77 was also one of great pastoral activity, in which he delighted, at St. Mary's Oneonta, New York (1970-73), then at St. Mark's, Hyattsville, Maryland (1973-77). His funeral was held at St. Mark's, and he was buried in St. Dominic's Cemetery, Benicia, California.

MEASUREMENT

The process or technique of correlating numbers with things that are not patently numbered in the order of nature; also, the RELATION that arises from such a process. Measurement is usually affected by comparing observable phenomena with a suitable metric, although sometimes it is the result of a mathematical calculation based on data that are not directly accessible to experience. As employed in the physical sciences, the process of measurement is itself an interaction between a measuring instrument and the thing measured, and on this account is dependent for its objective validity on corrections (sometimes involving theoretical interpretations) to account for the perturbing effect of the instrument.

This article first presents a philosophical analysis of measurement in general, then considers specific problems associated with measurement in psychology, and concludes with a discussion of mathematical aspects of the measuring process.

MEASUREMENT IN GENERAL

Measurement, according to St. THOMAS AQUINAS, is the process by which the QUANTITY of a thing is made known (In 1 sent. 8.4.2 ad 3). It is applied directly to physical bodies (1) when their discrete quantity is ascertained, e.g., by counting the number of objects in a room, or (2) when their continuous quantity is measured, e.g., by using a scale to determine individual lengths. In current practice the term measurement is sometimes applied to counting, but is more usually reserved for determinations of dimensive or continuous quantity.

Quantitative Measurement. The elements involved in direct measurement can be explained in terms of the requirements for a quantitative measurement such as the determination of length. Such measurement first presupposes a unit; the unit may be one that occurs naturally, such as the foot, or it may be one fixed by convention. The choice of a conventional unit is not completely arbitrary, but is dictated by the unit's suitability as a minimum dimension into which lengths can be divided.

Secondly, the unit used must be homogeneous with the thing measured (In 1 anal. post. 36.11). For example, if length is to be determined, the unit must be a length. Similarly, the thing measured must be uniformly structured and continuous to permit the application of the same unit to each of its parts.

A third requirement is that the unit of measurement and the object being measured must be invariant throughout the measuring process (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 91.3 ad 3; 97.1 ad 2). This ideal is never completely realized for any physical object, since all bodies continually undergo change. Because of such variation, as well as the infinite variety of contingent circumstances that accompany any measuring process, every measurement is at best an approximation. Yet a practical invariance is not only detectable, but is more or less guaranteed by the nature of both the object measured and the standard used. For example, a person's body temperature, although varying over a small range, is held constant by natural causes. Similarly, the unit of time is determined by the rotation of the earth and the gram by the weight of one cubic centimeter of water, both of which are maintained constant through the regularity of nature's operation.

A fourth requirement is that measurement involves a judgment of comparison between the object measured and the measuring unit (Summa theologiae 1a, 79.9 ad 4).

Such a judgment is an intellectual operation, although it presupposes a physical process. The program associated with OPERATIONALISM to reduce every measurement to the manipulation of instruments alone thus disregards an essential feature of the measuring process. Instruments cannot measure. Ultimately they require mind, which, because of its reflexive character as a "self-reading instrument," can effect the judgment of comparison and make the measurement.

These requirements for the direct measurement of quantity or of bodily extension are applicable to spatio-temporal measurements (see TIME). They can be applied also to other entities, such as certain types of quality, but not without some adaptations, as will now be explained.

Qualitative Measurement. Physical qualities, because present in quantified bodies and intimately associated with the quantity of such bodies, can themselves be said to be quantified. Their quantity can be measured in two different ways, giving rise to the two measurements that are usually associated with physical quality, viz, extensive and intensive quantification from the extension of the body in which they are present; thus there is a greater amount of heat in a large body than in a small body, assuming both to be at the same temperature (cf. De virt. in comm. 11 ad 10). They receive intensive quantification, on the other hand, from the degree of intensity of a particular quality in the body (ibid.; Summa theologiae 1a, 42.1 ad 1). If two bodies are at different temperatures, for example, there is a more intense heat in the body at the higher temperature, or it is the hotter, and this regardless of the size of either.

Measurement of the extensive aspect of physical qualities, being effectively the same as the measurement of length, area, and volume, has the same requirements as that for quantitative measurement. Measurement of the intensive aspect, on the other hand, is more difficult and requires slightly different techniques.

Two possibilities suggest themselves for the measurement of a quality's intensive aspect. The simplest is to arrange objects with a given quality in the order of increasing intensity, and then number them consecutively. For example, if bodies be arranged according to increasing hotness as discernible by touch, and these bodies be numbered, the higher number indicates the greater degree of heat. This is the closest one can come to a direct intensive measurement of quality. Such a measure offers difficulties, however, because of the subjectivity of sensation and the arbitrariness of assigning numbers depending on the number of objects that happen to be compared.

The other possibility is that of determining the intensity of a quality (1) from an effect, i.e., the change the quality produces in a body other than that in which it is subjected, or (2) from a cause, i.e., the agent that produces the quality's intensity in the subject.

Effect. If the quality is an active one, i.e., if it produces alterations in other bodies, it can be measured by the effect it produces in such bodies. This is usually done through special types of bodies known as instruments. Thus heat intensity is measured by a thermometer containing a substance that expands noticeably when contacting a hot object. Similarly, the intensity of sound is measured by vibrations produced in a microphone, and light intensity by electric current generated in a photocell. In each case, the intensity of an active quality in one subject is measured by the quantity of the effect it produces in a receiving subject, which is known on this account as the measuring instrument.

Active qualities, it may be noted, can sometimes be measured independently of external alterations of the type just mentioned. If they induce pronounced quantitative changes in the subject in which they are present, they can be measured directly through measurement of the subject body. In this way the temperature of mercury in an immersion thermometer is measured simply by reading the length of its own expansion. Similarly, the wavelength of sound in a resonating chamber of variable length is measured directly, using a standing wave technique to ascertain the length of the vibrating column. Such a method of concomitant variation, however, while of theoretical interest, is of limited applicability, since it is restricted to bodies that are quantitatively sensitive to the presence of the qualities being discussed.

Cause. If a quality is not particularly active, i.e., if it does not produce pronounced effects in itself or in another body, its intensity can alternatively be measured through some type of causality required to produce it in the subject body. In this way, one measures the intensity of light on a reflecting surface by the number of footcandles emitted by the source illuminating the surface. A variation on this technique is that of using an instrumental cause to measure some modality of the principal cause that actively produces the quality. An example would be using a prism or ruled grating selectively to refract and measure the wavelength of colored light incident on an opaque surface, and in this way indirectly to measure the ability of the surface to reflect light of a particular color.

All these methods are indirect ways of measuring qualitative intensity through a cause-effect relationship. All involve techniques whereby a precise quantity is assigned to the quality being measured, and on this account are considerably more accurate and objective than direct ordinal measures of qualitative intensities. As a consequence, these constitute the type of qualitative measurement most widely used in the physical sciences.

Accuracy. As employed in physical science, a measurement cannot be made to an infinite degree of accuracy. There are two reasons why this is so. The first is that all such measurements reduce to a measurement of continuous quantity, and the only way in which number can be assigned to such quantity is in terms of a conventional unit. For infinite accuracy, this unit would have to approach zero as a limiting case. Attaining the limit would itself involve a contradiction in terms, since a number cannot be assigned to a unit of zero, or nonexistent, magnitude. The second limitation arises from specifying the conditions that attend a particular measuring process. Since these involve details that are themselves infinitely variable, they can be only approximately specified. For all practical purposes, however, it is possible to specify the range of magnitudes between which a given measurement is accurate, depending upon the unit involved and the circumstances of measurement. Some Thomistic philosophers regard such accuracy as sufficient to permit a DEMONSTRATION with the CERTITUDE that is proper to physical science, although not with that proper to mathematics, while others see this as sufficient reason for questioning the strictly demonstrative character of any conclusion of modern science that is based upon a measuring process that has the above limitations.

MEASUREMENT IN PSYCHOLOGY

In psychology, the term measurement means the assigning of numbers to quantitative variations in a distinguishable attribute of behavior, or of behaviorally related objects, with the expectation that something true or predictable may be derived from their relationship with other variables. The logic of measurement is concerned primarily with the construction of a scale or measuring device, and secondly with the application of that scale to a particular behavior or object, such as occurs in psychological testing.

Requirements for Measurement. Quantitative indexes of behavior, such as number of errors, perception time, and number of words recalled are often employed in laboratories of experimental psychology, but in a fairly simple way—e.g., as a convenience for the experimenter in distinguishing and recording various performances, where the only assumption involved is that the behaviors can be properly and meaningfully ranked. The numbers themselves refer to physical units and are not commonly scaled psychologically. Psychological scaling involves the following special features:

Isolation and Identification of a Dimension. What is measured is not an object, strictly speaking, but rather some property or dimension associated with an object, either directly, at the level of sensory observation, or indirectly, through the type of indicant specified by an operational definition. Such a property must first be qualitatively distinguished from other properties and seen as capable of quantification. Not all psychological properties are measurable, for measurability depends upon whether or not the property can be conceived in a quantitative way.

Human Significance. The numbers employed in a psychological scale must represent a value indicative of the experience or performance of the human subject, as opposed to a value inherent in the physical nature of the stimulus, situation, or condition evoking the behavior. Physics, for example, using the human subject as mediating observer, employs a physical system—e.g., a thermometer, based on a law relating liquid expansion to heat—to eliminate or reduce subjective variations within the sensing organism. The psychologist, however, is directly concerned with variations in sensation and with human performance; thus the numbers he uses must reflect, or be isomorphic with, variations in psychological meaningfulness. The basic law employed must include behavior as one of its terms.

Rule for Assigning Numbers. The derivation of a psychological scale involves perceiving or performing subjects on the one hand, and stimuli (physical objects, situations, words, tasks, or problems) on the other, and a search for some functional law relating the two. Systematic variations in the responses of the subjects, when quantified in terms of the human variation itself, become the key to establishing the function relating stimuli and responses and to assigning one, and only one, number to each object.

Usable Properties of Numbers. Not all arithmetical properties of numbers are usable in psychological scaling. The number four, for example, is greater than two (order); it is also greater by a definite amount (distance or interval); and it is counted off from zero (origin—in this case, an absolute zero) and contains two by addition or division (composition or extension). Corresponding to these distinguishable properties, scales are commonly identified as ordinal, interval, or ratio scales. The difficulty of establishing an absolute zero in psychological matters restricts the use of ratio scales, and such matters offer little opportunity for using the extensive or composite properties of numbers.

Examples of Psychological Scales. Commonly employed psychological scales include psychophysical scales, attitude scales, product and mental test scales, and multidimensional and other types of scaling procedures.

Psychophysical Scales. An instance of a psychophysical scale is the measurement of the loudness of a sound based on the Weber-Fechner law, which states that the intensity of a sensation increases as the logarithm of the stimulus. A unit difference between the logarithms of two physical sound pressures is divided into ten equal steps, called decibels. The zero is set at the point of the absolute threshold, the weakest sound that can be heard, and the scale extends to cover a range of about 140 decibels.

Attitude Scales. These are commonly derived from a large number of statements of opinion, favorable and unfavorable, about some commonly known subject such as communism or about a debatable social custom or institution. Agreement among a group of judges as to how favorable or unfavorable each opinion-statement may be is transformed into a scale value, using the law of comparative judgment. This law states that the psychological difference between items is a function of the relative frequency with which the difference is perceived. The zero is placed arbitrarily low.

Product and Mental Test Scales. Product scales, used for rating specimens of handwriting, soldering joints (in trade tests), art work, or other kinds of cultural product, are similarly based on the law of comparative judgment and have an arbitrary zero point. Mental test scales, such as those used in psychological testing, are based on a statistical analysis of the performance of a group of homogeneous subjects on each item.

Other Types. Multidimensional scaling is employed to discover the number of dimensions involved in a particular phenomenon and to rate each object on the various dimensions. An example of this type of scaling is the "semantic differential," which is used to measure the connotative meaning of common words. Other scales are used for the associative value of common words or of nonsense syllables, the frequency rating of associated responses to a standard word list, the frequency rating of words in common use, and ratings of abnormal or psychotic behavior in terms of basic trait content.

Role of Measurement in Psychology. Psychological measurement is based on empiriological properties that lend themselves readily to conceptual quantification and identification in terms of observed indicants. It thus serves to supplement logical definitions and to extend these into an area of finer objective discrimination. Among its other contributions, the following may be enumerated: (1) increased precision in identifying instances of the occurrence of a property; (2) better contexts of meaningfulness, to the extent that the assignment of numbers is based on behavioral laws; (3) evaluations of the influence of empirically established relationships on tentative definitions of objects or properties; and (4) more reliable inferences of causal relationships as these are discernible through the application of the principle of concomitant variation.

MATHEMATICAL ASPECTS

From the viewpoint of the mathematician, measurement is the determination of the value of a measure function of a given attribute of an object. A measure function is a rule that correlates a set of attributes with a set of elements (usually numbers) of an algebra. For example, the measure function called "length," which one may denote by L, is a rule or set of procedures that associates the set of attributes of "extended objects" with the set of real numbers for which addition and multiplication are already defined. The length of the edge of a table may be denoted by L(t), in which case, for example, L(t) = 3 feet 6 inches. The rule denoted by L is the set of procedures for measuring the length of the table, which results in the correlation "length of table is 3'6"."

The element correlated with "length of table," or more generally "length of x," is not merely a real number; it is a dimension number, i.e., a number plus a dimension, as, for example, "3 feet." The term "feet" refers to a unit of measurement previously established. "To measure" thus signifies that one knows a set of procedures and a unit of measurement (a dimension) such that, by applying the set of procedures, he can associate a unique number of units of measurement with a given measurable.

Requirements for Measure Functions. A minimal set of conditions imposed on a measure function are: (1) if $m(x_1)$ and $m(x_2)$ are measurements, then one and only one of $m(x_1)$ is equal to $m(x_2)$ or $m(x_1)$ is less than $m(x_2)$ or $m(x_1)$ is greater than $m(x_2)$ holds; (2) x_1 is equal to x_2 if and only if $m(x_1)$ is equal to $m(x_2)$, where x_1 and x_2 denote measurables, e.g., the length of this table and the length of that table; and (3) if $m(x_1)$ is less than $m(x_2)$ and $m(x_2)$ is less than $m(x_3)$, then $m(x_1)$ is less than $m(x_3)$. For a measure function using the set (or any subset of the set) of real numbers as dimension numbers, these conditions are easily satisfied.

In defining the measure function, one must also define the rule, i.e., the method of assigning a dimension number to each instance of the attribute. An illustration of this method can be seen in fixing the age of some person P. Evidently "age of P" is measured from the point "birth of P." Moreover, to measure age one must define a dimension, i.e., a unit of measurement. In this case "calendar year," in its ordinary meaning, can serve as the unit of measurement, which is also called the metric. One correlates the birth of P with a point on a given calendar year. The age of P at birth is defined as zero years, whereas the age of P at present is the number of calendar years from zero to the present date. This process defines a mapping of two points in the set of calendar years to two events in the life of P, and consequently defines the age of P as the "distance" between the two points in the set of calendar years.

Mapping. The problems associated with mapping may be seen in the following example. Suppose that one wishes to measure food preferences of a set of adults aged 20 to 30. He then must define a measure function that maps a set of foods into the set of elements of some algebra. The most obvious algebraic set to select is the set of nonnegative integers. The unit of measurement is the preferential attitude of an adult toward a food. The measure function m(p) is definable as follows: m(p) (F) = order of F in the ranking by person. So m(p) (cheese) = 3 means that a given individual ranks cheese third on his list.

There are difficulties involved in this procedure, however. For example, it is not clear how to define m(p) (F) = zero. The metric is neither precise nor unambiguous. The measure function gives different results at different times and for different persons. The fact that, for two individuals, the measure function for the same food gives different integers does not enable one to make any significant comparison between the two measures. Finally, the fact that the measure function for a given individual yields m(p) (F_1) = a and m(p) (F_2) = b does not provide any significant conclusion concerning the relation of the two preferences.

Whether or not a measure function can be defined for a particular attribute is an empirical problem. But when a measure function can be found that correlates the measurables with some algebra, particularly that of the real number system, the whole apparatus of mathematics becomes available for inferences. Assuming translation from mathematical equations to attributes, the mechanical derivation of mathematical consequences then suggests phenomena that may be related to the measurables.

In the empirical sciences, concrete models of the metric are often constructed, e.g., clocks, meters, and scales. Some concrete entity or objective phenomenon is then used to determine the number of units to be mapped to a particular appearance of the attribute being measured. Such an instrument can be considered to define the method of determining the measure.

Error in Measurement. There are two major sources of error in measurement: (1) the definition of the measure function, and (2) the construction and use of the measuring instrument. Since the use of the measuring instrument involves the recognition of the coincidence of "points," the degree of accuracy with which the points can be seen to coincide influences the accuracy of the measurement. The size of the unit used also affects the accuracy. For example, a length measured by a measuring instrument graduated in inches is accurate only to within ½"; thus a length of 12" is really a length between 11½" and 12½". If the length is measured with an instrument graduated to 1/2", a length of 12" means a length between 1134" and 1214". Further errors arise if, unknown to the observer, the conditions under which the measurements are taken cause the measuring instrument to be altered, or the attribute measured to be affected.

MEAUX (MELSA), ABBEY OF

Former CISTERCIAN house, near Beverley, Yorkshire, England, Diocese of York, founded from FOUN-TAINS in 1150 by William le Gros, earl of Albemarle. The first abbot, Adam, resigned in 1160 and dispersed the community because of lack of endowments. Under Philip, his successor, Meaux was impoverished by lawsuits, bad crops, and the ransom for King Richard; and the community dispersed once again. When the abbey refused King John's levy, his vengeance necessitated yet another dispersal in 1210. Monastic life resumed in 1211, but bad administration throughout the 13th century accumulated debts; these were, however, reduced from £4,000 to £400 by 1339. In 1349 the plague killed 40 out of 50 inmates; this calamity was followed by internal dissensions concerning abbacy. William of Scarborough, abbot from 1372 to 1396, enriched the fabric of the church; he was succeeded by Thomas Burton, a man of considerable ability, who represented the Yorkshire Cistercians at Vienna during the WESTERN SCHISM, taking the place of the abbot of CLAIRVAUX for the Cistercians of the Roman obedience. He resigned in 1399 and devoted the rest of his life to writing the history of the abbey, Chronica de Melsa (ed. E. Bond, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores,). Meaux possessed a splendid library and a wonderful collection of relics, listed in the Chronica. The last abbot, Richard Stopes, and 24 monks surrendered the abbey on Dec. 11, 1539.

MECCA

In Arabic Makka, city in southern Hijaz, about 70 miles from the coast of the Red Sea, the holy city of Islam and birthplace of MUḤAMMAD.

The city lies in a slight depression in the surrounding low hills. The region is oppressively hot, almost completely infertile, and devoid of rainfall, though infrequent winter storms of great violence with their concomitant torrents (sayl, pl. suyûl) present a serious threat to the lower parts of the city. The earliest history of Mecca is altogether obscure; no doubt its foundation is due to the presence of water (the sacred spring of Zamzam) and its position at the hub of a number of important trade routes joining Yemen and thereby Abyssinia and India in the south to Palestine, Syria, and Iraq in the north. According to tradition, a certain Qusayy is said to have installed the tribe Quraysh as masters of the town over the Khuzâ'a. At the time of Muhammad the city existed entirely on trade, although because of the presence of the Ka'aba (sacred Black Stone) it already formed an important religious center for the pagan Arabs. Under the reign of the UMAYYADS there was much building in the city, the great mosque (al-masjid al-harām) being completed under al-Walīd I, while a number of dikes were constructed in order to protect the Ka'aba from the danger of the sayl. During the period of the 'ABBASIDS (750-960) the city was ruled by governors appointed from Baghdad, but even from the time of al-Ma'mūn (813-833) the whole region around Mecca and Medina and Tā'if fell into near anarchy. It was subjected to the raids of the 'Alids [see 'ALĪ ('ALĪ IBN ABĪ ṬĀLIB)] some of whom managed to make themselves rulers of the holy city for brief periods. In 930 it was plundered by the Karmatians (al-Qarāmita), who carried off the Black Stone, returning it finally in 950. With the rise of the Būyids in Baghdad (945) and the Pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia.

Fāṭimids in Egypt (969), the 'Alids, taking on the title of sharīf, became the rulers of Mecca, with varying degrees of dependence upon Egypt. Under the rule of 'Ajlān (1346-75) the Sharīfs gave up the Zaydī creed (see SHĪ'TES) to follow the orthodox Shāfi'ī system thereafter. There was again a major political change with Sultan Selîm's conquest of Egypt (1517); the relative dependence of Mecca upon Constantinople and Egypt then varied with the relative strengths of the two. The city was taken by the WAHHĀBIS in 1803 but was freed by Muhammad 'Alī in 1813. In 1916 the last of the Sharīfs, Ḥusayn ibn 'Alī, made himself ruler of the independent kingdom of the Hijaz but was forced to flee when the Wahhābi 'Abd al-'Azīz ibn Sa'ūd took the city in October 1924; he was there proclaimed king of Hijaz in 1926. In the following year the sultanate of the Nejd became the Kingdom of SAUDI ARABIA, with the ruler of the combined kingdoms residing at Riyadh.

MECHANISM

Mechanism attempts to explain the physical world by the movement of inert bodies that are pushed or pulled through direct or indirect physical contact with other bodies. Its proponents often hold that local motion is the only real motion, and that a body is maintained in such motion by its own inertia or impetus. Again, they frequently reduce physical bodies to purely quantitative principles, thereby giving mathematics primacy in physical science. Mechanists likewise deny purposes as explanatory principles, and sometimes deny the existence of inherent natural goals in bodies undergoing motion. Mechanism is often, but not necessarily, associated with the view that physical bodies are composed of atoms moving in a void (see ATOMISM). It also generally entails a denial of chance or contingency in nature; thus an apparent chance event is explained by the inability of man's finite mind to grasp all the relevant physical causes.

Mechanism is sometimes completely materialistic in orientation, though it need not be so (see MATERIALISM).

Since the meaning of the term mechanism has varied in the course of time, the details of its characteristics can best be noted in a survey of its historical development.

Greek and Medieval Origins. In ancient Greek philosophy, Democritus' theory of atoms moving in a void represents one form of mechanism. These atoms exert influence on each other only by physical contact and have no natural purposes. The Epicureans also espoused this rudimentary atomism of DEMOCRITUS, which reached the zenith of its development in the De rerum natura of the Roman poet, LUCRETIUS (see EPICUREANISM).

At the end of the 13th century, the Franciscan PETER JOHN OLIVI stressed an additional characteristic of mechanism. He defended a proposal made in the 6th century by JOHN PHILOPONUS, who maintained that a hurled projectile is given an IMPETUS that enables it to continue moving after it has lost contact with the original mover. This is an anticipation of the concept of inertia that plays an important role in later mechanism. Likewise Francis of Marchia and JOHN BURIDAN, in the 14th century, developed theories of impetus.

Other 14th-century philosophers, while not denying final causality in nature, nevertheless concentrated on approaches to nature which ignored finality. At Merton College in Oxford, THOMAS BRADWARDINE, who later became archbishop of Canterbury, studied relationships between distance, time, speed, and acceleration and expressed these in mathematical formulas that were basically algebraic. At Paris, NICHOLAS ORESME did similar work using graphing techniques that anticipated the development of modern analytic geometry. These kinematic studies, though not mechanistic in themselves, fostered mathematical, rational, and nonexperimental analyses of motion that were quite compatible with the mechanistic viewpoint.

Medieval mechanicians also considered forces acting on bodies and thus made beginnings in the science of dynamics that matched their work in kinematics. In his analysis of motive and resistive forces, Aristotle had stated that when a force was sufficient to put a body in motion, the velocity of the body was directly proportional to the force acting on it and indirectly proportional to the resistance of the medium through which it moved. In order to give intelligent meaning to Aristotle's proportionality, and also to explain why a small force cannot initiate motion, Bradwardine developed a logarithmic law of motion. This was not as accurate as later laws, but it did represent an improvement over earlier Aristotelian analyses.

In the 15th century NICHOLAS OF CUSA, although not a complete mechanist, invoked an impetus theory to explain the movements of the heavenly bodies. For him, God initiates all movement, but bodies afterward maintain themselves in motion. Cusanus was likewise sympathetic to atomism and the principle of the conservation of matter. The notion of impetus as a sustaining cause for local motion was accepted also by Leonardo da Vinci. In general, these late medieval philosophers advocated goals or purposes for moving bodies but did not concentrate upon them in their physics.

Scientific Revolution. In the early 17th century, Galileo GALILEI adopted and greatly promoted several ideas characteristic of mechanism. In his controversial work Dialogue on the Two Chief Systems of the World Galileo discussed sympathetically the Aristotelian doctrine of natural place as the normal goal of local motion. But in a later work, Discourse on Two New Sciences, he avoided discussions of purposes and concentrated on describing in mathematical terms how motions occur. His mechanism here consisted in denying the fruitfulness of studying purposes in physics rather than in denying that finality exists. Galileo also accepted the atomism of Democritus. He made colors, sounds, and other qualities subjective and stressed mathematics as the proper instrument for discovering physical natures.

In England at about the same time Francis BACON developed a system employing mechanistic features. He rejected the notion of Aristotle and of most medieval scholars that bodies have nonmathematical substantial forms and are the subjects of real qualities. While the Democritan idea of atoms moving in a void appealed to him, he regarded this as a hypothesis, and anything that was merely postulated and not immediately evident he looked upon with suspicion. Thus he differed from Galileo, who accepted atomism uncritically and favored a postulational approach in his science. Bacon believed in final causes or purposes in nature, but eliminated them from scientific considerations because he did not consider them useful for technological applications.

The writings of Johann KEPLER on the nature of the physical world were an unusual combination of science and mysticism. Pythagorean and Neoplatonic in his leanings, he nevertheless held some doctrines that are compatible with a mechanistic cosmology. Thus for him the real world is quantitative, and real qualities outside of man are reduced to the quantitative relations studied in mathematics.

Hobbes, Gassendi, and Descartes. Thomas HOBBES, a 17th-century Englishman, was clearly mechanistic in his views of the nature of the physical world. In his analysis of bodies he reduced all phenomena to matter in local motion. Hobbes was also much impressed with the power of quantitative analysis, and eliminated Aristotelian final causes or purposes for his science. While he did not deny that spiritual substances exist, he denied that philosophy could come to a knowledge of such substances. Therefore, for him, philosophy must be materialistic as well as mechanistic.

Furthermore, in Hobbes one sees mechanism linked to a general SKEPTICISM about man's ability to know the natures of things. The Greek atomists, Galileo, and Descartes, to the extent that they exhibited mechanistic elements in their work, believed that they were making statements about the natures of physical things. But Hobbes' skepticism caused him to associate mechanical conceptions with the appearances of things alone, and not with their true natures.

The impact of mechanistic thought in France in the early 17th century is reflected in the works of Pierre GASSENDI and René DESCARTES. Gassendi, a philosopher and mathematician, was an atomist. In fact he identified the Aristotelian notion of prime matter with the atoms of Democritus and Epicurus. He also accepted the ancient Greek notion that these atoms move in a void.

Descartes's view of the physical world is a classical statement of mechanism. For him final causality does not pertain to the study of cosmology. Descartes is also a good example of a mechanist who is not an atomist. Since he holds that extension is the essence of matter, wherever there is space there must be matter; therefore there is no void in which atoms can move. The entire cosmos is thus filled with rigid matter or with vortices of a very subtle matter. Causal influence is produced by the direct contact of bodies or by their indirect contact through some material medium.

Again, if extension is the essence of bodies, it follows that mathematics will be the science best suited to study their natures. In the thought of THOMAS AQUINAS and other scholastics, the substantial form is a principle of unity which makes the whole somehow greater than the aggregate of the parts. In the mechanistic world of Descartes, on the other hand, the universe resembles a mathematical whole which is merely the summation of its parts.

Boyle and Newton. In late 17th-century England, Robert Boyle continued the mechanist tradition. He affirmed that the qualities of bodies are derived from the size, shape, and local motion of their parts. Like other mechanists, he rejected the substantial forms of Aristotle and was hostile toward using the notion of natural end in physics. Yet his mechanistic views in cosmology never led him to doubt the reality or importance of spiritual entities.

At the same period, Sir Isaac Newton produced his great synthesis, which is usually associated with mechanistic philosophy. It does exhibit some key characteristics of mechanism, such as its aversion for final causality and its brilliant mathematical approach. But other aspects of Newton's thought, as expressed in The Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy, The Opticks, and his correspondence, reveal the presence of nonmechanical elements. While he accepts atomism and the notion of absolute space, for example, he also speaks of electric spirits. His famous three laws of motion are mechanistic in the sense that they invoke inertia, make no reference to finality, regard all motions as extrinsically determined, and explain causal interaction by making action mathematically equivalent to reaction. Yet Newton's universal law of gravitation, subsuming, as it does, celestial and terrestial phenomena under one law, is not mechanical in such a clear sense. It posits a mysterious force between bodies. These influence each others' motions even though they are not, and have never been, in contact. Though action through a void is not proposed, no physical substantial medium is posited. Cartesian mechanism is thus not in complete accord with the Newtonian variety (see MOTION).

Rise of Dynamism. G. LEIBNIZ strongly attacked Descartes's conception of the physical world. He claimed that both inorganic and organic bodies have within themselves unextended (and hence immaterial) substantial realities which he called monads (see MONAD). These simple unextended dynamic entities were centers of force and were inherently active in nature. Although Leibniz's cosmological system is sometimes referred to as DYNA-MISM, it still incorporates some characteristics of mechanism. Whereas Descartes believed that the total quantity of motion in the universe was constant, Leibniz asserted the total amount of physical energy in the universe to be constant. Even God could not change this, and all motions of bodies were thus preestablished harmoniously by God. Leibniz also characterized the universe as a perfect clock that, once started, needs no adjusting. That Leibniz held this mechanical view of the universe is clear from his criticism of Newton's affirmation that God intermittently changes the courses of planets and comets, and thereby compensates for celestial irregularities.

Immanuel Kant was an 18th-century physicist turned philosopher. In his early writings, he was influenced not only by Leibniz's RATIONALISM, but also by the latter's proposal that force, as found in the monad, was more fundamental than space and time. Kant was influenced also by Ruggiero Boscovich, who, like Leibniz, rejected atoms and made points of force his fundamental cosmological entities. In his early work Kant had sought a compromise between the position of Leibniz, which made force more fundamental, and that of Descartes, which made extension and space more fundamental. Nevertheless, in his writings before the Critique of Pure Reason, the view of Leibniz seems to have predominated; for Kant, force, which may be both attractive and repulsive, leads to the notion of space by way of the notions of connection and order. Then, in his post-critical period, under the influence of David HUME, with his EMPIRICISM and skepticism, he denied the ability of the mind to know natures in the physical world. In this period, Kant reversed himself and attempted to work from a priori forms of space and time to the notions of order, connection, and force.

Undoubtedly, the views of Boscovich, Kant, and Leibniz conflict with the strict mechanism of Descartes. Yet they do not conflict with some tenets of mechanism such as those which would exclude final causality. Again, Kant never confused the study of pure mathematics with the study of the physical world. Even in his critical period, he saw mathematics as a set of deductions from clear definitions. Since philosophy of nature, as exemplified in Newtonian physics, derives its basic concepts from sense experience and these concepts are somewhat indistinct, definitions come at the end of the reasoning process in the philosophy of nature. For Kant, philosophy as a whole should follow the same procedure as physics.

Decline of Mechanism. Despite the sophisticated analyses of Leibniz, Boscovich, and Kant, atomistic versions of mechanism did not die in the 18th century. Several new attempts were made to explain gravitation atomistically. A vortex theory involving small particles was proposed by J. Bernoulli; according to this, bodies were pushed to earth by tiny pellets of a mysterious nature, in turn driven down by whirling motions in the heavens. It should be pointed out, however, that in the late 18th and early 19th centuries strong antimechanistic currents already existed in the form of philosophical ROMANTICISM and IDEALISM.

Within physics itself the central position of mechanics in physics was concurrently being challenged. New work in heat, light, electricity, and magnetism, as well as in the foundations of mathematics, challenged the ideas of strict mechanism. Hermann von Helmholtz maintained that the sum total of all forms of energy remains constant. This was in accord with mechanism in some ways, for it posited a closed nonevolutionary universe. Nevertheless, heat, light, and electrical energy now enjoyed equal status with mechanical energy. The second law of thermodynamics, formulated by Carnot and Kelvin, again departs from mechanism. In relating this law to mechanism it should be noted that it involves no presuppositions regarding the existence of atoms or of the void, and utilizes the concept of "unavailable energy," which itself suggests a return to the occult qualities of the scholastics.

Field Concepts. In the areas of light and electricity, Young's diffraction experiments favored the wave theory of light over the more mechanistic corpuscular theory. This trend continued with the work of Michael Faraday. It culminated in the contribution of James Clerk Maxwell, who synthesized optical, electrical, and magnetic phenomena in his famous field theory, a theory that posited an ether and avoided the notions of atom and void. This theory also postulated the mysterious ability of bodies to influence each other when not in direct physical contact and when not connected by any obvious physical medium.

Additional difficulties for mechanistic philosophy developed from new studies on the foundations of mathematics. The work of Lobachevskiĭ, Riemann, and others introduced the concepts of non-Euclidean or curved geometries, and thereby questioned the objectivity of Euclidean straight-line geometry. This, in turn, affected the acceptance of Newtonian mechanics, since the law of inertia affirmed that the motion of a body tended to be in a straight line, just as the law of gravity affirmed that two bodies tend to approach each other in straight lines.

Positivism and Conventionalism. Scientists and philosophers toward the beginning of the 20th century undertook to draw philosophical implications from these new developments in science. Their thought led to a gradual acceptance of what is called positivist philosophy. Auguste COMTE, who earlier had introduced POSITIVISM, affirmed that our minds can only grasp phenomena or positive data. His basic idea was developed by three leading scientific minds, Ernst Mach, Pierre Duhem, and Henri Poincaré, all of whom reacted against classical mechanism. Mach criticized Newtonian mechanics on the grounds that its definitions of concepts such as force, mass, and acceleration were in fact circular, and that its laws were not objective representations of the physical world. Duhem and Poincaré thought along similar lines, although they concentrated more on the analysis of scientific methodology.

Relativity and Quantum Theory. The failure of the Michelson-Morley experiment (1887) to detect the notion of light relative to an ether or absolute space led Albert EINSTEIN to propose the thesis that the Newtonian concepts of absolute space, absolute rest, and absolute motion were meaningless in physics. In conformity with this view, in the theory of special relativity formulated in 1905, he postulated that the measured velocity of light would be constant and that the laws of physics would be the same in all systems of coordinates moving at constant velocity with respect to each other. Applying this to the laws of conservation of momentum and conservation of energy for collision problems, he deduced that the mass of a body varies with its velocity and that matter can be converted into energy. These notions have served to undermine the conception of matter in Newtonian mechanics and in philosophical mechanism. Again, while the notion of inherent finality or purpose in nature does not appear in the theory of special relativity, the concept of space-time geodesic associated with general relativity seems compatible with this type of teleology.

A second major reason for the downfall of strict mechanistic physics in the 20th century is found in quantum theory. Significant contributions to this microcosmic theory were made by Planck, Bohr, De Broglie, and Heisenberg in the first quarter of the century. Quantum theory, like relativity theory, discarded the idea of the void. De Broglie's work blurred the distinction between energy waves and corpuscles, and rejected the notion that subatomic particles have definite boundaries like billiard balls. Heisenberg's uncertainty principle, formulated in 1927, left room for chance and contingency in nature, as opposed to the determinism associated with the mechanism of Pierre Simon de Laplace. Again, there are intimations in recent theories that a whole atom is somehow more than the mechanical summation of its parts. Yet quantum theory seems to take no explicit account of purpose or finality in the processes of nature.

Out of relativity and quantum theory came a variation of positivism called OPERATIONALISM, which stresses that meaningful physical concepts can be derived only from measured activities of bodies. This fosters skepticism regarding the ability of the mind to reach the natures of things, and to this degree resembles the thought of Hobbes. Other streams of early 20th-century philosophy broke with mechanism in varying degrees— WHITEHEAD, BERGSON, the pragmatists, and the existentialists all stressed different points of departure (see EXISTENTIALISM).

Mechanism and Thomism. The most fundamental difference between mechanism and THOMISM is the former's denial of, and the latter's affirmation of, the existence of intrinsic purposes or goals for motions occurring in nature. Thomists and other scholastics assert the presence of finality in nature and use the manifestation of NAT-URAL LAW at the inorganic level as a foundation for its broader extension to the realms of organic and of human activity (see FINAL CAUSALITY). A mechanist philosophy does not encourage this type of reasoning.

Another basic difference is the attitude toward quantity and the notion of absolute space. Scholastic philosophers, following Aristotle, maintain that quantity is an accident of a physical body, and not its essence, as would be maintained by Cartesians. Therefore, while admitting the importance of mathematics and mathematical physics, they do not concede to these sciences complete autonomy from natural philosophy when using quantitative techniques to investigate the nature of the physical world (see PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE). Again, scholastics, such as Aquinas, deny the existence of a void or of absolute space, like that espoused by Newton, and in place of these notions apply the Aristotelian notion of natural PLACE to the analysis of local MOTION.

Scholastics likewise reject the atomistic concepts usually associated with mechanism. While affirming the existence of elementary particles, they do not regard these as indivisible subsisting entities, and maintain that a natural body is more than a mechanical aggregate of its parts. Thus they explain the organization and functioning of all bodies, including the inorganic, through an internal principle called the substantial form (see MATTER AND FORM; HYLOSYSTEMISM).

Finally, with regard to the strict determinism affirmed by classical mechanists, scholastic philosophers allow for a basic indeterminism in nature which permits the existence not only of CHANCE, but also of FREE WILL and miracles. Notwithstanding this, they still assert confidence in the ability of the human mind to attain truth and certitude through the habit of SCIENCE, and thus reject skepticism in favor of epistemological REALISM.

MECHANISM, BIOLOGICAL

Any application of the general principles of MECHA-NISM to the explanation of life and vital processes. The several varieties of biological mechanism that have appeared in the history of thought are first explained in this article and then subjected to philosophical analysis and critique.

Early Forms. Histories of biological mechanism commonly begin with the examination of Cartesian DU-ALISM. Both Aristotle and THOMAS AQUINAS, however, found themselves in opposition to a doctrine, similar to mechanism, elaborated as early as the 5th century B.C. This doctrine figures importantly in the objections raised by Simmias in Plato's Phaedo. Simmias, who had studied under a Pythagorean, Philolaus, argues in the Phaedo that life must be understood as flowing from a particular harmony of the body. This position may have arisen from a coalescence of the Pythagorean enthusiasm for explaining the whole of reality in terms of numerical proportions and of the Empedoclean thesis current in the Sicilian school of medicine, viz, that health consists in a balance of four basic qualities hot, cold, dry, and wet.

Aristotle and St. Thomas object to this position as if it were arguable on at least two levels, although they do not themselves explicitly distinguish these levels in their writings. The first sort of objection addresses itself to the inadequacy, for the explanation of vital phenomena, of certain special features of contemporary physics: vitality cannot be explained in terms of warmth, for fire tends to increase without limit; the explanation of nutrition and growth in terms of the tendency of the elements to move to their natural places ignores the unique function of roots and leaves in plants; the explanation of vital organization in terms of the ratio and spatial arrangement of physical elements accounts for special tissues or organs, but not for the organism as a whole.

The second sort of objection is more general, seeming to reject, principle, the possibility of any explanation of vital activity in terms of the concept of physical organization, regardless of the complication this concept might undergo with the advance of physical theories. For example, it is argued that the "harmony," or organization, of a living body cannot explain its spontaneous initiation of its own movements ("nor can harmony move a body. . .") and that any explanation in terms of structural or physically organizing principles ignores the fact that structure is inherently variable or modifiable without limit, whereas a thing is either living or it is not: "Substance has no contrary, and does not admit a variation of degree" (C. gent. 2.63–64; cf. In 1 anima. 9, In 2 anima. 8; Aristotle, anim. 407b 30–409a 30, 416a 1–15).

Modern Types. The controversy between Aristotle and St. Thomas, on the one hand, and the mechanists of their day, on the other hand, may be clarified in terms of a modern distinction of mechanism into three types, characterized roughly by the adjectives physical, biological, and philosophical.

Physical Mechanism. The first type holds that biological laws may be explained by deriving them from a postulate set including the basic laws of physics and chemistry and a small number of additional, compatible postulates. This definition is both flexible and vague: obviously the laws regarded as basic in physics and chemistry do not remain the same in succeeding epochs. In the history of thought, science has moved from Empedocles's earth, air, fire, and water, to the solid, uncutable, and elastic atom of the 17th and 18th centuries, to the present, nearly organic model of the atom as an ordered array of electrically charged particles, capable of varying degrees of stability or reactivity. The words "small" and "compatible" appearing in the definition of this type of mechanism are left deliberately vague to reflect the informal character of the conditions of scientific advance. The standards of economy and consistency proper to a scientific theory are dependent on such a great variety of cultural and scientific factors that is inappropriate to attempt to specify them in a formal way.

A current variant of this type of mechanism, proposed by J. J. C. Smart (1963), holds that the complication of physical and chemical laws in biological systems inevitably involves reference to the idiosyncratic history of evolution on earth, i.e., to organisms that have the properties they do, not for any generally statable theoretical reason, but because they happened to evolve at a particular time under particular circumstances. In this view, biology is a form of technology or engineering rather than a science proper; its concern with the application of the laws of physics and chemistry is comparable to that of the electrical engineer, who is not properly concerned with the discovery of universal laws of nature. The key assumption of Smart's mechanism, viz, that the complicating postulates enabling the application of the laws of physics and chemistry to biological phenomena are inevitably of limited, contingent significance, is too recent to have been subjected to thorough debate.

Biological Mechanism. A second type of mechanism VITALISM. It rejects the introduction, into theoretical biology, of factors that either (1) fail to increase the simplicity and scope (fertility) of biological theory, (2) fail to increase the precision and facility with which biological theory may be empirically confirmed, or (3) are conceivable only by "anthropomorphic empathy," in terms of such concepts as will, desire, and urge.

This type of mechanism is compatible with the recognition, e.g., in genetics or physiology, of system laws that elude reduction to laws governing physical and chemical processes. It may admit the unpredictable course of evolutionary history and the irreducibility of the principal of natural selection. Mendel's laws and the principles of crossing-over are also seen as eluding derivation from the theoretical principles of physics and chemistry.

Biological mechanism seems to involve the positive requirement that biological phenomena lend themselves to explanation in terms that have the same logical form as those of physics and chemistry. Yet neither the concepts nor the basic laws of biology and physics are required to be identical or even similar, so long as biology and physics have a similar theoretical structure.

This type of mechanism might be said to have as its primary aim, the preservation and clarification of an autonomous scientific method of inquiry into biological phenomena. So understood, it is not necessarily incompatible with philosophies of nature that recognize the independent validity of nonphilosophical investigation of vital processes, or that speculate about the human or metaphysical significance of such scientific inquiry.

Philosophical Mechanism. Whereas biological mechanism is primarily methodological, and hopefully neutral in substantive philosophical debate, the third type of mechanism is thoroughly philosophical, both in its inception and in its ultimate claims. It is primarily associated with R. DESCARTES, who may have been innocent of its more exaggerated aspects, but whose trenchant dicta do not always establish this innocence beyond question.

Descarte's mechanism shares all the strengths and weaknesses of his metaphysical system as a whole. Its foundations are the methodic DOUBT and the intuition of the existence of the thinking self. Its consequences are formulated as an absolute and exhaustive account of the nature of all reality below the level of human consciousness: inorganic objects, plants, animals, and the human body itself. Thus understood, the foundation of Cartesian mechanism are not tentative and subject to the pragmatic tests of scope and precision; they are indubitable, primitive truths: man cannot doubt his own act of thought in doubting, but he can doubt the existence of any physical object whatsoever, including his own body. This difference marks mind and body as distinct concepts; and in the Cartesian system, reinforced with proofs that God is omnipotent and benevolent, separate conceivability is the surest mark of separate existence. Mind and body are distinct substances, totally distinct types of reality, each with its own laws and essential characteristics.

Biological mechanism excludes evidence gathered by means of "anthropomorphic empathy" from biology because of the practical difficulty in getting general agreement as to the meaning and consequences of such evidence. Philosophical mechanism, on the other hand, insists on the same exclusion because of a prior philosophical decision to regard consciousness and life as irreducibly distinct realms of reality.

Descartes also appears to have been committed to an excessively rigid version of physical mechanism, insisting that all the laws of biology and animal behavior are explicable in terms of a physics whose single primitive term was extension and whose dominant explanatory model was simple, mechanical clock work. It is a simple fact of history that Harvey's revolutionary success in explaining the circulation of the blood in terms of a mechanical system of a pump and vessels or tubes fitted with valves was not duplicated in efforts to explain "animal heat" and embryological development in terms of the same sort of clockwork. The explanation of these latter phenomena waited for the development of biochemical theories employing a more complex explanatory apparatus than that suggested by such concepts as pump, friction, momentum, and so on.

It may be argued that Cartesian mechanism leads to such a parochial form of physical mechanism because of its insistence on the privileged, clear and distinct status of its basic concepts, which consequently are made to seem beyond the need of the gradual process of reform and modification characteristic of scientific concepts as understood in biological mechanism and in more open forms of physical mechanism.

Analysis and Critique. The inadequacy of Decartes's rigid physical mechanism seems to follow upon the self-reforming, progressive nature of scientific method. To reply to this sort of inadequacy by the construction of a similarly inflexible form of vitalism is to share the fallacious belief that scientific concepts must be so clear and distinct that they are unchangeable, closed to modification in terms of expanding contexts and altered relations among themselves. Hans Driesch seems to have made this sort of error in reacting to the limits and indequacies of simple preformationist theories in embryology, T. H. Morgan opened a new field of biological research in the related and extremely productive area of genetics. Morgan explicitly advocated biological mechanism.

The foregoing discussion should clarify the issues involved in the two-level criticism of mechanism made by Aristotle and St. Thomas. At the first level, in objecting to explanations of vital activity in terms of the natural movement of fire or of some harmonic balance of the tendencies of physical elements to move to their natural places, they point out the inevitable shortcomings of any rigid form of physical mechanism that assumes that inorganic theories of the moment are totally adequate for the explanation of vital processes.

At the second level, careful research on a variety of related topics is still necessary to determine their evaluation of the more recent forms of mechanism as used in biological theory. The weight of evidence concerning their positions on the irreducible variety of man's methods of approaching truth seems to exclude the possibility of their opposition to all mechanistic explanations. In fact, the flexibility and pragmatic fertility of such explanations count against any attempt to reject their scientific acceptability. The only appropriate criterion by which they can be judged is their actual success or failure in the organization and clarification of biological research. On the other hand, philosophical mechanism suggests that all knowledge of life below the level of human consciousness is to be gained through a single method and explained in terms of a single set of univocal concepts. This form of mechanism is invalidated by the observation that such terms as substantial unity, vitality, and even homeostasis exhibit an analogical variety of uses, and by the continued use of a variety of techniques—molecular, cellular, organic, ecological, and ethological—for the accumulation of biological data.

MECHITAR

Armenian Catholic priest, founder of the MECHITAR-ISTS; b. Sivas (Sebaste), Asia Minor, Feb. 7, 1676; d. San Lazzaro (Venice), Italy, April 27, 1749. Baptized Peter Manug, Mechitar was educated at the schismatic Armenian monastery of Garmir-Vanq (Red Monastery), where he later (1691) received the religious habit from Bishop Ananya and took the name Mechitar (Mehitar; "consoler"). A chance encounter with a Catholic missionary and an Armenian noble at Erzurum, Asia Minor, provided him with keen insights into Western culture and Catholicism. On a voyage to Syria he went to Aleppo, where he met Antoine Beauvillers, SJ, who received him into the Catholic Church and urged him to visit Rome. A sudden malady prevented this, and he returned to Sivas in 1695. Ordained a priest at Surp-Nišsan (Holy Cross) monastery (1696), he received the title vartapet (doctor) in 1699. The church of St. George in Constantinople became the center of his apostolate to unite the Armenian Church with Rome, and in 1701 he founded the Order of St. Anthony for pastoral, educational, and scientific endeavors.

Mechitar's preaching and promotion of union with Rome aroused the hostility of Patriarch Ephraim and his successor, Avedek, and resulted in Mechitar's departure from Constantinople for Modone (Morea), in the territory then belonging to Venice, where he built a monastery and church. Rome approved his congregation (1711), but substituted St. Benedict's Rule for that of St. Anthony. The Turkish occupation of Modone (1715) forced Mechitar's withdrawal to Venice, where he was given the use of the island of San Lazzaro.

A great monastery with church and library was completed in 1740, and a printing press was established. Mechitar published approximately 20 works, dealing mainly with theology and philosophy. Notable among his writings are his commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew (1737); his Armenian grammar, dictionary, and catechism; and an Armenian edition of the Bible (1733).

MECHITARISTS

The Benedictine Armenian Antonines, known also as Mechitarists, are members of an Armenian Catholic monastic congregation that follows the Benedictine Rule. They were founded in 1701 at Constantinople by MECHITAR. Father Stephen Melkonen, who was elected superior general in 1750, revised the constitutions. This move, although approved by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1762, was opposed by a segment of the congregation. The failure of a general chapter (1772) to restore peace occasioned a division into two groups, one centered in Venice, Italy; the other in Vienna, Austria. Both groups work for a renaissance of the Armenian people through education and preaching and have a similar form of government, ruled by an abbot general and his assistants.

Ordo Mechitaristarum Venetiarum. The Mechitarists of Venice (OMechVen), whose revised constitutions were approved in 1928, transferred to that city from the Near East in 1715 and have as their specific aim the union of dissident Armenians with the Catholic Church. The generosity of two wealthy Armenian merchants enabled the congregation to found Raphael College at Venice (1836) and Samuel Moorat College at Padua (1834), later moved to Paris. Here Abp. Denis Affre permitted, under certain conditions, the matriculation of some Armenian dissidents. Closed by the Franco–Prussian War, the college in Paris was united to that of Venice and later reestablished at Sèvres, near Paris (1929).

The Armenian Academy at San Lazzaro was established in Rome through the efforts of Stephen Kövér Akontz, later abbot (1800–24) and titular archbishop of Siunia. Abbot Placide Sukias Somal (1824-46) collected some 3,000 manuscripts, thus contributing toward making San Lazzaro a center of Armenian scholarship. During his superiorship the great dictionary of the Armenian language was published (1836), and the scientific and literary periodical Pazmaveb was begun (1843). The congregation has schools at Istanbul, Turkey (1810); Aleppo, Syria (1936); Alexandria, Egypt (1936); and Buenos Aires, Argentina (1956); and a minor seminary at Bikfaya, Lebanon (1948). In 1965 there were four religious houses and 54 members engaged in the direction of two colleges and four schools as well as in the publication of the periodicals Pazmaveb and Endanik, and other Armenian classical, historical, and ecclesiastical works, at the publishing house on the island of San Lazzaro (Venice).

Ordo Mechitaristarum Vindobonensis. The Mechitarists of Vienna (OMechVd), whose constitutions were approved in 1885, are engaged especially in pastoral work for Armenians. After separating from the Mechitarists of Venice in 1772, they went to Trieste, where, under the protection of Empress Maria Theresa, they established a separate congregation. During the reign of their first abbot, Adeodatus Babighian (1803-25), they were forced to seek refuge in Vienna (1809), where St. Clement HOFBAUER was of great assistance. The congregation prospered under succeeding abbots, especially under Abbot Aristakes Azarian (1826–55), and undertook pastoral activity among the Armenians of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. At the motherhouse in Vienna there are a school, a theological college, a museum of natural history, a library, and a printing establishment that publishes books in many languages and the Armenian periodical Handés Amsorya. In 1965 the congregation had 32 members, who staffed parishes in Budapest, Hungary; Cambridge, Mass.; and Los Angeles, Calif.; and colleges in Istanbul, Turkey (1811); Heliopolis (Cairo), Egypt (1935); and Beirut, Lebanon (1937).

MECHTILD OF HACKEBORN, ST.

Cistercian nun and mystic; b. Castle of Helfta, near Eisleben, Saxony, c. 1240; d. Helfta monastery, Nov. 19, 1298 (1299?). When Mechtild was seven years old, her parents brought her to visit her sister, Gertrude of Hackeborn, a nun of the monastery at Rodarsdorf, and at her request her parents permitted Mechtild to enter the cloister school. There her sister carefully supervised her education. Mechtild (or Matilda) was amiable and charming, highly gifted in mind and body, and possessed an excellent voice. In 1258 Gertrude, abbess since 1251, transferred her monastery to Helfta, and soon it became a center of learning, culture, and profound spirituality. Mechtild followed her and was appointed choirmistress and directress of the new cloister school. She became the spiritual mother of St. GERTRUDE THE GREAT, who, as a child of five in 1261, was entrusted to Mechtild's care.

Throughout her life, Mechtild received extraordinary graces. In 1292 she began to confide the secrets of her interior life to Gertrude the Great and another nun, and for seven years, without Mechtild's knowledge, her revelations were committed to writing. When she discovered this, she was at first deeply disturbed, but at last permitted Gertrude to edit what is now known as the Liber specialis gratiae.

The book is constructed upon the ecclesiastical year; it is liturgical, Trinitarian, and Christocentric, warmly affective and joyful, giving evidence of Mechtild's sound theological education. She urges the use of all the senses in the praise of God and stresses devotion to the Heart of Christ. Largely through the efforts of the Friars Preachers, who were in close contact with the nuns of Helfta, her book was widely read, especially in Italy. It has been suggested that she or Mechtild of Magdeburg may be the Matelda in Dante's Purgatorio. Iconography usually shows her with a book and a dove, holding a burning heart or healing a blind nun.

Feast: May 31.

MECHTILD OF MAGDEBURG

Beguine mystic; b. Saxony, c. 1209; d. Helfta, between 1282 and 1294. Mechtild was apparently of noble or well-born parents. According to her own testimony, her first mystical experience occurred when, at the age of 12, she was greeted by the Holy Spirit. Desiring to live wholly for God, she became a Beguine at Magdeburg in 1230, and under the direction of the Dominicans led a life of intense prayer and austerity for 40 years. The hostility aroused by her extraordinary spiritual experiences and by her severe criticism of the clergy forced her, in 1270, to leave Magdeburg. Ailing and partially blind, she sought refuge in the Cistercian convent at Helfta, where she was warmly received by SS. MECHTILD OF HACKEBORN and GERTRUDE THE GREAT. She remained there, in the congenial atmosphere of holiness, until her death. Although regarded as a saint by her contemporaries, she has not been canonized.

Mechtild's writings, begun in 1250 and completed sometime after 1270, were collected by her friends and widely distributed under the title of Das fliessende Licht der Gottheit, from the words supposedly spoken to Mechtild by Christ saying that she was to be a witness to the ''light of my divinity flowing into all hearts that live without guile'' (vliessende licht miner gotheit in allu die herzen die da lebent ane valscheit). The original Low German text is lost, but a South German translation and a Latin translation from c. 1290 are extant.

Das fliessende Licht consists of somewhat disconnected compositions of varying length. There are spiritual poems about mystical experiences, love songs, and allegories, visions, moral reflections, and solid admonitions. Mechtild often borrows the language and imagery of the Song of Songs and frequently uses dialogue in the manner of the minnesingers. Her writings show that she was acquainted with the works of Bernard of Clairvaux, William of Saint-Thierry, the Victorines, David of Augsburg, Hildegard of Bingen, and Gregory the Great. While Das fliessende Licht lacks theological content, it does contain sound mystical doctrine and shows Mechtild's profound understanding of the mystery of Christ's love and mercy. Her poetry, which is interspersed throughout the book, reveals talent of a remarkably high order. Unfortunately, her poetic imagination obviously colors much of her writing, especially her descriptions of hell. It has been suggested that Dante was influenced by her, and that she is the Matelda referred to in Purgatorio, Cantos 27 to 33.

MEDALS, RELIGIOUS

A religious medal is a piece of some solid substance generally but not necessarily metallic, in the form of a coin, adorned with some religious inscription or image, usually fitted to be worn suspended from the neck. Such devotional medals have been in use from the early Christian ages. St. Zeno (4th century) cited the wearing of medals as an example of the Church's practice of sanctifying pagan usages. He also referred to a custom of giving newly baptized Christians a medal to commemorate their baptism. A 5th-century life of St. Geneviève tells of St. Germain bestowing on her a medal marked with the sign of the cross, which was to be a memorial to her of her vow of virginity.

One medal bearing images of SS. Peter and Paul facing one another has been ascribed to the 2d century. Another, portraying a martyr, presumed to be St. Lawrence, on a grill, is assigned to the late 4th century. There are many others bearing religious images and dating from the 4th through the 8th century. Often coins of the late empire were stamped with the chrismon or with a figure of Christ, and it is thought that such pieces of money were converted to pious use as medals. The practice was widespread and was familiar at Rome and Constantinople, as well as in Africa.

There are no certain examples of religious medals from the early Middle Ages, but in the 12th century a custom grew of making medals, "pilgrim signs," cast in lead to commemorate well-known shrines. This custom was known in Rome; in 1200 Innocent III granted the canons of St. Peter's a monopoly of casting pilgrim signs for distribution to those visiting the basilica. Also, there are references to pilgrim signs for Canterbury, England, Santiago de Compostela, Spain, the Holy Land, and Assisi, Italy.

A type of medal called a jetton appeared in the 13th century and was used until modern times. These medals bore either initials or a device by which the owner could be identified. They were used as a sort of ticket or calling card, and sometimes as money. Besides the mark of identification, the jetton usually bore a pious motto, such as: "Love God and Praise Him"; "O Lord, Our God"; or "Hail Mary, Mother of God." The commonest motto used on the jetton was IHS, a way of writing the name Jesus. This jetton seems to have been connected with the devotion to the HOLY NAME.

Medals commemorating religious events, e.g., the preaching of Savonarola and papal jubilees, began to be popular in the 15th century. Religious medals as they are known today began to appear in the 16th century, and the blessing of medals came into use at this time. Pius V is credited with inaugurating the custom. In 1566 he blessed and indulgenced a medal bearing the image of Jesus and Mary. The usage spread rapidly. By the 17th century, every city in Europe had its own medals featuring Christ or His Mother, or a favorite saint or devotion. Surveys show types of medals beyond number. The events of Our Lord's life, the apparitions of Our Lady, the saints and blessed were commemorated in medals of some kind.

Religious medals used by Catholics are not to be regarded as magic charms and amulets. Such superstition has been severely condemned by the Church (H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum 477, 581, 601, 1823).

Catholic teaching attributes no intrinsic power to medals, blessed or not. The medal is a symbol that recalls to the believer his faith and his religious duties. Such a reminder moves him to acts of reverence to God or to Christ, immediately or mediately through the sacred person or event represented by the medal. It is not from the medal that the believer expects help or on which he puts reliance. The medal occasions acts of faith and hope in God whom it represents either directly or indirectly.

MÉDARD OF NOYON, ST.

Bishop; b. Salency (Picardy), France, early sixth century; d. c. 557. The son of a Frankish nobleman and a Gallo-Roman mother, Médard studied in Salency and Tournai. He succeeded Bp. Alomer of Vermand (c. 530). According to a highly suspect account by Bp. Radbod of Noyon (c. 1180), Médard moved the episcopal see to NOYON because of barbarian attacks and at the same time took over the Diocese of Tournai; the two sees were united until 1114. Médard accepted the monastic vows of Queen RADEGUNDA; his career was noteworthy for active missionary work. The Feast of the Roses, on which each year the most exemplary maiden of Salency received a crown of roses in church, is considered to be his invention. His cult was widespread in the Middle Ages and was rewarded with many miracles, especially in Soissons, where his relics are preserved. He is a patron of agriculture and horticulture, and is invoked in cases of toothache and migraine. Even today his feast is the occasion of prayers for good weather. He is represented with mouth open, laughing (le ris de St. Médard), teeth showing; a heart recalls his charitable activities.

Feast: June 8, Sept. 9, Oct. 1.

MEDEIROS, HUMBERTO SOUSA

Fourth archbishop and seventh bishop of Boston, cardinal; b. Arrifes, Sao Miguel, in the Azores (Portugal), Oct. 6, 1915; d. Boston, Sept. 17, 1983. The eldest of four children, he attended elementary school in Arrifes and later worked in a wholesale store and law office until April 1931 when he emigrated to the U.S., joining his family in Fall River, Massachusetts.

Unable to speak English when he arrived, this future linguist worked as a sweeper and "bob-watcher" in the city's mills to help support the family in the depths of the Depression. In 1937 he was an honor graduate of Durfee High School, completing the course in only three years. Medeiros studied for the priesthood at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., earning an M.A. (1942) and S.T.L. (1946) and was ordained there for the Fall River diocese on June 15, 1946.

Medeiros was assigned to various parishes until 1949, when he was asked to pursue doctoral studies in Washington and Rome. He was awarded an S.T.D. in 1951 from Rome's Gregorian University. From 1951 to 1966 he served as assistant chancellor, vice chancellor, and chancellor under the Most Rev. James L. Connolly, Bishop of Fall River. At the same time he was involved in parish work, especially among the city's growing Portuguese community, accepting the pastorate of St. Michael Parish in 1960. He was named a domestic prelate in 1958.

On April 14, 1966, Pope Paul VI named Msgr. Medeiros the second bishop of Brownsville, Texas. Ordained to the episcopacy on June 9, 1966, he soon earned a reputation for being close to his people, especially his large Mexican-American flock. He championed education, human and civil rights, and showed a particular pastoral care for migrant workers as they traveled in search of crops to be picked. While serving in Brownsville, Critic magazine named Medeiros one of the 12 leading U.S. bishops who held the "most promise for the future of the Church in the U.S."

When Pope Paul VI publicly accepted the resignation of Cardinal CUSHING in September 1970, he simultaneously announced that his successor as archbishop of the nation's second largest See would be the bishop of Brownsville. Within a month of Medeiros' installation on Oct. 7, 1970, in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, the beloved Cardinal Cushing had died.

Archbishop. Both in temperament and style, he differed from his more flamboyant predecessor. But Medeiros soon earned respect and affection for his gentlemanly courtesy, even disposition, and obvious holiness. Inheriting an archdiocesan debt of approximately 42 million dollars, as well as the arduous task of implementing the directives which followed the Second Vatican Council, he restructured the archdiocese into three, and later four, regions each presided over by an auxiliary bishop. In turn, each region was subdivided into four smaller vicarates so as to better serve the archdiocese's two million people.

In August 1971, Medeiros issued a timely pastoral letter which gained international attention. In "Man's Cities and God's Poor," his commitment to education, housing, racial and ethnic equality, as well as to alleviating the plight of the poor, was clearly articulated as his future pastoral agenda. Racial tensions and the subsequent solution of bussing to achieve integration in Boston's public schools placed an enormous strain on the Catholic community as well as its archbishop. He preached time and again on the sin of racism but would neither bless nor publicly oppose the specifics of the court-ordered bussing.

Cardinal. On Feb. 2, 1973, Pope Paul VI named Medeiros to the College of Cardinals, an honor which he maintained was more a compliment to the faithful of the archdiocese than to him personally. He received the "red hat" on March 5, 1973.

After the death of Pope Paul VI in August 1978, Medeiros participated in the elections of Pope John Paul I, "The September Pope," and the first non-Italian pontiff in centuries, Pope John Paul II on Oct. 16, 1978. This same Holy Father, on his first pastoral visit to the Church in the U.S., visited Boston for two days, spending the night of Oct. 1, 1979, in the Cardinal's Brighton residence after having captured the hearts of millions during a spectacular Mass on Boston Common.

Medeiros' nearly 13 years as archbishop were marked by issues of unrest: racial tension, the legalization of abortion, human and civil rights, the decline in vocations, the consequent closing of parochial schools, as well as the elimination of a huge archdiocesan debt. He bore these difficulties with an equanimity and natural grace. Ever mindful of his humble origins, Medeiros embraced an attractive simplicity of style, a directness in speech, and a compassion for those whom society overlooked or discarded.

In the summer of 1983, it was obvious that Medeiros' health was declining. He underwent openheart surgery at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, with apparent success. Unexpectedly, he died the next morning, Sept. 17, 1983. His death was followed by an immediate outpouring of grief and tribute, unprecedented for an archbishop of Boston. His obvious holiness, gentlemanly bearing, and unassuming presence made a deeper impression on the greater Boston community than had been evidenced during his years as archbishop. Only in death was his pastoral leadership adequately recognized and properly acknowledged.

MEDELLÍN DOCUMENTS

The Medellín Documents are the promulgated official results of Consejo Episcopal Latino-Americano (CELAM), the general assembly of bishops of all Latin America convened in Medellín, Colombia, in Aug.-Sept. 1968. The assembly was only the second such general episcopal conference ever held on the soil of Latin America, and the first since Vatican Council II. Often compared with Vatican Council II, Medellín in its impact was similarly crucial in shaping the modern discussions and contemporary agenda of the Latin American Church. The conference centered from the outset on the themes of revolution and class conflict. The working document for the CELAM meeting had been circulated to the bishops and made public two months before the assembly convened. This working draft is of considerable importance in itself and caused a furor that determined which issues the bishops must face to retain any credibility with the young, the militants, and the most vocal clergy. The working draft is a pale reflection of the kinds of radical agenda communicated to the preparatory committee by groups of Latin American priests and laity. The working document had been forwarded to Rome for a critique, and Rome had objected to its excessive concern with secular issues, but the document was circulated without incorporating Rome's objections. Pope Paul VI had already determined to attend the opening session of the conference in conjunction with his attendance at the Eucharistic Congress then being held in Bogotá. On three occasions the pope tried to dissuade the bishops from encouraging the militants who were interpreting the papal teaching set forth in Populorum progressio as condoning the resort to violence in resisting injustice. The pope's efforts were not completely successful.

The final documents of the conference incorporated the substance of the working draft in its descriptions of the tragic condition of the social order in most of Latin America; were unsparing in the condemnations of the imperialist powers and the violence of capitalism; agreed with papal emphases that the Church's main effort should be to appeal to the consciences of the ruling elites and that resort to violent resistance usually brings more suffering to the poor and may lead to newer forms of oppression. However, especially in the section on peace, the conference condemned the use of force by the ruling classes to repress opposition, characterized the current state of Latin America as a state of oppression and established violence, and seconded the teaching of POPULORUM PROGRESSIO that insurrection is legitimate in the face of evident and prolonged tyranny that attacks fundamental human rights and dangerously injures the common good. Various documents, including the report on pastoral planning for the different groups, cite favorably the social consciousness of revolutionary elites, in contrast to the insensitivity of traditionalist Catholics. The document on poverty calls for a new life-style for clergy and a new Church that will continue the painful process of turning from a position of support for the privileged minority to one of identity with the impoverished majority.

MEDES

One of the Iranian peoples who overran the plateau and settled in the area known to ancient sources as Media, corresponding to the modern area of Tehran, Hamadan, Isfahan, and southern Azerbaijan. The Medes are first mentioned as Matāi in the Assyrian inscriptions that recount the campaigns of Shalmaneser III in 836–835 B.C., although earlier notices record Iranian names from the area. Another term found in later Assyrian records is Umman-Manda, which sometimes includes the Medes as well as other peoples, but it may be a generic term for nomads or barbarians. The Assyrians made many expeditions to the land of the "mighty Medes," primarily in search of horses for their cavalry. The Medes were famous for their horses, but there is mention also of castles or fortified towns of the Medes in Assyrian inscriptions.

It is impossible to reconstruct a history of the Medes before they captured NINEVEH, the Assyrian capital, in 612 B.C.; but one may assume that the Median tribes became united in a confederacy under a chief called Dayukku or Deioces in the second half of the 8th century B.C.

Tripylon stairway with Median dignitaries against the Apadana, Persepolis, Iran. (©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

The center of his rule was probably the modern area of Hamadan, ancient Ecbatana. Herodotus (1.101) says the Medes were composed of six tribes, several of them probably non-Iranian in origin. In about 700 B.C. the Median state was disrupted by an invasion of Cimmerians from the north. These were followed by Scythians, who seem to have ruled over Media from c. 652 to 625 B.C. Another attempt to unite the Medes during the agitated 7th century by a chief Khshathrita (Akkadian Kashtaritu, Greek Phraortes) is reported in Assyrian annals, and this attempt bore fruit when his son Uvakhshtra or Cyaxares defeated the Scythians.

Cyaxares was the real founder of the empire of the Medes, and under him the Persians to the south and other Iranian tribes to the east were included in the empire. Herodotus (1.103) says he reorganized the army, and he probably reconstructed the state also. Cyaxares led the Median army against Assyria, and in 614 the city of ASSUR (Asshur) was captured. Then a pact was made with the new Babylonian King Nabopolasser (626–605), and the allies captured and destroyed Ninive in 612.

After the fall of Assyria, Cyaxares extended his kingdom into Anatolia. War with the Lydians ended in 585, after the battle of the "eclipse of the sun," and the Halys River (modern Kizil Irmak) became the boundary between the Lydian and Median kingdoms.

The loose far-flung empire may have been organized into satrapies, but very little is known about the Medes, not only because of lack of sources, but also because of the absence of archeological excavations in Median territory. It is not known what writing the Medes employed in their empire, but Aramaic and Akkadian probably were two means of written communication. The religion of the Medes and the role of the Magoi or MAGI, one of the Median tribes, according to Herodotus, are both unclear.

The Median empire was overthrown by CYRUS, king of Persia, whose rise is told in several Greek sources as well as in the Akkadian "Nabonidus Chronicle." The last ruler of Media, Astyages (Ishtumegu in Akkadian) c. 585-549 B.C., marched against his revolting vassal Cyrus in 549, but his army apparently revolted and gave Cyrus victory. The latter captured Ecbatana and carried off much booty. Cyrus founded the empire of the Achaemenids on the basis of the Median state. An unsuccessful revolt of the Medes at the beginning of the reign of DARIUS I is mentioned in his Behistun Inscription. The Medes continued to play an important role in the new empire, sometimes described as a dual monarchy of the Medes and the Persians. Although the name Media is found later in history, the people are not significant as a distinct entity. Some modern Kurds claim descent from the ancient Medes and begin a "Kurdish era" from the fall of Ninive.

MEDIATOR DEI

Encyclical letter on the sacred liturgy issued by Pius XII on Nov. 20, 1947. The immediate occasion of the writing of this significant document was probably the disturbed conditions in the Church in Germany during and immediately after World War II, but the real causes must be sought further back.

Spirit. Seen in its proper perspective, Mediator Dei is the crowning of the modern LITURGICAL MOVEMENT that began in the early years of the 20th century; by it the Holy See assumed the direction of the most significant movement in the Church in modern times and laid down the principles that must govern all future development. It was the first detailed official statement on the theology of the liturgy, and to be fully appreciated it must be seen in relation to the other great doctrinal encyclical of the same pontiff, Mystici Corporis, on the Mystical Body. Pius XII, having considered the nature of the Church, took the next natural step and considered the chief activity of the Church, the sacred liturgy. Moreover, Mediator Dei must be viewed in relation to all subsequent pronouncements of the Holy See on the nature and purpose of the liturgy, because, while it was the first official statement on the subject, it was by its nature only a beginning; it laid down principles but did not work out all their conclusions. In many ways it was a point of departure rather than a final goal.

Purpose. Mediator Dei cannot be adequately understood if it is regarded as a mere protest against the excesses of some promoters of the liturgical movement. Although it does condemn errors and aberrations that were attributed to some extremists, the letter gives condemnation a relatively small place. The document is a positive statement of the doctrine that lies at the basis of the liturgical celebration, and a careful study of the nature of the liturgy, of the principles that must animate the celebration of the liturgy, and of the results that this celebration will have upon the lives of those who participate in it.

It is not always noticed that the encyclical condemns indifference to the liturgy and sluggishness in living the liturgical life no less than it rebukes the immoderate and the extreme. Its whole aim is to impress upon all the necessity that Christians should live the liturgical life and be nourished and refreshed by the supernatural inspiration the liturgy provides.

Content. Given the extraordinary importance of this document, an outline of its contents may be of some help to the reader.

Introduction (1–12). Since through it the Church continues Christ's priestly mission of reconciling God and man, the liturgy deserves our best attention, an attitude beautifully exemplified in the initiative of the Order of St. Benedict and the liturgical movement. But the signs of wholesome revival of interest in the liturgy are accompanied by other signs of extremist tendencies on the one hand and indifference on the other.

Nature, Origin, and Development of the Liturgy (13–65). The liturgy is "the public worship of the whole Mystical Body, head and members," and while it is exterior worship, its chief element is interior. Instead of opposition between liturgy and personal piety, a union of the two should prevail. While the liturgy must evolve with society, both archeologism and novelty should be reproved, and regulation of the liturgy by the hierarchy is necessary.

Holy Eucharist (66–137). The Mass is the center of the Christian religion; in it Christ offers Himself and His members to the Father. Priest, victim, and ends of this sacrifice are the same as on Calvary. While the laity do not possess the priestly power to consecrate, their baptismal priesthood demands that they offer themselves in union with Christ through the ordained priest. Thus the whole Church offers the oblation. While certain erroneous tendencies are to be corrected, insistence must be laid on intelligent participation in the Mass on the part of the laity.

Divine Office (138–150). Since the Office is the prayer of the Mystical Body, greater participation in it by the laity is urged, especially by means of Sunday Vespers in the parish church.

Liturgical Year (151–170). The Church year is not a bare record of past events. In it Christ Himself is brought to us to relive His mysteries in His members and thus to transform them into Himself.

Practical Pastoral Suggestions (171–211). Pious exercises are of value as long as they are effective in making the liturgy loved and practiced more fervently. Concrete suggestions are provided for bishops, who are to promote the liturgical apostolate, since the most pressing duty of Christians is to live the liturgical life.

MEDICAL ETHICS

Medical ethics can be defined as the systematic study of value problems that arise in the relationship between physicians and patients. This definition implies that the field of medical ethics should be clearly distinguished from medical jurisprudence or forensic medicine, on the one hand, and from medical etiquette or convention, on the other.

In the Western intellectual tradition the two major sources of literature on medical ethics have been the medical profession itself and various faith communities. Among the most important professional codes of medical ethics are the HIPPOCRATIC OATH (c. 400 B.C.), Percival's Medical Ethics (1803), and the Code of Medical Ethics of the American Medical Association (1847). More recent professional codes and statements include the Declaration of Geneva (1948), which is an updated version of the Hippocratic oath; the Nuremberg Code (1946–49); the World Medical Association's International Code of Medical Ethics (1949); and the Principles of Medical Ethics of the American Medical Association (1957). Individual physicians have also contributed to the literature of medical ethics, particularly during the 19th and 20th centuries, by writing numerous books and essays on the field in general or on specific ethical issues.

The Jewish and Christian faith communities have also devoted considerable attention to problems of medical ethics. Over the course of centuries, the Jewish tradition has developed a rather elaborate series of moral and legal rules pertaining to medical care, as the studies of I. Jakobovits and D. Feldman illustrate. Among Protestants, systematic interest in the field of medical ethics is a relatively recent phenomenon (see the books by J. Fletcher, H. L. Smith, and P. Ramsey), although the earlier ethical writing of Barth, Brunner, and Bonhoeffer included brief discussions of specific medical-ethical issues.

Within the Roman Catholic tradition, the field of medical ethics has been a major focus of attention for almost a century. Two of the pioneering works in Catholic medical ethics were Karl Capellmann's Pastoral-Medizin (1877) and Giuseppe Antonelli's Medicina pastoralis (1891). A major achievement of these two authors, both physicians, was their synthesis of contemporary medical knowledge and moral-theological discussion. Throughout their works there are repeated references to the standard textbooks of moral theology written by Alphonsus Liguori, Gury, and Lehmkuhl.

Twentieth-Century Catholic Analysis. During the 20th century Catholic analysis of medical-ethical issues was carried forward at two levels: in official Church statements and in the writings of scholars in the fields of pastoral medicine and moral theology. Early in the century, between 1902 and 1940, the Holy Office issued rulings on numerous medical-ethical questions, including birth control, sterilization, ectopic pregnancy, eugenics, and the disposal of corpses. During the 1940s and 1950s Pope PIUS XII took an intense personal interest in the field of medical ethics; indeed, he devoted major public addresses to the issues of artificial insemination, tissue transplantation, and medical research and experimentation. Official Church statements of the 1960s included the general guidelines concerning marriage enunciated by Vatican II and the specific discussion of the birth-control question by Pope PAUL VI in his encyclical Humanae Vitae. Finally, in 1970 and 1971 the Catholic bishops of Canada and the United States issued official statements on hospital ethics entitled, respectively, a Medico-Moral Guide and Ethical and Religious Directives for Catholic Health Care Facilities.

European and North American Catholic writers in the fields of pastoral medicine and moral theology have also contributed to the Church's reflection on issues in medical ethics. During the first half of the century such discussion was carried on in journal articles, scholarly monographs, surveys of pastoral medicine, and the relevant sections of moral theology textbooks. In addition there appeared, during the late 1940s and the 1950s, a substantial number of specialized medical ethics textbooks written by moral theologians (e.g., G. Kelly, T. J. O'Donnell, and C. J. McFadden).

In the last years of the 20th century there was a change in the texture of medical ethics, particularly from a Catholic viewpoint. The factors contributing to this change are many, complex, and not easily identifiable.

Forces of Change. Among the better recognized elements are: the responses of both medical science and the Church to a rapidly growing technology; the impact of value pluralism that marks contemporary society; concern for patients' rights against medical authoritarianism; and the developing revitalization of the faith dimension in secular life. Not to be overlooked in these changes is the influence of the insights of other faith communities.

Technological Advance. The rapid expansion of scientific knowledge especially in the area of electronics, computers, molecular biology, genetics, and immunology, and their respective applications to medicine, has resulted in problems that were not considered earlier in medical ethics. The proliferation of ethical issues has led to the emergence of the new field of bioethics (16:28). The presence of two apparently distinct disciplines dealing with overlapping areas of concern has resulted in some confusion about the names and areas of applicability. Thus such terms as "medical ethics," "medicalmorals," "bioethics," and "biomedical ethics" appear. The consequence is the tendency to use these terms almost interchangeably.

Value Pluralism. A survey of the writings in the field of medical ethics (or bioethics) reveals that two valuegroups tend to predominate: one that seeks to incorporate a Christian viewpoint (or other religious viewpoints) and the other which espouses secular humanism. Frequently those fitting into the first category invoke the teachings of the Catholic Church, sometimes as overriding and decisive, in other instances simply as supportive. Those favoring a secular-humanistic approach do not necessarily deny religious values—even if their stance is "negatively neutral"—but seem rather to be concerned about meeting the needs of the broader public, one characterized by a homogenization of values. For secular humanists man is the standard; their advocacy is of values that would be most acceptable to the majority of the concerned public. Yet, one can detect an increasing attention to ethical contributions from JUDAISM and ISLAM as well as from various Christian bodies.

Increased Concern for Patients' Rights. The issue of human rights, dramatically focused by post-World War II revelations, continues to generate increased attention and an urge to action. Rapidly escalating health costs have raised grave concern on the part of public and government alike that the health benefits of high medical technology are being outweighed by the cost of supporting sophisticated medicine. Questions are being asked about the wisdom of allowing technology to dominate the practice of medicine. Additional support for such questions and concerns is the collective impact of popular entertainment and educational forms-television and videotapes and films—which have begun to dramatize the dangers of a runaway technology. More and more, the public is turning to the Internet for information regarding medical matters. Some web sites offer ethical analyses on current medical issues. Many fear that medical technology is taking too dominant a role in medicine. Instead of the comforting presence of the nurse at the bedside, there is instead the cold watchful eye of the television camera and a variety of other monitors; between patient and physician complicated instrumentation intervenes. The patient fears that the clinical judgment of the physician will be replaced by impersonal responses of the computer. More frequently than before it is heard that physicians are praised for their technical skills but with reservations about their "bedside manner." Scientific medicine is at times contrasted with humanistic medicine.

A few voices, such as those of Ivan Illich and Thomas Szasz, are raised to challenge what they perceive as a medical tyranny over health. They question whether modern medicine is truly effective in the treatment of disease. In the midst of medical advances the question is raised about the rights of the patients. Indeed, there has been a move toward codifications of a "Patients' Bill of Rights."

Taken together, these various factors have succeeded in alerting the public as well as the medical profession to the state of affairs in which the rights of the patient may have been very gradually and almost silently eroded. Questions, too, are raised about who makes the decision in a medical context. Toward clarification, distinctions are proposed between one set of decisions, medical decisions, which properly pertain to the physician, and personal decisions regarding life and health, which belong to the patient as a basic right. These controversies, however, have been viewed by some as ultimately constructive for both physician and patient because they promote a more precise definition of roles.

Increased Concern for the Faith Dimension. In concert with the elucidation of patients' rights and respect for the human person there has been growing articulation of the role of faith in daily life. Somewhat apart from both the medical and religious establishments there has been an increase in the popularity of faith healing—as one form of alternative medicine—which is largely associated with those involved in the charismatic renewal within the various faith communities. Such activity among believers is one indication of an increased awareness of the faith dimension in health and sickness.

Another indication of the same awareness has been the initiative taken by certain secular groups such as the American Association for the Advancement of Science to seek input from various religious faiths in connection with task forces dealing with such current issues as germline genetic intervention and stem-cell research. Within the Church, but not as part of the official structure, certain groups have endeavored to analyze the ethical and moral dimensions of various medical and scientific advances. For example, in the last quarter of the 20th century Catholic hospitals found themselves in the midst of painful and complex medical-moral problems for which there had been no adequate preparation. After consultation with medical and ecclesiastical representatives, the Catholic Hospital Association (which became the Catholic Health Association of the United States) founded the Pope JOHN XXIII Medical-Moral Research and Education Center (now known as the National Catholic Bioethics Center) for the purpose of studying the long-range medical-moral issues arising as a result of advances in science and medicine. Other groups were formed to meet a different set of problems: The Institute for Theological Encounter with Science and Technology, and the Human Life Center. Such existing organizations as the National Federation of Catholic Physicians Guilds (now officially known as the Catholic Medical Association) and the National Catholic Pharmacists Guild also responded to the newer ethical issues.

The official Church has itself acted vigorously to meet the developing ethical concerns by the establishment of a number of bishops' committees. Note, however, that U.S. bishops in 2001 underwent an internal restructuring so that what was functioning under two titles (NCCB and USCC) is now acting under one title, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB). Thus as part of the USCCB there were in 2001 bishops' committees on doctrine, human values, and pro-life activities. Although all of these committees, in one way or another, have a concern and interest in medical-moral issues, it is the committee on doctrine that has been given the special responsibility to deal with medical-moral issues. In addition to these committees, the Church's concern for the faith dimension in health and sickness is witnessed by its increased openness in testifying before congressional committees on issues it feels must be defended against legislation invasive of the basic rights of individuals. A major recent contribution of the bishops has been the issuance of a revised Ethical and Religious Directives for Catholic Health Care Facilities (4th edition, 2001).

Publications. Evidence of growth and vitality within the Church has been the increased number of periodicals that seek to deal with medical-moral issues from a Catholic perspective. Some deal exclusively with ethical issues in medicine, others are concerned with broader issues in health care. A representative list includes the Linacre Quarterly, Health Progress, Medical-Moral Newsletter, Ethics & Medics, and many others.

Important Current Topics. Clearly, at the start of the 21st century, the concerns of medical ethics go beyond what was traditionally its proper domain. Today writers on the topic of ethical issues in medicine do not consider themselves bound by the earlier parameters. The topics found under the heading of bioethics are now part and parcel of the publications of those who were once identified as medical ethicists. Of special concern today are such issues of distributive justice as the equitable allocation of scarce medical resources and the right to health care. In the increasingly complex society in which we live, issues of cooperation with objectively evil acts has become one of the major issues. A special concern for Catholic health institutions is the issue of cooperation when a variety of alliances are being considered between Catholic health care facilities and a non-Catholic institution. In a number of instances unresolved ethical issues have prevented the formation of an alliance.

The right to privacy has increasingly been challenged by computer data banks. The questions of genetic diagnosis and counseling are other topics. The question of personal freedom surfaces when the issue of behavioral control in its many forms is considered. The acute problems associated with recombinant DNA techniques in particular, and with genetic engineering in general, raise questions about the limits of human dominion over self and nature. In particular, cloning of human beings and the use of stem cells for research and therapy have become major issues.

MEDICAL MISSION SISTERS

The Medical Mission Sisters (MMS) was founded in Washington, D.C., in 1925 as the Society of Catholic Medical Missionaries, the first group of religious women dedicated exclusively to the professional medical care of the sick in mission countries.

Early in the 20th century, missionary bishops realized the need for organized, dedicated, and professionally trained personnel to take care of the health of their people, particularly mothers and infants. Women physicians were needed since, in the medically less developed areas of the world, tradition frequently prevented women patients from having recourse to male doctors. Moreover, women doctors who were also religious would ensure dedication to the work and continuity of care.

With this end in view, Anna DENGEL, an experienced lay missionary doctor, founded the Society of Catholic Medical Missionaries. Because canon law then prohibited religious with public vows from the practice of medicine, the society was canonically erected as a pious union. In 1936 the Holy See, in the instruction Constans ac Sedula, approved the study and practice of medicine for missionary sisters with public vows. Subsequently, the Medical Mission Sisters became a religious congregation with simple vows. In 1959, John XXIII granted the Decretum Laudis; the congregation was erected as a society of pontifical rank.

Since the establishment in 1927 of the society's first hospital in Rawalpindi, North India (now Pakistan), the apostolate has been expanded to include hospitals, clinics, and other healthcare facilities in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. The generalate is in London, England. The North American headquarters is in Philadelphia, PA.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES OF MARY

The Medical Missionaries of Mary (MMM) was established at Anua, East Nigeria, Africa, on April 4, 1937. A visit to Nigeria in 1921 convinced Mary Martin, of Dublin, Ireland, that the great need of the missions was for trained medical missionaries. After Pius XI issued an instruction in 1936 granting permission to religious congregations to devote themselves to all branches of medicine, the Medical Missionaries of Mary came into existence. In January of 1938 Mother Mary, returning from Nigeria after a serious illness, established a house of studies at Booterstown, Dublin. The following year, she took over Our Lady of Lourdes Hospital, Drogheda, which served as the motherhouse of the congregation.

In the first 25 years of its existence, the community grew from three members to more than 400 doctors, nurses, medical technicians, secretaries, and teachers, many of whom worked in Africa. In 1950 the first American foundation was made in the Archdiocese of Boston. The motherhouse is in Blackrock, Ireland; the U.S. head-quarters is in City Island, NY.

MEDICI

In adopting the Ordinances of Justice in 1293, the city of FLORENCE provided itself with a republican form of government that lasted at least formally for over two centuries. The outstanding political event of this period was the rise to power of the Medici family, which dominated political life in Florence throughout most of the 15th century. The Medici also ruled as grand dukes of Tuscany in an unbroken line from 1530 until 1737, when the duchy passed into the control of the House of Austria. The power of the family rested on its enormous wealth in the first phase of its prominence and upon personal family ties with ruling houses of Europe in the second.

Notable Members of the Family. Early in the 13th century individual Medici left their agrarian holdings at Cafaggiolo in the mountainous Mugello region north of Florence to make their way in the expanding commune. The name of Bonagiunta appears in an act of 1221. When the government of the priors was formed in 1282, the Medici were enrolled in the greater guilds as leading merchants. In 1291 Ardingo de' Medici served as a prior and in 1296, was elected gonfalonier, the highest office in the city. The family continued to grow in prestige during the subsequent century. Salvestro (1331-88) identified the family with popular causes by his role in the Ciompi revolt in 1378. Giovanni di Bicci (1360-1429), a shrewd and single-minded businessman, built up one of the greatest fortunes in Florence. He was absorbed in finances, was not politically ambitious, and failed to assume the role of advocate of the common people, but he nevertheless captured their sympathy by his liberality, constructing the church of S. Lorenzo, the Hospital of the Innocents, and the tomb of the antipope John XXIII, erected by Donatello and Michelozzo. The Albizzi oligarchy, which assumed power in 1382, was relatively permissive and allowed Giovanni to serve as prior repeatedly and as gonfalonier in 1421.

The break between the Albizzi and Medici developed under the rule of Rinaldo degli Albizzi and Giovanni's son Cosimo (1389–1464). Rinaldo undertook a popular war to subdue neighboring Lucca, failed to win, and on May 10, 1433 made an unsatisfactory peace. Civic sentiment swung in favor of Cosimo, who had been critical of Rinaldo's bungling. Rinaldo exiled Cosimo and his brother Lorenzo to Venice. On Sept. 1, 1434, a pro-Medici government took office and recalled Cosimo from exile. He then ruled the city by carefully controlling the public offices through a committee of ten electors, who appointed the members of the signory. Cosimo, in a rule of 30 years, allowed himself to be elected gonfalonier only three times, in 1435, 1439, and 1445, and for the rest of the time ruled indirectly. In directing the foreign policy of Florence, Cosimo's major aim was to achieve security and stability through the preservation of a balance of power and an emphasis on the common interests of the Italian city-states as opposed to the major powers of northern Europe. In order to prevent a Venetian hegemony to the north, he backed the SFORZAS of Milan with subsidies. In 1454 Venice and Milan signed the Peace of Lodi, which was accepted by Florence and Naples. The power configuration thenceforth rested on a combination of Milan, Florence, and Naples on one side, and Venice and the STATES OF THE CHURCH on the other.

Under Cosimo the family fortune expanded most rapidly. The Medici had one partnership in silk manufacturing and two in cloth manufacturing under a putting out or "wholesale handicraft" system. But the main source of their enormous wealth was their bank, one of the banchi grossi (great banks), which dealt in merchandise and exchange in all parts of the world. They combined foreign trade and dealing in bills of exchange, the trade being more significant than their banking operation as such. When Cosimo succeeded Giovanni in 1429 the house had branches in Venice and at the papal court. New branches were subsequently established in Pisa, Milan, Geneva (moved to Lyons in 1466), Avignon, Bruges, and London. The Medici bank was a decentralized combination of separate partnerships. Cosimo maintained a close vigil over the operation of all the branches, but his son Piero (1416–69) and grandson Lorenzo relaxed their grip on the managers. Lorenzo, preoccupied with politics, diplomacy, art, and letters, failed to give the business adequate attention and permitted disastrous loans to princes, so that under Lorenzo the Medici bank began a precipitous decline.

Cosimo's son Piero was in poor health and died five years after his father. He and his wife, Lucrezia Tornabuoni, a lady of great piety, had two sons, Lorenzo il Magnifico (1449–92) and Giuliano (1453–78). Lorenzo's good relations with Sixtus IV were strained when the pope's nephew Girolamo RIARIO sought to build a territorial holding for himself in central Italy. In 1473 the Riario kept Florence from acquiring Imola, and in 1478 he connived in the PAZZI revolt, which was triggered by the assassination of Giuliano during Mass in the cathedral on April 26. Lorenzo escaped to the vestry; he quickly quashed the conspiracy. The war with the pope and King Ferrante of Naples that followed went badly for Florence, which was threatened by Venice in the North. Lorenzo then "risked his own life to restore peace to his country," as MACHIAVELLI put it later, by his dramatic journey to Naples to make a personal appeal to Ferrante for peace. Lorenzo's diplomacy was directed toward the same goal as Cosimo's had been, security and stability for the Italian city-states. As a great patron of the humanists and artists, he presided over the flowering of Renaissance culture in Florence, favoring the Neoplatonic philosophers, and writing sonnets, lyrics, eclogues, and other literary pieces in the vernacular.

Two years after Lorenzo's death his licentious son Piero (1471–1503) was driven out by the people when the French under Charles VIII invaded Italy. After the SAVONAROLA episode and republican interval, Piero's son Lorenzo (1492-1519) restored Medici rule. He was the father of CATHERINE DE MÉDICIS, who became queen of France. In 1527 the Medici were driven out again, but in 1530 Alessandro, Lorenzo's natural son, was made hereditary ruler of Florence by Emperor CHARLES V. In 1537 Lorenzino de' Medici (1514-47) murdered Alessandro. The able and utterly ruthless condottiere Cosimo I (1519–74), a great-great-grandson of Lorenzo, Cosimo the Elder's brother, with the help of imperial troops made himself ruler. In 1570 Pius V crowned him grand duke of Tuscany, a position that his descendants held until Gian Gastone de' Medici's death in 1737, when the Hapsburgs took possession of their territories. The family through the centuries contributed to the Church many high clergymen, notably Popes LEO X (GIOVANNI), CLEM-ENT VII (GIULIO), and LEO XI (ALESSANDRO OTTAVIANO).

MEDIEVAL ACADEMY OF AMERICA

Founded in 1925, the Medieval Academy of America was the first organization in the United States dedicated to medieval studies. Centered in Cambridge,

Interior of the New Sacristy of S. Lorenzo (also called the Medici Chapel) at Florence, designed by Michelangelo; against the right-hand wall is the tomb and monument of Lorenzo de Medici, sculpted by Michelangelo. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Massachusetts, it is a constituent member of the American Council of Learned Societies. The Medieval Academy is the "largest organization in the world devoted to medieval studies," attracting scholars from all over the world; in 2000 it had 4,160 members. The academy is more than a group of medieval historians, since it fosters teaching and research in "medieval art, archaeology, history, law, literature, music, philosophy, religion, science, social and economic institutions, and all other aspects of the Middle Ages." It is open to anyone with an interest in the Middle Ages, which it defines as a period stretching from A.D. 500 to 1500. Although it concentrates on western Europe, the academy's interests also include Arabic, Byzantine, Hebrew, and Slavic studies

The academy publishes Speculum—A Journal of Medieval Studies, which has the widest circulation of any journal in the field. Published four times a year, it includes annually over 1,000 pages of articles, book reviews, and short notices on newly published books. Three times a year, the Medieval Academy News appears, containing information on events, fellowships, prizes, and other opportunities for medievalists. Since 1928 the academy has been publishing books and monographs, having over 100 titles in print. To facilitate its book production, it has concluded a contract with the University of Toronto Press to co-publish Medieval Academy books. Together with the University of Toronto, it also reprints books that are useful for teaching but that are out of print and no longer generally available to the public. The book subvention program helps subsidize first books by academy members at other non-profit scholarly presses.

In the spring, the academy holds an annual meeting at various sites in the United States and Canada, where scholarly papers are read and a business meeting is conducted. It also conducts sessions at the annual medieval conferences in Kalamazoo, Michigan and Leeds (United Kingdom) as well as at the yearly meeting of the American Historical Society. In 2001 the academy began to sponsor an annual lecture at the International Medieval Congress at the University of Leeds.

The academy has also established a Committee on Centers and Regional Associations (CARA) that "serves as a forum for teachers, administrators, and organizers of centers, institutes, programs, and regional and other organizations devoted to medieval studies." Each summer it provides scholarships for four students to study Latin at the University of Notre Dame and the University of Toronto. CARA also offers a prize for dissertation research, as well as awards for excellence in teaching and outstanding service, which is defined as providing "leadership in developing, organizing promoting, and sponsoring medieval studies through the extensive administrative work that is so crucial to the health of medieval studies but that often goes unrecognized by the profession at large."

Each year the academy awards the Haskins medal "for a distinguished book in the field of medieval studies." It is named after Charles Homer Haskins, an outstanding medievalist and one of the founders of the academy. It also offers the John Nicholas Brown Prize. Named after another founder, it is given to a resident of North America who has written a "first book or monograph on a medieval subject judged by the selection committee to be of outstanding quality." Van Courtlandt Elliott, the executive secretary of the academy and editor of Speculum from 1965 to 1970, has given his name to a prize that is awarded annually for a first article in medieval studies that is judged to be outstanding. Travel grants and dissertation grants are also awarded.

MEDIEVAL BOY MARTYRS

Beginning as early as 415 with an unnamed boy of Immestar, near Antioch, the deaths of many Christian children, especially around the time of the Passover, were attributed to Jews. Prominent Jews were accused of torturing a child in a fashion that mocked the Passion of Christ, then drained the blood for use in making the Paschal matzoth. When investigated, many of the deaths were accidental—regardless of whether a Jew was involved. Grieving relatives sought a reason for the death of a loved one and someone to blame.

Beginning with the death of (St.) WILLIAM OF NOR-WICH, there were six such cases in the 12th century, 15 in the 13th century, ten in the 14th century, 16 in the 15th century, 13 in the 16th century, eight in the 17th century, 15 in the 18th century, and 39 as late as the 19th century.

Nor was this phenomenon restricted to Western Europe. On March 21, 1690 (Holy Saturday), six-year-old Gavril Belostoksky was found murdered and drained of blood in Zverki, Belarus (now in Poland). Jews were accused of torturing the child and using his blood for the Passover matzoth. He was canonized in the 20th century by the Belarussian Orthodox Church, which celebrates Saint Gavril's feast on May 1. Although most of the victims were young boys, there are recorded cases such as the death (1623) of a girl in Ragusa, Dalmatia. Her body was found under the bed of a Christian woman, but the murder was attributed to Jews.

The cases of blood libel, which often resulted in pogroms or the death of the accused, became almost epidemic. The problem became so serious among German burghers that Emperor Frederick II undertook a formal inquiry of the charges, including a conference with Christian converts from Judaism. Thereafter he forbade such accusations under penalty of the law.

Most of the cults of these so-called boy martyrs have been suppressed; many were never recognized by the Church even locally. Among those included on various calendars were (in chronological order by death): St. WIL-LIAM OF NORWICH (d. 1144, Norwich, England); St. Harold of Gloucester (d. 1168 or 1160 to 1161, Gloucester, England); St. Richard of Pontoise (or of Paris; d. 1179, Pontoise, France; passio included in the Acta Sanctorum on March 25); Herbert of Huntingdon (d. 1180); St. Robert of Bury Saint Edmunds (d. 1181, Edmundsbury, England); St. Dominguito of Saragossa (or Dominic of Val; d. 1250; Saragossa, Aragon, Spain); Little St. HUGH OF LINCOLN (d. 1255, Lincoln, England); Blessed Werner of Oberwesel (or Wernher of Wesel; d. 1287, Oberwesel, Germany; feast formerly April 19); Rudolf of Berne (d. 1294); Conrad of Weissensee (d. 1303, Weissensee, Thuringia, Germany); Blessed Ludwig (Louis) von Bruck of Ravensburg (d. 1429, Ravensburg, Germany; feast formerly April 30); Blessed Andrew of Rinn (d. 1462, Rinn, near Innsbruck, Austria); St. SIMON (SIMEON) OF TRENT

(d. 1475, Trent, Italy); Blessed Lorenzino Sossio (d. 1485; Vicenza, near Padua, Italy; feast formerly April 15); and St. Cristoforo of Toledo (d. 1490, near Toledo, Spain).

MEDIEVAL LATIN LITERATURE

The body of medieval Latin literature would be rather small if it were limited to literature in its narrower and more usual meaning of belles-lettres, i.e., writings distinguished by artistic form or emotional appeal. But the general histories of the subject treat of it as the total preserved Latin writings of the Middle Ages. It seems best to take this latter approach here, with due regard, however, for articles on medieval writings in particular fields and on individual authors. The matter thus becomes vast and unwieldy, much of it still being investigated, though the 20th century produced an imposing array of valuable studies on the period.

There is wide divergence of opinion as to the date that should be set for the beginning of the MIDDLE AGES, and there can be even less agreement as to when Latin writings should first be considered to have become medieval. In literature the patristic period superseded pagan writings as the latter declined. Edward K. Rand found a happy solution for the problem of beginnings by reaching back well into the patristic period for his Founders of the Middle Ages (1929). It is true that one cannot understand medieval thought without reference to earlier Christian writers, not only AMBROSE, AUGUSTINE, and JEROME, but also PRUDENTIUS, SULPICIUS SEVERUS, OROSIUS, LEO I, and GELASIUS I. They, however, are treated separately.

Jerome's De viris illustribus, a sort of dictionary of Christian biography, set the pattern for subsequent attempts to list and characterize the writings of succeeding generations: GENNADIUS OF MARSEILLES (late 5th century), ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, and ILDEFONSUS OF TOLEDO (7th century), SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOUX (late 11th century), Honorius Augustodunensis, and Anonymus Mellicensis (12th century), TRITHEMIUS (late 15th century), and Robert BELLARMINE (early 17th century). From the Latin Fathers the Middle Ages acquired a taste for scriptural ALLEGORY. Ambrose bequeathed the art of hymnody (see HYMNOLOGY); Jerome gave the Vulgate and his saints' lives; Augustine transmitted NEOPLATONISM, theology, catechetics, the art of autobiography, and a theology of history; John CASSIAN taught a psychological approach to the spiritual life; Sulpicius Severus became a model for HAGIOGRAPHY; Orosius, for history; Prudentius, for versification and the allegory of the virtues and vices; Leo the Great left his name on the art of letter writing and rhyming (see CURSUS); and Gelasius I laid down the fundamental teaching on CHURCH AND STATE. In secular learning, MACROBIUS and Servius initiated medieval scholars into the study of Vergil, and Martianus Capella disciplined them with his treatise on the seven LIBERAL ARTS.

Modern histories of medieval Latin literature, successors of the De viris illustribus, arbitrarily enough set the terminus a quo of this literature in the early 6th century. They conceive a first period extending to the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, a second, extending to the renaissance of the 12th century; a third, comprising the 12th century; and a fourth, covering the later Middle Ages.

From the 6th Century to the Carolingian Renaissance

The first authors usually treated are the more immediate founders, themselves trained in the educational system of the Ancient World, who, without being of the highest literary genius themselves, handed down the torch of learning in an age that threatened its extinction. With the coming of the LOMBARDS late in the 6th century, the secular schools went out of existence in Italy, just as previously, except for the vicinity of CARTHAGE, they had collapsed elsewhere.

Italy. Worthy to head the list of medieval Latin authors is BOETHIUS (d. 524), scion of a distinguished family, official in the Ostrogothic kingdom of THEODORIC THE GREAT, and prolific writer. It was through his translations of, and commentaries on, parts of the logical writings of ARISTOTLE and PORPHYRY that these philosophers were introduced to the Middle Ages. Many of his definitions and technical terms were taken up by medieval philosophy. His treatises on arithmetic and music, among others on the quadrivium, had great subsequent influence. Most famous of his writings is the Consolation of Philosophy, composed as he languished in prison before his execution. It is a highly literary creation of prose and verse in the form of the Menippean satire. The great variety of its verse afforded models to medieval versifiers, and the allegorical nature of the work appealed to medieval taste. It is so purely philosophical that doubts could be raised as to Boethius's Christianity. But he also left theological treatises of proven authenticity and Catholic content.

A contemporary of Boethius was ENNODIUS, Bishop of Pavia (d. 521). A rhetorician at heart, he wrote many works in prose and mediocre verse, most of them secular, some even pagan, in tone. His highly artificial style fails to cover the shallowness of his thought. A biography of EPIPHANIUS, his predecessor in the See of Pavia, is Ennodius's best work.

Somewhat younger than Boethius and longer-lived, CASSIODORUS (d. c. 583), son of a pretorian prefect, likewise served as an Ostrogothic official. He composed an extensive collection of letters and documents (Variae) that reflect the workings of Theodoric's government and that of his successors, though, with the names removed, the documents do not offer a direct aid to history. The style is involved and obscure. Parts of the Variae foreshadow the medieval formularies. Cassiodorus made a modest contribution to HISTORIOGRAPHY. A consular list represents the only useful part of a chronicle that he prepared. His history of the Goths is not extant, but extracts of it were reproduced by Jordanis in 551. Only fragments remain of a genealogical work, Ordo generis Cassiodorum. He himself was not proud of the Historia eccle- siastica tripartita, made up of excerpts from three Byzantine historians, THEODORET, SOZOMEN, and SOC-RATES, which he selected and caused to be translated into Latin. His De anima reveals that he was not a profound philosopher. In 540 he withdrew to his family estate at Squillace in Calabria, where he founded the monastery of Vivarium. For the monks he wrote his two-part pedagogical Institutiones divinarum et saecularium litterarum, which was to have a profound effect on the history of monasticism. The first part offers a list of readings in Scripture, theology, and church history without, however, neglecting to make provision for those who would devote themselves to labor. On the highest manual level he placed the copying of manuscripts, thus ensuring the growth of monastic libraries. The second part of the Institutiones was a simple treatment of the liberal arts as a necessary preparation for the study of theology. His treatise on orthography, composed shortly before his death, consists of excerpts from various authors. It was Cassiodorus who gave the scholarly turn to Benedictin-

The milieu for which Cassiodorus produced his program of study was set by the BENEDICTINE RULE. Written down about the 3d decade of the 6th century for the monks of MONTE CASSINO by Benedict of Nursia, this rule was to form the monastic life of Europe for centuries. Next to the Scriptures it was the most read book of the Middle Ages and became the object of many commentaries, even to the present day. Its text was written in Latin of the people so that it would be intelligible to simple men. But it was filled with solid spirituality, and a wise moderation gave it universal appeal.

Another official at the Ostrogothic court, later a subdeacon in Rome, the rhetorician ARATOR, left a poem of 2,326 hexameter lines based on the Acts of the Apostles. He read it to an audience in the church of St. Peter in Chains during four days in April and May 544. Though of lesser worth than the earlier poem of Sedulius on the Gospel narrative, it was highly prized in the Middle Ages.

At the end of the century appears the figure of Pope GREGORY I THE GREAT, who after a distinguished civil career became a Benedictine and promoted the cause of the order. As pope (590–604) he left a precious collection of 854 letters, which reveal his great activity. He had them arranged according to the years of his pontificate, and so they became the model for PAPAL REGISTERS. His letters have a personal and human character that makes them completely different from the rhetorical effusions of Cassiodorus's Variae, although Gregory too was educated in the schools and trained in civil administration. His commentary on the Book of Job, which he called Libri morales, was a learned work in the nature of a moral theology.

His moral homilies on Ezechiel and 40 homilies on texts of the Gospels were on a dignified popular level. The Regula pastoralis was destined to be of the utmost importance in the direction of future bishops. The Dialogues on saints and their miracles, in which Gregory reproduced much of the credulity of his sources, became one of the beloved books of the Middle Ages. Gregory and Augustine were the authors most used by medieval writers. Boniface VIII numbered Gregory among the four great Doctors of the Western Church.

There is some basis for connecting Gregory with liturgical development and GREGORIAN CHANT. The authorship of the so-called Leonine, Gelasian, and Gregorian sacramentaries bristles with problems, but they belong in the period under consideration. Their collects and prefaces are masterpieces of majestic thought and expression, their cadenced metrical clausulae gradually yielding to the accentual cursus. The concise dignity of the Roman liturgical formulae contrasts with the more exuberant Milanese, GALLICAN, and MOZARABIC RITES, and there were reciprocal influences. In connection with the liturgy came the further development of the hymn. The TE DEUM LAUDAMUS, of uncertain authorship, dates from early in this period, and the Praeconium paschale gradually assumed the set form of the EXSULTET (IAM AN-GELICA).

The history of the individual popes from the time of Liberius (352-366) was recounted in the LIBER PONTIFICALIS by a succession of authors who gave a fuller and more exact account as time went on. It had considerable influence on the writing of religious history. The LIBER DIURNUS ROMANORUM PONTIFICUM was a formula book for papal documents. It was begun in the 7th century and, with subsequent additions, was much used for drafting documents in the papal chancery until the middle of the 9th century. After the 11th century it ceased to be used. In the middle of the 6th century, DIONYSIUS EXIGU-US, a Scythian, came to Rome and gave the Western Church a compilation of canons of Greek councils and a collection of papal letters. His work was fundamental for the development of Canon Law (see DIONYSIANA COL-LECTIO). He likewise introduced the use of the Christian era into the calendar.

North Africa. Near the end of the 5th century, Dracontius, a gifted lay poet, wrote his verse in North Africa. In prison for offending his Vandal king, he composed his Laudes Dei in 2,327 hexameter lines. The work was reproduced in abbreviated and altered form in the 7th century by EUGENE II OF TOLEDO and was long known only in this text until the original was edited in 1791. Toward the end of the Vandal kingdom (534) an Anthologia Latina, or Libri epigrammaton, was compiled from a number of African poets. It proves the existence of a considerable group of classically trained teachers and poets. In 533 a law of Emperor JUSTINIAN I provided for teachers of grammar and rhetoric in Carthage, and classical education lasted there until the city fell at the end of the 7th century. Out of North Africa came Priscian, author of the Institutio de arte grammatica (before 526-527), the most comprehensive grammar handed down from the Roman world. He lived in Constantinople and Rome. Next to DONATUS, his grammar was the most used in the Middle Ages. Corippus, the author of a long and rather tedious epic on the Byzantine conquest of the Moors and of panegyrics on the emperors Justinian and Justin II, wrote between 549 and 567. He was a teacher by profession and a Christian. If the subject matter of his poetry was scarcely of epic quality, his exactness in regard to details of Berber life insures him a place as a worthwhile historical source.

The region around Carthage continued to produce theologians. FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE (467-532), writing in the spirit of Augustine, attacked ARIANISM and SEMI-PELAGIANISM. Several others wrote in connection with the controversy of the THREE CHAPTERS. Among these was the biographer of Fulgentius, the deacon FERRANDUS (d. 546 or 547), who with Cresconius put together the Breviatio canonum, a collection of Greek and African conciliar canons. VICTOR, Bishop of Tunnuna (d. after 566), while in exile for defending the Three Chapters, wrote a general chronicle with emphasis on Africa. Much used in the Middle Ages was an introduction to Sacred Scripture by JUNILIUS AFRICANUS, a Byzantine lay official, who wrote in distinguished Latin. For content, Junilius had access to a manuscript by the Syrian Paul of Basra, who became metropolitan of Nisibis. Primasius, Bishop of Hadrumentum, wrote a commentary on Apocalypse, which was often to be found in medieval libraries.

Spain. After the invasions of the 5th century, letters in SPAIN revived very slowly in the 6th. Two bishops, Apringius of Pace and JUSTUS OF URGEL, wrote allegorical scriptural commentaries. The first writer of importance, St. MARTIN, Bishop of Braga (d. 580), a Pannonian by birth, put together an interesting account of existing superstitions and pagan practices in his De correctione rusticorum. Among his other works are moral writings, in which he relied heavily on SENECA, a collection of canons, a treatise on Baptism, and a translation from Greek of sayings of Egyptian Fathers. St. LEANDER, Archbishop of Seville (d. c. 600), older brother of St. Isidore, composed a rule for women religious and gave the opening address at the Third Council of TOLEDO (589), at which the Goths renounced their Arianism. St. Isidore of Seville (d. 636) deserves to be looked upon as one of the founders of the Middle Ages and has been called the last of the Western Fathers of the Church. A prolific writer, he for the most part reproduced the antiquorum monumenta, bequeathing a vast encyclopedia to posterity. Chief among his works is the Etymologiae, or Origines, which embraces all fields of knowledge. His other writings are largely theological. The Fourth Council of Toledo (633), with its creed and 75 canons, seems to be to a great extent the work of Isidore. It should be noted that the series of national councils of Toledo forms an important element of the literature of Visigothic Spain. Isidore's chronicles, like the others of Visigothic Spain, are jejune, that of JOHN OF BICLARO being the best. Upon BRAULIO, Bishop of Saragossa (d. 651), disciple and friend of Isidore, devolved the task of arranging and editing the Etymologiae. Braulio left a collection of letters, written in stilted Latin, which throw much light on Spain in the middle of the 7th century. He also wrote a life of the saintly hermit AEMILI-AN (S. Millán de la Cogolla).

For the most part the authors of Spain in this early period were bishops, who as theological writers surpassed their contemporaries in other parts of Europe. Tajo, who succeeded Braulio in the See of Saragossa (651-683), wrote Libri sententiarum based on Augustine and Gregory the Great. St. EUGENE, Metropolitan of Toledo (646–657), was a poet of considerable ability. St. IL-DEFONSUS, his successor (657–667), famous in legend as well as history, wrote works on the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary and on Baptism. The former treatise is written more synonymo, in the bad taste and style in vogue in Spain and previously used by Isidore in one of his works. St. JULIAN OF TOLEDO, the keenest theologian to occupy that see (680–690), wrote on eschatology and in refutation of MONOTHELITISM. Besides, he was the author of a grammar and of a history of a war of King Wamba. In the western part of the peninsula, St. FRUC-TUOSUS, Archbishop of Braga (656–665), previously active as abbot and bishop of Dumio, founded a number of religious houses for which he composed religious rules. These rules were followed in monasteries of Galicia and northern Portugal until the 11th century. His vita, an important hagiographical account, was written by an unidentified author. Later in the 7th century the crossgrained hermit VALERIO OF BIERZO left autobiographical works in a style full of devices that demonstrate his education in rhetoric. In the same century an unknown deacon, presumably of Mérida, wrote the Lives of the Fathers of Mérida, which, concerned with the preceding century, gives much information on social customs, religion, liturgy, and general history. It has the usual rhetorical conceits employed in early Spanish Latin, along with many departures from classical syntax.

It is of special interest to note that one of the Visigothic kings, Sisebut (612–620), left writings of his own:

five letters, a poem of 61 hexameter verses on eclipses, and a life of St. DESIDERIUS OF VIENNE. Along with the canons of the councils, the texts of the Leges Visigo-thorum deserve consideration for their style and legal merit. The diffuse, poetic Mozarabic rite took form in the 7th century and thereafter suffered little change until its suppression in favor of the Roman rite in the late 11th century.

Gaul. By the 6th century the Roman schools of Gaul, once so flourishing, had ceased to exist. But St. AVITUS, Bishop of Vienne (490–518), continued to write under the influence of the schools, much as Sidonius had done, in a correct, artificial Latin style. He left letters, sermons, tracts against heresy, a poem in praise of virginity, and a very lengthy poem based on parts of Genesis and Exodus. Quite different from him, St. CAESARIUS, Bishop of Arles (503–543), preached moral sermons in lively popular language and wrote practical religious rules, one for monks, another for nuns.

Coming out of Italy, where he was born c. 530, FOR-TUNATUS brought with him into Francia a facility for Latin prose and poetry. Living by his wits, he wrote much trivial occasional verse, but his religious poetry is of profoundly Catholic inspiration. Two of his hymns, VEXILLA REGIS PRODEUNT and PANGE LINGUA GLORIOSI, have been immortalized in the liturgy of Passiontide. He wrote a number of saints' lives in prose, the best being that of his patroness, St. RADEGUNDA. A long vita of St. MARTIN OF TOURS in hexameter verse adds no new historical data. Fortunatus, who is given the cult of a saint, died as bishop of Poitiers toward the end of the century. F. J. E. Raby would regard him "not as the last of the Romans, but as the first of the medieval poets."

GREGORY OF TOURS (538-594), bishop and saint, most faithfully reflects the spirit of Merovingian Gaul in his writings. Gallo-Roman though he was, Gregory wrote in a Latin that, as he well realized, departed far from the classical norms. His diffuse History of the Franks, a chronicle, episodic and dramatic in treatment, is no masterpiece of historical writing, but it is incomparably richer than the other chronicles of his time. It reconstructs for posterity the beginnings of Francia. The narrative of Merovingian history was continued in the Chronicle of FREDEGARIUS, so called, a work by several authors who wrote in corrupt Latin. Only its last book offers independent material. After the middle of the 7th century the Liber historiae Francorum became a mediocre source for the end of the period. A short scientific treatise by Gregory of Tours, De cursibus ecclesiasticis, indicated the position of the constellations throughout the year with a view to establishing the time for the liturgical offices.

Gregory's numerous hagiographical writings reveal excessive credulity on his part, but he was conscientious about his sources and critical of quackery. His works set a pattern in hagiography, though the life of St. Martin by SULPICIUS SEVERUS had the greatest influence on early medieval biography. With their slight attention to personal characteristics, the vitae of this period belong to the heroic type. Some authors, such as Gregory of Tours and Gregory the Great, treat of holy persons in groups, as had been done earlier by Cassian and Rufinus. But scores of individual lives were written—more than 190 for the period between 613 and 751—most of them anonymously. The emphasis was on edification rather than history, and it was common practice to transfer episodes and miracles from one saint to another. Among the lives of greater historical value may be mentioned those of SS. GENEVIÈVE, AMANDUS, OUEN, ARNULF OF METZ, Vaast, and later of St. BONIFACE by Willibald of Mainz. The authenticity of some of these lives has been challenged, but criticism has vindicated it in a number of instances. Outside of the Frankish domain the vitae of St. COLUMBAN by JONAS OF BOBBIO; of St. SEVERIN of Noricum by Eugippius, Abbot of Lucullanum, near Naples; of St. PATRICK by Tirechan and Muirchu; of St. COLUMBA OF IONA by ADAMNAN; of St. BRIGID OF KILDARE by Cogitosus; and of St. CUTH-BERT are outstanding.

Many legal texts have come down from the early medieval period. There were codes for the Roman subjects in the new Germanic kingdoms: the Lex Romana Visigothorum, the Lex Romana Burgundionum, the Edictum Theodorici. They represented largely an adaptation and simplification of the 5th-century Theodosian Code of Roman law. The 6th-century legal corpus of Justinian exerted little influence in the West until later in the Middle Ages. Collections of laws were likewise prepared for various Germanic peoples settled in Europe. Together these codifications are now called the Leges barbarorum. Much influenced by Roman law were the Leges Visigothorum. More Germanic in nature were, e.g., the Lex Salica, Lex Ripuaria, and the Lombard laws. Their Latinity was barbaric and mixed with Germanic words. The diplomata of the kings and especially private documents, of which there are many examples in the collections of formulae, were written in uncouth Latin strikingly paralleled by the crude form of Merovingian handwriting.

A shadowy, enigmatic figure probably of southern Gaul in the 7th century is the grammarian Virgilius Maro, whose Epitomae and eight letters are extant. His bizarre texts may have been intended as a parody on grammars. The whole setting of his writings seems to be a fabrication. Akin to this writing with similar grotesque vocabulary are the Hisperica famina and the rhythmical and rhymed exorcism, the Lorica, emanating, it seems, from southwestern Britain in the 7th century, as well as the iambic hymn Altus Prosator, of Irish origin, attributed to St. Columba.

Ireland. St. Patrick's Confessio and his letter addressed to the soldiers of Coroticus were written in vulgar Latin. But since Celtic, and not vulgar Latin, was the vernacular, it became necessary for Irish monks to study book Latin and so their language escaped the vulgar influence. Similarly, the missionaries appear to have brought the handwriting, traditionally known in PALEOG-RAPHY as half-uncial, into Ireland, and from it developed the legible insular hand. There are few traces of the beginnings of Latin literature in Ireland. For the 6th century only a PENITENTIAL and a few hymns are extant. Further penitentials, tariffs of penances to be administered according to the gravity of sins, were subsequently brought by insular missionaries to the Continent. There the genre was taken up by Carolingian moralists. Though these texts show little originality or literary merit, they naturally had great moral and social effect.

St. Columban (d. 615), who toward the end of the 6th century crossed over to the Continent to spread monasticism, left several writings, notably his two rigorous religious rules and a number of letters. There has been controversy about the authenticity of a number of poems attributed to him. Some of the verses are in hexameter, and there is a long poem in adonics. Classical authors are cited, as well as Christian. A tradition of interest in the Latin classics is revealed in a 10th-century catalogue of the library of BOBBIO, where Columban finally settled down. Further evidence of the writing of poetry in Ireland is to be found in the collections of the Liber hymnorum and the Antiphonary of Bangor. The hymns are characterized by the use of alliteration, assonance, and rhyme and cannot be called either quantitative or rhythmical. The unique manuscript of the Antiphonary is of the late 7th century. In the 7th and 8th centuries, Irish scholars produced commentaries on the Bible, stressing the literal interpretation. Apparently these writings were not widely circulated. The anonymous treatise, De duodecim abusivis saeculi, commonly attributed to St. CYPRIAN but composed in Ireland in the middle of the 7th century, was much quoted in the Carolingian period. Among the types criticized in the treatise are the scholar without works, the contentious Christian, the unjust king, and the negligent bishop. Adamnan, Abbot of Iona (679-704), a native of Ireland, besides his vivid life of St. Columba, left an interesting account of a journey by Bishop Arculf to the Holy Land, De locis sanctis, which he secured from the lips of the pilgrim himself. Both his enlightened approach to history and his literary style mark Adamnan as an outstanding author of his period and attest the high level of Irish education.

Anglo-Saxon England. The history of the 5th-century German conquest of Britain and its results are narrated in the gloomy De excidio et conquestu Britanniae. At least part of it has been attributed to Gildas, a monk who crossed over from England to live in Brittany. The first part of the work, which treats of the Roman occupation of England, was not written until the 8th century; the part dealing with the conditions after the coming of the Anglo-Saxons may have been written in the late 6th century. The Historia Brittonum, a compilation attributed to Nennius (9th century), presents even greater critical difficulties.

An important figure in the field of letters appeared in the middle of the 7th century in the person of ALDHELM (d. 709). A native of Wessex, he became the pupil of Mailduib, Irish founder and abbot of MALMESBURY. He also studied in Kent under Archbishop THEODORE OF CANTERBURY and Abbot HADRIAN. Thus there was in his education a double influence, Irish and Roman. Both of these came to bear on the monasteries in England and passed with the missionaries and scholars, Anglo-Saxons and Scoti, to schools on the Continent. Aldhelm's writings show that he possessed a wide acquaintance with pagan and Christian authors. His prose strains toward the unusual in vocabulary and construction, so that it is difficult to understand. He wrote a letter glorying in the fact that this artificial style could be produced in Britain as well as in Ireland. On the other hand, his poems, even his versified riddles, while not of great inspiration, are metrically correct and quite intelligible. He became abbot of Malmesbury and, at the end of his life, bishop of Sherborne.

Far superior to Aldhelm in graces of character and literary skill was BEDE (673-735), saint and scholar, known affectionately in history as the Venerable Bede. Northumbrian by birth, Bede became a monk of WEAR-MOUTH and then of JARROW, where he taught and wrote for more than 40 years. He composed for his pupils works on spelling, figures of speech, metrics, the divisions of time, and, more learnedly, on chronology (see CHRONOLO-GY, MEDIEVAL, 2). Commentaries on the Old and New Testaments form the greatest part of his writing. In them he draws heavily on his Latin predecessors and delights in allegorical interpretation, but he copies with discrimination and is not lacking in originality. He was able to use Greek in his research, but his Hebrew references are taken from Jerome. A number of Bede's homilies are used in the Roman Breviary. He wrote saints' lives in prose and in verse. Far the best known of his works is his Ecclesiastical History of the English People, on which knowledge of English history up to 731 largely depends. Less dramatic than Gregory of Tours, Bede attains a unity of presentation in his work that makes it deserve to be called a history.

Out of English Benedictinism too came Wynfrith (c. 675–754), renamed Boniface by Pope Gregory II as he sent him on the German mission. Boniface left many letters rich in information concerning his missionary lands. Early in life he wrote a grammar and a work on metrics, and he left some poems and versified riddles.

The Carolingian Renaissance

The Saracen conquest of Spain and the Danish invasions of Ireland and England stopped literary progress in those parts of Christendom. The next development was to take place in Francia and produce the Carolingian renaissance. In preparation for it came the replacement of the difficult, unlovely Merovingian handwriting by the pleasing, readable Caroline minuscule, which gradually was to become the handwriting of Europe. The renaissance got under way with CHARLEMAGNE's efforts, inspired by churchmen, to educate the clergy, not yet in philosophy and theology, but in the rudiments of the liberal arts. Teachers and writers came from England, Ireland, Spain, and Italy to start the movement. A literary flourishing of their labors followed in the reign of Charles II the Bald. This second phase of the renaissance brought out more Frankish scholars as compared with the numbers that came from other lands. The scholars played seriously at forming an academy about Charlemagne in which they assumed the names of ancient writers. A palace school was created to educate promising youths.

This renaissance deserves to be called so because it consisted to a great extent in a rebirth of ancient learning. There was much copying of classical and patristic texts in the monastic SCRIPTORIA and garnering of them into libraries. Latin grammar was thoroughly studied, especially Priscian, and a number of the prominent scholars taught grammar at some time in their lives and wrote on it. One of them, for example, was the deacon ALCUIN OF YORK (d. 804), who has been called Charlemagne's minister of education and, more broadly, minister of intellectual affairs. Martianus Capella, the favored guide concerning the seven liberal arts, became the object of many commentaries. Before and during the Carolingian period numerous Latin glossaries were prepared. These glossaries usually reveal acquaintance with ancient writers on the part of those who composed them, and they helped to enrich, often pedantically, the vocabulary of those who made use of them. Ancient authors were admired and avidly read. This enthusiastic study resulted in a fine mastery of Latin on the part of those who pursued it. Both in their poetry and prose, Carolingian writers tended to imitate the ancients. In many instances the imitation was slavish, but it served no few writers to present their own ideas with richness and elegance.

Historical Writing. The most familiar example of wholesome classical imitation is EINHARD's Life of Charlemagne. Frankish Einhard was a product of the palace school. For the vita he turned to SUETONIUS as a model of biography, taking over format, words, and ideas and appropriating them to Charlemagne. The form of his work profited greatly, while the facts doubtless suffered somewhat. His vita is better than other biographies of the time—the two histories of Louis I, the Pious, and Nithard's account of the sons of Louis. In hagiography efforts were made to put the crude Latinity of earlier lives into good style with no benefit to historical content. MAR-TYROLOGIES were written and rewritten. Wandalbert of PRÜM composed one in verse. In Carolingian times there were fewer saints than in the preceding period, but in many cases their lives were written down by contemporaries, and there were accounts of miracles and of the translation of relics. ANNALS AND CHRONICLES, though they multiplied, showed little development. Outstanding among them are the Royal Annals. The History of the Lombards by PAUL THE DEACON is not comparable to Bede's history. It does not include an account of the author's own times. But the period did produce a number of capable writers on government and on the relations of Church and State who in some cases wrote to offer solutions for current problems in the realm: ADALARD, Alcuin, RABANUS MAURUS, Kathvulf, SMARAGDUS OF SAINT-MIHIEL, JONAS OF ORLÉANS, AGOBARD OF LYONS, Sedulius Scotus, and HINCMAR OF REIMS.

Verse. Carolingian verse has been preserved in great quantity, as the stout volumes of the Poetae Latini aevi Carolini (still in progress) in the Monumenta Germaniae historica bear witness. The Carolingian poets went to school to their great ancient predecessors. Scholars in every field tried their hand at verse, so that the result was frequently little more than an exercise in Latin. But among the great mass of verse written in the period, there are poems of considerable inspiration. One important innovation was the greatly increased use of rhythmic verse. Many rhythmical poems of the time, generally in trochaic verse, with or without rhyme, have come down anonymously in a collection made at the monastery of St. Gall (see SANKT GALLEN). Among them there are alphabetical poems, an uninspired vogue of the period. Some of this abecedarian verse appears in connection with the plaintive instructions in prose composed (841-843) by Dhuoda (Dodana) for her son William, who with his younger brother had been taken from her by her husband, Bernard of Septimania, and who was at the court of Charles the Bald. Probably the best known of the accentual poems is the beautiful "Hymn of Charity," coming, it seems, out of Italy and still used in the liturgy of Maundy Thursday. It must be noted, however, that metrical verse was more commonly employed until the 10th or 11th century.

Some of Alcuin's verses savor too much of the Latin class. Even his celebrated poem on the church of York is noted principally for its subject matter. But he could and did at times write graceful poetry. Paul the Deacon left behind only a little poetry, some of it of high quality. Spanish THEODULF, Bishop of Orléans, an outstanding poet, did not let the language of the past destroy his originality as he wrote his hexameters and elegiacs. The Church still uses part of his lovely pentameter hymn, GLORIA LAUS, on Palm Sunday. He had a gift for vivid description of nature and of people, as appears, for example, in his poem to Charlemagne describing the court and the courtiers. WALAFRID STRABO was another true poet, best remembered for his poem on the monastery garden of RE-ICHENAU and his eschatological Visio Wettini with the themes eventually used by DANTE. The torch had been handed down to him by Rabanus Maurus, who in turn had Alcuin as his teacher. Rabanus too had written much verse, though not of high inspiration, unless the 9thcentury VENI CREATOR SPIRITUS, sometimes attributed to him, is really his. Also of Rabanus's school was GOTTS-CHALK OF ORBAIS, who put rhyme into his poems in classical meters and also wrote rhythmical verse. His verse, the first medieval lyrical poetry, bears the poignant touch of his own unhappy life. FLORUS, master of the cathedral school of Lyons, a deacon, wrote much religious poetry, but it can hardly be called great, and it is surpassed by his prose. Besides other verse, Milo, a monk of SAINT-AMAND, left an interesting didactic poem, De sobrietate.

Among a number of immigrant Irishmen who wrote verse, Sedulius Scotus about the middle of the 9th century was outstanding, comparing favorably with the best poets of the period. He wrote metrical verse with a light touch as he sought the patronage of bishops and princes. Other Irishmen who flocked to the Continent in the 9th century tried their hand at poetry: Donatus, Bishop of Fiesole; Colman, with his nostalgic verses on Ireland; and JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA. Erigena, proficient in Greek, could not resist introducing Greek verses into his poems. This conceit was followed by a number of other versifiers who came under Irish influence in their training, e.g., HEIRIC OF AUXERRE, Emmerich of Elwangen, and Fredigard of SAINT-RIQUIER. Micon, deacon and monk of Saint-Riquier, was a better poet. A pupil of Heiric, HUC-BALD OF SAINT-AMAND, wrote a humorous poem on baldness in which every word of 146 lines begins with the letter c. Bishop RADBOD OF UTRECHT left several poems, among them a charming one written about a swallow that nested beneath his eaves.

There were also attempts at epic poetry by Carolingian writers. Ermoldus Nigellus, who it seems was a secular cleric, wrote four books (c. 826) in honor of Louis the Pious and two panegyrics in honor of Louis's son Pepin. Though not great poetry, Ermoldus's works are a precious historical source. Later in the century the anonymous POETA SAXO wrote a dull epic on Charlemagne based entirely on chronicles and Einhard. At the end of the century, Abbo of Saint-Germain-des-Prés composed in three books a vigorous epic on the siege of Paris by the Norsemen. It is an eyewitness account. The third book is marred by a display of recondite words derived from glossaries after the manner of Aldhelm and many Celtic writers. Of somewhat the same genre as the epic were the versified lives of saints, which merely reproduced the facts of earlier prose lives. Some of them were of great length. Heiric, for example, wrote 3,400 lines on St. GER-MAIN OF AUXERRE (not of Paris, as is sometimes stated).

Carolingian Humanists. Greatest humanist of all in the period was LUPUS, monk and eventually abbot of Ferriéres, who left a precious collection of 127 letters dealing mostly with literary and monastic affairs. Many letters of the period have come down to us, written by monks, bishops, kings, and popes, full of human interest. Those of Lupus show his passionate interest in securing manuscripts and improving texts of ancient authors for the library of his monastery. He was an expert scribe himself, and not a few of the manuscripts that he actually copied or annotated are extant. His Latin shows much influence of Cicero, though he suited the style of his letters to the addressees. Lupus also wrote on theological problems of the day, making skillful use of dialectics. Among his many pupils, Heiric in turn trained Hucbald and RE-MIGIUS OF AUXERRE. Heiric, who also studied under Irish masters at Laon, carried on the tradition of Lupus by putting together excerpts of ancient authors and commentaries on authors treated by him in his classes. With Remigius the humanist tradition passed into the 10th century. Teaching successively in Auxerre, Reims, and Paris, he wrote much: numerous commentaries on secular and Christian authors, on books of the Bible, and on treatises dealing with the seven liberal arts.

Theology and Scripture. Writings on theology and Biblical exegesis, of which there were many in the period, depended very much on patristic writers, Augustine and Gregory the Great especially, but also Hilary, Leo I, Jerome, Boethius, Cassiodorus, Isidore, and some Greek authors available in Latin translation. Even in the controversial literature that arose over heterodoxy, patristic texts were, in the main, used as arguments. A rather uninspired pedagogical form of dialogue with catechetical questions and answers was introduced, probably first by Alcuin, into some theological writings. At times it was enlivened by riddles.

Alcuin participated in the Adoptionist controversy (see ADOPTIONISM), writing to refute Felix of Urgel (d. 818) and ELIPANDUS OF TOLEDO, as did also PAULINUS OF AQUILEIA and Agobard of Lyons. But it appears now that Alcuin did not compose or edit the capitulary of Charlemagne on images, commonly called the LIBRI CAROLINI, which protested against the teaching of the Council of NI-CAEA II (787) on the worship of images. The acts of the council were known to the Latin world only in a very faulty translation. The council had been a reaction against ICONOCLASM, and the Libri Carolini repudiated certain exaggerations in its teachings, especially in the Latin translation of its proceedings. There has been much academic controversy about the authorship of the Libri Carolini, but it seems, in the light of recent study, that it must be attributed to Archbishop Theodulf of Orléans instead of to Alcuin.

CLAUDIUS, Bishop of Turin, a Spaniard by birth, after writing many Biblical commentaries, went far beyond the Libri Carolini in his Liber apologeticus and attacked all cult of the saints, worship of the Cross, pilgrimages to Rome, and the veneration of St. Peter. His work stirred up a storm of indignation. He was answered by the Irishman, DUNGAL, who cited against him praises of the saints from Christian poets, and by JONAS OF ORLÉANS, who quoted passages of Claudius's own Apologeticus against him. On the other hand, Agobard of Lyons wrote in the same vein as Claudius. Neither showed an influence of the classics on his style, but the writings of both reflect the strength of their own polemical personality. Agobard wrote against the use of ORDEALS, against superstitions, and against the Jews.

The Libri Carolini took up the controversy about the FILIOQUE, insisting that it be introduced into the Creed. A few years later Alcuin in his summa of dogmatic theology (De fide sanctae et individuae Trinitatis) gave detailed treatment to the doctrine involved in the Filioque. Among several writers who answered an appeal of Pope Nicholas I to refute PHOTIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, RATRAMNUS, monk of Corbie, stands out with his powerful four books Contra Graecorum opposita, the first three of which deal with the Filioque.

Ratramnus was involved in a controversy with his abbot, PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS, concerning the Eucharist. The abbot had written De corpore et sanguine Christi, a presentation of the doctrine of transubstantiation. Ratramnus found fault with some points of this treatise, and as a result he himself has been accused of heterodoxy. The more common opinion at present holds that he was not heretical. Paschasius (d. 859) was perhaps the most learned theologian of the 9th century. He profited by the opportunity to use the rich library of his monastery to read deeply in classics and patristics. He is an important figure in the history of the cult of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Strangely enough, he attributed some of his own writings on her to St. Jerome; others are found among the homilies attributed to St. Ildefonse.

The greatest theological controversy of Carolingian times arose over the question of PREDESTINATION. Many of the important authors of the 9th century participated in it. Keen-witted and stubborn Gottschalk of Orbais, who had devoted much study to St. Augustine, started it. He was accused by his opponents of teaching absolute and complete predestination to eternal punishment. Rabanus Maurus and Hincmar wrote against him. He was condemned by synods and underwent severe punishment. Florus of Lyons dealt with Gottschalk's views in a rather ambiguous manner, whereas Archbishop Amolo of Lyons (d. 852) pointed out what he considered objectionable in Gottschalk's views and gently urged him to conform.

On the other hand, one of Gottschalk's former teachers, Ratramnus, as well as PRUDENTIUS OF TROYES and Lupus of Ferrières, wrote in his favor. John Scotus Erigena, at the request of Hincmar, prepared a treatise attacking Gottschalk. Erigena was the philosopher of his day, his mind nurtured on the teaching of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, whom he translated into Latin. His Liber de predestinatione, with its philosophical approach, was attacked by both sides of the controversy over Gottschalk, notably by Florus. Scotus's De divisione naturae was better received, though it met condemnation in the 13th century for its pantheistic tendency. Some of Gottschalk's own writings have been discovered in recent times, and modern research is inclined to rescue him from the charge of heterodoxy.

Commentaries on Scripture were produced in great numbers by Carolingian theologians, all of them depending on patristic writers and almost all emphasizing allegorical interpretation. As exceptions, Paschasius Radbertus criticized his authorities, and CHRISTIAN OF STABLO (STAVELOT) preferred historical interpretation. Late in the 8th century, Ambrosius Autpertus (d. 784) in Italy and BEATUS OF LIÉBANA in Spain compiled commentaries on the Apocalypse that had considerable influence. Rabanus Maurus and Claudius of Turin were the most prolific exegetes. Rabanus employed long excerpts from the Fathers and made his personal contribution by small additions and by blending his quotations into a coherent treatment. Teaching rather than original thinking characterized all that he did and earned him the title of pedagogue of his age. Claudius's many exegetical works were really scriptural glosses, the first of that genre in the Western Church, an imitation of the Greek catenae. Glosses were compiled from one or several early authors. They were much used by theological scholars as a ready source for citations. The most famous of them, the Glossa ordinaria, which cannot be attributed to Walafrid Strabo as such, was apparently started in the period. Much later it was developed by ANSELM OF LAON and was given its name by Stephen Lombard. In the 12th century, glosses ceased to be mere citations of ancient authors.

Liturgy. The reign of Pepin the Short had witnessed a great liturgical upheaval in Francia, with the replacing of the Gallican liturgy by the Roman. Bishops REMIGIUS OF ROUEN and CHRODEGANG OF METZ were especially active in this reform. In the next century AMALARIUS OF METZ and of Lyons wrote extensively on the liturgy. His exaggerated use of allegorical interpretation in explaining the liturgy and some careless expressions that lent themselves to suspicion of heresy caused a great outburst against him on the part of Agobard and Florus. Nevertheless he retained his popularity and was much used by subsequent liturgists. Besides criticizing Amalarius, Florus compiled a work on the liturgy from the Fathers, and Walafrid Strabo left a brief but solid treatise on the historical origins of liturgical ceremonies and institutions.

Law. In Canon Law, penitentials continued to be produced. The FALSE DECRETALS came out of the vicinity of Le Mans about the middle of the 9th century. About the same time, that other forgery, the DONATION OF CONSTANTINE, came into existence. Its authorship is still a mystery. Without valid proof it has been attributed to ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN, cardinal priest of St. Marcellus, who, as an intermediary between the Greek and Latin world, among numerous other writings, translated the acts of the seventh and eighth councils (NICAEA II and CONSTANTINOPLE IV) into Latin. The most distinguished canonist of the century was Hincmar, for 40 years archbishop of Reims. Civil law witnessed a redaction of the Leges barbarorum, the production of the royal CAPI-TULARIES and efforts at codifying them, and the issuing of many royal diplomata.

Spain. Contemporary Spain showed little influence of the Carolingian renaissance, though it experienced its own revival of Latin letters. Invaded and conquered as it was, it could not fulfill the promise it had shown in literature during the Visigothic period. There were chronicles in the second half of the 8th century. One of them, the Chronicle of 754, written with some effort at style, has precious information on Spanish history during the Muslim invasions. Late in the next century two chronicles offer historical data on the Christian kingdom of the Asturias, the Chronicle of Roda (or of Alfonso III) and that of Albelda. The latter is found with an addition called the Prophetic Chronicle, which underwent a revision in the late 10th century. It talks of the Muslims and prophesies their overthrow in Spain.

A number of letters concerning disciplinary matters in the Church and doctrinal errors supply scattered details for the history of the late 8th century. The most important heresy was Adoptionism, championed by Elipandus of Toledo and Felix of Urgel, and condemned as has been indicated above. Elipandus, a master of invective, wrote many letters concerning his beliefs. Beatus of Liébana and Eterius of Osma wrote a learned apologetic treatise (785) against him and his teachings. Thereafter written documents become scarce for a time. The acts of the Council of Córdoba (839) afford information on the current state of the Church.

The most distinguished and prolific writers of Spain in the 9th century were the Córdobans, Albar and his friend EULOGIUS. Presumably a layman, Albar wrote freely of theological and ecclesiastical matters. He exchanged letters with five correspondents on religious questions, some of them his personal problems. One such exchange was with Bodo-Eleazar, a priest who had gone over to Judaism. Albar strove to prove to Bodo that Christ is the Messiah. Both correspondents indulged in harsh invective. Albar left some 500 lines of rather poor metrical verse, mostly hexameter, on nature and on the Bible, all of it deeply religious. He devoted some Asclepiadean verses to the martyr Eulogius. A small quantity of metrical verse by other contemporary writers in Spain has been preserved. Probably Albar is the author of the Indiculus luminosus, which chides compromising Christians, defends the ideals of the martyrs of Córdoba (850-859), and denounces Muhammad as a precursor of Antichrist. The work concludes by deprecating the neglect of Latin and Latin studies in favor of Arabic learning on the part of Christian youth. A much more detailed account and defense of the Córdoban martyrs is to be found in the Memoriale sanctorum, the Apologeticus martyrum, and the Documentum martyriale of Eulogius. He himself died a martyr, and his life was written by Albar. They had studied together in the school of the learned Abbot Esperaindeo. Albar tells of a trip Eulogius made to monasteries around Pamplona, from which he brought back a number of classical and Christian writings. He praises Eulogius's virtue and zealous energy, as well as his learning, and pays ardent veneration to him as a saint in heaven. Probably Albar's final work was his Confessio, a long prayer of contrition. It has little in common with Augustine's Confession but is in the tradition especially of Isidore's Synonyma and several pseudo-Isidorian writings.

At a date not definitely known, but probably after the martyrdoms, a work on clerical discipline and dress was written by Leovigildus, presumably the otherwise well-known cleric of Córdoba of that name. In 864 Samson, abbot of the Basilica of St. Zoilus in Córdoba, wrote his Apologeticus. It treats of the Trinity and the Incarnation and gives an idea of the organization of the Church in Spain at the time. The most interesting part of the work is the attack on a bishop, Hostegesis, and a layman, Servandus, who were obsequious to the Muslim authorities and tyrannized over the Christians. Samson refutes their doctrinal errors and ridicules the bishop's bad Latin.

The 10th Century

The invasions of the Normans and Hungarians and the incursions of the Saracens in the Mediterranean regions discouraged the pursuit of letters in the 10th century. The organizational work of Charlemagne literally went to pieces. The period, not without reason, has been called an iron age, the DARK AGES, but even from the viewpoint of literature this should not be exaggerated. Remigius of Auxerre and Hucbald of St. Amand, as has been noted, passed on the torch of learning into the 10th century. Literary study was centered in the monasteries, among which that of St. Gall flourished in the period.

Sequence and Trope. NOTKER BALBULUS, a monk of St. Gall, lived only until 912, but he has a place in the early development of the SEQUENCE, or prose, a new departure in liturgical texts. There is much disagreement among authors about the actual origin of these texts, but Notker composed some of them and established the tendency to depart from the exact melody of the ALLELUIA and its prolongation, or jubilus. In France at the time the texts were made to follow the melody closely. At St. Gall assonance, rhyme, and rhythm gradually appeared in the Sequences, and with them a bold melodic development. From St. Gall this type of Sequence spread into Germany, where toward the middle of the 11th century, Wipo, chaplain to Emperors Conrad II and Henry III, composed the VICTIMAE PASCHALI LAUDES, the Easter Sequence, which marks a step toward the completely versified Sequences that was characteristic of the 12th century.

With St. Gall in the time of Notker is associated the composition of TROPES, i.e., texts interpolated into the Introit, Kyrie, Gloria, and other parts of the Mass. Probably originating in France, troping was more common there and in England and Italy than in Germany. Tropes, eventually rejected from the liturgy, were the beginnings of medieval drama (see DRAMA, MEDIEVAL).

Notker has more definite claim to literary greatness. He wrote occasional verse of superior quality, a life of St. GALL in mixed prose and verse, of which only fragments remain, and a martyrology. Best known of his works is, however, his Gesta Karoli, which laid the basis for the medieval legend of Charlemagne.

The Ottonian Renaissance. In the year Notker died, Otto, who in 936 became OTTO I of Germany, was born. The literary development in his reign and those of his two successors to the turn of the century is somewhat diffidently called a renaissance named after them (see OTTONIAN RENAISSANCE). It can be looked upon as a further flowering of the Carolingian renaissance. The Ottonian court by no means furnished a center of culture comparable to that of Charlemagne. But the steadying influence of the Ottos as rulers and the resumption of the imperial title established a milieu in which letters could thrive.

A number of rather ambitious epic and historical poems came out of German monasteries. An anonymous monk, perhaps of TEGERNSEE, using a Latin translation, put into leonine verse the old Greek romance Historia Apollonii, regis Tyri. He cast it into the form of a dialogue, or eclogue, and used many glossary terms and Greek words. The Waltharius, an epic of 1,456 hexameter lines with a setting in the time of the Hunnic invasions, is generally considered to have been written at St. Gall by EKKEHARD I (d. 973) and later revised by Ekkehard IV (d. 1060). It is maintained by some, however, that it was written in Aquitaine a century earlier. The epic is built on popular Germanic legends and is similar to the Nibelungenlied. It is a gory tale, but it has literary merit. Another, less successful, poem, the Ecbasis captivi in 1,229 hexameter lines with leonine rhyme, was composed in a monastery of Lorraine, apparently Saint-Evre of Toul. It is the oldest Germanic beast-epic, dating from c. 940, or, as recent scholarship proposes, from the next century. It is an allegory that tells a tale of monastic life, quite unintelligible now, under the guise of an animal story. Many classical and Christian poets were pillaged by the author.

At the convent of GANDERSHEIM in Saxony a nun, ROSWITHA (Hrotswitha), wrote six dramas in rhymed prose on Christian themes. She meant them to replace the reading of Terence, but he remained a favorite, and she survived in only one manuscript. Futile attempts have been made to prove her plays a forgery of the 15th century. Roswitha wrote a long poem in rather graceful rhyming hexameters, the Gesta Othonis, on Otto I, and another, the Primordia coenobii Gandeshemensis, which traces the history of her abbey down to 919. Her style is rather good and shows the influence of Vergil, Prudentius, and Sedulius. Saxony also produced WIDUKIND OF CORVEY (d. after 973), who wrote the history of Henry I and Otto I in prose, but with many poetic words and a patriotic approach that give his work qualities of an epic.

Between 915 and 924 an anonymous poet in northern Italy wrote four books of hexameters on the battle-filled history of Berengar I. He is not careful about chronology and leans heavily upon classical writers. The author, a schoolmaster, equipped his poem with glosses explaining difficult passages.

Along with historical poems the Ottonian period produced some histories. One of the most celebrated authors of the century was the Italian LIUTPRAND, cleric, courtier, ambassador, and, eventually, bishop of Cremona (961). He was successively at the courts of Hugh and Berengar in Italy, and of Otto I in Germany. His attempt at writing a universal history failed to deal with Europe west of Germany. It was called Antapodosis (Tit-for-Tat) because he praised his friends and excoriated his enemies, especially Berengar, with whom he had quarreled, and Emperor Nicephorus II Phocas, whom he despised. He wrote a history of Otto I during the years 960 to 964 and an account of one of his own embassies to Constantinople. His works are filled with anecdotes; his style is affected and interlarded with Greek, and verse of his own composition is introduced into his prose text. He writes with biting humor, and, though one cannot trust everything that he says, he is very interesting reading. A chronicle extending to 965 was written by Benedict, a monk of St. Andrew on the Soracte. In barbarous Latin he treats especially of the Lombards and of his own monastery. He is the first source for the legend of Charlemagne's expedition to the Holy Land. In better Latin the Chronicon Salernitanum, by a monk of St. Benedict of Salerno using archival material and oral tradition, gives the history of the Lombard dukedoms in southern Italy to 974.

In the north, in Lorraine, Abbot REGINO OF PRÜM (d. 915), besides works on music and Canon Law, wrote a chronicle from the birth of Christ to 906. It is curious that he did not know the Carolingian chronicles. The work becomes more original after 814 as he makes use of local annals, some sources no longer extant, and oral information. An anonymous writer extended the chronicle to 967, giving valuable information on the Saxon dynasty.

FLODOARD, a cleric of Reims (d. 966), distinguished himself as an historian. He wrote annals probably from the year 894, though the extant text begins with 919 and extends to 966. His great work is the History of the Church of Reims in four books, which as archivist of Reims he was well fitted to write. A poetical work by him on the triumphs of the saints of Palestine, Antioch, and Italy, in 19 books and many different verse forms, proves that he was no mean poet. He visited Rome to gather material on the saints of Italy. In both his prose and poetry he is singularly independent of classical influence. Richer (d. after 998), a monk of Saint-Remy in Reims, at the behest of Archbishop Gerbert, set out to write the history of Charles the Simple and Louis IV, but he carried it through to 995. It is a valuable source for the late Carolingians and the Capetian revolution. Richer's pretension to rhetoric and classical imitation, together with errors in chronology, make him inferior to Flodoard as a historian. The original manuscript of his work was found in 1883. The Historia Francorum (before 1004) of Aimon of Fleury is merely a rewriting in better Latin of earlier sources. It extends only to the middle of the 7th century.

Biography and hagiography were not neglected in the period. Notable were the accounts of the lives of the abbots of Cluny, two of whom, ODO (d. 942) and ODILO (d. 1049), wrote on spiritual matters in prose and in verse, though CLUNY produced no significant writer until PETER THE VENERABLE in the 12th century. It showed less enthusiasm for classical literature than did the great abbeys of the Carolingian period. Tenth-century abbots of several other monasteries received biographies. A number of good biographies of bishops were produced in the 10th and 11th centuries. In the valley of the Meuse, HERIGER, who became abbot of Lobbes (Laubach) in 995, under the influence of Notker, the great bishop of Liège, where the abbot had long been a teacher, wrote a history of the bishops of that see. It quotes ancient authors frequently and is better literature than history. First of the biographies in the time of the great Ottonian bishops was that of BRUNO, learned Archbishop of Cologne, brother of Otto I. It was written by Ruotger, a cleric, perhaps a monk, at the request of Folcmar, Bruno's successor (965-968). The author profited by Bruno's literary interests and rich library. He modeled his work after Sallust, as Widukind had done, and was influenced by Augustine and Sulpicius Severus. The life of ULRIC (d. 973), distinguished bishop of Augsburg, was written by Gerhard, provost of the cathedral chapter, his contemporary. There are biographies of the first bishop of Prague, the martyr St. ADALBERT, and of ADALBERO II, Bishop of Metz. Among the best biographies of the Middle Ages was that of Bishop BERN-WARD OF HILDESHEIM (992-1022) by THANGMAR, his teacher, and later dean of his chapter, librarian, and notary. Completed by 1023, the vita treats not only of St. Bernward and his see, a great art center, but also affords much information on the history of the time. There were two attempts at a biography of Mathilda, mother of Otto I, a biography of King Robert II of France by Helgaud, monk of Fleury, two accounts of the martyred Duke WEN-CESLAUS OF BOHEMIA, and one of the writer on Canon Law, Bishop BURCHARD OF WORMS.

Gerbert, born in Auvergne and educated in the monastery of Aurillac, who became Pope Silvester II, is reputed to have been the most learned man of his age. In 967 he went into Spain to study mathematics and the natural sciences. Because of his scientific learning he was even thought to be a magician. His interest was especially the quadrivium, and he wrote on mathematics and on the use of the abacus. As scholasticus of the cathedral school of Reims (970-982) he had great influence on education. Gerbert was elected archbishop of Reims and named abbot of Bobbio and archbishop of Ravenna before he became pope (999-1003). Written in classical style, a sheaf of letters left by him throws light on his humanistic ideals and the history of the times. Another distinguished teacher, ABBO OF FLEURY (d. 1004), wrote works on logic and the calendar. ADSO, Abbot of Montier-en-Der and later of St. Benignus in Dijon (d. 992), a careful stylist, wrote De Antichristo, an eschatological work, for Gerberga, daughter of Henry the Fowler, as well as several saints' lives.

RATHERIUS, tempestuous ecclesiastic, born in Liège, bishop of Verona, which see he took up and laid down three times, spending most of his incumbency in prison, wielded an extremely facile pen. He used it, dipped in irony, to make charges against king, bishops, priests, and all classes of society and to urge his reforms. Thus he was a sort of mirror of his times. His chief work, in five books, he called Praeloquia. He likewise at times wrote introspectively, confessing with bitterness his own failings, always in a style that showed his command of the classics. He continued his cantankerous ways back in the region of the Meuse until he died (974).

A calmer spirit was Bishop ATTO OF VERCELLI (d. 961), who wrote against lay oppression of the Church in his De pressuris ecclesiasticis and preached against superstition. A work entitled Polypticum, attributed to him, discussed the disturbing political situation in Italy in the most obscure language, very unlike Atto's usual style. No one, however, seems to doubt its authenticity. In Rome earlier in the century EUGENIUS VULGARIUS wrote a defense in rhymed prose of Pope Formosus after his death. He also wrote carmina figurata of the worst kind, e.g., in the form of a pyramid and of a triangle, in praise of the Pope and the Emperor. In Naples, with somewhat less rhetoric, AUXILIUS wrote in defense of Formosus, as did also an anonymous writer (928). Archpriest Leo of Naples translated into Latin the Alexander romance (951-969), which enjoyed great vogue in the Middle Ages.

The 11th Century

Writers in the 11th century continued to be monastic. They produced writings intended for pedagogical use, much verse of various genres, chronicles and biographies, and some theological works, culminating in those of St. Anselm of Canterbury.

Writings on the Trivium. In St. Gall NOTKER LABEO translated into German a number of Latin authors used in the schools. Thus St. Gall became the cradle of German literature in the 11th century. Papias, an Italian cleric, in the middle of the century composed a lexicon and a simple grammar based on Priscian. Aimeric of Angoulême, also a cleric, in his Ars lectoris (1086), which treated the accentuation of words, cited verses from many authors, including some otherwise unknown verses of Luxorius. He attempted, with judgment somewhat less than unerring, to group ancient and medieval authors into classes according to their excellence. Conrad of Hirschau, in an early 12th-century dialogue, discussed and evaluated a number of authors. He insisted that the study of the Bible and theology were superior to the pursuit of profane learning.

Verse. Ekkehard IV of St. Gall composed a Liber benedictionum containing 60 hymns for the feasts of the liturgical year, written by students and revised by himself, and a number of formulas for blessing various objects. His Casus sancti Galli gives a glimpse into the monastery and its schools, though as history it is inaccurate.

The school of TEGERNSEE owed much to the teacher Froumund, who at the end of the 10th century succeeded in making good poetry out of themes for school exercises. In rather poor Latin, Ruodlieb, a romantic epic concerning the adventures of a German knight, was composed by a monk of Tegernsee c. 1050. The end of the poem is not extant, but the 2,400 verses in leonine hexameter that remain offer a mixture of Oriental wisdom, German saga, and history.

One of the fullest medieval autobiographers, OTHLO, Abbot of St. Emmeram in Regensburg (d. 1070), was trained in the monastic schools of Tegernsee and HER-SFELD. His personality appears vividly in all his writings, and he gives precious information concerning his own education. Despite a vow to enter a monastery, he for some years remained a cleric in the world. In 1032 he entered St. Emmeram and soon became master of the school there. His first work, De doctrina spirituali, was a lengthy poem in 39 sections; the poet's introspective nature caused him to present an account of his temptations for the guidance of others. In the work he incidentally listed his writings and told of his calligraphic skill. In De visionibus he related visions of his own as well as some reported by other authors and by his contemporaries. Among Othloh's other writings are several hagiographical accounts of little historical value. All his writings, in a style pleasingly simple, were for the edification of others. Though he was versed in the classics himself and quoted from them in his Proverbia, he did not approve of their use in education. In theology, he felt, dialectics could be dangerous.

Somewhat earlier in the century Egbert of Liège had put together a collection of proverbs in some 2,000 verses of his Fecunda ratis, in which he drew from German tradition, the Bible, and patristic and pagan authors. At the same time WIPO, court chaplain to Conrad II, composed his Proverbia, with rhymes of two and three syllables, for Conrad's son Henry. Wipo carried over his love for proverbs into his history of Conrad II and Henry III, which is written in admirably correct Latin.

Intellectually highly gifted but physically maimed by paralysis, so that he could not move and could use his voice and fingers only with difficulty, Hermannus the Lame (Contractus), monk of REICHENAU, was called in contemporary annals the "marvel of his age." He wrote much on mathematics and astronomy. His chronicle of world history to 1054, the year of his death, is the earliest extant work of this kind written east of the Rhine. Its latter part is valuable for the history of southern Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary. Herman is the author of a long poem, De contemptu mundi, addressed to nuns; the versification, in a variety of meters, is correct. The text and music of several Sequences and a little treatise on music are by Herman, but the antiphons ALMA REDEMPTORIS MATER and SALVE REGINA cannot be attributed to him. The latter emanated from Le Puy in the 11th century, probably the work of Bishop Aimar. The AVE MARIS STELLA existed in the 9th century, and the AVE REGINA COELORUM and the REGINA CAELI are of the 12th century. The eclogue Conflictus ovis et lini, on the merits of the sheep and of flax, at one time attributed to Herman, is apparently the work of Winrich of Trier.

About the middle of the century Warnerius of Basel, perhaps of French origin, wrote two poems with smooth leonine rhyme: Synodicus and Paraclitus. The former is an imitation of the 9th-century Eclogue of Theodulus, a contest to demonstrate the superiority of the Old Testament over ancient mythology. Warnerius parallels persons and episodes of the Old Testament with some in the New Testament and in the history of the Church. The Paraclitus is a dialogue between a sinner and grace.

A shadowy figure of the middle Rhine region, a monk under the pseudonym Sextus Amaricius Piosistratus, composed his satirical Sermones, four books of verse in the form of dialogue and monologue. Writing in the reign of Henry III, in 1046 at the earliest, he castigated the vices of the time and presented the virtues as their cure. The Sermones are the first extant medieval satirical work of importance, though it has come down in only one manuscript.

Several historical poems in leonine hexameter were written by German ecclesiastics during the 11th century. Purchard of Reichenau in narrating the life of Abbot Witigowo described the coronation of Otto III in Rome. Abbot Gerard of Seeon wrote a historical poem in 54 hexameters on the church of Bamberg and its school, comparing it with ancient Athens. Bishop THIETMAR OF MERSEBURG interspersed his chronicle of the history of Saxony with dull leonine verses. The anonymous Carmen de bello Saxonico sings the praises of Henry IV in his victory over the Saxons from 1073 to 1075. Critics argue about its historical value.

In Italy, MONTE CASSINO, with its scriptorium and rich library, was a center of culture. There CONSTANTINE THE AFRICAN made translations of medical works from Arabic and Greek that were to be the fundamental texts in schools of medicine until the 15th century. Guaiferius and ALPHANUS were accomplished poets. The former wrote religious poetry for edification; the latter, more skilled, wrote odes in the lyrical measures of Horace, notably one on Monte Cassino and one dedicated to Archdeacon Hildebrand. LEO OF VERCELLI, episcopus imperii, wrote verse in praise of Gregory V and Otto III and an elegy on Otto. Rangerius, Bishop of Lucca, in a poem, De anulo et baculo, attacked lay investiture.

St. PETER DAMIAN (1007–72), unworldly ascetic called to be a cardinal and thrust into the fight against the evils of the age, was well schooled in the arts and gifted as a writer both in prose and verse. He was the author of much poetry, mostly metrical: majestic verses in trochaic tetrameter on judgment day and paradise, a rhythmical poem on the Song of Songs, and many hymns to Mary, the Apostles, martyrs, and other saints in a variety of meters. He was a skilled writer of epigrams. His rhymed prose could soar with poetical feeling. His prose works against simony and clerical incontinence played a significant role in the Gregorian reform. His many letters are of great value as historical sources. He was a master of the spiritual life, gentler in his asceticism and piety than many writers have made him out to be. Though he inveighed against pagan authors, he used them in his writing. He was especially fond of drawing some of his examples from the PHYSIOLOGUS.

In France the center of study was passing from the older monasteries to new schools, the cathedral school of CHARTRES and the monastery of BEC. But the significant poets began to flourish only at the turn of the century. With FULBERT, Bishop of Chartres (d. 1029), pupil of Gerbert, the reputation of the school of Chartres began. He wrote many religious poems in meter and rhythm, prose treatises, saints' lives, and sermons. He was versed in medicine, but his greatest fame was as a churchman.

His pupil BERENGARIUS OF TOURS, whose writings on the Eucharist raised a storm of polemical works against him, was the author of a rhyming accentual poem in which he prayed for himself. The devious politician who in 977 became bishop of Laon, Adalbero, wrote satirical verse (1017) attacking monks and deploring the state of the kingdom in the reign of Robert the Pious. He knew the Roman satirists. Godfrey (d. 1095), scholasticus and chancellor of Reims, wrote letters in verse, patently school exercises, and a poem in honor of another poet, Odo of Orléans and Cambrai, which was cast in the form of a dream.

In the middle of the 11th century a collection of medieval lyrical verse made by an unknown German throws light on the development of such poetry. From the manuscript of Cambridge University in which it is found the collection is known as the Cambridge Songs. It contains a number of Sequences, profane as well as sacred, intended to be sung. A number of the poems show progress in the mastery of accentual verse in connection with romantic stories, love themes, and description of nature. One of the poems of the collection, in rhythmical dactylic tetrameter, O admirabile Veneris idolum, came out of Verona, probably in the 10th century. Its subject is perverted love, but it gives a key to the provenience of the beautiful poem in the same meter, O ROMA NOBILIS, orbis et domina, which sings of the Rome of virgins and martyrs, of SS. Peter and Paul. A lengthy love poem in elegiacs with leonine rhyme, found among other poems in a Psalter belonging to the cathedral of Ivrea, appears to be of the late 11th century. Its theme indicates that St. Peter Damian was not fighting imaginary evils in the Church.

Three gifted 11th-century poets lived well into the 12th century: MARBOD, Bishop of Rennes (d. 1123), Baudry of Bourgueil (d. 1130), and HILDEBERT OF LAVARDIN (d. 1133). Marbod, a product of the cathedral school of ANGERS and its master, wrote a poem on figures of words, illustrating them in his verse. His best-known work is a poem on the virtues of precious stones, Liber lapidum. He put Bible stories and saints' lives, as well as many of his letters, into verse. A poetical work of his old age, Liber decem capitulorum, shows him repenting of frivolous verse of his youth and lamenting the unbridled freedom and too secular training of the cathedral schools. He was overly fond of the leonine hexameter and little skilled in composing rhythmical verse.

Baudry, a gracious and clever writer, after study at Angers became a monk at Bourgueil, its abbot (1089), and archbishop of Dol (1107). His verse is, however, for the most part secular in spirit. Ovid was his master; and he was an ardent humanist, showing in his beautifully wrought metrical verse the secularizing effect of his education in a cathedral school. His prose writings and some of his verse are religious but without great depth of feeling. He carried on a wide correspondence.

Hildebert, more profound than Marbod and Baudry and a better churchman, may have been a pupil of Berengar of Tours. After serving successively as scholasticus, archdeacon, and bishop (1096) of Le Mans, he became archbishop of TOURS (1125). Though a distinguished humanist, he preferred to choose themes for his poetry from Scripture, liturgy, and hagiography. Two fine poems have Rome as their subject. Hildebert wrote in a variety of classical meters but likewise used rhythmical verse in masterly fashion. His many letters reveal him as an earnest prelate concerned with law and reform. They were used as models in the schools.

History. The writing of chronicles and history made progress in the 11th century, not in France with its feudal division, nor in Spain, but along the Rhine and in Germany. MARIANUS SCOTUS (d. c. 1082), a recluse who lived in several German monasteries, used various ancient and medieval sources in writing his world chronicle and made many corrections in chronology. He showed little interest in the history of his own times, but gave scattered data on kings, bishops, and his fellow Scoti. Thietmar, bishop of Merseburg, wrote a history of Saxony and adjacent Slavic regions up to 1018. The indication of his sources in the margin of his manuscript gives evidence of vast research. He strove to imitate ancient authors, and his style is somewhat affected. On the other hand, Lambert of Hersfeld (d. 1077) wrote his chronicle in a good style, dealing after 1046 with matters of which he had personal knowledge. A prolific writer, author of 15 treatises on the side of the papacy in the investiture struggle, in which he displays good judgment and considerable moderation, BERNOLD OF CONSTANCE (or of St. Blaise or Schaffhausen) composed a universal chronicle. Original from 1074 to his death in 1100, it is too much restricted to ecclesiastical matters and unimportant daily happenings. Bernold left a valuable work on the liturgy. The History of the Bishops of Hamburg, extending to 1075, in good, concise Latin, by Adam of Bremen is the best diocesan history of the period, with much information on northern Germany and the Scandinavian countries. Somewhat earlier several good monastic and diocesan histories were written: an account of the abbots of SAINT-TROND by Rudolph of that monastery; a history of the bishops of Tongres and LIÈGE by Anselm of Liège; and one concerning the bishops of CAMBRAI by an anonymous writer. In Italy the Abbey of Monte Cassino had its chroniclers. The Belgian monk SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOUX (1030-1112) was the greatest chronicler of his time. His world chronicle is independent from 1024 to 1111. Sigebert, who sided with the Emperor against the Pope in the struggle over investiture, was also the author of saints' lives and of a De viris illustribus.

In France Radulfus Glaber (d. c. 1050) wrote a life of St. WILLIAM, Abbot of St. Benignus in Dijon, and a rather poor history of his times, limited for the most part to Burgundy and France. Adhémar of Chabannes (d. 1034), preacher, poet, scribe, and historian, wrote a history of the abbots of St. Martial in Limoges, a letter defending the apostolicity of the Church of Limoges, and a chronicle that is especially useful for the history of Aquitaine. There were several chroniclers of the conquest of England by the Normans and of their history in Italy.

Toward the end of the period, from the pontificate of Gregory VII (1073–85) to that of Pascal II (1099–1118), Europe was deluged with polemical literature emanating from both sides in the struggle over lay investiture. Aside from letters, which were numerous, and canonical collections, there were more than 130 polemical works, most of them edited in the Libelli de lite of the Monumenta Germaniae Historica. They emanated especially from Germany and Italy but also from France, England, and Spain, and were written almost entirely by ecclesiastics, mostly monks, and only a few bishops. Of great value as historical sources, they also throw light on the literary culture in the various parts of Europe. Some were in verse; irony was much employed. Simony was frequently the topic of the papal defenders.

There were many biographies written in the period, usually of great churchmen. The life of Henry IV was an exception. Saints' lives were written largely in a stereotyped pattern with disregard for the facts of individual lives. Some apocryphal lives were written to satisfy vanity. Following an effort to put earlier biographies into good Latin there was a reversion of sentiment in favor of simplicity. But in both the 10th and 11th centuries there were no few saints' lives written that brought out the details and personal qualities of their heroes and thus have real historical value.

The chronicles of the First Crusade were written in the early 12th century, but their authors were really men of the 11th. These writings and those on the succeeding Crusades are of varied literary quality. They are available in good editions and modern translations and are among the better known texts of the Middle Ages.

Theological Writings. There was a decline in the production of theological literature after the Carolingian period. Toward the middle of the 11th century, however, theological controversy gave new impetus to the writing of theology. The controversy concerning the Eucharist and the struggle over lay investiture have been mentioned. Both were marked by a wider recourse to dialectic. Its use was deprecated by some authors, but it was on its way to triumph in the next century. Those who fought over investiture still preferred the citation of authorities, especially legal texts, St. Cyprian, and St. Augustine.

The influence of Augustine made itself strongly felt in 11th-century works on the spiritual life, some of which actually circulated under his name. Abbot John of Fécamp (1028–78), only recently recognized as the author of a number of spiritual writings, was one of the first to introduce affective devotion into his meditations. The prayer for each day of the week in the Preparation for Mass in the Missal, which was formerly attributed to St. Ambrose, has been vindicated for Abbot John. St. Peter Damian wrote similar prayers, as did St. Anselm.

Glory of the Benedictine Middle Ages, ANSELM, born in Aosta in northern Italy, successively abbot of Bec and archbishop of Canterbury, at the end of the 11th century (d. 1109) far outdistanced his age in power of thought and literary expression. He was taught at Bec by the Italian LANFRANC, himself no mean scholar and author, chief literary opponent of Berengar of Tours. Bent always on his principle of fides quaerens intellectum, Anselm meditated lovingly on the truth he studied, whether he wrote his philosophical and theological treatises or composed his prayers. His ontological argument for the existence of God, often repudiated, has charmed philosophers of all ages. His more than 400 letters deal with many problems of his time and often amount to treatises. The memory of Anselm's life and conversation is faithfully preserved in the biography by his companion and secretary EADMER, monk of Canterbury.

Abbot GUIBERT OF NOGENT (d. 1121), at the suggestion of Anselm, composed his Moralia in Genesim in imitation of the Moralia of Gregory the Great. Besides other exegetical works, Guibert wrote on relics, decrying veneration paid to relics that were not authenticated; on the Incarnation, against arguments of the Jews; in praise of the Blessed Virgin Mary; on virginity; and on the construction of sermons. He is best known for his Gesta Dei per Francos, a history of the First Crusade, and for his autobiography. He ornamented his prose writings with verses in diverse meters.

Bruno of Asti (c. 1040–1123), abbot of Monte Cassino, was a prolific author. His works include treatises on the Trinity and the Incarnation, liturgical and polemical writings, commentaries on Scripture, sermons, and letters, all composed in good Latin style.

Law. The period witnessed a renaissance of civil law brought about by the discovery, after centuries of neglect, of Justinian's Digest, which became the object of intensive study resulting in glosses. Bologna, with its famous master IRNERIUS, became the center for this study. The investiture struggle stirred up increased interest in Canon Law. Outstanding names among the canonists were BURCHARD OF WORMS, ANSELM OF LUCCA, BONIZO (BONITHO) OF SUTRI, and IVO OF CHARTRES.

The 12th-Century Renaissance

The impetus in Latin literature connected with what is known as the 12th-century renaissance had its beginnings in the last quarter of the 11th century and extended through the first quarter of the 13th. The renaissance developed in the milieu of the rising towns with their business and prosperity. Its intellectual aspects were centered in France, in the schools in and around Paris. Chartres, Laon, Reims, Tours, Anvers, and Poitiers, along with Tournai and Liège in Belgium, had schools that flourished more or less for a time, but Paris took and kept an undisputed ascendancy.

Schools and Scholars. The schools occupied themselves primarily with philosophy and theology. But their scholars in many cases did not limit their writings to those fields. After St. ANSELM, the outstanding figure to arise in the scholarly world was ABELARD (1079–1142), certainly one of the best known of medieval personalities. He had studied under ANSELM OF LAON (d. 1117), whom he later sought to discredit but who had made a contribution to the systematizing of theology and the organizing of scriptural glosses.

Brilliant, but combative, Abelard moved about France discussing dialectic and theology before large audiences. His teaching on the Trinity, faith, and grace brought condemnations upon him and antagonism from Bernard of Clairvaux. He wrote much on dialectic and used it in his theology, not limiting himself, as has been averred, to the problem of universals. Most of his works were concerned with theology and Scripture. His Sic et non brought together contradictory texts on theology culled from patristic writings. It was not, as was held by some, an evidence of skepticism on the part of Abelard but a challenge to his pupils to reconcile conflicting opinions. The introduction is a pioneer treatment on the theory of semantics. His disciples, to whom he was Master Peter, were numerous, and many of their writings have been identified as belonging to the school of Abelard. Other writings of Abelard belong more strictly to the field of literature: metrical and rhythmical hymns, sermons, his autobiographical Historia calamitatum, and letters. His correspondence includes the exchange of letters with HÉLOÏSE, the authenticity of which on both sides seems now to be established.

The first great name in the school of the Canons Regular of St. Augustine at the Abbey of Saint-Victor in Paris was HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR (d. 1141). Attractive in character and versatile with his pen, he wrote theological treatises, commentaries on Scripture, a chronicle, and his widely circulated Didascalion, on education. He quoted Plato and Aristotle (as known through Latin translations), ancient Latin authors, grammarians, and poets, but most of all, St. Augustine. Medieval and modern writers have paid tribute to him, and his memory was flattered by the assignment to him of many works that are not actually his. Among other Victorine authors were ANDREW, who favored literal, historical interpretation of Scripture in his commentaries; RICHARD, distinguished for his mystical works; and Adam, whose Sequences mark the high point of that medieval genre.

The school of Chartres was a center of the cult of Platonic realism, but also, eventually, of the study of Aristotle. It was strongly devoted to humanism as against the rising tyranny of dialectic. BERNARD OF CHARTRES, a light of the school for 20 years or more after 1114, commanded great respect as a humanist, but his writings are not extant. His brother, THIERRY, strove to reconcile Platonic teachings and the Bible in his work on the six days of creation and left a valuable source for knowledge of the trivium and quadrivium in the 12th century in his Heptateuchon. BERNARD SILVESTRIS wrote in mixed verse and prose a work based on pagan authors concerning nature, De mundi universitate. CLARENBAUD (CLARENBALDUS) is considered to have written the best commentary on the De Trinitate of Boethius up to the time of St. Thomas Aguinas. WILLIAM OF CONCHES in his De philosophia mundi shows himself a Christian Platonist. The Moralium dogma philosophorum, best known of the writings attributed to him, is almost certainly the work of another author. It is a mélange of well-chosen texts from Scripture, the Fathers, and Roman philosophers. GILBERT DE LA PORÉE, professor and chancellor of Chartres, and from 1142 to 1154 bishop of Poitiers, had great scholarly influence, though he was not a prolific writer. Besides glosses on Scripture, he also composed a commentary on the De Trinitate of Boethius. His treatment of the Trinity and his use of dialectic in theology brought criticism from St. Bernard and others, though he escaped condemnation at the Council of Reims in 1148. His teachings were handed down in the collections of auctoritates of the Middle Ages, and he had followers identified as members of his school.

The Englishman JOHN OF SALISBURY began his studies at Chartres and ended his days (1180) as bishop there. In the meantime he had studied under many masters at Paris and had been secretary to Thomas Becket, whose biography he wrote. Though he never taught in the schools, he was one of the greatest humanists and authors of his century. His many letters are a rich source for history, as is his Historia pontificalis, though the last years of it (1153–62) are not extant. His best-known works present his political thought. The Entheticus is a long poem of philosophical and Christian counsel ending with a picture of the evils among churchmen and in the government of England. This latter part was developed in his Policraticus sive de nugis et vestigiis curialium, a brave attempt at a philosophy of government that fitted in well with the renaissance of canon and civil law of the century. His Metalogicon is a defense of logic in which he foretold the triumph of Aristotle in the schools. He was steeped in a knowledge of ancient authors, and his writings are permeated with classical quotations and allusions.

Akin to writers of Chartres because of his interest in nature though not of that school himself was another Englishman, ADELARD OF BATH, who appears to have lived until the middle of the 12th century. After travel, even into the Islamic East, he wrote and translated works on mathematics and astronomy. His Quaestiones naturales, in the form of a dialogue, tells of scientific matters he learned from the Arabs and of his own scientific observations. His De eodem et diverso states the case for philosophy and the liberal arts against the attractions of the world.

Monastic Authors. Away from the urban centers, monasteries continued to produce writers. The greatest personage of his age, St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (1090–1153), came from this milieu. Second founder and soul of the Cistercian movement, he brought about its phenomenal spread through western Christendom. His activities on behalf of the papacy, against heresy, and in the organizing of the Crusades add an important page to history. Mystic that he was, his writings all bear the mark of his contemplation. His sermons are an heirloom of the Christian world. They gave great impetus to the affective devotion that began to characterize piety in the Middle Ages. His letters, a record of his zeal, are a rich source for the history of the first half of the 12th century. He left 15 treatises, some of them dogmatic, some ascetical and mystical. The De consideratione was written as a guide to his protégé Pope Eugene III, and he wrote likewise on the duties of bishops and the reform of the clergy. His life of St. Malachy is a masterly piece of hagiography. Bernard's Latin style was unsurpassed in the Middle Ages, the prose of his sermons often attaining lyrical beauty. The Bible was the chief source of inspiration in his writing, and he drew much on the Fathers, whereas he almost never cited classical authors.

History was enriched by good biographies of St. Bernard, one of them, incomplete, by WILLIAM OF SAINT-THIERRY, his friend and adviser, well read in the classics and familiar with certain works of the Greek Fathers. He wrote brilliantly on faith, on monastic life, on contemplation, and on the dignity and nature of love as against Ovid's idea of love.

In England AELRED OF RIEVAULX (d. 1166) became a Cistercian and came to know Bernard. He was a gifted writer, reflecting the affective quality of his own spirituality in his Speculum caritatis, his De Jesu puero duodenni, and his De spirituali amicitia. The work on friendship was based on Cicero but sublimated. It was one of about a score of treatises on the subject written in the course of a century, along with about as many commentaries on the Song of Songs. Aelred wrote also history and saints' lives.

ISAAC OF STELLA, near Poitiers, was a Cistercian abbot who left exegetical works, a mystical explanation of the Canon of the Mass, and a De anima. Two other Cistercians, GUERRIC OF IGNY and ADAM OF PERSEIGNE, left collections of sermons composed in the manner of St. Bernard.

PETER THE VENERABLE (1090-1156), Abbot of Cluny, was second only to Bernard as a public figure in European ecclesiastical affairs. His collection of letters tells about the administering of the vast Cluniac congregation and gives interesting details concerning his relations with Bernard and Abelard. Some of the letters are theological in nature. His style is ordinarily very simple, but it rises to elegance on occasion. He had a translation of the Qur'an made in Spain at considerable expense. Subsequently he wrote his work against the religion of Islam. Earlier he wrote works against the Petrobrusian heretics and against the Jews. His severity in these works was not in keeping with the general suavity of his character. He cared for the broken Abelard, who ended his days at Cluny. Under him the monastery possessed a remarkably fine collection of 500 manuscripts, 100 of them texts of the classics.

PETER OF CELLE (d. 1187) was another Cluniac monk and abbot who took active part in the affairs of the time. His collection of more than 225 letters shows that he was in correspondence with many important people, lay and ecclesiastic. His sermons and ascetical treatises are marred by an excessive use of allegory. He deplored the rising influence of Aristotelianism in the schools. HUGH OF AMIENS (d. 1164), Abbot of Reading and (1130) Archbishop of Rouen, wrote against heresy and simony and on Scripture.

In Germany the enigmatic figure who concealed his identity under the name Honorius Augustodunensis (not of Autun) wrote his voluminous works in the first half of the 12th century. Perhaps an Irishman, he calls himself solitarius, scholasticus, presbyter. In his continuation of the De viris illustribus he lists 22 works of his own—non spernenda opuscula. He wrote on Scripture, theology, catechetics, homiletics, liturgy, history, moral and politico-religious problems of his day, and natural science. In philosophy he was a Christian Platonist, in theology mainly Augustinian, but he preferred the dialectical method to citing authorities.

Firmly opposed to the use of dialectic, overly fond of allegory, RUPERT, ABBOT OF DEUTZ (d. 1130), wrote much in the various fields of theology and many poems in classical meters. He revealed a wide knowledge of ancient authors, whom he cited even in his theological works. In indignation he made a special trip into France to argue with Anselm of Laon and WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX against the use of dialectic. One of the most detailed apologetic treatises of the 12th century against Judaism came from his pen.

The most prolific writer of the century was the Bavarian GERHOH OF REICHERSBERG (d. 1169), a Canon Regular of St. Augustine. He was a man of great vehemence, irreproachable in his own character, except for his exaggerated severity, who incessantly attacked the evils of his time. His writings, many of which are still unedited, deal with the relations of Church and State, reform in the Church, and current theological controversies. Abelard, Gilbert de la Porée, and the school of Paris were attacked by him. He approved of St. Bernard. Though he shows a knowledge of the classics in his writings, he generally preferred to cite Christian authors.

Two German nuns made their mark in literature in the second half of the 12th century. St. HILDEGARD OF BINGEN (1179), who had only a very elementary education, dictated works on medicine and theology, knowledge of which she acquired in visions, and many letters. Her tomb was the scene of numerous miracles. HERRAD OF LANDSBERG (d. 1195), as abbess, had her Hortus deliciarum prepared for the instruction of her nuns. It consisted of extracts from Christian writers, ancient and medieval, on various religious subjects along with elaborate illustrations in color demonstrating truths of religion. The pictures imposed the garb and usages of the 12th century on scenes from Scripture. The original manuscript perished in the destruction of the library of Strassburg in 1870. Just what share the abbess had in the compilation of the book cannot be determined.

There were a number of writers among the followers of St. Norbert in his flourishing order of Prémontré. PHILIP OF HARVENGT (d. 1183) wrote learnedly on dogmatic and ascetical subjects and on the Bible with an effort at elegance in his style. Adam Scotus, Abbot of Dryburgh (d. c. 1210), wrote sermons in highly rhetorical style, which he preached to his religious, and works of ascetical and mystical nature. HERMAN OF SCHEDA, a convert from Judaism, wrote (1137) a good Latin account of his conversion.

The Augustinian Canon HUGH, Abbot of Fouilloy (near Corbie), wrote on the seven abuses of the cloister and against marriage. Among the Carthusians, two abbots general, GUIGO I (d. 1137) and GUIGO II (d. 1188), composed beautiful meditations, and the latter left other works of piety.

The strange figure of JOACHIM OF FIORE, founder of an order in Italy (1192), presents problems. He had a great reputation for sanctity in his lifetime, but his writings contained heresy and unfounded revelations concerning the future of the Church. As he was dying, however, he charged his brethren to submit his writings to the judgment of the Holy See. Some of his misguided followers adopted and further perverted his errors, causing great harm in the Church.

Paris and Theology. In the meantime, interest in theology continued to develop in Paris. Aside from the Victorines, WALTER OF MORTAGNE, opponent of Abelard, held forth in Paris, Reims, and Laon and wrote well on questions of philosophy and theology. ROBERT OF MELUN, of English birth, was associated with Peter Lombard in opposition to the teachings of Gilbert de la Porée. He wrote exegetical works and theological sententiae. From Italy PETER LOMBARD, to be known in the future as Magister Sententiarum, came to Paris, becoming its bishop in 1159. He wrote scriptural commentaries, but his fame is connected with his Libri IV Sententiarum (Sentences). Based heavily on an earlier anonymous Summa Sententiarum, it is a systematic presentation of theology with prudent conclusions, but it is colorless and impersonal. These latter qualities masked its intrinsic greatness but ensured its future fame, because it was admirably suited to the needs of the many theologians who, next to the Bible, the sacra pagina, used it as their textbook and wrote commentaries on it. Among the commentators were Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventure. The doctrine of the Lombard did not escape attacks. They came from John of Cornwall, and more bitterly from WALTER OF SAINT-VICTOR, Gerhoh of Reichersberg, and the heretical Joachim of Fiore, but the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) gave solemn approval to Peter's teaching. In Paris, PETER OF POITIERS (d. 1205), professor and chancellor of the school of Notre Dame of Paris for 38 years, was the Lombard's faithful disciple and expositor. Other followers were PETER CANTOR, who sprinkled his smooth Latin with references to the classics, and Cardinal ROBERT OF COURÇON. Subsequent great names in philosophy and theology at Paris up to the 1230s were Nicholas of Amiens; ALAN OF LILLE, who wrote poetry and a De arte predicatoria, as well as theology; SIMON OF TOURNAI; STEPHEN LANGTON; PRAEPOSITINUS OF CREMONA; WILLIAM OF AUXERRE, who began the extensive use of the new Aristotle; and PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR (not PHILIP OF GRÈVE, whose writings are unknown), distinguished preacher and poet, as well as metaphysician and psychologist, author of the Summa de bono.

Canon Law. What Paris was for theology, Bologna was for Canon Law. The great canonist of the 12th century is the monk GRATIAN, who somewhat as Abelard did for theology in his Sic et non, brought together (1139–41) Church law into his Concordantia discordantium canonum. Known also as the Decretum Gratiani, it contained, in addition to previous legislation, a commentary by Gratian himself, which, like Peter Lombard's Sentences for theology, became the textbook for canonists and the object of their commentaries. Among the commentators were three future popes, Alexander III, Gregory VIII, and Innocent III, as well as many other important ecclesiastical figures. The pursuit of Church law became more popular than the study of theology and was more lucrative. St. Dominic noted this as he directed his followers to the study of theology.

Letters in Britain. There had been a lull in the production of Latin writings in Britain for the long period of the Danish invasions. King ALFRED had kept the torch of knowledge burning through his interest in Latin and his translations into Old English. His biography attributed to Asser appears to be a later forgery, but the example he gave was an inspiration to writers, mostly bishops and abbots, of the 10th and 11th centuries, who kept patristic learning alive with their translations into the vernacular. The Norman invasions brought a renaissance of Latin in England, as has been seen, with scholars coming from abroad and Englishmen participating in the intellectual movement on the Continent.

A number of other 12th-century writers in Britain deserve mention. Eadmer (d. 1128?), monk of Christchurch in Canterbury, secretary and later biographer of St. Anselm, wrote, among other works on the Blessed Virgin, the first treatise in Latin on her Immaculate Conception. His Historia novorum is a valuable history of his time. The Welsh ecclesiastic GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH (d. 1155?), in the guise of history, wrote down legends and stories of ancient Breton history, adding much of his own invention. His influence on English literature and that of all Europe has been enormous, whereas he did disservice to the cause of history. Gerald of Wales (GIRALDUS CAM-BRENSIS, or de Barri; c. 1147-1223), son of a Norman father and Welsh mother, educated in Paris, became one of the most prolific writers of his time. An ambitious ecclesiastic, a servitor of the English king, vain and egotistical but learned and of vast experience, he reveals himself as he writes on Wales and its clergy, on the English conquest of Ireland and of Irish topography, on the right of the See of St. Davids as against Canterbury, and in criticism of the Church, especially its wealth, of religious orders, and of the Roman Curia. Some school exercises of his in verse also have been preserved. Gerald's compatriot and friend WALTER MAP (1140–1210) was rather like him in character and manner of living. Walter's Nugae curialium, a title borrowed from John of Salisbury, brings his invective to bear on a multiplicity of things in varying style.

Peter of Blois (1135–c. 1204), well traveled, secretary to Henry II of England, archdeacon of Bath, chancellor of Abp. Richard of Canterbury, left sermons, many letters written with a classical touch, and a number of religious treatises. ALEXANDER NECKHAM (1154–1217) left a De nominibus utensilium, an encyclopedia listing things used in daily life; a De naturis rerum; and a De laudibus sapientiae divinae (a versification of De naturis), which reveal knowledge of ancient authors.

Historians. The 12th century produced some universal chronicles, such as those of FLORENCE OF WORCESTER, Hugh of Flavigny, ROBERT OF TORIGNY, ORDERICUS VITALIS (Historia ecclesiastica), Gui of Bazoches, and OTTO OF FREISING, the last the most original historian of his century. The chronicling of the Crusades continued, and each country produced its chronicles, some of which have been mentioned. England stood out by its number of historians, the greatest of whom was the learned WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY. In Spain the Historia Compostellana, produced by several authors under the auspices of Abp. Diego Gelmirez, was a significant piece of biography and local history.

Latin Translations from Arabic and Greek. Spain was the center of many translations of Arabic work—philosophical, scientific, and pseudo-scientific. It was an indirect way of tapping Greek learning. Other centers of translation, especially of Greek texts, were northern Italy and Sicily. As a result of the labors of the translators, scholars of the 13th century had access to Greek and Arabic philosophy and science. Of a literary nature, though by no means elegantly written, were two translations from Oriental sources—the Historia septem sapientum, a tale that probably originated in India and came into Latin through Hebrew, and the Disciplina clericalis, a collection of Oriental maxims and stories presented in Latin by the Jewish convert to Christianity Peter Alfonsi.

Poetry. Versifiers multiplied in the 12th century, and among them there were many good poets. Rhythmical verse now prevailed and reached perfection. The gifted poets who wrote at the turn of the century have already been treated. Among many who made verse on ancient themes, Walter of Châtillon won fame for his Alexandreis (1182), a long epic on Alexander the Great. The De bello Troiano of Joseph of Exeter shows him to have been a consummate rhetorician, an emulator of Lucan. Geoffrey of Monmouth wrote a pseudo-historical epic on Merlin. Better source material was found by poets in the history of their own times. Henry of Pisa wrote of the conquest of Majorca (1114-15) from the Saracens by his fellow townsmen. William of Apulia in 1111 composed an epic on the deeds of Robert Guiscard and his successors. An anonymous poet of Bergamo was one of several to write (1162-66) of the deeds of Frederick Barbarossa. Godfrey of Viterbo and Peter of Eboli, both admirers of Emperor Henry VI, found their themes in imperial history. The CRUSADES stirred the imagination of many poets. Fulco and Gilo, both Frenchmen, wrote on the First Crusade. It is unfortunate that the epic of Joseph of Exeter on the crusading exploits of Richard I, the Lion-Hearted, is not extant except for fragments. Among the epics of the Crusades perhaps the best is that of the Florentine monk, bishop in the Latin East, who recounted the history of the Third Crusade in his De recuperatione Ptolemaide. Most of these epics were written in hexameters, but the bishop presented his in the accentual 13-syllable goliardic verse in rhyming stanzas. It is distinguished in both form and content. German poets wrote the lives of bishops and several epics on Frederick Barbarossa. The anonymous authors of the imperial accounts reveal their patriotism and no mean knowledge of classical poets.

Much satirical verse was composed attacking simony, the cupidity of chanceries and the Roman Curia, the morals of prelates and monks, and the evils of the time in general. Among the authors were Serlo of Bayeux, John of Salisbury, Nigel Wireker, Nivard of Ghent, PETER THE PAINTER of Saint-Omer, Henry of Settimello, and Philip the Chancellor. The Architrenius (Archmourner) of John of Hauteville (Auville) mixes allegory with sympathetic descriptions of the indigent students of Paris and satire on the gluttony of the rich, the ambition of courtiers, and the vices of clergy and people. Best known of such verse is the pious De contemptu mundi of BERNARD OF CLUNY, or Morlas. Composed in accentual dactylic hexameters with rhyme, it contains the lines from which Jerusalem the Golden was translated.

Comedy, which really amounted to versified tales with incidental dialogue, forerunners of the vernacular fabliaux, was composed in the 12th century in France and England. The Amphitryo, or Geta, was taken from Plautus by its author, Vitalis of Blois, who claimed the same source for his Aulularia, whereas it merely reproduced a work of the 4th century A.D. Other similar pieces were produced in France. English comedy was obviously modeled after the French.

Religious drama continued to develop out of the liturgy. In the 12th century it remained for the most part conservative and pious. But already there appeared the tendency to secularize it. Condemnations came from various sources, especially Pope Innocent III, which seem to have been directed at the FEAST OF FOOLS. The vernacular was beginning to displace Latin in the plays. The developing city life and the guilds were to take them over. In the 12th century the name of Hilary, a follower of Abelard, is connected with the authorship of plays on St. Nicholas, the raising of Lazarus, and the Prophets. Anonymous plays are contained in the collection Carmina burana of Benediktbeuern and in collections of Fleury and Klosterneuburg.

The broad term didactic may be used to characterize much of 12th-century verse. Proverbs, epigrams, and ancient fables were put into Latin verse, as were Biblical narratives and saints' lives. Much of the verse of Matthew of Vendôme was for the schools, e.g., his Synonyma, Equivoca, Ars versificatoria, and his art of writing versified letters, besides several poems that point a moral. Geoffrey of Vinsauf composed (c. 1210) his handbook on hexameter verse, Poetria nova, which amounts to a technical manual on the art of poetry. Eberhard of Bethune (d. c. 1212) was the author in part of a work in verse called Graecismus. He treated of Latin grammar, and sections on rhetorical ornaments were added by his pupils. The most important versified grammar of the Middle Ages was the Doctrinale (1199) of Alexander of Villa Dei. It was part of a vast encyclopedia that he was compiling. Another section of his research for the encyclopedia appeared as his versified Ecclesiale. It dealt with the ecclesiastical calendar and Canon Law. Alexander Neckham put much of his encyclopedia of popular science, De naturis rerum, into a composition in elegiac verse: De laudibus divinae sapientiae. The pedagogue John of Garland, who lived until c. 1258, wrote in prose and verse on grammar and rhetoric and some religious topics.

Some of the 12th-century philosophers used verse as a vehicle for their teaching. Bernard Silvestris of Tours and Chartres presented his allegorical treatment of cosmology, De mundi universitate, in mixed prose and verse. It is Neoplatonic rather than Christian in tone. GODFREY OF SAINT-VICTOR (d. c. 1194) composed his Fons philosophiae in goliardic verse. It treats of the liberal arts, ancient and contemporary philosophy, and theology. The De mundi philosophia of a certain Milo, perhaps Milo Crispinus of Bec, consists of two books of verse on cosmology, especially astronomy. Alan of Lille was the author of a long allegorical poem, entirely in hexameters, on the creation of the soul by God. It moves from philosophy to theology, has beautiful lines on the Blessed Virgin, and ascends with Faith to the court of the Trinity. Another work of his, the De planctu naturae, is a mixture of prose and verse in several different meters. It amounts to a deification of Nature, who is made to deplore unnatural vice. A few shorter poems of Alan show his skill in accentual verse.

Theology and ecclesiastical subjects were often treated in verse. Sometime after 1083 FULCOIUS OF BEAU-VAIS composed versified letters, epigrams, epitaphs, saints' lives, and his long De nuptiis Christi et Ecclesiae. Some of his verse has only recently been edited. Richer of Metz wrote (c. 1135) a life of St. Martin of Tours in iambic and trochaic dimeters. The contents were based closely upon Sulpicius Severus. Between 1150 and 1160 Metellus, a monk of Tegernsee, composed a large number of odes in the manner of Horace on the life and miracles of St. Quirinus.

A monk of the monastery of St. Augustine in Canterbury, but a native of France, REGINALD, who was still alive in 1109, composed an epic of some 4,000 verses on St. Malchus, as well as verses on the saints buried or venerated in his monastery. He addressed three poems to St. Anselm during the saint's second exile. LAWRENCE, monk of Durham (d. 1154), versified narratives from Scripture along with hagiographical stories in his Hypognosticon. He wrote poems on the history of his monastery, not forgetting to include spiritual lessons. PETER RIGA, canon of Reims (d. c. 1209), composed his very long Aurora, mostly in distichs, on persons and things of the Old Testament. He collected his verse and added new poems, including some saints' lives, in his Floridus aspectus.

Lyric Poetry. The best known and most popularly appreciated genre among the 12th-century writings, and the part that deserves especially to be called literature in the strict sense, is the lyric verse. It is abundant and varied in theme and form. Some of it is secular, and some religious. Both meter and rhythm are employed in its composition. Both types of verse made increasing use of rhyme. The fact is worthy of note that in this century, just as skill in the use of many of the classical meters reached a high degree of proficiency, quantitative meter, depending on long and short syllables, should have yielded in popularity to rhythm, verse construction based on word accent. Accentual verse was not new in the 12th century, but it was then that it reached perfection and popularity.

It appears that accentual verse for the most part modeled itself on quantitative verse by substituting an accented syllable for the quantitative ictus and an unaccented syllable for one not having an ictus. This is most readily seen in iambic and trochaic verse. Sometimes accentual verse merely imitated the number of syllables of a metrical line or stanza, e.g., the sapphic strophe. The most interesting development in rhythmical poetry was the 13syllable goliardic verse or line of the so-called wandering scholars. There existed no quantitative model for it in classical literature, but the form is found in the refrain of a hymn by Marius Victorinus (c. 350), in Mozarabic prayers, and in Middle High German. This verse has been described in various ways. Trochaic in nature, it divides into seven and six syllables with the accent on the antepenult (proparoxytone) at the end of the first part and on the penult (paroxytone) at the end of the second part. German scholars prefer to consider the first seven syllables as ascending to an accent (secondary) on the last, and the second six as falling, with the final syllable unaccented. English readers readily understand if the first part of the verse is considered to be seven-syllable trochaic dimeter catalectic, and the second, six-syllable trochaic. At times three goliardic rhyming lines were put together to form a strophe along with a fourth line in hexameter or pentameter taken from a classical or medieval author. The fourth line might rhyme with the others or not. The strophe has been called the goliardic strophe cum auctoritate. The goliardic line was used both for profane writings, serious as well as frivolous, and for religious subjects.

The Profane Lyric. In the 12th century, three authors stand out for their skill and productivity in the field of the secular lyric: Hugh of Orléans, known as Primas; the anonymous Archpoet; and WALTER OF CHÂTILLON. They all wrote satirical pieces as well as lyrics. Walter, the most versatile of the three, made contributions in the field of religious poetry in addition to his secular verse. Hugh Primas was truly a wandering scholar in France; he was small in stature, dissolute, cynical, malicious, and far from handsome. He wrote (mostly occasional verse on his woes and animosities) in both metrical and accentual verse and was a master of rhyme. He was admired by his contemporaries for his skill. Fifty poems have been identified as coming from him. The German Archpoet was of a gentler character, grateful to German bishops for patronage, though bitter toward those who refused it. He wrote accentual verse by preference. His best known piece is his Confessio, in goliardic verse, an unabashed avowal of his life as a roué, for which he declares his penitence.

Walter of Châtillon also wrote both metrical and accentual verse. His epic, the Alexandreis, has been mentioned above. He was a master of satire, for which he used the goliardic strophe cum auctoritate very adroitly, as well as the trochaic Sequence-measure. He wrote lyrically of spring and love, and his frank eroticism contrasts with poems of his that are devoutly religious. A number of poems, mostly in goliardic verse, have been identified as the product of the "school of Walter of Châtillon." Serlo of Wilton, an English contemporary of Primas, the Archpoet, and Walter, wrote metrical verse of erotic character in his early life but underwent a conversion and as a Cistercian wrote religious poetry. Chancellor Philip of Paris (d. 1236) showed great skill in composing accentual verse, some of it religious, but the greater part of it satirical.

Collections of lyrical verse became common in the 13th century, and a number of manuscripts of these have been preserved. The most important such manuscript was found at the Abbey of BENEDIKTBEUERN and is now in Munich. The collection was given the name Carmina Burana by its first editor. Its content is chiefly profane: themes of wine, women, and song, parodies on Biblical subjects and the liturgy, satire on the clergy and especially on the Papal Curia. Other collections of poems of lesser scope than that of Benediktbeuern are contained in an Arundel manuscript of the British Museum; a Vaticanus Latinus manuscript; a manuscript that belonged to the monastery of Ripoll; and one belonging to the University of Basel. The form of this verse in many cases is highly refined as regards the use of meter, rhythm, and rhyme. The influence of the classics is strong. Some of the verse is by authors who can be identified, but most of it is anonymous. Obviously it was the product of the schools and of ecclesiastics; it was circulated and appreciated in all lands of the West because the scholarly and ecclesiastical groups were international and their language was Latin. English readers have access to many specimens of secular Latin lyric verse with penetrating comment in the two volumes of F. J. E. Raby, and to translations along with the Latin in the works of Helen Waddell.

Poetical Debates. With the secular lyric may be mentioned the poetical debates, of which there were many. They reached back to classical rhetoric, but the medieval themes were frequently of a popular nature. Thus, winter and summer were made to debate, as were wine and water, wine and beer. A contest between the violet and the rose was written in goliardic verse. The debate about love supposed to be carried on at a council of the nuns of Remiremont appears to be the product of the mordant humor of a cleric. A similar debate in a different setting is attributed to Henry of Avranches, author of many poems. The treatise De amore of Andreas Capellanus, the most ambitious work on courtly love, seems to be a piece of lumbering humor and not a true picture of a medieval aberration in morals.

The Religious Lyric. As was the case with the profane, the religious lyric reached perfection of form in rhythmical verse during the 12th century. But, whereas the secular poetry depended for its success on its form, its naughtiness, its sharp satire, and biting humor, the religious, in equally impeccable form, conveyed solid spiritual and theological thought. Most of the religious authors remained anonymous. The volumes of the Analecta hymnica and the incipit's of hymns listed by Chevalier bear testimony to their industry.

Hymns, Sequences, tropes, and rhythmical Offices formed the main body of this literature. In the early part of the century Hildebert of Lavardin surpassed his contemporaries in the quality of his religious verse. His long poem in accentual iambics, Lamentatio peccatricis animae, is a forerunner of the Dies irae. His Alpha et Omega is sublime praise of the Trinity. Abelard somewhat later composed a collection of hymns for use in the liturgical year. Prepared at the request of Héloïse for her nuns, it suffers because it was produced at one time and not gradually, as inspiration came. ADAM OF SAINT-VICTOR, with about 45 Sequences attributed to him, was the outstanding master of that genre in his century. His preferred verse form was the regular Sequence strophe: two to four accentual trochaic lines of eight syllables followed by a trochaic line of seven syllables, together with the use of a two-syllable rhyme and a regular caesura occurring at the end of a word. The restraint imposed by the requirements of the liturgy prevented Adam from injecting personal emotion into his Sequences. The highest level of inspired verse in the century was reached in the JESU, DUL-CIS MEMORIA, a hymn of affective devotion that came out of the milieu of St. Bernard's followers. It is filled with the spirit of Bernard's devotion, but it is not of his own composition. Hymn writing was to continue, and some of the greatest masterpieces among hymns and Sequences were produced in the next century.

The liturgical form known as the rhythmical Office began to develop as early as the 9th century. The genre was in vogue for six centuries thereafter. These Offices consist of the canonical hours of the Divine Office, with the exception of the Psalms and Lessons, put into meter, rhythm, or rhyming prose. About 600 such Offices are known, mostly in honor of patronal saints. The century of their greatest development was the 13th, and the most renowned among their authors was JULIAN OF SPEYER, a German Franciscan who became a choirmaster in Paris. In use in all the countries of Europe, these Offices brought large numbers of ecclesiastics into contact with verse.

Ars Dictaminis. The 12th and 13th centuries suffered from a discipline imposed upon them as regards the art of composition. Manuals called artes dictandi were put together in great numbers. The verb dictare and its derivatives had been used since antiquity to designate the composing of a piece of writing. There was need for rules of literary composition, but the treatises of the ars dictaminis became conventionalized and served to put literary writing into a straitjacket. The predecessors of these treatises in early medieval times were the collections of formulae intended to aid in the preparation of documents and letters. Beginning with the end of the 11th century, the production of the artes dictandi continued through the next two centuries. Their purpose was largely to serve the need of chanceries in composing documents correctly and elegantly. The first such treatises were connected with Italy and the name of Alberic of Monte Cassino (d. 1108), though the extent of his work is not definitely established. Subsequently many others were composed in Italy, France, Germany, and England. They began to encompass all literary composition. Instead of adhering to good classical traditions they were inclined to insist too much on cadenced prose, the use of cursus, and tasteless rhetorical ornament. Under the influence of Cicero's De inventione and the Rhetorica ad Herennium, they imposed the rules of oratory on the writing of letters, so that spontaneity was sacrificed. Sermons were adversely affected because of the same techniques. A particularly illconceived trend was the attempt to moralize Ovid through allegorical interpretation. This movement, which came out of Orléans, was wisely repudiated by most contemporaries.

After the artes dictandi, Latin arts of poetry emerged in the course of the 12th century. Important names in their composition were Matthew of Vendôme, Geoffrey of Vinsauf, Gervaise of Merkley, Evrardus the German, Alexander of Villedieu, and John of Garland. The arts poétiques have been admirably studied by E. Faral. The treatises are inclined to devote themselves to the beginning and conclusion of poetical writings and to give scant attention to the rest. They lose themselves in detail and are too much concerned with mechanical points. Thus they treat of amplificatio in an uninspiring way, not as a means of presenting ideas more vividly, but simply as a means of lengthening, and abbreviatio is for them only a means of shortening. Figures of speech are treated extensively but chiefly under the influence of the Rhetorica ad Herennium. These artes are helpful to modern scholars inasmuch as they give an idea of the literary taste of their age.

From the 13th Century to the End of the Middle Ages

The surveys of Latin literature published down to 1965 do not extend into the later Middle Ages, and for that period one must pursue the study of it in monographs, encyclopedias, periodicals, and specialized works on philosophy, theology, and the history of science. By the 13th century, philosophy and theology had taken over the dominant position in the scholarly world, and interest in literary works in Latin declined. Vernacular literature was developing rapidly, appealing as it did to a wide public, whereas Latin writings, limited as they were to scholarly circles, became more and more bookish. Works in philosophy and theology became abundant and reached a great perfection in the technical use of Latin and effectiveness of presentation.

Religious Poetry. Some of the theological writers made contributions to religious poetry. In fact the best, or at least the most loved, hymns and Sequences came in this period. The Golden Sequence, the VENI SANCTE SPIRI-TUS ET EMITTE COELITUS, attributed to STEPHEN LANGTON (d. 1223) rather than to Pope Innocent III, probably came out of the late 12th century in the days when Langton was a student or master in Paris, though it could have been composed at Pontigny during the years he waited there to take over his See of Canterbury. It is used as the Sequence of Pentecost Sunday. St. THOMAS AQUINAS wrote the Sequence and hymns for the Feast of Corpus Christi. The Sequence LAUDA SION SALVATOREM presents the theology of the Eucharist with the utmost precision in perfect Sequence rhythm and rhyme, with the controlled lyrical emotion that befits the liturgy and Aquinas's own intellectual approach to the mysteries of faith. The Tantum ergo is part of his PANGE LINGUA GLORIOSI CORPORIS MYSTERIUM. Though the affective hymn ADORO TE DEVOTE is commonly attributed to him, there are reasons for considering it the work of another author. A. Wilmart, through a study of the manuscripts, has restored the text of this beautiful hymn to its original form.

Franciscan piety produced much verse charged with religious emotion. St. BONAVENTURE wrote verses on the Passion of Christ. JOHN PECKHAM, an English Franciscan who became archbishop of Canterbury, is the author of Philomena (Nightingale), one of the most appealing spiritual poems of the Middle Ages. Its theme is the Passion, and its form the rhythmical goliardic four-line strophe. Peckham wrote verses on the Blessed Virgin, as did the English canon JOHN OF HOVEDEN, his contemporary. The latter wrote also much verse on the Passion. His Philomena is filled with pathos, but it is less attractive than that of Peckham. About the middle of the 13th century a Cistercian abbot, Arnulf of Louvain, wrote a rhythmical poem, De Passione Domini, full of effective devotion, in honor of the wounds of Christ. The famous Sequence commemorating Mary's sorrow at the foot of the Cross, STABAT MATER, is attributed to the Italian Franciscan JACO-PONE DA TODI (d. 1306). He wrote many laude in Italian for popular devotion, including the Donna del Paradiso, which is more replete with emotion than the Stabat

Mater, but is of the same inspiration. Both in the vernaculars and in Latin, poems in imitation of the hours of the Divine Office were made to depict scenes of the Passion. St. CATHERINE OF BOLOGNA (d. 1463) composed a poem of 5,610 verses, all ending in -is, on the mysteries of the life of Christ and of Mary. The autobiography of her interior struggles composed by her in Italian was translated into Latin.

From the hands of the Franciscan biographer THOMAS OF CELANO (d. c. 1260) appears to have come the DIES IRAE, which eventually was introduced as the Sequence in Masses for the dead, though it was rather a sermon for the living. Both in form and content its inspiration goes back to Carolingian times and to the 12th century. Its theme, the Last Judgment, was frequently depicted on the tympanums of medieval cathedral portals. It is written in accentual trochaic dimeters in rhyming stropes of three lines. Magnificent musical accompaniments have been composed for it. A companion piece by an anonymous author is the Mater Misericordiae, a plea for Mary's help on Judgment Day.

Devotional Works in Prose. In connection with devotional poetry, prose works of similar inspiration should be considered. There were many of these on the life and suffering of Christ. St. BONAVENTURE presents material for meditation on phases of Christ's life in his Lignum vitae. DAVID OF AUGSBURG (d. 1272), a Franciscan, looked to Christ as the model of spiritual life in his writings. In his De contemplatione the Carthusian GUIGO DE PONTE (d. 1297) presented a method of meditating on the life of Christ. The Speculum humanae salvationis, written no earlier than 1309, an anonymous work in 42 chapters of 100 lines each in rhyming prose, consists of meditations on Christ's life. Of very great influence in stimulating affective devotion to Christ and His Passion were the Meditationes in vita Christi. They were written before 1330 and have been incorrectly attributed to St. Bonaventure.

Dominican authors as well as Franciscan wrote on the life of Christ. Some of them, such as Hugh of Strassburg (d. 1268), are speculative; but the Horologium sapientiae of Bl. Henry Suso (d. 1366), a dialogue between himself and the Incarnate Word, is affective and lyrical, if not emotional. Simone Fidati (d. 1348), an Italian belonging to the Hermits of St. Augustine, used the Gospels to draw lessons, topically and not chronologically arranged, from the life of Christ. He repudiated scholastic argumentation and the parading of citations from pagan authors.

Most of these works on Christ were used by LUDOLPH OF SAXONY (d. 1377), a Carthusian, as he skillfully compiled and composed his elaborate Vita Christi, the most detailed chronological account of Christ's life attempted up to that time. Its affective spirituality had great appeal, and the influence of Ludolph on later authors is marked. Adolph of Essen (d. 1439) reflects the Vita Christi in his Meditations on the Life of Christ and His Mother; as did HENRY OF HERP (d. 1477), in his Theologia mystica; Jerome of Mondsee, in his De profectu religiosorum (c. 1458); and John Monbaer (d. 1501), in his Rosetum spirituale. Beyond the medieval period, Ludolph was used by St. Ignatius of Loyola, Francis of Osuna, St. Teresa of Avila, St. Francis de Sales, and Suitbert Moeden (d. 1705).

Devotio Moderna and the German Mystics. The second half of the 14th century witnessed the rise of the DEVOTIO MODERNA. It was fruitful in writings from the time of its founder, Gerard GROOTE (d. 1384). The great masterpiece of the movement was the De imitatione Christi, which apparently took final form at the hands of THOMAS À KEMPIS, author of many spiritual treatises.

Out of Majorca came the zealous missionary and prolific author (more than 300 works) Raymond LULL (d. c. 1316). His chief mystical works are in Catalan. A number of his writings exist in both the vernacular and in Latin. His Liber natalis pueri parvuli Jesu Christi was presented to King Philip the Fair. In the form of a vision, it presents six maidens personifying virtues who praise the Divine Child and then ask Philip to further Lull's program for converting the Muslims and Jews to Christianity. Lull's Ars generalis presented a method for the work of conversion. His purely literary works are in Catalan.

A group of German mystics of the Dominican Order flourished in the 14th century. Meister ECKHART (d. c. 1327), founder of this movement, preached in German and left writings in both German and Latin. Impetuous and imprudent in his expression, he revealed a tinge of pantheism in his writings, which after his death brought about a condemnation of errors attributed to him. Recent years have seen a resurgence of interest in his writings. Johannes TAULER (d. 1361), to whom several sermons and works are attributed, continued to voice the teachings of mysticism in more orthodox language. HENRY SUSO, with affective writings in both Latin and German, was of this group. In the next century Johann NIDER, OP (d. 1438), wrote practical works on moral theology, on how to live a good life and prepare for death, and on aspects of the religious life. His Formicarius uses ants as an example of how to live virtuously.

Spiritual Writers in France and Italy. In France Peter d'Ailly (d. 1420) and John GERSON (d. 1429), outstanding figures in the scholarly world and in the conciliar movement, which they embraced in their efforts to settle the WESTERN SCHISM, both wrote extensively on theology—175 works are attributed to D'Ailly, and 400 to Gerson—especially mysticism. The most profound philosopher and theologian of his age, Cardinal NICHOLAS OF CUSA in the Diocese of Trier (d. 1464), who was active in the effort to bring about the reconciliation of the Greek Church with the Holy See, is especially celebrated for his teaching and his treatise De docta ignorantia.

In Italy, Bl. John DOMINICI (d. 1419) wrote works of spiritual guidance in Italian, and scriptural commentaries in Latin, as well as his apology for a Christian renaissance in Lucula noctis. He formed in the Dominican way of life the future archbishop of Florence, St. ANTONINUS (d. 1459), who, besides guiding religious life in the flourishing city of Florence, wrote his famous Summa moralis and his chronicle, the latter also with the purpose of teaching men how to live and hope and attain salvation. St. VINCENT FERRER, OP (d. 1419), native of Valencia, one of the greatest of medieval preachers, composed a De vita spirituali that was widely used as a manual. Four of his Latin sermons are the basis of his meditations on the life of Christ that were put into Spanish. His younger contemporary St. BERNARDINE OF SIENA (d. 1444), a Franciscan, emulated him in his vernacular sermons but was less effective in his Latin writings. Cardinal Juan de TORQUE-MADA, OP (d. 1468), renowned for his Summa de Ecclesia, wrote meditations on the life of Christ in Latin and a defense of the visions of St. Bridget of Sweden. The fiery preacher SAVONAROLA (d. 1498) has about 90 works in Latin and Italian attributed to him—on the spiritual life, the love of Christ, and the Passion.

Historians. History continued to be written in Latin, but before the end of the Middle Ages the vernacular had taken over to a great extent. MATTHEW PARIS (D. 1279), Benedictine of St. Albans, is considered to be the greatest medieval historian of England, though numerous other Latin chronicles were written there. In France, Saint-Denis became the center of historiography for the kingdom. Beginning with Abbot SUGER on the reigns of Louis VI and VII, continuing with Rigord on Philip II, with the anonymous Gesta of Louis VIII and those of Louis IX and Philip III by William de Nangis, the chronicle reached almost to the 14th century in Latin. Then a French translation of chronicles was made that reached back to sources from the very beginning of Francia, and the Grandes chroniques de France continued to record French history in the vernacular. Latin was not, however, completely abandoned by French historians. Late in the 15th century it was used by Thomas Basin, Bishop of Lisieux, exiled by Louis XI, in his history of that king and his predecessor, Charles VII.

From a literary viewpoint the most interesting of medieval chronicles is that of the Franciscan SALIMBENE (1221–c. 1289). His work, extending from 1167 to 1287, presents a history of the Franciscans and his own personal memoirs rather than universal history. It is full of digressions and anecdotes, with accounts of his wide travels and the many important personages he met. The Italian vernacular is visible in his style, beneath his Latin. Many other chronicles were written in Italy in the late Middle Ages.

Akin to history, and more or less serving its purpose, is historical and political verse. William the Breton was the author of a hexameter poem in 12 books, completed in 1224, on Philip Augustus of France. An unknown author, perhaps a Franciscan, wrote the Song of Lewes, a Latin poem written after the battle (1264). It shows considerable political wisdom on the author's part. A poem under the name of JOHN OF BRIDLINGTON deals with the history of Edward III of England. John GOWER (d. 1408) wrote Latin verse on Henry IV, and against Richard II and the Lollards. His Vox clamantis dealing with the causes of the peasant uprising in 1381 describes the conditions of society and decries the evils existing among all its classes. In Germany, Jordan of Paderborn wrote in hexameter verse an allegorical satire, Pavo de natura saeculi (1291), in which he defended the rights of the emperor and the pope. The various participants are pictured as birds and animals. Bishop Leopold of Bamberg (d. 1363) lamented in verse the passing of German power in Italy. In France a Latin poem in two books tells of the taking of Orléans by Joan of Arc.

In hagiography the period produced the Legenda aurea, stories of the saints arranged according to the sanctoral cycle of the liturgical year. The author, JAMES OF VORAGINE, OP, archbishop of Genoa (d. 1298), wrote for the edification of the people. CAESARIUS OF HEISTER-BACH (d. 1245), a Cistercian, likewise wrote his Dialogus miraculorum, in 12 books, to edify. His life of St. Engelbert, Archbishop of Cologne (d. 1225), is one of the best hagiographical accounts by a medieval author. The numerous collections of exempla for the use of preachers, which often turn to hagiography for their material, are well represented by that of Cardinal JACQUES DE VITRY (d. 1240), Canon Regular of St. Augustine. His letters sent from the scene of the Fifth Crusade constitute a valuable historical source. Several biographies of saints came from the pen of the Belgian Dominican THOMAS OF CAN-TIMPRÉ, who died between 1263 and 1272. He made a study of bees, from which he drew lessons for Christian living, and composed an encyclopedia of natural science, Opus de natura rerum.

Epistolography. The art of writing letters in the later Middle Ages came under the influence of the artes dictaminis, and naturalness was sacrificed to mechanical phraseology. By the early 13th century chanceries had begun to preserve in registers copies of their letters and documents. Pope Innocent III, strong personality that he was, avoided the rigidity of dictamen in his own writings. Archbishop John Peckham of Canterbury composed his many letters according to its rules without seriously bad effect. The learned Franciscan scholar and gifted administrator ROBERT GROSSETESTE (d. 1253), Bishop of Lincoln, wrote his letters in good classical style.

Politico-Canonical Writings. Writings on government and Church-State relations became numerous in the period. The oldest of legal classics of England, the Tractatus de legibus et consuetudinibus regni Angliae, was composed by Rannulf de Glanville (d. 1190) or, perhaps, by his nephew, Bp. HUBERT WALTER. The greatest medieval work on law written in England was Henry de BRACTON'S (d. 1268) De legibus et consuetudinibus Angliae libri quinque. In France and Germany law books were being written in the vernacular. Even in the 15th century, Sir John Fortescue wrote in Latin on natural law and in praise of English law, though his greatest work is his Governance of England.

The additions to Canon Law were from time to time published in collections. Pope Gregory IX delegated to St. RAYMOND OF PEÑAFORT, OP, the task of putting together the laws enacted since the Decretum Gratiani had been completed. Promulgated as the Decretals of Gregory IX (1234), this collection gave rise to many commentaries. Pope BONIFACE VIII added a book of Decretals (1298), and Pope JOHN XXII published (1317) a collection made by Clement V.

The great authority of Innocent III in Christendom, his appeal to the indirect power of the papacy to justify his interference in matters of civil government, and his direct feudal suzerainty over vassal states (Aragon, Portugal, Sicily, and England) helped greatly to shape the theory of the numerous writers who championed the right of the papacy to the "two swords," the spiritual and the material. As St. Bernard had taught long before, the sovereign pontiff was to use the former and hand the latter over to secular rulers to be used for the Church. Pope Innocent IV had formulated the theory more emphatically in his struggle with Emperor Frederick II, who claimed sovereignty over both Church and State and expressed his claims in the writings of his legist, Peter of Vinea. The distinguished canonists HOSTIENSIS and William DURANTI THE ELDER in the late 13th century wrote to advance proof for the temporal authority of the papacy. St. Thomas Aquinas was much more conservative than these canonists in his opinion of papal secular power. He adhered to the theory of Pope GELASIUS I and at most conceded an indirect power over secular government ratione peccati. Ptolemy of Lucca, who continued the De regimine principium of Thomas, agreed with Hostiensis and Duranti. On the other hand, a number of canonists of the same period held rather closely to the teaching of St. Gelasius.

Writings on Church-State Controversies and the Conciliar Movement. In the controversy between BONI-FACE VIII and PHILIP IV, the letters of Boniface are among the best known pieces of medieval writing. They claim nothing that had not been claimed before by the papacy, but after each letter Boniface had been obliged to retract his demands. The anonymous Disputatio inter clerum et militem emanating from Philip's camp repudiated all claims of the papacy to authority in secular affairs. Pamphleteers came to the defense of papal authority in temporal matters: Henry of Cremona, GILES OF ROME, JAMES OF VITERBO, and AUGUSTINE TRIUMPHUS. The last three were Augustinians. Somewhat later the Spanish Franciscan ALVARO PELAYO (d. 1349) wrote in the same vein.

On the side of the king the anticlerical Pierre Dubois, one of Philip's legists, is thought to have been the author of a Deliberatio, which accused Boniface of heresy and maintained that if the popes had ever possessed temporal authority over the kingdom of France they had lost it through prescription. Besides other polemical works of this nature, Dubois wrote an abbreviatio on how France could conquer Europe; tracts against the Templars; a De pace et bello; and a De recuperatione terrae sanctae, which dealt little with the Crusade but put together his ideas of reform. Also in the camp of the king, though more moderate, was the capable Dominican writer John of Paris (Quidort, who denied that the pope held the supreme temporal power and anticipated the conciliar theory by affirming that a council is greater than the pope. Outside of this controversy DANTE wrote his De monarchia to show the need of a universal monarchy and to defend the empire under Henry VI, which Dante looked upon as ideal, against encroachment by the Church. Dante also wrote his De vulgari eloquentia in Latin.

In the 14th century the controversy between Pope John XXII and Emperor Louis of Bavaria concerning the latter's election without papal approval gave rise to further antipapal writing. The nominalist philosopher WIL-LIAM OF OCKHAM (d. 1349), an English Franciscan, wrote to support the independence of the State in relation to the Church. He rejected papal absolutism even in spiritual matters and advocated the general council as a check upon papal authority. In the same feud against the Avignon papacy MARSILIUS OF PADUA (d. 1342), professor at Paris, wrote his Defensor pacis, which began with the accepted medieval idea that monarchical authority is delegated by the people, but in its second part places the Church under the control of the State. He denied the divine institution of the papacy and insisted that even the decisions of a general council needed to be ratified by the civil legislator. JOHN OF JANDUN (d. 1328) of the faculty of arts in the University of Paris, an Averroist, held views similar to those of Marsilius and collaborated with him.

The movement for a general council as a solution for the Western Schism occasioned much writing. Gerson and D'Ailly have been mentioned as favoring the movement, which they supported with their pens. Ockham, Marsilius and John of Paris had previously insisted on the holding of councils as a means of controlling the papacy. A number of canonists pleaded for a council to cope with the exceptional problems arising from the Schism. This was the attitude of CONRAD OF GELNHAUSEN and Henry Heinbuche of Langenstein in the early days of the Schism. Later on, the leading canonist of his generation, Francisco ZABARELLA, in his zeal for the conciliar theory, declared that the pope was only the first servant of the Church. From Spain came two staunch opponents of the conciliar movement who, after the Schism was ended, wrote vigorously in behalf of the papacy and against any further holding of councils at the time: Juan de Torquemada and Rodrigo Sánchez de Arávalo (d. 1470).

Scientific and Encyclopedic Writing. There were no few writers on natural science in the later Middle Ages, as the studies of Lynn Thorndike and George Sarton attest. It must suffice here to mention the Franciscan ROGER BACON and the Dominican ALBERT THE GREAT.

The best-known encyclopedist and compiler of the age was the Dominican VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS (d. 1264?). He wrote a treatise on the education of the young men of noble families (De eruditione filiorum regalium). His Speculum maius is a large work in three parts: doctrinale, historiale, and naturale. A Speculum morale that had been attributed to him is the work of another author. The Speculum doctrinale treats not only of theology but of all fields of learning. The Speculum historiale consists of passages taken from earlier historical accounts pieced together in chronological order down to c. 1264. The Speculum naturale takes excerpts concerning nature from previous authors, to secure which he had access to a good library. He himself made little contribution to scientific knowledge. There is a notable tendency on his part to make religious application of the lore he presents.

The demarcation between writers of the Middle Ages and of the Renaissance is necessarily vague. Some of the authors treated in this article lived after the Renaissance could be considered to have started, and they have been included here because they seem to be medieval in spirit.

MEDINA

A city (Arabic al-Madīna), originally named Yathrib, in the east-central Hejaz, some 210 miles north of MECCA; the residence of MUHAMMAD and his followers after the Hegira. The area around the city is extremely fertile and well watered and is known for its orchards of date palms, oranges, lemons, figs, etc. The original settlement was an unwalled agricultural community. Well before Islam, although at an uncertain date, the town came to be settled by three Jewish tribes, the Qaynūqā', Qurayza, and Nadīr, who possessed the city and cultivated its lands; it is probably they who first gave it the originally Aramaic name, al-Madīna, by which was meant "the (chief or preeminent) city"; in the time of Mohammed it was called both Medina and Yathrib. Later, with the immigration of two Arab tribes, the 'Aws and Khazrağ, there ensued a continual and bloody struggle between the various factions, who finally negotiated to bring Mohammed to Medina from Mecca as an arbiter of the feuds. Following his death, it was up to the caliphate of Ali ('Alī), the capital of Islam. Later, particularly from the tenth century, its political importance declined until it became briefly the capital of the Kingdom of Hejaz under Husayn ibn 'Alī, from 1919 to 1924, after which it fell to the WAHHĀBIS under 'Abdal'azīz ibn Su'ūd. It has been, since the time of the Prophet, one of the chief religious centers of Islam; the MOSQUE over the tomb of the Prophet is one of the principal shrines of the Muslim world.

MEDINA, BARTOLOMÉ DE

Dominican theologian; b. Medina de Rioseco, near Valladolid, 1527 or 1528; d. Salamanca, Jan. 29, 1580. He entered the Dominican Order at Salamanca. With Dominic Bañez, he was the pupil of Dominic Soto and Melchior Cano. Though well versed in Greek and Hebrew, Medina devoted his life almost entirely to teaching theology, at Alcalá and then at Salamanca, first in the chair of Durandus, and afterward as the principal professor. He was appointed, in 1576, to the cathedra primaria after a successful public debate against the learned Augustinian, John of Guevara. Medina's principal works are his commentaries on the Summa theologiae of St. Thomas Aquinas. Only the commentaries on the prima pars (Salamanca 1577) and the tertia pars to question 60 (Salamanca 1578) are published. He also wrote the Breve instucción de comme se ha administrar el Sacramento de la Penitencia (Salamanca 1580). Medina is usually called the father of PROBABILISM, but scholars are not agreed about his teaching on this question. Some hold that he only formulated probabilism when he wrote: "An opinion is probable when we can follow it without censure and reproof. An opinion is not said to be probable because apparent reasons are adduced in its favor and many assert and defend it. If this were true, all errors would be probable. But an opinion is probable when wise men assert and confirm it with excellent proofs" (Comment. in ST, 1a2ae, 19.6). Others say he proposed the principle but did not use it in practice. Quétif and Échard and also Billuart maintain that Medina's system differed greatly from later probabilism. Quétif and Échard admit that Medina opened the way for a flood of probabilist theory and said: "St. Thomas is our master, others only insofar as they follow his teaching" (Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 2:257). Probabiliorists, when such were still to be found, were loath to admit that he proposed a new doctrine; probabilists do not wish to give him all the credit for introducing a new system of forming the conscience in doubtful cases.

MEDINA, JUAN

Moral theologian; b. Alcalá, 1490; d. probably there, 1546. Few facts are known about him except that he taught moral theology at the University of Alcalá from 1526 until his death. He won great renown as a teacher, drawing large crowds to his lectures. He published nothing himself, but after his death two of his works appeared that represent his moral teaching: (1) De restitutione et contractibus tractatus sive codex, nempe de rerum dominio atque earum restitutione et de aliquibus contractibus, de usura, de cambiis, de censibus; (2) In titulum de poenitentia ejusque partibus commentarius, sc. de poenitentia cordis, de confessione, de satisfactione, de jejuniis, de eleemosyna (2 v. Salamanca 1550; new eds. Ingolstadt 1581; Brixen 1589, 1606; Cologne 1607).

In addition to these works, two of Medina's manuscripts have been discovered in the Vatican archives (OTTOB 1044, fol. 162-231, 231v-261). These are a record of a course that he gave on the first book of the Sentences and a part of the second book. The text that he used was an exposition of the Sentences by Gabriel Biel (1425–95), the German nominalist whose commentary Martin Luther is said to have known by heart. The end of the 15th century had seen the introduction of nominalism into the Spanish and Portuguese universities from the University of Paris. The popularity of nominalist teachings in the Iberian schools led eventually to the establishment of a nominalist chair at Alcalá (as well as at Salamanca and Coimbra). Medina occupied this chair at Alcalá, as his exposition of Biel's commentary shows. This was a theological chair and the sophistical logic so highly acclaimed by the followers of Ockham was not allowed. But many of Medina's theses, following Biel, were in accord with Lutheran teaching, especially on justification and penance, and were later corrected by the Council of Trent.

MEDITATION

Meditation comes from the Latin meditatio, meaning a thinking over, contemplating; exercise, practice, preparation. In modern usage it can refer to physical and psychological methods of calming oneself, reducing stress or sharpening mental awareness. From the Christian perspective, meditation generally refers to a type of prayerful reflection. Meditation is sometimes called mental prayer, although this can be misleading because meditation can be vocal and often uses the imagination, memory, will, and senses in addition to the mind. A great many different methods of meditation are recommended by different spiritual authors. The methods, however, are meant only as guides, the goal being growth in love of God and towards others.

In the early monastic tradition meditatio refers to a vocal activity. To meditate on a passage of Scripture was to repeat out loud a phrase over and over again until it was known by heart. For example, the sixth-century Rule of Benedict lists meditation as one of the works of the novices: they were responsible for memorizing the portions of Scripture needed for the monastic office (48.23, see also 8.3, 58.5). The recitation from memory was also called meditation and could be done while engaging in manual work or other activities and served as a stimulus for personal prayer. In these contexts, meditation is closely associated with lectio divina, the prayerful reading of Scripture. It's foundation can be found in psalms, "Happy are those . . . whose delight is in the law of the Lord, and on this law they meditate day and night" (Ps 1.1–2 see also 19.14, 77.6).

Contemplation. While earlier authors did not always make a distinction between meditation and contemplation, in the middle ages the two terms began to be separated, and contemplation was associated with the higher stages of mystical prayer. The Carthusian, Guigo II (1174–1180), writes of four stages of prayer in his Ladder for Monks: reading, meditation, prayer, and contemplation. Meditation refers here to thinking about what the text means and searching for hidden meanings for each word. This distinction is retained by many later authors, including the Carmelite mystics and Francis de Sales (1567–1622). Thus, Teresa of Avila (1518–1582) calls "discursive meditation" prayers in which one thinks systematically about religious material, Scripture, or the mysteries of faith. Such meditative prayer requires much human effort, graced by God. In contemplative prayer, however, human effort is less as God acts marvelously to transform the person. For Francis de Sales, meditation uses one's understanding, making various reflections in order to arouse the will to love of God and the things of God. In meditation the mind moves from point to point, examining the subject of reflection from various angles.

Ignatius of Loyola's SPIRITUAL EXERCISES outlines manifold methods of meditation, albeit without differentiating the term from contemplation. The famous text includes methods for examining one's conscience, saying the Our Father, and reflecting on imagined scenes from Christ's life and one's judgement before God. Ignatius suggests meditating on single words as long as one continues to find new meanings in them, as well as reciting the words of a prayer rhythmically with one's breathing. His imaginative meditations encourage the use of all the senses while putting oneself in a particular scene or setting. One is to consider what one would say and feel in such a situation, and what one might hear from others. Ignatius' meditations include preparatory prayers for the graces one desires, as well as concluding prayers and conversations with Christ or the saints.

Quest. The Catechism of the Catholic Church highlights the need for all Christians to engage in prayer, including vocal, meditative, and contemplative prayer. It making these distinctions the Catechism describes meditation as "a quest" in which "the mind seeks to understand the way and how of the Christian life, in order to adhere and respond to what the Lord is asking." To assist in such meditation, one may use texts such as Scripture, seasonal liturgical texts, or other spiritual writings. Mental images may also be used, in particular recollections of events in the life of Christ. Meditation may be inspired by visual images such as icons or nature. Even the events in history can be used as a fruitful source of reflection, since history is "the page on which the 'today' of God is written." Meditation intends on deepening faith, converting the heart, and strengthening the will to follow Christ. It should therefore include a movement toward discerning what it is that God wants one to do. In contrast to meditation, the Catechism describes vocal prayer as focusing on words, whether interior or vocal, and contemplation as focusing on a union with God, "a silent love," in which the mind need not be as active.

MEDJUGORJE

A mountain town and pilgrimage center in the Diocese of Mostar in the Catholic Croatian region of Hercegovina, western central Yugoslavia. The name Medjugorje [Med-ju-gor-ee-ay] means "between the hills."

Beginning on June 24, 1981, six Croatian youths from the parish of St. James in Medjugorje reported receiving nearly daily apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The six visionaries, Vicka Ivankovic (b. July 3, 1964), Mirjana Dragicevic (b. March 18, 1965), Marija Pavlovic (b. April 1, 1965), Ivan Dragicevic (b. May 25, 1965), Ivanka Ivankovic (b. April 21, 1966), and Jakov Colo (b. June 3, 1971) reported to have seen the "Gospa" (Croatian for Madonna) in the form of a three-dimensional, external apparition, during which time the visionaries collectively entered an ecstatic state that medical and scientific researchers from Milan and the French University of Montpellier have described as 'removed from the spatio-temporal order.' The messages received from the Madonna are presented both as an authentic embodiment of Catholic doctrine and as a postconciliar formulation of the Marian messages transmitted at Lourdes and Fatima. The essence of the messages received for more than five years can be summarized into six foundational themes.

The Medjugorje message calls for a more resolute faith in the one God and in Jesus Christ as the one mediator to the Father, combined with faith in the apparitions themselves as a means of special graces and conversion. The call to prayer requests a greater generosity of Christian prayer that accentuates the daily recitation of the 15decade Rosary, an invitation to daily Mass, the praying of Sacred Scripture, and a consecration of each person and family to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the Immaculate Heart of Mary as a means of total abandonment to God. The Madonna requested a strict fast (bread and water) initially every Friday and later on Wednesdays as well, in reparation for sin and for the conversion of sinners. The call to penance comprises a general call to Christian self-denial offered for sinners. The message also asks for an interior change of heart to God made possible through greater faith, prayer, fasting, and penance. A monthly sacramental Confession is specified as a principal constituent of authentic conversion. The preeminent Medjugorje theme, the call to peace, requests an interior peace of Christ in the heart of every person, obtained by consistent faith, prayer, fasting, penance and conversion. Significant world chastisements because of humanity's refusal to convert, to take place within the lifetime of the visionaries, are also part of the Medjugorje message, but the acceptance of divine peace, in spite of upcoming external events, remains the heart of the reported Marian message.

The Church has made no official judgment regarding the Medjugorje apparitions. In July, 1986, 12 Italian bishops requested from Pope John Paul II pastoral directives for members of their diocese wanting to pilgrimage to the Marian site. The papal response recommended that pilgrims be allowed to go to Medjugorje, so that they may pray, fast, and convert.

MEDRANO, MARIANO

Argentine prelate and philosopher; b. Buenos Aires, 1767; d. there, April 7, 1851. He entered the University of Chuquisaca in 1781 and received his doctorate in theology there. From 1793 to 1795 he taught philosophy in the Colegio de San Carlos, where he had among his students such outstanding personalities as Saturnino Segurola, Julián Navarro, José León Banegas, Martin Thompson, and Mariano Moreno. His unpublished lectures, still extant, show that the basis of his whole doctrine was scholastic, although it had eclectic and Cartesian ramifications. In La Plata he spread the ideas of Francisco SUÁREZ, the oracle of Argentine youth at the close of the 18th century, who had so much influence on the revolution. Medrano was pastor of the church of La Piedad and vicar-general of the Diocese of Buenos Aires in 1822; in that position he opposed the ecclesiastical reforms of Bernardino RIVADAVIA. In 1829 the government of Viamonte exercised the right of presentation, addressing a request to Gregory XVI for a bishop to be named in the diocese. Medrano was named apostolic vicar and consecrated titular bishop of Aulón. In 1832 he was named bishop of Buenos Aires by Gregory XVI. When the papal bulls to this effect were presented to Attorney General Pedro José Agrelo, he supported national patronage as the right of the respective governments. In order to resolve this involved question, the government in 1834 appointed a board of 39 jurists and theologians to consider 14 propositions presented to them on the state's right of presentation to ecclesiastical office, which seemed to have been ignored in the appointment of Bishop Medrano. After receiving the report, Memorial ajustado, the government accepted the appointment of Medrano. He remained in his bishopric during the Rosas administration and reestablished the ecclesiastical hierarchy.

MEEHAN, CHARLES, BL.

Irish Franciscan priest and martyr; b. after 1639 (exact date and birthplace unknown); d. Ruthin, North Wales, Aug. 12, 1679. According to reliable contemporary sources, his surname was Mihan (modern Meehan), not Mahony as stated in a contemporary broadsheet. No details are available on his religious training and ordination. On Nov. 21, 1672, the Irish Franciscan provincial chapter approved him for hearing confessions of lay people. As a result of the edicts of banishment against bishops and regulars (1673–74), he fled to Flanders from Ireland. Early in November 1674 he was sent to pursue studies at the Franciscan friary in Hammelburg, Bavaria, and thence to St. Isidore's College, Rome (summer 1676). While returning to Ireland in 1678 his ship was forced onto the Welsh coast. He was arrested at Denbigh and imprisoned. At his trial (1679), during the Titus Oates scare, he admitted his priesthood and was condemned to death. He was hanged, cut down alive, and brutally butchered. Meehan was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast: Feb. 12; May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

MEEHAN, THOMAS FRANCIS

Historiographer, chiefly of the Catholic Church in the U.S., editor; b. of Irish immigrant parents, Patrick J. and Mary Jane (Butler) Meehan, Brooklyn, N.Y., Sept. 19, 1854; d. New York City, July 7, 1942. He received his B.A. in 1873 and his M.A. in 1874 from the College of St. Francis Xavier, New York City. His father, who owned the Irish American, appointed Thomas its managing editor (1874-1904). He was also New York correspondent for several papers and was on the staff of the New York Herald (1894–96). He was assistant managing editor of the Catholic Encyclopedia (1906-08), contributing more than 100 articles to it. From 1909 to his death he was on the editorial staff of America. He also wrote for the Encyclopedia Americana, the North American Review, the Catholic World, the Commonweal, and other magazines and newspapers. As early as 1899 he had contributed articles to the Records and Studies published by the United States Catholic Historical Society and in 1905 became collaborator with Charles G. HERBERMANN, president and editor of the society, when the latter's sight began to fail. When Herbermann died in 1916, Meehan became editor and continued in this capacity until his death. He was editor of and contributor to Catholic Builders of the Nation (Boston 1925). Pius XI named him a knight of St. Gregory, May 17, 1931, and Fordham University, New York City, honored him with the LL.D. during its centenary year (1941).

MEEKNESS

A human characteristic that renders one mild of temper and slow to take offense. In modern English it also has a pejorative sense and applies to a man who is spiritless and tamely submissive.

In the Old Testament meekness was closely allied with the state of humility, lowliness, poverty, and affliction. The ancient Greeks brought it into a moral context in counting it better to suffer than to do wrong. The esteem attached to meekness is typical of New Testament morality. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the earth" (Mt 5.4) is the most famous passage embodying this term, but the quality itself is included equivalently in the fruit of the spirit that St. Paul described as charity, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faith, modesty, and continency (Gal 5.22–23). Clearly the attitude that is recommended to the Christian is one of relative passivity in the face of aggravating invasion, or even one of active kindliness toward the covetous and domineering.

The Pauline reference in Galatians to the fruit of the Spirit, and the later association of the virtue of meekness with St. Benedict's steps of humility locate it more exactly in the organic process of Christian growth and development. In its fullness as a gift of the Spirit, there is a willing acceptance if not an element of positive relish in the reaction of those who possess it to the provoking behavior of others, as is exemplified in the martyrdom of the deacon Stephen. In more ordinary circumstances it shows itself in a lack of violence in dealing with one's enemies.

Scholastic theologians have narrowed this concept in making it a moral virtue, a potential part of temperance, that has as its effect the rational moderation of anger. However, their ideal embodiment of this character trait is still Jesus—"Now I myself Paul appeal to you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ" (2 Cor 10.1). Failure in meekness by way of defect is commonly considered under the heading of anger. Excesses of meekness that usually come from extreme indolence, craven fear, or complete absence of even normal aggressiveness have been treated by Aquinas and St. Francis de Sales. Serious failures are conceivable only in such unusual circumstances that bad example would be gravely scandalous, or that failure to admonish with adequate impressiveness would lead those under one's charge to moral confusion.

Obviously the beatitude mentioned by Matthew as part of the Sermon on the Mount lists meekness as a value opposed to those values that normally prevail in society. From the simple evolutionary point of view, it might be thought that the meek would be eliminated by the process of natural selection. However, some degree of acceptance of this Christian ideal in Western society appears necessary to its survival. Nonetheless, it is certainly one of the traits of character that the average man finds confusing. But with the passing of the rugged frontier era and its appropriate code of morality, humility and meekness are again becoming more and more acceptable as qualities of a well-adjusted member of our society.

MEGIDDO

One of the most important Canaanite and Israelite fortress-cities of ancient Palestine. It is located in modern Israel, approximately 20 miles south-southeast of Haifa. The principal references to Megiddo in the OT, usually coupled with its lesser twin city Taanach, occur in Jos 12.21; 17.11; Jgs 1.27; 5.19; 1 Kgs 4.12; 9.15; 2 Kgs 9.27; 23.29; 1 Chr 7.29; 2 Chr 35.22. Several features of Megiddo's location on a spur of the Mt. CARMEL ridge that thrusts into the southwestern edge of the Plain of Esdraelon account for its unique strategic value in antiquity. Control of Megiddo meant control of the best pass that cut northward from the coast through the Carmel range to the interior of Palestine and beyond. This was the main military and commercial route between Egypt and the Fertile Crescent. Megiddo also commanded the whole sweep of the fertile plain from east to north to west and therefore the traffic that traveled the busy trade route through this plain.

Because of the many battles that were fought at or near Megiddo in the distant past, the term Armageddon, which is probably the Hebrew for "Mount of Megiddo" and appears in the eschatological context of Rv 16.16, is commonly used as the symbol and the synonym for the battlefield where the final struggle between good and evil will take place.

MEHEGAN, MARY XAVIER, MOTHER

Founder, New Jersey Sisters of Charity; b. Skibereen, Ireland, Feb. 19, 1825; d. Convent Station, New Jersey, June 24, 1915. Mehegan's parents, Patrick and Johanna (Miles) Mehegan, named her Catherine Josephine. In 1844 she and her sister Margaret left for the U.S. without the knowledge of their mother. In 1847 Mehegan became one of the first postulants received by the New York Sisters of Charity after their separation from the community in Emmitsburg, Maryland. As Sister Mary Xavier, she was one of the three sisters who opened St. Vincent's Hospital in New York.

In 1858 James Roosevelt Bayley, first bishop of Newark, N.J., and a nephew of Mother Elizabeth Seton, requested Sister Mary Xavier and Sister Mary Catherine Nevin to supervise five novices who had been trained for him by the Cincinnati Sisters of Charity. On this basis, the sisters' New Jersey community was formally inaugurated on Sept. 29, 1859. The motherhouse was located first at old St. Mary's, Newark, and then, after July 2, 1860, at Madison, New Jersey, where St. Elizabeth's school for girls was opened also.

During the Civil War, Mother Xavier worked with the sisters in hospitals in Newark and Trenton. After the war, her order increased in numbers; new land was purchased, and additional buildings were constructed. The missions of the order flourished, and new ones were opened in Massachusetts, New York, and Connecticut. In 1899 Mother Xavier founded, at Convent Station, the College of St. Elizabeth, the first college for women in New Jersey. In 1915, when she had served as superior for 57 years, her community numbered 1,200 sisters and maintained 94 missions, including schools, hospitals, orphanages, nurseries, and homes for the aged.

MEHRERAU, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine abbey on Lake Constance in Bregenz, west Austria; present seat of the Cistercian abbey nullius of WETTINGEN-MEHRERAU. The Benedictine Mehrerau had nothing to do with the foundation of St. COLUMBAN in Bregenz c. 610. Mehrerau was settled by monks from PETERSHAUSEN (1097), who had settled (1083) in Adelsbuch (Bregenzerwald). The Romanesque church recently excavated served as a burial place for the counts of Bregenz and Montfort and for many Benedictine abbots. Mehrerau colonized the region with clearances in the Bregenzerwald and model farms. In 1806 the abbey was suppressed, and the Vorarlberg baroque church and tower were torn down. The baroque convent buildings still stand. In 1854 Cistercians expelled from Wettingen (1841) restored Mehrerau. By canon and civil law Mehrerau is now a priory dependent on Wettingen, and at the same time the seat of the Abbey of Wettingen. The abbot of Wettingen, the only abbot nullius in Austria, is head of the Mehrerau Cistercian congregation. This includes seven monasteries of men, two of which are priories, and nine monasteries of women, of which two are priories.

The library has 90,000 volumes, 100 MSS and early printings, a collection of engravings, and 18,000 seals. Several altar paintings are late Gothic and Renaissance. Mehrerau has a humanities gymnasium and boarding school recognized by the state, an agricultural technical school, and a philosophical-theological school. Since 1889 the abbey has published the Cistercian chronicle. It directs the pilgrimage in Birnau and a sanatorium in Mehrerau. Cistercians from Mehrerau were the first to return to Germany (Marienstatt), to modern Yugoslavia (Stična), and to Switzerland (HAUTERIVE) after the secularizations of the 19th century.

MEINHARD OF LIVONIA, ST.

Also known as Meinrad, Augustinian missionary, bishop; b. ca. 1130 in Germany; d. Aug. 14, 1196, Yxkill, Livonia (near Riga, Latvia). Meinhard entered religious life at the monastery of Segelberg, Germany. Following his profession as an Augustinian canon regular and ordination as a priest, he left the safety of his monastery to preach in pagan lands. He was consecrated the first bishop of Livonia (c. 1184) and fixed his see at Yxkill on the Düna. He brought monks from his former convent to form a community of canons regular at his castle. Christianity found firm footing in the region due to his efforts to form a native clergy and establish standards for their training. Originally he was buried at his castle in Livonia. The see was transferred to Riga (1201) following his death, and his relics translated later that century to Riga's cathedral. He was canonized by Pope John Paul II at Riga, Latvia, Sept. 8, 1993.

MEINRAD OF EINSIEDELN, ST.

Martyr; b. Sülichgau, near Württemberg, Germany, late eighth century; d. hermitage near Einsiedeln, Switzerland, Jan. 21, 861. He was educated at the Abbey REICHENAU, where he became a BENEDICTINE monk and priest. He was for a while headmaster of the school at Babinchowa on upper Lake Zurich, and then he spent seven years in a hermitage on the slopes of Mount Etzel. There he built a chapel that later became the site of the monastery of EINSIEDELN, and the same place witnessed his murder by two robbers to whom he had given hospitality. He was buried at Reichenau, and his remains were transferred to Einsiedeln in 1039. His symbol is two ravens, beloved pets of Meinrad and betrayers of his murderers.

MEINWERK OF PADERBORN, BL.

Bishop; d. Paderborn, June 5, 1036. Meinwerk, a scion of the aristocratic Saxon Immedinger family, was educated with the future Emperor HENRY II, who appointed him bishop of Paderborn in 1009 so that he might restore the impoverished see through his own immense wealth. Having been consecrated by WILLIGIS OF MAINZ, Meinwerk enriched his church and cajoled extensive donations from his friend the emperor. He administered his diocesan property meticulously and with a paternal pettiness that became legendary; he supervised his clergy and ecclesiastical foundations with equal care (see AB-DINGHOF, ABBEY OF). He brought goldsmiths, architects, and Greek artisans to Paderborn; built energetically; refurbished his cathedral; and fortified the town. He stands in the front rank of the OTTONIAN RENAISSANCE figures. Although he campaigned occasionally, Meinwerk did not seem to be politically inclined.

MEISTERMANN, BARNABAS

Missionary, archeologist, and author of many books on the shrines of the Holy Land; b. Pfaffenheim, Alsace, March 27, 1850; d. Jerusalem, Sept. 29, 1923. Ordained in 1873, Meistermann became a Franciscan in 1875. From 1882 to 1887 he was stationed at the Basilica of St. Mary of the Angels, Assisi, as a confessor and as the director of the renovation of the Portiuncula. After a short stay in Rome, he left for China in 1887, where he was a missionary for six years. From 1893 until his death 30 years later, he labored in the Holy Land and devoted himself to the study of the history, topography, and archeology of Palestine and its sacred shrines. The fruits of his scientific research were published in several books and in articles contributed to the Catholic Encyclopedia. His Nouveau guide de Terre Sainte (Paris 1907, 3d ed. 1936), which was translated into several languages, is still of much value.

MELANCHTHON, PHILIP

Humanist, reformer with LUTHER, and educator: b. Bretten, Feb. 16, 1497; d. Wittenberg, April 19, 1560. His father was Georg Schwarzerd, an armorer; his mother was a niece of Johann REUCHLIN. He studied under Georg Simler in the Pforzheim Latin school; at Heidelberg (1509–18), where the new humanistic learning was still weak, but ecclesiastical reform after the fashion of Wimpfeling was well represented by Pallas Spangel; and from 1512 to 1518 at Tübingen, where he received an M.A. degree (1514) and where he became wholly devoted to humanism, as evidenced by a plan to publish an error-free edition of Aristotle. At Tübingen he was influenced by the writings of Rodolphus Agricola, and especially of ERASMUS. In 1518, he went to Wittenberg University where, with help from Reuchlin, he had been appointed to the chair of Greek. His inaugural address on curriculum reform won the hearty approval of Luther, who in turn won Melanchthon for his cause of reform. Thus he rejected Aristotle, helped in the Leipzig Disputation, and received a baccalaureate in theology. During the period 1523 to 1528 his earlier humanism reappeared, initially occasioned by the preaching of the Zwickau prophets. He sensed that ecclesiastical order, political stability, and culture were in danger. Therefore he began stressing the importance of divine law (by which he came to mean not only that law as the revealer of sin and the leader to Christ, but also the law of nature as the foundation of civil, social, and intellectual life). Melanchthon helped to design the system for primary education that Luther advocated and evangelical territorial rulers began to adopt in the second half of the 1520s, but his influence was most directly felt in the reform of the Lutheran universities' curriculum. These activities earned him the title "Preceptor of Germany." Although Luther had longed for a curriculum free of the influence of Aristotle, it was through Melanchthon's influence that the Greek philosopher came to play an important role in the evangelical universities, particularly in the natural philosophical curriculum. Melanchthon was also instrumental in shaping the fledgling Church's relationship with Germany's princes. His spirit was irenic and was evidenced in his ecumenical concerns. To Luther's Schmalkaldic Articles (1536) Melanchthon added a statement that allowed papal primacy over bishops (iure humano); he sought a formula to bridge differences involving especially Bucer and Calvin concerning the Lord's Supper; against Matthias FLACIUS ILLYRICUS in the Interim controvery, he defended Catholic usages as adiaphora (indifferent usages). Melanchthon's affirmation of the necessity of good works (from obedience and as verification but not as cause of justification) involved him in the MAJORISTIC CONTROVERSY.

Melancthon remained loyal to Luther and his cause. His warm evangelical piety, clearly reflected in the AUGS-BURG CONFESSION (1530), cannot be doubted. His book of theological commonplaces, Loci communes (1520–21), was the first effort to systematize the evangelical faith. Succeeding editions broadened the Loci's rational framework. Melanchthon's writings influenced much of the system-building of later Protestantism, which characterized both the strictly orthodox and their opponents.

MELANIA THE ELDER

Heiress and ascetic; b. Rome, 342; d. Jerusalem, c. 409. Melania was born into the patrician family of Antonia, was related to PAULINAS OF NOLA (Epistola 29.5: noster sanguis propinquat), and at 16 married Valerius Maximus, prefect of Rome (361–363). She was widowed at 22 and apparently lost two of her children at the same time. Deciding on a life of strict asceticism, she confided her son Publicola to a tutor, disposed of much of her wealth, and departed for Egypt (372) where she aided the monks suffering in the Arian persecution. She visited Palestine and, with RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA (378) founded a double monastery in Jerusalem.

In 378 Publicola married the noble Albina Ceionia and had a daughter, MELANIA THE YOUNGER. After taking the part of Bishop JOHN OF JERUSALEM and Rufinus in the Origenistic quarrels with JEROME, Melania returned to Italy (400), visited Paulinus of Nola, and looked to the ascetical training of her granddaughter in Rome. She visited Sicily (404) and Hippo, where she met AUGUSTINE; she received the news of the death of Publicola (c. 405) with forbearance (Paulinus, Epistolae. 45.2–3) and died shortly after her return to Jerusalem.

Her life was written by PALLADIUS (Hist. Laus. 46, 54, 55), and she was eulogized by Paulinus (Epistolae. 28–29, 31, 45). Jerome's reference to Melania, cuius nomen nigredinis (melania) testatur perfidiae tenebras ("whose name means blackness and testifies to the darkness of her perfidy"; Epistolae 133.3), elicited caution among later hagiographers in admitting her sanctity; but Jerome was indulging his pique at her support for Rufinus in the Origenistic controversy (see ORIGEN AND ORIGENISM).

MELANIA THE YOUNGER, ST.

Granddaughter of MELANIA THE ELDER, heiress and ascetic; b. Rome, 383; d. Jerusalem, Dec. 31, 439. The daughter of Valerius Publicola and Albina Ceionia, and heiress to great wealth, Melania at 14 was forced to marry her cousin Valerius Pinian. After the early death of their two infants, she persuaded St. Pinian to live in married continence and to dispose of their wealth in favor of the poor. After the death of her father (c. 405) and despite the opposition of the Senate, fiscal agents, and her relatives, she converted her house on the Via Appia into a hostel for pilgrims and began the sale of her vast properties with the consent of the Emperor HONORIUS. With Pinian she visited PAULINUS OF NOLA (406) and, fleeing before the Gothic invasion from the north, settled in Sicily in the company of RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA. When he died (410), she and Pinian visited North Africa for seven years, met AUGUSTINE and ALIPIUS in Hippo, and encouraged the spread of ascetical movements. They settled in Jerusalem (417), made a pilgrimage among the Egyptian monks, and met CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA. After returning to Jerusalem, Melania founded a convent for nuns on the Mt. of Olives (432) and a monastery nearby (436). Upon the death of Pinian (431), she increased her penitential activities, visited Constantinople (436) to convert her uncle Volusianus, and met the Empress Eudoxia Athenais, whom she later befriended in Jerusalem. Her life was written by the monk Gerontius.

Feast: Dec. 31.

MELCHERS, PAULUS

German cardinal, archbishop; b. Münster in Westphalia, Jan. 6, 1813; d. Rome, Dec. 14, 1895. The Church-State conflict in Cologne (see COLOGNE, MIXED MARRIAGE DISPUTE IN) led him to abandon the legal profession and study for the priesthood. After ordination (1841), he became vicar-general of Münster (1852); bishop of Osnabrück (1857) as well as vicar apostolic for the northern missions, to which he devoted special pastoral care; and archbishop of COLOGNE (1866). At VATICAN COUNCIL I he was a leader in the minority group of bishops that considered a definition of papal primacy and infallibility inopportune, but he subscribed without hesitation to the conciliar decisions. His conscientious measures against the theology professors in his diocese who continued to oppose the definitions brought on him calumniations from the OLD CATHOLICS. During the early years of the KULTURKAMPF, which he had sought vainly to avert, he was the prudent leader of the Prussian hierarchy, along with his friend Bp. Wilhelm von Ketteler. After spending several months in prison (1874), Melchers was forced to leave Germany (1875) and to administer his see from nearby Maastricht in the Netherlands. To facilitate a settlement, he resigned his see at Pope Leo XIII's request (1885) and became a cardinal (1885) in the Roman Curia, where his influence was slight. In 1892 he joined the Jesuits.

MELCHIZEDEK

Speculations surrounding this name in pre-Christian times have been found in a number of Dead Sea Scrolls fragments. In 1965, A. S. van der Woude published a fairly complete column of Hebrew text (11Q Melchizedek text from Qumran Cave 11) which, with a few small fragments, is what remains of a manuscript of the (?mid-) 1st century B.C. The text features a contest at the end of time between Melchizedek and Belial, thought of as leaders of opposing military camps, angelic forces each of which can claim a portion of mankind as their "lot." The pattern is a familiar one. At Qumran, it is the conflict between the "sons of light" and the "sons of darkness," each group with its own angelic princely leader; in Christian legend, that between Michael and Lucifer. Melchizedek, so understood, is no longer the mysterious human figure of Gn 14.18–20, alluded to again in Ps 110.4, upon whom the discussion of Christ's priesthood in Heb 5–7 is based.

Seemingly the oldest text that presents an angelic figure named Melchizedek is the "Visions of Amram" (the father of Moses). J. T. Milik (see bibliography) has published the pertinent passages; he dated the work to the 2d century B.C. or earlier. The extant Aramaic fragments tell of a dispute of two angelic beings, who between them have power over all mankind, as to which of them Amram must accept. Each of the two has three names; only one name is preserved directly, but that is Melchireshac, "king of wickedness," the opposite of Melchizedek understood as "king of justice." Other evidence makes it easy to equate the two with Belial and Michael, respectively. The Qumran sect, in its community rule (1QS Serek Hayyahad [Rule of the Community, Manual of Discipline]), in the "War" scroll (1QM Milhâmâh [War Scroll]), and in various liturgical blessings and curses only partially published (4Q280 ff., described by Milik), each year on the occasion of its "renewal of the covenant" at Pentecost formally execrated Belial and aligned themselves with his adversary. These texts are in Hebrew. A curse in 4Q280 names Melchireshac; and Milik restores the name Melchizedek in a broken line of the "War" scroll (at 1QM xiii, 10), though elsewhere in that composition the two leaders appear as Michael (1QM xvii, 5–8) and Belial (frequent).

The "Visions of Amram," which was known to Origen, underlies a variety of later Jewish, Gnostic, and Christian presentations of Melchizedek as a superhuman figure. In a different direction, it became the prototype of the story reflected in Jude 9, with Michael and the devil disputing over the body of Moses. That these speculations were known to the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews can hardly be doubted. The latter, however, has carefully kept his portrayal of Melchizedek as a type of Christ within the framework provided by Gn 14 and Ps 110, and has not used the angelic figure Melchizedek as far as can be determined. From the known interest of the Qumran Essenes in a heavenly temple with an angelic liturgy (see Strugnell) scholars have inferred that the angelic warrior Melchizedek may also have been thought of as the high priest of the heavenly temple. Such a representation could have had a concealed influence on the development in Hebrews; but it remains unproved. The first text cited above (11Q Melch) is seen by Milik as forming part of a "Commentary on the Book of the Periods," from about 120 B.C.; the beginning of this was badly published by J. M. Allegro (as 4Q 180–181). Dependent on earlier sources for both its angelology and its division of world history into periods, this work modified its borrowings in an effort to bring them into line with the canonical Old Testament, including Daniel, which it quotes. In the process, the figure of Melchizedek underwent a further transformation; and while Belial remains a fallen angel, the victorious Melchizedek is now a name applied to the Almighty himself, intervening on behalf of his people at the end of time. A human figure, the "anointed of the spirit," serves as his herald.

MELÉNDEZ, JUAN DE

Dominican chronicler; b. Lima, Peru, date unknown; d. Lima, 1684. De Meléndez entered the Dominicans at the Convento del Rosario where he completed his studies. After teaching for some years, he was put in charge of studies in the convents of Cuzco and Lima. Later, he was vicar-general of the convents and doctrinas of the archbishopric of Lima and of the bishoprics of Cuzco, Arequipa, Huamanga, Panama, and Darien. In 1671 he was named procurator of the Peruvian Dominican province, and in connection with this position traveled to Madrid and Rome where he gathered material for and wrote his monumental work Tesoros verdaderos de las Indias (v.1, 2 Rome 1681, v.3 1682).

Although he took a great deal of material from other writers, the most valuable part of this chronicle is a detailed description of the city of Lima in the 17th century, including an inventory of corporations, churches, and convents. The last volume includes some lackluster biographical sketches of prominent Dominicans. The style is clear and concise, and shows a strong tendency toward Hispanism.

He was subsequently appointed regent of the Colegio de la Minerva in spite of the provision of its founder, Juan Solano, that the position be held by a religious from Spain. During his residence in Madrid and Rome he was commissioned by his province to promote the cause of the beatification and canonization of Fray Vicente Vernedo, of whom he published a biography in Lima in 1675, La vida y virtudes del Venerable Padre Vicente Vernedo. He published also a memorial to the king (1680), asking the royal influence to be exerted for the cause before the Holy See.

MELETIAN SCHISM

A schism of Antioch (360–418), which took its name from Meletius, a native of Melitene, bishop of Sebaste and then of Antioch (360–381), who died (May 381; feast, Feb. 12) while he was president of the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE I. In the anti-Nicene reaction after 330, the Catholic Bishop of Antioch, Eustathius, had been deposed and the see was occupied by Arian-minded bishops during the next two decades. The faithful were divided between a Eustathian minority following Paulinus and a majority who supported the doctrine of HOMOOUSIOS. When in 360 the homoean party took advantage of the political situation and occupied sees vacated in the persecution under JULIAN THE APOSTATE, ACACIUS OF CAESAREA had Meletius elected bishop of Antioch even though he was already bishop of Sebaste and in exile at Beroea in Syria. Meletius almost immediately rallied all the faithful, but under pressure the emperor exiled him and had him replaced by the Arian Euzoius.

Despite appearances, the Eustathians and Meletians were at variance, for the Eustathians recognized one God, one ousia, or hypostasis, in three persons; for this they were accused of SABELLIANISM by the Meletians, who believed in the Nicene doctrine of ousia, or substance, and three hypostases.

Before a synod of Alexandria could take a conciliatory position between the two expressions, LUCIFER OF CAGLIARI consecrated the Eustathian Paulinus as bishop of Antioch, and on his return from exile Meletius made the mistake of refusing communion with ATHANASIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, who in turn took the part of Paulinus (363). In spite of the synod that Meletius convened at Antioch to affirm the unity of substance (ousia) and the three hypostases, a schism ensued. Rome's attitude remained ambiguous despite the efforts of BASIL OF CAESAREA, who took the part of Meletius (see Epist. 92) and tried to win over the West. In 378 Rome communicated with both the bishops but delayed approval, awaiting the death of one of them. In synod at Antioch in 379, the Meletians manifested a conciliatory attitude. Nevertheless, upon the death of Meletius in 381, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, who preached the eulogy for Meletius, was not able to prevent the Meletian party from electing Flavian, who with Diodore of Tarsus had supported them during the exile of Meletius. AMBROSE OF MILAN expressed the discontent of the West, and Paulinus went to Rome in company with EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS and JEROME to protest the election of Flavian. Paulinus died in 388 but he had consecrated Evagrius before his death. Flavian succeeded in preventing the election of a successor to Evagrius and entered into communion with Alexandria. It was only in 398, when JOHN CHRYSOSTOM was patriarch of Constantinople, that Pope SIRICIUS finally recognized Flavian. The Eustathians ended the schism in 418, but the relics of Bishop Eustathius were returned to Antioch only in 482.

MELFI, COUNCILS OF

Several significant church councils that met in this city of southern Italy.

In August 1059 NICHOLAS II and Hildebrand held a synod at Melfi in an effort to reform the Church in southern Italy, especially to enforce clerical CELIBACY. The occasion is famous because the pope recognized the title of the Norman conquerors of southern Italy, notably Robert Guiscard, who in return acknowledged himself a vassal of the papacy, promised annual payments, and pledged to defend the pope. This placed the Italian NORMANS on a legitimate basis; it renewed the papal claims on the region and gained Rome a powerful ally for the moment but also gave her a potential enemy for centuries to come.

ALEXANDER II held a council at Melfi in 1067, at which a Norman noble was excommunicated on complaint of the archbishop of Salerno.

The Truce of God (see PEACE OF GOD) was imposed on all the subjects of Roger I of Sicily in 1089 by a council at Melfi over which URBAN II presided; a series of canons also survives.

In 1100 PASCHAL II excommunicated the Beneventans in a synod at Melfi for not fulfilling their political obligations to the Holy See.

A series of statutes was enacted at Melfi in 1284 for the Church in the Norman kingdom.

MELITO OF SARDES

Second-century apologist, theologian, and exegete; d. before 190. Information on his life is sparse and vague. Eusebius of Caesarea writes: "At that time Melito, Bishop of the Church of Sardes, and Apollinaris, Bishop of the Church of Hierapolis, shone in remarkable fashion: they addressed discourses to the Roman Emperor [Marcus Aurelius] . . . in defense of the faith" (Hist. eccl. 5.26.1). The letter (c. 190) of Polycrates of Ephesus speaks of "the eunuch [i.e., unmarried] Melito, who lived totally in the Holy Spirit and rests in Sardes in expectation of the visitation from the heavens" (Hist. eccl. 5.24.5). He was a Quartodeciman and c. 165 took part in a controversy over the date of Easter (Hist. eccl. 4.26.3).

A list of Melito's works is provided by Eusebius (Hist. eccl. 4.26.2): the Apology, On Easter (2 bks.), On Christian Life and the Prophets, On the Church, On the Lord's Day, On the Faith of Man, On Creation, On the Obedience of the Senses to Faith, On the Soul and the Body, On Baptism, On Truth, On Faith and Christ's Birth, On Prophecy, On Hospitality, The Key, On the Devil, On the Apocalypse of John, On God Incarnate, and six books of Extracts from the Law and the Prophets. This list does not coincide in all respects with the titles furnished by Jerome and Rufinus, or even with the titles of the fragments that have survived. Almost nothing of all this is extant other than some fragments and the homily(?) On Easter, edited in 1940 by Campbell Bonner and completed in 1960 by the publication of a new papyrus (Bodmer XIII) and by a Latin version.

The almost complete disappearance of the Melito corpus is not yet satisfactorily explained. Some have explained it by a suspicion of heresy, resting on certain formulas: "Insofar as He [Christ] engenders, He is Father; insofar as He is engendered, He is Son" (Hom. 9). "He [Christ] is . . . Son in the Father' (frag. 15). But most of these expressions can be interpreted in a satisfactory fashion, and it would seem that Melito's orthodoxy is not open to suspicion. His style too must be taken into account, for he is very fond of rhetorical devices: parallelism, antithesis, consonance, ecphrasis. In an age that no longer understands them, such turns of phrase can discredit an author; but it was not always thus, and the influence exercized by Melito was considerable. Regrettably, the present meager understanding of his thought makes it difficult to determine that influence with certainty. There is good reason to believe that Irenaeus was significantly influenced by Melito and is perhaps indebted to him for certain themes in his theological thought. Other authors he surely influenced were Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and the anonymous author of the paschal homily inspired by Hippolytus or by the Adversus Judaeos of Pseudo-Cyprian.

This would confirm the importance of Melito's theological thought, in which Christology plays a central role, inasmuch as his theology is organized around the problem of salvation: Christ, Son of God, "by Whom the Father has created everything" (Hom. 104), restores to man the salvation he has lost. He directs the history of the Old Testament and becomes present to humanity by His Incarnation; He frees man from sin and death by His Passion and introduces man to heaven by His Resurrection. The story of salvation is nothing but the story of the Word's presence to humanity from the beginning to the end. Melito's phraseology is precise enough to warrant the affirmation of an anonymous opponent of heresy: "Who does not know the books of Irenaeus, of Melito, and of others, where Christ is proclaimed God and man?" (Hist. eccl. 5.28.5).

Melito holds an important place in the history of exegesis. He differentiated the problem of the meaning of Scripture and the problem of the meaning of history, distinguished clearly between figures and parables, interpreted remarkably well the relations between the Old and New Testaments with original insights, and gave the oldest list of Old Testament canonical writings (Hist. eccl. 4.26.14).

Benedictine monastery on the Danube, 44 miles west of Vienna. After the Avars were destroyed, the area was given to the Bavarian abbey of Herrieden in 831, and in 976 the Babenbergs built their castle in Melk. A canonry was there c. 1000, and in 1014 the relics of the Irish martyr St. COLOMAN (d. 1012) were translated to Melk. In 1040 the abbey received a large fragment of the Holy CROSS. During the investiture struggle, Leopold II Babenberg brought Benedictines from LAMBACH to Melk (1089). The abbey flourished under Abbot Erchenfried (d. 1163), being famed for the Annals of Melk (1123-1564; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores, 9:479–537), necrologies, the Melk hymn to the Virgin, the poet Heinrich, and the cloister school. St. LEO-POLD III gave the castle with a rich endowment to the Benedictines and in 1110 obtained from Rome an exemption for the abbey. A fire in 1297 destroyed the monastery and its library. In 1418, during the Council of Constance, Duke Albrecht V Hapsburg brought Austrian and German Benedictines from SUBIACO to Melk to reform monasteries in Austria, Bavaria, and Swabia. Reformers of this period at Melk were Abbot Nicholas Seyringer (d. 1425), Peter of Rosenheim (d. 1433), Martin of Senging, and Johann Schlitpacher (d. 1482). Melk did not form its own congregation or join those of KASTL or BURSFELD, and the reformed monasteries declined rapidly during the Reformation. A third period of growth began when Abbot Reiner of Landau (d. 1637) founded an Austrian Benedictine congregation, whose members included the canonist H. L. Engel; the historians A. Schramb (d. 1720), P. Hueber (d. 1725), B. and H. Pez; and the librarian M. Kropf (d. 1779). The abbey school was completely restored. Neither the Enlightenment (c. 1785) nor the increasing of the abbey's parish ministries (to 29) benefited Melk. The aesthetician M. Enk von der Burg (d. 1843) and the historian I. Keiblinger (d. 1869) were monks at Melk. In 1964 the abbey had 40 members, of whom 33 priests were engaged in parish work or in the direction of the liberal arts Gymnasium. The library had 75,000 volumes, 1,800 MSS, and 800 incunabula. The archives held 1,800 documents.

The small original castle, enlarged in the 15th century, was pulled down by Abbot B. Dietmayr (1700–39) for the baroque construction of Jakob Prandtauer (1660?–1726). Behind a massive gate flanked by two towers is the west façade, divided by pilasters and marked by a central and two lateral projections. The center story is made prominent, here as elsewhere, by greater height and broad window sills and lintels. The prelates' court (273 feet by 136.5 feet) is divided in the same way. The stuccoed main stairway leads to the Emperor's Walk (637 feet long). In the prelature are two table altars, one by Jörg Breu (c. 1502) and one by the school of A. Dürer (1526). The archives hold the gold cross of Melk (1362). To the west is the two-story Marble Hall, the walls divided by composite and Atlantean capitals. The balcony, with its wonderful view of the Danube valley, leads to the library, the counterpart of the Marble Hall. The paintings Triumph of Reason and Glorification of Faith, are by Paul Troger (1731). The architecture, the paintings, and the orange, gold, red-brown, and gray of the church walls combine in an impressive harmony. The nave is barrelvaulted in three sections and has, on each side, three chapels with galleries. The walls of the church are divided by huge fluted pilasters and seem to hang from the rich and prominent ceiling cornices. The altars of St. Coloman and St. Benedict extend the transept but little beyond the nave. On the main altar, by A. Beduzzi, the patrons of the church, SS. Peter and Paul, take leave of each other before martyrdom. The paintings in the nave, Sources of Grace, Three Divine Virtues, and Life of St. Benedict, are by M. Rottmayr (1721). The saints in heaven are portrayed in the dome (208 feet high); the choir stalls are by P. Widerin (1736).

MELKITE GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH

The Melkite Church is one of the 22 autonomous Catholic churches (ecclesiae sui juris) with its own patriarch. Its origin goes back to the traditions of the Church of Antioch, today Antakia in Turkey. The term "Melkite" comprises a Syriac root with a Greek ending that means "kingly." Mālkâ is Syriac for king (Arabic malik). The word is used in all the Semitic languages for the Roman emperor, like the Greek basileus. By adding the Greek ending -ites we have the form melkites, a term equivalent to basilikos. It should be noted that the third radical of the Semitic root is kaf: there is no guttural. Therefore the correct form of the word is Melkite, rather than the latinized form "Melchite."

The term Melkite was originally used to refer to those Christians within the ancient Patriarchal Churches of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem who accepted the Christological Creed professed by the Byzantine emperor after the Council of Chalcedon in 451. Today, however, the term more often refers to Byzantine Catholics associated with those three patriarchal churches.

In the seventh century, the Byzantine empire was threatened by the Persians. Emperor Heraclius realized that he could not possibly withstand the Persians so long as he had factions feuding with each other within his empire, namely the Orthodox and the so-called Monophysites. As a compromise, he promoted the doctrine known as Monothelitism, a heresy that maintained that in Jesus Christ there was one divine energy and one will. This only served to create further division in the Antiochene Church that was already weakened by internal dissensions. In 637 Antioch fell to the Muslims as Islam was beginning its spread throughout the Middle East. Then in 969, Antioch was recovered by the Byzantines only to be conquered not too long afterwards by the Turks.

In 1098 the Crusaders came and took control of Antioch, replacing the Orthodox hierarchy with a Latin hierarchy. In 1154 the Byzantines reconquered Antioch, and the emperor restored the patriarch to his see. Hostility, however, made it virtually impossible for the patriarchs to reside in the city, so many of them governed from Constantinople. This situation caused the Melkite Church of Antioch to undergo heavy Byzantine influence. In time the ancient Syriac liturgical rite was replaced by the liturgical rite of Constantinople. By the end of the twelfth century, the adoption of the Byzantine liturgical rite became definitive, largely as a result of the influence of Patriarch Theodore IV (Balsamon) who headed the Church of Antioch from 1189 to 1195. When the Mameluks came to power in 1268, they recognized the Antiochian hierarchs but would not let them return to the city of Antioch. So the focus of the Antiochene patriarchate shifted from Antioch to Damascus. To this day Damascus in Syria remains the patriarchate center of the Melkite Church.

During the centuries of tumult in Antioch, there were several patriarchs who professed communion with the bishop of Rome despite the antagonism that had developed between the Old Rome and the New Rome (Constantinople). According to one estimate, between the twelfth and eighteenth centuries there were perhaps as many as 25 patriarchs of Antioch in communion with Rome. However, there was never a stable, enduring union between the Church of Antioch and the Church of Rome.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the European powers, namely Great Britain and France, entered the scene of the Middle East. The French attained a strong diplomatic and economic influence in the region. It was this influence which eventually led to the formation of the Melkite Greek Catholic Church.

Latin missionaries began their activity in the Patriarchate of Antioch in the mid-seventeenth century. While there were some receptions into the Latin Church, the missionaries were primarily concerned with forming a pro-Catholic party within the patriarchate itself. By the early eighteenth century, the Antiochene Church was split by internal dissension, with the pro-Catholic party centered in Damascus and the anti-Catholic party in its rival city, Aleppo.

Patriarch Athanasius III (Dabbas), who died on Aug. 5, 1724, had designated a Cypriot monk named Sylvester as his successor. Sylvester had the support of the Aleppo party and the Patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem. On Sept. 20, 1724, the Damascus party pre-empted the Aleppo faction by electing its pro-Catholic candidate as patriarch, who took the name Cyril VI (Tanas). A week later, the Patriarch of Constantinople responded by ordaining Sylvester as a rival patriarch. The Ottoman Sultan recognized Sylvester and expelled Cyril, who was exiled to Sidon, Lebanon. On Aug. 13, 1729, Pope Benedict XIII formally recognized Cyril's election as Patriarch of Antioch. The Catholic wing of the Antiochene Patriarchate became known as the Melkite Greek Catholic Church. In recognition of the growing diaspora of Melkite Catholics in Egypt and Palestine, Pope Gregory XVI bestowed the additional titles of Patriarch of Alexandria and Jerusalem on the the Melkite Catholic Patriarch ad personam.

Conditions improved for the fledging Melkite Church when the Ottoman Sultan extended civil guarantees to all Melkites on Oct. 31, 1837, and formally recognized Patriarch Maximos III (Mazloum) as the leader of the Melkite Greek Catholic Church, completely independent of any other ecclesiastical community in the Ottoman empire. This improved state of affairs resulted in the Melkite patriarchate's return to Damascus, Syria from Sidon, Lebanon, where it had been since 1724. This was followed by a period of expansion and growth, fueled by the popular perception of the Melkite Church as a focus of Arab resistance against the Turks.

The figure of Maximos III (Mazloum) towers over the Melkite Church of this period. His leadership gained his church respect and admiration; his educational reforms provided the Melkites with the most learned clergy of the Middle East. He also bequeathed to his church a sense of independence from the Roman Curia, vigorously resisting the Roman Curia's attempts to interfere in Melkite internal affairs. The Melkite Church owes him a great debt for setting a pattern which struck a balance between Eastern and Western traditions and separated the essentials from the accidental in both.

The 19th century witnessed much tension between the Melkite Church and the See of Rome. Many Melkites felt that their unique Byzantine identity, traditions and customs were being overwhelmed by the Latin tradition. This tension manifested itself publicly at the First Vatican Council (1868–70) when Melkite Patriarch Gregory II (Youssef) left Rome before the vote on the constitution Pastor Aeternus, which defined papal primacy and infallibility. Under intense pressure from Pope Pius IX, Gregory II reluctantly assented to the document on Feb. 8, 1872 only upon the addition of the qualifier, ". . . all rights and privileges of the patriarchs being respected."

The Melkite Church played a significant role at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The Melkite Patriarch Maximos IV (Sayegh) condemned the latinization of the Eastern Catholic Churches in forceful terms, and urged a greater receptivity to Eastern Christian traditions, especially in ecclesiology. The cause to which Maximos IV (Sayegh) devoted his life was the unity between Christians of the East and Christians of the West. For him, the celebration of Vatican II was the culmination of his life and patriarchal leadership.

Since the early 1990s, the Melkite Church and its orthodox counterpart, the Antiochene Orthodox Church have engaged in closer rapprochement. A bilateral commission was set up in 1995 to explore avenues of healing the 1724 schism. As relations improved, the Antiochene patriarch invited the Melkite Patriarch Maximos V (Hakim) to address a meeting of the Antiochene Synod in 1996. Since that date, the Melkite Synod has supported the idea of an eventual reintegration into the Orthodox Church of Antioch in the event of a reconciliation between the Orthodox and Catholic Churches.

The Melkite Church continues to witness great growth in the Middle East and the diaspora. The majority of her faithful live in Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, Israel, Jordan, Egypt and neighboring countries. Significant emigration has resulted in flourishing Melkite communities in the U.S., Europe and Australia. Besides the three Patriarchal Sees of Damascus, Cairo and Jerusalem, there are four eparchial sees in Syria: Aleppo, Hauran, Homs, and Lattakiah; seven in Lebanon: Baalbeck, Beirut, Marjeyoun, Sidon, Tripoli, Tyre, and Zahleh; and one respectively in Haifa, Palestine; in Sao Paulo, Brasil; in Newton, United States; in Montreal, Canada; in Sydney, Australia; in Mexico City, Mexico; and in Caracas, Venezuela. There are Melkite communities present in Iraq, Kwait, Italy, Belgium, Argentina, France, and Great Britain

MELLERAY, ABBEY OF

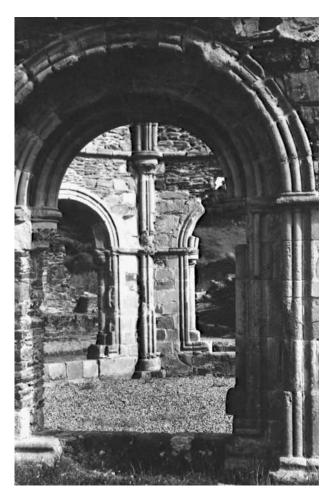

Trappist monastery in the diocese of Nantes, Brittany. It was founded in 1145 by CISTERCIANS from Pontron Abbey, Anjou. Melleray declined after it was granted in commendam (1544), and although the strict observance was later introduced, there were only three monks in 1768. After its suppression (1791), the property was purchased by TRAPPISTS of Lulworth, England (1817). By 1829 the community of 59 had increased to 192. They founded MOUNT MELLERAY in Ireland (1833), GETHES-MANI ABBEY in the United States (1848), and a monastery in Algeria. Abbot Eugene Vachette (1875–1919) became vicar-general of LA TRAPPE and aided in uniting the three Trappist congregations into the order of Reformed Cistercians. John Baptist Ollitrault de Kéryvallen, his successor, became abbot-general in 1923. The community decreased between the world wars, but flourished later under Dom Columban Bissey.

MELLIFONT, ABBEY OF

CISTERCIAN monastery, County Louth, Diocese of Armagh, Ireland, founded in 1142 by SS. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX and MALACHY of Armagh. Its first abbot was Christian O Connairche. The generatio Mellifontis rose to 25 monasteries. After the Anglo-Norman invasion, regular observance declined. A complete breakdown of monastic discipline led to the visitation of Stephen de LEXINTON in 1228, which deprived Mellifont of her filiations until 1274. Discipline restored, the abbey flourished until the 15th century when it became relaxed, but abbots Roger Boley (c. 1471–1486) and John Troy (1486–1501) reformed the house. This community, however, which numbered 110 persons in 1228, comprised only 15 when the abbey was suppressed (1539). A line of titular abbots was maintained until 1718. Part of the old abbey lands

(in Collon) was acquired by the TRAPPISTS of MOUNT MEL-LERAY ABBEY in 1938, and Mellifont was reborn, becoming an abbey in 1945. Remains of the original monastery include the chapterhouse, part of the cloister arcade, and a unique lavabo.

MELLITUS OF CANTERBURY, ST.

Benedictine (?) monk, first bishop of London and third archbishop of Canterbury; d. April 24, 624. Possibly abbot of St. Andrew's monastery, Rome, he was sent by Pope GREGORY I THE GREAT with the second group of missionaries to England (601). Having been consecrated bishop of the East Saxons by AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY in 604, he established his see in London, where ST. PAUL'S was built as his cathedral. He revisited Rome on church business and attended a council there on Feb. 27, 610. During the pagan reaction (c. 617) he was expelled from London and took refuge in Gaul. He returned a year later but was unable to resume his position among the East Saxons, who were to require reconversion a generation later. He succeeded Abp. LAWRENCE OF CANTERBURY after Feb. 2, 619, and as archbishop is reputed to have saved his see from destruction by averting a fire with prayer. He was buried in the church of SS. Peter and Paul, Canterbury.

Feast: April 24.

MELROSE, ABBEY OF

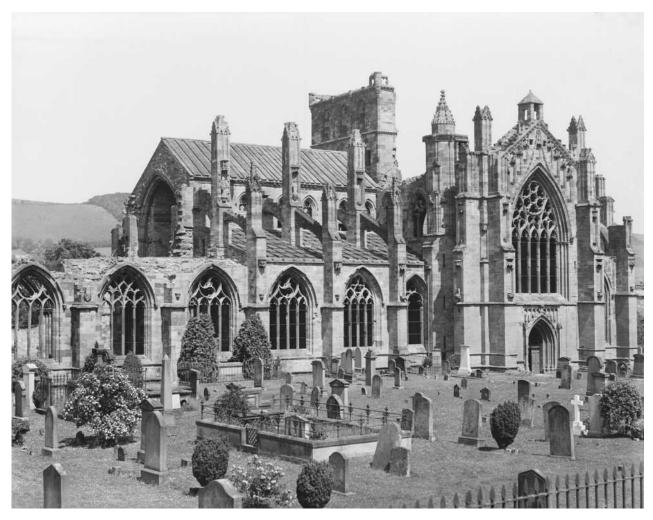

Former Cistercian monastery in Melrose, Scotland. The first CISTERCIAN monastery in Scotland and the first daughterhouse of RIEVAULX, it was founded by King DAVID I in 1136 beside the river Tweed, a few miles distant from the Columban monastery founded c. 650 and memorable for its abbots, SS. AIDAN, Eata, Boisil, and CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE. The choice of the new site foreshadowed the royal policy of supplanting the Celtic church with the Roman, the creation of dioceses, the introduction of religious orders, and the adoption of the rite and liturgy of the Continental system. The earliest buildings, conforming to the simple, severe style enjoined by the Cistercian rule, were not completed until 1146, when the church was dedicated to the Virgin Mary. Melrose founded the Abbeys of NEWBATTLE, Kindloss, Holmcultram, Cupar, and BALMERINO. The abbey's situation on the Roman road from England to Tweeddale and central Scotland was advantageous in times of peace, but disastrous during the continuous wars that lasted from the reign of King Edward I to that of Queen Elizabeth. The abbey was pillaged by Edward II in 1322; from 1346 to 1389 it was in English hands, during which time the church was burned in 1385; in 1544 and 1545 the abbey was again sacked, this time by the troops of HENRY VIII, and by 1556 the buildings were in ruins; by 1570 much of the fabric had been cast down and plundered. In spite of the repeated raids, restoration and rebuilding went on; royal favor and generous benefaction facilitated repair and reconstruction. As it now stands, the abbey church belongs to the latter half of the 14th century and the first half of the 15th, a magnificent example of the late Decorated and early Perpendicular. Romanticized by Sir Walter Scott, it is perhaps not "the most splendid piece of later medieval architecture in Scotland," being somewhat cold, formal, and overelaborate-evidence of the extent to which the Cistercians had discarded the austere simplicity enjoined in their statutes. What remained of the church was, in 1618, adapted for use as a parish church and so continued until 1810. In 1919 the abbey was presented to the nation by the duke of Buccleuch and is now a national monument. The medieval abbots were granted the miter in 1391; many held high office in Church and state. The honorary title of abbot of Melrose seems to have been used only once, when it was bestowed upon the learned Juan CARAMUEL LOBKOWITZ (1606-82), later vicar general of the Cistercian Order in Great Britain.

MELUN, ARMAND DE

A major figure in the Catholic social movement of 19th-century France; b. Brametz (Aisne), Sept. 24, 1807; d. Paris, June 24, 1877. He belonged to the cadet branch of the De Melun family and remained faithful to the ideals of the Legitimists until 1830. The influence of Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS, Père LACORDAIRE, MON-TALEMBERT, and Anne Sophie Swetchine directed his attention to the SOCIAL QUESTION. In 1838 he became one of the directors of the Amis de l'Enfance, the first of his innumerable activities in behalf of the indigent and the dispossessed. He carefully rejected the suggestion of Abp. Denis Auguste Affre that he enter orders, believing it important that his charitable work be that of a layman, especially in view of his high social status. Beginning in 1845 he published the important journal Annales de la Charité, which supported state responsibility to alleviate want as a general obligation rather than through individual charity. In 1847 he founded the Société d'Économie Charitable, which enlisted the support of the elite in France's public life and Catholic thought. In time the society participated significantly in the international congresses at Malines. Taking advantage of the social posture of NAPOLEON III, Melun played a major role in the formation of Catholic Sociétés de Sécours Mutuels in Paris and in the provinces. Throughout his long career he gave energy and a conservative center to the Catholic social movement before the Third Republic. His Memoirs were posthumously published in 1890.

MELVILLE, ANDREW

Scottish Protestant divine; b. Baldovy, Aug. 1, 1545; d. Sedan, 1622. Melville was educated at Montrose grammar school and at the University of St. Andrews. In 1564 he left St. Andrews for Paris where he perfected his knowledge of Greek, studied Oriental languages, and attended the lectures of Peter Ramus, whose philosophical method and plan of teaching he afterward introduced into the universities of Scotland. Melville later studied law at Poitiers and, in the face of political troubles, sought refuge at Geneva where he was welcomed by Theodore BEZA (1569) and appointed to the chair of humanity in the academy of that city.

Upon returning to Scotland in 1574, Melville was appointed principal of Glasgow University, which had been largely reduced to ruin by the change of religion. There he expanded the scope of the university's teaching; the new chairs that he established were confirmed in 1577, in the Nova Erectio, the charter of James VI. He helped in the reconstitution of Aberdeen University in 1575 and, in 1580, he was appointed principal of St. Mary's College at St. Andrews. Melville was moderator of the General Assembly in 1582; and in the great issue of the day, the position of bishops in the Church of Scotland, he advocated a purely presbyterian system of Church government. The question became acute through the attempt of the court to force the acceptance of certain bishops on the reformed church. When summoned before the Privy Council in February 1584, Melville fled to England, but he returned after a few months and, in March of 1586, resumed his lectures at St. Andrews.

For the next 20 years he was the vigilant protagonist of the presbyterian system and the liberties of the Scottish Church. In 1606 Melville, with seven other clergy of the Scottish Church, was summoned to London in order 'that his majesty (James VI and I) might treat with them of such things as would tend to settle the peace of the Church.' Melville's overbearing assertion of the general assembly's independence of the Crown and his sarcastic Latin epigrams on the ritual of the royal chapel gave King James an excuse to commit Melville to the Tower where he was imprisoned for four years. He was released on condition that he accept a professional chair at the University of Sedan, where he taught for the last 11 years of his life.

Melville's intellectual gifts and his courage have never been in dispute, but like all autocrats, he identified his own will with the honor of Christ and His Church. His opposition to the Crown, however, grew into a legend and became the ideal that Scottish Presbyterians ever afterward admired. Melville is the true author of the presbyterian system of church government that has become an essential part of the established Church of Scotland.

MELVILLE, ANNABELLE MCCONNELL

Biographer, professor; b. Minotola, New Jersey, Feb. 3, 1910; d. Taunton, Massachusetts, May 17, 1991. Melville received the A.B. and M.A. degrees from Albany State Teachers College, New York. Having been converted to Catholicism in 1936, she pursued doctoral studies at the Catholic University of America and wrote a dissertation under the direction of John Tracy Ellis. Two years after she was awarded the Ph.D. degree, her work was published under the title Elizabeth Bayley

Seton, 1774–1821 (New York 1951; reprinted 1960) and fostered devotion to the woman who was to be the first native-born American canonized a saint. Subsequently she published John Carroll of Baltimore, Founder of the American Catholic Hierarchy (New York 1955), Jean Lefebvre de Cheverus, 1768–1836 (Milwaukee 1958); and Louis William DuBourg, Bishop of Louisiana and the Floridas, Bishop of Montauban, and Archbishop of Besançon, 1766–1833 (2 vols.; Chicago 1986). Melville was also a member of the original editorial committee for the John Carroll Papers and co-author with Ellin M. Kelly of Elizabeth Seton: Selected Writings (New York 1987) in the series "Sources of American Spirituality." She won the John Gilmary Shea Prize of the American Catholic Historical Association for her biography of Carroll and the General L. Kemper Williams Prize of the Louisiana Historical Society for her biography of DuBourg. Her writings were distinguished by her reliance on manuscripts collected through extensive research in Europe as well as in the United States, for her keen analysis of the sources, and for her graceful style.

Melville was appointed to the faculty of Saint Joseph's College in Emmitsburg, Maryland, in 1947. From 1953 to 1975 she taught British and American history at Bridgewater State College, Massachusetts, and in 1963 she was given the title of Commonwealth Professor. After her retirement she was a visiting professor at the Catholic University of America. She established a fund for the publication of monographs in a series later named "Melville Studies in Church History."

Melville was recognized for her scholarship in several ways. After being elected second vice-president of the American Catholic Historical Association twice (1960 and 1985), she was the first woman to be elected first vice-president (1988) and to succeed to the presidency (1989, the bicentennial of the establishment of the American hierarchy). Known for her gracious charm, sparkling wit, and deep faith, she was widely respected, admired, and loved.

MEMORARE

A prayer beginning, "Remember, O most gracious Virgin Mary." Of unknown authorship, it has been attributed to St. Augustine, to St. John Chrysostom, and with more reason to St. Bernard or to Claude Bernard, "poor priest" of Paris. Passages in sermons of St. Bernard echo the theme (PL 183:428), but none comes close to the actual wording of the Memorare. The manuscript tradition can be traced only to the 15th century. It appears as a section of a longer prayer in the Antidotarius animae of Nicolas Salicetus (1489). J. Wellinger included it, possibly as a separate invocation, in his Hortulus animae (1503). Claude Bernard (1588–1641) did much to popularize the Memorare, teaching it in hospitals and prisons, working miracles of grace through Mary's intercession. Bishop Hefele [Kirchenlexikon (1882), "Bernard, C."] assumed that because of the similarity of names, St. Bernard's was substituted for Père Bernard's. The Memorare first appeared in the 12th edition of the Raccolta (Rome 1849).

MEMORY IN ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL THOUGHT

In ancient and medieval thought, human memory was an object of consideration both as a phenomenon remarkable in itself and as an aid in education. The appreciation of it was expressed in discussion of the arts, of historical transmission, of education in the practice of rhetoric, and of psychology.

Role in Theory of Culture and the Arts. Memory was considered a basis of the poet's production, and as a measure of the public's capacity for adequate response to poetry. Mnemosyne, or Memory, was the daughter of Heaven and Earth, and as such was characterized as celestial permanence in transitory concreteness. She was mother of the nine Muses, daughters of Zeus, who were able to help men forget the sorrows of life (Hesiod, Theog. 53, 135). According to the rhapsodists, Memory preserved the hymns in which human experience was stored in school-trained minds and was thus the common mother of all the arts. She symbolized the individual and social traditions of ancient culture. Although Memory was thought to have had divine origin, she influenced terrestrial life. In the scientific discourse of Aristotle, memory was not personified; but reference was made to the fact that the plot of a tragedy, to be beautiful, must be limited in length and magnitude by the capacity of the hearer's memory (Poet. 1451a 5-6). In discussion of literary style the same law was applied to the length of the syntactical period (Aristotle, Rhetoric 3.9.3; Quintilian 9.4.125).

Role in Historical Continuity. The continuance of human personalities and institutions was owed to memory (μνήμη, memoria), a fact recognized throughout the OT and in historiography. Moreover, memory was dependent on oral tradition, written documents, and the repetition of actions. Oral tradition perpetuated events in the minds of men in such societies as that of the Druids (Caesar, Gall. 6.14.3). It is not a perfect instrument since the content transmitted is subject to change in the process (Thucydides 2.54.3). Preservation in writing, in that regard at least, was found more effectual, but it had the baneful educational effect of allowing the living memory to deteriorate (Plato, Phaedrus 275A; Caesar, Gall. 6.14.4). The periodical repetition of actions and of feasts in a community, as exemplified by the Eucharistic celebration and the honoring of saints' days, aided remembrance of history.

Education in Rhetoric. The student in ancient schools of rhetoric, after inventing, composing and wording his oration, memorized it before presenting it. Unlike natural memory, artificial memorization helped the mind to retain mnemonic material by an affective intensification of the mental images (Aristotle, Anim. 427b 19). The student was taught to distribute the mnemonic matter in a fixed order of points or headings (Gr. τόποι, Lat. loci) arranged in groups of five (Rhet. Her. 3.17.31) and taken, e.g., from geography (a landscape, a town) or architecture (peristyle, etc.). This conception of memory was based on an associative power in the soul (Aristotle, Memor. 452a 12). It influenced medieval mnemonics particularly among the Dominicans in the classrooms of Albert the Great and Thomas Aquinas, of Peter of Ravenna and Giordano Bruno. The system of points or headings was extended to many fields for the purpose of arranging vast complexes of thought. It is suggested in the five-part structure of literary and other works, such as the drama and the rosary.

Psychology. Memory figures in different systems as one of two or three psychological categories. As a faculty, it is opposed to an act of recollection by Plato (Philebus 34B), Aristotle (Memor. 453a 6), and Aquinas (In lib. de memor. 8.398). For Plato, cognition is a recollection of the forms seen by the soul in its preexistence (Phaedo 72E, Meno 81D; criticized by Arnobius, Nat. 2.24, and Augustine, Trin. 12.15). Even without the assumption of the preexistence of the soul, some innate notions actualized by recollection, not only of the soul generally but especially of the memory are acknowledged by Nemesius, who gives as example the existence of God (De natura 13), and by Augustine (Conf. 10.11). Memory extends to objects perceptible to sensation and to intelligible objects, both reproduced by memory-images (Aristotle, Memor. 450a; Aquinas, In lib. de memor. 2.320). Augustine, however, excludes memory-images of intelligible objects, these being, according to his doctrine, really present in the memory (Conf. 10.9).

Aristotle establishes a scale beginning with sensation and leading first to memory and then to experience, which is the basis of art and science (Anal. post. 100a; also Plutarch, Moralia 11, De placitis 4.11). Nemesius (De natura 13) localizes sensation, intellect, and memory in different parts of the brain. In Aristotle memory corresponds to past or absent, sensation to present, and hope to future objects (Memor. 449b, Rhet. 1.11.6–12; Aquinas, In lib. de memor. 1.309). Cicero subdivides the cardinal virtue of prudence into three parts by attributing memory to the past, intellect to the present, providence to the future (Inv. 2.53.160). Augustine (Trin. 14.11), Albert the Great (De bono 4.2), and Aquinas (ST 2a2ae, 48) share this Ciceronian scheme. Augustine extends the function of memory to self-consciousness and substitutes will or love for providence (Anima 4.7). He explains (Trin. 14.12) this psychological triad of memory, intellect, and will (love) as a symbol of the Trinity in the human soul, when the soul focuses these three functions on God. The three faculties are later discussed by Aquinas (Summa theologiae 1a, 79.6-7) and used in the famous prayer of St. Ignatius of Loyola, Suscipe Domine. By the medieval mystics, e.g., Bernard and the hymn Jesu dulcis memoria, memory is considered the ascetical means for obtaining the experience of Christ's mystical presence.

There are two classes of metaphor for memory. In one, memory is conceived as a wax tablet conserving impressions, which are interpreted as seals or letters (Plato, Theaet. 191C; Aristotle, Memor. 450a; Cicero, Tusc. 1.25.61). The conception of memory as a papyrus roll is analogous (Plutarch, De placitis 4.11). The metaphor of memory as space, on the other hand, appears under three forms. Memory is regarded as a storehouse of sensible perceptions and intelligible universals (Plato, Philebus 34A; Cicero, Ac. 2.10.30; Sextus Empiricus, Adv. math. 1.372; Aquinas, ST 1a, 79.7), as a landscape or room filled with the objects of memory distributed according to their places (Augustine, Conf. 10.8), or as a vessel (Cicero, Tusc. 1.25.61).

Etymologically, because of its connection with the root of the Greek verb $\mu\alpha$ iveo $\theta\alpha$ i (to rage, to rave), memory can be extended to include the human disposition to give mimetic and cathartic representation, through mental images, of past but unmastered experiences.

MENCIUS (MENGZI)

Philosopher, teacher, social thinker, and political theorist, venerated as the "Second Sage" of Rujiao (Confucianism) after CONFUCIUS (KONGFUZI); b. c. 372 B.C. in the state of Zou (Tsou) in modern-day Shandong province; d. c. 289 B.C. Mencius is the Latinized form of the Chinese Mengzi (Meng-tzu) or "Master Meng."

Mencius lived during the turbulent period of the Warring States (475–221 B.C.). An avid admirer of Confucius (Kongfuzi), he studied in the school founded by Confucius' grandson, Zisi (Tzu Ssu). In the treatise that bears his name, he elaborated upon the views of Confucius, defending them against scholars from rival schools. His unique contribution to the scholarly debate in particular, and Chinese philosophy in general, is his assertion on the goodness of the benxing, ("original human nature"). This assertion would not only undergird his entire philosophy and vision of life, but would eventually become the classical Confucian formulation on human nature (renxing). His proof was simple but elegant: he argued that the spontaneous and instinctive impulse of every person, however morally reprehensible, to save a child about to fall into a well is evidence of the presence of latent goodness inherent in that person, suggesting that the presence of goodness in human nature (Mencius 2A:6).

Correspondingly, Mencius insisted that selfish desires do not constitute the essence of benxing, explaining his position in the parable of "Ox Mountain" (Mencius 6A:8). In this parable, the Ox mountain is a metaphor for the totally evil person, devoid of any virtue. Just as it is natural for trees to grow on a mountain, so it is natural for incipient moral shoots to develop into moral virtues even in an evil person. Just as the constant felling of trees by axes and eating away of young shoots by cattle reduced the mountain to a hopeless barrenness, so the preoccupation with selfish thoughts and deeds destroys the incipient moral shoots in a person, precluding them from blossoming into virtues. Just as new shoots spring up if the mountain is left alone by woodcutters and livestock to rejuvenate, so too, new moral shoots spring up and blossom into virtues if given an opportunity to do in the evil person. And just as axes and livestock are not essential to the original nature of the mountain, so too, selfish desires do not constitute the benxing.

For Mencius, strictly speaking, a human is not a static sort of being, but a dynamic becoming striving toward sagehood. In his understanding, an infant is not born as an "individual," but rather, born into a framework of familial and socio-cultural relations that would shape and nurture that infant's benxing. At birth, the benxing, comprises the four virtuous tendencies of commiseration, shame, deference, and preference that are incipient, underdeveloped, and fragile. With proper education and self-cultivation, these tendencies could mature and blossom into the four cardinal virtues of "human-ness" (ren), appropriateness (yi), propriety (li), and wisdom (zhi) in a fully developed human nature (renxing; see Mencius 2A:6). The self-cultivation of these four defining virtues is a lifelong process of deepening one's familial and social relationships to their fullest potential within the classic Five Relations of parent-child, ruler-minister, husband-wife, old-young, and friend-friend (Mencius 3A:4). What is meant here is a relational, rather than an essential understanding of personhood that understands the progressive maturing of human nature within an interlocking matrix of reciprocal relations that, over a lifetime, defines one's character.

Mencius recognized the possibility that everyone has the potential to become a sage (shengren). He reasoned that if everyone has the same innate orientation toward goodness at birth, and the sages represented the perfection of renxing, then with the right education and self-cultivation anybody could become a sage. Later philosophers would build upon this vision of sagehood as a realizable goal, the end point and highest fulfillment of learning and self-cultivation.

In the realm of statecraft, Mencius advocated the way of humane government over and against the way of a despot, arguing that if a ruler is righteous and humane, his subjects too will be righteous and humane (Mencius 4A:18). He asserted that a true king is a humane king (Mencius 2A:3) who looks after the material, emotional and moral-ethical well-being of his subjects (Mencius 1A:5). He advocated fair taxes, reduced punishments, proper use of natural resources, welfare assistance for the old and disadvantaged, and communal sharing of resources (see Mencius 1A:5, 1A:7, 3A:3). He reminded rulers that they do not gain the loyalty of their subjects by threats and force, but by virtuous example and leadership (Mencius 2A:3). To the delight of the commonfolk, but risking the wrath of rulers, he proclaimed that in a state, the people are the most important, the spirits of the land and grain are the next, the ruler is of the least importance" (Mencius 7B:14). Mencius vision of the goodness of original human nature (benxing) became the foundation upon which later generations of Chinese scholars and philosophers would articulate their philosophical views. His advocacy of humane government and condemnation of despots have endeared him to every generation of commonfolk of China and other East Asian nations.

MENDEL, GREGOR JOHANN

Augustinian priest and biologist; b. Hyncice, Moravia, July 22, 1822; d. Brünn (now Brno, Czech Republic), Jan. 6, 1884. The only son of a peasant farmer, Mendel attended local schools and the Philosophic Institute at Olomouc. In 1843, he entered the Augustinian Order at St. Thomas Monastery in Brünn and began his theological studies at the Brünn Theological College. He was ordained to the priesthood on Aug. 6, 1847.

The Augustinians had been established in Moravia since 1350, and St. Thomas Monastery was a center of creative interest in the sciences and culture. Its members included well-known philosophers, a musicologist, mathematicians, mineralogists, and botanists who were heavily engaged in scientific research and teaching. The library contained precious manuscripts and incunabula, as well as textbooks about problems in the natural sciences. The monastery also held a mineralogical collection, an experimental botanical garden, and a herbarium. It was in this atmosphere, Mendel later wrote, that his preference for the natural sciences developed.

After his ordination, Mendel was assigned to pastoral duties, but it soon became apparent that he was more suited to teaching. In 1849, he was assigned to a secondary school in the city of Znaim, where he was well received by his students. However, when he took the qualifying state examination for teacher certification, he failed. Recognizing that Mendel was largely self-taught, one of his examiners recommended that he be sent for further studies in the natural sciences. The abbot agreed, and sent Mendel to the University of Vienna, where for two years (1851–1853) he attended lectures and seminars in the natural sciences and mathematics. It was there that he acquired the empirical, methodological, and scientific research skills that he was to apply to his later investigations. He returned to teaching in Brünn in 1854, but when two years later he again attempted the state certification examination, he became ill and withdrew. He did not pursue the examination further, but returned to Brünn in 1856 where he continued to teach part-time.

Mendel began his experiments after his return from Vienna. Using 34 different kinds of peas of the genus Pisum that had been tested for their genetic purity, he tried to determine whether it was possible to obtain new variants by crossbreeding. His research necessitated the use of thousands of experimental plants, and, by his own account, extended over eight years. Prior to Mendel, heredity was regarded as a "blending" process and the offspring essentially a "dilution" of the different parental characteristics. Mendel demonstrated that the appearance of different characters in heredity followed specific laws that could be determined by counting the diverse kinds of offspring produced from particular sets of crosses. He established two principles of heredity that are now known as the law of segregation and the law of independent assortment, thereby proving the existence of paired elementary units of heredity (factors) and establishing the statistical laws governing them. He was the first to understand the importance of statistical investigation and to apply a knowledge of mathematics to a biological problem.

Mendel's findings on plant hybridization were presented in two lectures before the Society for the Study of the Natural Sciences in Brünn in 1865. His paper, Versuche uber Pflanzen-Hybriden ("Experiments in Plant Hybridization"), was published in the society's Proceedings in 1866 and sent to 133 other associations of natural scientists and to the more important libraries in a number of different countries. His work, however, was largely ignored. In the spring of 1900, three botanists, Hugo de Vries (Holland), Karl Correns (Germany), and E. von Tschermak (Austria) reported independent verifications of Mendel's work, which amounted to a rediscovery of his first principle.

Mendel continued to conduct research in horticulture, apiculture, meteorology, and astronomy. He corresponded with Karl von Nageli who encouraged him to carry out his next series of experiments on various species of the genus Hieracium (hawkweed). Mendel was not able to replicate his findings because the hawkweed reproduces asexually from diploid tissue in the ovary (apomixis), producing clones of the parent. In 1869 he published a report that hinted that the results were different from those obtained for Pisum, but left the problem open for further research. The experiments caused such severe eyestrain and backaches that Mendel was obliged to interrupt his research for long periods of time.

On March 30, 1868, Mendel was elected abbot of St. Thomas Monastery. His new duties involved many civic responsibilities that took him away from his scientific work. Almost immediately he became involved in a confrontation with the government over the payment of past taxes. A new taxation law in 1874 increased the tax on the monasteries to cover the expenses of Church institutions. Mendel, alone among the monastery superiors, vigorously contested the tax and refused to recognize the validity of the law. He became isolated both in the monastery and in public life until his death. In his last years Mendel lived a solitary life. Just before his death he commented, "My scientific labors have brought me a great deal of satisfaction, and I am convinced that before long the entire world will praise the result of these labors."

His serene confidence, despite the lack of recognition his work received, was to be vindicated. Mendel is regarded as one of the great biologists of the nineteenth century and the inspiration for the science of genetics.

MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY, FELIX

Important composer in the romanticist style; b. Hamburg, Germany, Feb. 3, 1809; d. Leipzig, Nov. 4, 1847. Other given names were Jacob Ludwig, and he preferred the single surname Mendelssohn. Felix, a grandson of the Jewish philosopher Moses Mendelssohn, belonged to a wealthy, cultivated family, many of whose forebears had adopted Christianity in the generations before legal emancipation of German Jews in 1812. Yet his father, a deist, wrote Felix in 1829, "There can no more be a Christian Mendelssohn than there can be a Jewish Confucius. If Mendelssohn is your name you are ipso facto a Jew"-sentiments to which the Nazis would later subscribe all too heartily in banning Mendelssohn's "non-Aryan' music. Felix, however, along with his brother Paul and devoted sisters Fanny and Rebecca, became thoroughly, if somewhat ambivalently, assimilated into the German Protestant culture of the romanticist era, although his Jewish background occasionally created problems that had traumatic repercussions on his personality (otherwise admirably balanced) and ultimate historical position. Nevertheless his musical genius, versatility, personal charm, and unflagging industry carried him through a series of triumphs as pianist, violinist, conductor, administrator, gentleman of letters, artist, linguist, and "composer in royal service" to the kings of Saxony and Prussia. On intimate terms with Goethe, student (in aesthetics) under Hegel, favorite of Queen Victoria (he made ten tours of England), friend of Chopin, the Schumanns, and countless others of high eminence, he remained essentially the loving son, husband, and father, the ethical man in search of eternal values.

The Octet (Opus 20) composed at 16 and the Overture to Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream at 17 reveal a Mozartean fluency and grace that were yet of his own time. They hold a permanent place in the repertory, along with the Violin Concerto (1844), the "Hebrides" Overture, and the "Italian," "Scotch," and "Reformation" symphonies, as major achievements of a composer who, soon after his untimely death at 39, lost general favor, but is now the subject of widespread reappraisal.

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

Mendelssohn's consistent interest in religious music of the past (including Palestrina) inspired his celebrated performance at age 20, the first in modern times, of J. S. Bach's St. Matthew Passion (1829) and influenced numerous works of his own for both Protestant and Catholic liturgies. Among the latter are an early Tu es Petrus (1827), three motets for Trinità dei Monti in Rome (1830), and the important but neglected Lauda Sion (for the Eucharistic Congress at Liège, 1846). The oratorios St. Paul (1836) and Elijah (his masterpiece, 1846) have had notable influence on sacred choral style both in England and the U.S.

MÉNDEZ, RAMÓN IGNACIO

Venezuelan archbishop and patriot, defender of the rights of the Church against the encroachments of the civil government; b. Barihas, Venezuela, 1775; d. Villeta, Colombia, August 1839. In the Royal Pontifical University of Caracas, he received the degrees of licentiate and doctor of philosophy in theology and in canon and civil law, and the title of lawyer. During several periods, he was a professor of both civil and canon law. In 1797 he was ordained and went to serve as parish priest in Barinas. In 1802 he was named vicar-general of the Diocese of Mérida, which he had occasion to govern several times. He taught canon law in the Collegiate Seminary of St. Bonaventure in Mérida; and, after being appointed rector in 1805, he obtained for the institution the right to confer graduate degrees in philosophy, theology, and Canon Law.

Among the patriots in Venezuela favoring independence from Spain in 1810 were many priests, including Méndez. He was named deputy to the Constituent Assembly in 1811 by the province of Barinas. As a signer of the Declaration of Independence, he was one of the founders of the nation. As he visited the towns in the llanos entrusted to his spiritual care, he also acted as a courier for Bolívar during the campaign of 1813. He was also a chaplain in the patriot armies, with Páez in 1816 and later with Bolívar in Guayana. He served as a deputy in the congresses of Angostura and of Cúcuta and in the congress in Bogotá from 1823 to 1826. Such activities did not interfere with his priestly duties. He was archdeacon of the cathedral of Caracas and maestrescuela in the cathedral of Bogotá. He was chosen archbishop of Caracas in 1823 with the full approval of Bolívar, who appreciated his talents, his patriotism, and his priestly character. He was consecrated on Feb. 18, 1828, and Caracas enthusiastically received its new archbishop whom it recognized also as a hero of the revolution.

The 1830 Venezuelan constitution denied certain rights and liberties of the Church, and Archbishop Méndez pointed out changes that would have to be made in it before he could swear to the constitution. Since his suggestions were not accepted, he refused to take the oath and was immediately expelled from the country. The bishops of Mérida and Guayana made common cause with him and they too were exiled. Within a year and a half, the exile was ended because "the Chief Executive had agreed to a means by which we might be able to swear by the Constitution of the State without contradicting the duties of our holy office," according to the archbishop's explanation. Late in 1836 another politicalreligious conflict arose. The government, in an arbitrary use of the Law of Patronage—without an agreement with the Holy See—established budgetary allowances for the offices of the dean and archdeacon of the cathedral and presented the candidates for the positions. The archbishop considered those allowances unacceptable and refused to install the would-be dignitaries. Again the government expelled the archbishop. For almost three years he lived on the island of St. Thomas and later in Curação. Because of his ill health, he then traveled to Colombia, where he died upon arriving near Bogotá. In 1942 his remains were placed in the National Pantheon in Caracas among the heroes of the nation. His published writings include Exposición sobre el patronato eclesiástico (Caracas 1830), Observaciones sobre el proyecto de constitución (Caracas 1830), and Reflexiones a sus diocesanos sobre varieo errores (Caracas 1832, 1834).

MÉNDEZ MONTOYA, JESÚS, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. June 10, 1880, Tarímbaro, Michoacán, Archdiocese of Morelia, Mexico; d. Feb. 5, 1928, Morelia. Jesús completed his seminary studies in Michoacán and was ordained (1906). His ministry in various parishes centered on the confessional, the sick, lay groups, and the poor. He also taught music and formed a magnificent choir. At the time of his death, he was pastor of Valtierrilla, Guerrero, Archdiocese of Morelia. Having exhausted every legal recourse to counter the anti-religious laws of Calles, many took up arms. Federal soldiers entered Valtierrilla to suppress a small group of Cristeros. The soldiers found the house where Méndez was hiding; they took him to the town square and shot him repeatedly. Fr. Méndez was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MA-GALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, ss.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

MENDICANT ORDERS

So called from mendicare, to beg; orders of religious that, when founded, were committed by vow to the renunciation of all possessions, common as well as individual. Since the Council of Trent (Session 25, ch.3; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta, 753), however, most of the mendicant orders are permitted to hold goods in common; and there have also been papal concessions to the communal poverty of the Franciscan Conventuals. The Canon Law, of course, still recognizes the original status and privileges of the mendicants; e.g., those orders "which are called Mendicant by institution and are such in fact" have the right in law "to quest," i.e., to gather alms, in any diocese in which they possess a house. Mendicants are subject only to their own religious superior (Codex iuris canonici, c. 621.1).

At its origins the mendicant movement grew out of the religious and economic conditions of the late 12th and early 13th centuries. For, as an urban economy gradually replaced that of FEUDALISM, the newly emerging townships or communes were soon in conflict with an entrenched clergy that, by way of defense, often resorted to punitive measures that on occasion deprived whole towns of the sacraments for long periods. Further, as a prosperous bourgeoisie developed, the poorer classes eagerly turned to those who, like John Valdes and his Poor Men of Lyons (see WALDENSES), were preaching that clerical affluence was a contradiction of the Gospel. About the same time as unlicensed preachers took the road to proclaim poverty, movements doctrinally more dangerous, such as those of the CATHARI and ALBIGENSES, were sweeping southern France and northern Italy. The various legates, crusades, and missionaries sent out in the name of the Church to bring these movements to heel made no lasting impression; but an answer in kind soon appeared in the Italian FRANCIS OF ASSISI, uniting poverty to obedience, and the Spaniard Dominic Guzman, allying learning and apostolic zeal.

After the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (1215) and its pastoral reforms, the Brethren (Fratres: hence Friars) of Dominic and Francis blossomed into orders of great influence, academically as well as pastorally. They were followed later by the CARMELITES (1245) and the AUGUSTINIANS (1256), together forming the four mendicant orders approved by the second Council of LYONS in 1274

(Session 23; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta, 302–303). To these the SERVITES were added some 150 years later; while in 1578 Gregory XIII recognized other orders as mendicants, e.g., the MINIMS, JESUATI, TRINITARIANS, and MERCEDARIANS.

From their beginning the mendicants have enjoyed a steady ecclesiastical popularity, marred now and then by an outburst such as that of Abp. RICHARD FITZRALPH of Armagh c. 1350, or by the celebrated action in France against the Friars in the second half of the 13th century. In 1253 the refusal of the DOMINICANS and FRANCISCANS to support a strike at the University of PARIS was the occasion of a spirited attack from the Faculty of Theology, led by WILLIAM OF SAINT-AMOUR. The Friars were ably defended by apologists such as THOMAS AQUINAS and BONAVENTURE; but a more radical campaign was opened by the bishops of France after Clement IV had renewed in 1267 the Friars' privilege of preaching, hearing confessions, and accepting burials, without having to seek the consent of diocesans. For if William of Saint-Amour simply saw the Friars as disruptive of a divinely arranged division of the ministers of the Church into seculars and monks, the bishops, on the other hand, felt that the papacy, by thus granting exemption to the mendicants, was in effect curtailing the jurisdiction of bishops over the pastoral care, if not tampering with the essential structure, of the Church. The problem was largely resolved in 1300 when Boniface VIII in the bull Super cathedram (Corpus iuris canonici clementinae 3.7.2; Friedberg 2.1162-64) limited the scope of the mendicants' privilege, ordering, for example, that licenses should be obtained from diocesans when Friars wished to preach or to hear confessions.

MENDIETA, GERÓNIMO DE

Franciscan missionary and author; b. Vitoria, Spain, 1525; d. Mexico, 1604. Mendieta took the Franciscan habit in Spain at an early age. In 1554 he arrived in Mexico where, with the exception of one trip to Spain, he devoted his long life to missionary labors among the native people. He also served as private secretary to several provincial superiors. One of the last flowerings of that brand of medieval Franciscan mysticism, whose two apexes were the image of the Apocalypse and the sanctification of "apostolic poverty," can be found in his Historia eclesiástica indiana. His temperamental inclination toward this tradition was intensified by the severe demographic crisis through which Mexico was then passing. Mendieta was a man of his times. His ideas, in themselves, were not novel. His talent for turning a phrase, however, made him more articulate in voicing those ideas, and his temperamental inclination for extremes impelled him to state his case in hyperboles. He was not alone, for example, in interpreting the age of discovery and colonization as an apocalyptical event. Yet nowhere can we find in the writings of other contemporaries a more systematic and more eloquent formulation of the proposition: the New World is the end of the world.

Mendieta's idealized conception of the native Mexican is rooted in the traditions of 13th-century Franciscan mysticism, yet his native also foreshadows the Noble Savage of the Enlightenment. His millennialism was, in reality, an other-worldly formulation of an ideal that received many secularized expressions in the 18th century and afterwards. Since America lacked the dead weight of tradition of Europe, the New World was the geographical theater where ideals of the Old World could be perfected by being applied.

Articulately resentful of Philip II's policy of favoring the secular clergy over the friars (which in his opinion contributed to the destruction of the "terrestrial paradise" that the Franciscans were beginning to organize among the native people) Mendieta was sharply critical of Philip II's reign. He was even more critical of the colonists' exploitation of native labor, which he ascribed to their unmitigated avarice. It was these attitudes that largely account for the Historia eclesiástica's not being published until Joaquín García Icazbalceta did so in 1870.

MENDOZA, PEDRO GONZÁLEZ DE

Cardinal archbishop of Toledo, statesman, and author; b. Guadalajara, May 3, 1428; d. Guadalajara, Jan. 11, 1495. Son of the Marquis of Santillana, he took his doctorate in law at the University of Salamanca (1452); he became bishop of Calahorra (Nov. 28, 1453) and Sigüenza (Oct. 30, 1467) and in 1473 cardinal and chancellor of Castile. After serving John II and Henry IV, he supported ISABELLA with his episcopal and family influence against her brother Henry IV and her niece Juana. His support in the Battle of Toro (1476) enabled her to secure the throne. She retained him as chancellor of Castile and cardinal deacon of Santa María in Dominica, and named him archbishop of Seville (May 9, 1474), cardinal priest of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme (July 6, 1478), and archbishop of Toledo (Nov. 13, 1482). Mendoza negotiated the constitutional aspects of Isabella's marriage with Ferdinand V of Aragon in 1474, supported them in the Conquest of Granada, and encouraged Columbus. He served as their chief adviser for so long that he was called "the third king of Spain." A typical Renaissance prelate, magnificent, luxurious, and morally lax, he patronized the new learning; translated Homer, Ovid, and Vergil into Spanish; and encouraged authors and scholars such as Gómez Manrique and PETER MARTYR D'ANGHIERA. He also wrote a catechism, organized the visitation of his dioceses, and founded (1484) the college of Santa Cruz at Valladolid for poor students. He left his fortune to the foundling hospital he had established in Toledo. He recommended XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS as his successor in Toledo.

MENÉNDEZ, JOSEFA, SISTER

Mystic and Religious of the Sacred Heart; b. Madrid, Feb. 4, 1890; d. Poitiers, Dec. 29, 1923. Sister Josefa, of humble parentage, made a promise of virginity on the day of her First Communion. At the School of Arts and Crafts in Madrid, she became a skilled needlewoman, and when her father became an invalid, she supported the family by dressmaking. Her attempts to become a Religious of the Sacred Heart, to which society she had long felt drawn, were thwarted several times; however, in 1910 she was accepted by Les Feuillants, a house of the society in Poitiers.

She led an obscure life there, working in the kitchen and linen room. Lack of knowledge of French made communication with others difficult, but she was a cheerful, deft, and untiring worker eager to help anyone. On July 16, 1922, she made her first vows and returned to her simple tasks. With the exception of a month spent at Marmoutiers and another short period in Rome, she spent the remaining 18 months of her life at Poitiers. After a short illness, she made her final profession on the day she was anointed.

Soon after Josefa's death, the depth of her inner life and the fact of her visionary communication with the Sacred Heart came to light. Diabolic temptations had alternated with frequent visits from the Sacred Heart, the Blessed Virgin, and St. Madeleine Sophie. She had been ordered to take notes and to submit them to her superiors. On her vow day in 1922, Christ had appeared to her "divinely beautiful, His heart flooded with light."

Her "message" was published posthumously, first partially [Un appel à l'amour. Soeur Josefa Menéndez (Toulouse 1938)], and then in its entirety [Le message du Coeur de Jésus au monde et sa messagère soeur Josefa Menéndez (Toulouse 1944)]. The burden of the message was that she should forget herself so that she might be the apostle of God's goodness and remind souls that the hour of justice had not yet approached and mercy might still prevail. Fidelity, sacrifice, suffering, and prayer are its keynotes.

MENESES, JUAN FRANCISCO

Chilean priest, politician, and educator; b. Santiago, 1785; d. there, 1860. He studied at San Felipe University and received the licentiate in canon and civil law in 1804. His strong character and unyielding defense of the royal prerogative won him office as attorney general and secretary to the last two Spanish governors. During the independence movement his attitude toward the patriots Ovalle and Rojas (1810) earned him the hostility of the Creoles. His loyalty to Spain during the independence movement brought him to power during the short period of the Spanish reconquest (1814–17). The victory of José San Martín at Chacabuco (1817) forced him to emigrate to Peru. His wife's early death so affected this fervent Catholic that he decided to embrace the religious life; he studied theology at Cuzco. In 1821 he was allowed to return to Chile, where he swore allegiance to the republican regime. After his ordination in 1822, his career was as brilliant in the Church as in politics. A preacher of great force and logic, he was pastor and vicar of Los Andes (1823) and dean of the cathedral. He was elected to Congress as deputy at large in 1823, and was successively reelected by Aconcagua. As a senator from 1830 to 1849, he was noted for his tireless work on commissions. He was one of the signers of the constitution in 1833. He held the ministries of interior, of foreign affairs, and of the treasury. Despite the liberal opposition that always remembered his royalist past, he held the high office of rector of the National Institute. The historian Amunátegui Solar has noted his contributions to pedagogy. He reformed the teaching of Latin, introduced scientific programs of study, reestablished the Forensic Academy, and maintained a very strict academic discipline. He became dean of the faculty of theology when the University of Chile was founded in 1842.

MENGARINI, GREGORIO

Missionary, philologist; b. Rome, July 21, 1811; d. Santa Clara, Calif., Sept. 23, 1886. After entering the Jesuit novitiate on Oct. 28, 1828, he taught grammar in Italian Jesuit colleges for several years. Following his ordination in March 1840 he responded to Bp. Joseph Rosati's plea for priests to serve the Flathead people. In the company of the Rev. Pierre DE SMET and other missionaries, Mengarini journeyed to Fort Hall, Idaho, in 1841. From there Flathead guides took them to St. Mary's Mission, Montana. Difficulties with the Blackfeet forced St. Mary's to close in 1850, and Mengarini was transferred to the Oregon mission at St. Paul. Sent to California, he helped to found the College of Santa Clara; he remained at the college until his death, serving as an instructor of modern languages and filling various administrative posts. Mengarini maintained a continuing interest in the Flathead language after the publication in 1861 of his classic Salish or Flathead Grammar; Grammatica linguae Salicae. He compiled A Dictionary of the Kalispel or Flathead Indian Language (2 v. 1877-79) and furnished material on Salish dialects for John Wesley Powell's Contributions to American Ethnology (1877). Mengarini's reminiscences appeared in Woodstock Letters (1888).

MENNAS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Patriarch of Constantinople 536 to 552; b. Alexandria, c. 500; d. Constantinople, August 552. Mennas first came into prominence as a priest and director of the xenodochium, or pilgrim hospice, of St. Samson in Constantinople. On the deposition of ANTHIMUS OF TREBIZOND, protégé of Theodora, he was selected and personally consecrated patriarch of Constantinople on March 13, 536, by Pope AGAPETUS, present in the Byzantine capital on a political mission.

The pope died there April 22, and on May 2 Mennas held a synod in which, with five Italian bishops present, he excommunicated Anthimus. In collaboration with the Roman deacon PELAGIUS (later pope) he urged JUSTINIAN I to condemn ORIGENISM, and early in 543 the emperor promulgated such an edict, which was signed by all the patriarchs, including the pope. When, by way of reprisal, Bishop THEODORE ASCIDAS persuaded Justinian to condemn the THREE CHAPTERS, Mennas signed the edict under protest, but encouraged his suffragans to sign. The papal apocrisiarius Stephen broke communion with the patriarch, and Pope VIGILIUS, summoned to Constantinople by the emperor, did likewise on his arrival on Jan. 25, 547. Five months later the pope and patriarch were reconciled (June 29, 547) when the pope acceded to the emperor and condemned the Three Chapters. Vigilius later addressed to Mennas a letter to this effect, the Judicatum, of April 11, 548. Upon the violent opposition of the Western bishops to the pope's action, Justinian was persuaded to allow Vigilius to abolish the Judicatum, which was returned to him by Mennas, whose name together with the pope's had been inscribed on the DIPTYCHS in January 550.

In the winter of 551, Vigilus escaped from imperial custody and took refuge in the Church of St. Euphemia in Chalcedon, having broken relations with the patriarch and the emperor over renewed agitation concerning the Three Chapters. In June of 552, Mennas and the episcopal entourage were sent by Justinian to make due apology to the pope, who then reentered communion with them on June 26. In August 552 Mennas died.

While he had been a determined opponent of both Nestorianism and MONOPHYSITISM, his position as patriarch under Justinian's rule had been most difficult, and he had yielded to the concept of caesaropapism in the Synod of 536, having stated: "It is proper that no questions agitated in the Holy Church should be settled without the advice and command" of the emperor.

MENNI FIGINI, BENEDETTO, ST.

Baptized Angelo Ercolino (Angel Hercules) Menni, priest of the Hospitallers of Saint John of God and founder of the Hospitaller Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus; b. Milan, Italy, March 11, 1841; d. Dinan, northern France, April 24, 1914.

As one of the fifteen children of Luigi Menni and Luisa Figini, Angelo learned charity at home. He gave up his job as a bank clerk to serve the soldiers wounded in the Battle of Magenta. He joined the Brothers of St. John of God (1860) and was ordained priest in Rome (1866). In 1867, he was sent to Spain to revitalize the order following its suppression by anticlerical laws. Despite threats to his life and temporary expulsion, he founded a children's hospital in Barcelona (1867). His work over the next thirty-six years with the elderly, abandoned children, polio victims, and the mentally ill attracted many others with vocations, allowing him to open and staff twenty-two hospitals in Spain, Portugal, and Mexico, thus restoring the Hospitallers' work in Latin America.

In 1880, Menni founded the Hospitaller Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus in Ciempozuelos (near Madrid, Spain) with María Josefa Recio and María Angustias Gimenez, who established a psychiatric hospital in Granada (1881). The female branch of the Hospitallers spread throughout Europe and to Africa, Asia, and Latin America. Menni later served as apostolic visitor (1909–11) and prior general (1911) before resigning due to ill health in 1912. His body rests in the motherhouse chapel of the Hospitaller Sisters in Madrid.

Menni was both beatified (June 23, 1985) and canonized (Nov. 21, 1999) by Pope John Paul II. In 2001 Menni was proposed as the universal patron of volunteers because he "discovered his vocation precisely when he was engaged in volunteer work in Milan" (John Paul II, canonization homily).

Feast: April 24.

MENNONITE CHURCHES

Christian churches named after Menno Simons (c. 1496–1561), known first as ANABAPTISTS during the 16th century. After originating as a wing of the REFORMATION in Switzerland in 1525, the movement spread into various countries. Melchior HOFMANN transplanted Anabaptism via Emden (1530) into the Low Countries, where for a few decades it became the most outstanding Reformation effort. Most significant among the leaders of the North was Menno Simons, a Roman Catholic priest who joined the movement in 1536. Through his writings and preaching, he gathered the peaceful, persecuted believers who came mostly from the Sacramentarian movement. He traveled extensively in the Low Countries and the Cologne and Vistula River areas, and he found temporary shelter near Emden and a permanent home and printshop at Oldesloe near Hamburg. Among his closest coworkers were Dirk Philips and Leenaert Bouwens.

Basic Views. For the most part Mennonitism of the North and the South had a common basis of faith. It was a wing of the Reformation with a stronger emphasis on the use of the Bible and the spiritualization of the Sacraments and the worship practices of the Catholic Church. Characterized by voluntary church membership entered into by adults only through the act of Baptism upon confession of faith, it emphasized a personally dedicated and disciplined Christian life. From the beginning, the movement had a strong sense of mission, which suffered considerably during the many decades of persistent persecution, resulting in the withdrawal of the group into isolated areas of various countries, and often leading to stagnation of the spiritual and cultural life of this church of martyrs.

Spread and Development. Basic and unique views, severe persecution, and isolation resulted in the development of peculiar characteristics among some Mennonites. They became outstanding pioneers in agriculture in Switzerland, Alsace, South Germany, the Low Countries, the Vistula area, Poland, Russia, the American prairie states and Canadian provinces of North America, as well as Mexico and South America. In the Netherlands and northwest Germany, Mennonites also made significant contributions to the fishing, silk, and cotton industries and as business people. There, their traditional isolation from the culture of the country in which they lived was overcome during the 17th and 18th centuries. The Mennonites of the Netherlands were organized in a conference (Algemeene Doopsgezinde Societeit) in 1811. They are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The Mennonites of Germany are not so unified as the Dutch. The urban churches (Krefeld, Emden, Hamburg, Danzig, Berlin) differ from the rural congregations of West Prussia, the Palatinate, Hesse, and particularly of Baden and Bavaria. They all sponsor publications and mission and relief work. The Vereinigung der deutschen Mennonitengemeinden is a member of the World Council of Churches. The congregations of East Germany, Poland, and Galicia were wiped out during World War II. The refugees from these countries found new homes in West Germany, Canada, and Uruguay.

Invited by Catherine the Great, Mennonites from the Vistula area migrated to the Ukraine starting in 1788. From the Chortitza and the Molotschna settlements, they spread into other parts of European and Asiatic Russia, making a significant contribution to the development of the agriculture and industry of the country. The first migration of Mennonites from Russia, Poland, and Prussia to the United States and Canada took place between 1873 and 1882. A second and third migration to Canada, Paraguay, Brazil, and Uruguay followed between 1923 and 1930 and during and after World War II. The remaining Mennonites of the Ukraine were transplanted into the northern and eastern parts of Soviet Russia; many of them perished in concentration camps at the height of communist rule.

Emigration to America. Among the early settlers of New York were some Dutch Mennonites. Cornelis Pieter Plockhoy settled at Delaware with a group of Dutch Mennonites in 1664. Thirteen Quaker-Mennonite families from Krefeld, Germany, founded German-town near Philadelphia in 1683. It became the gateway for a Swiss and Palatinate immigration spreading into Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ontario, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, etc. Among the famous pioneers was the educator Christopher Dock.

Between 1873 and 1882 the first immigrants (18,000) from Russia, Poland, and Prussia settled in the prairie states and provinces between Kansas and Manitoba. They were instrumental in introducing the hard winter wheat. After World War I, some 21,000 Mennonites from Russia went to Canada, and some 4,000 to Brazil and Paraguay, where some Mennonites from Manitoba had previously settled in the Chaco. After World War II, approximately 14,000 went from Russia, Poland, and West Prussia, to Canada, Paraguay, and Uruguay. Within the United States and Canada, the Mennonites originally followed the move from the East to the West, and in the 20th century the move from the rural to the urban and industrial areas has continued.

Organizations. The Mennonite Churches of North America have their own colleges, Christian high schools, conference headquarters, publishing houses and papers. Mission work was started in 1880 among the Native Americans and later overseas. Originally, the language in worship and home was German or a German dialect. Now, English is used almost exclusively. The American religious revivals and other factors have influenced the Mennonites and caused the introduction of Sunday schools, higher education, mission work, and the abstinence movement. Originally scattered and divided into many religious and cultural groups, they now belong to a number of ecclesial affiliations, among which the largest is the Mennonite Church, itself a merger of the Mennonite Church and the General Conference Mennonite Church in 2001. The most conservative among the various Mennonite churches are the Old Order AMISH CHURCHES and the Old Order (Wisler) Mennonite Church. Most of the Mennonites of all countries are members of the Mennonite World Conference.

One principal characteristic that the Mennonite Christianss share with the Quakers, the Church of the Brethren, and some other groups, is their peace witness, which led them during the two world wars to accept alternative service, and to do relief work in war-stricken and underdeveloped countries. Immediately after World War I, this aid amounted to $2,500,000, and after World War II, to $12,640,000.

MENOCHIO, GIOVANNI STEFANO

17th-century theologian and exegete; b. Pavia, Italy, December 1575; d. Rome, Feb. 4, 1655. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1594, and after receiving the usual course of training, taught humanities, Sacred Scripture, and moral theology at Milan. He was superior successively at Cremona, Milan, and Genoa; then rector of the Roman College, provincial first of Milan and later of Rome, and finally Italian assistant to two Jesuit generals, Carafa and Piccolomini. His most notable work, Brevis explicatio sensus literalis totius Sacrae Scripturae ex optimis quibusque auctoribus per epitomen collecta (Co-logne 1630), deservedly appeared in at least nine exegetical collections, most recently in La Sainte Bible of C. F. Drioux (Paris 1873). Other principal works of Menochio are Hieropoliticum, sive Institutiones politicae e S. Scripturis depromptae (Lyons 1625) and Le suore di Giovanni Corona, tessute di varia erudizione sacra, morale e profana (Rome 1646).

MENORAH

Menorah is a Hebrew word that generally designates in the Bible the sacred candelabrum that was one of the chief appointments of the TENT OF MEETING and the Temple. The word (Heb. $m^e n \hat{o} r \hat{a}$) is used only once in the Old Testament (2 Kgs 4.10) to denote a lamp for profane use. The menorah as described in Ex 25.31 was a sevenbranched lampstand made of pure hammered gold. It had a central shaft with three arms reaching out on each side. On each of the six branches, as well as on the middle column, there was a bowl for holding olive oil and a wick (Lv 24.2). These seven bowls were refilled and trimmed daily (Ex 27.21). Josephus states that three of the lights were kept burning during the daylight hours, and all seven were lighted at night. Later rabbinical commentators give a conflicting account, reporting that the lamp was lighted only at night.

Representations of the menorah as a symbol of Judaism were common, especially in the 1st century, on coins, on the walls of synagogues, and in Jewish catacombs in various parts of the Roman Empire. The seven-branched candlestick represented on the Arch of Titus in Rome is the most authentic and the earliest reproduction of the menorah known today; it depicts the candelabrum of the second Temple that was carried off by the soldiers of Titus in A.D. 70 at the end of the siege of Jerusalem.

Throughout the centuries the Jews have found the figure of the menorah rich in symbolic meaning. Josephus, for instance, interprets the seven lamps as the seven planets. Others have thought of it as portraying the tree of life. This is suggested by its arboreal shape and its bowls molded like almond flowers. At times it has been interpreted as symbolizing the creation of the universe in six days, the center light representing the Sabbath. Of greater interest and relevance is the judgment of E. R. Goodenough, who construes the portrayal of the menorah on Jewish tombs in the Greco-Roman period as being the mystic symbol of light and life. This is equivalently, he believes, the symbol for God manifest in the world, through whom the Jews hoped for immortality.

A direct development of the Temple menorah is the Hanukkah menorah used at the feast of Hanukkah or DEDI-CATION OF THE TEMPLE. This differs only slightly from the menorah of the Temple in that it consists of eight rather than seven lamps. At times a ninth lamp is added to serve as a pilot light and called the shammash (servant), since from it the other lamps are lighted. Legend connects the Hanukkah menorah with the ceremony of the rededication of the Temple by Judas Maccabee in 165 B.C. following its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes three years earlier (1 Mc 4.37–39). It is alleged that, when the perpetual light of the Temple was to be relighted on the occasion of this rededication, it was found that there was oil enough for only one day; miraculously, however, the oil sufficed to sustain the light for eight days. In memory of this prodigy, the Hanukkah menorah is lighted, one lamp at a time on the eight successive days of the festival of Hanukkah.

MENTAL RESERVATION

A term used to describe an attempt to evade a perplexing moral situation by restricting the meaning of words used in an act of communicating. Not wanting to lie, a person may at the same time not want to tell the truth, because it would involve him or others in difficulty. If he accepts the traditional and still common teaching of Catholic moralists, he knows that he is bound by a negative precept never to lie in any circumstances, yet there is no positive precept binding him to tell the whole truth in all circumstances. Silence would often be the best solution, but in some cases silence itself would provide a damaging answer. An alternative to silence, suggested to extricate the beleaguered conscientious individual from his dilemma, is the device known as mental reservation.

Kinds of Mental Reservation. The term has been understood in two senses. In the strict sense it means giving utterance to only part of one's judgment while retaining in mind or whispering inaudibly another part necessary to make the statement objectively truthful. In the classical example, Titius privately said to a woman that he would take her for his wife, although he had no intention of marrying her. Later, when asked by a judge whether he had said he would take the woman for his wife, he replied that he had not, understanding that he had not spoken the words with the intention of marrying the woman.

In the broad sense, mental reservation is the use of equivocation or ambiguity to conceal the truth. What is said is not objectively untruthful, but it is phrased in such a way that it is possible, indeed even probable, that the true meaning of the words will escape the hearer, and that he will understand them in a sense in which they are not true

History of the Problem. The need of protecting oneself against intrusive or unjust questioning so perplexed some of the early Fathers of the Church that in their solution of difficulties of this kind they seemed to tolerate lying. With St. Augustine, however, strong convictions were established on the subject of veracity. During the Middle Ages scholastic theologians accepted and expanded upon, but never deviated from, Augustine's definition of a lie and his teaching that to utter the opposite of what one holds to be true is intrinsically evil. In the 16th century this tradition began to weaken among some theologians. Martin ASPILCUETA (d. 1586) defended the licitness of mental reservation in the strict sense in his discussion of the classical example mentioned above. His near contemporary, Francisco de Toledo, and later theologians, such as Raynaud, Sánchez, Suárez, and Lessius, either espoused the doctrine of strict mental reservation or accorded it strong probability. Other theologians, such as Cajetan, Soto, Laymann, De Lugo, and Azor, along with most other Catholic moralists, repudiated it. With the condemnation by Innocent XI of one of the propositions of Tomas Sánchez (H. Denzinger, Enchiridicu symbolorum 2126), attempts to justify strict mental reservation came to an end, and thereafter it was considered permissible only if the meaning of the term was so broadened as to signify little more than ambiguity of speech.

Moral Evaluation. St. Thomas taught that to lie is one thing, and to keep the truth hidden is another; to affirm a restricted truth is not to deny a more extensive one (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 109.4). A man can affirm that he had coffee and toast for breakfast without denying that he had an egg, or he might affirm that he has a lesser amount of money in his pocket without denying that he also has a greater amount. So long as he has reasonable cause to conceal part of the truth, he does no wrong, provided, of course, that he is careful not to indicate that he has "only" so much to eat or that he has "only" so much money.

Similarly, a person could make a statement that has all the appearances of a reply to a question put to him, but which in fact is not, owing to some circumstance known to the speaker, which the hearer could know also but may not consider. If, for example, a wife, who has been unfaithful but after her lapse has received the Sacrament of Penance, is asked by her husband if she has committed adultery, she could truthfully reply: "I am free from sin." In any of these cases the speaker does not question the hearer's right to know a truth. He presents the truth as discoverable but not disclosed. He has made no false statement, but has allowed an admissible ambiguity, foreseeing a possible, or even probable, deception.

If deception follows from a broad mental reservation it is a by-product effect. Concealment of a truth legitimately hidden is the primary intention of the one who speaks evasively. Deception does not follow necessarily from the statement itself but from the circumstances of its utterance, especially from the dispositions of the hearer. By his own simplicity, ignorance, prejudices, or malice, a hearer may be deceived in listening to the evasive words of a broad mental reservation. The words themselves lack clarity and distinctness, which the hearer supplies for himself from his own assumptions. The words do not, however, distort the true, though vague, communication made by the speaker, and consequently they are not a lie.

Because deception of one's neighbor is an evil, one needs a just and proportionately grave cause to have recourse to evasive speech or writing. Simplicity in speech is to be regarded as obligatory under ordinary circumstances.

Moreover, in some circumstances the questioner may have a strict right to know the whole truth, and when such is the case, no type of mental reservation is allowable in answering a question. Consequently, mental reservation, even in the broad sense, is never tolerable when replying to questions of a superior in matters pertaining to his jurisdiction, or in formulating strict bilateral contracts, or in replying to a judge asking legitimate questions or to a confessor concerning something he needs to know for the proper administration of the Sacrament of Penance.

MERBOT, BL.

Martyr; d. Alberschwende near Bregenz, Austria, Mar. 23, 1120. He became a BENEDICTINE monk at the abbey of MEHRERAU, and then was named pastor when his monastery gained possession of the parish church at Alberschwende. According to legend he was a descendant of the count of Bregenz and the brother of Bl. Diedo of Andelsbuch and Bl. ILGA. Merbot was killed by settlers, and over his grave a chapel for pilgrims was erected, and subsequently restored in 1752.

MERCADO, TOMÁS DE

Dominican logician; b. Seville, date unknown; d. San Juan de Ulúa, Mexico, 1575. When he was very young, Mercado was taken to Mexico and received the Dominican habit in the Colegio de Santo Domingo of the province of Santiago in Mexico. There, after completing his studies, he was ordained on April 27, 1553. At the University of Mexico be excelled in theological studies under Fray Pedro de Pravia, an eminent master from Salamanca and the Colegio de Santo Tomas, Ávila. His superiors sent him to Spain, where at Salamanca he perfected his studies before being assigned to teach at the convent of Seville.

While there, he published his principal works, among them Commentarii lucidissimi in textum Petri Hispani (1571), a commentary on the principal dialectical work of Peter of Spain, Summulae logicales. Like Domingo de Soto, Mercado undertook the work to preserve the profound dialectical teaching of this illustrious 13th-century logician. Mercado's commentary is a precise, complete, original, and vigorous exposition of the genuine logical doctrine of Aristotle's First Analytics and constitutes one of the most important dialectical treatises of the post-Tridentine scholastic revival. Logic is raised to the science of sciences, a foundation for the other sciences. In Dialecticam Aristotelis cum opusculo argumentorum (1571) is an original, exact Latin translation from the Greek of Aristotle's Logica major divided into chapters and texts, each followed by a twofold commentary, one explaining the text itself in precise, well-chosen words, the other inquiring into the truth of the question. The reason for a new version was the corrupted state of current, literary, Ciceronian versions so dear to the Renaissance, into which had also crept various nondialectical questions such as the analogy of being, the identity or distinction of being, and the categories. Mercado's restoration of the purity of the original Greek is an eloquent testimony of the high level of studies in the newly founded schools of Mexico where he received all his classical training. Suma de tratos y contratos, en seis libros (1569) was written for the merchants of Seville and is principally an ethicotheological work of the times with only a few introductory questions of philosophical interest, for example, on natural law, which reflects the intellectualism of Thomas Aquinas, and on justice, which reflects the influence of Domingo de Soto.

MERCATI, ANGELO

Prefect of Vatican Archives; b. Gaida, near Reggio-Emilia, Italy, June 10, 1870; d. Rome, March 10, 1955. Ordained in Rome in 1893 after his studies there, he taught dogma and Church history in his home diocese. From 1911 he was scriptor of the VATICAN LIBRARY, from 1918 primo custode of the VATICAN ARCHIVES, and in 1920 vice prefect. He served as prefect from 1925 until his death. Under his direction, extensive and important accessions were added to the archives, and their contents were analyzed in a series of inventories. The stacks were considerably expanded and the furnishings were modernized for the accommodation of numerous visitors and scholars. Mercati's activity as a writer began with his translation into Italian of German standard works, such as H. Grisar, Rom beim Ausgang der antiken Welt; G. Schnüer, Entstehung des Kirchenstaates; O. Bardenhewer, Patrologie v. 1-3; J. Wilpert, Malereien der römischen Katakomben; H. Denifle, Luther und Luthertum; and L. Pastor, Geschichte der Päpste v. 1–3. Mercati wrote many long treatises, miscellaneous essays, and shorter articles usually occasioned by the discovery of hitherto unknown documents. His kindness and generosity to users of the archives were notable. He is buried in S. Giorgio in Velabro, beside his brother, Giovanni MER-CATI.

MERCATI, GIOVANNI

Cardinal, archivist, and librarian at the Vatican; b. Villa Gaida (Reggio Emilia), Italy, Dec. 17, 1866; d. Vatican City, Aug. 22, 1957. He was ordained in 1889; in 1893 he was called by Msgr. A. Ceriani to the Ambrosian Library in Milan. In 1898 Father Francis Ehrle, SJ, invited him to the Vatican Library as an expert on Greek MSS. On Oct. 23, 1919, he was appointed prefect of the Vatican Library, and on June 18, 1936, he became archivist and librarian of the Roman Catholic Church and was created cardinal deacon with the title of S. Giorgio in Velabro. Recognized as one of the most learned scholars of the times, he was equally skilled in Greek and Latin patristics, in the theology and literature of Byzantium, as well as in classical, medieval, and Renaissance literature. He is the author of more than 400 works in these various fields; among his more important contributions are the following: "D'un palimpsesto Ambrosiano contenente i Salmi esapli . . . ," Atti Acc. scienze Torino, 31 (1895–96) 655–676; Codices Vaticani graeci 1–329, in collaboration with F. De' Cavalieri (Rome 1923); Prolegomena de fatis bibliothecae monasterii S. Columbani Bobiensis et de codice ipso Vat. lat. 5757 (Vatican City 1934); Note per la storia di alcune biblioteche romane nei secoli XVI-XIX, Studi e Testi, 164 (Rome 1952); and four volumes of minor works, Studi e Testi, 76-79, in which all his articles before 1936 are collected. Cardinal Mercati exerted an influence on scholars throughout the world by his publications, scientific research, and competent advice; yet he was a living example of modesty and simplicity.

MERCEDARIAN MISSIONARIES OF BERRIZ

(MMB) A religious community of women with papal approbation. It was founded in 1930 when a Spanish nun, Mother Margarita Maturana, formed the community from a cloistered monastery of the Order of Mercy in Berriz, Spain. Keeping its spiritual ties with the MER-CEDARIANS, the congregation of Berriz applies the traditional Mercedarian vocation of the ransom of captives to the active tasks of evangelization and missionary outreach. The constitutions were approved in 1939. From Spain the institute spread to Italy, Mexico, Japan, Taiwan, Oceania, and the U.S. The sisters were invited to the Diocese of Kansas City, in 1946. In 1981, the revised constitutions were approved. The congregation maintains an active presence in Asia, where it has communities in China, Japan, the Philippines, Taiwan and Pacific Micronesia.

MERCEDARIANS

Popular name for the Order of Our Lady of Mercy (O.de.M., Official Catholic Directory #0970), derived from the Spanish word merced (mercy). Members have also been known as the Knights of St. Eulalia. Pope Piux XI bestowed the title by which the institute has since been known officially: Order of the Blessed Virgin Mary for the Ransom of Captives (Ordo Beatae Mariae Virginis de Mercede Redemptionis Captivorum.)

Foundation and Organization. St. PETER NOLASCO founded the order in 1218 for the ransom of Christian captives, in response to a request made by the Blessed Virgin Mary during an apparition (Aug. 1, 1218). In the presence of King James of Aragon and St. Raymond of Peñafort, Peter and 13 noblemen donned the religious habit and took the three religious vows in Barcelona cathedral. They added a fourth vow, to act as hostages if necessary to free from the Moors Christian captives whose faith was in danger. This fourth vow has since been adapted to changing historical circumstances. Originally the Mercedarians were one of the MILITARY OR-DERS. The habit has always been white, a color selected to facilitate entrance into Muslim territories. The habit was adapted to the order's military character. Subsequently, it consisted of a scapular as long as the tunic; a white tunic fastened by a wide leather belt, from which hangs a chain reminiscent of the soldier's sword that was formerly worn; and a cape with a cowl. On the breast of the cape was a shield, granted by King James I, which bore four stripes on a field of gold, a Maltese cross, and a royal crown. The Mercedarians constitute a religious order, whose rule is that of St. Augustine. Pope Gregory IX approved the order Jan. 17, 1235. Members are priests, candidates for the priesthood, or brothers. A master general who resides in Rome governs the order. The U.S. headquarters is in Cleveland, OH.

History. Mercedarians have been responsible for the liberation of perhaps 70,000 prisoners, some 2,700 during the founder's lifetime. In 1318 Pope John XXII decreed that the master general must be a priest. Thereupon the lay knights left the order and joined the military order of Our Lady of Montesa, founded in 1319 by King James II to battle against the Moors. At that time, the Mercedarians changed from a military to a clerical order. It became a MENDICANT ORDER. From Spain, the Mercedarians spread to Africa, Italy, France, and Ireland. After the discovery of the New World, the Mercedarians engaged in missionary activities and contributed to the evangelization of the regions from the Rio Grande River southward to the tip of South America. During the 17th century, there were eight provinces and 265 monasteries in Latin America. As a result of a reform movement, Juan Bautista González founded in 1602 the discalced Mercedarians, who received Paul V's approval in 1606. The French Revolution and the liberal, anticlerical governments in 19th-century Spain nearly extinguished the order. Pedro Armengol Valenzuela, who became master general in 1880, revised the constitutions and guided the apostolate toward educational, charitable, and social works. His directives have been followed ever since.

Congregations of women who share the Mercedarian spirit and heritage include the second order of Mercedarians founded by St. MARY DE CERVELLÓ (1265); the Mercedarian Sisters of Charity (1878); the Mercedarian Missionaries of Berriz (1930); the Eucharistic Mercedarians in Mexico; the Missionary Mercedarians of Africa, founded by Cardinal LAVIGERIE and incorporated into the order by Armengol Valenzuela; and the Mercedarians of the Child Jesus and the Divine Master of Argentina. A Third Order exists that received an official rule of life in 1260; its members, imbued with the spirit of the first order, assist the latter in hospitals and prisons.

MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY

Designates the theological school of the German Reformed Church that set out to oppose the emotional revivalism of the mid-19th century by re-presenting the faith of the early reformers and by stressing doctrine, especially Christology, ecclesiology, and sacramental theology. It originated about 1836 with Profs. Frederick Rauch (1806–41), John Williamson NEVIN (1803–86), and Philip SCHAFF (1819–93), all faculty members of the German Reformed Seminary at Mercersburg, Pa. Convinced that popular revivalism was not in harmony with the HEIDEL-BERG CATECHISM, they undertook a positive and historical reexamination of earlier writings in order to recover the pre-Puritan faith of the reformers and to promote a historical appreciation of the Church's past. The result was a system grounded on the centrality of Christ and the Church.

The Mercersburg theologians taught that the Incarnate Word, Christ, is the primary truth of Christianity; in Him all men are regenerated and united as members of His body, a spiritual organism called the church. The Church, extending through all ages and destined to include all peoples, is ever the same, yet each age appreciates its fullness differently. From this they concluded that no doctrinal formula or organizational structure can be final, and the church must modify its teachings according to its progressive knowledge of Christian truth. While strongly upholding the general priesthood of the laity, these theologians also maintained that Christ, who is ever present in the Church, perpetuates His mediatorial mission through an order of men, all equal, who speak in His name, dispense His Sacraments, and rule His flock. The Sacraments (baptism and the Lord's Supper) are not mere signs, but "real seals of God's covenant with man" and channels of grace, made efficacious by faith. As a consequence of these teachings, the leaders at Mercersburg urged a liturgical restoration and openly attacked the then prevalent emotional revivalism. Constantly questioned and suspected, the Mercersburg professors were tried three times for heresy and acquitted. Because of disagreements with Nevin and Schaff, several congregations left the Reformed Church, but they had little influence beyond their own membership.

The Mercersburg theologians had hoped that their studies would eventually lead the Reformed Churches to union. Their own German Reformed Church united with the Evangelical Church in 1934, forming the EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH; this Church, noted for its Christocentrism, experienced a liturgical revival. The Mercersburg influence helped to bridge the gap between the complete supernaturalism of the Calvinistic creeds and the religious liberalism of the early 20th century.

MERCIER, DÉSIRÉ JOSEPH

Founder and first president of the Institut Supérieur de Philosophie at Louvain (Belgium), cardinal archbishop of Malines; b. Braine-l'Alleud (near Waterloo), Nov. 21, 1851; d. Brussels, Jan. 23, 1926. He was the son of Paul (1808-58), manufacturer and artist, and of A. M. Barbe Croquet (1815–82), sister of Msgr. Adrian Croquet (d. 1902), apostle of the Oregon native tribe. After his studies in the classics, philosophy, and theology at the seminary of Malines, Mercier was ordained (1874), obtained a licentiate in theology at Louvain (1877), and became professor of philosophy at Malines the same year. In 1882 he was commissioned to inaugurate the chair of Thomistic philosophy created at the University of Louvain at the request of Pope Leo XIII. Mercier endeavored to realize the program formulated in the 1879 encyclical AETERNI PATRIS: to restore the philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, harmonize it with the progress of modern science and thought, and extend its influence to the scientific and social disciplines. On the basis of his initial successes, he asked for, and received, the support of the pope for the creation of an Institut Supérieur de Philosophie that would provide a complete education in the various philosophical areas. When named president of this institute in 1889, Mercier gathered collaborators from among his first students and with their assistance formed an international group of enthusiastic and devoted disciples. The Revue NéoScolastique, founded in 1894, made the writings of the institute available throughout the scholarly world.

Philosophy. Mercier's views concerning philosophy differed greatly from those of most of his Catholic contemporaries. For him philosophy was a purely rational discipline distinct from theology; not only this, but it had to be free from every apologetical preoccupation. Furthermore, philosophy cannot be considered a finished work. It must be animated with the spirit of research found in other university disciplines. Without breaking with tradition, philosophy must address itself to men in their own times. It must stay in contact with the empirical sciences and gain support from them, while yet aspiring to explanations that transcend the order of observable data.

This view of philosophy explains why Mercier appealed to experience when treating the transcendental character of truth and goodness, finality, and other themes. It is also apparent in his view of psychology, Mercier's favorite discipline. Fighting the "exaggerated spiritualism" and the mechanism that flowed, according to him, from Cartesian dualism, Mercier appealed to biology, physiology, and neurology to show the substantial unity of man and to elaborate the hylomorphic explanation of this unity. In 1892 he installed at the institute one of the first laboratories of experimental psychology, under the direction of A. Thiéry (1868–1955). In the same way he encouraged D. Nys (1859–1927) to unite cosmology with physics and chemistry and S. Deploige (1868–1927) to link ethics with the social sciences.

Mercier recognized the critical problem as one of furnishing a CRITERION for truth and certitude. This criterion, he believed, must be furnished in and by reflection. Since the latter is characteristic of intelligence, the criterion must be the evidence arrived at in the domain of abstract ideas. Yet he made appeal to the principle of causality to explain that the content of these ideas comes from experience and to guarantee thereby the real character of the evidence. This ''illationism,'' later abandoned at Louvain because of the influence of L. Noël, had the merit of stimulating a fruitful controversy.

Episcopacy. On Feb. 7, 1906, Mercier was named archbishop of Malines. He administered this diocese of 2.5 million inhabitants with continual solicitude for every type of Catholic activity and deep concern for the spiritual development of his priests. As primate of Belgium he convoked a Catholic congress in 1909 to coordinate religious activity in the whole of Belgium. At the 1920 provincial council, he examined the rehabilitation necessary in the aftermath of the war. If at first he was actively engaged in the political life of the country—where a powerful Catholic party seemed to him the best guarantee of Church liberty and the surest defense against a de-Christianizing Marxism—his concern after the war centered more on national understanding and specifically religious action. Lacking somewhat in political adaptability, Mercier was led to identify "la patrie" unconditionally with a unitary Belgium. This deficiency, coupled with his native attachment to French culture, explains his lack of understanding in the face of Flemish grievances. During the war he was convinced that his duty was to build and sustain the morale of his countrymen, to protest against the excesses of the German troops, and to cry against the injustices of the occupying government. This attitude won for him enormous prestige in his own country and among the Allied nations, as witnessed by the enthusiastic welcome accorded him in the United States in 1919.

When created a cardinal in 1907, Mercier took a lively interest in problems of the universal Church. Resuming after the war the work undertaken by the Fribourg Union, he created the International Union of Social Studies and presided over its work; this led, among other things, to the publication in 1927 of a social code. He was preoccupied also with Church union, and he installed in Belgium the Institute of the Monks of Union (Chevetogne) to further reconciliation with the churches of the Orient. Most importantly perhaps, he presided over the Malines Conversations (1921–25); at the initiative of Lord Halifax, these studied the conditions for union between Catholics and Anglicans.

MERCY

Compassionate sorrow at another's misfortune together with a will to alleviate it; it is genuine love in relation to an unhappy being. The encounter of love and misery gives birth to mercy, which is therefore one of the essential forms of charity, situated in the very heart of Christianity (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 2a, 2ae 30).

Another's distress becomes one's own because the other is united and in a sense identified with oneself, or because his misfortune is of concern to one, for example, by reason of his recollection of something similar in the past, or fear of something like it in the future. This likeness between another's misfortune and one's own can be experienced on the level of pure sensibility and is then simply an emotion. On the other hand, the comparison can exist on a more spiritual level, and charity becomes merciful, assuming and controlling the emotion. Compassion in itself is not the virtue of mercy. For the virtue, a genuine effort to relieve the misfortune of others in all its forms is demanded. The particular form of misery with which mercy is most concerned is spiritual misery, the abandonment of God. Mercy then unites and makes more intense the love of human beings and the hatred of vice. In this sense, mercy is found in its most perfect expression in God, since mercy is the efficacious hatred of another's evil.

God wills that we practice mercy as the most excellent way of accomplishing the second Commandment "like to the first." He expressly says so: "I desire mercy and not sacrifice" (Mt 9.13; cf. Hos 6.6). Mercy, to unite us with Him who is "merciful and gracious" (Ps 102.8; Ex 34.6) should tend to prompt imitation of Him. "Be merciful, therefore, even as your heavenly Father is merciful" (Lk 6.36). Mercy is intimately involved in our union with God Himself. "With what measure you measure, it shall be measured out to you" (Mt 7.2).

Christ is, in those who are His, the source of merciful love; He enlightens and inspires all forms of mercy. For example, almsdeeds take their inspiration from the Lord Jesus who, "being rich... became poor for your sakes" (2 Cor 8.9). The "great sadness and continuous sorrow" in the heart of St. Paul "for the sake of my brethren... who are Israelites" (Rom 9.2) is an extension of "the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord" (Rom 8.39). Mercy like the Lord's springs from a care for the human condition involved in many misfortunes. "Jesus saw a large crowd, and had compassion on them, because they were like sheep without a shepherd" (Mk 6.34).

Mercy obtains pardon of sins in this life and the eternal possession of God in the life to come. "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy" (Mt 5.7).

MERCY, BROTHERS OF

Officially known as the Brothers of Mercy of Montabaur (FMM, Official Catholic Directory #0810), dedicated to the care and nursing of those who are chronically ill. The congregation was founded in Germany in 1856 by Peter Loetschert (1820–86) and four others. In 1861 the motherhouse was established at Montabaur, Germany. The order grew steadily and spread to Holland, where by 1902 there were five houses. In Germany, their 23 establishments (1930) were later reduced to nine, as a consequence of war and Hitler's religious persecutions. The Brothers of Mercy opened their first U.S. house in Buffalo, N.Y., in 1924. The U.S. provincialate is in Clarence, N.Y., a Buffalo suburb.

MERCY, FATHERS OF

This society, officially known as the Congregation of the Priests of Mercy (CPM, Official Catholic Directory #0820), was originally founded in Lyons, France, in 1808, by a zealous priest, Jean Baptist Rauzan. Rauzan brought together a small group of priests to form a missionary band, with the idea of counteracting the disastrous effects of the French Revolution on the faith of the people. For years, the little band of missionaries traveled up and down the country, preaching and administering the Sacraments. Rauzan, seeing the work that was accomplished, formed his priests into a community known as the Missionaries of France. In 1834 the community was approved by Pope Gregory XVI and became known as the Fathers of Mercy. The society came to the United States in 1839 at the request of Bp. John Hughes of New York. The Fathers of Mercy founded four parishes, two in New York and two in Brooklyn. In 1956 the society was reorganized by the Holy See. The four parishes in the United States were turned over to diocesan authorities, and the community took on a strictly mission character. As a result of the reorganization, the society assumed the status of a congregation, since the fathers, already under the vows of obedience and chastity, also took the vow of poverty. The U.S. headquarters is in South Union, KY.

MERCY, WORKS OF

Works of mercy are acts that express MERCY and that could likewise be called the realizations of charity in its mode of mercy. Two specific works of mercy, almsgiving [see ALMS AND ALMSGIVING (IN THE CHURCH)] and fraternal CORRECTION, are explained elsewhere.

Christian Spirit of the Works of Mercy. The works of mercy warmly commended by the Law, the sages, and the prophets are at the heart of the Old Testament, e.g., "Sharing your bread with the hungry, sheltering the oppressed and the homeless, clothing the naked when you see them, and not turning your back on your own" (Is 58.7). However, in the New Testament there is a profound development of the concept of mercy. Christ is now present in His people, and His people are not only those who are merciful, but those in misery and in need of mercy. In fact, the Incarnation itself is a work of mercy for human misery, both Jewish and pagan. "For God has shut up all in unbelief, that he may have mercy upon all" (Rom 11.32).

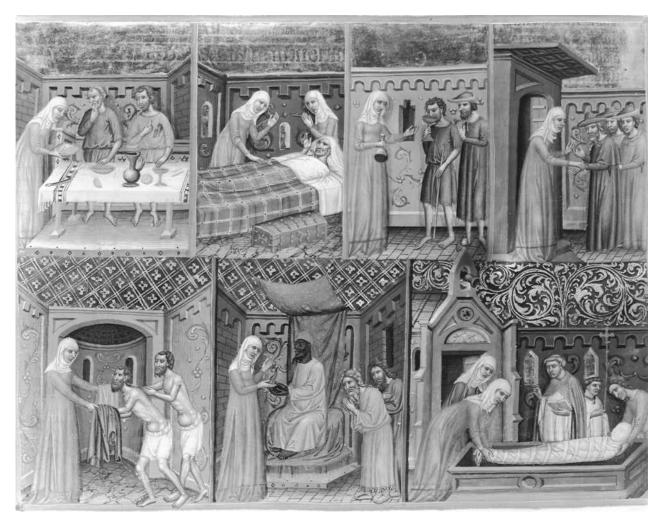

The Christian spirit brought first a new way of looking upon misfortune. Every kindness done "you did . . ." Our Lord said "for me" (Mt 25.40). Second, it gave new scope to free generosity. No regulation can determine the extent or the opportunities for this duty of mercy, since faith has opened new horizons, as St. Paul pointed out to Philemon whom he wanted to persuade by love to free Onesimus: "May the sharing of thy faith be made evident in full knowledge of all the good that is in you, in Christ Jesus" (Phlm 1.6). Third, it involved a spirit of service. The Christian's mercy is really that of Christ; his own personal gain and the manifestation of superiority cannot be its motives. Instead, humble service will tend toward the development of the person in need in order to bring him to equality: "that at the present time your abundance may supply their want, and that their abundance may, in its turn, make up what you lack, thus establishing an equality" (2 Cor 8.14).

Corporal Works. The list is long established: to feed the hungry, to give drink to the thirsty, to clothe the naked, to shelter the homeless, to visit the sick, to ransom the captive, to bury the dead. All are found in the parable of the Judgment (Mt 25.34–40), except the last, to bury the dead, which was added out of the respect owed to the body as a "temple of the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 3.16), and consideration of the sorrows caused by death. These seven are not to be considered as exclusive. Other real afflictions, such as those experienced by displaced persons who are without homes, or by prisoners, or alcoholics, or prostitutes, or others involved in evils that threaten human dignity, call for Christian mercy. Problems involved in getting aid to underdeveloped countries and the promotion of peace between men and races cannot be solved without the organized cooperation of many. Papal encyclicals have exhorted the faithful to effective participation in such works.

Spiritual Works. Seven are usually listed: to instruct the ignorant, to counsel the doubtful, to admonish sinners, to bear wrongs patiently, to forgive offenses, to comfort the afflicted, and to pray for the living and the dead. The instruction of the ignorant may be performed by an organization, although on occasion it may well be the work of an individual. But the other spiritual works remain in the realm of personal relationships, and on this account have a particular value. They make demands upon personal resources and hence are a more specific expression of charity toward another, and in this they tend to promote human unity. Their urgency comes from the threat of human depersonalization in contemporary civilization.

The works of mercy demand a spirit of service, the attention of love, and the sincerity of compassion. "I have given you an example" the Lord said (Jn 13.15). The performance of these works was characteristic of Christ's life, who, as St. Peter expressed it, "went about doing good" (Acts 10.38).

The word of God is a challenge to every Christian: "I desired mercy, and not sacrifice" (Hos 6.6 DV); "God who is rich in mercy, by reason of his very great love wherewith he has loved us" (Eph 2.4) wants us to be united with Him and to come to know the joy of giving as He has given.

MERCY OF GOD

Biblical Basis. The Old Testament tells of God's love manifested in his mercy. This was first manifested in freeing his people from their slavery in Egypt. It is the merciful God who tells Moses that he has heard the cry of his enslaved people and that he will deliver them (Ex 3:7-17). However, God's mercy is manifested foremost in forgiving the infidelity of his people. "The Lord, the Lord, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness, keeping steadfast love for thousands, forgiving the iniquity and transgression and sin" (Ex 34:6-7). So important is this text for declaring God's mercy that it is repeated in various forms six times within the Old Testament (Ps 85/ 86:15, 102/103:8, 144/145:8; J1 2:13; Neh 9:17; Jn 4:2). The Lord God is a merciful God (Dt 4:31, Ps 114/116:5), who will not turn away his face to those who return to him (2 Chr 30:9). Even though God sent his people into exile, he did not make an end of them or forsake them, "for you are a gracious and merciful God" (Neh 9:31). Similar examples and proclamations can be found throughout the Old Testament.

In the New Testament, the mercy of God finds its fulfillment in that the "The Father of all mercies and the God of all comfort" (2 Cor 1:3) so loved the world that he sent his Son into the world (Jn 3:16; 1 Jn 4:10). "God, who is rich in mercy, out of the great love with which he loved us, even when we were dead through our trespasses, made us alive together with Christ" (Eph 2:4). In so doing God remembered his mercy to Israel (Lk 1:54) "to perform the mercy promised to our fathers . . . to give knowledge of salvation to his people in the forgiveness of their sin, through the tender mercy of our God" (Lk 1:72 and 78). Even the Gentiles are now to "glorify God for his mercies" (Rom 15:9). Though Paul was the greatest of sinners he obtained the mercy of God so as to be the most extreme example and so hope of God's mercy to all (1 Tm 1:13-16). Thus everyone can now see "how the Lord is compassionate and merciful" (Jas 5:11), for "by his great mercy we have been born anew to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, and to an inheritance which is imperishable, undefiled, and unfading" (1 Pt 1:3–4). Jesus is the everlasting great High Priest to whom we can draw near in confidence "that we may receive mercy and find grace to help in time of need" (Heb 4:16). Christians, therefore, are a chosen people, a royal priesthood, a holy nation and God very people because "once you had not received mercy but now you have received mercy" (1 Pt 2:10). God allowed all to become sinners precisely so "that he may have mercy upon all" (Rom 11:32). The New Testament thus accentuates the mercy of God manifested in the face of humankind's sin. It is the cross of Christ that displays most strikingly the mercy of God for through it the Father has granted forgiveness of sins and the divine transforming life of his Spirit. This mercy is exemplified in anticipation of the cross through Jesus' example and miracles. Jesus, in his mercy, has come to call sinners (Mt 9:13, 12:7). Those who desire to be healed cry out to Jesus to have mercy on them (Mt 9:27, 15:22, 17:15, 20:30–31; Mk 10:47–48; Lk 16:24,18:38–39), and he, in his mercy, attends to their need. Moreover, Jesus, through the parable of the Prodigal Son, illustrates the utter loving mercy of the Father (Lk 15:11–32). Like the Father then, Christians are called to love and forgive their enemies. Christian perfection consists in being "merciful as your Father is merciful" (Lk 6:36, Mt 5:48).

Christian Tradition. The Fathers of the Church continue the biblical theme of God manifesting his mercy through the redemption wrought in his incarnate Son and in the incorruptible life poured out in his Spirit. Irenaeus states: "To exercise mercy is God's own function" (Demonstration on the Apostolic Preaching, 60). Ambrose, in an astonishing statement, wrote that God did not rest from creating until he had made man, for now he could exercise his mercy, "there now being someone whose sins he could forgive" (In Hex., 6.10). Augustine, in his Confessions, bears witness to the mercy of God throughout the whole of his life. So much was the mercy of God esteemed within the Church's tradition that Aquinas could ask whether mercy is the greatest virtue. He answers that "mercy takes precedence of other virtues, for it belongs to mercy to be bountiful to others, and, what is more, to succor others in their wants, which pertains chiefly to one who stands above. Hence mercy is accounted as being proper to God: and therein his omnipotence is declared to be chiefly manifested" (Summa theologiae, II-II.30.4). Mercy is God's greatest virtue because he gives not from any need of his own, but purely and freely from his own loving liberality and kindness (Summa theologiae, I.21.3, 4). For Aquinas, the chief manifestation of God's omnipotence is enacted through his omnipotent deeds of mercy, that is, in deeds that only he can perform. In his Commentary on Ephesians (2.2) Aquinas provides four examples of God's omnipotent deeds that display the richness of his mercy (Eph 2:4). First, the act of creation is itself an omnipotent deed of supreme mercy for in our non-existence, when we could not even cry out for mercy, God in his mercy brought us into existence. Second, God in his mercy made us in his own image and likeness so that we might enjoy his own beatitude. Third, he mercifully recreated us when we were corrupted by sin and death. Fourth, such a renewal was accomplished by the merciful Father sending his only Son. Pope John Paul II states that Jesus as the Incarnate Son "is mercy" in that he embodies in his own person the mercy of the Father (Dives Misericordia, 2). Likewise within the Christian tradition the mercy of God is found within the theology of and devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

The pierced heart of Jesus not only reveals the immense love and mercy of Jesus himself, but, through his open heart, we are also able to gaze into the merciful heart of the Trinity itself. Equally, more recently Bl. Faustina Kowalska (1905–38), because of her visions, promoted devotion to God's mercy through The Chaplet of Divine Mercy and Novena of Divine Mercy. Liturgically this has found expression in the Second Sunday after Easter being designated the Feast of Mercy.

MERICI, ANGELA, ST.

Foundress, b. Desenzano, Republic of Venice, probably on March 21, 1474; d. Brescia, Jan. 27, 1540. Except for some years when she lived with an uncle's family in Salo, Angela remained in Desenzano until she was about 40. Around 1506, she was favored with a vision in which she was told, "Before your death, you will found a society of virgins at Brescia." She awaited a providential action that might lead her to Brescia, and in 1516 received such a sign in the invitation from the Patengoli family to live with them in order to console them because of the recent death of their two sons.

It was not until 1531 that she organized a small group of 12 girls to help her with the catechetical work she had already begun. By 1535 the group had increased to 28, and with characteristic simplicity Angela formed them (25 Nov. 1535) into the Company of St. Ursula by the simple inscription of their names in a book. Aware of the need for reform in both the Church and society, Angela thus founded the first religious order for the teaching of young girls. Her goal was the re-Christianization of family life and thus of society, through the solid Christian education of future wives and mothers. Each one in the Company was to continue living in her own home, exercising her apostolate among the members of her own family, her social acquaintances, and the children of her neighborhood. No formal vows were taken, but the primitive rule drawn up by Angela prescribed the practice of virginity, poverty, and obedience.

Thus, the original company was in reality a "secular institute" and it was only after St. Angela's death that the administrative organization was changed by St. Charles BORROMEO, bishop of Milan, in order to bring it into harmony with the decisions of the Council of TRENT. Later changes and adaptations have brought into being different forms of life for the members of the institute; both Angelines and Ursulines claim St. Angela as their foundress. The divergencies have resulted from fidelity to her counsel: ". . . if according to times and needs you should be obliged to make fresh rules and change certain things, do it with prudence and good advice."

Immediately after her death Angela was honored as a saint by the people of Brescia. The municipal council collected the necessary documents for beatification, but it was not until 1768 that the actual decree of beatification was approved by CLEMENT XIII. Angela was canonized on May 24, 1807, and in 1861 her cult was extended to the universal Church by PIUS IX.

Feast: Jan. 27 (formerly June 1).

MÉRIDA

City of about 15,000 on the right bank of the Guadiana River, in Estremadura, southwest Spain. Founded by Augustus (25 B.C.), it became the capital of Roman Lusitania and one of the first dioceses and metropolitanates in Spain. The famous martyr, St. Eulalia (c. 304; feast, Dec. 10) is ascribed to Mérida (PRUDENTIUS, Peristephanon 3); she was joined in the Spanish liturgy c. 600 by St. Eulalia of Barcelona, usually regarded as a double of the martyr of Mérida. Eulalia, a voluntary martyr, is ascribed to Barcelona in the 1574 edition of EULOGIUS OF CÓRDOBA (Memoriale sanctorum 1.24), d. 859, who seems to have known Prudentius. Her cult spread through Spain, North Africa (a sermon by St. Augustine), Gaul, Germany, and Italy (Sant' Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna).

Mérida (633–638), prized in León by Alfonso III in 906; Eulalia is mentioned 29 times in the vitae. The acts of a reform council held in Mérida (666) and the Arabic text of Mérida's contract of surrender to the Arabs (June 713) are extant. The city was the scene of almost constant rebellion against CÓRDOBA until 929. Louis I the Pious of France in 826 wrote to the magistrates and people of Mérida, encouraging them to continue resistance and promising them their full liberty of old, exemption from taxation, and the right to live under their own law if they would ally with him against Córdoba. In 828 Mahmud, a mollites (offspring of a Christian-Muslim marriage), rebelled and fled with his followers to Christian Galicia. His sister, according to Arabic accounts, became a Christian, and her son became bishop of SANTIAGO DE COM-POSTELA. Ariulfus, metropolitan of Mérida, took part in ecclesiastical affairs of Betica (839-864).

When Badajoz was founded downstream with settlers from Mérida (868–875), the metropolitan also may have moved. Bishop Julius of Badajoz fled to Santiago, where he signed a document in 932. But Mérida appears as a metropolitanate with a varying number of suffragan sees in episcopal lists as late as the 13th century. The origin of these lists, which appear in several countries of Europe, is obscure; and it is not clear what period the lists would represent.

In 1120 the Metropolitanate of Mérida was transferred to Santiago. The city, after its reconquest (1228), was given to the KNIGHTS OF ST. JAMES (1232) until the 15th century. Settlers did not come, however, and Mérida was almost deserted from the 14th to the 16th century. Its many Roman ruins, still famous, survived in good state to the 18th century, when they suffered from neglect and abuse. Mérida is now part of the Diocese of Badajoz.

MÉRIDA, FATHERS OF

Five bishops—Paul, Fidelis, Masona, Innocent, Renovatus—of Mérida, from c. 550 to 633. An anonymous deacon of Mérida, arbitrarily named Paul in the 16th century, related edifying tales about the first three, with vague chronological indications. Paul, a physician from Greece, eventually became bishop. After many years, he recognized in a young man who came to Mérida with Greek merchants his nephew Fidelis, whom he trained for the sacred ministry and after many years chose as his successor. Fidelis was succeeded by Masona, a noble Goth who was called "well-known" by JOHN OF BICLARO in 573. Masons built and endowed many churches and monasteries, and established a hospital and a loan bank. He was exiled by the Arian King Leovegild (568–586) for three years, probably in 582 when Leovegild recaptured Mérida from his rebellious Catholic son HER-MENEGILD. Masona and Leovegild's convert son and successor Recared (586-601) overcame uprisings of Arian bishops and nobles. Masona signed the acts of the Third Council of Toledo (589) and a Toledo synod (597) and, if a letter from St. ISIDORE to him is authentic, was still alive in 605 or 606. He was succeeded by Innocent, who signed a decree of King Gundemar (610-612) in 610, and by the learned and prudent Renovatus, who was bishop for many years. The next known bishop of Mérida, Stephen I, signed the acts of the Fourth Council of Toledo (633).

MERIT

By the term "merit," the Catholic theologian understands that ordination of a man's good act whereby this act is rendered worthy of receiving a reward. In the abstract, merit may be considered as that property of the act which renders it fit for reward; in the concrete, merit is to be defined as a man's title to the reward that the action deserves. Theologians divide the notion of merit into two classes, condign and congruent. The distinction stems from the different bases on which the title to a reward rests. Condign merit has a title arising from a concept of justice; congruent merit is based on the liberality of the one who gives a reward. The expression "congruent merit" appeared for the first time in the writings of Alan of Lille (d. 1203?); William of Auvergne (d. 1249) shortly thereafter taught that condign and congruent are the proper divisions of merit. Theological consideration of the doctrine of merit is restricted to supernatural merit, that is, merit that arises from an action performed with the assistance of divine GRACE.

The present article will summarize (1) the scriptural basis and (2) patristic testimony on which the Catholic doctrine rests, (3) the teaching of the medieval theologians, (4) the Tridentine formulation of the doctrine as found in the decree on justification, and (5) the theological synthesis of the doctrine of merit as it has been made by theologians since Trent.

Sacred Scripture. The positive theologian who carries out the task of investigating the revelation as it is found in the sources will look in vain for the word "merit" in Scripture, and he will find relatively rare instances of the use of this word by early ecclesiastical writers. A BIBLICAL THEOLOGY of merit can be formulated only from the ideas of merit. On the one hand, the reader of the Bible will note the gratuity of God's gifts to man, and on the other, he will see the promise of a reward that will be given for man's good works. These are the elements that served at a later date as the basis for that synthesis which the theologians call the doctrine of merit. It must be noted that these elements are not found together in the Scripture.

Old Testament. A history of the relations between God and Israel, the people whom He gratuitously chose for His own, is contained in the Old Testament. This history is in great measure a recital of the blessings that God bestowed upon this people as a reward for their fidelity to Him; it also makes clear that the punishments He imposed were occasioned by infidelity. What is most significant is that these rewards and punishments were in some way dependent upon the actions of Israel.

New Testament. The principal teaching of the New Testament is the doctrine that SALVATION has come for mankind through Jesus Christ. New Testament salvation is that which each man can share by accepting Christ's gratuitous invitation to His kingdom, the CHURCH. Salvation has a personal and a social dimension because salvation is for the individual man but it is accomplished in the Church

In presenting the individual's role in attaining salvation, the Gospel writers make clear that Christ's kingdom is a free gift to men, but they also point out that in taking it from Israel of old, Christ intended to extend His kingdom to those who would yield the fruits of it. Numerous instances in the Gospel insist that a reward has been promised to man's works. For example, the Gospels attach the promise of a reward to love of enemies (Mt 5.46), almsgiving (Mt 6.1), forgiveness (Mt 6.15), fasting (Mt 6.18), faith (Lk 12.8), perseverance in face of persecution (Mt 13.18), and following Christ (Mt 11.29). This correlation between works and a reward is highlighted especially in the parable of the talents (Lk 19.11). There the gratuity of God's gifts and the notion that a reward is given for willingly using these gifts are placed side by side; and the parable suggests that God, in bestowing rewards, takes human efforts into account. It is valid to conclude that man's efforts to serve God have a value. The Gospel writers by their general reiteration that a man's work can deserve a reward thus provide the basic notion of the concept of merit.

In several Epistles St. Paul expresses the idea that God renders a reward for man's work and that the reason He does so is that He is just. The more significant of these passages are: "God . . . will render to every man according to his works" (Rom 2.6). "For the rest, there is laid up for me a crown of justice, which the Lord, the just Judge, will give to me in that day" (2 Tm 4.8). "Now he who plants and he who waters are one, yet each will receive his own reward according to his labor" (1 Cor 3.8). In each of these passages St. Paul indicates that the reward is given for the personal work of man. Objections have been raised against this position because of St. Paul's statement in Rom 6.22-23: "the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is life everlasting in Christ Jesus our Lord." The context of the passage indicates that just as the Romans have experienced the disorder arising from SIN, so now, since they have enrolled in the service of God, they will be able to realize the fruits of that service, life everlasting. The passage is not incompatible with the notion that life everlasting can be a reward as well as a gift.

Patristic Teaching. The writings of the Apostolic Fathers contain testimony to their belief that the works of the Christian are worthy of a reward. Yet this belief is not considered formally in any treatise on merit. In later patristic writings (Tertullian, Apology 1.28; Migne, Patrologia Latina, 1:435) one can find the term "merit" used in the precise sense in which it came to be used at a later date in theology. The concept of a reward given for man's work for which he has a title in some sort of justice can also be discerned throughout the patristic period (J. Rivière, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 10:612–661).

The classical writer on grace and its effects was St. AUGUSTINE. Much of his writing on grace was occasioned by Pelagianism, which was being successfully proposed during that period (see PELAGIUS AND PELA-GIANISM). Augustine's viewpoint, therefore, stressed man's need for grace; his interest in merit was quite secondary. Since Pelagianism distorted man's capacities within the economy of salvation and unduly emphasized the value of his efforts, it is quite significant that Augustine did speak about man's works as being meritorious. Augustine always insisted that the first grace that a man receives is completely a gift (see FAITH, BEGINNING OF).

In support of this Augustine repeats with remarkable frequency St. Paul's question: "Or what hast thou that thou hast not received?" (1 Cor 4.7). He constantly reminded his readers and hearers that man is reborn not by his own efforts but by mercy, "otherwise grace is no longer grace" (Rom 11.6). Yet Augustine realized that when a man is justified, that is, when he has come to the position in which he can act from charity, then these works have a value, precisely because they are moved by charity. He stated very clearly that a man's works have a distinct value in the working out of salvation. Commenting on Phil 3.10, Augustine states that after death a man receives what his merits deserve and that when God then crowns a man's works, He is, in fact, crowning His own gifts (Sermones 170.10.10; Patrologia Latina 38:932).

The same two ideas are found also in Augustine's letter to Sixtus (Epist. 194.5.19; Patrologia Latina 33:880–1). In these instances Augustine is recognizing the reality of a reward attached to man's works and that the possibility of meriting is bestowed by God's gift. Augustine's repetition of the idea that the just Judge in crowning man's works, is crowning His own gifts is significant, because the expression not only insists that the works of man are rewarded but also shows that the fact that they can deserve a reward is due to God. By His Grace God has set up the economy within which meriting becomes possible. Since Augustine was a favored source for the reformers, his testimony regarding the existence of merit has a special value for those in the reformers' tradition.

Medieval Theologians. During the Middle Ages the theologians formulated a synthesis concerning merit. Peter Lombard was the first who treated of the doctrine at length; St. Bonaventure and Alexander of Hales, among others in the Franciscan tradition, did also. Although the varied schools agreed on the basic concept, that man's works, accomplished with divine assistance, are worthy of a reward, two medieval trends can be distinguished regarding the doctrine: the Thomist and the Scotist. St. Thomas taught that merit is a title based on justice. This title is rooted in the intrinsic JUSTIFICATION effected in a man by the coming of grace. If the justified man by a true exercise of secondary causality performs a good act, he deserves a reward. This is the economy that has been set up by God. According to Duns Scotus, justification gives to man's actions the motions of CHARITY by which these actions can become acceptable to God. Because these actions are accepted by God they are meritorious. It should be noted that the operation of charity is not the cause of God's accepting these works—but the movement of charity is the condition on which He accepts them. In keeping with his general approach, Duns Scotus attempted in his teaching on merit to emphasize the freedom of God's will.

Council of Trent. It was during the period of the rise of Protestantism that the doctrine of merit was definitively formulated at the Council of Trent (see TRENT, COUNCIL OF). This council did not set out to define the Catholic teaching on merit precisely, but the sixth session of the council (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1520–83) was devoted to the doctrine on justification, and the logic of the situation brought the Fathers of the council to consider merit.

Luther's Position. The doctrinal point from which Lutheran Protestantism started was Martin LUTHER's insistence that grace alone effected man's justification. When Luther was forced by the constant theological polemics of the period to define his position more exactly he came to link this assertion with the statement that grace can justify a man without effecting an intrinsic change in him. Thus, Lutheran justification became an extrinsic justification that is brought about by faith alone. It followed logically that Luther came to exclude the value of any works. Justification by grace alone already excludes value being attached to works done before justification; Luther's concept that faith alone is the source of continuing justification rendered all works after justification completely useless. In the face of this total rejection of man's works the council's examination of the value of man's work was unavoidable. Although the inner logic of Luther's concept of justification implied the total rejection of merit, there is surprising confusion among early Protestant divines about merit. Their opinions range from Philipp MELANCHTHON's refusal to reject the notion outright to John CALVIN's bitter attacks on those who use the term. This confusion was an added reason why Trent came to focus its attention on merit.

Ratisbon. The final reason why the members of the council were quite conscious of the doctrine of merit grew out of the ill-fated Conference of Ratisbon held in 1541. The conference was intended to make an attempt at religious unity. Cardinal Gasparo CONTARINI, the delegate of the pope to the conference, accepted a compromise that included an incomplete statement regarding the nature of justification and that deliberately omitted any reference to the concept of merit. This incident served to make some theologians conscious that the doctrine of justification must include teaching on the nature of merit.

Seripando and Laínez. The most significant section of the discussions on justification at Trent was directly concerned with the theory of double justice (see JUSTICE, DOUBLE). This theory was proposed by some theologians as the true doctrine of justification. In fact, it was a compromise position and one that destroyed the Catholic notion of justification. The principal proponent of this theory was Cardinal Girolamo SERIPANDO, and the theory was most effectively opposed by Diego Laínez, a Jesuit theologian. In a treatise that examined the whole question of justification, Laínez thoroughly criticized this theory of double justice and showed that in its ultimate dimensions it was incompatible with the traditional concept of merit. Thus, his speech contained an exposé of merit and included the following ideas: strict merit is based on a concept of justice; the source of the title to a reward arises from justice because meritorious actions come from the grace that truly transforms a man in justification; man's justification is intrinsic to him and makes him a new creature who becomes able to cooperate truly with divine assistance in performing meritorious acts.

Conciliar Doctrine. Chapter 16 of the Tridentine decree on justification deals specifically with merit, the fruit of justification. In the opening sentence of this chapter the Fathers of the council teach that merit is a valid concept that is based on the Scriptural teaching. They insist that the reward for the meritorious action is certain because God in His justice (see JUSTICE OF GOD) will not forget the promise He made to reward. Even though a man may sin after being justified and thereby lose his title to a reward, while he still lives there remains the possibility of the restoration of this title along with the grace he has lost by sin. The conciliar decree next states that merit must be proposed first as a grace, or a gift, and then as a reward given for good works. Herein the council implies two conditions for meriting: (1) God's willingness to accept man's works as worthy of a reward (implicit in the fact that God ordained the economy of meriting) and (2) the goodness of the meritorious act. The decree next specifies that the reward given will be truly a crown of justice. The man who is justified has all that he needs in order to be regarded as having fully satisfied the divine law and as having truly merited eternal life by his works.

The Fathers of the council explain that it is the activity of Christ on His members that supplies the basis for holding that the just man has all that he needs in order to be considered as having fully satisfied the divine law and truly merited eternal life. (It is interesting to note that the verb for merit employed here is promereri, by which theologians had ordinarily referred to condign merit.)

This influence of Christ is necessary and is such that it makes man's work pleasing and meritorious. Christ's influence precedes, accompanies, and follows the good act.

Many theologians after Trent believe that this description envisions the need for an actual grace to make an act meritorious, that there must be a special assistance given to a man to perform each meritorious act. The determination of the kind of special help was not detailed by the council. The Fathers describe the motivation that is to be found in the meriting subject by a general expression that they culled from Scripture. They are content to say that meritorious works must be those that are "performed in God" (Jn 3.21). Thus the council does not settle the question of the role of charity in the performing of meritorious acts.

The decree goes on to explain that meriting does not usurp the rights of God and does not excessively dignify man's actions. The Fathers insist that their understanding of justification makes clear the role of God, Christ, and man. When justice is given to a man it is truly in him and he can operate by it; this same justice is God's who has given it to men through Christ. This explanation shows that the Tridentine bishops conceive of merit as rooted in an intrinsic justification of which the meritorious act is the fruit. Although the justified man can merit, he must do so without overconfidence or a complete self-reliance, since he must recall that he merits only because God's goodness has so ordered things for him. In a note of warning the council teaches that man must look to final judgment with confidence in his merits since God will be faithful to His promise to reward; yet man must ever recall the severity of judgment and therefore not act presumptuously in living his life.

The last canon appended to the decree on justification also deals with merit. Here is found the Church's declaration that merit is a valid concept. The canon teaches that the meritorious action must be good, done through grace, and accomplished by a man who has been justified. Finally this canon states that a man can merit an increase of grace in this life, eternal life, the attaining of eternal life, and the increase of glory. The canon distinguishes between eternal life and the attaining of eternal life and thereby shows that a man's right to eternal life is always conditional while he is still alive. If he dies in the state of grace, however, man has an infallible right to come to eternal life. By mentioning the increase of glory as an object of merit, the canon implies the belief that there are degrees of heavenly beatitude. The degrees correspond to the degrees of merit attained in this life. Since glory is the full flowering of grace, it follows that where there is a greater degree of grace, there will be also a greater degree of glory.

After Trent. From the time of the Council of Trent, and in keeping with its teaching on merit, theologians have described the condignly meritorious act as a morally good act accomplished by a man in this life who is in the state of grace. This act is directed to God in some way. Since such an act must be moved somehow by love, theologians have discussed the influx of charity that would seem to be needed for a meritorious act. All agree that a more intense or a more perfect charity can achieve a greater reward. Since Trent deliberately avoided this question regarding the necessary influx of charity, however, the question has remained an open theological one.

Theologians have discussed also the question of how justice can be involved in meriting. Generally they hold to the Thomistic position that sees the presence of sanctifying grace as the foundation for the proportion existing between the meritorious act and the reward that man attains. Grace makes a man's acts proportionate to the reward, and thus it is the basis in justice for the concept of condign merit. The objects of merit have been studied in greater detail, and theologians generally have made explicit reference to the fact that a man cannot merit justification for himself, final perseverance, or repentance after a fall. Post-Tridentine theology has discussed also the question of the revival of merit after repentance for a fall. There is agreement that merit does revive but there are varying opinions regarding the degree of revival.

Moreover, theology recognizes congruent merit. This, too, is a title for reward but one that arises from the divine liberality. Since God's merciful providence has placed man in an order that looks to a SUPERNATURAL end and He has made the attaining of this end possible through the redemptive action of Christ, it is fitting that God's mercy should continue to operate in favor of the justified man who willingly serves God. Since the justified man is truly the adopted son of God, it is fitting that God's love continue to reward man's efforts to do good.

The justified man has an acquired intrinsic dignity, and God continues to act in a manner truly consonant with His nature when His liberality rewards the good acts of such a man. For this reason theologians hold that a man in grace can congruently merit special graces for himself. They also maintain that such a man can congruently merit a grace (even the grace of justification itself) for another man. This doctrine is basic to the understanding Catholics hold regarding the propriety of praying for another. Finally, a man who is in the state of sin cannot congruently merit the grace of repentance for himself—nor can he merit in behalf of another. The reason for maintaining this position is the fact that the loss of grace deprives a man of any basis for a title to God's liberality.

MERKELBACH, BENOÎT HENRI

Dominican moral theologian; b. Tongres, Belgium, Jan. 6, 1871; d. Louvain, July 25, 1942. He entered the diocesan seminary at Liège and was ordained in 1894. He continued his studies at the University of Louvain and received the licentiate in theology in 1898. He then acquired pastoral experience for seven years as a curate at Hasselt, after which he was recalled to Liège, where he taught dogmatic theology until he became a Dominican in 1917. He received the doctorate in theology at Liège in 1918 and then was assigned to teach moral and pastoral theology at the Dominican studium in Louvain. The master general called him to Rome in 1929 to teach at the Collegio Angelico, as it was then known, where he remained for seven years. In 1936 poor health forced him to return to Louvain, where he continued to teach until his death. Merkelbach wrote many articles for ecclesiastical journals on subjects in dogmatic, moral, and pastoral theology, as well as in sacred scripture. His best-known work, Summa Theologiae Moralis, was published in three volumes from 1931 to 1940. This work not only embodied Thomistic principles but also marked a departure from the casuistic method in moral theology and a return to that of St. Thomas. Merkelbach also had a deep interest in Mariology. He formed a pontifical commission, by order of the Holy See, to study the problem of the mediation of Mary in the economy of grace and produced many erudite studies in Marian doctrine. The most outstanding of these studies is Mariologia: Tractatus de Beatissima Virgine Maria Matre Dei atque Deum inter et homines Mediatrice, published in 1939.

MERKS, THOMAS

Bishop of Carlisle; d. 1409. Merks joined the BENE-DICTINE ORDER at WESTMINSTER ABBEY c. 1376, and he completed his doctoral studies in theology at the University of OXFORD by 1395. In 1397 he became bishop of CARLISLE by papal provision at the petition of Richard II. He was translated in partes infidelium by BONIFACE IX in 1399, was made rector of Todenham, Worcestershire, in 1404, and was granted papal indult on May 31, 1404, for ten years to let his rectory, Sturminster Marshall in Dorset, to farm while he was engaged in study at a university or in service of a prelate or resident at the Roman Curia. In 1404 Merks served as assistant bishop for one year in Winchester, and in 1406 he opened the convocation of Canterbury as the archbishop's commissary. At Lucca, in 1408, he sided against the pope, and he was present at the Council of PISA shortly before his death.

His royal service began when he attached himself to Richard II's Irish expedition in 1394, served the king on diplomatic missions, and was with him in Ireland again in 1399. In the assembly in Westminster Hall (Sept. 30, 1399) he pronounced a defense of Richard II against the general competence of the lords to judge the king, and he lodged a protest against their special iniquity in judging him in his absence. He was accused in a plot against the new King Henry IV (d. 1413) and was held in custody for a while, but he was eventually pardoned and released on bail. Merks was the author of a treatise De moderno dictamine.

MERLEAU-PONTY, MAURICE

French phenomenologist, professor of philosophy at the Collège de France; b. Rochefort-sur-mer (Charente-Maritime), March 14, 1908; d. Paris, May 3, 1961. Of Catholic origin, Merleau-Ponty was admitted to the École Normale Supérieure in 1926. After receiving his doctorate from the Sorbonne in 1945, he taught at the University of Lyons and the Sorbonne (1949-52) until his nomination to the Collège de France. Although not a philosophical theist, Merleau-Ponty requested and received a religious burial service, an indication that he remained open on the question of personal religious belief. Situated within the movement most accurately designated as existential PHENOMENOLOGY, Merleau-Ponty's thought manifests affinities with the work of J. P. Sartre, M. Heidegger, and G. Marcel (see EXISTENTIALISM). E. HUSSERL, especially of the late period, remains the principal philosophical influence; G. W. F. HEGEL was a significant but less dominant source. Committed phenomenology as the philosophical method that would permit surpassing the subject-object, idealism-realism dichotomy of modern philosophy, Merleau-Ponty developed and transformed the phenomenology of Husserl into a more concrete and realistic philosophy. His major works consist of (1) detailed critical analyses of the sciences of man as well as of the classical modern rationalist philosophers and (2) an elucidation of the basic structures of human existence based upon man's immediate experience of the world, others, and himself. Later works develop his thought in the areas of aesthetics, political philosophy, and philosophy of history.

MERLINI, GIOVANNI

Moderator general of the Society of the Most PRE-CIOUS BLOOD; b. Spoleto, Italy, Aug. 28, 1795; d. Rome, Jan. 12, 1873. In 1820, two years after his ordination, he was received by St. Gaspare del BUFALO into the society, founded five years previously. As a preacher of missions Merlini gained so much renown that he was given charge of the more difficult ones. From 1847 until his death he served as the congregation's third moderator general. During his tenure of office, which coincided with a disturbed period in history, the institute expanded in the U.S., spread to Germany, and maintained itself well in Italy. At Merlini's suggestion, Pius IX extended (1849) to the universal Church the feast of the Most Precious Blood (July 1). Merlini was the spiritual director of Bl. Maria de MATTIAS from her youth and was her guide and ecclesiastical superior in the founding and direction of the Sisters Adorers of the Most Precious Blood. Among the many others who sought Merlini's spiritual counsel was Princess Adelaide Wolkonska, a convert and the mother of the Russian ambassador to Naples. Humility, meekness, and charity were prominent among Merlini's virtues. His remains rest in the society's church of S. Maria in Trivio, Rome. The decree introducing his cause for beatification was issued in 1927.

MERMILLOD, GASPARD

Swiss cardinal and pioneer in modern Catholic social movements; b. Carouge, Switzerland, Sept. 22, 1824; d. Rome, Feb. 23, 1892. After studies at the Jesuit college at Fribourg and ordination in 1847, Mermillod served as a curate in Geneva where he established two periodicals, Les Annales Catholiques and L'Observateur Catholique (1856–67). In 1857 he was appointed pastor of the city and vicar-general to the bishop of Lausanne for the canton of Geneva. He built the church of Notre Dame at Geneva between 1851 and 1859 with funds subscribed from all parts of Christendom. In 1864 he was consecrated titular bishop of Hebron and auxiliary bishop of Lausanne for the canton of Geneva. During his first seven years as bishop he was especially active in the cause of Catholic education, founding with Maria Salesia Chappuis the female Oblates of St. Francis of Sales at Troyes for the protection of poor working girls.

When the Holy See made him independent administrator of Geneva (1870), the radical government of the canton protested. A long and serious conflict ensued. Mermillod was at first forbidden to exercise any episcopal functions whatever and later was declared deposed even as a parish priest. When the bishop of Lausanne renounced unconditionally the title of Geneva and Mermillod was appointed vicar apostolic (1873), he was exiled from Switzerland. He repaired across Lake Geneva to Ferney in France, whence he governed his diocese as best he could. At the cessation of the religious conflict Leo XIII made the newly elected bishop of Lausanne bishop of Geneva as well, without, however, depriving Mermillod of his office. The government did not alter its tactics, and Mermillod was able to return to Switzerland only after he succeeded to the Diocese of Lausanne (1883). The conflict was by no means ended even then, for the canton of Geneva refused to recognize him as bishop, and normal relations were resumed only when he become a cardinal (1890).

Mermillod was one of the great preachers of modern times. In his far-sighted policy he founded, in 1885, the Union catholique d'études sociales et économiques (Union de Fribourg) that held international conferences on the social question and prepared the way for the encyclical RERUM NOVARUM. His Lettres à un protestant sur l'autorité de l'Église et le schisme (Paris 1859) made a great impression. Another important work was his De la Vie surnaturelle dans les âmes (Paris and Lyons 1865).

MÉRODE, FRÉDÉRIC GHISLAIN DE

Archbishop, minister of war, and almoner of Pius IX; b. Brussels, March 20, 1820; d. Rome, July 10, 1874. Of noble birth, he studied classics at Namur, and military science at Brussels. After distinguishing himself for bravery as a soldier in Algiers (1844–45), he studied for the priesthood at the Roman College (1847–49). When Pius IX's prime minister Pellegrino ROSSI, was assassinated (Nov. 16, 1848), Mérode, with his usual impetuosity, doffed his cassock and hurried to the Quirinal with pistols at his hip to defend the beleaguered pope. When Pius IX returned from Gaeta (April 12, 1850), he learned of Mérode's loyalty and made him his chamberlain on active duty. An extraordinarily close friendship developed between the refined, handsome Italian pope and the gigantically tall, somewhat blustering Belgian soldier and priest. Pius IX took him on all his journeys through the STATES OF THE CHURCH. Mérode was the one who induced the pope to build an army, and to put Lamoricière in charge (see ZOUAVES, PAPAL). As war minister, Mérode was ever at odds with Cardinal ANTONELLI, the secretary of state, who preferred diplomacy to arms. The populace blamed Mérode for all the military reverses in the conflicts with the emerging Kingdom of Italy. Pressure became so strong that Pius IX reluctantly asked for his resignation (Oct. 6, 1865). Mérode then became papal almoner. He was consecrated titular archbishop of Melitene (June 22, 1866). Until 1870 he enlarged and modernized the streets of Rome and introduced agricultural reforms. Thereafter he devoted himself exclusively to charitable causes. His character was a mixture of romantic dreamer, ascetical monk, cavalier soldier, and outspoken counselor.

MEROVINGIANS

A family of Frankish origin which established an extensive kingdom in Gaul during the late 5th and early 6th centuries over which the family ruled until 751. The Merovingian dynasty drew its name from Merovech, a semilegendary chieftain of the Salian Franks during the period in the mid-5th century that witnessed the rise of that branch of the larger Frankish people to prominence in northern Gaul between the lower Rhine and the Somme rivers.

Clovis I. The real founder of the dynasty was CLOVIS (ruled 481 or 482–511), grandson of Merovech, whose succession as leader of the Salian Franks was by right of blood, giving to the heirs of Merovech a sacral position, which served them well in terms of retaining the allegiance of their subjects. But Clovis also owed much to the advantages his predecessors had gained as allies serving the Roman imperial government in its efforts to retain its hold over northern Gaul. Clovis made his mark chiefly as a successful warlord who won a series of victories over various rivals: over Syagrius, a general who was the last to claim to represent Roman imperial authority in northern Gaul; over the Alemanni, Germanic rivals of the Franks; over the VISIGOTHS, another Germanic people already established as rulers of southern Gaul and Spain; and over the chieftains of other Frankish tribes who were rivals of the Salians. These triumphs made Clovis the sole ruler over the kingdom of the Franks, which by his death in 511 embraced most of Gaul as well as an important foothold east of the Rhine and which was generally recognized as a major power in the western part of the old Roman Empire.

Clovis was more than a successful, albeit brutal warrior king. Although the extent of Frankish settlement in Gaul remains an open question, there seems little doubt that there were few Frankish settlers compared to the indigenous population and that the heaviest Frankish settlements were between the Seine and the Rhine. Their numerical inferiority made their rule of a vast realm inhabited by non-Franks difficult. Without ever abandoning the use of force as an instrument of power, Clovis took important steps to establish the effective institutional foundations that allowed his family to rule the Frankish kingdom for more than two centuries and to play an important role in shaping the future course of western European history. His conversion to orthodox Christianity, the religion of most of the people occupying the territory he conquered, was a decisive factor in making his regime acceptable. His decision meant that he repudiated ARIAN-ISM, a version of Christianity adhered to by his rival Germanic kings but viewed as heretical by most of his Gallo-Roman subjects; his championing of orthodoxy was especially important in rallying the Gallic episcopacy to the support of his regime. In organizing the administration of his vastly enlarged kingdom Clovis left intact a wide array of Roman administrative structures and practices concerned with justice, taxation, and law enforcement. As a consequence, the establishment of the new ruling regime meant little change for much of the population of the kingdom of the Franks. From the beginning of his reign Clovis drew Gallo-Romans into service in his army and his political administration. He thereby provided a setting in which the assimilation of the conquering Franks and the conquered Gallo-Romans, especially the elite Gallo-Romans, rapidly took shape. The vast amount of land that his conquests put at his disposal allowed Clovis to reward his Frankish followers with grants of land that turned them into major landholders whose economic interests and lifestyles were increasingly similar to those of the indigenous aristocracy of Gaul. These measures marked a major step in making Clovis king of all who lived in Francia rather than being merely king of the Salian Franks.

Power Struggles after the Death of Clovis. After Clovis' death in 511, his kingdom was divided among his four sons, each being awarded a portion of the territory between the Rhine and Loire which constituted the heartland of kingdom of the Franks along with an important city in that territory as a capital (Paris, Soissons, Orleans, and Reims), and each was assigned a portion of Frankish holdings south of the Loire in Aquitaine. This division was dictated in part by Germanic custom which provided that each surviving male should receive a share of a father's patrimony while maintaining that that patrimony, that is, the kingdom, remained an entity belonging to the family. No less important in shaping the division were the concerns of Clovis' queen, Chlotilde, who was anxious to protect the interests of her three sons by Clovis against the ambitions of an older and more experienced son of Clovis by a concubine. This practice of dividing the kingdom among royal heirs became the source of endless intrigue and frequent bloody strife among members of the Merovingian family and their followers, who were trying to take advantage of their kinsmen to gain a larger share of the kingdom of the Franks. The baneful effect of such civil strife was somewhat veiled during the reigns of Clovis' sons, the last of whom died in 561. It was muted by the continuation of Frankish expansion and the policy of assimilation begun by Clovis. Working together and separately, his sons solidified Frankish control in Aquitaine, added the realm of the Thuringians, the kingdom of Burgundy, Provence, and Rhaetia to the kingdom of the Franks. They also conducted raids into Spain, the land of the Saxons, and Italy that produced booty and tribute. By 561 the kingdom of the Franks under the Merovingians reached its greatest size and the zenith of its standing in the western part of the empire once ruled by the Romans.

In 561 the kingdom, briefly united under Clovis' last surviving son, Chlothar I, was again divided among his four sons. The next half-century witnessed a succession of savage struggles for power. The causes of these struggles were multiple: the ambitions of individual kings; the need of rival Merovingian family members to prove on the battlefield their suitability for kingship; the neversated urge of members of the royal family to fill their coffers with booty to reward their followers; the unexpected death of kings, often at the hands of assassins, leaving a power vacuum that stoked the ambitions of royal relatives; muddied rights of succession brought about by serial marriages of the kings; the intrigues of aristocratic families seeking to win royal favor or to escape from rulers attempting to limit aristocratic privilege; and the ambitions of queens, especially widowed queens, to assure the well-being of their offspring. As the family rivalry and successive partitions of the kingdom unfolded, a division of the kingdom into three distinct entities began to take shape: Austrasia, in the northeast centered between the valleys of the Meuse and the Rhine rivers and including Alemannia and Thuringia east of the Rhine; Neustria, the northwestern region of the kingdom centered in the Seine valley and extending to the Loire on the south and the borders of Austrasia on the north and east; and Burgundy, located in the valleys of the Saôn and the Rhône rivers. Peripheral territories, such as Aquitaine, Provence, and Bavaria sought to elude Frankish control without ever being totally successful. Some of the most violent chapters in this phase of Merovingian history were stoked by a rivalry that pitted Brunhilde (d. 613), a Visigothic princess who was the wife, mother, and grandmother of a succession of kings ruling over Austrasia and for a time Burgundy, against Fredegund (d. 597), consort and mother of successive kings of Neustria. This violent chapter in Merovingian history finally ended with an uprising of the aristocracy of Austrasia which resulted in gruesome murder of Brunhilde in 613. That revolt was triggered in part by Brunhilde's effort to institute measures aimed at curbing the steady growth of aristocratic power at the expense of royal authority, a development that was a major consequence of a half-century of strife within the royal family.

With the elimination in 613 of Brunhilde and her grandsons as rulers of Austrasia and Burgundy, the entire Frankish kingdom was reunited under Chlothar II, a son of Fredegund, who had ruled in Neustria since 584, and his son, Dagobert I (629-638). During this quarter century of relative peace the Merovingian dynasty reached its apogee. Chlothar recognized that the local power of aristocratic families had expanded to the point where they played a decisive role in the governance of the kingdom and that their support was crucial to royal authority. He sought to regularize relationships between crown and nobles by issuing an edict in 614 that made important concessions to the nobles in terms of controlling appointments of local officials while clarifying the sphere of royal authority. Chlothar II and Dagobert I encouraged members of aristocratic families to come to the royal court, increasingly fixed at Paris, where they could be educated for royal office and earn rewards resulting from personal ties with the king. They could also make contacts with other aristocrats and fashion marriage alliances that would enhance family fortunes. The rulers increased their reliance on bishops and abbots as agents of royal power, a policy that involved royal control over appointments to those offices and grants of immunity, which freed church property from royal control. Their religious policy gave increasing weight to religious ideas as the ideological underpinning of monarchy that had earlier emphasized a warrior ethos.

The Rise of Aristocratic Families. Upon the death of Dagobert I in 639 the kingdom of the Franks was divided between his two sons; one ruled over Neustria and Burgundy, and the other reigned in Austrasia. Although men of some ability, they were unable to contain the seemingly irresistible advance of the local aristocratic families toward control of Gaul. The kings became "donothing kings" (rois fainéants), living dissolute lives and often dying young, sometimes as victims of assassins. Real power in the kingdom of the Franks was increasingly wielded by aristocratic factions, especially those led by one of the chief officials in each of the royal courts, the mayor of the palace. He utilized the wealth and prestige attached to that office to form extensive followings powerful enough to threaten royal power and rival aristocratic families. These factions and their leaders were not interested in ending Merovingian rule. Rather, they sought to control the royal office and its resources as a means of expanding and enriching their local bases of power. The violent rivalry among these factions finally culminated in 687, when an Austrasian faction, led by Pepin II of Herstal, won a decisive victory over a Neustrian force in a battle at Tertry. Pepin II counted among his ancestors a certain ARNULF (d. 643/647), a rich aristocrat who served many years in the Austrasian royal court and then became bishop of Metz, and Pepin I of Landen (d. 640), likewise a descendant of a powerful family who served the Austrasian king as mayor of the palace and used that office to increase his wealth and expand his circle of followers. These two men collaborated in bringing about the downfall of Queen Brunhilde in 613. The position of this dynasty, known variously as the Arnulfings or the Pippinids or eventually the CAROLINGIANS, was greatly strengthened by the marriage of Arnulf's son to Pepin I's daughter. Their son, Pepin II, was the victor at Tertry.

Decline of the Merovingians. Pepin II's victory at Tertry marked a turning point in the history of the Merovingian dynasty, setting it on a path toward its end. Pepin II assumed control of the office of mayor of the palace in Austrasia, Neustria, and Burgundy, thereby beginning a de facto reunification of the kingdom of the Franks. It was still theoretically ruled by Merovingian kings, but it was coming increasingly under Pepin's control. He was able to contain the resistance to his domination that still existed, and his cause was helped by the good will still enjoyed by the "long-haired kings" whom he claimed to serve. At his death in 714 the dominant position he had established was briefly threatened by efforts of aristocrats in Neustria to escape Austrasian authority, by the Frisians who allied with the Neustrians to remove the threat of Pippinid expansion, and by a quarrel within Pepin II's family over succession. The victor was his illegitimate son, Charles, later dubbed Martel (the Hammer), who until his death in 741 utilized his position as mayor of the palace, serving the Merovingian kings but also using them to overcome internal opposition. He reestablished control over Burgundians, Alemanni, Thuringians, and Aquitainians, all of whom had enjoyed some success in escaping Frankish control. He also won a victory over Muslim invaders of Gaul at a battle near Poitiers in 732 that led some to hail him as the savior of Christendom. Although CHARLES MARTEL left the Merovingian throne vacant after 737, his heirs as joint mayors of the palace, PEPIN III the Short and CARLOMAN, sought to fortify their position among the Frankish aristocracy by arranging the selection of a member of the Merovingian dynasty as king in 743. A few years later Pepin III, who became sole mayor of the palace after the retreat of Carloman to monastic life, turned to Pope STEPHEN II to ask whether or not it was right that he who had no power should enjoy the title of king. A response from the pope indicating that he who held power should be king emboldened Pepin in 751 to request and receive from his magnates election as king of the Franks. Once elected Pepin III deposed the last Merovingian, Childeric III.

The Significance of the Merovingian Dynasty. The Merovingian dynasty has not enjoyed a good reputation over the centuries; the period during which they ruled has repeatedly been described as the darkest of the Dark Ages. In part, they earned a bad name by their penchant for violence and treachery. In part, their reputation was blackened by Carolingian propagandists seeking to justify the usurpation of the Frankish crown by the dynasty that replaced the Merovingians. The dynasty had the misfortune to be center stage during an era when the territory and the population over which it ruled were suffering from the effects resulting from the transformation of the civilization of the Mediterranean world once ruled by the Romans. That tortured process witnessed long-term developments in western Europe that cast a shadow of failure over those involved: depopulation; the decline of urban life; the shrinking of trade; the onset of agricultural self-sufficiency; the fragmentation of political authority; the militarization of society; the depression of the lower classes of society into dependency; the barbarization of literary culture; the paganization of religious life; the vulgarization of manners.

When viewed from a perspective defined by this grim setting and when new evidence resulting from archeological investigations is taken into account, the history of the Merovingians does not seem quite so negative. Rather, the Merovingian epoch appears as a time of new beginnings which had major importance in relieving the stresses cause by the demise of Roman civilization and in shaping the future of Western Europe. As rulers the Merovingians created a political and social environment which promoted the assimilation of conquerors and conquered. That process resulted in the survival of vital elements of both pre-Merovingian Germanic and Roman cultures and the recombination of these survivals into political, legal, social, economic, and mental structures that provided the institutional framework for a new civilization based in northwestern Europe. Even in Merovingian times the vitality of the new structures was demonstrated by such things as slowly increasing population, land clearance, the renewal of cities as religious centers, the development of new trade routes linking northern Gaul, the British Isles, and Scandinavia, and the development of new technical skills, especially in metal-working. The Merovingian rulers pursued a policy that promoted the spread of a common form of Christianity as a unifying and stabilizing force in society. Their support of the episcopacy was crucial to the development of the internal organization of the Christian community and to the enhancement of that organization's capacity to enlarge its role in meeting the spiritual and material needs of the faithful, especially those living in an increasingly rural world. Their patronage of monasticism, especially that form introduced by the Irish monk, Columbanus, was crucial in expanding the role of that institution in converting pagans, defining new forms of piety, especially those appealing to the aristocracy increasingly rural in outlook, and encouraging the survival and renewal of Latin literary culture as an instrument for deepening the faith. When those facets of the history of the Merovingian dynasty are taken into account, it becomes obvious that the future history of Europe cannot be reconstructed without considering what happened during the two and a half centuries of Merovingian rule.

MERRICK, MARY VIRGINIA

Social worker; b. Washington, D.C., Nov. 2, 1866; d. Washington, D.C., Jan. 10, 1955. Her father, Richard Merrick, a descendant of the Brents and Calverts of Maryland, was a lawyer, and her mother, Nannie McGuire, an Episcopalian convert. As a young girl, Mary Merrick was crippled; she spent the rest of her life confined to a bed and wheelchair. Cardinal James Gibbons gave permission, renewed by his successors, for Mass to be said for her wherever she might be. She was educated by a French governess, and translated two French books for children and wrote two other books, Life of Christ (1909) and The Altar of God (1920).

Her interest in the poor led to the founding in 1886 of the Christ Child Society, which provided clothing and gifts for children at Christmas. Later the society established a settlement house, a convalescent home, summer camps, a boys' club, and other services. From Washington, D.C., it spread to other cities where similar programs were developed. By 1955 there were 37 chapters and 12,000 members, with professional social workers directing many of the society's projects and volunteers giving extensive service. Until her death Merrick served as president of the society, enlisting the active cooperation of others interested in child welfare. She was awarded the Laetare medal (1915) by the University of Notre Dame, Ind., the Cosmopolitan Club medal (1933) for civic work, and the papal medal Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice (1937).

MERRY DEL VAL, RAFAEL

Cardinal, papal secretary of state (1903 to 1914); b. London, Oct. 10, 1865; d. Rome, Feb. 26, 1930. His father, a diplomat, was a Spanish marquis; his mother was English. After studies in England and Belgium, he entered the seminary at Ushaw, England, transferring (1885) to the Pontifical Scots College, Rome, and then, at the urging of Pope Leo XIII, to the Pontificia Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici, where he was ordained (Dec. 30, 1888). Entering the papal diplomatic service, he was first named a chamberlain, and was then sent on missions to London, Berlin, and Vienna. Because of his competence and zeal for the conversion of England, he was asked to collaborate (1895-96) in the preparation of the apostolic letters Amantissimae voluntatis and APOSTOLICAE CURAE. He was also apostolic delegate to Canada (1897). From 1899 he presided over the Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici. He became titular archbishop of Nicaea (1900). As secretary of the conclave (July 1903), he was commissioned to beg Cardinal Sarto not to refuse the papacy.

Pius X chose him pro-secretary of state immediately upon election, secretary of state (Oct. 18), and created him cardinal (Nov. 9). His distinction and lofty virtues attracted the pope, as did the diversity of his diplomatic and linguistic talents, which contrasted with and complemented Pius X's background. Thenceforth, he was the faithful executor of the decisions of Pius X, who was more self-willed than is sometimes realized. But Merry del Val remained to the end the pope's counselor. His personal rigidity and great influence with the pope made unlikely a lack of vigor in the conduct of the pontificate, especially in the affairs of the secretariate of state. Merry del Val has been reproached for his protest, addressed to Catholic governments, at the visit of the French President Loubet to the king of Italy in Rome (April 1904). Yet this note was no more vigorous than that in which Cardinal RAMPOLLA revealed (June 1903) to the Quai d'Orsay the grave implications of the "offense" given to the pope, despoiled of Rome and the states of the Church. Merry del Val's text was published in Paris (May 17) by the Socialist journal, L'Humanité, to which the prince of Monaco had mailed it. A violent campaign against the Roman note soon developed. Complaint was especially strong because the note had been sent to foreign chanceries and because this version contained a phrase (omitted from the text dispatched to Paris) judged unacceptable to France. As a result the French ambassador was recalled, and replaced for a short time by a chargé d'affaires. The secretary of state, however, actively supported the more conciliatory attitude of Pius X toward the Italian government. Despite the Irish problem, he maintained a good understanding with England. In 1914 he signed a concordat with Serbia. Merry del Val has been blamed for an extreme doctrinal rigorism, which led him to utilize Monsignor BENIGNI, head of Italian INTEGRALISM and founder of the SODALITIUM PIANUM. Yet the cardinal frequently strove to moderate Benigni, rousing the latter's open complaint.

Politically the influence of the secretary of state ended with the death of Pius X. Merry del Val also fulfilled diligently his duties of archpriest of Saint Peter's Basilica, secretary of the Holy Office, member of several Roman congregations, and papal legate to Assisi. He was buried, as he wished, in the grotto of St. Peter's Basilica at the foot of Pius X's tomb. At the request of the Spanish hierarchy, Pius XII authorized (Feb. 26, 1953) the opening of a process of information concerning his renown for sanctity.

MERSCH, ÉMILE

Theologian; b. Marche, Belgium, July 30, 1890; d. Lenz, France, May 23, 1940. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1907. During his theological studies (1914–18) he began the long work that, with many other absorbing activities, was to occupy him until his premature death 23 years later: a synthesis of the doctrine of the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST as the center of all the great Christian dogmas. As philosophy professor at Namur from 1920 to 1935, he assumed various intellectual and religious tasks at the college, at the diocesan seminary, and in the city itself. Among his philosophical works, L'Obligation morale: Principe de liberté (Louvain 1927) stands out. Mersch's religious influence was profound because of his human warmth and his ability to inspire others with his own ideals.

Before trying to construct the dogmatic synthesis of the doctrine of the Mystical Body, Mersch realized that a preliminary work based on scripture and patristic tradition was necessary. Lengthy research occupied all of his free time from 1920 to 1929, and he published in 1933 the two-volume Le Corps mystique du Christ: Études de théologie historique (Louvain). The book was an immediate success, not only among Catholics, but also in Protestant theological circles. This success necessitated a second (1936) and a third (1951) edition, and in 1938 the English translation, The Whole Christ, was published (Milwaukee).

Rafael Merry Del Val.

Mersch then returned to his initial plan, the theological synthesis of the doctrine of the Mystical Body. After his death three successive drafts were identified. While contributing many articles on this subject to various magazines (e.g., 24 articles in Nouvelle Revue Théologique from 1926 to 1940), he almost completed the third draft of his synthesis at Louvain (1935–40). He drew up a moral and ascetic synthesis parallel to the dogmatic synthesis: Morale et corps mystique appeared in 1937 [4th edition in 1951; English translation: Morality and the Mystical Body (New York 1939)].

In the beginning of May 1940, Mersch was forced by the events of war to leave Louvain for exile, having been given the task of looking out for the safety of several older fathers. He took with him the manuscript of the third draft of his dogmatic synthesis. His life ended in a series of acts of self-sacrifice. On May 23, 1940, in the presbytery of the French town of Lenz, in spite of the frequent bombardments, he offered to take relief to several wounded persons. In this act of charity he met death, a death probably preceded by a great sacrifice for him: uncertainty for two days about the fate of his manuscript, in which he had concentrated so much hope. His body was first buried in the cemetery of Lenz; after the war it was brought back to Namur.

The manuscript of the completed part of the third draft of his dogmatic synthesis was recovered. With the help of the two former drafts left by the author at Louvain and at Brussels, the work was reconstructed enough to remain the faithful expression of his whole thought. In July 1944, it appeared in two volumes under the title Théologie du corps mystique (Brussels) and is now in its 4th edition [English translation: The Theology of the Mystical Body (St. Louis 1951)].

MERTEN, BLANDINA, BL.

Baptized Maria Magdalena, virgin of the Ursuline Sisters of Mount Calvary, Ahrweiler; b. July 10, 1883, Düppenweiler, Saarland, Germany; d. May 18, 1918, Trier, Rhineland Palatinate, Germany. Maria Magdalena was the ninth child of a peasant family. After she completed grammar school, a tutor helped her prepare (1898-99) for entrance to the teachers' college of Marienau bei Vallendar, where she studied from 1899 to 1902. After passing the licensing examination, she was a teacher in Oberthal, Saarland, then taught in Morscheid, Hunsrück (1903-07) and Großrosseln an der Saar (1907–08). A chance meeting with the Ursuline superior of Kalvarienberg, Ahrweiler, led to her entry into the order (April 22, 1908) and profession of temporary vows (Nov. 3, 1910). Thereafter she taught children in the order's schools at Saarbrücken and Trier. She professed her final vows in 1913 and contracted tuberculosis shortly thereafter. She endured her illness with resolute patience and remained committed to her teaching obligations until her death. On May 18, 1990, Sister Blandina's mortal remains were transferred to her new titular chapel, designed by Karl P. Böhr, in Trier's Saint Paulin cemetery. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II, Nov. 1, 1987.

Feast: May 18.

MERTON, THOMAS

Trappist monk, poet, and author; b. Jan. 31, 1915, Prades, France; d. Dec. 10, 1968, Bangkok, Thailand. The son of artists, his father, Owen Merton from New Zealand and his mother Ruth Jenkins Merton from America, Merton pursued his studies in Europe and America in literature, particularly in poetry, in which art he was first recognized and came to excel. Imbued with a strong social sense which led him simultaneously to espouse basic charity and to test an attraction to monasticism, he became a Catholic in 1938, and in 1941 entered the Trappist abbey of Our Lady of Gethsemani in Kentucky.

The publication of his autobiography, The Seven Storey Mountain, in 1948 brought him into international prominence. He began a series of writings on various spiritual subjects which was constantly to try his monastic vocation as they made him a famous celebrity. He was one of the first, and among the few in his time, to reemphasize the primary value of the contemplative life and to ground it in sound scholarship and social concern. Through his writings and example, he inspired and trained a generation of Christian contemplatives, not only in the Bernardian Cistercian tradition of strict monasticism with a watchful eye on the outside world, but also in the Carmelite tradition of St. John of the Cross. In his last years he lived out the same contradiction—a hermit yet one whose advice and friendship were sought by many great men, notably Jacques Maritain, a principal adviser of Pope Paul VI. As perhaps the most famous monk in the world at the time, and while investigating the ideologies and resources of Far Eastern spirituality, he died suddenly in Bangkok, at the first Pan-Asian Monastic Conference, an international congress on the future of monasticism, half a world away from the hermitage he had sought and found in Kentucky, and at the very height of his spiritual perception.

Merton's own works are numerous. Among the more significant are Asian Journal (New York 1972); Conjectures of a Guilty Bystander (Garden City 1968); Faith and Violence (South Bend 1968); New Seeds of Contemplation (New York 1972); No Man Is an Island (Garden City 1955); Selected Poems (Garden City 1967); Seven Storey Mountain (Garden City 1970); The New Man (New York 1981) and The Climate of Monastic Prayer (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1973).

MERULO, CLAUDIO

Renaissance organist and composer whose imaginative compositions initiated an independent literature for the organ; b. Correggio, Italy, April 8, 1533; d. Parma, May 4, 1604. His family name was Merlotti; he was known also as Claudio da Correggio. His career as organist began at the cathedral in Brescia in 1556. Thereafter he was second organist at St. Mark's, Venice (1557-66); first organist there (1566-82); and court organist at the Steccata (ducal) chapel in Parma (1584 on). He was an inspiring teacher, drawing students from all over Europe, and was also involved in organ building and, briefly, music publishing. Although he was a madrigalist of merit, his greater significance lies in his development of organ music. In particular by his use of alternating passages of technical virtuosity with passages of recitative quality or with quiet ricercar-like sections, he gave the toccata a more clearly defined character. His harmonies and passage work reveal much imagination and daring. In part 1 of Il Transilvano (1593), his pupil Girolamo Diruta (1550–?) synthesizes current musical practice and especially Merulo's teachings regarding the aesthetic as well as the technical aspects of performance.

MESCHLER, MORITZ

Jesuit spiritual writer; b. Brig (Switzerland), Sept. 16, 1830; d. Exaeten (Holland), Dec. 3, 1912. The religious training he received from his mother and a rigorous classical education under the Jesuits and Benedictines contributed to the formation of his robust and charming personality. He entered the Society of Jesus at the age of 20 and, after his ordination, filled various positions of trust: master of novices, provincial, assistant to the general, spiritual director, and writer. His spiritual doctrine, though rooted in revelation and developed according to solid theological principles, was the fruit of personal experience, keen observation and prolonged reflection during his years of religious life rather than the product of scientific research. His manner of presentation was clear, analytical, and systematic, yet graced with charm and richness of description. He conceived perfection as a height to be scaled—much like his native Alps—by heroic effort, with Christ as guide and source of strength, so that his doctrine revolved around two poles: the attractive force of Christ's humanity, and the need for earnest moral and intellectual effort. Though he predated the encyclicals Mediator Dei and Mystici corporis by 50 years, his spirituality was remarkably Christocentric and liturgically oriented. Among his best known works available in English are: The Life of Jesus Christ (Freiburg 1909) and Three Fundamental Principles of the Spiritual Life (2d ed. St. Louis, Mo. 1912).

MESHA INSCRIPTION

A 34-line inscription of King Mesha (Mesa) of Moab on a STELE of black basalt measuring 44 by 28 by 14 inches, discovered in 1868 at Dhībân (Old Testament, Dibon) in Transjordan, ancient Moab. While negotiations for its removal were going on, the local Bedouin, suspecting the value of the antiquity and hoping to command a higher price by selling each piece individually, smashed it into many pieces, but not before C. Clermont-Ganneau had secured a squeeze (facsimile impression) while it was still intact. Two large fragments and 18 small ones were recovered, and the missing portions were reconstructed from the squeeze; so that the inscription can be read in a fairly complete text. Since 1873 the stele has been in the Louvre.

The two letters missing from the name of King Mesha's father in the first line kmš— can be supplied from a fragment of an early Moabite inscription published by W. L. Reed and F. V. Winnett [The Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 172 (1964) 1–9], so that the full name reads kmšyt. The divine name Chemosh (Chamos) appears in Ugaritic as kmt, while yt figures among Ugaritic personal names.

Though scholars admit the close similarity of MOAB-ITE to Biblical Hebrew, they do not agree on the precise terms in which to define it linguistically. Some label it a Canaanite dialect, just as Hebrew is a Canaanite dialect, while others prefer to term it a dialect of Hebrew, just as the Byblos Phoenician inscriptions are a dialect of Phoenician. Two respected scholars have even proposed that the text was composed by an Israelite captive, since the text itself states that Mesha employed Israelite prisoners in the construction of Qarhoh (apparently a place in or near Dibon). There are, however, several features that set Moabite off from Hebrew, such as the masculine plural and dual ending in - n, as against Hebrew - m; the third person masculine singular suffix - h as against Hebrew - \bar{o} ; so one is justified in using the term Moabite dialect.

After the dedication the account begins in line five with the statement that Chemosh was angry with his people and allowed Amri (Omri), King of Israel (876-869 B.C.), to subdue Moab. The text specifies that it was Amri who conquered northern Moab as far south as the Arnon, information that supplements 1 Kgs 16.21–28. When Amri's son succeeded to the throne, he too promised, "I will humble Moab," but Mesha was successful in breaking Israel's strong hold over Moab so that "Israel completely perished forever." Amri's son was Achab (Ahab: 8697-850), but 2 Kgs 1.1; 3.5 states that Moab took advantage of the confusion following the death of Achab to revolt. This apparently conflicting testimony can be resolved, it would seem, by interpreting line 8, bnh, usually "his son," by "his grandson," since bn can denote "grandson" (cf. Gn 29.5). Hence the successful Moabite revolt that the stele commemorates took place under Joram (Jehoram: 849-842). This is further sustained by 2 Kgs 3.3–27, which describes Joram's military campaign to crush the rebellious Moabites, a campaign that was successful until the Israelites were forced to retire when Mesha offered his eldest son as a sacrifice to Chemosh, a fact not mentioned in the inscription.

The text mentions ten place names in Israel and five in Moab, and shows that the practice of hērem or ban (anathema) was observed in Moab. It also states that Moab's subjection to Israel was the result of Chemosh's anger, and that there was a Yahweh sanctuary in NEBO.

MESOPOTAMIA, ANCIENT

As the term is now used, Mesopotamia designates the land between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates extending from the Kurdish foothills in the north to the Persian Gulf in the south. The Greek term μεσοποτάμια, from which the English word is derived, was coined at the time of Alexander the Great to designate the part of Syria that lies between the Euphrates and the Tigris, or what would now be called northern Mesopotamia (Arrian, Anabasis 7.7.3). The Greeks, however, borrowed the term, in translated form, from the local Aramaic-speaking inhabitants, who called this region bên naharîn (between the rivers), as in the gloss on Gn 4.1 in the Genesis Apocryphon of Qumran. The Aramaic term probably goes back in turn to the Akkadian bīrīt nārim, literally "between the river" (in the singular), which designated the land within the western bend of the Euphrates, i.e., the far western part of the modern Jazireh of northern Iraq. That this Akkadian term referred to this very limited region seems certain from the fact that this region must be the same as the one that the Assyro-Babylonians called māt bīrītim, which lay to the east of māt ebirtim (literally "the land on the other side"), i.e., the land across the river (eber nārim) from the viewpoint of the Assryo-Babylonians, the region to the west of the Euphrates. By a similar extension of meaning the Hebrew term 'ăram nahăraim, Aram Naharaim (Gn 24.10), which originally referred only to northern Syria on both sides of the Euphrates (called Naharin by the Egyptians), was later used in regard to the land between the Euphrates and the Tigris.

GEOGRAPHY

Mesopotamia is the region that lies between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates and extends from the Kurdish foothills in the north to the Persian Gulf in the south. Beyond the rivers, the Mesopotamian plain is bordered by the steeply scarped Zagros Mountains to the east, and by the wastes of the Syro-Arabian desert to the west. Within this area, the terrain becomes progressively lower as one moves south, descending some 1,000 feet between the foothills and the steppes and swamplands of the south; to the lowering in altitude corresponds a decrease in rainfall: the uplands of the north receive orographic rain in sufficient quantity to support agriculture, but on the lower part of the plain the total annual rainfall does not exceed 6 to 8 inches, so that agriculture, throughout most of the area, is dependent on artificial irrigation. The climate varies greatly, ranging from 20 to 120 degrees with severe winter winds from the Armenian and Iranian highlands and a hot summer draught from the Persian Gulf.

The Euphrates, rising with the Tigris in the mountains of Armenia, proceeds at first in a westerly direction, but is deflected by the mountains of Taurus and Anti-

Taurus toward the southeast, and is then joined by the Balikh and Khabur. The triangle of land formed by these rivers was thickly populated in antiquity, its most notable settlements being Carchemish (Charchamis) on the Euphrates and Haran on the upper Balikh. Though the Euphrates is not navigable for any great distance, its banks provided a central route of land travel to Syria, along which were situated the cities of Mari and, at a later period, DURA-EUROPOS.

The Tigris flows in a generally southeastern direction, first through the Kurdish hills and then, south of Mosul, into unbroken alluvial plains and is navigable from Diyarbekir in the north. On the Tigris, between the confluences of the Upper and Lower Zab with that river, lies the ancient city of ASSUR, the heartland of the Empire of ASSYRIA.

At present the two rivers converge to within 25 miles of one another near modern Baghdad, then flow apart, to join at Qurna and flow together, as the 68-mile-long Shatt el-Arab, to the Persian Gulf, 40 miles southeast of the city of Abadan, Iran. In ancient times, however, the two rivers reached the sea without joining, and the coastline was perhaps much farther north, probably near the ancient city of Eridu. The southern plain thus consisted of steppeland formed from alluvial soil, which, under extensive irrigation, was famed in antiquity for its agricultural productivity, though progressive soil salinization has reduced its productivity in modern times. This region was the cultural center of ancient Mesopotamia, with BABY-LON and Sippar in its northern sector (Akkad), and NIP-PUR, UR and URUK in the south (Sumer).

HISTORY

Until the middle of the 19th century, when the first archeological excavations were made in Mesopotamia and its ancient cuneiform inscriptions deciphered, most of the books that treated of the history of human civilization began, after perhaps a few words about ancient Egypt, with an account of the Greeks and the Romans, as if civilization began with these. Although these latecomers on the scene of world history undoubtedly made original and extremely valuable contributions to the higher culture of the West, it is now known that they really owed much more than was previously thought to the high civilization of ancient Mesopotamia, which had a long, glorious history stretching back for at least 3 millenniums before the rise of Greece and Rome. This history will be outlined here as it was determined by the march of historical events whose center of interest generally lay first in Babylonia or southern Mesopotamia and then in Assyria or northern Mesopotamia.

Prehistoric Period. The first village settlements, of which one of the earliest has been found at Qal'at Jarmo east of Kirkuk in the hills of Kurdistan, go back to the Neolithic period (c. 5000–c. 4000 B.C.). In the following Chalcolithic period (c. 4000-c. 3000 B.C.) civilization properly so called was born in ancient Mesopotamia. Copper tools replaced stone ones; villages grew into towns and cities; the isolation of the past was abandoned in the course of far-flung trading expeditions; and writing was invented. In this period also, in the first half of the 4th millennium, the cultural center of gravity shifted to the south, where the earliest-known settlement was at Abū Shahrein, ancient Eridu, a short distance from the head of the Persian Gulf. The pottery discovered here is related to the potteries of Iran, Assyria, and central Mesopotamia and therefore would seem to indicate immigrations from different areas. Somewhat later there appeared the first great Babylonian culture, the Obeidian (named from Tell el Obeid, near Ur, where it was first found), characterized by its pottery painted in black, brown, and occasionally red, and by its gradually evolving monumental temple architecture. This culture was succeeded by the Warkan (named from Warka, the site of ancient Uruk), which, in its later phase, not only produced the earliest-known written documents, but also abounded in works of high artistic achievement both in sculpture and in the glyptic art as this was applied to the newly devised cylinder seal.

It is uncertain what people achieved this high cultural stage that came as early as c. 3000 B.C. The changes revealed by the excavations do not necessarily prove different immigrations; because of the continuity between the Obeidian and Warkan cultures some scholars believe that the achievements are to be attributed to one people, the Sumerians, although the presence of some Semites and other peoples is not denied. Other scholars argue that many of the names of the oldest cities cannot be explained from Sumerian, and therefore must have been founded by non-Sumerians; it is also claimed that within the Sumerian vocabulary a non-Sumerian stratum, or even several non-Sumerian strata, can be isolated, referring primarily to farming, gardening, brewing, pottery, leather work, and building. Suggestive, however, as these arguments may be, they should be subject to great caution, for modern knowledge of the written Sumerian language is still quite imperfect, and in these circumstances it is extremely dangerous to argue about a stage of the language some 500 years earlier. It can be stated, however, that the Sumerians were certainly in Babylonia c. 2900

B.C., almost certainly in the late Warka period, very probably in the earlier part; the Obeid period remains doubtful.

Babylonia. Since northern Mesopotamia or Assyria played a predominant role in the history of ancient Mesopotamia only during the 1st millennium B.C., the whole history of southern Mesopotamia or Babylonia until its absorption into the Persian Empire will be treated here before the contemporaneous history of Assyria.

Early Dynastic Period. This period (c. 2800–2360) takes its name from the important political developments in these centuries. According to T. Jacobsen's reconstruction, the earliest political organization was a "primitive democracy." Under the rule of the city god, who was the city's lord and owner, the city was organized in a type of theocratic socialism with actual sovereignty residing in the popular assembly. The assembly was convened in times of crisis; if the crisis was one of internal administration, a "lord" (Sumerian) was chosen who was qualified by his special gifts, but if the crisis came from without, a "king" (Sumerian lu-gal, literally "big man") was made military leader. This organization seems to have been extended to the principal cities of Sumer c. 2800 B.C., when they formed a league with its center at NIPPUR.

The crisis that led to this step was perhaps the threat of the Akkadians.

The seeds of stable monarchy lay in the temporary concession of power to the individual. The human tendency to retain power once gained was supported by the pressure of events. The large city walls of the Early Dynastic period prove that war or its threat had become chronic. The power of the individual was, therefore, perpetuated, and the dynastic principle emerged with a royal mythology, which derived the sovereign's power, not from the human assembly, but from divine choice. He was chief of a standing army recruited largely from his own servants and retainers. At home he built walls to protect the city, and temples to house the gods. He ensured the fertility of the land by building canals and overseeing the irrigation system; to the same purpose he acted as consort of the goddess of fertility in the rites of the sacred marriage. He administered justice, for which his power supplied the sanction. In the social reform of Urukagina of Lagash at the end of this period the king acted as the righter of wrongs and the protector of the weak, in whose favor he even set aside customary law. This role of the king became part of the royal ideology, reflected later in the reform decrees and legal codes of Ur-Nammu of Ur, Lipit-Ishtar of Isin, and Hammurabi and Ammi-ṣaduqa of Babylon (see LAW, ANCIENT NEAR-EASTERN).

For most of the Early Dynastic period the scope of this newly emerging power was regional, no one king being strong enough to extend his rule beyond rather narrow limits. One kingdom, however, that of Kish in northern Babylonia, did succeed, if only briefly, in establishing its hegemony over all of Sumer in the south and Akkad in the north of southern Mesopotamia. This became the ideal, and when from time to time some ruler achieved it, he called himself "king of Kish."

Dynasty of Akkad. The Early Dynastic period ended when Lugal-zaggesi of Umma, attempting a rule patterned on that of Kish, encountered the Semite, Sargon of Akkad (2360–2305 B.C.). The Semites were not new; earlier Sumerian texts from Lagash contain Semitic loanwords, and some earlier rulers hear Semitic names. The struggle was political, not racial, and the Semites won.

The most notable achievement of the Akkad Dynasty (2360-2180 B.C.) was the creation of the first world empire, and for this reason the Sargonids lived on in legend, not only in Sumerian and Akkadian, but also in Hurrian, Hittite, and Elamite. Sargon's rule eventually extended from the mountains of Iran across Syria to the shores of the Mediterranean. This universal sway, which lasted through the reign of his third successor, Naram-Sin (2280-2244 B.C.), was a hitherto unknown extension of political power. The achievement of the Akkad Dynasty must be considered one of the major events of history, because, as an ideal, it influenced the Neo-Assyrian rulers some 1,500 years later, and they in turn laid the foundations of the empires of the Neo-Babylonians, the Achaemenid Persians, and that of Alexander the Great, thus ultimately affecting Roman history.

The Akkadian yoke was oppressive, and rebellion was frequent, even in Sumer. When a severe famine struck and caused economic disaster, the empire crumbled, and Babylonia was invaded by the Gutians, mountaineers from the east, whose control brought a dark age to Babylonian history c. 2180–2082 B.C. This foreign domination, which was never complete, was terminated by a prince of Uruk, Utu-khegal, who drove out the Gutians.

Third Dynasty of Ur. Utu-khegal's victory paved the way for the rise of a new dynasty, the Third Dynasty of UR (c. 2060–1950). It was founded by Ur-Nammu, and introduced the conception of the bureaucratic state. Power was strongly centralized; local rulers called ensis, a title previously borne by native and independent dynasts, were appointed by the central authority. But they were completely stripped of military power, which was given to another royal appointee.

This period marked not only a resurgence of Sumerian political power but also a renaissance of Sumerian culture. Sculpture, architecture, and literature flourished, as is best known from the monuments of Gudea, a viceroy of Lagash under the last kings of the Third Dynasty of Ur. But Sumer was engulfed once more by Semites. In the 4th year of his reign, Shu-Sin, second last king of Ur, erected a wall and called it "That Which Keeps the Tidnu at a Distance." The Tidnu were western Semites or AMORRITES, seminomads moving along the edges of the desert, infiltrating into the cultivated areas in search of better pasture, but now massed in sufficient numbers to threaten the very existence of the state. Shu-Sin's successor, Ibi-Sin, mentions their incursions, and when the dynasty fell, partly because of the pressure of these attacks, it was these seminomads who gained control in many centers. In the city of Babylon under Sumu-abum c. 1830-1817 B.C. they founded a dynasty, the First Dynasty of Babylon, which a century later would produce the greatest and most famous of Babylonian rulers, Hammurabi. Other Amorrite dynasties were founded at Larsa, Eshnunna, and MARI.

Isin-Larsa Period. At the end of Ibi-Sin's reign famine and revolt broke out across the land, the Elamites to the east attacked and devastated Ur, and the King himself was carried into captivity. When the last Sumerian dynasty disappeared, two new dynasties rose, that of Isin (c. 1958–1733) founded by Ishbi-Erra, and that of Larsa (c. 1961–1699), founded by Naplanum. During most of this period Isin held the hegemony, but toward its end Larsa gained ascendancy. In general, however, the Isin-Larsa period was one of many petty kingdoms, often no larger than a city and its immediate environs.

First Dynasty of Babylon. The Isin-Larsa period and the First Dynasty of Babylon (c. 1830–1531 B.C.) were times of profound change in almost every area of life. Private property was greatly increased, but at the expense of the gods. This was part of a progressive secularization that radically altered the structure of the state. Not the temple and its god, but the royal palace and the king, became the center of the nation's life. New marriage customs, the replacement of Sumerian by Akkadian as the literary language, new syllabaries in the writing of Akkadian, and new types of personal names are a few indications of the transformation that Babylonia underwent in these 3 centuries.

Under HAMMURABI (HAMMURAPI; 1728–1686 B.C.) the First Dynasty of Babylon reached its apogee. Sumer and Akkad were reunited, and Babylonian arms gradually subdued Rim-Sin of Larsa in the south, Zimri-Lim of Mari on the middle Euphrates, and Ishme-Dagan of Assyria in the north. But already in the 9th year of Hammurabi's successor, Samsu-iluna (c. 1685–1648), the Babylonians were struggling with the Kassites or Cossaeans, a people from the mountains to the east, who were part of the vast ethnic movements of the 18th to the 16th century that would so profoundly change the entire ancient Near East. For more than a century the Kassites continued to press in, and in some areas probably achieved independence. When Mursili, the Hittite King (c. 1550–1530), raided Babylonia c. 1531 and the First Dynasty of Babylon came to an end with its last King, Samsu-ditanna (1561–1531), the Kassites had gained control over most of Babylonia.

Kassite Period. The Kassite period (c. 1531–1150) is obscure. The Kassite kings bore such strange names as Burnaburiash and Kadashman-Enlil, and they called Babylonia Karduniash. In the 14th century B.C. they corresponded with Egyptian and Hittite kings, and their country was still strong enough to play a part in the game of power politics. But it gradually receded more and more into the shadows. When Kassite rule ended in the late 12th century B.C., Babylon, for a brief period under Nabuchodonosor I of the Second Dynasty of Isin, regained something of its old power, which indirectly reached even into Assyria. But though the cultural prestige of Babylonia never waned, it was not until the late 7th century B.C. that its political power could be compared with the ancient glories of Sargon and Hammurabi.

Neo-Babylonian Period. Toward the end of the 2d millennium B.C. a new wave of Semites, this time Aramaic-speaking peoples, began to infiltrate from the north Arabian desert into all the lands of the Fertile Crescent. One group of these peoples, the Chal.deans, moved north from the western shores of the Persian Gulf and settled in southern Babylonia [see CHALDEANS (IN THE BIBLE)]. By the 8th century B.C. they had become fully assimilated in all things except language to the Babylonians, accepting their entire spiritual, intellectual, and material culture. Although the written language of Babylonia continued to be cuneiform Akkadian until the beginning of the Christian era, the spoken language gradually became Aramaic in the second half of the 1st millennium B.C.

A Chaldean prince, Nabopolasar, gained control of Babylon in 626 B.C. and established the New Babylonian dynasty. His son and successor NEBUCHADREZZAR II (605–561 B.C.) extended his father's conquests until his empire included not only all of Mesopotamia, but also Syria and Palestine. But the Chaldean dynasty collapsed under his fourth successor, NABU-NA'ID (NABONIDUS; 555–539 B.C.), and Babylon fell to the Persian, Cyrus the Great. Though under the Persian, and later under the Greek rulers, the Babylonian scribes went on copying the old texts, and the priests performed the old rituals, in 539

B.C. more than 3,000 years of Babylonian history effectively came to an end.

Assyria. The Assyrians first asserted themselves as an independent power when the Third Dynasty of Ur fell. Ilushumma claims that he brought freedom to the Akkadians in cities as far south as Ur, but the interpretation of freedom is uncertain, as is the date of Ilushumma's reign, which was probably around the beginning of the 19th century B.C. Assyria, however, was clearly no longer a vassal of Babylonia. In contrast with the new kingdoms of the south, Assyrian rulers in this period bore genuine Akkadian names; one of them was even called Sargon (Sharru-kin I) and in this name we should probably see a sense of continuity with the Akkadians of the past, which the newly arrived West Semites of Babylonia could not claim. In this same period, from Ilushumma to Sargon I, Assyrian trading colonies were located in Anatolia; their rich archives from Kultepe have been preserved in what are known as the Cappadocian Tablets.

However, when Assyria grew strong once more under Shamshi-Adad I (c. 1748–1716), it too was ruled by a West Semite, who, after ascending the Assyrian throne, overthrew the West Semitic dynasty at Mari and placed his son, Yasmakh-Adad, in control. With Shamshi-Adad's death, however, Assyrian power quickly disintegrated. Mari was lost to the earlier dynasty, and Ishme-Dagan, Shamshi-Adad's son and successor on the Assyrian throne, did not long resist the advances of Hammurabi, though the exact course of events is obscure.

Middle Assyrian Period. For more than three centuries Assyria lay prostrate, and her kings were vassals, first of Babylon, then of the new Mitanni kingdom to the northwest, which was largely Hurrian under Indo-Aryan rulers. But in the early 14th century B.C., while Mitanni grew weak under Hittite pressure from the west, Assyria began its move towards independence. By the time of Asshur-uballit I (1356–1321) Assyria became a power to be reckoned with, and for a brief period controlled even Babylonia. Under a succession of strong rulers the Hittites were fought along the Upper Euphrates until they collapsed (c. 1200 B.C.). This Assyrian revival culminated in the reign of Tukulti-Ninurta I (1233-1199), who conquered Babylon and transported the statue of Babylon's chief god, Marduk, to his new capital, Kar-Tukulti-Ninurta (modern Tulul el-'Aqir), near Assur (see NIM-ROD).

This humiliation of Babylon raised a problem that faced every strong Assyrian king and divided the political and religious forces of his nation: the policy to be adopted toward Babylon. So immense was Babylon's prestige that it could never be treated like any other vassal. To Assyria Babylon was what Greece was to Rome. A pro-

Babylonian faction favored assimilation of Babylonian religion and culture; the opposition insisted on retaining specifically Assyrian traditions as an expression of Assyrian hegemony and destiny. Tukulti-Ninurta I belonged to the latter group, and his anti-Babylonian fanaticism probably led to his murder.

The next strong Assyrian ruler, Tiglath-Pileser I (1116–1078), faced a new threat, the ARAMAEANS. It is uncertain when they made their first appearance in history, but by the late 12th century B.C. they had established independent kingdoms in Syria and along the upper Euphrates. A measure of the danger that they constituted may be seen from the fact that Tiglath-Pileser I led his troops 27 times across the Euphrates to drive them back.

Neo-Assyrian Empire. After this strong monarch, who controlled Babylonia as a vassal and marched as far as the Mediterranean, Assyrian power waned once more until late in the 10th century B.C. But with Assurdan II (935–913) there began the countless marches and battles of the Assyrian army, commemorated in annals and on reliefs, with their unspeakable cruelty ad gloriam dei Assur. The Aramaeans between the Tigris and the Euphrates were completely subjugated. Assurnasirpal II (884–860) introduced the division of the kingdom into provinces, whose peoples were subjected to forced labor and heavy tribute. His successor, Shalmaneser III (859-825), extended Assyrian rule across the Euphrates despite the desperate opposition of various coalitions. It was to such a coalition of 12 kings that Ahab, King of Israel, belonged when the Assyrian forces were fought to a standstill at Qarqar in 853. But Shalmaneser returned in 848 and again in 845. Jehu, Ahab's murderer and successor, paid him tribute in 841, and on the Black Obelisk, now in the British Museum, he is depicted as paying homage to his Assyrian master. North Syria had now become part of the Assyrian kingdom.

After a period of inner conflicts, Tiglath-Pileser (Theglath-Phalasar) III (745–728) inaugurated a century of unequalled power. He was perhaps the greatest of Assyrian kings. Boldness and originality stamped his every action. He assumed direct power over Babylonia in an effort to resolve in his own person the ancient tension. He smashed the Urartu kingdom in the Armenian mountains and then drove southward. Menahem, King of Israel paid him tribute, an event recorded both in the Assyrian annals and in the Bible (2 Kings 15.19), where Tiglath-Pileser is called Phul, the name he took as king of Babylon. Galilee was annexed as a district of an Assyrian province. The revolt of Pekah, King of Israel, and Rezin, King of Damascus, provoked a large deportation of Israelites (2 Kgs 15.29); HOSEA was installed as King of Israel, and tribute was paid the Assyrian King by Ahab, King of Judah (2 Kings 16.7–10).

Tiglath-Pileser's successors strove to continue his policy, of which a major instrument was wholesale deportations to break down national loyalties. Samaria fell to Shalmaneser V (727-723), and Israel ceased as an independent kingdom in 722. Sargon II (722-706), after consolidating his precarious position at home—he was a usurper, who attempted to legitimize his position by assuming a proud and ancient name and by accusing his two predecessors of having neglected the interests of the national god—crushed a revolt in 720 and deported more than 27,000 Israelites. With his authority established in Syria and Palestine, Sargon directed his energies to the Babylonian rebellion led by Marduk-apal-iddina (Biblical Merodach-Baladan), who had seized the Babylonian throne with the help of the Elamites. In 709 Sargon entered Babylon as king and restored Babylonia to the Assyrian rule.

Sennacherib (705–682) is best known for his failure to conquer Jerusalem under Hezekiah in 701 (2 Kings 18.13–19.36). Probably he returned again after 689; the OT seems to combine two campaigns of Sennacherib, for it mentions Theraca (Tirhaka), King of Egypt (1 Kgs 19.9), who did not come to the Egyptian throne until 689.

Sennacherib's anti-Babylonian fanaticism was so ardent that he razed Babylon to the ground and, like Tukulti-Ninurta before him, carried off the statue of Marduk to Assur. His son, Esarhaddon (680–699), who succeeded his murdered father, atoned for this sacrilege by restoring Babylon, and Assurbanipal (668–627) returned the statue

Under these two kings Assyrian power reached into Egypt. But Assurbanipal had to fight desperately for 4 years against a new Babylonian rebellion led by his brother with the support of Aramaean and Chaldean states in the south, of the Elamites to the east, and of Gyges of Lydia to the west. His victory was costly, even fatal, for in destroying the Elamites he removed the last effective barrier against a new and formidable power, the MEDES. It was to be the Medes who, when Assurbanipal died and revolt swept across the Assyrian empire (see 2 Kgs 23.19–23), would contribute most to Assyria's downfall. The city of Asshur was destroyed in 614 and NINEVEH in 612; the last Assyrian king, Assur-uballit II, fled to Harran, where a few years later he disappeared, and with him Assyria, from the pages of history.

Science. The Babylonians were the first grammarians and gave to language its first systematic, if rudimentary, analysis. They compared their own Akkadian language with Sumerian and arranged their results in lists comparable to our grammatical paradigms. And in the lexical lists of Sumerian and Akkadian, ordered according to the nature of the object (houses, trees, plants, etc.), there is a simple but scientific system of classification.

Babylonian medicine, which seems inextricably bound to magic, is a field of study never adequately investigated, but it can be said that the medical texts contain some amazingly acute observations.

In the sciences of mathematics and astronomy, a relatively high level was certainly attained. From the period of 1800 to 1600 there are both "table texts" and "problem texts," and among the former there are multiplication tables, tables of reciprocals, of squares and square roots, etc. The "Pythagorean" theorem was known to the Babylonians more than 1,000 years before Pythagoras. An eminent authority, O. Neugebauer, compares the level of Babylonian mathematics with that of the early Renaissance, although admitting that it never achieved a truly scientific level.

The earliest astronomy, from 1800 to 1600, was crude, but in the Seleucid period it became a mathematical astronomy, which was equal to that of Greek contemporaries. One of the major reasons of astronomical study was the collection of material for astrological omens, which was organized in series that reached their canonical form c. 1000 B.C. Texts from c. 700 B.C., which contain older material, show the first discussion of elementary astronomical concepts on a purely rational basis, and probably around 500 B.C. systematic observational reports developed into a systematic mathematical theory. In this period the zodiac seems to have been invented, appearing for the first time in a text of 419 B.C.

RELIGION

Mesopotamian religion was a quest for salvation; like all men, Mesopotamian man experienced the "numinous," which arrested him in awe and drew him with desire. But this quest and this experience had a specific character; they took form within specific and determining conditions of time and place. They were components of a distinctive culture that was not only Oriental, but within the ancient Near East, however many the similarities, a thing apart, neither Iranian, Syrian, nor Egyptian. A description, therefore, of this religion must strive primarily to grasp those decisive periods when it was shaped and found its distinctively Mesopotamian expression. With such a scope in view, this article, after considering the sources and their use, will first treat the gods of ancient Mesopotamia and then the relationship between the gods and man.

Sources. In general there is no lack of material, which in written or unwritten form extends over three millenia. Myths, prayers, hymns, rituals, the omen and wisdom literatures, the frequent statements on or allusions to religious conceptions and practices in royal annals, in legal texts, in letters and even in economic documents, and the religious views implied in personal names—these in general constitute the written sources. The unwritten are the archeological data: temple plans, statues, divine emblems, altars, the religious scenes on cylinder seals, etc.

Limitations. The use of this material, however, has its limitations and difficulties. The sources reveal mainly the official religion of the temple and palace; little is known, however, of popular religion. Furthermore, in the interpretation of the sources there is the problem of language. The language of the Sumerians is still imperfectly understood, and even Akkadian is not without its obscurities. There is also the problem of grasping the complexity of social, political, and economic institutions that were so intimately connected with religious life. There is finally the problem of time. No religion that extends over three millenniums and is alive remains static. Behind the traditional forms that religion adheres to there are shifts, at times subtle, of emphasis and value.

The great difficulty, however, is to understand the mentality of the ancient Mesopotamian man with which, in the religious situation of deepest personal concern and involvement, he viewed the universe. For to him the world was a "Thou," animate, personal, revealing a will and a presence. He felt himself part of nature; he could not stand away from it and judge it, as it were, from above. Its events revealed no laws, which are the result of abstraction. They were individual instances of a will immanent in the phenomena. The expression, therefore, of this confrontation of an "I" with a "Thou" was neither scientific nor systematic; it was, of an inner necessity, bound to the concrete and individual, and none of its multiple forms was capable of giving more than a partial, though valid, expression of the infinitely rich experience in which it was born.

The Gods. To have some understanding of the gods of ancient Mesopotamia, it is necessary to consider man's primal experience, the influence of social and political development, particularly at the time of the Dynasty of Akkad and the First Dynasty of Babylon, and the nature of mythopoeic thought in this part of the ancient world.

Primal Experience. A certain fluidity in the conception of the divine marks Mesopotamian religion in all periods. To the doorleaf of a temple, for example, is attributed personality, and as Ig-galla, "Great Doorleaf," he is the doorkeeper of the high god An; or as Ig-alima, "Doorleaf of the Bison," he is a member of Nin-girsu's household at Lagash, charged with specific duties and the object of cult. Similarly, Utu, the sun-god and god of justice, has as his viziers Nig-gina, "Justice," and Nigsisa, "Equity." But such deities are in a sense secondary; they derive from their relationship to the forces of nature.

It was in these forces that Mesopotamian man had his fundamental encounter with the divine. To illustrate from a few of the principal gods: Enki, "Lord of the Earth," the god of the fresh waters beneath the earth that appeared in marshes, lakes and lagoons, fructifying the earth; the goddess Nissaba, in the reeds and grasses and cereals; the goddess Inanna, the power in the cluster of the date palm; the moon-god Nanna, lighting up the darkness of the night; the sun-god Utu, the power in the brilliant white light of the day; Ishkur, god of the rainstorm, bringing grass to the pastures and swelling the rivers and canals with his waters.

Different Pantheons. Referring to the earliest times, however, as T. Jacobsen has shown, one should speak, not of a single pantheon, but of several pantheons, according to the dominant economic activities of the various regions of ancient Sumer. In the south where marshes and lakes separated the Persian Gulf from Sumer proper was the pantheon of the hunter and fisherman: Enki, also known as Abzu, "Fresh Water," Nudimmud, "Man Creator," Dara-abzu, "Ibex of the Abzu," etc.; Nazi (the current name Nanshe being probably due to a misreading), Enki's daughter, the fish-goddess; Asal-luhe, Enki's son, explained by Jacobsen as "Asal, the Man Drencher," that is, god of the thunder shower. In the south along the banks of the Euphrates where the date palm grew, the pantheon included: Inanna, "Mistress of the Date-Palm Cluster," especially as this power had reference to the storehouse for dates; Dumuzi-ama-ushum-gal-anna, the power for life in the date palm; several chthonic deities like Nin-gish-zida, "Lord Effective Tree," throne bearer in the Underworld, Nin-a-zu, "Lord Water-Knower(?)," son in one tradition of Eresh-ki-gal, "Mistress of the Great-Place (the Underworld)"; Dumu, "The Child," a vegetation god. The pantheon of the cowherds of the south included: Nanna, the moon-god; Utu, the sun-god; Nin-sun, "Lady Wild Cow"; Nin-har, god of rainstorms, and his spouse, Nin-i-gara, "Mistress of Ghee and Cream''; Shakan, Utu's son, god of the steppe's wild life; and An, god of the sky. In the central grassy region was the pantheon of the shepherds: Inanna, brought from the southern pantheon into this one; Dumuzi, the shepherd, the divine power manifested in the lambs of spring and the ewes' udders heavy with milk; and Ishkur, god of rainstorms. For the assherd the gods were: Nin-hursag, "Mistress of the Piedmont," who manifested herself especially in the wild asses of the western desert, but who was also more generally goddess of the wild life in desert and foothills and was likewise known as Dingirmah, "The Exalted Goddess," and Nin-tu, "Mistress Giving Birth"; and her husband, Shul-pae, "Youth Appearing," who remains ill defined. In the farmlands of the north and east, which in the history of Babylonia were politically and economically the most important region and home of some of the most important gods in Mesopotamian religion, the pantheon included: Enlil, "Lord Wind," who brought the rains of spring and was credited with the creation of the pickax, in ancient times the most important agricultural instrument; Ninlil, "Mistress Wind," Enlil's wife and originally a grain-goddess; Nissaba of the cereals, mentioned above, and her husband, Haya, god of stores; Ninurta (at Lagash called Nin-girsu), Enlil's and Ninlil's son, the farmer's god of thunder and rain; and Ninurta's wife, Bau, a goddess especially associated with dogs and healing. From these pantheons we see how closely bound to nature the early religion was and what man was seeking therein: sustenance, plenitude of material well-being, and integration of his own life with these life-giving powers of nature.

In this earliest phase of Mesopotamian religion the intimate association of the natural phenomenon and the inherent divine force must be noted. This is evident not only in the divine names—Utu is both the sun and the sun-god, Nissaba is the grain and the grain-goddess, divine cow, divine tree, etc.—but also in representations of the divine. Thus, Ninurta was Im-dugud, "Giant Cloud," perhaps his earliest name, and he was represented as a giant bird with wings outstretched and with a lion's head. In this form he was worshiped in historic times. Inanna's image was that of the reed bundles and the rolled-up screen of the storehouse gate.

The Evil God. Two other types of god should be mentioned, though it is difficult to determine whether they belong to the earliest conceptions of the divine. The first was the evil god. He was the god who by definition received no cult. He could inspire dread when evil struck mysteriously or massively, but he could not attract. He was therefore avoided as much as possible. Magic was used to ward him off, or, if one fell within his power, to remove him.

The Personal God. If the "evil god" was on the periphery of the Mesopotamian religious world, at its center (at least on the level of personal religion) was the personal god. Originally he was perhaps noted only in connection with those individuals who might be said to have been born under a lucky star, for there was something uncanny about their success, in which one sensed the presence of another invisible power. By Old Babylonian times he was the individual god of every man, his protector, his sponsor before the high gods. In general he remained nameless; the main exceptions were the personal gods of rulers, for example, Nin-gishzida and Nazi, the personal god and goddess of Gudea of Lagash.

Influence of Social and Political Development. As village grew into city, and the economy developed along with increasing specialization of crafts, society was altered, and there emerged a new type of power, beyond anything in the experience of the old village community. These individual powers, moreover, under the pressure of events were pooled in a league uniting the major cities of Sumer. Mesopotamian religion had a new basis for its expression of the experience of divine power, and it was in this period, c. 3000–2800, that it achieved its classical form.

Gods as Lords. Locally, the principal god now became the owner of a vast estate, and the temple was the center of economic as well as religious life. There the cult statue of the god resided, there he was fed daily with the other gods that made up the divine household. Each of these gods had his assigned task in the maintenance of the palace temple and in the administration of the estate.

With this profoundly anthropomorphic development the role of both god and man was changed. Because they were rulers, lofty and remote, the gods withdrew to a distance; yet, in a sense, they drew closer in that they took on human form. Henceforth the gods were visualized as men, though frequently survivals of the earlier image are evident: cereals sprout from the shoulders of Nissaba, sun rays come from the body of Utu, etc. The interests, too, of the god became wider; as ruler he provided for the political and social, as well as the economic, welfare of his subjects. He must fight to defend his city; it was Ningirsu who waged war for Lagash. He had to see to it that the dangerous elements of discord within the city were quieted; he concerned himself with law and its reform so that equity would prevail in the affairs of men.

Man became a serf of the gods. He worked his lord's estate within which, with the growth of specialization, he had his assigned task. Men produced the raw material; women worked it into the finished product. Even when the theocratic socialism of Sumerian times yielded to a progressive secularization of life, the classic statement of man's purpose was and remained that he was made for the service of the gods.

Kings as Gods. In this period royal power began to develop, and the king gradually became the principal human intermediary between gods and men. Ruling by divine choice, he mediated to men the divine blessings by scrupulous attention to and observance of the will of the gods. Because of this special function, he acted as the personal god of the community, and this found expression in the Akkad period when, for the first time, a ruler's name was preceded by the determinative for divinity. It was only in this very limited sense that the king was divine, but even this was hardly reconcilable with the Mesopotamian conception of divinity and was completely abandoned after the Kassite period.

Divine Assembly. On the national level the central shrine was at Nippur, where the gods convened in assembly, presided over by An and Enlil. The cosmos was conceived as a state with power ultimately residing in the assembly. Supremacy was achieved by election, and the high gods of the various cities had their assigned or traditional offices. After An of Uruk and Enlil of Nippur came Enki of Eridu, the god of wisdom and magic (since water cannily runs its course and finds its goal), who organized and administrated the economy. Utu, from whom nothing was secret, was the supreme judge. Ishkur, whose rain swelled the rivers and canals, was in charge of the irrigation system. All the gods decreed the destinies of Sumer and assigned political power, now to this king, now to that. History was born in the assembly of the gods.

The offices of the gods touched upon a very distinctive feature of early Mesopotamian thought. These offices were called me, which is probably the noun of the verb "to be." It is being, but being specified and normative that imparted to nature and society its essential structure. In one piece of speculation me was at the very beginning of cosmic origins, antecedent to divinity itself. In the actual order, however, the gods controlled and disposed of me; this was the highest prerogative of divinity.

Akkad Period. The political dominance of the Semites wrought no profound changes in Mesopotamian religion. In general, the Akkadians assimilated their gods with those of the Sumerians: Ea was Enki, Sin was Nanna, Adad was Ishkur, Shamash was Utu, Ishtar was Inanna. Many Sumerian gods were simply adopted; for example, An (who was Akkadianized as Anum), Enlil, Ninurta, Nergal, etc. The principal god of the Akkadians, Il, seems to have been gradually abandoned, or perhaps absorbed in one or more figures of the Sumerian pantheon (see EL [GOD].)

A few new goddesses appeared and gained general popularity. Most of these, like Anunitum of Sippar, originally a goddess of war, were absorbed by Ishtar, whose domination among the goddesses of the Mesopotamian pantheon eventually reached the point when ishtar meant goddess itself. This increasingly complex figure represented, above all, the passions of battle and sexual love. While the other goddesses were for the most part reduced to intercessors with the gods, she remained an independent force (see ASTARTE).

However, two peoples speaking two languages so profoundly different as Sumerian and Akkadian must have had equally profound differences of mentality. Even while adopting, the Akkadians must have transformed. Evidence of such a transformation is found in Akkadian art, which, in its treatment of religious themes, shows a grimness and a sense of man's being involved in a conflict of forces, the issue of which, never certain, lies beyond his control. Perhaps, therefore, the religion changed more than is generally suspected. This is an area for further investigation.

First Dynasty of Babylon. This was a period of secularization. The palace dissociated itself from the temple, and at the capital of Babylon the traditional pantheon was revised to the glory of the new center of political power. It was done through the exaltation of MARDUK, originally the city god of Babylon. His name probably meant "Bull Calf of the Storm," indicating that he was, like Ishkur and similar figures, a god of thunder and rain. This would explain his being identified with Asal-luhe, whence his parentage, Enki (Ea) and Damgalnunna (Damkina).

Marduk and Nabu. The boldest expression of Marduk's supremacy was found in the myth ENUMA ELISH, "When on high . . .". Within the framework of the old pattern, this supremacy was attributed to the choice of the gods met in assembly. When the older gods, represented by Enki, proved helpless against the forces of chaos, Marduk was chosen as champion; he demanded, however, that his leadership be made permanent. This was granted to him when he gave proof of his magical powers. With chaos overcome, man was fashioned from the blood of the rebel god Kingu, to dispense the gods from providing for their own needs. The gods rewarded Marduk with a house of his own, the heavenly counterpart of his temple in Babylon, E-sang-il, "House Raising High [its] Summit."

In effect, Marduk took the place of Enlil, but with the great difference that he became a truly national god, an expression of Babylon's political power. The other gods tended to diminish in importance; they became mere functionaries of Marduk or aspects of his power. One text records that Marduk as ruler and counselor was Enlil; as lighting up the sky he was Sin; as god of justice he was Shamash, etc. However, since elsewhere the parts of Ninurta's body were identified with the various high gods, we are not justified in interpreting the text on Marduk simply in terms of his role as national god. Both texts reveal a tendency to henotheism in later speculation.

With the rise of his father, Marduk's son, the god Nabu of Borsippa and the patron of accounting, assumed an important place in Babylonian religion. His cult spread to Assyria, and in the 1st millennium he was extremely popular, even more so than his father [see NEBO (NABU)].

Assur. When Assyria gained the hegemony that was once Babylon's, the city god of Assur (Asshur), who was also called Assur (Asshur), became the Assyrian counterpart of Marduk as national god. He was assimilated largely with Enlil; his wife was Ninlil, his temple complex at Assur was, like that of Enlil at Nippur, called E-sharra, and Nippur deities, like Ninurta, became part of his court. The pro-Assyrian faction strove to demonstrate Assur's superiority over the hated Marduk of the opposing pro-Babylonian faction. Sennacherib, perhaps the most fanatical partisan of the Assyrian god, substituted Assur for Marduk in the Enuma elish and equated Assur with the god An-shar, the father of Anum. At the same time he attempted to transplant the celebration of the traditional Babylonian New Year's festival, with its recitation of the Enuma elish, to Assyria.

In fact, however, Assur remained little more than the apotheosis of Assyrian power and political ambition. In his honor the Assyrian king wrought all the destruction and carnage that fill the Assyrian royal annals. The god Assur's distinction in Mesopotamian religion was that he alone was predominantly a god of blood.

Myth. Myth is the response to the "why" of things, and because all nature was a "Thou," myth must speak of who rather than of what and must be a story of personal forces and their possible conflicts. Mythopoeic thought is not discursive; it does not argue, it asserts. Its explicative value is that of symbol rather than clear concept, and it is therefore unsystematic, allowing for other symbols, other explanations, without inner logical coherence. And myth is essentially religious. It is religious experience given form and structure; in its transposition of the inner meaning of things beyond the familiar categories of time and space to the primeval order of divine activity, it gives expression to the transcendent which is inherent in the object of religious experience.

Only a few of the Sumero-Akkadian myths can be mentioned here. Enuma elish, already referred to, explains both Marduk's position in the pantheon and the organization of the universe with man's place in it. Another myth tells how the moon(-god) came into being: the young maiden Ninlil, against her mother's advice, went bathing in the canal Nun-birdu in Nippur; there she was seen and raped by Enlil, and the child born of the union was the moon(-god). Why is Sumer organized economically the way it is? Because Enki visited Sumer, appointed to each region its special function and gave it an overseer. Why at the end of spring each year does nature wilt and die, the milk disappear from the udders, etc.? Because, according to one myth, Dumuzi was attacked and killed by raiders from the Nether World. Why each year does the statue of Inanna journey by boat from Uruk to Eridu, there to be purified and Inanna reappointed to her divine office? Because Inanna once succeeded in getting Enki intoxicated, and in his state of euphoria he gave Inanna the me—here perhaps consisting concretely in emblems of sacred offices. She betook herself to Uruk, and, although Enki, who now viewed things in a more sober light, tried seven times to prevent her, she successfully returned to Uruk with all the me. In brief, the explanation of nature, of cult, of Sumerian culture is basically religious; its expression is the myth.

Gods and Man. The basic relations between the gods and man in ancient Mesopotamia can be described under such headings as sacred places, sacred times, divination and magic, and the loss and recovery of salvation.

Sacred Space. The temple was the earthly dwelling of the gods; here the cult statue was housed, here divine power was intensely concentrated, and from here it emanated into the land. The temple belonged to the very structure of the cosmos; it was "coeval with heaven and earth" (said of the E-ninnu at Lagash), "the bond of heaven and earth" (the meaning of the name of the Edur-an-ki at Nippur). It flashed with specifically divine effulgence (me-lam); and it was endued with divine terror (ni); it was awful (khush) and at the same time a place of joy (as in the name of the E-khush-kiri-zal). It had a holy purity (kug, sikil); its rites (me) were pure and perfect (šu-du). It gave abundance (nam-he); in it prayers were heard (the meaning of E-arazu-giš-tuk and E-šudde-giš-tuk); sins were remitted E-nam-tagga-duhu). According to the character of the god it housed, the temple could be considered a cattle pen, a sheepfold, a place of wisdom, etc. It possessed a measure of divinity itself. In a large number of hymns to the major temples of Sumer and Akkad, which are attributed to Enheduanna (the daughter of Sargon of Akkad), the temples are addressed as independent agents of power; and the presence of temple names as theophorous elements in personal names testifies to the popular belief in the divine power of the temple. Each of the temple hymns just mentioned closes with the essential observations: "Temple X, in your precinct[?] he [the god] has established his house, on your dais he has taken his seat."

The temple therefore must be maintained. One of the major duties of the Mesopotamian king was to provide for the repair of temples. If a temple were in ruins, the original foundations must, if possible, be found; it was the exact place of earlier temples that was the truly holy place. On the king fell the duty to lay the first foundation, anoint it with oil, wine, and honey, and to indicate by inscription the place where he had built. The greatest calamity a city could suffer was the destruction of its temple. This meant that the god had departed, hope had ended. The most moving of all Mesopotamian religious compositions are the lamentations over their destroyed temples.

In religious architecture the Mesopotamian creation of the ziggurat, the temple tower, was an attempt to unite the human and divine. Its origin may have been utilitarian; in the earliest phases of Eridu the shrine was constructed on a raised platform, perhaps to protect it from inundation. By the Warka period, however, it was more than 40 feet high at Ur, and a utilitarian interpretation is no longer adequate. The ziggurat was now the sacred mountain, on the summit of which man met god. According to Herodotus the ziggurat of Babylon, the E-temenan-ki, "Foundation Platform of Heaven and Earth," rose in seven stages, each a different color, and on the top was the shrine. At Khorsabad, ancient Dur-sharru-kin, founded by Sargon II as his capital, there were probably seven stages, with the height equal to the width of the base (143 feet). The number 7 and the symmetry show cosmic speculations (see TOWER OF BABEL).

Sacred Time. Each day the cult statue was clothed and fed by the staff of priests attached to the temple, and these activities were accompanied by prayers. There were also monthly feasts: the 1st (new moon), the 15th (full moon), and the 28th or 29th (disappearance of moon) days being honored by special rites. Different gods were specially honored in different months, as at Lagash where each of the gods Nin-girsu, Nazi, and Bau had their special feasts at different times.

New Year Feast. The most important festival was observed at the New Year. Most available information concerns its performance at Babylon; although the sources are late, they certainly reflect older practices. In Babylon it was celebrated in March and April, when nature revived. Its significance was cosmic: by word and deed the renewal of nature as a victory over the powers of chaos was reasserted, reenacted, and reactualized in its essential reality.

The festival began with four days of preparation; the mood was solemn and somber. To Marduk a prayer was raised, asking for mercy and freedom for the Babylonians. On the evening of the 4th day the Enuma elish was recited in its entirety before Marduk's statue. With this reading the deepest meaning of the feast was revealed. On the 5th day the king was stripped of his royal insignia, smitten on the cheek by the priest, after which he knelt before Marduk to declare his innocence. The god replied through the priest, "Do not fear" The priest then returned the insignia and smote the king once more. If tears welled in his eyes, it was a favorable omen. On the 8th day Marduk took his place in the chamber of destinies, the Duku (The Pure Mound). This was probably a reenactment—in the presence of the cult statues of the various gods who had arrived earlier from their centers (Nabu from Borsippa, etc.)—of the meeting of the divine assembly in which Marduk was granted supreme powers. The 9th and 10th days were occupied with a procession to a special sanctuary, the bît akîti, with the king leading Marduk (a procession against the powers of chaos?) and with rites (a divine banquet?) at the bît akîti. On the 11th day the destinies of the following year were determined after the assembled gods paid their homage to Marduk as their supreme lord. On the 12th the gods returned to their usual sanctuaries.

Sacred Marriage. In this festival we note how small was the role of the king, though without his presence it could not be celebrated. In Assyria the king was much more prominent in the native ritual of the takultu, a banquet for the gods. This contrast in the exercise of priestly powers between Babylonian and Assyrian kings in general prevails, but there was one rite in Babylonia, the sacred marriage (the ἱερὸς γάμος), in which the Babylonian king played no less a part than that of a god. The sacred marriage was represented in art from as early as the Warka period, and it was a common practice in the Isin-Larsa period. Then for unknown reasons, one of which may have been the secularization of kingship in Babylonia, it disappeared.

In the Isin-Larsa period, Ishme-Dagan described himself as the husband of Inanna; Enlil-bani was said to have been approached by her on the sacred couch; and Lipit-Ishtar became the god Urash before being united with the goddess. Earlier, in the inscriptions of Gudea, it is clear also that at Lagash the union of Nin-girsu with his consort Bau was celebrated, and we may assume that the king stood for Nin-girsu and a priestess for Bau. The best-known and most detailed text refers to Idin-Dagan as Dumuzi, Inanna's husband. The union of king and goddess is described, and then, after coming from the bridal chamber, they banquet together from the abundance that their union in the spring had, according to mythopoeic thought, achieved.

Divination and Magic. All the phenomena of nature were fraught with meaning, and therefore, not only extraordinary events, such as eclipses, earthquakes, or monstrous births, were viewed as portentous, but within the rhythm of everyday life, in dreams, in the courses of the stars and planets, in the flight of birds and the entrails of sheep, the skilled heirs of a long tradition could descry the future course of events. The life of the king, especially in Assyria, was virtually controlled by the results of the investigation of omens. He could grumble at the fast that the nonappearance of the moon at the beginning of the month imposed on him, but the astrologers remained adamant (see DIVINATION).

MAGIC was integrated with Mesopotamian religion rather than opposed to it. It was practiced together with prayer to the gods, especially Ea and Asal-luhe, from whom it derived its real efficacy. Magic was necessary because all the invisible forces were not beneficent; there were demons who brought all sorts of ills to the man whom they could get into their power. The function of magic was to ward them off or to exorcise them, and for this there were potent words and actions, powers of plants and stones known to the specialist, AMULETS, talismans, etc.

Loss and Recovery of Salvation. There was one loss shared by all, which, being that of nature itself, did not really destroy the pattern of salvation, but only imposed on man the necessity of participating in nature's course. Above all, this was the withering of life in the blasts of summer heat. Mythically, it was the disappearance of Inanna's spouse or of the Great Mother's child, and the people shared the grief of bereaved spouse or mother in lamentations for "the one who is far away."

Divine Caprice. This loss, however, was made good in the revival of nature. Another and more serious loss was that which might strike the individual, community, or nation outside the course of nature. Whence did it come? What was its remedy? One answer was simply to throw responsibility on the gods. King Urukagina was convinced of his innocence, yet he was conquered by King Lugalzaggesi of Umma. He dared to pray that the crime be on the head of Nissaba, Lugalzagessi's personal goddess. Divine power was at work, and its operations were not necessarily just. The inscrutability of divine ways is frequently referred to in the religious literature, and it is not always that of simple transcendence; at times it is that of caprice subject to no higher law.

Sin. Another answer was sin. Man must bow down, confess his guilt, atone by the prescribed ritual, and hope he would again find divine favor. Most often he thought of his personal god; his misfortunes must mean that this god, his protector, had been offended and had abandoned him. The high gods were then appealed to and asked to appease the personal god. The penitent freely admitted his guilt, even if he could not recall his offense. Abjectly he made his confession, but one looks in vain for a sign of the "contrite spirit." Its basis, love, was lacking.

Eventually the innate human conviction that the innocent should not suffer demanded a real searching of the ways of the gods with men. The problem was touched on in earlier Sumerian and Akkadian literature; in the Kassite period it became a theme. The bold solution of the Book of JoB, the experience of Yahweh, which defied rational expression, was far beyond the highest Mesopotamian thought. It remained a problem with no solution.

Death. One loss was final. Ultimately man could never integrate his existence with the life-giving powers of nature, which, when dead, rose again. Man must die. He survived in a dim world of dust and thirst, in "the land of no return." In the late period, some distinction in the lot of the good and evil was made, but it was not elaborated, and it is doubtful that it had much influence. "Gilgamesh, whither rovest thou? The life thou pursuest thou shalt not find. When the gods created mankind, death for mankind they set aside, life in their own hands retaining" (see GILGAMESH EPIC).

Conclusion. At the sacrifice of many facts about ancient Mesopotamian religion, an attempt has here been made, mainly along lines indicated by Jacobsen, to interpret this religion in terms of religious experience and to determine the principal influences on its formation and expression. All scholars may not accept this interpretation, and the reader should consult the bibliography for other points of view. In the striving to return to so distant and alien a world, errors and encounters with differences of opinions are inevitable; one can hope only for an approximation to what was the reality. That Mesopotamian religion, with all its deficiencies, was something deep and serious should be evident. This it had to be in order to sustain a people for three millenniums and to influence the entire ancient world, the Bible not excepted. It played its part, a larger one than that of most religions in history, in preparing for the "fulness of time."

MESROP

Saint, 4th-century Armenian ecclesiastic and founder of Armenian Christian literature; b. Hatzikk', c. 361; d. Feb. 7, 440. Mesrop was originally called Mashtotz. He received a Hellenistic education, probably at Antioch, where he appears to have met THEODORE OF MOPSUES-TIA. After a short military career at Valarshapat, he embraced the religious life as a monk (392 or 393) and was ordained by ISAAC THE GREAT. With the encouragement of the Catholicos and of Prince Vaghinak of Siunia, he made a missionary journey to the outer provinces of Armenia, where his experiences convinced him of the need of an Armenian written language. Assisted by Isaac and King Vramshapuh (401–409), he set out in search of an adequate alphabet and eventually settled on 36 letters (c. 404 or 407), with which he began the translation of the Bible into Armenian. He translated also the works of the Greek and Syrian Church Fathers. He assisted in the foundation of schools and monasteries, and evangelized the Georgians and the Albanians. In 422 he seems to have accompanied a diplomatic mission to Constantinople, where he obtained the aid of Emperor THEODOSIUS II for his educational enterprises. Upon the death of Isaac (438), Mesrop assumed government of the Church in Armenia, until his death. He was buried in Oshagan near Erevan, where a sanctuary was erected over his remains. In 1962 Armenia celebrated the 16th centenary of his birth. Mesrop appears to be the author of the so-called Teaching of St. GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR, attributed to Agathangelus. However, he is not the author of the much later polyhistory (Hadjachapatum), also attributed to Agathangelus. Mesrop's vita was written by Koriun, his disciple.

Feast: Thursday following 4th Sunday after Pentecost, and Monday after 3d Sunday after Assumption.

MESSIAH

Term derived from the Hebrew word $m\bar{a}s\hat{\imath}ah$ meaning "anointed." Its Greek translation is χριστός, which is used some 40 times in the Septuagint. The later Hellenized form Μεσσίας is based on a transliteration of the Aramaic term $m^e \hat{s}\hat{\imath}h\bar{a}$ ". The latter term was used either as a proper noun, Messiah, without the definite article, as in Jn 4.25, or as an appellative, with the definite article, the Messiah, as in Jn 1.41.

Originally only the king bore the title ham-māšîaḥ (the anointed one). The king was called "the anointed of Yahweh" (1 Sm 24.7, 11; 26.9, 11, 16, 23; 2 Sm 1.14, 16; 19.22; Lam 4.20), or simply "His anointed," in a context that clearly shows that he was Yahweh's anointed [1 Sm 2.10; 12.3, 5; 16.6; 2 Sm 22.51; Ps 2.2; 19(20).7; 27(28).8]. Again, Yahweh spoke to the king as "my anointed one" [1 Sm 23.5; Ps 131(132).17; cf. also "your anointed," said to Yahweh in Ps 83(84).10; "the anointed of the God of Jacob" in 2 Sm 23.1]. The ANOINTING of rulers invested them with Yahweh's authority and made them personally inviolate (1 Sm 24.7; 26.9, 11; 2 Sm 1.14).

According to the postexilic Pentateuchal PRIESTLY writers, the priests were likewise anointed with oil at the ceremony of their investiture with the priestly office (Ex 29.7; Lv 8.12); originally this referred to the high priests who were called "the anointed priests" (Lv 4.3, 5, 16; 6.15), but later, also ordinary priests were anointed (Ex 28.41; Lv 10.7; Nm 3.3; 2 Mc 1.1). However, the anointing of priests was probably not a preexilic rite. In Dn 9.25–26 the high priest ONIAS III is called an anointed leader.

In Ps 104(105).15; 1 Chr 16.22 the term "my anointed ones" (the only place where it is used in the plural) can be seen, from the context, to refer to the Patriarchs, who, though not anointed in the literal sense of the term, were dedicated in a special way to God.

The term Messiah was not used in the technical sense, as referring to the future Savior, before the 1st century B.C.; the only exception would be in Ps 2.2, if this Psalm were interpreted in a strictly messianic sense.

In the NT, apart from Jn 1.41; 4.25, only the Greek equivalent [δ] Χριστός, [the] CHRIST, is used. The Gospel has many texts referring to Jesus' messianic status. In the Nazareth synagogue episode He says that He is the one who fulfills the messianic role described by Isaia (Lk. 4.14–30). To the messianic question of the Baptist's disciples He responds by indicating the import of His healing and preaching (Mt 11.1–20). When, at Caesarea Philippi, Peter confesses Him to be the Christ, Jesus affirms this in revealing the heavenly origin of the Apostle's remark (Mt 16.13–20).

During the apostolic era the Apostles preached Jesus as the Christ (Acts 2.36); St. Paul used this title 389 times. As Gentile converts, unfamiliar with Jewish messianism, began to enter the Church, certain historical implications of the title Christ faded into the background and it assumed the significance of a name. At times it came to designate the divinity of Jesus (see St. Justin, 2 Apol. 6) or His priesthood (see St. Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech.; Patrologia Graeca 33:664). St. Thomas devotes no special article in his Summa theologiae to the messiahship of Jesus.

Rationalist critique of Jesus' messianic consciousness promoted renewed interest in the messianic texts, which have come to be distinguished into those indicating Jesus' personal awareness and those exemplifying the faith of the community. It is especially the narratives of His baptism, temptations in the desert, and Peter's confession that show Jesus' messianic consciousness, together with references to Old Testament titles, such as Son of Man (Mk 2.28), Servant of Yahweh (cf. Mt 20.28), and 'he who is to come' (Mt 11.3).

MESSIANISM

The word "messiah" comes from the Hebrew verbal adjective $m\bar{a}\tilde{s}\hat{i}ah$, designating a person anointed with oil. It is used most frequently of the king (1 Sm 12.3; 2 Sm 19.22; Ps 2.2, etc.), and refers to his coronation anointing. It is used also of priests (Lv 4.3, 5, 16; 6.15), who were anointed with oil at their installation.

Israel's idea of messianism, according to J. Well-hausen, originated only during and after the Exile through the influence of the Persian hope for a savior who would rid the world of evil. S. Mowinckel, for whom the Messiah is purely an eschatological figure, is convinced that Israel's messianism received its genuine form only after the Davidic dynasty fell in 587 B.C.

H. Gunkel and H. Gressmann propose an older origin but also seek it outside of Israel in the ancient Oriental myths about the primeval king who would return at the end of the world. This position lacks any evidence that the Egyptians or the Mesopotamians ever expected an eschatological savior, an element characteristic of the Israelite Messiah.

The Swedish school looks for messianism's origin in the Oriental ideology that regarded the king as son or incarnation of a god. Each year the king was ritually subjected to suffering and humiliation that evoked the conflict between the god and chaos and that through the king's ritual victory represented the renewal of nature's vital forces. This picture does not reflect the Jewish messianic concept. The constantly recurring cycle does not agree with the Israelite hope for a Messiah whose appearance would be unique, God's definitive intervention in history and the eschatological event.

Two basic facts underlie the development of the messianic idea—the originality of the Israelite concept of history and Israel's sense of its vocation.

Mankind has continually attempted to explain the problems of evil and suffering. The answers, though many, reduce themselves to two, one rejecting history, the other assuming it. The rejection of history leads to the attempt to annul its force by the ritual reenactment of the gods' or heroes' primordial acts. Man believed that by participating in these archetypes through religious ceremony he could regenerate time. This was the idea behind the Babylonian New Year feast.

The Israelite does not reject history. One of his fundamental beliefs is that God directs history by manifesting Himself in it. All setbacks in history are manifestations of God's displeasure. However, the God who punished was the same God who had elected Israel in the covenants with Abraham and Moses. These were vantage points from which Israel's aspirations looked to the future. Once it was elected, Israel believed that God would always take part in its history.

Such a confidence in God's continued support gave Israel a vital sense of its vocation as principal beneficiary of the messianic promises. Israel's maturing reflection on God's designs influenced its view of itself and convinced it of its historical continuity. In every trial, Israel knew that it could not completely perish because of God's fidelity to His promises. The Messiah, God's instrument of salvation, would eventually bring effective deliverance from the present trials.

During its history, Israel had different types of leaders: the patriarch (Abraham); the prophet-legislator and friend of God (Moses); the charismatic leader (the Judge); the religious seer and prophet (Samuel); the king chosen and anointed by God (David); a series of prophets who opposed the religious corruption of the kings (Elijah, Amos, Jeremiah, etc.); the priest-prophet, well versed in the oral and written traditions (Ezechiel, Second Isaiah); and finally the scribes, priests, and wisdom collectors (Ezra, the author of Chronicles, Ecclesiastes). These changes in leadership contributed to the complexity of Israel's concept of the Messiah. The roots of messianism, therefore, went back to Abraham and even to the interpretation by the Israelite prophets of the origins of man, who was made in the image and likeness of God.

Messianism Before the Monarchy

The ancient ideas that later coalesced into exilic and postexilic messianism may be considered under four headings: the Protoevangelium of the first three chapters of Genesis, the promises to the Patriarchs, the covenant-alliance, and the oracles concerning the twelve tribes of Israel.

The Protoevangelium. Traditionally, the first proclamation of a future salvation has been attributed to the creation stories of Genesis, chapters 1 to 3, and specifically to Genesis 3.15. [see Rome and the Study of Scripture (5th ed. St. Meinrad, Ind. 1953) 121 para. 3.] In Genesis 3.15 God says,

I will put enmity between you and the woman, between your seed and her seed; He shall crush your head, and you shall lie in wait for his heel.

Modern Biblical scholars have great difficulty in finding any messianic content in the Hebrew of this text. The "crush" and the "lie in wait for" are uncertain translations of the same Hebrew root \hat{sup} . It is possible that the two forms of \tilde{sup} were intended to be a play on words, the first one meaning "trample upon" from the Akkadian šāpu, with that meaning, and the second from a parallel Hebrew root šā'ap meaning "snap at, gasp or pant after, set traps for." This is not at all certain, however, and modern translations are returning to the caution of the Greek translators of the Septuagint (LXX) who used τηρέω in both instances, with the meaning "give heed to, watch out for, or beware of"; these versions use some expression of hostility in both cases, e.g., "bruise," "attack," and "strike at." For modern scholars the messianic content of the text can only be a deeper meaning added to the text after the victory of Christ over Satan. They hold that constant and inescapable hostility between the woman's race and the serpent's is all that is certainly affirmed in Genesis 3.15.

That there is some vague hope of a future salvation to be found in Genesis chapters 1 to 3, however, is indicated by the continued concern of God for His creation, which He pronounced to be "very good" (Gn 1.31), and especially for man, whom He created in His image and likeness with the full deliberation of His heavenly court (1.26-27); whom He blessed with the power of increasing and dominating the rest of His creation (1.28); whom He did not immediately punish with death, after the only covenant law in Paradise was broken (cf. 2.16-17 with 3.7, 17, "all the days of your life"); and finally, whom, even after the Fall, He continued to converse with, whom He clothed, and made the source of all human life (3.9-13, 16-21; 4.1). The salvation that the Israelites hoped for could come only from the God who had made all things "very good." After man broke the Paradise covenant, an infraction that should have led to his annihilation with the immediate death of the first couple, God remained mercifully and gratuitously faithful to the man He had formed from the earth. He punished, but He did not annihilate. Just as at the FLOOD He saved Noah and his family, so always would He save the just remnant who were wary of the serpent's head (Isiah 4.2–3).

Promises to the Patriarchs. Patriarchal history tells of God's election of a people in whom all nations were to be blessed (Gn 12.1–3; 18.18; 22.18; 26.4; 28.14). This election was specifically related to the later Mosaic covenant between YAHWEH and Israel (Ex 3.15; Dt 6.10) and to Noah's election and salvation descending to Abraham through Noah's favored son, Shem (Gn 9.26–27; 10.10, 26–27). The election and promises to Abraham began to be realized in the miraculous birth of Isaac and the vocation of Jacob (Gn 21.1–3; 28.10–22;35.9–15), but during the long years in Egypt they seemed to be frustrated until a new beginning for them came forth from the burning bush that the flames did not consume (Ex 1.11–14; 3.1–10).

Covenant Promises. The covenant story centers around God's intimate friend, spokesman, wonderworker, and legislator, Moses. His work as God's instrument of salvation was the new beginning in the historical development of the chosen people, perfectly fulfilled in Christ and the new Israel, His Church. Moses was later held to be the ideal prophet and the basis for the expectation of a new Moses (Dt 18.15–19).

By the covenant, Yahweh claimed Israel as His own possession, His son and holy nation (Ex 4.22–23; 19.38), and His bride (Jer 2.2), not because of the nation's greatness but because He loved it and was faithful to His promises to Abraham and Jacob (Dt 7.7–8). In contrast, Israel was frequently unfaithful to its covenant obligations and the awareness of its vocation was kept alive only by the prophets and a few faithful kings. Its hope for a glorious future was thus maintained even during the direst trials. With the Northern Kingdom, Israel, already destroyed and with Judah on the verge of being engulfed by Babylonia, the editors of Deuteronomy, supported by trust in God's covenant loyalty, reaffirmed the alliance's unbreakable bond and demonstrated how deep was Israel's hope in the ultimate fulfillment of God's promises.

Oracles of the Twelve Tribes. The originally rather loose union between Israel's tribes was strengthened by joining together for holy wars (Jg ch. 4–5), or in a renewal of the covenant (Jos ch. 24), or in liturgical assemblies (1 Sm 2.12–17). Songs composed at these assemblies were probably the source of JACOB'S oracles (Gn 49.1–28), the amphictyonic blessings of Jacob. They are oracles rather than blessings as can be seen from the "in days to come" of verse 1. In their final form they are dated no later than David's reign but contain many elements anterior to the monarchy, although they are not as old as Deborah's canticle (Jg ch. 5) or recent as Moses' benedictions (Dt ch. 33). The oracle about Judah (Gn 49.8–12) is the most messianic and emphasizes Judah's importance in the fulfillment of the ancient promises.

After a metaphorical description of Judah's preeminence among the tribes in vv. 8–9, the oracle predicts that Jude's imperium will eventually be concentrated in a ruler to whom the scepter and ruler's staff most properly belong and to whom the nations will be obedient. Although there is doubt about the meaning "until he comes to whom it belongs," the image very likely describes King David's rule and empire. In vv. 11 and 12 the oracle seems to return to the tribe of Judah in general, describing the main products of its territory, the southern hill country, the land of the vine and the flocks-David himself was originally a shepherd (1 Sm 16.11-13). However, these two verses more probably refer to the ultimate ruler of v. 10 who will bring with him a new paradise. The paradisiacal abundance is poetically symbolized by the ruler carelessly tying his ass to the choicest vine, which, of course, would immediately afford his beast a wonderful feast, and by the extravagant washing of clothes in wine. The translation of the Revised Standard Version, "his eyes shall be red with wine and his teeth white with milk," is more appropriate in such a context than the "darker than wine, . . . whiter than milk" of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine translation. The messianic character of the poem is clarified by comparing it to the fertility brought by Yahweh's anointed in Isaiah 11.1-9; Ezekiel 34.23-31; Amos 9.11-15.

Balaam's oracles (Nm 24.3–9, 15–19) also are amphictyonic poems that look forward to a king issuing from Israel. In the second, more famous poem, the prophet in a mysterious vision points to Israel's royalty and describes its king as a mighty warrior. Late Judaism and the Targum Onkelos attributed messianic import to BALAAM'S words.

These prophecies led to the belief that the promises would be realized in a king and more specifically, a descendant of David.

Messianism after the Monarchy

The king in Israel, as exemplified in David, was a charismatic leader, ruling vicariously for Israel's true monarch, Yahweh. As God's vicar, David had divine strength and wisdom since he had received Yahweh's spirit at his anointing (1 Sm 16.13). As he was the intermediary between Yahweh and the people, national prosperity depended upon his fidelity to God (2 Sm 24.1–25).

In him the covenant promises were recapitulated, and with each successive king of the Davidic line a new symbol arose that Yahweh's favor still rested with His people.

Kingship originated in Israel because the Philistine threat could no longer be met by such occasional leaders as the Judges. Saul was at first only another charismatic leader but soon became by popular acclaim the anointed king. After God's rejection of Saul (1 Sm 13) and David's anointing (1 Sm 16.1–13), the monarchy became more closely connected with the messianic hopes.

Nathan's Prophecy. The most important text concerning royal messianism is the oracle of NATHAN in 2 Samuel 7.5–16 [see also Ps 88(89); 1 Chr 17.7–14]. Its essential elements are: Yahweh refuses David's proffered house (temple); He reviews the benefits that He has showered upon David and his nation; He, instead, will build for David a permanent "house" (dynasty), which He will treat as His son and uphold with His covenant loyalty forever. Verse 13 referring to Solomon's building of the first Temple is a later interpolation, for it clashes with vv. 5–7. The gratuitous nature of the promise is underlined by David's humble thanksgiving (vv.18–29).

Psalm 88 (89) recalls the Davidic favors and promises (vv. 4–5, 20–38), contrasts them with the present miserable condition of David's dynasty (vv. 39–46), and concludes with a pathetic appeal to God's covenantal love and fidelity (vv. 47–52). The Psalm is obviously exilic, but despite the destruction of Jerusalem and the imprisonment of the last Davidic king, Yahweh's fidelity is not called into question; it is the basis for the psalmist's final prayer for deliverance and the establishment of the Messiah as the supreme emperor of the earth's kings (vv. 51, 28). Psalm 131 (132) expresses the same hope for the continuance of David's dynasty.

While the monarchy lasted, Israel's covenant with God was identified as the Davidic covenant. Nathan's oracle looked only to the continuation of Davidic rulers. But, Israel's hopes had forever been modified and henceforth would always include in some form the Anointed of Yahweh.

The Royal Psalms. Certain psalms were composed for court occasions during the monarchy and usually extolled the king's majesty, justice, piety, and the victories won for him by Yahweh. The king is not named (except for David and Melchisedec) but the psalms seem to come from the Southern Kingdom with the possible exception of Ps 44(45) originally written for a king of Samaria and his Tyrenian bride. Their messianic content became more pronounced as they were used over and over again in the liturgy, when there was no longer a king in Israel. Besides Psalm 44(45), Psalm 2, 71(72), and 109 (110) will be examined for their messianic content.

Many modern exegetes interpret Psalm 2 as a messianic oracle describing the outcome of a rebellion of nations against Yahweh and His anointed King. God has set up His king in Sion, i.e., Jerusalem, ruled by the Davidic dynasty. The king then proclaims Yahweh's consecration of him as His royal son and describes his imperium on Yahweh's behalf over the nations. The Psalm concludes with a warning to all kings to serve Yahweh. Thus, in Ps 2, the king's reign is extended over all nations, going beyond the more limited horizons of Nathan's oracle. Although the Psalm's universal expressions may have been due originally to Oriental court style, the Psalm became for the postmonarchical Jews an expression of Israel's hope in Yahweh's fidelity to the messianic covenant. The world dominion expressed here must have appeared unattainable to the small remnant of Judeans living in an enclave around Jerusalem under Persian rule, except through the direct intervention of Yahweh from His heavenly throne.

In its final form and liturgical meaning, Psalm 71(72) also may be directly messianic, although originally it seems to have been an exaggerated prayer for some king at his coronation. World dominion is more clearly indicated and a new element is injected: the just king's rule will bring with it paradisiacal fruitfulness, especially for the oppressed poor. Justice and judgment are the keys that open the gates to this paradise in whose benefits all the earth's peoples will share. The image goes beyond the expectation of a reinstated Davidic monarchy and describes the ultimate ruler who has many traits parallel to the prophet-king of Isiah 9.5; 11.1–5; and Zachariah 9.9–17.

Psalm 109(110) reintroduces from Psalm 2.7 the notion of an adoptive divine sonship pertaining to the Messiah (the Hebrew of volume 3 is obscure; the Greek is the source of the reading, ". . . before the daystar, like the dew, I have begotten you"). The king's position at God's right hand affirms a closer association with Yahweh's monarchy. The Messiah is also a priest of the type of Melchisedec who had no genealogy, a vague indication that he would be more than a mere historical figure, but a religious one incorporating in himself the prerogatives of both priest and king.

Psalm 44(45) commemorates a royal wedding, beginning with praise of the king and his rule's glorious benefits (vv. 3–8); then the wedding procession is described and the bride is told of her responsibilities (vv.9–16); the Psalm concludes with a prophecy concerning the dynasty's permanence and glory (vv. 17–18). The epithalamium may have been written for a historical king who married a foreign princess, but, in a typical meaning, it refers to the King-Messiah to whom Israel (a figure of the Church) will be wedded, according to Jewish and Christian tradition. The king is described as endowed with Yahweh's characteristics [Ps 144(145).4–7, 12–13] and those of Emmanuel (Is 9.5–6).

Royal Messianism in the Prophets. The Davidic promises came through the ministry of the prophet Nathan. It is not surprising that later prophets returned to this theme and expanded it. Two centuries after Nathan delivered God's covenant to David, another prophetadviser to AHAZ, King of Judah, reaffirmed it and saw more deeply into its meaning. The times were somber. Assyria was on the march again; Damascus and Samaria were besieging Jerusalem to destroy the Davidic dynasty and to force Judah into a coalition against Assyria. Ahaz, a young man, may even have killed his only son as a sacrifice to the god Moloch as a means to lift the siege (2 Kgs 16.3). In this mortal threat to the House of David, Isaiah uttered the first EMMANUEL oracle (Is 7.10–25). In it he tells Achaz that the besieging kings will soon be destroyed and that he has nothing to fear if he trusts in God alone and does not ask for help from Tiglath-Pileser III, the Assyrian King (2 Kgs 16.7–9). Ahaz refuses the sign that Isaia has offered in order to prove Yahweh's fidelity, but Isaiah insists on giving a sign to the House of David, "the virgin shall be with child, and bear a son, and shall name him Emmanuel."

Some interpreters hold that the prophecy is directly messianic and refers to the virgin birth of Jesus Christ. They argue that the term 'almâ (marriageable girl, young woman, until her first child's birth) should mean a virgin, for a virgin birth would be a supernatural sign, whereas the mere prediction of a son's birth for Ahaz and his young bride would not be. Thus, they say that 'almâ is synonymous here with the specific Hebrew word for virgin tûlâ (Lv 21.14; Jgs 21.12). Other scholars claim that the oracle is messianic only in a general way, or in a typical or deeper sense, and that it refers directly to the birth of Ahaz's son Hezekiah and through him to the Messiah. The form of address used by Isaiah in 7.13, "House of David" and the plural "you," recall Nathan's prophecy, although Isaiah is speaking to an unworthy and unbelieving descendant of David. This unworthiness does not destroy the promise, for Ahaz still embodies the prophet's hope for a Davidic king who will live up to the ideal expressed by the prophetic name given to him, Emmanuel, i.e., God is with us, He is on our side and we need no other help than His. The oracle, therefore, predicts the birth of a faithful king (realized in Hezekiah), the destruction of Samaria and Damascus, and the purifying devastation of Judah's lands by the Assyrians, a devastation that disrupts normal agriculture and reduces the land to pasturage (Is 7.15–25). Yet, the pasturage will produce an abundance of "curds and honey" (the idyllic food of faithful Israel) for the remnant purified by God's punishment and led by the faithful Davidic king, Emmanuel.

The second Emmanuel oracle (Is 8.23–9.6) again speaks of a son of David who will sum up in himself all the splendid attributes of Israel's ancient leaders and more recent heroes and will rule from David's throne with judgment and justice in contrast to the previous evil kings. His rule is placed against the background of the return from exile of the Northern Kingdom, Israel, and predicts the union of the two kingdoms again as it was in David's and Solomon's days.

The third oracle concerning this mysterious successor of David (Is 11.1-9) describes the king as full of Yahweh's spirit that endows him with qualities of wise understanding, shrewd strength, and an intimate knowledge and reverence for the Lord, the qualities of Solomon, David, and the prophets, but most of all, of Moses, God's intimate friend. The ruler will not rule like earthly kings but like a friend and spokesman for God, judging for the poor and afflicted, because of his divinely aided intuition, and destroying the wicked not by arms and war but by his mouth's rod and his lips' breath. He will be clothed in justice and faithfulness, the true religion, and his efforts will bring a new paradise without violence or any destruction, for they will fill the earth with the true, intimate, and faithful awareness of and devotion to Yahweh.

Isaiah's oracles continue the theme of royal Davidic Messianism, but they also develop it to include the ultimate recreation of the universe through a leader who is more prophet than king, more of a dedicated executor of Yahweh's will than a sovereign who demands obeisance. The historical is less pronounced than the eschatological and a new era in Messianism has begun. The religious and political frustrations of Israel and Juda had conditioned this prophetic leap into the completely Yahweh-controlled future and end, and the figure of the king who would be the Lord's regent would never be erased from Israel's hopes.

In Micah 4.14–5.1–5 the doom destined for Israel is contrasted with the deliverance to come through a king of David's line whose greatness will reach the ends of the earth. The passage follows the same pattern as the Isaian oracles and reflects the prophet's strong hope in Yahweh's fidelity to the covenant that He made with King David.

A century later, when Babylonia has taken Assyria's place as the scourge of Palestine, Jeremia foresees that Yahweh will raise up a just shoot to David who will rule justly and wisely and who will bear the prophetic name "The Lord our justice" (Jer 23.5–6). Thus, even though Jeremia's main message had been the ruin of Jerusalem and its monarchy, he still trusted in Yahweh's royal covenant when he referred to this future ruler.

Four more allusions to the royal Messiah are found in Ezekiel, Jeremiah's young contemporary. In Ezekiel 17.121 the allegory of the two eagles and the cedar that becomes through its shoot a modest vine and aspires through the help of another eagle to grow into a grandiose vine, ends with a vague prophecy (17.22-24); this is that Yahweh will make it a great cedar again, to prove that He is the only one who makes the little great and the great little. The allegory pictures a restoration of the Davidic monarchy according to eschatological proportions that are used again in the Gospels (cf. Ez 17.23 with Mt 13.32). It also seems that Ezechiel refers to Gn 49.10, the oracle in favor of Judah, when he says in Ezekiel 21.31-32 that Israel will be turned topsy-turvy and "twisted" until one comes who has the claim (judgment) against the city (Jerusalem?) and to whom Yahweh will deliver it. Ezekiel also depicts a new David as the shepherd and sole ruler of God's revitalized people in a parallel doublet (Ez 34.23-24 and 37.24-25).

Zechariah also describes a just, victorious, and humble king of Jerusalem who will dominate the known world and proclaim peace for all nations (Zec 9.9–10). In Amos too, although it is found in an addition to the prophet's original work, the Davidic Messianism is apparent (Am 9.11–12). The theme was popular among the postexilic prophets Haggai and Zechariah as concretized in their glorification of the freed exile, who may have been of royal rank, Zerubbabel (Hg 2.21–23; Zec 4.7–10; cf Zec 3.8 with 6.11–13 where Zerubbabel is obviously in question rather than Joshua). Even after the long years of Exile, another generation kept alive the ideal that there would be a son of David who would bear the royal insignia.

The ultimate picture of royal messianism depicts a kingdom and a new era that is outside history's stream in any human sense and hopes for Yahweh's divine reign through justice and judgment as executed by His mysterious vicar, the Messiah.

Priestly Messianism. With the fall of the monarchy, the long Exile, and the emphasis given to the new Temple and its priesthood in the second part of Ezekiel (40.1–47.12), the priest's importance grew to an unprecedented level. In the reconstruction after the Exile, the high priest emerged as a leader on a par with the ethnic leader (Zec 6.13c). The Temple's rebuilding under Zerubbabel and the high priest Josue became the inspiration of the discouraged refugees (Hg 2.1–9). The priesthood was restored in greater splendor and ritual than it had ever had before (Zec ch. 3). During this period most of the priestly laws found in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers received their full development from the Mosaic nucleus. Henceforth, any ruler of Israel, whether foreign or from the people, would have to share his government of the people with the high priest and his clan. David's inheritance and his election were not forgotten, but he became more and more a figure favorable to the priesthood and eventually the priest's great legislator after Moses (1 Chr 22.2–29.30). The priest also became the learned man, the scribe who knew the law and expounded it to the people, and, after a long struggle, the winner over independent sages, making them admit that, after all, ultimate wisdom was the Law that Moses gave through Aaron (Sir 24.22–27). Ezra, priest and scribe, was the father of this period and expressed the three main ideas of Judaism, the chosen people, the Temple, and the Law. The Chronicler (the collector of the great work that includes 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemia) must have been a priest also (see CHRONICLER, BIBLICAL). Nehemia, although he was more nationalistic than Ezra, followed the same inspiration as he, having been well molded by priestly tradition. Finally, the ethnic enclave around Jerusalem received as its sole ruler in its religio-political affairs the high priest, as exemplified by the splendid Simon of Sirach 50.1-21.

The priest's growth in importance influenced the messianic hopes of Judaism. A priestly clan led the rebellion against the Seleucids in the 2d century B.C. and by the end of that century had developed into the last Jewish kings, the Hasmonaean dynasty. The Maccabees were not of the highest order of priests, and by their domination they aroused the jealousy of the Sadocites, from whom the high priest by right was elected. This reaction against the HASMONAEANS was one of the factors leading to the formation of the Qumran sect, which opposed the illegitimate Jerusalem cult and longed for two Messiahs, one royal and one of priestly rank. The author of Hebrews was familiar with this development and described Jesus as the fulfillment of priestly messianic hopes (Heb 9.1–10.18).

Messianism in Deutero-Isaiah. Although the Isaian Book of Consolation (Is ch. 40 to 55, 60, and 62) calls Israel Yahweh's slave or servant, elected as a witness for Him among the nations, the same term has a different signification in the four "SERVANT OF THE LORD" oracles (Is 42.1–9; 49.1–6; 50.4–11; 52.13–53.12). The servant of the songs appears to designate a person rather than the collective Israel, although what is perhaps a gloss (49.3.) identifies the two servants. In 49.5–6 Yahwah's servant is clearly distinguished from Jacob's tribes and Israel's survivors. In the first oracle, he is Yahweh's elected, supported, and preferred slave, the bearer of His spirit, who quietly but surely brings God's justice, i.e., the true religion, to all nations by a teaching that will be a light for them and the blind, and a deliverance for captives. The same special election and universal mission is found in the second oracle, but in 49.4 the servant speaks as frustrated in his office, a development of the gentle quietness of the first oracle. A further elaboration of the servant's suffering is found in 50.5b-9 of the third oracle, which also emphasizes his discipleship and divine knowledge, the prerequisite for his teaching mission. Finally, in the most familiar and important fourth oracle, the ultimate glory and honor due to Yahweh's servant is contrasted with his unhappy history. In terms reminiscent of Jeremiah's suffering, the innocent servant's misery is described as unwarranted yet willed by God and freely accepted by the servant as an expiation for the faults of the multitudes and an intercession for sinners. He is submitted to humiliation and a dishonorable death like a lamb led to slaughter and accepts the punishment meant for "us" so that "we" might have peace. After his trials, he shall see the light and enter into his triumph; he shall prosper, he shall be raised high and be greatly exalted.

It is very difficult for a Christian to determine what these images and oracles meant to the sacred remnant of Israelites who returned from Babylon after the Exile, for he immediately transfers them to the Gospels and the preaching, suffering, and triumph of Jesus Christ and His new Israel, the Church. In their original impact the oracles must have evoked, however, the "worm Jacob," the "maggot Israel," who was and always will be, "Israel, my servant, Jacob, whom I have chosen, offspring of Abraham my friend," (Is 41.14, 8); they evoked Israel as a collectivity, therefore, but an Israel whose exilic experience was typified by that of the innocent yet suffering chosen prophets of God, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and later by Job, the innocent wise man and servant of God whose reason for suffering was hidden in the mystery of God's whirlwind. Whatever their original meaning may have been, the songs mixed into the messianic hopes, as did the whole Exile, the catalytic elements of suffering and death that were to hasten the movement toward the cross and the Resurrection.

The Son of Man in Daniel. The Book of Daniel, an apocalyptic literary form, written to console the Jews suffering from the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanus in the 2d century B.C., presents in Daniel 7.13–14, "one like a son of man coming, on the clouds of heaven." This mysterious, apocalyptic image is identified in Daniel 7.18, 22 with the saints of the Most High, therefore a collectivity, but the apocryphal books, Enoch and 4 Esdras, as well as rabbinical tradition, understand the figure as a man who has divine qualities and is the final king of the ultimate Kingdom of God.

The idea of God's Kingdom that destroys and succeeds all other kingdoms is found also in the image of the rock detached mysteriously from the mountain to crush the statue that symbolizes the previous empires (Dn 2.34, 44–45; cf. Mt 21.42–44; Lk 20.17–18). Other prophecies in Daniel are messianic in tone and predict a future in expressions that go beyond the immediate hopes of freedom from the Antiochean persecutions (e.g., 9.24; 12.1–4).

A few more texts deserve at least passing mention. In Deuteronomy 18.15–22, Moses promises that Yahweh will raise up a prophet like himself to guide the people. Although the context indicates that the text refers to all the prophets, later Judaism understood it to envision a prophet-messiah. The New Testament writers also know of this interpretation (Jn 1.21; Mt 16.14; 13.57).

The suffering and finally triumphant just man of Psalm 21 (22) is considered by some to be in the tradition of Isaia's suffering servant of Yahweh, but there is no idea of vicarious suffering for others in the Psalm. However, the Psalm's images are applied to the suffering Jesus by the Gospels (Mt 27.35, 43, 46; Mk 15.34; Jn 19.24).

Messianism in the New Testament

The messianic story is completed in the New Testament, where the Old Testament prophecies' fulfillment is affirmed in the life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus, the Christ.

Use of Old Testament Prophecies. The New Testament writers never raised the question whether the Old Testament prophecies envisaged Christ's mystery literally and in every detail; they simply situated Christ's words and actions in the context of sacred history and thereby brought out the richest meanings of the ancient texts, which they then reapplied to the Christian mystery. Peter in his Pentecost sermon (Acts 2.14–36), for example, repeatedly relates the events to which he bears witness to the appropriate places in the Prophets and Psalms and gains greater knowledge thereby of the objects of his witnessing.

This process of enlightenment is not merely a movement from the prophecies to the realized visions, so that the Apostles could then recognize the reality. The reality, rather, is observed first—Jesus on the cross, in the tomb, resurrected, on the road to Damascus. Only then did the Apostles turn back from the reality's clearness to the prophecy's obscurity to see in it a deeper meaning, which in turn they again related to their experience to discover in it a greater depth of mystery. This type of elucidation was most valid and appealing to the early Jewish Christians who were steeped in the sacred themes of the Old Testament. It was not a well-controlled method of literal and historical analysis; its looseness and freedom are at times shocking to minds trained in the exact methods of scientific criticism. But one cannot legitimately demand that the norms of modern exegesis be applied to religious teachers who were men of God and not literary and historical critics. Thus, to give but one example, Luke's summary of Peter's sermon (Acts 2.27) is not to be considered at fault for using the Greek text of Psalm 15 (16).9–10 rather than its Hebrew original, which is much less meaningful for believers in the Resurrection.

The Apostles' message was living and organic; it grew and adapted itself to various needs under the guidance of the Holy Spirit and in the secure awareness that they had been sent by Jesus to proclaim His mystery to the world. The validity of their use of prophecies rests not on an accurate and erudite knowledge of the Old Testament but on their divine commission as the new spokesmen for God and His Anointed; they were the new scribes, "instructed in the kingdom of heaven," who brought forth from their storeroom of memory and understanding, strengthened and enlightened by the risen Lord and His Spirit, things new and old (Mt 13.51–52; Lk 24.25–27).

Messianism in the Gospels. The four Gospels were the product of three sources that developed homogeneously and are still apparent in the final works. First, there was Jesus Himself, His words, deeds, and triumph as they were remembered by His disciples; then, the Apostles who, through the light of the Spirit and in the context of their post-Resurrection experiences as gospel preachers and founders of Christian churches, gradually came to a deeper understanding of what they had seen and heard of the Word of Life, and to a firmer grasp of the nature of the Kingdom that the Lord governed through them from heaven; and finally, the Gospel writers themselves who adapted the already developed message to their particular purposes. By keeping this development in mind, one may more accurately understand the Gospels' messianism.

Inaugural Proclamation of the Messiah. The accounts of the baptism, temptation, and hidden life of Christ are full of messianic allusions and affirmations that proclaim Jesus to be God's beloved Son in whom He is well pleased. He can cleanse man with the Holy Spirit that He received through the newly opened heavens because He has accepted His solidarity with sinful man, although He is innocent, by undergoing the penitential rite of John's baptism (Mk 1.8–11; Mt 3.13–15). The references to Isaiah's Suffering Servant are clear.

In the Fourth Gospel, in the context of His baptism, Jesus is heralded as the Lord for whom the Baptist prepares the way; God's Lamb or Servant, the Elect, who takes away the world's sin by baptizing with the Holy Spirit; the Teacher who is the source of all wisdom; the Messiah-Rock who has power to name His chief Apostle, the Rock; the fulfillment of the Law and the Prophets; Israel's King and God's Son; and finally, the Son of Man whose divine glory is manifested for the first time by the changing of water into wine (John 1.23–2.11).

In the temptation narratives, Jesus is described as the true and faithful Israel who fulfills the ideals of Deuteronomy 8.3; 6.16, 13 in conquering the major temptations to which the old Israel succumbed in the desert, thus showing His filial obedience and confidence in God and manifesting Himself as the perfect human creature whom the angels serve. He is the new Adam who conquers Satan and remains faithful to the Creation covenant; He is the new Moses who leads mankind into a new paradise where man is at ease with wild beasts and angels (Mt 4.1–11; Lk 3.23, 38; 4.1–13; Mk 1.12–13). See TEMPTATIONS OF JESUS.

In Matthew's Infancy Gospel, clear messianic titles are given Him: Son of David and Abraham; the Christ; Jesus, the Savior of His people; Emmanuel, God with us; King of the Jews, honored by Gentiles who bring Him gifts; and Israel, God's Son called out of Egypt (Mt 1.1, 16, 21–22; 2.2–11, 15). In Luke's parallel Gospel the post-Resurrectional titles given Jesus are Son of God, the Lord, Savior, Christ the Lord, the Christ of the Lord, and a contradicted Sign (Lk 1.35, 43; 2.11, 26, 34).

These conceptions of Jesus stem from the reality of His Passion and victory over death, sin, and the Prince of This World, the devil. They proclaim more than just an historical Jesus who was a wise teacher of the best the Jews had to offer but who ran afoul of corrupt official Judaism and Roman power and, after His execution for rebellion, was remembered with such longing by His disciples that they accepted the revelation of His Resurrection. This Jesus is the end and meaning of all the long history of salvation and His total mystery is proclaimed at the very opening of the Gospels in a setting that evokes all of Yahweh's faithful promises to Israel. The inaugural message, therefore, stems in its fullness from the post-Resurrection period when the Holy Spirit was teaching Jesus' Apostles "all the truth" (Jn 16.13).

The Messianic Secret. The common people to whom Jesus proclaimed His preliminary gospel longed for a warrior king who would deliver Israel from foreign domination. Since Jesus knew His messiahship had a different purpose, He commanded the demons not to make known His messianic character (Mk 1.25, 34; 3.12). He also wanted the cured not to broadcast His miracles (Mk 1.44; 5.43; 7.36; 8.26), and He even imposed silence about His messiahship on the Apostles until He had risen from the dead (Mk 8.30; 9.9).

His message was veiled of necessity because His audience could not have understood it and would have misinterpreted its meaning (Jn 6.15, 26; Mt 10.27), and because He had not completed His messianic office by the time of His death and Resurrection. He thus used enigmatic symbols that excited curiosity in the well disposed, but discouraged the enthusiasm of nationalists and disaffected the culpably indocile (Mt 13.13).

The messianic secret was not manufactured by the Evangelists; it corresponded to the historical reality but was emphasized by Mark to give force to the Christian confession of faith that he attributed to the Roman soldier at Jesus' death, "Truly this man was the Son of God" (Mk 15.39). Mark's words thereby also seem to indicate that the true evaluation of Jesus' messiahship will come only when the gospel has been preached to the Gentiles who will accept Him as their Savior (Mk 5.18-20; and note that according to Mk 16.7, the risen Jesus is to appear to the Disciples in Galilee, the "District of the Gentiles"; see also Jn 4.25-26, 39-42). The mysterious Messiah then is really God's Son, the Lord Jesus, enthroned at God's right hand, who confirms the Apostles' preaching of the Word in the whole world by acting in them and through them by the miracles they perform (Mk 16.19; although the verse is probably not from Mark, it is of Apostolic origin, an inspired part of Scripture, and an apt ending for the Gospel of the messianic secret).

The Suffering Servant of God. When Peter had acknowledged that Jesus was the Messiah, and after Jesus had sternly commanded that the Disciples were not to reveal this secret, He then began to teach them openly and clearly that the Son of Man must suffer and be killed and arise again after three days. Peter reacted by rebuking Him for saying such a thing. In His turn, Jesus rebuked Peter for not understanding God's plan and for impeding its fulfillment by his human aspirations (Mk 8.27-33). Peter's misconception, coming immediately after his messianic confession, shows that even the closest followers did not understand the nature of Jesus' messiahshipthat He was the Suffering Servant of God who would die for man's sin in order to enter into His glory. Despite the clear teaching (Mk 8.32a, 34-38; 9.9-13, 30-32; 10.32–34; 12.1–12; 14.7–8), the disciples did not grasp the meaning of Jesus' words until after He had been crucified and had risen (Lk 24.2527). After the Resurrection, however, the expiatory death and consequent triumph of Jesus became the main theme of the Apostolic preaching and was especially emphasized by St. Paul (1 Cor 1.17–25; Rom 3.25–26; 5.6–9).

The Son of Man. Jesus preferred to call Himself by this title, often using it in contexts of humiliation (Mt 8:20; 11.19; 17.22; 20.28) but also when He proclaimed His eschatological victory (Mt 17.9; 24.30; 25.31). It was used, therefore, to signify both His lowly, human condition and His transcendent nature as the king of God's final Kingdom (Mt 26.64). Jesus thus controlled the gradual revelation of His messianic character by the evolution of the title's meaning into the SON OF MAN at the right hand of God. This movement is parallel to the succinct but profound expression of Christ's mystery in Philippians 2.5–11 that terminates in the most transcendent title of all: Jesus is the Lord, i.e., Yahweh Himself.

MESSMER, SEBASTIAN GEBHARD

Archbishop, canonist; b. Goldach, Switzerland, Aug. 29, 1847; d. Goldach, Aug. 3, 1930. He attended the diocesan college of St. George near Saint-Gall, Switzerland, and the University of Innsbrück, Austria. Following his ordination on July 23, 1871, Bp. James R. Bayley invited him to teach theology and canon law at Seton Hall College, South Orange, N.J., where he remained for 18 years. He also did pastoral work and served as chaplain to St. Mary's orphanage, Newark, N.J. He was chosen to draft the decrees prior to the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore and to act as one of the council secretaries. He also helped to prepare the report of its deliberations for publication in 1886 and received an honorary D.D. from the pope for his efforts. In preparation for the assignment in 1889 to teach canon law at The Catholic University of America, he went to Rome where he earned a D.C.L. from the Collegio Appollinare. His tenure at the Catholic University ended with his appointment in 1891 as bishop of Green Bay, Wis. He attributed responsibility for his removal to the faculty who knew that he had been opposed to the establishment of the University.

His ten-year stay in the Wisconsin diocese resulted in the building of a number of parochial schools, academies, asylums, and hospitals. He sided with the Germans in the controversies between the Irish and German Catholics. He attacked the Bennett Law (1893) requiring compulsory education in the English language and championed the placement of Marquette's statue in the national capitol (1897). He promoted rural settlement and a Catholic summer school for the West, and sponsored the AMERICAN FEDERATION OF CATHOLIC SOCIETIES. He was a lifelong Republican, a foe of prohibition, women's suffrage, and socialism, holding that socialism was the basis of many labor unions. In 1903 he was transferred to Milwaukee as archbishop.

In his long administration of the Milwaukee Archdiocese (1903-30), there was a rapid expansion of parish schools, hospitals, sanitariums, and institutions for dependents. He gave generous support to Marquette University and Mt. Mary College, Milwaukee, Wis. As a result of his initiative, a chaplain was provided for the Catholic students at the University of Wisconsin, Madison (1906) and a superintendent of schools for the archdiocese was appointed. His articles appeared in the old Catholic Encyclopedia, American Ecclesiastical Review, American Catholic Historical Review, Pastoral Blatt, and Salesianum. Among his works are Praxis Synodalis (1883); he also edited: Canonical Procedure in Criminal Cases of Clerics (1886), from the German by Franz Droste; Spirago's Method of Christian Doctrine (1901); W. Devivier's Christian Apologetics (1903); and the Works of the Rt. Rev. John England, 7 v. (1908). Messmer's Outlines of Bible Knowledge (1910 and 1927) was based on A. Bruell's Bibelkunde. His honorary degrees included a D.D. from the University of Breslau in 1923 and L.L.D. from Marquette University in 1925. He was a curator of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin for many years.

METAPHYSICS

From the Greek t α μετα t α φυσικά (what comes after the physical) and the Latin metaphysica (after or beyond the physical), ontology, first philosophy, theology, wisdom, the philosophical science having as object being as being (t α δ ν η δ ν, whence "ontology"), or the study of the meaning, structure, and principles of whatever is and inasmuch as it is or exists. In its material object, or the number of things it studies, metaphysics is allinclusive, extending to everything and every aspect of whatever is or can exist, whether of a material, sensible, physical nature or of a higher, nonmaterial nature (from which extension to the most perfect and divine it is called "first philosophy" or "theology"). Nevertheless, metaphysics retains its distinctive point of vision, or formal object, inasmuch as it is concerned with things as beings, that is, according to the relation that any thing or aspect of things has to existence, rather than to one of the particular aspects treated in the other sciences. The unity of this point of view, centered on what is most fundamental to all reality, enables metaphysics to investigate the way in which the many are interrelated to the one in some form of real unity. Further, since things are reflected in knowledge, it enables metaphysics to order and evaluate the various types of speculative and practical knowledge (whence the term "wisdom").

The etymological derivation of metaphysics has been explained generally, though, it seems, erroneously, according to the theory of J. G. Buhle (1763 to 1821): from the fact that Andronicus of Rhodes (1st century B.C.) placed the treatises of Aristotle on this subject after the Physics for lack of any proper position in his scheme of the first complete edition of Aristotle's works. However, the name has been traced with probability by H. Reimer to Eudemus of Rhodes (3d century B.C.), the first editor of Aristotle's works, for whom it reflected not only that the subject matter in some sense transcends the physical aspect of things, but also the corresponding Aristotelian concern for the order of learning as proceeding from the more immediately sensible to the transcendent.

This article considers metaphysics in two parts. The first is concerned with its history, and the second with its elaboration as a science.

History of Metaphysics

Metaphysical thought arises from the WONDER generated by the tension between the characteristics of things experienced as multiple, individual, and contingent on the one hand and those of truth as one, universal, and necessary on the other. The history of metaphysics is constituted by man's progressing toward a more penetrating mode of vision (formal subject) and the correlative intrinsic and extrinsic principles that enable him to understand both the many as constituting one order of reality and the one truth in its multiple realizations.

Primitive Origins. That man's mind is naturally metaphysical is indicated by the vision of reality as a whole and the concern for explanation manifested in the ancient myths (see MYTH AND MYTHOLOGY). In Greece these were summarized in the Theogony of Hesiod, which stated the parts of the universe in the anthropomorphic form of the gods, unifying them in a genetic series and identifying in Eros an active principle for their interrelation. To attain a more precise view of this unity, it was necessary to supersede the anthropomorphic and symbolic form of the myths in order to attain a more explicit identification of their intellectual content and its source. This step was accomplished in concrete and personal terms by the Hebrews and in abstract terms by the Hindus and others in the East and by the Greeks in the West.

The Jews, from their earliest history to the Babylonian Exile in the 6th century B.C., under the tutelage of divine providence came to see that persons and things, however many, were one in their common dependence on God or, more exactly, in their dependence on a common God. "I am the first and I am the last; there is no God but me" [Is 44.6]. This unity in things was paralleled in the intentional order, where individuals by their fundamental response of mind and heart related themselves and their world to God. The repetition of this relation in concrete terms for single types of things ("who made the heavens in wisdom, . . . who spread out the earth upon the waters . . . ''-Ps 135.5-6) manifests the need for a more abstract type of thought capable of identifying the proper extension and comprehension of the unifying relation to God.

The Oriental mind did carry metaphysical thought to the abstract and speculative level. HINDUISM in its scriptures, the UPANISHADS, expressed a decisive appreciation of unity through the one impersonal substance, Brahman or Ātman, as the intimate reality of all things. However, fatally underestimating the world of experience as an illusion and source of suffering, it placed the road to wisdom in an ascetical and mystical science of withdrawal from activity and in a movement upward into natural contemplation of God as a prelude to reabsorption into Ātman. In the 6th century B.C., BUDDHISM, having reduced all to empty phenomena in flux, held the supreme science to be one of deliverance from existence as such into the total indetermination called NIRVĀNA.

Greek Philosophy. The Greeks, in initiating their own speculative unification in the 6th century, B.C., possessed a firm appreciation of the reality of their world and a growing awareness of the value of intellectual clarity. Hence, their first steps were scientific in character, based on the evidence of the external senses and concluding in correlative terms that all was but particular states of water (Thales, c. 640 to 550) or other similar elements. Even here their concern opened beyond the merely physical to the metaphysical problem of overall unity, as is reflected in Anaximander's (c. 611 to 546) further reasoning to the "boundless" as beyond the diverse elements, unborn, all-encompassing, all-governing, and even divine [W. Jaeger, The Theology of the Early Greek Philosophers, tr. E. S. Robinson (Oxford 1947) 24-36]. PYTHAGORAS (c. 580 to 500), in holding all to be numbers, attained a second level of evidence corresponding to the internal senses. Finally, PARMENIDES arrived at the third, uniquely intellectual, and metaphysical appreciation of the real in its own proper term, being. "Being is; for To Be is possible, and Nothingness is not possible," [figure 6, K. Freeman, Ancilla to the Pre-Socratic Philosophers (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1957) 43]. Since being could differ only by nonbeing, or nothing, Parmenides denied anything other than the one absolutely perfect and unchanging sphere. This gave being the meaning of identity or what can be thought (figure 3, ibid.; figure 2, 42), contrasting with the position of HERACLITUS (540 to 475) that all was becoming. This contrast reflected the attainment by Greek philosophy of the properly metaphysical: the real as such—the explicit search for its internal and external principles and, in their terms, for the relation between the multiplicity manifested by experience and the unity appreciated by the mind. This search occupied the golden age of Greek philosophy.

PLATO (429 to 348) concluded from the fact of multiple beings to a principle of limitation or nonbeing as a "not-that-being" (Soph. 259A), and from the similarity among beings to something one or absolute in which the multiple participate as limited imitations. However, the combination of the Parmenidean meaning of being as intelligible identity with the Socratic method led to the transfer of reality from the multiple to that which the multiple imitate, the transcendent formal unities as Ideas to be contemplated and hierarchically ordered under the supreme Idea of the Good or the One (Republic 509). Man's highest calling and wisdom must then be to tend with all his powers, including the affective, to an ever clearer appreciation of the Ideas as the basis for guiding his actions (Symp.).

ARISTOTLE (384 to 322), while retaining the goal of intellectual clarity and classically developing the division and structure of the sciences, initiated a more active understanding of FORM, based on a realist appreciation of the form of matter in changing things. This led him to forms separated from matter, which were not only objects of contemplation but themselves living, acting, knowing, and ultimately "the knowing on knowing" (νόησις νοήσεως νόησις Meta. 1074b 34). Related to this new level of reality was the distinct science of metaphysics, which in comparison to physics is both higher in dignity, because concerned with the unchanging, immaterial, and divine being, and broader in content, because concerned with being as being and hence all being (Meta. 1003a 20-1004a 1, 1025b 1-1026a 33). Aristotle, it seems, never perfectly conciliated the two understandings of metaphysics because his insight into being was not sufficient to allow for an understanding of the way in which the highest being could be the cause of being, as being in all beings. Despite the active understanding of form within the perspective of being as identity, form, and essence, the Parmenidean problem of the one and the many remained insoluble in these terms. This is seen from the limited attention given by the Greeks to the best manifestation of the simple affirmation of being, the PERSON as a free and creative center in time and as capable of individual immortality. (See GREEK PHILOSOPHY.)

Christianity. Christian thought presented the context for a penetrating insight into the act of being by underlining these very notions: in its distinguishing person from nature in the doctrine of the Trinity, and then in its heightening the appreciation of the created person's affirmation of self as gift in a response of love to the divine redemptive invitation to become sons, brothers, and heirs; and in its distinguishing creation from the Trinitarian processions, thus distinguishing form from the most formal effect of creation, the existence ("to be," or esse) according to which a being is (the perfection of all perfections). The history of metaphysics in the Middle Ages consists in the major developments made possible by this more penetrating appreciation of being and evoked by the elaboration of the resultant theologies. These developments were made first on a more Platonic basis by St. AU-GUSTINE (354 to 430) and his school through St. BONAVENTURE (1231 to 74), and then with an increasing addition of the Aristotelian systemization and realism by way of Arabian philosophy, culminating in the major syntheses of St. THOMAS AQUINAS (1224 to 1274), John DUNS SCOTUS (c. 1274 to 1308), and others (see below).

Modern Era. Modern and contemporary metaphysics, finding the realistic metaphysics of being of the classical Christian philosophies of the Middle Ages already negated in the conceptualist philosophy of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM (c. 1349) and his followers, proceeded to develop its metaphysics from the subject as manifested by the cogito of R. DESCARTES (1596 to 1650). For the deleterious results, extending even to the negation of the possibility of metaphysics as a science, see METAPHYSICS, VALIDITY OF. Within this context, however, such classical rationalists as B. SPINOZA (1632 to 1677) and G. W. LEIBNIZ (1646 to 1727) contributed importantly to working out a logically deductive pattern of ideas; the schemata of the critical philosophy of I. Kant (1724 to 1804) and the dialectical sequences of G. W. F. HEGEL (1770 to 1831) further expressed reality's organic and developing character. Without realistic foundations, these philosophies inevitably progressed from positing that being is met in CONSCIOUSNESS to IDEALISM, holding that being is consciousness.

Contemporary metaphysics has sought to identify a place and a topic for metaphysical investigation that will be without presuppositions in order to allow the human mind most authentically to attain the real. In the transcendental phenomenology of E. HUSSERL (1859 to 1938), philosophy is concerned with the knower and is directed toward grasping the world-constituting consciousness as such, rather than as one thing among many, because to grasp fully the possibilities of consciousness would be to grasp adequately being itself. For M. Heidegger (1889-1976), on the contrary, philosophy seeks the meaning of "to be" rather than of man, though the place of philosophical investigation is man in the world with others, the place in which "to be" has meaning for him. (See EXISTENTIAL METAPHYSICS and EXISTENTIALISM for a discussion of the existential emphasis in recent Thomistic thought and in contemporary forms of existentialism.) Together, the rationalistic and existentialistic developments of modern times have achieved a more reflective appreciation of man's grasp of being and of its personal dimension.

The Science of Metaphysics

The history of metaphysics manifests a universal striving of the human mind to clarify its appreciation of REALITY as a unified whole. To do this effectively, the mind must pass beyond the simple constatation of a unified reality to the discovery of its causes by means of SCI-ENCE (SCIENTIA), the discursive process leading to the perfect knowledge of its subject by discovering its causes and attributes (Thomas Aquinas, In meta., proem.; In 1 anal. post. 2.3). As the attributes are related to the subject through the middle term, which is the real definition of the quiddity of the subject (In 2 anal. post. 1.9), the subject is not only the term concerning which knowledge is sought but also the source and norm of the scientific knowledge that concerns it. It was the diversity of meanings historically attributed to being (identity, substance, "to be") as the subject that lay at the root of the various forms of metaphysics noted above; and if a metaphysics is to be a study of reality itself as ACT or as a relation to existence, it can be so only if this be the nature of its proper subject.

Initiation of the Science. As there is nothing in the INTELLECT that was not first in the SENSES, the realistic character of scientific knowledge immediately implies two levels of ABSTRACTION, of subjects, and hence of speculative sciences: physics abstracting from individual matter and proceeding on the evidence from the external senses to study things as expressed by qualities, and mathematics abstracting from common sensible matter and proceeding on the evidence of the internal senses to study things as quantified (see SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATIONS OF). Being, as a third level of formal subject prescinding from all matter, has been proposed on various bases: (1) a simple dissociation based on the mind's recognition that being and material are not equivalent, even though no special evidence for this be given; (2) a gradual process of removing the various specifications from being till there remains only a univocal "not nothing" of minimal significance; and (3) a separation of being as esse based outside the natural order on the common Judeo-Christian revelation of God as "I am who am" (Ex 3.14). Whatever be said about the distinctive value or problems of these approaches, the perfection of metaphysics as a distinct human science seems to require: first, that its subject, whose real definition is the middle term in the discursive process of metaphysics, be drawn from material things, the QUIDDITY of which is the proper object of the human intellect (In Boeth. de Trin. 5.4); second, that the separation of a distinct meaning for being from material being be validated by the witness of actually existing nonmaterial beings (In 4 Meta. 5.593).

This fact of nonmaterial reality has been reflected constantly by man's commonsense appreciation of a power that transcends man; of the human person as a unique subject of justice, love, and freedom; and of his many social and artistic expressions. Although all these manifest a level of nonmaterial reality untouched by the sciences of the first two degrees of abstraction, the initiation of the science of metaphysics itself is better supported by the full strength of the scientific knowledge. Phenomenological investigations have usefully reflected on man as the crossroads where the flesh assumes the spirit and the spirit becomes incarnate; but the attainment of being as act is most amply founded on natural beings experienced as existing on as broad a base as can be provided by the following combination of all the nonmetaphysical sciences.

Aristotle's classical statement of the structure of the science of physics leads to the nonmaterial after identifying form and matter as changing being's intrinsic principles. However, this composition is shown in the Physics (books 7 and 8) to manifest a dependence for its ultimate explanation on something nonmaterial. Though, in physics, this can be described only in such negative and relative terms as "not material," "not changing," "not spatial," and "not temporal," physics does establish the existence of the nonmaterial as presupposed for whatever reality is had by physical substances and their accidents. In Aristotle's De anima and in his other psychological writings, the nonmaterial character of man's acts of intellection and volition are seen to manifest the nonmaterial character of his substantial form, or soul (see SOUL, HUMAN; SPIRIT). Here, the extensive recent insights concerning human consciousness and freedom and the related significance of all dimensions of man and the universe give further indication of the reality and significance of the nonmaterial. Again, EXEMPLARY CAUSALITY, in relation to the speculative science of mathematics and its principles, allows the reality of the mathematical to manifest a higher and nonmaterial reality. Finally, in the practical order, the investigation of the end, or goal, required to open the full scope of man's free activity is seen as the contemplation of something transcending the material. Hence, as the human mind establishes the scientific processes by which it extends its knowledge with a controlled certainty and necessity to the various dimensions of reality, it becomes increasingly aware of the reality of the nonmaterial.

By this fact of immaterial reality, the mind is enabled to make the negative judgment of separation that the real is not necessarily material. It can also conclude that what makes the real to be real, the real precisely as real, is not material—though, of course, many real beings are really material (In Boeth. de Trin. 5.3, 4, and ad 5). By this negative judgment the mind removes a restriction to its understanding of things. Hence, whereas previously, having attained all things through the senses, it spoke of reality precisely as sensible, it is now able to speak of these distinctively according to that by which they are real. The mind also knows that real is not simply a more general term for what had previously been stated more specifically. Because it knows that there are some things that exist but are not material, it knows that to speak of things precisely as real is to express them in a way that is more fundamental and penetrating than are any of their prior modes of attainment.

From the above, it can be seen that the common notion of being (being as being, being in general), which is the subject of the science of metaphysics, is expressed by "what is," for being affirms in act "what" is and of whatever kind, and does so by the "to be," which, as the actuality of all determinations of kind or nature, is the most formal element in being. Together the "what," or ESSENCE, and the "is," or "to be," or EXISTENCE, express the notion of being (see BEING; ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE; POTENCY AND ACT).

From the foundation and mode of separation of being, it is also clear that the resulting notion is not a univocal least common denominator, whose differences have been progressively removed; rather, it actually includes the reality of all such differences precisely as real, even if only implicitly. At the same time, the notion of being is not equivocal (NOMINALISM), lacking in any common significance in its application to the many different things. On the contrary, the notion of being is analogical; that is, it includes within itself the differences by which beings are really distinct one from another—it is different simply in its application to distinct things while at the same time it has a certain similarity in its significance when applied to each of them (see ANALOGY).

Elaboration of the Science. After it is seen that the subject of metaphysics is being, and that its mode is analogical, the first and necessary phase of the science of metaphysics is to identify the properties of its subject, thus unfolding its meaning. These properties could not be really distinct from being in its transcendence; rather, they express explicitly what already is implicit, but actual, in being itself (De ver. 1.1). They include unity, truth, goodness, and beauty. By unity being is identified as indivisible within itself, that is, as not shared with what it is not or with nonbeing and, by implication, as divided from all other beings (see UNITY). Being in its identity is able to be present in the intellect, and hence to be true (see TRUTH). Being, as an intelligible identity, is also able to be related to the will, and hence to be good (see GOOD). All of these are drawn together in the property of beauty, which is being inasmuch as it pleases when seen (see BEAUTY). Parallel to these transcendental properties, and expressive of them in the form of judgments of being as possessing these properties, are the first principles of being (see FIRST PRINCIPLES). To being as one, there correspond the principle of CONTRADICTION: being is not nonbeing; and the principle of IDENTITY: being is being, or being is itself. To being as true, there corresponds the principle of SUFFICIENT REASON. Finally, to being as the transcendent good, there corresponds the principle of FI-NALITY. Once the subject of metaphysics has been attained, these properties and principles can be discovered by an analytic process reflecting on the significance of what it means to be. In fact, Parmenides made notable accomplishments in this phase of metaphysics, even though he maintained that there could be but one being.

In order to go further into the science of metaphysics and to discover the intrinsic principles of its subject and the external relationship between beings, it is necessary to introduce the more synthetic phase of metaphysical method, wherein the mind returns to the experiential order and its evidence for a plurality of beings. This evidence, understood in terms of being as being and its property of unity, poses the problem of the one and many for the first time in direct metaphysical terms. This, indeed, includes two problems: first, how there can be more than one being or how being can be limited and, second, how these many beings, while differing one from another, can still be similar as beings.

The limitation of being opens to the mind the reality of a limiting principle that is not existence, but is inside the being, forming a unity with the existence to which it is related as potency to act. As allowing the mind to attain an insight into the internal structure of multiple and, hence, FINITE BEING, this reflection is of the greatest moment for the development of the science of metaphysics; in it, Aquinas achieved his synthesis of Christian PLATO-

NISM and ARISTOTELIANISM. This discovery concerning internal structure is paralleled by another concerning extrinsic relations; this springs from the second problem, concerning the way in which the many can be similar as beings, and yet distinct from one another. This, together with the problem of the actuation of the potency, opens the path for the mind to Absolute Being, the cause of the subject of metaphysics. The essence of this Being is Its existence, a Subsistent Existence and PURE ACT in which all multiple beings participate precisely as being, or according to their relation to existence. Thus is established a unity between all beings such that the absolute unity identified by Parmenides as characteristic of being is not destroyed but rather is opened out to a subordinate realm of multiple and participating beings (see PARTICIPATION).

In similar cycles the problem of the one and the many considered synthetically yields evidence of new unities. These are either unities of a specific kind among the multiple beings that lead to knowledge of the actpotency structure of form and matter within essence and further to the Divine Mind for the ultimate explanation of specific unities; or they are unities of many accidents as acts of the one substance, laying the foundation for a further union between beings by CAUSALITY. Hence, the science of metaphysics gradually unfolds by a process of ANALYSIS AND SYNTHESIS wherein it elaborates the internal principles and the external causes of its subject, being as being, and comes to understand all things in the light of these.

Characteristics. Such a metaphysics is supreme in universality, intellectuality, and certitude. (In Meta., proem.). The distinctive universality is had, first, according to comprehension, for the formal subject of the science is the most fundamental value of all, the relation to existence; second, according to extension, for, studying things as beings, the science is transcendent in its concerns, extending to every being and aspect of being; and finally, according to dignity, inasmuch as it carries the mind even to the divine in its search for the cause of its subject.

A second characteristic of metaphysics is its supreme intellectuality. Intellectuality is a mode according to which all is comprehended in one simple act and idea that attains the full truth of manifold beings and their principles. The human mind, proceeding abstractively, approaches this ideal imperfectly, but truly, to the degree that it is able to unify its knowledge of all things in one formal subject, through which it attains a uniquely simple, immediate, and comprehensive intellectual knowledge (In Boeth. de Trin. 6.1.3 ad 1). This special intellectuality is had by metaphysics inasmuch as its formal subject is being, the common object of the intellect and the source from which its principles are derived immediately and its conclusions most directly. Hence, if difficult of attainment, metaphysics has a most profound proportion to the human intellect, with its actual and possible openness to being.

The third characteristic of metaphysics as a science follows from the above. This is its special objective certitude, which derives from its subject and from its reasoning processes, as founded and verified in the first and most evident of all principles, the principle of contradiction.

Fourth, as the science that is most perfectly universal, intellectual, and certain, metaphysics takes on the character of natural WISDOM. For if the wise man, as Aristotle describes him, must have universal and difficult knowledge, greater than ordinary certitude, and a capacity to identify causes, to seek knowledge for its own sake, and to be able to rule others, then metaphysics fulfills this necessity. It is the most universal science, extending even to what most transcends the human mind; yet it has the greatest certitude and commitment because concerned with being itself; and finally, because it knows the principles of all being, it is able to rule and direct the sciences that are concerned with particular types of beings. Metaphysics, therefore, stands at the culmination of man's knowledge; it derives from a negative judgment based on evidence from all the sciences, and, as a potential whole, it is present in the exercise of all other intellectual virtues, wherein it is but partially expressed. Since it uses other sciences to enlarge its knowledge, its ordering function in their regard is part of the work of wisdom itself.

Thus metaphysics takes on a supreme human value. "The ultimate perfection which the soul can attain, therefore, is, according to the philosophers, to have delineated in it the entire order and causes of the universe. This they hold to be the ultimate end of man. We, however, hold that it consists in the vision of God" (De ver. 2.2).

METAPHYSICS, VALIDITY OF

The history of Western philosophy is one alternately marked by metaphysical and antimetaphysical currents of thought. Looking back on this history, one can discern certain patterns. Each time metaphysics reached a new crest, there set in a reaction against it—typified by the movements known as SKEPTICISM, EMPIRICISM, and FIDE-ISM. After the apex of metaphysics reached by PLATO and Aristotle, scant progress was made in this area until the Middle Ages, when it was to flower once again. Then, toward the end of the Middle Ages, SCHOLASTICISM became increasingly decadent, preparing the way for a new rejection of metaphysics in the modern epoch. This rejection has extended all the way into contemporary philosophy, and while its strength has dissipated, it continues as a strong movement.

The present article surveys the antimetaphysical trends promoted by influential philosophers from the late Middle Ages to the end of the modern period. A brief critique is given, followed by an appraisal of the contemporary status of the movement from the viewpoint of moderate realism.

Ockham. In the period of the decline of metaphysics and scholasticism, the Franciscan WILLIAM OF OCKHAM is most representative among those who can be singled out as contributing to this decadence. Ockham understandably rebelled against the picayune distinctions introduced into philosophy by an earlier confrere, John DUNS SCOTUS, the Subtle Doctor. The voluntarism of Duns Scotus presented a less favorable climate for the growth of metaphysics than did the intellectualism of St. THOMAS AQUINAS. In sharp reaction to the increasing complexities introduced in philosophy, Ockham formulated his famous principle of parsimony, popularly known as Ockham's razor: "Beings are not to be multiplied without necessity."

None could quarrel with the statement of the principle, only with its possible interpretation. Ockham interpreted it liberally and used it ruthlessly to eliminate many of the traditional distinctions of metaphysics (see DISTINCTION, KINDS OF). He accepted as real only those distinctions tions implying separability—a legacy whose error was continued by René Descartes. Previously acknowledged real distinctions, such as those between principles of being, Ockham placed in the category of logical distinctions. He thus turned over much of the subject matter of metaphysics to the science of logic. Ockham limited the use of DEMONSTRATION so severely (denying, for example, that one can establish the spirituality and immortality of the human soul) that he became increasingly dependent upon faith for genuine certitude. Accepting only the reality of singulars, Ockham initiated also "the destruction of concrete universality" (É. H. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages 492). Ockham's terminism further combined strong elements of NOMI-NALISM and skepticism, both of which proved antithetical to metaphysics. Modern philosophy was to be strongly influenced by both.

Hobbes. Thomas HOBBES, who was subjected to the Ockhamist influence at Oxford, was an early representative of empiricism in the modern era. Openly nominalistic and linguistically oriented, Hobbes was preoccupied with words. He explained away the universal idea as but a common name serving as a mark for memory or imagination. Accordingly, science could be defined as "a knowledge of all the consequences of names appertaining to the subject in hand' (Leviathan, 1.5). For Hobbes, reasoning differed from sensation only in degree. It could be explained as nothing more than the adding and subtracting of various names. Prepared to simplify all philosophy along the lines of MECHANISM, Hobbes needed but two principles—matter and motion. Only what could be subsumed under these two categories could lay claim to being real. Metaphysics was thereby ruled out of court, and the way was paved for accepting only the positive sciences as valid.

Berkeley. Definitely opposed to the mechanism and especially the MATERIALISM of Hobbes, but proceeding initially from empiricist principles, Bp. George BERKE-LEY also legislated against metaphysics. But to make his case, he had to eliminate the material world and the substances it purportedly contained. Exhibiting greater consistency than Locke, who accepted substance simply as an "I know not what" (Essay on Human Understanding, 2.23.2), Berkeley insisted that for all unthinking things, to be (esse) is to be perceived (percipi). A material thing, then, is but the sum of the ideas of its qualities. Consequently, things exist only in a mind—whether man's or God's. In denying the extramental status of the material world, Berkeley eliminated the need for abstractionideas being given to man in various sequences by God. Although he accepted the reality of spiritual substances and a "notional" knowledge of them, Berkeley's position on this point was soon to be refuted by Hume.

Hume. Briefly stated, the position of David HUME can be described as follows: all genuine knowledge must have its validity tested by tracing it to primary impressions derived from experience. Now, in considering the nature of these impressions, one observes that they involve only phenomenal aspects. The same can be said of the knowledge that the agent possesses of himself. By what speculatively verifiable right, then, may one conclude to the reality of anything other than phenomena? Since man cannot trace the complex notions of substance or cause to corresponding sensory impressions, he cannot confirm their validity. Nevertheless, their practical utility is undeniable. It follows, then, that not only metaphysics and its substances are to be criticized as human pretensions, but all scientific (i.e., causal) knowledge as well.

Speculatively, only skepticism was tenable for Hume. Practically, however, he placed his trust in instinct, feeling that it would prevail over the impasse of speculative knowledge, thereby enabling man to continue living as he had in the past. Man could also turn to the vividness of certain impressions, if he wished to provide ground for the probable acceptance of an extraphenomenal world. It should be noted, though, that it would not be the real object itself that provided such probable grounds; rather it would be the way the impression of the object was present in the consciousness of the knower.

It is no exaggeration to state that Hume was the most consistent of the empiricists. He resolutely maintained that the image is the object of knowledge and exhibited no hesitancy in accepting the full consequences of the epistemological cul-de-sac into which this led. Hume succeeded in bringing empiricism to its irreducible base, allowing no semblance of metaphysics within it. After Hume's attack, many felt that the only way open for philosophical progress would be to commence along a different path. This trail, which also proved to be an antimetaphysical one, was explored by Immanuel Kant.

Kant. Kant attempted to weld together the irreconcilable positions of Wolffian-Leibnizian RATIONALISM and British empiricism. Never doubting the scientific validity of the universal and necessary (a Kantian heritage bequeathed by rationalism) or the requirement for experience as the only means by which one can progress in knowing (Kant's recent legacy from empiricism), the German thinker constructed a monumental synthesis based upon these twin presuppositions. That Kant met with a measure of success is an undeniable fact, but it is also undeniable that he accomplished this at the expense of metaphysics.

Kant berated the a priori metaphysics of rationalism as failing to provide for any new knowledge. He pointedly asked how it was that metaphysics, supposedly queen of the sciences, found herself without a court. In fact, not only her crown, but her claims to science as well were in jeopardy. Despite the strong criticism of Hume with respect to all scientific knowledge, Kant never seriously doubted the validity of mathematics and physics. But he always entertained suspicions about the scientific status of metaphysics, suspicions confirmed as a result of Hume's criticism. In order to solve the problem of Hume and at the same time provide for a philosophy of Newtonian science, Kant subjected philosophy to his own "Copernican Revolution." Henceforth, he would explain knowledge as revolving around the knower instead of around the object. This differed sharply from the more classical explanation of knowing as a reception of the form of the object in the matter of the knower. According to Kant, it would be more fruitful to proceed on the assumption that the matter of the object is received and the form is imposed upon it by the knower. Since the form confers intelligibility, and since this is due to the knower, "the understanding does not derive its laws (a priori) from, but prescribes them to, nature" (Prolegomena, 36). Because man cannot know until after he imposes the form upon the raw datum, it is literally impossible for him to know the thing in itself—the noumenon—the real world. "All the properties which constitute the intuition of a body belong merely to its appearance" (ibid. 13.2).

Whatever is transcendent, then, is unknowable and remains so always—for the knower cannot get "outside" himself. Yet man is capable of knowing the appearance of things through the forms of sensibility (i.e., space and time) or through the categories of understanding (i.e., quantity, relation, quality, and modality). The scientific validity of phenomenal knowledge is therefore preserved. Insofar as such knowledge involves the datum as well as the structure of the knower, scientific (i.e., synthetic a priori) propositions about phenomena can be constructed. Once this is seen, it becomes clear why Kant never asks "whether," but only "how," scientific propositions in physics and mathematics are possible.

With respect to metaphysics, however, the question is not "how" but "whether" such synthetic a priori propositions are possible. In Kant's mind, metaphysics answers the latter question by extravagantly proposing to transcend experience. This he strongly challenged, asserting that to do so is simply impossible. On the basis of his own epistemology, Kant was perfectly consistent. Yet he still had to explain the obvious and irrepressible tendencies of his predecessors to accept metaphysics as a science. Kant fully recognized this and claims to have laid bare its uncertain foundations. There are rooted in reason, he says, ideas of God, the world, and the soul. But these are purely formal and seek application to something "given" (to a matter) for content. But the matter they seek to join is not on the phenomenal side; it is on the noumenal level. Since man cannot reach this order, he will always be frustrated in such a quest. Nevertheless, because he has these ideals (which may help to give goals to science, and so serve as regulative principles), man can always be expected to engage in the fruitless attempt to transcend experience. Eventually, Kant permitted metaphysics the role of a critique of reason and conceded to it a moral value. But he was convinced in his own mind that he had buried, once and for all, its pretentious claims to being a science. Despite Kant's momentous efforts to bridge the gap between empiricism and rationalism, his philosophy paradoxically resulted in a dualism itself—a dualism of PHENOMENA versus NOUMENA, of appearance versus reality. It remained for G. W. F. HEGEL to complete the synthesis.

Hegel. If there is a principle that governs the philosophy of Hegel, it is that the real is rational and the rational is real. Given such a principle, there is no longer need sharply to separate the order of appearance from that of things-in-themselves. Appearance and reality amount to the same thing under two different names. The same may be said for logic and metaphysics—hence the cryptic description of Hegel's system as panlogism. Metaphysics, for Hegel, finally gives way to logic. His entire system develops dynamically according to the dialectic of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis. Two contradictories are sublated and in turn form a unity, preserving the worth of the old components, yet providing for the new. Thus the contradictories of being and nonbeing dialectically evolve into becoming. This system of absolute mind or absolute idealism was at once the culmination and the termination of modern philosophy in its attack upon metaphysics.

Critique. By and large, the rejection of metaphysics by the philosophers mentioned was an outgrowth of their epistemologies. None subscribed to the position of moderate REALISM, which holds that the universal, while formally in the mind, is fundamentally in the thing—that the mind knows the universal nature in the singular material thing (Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 84.7). All denied a genuine doctrine of intellectual ABSTRACTION, claiming either that the INTELLECT is a constructive device or a refined sensory power. Such being the case, it is highly questionable whether the metaphysics rejected by these philosophers was the metaphysics of Aristotelian and Thomistic philosophy. Kant, for instance, had refuted Wolffian-Leibnizian metaphysics as a science of pure possibles, but he hardly administered the coup de grâce to traditional metaphysics.

There have even been some negative benefits accruing to Thomism by virtue of the critique established by modern philosophies. Among these is the existential reminder that metaphysics should proceed from an empirical base and concern itself with real being. It must curb the tendency to become excessively a priori. In short, traditional metaphysics has been forced to rethink its position—an exercise that must always be deemed as contributing to its health.

Contemporary Status. To a large extent, the antimetaphysical trends in the contemporary period of philosophy follow the patterns of empiricism. Auguste COMTE sounded the clarion call for POSITIVISM by dismissing the theological and metaphysical as anachronisms in the past development of human thought. In his view, one no longer need view God as transcendent (theological) or as immanent (metaphysical); He has been wholly eliminated by science. The positive sciences, rather than metaphysics or theology, henceforth provide the rallying point for humanism in the new culture.

The neopositivists continue in this view and, indeed, even outdo Comte in their antimetaphysical bias (see LOGICAL POSITIVISM). The Vienna Circle (Wiener Kreis) of M. Schlick, R. Carnap, H. Feigl, and others declared open war on metaphysics. Abetted by linguistic analysis, they sought to prove that metaphysical statements are neither true nor false, but meaningless. At best, metaphysics reflects an emotive meaning or perhaps an aspiration (as Kant suggested), but it presents no cognitive meaning. Only the sciences can provide advances in genuine knowledge, a position known as SCIENTISM. Metaphysics either contents itself with tautologies (which are certain because they have no content) or with pseudopropositions (which are sentences having no means of VERIFICATION).

Although some linguistic analysts are philosophically neutral, others—represented by such men as A. J. Ayer, Gilbert Ryle, and Anatole Rapoport—dogmatically refuse to accord cognitive meaning to metaphysical statements. With the scientific empiricists, they insist that in order for statements to be meaningful, they must meet the demands of the principle of verifiability. Basically, that principle requires that in order for a proposition to be factually meaningful, there must be ways of proving or disproving it. Those more moderate in their demands (such as Hans Reichenbach) grant degrees of probability as indicative of meaningful propositions. Ayer, however, does not grant even the possibility of proving or disproving the probability of God's existence. In his view, that there is or is not a God is not even a meaningful question, for there is no way of verifying or refuting it.

In attempting to clarify and refine the principle of verifiability, positivists hold for the necessity of deducing some experimental, experiential, or operational statement from a meaningful proposition. The metaphysician, of course, claims that this is not altogether fair, for it prejudices the case from the start, admitting for man only the attainment of empirical knowledge. One can also detect an element of PRAGMATISM in this movement, for a "cash value" is always demanded of meaningful statements. Paraphrasing C. S. PEIRCE and W. JAMES on this point, "to be a difference, it must make a difference." Peirce, of course, would limit this principle to the area of science rather than broaden its application to all life situations as was attempted by James. In general, then, the contemporary period of neopositivism bears a markedly antispeculative attitude that positively and openly discriminates against metaphysics. It matters little whether the subspecies be logical positivism, scientific empiricism, linguistic analysis, or INSTRUMENTALISM.

What these thinkers have in common is that they have become so enamored with modern science as to be unable to admit other perspectives. They tend to make the same demands for metaphysics as they do for the positive sciences. Although it is true that both areas produce scientific knowledge, it must be recognized that they do so differently. The positive sciences aim at prediction and the discovery of new truths on the basis of their hypotheses. Metaphysics is not concerned with this prediction and forecast of new phenomena, but rather with an understanding of what is. Metaphysics possesses a domain all its own, untrespassed upon by the other particular sciences. It likewise possesses a peculiar methodology for dealing with this domain. Its material object is reality or BEING. Although all of the various sciences deal with being of one kind or another, none treats of what is proper to the formal object of metaphysics, i.e., a consideration of being insofar as it is being. Traditional metaphysics shows that the question "What pertains to the real precisely as real?" is indeed a meaningful question. That it has not been solved to the satisfaction of all is patent, but at the same time the various proposed answers to the question are indicative of its fertility. From the perspective of metaphysics, the history of philosophy is a search for the meaning of being. Some have claimed that "to be" is to exist after the manner of a phenomenon; others have said that "to be" is to be material; still others have said that "to be" is to be changing. The views on this point are inexhaustible. In short, it becomes increasingly clear that metaphysics, like a phoenix, continually rises out of its own ashes, for even an antimetaphysics itself constitutes a metaphysics.

METEMPSYCHOSIS

Otherwise referred to as TRANSMIGRATION OF SOULS or REINCARNATION, is a doctrine asserting not only the preexistence of the human soul before union with matter but also, after death, a return to life on earth in a different body, perhaps through several successive reincarnations. This notion pervades ancient pagan, Neoplatonic, and some Oriental and modern spiritualist beliefs. It has been condemned as heretical (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 403, 854, 857, 1000–08, 1305–06, 1316, 1440), since Christian doctrine teaches that "it is appointed unto men to die once and after this comes the judgment" (Heb 9.27; cf. also Lk 16.19–31; 23.43; 2 Cor 5.10). Man has but one life on earth in which to earn his eternal destiny.

The reasoning against metempsychosis is both negative, from the lack of any psychological evidence (C. Jung's archetypes are racial, not individual), and positive, from the unity of man as one being. If one's soul were to return and unite substantially with matter, it could form only the body of that person. This person cannot be someone else, regardless of changed material conditions. Lack of recognition by oneself or others, as happens in psychotic or deteriorated states, does not cause one to be another person. Even less could a human soul actuate matter to form a dog or other animal.

METHODIST CHURCHES

PART I: ENGLAND

The Methodist Churches originated as a pietist religious movement within the Church of England, led by John and Charles WESLEY, George WHITEFIELD, the Countess of Huntingdon (Selina Hastings), and other Evangelical Anglicans. The epithet "Methodist" had been hurled in derision at the pious Oxford undergraduates of the "Holy Club," who met from 1729 for practices of devotion and philanthropic works under the direction of the Wesleys. After the dispersal of the club (1735) the name was still applied to the Wesleys' followers. John himself defined a Methodist as "one who lives according to the method laid down in the Bible." Part I of this entry surveys the origins and subsequent developments of Methodism in England, while Part II presents the history and growth of Methodist Churches in North America.

Mourners gather round the body of Parsis at his funeral, where his soul has passed on to the dog beside him.

First Establishment. The early Methodists sought to revive and purify the Church of England, whose separation from Rome had brought the total dependence of the bishops upon the crown. The aftermath of the bitter religious quarrels of the 17th century, as well as the influence of the writings of Henry Bolingbroke (1678–1751), Anthony Collins (1676–1729), Anthony Shaftesbury (1671–1713), and other deists, led some bishops to doctrinal indifference and many preachers to an advocacy of a grave piety devoid of emotionalism. Accordingly, Anglican missionary fervor, discipline, and liturgy suffered. Debility and indifference, however, were not universal. Many clergymen had reacted against the prevailing formalism and rationalism. William LAW, for example, extolled piety and ascetism in his Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728), which left its mark upon John Wesley. The latter's father, the Reverend Samuel Wesley (1662–1735), stressed the saving work of Christ and faith in Jesus as the savior of the world.

Wesley's hope to lead other evangelical-minded Anglican clergy to minister to the Methodists, whose piety and fervor would animate the whole Church, was unfulfilled. The opposition of many churchmen who denied their pulpits to Methodist preachers led Wesley to measures that eventually meant independence. But as long as he lived, he shrank from the establishment of independent churches and counseled loyalty to the church of his father. His field preaching, itinerancy, emotional sermons, employment of lay preachers, and ordination of presbyters prepared the way for ultimate separation of Methodists from Anglicanism. As did Lady Huntingdon, Wesley in 1787 accepted the protection of the Toleration Act (1689) for Methodist ministrations outside parish churches.

The movement revolved around John Wesley, whose strong personality, exemplary life, managerial skill, frequent pastoral visits to the scattered Societies, and extensive writings commanded his converts and his itinerant preachers. Although he had called an annual conference since 1744, he regarded its function only as advisory. In 1784 his Deed of Declaration named 100 of the itinerants as constituting the Conference of the "People called Methodists." The Legal Hundred thus formed the official body of the movement and held chapels and other property in trust, and also administered, assigned, and controlled the preachers after Wesley's death.

Historical Organization. The original basic unit of Methodism was the Society, a form of organization existing within the Church of England without formal sanction since 1678. The various Societies in London, Bristol, and elsewhere admitted communicants of the Church of England, dissenters, and others who had "a desire to flee from the Wrath to come, and to be saved from their Sins," and issued to members in good standing quarterly tickets of identification. Within each Society were Classes of 12 or more persons, under a leader who visited each member weekly, collected contributions, kept the minister informed, and distributed the tickets. Wesley adopted the plan of the Bristol Methodists to collect a penny a week from each member and, in the process of collecting the money, to "enquire how their souls prosper." Also within the Societies in the early days were the Bands of 5 to 10 persons, who were organized according to their status as married and single men, and married and single women. Each little group met weekly for confession and for prayer that all might be healed. Another short-lived company was the Select Societies, whose members asserted that they had already attained the heights of Christian perfection.

Wesley's close supervision and inspiration kept the Societies united. In his absence, lay assistants were permitted to preach in the morning and evening when ministers were away, visit the Classes monthly, adjudicate differences, deal with the "Disorderly Walkers," and supervise the stewards. Wesley arranged the Societies according to geographical location, into Circuits, which were placed under a helper. After Wesley's death, Circuits were organized into Districts. The aggregate of all the Societies, Circuits, and Districts under the authority of the Conference formed the Methodist "Connexion."

Today Methodist administrative authority is exercised through a system of assemblies or conferences of local churches, from the quarterly meetings of the Circuit, to the District, and the annual conference. In the Conference, an equal number of clergy and laity hold a representative session to deal with administrative and financial questions. Then the pastoral session, composed of the Legal Hundred (the ministers who have been sitting in the representative session that year) and others, deals with pastoral and disciplinary matters.

Doctrine. Wesley's teachings emphasized certain historic Christian truths, as modified by the Protestant reformers and by his own religious experience. Their foundation was acceptance of the divinity of Jesus and the Trinity, as well as the universality of original sin, the consequent weakening of human nature, and the necessity of man to cooperate with grace in order to gain salvation. To Protestantism Wesley owed his reliance on the Bible as the measure of religion, his denial of purgatory and rejection of the invocation of saints and veneration of relics, and his adoption of puritanical norms of conduct for his followers. From Protestantism too he derived the major importance he assigned to preaching (he called his chapels "preaching houses") and his views of the Sacraments. As he saw it, baptism was a sign of regeneration that had already occurred in the Christian; and it was to be administered to infants, who were in the kingdom of God, to strengthen their faith. The Eucharist was understood as a memorial of the Passion and Death of Jesus.

The basic doctrines of Methodism are: (1) Universal Redemption—Christ died for all, and He offers His love to all people. (2) Justification by faith and the New Birth—unlike the vast majority of evangelicals in the Church of England, who embraced Calvinistic justification, Wesley assigned a role to free will and to good works. Justification brought the regenerated sinner freedom from "outward" sin; still for triumph over "inward" sin the Christian must experience the New Birth that renews our fallen nature. (3) The witness of the Spirit—God's Spirit witnesses to the soul of the just man that he is His child. This assurance that he is the son of God ("ease after pain, rest after labour, joy after sorrow, light after darkness") leads him to feel the certainty of present pardon and to recognize that Christ lives in him. Wesley sought to bring every man into an experience of personal fellowship with God, that is, possession by the indwelling God. This assurance differs from certainty of final perseverance in Calvinistic predestination. (4) Perfection, sanctification, or holiness-the Christian may attain the state of complete sanctification that excludes all voluntary offense and enables him to grow in grace toward the fullness of salvation. Today Methodists view sanctification as the inherent righteousness of the justified who have the power to resist evil.

The Methodists emphasized not dogma but the living of a Christian life and the following of certain religious observances. Above all, the Methodists were to have the love of God in their hearts. Wesley enjoined celebrating the festivals of the Church of England, and he added the love feast (agape) and the watch nights, which he borrowed from the Moravians. In each quarter Christians were to meet at night in order to "eat Bread with Gladness and Singleness of Heart" and join in brotherly union in song and in relating religious experiences. Distinctive in Methodist observance was the prominence accorded to the singing of hymns. There was no confession of faith, though Wesley did stipulate that American Methodists were to accept an adaptation of the Thirty-Nine Articles, and that British preachers were to adopt the first four volumes of his sermons (edited in 1787-88), which contained 44 discourses, and his Notes on the New Testament. In effect, this meant Wesley's interpretation of the Scriptures. After his death, doctrinal authority rested with the conference.

Developments in the 19th and 20th Centuries.

Even in the days of Wesley, Methodists were divided. Lady Huntingdon failed to compose the differences over predestination of the Wesleys and Whitefield. Later, disputes occurred over the relationship of Methodists to Anglicanism, the necessity of taking Communion in parish churches, and refraining from holding services during the hours of the Church of England. The plan of Thomas Coke (1747–1814) to have Methodist preachers ordained in the Church of England for the purpose of administering the sacraments to the Methodists failed. Preachers ordained by Wesley and other ministers proceeded to ordain their own preachers. Methodists gradually ceased going to Anglican services. For much of the 19th century, nonetheless, some chapels neither scheduled services during the hours of the Established Church nor administered the sacraments. No formal separation from the Church of England occurred until 1891. The authority of the preachers in full Connexion and of the conference and the role of the laity touched off many disputes that led to schism. Jabez Bunting (1779–1858), four times president of the conference and regarded as the second founder of Methodism, aroused much resentment. His foes, who had published "Fly Sheets," or a series of broadsides, from 1849 to 1856 against his rule, were expelled; many of them were lost to Methodism.

Splintering shattered the Methodist unity. Alexander Kilham (1762–98) and William Thompson left with 5,000 supporters to form the Methodist New Connection (1797) because they favored universal suffrage and democratic principles in church government. The strongest dissident group, the Primitive Methodists, was formed by Hugh Bourne (1772–1852), a carpenter, who joined his forces with the similarly dissident Clowesites (William Clowes, 1780–1851). The Primitive Methodists wanted camp meetings, which were widely used in America but condemned by the Liverpool Conference in 1807, and field preaching. Considerable working-class support was evident in the increase of membership from 200 to 165,410 in 1875. Another group, the Bible Christians, was founded in 1815 by William O'Bryan (1778–1868), an itinerant preacher, who appealed to the Bible, and not to the Prayer Book as well, as the sole authority and who favored the ministry of women.

In addition to several other offshoots of the main body of Methodism there were the Protestant Methodists and the Wesleyan Methodist Association. The first was organized by Matthew Johnson and 70 local preachers who opposed the introduction of an organ into the Brunswick Street chapel at Leeds in 1828. The Protestant Methodists merged with the Wesleyan Methodist Association, which had come into existence following the creation of a school for the education of ministers. Part of the motivation of these dissenting groups was the desire of a greater voice for the laity in administrative and financial matters. The association favored decentralization and the autonomy of the circuit and the individual chapel in the management of business. In 1857 it merged with the Wesleyan Reformers—the opponents of Bunting—to become the United Methodist Free Churches. Although the schisms and internal disputes cost Methodism dearly, by the 1860s membership was again on the rise.

The vast industrial and social changes prompted Methodists to attract the poor once more, to alter their dominant middle-class character, and to renew their evangelical fervor. Their social conscience was stirred. Hugh Price Hughes (1847–1902) established the West London Mission in 1887, which combined social and religious features, and later another great figure in Methodism, John Scott Lidgett (1854–1953), directed the settlement in southeast London, where religious, social, educational, and medical services were provided.

The unification of the several branches of Methodism was facilitated by the fact that they differed not in doctrine but in church government. An Act of the English Parliament in 1907 authorized the merger of the Methodist New Connexion, the Bible Christians, and the United Methodist Free Churches as the United Methodist Church. In 1932 the Wesleyan Methodists, Primitive Methodists, and the United Methodist Church came together as the Methodist Church, with a combined membership of 859,652. The unified church does not include the Wesleyan Reform Union (with autonomous individual churches) or the Independent Methodist Church (with a voluntary ministry that admits women). The first ecumenical Conference of Methodists met in London in 1881. Subsequent consultative assemblies have usually met at 10-year intervals. At the meeting in Oxford in 1951, the name of the organization was changed to World Methodist Council. Its functions include liaison among the various Methodist groups and cooperation with the World Council of Churches.

Methodism took root in the British Isles, wherever English rule and influence existed. In Wales many evangelists, including Howell HARRIS, Griffith Jones (1683–1761), George Whitefield, and the Wesleys, made Methodism—but by no means the Wesleyan variety—the country's strongest religious force. Methodism did not flourish in Scotland. In Ireland itinerant preachers, dubbed Swaddlers, faced the opposition of Catholic priests and the attachment of the Irish to their traditional faith. Methodism made headway in the British overseas possessions such as America, the West Indies, and Canada. In 1925 the Canadian Methodists and the Congregationalists and Presbyterians formed the United Church of Canada. Autonomous churches were established in Australia and New Zealand.

PART II: NORTH AMERICA

John WESLEY had spent two years (1736 to 1737) in Georgia as chaplain to General James E. Oglethorpe's colony and missionary to the Native Americans, but he sailed home to England disheartened at the failure of his mission. After coming under the influence of the Moravians, he experienced conversion on May 24, 1738, and through the next half-century successfully promoted his evangelical movement within the Anglican communion. In America, however, the colonists' victory in the War for Independence made a British-controlled Methodist Church unacceptable and impractical, with the result that the first Methodist Church was organized in America rather than in England, homeland of the Wesleyan Revival.

Origin and Historical Development. Unofficial lay preachers who had gone from Ireland and England, not as missionaries but as immigrants, were the founders of Methodism in America. In 1766 Philip EMBURY began to preach in New York, and the society he formed there built a chapel on John Street (1768) with the aid of Captain Thomas Webb of the British Army, a lay preacher. In 1768 Webb also founded a society in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and two years later led in purchasing and completing a half-finished sanctuary, later St. George's, the oldest church of American Methodism. At about the same time Robert Strawbridge, unordained and unofficial, settled in Frederick, Maryland, making his cabin a preaching center. Between 1769 and 1774 Wesley dispatched eight experienced itinerant preachers to America, where under their leadership a corps of indigenous preachers developed. Francis ASBURY, one of Wesley's emissaries who arrived in 1771 and was the only one to remain through the Revolution, became to American Methodism what Wesley was to British.

The achievement of American independence convinced Wesley that it was time for his followers there to be free from his control and to organize into a church with an ordained ministry. When the Anglican bishop refused to ordain his America-bound leaders, Wesley took upon himself the solemn setting-apart of Dr. Thomas Coke, already a priest, to be superintendent for America, and also ordained two itinerants to accompany Coke. In 1784, 60 of the 83 itinerant preachers met in a Christmas Conference in Baltimore, Maryland, and elected Asbury as cosuperintendent. He was ordained deacon and elder on successive days, and on the third, consecrated as superintendent. To Wesley's consternation the new body named itself the Methodist Episcopal Church and designated their superintendents bishops. This was the first religious group in the United States to create an independent, national church organization. Later, formal greetings were exchanged between the bishops of the new church and the president of the new republic. Coke, because of missionary assignments for Wesley, left leadership entirely to Asbury, except for brief visits. At his death in 1816, Asbury's diary revealed that he had traveled 270,000 miles, preached 16,000 times, held 224 conferences, and ordained 4,000 ministers. The societies, which numbered 316 members in 1771, had grown to a denomination of 214,235 members, more than in England.

Methodism's close connectionalism and its circuit system were well adapted to following the population westward. The pulpit emphasis upon free grace and free will for all met with remarkable response from pioneers freshly tuned to the implications of democracy. Between 1800 and 1830 membership increased sevenfold. By 1850 there were 1,208,110 Methodist members in America. Because of the demand for ministers many of the circuit riders were chosen more for their zeal than their learning. Their deficiencies were made up in part by private study and reading; but since their congregations were rough and uncultured, too much education was undesirable and might only estrange them from their listeners. As a consequence, the transition to the later standard of a liberal arts degree followed by three years of graduate study in a theological seminary was slow, and for many years divinity schools were scorned and mistrusted.

Doctrine and Worship. Wesley supplied the Methodist Church in America with doctrinal and liturgical standards. He abridged to 24 the 39 Anglican Articles of Religion, endorsed as theological norms his own Notes on the New Testament and certain published sermons, prescribed general rules, and provided liturgical aids. However, because of primitive settings for the circuit riders' ministrations, the dignified Order of Morning and Evening Prayer soon lost out to completely informal worship and extempore prayer. Rituals for Methodism's two sacraments, baptism and holy communion, and for such rites as marriage and burial were conscientiously followed. Methodists take holy communion kneeling and partake of both elements. While sprinkling is the usual method of baptism, every adult and the parents of every infant to be baptized have the choice of sprinkling, pouring, or immersion.

Methodists have had few doctrinal disturbances, probably because of their light stress on dogma. "Whosoever imagines a Methodist is a man of such and such opinion is grossly ignorant of the whole affair," Wesley wrote. Despite this liberality there is a definite Wesleyan theological accent. The founder's message was twofold: first, the experience of the new birth, the gift of God's grace, offered freely to all repentant men; second, the moral ideal that the gospel presents. Basic, of course, to all other standards were the Scriptures, declared to be "the sole and sufficient rule of belief and practice."

Early Methodists answered CALVINISM with the Arminian doctrine of universal redemption (see ARMINIANISM). Accordingly, salvation is full and present, available to all and conditioned on repentance and faith in Christ. Inwardly it is authenticated by the witness of the spirit bringing peace and assurance. Outwardly its evidence is a life of loving service. Methodism's doctrine of Christian perfection emphasizes not the possibility of sinlessness, but rather perfection in love and motives.

By mid-20th century there were evidences, extending to the laity, of reawakened interest in theology. Doctrinal presentations appeared in Methodist periodicals and church school curriculum. There was an organized circulation of eight doctrinal booklets on "Our Faith." An inquiry on the beliefs of Methodists confirmed that while most of the austere restrictions on dress and amusements have long been outmoded, the major doctrinal emphasis of Wesley remained vital.

Methodist Churches in Canada. In 1925 the United Church of Canada was formed by the union of three communions, one of which was the Methodist Church of Canada. This strong body was itself the product of the union in 1883 of four independent Canadian Methodist bodies. In 1765 Methodism in Newfoundland developed from the work of English itinerants. Two preachers, dispatched by the Christmas Conference in Baltimore, reached Nova Scotia in 1785. Others followed, and from 1800 on the work was taken over by British missionaries. In the Niagara region, now Ontario, a Canadian conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1824, but four years later was granted independence. Numerous Methodists were found also among the Tory refugees who fled to Canada during and after the American Revolution.

Methodist Churches in the United States. On May 10, 1939, after years of negotiations, the long-separated Methodist Episcopal Church (numbering some 4,750,271 members), the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (2,619,197 members), and the Methodist Protestant Church (195,000 members) merged to form "The Methodist Church." The united church was partitioned into six jurisdictions—five geographical, one racial. All were empowered to elect and assign their own bishops, formerly a General Conference prerogative. The merging of the missionary, educational, and benevolent agencies of the three bodies was accomplished smoothly. A union of the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN and the Methodist Church, was approved in principle by both bodies in 1962 and 1964, and ratified by their respective General Conferences in 1966. In 1968, the United Methodist Church, combining the Evangelical United Brethren and the Methodist Church came into existence.

The Methodist Protestant Church. This was organized in Baltimore in 1830 by reformers who protested the autocratic practices of bishops and the absence of laymen in the conferences. In a century membership increased from 5,000 to nearly 200,000. Meanwhile their democratic principles prevailed in the major Methodist bodies. Laymen in equal numbers were in all conferences, and bishops, while still there, exercised their powers with restraint and consideration. In 1939 Methodist Protestants joined in the reunion movement, furnishing two leaders for consecration as bishops in the new body, The Methodist Church.

Wesleyan Methodist Church. In 1843 objectors to the bishops' compromises on slavery, made to keep peace with the South, withdrew to organize a church "free from episcopacy and free from slavery." In 1968, it merged with the Pilgrim Holiness Church to become the Wesleyan Church.

Free Methodist Church. A conservative group that was organized in 1860 by ministers and laymen expelled from churches in western New York for "fanatical reactionism." They had condemned pew renting, liquor, to-bacco, the use of musical instruments in worship, and neglect of the doctrine of entire sanctification. The word "free" in their name refers to free seats, freedom from ecclesiastical domination, freedom from sin, and freedom in worship.

Methodist Episcopal Church, South. As the nation was to do later, the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1844 split over slavery. A Georgia bishop, James O. Andrew, through marriage had come into possession of slaves. Church law forbade a minister to hold slaves. State law prohibited their emancipation. A resolution was passed in the General Conference calling upon Bishop Andrew to "desist from the exercise of his office as long as this impediment remains." When protests on constitutional grounds failed, the Southerners sought and obtained a provisional separation agreement establishing boundaries and providing for the division of institutional assets. Membership divided, with 689,310 adhering to the North and 462,851 to the South. In May 1845 the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was duly organized. Both churches prospered until the Civil War; they launched missionary enterprises, domestic and foreign, and founded schools and colleges. Although the war years and Reconstruction were disastrous, recovery was rapid and by 1866 American Methodism comprised nearly half of all Protestant communicants. In 1939, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Protestant Episcopal Church were reunited to form the Methodist Church. Those who objected to the merger formed a new church, the Southern Methodist Church.

Historic African American Methodist Churches.

African Methodist Episcopal Church. This group, the oldest and largest, developed from Bethel Church, Philadelphia, an all-black congregation set up in 1794 under the leadership of Richard Allen by members of St. George's Church, who were displeased by discriminatory treatment. In 1816 it joined with five other congregations to establish the African Methodist Episcopal Church, severing its ties with the all-white Methodist Church.

African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. Similar friction between black and white members of John Street Church, New York, resulted in 1796 in permission for its black members to worship separately in a church they named Zion. Other congregations with similar problems maintained a loose affiliation. In 1822 efforts failed to form these churches into a Methodist episcopal annual conference, as did also an attempt to unite them with the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Led by James Varick, they then organized independently.

The Christian (formerly Colored) Methodist Episcopal Church. This group was founded on request of African Americans, who in 1870 were still members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The parent body sponsored the new church. Both the African Methodist Episcopal and the African Methodist Episcopal Zion churches moved aggressively into the South as the Civil War ended, quadrupling their memberships between 1860 and 1870.

METHODIUS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, ST.

Patriarchate, 843–47; b. Syracuse, c. 788 or 800; d. Constantinople, June 14, 847. As a young man Methodius, called "the Confessor," studied in Constantinople, where he became a monk in the monastery of Chenolakkos. During the second iconoclastic persecution, after 815, he took refuge in Rome and seems to have been instrumental in the papal rejection of advances made by the legates of the iconoclastic patriarch. He returned to Constantinople in 821 with a letter from the pope to the Emperor Michael II and was persecuted by the iconoclasts and imprisoned in a tomb on the island of St. Andrew. Upon his liberation, probably in 831, he lived at the court of the Byzantine Emperor THEOPHILUS, who had a high esteem for his erudition and employed him as his adviser. At the death of Theophilus (Jan. 20, 842), Methodius returned to his monastery; but upon the deposition of the iconoclastic patriarch, JOHN THE GRAMMARIAN, Methodius was appointed patriarch (March 4, 843). He convoked a local synod to reestablish the cult of images and legislated that the restoration of image veneration was to be remembered by the introduction of the feast of Orthodoxy, which is still celebrated by the Orthodox Churches on the first Sunday in Lent. The Synodicon (Patrologia Graeca 120:724–736) explaining the true faith that is read during the Liturgy of this feast is also ascribed to him, but it has been changed and expanded at different periods. He treated the penitent iconoclasts with moderation in spite of the protest of the zealots led by the monks of Studios monastery; but he was obliged to excommunicate the fanatic monks, who remained in schism until his death. Methodius composed several hagiographic texts, especially in honor of the martyrdom of SS. Marina, COSMAS AND DAMIAN, of AGATHA (patron saint of Syracuse), and of THEOPHANES, as well as the life of Euthymius of Sardes.

[F. DVORNIK]

METHODIUS OF OLYMPUS, ST.

Third-century ecclesiastical author; d. probably a martyr at Chalcis, Greece, c. 300. St. Jerome (De viris ill. 83) speaks of Methodius as a bishop and martyr, who held the See at Olympus in Lycia, and later in Tyre, dying "at the end of the last persecution at Chalcis, in Greece." Different ancient sources offer contradictory details with respect to his see and the date of his martyrdom. But if the authenticity of Methodius's Against Porphyry is accepted (c. 270), his floruit must be dated in the last quarter of the century. F. Diekamp at one time suggested that Methodius was bishop of Philippi [Theol. Quart. 109 (1928) 285], but the argument is not convincing. The most one can say is that Methodius, also called Eubulius, was a Platonizing Christian teacher, possibly also a bishop and martyr, who exercised his ministry in the cities of Lycia, Olympus, Patara, and Termessus, during the last quarter of the third century.

Writings. The Symposium, or Treatise on Chastity, is the only work of Methodius that has been preserved entirely in Greek; two other works of importance, the Treatise on Free Will and On the Resurrection, are preserved in a Slavonic version and in a few Greek fragments. Other pieces are The Jewish Foods, On Life, On the Leech, On Leprosy, On Creatures, and Against Porphyry.

In the treatise On the Resurrection Methodius combats the Origenist concept of the Fall and the Resurrection; in the Treatise on Free Will he gives a detailed explanation of the effects of Adam's sin upon man's freedom and hints at the voluntarism that is at the heart of Methodius's theology and asceticism: for the effect of Jesus' atonement was to restore some of the perfect freedom and equilibrium of the human will that man possessed before the Fall.

It is this restoration of the divine image that Methodius explains in the Platonic dialogue, the Symposium. So far as external form is concerned, this is the most Platonic of all the writings of the early Church, composed within the last quarter of the third century and dedicated to Methodius's patroness, the Lady from Termessus.

In the course of the eleven great discourses, with prelude, interludes, and epilogue, Methodius explains how virginity has taken the place of the Platonic eros as the all-embracing virtue of the Christian life, but he also gives practical instruction (presumably for a community of consecrated women of Lycia) on the interpretation of the Scriptures, on the nature of the final reign of Christ, on the Incarnation and Redemption, on prayer and the freedom of the will, on the dangers of astrology, and on prayer and temptation. Thus the work becomes a summary of Christian doctrine and a handbook against the errors of GNOSTICISM and Encratism.

Teaching. For all his debt to Alexandrian allegorism, Methodius shows no trace of ORIGENISM in his doctrine of the Fall or the Last Things. Rather he stresses the archetypal relationship between Adam, the first man, born of the virgin earth, and Christ, the archvirgin, born of a virgin mother, who by His life and death restores freedom and chastity to mankind. The effects of this restoration are communicated to men through the Virgin Mother Church, who brings forth her children mystically and nourishes them with the milk of her grace. Through her teaching and her liturgy (especially the anamnesis, or memorial, of the Passion) men learn to conquer their passions, exercise their freedom, and thus restore the luster of the divine image within the soul. In practice this is achieved by the more perfect in the Church, instructing the weak.

Methodius sets his doctrine against the grandiose scheme of the eight ages of the world: five are the ages of the Old Law, the sixth is the Church, the seventh is the millennium of rest (when Christ will rule the world), and the eighth designates the eternity of heaven. In Thecla's hymn we have a moving description of the march to meet Christ on the last day in the company of His virgin bride, the Church.

Methodius's Christology tended to be subordinationist, and it is probable that his text was later corrected by an anti-Arian group; another recension, Photius tells us, was circulated by the Arian party. Yet Methodius spoke clearly of Christ's divinity; and G. N. Bonwetsch, E. Mersch, and others err in thinking that he taught that there was a hypostatic union between the Logos and the first man.

Doctrine, however, is not Methodius's strong point; he is most moving in his poetic flights, his description of the heavenly meadows, the rise of the soul to God, the mystical sleep of Christ, and the marriage of Christ and the Virgin Church. In philosophy he is eclectic. Aristotelian in his logic and in his support of the imagination, Methodius inclines to Stoicism in his moral doctrine, to Platonism in his view of the shadow-reality dimension of the world, and, finally, to an Alexandrian-Asiatic form of allegorism in his interpretation of Scripture.

METHODOLOGY (PHILOSOPHY)

Method is a "way after" (derived from the Greek μέθοδος from μετὰ, ''after,'' and ὁδός, ''road'' or "way"); it is applied both to the process or art of investigation and to the treatise or body of knowledge resulting from investigation. Method is used in three distinct but related applications in philosophy: (1) to logic or parts of logic, as inductive or axiomatic methods; (2) to procedures of the sciences, as mathematical or experimental methods; and (3) to modes of philosophizing, as Cartesian or phenomenological methods. Plato was the first philosopher to use the term; Aristotle gave it a technical meaning. They both refer to mathematical and medical methods to explain philosophical methods, and later interpretations of method based on their theories influence and are influenced by developments of method in the arts and sciences. Plato and Aristotle use earlier terms such as way (ὁδός), reason (λόγος), mode (τρόπος), treatment (πραγματεία), and art (τέχνη), in connection with or in the place of method, and those terms continue to be used in later theories.

Greek Thought. In the Republic PLATO uses "method" to relate DIALECTICS to the five kinds of mathematics. It is the only method that proceeds directly to the first principle without hypotheses (Republic 533C). Plato's SOCRATES develops his arguments on the analogy of the arts or even of the "method" of hunting (Soph. 218D). He distinguishes two processes in dialectic, division ($\delta\iota\alpha$ ($\rho\epsilon\sigma\iota\zeta$) and bringing together ($\sigma\iota\nu\alpha$), and argues that they are appropriate to RHETORIC, and constitute the art of Hippocrates (Phaedrus 266D. 270C).

Aristotle records that Socrates was the first to examine universal definitions and inductive arguments, because he was concerned with the principles of science and with syllogizing (Meta. 1078b 17-31). Aristotle raises the question whether there is one method of inquiry for all subject matters, as syllogistic DEMONSTRATION applies to all proofs. He concludes that there are as many methods as there are subject matters or parts of subject matters, and he frequently divides his scientific treatises into several methods or parts. He wrote a treatise, now lost, called Methodics. Dialectic is a method (Topica 100a 18), comparable to the methods of rhetoric and medicine (Topica 101b 5–6); one of its functions is to discover the principles of all methods or sciences (Topica 101b 2-4). Syllogistic demonstration, unlike the method of inquiry, is universal to all proofs; and the demonstrative syllogism is "analyzed," first, into the terms or parts that compose it and into other syllogisms, and second, in what was later called the Posterior Analytics, into the principles of instruction and proof.

During the Hellenistic period the Stoics, Epicureans, and Academics divided philosophy into physics, ethics, and logic. Under logic they considered the criteria of knowledge and the rules of dialectic and rhetoric. Art was conceived as a skill in proceeding by a way or method, or a canon or rules of judgement, or a calculus or probabilities. Pappus in the 4th century A.D. states the position, attributed to Euclid, that mathematical inquiry employs two converse methods, analysis (positing what is sought and proceeding to what must be assumed) and synthesis (positing what is assumed and proceeding to what is sought). Galen in the 2nd century A.D. reviews the methods of all the arts, particularly rhetoric and mathematics, and philosophy, including the theories of Plato, Aristotle, and the Stoics, to clarify the methods of instruction and practice in medicine. He enumerates three methods of instruction: analysis, which begins with the idea of the end; synthesis, which compounds what had been discovered by analysis; and partition (διάλυσις), which breaks definitions into essential parts. The Greek commentators on Aristotle and Plato made use of these distinctions to characterize the methods of philosophers. Ammonius Hermiae found a fourfold method in Plato's dialectic: DIVISION, DEFINITION, DEMONSTRATION, and ANALYSIS. The four dialectical methods (or three—analysis, division, and reduction to absurdity) are referred to by JOHN PHILOPONUS, JOHN DAMASCENE, Alcinous, and PROCLUS. Alexander of Aphrodisias applied the geometric conception of analysis to Aristotle's Analytics, and he distinguishes in Aristotle's method the converse methods of analysis and synthesis. (See ANALYSIS AND SYNTHESIS.)

Roman and Medieval Development. For the Romans, methodological distinctions were distinctions applied to via or ratio or ars; the term methodus came into use during the late Middle Ages. CICERO applied two basic distinctions of rhetoric, invention and judgment, to all discursive art (ratio disserendi) and attributed their origin to Aristotle. The art of invention is expounded in the Topics. The translation of Arabic medical works, including Galen, in the 11th century, and of the last four books of Aristotle's Organon, in the 12th century, focused the discussion of the LIBERAL ARTS on problems of method. In the treatment of methodus during the late 13th century, analysis and synthesis took the place of resolutio and compositio. (See SCHOLASTIC METHOD.)

THOMAS AQUINAS seldom uses methodus, but he does distinguish invention and judgment and also resolution and composition. He applies composition and division to the act of the intellect forming propositions, true and false, and invention and judgment to the discursive processes of reason from known to unknown. The process of reason by which the certitude of science is acquired is treated in the judicative part of logic, which Aristotle called Analytics, or from the form of the syllogism, in the Prior Analytics, or from the matter of the demonstrative syllogism, in the Posterior Analytics. The processes of reason that fall short of certitude are treated in the inventive part: (1) invention leading, not to judgment, but to conviction or OPINION based on PROBABILI-TY in the Topics; (2) invention leading to suspicion leaning to one side of an opposition in the Rhetoric; and (3) invention producing only estimation because of a pleasing representation in the Poetics (In 1 anal. post. 1.4-6). St. Thomas also distinguishes two ways (viae) of proceeding to knowledge of the truth (that is, two parts of judicative logic), the mode (modus) of resolution, by which one proceeds from composites to simples and from wholes to parts, that is, from the confused experience known first in nature, and the way of composition, by which one proceeds from simples to composites (In 2 meta. 1.278).

Renaissance Transition. The method of the Aristotelian logic was transformed by the development of terminist logics, Lullian combinatory arts, and dialectical and rhetorical arts of invention. The transformed methods were used in the renewed study of medicine, mathematics, and literature. As a result the differences between discovery and proof and the relation of both to analysis and synthesis and to INDUCTION and DEDUCTION became subjects of interest and controversy. The new arts and encyclopedias and the new logics of the Renaissance were methods. The importance of method in the reform of the arts, sciences, and education is seen in the proliferation of titles such as the Ratio seu methodus compendio perveniendi ad veram theologiam of D. ERASMUS and the Methodus ad facilem historiarum cognitionem of J. Bodin.

Giacomo Aconcio, in De methodo (1558), treats method as the right way (recta ratio) of investigating and transmitting arts and sciences. Three methods are required in inquiry and teaching: the method of definition to demonstrate what a thing is, the method of resolution and composition to treat causes and effects, the method of division to order parts and wholes. The De inventione dialectica (1480) of R. Agricola transfers the Ciceronian division of discourse into invention and judgment, and the priority of invention or topics from rhetoric to dialectic.

Peter RAMUS identifies dialectic with logic, and both with the art of discoursing well (ars bene diserendi). He divides logic into two parts, invention and judgment. (1) Invention is achieved by the topics or commonplaces, beginning with causes since cause is "the first place of invention, the foundation of all science and knowing," and ending with distribution, definition, and description. (2) Judgment is the disposition of the arguments discovered by invention. Ramus argued, therefore, that there is a single method of all the arts and sciences, since method is disposition of arguments proceeding from the more general and prior in nature. Jacob Schegk (1511 to 1587), a physician and logician, maintained against Ramus that method is a way of knowing, rather than a discoursing, and undertook to show in his De demonstratione (1564), using Aristotle and Galen, that analysis or method is the way both of discovery and judgment in science. J. ZABA-RELLA included four books De methodis in his Logica (1587), in which, after examining theories of kinds of method, he argues that two, the demonstrative and resolutive, suffice for the investigation of all things.

17th Century. The distinctions of methods and the oppositions about methods recur with few changes in philosophic statements of scientific method and its application to philosophy. Francis BACON criticizes the various classifications of method, including the single method and dichotomies of Ramus (De aug. sci. 6.2). According to Bacon, the intellectual arts are four: inquiry or invention, examination or judgment, custody or memory, and elocution or transmission—adaptations of four of the traditional five parts of rhetoric: invention, arrangement, expression, memory, and delivery. Bacon makes use of the topics (or places) for invention, and he rejects the syllogism.

Rene DESCARTES turned to the analysis of ancient geometry and of algebra to set forth an art of invention and a universal mathematics, contrasted to the logic of syllogisms and the art of R. LULL, which provide rules for discoursing about things that one does not know. Analysis is the true way by which a thing is methodically discovered and derived; synthesis proceeds conversely from effect to cause. Descartes concludes, therefore, that analysis is also the best and truest method of teaching.

The Port Royal Logic, influenced by the Cartesian method, has four parts, the first three on concepts, judgments, and reasoning, and the fourth on method. Method is the art of disposing well a series of many thoughts for either discovery or proof. The method of discovering truth is called analysis, or the method of resolution, or the method of invention. The method of explaining or proving a known truth is called synthesis, or the method of composition, or the method of doctrine.

18th Century. The Treatise of Human Nature by D. HUME is presented in its title as an exercise in method, Being an Attempt to Introduce the Experimental Method of Reasoning into Moral Subjects. All reasoning is nothing but a comparison and a discovery of those relations that two or more objects bear to each other. There are two kinds of relations: some depend entirely on ideas, and some are altered without a change in the ideas. Reasoning depends on one alone of the latter relations, causation.

I. Kant adapted Hume's skeptical method in his construction of a critical philosophy, but he differed from Hume concerning both judgments methods. He argued that mathematical judgments are synthetic, not analytic as Hume thought, and that mathematics, physics, and ethics are all based on synthetic judgments a priori. In the Prolegomena he distinguishes rigorously between the use of analytic and synthetic applied to judgments and applied to method. He uses both the analytical and synthetic methods in his philosophy. In The Foundations of the Metaphysics of Morals he says that his method is to proceed analytically from common knowledge to the determination of its supreme principle and then synthetically from the examination of this principle and its sources back to common knowledge where it finds its application. The structure of the three Critiques is synthetic in method and proceeds in logical sequence through a doctrine of elements, containing an analytic and a dialectic, to a doctrine of method.

19th Century. During the 19th century the methods of transcendental logics and of empirical logics were elaborated; the implications for method of history, psychology, sociology, and of the theory of evolution were examined; and classifications of the sciences, with special attention to the methods of the natural sciences and the humanistic sciences, or Geisteswissenschaften, were constructed.

G. W. F. HEGEL argued that the Kantian distinction between judgment and method, analytic and synthetic, is unduly abstract. All judgments and all methods are simultaneously analytic and synthetic. The reactions of S. A. Kierkegaard and K. Marx to the Hegelian dialectic laid the foundations of the methods of PHENOMENOLOGY and EXISTENTIALISM and of materialistic DIALECTIC.

A. COMTE developed the positivistic method in connection with his inauguration of sociology, expounded an interrelated series of classifications of the sciences, and developed a "subjective synthesis: as a universal system of conceptions proper to humanity." W. DILTHEY devoted himself to a critique of historical reason, which he found lacking in Kant, and to an examination of the principles and methods of the Geisteswissenschaften. F. Brentano's psychology "from an empirical standpoint" and W. Wundt's "physiological" psychology, both published in 1874, revolutionized the methods of both psychology and philosophy.

Sir William HAMILTON, who endeavored to combine the Kantian and the Scottish common-sense philosophy, divided his logic into two parts: stoicheiology, or the doctrine of elements (in which he treats concepts, judgments, and reasoning), and methodology, or the doctrine of method. For Hamilton, method consists of two processes, analysis and synthesis; and logical methodology has three parts: the doctrine of definition, the doctrine of division, and the doctrine of probation.

John Stuart MILL, in his System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive: Being a Connected View of the Principles of Evidence and the Methods of Scientific Investigation, devotes one chapter to his "four methods of experimental inquiry," another to the deductive method, and the final book to the methods of the social sciences. His defense of Utilitarianism is a method of examining consequences rather than a priori precepts, Herbert SPENCER applies the conception and method of evolution in the construction of his system of synthetic philosophy.

20th Century. The revolutions of philosophy in the 20th century are characterized by methods used and by subject matters selected in order to avoid errors and absurdities and in order to give philosophy a concrete basis and a scientific or critical function. PRAGMATISM, according to W. JAMES, is a new name for some old ways of thinking derived from Mill. J. Dewey seeks a "method of inquiry' to avoid the errors revealed by experience in past inquiries. He defines inquiry as "the controlled or directed transformation of an indeterminate situation into one that is so determinate in its constituent distinctions and relations as to convert the elements of the original situation into a unified whole."

G. E. Moore refutes IDEALISM and utilitarianism, defends common sense, and analyzes the statements of philosophers. The methods of Moore and B. RUSSELL were the starting point of the philosophical analysis that ran through logical atomism and LOGICAL POSITIVISM to linguistic analysis. The objectives of method applied to language, formal or ordinary, are to determine the conditions of VERIFICATION or the varieties of use and to expose false inferences, spurious questions, and non-sensical assumptions.

Edmund HUSSERL sought to make philosophy a rigorous science. His Formal and Transcendental Logic, according to its subtitle, is a Critique of Logical Understanding. Taking its beginning from experience of the sciences and logic, the phenomenological method does not consist in deducing, in erklaren (mere "explanation by theories") but rather in aufklaren (seeing things as they are). The functions of logic reflect the meanings of "logos": speaking, thinking, and thing thought. Phenomenological research must cover all three, since formal logic depends on transcendental logic.

Martin Heidegger undertakes to analyze and describe the meanings of individual phenomena. He seeks to free philosophy from dependence on the special sciences and to destroy the misconceptions of traditional philosophies, which have forgotten or distorted and trivialized the insights and truths of earlier thinkers. The question of being must be restated explicitly; and to understand Sein one must begin with Dasein: the approach to ontology must be made by analysis of experiences such as temporality and of emotions such as concern and dread. (See EXISTENTIALISM)

Summation. From the beginning of rational thought men have speculated concerning methods, or ways, or modes, or instruments of thinking. The meanings of method have been as diverse as the kinds of philosophies, sciences, arts, beliefs, and problems. During the Renaissance method became a central problem of philosophy and science, and by the 17th century the numerous divisions of method had been all but amalgamated into the distinction between analytic and synthetic. Some important problems were encountered in that reduction: thus, some philosophers argued that the method of discovery is analytic, others that it is synthetic. During the 19th century the differences between classification of the methods of the sciences and arts were subjects of inquiry and controversy: the a priori method was presented as synthetic, as analytic, or as impossible; the a posteriori method was analytic or synthetic of empirical experience. In the 20th century the methods of philosophies set them in controversial opposition in the detection of errors, the clarification of meanings, and the establishment of truths. Pragmatism tends to be synthetic; logical positivism, ANALYTICAL PHILOSOPHY, PHENOMENOLOGY, and existentialism tend to be analytic. A fuller investigation of the different objectives of the different methods and of what they have in common may serve to reduce the misunderstandings and controversies that have developed in contemporary philosophy.

METHODOLOGY (THEOLOGY)

Methodology is an area in scientific theology that is not included in the traditional divisions because it is only beginning to be developed. Only a brief outline of this problem can be given here. It consists in the accomplished theologian's reflections on the historical development of his science in order to achieve an understanding of theological methodology. The growth of theology is like the growth of a child. A child must grow to maturity before he can reflect on and understand the process of maturing. Likewise theology must achieve some maturity before it can understand its own process of development. Only a chemist can write the history of chemistry, and only a theologian can write the history of theology.

Processes. In reflecting on the historical development of theology, the theologian becomes aware of various processes at work, especially the transcultural process, the theological process, and the dogmatic process.

The transcultural process is the transposition of the message of revelation from the thought patterns and ways of understanding commonly used in one culture to the thought patterns and ways of understanding in another culture; for example, from the Hebrew mentality and culture to the Hellenistic, to the Roman, to the medieval, to the modern Western, to the modern Oriental, etc. Because the gospel is to be preached to all nations in all ages in language and forms that the faithful of each particular age and culture can understand, one of the fundamental problems the theologian has to face is that of finding the transcultural principles operating in this transposition.

The theological process consists in passing from an understanding of revelation in terms of a particular culture to an understanding that is more universal, transcending individual past cultures. This process moves from an understanding of the truths of revelation in relation to a particular past cultural context to some understanding of the truths in themselves and in their relation to one another. It involves passing from what comes first in the acquisition of knowledge (prius quoad nos) to what is first in the order of being and intelligibility (prius quoad se). It does not terminate in a stage determined by past cultural circumstances. It was this process that achieved an analogical conception of the Divine Persons as consubstantial, of the Incarnation as the union of two natures in one Person, of grace as absolutely supernatural, etc.

The dogmatic process is that by which the Church as the teacher of all ages and cultures judges and defines an understanding of revelation that transcends past particular cultures and gives accurate expression to a more evolved understanding of revealed truth. Such judgments do not belong to the private theologian but to the Church under the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

Reflection on Processes. The theologian can come, in reflecting on these processes in detail, to understand something about the methodology of theology: what operation and groups of operations are involved in theological development; how these operations become further differentiated; how particular persons and cultures, although potentially unlimited, are actually limited by their horizon, their need of subjective conversion (moral, intellectual, religious), and lack of authenticity. As the effort to analyze and group all the operations of theological development into an intelligible synthesis runs into a barrier, the theologian looks about for some tools of further advance. He notices that the dynamism of consciousness has led in the past to a differentiation between operations that have to do with things that man can master (the profane world) and those that deal with the fields that lie beyond his control (the sacred); he notices that the structure of consciousness leads to a differentiation between operations insofar as they deal with objects (the objective world) and operations insofar as they are the means by which the subject is present to himself (the world of subjectivity). He notices, moreover, that there is a kind of specialization within consciousness where intelligence functions only as a part of the whole man (the world of common sense involving also specialized intelligence, e.g., D. Petau, A. von Harnack, J. Lebreton, R. de Vaux). And there is also a specialization of intelligence in which everything is subordinated to understanding and intelligence dominates (the world of theory—symbolized by Plato, Aristotle, Aquinas, Newton, Einstein, etc.).

The theologian can detect not only a great mobility within all of these worlds but also a movement from one world to another with development in one world affecting development in the other world. To illustrate briefly, historically there has been a movement from the world of common sense (the world of Scripture and tradition) to the world of theory (characteristic of medieval speculative theology) to the world of interiority (characteristic of modern theology). Morever, reflection reveals an inner dynamic of human intelligence that demands a movement from common sense understanding to theoretical understanding and on to an understanding of subjectivity and the subject who is engaged in all three worlds. The basic methodological problem for the theologian is to examine the differentiation and development of theological operations within each world and their relation to the operations of the other worlds in order to discover a principle or principles of integrating all three worlds. Theological method has to do with the order of these operations in achieving the goal theology sets for itself.

Theology as Science. A critical problem in modern theology is the place that theory is to hold in theology, whether the Aristotelian notion of science is any longer applicable to modern theology. In the Aristotelian notion of science, taken over by St. Thomas, science is concerned with certain knowledge, with the universal, the necessary, the immutable. Modern science, however, never claims more than probability. It is concerned with the changeable, the contingent, with movement, with the particular, with what exists in fact, with man as he actually exists instead of the ideal man. With the rise of historical consciousness and its repercussions in theology, one has an enormous theological development that does not fit into the medieval synthesis. Theology has shifted from a consideration of man as substance to a consideration of man as subject. Its current concern is more with the historical and concrete, with salvation history, than with universal conceptions. The theoretical element in theology is in danger of being pushed aside because seemingly irrelevant.

Nevertheless, the Church seems to have given a permanent status to the theoretical element in theology in Vatican Council I, in its Constitution on the Catholic Faith, which considered FAITH and reason (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3015–20). The problem for the modern theologian, therefore, in view of the historical development of theology, is how to enlarge his concept of science so as to make room for modern developments in such a way that the contributions of modern theology are integrated with the achievements of the past. By studying past achievements more carefully, the theologian may be able to find the implicit foundations for modern development in such a way that he can see how modern theology is a prolongation and development of medieval theology.

To do this it seems that a theologian must understand what it is to understand, pursuing the path explored by B. Lonergan. He must investigate how understanding and judgment are related; how judgment is an act involving an ultimate personal COMMITMENT; how theological judgment, because it involves a view of the whole economy of salvation, is an act of Christian wisdom; why this requires a collaboration with the various particular natural wisdoms.

Theology has become very conscious of itself and sees the need of exploring the subject theologizing much more thoroughly if it is to understand what theological understanding is, how theological questions are to be ordered, and how the theologian is to integrate the three worlds in which he lives. A good beginning is being made in this area.

METOCHITES, GEORGE

Archdeacon of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople and Byzantine theological polemicist; b. c. 1250; d. in exile, c. 1328. A well-educated civil official, Metochites supported the policy of the Patriarch JOHN XI BECCUS and the Emperor MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS in their efforts to achieve union with Rome. He served on ambassadorial missions to Rome under Popes Gregory X, Innocent V, and John XXI, participated in the union Council of Lyons (1274), and wrote numerous tracts in support of the theological alignment with the Western Church. During the restoration of the Orthodox separatism under Emperor Andronicus II Palaeologus in 1283, he was imprisoned and exiled for the remainder of his life, despite the fact that his son, Theodore Metochites, became first minister of the Byzantine Empire in 1316.

Together with John Beccus and Theodore Meliteniotes, George Metochites was one of the most prolific writers favoring the union. Besides popularizing the works of Beccus, he wrote polemical tracts against Maximus Planudes (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE. 141:1275–1308), Manuel Moschopulus (Patrologia Graeca 141: 1307–1406), and Gregory II of Cyprus (unedited). His five-book treatise on the procession of the Holy Spirit is still unedited. He wrote also a Historia dogmatica on the origin and development of the schism between Rome and the East after 1274, which is most valuable for information on events in his own lifetime. He is also credited with the composition of Typikon on Faith, and the treatises On Virtue On Asceticism, and On the Soul, which actually belong to Nicephorus Blemmydes.

METROPHANES CRITOPOULOS

Patriarch of Alexandria (1633-39), Byzantine scholar; b. Beroea, Macedonia, 1589; d. Vallachia, 1639. Metrophanes embraced the monastic life on Mount ATHOS, where he met Cyril LUCARIS, and accompanied him to Alexandria. In 1617 he was invited by the Archbishop of Canterbury, George Abbot, to visit England, and he spent ten years traveling in Europe, studying Protestantism and Anglicanism. He visited Oxford; then Hamburg, Bremen, Helmstedt, Wittemberg, Berlin, Leipzig, Tübingen, and Strassburg in Germany; Basel, Berne, Zurich, and Geneva in Switzerland. In November 1627 he was in Venice and left there for Constantinople. He was in Egypt in 1631 and had apparently been consecrated a bishop by 1633; in 1636 he was patriarch of Alexandria. As patriarch he subscribed to the decisions of the Synod of Constantinople (1638), which condemned his predecessor and benefactor, Cyril Lucaris. Metrophanes wrote a Confessio catholicae et apostolicae in Ecclesia oriente in Greek while at Helmstedt (1624-25); it was published there with a Latin translation by John Homeius in 1661. Protestant influence is noticeable in his doctrine on the Sacraments, which he reduces to three: Baptism, Eucharist, and Penance. He also rejected the deuteroncanonical books of the Bible, as well as the Catholic doctrine on indulgences and the Immaculate Conception. Only part of his works have been edited.

METROPHANES OF SMYRNA

Metropolitan from 857 to 880. He was one of the intransigent prelates who refused to recognize PHOTIUS as the legitimate patriarch of Constantinople after the resignation of Ignatius. He was deposed by a Photian synod and was exiled to Cherson by the Emperor MICHAEL III. In 860 he met Constantine-Cyril and his brother Methodius, who stopped at Cherson on their embassy to the Khazars. He gave information to ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN on the discovery by Constantine of relics believed to be those of Pope Clement I and on Constantine's writings about the discovery and in honor of St. Clement. After the deposition of Photius, Metrophanes played an important role at the Council of 869-870. When Photius was reinstated as patriarch after Ignatius's death (878), Metrophanes refused to recognize his offer of reconciliation and friendship. He refused to appear at the Union Council (879–880), which had rehabilitated Photius, and was deposed and excommunicated by the papal legates sent by Pope JOHN VIII. He may have recovered the See of Smyrna after Photius's resignation in 886. He wrote eulogies on St. Polycarp of Smyrna and the archangels Michael and Gabriel, and commentaries to the first Epistle of St. John, the Catholic letters, and Ecclesiastes (preserved only in a Georgian translation, pub. K. K. Kekelidze, 1920).

METTEN, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey in the Diocese of Regensburg, Bavaria, south Germany. Founded (766) from REIC-HENAU by Bl. Gamelbert and the first abbot, Bl. Utto, it was made a royal cloister by Charlemagne with the duty of prayer for emperor and empire and became an important settlement cloister. The monks were expelled (1058) and replaced by canons, but returned under the HIRSAU OBSERVANCE (1157). In 1236 church and cloister burned down. The abbots obtained pontifical rights in 1439. After collapse during the Reformation, there was a revival at Metten under Abbot Johannes Nablas (1596–1624), who expanded the abbey. The church was restored under Roman Märkl (1706–29). The cloister was suppressed by Bavaria in 1803 but was restored in Offenberg castle (1826) and made an abbey (1840). Metten has had prominent monks. The miniatures in a MS of the rule (c. 1400) anticipated the "Danube style." Ildefons Lehner was a leader in the neo-Gothic movement c. 1860; Utto Kornmüller, a composer and scholar, represented classical church music; Edmund Schmidt did research on the Benedictine rule. Gregor Scherr became archbishop of Munich and Freising (1856), and Leo Mergel, bishop of Eichstätt (1905). Metten restored SCHEYERN and Weltenburg and founded ST. VINCENT ARCHABBEY in the United States.

MEURERS, HEINRICH VON

Liturgist; b. Tönnis (Holstein), Oct. 21, 1888; d. Trier, May 16, 1953. From 1909 he studied theology at Innsbruck, though interrupted by military service (1914–18), and he completed his studies with a doctorate in theology in 1921. In 1920, he was ordained at Trier. After a year of pastoral duties, he went to Rome for further studies, where, in 1923, he received the degree of master of sacred theology. From 1923 to 1935, he was professor of dogma at the theological faculty of Trier. From 1935 to 1951, he was vicar-general of the Diocese of Trier. In this office Von Meurers displayed high qualities and became, even beyond the boundaries of the diocese, one of the leaders of the liturgical movement in Germany; he was a founding member of the German liturgical commission (1940), the first president of the Liturgical Institute of Trier (1947), and president of the first German liturgical congress at Frankfurt am Main in 1950.

From his articles, which he published in different periodicals, the one on concelebration stands out: "Die eucharistische Konzelebration," Pastor Bonus, 53 (1942) 65–77; 97–105.

MEURIN, SÉBASTIEN LOUIS

Jesuit; b. Charleville, France, Dec. 26, 1707; d. Prairie du Roeher, Ill., Feb. 23, 1777. He was destined to be the last Jesuit missionary in the "Illinois Country." He entered the novitiate of the Champagne province of the Society of Jesus, at Nancy, France, 1729. He came to Canada in 1741 and was sent in 1746 to the Illinois mission. After serving as pastor of Ft. Vincennes (Vincennes, Ind.) he moved (1752) to French settlements near the Mississippi River (present Cahokia, Prairie du Rocher, and Kaskaskia, Ill.). Toward the end of the French and Indian War, a new governor, Philippe D'Abbadie, arrived at New Orleans with orders to expel the Jesuits. The priests were taken to New Orleans and sent to France, but the superior council of Louisiana took the responsibility of returning Meurin to his ministry among the Illinois native tribes. When the territory east of the Mississippi became English in 1763, he settled at St. Genevieve, crossing the river to serve the Christians of Illinois. He first established ecclesiastical jurisdiction through the Rev. Robert Harding, superior of the Maryland Jesuits, but in 1768 he offered obedience to Bp. Oliver Briand of Quebec, Canada. Briand named him vicar-general and sent the Rev. Pierre Gibault to help him. The Spanish commandant of Sainte Genevieve, considering this relationship with a bishop in English territory disloyal, exiled Meurin, who had to go to Illinois, where he settled at Prairie du Roeher; he lived the rest of his life under English rule. In 1764, during Meurin's only absence from the Illinois mission, Pierre Laclede and Auguste Chouteau founded the present city of St. Louis, Mo. From its beginning, Meurin cared for the settlers there, blessing the first log cabin church in the village on June 24, 1770. In 1775, after the suppression of the Society of Jesus (1773), he was adopted by the bishop of Quebec. He was buried at Prairie du Rocher, but his remains were transferred in 1847 to the Jesuit novitiate at Florissant, Mo.

[R. N. HAMILTON]

MEXICO, COLONIAL

In August 1521 the great Aztec city of Tenochtitlán was in ruins; its inhabitants had fled; the last Aztec ruler, Cuautemoc, was a prisoner of Hernán Cortés. The Spaniards faced the task of rebuilding the destroyed city and of winning over the inhabitants of the area, inimical and distrustful after all the destruction. The Castilians in their simple faith felt it imperative first to eradicate idolatry and superstition among the native people. However, they had no idea of the vastness and ruggedness of the territory, of the varieties in climate, and of the lack of political and linguistic unity.

Early Missionary Activity. On Aug. 13, 1523, two Franciscan priests, Tecto and Aora, and Brother Pedro de GANTE arrived in New Spain from Flanders. On May 13, 1524, "the Twelve," led by Martín de Valencia, arrived with power granted by the pope to establish the Church in New Spain. Gradually, hundreds of Franciscans, Dominicans, and Augustinians came. To facilitate the work of evangelizing, they divided the territory, with Mexico City as the center: the Augustinians, to the northwest and south; the Dominicans, to the southeast; and the Franciscans, to the north and northeast. The Franciscans also went into Yucatán. When the Jesuits arrived, they were given charge of the extreme northeast of present-day Mexico, but they continued on to the present states of Nuevo León and Coahuila and the vast territories of modern Texas and New Mexico.

Franciscans. This order grew so quickly that by the beginning of the 17th century it was organized into five provinces: Mexico City, Mérida, Valladolid (now Morelia), Guadalajara, and Zacatecas. To educate their missionaries they also built six apostolic colleges: Querétaro, Guadalupe de Zacatecas, San Fernando de México, Orizaba, Pachuca, and Zapopan, whose history had been written by Isidro Félix de Espinosa and Juan de ARRI-CIVITA. The Franciscans gave to New Spain 19 bishops, among them Fray Juan de ZUMÁRRAGA. They wrote hundreds of works in the native tongues, of which Beristáin lists 522, not all verified. Motolinía, Sahagún, Mendieta, Augustín de Vetancur, Alonso de la Rea, Pablo Beaumont, Antonio Tello, José de Arlegui, and Diego de Landa wrote histories and chronicles, rich in data, on the pre-Cortesian history as well as on the development of the apostolate and the discoveries and conquests.

Dominicans. In 1526 the first Dominicans arrived; but five of them died that same year, and four returned to Spain. They made progress little by little and eventually formed four provinces: Santiago de México (1536), San Vicente de Chiapas y Guatemala (1551), San Hipólito de Oaxaca (1595), and Puebla (1656). In those first years they distinguished themselves by defending the native Mexicans as rational beings. They also filled important offices in the Inquisition and in the university. They gave 19 bishops to New Spain, including the first bishop to come to Mexico, Garcés (1452?–1524); the famous LAS CASAS; and the enterprising Alcalde (1701–92). They had two excellent historians: Agustín Dávila Padilla and Antonio de Remesal.

Augustinians. In 1535 seven Augustinian fathers arrived, the advance group of those who were to work especially for the conversion of the Otomies in Huasteca and in the present state of Guerrero. Some of their magnificent monasteries are still standing, such as Acolman, Actopan, and Ixmiquilpan. They were bold builders and able organizers of native communities. Alonso de la Veracruz was noted for his learning. Of the eight prelates whom the order gave to New Spain, the viceroy-archbishop Fray Payo Enríquez de Rivera (1670–81) was exceptional. Juan de Grijalva, Esteban García, Diego Basalenque, Juan González de la Puente, and Matías Escobar were Augustinian chroniclers.

These three religious orders converted millions of native people who lived on the central plateau and began to Christianize other regions. At the beginning of the 18th century there were 351 monasteries with 2,396 priests: 1,218 Franciscans, 527 Dominicans, and 651 Augustinians. The secular clergy did very little at first. Of those who came to New Spain only a rare few had the qualifications necessary for an arduous life. Most of them served in the curia or in the cathedrals of the six dioceses, which Charles V quickly obtained from the Holy See. Important in the conversion of the natives was the devotion to Our Lady of GUADALUPE, which spread throughout the land and by the 17th century was the characteristic devotion of the Mexican people.

Problems in Evangelization. The obstacles that the missionaries encountered were greater than the first volunteers had anticipated. The country was immense and bristled with mountain ranges. The sea coasts were hot and unhealthy. Only one area in the central plateau, the region ruled by the Aztecs, was relatively civilized. In the rest of the country the linguistic, tribal, and cultural differences were almost infinite. More than 500 different languages were spoken. More problematic still were the native religious practices. The Aztecs had syncretized the religions of the tribes they dominated, and their cult had become a confused conglomeration of polytheistic, animistic, and astrological beliefs, which resulted in all kinds of sacrifices, rites, and magical and superstitious practices. Especially abhorrent to the Spaniards was their common practice of human sacrifice. The religious beliefs and practices of the rest of the country also varied immensely. In those first years the barriers seemed impregnable. The missionaries attributed the tenacity of the natives in clinging to their ancestral customs to the special dominion of the devil. Some missionaries thought they saw in native rites or images vestiges of remote Christian teachings, an ingenious misinterpretation that many were to follow two centuries later.

The bravery of the Spanish conquistadores and the backing of the crown made the work of evangelizing much easier. In every town a church with its monastery or rectory was built at royal expense. Spain paid the traveling expenses of the missionaries and maintained them in their Christianizing work (see PATRONATO REAL), even though some Spanish settlers by their greed and evil conduct made the religion they professed odious. The results of the first 50 years of evangelizing were amazing. At the end of the 16th century the population of the entire central plateau had been converted to the Christian faith. It is impossible to say how many were baptized. The missionaries speak of millions. Modern sociologists have not been able to find a satisfactory explanation with reliable statistics for the undeniable phenomenon of the depopulation of the country. Studies of the Berkeley school hold that a population of 20 million when the Spaniards arrived fell to 2 million by the end of the century. The laments of the missionaries over the disappearance of the native peoples were not exaggerated. The clash of cultures brought ravaging epidemics and a rapid decline in the number of natives. All who survived became Christians. The Church, led by Zumárraga and the first Bishop of Michoacán, Don Vasco de QUIROGA, founded hospitals and various charitable institutions throughout the country.

Inquisition. To protect the purity of faith of the discoverers and conquistadores, among whom were descendants of half-converted Jews, the Tribunal of the Holy Inquisition, established in Santo Domingo, delegated Martín de Valencia. He was to stamp out all superstitious practices and any heresy that arose among the Spaniards and to punish natives who fell back into idolatry or into shameful sins. After some time and various changes, on Nov. 4, 1571, a tribunal with all powers was established in Mexico City. By 1575 the native peoples were exempt from its jurisdiction. During its first century of operation the Inquisition prevented Judaism or Islam from taking root, resisted the habit of blasphemy and pseudomystical aberrations, and averted the entrance of Protestantism. With a strong hand it suppressed bigamy among Christians and the scandalous conduct of some priests. At the end of the 17th century it began to decline and almost confined its activities to the task of preventing censored books from entering the country. During the 296 years it functioned in Mexico, the Inquisition turned over to the secular authority for capital punishment 43 guilty persons. The rest were imprisoned for a time.

Education. The bishops and religious of New Spain established schools in the new villages. In the shadow of the first cathedrals, monasteries, and churches, elementary education was given, and the arts and trades brought over from Spain were taught. All were admitted free of charge, with no distinction of caste or race. Pedro de Gante had more than a thousand native students in his school. The first Franciscans, with the approval of the viceroy and bishop, tried to prepare the sons of the native chiefs even for Holy Orders in the famous college of Santa Cruz de Tlaltelolco (1536), but the efforts were premature. Many centers of learning opened in the 16th century. Mexico had a university in 1553. Printing was introduced by the Church. In 1539, the first book known to have been published in the New World, the Breve y más compendiosa doctrina Christiana en lengua Mexicana y Castellana, appeared. It is not improbable that many others were published before this. Books on dogma and asceticism and on theoretic and applied science, especially grammars and vocabularies in the native languages, came off the presses by the hundreds.

Work of the Jesuits. The coming of the Society of Jesus in 1572 brought great benefits. During the two centuries they worked in Mexico, until they were expelled in 1767, the Jesuits founded 25 colleges, 11 seminaries, and six houses for priests and extended their missions throughout the northeast of the country (Sinaloa, 1591; Tepehuanes, 1596; Pimería, 1687; Lower California, 1697). Famous among the missionaries were TAPIA, KINO, SALVATIERRA, and PFEFFERKORN. The Creoles received their education from the Jesuits during those two centuries. From this resulted many vocations for the secular clergy, which made it possible to transfer to them the parishes, conducted by religious during the 16th century. These transfers were made not without disturbance and bitter feelings. The rigid attitude of the bishop of Puebla, PALAFOX, caused rancor, and he went to the extreme in clashing with the Jesuits. Early Jesuit historians were Pérez de Rivas, Florencia, and Alegre.

17th-century Mexican Society. Many monasteries of other religious orders, Mercedarians, Carmelites, those of St. Hippolitus, etc., fostered Catholic life among the descendants of the Spaniards. By the middle of the century the central section of the country was Christian. Churches and monasteries abounded; in towns and haciendas and ranches Christian life flourished, and if some vestige of paganism persisted among the native Mexicans incorporated into the civilized world, it was not tolerated in public. Spanish culture thrived, especially in Mexico City. Among the most notable representatives were Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1651–95), the learned priest Carlos de Sigüenza y Góngora (1645-1700), and the talented playwright Juan Ruiz de Alarcón. Famous painters also plied their art, such as Baltasar de Echave, Luis and José Juárez, and Miguel Cabrera. Along the coasts and in the mountainous regions of the north and south, the spread of Christianity was slow and difficult. Because of the lack of statistics, it is impossible to give the number of Catholics in New Spain at the start of the 18th century. There were eight immense dioceses with their prelates, cathedral chapters, and seminaries; innumerable parishes; monasteries; Catholic colleges, hospitals, and charitable institutions. The native Mexicans numbered scarcely 3 million; the Spaniards reached 1 million; and the castes (or persons of mixed blood), another million. Since Catholicism was the official religion and the only one acceptable, all were Catholics, although not equally educated in the faith.

Effects of the 18th Century in New Spain. The decline of Spain, already far advanced in the reign of Charles II (1665–1700) and made worse by his death, which brought on the War of the Spanish Succession, halted almost completely the progress of Catholicism in New Spain. Greater evils were brought on by the regalistic government of the ministers of Charles III (1759–88), who in 1767 expelled the members of the Society of Jesus, bringing ruin to their missions, colleges, and apostolate. The Jesuits were, so said the viceroy in charge of their expulsion, the object of blind devotion on the part of all the inhabitants who rose in protest against the expulsion. The Oratorians, Dominicans, and Franciscans also suffered in having to take over the work of the Jesuits at a time when vocations were not plentiful. Anticlerical and anti-Catholic movements of the ENLIGHTENMENT. then in vogue in France and in Spain, weakened the faith of the educated classes. The missions were falling in ruins. Peace and social quiet were disturbed by the news of U.S. independence and by reports of the French Revolution.

Weakening of Church Discipline. Those same ministers of Charles III supporting the anticlerical and anti-Roman tendencies then prevalent used the Patronato Real and the concordat, recently held by the king with the Holy See, to place in episcopal sees and in key positions of the Church persons completely subordinate to political interests. The Inquisition, which had lost much of its former zeal, degenerated into an instrument of political suppression. Among the upper classes the anti-Christian Enlightenment unsettled the basic Catholicism, which had been typical of the Creole society. From the end of the 18th century vocations decreased in number and quality, and monasteries declined. Among both the religious and secular clergy more and more individuals lacked apostolic zeal and the basic Christian virtues. The authority of the Church was undermined in many of its representatives.

Educational Influence of the Enlightenment. When Baron Alexander von Humboldt visited New Spain on his expedition of 1799 to 1804, he was agreeably surprised at the economic, cultural, and artistic progress, which was steadily approaching the level of that of the mother country. Because of the efforts of the learned priest CASTORENA Y URSÚA, Mexico had a newspaper, which printed the political and cultural news from Europe. The university still flourished and had made great progress in the natural sciences and in mathematics. The erudite José Antonio Alzate published periodically information on the scientific progress in Europe and also worthwhile studies and observations of his own.

During those same years the canons of Mexico, Eguiara y Eguren and Beristáin, compiled and published excellent bibliographies, veritable catalogues of religious, theological, philosophical, linguistic, and scientific publications of the three centuries of New Spain. But theological and philosophical studies were at a low level; the expulsion of the Jesuits and the implacable opposition to their books and teaching had caused confusion among students. Yet the Jesuits had early introduced experimental sciences in Mexico and even some modern philosophical trends. Their expulsion contributed also to a weakening of the traditional love for the Spanish crown, since many of the exiled belonged to the most Christian Creole families. The opposition between the Creoles and the Spaniards born on the Peninsula increased. Humboldt said it was very marked. The government of Charles IV (1788–1808) was discredited even more by the blunders and venality of certain governors sent to Mexico and by the law through which the Crown expropriated the capital of charitable institutions. This brought harm and failure to the farmer and to the Creole businessman.

Napoleonic Period and the Mexican Revolt. In such circumstances it is not at all surprising that the agitation in Spain caused by the invasion of Napoleon and the upheaval in all of Spanish living from 1808 to 1814 should have had repercussions in the American dominions and especially in Mexico. The news of the insurrection of Aranjuez and of the renunciations in Bayonne disturbed the inhabitants of New Spain. In the capital two opposing groups were formed: one side was for autonomy and wanted the viceroy, assisted by a junta of representatives, to take over all power; the other side, completely dedicated to the interests of the Peninsulars, imprisoned the viceroy and appointed an old soldier, Garibay, to hold command until the central Spanish junta named a new viceroy. The first one chosen was the archbishop of Mexico, Lizan y Beaumont, who tried to ease the tension of souls, without however preventing the formation of juntas in different parts of the country to plan for independence. At the threat of capture of the plotters in Querétaro, the parish priest of Dolores, Miguel HIDAL-GO, resolved to start an armed rebellion, which took on the character of a religious and a class war with the slogans "Viva la Virgen de Guadalupe" and "Mueran los gachupines." This succeeded in arousing a large part of the working class of Bajío. The excesses perpetrated by this horde in Guanajuato, Valladolid, and Guadalajara caused a deep rift in the country between the insurgents, who feared that the government of Mexico would sacrifice the legitimate interests of the country and surrender to the French, and the people of law and order, who could not believe that authority should be compromised by the outrages and atrocities committed by the rebels in arms. These excesses justified the position taken by the religious authorities of Valladolid, Mexico City, Puebla, and Guadalajara, who excommunicated the leaders, guilty of taking prisoners and mistreating persons consecrated to God.

The number of priests and religious who took an active part in the prolonged war for independence (1810-21) has been greatly exaggerated. Of the 7,000 clerics and religious in New Spain, only 161 have been verified as revolutionaries; of those, 37 were shot. Especially in the first years of the war, 1808 to 1815, cruelty was widespread and the excesses and outrages defiled the army of insurgents as well as those who tried in the name of government to suppress the rebellion. From the time when the parish priest Morelos, the genial guerrila, was shot until the rebellion of 1821, the insurgents were reduced to bands of guerrillas in the mountains and along the coast. When Mexico learned of a new rebellion in Spain under the leadership of Riego and that Ferdinand VII was forced to promulgate the Constitution of the Cortes of Cádiz, condemned by the Church, Agustín de Iturbide, a general in the service of the viceroy, and Vicente Guerrero proposed their Plan of Iguala. This gained the support of almost all the military leaders, even those of the insurgents in arms, and the approval of the entire country. On Sept. 27, 1821, the army, called the Army of the Three Guarantees, proclaiming as the basis of Mexican independence religion, union, and independence, entered the capital in triumph. On the following day the independence of Mexico was solemnly proclaimed. The crown of the new kingdom was offered to an Infante of the House of Bourbon, and Iturbide meanwhile presided over a body of regents. Although the Catholic religion was proclaimed as official, the Church had ended the secular rule of the Patronato through which the Spanish crown had supported the work of evangelizing, educating, and doing good works, with an enormous outlay of money and with constant protection. A most grave problem, therefore, confronted the hierarchy of the Church and the government of the new nation.

MEXICO (MODERN), THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Divided into 31 separate states, the federation formally known as the United Mexican States is bordered on the north by the United States, on the west by the North Pacific Ocean, on the east by the Gulf of Mexico, and on the south by Guatemala and Belize. Vast areas in the arid north and the tropical south are thinly populated, while the rest of the terrain ranges from high, rugged volcanic mountains in the central region dropping to low plains at the coastlines. Tsunamis are frequent in the Pacific region, while hurricanes present a regular threat near the Gulf of Mexico and along the eastern coastline. Natural resources include petroleum, silver, copper, gold, lead, zinc, and natural gas. Agricultural products consist of corn, wheat, soybeans, rice, beans, cotton, coffee, fruit, and livestock and dairy, and the illegal cultivation of the opium poppy and cannabis are common. The majority of the Mexican people are of mixed Spanish and Amerindian descent, but a large percentage of the population in the south is pure Amerindian. The following essays discuss the history of the Catholic Church in Mexico from the establishment of independence (1821) to the present. For discussion of the church in Mexico prior to 1821, see the entry on colonial Mexico above.

The Independent Church. For three centuries the Catholic Church in New Spain had been in close union with the Spanish crown. The invasion of Napoleon and the upheaval in all the Spanish colonies from 1808 to 1814 would sever this relationship. In the aftermath of the sometimes brutal fight for independence that began in 1810, the Church struggled to adapt itself to the independent life of Mexico, trying to preserve its autonomy without breaking its ties with the government. While Catholicism became the state religion when independence was proclaimed in 1821, the financial support formerly gained through the PATRONATO REAL was now lost. During the first 40 years after independence, the Church was forced to weather a succession of similar crises. After the War of Reform and the Empire (1857–67) the Church strove to survive in an atmosphere of hostile separation from the state, mitigated somewhat by the conciliatory policies of Porfirio DíAZ. Social problems and political unrest brought the social revolution (1911-20) and a new constitution (1917). Both were openly hostile to the Church, which resisted the efforts of President CALLES to exterminate it. After years of persecuting the Church, the government finally began to practice tolerance toward it.

Problems of Independence. On Sept. 28, 1821, the Act of Independence of the Mexican Empire was signed. Despite the poverty and the destruction left following over a decade of war, the Three Guarantees proclaimed by the newly established Mexican regime—religion, union, and independence—restored hopes of peace and stability. The Catholic religion was preserved; the barriers of caste were declared abolished; and the ties that bound the region to Spain were broken. The territory of the new empire was most extensive; the illusion was created of vast territories, of political and social unity, and religious peace. However, in the decades that followed the country endured five constitutions, two emperors, 51 presidents, and wars with Texas, France, and the United States. By 1867 Mexicans were more profoundly divided among themselves than in 1821.

Scarcity of Priests. At independence Mexico was homogeneously Catholic and the Church was credited with fashioning the Mexican character. The population in 1810 was estimated at 6,121,426, of which more than half were Amerindians. Over 4,200 clerics, 3,000 religious, and 2,000 nuns tended to these faithful. The War of Independence caused the number of priests and religious to decrease; seminaries were closed; missionary reinforcements from Europe were discontinued; and the war claimed many of the faithful. Three dioceses, Michoacán, Linares, and Chiapas, were without bishops. Only the young archbishop of Mexico City and six other prelates remained active.

In spite of the Three Guarantees, serious problems immediately presented themselves: the exercise of the patronato real; the disposition of property used by the Church under grant from the crown; the collection and use of tithes; and the support of hospitals, charitable organizations, and educational institutions, which had already begun to deteriorate. The bishops and their advisers took the position that the patronato had ceased with the declaration of independence, that the Church was also completely independent, and that the new nation, rooted in Catholicism, should sustain the juridic and economic position of the Church. Opposed to this interpretation were many politicians who supported radical regalism: the new state had the rights and the obligations of the patronato. Under Iturbide these issues remained unsettled. While in 1822 canon Pablo VÁZQUEZ was appointed to go to Rome to reach an agreement with the Holy See, he was given no clear instructions.

As time passed matters grew worse. The archbishop of Mexico and the bishop of Oaxaca, alarmed at the grave problems in conscience that the independence of the king created, returned to Spain. Other bishops died: the bishop of Guadalajara in 1824; the bishops of Sonora and Durango in 1825; the bishop of Yucatán in 1827; and lastly, the bishop of Puebla in 1829. Moreover, by 1831, 93 of the 181 prebends of the cathedral chapters were vacant; the number of clergy had decreased from 4,229 to 2,282; of 208 convents only 155 remained, with some 1,700 religious instead of 3,112, Replacements were not numerous enough for those who died and those who returned to Spain. The Jesuits, reestablished by the pope in 1814 and by the king of Spain in 1815, had not as yet reached a stable condition, and the few members it had in Mexico were scattered and unorganized.

Role of Masonry. One threat to the Church came from the Masonic lodges, which multiplied during the War of Independence and became political clubs following independence. U.S. ambassador Poinsett introduced the York rite to counteract the Spanish influence of the Scottish rite. Rare was the active politician who was not a Mason, and many priests were members. While the condemnation of the Church was not stressed, since all Mexicans were said to be Catholics, Masonic organizations did foster anticlericalism.

Reestablishment of Hierarchy. In 1830 Vázquez received instructions to negotiate with the Holy See in regard to the nomination of bishops. PIUS VIII, fearing to offend the king of Spain, appointed only apostolic vicars with episcopal character; providentially for Mexico Pius VIII died in 1830 and his successor, GREGORY XVI (1831–46) named six bishops for Mexico, among them was the canon Vázquez. Thus the ecclesiastical hierarchy was renewed in Mexico. Only Mexico City and Oaxaca remained without prelates, out of regard to their bishops, who were residing in Spain. In 1838 the Holy See succeeded in obtaining their resignations and appointed new prelates for both dioceses.

Temporary president Valentín Gómez Farías began a juridical persecution of the Church under the pretext of reforming it. In addition to attempting to use the patronato to intervene directly in the government of the dioceses, he tried to suppress religious vows so that monasteries would be deserted; he tried also to do away with the civil exaction of the tithes, to appropriate the funds of the missions of the Philippine Islands and of California, to secularize these last missions, and to take education out of the hands of the clergy by closing the university and the Colegio de Santos. However, Gómez was quickly overthrown by Santa Anna, and the new bishops, in spite of the political upheavals, local persecutions, and the impossibility of trying to reform the religious orders, began to restore their dioceses and seminaries, to increase the number of clergy. From 2,282 in 1831, the number of priests rose to 3,232 in 1851. From 1834 to 1856 the government allowed the Jesuits to reestablish themselves; Basilio ARRILLAGA was an outstanding apologist for the Society of Jesus during those difficult years.

Recognition by the Papacy. The problem of Church-State relations approached resolution when the patronato was replaced by a concordat. In 1836 GREGORY XVI recognized the independence of Mexico and received as extraordinary minister and plenipotentiary Manuel Diez de Bonilla. PIUS IX named the first apostolic delegate, Luigi Clementi, who arrived in Mexico City in November of 1851. The archbishop of Mexico, De la Garza, influenced by the opinion of canonists who tended toward regalism, did not want to acknowledge him unless the government did. President Arista did not dare because of opposition in the chamber of deputies. His successor, Lombardini, submitted the matter to the senate, which, with certain reservations, agreed to allow the delegate to exercise his pontifical mission in Mexico. The subsequent War of Reform hindered effective action, and the delegate was expelled by Benito Juárez in 1861.

The 1847 war with the United States made Mexico unable to put down the war of the castes in Yucatán, the invasions of the Apaches in the north, and other insurrections in the interior, as well as deal with the nation's economic problems. In 1853 the exiled and discredited Santa Anna was asked to return to head a centralist republic. Under a Catholic president, the Church enjoyed its share of the Guarantees, reestablished the Jesuits, and had complete freedom in Catholic worship. However, opposition to the Church would resurface by 1854.

Liberal Reforms. The revolution started by the Plan of Ayutla proclaimed that "liberal institutions alone suit the country to the exclusion of all others." Santa Anna was forced into exile and the liberals took over the government. They convoked a constitutional congress that passed various laws, known by the names of the ministers who introduced them: the Ley Juárez, which suppressed ecclesiastical privileges; the Ley Iglesias, which prohibited payment for parochial services; and the Ley Lerdo, which expropriated the lands of corporations and gave them to tenants or put them up for public sale.

War of Reform. The constitution of 1857 incorporated the essentials of these laws and separated Church from state. The bishops refused to respect the constitution, and many Catholics were convinced that the intention of the legislators was wicked. A brutal civil war broke out from 1855 to 1867, during which more than 11 priests were killed, many more were tortured, and all the bishops and many others were banished. Some 40 churches were plundered and many more demolished, monasteries were torn down or broken through for streets, or used for profane purposes. Of the 11 conciliar seminaries, nine were confiscated, and the one in Puebla was sold. General González Ortega confiscated silver and artistic treasures from the Zacatecas parish and the cathedral of Durango, while Michel Blanco stole 100,000 pesos from the sanctuary of San Juan de los Lagos, and took all the wrought silver from the cathedral of Morelia.

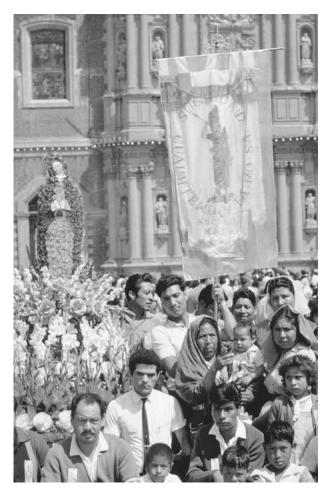

Such profanations and scandalous conduct stirred the ire of the people, and armed leaders arose throughout the country. Two irreconcilable groups were formed: the liberals, or chinacos, and the conservatives, or mochos. Liberal leaders attempted to introduce into Mexico a brand of politics that they copied from French radical liberals, and conservatives opposed this doctrine as a disruption of Mexican culture and a campaign against the Church.

French Intervention. The War of Reform (1857–62) was prolonged by victorious liberals who challenged the expeditionary forces of Napoleon III of France. Some Mexicans put aside the confusion of interests and, notwithstanding their profound Catholic faith, fought against the invaders. The situation was very complicated. From the beginning of the war the liberals applied to the United States for moral, economic, and even military help. Some of the conservatives thought the only hope of salvation was a monarchy and they supported Napoleon III. Empress Eugenie, profoundly Catholic, favored them, and thought that France should oppose the conquest of a Protestant nation such as the United States and save the independence of Catholic Spanish America. Maximilian of Hapsburg, on condition that the Mexican people offer him the crown, joined this fantastic and grandiose project. Some Mexicans accepted him under the illusion that a strong Catholic, and therefore popular, monarch could save Mexico from national disintegration and from being absorbed by the Colossus of the North.

The government of Benito Juárez had expelled the first apostolic delegate, Bishop Clementi, and various bishops; it had discharged many government employees, who in conscience protested against the laws of persecution; it had deprived the Church of its goods without process of law and in a wasteful manner; it had proposed the MacLane-Ocampo treaty with the United States, which the Senate later rejected because it divided Mexico. So it was not surprising that, even though he came under the protection of French bayonets, many bishops welcomed the European prince.

The delusion did not last long. The policy of Maximilian was a mixture of French liberalism and Austrian Josephinism and was in certain aspects a continuation of liberal persecution. Nevertheless, during these few years of comparative peace the Church was able to recover its strength and erect two new ecclesiastical provinces, Guadalajara and Michoacán, as well as establish several new dioceses.

Establishment of Liberal Government. The liberals, aided by the United States, forced the withdrawal of French troops, took control of the country, and in 1867 captured Maximilian in Querétaro, executing him along with two of his generals. With liberal general Porfirio Díaz's conquest of Puebla and Mexico City, the last conservative strongholds were gone. President Juárez reestablished the republic and, under the pretext of defending liberty, closed the monasteries, churches, educational institutions, and charitable organizations, opening the country to Protestants.

Other anti-Catholic measures were drawn from the constitution, including the suppression of religious instruction in state schools and the prohibition of religious corporations from possessing property other than buildings of worship. Juárez's successor, Sebastián Lerdo de Tejada, increased his predecessor's influences: complete freedom of worship was established; marriage was declared a mere civil contract; religious institutions were forbidden to acquire property or money coming from it; the religious oath in civil acts was abolished; and it was decreed that the State "will not allow any contract, pact or agreement which has as its object any diminution or loss, by irrevocable sacrifice, of human liberty, be it because of labor, education, or religious vow, and in consequence the Law cannot recognize monastic orders nor permit their establishment." These laws prohibited religious instruction and the practice of any worship in government buildings. Ministers were not allowed to wear anything distinctive in public.

Enforcement of Religious Reform. In a Catholic country such measures were either not complied with or were a source of constant infractions. During the presidencies of Juárez and Lerdo de Tejada attempts at enforcement were made and many were imprisoned. Lerdo banished from the country the Sisters of Charity, Jesuits, Passionists, and Paulists. During those years the Church lost almost all her imposing buildings, which had served as seminaries, colleges, religious houses, or charitable institutions. Almost all the libraries were taken by the government or destroyed. The Church passed through a time of anguish, as did the entire nation, impoverished by wars and discredited before the civilized world. The public treasury was bankrupt, backwardness and poverty were general, and divisions and grudges among the liberal leaders were implacable.

Age of Porfirio Díaz. It is not surprising that the country acclaimed Porfirio Díaz when he turned the nation onto a course of order and peace. Many of his political enemies submitted, and the law was repealed that prohibited a reelection of a president, thus making possible the "era of Porfirio," the personal reign of Díaz through six successive reelections as president, until the revolution in 1911 overthrew him. Peace was imposed, indeed by an iron hand, but gratefully accepted by an impoverished nation. Mexico became more prosperous and wealthy than all Spanish America, and the new national unity put an end to the centrifugal tendencies of many states. While Díaz was sincerely dedicated to the welfare of Mexico, he showed some lack of culture, of vision, and even of loyalty. He tended toward Machiavellism in governing, and lacked strength to change laws he considered utopian. His tolerance of many illegal manifestations of Catholic life was termed "conciliatory."

This "Porfirian peace" was beneficial to the Church: Catholic worship and practices were held not only in churches and homes, but often also on ranches, in camps, and in towns. Catholic schools and institutions multiplied. Bishops returned from exile to govern their dioceses and were respected by all. The dictator himself intervened when it was necessary to calm radical governors. Seminaries were reopened and ecclesiastical provinces were increased: Oaxaca, Durango, Linares-

Monterrey, Yucatán, and Puebla. New dioceses were established: Tabasco, Colima, Sinaloa, Cuernavaca, Chihuahua, Saltillo, Tehuantepec, Tepic, Campeche, Aguascalientes, and Huajuapan de León, or Mistecas. There were many religious institutes, such as those of the reorganized Jesuits, who increased from 39 scattered members in 1878 to 338 in 1910, and those of religious who came for the first time: the Marist fathers and brothers, the Salesians, the Cordian-Marians, the Redemptorists, and the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

Religious congregations were also founded in Mexico: the Josephites, the Missionaries of the Holy Spirit, the Guadalupans, the Servants of the Sacred Heart, the Servants of the Divine Shepherd, and others whose efforts in education raised the level of culture and of Christian living. Prominent figures among the Mexican clergy during those years were the archbishop of Mexico City LABASTIDA Y DÁVALOS, who prudently directed the entire renewal, and his two successors, Alarcón and MORA Y DEL RÍO; the first archbishop of Puebla, Ibarra; and Silva of Morelia. Catholics notable for their writings were García Icazbalceta, the untiring publicist Victoriano Agüeros, and the aggressive journalist Sánchez Santos.

The War of Reform and its consequences left deep wounds. Secularism not only dominated civil life but influenced all social life. While the government did not tolerate the mention of God in any official act, it did allow many pseudo-cultural expressions that were openly hostile to the Church. Official instruction disregarded the constitutional neutrality of education but openly defended antireligious Positivism, which little by little won over many professors and intellectuals and also hundreds of students and professional men.

The Mexican Revolution. When General Díaz fell from power in 1911, the political freedom that followed allowed the Church to reorganize and negotiate for the recovery of some of their lost rights. The National Catholic party, with a membership of hundreds of thousands, would have had a majority in the legislature had there been a free election. The National Federation of Workers, the Knights of Columbus, the A.C.J.M., and the Asociación Nacional de Padres de Familia were founded. When liberal president Francisco Madero was assassinated in 1913 a revolution broke out again. The old animosity against the Church appeared with greater vehemence than ever before, partly because of the persistent and slanderous rumor that it had supported the usurpation of Victori-ano Huerta in February 1913. In reprisal, churches and religious buildings were seized, sacrileges were committed, and priests and nuns were molested.

Constitution of 1917. The constitution of Querétaro, promulgated on Feb. 5, 1917 by the revolutionary minority, gave concrete expression to the attack on the Church: LAICISM was obligatory in primary education, and priests were prohibited from conducting schools; seminary studies were not recognized by the state; any religious act was forbidden outside the church; all religious organizations were forbidden to own property; all buildings that housed institutions dependent on the Church were declared the property of the state; priests lost political rights and the exercise of citizenship; the states were given the right to limit the number of priests; and the Catholic press and all confessional political parties associated with churches were suppressed. In the persecution that followed most bishops were forced to leave the country, many priests went into hiding or into exile, and hundreds of Catholic schools were closed. President Carranza (1917–20) understood that the radical constitution was fanatical and even tried to change it, but his successor, Álvaro Obregón (1920–24), again unleashed hostile forces against the Church and expelled apostolic delegate Bishop Filippi.

Persecution under Calles. The anticlerical actions of president Plutarco Elías Calles (1924–28) were spurred on by Protestant and liberal forces and even by foreign capitalists. In addition to enforcing the constitution, he supported two fallen priests in establishing a schismatic Mexican Church. As Protestants gained ground, the Catholics organized the Liga de Defensa de la Libertad Religiosa, which made use of bold propaganda, legal protests, and boycotts.

Calles, furious at the opposition, started the most bloody persecution Mexican Catholics had ever suffered. By the Ley Calles of July 1926, foreign priests and many bishops were banished. Priests and religious were imprisoned, and all Catholic schools and other organizations were suppressed.

In response, the bishops ordered priests to suspend religious services in churches. Discontent rose like an irresistible tide. Calles tried to crush all resistance; repeated outrages were never punished by the bailiffs. Catholics, who saw no other remedy for defending their rights, also took up arms as los Cristeros and caused the government serious trouble. The government unjustly accused Catholics of taking part in the revolt and ordered many killed, among them Father Miguel PRO.

Truce between Church and State. The intolerable situation, complicated by political issues, was made worse by the assassination of president-elect Obregón. Interim president Portes Gil negotiated with Morelian archbishop RUIZ Y FLORES, who was also the apostolic delegate. On June 22, 1929, the president published a declaration that the government would not interfere in the internal affairs of the Church, and while the registration of priests would continue, it did not mean that the government would make ecclesiastical appointments. Encouraged by this apparent good will and fearful lest the people lose their faith if divine services were not resumed, the bishops ordered Mexico's churches to be reopened. While most welcomed the religious peace, Catholics whose lives and fortunes had been in jeopardy believed the government was deceiving the bishops, especially after a subsequent massacre of the Cristeros.

Revival of Persecution. The forces hostile to the Church did not withdraw. Renewed anticlerical fury broke loose during the celebration of the fourth centenary of the apparitions of Our Lady of Guadalupe, on Dec. 12, 1931, and sanctions were levied against all public employees who took part in the celebrations. Absurd restrictions were placed on numbers of priests: i.e., for the Federal District, with more than a million inhabitants, only 25 priests were permitted; for Tabasco, with more than 200,000 inhabitants, only one priest. Actually, the law was not complied with, and many priests continued to function without being authorized; others sought legal subterfuges.

Much more dangerous was the cunning persecution begun by President Lázaro Cárdenas, who came to power in December 1934. Following his orders that all schools teach socialism, Marxism, atheism, and sexual education, public indignation rose throughout Mexico. While at first the bloody regime of Calles seemed about to be repeated, it was soon apparent that these unpopular decrees could not be enforced, and the government changed the ministry. Although the persecution slackened, no seminary was left unmolested. When almost all seminaries had been closed, U.S. bishops offered their help, and in September 1937 the Seminario Nacional Pontificio, for candidates who could not be educated in Mexico, was opened in Montezuma, New Mexico.

In April 1937 PIUS XI addressed an apostolic letter to Mexico in which he asked Mexican Catholics to organize peacefully, promote Catholic Action, and keep the faith intact. The pope acknowledged the legitimacy of armed revolt in certain cases but added that the Church must never engage in it.

In this sad struggle the archbishops of Mexico City, Díaz and Martínez, and Orozco of Guadalajara stood out prominently. Amid such continuous turmoil the Church was unable to effectively educate the youth and to preach the social doctrine of the Church. Little could be done for Mexico's indigenous peoples and for laboring classes because circumstances forced the clergy to attend primarily to urgent pastoral duties: conducting divine services and catechizing.

Postwar Development. After the Second World War, the relationship between the Catholic Church and the Mexican presidency became less strained, and though anti-clerical legislation remained in effect, it was not generally enforced. Beginning with the presidency Manuel Avila Camacho (1940–46), a modus vivendi gradually emerged that brought Catholics into the mainstream of Mexican political life and gained for the Church greater freedom. Although new disputes arose during the presidency of López Mateos (1958–64), they never generated the animosity, repression, and violence that characterized Church-state relations before 1940.

In 1953 the Mexican Episcopal Conference (CEM) was founded in response to Pope PIUS XII's request for a structure that would enable the hierarchy to coordinate their efforts in the spiritual and political spheres. After the second VATICAN COUNCIL, the conference was reorganized and strengthened. Including all bishops, even retired bishops who had a voice but no vote, the CEM meets twice a year, its main executive body the 21member Permanent Council. Members of the Permanent Council include representatives of the 15 pastoral regions into which the country is divided. The work of the conference and the Permanent Council was to include issues relating to doctrines of faith, Church personnel and hierarchy, and pastoral ministries to youth, family, indigenous peoples, migrants, and refugees. Initially, the Mexican episcopal conference did not attempt to strongly intervene in pastoral, social, or political affairs. However, in 1971, the Synod of Bishops in Rome published a report called "Justice in Mexico" faulting Church leaders for not doing more to address social and economic injustice. The CEM subsequently gave social issues a higher priority.

The low profile of the CEM and the Church hierarchy in socio-economic affairs notwithstanding, many of the non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that took the lead in Mexican development were motivated by the papal social teachings and the Medellín-inspired emphasis on a preferential option for the poor. During the 1950s and 1960s, the Secretariado Social Mexicano guided the Church toward ethical and moral requirements of social justice and focused attention on programs and organizations capable of supporting development. The secretariat inspired a range of programs throughout the country under Church auspices, including cooperatives, credit unions, food distribution centers, and health clinics. Although Christian base communities never achieved the large numbers they had in Central and South American countries, NGOs backing them proliferated in Jalisco, in Ciudad Netzahualcoyotl on the outskirts of Mexico City, in Morelos, and in Vera Cruz.

Under the leadership of Austrian-born Ivan Illich, the Centro Intercutural de Documentación (CIDOC) in Cuernavaca became a think-tank for social, developmental, and educational issues. Illich, who had earned a Ph.D. in philosophy at the University of Salzburg, served as a parish priest in New York City before becoming vice president of the University of Santa Maria in Ponce, Puerto Rico from 1956 to 1960. In 1961 he joined CIDOC as a researcher, became president of the board in 1963, and continued as a member until 1978. Under Illich's direction, CIDOC made an impact on social thinking not only in Mexico, but throughout the hemisphere. As the U.S. Church looked south and began to send missionaries to Latin America in increasing numbers, the Center offered language courses and at the same time forced missionaries to examine the assumptions they were bringing to their ministry.

Meanwhile, popular education programs, inspired by Brazilian educator Paulo Freire spawned a variety of Church-related NGOs. The NGOs embarked on programs of conscientización that through a broad range of activities, such as literacy and adult education, health clinics, self-help housing, and micro-enterprise production, sought to raise the social consciousness of the people. To some extent these early NGOs were limited by their dependence on external sources of support. At the same time, more independent organizations, closely aligned with poor people united through social movement and producers associations, took a more militant stance. The national coordinating bodies of producers' associations played an important role in the 1970s and early 1980s. Gradually, Church-promoted social organizations allied with them.

Liberation Theology. Also in response to the plight of the poor in Mexico, a few dioceses encouraged the creation of communidades eclesiales de base (BASIC CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES, or CEBs) and a few centers in Mexico studied LIBERATION THEOLOGY. The CEBs, small discussion and worship groups common throughout Latin America led usually by laity, catechists, or sisters, provided an occasion especially for the very poor to discuss the New Testament in light of their own experience. The CEBs were generally influenced by the themes and methods of liberation theology. By reading the Bible in light of contemporary reality, members of base communities had their consciousness raised about the structures of injustice and oppression at the root of poverty.

One of the few members of the hierarchy who openly promoted liberation theology was Sergio Méndez Arceo (d. 1992), bishop of Cuernavaca until his retirement in 1982 at the age of 75. Called the "red bishop," because of his Marxist sympathies, Méndez Arceo was reprimanded by the episcopal conference and the Vatican for his outspoken positions. He defended Fidel Castro, supported the Sandinistas in Nicaragua, demanded that the inequities in Mexico's socio-economic order be addressed, and denounced U.S. imperialism.

Several research centers in Mexico City also studied liberationist themes, among them the Centro de Relección Teológica and the Centro de Derechos Humanos M.A, the last co-sponsored by the Jesuits and the Centro de Estudios Dominicanos, Another center, under lay control, was the Centro Antonio de Montecinos. These centers utilized the approach of liberation theology to analyze the socio-economic and moral causes of poverty and injustice.

While liberation theology and base communities were often the focus in discussions of the contemporary Latin American Church during the 1970s and 1980s, the well-organized conservative side of Catholicism remained a power to contend with. OPUS DEI, with its highly centralized structure, exercised considerable influence on and through the laity, especially those of means and advanced education. The Legionarios de Cristo, founded in Mexico in 1941, remained a conservative and influential congregation that attracted many vocations and sent missionaries abroad, staffing parishes in the United States and Europe. By the 1990s liberation theology had been replaced by "Indian theology," which was also held to have Marxist roots. Indian theology, which attempted to address the wrongs done to native peoples during the colonial era, by admitting the role of the Church in oppressing, robbing, and exterminating indigenous tribes in the Americas and elsewhere, was of concern to both the pope and others; among its major proponents in Mexico was Father Eleazar Lopez Martinez, of Mexico's Center for Support to Indian Missions.

Modernization of the Mexican State. Carlos Gortari Salinas was elected president of Mexico in 1988. Salinas moved rapidly to consolidate his position as president and embark on what he called the "modernization of the Mexican state." Salinas' strategy of modernization meant initiating an overall economic policy that broke with tenets of the Mexican revolution, most notably issues of land ownership. Putting Mexico more in synchronization with the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and the package of neo-liberal economic adjustment policies meant the privatization of many state enterprises and a dramatic shift in Mexican agrarian policy on ejidal or communal land ownership and resale. The border industrialization program was a preface to wholehearted embracing of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), with many poor Mexicans asked to make a huge leap of faith that the benefits of these economic adjustment strategies would somehow trickle down to improve the lot of the poor.

Salinas' modernization strategy included a shift in Church-state relations. Early in his electoral campaign, Salinas often met with bishops, and after his election delegates of the CEM regularly discussed issues of mutual concern with the president, as did the papal nuncio. President Salinas broke with Mexican precedent by inviting the archbishop of Mexico City, the papal nuncio, and the CEM president to his first presidential address. In February 1990, Salinas named a personal envoy to the Vatican and cooperated in preparations for Pope John Paul II's second visit to Mexico, welcoming him upon his arrival at the airport. The bishops, mindful that Salinas had spoken in his inaugural address about improving relations with the Church as part of his plan for modernizing the Mexican state, began, through the CEM, to search out ways to recover religious freedom. Anticlerical articles of the Mexican Constitution were revised by presidential decree on Jan. 28, 1992. Through these changes, churches were recognized as legal entities and permitted to own property. Foreign clergy and ministers were allowed in the country, and Mexican clerics were granted the right to vote, to criticize the government, and were exempted from taxes.

Papal Visits. In mid-1991, Salinas visited the Vatican, and on Nov. 1, 1991 he announced his plan to normalize relations with the Church. Pope John Paul's three visits to Mexico and Salinas' visit to the Vatican added up to a resumption of ties, with formal representation of Mexico to the Vatican State, and constitutional changes affecting the Church within Mexico.

The change in the reception given the pope on his four visits to Mexico reflected the transformation of Church-state relations. During his first visit in January 1979, President López Portillo claimed to have met him by chance and offered only a hasty handshake and a few perfunctory words of welcome at the airport. The pope's second visit was in 1990, to attend the Conference of Latin American Bishops at PUEBLA, near Mexico City. President Salinas, though acting in a "strictly personal" capacity, welcomed the pope at the airport and warmly praised him. Governors of the ten states where John Paul visited, taking their cue from the president, openly welcomed the pope.

John Paul II paid a third visit to Mexico in 1992 en route to the Conference of the Latin American Bishops at SANTO DOMINGO that commemorated the 500th anniversary of Columbus. The pope offered some solace for Mexicans involved in ministry to indigenous peoples. He asked pardon of the native population and the enslaved populations of the Americas for centuries of mistreatment and for attempts to force religious belief that in no way respected human dignity and freedom. In January 1999 the pope returned again, this time to promulgate the apostolic exhortation Ecclecia in America, which outlined the challenges facing the Church in the Americas. All four visits of the pope drew enormous crowds and demonstrated his enormous appeal to Mexican Catholics. The massive turn-outs convinced many, including government leaders, that the revolutionary legacy of hostility toward the Church had turned counterproductive.

Even before Salinas came to power, efforts on behalf of both the hierarchy and the government to improve relations gradually produced results. Although the constitution prohibited the Church from owning real estate, wealthy Catholics, associations, and corporations, acting as intermediaries, could purchase any property they wanted. The government provided assistance in the 1970s when ecclesiastical authorities constructed a new Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe. On May 6, 1990 during his second visit to Mexico, Pope John Paul II solemnized the beatification of JUAN DIEGO in the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe. On the same occasion John Paul marked the beatification of the child martyrs of TLAXCALA and of Jose Maria YERMO Y PARRES.

The final year of the Salinas presidency witnessed a series of troubling events in Mexico. The signing of the NAFTA agreement redefined the relationships among the three countries of North America; the presidential electoral campaign was one of the most hotly contested in history; a peasant rebellion broke out in the southern state of Chiapas; and Cardinal Posadas, archbishop of Guadalajara, and two other public figures were assassinated. One of the most troubling, the revolt in impoverished Chiapas that began in January 1994 brought the Church center stage during a major national crisis. Samuel Ruiz, bishop of the diocese of San Cristobal de las Casas for more than 25 years, mediated the dispute between the government and the mostly Amerindian Zapatista Army of National Liberation. Both the government and the hierarchy rallied behind Ruiz, one of the few persons acceptable to the rebel forces, and his efforts were acknowledged by the 1996 Raoul Follereau Prize for contributing to the cause of peace. Despite Ruiz's efforts, the violence continued into 2000, forcing thousands of Amerindians in the region to abandon their homes as Zapatista gunmen and paramilitary groups fought for support in the area. Ruiz stepped down as bishop in April, 2000, amid repeated threats against his safety and continuous acts of violence by those opposed to the Catholic Church in the region.

In 1996, during the presidency of Ernesto Zedillo, the nation found itself in an economic downturn, as inflation climbed and a recession began. Zedillo's economic remedies sparked vocal criticism in the form of a pastoral letter from Mexican bishops to which the government responded by attempting to limit the freedom of speech of the Church. A new law forbade Church leaders from making any statement about Mexico's "political or economic issues, or any other linked to the country's situation." Not surprisingly, there were strenuous objections to such a law as a violation of the constitutional separation of Church and state. According to Amendment 130 of the Mexican constitution, made in 1992, Church leaders were prohibited from holding public office, supporting political candidates, or taking any other action that would "invade the public sphere." In the unsettled region of Chiapas in particular, the government enforced its prohibition against clerical involvement in politics, expelling several foreign priests from the region in 2000.

Into the 21st Century. Despite the success of Protestant missionaries during the late 20th century, by 2000 four out of every five Mexicans identified themselves as Roman Catholic. There were 5,318 parishes, tended by 9,684 diocesan and 3,145 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 6,500 brothers and 26,600 sisters, many of whom taught at Mexico's 1,828 primary and 1,060 secondary Catholic schools. Many Amerindians, despite their Catholicism, continued to maintain some traditional beliefs and practices that predated the conquest; syncretistic religious, such as Catholic Mayans who practiced in Chiapas, were also common. Both mainstream Protestant churches and evangelical sects multiplied among the tribes in the highlands, as well as among the burgeoning urban populations of Mexico City and Guadalajara, and throughout the northern border area. Over half the people of Mexico attended church regularly.

As Mexico began to establish itself as a stable, economically viable country free from war, it began to confront issues common to many other modern nations through new legislation. The bishops were vigilant in their review of these new laws, recognizing themselves as a force for Christian traditions in a secular age. In 2000 a government bill promoting organ donation was greeted with approval by bishops, as long as the donor's free will was respected. However, laws passed by several of the Mexican states contravening the federal law banning abortion were viewed with concern as a sign of things to come. However, with the election of President Vincente Fox in 2000 Church leaders hoped for a closer relationship between the government and the Catholic Church. In May of that year Mexico City was the site of the largest outdoor Mass to be held in the country since 1924. Over 50,000 people were estimated to be in attendance.

MEY, GUSTAV

Pastoral theologian; b. Neukirch, Württemberg, July 2, 1822; d. Schwörzkirch, June 22, 1877. After studying philosophy and theology at Tübingen, he was ordained in 1847. He took up pastoral work at Schwörzkirch (Oberschwaben) in 1858. His principal writing is Vollständigen Katechesen für die untere Klasse der katholische Volksschule (Freiburgim-Breisgau 1871, many later eds.).

Three achievements mark Mey as one of the most important and controversial catechists of the 19th century. (1) In his Katechesen he introduced organically structured teaching units, and this started the transition to catechetics involving separate lessons. His "learning pieces," as he called them, represent a synthesis of the 'question-and-answer method'' based upon "Biblical catechesis" as taken in the sense of B. Overberg, J. Hirscher, B. Galura, and A. Gruber. This is manifested also in his published works insofar as he follows Hirscher and the scholastic tradition. (2) Having an extensive appreciation for the liturgy, Mey deems active participation in the Mass to be the guiding concept for establishing the whole liturgy. (3) On the basis of a vivid insight into the meaning of the historical character of revelation, he saw it as the function of the kerygmatic teacher in the present to strive to present the basic events in the divine economy of salvation in a manner in which they can be grasped as real events. According to Mey, the catechist must take a general view of every Biblical fact and seek to see its meaning and place in the plan for communicating and developing the work of salvation. This, according to Mey, is the procedure whereby a definite doctrinal aim is achieved and the teaching itself becomes truly fruitful for the advance of faith and the life that comes from faith. The Mey-Pichler Method is so called because it is the Mey method as developed by W. Pichler.

MEYENDORFF, JOHN

Theologian, historian, teacher, ecumenist, Orthodox churchman; b. Neuilly-sur-Seine, France, Feb. 17, 1926; d. Montreal, Canada, July 22, 1992. Son of Russian émigré parents of aristocratic Baltic German origin, Meyendorff was educated in France, completing his theological studies at the Orthodox academy of St. Serge in 1949 and his Doctorat-ès-Lettres at the Sorbonne in 1958, in which year he was also ordained to the priesthood. In 1959 he came to the United States with his wife Maria and their four young children to join the faculty of St. Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary as professor of Patristics and Church History. Soon after his arrival Meyendorff also became a senior fellow at Dumbarton Oaks, Harvard University's Byzantine research center in Washington, DC, where he later served briefly as acting director of Studies (1978). Beginning in 1967 he was also professor of Byzantine History at Fordham University. In 1984 he became dean of St. Vladimir's, a position that he held until his retirement. Like his predecessors in that position, Georges Florovsky and Alexander Schmemann, Meyendorff was instrumental in bringing the intellectual and cultural tradition of Russian émigré theology to the New World.

Publication in 1959 of his critical edition of the Triads of St. Gregory Palamas, the 14th century Byzantine hesychast theologian, and of his Introduction à l'étude de Grégoire Palamas (partial English translation, 1964) established Meyendorff's reputation as a leading Byzantinist and patristics scholar. His other works include: The Orthodox Church: Yesterday and Today (1963); Orthodoxy and Catholicity (1966); Christ in Eastern Christian Thought (1969); Byzantine Theology (1973); Marriage: An Orthodox Perspective (1975); Byzantium and the Rise of Russia (1980), which called attention to the role of hesychasm as a unifying cultural movement in late medieval eastern Europe; and Imperial Unity and Christian Divisions: The Church 450-680 A.D. (1989), which tried to correct a perceived imbalance in the historical presentation of relationships between East and West.

A churchman as well as a scholar, Meyendorff was an outspoken proponent of Orthodox unity in America, arguing that Orthodoxy's witness and indeed its most basic ecclesiological principles were being compromised by its jurisdictional fragmentation along ethnic lines. He played a major role in negotiations with the Russian Orthodox Church that led to its 1970 recognition of the autocephalous, or fully independent, status of the Orthodox Church in America (the OCA, until then known as the Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church in North America, or Metropolia). He also served as chairman of the OCA's Department of External Affairs and editor of its monthly newspaper, The Orthodox Church. In addition, he represented that church on the Central Committee of the World Council of Churches and also served as moderator of the Council's Faith and Order Commission (1967-76).

Meyendorff was the recipient of a number of academic and church honors. Indicative of the major changes sweeping the former Soviet Union, he was awarded the Order of St. Vladimir by Patriarch Aleksii II of Moscow in 1991.

[J. H. ERICKSON]

MEYER, ALBERT GREGORY

Cardinal; b. Milwaukee, Wisconsin, March 9, 1903; d. Chicago, Illinois, April 9, 1965. He was the fourth of five children of Peter James and Mathilda (Thelen) Meyer, who were of German Catholic ancestry. At 14 he entered St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, where he completed his secondary education and two years of college before being sent to Rome (1921) to study philosophy and theology at the Urban College of the Propaganda while residing at the American College. On July 11, 1926, he was ordained by Cardinal Basilio Pompilj. After taking the doctorate in theology in 1927, he became a student at the Pontifical Biblical Institute, where he received the licentiate degree and the certificate of a doctoral candidate in Sacred Scripture. Throughout his life he continued to deepen his knowledge of the Bible; he was later invited to translate the Epistles of St. JOHN for the edition of the New Testament published by the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine.

After he returned to his diocese in 1930, he served as assistant pastor of St. Joseph's parish, Waukesha; in the autumn of 1931 he was appointed to the faculty of St. Francis Seminary. He also ministered to a number of Italian families, for whom a mission chapel was soon erected. In 1937 he was appointed rector of the seminary by Abp. Samuel A. Stritch and the following year, was made a domestic prelate.

Early Episcopal Career. On Feb. 18, 1946, Meyer was appointed bishop of Superior, Wisconsin, and was consecrated in St. John's Cathedral, Milwaukee, by Abp. Moses Kiley on April 11. After Kiley's death, Meyer was promoted to the metropolitan See of Milwaukee on July 21, 1953, and was installed by the Apostolic Delegate, Amleto Cicognani.

Being methodical in his work, he developed a quiet but effective and very orderly system of administration on all levels. Although he did not abolish national parishes, in appointing priests he overcame the outmoded divisions based on descent, especially in the case of those of Slavic origin. He also fostered the growth of organizations for laymen such as the Serra Club, the Holy Name Society, the Archdiocesan Council of Catholic Men, and the Catholic Youth Organization; and he encouraged the work of the Catholic Church Extension Society, of which he automatically became a member of the board of governors. He was a member of the AMERICAN BOARD OF CATH-OLIC MISSIONS (from 1953) and served as president general (1956-57) of the NATIONAL CATHOLIC EDUCA-TIONAL ASSOCIATION. In 1956 he was elected by his colleagues in the hierarchy to the administrative board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and he assumed the chairmanship (1956–59) of the education department. He was also chairman of the ad hoc episcopal committee for the revision of the English version of the ritual (Collectio Rituum), which was published in 1961.

Cardinal Archbishop of Chicago. Meyer was chosen as archbishop of Chicago, Illinois, on Sept. 19, 1958, by PIUS XII. In the consistory of Dec. 14, 1959, he was created cardinal priest of the title of St. Cecilia by JOHN XXIII and was made a member of the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith, of Seminaries and Universities, and of the Fabric of St. Peter's. In January 1962 he was appointed to the Pontifical Commission for Biblical Studies, and in November 1963 he was added to the papal commission for the revision of the Code of Canon Law; a year later he was attached to the Supreme Congregation of the Holy Office, being one of the first two cardinals not resident in Rome ever to become members of that body. In June 1963 he took part in the conclave in which PAUL VI was elected.

For the education of the future priests of the archdiocese he built Quigley Preparatory Seminary South and opened a junior college division of the major seminary, St. Mary of the Lake, at Niles. In addition to his close attention to the temporal affairs of his archdiocese, Meyer put the greatest emphasis on his spiritual duties of teaching and sanctifying. He wrote learned and lengthy pastoral and other letters in which he demonstrated his intimate familiarity with the Bible and with papal pronouncements. The most distinguished of his Lenten pastorals was that of 1964, entitled "Ecumenism: The Spirit of Christian Unity." He fostered the revival of emphasis among Catholics on the Bible, urging his priests through clergy conferences and summer study weeks to bring their knowledge of the Sacred Scriptures up-to-date and to apply it to their own spiritual lives and to their pastoral ministry. He also wrote the preface to the Catholic edition of the New Testament of the Revised Standard Version (1965).

Vatican Council II. In October 1961 the cardinal was appointed by John XXIII a member of the Central Preparatory Commission for the Council, and he attended several meetings of that body in Rome. Before the council convened, he was appointed a member of the Secretariat de Concilii negotiis extra ordinem (for business not on the agenda); and when this body was abolished by Paul VI, he was appointed one of the 12 presidents of the council. When the original schema on the sources of revelation was rejected by the council, he was made a member of the special mixed commission that drafted a new schema, and he presided over the subcommittee for the chapter on the Old Testament.

In the first session (1962) he spoke twice on the liturgy, advocating the use of the vernacular in general not merely under the regulation of the episcopal conference but also at the discretion of the local bishop (6th gen. cong., Oct. 24) and particularly in the private recitation of the Divine Office for the sake of greater devotion (15th gen. cong., Nov. 9); he spoke also on the sources of revelation, demanding that a new schema be drafted in a positive spirit with due recognition of the contributions of contemporary exegetes in order to win the unanimous consent of the fathers (22d gen. cong., Nov. 19). In the second session (1963) he spoke twice on the Church, proving the collegiality of the APOSTLES and their successors from the New Testament (42d gen. cong., Oct. 7) and showing realistically that the ever-present sinfulness and weakness of the People of God meet forgiveness and strength in the house of the Father of mercies (52d gen. cong., Oct. 21). He addressed the session also on the subjects of national episcopal conferences, in the name of more than 120 bishops of the U.S. whose signatures he had personally solicited, in favor of a cautious, reserved position on the binding force of collective decisions (65th gen. cong., Nov. 12); and of ecumenism, praising the inclusion of the chapters on the Jews and religious liberty (71st gen. cong., Nov. 20).

In the third session (1964) he spoke on religious liberty in the name of the American bishops, arguing for the necessity of this declaration for a fruitful dialogue with non-Catholics and for a successful apostolate (86th gen.

cong., Sept. 23); on the Jews and non-Christians, recommending the restoration to the text of the strong parts that had been deleted, such as an explicit condemnation of all forms of anti-Semitism and the refutation of the charge of deicide (89th gen. cong., Sept. 28). He discoursed twice on divine revelation, presenting tradition in a broad sense as something living and dynamic, subject to limits and defects, and therefore needful of being reformed in the light of the Scriptures (91st gen. cong., Sept. 30), and describing inspiration in terms of the Word of God as a personal communication to men (94th gen. cong., Oct. 5). He spoke also on the life and ministry of priests, criticizing the schema (which was afterward sent back to the responsible commission for complete revision) for its unbecoming brevity, incompleteness, lack of balance, and obscurity of purpose (100th gen. cong., Oct.13); on the Church in the modern world, elucidating from a Biblical and theological point of view the place of the material universe in the economy of salvation (105th gen. cong., Oct. 20); and on the education of priests, offering suggestions for improvement drawn from the unity of their mediatory function and the variety of their apostolate and from the fundamental requirements of the qualities and virtues of a good man and a good Christian (121st gen. cong., Nov. 12).

On Nov. 19, 1964, after Cardinal Eugene Tisserant, acting as head of the board of presidents but without consulting Meyer, announced that the preliminary vote on the schema on religious liberty would be postponed until the fourth session, Meyer, accompanied by Cardinals Joseph Ritter of St. Louis, Missouri, and Paul-Émile LÉGER of Montreal, Canada, and supported by the signatures of nearly 1,000 bishops, immediately appealed to Paul VI in person, but failed to induce him to reverse the decision. By the end of the third session Meyer had addressed the Council more often than any other American bishop and had emerged as the unrivaled intellectual leader of the hierarchy of the U.S.

After the third session the cardinal showed signs of physical fatigue and malaise; he entered Mercy Hospital, Chicago, on Feb. 17, 1965, and eight days later, after receiving the Anointing of the Sick, he underwent intracranial surgery. He never recovered normal responsiveness and eventually lost consciousness for longer and longer periods until he died on April 9. After the solemn funeral, which was held in Holy Name Cathedral on April 13, conducted in the revitalized form of the liturgy and attended by six cardinals and more than 60 bishops, he was buried in the little cemetery of St. Mary of the Lake Seminary at Mundelein.

MEYNARD, ANDRÉ

Dominican canonist, theologian, religious founder; b. Lyons, France, May 4, 1824; d. Bourg-en-Bresse, Aug. 2, 1904. Meynard was ordained in 1849 and was pastor of Pélussin (Loire) in the Diocese of Lyons until 1855 when Lacordaire's influence led him to the Friars Preachers at Flavigny. During his early years as a Dominican, he preached missions until ill health forced him to abandon the pulpit in 1856. He restored the priories of Carpentras and Poitiers. In 1860 Meynard founded the congregation of Third Order Dominican Sisters at Bourgen-Bresse for the care of the sick. He spent his last 19 years of life as their chaplain. His final year was one of severe physical and spiritual trial: because of misunderstandings, his spiritual daughters snubbed him and sought his departure. He bore this trial with patience, offering his last sufferings for the Church and his Order.

He did some writing in the field of Canon Law but his chief interest was in spiritual theology. He wrote the following works: Traité de la vie intérieure (2 v., 1885) and Catéchisme de la vie chrétienne intérieure et religieuse (1894). His teaching on the interior life is notable as a 19th century continuation of the Thomistic tradition as derived from Thomas de Valgornera. Meynard differed from most Thomists, however, in holding the widely accepted distinction between ascetical and mystical theology: to the former he ascribed the study of a soul's progress toward perfection with the ordinary helps of grace; to the latter, the extraordinary acts and phenomena of the interior life. He also considered infused contemplation an extraordinary grace.

MEYNELL, ALICE C. AND WILFRID

Husband and wife, authors. Alice: Poet, literary journalist; b. Barnes, Surrey, England, Oct. 11, 1847; d. Nov. 17, 1922. Her father, Thomas Thompson, was a Cambridge graduate; her mother, Christiana Weller, was a concert pianist. The family was wealthy, due to an inheritance from colonial enterprises. Alice and her older sister Elizabeth were educated privately, their father being most frequently their tutor. This training was augmented by frequent travel from childhood onward, the family home alternating between northern Italy and England, with briefer stays in France, Germany, and Switzerland. At the point of young adulthood, Alice and Elizabeth already showed their artistic gifts, the younger as a poet, the older as a painter.

Alice entered the Catholic Church in 1868, a few years after her mother; eventually her father and sister joined them. Although she carefully guarded her privacy in spiritual matters, she once confided to a daughter that she was drawn to the Church primarily for its authoritative moral discipline: "I saw when I was very young that a guide in morals was even more necessary than a guide in faith. It was for this I joined the Church." In 1877 she married Wilfrid Meynell.

Her first volume of poems, Preludes, was published in 1875, winning praise from such luminaries as Tennyson, Ruskin, Christina Rossetti, and George Eliot. With marriage and the beginning of a family, and largely for economic reasons, she shifted her energies to prose. Eventually, however, she returned to her first love, publishing a new collection, Poems, in 1893. Subsequent volumes, including one posthumously issued, secured her contemporary reputation as one of the most compelling voices of her time.

Alice Meynell's poetry finds its power not in the subject matter itself (nature, love, the moral life), which was rarely topical, and never polemical. Its force arises from the exquisite choice of language, a quiet, understated voice, and most of all from surprising angles of perception. In this way she makes the familiar new, alive to fresh intimations. These qualities are also the source of a persistent critique of her work, that it presses its material too strenuously, is overwrought, precious. Religious sentiments mark much of the verse, but underneath nearly all of it, religious or "secular," is a persistent refrain, a theme of compensation that is the very touchstone of the fin de siècle sensibility: life's choicest pleasures are experienced most intensely in their absence. This code of denial, of abstinence, lies at the very heart of both "decadence" and a profoundly religious vision.

Her prose, which found its way into several volumes of essays, is a good deal more uneven in quality than the poetry, much of it having been written on weekly and monthly press deadlines. In addition to studies of classic English writers and reviews of the major literary figures of the day, she practiced what was once called the "familiar essay," a species of writing on quotidian matters that delights more by its method than its matter, where wit and whimsy count more than the passionate prosecution of a thesis. Representative of these qualities is The Rhythm of Life (1893).

Wilfrid: Catholic journalist, editor, publisher, biographer; b. Newcastle-on-Tyne, Yorkshire, Nov. 17, 1852; d. Greatham, Sussex, Oct. 20, 1948. He was the son of Quaker parents and educated in Quaker schools. After moving to London to search for work, he joined the Catholic Church and entered into a lifelong career in journalism.

The Meynells had eight children, one of whom died in infancy. Through the early years of family preoccupations, the two of them created a minor publishing industry, primarily within Catholic circles, as editors, publishers, and frequent contributors to leading periodicals. Wilfrid founded and edited the monthly Merry England, edited the Church-sponsored Weekly Register, and directed the most important Catholic publishing house in England, Burns and Oates. But in all these enterprises the hand—and the pen—of Alice were never absent.

While his wife was earning high praise not only in England but also in America, Wilfrid made his own mark in both religious and secular arenas. His biographies of Cardinals Manning and Newman and of Prime Minister Disraeli were well received; and the steady stream of articles and columns for the periodical press gained him a special currency among readers of more than two generations.

Nothing counts so much as a touchstone of the life of Alice and Wilfrid Meynell as their friendship and generous support of many of the most talented literary figures of the day, both the famous and those struggling to be known. For years the Meynell home in London served as a salon for almost daily gatherings of a company of literary friends such as Francis Thompson, Coventry Patmore and George Meredith. For over four decades, decades that spanned the rule of Victorian values to their collapse in World War I, the Meynells were an influential presence in the English-speaking world. The prominence of their religious loyalty must surely count as a factor in the important English Catholic Revival of the twentieth century.

MEZGER

Family distinguished as Benedictines, teachers, and writers.

Franz, professor and writer; b. Ingolstadt, Oct. 25, 1632; d. Salzburg, Dec. 11, 1701. Franz entered the Benedictine Order in 1650, and was ordained in 1657. From 1659 to 1665 he taught philosophy at the University of Salzburg, then moral theology until 1668. From 1669 to 1688 he taught various theological sciences at the Benedictine Abbey of Ettal in Bavaria and at his own abbey in Salzburg. He was master of novices and director of the clerics at St. Peter in Salzburg from 1688 until his death. Besides writing ten philosophical and theological works, he made numerous translations, particularly from the Maurists, mainly of ascetical treatises.

Joseph, professor and writer; b. Eichstätt, Sept. 5, 1635; d. Abbey of St. Gall in Switzerland, Oct. 26, 1683. Joseph became a Benedictine in 1650, and was ordained in 1659. At the University of Salzburg he taught philosophy (1662–64), apologetics and polemics (1665–67), and Canon Law (1668–73). He was prior of St. Peter in Salzburg (1673–78), where he also taught hermeneutics and polemics. In 1678 he was appointed vice chancellor of the University of Salzburg. He was an intimate friend and correspondent of Mabillon, who called him "the most prominent light of the University of Salzburg." His numerous works cover theology, Scripture, and history. He died while on a pilgrimage to the Marian shrine at Einsiedeln.

Paul, professor and writer; b. Eichstätt, Nov. 23, 1637; d. Salzburg, April 12, 1702. Paul joined the Benedictines in 1652, and was ordained in 1660. From 1664 to 1666 he was master of novices and director of the clerics at St. Peter in Salzburg. At the University of Salzburg he taught philosophy (1668–70), theology (1673–88), and exegesis and polemics (1689–1700). In 1683 he succeeded his deceased brother as vice rector and vice chancellor of the University. Of his 33 works, M. Grabmann praises his Theologia scholastica secundum viam et doctrinam d. Thomae, in four volumes (Augsburg 1695), as "one of the best presentations of Thomistic theology." His teachings on the Immaculate Conception and papal infallibility are in accordance with later official definitions of these doctrines.

MEZUZAH

Hebrew term for a strip of parchment upon which are inscribed two passages from Deuteronomy, 6.4–9 and 11.13–21, written in 22 lines, and which is usually placed in a small metal, glass, or wooden cylindrical container. On the reverse side of the parchment is written the divine name SHADDAI (Almighty). This word should be visible through an opening cut into the mezuzah case. It is prescribed by rabbinical law that a mezuzah be placed upon the doorpost of every building and room inhabited by persons. (The Hebrew word $m^e z \hat{u} z \hat{a}$ means doorpost.) It is affixed to the upper part of the right doorpost (as one enters). There is a special prayer formula for setting it in place. Among Orthodox Jews it is a pious custom, upon entering or leaving the house, to touch the mezuzah with the fingers and then to kiss the fingers. One of the seven minor Talmudic tractates, which is called by this term, treats of the various regulations on the writing and the use of the mezuzah. The mezuzah custom is based on Dt 6.9; 11.20: "Write them [God's words, understood to be those of 6.4-5] on the doorposts of your houses and on your gates." However, as in the similar case of the PHY-LACTERIES, this injunction in Deuteronomy was no doubt intended originally to be understood in a merely figurative sense.

MEZZABARBA, CARLO AMBROGIO

Patriarch of Alexandria and apostolic visitator to China; b. Pavia, c. 1685, d. Lodi, Dec. 7, 1741. Mezzabarba was accredited by Clement X with powers of legate a latere (Sept. 18, 1719); his mission to the Sino-Manchu Empire was to negotiate acceptance of the constitution Exilla die of March 19, 1715, condemning the Chinese rites. In a series of audiences from Dec. 31, 1720, to March 1, 1721, Hsüan-veh treated the papal plenipotentiary with marked honors, but angrily spurned the antirites decree and threatened repressive measures if it was enforced. Hoping to ease the grave tension, the legate issued a pastoral instruction (Macau, Nov. 4, 1721) in which he aceight qualifying permissions previously authorized by Rome itself in case of need, but which were quashed by Benedict XIV 20 years later (1742). Unsuccessful in his mission, Mezzabarba left China on Dec. 9, 1721, and on July 13, 1725, he was named to the See of Lodi. His confessor during the ill-fated legation, the Servite Sostegno Viani, wrote a diary of events, Giornale della Legazione (Cologne 1740), which was critical of the actions of the Beijing Jesuits in this affair.

MEZZOFANTI, GIUSEPPE

Cardinal, linguist; b. Bologna, Sept. 17, 1774; d. Rome, March 15, 1849. His father was a poor carpenter. Gifted with a prodigious memory, in boyhood he learned Latin, Greek, Spanish, and Swedish. As a seminarian he mastered Hebrew, Arabic, and other Oriental languages. After ordination (1797), he taught Arabic at the University of Bologna, but he lost his post when he refused to take the oath of allegiance to the Cisalpine Republic. To support himself he then acted as a tutor. He returned to Bologna as professor of Hebrew and Greek from 1803 until 1808, when the chair was suppressed, and again from 1814 to 1831, when he was called to Rome as canon of the Basilica of St. Mary Major and a member of the philological college of the University of Rome. Meanwhile, he studied Chinese at the Capodimonte College in Naples. In 1833 he was named prefect of the VATICAN LIBRARY and canon of St. Peter's Basilica, and in 1838 cardinal and member of the Congregations of Propaganda, Rites, Index, and Revision of Books of the Oriental Church. He could speak about 40 languages, had a fair knowledge of about 30 more, and a familiarity with another 45 dialects. He contributed much to the science of comparative linguistics. Pressure of his other duties never permitted Mezzofanti to publish any of his studies. Most of his manuscripts and letters are deposited in the communal library of the Archiginnasio of Bologna. Several of his manuscripts were published after his death.

MIAMI, ARCHDIOCESE OF

When Miami (Miamiensis) was established as a diocese on Aug. 13, 1958, its territory consisted of 14 counties formerly of the diocese of St Augustine. When the dioceses of Orlando and St. Petersburg were established on June 13, 1968, Miami was made an archdiocese with the new dioceses, along with St. Augustine, as its suffragans. In 2001 the Province of Miami included, in addition to the above named dioceses, St. Petersburg (1975), Pensacola-Tallahassee (1975), Palm Beach (1984) and Venice (1984). The territory of the archdiocese had been reduced to three counties in the southern Florida, Broward, Dade, and Monroe, but the Catholic population had grown to 816,207 Catholics, or about 22 percent of the total population of 3.7 million.

The first bishop, Coleman F. Carroll of Pittsburgh, Pa., served as auxiliary in Pittsburgh until his installation as bishop of Miami, Oct. 7, 1958. During the years of his episcopacy (1958–1977), the extraordinary growth in population that had begun after World War II continued in southern Florida. The increase that reached boom proportions came as a consequence of the attractive climate and real-estate projects for year-round residents in middle income brackets, and an influx of refugees from Cuba. Carroll initiated an extensive series of building projects and pastoral programs to meet the needs of his vastly diverse flock.

Within the first five years he more than doubled the number of parishes, many with schools. Bishop Carroll took the initiative in constructing and staffing diocesan high schools, Catholic hospitals and retreat centers. In 1958 he blessed the new St. John Vianney College Seminary, the first minor seminary on the East Coast south of Baltimore, Md., and in 1962 he inaugurated a major seminary, St. Vincent de Paul, opened at Boynton Beach. Early in 1960 Carroll established the Centro Hispano Catolico for all Spanish-speaking people in the area, with day nurseries, a medical clinic, a dental clinic, and arrangements for medical assistance. In addition to housing, food, and clothing, the center provided employment opportunities and transportation from Cuba for children and religious at considerable expense to the diocese. He dealt with the issue of race and ethnicity by pushing for a steady, if gradual, integration in parishes and schools. To staff the new institutions Carroll brought to the diocese eight religious communities of priests, 25 of sisters, and five communities of brothers.

In September 1976, Bishop Edward A. McCarthhy, of Phoenix, was appointed coadjutor with right of succession, becoming the second Archbishop of Miami (1977–1994) when Archbishop Carroll died the following year. The population in Florida continued to grow, and diocesan boundaries were once again realigned in 1984 with the creation of the dioceses of Palm Beach and Venice. McCarthy carried on the pastoral outreach and general policies of his predecessor in trying to help the refugees who continued to flow into Florida from Cuba and Haiti. Archbishop McCarthy had the honor of welcoming Pope John Paul II to Miami when the pontiff paid his second visit to the U.S. in September 1987. John Paul addressed large audiences in both English and Spanish, and took the occasion of his visit to Miami to meet with a group of prominent Jewish leaders.

When Archbishop McCarthy reached the mandatory age of retirement in 1994, New Orleans-born John C. Favalora, since 1983 the bishop of St. Petersburg, was appointed to succeed him.

Catholic institutions of higher learning in the archdiocese include Barry University and St. Thomas University in Miami. Founded as Barry College for women in 1940 by the Dominican Sisters of Adrian, Mich., it went co-educational and subsequently attained university status in 1981. St. Thomas University was originally established as Biscayne College by the Augustinian Friars in 1961. It has evolved from an all male college to a coeducational university with a graduate school and the only accredited Catholic-affiliated law school in the Southeastern United States. Since 1988, the University has been under the sponsorship of the Archdiocese of Miami.

MICAH, BOOK OF

The 6th of the 12 MINOR PROPHETS. After outlining the contents of the book, this article will consider the questions of its date and authorship and its message.

Contents. The construction of the book is simple and well balanced: two collections of doom oracles separated by a collection of oracles of salvation. The ordering is a logical, not a chronological, one. The three parts of the prophecy are (1) God's chastisement of Judah's sins in keeping with the punishment He has already inflicted on Samaria (1.1–3.12); (2) a prediction of Zion's restoration by the Messiah (4.1–5.14); (3) God's rebuke of Illumination from the Book of Micah in the "Great Bible of Demeter Neksei-Lipocz" (Pre. Acc. MS 1, v. 2, folio 186).

Judah for its ingratitude, injustice, and infidelity (6.1–7.6).

Part one contains prophecies of doom against Judah. It begins (1.2–7) by announcing Samaria's fall and the judgment of Yahweh on that city's sins. But the whole oracle intends to present the message to Jerusalem; judgment against Samaria is announced as an introduction to dire warning given Jerusalem and Judah (1.8–16); devastation comes as judgment upon Judah's social injustices (2.1–11). In the midst of these oracles of doom is an unexpected prophecy of salvation, announcing the gathering of the Remnant of Israel (2.12–13). There follows a further list of prophecies of woe directed against judges, Prophets, and the governing classes, and because of the crimes of these leaders Jerusalem will fall (3.1–12).

Part two of Micah is the "messianic" section (ch. 4–5); it is concerned entirely with the salvation of God's people and the destruction of its enemies. Possibly some verses found here have undergone later revision or even transformation. To inspire hope, the oracle of promise is used: 4.9–10, 11–13; 4.14–5.5. Here occurs a radiant vision of the new Jerusalem (4.1–5) and a great tableau of the future (5.1–5). The messianic kingdom is promised, not to the temporal Judah in its totality, but to the remnant (4.7; 5.2, 6–7) that has survived the punishment. This punishment is the sanction of Judah's present sin. But the sin of Judah does not suspend the fulfillment of the covenant. Micah's vision of Zion's restoration is an affirmation of complete faith in the success of God's plan. At the center of God's kingdom, the Prophet sees the King-Messiah, Son of David (4.8; 5.1–5).

The third part of the book opens with a juridical charge brought by Yahweh against His ungrateful people (6.1–8). Jerusalem is condemned for its social injustices (6.9–16); then the Prophet laments over the lack of justice and loyalty in the land (7.1–6). The section closes with a lamentation (7.7–10), a prediction (7.11–13), and a double prayer (7.14–17, 18–20).

Date and authorship. According to the title of the collection (1.1), Micah's preaching activity took place during the reigns of the Judean kings Joatham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. This title, however, is later than the collection and has appeared suspect to many critics. In any event, Micah's preaching under Hezekiah (715-687 B.C.) is incontestable; Jeremiah affirms it (Jer 26.18-19). Micah's complaint over the cities of the Shephela (Mi 1.8-16) and his allusions to the siege of Jerusalem (4.9–10, 11, 14) are best situated at the time of Sennacherib's invasion in 701 B.C. In Micah there are excerpts from prophetic preaching that began sometime before 721 and still continued in 701. This is not to deny that some oracles have undergone later revision. The collection of Micah's oracles as it now exists is the work of an anonymous postexilic editor who apparently organized partial collections that had already been made. Unfortunately, the text suffered in transmission and is in an extremely bad state of preservation. Some critics doubt the Mican authorship of certain passages. This question is complicated by the fact that Micah, like the other prophetic books, was not a dead letter; the community exploited it and fashioned it in its liturgy according to its needs. The problem of authorship demands a cautious approach.

Message. Micah protests against social injustice: oppression of the poor, corruption of the governing classes, grinding down of the unfortunate in the machinery of the law. But his protest is based, not on man's dignity or his rights as a human individual or social being, but on Micah's concept of God's people. This concept dominates Micah's whole vision. God's people is not a political power, but a people chosen by, saved by, and allied to Yahweh by pure favor. Hence flow religious duties toward Yahweh the savior, and a special type of human relations among members of the chosen family. Micah demands the restoration of these duties and these relations. His vision of the future expresses faith in the fulfillment of the Davidic covenant and the ultimate accomplishment of Yahweh's plan to save.

MICHAEL, ARCHANGEL

The name Michael occurs in the Old Testament as a rather common personal male name (Nm 13.13; 1 Chr 5.13–14; 6.40; etc.) as well as the name of a certain angel. The name in Hebrew, mîkā'ēl, means "who is like God?"; compare the similarly formed Michea, in Hebrew, mîkāyāh, "who is like Yahweh?"

In the Bible. GABRIEL, the angel instructor of Daniel, calls Michael "one of the chief princes," "your Prince," and "the great prince, guardian of your people." In Dn 10.13, 21 Michael helps Gabriel in the contest against the tutelary angel of the Persians called "prince of the kingdom of Persia." The background of Daniel's vision is the Seleucid period (312–63 B.C.), and the author has undoubtedly been influenced by the angelology of Zoroastrianism. Michael is presented as the angel protector of Israel and is integral to God's government of history. In Dn 12.1 Michael appears in apocalyptic circumstances as the source of comfort and strength for Israel in extreme distress.

In Jude 9, Michael is called "the archangel," i.e., the chief angel, and is pictured disputing with the devil over the body of MOSES. The reference is unknown but refers probably to a passage from "The Assumption of Moses" (Pharisaic apocryphon of 1st century A.D.). In Rv 12.7–9, Michael leads the faithful angels to victory over the dragon (Satan) and his angels and casts them out of heaven down to the earth.

In Christian Cult. Early Christian cult was undoubtedly influenced by the prominent place given to Michael in the Hebrew apocrypha (e.g., Book of Enoch; Testament of Abraham). The Shepherd of HERMAS already mentions "the great and glorious angel Michael who has authority over this people and governs them. . . ." In the East, Michael was venerated as having care of the sick. Churches dedicated to him and the other angels date from as early as the 4th century. In the West, Michael was venerated as the head of the heavenly armies and the patron of soldiers. This veneration may be traced to a popular cult arising from an alleged 5th or 6th–century apparition of Michael during the distress caused by invading Goths (on the coast of southeastern

Sculpture of St. Michael the Archangel on San Michele in Foro, Italy. (©Michael Freeman/CORBIS)

Italy, Gargano or Monte Sant' Angelo; probable source of Mont-Saint-Michel tradition, Manche, France, 709 A.D.).

Michael was the only individual angel with a liturgical observance prior to the 9th century, and his cult has grown since then: e.g., tutelary angel of the church (the new Israel); patron of mariners, of roentgenologists (1941), and of Italy's public discipline and security (1950). Historically, September 29 was the feast of the Archangel Michael in the Roman Rite. The post–Vatican II reform of the liturgical calendar created combined the Feasts of the Archangels Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael on September 29. In the Eastern Christian tradition, the Feast of the Archangels is celebrated on November 8.

MICHAEL III, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Byzantine emperor 842 to Sept. 23/24, 867; b. probably 836. Michael, the son of Emperor THEOPHILOS and the last emperor of the Amorian dynasty, succeeded his father when still a child, under the regency of his mother, the Empress Theodora. A woman of great energy and piety, she put an end to the last remnants of ICONOCLASM, restored the peace of the Church and took strong measures against the spread of the Paulician heresy (see BOGOMILS) in Asia Minor.

The renewed war with the Arabs and simultaneous campaigns against the SLAVS threatening the Balkan provinces of the Empire called for an efficient military leadership that Theodora and her minister Theoctistos were unable to provide. In 856, Michael, aided by his maternal uncle, Bardas, overthrew Theodora's regency, forcing her into a convent. Bardas became the real ruler of the Empire and in 853 the Patriarch IGNATIUS was compelled to resign and was replaced by PHOTIUS, a close associate of Bardas.

Thus began the Photian Schism with all its disastrous religious and political consequences. The ever-increasing rift with the West, the wars with the Arabs and Balkan Slavs, and the beginning of Russian attacks from across the Black Sea (c. 860) made the position of the Empire extremely precarious. Michael III lacked an ability for government and military leadership. This capricious, cruel, and corrupt young man, always under the influence of favorites, soon tired of Bardas, and in 866 had him murdered in his presence by Basil the Macedonian who became co-emperor. In 867 Basil murdered Michael and thus became Emperor Basil I, founder of the Macedonian (Armenian) dynasty.

MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reigned 1259 to Dec. 11, 1282; b. 1224 or 1225. Michael not only restored Greek rule in Constantinople after the period of Latin domination (1204–61), but thwarted the attempted invasion of Byzantium by the able and ambitious Charles of Anjou, king of Sicily.

With the establishment of the LATIN EMPIRE OF CONSTANTINOPLE after the Fourth CRUSADE, several Byzantine states appeared, of which the most important was the Empire of Nicaea in Asia Minor. Michael, a leading nobleman at the Nicene court, usurped the throne in 1259 from the boy Lascarid emperor, thus establishing the Palaeologan dynasty that ruled Byzantium until its fall to the Turks in 1453.

With Nicaea as a base, Michael ultimately recaptured Constantinople (1261), the result of either a surprise entrance of his troops into the city, or of carefully laid plans, or both. At the Greek reconquest, the expelled Latins, especially the Latin Emperor Baldwin and the Venetians, launched a diplomatic campaign to recover the city. Their plans ultimately centered around Charles of Anjou, the ambitious brother of King Louis IX of France, who had inherited the old Norman designs against Byzantium. As a result Michael had to devote almost all of his energies to checkmating the intricate web of alliances woven against Byzantium by Charles.

With great diplomatic finesse, Michael offered to Pope GREGORY X, Charles's suzerain for Sicily, union of the Greek and Latin Churches in exchange for papal restraint of Charles's plans against Constantinople. After long negotiations Michael sent envoys to the famous second Council of Lyons (1274), and a union of the two Churches was declared there. The Greeks, however, looked upon this union—at which the Eastern patriarchs were not represented—as a fraud, and Michael faced opposition to the union from most of his subjects. Negotiations to implement the union continued until Charles finally succeeded in securing the election of his own papal candidate, MARTIN IV, who almost immediately excommunicated Michael and declared a crusade against the "schismatic" Greeks under the leadership of Charles of Anjou.

In 1281 the situation seemed desperate for Michael, because Charles had created a tremendous anti-Byzantine coalition that ultimately included the papacy and Venice. However, on March 30, 1282, the Sicilian Vespers, a revolt against Angevin rule, suddenly broke out in Palermo, Sicily, forcing Charles to suspend his plans against Byzantium and occupying his attention until the end of his reign. Scholarship has recently shown that this revolt (which had some nationalistic overtones) was in part engineered not only by the Hohenstaufen party in Sicily, but also by Michael, who supplied the rebels with money and entered into an alliance against Charles with King PETER OF ARAGON, son-in-law of Manfred, the last Hohenstaufen ruler of Sicily. Thus Michael, by a series of brilliant diplomatic maneuvers, was able successfully to maintain the empire against one of the ablest foes Byzantium had ever faced. In view of the overwhelming threat from the West, however, Michael could devote little attention to the East, and the OTTOMAN Turks were able to overrun almost all of Asia Minor.

MICHAEL I, THE SYRIAN, PATRIARCH OF ANTIOCH

Jacobite patriarch, historian; b. Melitene (Malatya, Turkey), 1126; d. 1199. Monk, and later archimandrite, of the monastery of Bar-Sauma, Michael, as patriarch of Antioch (1166-99), strove to reform the somewhat lax ways of the Jacobite (Monophysite) Church (see JACO-BITES [SYRIAN]), and for a time had to struggle with a rival patriarch who enjoyed Armenian support. He maintained good relations with the CRUSADER STATES, and was invited to the Third LATERAN COUNCIL, but declined. His main writing is a chronicle in Syriac, covering the period from creation to 1199. Its value lies, for the earlier portions, in the many now lost Syriac historians whom he used as sources, and for the later portions, in his own shrewd and detailed eyewitness accounts of events in the Near East in his own time. The original Syriac text was rediscovered in 1888; previously the chronicle had been known only in a shortened Armenian version. Unpublished liturgical and dogmatic works by Michael also survive.

MICHAEL CERULARIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Patriarchate, Mar. 25, 1043, to his exile, Nov. 1058; d. Jan. 21, 1059. The supposed author of the EASTERN SCHISM, Michael came from a distinguished family of Constantinople, was educated for the civil service, and never acquired any real knowledge of ecclesiastical studies. Nevertheless, he had a lofty concept of his office, regarding the spiritual ruler above the temporal, a theory influenced by the thought of SYMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN. Since he was a controversial figure in his own lifetime, even the contemporary sources are contradictory. When in 1040 a plot against Emperor Michael IV was discovered, Cerularius was accused by some sources of leading it, and by HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA in Excommunication of having become a monk to escape punishment; others stated that he was guiltless and entered religion freely. At the accession of Emperor CONSTANTINE IX, who had taken part in the conspiracy, Cerularius became syncellus, virtual successor-designate to the patriarch, and the emperor's most trusted adviser. Succeeding to the See of CONSTANTINOPLE in 1043, he broke with Constantine over the question of submission to Rome.

The BYZANTINE CHURCH, separated from Rome since 1009, had, by the middle of the eleventh century, lost all belief in the primacy—did not even recognize, in fact, that Rome had ever made such a claim—and, though it conceded in principle that all five patriarchates were equal and independent, regarded Constantinople as the foremost see in Christendom. At first, Cerularius proposed reunion with Rome, thinking that he was dealing with the pope as an equal. He was shocked when confronted with the demand of the legates (he thought them demented, cf. Epistola ad Petrum, Will, 183-184), backed by the emperor, that he acknowledge the primacy of Rome. This demand ran counter to his convictions, and he was excommunicated by the legates, but after the death of the pope. [The question of the excommunication has since been reconsidered in light of the ECUMENICAL movement growing out of VATICAN COUNCIL II. See the joint statement of Pope Paul and Athenagoras, Patriarch of Constantinas, Patriarch of Constantinople, on Dec. 7, 1965 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis, [Rome 1919–] 58.1:2021).] In consonance with his theory of the supremacy of the spiritual, Cerularius fought the temporal power. He enjoyed tremendous popularity in Constantinople, and knowing well how to sway the mob, he forced Constantine to an abject surrender.

Thereafter he exercised unchallenged authority in the capital—an unparalleled position for a patriarch in Byzantine history—but he did so in the public interest. Boldly, he told Empress Theodora that sole rule by a woman jeopardized the Byzantine state and that she should appoint an emperor (his frankness very nearly cost him his life; cf. Psellus, Chron. 6.17), and he played the decisive role in the deposition of the weak Emperor Michael VI and the crowning of the able Isaac I Comnenus. As a reward, Cerularius gained control over all revenues and appointments in HAGIA SOPHIA, but he gradually became overbearing, as even the friendly sources relate, and the ensuing struggle for power was fatal to emperor and patriarch.

According to the testimony of an eyewitness, Cerularius's right hand remained incorrupt after his death. Immediately he won renown throughout the East for sanctity as a confessor, and in Constantinople he received a popular cult, made official the next year. Among the patriarchs of Constantinople he is unique; no other ever attained such power. He was not without defects: he was weak in theology, violent and uncompromising, vindictive, and corrupted by power in his last years. But he had great personal courage and a high sense of duty, as proven by the risk he took in admonishing Theodora. In the quarrel with Cardinal Humbert and the emperor, he fought bravely and resourcefully and in all good faith for what he considered the preservation of true doctrine. It was his misfortune to have served the wrong cause; but modern historians who condemn him seem not to make allowance for his psychological background. Cerularius is an early counterpart of Patriarch JOSEPH I, who rejected the union of the Council of Lyons, with this difference: while Joseph resigned, Cerularius fought.

MICHAEL III, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Reigned 1170–1178; b. Anchialos. Michael was educated by the archbishop of Anchialos, and after entering the clergy was named sakkelarios, or treasurer. He journeyed to Constantinople on business for the patriarchate and there was made protekdikos, or first advocate, and later hypatos, or chancellor, of the philosophers. In late 1169 he was named patriarch of Constantinople; and he became involved in a controversy over the interpretation of Christ's words "The Father is greater than I," which led to the condemnation of Constantine of Kerkyra and Abbot Irenicus of Batala. He encouraged the jurist BAL-SAMON to write his commentary on the canons and opposed the attempts of the Emperor Manuel I Comnenus (1143–80) to bring about a reunification of the Orthodox Church with both Rome and the Armenians. In 1170 a papal delegation was sent to Constantinople by Pope AL-EXANDER III, who reduced conditions for reunion to three: recognition of the papal primacy, recognition of the right of appeal to Rome, and inscription of the pope's name in the diptychs. In a synod (1171) Michael made a public response to the legation's offer in a dialogue with the emperor. He violently attacked the pope as no pastor but a sick member of the fold in need of a cure. He said union with the Turks would be preferable to union with the Latins. He likewise repulsed efforts of Theorianus, sent by the emperor to the Armenian Catholicos Nerses IV (1169), and to the Jacobites (1171), to win them to an acceptance of Chalcedonian doctrine. Of Michael's writings, besides the dialogues with the emperor and his letters concerning Armenian affairs, his synodal acts dealing with ecclesiastical discipline are of great interest. A treatise on the liturgy of the presanctified attributed to him by A. Ehrhard belongs to the Patriarch Michael II Oxeites.

MICHAEL DE NORTHBURGH

Bishop of London, minister of King Edward III; d. Copford, Essex, England, Sept. 9, 1361. He studied at Oxford and had received the M.A. and doctorate of civil law by 1336. He amassed innumerable benefices and, soon after becoming a canon of Lichfield and Hereford, entered the royal service, being sent in 1345 on an unsuccessful mission to the pope to obtain a dispensation for the Black Prince's marriage to a daughter of the Duke of Brabant. By 1346 he was a counselor and confessor to the king, whom he accompanied on his expedition against the French. The two letters Michael wrote describing the campaign from Saint-Vaast to Caen and from Poissy via Crécy to the siege of Calais are preserved in Robert of Avesbury's chronicle (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 43; 1889). By 1350 he was the king's secretary and keeper of the Privy Seal and thus in charge of war and foreign affairs. In 1354 he was appointed bishop of London by papal PROVISION. Soon afterward he conducted fruitless peace negotiations with the French at the papal court at Avignon, and he was sent again in 1355 to treat with them at Guisnes. Impressed by the French CARTHUSIANS, he became co-founder of the LONDON CHARTERHOUSE. He died of the plague. He had compiled a Concordancia of laws and canons, since lost; he left £2,000 to the Charterhouse, £1,000 to St. Paul's cathedral, and scholarships for law students at Oxford.

[B. S. SMITH]

MICHAEL DE SANCTIS, DE, ST.

Mystic; b. Vich, Catalonia, Spain, 1591; d. Valladolid, April 10, 1625. Michael practiced austerities of fasting and watching, abstained from meat in early childhood, and at the age of eight made a vow of chastity. He had a special devotion to the Rosary and the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin. After the death of his father, he wished to enter the Trinitarians, but his family opposed it. However, he entered the Order at Barcelona, and was professed there at 16. He studied at Salamanca and Seville where his mystical gifts began to manifest themselves. He was ordained in Portugal.

It was reported that when rapt in ecstasy he often levitated. In Cordova, while meditating on paradise, he was said to have soared out of the choir, across a field, and come to rest on a churchtower. When preaching in Salamanca, he reputedly was raised in the air in sight of all. His favorite sermon topic was the ransom of Christian captives of the Moors. In 1622 he was made prior at Valladolid where he spent his last years. He was beatified by PIUS VI in 1779, and canonized by Pius IX in 1862.

Feast: April 10.

MICHAEL OF CESENA

Franciscan minister general and theologian; b. Ficchio, near Cesena, Italy, c. 1270; d. Munich, Germany,

Nov. 29, 1342. Michael Foschi entered the FRANCISCAN Order c. 1284 and was custos at Bologna by January 1305 (Archivum Franciscanum historicum, 25:285). He had just been made a doctor of theology at the University of PARIS in May 1316, when the news of his election as minister general by the general chapter at Naples was announced to him. In July of the same year he went to Assisi to preside over the compilation of new constitutions for the order, and he named PETER AUREOLI (d. 1322) to succeed him in Paris. In close accord with Pope JOHN XXII, he succeeded in putting an end to the dispute between the FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS and the rest of the community, and the majority of those who had revolted submitted to him. However, Ubertino of Casale and ANGE-LUS CLARENUS left the order, and four recalcitrants were burned at Marseilles in 1318. At the general chapter of Marseilles in 1319, Michael obtained the condemnation of the treatise of PETER JOHN OLIVI on the Apocalypse. A serious crisis erupted in 1322, when Pope John XXII repudiated the Franciscan proposition of the absolute poverty of Christ and the Apostles. The order defended it in a general chapter at Perugia in June 1322, after Cesena had tried mitigating certain texts. But the condemnation of Dec. 8 (Ad conditorem), the imposition of ownership of goods on the order, and the Quia quorumdam (November 1324), which declared heretical everything opposing the bulls on poverty, all exasperated the friars, making them more sympathetic toward the excommunicated emperor, Louis IV, the Bavarian, who was in conflict with the AVIGNON PAPACY (see POVERTY CONTROVERSY). The general chapter at Lyons in 1325 remained silent regarding the Perugia decisions; Cesena merely exhorted obedience and moderation and made a few slight alterations in the constitutions. Trips to Paris, Naples, and Rome during 1326 to 1327 and denunciations by prominent Guelfs aroused the pope's suspicions, and Cesena was recalled to Avignon. In January 1328 Louis was crowned in Rome by Sciarra COLONNA (d. 1328), and in May he had a dissenting Franciscan, Pietro Rainalducci, elected as antipope NICHOLAS V. Ten days later, on May 22, King Robert of Naples (d. 1343) procured Cesena's confirmation as general by the general chapter at Bologna despite the protests of the papal legate. Michael fled Avignon on the 26th with WILLIAM OF OCKHAM and Bonagratia of Bergamo (d. 1347) and reached Pisa on June 9. Although avoiding the antipope, they succeeded in winning the friendship of Louis, who took them under his protection. This was a serious matter that alienated the majority of Franciscans from Cesena, and Geraldus Odonis (d. 1349) succeeded him as head of the order in 1329 after the general chapter at Paris. This same chapter condemned the conduct and writings of Michael and his associates. The schismatics settled permanently in Munich, and from there Michael addressed himself in vain to the Perpignan chapter in April 1331, which expelled him from the order. The general answered him in his Quid niteris, to which Cesena replied with Teste Salomone in December 1332. In his last years he wrote numerous anonymous works, and his name is found on a final protestation, Quoniam sicut testatur, dated Aug. 23, 1338. Before his death, he restored the seal of the order to William of Ockham and left his papers in safekeeping with Queen Sanchia of Naples (d. 1345). He died unsubmissive. His theological writings on the Sentences and on Ezechiel and his Sermones de tempore and de sanctis are lost; only the constitutions of 1316 and 1325, his polemical writings, and a few letters remain.

MICHAEL OF MALEINOS, ST.

Hermit and monastic founder; b. Charsianon, Cappadocia, 894; d. Mt. Kymina, Bithynia. Related to the imperial family, he was reared at the Byzantine court under the name of Manuel. As a young man he became a monk at the monastery of Kymina (912), from which he withdrew (918) to solitary life on a cliff, and to a desert the following year. In 921 he founded a monastery at Xerolimni (Gerolimni) in Bithynia. He returned to Kymina (c. 925), and was ordained (930). Michael was the spiritual father of St. ATHANASIUS THE ATHONITE.

her father, Giuseppe Grillo, was chief physician at Alessandria's hospital. Her mother moved the family to Turin following her husband's death. Maddalena attended grammar school in Turin before being sent to the Ladies of Loretto boarding school in Lodi (Lombardy). Having completed school (1873), Maddalena returned to Alessandria for her debut into society.

She married (Aug. 2, 1877) Giovanni Battista Michel, a captain of the Bersaglieri. During 14 years of marriage, the couple lived in Acireale, Catania, Portici, and Naples. Her sorrow at the death of Giovanni from sunstroke might have turned to despair had she not read the life of Saint Joseph COTTOLENGO. His life inspired her to share the grief of the abandoned: orphans, the elderly, and the sick.

She turned her home into a shelter for those in need. As the numbers grew, she sold her home in order to buy and renovate a large building on the Via Faa di Bruno (1893) that became the "Little Shelter of Divine Providence." She continued her work despite opposition and enlisted the aid of others. On Jan. 8, 1899, Maddalena and eight co-workers received the religious habit and new names in the shelter's chapel, becoming the Congregation of the Little Sisters of Divine Providence.

Almost immediately the institute grew exponentially: houses were established in Apulia, Liguria, Lombardy, Lucania, the Piedmont, and Veneto. Eighteen months after the institute's foundation, a house was opened in Brazil (June 13, 1900) and, at the request of Blessed Luigi Orione (1872–1940), houses in Argentina (1927). Thereafter, Teresa crossed the Atlantic eight times to establish homes for the aged, hospitals, nurseries, orphanages, and schools in Latin America.

She was beatified in the Piazza Vittorio, Turin, Piedmont, Italy, by Pope John Paul II, May 24, 1988.

MICHEL, TERESA GRILLO, BL.

Baptized Maddalena Grillo, widow, foundress of the Congregation of the Little Sisters of Divine Providence; b. Spinetta Marengo, Alessandria, Italy, Sept. 25, 1855; d. there, Jan. 25, 1944.

Maddalena, the youngest of five children, was born into a life of privilege. Her mother, Maria Antonietta Parvopassau, had been born into the local aristocracy, while

MICHEL, VIRGIL

Benedictine liturgist and educator; b. St. Paul, Minn., June 26, 1890; d. Collegeville, Minn., Nov. 26, 1938. The son of Fred and Mary (Griebler) Michel, he was baptized George. After his education at St. John's Preparatory School and University in Collegeville, he joined the Benedictine Order there in 1909, pronounced his solemn vows on Sept. 26, 1913, and was ordained in 1916. In 1918 he received his doctorate in English and a licentiate in theology at The Catholic University of America. During the next six years (1918–24), he taught at St. John's University and also held various administrative posts, including that of dean of the college. In February 1924 Michel began philosophical studies under Joseph Gredt at Sant' Anselmo in Rome, but, dissatisfied with Gredt's approach, he went to Louvain for the following school term.

Of greatest significance for his future work in America was the knowledge he acquired of the liturgical movement in Europe, which had not yet made an impression upon the English-speaking nations. Having convinced his superior of the need of such a movement for Englishspeaking Catholics and that St. John's Abbey should undertake its promotion and be its center, Michel, during extensive study trips, consulted European liturgical leaders and scholars. Of these, Lambert BEAUDUIN especially influenced him. Back at home in the fall of 1925, Michel, with the support of Abbot Alcuin Deutsch, at once laid plans for founding the movement's organ, Orate Fratres (later renamed Worship), and established the Liturgical Press. Under his guiding hand as editor of Orate Fratres, the liturgical movement gradually took firm roots in the U.S., though not without considerable misunderstanding and opposition.

Undoubtedly Michel's chief contribution was his influence on the American liturgical movement, particularly his sketching of the implications of the liturgy for all aspects of human life. As a leader in the Catholic social movement in the Depression years of the 1930s, he spoke out boldly for the reconstruction of society on the basis of an adequate philosophy of human and spiritual values. He was a prolific writer, a tireless worker, a strong personal inspiration to others, and a man of wide-ranging interests. He published seven volumes; contributed to many more; and wrote several hundred articles, editorials, and book reviews for more than 35 periodicals. The totality of his writings constitutes a kind of Christian synthesis, embracing the natural and supernatural elements of man's life in an ever-changing world.

[P. MARX]

MICHELANGELO BUONARROTI

Sculptor, painter, architect, poet, a founder of the high Renaissance style, and the most influential late Renaissance artist; b. Caprese (Arezzo), Mar. 6, 1475; d. Rome, Feb. 18, 1564.

Life. Michelangelo's poor but aristocratic father opposed his artistic ambitions but nonetheless apprenticed him to the painter Ghirlandaio (1488). Thereafter the boy was protected by Lorenzo de' Medici, coming in contact with advanced artistic and philosophic tendencies. He was also influenced by SAVONAROLA's sermons. The supposed Neoplatonic content of Michelangelo's art has been disputed. His writings disclose profound, lifelong Catholic piety. His art embodies a new concept of human dignity and dependence on the Creator, of whose sublimity no other Renaissance artist experienced so convincing a vision. For nearly 60 years Michelangelo carried out official papal programs. Although the propriety of his creations was sometimes questioned, no ecclesiastical authority challenged their orthodoxy. Michelangelo's high Renaissance works fulfill ideals of Pope Julius II during a crisis in Church history, and his late works are imbued with Catholic Reformation mysticism.

Michelangelo's contemporaries believed him divinely inspired. The later eighteenth and early nineteenth century found his art inaccessible, but otherwise he has been considered one of the world's greatest artistic geniuses. Even Michelangelo's painting and architecture were predominantly sculptural. He depicted nature only as background for his principal theme, the life of the soul expressed in the form and movements of the body, defined in his writings as the "beautiful and mortal veil" mirroring divine intention. Michelangelo projected the body on a new scale of grandeur, distorting it to emphasize muscular power. Although his principal concern was form, his color ranged from clear, transparent tones in early work to great intensity in later paintings, and the white marble for his sculptures was chosen for its brilliance. In his architecture and painting, he subordinated space to mass and made little attempt to represent perspective.

Work. Michelangelo's ambition outran circumstances, and none of his major sculptural projects reached completion. His bronzes are all lost. Many of his marble statues, intended for perfect completion, show large unfinished areas, affording insight into his methods. He first drew outlines on the block, then cut away marble to free the figure, which emerged complete save for final polishing. His poems interpret this procedure as an allegory of divine creativity and human salvation. In architectural enframements for statues and in complete buildings, Michelangelo devoted scrupulous attention to detail, epitomizing the rhythms and tensions of the larger masses in the ornament. The finished portions of his statues show a similar intensity of life and of formal relationships, extending to the smallest elements. Michelangelo's art was founded on drawing. During old age he destroyed most of his thousands of preparatory studies for statues, paintings, and buildings; but several hundred survive. Full critical agreement on an authentic corpus of drawings has not yet been reached.

From ancient art Michelangelo absorbed heroic aspects of pose and figure structure, but he avoided classicizing faces. His faces reflect contemporary Italian types, endowed with special beauty by the artist's sensitivity. He was responsive to the qualities and meaning of Italian medieval and early Renaissance art, often quoting entire figures.

Michelangelo's poetry, most of it composed in later life, at first expresses passionate human attachments or ironic reflections; eventually, aspiration for salvation. About equally divided between sonnets and madrigals, Michelangelo's poems are abrupt in diction and difficult to interpret. The best possess a depth and power equaled by no Italian Renaissance poetry.

Michelangelo's surviving early works include the "Madonna of the Stairs" and "Battle of Lapiths and Centaurs" (1489–92), a recently rediscoverd wooden Crucifix for Santo Spirito (1492), three statuettes for the Tomb of St. Dominic in Bologna (1494–95), "Bacchus" (1496–98), the "Pietà" for St. Peter's (1498–1500), "David" (1501–04), "St. Matthew" (1503–08), the "Bruges Madonna," two marble Madonna reliefs, and the painted "Doni Madonna" (1503).

Patronage of Popes. In 1505 began the patronage of Pope Julius II, which, though often stormy and even tragic for the artist, generated some of his noblest works, especially the ceiling frescoes of the SISTINE CHAPEL (1508-12). This immense allegory of the coming of Christ envisioned by prophets and sibyls in scenes from Genesis, bordered by the ancestors of Christ, was probably guided by Cardinal Marco VIGERIO. The pope's tomb, planned as freestanding in ST. PETER'S BASILICA (1505), with more than 40 marble statues and many bronze reliefs, underwent changes in 1513, 1516, 1532, and 1542. The reduced version in S. Pietro in Vincoli (1545) contains only "Moses" and the "Active" and "Contemplative Life" by Michelangelo himself. Two "Bound Captives" from previous projects are in the Louvre; four are in the Bargello, and a "Victory" is in the Palazzo Vecchio.

The patronage of the Medici popes, LEO X and CLEMENT VII, centered on San Lorenzo, including a never-executed façade, the Medici Chapel with its magnificent sculptures (1519–34), and the library of San Lorenzo, completed from Michelangelo's drawings and models. The "Christ" of S. Maria sopra Minerva (1514–21) and "David-Apollo" (1531–32) are two great works that date from this period, during which Michelangelo was also deeply involved in Florentine struggles for liberty.

Michelangelo Buonarroti.

The "Last Judgment," terminating the decoration of the Sistine Chapel (1535–41), and the frescoes of the Pauline Chapel (1541–50), painted for Pope Paul III, reflect penitential currents in the Catholic Reformation. Although hampered by ill health, Michelangelo undertook in 1546 to complete St. Peter's, designing the present apse, transepts, two bays of the nave, and the dome, in a style prophetic of the BAROQUE. Other buildings designed in Rome include additions to the Farnese Palace (1546), the structures on the Capitoline (1538–), the Porta Pia, and Santa Maria degli Angeli (1561). Michelangelo's last sculptures, the "Pietàs" in Florence cathedral (c. 1547) and the Castello Sforzesco in Milan (1552–64), embody his meditations on the preparation of his soul for death.

is composed of an upper (northern) and a lower (southern) peninsula, which are separated by the Straits of Mackinac, spanned by the great Mackinac Bridge, opened in 1957. Four of the five Great Lakes form a part of the boundary of the peninsulas. Lake Michigan separates the two peninsulas, forming the southern boundary of the upper and the western boundary of the lower. Lansing is the capital, and Detroit is the largest city. The Catholic population of the State of Michigan is 2,226,881 or 23 percent of the total population of 9,526,685 (as of January 2001). They are organized in seven dioceses: the Archdiocese of Detroit and the six suffragan sees: Grand Rapids, Lansing, Marquette, Saginaw, Gaylord, and Kalamazoo. At the beginning of the 21st century there were 803 parishes and 52 missions served by 1,090 diocesan priests, 403 religious order priests, 308 permanent deacons, 148 brothers, and 3,006 sisters. The state had two free-standing seminaries, seven Catholic colleges or universities, 26 Catholic hospitals, 54 Catholic high schools, and 296 Catholic grade schools.

Early History. The beginnings of the Catholic Church in Michigan date from the 17th century. In the fall of 1641 the French Jesuits Charles Raymbaut and Isaac Jogues visited the Chippewa Indians in the area later called Sault Sainte Marie in northern Michigan. Thirty years later, with headquarters at St. Ignatius mission, James Marquette, Gabriel Druillettes, and other Jesuits cared for the area surrounding the Straits of Mackinac that link Lakes Huron and Michigan. By 1679, when Robert Cavelier de La Salle and Louis Hennepin, OFM, explored the St. Joseph River and built a chapel at its mouth on Lake Michigan, priests had visited almost all parts of Michigan. Detroit itself was colonized in 1701 when Antoine Cadillac arrived from Montreal, Canada, on July 24, bringing with him a Franciscan and a Jesuit. A primitive chapel was built within Cadillac's Fort Ponchartrain, and resident priests served as chaplains. In 1708 construction of a church was begun; the parish register of St. Anne's received its first entry on July 17, 1722, signed by Rev. Bonaventure Liénard. During the following decades Jesuits, including Armand de la Richardie, arrived in Detroit for work among the native people, while the Franciscans continued to minister to the white settlers.

The surrender of Montreal to the British in 1760 marked the influx to Detroit of its first Protestant element, Irish, Scotch, and English traders, soldiers, and merchants. It also presaged a change in ecclesiastical jurisdiction for the missions of the area, which until then had been under the bishop of Quebec, Canada. With the independence of the 13 English colonies and the establishment of the United States, Rome named John Carroll prefect apostolic (1784) and then first bishop of Baltimore (1789), with authority over all Catholics in the new republic. Detroit raised the American flag in 1796, at about the time that St. Anne's received Rev. Michael Levadoux, the first pastor appointed by an American bishop. Two years later, Levadoux welcomed as assistants two Sulpician confreres, Jean Dilhet and Gabriel RICHARD, the latter succeeding to the pastorate of St. Anne's in 1802. Richard opened a seminary, a school for Native Americans, and an academy for girls. On Aug. 31, 1809, he printed the Michigan Essay, probably the only issue of the first paper in Michigan. He was one of the founders (1817) of the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, of which he also served as vice-president and professor.

In 1808 the Michigan Territory was assigned to the new Diocese of Bardstown, Kentucky. When Bishop Benedict Joseph Flaget made his visitation in 1818, he erected six parishes in Detroit and resolved the difficulties that had prevented the erection of a new St. Anne's after the old structure had been leveled in the fire of 1805. Although it was first occupied in 1822, the church was not completed until Christmas 1828. To Bishop Edward Dominic Fenwick, who had been named ordinary of the new Diocese of Cincinnati (1821), with jurisdiction over the Michigan Territory, Richard reported in 1826 that there were 7,000 white Catholics in the territory and about 100 African Americans. They were served by eight priests, including Stephen BADIN at St. Joseph, Samuel MAZZUCHELLI, OP, at Mackinac Island and Green Bay, and Frederic BARAGA in the northwest sector and the upper peninsula. Although the majority of the Catholics were French settlers or native converts, the Irish were trickling into Wayne and Washtenaw counties, and in 1831 Rev. Patrick O'Kelly became their pastor in Northfield Township.

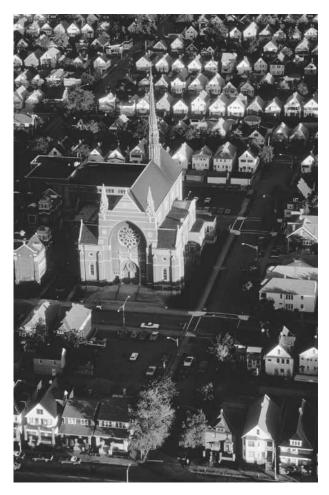

Diocese. On March 4, 1827, Leo XII named Detroit a diocese with Richard as its first ordinary, but his nomination was suppressed before the bull erecting the diocese was officially issued (March 20). Apparently, interventions by Fr. Stephen Badin and Fr. Frederic Résé gave Rome pause: the poor financial resources of the Church in Detroit and that Richard had been imprisoned for defamation of character at one time for his excommunicating a local man who had divorced and was living with another woman. This situation of holding back the establishment of the diocese remained until Richard's death on Sept. 13, 1832. Within two weeks, Fenwick also was dead and the Church in Michigan was deprived of the leadership under which it had begun its growth.

Résé. On March 8, 1833, without reference to the action taken by Rome in 1827, Gregory XVI established Detroit as a diocese for the second time; Frederic Résé of Cincinnati became its first bishop and St. Anne's its first cathedral. The diocese embraced the present states of Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and the portions of North and South Dakota east of the Mississippi. By 1838 Michigan's population had increased to 170,000; of these, between 20,000 to 24,000 were Catholics; 3,000, converted Native Americans; 8,000, English, Irish, German, and American; and the balance French. To help care for this flock, Résé had about 30 priests. As administrator of the Diocese of Cincinnati, he had brought the Poor Clares to Detroit in 1833, establishing the first convent and the first school for girls.

In 1835 Most Holy Trinity parish was established for the English-speaking Catholics, primarily the Irish. German immigrants settled in Clinton County in 1836, and within two years a resident priest was assigned to the community that became Westphalia. In Detroit, Rev. Martin KUNDIG was deputed to minister to the German Catholics, especially at the mission that became Assumption Grotto parish. Kundig also organized the Catholic Female Society in 1834 to assume responsibility for the poor and orphans made homeless by the cholera epidemic of 1834. He was appointed the town's superintendent of the poor and directed the county poor house, the infirmary, and the orphan asylum. The orphan asylum, financed solely by Catholic funds, represented the beginning of organized Catholic charity in Detroit.

Lefevere. Disputes with other bishops, mishandling of his oversight of the Poor Clares of Pittsburgh, a possible drinking problem, and unauthorized fund-raising in Europe were reasons for Résé's forced resignation in 1840. He remained bishop of Detroit but spent the rest of his life in Europe where he died in 1871. Peter Paul LEFEVERE, who had come to the Missouri missions from Belgium only eight years earlier, was named coadjutor and administrator of Detroit on July 23, 1841, and consecrated on November 22. During his 28-year episcopate, the diocese emerged from a pioneer settlement to a well-structured community capable of further development. The territory originally administered by Résé was divided first by the erection of the Diocese of Dubuque in 1837, then Milwaukee in 1843. The upper peninsula was made a vicariate in 1853, and Bishop Baraga established his see first at Sault Sainte Marie and then, in 1865, at Marquette.

Under Lefevere, Detroit's Catholic population increased to more than 150,000, the number of priests to 88, and churches to 80, with much of the growth across the southern tier of the state, in the Grand Rapids region, and around Saginaw. In 1843 five Sisters of the Holy Cross arrived to establish a school at Bertrand, near St. Joseph. In 1844 the Daughters of Charity began St. Vincent's Select School for girls in Detroit and in 1845 opened St. Vincent's, which five years later was moved to a new location and renamed St. Mary's, the first private hospital in the Northwest Territory to care for the mentally ill. In 1860 they opened St. Joseph's Retreat in presentday Dearborn, the first hospital in Michigan, and the second in the nation, to care exclusively for the mentally ill. In 1845, at his parish in Monroe, Rev. Louis Gillet, CSSR, worked with Mother Teresa Maxis Duchemin, and founded the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, one of the few native sisterhoods in the United States. Lefevere introduced into the diocese two other communities, the Religious of the Sacred Heart in 1851 and the School Sisters of Notre Dame the following year. In the same year four Brothers of the Christian Schools arrived to teach at St. Mary's. By 1874 approximately 38 parochial schools were operating in the diocese. The first diocesan regulations were issued under Lefevere, who convened the first diocesan synod in 1859.

Progress was made in Catholic journalism with the appearance on July 23, 1842, of the first number of the Western Catholic Register, the first newspaper under Catholic auspices since Richard's short-lived Michigan Essay. It was succeeded in 1853 by the Detroit Catholic Vindicator, which survived approximately six years. On Sept. 12, 1868, the Western Catholic appeared, in turn succeeded by the Western Home Journal in 1872. Eleven years later the paper was acquired by the diocese and was renamed the Michigan Catholic.

The preparatory seminary which Richard and Dilhet had attempted to establish at St. Anne's in 1804 was destroyed by fire. From 1846 to 1854, Lefevere conducted St. Thomas Seminary, probably in his own home, apparently abandoning it in favor of the American College at Louvain which, together with Bishop Martin Spalding of Louisville, he launched in 1857. Until Sacred Heart Seminary opened in 1919, the only other diocesan seminary was St. Francis in Monroe that operated from 1886 to 1889. In 1885 the cornerstone was laid for SS. Cyril and Methodius Seminary, Orchard Lake, for training young men for the service of Polish Catholics throughout the country. A new cathedral, SS. Peter and Paul, had been built in 1848 by Lefevere; he was buried there following his death on March 4, 1869.

Borgess. Caspar Henry BORGESS, chancellor of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, Ohio, was installed as Detroit's third ordinary on May 8, 1870. The 18 years of his administration were marked primarily by a consolidation of diocesan gains. The great influx of German and Irish immigrants found national parishes already established. St. Wenceslaus was organized in 1871 for the Bohemians; in the same year St. Albertus became the first of many parishes to serve the great number of Polish immigrants who flocked to Detroit. St. Aloysius parish in downtown Detroit was established in 1873; it was made the procathedral in 1877, and SS. Peter and Paul was entrusted to the Jesuits, who also opened Detroit College (1877). It became the University of Detroit and in 1963 had the largest student enrollment of any Catholic college or university in the United States. Besides the Jesuits, four other religious communities of men entered the diocese: Franciscans, Capuchins, Holy Ghost Fathers, and Basilians; the Redemptorists returned after an absence of a few years. In 1874 the Little Sisters of the Poor arrived to take up their work among the aging. In 1879 the Sisters of St. Felix came from Warsaw, Poland, and three years later established provincial headquarters in Detroit; in 1936 they moved to nearby Livonia.

In the northwest sector of the lower peninsula, lumber and fertile land attracted so many people that between 1869 and 1883 the number of churches had increased from 13 to 32. In May 1882, the Holy See established the Diocese of Grand Rapids containing 39 counties, all but two north of a line from the southern extremity of Saginaw Bay to Lake Michigan. This reduced the Diocese of Detroit to 29 counties, an area of about 18,558 square miles, with 85 priests, 100,455 Catholics, and 42 parochial schools with 9,832 pupils. The Grand Rapids diocese contained about 50,000 Catholics served by about 40 priests. Ill health caused Borgess to resign in 1887; three years later he died in Kalamazoo, Michigan, where he was buried in St. Augustine's parish cemetery.

The upper peninsula Diocese of Marquette, first headed by Bishop Baraga, saw two fellow Slovenians succeed him, Ignatius Mrak (1869–78) and John Vertin (1879–99), both of whom sought to impose order on a very disparate diocese. Frederick Eis, the fourth Bishop of Marquette (1899–1922), held the diocese's second synod (1905). Henry Joseph Richter was the first Bishop of Grand Rapids (1883–1916). He established the initial institutions of this new diocese, including the Seminary of St. Joseph (1909). His coadjutor, Michael Gallagher, ordained in 1915, succeeded him (1916) until being transferred to Detroit in 1918.

Foley. John Samuel Foley of Baltimore, Maryland, was installed as successor to Borgess on Nov. 25, 1888. During his 30-year episcopate, the Catholic population increased to 386,000, largely because of the great waves of immigrants who settled principally in Detroit to work in the newly established automobile industry. In 1899 San Francisco, the first parish for Italians, was founded, and soon there were churches for the Slovaks, Lithuanians, Hungarians, and Rumanians, among others. In 1900 St. Patrick's Church was named the cathedral and in 1918 retitled SS. Peter and Paul.

Significant developments took place among religious communities. In 1891 the Sisters of St. Joseph were founded in Kalamazoo, Michigan, where they opened (1901) Borgess Hospital. The Sisters of St. Dominic, in Michigan since 1877 when they staffed a parish school in Traverse City, chose Adrian, Michigan, as the location of their provincial house (1892) and their motherhouse (1923). In 1910 the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, founded St. Mary's College in Monroe; they renamed it Marygrove in 1925 and two years later transferred it to a new site in Detroit. In 1906 the Cloistered Dominican Nuns established a convent, and the Sisters of Bon Secours their hospital in Detroit. In 1911 the Sisters of Mercy opened St. Joseph Mercy Hospital in Ann Arbor. When Foley died on Jan. 5, 1918, the diocese had 318 priests serving 246 churches and missions.

Gallagher. Bishop Michael James Gallagher of Grand Rapids was installed as bishop of Detroit in 1918 and immediately addressed himself to the problems of an expanding, polyglot population. Among the 105 new parishes he began, 33 were for Catholics speaking foreign languages. Parish schools more than doubled in number and enrollment. In 1919 Siena Heights College was established by the Dominican Sisters in Adrian; and Nazareth College opened in 1924 under the Sisters of St. Joseph. In 1919 Sacred Heart Seminary was founded, with high school and college departments training young men for the diocesan priesthood; the Gothic structure was ready for use in the fall of 1924. Retreat houses were built for laymen and women. The Diocesan Council of Catholic Men was started. A chancery office and a new St. Aloysius Church in downtown Detroit were erected. Hospitals multiplied: St. Francis, in Hamtramck; Mercywood Sanitarium, in Ann Arbor; St. Joseph's Mercy, in Pontiac; and Mercy, in Monroe. In the 1920s the Dominican Sisters of the Third Order of St. Dominic, Discalced Carmelite Nuns, and the Sylvestrine Benedictines established provincial headquarters in the diocese.

During the 1920s the Catholics of Michigan also struggled to protect their right to send their children to Catholic schools. In 1920 and 1924 they fought a state constitutional amendment that would oblige all children to attend public schools. When Gallagher died in 1937, more than 800 priests were ministering to 602,000 Catholics.

The Diocese of Grand Rapids experienced the same growth as Detroit. Edward Kelly, ordained as an auxiliary Bishop of Detroit in 1911, became the fourth bishop of Grand Rapids in 1919 and built many institutions. He was a leader, along with the Marquette and Detroit bishops in successfully defeating the 1920 and 1924 anti-Catholic school amendment campaigns. His successor, Joseph Pinten (1926–40), wisely paid off Kelly's bills, helping the diocese to survive the Depression better than most dioceses. Paul Nussbaum, the bishop of Marquette (1922–35), served while the upper peninsula experienced a serious post–World War I economic decline which has continued to this day. His successor, Joseph Plagens (1935–40), a Detroit auxiliary bishop, faced the added trial of a burned cathedral.

The state ecclesiastical scene changed on Aug. 3, 1937, when Detroit was made an archdiocese with Grand Rapids and Marquette as suffragan sees. The creation of Lansing the next day and of Saginaw on Feb. 26, 1938, raised the number of suffragans to four. Both new sees were industrial cities that experienced great growth, especially after the Second World War. Their bishops were primarily focused on establishing the institutions of a new diocese. Since the late 1960s they also experienced the same urban trials which beset Detroit. Marquette continued to struggle on, seeing under Bishop Thomas Noa (1947–68) a share in the state's postwar boom with the erection of many buildings and ecclesial institutions. After the dynamic leadership of Francis Haas, as the sixth bishop of Grand Rapids (1943–53), this diocese experienced the steady and competent leadership of several bishops up to the present.

The Archdiocese of Detroit, meanwhile, found itself not only a leader in the state hierarchy but a crucial diocese in the Church in the United States. This was more due to the archbishops who held this see than to the diocese itself: Edward Mooney (1937–58; cardinal in 1946), John Dearden (1958–80; cardinal in 1969), Edmund Szoka (1980–90; cardinal in 1988), and Adam Maida (1990–; cardinal in 1994).

Two more suffragan sees were created on Dec. 19, 1970—Kalamazoo and Gaylord. The former has a Catholic population which is a very small percentage of the total population. The latter is serving an increasing resort population.

Michigan's economy in the last quarter of the 20th century experienced many challenges. This meant that the state population, including that of Catholics, did not increase as greatly as the rest of the country. Michigan Catholics successfully defeated a measure which would have allowed physician-assisted suicide in 1998, but twice were defeated in efforts to gain some state financial assistance for their schools (Proposition "C" in 1970 and the Voucher Proposal in 2000). As the Catholic Church in the State of Michigan enters the 21st century, she finds herself an established part of the religious, social, intellectual, and political scene but without the spirit that affected many in the Church as the labor unions, containing many Catholics, developed and exercised their power from the 1930s through the 1950s. The Church in the State of Michigan has experienced many parish-diocesan disputes, especially those based on some ethnic disagreement, and these have continued right up to the end of the 20th century. These have happened despite the suburbanization of many Catholics. The decline in clergy and the teachings of the Second Vatican Council have also seen the tremendous growth of lay involvement, especially professional lay training in theology and pastoral ministry. In all, the Catholic Church in Michigan has seen growth and decay, struggles and cooperation, population shifts and theological disputes, financial crises and stability. The greatest current trial is the shortage of clergy and vocations as the Church confronts the new century.

MICROLOGUS

The medieval Latin word for "epitome," indicating a manual that offers a synopsis or an explanation of some subject. The micrologus became a popular literary form in the Middle Ages, the Micrologus de ecclesiasticis observationibus (Patrologia Latina, 151:973–1072), by reason of its erudition, moderation, and influence (especially in German lands) probably being the most important single medieval commentary on the liturgy. This work, originally perhaps three separate treatises, contains 62 chapters: 1 to 23 treat of the celebration of Mass; 24 to 28 of the EMBER DAYS; 29 to 62 of the ecclesiastical year in general. Its purpose was to restore Roman liturgical observances throughout Europe. These observances are constantly commended, and appeal is repeatedly made to the authority of the "ancient fathers," i.e., generally such popes as LEO I, GELASIUS I, and GREGORY I THE GREAT. Decisions of the Apostolic See regarding the liturgy are to be religiously obeyed, particularly those of GREGORY VII (d. 1085), who is mentioned with veneration. Dom. L. G. MORIN established convincingly that the Micrologus was written by BERNOLD OF CONSTANCE, a supporter of Gregory VII, and that it dates from a time between 1086 and 1100. Faced with the numerous and various prayers that had been added to the Mass books over three centuries, Bernold recommended that they be reduced to the fewest possible. He urged conformity with Rome on the date of the spring and summer Ember Days and set forth Roman norms for the correct correlation of the various parts of the Divine Office and of the Mass.

MICY, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery of Saint-Mesmin, or St. Maximinus, near Orléans, Loiret, France, Diocese of Orléans. It was founded—according to suspect hagiography and charters—during the 6th century, by Euspicius and his nephew St. Maximinus (feast, December 15), the monastery's first abbot and patron saint. However, the earliest authentic document, a privilege of exemption from the tonlieu tax granted by Emperor Louis the Pious to Abbot Dructsindus, dates from Jan. 8, 815. Bishop TH-EODULF OF ORLÉANS had successfully appealed, prior to 814, to BENEDICT OF ANIANE to introduce monks. These monks restored the observance of the BENEDICTINE RULE and very probably refounded the Abbey, which had declined after flourishing briefly in the 6th century and which had been pillaged by soldiers of CHARLES MARTEL. Subsequently, Micy was twice pillaged by Norman raiders (856 and 897), and then restored under its 10thcentury abbots; it flourished materially from the 10th to the 13th century. The first history of Micy, written c. 985 by a monk, Letaldus, was the Liber miraculorum s. Maximini (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 137:795–824). A monastic library of some consequence is believed to have existed there from the 9th century. The 11th-century three-naved Romanesque church, completed under Abbot Albert (1018–35), was replaced (c. 1225–50) by a larger Gothic structure. During the Hundred Years' War, Micy suffered greatly and was in large part destroyed by the English (1428) during the siege of Orléans. It was also pillaged by the Huguenots during the Wars of Religion (1562). Abbot François de LA ROCHEFOUCAULD in 1608 introduced the Feuillant CISTERCIANS, who occupied the monastery until its total destruction in 1792, during the French Revolution. Its last abbot, De Rastignac, was executed during the September massacres.

MIDDLE AGES, THE

According to the conventions of modern historiography, part of the tripartite division of European (or Western) history into periods labelled ancient, medieval, and modern. The Middle Ages (a plural in English, Dutch, Russian, and Modern Icelandic, but a singular in other European languages; e.g. French, le moyen age; German, das Mittelalter; Italian, il medioevo) are usually considered to be the centuries from c. 500 A.D. to c. 1500 A.D., primarily in western Europe, but occasionally extended by comparativists to other parts of Eurasia as well. The period is often considered as having internal divisions early and late, or early, high, and late. The term "Middle Ages" and its adjectival form, medieval, also have a common and usually disparaging meaning in colloquial and uninformed usage, sometimes as the Dark Ages, contrasted with the perceived glories of antiquity earlier and those of the Renaissance later. Current scholarship has challenged both the appropriateness of the term "Middle Ages" for the period and the conventional dating of its beginning and end, which had never been precise in any case. Many historians extend a period recently defined as Late Antiquity (c. 250–750) into the tenth century or later and some propose a "long middle ages" from around 1000 to 1800.

Origins and Early Usage of the Term and Concept. From the fourth to the fifteenth centuries writers of history thought within a linear framework of time derived from the Christian understanding of scripture—the sequence of Creation, Incarnation, and Christ's Second Coming and the Last Judgment. In The City of God, XXII, St. Augustine posited six ages of world history that paralleled the six days of creation and the six ages of the human lifespan, of which the sixth age of history was the period between the Incarnation and the Second Coming, and a seventh age, the reign of Christ on earth. All of Augustine's references to a "middle time" must be understood within this framework of salvation-history. Early interpretations of the scriptural Book of Daniel (Dn 2.31, 7.1), especially those of St. Jerome and the historian Paulus Orosius (c. 415), added the idea of four successive world empires, those of Babylon, Persia, and Greece, of which the fourth was that of Rome. Later writers in this tradition added the idea of the translatio imperii, the "translation of the Empire" from the Romans to the Franks under CHARLEMAGNE in 800, and then to the East Frankish emperors from OTTO I (962) until the Second Coming. The theory of the four monarchies was compatible with the Augustinian sequence. The great single exception to these ideas was the work of the late twelfthcentury scriptural exegete JOACHIM OF FIORE, who posited three ages in human history, that of the Father, that of the Son, and a coming age of the Holy Spirit. But

Saint Bede. (British Library)

Joachim's view was also expressed in terms of SALVATION HISTORY.

In the fourteenth century, however, the literary moralist Francesco Petrarca (1304-1374), fascinated with Roman history and contemptuous of the time that followed it, including his own century, divided the past into ancient and new, antiquity and recent times, with the dividing line being the conversion of fourth-century Roman emperors to Christianity. According to Petrarca, what followed was an age of tenebrae, shadows, a "sordid middle time," perhaps with the hope of a better age to follow. Although Petrarca's disapproval of the Christianized Roman and post-Roman world may seem irreligious, he was a devout Christian, and his judgment was based on aesthetic, moral, and philological criteria, not those of Christianity. Petrarca's limitless admiration for Rome and his contempt for his own and recent times heralded a novel conception of the European past and established other criteria for historical periodization besides those of salvation history or the history of the church and empire. Those who followed him focused primarily on the transformation of the arts and letters, seeing a renewal of earlier dignity and achievement in the age of Petrarca and the painter Giotto, continuing into the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

In the early sixteenth century religious critics and reformers, including both Desiderius ERASMUS and Martin LUTHER, added another dimension to the new conception and terminology—the idea of a "true" evangelical Christian church that had become corrupt when it was absorbed by the Roman empire and now needed to be reformed, or restored to its earlier apostolic authenticity. Thus, the historical dimension of both the Protestant Reformations and the Catholic Reformations of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries added a sharply polemical religious interpretation to Petrarca's original conception, as church history was put to the service of confessional debate

Petrarca's cultural successors, the literary humanists, also used varieties of the expression: media tempestas (Giovanni Andrea, Bishop of Aleria in a memorial on Nicholas of Cusa in 1469, directly quoted by later writers in 1493 and 1514) and media antiquitas, media aetas, media tempora (all between 1514 and 1530). In 1604 the political theorist and historian Melchior Goldast appears to have coined the variation medium aevum, and shortly after in a Latin work of 1610 the English jurist and legal historian John Selden repeated medium aevum, Englishing the term in 1614 to middle times and in 1618 to middle ages. As early as 1641 the French historian Pierre de Marca coined the French vernacular term moyen âge, which gained authority in the respected lexicographical work of Charles du Fresne, Seigneur du Cange, the Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae latinitatis (1678), in which du Fresne emphasized the inferior quality of Latin linguistic usage after the fourth century. Other historians, including Gisbertus Voetius (Exercitia et bibliotheca studiosi theologiae, 1644) and Georg Horn (De arca Noe, 1666, and Orbis politicus, 1667) used such terms as media aetas in their histories of the church. The term and idea circulated even more widely in other historical works. Du Cange's great dictionary also used the Latin term medium aevum, as did the popular historical textbook by the Halle historian Christoph Keller (1638-1707) in 1688, The Nucleus of Middle History between Ancient and Modern, although Keller claimed that he was simply following the terminology of earlier scholars. By the late seventeenth century, medium aevum was the most commonly used term for the period in Latin and various versions of "the middle ages" in European vernacular languages.

The Enlightenment and Romanticism. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries a number of thinkers argued that western Europe after the fifteenth century had surpassed even antiquity in its discoveries and technology and created a distinctively modern world. Their historical views did nothing to change the image of the Middle Ages, however, and those views were sharpened by Enlightenment critics of earlier European political and religious structures. VOLTAIRE, in his Essai sur les moeurs of 1756, savaged both the Latin Christian and the reformed churches for their clerical obscurantism and earlier rulers for their ruthless and arbitrary uses of force. Edward Gibbon, whose great work The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire ended with the fall of Constantinople to the Ottoman Turks in 1453, categorically attributed the beginning of that very long "decline and fall" to "the triumph of barbarism and religion," thus contemptuously characterizing the entire period that followed.

But as Gibbon's own work showed, not only had the term and the often pejorative idea of the Middle Ages been shaped in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but so had the critical, technical standards of modern historical scholarship. Some Enlightenment thinkers came to share the respect for and interest in the period that many conservative rulers, nobles, magistrates, and churchmen continued to express and to apply critical historical techniques to its investigation. The new scholarly interest was intensified by the work of historians imbued with national sentiment and a conception of historically "ethnic" communities in areas that often lacked a past (or had only a provincial or peripheral frontier-past) in the Greco-Roman world, especially in Germany and England. The medieval history and ancestry of nineteenthcentury nation-states, their vernacular languages, art, literature, and surviving architectural monuments, indeed most elements of folk culture; and an emotional sympathy for (largely imaginary) features of the distant postclassical past produced in most Romantic historians, as in painters, poets, historical novelists, architects, composers, and their patrons and audiences, an affectionate and sentimentalized portrait of the Middle Ages, although that portrait was usually no more accurate than the polemical characterizations of Enlightenment rationalist sceptics.

Nor were all nineteenth-century historians appreciative of the period. Jules Michelet (1798–1874), the immensely popular and influential French historian, at first praised the Middle Ages as the birth of France, but by 1855 his increasing political liberalism led him to repudiate his earlier admiration in favor of emphasizing the France of the sixteenth century, virtually coining the term Renaissance in the process and appropriating it for France. In 1860 the Basel historian Jacob Burckhardt published his Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy, a work as widely read and influential as that of Michelet.

In spite of Romantic nostalgia and increasingly disciplined scholarship, in the late work of Michelet and the study of Burckhardt the opposition between the Middle Ages and the Renaissance was fixed in most modern usage, generally to the disadvantage of the former. These views were sharpened by nineteenth-century anticlericalism.

The Middle Ages in Modern Historiography. With the extraordinary growth of the academic discipline of history in the nineteenth century, the history of the Middle Ages was absorbed into departments of history in Europe and the United States and established in university curricula in both survey courses and research seminars. Journals of historical research began publication in Germany (1859), France (1876), England (1886), and the United States (1895), regularly including studies of one aspect or another of the Middle Ages. The editing and printing of historical documents and the writing of scholarly monographs brought the history of the Middle Ages into synchronization with other fields of history, as national history in European countries, but as more broadly pan-European, with a focus chiefly on English and French history rather than German after World War I, in the United States. The most influential monument to the new academic and professional history was the eightvolume collaborative Cambridge Medieval History, which appeared between 1911 and 1936. The New Cambridge Medieval History began to appear in 1998.

Although the teaching responsibilities of academic historians of the Middle Ages still generally reflect the original tripartite division of European history into ancient, medieval, and modern, most historians specialize in only very small parts of a very long period and are acutely aware of the need to subdivide it. With the emergence of Late Antiquity as a distinct research and teaching field following the stimulus of such early and midtwentieth-century historians as the French scholar Henri-Irenée Marrou, the Austrian Alfons Dopsch, the Belgian Henri Pirenne, the Italian Arnaldo Momigliano, and the English historians Peter Brown and Robert Markus, the early part of the conventional Middle Ages is now being rethought and rewritten. With the emergence of various definitions of Early Modern History, as a result of the work of the Austrian Otto Brunner and the English Geoffrey Barraclough and others, older periodizations like the Middle Ages, Renaissance, Reformation, and Scientific Revolution are being subsumed into a period extending from the late thirteenth century to the eighteenth—the later end of the "long middle ages." Specialized scholarly conferences, historical journals, and monograph series reflect these changes in the configuration of the period.

Scholars have also rethought the nature of change in different parts of Europe. Not only must they deal with the obvious differences between those lands in later Europe that had been part of the Roman Empire and those which had not, but also with the relations between the older Mediterranean world (large areas of which entered the Byzantine and Arab/Islamic cultural orbits—raising the question of comparison among the three cultures of the Mediterranean basin) and northern Europe. There is also the question of the pattern by which a culture with its heart in southern and western Europe gradually exported itself to the north and east, from Iceland to the Urals, often it seems, by a process closely approximating colonization, but a form of colonization that ended by slowly absorbing the colonies into an expanded mother-culture.

The Middle Ages will not disappear as a term, concept, or curricular subject from either colloquial or academic usage in the foreseeable future, but the history of the term and the current debate about its temporal and spatial application and appropriateness as a component of European history is a reminder that historical periods are cultural and social constructs, that human life changes often rapidly within labeled periods, however designated, and that the dialogue between continuity and change is the historian's primary intellectual activity.

Chronology. Regardless of the loaded aesthetic, linguistic, confessional, and philosophical origins of the term, the label "Middle Ages" is in any case misleading, because however one defines its chronology, its content is the emergence of a distinctive European civilization out of a region originally on the periphery of the Hellenistic-Roman Mediterranean civilization of antiquity. Although European civilization appropriated elements of both Greco-Roman antiquity and Judeo-Christian (especially the Christian interpretation of Jewish) religion and ethics, the emergence of Europe paralleled the division of the ancient Mediterranean ecumenical world into the civilizations of Byzantium, or East Rome, and Islam. Three sibling civilizations, two of them Christian, emerged at around the same time, and the influence of Eurasian history on that of Europe has recently attracted the attention of historians. But such change does not occur in a single year and not even in a single century, and to assign any but an approximate date to the beginning or end of the Middle Ages, as was once the fashion, is pointless. Far more important is the assessment of change in different periods between the third and the sixteenth centuries.

In one respect, that of dating, the Middle Ages introduced the dating of the Common Era, when the eighth-century English computist St. BEDE adapted the practice first used by DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS in the fifth century of dating history Anno Domini, "in the year of the Lord."

Bede's practice was taken up by Frankish chroniclers and rulers from the late eighth century on. Within the year, a universal Christian calendar also slowly displaced the older Roman calendar, with the month surviving from Roman usage and the week from Jewish, displacing the older Roman kalends, ides, and nones.

Rome, Latin Christianity, and the European Provinces. The Roman empire that gradually faded in the west during and after the fifth century (although its language, memory, Christianity, and many institutions survived) was no longer the empire of Augustus, nor was it the empire of Marcus Aurelius. Internal and external crises during the third and fourth centuries had resulted in the division of the empire into an eastern and western part after 285, with the east possessing far more material, political, and military resources and a great city as its capital, Constantinople. The entire empire was restructured to finance immense military expenditure, giving the European provinces and frontier areas greater importance.

The western part, the capital of which moved north from Rome to a number of cities, including Trier, Arles, and Milan, and ultimately to Ravenna, became less urbanized, more ruralized, and gradually dominated by an aristocracy of landowners and military officials. After 375, a series of composite peoples, many of them only recently assembled, ruled by their own political and military elites, assumed control of a number of western provinces, often in the name of the Roman emperor and with the cooperation of Roman provincials. Many of these Romans were Christian higher clergy. The term catholic ("universal") Christianity was originally used as a term to authenticate a normative Christian cult on the grounds of its universality and to characterize different beliefs and practices as heterodox on the grounds that they were merely local and reflected neither duration, unanimity nor universality. The normative Christianity of the empire gradually became the Christianity of Europe's new local rulers. Within that coherence, however, many of the new kings and peoples based their claims to legitimacy on their own local versions of Latin Christianity, expressed in law, ritual, saints' cults, and sacred spaces. If the older empire and the new, non-imperial lands in Europe into which a new culture expanded came to call itself Christianitas, "Christendom," it was in practice divided into what a recent historian has called many self-contained "micro-Christendoms."

The new kings ruled as much in Roman style as they could, issuing laws written in Latin, coins that imitated imperial coinage, and sponsoring "ethnic" and genealogical histories that attributed to themselves and their peoples, however recently assembled, an identity and antiquity rivaling that of Rome. Although Romans had long despised the term rex, "king," they considered it suitable for the rulers of gentes, "tribes," who had not reached the level of the Romans, who called their own society a populus, a "people." Some of these kingdoms, especially that of the VISIGOTHS in Iberia, also modelled themselves on the Hebrew kingdom as described in scripture, borrowing and adapting some ancient Jewish ritualsuch as anointing the ruler with oil and liturgically reminding him that he was God's servant, with responsibilities as well as powers. The kings and aristocracies of landowners ruled subjects both slave and free, most of them ruralized, as cities shrank and the need for them except as royal residences or capitals or as seats of bishops, decreased. As these cultures spread throughout western Europe during the fifth to eighth centuries, they reached areas that the empire had never ruled, initially Ireland, then northern Britain, the lower Rhineland, and trans-Rhenish Europe, influencing political and religious change in these areas as well.

The Mandate for Conversion. The process of expansion was also driven by a missionary mandate: the conversion of all peoples, no longer only those of the Empire, to Christianity, carried out independently by bishops, monks, and holy men (the bishop and the monk were two of the most remarkable religious and social inventions of late antiquity—the barbarian kingdoms were a third), and by Greek Christians from Constantinople as well as by missionaries from the new kingdoms and the bishops of Rome. The model of conversion of both religious belief and practice was collective—that of a ruler and his followers together as a new Christian people, integrating rulership with clerical teaching and the development of liturgy, with the definition of sacred space, control of sanctity, and the rituals surrounding key moments in human life, extending to death and burial. As Roman and non-Roman peoples assimilated during the sixth and seventh centuries, non-Romans gradually became Christian clergy themselves, and frequently saints. The conversion of Ireland in the late fifth century brought the particularly Irish ascetic practice of self-exile to bear on missionary work

Although the bishops of Rome enjoyed great respect and veneration because of the antiquity of their see, its historical orthodoxy, the relics of its martyrs (including both Peter and Paul), and the imperial and Christian history of the city of Rome, the material conditions of the sixth and seventh centuries greatly limited any papal exercise of universal authority or influence and developed relatively little theory about them. The Christian clergy preserved a literate Latin culture based on the text and understanding of scripture in several Latin versions, the writings of the Church Fathers, the legislation of Church councils, and the idea of tradition, which states that the authority of the Apostles had been passed down (Latin, traditio) to the Christian higher clergy, particularly to the bishops.

During the seventh and eighth centuries, new invasions in the east and the emergence of Islam, first in the Arab world and then west into Egypt and Numidia and east into Persia, divided the old Mediterranean ecumenical world into three distinct culture-zones, the sibling worlds of East Rome, or Byzantium, that of Islam, and that of Latin Europe. Byzantium and western Europe remained long on the defensive against Islamic pressures, which extended to the conquest of the Iberian Peninsula in 711, Sicily in 902, and Anatolia in the eleventh century.

The Frankish Adventure. In western Europe, the FRANKS established a strong monarchy under CLOVIS in the early sixth century. Although the Frankish kingdom was divided under Clovis's successors, it was reunited under the lordship, then monarchy (after 751) under PEPIN II and his successors, Charles MARTEL, PEPIN III, and Charlemagne (768–814), bringing much of the continent under Frankish control and establishing diplomatic relations with Britain, Iberia, Rome, Constantinople, and even with Harun al-Rashid, the great caliph of Baghdad. As each of these three cultures constructed a distinctive character based on different uses of and attitudes toward the older Roman-Mediterranean ecumenical past, they maintained diplomatic and commercial contact, sometimes on a much-reduced scale, and continued to influence each other culturally even as they became more distinctively individualized.

The world of Charlemagne and his successors also patronized a vast project of what it called correctio—restoring a fragmented western European world to an earlier idealized condition—by patronizing monastic studies, attempting to standardize monastic practice and rules of life, insisting on high clerical standards, adopting and disseminating standard versions of canon law and the liturgy, and maintaining a regular network of communications throughout. In 800, Pope LEO III crowned Charlemagne emperor of the Romans, a title that his successors also adopted. Historians still debate whether these developments indicated a backward-looking, last gasp of the older world of late antiquity or a new organization of then elements of what later became Europe.

In the ninth and tenth centuries a series of new invasions from Scandinavia, the lower Danube Valley, and North Africa greatly weakened the late Carolingian world. Its military needs were met by both kings and powerful lords with armies of private followers. Although two kinds of invaders—the Scandinavians and Hungarians—became assimilated and Christianized over the next several centuries, the Islamic world remained apart, extending from Iberia and Morocco eastwards to the western edges of China and southeast Asia. But in the case of western Europe, these were the last outside invasions until the allied landings in 1944—making western Europe the only part of the world that remained free of outside invasions for nearly one thousand years. Europe could increase demographically, improve materially, and engage in cultural and commercial reciprocity and technology transfer with its parallel civilizations, but after the tenth century it no longer needed to defend itself against them.

The Demographic, Agricultural, and Urban Takeoff. Historians disagree about the extent of the social and material damage caused by the ninth- and tenthcentury invasions, but there is little disagreement that shortly after the end of the tenth century, perhaps earlier, signs of demographic growth are clearly visible, as are signs of a reorganization of both lordship and labor in which an order of experienced and determined warriors concentrated the control of land in its own and its dynasty's hands and coerced a largely free peasantry into subjection to it. Thus did the idea of the three orders of society—those who pray, those who fight, and those who labor-come into use to describe the results of the ascendance of the landholding aristocracy and its clerical partners. In co-operation with ecclesiastical establishments, particularly great monastic foundations like CLUNY, and with bishops, the nobility of the late eleventh and twelfth centuries established the agrarian basis of the urbanizing process, also well underway in the eleventh century.

Reform and Renewal. At the same time movements for ecclesiastical reform focused on a redefinition of clerical and lay identities, emphasizing clerical celibacy, clerical freedom from dependence on the laity, and the libertas of the Church to accomplish its divinely-ordained mission. By the middle of the eleventh century, these movements reached Rome itself, where a line of reform-minded popes, beginning with LEO IX (1049–1054) and continuing with GREGORY VII (1073–1085) and URBAN II (1088–1099) placed the papal office at the head of reform, while articulating a systematic claim to papal authority over both clergy and, in many matters, laity as well.

The emotional intensity of ecclesiastical reform led to outbursts of religious enthusiasm both in favor and against, and one of the most significant results was the military expedition that captured Jerusalem in 1099 and established for a century the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, an expedition much later called the First Crusade (see CRUSADES).

The reform movement of the eleventh and twelfth centuries produced an independent clerical order, hierarchically organized under the popes, which claimed both a teaching authority (magisterium) and a disciplinary authority based on theology and canon law that regulated much of lay and all of clerical life, defined orthodoxy and heterodoxy, expressed itself through a series of energetic church councils from 1123 to the Fourth LATERAN COUN-CIL in 1215, and greatly enhanced both the ritual and legal authority of the popes. At the same time, new devotional movements led to both outbursts of dissent (with new forms of ecclesiastical discipline devised to control them) and equally passionate expressions of orthodox devotion. In particular, the Order of Friars Minor, founded by the layman FRANCIS OF ASSISI to administer to the spiritual needs of the cities, spread widely and rapidly, as did the Order of Preachers, founded by the canon of Osma, Domingo de Guzman (1170-1221). These and other devotional movements were supported by Pope IN-NOCENT III (1189-1216) and his successors. The movement of reform and renewal also witnessed the expression of devotion in new, large churches, pilgrimage and crusade, the increase in Marian devotion and that of the crucified, rather than the regal Jesus. Commenting on scripture grew from the early contemplative monastic style to the investigative techniques and speculative theology of the new schools.

During the twelfth century clerical teaching authority was articulated in the new universities, distinctive corporate institutions that had begun with the teaching of law at Bologna and the teaching of the arts and theology at Paris, later spreading the model to Oxford and other centers of learning. With the foundation of the University of Prague in 1348, the model crossed the Rhine river for the first time.

The Territorial Monarchies. During the conflicts over reform in the late eleventh and early twelfth centuries, the office of emperor lost much of its religious character, although several twelfth- and thirteenth-century emperors reasserted their authority by means of Roman law and energetically applied lordship. But the most successful rulers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were, first, individual lords who created compact and thoroughly governed principalities, and second and most important, kings who asserted their authority over that of the princes, although often with princely cooperation. The monarchies of England, France, León-Castila, Aragon, Portugal, and elsewhere all acquired their fundamental shape and character in the twelfth century. Although the Mongol invasions wreaked havoc on eastern Europe in the thirteenth century, the west was spared them, and not until the expansion of the Ottoman Turkish empire in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries did the eastern borders of Christian Europe undergo a greater threat, one that lasted until the Treaty of Carlowitz in 1699.

In the twelfth century too, literary vernacular languages emerged from under the protective umbrella of Latin, and history-writing took particular kings and peoples as its subjects rather than universal salvation-history, or else it relocated these in salvation-history in lively and novel ways. The territorial monarchies were supported by a larger and larger bureaucracy, new techniques of public finance, increasingly expensive warfare, and the political identity of kings and peoples. Following the papal model in both their formal documentation and their establishment of diplomatic relations with each other, these states represented something quite new in world history, incorporating both clergy and laity under vigorous royal dynasties. The later states of Europe, as well as their political theory and constitutional structure, grew out of the Italian city-republics and territorial monarchies of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

Crisis and Recovery. The process of rural and urban expansion and development paused in the fourteenth century as famine, epidemic disease, intensified and prolonged warfare, and financial collapse brought growth to a halt and reduced the population for a time to around a half of the 70 million people who inhabited Europe in 1300. But the resources that had created the Europe of the twelfth and thirteenth century survived these crises. It is the resiliency of Europe, not its weakness, that explains the patterns of recovery in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. That recovery continued through the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

The missionary mandate reached out across Mongoldominated Asia as far east as China, where a Christian bishop took up his seat at Beijing in 1309. The Mongol opening of Eurasia relocated Europe in the minds of its inhabitants. Improved maritime techniques in both navigation and marine engineering led Europeans from the thirteenth century on to cross and map first, the local seas, and then the Atlantic and Pacific. From the late fifteenth century Europe began to export itself once more, as it once had to the north and east from the tenth to the fifteenth centuries, this time over vast oceans and to other continents than Eurasia.

Neither the crises of the fourteenth century nor the voyages and discoveries of the fifteenth suggest a fatigued and exhausted Europe. On the contrary, the resiliency and capacity for innovation of fourteenth- and fifteenth-century Europe, the determined and often confident search for salvation among ordinary people leading ordinary lives, even the inability of governments to weigh down their subjects without fierce displays of resistance, all indicate the strength of that European society and culture that men and women had shaped from the eighth century on.

MIDDLE EAST COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (MECC)

The general ecumenical awakening of the early twentieth century inspired the churches of the Middle East to search for ways to heal centuries-old quarrels and find opportunities for collaboration. The Ecumenical Patriarch Yoachim III raised the issue of Christian unity and encouraged the spirit of reconciliation. The Protestant missions formed a fellowship of 36 Protestant agencies called the Near East Christian Council in 1956. Early contacts between the Near East Christian Council and the Oriental Orthodox Churches blossomed into full collaboration in 1962 when some of these Oriental Orthodox Churches joined the Protestant Churches to form the Near East Council of Churches (NECC). In turn, NECC conducted negotiations with the Eastern Orthodox Churches, and in 1974 the Middle East Council of Churches (MECC) was born. Adopting the "Family" system, the original MECC comprised three Families: Protestant-Evangelical, Oriental Orthodox, and Eastern Orthodox. The seven Catholic Churches of the Middle East were initially invited as observers, and after about 15 years of dialogue, they joined the MECC at its fifth General Assembly in 1990, bringing its membership to four Families.

Five themes summarize the objectives of MECC: (1) strengthening a sense of unity, (2) encouraging mutual support among the churches, (3) cultivating mutual respect and understanding, (4) nurturing the spirit of diakonia, (5) fostering collaboration among the member churches and between them and churches elsewhere.

A General Assembly meeting every four years gives the Council its basic orientations. There is also a Council of Presidents consisting of four members. A 24-member Executive Committee meets once or twice a year. The General Secretariat, which comprises the General Secretary and three Associates, organizes programs dealing with human rights and Christian-Muslim dialogue. Three program units: (i) Faith and Unity, which deals with ecumenical concerns, (ii) Life and Service, which offers relief and developmental services, and (iii) Education and Renewal, implement the mandate of the Council at the grassroots level. Two remaining program units deal with communication and finance. All four Families are equally represented at all levels of the Council structure, independently of the number of their faithful.

Since its inception, the MECC has served as a platform for ecumenical dialogue in the region, contributing significantly to the improvement of relations among the churches of the area and with other ecumenical organizations in the world at large. Its various ''diakonal'' programs and emergency relief services have alleviated significantly the suffering of the people in the Middle East, especially refugees and underprivileged. In addition, it also highlights human right issues and collaborates with other organizations to improve Muslim-Christian relations.

MIDDLEMORE, HUMPHREY, BL.

Carthusian priest, vicar of London Charterhouse, martyr; b. Edgbaston, Warwickshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), June 19, 1535. Humphrey, the son of Thomas Middlemore and Ann Lyttleton of Pillaton Hall, was born into one of the oldest families in the county. Although little is known of his life, it is certain that he was a man of piety and learning who was appointed as procurator for the London Charterhouse after his profession.

In 1534 Henry VIII sought the express acknowledgment from the Carthusians and other prominent subjects of the validity of his marriage to Anne Boleyn and the right of their children to succeed to the throne. When John HOUGHTON, the prior, and Middlemore refused to sign the Oath of Succession, they were imprisoned in the Tower of London. A month later they were permitted to take the oath conditionally ("so far as the law of God allows"), and released.

The following year Fr. John was executed for refusing to take the new oath of supremacy, leaving Fr. Humphrey as the vicar of the Charterhouse. Henry again attempted to persuade the monks to support him by assigning Thomas Bedyll, one of the royal commissioners, to argue with the monks against papal supremacy. When they remained unmoved, Thomas Cromwell authorized the arrest of Middlemore and his monks BB. Sebastian NEWDIGATE and Blessed William EXMEW. They were cruelly treated in prison: bound to posts with chains round their necks and legs for two weeks without relent. Nevertheless they refused to take the oath when brought before the Privy Council, and went so far as to ably support their position by reference to Scripture and the Fathers. They were accordingly condemned to death.

All three monks were beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); May 11 (with Newdigate in the Archdiocese of Birmingham).

MIDDLETON, ANTONY, BL.

Priest and martyr; b. Middleton-Tyas, North Riding, Yorkshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Clerkenwell (London), May 6, 1590. Antony was nobly born to Ambrose Middleton of Barnard Castle, Durham, and his wife Cecil Crackenthorpe of Howgill Castle, Westmoreland. He studied theology at the English College, Rheims, France, from 1582 until his ordination on May 30, 1586. He ministered successfully in the environs of London until his arrest in Clerkenwell and execution as a priest. He was beatified Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

MIDDLETON, ROBERT, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. 1571, at York, England; d. ca. April 3, 1601, hanged, drawn, and quartered at Derby. Born into a Catholic family, he appears to have practiced as an Anglican for a time, but he was reconciled to the Church, perhaps because of the martyrdom of St. Margaret CLI-THEROW, née Middleton (d. 1586). In 1594, he began seminary studies at Rheims and then Seville before transferring to the English College in Rome (1597), where he was ordained (1598). He labored in Lancaster for two years. In 1599 Middleton wrote a letter to Jesuit superior Henry GARNET requesting admittance into the Society of Jesus; it is unknown whether Middleton ever received the response informing him of his acceptance, for on Sept. 30, 1600, he was arrested while riding from Preston to Fulde in Lancashire. A rescue attempt was made but failed, leading to the apprehension of Bl. Thurston HUNT also. During questioning Middleton acknowledged the authority of the queen in temporal matters and said that he prayed God would one day make her a Catholic. Middleton and Hunt were condemned in March 1601 for their priesthood and beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

MIDDLETON, THOMAS COOKE

Historian; b. Philadelphia, Pa., March 30, 1842; d. Villanova, Pa.; Nov. 19, 1923. He was the oldest of the nine children of Joseph and Lydia (Cooke) Middleton. The Middletons were Quakers before the family was received into the Catholic Church in April 1854. Thomas studied at Villanova College (later University) from 1854 to 1858, when he was sent to the Augustinian novitiate at Tolentino, Italy. He made his vows there on Oct. 10, 1859. After completing his theology in San Agostino in Rome, he was ordained at the Basilica of the Holy Savior (Basilica of St. John Lateran), on Sept. 24, 1864. He returned to the U.S. in 1865 and was assigned to Villanova College, where he remained for the next 58 years. Between 1866 and 1914 he was professor, vice president, and president (1876–78) of the college, prior of the monastery, counselor (definitor) and regent of studies for the American province, and associate and secretary to the provincial. In 1884 he was one of the founders of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia; he served from then until 1890 as its president. From 1899 to 1905 he was director of the society's publications and editor of its journal, Records of the American Catholic Historical Society. A partial list of his writings includes his Historical Sketch of Villanova (1893), Augustinians in the United States (1909), articles on Augustinian hagiography, accounts of prominent churchmen, descriptions of Philadelphia churches, and lives of priests of his order. His papers, now in the archives of Villanova University, exemplify his contribution to Augustinian and Pennsylvania historiography.

MIDRASH

A common term in Jewish literature for a homiletic discussion of a text of Sacred Scripture for the purpose of applying the text to a present situation. In this article the usage of the word, the characteristics of midrash, types of midrash, and examples of it will be treated.

Usage of the Word. The Hebrew noun midrāš occurs three times in the OT: in two Chr 13.22 and 24.27 as the title of a literary work of unknown nature, and in Sir 51.23, where the term, bêt midrāš, "house of study, school," occurs for the first time, if the reading is genuine. In the Qumran literature published to date, the term midrāš means "juridical investigation" as well as "study" and "interpretation [of the Scriptures]," and is used also as a title for a work of Biblical interpretation. In the subsequent rabbinic literature the word midrāš was used almost exclusively in the sense of "Biblical interpretation": (1) a single comment on a Biblical text was called a midrāš, as well as a collection of such interpretations (plural: midrāšîm); (2) from the 3d century A.D. onward, with the increasing interest in the plain sense (pešat) of Scripture, the term midrash also came to signify the earlier, predominantly homiletic exeges is as distinguished from the later scientific exegesis, and thus midrash sometimes designates that Biblical interpretation that seeks to go beyond the literal sense to find hidden and more profound senses of Scripture (see HERMEN-EUTICS, BIBLICAL). The word midrash has modernly come to designate a literary form and is thus used as a technical term to describe rabbinic exegetical literature of the 2d to 13th century A.D. (see MIDRASHIC LITERA-TURE) and material in earlier Jewish literature and the NT that manifests similar characteristics.

Characteristics of Midrash. A midrash's primary focus is on a Biblical text. Its purpose is homiletic, i.e., practical and religious, rather than speculative. It seeks to make the text relevant here and now. It sees in the text the Word of God as valid and meaningful for every age and attempts to point out its implications for the present. Midrashic discussion is free; it may be based on the literal sense or it may make applications never intended by the original author.

Types of Midrash. Based on content, midrash is divided by the Jews into HALAKAH (legal discussions of the Bible) and HAGGADAH (nonlegal, didactic exposition). A third classification, pesher, has been suggested recently to provide a category for the Biblical commentaries $(p^e \check{sar}\hat{nm})$ composed by the QUMRAN community. However, the terms haggadah and halakah as defined by the Jews are exhaustive and exclude a third classification from content. Pesher is actually haggadic midrash.

Based on form, midrash can be a single interpretative statement, or a collection of such statements in a homily or in a verse-by-verse scriptural commentary. Midrash can also be a rewritten version of a Biblical narrative. This type supplies to the text of the Bible aids for understanding its story and adds imaginative embellishments to the narrative to make it more vivid, ample, and edifying. Because of the imaginative element in some midrashim, fictional embellishing of history has been erroneously equated with midrash. It cannot be overemphasized that midrashic embellishments are those made on a scriptural text. Fictional material with no connection with a Biblical text is called by the Jews free haggadah. Some exegetes equate anthological style with midrash, i.e., the use of Biblical phraseology to express one's thoughts. The equation, however, should not be automatic. Sometimes the Biblical allusions used are merely contributing to a new composition, and no attention is fixed on their original meaning (e.g., in Prv 1; 8–9; Wis 1–9); this is not midrash. On the other hand, sometimes the Biblical allusions and texts not only provide words and images for the new composition, but they do so in such a way that the finished product contributes to an understanding of the original texts. Such anthologies are midrashic [e.g., 1QS 8.4-10 (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) and some of the echoes of Jeremiah in Dn 9.1-19].

Examples. Midrash as a literary form originated in the postexilic period as a result of an increased emphasis in Judaism on the Scriptures and the gradual fixing of the Biblical text. Isolated midrashic statements and sections are found in the late books of the OT (Sir 7.27–28; 1 Mc 7.16–17), the apocrypha (Testament of Nephtali 8.8), the Qumran literature (CD 4.14–19; 6.4–11), the NT (Gal 4.21–31; Heb 3.7–4.11; 7.1–10), and in abundance in the Palestinian TARGUMS. Verse-by-verse midrash can be seen in the peshers from Qumran, and narrative midrash (or 'rewritten Bible'') in the Genesis Apocryphon. Jn 6.31–60 is an example of a midrashic homily, and Wis 11.2–19.22 is an example of a homily with midrashic elements

MIDRASHIC LITERATURE

The midrashic method of exegesis presupposes a definitive and accepted scriptural text. In this way MIDRASH differs essentially from the expansions and glosses that, in the course of their long period of formation, filled out the ancient books and occasionally gave them a new relevance for later times. As long as a book was not yet a part of the canon, its content could be enlarged by the clarifications of later authors, which in many cases became so much a part of the text that it is difficult now to distinguish them from the underlying document with any degree of certainty. The development of the midrashic method is thus bound up with the rabbinical postulate that after the minor Prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the holy spirit (i.e., the gift of prophecy) disappeared from Israel (Tosephta, Sota XIII, 2; Joma 9b; Sota 48b; Sanhedrin 11a).

Midrashic method in the strict sense can accordingly be described as typical of Pharisaism and the normative, rabbinical Judaism that developed on a Pharisaic basis after the destruction of the Temple (A.D. 70). Only in its beginnings was this technique present among such groups, apocalyptic writers, for example, as they thought of themselves as endowed with the gift of the spirit; and even among these it found a place only insofar as the group in question interpreted received canonical texts distinct from the newer "inspired" texts produced within their own circle. The DEAD SEA SCROLLS contain typical examples of such a literature (O. Betz, Offenbarung und Schriftforschung in der Qumransekte [Tübingen 1960]).

Midrashic Method. In the sense of inquiring into and explaining the will of God as formulated in already existing Scripture, this method took its rise in the period of the return from the Exile (Ezr 7.10). The interpretation of the Scriptures was in the hands of the so-called SCRIBES, who originally were, for the most part, of priestly descent. But in the course of time, especially from the 1st century B.C., when the PHARISEES began to influence the SANHEDRIN, the lay elements played an everincreasing role. The place where this interpretation was taught came to be known as the bêt ha-midrāš (already in Sir 51.23; see Shabbat 65a; Enziglopedia talmudit [Jerusalem 1951] 3:210–213). It was a place of study in conjunction with the SYNAGOGUE, the place of liturgical veneration of the word of God, another practice that originated in the postexilic period.

Midrash at Qumran. The QUMRAN COMMUNITY of ESSENES employed the term "midrash" in the phrase $midraš\ ha-t\hat{o}r\hat{a}$ (1QS 8.15; CD 20.6–7). By this "midrash to the Law" they seem to mean "a definitive collection of instructions taken from Scripture to regulate the mode of living of the members of the sect" (Betz, $op.\ cit.\ 33$). In 1QS 6.6 it is set down that in each community of 10 men, one must be engaged in studying the law $(d\bar{o}r\bar{e}s)^*ha-t\hat{o}r\hat{a}$). The enemies of the community studied the law incorrectly and for this reason were called "teachers of slippery things" $(d\hat{o}r^es)^\hat{e}$ $halag\hat{o}t$, v.g., 1Q Hod 2.15, 32; 4Q p Nah; Dan 1.18). In Judaica 18 (1962) 233–249, J. Maier conclusively proved that this word was used as a derogatory name for Pharisees. The midrash-type commentaries to OT books found in Qumran are typical of the community's scriptural study and interpretation. An early instance of similar methods is Dn 7.17–27.

Rabbinical Midrashim. In Pharisaic and rabbinical circles, as at Qumran, midrash took the external form of a running commentary on the biblical text. The most important and oldest midrashim (plural of midrash) come from the time of doctors of the MISHNAH, the so-called Tannaim (see TALMUD). They were compiled for the same reason that the Mishnah itself was compiled, in the endeavor, after A.D. 70, to preserve within normative Judaism a solid body of traditional narratives, as well as of legal precedents and customary law, safeguarded against forgetfulness and arranged for ready use in dispute with advocates of heterodox opinions and practices. These Tannaitic midrashim are from the schools of Rabbi AKIBA BEN JOSEPH and Rabbi Ishmael; they were not compiled and edited in a final form, however, until the time of the early Amoraim (3d-4th century A.D.). The seven hermeneutical rules of Hillel and the 13 rules of Ishmael provided the basic principles for midrash. Ishmael formulated additional principles, the most important of which was: "The Torah expresses itself in a human way" (Sifre to Num. sect. 112; b Sanhedrin 64b; b Keret 11a). In regard to the text, "Destroyed, destroyed shall such a soul be" (Nm 15.31), Akiba took this to mean a twofold destruction, in this world and in the next. Ishmael repudiated this kind of dissection of the text. Akiba manifestly believed that there was not a superfluous word in the Bible and that every single word had to be accounted for as to its contribution. Thus it was said of him that "from every tittle in the text he could derive mountains of law" (b Menachoth 29b). In spite of the resultant high regard for the midrash in the sense of a living and interpretative study, the PIRKE AVOTH 1.17 gives the early rabbinic dictum: "The important thing is not expounding the law [literally, midrash] but fulfilling it."

The most important Tannaitic midrashim are the Mekilta to Exodus (beginning with Ex 12), the Sifra to Leviticus, and Sifre to Numbers and Deuteronomy. In addition to the well-known midrash Mekilta de-Rabbi Ishmael, there is another compilation, Mekilta de-Rabbi Shimeon ben Jochai. Also from the time of the Tannaim are the Mekilta to Deuteronomy and the Sifre zuta. These midrashim are referred to in Jewish literature as "midrash HALAKAH," that is, legal as opposed to HAGGADAH, or narrative midrashim, though in fact they include many narrative sections. The later midrashim are the so-called haggadic, or narrative, midrashim. They extend from the 3d down to about the 8th century. The best known is the Midrash Rabbah, or Large Midrash, to the Torah and the five Scrolls (Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Esther, and Ecclesiastes), which originally did not form a unity. Others that should be mentioned are the Midrash Tanchuma (or Yelammedenu), a homiletic midrash to the Mosaic books that takes its name from Tanchuma bar Abba, a Palestinian Amora of the late 4th century; the Pesiqta de Rab Kahana; and the Pesiqta Rabbati. There were, of course, other and later works written in the midrash style.

The so-called lesser midrashim collected by A. Jellinek, J. D. Eisenstein, and A. J. Wertheimer are of a distinct literary genre. They belong, in part, to Jewish GNOSTICISM.

MIÈGE, JOHN BAPTIST

Bishop; b. La Forêt, Chevron, Savoy, Sept. 18, 1815; d. Woodstock, Md., July 21, 1884. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1836, was ordained in Rome, Sept. 12, 1847, and came to the U.S. in 1848. He was assigned to the vice province of Missouri and served in the novitiate at Florissant, in parishes at St. Charles and Portage des Sioux, and at St. Louis University. Acting on the petition of the Seventh Provincial Council of Baltimore, Pius IX erected a vicariate apostolic of Indian Territory, embracing the area east of the Rocky Mountains that was not included in Arkansas, Iowa, Missouri, or Minnesota. On July 23, 1850, the pope appointed Miège titular bishop of Messene and vicar apostolic of this area of 500,000 square miles and scarcely a thousand Catholics. After his consecration in St. Louis, Mo., March 25, 1851, Miège took up residence among the Pottawatomi at St. Mary's Mission. In 1857, to form a more serviceable area, he asked Rome to create the Vicariate of Nebraska; in 1860 the western end of Kansas Territory was attached to the Diocese of Santa Fe, N.M.

Miège's missionary activities were altered by the Kansas-Nebraska Act (1854), which brought new settlers to Kansas amid much turmoil. To serve this incoming white population, he transferred his residence to Leavenworth, Kans., in 1855. By the 1860s he had established three religious communities—Benedictine fathers and sisters, Carmelite fathers, and Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth; built an academy, a large rectory to care for missionaries, a hospital, and an orphanage; founded a seminary; and completed the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception. Miège was given a coadjutor, Louis Mary Fink, OSB, in 1870 and, after he collected funds in South America (1871–74) to reduce the cathedral debt, he asked to resign. Pius IX granted his request Nov. 18, 1874. Miège then doffed all episcopal insignia and became the spiritual director of the Jesuits at Woodstock College, Md. (1875–77). In 1877 he was named the first president of Detroit College, later the University of Detroit, Mich. In 1880 he returned to his former post at Woodstock, where he spent his remaining years.

MIER, SERVANDO TERESA DE

Mexican Dominican friar, active in Mexican independence movement; b. Monterrey, Oct. 18, 1765; d. Mexico City, Dec. 3, 1827. He entered the Dominican Order in 1781 and after ordination, received a doctorate in theology.

Mier might be called a man of prisons. Like the famous adventurer Casanova, he always succeeded in escaping from the dungeons in which he was confined. His first adventure resulted from a sermon that he preached on Dec. 12, 1794, on the subject of the Virgin of Guadalupe. He declared that the image of Guadalupe was not painted on the sisal robe of the native, Juan Diego, but on the cloak of St. Thomas. This statement aroused much indignation among the ecclesiastical authorities. The bishop ordered Mier confined to his cell and initiated proceedings. Mier found himself obliged to retract and did so, according to his statement, "because I was unable to bear the prison any longer."

The archbishop condemned him to ten years of exile, which he was to spend in Spain, confined in the monastery of Las Caldas near Santander. He was simultaneously disqualified for public instruction in lecture room, pulpit, and confessional, and his doctor's title was abolished. At Las Caldas he was locked in a filthy room that he shared with rats; they contended with him for his miserable food. "There were so many of them and such large ones," Mier stated in the account that he wrote of his adventures in Europe, "that they ate up my hat, and I had to sleep armed with a stick to keep them from eating me." He escaped by filing the iron grating of his cell, leaving a letter written in verse entitled "Ad fratres in eremo." He was arrested again and sent back to Las Caldas "like a missing old manuscript," as he said himself.

In 1796 Mier was permitted to go to Madrid so that his case might be heard by the Council of the Indies. He received orders to go to a monastery in Salamanca, and since he tried to flee en route, he was seized again and locked up in the Franciscan monastery in Burgos. Under suspicion of intent to escape, he was confined in a dungeon. From this he did succeed in escaping and he went to France. In Paris in 1801 he opened an academy for teaching the Castilian language. He engaged also in literary tasks, one of them the first Castilian translation of Chateaubriand's Atala.

In 1802 he left for Rome, intending to enter secular life. The following year he was appointed theologian of the Congregations of the Council of Trent and the Universal Inquisition, and prothonotary apostolic. His dissatisfaction with his lot led him to return to Spain. On his arrival in Madrid he was imprisoned, but he escaped from the Casa de los Toribios, on June 24, 1804. He was arrested in Cádiz and returned to the same prison, this time in irons. In a short time he was in Portugal; he had freed himself again from the irons and fled. He held the post of secretary to the Spanish consul and, thanks to a change of fortune, the appointment of "Apostolic Prelate of the Pope," conferred by Pius VII through the nuncio.

When war broke out between France and Spain, Mier returned to Spain and became a chaplain in the Valencian regiment of volunteers. In Belchite he became a prisoner of the French, but he succeeded in escaping and, with a recommendation from General Black, he went to Cádiz, where in 1811 the Regency awarded him a large pension.

After hearing the news of Hidalgo's insurrection, he went to England, intending to support the cause of Mexican independence. In London he wrote Historia de la revolución de Nueva España (1813), the first study on the emancipation movement. He wrote also "Carta de un Americano al Español sobre su número XIX," which attracted much attention among the insurgents. Mier also formed a friendship with Francisco Xavier Mina in England and joined in Mina's revolutionary expedition to Mexico in 1817. When it failed, Mier was imprisoned in the dungeons of the Inquisition. As a consequence of the dissolution of the Tribunal in May of 1820, he was put on board a boat for Spain two months later. When his boat put in at Havana, he fled and succeeded in going to the United States. In February of 1822, after independence had been achieved, he returned. In Veracruz, still under Spanish control, General Dávila had him imprisoned in the fortress of San Juan de Ulúa, where he remained for four months. Then, having been elected deputy by the province of Nuevo León, he was set at liberty and was at last able to go to Mexico City. He had not been there a month when he was arrested and imprisoned in the monastery of Santo Domingo because he was suspected of taking part in a republican conspiracy against A. Iturbide. He remained a prisoner until Feb. 11, 1823, when the Mexican troops decided in favor of the republic. Mier then enjoyed the high favor of President Guadalupe Victoria.

MIGAZZI, CHRISTOPH ANTON

Count, Prince-archbishop of Vienna; b. Innsbruck, Nov. 23, 1714; d. Vienna, Sept. 15, 1803. Migazzi studied theology at the Collegium Germanicum in Rome and jurisprudence in Innsbruck; he became a priest and was a canon in Brixen and later in Trent. Soon after being appointed auditor of the Roman Rota for the German nation in 1745, he enjoyed the complete confidence of Empress MARIA THERESA. She entrusted him with diplomatic negotiations, had him appointed coadjutor to the archbishop of Malines in 1751, and in 1752 sent him to Spain where, as Austrian ambassador, he concluded a treaty of alliance.

On March 22, 1756, Migazzi was appointed coadjutor to the bishop of Waizen, Hungary. When the bishop died in June of 1756, Migazzi was recalled from his ambassadorial post in Madrid to undertake the care of his diocese. Then, when Cardinal Trautson, Archbishop of Vienna, died (March 10, 1757), Migazzi was elected his successor and appointed Prince-archbishop of Vienna (March 18).

When in 1761 Pope Clement XIII named Migazzi cardinal, this scion of an impoverished Tyrolese noble house seemed to have reached the aim of his earthly ambitions. In reality, his elevation to the episcopal See of Vienna brought a tragic turn in Migazzi's life. Up until then he had served his revered empress, whose unremitting favor he had enjoyed and whose wishes he had been able to fulfill unreservedly in honorable positions. He now had to oppose her when she attempted to subordinate the Austrian Church to the State. Migazzi tried unsuccessfully to defend ecclesiastical rights in hundreds of written petitions and memoranda.

Maria Theresa, although withdrawing her former nearly absolute confidence from a servant who now had become a spokesman for the Church, never failed to show him respect. Emperor JOSEPH II, however, not only drew the last consequences from his system of JOSEPHINISM without any regard to Migazzi's protests, but also exhibited a scarcely veiled contempt for his person. In a letter to a bishop, the emperor compared the great St. Christopher, carrying the child Jesus in his arms, with that other "great" Christopher who allowed himself to be carried away by his canon Fast, a fearless defender of the Church. Migazzi later protested once more against Josephinism as reconfirmed by Leopold II; the emperor wrote, "Memoires of Cardinal Migazzi; of no significance," on the petition. The sorely afflicted archbishop died at Vienna and was buried in St. Stephen's cathedral.

MIGNE, JACQUES PAUL

Patrologist and ecclesiastical publisher; b. Saint-Flour, near Orléans, France, Oct. 25, 1800; d. Paris, Oct. 24, 1875. After studying in Orléans, he was ordained there in 1824. His pamphlet, De la Liberté, on the revolution of 1830, caused difficulties with his bishop, and in 1833 he was permitted to leave Orléans for Paris, where he turned to ecclesiastical journalism. He helped found three unsuccessful newspapers before he brought out L'Univers religieux (later L'Univers), which he abandoned in 1836 to publish a universal library for the clergy. In 2,000 volumes in handy format, he hoped to publish at a moderate price the whole of Christian writings from the beginnings to his own day. He had canonical difficulties over financial matters with Archbishop Quelen of Paris but enjoyed the favor of the bishop of Versailles. To avoid difficulties of censorship, he founded in 1836, at Petit-Montrouge near Paris, his own publishing house (Ateliers Catholiques). Here he had all the facilities he required, and employed more than 300 persons. He brought out successively a Theologiae cursus completus (25 v.), a Scripturae sacrae cursus completus (24 v.), a collection of Christian apologetics (20 v.), a collection of French sermons (99 v.), three theological encyclopedias (52, 53, and 66 v.), a course of Church history (27 v.), and a collection of writings on the Blessed Virgin (13 v.). The aid of J. B. PITRA and many scholars made possible his Patrologies, modeled especially on La Bigne's Maxima bibliotheca (Lyons 1677) and GAL-LANDI's Bibliotheca (Venice 1765-88). The Series latina (221 v. 1844-64) covered Latin authors from Tertullian to Innocent III (A.D. 200-1216). The Series graeca included 161 volumes (1857–66) comprising Greek and Latin texts of authors from the Pseudo-Barnabas to the Council of Florence (A.D. 120-1438) and 81 volumes (1856–67) of the Latin text only of the Greek Fathers. In 1868, a fire destroyed Migne's presses and stores. Insurance recovered after long litigation permitted him to build again, but his efforts to finance the new enterprise by the use of Mass stipends caused the archbishop of Paris to suspend him. He died almost blind.

His accomplishment is a phenomenon in the world of erudition. His genius for organizing, directing, and financing a vast publication was unique in his age. He personally solved problems in the use of Greek type and invented many devices that saved time and money. He used texts already in print, especially those of the MAURISTS, but urged his collaborators to emend or even re-edit texts from the manuscripts. His texts were accompanied by the best introductions and notes available, and great care was taken with proofreading of the volumes issued before the fire. Only gradually are his texts being replaced by better editions, and they are still indispensable for almost every field of ecclesiastical study. H. LECLERCQ called him one of the most useful priests in the Church of France in the 19th century.

MIGNOT, EUDOXE IRÉNÉE

French archbishop; b. Brancourt (Aisne), Sept. 20, 1842; d. Albi, March 18, 1918. After studying at Saint-Sulpice in Paris, he was ordained (1865) and acted as pastor in various parishes in the Soissons Diocese, until he became bishop of Fréjus (1890). From 1899 until 1918 he was archbishop of Albi. Mignot was much interested in intellectual problems, but his writings consist of essays, very similar in form to familiar conversations. He published an article in Le Correspondant (April 10, 1897) on "L'Évolutionnisme religieux" to criticize L'Esquisse d'une philosophic de la religion (1897) of Louis Auguste Sabatier. In Sabatier's manifesto of liberal Protestantism, Mignot discerned a natural philosophy "void of what has historically constituted the mystery of Jesus." Utilizing Leo XIII's teaching, Mignot addressed five Lettres sur les études ecclésiastiques (1900-01), to his clergy which were later reproduced in the Revue du Clergé français and then published as a separate volume (1908), along with his discourse on "La Méthode de la théologie," pronounced at the Catholic Institute of Toulouse (1901). Mignot held that reason was in accord with faith, and wanted theologians to be scientific and historically minded. His belief that Alfred LOISY, in L'Évangile et l'Église, neglected oral tradition as the historical basis of faith led him to publish in Le Correspondant, "Critique et Tradition" (1904), "L'Église et la science" (1907), and "La Bible et les religions" (1907). These articles and two panegyrics were published in the volume L'Église et la critique (1910).

Mignot was a liberal and enlightened prelate who was prominent in the affairs of his day. After the separation of church and state, he promoted religious associations in accordance with civil law. In 1910 he was one of the very few bishops who supported the Sillon of Marc SANGNIER. His Mémoire envoyé au cardinal Ferrata, published in 1914 after Ferrata's death, revealed his eagerness to maintain contacts between the church and modern society and condemned INTEGRALISM for its violent tactics. Mignot sought to spare Loisy from censure by Rome. Even after the heresiarch's condemnation, Mignot treated him benevolently and tried to keep him in the Church.

MÍGUEZ, FAUSTINO, BL.

Baptized Manuel, also called Faustino of the Incarnation, educator, scientist, Piarist priest, and founder of the Daughters of the Divine Shepherdess (Calasanctian Sisters); b. Xamirás, Acebedodel Rio, Celanova, Orense, Galicia, Spain, March 25, 1831; d. Getafe near Madrid, Spain, March 8, 1925.

Manuel, the fourth child of Christian farmers, studied Latin and the humanities in Orense. There, he was inspired by the life of Saint JOSEPH CALASANCTIUS (1556–1648) and entered the novitiate of Calasanz's order, Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (PIARISTS), at Saint Ferdinand's in Madrid (1850), professed his vows, and was later ordained. He taught for nearly fifty years in Piarist schools, including those at Celanova, El Escorial, Getafe, Guanaboacoa, Monforte de Lemos, San Fernando, and Sanlúcar de Barameda, while continuing to improve his own education.

His genuine love for children exhibited itself in his kindness and dedication to teaching them the love of truth. At the invitation of St. Anthony Mary CLARET, Faustino travelled to Cuba to teach in various colleges. Returning to Spain, he used his study of botany to uncover the healing power of plants and manufactured medicines for the sick, poor people of the region. His legacy in this area is the Míguez Laboratory in Getafe.

Míguez was particularly sensitive to the dignity of women, whom he regarded as the soul of the family. Appalled by the illiteracy and marginalization of women in Sanlúcar de Barrameda, he founded the Calasanctian Sisters (Jan. 2, 1885) with the support of the bishop of Seville. The congregation, recognized by the Holy See in 1910, is dedicated to the education and formation of children, especially poor girls. This congregation has continued to endure and prosper in Spain and Latin America.

Míguez, who was also known as a patient, wise confessor, died at the age of 94. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II, Oct. 25, 1998.

MIHAN, CHARLES, VEN.

Irish Franciscan priest and martyr; b. after 1639 (exact date and birthplace unknown); d. Ruthin, North Wales, Aug. 12, 1679. According to reliable contemporary sources, his surname was Mihan (modern Meehan), not Mahony as stated in a contemporary broadsheet. No details are available on his religious training and ordination. On Nov. 21, 1672, the Irish Franciscan provincial chapter approved him for hearing confessions of lay people. As a result of the edicts of banishment against bishops and regulars (1673-74), he fled to Flanders from Ireland. Early in November 1674 he was sent to pursue studies at the Franciscan friary in Hammelburg, Bavaria, and thence to St. Isidore's College, Rome (summer 1676). While returning to Ireland in 1678 his ship was forced onto the Welsh coast. He was arrested at Denbigh and imprisoned. At his trial (1679), during the Titus Oates scare, he admitted his priesthood and was condemned to death. He was hanged, cut down alive, and brutally butchered.

MILAN, EDICT (AGREEMENT) OF

Galerius, in 311, issued an edict of religious tolerance; and Constantine, after defeating Maxentius (Oct. 28, 312), published decrees favorable to the Christians. When Constantine and Licinius met in Milan (February 313), they resolved their political problem and agreed on certain legal provisions in favor of the Christians. While no edict was issued at Milan, the contents of these resolutions are recorded in a rescript issued by Licinius for the East on June 13, 313, prescribing that everyone, including Christians, should be given freedom to follow the religion that suited him, in order that the favor of every divinity in heaven might be ensured for the emperor and his realm. Ordinances hostile to Christians were lifted; general and unrestricted freedom of religious practice was guaranteed. Confiscated Church property was to be restored gratuitously, and the Christians were once more given the right of forming a legal corporate body. Without complete agreement on the particulars, both Lactantius (De mort. pers. 48) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 9.9.12; 9a.12; and 10.5.2–14) supply evidence of this agreement of Milan.

MILITARY ORDERS

The military religious orders such as the TEMPLARS and the KNIGHTS OF MALTA, in their origins, functions, organization, and historical significance, were essentially distinct from the secular orders of knighthood such as the Golden Fleece. The military religious orders appeared initially in the 12th century as a response to the appeal of the crusading movement. For centuries the Church had exhorted medieval knights to use their swords only in the cause of justice. In proclaiming the CRUSADE in 1095, URBAN II pointed to such a cause. The formation of the military religious orders soon after can be regarded as the logical outcome of the effort to Christianize the soldier.

In entering orders wherein the principles of monasticism and chivalry were combined, the knights pledged themselves not only to observe the canonical vows, to practice asceticism, to recite the canonical hours, but also to defend Christendom against the infidels by force of arms. Each order was directed by a master; clerical members served the spiritual needs of the knights. The papacy exempted the orders from the jurisdiction of diocesan ordinaries, from the observance of interdicts, etc. The orders contributed substantially not only to the maintenance of the CRUSADERS' STATES in the Holy Land, but also to the Reconquest in SPAIN and to the conversion of the pagans in eastern Europe.

The secular orders of knighthood came into existence at the close of the medieval era under the auspices of kings and princes who considered these honorary societies as symbols of their power. The secular orders did not participate significantly in the military defense of Christendom, and their members did not adhere to the monastic life.

The prototype of the military religious orders was the Order of the Temple, founded about 1119 by Hugh de Payens for the protection of pilgrims to the Holy Land. At his request, BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX wrote the Liber de laude novae militiae, a justification of the idea of the military religious order. To sceptics Bernard demonstrated the possibility of reconciling and conjoining the military and monastic professions. The nova militia of which he spoke was both a new kind of knighthood and a new kind of monasticism. In large measure the phenomenal growth of the Templars and of the other military religious orders can be attributed to his influence. In imitation of the Templars, the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, already caring for the sick and pilgrims, assumed a share of the responsibility for the military defense of the Holy Land. Another foundation in the Holy Land, the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, gained renown in the conquest and conversion of Prussia. The KNIGHTS OF THE SWORD, organized in 1202 by Bp. ALBERT I OF RIGA, performed a similar role in Livonia.

Several military religious orders were founded in the Iberian peninsula. There is no substance to the opinion that they were an imitation of similar organizations existing among the Muslims. The Hispanic orders were modeled on the Templars and the Hospitallers and reflected most clearly the influence of St. Bernard. The first of the peninsular orders, CALATRAVA, founded in 1158, was directly affiliated to the Order of Cîteaux and was indeed a military arm of that order. The Leonese KNIGHTS OF AL-CÁNTARA, the Portuguese Order of AVIZ, and the Aragonese KNIGHTS OF MONTESA were affiliates of Calatrava and thus of Cîteaux. The Portuguese ORDER OF CHRIST, though not a dependency of Calatrava, observed its customs. Thus all the major Hispanic orders, with the exception of the KNIGHTS OF ST. JAMES (SANTIAGO), which followed the Rule of St. AUGUSTINE, pertained to the CIS-TERCIAN observance.

Several military orders disappeared just as quickly as they had come into being. One should mention that especially in modern times there has been a tendency to invent military orders and to attribute to them a false, fraudulent, and fantastic history. The destruction of the crusaders' states and the completion of the Hispanic Reconquest deprived the military religious orders of any real reason for existence. In 1312 Clement V suppressed the Templars, but the Hospitallers (Knights of Malta) have survived until modern times because they never abandoned their original function of caring for the sick. At the close of the Middle Ages the kings in Spain and Portugal assumed direct control of the military religious orders, gradually turning them into honorary societies of nobles.

MILITARY SERVICE

Military service is by definition "a vocation of service. And the centurion in the Gospel proves that there is no incompatibility between the requirements of military discipline and those of the faith, between the ideal of the soldier and that of the believer" [Paul VI, Address to Belgian soldiers (L'Osservatore Romano April 22, 1965)].

The morality of military service by Christians has been seriously questioned. Christ preached a doctrine of peace and vigorously rejected the use of armed force in the advancement of His kingdom (see Mt 26.52). But He also insisted that His followers have lawful duties both to God and to Caesar (Mt 22.21; cf. Rom 13.1-7; 1 Pt 2.13-17). Among the theologians of the pre-Constantinian era, Tertullian was outstanding for his hostility to all military service. He based his opposition not only on the prevalence of idolatry and licentiousness in the Roman legions, but also on the principle that military service can never be reconciled with "the things that are God's." This rigorous position, however, did not represent the common or official teaching of the early Church. The bishops could not sanction enlistment as long as military life exacted compromise with pagan practices, but they did voice support for the Roman government in its struggles against the barbarian invaders. It is significant that there is no record of any conciliar decree against military service during this period in which councils played so important a role in the formulation of Christian discipline.

With the publication of the Edict of Toleration for the Christian religion, the situation changed. The Council of Arles in 314, for example, decreed excommunication for deserters even in times of peace. Certainly, from the time of SS. Ambrose and Augustine, Catholic theologians have taught that military service is not a contradiction of the human and Christian will to peace. The man who conscientiously serves in the armed forces of his nation or of an effective international organization that is fighting to achieve peace with justice is "a man of peace in his warmaking, that by his victory he may bring those he attacks to the unity of peace" (St. Augustine, Epist. ad Bonifatium Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 57.135). That such is the teaching of the Church is evident from the following declaration of Vatican Council II: "Those who devote themselves to the military service of their country should regard themselves as agents of security and freedom of peoples. As long as they fulfill this role properly, they are making a genuine contribution to the establishment of peace" (Constitution on the Church in the Modern World 79).

Military service, therefore, is permitted if it is undertaken not for motives of greed or cruelty but with a desire for peace. The moral principles that govern the life of a soldier are clear. He is to fulfill his duties to the best of his ability according to the lawful directions of his superiors. In waging war he is to observe the norms of humanity that arise from the natural law, many of which are defined by international treaties and covenants. There exists no right, no obligation, no permission to accomplish an act, evil in itself, even if it is ordered. Military obedience, even when it is imposed under the threat of severe punishment for any violation, does not excuse a soldier from the obligation of acting in accord with the dictates of his conscience.

The application of these principles to the immediate moral problems of military life has become increasingly difficult. In the 13th century, St. Thomas Aquinas restated the Augustinian doctrine on peace and war. He placed great stress on the necessity of a right intention, but had little to say about the conduct of the individual soldier in wartime. The later scholastics, particularly Francisco de Vitoria, formulated precise and concrete rules for applying moral principles to the changing conditions of warfare in their time. The rapidly developing technology of weapons and the complexity of modern war make it almost impossible to foresee or solve all the moral problems that the present-day military man may have to face.

There are some military actions that are not at all defensible in the eyes of anyone who has a reasonable concept of justice. If a soldier is ordered to take part in the mass slaughter of innocent women and children or in the killing of defenseless prisoners, he has no choice in conscience but to refuse. Many other moral questions may arise for which a definitive solution cannot be found in the official teaching of the Church or in the consensus of theologians. In each case the individual must make a moral judgment before he acts. When there is an honest doubt about the morality of a particular action, the presumption of right is in favor of the lawful authorities. A soldier is never obliged in conscience to disobey an order of his superiors except in cases where violation of the law of God is evident.

MILITARY SERVICES, USA, ARCHDIOCESE FOR

The Archdiocese for Military Services, USA is responsible for the spiritual and sacramental care, including sacramental records keeping, of Catholics and their families in the United States Armed Forces, including the army, navy, air force, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, as well as Catholics in Veteran's Affairs Hospitals and U.S. diplomatic posts overseas. The archbishop for the military services is also recognized by the federal government as the endorser for all Catholic priest chaplains who serve these faithful.

Development of a Military Vicariate. Catholic priests served American armed forces with distinction since Revolutionary War times. In 1888, the Apostolic See granted exclusive competency to the archbishop of New York to designate navy chaplains. After the Spanish American War, a commission of the U.S. bishops, under James Cardinal Gibbons, was established to recruit priests of the military chaplaincy. At the outbreak of World War I, there were sixteen priests in the army, eight in the navy, and a further ten in the National Guard. The need for priests was urgent, so the bishops of America, with significant support from the Knights of Columbus, formed a National Catholic War Council. By Armistice Day, 1919, a total of 1,026 priests were serving with the U.S. armed forces. Most were commissioned officers, but some 165 of those served as civilians paid from funds donated by the Knights of Columbus.

In the United States, as in other countries, the military constituted a vast diocese with no regularly constituted head until Pope BENEDICT XV authorized each country to have an episcopus castrensis, or bishop for the military. On Nov. 24, 1917, he appointed Patrick Hayes, an auxiliary bishop of New York, to be "Ordinary of all Catholics who fight in the Army and Navy during the present war." Bishop Hayes organized the new jurisdiction, with headquarters at St. Stephen's Church, New York City, and five regional vicariates. The organization came to be known as the Military Vicariate and its offices as the Military Ordinariate. Special faculties for general absolution, the Eucharist, and marriage were among many privileges granted only to military chaplains by the Military Ordinariate.

War was threatening again when Cardinal Hayes died in Sept. of 1938. On Nov. 25, 1939, Pope Pius XII designated Archbishop Francis Spellman, the new ordinary of New York, to be military vicar of the United States of America and Archbishop Spellman an episcopal administrator for chaplain affairs. The first administrator was Father John O'Hara, CSC, president of the University of Notre Dame. O'Hara was later named bishop of Buffalo and afterward cardinal archbishop of Philadelphia.

When peacetime conscription was instituted in 1940, Archbishop Spellman and Bishop O'Hara appealed to the America bishops for clergy. By Dec. 8, 1941 there were 500 priests on active duty. During World War II, 2,453 priests served as army chaplains and 817 as navy chaplains, of whom 676 died in service. After World War II, as realities dictated an American presence in outposts far from home, the jurisdiction of the Military Ordinary was expanded to include civilians serving the U.S. government overseas. In June 1946, the Veterans Administration program was placed under the canonical jurisdiction of the Military Ordinariate. During the Korean War, with many nations fighting under United Nations auspices, the Holy Father placed all Catholic chaplains in Korea under the American Military Vicar.

On April 25, 1951, an instruction of the Holy See, Sollemne Semper, established norms for canonically establishing a permanent vicariate for the apostolate to military personnel. It was made specific for the United States in a subsequent decree, Mysticam Petri Naviculam, of Sept. 8, 1957. This decree formally erected the Military Vicariate and placed it under the archbishop of New York, with the tribunal of the Archdiocese of New York appointed to hear the cases of its subjects. It operated as a separate office in the New York Chancery, with its own staff and auxiliary bishops. Bishop Terrence Cooke succeeded Cardinal Spellman as archbishop of New York and Military Vicar of the U.S. Armed Services in the spring of 1968. To assist him Bishop Joseph Ryan, who had been bishop of Anchorage, Alaska, was installed as coadjutor archbishop of the military vicar in December 1975, and a separate ecclesiastical tribunal was created to attend to the needs of the military.

When Cardinal Cooke died on Oct. 6, 1983, the Holy See determined that the military vicariate should have its own independent status, not as an added role for the archbishop of New York, but with its own full-time ordinary, to function as any other diocese. After a brief interregnum, during which time Archbishop John O'Connor of New York served as apostolic administrator, Archbishop Ryan was named and installed as the first ordinary of the Archdiocese for Military Services in March 1985. In January 1986 Archbishop Ryan moved the administrative headquarters of the newly independent jurisdiction to the Washington D.C. area. Archbishop Ryan retired in 1991 and the Most Reverend Joseph T. Dimino, who had been auxiliary bishop of the military vicar, was appointed the second ordinary for the military services. When Archbishop Dimino retired in 1997, he was succeeded by the Most Reverend Edwin F. O'Brien, who had been an auxiliary bishop in New York.

General Norms. On April 21, 1986, Pope John Paul II issued the Apostolic Constitution Spirituali militum curae, effective July 21, which made each military vicariate or ordinariate juridically comparable to a diocese. Spirituali militum curae recognized that military people "constitute, as a matter of fact, a particular social body, and because of the special conditions of their way of life, they have need of a concrete and specific form of pastoral assistance." Each ordinariate is headed by a military ordinary, normally a bishop, with all the rights and obligations of a diocesan ordinary, insofar as possible, given the nature and pastoral conditions of the military. Canonically, this ecclesiastical entity is denominated Ordinariatus militaris seu castrensis. A local title more suitable to the language of the particular country being allowable, in the United States the designation is Archdiocese for the Military Services.

The Apostolic Constitution laid down certain general norms valid for all military ordinariates. In addition, each military ordinariate is ruled by its particular statutes as approved by the Apostolic See.

The military ordinary, nominated by the pope, belongs by right to the National Episcopal Conference. His jurisdiction is personal and exercised over all persons pertaining to the ordinariate, wherever they may be; it is ordinary for both the internal and external forums and proper but cumulative with the jurisdiction of the diocesan bishop. The areas and places reserved to military personnel fall chiefly under the jurisdiction of the military ordinary and secondarily, in the absence of a chaplain, under the diocesan bishop. The military ordinary has the right to erect a seminary, to incardinate clerics, and to petition for a proper tribunal.

The following belong to the military ordinariate and come under its jurisdiction: the faithful who are military persons, as well as those who are at the service of the armed forces, provided that they are bound to this by civil laws; all members of their families, spouses and children, even those who, though independent, live in the same house, as well as relatives and servants also living with them in the same house; those who attend military training schools, or who live or work in military hospitals, homes for the aged, or similar institutions; and all the faithful, both men and women, whether or not they are members of a religious institute, who carry out in a permanent manner a task committed to them by the military ordinary or with his consent. Particular statutes of each ordinariate may further specify the areas of proper subjects.

MILL, JAMES

Philosopher, psychologist, economist, and historian; disciple of J. BENTHAM and D. Hartley; b. Northwater Bridge, Scotland, April 6, 1773; d. London, June 23, 1836. Mill studied for the ministry but failed to get a parish; later, under Bentham's influence, he came to see Christianity as "a mere delusion," "a great moral evil," and "the greatest enemy of morality." In London, after some years in journalism, he wrote a History of British India [1818; 4th ed., ed. H. H. Wilson, 9 v. (London 1848)], entered the East India Company, and lived to become its chief London administrator. He was active also in the formation of the political party known as the Philosophical Radicals, who were influential in passing the Reform Bill of 1832. In his major work, Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind (London 1829), Mill defended and developed Hartley's ASSOCIATIONISM. Denying innate differences, he believed in unlimited perfectibility through education; for an account of the remarkable education he gave his own children, see his son John's Autobiography (1873). In political theory, Mill, like Bentham, rejected all notion of "natural rights," and in his famous 1820 Britannica article on "Government" he attempted one of the very first defenses of representative government along purely utilitarian, Benthamite lines.

MILL, JOHN STUART

The most influential philosopher in England during the mid-19th century; b. London, May 20, 1806; d. Avignon, May 8, 1873.

Life. One of the two major influences in Mill's life was that of his father, James MILL, who tutored John intensively from his 3d to his 14th year with the aim of making his son able to carry on his own work as chief exponent of empiricist and Benthamite utilitarian philosophy. James, and later John, who edited and annotated his father's Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind (London 1869), were psychological associationists. The Mills' circle included Jeremy BENTHAM (whose Rationale of Judicial Evidence, 5 v., John edited when he was 21), David Ricardo (whose economics John never outgrew), and John AUSTIN, the utilitarian legal theorist. At 17 Mill entered the examiner's office of the East India Company, where he remained for 35 years, reaching, as had his father before him, the highest administrative position in the London office.

The other major influence in Mill's life was that of Mrs. Harriet Taylor, who dominated him for 28 years, first as his Seelenfreundin (as she described herself), then, after her husband died, for seven years (1851-58) as his wife. He believed her to be the spiritual peer only of Shelley and to lack no virtue, intellectual or moral. At her direction he made changes in the later editions of his Political Economy ("a joint production with my wife") in the direction of socialism and away from the Benthamite laissez-faire tradition of the first edition (London 1848). She led him away from his earlier interest in, and sympathy with, T. Carlyle, S. T. Coleridge, and A. Comte; and many of his major essays, including *Utilitari*anism (London 1863) and Considerations on Representative Government (London 1863), were first sketched out with her. On Liberty was the development of an early paper by Harriet on toleration.

Teaching. Mill's principal philosophical work is his System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive (2 v. London 1843), an empiricist attack on a prioristic intuitionism, which he regarded as the great intellectual support of false doctrines and bad institutions: "And the chief strength of this false philosophy in morals, politics, and religion, lies in the appeal which it is accustomed to make to the evidence of mathematics and of the cognate branches of physical science. To expel it from these is to drive it from its stronghold" (Autobiography). A contemporary reader of Logic would find Mill's discussion of the following topics valuable—though perhaps mainly because of Mill's instructive errors.

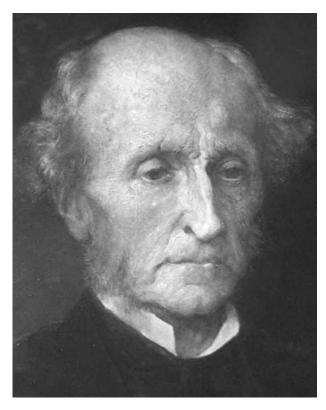

Logic. Mill believed that in order to find the meaning of a proposition one must first find the meaning of its constituent verbal parts; and for this he is usually criticized on the basis of an analysis of meaning deriving mainly from L. WITTGENSTEIN, according to whom propositional meaning is primary and the meaning of individual words is derivative.

Mill was an empiricist: for him, a proposition is significant if and only if it describes what has been or could be experienced. He was in some ways an even more thoroughgoing empiricist than D. HUME: failing to distinguish pure from applied mathematics, Mill maintained that even mathematical axioms and theorems are generalizations from experience. One might object that if mathematical propositions are empirical generalizations, they can be disproved by experience; yet what sort of evidence would tell against "things equal to the same thing are equal to each other"?

On the value of the categorical SYLLOGISM Mill held a middle position between those who, like R. WHATELY (Elements of Logic, 1826), find in it the ground of all proof, and those who, like J. LOCKE, regard it as worthless because circular. Mill maintains that the syllogism, not being a "real" inference (one in which the conclusion asserts more than the premises), is circular but not worthless. One is really interested in going from "all observed X is Y" to "this X is Y"—a formula reminding him of the manner in which he has been in the past, and is in the future, entitled to infer from a number of particular cases yet another particular case: "What is called Formal Logic is the logic of consistency."

Method. That part of his Logic for which Mill is best known is his analysis of the five "experimental methods'' (agreement, difference, etc.), which, by eliminating all but one of the initially possible alternatives (eliminative induction), are claimed to be the only rigorous methods of establishing true causal laws. Now Mill maintains that any conclusion drawn from an application of these methods presupposes the "law of universal causation" as a major premise (e.g., all events have a cause; the only possible cause of rust here is moist oxygen; so moist oxygen is the cause of rust). But this law needs to be inductively established, and cannot, without petitio principii, be established by eliminative induction. There remains only enumerative induction (C is the cause of E, where C and E are frequently repeated events). Now if enumerative induction is sufficient to establish the universal law of causation, why is it not sufficient simply to establish particular causal laws—which, according to Mill, can be established only by eliminative induction—the sum total of which particular laws are called for to establish the universal law? It is now generally maintained that any attempt to justify inductive reasoning by general postulates about the constitution of nature cannot fail to be circular. (See INDUCTION.)

John Stuart Mill, painting by George Frederick Watts.

In the social sciences one must generally avoid reliance on unanalyzed experience alone (exemplified by Macaulay's 1829 Edinburgh Review critique of James Mill's essay on "Government") or on the "geometrical" method (exemplified by his father's essay itself) of deducing social phenomena from a single principle. Usually the "inverse deductive method" (attributed by Mill to Comte) should be followed: begin, as Bacon or Macaulay did, by generalizing on the basis of historical evidence; then, since empirical laws are not of themselves sufficient for long-range prediction, go on to show that these generalizations are deducible from the laws of experimental psychology and "ethology" (science of the formation of human character).

Metaphysics. In a later metaphysical work, The Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy (London 1865), Mill defends a Berkeleian PHENOMENALISM. But whereas G. BERKELEY had made the existence of a physical object depend on its actually being perceived, Mill made its existence depend on the possibility of perceiving it: what constitutes the existence of a physical object is that under certain conditions, themselves describable in sensory terms, certain sorts of sensations regularly occur. "Matter, then, may be defined, as a Permanent Possibility of Sensation. If I am asked, whether I believe in matter, I ask whether the questioner accepts this definition of it. If he does, I believe in matter: and so do all Berkeleians. In any other sense than this, I do not. But I affirm with confidence, that this conception of matter includes the whole meaning attached to it by the common world, apart from philosophical, and sometimes from theological, theories" (ch. 11). Now Mill is surely wrong when he claims to be asserting the common conception of things: things as ordinarily conceived exist actually, whereas for Mill things exist only potentially. Further, though Mill insists on the publicity of possible sensations, any particular sensation actually felt or even able to be felt by one person is private and cannot be felt by another person. And finally, Mill might well be accused of falling into the genetic fallacy: to say that one's conception of matter originates in his conception of possible sensations and thus matter is really only a complex of possible sensations is like saying that a man originates in a complex of chemical elements and so is really only a composite of those elements. Like Berkeley, but unlike Hume, Mill backs away from a phenomenalist account of minds or persons. For that which can remember actual sensations and anticipate possible ones can hardly be only a set of possible sensations: here is a "finally inexplicable fact"; but no alternative account of this is proposed by Mill.

Political Theory. In Utilitarianism Mill's primary objective was to explain and defend the truth of an importantly modified Benthamite utilitarianism against intuitionists such as I. Kant and W. Whewell.

On Liberty is quite probably the most powerful political sermon preached in English since the mid-19th century. Mill's main objective was to persuade his hearers that though England was free, it should be freer and that greater freedom could come only if society resolved to avoid the use, not only of government coercion, whether democratic or not, but even of "the moral coercion of public opinion" in order to enforce conformity. Otherwise, he argued, genius, independence, and originality would go to the wall: "The grand, the leading principle, towards which every argument in these pages directly converges, is the absolute and essential importance of human development in its richest diversity." Each adult should have a private sphere of individual liberty, comprising any of his acts that do not "affect prejudicially the interests of others"; and one should never, above all, interfere with freedom of thought and expression, for the progress of society depends on this. Mill can be criticized on the ground that almost any act a man does may be held to affect prejudicially the interests of others; and that to the extent that people are dissuaded from using nonviolent "tyranny of opinion," they will tend to use the violence of governmental coercion, which even a strongminded man finds far harder to resist.

Religion. Mill wrote Three Essays on Religion. The first two, "Nature" and "Utility of Religion," he wrote under his wife's influence in the 1850s: there is little value in religion. The last, "Theism," written in 1869–70, is far more sympathetic; it shocked his agnostic and atheist friends when it was published posthumously, though in it issues of truth and appropriate feeling continued to be mingled; Mill's main concern was with the question whether the consequences of belief in God would be beneficial. It is not unreasonable, he claimed, to maintain that God exists: the a posteriori argument from design, as Hume and Kant had said, offers some evidence; and the human soul may be immortal: there is no decisive evidence against it; and Christianity has the status of an inspiring and edifying belief. But Mill could not accept a God who was at once omnipotent and benevolent, an "Omnipotent Author of Hell"; a powerful but finite God seemed more morally stimulating to him. Thus man is enabled to cultivate "the feeling of helping Godof requiting the good He has given us by a voluntary cooperation which He, not being omnipotent, really needs."

MILL HILL MISSIONARIES

Officially called St. Joseph's Missionary Society of Mill Hill (MHM, Official Catholic Directory #0830), a society of secular priests and brothers devoted exclusively to worldwide missionary work, it was founded at Mill Hill, London, England, in 1866 by Father Herbert VAUGHAN (later cardinal archbishop of Westminster). The society represented one of the first conscious efforts of post-emancipation English Catholics to shoulder their missionary responsibilities. Vaughan recruited members from any country able to supply them; Holland and the Tyrolean region contributed largely. The society received final approval by the Holy See in 1908.

The society's first mission in the United States (1871) eventually grew into an independent community, the JOSEPHITE FATHERS, who labor among African Americans. In 1951 the Mill Hill Fathers returned to the United States to recruit members for their worldwide mission. The U.S. headquarters is in Hartsdale, NY. The generalate is in Mill Hill, a suburb of London, England.

MILLENARIANISM

The teaching that before the Last Judgment [see JUDG-MENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE)] Christ will return to the earth in order to establish an earthly kingdom, a kingdom which will last for 1,000 years, the ''millennium.'' This term is derived from mille, the Latin word for 1,000; the doctrine is also called chiliasm, from $\chi\iota\lambda\acute{\alpha}\zeta$, Greek for the number 1,000.

In the Bible. This teaching is based on a strictly literal interpretation of Rv 20.1–15. Thus, it teaches that while Satan is chained for 1,000 years, the martyrs and all who have been faithful to Jesus will come to life (the "first resurrection") and for 1,000 years share His royal priesthood in a messianic kingdom. As the 1,000 years near their end, Satan will be permitted to resume his activity. After a bitter struggle Satan will be conquered definitively by Christ in the Last Judgment. Sinners will then rise from the grave to be plunged forever into the pool of fire (the "second death"). The just will enter into the eternal happiness of heaven.

Millenarianism can be found in non-biblical Jewish writings, e.g., 4 Esdras, but Jewish authors do not always distinguish carefully between the messianic kingdom (see KINGDOM OF GOD) and the eschatological period [see ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)]. Millenarianism was taught by some heretics, such as Cerinthus (see HERESY, HISTORY OF, 1) and the EBIONITES, as well as by several Church Fathers, e.g., PAPIAS OF HIEROPOLIS and St. JUSTIN MARTYR. Their interpretation of Rv 20.1–15 was that after a "first resurrection" of the just, Christ will return to earth to establish a kingdom of 1,000 years duration. Only after these 1,000 years will there be the Last Judgment.

The true interpretation of Rv 20.1–15 stresses the literary form of the Book of REVELATION, with its allimportant use of symbolism. The millennium is to be understood in a symbolic sense. The "first resurrection" symbolizes Baptism [see BAPTISM (IN THE BIBLE)], by which one shares in Christ's Resurrection (see Rom 6.1–10). All the faithful, both those on earth and those in heaven, share in the 1,000-year reign of Jesus, a symbol for the entire life span of the Church considered in its glorious aspect from the Resurrection of Christ until the Last Judgment, just as three-and-a-half years symbolizes the Church's life in struggle and persecution (Rv 11.2-3; 12.14). The chaining of Satan during this same period signifies that the influence of Satan has been notably reduced, not completely removed. The lessening of Satan's influence is the result of the effectiveness of Christ's Redemption. After a final struggle near the end of time (a constant of the apocalyptic pattern; see ANTICHRIST), Satan will be definitively conquered by Christ. Then follows the Last Judgment. Those who have not been faithful to Jesus will experience the "second death," the symbol of eternal punishment in hell. The faithful with resurrected bodies will enter into the bliss of heaven.

In Church History. That theory that the Christ will reign on earth for 1,000 years, during which time the saints will be raised from the dead and Satan will be subdued, is rooted deeply in early Jewish apocalyptic tradition and persists in religious movements today.

Jewish Apocalyptic Tradition. In several ancient passages of the earliest prophetic books (c. 700 B.C.) allusions are made to a millennial kingdom, a veritable paradise, that will be ruled over by the Deliverer and a "saved" remnant of Israel. The emergence of this new Eden will follow the last days of cosmic holocaust after which Yahweh will defeat the forces of evil and provide protection for the elect.

Commentary on the Apocalypse of Beatus: the Death of the Beast and the Enemies of God, manuscript illumination. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Early eschatological works describe Yahweh not as a vengeful Deity, but rather as a merciful king who will bring to the just a 1,000-year reign of peace and material abundance. The efficacy of these eschatological prophecies was reaffirmed in the Books of David written at the height of the Machabean revolt (165 B.C.). In the "dream" of David, the Deliverer is a powerful Messiah who would rule not only Israel, but the entire world.

Messianic prophecy intensified as the political lot of the Jews became more intolerable and, from the annexation of Palestine (63 B.C.) to the war of A.D. 66–72, the wise Messiah of Davidic origin was replaced by the superhuman "warrior king" in the Apocalypses of Ezra and Baruch (1st century A.D.). Throughout this period various "messiahs" appeared, and, even in the last great Jewish uprising of A.D. 131, its leader, Simon BAR KOKHBA, was hailed as the true "Messiah."

Early Christian Apocalyptic. Like the Jews, the Christians of the early Church (50–150) suffered persecutions at the hands of their Roman overlords, and in their plight they readily utilized the Jewish eschatological tradition. Around A.D. 93 Christians evoked the millennial message in the Revelations in which the "Tyrant of the Last Days" is depicted as a hideous 10-horned beast. To the members of the early Church, this beast, or Antichrist, easily symbolized the oppressive Roman state, and millenarists hopefully anticipated its defeat at the Second Coming of Christ.

It was partly in reaction to the Roman persecution that Montanism, the New Prophecy as an eschatological theory, held that the Second Coming would soon take place in the Phrygian city of Pepuza. In 156 Montanus claimed to be divinely inspired by the "Spirit of Truth" and therefore capable of prophesying the PAROUSIA. All Christians were urged to gather in Pepuza and await the Second Coming in prayer and fasting. Within a few years the Phrygian prophet's eschatological summons was carried throughout Asia Minor and retold in Africa and Gaul.

TERTULLIAN (d. 220), the greatest theologian in the West at that time, was attracted to Montanism's high regard for divine inspiration, and by his prestige alone he added new converts to the movement. However, he rejected much of the radicalism of the early Montanists and never did believe in the prophecy of the Phrygian Parousia.

Montanism encountered sharp criticism from DIONY-SIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, who attacked the theory at its roots by questioning the Apostolic origins of the Revelation. The doctrines of Montanus were finally declared heretical by Pope ZEPHYRINUS (d. 217).

Despite the eventual collapse of Montanism, CHILI-ASM or the doctrine of an eschatological kingdom prophesied in Isaiah and Ezekiel was accepted literally by many in the early Church, including JUSTIN MARTYR. IRENAEUS, in his lengthy exposition Adversus Haereses, averred that divine justice demanded that the chiliastic revelation be realized. LACTANTIUS and the poet Commodianus gave impetus to chiliasm by emphasizing the demoniac Antichrist and his eventual defeat in the Second Coming. First attempts to discredit radical chiliasm were made by ORIGEN (d. 254) in his assertion that eschatological change came about only in the soul. St. AUGUSTINE in the City of God advanced the theory that the millennium had actually begun with Christ's nativity.

Although attempts had been made at various times to question the authenticity of the Revelation, these apocalyptic writings were in fact reinforced by the Judaeo-Christian Sibylline Books, especially the Tiburtina (c. 350). Unlike previous eschatological theories, the Sibylline tradition prophesied two warrior-saviors. In the Pseudo-Methodius an earthly emperor rises from his grave, slaughters the forces of evil, and introduces an era of relative tranquillity until the demoniac Antichrist appears. At this critical juncture the Christ descends, slays the Antichrist, and the Last Judgment begins.

The eschatological tradition was preserved in the commentaries on the Apocalypse of Bede, Walafrid Strabo, Anselm of Laon, and Bruno of Segni, but chiliasm was rejected as heresy by THOMAS AQUINAS (Summa theologiae 3, 77, 1 ad 4). On the basis of the Rv 7.2 and 14.6, JOACHIM OF FIORE (d. 1201) predicted that the 1,000-year reign of the Holy Spirit would begin in A.D. 1260, and his influence was felt among the early Dominicans, Spiritual Franciscans, Beguines, and Fraticelli.

Middle Ages. In the Middle Ages many a powerful king was mistaken for the "Last Emperor," and the invading hordes of Huns, Saracens, and Turks played the role of Antichrists. As the year 1000 neared, millenarianism became more prevalent because many eschatologists believed that the 7th day of creation was to be realized in human history in A.D. 1000 and that there would follow a glorious 10-century reign of the Christ.

In the later Middle Ages, millenarianism was clearly evident in the populous regions of northern France, the Low Countries, and in the Rhine Valley. From a combination of factors—overpopulation, the rise of merchant capitalism, and improvements in agricultural technology-there arose a class of unemployed urban dwellers who possessed neither the native skill nor the professional training with which to secure for themselves a stable place in a competitive society. These people, ever conscious of their desperate condition, became extremely susceptible to the eschatological phantasies of prophets claiming to be divinely inspired saviors, or even gods. Thus the chiliastic tradition was not lost, but instead adapted for social reform. TANCHELM (d. 1115) appeared in Antwerp announcing that he was God to the same degree that Christ was. He quickly gained the confidence of the artisans and it was only after many massacres that he was finally apprehended and executed. In Brittany, a generation later, Budo de Stella attracted a large following of peasants by exposing himself to them as the "Son of God" who would judge the living and the dead. Both Tanchelm and De Stella considered the Church a formidable obstacle to their chiliastic movements and for them the Church became the Antichrist.

Another ancient chiliastic prophecy that appeared in medieval millenarianism was the Sibylline Emperor of the Last Days. At one time or another this title was attributed to Count Baldwin IX of Flanders, Philip II Augustus, Frederick II, Louis IX, Sigismund, Maximilian, and Charles V. Frederick II was the most important of these precursors of the millennial kingdom, because he alone never denied his "divinity" and, even after his death (1250), German eschatologists as late as 1500 believed the prophecy contained in the Book of 100 Chapters.

During the plague epidemics of 1348–49, new self-flagellant sects passed through Germany and Thuringia.

In Thuringia Konrad Schmid (d. 1368), averring to be the Frederick of the eschatological prophecies, preached self-flagellation as a means of preparing for the millennium. The eschatologist Schmid was intimately associated with the heretical Brethren of the Free Spirit, who considered themselves one with the Holy Spirit. This theory, Neoplatonic in accent, was originated in the early 13th century by Amaury, a theologian at the University of Paris. The Amaurians claimed to be the reincarnated Christ whose mission it was to preach the coming millennium in which all mankind would fully recognize their oneness with the Spirit.

Millenarianism lay beneath the surface in England's Peasant Revolt (1381) and the Jacquerie uprising (1358), but it was in the Taborite movement that egalitarian millenarianism first became fully evident. The TABORITES, a revolutionary offspring of the HUSSITES, after John HUS (d. 1414), adopted the chiliastic tenets of the Free Spiritualists, denounced the pope as an Antichrist, and lived in constant anticipation of the Second Coming. Another precursor of egalitarian millenarianism was one Hans BÖHM (d. 1476), the Drummer of Niklashausen, a simpleminded popular entertainer, who became the object of the machinations of the local lords. Böhm averred that the Virgin had instructed him that Niklashausen was the "new salvation city," and only there could man find Divine Grace.

Reformation. During the Reformation chiliastic millenarianism reached a new emotional peak in the PEAS-ANTS' WAR of 1525 and in the ANABAPTIST movement. The uprising of 1525 was an insurrection of peasants led by Thomas MÜNZER, a man firmly committed to a literal interpretation of the chiliastic theories in the Books of Revelation. According to Münzer, the people destined to live in the millennial kingdom were the poor because they had not been corrupted by greed and wealth. The means he chose to attain his end were the sudden overthrow and violent annihilation of the wealthy, ecclesiastical and secular. The Anabaptists tried to live as closely as possible to the precepts of the New Testament, and the more radical members prophesied the millennium. However, the almost fanatical exclusivism of early Anabaptism eventually alienated the militant millenarists in the movement.

In northwest Germany two Anabaptist preachers, Melchior Hoffmann and Bernt Rothmann, acquired converts in the prosperous city of Münster. But they were soon replaced by Jan Matthys (d. 1534) and Jan Bockelson (d. 1537), two chiliastic revolutionaries who were so caught up in their own fervor that they proclaimed that only in Münster were Christians leading a life worthy of salvation. The rest of the world around the "New Jerusalem" would perish in the Parousia that was close at hand.

Anabaptists flocked to Münster and shortly Matthys and Bockelson controlled the town. After Matthys's death, Bockelson declared that by God's will he was the "King of the World." However, his reign came to an abrupt end when the authorities recaptured Münster in 1537.

Modern Period. Millenarianism persisted in the 16th and 17th centuries mainly through the efforts of Valentin Weigel in Germany, Pierre JURIEU in France, and Jane Lade in England. On the Continent, Germany became the most important base of millenarian theory primarily due to the work of Johann Bengel, Frederick Oetinger, Johann Jung-Stilling, and Johann Kurtz.

In the United States, the millenarist William MILLER gathered a large following in the first half of the 19th century. Chiliastic views are still found in the doctrines of the premillenarian Adventist sects that hold that Christ will appear before the millennium. The following religions contain at least part of the premillenarian concept: the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS, the Southern Baptist Convention (see BAPTISTS), the Second ADVENTISTS, the Primitive Baptists, and the Mormons (see LATTER-DAY SAINTS, CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF THE).

MILLER, WILLIAM

Founder of the modern Adventist movement; b. Pittsfield, Mass., Feb. 15, 1782; d. Hampton, N.Y., Dec. 20, 1849. He was a veteran of the War of 1812 and a farmer in upstate New York. At the age of 34, he abandoned Deism to join the Baptist Church; he began to preach in 1831 and engaged in Biblical prophecy. His interpretation of passages in Daniel and the Apocalypse led him to declare that the Second Coming of Christ would occur on March 21, 1843. A number of Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregationalist clergymen accepted his prediction. When the event did not happen on the expected date, Miller announced that the end would come on March 21, 1844; finally, the date was set for Oct. 22, 1844. The postponements and disappointments decimated the ranks of the Millerites, or Adventists. One group, which combined Miller's prophecies with other doctrinal interpretations, survived to become the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS.

MILLS, SAMUEL J.

American Congregationalist minister, who was instrumental in the development of the foreign mission movement in America and in other social and religious reforms; b. Torrington, Conn., April 21, 1783; d. at sea, June 16, 1818. The son of a Congregationalist pastor, he intended to be a farmer until he experienced a conversion (1801) and began to prepare for the ministry, with a view to overseas missionary work. He entered (1806) Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., where he soon influenced other students, culminating in the famous "haystack meeting" (1807), when several experienced a call to the missions. After graduation (1809), he studied briefly at Yale and entered Andover Seminary, Newton Centre, Mass. (1810), where, with some of his Williams College colleagues, he took steps leading to the formation of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He worked for a time as a home missionary in the Mississippi Valley and published A Report of a Missionary Tour (1815). After ordination (1815), he turned his attention to the urban poor and the African Americans, founding the American Bible Society (1816) and associating himself with the newly formed American Colonization Society. As the latter's agent he visited Africa and purchased lands near Cape Mesurado as the site, to be called Liberia, for a settlement of African Americans. After contracting a fever, he died on the return passage.

MILMAN, HENRY HART

English poet, historian; b. London, Feb. 10, 1791; d. Ascot, Sept. 24, 1868. Educated at Eton and Brasenose College, Oxford, Milman had a brilliant academic career and won the Newdigate prize for poetry in 1812. After being ordained in the Anglican Church (1816), he was appointed vicar of St. Mary's in Reading (1818), canon of Westminster and rector of St. Margaret's (1835), and dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, London (1849). He gained an early reputation as a poet with his epic drama Fazio (1815); he then composed Samor the Lord of the Bright City (1818) and the dramatic poems The Fall of Jerusalem (1820) and The Martyr of Antioch and Belshazzar (1822). Ann Boleyn (1826), a somewhat mediocre composition, marked the end of his poetic career. His descriptive style was florid, with a certain dramatic strength; and his poems included some felicitous lyrics. But his work was marred by a lack of creative imagination, particularly in character drawing. He contributed some notable hymns to Reginald Heber's collection in 1827. Some of his best hymns still appear in Anglican hymnbooks; these include "When Our Heads Are Bowed with Woe" and "Ride on, Ride on in Majesty." Later in life Milman turned to translation and pioneered in the rendering of Sanskrit poems into English. He translated Agamemnon and The Bacchae, and also produced a new edition of Horace. In 1838 he published an edition of Edward Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Milman's historical works varied in quality. His History of the Jews (1830) offended Newman and provoked sharp criticism for its evasion and minimizing of the miraculous elements in the Old Testament, but Milman reissued it later with a sharp reply to his critics. His History of Christianity . . . in the Roman Empire (1840) was also coldly received. However, The History of Latin Christianity down to the Death of Pope Nicholas V (1835), his most important historical work, long remained a classic because of its balance and candor, although it contained many errors of detail. Milman had a great gift for friendships and counted Thomas Macaulay, Sydney Smith, Henry Hallam, and John Lockhart in his circle. As dean of St. Paul's he accomplished much in making cathedral worship more popular.

MILNER, JOHN

English bishop and leader in the movement for Catholic emancipation; b. London, Oct. 14, 1752; d. Wolverhampton, April 19, 1826. His father was a tailor and his family, whose proper name was Miller, originated in Lancashire. Bishop Richard Challoner sent him in 1765 to the English college at DOUAI, where he was ordained (1777). He returned then to Winchester, England, where he ministered to the French prisoners of war and served as pastor until 1803. While there, he also helped the English nuns who had fled their convents on the Continent because of the French Revolution to establish themselves in England. During the negotiations leading to the first Catholic Relief Bill, which abolished the Penal Laws and legalized the celebration of Mass (1791), Milner was theological adviser to the English vicars apostolic and encouraged firmness, especially against the objectionable oath required of Catholics and the title of "Protesting Catholic Dissenters." In this stand he opposed the counsel of Charles BUTLER and the Cisalpine Club.

In 1803 Milner became titular bishop of Castabala and vicar apostolic of the Midland District. In subsequent agitation for Catholic EMANCIPATION, Milner acted as London representative of the Irish bishops and fought every measure that would concede to the British government a veto over the Holy See's appointments of Catholic bishops. Here again he was opposed by Butler and also by Bp. William POYNTER and the London clergy. His advocacy of papal prerogatives won for him in Rome the title of the English Athanasius. But his pronounced views, often expressed imprudently, made his writings on emancipation extremely controversial. In 1817 the prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith asked him to discontinue writing articles for the Orthodox Journal. During his remaining years he concentrated on his duties as vicar apostolic. Milner published many articles and books. His two-volume History of Winchester (1798-1801) was scholarly as well as controversial. The End of Controversy (1818), a work of popular theology, is his best-known book. Milner had a reputation also as an archeologist.

MILNER, RALPH, BL.

Lay martyr; b. Slackstead (Flacsted), Hants, England; d. hanged at Winchester, July 7, 1591. Milner was a simple, illiterate man who married and supported his eight children through his labor. For most of a century he belonged to the Anglican church, but the lives of the Catholics he knew caused him to reconsider his beliefs.

John Milner.

He decided to seek instruction in the faith and was received into the Church. On the day of his first Communion, however, he was arrested and committed to Winchester jail for changing his religion. Here his good behavior during years of imprisonment eventually won the confidence of the jailer who entrusted Milner with the prison keys and frequently allowed him to leave. This enabled him to help his fellow Catholic prisoners by bringing in priests to administer the Sacraments or render other services. His liberty also allowed him to serve as escort to several priests, including Fr. Thomas Stanney, then Bl. Roger DICKENSON, with whom he was arrested. Dickenson and Milner were confined to Winchester jail. Attempts were made to persuade the ancient Milner to attend a Protestant service in exchange for his life. He refused "to embrace a counsel so disagreeable to the maxims of the Gospel." Other effort was made en route to the gallows: His children were sent to plead with him to renounce his faith. Instead, Milner blessed his children and said that "he could wish them no greater happiness than to die for the like cause". He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

MILTIADES, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: July 2, 311 to Jan. 10, 314. After a vacancy of one or two years the Emperor Maxentius allowed the election of a new bishop of Rome as successor to EUSEBIUS. The LIBERIAN CATALOGUE assigns him a reign of three years, six months, and eight days and says that he was consecrated on July 2, 311; while the trustworthy Depositio Episcoporum places the date of his burial on January 10. The three years (III) of the Liberian Catalogue may be a mistake for II; this would reconcile the two sources. Miltiades (also Melchiades) assumed office apparently shortly after the promulgation of the Edict of Toleration at Nicomedia on April 30, 311, which put an end to persecution, at least in the West.

His election ended a period of internal confusion and factionalism in the Roman Church. Maxentius ordered the Pretorian Prefect to restore to the deacons of the Roman Church the property confiscated by the State. What part Miltiades played in the momentous events that shaped the destiny of the Church and culminated in the imperial rescripts of 313 is not known. But during his reign Christianity received legal recognition and eventually a status equal to that of the pagan cults.

Miltiades was in Rome when CONSTANTINE became emperor after his victory at the Milvian Bridge, which he attributed to the aid of the Christian God. The new emperor presented to the pope a palace on the Lateran which became the papal residence.

In the case of the Donatist controversy the initiative clearly seems to have lain with Constantine I. The African bishops opposed the election of Caecilian as bishop of Carthage on the grounds that he had been a traditor and appealed to Constantine to designate bishops from Gaul to decide between the two parties. The emperor commissioned the pope, together with the bishops of Cologne, Autun, and Arles, to adjudicate the matter in Rome after hearing both sides. Going beyond the emperor's commission, Miltiades added fifteen Italian bishops to the group, held a synod in the domus Faustae in Laterano on October 2, 313, at which both Caecilian and his rival DONATUS were present, pronounced in favor of Caecilian, and excommunicated Donatus. They also proposed milder measures to facilitate the reconciliation of the Donatists in accordance with the imperial will. The Donatists appealed from the Roman synod to the emperor. It seems that they never forgave Miltiades for his decision against them; and toward the end of the century they spread stories about his alleged weakness during the persecution.

It is unlikely that the measures attributed to him by the Liber pontificalis forbidding fasting on Sundays and Thursdays and providing for particles of the consecrated host (fermentum) to be sent from the pope's Mass to the presbyteral churches are contemporary. His death is commemorated correctly in the Depositio Episcoporum and Martyrology of St. Jerome on January 10. The Roman MARTYROLOGY, following the Liber pontificalis, is in error with December 10. Miltiades was buried in the cemetery of St. Callistus, the exact location of his tomb being unknown.

MILTITZ, KARL VON

Curial diplomat; b. Rabenaul, near Dresden, 1490; d. by drowning in the Main, Nov. 20, 1529. Karl was the posthumous son of Sigismund von Miltitz, a lesser noble of Meissen; he was educated at Cologne and Mainz and was sent to Rome in 1541, where, through the influence of his uncle, the Dominican Nicholas von Schönberg, he was made a papal notary and titular chamberlain. In September of 1518 he was selected to carry the Golden Rose to Frederick The Wise, Elector of Saxony. The move was calculated to frustrate the imperial election of the Hapsburg Charles of Spain and to persuade the elector to consent to the extradition of Martin Luther. It was not the intention of LEO X that Miltitz should inaugurate a policy of mediation during his conference with Luther at Altenberg in January of 1519; nevertheless Miltitz, believing that a settlement of the Lutheran affair would aid Rome's plans in the imperial election, suggested a trial for Luther before the archbishop of Trier. Neither Luther nor his supporters trusted the emissary who had, without the knowledge of Cajetan, his superior, proposed a hearing that would also involve Johann TETZEL. The death of Maximilian on January 10 postponed the Lutheran affair, and Miltitz, as papal agent and with French support, attempted to persuade Frederick to obtain the two votes needed for his election. The promise of a cardinal's hat for whomever he chose was one of Miltitz's inducements. Miltitz met with Luther at Liebenwenda (October 1519) and Lichtenberg (October 1520) but achieved no results. He resided in Germany and held benefices as a chapter member of cathedrals in Mainz and Meissen until his death.

MILTON, JOHN

Poet, scholar, pamphleteer; b. London, Dec. 9, 1608; d. there, Nov. 8, 1674. He was a product of the classical Renaissance and of the Protestant Reformation in its most extreme English development, Puritanism. His father, John, who had defected from Roman Catholicism and was disinherited by his yeoman family, had prospered as a London scrivener by the time his son was born. The home, strongly Protestant and moderately Puritan (conforming still to the Established Church), was not notably literary or artistic but contained some books (e.g., Sylvester's translation of the French Protestant poet Du Bartas and Spenser's Faerie Queene) and the family was fond of music (the father was an amateur musician and composer); the home was marked by "cheerful godliness," and certainly by respect for learning. The gifted and studious boy had every educational advantage: private tutoring, St. Paul's School (COLET's foundation, which under Alexander Gill largely retained a tradition of Christian humanism), and Christ's College, Cambridge (1625–32). The last, to Milton's disgust (see Proclusion 3), was still dominated by the old scholastic discipline but afforded him an opportunity to continue his classical studies and commence his practice in poetry (Latin, English, and even Italian).

If this background was designed to prepare Milton for holy orders and a place among the Puritan preachers within the Established Church, LAUD's policy of repression thwarted it, and Milton found himself "churchouted by the prelates"; but, as his religious experience deepened and confidence in his poetic gift grew, he determined to devote his life to the service of God in poetry.

John Milton.

A period of intense study and moral discipline (1632–38) followed, during which he wrote Comus (1634) and Lycidas (1638). A tour through France and Switzerland to Italy (1638–39) led to meetings with Grotius, Galileo, and Manso (the friend and patron of Tasso), and to his welcome in the Platonic Academy (Florence). Though he did not conceal his Puritan principles, this was a humanist's pilgrimage to classic ground, which would have continued to Sicily and Greece had not the Bishops' War, the prelude to the Puritan Revolution, called him home to be of service in the struggle for reformation and liberty (see his account in Defensio secunda).

Prose in the Puritan Cause. Save for the Epitaphium Damonis (1639), a moving elegy on Charles Diodati, his friend and confidant since boyhood days, his Sonnets (Nos. 8–23), and one or two other occasional pieces, he wrote no more poetry until Paradise Lost (though he published his earlier Poems in 1645). All his effort was channeled into prose in defense of the Puritan cause or to expositions of his concepts of religious, civil, and domestic liberty. First he joined the attack on Episcopacy and the demand for a Presbyterian church in such works as Of Reformation (1641) and The Reason of Church Government (1642). Then he made his plea for freer divorce in The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1643, 1644) and Tetrachordon (1643)—a plea not unconnected with the fact that his young wife, Mary Powell, whom he had married in 1642, had returned to her Royalist family. Milton was now attacked by his Presbyterian allies, and, hampered by their censorship of the press, he wrote his most famous prose work, the Areopagitica (1644). It was a plea for uncensored publication but also in effect for liberty of conscience, appearing in the same year as Roger WILLIAMS's Bloudy Tenent of Persecution. In Of Education (1644), Milton described (in the spirit of Christian humanism, not, as is sometimes asserted, in that of Baconian empiricism) the intellectual, religious, and moral training necessary for those who would be truly free and competent to serve Church and State.

Not until 1649 did he turn to political issues, when, in The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates, he defended the desperate action of the Puritan Army in bringing Charles I to trial and execution. Eikonoklastes (1649) was an effort to counteract the immense effect of the Eikon Basilike, the supposed meditations of Charles in captivity; and, now Latin secretary to the new republican government, Milton was commissioned to reply to the royalist champion SALMASIUS. This he did in Pro populo anglicano defensio (1651), of which (as he proudly said) "all Europe talks from side to side," and to which he consciously and heroically sacrificed the remnant of his failing eyesight. Though a republican at heart, he supported Oliver CROMWELL as Lord Protector, praising and admonishing him in the Defensio secunda (1654). When he was relieved of some of his duties in 1655, and of more in 1658, he had leisure to give to his theological treatise, De Doctrina Christiana (unpublished until 1825), and perhaps to Paradise Lost (whose subject he had had in mind as early as 1642, but for dramatic, not epic, treatment). Meanwhile he had written such sonnets as No. 16, to Cromwell (a plea against a state church); No. 18, on the late massacre in Piedmont; No. 19, on his blindness; and No. 23, on the death of his beloved second wife. With the death of Cromwell in November 1658, and the ensuing chaos that was to result in the Restoration, Milton struck his last blows for the extreme Puritan cause: in Of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes (1659) he pleaded for religious toleration and in A Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth (2d ed. April 1660) he opposed the Restoration up to its very eve.

At the Restoration Milton was imprisoned for a short time but unmolested after his release, an act of singular clemency by the restored monarchy. Though aging, blind, with all his hopes for England shattered, and conscious of living in an alien world, he was yet able to complete the work he was born to do. Paradise Lost appeared in 1667 (the 1st ed. in ten books, later redivided into 12), and Paradise Regained, with Samson Agonistes, in 1671. There is no greater example of genius coupled with indomitable will. He was buried in the Church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, with Anglican rites.

Early Poetry (1626–39). At Cambridge Milton seized every opportunity to practice the art to which he had devoted himself. In Latin he wrote Elegy 3 (on the death of Lancelot Andrewes), Elegy 7 (Cupid's Revenge), and Elegy 5 (On the Coming of Spring)—the last two were pagan erotic poems in the tradition of the Roman elegists but marked by a characteristic beauty of innocence. Religion and the English language, however, were soon to assert their claim in the Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity (1629), in which we may trace the beginnings of an experience, at once religious and poetic, that was to crystallize three years later in the resolve to live and write thereafter "As ever in my great Taskmaster's eye" (Sonnet 7, December 1632). Between 1629 and 1632 there had been some hesitation, perhaps retreat, but certainly a return to secular subjects in the Italian sonnets, in Arcades, and in the famous companion pieces, L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, though with religious overtones in the last. After Sonnet 7, however, there was to be no return to secular themes.

Four characteristics of Milton's poetry were already present in the early poems: (1) the starting point in traditional forms (the Ovidian elegy; the Petrarchan sonnet; in the Nativity Ode, the Messianic eclogue; in Arcades and Comus, the court masque; in L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, a compendium of motifs from the English lyric; in Lycidas, the pastoral elegy as it had come down from Theocritus and Virgil); (2) the freedom and originality with which Milton shapes these traditional vehicles to his ends; (3) the clearly marked structure of each, the groundwork for a variety of patterned effects in idea, image, and sentiment—a principal source of their artistic appeal; and (4) the unobtrusive but patent reference in most of them to Milton's own experience and deepest concerns—a source of their emotional power. These characteristics may be illustrated briefly from Comus and Lycidas.

Comus, written for the installation of the Earl of Bridgewater as Lord President of Wales, develops into something more dramatic and more fraught with doctrine than the common masque, as it presents the imagined adventures of the Earl's three children on their journey to Ludlow to greet their parents. In the wild wood the brothers lose their sister, who is decoyed by the evil enchanter Comus (the son of Circe) to his palace and there tempted to share his life of luxury and license. She scornfully rejects his advances; her brothers, led by the Attendant Spirit, find her, firm indeed in virtue, but immobilized by the enchanter's spell, from which she can be freed only by the superior power of Sabrina, virgin nymph of the River Severn, who, sprinkling on her "drops of precious cure," releases her to pursue her journey. The children reach Ludlow and are presented by the Attendant Spirit to their parents. On its literal level the action is pure folktale, but "more is meant than meets the ear"; the wild wood is the world; the palace of Comus is a concentration of evil therein; and Ludlow, the goal of the journey, is home and a symbol of heaven. The theme is chastity and the resistance to temptation, but more than that, heaven's providential care of the innocent (symbolized by the Attendant Spirit) and the necessity of divine grace for progress in the Christian's pilgrimage (symbolized by the intervention of Sabrina). This is Milton's concern and his message, summed up by the epilogue spoken by the Attendant Spirit. Structural pattern and symbolic image are of the essence of Comus.

Pattern and symbol play the same role in Lycidas, Milton's elegy on the death by drowning of young Edward King. The Christian pastoral elegy, unlike its pagan counterpart, moves (as can be seen in the Epitaphium Damonis) from despair to the hope of immortality and so to a note of consolation and triumph. In Lycidas, while drawing on the accumulated imagery of the whole tradition, Milton extends this hope to a principle of healing and restoration that operates, under Providence, throughout life and culminates in the joys of heaven. Thus to view the tragedy, by an alliance of religion and poetry, is to clear one's vision and fortify one's faith; and the poet is able at the end to resume his task: "Tomorrow to fresh woods and pastures new."

Developing Thought (1640-60). Milton's Puritanism became increasingly emphatic and extreme. When allied with the Presbyterians (1640-43), he grew disillusioned, deciding that "New Presbyter is but old Priest writ large" (New Forcers of Conscience, 1646), and supported the Independents, until they in turn sought to set up a state church. Thereupon he appealed to Cromwell, "Help us to save free conscience from the paw/ Of hireling wolves whose gospel is their maw" (Sonnet 16, 1652); he was by this time clearly a Separatist, who would presently champion religious toleration for all who grounded their beliefs solely on Scripture (Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes, 1659). His Puritanism explains his politics: others might fall away, but he would champion "the good old cause" to the bitter end, convinced that it alone would guarantee the liberty of the regenerate. This was his sole concern, and he was to countenance violence and dictatorship to achieve this end. After the Areopagitica he became increasingly disillusioned with his fellow countrymen: he was a radical but no democrat. In The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649) he asserted that all power resides in the people and is merely delegated to the monarch, who, if he violates his trust, may be brought to account. This, however, does not mean that the people's will must prevail: the Puritan army, called and owned by God, must, under its leaders, act for the people's good and, if need be, against their will. His defiance of the majority was more open in The Ready and Easy Way (1660): all who have opposed or abandoned the Puritan cause have lost their right of choice, and the remnant, who desire only their freedom, have the right to keep it by force if they can. To encourage them and give them something to fight for, Milton proposed a new constitution with neither monarch nor protector but a perpetual senate of able and regenerate men, dedicated to the principle of religious freedom.

For Milton, the extreme Puritan, the Church and tradition count for nothing: there is but one authority, the Bible, as it is studied and interpreted by the individual believer. Between his Puritanism and his humanism some tension inevitably developed, but their relation is not simple. In politics there was a radical tradition in Renaissance humanism, and Milton responded to this in his political writings. In ethics, he combined an appeal to Scripture, to the law of nature, and to the good of man (as in the divorce tracts); and, much more than most of his fellow Puritans, he reacted strongly against asceticism. Moreover, his scripturism was accompanied by an increasingly militant rationalism: where the Bible speaks, he would accept its pronouncements (but he would first submit them to a searching analysis); where it is silent, he would rely on reason alone. To this combination of Scripture and reason may be traced some of the more extreme opinions of the De Doctrina Christiana.

In isolating these principal examples, we should remember that Milton always regarded himself as a Christian, retaining a firm conviction of God's creation and government of the world, man's fall and Christ's Redemption, and the clear revelation of all this in Scripture. But his views on the Trinity approximated ARIANISM: the Son, "the first born of every creature," but raised to divine honors, was the "True Image of the Father" and the manifestation of the otherwise inapprehensible God. He rejected creation ex nihilo and substituted, in effect, de Deo: since God was infinite, He embraced all that was, and since He was omnipotent, all causes, including the material cause. Creation was thus the imposition of form and order on a single substance, essentially good (because of God), and including both matter and spirit (which differed not in kind, but in degree). This position is often called MATERIALISM, but is more correctly MO-NISM.

Further, Milton rejected the extremes of Calvinism; he held that the fall of man was not predestined but the result of man's free choice; that it resulted, in turn, not in total depravity but in deprivation. Grace sufficient for repentance, however, was offered to all men, and, if freely accepted, was enhanced to salvation; the law of nature, given to Adam and obscured but not obliterated by the fall, was, in the regenerate, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, progressively restored to its original brightness. Finally Milton placed a heavy and repeated emphasis on Christian liberty, which depends on the voluntary acceptance of the Gospel, whereby the regenerate were made sons of God and joint heirs with Christ. On the negative side it meant the abrogation of the Law, and on the positive, the identification of liberty with virtue, the recognition that God's service was indeed perfect freedom. It is necessary to know this much of Milton's theology if one is to understand his writings, and especially Paradise Lost; for the positions argued in the De Doctrina, orthodox and unorthodox alike, are assumed in the epic.

Paradise Lost. Milton's magnum opus is a classical epic with a Christian subject and theme: its form links it with Homer, and more particularly with Vergil; but its subject, derived from the Bible, turns on man's fall, his repentance, and the promise of salvation—matters wholly alien to the pagan models. It is a religious, even a theological, poem whose purpose is to "justify the ways of God to men" by placing the responsibility for the fall squarely on man himself (God's foreknowledge did not predestinate), and to "assert eternal Providence" in the provision for redemption by the Son. It is thus a kind of theodicy and it further includes a hexameron (an account of the six days of creation). It is a work of immense learning and of conscious and constant artistry. Milton fearlessly claimed that it was divinely inspired.

In Paradise Lost we recognize in their full development the qualities already adumbrated in the early poems. It is a masterpiece of construction. Like the Aeneid, it plunges in medias res, with Satan and the rebel angels already in Hell and planning to avenge themselves on God through his new creature, man; we get our first picture of Adam and Eve in their happy state of innocence as Satan spies upon them. Then in Raphael's narrative to them (cf. that of Aeneas to Dido) we learn of the antecedent action: the war in heaven and the defeat and eviction of the rebels by the Son—an epic within the epic. Now the crisis approaches: Eve, willfully tending her flowers alone, is easily deceived by Satan in the form of the Serpent, and Adam, undeceived, deliberately chooses to share her sin and her fate ("So forcible within my heart I feel/ The bond of nature draw me to my own"). The holiness and peace of Eden are shattered: they fall first to lust, then to recrimination. The Son passes judgment upon themthey fear, but they do not yet repent. Repentance follows, not without prevenient grace, but still by means of the very "bond of nature" gradually restored: together they pray for forgiveness (this has been called the second crisis of the poem). There remains the prophetic view of the future (placed by Vergil at the midpoint of the epic, by Milton at the end) effected by Michael, who reveals to Adam the results of the fall in future history, but also the promise of redemption and a "Paradise within thee, happier far"; for Adam has learned his lesson: "Henceforth I learn that to obey is best/... Taught this by his example whom I now/ Acknowledge my Redeemer ever blest." On this note, Adam and Eve go out into the world together, hand in hand.

The structural pattern gives to Paradise Lost its classic purity of outline and a firm foundation for all the enrichment that Milton adds. There are innumerable other patterned effects. The revolt of the angels (besides supplying the martial action necessary for an epic) stands in a twofold relation to the fall, of cause, but also of parallel (with difference). Michael's prophecy of the future balances Raphael's narrative of the past. The four settings are related, and each is not only a locality but the symbol of a state of mind: Heaven is God-centered, and therefore perfect order (and perfect freedom); unfallen Earth reflects that order; Hell is not (as might be thoughtlessly assumed) disorder but perverted order (and utter slavery) as if heaven were reflected in a distorting mirror; and Chaos is unorder, destitute of form, but capable of receiving it at the hand of God. Creation, too, is a symbol: goodness is constructive, and in the Redemption, reconstructive, while Satan can only destroy. Satan, Sin, and Death are a sort of infernal trinity.

Basic in both pattern and meaning is the Pauline conception of Christ as the second Adam. He is the hero of the epic, the exemplar of its standard of heroism (as Achilles is in the Iliad, and Aeneas in the Aeneid), and it is Christian heroism that Adam must learn. Satan is not (as is so often assumed) the hero of the poem: his is a pagan heroism (repeatedly he reminds us of Achilles), and in him pagan heroism is presented, judged, and condemned. Milton's Satan is a triumph of characterization (as even those who misunderstand the poet's meaning agree). It is achieved by treating the character in human terms, so that he becomes a tragic figure—of the order, one might say, of Macbeth. But successful characterization is not confined to Satan; presented at first as ideal and somewhat remote figures in a pastoral setting, Adam and Eve are gradually brought nearer to us, and the Fall and their movement toward repentance become poignant domestic drama. Given the nature of Milton's "fable," this is a triumph indeed. Other genres, then, make their subordinate contributions to Paradise Lost, but the prevailing note is epic dignity and grandeur, supported by Milton's mighty verse, his language, his imagery, and not least by his great epic similes, patterns themselves and integrated with the pattern of the whole.

Samson Agonistes and Paradise Regained. Though it has been generally assumed (but on no reliable evidence) that Samson Agonistes (1671) was the last written of Milton's poems, there is good reason to regard Paradise Regained (published the same year) as summing up his final outlook.

As in Paradise Lost Milton wrote a classical epic on a Christian theme, in Samson Agonistes he essayed the yet more difficult task of a Christian tragedy, and with at least equal success. In form it adheres even more closely to Greek tragedy than does Paradise Lost to the Greco-Roman epic. Its subject is likewise scriptural, derived from the Book of Judges; its theme is similar (sin, repentance, and restoration) and the treatment involves the same combination of religious reference and human motivation, of theology and psychology. Again it is a masterpiece of construction, the most perfect perhaps of all Milton's poems, and the most moving. From the depth of despair ("Eyeless in Gaza at the mill with slaves") brought on by his own sin and folly, and feeling as yet only self-centered remorse and the sense of "Heaven's desertion," Samson comes first to true repentance, then to the dawning hope of God's forgiveness ("Whose ear is ever open, and his eye/ Gracious to re-admit the suppliant"), and finally, at the very end, to the conviction that there is yet one more task for God, the seal of his forgiveness and reacceptance, to be achieved at the cost of his own death. As in Sophocles' Oedipus at Colonus, the action is all inward; the change is effected through a series of encounters (with the Chorus, Manoa, Dalila, Harapha, the Officer). We recognize the operation of God's providence and prevenient grace, but the motivation is all intelligible on the human level. Samson goes to his death doubly armed, with "celestial vigor" and "plain heroic magnitude of mind." Thus is attained the full tragic effect and the Aristotelian catharsis: "calm of mind, all passion spent."

Paradise Regained finds its subject in the temptation of the wilderness (chosen as paralleling the temptation in Eden and in pursuit of the theme of Christ as the second Adam) and its structural starting point in the Book of Job (thought of by Milton, following St. Jerome, as epic in genre). The order of the temptations is taken from St. Luke and is adopted for the sake of a structural pattern that treats briefly the first and third temptations (respectively to distrust and presumption), but elaborates the second (that of the kingdoms, conceived as involving both distrust and presumption) in a series of temptations to glory—the glory of beauty, of fame, of wealth, of power (represented by imperial Rome), and of knowledge (represented by Athens, "The eye of Greece, mother of arts"). The superb culmination comes when Christ stands on the pinnacle of the Temple, and as Christ rebukes him ("Tempt not the Lord thy God") Satan falls. For, as the angels sing, Christ is indeed the "True Image of the Father."

Like all great religious poems, Milton's spring from a coalescence of religious and aesthetic experience. He does not shift his ground in doctrine, but all the positive elements of his belief come into play. It is as though, when he writes poetry, a new dimension were added to his sensibility and his thought.

MILWAUKEE, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Milwaukee (Milwauchiensis) was established as a diocese Nov. 28, 1843; and as an archdiocese, Feb. 12, 1875. In 2001 it had a population of 685,004 Catholics, 31 percent of the general population of 2,222,364 in ten counties in southeastern Wisconsin, an area of 4,758 square miles. The ecclesiastic Province of Milwaukee, includes all the Wisconsin dioceses as its suffragans, namely, Green Bay, LaCrosse, Madison, and Superior. From 1843, when Milwaukee was erected as a separate see, it was governed by the following prelates: John Martin

HENNI, 1844–81; Michael HEISS, 1881–90; Frederic KATZER, 1891–1903; Sebastian Gebhard MESSMER, 1903–30; Samuel Alphonse STRITCH, 1930–40; Moses Elias Kiley, 1940–53; Albert Gregory Meyer, 1953–58; William Edward Cousins, 1958–77; and Rembert G. Weakland, OSB, 1977–2002.

Wisconsin early formed a center for Native Americans and a goal for French explorers, of whom the first was Jean Nicolet who, seeking a route to China, landed at Green Bay in 1634. In the summer of 1661 the first missionary, René Ménard, SJ, entered Wisconsin at the source of the Wisconsin River, and four years later Claude Allouez, SJ, built the first church between Bayfield and Washburn. But wars, liquor, traders, the official policy of concentrating the Native Americans near Detroit, and the suppression of the Jesuits by the French government in 1762 ruined the Jesuit missions. John Baptist Chardon, SJ, remained at Green Bay until 1728, when it too was given up. With the exception of a missionary or two, no priest entered Wisconsin for about a century. Rev. Gabriel Richard of Detroit stopped off at Green Bay and started a church building in 1823, which was completed in 1825 by Rev. Vincent Badin, also from Detroit. In 1840 the Wisconsin Territory, including eastern Minnesota, had a Catholic population of 14,600 (of whom 11,000 were Native Americans) in a total of 40,000. Before the establishment of a diocese in Wisconsin, it had been visited by several bishops including Edward Fenwick of Cincinnati, who stopped at Green Bay in 1829 and 1831. In 1838 Frederic Résé of Detroit paid a visit to La Pointe and Little Chute, and two years later Mathias Loras's trip from Dubuque, Iowa, included visits at Green Bay, Little Chute, Kenosha, Milwaukee, and Potosi. Charles Auguste de Forbin-Janson, a French refugee bishop of Nancy and Toul, was offered the temporary administration of the Detroit diocese, but after a tour of inspection in 1840, which touched on Wisconsin, he declined the charge.

Difficult Years. From 1840 to 1870 most settlers in the area came from Germany, Ireland, and Norway. Later, the Poles led (1870–1920), followed by the Swedes (1900–20), Italians (1900–10), and other nationalities with lesser numbers. Opposition to the Church took the form of segregation designed to isolate Catholics, especially the foreign-born, and was sponsored in turn by religious sects, Nativists, Know-Nothings, Forty-eighters, Whigs, and Turners. Bishop Henni and his successors had to contend with these external threats, but gradually by the acquisition of property, organization of parishes, schools, and societies, and a vigorous, informed press, they succeeded in making Catholicism respectable.

Nativist Attacks. In 1844, when a Nativist Gospel-Whig, Rev. John J. Miter, launched an attack against Romanism, charging that the hierarchy was dedicated to the overthrow of the government by control of the Irish vote, Henni's Facts Against Assertions (1845) silenced open attacks and offered a basis for respect and understanding. The press attack of Frederic Fratny of the Forty-eighters against the Church as being antagonistic to republican forms of government and intolerant toward personal liberty, principally by its regulation of marriages and burials, was proved a hoax by the Catholic press. Henni recruited F. J. Felsecker for the propaganda war with the Forty-eighters, and he demonstrated that their press was filled with material fabricated in Luther's time. As a result Catholics became more closely organized through societies and much better informed.

Among the other external obstacles to the Church, the problem of religious freedom for inmates of public reformatories and prisons was settled by legislative enactment in 1891, after two decades of conflict. Little encouragement was accorded KNOW-NOTHINGISM in the 1850s, but later the AMERICAN PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION (APA) developed strength in the state, where about 100 branches were organized. Catholics countered the movement through activities of the Milwaukee Columbian League and in their press, especially the Catholic Citizen. The question of reading the Bible in public schools received notice and significance from the Edgerton Bible Case [see CHURCH AND STATE IN THE U.S. (LEGAL HISTO-RY), 3]. In 1891 the state supreme court declared reading the Bible in public schools sectarian instruction and therefore unconstitutional. Credit for making the question an issue was due largely to Rev. James F. Bowe, of Edgerton, whose efforts were financed by funds raised through the columns of the Catholic Citizen. The Bennett Law, enacted in 1889, was a compulsory education act that included provisions for teaching English and going to school in the district of one's residence. Under the leadership of Archbishop Heiss, the bishops of Wisconsin registered an able and effective protest. The Bennett Law became the issue in the gubernatorial election of 1890, with the result that it was repealed in 1891. In the opinion of Archbishop Katzer, the reversal was due to the intelligence and organization of the laity, under the leadership of Humphrey J. Desmond, lawyer, editor, author, and at that time chairman of the education committee in the Legislature.

Thus, with the exception of the Civil War period, outbreaks of hatred marked every decade prior to 1900. In 1853 the visit to Milwaukee of Abp. Gaetano BEDINI, papal nuncio to Brazil, provided an opportunity for Fortyeighters to express their hatred of the Church, particularly in their press. They planned to hang Bedini in effigy, but were forced to drop the scheme, when no Native Americans could be induced to join them. A notable address to Bedini from the Catholic laity did much to silence the opposition. Among the anti-Catholic items in the 1870s was the convent libel case, which involved defamatory remarks in a Protestant weekly, the Christian Statesman, about the Notre Dame Sisters in Milwaukee, and was actually a veiled attack on the Catholic school system. The case was tried in circuit court at Milwaukee in February 1875, and ended in a hung jury over the question: Can a corporation be libeled? The affair was settled when the editor retracted his statement. In 1875-76 hatred for the Catholic Church in the German press and the Milwaukee city council was blamed for blocking a donation of land to the Sisters of Charity for a lying-in hospital and infant asylum. The same sisters were engaged in litigation with the city (1890-1900) for damages when Terrace Avenue was extended through their property. Proceedings in the council and feelings elsewhere were marked at times by charges of bigotry, prejudice, and illegality. The city finally paid $5,000 damages and issued a quitclaim deed. In 1897 the placement of Marquette's statue in the national capitol by legislative action produced an outburst of hostility. Positive apologetics in the press and letters by laymen such as Desmond to the lawmakers helped to steady the latter. At the end of the 19th century socialism began to grow locally and nationally. Archbishop Messmer tried to check its effect on labor unions through the Federation of Catholic Societies, the encyclical Rerum novarum of Pope Leo XIII, and the presentation of lectures by noted speakers.

Messmer was also conscious of the need for a pastoral outreach to the blacks. When Lincoln Charles Valle, a black layman from Chicago, called on Messmer in 1908 to interest him in evangelizing the blacks in Milwaukee, Messmer encouraged the work and lent the assistance of diocesan clergy. The Capuchins took over the work in 1911 and after the building of St. Benedict the Moor's church, the apostolate began to bear fruit.

Internal Dissension. Besides strife arising from the outside, the Milwaukee diocese experienced trouble from within in the form of trusteeism, Fenianism, and nationalism. Lay trusteeism never became a major problem to Church leaders who employed common sense and publicity against it. Henni used indirect methods to curb Fenians by persuading local Irish leaders to eschew all support of an association already condemned by the bishops of Ireland. The choice of a coadjutor for Henni in the last years of the 1870s sparked dissension in the press, correspondence, and discussion among the English and German-speaking elements, particularly clerical, in the archdiocese and elsewhere. The appointment of Heiss, though gratifying to Henni, not only disrupted the archdiocese and its unity, but had repercussions far beyond Wisconsin, especially by opening up the entire nationalistic question in the U.S. By focusing attention on the role of nationality, the debate in ecclesiastical circles awakened a livelier regard for immigrants. The Kuryer Polski, a Polish daily of Milwaukee founded in 1888, advocated the creation of Polish dioceses with Polish bishops. For 25 years the question was embittered by official letters banning the paper and by law suits. Finally in 1916 the Kuryer Polski lost its case in which it charged the bishops of the Wisconsin province with conspiracy and boycott. The state supreme court decided in favor of the bishops on the grounds of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which the plaintiff acknowledged.

Need for meeting a hostile press and furnishing information gave rise to a German Catholic press. In 1852, the Seebote appeared in Milwaukee, followed by the Columbia in 1872, and the Excelsior in 1883. World War I, and the limitation of immigration after it, presaged the doom of the German press and also the lessening of the appeal of other foreign language newspapers. The Star of Bethlehem (1869) and Catholic Vindicator (1870) appeared in English to counter new antagonisms. Both merged in 1878 into the Catholic Citizen, which in turn became the Catholic Herald-Citizen in 1935. The foregoing papers, particularly the Catholic Citizen, which was well informed and edited, may be credited with much of the unity and aggressiveness of the Catholic laity. Beginning in 1885 three successive attempts to publish a Polish paper failed, but the Kuryer Polski began its continuous appearance in 1888. To counter its nationalistic laicism, a clerical opposition press was started at various times. The Katolik (1895) and the Dziennik Milwaucki (1899) were short-lived but the Nowiny Polskie, founded in 1907, lasted to 1950, when popular interest, as well as income, waned.

Institutional Growth. Father Martin KUNDIG introduced the first parochial school at Milwaukee in 1842 with lay teachers, and four years later Henni secured the Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md., to do the teaching. Milwaukee's first public school opened in June 1846 in the basement of St. Peter's Cathedral by an arrangement with Henni, who agreed not to teach the catechism in school hours. By the 1850s the needed churches had been built and a supply of priests assured by the new seminary (1856). Nothing was closer to the heart of Henni than parish schools wherein the required languages were available. The Dominican Sisters of Sinsinawa, founded by Rev. Samuel Mazzuchelli, OP, in 1847, provided a partial fulfillment of Henni's plan to obtain teachers for English-speaking congregations. Mother Karoline Gerhardinger of the School Sisters of Notre Dame from Bavaria, who had settled in Pennsylvania in 1847, arrived at Milwaukee in 1850. By 1860 her sisters had charge of 13 diocesan grade schools, and operated Mount Mary College, established 1872, in Milwaukee.

The Sisters of St. Francis of Assisi arrived in 1849, and undertook their first teaching assignment in 1864 at Jefferson. Founded, 1937, by the Sisters of St. Francis of Assisi for the education of novices and sisters, St. Clare College was renamed Cardinal Stritch College in 1946. In that year, it admitted laywomen and became a women's college. In 1970, Cardinal Stritch College went coeducational and in 1997 it attained university status.

The School Sisters of St. Francis came to Milwaukee from Baden in 1873, and after some migrating finally settled there in 1888. In 1963 they taught in 44 archdiocesan grade schools. German Dominican sisters staffed numerous parish schools in the archdiocese, and established a motherhouse at Racine in 1863, where they conducted coeducational Dominican College (1935). The college was closed in the 1970s.

The Sisters of St. Agnes, founded at Barton, Wis., in 1858, to teach in rural district schools, in addition to having charge of grade schools, established Marian College for women (1963) in Fond du Lac, Wis. St. Thomas College, opened by Mazzuchelli at Sinsinawa in 1847 and chartered in 1848, had a competent faculty and adequate equipment, but was closed in 1865 because of the death of its founder and other factors.

Two high schools opened by the Jesuits in Milwaukee were suppressed by 1872. In 1881 Marquette began as a college; its transformation into a university began in 1907, and its graduate school was organized in 1922. A branch of the Capuchins was organized in 1856 at Mt. Calvary, where St. Lawrence Seminary was started in 1860 and has since graduated many young men destined for the priesthood. Holy Cross Fathers from Notre Dame, Ind., set up a college at Watertown in 1872, which ceased operation as such in 1911, when it became a training school for their brothers.

A normal school, started in 1870 to supply lay teachers and organists, was located in St. Francis and is associated with the work of John Singenberger, composer and organist. The Catholic Summer School of the West was organized at Madison in 1895. In 1906 Rev. Henry Hengell was named chaplain of the Catholic students at the University of Wisconsin, becoming the first to so serve at any secular university in the U.S.

The Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md., opened the first hospital May 15, 1848, in Milwaukee, which since 1858 has become well-known as St. Mary's. In 1963 there were also St. Joseph's Hospital, conducted by Franciscan sisters, and four lesser general hospitals in Milwaukee, as well as ten others within the archdiocese.

Special hospitals were conducted by the School Sisters of St. Francis, the Sacred Heart Sanitarium (1893), and its annex for mental cases, St. Mary's Hill (1912). St. Rose's orphanage for girls was started in 1848 and St. Aemilian's for boys in 1849 at the residence of the Sisters of Charity. In 1855 the boys were put under the charge of the Sisters of St. Francis. In 1908, when there were 17 Polish parishes in the archdiocese, the need for a Polish orphanage was met when St. Joseph's orphanage was opened at Wauwatosa. St. Vincent's Infant Asylum, opened in 1877 by the Sisters of Charity to care for foundlings, uncared-for babies, and unwed mothers, ceased operation Oct. 1, 1958, because of the use of foster homes for small children. The sisters at once adopted a project to aid girls with emotional problems in a group home. In 1877 the Good Shepherd Sisters came to care for delinquent girls, while boys went to an industrial school which was an annex to St. Aemilian's orphanage, probably the earliest predecessor of St. Charles Boys' Home, a protective institution. St. John's School for the Deaf was opened in May 1876. A Conference of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, formed at Milwaukee in 1849, lapsed from 1874 to 1908, when it started anew. The Little Sisters of the Poor have been active in serving the destitute and aged since 1876.

Welfare work became more closely organized, beginning with the appointment of a superintendent in 1920. Since its establishment the welfare bureau has arranged the adoption of 3,000 children into Catholic homes. Its other services include family counseling, homemaker guidance, care for unmarried parents, resettlement help, care for children in foster homes, group homes, and child-care institutions. In 1917 Rev. Joseph Hurst established St. Bernard's Workingmen's Home, a refuge for migratory workers, and before it was closed in 1932 it had fed and lodged 200,000 men. The archdiocese also engaged some notable clerical economists in 1910; these included F. J. HAAS and A. J. MUENCH, who won international fame, and P. DIETZ, who influenced labor councils in the American Federation of Labor and ran a school for workers in Milwaukee, mainly to combat socialism. Dietz also led a campaign to legalize parish credit unions in Wisconsin.

Post-War and Post-Conciliar Years. In the years after World War II the archdiocese of Milwaukee had to come to grips with the growth and mobility of the Catholic community. The number of Catholics swelled in proportion to the general population increase, and many were moving to new suburban developments. Milwaukee-born Albert G. Meyer, installed as archbishop in 1953, addressed the expanding needs of a growing population, establishing new parishes, building, and watching the Catholic colleges and universities in the archdiocese expand. When Meyer succeeded Cardinal Stritch as archbishop of Chicago in 1958, he was succeeded by the Most Reverend William Cousins, the bishop of Peoria. Installed in January 1959 as the eighth archbishop of Milwaukee, Cousins continued Meyer's building program. He attended all the sessions of the Second Vatican Council, and moved swiftly to implement its decrees and recommendations. Archbishop Cousins retired when he reached the age of 75 in 1977. (He died Sept. 14, 1988.)

Cousins successor was Rembert G. Weakland, former abbot of St. Vincent's Archabbey in Latrobe, Pa., and Abbot Primate of the Order of St. Benedict in Rome. Already well known throughout the country as a spokesman for monastic renewal, he transferred his activism, tireless zeal, and broad vision of the Church in the modern world to Milwaukee when he was installed as archbishop in November 1977. He reorganized the archdiocesan curia, closed the preparatory seminary built by his predecessor in 1963, turning it into diocesan offices and a retirement home for clergy. In his weekly column in the Catholic Herald, the diocesan newspaper, Archbishop Weakland addressed timely topics, sometimes taking controversial positions on social issues, foreign policy, and the role of women in the Church. Under his direction the archdiocese intensified it pastoral outreach to the Hispanics, ministered to Hmong and Laotian refugees, and established the first urban parish for Native Americans.

Weakland met opposition on a number of fronts and for a number of reasons but none stirred more furor than his plan to remodel the cathedral. The Cathedral of St. John the Evangelist, consecrated in 1853, had been the focus of controversy before, when in the 19th century, the German Zwiebelturm (onion dome) of the original structure was removed, a gesture that was interpreted as an effort to placate Irish Catholics. In January 1935 a fire completely demolished the interior and the roof, weakened the walls, and destroyed the stained glass windows. The restoration of the cathedral, slowed because of the war, was finally completed just prior to the centennial of the archdiocese in 1943. In the 1960s Archbishop Cousins authorized a new design and reconstruction of the main altar to bring the sanctuary space into conformity with liturgical directives of Vatican II, and in 1977 he initiated a more extensive remodeling. Twenty years later Archbishop initiated the Cathedral Project, a comprehensive plan to preserve historical legacy of the Cathedral of St John the Evangelist and to make the environment and furnishing better serve the spirit of the liturgy. In addition, the plan called for the property north of the Cathedral church to be developed as a center for social outreach to the poor and homeless. A vocal opposition denounced the Cathedral Project and even won a favorable hearing from the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments. Nonetheless, the project went forward and on Feb. 9, 2002 bishops from throughout the state joined the priests of archdiocese and representatives from each of the parishes in a liturgical celebration dedicating the renovated Cathedral. Archbishop Weakland reached mandatory retirement age later in the year.

MINDSZENTY, JÓZSEF

Cardinal-archbishop of Esztergom, primate of Hungary; b. March 29, 1892, Mindszent, Hungary; d. May 6, 1975, Vienna, Austria. For a major part of his long and distinguished career in the church, Cardinal Mindszenty personified the struggle for religious freedom under the Communist regimes of Eastern Europe. From the time of his 1949 show trial and imprisonment by the Communist rulers of Hungary, through his release during the 1956 Hungarian Revolution and his long self-imposed imprisonment in the American legation in Budapest, to his eventual exile from Hungary, his personal fate symbolized the condition of church-state relations in the twentieth century.

The political convulsions which afflicted Hungary during his lifetime inevitably drew Cardinal Mindszenty into public affairs. His village of Mindszent, where his family owned a small farm, had changed little under centuries of Habsburg rule, but his studies for the priesthood opened the wider world of classical learning. By the time of his ordination, June 12, 1915, World War I had begun to dissolve many traditional social and political relationships as well as to impose extraordinary demands on his services as a curate, teacher, newspaper editor, and community advisor. The loss of the war and the overthrow of the Habsburg monarchy left a political vacuum in Hungary. The activities of the young priest on behalf of the newly formed Christian Party brought him into disfavor with both Count Károlyi's moderate leftist government and its successor, Béla Kun's short-lived Hungarian Soviet Republic. The shift to the rightist policies of Admiral Horthy's regency allowed 25 years of dedicated parish work in Zalaegerszeg with politics overshadowed by concern for the community and the schools.

His elevation to the episcopate in March 1944 as bishop of Veszprém brought Mindszenty to a position of national leadership while the country was again suffering the ravages of a world war, which Hungary had entered as an ally of Nazi Germany. When the Hungarian government imitated the Nazi persecution of Jews, the Hungarian bishops vigorously protested the violation of innate human rights. Recognizing that the war was hopelessly lost, the government negotiated an armistice in October 1944, but German forces installed a puppet regime in Hungary to continue the fighting. Bishop Mindszenty presented a memorandum, signed by all the bishops of western Hungary, urging the new premier, Ferenc Szálasi, to end the senseless destruction. Because of this memthe Szálasi orandum, regime arrested Bishop Mindszenty. He remained a prisoner until the complete German withdrawal from Hungary in April 1945.

The end of the war left Hungary devastated and disillusioned. Bishop Mindszenty, who became archbishop of Esztergom in September and a cardinal in February 1946, organized relief efforts to overcome the food shortages, to treat the widespread illnesses, and to provide for refugees. His determination to uphold the traditional constitutional authority of the archbishop of Esztergom led Cardinal Mindszenty to issue increasingly outspoken warnings about the threats facing the newly established democratic regime. As the Hungarian Communists consolidated their power by gradually eliminating other parties, the church became the last focal point of resistance and the prime target of hostile propaganda. Cardinal Mindszenty's protest of the nationalization of Catholic schools in 1948 led to his ultimate conflict with the regime. He was arrested on December 26 and placed on trial in February 1949. The public trial of the primate of Hungary demonstrated that no one could resist the will of the regime. After forced confessions from the cardinal and a mass of fabricated evidence against him, the court found Cardinal Mindszenty guilty of treason and sentenced him to life imprisonment. The harassment of the church also included the arrest of other bishops, the cessation of religious instruction, and the dissolution of religious orders.

The 1956 Revolution in Hungary freed Cardinal Mindszenty on October 30. When the populace enthusiastically welcomed his return to Budapest the next day, the government of Imre Nagy hastily declared the previous legal actions void. In a radio address, Nov. 3, Cardinal Mindszenty justified the revolution as a fight for freedom. He advocated neutrality, democratic elections under international control, private ownership, and religious freedom, but he carefully avoided lending support to Nagy's government or any other political faction. Less than eight hours after his speech, Soviet troops occupied Budapest and crushed the revolution. When the Soviet troops arrived, Cardinal Mindszenty sought refuge nearby in the U.S. legation. He received asylum and remained for 15 years in spite of the protests of the Hungarian government and papal entreaties to accept a post in the Roman Curia. The Hungarian Primate believed his persistence called attention to the oppression of Hungarian Catholics, but it also obstructed Vatican efforts to reach an accommodation with the Communist regime. At the urging of Pope Paul VI, he left Hungary in September 1971 and took up residence at the Hungarian seminary in Vienna. Fifteen months before his death he unwillingly relinquished his position as archbishop of Esztergom, while sternly proclaiming his disagreement with the Vatican pursuit of improved church-state relations in Hungary, which allowed the appointment of new bishops. Citing examples of continued restrictions on the Hungarian church, he announced characteristically, "In these grave circumstances Cardinal Mindszenty cannot abdicate."

MINIMS

Mendicant order (OM, Official Catholic Directory, #0835) founded by St. FRANCIS OF PAOLA in 1435 in Paola, province of Cosenza in Calabria, Italy, the place of the first convent. Humility, penance, and charity are the characteristic virtues and the means of perfection, inspiring the spirituality and apostolate of the Minims. Minims are thus named because they are so to form themselves in the school of the Gospel, that by becoming the least of all they might die to self and live in and for God alone. The observance of a solemn vow of abstinence from meat, eggs, milk, cheese, butter, and any other kind of dairy products and derivatives from meat is characteristic of the Minims' penitential spirit.

The motto of the order is "Charitas": the heraldic symbol that the founder received in a vision from St. Michael the Archangel to be transmitted to his religious family. Besides the first order of Friars, there is also a second order of cloistered nuns (first monastery founded at Andujar, Spain in 1495), who profess the same rule adapted to their conditions, and the third order for lay people of both sexes. The apostolate of the Minims is varied as is that of all the mendicant orders, consisting in a ministry of preaching and teaching; a particular pastoral activity is devoted to seafarers, of whom St. Francis of Paola is the official patron.

The rule of the Minims, the fifth in the Church, is short in composition (10 small chapters), but it is original in content, and was several times approved by Alexander VI and Julius II with successive bulls: Ad ea quae circa decorem (May 1, 1501), Ex debito pastoralis officii (May 18, 1502), and Inter caeteros regularis observantiae professores (July 28, 1506). Such a rule is a testimony that penance and prayer can bring union with God. At the death of the founder (April 2, 1507), the Order of Minims had 33 convents: 12 in Italy, 14 in France, 4 in Spain, 3 in Germany; it was divided into 8 monastic provinces. Later, in the golden age of the order (1600–1700), the number of convents increased to about 400, with more than 9,000 religious. The Minims provided a select corps devoted to prayer, study, and penance, including dedicated pastors, teachers, and scholars.

The Minims have had their own universities and colleges, and held chairs in public universities. However, their religious and intellectual apostolate suffered from anticlerical persecution during the 19th century. Despite this setback, the work of St. Francis of Paola has found strength for a new start as evidenced by the increasing number of vocations, houses, and apostolic activities.

The Minims first arrived in the United States in 1970, setting up their ministries in the Archdiocese of Los Angeles. Their U.S. headquarters is in Los Angeles, CA. The generalate is in Rome.

MINISTRY (ECCLESIOLOGY)

In early Latin translations of the New Testament, ministerium and its cognates were used to translate $\delta\iota\alpha$ -κονία and its cognates, as well as the less frequent $\lambda\epsilon\iota$ -τουργία. The best English rendering of diakonia is the word "service." The New Testament uses the term for activities in the Church which issue from the graces of the Spirit and build up the body of the faithful. The less commonly used leitourgia intimates that these activities bear the character of true worship, since they build up the priestly people in whom God is glorified.

In ecclesiastical usage ministerium came to be used almost exclusively of the ordained members of the Church. It took on connotations of power and official authority which the original Greek term does not possess. This use of words is itself a sign of the growing tendency to reduce the laity to a passive role in the Church and to confide mission and responsibility predominantly to the clergy. Vatican II gave sanction to a trend to reverse this situation that had begun earlier in the century. In its documents the Council continued to reserve the vocabulary of ministry for bishops, presbyters, and deacons, while using terms such as munus, missio, charisma, apostolatus and officium for the works of the laity. By reason of such usage, it was able to maintain a distinction between the role of ordained ministers and that of the laity, while at the same time recognizing the active part which the latter have in the mission of the Church and in service to the community. Furthermore, the Council recalled the original meaning of ministry or diakonia and stressed the need for the ordained to model their ministry on the service of Jesus Christ. Since then, there has been even greater attention given to the use of the word diakonia in the New Testament sources, and a deeper examination of the relation between the ministries of the laity and those of the ordained.

Origin of Ministries. The many ministries derive from the charisms, or gifts of service, which are given by the Spirit. The coordination of these gifts to the service of the common good is also the work of the Spirit. Every ministry is modelled on that of Jesus Christ (cf. Lk 22.24–27) and all power (εξουσία) in the Church is a share in his power (cf. Mt 28.18–20). The good of the Church and its mission requires order and leadership. The early Church turned to the Twelve (known by Luke as Apostles) or to their immediate associates, such as Paul, for this service.

That much, in brief, is the position which emerges from an exegesis of the New Testament. When little attention was given to the ministries of lay persons, it was enough for theology to explain that the power and authority of the bishops derive from the mission given by Christ to the Apostles. Given a broader concept of ministry, theology has to take other factors into account and offer a different synthesis. Three converging principles may serve this purpose. They are the Pauline teaching on the Body, the relation of all ministries to the model of the Twelve, and the action of the Spirit in the Church through time.

Pauline Teaching. The Pauline image of the Body expresses the Church's relation to Christ and his Spirit and is an effective image of her unity in plurality. Amongst other things, it brings home the corporate nature of her life and mission, as well as the personal share which each member has in the gifts of the Body and service to its life. On the basis of this image Vatican II can refer to the Church as the sacramentum seu signum et instrumentum intimae cum Deo unionis totiusque generis humani unitatis ("sacrament or sign of intimate union with God and of the unity of all mankind" Lumen gentium 1.1). Ministries contribute to the reality and witness of this corporate life and mission.

Apostles as Model. The Twelve are an eschatological image of the Church of the New Covenant, which, filled with the Holy Spirit as foretold by the Prophets, takes part in the banquet prepared by God for the Christ. Being likewise the Apostles sent by Christ, they transmit not only a life of discipleship and faith but also the mission which they received from him. Ministries in the Church derive from this mission and are modelled on that of the Twelve, in whom the early community found exemplars of disciple, pastor, and missionary.

Action of the Spirit. It follows from this that ministry is by the gift of the Spirit a share in the mission and saving power (exousia) of God in Christ. The intervention of the Spirit is necessary, since it is the role of the Spirit to keep alive the historical remembrance of Christ and the Twelve, while at the same time providing for that newness of creation which each epoch requires. Indeed, the remembrance is itself a source of fresh creativity, since it gives the Church an eschatological focus on history, a grasp that the Church is always an event, and the realization that she lives constantly under the judgment of God and in his hope.

A conclusion to draw from this eschatological model is that a call to mission and service is already given in the Sacraments of initiation whereby a person becomes a member of the eschatological community. Vatican Council II recognizes this in many ways, not least in its Decree on Priestly Ministry when it implies that ordination specifies the mission already given at initiation (Presbyterorum ordinis 1.2). Of every adult Christian it can be said that her/his call is determined by the gifts of the Spirit, of which there is a guarantee in the Sacraments of initiation. For some, these are given special recognition and a new sacramental role through the Sacrament of Order.

Classification of Ministries. Different classifications or typologies of ministries are offered to explain their respective contributions to the life of the Church. The division offered by the Council is based on the theology of the triple office of Christ, namely, that of Priest, Prophet, and King. The works of both laity and ordained ministers are diversified in terms of their participation in one or other of these offices (Lumen gentium 9–12).

Another classification, more descriptive in character, is based more directly on the New Testament. It distinguishes ministries of word, sacrament, and care, drawing either from the listings of ministries (e.g. Rom 12.6–8; 1 Cor 12.4–11.28–31; Eph 4.11) or from what is known in other ways, of life in the New Testament Church. The principal ministries of the word are those of the apostles, the prophets, and the teachers, but the listings cited would also allow inclusion of such gifts as exhortation, tongues, and the discernment of spirits from the listings quoted. Of the ministry of sacrament or worship little specific is said in the New Testament. The foundation on which such ministry is explained naturally lies in what is said of the Eucharist and Baptism, and some would also draw from texts on the presidency of communities (e.g. Rom 12.8; Heb 13.17.23); but this is rather uncertain ground. An important feature in this classification is the recognition given to the ministries of care. The category includes the service of tables (cf. Acts 6.1-6); the care of the sick (cf. Jas 5.13–16), the widow, and the orphan (cf. Acts 6.1-6; Jas 1.27); healing (1 Cor 12.10); and the administration of community goods (cf. 1 Cor 12.28 on administrators and helpers). Sometimes in theology the New Testament word diakonia is used for this category alone instead of being employed for all ministries. The works falling into this category have equal status with the ministries of word and liturgy. Hence they are not to be judged inferior or less necessary. Their exercise in the life of the Church today is not a mere repetition of New Testament days, but takes on new needs and new forms.

Another classification of ministries distinguishes them by way of their relation to those aspects of the Church's life that are designated by the Greek words μαρτήρια, διάκονία, and κοινονία (witness, service, communion). A similar distinction refers them to the Church's mission to evangelize, to the inner life of each community, and to the relations fostered between communities. This is to take up the notes of the Church which are its apostolicity, its unity, and its catholicity, and to relate ministries to them.

Clearly, no classification of ministries is adequate or exhaustive, nor may it be used to restrict development of new ministries or new ways of exercising old ones. A first limitation to be found in every classification is that some ministries overlap the types given. Thus the promotion of justice and peace could be classed under word, since it pertains to prophecy and to teaching, but it could also be classified under care, since it promotes human welfare in Christ's name. A second limitation to any typology is that the types may not appear to be comprehensive. Thus in the second classification mentioned, some would posit judgment as a fourth class of ministry, while others include it under word and still others place it under sacrament, relating it thus to the Sacrament of binding and loosing. Awareness of these shortcomings is a reminder that theology's task is to understand the wonders of the Church's variety in unity, not to establish stringent categories.

Ordained Ministry. Both history and dogma distinguish between ordained ministry and other ministries. It is less clear where the nature of this distinction resides. Given the new respect for lay ministries the question has become a more acute one in recent theology. Many things are involved in the discussion, including the nature of ecclesiastical AUTHORITY, the offices reserved to the ordained, the purpose of the Sacrament of Order for the life of the Church, and the structure internal to the Sacrament. It is now more commonly recognized that the theology of Order derives from the theology of the Church and not vice versa as in an earlier system. Likewise, the authority of Order has to be related to common responsibility and mission of the community and is incomprehensible outside that context.

The call to ordained ministry comes as a special call from Christ and the Spirit, but it is mediated through the Church and requires sacramental incorporation into the ministerial college to be effective. How this mediation is to be effected is both a practical and a theological crux. The intervention of the episcopacy as the normal way of proceeding is not in question. It is more difficult to determine the just part played by the faithful in the choice of ministers and in the transmission of office. It is also difficult to assess situations where leadership and sacramental presidency have been assumed or granted outside the normal channels of episcopal succession.

Ordained ministers are certainly not mere delegates of the community. To say this would be to deny the unique source of power in Christ and the Spirit. At the same time, a rigid identification of episcopal succession with apostolic succession ignores all other authority and ministry in the Church and has serious practical as well as theological consequences. To express the delicacy of the relationship between the ordained minister and the community, some recent theology prefers images or concepts of leadership and presidency to those of power and JURISDICTION. It is further pointed out that the authority of office is normally grounded in the spiritual authority of the person to whom the office is confided. Those dogmas that affirm that the power of Christ works in the Sacraments despite the unworthiness of the minister speak to unhealthy situations to give assurance that the grace of Christ is not rendered void by bad ministers, but such dogmas do not constitute the basic principles for a theology of Order.

When the Eucharist is taken as the central point and summation of the Church's life and mystery, then the liturgical presidency of the ordained minister can be understood as the focal point of the community's relation to the Trinity. Ministry and authority are thus related to the service of the Church as a communion in faith and worship. There is also room in this image for a proper recognition of the power and spiritual authority of the nonordained ministries, since the word presidency does not suggest a monopoly of worship. It is rather the encouragement, the recognition, and the ordering in unity and harmony of all ministries, relating them in the liturgy to the communion of the Church and the glory of the Father.

Lay Ministries. Besides the multiple problems concerning the relation of ordained to common ministries, the Church today also discusses the institutionalization of some lay ministries. This means a designation to a particular function, made by the hierarchy at some level and recognized as a common procedure rather than as a unique instance. Specifically, the motu proprio of Paul VI, Ministeria quaedam (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 64 [1972] 529–534), promoted the institutionalization of the functions of acolyte and lector for the universal Church. It also urged local episcopates to consider the need for other ministries deserving of similar recognition in their respective constituencies. Hence there are movements towards setting up formal appointment to the ministries of catechist, psalmist, marriage counsellor, or even that of lay president in communities which have no resident ordained pastor.

This practice may be either promotional or restrictive, or perhaps a combination of both. While the intention of Ministeria quaedam was to promote a wider share of the laity in liturgical and catechetical roles, its implementation at times appears restrictive. This is all too easily the case when it is supplemented by the appointment of Extraordinary Ministers of the Eucharist. It can very easily happen that what of its nature belongs to all is in practice confined to the few, in the interests of what is deemed better order. To take the Lord's Body to other Christians and to read God's Word in the liturgy are offices which of their nature can be carried out by any mature Christian. At the moment some disciplinary measures may be needed to regulate this, but in the long run the phase of lay ministering marked by the institutionalization of these offices can only be temporary.

The question then remains whether similar procedures might be used to promote other ministries, particularly urgent for the life and mission of the Church at a given time and in a given place. Coming readily to mind is the need to promote ministries that work for justice or those that take up the call to dialogue with other religions. Whether the process of institutionalization can ever fully avoid forms of neoclericalism is an open question. Hence it may be more fitting to think in terms of a testing and discernment of gifts and ministries within communities and of their subsequent incorporation into the communion of faith and worship through prayer and mutual encouragement.

MINNESOTA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

In 2000 the Catholic Church in Minnesota numbered 1,256,268 communicants, about 25 percent of the state's population of 4,919,479. The history of the Catholic Church in Minnesota falls into three rather distinct chapters. The first chapter encompasses the age of exploration of the upper Midwest during the 1700s when missionaries accompanied fur traders and explorers along the upper Mississippi River and western Lake Superior. The second chapter focuses on the first years of the Diocese of St. Paul, from 1850 to 1877, when the diocese was elevated to archiepiscopal status. The third chapter relates the growth of Catholicism in the state since that time with suffragan sees necessitated because of Catholic population growth. In 1887 St. Cloud, Duluth, and Winona became suffragan sees, Crookston in 1909 and New Ulm in 1957.

Early History. During the early 18th century European exploration ventures, especially from France and England, were launched into the Minnesota region in an attempt to dominate the lucrative fur industry. Accompanying these sorties were Catholic missionaries, French Recollect Fathers and Jesuit priests, desirous of converting indigenous Ojibway and Sioux along with ministering to scattered settlers around crude forts. Chapels were erected near these forts and fur trade entrepots. Sieur Du Luth and Father Louis Hennepin were in the region in the 1680s. The early 18th century brought Fathers Mesaiger and Aulneau to the northern regions of the territory and the Jesuits around Lake Pepin in the south. Chapels were erected at Pembina, Fort St. Charles, Grand Portage, and Fort Beauharnois on Lake Pepin. In 1818 the U.S. Government erected Fort Snelling at the confluence of the Mississippi and Minnesota Rivers, and by 1845 French Canadian and Swiss settlers from Lord Selkirk's colony near Pembina in the far north clustered in the area around Fort Snelling, known as the Fort Snelling Reserve. In 1840 a log chapel (St. Peter's) was built in Mendota near the fort, and in 1841 Father Lucien Galtier, a missionary from the Dubuque Diocese, erected a log chapel on the cliffs above the river port known as "Pig's Eye Landing." Galtier dedicated this chapel to St. Paul and ultimately the surrounding village took on that name. This crude chapel was to be the first cathedral of the Diocese of St. Paul. A large stone marker on the bluff above the river memorializes St. Paul's first cathedral. At this time of missionary activity in the region, Minnesota really belonged to the Diocese of Dubuque and just a small portion in the southeast triangle to the Milwaukee Diocese.

St. Paul Diocese. A papal decree issued July 19, 1850 created the Diocese of St. Paul and appointed Joseph Cretin, vicar General of Dubuque at the time, as first bishop. The diocese extended from Lake Superior to the Missouri River and from Iowa to the Canadian border. Initially parts of North and South Dakota were included in the St. Paul Diocese.

Joseph Cretin was from Belley, France, and had come with missionary zeal to the Midwest frontier at the behest of Bishop Loras of Dubuque. Severe challenges faced the new bishop as he came to this outpost facing Minnesota's wilderness. Diocesan church buildings consisted of log structures in St. Paul, Mendota, St. Anthony, and Pembina. His diocesan priests were few: Rayoux in Mendota, Belecourt and Lacombe at Pembina. The Catholic population was scattered. The total population of the entire region was 30,000 Native Americans and 6,000 whites. Of necessity, Cretin was an itinerant bishop. His motto, "All things to all men," exemplified his leadership style of personal sacrifice and self-denial that attracted young men to serve in this untamed territory. In 1853 he sent two St. Paul recruits, John Ireland and Thomas O'Gorman, to the preparatory seminary of Meximieux, and recruited seven seminarians from that region in France to come to St. Paul. A newly combined church, residence, and school on Wabasha and Sixth Streets became the new cathedral, episcopal see, and seminary for the diocese.

In 1851 Cretin brought the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet from St. Louis to staff a school for girls. St. Joseph's Academy, the first Catholic school in the diocese, was at first located in the old log chapel on the bluff, but later a new building for the academy was erected at Virginia and Nelson (later Marshall) Streets. This building also served as Motherhouse and Novitiate for these sisters. A Catholic hospital was also erected and the Sisters of St. Joseph took charge of that institution when a cholera epidemic broke out in the city in 1855-56. These sisters were also administrators of St. Mary's Hospital in Minneapolis for over 100 years. They also undertook missionary work among the Winnebago Native Americans in Long Prairie, a project dear to the heart of Bishop Cretin. Financial problems caused the demise of this mission in 1856.

At Cretin's encouragement, numbers of French, Irish, and German immigrants came to the region and took up lands along the Mississippi, Minnesota, and St. Croix Rivers. Prosperous settlements developed throughout the diocese and Catholic population increased. In 1853 because the German Catholic population in St. Paul had grown so rapidly, a German parish, the Assumption, was established. German speaking priests were sought to administer the parish and in 1856 three Benedictines came from Latrobe, Pennsylvania, to staff the Assumption parish and to help with the growing German population of Stearns County. They settled in St. Cloud, opened St. John's Seminary, and in 1856 moved permanently to Collegeville. This Abbey became renowned for its leadership in liturgical reform and ecumenical endeavors throughout the development of the Catholic Church in America. Other dedicated religious men and women began to establish regional headquarters in the diocese in order to assist in the charitable works so needed among the immigrant throngs. While Catholic immigrants to Minnesota signified tremendous growth in numbers for the Catholic Church in America, cultural differences among these newcomers posed serious problems for Church leaders. Irish prelates dominated the American hierarchy and other ethnic groups voiced desires to have bishops over them who were of their cultural background. While the Irish Immigration Society encouraged Irish from the old sod and from congested Eastern states to settle in Minnesota, groups of Germans also came from various petty principalities in Germany. The German language held these disparate groups in some kind of cultural unity. For the Germans the retention of their German language would remain at the heart of their cultural identity well into the 20th century. St. Paul's Germans wanted German used in their worship, their Catechetical instruction, other Church rites, and in their parochial education. They organized the St. Joseph Aid Society and purchased land in St. Paul for a cemetery for German-Catholics. Bishop Grace, successor to Cretin, intervened and this property became the site of St. Joseph's Orphanage, staffed by Benedictine Sisters. Polish and Italian groups in St. Paul also demanded clergy of their specific nationalities, but Grace opposed this tendency. He wanted all Catholics to be accepted as loyal Americans by the dominant Protestant groups in society. At that time anti-Catholic activities of the Know-Nothing Party still hung heavy over the land, and Grace wanted no action of Catholics in his diocese to fan the fire of hatred generated by this group. The Northwestern Chronicle became the official organ of the diocese. In short order the Germans launched Der Wanderer, the French began Le Canadien, and the Irish began publishing the Northwest Standard. Other ethnic papers appeared as newer immigrants found their way into Minnesota. Ethnic parishes with their special church construction and cultural thrust proliferated in both rural and urban Minnesota up to the turn of the century.

Bishop Grace welcomed other groups of religious into the diocese to help with the needs of the growing Catholic community: Sisters of St. Dominic of Sinsinawa in 1865, Sisters of the Good Shepherd in 1868, Christian Brothers in 1871, Sisters of the Visitation in 1873. By 1919 other religious groups would be serving in the diocese as well. Among these were School Sisters of Notre College of St. Scholastica, Duluth.

Dame, Sisters of Christian Charity, Franciscan Sisters from Milwaukee and Toledo, Poor Handmaids of Jesus, and Felician Sisters. Early bishops of the diocese openly opposed participation of women in political, civil, and national organizations, no matter how worthy the cause. For them, the proper place for women was in the home. The various sisterhoods, providing education for young women beyond the elementary level, truly paved the way for changing feminine thought toward more active roles in society for women.

From the very beginning of the diocese, lay leadership was evident in collaborating with the clergy and religious in addressing the needs of the growing Church, especially the needs of the poor. Benevolent societies were founded to provide aid to families in time of exigencies. Economic, political, and social bigotry in the young United States excluded Catholics as ineligible recipients of public charities.

Pope PIUS IX's Syllabus of Errors, condemning various kinds of religious liberalism, brought a barrage of criticism in the United States against everything Catholic. The Second Council of Baltimore in 1866 affirmed the pope's decree, and Grace, like the other American bishops, pledged to implement the Syllabus in the St. Paul Diocese. Deaneries were organized to do this. Too ill to attend the First Vatican Council, Grace sent Father John Ireland to represent him. Though unfinished, the Council declared the infallibility of the pope in matters of faith and morals, causing more negative reaction against the Catholic Church among American Protestants. In America this led to stricter laws demanding separation of Church and State, particularly when Catholic leaders strove for financial aid for their struggling parochial schools. The plea of Catholic parents that they were being doubly taxed for educating their children according to conscience fell on deaf ears in American courts. This was a big issue in Minnesota.

Despite this controversy, Bishop Grace continued to champion Catholic education. His endeavors resulted in the beginnings of Cretin High School in St. Paul and an attempt to start a Catholic Industrial School on the property which was to become the site for the future University of St. Thomas. This school later moved to Swift County but was finally closed in 1879.

The Catholic population in the diocese continued to grow, and in 1875 the Vicariate of Northern Minnesota was established with the Right Reverend Rupert Seidenbusch, O.S.B. consecrated as Vicar Apostolic of the new territory with residence in St. Cloud. That same year John Ireland became coadjutor to Bishop Grace with the right of succession. In 1879 the Vicariate of North Dakota was created with Right Reverend Martin Marty, O.S.B. its first bishop. Thus the Diocese of St. Paul became focused on the southern half of Minnesota. In 1884, Grace resigned as Bishop of the St. Paul Diocese in favor of his coadjutor, John Ireland. The diocese was raised to archiepiscopal status in 1888 with Ireland the first archbishop. In 1889 five suffragan sees were erected: Sioux Falls in South Dakota; Fargo in North Dakota; and Duluth, Winona, and St. Cloud in Minnesota. Although the archdiocese at the time comprised both rural and urban areas, by far the greater population was concentrated within the Twin Cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis with all the attending problems that urban concentrations imposed on an immigrant Church. Six priests of the province were consecrated bishops at one time by Ireland in the St. Paul Seminary chapel to fill these new sees as well as to provide an auxiliary for Ireland. This auxiliary, John J. Lawler, became Bishop of Lead, South Dakota, in 1916.

Perhaps more than any other prelate in Minnesota's history, John IRELAND's leadership put the Minnesota Catholic Church in the limelight. Ireland's championship of the Americanization Movement brought him at loggerheads with Catholic ethnic leaders in Minnesota, the nation, and Rome. Ireland demanded that the ways of the old world had to be shed in becoming American. This required the adoption of English by all and the relinquishing of foreign languages in educational instruction, business enterprises, and liturgical services. Many ethnic groups, particularly Germans, wanted to retain their old customs and cultures, especially the use of their native languages. Ireland feared that the use of foreign tongues would bring grave criticism on the Catholic Church in America. St. Paul Germans, affiliated with the St. Raphael Verein (see ST. RAPHAEL'S SOCIETY), founded by Peter Paul CAHENSELY in 1883 to provide for the spiritual welfare of foreign language groups, believed that priests in their national parishes should teach the truths of the faith in the language of each particular ethnic group. Ireland and his supporters of the Catholic University of America insisted that all newcomers adopt English as their national language. The St. Raphael's Verein had international support. Rome refused to take sides in this issue, but the controversy resulted in a rift between Ireland and ethnic groups in his archdiocese. Irish clergy blamed German hierarchy in Cincinnati, Milwaukee, and St. Louis for attempting to control Catholic affairs in America. The Americanization Movement also called for new methods to approach non-Catholics. Catholic doctrine must be adapted to modern times. Ireland's enemies accused him of the heresy of "modernism" and contributed to his failure at being named a cardinal.

The episcopacies in Minnesota following the death of Archbishop Ireland in 1918 were forced to face the hardships imposed on their flocks by two world wars and the Great Depression in between. Archdiocesan social programs expanded during these decades. The voice of the local Church was ever present in addressing rural and urban problems facing the poor. The work of Minnesota's own Monsignor John A. RYAN had its impact on local needs of the working poor as well as on the national social legislation that marked the 1930s. World Wars I and II tried the patriotism of all Americans and Minnesotan Catholics responded nobly. Chaplains, nurses, soldiers in all branches of the service included many from the ranks of Minnesota's Catholics. The outstanding Minnesota Catholic event between the wars was the celebration of the Ninth Eucharistic Congress in the summer of 1941 in the Twin Cities. As a result of this demonstration of the Catholic Faith, daily exposition of the Blessed Sacrament was initiated in several diocesan churches and chapels of religious. These were the years that marked the high point of the immigrant Church in Minnesota, as it was impacted by European immigration.

The most earth-shaking event of the 20th century impacting the life of the Catholic Church of Minnesota was the Second Vatican Council. Lasting from 1962 through 1965 the Council produced several significant documents. Lumen Gentium emphasized the inclusive thrust of the Gospel message, referring to the Church as the People of God. The hierarchical, triumphal image of Church was no longer meaningful to most, clergy and lay alike. The bishop's role was seen as pastor of the local diocesan Church in collaboration with the priests and laity in carrying the gospel message into all walks of life.

The Pope and bishops were to act more collegially and the principle of subsidiarity called bishops to stronger local leadership. The laity, especially women and the marginalized, expected greater inclusion in Church life. The final Council document, The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, addressed the complex issues faced by the People of God in a rapidly changing world.

From 1950 to the turn of the century the Church in Minnesota faced moral issues impacted by many changing social and political realities of the time. Urban sprawl demanded new churches but with fewer priests to staff them; fewer religious were available to staff the existing parochial school system, putting greater demands on the laity for personnel and monetary resources; consolidations and closings of schools created problems; the sexual revolution and decline in family values witnessed the rise of homosexual issues; the abortion issue, medical research and experimentation plus rising cost issues in staffing Catholic hospitals put these hospitals at odds with governmental regulations; the growing diversity among Minnesota Catholics, assuming personal responsibility in attempting to implement the directives flowing from the Council documents created tensions throughout the archdiocese. In all of these issues, Minnesota bishops, clergy, religious and other laity provided leadership in guiding the local Catholic Church to be faithful to Christ's Gospel mandate. Although common Catholic traditions and shared interests are characteristic of the Church in Minnesota, the third phase of its history must be recounted in connection with the individual dioceses.

MINOR PROPHETS

The group of 12 short PROPHETIC books of the Old Testament is called the Minor Prophets. The name Minor Prophets goes back apparently to St. Augustine [Civ. 18.29: Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum (Vienna 1866–) 40.2.306], who distinguished the 12 shorter prophetic books as prophetae minores from the four longer books of the Prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. The term, therefore, is not concerned with the relative importance of these books. Since the collection of the 12 Minor Prophets contains writings from the 8th to probably the 4th century B.C., it is of great importance for understanding the religious and political history of Israel during these centuries. Besides, many of the Minor Prophets, despite their brevity, rank on a par with the best chapters of the Major Prophets from a literary viewpoint. In the Septuagint the Minor Prophets are placed before the Major Prophets; in the Vulgate and other Christian versions, after Daniel; in the Hebrew Bible, after Ezekiel. Since all the 12 Minor Prophets can be written on one SCROLL, in the Hebrew Bible they are considered a single book, called by the Aramaic word terê 'ašar (the Twelve). The Greek Fathers, too, knew them as a single unit called the δωδεκαπρόφητον (the Twelve Prophets). Their order in the Vulgate is the same as in the Hebrew Bible: HOSEA, JOEL, AMOS, OBADIAH, JONAH, MICAH, NEHEMIAH, HABAKKUK, ZEPHANIAH, HAGGAI, ZECHARIAH, and MALACHI. In the Septuagint the order of the first six is somewhat different: Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, and Jonah. Neither order, however, shows a correct chronological sequence, although no doubt chronological considerations played a major role in both arrangements.

MINUCIUS, FELIX

Marcus, Roman lawyer and Christian apologist; b. probably Africa, second half of the 2d century; d. Rome, c. 250. Lactantius (Div. inst 5.1, 22) and Jerome (De vir. ill. 58) associate Minucius with such Africans as Tertullian, Cyprian, and Arnobius. Minucius studied law and later practiced in Rome. His Octavius, or apology, was addressed to educated pagans. It is written in the form of a Ciceronian dialogue, held supposedly during a walk from Rome to Ostia, among Octavius, Caecilius, and Minucius. Octavius states the case for Christianity and Caecilius, for paganism; Minucius adjudicates the discussion. In his defense of paganism Caecilius contends that in human affairs everything is doubtful and that the lawlessness of nature and in the moral world denies the existence of providence. Hence it is best to adhere to old ways. The Christian desire to change a religion as old and proved as the Roman results from an impious conceit (5–13). In response Octavius states that all men are born with intelligence and understanding and that those who cannot see the universe as the product of divine wisdom are intellectually blind. The true God cannot be seen because He is too bright for sight, too magnificent for full human comprehension (14–19). Pagan fables are a fantastic mixture of immoral myths and mysteries, and the Romans have grown great not by religion but by unpunished sacrilege (20–27). The truth of Christianity is attested by the deportment of its adherents. They not only preach, but they also live great deeds (28–38). No judgment is necessary because Caecilius is converted to Christianity after hearing Octavius.

Minucius was a tolerant apologist, keen to propagate Christianity but anxious not to cause offense in so doing. The work contains neither a summary of Christian teaching nor a wealth of biblical reference; but there are reminiscences of Homer, Horace, Juvenal, Vergil, and other pagans, as well as Justin, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus. Its style is more restrained than that of Tertullian, but literary connections between it and Tertullian's Apology can be traced. These relationships cause a chronological problem, but the majority of scholars regard the Apology as earlier than the Octavius.

MIRACLE, MORAL

The definition of miracle in general [see MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF)] is fulfilled by the moral miracle in its own way. It consists in an observable phenomenon that so differs from or exceeds the capacity of the natural factors in a situation that the human mind recognizes a special divine intervention.

The moral miracle is differentiated from other miracles not by being a less evident or less striking miracle, but by the fact of its occurrence in the moral (as distinguished from the physical or the intellectual) order. Whereas the physical miracle (and it is generally of such that one speaks when he talks of miracles without further qualification) occurs in the sector of reality described by the laws or principles of chemistry, physics, biology, and physiology, and whereas the intellectual miracle occurs in the sector of human cognition, the moral miracle occurs in the field of human conation, human activity, ethical endeavor. As the changing of water into wine, the multiplication of foodstuffs, the spontaneous healing of organic diseases, the raising of the dead to life are instances of physical miracles, and as the foreknowledge and certain prediction at some distance in time beforehand of free actions of God or man is an instance of intellectual miracle, so a manner or mode of deliberate action—on the part of either a single person or a group of persons—that notably surpasses the observed and constant level of human behavior is held to be a moral miracle.

Concretely, one discerns the presence of a moral miracle where (1) the constant commitment (affective and effective) (2) to goals that are set by God and lead to union with Him (3) despite grave obstacles and at the cost of heavy and recurring sacrifices is, on reflection, recognized as involving a type of conduct that clearly surpasses the level of performance that human nature achieves when left to its own resources. The basic judgment of human capabilities draws upon both man's valid intuitions and his human experience.

Moral miracle as sign. Since the subject of miracles is of practical concern insofar as by means of them God alerts man to His salvific intentions, effectively witnesses to and accredits those who claim to speak and act in His name, it may be helpful to consider the advantages and disadvantages of moral miracles (as contrasted with physical and intellectual miracles) in establishing the credibility of the Catholic religion.

Two advantages come to mind. (1) Since the moral miracle is situated precisely in the life, vitality, activity of the person or institution claiming acceptance as a divine legate, it appeals more strongly as an endorsement than do signs (however valid) that are extrinsic to the legate. In offering the moral miracle as proof, the legate carries his credentials not so much with him as within him. As a long-lost son appearing to claim his inheritance enjoys a special advantage if instead of depending on documents of certification he can present himself to the executors bearing in every line and feature the living image of his father, so the divine legate has a special advantage if his whole manner of being immediately evidences a divine origin. (2) The other advantage—this time in the actual context of Catholic apologetics—is that whereas the physical and intellectual miracles generally adduced are those of Christ Himself and His Apostles, and hence the force of the apologetic demonstration hinges on the historical value of records of past events, the moral miracle to which appeal is made (the vitality and activity of the Church in its members) is a visible phenomenon arising truly in the past but a continuing and verifiable phenomenon in the present.

In the appeal to moral miracle as a motive of credibility there are, however, difficulties not encountered to the same extent in the appeal to other miracles. Two comparative disadvantages may be mentioned: (1) if the moral miracle is sought in the life and activity of a group spread over large areas and during extended periods of time, it is difficult to amass and assess all the factors—national, racial, temperamental, political, social, psychological—that enter into and may modify the whole situation; (2) if this difficulty is greatly diminished when an appeal is made to the moral excellence of one person (e.g., Christ Himself), then another difficulty arises, that of establishing the limits of achievement in single and exceptional cases.

Vatican Council I proposed the existence (and a fortiori the possibility) of moral miracles in presenting the Church as in itself "a great and perpetual motive of credibility and an unimpeachable [irrefragabile] testimony to its own divine legation" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 3013).

MIRACLE, MORAL (THE CHURCH)

One may note from the start a difference of thrust between the argument adduced when the Church is presented as a moral miracle and the argument adduced from the MARKS OF THE CHURCH. In the latter argument the intention is to show that the Catholic Church at the time the argument is offered manifests itself as the legitimate continuation and prolongation of the religious society founded by Christ and consequently is through Christ a divine institution and bearer of a divine legation. The argument from the Church as a moral miracle, if validly constructed, has as its immediate conclusion (thus prescinding from the foundation of the Church by Christ) the truth that the Church is certified to speak in the name of God.

The notion that the Church in its concrete existence—its life, growth, vigor, activity—is a testimonial to its divine mission has never been absent from Catholic thought, though it has not always been equally emphasized in its teaching. It is suggested or proposed in elementary form in the early Fathers, is developed more fully in Augustine's City of God (bk. 22), and is advanced in summary form by St. Thomas Aquinas (C. gent. 1.6). In the 19th century, restated by J. Kleutgen and Cardinal J. Franzelin, it was stressed by Cardinal V. Dechamps, Archbishop of Malines, to whose efforts is in large measure due the decree of Vatican I (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3013) that "the Church in itself (per se ipsa) by reason of its admirable growth, its outstanding sanctity and unfailing fruitfulness, its catholic unity and unwavering stability is a great and perpetual motive of credibility and an unimpeachable testimony of its own divine legation." In the century after Vatican I, most of the theologians writing in the field of apologetics presented at greater or less length this demonstration along the lines marked out by that Council.

Force of Conciliar Decree. It has been generally maintained by theologians that the Council did not intend to insist as much on the specific aspects under which the miracle may be considered as on the basic truth that the Church is in itself an indisputable proof of its claims. Still less, it may be held, did the fathers of the Council teach that all the aspects are equally evident at all times. It may be thought that as in the case of other living things the vitality—and here the miraculous vitality—would in the early years be manifested in the phenomenon of growth (the admirabilis propagatio) and in more mature years in the vigor by which the living subject resists fission, deterioration, and decay (the fecunditas, unitas catholica, and invicta stabilitas).

Modes of Presentation. One can here but sketch the type of argumentation that is to be found fully developed in standard theological treatises. The treatment here confines itself to only some of the aspects indicated by the council: that of the growth or spread of the Church during the two-and-a-half centuries before the peace of Constantine, and that of its enduring unity in the centuries since then.

Early Growth. In developing the argument from the Church's growth during the first centuries, theologians recall that in those years the Church grew from a membership of some few thousands to a number estimated between seven and ten million (within the Roman Empire, which at the end of this period probably numbered about 50 million). This numerical increase was achieved, though not equally, in all parts of the empire and among all classes of society; hence it cannot be explained as an increase based on a natural appeal to racial or class interests. Most important, it was accomplished in the face of tremendous obstacles and at the cost of great sacrifices. Among these are generally enumerated: (1) the antipathy of the Gentile world to the Jewish people, from whom sprang the One to whom the Church paid divine worship and proclaimed as its founder; (2) the scandal of His Crucifixion, and of the ignorance and lowly condition of those who first preached His gospel; (3) the theoretical doctrine, which though lofty and noble surpassed and affronted human reason without catering to the taste for the exotic or the esoteric as did gnostic teachings or mystery religions; (4) the moral doctrine that unequivocally condemned vices, even the customary and comfortable ones; (5) the harassments from the increasingly hostile attitude of the Roman government—even though persecutions were sporadic and, in the early part of this period, often only local, there was never a time when a Christian could breathe freely in the conviction that his life, his family, his home, his position, his possessions were secure from private or public prosecutor; (6) the abuse or ridicule frequently encountered, a factor especially important insofar as it endangered the faith and allegiance of younger and adolescent Christians; (7) the necessity that often arose of refusing or surrendering lucrative and decent occupations or offices, denying oneself the pleasure of feasts, entertainments, and spectacles because they were in one way or other connected with pagan rites, implied acceptance of pagan religions (see Tertullian's De idololatria). Given all the difficulties from which the Christian could easily have extricated himself by simply renouncing his membership in the Church, the continued existence and the steady growth of the Church evidences in its members a level of conduct surpassing human strength and moral courage.

Enduring Unity. In much the same way, Catholic writers develop the argument from the steady UNITY OF THE CHURCH during the time that has passed since the age of persecution. They recall that over a period of 1,600 years in all parts of the world (though again by no means equally in all) this religious society has maintained itself and grown to encompass nearly 500 million members. In so doing, it has not ceased to maintain a clear doctrinal and social unity, notwithstanding grave and constant difficulties.

The obstacles to doctrinal unity are found (1) in the delicate harmony of Catholic doctrine itself, a body of truths neither simple nor crude, but complex and finely integrated—balancing the simplicity and unity of the divine nature with the Trinity of Persons, the divinity of Christ with His complete humanity, the validity of the concept of nature and natural law with the fact of universal supernatural destination, human freedom with the efficaciousness of grace, the superabundant merits of Christ with the merits of the justified individual, rights of the individual with the claims of society and public order, rights of the Church with the rights of civil society, rights of married people to personal fulfillment with the claims of marriage as an institution; and (2) in the succession of philosophies, ideologies, intellectual movements that have claimed acceptance especially in those parts of the world in which the Church counted the greater number of its members; thus, in succession and sometimes overlapping, Manichaeism, Pelagianism, medieval pantheism, Renaissance humanism, the Enlightenment, rationalism, skepticism, idealism, modern atheistic or anti-Christian communism, certain forms of scientism, evolutionism, individualism, and personalism. (See UNITY OF FAITH.)

The Church's social unity has been threatened over many centuries by CAESAROPAPISM and exaggerated nationalism with its chauvinistic appeal to national or racial feelings, aspirations, and pride. The history of the Church in the U.S. during most of the last two centuries is almost by itself sufficient documentation of the difficulty (and one that appears naturally insuperable) of maintaining Catholic unity among Catholics drawn from different peoples and nations of Europe.

Although it is true that in the course of these centuries millions have forsaken this unity, and hence although it is to be conceded that a greater and more striking miracle is conceivable, still there remains the fact of the one common religious allegiance of almost one-sixth of the world's population. It may be added that the defections from unity over the centuries at least assure one that this unity has been maintained among men and women subject to all the normal centrifugal strains and to all the natural appeal of newer, attractive, more "up-to-date" systems that would answer to the needs, the aspirations, or the desires of the moment.

MIRACLES (IN THE BIBLE)

There is no term in the Bible that corresponds to miracle in its strict theological meaning. The Latin word

"Jesus Gives Sight to One Born Blind." (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

miraculum is absent from the Vulgate New Testament and occurs only six times in the Vulgate Old Testament for a number of Hebrew terms for wondrous acts or events, not necessarily miraculous in the ordinary sense. After considering the various terms used in the Bible for events of a marvelous nature, this article considers the historical value of accounts in which these events are narrated and the miraculous nature of these Biblical wonders.

Terms. The Hebrew word môpet (wonder), used in an exclusively religious connotation, may stand for a symbolic act not necessarily beyond nature's power (Ez 12.6), a sign of God's power and goodness [Ps 70(71).7], an omen for the future (Is 8.18; 20.3), or a warning portent to keep the people away from evil [Ex 11.9; Ps 104(105).5]. The Septuagint (LXX) translates this term by τέρας (prodigy); in classical Greek this denotes any divine sign (Homer) and later a purely natural wonder (Polybius and Plutarch), but combined with σημείον (sign) it often signifies a divine sign, especially in the LXX. This combination is used in the New Testament to describe the wonderful works of Christ (Mt 12.38; 16.1–4; Mk 8.11; Lk 11.16–17; Jn 2.11, 18, 23; etc.). The Hebrew word 'ôt (sign, mark, or token) is frequently added to môpet, e.g., in Ex 7.3; Dt 4.34; 6.22; 7.19; 34.11; Jer 32.20; Ps 47(48).23, to which the Greek idiom σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα corresponds. The word 'ôt may also be used in a profane sense; its religious sense is therefore to be determined by the context. The Hebrew word $n\hat{e}s$ (signal) occurs once (Nm 26.10) in the meaning of miraculous sign. This term, like $g^eb\hat{u}r\hat{o}t$ (mighty deeds), is very common in post-Biblical literature in combination with $m\hat{o}pet$ or 'ôt.

God's power is often seen in everything that appears wonderful, mysterious, surprising, awe-inspiring or astonishing. Actions manifesting such power are called nifla'ôt (wonderful deeds) of God (Ex 3.20; 34.10; Josh 3.5; Jgs 6.13; Jer 21.2; Ps 9a.2), or pelā'ôt (marvels) of God [Ex 15.11; Ps 76 (77).15; Jgs 13.18]. When these terms are used in regard to men, they indicate something beyond them, a notion that the LXX expressed by άδύνατον or άδυνατεῖν (Gn 18.14; Dt 17.8; Zec 8.6; Prv 30.18). God's wondrous deeds are also norā'ôt (awesome deeds), which is rendered in the LXX by ταυμάδια (marvelous deeds) or ἔνδοξα (glorious deeds) and in Symmachus by παράδοξα (astonishing deeds), as in Jgs 13.16; Ex 34.10; Ps 65(66).3; Dut 10.2; 2 Sm 7.23. They are the works (ma'ăśîm) of God's power (Ex 34.10; Dt 11.7; Jos 24.31; Jer 51.10), His ge bûrôt (mighty deeds), as in Ex 3.24; Ps 19(20.7; 104(105).2, His ge dôlôt (great deeds), as in 2 Kgs 8.4; Ps 70(71).19; 135 (136). 4; Job 5.9; 9.10; 37.5, corresponding to the New Testament terms ἐργα (works, i.e., of God: especially in John) and δυνάμεις (mighty deeds: so especially in Matthew and Mark). Miracles are thus placed in the grand design of God, the Creator and savior of mankind (Jn 4.34; 17.4; Rom 1.16; 15.19; Gal 3.5; 1 Cor 12.1; 1 Thes 1.5).

This terminology shows that the wondrous acts of God fall within the category of prophetic symbolism intended to draw attention to something beyond themselves that confirms the word of God. They are not isolated gestures on the part of God but play an important part in the execution of the grand design of the Creator for the redemption of His creatures.

Historical Value. Vatican Council I declared that Biblical miracles are not to be rejected as so much mythical or legendary matter (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1813); Moses, the Prophets, the Apostles, and Jesus did really perform miracles to attest to their respective messages and draw the attention of their listeners (Enchiridion symbolorum 1790). There is still freedom to discuss particular cases (and modern literary-historical criticism is exacting in the matter) in the light of the principles laid down in the encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (Enchiridion Biblicum [Rome 1961] 558).

All miracle narratives are held to be legendary and mythical by the independent schools of comparative religion and literary criticism. Literary features common to Biblical and pagan narratives should not blind one, however, to the radical divergencies between them pointing to the great religious value of the former. The crucial difference arises from the intervention of God in human affairs for the salvation of humankind. The method of Biblical FORM CRITICISM has the merit of bringing to the fore the literary form and qualities of the text, but is unable by itself to lead one to a decision as to its historical value.

The wondrous acts of Jesus are one with the texture itself of the New Testament: they form an integral part of his story and provide a solid basis for Christian belief and Apostolic preaching (Lk 7.22; Mt 11.5; Acts 2.22; 10.38; 2 Cor 12.12; 1 Thes 1.5) and authority (Mk 16.17; Acts 3.12; 2.43; 5.15; 14.3; 1 Cor 2.4; Heb 2.4).

In the case of the Old Testament miracles, the literary form of the book containing a miracle story must first be determined. A miracle narrative may be found in larger works with different literary forms. The wisdom form of literature makes full use of fictional devices; in such an instance the wonder narrative may be a purely literary artifice. This is generally admitted with respect to the Book of Job (Dictionnaire de la Bible, 4.1082) and, to a lesser extent, to the Books of Jona and Tobit. The Book of Daniel is a mixture of prophetic, apocalyptic, and wisdom forms. Sir 44–49 and Wis 10–19 manifest how freely the sapiential writers treated historical facts; exaggeration and artificial devices are harnessed to press home the writer's point.

The fictional element is not missing in some historical writings: the talking serpent in Gn 3.2 may be taken figuratively [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 40 (1948) 47]. The history of the Exodus puts one on guard lest too much be rejected or accepted (see PLAGUES OF EGYPT). The critical examination of the various traditions handed down from generation to generation to keep alive the faith of the people bears unanimous witness to basic miraculous events at the start of the whole deliverance; they differ, however, as to the details and particular circumstances accompanying these events: the separation of the sea for the advance of the people (Ex 14-15), the sending of the manna (Ex 16.1–18), and so on. The compiler, no less than the writer, of Deuteronomy, the Psalmists, and the wisdom writers juxtaposed these traditions to emphasize the miraculous nature of the whole adventure; as to details, each case must be assessed by itself. The miracles in the historical and prophetical books respectively are less in number and better attested by contemporary witnesses and form part of a normal historical record. Miracle narratives tend to increase in the biographies of ELIJAH AND ELISHA; this calls for caution and inclines one to admit literary exaggeration. In view of well-attested modern miracles of this type one should not be over hasty to put them aside as legendary folk tales.

Miraculous Nature. The Israelite, having no idea of a fixed unchangeable natural law governing the physical universe, was not interested in the intimate nature of a miracle; for him it was a sign of God's merciful providence for some specific purpose, which he tried to grasp and understand. Christian theology attempts to discover the nature of a miracle defined as an event inconsistent with the constitution of nature, that is, with the established course of things. Or, again, it is an event in a given system that cannot be referred to by any law or accounted for by the operation of any principle in that system. [J. H. Newman, Essays on Miracles (London 1890) 4.] Do Biblical miracles conform to this definition? An outline of basic principles suffices for the present; each specific case should be examined on its own merits.

Some, interpreting the miracle narratives in a strictly literal sense, strive to find natural explanations; others cast serious doubts on their historical value; and still others, accepting their historical value, explain them as magical practices or empirical curative treatments or gestures common in those days. Some of these attempts to understand miracle stories are vitiated by the basic prejudice that miracles are theologically and philosophically impossible.

It is, nonetheless, legitimate to search for scientific or natural explanations provided that things are not stretched too far. Frequently events are much too summarily described for us to establish their miraculous nature with any degree of theological precision; in such cases it is better to confess our ignorance for lack of evidence. It must be kept in mind that miracles were first and foremost, although not exclusively, intended to awaken in their immediate beholders an interest and trust in God, the Prophets, the Apostles, and Jesus Christ. For moderns, the church itself is a fundamental miracle, a sign raised among the nations (Is 11.12). The value of particular miracles lies in their being carriers of the word of God and witnesses of the power of the Spirit for the Redemption of humankind and the establishment of the eschatological kingdom.

Theological Significance. For the Israelite, the importance of the miracle lies not so much in its being a break in the laws of nature as in its purpose. The modern study of miracles has moved in this direction, seeking to define the theological significance of these wonders. In this way the miracle, far from being considered as an isolated display of God's power over the laws of nature, finds its place and function in the execution of the overall design of divine Providence for the Redemption of Israel and all humankind. The terms examined above unmistakably show that the miracle is a sign going beyond itself to draw the attention of the beholders (Exod 3.2–3); it is an invitation to faith in God and is understood only by the well-disposed, drawing them to a decision (Nm 14.11-12; Dt 4.34; 7.19; 29.2; Mt 12.22-50). The marvelous signs reveal the attributes of God and His will (Ex 7.5, 17), especially with regard to Israel's election (Ex 11.7; 34.10-11; Dt 6.22; 10.14-15; Wis 11.5); through them God's fidelity to His own promises is made manifest [Ex 3.7; Dt 7.8–10; Psalm 135(136); Is 46.3–4; Hos 9.10; 11.1], and His justice is made public to all the world (Leviticus 26, 45). A miracle is a guarantee for the future and its foreshadow (Dt 7.9-19; Is 11.15-16; 43.16-21; 51; Hos 2.14-15, 17; 11.1; 13.4; Mt 4.23-25; 12.28; Lk 6.17-19).

Miracles also provided an effective instrument for the religious education of Israel [Dt 9.26; Psalm 76(77); 81(82); 104(105)–107(108)]; they awakened fundamental religious feelings and attitudes through concrete symbolical representation of the truth. By itself a miracle is insufficient to confirm or authenticate the truth; the message must conform to the word of God (Dt 13.2–6; Mt 8.17; 9.35; 11.2–6; 24.24; Rv 13.11–18; 16.13–14; 19.20).

In the New Testament. The Acts of the Apostles says that wonders and signs were done by the apostles (Acts 2.43) and by Paul and Barnabas (Acts 14.3). Thus miraculous activity was part of the witness that the church bore to the kingdom of God among Jews and Gentiles. Luke enhances his pictures of Peter and Paul as, respectively, the bearers of God's word to Jews and Gentiles by telling stories of miracles worked by each of these Apostles. Similar stories are told about each of these two key figures in the history of the early church (Acts 3.1–16 and 14.8–10; 5.1–11 and 13.6–11; 9.33–35 and 28.7–9; etc.). Paul writes about the signs, wonders, and mighty works that are the signs of a true apostle (2 Cor 12.12) without describing any individual signs and wonders.

Preaching in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost, Peter described Jesus as a man attested by God with deeds of power, wonders, and signs that God did through him (Acts 2.22; Lk 24.19). Stories about Jesus' miracles appear in each of the four Gospels. The Gospels attest to several controversies that arose because of the wondrous deeds that Jesus had effected, particularly Jesus' curing on the sabbath.

In describing the miracles of Jesus the four evangelists follow the standard pattern used in the ancient world—the literary form of a miracle story—to describe the activity of wonder-workers. This literary form consisted of three elements: 1) a description of the situation, so narrated as to highlight the difficulty of the miracle that was to happen; 2) a simple ritual consisting of an authoritative word (Mk 5.34) and/or a ritualized gesture (e.g., Mk 7.33); and 3) some demonstration of the reality of the miracle. This last element sometimes consisted of a narrative element, illustrating that the miracle had happened, e.g., the blind man who regained his sight and followed Jesus was calm (Mk 10.52); those fed had more than enough to eat (Mk 8.8). This narrative "proof" was sometimes accompanied by or even replaced by a choral response in which the bystanders express amazement at what had happened (Mk 4.39 and 41; Le 18.43). These choral responses are particularly important in Luke's account of Jesus' miracles.

Many of the miracle stories recounted by Matthew and Luke come from Mark, the first of the Synoptic Gospels. A very large part of Mark's gospel consists of stories about Jesus' miracles and exorcisms. These stories show that the kingdom of God is present in Jesus ministry. Through these wonderful activities of Jesus, God's power is at work conquering the power of evil in individuals and even in nature, a foreshadowing of the ultimate conquering of evil that will come when the Kingdom of God is fully and finally manifest.

Occasionally Mark intimates that Jesus' miracles should be seen in the light of the biblical hope. Thus the choral response of Mk 7.37 alludes to Is 35.5–6 and shows that Jesus' miracle of the man whose hearing and speech were impaired was a partial realization of Isaiah's dream. What is implied in Mark becomes clearer in the later Synoptic gospels. Thus, Matthew who collects a number of miracle stories together in chapters 8 and 9 interprets Jesus' miracles by means of a fulfillment citation (see Is 53.4 in Mt 8.17). Later on in his narrative, Matthew describes Jesus's miracles as "what the Messiah was doing," that is, the deeds of the Messiah. Jesus' response to John the Baptist as to whether he was the one to come was a rehearsal of his miraculous activity described in the language of Is 29.18–19; 35.5–6; 42.18.

In Luke's Gospel, the importance of the Old Testament for understanding the miracles of Jesus is present from the very beginning of the story of Jesus' public ministry. In his "inaugural address" (Luke 4.19), Jesus described the reason why the Spirit had descended upon him. His brief discourse uses passages from Is 61.1–2 and Is 58.6 and includes a reference to the recovery of sight by the blind. Defending himself against the hostile natives of Nazareth, Jesus told the story of miracles attributed to Elijah and Elisha (Lk 4.25–27). Empowered by the Spirit as he was, Jesus performs similar miraculous acts. Like Elijah (1 Kgs 17.17–24), he raised a widowed mother's dead son (Lk 7.11–17).

Only seven stories of miracles are told in the Fourth Gospel. These are concentrated in the first part of the book (Jn 1-12): water become wine (2.1-11), the cure of the royal official's son (4.46–54), the healing of the paralytic (5.1-14), the feeding of the large crowd (Jn 6.1-14), the walking on water (6.16–21), the healing of the blind man (9.1–7), and the raising of Lazarus (11.1–44 [+12.1-2]). While the Fourth Gospel has fewer miracle stories than do the Synoptics, the Fourth Gospel has its own theological idiom to describe Jesus' miracles. They are "signs" (semeia). In a characteristic note, the Fourth Evangelist describes the water become wine as "the first of his signs' (1.11). The theology implicit in the evangelist's use of "sign" is dense. Essentially the cipher points to the christological meaning of Jesus miracles. This is most evident when after the feeding of the crowd the Johannine Jesus describes himself as "the bread of life" (6.48, 51) or before raising Lazarus from the dead says "I am the resurrection and the life" (11.25).

MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF)

In theological usage, a miracle is an extraordinary event, perceptible to the senses, produced by God in a religious context as a sign of the supernatural.

"Extraordinary." In interpreting the words "an extraordinary event produced by God in a religious context," one must understand that extraordinary means beyond the powers of corporeal nature, or at least extremely unlikely from the standpoint of those powers alone. There have been, however, differences of opinion among Catholic theologians in this regard.

Strict View. Many theologians, following St. Thomas Aquinas, have maintained that a miracle in the proper sense is beyond the power of all creatures, even incorporeal creatures, something of which only God could be principal cause, though a creature might serve as instrumental cause (see INSTRUMENTAL CAUSALITY). This view has been increasingly abandoned on the ground that very few, if any, of the events regarded by Scripture and by the Church as miracles are demonstrably above all created power. The proponents of the Thomistic view themselves have usually had recourse to the notion of 'relative' miracles to include those not fitting their strict definition.

"Christ healing the sick presented to him by the Pharisees," manuscript illumination by Cristoforo de Predis from the "Predis Codex." (@Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Intermediate View. A more common view is that adopted by Pope Benedict XIV in his classical treatise De servorum Dei beatificatione et beatorum canonizatione, according to which a miracle need be only above the powers of corporeal creatures. In this view a miracle could be effected by a created spirit as a principal cause; it would be "produced by God" in the sense that the spirit acted as God's agent, i.e., at God's command or at least with God's formal approval.

Wide View. In recent years some authors have argued that a miracle need not even be strictly beyond the powers of corporeal nature, provided it be a truly prodigious event, one at least highly unlikely ever to result from natural forces alone. Such an event, according to these authors, qualifies as a miracle when, occurring in a religious context, it is recognizably intended by God as a SUPERNATURAL sign. Some authors who hold this view suggest that a miracle need not even de facto be caused by immediate supernatural intervention but might be produced by God in the merely mediate sense that it results from an extraordinary combination of natural factors providentially arranged by God, even in the very remote past.

"Sign of the Supernatural." Miracles occurring in connection with a claim of supernatural revelation serve as a divine signature to the truth of that claim. But miracles function as signs also in other ways. They not only confirm supernaturally revealed truths but represent those truths. Thus the RESURRECTION OF CHRIST is not only a guarantee of His teaching but a symbol of His redemptive victory over the spiritual death of sin and an exemplar of the resurrection promised to the faithful. Miracles are also in themselves direct manifestations of one or more divine attributes; e.g., a miraculous cure bespeaks God's compassion. And miracles may testify to the sanctity of a man, as do the miracles accepted as evidence in processes of beatification and canonization. [See CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE).]

"Perceptible to the Senses." Although a purely internal supernatural experience can serve as a divine sign, the term miracle is normally applied only to events that are ascertainable through the external senses. But while the term is sometimes used exclusively of physical miracles, such as miraculous cures of bodily ailments, it is also properly applied to occurrences in the intellectual or moral order, provided there is external evidence of the operation of the supernatural in the mind or will. One type of intellectual miracle is prophecy in the strict sense, the prediction of an event or series of events by a human being in a manner beyond merely human knowledge. (See PROPHET.) An example of a moral miracle is a sudden complete conversion such as that of the Apostle St. PAUL (Acts 9.1–30). In these instances the internal supernatural experience is deducible from its external results; it would not be considered a miracle if it had to be accepted entirely on the word of the recipient. A fortiori, supernatural events, even in the material order, knowable only by divine faith, such as TRANSUBSTANTIATION, are not considered miracles in the proper sense, though they have been called "miracles of faith."

Official Catholic Doctrine

The teaching of the Church concerning miracles is to be found chiefly in the pronouncements of VATICAN COUNCIL I. The Council declared: "In order that the 'service' of our faith be 'in accord with reason' [cf. Rom 12.1], God willed that to the internal helps of the Holy Spirit there be joined external proofs of His revelation, i.e., divine deeds, and principally miracles and prophecies. Since these clearly show forth God's omnipotence and infinite knowledge, they are signs of revelation that are most certain and suited to the intelligence of all men. Therefore not only Moses and the Prophets but also and preeminently Christ the Lord Himself wrought many obvious miracles and made numerous manifest prophecies" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 3009). With a view to the RATIONALISM common in the 19th century, the Council condemned as erroneous the opinion that "miracles are impossible, and therefore all accounts of them, even those contained in Sacred Scripture, are to be rejected as fables and myths" and the opinion that "miracles can never be known with certitude nor serve as valid proof of the divine origin of the Christian religion" (Enchiridion symbolorum 3034).

The Oath against Modernism prescribed by St. Pius X in 1910 was even more explicit about the enduring apologetic value of miracles, stating that they are "eminently suited to the intelligence of all men of every era, including the present" (Enchiridion symbolorum 3539).

It is to be noted that in its official teaching the Church, while by no means excluding the other purposes of miracles, emphasizes their apologetic function, their role as "proof" of revelation. Vatican Council I furthermore clearly implied that among the various forms of evidence of the reasonableness of faith miracles hold first place.

Possibility

Both scientific and philosophical objections have been directed against the very possibility of miracles.

The scientific objection, common in the 19th century, was based largely on a rigid scientific determinis. Although it has been undermined by a more modern indeterministic view of nature, even a deterministic theory of science does not exclude the possibility of miracles, provided the determinism is properly qualified by the awareness that the necessity of physical law is precisely a physical or "natural" necessity, one that allows for intervention of the supernatural, not a metaphysical necessity.

Philosophical objections to miracles are raised not only by atheists, on the obvious ground that if there is no God he can work no miracles, but also by deists, mainly on the ground that miracles would be contrary to God's immutability and wisdom, as though God's supernatural intervention implied a change in His original plan regarding the nature and operation of creatures or was even needed to correct that plan. The error in this view consists in the failure to see that miracles, like other forms of supernatural intervention, do not change or destroy nature or correct some essential defect in it, but build on nature and provide it with a complementary and higher perfection. They are not the object of a new or separate divine plan, but part of God's universal plan which from eternity included both the natural and the supernatural.

Recognition

The crucial question about miracles is the question of their recognizability. Can there be CERTITUDE, first, about the external event itself, as a historical fact, aside from its natural or supernatural character? Can there be certitude, second, about the miraculous character of the event?

Recognition as Historical. Since miracles are by definition events perceptible to the external senses, there is in principle no reason why they should not, from that standpoint, be as definitely ascertainable, either to eyewitnesses or to others on the testimony of eyewitnesses, as are other external occurrences. The fact that miracles are also by definition extraordinary or prodigious events serves to strengthen their verification, since for that very reason they would attract closer attention on the part of the witnesses.

In point of fact, many miracles have presented all the necessary qualifications of historically attested events, occurring in the presence of numerous reliable witnesses, even adversely disposed witnesses, and under suitable conditions, in broad daylight, near at hand, etc. And while clinical evidence is unnecessary for this purpose, there is such evidence in favor of some miracles, for example, some of the cures of LOURDES.

An argument advanced by David Hume against the historical verifiability of miracles is superficial but still widely repeated. Hume's argument in essence is that on behalf of any miracle there is for most men only moral certitude, certitude based on the testimony of human witnesses, whereas against the miracle there is physical certitude, the certitude of the laws of nature, and physical certitude outweighs moral. The fallacy in Hume's argument is the assumption that physical laws are opposed to miracles. Physical laws are conditional, not absolute. They state what happens under natural conditions but do not exclude the possibility of supernatural exceptions. The physical certitude, accordingly, is in favor of the general law, not against the exception, and is therefore in no way opposed to the moral certitude which is precisely in favor of the exception.

Recognition as Miraculous. The criteria to be applied in the recognition of miracles as miraculous vary with one's definition and understanding of miracle as explained above.

According to the Wide View. If one adopts the broad view that a miracle need not be strictly beyond the powers of corporeal nature but only extremely unlikely from the standpoint of those powers alone, the recognition of miracles becomes relatively simple. In this view the main emphasis with regard to the recognition of miracles is to be placed on the religious context. Not any religious context whatsoever is sufficient. The context must be such that one can reasonably conclude that God in His providence would not cause or allow the extraordinary event in question unless He did intend it to be taken as a sign from Him. There would be such a context, for instance, if a religious teacher claimed repeatedly that his doctrine was a new and directly authorized divine revelation, particularly if the teacher appealed to some forthcoming extraordinary event as miraculous confirmation of his claim. Just as an event clearly beyond natural power occurring in such circumstances would reasonably be interpreted as a sign of divine approval, on much the same grounds even an event not distinctly beyond the power of nature but highly unlikely on a natural basis would be rightly interpreted as a divine sign.

This theory of the recognition of miracles depends heavily on God's providence. [See PROVIDENCE OF GOD (THEOLOGY OF).] Its force will vary with the degree of extraordinariness of the event and with the details of the religious context. But while this theory does provide a satisfactory explanation of the recognition of miracles, it is possible to present a stronger case by showing that many miracles are actually beyond the powers of corporeal nature.

According to Intermediate View. It should first be understood that there is more than one sense in which an event can be above the powers of corporeal nature. The event might be intrinsically of a kind that could never happen naturally with any corporeal subject; e.g., its occupying strictly the same place as another body. Or the event might be of a kind that could happen in another corporeal subject but not in the one under consideration, e.g., speech in a dog. Or it might be the kind of thing that could happen even in this subject but not under these particular circumstances or in this particular way, e.g., fluent speech in a newborn child or the instantaneous cure of an advanced organic disease. Along these lines theologians distinguish three classes of miracles: miracles with regard to substance (miracula quoad substantiam), miracles with regard to subject (miracula quoad subjectum), and miracles with regard to mode (miracula quoad modum). The majority of miracles are of the third class, events that could happen naturally but not in this particular way or under these given circumstances.

The discernment of a miracle as something beyond the powers of nature involves a comparison of what happens in the miracle with what happens naturally under similar circumstances. Our knowledge of what happens naturally is based on experience, partly on our own experience but especially on the reported experience of others. Even though we do not know all that nature can do, we have a reasonably certain knowledge, based often on thousands or even millions of cases, of at least the general limits of the results produced by nature in a particular set of circumstances (e.g., in the case of a man of a certain age with a particular disease). In the extraordinary event considered a miracle we see that, although there are present at least approximately the same natural causes and conditions as in similar but admittedly natural cases, a distinctly different result occurs. We conclude that there must be some cause present other than the natural ones.

The disproportion between the natural effect and the miraculous effect may appear in various ways. The difference may be in quantity, or in quality, or in both. One particular difference, seen in many miracles, is in the time required. The miracle often takes place instantaneously, or at least in a much shorter time than is required to produce a similar result naturally.

There are, furthermore, in most miracles, positive indications that the principal force responsible for the extraordinary event is a force operating intelligently and freely and, therefore, not a merely natural force. (It is understood that the intelligence and freedom are not those of a human being. An extraordinary event would not be seriously considered as a miracle if there were good reason to suspect that the phenomenon might be within the power of a mere man to produce at will by an understanding and control of the forces of nature.)

Some of the indications of the action of an intelligent and free agent in a miracle may be mentioned. (1) The timing. If, for example, Christ's walking on the water were due merely to an unknown natural force, why should this force take effect just at those times that Christ chose to walk on the water? (2) The purposeful concurrence of several or even many factors. For example, in a miraculous cure there may be distinguished such separate steps as the provision of a certain amount of matter to replace lost tissue, the provision more specifically of the exact elements needed, the organization of that matter into the kinds of tissue needed (skin, muscle, nerves, etc.), the elimination of infectious matter, and so on. In some miracles, two or more completely distinct ailments have been cured simultaneously. (3) The multiplicity and variety of miracles in the life of Christ. If these were all due to merely natural forces, how explain the occurrence of so many and such different extraordinary events in the life of one man? Either these things happened because Christ knew how to use those forces at will, or they happened without such understanding on His part. The latter hypothesis would require an incredible series of coincidences. The former hypothesis would require at least supernatural knowledge in Christ. Such knowledge would constitute an intellectual miracle that could itself be taken as confirmation of Christ's claims.

Even if such considerations do not of themselves afford absolute certitude, they provide genuine moral certitude of the physically transcendent character of many miracles. There is admittedly much that is still unknown about nature, but it is not necessary to know all that nature can do in order to recognize a particular effect as something that nature cannot do; it is not necessary to know the absolutely maximum weight a man can lift in order to know that he cannot by his own unaided strength raise a mountain. Nor need we have a complete knowledge of the power of mind over matter—as in psychosomatic illnesses and cures, hypnosis, psychokinesis, etc.—in order to recognize some effects as plainly beyond that power.

While formally scientific knowledge is not necessary for the discernment of miracles, it can be of assistance, both negatively and positively. It is often erroneously asserted that the progress of science has weakened the case for miracles. Science has indeed furnished a natural explanation of certain phenomena that may have once been looked upon as supernatural in some sense, especially by primitive man-though even this is sometimes exaggerated. And science has, by an increased understanding of nature derived from research and by the development of instruments, enabled man to do remarkable things previously impossible to him. But there is a vast difference between doing such things by the aid of scientific knowledge and instruments and doing the same or similar things without such knowledge and instruments. Science has not enabled man to reproduce any of the prodigies related of Christ, especially in the way in which He did them, i.e., without scientific instruments. And even if science were to bring this about, it would still have been miraculous for Christ to do such things at a time when the necessary scientific knowledge was, humanly speaking, unavailable. The progress of science has, in fact, strengthened the case for miracles by giving man a constantly deeper and fuller understanding of the processes of nature, thereby enabling him to recognize certain phenomena even more definitely as beyond natural powers.

Some have thought that the indeterminism espoused by modern physics constitutes an obstacle to the recognition of miracles on the ground that, if nature is basically indetermined, it is impossible to know what nature can or cannot do. But a genuinely basic indeterminism in nature is, to begin with, highly questionable, not only philosophically but also scientifically. Moreover, whatever indeterminism there is in nature (prescinding from the indeterminism of human free will, which is irrelevant in this connection), the indeterminism affects directly events on the microscopic scale and not appreciably those on the macroscopic scale; and only the latter have ever been considered as miracles. Even if the kind of indeterminism envisioned by modern physics were on a rare occasion to produce a striking effect on the macroscopic scale, it could never account qualitatively for such miracles as a resurrection or the sudden, complete cure of an advanced organic disease, in view of the nature of such miracles and considering, moreover, the positive signs of the operation in miracles in general of an intelligent and free agent, as previously explained.

If most miracles, even though recognizably beyond the powers of corporeal nature, are seldom discernibly beyond the powers of created spirits, how can it be known that they do actually come from God, at least through a spirit acting in God's name, rather than from an evil spirit acting for its own purpose?

A sufficient criterion is provided by the moral circumstances—e.g., the dignity or incongruity of the event itself, the character and conduct of the human "miracleworker," and, most important, the good or evil effects of the event. Though there can be exceptions to the principle, morally good circumstances point to a divine origin, evil circumstances to a diabolic origin. The principle operates mainly in a negative way: God would not allow an evil spirit to produce a supernatural manifestation in connection with a false claim of revelation unless there were present one or more serious moral defects that would furnish a sufficient indication of the source of the phenomenon.

Recognition by Unaided Reason. Although a few theologians have held the contrary, the recognition of miracles does not strictly require the assistance of an internal divine GRACE. Nor is an authoritative judgment by the Church always necessary. There are indeed cases in which the nature of the miracle or the evidence for it are such that a prudent certitude would hardly be possible without an ecclesiastical decision. But Christian apologists have always maintained that some miracles, especially the major miracles of Christ, can be known with certitude independently of the divine teaching authority of the Church (magisterium).

In his encyclical Humani generis Pius XII spoke of "the many wonderful external signs God has given, which are sufficient to prove with certitude by the natural light of reason alone the divine origin of the Christian religion" (Enchiridion symbolorum 3876).

Miracles outside the Catholic Church

It is sometimes argued that miracles have been claimed by most religions and that, accordingly, they cannot serve as evidence in favor of a particular religion or church.

The appeal to miracles as confirmation of the truth of Christian revelation and of the Catholic religion does not exclude the possibility of miracles outside the Catholic Church and outside Christianity. God could work miracles in connection with another church or another religion for any number of reasons, e.g., to witness to the divine presence in a particular event, to confirm the truth of a particular doctrine, or to strengthen faith of individuals. On the other hand, Catholics logically hold that since the Church if of divine origin, God would not work a miracle under such circumstances that it could reasonably be interpreted as divine confirmation of another religion as a whole or of a doctrine contrary to the teachings of Christ and his Church. A comprehensive survey and evaluation of the best known claims of miracles outside the Catholic Church may be found in L. H. Monden, Le Miracle, signe de salut (Bruges 1960).

MIRACULOUS MEDAL

The miraculous medal was revealed by the Blessed Virgin Mary in a vision granted St. Catherine Labouré, a Daughter of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, at the Paris motherhouse, Nov. 27, 1830. The Virgin stood upon a globe, crushing a serpent beneath her foot (Gn 3.15). Rays of light, symbolizing graces, streamed from her outstretched hands. Written around her was the prayer: "O Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee." The vision reversed revealing an "M" surmounted by a bar and cross. Beneath were the Hearts of Jesus and Mary, one crowned with thorns, the other pierced with a sword (Lk 2.35). Twelve stars encircled the whole (Rv 12.1). A voice spoke: "Have a medal struck after this model. All who wear it will receive great graces. They should wear it around the neck."

The first medals were struck, with permission of Archbishop de Quélen of Paris, June 30, 1832. So many remarkable favors followed that people called the medal "miraculous." A canonical inquiry at Paris (1836) certified its supernatural origin and efficacy. Papal approval followed the instantaneous conversion of Alphonse Ratisbonne, who was hostile to Catholicism, to whom the Madonna of the Medal appeared in the Church of S. Andrea delle Fratte, Rome, Jan. 20, 1842.

Pius IX (June 20, 1847) approved the Association of Children of Mary, requested of St. Catherine by the Virgin, granting it all indulgences enjoyed by the Prima Primaria (1584). Leo XIII (July 23, 1894) honored the medal with a Mass and Office for Nov. 27, proper to the Congregation of the Mission (Vincentian Fathers) and Daughters of Charity. Pius X (June 3, 1905) established the Association of the Miraculous Medal, granting it the indulgences and privileges enjoyed by the Confraternity of the Blue Scapular.

The devotion, indulgenced by Pius XI, Pius XII, John XXIII, and Paul VI, has spread throughout the world.

MIRAEUS, AUBERT (LE MIRE)

Church historian; b. Brussels, Dec. 2, 1573; d. Antwerp, Oct. 19, 1640. Of a wealthy merchant family, Miraeus attended the college at Douai, and then the University of Louvain, where he was taught by Justus Lipsius. He became a canon of the cathedral (1601) and later secretary to his uncle, Jean Miraeus, the bishop of Antwerp. Vice Regent of the Netherlands Albert of Austria (reign 1596–1621) sent him on diplomatic missions to La Haye (1609) and Paris (1609–10), and appointed him court chaplain at Brussels (1615). He was also appointed dean of the cathedral at Antwerp (1624) and vicar general (1635).

During these years of diocesan administration and diplomatic service, Miraeus wrote prodigiously, if not always accurately, on Church history (39 works are listed). A great number of his books served as valuable guides to the history of monastic orders and religious congregations, including the Benedictines (1606, 1614), Carmelites (1608, 1610), Carthusians (1609), military orders (1609), Augustinians (1612, 1614, 1622), Premonstratensians (1613), and Cistercians (1614); and he prepared a brief history of the orders that came into being during the Counter Reformation, De congregationibus clericorum in communi viventium, ut theatinorum, societatis Jesu, barnabitarum, somaschae, oratorii, doctrinae christianae . . . (Cologne 1622). His greatest fame is derived from his writings on the history of Belgium: Elenchus historicorum Belgii . . . (Brussels 1622); Rerum belgicarum chronicon . . . (Antwerp 1636); Stemmata principum Belgii (Brussels 1626); Diplomatum bellicorum libri duo (Brussels 1627); Donationum belgicarum libri duo . . . (Antwerp 1629); and Notitia ecclesiarum Belgii . . . (Antwerp 1630). Miraeus wrote also on hagiographical questions, the state of religion in Europe, Emperor Ferdinand II, and the Bohemian wars; compiled lists of the episcopates throughout the world; and composed a general chronicle of Christian history.

MIRIAN (MERIBANES)

First Christian king of Iberia (East Georgia), founder of the Chosroid dynasty; b. c. 282; d. 361. As a member of the House of Mihran, one of the seven great houses of the Iranian monarchy, he was placed on the throne of Iberia by the Iranians, who were anxious to counterbalance Roman influence in Armenia. At about age seven (c. 289), he passed through a ceremony of marriage with Abeshura, the Arsacid heiress of Iberia. Converted to Christianity in middle age by the preaching of St. Nino (334), he sent to the Emperor Constantine for priests, and in 337 he was baptized together with his people. Though Iberia was an area traditionally under the jurisdiction of Antioch, John, the first bishop of Iberia, was sent from Constantinople because of the Emperor Constantine's war with Iran, begun in 337. Mirian is venerated as a saint by the Georgian Church.

MIRROR OF PRINCES (LITERATURE)

Literary genre offering a model for the ideal prince to follow; especially popular in the late medieval and Renaissance periods, called also Speculum principum. Treatises of this kind were of three related types; some depicted famous princes biographically with an emphasis on the high quality of their persons and the skill of their statecraft; some described historical personalities in a highly idealized and poetic way in order to produce a maximum idealistic impact upon the noble reader; and others presented practical rules, principles, and norms for the conduct of a prince. In some of the literature there was a shading from a practical discussion of the management of political affairs to a treatment of the theoretical foundation of the office of the ruler.

The roots of the mirror of princes literature reached back into classical antiquity, where Plato's description of the philosopher-kings in the Republic and Aristotle's Politics and Nichomachean Ethics were the most influential sources. Xenophon and Isocrates contributed to the tradition. A compilation of moralisms from Plutarch titled Institutio Traiani was to be much imitated during the medieval period. Roman antiquity in turn contributed substantially to the development of this genre of writing. Seneca's Moral Essays and Marcus Aurelius's Autobiography, stressing the importance of the ruler's interior qualities, reinforced Cicero's earlier work. Three other influential writings were Pliny the Younger's Panegyricus, Claudian's Panegyricus de quarto consulatu Honorii, and Vegetius's Epitome rei militaris. These classical sources were cited in the fully developed mirror of princes literature of the 12th to the 18th centuries.

The early Middle Ages was influenced by AUGUS-TINE's description of the good emperor in his City of God. The pseudo-Cyprian, composed in Ireland during the 7th century, was important during the Carolingian period. By this time the ideal prince was depicted as one who was loyal to the Christian faith and was of service to the Church and to the monastic way of life. The earliest elaborate medieval treatise on politics was JOHN OF SALIS-BURY's Policraticus (1159), which included, with its organic theory of the state, a discussion of the duties and rights of governors as well as of the true king as God's vicar. A contemporary of John of Salisbury, GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS, composed De instructione principum, which he loaded with moral preachments but with little practical advice. Similarly, VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS's De morali principis institutione (1260–63) had a pious flavor and bristled with references to Scripture and the Fathers. In the 13th century, however, Arabic-Aristotelian ideas that contributed a new element of secular realism were added to the revived classical ideas of the 12th century. The pseudo-Aristotelian Secretum secretorum, purporting to represent the correspondence of Alexander and Aristotle, had considerable influence through its Latin translation by Philippus (prior to 1243). Aristotle's ideas were evident in St. THOMAS AQUINAS's De regimine principum as well as in the work by the same name of GILES OF ROME, the latter being indisputably the most important work of this type. Giles's treatise was less a discussion of the nature of the state than a true mirror for a prince, written to instruct the heir to the French crown before the death of King Philip III in 1285.

Renaissance humanists, imbued with classical ideals and often personally in the service of princes, developed this type of writing into a fine art. PETRARCH himself set the precedent with his De republica optime administranda. The poet Pontanus wrote on the subject and SAVONA-ROLA touched upon some of the same familiar themes in his Tractate on the Organization and Government of the City of Florence. Certainly the most renowned treatise in the mirror of princes category was N. MACHIAVELLI's The Prince. Although many of the themes in The Prince were of a familiar sort—e.g., liberality, keeping faith, love and fear, flattery, friendships, and the king's ministers—Machiavelli disagreed with the earlier treatises, which had demanded that the good ruler must himself be a good man and the best moral example for his subjects. Instead, Machiavelli urged that the standard of the good ruler be whether he succeeds (one way or another) in securing the well-being of the citizens of his state. In contrast to Machiavelli's work, both the treatise of Budé and ERASMUS's Instruction of a Christian Prince seem traditional in cast. Later works of the mirror of princes type include BOSSUET's Politique tirée de l'Écriture Sainte, CAMPANELLA's Monarchia Hispanica, the Jesuit MARI-ANA's De rege et regis institutio, FÉNELON's Télémaque, and Wieland's Goldener Spiegel, most of them tiresome and banal.

MISERICORDIA SISTERS

The Misericordia Sisters (SM) is a congregation with papal approbation founded in Montreal, Canada, on Jan. 16, 1848, by Bp. Ignace Bourget and Rosalie Jetté (Mother of the Nativity) for the purpose of rehabilitating wayward young women. Some of these women consecrate themselves to God by taking vows as Oblate Sisters of Misericordia. The Misericordia Sisters work at hospitals, schools of nursing, retreat houses, and other social work venues. On June 7, 1867, Pius IX approved the institute; Pius XI granted final approbation of the constitutions on May 6, 1932. The superior general resides at the mother-house in Montreal. The first U.S. foundation was established in 1887. The U.S. headquarters is in Aurora, IL.

MISHNAH

The core and oldest part of the TALMUD. The Hebrew word mišnâ, literally "repetition," designates here instruction in the Oral Law. The Mishnah is a codification compiled by Rabbi JUDAH HA-NASI in the beginning of the 3d Christian century on the basis of earlier oral collections of the teachings of the rabbis since the 1st century B.C. It is divided into six "orders" (se dārîm) embracing 63 tractates (masse kôt). Its language, commonly called Mishnaic Hebrew, is a direct development of the spoken HEBREW LANGUAGE of the late OT period under the influence of Aramaic.

MISSAL, ROMAN

The earliest eucharistic liturgical books for presiders used in the Roman rite were the sacramentaries, which date from the seventh and eighth centuries (see SACRAMEN-TARIES, HISTORICAL). Other liturgical ministers in the early medieval period made use of other liturgical books containing material proper to their differing roles, e.g. the lectionary for readers, the graduale or antiphonale for cantors and scholae (choir). These sacramentaries originally contained only the presider's prayers (euchology) used at mass; even the outline structure of the service, the ordo missae was contained in a separate libellus or booklet at this time. These ordines tended to become more elaborate into the eleventh century, incorporating many devotional and penitential prayers for the presider to recite while other liturgical ministers were active during the mass (e.g. the singing of the Gloria, the preparation of the altar at the offertory).

The "Full" Missal. Beginning from the twelfth century into the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, all of the material necessary to celebrate mass were gradually collected into a single volume for the use of the presider. The ordo missae was incorporated first, and came to be located in the middle of the book. Eventually, texts from other liturgical books proper to other ministers was also incorporated: readings from the lectionary, pieces of chant from the antiphonaries and graduals. The resultant volume came to be known as the missalis plenarius, the plenary or "full" missal.

The development of this liturgical book was prompted by a number of factors. The first was the spread of the "private mass," that is, the celebration of the mass by a single priest with only a few, or perhaps only one acolyte assisting, beginning in the late eleventh and twelfth centuries. At the same time the priest became obliged to recite all the parts of the mass like the readings and chants, even if they were done by their proper minister. The second was the rise of mendicant religious orders in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries. Priests of these new orders (e.g. the Dominicans and Franciscans) were not bound by vows of stability to a single monastery, but were instead committed to a mobile type of ministry, moving about the countryside and towns of an increasingly urbanized Europe, preaching and begging for alms. These friars needed single volume collections of the texts needed to celebrate the mass (the missal) and the Divine Office (the breviary).

Missals in the high middle ages were not yet unified into a single uniform volume, There were a number of diocesan and regional variations, even in the city of Rome. The Dominicans, for example, formed their own missal based on the liturgical books of Lyons in France (see DOMINICAN RITE). In England, there were several related "Uses," for example, the HEREFORD USE, YORK USE, and SARUM USE, which was the most widespread liturgical Use in medieval England. In the sixteenth century, Thomas CRANMER would use the Sarum Missal as the basis for the vernacular BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, the official liturgical book of the fledging Church of England.

An important step in the development of a single, normative Roman Missal (Missale Romanum) comes with the Franciscans, led by their General HAYMO OF FAVERSHAM (d. 1244), who modeled their missal on the practice of the contemporary Roman Curia and disseminated it through Europe. After some revision under CLEM-ENT V (d. 1314), the Franciscan Missal was adopted by the Curia itself, and under the title "Missal According to the Use of the Roman Curia" became the first printed missal in 1474. This missal was promulgated virtually unchanged by Pope Pius V in 1570, as the first of a series of standard liturgical books mandated by the Council of Trent (1545-1563). The MR was promulgated for all Roman Catholic dioceses; however, those dioceses (and religious orders) whose own liturgies were at least 200 years old were given the option of retaining their own books. Most chose to adopt the Missal of Pius V. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, some French bishops (in the wake of Gallicanism and Jansenism) chose to replace the MR with missals composed locally, called neo-Gallican missals. The nineteenth century saw the victory of ultramontanists in France, and the reappropriation of the MR in that country. Other Latin, but non-Roman, rites continued to be used, e.g. the AMBROSIAN RITE in Milan, and the MOZARABIC RITE in Toledo. Some religious orders also retained their own proper missals, all earlier versions of the MR, until the Second Vatican Council, e.g. the Dominicans (see PREMONSTRATENSIAN RITE) and the Premonstratensians (see PREMONSTRATENSIAN RITE).

The Sacramentary (1970). The Missal of Pius V continued to be used, with some minor additions in 1604, 1634, and 1920, until the implementation of the liturgical reforms mandated by the Second Vatican Council. The last editio typica, or "authoritative Latin version" of the Missal of Pius V was published in 1962. The Roman Missal revised by the decree of Vatican II was published by the authority of Paul VI in 1970. A second editio typica with minor revisions was issued in 1975, and a third edition typica was slated to appear in 2001. A notable part of the Missale Romanum of Paul VI is the return to the use of a variety of liturgical books for the various liturgical ministers, e.g., the LECTIONARY and Antiphonal (or Gradual). Unlike a missale plenaries (full missal), the Missal of Paul VI does not give the readings and proper chant notations for each mass. this is carried over in many vernacular translations of the edition typica, which retrieve the classic terminology of sacramentary as the title for the liturgical book.

For two decades, the use of the Missal of Pius V was technically forbidden except in certain specific situations; defying this discipline at times became a rallying point for certain conservative groups unhappy with the reforms mandated by the Second Vatican Council.

Today, the Tridentine Rite of 1962 MR may still be celebrated in a selected location in any diocese at the discretion of the local Ordinary, according to an indult by Pope John Paul II in Ecclesia Dei (1988), calling for a more "generous" application of the directives issued by the Congregation for Divine Worship, Quattuor abhinc annos (1984).

MISSAL FOR THE DIOCESES OF ZAIRE

Promulgated by the decree Zairensium on April 30, 1988 by the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments, the Missel romain pour les diocèses du Zaïre (Roman Missal for the Dioceses of Zaire) is an attempt to inculturate the Roman Ordo missae in an African context, inspired by the liturgical reform initiated at the Second Vatican Council (see INCULTURATION, LITURGICAL).

Genesis and Drafting. Amid the cultural ferment in the aftermath of Zaire's independence in the 1960s (see CONGO, DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF), just before Vatican II, the bishops of Zaire stated that Christianity's appeal was inhibited because of lack of adaptation to the living traditions of the African peoples. In a 1961 directive, the Episcopal Conference of Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo) called for an "adaptation of the cult." A thorough and critical examination of the religious customs and cultural matrix of the African peoples was identified as the starting point for an elaboration of an authentic African liturgy. The renewal decreed by the Second Vatican Council, together with the historical appeal of Pope Paul VI in Kampala in 1969 to the African nations to formulate Catholicism in terms of African culture [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1 (1969) 577-578] confirmed the endeavor of the Zairean bishops.

In 1969, the Commission on Evangelization of the Episcopal Conference initiated study of the culture and religious beliefs of the Zairean peoples. After the Congregation for Divine Worship granted authorization on June 22, 1970, the Commission on Evangelization elaborated the first draft of the new Order of Mass that was presented officially to the bishops in 1973. Permission to use the new liturgy ad experimentum was granted on June 15, 1973. After extensive evaluation and criticism, the entire Zairean episcopate reaffirmed the "Zairean Rite," as it was then called, in 1985. Once the bishops had given approval, the Roman authorities granted that the new Order be used ad interim. Definitive approbation of the Zairean Eucharistic liturgy came in 1988 under the title, Missel romain pour les Diocèses du Zaïre (Roman Missal for Use in the Dioceses of Zaire). The name changed from "Zairean Rite" because "rite" is a broader designation and does not consist of the Eucharistic liturgy solely. Second, the Roman authorities wanted to locate this African Eucharistic liturgy within the "forms already existing" in the Catholic Church, namely the typical edition of the Roman Missal (cf. Sacrosanctum Concilium 23).

Structure and Originality of the Missal. Taken in both its solemn and simple versions, the Missal for Zaire followed the structure of the Roman Ordo missae. However, it was adapted and enriched by a number of variations inspired by the region's cultural milieu. Three major structural adaptations are evident. First, the liturgy begins with an invocation of the ancestors. Second, the penitential rite follows the proclamation of the Word, the homily, and creed. Third, the gesture of peace follows this penitential rite, not the Lord's Prayer as in the typical edition of the Roman Missal.

These changes found their raison d'être in the particular worldview of the Zairean peoples, and the pattern of their traditional community gatherings provided the ritual frame for the Zairean Mass. First, the remembrance of ancestors opens the Eucharistic celebration. The remembrance of ancestors is an essential practice in traditional African society since most Africans believe that the dead are still members of the community and that the world of the dead is in communion with that of the living. Not all the dead are presented with the title of ancestor, but only those who have lived an honest and exemplary life. No important event or gathering can occur in traditional African society without an invocation of ancestors and their remembrance.

Taking account of this practice, the Zairean liturgy integrated the invocation of the saints and the ancestors into the Eucharistic celebration. By doing so, the liturgical rite Christianized the traditional remembrance and veneration of ancestors. Whereas, in the traditional society, the ancestors belonged to only their clan or family, their incorporation in the Christian liturgy was the very expression of their incorporation in Christ. Thus, the ancestors of one clan could be invoked as ancestors of the entire Christian community.

Just as in the traditional gathering, forgiveness is sought after the exposition of the circumstances of disharmony, so the penitential rite followed the proclamation of the scriptures and the Homily. Having listened to the Word of God that stirs up the memory of God's salvific call and grounds all conversion, the community sought God's pardon for its shortcomings and sinfulness and reconciliation with each other.

Distinctive Cultural Aspects of the Liturgy. Fidelity to African culture resulted in the incorporation of the Manuscript page of music "The Introduction and Lord's Prayer," from "Missale Romanum," 1474.

Zairean peoples' orality, gesture, art, and music into the Roman liturgy. The characteristics of African orality are dialogue, narrative, repetition, dramatization, the use of short sentences, strong images and metaphors, enigmatic expressions calling for a deep sense of imagination, expressive sonorities, and allusions. The model taken was the palabre africaine or judicial oratorical art. For instance, in the Homily, the preacher elicited the response of the assembly, engaging them as a dialogue partner. The preaching was often interrupted by songs and dances. Also, traditional African assemblies included designated individuals who introduce, comment, summarize, and dramatize what is under discussion, the goal to invite the community to a genuine sense of what is taking place. Thus, liturgy included an announcer or narrator, generally a lay minister, who heralded and commented upon the main parts of the celebration and introduced to the assembly whoever was going to speak. Every reader asked the permission and blessing of the priest celebrant. The culmination of the liturgy of the Word was the enthronement of the Book of the Gospels.

Gesture and movement was another characteristic of the Zairean liturgy. Bodily expression also took the form of dance. The Gloria, which immediately followed the invocation of the ancestors, was accompanied by ritual dances by the ministers and some of the faithful around the altar while incense was burned. These two symbolic actions were intended as an expression of the veneration of the altar. The rest of the assembly members danced at their places. The priest celebrant venerated the altar with traditional African gesture: with his arms raised in a "V" form, he touched each side of the altar with his forehead. During the penitential rite, all the assembly members bowed their heads and formed an "X" on their chests with their arms. At the sign of peace, people generally shook their two hands as a sign of total openness or acceptance, sometimes preceded by the washing of the hands in a common receptacle. Rhythmic dances and gestures also accompanied the procession of the gifts, including food and gifts destined for the poor, the sick, and the suffering, or for community fund-raising.

The Zairean Mass made use of special liturgical vestments and specific musical instruments. The Zairean liturgical vestments were distinguished by their form, design, and particular arrangement of colors. Generally, the bottom color held dominant meaning and was decorated with other complementary colors. Among the musical instruments commonly used were the tam-tam, the gong, and the hand bell. The bell, the instrument of the announcer, was used to announce any intervention in the assembly. The gong was usually reserved for use during the institution narrative of the Eucharistic prayer. Frequent use was made of the drum, an instrument of great importance for Africans. The Missal for the Dioceses of Zaire was a concrete example of the ongoing task of the inculturation of Roman Catholic liturgy and African cultural genius.

MISSIOLOGY

Missiology is a multidisciplinary branch of theology which studies the mission of the Church in all its aspects. Although Fathers of the Church, such as AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO and GREGORY THE GREAT, wrote about mission and the obligations and methods of missionary evangelization, and although later ecclesiastical writers, such as the Dominican RAYMOND OF PENYAFORT and the Franciscan tertiary RAYMOND LULL, produced specialized treatises on mission, the present-day discipline of missiology emerged in the early 19th century with the Protestant Gustav Warneck (1834-1910), who is considered the father of modern missiology, with Alexander Duff, who held the first chair of missiology at Edinburgh University in 1867 and with the Catholic missiologists Robert STREIT and Joseph SCHMIDLIN at the University of Münster in the first half of the 20th century. Even as late as 1962, the year of the opening of the Second Vatican Council, there was still a discussion in Catholic circles as to whether the discipline should not be called "missionology," rather than missiology.

The Institute of Missiology at Münster began its publications before World War I and made a new start after World War II with the appointment of Thomas Ohm OSB. Meanwhile, at the Catholic University of Louvain, from 1922–1954 Pierre CHARLES SJ began a series of courses in missiology and launched the celebrated Louvain Missiological Weeks. Between the World Wars chairs and faculties of missiology were founded at the Gregorian and Urbanian Universities in Rome.

Two names are important for the impact they made on the English-speaking world in the second half of the 20th century. Lesslie Newbigin (1909–1995) was a Presbyterian who became Secretary of the World Council of Churches' International Missionary Council, a Bishop in the Church of South India and a minister of the United Reformed Church in England. The main thrust of his writing was the mission to the secularized western world. David J. Bosch was a South African, of the Dutch Reformed Church and missiologist in the University of South Africa, Pretoria. He died in a tragic accident in 1992, a year after the publication of his magisterial compendium Transforming Mission—Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission.

Paradigms of Mission. A missionary reading of the New Testament enables us to discern several mission theologies. The Gospel of Matthew reaches its climax with the "great commission" to make disciples of all nations (Mt. 28:18–20). Proclamation and disciple-making have been a traditional emphasis in missionary evangelization. The Johannine stress on the "great commandment" of universal love is, however, more fundamental, and coincides with a modern emphasis on dialogue and the missio Dei, God's initiative of love. In Luke-Acts evangelization is centered on forgiveness and solidarity—the preaching of the Good News to the poor, another contemporary concern, while the Pauline writings envisage the eschatalogical community as the goal of mission.

Following the ideas of Thomas Kuhn and Hans Küng, David Bosch described six paradigms in the history of missiology. After the eschatalogical interest of primitive Christianity came the Hellenistic-Patristic emphasis on metaphysics and liturgy. The medieval paradigm was Church-centered and monastic, and even countenanced missionary wars and forms of missionary colonialism. After the Reformation, Protestants were slow to embark on missionary activity, but eventually the Anabaptists and Pietists took up the challenge of the "Great Commission." The missionary paradigm of the Age of Enlightenment emphasized the promotion of Christian "knowledge." The emerging contemporary paradigm, according to Bosch, is one in which Catholics and Protestants share a number of basic ideas: the Church as sacrament and sign of the Kingdom, the Missio Dei, the preferential option for the poor, inculturation, liberation, and common witness.

For Bosch, these paradigms are not necessarily consecutive and several are said to be contemporaneous. Historians are cautious when confronted by such imposed structures. In any case, it is probably easier to observe a paradigm shift—the crisis or breakdown of a reigning paradigm—than to identify in detail the emergence of a new one.

Missiology in the 20th Century. The International Missionary Conference at Edinburgh in 1910 and the other conferences that led up to it, took place in the wake of missionary expansion in Asia and the Americas. Christianity was also on the threshold of a major expansion in Africa. The Edinburgh Conference, therefore, viewed mission as a process of geographical extension. While it advocated a sympathy towards non-Christian faiths, it was in no doubt about the uniqueness and finality of the Christian message. The lasting importance of the Edinburgh Conference was that it laid the foundations for the Ecumenical Movement and for the idea of mission as common witness.

Another approach in the first decade after Edinburgh was an emphasis on community and communal relationships in mission. It was associated with the names of the Protestant missionaries Bruno Gutmann and Christian Keysser, but has survived in the ideas of a Catholic Missionary, Vincent Donovan. Max Warren, who became general secretary of the Anglican Church Missionary Society in 1942, popularized the "Christian Presence" theology of religions in which missionaries were encouraged to engage sympathetically with other faiths in the belief that Christ was already actively present in them.

The 1960s were a time of upheaval and discontinuity. The experience of decolonization, the growth of ecumenism and, above all, the renewal set in motion by the Second Vatican Council, brought new emphases in missiology: liberation and a tension between proclamation and dialogue. A return to proclamation coincided with the rising tide of conservative evangelicalism in the last decades of the twentieth century, and this was also the major thrust of the papal encyclical Redemptoris missio of 1990. Such an emphasis, especially on the part of Protestant fundamentalism, went hand in hand with a renewed commitment to church planting and church growth. Some of the proponents of dialogue however, such as the Protestant J. C. Hoekendijk and Catholics like Paul Knitter and, more recently, the Jesuit Jacques Dupuis, in their efforts to retreat from a church-centered missiology, adopted a pluralistic theology of religions.

A notable feature of Catholic missiology in the last quarter of the 20th century has been the development of a biblical theology of mission. This and other aspects of modern missiology have been promoted by influential missionary publishing houses.

Missiology and the Second Vatican Council. At Vatican II no satisfactory draft of a decree on missionary activity was at first forthcoming. The attempt to reduce it to 13 propositions prompted Bishop Donal Lamont's celebrated "Dry Bones" speech. As a result, a new committee produced Ad gentes divinitus in time for the final session. It is a practical document arising from the desire of missionary bishops for a statement about the evangelization of the non-western world ("young churches" and those in a state of "decline or weakness") and the obligation of dioceses in Europe and North America to support it with finance and personnel. As such, it is a conservative document that conceives specialized missionary activity in terms of proclamation and church implantation, although—in line with a christocentric and kerygmatic concept of mission—it proclaims the whole Church to be missionary.

Ad gentes divinitus accepts the fact of religious and cultural pluralism and expresses belief in God's active presence in non-Christian traditions. It also accepts the ecclesiological revolution of Lumen gentium and Gaudium et spes, with their emphasis on the particular church as the basis for ecclesial diversity in unity and devotes an entire chapter to the concept. The high point of the chapter, and indeed of the whole decree, is reached in the final paragraph (22) with the idea of a local incarnation of Christianity representing a profound adaptation in every sphere of Christian life. Although it does not use the term, it already foreshadows the development of the theological concept of "inculturation." It is this passage that has best stood the test of time. Although it is a positive document, Ad gentes divinitus contains internal contradictions that are more clearly seen in the changed circumstances of today. Incarnation, rather than the Paschal Mystery, is emphasized as the source and model of missionary activity. There is an unsatisfactory distiction between missionary and pastoral work. No reference is made to integral development. The encouragement given to Fidei donum priests contradicts the emphasis on the need for specialized missionary training.

The foundation of the SECRETARIAT FOR NON-CHRISTIANS, renamed the PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR INTERRELIGIOUS DIALOGUE in 1988, took place before the end of Vatican II, and the conciliar declaration on the Church's relation to Non-Christian religions, Nostra aetate, became its major guiding document. This declaration praised the spiritual and moral truths found among Non-Christians, and the secretariat set out to document, inform, and analyze the problems of interreligious dialogue, as well as to make contact with religious leaders. In 1984 the secretariat produced an important document clarifying the relationship of dialogue to mission, and this theme was taken up again in Dialogue and Proclamation in 1991.

Missiology after Vatican II. In the wake of Vatican II, the role of dialogue took on greater importance. Lumen gentium (n. 16) opened the way for discussion by declaring that salvation was possible for those ignorant of Christ and even for those lacking an explicit knowledge of God; while Gaudium et spes (n. 22) affirmed that such people have the possibility of being made partners in the Paschal Mystery, in a way known to God. Theologians have developed the concept of the fundamental option as an implicit act of faith and love. Some have looked for positive values in non-Christian religions that may play a role in the salvation of their adherents, while others have considered the role of such religious traditions in God's salvific design for humanity.

Karl RAHNER made a major contribution to the discussion with his much criticized theory of "Anonymous Christianity." According to this theory, people who have no explicit consciousness of being Christians may nevertheless be recipients of a Christic revelation and salvation. Conservative evangelicals, with an exclusivist soteriology, have vehemently attacked the theory. Others have pointed out that anonymity and faith, ignorance and grace, are unconvincing allies. In the light of Rahner's response to such criticism, it would seem that Anonymous Christianity must comprise a disclosure of meaning within an unfolding historical praxis.

Another follow-up to Vatican II was the notion of integral development, the understanding of economic and social development as a form of Gospel praxis implicit in evangelization. The theology of development was helped both by PAUL VI's encyclical Populorum progressio (1967), and by liberation theology, with its accompanying experience of basic ecclesial communities, that led to the statements of the Latin American Bishops at Medellin (1968) and Puebla (1979). The 1971 Synod of Bishops on Justice and Peace made an explicit link between the promotion of social justice and missionary work.

Yet another missiological legacy of Vatican II was INCULTURATION, the creative re-expression of the Gospel in forms proper to a culture, which results in the reinterpretation of both, without being unfaithful to either. Vatican II, following the lead given by JOHN XXIII in Princeps pastorum (1959) accepted the fact of cultural pluralism and began to draw the conclusions for missionary evangelization. The discussion was carried forward by the Bishops' Synod on Evangelization (1974) and by Paul VI's post-synodal exhortation EVANGELII NUNTIANDI (1975). This remarkable document proclaimed the necessity of evangelizing cultures and envisaged a communion of particular churches enriching one another in the fields of theology, catechesis, ecclesial structures, and ministries. The term "inculturation" surfaced at the Bishops' Synod on Catechesis (1977) and was popularized by Pedro ARRUPE SJ in his letter on the subject to the Society of Jesus (1978). Its first appearance in a papal document was in JOHN PAUL II's Catechesi tradendae (1979).

With the speeches, writings, and pastoral journeys of John Paul II, as well as the foundation of the PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR CULTURE in 1982, inculturation has become a theological commonplace, although Roman documents have tended to counsel caution and gradualism, and even to warn against doctrinal relativism and schism. By and large, Catholic theologians have preferred a discourse centered on "culture" and "inculturation," while theological circles connected with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES have been happier with "context" and "contextualization." "Context" is a vague term that nevertheless conveys a sense of comprehensiveness. "Culture" is more precise and serves the anthropological imperatives of evangelization.

John Paul II's Mission Encyclical. An important stage in missiological thinking was marked by John Paul II's encyclical REDEMPTORIS MISSIO (1990). A quarter of a century after Vatican II there were obvious anomalies in the mission paradigm represented by Ad gentes divinitus. The mission-sending churches of Europe were themselves in a state of "weakness or decline" and the balance of Christian world population had shifted to countries of the south. The geography of missionary recruitment had also changed in favor of the south, and there was a growing presence of lay missionaries. There was also a notable missionary resurgence of other world religions. The encyclical attempted to instill a sense of urgency for primary evangelization. Although it situates the Church's mission firmly in the missio Dei, the love and mercy of God, it cannot be denied that a strong emphasis on proclamation renders difficult the integration of dialogue in the missionary task.

The attempted reconciliation of opposites in the encyclical is a pointer to the paradigm shift that is taking place. The uneasy distinction between mission work and pastoral work is a case in point. Many, if not most, missionaries are engaged in cross-cultural pastoral work, and the missionary parish remains the foremost context for pioneering tasks, including both primary evangelization and interreligious dialogue. Another conflict is contained in the question: what makes people specialized missionaries? Is it their vocation to cross-cultural evangelization or is it simply the "mission" situation in which they find themselves? Although the encyclical tilts towards the latter, it does not adhere to the old geographical definition of "mission lands." There are new parameters of mission, new social phenomena, such as urbanization, communications media, international relations, the scientific community and youth culture. There are also new "paths of mission," including basic ecclesial communities, inculturation, dialogue, and development.

Finally, there is the discussion about the priority and methods of evangelizing those who are no longer Christian, as opposed to those who are not yet Christian. It would seem that the evangelization of post-Christians is the more difficult task. Moreover, John Paul II's concept of "New Evangelization" presupposes a flaw in the first evangelization. This idea has been received very positively in Latin America, and to some extent in Africa, where first evangelization was associated to a greater or lesser degree with colonial conquest. Redemptoris missio thus poses many new questions of missionary interpretation and strategy.

Missiology in the 21st Century. Mission is basically a question of faith and the practical shape taken by faith. It is fundamentally a spirituality or a religious conviction. As such, it is a "being" before becoming a "doing," but it is not a "being" without "doing." It is an active faith in the initiative taken by God, the missio Dei. Mission is born in the heart of God—God's loving dialogue with the world, through creation and redemption. God's project, God's "kingdom" or "reign," is the promotion of oneness between creatures and the Triune

Godhead, and evangelization ("mission" in the generalized sense) is the implementation of this project. The Church is the seed, the sign, and the chosen instrument of God's project, visibly inaugurated by Jesus Christ. However, the Church itself is not the project. The Church in every age, like mission, is an "unfinished house."

Since mission flows from the heart of God, it is clear that dialogue is basic to evangelization. God's Spirit of Love precedes the evangelist and there is no limit to the Spirit's freedom and activity in the world. The Church's own vocation is consonant with the activity of the Spirit. Salvation is offered to all in their otherness—in their human and cultural difference. This is expressed by Jesus in the Great Commandment of universal love. The dialogue of love is basic to mission, because, as John Henry Newman never tired of stressing, love is the parent of faith

God "wants all people to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tm. 2:4). The love of God therefore urges us to proclaim and to share our faith. This is the Great Commission to teach all nations and to make them disciples of Christ through Baptism. Proclamation of the Good News concerning Jesus Christ is an essential feature of evangelization. It is the naming of Jesus who is the mediator of salvation. It makes the truth known until it is fully known at the end of time. Proclamation is mainly verbal but it communicates Christian knowledge in non-verbal ways also, such as music, art, and dance.

Associated with proclamation is praxis or witness. This includes the mission to the poorest, development, liberation, social justice, and safeguarding the integrity of the environment. Prayer is the guarantee of proclamation, because mission is God's work in the communion of saints.

Types of evangelization are distinguished according to both personal/vocational and situational criteria. Since prayer is a basic component of evangelization, a religious in a contemplative community is also an evangelizer in a real sense. St. Thérèse of Lisieux, a contemplative, is Patron of Missions. Evangelization takes place in ordinary pastoral situations, that is to say, within relatively homogeneous contexts, from a cultural or social point of view. The pastoral evangelist is at home in the local culture, although the work may include the Christian initiation of adults and approaches to lapsed or former Catholics, as well as dialogue with other churches and other religious faiths.

Missionary evangelization involves crossing a human (cultural) frontier or entering new post-modern parameters of human life. Geographical distance is not the issue. It is enough to enter a situation that is "other" and to accept its evangelization priorities. Typically, though not necessarily, these include primary evangelization, which is the charism of many missionary societies. However, as Redemptoris Missio shows, while primary evangelization is an urgent task, the context of such pioneering work today is not necessarily a geographically based "pagan tribe" but includes other parameters of human life, as yet untouched by the Gospel. The emphasis today is more and more on entering the world of the poor and marginalized.

Essentially, however, mission is part of God's loving dialogue with humanity. Very rarely is this a "conference dialogue" of theological discussion with representatives of other faiths. More often, it is the dialogue of joint action for social justice or a dialogue of faith in which there is a mutual experiencing of worship and spiritual life. In Islamic countries and communities there are still missionaries who carry out the dialogue of life through their simple presence and silent witness.

MISSION, ARTICLES ON

In this encyclopedia, the two principal entries in this area are MISSION AND MISSIONS, which discusses the definition and nature of mission; and MISSIOLOGY, which surveys the multidisciplinary field of theology which studies the mission of the Church in all its aspects. The entries MISSION THEOLOGY and INCULTURATION, THEOLOGY OF treat the systematic, contextual and pastoral theologies of mission and evangelization. For treatment of the Church's task of mission and evangelization in the Code of Canon Law, see MISSION AND EVANGELIZATION IN CANON LAW; for papal teachings on this topic, see MISSION AND EVANGELIZATION, PAPAL WRITINGS ON.

The following three mission encyclicals have individual treatment: EVANGELII NUNTIANDI; REDEMPTORIS MISSIO; and SLAVORUM APOSTOLI.

MISSION HISTORY, a comprehensive three-part entry, discusses the general historical developments of Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant missionary endeavors. The four-part MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA, covering Spanish, Portuguese, French, and English missions, treats the historical developments of the early missionary endeavors in the Americas. MISSION IN POSTCOLONIAL LATIN AMERICA surveys the developments in missionary endeavors in Latin America in the era of independence from Spanish and Portuguese colonial rule. The following special treatments of individual aspects of mission history are provided: for Spanish and Portuguese colonial missions, see PATRONATO REAL; ALEXANDRINE BULLS; ENCO-MIENDA-DOCTRINA SYSTEM IN SPANISH AMERICA; REDUCTIONS OF PARAGUAY and LAS CASAS, BARTHOLOME DE. For aspects of Asian mission history, see CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY; INDIAN RITES CONTROVERSY; DIAM-PER, SYNOD OF; NOBILI; ROBERTO DE; RHODES, ALEXAN-DRE DE; RICCI, MATTEO and VALIGNANO, ALESSANDRO.

Biographical information on individual missionaries, founders of missionary societies, and missiologists are treated under their respective names. For the history of Propaganda Fide, the Vatican's curial agency responsible for mission and evangelization, from its inception to 1967, see PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, CONGREGATION FOR THE. Post-1967 developments are found in the entry EVANGELIZATION OF PEOPLES, CONGREGATION FOR THE. A related agency which assists the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples is PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, SOCIETY FOR THE. The following U.S. mission societies and agencies receive individual treatment in this encyclopedia: MARYKNOLL FATHERS AND BROTHERS; MARY-KNOLL SISTERS; MARYKNOLL MISSION ASSOCIATION OF THE FAITHFUL; MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF ST. JAMES THE APOSTLE; PAPAL VOLUNTEERS FOR LATIN AMERICA (PAVLA); UNITED STATES CATHOLIC MISSION ASSOCIA-TION; and AMERICAN SOCIETY OF MISSIOLOGY. International mission societies and agencies are treated under their respective names, e.g., PARIS FOREIGN MISSION SOCI-ETY; PONTIFICAL INSTITUTE FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS; CATHOLIC NEAR EAST WELFARE ASSOCIATION; and PON-TIFICAL MISSION FOR PALESTINE.

MISSION AND EVANGELIZATION, PAPAL WRITINGS ON

Early papal writings on mission and evangelization dealt with specific issues or opportunities, and were usually addressed to missionaries, mission superiors or rulers. The earliest such example is the famous letter of POPE GREGORY THE GREAT to St. Mellitus (d. 624), who was on his way to join St. Augustine in England. (Hist. Eccl. I, 30). This letter is remarkable for espousing a policy of graduality in the evangelization of the English people. Gregory the Great thought that while the idols were to be destroyed, their temples could be transformed for Christian worship, and their feasts could be replaced with feasts of Christian martyrs. In the Alexandrine Bulls, Pope ALEXANDER VI authorized the Portuguese and Spanish crowns to colonize the New World on the condition that they accepted the responsibility for converting its inhabitants to the Catholic Faith, thereby giving birth to the PATRONATO REAL. When the shortcomings of the Patronato could no longer be ignored, Pope GREGORY XV issued a papal bull, Inscrutabili Divinae, authorizing the formation of the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH (now known as the Congregation for the EVAN-GELIZATION OF PEOPLES). Important 18th-century papal documents with far-reaching missiological consequences include Ex illa die (CLEMENT XI) and Ex quo singulari (BENEDICT XIV) which prohibited the practice of Confucian ancestral veneration rituals by Chinese Catholic converts (see CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY). Other papal documents called for the abolition of slavery in mission lands and the release of slaves by their owners.

In the late 19th century, Pope LEO XIII wrote six major letters on mission and evangelization. His first letter, Sancta Dei civitas (Dec. 3, 1880), sought to modernize mission thinking by recalling the universality of mission. Two other apostolic letters, Humanae salutis (Sept. 1, 1886) and Ad extremas orientis plagas (June 23, 1893), dealt with the problem of missionary jurisdiction and indigenous clergy in India in the context of the centuries-old conflict between the Portuguese Padroado and Propaganda Fide. Two subsequent letters, In plurimis (May 8, 1888) and Catholicae ecclesiae (Nov. 20, 1890) dealt with the mission-related problem of slavery. In plurimis urged the Brazilian bishops to promote full abolition of slavery, while Catholicae ecclesiae was a letter supporting the campaign of Cardinal Charles LAVIGERIE and his Society of MISSIONARIES OF AFRICA (the White Fathers) to eliminate slavery in Africa. Finally, the sixth letter, Orientalium dignitas ecclesiarum (Nov 30, 1894), dealt with the mission to the Eastern Church.

The twentieth century witnessed the emergence of a systematic body of papal teachings on mission and evangelization, beginning with Maximum illud, the Apostolic Letter of Pope BENEDICT XV that was issued on Nov. 30, 1919. In this letter, Pope Benedict XV condemned missionary ethnocentrism and promoted the training of indigenous clergy in mission lands. He asserted that the chief aim of evangelization in mission lands was to make the missionary superfluous by training indigenous clergy for the eventual task of administering the local church.

As far as he was concerned, the indigenous priest was not to "be trained for the sole purpose of assisting foreign missionaries in a subordinate ministry, but he must be fitted for his divine task and rendered able one day to undertake with credit the administration of his own people."

Known as the "Pope of the Missions," Pope PIUS XI reminded everyone in his encyclical Rerum ecclesiae (Feb. 28, 1926) that the whole Church was responsible for the task of mission, a point that subsequent popes would emphasize. He called for renewed efforts at building a strong body of indigenous clergy. He also foresaw the eventual possibility of decolonization and pointed out that disaster would befall the Church "unless full provision has been made for the needs of the Christian populace by a network of native priests throughout the whole country." Underlying his call for indigenous clergy to play an important role in the task of evangelization in the mission lands was his belief in the fundamental equality between the foreign missionary and indigenous clergy. Pius XI is remembered for being the first pope who personally consecrated indigenous Chinese, Indian and Japanese bishops.

Of the ten letters on mission that Pope PIUS XII wrote, the most important is Evangelii praecones (June 2, 1951), issued on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of Pius XI's Rerum ecclesiae. Among other things, Pius XII adopted an approach to evangelization in mission lands that was reminiscent of Pope Gregory the Great in his letter to St. Mellitus. Reiterating a position which was first enunciated in his first encyclical, Summi pontificatus (Oct. 20, 1939), he suggested that "whatever there is in native customs that is not inseparably bound up with superstition and error will always receive kindly consideration and, where possible, will be preserved intact." As he explained: "let not the gospel, on being introduced into any new land, destroy or extinguish whatever its people possess that is naturally good, just or beautiful." Another important encyclical which Pius XII wrote was Fidei donum (April 21, 1957), which appealed to the universal Church to provide assistance to the missionary enterprise in Africa, a continent that was undergoing a painful transition toward political independence. Fidei donum also introduced the term "young churches" to describe the churches in mission lands.

In addition to the usual themes that his predecessors covered, e.g., the necessity of indigenous clergy to meet the challenges of decolonization, Pope JOHN XXIII's encyclical Princeps pastorum (Nov. 28, 1959) is remembered for laying the cornerstone for the Church's subsequent recognition of cultural diversity in her task of mission, asserting, among other things, that the Church "does not identify herself with any one culture to the exclusion of the rest—not even with European and Western culture, with which her history is so closely linked."

Among the various letters on mission and evangelization that Pope PAUL VI wrote, the Apostolic Exhortation on the occasion of the 1974 Synod of Bishops on Evangelization in the Modern World, EVANGELII NUNTIANDI (Dec. 8, 1975), stands out for its deeply profound reflection on the relationship between evangelization and culture. Here, Pope Paul VI emphasized the need to evangelize human culture and cultures. In his own words: "The rift between the gospel and culture is undoubtedly an unhappy circumstance of our times just as it has been in other eras. Accordingly we must devote all our resources and all our efforts to the sedulous evangelization of human culture, or rather of the various human cultures" (Evangelii nuntiandi 20). He warned against the facile reduction of evangelization to that of mere human liberation with its goal of material well-being (Evangelii nuntiandi 32). These discussions should be set in the context of Paul VI's criticism of certain quarters in the Church that were misusing conciliar teachings as arguments against the necessity of evangelization.

Pope JOHN PAUL II wrote significantly on the question of evangelization, beginning with the Apostolic Exhortation, Catechesi tradendae (Oct. 16, 1979). In Catechesi tradendae, he discussed the close relationship between inculturation, catechesis and evangelization, saying that inculturation "is called to bring the power of the Gospel into the very heart of culture and cultures" (Catechesi tradendae 53). Subsequently in his encyclical SLAVORUM APOSTOLI (June 2, 1985), he suggested that the work of evangelization that was carried out by SS. Cyril and Methodius "as pioneers in territory inhabited by Slav peoples—contains both a model of what today is called 'inculturation'—the incarnation of the gospel in native cultures—and also the introduction of these cultures into the life of the church" (Slavorum Apostoli 21). The most important missiological document of John Paul II is his encyclical, REDEMPTORIS MISSIO (Dec. 7, 1990), written to commemorate the 25th anniversary of Vatican II's Missionary Decree, Ad gentes. Here, John Paul II invited the Church to "renew her missionary commitment" (Redemptoris missio 2) and highlighted the necessity for three categories of evangelization: (i) evangelization of non-Christians (i.e., the mission ad gentes in the strict sense), (ii) pastoral care of the faithful, and (iii) the "reevangelization" or "new evangelization" of people "who no longer consider themselves members of the church and live a life far removed from Christ and his Gospel" (Redemptoris missio 33).

All post-Vatican II papal writings on mission and evangelization have drawn upon the profound theological insights of Vatican II documents Ad gentes, Lumen gentium, Gaudium et spes, and Nostra aetate to articulate a renewed theology of mission for today. At the heart of these papal writings is the call to the whole body of the Church to undertake the task of mission, not just the mission professionals. In the wake of the importance which Gaudium et spes and Ad gentes give to human cultures and communities, the scope of mission has broadened beyond merely effecting a "change of religion" in individuals to include transforming human cultures and communities in the light of the Gospel message.

MISSION AND EVANGELIZATION IN CANON LAW

The establishment of present day Catholic law and legal order concerned with the propagation of the Christian faith among non-Christian peoples historically dates from 1622 with the foundation of the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, now called the Congregation for the EVANGELIZATION OF PEOPLES. The twentieth-century movement from the principle of delegation to the principle of reservation underlies current change in the Catholic legal order. The change reflects a movement away from canon 1350, §2 of the 1917 Code of Canon Law (CIC) which accorded the responsibility for missionary activity exclusively with the Apostolic See. The Second Vatican Council marked the turning point for developing particular legislation whereby the Church can consider the realities of individual cultures to implement legal order and activities.

Catholic Church teaching expressed in Lumen Gentium, number 23 and Ad gentes, numbers 2, 35 and 39 of the Second Vatican Council grounded theology and pastoral directives in the 1983 CIC and the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (CCEO) which state that the work of evangelization is a fundamental duty of all the people of God, since "the whole Church is by its nature missionary" (CIC c. 781, and CCEO c. 584, §1). Missionary action implants the Church among peoples or groups where it has not yet taken root, especially by sending heralds of the gospel until the young churches have the proper resources and sufficient means to be able to carry out the work of evangelization themselves (CIC c. 786 and CCEO c. 590). The canon expresses the goal of missionary activity. The code devotes title II of Book III on the Teaching Function of the Church as well as specific eferences in Book II, The People of God, to meet the goal, that is, to set up structures to direct missionary activity and to regulate the missionary actions of individual church people.

Reflective of the hierarchical constitution of the people of God, the code structures the supreme direction and coordination of missionary endeavors for the entire Church to the Roman Pontiff and to the College of Bishops (CIC c. 782, §1). Conferences of bishops are charged, first, to regulate the steps necessary to enter the church (CIC c. 788, §3 and CCEO c. 587, §1, 3) and, secondly, to establish and promote works by which those who come to their territory from mission lands for study or work be received and assisted with adequate pastoral care (CIC c. 792). Individual bishops are to initiate, foster and sustain missionary endeavors in their own dioceses. Specifically, the diocesan bishop fosters missionary vocations and promotes cooperation in individual dioceses by prayer and financial support (CIC c. 782, §2; 385 and CCEO c.195 and CIC c. 791 and CCEO c. 585, §3). A diocesan bishop in the territory of a mission is to promote, direct, and coordinate missionary endeavors by forming agreements with those engaged in missionary work (CIC c. 790). In a particular church grouping organized as a territorial prelature (CIC c. 370 and CCEO, c. 311, §§1, and 312) or under an apostolic vicar (CIC c. 371), the 1983 code calls for a council of the mission (CIC c. 495, §2 and CCEO c. 264 and CIC c. 502, §4 and CCEO c. 271, §§1–5), at least three missionary presbyters who function as a presbyteral council and whose opinion the vicar or prefect apostolic is to hear in more serious matters, as for example the granting of dimissorial letters required by CIC c. 1018 or CCEO c. 1269 for the ordination of secular clergy within the grouping.

The carrying out of missionary work may be entrusted to natives or non-natives, whether secular clergy, members of either institutes of consecrated life or societies of apostolic actions, and lay members of the Christian faithful (CIC c. 784). Priests going to the missions, for example, are to learn the language of the region, and understand its institutions, social conditions, usages, and customs (CIC c. 257 and CCEO c. 352, §3). Members of institutes of consecrated life are to engage in missionary action in a special way and in a manner proper to their institute under the direction of the diocesan bishop (CIC c. 783). The Holy See in consultation with a conference of bishops can establish a personal prelature of priests and deacons to engage in missionary activity in accord with the prelature's statutes and the consent of the diocesan bishop where the activity takes place (CIC c. 294 and 297). Church law calls for catechists, trained lay members of the Christian faithful, duly instructed and outstanding in Christian life, to set forth the teaching of the gospel, to organize liturgies and works of charity under the direction of a missionary (CIC c. 785). Laity also have the duty to work so that the divine message of salvation becomes known, especially in "circumstances in which only through them can people hear the gospel and know Christ" (CIC c. 225, §1 and CCEO c. 401 & 406)

Missionary activity takes place in three stages. In the pre-catechumenate, the activities of missionaries establish by witness of word and their life a dialogue with those who do not believe in Christ so that in a manner adapted to their own temperament and culture, individuals come to understand the gospel and be admitted to receive baptism when they freely request it (CIC c. 787). Only dialogue brings into focus cultural distinctiveness and promotes that any decision to accept the faith is a free determination. The catechumenate begins when one makes known his or her intention to embrace the faith in Christ. Admitted in liturgical ceremonies, a formation program initiates catechumens into the mystery of salvation and introduces them into the life of the faith, the liturgy, the charity of the people of God, and the apostolate under the direction of a nation's conference of bishops (CIC c. 788 and CCEO 587, §1, 3). Finally, neophytes after their reception of baptism are to deepen their understanding of the faith and formed to fulfill the duties assumed at baptism (CIC c. 789).

MISSION AND MISSIONS

Mission, as a term describing the activity of Church members in the spread of the Gospel, is a relatively new term. In the 16th century IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA used the term "votum missionis" to describe the commitment and task of his members. Before that, a variety of words were used to describe this activity: propagation of the faith, conversion of the heathen, proclamation of the Good News to the whole world, conversion of unbelievers, planting the Church, extension of the Kingdom, etc.

It was only in the 19th century that missions (in the plural) became identified with the outreach of the Church to those who were not Christians and with the places where Christian communities were only starting or had not yet achieved the full structure of the Church. This word continued to be used to describe the Church's activity until the middle of the 20th century, when for various reasons the word mission began to replace missions.

Its Definition. Common definitions of mission encompass the following elements: mission begins in the life of God; the Church continues Christ's mission; mission is carried out under the guidance of the Spirit; the Church is missionary by her very nature; "foreign missions" is not a separate entity; mission expresses God's relationship with the world; and mission includes evangelization and bringing the Gospel to those who have never heard it.

Before Vatican II—From Missions to Mission. The activity of the Church in the 19th century in Africa, Asia, and the South Pacific prompted systematic theological reflection on missions at the beginning of the 20th century. This was true in both the Protestant and the Catholic Churches. Missionaries succeeded in making converts and establishing Christian communities. This suggested that they reflect on what they were doing and why and with what goal in mind.

Catholic mission theology from its formal start in 1911 until the time of World War II in the 1940s was dominated by three schools of thought. At Münster the school established and guided by Joseph SCHMIDLIN affirmed that the purpose of missions was to preach the Gospel to non-Christians. Therefore missions only existed in what were identified as non-Christian lands. At Louvain Pierre CHARLES, SJ, and his colleagues preferred to say that the goal of missions was to plant the Church. They saw missions as a transient stage and they would disappear when the Church was established. At Burgos Jose Zameza, SJ, and Olegario Dominguez, OP, took a less juridical approach; they spoke about missions as the way in which the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST grew. The French School of Andre Glorieux, Henri de LUBAC, and Alexandre Durand took a different approach. Their basis for mission work was not the salvation of individual souls but the collective salvation of humanity. Also they rooted mission in the mystery of the incarnation.

However, significant changes that would deeply influence Vatican II emerged after World War I. Edward Loffeld, CSSp, saw the European schools of thought converging. He spoke about the goal of missions as particular churches. Thomas Ohm, OSB, who filled the Chair at Münster once held by Schmidlin, emphasized that missions were about discipling the nations. He also suggested that missions must find their origin not in the Church but in the life of the Trinity.

The French also made important contributions. Jean DANIÉLOU, SJ, a church historian and patristics scholar, proposed the idea that God had made three covenants with humanity: through Noah, through Moses, and through Jesus. Thus he placed all religious history under God. He saw other religions as being simply human endeavors, while Judaism and Christianity were based on a revelation from God. He also was interested in the dynamics by which a Jewish movement became a gentile church. This led him to examine the mystery of the incarnation in terms of its cultural implications. He suggested that the Gospel must be incarnated in every culture, refracted as it were in the prism of every culture, before it would be fully understood.

Yves CONGAR, OP, in his earliest writings was concerned about ecumenism. But he also was interested in the mission (in the singular) of the Church. He suggested that mission is permanent (not transient) and coextensive with the life of the Church in the world (not just mission territories). For him mission had to be linked with the incarnation and with cultures. The Church, he said, would not know what it means to preach the Gospel to all peoples until it had done so.

The Worker-Priest Movement, also known as the Mission de France, began under the guidance of Cardinal SUHARD of Paris in the early 1940s in response to a study that showed that the working class of France had never been evangelized. A group of missionaries were formed who would become full-time workers, identify with the people in their style of life, and bring the Gospel to those who had not heard it. They realized that the parish itself must become a missionary institution. Mission was no longer the specialized calling of religious men and women going overseas to new cultures; it was the calling of the local Church as well. These ideas were not easily accepted by the traditional mission theologians and religious missionary congregations at that time.

Finally, the German Jesuit Karl RAHNER helped to bring about a changed understanding of mission and missions. In his attempt to explain that God wills the salvation of all peoples, he pointed out that God's will would be frustrated if salvation were limited to those who were baptized or who consciously knew and accepted Christ. Therefore, he talked of "anonymous Christians"—people who followed their consciences and lived a good life and were saved through Christ even if they did not know it. This changed not only the motivation for mission but also the approach to people of other faiths.

Vatican II—Ad gentes. The gathering of Bishops at Vatican II produced the most significant document on mission and missions of the 20th century. It almost did not happen. It was brought forward in the third session of the council. The bishops by that time were anxious about the amount of time that they were away from their dioceses. The drafting committee decided to reduce the decree to several proposals. Cardinal AGAGIANIAN, the prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, persuaded PAUL VI to make a personal appearance in support of the proposals to show his concern for the entire missionary movement. After Paul VI left the aula, one bishop after the other rose to speak against the proposals. They urged that in the current climate the Church needed not just a few proposals but a complete decree. A special commission was set up to work on this between the third and fourth sessions. John Schuette, SVD, the superior general of the Divine Word Missionaries, was appointed to chair the commission. Some of its members were: Dominic Grasso, SJ; Joseph Neuner, SJ; Yves Congar; and Joseph RATZINGER. They brought their decree to the Council floor early in the fourth session. It was approved, but certain changes were suggested. These were made and the revised document was again brought towards the end of the fourth session. It had almost universal acceptance.

The document, Ad gentes divinitus, as so many of the documents of Vatican II, is a compromise document. While the various European schools of mission theology argued to have their interpretation accepted as the official one, the commission decided not to choose between them but to take a both/and rather than an either/or position. It also decided to include the recent insights and outlook of Jean Daniélou, Yves Congar, Karl Rahner, and the Worker-Priest Movement. It introduced an element that had not been greatly present in the missiological literature before then: the value of Christian presence and witness as a missionary task. Finally, it incorporated the recommendation that a bishop of the Melkite Church made after the first reading of the decree: that the Church should reclaim the teaching of JUSTIN MARTYR about the "seeded Word of God."

Early in the document the Council Fathers indicated that the origin for mission and missions is found in the life of the Trinity: "The Church on earth is by its very nature missionary, since, according to the plan of the Father, it has its origin in the mission of the Son and the Holy Spirit." (AG, 2) The Father sends the Son; the Father and Son send the Spirit; and all three send the Church. The decree highlights the special role that the Holy Spirit plays, removing divisions and diversity and often anticipating the presence and activity of the missionary.

Jesus called the Apostles who became the foundation of the Church which is a sacrament of Christ's presence and saving love. It is the Church's mission, according to the decree, to make herself fully present to all people and nations. It is a continuing task and one which the Church must carry out in the same way that Christ carried out His mission: "the Church, urged on by the Spirit of Christ, must walk the road Christ himself walked, a way of poverty and obedience, of service and self-sacrifice even to death, from which He emerged victorious by his resurrection' (AG, 5).

After pointing out the origin of mission and missions, the decree describes the difference between them. The mission of the Church, it is said, is one and the same everywhere, although circumstances may demand different approaches. However, "the special undertakings in which preachers of the Gospel, sent by the Church and going into the whole world, carry out the work of preaching the Gospel and implanting the Church among people who do not yet believe in Christ, are generally called 'missions.'" (AG,4) This distinction was insisted upon by missionary congregations who wanted to distinguish their work from that being done in the West, such as the Mission de France. While this distinction has been maintained by certain missionary groups and was even reinforced by the papal encyclical of John Paul II, Redemptoris missio, for the most part it has disappeared from the writings of most mission scholars. An opening was given to this in the document itself when it recognized not only that an established and fully mature Church and a mission situation can exist side by side but also that missionary activity can be reinstated because of changed circumstances and that the missionary activity might be reduced to presence and service.

The decree sees the missionary task as a three-fold one: bearing Christian witness; preaching the Gospel and gathering God's people; and forming the Christian community. Missionaries had traditionally cared for the poor and afflicted. Schools, clinics, and hospitals had been established; famine relief was organized. They did this both for their Christians and to attract new converts. This was often seen as pre-evangelization. The decree insists that if it is true charity it must extend to all without distinction of race, social condition, or religion. (AG, 12) Moreover, charity must never be used to entice people to conversion. (AG, 13) In doing this, Catholics need not set up their own projects, but should be willing to cooperate with public and private organizations, with international agencies, with various Christian communities, and even with non-Christian religions. (AG, 12) Missionaries must have a concern for the development of peoples, even if they cannot preach Christ; since "in teaching the religious and moral truths, which Christ illumined with his light, they seek to enhance the dignity of men and promote fraternal unity, and, in this way, are gradually opening a wider approach to God." (AG, 12) Interestingly, in addressing this topic the decree began with the role of the new converts rather than that of the foreign missionaries. To give this witness they must be members of the group among whom they live, sharing in their cultural and social life (AG, 11).

The second missionary task, according to the decree, is to preach the Gospel and gather God's people, an example of the Commission's approach, combining the concerns of the Münster and Louvain schools of thought rather than choosing between them. From the start the decree points out that the missionary might announce the Gospel, but it is the Holy Spirit, which opens hearts, that leads to conversion. The decree recognizes that conversion is a gradual process and at times demands a painful breaking of ties. It brings a progressive change of outlook and morals that is developed during the time of the catechumenate. (AG, 13) These should be established everywhere. The liturgy is to play an important role in it with a special emphasis put on Lent and Easter (AG, 14).

The third missionary task is forming the Christian community. There is a great emphasis on the role the laity in these congregations plays in the mission of the Church by being part of the local scene. Congregations are enriched by their nation's culture and are truly one with the people. This new community is to be ecumenical in the broadest sense of the term. Not only is it to recognize that others who believe in Christ are Christ's disciples, but also to the extent that its beliefs are common, it is to make before the nations a common profession of faith in God and in Jesus Christ (AG, 15).

The formation of the Christian community also means raising up priests from their own community. The decree also recommends the restoration of the diaconate on the grounds that there are men who are already carrying out that ministry and would be strengthened by the laying on of hands. (AG, 16) This creative idea has not stimulated much of a response in the former mission territories, although it has been taken up by many churches in the West. Religious life is also to be encouraged, but according to the nature and the genius of the country.

The decree has a special chapter on particular churches. Much is a repetition of what was said in the part about forming the Christian community, but it was the "missionary bishops" who insisted that there be such a chapter. There are two emphases in this chapter: that the local congregation from the start should participate in the mission of the universal Church, and that the particular church is such because of the uniqueness of its culture.

The particular church is expected to engage in mission through its witness since it is to mirror the universal Church. It is sent to those also who live in the same territory and who do not yet believe in Christ. They do this by the living witness of each one of the faithful and of the whole community. (AG, 20) Special consideration is to be given to those who for some reason are not able to join the community just then. The decree recognizes that in certain regions, groups of people are found who are kept away from embracing the Catholic faith because they cannot adapt themselves to the peculiar form the Church has taken on there. In that case the decree urges "that this situation should be specially provided for, until all Christians can gather together in one community" (AG, 20).

What makes the particular Church particular is the local culture. Therefore this missionary task of witness is to be carried out in a way that is relevant to the local culture and local politics. The decree urges that Christians give expression to their newness of life in the social and cultural framework of their own homeland and according to their own national traditions. They are not only to be acquainted with their culture, but also to heal and preserve it. Thus "the faith of Christ and the life of the Church will not be something foreign to the society in which they live, but will begin to transform and permeate it." (AG, 21) The decree foresees that the Church, following the model of the incarnation, will be enriched by these cultures. They will take to themselves in a wonderful exchange the riches of the nations which were given to Christ as an inheritance. From the customs and traditions of their people, from their wisdom and their learning, from their arts and sciences, these Churches will borrow those things which contribute to the glory of their Creator, the revelation of the Savior's grace, or the proper arrangement of Christian life (AG, 22).

The decree also has a chapter on the missionary vocation that reaffirms the value of a lifetime commitment to mission and a chapter on missionary cooperation that describes the possible role that the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith might play in the future.

Vatican II—Nostra aetate. Another decree that has had a profound effect on missionaries and the missionary task is Nostra aetate: Declaration on the Relation of the Church to Non-Christian Religions. This, too, was a decree that almost did not happen. At the very outset of the Council John XXIII asked that a statement on the Jews should be included in the Council's deliberations; he was anxious to have the charge of "deicide" removed. At first it was made part of the decree on Ecumenism and then on Religious Liberty. But John XXIII, as well as several bishops, wanted a separate decree; this was decided upon as early as Nov. 19, 1963.

The document was drafted under the leadership of Cardinal BEA between the second and third session. The document brought to the Fathers of the Council was different from that which had been leaked to the press, and there was a great outcry. There were several serious concerns. The four Eastern Patriarchs and the bishops coming from Arab lands favored no statement at all for fear that it might be interpreted politically. Many bishops were opposed even to using the word "deicide," which in the end did not appear in the document. The question was raised about asking the Jews and Muslims forgiveness for past offenses. Finally, it was thought that the decree should also refer to the Muslims and people of African religions as well. However, when the final version of the document was brought to the Council on Oct. 28, 1965, it received overwhelming approval.

The decree first refers to Hinduism, Buddhism, and other religions, and it affirms that the Church "rejects nothing of what is true and holy in these religions." She "looks with sincere respect" on them since they "often reflect a ray of that Truth which enlightens all men." Therefore, it exhorts the Church to "enter with prudence and charity into discussion and collaboration with members of other religions. Let Christians, while witnessing to their own faith and way of life, acknowledge, preserve and encourage the spiritual and moral truths found among non-Christians, also their social life and culture" (NA, 2).

There is a special section on the Muslims. The decree states that the Church has a high regard for them for several reasons: they adore the One God; they submit whole-heartedly to God; they acknowledge Jesus as a prophet; they honor Mary; they prize moral living; and they worship God through prayer, almsgiving, and fasting. It urges "all to forget the past" and that "a sincere effort be made to achieve mutual understanding." Also they are called on to make common cause in safeguarding and fostering social justice, moral values, peace and freedom (NA, 3).

But the longest section of the decree deals with the Jews. After pointing out the common heritage of Christians and Jews and reminding its readers that Jesus and the Apostles were Jews, the decree states clearly that the covenant that God has with the Jews is still valid; as Paul argued: "the Jews still remain most dear to God because of the patriarchs, since God does not take back the gifts He bestowed or the choice He made." (NA, 4) The decree talks about the role that Jews played in the death of Christ, but states clearly that "neither all Jews indiscriminately at that time, nor Jews today, can be charged with the crimes committed during the passion. It is true that the Church is the new people of God, yet the Jews should not be spoken of as rejected or accursed, as if this followed from holy Scripture" (NA, 4).

The decree concludes with a strong statement on discrimination. It states that there is no basis for discrimination either in theory or in practice, and therefore the "Church rejects . . . any discrimination against men or harassment of them because of their race, color, condition of life, or religion" (NA, 5).

A Changed Situation. While the Council was in session, the situation in former mission lands was changing rapidly. Almost all the former colonies which had not yet become independent became new nation-states. The Church also changed. Vicariates apostolic became dioceses, and vicars apostolic became ordinaries. Bishops' Conferences developed in the new nations and sometimes across regions; leadership posts were filled by indigenous people. Some countries closed their doors to foreign missionaries.

Changes also took place in the structures of mission work. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith became the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples. With the establishment of national hierarchies its role became more one of coordination than supervision, although it has continued to play an important role in the choice of new bishops in the former mission lands. The end of "ius commissionis" in 1966 meant that the territories would no longer "belong" to a particular mission congregation. Bishops were free to invite any congregations they wished as co-workers.

Development of New Mission Theories. Ad gentes had summarized the theories about mission and missions that had taken place in the 20th century before and leading up to Vatican II. But it had also introduced some new ideas that would be explored and embraced in the subsequent decades of the 20th century. It had affirmed that witness and development work were not just preevangelization; they were part of the missionary task itself. It had also introduced the phrase "the seeded Word of God," spoke forthrightly about the respect that must be shown to all other religions and called for dialogue, and had urged that local cultures be respected and embraced so that the Church itself could become more local. These ideas demanded discussion, elaboration, and clarification.

Some of this took place in the Church synods, such as that in 1974 on evangelization, which resulted in the encyclical of Paul VI: Evangelii nuntiandi. Major guidance has also been given through papal encyclicals such as John Paul II's Redemptoris missio. The Secretariat for Non-Christian Religions (the name was later changed to the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue) was set up by Paul VI in 1964 and has provided documents and guidelines for this aspect of the missionary task. Bishops' Conferences, like CELAM (the Latin American Bishops' Conference) and FABC (the FEDERATION OF ASIAN BISHOPS' CONFERENCES), have addressed the missionary task in their part of the world. Finally, theologians, individually and through missionary associations, such as the International Association for Mission Studies, American Society of Missiology, and the many national associations, continue to further thought on the missionary task. A very significant meeting has been the gathering in Italy of scholars from around the world almost every ten years for Seminars organized by SEDOS.

Witness—Development—Liberation—Ecology.

The Church has had a long history of carrying out corporal works of mercy. It was often seen as a way of making converts or as pre-evangelization. But the decree Ad gentes said that the Church must be concerned about the development of people even when there was no hope of preaching the Gospel. This idea was given great impetus by Paul VI's encyclical Populorum progressio "On the Progress of Peoples", published in 1967. Some of the characteristics of development that were urged by the pope were: the human person and the respect for his or her dignity must be the basis for development and ought to determine its approach; the Church must look to the improvement of the whole person, body and soul; the Church must be concerned to improve the whole world, not just Christians; and such development tasks should be done in conjunction with local governments and national agencies. The United Nations had declared the 1960s to be the decade for development, and so missionaries were quick to take up the suggestions of Vatican II and Paul VI.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s not only were missionaries deeply involved in development work but also mission theologians were reflecting on its meaning. Some suggested that development was the new name for mission. Books with titles such as Theology of Development or something similar appeared. A SEDOS seminar in March of 1969 addressed the topic of development and evangelization. It recognized that there could be a tension between missionaries who saw evangelization and those who saw development as a priority. The SEDOS seminar, building on the documents of Vatican II, affirmed that work undertaken to further the integral development of peoples is a means of evangelization. It was a living and eloquent witness of the lordship of Christ over the world. Even when this witness could not be complemented by the word, development still retained a missionary significance.

At the synod of 1974 on evangelization, the question of human promotion and its relation to evangelization was once more examined. Paul VI was asked to write the conclusions of the synod. This he did in Evangelii nuntiandi. While reaffirming the priority of verbal evangelization he recognized the validity of development work as a missionary task even in situations where the Gospel could not be preached.

Paul VI's Populorum progressio was written primarily with Latin America in mind. But events had overtaken theory. The bishops of Latin America (CELAM) met in Medellin, Colombia, in 1968. After experiencing a decade of development they found that there were more poor than at the beginning of the decade and that the gap between the rich and the poor had widened. They also decided that since the overwhelming majority of their Catholics were the poor they must make an option for them. As Gustavo Gutierrez, a parish priest in Lima and the father of Liberation Theology, would say: development had not worked for Latin America; what was needed was liberation from oppressive economic structures.

By the late 1980s missionaries and mission theologians realized that if they were truly concerned about the development of peoples they must also be concerned about the universe and the environment. National and international meetings of missiologists began to make this not only an item on the program but often its entire focus.

Interreligious Dialogue. The decrees of Vatican II raised new questions about other faiths and the Church's attitude toward them. Both Lumen gentium and Ad gentes made it clear that salvation is possible for all, even those who have never heard of Christ. But, it was asked, does this mean that people can be saved in their religions, even if not through them? The magisterium as articulated in documents such as John Paul II's Redemptoris missio insists that Jesus Christ is the only Savior given to humankind; but it does not say how this relates to the teaching of Vatican II about salvation being possible for all. A second issue is the question of revelation. Nostra aetate, Redemptoris missio, and Dialogue and Proclamation (published jointly by the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples and the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue in 1991) all talk about the "seeds of the Word of God" present in other religions, but they have not yet explained what this means in the concrete situation. It does establish a basis for respect for the other religions; but does it mean that these religions have received a revelation? This issue is more than a theoretical, albeit lively, topic of discussion among missiologists; it has farreaching ramifications on relations between the Church and other religions.

Paul VI, even before Nostra aetate had been accepted by the Council, had established a Secretariat for Non-Christian Religions. Its purpose was to promote studies of the various religions and activities such as cooperation and dialogue. The Church in Asia, which is a minority living in the midst of other living faiths, has responded enthusiastically to this call for dialogue. At first the dialogue was undertaken at the level of theological exchange for the sake of mutual understanding. But as time passed the Church also took part in the other forms of dialogue: of life—where Catholics shared a common social or political life with peoples of other faiths; of action—where Catholics and people of other faiths formed basic human communities to work for development and/or change of oppressive structures; and of religious experience—where monks, nuns, and religious people of various faiths came together to pray and exchange their deeply religious experiences.

Theologians have attempted to address some of the questions that interreligious dialogue raises. The SEDOS Seminar of 1969 stated clearly that although non-Christian religions could not be seen as ways of salvation their authentic values could lead their followers to the act of faith and charity which is necessary for salvation.

Paul VI, in Evangelii nuntiandi, did not address the topic of interreligious dialogue. But he did say of the other living faiths that since these religions "are the living experience of the soul of vast groups of people" searching for God in an incomplete way but with "great sincerity and righteousness of heart," they are to be respected and esteemed. "They are all impregnated with innumerable 'seeds of the Word.'" (EN, 53) However, John Paul II has led the way in interreligious dialogue both in action and in word. His visit to the Synagogue in Rome, his meetings with Jewish leaders, and his visit to Israel have furthered the dialogue with the Jews. His invitation to the religious leaders of the world to join him in prayer for peace at Assisi in 1986 was a landmark event that initiated a new practice that he continued to pursue. Notable, too, was his decision to enter and pray in a mosque during his visit to Syria in May of 2001, another first for any pope. His writings also, especially *Redemp*tor hominis, Dominum et vivificantem, and Redemptoris missio, have not only encouraged interreligious dialogue but have also articulated a theological basis for interreligious dialogue.

Inculturation. The decree Ad gentes emphasized the role of culture even though it did not use the term inculturation. It stated that Christians (and the Church) must be at home in their own cultures. It even used the analogy of the incarnation. The chapter on particular churches gives the impression that the identity and relative autonomy of particular Churches is bound up with culture.

In the letter Evangelii nuntiandi, Paul VI offers a theology of a multicultural Church. He writes: "What matters is to evangelize people's culture and cultures (not in a purely decorative way as it were by applying a thin veneer, but in a vital way, in depth and right to the very roots), in the wide and rich sense which these terms have in Gaudium et spes, always taking the person as one's starting point and always coming back to the relationships of people among themselves and with God" (EN, 20).

It was in the Synod on Catechesis in 1977 that the term "inculturation" was brought into ecclesiastical discussion by Pedro Arrupe, SJ. The following year John Paul II used it for the first time in a Roman document, calling it a "neologism" but stating that it expressed well one factor of the great mystery of the incarnation. When he set up the Pontifical Council for Culture in May of 1982, he said that the synthesis between culture and faith is a demand of both culture and faith. A faith that does not become a culture, he maintained, is a faith that has not been fully received, not thoroughly thought through, not fully lived out.

No More Missions or Mission Lands. In the decades that followed Vatican II missionaries, mission agencies, and mission theorists, with a few exceptions, have stopped talking about missions or mission lands. The emphasis is on the mission of the Church that is one and the same everywhere. Mission is recognized to be as necessary and alive in North America and Europe as in Asia and Africa. It is no longer mission agencies in Europe and North America that determine the missionary task to be carried out elsewhere; it is the local Church of the area, a local Church that is for the most part in the hands of local people.

MISSION HELPERS OF THE SACRED HEART

A religious community of women founded by Mother M. Demetrias in Baltimore, Md., in 1890 and dedicated to the work of catechetics and religious instruction (MHSH, Official Catholic Directory #2720). The congregation was raised to pontifical status in 1949. From the beginning, the sisters combined regular home visiting with the organization of catechetical classes. As missionaries and religion teachers, they continued through the years to go out from their convents to surrounding areas, pioneering in any undertaking that assists bishops and pastors to implement religious education in their dioceses and parishes. Their varied activities have included the initiation and promotion of schools of religion, home instruction programs, special education for the handicapped, and youth ministries. The motherhouse in Baltimore remains the educational center where the work is constantly evaluated and coordinated.

MISSION HISTORY, I: CATHOLIC

Encountering the People of the Roman Empire & Its Neighbors. The second and third century Christian communities were for the most part around the Mediterranean basin. Some claimed an apostolic foundation; others simply appeared. From these communities came apostolic preachers who wandered from town to town, staying two or three days. For the most part their names are unknown; but there were many. According to CELSUS, an opponent of Christianity, the gospel was spread also by women and slaves through ordinary conversation.

Celsus stated that the Gospel would only be accepted by women, slaves, and unlearned people. However, evidence shows that Christian converts came from all classes—Roman gentility, learned philosophers, civil servants, and slaves. By the end of the second century few Jewish people were becoming Christians. People were attracted by the salvation promised and the divine philosophy being taught. For this reason teachers such as Justin, Clement, and Origen are often listed as missionaries. There are also cases where healings and other works of power had an impact, as with Gregory Thaumaturgus in Pontus. Within the empire the evangelization was done in the cities; the people in the countryside (the pagani) would not be christianized until the fourth century.

Christian communities also developed outside the Roman Empire. The community in Edessa developed very early in post-apostolic times with some indications that Christianity was made a state religion, although most historians say this is doubtful. However, there is evidence that when GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR brought the Gospel to Armenia with the support of King Trdat (TIRIDATES III, 298–330) a strong link was forged between the state, Armenian culture, and Christianity.

With CONSTANTINE's conversion and the toleration granted Christianity, the situation changed. The last group to withstand Christianity within the cities was the aristocratic class. The nobles would not abandon their traditional gods, but they married Christian women and allowed their sons to be Christians. Once Christianity became the ordinary religion of the urban citizens, group pressure played a role in Christianity's spread.

The development of monasticism in the fourth century played an important part in the evangelization of the "pagani." The monks' purpose in moving into rural areas was to pursue an ascetic ideal, but they also evangelized. Martin of Tours, after becoming bishop, undertook an active campaign with his monks to bring the Gospel to the countryside.

Outside the Roman Empire, Christianity attracted many adherents. In some cases, it was brought by ship-wrecked Romans, e.g., Aedesius and Frumentius, who brought Christianity to Ethiopia. In other cases, it was a miracle by a slave girl that would convert the king and his kingdom, as happened in Georgia with St. Nina, or it was the influence and charismatic preaching of a particular person, as with Patrick in Ireland.

Encountering the New Peoples of Europe. From the end of the fourth century the Church encountered new peoples who had come into the empire. Some were already Christian, such as the Visigoths; but they were Arian Christians. Others had not encountered Christianity until their arrival within the Roman Empire, such as the Huns, Vandals, and Franks. These tribes for the most part settled in the countryside and left the cities to the Roman citizens. The Bishops of these towns set about to convert them.

The bishops developed a pattern of focusing on the conversion of the chiefs (in some instances called kings). They always looked for "another Constantine." For this reason the names of individual bishops are tied with the peoples converted: MARTIN OF BRAGA with the Suevi, ISI-DORE and LEANDER OF SEVILLE with the Visigoths, Avitus of Vienne with the Burgundians, GREGORY THE GREAT with the Longobards. The conversion of CLOVIS as given to us in the History of the Franks by GREGORY OF TOURS is illustrative.

Over 150 years, the Germanic tribes were evangelized and baptized; but much remained to make them truly Christian and to bring organization to their local Churches. The first task was carried out by the Irish monks. Their primary motive for leaving home was not to bring the faith to unbelievers but to perform an act of asceticism: to leave home and wander for the sake of Christ (peregrinatio pro Christo). Their attitude toward their neighbors differed according to the people they encountered. COLUMBA and his followers awed the Picts in Scotland with their spiritual power and mysterious rituals; CUTHBERT and his monks on the east coast of England gently instructed the shepherds in the hills; Columbanus and his monks brutally attacked the pagan shrines of the Franks, who were Christians only in name, and scolded them until they trembled.

While the Irish monks deepened the faith of the Germanic tribes, the Benedictine monks brought organization. Just as the mission of AUGUSTINE to evangelize the Angles had originated in Rome with Gregory the Great, so the Benedictine Wynfrith (BONIFACE) first went to Rome before going to the Saxons on the continent. Rome directed him first to the Church in the Frankish Kingdom, which needed organization and reform. This he proceeded to do, but always under the direction of Rome. Although martyred in 752 by the Saxons, his principal missionary task had been to bring order and organization to the Frankish Church.

Mission in the High Middle Ages. Between the 800s and the 1300s there were three principal ways in which new peoples were evangelized: the sword, diplomacy, and a gentle presence (the approach of the mendicants).

CHARLEMAGNE wanted to extend his kingdom and include the Saxon people. However it was believed that a Christian king could rule only over a Christian people, and so baptism under pain of death was forced on them.

The sword was also used in the encounter of non-Christian peoples in Crusades from the tenth to the fourteenth century. In its initial phase in Spain, its purpose was to defeat the non-Christians (Muslims and Jews) in order to establish a Christian kingdom. Once defeated, they had the choice of being baptized or leaving the country. The Crusades to the Middle East in the eleventh and twelfth centuries were intended to recover the Holy Places from the Muslims in order to protect pilgrims and to establish Latin Christian states. Once the Christian state was established people again had the choice of being baptized or leaving. The final Crusades in the twelfth to the fourteenth century against the peoples to the north and east of the Holy Roman Empire were intended to subjugate peoples and enforce baptism. The evangelization of these peoples was left to the Cistercians and Premonstratensians in the twelfth century and the Franciscans and Dominicans in the thirteenth century.

Mission to new peoples during this time was also attempted on rare occasions by diplomacy. Anskar (801-865), after Louis the Pious's failure to impose baptism on the Danes with the sword, 30 years later, through diplomatic channels, was able to establish Christian communities among them. In Moravia the Church in Byzantium also used the diplomatic approach. The German priests and bishops who had come from the West were not successful in evangelizing the people. However, Constantine (826-869), Cyril, and Methodius (c. 815-885), who were sent as diplomats from the East, proved to have great success. Constantine had developed an alphabet for the Moravian language, and they arrived with the Scriptures and the liturgical books in the Moravian language. After Cyril's death and Constantine's expulsion by the Germans their evangelization by diplomacy was ended.

The third approach was that of the mendicants—a gentle presence. FRANCIS OF ASSISI (1181/2–1224) met with Sultan al-Kamil in 1219 and obtained personal freedom to preach Christianity. But the Friars he sent to Morocco in 1220 and to Tunis in 1225 were all killed. It was written into the Franciscan rule that the Friars can choose to live among Muslims as servants without preaching or can preach knowing that they risk martyrdom. The Dominicans, realizing the importance of language, established schools for this in the Holy Land already in 1237.

The mendicants also evangelized the Mongols, adapting to their nomadic way of life. The Popes also used them on diplomatic missions to the Khans, but with no lasting results. When the Polo brothers returned from China with a letter from the Great Khan Kublai (1260–1294) asking for missionaries, the Popes responded. JOHN OF MONTECORVINO, OFM, reached Beijing, and because of his success was made archbishop in 1307. At the time of his death in 1328 there were 30,000 Christians in China.

Encountering New Peoples Outside Europe. Columbus, under the patronage of Spain, found people on the other side of the world who were not Christian. Since in the 1440s the Pope had given all the lands and islands they would discover to the Portuguese, the Spaniards also sought papal approval to claim the lands they found. In 1493/4, by the Treaty of Tordesillas, ALEXANDER VI drew a line of demarcation, and all lands and islands to the east of it were to belong to Portugal and to the West to Spain. This paved the way for the establishment of the PATRONATO REAL or patronage system of missionary activity, whereby the Spanish and Portuguese Crowns were also responsible for the evangelization of these peoples, the providing of missionaries, and the governance of the Church.

The political conquest of the Caribbean Islands, Mexico, and Peru was rapid; it was completed by 1535. The acceptance of Christianity by the conquered people took longer. The Spanish ships that arrived brought not only conquistadors and settlers, but also Franciscans, Dominicans, Augustinians, Augustinian Recollects, and later Jesuits.

There were some outstanding individual preachers who evangelized these new peoples; however, most was done by communities of friars. Their attitude towards the religions of the native peoples was that everything had to be destroyed. The people were to be made a "tabula rasa," a clean slate on which Christianity could be inscribed. They built their "conventos," gathered the people around them, taught them farming, and set up schools in which they taught Latin, the industrial arts, music, etc. The natives were quickly converted to Christianity, especially after the appearance of Our Lady of GUADALUPE in 1531.

The Jesuits who began work among the Guarani people received permission to set up REDUCTIONS in 1608. Eventually, there were more than 30 of them, with more than 100,000 natives. The Jesuits brought them together to protect them from the Spaniards and Portuguese. The remains of their Churches and their music attest to a deep faith.

From Mexico the Spanish evangelized the Philippines. It was the same religious communities who had come to Mexico. They divided the territory between themselves. Since there were few settlers who came along, the friars were free to evangelize and were quickly successful. They also became the civil servants for Spain.

While some evangelization was done along the African coast under the Portuguese Patronage, the principal work was done in the Far East. Christianity had been present in India at least since the fourth century, possibly since Thomas the Apostle. The arrival of the Portuguese in GOA brought Western Christians in contact and at times in conflict with these St. Thomas Christians. Francis XAVIER (1506–1552) arrived in India in 1542 and worked for several years among the people on the Fisheries Coast.

In 1549, having heard about the Japanese, Francis went to open a mission there. He found that to get a hearing he would have to respect their culture and their religion. After he left for China his missionary principles were carried on by Alessandro VALIGNANO, SJ, and led to what is known as the "Christian Century" in Japan.

In the Jesuit mission in southeast India, Roberto de NOBILI (1577–1656) decided to identify himself with the Brahmins and to live by the strict rules of a sannyasi ascetic. He met with opposition from the Hindus, his own confreres, and Church leaders. He had some success, but in the end there was no one to take his place.

Matteo RICCI, SJ (1552–1610), entered China in 1582. He learned the language and culture exceptionally well. He made adaptations in the use of language and the manner of celebrating the sacraments, and continued to allow his converts to venerate Confucius and their ancestors. These rites would become the source of bitter controversy.

While the Kings of Spain and Portugal were responsible for the missions under their patronage, it was the business community that supported the French missions to North America. Seculars, Recollects, and Jesuits all came, as did lay men and, for the first time, Religious women.

Re-Structuring the Activity. The decline of missionaries available, especially for the Patronato Real system, and the centralizing process that was going on in Rome, resulted in the establishment of the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH on Jan. 6, 1622. Its object was to help souls that were "off the true path of salvation" because of schism, heresy, or unbelief. The first Secretary, Francesco Ingoli (1622–1649), worked to appoint secular priests as Vicars Apostolic, to recruit diocesan clergy for its mission, and to develop an indigenous clergy.

A Decline in the Activity. The eighteenth century saw a decline in missionary activity. Two major causes of this were the Rites controversy and the suppression of the Jesuits.

The CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY and the INDIAN RITES CONTROVERSY arose from the practices which Matteo Ricci and Roberto de Nobili respectively allowed their new Christians. The denunciation of these to Rome in 1645 began a century-long conflict. Condemnations were made, withdrawn, and then made again. In 1742 Benedict XIV condemned the Rites.

The suppression of the Jesuits came about not because of corruption or laxity but because they had many enemies, especially among the Jansenists and the enlightened philosophers and rulers of the day. In 1758 they were suppressed in Portugal and all its possessions; in 1762 in France and all its possessions; in 1767 in Spain and all its possessions; and in 1773 in the Catholic world by the decree of Clement XIV.

The Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Century Missionary Revival. During the time of the French Napoleonic Wars Europe was too disorganized to send missionaries, and the entire movement almost came to a halt. But after 1815 a missionary outreach from Europe and then later North America began that would remain vital up to and immediately after World War II. The story of the individuals and groups who went out and the people they encountered is fascinating, but here only a few characteristics of this revival can be described.

The revival was Rome-directed and Rome-supported. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith played the role intended for it at its founding. It defined boundaries of the Vicariates, assigned territories to Religious orders, appointed Vicars Apostolic, and collected information. Also the Popes played a direct role in giving support to missionaries (e.g. Gregory XVI, Pius IX) and later gave direction to the work through mission encyclicals (e.g. Pius XI, Pius XII).

Catholic missionary endeavors were no longer supported by the generosity of the royalty or rich merchants but by the Catholic faithful. The Society for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH was founded by Pauline Jaricot in France in 1822. In Austria the Leopolidinenstiftung, in Bavaria the LUDWIG MISSIONSVEREIN, and in Aachen the Xaveriusverein were all established in the 1840s. There were many other support agencies as well.

Their activity was challenged by Protestant Missionary Societies, especially from England, Germany, and the United States of America. At times the presence of Catholic and Protestant Missionary Societies in the same area provoked conflict (e.g. Uganda), at times competition (e.g. New Guinea), and at times cooperation (e.g. Gambia). The revival was fed by many new missionary societies founded in all the European and North American countries. These were not only clerical religious but also Brothers' and Sisters' congregations. Mission work now included education, health care, and social services.

Finally, the revival for the most part formed friendly relations with the imperial powers. Often there was close collaboration with political protectorates (e.g. Indochina) as well as religious protectorates (e.g. China). Missionaries expected their governments to negotiate for freedom of religion (e.g. Siam and Japan) so they could evangelize. In the colonies they tended to collaborate with the colonial powers in carrying out their aims (e.g. ending slave trade) although they would object at times to oppression (e.g. the hut-tax in East Africa).

Because of these factors the nineteenth and early twentieth century Catholic missionaries took on certain characteristics. They tended to be highly nationalistic and concerned about the imperial interests of their home government. They came for the most part from the conservative, devotional stream of Catholicism and would propagate these devotions and be ultramontane in sentiment and actions. They also would be reluctant to adapt to other cultures.

The Post-Colonial World. World War II and its aftermath left the world in a different situation as far as missions were concerned. Many of the former colonies claimed independence right after the war, and by the 1960s most of them had attained it. Often these nationalistic movements were tied to ancient religious and/or cultural revivals. Vatican II (1962–1965) also brought about a sea-change both in attitude and practice in what had been mission countries.

These changes in politics and in church life demanded changes in the missionary life of the Church as well. Indigenous leadership emerged; it took control of mission in its own lands. The removal of "ius commissionis" meant that territories no longer belonged to specific religious congregations but to local bishops. Bishops' Conferences began to give guidance to and coordinate the activity of Churches in their part of the world. While evangelization was still emphasized, there was a strong emphasis on development, liberation, dialogue with other religions, and inculturation as well. All of this has opened a new phase in the Church's mission history.

MISSION HISTORY, II: ORTHODOX

From the Eastern Mediterranean the gospel spread throughout the Roman Empire. Before Byzantium and Rome separated in 1054, both had evangelized, and both had success in their own spheres of influence. There were divisions in the Eastern Church before 1054 so that not all the missionary work done in the East can be considered part of Orthodox missions. To attribute the work of the Copts and Nestorians to the Orthodox Church is to ignore the real theological differences between the Chalcedonian and non-Chalcedonian factions. The common thread, however, that unites the missionary practice of all the Eastern Churches, both those in fellowship with Constantinople and the so-called lesser or Oriental Churches, is the use of the vernacular languages in the church. The missionaries translated the liturgical services and the Bible into the language of the people, which meant that Christianity became part of the cultural heritage of the country. The corollary is, of course, that national identity was sometimes bought at the price of losing a sense of the unity of the one Church.

Cosmas Indicopleustes, in the 6th century, knew of Orthodox missionaries "among the Bactrians, Huns, Indians, Armenians, Medians and Elamites." He also mentioned the Thomas Christians in India and Christian communities in Ceylon. The Assyrian (Nestorian) monument at Xi'an-fu bears witness to the existence of that missionary church in 7th-century China. The Assyrian missionaries suffered a severe reversal when the Tang dynasty ordered the dissolution of the monasteries which, while aimed at curbing Buddhism, also affected the Assyrians, whose strength lay in the monastic movement.

From the 8th to the 10th century the Byzantine Church competed with Rome for the winning of the Slavs, and converted them through the labors of Saints CYRIL AND METHODIUS and their disciples. There were Latin missionaries who participated in the conversion of Russia, even if the journeys of Adalbert of Trier (961–962) and Bruno of Querfurt were unsuccessful. The Baptism (c. 988–989) of St. VLADIMIR of Kiev (956–1015) brought his people into the Byzantine Church. After the Schism of 1054, the conversion of the Slavic peoples to Eastern Christianity meant that the subsequent missionary expansion in vast areas of Euro-Asia followed the Byzantine pattern.

Russian Medieval Missions. Because of the constant warfare connected with the CRUSADES and the subsequent expansion of the Turkish empire leading to the fall of Constantinople in 1453, the Byzantine Church had little opportunity to spread the faith. The period of Ottoman rule (from 1300–1922) was difficult for the Orthodox Church, though even under the onerous burdens imposed on non-Muslims, the witness of Orthodox Christians produced converts from among their oppressors. These converts were often martyred shortly after their profession of faith in Christ as apostates to Islam, but their existence demonstrates the vitality of the Eastern Church which continued unabated.

While missionary work was denied the Orthodox world under Ottoman rule, the Russian Church was able to spread the faith. This church deserves all the more recognition because it was jurisdictionally dependent on Byzantium until 1589. The early Russian mission extended, however, only to Slavs within the Kiev district of Russia. Early attempts to evangelize non-Slav neighbors cost the lives of men such as Isaja of Rostov (11th century) and Kuksáa (mid-12th century).

The shift of power from Kiev to Novogorod led to the colonization of the Ugro-Finnish settlements to the northeast. For the first time a characteristic feature of Russian Orthodox missionary history became evident: colonization entailed evangelization, and vice versa. The spread of the faith came about indirectly, since acceptance of Christianity meant a higher degree of civilization. The result was a Christian-pagan amalgamation.

Movement to the northeast became inevitable when the Mongols invaded Russia and captured Kiev (1240). In the turmoil that followed, a new type of Russian missionary appeared—the monk and the monastery. The reform of St. Sergei of Radonej (1314–92) inspired monks with missionary zeal. Monasteries, such as Valamo, Murmansk, and Solovkij, soon became mission centers. In this period Stephen of Perm (c. 1340–96) evangelized effectively among the Zyriani. He knew how to adjust to popular customs, which he elevated by translating the liturgy into the vernacular. His example helped the Permiaks, Chuvashes, Mordvins, and Lapps to accept Christianity.

New Direction in Mission. Domination by the Mongols, who had meanwhile become Muslims, ended in 1380, although 150 years passed before the last khanates were subdued along the Volga. The end of Mongol control led to a turning point, the beginning of organized missionary activity. Decisive in this respect was the changed attitude toward Islam, which came to be considered a pressing threat after the fall of Constantinople (1453). Henceforth, Russia considered itself the outpost of Christianity and protector of Orthodoxy. The titles of the czars, and the Eastern Roman double-headed eagle were expressions of the claim by Moscow to be the "Third Rome."

This change appeared in a new understanding of the missions. In 1552 Kazan, the last bulwark of Muslim Tatars on the Volga, fell. The journey of Gurij, the first archbishop, to Kazan was celebrated as a triumph of Christianity over pagans and Muslims. The mission itself, however, became an undertaking of the state, which dispatched, protected, and supported the missionaries.

Siberia and China. A few years later the conquest of Siberia began. In 1582 the Tatar khanates of Siberia fell. In 1619 the Jenissei was crossed, and in 1632 the eastern extremities of the Lena River. In 1648 Cossacks reached the Pacific Ocean, thereby opening an enormous missionary field. Again colonization involved evangelization, and evangelization colonization or Russification. The tasks connected with the conquest of Siberia were taken in hand by PETER I, THE GREAT (1682-1725), at a time when China placed obstacles in the way of Russian expansion. Thus began the dramatic history of Sino-Russian relations. The Kangxi (K'ang-hsi) Emperor (1662–1722) ordered Russian expansion to stop at the Amur. Nevertheless the Treaty of Nerchinsk (1689) permitted the presence of a Russian Orthodox mission in Beijing (Peking). In the Treaty of Kiachta (1727) Russian missionaries were recognized as their country's diplomatic representatives to the Chinese court. There was hardly any missionary activity, but Russia had, over other countries, the advantage of being present in Beijing. The Chinese situation being what it was, more attention was then paid to the mission in Siberia. Kamchatka and the Yakut, Buryat, and Chukchi tribes were absorbed by the Orthodox Church. From Siberia the mission spread to the Aleutians and Alaska, where monks from Valamo worked c. 1800.

19th Century. In the 19th century the Russian Orthodox mission experienced a revival, resulting partly from a renewal of Russian piety and partly from the influence of Western pietism. This revival led to the foundation of the Russian Orthodox Biblical Society (1813). Kazan became the center of mission renewal and the scene of the beginning (1854) of missionary science. Makarij Glucharev (1792–1847), the founder of the Altai mission, was extremely progressive in his understanding of mission. He only baptized his converts after an extensive period of instruction and established schools and clinics.

Innokentij Veniaminov (1797–1879), the apostle of the Russian Far East, was one of the greatest Christian missionaries of the 19th century. Traveling to Russian Alaska with his family, he constructed his own dwelling and the church, learned to navigate a kayak to visit his far flung flock and was a conscientious observer of native customs as well as flora and fauna. He composed an alphabet for the Aleut language and his linguistic ability enabled him to properly instruct the converts in Christian faith. One of the books he wrote in Aleut, Indication of the Way into the Kingdom of God, was translated into Russian and between 1839 and 1855 was published in 46 editions. Upon the death of his wife, he took monastic vows and was consecrated bishop of Kamchatka, the Kurilian and the Aleutian Islands. Later all Siberia was added to his jurisdiction. Veniaminov, who became metropolitan of Moscow, established a missionary society (1870) which contributed to the Church's recognition of its mission obligations. Veniaminov's plans for evangelization extended to Japan and Korea. He encouraged the apostle of the Orthodox in Japan, Nikolai Kasatkin (1836–1912), to work for the conversion of the Japanese. The liturgy in the vernacular, a native Japanese clergy, and the sacrifice of political goals helped the Orthodox Church make great progress in Japan within a few decades. Kasatkin, who had been elevated to bishop, stayed with his flock during the Russo-Japanese War instead of returning to Russia. The mission in China was first relieved of its diplomatic function by the Peace of Aigun (1858). After the Boxer Rebellion a diocese was established in Beijing, but in 1914 the mission had only 5,000 disciples. In proportion to their numerical strength, the Orthodox Church lost more adherents in the Boxer Rebellion than either the Catholic or Protestant Churches.

Early Twentieth Century. The Russian Revolution (1917) put an effective halt to all missionary work of the Russian Orthodox Church by stopping the flow of funds. Most impacted was the mission to Japan which, while it never had many missionaries, was dependent on the support of the mother church. The Orthodox Church of Japan was forced by the Japanese government to sever its ties with Moscow and declare itself independent in 1940. After World War II the Church submitted to the Metropolitanate of North America. When this jurisdiction became the ORTHODOX CHURCH IN AMERICA, the Japan Orthodox Church retained its autonomous status under the Patriarchate of Moscow.

The mission in China was strengthened by the immigration of White Russian refugees, but the ministry among the Russians was at the expense of the missionary work among the Chinese. The Orthodox Church in China suffered when the Communists came to power. The last Russian hierarch, Archbishop Victor, left in 1956 and most of the parishioners emigrated to Australia or America. There appears to be only one functioning Orthodox Church in China comprised of elderly Russians that is in the city of Haerbin (Harbin).

Fresh Starts in Mission. During and after World War II, old missionary dioceses were able to be reorganized, even in Russia. Some of them carry the names of each respective race in their title. It was only after the Greek Civil War that missionary interest was rekindled in Greece, primarily through the agency of the Inter Orthodox Center for Mission. Founded by Anastasios Yannoulatos, the center sponsored missionary lectures and for a decade (1959–1969) published a very influential journal, Porefendes ("Go Ye") in both Greek and English editions. The journal discussed not only the activities of missionaries but also mission strategy and theology.

The impetus for missionary advance came with the incorporation under the Patriarchate of Alexandria of an African initiated church, the African Orthodox Church, whose leadership sought to connect to the original expression of Christianity. Many had been Anglicans and they sought a form of Christianity that would not make them subject to the major Christian traditions already present in East Africa. One of the founding leaders, Spartas (Reuben Mukasa from Uganda), toured Greece (1959) and generated interest in the work in Africa. Both the Church of Greece and the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America responded with financial assistance and with missionaries. The liturgy was translated into Kikuyu and a seminary was established in Kenya to train clergy. The African Orthodox Church received significant assistant from Cyprus when the head of the autocephalous Church of Cyprus, Archbishop Markrios, took an interest in the work, making several journeys to the developing churches. The leadership of the work in East Africa has come from Greece and Cyprus. Bearing the title of Archbishop of Irinoupolis and All East Africa, this see has been occupied by Archbishop Anastasios Yannoulatos, one of the architects of the Orthodox missionary revival. The last two Metropolitans, Seraphim and Makarios Tillyrides are both Cypriots. At the turn of the 21st century there are an estimated 600,000 African Orthodox in Kenya with smaller communities numbering 50,000 in Uganda and 10,000 in Tanzania. Elsewhere there is Orthodox missionary work in Ghana and Cameroon. Mission work has been undertaken in Indonesia through the efforts of a convert from Islam, Father Daniel Bambang D. Byantoro. Again, there is benefit in the lack of a colonial connection and the fact that the patterns of Orthodoxy appear more adaptable to the cultures of the Orient in the use of forms and symbols. There are the beginnings of missionary work in other Asian nations.

Orthodox Diaspora and Mission. Because of the dispersion of traditional Orthodox peoples, the Orthodox Church is represented on all six inhabited continents. In most places the Orthodox community established congregations and sent back to their country of origin for clergy to minister among them. While technically not missionary work, these outposts of Orthodoxy served to attract people to the Orthodox Church. This has been true in Australia, Africa, Europe and North America. In many places the Orthodox Church has the advantage of not being associated with any colonial power. The transplanted Orthodox and the few missionaries that were sent out were not identified with an oppressive Western presence. The focus on indigenous clergy also helped to remove a foreign stigma. Indeed the rapid advancement of nationals into ministry positions, necessitated by the paucity of missionary personnel became a virtue as the churches that developed were quickly seen as belonging to the converts

Missionary work has recommenced with missionaries being sent from both the Inter Orthodox Mission Center in Athens, Greece, and the Orthodox Christian Mission Center in St. Augustine, Florida. The latter is a pan-Orthodox society, sending out missionaries from various ethnic jurisdictions in North America and is perhaps one of the best examples of inter-Orthodox cooperation. Sponsoring both short term and career missionaries, the center is actively supporting the rebuilding of the Church in Albania under the direction of Anastasios (Yannoulatos) Archbishop of Tirana, Durres and All Albania. Missionary information can be gathered from the publication (in Greek) of the Inter Orthodox Mission Center's Panta ta Ethne (To All the World) and the Orthodox Christian Mission Center's OCMC Missionary Magazine.

Mention should be made of conversions from Protestant denominations to Eastern Orthodoxy. Peter Gilquist, former staff worker with Campus Crusade for Christ, led a group of evangelical protestants that had formed their own church into the Antiochian Orthodox Archdiocese of North America. A missionary presence within the Antiochian Church, they have established missionary parishes in North America that actively proselytize. Many of the current Eastern Orthodox missionary force from North America are former evangelicals. In addition there have been other converts attracted to the Orthodox Church so that between 30 and 40 percent of the students at St. Vladimir's Orthodox Seminary, sponsored by the Orthodox Church in America are converts to Orthodoxy. One notable convert is Franky Schaeffer, son of the evangelical apologist, Francis Schaeffer.

MISSION HISTORY, III: PROTESTANT

This entry gives: (1) a brief history of Protestant missions, and (2) a survey of their status as at the beginning of the 21st century.

History

Protestants were slow in taking up missionary work among non-Christians. This was partly because they were engrossed in consolidating their position in Europe and also because some of their early leaders believed that the obligation to spread the faith did not apply to them. But the delay was chiefly attributable to the fact that Protestants were late in establishing commercial or colonial contacts with non-Christian peoples. When Protestantism was still in its infancy, and even before it had been born, Spanish and Portuguese Catholics had led in the explorations and conquests of the 15th and 16th centuries and under the impulse of Roman Catholic reform had initiated extensive mission in the Americans, Africa, Asia and the East Indies.

The English and the Dutch were the first Protestants to undertake commerce and colonization on a large scale outside of Europe. Wherever they made contact with non-Christian peoples some missionary effort followed, although tardily in some countries. Thus in Virginia and New England, especially the latter, missions to the Indians were inaugurated in the 17th century. Early in the 18th century the (Anglican) SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGA-TION OF THE GOSPEL in Foreign Parts (est. 1701) sent missionaries to the indigenous tribes in the 13 colonies. Dutch missionaries went to the East Indies. In the 18th century, under the impulse of Count Zinzendorf, the Moravians had missions in the Danish and British West Indies, India, Ceylon (Sri Lanka), Russia, Central America, Greenland, Labrador, the Gold Coast, and South Africa, as well as among North American peoples. In the 18th century, beginning in 1706 under the auspices of the King of Denmark, German Pietists had missions in India and were aided by the (Anglican) SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOT-ING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE (est. 1699). Thus, the first Protestant missionaries to Asia were Germans, Bartholomew Ziegenbalg and Henry Plutschau

Missionary Societies. Protestant missions had their main beginning in the closing decade of the 18th and the opening decades of the 19th centuries. In 1792, at the insistence of William CAREY, the Baptist Missionary Society was founded in England. The following year it sent Carey to India. There he and his colleagues translated the Bible into the languages of India and into Chinese, and founded a college at Serampore that became the chief center for the training of native peoples for the Protestant ministry. Bible translation and educational work would be major concerns of all Protestant missionary work. In 1795 British evangelicals who did not conform to the Church of England organized the London Missionary Society. Four years later evangelicals within the Church of England inaugurated the Church Missionary Society. In 1804 evangelicals, both Nonconformists and Conformist Anglican, organized the British and Foreign Bible Society. In continental Europe Protestant societies emerged also. Among them were the Netherlands Missionary Society (1797) and the Basel Missionary Society (1822). In the U.S. the interdenominational (chiefly Congregational) American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was initiated in 1810, and in 1814 American Baptists founded a missionary society. In the next few years a number of societies were founded, most of them as organs of particular denominations. In 1816 members of several denominations united in the American Bible Society.

Protestant missions were given a major impulse from various revival movements in the English speaking world which culminated in 1886 with the formation of the STU-DENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT for Foreign Missions (SVM). It had as its watchword: "the evangelization of the world in this generation." By this was meant not the conversion of the whole world, but the conveying of a knowledge of the gospel by each generation of Christians to their generation the world over. The SVM was nondenominational. It spread among students in many countries. One of its original members, John R. MOTT (1865–1955), was long its chair. Under its influence thousands of students offered themselves to their denominational societies and were sent to many different countries. Mott became an evangelist to students in scores of countries. In one of his widely read books, Strategic Points in the World's Conquest (1897), he outlined a program for winning all people to Christ. The book and the movement reflected the progressive, optimistic Protestant missionary spirit of the age.

Mott became the chief agent also in bringing Protestants together to fulfill the purpose of the evangelization of the world and was chairman of the World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh, 1910). Out of this gathering came, first, the Continuation Committee of the conference and then (1921) the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL (IMC). Both had Mott as chairman. The purpose of the IMC was the coordination of Protestant missionary effort the world over. It had as members national and regional bodies. The members in Asia and Africa were called National Christian Councils, and increasingly enlisted the Protestants of these lands. In America and Europe the members were bodies that represented the Protestant missionary organization of their respective countries or regions. The IMC embraced the overwhelming majority of the Protestants of the world. Substantial minorities held aloof, chiefly and increasingly, on doctrinal grounds. By the 1960s the World Evangelical Fellowship (founded 1951) was growing rapidly and in 1974 the Lausanne Committee on World Evangelization was formed as alternative Protestant mission organizations.

In 1961 the IMC was integrated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) and became the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism of that body. The WCC (est. 1948) was to a large degree an outgrowth of the Protestant missionary movement. After 1961 the organization of Protestant missions becomes more diverse worldwide. There are three main reasons for the rapid growth and diversification of Protestant mission societies after 1961. First, many churches and individuals felt that the greater dialogue with Roman Catholics and the WCC unit on "Dialog with People of other Living Faiths" were signs of compromise and a change in mission theology. The 1973 call for a moratorium on foreign missions, first by John Gatu, General Secretary of the Presbyterian Church of East Africa, further divided what would be called the "ecumenical" missions from the "evangelical" or "independent" missions. Secondly, the sudden national movements of independence from 1945-1969 where 71 non-western nations became independent encouraged the diversification of Protestant missions. Many of these new countries identified themselves with a non-Christian religion and restricted Christian missionaries. As a result new indigenous mission societies were founded and new Protestant missionary societies were founded with particular countries, regions or religions in view. On the average over 100 new mission societies have been founded each decade for the past 30 years in North America. More significantly for the diversification and multiplication of mission societies has been the explosion of non-western mission societies in countries like Korea, India, Taiwan and Brazil. Cooperation among societies has been more a matter of relationships and elective participation in umbrella organizations such as the World Evangelical Fellowship or World Pentecostal Fellowship, rather than official membership in an organization such as the WCC. Thirdly, the decline in denominationalism in the West and sudden drop in communications costs has encouraged the formation of mission societies by local churches or groups of churches often by-passing the national church bodies.

Developments. From the beginning of Protestant missionary endeavor there has been a primary interest in translation work and educational work to train future church leaders. Church planting was always related to the production of Bibles in the local language and literacy work. Another aspect was the fostering of efforts to influence wholesomely, from the standpoint of Christians, various aspects of the cultures in which missionaries lived. Protestant missions worked in association with Western enterprises that profoundly influenced nonwestern portions of the globe. The impact of the West brought about a mounting revolution in these areas. Protestant missionaries endeavored to prepare non-Western peoples for this and to make the resulting changes beneficial rather than harmful. To do so they introduced western medicine and surgery, training physicians and nurses in Western techniques, promoted public health, established schools that combined western and indigenous learning (e.g. "Anglo-Chinese Schools"), pioneered in improved methods of agriculture and forestry, fought famines and such evils as opium and slavery, sought to improve the status and education of women, fostered Christian standards of marriage and family life produced Christian literature, and strove to raise the level of rural life. This revolution in missionary work began before the middle of the 19th century.

In the 20th century, with the emergence of anticolonialism in the non-western world, Protestant missions sought to deepen the foothold they had won among non-Europeans. In the East Asian Christian Conference, (est. 1954; renamed Christian Conference of Asia), with the aid of missionaries, the Protestants of that part of the world undertook cooperatively to spread the faith among their neighbors.

More and more the direction of the "younger churches" that had sprung up out of Protestant missions was transferred to indigenous leadership. Thus in India after the 1950s all Methodist bishops were men from India, the only Lutheran bishopric was transferred (1962) from a Swede to a native inhabitant, and an increasing proportion of Anglican bishops were native inhabitants. Similar developments were seen in Protestant churches that did not have bishops, not only in India, but also in other non-western countries. In 1958 the Theological Education Fund of U.S. $4 million was created and placed under the direction of the IMC. It had as its purpose the training of an indigenous Protestant clergy in Africa, Asia and Latin America and the islands of the Pacific. In 1963 an all-Africa (Protestant) Christian Conference met under African leadership and created a continuing organization to embrace the continent. Following World War II the Batak Protestants (Sumatra) became completely independent of foreign control and received only that help from missionaries for which they specifically asked.

In order to erase some of the church divisions which had been exported from the West, and to form a more united Christian front, Protestant Christians formed unions of diverse denominational bodies. Thus, in 1934 the Church of Christ in Thailand was formed, in 1941 the Church of Christ in Japan (Koyodan) was constituted and the Church of South India was formed in 1947. The latter's constituent members were Anglicans, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and members of the Reformed Church. It had an episcopate which sought apostolic succession through the (Anglican) Church of India, Myanmar and Sri Lanka. Other unions soon formed in several countries.

The cooperation and unions among churches that occurred from the 1930s through the 1980s shifted to become cooperation and sharing in mission without the organic unions. With the rapid growth in non-Orthodox and non-Roman Catholic Christianity in the last decades of the 20th century (house churches in China, Africa Independent Churches in Africa, etc.) came the need for new models of cooperation in mission. The largest global cooperation among Protestants for prayer and strategy came in the 1990s as the "AD 2000 and Beyond Movement." This global and grassroots movement was supported mostly by non-western churches and had as its goal, "A church for every people and the gospel for every person by the year 2000." Conferences were held to aid in the sharing of resources and plan cooperative strategies in Singapore (1989), Seoul (1995) and Pretoria (1997). One of the many resources used has been the Jesus Film, shown to over 2 billion people and translated into over 700 languages by 2001.

Five major shifts in Protestant mission have taken place since World War II, the first occurring immediately after the War was over. Independence movements caused a redistribution of missionary personal, and the spread of Communism in Eastern Europe and China reduced the mission activity further. The ascendancy of the United States as a world power paralleled its rapid growth in Protestant mission activity. The predominance of both personnel and financial support shifted from the British Isles and the Continent to the United States. The second major shift occurred in the late 1980s and early 1990s. With the democratic revolutions in Eastern Europe, the collapse of Communism in the Soviet republics and the new openness to the world in countries like Vietnam, Cambodia and China came new Protestant mission development in areas that had been "closed." Along with new work, both official and unofficial, came one of the most rapid developments of Protestant work since the "opening" of China in the 1840s. Thousands of missionaries from Europe, the U.S. and Korea moved to the former Soviet republics and hundreds of others found ways to work in China. The third major shift has been taking place since World War II and that is the change from ecumenical to evangelical and independent missions. In 1954 about half of the 19,000 long term missionaries from North America were from mainline churches. Today less than 5% of the long-term missionaries from North America are from the ecumenical sending agencies. Fourth, whereas in 1910 western church bodies and mission agencies were discussing how to evangelize the world, today most of the church planting is being done by non-western missionaries. The fastest growing church in the world is in China and virtually all of the work is being done by Chinese. In Nepal, India and Myanmar and most nations of sub-Saharan Africa, the evangelistic and church planting work of mission are being done by nationals or missionaries from the region. Finally, the fastest growing missionary work in the world is now Pentecostal. Not only in Latin America, but also the missionary work in much of South and East Asia today is from Pentecostal groups both working regionally as well as from the West.

Protestant Mission in the 21st Century

A look at the four major regions of Protestant missions at the beginning of the second millennium shows the extent of the changes that have transpired.

Asia. Although Christianity has been introduced to China in the seventh, 13th, 16th and 19th centuries, it has been the most recent reintroduction, from within, which has had the greatest impact. With the deportation of all missionaries between 1948 and 1952, the Protestant churches suffered from closures, arrests of leaders and relocation of many Christians to work on farms or in factories. Even though the Christian population was estimated to be 1.5 million in 1948, today estimates vary between 15 million (Roman Catholic and China Christian Council—CCC) and 90 million (inclusive of non-registered churches). Most of this is Protestant Church and, except for some groups who began smuggling Bibles in the early 1980s, has all been done by Chinese. The formation of the Three Self Patriotic Movement (1954) and the CCC (1980) created a "post-denominational" church recognized by the government. However the largest number of Protestants today still meet in unregistered churches. Mission to China is coordinated and directed from the Amity Foundation with offices in Nanjing and Hong Kong. Korean church growth increased dramatically in the South after the Korean War. Thousands of Christians from the North migrated to the South and after the War churches and missions were reestablished with the help of many American missions. Today more than 40% of South Korea is Christian with the largest Christian church in the world (Yoido Full Gospel) and the largest Christian gatherings ever (15 million at Yoido) and many of the largest denominational churches and seminaries found in the world. These churches are very strong in their missionary leadership. For example, in 1996, 60,000 Korean students committed themselves to be missionaries at a gathering at the Seoul Olympic stadium.

With the gradual opening for travel to Vietnam and Cambodia, some educational and church missionary work has begun in these two countries. Most of the Protestant missionary work to these countries is also done by Asians. The largest number of missionaries is from Korea and diaspora Chinese communities working out of Singapore, Malaysia, Taiwan and Indonesia. A number of refugees from Cambodia and Vietnam (as well as China) have returned to work with Christians in their home countries or have organized missions in the West to reach their home countries. Although after the Pacific War it looked like both Thailand and Japan would have rapidly growing Christian communities, this never happened. Both countries, with a fairly large Protestant missionary presence, are still between 2 and 3.5% Christian. Nepal, until 1980, had less than 10,000 Christians. Today, mostly from the work of Indians and other Asians, plus the long-term service work of the United Mission to Nepal, there are over 500,000 Christians (2.4%) in Nepal. These are nearly all Protestant. Missionary work in Indonesia is mostly educational and medical now, but Indonesians are very active in missionary work within their own nation. Protestant Christianity is one of the five recognized religions in Indonesia (also Roman Catholicism, Buddhism, Hinduism and Islam) and it continues to grow in the midst of the largest Muslim population in the world. In Malaysia large numbers of Chinese and Indians have become Christians. However, except for tribal groups in East Malaysia (North Borneo) the bumiputra (indigenous Malay) are still mostly Muslim. India has one of the largest numbers of cross-cultural missionary groups in the world (after the United States), although most of their missionaries work within the sub-continent. Close to 40,000 Protestant Indian missionaries work full-time, mostly in church planting, literacy, educational and medical work. Northeast India (Nagaland, Mizoram and Meghalaya) is predominantly a Christian area sending out missionaries throughout the sub-continent. In many areas of India large movements of Dalits (untouchables) are turning to Christianity. In the Philippines, the dominance of missionaries from North America is now being challenged by missionaries from Korea. The Philippines now send out more missionaries (some to unreached areas within the Philippines) than it receives.

Africa. The 20th century in Africa, especially since the independence of most of the African nations, has marked one of the greatest religious changes in the history of Christianity. In 1900 Africa was less than 10% Christian. By 2000 it was nearly 46% Christian. Some of the fastest growing churches are not technically speaking Protestant, since they don't trace their lineage to a Protestant denomination or split. Many of these African Initiated (or Independent) Churches have been started by local prophets-often resisting western domination-with a vision for planting churches in different regions in Africa. Two of the main streams of AICs are the Ethiopian stream (looking to Ethiopia for their Christian heritage) and the Zionist churches (which tend to be more Pentecostal in worship and mission). South Africa has had the largest number of AICs which, after the collapse of apartheid in 1991 continued to multiply and divide. Today there are nearly as many African missionaries serving cross-culturally as there are foreign (western and Asian) missionaries working in Africa. Political struggles in countries like Uganda, Republic of Congo, Ethiopia, and Nigeria, tribal conflicts in countries like Rwanda, Burundi, Sierra Leone and Liberia and religious conflict between Islam and Christianity have all affected the missionary work in Africa. The attempt to impose Islam on southern Sudan, for example has led to the longest running civil war of the century; over three million people displaced from their homes, over two million deaths and yet a church growth in the south from 5% in 1960 to over 70% in 2001. Northern Africa is still mostly all Muslim with only small Christian communities scattered across the Sahara.

Eastern Europe, West and Central Asia. With the independence of nations of the Middle East came a rise in Islamic consciousness. Countries like Lebanon and Syria have had a marked decline of Protestant Christians with mission work increasingly difficult to maintain. Islamic regimes in places like Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan have all but stopped ongoing Protestant missionary work except in small "tentmaking" operations. Upon the collapse of the Soviet Republics in 1991 missionary work suddenly took off in countries like Russia, Albania, Yugoslavia and Romania, largely with Americans, Western Europeans and Koreans. The response has been mixed with large rallies and media events in countries like Albania and Romania having a great impact, but in areas like Eastern Germany and Poland there have not been large Protestant movements. In most of the central Asian republics there has been a large influx of Protestant missionaries since 1991, although the overall impact is minimal. In countries like Uzbekistan the rising tide of Islam has caused a great exodus of Christians from the country.

Latin America. A century ago nearly all of Latin America was Roman Catholic. The twentieth century has been marked by a decline in religious belief in general, but also a growth in Protestantism. Brazil is the largest country with over 170 million people, 22 million who are now Protestant. Brazil sends more missionaries out of the country today than they receive. As with most of Latin America, the fastest growing churches in Brazil are Pentecostal or Charismatic in theology and worship. In all of Latin America and the Caribbean Protestant and Independent churches are growing at a rate of about 4% per year, compared to the annual population growth rate of only 1.6%. Still, in most countries of Latin America, the Protestant population is only between five and 15% of the total population. As with much of Africa, the missionary work in these countries will be related to poverty, disease and political stability, since most of the poorest countries of the world are found in Africa and Latin America.

MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA, I (SPANISH MISSIONS)

The Christianization of the aborigines of America and their incorporation into Western civilization was most effectively accomplished through the mission. With the support of the Iberian kings and the PATRONATO REAL, religious orders developed this method of catechizing the native Americans. The system itself will be discussed first and then the application in North, Central, and South America.

Mission System

In 1573 Philip II of Spain issued a long directive on conquests and settlements that forbade the extension of the encomienda system beyond the territory in which it was then established. The directive marked the end of the encomienda-doctrina as a means of incorporating into Church or State the pagan Native Americans along the frontier. A new agency had to be developed for this task, and after an initial period of uncertainty, this was done. It is called the mission, although the word did not appear in Spanish legislation for many decades. In the mission, the Native American was to be kept in involuntary isolation from the European under the direct care of the priest and the mercenary soldier. Basically, the difference between the mission and the ENCOMIENDA-DOCTRINA SYS-TEM lay not in the objective, for that remained the same, but in the means. The major responsibility for the exploration of new lands, for settling the Native Americans and controlling them, building the churches and other needed buildings, maintaining the roads and ships with which to bring in supplies, etc., now fell directly or indirectly on the priests, most of whom were not trained to cope with such tasks. Some aspects of the mission dated from experiments in the very beginning of the Spanish colonial effort in the Americas. The new agency was begun at almost the same time at the two extremes of Spanish America: northwestern New Spain and the area near Buenos Aires. In the north it was initiated by the Jesuits under Gonzalo Tapia and in the south by the Franciscans under Luis de BOLAÑOS. It is curious that today the Jesuits are perhaps best remembered for their missions in the Rio de la Plata area, whereas the Franciscans are possibly best known for their missions at the extreme northern border of New Spain. Although the Dominicans did much to develop the idea of the mission, they did relatively little work as missionaries, perhaps due to the inability of harmonizing the needs of the mission with commitments contracted under the doctrina. In general, the same is true of the Augustinians and Mercedarians. In the 17th century the crown sent the Capuchins of Valencia to work in eastern Venezuela. Their missions were well conducted.

The bulk of the mission work in Spanish America was carried on by the Jesuits and Franciscans. Both orders suffered a severe crisis as a result of the need to supply trained men. The Jesuits in the mid-17th century solved it in great measure by enlisting German missionaries. The Franciscans at about the same time reached a solution in founding the Mission College. In 1767, the year of the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spanish America, it is estimated that there were about one million natives in all missions in Spanish America. Of these, the Jesuits cared for about 700,000; the Franciscans, about 250,000.

Financial Support. A mission was an expensive institution, and the crown generously offered to defray some of the expense. Royal support was of two kinds: a subsidy to each mission at the time of its foundation for the purchase of a chalice, bells, and other necessary supplies, and for the yearly salary of the missionary. The salary varied somewhat over the vast expanse of the empire, but generally it ranged from 350 to 450 pesos each year: a truly handsome sum at that time. Of course, royal financial support also gave the royal officials a means of control over the mission and the missionaries. Some, especially the Jesuits, tried to free themselves from excessive interference by securing alms. The Pious Fund, begun in 1697 for Lower California, was perhaps the most famous example of this type of financing. In 1693 the Franciscans in Peru founded a similar society called the Apostolic Administrators, but it was not nearly as successful. Usually the government gave funds for the founding of a mission, but often, with political motives, dictated where the mission was to be established. The missionaries soon recognized this, and their reports were often drawn up to stress the political aspect of their work. In Texas they stressed the danger from the French; in California, from the Russians; in Maynas (Peru), from the Portuguese slave raiders; and in Paraguay, from the Paulistas. Only too often, though, if there were no political motives, a mission would either not be founded, or, if it were, it could expect only sporadic assistance from the royal treasury.

Organization and Operation. The mission was a school of religion, civilization, and political government, although actually the three aspects were considered inseparable in the minds of most missionaries. In effect, the task was the changing of the nomadic Native American of the frontier into a copy of the town-loving Spaniard. A prerequisite was the settlement of the nomads in or close to the mission center. Sometimes the native people themselves were willing to surrender their freedom in order to be protected from their more powerful enemies. Often the missionary was able to persuade them to do so through kindness and gifts, or friendly Native Americans who had already joined a mission would persuade them. A rancher, miner, or lay military leader might influence them. Some missionaries, few in number, are known to have used force to bring the Native American under the control of the mission. Once a native had been enrolled in a mission, the mission used every means in its power, including force, to keep him there.

To instruct the Native American in the faith, the missionary drew heavily on the methods developed by the doctrina, but generally the missionary was able to exert a much stricter control over his charges than the doctrinero. Mission life was governed by the mission bell to such an extent that the expression bajo la campana came to signify a mission Native American. Hence, the resemblance of the mission to monastic life was usually much stronger than in the doctrina, even often in the separation of the boys from the girls into separate dormitories under close supervision.

As a center of civilization, the mission was often a vast industrial school, of which the largest might number 2,000 pupils as in Upper California, or even 7,000 as in the REDUCTIONS OF PARAGUAY. There would be a weaving center, blacksmith shop, tannery, sugar refinery, wine press, warehouses, vegetable gardens, and grain fields, while on the ranches there were often thousands of heads of cattle, horses, sheep, pigs, and goats. The women were charged with cooking, spinning, weaving, and sewing. Often there would be a carpentry shop or a shop for the making of adobes or for cutting stone. This training not only helped to educate the Native Americans but also to support the mission. For his part, the missionary was accustomed to transplant to the frontier almost every conceivable domestic plant and animal of Europe. In the teaching of the manual trades, the cultivation of the land, and the care of domestic animals, the missionaries relied either on the soldiers or preferably on laymen hired by the missionaries for the purpose. These served as superintendents of the fields, of the herds of animals, and of the shops. Through their care and under the management of the missionary, but especially through the work of the Native American, many missions came to represent an enormous economic investment. In Upper California in 1834 the 31,000 mission Native Americans of 21 missions herded 396,000 cattle, 62,000 horses, 321,000 hogs, sheep, and goats, and harvested 123,000 bushels of grain. There was a corresponding abundance in the orchards, gardens, wine press, and workshops. In 1768 the Jesuit missions of Paraguay had 769,869 head of cattle, 124,619 mules and horses, 14,975 asses, and 38,141 sheep and goats. A single Capuchin mission in Venezuela, Divina Pastora, in 1755 cared for 154,000 head of cattle.

Finally, the mission was also a school of government and citizenship. For this purpose, the mission was organized into a pueblo with the same civil officials, and sometimes also the same military leaders, as the corresponding Spanish pueblo. Usually these officials were appointed the first time. Thereafter, they were elected on each January 1 by the Native Americans who were heads of a household. Special insignia were granted to the officials as well as special accommodations in the Church to add to their prestige. This Native American pueblo council had the right to administer minor punishments and also had its own jail. It could pass laws that were required by local circumstances, and it appointed Native American overseers to superintend the community projects, such as road maintenance, bridge construction, and work in the community fields. Much of the actual controlling of the native people was thus done by the Native Americans themselves, although there always hovered in the background the figure of the missionary or the soldier of the presidio. Some authors have tended to underestimate the efficacy of the Native American council, possibly because they do not understand its purpose. It resembled closely the student government found in many colleges in the 20th century: a means of control and a step toward true self-government. It was thus one of the factors that help to explain how two missionaries could form an orderly town out of several thousand nomads.

The Mission System Re-evaluated. Recent studies have shifted their focus from the missionaries to the Native Americans who lived in the missions. These studies, inspired in part by a greater sensitivity to human rights issues and the suffering which Native Americans and African Americans experienced as a result of their encounter with Europeans from the 16th Century on, place the history of the missions in a more critical light. Although the missionaries were well-intentioned, their attempt to incorporate the Native Americans into the mission system often accelerated the spread of disease and the breakdown of native culture and traditions. Frequently, the Native Americans resisted the attempt to impose Christianity by harboring old ways under the guise of Catholic rites. Women especially found themselves subordinated to a strictly male-oriented hierarchy legitimated by the missionaries. The oldest criticism of the missions still remains the central one: did the benevolent paternalism of the missionaries inhibit the Native Americans from developing the capability to become integrated into the larger western world beyond the mission? But this is an uneven story. Other studies show that in some mission experiences, and this would be particularly true of the Jesuit missions in Mojos (Bolivia) and Paraguay, the native peoples not only cooperated with the missionaries, but were quite capable of defending and maintaining their mission way of life long after the Jesuits were expelled.

Mexico and Central America

The spread of Christianity through the missions in Spanish North America and Central America was largely the work of the Order of St. Francis and of the Society of Jesus.

Franciscan Missions. The Franciscans arrived in Santo Domingo in 1493. By 1500 they had already obtained about 3,000 converts. Organized in a province in 1505, they extended their work of evangelization to the neighboring islands as they were discovered. There is evidence of great missionary effort but not of the fruit of their labor. Missionary activity diminished as the native population decreased. From the Antilles the Franciscans penetrated the coasts of Cumaná and Tierra Firme in 1513 and reached Panama the following year. Cuba served as a base for the penetration of Florida.

Period of Mexican Occupation. The territory of colonial New Spain comprised all present Mexico, Florida, southern Georgia, the lower part of South Carolina, Texas, New Mexico, southern Colorado, Arizona, and California. From 1522 Franciscans began to evangelize the outskirts of Mexico City and of Puebla de los Angeles. They entered Michoacán in 1525 and Jalisco the following year. These centers of initial missionary expansion served as the base for new penetrations. They began the evangelization of Taftipico in 1530, of Yucatán two years later, and of Zacatecas in 1542. Each of these centers became a province or autonomous custody, with the responsibility to evangelize its own territory and to penetrate regions that were discovered later. Evangelization in the 16th century was accomplished by means of self-expansion in concentric circles. Each province established convents in the principal towns. The evangelizing radius of each convent was constantly enlarged, and when the limits touched, the region could be considered Christianized. At the close of the 16th century there were 200 convents, which attended to about 1,000 native settlements.

The apostolic zeal of the religious and the methods used brought a harvest unique in the history of the missions, for we are told that several million baptisms occurred in a few years. Outstanding among the missionaries were Pedro de Gante; the Twelve Apostles of Mexico, among whom were Martín de Valencia and Toribio de Benavente Motolonía; Juan de Zumárraga; Marcos de Niza; Bernardino de Sahagfún; Andrés de Olmos; Maturino Gilberti; Alonso de Molina; and Gerónimo de Mendieta.

Later Expansion. At the close of the 16th century a new stage opened, which lasted until independence: the penetration of territories distant from the original centers of evangelization. Zacatecas, made a province in 1603, was entered through the northeast section of the country, and missionary activity was carried on in what is now Durango, Sinaloa, Coahuila, Chichuahua, and San Luis de Potosí. It is estimated that in 1737 there were 100,000 converted native Mexicans.

The province of the Holy Gospel began the Christianization of New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado in 1598; the territory was taken over in 1616 by the custody of San Pablo. Although in 1630 they had 80,000 baptized native Mexicans, these missions were among the most difficult in America. They survived the grave crises of 1680 and 1696, and in 1700 there were 126 Franciscans in missionary work there. About 1750 there were 21 villages, with 17,500 Christians. They were placed under the administration of the secular clergy in 1756 and returned to the order in 1771. In 1787, 28 religious were evangelizing there, in charge of 48 missions. Alonso de Benavides is a well-known figure of that era.

After several earlier attempts the province of Michoacán in 1617 systematically began the Christianization of Río Verde, which became a Franciscan custody in 1621. In 1693 it had 12 Franciscans, seven missions, seven visitas, and 10,000 native Mexicans in the process of Christianization. The missions were secularized in 1712; 15 years later they were returned to the Franciscans, who in 1761 attended to 15,469 converts.

In 1670 the province of Jalisco took charge of the missions of Coahuila. A century later the region was deemed Christianized and was transferred to the secular clergy, leaving the Franciscans with seven towns and a total of 10 missions.

The Franciscan evangelization of Florida had begun in 1573, after the unsuccessful attempts of the Dominicans and Jesuits. Following many difficulties and martyrdoms, the religious succeeded in Christianizing the region to the south of Carolina. In 1634 there were 35 missionaries in charge of 44 towns, with 30,000 native Americans. The English invasion of 1704 damaged the flourishing missions, and they disappeared after the English took over the territory in 1763. The best-known missionaries there were Alonso de Reinoso, Luis Gerónimo de Oré, and Juan de Silva.

Era of the Colleges. From the second quarter of the 17th century onward, to the missionary activity of the provinces was added that of the Apostolic Colleges of Propaganda Fide. Querétaro started with the evangelization of Texas in 1714. In charge of Zacatecas after 1774, the missions succeeded in overcoming the political vicissitudes of the territory. In 1780 they had 17 Franciscans, who attended to 18 missions and two Spanish communities. Working in the missions there were Antonio Margil, Francisco Casafñas, Isidro Fé1ix de Espinosa, and Alonso Giraldo de Terreros. The Sierra Gorda, evangelized since 1690 by the College of Querétaro, was transferred in 1743 to Pachuca and Mexico City. The former attended to the needs of 3,000 Christians in 1787. Pedro Pérez de Mezquía was outstanding among the missionaries from Mexico City. All these missions were turned over to the secular clergy in 1770. Nuevo Santander was entrusted to the College of Guadalupe in 1750. It was abandoned for a short time, but 22 religious returned there in 1756. In 1782, 28 Franciscans were in charge of 31 missions.

Assumption of Former Jesuit Missions. Without giving up their own missions, both the provinces and colleges took charge of those abandoned by the Society of Jesus when it was exiled in 1767. A new era of mission prosperity began. Baja California, entrusted to the College of Mexico City, was exchanged for Alta California in 1772, and evangelization was extended to the north of San Francisco. In the 21 missions that existed until 1832, 89,900 baptisms had been administered. Junípero Serra, Francisco Palou, Fermín Lasuén, Juan Crespí, and Pablo de Mugártegui are well-known figures in the California missions. The province of Jalisco assumed charge of the missions of Nayarit. Pimería Alta (Sonora-Arizona) and Baja California went to the College of Querétaro, which in 1774 surrendered the second to Jalisco. The province of Zacatecas attended to the missions of the Laguna de Parras (Coahuila Durango), while the College of Guadalupe took charge of the missions of Taraumara. With the addition of these former Jesuit missions, the Franciscan Order in 1786 possessed 116 mission centers, 500 missionaries, and had 250,000 native people under its direction.

Central America. In Guatemala the region of Peténitza was evangelized by the province of Yucatán. The rest of the country, where the Franciscans arrived in 1540, made up the province of the Most Holy Name of Jesus, whose evangelizing activity was accomplished by means of the Mexican system of occupation. The province in 1661 possessed 24 houses, 172 religious, and 50,000 neophytes. Fray Esteban Verdelet pushed the missionary activity of the Yucatán province to Honduras. Work in Teuzgalpa, begun in 1608, had to be suspended in 1623 because of the death of the missionaries, but it resumed in 1667. The evangelization of Tologalpa was started in 1667 and intensified after 1674. Both missions had seven missionaries in 1690 and were still in existence in 1787. In 1675 the province founded the convent of Nueva Segovia for the evangelization of the coast of La Pantasma; eight religious were working there in 1787. Further, from the beginning of the 18th century the College of Guatemala maintained the missions of Lean-Mulian and Río Tinto (Comayagua), both of which were still in existence at the end of the century.

Christianity was introduced into Nicaragua and Costa Rica in 1523 and 1542 respectively. Later the province of San Jorge was formed there. In 1635 it had 17 houses distributed throughout 150 leagues of territory. In Talamanca the College of Querétaro carried on missionary activity from 1688; later the area was cared for by the College of Guatemala, assisted by the province of San Jorge. In 1787 there were five missions in the foothills, with a population of 3,000 Christian native inhabitants. Outstanding among the missionaries were Melchor López, Antonio Margil, Pablo de Rebullida, Pedro de la Concepción Urtiaga, and Francisco de San José.

From 1513 to 1519 several religious carried on missionary activity in Darién. In 1565 a custody was established in Panama. It not only evangelized the immediate territory but also in 1632 undertook the Christianization of the Gorgonas Islands. The College of Guatemala evangelized the territory of Veragua, whose five towns and 2,500 native inhabitants were transferred in 1786 to the College of Panama, assisted in the missionary work by the province of Chiriquí. In 1796 its missions had six towns, 1,834 neophytes, and 289 pagans. With independence, a totally different missionary phase began in Spanish America.

Jesuit Missions. Although the royal decree authorizing the Jesuits to establish themselves in Mexico in 1572 stated specifically that they were to work among the native people, it was not until 1589 that the first Jesuits could begin their apostolate among the natives in the vicinity of San Luis de Paz. Until then the Jesuits had attended to such ministry as seemed most needed: schools for the Spaniards and Creoles in all the principal cities and elementary classes for the children of converted natives in several of the larger cities. The initial emphasis on this form of apostolate, rather than missions, derived from the previous training of the Jesuits arriving from Spain and their conviction that they were serving through schools the greatest need of the nation: an educated clergy and a select laity.

The important stable missions were all to the northwest of Mexico City, with Parras, Durango, and the Villa de Sinaloa (San Felipe) as the main centers in the early phase of missionary efforts. From 1591, when the first two missionaries, Gonzalo de Tapia and Martín Pérez, set out for Sinaloa, until 1767 and 1768, when the Jesuits were banished from the missions, their apostolic activity among the native Mexicans extended to an area equivalent to approximately two-fifths of modern Mexico; all or part of the states of Guanajuato, San Luis Potosí, Nuevo León, Jalisco, Zacatecas, Nayarit, Coahuila, Durango, Chihuahua, Sinaloa, Sonora, Lower California, and as far north as southern Arizona. All of this area has since developed into dioceses, except for the Vicariate of Lower California (established in 1854) and the Vicariate and mission of Tarahumara in Chihuahua (1958).

As the Jesuits moved northward along the Pacific coast, they converted the native inhabitants of one river area after another and established missions and schools in all the settlements. The missionary resided in the most important town (cabecera) of the area, where he maintained a school for the native children, teaching them reading, writing, arithmetic, and singing, and attended to several dependent missions (visitas).

The 12 main mission groups will be listed chronologically according to the years of their respective foundations.

San Luis de la Paz (1589). This was named after Luis de Velasco, a viceroy intent on converting and subduing the tribes designated by the generic term "Chichimecas." In 1594 the Jesuits established a residence and small school. This was the only isolated mission area of the Mexican Jesuits; all the others were contiguous and permitted them to use a well-founded mission as the springboard for the next mission to be established.

Sinaloa (1591). This was the first mission founded among wholly barbaric and unconverted tribes. The governor of the region, Rodrigo del Río Losa, summoned the Jesuits in the hope of facilitating and consolidating the Spanish dominion over numerous and most warlike native inhabitants. Sinaloa did not become a diocese until 1883, although the Council of the Indies inquired as early as 1638 about the feasibility of organizing the area into a bishopric.

The uprisings of the natives that led to the martyrdom of Tapia in 1594 might well have spread and continued to the extinction of the entire group of missions had Captain Diego Martínez de Hurdaide not come on the scene shortly afterward. He knew how to win over the loyalty of the natives and inspire fear in those intent on the annihilation of the Spaniards. By 1605 the numerous tribes of the Bamoas, Níos, Guazaves, Tamazulas, Ahomes, Zuaques, Tehuecos, and Sinaloas had in great part been converted. Prominent among the missionaries of the area was Michael Wadding, still more famous for his treatise on mystical theology.

The missionary effort extended ever northward, from one valley to the next, until all the tribes (Tzoes, Huites, Bacoburitos, Chicoratos, and Yecoratos) had been brought into the Church. The more general native language was Cahita; numerous other languages and dialects were spoken in the various missions. In the 1662 report to Propaganda Fide 16 missionaries were attending to 38 native settlements, administering to 21,912 native inhabitants, and conducting 16 schools for the native children. At the time of the expulsion (1767) 21 missionaries were working in approximately 50 settlements and administering to some 30,000 natives.

Parras (now Parras de la Fuente), Coahuila (1598–1652). The Jesuit missionaries had heard about the native inhabitants in the vicinity of this outpost as early as 1594 and had done some apostolic work among the natives, but the definitive foundation of this group of missions was not effected until 1598. The missions were extended rapidly during the years 1602 to 1608. Despite frequent uprisings of the natives and epidemics, the missions of the area were sufficiently developed to allow their incorporation (1652) into the already established (1623) Diocese of Durango.

Acaxees and Xiximíes (1592). These natives lived in the group of missions termed San Andrés and Topia, among the most inaccessible mountains in the upper reaches of the Piastla, San Lorenzo, and Culiacán Rivers. Whereas most of the other Jesuit missionaries received only 300 pesos annually and 35 for the school they conducted for the native children, those here were allotted an additional 50 pesos because of the hardships entailed and the exceptional difficulties in securing supplies. Two outstanding missionaries devoted their lives to the natives of this area: Hernando de Santarén, the founder of the missions and martyr of the neighboring Tepehuanes; and Pedro Gravina, his successor. According to the 1662 report 12 missionaries were working in 41 widely scattered and thinly populated settlements, conducting 12 schools for the native children and attending to 3,851 native inhabitants. At the close of 1753, 11 of the most highly developed missions were turned over to the diocesan clergy of Durango.

Tepehuanes (1596). Their homeland lay to the east of the Acaxees and Xiximíes and extended south of the Tarahumares as far as Navarit. This relatively small area was the most difficult of all missions to establish and administer. November of 1618 witnessed the violent death of eight missionaries. This seemingly fatal blow served to inspire numerous volunteers to replace them and extend their apostolate. Guanaceví, Zape, San Ignacio, Santa Catarina, and Papasquiaro were the principal centers. The lingua franca was Tepehuana, although Nahuatl, Tarahumara, and Salinera were spoken in several of the missions. The 1662 report records only four missionaries attending to 11 settlements and four schools for the native children and administering to 2,356 native inhabitants. In 1753 the missions were considered sufficiently developed to be incorporated into the Durango diocese.

Tarahumara Baja (1607). These missions are important not only for their intrinsic significance but also because they served as the springboard for the two most extensive groups: Tarahumara Alta and Sonora. So restless and hostile were the natives that it was not until 1630 that the first permanent mission could be established among them at San Miguel Bocas. Even after the founding of several missions, the native inhabitants revolted and slew their missionaries in 1645, 1648 to 1650, and 1652. In 1662 only five missionaries were working in Chihuahua, attending to 11 settlements and five schools for the native children and administering to 3,400 native inhabitants.

The Yaquis, Mayos, Tepahues, and Conicaris (1614). These warlike tribes lived along the northern Pacific coast in the valleys of the Yaqui and Mayo Rivers, directly in the path of the northwestern movement of the Jesuit missionary apostolate. The 1740 uprising was particularly destructive to the missions and threatened to undo the work of more than a century. At the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767, the missions were not sufficiently developed to be incorporated into any diocese. With missionaries sufficient to attend to only a few of the main centers, many of the native inhabitants, especially the Yaquis, reverted to paganism and were lost to Christianity.

Sonora (1614). This was the most extensive of all the Mexican mission territories. Christianity came to it with the conversion of the Nebomes (southern and northern tribes), followed by that of numerous other nations. Of particular significance was the conversion of the Guázavas in 1646, their homeland serving as the gateway to more distant nations. In 1662 there were 17 missionaries working in 17 centers, each with its native Mexican school, attending to 40 settlements and administering to 17,790 natives. A new era for the Sonora missions began in 1687 with the coming of Eusebio Francisco Kino to the Pimería center of Dolores. Some 40 expeditions to the west along the Gulf of California, to the junction of the Gila and Colorado Rivers, and to Casa Grande in the present state of Arizona, along the San Pedro and Santa Cruz Rivers, not only awakened an interest in Christianity and repeated requests for missionaries, but also led to the founding of numerous successful centers with thriving native communities instructed in their new faith and in a better way of life economically and socially. By every norm Kino ranks as the outstanding missionary of the Mexican province; to the tragic disadvantage of the entire vast territory there was no one of his ability to replace him at his death in 1711. The 1751 revolt, launched with the assassination of Fathers Teflo and Ruhen, threatened to spread to the entire mission territory. At the time of the expulsion (1767), 29 priests were working in as many centers and attending to some 60 settlements.

Chínipas (1621). This group of missions lay to the southwest of the Tarahumares and Tepehuanes. Although the Jesuits had preached to these native inhabitants as early as 1601, no permanent mission could be founded until 1621. Two of the pioneering apostles, Julio Pascual and Manuel Martínez, were slain by the natives in 1632. In 1767, 12 missionaries were working among these native inhabitants, having added new missions to the group a few years previously, for a total of 12 centers, each with several dependent stations.

Tarahumara Alta (1673). This group of missions was a continuation of the Baja foundations. They were situated in the modern state of Chihuahua and, together with the Baja group, covered an area approximately the same as the modern Tarahumara missions. Numerous and fierce native uprisings made this one of the most difficult mission areas; particularly destructive was the 1690 rebellion, which claimed the lives of Juan Foronda and Manuel Sánchez. In 1767 (the two Tarahumara groups had previously been fused into one) 19 priests were working in 18 centers and attending to approximately 60 native settlements.

Baja, California (1697). Jesuits participated in several expeditions to Lower California before Juan María Salvatierra founded the first permanent settlement at Loreto in 1697. He was joined by Francisco M. Piccolo and Juan de Ugarte. Before they were expelled in 1768, the Jesuits had founded some 15 main mission centers, each with dependent stations. In 1745 the mission population was about 4,000; in 1762, nearly 8,000; and in 1768, slightly more than 7,000.

Nayarit (1716). The Jesuit mission group lay in the eastern part of the present state of Nayarit, extending from Santa Teresa in the north across the high plateau of Trinidad to Guaynarnota (San Ignacio) in the south. The almost inaccessible terrain made both the military and the spiritual conquest exceptionally difficult. At the time of the expulsion (1767), there were seven missionaries working in as many mission centers and attending to numerous dependent stations.

Modern Missions. The Jesuit Order, suppressed in 1773 by Clement XIV, was universally restored by Pius VII in 1814. A few surviving Mexican Jesuits returned to the home province in 1816 at the height of the independence movement. Although a few of the schools and churches were given back, none of the Mexican missions was returned until 1900, when the Jesuits were asked to take over the Tarahumara (Chihuahua) group. Not even the fierce persecution by Calles (1926–29) succeeded in imprisoning or exiling all of the missionaries. In 1964, one vicar apostolic, Bishop Salvador Martínez Aguirre, SJ, 22 priests, six seminarists, and 13 lay brothers were working in these missions. The main centers are: Sisoguichi, Carichí, Chínipas, Cerocahui, Batopilas, Norogachi, Guadalupe y Calvo, and Chinatfú. Schools are conducted in Sisoguichi, Creel, San Juanito, Batopilas, Carichí, Cerocahui, Chinatfú, Guadalupe y Calvo, and Norogachi. In 1959 the Mexican Jesuits of the southern province founded missions in the area near Chilón called Bachajón and in the state of Chiapas in southern Mexico. At no time have the Jesuits of Mexico administered permanent missions in Central America.

South America

Thousands of religious of various orders worked in catechizing and civilizing the native peoples in Spanish South America through the mission system. The Mercedarians were active in the colonial period in Peru, Gran Colombia, and La Plata. The DOMINICANS, who first lived in convents in America as they had in Spain, left their convents because of the lack of diocesan clergy and went out to the doctrinas. They learned the native languages and as early as 1548 published a Doctrina Cristiana in Spanish and Mexican for the use of their missionaries. In 1560 Domingo de Santo Tomás published a Quechua grammar. In the 17th century, when the mission system proper developed, the Dominicans established their oldest mission (1624) among the Canelos natives; it still exists as the Apostolic Prefecture of Canelos. The Dominicans in the 20th century also supervise an apostolic vicariate in Peru and missions in Colombia. However, the most active orders in the missionary work in Spanish South America, over its whole history, have been the Franciscans and the Jesuits. Among the orders that have been expanding or entering mission work in the 19th and 20th centuries are the Augustinians and the Salesians.

Franciscans. In 1505 the Franciscan province of Santa Cruz was founded on the island of Española. From there the Franciscans extended their apostolate throughout the Caribbean Islands, especially Cuba and Puerto Rico. In about 1511 they established in the recently founded Santa Maria de la Antigua, Darién, the first convent on the continent. Between 1514 and 1522, they carried out a successful missionary attempt on the coast of Cumaná, Venezuela. By way of Panama and Nicaragua, the Franciscans reached Ecuador and Peru. A Franciscan, Juan de los Santos, accompanied Pizarro on his explorations. Marcos de Niza went with Alvarado from Guatemala to Ecuador (1531-32). In 1532 the order decided to establish the Custody of Peru. In about 1553 the province of the Twelve Apostles was established permanently at Lima, and under its jurisdiction were all the Franciscans of South America until 1565 when the independent provinces of Santafé de Bogotá, San Francisco de Quito, and the Holy Trinity of Chile were created. Later the territories of Upper Peru—under the title of San Antonio de los Charcas—and Rio de la Plata were established as provinces. The province of Santa Cruz Española began to extend itself throughout Venezuela after 1575.

Many of these first activities had a missionary character, although the religious were engaged also in ministering to the conquistadors and the colonists. It is impossible to separate clearly these functions from those properly termed missionary, because at all times expeditions were made to the pagan native inhabitants. However, what were called "conversions" or living missions, as opposed to the doctrinas or parishes of native inhabitants already converted, began in the 17th century, after the period of consolidation of the conquest. Sometimes exploratory or conquering expeditions led the way; at other times the missionaries preceded the conquistadors and the colonists.

Venezuela. The province of Santa Cruz did not maintain missions in the sense mentioned, but the "Missions of Píritu," so called because the first was established in the little town of that name in the eastern part of the country, achieved true importance. They started in 1656 and were under the direct supervision of the superior general of the order. Shortly before their destruction during the war for independence, in the second decade of the 19th century, the Píritu missionaries had in their charge 65 villages and missionary posts in the territories corresponding to the modern states of Anzoátegui and Guayana.

Colombia. Although Francisco de Aragón appeared in Santa Marta in 1534, and Juan de San Filisberto visited the recently established city of Bogotá in 1540 or 1541, the order was not established in Colombia until 1550. The first superior, Jerónimo de San Miguel, was responsible for the humanitarian legislation that regulated the work of the native rowers on the Magdalena River. The first two archbishops of Bogotá were the Franciscans Juan de los Barrios and Luis Zapata. Also in the 16th century, another Franciscan, Sebastián de Ocando, occupied the See of Santa Marta. Later the Franciscans maintained missions in the Chocó region-where Matías Abad distinguished himself in the mid-17th century—and in Los Ilanos, where they ministered to eight villages in 1775. About 1678-80, they attempted to establish in Los Ilanos a missionary bishopric, with its see at Santiago de las Atalayas. Juan Doblado, who had been connected with those missions since at least 1667, was proposed as the first bishop. Not until the 19th century was the idea partially realized with the consecration as auxiliary bishop of Bogotá of the Franciscan José Antonio Chaves. He lived at Casanare, and concerned himself with the improvement of the missions. In the 18th century the College of the Propagation of the Faith at Cali and Popayán accomplished much missionary work in the region of the Putumayo and Caquetá Rivers.

Ecuador. The Franciscans were the first and the principal evangelists of the territory of Quito. In the second half of the 16th century, they had in their charge "most of the doctrinas in the native villages," according to an account sent to visitor Ovando. An incomplete list of 1646 still assigned them more than 20. From 1632 they made several attempts to reach the Amazon, which they finally achieved in 1636 or 1637. This was the prologue to a great missionary effort in the Napo River area, actually started in 1647. When at the end of the 17th century, these missions were put into the hands of the Jesuits, the Franciscans concentrated their efforts on the Putumayo and Caquetá territories, tenaciously maintained in spite of many difficulties. Around 1739 the Franciscans ministered to 21 villages there. In 1736 the Franciscans of Quito established a mission among the Jíbaro natives in the province of Macas, which did not continue then but was resumed later. Upon the expulsion of the Jesuits from the missions of Mainas in 1767, the Franciscans took charge of them. In 1774, 18 Franciscans were working there in an equal number of villages. When the territory of Mainas was added to the viceroyalty of Peru (1802), its missions were transferred to the charge of the community of Ocopa.

Peru. Ocopa was the first Missionary College of the Propagation of the Faith founded in South America (1724). Its founder, Francisco de San José, of the community of Querétaro, Mexico, had previously worked in Central America, especially among the native people of Talamanca (Costa Rica). Having gone to Peru in 1708 as assistant commissioner of the missions of Propaganda Fide, he gave new drive to the missionary activities of the Franciscans there. At his death in 1736, the missionaries of the new community had spread through the Montaña of Peru, ministering to almost 8,000 native inhabitants. Almost all of this was lost in the uprising of Santos Atahualpa (1742), which dominated those territories for more than a decade, but the Franciscans were able to bring back all those conversions, at the cost of tremendous hardships and the death of several religious. Ocopa, the main missionary center in eastern Peru during the 18th century, came to be so again in the 19th century, after a brief eclipse during the wars for independence. In the 20th century it was one of the main bases for the missions in the region of the Ucayali River. Its apostolate extended to other parts of Peru and even outside it. From it, directly or indirectly, came the founders of all the other missionary communities that existed in South America. Many of its missionaries—outstanding among them was Manuel Sobreviela—contributed, besides, in great measure to the geographic knowledge about Peru with their diaries, descriptions, and maps.

The work of the community of Ocopa was the continuation of a long history of missionary activity by the Franciscans of Peru. In 1619 Gregorio de Bolívar had undertaken the conversion of the Panatahua people on the banks of the Huallaga River; his work was continued by Felipe de Luyando and others. Beginning in 1632 from Panama, which was a dependency of Lima, an attempt was made to evangelize the Idibá of Gorgona on the coast of Colombia. Shortly thereafter (1635) were established the first missions of Cerro de la Sal, and the advance toward the Ucayali was started, an area explored by Manuel Biedma during that century. About 1686 the mission of the Cunivo was established on the upper Ucayali, where another great missionary appeared—Francisco Huerta. A noteworthy aspect of Franciscan missionary history in Peru is its relationship with far-off Oceania. Franciscans figured both in the expeditions of discovery organized in the second half of the 16th century and in those sent toward the end of the 18th (1772-76) by Viceroy Amat.

Bolivia. The missionary history of Bolivia is the same as that of Peru since it formed a part of the province of the Twelve Apostles of Peru until 1607. Among the later missionary undertakings was the expedition to the Chuncho to the northwest of La Paz by the already mentioned Gregorio de Bolívar about 1621, continued by Bernardino de Cárdenas with great heroism, although without permanent success. Bolívar made an expedition to the Motilón, by way of Chapapoyas, about 1627; having failed in this attempt also, in 1631, he penetrated from Chuquisaca (modern Sucre) into the unknown regions of the east, from which he never returned. Cárdenas, wellacquainted with the Quechua and Aymara languages, was put in charge of a campaign of popular missions among the native inhabitants who were already baptized but needed more instruction.

The expeditions of Bolívar and Cárdenas from La Paz were the antecedents of the missions of Apolobamba, which the Franciscan province of Charcas (this was its official title) organized in the second half of the 17th century. Later they were extended by the missionaries of the College of Moquegua, Peru, founded in 1775, and finally came to be a part of the Apostolic Vicariate of Beni, still under the direction of the Franciscans. The College of Moquegua in southern Bolivia was established by religious originating from the College of Tarija, which had been founded in 1755 by missionaries from the College of Ocopa. The College of Tarija worked especially among the Chiriguano people of the Chaco region, a task that the Franciscans still continue. Among the first missionaries was the lay brother Francisco del Pilar, who established some 17 reductions. In the restoration of missionary activity in Bolivia in the 19th century after the wars for independence, Andrés Herrero worked tirelessly to recruit missionaries in Spain and Italy. With the principal aim of ministering to the former Jesuit missions among the Mojo, the missionary college of Tarata was established toward the end of the 18th century, with a group of 25 Franciscans brought from Spain by Bernardo Jiménez Bejarano. His missionaries worked among the Yuracaré, Mosetén, and Guarayo. In 1930 the Austrian Franciscans of the province of St. Leopold of the Tyrol took charge of these missions.

Chile. The Franciscans reached Chile in 1553, coming from Lima. Their leader was Martín de Robleda. The order expanded so rapidly that in 1565 an independent province could have been established there, but none was until 1571. The Diocese of Santiago was governed by three Franciscans during the 16th century, among whom Diego de Medellín (1573–93) is considered to have been the true organizer of the bishopric; in the 17th century two other Franciscans occupied the episcopal see: Juan Pérez de Espinosa and Diego de Umansoro. The other bishopric of Chile, La Imperial, had as its first bishop Antonio de San Miguel, a veteran Franciscan missionary from Peru; among his successors in the 17th century was the Franciscan writer Luis Gerónimo de Oré (1620-30). The violence of the Araucanian War and other unfortunate circumstances—among them, the disastrous earthquake of 1647-made its missionary work slow. True missions were not developed until the 18th century, with the founding of apostolic colleges of Propaganda Fide. The first of them was established in Chillán in 1756 by missionaries from the College of Ocopa. They set to work with considerable success among the indomitable Araucanians, among whom they had founded five missions by 1789. Shortly thereafter, they received the missions that had belonged to the Jesuits in the Valdivia region and in the archipelago of Chiloé. The latter ones were turned over to the College of Ocopa in 1771. In Valdivia, where the Jesuits had only left two missions, the missionaries of Chillán had founded six new ones before 1789. The missions of the College of Chillán as well as those of Castro received fresh impetus in the 19th century. The Castro missions reached the Strait of Magellan, where the Franciscans had tried to establish themselves in the 16th century.

Rio de La Plata. Two great Franciscan missionaries lived in this area during the 16th and the early 17th centuries: St. Francis Solano at Tucumán and Luis de Bolaños in Paraguay. Later, the Franciscans worked among the Charrúa Indians on the Banda Oriental (Uruguay), and among the Ocloyas and Tobas of Jujuy. In 1784 the College of San Carlos was established, in the modern village of San Lorenzo, Santa Fe. It was the first founding of a college of Propaganda Fide in the area, and it was owing principally to the efforts of Juan Matud, the commissary of missions for South America, who as early as 1754 wanted to establish it at Rio Cuarto, in the center of Argentina. The new community was concerned primarily with the missions in the Chaco. In the 19th century a missionary college was finally founded at Rio Cuarto for the Indians of the pampa, where Marcos Donati distinguished himself. For the conversion of the native people of the Bermejo River in El Chaco, a missionary college was established at Salta.

Jesuits. The first Jesuits in Spanish South America arrived in Peru in April 1568. Seven missionaries sent by the general Francis Borgia, with Jerónimo Ruiz de Portillo as provincial, first lived in Lima. In 1569 they took charge of two doctrinas: El Cercado, a district of the capital, and the area of Huarochirí, which included 77 villages and, provisionally, Andaguaillas (Apurímac). In 1570 they founded the College of Cuzco, intending to extend their efforts to the east. In the next few years they explored the area around Lake Titicaca and established doctrinas at Juli, Potosí, and Santa Cruz de la Sierra (1586). They made sporadic entradas to the north in the area of the Maranhão River and into the sub-Andean zone. In the south they established the College of Arequipa and entered Tucumán, Argentina, in 1585.

After this first deployment, the Jesuit missionaries spread widely through Spanish South America: into the modern Peruvian departments of Huánuco, Libertad, and Ayacucho; into Bolivia, where the mission to the Moxos developed 16 reductions with 24,914 Christian native inhabitants; the mission to the Chiquitos had 11 reductions with a total of 19,981; and that to the Chiriguanos eventually ministered to 20,100. In 1574 Jesuits from Lima went into Ecuador along the Peruvian border and evangelized in the regions of Yaguarzongo, Jaén, and Quijos and on into the Amazon jungle from the Napo River to the Guallaga, Ucayale, and the mouth of the Río Negro (today in Brazil); they moved also into the area between the Tigre, Napo, and Maranhão in the modern Peruvian department of Loreto. This mission activity grew to include 18,234 Christians in 32 villages. Jesuits from Peru also went down into Chile from 1593 on and evangelized in the districts of Melipilla, Rere, Castro, Arauco, Laja, Lautaro, Traiguén, Valdivia, Chillán, and Chiloé. In Araucania they established 91 missionary stations, in Chiloé 77 for 10,478 Indians. In Colombia the society was active from 1599 spreading out from Bogotá and Quito into Urabá and Turebo, Nariño and Cauca, then into the llanos, along the banks of the Meta River and so on. Their apostolic journeys went as far as Caracas, Guiana, and Cuba. Argentina was entered by the Jesuits from Chile about 1650. They worked in Patagonia and on down to the Strait of Magellan, as well as up into the pampas area near Buenos Aires and on to Salta and Tucumán. Among the Mocobíes, the Abipones, the Vilelas, and the Lules, they had 17 reductions with a population of about 3,000. Beginning in 1614 the Jesuits entered Venezuela from Colombia and French Guiana. They established six reductions along the upper Orinoco and the Río Negro. To these should be added the enclave of reductions in Paraguay-Uruguay. Thus the Jesuit missions formed a continuous line from the Pacific shore of Colombia through Ecuador, Bolivia, Paraguay, Uruguay, and down through Patagonia, extending branches out to the Guianas in the north and to Chile in the south.

Mission Methods. After the first period (1493–1556) in which the Church was established in Spanish America came an era of development (1566-1700). During this time about 75 percent of the South American Jesuit community was involved in mission work. The difficulties they encountered arose from the geography and climate, from the numerical disproportion between the size of the native population to be cared for and the number of active missionaries, from the psychology of the native peoples and their almost constant state of warfare, from the intrusions of the European settlers in moral, social, political, and economic matters, and from the intrinsic nature of the process of transculturation that was taking place. The mission system expanded to include the intelligence and the will, the imagination and the affections of the native and his whole physical being; his family, tribal, fraternal, and national community; his whole world of individual and social interests. Various means were used. To appeal to the intellect, native languages were used in catechisms, in sermons, and in the specialized schools for the sons of the caciques. Their wills were trained in the group discipline of the reductions and the villages. Teachers used visual and acoustical aids: the catechism was memorized by musical recitation; religious architecture and sculpture and painting educated the native inhabitant's artistic feeling. The missionary stressed a paternalistic attitude and a defense of the native against the white settlers to create a sympathetic bond. He also provided medical care in hospitals, hygienic arrangements in the native dwellings, and adequate food. Within the mission native inhabitants took part in the direction of activities, gaining a spirit of cooperation in schools of arts and crafts and in liturgical activities.

End of the Jesuit Missions. This Jesuit missionary activity was cut off by the royal decree of Charles III of Spain, Feb. 27, 1767, which ordered the expulsion of the Society of Jesus from Spanish territory. The Jesuits had to abandon their mission posts and embark for Europe. In general this meant the ruin of their work. There were few missionaries to take their place and many were moved into areas of which they knew nothing. Some native people used this as an excuse to reassert their own autonomy and leave the missions at a time of moral deterioration among the religious orders generally. The actions of the civil government were unwise: missions were secularized, a separation was made between the powers of the laity and the clergy, and the consequence was the demoralization of the native inhabitants and a diminution of their respect for the missionary.

Augustinians. The following are the missions of the modern period.

Peru. In 1965 the Augustinians administered two mission territories. The Vicariate Apostolic of Iquitos, a territory of about 90,000 square kilometers in northeastern Peru, is an area of tropical jungle in the upper reaches of the Amazon basin. About half of the estimated 100,000 inhabitants (1963) lived in the one major town, Iquitos; the remainder were seminomadic tribesmen who were scattered along the many rivers. When Augustinians from Spain took charge of the territory in 1900, it was a prefecture about three times larger than the later vicariate. The mission was raised to a vicariate apostolic in 1921, and the boundaries were fixed in 1945, after several divisions of the original territory. Five friars, led by the first prefect apostolic, Paulino Díaz (1900-11), arrived in 1901. By 1963 there were 32 Augustinians under the jurisdiction of Angel Rodríguez Gamoneda, conducting many mission stations, five parishes, a secondary school in Iquitos, several primary schools, a radio station, and a seminary in Nauta. There were two native-born Augustinian priests. Of the total population, only about 500 were as yet unbaptized.

The prelature nullius of Chulucanas, erected in 1964, comprised the eastern half of the Diocese of Piura in northwestern Peru. This territory, about 13,000 square kilometers, had a population of almost 300,000; about 38,000 persons lived in the see city of Chulucanas. In 1964, the U.S. Augustinians, led by the prelate nullius John C. McNabb, took charge of the territory.

Bolivia. The Augustinian Order had foundations in Bolivia from the early days of the Spanish conquest. The mission at Cochabamba was established in 1569. After their disappearance in the 19th century, however, the Augustinians did not return to Bolivia until four friars came from Holland in 1930. The founder of the mission was Thomas H. Van der Vloodt (d. 1934). In the Archdiocese of La Paz, the Dutch Augustinians were assigned to South Yungas, a territory of about 3,400 square kilometers, with a population of 30,500, in which the principal town is Chulumani. In 1939 they established a large parish in La Paz. In 1950 they began in Cochabamba a secondary school, which offers scientific and technical education for 300 students.

Salesians. Juan Cagliero and nine Salesians arrived in Buenos Aires Dec. 14, 1875, but it was not until 1879 that they entered the missionary area of Patagonia, of which their founder, Don Bosco, had dreamed. José Fagnano became superior there in January 1880, and the missionaries traveled over the area up to the cordillera. When Cagliero was made vicar apostolic of Patagonia in 1885, Fagnano took charge of southern Patagonia in both Chilean and Argentine boundaries. Their jurisdiction covered one million square kilometers. Cagliero worked out a mission circuit and Fagnano concentrated on bringing the native inhabitants into reductions, which also brought some industrial development to the area.

In 1886 Evasio Rabagliati founded the first Salesian establishment in Chile. Though they were requested by Colombia in that year, Salesian missionaries did not go there until 1890 under the leadership of Father Unia, who worked among the lepers at Agua de Dios. In 1891 Antonio Riccardi began the apostolate in Peru. Bishop Cagliero started extending his missions into Chubut in 1892 and on to the pampas in 1896. By 1934 those missions had been organized into six dioceses. Bishop Luis Lasagna founded the Salesian missions in Matto Grosso, Brazil, and from there moved on into Paraguay. The missions of Ecuador were founded by Angel Savio, who did not live to see them flourish. Bishop Santiago Costamagna took charge of the missions among the Jíbaros in 1895. Salesians began work in Mexico in 1892.

Borderlands

Spanish missionary activity in the so-called Borderlands dates from the 1540s. (The Borderlands may be defined as that southerly strip of territory of the United States comprising Florida-Georgia and extending along the Gulf Coast into Texas, across the Southwestern states, and finally up the Pacific Coast to include California.)

Early Expeditions. Dominican friars were with the De Soto expedition in 1539, but they were along as chaplains rather than as apostles of the gospel. In that same year (1539) Fray Marcos de Niza was in Arizona, maybe even in New Mexico, but this Franciscan was on a reconnaissance tour to the Seven Golden Cities, or Cíbola, on orders from New Spain's Viceroy, Don Antonio de Mendoza. When Fray Marcos and several Franciscan companions went north in the following year with the Coronado party, they too were serving as chaplains. One of the Franciscans, Fray Juan de Padilla, remained behind when the Coronado group returned to Mexico. He is really the first missionary in the Borderlands, for he went back to Quivira (central Kansas) in order to bring the faith to the Native Americans whom he had met there. At their hands he met his death, probably in 1544, and to him goes the distinction of being the first "martyr" on the soil of the future United States.

Florida. The Floridas had defied conquest by Juan Ponce de León, by Pánfilo Narváez, and by Hernando de Soto before Fray Luis Cancer and several Dominican companions tried (1549) by peaceful means to subdue the area's native inhabitants. They died in the attempt to emulate the methods and successes of their famous confrere Fray Bartolomé de LAS CASAS. In 1566 the Spaniards under Don Pedro Menéndez de Avilés took possession of the peninsula at St. Augustine in order to prevent this strategic area along the homeward route of the silver galleons from falling into enemy hands (the French had attempted to hold and colonize it earlier in that decade). Once in control, Menéndez in characteristic Spanish fashion prepared to introduce missionaries. In 1565 three Jesuits arrived to inaugurate missionary activity. Their leader, Padre Pedro Martinez, was killed along the Georgia coast. His two companions withdrew to St. Augustine to serve the needs of the Spaniards until replacements arrived. Ten Jesuits reached there in 1568 and opened mission stations along the coast as far as South Carolina. Two years later, under Padre Juan Baptista Segura, a band went northward to the future Virginia; but six in the party were murdered. In 1572 the two survivors were withdrawn and sent to Mexico, where the Jesuits were opening their apostolate.

In 1573 a band of Franciscans arrived, but, meeting with fierce hostility from the natives, they decided to withdraw until such time as the military could establish better order in the province. In the mid-1580s, with Fray Alonso de Reynoso as the great proponent of missionary activity in Florida, the Franciscans returned, remaining until the English occupation of 1763. By about 1650 the Franciscans had more than 50 missionaries in the Floridas, serving approximately 30 doctrinas (mission centers). After 1670, however, the arrival of the English in the Carolinas signaled the beginning of the end, even before James Oglethorpe and his colonists settled in Georgia in the 1730s. Constant border fighting pushed back the mission frontier and destroyed the Christian villages. When the British gained possession of the peninsula by the Peace of Paris (1763), most of the missions had been destroyed or were abandoned. Florida has a few mission reminders of Spanish days.

Louisiana. Disregarding strict chronological sequence, brief mention should be made of the area of the lower Mississippi basin. This was French territory in more senses than that of political dominion. At the end of the 17th century the French had penetrated the great valley, including both the Louisiana and the Illinois country. P. Le M. d'Iberville's expedition arrived on the Gulf Coast in 1699. The French settled first at Biloxi, then moved over to Mobile, and in 1718 shifted their capital to New Orleans. Missionary activity opened almost immediately. The Jesuits worked with the Native Americans, and the Capuchins served the settlers.

In 1762 France, badly beaten in the French and Indian War, by a secret treaty ceded the western half of her Louisiana claims to Spain before going to the peace table at Paris. Spain remained in control of Louisiana, thus abbreviated, until 1800. During the years of Spanish possession there was little, if any, concerted missionary effort expended in the former French area. The French Jesuits had been expelled by royal decree in 1763, stripping the missions of their pastors. No replacements arrived from either France or Canada, and Spain had few to send. During this time the Capuchins and the Spanish priests could barely care for the needs of the settlers. Some little attention was given to the Native Americans in the Illinois country by Canadian and later by French refugee priests; but none of this rose to the status of real missionary effort. Thus the Spaniards in Louisiana left no Christianizing mark on the Indians of the Mississippi Valley proper.

New Mexico. In the area to the west, more commonly designated as the Spanish Borderlands, the Spanish mission enterprise was more extensive, thorough, and successful. The impetus out of New Spain (Mexico) into this region resulted in the late 18th century in the organization of the administrative unit of the Provincias Internas. The mission activity was integral to the three-pronged Spanish advance to the north: the center reached into New Mexico and looked beyond to the Great Plains; the right, or east, flank moved toward and across the lower Rio Grande into Texas; the left flank edged up the so-called West Corridor, along the Gulf of California, and ultimately reached the Golden Gate.

By mid-16th century the Age of the Conquistadores in North America had ended, and the slower, more prosaic but more enduring type of frontier expansion got underway, as the Spaniards moved into and began to exploit the rich silver belt of north central and northern Mexico. The Franciscans were with the first miner-settler waves that went northward. At the end of the century, when they accepted the call to form the spiritual arm of the thrust into the Pueblo country, the Jesuits began founding missions along both slopes of the Sierra Madre Occidental. The Franciscans continued to staff the missions on the more easterly flank of the northward advance. By the first years of the 18th century the sons of St. Francis were on the lower Rio Grande, as well as along its New Mexican reaches, while the Jesuits were inching into the future Arizona.

In 1598, when Don Juan de Oñate went north to lay foundations of the outpost province of Nuevo México, Franciscans were in his company. Within the next years, after the Spaniards had established control through the country, the friars fanned out to the pueblos and began the work of Christianization. Early in the 17th century they pushed westward and likewise established themselves in the mesa towns of the Hopi. Things went rather well until 1680; there were successes and setbacks, but the number of converts climbed high into five figures. Then in 1680 came the devastating Pueblo revolt, which temporarily put an end to all Spanish activity in the province. The Franciscans lost a score of men, and more than 400 Spanish settlers were massacred. The rest managed to escape southward and found protection at Paso del Norte. Missions were established in the neighborhood for the Christian Native Americans who were refugees from the pueblos that were located up the river. The reconquest of New Mexico was effected in the 1690s by Don Diego de Vargas, and most of the old mission sites among the Pueblo Indians were reopened. However, neither the Franciscans nor the Jesuits, probing from the south in the next century, were able to bring the Hopi missions back into existence. The work of the Franciscans went on through the 18th century, leaving a Christian imprint on the Pueblos and their neighbors who survived the days of decline in the early 19th century, as well as the influx of Anglo-Americans at mid-century. Brown-robed friars later replaced their blue-robed brethren of earlier times and carry on the mission traditions.

Texas. Spanish interest in Texas was minimal until the 1680s, when reports were received that R. C. de La Salle had sailed to the Gulf Coast. Fearing the presence of French rivals in a position from which they might threaten the rich silver provinces of northern Mexico, the Spaniards bestirred themselves and set out to look for La Salle. Although they learned that his attempt at settlement had ended in disaster, the Crown decided that Texas should be occupied by at least a token force. In 1690 soldiers and Franciscan missionaries moved east from the Rio Grande and set up on the Rio Neches, in east Texas. But, when there were no signs of a French follow-up expedition, the posts and missions were recalled.

By the second decade of the 18th century, however, Spanish officials recognized that the French threat had by no means passed. In 1714 L. J. de Saint-Denis and his trader band appeared on the Rio Grande, at San Juan Bautista. Two years later the decision was made to turn Texas into a buffer province, and in 1718 a party was laying the foundations of San Antonio. As usual, missions and missionaries figured in the Spanish plans for subduing and holding this new frontier. The Franciscans took up the work that D. Massanet and F. Hidalgo had been forced to interrupt about 20 years before. One of the important figures in this new missionary effort was Fray Antonio Margil de Jesús. Missions soon dotted the lower course of a number of the Texas rivers; and there was even an unrewarding attempt to domesticate the wild Apache from the inland station of San Sabá. Here, as elsewhere in the Borderlands, the foundations of Christianity were laid among the American natives, and some of the early historic monuments of Texas were constructed. These were not always appreciated by the Anglointruders of a later date who appropriated the province, arrogated the name for themselves, and worked to obliterate the vestiges of the Spanish background.

Arizona. By the beginning of the 18th century northward progress up the West Coast corridor had carried the Spanish frontier into the future United States. The Jesuits had been advancing up the west coast of Mexico, valley by valley, since 1591, from Sinaloa into Sonora. Late in the 17th century there came to Pimería Alta a remarkable Tyrolese Italian, Padre Eusebio Francisco KINO, one of the first of a line of non-Spaniards who contributed another chapter of the Borderlands story. Early in the new century Kino was dotting the upper Pimería and the Papaguería with stations that later had an Arizona address—Tumacacori, Guebavi, Bac.

After Kino's death (1711) there was a lull in activity on the Arizona frontier. Since the last years of the 17th century most of the Jesuits had been diverted to the new foundations on the California peninsula, where J. M. Salvatierra, F. M. Piccolo, J. de Ugarte, and their coworkers were opening up a new mission frontier. In the 1730s, however, the Sonota-Arizona region again began to hum with activity. Many northern European Jesuits were available to the Mexican superiors for assignment, and quite a few of them were detailed to the north. Strange names, by Spanish standards, appear in the story, such as Jacobo Sedelmayr, Ignatz Keller, Philipp Segesser, Caspar Stiger, Adam Gilg, Heinrich Ruhen, Gottfried Middendorff, Ignatz Pfefferkorn, and Joseph Och, to mention only a few. Missions spread up the San Pedro Valley and were set along the upper waters of the Gila as new tribes to the north and west were drawn into the mission circle.

As the third quarter of the 18th century moved past its midpoint, all seemed in readiness for the next big forward thrust, which Kino and Salvatierra had planned many years before—the Baja California chain and the Sonora-Arizona line were to be joined and moved in conjunction toward the "great harbor of Monterey." The Spaniards had long dreamed of occupying Alta California, but the royal budget could never quite provide for this expansion. Mission expenses were not always quite so prodigious, especially since the Jesuits had managed to enlist much nonroyal financial support, such as the moneys that started and nourished the famous Pious Fund. Then in 1767 the plan seemed to evaporate into thin air, as Charles III of Spain, following the pattern of the monarchs of Portugal and France, decreed the expulsion of the Jesuits from all his dominions, at home and overseas. The West Coast corridor missions were deprived of their pastors. Other religious orders were asked to fill the places; but most of them had little enough personnel to man the missions already assigned to them.

The Franciscans accepted the burden and the challenge. Their missionary seminary at Querétaro sent men into the Pimería; and the missionary Colegio de San Fernando, in the viceregal capital, offered replacements for the peninsular missions. Fray Francisco Garcés went to San Xavier del Bac in 1768 to begin a career as missionary and explorer; this kept the plan to occupy Monterey from dying. And to the peninsula, as presidente, came the man whose name is so importantly linked with the occupation and Christianization of the "last Borderland," Fray Junípero SERRA. Furthermore, when the Franciscans moved up to Alta California, Dominicans helped to staff the missions in the peninsula.

California. In addition to promulgating the decree expelling the Jesuits, Don José de Gálvez, the visitator general to New Spain in the 1760s, was instructed to investigate the soundness of the reports that the Russians were extending their trading enterprise southward from Alaska toward the California coast. In view of the trade that the Spaniards had built up with the East through the Manila galleons, they could ill afford to have California in the hands of a rival power. Gálvez carried out his commission and made arrangements for the occupation of Alta California.

In 1769 the expedition, divided into a sea and a land arm, set forth. Serra went with G. de Portolá and the main land party; Fray Juan Crespi went on ahead with the smaller advance party under Capt. F. Rivera. In that year the southern anchor of the future chain of California missions had been established at San Diego de Alcalá. In the next year San Carlos Borromeo was founded at Monterey. In 1776 Capt. Juan Bautista de Anza, commandant in Sonora, led the settler band to the Golden Gate and there laid the foundations of the San Francisco complex, presidio-pueblo-mission. Anza's close associate in the explorations that made possible this overland trek of settlers had been Garcés, who soon after (1780) met his death, along with two Franciscan brethren, at the hands of rebellious Yumas at the missions located near the junction of the Gila with the Colorado River.

The links of the California mission chain were gradually filled in during the last quarter of the century. The number of converts mounted; the province became moderately prosperous. After Serra's death (1784) others, such as F. F. de Lasuén carried on the work. Twelve years before the missions were secularized and the Pious Fund appropriated by the impecunious Mexican government, the friars pushed beyond the Golden Gate and built two last missions, at San Rafael and San Francisco de Solano, increasing the total to more than 20. Many of these are still preserved, and some are still in use as parish churches. Californians are much prouder of their mission heritage than are the Anglo-successors to the Spaniards in other parts of the Borderlands.

Missionaries Honored. Two of the Borderlands missionaries have been named to the National Statuary Hall in the Capitol, Washington, D.C., by the states in which they labored; California named Serra (1931), and Arizona accorded this distinction to Kino (1965).

Borderlands Revisited. Recent literature tends to criticize older studies of the borderlands missions, which in turn were highly influenced by Herbert Bolton's pioneering works. The anti-Boltonian school centers on Bolton's eurocentric approach which uncritically praised the civilizing efforts of the missionaries, but which paid little attention to the suffering which the Native Americans underwent in order to become "civilized." In fact, the Native Americans did not always submit peaceably to the new system. There were numerous rebellions against Spanish rule and the presence of the missionaries, one of the most notable being the Pueblo revolt of 1680. Furthermore, the methods used by the missionaries, which included coercion, have been held up to a more critical light. Junípero Serra, the Franciscan founder of the California missions, has been particularly singled out in this regard. When all is said and done, however, the missions undoubtedly did more good than harm and left an indelible imprint on the native peoples in the borderlands.

MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA, II (PORTUGUESE MISSIONS)

The history of the missions in Brazil can be divided into two characteristic periods: that from the discovery in 1500 to independence, and that from independence to 1964. The Society of Jesus began the work with the help of the Portuguese governors general, and other religious orders gradually joined in catechizing and civilizing the Brazilian native inhabitants.

1500 to 1822. The first missionaries in Brazil were the Franciscans Henrique de Coimbra and his companions together with Álvares Cabral, who raised the first cross at the mouth of the Mutari or Itacumirim on May 1, 1500. In the armadas of 1501 and the years immediately following came other priests and brothers, who went to Paraíba do Norte, Pôrto Seguro (1516), São Catarina, Iguaraçu (1521) and Pernambuco (1526). Systematic colonization (1530), led by Martim Afonso de Sousa, brought up the problem of organized evangelization. It was begun in Olinda in 1534, in São Vicente in 1535 and in Bahia in 1545. A group of Spanish Franciscans started the mission among the Carijós of Laguna (1538), but had to abandon it in 1548. Other attempts were made in Espírito Santo (1541), in Ilheus and Paraíba (1545), but all were in precarious condition in the middle of the century when a central government was established. Effective evangelization then began with the first contingent of Jesuit missionaries, led by the active Manuel da NÓBREGA (1549). While the Jesuits extended their work in Bahia, São Vicente, São Paulo and Pernambuco, the Carmelites arrived in Olinda (1580), where they founded the first convent in 1583. They spread to Salvador (1586), Santos (1589), Recife (1654) and in the south, to Rio de Janeiro (1590), São Paulo (1594), Angra dos Reis (1608), Mogi das Cruzes (1629), and Itú (1719). By the 18th century they had in Brazil three provinces with approximately 500 religious. In Maranhão they established themselves in São Luis (1615), Pará (1624), Gurupé (1639), Alcântara (1647), Bonfim (1718) and Vigia (1737). By 1674 there were 60 religious evangelizing the area of Alto Solimões, Rio Negro and other parts of the Amazon basin, where Father José da Madalena introduced vaccine in 1728. In Maranhão in 1722 they administered 15 missions and in 1751, 18. The number decreased considerably in the 19th century.

The Franciscan missions achieved a firm foundation in 1585 in Olinda. The seat of the first custody of the Friars Minor in Brazil was the convent of Na Sra das Neves with a novitiate (1586) and a school for native children. From here the Franciscans went to Bahia (1587), Iguaraçu (1588) and Paraíba and Espírito Santo (1589). The Indian missions gained importance at the end of the century through the work of Father Antônio de Campo Maior in Itapessima, Ponta das Pedras, and Itamaracá. In São Paulo a Franciscan convent was founded in 1639.

In the 17th century Capuchins established the province of Santo Antônio in Brazil (1657) with numerous foundations in Ipojuca and Recife (1606), Rio de Janeiro (1607), Pará (1617), Serinhaem (1630), Santos and São Paulo (1639), Espírito Santo (1650) and Aracaju (1687). In 1733 there were 15 convents, one hospice, and 13 missions among the native inhabitants. Simultaneously, the Franciscans continued to maintain houses and missions in Pará and in Maranhão. Those of the province of Santo Antônio in Belém possessed one convent and seven missions; those of the province of the Immaculate Conception, 1 convent in São Luis, and one hospice and one mission in Grão-Pará; and those of the province of Piedade in Pará, two hospices and ten missions. Noteworthy were the missions of the Padres da Piedade in Pará and in Rio Tocantins among the Cametás and Aruãs. In the division of 1693 these fathers received the missions of Gurupatuba, Urubaguara, Rio Paru and Jamundã and, in that of 1699, all the missions between Amazónas and Cabo Norte. From Quito (1632-34) they had also contacted the Tapuias of the Amazon and reached the Encabelados (1635). In 1637 Father Agostinho das Chagas and Father Domingos de Brieva along with Jesuits and Mercedarians accompanied Pedro Teixeira on his return to Pará (1638). The province of the Immaculate Conception of Rio de Janeiro in 1675 continued with the foundation of Cabo Frio (1687).

The French Capuchins, at the suggestion of María de Médicis, accompanied the expedition of La Ravardière (1611), beginning their evangelization on the island of Fernando de Noronha and continuing it in Maranhão from where Claude d' ABBEVILLE and Father Ivo d'Evreux sent to France (1612) a group of Tupinambas, who were baptized in Paris with great solemnity. When the French were expelled, the Capuchins had to abandon the mission (1615) and were replaced by Franciscans, Jesuits and Carmelites. In 1705 Italian Capuchins, constituted in the Prefectures of Bahia (1712), Pernambuco (1725) and Rio de Janeiro (1737), directed 17 native inhabitant settlements.

The Mercedarians entered Brazil with Pedro Teixeira on his return from Quito to Pará (1637–39) and founded there the convent of Na Sra das Mercês (1640), from which they spread to São Luis do Maranhão (1664), and to Alcântara, creating or administrating several missions in Urubu (1665) and in Amazonas (1699). Father Teodósio da Veiga was the one who initiated regular mission establishments as far as Aiurim on the Rio Negro (1668–69). Difficulties with the Trinitarians, which impeded their expansion in Portugal in the 17th and 18th centuries, limited their recruitment of personnel for Brazil. In 1785 Pius VI secularized some convents in Pará. In 1749 the Mercedarians were ordered to withdraw to Maranhão, and their properties were confiscated. In 1758 in Maranhão and in Pará they had only five Indian settlements.

Of all the male religious orders after the Jesuits, the Franciscans were the ones that prospered and exerted the most influence. Missionary activity was not limited to the teaching of the Christian doctrine. It opposed cannibalism vigorously, turned nomadic native inhabitants into sedentary peoples by means of settlements where they were taught cattle raising, arts and trades in which many became eminent, as well as utilization of hygiene and prophylaxis in times of epidemic when smallpox, yellow fever, or malaria produced terrible devastation. Peaceful expeditions among rival clans for the ransoming of prisoners or their establishment in healthful places appropriate for the raising of cattle saved thousands of natives from extermination. On punitive expeditions the missionaries attempted to lessen the penalties inflicted and to prevent unjust imprisonment. Since colonists fought with a shortage of manpower, the missionaries did not always prevent excesses. They even participated at times in these and took unscrupulous advantage of the captives, disobeying the laws of the Church and the king in the regulation or distribution of prisoners. Nevertheless, the total result was the Christianization and civilization of many Stone-Age savages in the 16th century.

The political-administrative reforms imposed by Pombal on the American missions, because of the drastic and sudden way in which they were executed, were disastrous both from a religious and from a socio-economic point of view. Culturally, the expulsion of the religious orders from the settlements marked a return to "obscurantism." The monastic decadence in the Portugal Pombaline period (1750–77) and in the liberal period up to 1820, followed by the subsequent extinction of the Portuguese religious orders in 1834, and the increase in Gallican and Jansenist influences, made missionary conditions in Brazil deplorable in the last days of the colonial period.

1822 to 1964. With the political agitation that preceded independence (Inconfidência Mineira of 1789) and followed it during the empire and with the influx of ideas of the French Revolution, of poorly assimilated Anglo-American liberalism, of regalism during the stay of the Portuguese court in Rio de Janeiro and of Masonry, the crisis begun by Pombal aggravated the situation of the missions in Brazil. During the empire Vidigal's instructions (1824) for the separation of Brazilian religious houses from their superiors in Europe, the extinction of Oratorian, Carmelite and Capuchin convents in Pernambuco in 1830, 1831, 1835 and 1840, in addition to the closing of the novitiates in 1855, pointed to a dismal future.

Fortunately, the popularity gained by the clergy and the religious orders in the civil struggles (1835–48) and in the wars with Argentina (1852) and Paraguay (1865–70), the zeal devoted to the missions, above all by the Italian Capuchins from 1843 and by the Sisters of Charity from 1849 and the agreement of the Holy See with Brazil on apostolic missions among the natives in 1862, backed by the liberties that the Republican Constitution of 1890 eventually guaranteed, all led to a new missionary expansion that is still going on throughout all of Brazil.

MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA, III (FRENCH MISSIONS)

The voyage undertaken by Giovanni da Verrazano in 1524 gave the French king Francis I a claim to certain areas in North America, but unlike Spain, France was slow in her New World colonization efforts because of her preoccupation with the so-called religious wars of the sixteenth century. Not unlike Spain and England, France envisioned a large colonial empire in North America, which, it was hoped, would bring economic benefits to the mother country. Between 1534 and 1542 Jacques Cartier undertook several voyages to North America, where he made extensive explorations with a view toward establishing a permanent French settlement. As a result of Cartier's first voyage, Francis I issued a royal commission for the founding of a permanent colony. In the commission to Cartier, the conversion of the native people of North America was mentioned as a prime incentive. This first attempt to plant a French colony ended unsuccessfully in 1542 because of the renewal that year of hostilities between Francis I and Emperor Charles V.

Early colonization efforts. Twenty years elapsed before a second attempt took place. Admiral Gaspard de Coligny planted a Huguenot settlement (1562) on the present Parris Island, S.C., but it was shortly abandoned in favor of Fort Caroline, near the mouth of the St. Johns River, Fla. In 1565 a Spanish contingent from St. Augustine under Pedro Menéndez de Avilés destroyed the fort. In 1605 a colony, originally established the year before on Saint Croix Island, was moved to Port Royal, Acadia (Nova Scotia). Abbé Jessé Fleché, who went there in 1610, carried on mission work among the Micmac tribes. Fleché was succeeded by two Jesuits, Pierre Biard (d. 1622) and Ennemond Massé (1574–1646), who arrived at Port Royal in 1611 under the patronage of the Marquise de Guercheville. In 1613 Biard and Massé joined with two fellow Jesuits, Reverend Jacques Quentin and Brother Gilbert du Thet, to establish a new mission near present-day Bangor, Maine, but they never reached their goal. In a surprise attack by Captain Samuel Argall of Virginia, Du Thet was killed and the others taken prisoner.

To Samuel de Champlain belongs the credit for the first permanent French settlement in North America. In 1608 Champlain founded the colony of Quebec, which in its early years owed its existence to his courage, determination, and organizational ability. Ideally located as a trade center, Quebec provided easy access to the St. Lawrence River, the Mississippi River, and the Atlantic Ocean. The first missionaries to arrive in Quebec were the French Franciscans (Récollets), who came in 1615 and ministered to the Montagnais, Hurons, Wyandots, and the Micmacs. They enjoyed little success, however. By 1625 six Jesuits arrived under Charles Lalemant (1587-1674); among them were Massé and Jean de Brébeuf (1593-1649). Disputes between England and France, as well as intermittent warfare, disrupted life in the colonies and added to the difficulties of the missionaries. In 1629 the English captured Quebec, and it was not restored to the French until 1632. In that year the Jesuits were entrusted by the Company of One Hundred Associates with the North American missions.

Following the restoration of 1632, French rule made itself felt in varying degrees and at different times from the northeast corner of the future United States through the system of great inland lakes and south through the valley of the Mississippi River to the Gulf of Mexico. New France provided the base for missionary activity in many parts of what is now the United States.

Maine. After the failure of the colonization efforts in 1604 and of the Jesuit missions (1611–13), the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith commissioned the Capuchins to take up the missionary work in Acadia. Between 1632 and 1654 the Capuchins established seven missions in Acadia, New Brunswick, and Maine. Following the English seizure of Fort Pentagoet (Castine), Maine (1654), the Capuchins closed their missions. In the meantime, the Jesuit Gabriel Druillettes visited the Abenaki Indians on the Kennebec River in 1646 in response to the indigenous people's appeal for a priest. He remained for a year, during which he studied the native language and customs. Druillettes made two subsequent visits before the English attack in 1654. During the 20 years that the Capuchins spent in the northeast missions, many of the Native American converts were removed to tribal villages or reductions near Quebec, such as Sillery, St. François, and Becancourt, where it was hoped that they could be taught the elements of European customs and useful trades.

No missionary activity of consequence resumed in Maine until the 1680s. In 1694 Sebastian RALE, SJ, arrived, and Maine became the scene of his labors for the next 30 years. When Hudson Bay, Newfoundland, and Acadia were ceded to England in 1713, there followed a dispute between Quebec and Massachusetts over the boundary of Maine. In 1722 Governor Samuel Shute of Massachusetts attacked the French mission on the Kennebec River, and two years later Father Rale was murdered. In 1726 the Maine missions were reopened, but little headway was made because of a lack of priests and the uncooperative attitude of the Quebec authorities. With the passing of New France to the English in 1763, the Maine missions came under the jurisdiction of Bishop Richard Challoner, vicar apostolic of the London District.

New York. The story of missionary activity in New York began in a sanguinary fashion when, in 1642, a band of Mohawks (Iroquois Confederacy) surprised and captured a group of Hurons near Three Rivers. Father Isaac Jogues and two lay assistants, René Goupil and Guillaume Coûture, who had accompanied the Hurons, were taken to a tribal village near present-day Auriesville, where Goupil was murdered and Jogues and Coûture were tortured. Jogues managed to escape, but on a second trip in 1646 he and Jean La Lande were taken prisoners by the Mohawks, after which they were tomahawked to death (see NORTH AMERICAN MARTYRS).

An attempt to plant a French colony among the Onondagas near Lake Onondaga in 1656 ended in failure within the year because of Iroquois unrest. The next ten years witnessed intermittent warfare between the French and the five Iroquois nations, and it was not until 1668 that a mission could be established in the five cantonments of the Iroquois Confederacy. In the succeeding decade some 2,000 converts were made, among them Katharine Ganneaktena of the Erie tribe and Kateri TEKA-KWITHA of the Mohawks.

Following the 1665 grant of New Netherlands by Charles II of England to his brother James, duke of York, the deep and lasting rivalry that developed between England and France ended only with the cession of New France to England at the end of the French and Indian War (1763). The Jesuit missionaries were looked upon as French agents. Thomas Dongan, New York's Catholic governor (1683–88), afforded the Jesuits a modicum of protection on the northern frontier, but beginning in 1687 he forbade the Jesuits to work among the Iroquois. By 1709 the final chapter in the history of the French Jesuits in New York ended with the departure of Jacques de Lamberville for Quebec and the arrest of Pierre de Mareuil by Colonel Peter Schuyler.

Apart from the Jesuits' venture, the only other partially successful effort to establish a Catholic Christian community in New York centered at present-day Ogdensburg, where in 1748 the Sulpician François Piquet founded La Presentation. This mission came to an untimely end during the French and Indian War.

The Great Lakes. The missionary potential of the Great Lakes area became evident after the establishment of trade centers at Michilimackinac, Green Bay, and Sault Ste. Marie. During the 1640s and 1650s several Jesuits, including Charles Raymbault, Isaac Jogues, Leonard Garreau, and Gabriel Druillettes, penetrated this area. In 1661 René Menard, SJ, gave his life to spread the gospel among the native people in the Wisconsin wilderness. Menard was succeeded by Claude Jean ALLOUEZ, SJ, who left a fine record as a missionary of the West. In addition to the mission known as La Pointe du Saint Esprit (Ashland, Wis.), established in 1665, Allouez established missions at Sault Ste. Marie and Green Bay. He also worked with Jacques MARQUETTE among the Illinois tribes at Kaskaskia. Bishop F. de M. LAVAL of Quebec named Allouez vicar-general for the western country, where the Jesuit traveled widely and labored successfully among the Illinois, Nipissings, Ottawas, Pottawatomi, Sacs, Foxes, and Sioux. After three years, Allouez was joined by Louis Nicholas, Marquette, and Claude DABLON. Dablon succeeded Allouez as superior of the missions in 1668. In 1671 La Pointe was abandoned because of a threat from the Sioux. During this same time, Dablon established the mission of St. Ignace some 50 miles west of Sault Ste. Marie; this mission was maintained until 1765.

Illinois country. During the latter part of the seventeenth century and the early decades of the eighteenth century, the French government encouraged missionary activity in the Great Lakes, Illinois, and Mississippi Valley areas. Experience proved that only the missionaries were able to control the unpredictable tribes. Furthermore, the presence of the missions provided the government with a firmer grasp on territory already claimed by Spain and England. In addition, exploration was stressed, and several commissions were given to such men as Louis Jolliet and R. C. de LA SALLE to further the interests of France.

Jolliet-Marquette Expedition. In 1672 Louis Frontenac, governor of New France, commissioned Jolliet to explore the Mississippi River to determine its source in the hope of finding a waterway to the Orient. The historic trip began in the spring of 1673, and among the party was Father Marquette. The journey, which proved that the Mississippi emptied into the Gulf of Mexico, had two important effects for Marquette. On the return passage, he became acquainted with the Kaskaskia tribes, for whom he established the mission of the Immaculate Conception near Utica, Ill., two years later. But the expedition also irreparably harmed his health, and he died on May 18, 1675.

La Salle's Explorations. One of the most colorful, if ill-fated, laymen whose influence on Church affairs was strongly felt in New France was Robert Cavelier de La Salle. Like his friend Governor Frontenac, La Salle disliked the Jesuits and invariably employed the services of the Sulpicians and Franciscans in his explorations. One of his early associates was the Flemish friar Louis HENNEPIN, who joined him in the establishment of Fort de Conty on the Niagara River near the falls (1678). Shortly thereafter Fort Miami (Mich.) and its chapel (the first Catholic Church in the lower peninsula of the future state), as well as the fort of Crevecoeur near Peoria, were built. The latter was abandoned in 1680 following an attack by the Iroquois on the Illinois tribes.

La Salle, who regarded the Mississippi as the lifeline of a French domain in the interior, established Fort St. Louis (1682) on the upper Illinois River. From there he began his famous descent of the Mississippi River that same year. The result of that trip was the claim to a vast territory to be known as Louisiana. Two years later King Louis XIV commissioned La Salle to plant a colony in Louisiana, which La Salle located on the Texas coast near Matagorda Bay. The elaborate plans collapsed within four years with the murder of La Salle by his own men and the destruction of the colony by the Cenis tribes.

Jesuits in the Illinois Country. After Marquette's death in 1675, Allouez took over the Immaculate Conception mission among the Kaskaskia, where he labored until his death in 1689. It has been estimated, with some exaggeration, that Allouez instructed almost 100,000 native people and baptized some 10,000. Among the Jesuits who succeeded Allouez in the Illinois country were Jacques Gravier, Sebastian Rale, François Pinet, and Jean Mermet. In 1663 Bishop Laval set up in Quebec a missionary seminary whose students served in the Illinois area among both natives and whites. Unfortunately, minor disputes arose between the secular priests and the Jesuits over jurisdiction.

During the eighteenth century, several villages were established along the Illinois River and were generally ministered to by the Jesuits. These communities thrived until the end of the French and Indian War. The heroic work reaped proportionately small rewards, however, and the brandy trade between the natives and French traders was noted as a primary cause of the Jesuits' failure to make lasting converts. In the 1730s the mission at Vincennes was founded; a century later it was named a diocese.

Franciscans at Detroit. Fort Pontchartrain was built on the site of present-day Detroit, Mich., in 1701 under the leadership of Antoine de la Mothe Cadillac (d. 1730). Like Frontenac and La Salle, Cadillac was of the anti-Jesuit party, and much to the annoyance of the Jesuits, he concentrated the various native tribes around Detroit. Fort Pontchartrain itself was well served by two Franciscans, Bonaventure Lienard and Simplicius Bocquet. In 1749 the Hurons in Detroit moved across the Detroit River and settled at Pointe de Montreal (Sandwich, Ontario), where they were ministered to by the Jesuits Armand de la Richardie and Pierre Portier. In 1755 Bishop Henri Dubreuil de Pontbriand of Quebec (1741–60) went to Detroit for a church dedication; he was thus the first bishop to visit that area of the future United States.

Louisiana. In 1698, a decade after La Salle's death, Pierre Le Moyne d'Iberville, was authorized to lead an expedition to Louisiana and there to establish a settlement at Biloxi. Iberville's first contingent was accompanied by Reverend Anastase Douay, a survivor of La Salle's tragic venture of 1687. On Iberville's second trip to Louisiana, he was accompanied by Paul du Ru, SJ, although the latter remained only briefly. The Biloxi settlement was moved in 1702 to Fort Louis on Mobile Bay (Mobile, Ala.). A conflict that erupted at this time between the Jesuits and the secular priests from Quebec's missionary seminary resulted in the departure of the Jesuits—an exile that lasted for 20 years.

By 1718 Iberville's brother and the new governor, Jean Baptiste le Moyne, Sieur de Bienville, succeeded in planting a settlement on the Mississippi itself, naming it New Orleans in honor of the prince regent of France, and four years later the capital of Louisiana was moved there from Fort Louis. The Code Noir, introduced in 1724, regulated race relations and was in effect a transference to France's colonies of the union of Church and State that existed in the mother country.

Difficulties over ecclesiastical jurisdiction hampered the work of the Church in Louisiana. A division of the territory (1722) into three ecclesiastical districts, under the Capuchins, the Jesuits, and the Carmelites respectively, proved unworkable. The Carmelites withdrew, and the Capuchins were given jurisdiction on both sides of the Mississippi River south of Ohio, at which point the Jesuit vicar-general's jurisdiction began. In 1723 the area between the Natchez and Ohio rivers was turned over to the Jesuits. Three years later, the Jesuits were given charge of all native missions in Louisiana, while the Capuchins were responsible for the white colonists. The latter complained bitterly, and Bishop Louis de Morney of Quebec, himself a Capuchin, placed the New Orleans Jesuits under interdict. The troubles between the two orders did not end until the Society of Jesus was suppressed in 1763. Because of the lack of funds, the missionaries were forced to live in extreme poverty; the conditions at the native missions were especially pitiful. New Orleans itself had no real church until 1727 when St. Louis' Church was established. That same year eight Ursuline nuns from Rouen opened a girls' academy in New Orleans, although there was no similar school for Catholic boys until the nineteenth century. Immorality was so prevalent in New Orleans that Bishop Jean Baptiste de St. Vallier of Quebec issued a sharp rebuke in his 1721 pastoral letter. In addition, troubles arose over the brandy trade and mixed marriages. By the terms of a secret treaty in 1762, Louisiana was ceded to Spain, and that vast territory returned to French administration for but a brief period (1800–03) before its purchase by the United States in 1803.

Results. In examining the overall record of French missionary activity in North America, it must be judged a failure in terms of lasting results. Hundreds of priests and lay assistants—Jesuits, Franciscans, Sulpicians, Carmelites, Capuchins, and secular priests-devoted all or a major portion of their adult lives to this disappointing apostolate. The soil of New France was enriched with the blood of numerous martyrs, but the number of lasting converts was relatively small. Blame may be justly laid at the door of uncooperative and often irreligious authorities at home and in the colonies. JANSENISM and GALLI-CANISM, then prevalent in France, affected the colonial missions. The brandy trade and questions of immorality among both the Europeans and Native Americans were sources of keen disappointment. Although the heroic missionaries were well trained in adversity and the example of a Kateri Tekakwitha was consoling, perhaps the real cause for the failure of the French missions was bevond the missionaries's control. The missionaries were unfamiliar with native customs and were unprepared for the inter- and intra-tribal warfare that took place. Also, the continuous friction between England and France made it unlikely that the native peoples could be Christianized until the white man himself set the example.

MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA, IV (ENGLISH MISSIONS)

England was itself a Catholic mission and was mission-minded when Catholic settlers first arrived in America. Simon Stock, OCarm, Lord Henry Arundell, and others advanced the hope of preserving the faith by immigration to the New World; they also asked dedication of colonizing gentlemen to the conversion of Protestants as well as indigenous people in America.

17th-Century Foundations. The first to attempt such a project was George CALVERT, who established the short-lived Avalon in Newfoundland, Canada (1627); two secular priests, Thomas Longeille and Anthony Smith, accompanied him. It was Calvert's Maryland colony (1634), however, that soon after became the center of mission growth.

Unsettled ecclesiastical conditions in England hindered an orderly provision for the American missions. After the Holy See ruled against the appointment of a bishop in England (1631), the Congregation for the PROP-AGATION OF THE FAITH in Rome dealt with the English clergy directly or through Continental prelates or through the major superiors of exempt orders. Under Cecil Calvert, second Lord Baltimore, who as patron possessed a semi-feudal role, Jesuit missionaries withdrew (1647) temporarily from Maryland in opposition to Baltimore's oath requirement, application of mortmain, and other decisions on corporate property ownership. They eventually found a solution in lay trusteeship or other devices; but missionaries of this period were often burdened with secular employments to assure their material support. Among those who labored heroically and effectively was Thomas Copley, SJ, who served for nearly 20 years in the earliest times and, with Andrew WHITE, SJ, endured Puritan persecutions. By 1684 native Marylanders such as John Brooke had entered their priestly studies with the Jesuits. The Capuchin Christopher Plunkett served for a time in Maryland and Virginia. At Baltimore's request two secular priests arrived during the period of difficulties with the Jesuits. Hardships of climate and the apostolate, however, often considerably shortened priestly careers.

Toward the end of the 17th century St. Mary's City in St. Mary's County became the center of Catholic life for a population of about 2,000. Missionary excursions to the native tribes led to foundations in Charles and Prince George's Counties. Virginia was often visited by Maryland missionaries, and at times some resided there among a small Catholic population. Chapels were built where priests resided and the manors of gentlemen served as places of worship for remote communities. Native people who remained in St. Mary's County were cared for; other native missions were gravely harmed by migration, the marauding of Susquehannocks, and the period of Puritan power.

The Catholic governor, Thomas Dongan, brought Thomas Harvey, SJ, to New York (1783). Catholic life in New England was very tenuous at this time; occasionally French missionaries, such as Gabriel Druillettes, made visits there. The Catholics on the English Caribbean islands were under the same jurisdiction as these mainland settlements. About 1667 Governor Stapleton of Montserrat, a Catholic, was involved in the struggle of the Catholic population there and on the islands of St. Christopher and Barbados. French and Spanish priests on neighboring islands often attended to these Catholics.

Outstanding Catholic Maryland families, such as the Brents and the Fenwicks, grew strong in the faith. They were well educated in secular and religious matters, and they fostered their spiritual life with retreats. They helped educate the native tribes, protected church property as trustees, and had a paternal Christian care for uneducated Catholic servants and slaves. They furthered tutorial and other education under such masters as Brother Ralph Crouch, SJ. Between 1667 and 1674 conversions to Catholicism averaged more than 40 persons annually.

Penal Age. Before 1690 favorable political and other secular conditions directly aided Catholic life in the New World. After the Restoration of the Stuarts in 1660, the British Crown gave instructions that freedom of conscience was to be respected even in New England. From the beginning, Maryland was free from intolerant laws except during a Puritan decade of power. This freedom was due to the TOLERATION ACTS and the Calverts. Quakers and Presbyterians as well as Catholics favored the old arrangement without establishment of religion and restriction on conscience. When William and Mary overturned Stuart rule in 1688 a tragic reversal of Catholic fortunes ensued. For the next 20 years newly appointed royal governors in Maryland experimented with the most repressive measures against Catholicism. By 1718, however, some of these laws had been mitigated. Worship was permitted, but only in private. Catholics were excluded from voting, office holding, and the practice of law; and their property was sometimes in danger of a double tax. An oath against the doctrine of TRANSUB-

STANTIATION was a frequent cause for the imposition of these penalties. There was discrimination against Catholic immigrants and Church educational institutions. Similar provisions were prevalent elsewhere, except in Pennsylvania, where public worship and voting were permitted.

In spite of hardships, missionary work went forward. Before James II was deposed, his former chaplain Bonaventure Giffard was appointed vicar bishop apostolic of London with jurisdiction over the American English Colonies. Advances were made into Talbot County on Maryland's eastern shore. Between 1732 and 1763, under the leadership of Ferdinand FARMER, SJ, six churches were built in Pennsylvania, serving Philadelphia and the German immigrants in southeastern counties. Franciscans worked among the Scotch immigrants in Pennsylvania. Excursions of missionaries to New Jersey and New York were made, and contacts were established with Catholic Mohawks. French-Catholic Acadians found refuge in Baltimore, Md., and in Philadelphia after they were expelled from Canada. Catholicism continued to grow in the Caribbean islands of St. Christopher, Montserrat, Antigua, and Nevis, in spite of property and other restrictions on Catholics. But provisions for the care of souls were not as satisfactory as on the mainland.

Gentlemen of means in England and America provided land and other investments to support some of the missionaries; in court they successfully contested efforts to prevent such assistance. Although Catholics of the period suffered imprisonment in the earlier years and the threat of it later, the gentry's possession of property and their self-respect prevented social ostracism. They sent their children to Bohemia Manor grammar school, which was opened by Thomas Poulton, SJ (1741). Many went from there to St. Omer's and other Continental European institutions, which put them among the better educated men of America. In their libraries in America, Catholic gentlemen read the spiritual and polemical works of the Elizabethan Robert PERSONS, SJ, as well as those of Bp. Richard CHALLONER of London; and with the clergy, they answered the attacks of hostile elements among Protestants.

In St. Mary's County, where in 1712 50 percent of American English Catholics constituted about 35 percent of the county's population, devotion to the Sacred Heart fostered popular piety. But throughout the colonies the pressure to conform to the Church of England had its effect. The uneducated Catholics of the rising towns were not protected by the plantation-gentry structure of most Catholic communities, and Catholic immigrants were often a scandal, even when they did not abandon their faith.

Revolutionary Prelude to Episcopacy. From the time of the English conquest of French Canada (1763) until the appointment of John CARROLL as first bishop of the U.S. (1789), ecclesiastical jurisdiction was in a tangle. Innocent XII had indicated that application for priestly faculties should be made regularly to the vicar apostolic of London. Both Giffard and Challoner understood the awkwardness of this arrangement, and they recommended that the bishop of Quebec, Canada, assume this role. But the Congregation of Propaganda continued to recognize the authority of Jesuit superiors. George Hunter, SJ, Superior of Maryland, made trips to both Quebec and London to adjust matters, representing the unfavorable reaction of American Protestants not only to jurisdiction of a French Canadian prelate, but to any North American bishop.

A new complication arose in 1773 when the Society of Jesus was suppressed. The last Jesuit superior, John Lewis, then vicar-general, formed an association that by oath bound the clergy together and protected the American Church against any undue control by Propaganda. A new legal incorporation was effected to safeguard property. The Revolutionary War further alienated the American mission from the bishop of London, who again expressed the desire to be freed of jurisdiction; in 1781 Bp. James Talbot formally disassociated himself from the mission.

Soon a general chapter of the U.S. clergy was called at White Marsh, Md. (June 27, 1783), and a petition was sent to the Holy See requesting appointment of a prefect apostolic from a list of names drawn from the chapter. On June 9, 1784, John Carroll was approved. In addition to the authority held by past superiors, he had the power to confer Confirmation, and he was no longer under the bishop of London but had quasi-autonomous status directly under the Holy See. When Protestant tolerance for episcopacy developed, Carroll sought relief from the weaknesses of the prefecture and was granted the power of bishop ordinary in 1789.

The jurisdiction of Carroll technically extended to the territorial extremities of the U.S. Immigrant Scotch-Irish Highlanders in upper New York had their own priests. Rev. Peter Gibault, who had collaborated with patriots despite the opposition of the bishop of Quebec, continued to serve in the Illinois country after the war. The Franciscan Simplicius Bocquet ministered in the vicinity of Detroit, Mich. Penobscot tribes in Maine successfully applied to Massachusetts for a priest to meet their spiritual needs. Although the treaty of 1763 had added four more Caribbean islands to the jurisdiction of the Catholic bishop of London, the appointment of Carroll severed Caribbean jurisdictional connection with the communities of the United States.

During this period the Catholic life of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York grew strong, and the Catholic population exceeded 25,000. Chapels of public worship were built in Baltimore and elsewhere, and John Carroll initiated one of the first parishioner-supported churches at St. John's, Rock Creek, Md. Educational foundations in Philadelphia and Georgetown (Washington, D.C.) were made. But the growing diversity of secular life in the new nation, particularly in New York, Pennsylvania, and the Trans-Appalachian West, radically modified the social structure of the Catholic community. Favorable provisions of state and Federal constitutions opened public office to Catholics. Particularly in Maryland and Pennsylvania, growing amity with Protestants developed, loss of the faith declined from what it had been, and a greater number of conversions to Catholicism took place, including that of Gov. Thomas Sim Lee during his term of office in Maryland.

MISSION IN POSTCOLONIAL LATIN AMERICA

This entry discusses the history and development of missionary endeavors in the postcolonial period of Latin America. For a survey of the colonial period, see MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA, I (SPANISH MISSIONS) and MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA, II (PORTUGUESE MISSIONS).

Introduction. The expulsion of the Jesuits in the eighteenth century followed by the anti-clerical independence movements in the early nineteenth century brought the colonial phase of the history of evangelization in the Americas to an end. For a period of time the faith was kept alive and transmitted in many parts by the cofradías or lay confraternities in the absence of an organized evangelization. Circuit riding, often ill-prepared diocesan priests were overwhelmed by the pastoral needs of the people. Formation and education in the faith passed to various religious orders, which established schools in much of the republican era.

The early twentieth century witnessed virulent anticlerical attitudes in Mexico arising from a backlash against the Church's growing influence in the secular sphere. The Cristero Rebellion of the 1920s in Mexico led to a period of persecution and the strict separation of Church and State. Elsewhere in Latin America, that separation was not so rigidly adhered to and many governments had concordats with the Vatican that allowed the Church to maintain schools and to carry out evangelization unhindered. It wasn't until the early 1960s, with the influx of many North American missionaries, that the Church in Latin America entered into another phase of an evangelizing outreach.

Developments in the Renewal of the Latin America Church: Medellín. Concerns over how to evangelize and transmit the faith to the growing population of Latin America received an impetus when the continent's bishops met for the first time in Rio de Janeiro in 1955 and formed the Latin American Episcopal Council or CONSEJO EPISCOPAL LATINOAMERICANO (CELAM). The Second Vatican Council gave an added impetus to Church leaders to address this question, leading to the convocation of the Second Conference of CELAM in Medellín, Colombia in 1968. Called to adapt the spirit of Vatican II's aggiornamento to the Latin America reality within the continent, Medellín reflected the winds of change that paved the way for the adoption of a critical stance toward unjust structures in civil society, and a preferential option for the poor. Radical developments, such as the comunidades de base (BASIC CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES) supported by new theological currents and symbolized by the emergence of the theology of liberation, captured worldwide attention and imagination. By the same token, these changes provoked a negative reaction from some sectors long acccustomed to the Church's traditional apolitical stance. Latin American bishops such as Dom Helder Camara in Brazil, Cardinal Juan Landázuri Ricketts in Peru. Eduardo Proaño in Ecuador, Marcos McGrath in Panama, and Sergio Mendéz Arceo and Samuel Ruíz in Mexico lived out the spirit of the Medellín documents and enthusiastically translated its conclusions into concrete pastoral actions that contributed to the renewal of evangelization in the Latin America Church.

Puebla. The Third Conference of CELAM was held in Puebla, Mexico in early 1979. While affirming the basic thrust of Medellín, it also gave new emphasis and urgency to the Church's evangelizing activity by underscoring the "evangelizing potential of the poor" and by calling for the Latin America Church to step up and assume its mission ad gentes role outside of, as well as inside, Latin America. Puebla took a much more guarded approach to the movement of Base Christian Communities, preferring to see them be much more under ecclesiastical supervision than as a lay-led grassroots expression of the Church. Likewise, the assessment of the writings of liberation theologians resulted in a qualified approval that also cautioned against unnuanced dependence on Marxist analysis.

Santo Domingo. The Fourth Conference of CELAM in Santo Domingo in the Dominican Republic in 1992 affirmed the renewal process initiated at Medellín and Puebla and expanded its focus by recognizing developments in emerging theological currents from indigenous and Afro-American peoples, feminist theologians, and a growing ecological movement. One of the most important developments at Santo Domingo was the pope's call for an American Synod joining the local churches of North and South America and the Caribbean to discern the concerns and challenges for evangelization in an age of globalization and interdependence. At Santo Domingo, many church leaders voiced their concerns over the phenomenal growth of Protestantism in Latin America in recent decades, especially of Pentecostal churches. Alarm from some sectors over this development did not readily translate into concrete strategies. Some envisioned a weakening of ecumenical relations with the more historical churches due to what many perceive as the aggressive proselytism of more sectarian Christian groups. As Latin American society becomes more pluralistic, cultural Catholicism will likely become less of a factor in identity.

Synod for America. The 1997 Synod of Bishop's Special Assembly for America held in Rome broke new ground for establishing closer connections between churches from the north and south and set the stage to create the foundations for greater collaboration around common problems within the perspective of the New Evangelization. Expectations ran high as to the potential for collaborative and joint efforts. At the same time, uncertainty over the future of CELAM and especially the continuous process of renewal begun at Medellín remained. The passing of an older, dynamic, high-profile generation of Church leaders also raised questions about the future course of evangelization in Latin America.

U.S. Missionaries in Latin America. The movement to send U.S. missionaries to Latin America was led by Cardinal Richard CUSHING of Boston, Maryknoller John CONSIDINE, and Ivan Illich in the 1950s and 1960s. Religious communities like Maryknoll, the Columbans, and the Boston-based MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF ST. JAMES THE APOSTLE and such diocesan missions as St. Louis, Missouri (Bolivia) and Jefferson City, Missouri (Peru), Cleveland, Ohio (El Salvador), and New Ulm, Minnesota (Guatemala) participated in this massive missionary endeavor. While the number of North American-born missionaries working in Latin America had declined sharply by 2000, the missionary movement from north to south continued to show great vitality and creativity. More emphasis was placed on mission education awareness initiatives, different forms of inter-American cooperation and collaboration, along with an increased presence of laity. An expanded notion of what constitutes mission also influenced the changes in mission from a one-way process to allow for more dialogue on all levels. The challenges spelled out in the document Ecclesia in America, fruit of the 1997 Synod of America, provided the foundations for new directions and initiatives.

The changing profile of the U.S. missionary in Latin America in the last decades of the 20th century bear closer examination. Religious women embarking on a second or third ministerial career change arrived in greater numbers in the 1980s and early 1990s. Short- and longterm lay missionaries with close ties to established diocesan groups and communities like MARYKNOLL and the COLUMBAN FATHERS appeared at the same time. In the 1960s, there were few options for the lay overseas mission vocation. By 2000, a greater number of possibilities for overseas cross-cultural service were available. Reflecting wider societal trends, many committed U.S. Catholics found themselves drawn to diverse forms of service of a short-term duration. The twining of parishes, or sister parish projects, from North and Latin America opened up even more paths for alternative service and networks of solidarity across the hemisphere.

Challenges and Questions. The witness of life and the Church's prophetic role in the defense of human rights, participation in the peace process, and the work of reconciliation were integral to the task of evangelization in Latin America. After the early 1970s, many missionaries gave their lives to spread the Gospel, of whom Archbishop Oscar Romero (1980), the U.S. churchwomen (1980), and the six Jesuits and their housekeeper (1989) in El Salvador became the most publicized examples. The recovery of the historical memory of atrocities committed against missionaries in places like Guatemala and El Salvador is not simply an adjunct to the work of proclaiming the Gospel, but an essential dimension of it.

One of the main vehicles for evangelization since the early 1970s, the comunidades de base (Base Christian Communities) enjoyed a process of continuous organic growth in places like Brazil. In other places, they declined in importance. Alongside the development of the CEBs, a resurgence of European-style lay movements like Opus Dei, Communione et Liberatione, the Neo-Catechumenate, and others, injected other protagonists and variables into the prospects for evangelization. This shift came about in tandem with the evolution in Latin America of large urban areas and mega-cities. A new pluralistic culture in the cities among both migrants and more educated elites presented new challenges as well. The challenges of globalization, urbanization, mass migrations, pluralism, and the acceptance of new information technology called for new mission strategies that focus on maintaining an evangelizing presence in the area of social communications, as well as dialogue with new social actors, the socio-cultural areopagi that Pope John Paul II referred to in his missionary encyclical REDEMPTORIS MISSIO (1990).

MISSION THEOLOGY

Mission theology is "that part of missiology that links systematic theology (dogmatics, ethics, ascetics) with practical theology (canon law, catechetics, liturgics, homiletics, pastoral care, service and apologetics). It outlines and interprets mission systematically and practically from the perspective of God's mission, Christ's mission, the mission of the Holy Spirit and the mission of the Church" (see J. A. B. Jongeneel [1999]: 29).

Mission theology developed rapidly during the latter half of the twentieth century. Informed and influenced by postcolonial critique and significant shifts in religious, political, and cultural consciousness, developments in mission theology have included renewed interest in the biblical foundations for mission, heightened consciousness of the missiological challenges posed by contextual theologies and historical studies of Christian mission, the integrative use of social scientific insights in theological reflection on missionary activity, the promotion of spiritualities of mission, theological investigation of the interactive dynamics of gospel and culture, and finally, fostering confidence in an ecumenical vision worthy of trust.

In the effort to make theologies of mission intelligible for a world church, ecclesiastical leaders, theologians, and missionaries, along with representatives of local churches and faith communities, have attempted to put these theologies at the service of others in meaningful and productive ways. Mediated in and through ecclesial documents, ecumenical declarations, scholarly publications, pastoral communications, and Christian media productions, mission theologies have been instrumental and consequential in both setting the agenda and implementing the decisions of councils, synods, assemblies, and congresses. Mission theology is foundational to the processes of promoting, integrating, and contextualizing the elements of Christian mission through encounter, proclamation, communion, dialogue, and social transformation. It is a theology characterized by fidelity as well as creativity.

Biblical Foundations for Mission Theology. Mission theology is distinctive for its appeal to and reliance upon biblical foundations. Books and articles have taken up the theme in direct and indirect ways. Major contributions in this area include surveys of general mission themes in the Old and New Testaments as well as specific mission themes that are identified with a particular biblical book or character. Methodological developments in biblical studies have enabled scripture scholars to employ a number of critical and constructive strategies for reading and interpreting texts. Inasmuch as scholars come from many different backgrounds and contexts, they frequently bring to their respective interpretations of texts important insights that have gone unexplored in the past. The hermeneutical circle (pretext-text-context) has provided a framework for understanding the relationship between biblical narratives, the demands of Christian mission, and the experiences of people in particular circumstances. This framework for interpretation has made possible the application of biblical insights to missionary practice in ways that correct, challenge, and transform. The foundational significance of biblical themes for mission theology is more than evident given the prominence of topics such as vocation, salvation, discipleship, prophetic action, witness, solidarity with the poor, table fellowship, community, justice, conversion, hospitality, liberation, reconciliation, compassion, the Reign of God, and the mission of Jesus.

Contextual Theologies and Historical Studies. One of the dramatic shifts taking place in the last decades of the twentieth century was the worldwide emergence of contextual theologies. Contextual theologies include, among others, theologies that are local, constructive, indigenous, liberationist, and feminist. Set in juxtaposition with longstanding theological positions that have shaped ecclesiastical histories and ecclesial identities, these contemporary theological positions often represent efforts to communicate the Christian Gospel more effectively in situations where peoples and cultures have been misunderstood, threatened, and devalued by past missionary mediation of Christian beliefs and practices. In an effort to understand more fully the meaning of the Christian Gospel amidst diverse peoples, cultures, and contexts, contextual theologies give rise to tensions as well as opportunities for growth within and beyond Christian churches and faith communities. The direct implications of these collisions and convergences for mission theology are numerous. Inasmuch as centuries of contributions to the study of theology have been formulated in accord with Western categories of thought and embedded in Western European cultures, the contemporary challenge that theologians face is one of effectively demonstrating and communicating that the Church's participation in the missio Dei requires attentiveness to tradition and revelation as well as attentiveness to contextual experience and historical consciousness. In this regard, mission theology is also indebted to the findings and insights of numerous historical-critical studies of Christian missionary activity. In effect, mission theology is a crucible for theological investigation as it endeavors to affirm both that which is essential to the universal kerygma and that which is particular to the effective proclamation of the Gospel in a given context. This specific theological task is critical and complex inasmuch as there is a wide diversity of methods in contextual theologies (see S. Bevans [1992]).

Social Scientific Insights. The social sciences, particularly cultural anthropology, sociology, psychology, linguistics, semiotics, social psychology, political science, and economics, have had a significant influence on mission theology. First, the social sciences have allowed missionaries and mission-sending societies to gather data, evaluate findings, and interpret information about various aspects of missionary practice. Second, they have provided theologians with additional conceptual tools for understanding the social processes through which individuals, communities, and societies make meaning of the realities in which they find themselves. Insights from the social sciences have enabled theologians to explore the relationship between key theological concepts from the Christian tradition and fundamental human experiences that are shaped by social interactions, cultural values, and worldviews. One example is the grounding of mission theology in a Eucharistic theology that is informed by the Christian tradition as well as by an understanding of rituals and symbols associated with food, feeding, and nurturing. Another example includes the incorporation of concepts such as stewardship and jubilee into a mission theology that is also attuned to questions of justice and the sociopolitical implications of a global market economy and the international debt crisis. Finally, to the extent that communication is critical to the process of evangelization, mission theology is enhanced by the use of more effective images, metaphors, and symbols or a more perceptive understanding of human development, gender differences, and ethnic identity.

Spiritualities of Mission. Spiritualities of mission are intrinsic to many mission theologies inasmuch as they function as sources of inspiration and integration. Within the Roman Catholic Church, historical research on the missionary charism of religious orders and missionary societies has led to a resurgence in spiritual formation for mission. Grounded in the Good News of Jesus Christ. these spiritualities of mission give expression to the diverse forms of missionary witness present in the lives of men and women at different periods in the Church's history. Spiritualities of mission continue to provide orientations for mission that guide the Church as a whole and missionary movements in particular. For this reason, spiritualities of mission are inextricably related to mission theologies. Spiritualities of mission that deal directly with the subject of giving one's life for the sake of the Gospel continue to be among the most compelling. Frequently, it is in and through spiritualities of mission that a meaningful synthesis of the Great Commandment (Jn 13:34) and the Great Commission (Mt 28:19-20) is clearly articulated and advanced.

Gospel and Culture. An important dimension of mission theology involves coming to terms with the interactive dynamics of gospel and culture. Among other things, this theological task includes critical reflection on the lessons to be learned from the history of Christian missionary activity. This is where the moral dimension of mission theology frequently finds its focus. It is in this arena of discourse that the challenges, possibilities, and polemics of Christianity's encounter with the world are identified, interpreted, and addressed. Faced with the important questions raised by this encounter, mission theology endeavors to provide adequate theological resources for understanding and responding to the ethical imperatives of Christian mission. Important concerns include interreligious dialogue, comparative theology, the integrity of creation, cultural survival, secularization, globalization, migration, systemic forms of human oppression, human rights, and mass communications. At issue in all of these areas is the relationship between the evangelization of culture and the inculturation of the Gospel message in a pluralistic world.

An Ecumenical Vision of Christian Unity. Mission theology, at its best, is reflective of a common theological commitment to articulate theologies that will support, encourage, and sustain an ecumenical vision that is worthy of trust. To the extent that the existing separations and divisions among Christians continue to be a source of scandal, hostility, and ambivalence, efforts at encounter, proclamation, dialogue, communion, solidarity, and transformation are easily weakened and undermined. In the light of this reality, it is incumbent upon Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican, Conciliar Protestant, and Evangelical theologians of mission to provide credible visions of Christian unity that are firmly rooted in the prayer of Jesus "that all may be one" (Jn 17:21).

MISSIONARIES OF AFRICA

The Society of Missionaries of Africa (M.Afr.), formerly known as the "White Fathers," was founded in Algiers in 1868 by Charles M. LAVIGERIE, Archbishop of Algiers. The society's first apostolate was among the orphans whom Lavigerie had taken under his care during the typhoid epidemic of 1867. Villages of Christian Arabs were founded in 1873 and 1875. Soon after, mission stations were established in Kabylia (Algeria) and on the northern fringes of the Sahara. Archbishop Lavigerie, as apostolic delegate for the Sahara and the Sudan, planned to send the missionaries of Africa into the interior of the African continent. Two attempts to cross the Sahara, one in 1876 and the other in 1881, resulted in the massacre of six White Fathers by their Touareg guides.

In January 1878, Lavigerie submitted to the Holy See a plan for the evangelization of the newly explored "Great Lakes" region of Central Africa. Leo XIII responded by appointing Lavigerie apostolic delegate for Equatorial Africa and establishing four mission territories to be entrusted to the Missionaries of Africa, although the society had less than 80 members at the time. By May 1878 the first caravan of ten missionaries had set out from the coast of Tanganyika (now Tanzania) toward the interior. At Tabora they split into two groups: one heading for Uganda, the other for the western shores of Lake Tanganyika.

The beginnings were extremely difficult. Physical sufferings, disease, and persecution by jealous tribal chiefs and greedy slave traders caused great hardship. By 1887, 16 priests, two brothers, and three lay auxiliaries had given their lives for the mission. In 1882 King Mutesa of Uganda forced them to leave the region south of Lake Victoria. They returned under Mutesa's successor, King Mwanga, only to see their small flock decimated by violent persecution. Twenty-two of the Christians martyred in Uganda were canonized in 1964.

After much hardship and losses, Lavigerie's plans began to bear fruit. He had instructed the missionaries to apply the discipline of the early Church's catechumenate in order to prepare the neophytes for baptism. The long task of building up an indigenous clergy was begun at an early stage of the mission's development. Uganda had its first two priests in 1913; the Congo, in 1917. In West Africa, the mission in the French Sudan (now Mali) was founded in 1894.

In 1880, at the request of the Holy See, the Missionaries of Africa opened a Greek Melkite seminary at the Basilica of St. Ann in Jerusalem. Today the Missionaries of Africa remain the guardians of this shrine in Jerusalem.

At Cardinal Lavigerie's death in 1892, 278 Missionaries of Africa from five different nationalities worked in six countries: Algeria, Tunisia, Uganda, Tanganyika, Congo, and Zambia. The Holy See granted final approval to the Society's constitutions in 1908. Its members, both priests and brothers, are bound by an oath of stability and of dedication to the continuation of Jesus' mission among Africans. Adapting themselves to the local surroundings, the Missionaries of Africa wear a religious habit which resembles the traditional clothing worn in North Africa: the white gandurah (cassock-like robe), a white burnoose (a hooded cape) and a reddish chechia (a fez-like head cover). They also wear a 15-decade rosary about their necks.

The General Chapter of 1936 divided the Society into provinces, Canada being one of them. The U.S. province was established in 1948. In 1997 the Canadian and U.S. provinces were combined as the North American Province. By the end of the 20th century, total membership was more than 2,000, coming from 31 different nationalities, working in 384 communities in 43 countries and recruiting from all continents. The North American Headquarters is in Montreal, with an U.S. Office in Washington, D.C.

MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY

An international congregation of religious women, the Missionaries of Charity have as their primary ministry the service of "the poorest of the poor" irrespective of caste, creed, and nationality. Their headquarters are located in Calcutta, India, where the congregation was founded by Mother Teresa Bojaxhiu. The foundation was approved as a diocesan congregation in 1950 and made a pontifical institute in 1965. The distinctive habit of the Missionaries of Charity, made famous by Mother Teresa, consists of a white cotton sari with a blue border that covers the head, a cincture made of rope, sandals, a crucifix, and rosary. The sisters nurse sick and dying destitutes, including victims of AIDS; teach street children; visit and care for beggars, lepers, and their children; and provide shelter for the abandoned and homeless. They foster special devotion to Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, and proclaim the Word of God to the spiritually destitute by their presence and the spiritual works of mercy.

In March 1997 the congregation elected Sister Nirmala and a council of four sisters to succeed Mother Teresa, who had asked to be relieved of administrative duties because of her poor health. At the time of Sister Nirmala's election, the order had some 4,500 nuns working in more than 100 countries.

MISSIONARIES OF THE HOLY APOSTLES

A society of priests and brothers (M.Ss.A., Official Catholic Directory #0590) founded in 1946 in Montreal, Canada, by Father Eusebe M. Menard, a Franciscan. Guided by the spirit of St. Francis of Assisi, the members bind themselves by oath to observe the constitutions of the society. Their purpose is to foster vocations and to train priests for the service of the universal Church. The general headquarters is in Montreal, Canada. The U.S. provincial headquarters is in Cromwell, CT.

MISSIONARIES OF THE KINGSHIP OF CHRIST

Secular institute of women in the Franciscan tradition founded by Agostino GEMELLI, OFM, and Armida Barelli in Assisi, Italy, November 1919. The original band of 12 young women professed the Franciscan Tertiary Rule and lived in chastity, poverty, obedience, and devotion to the active apostolate, especially of Catholic Action. From 1919 to 1928 the society, called the Family of Franciscan Tertiaries for Promoting the Social Reign of the Sacred Heart, was under the minister general of the Friars Minor. Members lived at home following their own occupations. From 1928 to 1939 Pius XI guided the group, naming it the Pious Association of Missionaries of the Kingship of Christ. After 1947 the association conformed to the Apostolic Constitution Provida Mater. On July 12, 1948, it received the decree of praise as a pontifical secular institute; definitive approval followed on Aug. 3, 1953. From Italy the institute spread to all the continents. Missionaries of the U.S., organized by Stephen Hartdegen, OFM, in Washington, D.C., labor in many states. At the beginning of the 21st century, there were more than 3,000 members worldwide in 20 countries.

The institute's importance derives from its ability to influence secular environments (professional, occupational, and social), through competence and Christian action. Members are not publicly known as missionaries but as laity. The related Men's Institute of Missionaries, founded by Gemelli in 1928, was approved by Pius XI. Entrusted to Cardinal Schuster of Milan in 1929, it was reorganized in 1942 as the "Union of Missionaries of the Kingship of Christ." It became a diocesan secular institute, Oct. 4, 1951. A third institute founded by Gemelli, the diocesan Secular Institute of Priest Missionaries of the Kingship of Christ, under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Milan, arose from the attraction to the ideals of the lay institutes of missionaries by their priest directors. Members renew annually the vows of poverty, chastity, obedience, and devotion to the apostolate.

MISSIONARY SERVANTS OF THE MOST BLESSED TRINITY

(MSBT, Official Catholic Directory #2790); an American missionary congregation of women of pontifical status, founded, 1912, by Thomas Augustine JUDGE, CM, as a companion community to his society for priests, the MISSIONARY SERVANTS OF THE MOST HOLY TRINITY. In 1909, while stationed at St. John the Baptist parish in Brooklyn, N.Y., Judge organized the Missionary Cenacle Apostolate, one of the earliest lay missionary groups in the U.S. Community life was inaugurated in 1912 by a small group of those lay associates who had taken private vows. Between 1912 and 1915 two other houses were opened and named Missionary Cenacles of the Holy Spirit and the Apostles. In 1916, a year after Judge had been transferred to the Vincentian missions in eastern Alabama, he was joined by a few of his Northern lay associates. Their school, opened in Russell County, offered a program suitable for the needs of impoverished families, and the home-visiting services of the "Catholic Ladies," as they were called, soon won the confidence of the people.

In 1918 they were incorporated as a missionary organization with special devotion to the Blessed Trinity; a year later they were organized as a formal religious congregation under Lulu Margaret Keasey (Mother Mary Boniface) as first superior. As the work expanded, the first motherhouse at Holy Trinity, Ala., founded missions throughout the U.S., the Virgin Islands, and Puerto Rico, staffing them with sisters and lay associates. In 1930 a fire demolished the original foundation, and the motherhouse was moved to Philadelphia, Pa. In 1932, a year after Mother Boniface's death, Rome granted the decree of canonical erection and in 1958 raised the congregation to pontifical status. The sisters are engaged in education, catechetics, clinics, healthcare, pastoral ministries, social outreach and retreats.

MISSIONARY SERVANTS OF THE MOST HOLY TRINITY

(ST, Official Catholic Directory #0840); a religious congregation of men, founded in the U.S. by Thomas Augustine JUDGE, a Vincentian priest from Boston, Mass. In 1909, after some years of mission and parochial work, Judge founded the Missionary Cenacle Apostolate, one of the earliest lay apostle movements in the U.S. It was from this organization that the Missionary Servants of the Most Holy Trinity and a companion community of sisters, MISSIONARY SERVANTS OF THE MOST BLESSED TRINITY, developed.

In 1915 when Judge was appointed superior of the Vincentian missions in eastern Alabama, he urged his lay apostles in the North to come south and assist the few priests there. A plantation on the Chattahoochee River in Russell County was opened as Holy Trinity training center for lay associates, as the members of the missionary Cenacle Apostolate were called. By 1917 these lay apostles had opened an academy and infirmary and were conducting a Sunday school. In addition, Holy Trinity center served as a nucleus of Catholic life and exerted an influence on the whole area.

By 1921 a group of men living a common life were recognized as a religious community by Bp. E. P. Allen of Mobile. A boys' school, which had been part of the apostolate since Holy Trinity was acquired, became explicitly a preparatory seminary in 1923. Thereafter, only those boys intending to study for the priesthood as Trinity missionaries were accepted in this school. In 1926 a house of studies was established in Washington, D.C., where the brothers would complete their studies for the priesthood at The Catholic University of America. This spontaneous development met with Judge's approval, and in 1929 the Holy See recognized the Missionary Servants of the Most Holy Trinity as a clerical, religious congregation of diocesan rank. A canonical novitiate was established in 1931. But it was only after 1940 that sizable classes of priests began to be ordained and the community expanded beyond its formative stage. In 1958 the Holy See bestowed upon the Missionary Servants of the Most Holy Trinity its decree of praise, raising the community to a pontifical congregation.

Trinity missionaries are especially trained to promote in their work the social encyclicals of the popes. The community accepts the care of parishes, especially where there is a great need for priests. Trinity missionaries work as chaplains, conduct social outreach centers and summer camp programs, and engage in catechetics, youth ministries, retreats, counseling and spiritual direction. The generalate is in Arlington, Va.

MISSIONARY SISTERS OF OUR LADY OF AFRICA

(MSOLA, Official Catholic Directory #2820); formerly known as the "White Sisters," a congregation with papal approbation founded, 1869 in Algiers, North Africa, by Charles LAVIGERIE (later cardinal) and Mother Marie Salome. The sisters follow the Rule of St. Ignatius of Loyola and engage in various mission activities in Africa. They seek especially to serve the spiritual and material welfare of African women through catechetical, social, medical, educational, and cultural works, and through the training of African religious. Though of diverse nationality, race, background, and education, the sisters work together with a readiness to adapt to changing times and circumstances and with the same spirit of faith and missionary zeal exemplified by their founders. The sisters came to the U.S. in 1929 and have their headquarters in Winooski, VT. The generalate is in Rome.

MISSIONARY SISTERS OF ST. PETER CLAVER

(SSPC, Official Catholic Directory #3990); also known as the Sodality of St. Peter Claver for the African Missions; a congregation with papal approbation (1910) founded by Countess Maria Theresia LEDÓCHOWSKA in 1894 for the purpose of giving help to the African missions, especially by means of the apostolate of the press. Countess Ledóchowska, encouraged by Cardinal Charles LAVIGERIE, had begun to publish in 1889 the magazine African Echo (later published in eight languages) and had founded an association of lay persons called The Anti-Slavery Committee. Instructions received from Leo XIII in 1894 led her to found the sodality, which was first approved as a diocesan congregation by Cardinal Johannes Haller, archbishop of Salzburg, Austria, in 1897. As the number of religious increased, a house with a wellequipped polyglot press was opened at Salzburg; later, other houses were established in various nations and in Rome, where the generalate is located. The sisters established their first foundation in the U.S. in 1912. The U.S. headquarters is in Chesterfield, MO.

MISSIONARY SISTERS OF THE HOLY ROSARY

(MSHR, Official Catholic Directory, #2730); founded, 1924 in Killeshandra, Ireland, by Bp. Joseph Shanahan, CSSp (papal approval 1938). Members engage in educational, medical, and pastoral ministries. The congregation has established foundations in Europe, North America and Africa. The generalate is in Dublin, Ireland. The U.S. headquarters is in Bryn Mawr, Pa.

MISSIONARY SISTERS OF THE MOST SACRED HEART OF JESUS OF HILTRUP

A pontifical institute founded in 1899 in Hiltrup, Germany, by Hubert J. Linckens (MSC, Official Catholic Directory #2800) to cooperate with his community in spreading the faith among the peoples of the Southwest Pacific (see SACRED HEART MISSIONARIES). In 1902 the first sisters departed for missionary activity; two years later five of them were slain by Baining natives. The first American foundation was made in 1908, when eight sisters began educational work in the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, Pa. In the United States, the sisters are engaged in education, healthcare, parish ministry, counseling, spiritual direction, social outreach, and prison ministry. Headquarters for the American province are located in Reading, Pa. The generalate is in Sutri (Viterbo), Italy.

MISSIONARY SISTERS OF THE PRECIOUS BLOOD

Founded in the Republic of South Africa by Abbot Franz PFANNER (Missionales a Pretiosissimo Sanguine, CPS, Official Catholic Directory #2850), its nucleus was a group of five lay apostles whom Pfanner invited in 1885 to instruct young girls at Mariannhill monastery in Natal. Papal approval came in 1906. According to the founder's wish, the sisters are expected to accept missionary assignments throughout the world. Besides teaching, nursing, and healthcare, the sisters perform a variety of social and charitable works. The sisters established their first foundation in the United States in Princeton, NJ, in 1925. The U.S. provincialate is in Reading, PA. The motherhouse is in Rome.

MISSIONARY SISTERS OF THE SACRED HEART

(MSC, Official Catholic Directory #2860); also known as Cabrini Sisters, a papal institute founded Nov. 14, 1880, by (St.) Francis Xavier CABRINI at Codogno, Italy. The congregation's growth was rapid, and the Holy See granted the decree of commendation in 1888 and final approbation in 1907. The rules and constitutions thus approved were the work of Mother Cabrini herself. In 1889, when Mother Cabrini applied to the Holy See for permission to begin Chinese missions, the deplorable condition of large numbers of Italian immigrants caused Leo XIII to bid her to go "not to the East but to the West." Accepting the invitation of Abp. Michael Corrigan of New York, Mother Cabrini and six sisters arrived in New York City on March 31, 1889. Thereafter Cabrinian foundations, following the streams of immigration, were made in New York and Brooklyn, N.Y.; New Orleans, La.; Chicago, Ill.; Scranton, Pa.; Newark and Arlington, New Jersey; Denver, Colo.; Seattle, Wash.; and Los Angeles and Burbank, Calif. Meanwhile new foundations were established in Europe and South America. Although the work for Italian immigrants earned for the foundress the title "Saint of the Immigrants," this was but one phase of her institute's world-embracing program. Schools, hospitals, and institutions of higher learning paralleled works for the poor.

Inspired by a devotion to the Sacred Heart, the sisters engage in a variety of ministries, including education, catechetics, hospitals, nursing, healthcare, parish administration, pastoral ministries and social outreach. The motherhouse is in Rome. The U.S. provincialate is in New York City.

MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF ST. JAMES THE APOSTLE

Established as a Pious Society by Richard J. CUSH-ING, Archbishop of Boston, by decree on 25 July 1958, with the encouragement of the Holy See, for the purpose of sending diocesan priests as missionaries to Latin America for a minimum of five years. The first 14 volunteers, all priests of the Archdiocese of Boston, arrived in Lima, Peru in early 1959 and began language studies. Within that year they undertook responsibility for parishes in remote areas of Peru and Bolivia. The Society also began parish work in Ecuador in 1963, and currently maintains a presence in those three countries, with headquarters in Boston, Massachusetts. In addition to supplying missionary personnel, the Society has provided funds for the erection of numerous churches, pastoral centers, clinics, rectories, and language schools in the areas where its members have labored. The St. James Society, now organized as a Clerical Association of the Christian Faithful, in conformity with the 1983 Code of Canon Law, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Boston and a priest-director elected by the members, is made up of English speaking diocesan priests from approximately six nations. Over 300 diocesan priests from more than 100 dioceses have been members since its foundation. While there were slightly more than 100 volunteers at the peak of membership, in 1967, by 2000, only about 50 priestmembers from over 30 different dioceses were affiliated.

MISSIONS, DIVINE

The word mission (from the Latin mittere) means a sending. Theologically, the divine missions are the sending of God the SON and the HOLY SPIRIT. The doctrine of the divine missions may be succinctly stated thus: the Son is sent by GOD THE FATHER, and the Holy Spirit is sent by both the Father and the Son (Denz 527).

Notion of Divine Missions. A divine mission is the procession of a Divine PERSON with the extrinsic effect that the Person thus sent becomes present in a new manner in rational creatures, uniting them in a SUPERNATURAL union with God.

A divine mission is a sending not by command or counsel, for this would imply that the Person sent would have a distinct will from the Person sending. In God there is but one will (Denz 851), which is common to the three Divine Persons. Any communication of the divine will from one Person to the other can be only through the divine processions, which distinguish the Divine Persons (Denz 528). As the divine processions imply no inequality between the Divine Persons, so too the divine missions imply no dependence or inferiority of the Person sent. The divine missions are as prolongations of the eternal processions; but, whereas a divine procession pertains to the immanent life of God, a divine mission refers to a Divine Person existing in a new manner outside the Godhead.

The existence of a Divine Person in a new manner is in rational creatures. This constitutes a new divine presence in creation. In the natural order, God is present by His knowledge, will, and essence (see OMNIPRES-ENCE). By virtue of the divine missions the presence of the Son and the Holy Spirit in the soul is a personal presence superadded to the presence of God in all nature. As to the supernatural order, the Latin Fathers emphasize the divine nature as the efficient and final cause of sanctification and the Triune God as the author of GRACE. This aspect of the mystery of sanctification stresses the divine operations in the soul. These divine operations are extrinsic to God and must therefore be attributed not to any one Person but to the three Divine Persons (Denz 501, 531). The work of sanctification is frequently ascribed to the Holy Spirit by APPROPRIATION [Divinum illud munus; Acta Sanctae Sedis 29 (Rome 1896–97) 647], for all these effects must be held as common to the Trinity in as far as God is the supreme efficient cause (Denz 3814). Since the divine missions, then, pertain only to the divine presence of the Son and the Holy Spirit, these missions are not to be distinguished by their sanctifying effects on the soul but by the divine processions in respect to the new manner in which these Divine Persons dwell in the soul.

In the soul of the just, the three Divine Persons are present in their substantial reality: the Son and the Holy Spirit are present in Person in accordance with their divine missions; and the Father is present in Person because the Father is in the Son and in the Holy Spirit (Denz 1330). This presence of the Trinity in the soul of the just is known as the doctrine of the divine INDWELLING.

The personal presence of the Trinity in the soul of the just is brought about through the Incarnate Word. Christ assumes a new human nature, not in a substantial way as in the INCARNATION, but in an accidental way, for the creature does not thereby lose his identity; nevertheless, there is truly a mystical union through the Holy Spirit, a union that attains its consummation and perfection in heaven (Denz 3814–15).

Persons Sent. In the Trinity there are the procession of the Son from the Father and the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son. Consequently, only the Son and the Holy Spirit are said to be sent.

The Father can be in a new manner among creatures, but not by reason of any divine processing. Nowhere is it said in Scripture that the Father is sent, but that He comes and gives Himself (Jn 14.23). Hence the Father's coming and giving Himself is not a divine mission.

The mission of the Son emanates from His immanent procession from the Father. Christ, who is sent by the Father, is His Son. God did "send his Son into the world" (Jn 3.17). "He who does not honor the Son, does not honor the Father who sent him" (Jn 5.23). Christ lives by the Father: "As the living Father has sent me, and as I live because of the Father, so he who eats me, he also shall live because of me" (Jn 6.58). Christ's mission is by the will of the Father (Jn 6.39), and faith in Christ is faith in the Father, who sent Him (Jn 12.44). It is, moreover, the will of the Father that the mission of Christ should bring life everlasting, and Christ Himself will raise the just to glory (Jn 6.40). Thus the ultimate purpose of Christ's mission is "that all may be one, even as thou, Father, in me and I in thee; that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me" (Jn 17.21; cf. 17.22, 23).

Furthermore, according to St. John's doctrine of the Son as the Word (Jn 1.1–18), the mission of the Son is associated with creation itself; it is directed specifically to rational creatures, and it is manifested in the Incarnation: "And the Word was made flesh" (Jn 1.14; see WORD, THE; LOGOS). A human nature is assumed in the very Person of the Son, so that it is the Son Himself who comes in Person. St. Paul, too, speaks of the Incarnation as the actual sending of the Son as man (Gal 4.4). He speaks also of the mission of the Son as embracing all rational creatures, visible and invisible (Col 1.15–20). Besides, St. Paul speaks of the eternal plan of the Father to be realized in Christ with His mission extending to those in heaven and those on earth (Eph 1.3–10).

The mission of the Holy Spirit emanates likewise from the will of God to communicate Himself. Accordingly the Holy Spirit is called the Spirit of the Father (Mt. 10.20) and the Spirit of His Son (Gal 4.6). The Holy Spirit is sent by the Father and the Son in accordance with His divine procession (Jn 14.26; 15.26; 16.7; 16.13–15; Gal 4.6). As the Holy Spirit in the Trinity is the "love and holiness of both" the Father and the Son (Denz 527), Scripture speaks of Him in respect to His mission not only as the gift of God (Jn 4.10, 14; 7.37–39) but also as the concrete and personal realization of God's love, achieving in the soul purification, justification, and sanctification (1 Cor 6.11; 2 Thes 2.13). Leo XIII therefore speaks of the Holy Spirit as the "life-giving Love," whose temporal mission is from the beginning of creation [Acta Sanctae Sedis 23 (Rome 1890–91) 644–645].

The missions of the Son and the Holy Spirit are eternal and absolute in origin; they are universal in time (Heb 13.8) and so ecumenical that no rational creature is excluded from their divine influence, for God "wishes all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the "truth" (1 Tm 2.4; cf. Is 59.1).

Visible Missions. The Incarnation is the visible mission par excellence. In the Incarnation a human nature was assumed into the unity of the Person of the Son. Of the three Divine Persons, the Son alone assumed this new mode of existing as man (Jn 1.14; Phil 2.5–7).

In the Incarnation the Son, who is the "image of the invisible God" (Col 1.15), enters creation officially "in the fullness of time" (Gal 4.4). He comes to impart His life (Jn 6.38–40; 10.10), but always in the Holy Spirit, "because through him we both have access in one Spirit to the Father" (Eph 2.18). And in union with the Holy Spirit, Christ perpetuates His visible mission through His Mystical Body, the Church, through His priesthood (Jn 20.22), through His Sacraments, and through His sacrificial and sacramental presence in the Holy Eucharist.

Of the mission of the Holy Spirit, there are four perceptible manifestations: under the form of a dove at the BAPTISM OF THE LORD (Mt 3.16); under the form of a luminous cloud at the TRANSFIGURATION (Mt 17.5); under the form of breath, when Christ conferred the Holy Spirit on His APOSTLES (Jn 20.22); and under the form of tongues of fire in the cenacle (Acts 2.3–4). These forms were only signs or symbols of the presence of the Holy Spirit, for the Holy Spirit did not assume these forms into the unity of His own Person.

In the Old Testament the just were sanctified through the divine missions [Divinum illud munus; Acta Sanctae Sedis 29 (Rome 1890–91) 651], but no legal or formal manifestation of these missions was made. The Incarnation of the Son was to inaugurate the external dispensation of grace. The visible mission of the Holy Spirit, then, does not precede the visible mission of the Son; but the Holy Spirit manifests the Son, as the Son manifests the Father.

Invisible Missions. The distinctive nature of the divine missions is that the Son and the Holy Spirit are in a new manner in creatures. It is a new, interior and invisible presence, which sanctifies the soul, imparting to it a new supernatural life.

As mentioned, the Latin Fathers stress the efficient and final causality of sanctification and attribute the SU-PERNATURAL ORDER to the Triune God. For the Greek Fathers every created effect is by virtue of the divine command of creation; the supernatural order, however, is not taken as an effect of efficient causality but as the living presence of the Divine Persons in rational creatures. The life of a Divine Person is distinct from any creative command; it is essentially immanent, whereas the creative command refers to things outside the divine nature. By virtue of the divine missions, the Son and the Holy Spirit exist in a new manner in rational creatures, so that the immanent life of God is present in creatures. It is in this sense that the Greek Fathers explain the words of St. Peter: that "you may become partakers of the divine nature" (2 Pt 1.4). Similarly, St. Paul speaks of Christ being "formed" in the soul (Gal 4.19).

Pius XII explains:

If we examine closely this divine principle of life and power given by Christ, in so far as it constitutes the very source of every gift and created grace, we easily see that it is nothing else than the Holy Spirit. . . . For it was by His breath of grace and truth that the Son of God adorned His own soul in the immaculate womb of the Blessed Virgin . . . this Spirit Christ merited for us on the cross. . . . But after Christ's glorification on the cross, His Spirit is communicated to the Church in an abundant outpouring, so that the Church and each of its members may become daily more and more like to our Savior.

To this Spirit of Christ, too, as to an invisible principle, is to be ascribed the fact that all the parts of the Body are joined one with the other and with their exalted head; for the Spirit of Christ is entirely in the head, entirely in the Body, and entirely in each member. . . . It is He who . . . is the principle of every truly supernatural act in all parts of the Body. It is He who, while He is personally present and divinely active in all the members, also acts in the inferior members through the ministry of the higher members. . . . "Let it suffice to say that, as Christ is the head of the Church, so is the Holy Spirit its soul" (Leo XIII).

. . . The Church, then, no less than each of its holy members, can make this thought of the Apostle its own (Gal 2.20): "And I live, now not I; but Christ lives in me." [Pius XII, "Mystici Corporis Christi," Acta Apostolicae Sedis 35 (1943) 54–56]

MISSISSIPPI, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A state in southern U.S., bounded on the north by Tennessee, on the east by Alabama, on the south by a portion of Louisiana and an arm of the Gulf of Mexico, and on the west by the Pearl River and the Mississippi River, which separates the state from Arkansas and Louisiana. The two Catholic dioceses in the state, Natchez-Jackson (1837, renamed diocese of Jackson in 1977) and Biloxi (1977) are suffragan sees of the archdiocese of Mobile.

History. In 1540 Hernando DeSoto and his Spanish expedition passed through this region. Several priests accompanied him; but since in a previous attack by Native Americans they had lost their Mass wine and some utensils, Mass probably was not offered here at that time. The earliest French explorers of the Mississippi River were Louis Jolliet and Rev. Jacques MARQUETTE (1673) and R. C. de LA SALLE (1682). Accompanying La Salle's expedition was Rev. Zenobius Membre, who on Easter Sunday, March 29, near the present site of Fort Adams, celebrated the first Mass on Mississippi soil of which there is a definite record. In 1699 missionaries from the Seminary of Quebec, Canada, descended the Mississippi River to work among the Indians and took up their stations near present Natchez. In the same year the French established a temporary settlement in what later became Ocean Springs. In 1717 they founded Natchez, and in 1720, Biloxi; other settlements were established soon after. During the latter half of the 18th century Great Britain and Spain in turn dominated this area. When in 1798 Spain withdrew in favor of the U.S, the Spanish-trained Irish clergy who had served in the area also withdrew. The Mississippi Territory (including the future Alabama) was then organized. Its government was modeled on the Northwest Ordinance with one major exception, the toleration of slavery. In 1817 Mississippi was admitted to the Union as the 20th state.

Antebellum Period. Post-territorial Catholic Mississippi was successively part of the Diocese of Baltimore, the proposed (1822) but not implemented vicariate of Alabama and Mississippi, the Diocese of Louisiana and, in 1826, the Diocese of New Orleans. In July 28, 1837 Gregory XVI established the Diocese of Natchez (later redesignated JACKSON) to embrace the whole state of Mississippi. Although the diocese was established on July 28, 1837, it was almost four years before Bishop John Chanche, the first ordinary, was consecrated, March 14, 1841. When he arrived in Mississippi on May 19, he found two sizable Catholic communities at Natchez and Vicksburg, a large number of families and small communities along the Gulf Coast, and an unknown number of families and individuals scattered throughout the state. The state had no Catholic churches or institutions and only two priests.

Mississippi's economy, politics, and culture were molded during the 1830s when former Native American lands were opened to settlement. An influx of immigrants quickly followed, and the growing presence of Baptist and Methodist congregations gave the state its predominately Protestant religious profile. Cotton-based agriculture, mainly worked first by black slaves and later by sharecroppers, created a distinctive political, social, and economic society that endured until World War II. Strong regional differences appeared between the planter societies of the river counties and the small farms of the north and the Piney Woods. Simultaneously the "race question" shaped the state's future.

Mississippi Catholicism grew both in numbers and organization under the antebellum leadership of Bishops John Chanche (1841–1852), James Oliver Van de Velde, S.J. (1853–1855), and William Henry Elder (1857–1880). By 1861, the diocese numbered about 10,000

Catholics served by one bishop and eighteen diocesan priests; thirteen parishes with resident priests and twenty-eight mission stations; fifteen churches with several more under construction; five parochial schools, two day schools, three boarding schools, and two orphanages staffed by five religious communities and several lay teachers; numerous parish devotional, altar, and charitable societies; and regular parish missions and clerical conferences. Bishop Chanche laid the foundation for an imposing cathedral that he viewed as "the needed stimulus to the whole mission."

Civil War and Reconstruction. Mississippi was a major battleground during the Civil War. Natchez, Vicksburg, Jackson, Meridian, Okolona, and Corinth were among the Catholic communities that were battle sites or suffered property damage. Catholic church facilities at Jackson were destroyed three times by Federal troops. Bishop William Henry Elder was briefly sent into exile in Louisiana in July, 1864, when he refused to allow the local Federal military commander to dictate specific prayers for Northern civil authorities at Mass.

The war left the state devastated politically, economically, and socially; brought ruin to numerous families whose fathers were killed or disabled; and depleted the already meager resources of Mississippi Catholicism. Mississippi was readmitted to the Union in 1870, but remained under a reconstruction government until 1875. The state was hampered by an undiversified agriculture, the lack of industry, poor education, and a primitive financial system based on merchants.

The greatest post-war challenge was the peaceful, productive incorporation of newly-freed blacks into Mississippi life; this challenge was met, after a brief reconstruction period, by a political-economic-social structure of sharecropping, segregation, and disenfranchisement that closely mirrored antebellum, slave society.

Bishop Elder worked among the camps for freed blacks outside Natchez during the final years of the war and struggled to find the resources to address the challenge of evangelizing them. By 1884, Mississippi numbered 1,500 African American Catholics. Bishop Francis Janssens (1881–1887) adopted an approach common in missionary lands—small chapel-schools overseen by priests but staffed by trained African American catechists. In 1890, Holy Family Parish, the state's first parish for African Americans, was established at Natchez. Between 1906 and 1914, seven additional parishes for African Americans were founded at Vicksburg, Pascagoula, Jackson, Meridian, Pass Christian, Greenville, and Biloxi; all were staffed by Josephites or Divine Word Fathers.

Early Twentieth Century. Despite the upheavals of reconstruction and its aftermath, Mississippi Catholicism took on a new vigor in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century under the leadership of Bishops Francis Janssens, Thomas Heslin (1889–1911), and John Gunn, S.M. (1911–1924). More than 250 Catholic communities, many short-lived, existed in the state between 1865 and 1910. The Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the American Board of Catholic Missions, the Indian and Colored Missions Fund, and the Catholic Church Extension Society provided a significant part of the financial resources for these communities. Even today the diocese of Jackson receives funding from these sources.

After statehood, a series of broken treaties and government policies of displacement to Native American Territory left Mississippi with only 2,300 Native Americans by 1900. Through the initiative of Bishop Francis Janssens, a small, active Catholic Choctaw community, centered in the Philadelphia area, developed in the late nineteenth century and remains a vital part of Mississippi Catholicism. By 1917, more than 28,000 Catholics were scattered across the state in 41 parishes, 69 missions, and 54 stations; 11 percent were African Americans. Fortytwo schools and two orphanages had a combined enrollment of 4,736; 29 percent of the students were African Americans; .8 percent, Choctaws.

When Bishop John Gunn arrived in 1911, he set as one of his primary goals to establish chapels throughout the state. With generous aid from the Catholic Church Extension Society, more than twenty-five new churches and chapels were built between 1912 and 1924 alone. With Bishop Gunn's encouragement, the Society of the Divine Word established a seminary to train African American priests, first at Greenville in 1920, and then at Bay St. Louis in 1921. The first four graduates were ordained in 1934, and several later graduates were among the country's pioneer twentieth-century African American bishops, including Harold Perry (New Orleans), Terry J. Steib (St. Louis/Memphis), and Dominic Carmen (New Orleans).

The Gerow Era. Bishop Gunn's successor, Richard O. Gerow, shephered the Church in Mississippi for over forty years (1924–1966), during which time the state, like the rest of the country, suffered through the depression of the 1930s, World War II and its aftermath, and later the civil rights movement. When newly consecrated Bishop Gerow arrived, Catholicism was Mississippi's third largest religious denomination, after the Baptists and Methodists. The state had 31,387 Catholics served by 60 priests, but only 42 of the state's 149 churches and chapels had a resident pastor. 5,829 children were being educated in 41 Catholic schools.

The church had all it could do to hold its own during the 1930s when parishes and other Catholic institutions suffered the harsh effects of the depression. The post-World War II years, however, witnessed the waning of Mississippi's insularity and isolation as it became more industrialized and assimilated into the mainstream of the American economy. It was also a period of major administrative change in the Catholic Church in Mississippi. In 1952, Bishop Gerow divided the diocese into nine deaneries, and the following he year moved the bishop's residence and chancery from historic Natchez to Jackson. In 1953 he launched a diocesan newspaper, the Mississippi Register (later Mississippi Today and then Mississippi Catholic) to replace the Natchez edition of Catholic Action of the South, a cooperative venture of the Louisiana and Mississippi dioceses. On Dec. 18, 1956 the name of the diocese was changed to Natchez-Jackson.

The most striking changes in Mississippi society took place in the area of race relations. Bishop Gerow had worked quietly and within the existing legal and social structure to expand opportunities among the region's African American population. He concentrated on establishing parishes and strong schools with sisters in urban areas, and acted forcefully against all blatant acts of discrimination in diocesan churches.

The issue of desegregating Catholic schools came to a head in the wake of the 1954 Supreme Court decision. The violence with which some Mississippians opposed integration, evidenced in the 1963 murder of Medgar Evers, prodded the mild-tempered Bishop Gerow to take a more public and forceful stance. On June 14, he issued a statement that proclaimed a mutual responsibility for Evers' murder and the growing violence and pleaded for a common ground ''based on human dignity and the concept of justice under God's law.'' On Aug. 4, 1964, Gerow, at the urging of auxiliary Bishop Joseph Brunini and Father Bernard Law (the future Cardinal Archbishop of Boston), ordered the integration of the first grade in all Catholic schools of the diocese. The following year he ordered the integration of all grades.

The Brunini Years. Bishop Gerow was succeed by his auxiliary, Joseph B. Brunini. A native of Vicksburg, Brunini had studied and was ordained to the priesthood in Rome, received a doctorate in canon law from the Catholic University of America in Washington, and served as a pastor before being ordained as auxiliary bishop in 1957. Bishop Brunini had attended the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). It fell to him to guide Mississippi's Catholics through the implementation of integration.

In 1967, Bishop Brunini committed the diocese to full integration of Catholic schools. He established an open, participative style of leadership, fostered lay participation and ministry, expanded the Church's social ministry, led the state's efforts to break down racial barriers, and worked to establish closer bonds with other Churches. In his 1969 Christmas homily, Bishop Brunini called for Mississippi's religious leaders to speak with a united voice to bring about racial justice and peace. Soon afterwards, the Mississippi Religious Leadership Conference was established with Brunini as the first chairman. The conference became a major voice in the state, urging political leaders to foster education and end segregation and racism throughout the state. Brunini's support encouraged Sister Thea Bowman, a Missionary Sister Servant of the Holy Ghost, who served in the diocese from 1961 until her death from cancer in 1990. She became a national voice for change and reconciliation, proclaiming her message in word and song.

During his tenure, Catholic services to the needy, poor and elderly rapidly expanded. He actively recruited Irish clergy, formed the Catholic Foundation in 1973, established new personnel and finance policies, encouraged the establishment of parish councils, and fostered adult education programs. Under Brunini's leadership, the diocese agreed to staff Our Lady of Perpetual Help Parish in Saltillo, Mexico. Although begun as a provincial venture, Brunini and the Catholic people of Mississippi soon adopted, funded, and supplied clergy for the mission.

On March 1, 1977 Pope Paul VI established a second diocese in Mississippi. The seventeen southern counties were organized into the Diocese of Biloxi. Bishop Joseph L. Howze was named the first bishop. Later that year, June 6, 1977, the name of the other diocese was redesignated as the Diocese of Jackson. In 1980, the two Mississippi dioceses became part of the new ecclesiastical Province of Mobile. In 2000, the Biloxi diocesan administration moved to a new Catholic chancery building. On July 2, 2001, Msgr. Thomas J. Rodi, a native New Orleanian and former Vicar General of the Archdiocese of New Orleans, was ordained as Biloxi's second bishop. Bishop William R. Houck who had succeeded Brunini in Jackson in 1984 established spiritual renewal as one of his first priorities.

Between 1950 and 2000, the number of Mississippi Catholics increased from 50,559 to 115,196. By 2000, Catholics numbered about 4.2% of the state's total population, a significant increase from 2.4% a half century earlier. The largest concentrations were on the Gulf Coast, in the capital city of Jackson, and in Vicksburg. While the number of priests actually increased slightly, the number of religious brothers and sisters serving in the state declined by fifteen percent. In 1950, priests constituted 3.5% of the Catholic population; brothers and sisters, 8.8%; and the laity, 87.7%. By 2000, these figures had changed to 1.7%, 3.3%, and 95% respectively.

MISSOURI, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in the central United States, Missouri is separated from Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee by the Mississippi River and is bounded on the north by Iowa; on the west by Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma; and on the south by Arkansas. It was admitted to the Union in 1821 as the 24th state. The capital is Jefferson City; St. Louis and Kansas City are the largest cities. In 2001 the population of the state was 5,478,300 of whom 859,574 or about 16 percent were Catholic. There are four Catholic dioceses: the archdiocese of St. Louis and its three suffragan sees, Springfield-Cape Girardeau, Jefferson City, and Kansas City.

Early History. The roots of Roman Catholicism's development in Missouri date back to 1673; on June 17 of that year Jesuit Father Jacques MARQUETTE, a priest and missionary from Canada accompanying the entrepreneur Louis Joliet down the Mississippi River to evangelize the peoples living in the region, entered the Great River. Eventually Marquette and Joliet negotiated the river from the Kaskaskia country all the way to the southern reaches of Arkansas. En route the two Frenchmen crossed the Mississippi and camped over in and explored the southeastern part of what would later become Perry County, Missouri. That trek laid the foundation for Catholic missioning in the western reaches of the Mississippi Valley.

Throughout the latter half of the seventeenth century and much of the eighteenth, the French presence in the Mississippi Valley increased, with a settlement across the river, St. Genevieve, founded in the mid-1730s. In 1759 the Jesuits established a parish at St. Genevieve. Several years later, in 1763, the Treaty of Paris ended the French and Indian War. France was forced to cede to England all her North American territorial possessions east of the Mississippi River and north of the Ohio, including Canada. In order to safeguard her interests in the vast lands she claimed westward from the Mississippi River to the Rockies against the incursions of the British, France ceded them all to Spain. As a result, the Catholic Church's situation changed dramatically in the area. For more than a century that region had existed under the ecclesiastical authority of the French Bishop of Quebec. But with the ceding of this domain to Spain, it then fell under the jurisdiction of the Spanish Bishop of Havana, Cuba.

Not many years were to pass before several clusters of settlers with visible Catholic identities (mainly French, Irish, and German) began to develop immediately beyond the western bank of the Mississippi River. Between 1787 and 1818 a small farming community situated 80 miles south of Saint Louis near St. Genevieve took form and began to mature. Originally known as the Barrens Colony, it would later be called Perryville, named after the naval hero of the War of 1812, Oliver Hazard Perry. About 1790, an Irish-born priest who had received his education in Spain, Father James Maxwell, began to serve the Catholics of the Barrens Colony.

According to Isidore Moore, one of the locale's earliest residents, Father Maxwell labored among the people of the settlement well into, and perhaps even slightly beyond, the War of 1812. The Congregation of the Mission constructed a seminary in Barrens Colony (Perryville) that molded countless Vincentians into frontier churchmen inspired by the spirit of their founder, St. Vincent de Paul. Alumni of the seminary emerged as key in the growth of the Catholic Church not only in Missouri, but far southward to Texas and northern Mexico and west to California as well.

The first permanent settlers in that area in 1787 were two Frenchmen, Jean Baptiste Barsaloux and his father. They had obtained a tract of land from the Spanish government and planned to engage in a life of farming. Inasmuch as the government of Spain would have required such, the two Frenchmen likely were Catholics. Within 30 years a rural community of Catholics had been attracted to the site. In addition to Isidore Moore and his family, they included Joseph Fenwick (at the vanguard of a group of Marylander Catholics), Joseph Tucker and his sons, Aquila Hagan, Sarah Haydon, and Wilfrid, Joseph, and Ignatius Layton and the latter's wife. Important also in the development of that Catholic group were the French Trappist pastor from Florissant, Missouri, Father Joseph Dunand, an Italian Vincentian priest, Joseph ROSATI, and Bishop Louis William DU BOURG, heading up the diocese of Louisiana and the Floridas.

When Father Rosati arrived at the Barrens on Oct. 1, 1818 with a number of Vincentian missionaries and seminarians, they were warmly welcomed by Bishop Du Bourg. The construction of the seminary had already begun; it was completed in the early 1820s, and a lay college was attached. Among the many dedicated missionaries educated in Saint Mary's of the Barrens seminary none were better known nor more highly respected than Jean-Marie ODIN, C.M., and John TIMON, C.M.

Odin was a French priest born in the tiny hamlet of Hauteville, in the parish of Saint Martin d'Ambierle, situated in the far western reaches of the archdiocese of Lyon, France. Following his decision to volunteer for foreign mission work to America from the Sulpician major seminary of Saint Irenaeus at Lyon, Odin arrived at Saint Mary's of the Barrens Seminary in August of 1822. In 1823 he entered the Congregation of the Mission and was ordained a priest. For 17 years following his ordination he labored as a missionary, professor of theology at the seminary, secretary to the rector of the seminary (Father Rosati) and confessor to a community of Sisters of Loretto at a convent near the seminary. After serving as first pastor of the newly established parish of Saint Vincent de Paul at Cape Girardeau, Missouri, in 1836, he returned to Saint Mary's of the Barrens seminary for a three-year stint. Eventually, however, in 1840, he was sent to Texas, where he spent more than 20 years building the Faith there as vice prefect apostolic (1840), vicar apostolic (1841), and finally first bishop of Galveston (1847–61). In the spring of 1861 Odin was named second archbishop of New Orleans (1861-70).

John Timon, three years older than Odin, was born of Irish immigrant parents at Conswego Settlement near York, Pennsylvania, on Feb. 12, 1797. Following the War of 1812 the Timon family migrated westward, eventually settling in St. Louis where young Timon met Father De Andreis and Bishop Du Bourg. After studying for a short time at a school that Bishop Du Bourg had founded in 1919 (the forerunner of St. Louis University), Timon moved on to St. Mary's of the Barrens Seminary where in 1823 he joined the Congregation of the Mission. He was ordained a priest in 1825 and in 1835 Timon was named the first Visitor (Superior) of the American Vincentians. Ultimately Timon went on to be named prefect apostolic of Texas (1839) and first bishop of Buffalo, New York (1847) where he died on April 16, 1867. Under the leadership of Father Rosati, these nineteenthcentury Vincentians went on to lay a strong base for the Church in Missouri, building parishes, catechizing, and ministering to the Catholics of the state.

From 1804 when the Upper Louisiana Territory was transferred to U.S. control, to 1826 the territory of the future state of Missouri fell under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Bishop of Louisiana, Bishop Du Bourg. The Vincentian Joseph Rosati was appointed coadjutor of Bishop Du Bourg and consecrated bishop at Donaldsville, Louisiana in March 1824. When on July 18, 1826 Pope Leo XII divided the Diocese of Louisiana and erected the sees of St. Louis and New Orleans, Bishop Du Bourg resigned. (He returned to France where he died on Dec. 12, 1833). The pope named Bishop Rosati the first ordinary of the Diocese of St. Louis and administrator of the Diocese of New Orleans. On Nov. 30, 1841, Father Peter Richard KENRICK, a native of Dublin, Ireland, and younger brother of coadjutor bishop of Philadelphia and future archbishop of Baltimore Francis Patrick Kenrick, was consecrated coadjutor bishop of St. Louis. When Bishop Rosati died in Rome on Sept. 25, 1843, Kenrick automatically succeeded him as ordinary of the diocese.

Diocesan Development. On Jan. 30, 1847, St. Louis was raised to the ecclesiastical status of an archbishopric; and Kenrick became the first archbishop of St. Louis. St. Louis included among its early suffragan sees Chicago, Dubuque, Milwaukee, Nashville, and St. Paul. At first the territory of the archdiocese was ill-defined, but by 1850 it was restricted to the present state boundaries. The Diocese of St. Joseph was erected in 1868, followed by that of Kansas City in 1880. Save for the assignment of 11 northeastern Missouri counties to St. Joseph in 1911, the ecclesiastical division of Missouri remained the same for 76 years. In 1956 a third suffragan see was added, and the territory completely realigned, with the Archdiocese of ST. LOUIS contracted to the see city and nine surrounding counties.

The ethnic make-up of Missouri's Catholic presence mirrors the historical patterns of religious demography associated with nineteenth-century American migration into the Midwest and beyond to the West Coast. The original French pre-eminence in the European settlement of the Mississippi River Valley, particularly with such personages involved as Marquette and Joliet, evolved as a paradigm of the manner in which New France was colonized. The nineteenth-century influx of Irish and German Catholics into the region, on the other hand, developed as an integral part of the narrative of European immigrants and the westward movement. This is especially true in regards to the building of the railroads and other essences of the industrial revolution—including that of mining in the West.

Catholic Irish and German life of Missouri is a prominent aspect of the state's legacy. Though noticeable throughout the southeastern, eastern, and centralnorthwestern regions of the state, such is especially true regarding St. Louis, Kansas City, and some of the state's smaller population centers. Perryville, for example, enjoys a visible German Catholic identity concomitant with its Irish and French Catholic heritage. As early as 1790, Father James Maxwell, from St. Genevieve, served Missouri's first Irish Catholic settlement, "a rough and tumble encampment on the Mississippi River called Boisé Brûlé Bottom." After gaining statehood in 1821, Missouri attracted an increasing number of settlers. Its Irish Catholic population steadily grew, many of the men working on the docks and steamboats of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and the women acting as domestic servants. Having matured as a prominent ethnic community in Missouri's western settlement of St. Joseph, the Irish Catholics saw the first parish established there in 1845, with Irish-born Father Thomas Scanlon as pastor.

With the passage of time, Irish Catholics came to play a major role in the building of not only the Church, but secular society as well. Father John Joseph Hogan of Bruff (Limerick), Ireland, the founder of the Irish Wilderness Settlements, became the first bishop of St. Joseph (consecrated on Sept. 13, 1868), and later (Sept. 10, 1880) first bishop of Kansas City. Irish Catholics were active in virtually all phases of Missouri's nineteenth and twentieth-century political, economic (especially labor unions), cultural, educational, military, and social developments.

The late nineteenth and twentieth centuries saw a kneading into the population of St. Louis, Kansas City, and other metropolitan areas most of the nationalities that have historically emerged as segments of the contemporary Catholic scene: Hispanics (and their centuries-old heritage from the American Southwest), Italians, and Asians.

At the same time with all of this development of the Catholic presence in Missouri, it cannot be ignored that a moral blight existed into the seventh decade of the nineteenth century, infecting the American nation, and thus society in Missouri and Catholicism's role therein: the institution of slavery. That phenomenon must be looked at carefully, as it came to fruition within the Catholic population of the state. While the human debasement that lay at the heart of slavery inherently contradicted Catholic moral precepts, lay Catholics and clergy and religious alike owned slaves in the nineteenth century, including the Vincentians at St. Mary's of the Barrens Seminary at Perryville.

After the creation of the Diocese of St. Joseph in 1868 and Kansas City in 1880, the ecclesiastical division of Missouri, save for the assignment of 11 northeastern Missouri counties to St. Joseph in 1911, remained the same for 76 years. In 1956 the territory completely realigned. The dioceses of Kansas City and St. Joseph were joined and redesignated as the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph. The new diocese of Springfield-Cape Girardeau was created by carving out 39 counties in southern Missouri from the dioceses of St. Louis and Kansas City. Bishop Charles H. Helmsing, auxiliary bishop in St. Louis, was the first ordinary (1956-62). The diocese of Jefferson City in the northeastern part of the state embraced 38 counties taken from St. Louis, Kansas City and the old diocese of St. Joseph. Bishop Joseph M. Marling, an auxiliary bishop in Kansas City, was named the first ordinary (1956-79). The Archdiocese of St. Louis was contracted to the see city and nine surrounding counties. The four dioceses joined together to form the Missouri Catholic Conference to provide a forum in which Catholics communicate and exchange information with one another and other groups on a statewide basis. The conference provides moral leadership and advocacy on public policy and issues of concern to the Church.

Higher Education. Founded by the Jesuits in 1818, ST. LOUIS UNIVERSITY is the oldest and most prestigious Catholic institution of higher learning in Missouri. In addition to St. Louis University, the Jesuits also sponsor Rockhurst College in Kansas City (established 1910). The Sisters of Saint Joseph of Carondelet sponsors two colleges, Fontbonne College in St. Louis (founded 1923 as a liberal arts college for women; coeducational from 1971) and Avila College in Kansas City (founded 1916 as a women's college; became coeducational in 1969). The Dominicans founded the Aquinas Institute of Theology, a Catholic graduate school, in St. Louis in 1925.

MITER

The headdress worn in liturgical functions by bishops and other ecclesiastical prelates (mitered abbots) as a symbol of their special dignity. It is constructed of two stiffened triangular pieces, rounded at the sides and reaching to a point, sewn together laterally and united above by a fold of cloth. Two lappets (infulae) trimmed at the ends with fringe hang down from the back. Historically, there were three forms of miter: pretiosa or precious miter (often ornamented with jewels), auriphrygiata (with cloth of gold) and simplex (white silk or linen). Worn during various liturgical actions, the miter is always put aside when the bishop prays (1 Cor 11.4).

The origins of the miter are unclear. Probably developing from the camelaucum worn by the civil officials of the late ROMAN EMPIRE, this distinctive headpiece was allowed by Emperor CONSTANTINE I to Christian bishops in recognition of the role he had assigned them in the imperial hierarchy. Its history seems to be analogous to that of the phrygium, the predecessor of the papal TIARA, claimed by popes in the DONATION of Constantine. It is known that Pope CONSTANTINE I in the early eighth century wore the camelaucum on a visit to Constantinople (Liber pontificalis, 1:390). There seems to be no relationship between the Episcopal miter and the crown or μ (τ) used in both the East and the West by women and old men.

Prior to the 12th century the episcopal miter assumed many shapes: it was cone-shaped or simply a hat with a rounded crown of soft material, the lower edge of which ended in an ornamental band. Two lappets might be attached to the back of the miter. During the 12th century the rounded miter was often indented back across the top, producing prominent horns (cornua) at the right and left sides of the crown. These might be round or puffed as the result of an ornamental band that passed from front to back across the indentation; or they might end in a point, stiffened with parchment or other lining. By the end of the century the appearance of the miter was changed by moving the cornua a quarter circle causing them accordingly to rise centrally, front and back. From the 13th century the miter gradually grew in height and evolved into the roughly triangular shape it has in the 20th century. It has been observed that miters used today in the Church of England and the Episcopal Church in the United States, approximate the height of those in the late 15th and early 16th century; Roman miters, on the other hand, continued to grow in height and ornamentation into the 17th century. But in the absence of an exact comparative study of the headdress of bishops and abbots through the centuries, no precise dating of distinguishable developments is possible.

The first written mention of the miter is found in the bull of Pope LEO IX (Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, 4158) of 1049. In this document, confirming the primacy of the church of Trier, Leo granted Eberhard of Trier the right to use the Roman miter in performing the offices of the Church. In 1051 the same pope allowed the miter to the cardinal priests of the diocese of Besançon. The first authentic grant of the miter to an abbot dates from 1063, when Pope ALEXANDER II conferred the miter on Abbot Aethelsig of ST. AUGUSTINE's Abbey in Canterbury (Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, 4541). At times the privilege of the miter was granted to secular princes, among them the German emperors, Duke Wratislaw of Bohemia and King Peter of Aragon.

In the Greek Church the liturgical head-covering developed apparently from the cap worn by dignitaries of the late Roman Empire, possibly from that of the emperor himself. The Greek pontifical miter is a high hat that swells out toward the top and is spanned diagonally by two hoops; on the highest point of the crown is a cross either standing upright or placed flat.

MITHRAS AND MITHRAISM

Mithra (in Greek, Mithras) was an ancient Indo-Iranian god. In the Vedas, as well as in a list of gods appended to a treaty concluded in the 14th century B.C. between the Hittite king and the king of Mitanni, he is coupled with Varuna. In Iran also, he appears in union with Ahura—probably another name for the outmoded Varuna. His name means "contract," but this designation does not account for all his characteristics. Despite his importance as a major divinity, Mithra is conspicuously absent from the Gāthās. As he was the greatest rival of Ahura Mazda, whom Zoroaster wished to make the supreme god, the prophet probably did not dare to oppose him openly but preferred to ignore him in his hymns. Mithra, at this early date, may have been connected with bull-sacrifices, as he was in Roman times. But, when after the death of Zoroaster Mithra was readmitted into the religion of his followers, he did not exhibit any such connection. On the other hand, he is associated with the sun; the Yasht (see AVESTA) devoted to him depicts him rising in the morning behind the Eastern mountains and crossing the sky from East to West in his chariot drawn by white horses. His standing epithet, "with broad pastures," means that he gives protection and grazing rights over large territories, and this at least is clearly in accord with his character as a god of the contract.

The Development and Spread of His Cult. In western Iran he is first mentioned, in addition to Ahura Mazda, in the inscriptions of Artaxerxes II (404-358 B.C.). His popularity in Parthian and Hellenistic times is proved by the frequency of personal names, like Mithridates, and by his presence, immediately after Ormazd, in the inscription of Antiochus of Commagene on the Nimrud Dagh (c. 50 B.C.). In that, Mithra is further identified with three different Greek gods, namely, Apollo, because of his solar and juridical character; Helios, as a sun-god; and Hermes, as a mediator between gods and men. In eastern Iran during the same period, he was by far the most prominent god, superior even to Ormazd, in the religion of the Kushans. Therefore, it is not surprising that the Iranian religion, which in Hellenistic and Roman times spread throughout the West, should have had Mithra, and not Ormazd, as its principal god, and should have been called Mithraism.

The Greco-Oriental mystery cult of Mithras is known, apart from a few meager literary texts, almost exclusively from archeological monuments and a few short inscriptions. The Mithraic monuments are scattered throughout the Roman Empire, but are found especially at the frontiers. Mithraism was essentially a soldiers' religion. Renan was guilty of exaggeration when he said that had not the world turned Christian, it would have turned Mithraic. Christianity had the advantage of having the historical God-Man, Jesus Christ, as its founder and of addressing itself to women as well as men—and women played a decisive part in its diffusion.

Mithraism or the Cult of Mithras. The ceremonies of the mysteries of Mithras were performed in caveshaped, usually subterranean buildings, imitating the vault of the sky, which Mithras spanned daily. These temples, or Mithraea, were adorned with reliefs, the most important of which show Mithras, wearing a Phrygian cap, in the act of killing a bull. An ear of wheat sprouts from the tail of the animal. The relationship between these representations and the myth, attested in later Pahlavi writings, of Ahriman killing the primeval bull, is far from clear. The Pahlavi documents, moreover, are as late as the 9th century A.D., whereas the monuments of the mysteries date from the 2d to the 4th [see AHURA MAZDA (ORMAZD) AND AHRIMAN]. But the fact must be stressed that Mithras, in the mysteries, had taken over the role of other gods or heroes, notably of Saturn, as god of a new golden age; of Time, as god of destiny; and Phaethon, as author of the final conflagration of the world. Therefore, it may well be that he took over an exploit usually assigned to Ahriman.

The birth of the infant Mithras was celebrated on December 25, i.e., just after the winter solstice, when the power of the sun was at its lowest. This undoubtedly contributed to the adoption of December 25 as the date for Christmas. But the importance of Mithraism in the development of early Christianity should not be overestimated. For instance, the thesis that the Iranians, prior to the birth of Jesus, believed in and waited for the imminent advent of a divine child who would save the world, is devoid of proof.

There were seven degrees of initiation into which the faithful were successfully admitted, each with its own symbols, and each connected with a planet. They were: the Corax, or Raven; the Nymphus, or Bridegroom; the Miles, or Soldier; the Leo, or Lion; the Perses, or Persian; the Heliodromus, personifying the sun's daily course; and the Pater, or Father, who was the chief of a Mithraic community.

The ritual comprised oaths, banquets of bread and wine, and a formal baptism through water and blood. In these ceremonies, reminiscent of the Christian Eucharist and Baptism, some early Christian writers (Justin Martyr and Tertullian) saw imitations of the Christian Sacraments. It may well be that they were at least partly right.

Mithras, though the most important god in the mysteries, was not the supreme one. This is in accord with Plutarch's statement that he was a mediator. In fact, the numerous bas-reliefs representing various stages in his career give the impression not so much of a god as of a demigod or hero, a sort of Hercules. The connection is sometimes obvious. Thus, when Mithras, having captured the bull, pulls him into the cave, he seems to be repeating the exploit of Hercules and Cacus. Accordingly he performs all his feats in honor of some other god. In regard to the identity of this god, there is no definite answer. Perhaps the question should not be raised at all. In an age when syncretism was so dominant, gods such as Aion, Sarapis, Zeus, Helios, Mithras, Hades, and Ahriman could all be identified as one. It suffices to recall the syncretism of Ormazd-Jupiter-Caelus. However, it should be noted that, even when called summus exsuperantissimus, this god was not exterior to the world like Yahweh, or the "Father of Greatness" of Gnosticism, but a cosmic god.

After death, the followers of Mithras were promised access, through seven successive planetary spheres, to a heaven that was beyond these spheres, beyond all things.

MITTARELLI, GIOVANNI BENEDETTO

Camaldolese author and administrator; b. Venice, Sept. 2, 1707; d. Abbey of S. Michele di Murano, near Venice, Aug. 14, 1777. Mittarelli's field of activity as priest and scholar was limited to his own CAMALDOLESE Order, which he joined in 1722. In 1747 he came to Faenza as chancellor of the order and there began, together with Anselmo Costadoni (d. 1785), the Annales Camaldulenses ordinis S. Benedicti. This is his chief work, and it is patterned entirely after MABILLON and embraces the period from 907 to 1764. It appeared in nine volumes in Venice from 1754 to 1773. Mittarelli returned as abbot in 1760 to his home monastery of S. Michele di Murano; in 1765 he went to Rome as abbot general of his order. During his five-year stay there, he was a favorite of Pope CLEMENT XIII, a native of Venice.

MITTY, JOHN JOSEPH

Fourth archbishop of San Francisco, Calif.; b. New York City, Jan. 20, 1884; d. Menlo Park, Calif., Oct. 15, 1961. He was the son of John and Mary (Murphy) Mitty and was orphaned at an early age. After an early education at the St. Joseph's School and the De La Salle Institute, he graduated (1901) from Manhattan College, New York City. From 1901 to 1906 he attended St. Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, N.Y., and he was ordained on Dec. 22, 1906; he was the first graduate of that institution to be consecrated a bishop, and he himself ordained more than 700 priests and consecrated seven bishops. He pursued graduate studies at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., and the Lateran Seminary, Rome, receiving a doctorate in sacred theology in 1908. After advanced studies in psychology at the University of Munich, Germany, he returned to New York (1909), where he was assigned briefly as a curate at St. Veronica's Church. In the same year he joined the faculty of St. Joseph's Seminary as professor of theology, enjoying the life of a scholar until 1917, when he joined the U.S. Army. He served as chaplain with the 49th and 101st regiments at Camp Merritt, N.J., and in France, where he participated in the Meuse-Argonne offensive. After the war he was appointed pastor of Sacred Heart Church, Highland Falls, N.Y., and chaplain of the cadet corps at West Point. His second pastorate was at St. Luke's Church, Bronx, N.Y., from 1922 to June 21, 1926, when Pius XI appointed him bishop of Salt Lake City, Utah. He was consecrated the following September 8, the youngest bishop in the country at that time. He served as ordinary of the Utah diocese until Jan. 29, 1932, when he was named coadjutor archbishop of San Francisco; he succeeded to the see when Archbishop Edward J. HANNA resigned on March 2, 1935.

Mitty's previous career fitted him well for the huge task that awaited him in rapidly growing San Francisco. His arrival there coincided with an economic depression that stunted the growth of facilities necessary to maintain a living church. Then World War II, with San Francisco the major port for Pacific operations, gave a new direction to the sociological, cultural, political, and spiritual development of the archdiocese. The great westward migration that hit flood stage with four million newcomers during the war years brought an increase in the Catholic body from 405,000 Catholics in 1935 to more than 1,121,500 in 1961. Mitty founded 85 new parishes and directed the completion of 563 major building projects, including 120 new churches, 119 new elementary schools, 13 high schools, 28 youth centers, and 27 diocesan buildings, including orphanages, retreat houses, general hospitals, and an enlarged junior seminary. During his tenure, the number of priests serving the archdiocese increased from 667 to 1,197, and the number of children in Catholic schools rose from 27,257 to 100,681. The total number of youth under religious instruction in 1961 was 220,397, an increase of 164,783. This increase was due to the new concept of the School of Religion in the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine program, which Mitty started and which has since become widely accepted in many parts of the world.

Mitty was one of the first prelates in the United States to inaugurate a specialized postgraduate training for his clergy; all diocesan departments were headed by priests trained especially for the purpose and with appropriate degrees. He also anticipated many pastoral projects that later became common practices in U.S. dioceses, pioneering in the work of counseling in the social services and initiating a series of monthly spiritual hours of direction for the nuns in the archdiocese. He was one of the first to organize "flying squads" of priests to care for migrant workers, and he lost no time in integrating schools throughout the archdiocese. When television was in its infancy, he plunged immediately into the establishment of a weekly diocesan-produced program. Ecumenicalminded, he was instrumental in having accepted nationally the ceremony of "mixed marriages" held in the parish church. He provided summer schools for the education of his priests in the social encyclicals long before such activities became popular. He insisted that his seminarians spend their summers in some form of apostolic work that he himself provided through camps, catechetics, and census-taking. When the United Nations was founded in San Francisco, Mitty organized the greatest act of citizen participation in the initial days of the United Nations with a Mass at which he was joined by 10,000 of his flock.

MIVART, GEORGE JACKSON, ST.

Biologist; b. London, Nov. 30, 1827; d. London, April 1, 1900. He converted to Catholicism in 1844. He was confirmed at Oscott in 1845, the same year as William George WARD and John Henry NEWMAN. Barred by the religious tests from matriculation at Oxford or Cambridge, Mivart studied law at Lincoln's Inn Court and was called to the bar in 1851. Financially secure, he did not practice law, but became active in biology. With Richard OWEN and Thomas HUXLEY as both friends and teachers, he pursued investigations in comparative anatomy that resulted in significant monographs in vertebrate anatomy with emphasis on the primates. He accepted evolution as an explanation for the origin of species, although he rejected as a primary agent the Darwinian mechanism of natural selection because he considered it to be in conflict with Catholic doctrine. In his On the Genesis of Species (1871), he criticized the Darwinian theory and put forth a theory of his own that he thought compatible with both science and religion. For his attempts to reconcile science and revelation, he was awarded a doctorate by Pius IX in 1876. His gradual estrangement from the scientific community resulted from his nonsecular approach to scientific questions, and Mivart became increasingly involved in attempts to reconcile the doctrines and practices of the Catholic Church with knowledge derived from science. This was expressed in articles on biblical criticism, liturgical reform, education of the clergy, the nature of hell, and the Catholic Church as an evolving institution. The last was considered heretical by Cardinal Herbert VAUGHAN, archbishop of Westminster, who demanded that Mivart sign a profession of faith. In a letter of Jan. 23, 1900, Mivart, following a detailed explanation of his position, refused, after which Vaughan denied him the sacraments. He died two months later.

MIXED MARRIAGES, PROHIBITION OF

Church law forbids two baptized persons from contracting marriage when one is a Catholic and the other belongs to a Christian community that lacks full communion with Rome (Codex Iuris Canonicis c. 1124; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 813). In this part of its matrimonial discipline, the Church canonizes the custom and particular legislation that goes back to its earliest centuries, forbidding members from contracting marriage with those, who, by birth or by choice, were outside the membership of the Church.

With the advent of the Reformation, the cases in which mixed marriages arose became more frequent, especially in such countries as Germany and Holland. The Council of Trent failed to enact any legislation dealing directly with mixed marriages. Indirectly, however, it controlled such unions by requiring for the validity of marriage of a Catholic the assistance of the Catholic's proper pastor, wherever the decree TAMETSI was published. No priest was allowed to assist at such marriages without a dispensation. Despite this fact, an opinion arose that in Protestant countries, where the juridical form of marriage of the decree Tametsi was not obligatory, there was no need to seek a dispensation and no need to ask for the antenuptial promises or cautiones. This opinion was condemned and the word "everywhere" was inserted into c. 1060 of the 1917 code and c. 50 of Crebrae allatae.

Under the 1917 code and Crebrae allatae, mixed religion was an impediment to marriage (1917 Codex Iuris Canonicis c. 1060; Crebrae allatae c. 50). The current discipline of the Church prohibits mixed marriages, but does not consider mixed religion an impediment.

Local ordinaries can grant permission for a mixed marriage (Codex Iuris Canonicis c. 1125; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 814). Before the permission is granted, the Catholic party must declare that he or she is prepared to remove dangers of lapsing from the Catholic faith as well as promise that he or she will do all in his or her power to baptize and raise children born to the marriage as Catholics (Codex Iuris Canonicis c. 1125; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarium Orientalium c. 814).

MOABITES

A Semitic people who, during OT times, inhabited the territory east of the Jordan River and north of the Wadi Zered and the territory of the EDOMITES. Their northern boundary was the Wadi Arnon during much of their history, though at times they were able to extend their holdings beyond this point; the region north of their border was held by AMORRITE tribes, the AMMONITES, and the Israelites at various times in their history. The folkloric accounts of LOT's settlement east of the Dead Sea (Gn 13.1–13) and of his fatherhood of the eponymous ancestors of the Moabites and the Ammonites through intercourse with his daughters (Gn 19.30–38), reflect both the Israelite awareness of their kinship with the tribes that settled in this region and their contempt for the hostility toward them.

Although the Moabites may have dwelt in this territory as nomads at an earlier period—there is no trace of a settled population there after the 20th century B.C. until their kingdom appears—it is only at the beginning of the Iron Age (13th century B.C.) that they emerged as a settled people, as the explorations of N. Glueck have shown. The Biblical account accords well with Glueck's findings, for when the Israelites were en route to the conquest of Palestine, they were forced to detour around Moab (Nm 21.10–20; Dt 2.8–13) instead of passing through as they had intended (Jgs 11.16–18), an indication that there was a strong, well-organized population there at that time.

According to Nm 21.26–30, Moab had previously possessed territory north of the Arnon, but was driven from it by the Amorrites; although the Israelites took this territory from the Amorrites by conquest (Nm 21.21–25), Moab continued to lay claim to it. There is at least a strong possibility that the words of Jephthah in Jgs 11.15–27, although they are presented as a message to the Ammonite king, may have originally concerned the Moabites and their claim to this territory; 11.24 is to be noted especially, for it identifies the god of the king addressed as CHEMOSH, who was the god of Moab, not of Ammon.

Although a successful campaign against the Moabites is attributed to Saul in 1 Sm 14.47, it was only under David that Moab was subjugated and made to pay tribute (2 Sm 8.2). David's harsh treatment of the Moabite captives on this occasion is hard to reconcile with his earlier friendly relations with this people (1 Sm 22.3-4) and with the tradition preserved in the Book of RUTH that his grandmother was a Moabite. It is possible that during the time of Israel's divided monarchy Moab regained independence for a while and was reconquered by the northern kingdom, for the MESHA INSCRIPTION names Omri, King of Israel, (c. 876-869 B.C.) as the subjugator, and the OT account indicates that it was to Israel (rather than to Judah) that Moab paid tribute during this period and that it was against Israel that they rebelled under Mesha, their king (2 Kgs 1.1; 3.4-27), in 849 B.C. The united forces of Israel and Judah were unable to bring Moab under control again. This successful rebellion is the theme of the inscription of Mesha's famed stele. During the Persian period Moab's territory was incorporated into the kingdom of the Nabataeans.

The bad feelings that existed between Moabites and Israelites are reflected not only in the Genesis accounts and David's cruelty mentioned above, but also in other OT texts. The Moabites (along with the Ammonites) are singled out for special discrimination in Dt 23.4–7, and many prophetic oracles were directed against them (e.g., Is 15.1–9; Ez 25.8–11; Zep 2.8–11). Yet the Book of Ruth portrays the Moabite heroine as a noble personage, and after the Exile, marriages with Moabite women were so frequent that both Ezra and Nehemiah took measures against the practice (Ezr 9.1–10.44; Neh 13.23–30).

MOBILE, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Erected as diocese of Mobile (Mobiliensis) on May 15, 1829, it was designated the Diocese of Mobile-Birmingham on July 9, 1954. On Nov. 16, 1980, the diocese was elevated to an archdiocese and the Metropolitan See of the Province of Mobile, comprising the states of Alabama and Florida. Formerly suffragan of New Orleans, the archdiocese comprises the lower 28 counties in Alabama and has an area of 22,969 square miles. In 2001 Catholics number some 5 percent of the total population of 1.6 million.

Catholic Origins. The arrival of Catholicism in the region traces its origins to early Spanish and French explorations and permanent settlements at Pensacola, Fla., in 1696, and Mobile, Ala., in 1702, where a parish was erected on July 20, 1703, with Henry Rolleaux de la Vente as first pastor. The parish registers, virtually intact from 1704, faithfully mirror the unsettled conditions of those early days. Secular and religious priests in turn acted as pastors as the territory passed from French through British into Spanish hands. Ecclesiastical responsibility shifted from Quebec, Canada, to Santiago de Cuba and, in 1793, to a mainland diocese with the see at New Orleans. After the Gulf Coast area became part of the U.S., the states of Alabama and Florida were erected into a vicariate apostolic in August 1825, and Michael PORTIER was chosen to head the new jurisdiction.

Diocesan Growth. Portier developed and ordered religious life in the area, which was raised to a diocese in May 1829, and in 1850 reduced in size. He was notably successful in founding institutions of education and welfare, and by the time of his death in 1859 there were, exclusive of the staff of Spring Hill College, ten priests serving nine parishes and nine mission stations. Catholic population had grown from about 6,000 to an estimated 10,000, most of it centered in the southern part of the diocese.

John Quinlan (1826–83) was consecrated as the second bishop of Mobile in New Orleans on Dec. 4, 1859. A native of County Cork, Ireland, Quinlan immigrated to the U.S. in 1844, was ordained for the Diocese of Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1852, and two years later became rector of the diocesan seminary. His early years in the South were spent amid the confusion of the Civil War, and the remainder of his life was devoted to improving the status of the Church through the difficult years that followed. Quinlan secured a supply of clergy from Ireland, repaired the war losses, continued construction on the cathedral, and increased the number of parishes and mission stations to 36. Resident pastors were placed in the northern part of the diocese for the first time, due largely to the introduction in 1876 of Benedictines from St. Vincent Abbey (now Archabbey), Latrobe, Pa. This group formed the nucleus from which St. Bernard Abbey and College later developed. By the time of Quinlan's death his clergy had increased to 45, about evenly divided between secular and religious, to care for a Catholic population of about 18,000. The diocese was, at the same time, burdened by crushing financial obligations.

The third bishop, Dominic Manucy (1823–85), was born in St. Augustine, Fla., and had been ordained by Portier in 1850. He was consecrated by Quinlan in 1874 for the Vicariate Apostolic of Brownsville, Tex., but was transferred to Mobile in March 1884, while yet retaining the administration of his former jurisdiction. Ill health, combined with the difficult situation in Mobile, led Manucy to resign before the year's end.

Jeremiah O'Sullivan (1844–96), a native of Ireland and priest of the Archdiocese of Baltimore, Md., was consecrated fourth bishop of Mobile, Sept. 20, 1885. Although he was successful in extricating the diocese from its financial difficulties, his years were necessarily characterized more by retrenchment and consolidation than by new gains. Towers were added to the cathedral and conditions prepared for later growth throughout the area, but the estimated Catholic population suffered a slight decline.

Edward Patrick ALLEN, who followed Bishop O'Sullivan, was consecrated in Baltimore on May 16, 1897. Prior to that he had been president of Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md. During Allen's 30-year rule, the Catholic population grew to 48,000, while churches and clergy increased threefold. New efforts were made in rural districts, and the Josephite fathers ministered to a large African American population. Much was accomplished in the fields of education and welfare in Mobile through the benefactions of the McGill family of that city.

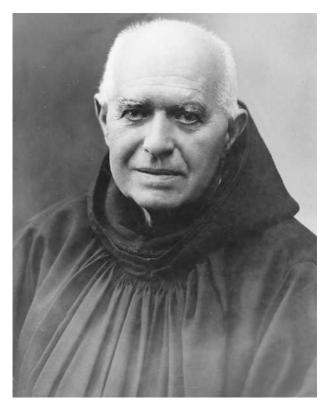

Growth continued during the administration of Thomas Joseph TOOLEN, consecrated the sixth bishop of Mobile in Baltimore, May 4, 1927. During his episcopate 69 parishes were established and 154 churches built to keep pace with notable gains in urban as well as rural Catholic populations. Of the 77 counties within his jurisdiction, those without churches were reduced from 49 to 19. Outside of the Mobile district, the diocese was divided into three deaneries: North Alabama, centered at Birmingham where, since 1954, St. Paul's Church had been the cocathedral; Central Alabama, the area around Montgomery; and Northwest Florida, dominated by Pensacola. The number of priests had increased threefold to provide for a like growth in Catholic population.

Social welfare services were efficiently organized under a Bureau of Catholic Charities, and a diocesan school system was annually responsible for the education of more than 25,000 students. Adequate Catholic hospital facilities exist in the major cities, and, since 1934, the diocese had an independent newspaper, The Catholic Week. Toolen's success in coping with such growth, and special attention given to the needs of Black Catholics in the area merited for him the title of archbishop ad personam (1954). In 1968 the Pensacola Deanery was added to the Diocese of St. Augustine. Archbishop Toolen resigned on Oct. 8, 1969, at which time the see was divided into the Diocese of Mobile and the Diocese of Birmingham in Alabama. Toolen died on Dec. 4, 1976.

John C. May (b. 1922), an auxiliary bishop of Chicago, was installed as the seventh Bishop of Mobile on Dec.10, 1969. He effectively fostered liturgical and standard changes provided for by Vatican Council II and gave renewed emphasis to the Church's social apostolate (housing and health care). The new parishes were established mostly in rural areas and a number of missions. Significant advances were made in social integration in diocesan organizations with notable success in the parish at Selma, Ala. Despite a number of school closings and consolidation, two new elementary units were established. A diocesan pastoral council was formed in 1974 and lay leadership emerged in parish and diocesan structure. A program for the retirement of lay employees was put into place. Ecumenical initiatives bore fruit in collaboration for direct help to the needy and a Jewish-Christian Dialogue began in Mobile, the longest ongoing such exercise nationwide. In 1979 Bishop May ordained the first class of permanent deacons for the diocese. He was appointed as Archbishop of St. Louis on Jan. 29, 1980.

On Nov. 16, 1980, Oscar H. Lipscomb, a native of Mobile (b. 1931, ord. 1956) was consecrated as the first Archbishop of Mobile. The new province, erected that same day, consists of the states of Alabama and Mississippi, with Jackson, Biloxi and Birmingham as suffragan sees. Reported Catholic population has grown but slightly. Notable decreases occurred in rural areas, but there is currently a Southeast Asian and significant Hispanic presence. An office for Hispanic Ministry addresses the latter, while only one new parish has been established, older parishes have built permanent or new churches, the result of increased substantial Catholic populations. number of diocesan priests has remained stable with more than average success in the program for priestly formation. Currently, the fourth class of permanent deacons is preparing for ordination. Catholic high and elementary schools enroll 6,498 students, and other programs for youth religious education count 4,376. Jesuit Spring Hill College, the oldest in Alabama, has a student body of 1,005. The social apostolate has grown with new centers in Montgomery, Dothan, and Robertsdale, and Pro-Life offices serve in the Mobile, Montgomery, and Dothan areas.

MOCQUEREAU, ANDRÉ

Founder of the Solesmes system of GREGORIAN CHANT; b. Tessoualle (Maineet-Loire), France, June 6, 1849; d. Solesmes, Jan. 18, 1930. His musical education was nurtured in an atmosphere of strict classical formalism and directed and developed by Charles Dancla, with whom he studied cello at the Paris Conservatory. He entered the Benedictine Abbey of SOLESMES (1875), was professed April 9, 1877, and ordained Dec. 28, 1879. As director of the paleographic scriptorium and choir master, he soon determined the community's commitment to the restoration of the pristine purity of chant. Working closely with Dom Pothier for 13 years, but later in opposition to Pothier's theory of "free oratoric rhythm," Mocquereau developed the Solesmes system, basing it on the theory of "free musical rhythm." This system, first proposed in Paléographie musicale v.7, was expansively developed in the Le nombre musical (1908–27). Under the title of Paléographie musicale grégorienne, Mocquereau launched the publication of over 15 volumes of photographic reproductions of medieval manuscripts with important historical studies. These laid the foundation for the reform of chant prescribed in the 1903 motu proprio of Pius X. Mocquereau's system is incorporated in the modern publications of the Solesmes editions by the addition of certain rhythmic signs. He defended his system by many scholarly publications, often controversial, in the Tribune de Saint Gervais, the Rassegna gregoriana, and the Revue grégorienne.

MODALISM

Modalism, also SABELLIANISM or PATRIPASSIANISM, is the strict form of MONARCHIANISM, a heresy that originated in an exaggerated defense of the unity (monarchia) of God; and while verbally admitting a Trinity, it denied the real distinction between the Persons. It affirmed that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are modes, aspects, or energies of one and the same divine Person, who is given different names according as He exercises different functions ad extra or outside the Trinity: creation (Father), redemption (Son), sanctification (Holy Spirit). God, one from eternity, became three in time. God's appearance on earth as the Son should logically have involved the conclusion that the Father died; hence the name Patripassianism, as the heresy was known in the West. Praxeas, the first proponent of Modalism to visit Rome, went to Carthage about 206 or 208, and TERTULLIAN refuted him in his Adversus Praxean (213), "which represents the most important contribution to the doctrine of the Trinity in the Ante–Nicene period' [J. Quasten, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md.) 2:285]. According to Tertullian, the identification of Father and Son was so complete in Praxeas's teaching that 'the Father Himself came down into the Virgin, was Himself born of her, Himself suffered, indeed was Himself Jesus Christ' (ch. 1). In the East the heresy was known as Sabellianism, from Sabellius, who probably developed the teaching of Noetus and was excommunicated by Pope CALLISTUS I (c. 220). Sabellius's chief opponent was DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA.

MODE

In metaphysics, a limitation or determination produced in some actual reality by a principle or cause extrinsic to itself, e.g., rapidity or slowness of motion, various shades of the same color, and different degrees of a virtue or vice; in logic, a particular determination of the PROPOSITION or SYLLOGISM.

Real Modes. Mode is found in all creaturely reality, only God being absolutely unmodified. "Wherever there is something received there must be a mode, since what is received is limited according to the recipient; therefore, since creaturely being, essential and accidental, is received [being], mode is found not only in accidental things but also in substances" (St. Thomas Aquinas, De ver. 21.6 ad 5). All experienced reality involves partial or limited perfection. For example, man has the perfection of intelligence, but limited intelligence, called reason; intelligence of itself does not bespeak animality, and this limits human intelligence.

Mode is proximately produced in a perfection by two principles, viz, the efficient and material causes (Summa theologiae 1a, 5.5). The efficient cause effects a form of determinate species and so determines it; the material cause, by its relative aptness, receives this form more or less perfectly and so determines its individual perfection.

Mode resides in both the perfection modified and in the principle that modifies it; yet it is more properly in the latter, since the form is modified primarily by the modifying principle. For example, individuality is a mode of being found in all corporeal things, and arising from their corporeity, since matter exigent of quantity is the root of INDIVIDUATION; yet individuality, more properly in matter, affects the form also, individualizing it through its relation to matter.

Scholastics distinguish between intrinsic and extrinsic modes. Intrinsic modes constitute or complete something because they are requisite to the BEING, either essential or existential, of the nature. For example, man is neither body nor soul but the union of the two; this union is neither body nor soul but a mode of being shared by each, since each in a manner proper to it determines and modifies the other, and thereby contributes to constituting man's nature. Extrinsic modes, on the other hand, suppose a nature complete in its interior being, essential and existential, but determine it in nonessentials, relative to other things or natures. For example, LOCATION (ubi) is produced in a body only through the mediacy of other bodies, so that were there only one body existing, it would have no location. Yet extrinsic modes are not mere references to other things—such references constituting the category of RELATION—but qualifications of a reality that truly characterize it, although relatively to other existing things. (See CATEGORIES OF BEING.)

Modality figures prominently in scholastic theology and philosophy. In theology, for example, mode alone explains different graces and different degrees of beatific vision in heaven. All supernatural grace has the same nature and definition; but the difference among sacramental graces, the difference between Christian grace and pre-Christian, and the different degrees of grace in different persons, or in the same person at different times, are all modal differences (see DISTINCTION, KINDS OF).

Logical Modes. These either assert the manner in which a predicate term is affirmed or denied of a subject term, e,g., "It is impossible that right be wrong," or identify particular determinations of syllogistic form. Four logical modes are usually distinguished: impossible, possible, necessary, and contingent. Each of the four can be either divided or composed (divisa aut composita). The divided mode is had when the modal word or phrase functions as an adverb qualifying the verb, e.g., "Man is necessarily rational." In the composed mode the modal phrase functions as predicate term, e.g., "That the court erred is possible." The various allowed forms of the figures of the categorical syllogism, such as Barbara and Celarent, are referred to as modes or moods. The modal syllogism, on the other hand, expresses an ARGUMENTA-TION wherein the premises and conclusion are modal propositions.

MODERNISM

This ideology emerged clearly within the Church c. 1900 and sought a revolutionary transmutation of Catholic doctrine through the application of naturalistic evolutionary philosophy and arbitrary historical criticism. It was condemned by the decree LAMENTABILI and the encyclical PASCENDI, and definitively ended by the oath against Modernism.

Background

The roots of Modernism are extremely complex. Four factors may be singled out as the principal occasions for its rise: (1) in philosophy, the prevalence among Catholics of a shallow ECLECTICISM combined with the strong influence exerted by NEO-KANTIANISM Pragmatism, and the disciples of F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER; (2) in theology, a growing dissatisfaction with a too static NEOSCHOLASTICISM; (3) in the sciences, the development of evolutionary biological theory and the growth of historical method; and (4) at least of equal importance, the not yet assimilated changing relationship between the Church and the sociopolitical order.

Philosophy and Theology. During most of the 19th century an eclecticism under the patronage of thinkers such as DESCARTES, LEIBNIZ, and ROSMINI-SERBATI prevailed in Catholic circles. It was neither profound nor systematic. After the encyclical of AETERNI PATRIS (1879) neoscholasticism began to exercise greater influence from its centers in Rome, Louvain, and Germany. Many Catholic writers c. 1900, however, never experienced this influence. Furthermore, the categories of neoscholasticism began to appear inadequate to contain the rich reality suggested by the new work in Sacred Scripture and history, and by a philosophy with an accent on the aspect of IMMANENCE.

ECCLESIOLOGY had been scarcely influenced by the great mystical and organic insights of J. A. MÖHLER and the Tübingen Catholic school. The functions of authority and hierarchical power tended to hold the central perspective in the theological manuals. The work of NEWMAN on the development of dogma (1845) had opened new vistas, but its influence on scholastic theology was negligible.

Contemporary thought had begun to challenge scholastic positions, both in Catholicism and in Protestantism. About 1800 Schleiermacher developed his theory of experience (the feeling of dependence) as the heart of religion. His later disciples eliminated, perhaps more than Schleiermacher intended, the element of intelligence. Religion was portrayed as a sentiment, an experience beyond the critique of intellectual concepts. In the Catholic tradition, Möhler, who had steeped himself in the Bible and the Fathers, stressed that the living organism of the Church cannot be fully understood unless it is vitally lived. Newman worked out his own theory of experience as contrasted with notional knowledge, a fact that augured the trend toward a greater emphasis on spiritual anthropology. By 1893 BLONDEL in his L'Action presented a fully rounded metaphysic of action in which man's totality, and not exclusively his intellect, played a vital role in the approach to God and in the understanding of tradition. Möhler, Newman, and Blondel to an extent resembled the Modernists in the questions that interested them, but not in their solutions.

In the closing decades of the 19th century the emphasis on growth and development in religion received influential support from Neo-Hegelians, such as John and Edward Caird in Britain, and from neoidealists, such as Rudolf Eucken in Germany with his philosophy of activism. In England the pragmatists, under the influence of William JAMES, struggled against Neo-Hegelianism. Yet the two streams of pragmatism and Neo-Hegelianism tended to blend into a composite theory of a radical evolution of dogma and of a pragmatic norm for finding religious truth, i.e., its fruitful life-value and permanence. Lastly, Neo-Kantianism was still influential in its separation of thought from reality, and it joined evolutionary and pragmatic theory in questioning the stability and reality of dogma (see HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM; IDEALISM).

Natural Science and History. The general idea of development was caught up and quickened by the publication of DARWIN's The Origin of Species (1859). The same notion began to emerge with regard to the Bible through the work in biblical archeology in the Middle East around 1850. The scientific development of historical method during the 18th and 19th centuries, especially in Germany, began to leave its mark on the Church toward 1900, particularly through J. J. I. von DÖLLINGER and Lord ACTON. Induction and empirical work lined up against the more deductive approach of the scholastics. Subsequent to Döllinger, the split grew between historian and theologian.

Around 1870 the great movement of biblical exegesis was set in motion by German liberal scholars. New and often valid insights concerning the formation of the Pentateuch were glimpsed in the light of J. WELLHAUSEN. The influence of the New Testament work of HOLTZ-MANN, the culminating point of liberal exegesis, began to be felt in Catholic circles. The establishment of Catholic institutes in France (1875) and the contributions of Catholic Scripture scholars in Germany and Belgium around the same period marked the beginning of renewed exegetical work in the Church. DUCHESNE began his important historical studies in 1877; and the first work of his pupil, LOISY, was on the history of the Old Testament canon (1890). In general, Catholic exegetes lagged behind liberal Protestant scholarship, although many of them were unaware of it. Apathy had been created by a lack of historical sense and by an excessive reliance on deductive method. There had also developed a general fear of the new critical methods that had been used so destructively, as in J. E. RENAN's Vie de Jésus (1863). Further, with some exception in Germany and Belgium, where Catholic faculties received state support, the Church-State struggles had greatly harmed the opportunities for Catholic scholarship. The desire to catch up brought with it the risk of hasty conclusion and the danger of intellectual indigestion.

Culture and Politics. The final stage of the Church's relationship to political society was discerned by relatively few of the participants in the bitter struggle between Church and State in the 18th and 19th centuries. The immediate outcome around the time of Vatican Council I (1870) was the hardening of positions into two camps, with antireligious and anticlerical groups opposing Catholics who were religiously and politically conservative and who supported an extremely simplified view of ULTRAMONTANISM. Liberal Catholic thought had in general been ineffectual. The Church-State struggles had contributed to the destruction of the intellectual structures of the Church, especially in France. The intellectual life of the seminaries had been hampered, although piety prospered. As a reaction to these struggles, greater centralization of Church authority in Rome gradually increased. Against this background, the decrees of Vatican Council I on papal infallibility were given a rigid and overriding interpretation by conservative Catholic spokesmen, in the tradition of Louis VEUILLOT in France and W. G. WARD in England.

In France political and religious conservatism supported monarchism and projected the image of a Church attached to the old order. The Dreyfus affair revealed anti-Semitic and other unjust attitudes among some Catholic conservatives. Many of their leaders rallied around Charles MAURRAS and ACTION FRANÇAISE. At the same time the Sillon under the direction of Marc SANGNIER emerged as the liberal, democratic counterpart of Action Française. Thus the most outspoken in the Church in France were radically split in their political and religious thinking.

In Germany, somewhat less touched by political reactionism than France, REFORMKATHOLIZISMUS, especially as represented by F. X. KRAUS and H. SCHELL, began during the 1890s to urge reforms in the Latin type of Catholicism and "Romanism." Curial centralization and excessive use of papal power were criticized. It was urged that a "religious Catholicism" be substituted for an external and political one. Discussions centered to a large extent on Church discipline and scholarly freedom. In 1902 Hochland, a periodical whose liberal aim was to bring the Church out of its cultural ghetto, began publication.

In Italy, because of the loss of papal temporal power and the unification of the peninsula, many young priests envisioned a totally new relationship between Church and State. There was a growing indifference toward the clear-cut philosophies that formed the backdrop of the old conflicts. Some Catholics began to favor an idealistic philosophy that regarded the Church as merely a powerful cultural force, a totally variable expression of a deeper religious aspiration. At the same time CATHOLIC ACTION groups began forming to inject Catholic social influence into the mainstream of national life. Simultaneously, however, Catholics were forbidden to take part in the political life of a government traditionally opposed to the spirit and demands of the Church. In social thought and action there arose a tension among many young Catholics concerning subordination to bishops and Church discipline in general.

In England, both numerically and intellectually, the Church was only beginning to become a social influence. Not until 1895 were Catholics permitted to attend the great universities.

In the midst of this complex ebb and flow of philosophies and cultural pressures, Modernism appeared as an abortive and self-destructive attempt at adaptation and rejuvenation. Thinkers, for the most part ill-prepared philosophically, desperately grasped for and tried to force on the Church theories not sufficiently analyzed and purified. The outcome was a necessary reaction of the magisterium to these indigestible syncretisms.

Modernist Movement

Modernism began as a spontaneous rather than as an organized phenomenon. Its four centers of influence were France, England, Italy, and Germany.

France. In 1897 Louis A. SABATIER, a French Protestant, presented with force and clarity many of the ideas of Schleiermacher and Albrecht RITSCHL in L'Esquisse d'une philosophie de la religion d'après la psychologie et l'histoire, a work that was to have great influence on Modernist thinking. In 1899 M. HÉBERT published his Souvenirs d'Assise in which he began his denial of personality in God and became the herald-philosopher of Modernism within the Church.

Loisy had been working on the frontiers of the new criticism, especially in the Old Testament, from 1890 to about 1900, and aroused suspicions. (During this period the liberal but solid positions of M. J. LAGRANGE were, to a lesser extent, subject to similar suspicions in conservative quarters.) In 1893 Loisy lost his position at the Institut Catholique in Paris and gradually moved toward work on the New Testament. In 1900 he published an article strongly criticizing the notion of inspiration as presented in the encyclical PROVIDENTISSIMUS DEUS (1893). Then he published two books, L'Évangile et L'Église (1902) and Autour d'un petit livre (1903), which then started a violent public controversy.

Through a selection of eschatological texts in the Synoptic Gospels, Loisy presented the essence of Christ's preaching as a literal teaching of an imminent coming of a physical, visible end-of-the-world kingdom. This theory resembled closely that of the liberal Protestant exegete, Johannes Weiss, which appeared in 1892. Loisy concluded: "Jesus announced the Kingdom and it is the Church which came." Terming his work a defense against A. von HARNACK's rejection of doctrinal development, Loisy attempted to justify the appearance of a Church, which was never in the mind of Christ, and an evolution of its dogma, which would be genuine development. Blondel attacked this outlook, while advancing his own theory of vital tradition in action as an avenue of approach to the understanding of the Gospels. F. von HÜGEL defended Loisy's right as a Catholic to present such a theory. Loisy's writings caused great anguish among the intellectuals and young clergy in France and Italy. The two works were among the five of Loisy's books placed on the Index in 1903. In 1904, after some ambiguous retractations, Loisy made his submission, an act that rankled him afterward.

E. LE ROY, a Catholic layman and disciple of BERG-SON, rejected in an extreme way the intellectual content of dogma in the article, "Qu'est-ce qu'un dogme?" (1905). He asserted that since dogma was formulated in relative terms, it could not aim at an absolute intellectual assent. Rather, it negatively safeguarded against error and it positively prescribed a rule of practical conduct, a personal stance of action in the face of supernatural reality. Thus the dogma of God as Father is to be assimilated not intellectually, but through filial action toward Him as Father. In 1902 and 1906 Abbé HOUTIN published studies that were extremely critical of recent Catholic exegetical work and favored the most extreme positions.

Abbé TURMEL, a historian of dogma who had lost the faith as early as 1886 but wanted to remain in the Church, began c. 1900 to publish numerous pseudonymous articles attacking Catholic dogma. Meanwhile the French Protestant, Paul SABATIER, took a leading part in propaganda for the movement.

Abbé LABERTHONNIÈRE, many of whose writings were later condemned, and Blondel, with his philosophy of action, were leaders in the contemporary movement of liberal Catholic philosophical thought; but from the beginning they reacted against Modernist aims and cannot be considered part of that movement. Similarly Archbishop MIGNOT, who was in contact with Loisy and favored a more liberal attitude toward scholarly work within the Church, was gradually dismayed by the more extreme exegetical positions and by the tendency toward philosophical IMMANENTISM.

England. George TYRRELL, who had privately distributed certain works, was dismissed from the Society of Jesus (1906) for refusing to retract the ideas in his anonymous "Letter to a Professor of Anthropology," which was published in Italy without his permission. In this work he greatly minimized the function of Church dogma. Privately outlining a blueprint of the Church of the future, he became more and more caught up in controversy. He attacked papal infallibility, ultramontane and otherwise, and the ecumenicity of Vatican Council I. Until his death (1909), he kept developing a theory of the relation of revelation to dogma. Revelation, as the selfmanifestation of the divine in our inward life, was presented as an experience, first of the Apostolic Church, which was normative, and then of every Christian. Revelation, when communicated biblically, he called dogma or prophetic truth, an imaginative and prophetic presentment of divine reality. Prophetic truth was the living shadow of this reality. Later formulations he termed "theology" or "secondary dogmas." These metaphysically conceptualized the original prophetic communication. They were merely protective or illustrative formulas for prophetic truth, could be later contradicted or discarded, and in general were useful but totally relative formulas. Revealed truth (res) was still contained in the formula (enuntiabile), but since the prophetic imagery was now transferred to scientific language, no absolute value guaranteed to be true could be assigned to the formula. Conciliar pronouncements were to be accepted only through the subsequent acceptance of the entire Church. Having drastically reduced the intellectual element in the original experience, Tyrrell worked out the rest of his system rather consistently, but through a confusing rhetoric. He never sufficiently accounted for the fact that conciliar formulas themselves have their axes in the Absolute. At the end of his life he espoused the theory of an error by Christ as to the time of the Parousia. Tyrrell never held the doctrine of exclusive immanence as condemned by Pascendi. Many of his positions, however, were an evident object of the encyclical's attack.

Von Hügel, Tyrrell's friend, while rejecting the new immanentist philosophical approach, was the leader of a crusade for the untrammeled rights of the exegete. These rights, he insisted, were being infringed upon by Roman authority. Conferring with various high-ranking ecclesiastics in and out of Rome and maintaining a vast correspondence with the leaders of the new thought, he endeavored to give some coherence and organization to the movement. Maude PETRE supported the ideas of Tyrrell and published his life in 1912.

Italy. In Italy the movement had more of a social flavor. Discussion of political and social theory, however, continually drifted back and forth across the terrain of religion and theology. The Italian priest, R. MURRI, supported CHRISTIAN DEMOCRACY and founded the Lega democratica nazionale. This movement, intended to be independent of the hierarchy, urged reform of the Church's institutional and social structure. Although he was anticlerical in tone, Murri worked out his ideas from a scholastic basis. Later he moved toward an idealism somewhat reminiscent of B. CROCE and G. GENTILE, though he was attacked by them for the equivocation in his position.

In the exegetical and theological fields Salvatore Minocchi, a priest, founded the review Studi religiosi in 1901 as a forum for the new thought. He was strongly influenced by Loisy in the exegetical area, and later by Tyrrell in the interpretation of dogma. Another priest, Ernesto BUONAIUTI, early enamored of Blondel's philosophy of action, became fascinated with immanentism and moved toward a form of social messianism. He emerged as the leading Italian Modernist but was eager to remain within the Church for the working out of his ideas.

More on the edge of Modernism and ultimately loyal to the Church were the layman Fogazzaro, whose novel Il Santo (1905) became the literary symbol of the movement, and the Barnabite priest, Giovanni Semeria, who worked in religious and biblical criticism. In 1907 the journal Rinnovamento became an important organ for liberal political and religious opinion.

Germany. In Germany the review Zwanzigste Jahrhundert, which was founded in 1901 at Munich by F. Klasen and continued by Thaddäus Engert, became an organ for Reformkatholizismus. Like the Krausgesellschaft founded in Munich in 1904, Reformkatholizismus carried out a program of anti-Roman and antischolastic sentiment. It attacked political ultramontanism and insisted on freedom in scientific religious work and on the abolition of the Index. It did not totally overlap Modernism but remained principally on the level of practical Church discipline. The Bavarian priest, K. Gebert, however, in 1905 proposed a Kantian and immanentist approach not unlike that reproved by Pascendi. Engert, also a priest, demanded the abandonment of the notion of biblical inerrancy and the complete revision of the concept of inspiration. Yet it was not until after the condemnations of Pascendi that Engert and Josef Schnitzer of the University of Munich, who was a supporter of Loisy, emerged as the leaders of a small Modernist extreme. In Germany, Modernism was more localized than in France and Italy and brought forth less extreme theological positions than in any of the other major countries involved.

Action by Church Authorities. Leo XIII, whose liberal policy was accompanied by serious reserves over the new thought but who hesitated to take strong action, was succeeded (Aug. 4, 1903) by PIUS X, who decided that firm action was mandatory. He approved the decree of the Holy Office placing five works of Loisy on the Index (Dec. 17, 1903). His encyclical Il fermo proposito (June 11, 1905) encouraged Catholic Action but insisted that it must be subordinate to ecclesiastical officials. The encyclical Pieni l'animo (July 28, 1906) warned of insubordination among the Italian clergy and declared priests who became members of the Lega democratica nazionale suspended. The same year Fogazzaro's Il Santo and two works of Laberthonnière were placed on the Index, and Tyrrell was dismissed from the Jesuits. Murri was suspended April 15, 1907. On July 3, 1907, the Holy Office's decree LAMENTABILI condemned 65 propositions in the area of criticism and dogma. On July 26, Le Roy's Dogme et critique was put on the Index. (During August, Fogazzaro, Murri, Buonaiuti, von Hügel, and others met in northern Italy to limit the terms of their submission.)

The encyclical PASCENDI (Sept. 8, 1907) presented a global blueprint of the whole Modernist program. It condemned theory on dogma and biblical criticism, which had an agnostic, immanentist-evolutionary, and anti-intellectualist basis. Constructed from ideas found in the work of various Modernists, it reproved a system, to every detail of which not all the Modernists subscribed. Yet, as Gentile and Petre, the subsequent champion of Modernism, admitted, Pascendi seized the movement in its totality. At the same time, immanentism, Neo-Hegelianism, and agnosticism were the terminal point rather than the point of departure for many Modernist thinkers. Pascendi in its picture of Modernism not only described the situation of some Modernists but also was an accurate prophecy of the final position of others.

Pius X decreed in the motu proprio Praestantia scripturae (Nov. 18, 1907) that all were bound in conscience to submit to the decrees of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION, both past and future, in the same way as to the doctrinal decrees issued by the Sacred Congregations and approved by the pope. (Since 1905 the Biblical Commission had issued a series of generally conservative prudential norms with regard to scriptural interpretation.)

Some loosely organized opposition had developed among the group associated with Rinnovamento, but writers and supporters of the review were made subject to excommunication at the end of 1907. Tyrrell (October 1907) and Schnitzer (February 1908) were excommunicated for their opposition to the encyclical. Minocchi was suspended and Loisy excommunicated in 1908. Subsequently Loisy developed his doctrine of the religion of humanity built on a vague agnostic basis. With Tyrrell's death (1909) the heart went out of the movement, though small pockets of resistance remained. The oath against Modernism (Sept. 1, 1910) to be taken by professors and pastors of souls marked the end of the crisis (see MODERN-ISM, OATH AGAINST). Petre, deprived of the Sacraments in her own diocese though never singled out for formal excommunication by name, and Buonaiuti, finally excommunicated by name in 1926, continued as champions of Modernism. Le Roy, Semeria, and von Hügel, previously more or less on the margin of Modernism, remained faithful to the Church. Engert became a Protestant. Houtin rejected the whole Modernist plan and became agnostic. Murri, with reservations on his political and social positions, was received back only in 1943.

Aftermath. After Pascendi, there followed a period of unmasking Modernism that caused great anguish. Many thought incorrectly that Newman and Blondel had been condemned. The committees of vigilance set up by the encyclical were used as a specious support by simplist conservative groups to justify sweeping condemnations. Thinking and nuance were rejected in favor of polemics. Modernism became a slogan to be applied to whatever was disliked in liberal Catholic thought, theology, literature, and politics. At the center of this campaign was the association, SODALITIUM PIANUM, directed by Monsignor BENIGNI in Italy. A secret code, the counterpart of Modernist anonymity, protected collaborators in various countries. The attacks of Action Française (whose condemnation in 1914, four years after the condemnation of Sillon, was made public only in 1926), and the intransigence of writers, such as Emmanuel Barbier and J. Fontaine, brought into popularity a counterlabel, INTEGRALISM. At the beatification of Pius X in 1950, evidence was presented that showed that he did not give his support to a great deal of this campaign, but held his hand for fear of encouraging the Modernists. Benedict XV, in his inaugural encyclical Ad beatissimi Apostolorum (Nov. 1, 1914) warned against excessive accusations. This, together with the eruption of World War I, ended this phase in the aftermath of the Modernist crisis.

Definition

Some have defined Modernism as an attempt to retain the form while dropping the content of dogma. Some Modernists, however, desired to drop also the form. If Modernism is defined very broadly, then only its extreme form was condemned. Any definition of Modernism must be drawn mainly from Pascendi, the most solemn Church condemnation. The loose application of the term "Modernism" to the development of theological thinking is widely admitted to be an abuse. Further, faint similarities of a position to statements in Pascendi can be judged fully Modernistic only if they are related also to the essential points of condemnation in the encyclical. Pascendi stated that it was directly attacking agnostic, immanentist, and evolutionary-naturalistic doctrine.

The following definition is suggested. Modernism was an ideological orientation, tendency, or movement within the Catholic Church, clearly emerging during the waning years of the 19th century and rapidly dying out around 1910 after official condemnation. Only loosely and sporadically organized, it was characterized by a tone antagonistic to all ecclesiastical authority, and by a belief in an adaptation of the Church to what was considered sound in modern thought even at the expense of radically changing the Church's essence. At its roots, grounded beyond liberal Catholic positions on biblical criticism and theology, lay a triple thesis: (1) a denial of the supernatural as an object of certain knowledge (in the totally symbolic nonobjective approach to the content of dogma, which is also related to a type of agnosticism in natural theology); (2) an exclusive immanence of the Divine and of revelation ("vital immanence") reducing the Church to a simple social civilizing phenomenon; (3) a total emancipation of scientific research from Church dogma, which would allow the continued assertion of faith in dogma with its contradiction on the historical level, as understood in certain presentations of the "Christ of faith, Christ of history," "Church of faith, Church of history" distinctions (see DOCTRINE, DEVELOPMENT OF.)

Conclusion

The difficulty in assessing the influence of Modernist thinkers on the later Church arises from the fact that these men also fed on and assimilated many legitimate tendencies that were arising in the contemporary Church, such as the idea of faith as a personal encounter, the increased appreciation of religious experience and spiritual anthropology, the deeper probing of the relation between psychology and religion, the return to the traditional emphasis on the sense of mystery, the renewed realization of the pastoral function of theology, the less mechanical assessment of the role of authority, the growth in insight into the development of dogma, the underlining of the organic nature of the Church and the importance of the laity, a greater respect for scriptural scholarship and natural science, a newer framework of Church-State relations, and a call to leave a cultural ghetto. Many of these insights, however, were already found in the works of scholars, such as Möhler, Newman, Blondel, and other orthodox thinkers, who, previous to the rise of Modernism, had begun to investigate these questions. With the return to the spirit of genuine THOMISM the stage would have been set, it seems, for their fruitful development. It is difficult to see how certain values said to arise from Modernism were not actually hampered in their development within the Church by Modernism's very appearance and by the strong medicine deemed necessary to eradicate it.

Nevertheless, through its excess Modernism did point out certain areas that called for investigation within a sound theological framework, as in the insights mentioned above. Certain authors, such as De GRANDMAISON, Lagrange, and LEBRETON, continued their scholarly contributions. The exaggerated spread of suspicions, however, that followed the condemnation of Modernism probably caused many scholars to avoid delicate subjects. Only after World War II did a trend emerge toward a renewed consideration of subjects that had been so destructively and abortively handled by the Modernists.

The Modernist crisis retarded Catholic scholarship and strengthened Catholic discipline, but its capital effect was decisive victory over a subtle and mortal enemy, a victory that preserved the essential life of the Church.

MODERNISM, OATH AGAINST

The popular name for the oath contained in the motu proprio Sacrorum antistitum of PIUS X (Sept. 1, 1910), which was required of clerics before the subdiaconate, confessors, preachers, pastors, canons, benefice-holders, seminary professors, officials in Roman congregations and episcopal curias, and religious superiors. The oath contains two parts. Part I contains five main propositions: (1) God can be known and proved to exist by natural reason; (2) the external signs of revelation, especially miracles and prophecies, are signs giving certainty and are adapted to all men and times, including the present; (3) the Church was founded by Christ on earth; (4) there is a DEPOSIT OF FAITH and the assertion that dogmas change from one sense to another one different from that held by the Church is heretical; (5) faith is not a blind sense welling up from the depths of the subconscious under the impulse of the heart and of a will trained to morality, but a real assent of the intellect to truth by hearing from an external source. Part II promises submission and assent to PASCENDI and rejection of opposition between history and dogma. The oath, a formal personal ratification of previous authoritative decisions of Pius X, was aimed at certain clandestine groups forming after Pascendi. The assent to which the oath binds is commensurate with the assent demanded by the sources of Catholic teaching from which the oath is drawn.

The strongest reaction to the oath occurred in Germany. Chiefly because of their position on faculties at state universities where the oath would endanger their position, theology professors who exercised no pastoral ministry were dispensed from taking the oath. In Italy the Barnabite priest Giovanni Semeria was allowed by Pius X to take the oath with certain reservations. In England Maude PETRE, who was preparing her work on George TYRRELL, was asked to take the oath. When she refused, she was deprived of the Sacraments. Only 40 or so priests in the world refused to take the oath. The oath itself marked the last breath of Modernism.

The oath was rescinded by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in 1967 in favor of a concise affirmation of the faith.

MODESTY

Understood here as the English equivalent of the Latin pudicitia with the restricted meaning the term often had in scholastic use, namely, decency or a sense of decency. It is the moral virtue that moderates and controls the impulse of sexual display in man.

The Natural Virtue of Modesty. The natural virtue of CHASTITY moderates and regulates the sexual appetite, a particular expression of which is man's impulse to display himself sexually or to be responsive to sexual display in others. Such display may be concerned with sexuality in the wide, or general, sense or with sexuality in the strict, genital sense ("venereal" sexuality in scholastic terminology). To the first or general category of sexual display belong general sexual signs, i.e., words, looks, modes of action, modes of dress, and the like that proclaim a man as a man or a woman as a woman in ordinary personal and social life. Such signs are part of normal life itself (e.g., sexual differentiation in modes of dress). To the sphere of genital, or venereal, display belong genital signs (signa venereorum), i.e., those that tend directly to excite and stimulate the genital drive in man.

Chastity in the strict or genital sense moderates and regulates the use of these latter forms of sexual display, authorizing them where it authorizes genital fulfillment itself (i.e., in marriage) and excluding them elsewhere. This particular function of chastity, considered separately, constitutes the moral field of genital decency, or modesty. Chastity in the wide or general sense regulates the use of general sexual signs. Certain forms of speech, dress, action, and the like are apprehended as appropriate for the normal display or expression of masculinity or femininity, as the case may be, and these pertain to the field of general sexual decency or modesty.

General sexual modesty is very largely a matter of social convention. It is bound up with the role that men as men and women as women are expected to play in society. When the role changes, as it has done enormously for women in modern society, the forms of general sexual modesty change too. A girl regarded in the U.S. as decent in the mid-20th century would have been a shocking type a century earlier—quite immodest in speech, dress, and general behavior.

Specific sexual modesty—modesty in the sphere of genital signs—is also a social variable to the extent that some things that operate as genital stimuli in one culture do not have this significance in another. Thus display of the uncovered female breasts operates as a genital stimulus in Western civilization but is only a generic, nonvenereal sexual sign in African tribal cultures. Such cultures have their own taboo areas of genital signs. Use of them is confined by tribal custom to circumstances where their focal point, namely, genital intercourse, is socially approved. Genital modesty and immodesty, decency and shamelessness, are universal moral categories of humanity, however widely the concrete forms of modesty may differ from one culture to another.

Modesty in Scripture and the Fathers. The Yahwist writer stresses the sexual innocence of Eden. Sexual self-consciousness, shame, and the covering-up of the body follow the Fall (Gn 2.25; 3.7, 10-11). The wisdom literature warns against the snares of feminine shamelessness (Prv 2.16; 5.3; 7.5–27). In the NT modesty in looks, words, and general behavior is inculcated (Mt 5.28; Eph 5.3–20; 2 Pt 2.14). General sexual modesty—"a gentle and quiet spirit"-should characterize the Christian woman (1 Tm 2.9-12; 1 Pt 3.1-6). Feminine modesty, both general and specific, and the avoidance by both sexes of defiling contact with the lascivious world around them are constant themes of patristic exhortation (e.g., Chrysostom, Homiliae in Matthaeum; Tertullian, De spectaculis, and De cultu feminarum; Cyprian De habitu virginum).

Theology of Modesty in St. Thomas and Later. St. Thomas treated modesty (pudicitia) as a part of chastity, not a distinct virtue from it. It is concerned with signa venereorum. St. Thomas took these in a very limited sense (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 151.4). They are immodest acts done with a lustful intention. He did not treat of acts tending by their nature to stimulate genital desire, though this may not be the personal intention of the person who does them.

Later moral theology, especially after 1600, put immodest acts in St. Thomas's sense into the category of directly unchaste acts (see LUST) and took signa venereorum in a new and broad sense. These were acts of an intrinsically innocent kind (e.g., exposure of the body) that would, however, tend of their nature to provoke sins against chastity unless the doing of them was justified by an objective reason in particular circumstances (e.g., exposure of the body for purposes of medical examination). All kinds of things could be and were considered in this context—words, looks, touches, embraces, kisses, fantasies; the nude in art; dress, reading, bathing, dancing; theatrical shows and, in recent times, film and television shows. The treatment of all this heterogeneous material was usually anything but scientific. The writer dogmatized on everything in terms of the culture he was accustomed to, taking little account of the fact that his judgments on modesty and immodesty in dress, for example, would not be valid for other cultures. Moreover, the whole subject was pursued in extreme detail. Areas of the body were divided into decent (honestae), less decent (minus honestae), and indecent (inhonestae) and a quasimathematical scale was worked out for measuring the seriousness of sins of look or touch in each of the three areas. Dancing involving physical contact between the sexes was viewed as immodest. The confusion was often increased in pastoral practice when-general sexual modesty being mixed up with specific or genital modesty-women were reproved for immodesty simply because they went along with the times in dressing more lightly and freely than had been the custom in former generations.

Modesty in Modern Catholic Theology. The subject is now treated in a more realistic and genuinely theological way. The difference between general sexual modesty (a social variable) and specific modesty is better understood. The need of a sound theology of specific modesty is as real as ever in this age of sexual exploitation and commercialization [see Pius XII, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 49 (1957) 1013]; but the object of this theology is seen as the right training and counseling of Christians in the virtue of modesty rather than as the handing out to them of endless classifications of modest and immodest acts.

MOECHIAN CONTROVERSY

The theological and political dispute caused by the adulterous marriage of Emperor Constantine VI (780–797). It was designated from the Greek moicheia (Latinized, moechia) for adultery. In 795 Constantine VI forced his wife into a convent and, with an Abbot Joseph officiating, entered into an adulterous union with his mother's lady-in-waiting, Theodote. The patriarch of Constantino-ple TARASIUS refused to bless the wedding, but tolerated the situation; he did not bar the emperor from the sacraments, nor take punitive measures against the abbot Joseph. This shocking neglect of his patriarchal responsibility scandalized the Studite monks, who not only condemned the emperor and his consort, as well as Abbot Joseph, but also broke off communion with Tarasius. Their leaders, the abbot THEODORE the Studite, and the monk Plato, were exiled and imprisoned, and the rest of the community were punished in a similar way. Two years later, Empress IRENE seized the throne and recalled the Studites from exile. The patriarch Tarasius then degraded Joseph and made peace with the Studites.

The issue was revived during the next reign. Emperor Nicephorus I (802-811) asked Patriarch NICEPHORUS I (806–815) to reinstate Joseph for signal services to the state. Again Theodore and his monks broke off communion with Joseph, and though still retaining the names of the emperor and patriarch in the diptychs during the Liturgy or Mass, studiously avoided contact with the patriarch. Theodore did not object to restoring Joseph to his ecclesiastical post as oeconomus or business manager, but did deny his right to celebrate the Liturgy. The emperor decided to force the issue and insist that the Studites communicate with Joseph. On their refusal, they were condemned by a synod in 809, after which the emperor decided to make clear that he repudiated Constantine VI's adulterous union, and dissolved it posthumously. The dedicated Studites were exiled together with many other abbots and monks. Theodore appealed to Rome. Under Emperor Michael I Rangabe (811–813) religious peace was reestablished. Through the good offices of Pope LEO III, the reforming monks were reconciled to the patriarch and returned to their monasteries, and the abbot Joseph was condemned once more.

MOGAS FONTCUBERTA, MARÍA ANA, BL.

Co-foundress of the Capuchin Congregation of Franciscan Missionaries of the Mother of the Divine Shepherd; b. Corró de Vall-Granollers (near Barcelona), Catalonia, Spain, Jan. 13, 1827; d. Fuencarral (north of Madrid), Spain, July 3, 1886.

María Ana was raised in Barcelona by her widowed aunt or godmother, María Mogas, following the deaths of her father Lorenzo Mogas (d. 1834) and mother Magdalena Fontcuberta (d. 1841). María Ana was provided with all the benefits of high social standing, as well as faith. She searched for her vocation under the spiritual direction of the exclaustrated Capuchin Father José Tous Soler. He introduced her to two former Capuchin nuns, María Valdés and Isabel Yubal. All had been given permission to minister outside the convent.

Together they founded at Ripoll (near Gerona) the third order regular sisters of the Mother of the Divine Shepherd (June 13, 1850) for the education of children. With the permission of the Bishop of Vic the sisters were veiled. He gave them charge over a school at Ripoll, and María was elected superior (September 1950). Mother María Ana professed her vows, June 25, 1851. When the two former Capuchin nuns returned to their cloister, María fulfilled the legal requirements to administer a school, then recruited new members. The congregation grew rapidly thereafter, and a second group was established in Barcelona.

At the request of Bishop Benito Serra, María Ana began to work with the noblewoman María Antonia Oviedo to establish (December 1865) a ministry for the regeneration of prostitutes in Ciempozuelos (Madrid). She later abandoned the project and accepted instead the direction of another school.

Following her death her body was buried in Santa Ana cemetery. After miracles occurred at her grave, it was exhumed (1893) and translated to the college chapel. Her relics were lost during the Spanish civil war (1936), but recovered in 1967 and placed in the motherhouse at Madrid. A miracle attributed to her intercession was approved in 1996. Thereafter, Pope John Paul II beatified Mother María Ana, Oct. 6, 1996.

Feast: Oct. 6.

MOGHILA, PETER

Russian ecclesiastic and theologian, metropolitan of Kiev from 1633 to 1646; b. Moldavia, Dec. 21, 1596; d. Kiev, Dec. 22, 1646. The Moghila family (in Rumanian, Movila) originated in Moldavia. Moghila was ten years old when his father died, and his mother took him to Poland, where he was educated in a strictly Orthodox spirit. It is also possible that he studied abroad, perhaps in Paris.

In 1622 an expedition organized to recover his possessions in Moldavia failed, and Moghila changed the orientation of his life and studied for the priesthood. In August of 1627 he became a monk in the most famous monastery of the Slavic world, the Pecherskaya Laura (Monastery of the Caves) in Kiev. Three months later Polish King Sigismond III had him appointed grand archimandrite of the monastery. He was at times too authoritarian, but under his energetic guidance the Laura became a center of spiritual and intellectual vitality in the Eastern Orthodox world at a time when opposition among the Orthodox, Catholics, and Protestants was particularly bitter.

The printing press of the Laura turned out many new liturgical and ascetical books. At the same time Moghila opened a school of theology that became a nursery of theologians and learned bishops. In 1632 he took part in the election of the new king of Poland, Ladislas IV. He secured the king's favor for the Orthodox and in 1633 was appointed metropolitan of Kiev. His election was confirmed by Cyril LUCARIS, patriarch of Constantinople. Under Moghila's administration new confraternities were erected, and many new schools, hospitals, monasteries, and printing shops were founded. Moghila adopted the best methods of his adversaries in order to contend with them more successfully. In Kiev, theology was taught in Latin, according to the scholastic tradition. Two letters of Pope URBAN VIII indicate that in the years 1636 and 1643 hopes for a reunion of Peter Moghila with the See of Rome were nurtured, but they did not lead to concrete results. He died seemingly prematurely, but in the life of the Slav Orthodox Churches he had opened a new era.

The pro-Calvinist attitude of the patriarch of Constantinople, Cyril Lucaris, and the preaching of the Catholics of both Latin and Byzantine rites had left much confusion in the minds of the Orthodox faithful. Moghila became convinced that there was great need for a clear formulation of Orthodox doctrine, so he composed his principal work, The Orthodox Confession of Faith. He submitted it to the members of the church of Kiev in an encyclical letter (June 24, 1640) and had it studied by a synod of theologians. Some points did not obtain universal approval, and the synod decided to submit the Confessio to the patriarch of Constantinople. The patriarch appointed two of his theologians, one of whom was the noteworthy Meletius Syrigos, to meet in Iasy with three Kievan theologians to study the Confession. Some doctrinal points were modified to bring them into conformity with the Greek tradition, and it was finally approved by the four Eastern patriarchs.

The Confession, presented in Latin by the Kievan theologians, was translated into modern Greek by Syrigos and printed for the first time in Amsterdam in 1667, after Moghila's death.

For reasons that cannot be established with certitude, but probably because the revised Confession did not fully express his beliefs, in 1645 Moghila published a short catechism that is at variance with the Confession on certain important points. The most striking of these points concerns the precise moment of consecration in the Mass. Though the Confession sees that moment in the Epiclesis, the Catechism places it at the singing of the words of institution. On some other points the Catechism is more explicit than the Confession, for example, about the Assumption of Our Lady.

To answer the Catholic theologian Cassian Sakovich, who had violently criticized the practices of the Orthodox under the pseudonym of a "Devoted Shepherd," Moghila also published an apologetical work, A Stone Cast..., written in part by his theologians.

Peter Moghila directed his polemics mostly against the Catholics. Nevertheless his theological doctrine is close to Catholic Doctrine, with the exception of his attitude toward the primacy of the pope. In his books he followed the general scheme of the Catholic catechisms, mostly that of Peter CANISIUS. In his liturgical publications he let himself be guided by Catholic practices, thus bringing the Kievan church closer to the Catholic than the Greek. In his Trebnik, or ritual, for the Sacrament of Penance, for example, he introduced a formula of absolution that is declaratory as in the Roman rite, while the Greek formula of absolution is deprecatory.

For two centuries the Confession was considered by the Orthodox as one of the symbolic books of their Church, having the same authority as the decrees of the first seven ecumenical councils (see ORTHODOX SYMBOLIC BOOKS). The Russian theologians of the twentieth century, however, were much less committed to it. They were trying to develop a more independent and more creative Orthodox theology by what one of them, J. Meyendorff, called a "return to the sources."

MOGROVEJO, TORIBIO ALFONSO DE, ST.

Spanish archbishop of Lima; b. Spain, November 1538; d. Saña, Peru, 1606. He was the son of a wealthy landed family, prominent in Castile since the days of the Reconquista, but his birthplace is a source of scholarly controversy. Some conjecture it was Villaquejida, near León, in the Diocese of Oviedo; others, Mayorga, Valladolid, in the Diocese of León. There is no definite documentary evidence for either.

He was one of five children; one of his sisters, Grimanesa, married Francisco de Quiñones, and another became a nun. When he was 12 to 15 years old, Toribio was sent to Valladolid to study humanities. In 1562 he went to Salamanca, where his uncle Juan was in the College of San Salvador de Oviedo. Toribio studied canon and civil law but left for a two-year stay in Coimbra with his uncle. Upon his return to Salamanca he won a scholarship to San Salvador de Oviedo. He remained there until he was unexpectedly named inquisitor of Granada in July 1574. He carried out the office with dignity and efficiency, although it was one of the most responsible in Spain. He gained a reputation for moderation not only in matters belonging exclusively to the tribunal but also in his dealings with the chancery of Granada.

In 1568 the Council of the Indies, which controlled the provinces in the New World, decided on a number of sweeping reforms. The energetic viceroy of Peru, Francisco de Toledo, was active in enforcing them, but he needed an efficient collaborator in ecclesiastical matters. On August 28, 1578, PHILIP II proposed that the pope name Mogrovejo archbishop of Lima to fill the vacancy left by the death of Jerónimo de LOAYSA. At first he humbly declined, but he finally accepted the appointment. Since up to that time he had received only tonsure, on successive Sundays he received the four minor orders and the subdeaconate. GREGORY XIII named him archbishop of Lima on March 16, 1579. Still in Granada, he received the diaconate and was ordained. He was consecrated in Seville in 1580 and left in September for Peru, accompanied by his sister Grimanesa and her family. After a stop in the Canary Islands they arrived at Nombre de Dios in Panama and from there crossed the Isthmus to embark on the Pacific for Paita. The party made the rest of the journey to Lima by land, the archbishop making a solemn entrance into the capital on May 11, 1581.

Not losing any time, he made his first pastoral visit and called the Third Council of Lima for Aug. 15, 1583. When the bishops under his jurisdiction were gathered together, they decided on a number of new regulations of great importance, some dealing with conversion of the Indians—catechism classes, administering the Sacraments, printing of catechisms, etc.—and others devoted to reform of the clergy. Although there were difficulties from the first moment, especially protests from the clergy about to be reformed, the acts of the council, which revitalized those of the Council of Trent and those of the Council of Lima of 1567, received royal and papal approval. They were put into effect in all the bishoprics of the province of Lima and gained such a reputation that they were subsequently adopted in the archdioceses of Charcas, New Granada, and Brazil, and in fact in all South America and in the missions of the East.

The archbishop engaged in various activities, such as founding a diocesan seminary, and continued his pastoral visits, synods, and councils. In the council of 1591 secularization of the religious doctrinas was discussed. Always conscious of the dignity of his office, Mogrovejo would, if he felt it necessary, oppose the civil authorities, even the king, whose exercise of royal patronage hindered direct communication by the bishop with the Holy See. Baptizing with his own hand, confirming, and taking care of all the matters that came to his attention, Mogrovejo made three general pastoral visitations and many local visits in the diocese. He was taken ill during the course of a visitation and died before he could return to Lima. He was canonized in 1726 by BENEDICT XIII.

Feast: March 23.

MOHLBERG, KUNIBERT

Liturgist; b. Efferen, near Cologne, April 17, 1878; d. Maria Laach, May 21, 1963. In 1897 he entered the Abbey of MARIA LAACH and there, in 1898, was professed as a Benedictine. In 1905, after his philosophical and theological studies at Maria Laach and Beuron, he was sent to Louvain, where he completed his studies in 1911 and received the degree of Docteur en sciences morales et historiques. The years at Louvain were decisive for him. Under A. Cauchie (d. 1922) he learned all the subtle historical and technical methods of editing that he developed and improved during his later research. It was also in Louvain that he met the great teachers of his order: C. Butler and G. Morin, as well as the great English liturgist, E. Bishop. All of them encouraged and helped him, and thus through him influenced German scholarly liturgical research. With Morin's encouragement, he returned to his doctoral dissertation Radulph de Rivo, der letzte Vertreter der altrömischen Liturgie (2 v. Louvain 1911; Münster 1915). This topic led him to his special field of interest, namely, the problem of the ancient SACRAMEN-TARIES, the area between the libelli and the full Missals.

The first result of these studies was the publication of Des fränkische Sacramentarium Gelasianum in alamannischer Überlieferung (Liturgiegeschichtlich Quellen und Forschungen 1–2; Münster 1918) and a fundamental description of the objectives, problems, and methods of research, Ziele und Aufgaben der liturgiegeschichtlichen Forschung (Liturgiegeschichtlich Quellen und Forschungen 13; Münster 1919).

In the years after World War I he collaborated with his abbot Ildefons HERWEGEN (d. 1946), Romano GUARDINI, F. J. DÖLGER (d. 1940), A. BAUMSTARK (d. 1948), and A. Rücker (d. 1948) in many undertakings that became characteristic of German liturgical scholarship and renewal. He was called to work at the Vatican Library in 1924; from 1927 to 1939 he devoted himself to his first great series of liturgical editions, and in 1931 he was named professor for early church history, hagiography, and the history of liturgy at the Pontifical Institute for Christian Archeology. As early as 1921 he was a collaborator on the Ephemerides Liturgicae, and in 1927 he joined the editorial staff.

In 1927 Mohlberg already was working regularly during vacations on a catalogue of the medieval manuscripts at the University of Zürich; to this task he dedicated all his efforts when, at the outbreak of the war, he had to seek refuge in Switzerland. The catalogue, published in 1950, received warm praise and recognition, which in 1958 finally resulted in the bestowal on Mohlberg of an honorary doctorate by the Faculty of Philosophy at the University of Zürich. His method of cataloguing became a model to others, made possible the ordering of liturgical manuscripts, and gave impetus to new scientific work in liturgy.

A last fruitful period of creative work started for Mohlberg in 1948, when he was called to the pontifical college of the Benedictine Order, Sant' Anselmo, where from 1950 to 1953 he taught liturgiology and methodology, and until 1962 directed the liturgical institute founded by his Abbot Primate Bernard Kaelin. With Peter SIFFRIN and Leo Eizenhöfer he began the second important series of editions of the Roman Sacramentaries. In 1948, on the occasion of his 70th birthday, his former students published the Festschrift Miscellanea Liturgica in honorem L. Cuniberti Mohlberg (2 v. Rome 1948–49); this was an impressive witness to the kind of scholarship that Mohlberg encouraged.

MÖHLER, JOHANN ADAM

Theologian, author, and professor; b. Igersheim, Germany, May 6, 1796; d. Munich, April 12, 1838. Möhler studied philosophy and theology at the Catholic Academy, Ellwangen, and after ordination to the priesthood (Sept. 18, 1819) taught church history at the Catholic Seminary and University of Tübingen. On a tour of leading German and Austrian universities, he made contact with the most famous theologians of his time, among them the Protestant professors J. Neander and F. Schleiermacher. In 1835 he became ordinary professor at Louis-Maximilian University in Munich, where he lectured on church history and literature and the Epistles of St. Paul. After a three-year period of intensive work, he died of a combination of cholera, pneumonia, and general exhaustion.

His four great works were: Die Einheit in der Kirche (1825); Athanasius der Grosse (1827); Symbolik (1832); and Neue Untersuchungen der Lehrgegensätze zwischen Katholiken und Protestanten (1834). He wrote a Patrology, a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, and 65 reviews of scientific works for the Tübinger Theologische Quartalschrift, besides articles on ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, Pseudo-Isidore, JEROME, and AUGUSTINE, among others.

His work on the unity of the Church (Die Einheit in der Kirche) received both enthusiastic appraisals and severe criticism, including accusations of heterodoxy in regard to papal infallibility and Modernism. Deeply influenced by the Protestant thought of F. SCHLEIERMACHER and the idealism of F. SCHELLING, Möhler exhibited an ideological metamorphosis in his later works, gradually retreating from a mystical and immanent approach to Christian doctrine into an objective evaluation of Christian revelation.

In 1930 K. Eschweiler explained this change by postulating the influence of Hegel's "objective mind" theory whereby the world of ideas is considered to take a concrete objective form in visible organizations such as church and nation. J. Geiselmann, however, attributed it to an internal intellectual evolution, whereby Möhler came to understand the shortcomings of his first works and their potential dangers, such as subjectivism, immanentism, and pantheistic evolutionism. While there are traces of Hegelian thought in Möhler's works, Geiselmann's opinion seems to explain adequately Möhler's ideological metamorphosis. The views of the Protestant scholar É. Vermeil and the Catholic A. Fonck, who consider Möhler as "an unconscious precursor of modernism," have no foundation in Möhler's works, where the divine institution of the Church and the objective character of the Catholic religion are clearly defended.

Kunibert Mohlberg.

Möhler's desire to reach an understanding with Protestantism and eventually to accomplish the reunion of the Churches was evident in the first years of his scientific work (1823-27), when he showed sympathy for the fundamental theses of Protestantism regarding the invisible character of the Church and its mystical elements. In The Unity of the Church (Die Einheit) he embodied the mystical elements of his ecclesiology and theological system in preparation for the debate with Protestantism encountered in his later works, e.g., Symbolik and Neue Untersuchungen. Well versed in the writings of the patristic and medieval theologians, Möhler kept abreast of the theological thought of his time on both Catholic and rationalist sides. His equanimity and genius have proved an inspiration for modern scholars who find him a guide to the problems raised by the ecumenical movement of today.

MOINE, CLAUDINE

French mystic; b. Scey-sur-Saône, in the Diocese of Besançon, Jan. 17, 1618; d. Paris, date unknown, but later than 1655. Of distinguished birth but impoverished by war, Claudine Moine was obliged to go to Paris in April 1642 to seek work. There she placed herself under the direction of a religious and was not long in achieving experience of a mystical kind. Her spiritual journey is described in her Relations Spirituelles, which was preserved in a seventeenth-century manuscript in the Archives of the Foreign Missions in Paris. Her experiences comprised six months of favors; three years of temptations; and three years of infused lights, transverberation, and mystical marriage, followed by a state of darkness lasting six years when she ceased writing. The quality of the experience recorded in the Relations, the clarity of analysis, and the precision of the style make this a valuable contribution to mystical literature.

MOISSAC, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of Cahors, Department of Tarnet-Garonne, in southern France. Founded in the time of King Dagobert I (d. 639) by St. AMANDUS, who became the first abbot, this community provided the Church with many bishops from the ranks of its early abbots. Amandus himself became bishop of Maastricht; St. ANSBERT, archbishop of Rouen; and St. Leothade, bishop of Auch (691). The abbey was destroyed by the Saracens in 732 and was later raided by the Hungarians and Normans. During this chaotic period the monastery was able to rebuild and continue only with the protection of the powerful counts of Toulouse. After it became a dependency of CLUNY in 1047, Moissac once again became prosperous, housing at one time more than 1,000 monks. It was the headquarters of the Cluniac province of Aquitaine and administered a large number of other houses. In 1122 the body of St. CYPRIAN of Carthage was transferred to the abbey church of St. Peter at Moissac. With the institution of COMMENDATION in the late Middle Ages, the establishment began to decline. It was secularized by PAUL V in 1626 and finally suppressed in 1790. The church of St. Peter, containing in the tympanum of its south portal some of the most famous works of Romanesque sculpture, is now a parish church. The 12th-century cloisters are still well preserved.

MOLAS Y VALLVÉ, MARÍA ROSA DOLORIBUS FRANCISCA, ST.

Foundress of the Sisters of Our Lady of Consolation (Hermanas de Nuestra Señora de la Consolación); b. Reus (near Tarragona), northeastern Spain, March 24, 1815; d. Tortosa, Spain, June 11, 1876.

María Rosa, the daughter of craftsmen who owned a small shop, postponed her entry into religious life to tend her father's household after her mother's death from cholera. As Sister María Rosa, she joined an association of pious workers at the hospital in Reus (1841). Because of her practical intelligence, she was sent (1849) to Tortosa as superior of the House of Mercy. She reorganized and modernized the facility and procedures to improve the care given to its 300 mentally ill patients.

When she discovered that her congregation had no ties to any ecclesiastical authority and was unassociated with the Daughters of Charity, she placed herself (1957) and her 11 sisters under the jurisdiction of the local bishop. Her spirit of communion and ecclesiastical obedience birthed a new congregation: the Sisters of Our Lady of Consolation. The sisters, formally constituted as a congregation in 1868, dedicated themselves to providing health and educational services; however, María Rosa wrote the Rule to allow the order to respond to other needs of the Church.

She herself mediated disputes and even crossed a battleline to negotiate a cease fire during an attack on Reus. In Tortosa she established 10 houses and 17 hospitals, schools, and shelters for the poor before her death. By the late 20th century the order had 796 members in 84 houses in Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Burkina Faso, Chile, Ecuador, Italy, Mexico, Mozambique, Portugal, Slovakia, South Korea, Spain, and Venezuela.

María Rosa was beatified (May 8, 1977) by Pope Paul VI and canonized (December 11, 1988) by John Paul II.

Feast: June 11.

MOLDOVA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Moldova is located in eastern Europe, and is bound on the north and east by Ukraine, and on the south and west by Romania. A landlocked region, Moldova is characterized by hilly steppe areas rising to the Carpathian Mountains in the east. The region's mild climate and fertile soil make it excellent for agriculture: among the crops grown are grapes, tobacco, grains, sugar beets and fruits and vegetables. In contrast to its abundant agricultural potential, the region's natural resources are limited, consisting mainly of lignite, phosphorites and gypsum. Wine, tobacco and fruits and vegetables were the basis of the region's economy in 2000.

Known as Bessarabia until it proclaimed independence from Russia in 1917 as the Moldavian Republic, the region was annexed to Romania under the Treaty of Versailles in 1918. In 1940 it was occupied by the USSR and renamed the Moldavian Soviet Socialist Republic. Despite a brief occupation by German troops from 1941-44, the region remained under Soviet control until the fall of the USSR in 1991. A new constitution defined the region as a parliamentary republic, and elections were held in 1994. Attempting to establish the new government of Moldova, the region's new democratic leaders weathered unsuccessful secessionist movements in the east (Transnistria) and the south (Gagauzia), before being financially hampered in 1998 by a decline in the Russian economy, on which the country was dependent for trade. Corruption, organized crime and poverty remained problems in the region through 2000.

History. The region's Christian origins can be traced to the Roman occupation of Dacia (modern Romania, Bulgaria and Serbia) and the movement of Roman colonists during the 2nd century. Romans left the region in 271, after which Huns, Slavs, Magyars and Mongols passed across the region, some ruling for brief periods. Hungary expanded into the area in the 13th century and ruled until the region declared its independence under Prince Bogdan in 1349. Bodgan established the principality of Bogdania, later renamed Moldavia, which extended from the Carpathian Mountains east to the Dniester River. Under Constantinople since Roman times, Moldavia remained predominately Orthodox, its patriarchate in Bucharest.

Capital: Chisinau (Kishinev). Size: 13,000 sq. miles. Population: 4,430,655 in 2000.

Languages: Moldovan, Russian, Gagauz (Turkish dialect). Religions: 15,565 Catholics (.35%), 4,342,040 Orthodox (98%), 60,000 Jews (1.3%), 13,050 practice other faiths. Diocese: Tiraspol, directly subject to the Holy See.

By the late 15th century most of southeastern Europe was under the control of Turkish invaders and Moldavia fell to their incursions in 1512. For the next three centuries it existed as a tributary state ruled by representatives of the Ottoman Empire, and also suffered through invasions by Turks, Tatars and Russians. During this upheaval, the Orthodox Church remained steadfast in its efforts to preserve both Christianity and regional culture from the incursions of Islam and other religions. The region was a point of contention between the Turks and the Russians through most of the 18th century, and in 1792 the Ottomans finally withdrew. Most of far-eastern Moldavia was ceded to Russia by the Treaty of Bucharest following the end of the Russo-Turkish war (1806-12); the rest, the region known as Bessarabia, was ceded to Romania by the Turks in 1918. Of the territory gained by Romania, that west of the Prut River was united with Walachia and permanently incorporated into Romania, while that to the east had a more difficult future. Despite the political lines drawn through the region, most of the population of the region to the east of the Prut, ethnic Romanians, retained their affiliation with the Romanian Orthodox Church and Romanian culture—into the 20th century.

Eastern Moldavia remained under Russian control through the rest of the 19th century, during which time it was subjected to a policy of Russification. In reaction, a nationalist movement had taken root by 1905, and this group seized the opportunity, during the Russian revolution of 1917, to declare independence as the Moldavian Republic. Unfortunately, this independence did not last long: in 1924 the region was incorporated into the USSR as an autonomous soviet republic, and in 1940 was rejoined to the Bessarabian lands held by Romania since the Turkish withdrawal, thus creating the boundaries of the modern state. A focus of Romanian aggression in World War II, the region remained under Soviet control—disputed for decades by Romania— until the fall of the USSR in 1991.

The communist government strictly limited the activities of all religions, including the Romanian Orthodox Church, and worked to ultimately quash all religious activity. During the early 1940s most Orthodox churches and monasteries in the region were confiscated by the state and either demolished or converted to other uses, some even becoming warehouses. Clergy were put under constant observation, harassed and often punished for practicing their faith. As communism evolved, the role of the Russian Orthodox Church increased throughout the Soviet Union, and it eventually absorbed the Orthodox Church in Moldavia, as it absorbed similar churches throughout the Soviet sphere. Although by the 1950s Soviet dictator Josef Stalin had lifted much of the persecution with respect to the favored Russian Orthodox Church, other churches were not so fortunate, and many Latin-rite Catholics were forced to practice their faith "underground." Ethnic Ukrainians living in the region east of the Dniester River, most members of the Ukraini an-Greek Catholic Church, were put in such a situation when the government declared their Church illegal and forcibly united it with the Russian Orthodox Church in 1946.

An Independent Moldova. By the late 1980s many of the Soviet republics were experiencing Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's perestroika as a rising nationalism, and Moldavia was no different. In August of 1989, unopposed by local communist officials, thousands of demonstrators took to the streets of the capital, demanding freedoms and official status for the Moldavian language. In the late summer of 1991 Boris Yeltsin staged a bloodless coup against the Gorbachev government, resulting in confusion throughout the now-disintegrating USSR. As 400,000 marchers took to the streets in Chisinau, Soviet attempts to impose a state of emergency in Moldavia were repulsed by the region's own government, and on Aug. 27, 1991 Moldova declared its independence from the Soviet Union. This action sparked a second move for independence, as Transnistria, the region to the east of the Dniester River that was home to a Ukranian/Russian majority, attempted to separate from the ethnic Romanian west. As tensions flared in Transnistria in 1992, Soviet troops entered the region to support the separatists. In response, the fledgling nation of Moldova reinforced its military, hoping to avert a spread of violence into the rest of the country. After a new constitution was promulgated on July 28, 1994, that clearly granted the "preservation, development and expression of ethnic and linguistic identity," and which gave Transnistria autonomous status, a cease-fire was negotiated and Moscow agreed to withdraw its 14th Army in 1995. The first multiparty presidential elections were held in Moldova in 1997.

A Divided Orthodoxy. During the Russification process that was ongoing during communist rule, the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow patriarchate) had been given almost complete jurisdiction over all Orthodox formerly under the patriarchate in Bucharest, and at independence had 853 churches and 11 monasteries still under its control. In late 1992, the Patriarch of Moscow and all Russia issued a decree upgrading the eparchy of Chisinau and Moldova to a metropolitan see. In contrast to the vigor of the Russian Orthodox Church, the Old Russian Orthodox Church (Old Believers) had only 14 churches and one monastery in the country, while the small Ukrainian Greek Orthodox Church remained a tiny minority in the east. Other religious denominations that survived decades of Soviet oppression included the Armenian Apostolic Church, Seventh-Day Adventists, Baptists, Pentecostals and Molokans (a Russian Orthodox sect); by 2000 nine synagogues had been restored for use by the country's small Jewish community.

Legislation passed in 1992 guaranteed religious freedom but also required that all religious groups be officially registered with the government. Laws were also passed to prohibit proselytization, a protection primarily for the Russian Orthodox Church in the face of the country's new spiritual independence, although these laws were amended in 1999. While over 98 percent of the population declared themselves Orthodox, during a postcommunist resurgence of religious fervor, many Orthodox with ties to Romania wished to return to the Bucharest patriarchate. In appeasement, the Moscow patriarchate granted autonomous status to its Moldovan diocese, hoping to retain its hold over the new country. However, the Holy Synod of the Romanian Orthodox Church decided in December of 1992 to reconstitute its own metropolitanate of Bessarabia in the same territory. Thus Orthodoxy in Moldova was split between two rival jurisdictions, the great majority of parishes remaining loyal to Moscow. By 2000 the Moscow patriarchate claimed over 1,000 parishes, while the Bucharest patriarchate declared only 100. The newly reconstituted Bessarabian Orthodox Church made four efforts at registration with the government in the decade after independence; each time its application was refused, the government claiming it a "schismatic movement" and listing unresolved claims against church property.

Into the 21st Century. The Moldovan Orthodox Church remained the predominate religion in the country in 2000, and as such it was at the forefront of efforts to promote Christian values within a country secularized as a result of decades of communist rule. In November of 2000 it flexed its muscle by announcing that it would excommunicate any member of parliament voting in favor of a proposed law legalizing abortion, a law intended to extend the Soviet policy of the pre-independence period. Ukrainian Greek Catholics, who sided with the Orthodox in this matter, remained a small minority unrecognized by the state; by 2000 they had fewer than ten parishes, tended by six diocesan and seven religious priests and 20 sisters. In addition, a small number of Latin-rite Catholics were living in the country, most of Polish or German descent. While there were no Catholic or other Christian schools operating in Moldova, beginning in 2000, instruction in the Christian faith was made mandatory in the country's state-run primary schools, and optional for older students. As the nation moved into a new century, the construction of new churches and the restoration of over a hundred existing but damaged religious buildings was soon under way, although clergy remained in short supply throughout the country.

MOLDOVIŢA (VATRA MOLDOVIŢEI), ABBEY OF

Orthodox monastery built in Moldavia (now Moldova), district of Câmpolung, at the order of the Moldavian Prince Peter Rareş in 1532. The abbey was erected near an older foundation established there by Alexander the Good in 1402. It was later expanded by important territorial grants. Its buildings, which comprise the monks' cells, the superior's quarters, and the dwellings of the princes, are surrounded by fortified walls. The outside walls of the principal church were painted in 1537 in typical Moldavian-Byzantine style; and these frescoes, representing religious and historical subjects as well as the portraits of the founders, are particularly beautiful and well preserved. The convent is no longer occupied.

MOLESME, ABBEY OF

Former French Benedictine abbey, center of a monastic congregation, Diocese of Langres; founded in 1075 by ROBERT OF MOLESME, who retired with his followers to the dense forests near Langres. The original hermitage grew into a flourishing abbey but Robert left in 1098 and founded CÎTEAUX. He was soon reconciled with his abandoned monks and in 1099 returned to Molesme, which became the head of a monastic congregation that eventually incorporated 64 priories and some nunneries. Most of the affiliated houses were located within the Dioceses of Langres and Troyes. The congregation's organization was similar to that of CLUNY, the abbot of Molesme retaining jurisdiction over all houses and appointing all local superiors. But its spirituality, discipline, and method of handling property were closer to the usages of Cîteaux. The abbey was totally destroyed in 1472 in the war between France and Burgundy. In 1534 the foundations of a new church were laid, but commendatory abbots led to financial difficulties. After Molesme joined the MAURISTS in 1647, both moral life and monastic finances improved. The new church was consecrated in 1687. In 1791 Molesme was suppressed by the French Revolution. In the course of time, the magnificent church, which was under private ownership, was completely demolished. Other monastic buildings housed a school.

MOLEYNS, ADAM

Bishop, statesman, and humanist; d. Portsmouth, Jan. 9, 1450. Moleyns, who played an important role in the development of English HUMANISM, was the son of Sir Richard Moleyns. He was educated at Oxford, where he secured degrees in civil and canon law in 1435. By 1434 he was already a papal chamberlain and member of the papal household, where he befriended the humanist POGGIO BRACCIOLINI and cultivated the humanities. In 1435 he became king's proctor in Rome, went to the Council of BASEL, and then returned home, where he was made clerk of the council in 1436. Under Henry VI he served as envoy to Aachen and Cologne in 1438, to the Frankfurt Diet in 1441, and to the pope in 1442. Meanwhile, he collected an impressive number of ecclesiastical benefices. As keeper of the Privy Seal from 1444 to 1449 and bishop of CHICHESTER (1445) he held, together with the Duke of Suffolk, a key position in English politics. He was killed by a mob of mutinous sailors. Moleyns's correspondence with Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini (later Pope PIUS II) displays his mastery of humanist Latin. His authorship of the Libelle of Englysche Polycie (ed. G. Warner, 1926) is by no means certain.

MOLINA, ALONSO DE

Franciscan missionary and linguist; b. Spain, probably in the province of Estremadura, 1512 or 1513; d. Mexico City, 1585. Soon after the conquest of Mexico in 1521, his parents moved to the new land, where his father died. The boy became proficient in Nahuatl, the language of the Azteots. When the Franciscans arrived in 1524 with no knowledge of Nahuatl, they asked that the boy be allowed to live with them. He took up residence in the Franciscan community, sharing the common life of the friars and serving as their interpreter. In 1527 he became a Franciscan, and he was ordained probably in 1534 or 1535. He became an excellent preacher in Nahuatl. In 1555 he was guardian of the friary of Texcoco; in 1559, of Tecamachalco; and in 1571, of San Francisco in Puebla. He is best remembered for his pioneering studies in Nahuatl and for his writings in that language. His linguistic works include Vocabulario en la lengua castellana y mexicana and Arte de la lengua mexicana y castellana. His published writings of a religious and pastoral nature include Doctrina christiana breve, Confesionario breve and Confesionario mayor, and Sumario de las indulgencias concedidas a los confrades del sanctísimo sacramento. He also translated the Epistles and the Gospels of the Roman Missal and the Office of Our Lady into Nahuatl, but these were not published because of a prohibition against printing the sacred scriptures in the vernacular.

MOLINA, ANTHONY DE

Carthusian ascetical writer; b. Villanueva de los Infantes, c. 1550; d. Miraflores, Sept. 21, 1612. After studying at Salamanca, Molina made his profession in the Order of Augustinian Hermits (March 17, 1575), was elected superior at one of their Spanish houses, and taught theology. Wanting to join an order of stricter discipline, he became a Carthusian at Miraflores, near Burgos, in 1589, and died there as prior of the monastery. He wrote ascetical works in Spanish, adapted especially for priests, that became the most popular books of their type in Spain and were translated into other languages. The most famous of this group is a manual for priests titled Instrucción de sacerdotes, en que se dá doctrina muy importante para conocer la alteza del sagrado oficio sacerdotal, y para exercitarle debidamente, the whole work being based on the teachings of the Fathers and Doctors of the Church. Twenty editions of this work are known to have been published, among them a Latin translation by the Belgian Dominican, Nicolas Janssen Boy, that underwent five editions (Antwerp 1618, 1644; Cologne 1626, 1711, 1712). Severely attacked by the Jansenist Antoine ARNAULD (De la fréquente Communion, 1643), this work was well defended by Petavius (Dogmata theologica; De poenitentia 3.6). Molina also produced two ascetical works adapted for laymen: Exercicios espirituales para personas ocupadas deseosas de su salvación (Burgos 1613) and Exercicios espirituales de la excelencia, provecho y necesidad de la oración mental . . . (Burgos 1615). Finally, still extant are many of his letters to the confessor of Philip III, a tract on prayer, a biography of Dom Michael Colmenero, and an unpublished treatise on the ultimate aim of life.

MOLINA, LUIS DE

Spanish theologian; b. Cuenca, September 1535; d. Madrid, Oct. 12, 1600. Molina entered the Jesuit novitiate at Coimbra, Portugal, in 1553, studied philosophy there until 1558, and theology there and at Évora until 1563. Peter da Fonseca, alleged to have influenced his doctrine of SCIENTIA MEDIA, was never his teacher. After professing philosophy at Coimbra (1563–67), and theology at Évora (1568–83), Molina retired to write, spending time at Évora, Lisbon, and Cuenca. In 1600 he was called to profess moral theology at Madrid.

His published works are Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratiae donis, etc. (Lisbon 1588); Appendix ad Concordiam (Lisbon 1589, bound in some copies of the 1588 Concordia); Commentaria in primam divi Thomae partem (Cuenca 1592); Concordia (2d ed. Antwerp 1595); and De justitia et jure (1st complete ed., 6 v. Cologne 1613).

The Concordia is Molina's solution of the problem of free will and God's foreknowledge, providence, predestination, reprobation, efficacious GRACE, by scientia media. Comparison of both Concordia editions and the Commentaria (that contains some of the Concordia material) shows differences of expression, but none of doctrine. Though originally occasioning great controversy, the Concordia still presents one accepted solution of the problem it considers. It was edited critically by John Rabeneck (Oña-Madrid 1953).

The De justitia et jure marks Molina as one of the preeminent moralists and economists of his time. Molina published almost three volumes (Cuenca 1592–1600); the rest of the material, prepared by him, was published posthumously by his brethren. Many of Molina's unpublished writings were edited by Friedrich Stegmüller in his Geschichte des Molinismus (Münster 1935).

MOLINA, MERCEDES DE JESÚS, BL.

Also known as the "Rose of Baba and Guayaquil," foundress of the Congregación de Santa Mariana de Jesús or Marianitas; b. 1828 Baba (Los Rios), Ecuador; d. there, June 12, 1883. Mercedes (Eng.: Mercy) began her life's work as a laywoman with the motto: "As much love for as many sufferings as there are in the world." She set her hand to the task by teaching orphans and aiding the abandoned, and ministering to the poor in Guayaquil. Eventually her world expanded to include the ill-treated native Jibaros and abandoned children at Cuenca. On Easter Monday 1873, the bishop of Riobamba gave episcopal approval to her formation of the Marianitas, named after Saint Maríana de Jesús PAREDES Y FLORES, the "Lily of Quito." The Marianitas continued her apostolate after Mercedes' death at age fifty-five. She was beatified on the Las Samenes Esplanade in Guayaquil by John Paul II, Feb.1, 1985.

MOLINISM

A system of theological thought concerning God's perception of the free FUTURIBLES and futures through His middle knowledge (SCIENTIA MEDIA), the conciliation of efficacious GRACE and FREE WILL, some aspects of PREDEFINITION, PREDESTINATION, REPROBATION, and the nature of internal actual grace. It is called Molinism because it was fathered by Luis de MOLINA, although not explicitly stated by him in its modern formulation. This article explains the Molinist position on the topics mentioned above, and compares Molinism with CONGRUISM. Grace hereafter in this article always means internal actual grace.

Futuribles, Middle Knowledge, Futures. The free futurible, unlike the possible, is always one definite thing, whose being is "would be." It is therefore always infallibly known by God's infinite intelligence. Being only a conditional existent, it requires only a subjectively conditional decree in God—"Thomas would believe if God gave him grace." Consequently, God knows free futurible acts of creatures prior to His absolute decrees about them. This is God's middle knowledge—middle between His knowledge supposing no decrees (possibles) and that supposing subjectively absolute decrees (futures).

Less important is the question of how God knows free futuribles before His absolute decrees. Molinists agree that they cannot be known by God in Himself as determining their objective truth, for example, that a creature would consent to, rather than reject God's grace, if it were given. Any divine decree or grace determining futurible consent would have to derive its determining power from its very nature and would therefore conflict with any creature's power of futurible dissent. Hence any grace that God would give to men, though always inclining to good, must of its nature not determine man's futurible consent rather than dissent. Hence futuribles cannot be known in God's futurible decrees or graces as determining them. In the conditional order, God's grace is efficacious entirely from man's free futurible consent and can be known as efficacious only presupposing this fact.

Beyond this point Molinists dispute among themselves whether God's middle knowledge perceives the futuribles in God, as in a mirror reflecting their futurible being without determining it. Many Molinists, considering this impossible, say free futuribles are known by God only directly and immediately in themselves. This means that the "would be" of the futurible is sufficient objective reason why it terminates the divine cognition, itself subjectively activated by the divine essence to know whatever has determinate being. Some Molinists say God sees the futuribles in His "supercomprehension" (Molina never uses the word) of the human will—He sees the will and the act proceeding from it, and this seems equivalent to the preceding theory.

Molinists conceive that man would determine himself to consent to, rather than reject God's grace, if it were given. God's grace of its very nature would give sufficient power to consent; but its effectiveness to produce conditional consent, rather than dissent, arises solely from the fact that man would freely choose to consent, for reasons which would seem good to him. Man shares the determining power of God in the futurible order, but God gave such power to man by creating him free. Just as man is an agent by sharing God's productive power, so is he a free agent by sharing God's determining power.

Therefore, the reason that God has at His disposal efficacious and inefficacious graces is not that there are two intrinsically different kinds of grace; it is the fact that man would freely consent to some and would freely resist others.

Absolute futures, whatever "will be," are known by God, according to Molinism, in His absolute decree to give that grace, to which by middle knowledge He had foreseen man would consent or not, as the case may be. This absolute decree fulfills the condition upon which man's futurible action depended for its future existence. It changes "would consent" to "will consent." It predefines the future free consent of man, even before that consent is given, and definitely precontains it. In it, as in a mirror, God knows infallibly, by knowledge "of vision," man's future consent.

By this absolute divine decree, man's future acts become from all eternity events of human history, occurring in due time, and God is the "Lord of History," who has "got the whole world in His hands." For as He alone has power to distribute His graces and distributes them as He wills, He decides all future events and could just as well have given man other graces, which He foresaw man would resist, if they were given, thereby changing the course of history. By this decree He differentiates the saint from the sinner; by it also, made freely with knowledge of what would happen, every good human action becomes God's special benefit to man.

Conciliation of Efficacious Grace with Free Will.

The efficacious grace, which God decrees to give man in the absolute order of time, has its efficacy or infallible ability to obtain man's future consent, not from man's consent, but before that consent is given. Yet it is a dogma of faith that, under the influence of grace that works, man's will is free (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 1554). Hence the question: whence does efficacious grace derive its infallible power to obtain man's future consent without detriment to human liberty?

There are today two probable answers to the question. One is: from the internal nature of efficacious grace, which, prior to any consideration of man's reaction to it, differs intrinsically from inefficacious grace. There are several ways of describing this grace. Molinists say: not from the internal nature of grace, but from external sources consequent upon man's futurible reaction to it. Molinists unanimously reject the first solution, especially because it seems destructive of human liberty. It also seems to eliminate ineffective, but truly sufficient grace.

Positively, Molinists unanimously say all efficacious grace derives its infallible power to obtain man's future consent from three extrinsic sources: (1) the objective fact that man would freely consent to a grace if it were given, that is, from man's futurible consent; (2) God's foreknowledge of that fact, before He absolutely decrees to give the grace, that is, from His middle knowledge; and (3) from God's benevolent absolute decree to give this grace, in the light of that foreknowledge, for reasons known to God—not necessarily because man would consent.

This grace does not conflict with man's liberty or power of dissent, even when it is acting on man's will, because its whole connection with man's future consent arises from the original supposition that man would freely consent to it, if it were given, and not from the intrinsic nature of the grace. This grace, when given, takes from man the act of dissent, but leaves intact the power.

This implies the doctrine that liberty is not an act, but an active power of the will to determine itself to act or not act when all the prerequisites for action are present. The will has the passive capacity to receive these prerequisites, such as motivation and divine grace. These remove the passive indifference of the will toward action; but when they are present, there must remain in the will, if free, active power to determine itself to act or not act. A gasoline tank has the passive capacity to receive a lighted match, but no active power to explode or not once the match is thrown in. When the will has motivation and God's grace acting on it, it still has the active power to respond or resist. This, according to Molinism, is freedom; and this is preserved in the Molinist explanation of efficacious grace. According to Molinism, efficacious and inefficacious (purely sufficient) graces do not differ in their internal structure; grace, so far as its inner nature is concerned, can be effective in one person, not in another; to graces intrinsically alike one will consent, another dissent; no new entity need be added to the inner make-up of sufficient grace to render it efficacious; efficacious grace is of its nature repudiable; although efficacious grace intrinsically is not a greater benefit than inefficacious, it is in its totality, because it is willingly given by God, in the light of His knowledge that man would consent to it.

Predestination, Predefinition, Reprobation. In the order of time or execution, God gives the reward of glory to adults after and on account of merit, but there has always been dispute among Catholic theologians about the order of intention. Does God first absolutely intend, for His own reasons, to give the reward of glory to some (formal predestination), and consequently absolutely intend that they acquire merit, and so absolutely intend that they receive graces infallibly procuring these acts (formal predefinition); and does He consequently "not elect" other adults for glory prior to their foreseen death in sin (negative antecedent reprobation)? Or does He ordinarily simply will, for reasons known to Him, to give some men graces, with which He had foreseen they would correspond, thereby decreeing their meritorious acts (virtual predefinition), and only after and on account of these foreseen future merits, intend to give them the crown of glory (virtual predestination), while the rest He positively intends to reprobate on account of their foreseen death in sin (positive consequent reprobation)?

One's response to these quotations is ultimately linked with one's response to the question (also debated among Catholics): Under what condition does God will to save all men in the order of intention? Is it some consideration prior to the foreseen state of man's death, like the predetermined order of the universe, or manifestation of God's glory, or some other reason known to God, or is it solely the foreseen state of man at death?

Most non-Molinists hold the first opinion, as do many who follow Molina on grace and free will (F. Suárez, Bellarmine), because this opinion can be maintained by one who holds God's middle knowledge of the futuribles; but Molina and strict Molinists (Lessius, G. Vázquez) hold the second position. To them the first opinion is unproved; it seems to liken God to one who promises a reward, for which all are to strive, and then arbitrarily chooses only certain ones to be the winners—which seems to nullify God's universal salvific will. These think that the final purpose of God, our Father, is the communication of His goodness to us. The final end of men, His children, is the order of the universe, the manifestation of God's glory; but as men are free, God cannot absolutely intend this end, which involves the number of the saved, except as it proves obtainable by the free cooperation of men.

Strict Molinists, in affirming this position, say God would have given men the same graces and would have permitted sins, had He foreseen their rejection. The fact of God's permission of sin must be faced by any theory. According to Molinism God gives men inefficacious grace, with which man infallibly sins; but the inefficacy is due, not to some deficiency in the grace, but solely to the fact that men would freely reject it if it were given. When God gives men grace foreseen as ineffective, He gives it, in spite of its inefficacy, with a sincere intention of efficacy; for the grace is truly sufficient, and its ineffectiveness is due, not to the grace, but entirely to man's free dissent. Of course God could give other graces, to which man would respond, but He does not, so great is His respect for human liberty.

The strict Molinist doctrine, up to this point, may be summarized as follows:

- (1) By "simple intelligence" God sees the possibility of creating A and B, of giving them truly sufficient grace, with which both can be saved.
- (2) God decrees to create both, to give them sufficient graces, and, if they cooperate, merit and glory—God's universal salvific will, antecedent, conditioned solely on man's future cooperation with grace.
- (3) By middle knowledge God sees A would cooperate with grace, if it were given, and would be saved; and that B would do the opposite.
- (4) God absolutely decrees, for His own reasons (here is the mystery of predestination), to give to A graces, to which He foresaw A would consent, if they were given, out of predilection for him; and to give B truly sufficient grace, from which He foresaw B would dissent, if it were given. God loves B, but does not force Him—virtual predefinition of the good acts of A; permission of the sins of B. Their good acts and sins are now absolute futures.
- (5) By "vision" God sees in these decrees the meritorious acts of A, the sins of B as absolute futures.
- (6) God absolutely intends to give A the crown of glory on account of his absolutely future merits; and positively to reprobate B on account of his absolutely future demerits—virtual predestination of A to glory on account of merit in order of intention; also in the same order the positive reprobation of B consequent on demerit. No antecedent reprobation.

- (7) A in time performs meritorious acts, B commits sin.
- (8) God in time gives glory to A and punishment to B, on account of their merits and demerits—predestination and positive reprobation on account of final merits and demerits in the order of execution.

Nature of Actual Grace. All Catholic theologians agree that indeliberate acts of thought and volition, which draw man to a good free act, pertain to the complex of actual grace. All Molinists agree that actual grace is not a supernatural entity determining the will to the subsequent choice to do that to which it is drawn. Beyond this they differ. Some (e.g., L. Billot) say actual grace is a nondetermining, supernatural entity injected into the faculties by God. Others (Molina, Suárez) hold actual grace to be solely the acts of intellect and will elevated to the supernatural order by God's simultaneous concursus.

Molinism and Congruism. Because Suárez and Bellarmine have really different opinions from Molina and Lessius regarding predestination and allied topics, and occasional differences of expression, it is sometimes alleged that there are two systems, congruism and Molinism. Congruism is said to hold that grace is efficacious because God so tempers it to man's disposition and circumstances that the will infallibly but nevertheless freely consents to it.

However, this tempering merely explains grace's sufficiency, not its efficacy, why it will infallibly get man's consent. This, the crucial point, Suárez and Bellarmine explain exactly as Molina does. On this point there is no system of congruism as opposed to Molinism.

MOLINOS, MIGUEL DE

Theologian, whose life and writings greatly influenced seventeenth-century mysticism; b. Muniesa, Spain, June 29, 1628; d. Rome, Dec. 28, 1696. His early years were undistinguished; he studied at Valencia where he was ordained and received a doctorate in theology. In 1663, he was sent to Rome as procurator in the cause of a local venerable. He was afterward relieved of his commission, but he elected to remain in Rome where he had gained a reputation as director of souls. In 1675 he published A Spiritual Guide, which set forth his mystical doctrine and purported to offer an "easy way to contemplation." The book achieved immediate popularity and was quickly translated into several languages. According to this work, it is through contemplation that the perfect Christian is ultimately distinguished from the imperfect Christian whose life is active and who uses the prayer of meditation. This distinguishing contemplation is acquired only by a total abandonment of self to the will and operation of God in the soul, to the extent that this soul of "pure faith" has rid itself of all effort to act virtuously, or to form thoughts or desires, or even actively to repel temptations.

The seventeenth century had a decided bent toward mysticism, and Rome, still perturbed from the Jansenist crisis, could not be indifferent to this novel teaching. Opposition to Molinos soon formed, with Jesuit theologians and preachers leading the defense of meditative prayer. Gottardo Bell'uomo and Paolo Segneri wrote treatises against the new doctrine. Molinos countered with two long letters to the Jesuit general in a conciliatory but unyielding spirit. For five years the dispute grew ever more acute, and soon the political machinery of Rome was called into play. Molinos was not without powerful friends, among them the archbishop of Palermo, the cardinal secretary of state, and especially the Oratorian Pier Matteo Petruccio, a convinced adherent and propagandist of the new mysticism and soon to be created a curial cardinal. In 1681 the books of Bell'uomo and Segneri were placed on the Index, and Molinos seemed to have triumphed.

Then suddenly on July 18, 1685, Molinos was arrested and subjected to a searching investigation by the Holy Office. The immediate reason for his arrest is not altogether clear. It is true that Cardinal Caracciolo of Naples, who seems first to have mentioned the term "quietist," complained of the doctrine in 1682. Yet the Guide had been under scrutiny for three years before the arrest. Although the teaching of the Guide was susceptible to dangerous and even heretical interpretation, yet it seems improbable that this alone could have precipitated the sudden and drastic measures used against such a well-known and respected figure as Molinos. Non-Catholic sources adopted the current gossip that the affair was engineered by Cardinal D'Estrée, Louis XIV's ambassador to Rome, but there is little historically or logically to substantiate the claim. It seems more probable that it was accusations of a moral rather than a doctrinal nature that brought about Molinos's sudden downfall.

For two years Molinos was examined on the Spiritual Guide, the more than 12,000 letters found in his possession, and the depositions of the many called in to give testimony concerning his spiritual advice and moral conduct. Finally in the spring of 1687, Molinos admitted his guilt. A list of errors charged to him, numbering 68 in all, (see H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, [Freiburg 1963]:2201-2268) was read to the defendant before a large assembly in the Minerva on Sept. 3, 1687. Molinos read his retraction and pleaded guilty as charged to moral misconduct, the extent of which cannot be certified as the report lies buried in the secret files of the Holy Office. He was sentenced to a life of penitential imprisonment and led to jail as the crowd looking on the fallen idol cried: "To the flames." He lived nine more years of pious and exemplary behavior, perhaps practicing his teaching that elevated souls seek only the humiliations and scorn that it might please God to send.

MOLLA, GIANNA (JOAN) BERETTA, BL.

Physician, mother, "Martyr for Life"; b. Magenta near Milan, Lombardy, northern Italy, Oct. 4, 1922; d. there April 28, 1962.

Gianna was the tenth of thirteen children of Alberta Beretta and Maria de Micheli—who ensured that she received a Catholic education. Gianna began her apostolate of caring for the sick and elderly as a member of the Saint Vincent de Paul Society while still in school. Gianna was also a leader in the CATHOLIC ACTION Movement, organizing retreats and spiritual exercises.

Upon graduating from the University of Pavia with degrees in medicine and surgery (1949), she practiced medicine with her brother Ferdinando Beretta at Merero (near Magenta) and studied pediatric medicine at the University of Milan (1950–52). After completing her education she devoted more time to providing medical attention to the indigent.

She married engineer Pietro Molla (Sept. 24, 1955) with whom she had three children: Pierluigi (b. September 1955), Mariolina (b. December 1957), and Laura (b. July 1959). In the second month of her fourth pregnancy, Gianna was diagnosed with a large uterine fibroma that required surgical removal. As a doctor she knew that her best chance for survival would mean killing the baby in her womb; nevertheless, she pleaded with the surgeon to save the life of her child regardless of the risk to her own life. Her daughter Gianna Emanuela was born, April 21, 1962. Gianna Beretta Molla, however, died one week later.

Her body lies in the cemetery of Mesero (near Magenta). Her process for beatification was opened in Rome, March 15, 1980. She was declared venerable in 1991. Her husband and three children attended Gianna's beatification by Pope John Paul II, April 24, 1994 (Year of the Family). Patroness of healthcare workers, mothers, professional women, the prolife movement, spouses, and unborn children.

Feast: April 28 (Archdiocese of Milan).

MOLLOY, ALOYSIUS, SISTER

Educator and author; b. Sandusky, Ohio, June 14, 1880; d. Rochester, Minnestota, Sept. 27, 1954. Sister Aloysius was the daughter of Patrick John and Mary (Lambe) Molloy of Sandusky. After attending Ohio State University, Columbus, she went to Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, where in 1907 she became the first woman to receive a Cornell Ph.D. That same year, with Sister M. Leo Tracy, OSF, she founded the College of St. Teresa, Winona, Minnesota. In 1911 she became the first dean of the college, and after 1928 served as both dean and president until her retirement in 1946. Upon the death of her father in 1922, she sought admission to the Sisters of St. Francis of the Third Order Regular of the Congregation of Our Lady of Lourdes. When she completed her novitiate, she continued her activities on behalf of Catholic higher education.

For 25 years Sister Aloysius was a member of the Commission on Higher Education of the North Central Association and served on its committee to draft new standards for colleges and universities. She joined the National Catholic Educational Association in 1913, and became the first woman member (1923), and later the president, of the executive committee of its college and university department. She was the cofounder of the Confraternity of Catholic Colleges for Women (1918). Her memberships included Phi Beta Kappa, American Association of University Women, and the Medieval Academy of America. She was the author of The Celtic Rite in Britain (1910), The Lay Apostolate (1915), Catholic Colleges for Women (1918), The Parochial Schools, School Organization, and Teacher Training (1919), A Catholic Educational Directory (1919), A Teresan Ideal in Service and System (1928), and Training the Nursing School Faculty (1930). She collaborated on concordances to Wordsworth (1911), Horace (1914), and Bede's Ecclesiastical History (1907). Among the honors she received were the papal cross Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice (1918) and the Cross of Merit of the Constantinian Order of St. George (1923).

MOLLOY, FRANCIS

Irish Franciscan writer and teacher who compiled the first Gaelic grammar ever printed; b. Diocese of Meath, Ireland, c. 1606; d. France, 1677. Molloy (also known as O'Molloy) seems to have been a native of Fir Ceall in the present County Offaly. He joined the Franciscan Order at St. Isidore's College, Rome, on Aug. 2, 1632. He taught philosophy at Klosterneuberg (1642) and Mantua (1647), and theology at Graz (1645) and Rome (1652), where he became procurator for the Irish Franciscans. In 1671 Molloy's name was proposed for the bishopric of Kildare. Among those who recommended him was Maria Virginia Altieri, sister of Clement X. The Propaganda Printing Press at Rome published his two best-known works: a Gaelic catechism, Lucerna fidelium, Lochrann na gcreidmheach (1676), and a grammar, Grammatica latino-hibernica (1677). Neither is original, and the grammar is very defective. He also published a treatise on the Incarnation and some Latin poems.

MOLLOY, THOMAS EDMUND

Archbishop, educator; b. Nashua, N.H., Sept. 4, 1884; d. Brooklyn, N.Y., Nov. 26, 1956. He was the son of John Molloy, a provision merchant, and the former Ellen Gaffney. He attended Nashua public and parochial schools and St. Anselm's College, Manchester, N.H. In Brooklyn, N.Y., he studied at St. Francis College and St. John's Seminary. In 1904 he entered the North American College in Rome and on Sept. 19, 1908, was ordained for the Diocese of Brooklyn. He was assigned as assistant at St. John's Chapel, Brooklyn, and when his pastor, George W. MUNDELEIN, was appointed auxiliary bishop, Molloy became his secretary. In 1915 Mundelein was named archbishop of Chicago and took his secretary with him. After ten months, Molloy returned to Brooklyn and became assistant at Queen of All Saints parish and spiritual director at Cathedral College of the Immaculate Conception. He also taught philosophy at St. Joseph's College for Women, Brooklyn, and later became its president. He was consecrated auxiliary to Bishop Charles E. McDonnell of Brooklyn on Oct. 3, 1920, and was elected administrator of the diocese upon the death of McDonnell in August of 1921. He was named bishop of Brooklyn by Pope Benedict XV on Nov. 21, 1921; Pope Pius XII gave him the personal title of archbishop on April 7, 1951. During his episcopate the Catholic population of the diocese doubled and the number of priests tripled. Ninety new parishes were established, 100 new parochial schools were opened, and the number of Catholic high schools more than doubled. Existing colleges expanded; the Seminary of the Immaculate Conception, Huntington, N.Y., and Molloy Catholic College for Women, Rockville Center, N.Y., were opened. The services of the hospitals and Catholic charities were reorganized and expanded, and diocesan insurance and purchasing agencies and a building commission were established. Molloy's eloquence and personality attracted the support of influential non-Catholics as well as Catholics.

MOLYNEUX, ROBERT

Missionary, first superior of the restored Society of Jesus in the U.S.; b. Lancashire, England, July 24, 1738; d. Washington, D.C., Dec. 9, 1808. Molyneux was descended from an old Catholic family, and in 1757 entered the Society of Jesus, where he had been preceded by his older brother William. During his training, Robert taught at the Jesuit school at Bruges, Belgium, where John CARROLL, the future American archbishop, was enrolled, and the two men became close friends.

In 1771 Molyneux was sent to the U.S., arriving in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on March 21. After the death of Rev. Robert Harding the following year, Molyneux became pastor of old St. Joseph's and of the larger church nearby, St. Mary's. He was an excellent preacher, and his funeral sermon on the death of his colleague, Rev. Ferdinand Farmer, in 1786 was one of the first Catholic items printed in the U.S. He was also instrumental in founding the first parochial school in Philadelphia before going to St. Francis Xavier Church, Bohemia Manor, Maryland (1788), where he replaced John Lewis, former vicar apostolic for Maryland and Pennsylvania. Two years later, Molyneux departed for Newtown, St. Mary's County, Maryland. During this period he also helped to establish Georgetown College, Washington, D.C., on a firm foundation, and became its second president in 1793. He held this office until 1796 and returned for another term as president in 1806.

Having learned that the Society of Jesus, which had been suppressed in other countries, still existed in White Russia (now Belarus), former Jesuits in the U.S. expended every effort to aggregate themselves to this body. Arrangements were finally completed, and Molyneux was appointed first superior by Carroll on June 21, 1805. Thaddeus Brzozowski, Jesuit general in Russia, confirmed the appointment on Feb. 22, 1806. The first novitiate of the restored Society was located at Georgetown, and on Aug. 18, 1806, Molyneux renewed the simple vows of the Society at St. Thomas Manor, Maryland, in the Church of St. Ignatius, whose cornerstone had been laid in 1798 by Carroll.

MOMBAER, JOHN

Monastic reformer and ascetical writer, called also John Mauburnus or John of Brussels; b. Brussels, 1460; d. Paris, Dec. 29, 1501. He studied at the cathedral school in Utrecht and in 1480 entered the monastery of the Canons Regular at Mt. St. Agnes (near Zwolle), a house of the Congregation of Windesheim. Mombaer's spirituality was thus nourished by the DEVOTIO MODERNA of which Windesheim was the focal point. After serving as superior at Mt. St. Agnes, he was called to France in 1496 to inaugurate reform in various monasteries of his order there. In this work he enjoyed considerable success, but he also met with substantial opposition. In 1501 he was elected abbot of Livry. In his writings Mombaer gathered ancient truths of spirituality, but he tended to present the ascetical life as a rigid and mechanical system. He used a mnemonic verse form to describe his various steps, schemes, and divisions in the practice of prayer and the attainment of Christian virtue. His works include Rosetum exercitiorum spiritualium et sacrarum meditationum, Exercitia utilissima pro horis solvendis et devota communione sacramentali, and Venatorium sanctorum Ordinis Canonicorum Regularium.

MOMBRITIUS, BONINUS

Italian humanist; b. Milan, c. 1424; d. before 1502. Of an impoverished noble family, he studied Greek and Latin at Ferrara and later taught the classics at Milan. The letters sent to him by Candide Decembrio (d. 1480) in 1460 testify that Boninus had acquired a reputation as a humanist. In 1470, along with other nobles living near the Parian gate at Milan, he swore fidelity to Galeazzo-Maria SFORZA. He never married and has been praised for his piety and lofty principles. From 1474 to 1481, despite straitened circumstances, he managed to produce a surprising number of literary works. In 1482 his professorial chair was given to George Merula (d. 1494), and a letter dated 1502 from Alexander Minuziano (d. 1522) speaks of Boninus as being dead.

Besides numerous poems his works include the following editions of various authors: Rerum memorabilium collectanea of Solon (6th century B.C.), published at Milan c. 1473 or Ferrara in 1474; the Theogonia latinis hexametris reddita of Hesiod (8th century B.C.), published at Ferrara in 1474; the Summule seu logice institutiones (Milan, Dec. 14, 1474); and the Summule naturalium (Milan, July 17, 1476) of the AUGUSTINIAN hermit Paul of Venice (d. 1429), as well as the Historiae augustae scriptores sex (Milan, Dec. 12, 1475). He published the Chronicon of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA at Milan between 1474 and 1476 and is also thought to have edited the works of JEROME, PROSPER OF AQUITAINE, and Matthew Palmieri (d. 1483) at this time. He is also credited with Papiae vocabularium (Milan, Dec. 12, 1476) and Prosperi epigrammata (Milan 1481). His Sanctuarium seu vitae Sanctorum, in two volumes dedicated to Francis Simoneta (d. 1480), the duke's secretary, must be antecedent to the secretary's imprisonment in 1479. Far from imitating the hagiographers of his time, who embellished and altered somewhat freely, Mombritius preferred to produce the texts as he found them, and their value is thus dependent on the source from which he drew. G. Eis tried without success to indicate these sources, and consequently much work remains to be done in this field. The monks of the Abbey of SOLESMES reedited the Sanctuarium (Paris 1910).

Boninus also published some of his own works, such as De dominica passione libri V (Milan c. 1474; new ed. Leipzig 1499), which contains six books of poems in hexameter verse dedicated to SIXTUS IV; and the Thraenodiae in funere illustris quondam domini Galeazzo-Mariae Sfortiae (Milan, March 2, 1504), one of his last publications and very probably posthumous. Several of his works remain in manuscript form, including Momidos, a poem in 12 books on the faults of women, written between 1468 and 1476 and dedicated to Bona Sforza (d. 1485), the wife of Galeazzo-Maria; De varietate fortunae, another poem in 10 books; a Latin translation of the Grammar of John Lascaris; and two epithalamia.

MONACO, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Monaco, the second smallest state in the world after the Holy See, is a tiny enclave located on the Mediterranean shore of France near the Italian border. Rugged hills characterize the terrain, while the climate is moderate, with mild winters and dry summers. With no natural resources and no agricultural means, the region relies on tourism and small industry for its wealth. Of its total population in 2000, only one fifth were actual citizens of the principality.

The area was controlled by the Phoenicians from the 10th to the 5th century B.C. and then by the Phoceans. Rome dominated the region during the Christian era until barbarians and then Saracens invaded it. After the Genoese were granted feudal rights over the area at the end of the 11th century, it came under the House of Grimaldi in 1297. The principality, annexed to France (1793–1814), was placed under the protection of Sardinia in 1815, and under that of France in 1861. Monaco has been a sovereign principality ruled by a hereditary constitutional monarch since 1911. The construction of a gambling casino in the 19th century established the region as a world-renown tourist destination. Prince Rainier III has been king of the region since 1949.

History. It is unknown when Christianity entered the region. While the relics of St. Devota are said to have been brought to Monaco shortly after her martyrdom in Corsica under Diocletian, the historicity of the martyrdom, and even of the existence, of this patron saint of Monaco, rests on sources from as late as the 11th century. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction rested with the bishop of Cimiez, whose see was united with that of Nice in the 5th century. The oldest reliable historical document (1075) mentions the chapel of St. Devota being restored to the Abbey of St. Pons of Cimiez. In 1078 the Church of St. Mary was constructed at the base of the Rock of Monaco and was given to the bishop of Nice. The Rock itself was owned and inhabited by the abbey and the commune of Peille until the end of the 11th century, when control passed to the Genoese who fortified it. The abbey erected the chapel of St. Martin. The parish of St. Nicholas, whose church edifice was started in 1252, was placed under the bishop of Nice. From 1206 the prior of St. Devota acted as spiritual and temporal lord, in the name of the Abbey of St. Pons, for most of the surrounding countryside and for all the present-day principality except the Rock.

In the 14th century the Grimaldi gained control of the Monegasque fortress and over the next two centuries obtained by purchase the possessions of the priory. This family, which became a princely one in the 17th century, chose the pastor and curates of St. Nicholas, but ecclesiastical powers came from the bishop of Nice. In 1868 the principality was separated from the diocese of Nice and made an abbey nullius immediately subject to the Holy See. The Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception was built at the end of the 19th century. Leo XIII's bull Quemadmodum (March 15, 1887), which regulated the juridical condition of the Church, created the diocese of Monaco immediately subject to the Holy See. According to this document, which was substantially an agreement between the pope and the prince of Monaco, Catholicism was officially named the state religion. The government subsidized the Church and, in exchange, enjoyed extensive privileges, including that of presenting a trio of names for episcopal appointments, nomination of all canons except one and of the pastors and curates of all churches except that of St. Charles in Monte Carlo, which is reserved permanently to the CLERKS REGULAR OF THE MOTHER OF GOD.

By 2000 Monaco had five churches tended by 13 diocesan and eight religious priests, in addition to its cathedral. Other religious included a brother and 22 sisters who maintained the principality's Catholic schools. Monaco enjoyed diplomatic relations with the Holy See and maintained a minister plenipotentiary in Rome. While Protestant faiths had increased their influence by the 1990s, the government discouraged proselytizing and access by some cults was also discouraged. The Mass was

MONAD

From the Greek, μ ová ζ , a unit or individual entity, a monad is a simple, unextended, substantial, dynamic being of a psychical nature that reflects and represents the whole universe within itself, spontaneously and more or less consciously, without direct interaction with any other being. Monads are previously interrelated on the basis of a similarity of composition and a preestablished harmony.

The concept of the monad goes back to the later philosophy of PLATO, who sought an original unit $(\mu ov\acute{\alpha}\zeta)$ from which to derive the many. In a similar manner, NEO-PLATONISM postulated the One ($\acute{\epsilon}v$), a self-subsistent principle from which numbers emanate, again to explain how many come to image the one. NICHOLAS OF CUSA accepted the explanation of the School of Chartres that God is the One, who reveals Himself in the world and is above all present there and to whom all beings are related as to an original source, so that He is "all in all" (quodlibet in quolibet). Giordano BRUNO also adopted the monas, but as psychically animated and spatially extended. He thought of it as an atom, a microcosm that encloses the macrocosm.

G. W. LEIBNIZ, for whom the monad became a principle of a dynamic PANPSYCHISM, began by seeking to improve upon the notion of substance as developed by R. DESCARTES. He thought of monads as metaphysical points, psychical centers of force, and the substantial elements of which the universe is composed. They are true atoms, but at the same time overlapping units, making up "higher monads" and thus the hierarchical forms and structures of all things, crowned by the divine monad as the source and mind of the universe. In themselves they are indestructible; according to Leibniz, they were created by God and can be destroyed only by Him. The Leibnizian monad is the recapitulation and ultimate extension of the formula of B. SPINOZA: Deus sive natura sive substantia; yet, because Leibniz relates all monads to the first monad (God), his theory is essentially different from that of Spinoza.

The entire monad theory is based upon the implications of the Parmenidean identification of thought and being. The result is that a similarity in image is identified with a similarity of being, an identification that is itself untenable. In Leibniz's time, those who discussed monads were H. More (1614–87), F. M. van Helmont (1614–99) and G. VICO; those later influenced by Leibniz in the compilation of an inductive metaphysics include R. H. LOTZE, H. Driesch, and E. Becher (1882–1929).

MONAGHAN, JOHN PATRICK

Leader in Catholic social thought and activity; b. Dunamore, Tyrone, Ireland, Feb. 12, 1890; d. New York City, June 26, 1961. He was the son of Patrick and Bridget (McCormick) Monaghan. He was educated at St. Francis College, Brooklyn, N.Y., and St. Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, N.Y., before being ordained a priest for the New York Archdiocese.

Monaghan was an early promoter of Catholic social teachings. From the mid-1920s to his death, he, along with his close friends Msgr. John A. RYAN and Bp. Francis J. HAAS, was known as a "labor priest." He was one of the most influential priests in New York, especially through his contribution to the establishment of Catholic Labor Schools (1935), the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists (ACTU, 1937), and the Labor Day Mass (1937). Belief in the ability of workingmen to solve their own problems, once they had the necessary knowledge, led Monaghan to initiate a program of worker education that gave to union and non-union members a basic course in labor economics, the social teaching of the Catholic Church, and parliamentary procedure. It was chiefly his work with the ACTU, however, that made him a latterday Peter E. DIETZ. The ACTU was not a Catholic labor union; it was, rather, an organization under Catholic auspices for the training of rank and file union members, Catholic and non-Catholic alike, in their social rights and responsibilities. In this work Monaghan found himself opposed, first by management and financial interests, but later even by entrenched labor leaders, particularly the racketeers and communists.

In other areas as well, he was a forward-looking leader. Before the days of the Catholic Youth Organization, he operated one of the best youth programs in New York City. At the time when Dom Virgil MICHEL was preaching liturgical revival, Monaghan's parish on Staten Island was nationally known for its liturgical practices. He was a pioneer in the field of adult education; and at the parish school level he argued that the inclusion of religion in the curriculum never compensated for educational mediocrity. He was not, however, an "organization man"; he can better be described as a personalist. His influence on priests and their pastoral ministry, attributable in part to his long career in New York's diocesan preparatory seminary, and his courageous attitude in the face of serious difficulties were the basis for his fame. The record of his thinking is best found in the Labor Leader, the organ of the ACTU, in which he wrote a column called "Don Capellano." His comments were pointed and pungent. "Atheistic Communism is not half the menace to Christianity that the blight of self-complacent Catholicity is." "Revolution is not something that comes with the roll of drums and the shouts of a mob. Revolution is a change of ideas." "Most of us are not spiritually equal to the life of creative beggary by which St. Francis forgot himself into immortality. If we tried it, we would probably turn out as quite ordinary tramps." Monaghan was raised to the rank of domestic prelate in 1957, and at the time of his death he was pastor of St. Michael's Church, New York City.

MONARCHIA SICULA

Since the 16th century, a right claimed by the kings of Sicily to exercise supreme ecclesiastical authority in their kingdoms as representatives of the Holy See. This claim was based on a privilege conceded by Urban II to Count Roger I of Sicily and Calabria (July 5, 1098) in reward for his warfare against the Saracens. In his bull Urban assured the Count and his successors that no legate would be sent to Sicily against their wishes. For the execution of papal commands the kings of Sicily would act as vice legates of the pope. It was a question not of a jurisdiction by the princes of Sicily independent of the Holy See, but only of the privilege of the secular rulers to execute the precepts of the supreme Church authorities; the sovereign of Sicily was privileged, but also bound to carry out papal regulations in his land. Paschal II sought to restrict the privilege by a bull to Count Roger II (Oct. 1, 1117). Adrian IV reluctantly recognized it (1136), but Innocent III (1198–1216) repudiated it.

During the period of Absolutism, Spanish legalists rediscovered the document and asserted immense ecclesiastical privileges for their kings, who were the rightful successors of the Normans and Hohenstaufens of Sicily. In practice the acts of the Holy See had no strength without an executory letter of the viceroy. Ferdinand I (d. 1516) had claimed for himself jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters, and Philip II sought in vain (1578) to have the Holy See confirm the Monarchia Sicula. Later Philip instituted a permanent tribunal named Index Monarchiae Siculae and forbade appeals from this tribunal to the Holy See. Rome could not overlook the danger to the independence of Sicilian bishops. The conflict was particularly violent during the reigns of Pius V (1566-72), Gregory XIII (1572–85), and Clement VIII (1592–1605). Philip condemned the 11th volume of the Annales Ecclesiastici in which Cardinal Caesar BARONIUS questioned both the genuineness of the bull of Urban II and the legal right of the Monarchia Sicula.

Monaco Cathedral. (@Gail Mooney/CORBIS)

The contest became intense under Urban VIII (1623–44). The Sicilian bishops had protested so bitterly about the lack of independence due them by the Tridentine decrees that the pope adopted extreme measures proposed by a commission of cardinals. Accordingly, in 1687 Bl. Innocent XI instructed the nuncio of Spain to excommunicate the Neapolitan functionaries. The government of Madrid succeeded in having the sentence revoked. A heated battle broke out in 1717 when King Victor Amadeus II of Savoy ascended the throne of Sicily and the privilege of Monarchia Sicula was conceded to him. In a question of ecclesiastical immunity Clement XI suppressed the tribunal of that monarchy with the constitution Romanus Pontifex (Feb. 20, 1715). After he became King of Sicily and Holy Roman Emperor, Charles VI strove to obtain from Benedict XIII the revocation of the Clementine constitution; but in face of the resolute stand taken by the pope he settled for a bull that systematized ecclesiastical affairs on the island. The laborious treaties in which Cardinal Prospero Lambertini had an important role as papal adviser were concluded with the bull Fideli (Aug. 30, 1728), in which Benedict XIII, after withdrawing the decree of Clement XI, reserved to the Holy See the more important ecclesiastical affairs in Sicily but conceded to the sovereign for decisions of the last instance in certain ecclesiastical cases the institution of a supreme judge as a delegate of the Apostolic See. It was called "Tribunal of the Royal Monarchy and Apostolic Legation." Abuses again grew and in 1860 Garibaldi claimed the rights of papal legates and the privileges of Monarchia Sicula. Shortly after, Pius IX suppressed the apostolic legation by the bull Suprema, dated Jan. 28, 1864, but not published until Oct. 10, 1867. This bull was a complete and final revocation of the Monarchia Sicula. The Italian government quickly protested, but with the Law of Guarantees (art. 15) it renounced the privilege.

MONARCHIANISM

A heresy that, through an exaggerated concept of the unity (monarchia: one origin, one rule) of God, denied the distinction of persons in the Divinity. In pre-Christian theodicy Monarchianism was related to the monotheistic principle asserted in Platonic and Stoic teaching which affected Hellenistic ideas of Divine Providence and political ethics. For PHILO JUDAEUS and the early Christian apologists, the idea of Monarchianism followed from the Old Testament insistence on the oneness of God.

As a heresy, Monarchianism originated in the 2d century partly in reaction to the Gnostic theories of intermediate aeons and partly as a reaction to subordinationist tendencies of orthodox teachers. In their presentation of Trinitarian and Christological doctrine they ascribed to the Son functions such as creation and conservation that made him God in a secondary sense.

Two types of Monarchians are met with in the early Church. The adoptionists or dynamists represented by Theodotus the Banker and his disciple Theodotus of Byzantium, founder of the sect, and by Artemon with his disciple, Paul of Samosata, who began with the Christological error that Jesus Christ was not always God, but that at His baptism a power, or dunamis, of the Father descended on Him by virtue of which He wrought wonders (dunameis). Theodotus called this power of God Christ; but some of his followers thought that He became God only after the Resurrection. The sect, called Theodotians, was never numerous; their history has been preserved by Hippolytus.

For the Modalists and Sabellians, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are not names of truly distinct persons, but rather modes, energies, aspects, or phases of the one divine person. God the Father appeared on earth as the Son, and this logically involved the fact that the Father died; hence the Modalists were known in the West as Patripassians. In the East they were called Sabellians after a Roman cleric Sabellius, who developed the doctrine of Noëtus of Smyrna. He became the chief spokesman of the sect in Rome, and was excommunicated under Pope Callistus (c. 220). The doctrine was combated by Dionysius of Alexandria, causing an exchange of letters between the bishop of Alexandria and Pope DIONYSIUS whose decisions in the matter are reported by St. Athanasius in his Decrees of the Council of Nicaea, 26 (Patrologia Graeca, 25:461-465).

Although the early Monarchians professed belief in one true God and in Jesus Christ, wholly and truly God, and thus developed the logos-teaching of the apologists, nevertheless, in the course of controversy, particularly with Tertullian, Hippolytus, and Novatian, their denial of the real distinction of persons in the one God was gradually unmasked. Praxeas, whom Tertullian assailed, visited Rome and Carthage (c. 206–208). The heresy is found in the 4th century developed by Marcellus of Ancyra (d. c. 374) and propagated by Photinus of Sirmium (c. 344). They denied the real distinction of persons and said that the Father is given three names corresponding to three activities.

Michael SERVETUS of Spain revived this doctrine in the 16th century, and it became a principal teaching of the Socinians (see SOCINIANISM). In modern philosophy a form of Monarchianism is applied to the Trinity in, for example, KANT's teaching that belief in God is directed toward a holy ruler, a wise legislator, and a just judge. According to G. W. F. HEGEL, the Idea-Being (or Ens) evolved as the Idea-Ens in itself, which is God, the Idea-Ens evolving outside itself (ad extra evoluta), which is nature, and the Idea-Ens, conscious of itself, which is man.

MONARCHICAL EPISCOPATE

The term monarchical describes the form of Church governance described by St. Ignatius of Antioch, wherein the bishop is seen as high priest, teacher, and shepherd of the faithful. It is distinguished from a collegiate episcopate in which the direction of local communities, according to some historians and theologians, did not rest with any one man during the first post-apostolic generations. They theorize that, in some churches at least, a number of elders or functionaries, grouped more or less closely in a college, exercised leadership. For them the monarchical episcopate is the result of a natural evolution that owed much to the doctrinal and disciplinary differences that plagued the communities, threatening their unity, and pointing the need for concentration of leadership. Many of them fix the term of such transition at the beginning of the third century.

MONARCHY

A form of STATE in which sovereign AUTHORITY is vested in a single person, whether he be called prince, king, or emperor. Monarchy is absolute when there is no limitation on the monarch's power, limited when there is such restraint.

Classical views. Theoretically, the ideal form of GOVERNMENT has been held to be the centralization of all political power in the one best man. In ancient times Homer and the Pythagoreans advocated a monarchical form of THEOCRACY. PLATO (427–347 B.C.) termed the rule of philosopher-kings either monarchy or ARISTOCRACY, since "we count royal and aristocratic as one" (Republic 587d). Among the three types of good government (monarchy, aristocracy, and polity) distinguished by ARISTOTLE (384–322 B.C.), monarchy was held to be the ideal. The deep sympathy for monarchy so often expressed in the Politics is to be understood in the light of Aristotle's relations with the rising Macedonian monarchy. He also maintained that the form of government that is best for any people is that best adapted to obtain for them the end of civil power. Although regarding monarchy as the ideal, he thought the best attainable form to be an aristocracy, not of wealth or of birth, but of intellect—a true aristocracy, a government of the best (Politics 1293b). According to CICERO (106-43 B.C.), men organized states to attain their common good. He preferred a form of government embracing the best features of the pure forms of monarchy, aristocracy, and DEMOC-RACY. He believed that the Roman government embodied this "mixed" form, which he thought superior to others because it was better balanced and more stable (De Re Publica, 1.65-).

Medieval theory. In the Middle Ages, the king was considered the lawful head of civil society. St. THOMAS AQUINAS (1225-75) taught that all government is derived from God since He alone from His very nature has dominion over men. Such dominion is not intrinsic or innate in any man, not even in a king; it is derived. The power to govern comes from God either immediately or mediately; it is not an inborn natural right of a few. St. Thomas explained that the will of the people counteracts tendencies to TYRANNY. Although he believed monarchy to be "most in accord with nature," he defined as acceptable any form that performs well the functions of the state. In De Regimine Principum he was emphatic on the moral limitations placed upon the royal power. Indeed, he even called for some restraint upon the king and approached Thomas Jefferson's later advocacy of revolution against tyranny. There was no basis in medieval political thought for such doctrines as the DIVINE RIGHT OF KINGS. Every expression by Aquinas and his predecessors pointed not to the divine right, but to the sacred responsibility of kings. The modern concept of the limitation of governmental power can be drawn easily from Thomistic principles.

Dante (1265–1321), in De Monarchia, cherished the ideal of a world state over which one sole civil ruler would preside, just as the pope was the supreme head of the Church. In fact as well as theory, however, medieval royal power was far from absolute. The king's authority was kept in check by the communes, the guilds, and the Church. These elements served to counteract royal ABSOLUTISM, preventing it from trespassing on rights founded on NATURAL LAW and confirmed by custom. Politics was considered inseparable from ethics and religion.

Beginning of modern political theory. Niccolò MA-CHIAVELLI (1469–1527) revived the pagan concept of royal absolutism. He was the first to identify the state with the prince and to divorce politics from Christian ethics. Thomas HOBBES (1588-1670) thought the best state was one in which the power was concentrated in one absolute monarch possessing all rights and no duties. In general, the late 18th-century European monarchies had become enlightened despotisms. Since that time absolute monarchy has disappeared from the civilized world, and the limited type is in decline. However, natural-law ethics does not imply any particular form of government, although it opposes tyrannies of all types. In the words of Leo XIII, "There is no reason why the Church should not approve of the chief power being held by one man or more, provided only it be just, and that it tend to the common advantage" [Diuturnum illud, in Acta Sanctae Sedis 14 (1881) 5].

MONASTERY

In early usage, in its strict etymological sense (from μόνος or μοναχός), the term monastery denoted a hermit's cell or a group of cells surrounded by a protective wall. Later it applied to the dwelling of monks (coenobium) and clerics living a common life (monasterium canonicorum). In the West the word refers specifically to the houses of BENEDICTINES and of other orders derivatively using the BENEDICTINE RULE. St. BENEDICT employed the word 72 times in the Rule to mean either the physical structure of the abbey or the community living in such foundations. The houses of CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE also are called monasteries.

Despite the many inaccuracies of popular terminology in matters pertaining to the religious life, some elements of MONASTICISM have always remained reasonably constant. Only with reference to them can one speak properly of a monastery as the dwelling place of monks. The following seem to be the most basic distinguishing marks of the monastery in this restricted acceptance: (1) well-defined separation from the world and permanent attachment to the place of the monk's profession through the vow of stability; this is monasticism's principal identifying feature; (2) an almost complete autonomy of internal government of the individual house, despite legal provisions for membership in monastic congregations (1917 Codex iuris canonici c.488n1) and, since 1893, in the Confederation of the Benedictine Order under the abbot primate; (3) commitment to one of the classical rules of monasticism, today almost exclusively the Benedictine Rule for the West and those of St. BASIL for the East; and (4) concentration on work identified with the region, since a monastery's influence is usually wielded locally, in distinction to that of centrally controlled undertakings which call for large numbers of specially trained personnel.

The generic term "monastery" usually needs to be qualified for accuracy. Canon Law employs various descriptive phrases, such as independent (sui-juris) monasteries (1917 Codex iuris canonici cc.488n8; 494.1; elsewhere consistently), monasteries of nuns (c.497.1), exempt monastery (c.645), and similar terms. Popular designations are derived either from the superior's rank (abbey, priory) or from the nature of the work undertaken by the community (sanctuary, shrine, mission, house of studies). Both practices tend to reserve the use of the colorless "monastery" to legal terminology and scholarly treaties.

Simplicity marks the monastery's government. This was the desire of the great founders in their earliest establishments; it remains essentially unchanged today, in vivid contrast to the complexity and legal structure of the centralized orders. The impracticality of the hermits' vocation, and especially its moral deficiency in that it had offered no opportunity for the practice of charity (Basil, Long Rules, 7), were soon realized. The cenobitic ideal made capital of mutual cooperation and showed the great wisdom of centering everything about "the aid of many brethren" (Benedict, Rule of Monks 1, passim) working under the common father, the ABBOT, who is believed to hold the place of Christ in their midst.

The monastery's basic similarity with the human family, united in Christ, especially through the father, did not, surprisingly, command immediate attention. St. Basil emphasized it; St. Benedict, composing his Rule a century and a half later, with less copious, but far more judicious employment of scriptural sources, especially of the OT, was the first to make it his central theme. It was for the abbot, the spiritual father and Christ's representative living with his men, that Benedict's Rule was primarily written. Through him they became brothers to one another; under his spiritual formation and leadership they worked out the goals that constituted their ideal.

The monastery for which Benedict legislated was a group of men intent on seeking God (ch. 58); they were united in virtuous zeal (ch. 72) in serving Christ; they did so under "the guidance of the Gospel" (prologue), the precepts of the Rule, and the abbot's adaptation of the Rule's principles to existing conditions. The abbot's powers are today regulated largely by decrees of monastic congregations and more general pronouncements of the Church.

Ideally the group in a Benedictine monastery is to be large enough to facilitate corporate practice of monastic virtues on a generous scale (charity, obedience, humility, considerateness for others, serving Christ in them), yet small enough to preserve the character of a true family. Living under one roof, inspired and drawn forward by a man whom they elect for life as their abbot, the monks pray together (ch. 8–18, and elsewhere), work together (ch. 48), eat at a common table, serving one another in charity (ch. 35), vie with one another in the spirit of obedience (ch. 71–72), and assist one another in all things. Many famous abbeys of the past were modest in size; it was exceptional for membership to exceed 100; few today are larger.

So attached was Benedict to simplicity and unity of government in his monastery that his Rule provides for a sole superior. Reluctantly he conceded (ch. 65) the probable need of a prior, who is actually not a superior, but performs assigned tasks for the community at large and represents the abbot in his absence. By stated preference Benedict would rather have conducted the affairs of the community through deans, seniors who had charge of 10 monks each (ch. 21), in order to rule out all occasion of pride and vainglory. Today's share in the active apostolate requires the appointment of many officials with responsibilities in limited areas, but there remains the one superior, the abbot.

All monasteries are solemnly blessed in honor of a sacred mystery or a heavenly patron, particularly the Blessed Virgin, one of the Apostles, or saintly heroes of monastic life. Such is the nature of stability, however, that even some of the most famous houses in history and those currently thriving are almost invariably referred to by the name of the town where they are located rather than by their official name. trons of Ligugé, Monte Cassino, Metten, Cluny, or, today, Maredsous, Clérvaux, or Chevtogne. Locally they are the "abbey," the "priory," or the "monastery." Even in official documents they are referred to by the name of the local town.

MONASTERY, DOUBLE

The name given to monastic foundations or cloisters joined together under a common superior and bound by juridical and economic bonds. When the two monasteries were occupied by the same sex, as at Wearmouth-Yarrow or Stavelot-Malmédy, or the convent of women was enclosed in its own cloister, this type of foundation presented no problem. It was normal for nuns to put themselves under the direction of noted ascetical directors and to employ male religious in the care of their spiritual and temporal necessities. The superior of a men's monastery, by virtue of his priesthood and his experience, intervened in the direction of the nuns; and at times the abbess who might be of a superior social condition (a princess) controlled the temporal possessions of the convent and governed its inhabitants. The enthusiasm that accompanied the origins of monasticism tended to promote the condition of women in accordance with Gal 3.28, which suppressed the inequality of the sexes; and double monasteries took rise in this perspective. But dangers appeared when the first fervor had to be followed by juridical regulations.

St. PACHOMIUS governed a community founded by his sister in which the brothers took care of the material needs of the convent, but were forbidden to take meals there; and relations with the nuns were prudently regulated. The abundant Christian literature of the 4th century speaks frequently of the reserve with which virgins should deal with the male ascetics, in a fashion that does not supply for the absence of law; and the examples of double monasteries under St. Paula and St. Jerome at Bethlehem and of Rufinus of Aquileia and Melania the Elder at Jerusalem testify to a sane liberty similar to that encountered in Syria with the so-called "Sons of the Covenant" of the monastic settlements. The Basilian confraternities in Cappadocia, organized by St. BASIL on family estates, where mother and daughter set an example for their households, achieved a true unity in which children of both sexes were brought up together; but severe rules regulated communications between the grownups. St. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS speaks of this type of institution without criticizing it (Epist. 238), but St. Basil had to protect against him a certain deacon who had induced a group of young women to join him in an ascetical way of life (Epist. 169–171).

JUSTINIAN I in 529 demanded a rigorous separation of the sexes in monasteries (Cod. Just. 1.3.43), an order that he repeated with insistence in 539 and 546, using the term double monastery in this latter instance. The Council of Nicaea II (787) repeated this admonition and ordered the toleration of such institutions already in existence, but forbade new foundations. The patriarchs took similar measures in 810 and 1383, but without much success. Despite abuses in particular cases, the system was sustainable.

In the West in the 7th and 8th centuries there were numerous double monasteries: in Gaul at Faremoutiers, Jouarre, Remiremont, Chelles, Nivelle, and in Spain, England, and Ireland. In origin, however, this type of monastic foundation seems to have been spontaneous. The decline set in with the 9th century, but a new outbreak accompanied the spiritual movement of HIRSAU and of PRÉMONTRÉ in the 11th and 12th centuries and culminated in the Order of FONTEVRAULT. Although BURCHARD OF WORMS and Pope PASCHAL II echoed the Greek law, CALLISTUS II approved the institution with the proviso that proper precautions should be observed. Opposition came from the monastic milieu itself, and only the BRID-GETTINES maintained this type of organization until the end of the Middle Ages. By regulating the enclosure of the cloister, the Council of Trent put an end to the problem; it gave some difficulty when Latin regulations were applied to the Oriental churches united with Rome, particularly at the Maronite Synod of 1736.

MONASTIC SCHOOLS

Medieval schools conducted by monks and nuns within the confines of a monastery for the religious training and general education (1) of oblati, or youth who intended to enter the monastic or clerical life and lived at the monastery and (2) of externi, or youth who were preparing for public life and lived at home. Monastic schools are not to be confounded with monastic centers of study and culture for monks and nuns.

Origins and Aims. Although monasteries were originally intended exclusively as centers of asceticism, as early as the 4th century in both East and West they accepted even young children as pupils. Since according to the norms of monastic asceticism monks and nuns as a group were expected to read the Bible, its commentaries, and the lives of the saints, they felt obliged to teach the children to read these texts, and these alone. In the East, first St. PACHOMIUS (c. 320-340), then St. BASIL (c. 330–379) and St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM (c. 347–407) adopted this custom but these schools wielded little influence. The same system prevailed in the West at the monastery of St. Martin at Ligugé (founded in France in 361), St. Honorat of Lérins, and in some African abbeys in the 5th century (see LIGUGÉ, ABBEY OF; LÉRINS, ABBEY OF). Here, however, since Latin was no longer spoken, the need arose to teach it to the children as a foreign language. This led the monks to use profane authors, which they did very sparingly, since these literary studies were considered merely as an introduction to Sacred Scripture. In fact, education of children was not the original monastic aim, and until the 6th century, in keeping with St. Benedict's Rule, monasteries continued to be almost solely schools where one was instructed in "the Lord's service."

Organization. The number and age of the children varied, with the number usually small and some of the children very young, about six or seven years old. The majority, but not always all the children, were destined to become monks, either of their own desire or more often because their parents "offered" them to God in the monastery. Courses of study consisted primarily of learning to read Latin and secondarily of writing, chant, arithmetic, and learning how to read time on the sundial. The principal text was the Psalter.

From the 8th century on, mention is made of the seven liberal arts, divided into the trivium and quadrivi- um. These terms, however, indicate little more than literary themes, which had scarcely any influence on the programs of study. Actually, there was no precise program. Pupils simply passed from simple reading exercises to exercises in more difficult texts. Reading aloud was common practice, for it helped fix texts and ideas in the mind. Dialogue between pupils and master or among the pupils was also used. Sometimes the child was asked to recite before the master what he had learned. The master (magister or scholasticus) determined the method to be used. He had full power over the child, whom he kept under constant surveillance, held to a very strict discipline, and, particularly with adolescents, subjected to corporal punishments that at times were very severe. There were some instances, though very rare, of tenderness toward the children, who, if they were oblati, became monks or nuns regardless of age as soon as they had learned to read. They then left the school and devoted their time in the community to lectio divina, to meditation, and sometimes to study. The monks' books, which were different from those used in school, consisted mainly of texts by profane authors sometimes accompanied by a gloss.

This first type of school, called claustral, was destined primarily for future monks and situated within the monasteries. A second type, called nonclaustral, was intended for nonresident children and situated outside the enclosure. In more than one place, however, the latter were considered incompatible with monastic observance and consequently either suppressed or entrusted to seculars. It was loyalty to this typically monastic ideal that caused the Cistercians to refuse to operate schools. They were introduced into their order only much later and contrary to the ideals of the original foundation.

Significance. Although monastic schools in time showed some decline, their twofold organization continued virtually the same everywhere throughout the Middle Ages. The Carolingian renaissance in the 9th century, however, brought about a revival of monastic education and the rise of many schools that, despite their small enrollment, exercised a strong influence over an extended period of time. Among the most renowned were Clonmacnoise, Kildare, Clonard, Kells, Armagh, Bangor, in Ireland; Dumio, Braga, Liebana, St. Aemilian, in the Iberian peninsula; Bobbio, Monte Cassino, Farfa, Nonantola, in Italy; Wearmouth, Jarrow, York, Canterbury, Lindisfarne, Whitby, Malinesbury, in England; Fulda, Sankt Gall, Reichenau, in Germany; Gorze, Lobbes, St. Hubert, St. Amand, Liège, in Lotharingia; and Luxeuil, Aniane, Tours, Corbie, St. Wandrille, Fleury, Cluny, in France. Although the School of Bec in France was a "school of the Lord's service" and not strictly speaking an institution of learning, Lanfranc, prior at Bec and later archbishop, and Anselm, Lanfranc's student, sent out scholars whose influence was widely felt (see ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, ST.).

Some historians have attributed to the monastic schools of the Middle Ages too high a level of instruction. In some towns, it is true, especially in the 11th and 12th centuries, there were some schools, generally cathedral or episcopal, where higher studies were offered and where even some monks were educated. Two facts, however, must be noted. (1) Compared with episcopal, cathedral, or lay schools, monastic schools were more universal and continuous. This was particularly true until the end of the 8th century. (2) While the town schools gave rise to scholastic education, which was oriented toward speculation or pastoral action, monasteries favored humanism, the herald of a literary tradition more compatible with contemplative prayer and a liturgical cult.

MONASTICISM

An institution of ancient and medieval origins, establishing and regulating the ascetical and social conditions of the manner of religious life lived in common or in contemplative solitude.

1. Early Christian (to 600)

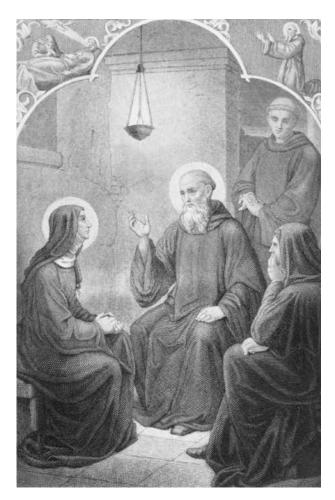

In describing the rise and development of Christian monasticism, this article deals with its background—the work of St. Anthony and the origin of Anchoritism, the contribution of Pachomius and the rise of Cenobitism; the life of the Desert Fathers—developments in Syria, Palestine, and Cappadocia; Constantinople; and the West.

Background. The primitive Church as a minority group and a community bearing witness to faith in Christ felt so strong in its creative newness and eschatological hope that, while being in the world, it was, on the whole, aware of not being of the world, of being a community of "saints." VIRGINITY was held in high regard, and among the poor classes the sharing of goods was relatively easy. Normally the tendency toward encratism did not harden into doctrinal opposition to marriage or the social order of the day. Its source was the gospel; it was not linked with a Manichaean dualism or scorn for created things.

Contacts with Gnostic currents, with the philosophical attitudes of Stoicism and Platonism, or again with the Eastern religions were inevitable and fruitful, though dangerous at times; clearly they did not go to the root of the movement, as Weingarten's outmoded theories claimed regarding the pagan recluses of the Serapeum. The foreshadowings of Christian institutions are to be sought in Israel; the desert spirituality, expressed in the lives of the prophets ELIJAH, Hosea, and JOHN THE BAP-TIST, was certainly in line with monasticism and had a considerable literary influence on its development. The ESSENES of the QUMRAN COMMUNITY near the Dead Sea and of Alexandria, of whom the description by PHILO JU-DAEUS is in part interpretative, bear a resemblance to the monks of the later monasteries that flourished in the same territory. However, there is no evidence of direct historical continuity between the two groups. It is probable that the Judeo-Christian communities, profoundly stamped with the tradition of the "poor of Yahweh" (see EBIO-NITES), transmitted their sentiment to the churches of Syria and perhaps to those of Egypt. It is not characteristic of the churches in the Greek stream of culture that are relatively better known.

Early in the 3d century, ORIGEN gave expression to an ascetic and mystical ideal that contained elements of GNOSTICISM and of Greek philosophy and was destined to have extensive influence on the Church's future. During the years when Christianity was making peace with the Empire, receiving the masses into its communion, but lowering its moral level, a powerful ascetical movement began to manifest itself with the constitution of a purely evangelical society on the fringes of the populated world. Occasionally this movement opposed itself to the hierarchy and gave rise to unorthodox sects. More often, however, ecclesiastical authority was respected by its saintly founders, and the movement became an institution within the Church. Initially it took the form of anchoritic societies; later, it developed into cenobitism and the founding of the lauras. Marxist interpretation describes this evolution as a seizure by the hierarchy of a popular revolutionary force; and this observation is not entirely false. Like primitive Christianity itself, monastic asceticism is a historical movement that transformed the ancient world and that can be said to have created the medieval society. Monasticism provided a spiritual aristocracy, scions of a new elite, that preserved a notable part of the ancient culture. Once in being, however, the monastic institutions were not always faithful to their original inspiration.

St. Anthony and Anchoritism. A son of Coptic peasants became the father of the monks; he proved to be the model, not the founder, of monasticism. According to his biographer, ANTHONY OF EGYPT (d. 356) retired to a retreat outside his native village at 20 years of age and died there when he was 105. However, the chronology of the period seems confused, and the beginning of the Egyptian anchorite movement should be dated closer to the year 300 than to 270. The first documentary (papyrus) evidence is supplied by the entourage of Meletius of Alexandria, a rival of Athanasius. It dates from c. 335. The Life of Anthony written by Athanasius of Alexandria (c. 357) stresses Anthony's austerity, the evangelical inspiration of his renunciation, his fight against the demons, and his zeal for orthodoxy. The demonology seems to be an accommodation to popular concepts, and the attention directed to his orthodoxy apparently stems from the concern of the biographer to strengthen the bonds between the hierarchy and monasticism. One thing is certain: Athanasius's own difficulties with the imperial authorities in the Arian controversies strengthened his alliance with the monks.

The impressions of a witness so close to the monastic movement, but himself not a part of it, must be compared with the authentic letters of Anthony. Beneath the somewhat vague concepts formulated by this uneducated old man, there are the pantheistic trends of Origen's thought, with the idea of a return via the Christ-image of God to the primitive soul-image, by means of an inner serenity that is achieved in perfect prayer. In his retreat in the desert between the Nile and the Red Sea, Anthony enjoyed an enormous prestige, because of his lofty and well-balanced ideal of asceticism and solitary contemplation, as well as his gift of discernment of spirits. A number of disciples began to imitate him, living in solitude, separated by great distances, and coming to him at long intervals for counsel.

Pachomius and Cenobitism. Farther to the south, at TABENNISI and Pebou in the THEBAID, a younger contemporary of Anthony, PACHOMIUS, who had become a monk c. 313, began organizing cenobitic communities (c. 320) that in his lifetime included several thousand brothers, not counting convents of women (see MONASTERIES, DOU-BLE). Endowed with an instinctive understanding of human nature, this Copt with no philosophical training founded monasteries that he divided into houses where men lived a disciplined life in common, performed remunerative work, and practiced individual poverty and detachment in essential matters, alternating with judiciously organized prayer. He had many visions of an apocalyptic type; and despite the profound respect he displayed toward ecclesiastical authority, trust in his charismatic gifts gradually brought him into opposition with the hierarchy (Synod of Latopolis), though not with Athanasius, in whom distance fostered comprehension.

Pachomius's successors, Orsiesi and Theodore, did not enjoy the outstanding prestige their master had acquired for himself, but they are attractive figures; the rules and the vitas forming the Pachomian legacy are partly their work. By a strange turn of history, these unsystematized rules that are nevertheless rich in experience had only a limited influence in the East; but they reached Italy in a Latin translation by St. JEROME, and there exercised a profound influence.

Desert Fathers. Ammonas, disciple of Anthony, was named bishop of OXYRHYNCHUS by Athanasius, probably to assure proper control and supervision of the masses of monks then multiplying in the region. He showed unusual mildness and forbearance toward those among them who were public offenders; he maintained the brothers in stability and coped with the problems occasioned by the charisms of the Spirit and revelations of heavenly mysteries. Ammonas is to be distinguished from Ammon, founder of the monastic colonies in the Nitrian Valley, who also was acquainted with Anthony, though he died before him. This Ammon had initially lived in virginal matrimony with his wife, a practice that recalls an archaic rule of Christian family asceticism and that, it is astonishing to note, was not condemned judging from available sources. In the great desert of Scete, a little to the south, MACARIUS THE EGYPTIAN (d. c. 390) collected fewer disciples, but achieved a more perfect and tranquil solitude.

Like Anthony and Pachomius, these monks supported Athanasius in his difficulties with ARIANISM and the civil authority; and Athanasius on his part made their merits known in the West. MELANIA THE ELDER, with RU-FINUS OF AQUILEIA and other Romans, visited them and on settling in Jerusalem devoted themselves to imitating their ascesis, their knowledge of Scripture, and their Origenism. In c. 382, EVAGRIUS PONTICUS provided the monks with the spiritual and intellectual legacy of the Cappadocians; he learned the monks' ascetical "alphabet" and profited from the treasures of psychological insights acquired by their long silences. Shortly after his death (399) a quarrel broke out among his friends and disciples, the Origenists, and the anthropomorphites. Archbishop THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA interfered ruthlessly and achieved control of the monastic groups, but not without damage to their gnosis and culture.

The main sources of information regarding this development bear the stamp of the crisis, although the traditions on which they are founded are considerably anterior to it. Of these documents, some were written for the edification of outsiders, such as the Historia Monachorum, produced c. 400 in the monastery of the Mount of Olives, and the Historia Lausiaca of PALLADIUS, published c. 420; both reflect the spirit of Evagrius in a popular coloration. For the internal use of Western monasticism, another thoroughly Evagrian author, John CASSIAN, wrote his memoirs in the form of Institutiones and Conferences. For the internal use of Eastern monasticism that had become anti-Origenist, there were compiled various collections of APOPHTHEGMATA, or Sayings of the Fathers, brief and charismatic replies to problems of the spiritual life.

The proper use of these various sources requires an acquaintance with the literary genres that evaluates each according to its individual worth. Traditional views have often succumbed to the temptation of evaluating them by the criteria of HAGIOGRAPHY; and rationalistic criticism, both Catholic and non-Catholic, has not always understood the monastic ideal or sufficiently recognized the gospel legacy and the freedom of spirit that characterized this literature. External witnesses aid in discerning and interpreting the facts, although the authors of these literary sources were themselves often the willing victims of the mirages of the desert. More recently, unpretentious evidence, badly transmitted by the copyists, has been rediscovered and edited from Eastern versions that were strictly contemporary and addressed to the monks themselves. These notices are of the greatest documentary value, and they make it possible to get behind the unsatisfactory syntheses that have hitherto supplied information on the origins of monasticism. They are furnished in the writings of Athanasius, SERAPION, Anthony, Ammonas, and Arsenius. In the effort to give an accurate picture R. Draguet and J. C. Guy have called attention to the value of the collections of apothegms. However, their value is still to be clarified.

Syria and Palestine. In the attempt to achieve a further understanding of the extent of the monastic beginnings, it must be remembered that the eastern provinces of the Roman Empire had easy commerce with one another: the primitive Gnostics and the Manichaeans of Syria and Egypt, for example, were in close contact. In the 3d century the ascetic movement in Mesopotamia was perhaps more advanced than that of any other part of the East. The name "abbot" is evidently of Syriac origin. The word "monk" may likewise have had an ambitious and Gnostic meaning linked with the Monogenos, the Only Son of God, although this interpretation and etymology is contested. It was certainly not current in the 4th century, when monachos had the simpler meaning of "solitary" (i.e., celibate) and quickly came to mean an anchorite.

Syria took longer than the West to react against the encratism of TATIAN and to eliminate his influence. In certain quarters Baptism was understood as an engagement involving continence, although the marriage of catechumens was not condemned; and the catechumens did amount to a sizable group. In the 4th century, Baptism did not exclude marriage; but within the communities there was a fervent nucleus, the Sons of the Covenant (b enai $q^e y \bar{a} m \bar{a}$), who preserved virginity and were more or less ministers of divine worship. They formed the humblest rank of the clergy and lived in a clerical family or among the clergy. The rules concerning these persons were specified only slowly. The Covenant was the acceptance of the New Testament concluded by Baptism, not a vow or an evangelical counsel. No major figure appeared among them in the 4th century; APHRAATES and St. EPHREM THE SYRIAN were exemplars rather than pioneers.

Under the Egyptian influence, it seems, a current of anchoritism manifested itself in that part of the Orient c. 360; numerous solitaries escaped all organized discipline, preferring to wander in wild and desert places, leading a primitive and eccentric life. Saints EPIPHANIUS OF CONSTANTIA and Ephrem the Syrian testify to the existence of lawless groups called Messalians (Syriac for "those who pray"), who rebelled against any work under the pretext that they had to consecrate themselves to perpetual prayer. They had a scorn for worldly goods and were more a scandal than an edification. Some, for all their oddity, did attract veneration; their achievements are described by THEODORET OF CYR in his Religious History. Of special note was Simeon the Stylite (d. 459), who lived in a basket between heaven and earth on a column more than 60 feet high. But great numbers, either spontaneously or under the influence of the episcopate, came to accept the way of life implicit in Basilian cenobitism. Their most notable centers were located near the Persian border, in Edessa, Amida, and Tur Abdin. From there a missionary monasticism spread over the southern part of ARMENIA and GEORGIA, and characterized the eastern missions of the Persian church.

The Syrian monastic world had its counterpart in the deserts of Judea and the hermitages of Sinai, with their close contacts with Egypt, and had a special character because of the sacred memories of the Holy Land. The spoudaei (zealots) attached themselves primarily to the holy places and provided them with protection and divine worship. Foreign pilgrims entered their ranks, often after having visited Egypt. In the 4th century, particularly, they had many Latin visitors, including Saints Jerome and Paula, the two Melanias and Rufinus, John Cassian, and Aetheria. Jerome embroidered or invented local traditions of his Life of Malchus and Life of Hilarion; he did the same for Egypt in his Life of St. Paul First Hermit. Later the same process can be observed among the Cappadocians, Armenians, and Georgians. The recognizable Syrian type is sometimes clothed with a Hellenistic veneer, especially when the subjects were men in the cities. Such was the case especially with DIODORE OF TARSUS and JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, at Antioch.

Cappadocia and Messalianism. The eastern part of Asia Minor came under the influence of Syria. At the Council of GANGRA (341) the Arianism of court bishops clashed with an ascetical movement led by EUSTATHIUS, future bishop of Sebaste. He was reproached with breaking up homes, misleading children, emancipating slaves, and departing from the obedience of the clergy to live independently in sectarian fashion. When he became bishop, Eustathius annoyed the extremists among his own disciples, e.g., Aetios, by preserving ecclesiastical discipline and organizing a hospice, for this supposed a certain compromise with the goods of this world. To his ideal rallied intellectuals of great families, such as Basil of Caesarea and GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS. They managed to combine asceticism with obedience to the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The result was a stable and balanced CENOBI-TISM, similar in a sense to that achieved by Pachomius. Gregory of Nazianzus preferred a more inward and contemplative life; it was through him that Evagrius Ponticus was to come to Scete.

After the death of Basil (379), his brother GREGORY OF NYSSA and his disciple AMPHILOCHIUS OF ICONIUM maintained contact with the ascetic movement in the hope of spreading their mystical ideal to the whole Church. However, they were soon faced with extravagances among the followers of Eustathius and did not succeed in controlling them. After 383, Bishops Letoios of Melitene, Amphilochius, and then Flavian of Antioch, in succession as the evil spread, took the initiative in condemning Dadoes, Sabas, Adelphios, Hermas, Simeon, and other leaders of the movement. This episcopal intervention had been provoked in part undoubtedly by previous experience. But the ascetics claimed they were in communion with the Church, and strategy had to be resorted to in order to get them to express openly their ideas on inner sanctification by the Holy Spirit and on the devices of the demon, conceptions that were dangerous for the sacramental structure of the Church.

To discredit these sects, the bishops linked them with the anarchic Messalians, despite the differences between the two groups. Their spiritual teaching has survived in the homilies improperly attributed to Macarius the Egyptian; the Liber graduum, a Syriac work, is closely allied. These writings are certainly susceptible of an orthodox interpretation and traditional support can be found for them: but they contain the theses condemned by the anti-Messalian councils. These condemnations and the polemic by a DIADOCHUS OF PHOTICE or a MARK THE HERMIT did not prevent them from having a beneficent influence on Byzantine mysticism (see HESYCHASM). They reached the West only at a comparatively late date, during the crisis that was caused by the Franciscan FRATICELLI and during the beginnings of PIETISM and METHODISM.

Constantinople. In the capital of the later Roman Empire, monasticism established itself c. 380; its original contacts were with Syria, but it manifested Egyptian influence when the Origenist monks were expelled by Theophilus of Alexandria (c. 400). The Lives of Hypatius (d. 446) and Alexander the Acoemete (d. c. 430) witness to this movement, although the latter is somewhat in the tradition of the Messalians and gives evidence of conflict with Church discipline. The disciples of John Chrysostom are known through a collection of the letters of NILUS OF ANCYRA (d. c. 430) and the works of Mark the Hermit. In the second half of the century, Daniel the Stylite (d. 493), an imitator of St. Simeon, was already playing a role in the capital.

Early Western Monasticism. The first centers of monasticism in the West were formed as a result of the exile of Athanasius in Rome, Treves, northern Italy, and Aquileia. The social structure of the Christian communities differed considerably from that of Egypt, but the Life of Anthony readily set the tone for men coming to the movement from higher society. A typical trait of Western monasticism was its penetration into the clergy in the service of the local Church. It is noticeable from the time of EUSEBIUS OF VERCELLI (d. 371), who, on his return from exile in the East, brought back the idea of a community life for his clergy; later the idea was put into practice by Ambrose of Milan and AUGUSTINE.

In northern Italy, MARTIN OF TOURS was trained in the monastic ideal before founding Marmoutier (372) in western France and becoming the model monk bishop of Gaul. After the death of Pope DAMASUS (384), monasticism temporarily lapsed into disfavor in Rome, although Jerome successfully discredited its adversaries Helvidius and Jovinian. In Spain, in this same period, PRISCILLIAN-ISM proved an analogous movement, but its orthodoxy was suspect, and its principals were persecuted by the episcopacy. In Africa, outside the zone of influence of Augustine, modern historians see traces of Messalianism, perhaps derived from the East. Marxist historians such as T. Büttner link monasticism with the Donatist movement of the Circumcellions who rebelled against the social system and went about the countryside violently imposing their religious opinions. The phenomenon is interesting for the light it sheds on one milieu of the origin of monasticism.

Jerome, Rufinus, Evagrius, and others had translated the Eastern monastic texts into Latin at an early date. At the beginning of the 5th century, Cassian in Provence brought a new influx of Eastern traditions with the avowed aim of reforming Gallic monasticism. The Latin genius was to multiply these monastic rules based on the original ideals as it assimilated the barbarians, until the day when Benedict of Nursia was to synthesize them all. By way of Gaul, particularly, was to be born the early Irish MONASTICISM that was later to bring the gospel and culture back to the Continent.

Conclusion. Monasticism was a development of primitive Christian asceticism along various lines; the anchoritic and cenobitic types were not the original nucleus but rather successful forms on which others patterned themselves. The monks had their own culture; it was independent of the classical world of antiquity and often arose from local popular traditions, Coptic or Syriac. The monks brought the Church an ideal of asceticism, forms of prayer such as the use of the Psalter, a rich experience of inwardness, and new literary forms. The movement became a triumphant power that, despite its resistance to cultural changes, was to give a distinguishing character to the Middle Ages.

2. Medieval (600–1500)

From the 6th into the 8th century, Western monasticism was not organized into an order, nor did it have a common rule. Eastern (see section 5 of this article), Celtic (see MONASTICISM, EARLY IRISH), and Benedictine elements combined to form various rules; 20 such mixed rules were in use in Gaul alone c. 600. In the course of the 7th century these rules incorporated ever larger portions of the Rule of St. COLUMBAN and the BENEDICTINE RULE; some Continental monasteries, e.g., LUXEUIL and FLEURY in Gaul, BOBBIO and the restored Abbey of MONTE CASSINO in Italy, came to adopt the Benedictine Rule as their norm of monastic life. As for England, even though the monastic allegiance of AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY and his fellow monks sent by GREGORY I the Great to convert England is unknown, the late 7th- and 8th-century Anglo-Saxon missionaries to the Continent were all Benedictine, and their many monastic foundations—for both men and women—were likewise Benedictine. The work of BONIFACE, followed by the encouragement and legislation of CHARLEMAGNE, made the Benedictine Rule obligatory for all monks and nuns under Carolingian authority. However, the monks and nuns of Celtic lands and Visigothic Spain held fast to their own patterns of monastic living for several centuries more.

Carolingian Era. The BENEDICTINES were the missionaries and the teachers in the Carolingian era who made the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE a reality. Their mission work to the Danes, Swedes, and Norwegians continued into the 10th century, as did their mission to the western Slavs and Hungarians. At home, the monks labored in the school and SCRIPTORIUM, writing theological, hagiographical, and historical works, and managed the abbey lands. But all this extramonastic activity provoked protests by BENEDICT OF ANIANE (see CAROLINGIAN REFORM). Under his leadership the monastic synod of Aachen in 817 decreed the elimination of extern work, the lengthening of the DIVINE OFFICE, common monastic customs or regulations for all monks, and regular VISITA-TION of all monasteries. From this time to the 12th century almost all monks in Europe were Benedictine, but most of this legislation remained largely a dead letter until Cluny adopted parts of it in the 10th century.

The decay of Carolingian authority in the state and the subsequent decentralization, which resulted in feudalism, made the abbey a feudal fief with the ABBOT a feudal lord with all attendant privileges and obligations. The contemporary invasions of NORMANS, Hungarians, and Saracens destroyed many abbeys, especially in France and Italy. However, observance in the monasteries in German lands east of the Rhine generally remained good, and they were thus able to play a leading role in Church and State under the Saxon and Salian rulers of the 10th and 11th centuries.

Cluniac Reform. Monastic renewal in the West began with the foundation of CLUNY in 910. It was fortunate in its saintly, capable, and long-lived abbots: ODO OF CLUNY, MAJOLUS, ODILO, HUGH OF CLUNY, and PETER THE VENERABLE. Under these men, Cluny—exempt from all secular and spiritual authority except that of the pope—created a centralized "Order" of Cluny (see CLUNIAC REFORM). All member monasteries were under the direct authority of the abbot of Cluny, all vows were made to him, and all superiors were appointed by him. Monks were not to be primarily missionaries or teachers, manual labor was curtailed, and the Divine Office was to be longer and more solemn.

The spirit of reform was, however, not exclusive to Cluny. Other centers grew up in Flanders and northern France under GERARD OF BROGNE near Liège, in Lorraine under JOHN OF GORZE at Metz, in Germany at HIRSAU, as well as in southern France, Italy, and Spain. The English revival was the work of the monk bishops DUNSTAN OF CANTERBURY, ETHELWOLD OF WINCHESTER, and OSWALD OF YORK. Their program for English Benedictinism was outlined in the Regularis Concordia.

New Monastic Orders. The number of monastic foundations grew steadily. The great churchmen between the 10th and the 12th centuries—the so-called Benedictine centuries—were monks; as bishops and popes they successfully spearheaded the struggle of the Church for freedom from secular authority (see GREGORIAN RE-FORM). Centers of monastic renewal emphasizing the eremitic and contemplative ideals of early monasticism were created by Romuald at CAMALDOLI, PETER DAMIAN at FONTE AVELLANA, and at VALLOMBROSA by JOHN GUAL-BERT in the 11th century. In 1084 BRUNO OF COLOGNE set up the first Carthusian hermitage at La Grande Chartreuse, thus founding an order that by the 15th century would include over 190 charter-houses throughout Europe, all faithful to the ideals of the founder. Other Benedictine-based reform groups, each with its own set of ideals, were founded in the 11th and 12th centuries: GRANDMONT, Sauve Majeure, CHAISE-DIEU, FON-TEVRAULT, and SAVIGNY. (See GILBERTINES; PREMON-STRATENSIANS; HOSPITALLERS AND HOSPITAL SISTERS; MILITARY ORDERS.)

The most important 12th-century foundation and the professed rival of Cluny was the CISTERCIAN ORDER. Its founders, ROBERT OF MOLESME and STEPHEN HARDING, stressed a stricter interpretation of the Benedictine Rule, setting out their ideals and constitutional structure in the Charta caritatis. Their original program was purely contemplative and ascetic with emphasis on silence, poverty, and manual labor. But since they could not abolish the idea of the monk priest, they were soon obliged to turn the heavy manual work over to lay brothers, whose industry and skill created the great Cistercian abbey estates. Constitutionally, the Cistercians safeguarded the autonomy of every abbey; necessary unity in the order was achieved by means of annual general chapter meetings and visitations. The growth of the order was unparalleled in monastic history. Candidates flocked to the new foundations. Many older Benedictine monasteries joined the new order. By 1300 there were about 700 monasteries for men and a larger number for CISTERCIAN NUNS. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX was in great part responsible for the initial growth of the order. His European reputation placed it in the midst of Church and State affairs; his energy inspired the Second CRUSADE and three Cistercian archbishops were the religious leaders of the Third Crusade. Cistercian monks soon served as diplomats and in the Roman Curia. They headed the mission to the ALBIGENSES and converted the pagans of Prussia and the Baltic area.

However, tensions arose in the order even before the death of Stephen Harding. Rivalry between the abbot of CÎTEAUX and the daughter houses threatened to become chronic. Distant abbeys tended to go their own way. The practice of COMMENDATION, the Black Death, the WEST-ERN SCHISM, the Hundred Years' War, and the Hussite Wars had their repercussions. Changes in administration and papal legislation were of some help, but attendance at the general chapters kept falling off from the second half of the 14th century onward, so that in the years of religious crisis rarely would even 30 abbots attend the annual gathering.

The 13th and 14th Centuries. The general monastic picture of the 13th and 14th centuries was uninspiring. Some abbeys retained a high level of regular observance; the "Orders" of the CELESTINES, of Sylvestrine, and of Olivetan BENEDICTINES founded in this era still survive. Most monastic foundations, however, were in spiritual doldrums. Leadership in Christian scholarship had passed to the universities and dedicated religious vocations gravitated to the MENDICANT ORDERS. Reasons for this decline in monastic life are varied. Many abbeys were too much involved in secular affairs, some had become resthouses for members of the nobility, and others had purposefully limited the number of monks so that the professed monks would have more income. The Hundred Years' War often forced monks to live outside their cloisters; the Black Death and the pernicious commendatory system were causes of decline over which the monks had no control. The abbatial office and that of other monastic officials were treated as benefices. Frequently the sense of personal poverty all but vanished. Reform efforts of higher ecclesiastical authority availed but little. The decrees of the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (1215), the efforts of Popes HONORIUS III, GREGORY IX, and BENEDICT XII failed to overcome the general inertia and the opposition of the local ordinaries.

The 15th Century. Eventually, effective revival came from within the Benedictine family with the birth of the late medieval congregations, especially the highly centralized congregations of St. Justina of Padua and PANNONHALMA in Hungary. Other congregations preserved the autonomy of the member abbey but placed it under the supervision of the general chapter and its officials. Many abbeys joined the congregations of KASTL, MELK, BURSFELD, or WINDESHEIM in German lands, Valladolid in Spain, and CHEZAL-BENOÎT in France.

The ideal monk of these monasteries was pious and book-loving, and his cell was the nursery of 15th-century humanism. These monks loved the Benedictine Rule, but the spiritual doctrine taught by the great abbots of the new congregations, such as John Rode, Luigi Barbo, García de CISNEROS, and Johannes TRITHEMIUS, was that of the DEVOTIO MODERNA.

3. Modern (1500–1960)

Like so much of the Catholic Church's renewal in the 16th century, monasticism looked to the Council of Trent for new impetus. Prior to the Council, there had been some efforts at reform (e.g. Valladolid in Spain, St. Justina in Italy, Melk and Bursfeld in German-speaking territories), but these were minimal in terms of their ability to mobilize a widespread movement of Benedictine reform throughout Europe. By the time of the Council of Trent's opening, the monasteries of England had already been effectively closed by virtue of the dissolution under Henry VIII. The disparate character of the monastic life throughout Europe was in need of unification. This was provided by canon eight of the Council's last session, requiring all monasteries to ally themselves as members of a particular monastic congregation. Although an effort was made to preserve the traditional monastic autonomy of each house, implementation and enforcement of conciliar decrees frequently fell to the local bishop. Monasteries of women were to remain under the jurisdiction of the Holy See or the local bishop. The minimum age for profession of monks was 16; monastic women could make perpetual profession only after they had reached 21 years of age. Forbidden against the vow of poverty were personal ownership and landholdings, a blow against the commendam practice of previous centuries. Most important for the success of the reforming spirit, all exempt monastic houses were to affiliate with into a congregation, with general chapters and regular visitations.

Response to the Tridentine decrees varied according to the locale. The Congregation of Santa Justina in Italy, once affiliated with the ancient abbey of Monte Cassino, became the Cassinese Congregation. It grew in number in the years following Trent, having 14 new monasteries enter the congregation in the 16th and 17th centuries and producing a number of bishops and cardinals as leaders of the Church. In 1566 the Portuguese Congregation of Lusitanian was established, modeled on the already existent Valladolid Congregation. In Austria, the restored Congregation of Melk was reestablished (1617). The old German Bursfeld Congregation expanded as the Swabian Congregation (1603), the Congregation of Strasbourg (1623), the diocesan Congregation of Salzburg (1641), the Bavarian Congregation of the Holy Angels (1684) and the Congregation of Augsburg (1685). Under Einsiedeln Abbey, the Swiss Congregation was formed (1602) and in the Netherlands the Congregation of the Presentation (1628). The reformed congregation of Valladolid in Spain was extended in the 16th century to Mexico and Peru with the missionary ventures to the New World. Another Portuguese Congregation of Brazil was formed in 1582. The English Benedictine Congregation was formally established in exile on the continent in 1619. Perhaps the most influential of the new congregations were found in France. The Congregation of St. Vanne (1604) was modeled on the Cassinese Congregation and under Didier de la Cour spread throughout France, gaining a reputation for scholarly work. Even more of a commitment to intellectual life was rendered by the Congregation of St. Maur (1621). Noted for its house at St. Germain-des-Prés in Paris, the Maurists flourished throughout the following century, producing such eminent figures in scholarship as Gregory Tarrisse, Luc d'Archery and Jean MABILLON.

New congregations of women in France included the Catherine de Bar's Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and the Congregation of Calvary from Fontevrault. In the 17th century there were also reformed abbesses renewing the monastic life at places such as MONTMARTRE, Val-de-Grace and Saint-Paul-les-Beauvais. By 1660 there were 18,000 Benedictine nuns in France, about twice the number as there were in 1600. Also in France the English Benedictines in exile at Douai and Cambrai found in Dame Gertrude MORE and others a rich vein of spiritual writing to help them in their own renewal. The Congregation of Kulm under Magdalene Morteska helped to lead reform in German-speaking lands.

Another arm of reform came from the Cistercian branch of monasticism. The Trappists (Order of Cistercians of Strict Observance) under Abbot Armand de RANCÉ received papal approval in 1678. In 1712 papal approval was given to the Congregation of Mechitarists, a group that represented the ancient traditions of Eastern monasticism.

Apart from the spiritual vein of renewal, Benedictine monasteries were in the forefront of spreading the best baroque standards of art, architecture and music. The Austrian, German and Swiss monasteries were especially noteworthy in this enterprise.

Secularization. By the 1700s, however, the monastic order was again being threatened by elements of the Enlightenment, monarchical government and secularizing influences. The Enlightenment critique of the Catholic Church included the monasteries, which it identified with the ancien régime. The anti-clerical and Masonic literature of the century reflected this as did the policies of the secularizing governments of Austria (1750 to 1790) and the Czarist regime in Russia and Poland. In the second half of the 18th century the first dissolutions of French monasteries took place, culminating in the complete suppression of all monastic houses at the time of the French Revolution. The September Massacre and many other bloody reprisals against the Church by the revolutionary government included Benedictines as their victims. In the last decades of the century, Emperor JOSEPH II of Austria suppressed numerous Benedictine abbeys in Austria, Bohemia, Hungary and areas of Poland. Monasteries in the Netherlands and Switzerland were forced to close their doors in 1796. The Napoleonic Wars increased the threat to Benedictine life. Throughout Italy, Prussia, Silesia and Germany, countless monasteries were secularized by governments unfriendly to any form of organized religious life. In Spain, the monasteries were suppressed by Joseph Bonaparte in 1809. By 1810, it was said there were fewer monasteries in existence in Western Europe than at any time since the age of St. Augustine.

The 19th-Century Revival. Even as the monastic order in Europe reached its nadir at the beginning of the 1800s, indicators of rebirth were evident. In 1802 the suppressed abbeys of Hungary formed a new congregation from the royal monastery of Pannonhalma. English monks who had fled from the French oppression founded abbeys at AMPLEFORTH (1802) and DOWNSIDE (1814). Benedictine nuns from Cambrai in France did the same, establishing communities at Colwich in 1795 and later founded the monastery of STANBROOK. In Bavaria, King Ludwig I restored the Abbey of METTEN (1830) and the Benedictine convent of Eichstätt, which was in turn to become influential in shaping other Bavarian abbeys into the Bavarian Congregation.

The real germ of the 19th-century revival, however, was to be found in France. In 1833 a diocesan priest, Prosper GUÉRANGER, founded an abbey at the ancient monastic site of SOLESMES. Modeled on the medieval ideal of Cluny and a return to ancient monastic sources, Solesmes became a center of liturgical life and scholarship. It marked the beginning of the French Congregation (now known as the Solesmes Congregation) and gave birth to other foundations at Ligugé and Marseilles. Solesmes also helped to found the Sisters of St. Cecilia under Cecile Bruyère, a companion reform to the monks. Another French diocesan priest, Jean-Baptiste Muard, founded an abbey at Pierre-qui-vire (1850) that incorporated elements of strict observance and missionary activity. In France there also emerged the Benedictine Nuns of the Heart of Mary (Pradines), the Benedictine sisters of the Poor (Solesmes), the Adorers of the Heart of Jesus (Montmartre) and the Congregation of Missionary Benedictines (Ligugé).

In Italy, Pietro Casaretto transformed SUBIACO into a reform center (1851) and then went on to form the Subiaco Congregation. This congregation absorbed abbeys across the European continent and was known for its missionary impulse. It was this congregation, through the labors of Spanish Benedictines Joseph Serra and Rosendo Salvado, which brought a Benedictine presence to the Australian continent, along with the work of English Benedictines.

Another branch of the 19th-century revival came from the foundation at BEURON in the Black Forest (1863), made by two German brothers, Maurus and Placidus WOLTER. Modeled in many aspects on Solesmes, the Beuron Congregation was influential in a return to the sources of monastic life and a concentration on liturgical renewal. Indeed, the abbeys of MAREDSOUS and Mont-César in Belgium, centers for the liturgical movement, formed part of the Beuronese Congregation, as did the German abbey of MARIA LAACH. A Beuronese monk, Andreas Amrheim, was to found still another new Congregation of St. Ottilien (1884), missionary in orientation. Allied to the monks of St. Ottilien were the Benedictine missionary sisters of Tützing.

The missionary thrust of the 19th-century revival was a pronounced part of its impetus. In addition to sending monks to Africa, Australia and South America, this was the time when monasticism came to North America. The most forceful figure in this venture was Boniface Wimmer, who became archabbot of the monastery of ST. VINCENT's in Pennsylvania (1846) and spearheaded the birth and growth of the American Cassinese Congregation. Swiss monks made similar foundations at ST. MEINRAD (1854) and Conception (1871) and there were large numbers of Benedictine sisters from monastic houses in Germany and Switzerland who accompanied them.

The fruits of this revival were seen not just in rapidly expanding numbers but also in a more centralized structure. Under Pope Leo XIII there was a revival of the monastery of Sant'Anselmo in Rome as a central house of studies and an attempt to organize a confederation of Benedictine congregations. A Congress of Abbots was held (1893) and the position of abbot primate created to constitute a more unified Benedictine character. Among new congregations added in the first part of the 20th century were the Belgian Congregation (1920), the Austrian Congregation (1930) and the Bohemian Congregation of St. Adalbert (1945).

Many Church leaders, as well as liturgical and spiritual writers, reflected the revitalized monasticism of the early 20th century. Cardinals GASQUET, DUSMET and PITRA epitomized the scholarship of the Benedictine revival. Such writers as BEAUDUIN and Botte, BUTLER and CHAPMAN, MARMION and MORIN, served as examples of the fruits of a return to Scriptural and Patristic sources. The growth in numbers was paralleled with a growth in physical plants, especially in Europe and North America.

The 20th century was not without its challenges to monasticism. The punitive legislation passed by governments of Germany, France and Italy at the end of the 19th century slowed the progress of monasticism in those countries. Even more devastating were the two world wars that marked the first half of the century. The devastation of so much of the monastic patrimony of Europe in those wars was reflected in the destruction of the abbey of Monte Cassino by Allied bombers and the wholesale loss of life and property experienced by many monastic houses, to say nothing of priceless manuscripts and books contained in monastic libraries. The period after World War II resulted in another resurgence of monastic growth, especially in the United States. There was a strong contemplative movement that accompanied the popularity of the best-selling autobiography of Thomas MERTON, a monk of Gethsemane in Kentucky. It was reflected not only in growing numbers flocking to Cistercian houses but in new communities of Benedictine men and women that turned away from traditional apostolic works of education and pastoral work and became centers of prayer and liturgical life.

The 20th century was not without its record of political persecution of Benedictines. Monks from Silos Abbey were expelled from Mexico in 1913. In the Spanish Civil War in 1936 monks of the abbey of Pueyo suffered a collective martyrdom. Benedictines were driven from mainland China after World War II. With the suppression of monastic houses in Communist territories, there was an increased emigration of monks from Eastern Europe and Asia to other countries.

There was also a strong missionary thrust, this time directed to Latin America, Asia and Africa. By the 1950s there were thriving Benedictine communities in Argentina and Mexico, Vietnam and India, Morocco and Madagascar. A number of Benedictines served as bishops in missionary countries.

4. Contemporary (1960–2000)

The decade of the 1960s marked not only the decisive event of Vatican Council II (1962 to 1965) but also another period of intense renewal of monastic life. This was accomplished through a full spectrum of changes: structural changes in the constitutions of Benedictine congregations, the introduction of the vernacular in the liturgical prayer of communities, the changed patterns of ministry or apostolic work taken on by many communities, a comprehensive reevaluation of monastic spirituality as it came to terms with the modern world and new challenges that came through interacting with that world. At the same time, this period initiated a time of marked demographic change, with decreased numbers from Benedictine houses in Europe and North America, and increased numbers from the sub-continents of Africa, India and South America.

The conciliar call for all religious to return to the sources of their charism led to a flowering of new monastic scholarship. Benedictines such as Jean LECLERCQ, Adalbert de Vogüé and Cypriano Vagaggini led a new wave of Benedictine scholars, intent upon distilling the best of Benedictine tradition of scholary work and extending it to a wider readership. The Benedictine Pontifical University of Sant'Anselmo in Rome offered an international venue for this to take place, particularly with its Liturgical and Monastic Institutes. Centers for study and publishing in other parts of the monastic world, such as Collegeville, Minnesota, in the United States, also attracted large numbers of Benedictine students and scholars.

Benedictines exercised considerable leadership in renewal efforts of religious life in the period after the Council. American Benedictine Rembert Weakland, elected as abbot primate in 1967, did much to promote the renewal of liturgical life. He also broadened contacts with houses of Benedictine women and supported the growing influence of monasticism in Third World countries. In the Roman Curia, Cardinal Augustine Mayer played a significant role under Pope JOHN PAUL II in expediting the religious renewal of communities of consecrated life and later serving as liaison with the Society of St. Peter. Cardinal Basil HUME, a monk and abbot of Ampleforth Abbey before being named archbishop of Westminster, was widely recognized as a spokesman and spiritual figure of influence in the European Church.

The Benedictine Order itself was enlarging its membership. By the 1970s, the Vallombrosan (1966), Camaldolese (1966), Olivetan (1960) and Sylvestrine (1973) branches of Benedictinism had entered the Benedictine Confederation. There was now a Dutch and Slavic (1969) Congregation and the Benedictine houses of Latin America formed the Cono-Sur (1976) Congregation. This period was also a time of marked growth in non-Catholic Benedictine houses. The Anglican and Lutheran Churches were witnessing the renewed growth of monastic communities in their denominations. In addition, there was a concerted effort to engage in dialogue with non-Christian monastics. The Bangkok Conference of 1968, at which the Trappist Thomas Merton suffered his unexpected death, was one of these. The work of English Benedictine Father Bede GRIFFITHS and Henri le Saux in India signaled an entirely new ground for combining elements of Hindu practice with Catholic monasticism. A number of organizations such as the North American Board for East-West Dialogue and Monastic Interreligious Dialogue actively sought to carry on the exchange of ideas between Catholic monks and those of other faiths. Examples of Benedictine monasteries in the forefront of ecumenical work included Chevetogne in Belgium and Bose in Italy. This was also a period when the popularity of the Benedictine-based ecumenical monasticism of Taizé was achieving unprecedented attention.

The missionary impulse was alive and well in this period. The decade of the 1960s had seen an unprecedented commitment of monastic personnel sent to Latin America. Although a number of the foundations made did not pass the test of time because of local political instability and a dearth of indigenous vocations, many Benedictine foundations became integral parts of the local Church in Latin America. Africa and Asia were also geographic sectors of renewed Benedictine growth in the last years of the 20th century.

The decades at the end of the 20th century witnessed the return of a more vibrant monastic life to countries that had long suffered from political oppression under Communist rule. This was the case in Vietnam after the difficult period of war and internal discord. It was especially so in the countries of Eastern Europe after the fall of Communism in 1989. Many of the restrictions formerly imposed on monastic houses in Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia were lifted. In countries such as Lithuania, Slovakia and the Czech Republic an entirely revitalized form of monastic life was nurtured with the help of material and human resource from monasteries of the free world.

A variety of experiments in monastic life were part of the post-conciliar period. There were new efforts at both an urban monasticism and a return to eremitical life. The CHARISMATIC RENEWAL movement of the 1970s found its way into a number of Benedictine houses, notable the monastery of Our Lady of Guadalupe in Pecos, New Mexico. The 1980s and 1990s were marked by the genesis of a number of new monastic communities of men and women whose common heritage was a retrieval of more traditional practices, characterized by a full round of the Divine Office, use of the full religious habit, and a more cloistered existence. More communities were divesting themselves of active apostolic ministries and becoming centers for prayer and retreats. In this period as well there was a flowering of new forms of monastic art, architecture and music.

Monasticism was distinguished much more by its international character and its pluralism in the last decades of the 20th century. Technology expedited an ease of communication among far-flung monasteries and this was buttressed by frequent encounters and personal exchanges among monastics of different houses. Another prominent feature was the surge in growth of lay associate or oblate programs, in which many committed lay people, Catholic and non-Catholic, affiliated themselves with particular monasteries. Monastic practices such as lectio divina also became accessible to a wider public and so did the interest generated in monastic spirituality on the part of the entire Church.

There was a decline in numbers that had taken place from 1965 to 2000. In 1965 there were over 12,000 monks and over 23,000 Benedictine women throughout the world. At the end of the second millennium in 2000 there were just over 8,400 monks and over 17,000 Benedictine women. However the variety of women's congregations had grown to 63 and for the men there were 82 congregations or independent abbeys. The numerical decline was also less than that suffered by other major religious orders in the same period. These figures pointed to a vitality and diversity in the monastic order at the beginning of the third millennium that was very much in keeping with the Benedictine charism.

5. Eastern

Byzantine monasticism is not divided into specialized orders and congregations as in the West; nor has it an organized unity. The conciliar and imperial legislation on the matter is summary, and the Rule of St. Basil is but a monument of experience and tradition, without legal binding force. In addition to CENOBITISM, there have been various forms of the eremitical life; and since the 9th century, anyone (often it was a layman) founding a monastery drafted the typikon of his house to his own taste.

a. To 1453. It is almost impossible to make a list of the early monasteries, since many were but precariously maintained hermitages. For the city of CONSTANTINOPLE, R. Janin has nonetheless succeeded in establishing a catalogue of 325 monasteries, several of which may be duplicates, since monasteries changed names in the course of time. A similar list covering the remainder of the empire is in preparation in the same collection. It will furnish a precise basis for general study. This section is limited to a brief chronological survey of the most significant events.

Egypt and Palestine. The initial period has been treated separately (see section 1 above), for it is of cardinal importance and the innovations spread rapidly throughout the Christian world. From the end of the 4th century, Egypt was more isolated, except for the group at Nitria known from the Apophthegmata Patrum. In the south, in the White Monastery, SHENOUTE OF ATRIPE (d. 466) and Besa (d. after 474) were personages well known from their Coptic works, but they had almost no influence outside of Egypt. In the north, which was troubled very early with MONOPHYSITISM (except among the Pachomians of Canopus, bulwark of the Chalcedonian patriarchs), development of monasticism ran closely parallel with that of the East but produced no figures of first rank. Syria also was hard hit by Monophysitism, except for the monasteries of St. Simeon and of St. Maron; the Plerophoriae of John Rufus (Patrologia orientalis, ed. R. Graffin and F. Nau, 8:1), written shortly after 512, and the Lives of the Eastern Saints (Patrologia orientalis, v.17–19) of JOHN OF EPHESUS (d. 586) give a picturesque description of them. Spiritual writers such as PHILOXENUS OF MABBUGH were already outside the mainstream of Byzantine tradition.

The most active monastic center in the 5th century was Palestine, which attracted vocations from everywhere. The Monophysite centers there were moderate and highly cultured. The highest traditions of the Egyptian desert from the 4th century were maintained; representative authors inspired by the works of EVAGRIUS PONTICUS include Abbot Isaias (d. 488), Peter the Iberian (d. 488), and John and Barsanuphius with their disciple Dorotheus of Gaza (d. after 560); the PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS probably belongs to this group. Along the Jordan and in the Dead Sea region were Chalcedonian lauras, whose monks were less well read and perhaps more austere. CYRIL OF SCYTHOPOLIS (late 6th century) has provided excellent biographies of several of them: e.g., EUTHYMIUS THE GREAT (d. 473), SABAS (d. 532), and Theodosius (d. 529). Monasticism, in penetrating this region, led to a violent crisis of Origenism from about 540 to 552. (See ORI-GEN AND ORIGENISM.) With the assistance of Justinian I the mischief was brutally extirpated. The most vital center of orthodox monasticism shifted to Sinai (c. 600), where Justinian had built a fortified monastery. The Ladder of Paradise by JOHN CLIMACUS synthesizes the whole of this ascetic and mystical tradition.

Constantinople. In the Byzantine capital the monks maintained the Chalcedonian tradition with vigor, notably the Acoemeti and the monks of the monastery of Dalmatos. With the Christological crisis, the monks of the East everywhere adopted extremist positions, not hesitating to withdraw from the jurisdiction of their bishops, often at the invitation of a neighboring bishop. It is understandable that the Council of CHALCEDON (451), its eyes opened by the Robber Council of EPHESUS (449), should have taken measures to put the monks under the charge of the bishops (c.4), and that Justinian should have legislated to the same effect (Corpus iuris civilis, Novellae, ed. R. Schoell and G. Kroll, 5, 133). Nevertheless it was the power of the monks, the goad of the masses, that was responsible for the creation of an independent Jacobite Church [see JACOBITES (SYRIAN)], which often backed linguistic and ethnic groups striving for autonomy. The unwillingness of such groups to compromise was only rarely (e.g., in Palestine) mollified by a literary culture. The monks' work of evangelization on the fringes of Christendom in ARMENIA, GEORGIA, and ARABIA, to say nothing of the Persian form of monasticism, (which had already been cut off from the Byzantine world) deserves to be stressed.

Middle Byzantine Period. The Persian invasion, and later the Arab conquest, split the Eastern provinces and Egypt from the empire; Monophysite monasticism became isolated and disappeared from Byzantium. Some orthodox monks fled to Byzantium and the Western provinces, bringing with them some manuscripts. The times were not favorable for great literary works but only for spiritual FLORILEGIA. In 692 the Council of Trullo tried to work out monastic legislation. Soon the crisis over ICONOCLASM, in part a military and imperial reaction against the influence and wealth of the monks, aggravated the situation and culminated in a persecution (754 to 764). Some colonies of hermits, itinerant, poor, and little organized, nevertheless continued to exist, notably on Mt. Olympus in Bithynia.

Studite Foundations. Plato and THEODORE, the future Studite, withdrew with their family to Mt. Olympus at the end of the 8th century. They took in hand a strict cenobitic reform based on the writings of St. BASIL and on Palestinian monasticism, first in the monastery of the Saccudium and later, in 709, in the STUDION monastery of the capital itself. Strong in their moral authority, they were often vigorous opponents of the emperor and his patriarch. Their poverty and work, their copying of manuscripts, with the spread of the new minuscule script, and the number of monks (more than 700) all prove the value of this reform, which opened the most splendid period of Byzantine monasticism. Sumptuous foundations began to multiply, and libraries were created in them, bringing together treasures of Christian literature that have since enriched Paris, Rome, and Moscow. The most vital monastic centers, such as northern Italy (see BASILIAN MONASTICISM), Mount ATHOS, and Russia, were profoundly marked by the Hypotyposis of the Studites.

The persecutions of the second iconoclast crisis served only to give the Studites the prestige of confessors. The Synod of Constantinople held in 861 endeavored to prevent abuses attendant on the increase of foundations and the authoritarian interference of the founders in the life of the communities. It imposed a three-year novitiate. This was also the age in which the distinction came to be widespread between the "minor habit," signifying a less demanding form of life devoted to manual labor, and the "angelic habit," a higher rank reserved to those who gave themselves exclusively to prayer. The distinction seems to have originated in Palestine (7th century) and finally came to be accepted despite the long opposition of the Studites. It can be interpreted as a reaction against legislation and an effort to safeguard the spiritual character of monasticism (that of the angelic habit).

In the 10th century, Mount Latros housed a number of flourishing monasteries. In 956 St. ATHANASIUS the Athonite founded at Mount Athos, till then a peninsula of hermits, the cenobitic monastery of Lavra, soon to be followed by other large houses of Slavs, Georgians (Iviron), and even Latins. Christodoulos (d. 1101) founded an important monastery on Patmos.

Mystic Revival and Hesychasts. The most remarkable event of 11th-century Eastern monasticism was undoubtedly the appearance of a mystic revival with Symeon the New Theologian (d. 1022), who came from the Studite tradition but was dissatisfied with the too disciplinary and too exterior conceptions of holiness that in the course of time had developed even in the most reformed type of cenobitic life.

As opposed to the ancient anchorites, the Hesychasts of the school of Symeon lived and worked in communities, but they championed a demanding conception of union with God, in line with the teaching of St. Anthony, the Apophthegmata, Dorotheus, and the Messalianswho stressed the importance of the cell, silence, and reading. Obviously peace and silence were thought of preeminently as interior dispositions and involved the elimination of distraction with a view to pure prayer. But the insistence on the psychological experience of the union with God and on pneumatism led Simeon, and still more his disciple and biographer NICETAS STETHATOS (d. c. 1080), to reserve the direction of souls and teaching to those who had had charismatic spiritual gifts, at the risk of disqualifying the hierarchical power. The Byzantine tradition had generally confided the direction of consciences to the monks, even those not priests, but this was now formulated as a doctrine. The spirituals provoked a reaction, doubtless excessive, against Michael Psellus and against the claim of the lay philosophers to teach in the Church. Nicetas Stethatos, furthermore, was among the anti-Latin polemicists in 1054.

Late Byzantine Period. The 13th century, the period of the conquest of Constantinople by the Crusaders, was a time of ruin and decline, but also of renewal. In the 14th century the Hesychast tradition found its greatest Doctor in Gregory PALAMAS. Western authors who have studied this period and made scholarly and doctrinal contributions concerning it often adopt a hostile attitude toward Palamas because of his opposition to Thomism. His distinction between the incommunicable essence of God (to save His transcendence) and His communicable uncreated operations (to safeguard mystical "Taboric" illumination) appears strange to the scholastic mind, but it eventually became the accepted doctrine in Byzantium (after violent controversies) and is a most felicitous characterization of the soul of Byzantium.

The HESYCHASM of Mount Athos was united to a psychophysical method, the continual repetition of the JESUS PRAYER while fixing the gaze on a point of the body, in rhythm with breathing, in order to make the spirit descend into the heart. This technique, which used to be ridiculed, attracted the attention of 20th-century psychologists, and the importance it ascribes to the body no longer seems unjustified. It should not in any case be considered more than a method for concentrating attention.

The Turkish invasion soon put an end to monasticism at Constantinople itself. Mount Athos, Patmos, monasteries of the Meteora in Thessaly, St. Sabas, and Sinai maintained flourishing Greek monastic republics, while the Slavic world took up the tradition and extended it.

Recruiting to the monastic life has become very difficult in the East; a modern ideal of culture and social action has not readily assimilated the traditions of monasticism or those who incarnate them. But it appears that the Western world is beginning to appreciate the human and Christian treasure of Hesychasm and ascetical contemplation.

b. Since 1453. The importance of the study of Eastern monasticism was stressed by Pius XII when speaking to the participants of a congress on Eastern monasticism (Rome 1958). He pointed out that the Eastern monastic institutions are the basis for all other forms of Christian monasticism.

Forms and Terminology. The anchoritism begun by St. Anthony of Egypt (d. 356) was subjected to a critical reappraisal by St. Basil the Great (d. 379) in his rule. From that time, the ideal of common life, cenobitism, prevailed widely also in the Orient. But the tendency toward a solitary life was never completely extinguished. Solitude (eremia) was considered indispensable for hesychia, i.e., internal tranquility, a word that developed into a whole ascetical program, HESYCHASM, one of the most important currents of Byzantine spirituality. Some forms of solitary life were austere and even extreme. Besides stylites and recluses (both of whom were numerous, especially in Syria), there were boskoi, or shepherds, who roamed freely over the deserts, nourishing themselves on herbs, whence came the name herbivori, given them by St. EPHREM THE SYRIAN. St. NILUS OF ANCYRA considered xeniteia, the life of pilgrims in a strange land, the most difficult. The desire for a complete isolation even in the midst of people urged the saloi (in Slavic, jurodivyje) to feign eccentricities, even insanity, out of love for Christ; they were numerous in Syria and Russia.

Basilian cenobitism reached its perfection in the Studion monastery of Constantinople, whose typikon or rule became the model for other foundations. But in reality not all monasteries succeeded in full observance. The idiorrhythmic type of monasticism, an imitation of the ancient colonies of the fathers of the desert, was gradually introduced. Accordingly, the monks live in groups under a superior, but obedience is limited to matters of external regulation. Individual monks retain their own personal property and enjoy considerable freedom. Of the 20 principal monasteries of Mount ATHOS, nine are of this kind. The structure of this monastic republic reveals other types of monastic life still found in the East. The sketai (sketes) are dependent on larger monasteries and consist of a group of isolated houses. In the asketikai kalybai small groups of anchorites live. A hesychasterion is the dwelling of a solitary hermit. Kellia are small, separate, rural habitations where individual monks live under the direction of an older monk. Kathismata are hermitages better equipped, suitable, e.g., for a retired bishop. There are on Mount Athos also gyrovagi or kabiotai (wanderers) who do not belong to any monastery. Palestine was famous for its lauras, a type intermediate between anchoritism and the cenobitic life. A dependent pustyň or hermitage was often attached to the Russian monasteries.

In the monastic legislation of the East both civil and ecclesiastical authority had a part. Such legislation is found, for example, in the canons of the Council of Chalcedon (451), the Council of Trullo (691), the Council of Nicaea II (787), and the First and Second Photian Councils of Constantinople (867, 879). In the code of Theodosius (d. 450) are found prescriptions for monks that were developed further by Justinian (d. 565) in his Codex and Novellae, and by Emperor Leo VI (d. 913) in his Basilika and Novellae. In the 9th century began the custom of formulating a particular rule (typikon) for each newly founded monastery. In more recent times the Holy See issued for Catholic religious of the Eastern rites the motu proprio Postquam Apostolicis Litteris (Feb. 2, 1952).

Despite the multiplicity of forms, Eastern monasticism possesses a unity rooted in the common ideal of all Christians, namely, the salvation of one's soul. The monk, according to the concept of Basil and others, is none other than the Christian who takes the gospel seriously with all the consequences. Thus, in the Orient the ideal of perfection and monastic asceticism are considered identical.

Since it is not possible to give a detailed account here of all Eastern monasteries, some of the principal centers of Eastern monastic life are discussed briefly in the remainder of this article.

Egypt. The separation of the Egyptian Church from the Catholic Church, the invasion by the Muslims, and cultural isolation have reduced to a handful the number of existing monasteries, which in the golden era of Egyptian monasticism had numbered in the hundreds. Four of these are situated in the valley of Wadi Natrun, near the modern highway that leads from Cairo to Alexandria. Deir Amba Maqār is the monastery of MACARIUS THE EGYPTIAN; it was founded on the site of the hermitage of this patriarch of monasticism in the Scetic Desert. Though destroyed several times, it became in the 6th century the seat of the Coptic patriarch; in the 9th century it was surrounded by the kind of walls that later characterized all Egyptian monasteries. Deir as-Surjān, the monastery of the Syrians, was founded in the 8th century by the Syrian Tekrit for the monks of his nation. It became celebrated for its Syriac manuscripts, of which many were carried off in the 18th century to the Vatican Library, others in the 19th century to the British Museum. In the 14th century a plague killed most of the monks. The chronicle of the monastery speaks of only 43 monks in 1516, of whom 25 were Copts. Finally the administration came completely under the Copts. Deir Amba Bishāj, monastery of the Abbot Isaias, contemporary of Macarius, was reconstructed in the 14th century. Deir al-'Adrā (Baramus, or monastery of the Romans), was founded, according to legend, by the sons of Valentinian I (d. 375) or by St. Arsenius.

In the eastern desert, about 40 miles from the Red Sea, stands Deir Mār Antūnius, the monastery of St. AN-THONY OF EGYPT. In it is located the tomb of the saint, who spent his last years in a cave on Mount Kolzim. Ten miles from the Red Sea is found Deir Mar Bula, monastery of St. Paul of Thebes. This was built in the 5th century and reconstructed in the 16th and 18th centuries. Almost abandoned is the monastery of Deir Samūil in the valley of Kalamon, southwest of Medinet el Faijum. Founded by the Monophysite monk Samuel in the 7th century, it was reconstructed in 1899 by monks who had been forced to flee from Deir al-'Adrā. The Coptic monastery that presents the most modern aspect is that of Deir al-'Adrā (Al-Muharraq), some 20 miles northwest of Mafalut and reconstructed in the 16th century as a palace. Near Sohag are the famous monasteries of SHENOUTE, Deir-el Abjad (White monastery), and Deirel'Achmar (Red monastery), but they are now in ruins. The same is true of the monastery of St. Epiphanius near Luxor and that of St. Simeon near Aswan. Since the coming of Islam, monasteries for women have been limited to the city of Cairo, where even in the 12th century there was a foundress named Saijida Tarfa. Some of these convents still function; the largest of them is Deir Abū Sefein.

Ethiopia. The history of Ethiopian monasticism has not yet been studied sufficiently. All Ethiopian monasteries recognize as their head the abbot of Dabra Libānos, the great monastery to the north of Addis Ababa, whose abbot has the title of etshage and has jurisdiction also over the secular clergy. The greatest number of monasteries is in the north of Ethiopia and in Eritrea. Among them is the notable Dabra Bizan, which had great importance in the 14th century. In central Ethiopia the principal monastery is Dabra Dimā (Mount Calvary), along with its school. In the south the only important one is Dabra Wagag in Assabot. Monastic communities for women are found at times within the confines of the greater monasteries, but in separate buildings, as at Dabra Libānos. The abbots of monasteries are nominated by the crown. Ethiopian monasticism has extended to other countries, viz, to Egypt, Palestine, Lebanon, Cyprus, and Italy, where St. Stephen's Church in Rome is the ancient seat of the Ethiopian College.

Sinai and Palestine. On the Sinai Peninsula near Faran there was a large colony of monks of the monastery of Raithu. In the 8th or 9th century the episcopal see of Faran was transferred to the monastery of St. Catherine below Mount SINAI, which enjoyed the protection of the Muslims, Venetians, and the popes, because it was the goal of pilgrims from both East and West.

Greek monasteries in Palestine were numerous in the days of the Byzantine Empire. There were also Latin monasteries at Bethlehem and on Mount Olivet. In the Middle Ages the Benedictine monastery at Jerusalem, Sancta Maria Latina, where the discussions concerning the FILIOQUE began, was still extant. The Georgians enjoyed special protection from the mamelukes, who allowed them to construct Georgian monasteries even in the late Middle Ages. The Armenians in the beginning were associated with the Greek monasteries but soon constructed their own. There are testimonies concerning three monasteries of the Caucasus Albanians. The Copts and Ethiopians established themselves also in the Holy City. In the 19th century were was a strong influence of Russians in the Holy Land; some of their convents for women still function.

Syria. After a notable flowering in the early centuries, Syrian monasticism went into rapid decline. The ruins of Qalat Sem'an around the column of St. Simeon Stylites (d. 459) reveal large monastic constructions. This place was the object of veneration for Monophysite pilgrims (see MONOPHYSITISM). Almost by way of opposition, the orthodox pilgrims hastened to the column of another of the STYLITES, St. Simeon the Younger (d. c. 592), on the Mount of Miracles near Antioch. The monasteries on this hill were the scene of bitter conflicts between the Greeks and Georgians in the Middle Ages. Opposite the Mount of Miracles was Black Mountain, a monastery founded in the 11th century, in which the canonist, Nikon of the Black Mountain (d. c. 1088), lived for some time.

The plains of Iran offered many "deserts" for anchorites from the 4th century on. In the 5th century an Egyptian, Eugene (Awgin), started a cenobitic monastery modeled on the type founded by St. PACHOMIUS. The Persian monks often occupied themselves in the care of souls. The disciples of St. Maro (d. c. 410) of Apamea in Syria emigrated to Lebanon (see MARO OF CYR, ST.; MARONITE CHURCH). The Maronite monks settled chiefly in the "Holy Valley" called Qadisha (extending from the Cedars toward Tripoli) which became filled with hermits and monasteries for both men and women. Several religious orders still work among the Maronites: the ANTONINES, the Missionaries of Kraim, and various congregations of sisters.

Armenia. Monasticism appeared in Armenia in the 4th century and reached its greatest development between the 9th and the 14th century. In all of old Armenia the number of monasteries was approximately 2,000. In the present-day region of Vaspurakan there were nearly 189 monasteries; Sünik had 150; Artzakh, 126; Karin, 116; Airarat, 52; Turuperan-Taron, 48; and Cilician Armenia, 62. The number of monks was large; the monastery of the Mother of God in Karmruk counted 300; that of St. John the Baptist in Klagh, 400; and Tathéw, in the time of its glory, 500. Many of these monasteries still existed before World War I but were later abandoned as a result of persecutions. Among the Catholic Armenians, there are two branches of the MECHITARISTS, monks who have motherhouses at Venice, Italy, and Vienna, Austria, and who conduct schools, printing presses, and missions in the Near East.

Georgia. Monasticism in eastern Georgia was initiated by the "Syrian Fathers." In the second half of the 6th century it developed in the western part, especially in Tao-Klargeti (Turkey) in the Čoroki River basin. The monastic center called the Georgian Sinai arose there. Its founder was the archimandrite Gregory of Khanzta (d. 860-61). When he arrived the only monastery in this region was Opiza, but Gregory founded in the vicinity his monasteries of Khanzta and then Shatberdi, not far from Artanugi, capital of Klargeti. In time the foundations multiplied, and from these monasteries there emerged, especially, the 12 monasteries called in Georgian literature simply Atormetni, i.e., the 12, founded not later than the 9th century. From Tao-Klargeti came the founders of Iveron on Mount Athos. Some Georgian monks founded monasteries in Syria, Palestine, and Mount Sinai.

Balkan Countries. Modern Greece numbers 175 male monasteries, but they are sparsely populated. In the famous Meteora only three monasteries are inhabited. Female religious are more numerous, e.g., in the convent on the island of Tenos near the Marian sanctuary. The recently founded community Zoe follows the model of modern Latin congregations and engages in works of the apostolate. In Yugoslavia the first center of monasticism was located around the lake of Ochrid in the 9th century. The golden period was in the 14th and 15th centuries. The Serbian lauras, called also "imperial" monasteries, enjoyed special privileges. In 1939 there were in Yugoslavia 166 Orthodox monasteries with 540 monks. The most famous monasteries are Krushedol (near Karlovtsy), Studenitsa (the Serbian Westminster Abbey), Mileshovo, and Gratchanitsa. On Mount Athos St. Sava founded in 1197 the monastery of Chilandari for his fellow countrymen.

In Romania monasticism diminished rapidly in the 19th century. Statistics for 1857 showed 10,000 monks; in 1867, only 4,851; and in 1893, 2,654. Nuns are more numerous, especially in the convent of Hurezu in the Carpathians. In Bulgaria also, in the period after World War II, nuns adapted themselves better to difficult circumstances. The most important of the male monasteries are in Rila, Batchkovo, Trojan, Pomorie, and Preobraženski.

Russia. Traces of monastic life are found in Russia from the very beginning of Christianity toward the end of the 10th century. These were small foundations established by princes, in imitation of the monasteries of Byzantium. In contrast, the famous laura of Pechersky arose, as its chronicle narrates, solely by "the fasts and tears" of the monks. SS. Anthony (d. c. 1073) and Theodosius (d. 1074) are venerated as its founders. Anthony was a solitary of the type of the Egyptian anchorites and became a monk on Mount Athos. After returning to Kiev, he took up his abode in a cave cut out of a hill. His disciple Theodosius, when he became hegumen (superior), built cells for monks above the cave and sent one of the monks to Constantinople to bring back the rule of the famed Studion monastery in order to introduce the cenobitic life. The Pechersky laura was several times reduced to ruins by the Tartars; it was reconstructed and became a religious and cultural center, a place of pilgrimage frequented by the Russian people. After 1917 it was transformed into an anti-religious museum. The monastery was reopened in 1946, but again closed some time later.

After the Mongol invasion a new center of religious life arose in the middle of the 14th century in the "desert" of the virgin forests of the north, which in the following centuries were populated by hermits. The initiator of this movement was St. SERGIUS OF RADONEZH, founder of the monastery of the Holy Trinity in the province of Moscow. This monastery was closed after the revolution (1917) and was later reopened. Sergius began as an anchorite, but in founding his monastery he introduced the cenobitic rule of the Studites. His laura became the center for other foundations toward the south in the environs of Moscow, and toward the north in the forests beyond the Volga, in the area called the Russian Thebaid because of its numerous hermitages and monasteries. Among the more famous of these founders were St. Cyril of Beloozero (d. 1427) and Paul of Obnora (d. 1429). Along the shores of Lake Kuben arose monasteries in imitation of those of Mount Athos, especially that of "Spasso-Kamennyj," constructed on rock in honor of the Transfiguration. The monks penetrated even to the Nordic islands of Solovki. Led by SS. Sabatios (d. 1435) and Zosimus (d. 1478), they established a monastery that became a center of missionary activity and, subsequently, a military fortress.

The second half of the 15th century brought a decline in religious discipline in numerous monasteries that had become rich and influential. Trouble arose in the form of heresy and state opposition, but monastic reformers also appeared. Among these the more important were Saints Nilus Sorsky (d. 1508) and Joseph Volokolamsky (d. 1515). Nilus promoted a semieremitical life in which a few monks in isolated huts (skete) lived lives of extreme poverty, hard work, and prayer. Nilus's monastic rule (ustav) is an ascetical instruction on prayer and control of the affections. He came under the influence of the hesychastic spirituality of Mount Athos. More than external works, he stressed the internal struggle against evil thoughts. The ideals of his contemporary, Joseph, were different. His rule, Duchovnaja gramota, outlined an ideal of cenobitic discipline under obedience to a superior and following a stable rule of life that regulated each moment of the day. The principal virtue of the monk was the perfect observance of assigned duties and the renunciation of one's own will and independent thoughts. The spirit of Joseph's rule prevailed in the Russian monasteries that became thereafter schools and centers of cultural activity, and often of politics also. The defects of this rigid traditionalism and attachment to external formalism brought about a new decadence. A kind of fusion between these two opposing tendencies is found in the rule of St. Cornelius (d. 1537), founder of a cenobitic monastery in the forests of Komel. His disciples founded the monasteries of the northern Russian regions.

A breath of new spirit was felt in the Russian monasteries with the appearance of the starchestvo in the 18th century. The staretz (literally, old man) was a spiritual father, a guide of souls, who, even though not a priest, attracted people to himself because of his experience in the spiritual life and often because of his special gifts, above all, that of discernment of spirits. The founder of this spiritual renaissance was Paissy Velitchkovsky (d. 1794). While on Mount Athos, he immersed himself in ascetical Greek literature. He went to Moldavia (to Dragomirna, and later to Sekul and Niametz) and organized the translations of spiritual books from Greek and Latin. Among these books was the Philokalia of NICODE-MUS THE HAGIORITE.

The startzy of the monastery of Optina made this monastery near Kozelsk well known. Here lived Leo Nagolkin (d. 1841), who was beloved especially by the simple people. His successor, Marcarius Ivanov (d. 1860), was in contact with the intellectual and literary leaders of Russia of his time. Ambrose Grenkov (d. 1891), a disciple of Macarius, is described by Fëdor DOSTOEVSKIĬ in Brothers Karamazov. Seraphim of Sarov (d. 1833) led the austere life of a recluse before becoming famous in all of Russia as a thaumaturge, mystic, and director of souls.

Russia, in 1914, had 1,027 Orthodox monasteries (550 of men and 477 of women), with a total of 94,599 religious (21,300 monks and 73,299 nuns).

In the Ukraine, monastic life was initiated with the laura of Pechersky, which pertained to the Russian Orthodox Church. Ukrainian monasticism received a new impetus after its union with the Catholic Church in the Union of Brest (1596). The Basilian Order of St. Josaphat played a significant role in the subsequent development of the religious life. [See BASILIANS (BYZANTINE).] In Galicia, about the year 1900, there appeared a congregation made up of simple peasants. Metropolitan A. SHEPTYTS'KYĬ gave them, in 1906, a rule modeled on that of the ancient Byzantine rule, and they adopted the name Studites. The first hegumen or superior was the Father Clement Sheptyts'kyĭ, brother of the metropolitan. Later they were dispersed; a small group remains in the West.

MONASTICISM, EARLY IRISH

The monastic way of life, which began in Egypt in the 3d century, was introduced into Ireland by St. PAT-RICK, who spoke with surprise of the Irish boys and girls who insisted on becoming "monks and virgins of Christ." Their place in the Church, as organized by St. Patrick, however, was secondary. Beginning about 520, monasteries multiplied and by 600 the Church in Ireland had become the most monastic Church in Christendom; but there is no simple explanation for this phenomenon.

The Foundations. St. Patrick's experience showed that the imitation of Christ in humility, poverty, and hardship appealed to the Irish character. In the early 6th century influences favorable to monasticism reached Ireland from Britain; the fame of the Candida Casa of St. NINIAN, in modern Wigtonshire, and the monasteries of Ynys Pyr, Liancarven, and St. David's (modern Wales) spread as models of spiritual living, which Irish ascetics felt the urge to imitate. In a land whose political organization did not depend on cities, the monastery easily became the center from which the bishop ruled; and the monks were encouraged to take the place once held by the pagan druids as teachers of youth.

The most important name in this vigorous movement is St. FINNIAN of Clonard, called in later literature Magister, in Latin, and in Irish, aite fer nérend lena lind, "the teacher of all Ireland in his day." He trained a group of brilliant young men whom he sent to found independent monasteries, including St. Columcille of Derry and Iona, St. Ciaran of Clonmacnois, St. BRENDAN of Clonfert. Other illustrious founders were St. COMGALL of Bangor, St. Enda of Aran, St. KEVIN of Glendalough, St. Cronan of Roscrea, St. Nessan of Mungret, St. Colman of Cloyne, St. Finbarr of Cork, St. Iarlaith of Tuam. More than 100 monasteries of major significance were founded during the 6th century in every part of the country and on the coastal islands. Women, such as St. BRIGID of Kildare, St. ITA OF KILLEEDY in Limerick, St. Monenna of Killeavy near Newry, showed themselves capable of equal idealism. Thus a large proportion of the population of the country lived in monastic seclusion as monks and nuns.

All did not follow the same observance, but the surviving Irish rules put more emphasis on the interior spirit than on details of external organization, which they obviously regarded as unworthy of mention.

Monastic Rules. A monastic rule ascribed to the saint Ailbe of Emly is written in Old Irish and represents ancient teaching and practice. It instructs the monk that: his conscience should be tender; he should speak little, work hard, serve the sick, deal gently with sinners, be modest in dress, and be wise, learned, pious, generous and courteous, be constant in prayer, and be zealous in reciting the canonical hours which formed the pattern of daily life. Matins began at dawn. When the bell rang the brethren were to chant the hymn of St. HILARY OF POITIERS, Hymnum dicat. When passing the altar each should genuflect three times, "going into the presence of the King of Angels."

After the morning office came a manifestation of conscience, then readings from the Gospel and spiritual treatises, then work. To keep the body in subjection the stomach was to be kept empty. About three P.M., "except in time of famine," the monk was given his meal. The cook was to be competent and generous; but "dry bread and watercress is the fitting food for the genuine ascetic." It was the duty of all to bear reproof and to confess their faults.

The monastic officials referred to are the abbot, the vice abbot, the oeconomus, the cook, and the priest. Obedience was to be absolute. If this rule was observed, the community would persevere without fault till death, when they would leave earth to receive the royal welcome offered them by the "Abbot of the Archangels."

The rule of St. Fintan of Clonenagh was similar to the rule of St. Ailbe; it was imitated by St. COMGALL at BANGOR and then carried by St. COLUMBAN to Luxeuil and Bobbio, whence as the Regula Sancti Columbani it spread to some 50 monasteries. Its influence remained strong until Charlemagne ordered that the Regula Sancti Benedicti should be observed in all the monasteries of his empire.

Distinguishing Characteristics. While the elements of Irish monasticism are found elsewhere, the system had a unity and an originality distinctly its own. Severe bodily austerity was a marked feature of every Irish rule and became a national tradition. The spirit of the rule was anchoritical rather than cenobitical; when the monk had advanced sufficiently in virtue he retired to an uninhabited spot to live in contemplation. Nevertheless the monks did not neglect apostolic duties: at home, the monastic oratories served as parish churches for the surrounding laity; abroad, the Irish monks were missionaries, intent on their own perfection, but hardly less intent on the salvation of the neighbors' souls. A zeal for studies, higher and lower, is indicated by the existence of a school which was second in prominence only to the church in every Irish monastery. In a category by itself is to be placed the prominence of abbots as ecclesiastical rulers who exercised jurisdiction for some six centuries, on a scale without parallel elsewhere in the Church.

The Decline. One reform movement in early Irish monasticism took place in the second half of the 8th century. It gave much promise but succumbed in the disorder caused by the irruptions of the Vikings, who appeared first in Ireland in 795 and continued as a disruptive force in the body politic until their final defeat at Clontarf, in 1014. The result for the monasteries was an ever-increasing measure of secularization which grew to such an extent that by the 12th century it could not be remedied without an undesirable social upheaval.

In 1111 Ireland was divided into dioceses on the continental model and in many cases monastic properties passed eventually under the control of the bishops. By 1200 early Irish monasticism had come to an end. The Irish rule was superseded by the Cistercian and by the rule of the Canons Regular of St. Augustine. A few ancient monasteries managed to survive, under the Rule of St. Augustine or as colleges of secular canons.

MONE, FRANZ JOSEPH

Catholic historian; b. Mingolfsheim, Baden, Germany, May 12, 1796; d. Karlsruhe, Germany, March 12, 1871. He taught history at the University of Heidelberg from 1819 to 1827, and from 1825 he was in charge of the University library. In 1827 he was appointed to LOUVAIN University, but he returned to Germany in 1831 as a result of the Belgian Revolution. From 1825 until his retirement in 1868 he was director of the General State Archives in Karlsruhe. As a researcher, Mone was entirely dominated by the ideas of ROMANTICISM, as is shown by the letters of Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm, Karl Lachmann, Freidrich Creuzer, and Joseph von Lassberg to him, which were published by Max von Waldberg in Neue Heidelberger Jahrbücher 7 (1897) 68. The breadth and variety of Mone's field of study can best be conveyed by the modern concept of the history of culture. His works on the Celts are an extreme example of Romantic infatuation with the past. Mone made a modest contribution by his literary-historical researches to the foundation of Germanic PHILOLOGY, although his conclusions are often at fault. Even before Jacob Grimm, Mone had tried to give an overall presentation of German mythology, and on the basis laid down by Wilhelm Grimm, he pursued still further researches on the Germanic heroic legends. His editions on the history of the liturgy and on ecclesiastical poetry in the Middle Ages are even today a scholarly achievement of great importance. The Lateinische und griechische Messen aus dem II. bis. VI. Jahrhundert (Frankfort 1850) presents the pure Frankish- GALLICAN form of the liturgy. Mone also devoted himself to the history of Baden, and he initiated the Baden Church-State struggle with his anonymously published Die katholischen Zustände in Baden (Conditions of Catholics in Baden), a polemical pamphlet, published in Karlsruhe in 1841 and 1843, in which he championed the Catholic Church's independence of state tutelage.

phosphates and other minerals, while the harvesting of wheat, barley and potatoes, and the raising of livestock for food, cashmere and hides provide many Mongolians with their livelihood. The northern part of the region, once known as Outer Mongolia, comprises Mongolia proper; the southern region, geographically part of Mongolia, forms the Inner Mongolian Autonomous Region, an administrative unit of China since 1947 that includes parts of Manchuria as well as Inner Mongolia in the traditional sense.

The historic homeland of the MONGOLS who under Genghis Kahn conquered much of eastern Europe during the 13th century, the region was divided into two separate entities, both of which were directly or indirectly under the domination of China or the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) until the mid-1990s. A province of China from 1686, the region gained its independence in 1921, after ten years of fighting. The Mongolian People's Republic, a Soviet satellite, ruled from 1924 to 1992, when a new democratic constitution was promulgated and elections established. Only in Outer Mongolia, where ethnic Mongols constitute 93 percent of the populace, does the Mongol race predominate numerically. The Islamic Kazazhs constitute four percent of the region's population.

Early History. The region was originally inhabited by nomadic tribes who adhered to Shamanism (see SHAMAN AND MEDICINE MAN). Lamaistic BUDDHISM was introduced from TIBET in the 13th century at the invitation of Kublai Khan (1215–94), grandson of Genghis Khan and conqueror of China. Buddhism quickly grew to become the predominant religion of Mongolia (see LAMAISM).

Christianity was first propagated by Nestorians (see ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST). Franciscan missionaries entered southern Mongolia in the 13th and 14th centuries, prior to the destruction of the Ming dynasty in 1368 (see MISSION, HISTORY, I), and in 1690 Mongolia was incorporated in the diocese of Peking. Evangelization was entrusted to the Jesuits until the French Vincentians took charge in 1785. One of them, Father Gabet, visited Outer Mongolia in 1838 with two converted lamas. The Vicariate Apostolic of Mongolia was erected in 1840. The first Mongolian priest was Garudi (1820–93), a former lama who was ordained in 1854 and who was also known as Peter Fong. The IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY congregation (Scheut Fathers), who succeeded the Vincentians in 1865, worked mainly among the Chinese immigrants in Inner Mongolia. A number of missionaries moved north to labor among several Mongol tribes, and attained a measure of success with the Ordos, who had suffered much during a Muslim uprising of 1862-72 and a severe famine in 1878. Mongol converts partly abandoned nomadic life and settled around the mission established in Porobalgason in 1874. A second mission station, founded in 1904 at Dumdadu, became the independent mission of Kharashili in 1937. The vicariate of Mongolia was divided into three regions in 1883: the vicariate of Southeast Mongolia; the vicariate of Southwest Mongolia in Inner Mongolia which in 1922 was itself divided into the vicariates of Suiyüan and Ningsia; and the vicariate Apostolic of Central Mongolia, which was split to create the Vicariate of Tchagar (Siwantze from 1924) and the mission sui juris of Ulan Bator in Outer Mongolia.

Protestants established a mission and printing press at Selenginsk among the Buriats (1817). They translated the Old Testament into Mongolian and published it in 1840 and the New Testament in 1846. O. S. Nostegaard, a Norwegian, remained in Outer Mongolia from 1890 to 1900. James Gilmour (1843–91) of the London Missionary Society, the first Protestant missionary in Inner Mongolia, worked among the Chakhars (1875–91). The Scandinavian Mission Alliance entered this region in 1895. The Swedish Mongol Mission, the Assemblies of God and the British and Foreign Bible Society also sent missionaries to the southern regions, although few ventured north into Outer Mongolia.

The Modern Church. Despite the efforts of the Church, 80 percent of Mongols were members of the Lamaistic Church of Tibet at the time the region fell under communist control. After 1924 Buddhism, as well as Catholicism, suffered severely from the Communist drive to destroy all religions. The 767 lama monasteries with 100,000 monks that existed in Outer Mongolia in March of 1921, when the region gained its independence from China, disappeared after 1936, the life of monks deemed particularly useless by communist standards. The temple of Gadang was the only one left open in Ulan Bator by the mid-1950s. While Inner Mongolia still had 997 monasteries with 150,000 lamas in 1952, many of these monasteries were razed in the coming decade.

Despite the assault on the Church during the 1930s and 1940s, Suiyüan became an archdiocese in 1946, with Ningsia, Siwantze and Tsining as its suffragan sees. While the mission in Outer Mongolia was entrusted to the Scheut Fathers in 1922, they were never allowed to enter it. The mission set up in 1923 by Swedish Protestants in Ulan Bator was closed in 1924 when the missionaries were expelled. There were less than 100 Mongol Protestants when all the missionaries were expelled from Inner Mongolia (1948–52). By 1953 no Christians of any faith were known to exist in Outer Mongolia.

Into the 21st Century. In 1992, with the fall of the USSR, the communist government of Mongolia weakened and democratic influences increased, prompting the promulgation of a new constitution in February of 1992 that granted freedom of religion and free, democratic elections under a reorganized government. The constitution also stipulated the separation between church and state; while the government funded the restoration of several Buddhist temples as historic sites, it did not otherwise fund the Buddhist religion. From 1992 to 2000, 90 Buddhist temples, 40 Christian Churches, a Muslim mosque and four Baha'i Churches were founded with the permission of the Mongolian government.

In May of 1996, the first Catholic Mass to be held in Mongolia since the arrival of communism was performed in a newly opened church in Ulan Bator. By 2000 the Church was slowly becoming reestablished in Mongolian life. Msgr. Wens Padilla established the first mission to Mongolia at the request of the new democratic government in 1992, and a second was established under South Korean Father Robert Lee Jun-Hwa in 1997. Three priests, ten nuns and 17 missionaries were at work in the country by 2000. Among their good works were the establishment of a Catholic kindergarten that taught over 60 students per year and an orphanage that cared for handicapped children. In June of 2000 Pope John Paul II met with Mongolian president Natsagiin Bagabandi to discuss the future of the Church in the region. Mongolia established diplomatic relations with the Holy See in 1992.

MONGOLS

A group of peoples, speaking closely related languages, who during the MIDDLE AGES ruled over a great part of Asia and of eastern Europe. At present most of the three million Mongols live in the Mongolian People's Republic, in the Soviet Union, and in China.

Political Organization. The Mongolian People's Republic, usually referred to as Outer MONGOLIA, is an independent state covering about 580,000 square miles, with a population of 1,100,000 (1960). Its capital, Ulan Bator, formerly Urga, has a population of 164,000 (1959). In spite of recent and somewhat successful efforts at industrialization, the country's main source of income is cattle breeding and 72 percent of the land is pasture. Since 1956 the Moscow-Peking railroad has passed through Ulan Bator. Within the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and in the framework of the Russian Soviet Federal Socialist Republic (R.S.F.S.R.), the Buriat Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic, with its capital at Ulan-Udé, has a population of 727,000 and covers 137,007 square miles. Other Buriats are grouped in the autonomous districts of Ust-Ordynsky and of Aginsky. A Kalmuck Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic, established in 1935, suppressed in 1943, and reestablished in 1958, belongs to the North Caucasian Region of the R.S.F.S.R. It has an area of 29,601 square miles and a population of 204,000; its capital is at Elista.

Languages. The Mongol languages belong to the Altaic group and are related to the Turkic and Tungusic languages. Among the eastern Mongol dialects Khalkha and Buriat are the most important, for both have evolved as literary languages. Among the western dialects Oirat and Kalmuck should be mentioned. The so-called Classical Mongol was the literary language used from the 17th century up until the more recent reforms.

History. The first people known to have spoken a Mongol language were the Khitan, who under the dynastic title of Liao ruled over North China from 907 to 1125; they have no known genetic relations with the Mongols proper. The current practice of designating as Mongols such earlier nomadic peoples as HUNS and AVARS is unwarranted. The rise of Mongol power is connected with Genghis (more correctly Chingiz) Khan (b. 1167), who "having united all the tribes living under felt-tents" was elected supreme ruler of the Mongols in 1206. A man of extraordinary genius, he organized the Mongols, poor and small in number, into a formidable military machine that, by the time of his death in 1227, had expanded Mongol influence from the Pacific Ocean to the Adriatic Sea. The initial reasons for these wide conquests were economic. Horses were the only raw material the Mongol economy had in plentiful supply, and war was the most efficient and productive way of using them. To secure the products needed by his people, in the form of booty or through taxes levied on subjugated peoples, Genghis evolved a most efficient strategy, based on the extensive use of cavalry. As usual, the political theory that justified such actions was supplied only after the event when it was asserted that Genghis had been chosen by God to rule the world. The conquest of North China in 1211 to 1215 was followed in 1220 to 1221 by the conquest of Iran. In 1223 a Mongol vanguard defeated a coalition of Russian princes on the Kalka River. Under Genghis's son and successor Ögödei (Ogadai; d. 1241) the war in China was continued while Mongol armies invaded Hungary in 1241 to 1242. Another army, sent into Russia, plundered Moscow and destroyed Kiev. But the very size of the Mongol Empire was conducive to its disintegration. The westernmost part, called the Golden Horde, survived in European Russia until 1502. When ruled by Berke (d. 1266), who adopted ISLAM, it became virtually autonomous, and its relations with the Il-khans, the Mongol rulers of Iran, deteriorated. During the reign of the great Khan Möngke (Mangu; d. 1259), who ruled from Mongolia, his brother Hülegü (d. 1265) was entrusted with the task of consolidating Mongol power in Iran, and in 1258 he also occupied BAGHDAD and put an end to the caliphate of the 'ABBASIDS. Hülegü's wife was a Christian, and in his entourage NESTORIANISM had considerable influence; it was not until the time of Gazan Khan (d. 1304) that the Il-khans finally adopted Islam. Their rule eventually collapsed under the attack of TIMUR (d. 1405) in 1393. The final conquest of China was achieved in 1279 under Möngke's successor Qubilai (Kublai) Khan (d. 1294); and under the dynastic title of Yüan, the Mongols ruled over China until 1368. A dominant power in Asia for a century and a half, the Mongols, after the havoc of the initial conquest, brought peace, a good administration, and tolerance to the countries conquered. Their political achievement matched their former military prowess. In the 13th and 14th centuries many contacts were established between the Mongols and western Europe. Thus INNOCENT IV and LOUIS IX of France sent several embassies to them and relations between the Il-khans and the kings of France and England were quite friendly. Several Mongol envoys visited Italy, France, and England, and the adventures of Marco Polo at the court of Kublai Khan became well known even in his own day.

Although by the 16th century the Mongols had lost all the lands conquered, they maintained themselves in Mongolia and in parts of South Siberia and of Turkestan. Much of their energy was used up in fratricidal conflicts between eastern and western Mongols. Under Dayan Khan (d. 1543), Altan Khan (d. 1583), and Ligdan Khan (d. 1634) political supremacy rested with the eastern Mongols, whereas under Galdan Khan (d. 1697) the initiative was in western Mongol hands. By that time the Mongols were trapped between the expanding Russian and Chinese empires, and in 1643 some of the Oirats moved from the Chinese borders to the Volga, where in due course they accepted a Russian protectorate. In 1771, in a memorable migration worthy of the Ten Thousand, the majority of the Oirats returned to China while the rest, called Kalmucks, remain in Russia to this day. Following the Chinese revolution of 1911, the Mongols of Mongolia declared their independence, which had been lost in the 18th century, but it was soon put to the test by various foreign interventions. In 1921, with Soviet help, independence was assured, but Mongolia remained a monarchy ruled by the theocratic supreme lama, Khutuktu Bogdo Gegen, until his death in 1924, when the country was transformed into a People's Republic. In 1961 Mongolia was admitted to the United Nations.

Civilization and Culture. Mongol civilization is of the nomadic, cattle-breeding type, but it has shown itself adaptable to foreign influences. Under Genghis Khan the Mongols adopted the Uighur writing, alphabetic and written in vertical lines from left to right, which has survived to this day, although at present the Cyrillic alphabet is used both in Outer Mongolia and among the Buriats. Originally shamanists, the Mongols were converted to LAMAISM, the Tibetan form of BUDDHISM, in the second half of the 16th century when Altan Khan accepted the spiritual authority of the Dalai Lama. The bulk of Mongol literature is Buddhist, and the whole Buddhist Canon was translated from the Tibetan. There exists also a very fine collection of original historical literature that includes the Secret History of the Mongols written in the middle of the 13th century and various other chronicles, such as that of Saghang Sechen written in the second half of the 17th century.

MONICA, ST.

Mother of St. AUGUSTINE; b. Tagaste, Numidia c. 322; d. Ostia, fall 387. Alhough born of Christian parents, Monica married a pagan official, Patricius (d. 371, a convert); she bore at least three children: Navigius, a daughter Perpetua (not mentioned by St. Augustine), and Augustine, who paints an unforgettable picture of her in his Confessions. She followed Augustine's education and career with motherly pride, and despite an estrangement during his Manichaean period, followed him to Rome and Milan, tolerating his dissipation and attempting to arrange a good marriage for him. This was voided by his baptism and conversion to a celibate life. Monica died and was buried at Ostia on the eve of a return journey to Africa. In 1162 her bones were translated to an Augustinian monastery near Arras in France from whence her cult spread throughout the Church. Other relics, however, were brought from Ostia to the Church of St. Augustine in Rome in 1430. Recently a fragment of her sepulchral inscription came to light in Ostia. She is a patron of women's sodalities.

Feast: May 4.

MONISM

A philosophical system or doctrine that reduces all of reality to some type of unity, or admits only one basic PRINCIPLE where other doctrines admit two (DUALISM) or more (pluralism). MATERIALISM, IDEALISM, and PANTHEISM are the major forms that monist philosophies assume. This article surveys the various kinds of monism and then offers a brief critique from the viewpoint of Catholic thought.

Kinds. Depending on the type of principle or underlying unity to which all entities are reduced, monism may be variously designated as substantive, or conceptual, or moral and aesthetic.

Substantive. In substantive monism, the underlying principle is SUBSTANCE, which is usually viewed as either MATTER or SPIRIT. If everything is reducible to matter, as is affirmed in Marxism, spirit becomes nothing more than a modality of matter. A similar consequence results from the teaching of W. Ostwald (1853-1932), who spoke of energy as the sole subsistent reality. For J. M. Guyau (1854–88), it is life in a state of continual becoming that explains universal evolution and is itself the basis of everything real; in such vitalistic monism, spirit fares no better than in materialism, for both matter and spirit, in its view, are but an extract of life. The teaching of E. H. Haeckel is a classical example of materialistic monism. According to Haeckel, the universe is one to such an extent that there is no possibility of matter-spirit dualism: the universe was not created but evolves according to eternal laws and is identical with God; physical and chemical forces alone explain change; the soul is mortal:and so forth.

Among those varieties of monism in which substance is conceived as spirit, that of G. W. F. HEGEL exerts the greatest influence. For Hegel, the world is one and is in continual dialectical change under the direction of the idea, or logos, which constitutes all of ontological reality. British idealism, inspired by Hegel and developed especially by F. H. BRADLEY, likewise teaches the radical unity of the universe and the existence of the ABSOLUTE; for it, the multiplicity recognized by the senses, together with individuality and duration, is nothing more than appearance. Among earlier thinkers, G. BRUNO and B. SPINOZA may likewise be listed as monists who accented spirit as the unique type of substance.

Conceptual. The second kind of monism does not invoke a substantial principle of things, but rather the type of conception man can have of them. The accent is here placed on the unitary character of TRUTH, on a unity of knowledge rather than on an ontological unity. Paul Carus (1852–1919), the American positivist who founded the Monist in 1890, thus maintained that all truths, of whatever kind and origin, must agree among themselves. For him, scientific knowledge and religious faith can be completely and harmoniously reconciled; on any subject, there can be but one truth, which is eternal and independent of all subjective feelings and aspirations.

Moral and Aesthetic. Various other forms of monism include the moral and the aesthetic. A moral monism would draw ethical consequences from a materialistic view of the universe. This is essentially the teaching of Haeckel, who regarded his system as a religion that imposed a mode of conduct in basic conflict with that of Christianity. In a more restricted sense, one may regard as monistic any doctrine that postulates a certain unity of explanation within a limited sphere of ideas or of facts. It is in this sense that one may speak of an aesthetic monism, meaning by this the elegance and appeal of any simplified accounting for a domain of human experience.

Critique. The difficulties involved in accepting monism as a complete explanation of reality are evidenced by repeated attempts to develop pluralism as a consistent philosophical position. Pluralism is radically opposed to monism, especially when monism is understood in a Hegelian sense. In Germany, the teaching of J. F. Herbart is generally regarded as pluralistic and as thus antithetical to the idealistic monism of F. W. J. von SCHELLING. In France, C. B. Renouvier proposed a philosophy that is likewise spoken of as pluralistic. In the U.S., similarly, W. JAMES advocated a type of pluralism, as did H. A. Myers (1906–55) in his Systematic Pluralism: A Study in Metaphysics (Ithaca 1961).

Some elements stressed in monism, however, are to be found in all schools of philosophy. Despite the endless variety and diversity to be found in the universe, one need not be committed to a doctrine of absolute disparity. Beings resemble one another; they possess common characteristics, and there are transcendental attributes that encompass the entire ontological order. The activities of the many species of natural things are regulated by laws, so much so that one may speak of a UNIFORMITY in nature and in its operation. Similarly, there are metaphysical principles that confer a unity and organization on observable facts and the ideas men use to explain them. From the social point of view, and particularly with recent improvements in methods of communication and transportation, the world is becoming more and more one. Along these lines, P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN has accented the unity of order and direction to be found in the universe, echoing the earlier suggestion of P. Lecomte du Noüy. In the mid-20th century, therefore, few thinkers held for an absolute multiplicity in the universe, without any element of permanence or continuity.

Nevertheless, monism itself cannot make an absolute claim to validity. A primary indication of dualism is that provided by the distinction between the universe and its Creator. Reason postulates, with evidence, the existence of a God who is not identical with His work. Again, although the universe is one, it contains a plurality of things. These are distinguished from each other by their GENUS and SPECIES as well as by their INDIVIDUALITY. This dog is not this cat or this horse, nor is it this other dog. The world is not a single substance, but is made up of subsisting realities that cannot be explained adequately in monistic terms. Despite its aesthetic appeal, monism is thus an oversimplified system that is unable to account for the totality of human experience.

MONITA SECRETA

A collection of allegedly secret instructions from the Jesuit general C. ACQUAVIVA to provincials and rectors. Monita secreta (privata) Societatis Jesu is actually a clumsy forgery and has long been recognized as such, but even today it is introduced into popular anti-Jesuit writings. After its appearance (Crakow 1614, falsified as Notobrigae 1612), it was widely distributed in a short while (22 eds. in seven languages by 1700, and 42 eds. by 1786). The titles varied: Avis d'or de la très religieuse Compagnie de Jésus, Le Cabinet jésuitique, Arcanes de la Compagnie de Jésus, Jesuiterpolitica, The Secret Instructions of the Jesuits, etc. It was put on the Index May 10, 1616 (made public Dec. 28, 1616), and numerous rebuttals soon appeared (M. Bembus in 1615, J. Argenti in 1616, J. Gretser in 1618, and A. Tanner, et al.), but it continued to circulate. The former Jesuit Jerome Zahorowski, dismissed from the society in 1613, was established as its author through an investigation ordered by the bishop of Crakow himself in 1615 and through an entry in the diary of the Jesuit house in Crakow in August 1614. Similar in style to the rules and the constitution of the society, the Monita in 16 chapters, later expanded to 17, contains detailed instructions on how to use trickery, dissimulation, and political intrigue, and how to get hold of inheritances, always with the increase of the society's power and influence in mind and without regard for faith and morals. The sharp contrast between the content of the Monita and both the letter and the spirit of the society's constitution and the instructions of the generals is so obvious as not to require explication. Even enemies of the society, such as P. SARPI, A. ARNAULD, and the Jansenistic Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, rejected the work as false. This verdict was confirmed in the 19th century (DÖL-LINGER, F. REUSCH, A. von HARNACK). Nonetheless, the work continues to be used as invective in polemics; e.g., P. von Hoensbroech concedes that it is technically a forgery but maintains that in fact its instructions reflect the true spirit of the society.

MONK

A monk is a member of a religious community of men living apart from the world, vowed according to a definite rule to a celibate life of poverty and obedience, and dedicated primarily to the performance of religious duties and to the contemplative life. The Latin word monachus, from which monk is derived, is a transliteration of the Greek μοναχός—one who lives alone. The Greek word was borrowed by Christians from the Greek Old Testament [Ps 101(102).8] and applied not only to ANCHORITES but—from the beginning of monasticism —to the individual members of monastic communities; and monachus with this meaning was in common use among the Latin Christians of the 4th century. In the 5th and 6th centuries the Latin and Greek words were applied not only to the worthy CENOBITES and HERMITS of that age but also to the various types of the monastic degeneration—the gyrovagi and sarabaitae mentioned by St. Benedict. With the popularization of the Rule of St. Benedict in the West, monachus was for a time, especially in monastic contexts, often used to refer precisely to individuals living under that rule; but in general, before the Cluniac reform, monachus was used broadly and with great imprecision. The early medieval monastic reforms tended to fix the meaning of monachus and its already current derivatives in the European languages, so that through the following centuries up to the Reformation, monachus was applied to Benedictines, Cistercians, and Carthusians, but not usually to canons, FRIARS, and members of the other new medieval institutions. With the Reformation, this precision was lost, except among a few writers of ecclesiastical Latin, and has been restored in the modern languages only among the most knowledgeable of historians. In practice, the modern English word monk is seldom used with such precision and is made to refer not only to all male religious of the Catholic and Orthodox churches but also to members of non–Christian religious bodies, e.g., the Buddhist monks of Vietnam.

MONK OF FARNE

The name generally given to the author of seven meditations in MS B iv.34 of Durham cathedral library. His name was John and he should probably be identified with John Whiterig of Northumberland, monk and novice master at Durham, who lived on Farne for eight years and died there in 1371. His longest and most important meditation, on Christ crucified, is concerned with God's love for men, as shown in the Crucifixion, and with man's response, which should also be total love. He begins by addressing Christ under a series of OT types, then contemplates the crucified Christ directly and realistically, but also serenely, calling on man to commit himself to Christ. Once this is done Christ will visit the soul as He did for the saints and martyrs. The reader is exhorted to study the open book of the Savior's sufferings: the letters are the five wounds; the words, His actions and sufferings. The all-important thing is that Christ should be loved: charity will bring the reader through carnal and rational love to the highest kind attainable in this life. Here the writer depends fairly closely on St. Bernard; elsewhere he cites SS. Gregory, Augustine, Bede, Isidore, Ambrose, Peter Damian, Hugh of Saint-Victor, Innocent III, and John Pecham. But the influence of Scripture is the strongest, and the texts, including the dogmatic ones, are frequently and skillfully interwoven.

It is not known with any certainty that the monk of Farne influenced other spiritual writers; his importance lies rather as witness to what a 14th-century Durham monk thought and prayed about. This type of spiritual writing is rare in this century; it affords a glimpse of a fervent, but conservative, monk at prayer. The other meditations are addressed to Our Lady, the angels, Abraham and David, St. John the Evangelist, and St. Cuthbert (incomplete).

MONOGENISM AND POLYGENISM

Monogenism takes the position that the whole human race is descended from a single couple or a single individual. At least until the mid-nineteenth century, monogenism was also regarded as entailing the immediate creation of the first man or couple by a special divine act. Given the preponderant evidence for biological evolution, monogenism is no longer understood in this way. But if the first biological couple may have arisen through an evolutionary process, it remains Church teaching that the SOUL of each and every human being is created directly by God (Pope John Paul II 1997).

The position contrary to monogenism is known as polygenism, of which there are two types. According to the first (called monophyletic polygenism), since evolution always proceeds within an interbreeding group, humanity would have first appeared among a number of individuals, whose progeny gradually spread world-wide through emigration. Thus, one would speak of a first community rather than a first couple or man. The second type (called polyphyletic polygenism) hypothesizes that the human species arose through separate evolutionary lines in a number of different places at different times, with the different lines converging to form our present population. Scientists have not reached consensus on which of the two versions of polygenism—the monophyletic or polyphyletic—is more likely to be true (Harpending 1994).

Monogenism was presumed by the Council of TRENT in its teaching on ORIGINAL SIN (DS 1511–1514). The most explicit statement on monogenism came in 1950 in Pope Pius XII's encyclical letter HUMANI GENERIS. Referring to Rom. 5.12 and the teaching of Trent, Pius maintained that "Christ's faithful cannot embrace" either form of polygenism, since "it is in no way apparent how such an opinion can be reconciled" with the scriptural and magisterial teaching on original sin, namely, that this sin was "actually committed by an individual Adam" and "through generation is passed on to all and is in everyone as his own" (DS 3897).

In view of Pope Pius's statement, many theologians (including K. RAHNER in 1954) argued that monogenism is so closely implied by the teaching on original sin that it must be considered a certain, if not infallible, tenet of faith. But the conclusions drawn by science, which flatly contradict monogenism, were found increasingly persuasive by theologians, including Rahner, who reversed his initial support of the position in 1967. The present situation amounts to a quandary for theologians. On the one hand, even though it has not been formally addressed by the magisterium since Humani generis, monogenism continues to be accepted as a basic premise in Church teaching, as is shown by the relevant sections of the The Catechism of the Catholic Church (nn. 374–379, 390, 399–407). On the other hand, to deny the polygenistic origin of the human species places the theologian in clear opposition with science, and conjures up the image of an obscurantist faith combating the truth of reason. And yet it may very well prove to be that science, in its forthright drive for empirical knowledge, has only forced theology to deeper reflection on its own central claim that Christ lies at the heart of all (Col. 1.16).

It is evident that the magisterium has insisted on monogenism for the sake of defending the teaching on original sin, according to which, as Trent declared, all of humanity belongs to a single order which was intrinsically "changed for the worse," physically and spiritually, by virtue of a human decision made at this order's beginning (DS 1511–1513). Hence, the judgment by Pius XII in Humani generis that the faithful are not free to accept polygenism, since it appears quite impossible to speak of any human act having the kind of effect that Trent assigned to the first sin if the human order emerged gradually and in plural fashion from an antecedent nonhuman order. If science is right about the mechanisms that gave rise to the biological species Homo sapiens, and the tradition is right about the nature of the human order, it would seem that theologians must continue to reflect on the data in search of other ways of defending the issue. One alternative is to consider the possibility that the roots of this order transcend, even precede, its present empirical condition. In his work entitled A Theological Anthropology (1963), the Swiss theologian Hans Urs von BALTHASAR entertained just this possibility. It may be necessary, he wrote, to say that the primal decision that shaped human freedom lies "above the whole temporal unfolding of the material cosmogonic process. In particular, does it exist above the biological development of man, which would thus be subject already and at its very heart to the law of generation and death and consequently to 'vanity''' (90).

If Balthasar is right, then future theological inquiry must be prepared to regard the question of monogenism or the constitution of the human order, like the question of the first sin, as referring to a state of affairs that both is fundamental to and underlies the present sequence of biological phenomena that is described by science.

MONOPHYSITISM

The schismatic and eventually heretical movement that sprang from the exaggerated insistence on one nature ($\mu \acute{o} \nu \eta \ \phi \acute{o} \iota \varsigma$) in Jesus Christ. The actual heretical concept of the absorption of the divine nature in the human nature or vice versa is called EUTYCHIANISM, even though it is doubtful that the 5th-century Constantinopolitan archimandrite, EUTYCHES, possessed either the knowledge or the desire to found a doctrine contrary to orthodox tradition.

Background. Theological reflection on the nature of the being of Jesus Christ, at once true God and true man, had caused considerable difficulty in the early Church and had given rise to such heresies as DOCETISM, MODALISM or SABELLIANISM, and ARIANISM. Philosophical speculation under the impulse of both Neoplatonism and, later, Aristotelianism introduced logical considerations that tended to deny that Christ was of the same being or substance as the Father, and therefore truly divine, or that He was at the same time truly human. Soteriological considerations on the other hand played an important part in setting the theological tradition.

The Alexandrians generally, following a Platonic bent, were interested in man's divinization. They took literally the scriptural statement that man was made "in the image and likeness of God" (Gn 1.26); and they found support in Paul's quotations (Acts 17.27–29) of the pagan poets Epimenides ("for in him we live, and move, and have our being") and Aratus ("for we also are his off-spring"). They stressed the fact that through Christ's divinity man would eventually be divinized.

The Antiochians, on the other hand, adopting a more literal approach to Scripture and influenced by Aristotelian logic and empiricism, stressed the humanity of Christ, again with Saint Paul insisting that it was in Christ's Resurrection that mankind was redeemed and that through participation in the Resurrection of Christ man would be fulfilled in grace and glory, since Christ restored His own and all humanity through the triumph of His Resurrection.

Cyril and the Controversy. To emphasize the human side of Christ's being, DIODORE OF TARSUS spoke of Mary as the Christotokos (Christ-bearer), instead of the traditional THEOTOKOS (God-bearer); and NESTORIUS as patriarch of Constantinople attempted in his sermons to force the issue. In reaction, the monks and the clergy called upon CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA for assistance. Acting on a commission from Pope CELESTINE I, Cyril seized control of the Council of EPHESUS (431), condemned Nestorius and, with his twelve anathemas, attempted to root out totally the very possibility of NESTORIANISM, the doctrine that the human nature and the divine nature in Christ were merely a mixture or indwelling of one in the other. To avoid the possibility of alleging that there are "two persons or two sons" in Christ, Cyril seized on the formula μία φύσις τοῦ θεοῦ λόγου σεσαρκωμένη, i.e., one nature of the word God Incarnate. He attributed the phrase to his predecessor in Alexandria, Athanasius; actually the sentence was of Apollinarist origin.

The problem revolved round the meaning of the word φύσις (nature), used by Apollinaris and Nestorius and accepted by Cyril in the sense of a concrete and subsistent nature. In this meaning, it is a perfect synonym for ύπόστασις and πρόσωπον, or person. Used of Christ, φύσις (physis or nature) in this sense meant the one sole Person of the Word, eternally subsistent, Who had extended His proper subsistence to the concrete and complete individual human nature to which He was united by the Incarnation. This is the way Cyril used the words mia physis (one nature) and the manner in which it was employed by the followers of Cyril. When the theologians of the Council of Chalcedon and the Nestorians spoke of two natures in Christ, they were employing an earlier traditional meaning of the word physis, or nature, in which it was completely distinct from the hypostasis or prosopon as used for the Persons in the theologia of the Trinity.

Cyril and the Monophysites changed the meaning of physis, or nature, to a complete person in dealing with Christ in the economia of salvation, and thus gave rise to the dispute that gravely disturbed the Oriental Church for 1,000 years. They had in mind the destroying of the equivocation of the extreme Nestorian position that admitted two persons in Christ, that of the Word and that of the Son of Mary. But they occasioned the danger of having the human nature of Christ considered as something automatic, deprived of truly human spontaneity and free activity. To avoid this danger, the Council of CHALCEDON had adopted a dyophysite, or two-nature, explanation, explicitly justifying the concepts and terminology of Cyril, but adapting the meaning of physis to the older Trinitarian terminology and speaking of Christ as "of two natures."

Monophysite Revolt. This terminology was rejected by the Monophysites, beginning with the Egyptians, and their revolt spread through the Orient. In actual fact, the rejection of the Chalcedonian doctrine was verbal or semantic rather than truly doctrinal, and in the course of the subsequent disputes, only a few groups of Monophysites held positions that were actually heretical in the sense of claiming that Christ's divinity absorbed the humanity or vice versa.

Attempts by the imperial authorities to pacify the Monophysites through compromise statements such as the HENOTICON of Zeno and various decrees of JUSTINIAN I were of no avail: these decrees were rejected as inadequate by the Monophysites and by the orthodox as dangerous to the doctrinal definition of Chalcedon. The leaders of theological thought among the Monophysites, such as Timothy Aelurus, Peter Mongus, Peter the Fuller, Philoxenus of Mabbugh, James Baradai, and above all SE-VERUS OF ANTIOCH, who gave the movement its solid theological foundation and coherence, were not formal heretics. They repudiated the Eutychian explanation, and they fully maintained the integrity of the two natures in Christ after the union in the Incarnation, without mixture or confusion. J. LEBON has proved this conclusively in regard to Severus; and more recent study of the writings of the other leaders confirms the testimony of contemporaries of theirs such as Vigilius of Thapsus, Timothy of Constantinople, and later JOHN DAMASCENE. The Monophysites proved schismatical in tendency in that they refused to accept the Council of Chalcedon and the obedience demanded by the Holy See as well as by the orthodox-minded emperors. Their position was made finally untenable by the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II (553), which, although apparently concerned primarily with the condemnation of the Three Chapters and the Nestorian position, so restated the teaching of Chalcedon as to canonize that Council's doctrine. In so doing, Justinian's council failed to prevent problems that would arise in the next century with MONOTHELITISM and Monergism; but it did provide the death blow for aberrations such as Theopaschitism, Aphthartodocetism, and those of sects issuing from Severian or Trinitarian Monophysitism.

MONOTHELITISM

A 7th-century Christological heresy that originated in an attempt to return the Monophysites to orthodox doctrine by means of formulas that stated that in Christ there was only one operation, energeia, proceeding from a unique will, monon thelēma. The history of Monothelitism covers a period of 60 years ending with its condemnation in the Sixth Ecumenical Council, CONSTANTINOPLE III (681).

The background to the Monothelite development is furnished by Severian MONOPHYSITISM, which employed the terminology of St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA concerning the one nature in Christ to express the oneness of His Person. As a result, an expression such as one will and one operation in Christ had come into theological usage, although errors such as APOLLINARIANISM had been condemned for denying that Christ had a human soul and maintaining that He had only one divine will. SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH (512–518) had insisted that since Christ was a unity, the divine and human natures were so coordinated that one could speak of but one will and one action.

Patriarch Eulogius of Alexandria (580-607) had defended the doctrine of two wills and two activities in Christ. His adversaries, relying on the doctrine of Severus, spoke of one sole will proceeding from one sole subject willing. While for Severus this formula was susceptible of an orthodox interpretation, it led to the heresy of Monothelitism. Sergius I of Constantinople (610-638) had proposed to Emperor HERACLIUS that the Monophysites of Syria and Egypt could be brought back into the Church by speaking of one energy or operation in Christ, and advances were made to George Arsas, head of the Monophysite section of Egypt, and to Paul the Blind in Armenia without great success. But in 626 the emperor contacted Cyrus, Metropolitan of Sebastopolis, who accepted the explanations given by Sergius and interested Theodore of Pharan, Arabia, in the same. In 631 Heraclius named Cyrus patriarch of Alexandria, commissioning him to bring the Monophysites back into the Church. The Act of Union (June 3, 633) explicitly professed "one Christ and Son, performing things attributable to God and man in one theandric operation" (Mansi 11:565). At the same time Heraclius completed a treaty of union with the Armenian Church.

The difficulty with this doctrine lay in the fact that monoenergism connotes a unique operation that could proceed from the coordination of divine and human wills in Christ and would therefore be orthodox; but it can also mean a unique source of operation and would deny the human will in Christ.

SOPHRONIUS OF JERUSALEM, while still a monk in Alexandria, protested the monoenergism doctrine to Sergius of Constantinople; and the latter suggested that instead of speaking of two operations in Christ, the Fathers and Councils had spoken rather of the one sole Person operating in the divine and human actions of the Word Incarnate. In 634 Sergius wrote in this sense to Pope HONORIUS I (625–638), and his doctrinal explanation (psēphos) served as a basis for the Ecthesis published by Heraclius in 638. The doctrine of one will in Christ, though not explicitly asserted, is implicit in this document.

The reply of Pope Honorius accepted the suggested prohibition against speaking of one or two operations (energeiai) in Christ and, to exclude the possibility of a conflict between the human and divine wills in Christ, spoke of one will. In Christ the one Person there can be no dualism or antagonism in His willing. In 634 Sophronius, now patriarch of Jerusalem, sent the pope his Epistula Synodica, in which he clearly distinguished the operations of the two natures and spoke of theandric acts as intermediary between operations proceeding from the human nature alone and operations proceeding from the divine nature alone.

The doctrine expressed in the Ecthesis of Heraclius stressed the one will in Christ in a sense of the act of the will; but it was interpreted generally to mean a suppression or fusion of the human will in Christ, and as a consequence it was condemned by Pope JOHN IV (640-642) in a Roman synod. Both Pope THEODOREI and MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR further condemned Monothelitism, appealing to the doctrine of the Greek Fathers of the 4th century and stressing the indissoluble union between Christology and the dogma of the Redemption. In 647 Pope Theodore I excommunicated Patriarch Paul of Constantinople when the latter refused to condemn Monothelitism, and Emperor Constans II (641-668) in 647 issued a Typos (rule for faith) prohibiting all discussion of one or two wills and operations in Christ (Mansi 10:1029-32). Pope MARTIN I held a synod in the Lateran basilica that condemned Monothelitism and the Typos. In reprisal both the pope and St. Maximus were seized, taken to Constantinople, tortured, and exiled. Only after the assassination of Emperor Constans II in 668 did the Typos become a dead letter. Later Emperor Constantine IV (668-685) authorized the convocation of the Council of Constantinople III (680–681) by Pope Agatho. Two natural activities and two natural wills were defined as well as the preservation of free will in Christ; and misunderstanding was eliminated by stressing the inseparability, distinction, and harmony of the two wills in Christ.

MONROY É HIJAR, ANTONIO

Mexican Dominican educator and archbishop of Santiago de Compostela, Spain; b. Querétaro, Mexico, c. 1632–34; d. Santiago de Compostela, Nov. 7, 1715. His father, Antonio, acted as the general moderator of Mexico City, and his mother was Doña María de Hijar y Figueroa. He received his bachelor's degree in philosophy in 1652 and joined the Dominicans in 1654 in Mexico City. Subsequently he taught theology at the University of Mexico and at the Dominican College of Porta-Coeli, Jacques Marie Monsabré.

Mexico City. The provincial chapter of 1663 recommended him for the degree of Praesentatus, and the chapter of 1667 for that of master of theology. He was a consultant of the Holy Office and was sent to Rome as definitor to the general chapter. There he was elected master general in 1677. He called upon the fathers in the chapter to revise the constitution and to restore more perfectly the common life in Dominican convents. In 1685 he was appointed archbishop of Santiago de Compostela. He was also chaplain for King Charles II, who made him a grandee of Spain. In his diocese he was zealous in correcting morals and restoring discipline. The income of the see, about 100,000 ducats, was used to build infirmaries, convents, chapels, and churches and to help the poor. He collected a large library, which was given to the Jesuits upon his death.

MONSABRÉ, JACQUES MARIE

Dominican preacher; b. Blois, France, Dec. 12, 1827; d. Le Havre, Feb. 22, 1907. Baptized Louis, he attended the Grand Seminaire, Blois, and was ordained there in 1851. At once he sought an exeat in order to join the Dominicans, which was refused. He was successively curate at the church of St. Vincent de Paul, Blois; curate at a chapel in Mer, where his brother was curé; and tutor with a private family. In 1855 he was released from the diocese, and on May 31 he joined the Dominicans at Flavigny. A year later, after profession, he went to the priory at Chalais des Alpes, where he studied the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas.

In 1857 he began his preaching career with a series of sermons at Saint-Nizier's, Lyons, whence he was invited to preach at the cathedral. Later in the year, in the chapel of St. Thomas Aquinas in Paris, he commenced a series of conferences that continued until 1865. Meanwhile he developed an international reputation, filling pulpits in Paris, Brussels, and London, as well as in the French provinces. In 1867 he became the regular preacher in the Dominican church in Paris.

In 1869 Monsabré was invited to preach the Advent course in Notre Dame to replace Père Loyson, who had been excommunicated that fall. His success won him an invitation to preach the Lenten course at Notre Dame, succeeding the famous Jesuit Père Felix. There, during Lent of 1872, he preached a course on Christianity in society. The next year he began a series devoted to the exposition of Christian dogma that he continued to its completion in 1890. That year he retired to the priory at Le Havre but continued to do some preaching. In 1890 he gave an Advent course in Rome and, in 1891, at Toulouse. At Le Havre he began a series of Lenten courses in 1897, a series that continued until 1903 and was published as the Petits câremes.

Apart from his priorship in Le Havre (1881–84), Monsabré had not been involved in administrative positions, but he represented the province of France at general chapters of the order in 1871 at Ghent and in 1891 at Avila. His life was devoted to study and the preparation of his sermons. In 1873, at the age of 40, he had set himself the task of placing in a French setting everything in the theology of St. Thomas Aquinas that could be effectively preached. In the history of the pulpit of Notre Dame, he is not renowned, as are Lacordaire and many of his successors, for his appeal to the heart. Rather, he followed the classic formulas of Bossuet and Bordaloue. He aimed at instructing the intelligence in order that the heart be left with lasting motivation, and to this end he discovered the secret of melding into classic French oratory the strength of Aquinas. His collected sermons fill 35 volumes (8th ed. Paris 1901-04).

MONSIGNOR

Title of French origin introduced into the papal household during the years of the pontifical court's stay in Avignon. It is now given to all clerics who belong to the papal household (except cardinals, although also addressed as monseigneur in French), i.e., palatine prelates (his excellency, the most reverend monsignor), papal chamberlains (if participating, right reverend monsignor, if supernumerary, very reverend monsignor), domestic prelates (right reverend monsignor), masters of the papal ceremonies (right reverend monsignor), secret chaplains, common chaplains, secret clerics, as well as to bishops not commonly used in English. All vicars-general of dioceses, being automatically honorary prothonotaries apostolic, enjoy the title, even if not members of the papal household. According to ancient tradition, the title is often given by courtesy to consistorial advocates, who are ceremonially dressed in crimson-lined and crimsonbuttoned cassock, although they are generally laymen.

Use of the title of monsignor has been altered somewhat by the Instruction of the Papal Secretariat of State, Ut sive sollicite, March 31, 1969 [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 61 (1969) 334-340]. The title may continue to be used of bishops, who, along with the superior prelates of the offices of the Roman Curia without episcopal rank, the Auditors of the Roman Rota, the Promotor General of Justice and the Defender of the Bond of the Apostolic Signatura, the Apostolic Prothonotaries de numero and the four Clerics of the Camera, may be addressed as "Most Reverend." For lesser prelates (supernumerary apostolic prothonotaries, prelates of honor, and chaplains of His Holiness), the distinction between "Right Reverend" and "Very Reverend" has been abolished. For them, the title may be preceded where appropriate by "Reverend."

MONSTRANCE

A liturgical vessel used for showing the Blessed Sacrament at exposition and benediction, and in processions. Its name and the alternative name of Ostensorium are derived from the Latin words monstrare and ostendere, both meaning "to show."

The monstrance appeared first in France and Germany in the course of the 14th century, as a result of devotion to the Real Presence fostered by the institution of the feast of Corpus Christi (see CORPUS ET SANGUINIS CHRIS-TI). At first the Blessed Sacrament was shown in reliquaries of the type that had a vertical glass cylinder mounted on a base like that of a chalice and surmounted by some kind of gothic metal crown. Some monstrances, intended for use in processions, were so big they had to be drawn along on carts. During the baroque age the cylindrical glass was superseded by the flat "windowpane" type of monstrance, usually surrounded by metal rays; there were also other types in which the base or stem was developed into chalice forms or even Jesse Trees. Some were made like statues of Christ or the Blessed Virgin Mary and showed the Blessed Sacrament through a circular pane of glass set into the breast. More recent monstrances are far simpler and more functional. The Host is fitted into a holder called a lunette, which slides into a fitting accessible from the back of the monstrance.

MONT-CORNILLON, MONASTERY OF

In Liège, Belgium, originally a double MONASTERY. In 1106 Bp. Albert of Liège gave a chapel there to canons regular, who in 1124? became Premonstratensians under the Abbot Luke (works ed. by J. Faber, Frankfurt 1538). In 1140 some of the nuns went to Reckheim. Those who remained at Mont-Cornillon were thereafter regarded as Augustinian canonesses rather than as Norbertines. St. JULIANA (d. 1258), who began the devotion to Corpus Christi, lived there. In 1360 the convent was transferred to Carthusians, who were suppressed in 1796. A Carmelite convent now occupies the site. The male community moved to Beaurepart on the riverside in 1288 and continued as a flourishing Norbertine abbey of the circary (province) of FLOREFFE. Its abbots obtained the right to wear the ring in 1390 and the miter in 1659. Beaurepart was suppressed in 1796 and is now used for the bishop's residence and the major seminary.

MONT-SAINT-MICHEL, ABBEY OF

A former Benedictine foundation and the principal shrine of the Archangel MICHAEL in northern Europe, situated in the Diocese of Coutances and the arrondissement of Avranches, Manche Department, France, on a rocky island connected to the mainland by a tidal causeway. In obedience to a vision of St. Michael, AUBERT, Bishop of Avranches, built an oratory on this site c. 708, and in 966 Richard I, Duke of Normandy, endowed a BENEDICTINE monastery there, giving the abbot temporal jurisdiction over the island. In c. 1023 Abbot Hildebert II caused a platform to be leveled on the summit of the rock in order to build a new church, and this was only the first stage of a plan to cover the entire rock with monastic buildings, an undertaking that was made difficult by the nature of the terrain as well as by the hazards of war and fire. Nevertheless this grand design was accomplished in 1520 when the choir was completed; and because the monastery occupied so important a strategic position in the wars between France and England in the later Middle Ages, it was also strongly fortified. From 1523 to 1622 the house was administered by commendatory abbots (see COMMENDATION), and the community declined. It was then given to the MAURISTS, who remained there until the French Revolution, when the house was secularized. From 1789 to 1863 the monastery was used as a prison, but in 1874 it was recognized as a public monument, and necessary restorations in the structure were undertaken. Since 1922 the monastery church has been restored to use as a place of worship.

MONT SAINTE-ODILE, CONVENT OF

On a peak of the Vosges mountains in Alsace, founded c. 690 by (St.) ODILIA (also foundress of NIEDER-MÜNSTER), whose shrine was an important place of pilgrimage during the Middle Ages. It followed its own rule until Abbess Relindis (d. 1169) introduced the Augustinian rule. Under the Abbess Herrad (1167–95) the convent, then called Hohenburg, was famous for its spiritual atmosphere and the nuns' intellectual attainments. After fire forced the religious to leave in 1546, the shrine was cared for by the PREMONSTRATENSIANS until the French Revolution, when the property was sold into private hands. In 1853 it was purchased by the bishop of Strasbourg, and the buildings have been gradually rebuilt. Sisters of the Cross now operate a hostelry and care for the shrine. Its German name is Odilienberg.

MONTAIGNAC DE CHAUVANCE, LOUISE-THÉRÈSE DE, BL.

Foundress of the Oblates of the Sacred Heart of Jesus; b. May 14, 1820, Le-Havre-de-Grace, France; d. June 22, 1885, Moulins, France.

As the daughter of a wealthy financier—Aimé Montaignac de Chauvance and his wife Anne de Ruffin—Louise-Thérèse was educated at a boarding school from age seven. Although she did not pursue a Carmelite vocation, she made a private vow of perpetual chastity (Sept. 8, 1843), founded the Guild of the Tabernacle for Perpetual Adoration (1848) and an orphanage at Montluçon.

With the help of her aunt, she formed (1852) an association of Christian women at Montluçon with the mission of restoring the faith in France. This became the Pious Union of the Oblates of the Sacred Heart (Dec. 21, 1874) dedicated to "renewing society by their example and their holy lives." Montaignac was elected superior general on May 17, 1880 and held that office until her death. The oblates live in community or secular life in Europe, Africa, and Central America and continue her work of operating orphanages, providing religious education, financing poor parishes, and directing retreats.

Montaignac also founded the "Samuels" for the formation of young Christians discerning religious vocations. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II, Nov. 4, 1990.

Feast: June 22.

MONTAIGNE, MICHEL EYQUEM DE

French writer and moralist, author of the Essais, widely considered to be finest of its type in world literature; b. at the château of Montaigne, Périgord, Feb. 28, 1533; d. there, Sept. 13, 1592. Few people have held the attention of their fellow men for so long and as steadily as has Montaigne, and this although he never really wanted public reaction. He tells future readers at the opening of the Essais that his book has but one aim: to be a sincere and unadorned self-portrait that will serve kinfolk and friends as a living reminder of himself. Emerson has called Montaigne a "representative man." This he says because the good sense of the Essais has impressed readers through the years; at the same time, the author holds them with the magic of his personality and the charm of his humanity.

Montaigne's father, born of rich, middle-class merchants only recently ennobled, had returned from the Italian wars under the spell of Renaissance splendors and the new knowledge he had found in Italy. He was anxious to apply this learning to the education of his son and heir. The awakening of the young Montaigne to the gentle sounds of music, for example, was not due to any epicurean tendency on the part of his father. The boy had merely read the Italian philosopher Cardano, who taught that the person who awakes abruptly may have his body invaded by a soul not his own. This mixture of superstition and enthusiasm for experiment and new learning is typical of the intellectual climate into which Montaigne had been born. His father also decided that the boy's first language would be Latin, and he employed a German tutor, Horstanus, who spoke no French. When Montaigne went to the Collège de Guyenne at the age of six, he already spoke Latin fluently. He was later critical of both his secondary education and the legal training it opened to him at the University of Toulouse. He aspired to the Italian ideal of the uomo universale and after many years of reading, thinking, and study he was to come very close to achieving it.

Early Years. Montaigne's youthful days were marked by the hedonism characteristic of the nobility of the century; yet it was in this same early period that he became the close friend and admirer of Étienne de la Boétie, whose deep love of learning and moderation were to have so profound an influence on him. At this time, too, he made a most significant decision: to remain within the Catholic fold, although his family, like so many in the realm, was divided—his brother and sister espousing the "new religion." He followed his father's footsteps in choosing a profession and practiced law in the Parlement of Bordeaux. His intellectual life really began, however, when his father asked him to translate the Theologia Naturalis (c. 1400) of Raymond of Sabunde, a work often cited against the heretics of the century. In the meantime, he married Françoise de la Chassaigne in 1565.

In 1571, Montaigne decided to retire from the world to his château, probably because he desired to secure greater independence and because he had little taste for the political arena. It is almost impossible to describe the state of France at this time. The massacre of thousands of Protestants on ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY (Aug. 24, 1572) marked a high point of terror and destruction that had not been equalled since the Hundred Years' War. With death surrounding him and with the example of his friend La Boétie in mind, Montaigne determined to devote the last years of his life to contemplation and study. The place he had chosen for it commands even today beautiful green and rolling country in an atmosphere of calm and peace.

Here he began the Essais, which were to be developed and added to for the next 20 years. His great source of ideas was his reading: the Roman poets, Seneca, the Greeks in translation, and especially Plutarch's Lives in Amyot's French translation. At first, his purpose was simply to compile anecdotes with brief commentaries. Very much attracted to the stoical humanism that was then the intellectual vogue in France, he gradually came to see that for him, a passive rather than an active man, such a stance was not possible; he decided to live and let live rather than to seek violent changes. Although he realized the importance of good intentions, he could not help but note the mediocre results of much of human effort. And, unlike many of his contemporaries, he was struck by the inhuman demands of the Stoical position, especially with regard to suicide, which he knew to be at variance with his Catholic faith.

So-called Skeptical Crisis. The subsequent stage in Montaigne's development is often referred to as his skeptical crisis. He did indeed doubt the unreal academic attitude of the Stoics as well as the rigid dogmatism of philosophers in general, but Montaigne, the universal and all-corrosive doubter, is a fiction created by such Jansenist fanatics as Pierre NICOLE in the seventeenth century. (It was at this time, too—1676—that Montaigne was put on the Index of Forbidden Books by the Church, although strangely enough, the folio giving the Church's reasons for this is missing.) The main evidence adduced by those who accused him of universal skepticism is the chapter of the Essais entitled "The Apology of Raymond de Sebond" (see RAYMOND OF SABUNDE), which includes his famous phrase, "que sais-je?" It is a disconcerting essay which has meant many things to many readers. Today scholars are mostly in agreement that the essay is not to be read as a betrayal of Sabunde. Rather it is a layman's attempt, as Montaigne clearly says, to defend the orthodox faith he holds in common with Sabunde. The structure of the essay, however, is curious. It is divided into two unequal parts.

In defending Sabunde, Montaigne first attacks the fideists. That he devotes so few pages to them has led many critics to accuse Montaigne of FIDEISM. But both faith and reason have their role to play in traditional theology; faith is the source, but reason applies itself within these limits to the object of inquiry. This is precisely Montaigne's position.

The second group of adversaries are the rationalists. These Montaigne with ill-disguised enjoyment excoriates in a long attack. He shows—and Pascal was to remember his arguments—that man without God is nothing; that knowledge and reason do not necessarily add to man's happiness; and that the most learned of rationalists have always disagreed. It is at this point in the chapter, after pointing to the bloody quarrels occasioned largely by the Calvinist rejection of TRANSUBSTANTIATION, that he inserts his wise "que sais-je?" He approaches the last part of his defense with much misgiving; he warns us that here his argument is most dangerous for he is going to prove that not only does man know nothing, but also that he can know nothing. His conclusion is that man is a wretched being at best, whom only the grace of God can raise to dignity.

What must be remembered in analyzing the "Apology" is that Montaigne's attack on reason, filled with paradoxes and contradictions, is a kind of intellectual exercise. Where he is deadly serious is in attacking the rigorist rationalists whose vain presumption has brought much unhappiness to mankind, for they love not men but problems, and thus indulge in what seems to him the worst of human follies. Following his own counsel of moderation, he seems to shift his purpose in the Essais (about 1578–80); he now intends simply to portray himself in all his manifold human aspects.

Although Montaigne in a sense retired from active life, he set off on a long journey in 1580 and 1581. His Journal de voyage is a delightful and entertaining travel book filled with curiosity concerning the lands and persons he meets. But even travel helps Montaigne to see himself—this time against a different background—and thus aids him in his self-study. While he was traveling, he was elected mayor of Bordeaux. He returned home for two years and then was reelected for a second two-year term ending in 1585. When he returned to private life, the civil war was raging even worse than before, and, to add to his woes, the plague forced him and his family to abandon the château for six months. As he wandered about, he was much impressed with the quiet courage and heroism in the face of death that he noticed among simple peasants, ignorant of all philosophy. He began to abandon his own apprehensiveness about death and renewed his confident optimism in human nature. It was in this spirit that he began work on the Essais once more.

Last Years. These last years of Montaigne's life were fraught with peril and sickness. Since his travels, he had suffered from kidney stones, and in these years (1586–92) his many painful bouts became worse. Yet it was during this period that he wrote the 13 great chapters of the last book of the Essais. Moreover, he had become too well known and respected not to take an important role in the negotiations between King Henry II and his successor, King Henry IV. While in Paris in 1588, probably on such a mission, he published his first edition of the Essais, containing all three books. Returning to his château, he spent his last days adding almost a thousand passages to his great work and correcting its style. In this last stylistic revision he tends to shift from long philosophical exposition and classical rhetorical periods to the familiar style of conversation. The movement of his thinking is one of overlapping circles of argument; what counts most in Montaigne is his matter, not his manner. Montesquieu says of him: "In most authors I see the man who writes; in Montaigne I see the man who thinks."

And yet it is difficult to define Montaigne's thought. He seems most intent in seeking out the real nature of man and deducing from that how he should live. Montaigne is not a systematic philosopher. He is rather a practical moralist who notes that there are vast differences among men and yet that "all of moral philosophy can be applied as well to a common and private life as to one of richer stuff. Every man carries in himself the entire form of the human state" [The Essays of Michel de Montaigne, tr. and ed. J. Zeitlin (New York 1936), 3.2:15; subsequent quotations are from this edition.] Moreover, man is composed of soul and body, and real wisdom consists in recognizing this duality, which means precisely that we have great limitations but possess even greater possibilities. "In the experience I have of myself, I find enough to make me wise, if I were a good scholar." And he later adds: "Let us but give ear to it, and we tell ourselves everything of which we chiefly stand in need" (3.13:273–274). Therefore, to live happily, we must first know ourselves and live in harmony with ourselves. Not an easy task for most but surely the most important work in life. "Have you known how to think out and manage your own life? You have then performed the greatest work of all. . . . Our duty is to compose our character. . . . Our great and glorious masterpiece is to live appropriately" (3.13:309).

The key to all this is a realistic acceptance of nature as our guide. Of course, Montaigne realized that mere nature cannot always be relied upon, but he was a man of his age in urging us to enjoy to the hilt the legitimate and abundant pleasures of this life for "it is an absolute perfection and, as it were divine, for a man to know how to enjoy his existence as he ought" (3.13.316). Or again: "For my part then, I love life and cultivate it, such as it has pleased God to bestow it upon us. . . . A man does wrong to the great omnipotent giver in refusing, nullifying, or disfiguring His gift. All goodness Himself, He has made all things good" (3.13:313-314). But this confidence was possible for Montaigne only because he had learned, in studying himself, another and equally valid principle: "I am pleased not to be sick; but if I am I would know that I am. . . . Evil is proper to man in its turn. Pain is not always to be avoided, nor pleasure always to be pursued" (2.12:153).

Montaigne died while Mass was being said in his room, fully conscious of the Real Presence. He had made great progress from his early hedonism, pessimism, and Stoicism up to the final and growing confidence in the goodness of God and hope in a common humanity. Montaigne's contribution to Western thought is his humanism, especially if we define that humanism as respect for what makes man human: intelligence, responsibility, freedom, and the revealed knowledge that he is the adopted son of God.

MONTAL FORNÉS, PAULA, ST.

Known in religion as Paula of St. Joseph Calasanctius, foundress of the Daughters of Mary of the Pious Schools (Hijas de Maria, Religiosas de las Escuelas Pias); b. Oct. 11, 1799, Arenys de Mar (near Barcelona), Spain; d. Feb. 26, 1889, Olesa de Montserrat near Barcelona, Spain. Born into a large family of artisans, Paula began working to help support the family after her father's death (1789). Paula grew especially concerned about the formation of Christian women while teaching in schools. In 1829 with her friend Iñes (Agnes) Busquets, she opened a school in Figueras near Gerona and dedicated herself "to bring families to eternal salvation by teaching children the fear of God." She opened an additional seven schools. Montal was aided in her effort by the PIARISTS, especially Augustín Casanovas, who is considered the cofounder. Both sought to instill in the new institute the spirit of (St.) JOSEPH CALASANCTIUS, by adapting to women the constitutions that he wrote for the Piarists. By the time of her death, the order had more than 300 sisters operating 19 schools throughout Spain. Her cause was introduced in 1959. She was declared venerable in 1988 and beatified by John Paul II, April 18, 1993. A second miracle attributed to her intercession was approved July 1, 2000, opening the way to her canonization, which was held on Nov. 25, 2001.

Feast: Feb. 26 (Archdiocese of Barcelona).

MONTALEMBERT, CHARLES FORBES RENÉ DE

Catholic liberal, politician, publicist, historian, and orator; b. London, April 15, 1810; d. Paris, March 13, 1870. His father, Count Marc René de Montalembert, joined the French Revolutionary émigrés and then served in the British army. His mother, Eliza (Forbes) de Montalembert, was an English Protestant who became a Catholic in 1822. When the parents returned to France (1814), they left Charles in England with his grandfather James Forbes, a well-known author and a devout Protestant, who instilled in the boy a religious piety and a zeal for learning that remained throughout his life. Under his mentor's influence Montalembert developed also an admiration for the British parliamentary system as the epitome of sound liberal government. When he returned to France in 1819 to continue his education in Paris at the Lycée Bourbon and later at the Collège Ste. Barbe (1827), he was shocked by the bitterly antireligious spirit evident among professors and students behind their façade of religious practice enforced by the restoration government. The classmates of Charles were equally surprised to find him a pious Catholic who was ardently liberal in politics. From an early date, therefore, Montalembert confronted the problem that absorbed his energies throughout life: the reconciliation between political liberalism and Catholicism.

Historical Writings. In 1828, during a stay in Stockholm, where his father was ambassador, Montalembert was introduced to the works of Joseph von GÖRRES and others in the Munich school of romantic philosophers. Their frankly Catholic spirit and enthusiasm for the Middle Ages stirred the youth's interest in the medieval period and inspired him to write his chief historical works, Histoire de Sainte Elisabeth de Hongrie (1836) and Les Moines de L'Occident (7 v. 1860–77). Both his life of St. Elizabeth and his history of the monks of the West, now outdated, were translated into English and were once widely read.

When bourgeois liberalism triumphed over both throne and altar in the revolution of 1830, Montalembert was traveling in Ireland, where he was attracted by Daniel O'CONNELL and his victorious campaign to win religious and political EMANCIPATION for Catholics. While there, he learned that Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS and a group of young Catholic liberals planned to publish in Paris a newspaper, L'Avenir, dedicated to the cause of "God and Liberty." Montalembert hurried to Paris and offered his services. Along with LACORDAIRE he became one of the most dedicated and enthusiastic collaborators of Lamennais. When GREGORY XVI condemned the teaching of Lamennais, Montalembert strove to prevent the Breton priest from leaving the Church. The association between the two men ended in 1836. In that year Montalembert married Elisabeth de Mérode, daughter of Felix de Mérode, a Catholic leader in the movement for Belgian independence.

Montalembert gained fame as a politician who used his outstanding oratorical and journalistic talents in defense of the Church's rights, but he merited permanent significance as one of the most forceful voices seeking a reconciliation between the Church and the new type of society that emerged from the FRENCH REVOLUTION. Much as he disliked many of the ideas and institutions that dated from 1789, he believed that the Church must learn to live without special privileges as one of several religious groups operating under laws applicable equally to all of them.

Ideological Position. When he entered parliament (1837), Montalembert struggled on two fronts. He tried to persuade liberals that Catholics could be loyal to the new regime and that the Church, therefore, should be granted freedom to operate its own secondary schools as promised in the charter of 1830. Second, he sought to disabuse Catholics, including most of the higher clergy and influential laymen, of their yearnings for a return of the ancien régime; he aimed also to train them to win their rights in and through parliamentary processes. Montalembert also advocated the outlawing of slavery by legislation, French colonial expansion, the independence of the STATES OF THE CHURCH, the rights of the Poles, Irish, and other oppressed peoples, and the rights of the French parliament. He held that recognition of the Church's right to operate secondary schools was the touchstone of liberal sincerity and an essential to the Church's progress, which required the development of an enlightened laity. Freedom of education was also the one cause capable of uniting Catholics of all political persuasions. This was the program that enabled Montalembert to organize a Catholic party that elected 140 deputies pledged to support Catholic schools (1846). Before these representatives could press their advantage, the Revolution of 1848 ended the regime of Louis Philippe. Under the Second Republic (1848–52), Montalembert won the cooperation of bourgeois politicians, who feared revolution more than religion, and secured the passage of the Falloux Law, which permitted the Church to operate secondary schools.

The fall of the July Monarchy in 1848 did not please Montalembert because it deprived him of his favorite forum in the House of Peers and because the rising popular demands for social reforms under the succeeding regime frightened him. He used his influence with Catholic voters to inaugurate the Second Empire under NAPOLEON III in order to provide France with a strong government. Before long, however, the emperor's authoritarianism deeply embarrassed and disillusioned him, but he was unable to persuade Catholics to break with Napoleon III. Louis VEUILLOT, a talented journalist and an ardent advocate of authoritarian government, replaced Montalembert as the outstanding Catholic leader. In matters concerning France, Veuillot, a leader of French ULTRAMONTANISM, was also more influential with Pope Pius IX, who became more conservative after 1848 and who was forced to depend on Napoleon III for the preservation of the States of the Church. Montalembert remained in the national legislature until his defeat in 1857, when many Catholics voted against him. Thereafter he grew increasingly isolated and impotent politically, but he continued to contribute to Le Correspondant, the liberal Catholic review started in 1855. He also addressed the French Academy, to which he was elected in 1851.

Montalembert's last great effort to reconcile the Church and liberal society was made at the international Catholic congress in Malines, Belgium (1863). His two speeches there caused a stir in European Catholic circles by urging Catholics to Christianize democracy and not to fear it. He also advocated that the Church accept the principle of religious freedom for all beliefs as a practical necessity in modern society. For his sentiments he received a reproof from Rome. When the encyclical QUANTA CURA and the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS appeared (1864), Montalembert interpreted these papal strictures on liberalism as indictments of his own position and became still more isolated and embittered. News of the convocation of VATI-CAN COUNCIL I pleased him at first, but then alarmed him because he feared the growing power of the PAPACY. He opposed a definition of papal infallibility and dreaded the possibility that Veuillot, W. G. WARD, and other extremists might influence the synod to turn the propositions in the Syllabus of Errors into doctrinal definitions. While the Council was in session Montalembert died. At no time did he contemplate leaving the Church.

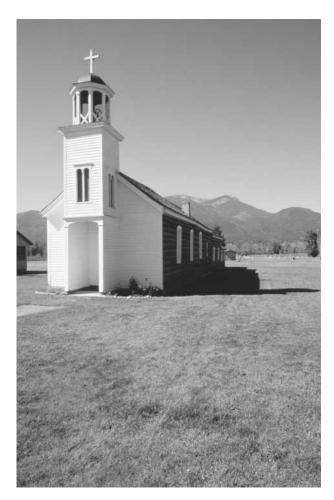

His Vision and Its Limitations. History has demonstrated the essential soundness of Montalembert's intuition concerning the need and the possibility of a political rapproachement between the Church and liberal society. He was correct in insisting that where constitutional government prevails, the interests of the Church and its members are best protected by laymen exercising their political rights as citizens. Unfortunately, his vision was too exclusively political and too narrowly liberal. He ignored almost completely the issues of social justice raised by advancing capitalism; indeed, he won his great victory on the education question, the Falloux law, by siding with property owners and capitalists against the working class. His vision of an ideal political society always remained paternalistic; it was modeled, as is evident in his L'Avenir politique de l'Angleterre (1856), on Britain's constitutional monarchy, which was based firmly on a landowning class of nobles and gentry.

MONTANA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Montana, located in the Rocky Mountain region of the northwest U.S., was admitted to the Union as the 41st state in 1889. The fourth largest state, it is bounded on the north by Canada, on the east by North and South Dakota, on the south by Wyoming and Idaho, and on the west by Idaho. Helena is the capital, and Billings is the largest city. There are two dioceses in the state: the Diocese of Helena (Helenensis) and the Diocese of Great Falls-Billings (Magnocataractensis-Billingensis), both of which are are suffragans of the Metropolitan See of Portland in Oregon. The Diocese of Helena, established in 1884, encompasses the western counties of the state, an area of 51,922 sq. miles, and the Diocese of Great Falls, erected 1904 and redesignated in 1980 as the Diocese of Great Falls-Billings; it consists of the eastern counties, an area of 94,922 sq. miles.

History. The U.S. acquired the eastern two-thirds of the region, an extension of the Great Plains, in the Louisiana Purchase; the predominantly mountainous western third, containing the Continental Divide, passed to the U.S. with the settlement of the Oregon Question. The state contains numbers of Native American tribes, including the more important Gros Ventres, Assiniboine, Blackfoot, Flathead, and Crow tribes, located on reservations under federal supervision.

White fur traders of the Canadian Northwest Fur Company entered Montana either in the late 18th or early 19th century. The first American explorers to enter the region were the members of the Lewis and Clark Expedition (1804–06), who spent considerable time in the area on both the outbound and return phases of their journey. Montana was an important sphere of activity in the furtrading era. The Canadian Northwest Company trapped the western and northwestern sectors of the region; while American groups, such as the Missouri Fur Company, the American Fur Company, and the Rocky Mountain Fur Company, ranged over the entire area. After the decline of the fur trade, mining succeeded as Montana's dominant form of economic activity, later it became energy production (natural gas and oil). Cattle raising and wheat farming are also of importance.

Missionary Activity. Catholicism was introduced in Montana when Iroquois moved west with Canadian fur traders and settled among the Flatheads of western Montana (1811–12), giving the latter a primitive idea of the faith. The Flatheads sent four successive expeditions (1831, 1835, 1837, and 1839) to Bp. J. ROSATI of St. Louis, MO, to obtain the services of missionaries, but lack of available personnel prevented his promising to provide them with services until 1839. In 1840 Pierre Jean DE SMET, SJ, went on an exploratory journey among the natives. One year later he returned with fellow Jesuit priests and lay brothers to establish St. Mary's Mission, thus beginning an era of fruitful Jesuit endeavor among the Native Americans and, later, the whites.

Diocesan Development. Montana became a vicariate apostolic in 1883, and in 1884 the Holy See established the Diocese of Helena, coextensive with the entire territory, with John Baptist BRONDEL, bishop of Victoria, Vancouver Island, Canada, and vicar apostolic of Montana as its first bishop. Until his death on Nov. 3, 1903, Brondel labored dilligently to build the diocese among Native Americans, as well as trappers, miners, and other immigrants to the area. When he arrived in 1884, there were four diocesan priests, 12 religious priests, 16 churches, four hospitals, two parochial schools, two schools for Native Americans and a Catholic population of 15,000. By 1903, the last year of his life, there were 38 diocesan priests, 15 religious priests, 65 churches, eight hospitals, nine parochial schools, ten schools for Native Americans and a Catholic population of 50,000.

Soon after Brondel's death in 1904, his earlier request for a division of the diocese was granted. The eastern two-thirds of the state became the Diocese of Great Falls. Mathias C. Lenihan, pastor in Marshaltown, Iowa, was consecrated the first bishop of the diocese on Sept. 21, 1904. At the time, the diocese had 14 priests, 11 parishes, two schools, and four Native American missions. When Lenihan retired in 1930, there were 68 priests, 45 parishes, 88 missions, 11 schools, 15 Native American missions, four private academies and eight hospitals to care for a Catholic population of 33,345. In the western section of the state, John P. Carroll of Dubuque, Iowa, became the second bishop of Helena, Dec. 21, 1904. Given his academic background as president of St. Joseph College (now Loras College) in Dubuque, IA, it was not surprising that he made Catholic education a high priority. In addition to five high schools, he founded Mt. St. Charles College (now called Carroll College in honor of its founder), which opened in September 1910. Two years earlier, Carroll laid the cornerstone for the magnificent Gothic Cathedral of St. Helena in the see city. It was consecrated Jan. 3, 1924. Bishop Carroll died later that same year, on Nov. 4, 1925. During his episcopacy 32 new parishes were erected.

Meanwhile in eastern Montana, Fr. Edwin V. O'HARA, founder and director of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference and zealous promoter of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine in the United States, was consecrated the second bishop of the Diocese of Great Falls on Oct. 28, 1930. Given the rural nature of the diocese, O'Hara labored to establish the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine program (CCD) locally in order to meet the religious education needs of children and adults. Working with the Sisters of Providence and the Ursuline Sisters, O'Hara founded the College of Great Falls in September 1932. In April 1939 O'Hara was named archbishop of Kansas City, MO.

In western Montana, the unexpected death of Bishop Carroll in 1925 left the Diocese of Helena without a bishop until May 22, 1927, when Pius XI appointed Fr. George J. Finnigan, C.S.C., provincial of the Congregation of the Holy Cross at Notre Dame, IN, the third bishop of the diocese. He was the first member of his religious congregation in the U.S. to be consecrated a bishop. Before his death, Aug. 14, 1932, Finnigan established the CCD program thoughout the diocese and a diocesan newspaper, The Register: Western Montana. On Sept. 23, 1933, Fr. Ralph Leo Hayes of Pittsburg, PA, was consecrated the fourth bishop of the diocese. His brief time in Helena ended in 1935 when he was appointed rector of the North American College in Rome.

In Great Falls, William J. Condon, vicar general of the diocese of Spokane, WA, was consecrated the third bishop of the diocese on Oct. 18, 1939. Until his retirement, Aug. 17, 1967, the diocese witnessed a period of remarkable growth. Given the difficulty of caring for a diocese with such a vast territory, he requested the Holy See to grant him an auxiliary bishop, and on Oct. 30, 1961, Msgr. Eldon B. Schuster, chancellor of the diocese, rector of the cathedral parish, and the superintendent of schools, was appointed titular bishop of Amblada and auxiliary bishop of the Diocese of Great Falls. He was consecrated a bishop on Dec. 21, 1961.

Meanwhile, in the Diocese of Helena, Fr. Joseph M. Gilmore, born in New York but raised in Montana from the age of five, was consecrated the fifth bishop of Helena on Feb. 29, 1936. To meet the needs of a rapidly growing Catholic population, new and larger facilities were needed, and he immediately began to build and strengthen the institutions of the diocese. Accordingly, a new chancery building, 20 new churches, and six new grade schools and high schools were built. The Cathedral of St. Helena was completely renovated in time for the diamond jubilee of the diocese in 1959. His years as bishop were considered by many to be golden building years for the diocese.

When Gilmore died, on April 2, 1962, he was succeeded by Raymond G. Hunthausen, president of Carroll College and a native of Montana. He was consecrated the sixth bishop of the diocese on Aug. 30, 1962. From 1962 to 1966, Hunthausen participated in the sessions of the Second Vatican Council where he met Bishop Angelico Melotto of Solala, Guatemala. Although Guatemala was 90 percent Catholic, Bishop Melotto's diocese was experiencing a critical shortage of clergy. Soon after the meeting, Hunthausen opened the Diocese of Helena's mission in Guatemala. In addition, he labored diligently to implement the decrees of the Second Vatican Council throughout the diocese. With the decline in number of vocations to the priestly and religious life, its impact on the schools, hospitals and parishes in the diocese was dramatic. With schools closing, greater emphasis was placed on the CCD program, which had existed for many years in the rural areas of the diocese. In addition, religious education centers staffed by religious, clergy, and laity were set up throughout the diocese. Although the changes were painful for many, Hunthausen's willingness to listen and his intense desire to be faithful to the teachings of the Second Vatican Council made the difficult transition possible. He was appointed archbishop of Seattle on Feb. 25, 1975.

In the Diocese of Great Falls, Auxiliary Bishop Eldon B. Schuster was chosen to succeed Bishop Condon, on Jan. 23, 1968. Schuster also took part in the sessions of the Second Vatican Council. His diocese did not escape the depletion in the ranks of the clergy and the closing of many Catholic schools in the ensuing years after Vatican II. When Schuster retired on Dec. 27, 1977, Pope Paul VI appointed Thomas J. Murphy to be the fifth bishop of Great Falls. A native of Chicago and rector of Our Lady of the Lake Seminary in Mundelein, IL, Murphy was consecrated bishop on Aug. 26, 1978. He served the diocese until May 27, 1987, when he was named coadjutor archbishop of Seattle. Faced with serious personnel shortages, and with the help of his presbyteral council, Murphy consolidated parishes and schools. Cluster parishes were formed to care for areas with fewer priests. Women religious were called upon to conduct the day-to-day administration of these parishes. Another significant development was the decision to change the name of the diocese, in 1980, to the Diocese of Great Falls-Billings, thus recognizing the importance of the Catholic community in Billings, the largest city in the state.

Anthony M. Milone, auxiliary bishop of Omaha, NE, was named the sixth bishop of the Diocese of Great Falls-Billings on Feb. 23, 1988. At that time, the 73 parishes and 56 missions in the diocese, had only 58 resident pastors. Father Elden F. Curtiss, president-rector of Mount Angel Seminary in St. Benedict, OR, was named by the Holy See to succeed Bishop Hunhausen in Helena. He was consecrated the seventh bishop of the diocese on April 28, 1986. For the next 17 years, Curtiss dealt with a wide range of problems. He chose as his motto a paraphrase of John 17:21, "That we all may be one," and his desire to unify and reconcile a sometimes divided diocesan church was the hallmark of his episcopacy. He presided over a diocesan synod in 1988, the first one held in 80 years. It was announced on May 4, 1993, that Curtiss was named archbishop of Omaha, and Monsignor Alexander J. Brunett of Detroit, MI, was subsequently appointed the eighth bishop of Helena, April 19, 1994, a post he held until he was named archbishop of Seattle, on Oct. 28, 1997. His successor was Robert C. Morlino, another priest of Detroit, who was consecrated the ninth bishop in the Cathedral of St. Helena, Sept. 21, 1999.

At the beginning of the 21st century, there were approximately 125,000 Catholics in Montana, in a total population of about 815,800 persons. They were served by about 122 active diocesan, extern, and religious priests. The two dioceses served five Native American reservations and a total of 124 parishes and 86 missions. Bishops Schuster and Hunthausen established the Montana Catholic Conference on Social Welfare, which in turn led to the formation of Catholic Social Services of (for) Montana and the Montana Catholic Conference.

MONTANISM

A schismatic movement that originated in Phrygia about the middle of the 2d century, spread rapidly and widely through the East and West, and almost completely disappeared during the 5th and 6th centuries. Montanism was a manifestation of a recurring phenomenon in the Church that, for want of a better term, is called "illuminism" or "enthusiasm" and is characterized by a conviction on the part of its devotees that (1) they are a spiritual elite called to restore the Church to its primitive simplicity, (2) they are under the direct guidance of the Holy Spirit, and (3) in their circle are renewed the charismatic gifts common during the period of the Church's first fervor.

Montanus. Montanus, the founder of the sect, was a convert from paganism. Shortly after his conversion he became the leader of a group of illuminati at Ardabau, and later at Pepuza, in Phrygia. He and certain of his followers, notably the women Priscilla (or Prisca) and Maximilla, were seized by religious raptures and, in the course of ecstasy, spoke in strange tongues and uttered prophecies that the sectaries regarded as oracles of the Holy Spirit.

Stories of mysterious apparitions of Christ and the Paraclete were spread abroad, and in the meetings of the Montanists, trances, convulsions, and mass hysteria occurred similar to the bizarre experiences of the Camisards, the Shakers, and the 17th-century visionaries of Paris who danced in the cemetery of Saint-Médard. Phrygia was traditionally the home of frenzy and fanaticism, and it is probably the irrationality and extravagance of Montanism that led opponents to call its adherents Phrygians or Cataphrygians.

Doctrine. During its earliest stages, Montanism was less concerned with doctrine than with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit that the Montanists saw in the transports of their prophets. Some points of discipline were inculcated; certain fasts were introduced; virginity was praised in exaggerated terms; husbands and wives were advised to separate or to live in continence; there were warnings of imminent catastrophes; and true believers were summoned to assemble at Pepuza to await the descent of the new Jerusalem and the coming of the millennium.

Montanists of the second and third generations developed the primitive asceticism of the sect into a doctrinal and disciplinary system that is described in considerable detail by TERTULLIAN, the most famous of its converts. In his Montanist treatises he condemns all second marriages as adultery. He insists that there are some sins that are so serious that the Church cannot or should not forgive them. Flight during time of persecution is a kind of apostasy; relatively mild fasts of the orthodox Church were to be replaced by frequent and prolonged xerophagies or dry fasts. The antihierarchical and anti-institutional prejudices characteristic of Pentecostal groups appear in Tertullian's views on the priesthood of all believers, and in the opposition that he sets up between the internal Church of the Spirit and the external Church of the bishops.

St. JEROME, in describing Montanism, lists the errors already mentioned and says that members of the sect were infected with SABELLIANISM. The claim that the utterances of the new prophets add to or supersede the revelation delivered to the Apostles and handed down in the apostolic churches remained a basic point at issue between Montanists and Catholics.

Importance. The importance of the sect during the early centuries may be judged by the attention it received from ancient Christian writers and ecclesiastics. Clement of Alexandria, Origen, St. Jerome, Sozomen, and, most particularly, Eusebius of Caesarea and Epiphanius furnish information on its historical development and describe the principal tenets of the sect. According to Eusebius the earliest anti-Montanist writings are those of Apollonius (c. 197); the apologists Miltiades, Melito, and Apollinaris of Hierapolis; the Roman Caius; and an anonymous bishop of Asia Minor who composed an influential three-volume work on the subject, c. 192–193 (Hist. Eccl. 5.16–19), Popes Soter (c. 166–175) and Eleutherius (c. 175-189) condemned the movement shortly after its appearance in the Church. The energetic opposition of Pope INNOCENT I (401–417) and the laws of the Emperor HONORIUS I against heresy (Feb. 22, 407) contributed substantially to the decline of Montanism in the West, and some 150 years later the severe anti-Montanist legislation of the Emperor JUSTINIAN I all but destroyed it in the East.

As the movement lost its formal identity, its members either returned to the Church or went over to other Pneumocentric groups such as the Priscillianists and Cathari. However, evidence of the tenacity of some of its adherents and of the sect's stubborn will to live may be seen in a letter of GREGORY THE GREAT (June or July 601) to the bishops of Spain on the invalidity of Montanist baptism. And again as late as the 9th century, according to Ignatius of Nicaea, Nicephorus, Patriarch of Constantinople, urged the emperor to take restrictive measures against the Phrygian heretics.

MONTAVON, WILLIAM F.

Welfare executive; b. Scioto County, Ohio, July 14, 1874; d. Washington, D.C., Feb. 15, 1959. He was the son of John Baptist and Mary (Muller) Montavon. He attended the University of Notre Dame, IN (1892–95), the Institut de Sainte-Croix, Paris (1895–97), and The Catho-University of America, Washington, (1897-1901). He was married in 1901 to Agnes Burrow, who died in 1913, and in 1942 to Leocadia Kerby. He spent his early career in South America, where he served as U.S. commercial attaché in Lima, Peru (1915–18), and as executive representative of the International Petroleum Company (1918–25). In 1925 he returned to the United States to become director of the legal department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, a post he held until 1951. His duties as legal director plunged him into problems created by religious persecution during the Mexican civil war, and for three years the status of the Catholic Church in Mexico occupied much of his time. In 1930 he accompanied the Forbes Commission to Haiti as press correspondent for the Catholic newspapers in the United States. The following year he was sent to Spain to represent Catholic interests at the constitutional assembly in Madrid. His efforts were rewarded by the Holy Father, who named him Knight Commander of the Order of St. Gregory the Great in 1945, and by St. Bonaventure College (later University), New York, which gave him its Catholic Action Medal in 1939. Montavon, an author and lecturer in the fields of health, education, and welfare, served also as consultant to the Catholic Hospital Association and adviser to the U.S. State Department on inter-American relations.

MONTCHEUIL, YVES DE

Theologian; b. Paimpol, France, Jan. 30, 1900; d. Grenoble, Aug. 10, 1944. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1917 and was ordained on Aug. 24, 1932. With a dissertation titled L'Intervention de Malebranche dans la querelle du pur amour, published posthumously as Malebranche et le quiétisme (Paris 1946), he earned a doctorate in theology at the Gregorian University, Rome, in 1936. While teaching dogma at the Institut Catholique de Paris from 1935 to 1944, he exercised zealously the functions of chaplain and counselor for the Catholic Action movement in France. His apostolic zeal occasioned his tragic end. He was arrested while offering priestly ministrations to the dying men of the Resistance, and was shot by the Germans at Grenoble. Besides his work on Malebranche, he wrote two others: Problèmes de vie spirituelle (Paris 1946) and L'Église et le monde actuel (Paris 1946). H. de Lubac gathered De Montcheuil's articles in two volumes titled Mélanges théologiques (Paris 1946).

MONTE, BARTOLOMEO MARIA DAL, BL.

Diocesan priest, missionary, preacher; b. Nov. 3, 1726, Bologna, Italy; d. Dec. 24, 1778, at Bologna. The son of Orazio dal Monte and Anna Maria Bassani, Bartolomeo was confirmed (1733) by Cardinal Prospero Lambertini of Bologna, the future Pope Benedict XIV. Bartolomeo studied at the Jesuit Santa Lucia College for a career as a banker. LEONARD OF PORT MAURICE, himself later canonized, encouraged Bartolomeo to ignore his father's opposition to a priestly vocation; Bartolomeo was ordained in 1749 and completed his seminary studies in theology (1750–51). He then undertook his life's work: preaching missions and retreats not only in Bologna, but also in sixty-two other dioceses. His powerful preaching led many to reconciliation and conversion of life. According to the citation issued March 16, 1777, Father dal Monte's charity, the purity of his doctrine at a time when Jansenism was spreading, and holiness of his life won for him honorary citizenship in the principality of San Marino. His body is enshrined in Our Lady of Peace Chapel in Bologna's Basilica of Saint Petronius. The decree approving a miracle wrought at his intercession was promulgated on July 11, 1995, leading to his beatification on Sept. 27, 1997 at Bologna by Pope John Paul II.

MONTE, PHILIPPE DE

Dutch composer celebrated as a madrigalist; b. Mechlin (Malines), 1521; d. Prague, July 4, 1603. After preliminary music studies he settled in Naples in 1542 as a teacher, but in 1554 transferred to Rome, where his first book of madrigals was published. As a member of Philip II's chapel he spent the next period in Antwerp and England, where he made friends with Thomas Morley and W. BYRD. When Jakob Vaet, imperial chapelmaster, died and negotiations with PALESTRINA failed, Monte was appointed in 1568 and held the post for the rest of his life, enjoying the new emperor Rudolph II's favor as he had Maximilian II's. Monte was one of the most productive composers of his time, and his fame rivaled that of Palestrina and LASSO. Between 1554 and 1603 he published 1,073 secular and 144 spiritual madrigals in 42 volumes, with texts by Cardinal Bembo, F. Petrarch, T. Tasso, Vittoria COLONNA, and other leading poets. Their tone is lyrical and elegiac, only rarely dramatic, and after 1580, less chromatic and increasingly contrapuntal in technique. His church music, which comprises 320 motets and 38 Masses that have been compared to Palestrina's, is conservative and melodic, with felicitous voice combinations. Most of his Masses, only nine of which were published in his lifetime, are of the parody type, elaborating polyphonic models by RORE, G. de Wert, P. Verdelot, and himself. Among the best are the Missa Benedicta Es and the Requiem. In the motets, double-choir technique and imitation in all voices are found, with strict contrapuntal writing in the earlier groups and homophonic declamation alternating with counterpoint in the later. In contrast to the dramatic antitheses and climaxes of Lasso's motets, Monte's pieces in this form are pervaded with mystical fervor, as for example, in his six-voice O bone Jesu.

MONTE CASSINO, ARCHABBEY OF

of Nursia c. 529 within the wall-enclosed citadel of ancient Casinum. There Benedict built a church on the site of a Roman temple (St. Martin; rediscovered in 1953 by Angelo Pantoni, OSB) and another on the place of the altar of the temple (St. John the Baptist; rediscovered under the present church in 1951).

During the tenure of Benedict's fourth successor, Monte Cassino was destroyed by the LOMBARDS (c. 581). The monks found refuge in the LATERAN monastery in Rome where GREGORY I (THE GREAT) befriended them. He knew personal disciples of Benedict and made the saint the protagonist of the second book of the Dialogues. Benedictinism survived, but the existence of Benedict's foundation remained interrupted for about 140 years. The list of the Lateran abbots is a 12th-century forgery to fill this gap.

About 717 PETRONAX OF BRESCIA restored Monte Cassino, which then became the model monastery of Europe. Here St. BONIFACE's kinsman Willibald from Wessex stayed as a monk (729–739) before becoming bishop of Eichstätt; here Sturmi, the first abbot of Fulda, "acquired the practice of the Rule" (W. Levison). Boniface himself asked Petronax's successor Optatus to be admitted to the confraternity of Monte Cassino. Carloman, Pepin's brother, retired to the abbey after his abdication in 747, to be joined by the Lombard King Rachis in 749. Pope Zachary issued to Monte Cassino the first of many papal privileges and declared it subject only to the Holy See, an arrangement that still obtains today (abbatia nullius).

The territorial expansion of the abbey started before the middle of the 8th century with the generous donation of Duke Gisulf II of Benevento. CHARLEMAGNE visited Monte Cassino in 787, bestowed privileges on it, and later asked for a copy of the alleged autograph of the BENE-DICTINE RULE to serve as standard text throughout his realm. His friend and helper PAUL THE DEACON, historian of the Lombards, was a member of the congregation then. Abbot Gisulf (797–817) transformed the church of St. John into a three-nave basilica and built at the foot of the hill another monastery with a church dedicated to the Savior. It was here that in 883 Abbot BERTHARIUS was slain by the Saracens when they destroyed Monte Cassino. The monks fled to Teano (where they lost the alleged autograph of the Rule in a fire) and from there to Capua under pressure of the princes of Capua. Abbot Aligernus (949–86), a pupil of ODO OF CLUNY, at last brought the congregation back to Monte Cassino, which he restored. Subsequent Capuan influence ended only with the election of Abbot Theobald (1022–35), which was supervised by Emperor Henry II.

Under Theobald and the Bavarian Richer (1038–55) Monte Cassino began its rise to the splendid height that it was to reach under Desiderius (1058–87), who directed the abbey's reconstruction (see VICTOR III, POPE), and which was to continue under Oderisius I (1087–105). Numerous monks of Monte Cassino attained the highest ranks in the Church, three of them the papacy (STEPHEN IX, Victor III, GELASIUS II). Meanwhile the SCRIPTORIUM of Monte Cassino, which used the "Beneventan script," led in MS production in southern Italy, and in book illumination also. The library was rich in ancient pagan and Christian texts, some of which are preserved only there. Among the great men active then in the abbey were Alberic of Monte Cassino, ALPHANUS OF SALERNO, the medical writer CONSTANTINE THE AFRICAN, and the historians Amatus of Monte Cassino, LEO MARSICANUS, Guido, and PETER THE DEACON. The territory belonging to Monte Cassino (Terra s. Benedicti) reached its largest extension under Desiderius.

A decline set in after Oderisius I. Neither the NOR-MAN rulers nor their German successors respected the independence of the abbey. It inevitably suffered in the struggles for the possession of southern Italy and endured new misfortunes when John XXII raised the abbots to the rank of bishop; most of them held their tenure in absentia (1322-65). An earthquake destroyed the monastery of Desiderius on Sept. 9, 1349. Rebuilding started through the initiative of Pope Urban V, a Benedictine (1362-70). Throughout the second half of the 15th century the abbey was ruled by commendatory abbots (1454-1504). Only when Monte Cassino joined the Benedictine Congregation of St. Justina of Padua (1504), henceforth called Congregatio Casinensis alias s. Justinae de Padua, was there peace and prosperity. Abbots were now elected only for short terms. Important construction went on during the 16th and 17th centuries. The new church, with the frescoes of Luca Giordano, one of the foremost examples of Neapolitan baroque, was dedicated by Benedict XIII in 1727. Among the eminent scholars of the abbey were Abbot Angelo della Noce (d. 1691), editor of the Chroni*cle of Monte Cassino* (1668), and Erasmo Gattola, the learned archivist and historian of the abbey (1662–1734).

With the fall of the kingdom of Naples and the suppression of the religious houses, Monte Cassino became in 1866 a national monument whose guardians were the monks themselves. The historian Abbot Luigi TOSTI (1811–97) fought first for the unification of ITALY and after 1870 for the reconciliation of Church and State. Learning has been flourishing, and important publications issue from Monte Cassino. On Feb. 15, 1944, the abbey, wrongly believed by some Allied commanders to harbor German soldiers, was destroyed by aerial bombardment to the dismay of the entire civilized world. The abandoned ruins were taken over by the Germans and fell to Polish troops on May 18. The abbey has been rebuilt as it was, mainly with funds provided by the Italian government and with the very active help of the congregation itself, led by Abbot Ildefonso Rea. On Oct. 24, 1964, Pope Paul VI consecrated the monastery and from Monte Cassino proclaimed St. Benedict the patron saint of Europe.

MONTEAGUDO, ANA DE LOS ANGELES, BL.

Dominican mystic; b. c. 1600, Arequipa, Peru; d. there, January 10, 1686. Ana, the daughter of the Spaniard Sebastián Monteagudo de la Jara and his Peruvian wife Francisca Ponce de León, was entrusted to the care of the Dominican sisters of Santa Catalina de Siena until she reached marriageable age. She returned home at her parents' request and eventually overcame their objections to her religious vocation. In 1618, she began her novitiate at Santa Catalina and appended the name "de los Angeles." She served as novice mistress. After she was chosen as prioress (1647), she reformed the community of nearly 300 sisters. The entire life of Blessed Ana was spent in prayer and apostolic work. Her sanctity was recognized through her beatification, February 2, 1985, at Arequipa, Peru, by Pope John Paul II during his pastoral visit to Latin America.

Feast: Jan. 10 (Dominicans).

MONTEFIORE, CLAUDE JOSEPH GOLDSMID

Anglo-Jewish scholar; b. London, 1858; d. London, July 9, 1938. He was a member of the wealthy Anglo-Jewish Montefiore family, originally from Italy; his granduncle was the well-known philanthropist Sir Moses Montefiore (1784–1885). After he received an Oxford M.A., he studied theology in Berlin. Because of the "arrest of the Reform Movement," he associated himself with liberal Judaism and even traveled to the United States in order to engage a liberal rabbi for a London synagogue. He was president of the Anglo-Jewish Association, the Froebel Society, the Jewish Religious Union, the Jewish Historical Society, and the University of Southampton. His special field of scholarly interest was the New Testament, particularly in its relationship to JUDA-ISM. With Israel Abrahams he edited the Jewish Quarterly Review (1888–1908). Of particular note among his numerous published works are his Origin and Growth of Religion as Illustrated by the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews, (2 v., Hibbert Lectures for 1892); The Synoptic Gospels (London 1909); and Outlines of Liberal Judaism (London 1912; 2d rev. ed. 1927).

Montefiore conceived liberal Judaism as "in a certain sense . . . traditional. . . . Liberal Jews desire to carry the tradition forward and onward" (Outlines 283). Not a people "as regards all else than religion," Jews ought "to be one with the nations among whom they dwell" and therefore "opposed to Nationalism and Zionism. . . . Liberal Judaism believes in, and aims at, a universal Judaism, universal both in doctrine and in form" (ibid. 301-302). Montefiore was well aware that his benign attitude toward some aspects of Christianity and its Founder did not mean that a reconciliation was in sight. "The Liberal Jew is in some respects still farther removed from orthodox Christianity than the Conservative Jew. . . . He who has learnt to apply the canons of historical criticism to the Pentateuch will not fight shy of applying them to the Gospels" (ibid. 325).

MONTEIRO DA VIDE, SEBASTIÃO

Archbishop and legislator in Brazil; b. Monforte do Alentejo, Portugal, March 19, 1643; d. Salvator, Bahia, Sept. 7, 1722. At age 16 he entered the Society of Jesus, but he left soon afterward to become a soldier and later to study Canon Law at the University of Coimbra. After ordination he became an ecclesiastical judge and vicargeneral of Lisbon. He was named bishop of Bahia on May 8, 1701, and consecrated on December 21, 1701. He took possession of his see on May 22, 1702. He is known for having created many new parishes, but especially for holding in 1707 the first diocesan synod in Portuguese America, and for publishing the famous Constituições Primeiras do Arcebispado da Bahía feitas e ordenadas por . . . Propostas e Aceitas em o Sinodo Diocesana que o dito Senhor celebrou a 12 de junio do ano de 1707. The dioceses of Brazil had been governed by the constitutions of the Archdiocese of Lisbon, but after 1707 Da Vide's treatise was used, with suitable adaptations, in all the dioceses of Brazil throughout the rest of the colonial period and well into imperial times in the nineteenth century. These constitutions were universal in scope and admirable in their conciseness and clarity. They were highly praised by contemporary European canonists. Da Vide also included statutes for his cathedral and charters for various ecclesiastical courts in his diocese. Besides legal writings, he published a biography of Mother Vitoria da Encarnação, a holy Poor Clare nun of Bahia, Historia da vida e morte da Madre Soror Vitoria da Encarnação, religiosa do Convento de Santa Clara do Desterro da cidade da Bahía (Luiz Carvalho, ed., Rome 1720). He also left a manuscript entitled "Exortação mística."

MONTEMAYOR, JUAN FRANCISCO

Spanish theologian and jurist; b. Huesca, Spain, Aug. 25, 1620; d. there, 1685. He is known variously as Montemayor de Cuenca, as Montemayor Córdoba de Cuenca, or simply as Cuenca. After receiving the licentiate in law in 1641, he became judge of inquests in Huesca and judge of the audiencia in Catalonia. He went to America as oidor in the audiencia of Santo Domingo in 1650. When the governor, the captain general, and the president of the audiencia died in 1653, Montemayor took over these offices. He recovered the island of Tortuga, north of Hispaniola, which had been held by French buccaneers and had served as a supply base, along with neighboring islands, for English and Dutch pirates as well. As a reward, he was named judge of the audiencia of Mexico, a post he held for 22 years, during which time he was ordained. When he returned to Spain he was a member of the Council of the Indies and advisor to the Inquisition. His work as a jurist is reflected in his writings. The Discurso político, histórico, jurídico del derecho y repartimiento de presas y despojos aprehendidos en justa guerra, premios y castigos de soldados (Mexico 1658) explains his theories on sea warfare and the disposition of prizes of war and prisoners. Sumari os de las cédulas, órdenes y provisiones que se han despachado por S. M. a la Nueva España y otras partes de Indias (Mexico 1678) covers the years 1628 to 1677 and treats also some of the decrees of the royal audiencia and other government orders. The book was used in Mexico up to the time of independence from Spain. Also published in Mexico in 1676 was his Excubationes semicentum ex Decisionibus Regiae Cancellariae S. Dominici, vulgo Hispaniolae.

MONTES PIETATIS

Charitable, nonprofit, credit organizations that lend money at low rates of interest on the security of pawned objects. Montes were established in the mid-15th century to provide financial assistance to the poor in a temporary crisis, as a protection against the exploitation of usurers. The interest compensated for the care of pawns and was used to defray administrative expenses, including the salaries of employees, to prevent the exhaustion of capital through the cost of operation.

Historically, the word mons was used to designate funds collected for a specific purpose, and was applied, before and during the Middle Ages, to public debts, stock and insurance companies, and banks of exchange and credit. As these banks often lent money on pawned objects, the charitable organizations operating on this basis assumed the name but added the word pietatis to identify them as beneficent, not speculative.

In the Middle Ages money was difficult to obtain and the prohibitions against usury imposed on Christians created a kind of monopoly on lending for the Jews and such groups as the Lombards, who exploited the situation by charging exorbitant rates of interest (averaging 32 1/2 to 43 1/2 per cent). In an effort to find a remedy for usury various proposals were made for lending money at low interest, or gratuitously, either through institutions created for this purpose or through municipal sponsorship.

In 1361 Bp. Michael Nothburg of London left a sum of money for the foundation of a bank to lend money on pawned objects without interest. This venture failed because of the provision that expenses be defrayed from the foundation capital, which was inevitably exhausted.

Durandus of Saint-Pourçain (?–1332) and Philip of Maizières (?–1405) conceived of a public institution that would lend money to the poor at a low rate of interest intended only to defray the cost of services rendered. There is no evidence that this proposal was ever put into practice, but in 1461 Hermolaus Barbarus (c. 1410–71), Bishop of Verona and papal delegate to Perugia, had authorized the foundation, in Perugia, of the first Mons pietatis by the Franciscans. Barbarus, upon his appointment as papal delegate, had abolished an existing statute that directly violated Canon Law, viz, the authorization of Jews to take limited usuries in the city. The mons provided an acceptable substitute to give financial assistance to the needy. The montes spread rapidly throughout Italy and their success is attributable largely to the Franciscans who promoted them, especially Bl. Bernardino of Feltre (1439–94). In 1467 Pope Paul II (1417–71) approved the constitution of the Perugia mons despite theological opposition, and successive popes sanctioned montes in other Italian cities.

As the montes developed they became either autonomous or municipal corporations, administered by a director, an appraiser, an accountant, and a staff of clerks. A rate of interest ranging from four to 12 per cent was charged, and at the end of a specified period the net profits were applied to the capital. If the profit was substantial, interest rates were lowered. The amount of a given loan equaled two-thirds of the value of the pawned object, which, if not redeemed within a stipulated period, was sold at public auction. If the price brought exceeded the amount of the loan plus the interest, the residue was given to the original owner.

A big step in the development of montes was the sanctioning of interest charges in order to raise and maintain capital, a need that had not been met by voluntary donations and collections. By the mid-16th century it was common practice to accept deposits from anyone wishing to invest and to pay five per cent on them. Many montes accordingly became "mixed montes," i.e., institutions not financed by charity alone, but also by private investment, and they made loans to businessmen at eight to ten per cent as well as to the poor. The secular mixed montes were unlike a commercial banking system in that they did not create credit, but their structure was essentially similar to that of savings banks, financed by deposits and lending at interest to all.

Opposition, directed against the charging of interest rather than against the montes themselves, came from two main groups, viz, those whose interests were affected, and theologians and canonists who maintained that lending money at interest was illicit. That the interest was used for charitable purposes and not for profit did not justify the practice, which, they contended, was expressly forbidden by Christ (Lk 6.33). The question became an issue between several orders, Dominicans (with some exceptions) opposing montes as usurious and Franciscans defending them. Legal and theological faculties from many universities and some individual jurists also gave opinions favorable to the montes. Of the written attacks [the first by Nicholas Bariani, an Augustinian, in 1494] Gaetano Cajetan's [Tommaso de Vio (1469–1534)] De Monte pietatis (1498) is one of the most thorough and objective. Untinged by the bitterness of the conflict, though aimed at proving montes illicit, this analysis presents arguments for both sides of the question, and makes an important and significant distinction between defenses based on collective and on distributive justice. Navarrus [Martin Aspelcueta (1491–1586)] was the first important canonist and scholastic to make a detailed defense of montes and to discuss their financing, and the first to extend the principles used in this defense to other lending organizations.

The controversy was finally settled by the papal bull Inter multiplicis (May 14, 1515) of Leo X (1475–1521). The pope and the Lateran Council (tenth session) declared montes in no way sinful or illicit but meritorious, and declared those who preached or wrote against them subject to excommunication. By the 18th century montes were universally accepted in continental Europe.

The particular significance of the montes lies, not so much in their charitable function and successful reduction of usury, as in their influence on the justification of charging moderate interest. They prepared the way for the acceptance of credit business as a means of livelihood, and for the legitimacy of investment in lending organizations.

MONTESINO, ANTONIO

Dominican missionary and possibly a martyr; b. Spain, not later than 1486; d. West Indies, c. 1530. The birth and death dates of this Dominican friar, known also as Antonio de Montesinos, have not been accurately determined, nor is much information available on his life. He entered the Dominican Order in the convent of San Esteban, Salamanca, on July 1, 1502. Before April of 1510 he had arrived in Española. He took up the cause of the natives and in 1511 preached at least twice against the abuses in slavery. This action aroused opposition among the Spanish colonists, and Montesino was called to Spain on the matter. There he pleaded the need for protection of the indigenous population and evidently influenced the promulgation of the Laws of Burgos of 1512 and of Valladolid in 1513. He made three more trips to Spain regarding related problems in 1515, 1522–24, and late in 1527. About 1516 he wrote Informatio juridica in indorum defensionem. In June or July of 1526 he accompanied Vásquez de Ayllón on the unsuccessful attempt at colonization near modern Jamestown, Virginia. A temporary chapel was built there, and Mass was said, but the unhealthy location, the cold winter, and mutiny combined to destroy the colony. There is no evidence that he led a band of 20 Dominicans to Venezuela in 1528–29, as Zamora and Remesal state. In the margin of the chronicle that records Montesino's profession in the Dominican Order is written: "Obiit Martyr in Indiis." Nothing but this is known of Montesino's death.

MONTESQUIEU, CHARLES DE

Man of letters, political theorist; b. near Bordeaux, Jan. 18, 1689; d. Paris, Feb. 10, 1775. Charles Louis Joseph de Secondat, Baron de la Brède et de Montesquieu, inherited the former barony from his mother and the latter, together with a provincial office, from an uncle. He studied law and the sciences. Originally he was a rationalist in the Cartesian tradition, inclined to see social life as dominated by unchanging regularities. A grand tour from 1728 to 1731 opened his eyes to the profound differences among cultures, and to the importance of customs and local traditions. His book De l'Esprit des lois (1748) made him one of Europe's foremost social and political philosophers.

As a mature scholar Montesquieu endeavored to uncover the underlying raisons d'être of apparently irrational institutions, such as the medieval ordeal by fire, taking contemporary circumstances as his clues for interpretation. His general conviction was that cultures are determined by two sets of influences, geographical environment and political constitution. A hot climate makes men sluggish and conservative; a cold climate makes them active and progressive. He ascribed to ecological realities both the liberty enjoyed by the British and the lack of liberty endured by Africans and Asiatics.

Montesquieu distinguished three basic forms of political constitution, each needing an appropriate indwelling spirit to function well: republicanism, the spirit of virtue; limited monarchy, honor; and despotism, fear. Rome, the main example of republicanism, flourished while her citizens were frugal, hard–working, disciplined, patriotic, and enjoyed the rough–and–ready equality essential to this kind of society. Limited monarchy as exemplified in England and France required a general conviction of noblesse oblige to keep social ranks and distinctions from enfeebling the state. Despotism, characteristic of the Oriental empires, was simply structured, with the dictator on the one hand, the subject masses on the other, and with oppression and terror as the only social cement.

By distinguishing two formative forces, geography and politics, Montesquieu created for himself the difficult problem of resolving which, in the last resort, was the more decisive. The assertion that each constitution had its own appropriate territorial configuration—that republics worked best when small, limited monarchies when medium-sized, and despotisms when of vast extent-did not indicate whether territory conditioned political form or political form conditioned territorial frontiers. Montesquieu recognized that geographical and political theories embody contradictory conceptions of man, geographical determinism seeing man as passive and subject to natural forces, political doctrine assuming him to be active and morally responsible. In the unfinished Essai sur les causes qui peuvent affecter les esprits et les caractères, he ascribed primacy to the sociopolitical factor, arguing mainly from observation.

Although Montesquieu abhorred despotism and admired republicanism, he judged that a limited monarchy suited the modern territorial state best. He regarded the English constitution with its division of powers as very successful. His threefold division of governmental power into executive, legislative, and judicial branches was a major contribution to political thought and practice. It has often been asserted that he was a mechanist, finding the secret of a smoothly running society in the counterbalancing of independent societal forces. But his thought exemplifies organismic conceptions as well. Social forces are never really independent of each other. They form a definite total and inclusive system. A contest among them is not to be desired, not even a contest that will lead to equilibration, but rather mutual mitigation, complementation, and cooperation. The existence of intermediate social strata, such as an aristocracy independent of the king, seemed to Montesquieu the best safeguard against the dangers of overcentralization and dictatorship on the one hand, and underorganization and mob rule on the other. Not only England, but also France, with her sturdy provincial estates and parlements, provided the model.

Montesquieu's concept of man was similar to that of Montaigne; his low estimate of human nature was somewhat mitigated, however, by an indulgent and even compassionate attitude. In religion he was a Deist, and although he was basically anticlerical, he respected the traditional Roman Catholicism of his country and died in the church.

MONTESSORI, MARIA

Educator and originator of the Montessori Method; b. Chiaravalle, near Ancona, Italy, Aug. 31, 1870; d. Noordwijk, Netherlands, May 8, 1952. The first woman to receive a medical degree in 1894 at the University of Rome, Maria Montessori lectured on anthropology at the University and practiced as assistant physician at its psychiatric clinic where she came into contact with retarded children.

While working at the State Orthophrenic School in Rome (1899–1901), she turned her attention to the education of the feebleminded. She was conversant with E. Seguin's educational methods, which were the forerunner of much of the pedagogical treatment allied with medicine, later known as therapy. In her work at Bicêtre, in Paris, she noted Seguin's use of didactic apparatus rather than teacher–dominated methods. Utilizing this experience, she devised a great variety of didactic materials and trained a corps of teachers who were encouraged and stimulated by her dynamic personality.

While lecturing on pedagogy at the University of Rome (1901–07), she became interested in the education of normal children. In 1907 she opened the Casa dei Bambini, the first Montessori school for normal children, and within three years she had established three similar classes. Until 1911 she directed these schools, situated for the most part in the poorer sections of Rome and Milan.

From 1911 until her death she traveled the world— Europe, India, the U.S.—lecturing to teachers and interested persons, writing prodigiously, and instituting teacher-training centers. She introduced her method in Spain when she took charge of the Montessori Institute in Barcelona in 1917, and in London in 1919. On returning to Italy in 1922, she was appointed government inspector of Italian schools but was obliged to leave in 1934, during Mussolini's regime, because of her alleged pacifist ideas. She returned to the Barcelona Institute but again withdrew in 1939 during the Spanish Civil War and established an educational center at Laren near Amsterdam in the Netherlands. In 1939 she went to India to conduct a training course in Adyar, Madras, where, although interned as an enemy alien with her son, Mario Montessori, she continued her courses at Ahmadabad. After World War II, Montessori made the Netherlands her permanent home.

Montessori's major educational contribution was her method, which thrived in the U.S. and abroad in the early 20th century but later waned. Its early demise in the U.S. is attributed to the rising progressive movement and the work of J. Dewey and W. H. Kilpatrick. Her progressive ideas, especially her views on liberty, were often equated with Dewey's, while Kilpatrick, in his brief text The Montessori Method Examined (1914), dealt a severe blow to her infant beginnings in the United States. The restrained description of her work by such educational historians as R. Freeman Butts and Louella Cole contributed to its ineffectiveness. A Montessori society formed in the U.S. in 1913 by a group of socially prominent individuals lacked adequate leadership and quickly disappeared. Since the 1950s, however, there has been a Montessori revival, and interested parents have formed study groups preparatory to opening classes for their children. Leading Catholic universities, such as DePaul University, Chicago, Ill.; Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wis.; and Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Mass.; have inaugurated centers of research and teacher training. Boston College is also engaged in a modified practice of the method.

Maria Montessori. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Among her published works is The Montessori Method (1912), in which she expounds her philosophy, influenced by the English empiricist, J. LOCKE; the Spanish teacher of deaf mutes, J. R. Pereira; and the two French pioneers in the education of the retarded, E. Seguin and J. E. Itard. The heavy emphasis of the work in anthropology and biology stems from her medical background. Other publications include Pedagogical Anthropology (1913), The Secret of Childhood (1936), and The Discovery of the Child (1948).

MONTEVERDI, CLAUDIO

Illustrious composer whose sacred and secular works spanned the old Renaissance and new baroque styles; b. Cremona, 1567 (baptized Claudio Giovanni Antonio on May 15); d. Venice, Nov. 29, 1643. After study with M. A. Ingegneri at Cremona, he spent 21 years in the service of Vincenzo Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, where he composed his earliest madrigals, church music, and operas, the first of which, Orfeo (1607), did much to fix the modern opera form. From 1613 until the end of his life he was maestro di cappella of St. Mark's, Venice, a post affording both stimulus and opportunity for his mature compositions in the new baroque concertato style. Long after his wife's early death he became a priest (c. 1632). Although the madrigal was declining when he was a young man, his nine books display a wealth of invention covering a far wider field than the classic term "madrigal" might suggest. Even more dramatic and picturesque effects are found in his ballets and operas, many of which are now lost. In church music he was supreme in his mastery of massive choral and instrumental groups, though he could also express the quieter mood of smaller-scale motets and monodies developed in Mantua by his colleague VIADANA.

Monteverdi issued his first anthology of church music when only 15—the three-voiced Sacrae cantiunculae of 1582. Apart from a book of Madrigali spirituali in 1583 (lost, except for the basso part), he ventured no further into the already overcrowded field of church music until 1610, when the Venetian publisher Amadino brought out a vast collection of music in honor of the Blessed Virgin Mary. This consisted of a six-voiced Mass based on themes from GOMBERT's motet In illo tempore, five motets (or cantatas), and a complete setting of Vespers, with two Magnificats. The Vespers make considerable use of divided choirs (cori spezzati), instrumental accompaniment and interludes, and extensive sections for solo voices. From 1615 until well after his death, Venetian publishers included his motets in various collections. The Selva morale e spirituale of 1640 includes a handful of spiritual madrigals and a "Pianto della Madonna" based on the popular "Lamento d'Arianna" (from 1608), but the main content is liturgical: a four-voiced Mass, a seven-voiced Gloria, with brilliant instrumental obbligato parts, and another extensive collection of music for Vespers of solemn feasts. Seven psalms are set for extremely varied combinations of voices and instruments, and some are provided with two or even three different settings. The four hymns appear as monodies, duets, and a trio, all with two violins and continuo. Of the two Magnificats, one is conceived as chamber music, the other as a grandiose canticle. Also noteworthy are three versions of Salve Regina, one of which features an echo tenor singing a TROPE.

This collection represents Monteverdi at the very height of his career, and though some secular elements are present (contrafacta of madrigals) the general impression is one of tremendous competence and a sincere desire to project the meaning of the texts. In his posthumous Messa a quattro voci e salmi (1650), one of the last great collections reflecting the baroque apogee of the Veneto, there are 13 settings of eight different psalms, perhaps the remains of several complete sets of Vesper psalms written for St. Mark's. Monteverdi's contribution to the church music of his day was a distinguished one, and if its occasional excess of ornament is seen against the background of his life and work, his taste is generally vindicated.

MONTFAUCON, BERNARD DE

Benedictine scholar, paleographer; b. Soulage, France, Jan. 16, 1655; d. Paris, Dec. 21, 1741. He came from a noble family and was an army officer under the Count of Turenne from 1672 until he joined the Benedictine MAURISTS in Toulouse in 1675. He was ordained in 1676 and went to SAINT-GERMAIN-DES-PRÉS Paris (1687), to study Greek, Hebrew, and Syriac as preparation for editing the Greek Fathers. From 1698 to 1701 he did research in libraries in Italy with P. Briois in search of manuscripts and other historical material. He met L. A. MURATORI in Milan and was welcomed to Rome by Pope Innocent XII. He published a Diarium Italicum (1702) and used materials he had gathered, especially archeological, in L'Antiquité expliquée et representée en figures (10 v. 1719; 2d ed. 1722 and 5 v. suppl.), and Les Monuments de la monarchie française (5 v. 1729-33). He is known also for his monumental editions of St. Athanasius (3 v. 1698, in Patrologia Graeca 25–28), the Hexapla of Origen (2 v. 1713), and St. John Chrysostom (13 v. 1718–38, in Patrologia Graeca 47–64). He virtually created the science of Greek paleography with his Palaeographia graeca (1708). In 1699 he wrote a defense of the Maurist edition of St. Augustine. He maintained a voluminous correspondence with learned men of his time; and the younger generation of Benedictine scholars, the "Bernardins," were greatly influenced by him. He is buried next to J. MABILLON in Saint-Germain-des-Prés.

MONTFORT FATHERS

(SMM, Official Catholic Directory #0870); Missionaries of the Company of Mary, known also as the Montfort Fathers and the Society of Mary of Montfort (SMM), was founded in 1705 by St. Louis Marie GRIGNION DE MONTFORT.

In 1700, Louis Marie journeyed throughout western France, preaching missions and retreats, and teaching total consecration to Jesus through Mary. At the time of his death in 1716, the Company of Mary numbered two priests and a few brothers. The community, however, took root near the tomb of its founder at Saint-Laurent-sur-Sèvre, in Vendée. Although limited by royal decree to no more than 12 priests, this small mission band accomplished work that merited praise from Rome in 1719 and again in 1747. Nine of the priests and brothers were martyred for the faith during the French Revolution, leaving the congregation with but five priests and two brothers. Gabriel DESHAYES, founder of five religious congregations, joined the Company of Mary and became the superior. When he died in 1841 the society had grown to 18 priests and 40 brothers.

Louis Marie's manuscript, "True Devotion to Mary," was discovered in 1842; it marked a turning point in the history of the congregation. Although all recruits for the priesthood were from the secular clergy, the community expanded and was raised to the rank of a pontifical congregation in 1853. The society's first minor seminary was founded in France in 1876; the first major seminary, in Holland in 1880. The beatification of the founder, in 1888, was accompanied by a rapid development of the society, which spread throughout the world, preaching missions and retreats, and was dedicated to restoring the reign of Christ through Mary.

Although the Montfort Fathers were invited to the U.S. in 1835 by Bp. Benedict Flaget of Kentucky, the first American establishment of the order was made in the Diocese of Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1903. The U.S. provincial headquarters was established at Ozone Park, N.Y. The generalate is in Rome.

MONTH, THE

A journal published by the British province of the Society of Jesus, but begun in July 1864 by Fanny Margaret (later Mother Magdalen) TAYLOR, a convert, who had accompanied Florence Nightingale to the Crimea and later founded the Poor Servants of the Mother of God. She was supported by the JESUITS, and encouraged by John Henry NEWMAN who, though he cautioned against the publication of theological articles, chose The Month for the first publication of The Dream of Gerontius. The Jesuits took over in 1865, as the review was not paying its way. There was a distinguished series of Jesuit editors, starting with the convert Henry COLERIDGE, a distant relative of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. After Newman's poem, verse disappeared from the journal's pages; Gerard Manley Hopkins's The Wreck of the Deutschland was rejected. George TYRRELL was one of those assigned to the journal, and the editor, John Gerard, who was also for a time provincial, made considerable efforts to support him during the Modernist crisis, earning him a rebuke from Rome. Sydney Smith, S.J., a regular contributor from 1869 to 1920, was likewise rebuked for being too sympathetic to Anglicans. The Month published a wide variety of articles, from the historical (by the distinguished Jesuit scholars Joseph Stevenson and Herbert Thurston) to commentary on political events both national and international. Despite the ban on poetry, soon lifted, the magazine had a strong interest in literature. In 1949, under the new editorship of Fr. Philip Caraman, and a new, elegant, design, the literary content became outstanding: Caraman was able to call upon some of the leading British writers for articles. Ronald Moffatt was appointed editor in 1963, and he brought in Peter HEBBLETHWAITE, who had just completed his theological studies. Hebblethwaite went to Rome to cover the Second VATICAN COUNCIL for The Month and for other journals, swiftly emerging as a leading commentator on Vatican affairs. On his return Moffatt resigned the editorship in his favor. Under Hebblethwaite The Month became increasingly liberal in tone, and carried important articles on Church affairs. In 1971 it absorbed the even more radical Herder Correspondence, having two years earlier amalgamated with the Dublin Review at the request of the Dublin's owner, the archbishop of Westminster. From 1976 until his sudden death in June 1986 the magazine was edited by Hugh Kay, a layman with close ties to the Jesuits. Kay had strong, radical, political views, and the paper reflected his social concerns. After his death it once again acquired a Jesuit editor and again became more literary, but a declining circulation and the increasing difficulty of finding an editor when the number of members of the British Jesuit province was decreasing led to an announcement in 2000 that it would suspend publication the following year.

MONTHS, SPECIAL DEVOTIONS FOR

Special devotions for months is a nonliturgical practice developed in the Church in recent centuries, by which the months of the calendar are dedicated to special devotions. In some of these cases—for example, the dedication of May to the Mother of Christ —the Church recognized and blessed what had been a popular practice. In other cases—for example, the dedication of October to the Rosary—the practice was initiated by the Holy See. In each of the recognized dedications the Church grants indulgences for the saying of special prayers during the month in question. (See INDULGENCES.)

January is dedicated to the Holy Name of Jesus, with devotions indulgenced by Leo XIII; March, to St. Joseph with indulgences granted by Pius IX and Pius XI for devotions; May, to the Virgin Mary, with indulgences granted by Pius XII for devotions; June, to the Sacred Heart of Jesus with indulgences granted by Pius IX, Leo XIII, Pius X, and Pius XI for devotions; July, to the Precious Blood of Jesus Christ, with indulgences granted by Pius VII, Pius XI, and Pius XII for devotions; August, to the Immaculate Heart of the Blessed Virgin Mary, with indulgences granted by Benedict XV and Pius XI for devotions; September, to Mary, under the title Our Lady of Sorrows, with indulgences granted by Leo XIII and Pius XI for pious exercises; October, to the rosary, with indulgences granted by Leo XIII and Pius XI for daily or regular recitation of the rosary; November, to the souls of the faithful departed, with indulgences granted by Pius IX, Leo XIII, and Pius XI to those who pray for the dead; and December, to Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception, with special indulgences granted by Pius X and Pius XI for exercises of piety.

There are a number of other dedications of given months to particular mysteries; for example, January, to the Holy Childhood of Jesus; March, to the Holy Family; and October, to the Holy Angels. These, and other like dedications, are a result of local, popular devotions and are not formally recognized by the Church.

MONTMAJOUR, ABBEY OF

A former Benedictine abbey in the now-suppressed Diocese of ARLES, in southern France (Lat. Mons Major). It was established about the middle of the 10th century, although local legends attribute to it an earlier date of foundation. Like LÉRINS and SAINT-VICTOR IN MARSEILLES, the abbey had acquired numerous holdings in southeastern France during the 11th and 12th centuries, and it exercised considerable influence in Dauphiné and Provence. In the following century it had to struggle for its existence against aggressive local lords. In 1639 it joined the MAURIST reform movement but was suppressed in 1786 and its holdings were distributed among the Provençal dioceses. The abbey church dating from the 12th century has been preserved, as well as a cloister of the same date and a 14th-century tower. The Maurist buildings, restored at the beginning of the 18th century according to the plans of the painter Pierre Mignard (d. 1695), are now in ruins.

MONTMARTRE (PARIS), ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery for women in Paris on Montmartre, the original Mons Mercurii, later called the Mons martyrum, a cemetery and place of execution, where DENIS OF PARIS and others may have been martyred. Very early oratories had been built there. One of these, the Sanctum martyrium, became a priory of monks in 1098; the oratories of Notre Dame, Saint-Denys, and Saint-Pierre were united into a church (one of the first Gothic churches) consecrated by Pope Eugene III (1147) for the Benedictine nuns who were established there in 1134. Under Bishop Poncher (d. 1519) the convent was reformed and strict enclosure, the common life, episcopal visitation, and a three-year term for the abbess were insisted upon. St. Ignatius and his followers took their vows there (Aug. 15, 1535). In 1560, however, the kings began to appoint lifetime abbesses of noble birth. One of these, Marie de Bauvillier (1601), initiated a mystical revival that influenced people even outside the abbey, e.g., Marie Granger (devotion to the Sacred Heart), Marguerite de Bac (Benedictines of the Bl. Sacrament), and Jeanne Marie de la Motte GUYON. The abbey was suppressed during the French Revolution and the abbess was murdered; the abbey church became a parish church. To the basilica of Sacré Coeur, erected close by in 1875, are associated (1899) the Benedictine Nuns of the Adoration of the Sacred Heart of Montmartre.

MONTREUIL, ABBEY OF

Former Carthusian house of Notre-Dame des Prés, at Neuville-sous-Montreuil, Pas-de-Calais, France, Diocese of Arras. This charterhouse was established in 1324 by Count Robert VII of Boulogne; its church was consecrated in 1328 by John of Vienne, bishop of the former Diocese of Thérouanne. It was periodically sacked and abandoned in the 14th and 15th centuries (Hundred Years' War). Dom Pierre de Marnef, a monk of Montreuil, was general of the CARTHUSIANS from 1540 to 1546. Imperial troops pillaged Montreuil in 1542; the charterhouse was extensively rebuilt in the 17th century under Dom Bernard Bruyant. Montreuil was suppressed in 1790 during the French Revolution, and its prior, Dom Eloi Marion, was imprisoned at Arras and executed. After repurchasing a portion of the former lands of Montreuil, the Carthusians built a new monastery there (1872–75), which was consecrated by Bishop Lequette of Arras. It served as a major center of Carthusian publications; e.g., the Annales ordinis Cartusiensis of C. Le Couteulx were published there (1887–91). The charter-house was closed in 1901, during the era when France expelled all religious orders, and the monks moved to PARKMINSTER, England.

MONTREUIL-LES-DAMES, ABBEY OF

Former French Cistercian abbey for nuns, diocese of Laon. Montreuil-les-Dames had been the site of a Benedictine monastery since the 7th century, but was given to a community of CISTERCIAN NUNS by the bishop, Bartholomew of Laon, in 1136. It was so successful that soon 300 nuns populated the convent, supported by rich donations of land. Upon the insistence of CLAIRVAUX, the nuns reduced their number to 100 after having experienced economic difficulties. The defenseless abbey was repeatedly devastated by the wars of the 14th to the 17th centuries, and the nuns forced to seek refuge within the walls of Laon. In the late Middle Ages Montreuil-les-Dames was famous as the shrine of the "Veil of St. Veronica," donated to the convent in 1249. It was actually only an early copy of the one preserved in Rome. The abbey was suppressed by the French Revolution (1791).

MONTSERRAT, ABBEY OF

Benedictine monastery on a mountain near Barcelona, Spain; aggregated to the congregation of SUBIACO with 150 professed monks. It was founded as a priory by Oliva of Ripoll c. 1025 on the site of a 9th-century hermitage. Benedict XIII made it an independent abbey (1409). Hermits lived there with the cenobites from the 11th century to the late 19th. The monastery belonged to the cloistered congregation of Tarragona until 1493, when the reform of Valladolid was introduced. The first reform abbot, García Ximénez de CISNEROS (d. 1510), published in 1500 Exercitatorio de la vida spiritual, which through Montserrat's ascetic school influenced IGNATIAN SPIRITUALITY. Other devotional and liturgical works were published at Montserrat (1499–1500, 1518–26). In the 16th and 18th centuries, besides traditional ecclesiastical disciplines, the monks cultivated history, classical literature, natural sciences, painting, and music. From the boys choir school (Escolania), 13th century in origin, came famous composers, organists, and musical directors: Juan Marqués (1582–1658), Juan Cererols (d. 1680), Narciso Casanovas (1747–99), Antonio Soler (1729–83), and Fernando Sor (1778–1839).

The abbey was destroyed by Napoleon's troops (1811) and lay vacant during secularization (1835–44) and the Spanish Civil War (1936-39). It is famed for its museum of paintings, Biblical and Middle Eastern museums, and a library of 180,000 volumes, 1,350 MSS, and 400 incunabula. The musical archives hold some 2,000 MSS; and the monastery archives (13th–19th century), some 5,000 parchment and 30,000 paper documents. The abbey publishes Biblia de Montserrat, Analecta Montserratensia, Studia Monastica, and Scripta et Documenta, as well as liturgical and pastoral publications. The shrine of Our Lady of Montserrat (La Moreneta), patroness of Catalonia, has been a pilgrimage center since the Middle Ages. Of the original church there remain only the Romanesque portal (12th-13th century) and the Gothic cloister, built under the commendatory abbot Cardinal Giulio della Rovere (1472–83). The present church, a minor basilica (1881), dates from the late 16th century. Miracles attributed to the image of Our Lady of Montserrat (polychrome wood, Romanesque, c. 1200) and the brotherhood formed in 1225 have spread her cult in Europe and Latin America.

MOODY, DWIGHT LYMAN

American revival preacher; b. Northfield, Mass., Feb. 5, 1837; d. Northfield, Dec. 22, 1899. He received a grammar school education and went to work in a Boston shoe store in 1854. Although originally a Unitarian, he experienced a religious conversion in 1855 and joined the Congregational Church. He moved to Chicago, Illinois, in 1856 and worked as a salesman until 1860, when he became a full-time city missionary. He organized the North Market Sabbath School in 1858 and formed a non-denominational church in 1863. He was active in the Chicago YMCA and became its president in 1866. His first evangelistic crusade in British industrial centers began in 1873, and in 1875, he conducted interdenominational revivals in various American cities. He toured the British Isles from 1881 to 1884 and again in 1891 and 1892. He founded the Chicago (Moody) Bible Institute in 1889 to train evangelists and began the Student Volunteer Movement. Moody's preaching was restrained and stressed "Bible Christianity." He brought modern business methods to revivalism, but his crusades did not reach the masses of the unchurched or notably increase church membership.

MOONEY, EDWARD FRANCIS

Cardinal, first archbishop of the Detroit (Mich.) Archdiocese; b. Mount Savage, Md., May 9, 1882; d. Rome, Italy, Oct. 25, 1958. He was the youngest of the seven children of Thomas and Sarah (Heneghan) Mooney, immigrants from Ireland, who moved to Youngstown, Ohio, when Edward was five years old. He attended St. Columba's parish school, St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Md., and St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, earning the bachelor's and master's degrees maxima cum laude. On Oct. 22, 1905, Mooney entered the North American College, Rome, where he completed his theological studies, receiving a doctorate in philosophy in 1907 and a doctorate in theology in 1909. On April 10, 1909, he was ordained for the Diocese of Cleveland. He returned to the United States and was appointed to St. Mary's Seminary, Cleveland, to teach dogmatic theology. He established the Cathedral Latin School in Cleveland in 1916 and served as principal for six years. In August of 1922, Bishop Joseph Schrembs appointed Mooney pastor of St. Patrick's parish, Youngstown; a few months later he was selected as spiritual director at the North American College. Pope Pius XI named him a domestic prelate in 1925.

Diplomatic Service. On Jan. 8, 1926, Pope Pius XI chose Mooney as apostolic delegate to India, one of the first Americans to represent the Holy See in a permanent diplomatic post. He was consecrated titular archbishop of Irenopolis by Cardinal William Van Rossum, CSSR, Prefect of the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith, in the chapel of the North American College on Jan. 31, 1926. In India, Mooney's tact and judgment were tested by a longstanding dissension, the Padroado question. The dispute involved a jurisdiction divided between the Indian bishops of native dioceses and the Portuguese missionaries whose parishes were scattered along the east coast of India. Mooney procured an accord between the Holy See and the Portuguese colonial government that terminated four centuries of Portuguese ecclesiastical control over some of India's faithful.

As apostolic delegate, Mooney received into the Church on Sept. 20, 1930 two Jacobite bishops, Mar Ivanios and his suffragan, Mar Theophilos, who were soon followed by other clergy and religious, and a number of lay people. Mooney supervised the establishment of 11 new mission territories in India and the transfer of three existing dioceses to native Indian bishops. After five years in India, Mooney was named delegate to Japan on Feb. 25, 1931. Here he was faced with the dilemma of Japanese Catholics, who, as subjects of the Mikado, were bound by law to attend the Shinto shrines, yet constrained in conscience from participating in what seemed to be pagan worship. Close scrutiny by the apostolic delegate determined that the Shinto rites were civil, not religious, ceremonies. Thus without doing violence to their religious convictions, Catholics could discharge their civil obligations by attending the ceremonies.

Bishop of Rochester. On Aug. 28, 1933, Pope Pius XI named Mooney bishop of the Rochester (NY) Diocese, where he was installed on Oct. 12. Within a year, he was elected to the administrative board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC) and named chairman of the Social Action Department. During the social and economic difficulties of the 1930s, he was articulate about the social teaching of the Church especially as delineated in the encyclicals of Pope Leo XIII and Pope Pius XI. In November of 1935, Mooney was elected chairman of the NCWC administrative board, a post he held for two terms (1935-39, 1941-45). Thus during World War II he was, in effect, spokesman for the Church in the United States. To provide for the spiritual welfare of service personnel he served as first chairman of the Bishops' War Emergency and Relief Committee and as first president of the board of trustees of the National Catholic Community Service, which cared for the religious needs and social welfare of the men and women in the armed services. He was also cochairman of the Clergy Committee of the United Services Organization and was one of the framers of the seven-point Declaration for World Peace, which was signed by 144 leading Catholics, Jews, and Protestants.

Archbishop of Detroit. When DETROIT was made a metropolitan see on May 22, 1937, Mooney was transferred there and installed by Archbishop (later Cardinal) Amleto G. Cicognani, the apostolic delegate, on Aug. 3, 1937. During the early years of his administration, he faced a mixed reaction to the radio addresses and publications of Charles E. Coughlin, pastor of the Shrine of the Little Flower parish, Royal Oak, Michigan. An industrial center, Detroit was caught in the post-Depression turmoil and in the throes of union organizing among the automobile workers. When the archbishop publicly announced that Catholics were not only free to join the new Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), but had an obligation to join a union, his statement was widely heralded. To help form a Christian conscience on social and economic questions among his people, he established the archdiocesan Labor Institute. Classes in social ethics and the encyclicals were offered to priests and laymen, who in turn carried the message throughout the archdiocese.

During the 1920s the diocese had expanded rapidly, but the Depression years brought on a crisis. When Mooney arrived in 1937, the total debt stood at more than $18 million. He reorganized the financial structure of the parishes and instituted the archdiocesan development fund, an annual collection for specifically archdiocesan needs. As a result of sound financing, Detroit was able to keep pace with the expanding needs of a new wave of population that came with World War II. More than 100 new parish sites were bought; catechetical centers were established for Catholic children attending public schools; social service centers were provided in all eight counties of the archdiocese; Boysville and the Catholic Youth Organization (CYO) Home for boys were erected. St. John's Provincial Seminary, theologate for the entire province, at Plymouth, Michigan, opened in 1949. Two centers for the aging, Carmel Hall in downtown Detroit and the Martin Kundig Center for the Aged, were established during Mooney's episcopate.

Eight years after arriving in Detroit, Mooney was named a cardinal priest by Pope Pius XII. He received the red hat at the consistory on Feb. 21, 1946; his titular church in Rome was St. Susanna's. His world view was reflected in the address he gave in April of 1954 to the Detroit archdiocesan Council of Catholic Women, calling for support of the United Nations as the "best available means" for international accord. His zeal for the unfortunate never flagged. Not long before his death he dedicated Our Lady of Providence School for retarded girls. During the 21 years of his episcopate, the Catholic population had increased from about 550,000 to 1,288,000. Parishes with resident pastors had increased from 201 to almost 300. Death came when he was in Rome participating in the election of a successor to Pope Pius XII. On the morning of Oct. 25, 1958, he attended the Mass in St. Peter's opening the conclave. As he waited at the North American College for the first session that afternoon, he was stricken with a massive cerebral hemorrhage and died. He was buried from the Cathedral of the Most Blessed Sacrament, Detroit, on Oct. 31, 1958.

MOORE, EDWARD ROBERTS

Social worker; b. New York City, Jan. 9, 1894; d. New York City, June 2, 1952. He was the only child of Edward A. and Mary (Roberts) Moore, the latter of English heritage and a convert. He received his higher education at Fordham University, NY (Ph.D. 1923). After his ordination on Sept. 20, 1919, at St. Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, New York, he was assigned as curate to St. Peter's, Barclay Street, New York City, the oldest parish in the state. In 1923 he was appointed director of the division of social action of the newly founded Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of New York. Moore was interested in youth work (especially scouting), in housing, and in the Legion of Decency, and he served as a board member on many civic and Catholic committees. From 1933 to 1943 he was executive secretary of the Catholic Committee on Scouting. He was a member of the New York Municipal Housing Authority from 1934 to 1944 and he was appointed in 1935 by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to the Advisory Commission of the National Youth Administration. He played a major role in 1935 in establishing the Legion of Decency on a national basis. Except for a brief period (1923-29) at St. Gregory's parish, Moore spent his priestly life at St. Peter's as curate, administrator, and pastor (1937–52). He made it virtually a shrine parish, established a large lending library, and fostered discussion groups. His book Roman Collar (1950) records his experiences at St. Peter's. Moore also taught at Fordham University's School of Social Service (1924–38) and worked zealously with the New York province of Newman clubs. Pope Pius XII named him a papal chamberlain in 1941 and a domestic prelate in 1948.

MOORE, THOMAS VERNER

Catholic priest and psychologist, b. Oct. 22, 1877, Louisville, Kentucky; d. June 5, 1969, Burgos, Spain. Moore entered the Paulists in 1896, and was ordained in 1901. In 1903 he received his doctorate in psychology from The Catholic University of America under Pace and continued studies under Wundt in Leipzig. He received his doctorate in medicine from The Johns Hopkins University in 1913. In 1910 he began as an instructor in psychology at The Catholic University of America, becoming head of the department of psychology and psychiatry in 1939. In 1916 he founded a psychiatric clinic where training was offered to students in psychology, this becoming, under Moore and for the first time in America, a regular part of their curriculum. During 1918–19 Moore served in the U.S. Army as psychiatrist and chaplain.

A pioneer among Catholics in recognizing the value of scientific psychology, Moore became one of the first Catholic priests to win general recognition from fellow psychologists. The doctorate from his department was until 1959 the only one from a Catholic university with official approval of the American Psychological Association. He likewise understood the loss to psychology that came from ignoring man's religious dimension, and correcting this then-prevalent situation became a dominant feature of his life work.

With the idea of living the more deeply religious and liturgical life of a monk, and offering this to colleagues for vitalizing their scientific activities, he was a prime influence in founding the Benedictine Priory (now Abbey) in Washington in 1924, after making a year's novitiate in Scotland. He became prior in 1939.

In 1947, understanding that God was calling him to the hidden, solitary Carthusian life, he entered the Carthusians in Spain, returning to America in 1950 to help found the first American Charterhouse. He died in Spain, where he had returned in 1960, at the age of 91, living the Carthusian life faithfully to the end.

MOPSUESTIA

City of the second province of Cilicia, on the Pyramos River, at present-day Misis. Its name means hearth (or shrine) of Mopsos, a legendary seer who was believed to have been its founder. It was an episcopal see early in the 4th century, suffragan of Anazarbos, under the patriarch of Antioch. Its most famous bishop was THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA (392–428), outstanding representative of the Antiochene school of theology and exegesis, who was condemned for heresy 125 years after his death by the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II (553). On orders of the emperor Justinian, a provincial synod had been held at Mopsuestia on June 17, 550, at which the oldest of the clergy and laity declared under oath that in their lifetime Theodore's name had always been replaced on the diptychs of the church by the name Cyril, whom they understood to be CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 9:274–289; Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, 3.1:38-40). Mopsuestia became a metropolitan see in 879; from 1079 to 1224 (when it was known as Mamistra) it had Latin archbishops; it is now a titular archbishopric.

MORA, MIGUEL (MICHAEL) DE LA, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. June 19, 1878, Tecalitlán, Jalisco, Diocese of Colima, Mexico; d. Aug. 7, 1927, Colima, Colima. He was chaplain of Colima cathedral, a simple, charitable priest, who was always ready to serve. Colima was the first state to require priests to register in order to exercise their sacerdotal ministries. When the bishop and priests protested, the government exiled them. Miguel was one of those who were hidden to ensure the faithful were not left untended. He was discovered and threatened with imprisonment. Unwilling to disobey the instructions of his bishop, Miguel attempted to leave the city, but was apprehended and condemned to execution. Upon reaching the appointed place at noon, he declared his faith and his love of the Blessed Mother. Miguel was felled by bullets as he prayed the rosary. He was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, ss.] by Pope John Paul II.

MORA Y DEL RIO, JOSÉ

Archbishop of Mexico during the beginning of the persecution; b. Pajacuarán, Michoacán, Feb. 24, 1854; d. San Antonio, Texas, April 22, 1928. After early education at a private school in Ixtlán de los Herbores, he entered the seminary of Zamora about 1868; in 1874 he was sent with other young seminarians to the Colegio de San Luis being established in Jacona. He completed his studies at the South American College in Rome, where he was ordained in 1879, and received a doctorate in Canon Law and in theology. In 1881 he returned to Mexico to become rector of the Colegio de San Luis. Bishop LABASTIDA Y DAVALOS, recognizing the young man's abilities, made him a professor at the seminary and gave him a post in the archiepiscopal secretariat. From then on he occupied many positions of confidence through which he became thoroughly acquainted with the operation of the Church and the political problems in Mexico. The succeeding bishop, Próspero María Alarcón, named Mora y del Rio first secretary of the archdiocese. Bishop Gillow of Oajaca recommended him for the Diocese of Tehuantepec, and he was appointed its first bishop on Jan. 19, 1893. That rude inhospitable area was transformed as much as possible by the bishop, who brought in religious orders to help in his social and apostolic work. On Sept. 12, 1901, he was transferred to the Diocese of Tulancingo. An advocate of Catholic Social Action, he organized there the influential "Semanas Agrícolas" for the working classes of the region. On Sept. 15, 1907, he was transferred to León and was there little more than a year when he was appointed archbishop of Mexico on Dec. 2, 1908. He took possession of the see on Feb. 11, 1909.

At the beginning of the political upheaval of 1911, the Catholics received the backing of the archbishop in founding a Catholic party, which supported the presidential aspirations of Francisco Madero. A coup d'état destroyed the weak, recently established democracy and General Victoriano Huerta assumed power. He was sympathetic to the Church, and his enemies were against it. But this was a momentary pause in the attack. In 1914 Archbishop Mora y del Rio went to Rome to report to the pope on the situation. He did not return to Mexico because of the religious complications building up to the Constitution of 1917, but spent some years in exile in San Antonio, Texas. As soon as circumstances permitted, he returned to his see and was back in Mexico by February of 1919. The law had put the Church in a precarious position, and the archbishop used whatever means he could to keep the Church organization functioning. The Eucharistic Congress he held in 1924 was so successful that it provoked governmental action against him and the other bishops who had participated. This was just the beginning of the persecution, which soon increased. To coordinate the activities of the bishops and the faithful, the apostolic delegate, Jorge Caruana, suggested an episcopal committee, which was formed with Mora y del Rio as chairman. This committee protested the antireligious laws and their enforcement, but President Calles was adamant. On Aug. 1, 1926, public worship was forbidden. Mora y del Rio had already refused to cooperate with the government in the establishment of a schismatic Mexican church; and so he, with other members of the hierarchy, was exiled to the United States, where he died.

MORAGAS CANTARERO, MARÍA SAGRARIO OF SAN LUIS GONZAGA, BL.

Baptized Elvira Moragas Cantarero; pharmacist, Discalced Carmelite martyr; b. Lillo (near Toledo), Spain, Jan. 8, 1881; d. the Pradera of San Isidro near Madrid, Aug. 15, 1936. Elvira was the third of the four children of Isabel Cantarero and Ricardo Moragas, who was appointed pharmacist to the royal household and moved his family to Madrid in 1886. One of the first Spanish women to earn a degree in pharmacy, Elvira was planning a secular career until she felt called to religious life. Nevertheless, she delayed her response to raise her younger brother Ricardo after the deaths of their father (1909) and mother (1911) and to run the family pharmacy until he could take it over.

She was a capable, just, and charitable professional; she entered the Discalced Carmelite convent of Saints Anne and Joseph in Madrid (1915). There she began her postulancy (June 21, 1915), then took the habit and the name María Sagrario de San Luis Gonzaga upon beginning her novitiate (Dec. 21, 1915). She professed her solemn vows in 1920. She was appointed mistress of novices (April 1927), then was elected prioress (1930–33). She was again elected prioress (July 1, 1936) just before the outbreak of violence in Madrid (July 18, 1936).

When the convent was attacked (July 20, 1936), she sent her sisters to safety and hid herself with another sister in the city rather than taking refuge in her brother's house at Pinto. The two were found and arrested in the Ruiz home, August 14. The following day she was executed by firing squad for refusing to denounce others.

Her body was exhumed and translated to the convent chapel after the war. On March 8, 1997, the decree of martyrdom was signed for Mother María Sagrario. During her beatification on May 10, 1998, Pope John Paul II pointed to María Sagrario as a model for pharmacists, then referred to her martyrdom: "she found the strength not to betray priests and friends of the community, facing death with integrity for her state as a Carmelite and to save others."

MORAL EDUCATION

Moral education comprises a lifelong process, influenced by many agencies in society, which promotes growth in responsibility and freedom.

Teaching of Vatican II. Vatican Council II's declaration on Christian education stresses the importance of moral education (Gravissimum educationis 7) by placing the issue in the context of changing social conditions. The ordinary faithful have an increasingly important part to play in the political and economic life of society; their social influence is amplified by developments in technology and social communication (ibid., intro.). The declaration, acknowledging advances in psychology and pedagogy, envisages the creation of means to "develop harmoniously [young people's] physical, moral, and intellectual qualities" to the end that they will acquire "a more perfect sense of responsibility in the proper development of their own lives . . . and in the pursuit of liberty" (ibid. l).

José Mora y del Rio.

As an agency which seeks to achieve this end, the Catholic school must strive to do the following: (1) provide an atmosphere enlivened by the freedom of the Gospel and by a spirit of charity; (2) help adolescents interpret their personality development in a manner coherent with the "new creation" they have become in Baptism; and (3) relate human culture to the mystery of salvation so that the Catholic student will "contribute effectively to the welfare of the world of men" and become "the saving leaven in the community" (ibid. 8). Clearly, the declaration sees moral education as developing persons who exercise their capacities as dynamic moral agents, who accept moral accountability for what they do, who take responsibility for others in relationship with them, and who arrive at a personal autonomy and freedom helpful to the human community.

Dimensions of Morality. Moral responsibility represents the maturation of the many dimensions in personal growth, not just a single dimension. It involves the capacity to decide (including initiative, experience, accountability, and caring) as well as the capacity to judge well (including understanding, fairness, and empathy). Moreover, moral education includes a proper orientation toward many levels of value.

Transcendent values. These represent the person's orientation of his life to the Author of life. Here the religious conscience gives testimony to a personal experience of the reality of God, to the enduring meaning of moral striving, and to a person's vocation to a special state in life. This level of values is altogether transempirical.

Social values. These represent the rules, order, roles, and customs of a person's culture. Persons gradually develop a capacity to relate to these values in flexible and creative ways, and this development is empirically measurable.

Personal Values. These represent the person's relationship to self-actualization, to the maturation of personal skills and talents, and to the free acceptance and exercise of personal potential for initiative, leadership, and creativity. A good orientation toward all of these dimensions is necessary for integral moral education.

Means for Moral Education. Most important for the moral education of the child are the example, character, and discipline of parents and family. Schools will supplement the influence of the family, but cannot be expected to provide an orientation to responsibility when this is lacking in the home. The sharing of a common vision of what is good, with family, friends, and an ecclesial community, is the most dynamic means for value formation. Likewise, only the exercise of responsibility and initiative will develop the personal value orientation necessary for the development of a mature autonomy and a personal freedom.

MORAL THEOLOGY

This article treats of moral theology as a sacred science and considers: (1) its proper essence or nature as a sacred science; (2) its relation to other parts of theology; (3) its relation to certain profane sciences—namely, ethics, sociology, and psychology—with which it has an affinity because they are also concerned with human behavior; and (4) its division or its basic content.

NATURE OF MORAL THEOLOGY

Since moral theology is a part of theology it cannot be understood or defined except in that framework, for the part has neither being nor consistency except in the whole. One's understanding of moral theology as theology must depend, therefore, on one's understanding of the kind of whole or totum that is constituted by the science of theology. Is it a universal or univocal whole, whose parts are contained in it as species in a genus? Is it a virtual or analogous whole, in which the secondary branches participate as modes, and imperfectly, in the idea of the science as this is realized in its principal branch? Or is it an integral whole, whose parts contribute to the total perfection of the whole, each in a proportionate way?

When theology began to be organized as a science, the whole of it in all its divisions, was considered to constitute one single specifically undifferentiated discipline. But in the course of time, the broadening of the inquiry into and application of the data of revelation gave rise to specialization. Gabriel VÁZQUEZ (d. 1604) was the first to advance the opinion that moral theology as it was taught in the schools was a distinct science. This idea found favor, and works on moral theology began to be published separately from those dealing with dogmatic or speculative theology, for example, the Institutiones morales (1600) of Juan AZOR, the Theologiae moralis summa (1588) of Enrique HENRÍQUEZ, and the Opus morale in praecepta decalogi (1613) of Tomás SÁNCHEZ. The 17th and 18th centuries produced an abundance and variety of works of this kind, and a determined effort was made to organize moral casuistry around specified criteria, which gave rise to the so-called systems of MO-RALITY. In the latter part of the 18th century the total separation of moral from dogmatic theology was achieved and its autonomy in its status as a separate science was established. Not only was a divorce effected between moral and dogma, but under the influence of the same trend other new species of theological science were introduced. Authors began to speak, as of distinct branches, about exegetical, patristic, symbolical, polemic, mystical, pastoral, liturgical, casuistic, homiletic, catechetic, positive, scholastic, speculative, synthetic, problematic, and historical theologies. These began to be gathered together in the only unity still possible, that of collections called theological encyclopedias (see J. M. Ramírez, De hominis beatitudine 1.7–22).

The 19th century and the first part of the 20th inherited this legacy from the 18th century. Since 1930, however, there has been a reaction against the preponderance of casuistry in moral theology, as well as against the disjunction of the sacred sciences in general, and there have been pleas for greater union and interpenetration. This marks some return to the traditional idea of theology, according to which theology is not a genus having different species under it, nor an analogous science embracing various genera, but an indivisible science having only integral parts. The whole of sacred theology has the same principles, which are the articles of faith, and the same medium of knowledge, which is the light of divine revelation. It is an imprint of God's own knowledge, which is one and simple with regard to all its objects, or, as St. Thomas said, a single and simple vision of all that He knows (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae (ST) 1a, 3 ad 7; hereafter all references with the author unnamed are to the works of St. Thomas). Such also was the position of Alexander of Hales, of SS. Albert the Great and Bonaventure, and in general of all the medieval scholastic theologians.

According to this view the sacred sciences are like the branches of the same divine tree, which is theology in its most profound and authentic sense. Its integral parts correspond to the distinct material objects contained within itself, and in regard to the various functions it, as true wisdom derived from God, exercises with respect to them. It thus treats of God, of man, of the God-Man, Jesus Christ, and of all that He did and taught; of the ultimate end of human life and of the means of attaining it; of good and evil, both eternal and temporal; in a word, of all that relates to God and to man as made to His image and likeness.

The function of theology, as true and supreme wisdom, is to grasp all divinely revealed truths to the full extent of their meaning and to direct life in genuine accord with them. For divinely revealed truth is at the same time the light of understanding and the bread of life. In regard to it wisdom exercises two functions. One of these is cognitive, for wisdom is an intellectual virtue; the other is directive of human life to the supernatural end of eternal life, since it is an affective and loving wisdom: "a sweet knowledge breathing forth love" (ST 1a, 43.5 ad 2; In epist. ad Heb. 5.2), and it is characteristic of the highest wisdom to consider the Supreme Cause of all things, God, as the ultimate end of every rational and angelic being (C. gent. 1.1). Thus Alexander of Hales could say of theology that it "teaches of God, is taught by God, and leads to God'' (ST, 1.2 ad obiecta, ed. Quaracchi, 1924, 5b).

Nominal Definition. The term moral theology contains two notions. It is theology but as modified by the adjective moral.

Theology. Theology is the science or knowledge of God. This knowledge is not, properly speaking, of God as He is in Himself, but rather of God as He has revealed Himself to man, as opposed to the knowledge of Him that can be derived by natural reason from the visible works of His creation. For this reason it is sometimes called sacred or supernatural theology. It is not simple theological faith, but rather knowledge derived from faith and scientifically elaborated by reason, which theology has at its service and positively directs in the exercise of its functions. It is faith seeking understanding (fides quaerens intellectum). For an account of the origin and semantic evolution of the word, see THEOLOGY.

Moral. This word is derived immediately from the Latin moralis, a word coined by Cicero (De fato 1) and taken into common use by Latin writers as St. Augustine attests (De civitate Dei 11.25). Cicero used philosophia moralis as a simple translation of the Greek ήθικη φιλοσοφία because it is concerned with mores, which they (the Greeks) called ἠθική. The Greek term, however, richer and more flexible than the Latin, provides an explanation of $\hat{\eta}\theta o \zeta$, which means a habit or habitual mode of conduct acquired by the repetition of acts (ἔθος), as opposed to a mode of conduct implanted by nature (Aristotle, Ethica Nicomachea 2.1). The Latin mos is of unknown or uncertain etymology; it expresses indiscriminately the habit acquired by repeated acts and the repetition of the acts, i.e., both effect and cause. To distinguish these verbally the Latins had recourse to a word of different origin, consuetudo, which is a habit contracted as if it were a kind of second nature, caused by the repetition of acts as signified by mos. So understood, mos is related to consuetudo as έθος to $\hat{\eta}\theta$ ος. Thus Macrobius wrote: "Mos, the moral act, came first, and cultus moris, the moral practice, which is custom [consuetudo], followed" (Conviviorum saturnaliorum 3.8). In any case, mos means a manner of being or acting, or of conducting oneself, particularly in regard to men, for mores are, as St. Ambrose observed (In Lucam, prol. 8), in a peculiar sense proper to men. Only men act freely, with perfect knowledge and control of their acts, and consequently they alone are capable of acquiring operative habits properly so called. As human, mores (or conduct) are not fatally or necessarily what they are; they are contingent and free. Like luck or health, they may be good or bad. But mores unqualified, like luck or health, are generally understood to be good.

The term moral, like the Greek $\dot{\eta}\theta\iota\kappa\dot{o}\nu$, is applied by metonymy to act, habit, object, science, and to the written or oral expression of the science, although differences of meaning are evident in its different applications. But morality is applied primarily to the human act, and secondarily, and because of their reference to the human act, to other things such as habit, object, or science. Because it is concerned with the human act, it follows that moral science embraces in its scope all the life and actions of man. Hence Aristotle called it the philosophy of human nature (Ethica Nicomachea 10.9 1181b).

Scripture adopted a similar terminology in reference to customs, practices, traditional rites (Lk 1.9; 2.42; 22.39; Acts 6.14; 16.21; 21.21; 26.3; Heb 10.25), and the good and bad habits contracted by the repetition of acts (1 Cor 15.33; Heb 5.14). This passed on to the Greek and Latin Fathers. They did not treat of the mores of God Himself, as did the unknown author of the treatise De divinis moribus and Leonard Lessius in his De perfectionibus moribusque divinis in later times—a manifest impropriety of language, for God does not have mores. The Fathers dealt only with the mores of man, and those of Jesus Christ, to whom as man they naturally belonged. They treated of such mores as coming from God and from Christ, the Word made man. "In the Old and New Testaments," says C. Spicq, "the life of the believer goes from God to God, from God the Creator . . . to God the ultimate end, the final repose of the just and of those who persevere Therefore the entire biblical moral teaching can be defined as a highway code telling how one may arrive at the desired term" [L'Epître aux Hebreux (Paris 1953) 101].

St. Thomas, who devoted considerable time to the semantics of the word moral in its theological application, did not use the term moral theology formally, but resorted to equivalent expressions, such as scientiam moralem (ST 1a, 1.4 obj. 2 and arg. sed contra), moralem considerationem or tractatum moralium (ST 1a, 83.2 ad 3), de moribus hominum (ST 1a, 1.3 obj. 2; 7 obj. 2) and de actibus humanis (ST 1a, 1.4 sed contra and corp.).

The term moral was used primarily for repeated good or bad human acts that produce a good or bad operative habit, i.e., a virtue or a vice (ST 1a2ae, 58.1); and the same term was then applied to the object or material with which these acts or habits are concerned (ST 1a2ae, 18.2; In 2 sent. 33.36.5) and to the science that deals with all of them (In 4 sent. 33.2.2.3 ad 2). And although the infused virtues are not caused by the repetition of acts (see VIRTUE), but are the result of the direct and immediate action of God, they can, nevertheless, be called moral either because of the matter with which they are concerned and the repeated acts that follow their infusion, as in the case of the infused cardinal virtues, or because of their consequent free exercise, even though directly and primarily their object is something divine rather than human, as in the case of the theological virtues.

Although St. Thomas did not employ the phrase theologia moralis, which has been in general use since the end of the 16th century, his contemporary Robert KIL-

WARDBY did [De natura theologiae, ed. F. Stegmuller (Münster in Westfalen 1935) 41, 17]. The Calvinist Lambert Daneau used an alternative expression in his Ethices christianae libri tres (1577), which was imitated in the 18th century by A. Hochkirchen's Ethica christiana sive orthodoxa iuris naturae et gentium prudentia (1751). Other works that used a form of the same title were B. Stattler's Ethica christiana universalis (1772) and Ethica christiana universalis (1800), the Ethica amoris of HENRY OF ST. IGNATIUS, the Ethica christiana (1758) of E. AMORT, and the Ethica christiana sive theologia moralis (1770) of V. Patuzzi.

From what has been said it is evident that the term moral theology, or Christian ethics, means the science of Christian life and action as this is seen as coming from God and ordained by God to man's attainment of eternal life. Or, to put it in other words, it is the science of Christian morality, i.e., of human life led in the imitation and following of Christ, who is the way by which we travel to God (via est nobis tendendi in Deum, ST 1a, 2. prolog.).

Real Definition. Since moral theology is a science and a true intellectual virtue, its real definition should stem from its relation to its proper object, for operative habits are specified by their proper objects, to which they are transcendentally related. But the formal object, both causal and terminative, of moral theology is the same as that of all theology, which is one and indivisible in species. That is to say, the object in this sense is God Himself under the aspect of His deity (sub ratione deitatis) as this has been manifested to man by divine revelation. From this point of view, then, there can be no differentiation of moral theology from the other divisions of sacred science. However, there is a difference on the part of the material object sufficient to account for the classification of moral as an integral part within the total gambit of sacred theology.

All the material with which theology is concerned is divided into two main sections, the first embracing things that ought to be known, and the second, things that ought to be done. What ought to be known pertains to faith; what ought to be done pertains to morals. This distinction is expressed or at least suggested by Scripture itself, which records that Christ, unlike the Pharisees who taught but did not practice (Mt 23.3), began to do and to teach (Acts 1.1). His disciples were called upon to imitate their Master in this: "He that shall do and teach, he shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 5.19); they were to be doers of the word and not hearers only (Jas 1.22), for faith without works is dead (Jas 2.26).

The Fathers. St. Cyril of Alexandria said that Christian religion consists in devout dogmas and good actions, not taken separately but rather together (Catech. 4.2; Patrologia Graeca 32:455; St. Gregory of Nyssa, Epist. 24; Patrologia Graeca 46: 1087). St. Augustine wrote a special work, De fide et operibus (Patrologia Latina 40:197–230), and elsewhere he wrote: "Everyone knows that in the sacred Scriptures . . . some things are proposed simply to be known and believed, for example, that in the beginning God made the heavens and the earth, and that in the beginning was the Word . . . and other things are commanded to be observed and carried out, or prohibited and to be avoided, such as 'honor thy father and mother,' and 'thou shalt not commit adultery''' (Speculum de sacra scriptura, pref.; Patrologia Latina 34:887–889).

Medieval Theologians. The distinction was too well recognized to require many citations. PETER CANTOR in the 12th century wrote: "Theology is twofold: there is the high or heavenly that offers knowledge of divine things; and there is the lower, or subheavenly, that teaches about moral matters" [Summa Abel, cited by M. Grabmann, Geschichte der scholast. Methode (Freiburg im Breisgau 1911) 2.483 n.2]. St. Thomas wrote: "The truth contained in Sacred Scripture is ordered to two things, namely, to believing rightly and to acting rightly" (Quodl. 7.6.2). Divine revelation was ordained to man's salvation; what is necessary to that end is reducible to the instruction of faith and the formation of morals (De ver. 12.2; cf. In 1 sent. 23.5, arg. sed contra). With the other theologians of his time St. Thomas was accustomed to translate this division into the Aristotelian terms of speculabilia and agibilia, and this provided the basis for the distinction of speculative and practical theology (see In 1 sent. prol., 3.1; ST 1a, 1.4). The practical part came to be called moral, the speculative part dogmatic, theology. The latter expression, however, appears not to have been coined until the 16th century, and its author may have been F. Suárez (Opera, ed. Vives, 20 p. xii), since whose time the older terms speculative and practical have been replaced by the terms dogmatic and moral.

The Object of Moral Theology. The object (or subject matter) with which moral, as distinct from dogmatic, theology is concerned is wholly and solely that which is capable of supernatural (i.e., theological) morality. This includes whatever can in any way influence or be the cause of that capacity or that morality, for all science properly so-called is the knowledge of its object through its causes.

The first and original subject of Christian and theological morality is man insofar as he is the adopted son of God and brother of Christ, or insofar as he is the supernatural image of God, bearing as a participant of the divine nature through sanctifying grace (2 Pt 1.4) a likeness to the consubstantial image of the Word made man, Jesus Christ (Col 1.15; Heb 1.3), to whose image the Christian should be conformed (Rom 8.29). Therefore, as St. Thomas noted profoundly and with great precision, the proper object of the moral part of the Summa theologiae is man as the image of God (ST 1a2ae, 1 prol.). It is the nature of the image to resemble its exemplar and imitate it as perfectly as possible, just as the son resembles the father and imitates his conduct or manner of acting.

Sanctifying grace not only heals and regenerates man wounded by sin, original and personal, but raises him up and makes him into a son of God, giving him in a sense a divine existence. And although this deification originally affects the soul as spiritual, it consequently also affects it as the animating and vivifying principle of the body; and hence the deification flows over into the body, which it makes the living temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 6.19), the bearer of God (1 Cor 3.16–17), and an instrument of justice and sanctification (Rom 6.13, 19). Rooted and enfolded in man as the principle, or formal cause, of his justification (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1529-30), this participation in the divine nature (2 Pt 1.4), which is grace, produces a corresponding divine operation. St. Peter emphasizes this, saying that it obliges us to flee all corruption of concupiscence and sin and to cultivate all the virtues, especially faith, hope (including patience), and charity, laboring ceaselessly to work out our sanctification and thus guarantee our entrance into the eternal kingdom of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ (2 Pt 1.4–11).

Habitual grace is the first immanent supernatural principle of the salutary works of the Christian life, just as the soul is the first immanent natural principle in man of the natural acts of human life. However, actions come from sanctifying grace through the infused virtues and gifts of the Holy Spirit that flow from grace in the manner of operative powers in the same way that the natural powers through which the soul operates flow, so to speak, from its essence. The infused virtues not only bestow on man a facility for the performance of supernatural works as acquired habits facilitate the operations of the natural powers of the soul, but also confer the very power to perform them (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 226, 245, 373, 395). Without them the natural powers can do nothing in the supernatural order. Virtues are needed, first of all, as the immediate principles of the salutary action that has God as its direct object. These affect the superior powers of the soul-faith, the intellect; hope and charity, the will-elevating them radically and sanctifying them. But besides this, other virtues are needed to elevate, even with respect to their activity having a created thing as its direct object, all the powers of the soul that are in any way rational and thus participate in a certain sense and to a certain degree in the natural image of God, and raise those powers to the level of the supernatural image. Thus, there are infused cardinal virtues affecting reason (prudence), will (justice), and the two forms of sense appetite, concupiscible (temperance) and irascible (fortitude). In addition to these there are the gifts of the Holy Spirit, corresponding to the three theological and the four cardinal virtues, perfecting and completing the adaptation of the natural powers to supernatural activity.

However, the immediate subject of Christian and theological morality is the human act of the Christian performed with full consciousness and freedom. This is an act commanded or elicited by the will; for nothing is to be classified as moral unless the will is involved, because in the sphere of morality will is the principle upon which the morality of all else depends (In 2 sent. 24.3.2). Thus the psychologically complete human act, fully conscious and free in regard to its specification and performance, or at least with regard to its performance, is the proper subject of the form of either natural or supernatural morality; and even the acts of the infused virtues and gifts must be psychologically complete to be accounted moral.

But the objective formality that moral theology considers in its material object is the supernatural and divine morality proper to the sons of God and brothers of Christ who act as such; for Christian, or theological, morality is the relation of conformity or disconformity of human acts with the law of God and of Christ. This is the eternal law, the law of divine love or of charity, for charity contains all the law and the prophets (Rom 13.10; Col 3.14; Mt 22.37-40). An act in conformity with this divine standard of conduct and befitting sons of God and brothers of Christ is morally good and Christian; if such conformity is lacking, the act is bad. The moral obligation to conform to this supreme norm is not something violent to nature or imposed from without; rather it is postulated and demanded by the essential condition of those who are living, supernatural images of God, His sons by adoption, and brothers of Jesus Christ.

The voluntary acts of the Christian are the essential means of attaining eternal life. They are a conscious and free movement toward God. As means, they affirm an essential relation to their proper end and should be proportioned to it. Consequently, those acts are morally good and Christian that are so proportioned and do in fact lead to eternal life. On the other hand, those acts are evil that are not proportioned to man's end and alienate him from God. The supreme good in the moral, as well as the ontological, order is God Himself as the object in which man finds beatitude, and it is in relation to Him that all human acts are to be considered as morally good or evil.

Supernatural morality is concretely reducible to the idea of merit or demerit with respect to eternal life. Thus it is proper in the strictest sense to the human acts of Christians, for one merits or demerits by his acts, not by his habits or his operative powers (De malo, 2.5 ad 8; 2.9 ad 9). Meritorious acts are here understood to mean acts that are salutary in the full sense, i.e., acts that are meritorious de condigno of eternal life. Imperfectly salutary acts, such as the acts of unformed faith (fides informis) and hope, prepare or dispose to justification only when they are united with the fear of God and sorrow for sin and are not called meritorious except in a broad and improper sense. Their merit is de congruo. Consequently, they are not salutary and meritorious except in an analogous sense of attribution (see ANALOGY) insofar as they participate imperfectly in the value and dignity of merit de condigno; and it is in this sense that they come within the orbit of supernatural morality (see MERIT).

Therefore, as St. Thomas observed, "the [condign] merit of everlasting life pertains first to charity and secondly to the other virtues inasmuch as their acts are commanded by charity" (ST 1a2ae, 114.4). Acts elicited by charity, especially the act of love directed immediately to God Himself, are, of their nature, meritorious de condigno. It is indeed the primary analogue of all that is meritorious. To acts commanded by charity and executed through the other virtues and the gifts of the Holy Spirit merit belongs by participation. Charity gives form and life to all the other virtues, endowing them with their ultimate perfection as virtues leading to eternal life (Gal 3.14). Without charity all the other virtues and their acts, however heroic and sublime they may seem to be, merit nothing with respect to eternal happiness. Even faith without charity is useless (Jas 2.20); it is of no avail toward eternal life except when united to charity and moved by it (Gal 5.6). He who does not love abides in death (1 Jn 3.14). In the words of St. Augustine, "The Scriptures command only charity and blame only cupidity, and thus do they form human morals" (Doctr. christ. 3.10.15); to which St. Thomas added, "The rectitude of the human will consists in an ordering of love which is its principal drive. Love is ordered when we love God above all things, as the highest good, and when we order all things to Him as the ultimate end" (De rat. fid. 5).

Charity, then, as Benedict XV declared, is the soul and the form of the whole Christian life [encycl. Pacem, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 12 (Rome 1920) 210]. Or, in the words of Leo XIII, "The kingdom of Jesus Christ takes its form and vitality from divine charity; its foundation and achievement is ordered and holy love" (encycl. Tametsi futura prospicientibus, Dec. 1, 1900). Indeed charity is the constitutive and distinctive sign of the true disciple of Christ, who loved men with the highest degree of love, giving His life for them upon the cross (Jn 15.9–13; 17.13). It is the seal of the true sons of a Father whose love embraces all things and all men, even to the extent of sending His Son for their ransom and redemption (Wis 11.25; Mt 5.44–48; Jn 3.16). Therefore the Apostle said: "Be you, therefore, imitators of God, as very dear children, and walk in love, as Christ also loved us and delivered himself up for us" (Eph 5.1–2). There is nothing more natural than that a son love his father and repay love with love (1 Jn 4.9–11; Comp. theol. 2.5).

All this is contained in yet another formula with which St. Thomas indicated the proper object of moral theology, namely the motus rationalis creaturae in Deum, the movement of the rational creature toward God (ST 1a, 2 prol.). This movement is the conscious and free act of the rational creature acting rationally. But the rational creature acts and moves toward God by acts of love. The feet with which he runs and the wings with which he flies and is lifted up to heaven are the acts whereby he fulfills the demands of charity (St. Augustine, In psalm. 33, serm. 2.10; Patrologia Latina 36:315).

Therefore moral theology is really and essentially the theology of love, that is, of the loving movement of the Christian toward God in the footsteps of Christ, his Redeemer and Savior.

THE RELATION OF MORAL TO THE OTHER PARTS OF THEOLOGY

According to the traditional view expounded above, all the parts of the theology properly so-called are integral parts within one body of sacred science. Between integral parts there should be neither antagonism nor separation, but only mutual union and solidarity. All the parts of theology together require a total theology that is complete and unmutilated. Each part or division has its function in the whole, as do the members and organs of a living body. And like the members of the body, they live and prosper when united among themselves in a whole, but they lose their identity and being on becoming separated.

Dogmatic Theology. Such a union exists between moral and dogmatic theology according to the traditional concept. The distinction between what is speculative and what is practical is merely human and philosophical. Theology transcends divisions and compartments of that kind and contains in a higher union all that is speculative and practical. In place of arid speculation it offers contemplation; in place of mere action with its usual accompaniment of agitation it offers a gentle, quiet, loving affection. Theology in its deepest and truest sense is, in fact, a loving contemplation of God and of all that refers to God as God. It is a development of faith, which is at one and the same time eminently cognitive and affective with respect to the revealed truth it embraces. The proper act of faith, which is to believe, is an act elicited from the intellect moved by the will, both powers being elevated and aided by grace (ST 2a2ae, 2.9). Faith is at once intellectually receptive of the revealed things of God and directive of human life. The same holds true for theology, because as the science of faith it must reflect these same qualities.

No dogma of faith is incapable of inciting to the love of God. All dogmas are concerned either with God Himself and His perfections, which call for love of Him as the greatest good, or with God's works ad extra, both natural and supernatural, which, as the fruit and product of His infinite love (ST 1a, 20.2), move one to respond with love (ST 2a2ae, 27.3). Therefore St. Thomas declared: "The knowledge of God which is had by other sciences enlightens only the intellect, showing that God is the first cause, that he is one and wise, etc. But the knowledge of God had through faith both enlightens the mind and delights the affections, for it not only tells that God is the first cause, but also that he is our Savior, that he is our Redeemer, that he loves us, that he became incarnate for us, and all this inflames the affections" (In epist. 2 ad Cor. 2.2).

On the other hand, there is no morally good and Christian act, especially if it is an act of charity, that does not dispose and help one better to grasp and understand the dogmas and truths of faith. Wisdom does not enter the sinful soul (Wis 1.4); for the sensual man lives sensuously, like the brute beasts, and cannot perceive the things that are of the spirit, which are the things of God (1 Cor 2.14–16). He who loves God knows Him in truth, and he who offends Him by sin does not know Him (1 Jn 3.6; 4.7). The truths of faith are the life and mysteries of love, which are neither grasped nor well perceived unless love is allied with the act of the intelligence. Love opens the eyes and makes them keener, for, as St. Thomas observed, "The lover is not satisfied with a superficial apprehension of the beloved but strives to gain an intimate knowledge of everything that pertains to the beloved so as to penetrate into his very soul. Thus it is written of the Holy Spirit who is God's love that He searches all things, even the deep things of God" (ST 1a2ae, 28.2); and elsewhere: "Spiritual things should be tasted first and afterwards understood, for no one understands who does not taste. Thus the psalmist says first: Taste! and afterwards: See how sweet is the Lord' (In Psalm 33.9).

Thus dogmatic and moral theology are each in need of the other's help. They complete each other, like faith and good habits informed and vivified by charity.

The teaching of Sacred Scripture holds that it hands on not only matters to be speculated on, as geometry does, but also matters to be approved by the affective powers. Thus we read that whoever carries them out (i.e., the Commandments) and teaches them, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven (Mt 5.19). Hence in other sciences it is enough that a man be perfect in his intellect; in this it is required that he be perfect both in intellect and affection. Deep mysteries, therefore, are to be spoken to the perfect: "wisdom we speak among those who are mature" (1 Cor 2.6). According as each one is disposed, thus things will appear to him, as an angry man judges one way while angry and otherwise when his anger has passed, and an incontinent man will judge something good because of his passion and differently when it has subsided Since then the things taught in the Scripture pertain to the affections of man as well as to the intellect, it is best to be perfect in both. [In Heb. 5.2]

Casuistry and Ascetical and Mystical Theology.

Just as moral theology, as here understood, cannot be separated from the rest of theology, so casuistry and ascetical and mystical theology cannot be separated from moral, or from theology as a whole. They are essentially and specifically one with each other and with theology in its totality in having the same formal object. All have the same principles and the same means of knowledge, that is, the articles of faith and the same divine revelation. They envisage the same supernatural and Christian morality. For there are not various kinds of sonship by adoption, or of brothers in Christ, or of Christian life. There is only one God, one Christ, and one Church that is His mystical body. Sanctifying grace is the same for all; the same beatitude is held out to all, and there is only one road leading to it, namely, the imitation and following of Christ (Rom 3.30; 5.15, 17; 12.5; 1 Cor 8.4–6; 12.9–27; 2 Cor 5.14; Gal 3.16, 20, 28; Eph 4.4–6; 1 Tm 2.5).

Theological charity, which is like the soul and form of all Christian morality, is specifically the same in all Christians who possess it. Christian morality, then, is specifically one, for this morality corresponds to the acts elicited by charity and to acts of other virtues only insofar as they are ordered and vivified by charity.

The degrees and steps of charity in its upward movement toward union with God are reducible to three, which are known as the incipient, proficient, and perfect; and to these steps three stages of the Christian life correspond—the purgative, illuminative, and unitive (see THREE WAYS, THE). These do not constitute different kinds of life, but are rather distinct ages of the same life and different moments of the same movement (ST 2a2ae, 24.9; In 3 sent. 29.8.1; In Isaiam 44.4). They correspond to infancy, adolescence, and manhood or maturity in human life on the natural level, which develops in these stages but remains specifically the same.

Casuistry. Casuistry is concerned with the incipient charity of the neophyte still in the stage of spiritual infancy; that is, it deals with the moral life of those recently converted from sin to grace. Such individuals still feel the goad of sin, which, though pardoned so far as its guilt is concerned, has left effects in the form of evil inclinations against which they must struggle if they would conserve the life of grace and avoid relapsing into sin. Casuistry, therefore, is concerned in particular with the licit and the illicit, that is, with what is compatible or incompatible with grace and charity, and devotes itself to the establishment of norms and the discovery of concrete means for avoiding mortal sin and the loss of grace. Hence it is pre-occupied with the purgative way.

Ascetical Theology. The ascetical theologian deals with proficient charity, or with the spiritual adolescence of those who, having overcome and conquered evil inclinations to sin, seek to grow and develop in a truly Christian life. Ascetical theology, therefore, is less concerned with the good and evil, the licit and the illicit, the permitted and the forbidden, but is more interested in the greater and lesser good. The proper function of this branch of theology, therefore, is to deal with the illuminative way.

Mystical Theology. The mystical theologian treats of perfect charity, that is, of the spiritual maturity or manhood of those Christians who, having conquered sin and its evil inclinations, and having grown in grace, have drawn near to Christ and are united to Him in close friendship, as if transformed into Him, as was St. Paul, who said: "It is now no longer I that live, but Christ lives in me" (Gal 2.20). Mystical theology, therefore, is not concerned with the good or better so much as with what is, properly and absolutely speaking, the best, which consists in intimate union with God and permanence in Him in what is called the unitive way.

Differences Not Specific. A certain caution, however, is necessary to avoid exaggerating the significance of the distinction between the different stages of the Christian life. These ways or stages do not constitute autonomous and separate compartments, but are rather mutually intermingling and interacting phases. The life of grace and charity, even in the case of neophytes or those recently raised to grace by baptism or penance, is not lacking in a real illumination from above by which they pass from the darkness of sin to the light of Christ and to an affective and effective union with Him. Moreover, by resisting temptation to sin and struggling against the inclinations left by their former sins, they really gain merit before God and grow in grace and charity.

On the other hand, temptation and the danger of relapse into sin do not totally cease as long as the present life lasts, and therefore in all stages of the spiritual life the Christian should be vigilant and resort to mortification, according to the admonition of St. Paul: "Let him who thinks he stands take heed lest he fall' (1 Cor 10.12; Phil 2.12; 1 Cor 9.27; 2 Cor 4.10). Charity and with it the vigor of Christian life should ever grow during the present life, being renewed day by day (1 Cor 4.10) until death. Charity does not grow old, but rather gains new strength the more it is used.

One cannot hold the contrary without falling into the aberrations of the Brethren of the Free Spirit, of the Beghards, the illuminati, or the quietists, who thought that the Christian or spiritual man can in this life attain such a degree of perfection that he no longer needs to be mortified or to perform acts of penance or to practice virtue, since he has become incapable of sin and has attained union with God, a condition that puts him beyond the need of purification or growth [J. De Guibert, Documenta ecclesiastica christianae perfectionis studium spectantia (Rome 1931) 200–204, 274–275, 304, 315–317, 403–419, 438–468, 471, 474].

Charity does not make the observance of the Commandments of God and of the Church unnecessary; on the contrary, it positively demands their observance: "If you love me, keep my commandments" (Jn 14.15; Jn 14.20; 1 Jn 2.3–5; 5.2). The same charity, without change of kind, is capable of performing the different functions appropriate to the different stages of spiritual development. It struggles to avoid sin; it resists temptation; dynamic and active, it grows until the soul is united perfectly to God. It is impossible to distinguish in kind between the Christian moralities corresponding to the several branches of theology under discussion, just as it is impossible to make a division in charity itself.

The Detachment of Casuistry from Moral Theology. In every practical science there must be a certain casuistry, for "all operative sciences are perfected by the considerations of details" (ST 1a2ae, 6 prol.; ST 1a, 22. 3 ad 1). It must, however, shun sophistry and exaggerated pragmatism, for otherwise it would cease to be a science and become a mere art or simply a technique. Unfortunately, casuistry has too frequently inclined in this direction at the cost of a loss of contact with Scripture and the Fathers, with the great dogmas of faith, and with the basic principles of moral theology itself. And this has resulted in a moral doctrine that sometimes appears to give no thought to man's ultimate end or to grace. It seems cramped by a certain legal juridicism and meticulously catalogues sins as they are related to confession and to sacramental absolution, but gives scant attention to the spiritual life or the supernatural virtues. The moral systems (see MORALITY, SYSTEMS OF) founded on certain reflex principles of more juridical than moral value do not compensate for what is lost by abandoning the great foundations of Christian moral teaching and the use of Christian prudence, which is precisely the virtue that, illuminated by faith and backed by a sound moral theology, guides science in the sure and genuinely Christian solution of its cases. Fortunately, in more recent years greater importance is being attached by moral theologians to the virtues than to the vices, to the law of Christ than to the old law of the Decalogue; but much remains to be done toward raising the general level of moral theology and putting it in greater accord with the spirit of the gospel and the teachings of the great theologians of the past.

Some of the excessive juridicism that marks moral theology as expounded by some moralists stems, no doubt, from its association with a type of canonical thought disengaged from its ancient theological context. Canon Law in the beginning was not separated from theology but rather formed a part of it and had, therefore, a more evangelical flavor. There are indications that it may return in some degree to its old matrix, for, according to Vatican Council II, the duty of the bishops and of the whole government of the universal Church to rule is essentially united to the duty of sanctification [Dogmatic Constitution De Ecclesia 3.27, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (Rome 1965) 32–33]. The pope and the bishops govern the Christian people in the name of Christ, as His vicars, for the better fulfillment of His law, which is the law of love and charity.

Liturgy and Pastoral Theology. The liturgy integrates the Scriptures (the Psalms and readings from the sacred books), the writings of the Fathers (homilies), the living magisterium of the Church (the hymns and prayers approved and proposed by it), and the purest ascetical and mystical spirituality with which not a few Masses and Lessons of the Breviary abound. Through it, therefore, the functions of dogmatic, moral, and spiritual theology are exercised in a living and effective manner [Vatican Council II, Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 16–19, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 (1964) 104–105].

Pastoral theology aims at the proper fulfillment of the duty of the pastor of souls, in imitation of Jesus Christ, who is the Good Shepherd, the Pastor by antonomasia. He feeds His sheep with His life and His doctrine (Acts 1.1), giving example in all the virtues, especially that of charity, by dying for men on the cross (1 Pt 2.21–25), and communicating to them the words and mysteries of eternal life (Jn 6.64, 69). His pastoral teaching contains the truth to be believed and the holiness to be realized in practice. Such is the work of the pastoral ministry, namely, to teach Christian dogma and morals, according to the revelation of Jesus Christ and the authentic interpretation of the Church, in which exegetes, Fathers, and theologians have collaborated.

Pastoral theology is reduced to practice in the liturgy, in homiletics and catechetics. The catechesis of the Apostles, contained in the Gospels, was impregnated with the life and doctrine of Christ, as was the liturgy practiced by them and transmitted to the Christian community, which has continued to flourish and develop throughout the centuries. The homilies of the Fathers, especially those of SS. John Chrysotom, Augustine, and Leo the Great, contain immeasurable biblical, dogmatic, moral, and spiritual riches. They lived the divine revelation in its entirety and gave expression to it in their words. As true and authentic kerygma, it was a living proclamation of the gospel. The truths of faith and the norms of conduct taught by Jesus Christ, and collected and illustrated by a sound and authentic theology, are always lifegiving and kerygmatic.

In this way all the integral parts of sacred theology are mutually completed and perfected, to the great advantage of theological science and of the Christian life.

MORAL THEOLOGY AND PHILOSOPHICAL BEHAVIOR SCIENCE

Moral theology is essentially distinct from natural ethics, not simply in species but also in genus, in the same way that Christian theology is distinguished from theodicy (ST 1a, 1.1 ad 2). Between them there is only an analogy of proper proportionality inasmuch as moral theology holds the same position in the supernatural order that moral philosophy does in the natural order (In 3 sent. 33.1.2.4). The essential generic difference appears on the part of the subject of the respective moralities, the moralities themselves, and the means of knowing them.

Subject and Operative Principle. The remote and radical subject of moral theology or philosophy is the person operating, that is to say, man. For moral philosophy the subject is man as man, that is, considered simply as a rational animal; for moral theology the subject is man as the adopted son of God and brother of the only begotten of the Father, Jesus Christ.

The operative principle of moral actions for moral philosophy is, radically, the rational soul and, proximately, the rational powers of the soul and the cardinal virtues acquired by the repetition of acts; for moral theology the radical principle of moral acts is habitual grace, and the infused virtues are the proximate or immediate principle.

In natural ethics the immediate subject of morality is the natural human acts of man as man and of his acquired virtues; in moral theology the subject is the supernatural human acts of man as a Christian and son of God by adoption and of his infused virtues.

Morality. Ethics considers only the natural morality of the human acts of man as man and of his acquired virtues; moral theology directly and principally considers the supernatural morality of the human acts of man as a Christian and of his infused virtues. Natural or philosophical morality is the order or relation of natural human acts to the ultimate natural end of human life, according to the natural law naturally known by man and the determinations of positive human laws; supernatural or theological morality is the order or relation of supernatural human acts to the ultimate supernatural end of the whole Christian life of the sons of God. Goodness in the former is measured in terms of what is befitting human nature and natural right reason; in the latter in terms of conformity with the divine filiation, brotherhood of Christ, and with the teachings of the faith. The ultimate issue, in the case of natural morality, is a well-being in the natural order; in the case of supernatural morality, it is the vision of God, for supernatural human acts executed with the help of God's grace and the infused virtues, especially charity, are salutary in the full sense and meritorious of eternal life.

Means of Knowledge. These differ essentially for both moral sciences. Ethics can know its formal object by the light of natural reason alone. By this light it knows the rational and social nature of man, his human acts, his natural powers, the acquired habits that are the immediate principles of his good and evil action, and his ultimate natural end. But the proper object of moral theology cannot be known by natural reason, but only in the light of divine revelation. By this means alone can be known the elevation of man to the supernatural order and the status of son of God, brother of Christ, and heir of eternal life. The same light is needed to know of sanctifying grace, the infused virtues, the gifts of the Holy Spirit, the Sacraments through which God communicates His grace, the meritorious value of acts elicited or commanded by charity, and the eternal and the positive law of God, especially the law of charity, promulgated and carried to its highest perfection by Christ.

The Comparative Imperfection of Ethics. Philosophical ethics is an imperfect science within its own sphere, for it does not know the true existential situation of man as it is in fact. Natural reason is capable only of knowing human nature in its essential lines and in the rights and duties that are proper to it as such, that is to say, in its condition or state of pure nature. It knows nothing of man's elevation to the supernatural order or of original sin; it is ignorant therefore of the state of original justice, or of the state of nature as redeemed or repaired after the Fall, which are man's true historical states. Knowledge of these can be had only through divine revelation.

Knowing nothing of man's historical states, purely philosophical ethics has no knowledge of the wounds, the weaknesses, and the infirmities due to original sin, which affect man even in his natural life and environment, because, in addition to being deprived of the supernatural and preternatural gifts that he enjoyed in the state of original justice, he was also left wounded in his nature. Because of this he is morally incapable of fulfilling all the natural law by the natural powers at his disposal, but even for that achievement of the natural order, he must have the help of grace. This moral impotence carries over into his very knowledge of the natural law, which becomes uncertain in not a few of its precepts for the majority of men; for the practical intellect, to which such knowledge belongs, has been especially weakened in its proper function of discriminating between good and evil and of directing the will to true good. "Because we do not know ourselves perfectly we cannot fully know what is for our good according to Wisdom (9.14): 'For the deliberations of mortals are timid, and unsure are our plans" (ST 1a2ae, 109.9). Therefore the divine revelation of these fundamental truths of the natural law was morally necessary in order that all men from the beginning of rational life might have certain knowledge of them without admixture of error (In 3 sent. 37.1, and ad 1, 3). In addition to its ignorance of the true moral order, ethics labors under the more serious ignorance of man's elevation to the dignity of son of God and heir to His glory.

Value of Ethics. Although imperfect and incomplete, the knowledge of man sought by philosophical ethics is not something false or valueless. This knowledge does not contain total and complete, but only partial and imperfect, truth. Nevertheless it is truth and not error. The natural knowledge of God derived by theodicy from the visible things of creation is not false, nor is it opposed to the knowledge of the one and triune God that theology seeks in faith and divine revelation; on the contrary, it is a preamble to it. In a similar way, the natural knowledge of God as the natural ultimate end of man, to whom man owes the cult of prayer and adoration according to his strength and possibilities, is not an aberration; rather it is natural truth that prepares the soul to receive the plenitude of saving truth drawn from divine revelation.

Between ethics, then, and moral theology one must admit an essential distinction, but not a separation and much less an antagonism. The distinction parallels that between reason and revelation, or the more universal one between nature and grace. Grace does not destroy nature, but rather supports and perfects it (ST 1a, 1.8 ad 2; 60.5; 62.5). This distinction provides a certain autonomy for both sides within their proper field and limits, which was recognized by Vatican Council I with regard to theology and philosophy in general (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3019), although the Council exacted a true union and collaboration. Moral theology admits all the good and true taught by ethics and makes use of it for its own higher ends, at the same time remedying the defects and imperfections of ethics and enriching it with new and sublime contributions from Christian revelation.

Ethics is subordinate to moral theology just as reason is to faith and nature to grace, but it is not subalternated properly and strictly speaking, as J. Maritain thought [Science et sagesse (Paris 1935) 327–345]. This would mean the absorption of ethics in theology and its reduction to a theology of the second class [J. M. Ramirez, "Sur l'organization du savoir moral," Bulletin Thomiste (Paris 1935) 363–386; "De philosophia morali christiana," Divis Thomas (Fribourg 1936) 87–122, 181–204].

Moral theology should similarly make use of the sciences auxiliary to ethics, especially of psychology in its experimental, rational, and pathological branches. Human acts, psychologically considered, are the matter with which ethics is immediately concerned, and whatever exerts influence on the cognitive and appetitive elements of the human act is likely to have some influence on the responsibility of the agent and the morality of his acts. And, since the supernatural act with which moral theology is immediately concerned supposes a complete natural human act, it is evident that psychology, and, in general, anthropology in its fullest and integral sense, can be of great use to the moral theologian.

DIVISION OF MORAL THEOLOGY

With greater attention to practical utility than to the scientific organization of their material, many moralists of the past arranged their matter in alphabetical order. Others divided it according to the Commandments of the Decalogue and of the Church. This mode of division enjoyed general favor for a time. Later, in an attempt to give greater scientific character to their subject, many theologians began to treat moral theology as a body of doctrine parallel with dogmatic theology. Therefore, because dogma was commonly divided into general and special dogmatic theology (the general being known as fundamental, and the special being subdivided into various treatises, On the One God, On the Trinity, etc.), moralists imitated this procedure and divided moral theology into general and special. The general part was called fundamental, and it dealt with the notions common to all moral material. The special was subdivided into different treatises on the virtues, sins, and precepts, and terminated with a practical treatise on the Sacraments. This division was much in vogue after T. J. Bouquillon published his Theologia moralis fundamentalis (Bruges 1873). This work omitted any treatment of grace or the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which it relegated to dogmatic or mystical theology, and gave only superficial consideration to the ultimate supernatural end of human life, although these treatises are the most fundamental of all moral theology. Moreover, it lacked a Christological flavor because it did not focus Christian morality in an explicit and formal way on Christ. The Redemptorist Bernard Häring sought to remedy this defect in his Das Gesetz Christi (Freiburg im Breisgau 1958).

The End. Moral theology ought to revolve entirely around God and Christ since it is a theology of the morality of the sons of God and the brothers of Christ. On the other hand, an explicit and clear consideration of the proper end of all human life and the means of attaining it is an essential requirement of all moral doctrine. There are two poles on which all morality moves: de vita et moribus. The life is to be understood as the vita beata and the mores as the human acts by which one moves toward it. This was known to the ancient Greek and Latin philosophers, but their ideas must be translated analogically and proportionally to the supernatural order. Therefore, a scientifically and vitally structured moral theology should begin by pointing out the final goal of all Christian life, which is God Himself as He is in Himself, the object in which beatitude is found. The way by which this beatitude is achieved must be indicated. The royal road is Christ, who said of Himself: "I am the way, and the truth, and the life. No one comes to the Father but through me" (Jn 14.6). In this way all moral theology is theocentric and Christocentric.

The Means. The means to be employed ought to be proportionate to the essentially supernatural and divine end. They are human acts performed in grace and love, for only such are actus salutares and lead to eternal life. Therefore, moral theology ought to contain a treatise on grace and the infused theological and moral virtues, which are the immanent principles of the salutary acts that merit eternal life. It should contain also a consideration of the gifts and fruits of the Holy Spirit, of the beatitudes, and of the Sacraments as the efficacious means of Christian sanctification. Finally, it should treat of the law of God and of His Commandments as these are necessary to the dignity of Christians who are sons of God by adoption and heirs to His glory, the Commandments being expounded as they are contained in the all-embracing law of charity.

Such was the field of moral theology as this was understood by St. Thomas Aquinas, whose achievement as a moralist is sometimes overshadowed in popular consciousness by his greatness in other areas of theological and philosophical thought. But his excellence, in the judgment of some—at least of his contemporaries, was to be found especially in moral matters (Chronica minor auctore Minorita Erphordiensi 4; Monumenta Ger- maniae Historica 24.212). Precisely as a moralist was he most original and creative, and in nothing is he more admirable than in his total view of the life worthy of a Christian, which he set out to treat in such a way that nihil moralium erit praetermissum (ST 2a2ae, prol.).

MORAL THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF (TO 700)

In the primitive Church Christ's moral teaching developed out of the basic, but nonceremonial, Jewish ethic as modified in Christ's interpretation of the Ten Commandments and the Beatitudes. Although neither casuistic nor ascetical, the earliest postapostolic documents, such as the letter of CLEMENT I, the DIDACHE, Shepherd of HERMAS, pseudo-BARNABAS, and the letters of POLY-CARP and of IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH, are primarily moral treatises. They deal with obedience; the imitation of Christ in His sufferings; family, social, and civic obligations. From the Old Testament the Christians inherited a dynamic sense of God's living presence and of His wisdom, sanctifying the man who devoted himself to God's law. The way of wisdom (hokmâ) was identified with the right conduct of life; it led to an experience of the divine presence. St. Paul had applied this notion to Christ, "The Wisdom of God" (1 Cor 1.24); and in the Septuagint translation of hokmâ, or wisdom, sophia was used for its stress on virtue as well as knowledge; in Latin, this became sapientia used by Vergil and Cicero in a sense that implied virtue.

Hellenistic and Christian Ethic. The Hellenistic ethic was a nonreligious attempt to achieve a rationally coherent system of conduct based on man's reaction to daily experience. For the Platonists, control of passion was directed to contemplation; for the Stoics, it looked to achievement of the honestum, or good, and was extended to family, friends, and country. The Christian ethic, on the other hand, was based on conformity to the will of God as revealed in His Word through the Scriptures. On an eschatological basis, St. Paul specified the law of Christ as love of God and neighbor in the Church as the body of Christ. The early Christian teachers further adapted codes of social conduct common in both Hellenistic and Jewish teaching; and in their CATECHESIS, or moral instruction, they employed pedagogic devices such as the "two ways" (Didache, pseudo-Barnabas, Shepherd of Hermas) and catalogues of virtues (Clement I, Ignatius) that were used by Aristotle (Eth. Nic. 2.7), by Christ (Mt 5.1-12; Lk 6.20-23), and in the Epistles. In adapting Christian moral teaching to everyday life, Platonic and Stoic anthropology, experience, and terminology played a part, particularly with the apologists. Little attention was paid in earlier documents to the psychological elements in man's evil tendencies; this interest was developed mainly in the Judeo-Christian apocryphal literature with the doctrine of the good and evil spirits. It received justification in New Testament preoccupation with diabolic and angelic influences.

The Apologists. In defending Christians against allegations of criminality, the 2d-century APOLOGISTS assessed the morality of their Hellenistic contemporaries, attacked idolatry and superstition, and attempted to convince their pagan audience that Christianity alone was conformable to what is noble and valuable in the human soul. JUSTIN MARTYR (100 to 160) supplied a "rule of faith" and recounted the way of conversion from pagan immorality and Jewish superstition to the purity of the Christian way of life (Apol. 1.14.4–17.4). The letter to DIOGNETUS described the divine economy of God's revelation as an antidote to man's corrupt ways and asserted that in marriage and family life, in dress and language, in civic custom and law, Christians did not differ from their contemporaries, sin alone excepted (5.1–8). The author maintained that "what the soul is to the body, the Christians are to the world" (6.1–10). This attitude was likewise reflected in the apology of ARISTIDES (17.19).

TATIAN (Disc. 12) and THEOPHILUS OF ANTIOCH (Autoly. 2) attempted to supply a theory for the inner workings of the soul. Irenaeus of Lyons coordinated the Christian moral development; refuted Gnosticism with its pessimistic evaluation of evil as a positive reality; and returned to the Semitic, flesh-soul-spirit anthropology rooted in the Pauline concept of the Incarnation. Man was created as a child ($\nu\eta\pi\iota\sigma\varsigma$); his failure to follow God's pedagogic guidance has been rectified by Christ, in whom all things were created and destined for a final recapitulation. Man's freedom, however, is guaranteed by his creation in God's image, which he is to refashion within himself, under the aegis of the Holy Spirit.

Early Latin and Greek Fathers. The Greek and Latin Fathers of the 3d century continued this development. TERTULLIAN, HIPPOLYTUS, and CYPRIAN OF CAR-THAGE in the West and CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA and ORIGEN in the East inaugurated a detailed elucidation of such themes of Christian morality as the image of God, the imitation of Christ, the return to a paradisaical innocence or perfection. Clement described at length the full Christian day from the family meal in the evening through prayer and the care of the body, to sexual and social activities (Pedagog. 2, 3). With Origen and METHODI-US OF OLYMPUS, specific obligations such as virginity and continence, prayer, fasting, almsgiving, patience and steadfastness in persecution, justice, and the Christian attitude toward the state received basic consideration. In Hippolytus the liturgical and canonical aspects of Christian life are described; and in local synods and the councils, ordinances were laid down regarding clerical and lay practice of virtue and avoidance of vice. In Tertullian a legalistic approach to salvation is expressed in terms of the debt due to sin, condign punishment, and satisfaction; and this became a characteristic of Western moral thought as expressed by popes such as INNOCENT I, LEO I, GELASIUS, and GREGORY I.

Eastern Moral Thought. In the East, with ATHANA-SIUS, CYRIL, and the Alexandrians generally, more stress was placed on the possibility of man's divinization through cooperation with the Holy Spirit. In the Antiochene school as represented by DIODORE OF TARSUS, THEODORET OF CYR, and JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, man's justification was connected rather with his fulfillment in the Resurrection and with his preparation through the imitation of Christ in His sufferings. This teaching was developed in exegetical homilies on the Scripture and in catechetical and mystagogical lectures such as those of CYRIL OF JERUSALEM and Theodoret of Cyr. But in an unfinished work on the nature of man, NEMESIUS OF EMESA (400 to 450) supplied a psychological analysis of the human composite and vindicated man's freedom while insisting on the guidance of providence.

Basil of Caesarea (d. 379) returned to the gospel precepts and concentrated on the will as the controller of virtuous conduct, while combating the rigorism of EUSTATHIUS OF SEBASTE. Man with free will is capable of love and sacrifice in striving for union with Christ through participation in the mysteries of the Church's life. Basil's regulae were directed to the guidance of monastic life, but dealt also with priestly ministration and the obligations of husbands and wives, children and servants, administrators and magistrates (70 to 79). The perfection of union with Christ is achieved in martyrdom; but the monk and lay Christian can approach this ideal in the "white martyrdom" of obedience to God's will by the practice of virtue, constant prayer, and continence. GREGORY OF NYSSA stressed imitation of divine nature, in image of which man is created, and harmonized the concept of grace with the Hellenistic ethical ideal (De instit. christ.). The practical pastor of souls predominated in John Chrysostom's discussion of original sin and penance, and in the explicit instruction in virtuous practice that he provided in exegetical homilies and sermons for the laity, monks, and priests (De sacerdotio).

Fathers of the West. Western moral thought is represented in HILARY OF POITIERS' (315 to 371) exegesis of the Psalms and of St. Matthew; by ZENO OF VERONA (363 to 372) in the battle against pagan practices; by PACIAN OF BARCELONA (d. 392), who wrote treatises on Baptism and Penance; and by a widespread defense against the excesses of PRISCILLIANISM and the purely humanistic doctrines of PELAGIANISM. AMBROSE of Milan (339 to 397) utilized Cicero's De officiis as a background for his discussion of the Christian moral teaching, but consciously directed man's final end to union with God rather than Stoic contemplation. He stressed the ideals of continence and virginity, as did JEROME, whose defense of Christian morality is all-embracing in his Adv. Vigilantium, Adv. Helvidium, and Dialogi III contra Pelagium. RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA introduced Origen's ascetical ideals and Basil's concept of the practice of virtue for both the laity and monks in the West. John CASSIAN (c. 360 to 430) in his De institutis and Collationes Patrum discussed the love of God and purity of heart; he advocated the avoidance of the eight capital sins as the way to perfection; and PETER CHRYSOLOGUS (d. c. 450), MAXIMUS OF TURIN (d. c. 420), and Pope Leo I excelled in the adaptation of moral discipline to the necessities of daily life.

With St. AUGUSTINE of Hippo, Western moral thought reached maturity. His vast sweep of doctrinal disquisitions provided a defense of Christian moral theory against MANICHAEANS and Pelagians; he turned to specific problems in his De agone christiano, De mendacio, De continentia, De bono conjugali, De nuptiis et concupiscentia, De bono viduitatis, and De virginitate. Because of his personal experiences (Confessions) Augustine took a pessimistic view of human nature and tended to exaggerate the opposition between GRACE and nature. This tendency toward rigor is discernible in many of his sermons, and it affected the development of moral theology during the Middle Ages. It is notable in the sermons of CAESARIUS OF ARLES (d. 542), who, commenting on the Old Testament practice of continence, introduced abstention from Communion after marital relations and nocturnal pollution. Pope Gregory I (590 to 604) mitigated this tendency with his insistence that, although no good work is possible without chastity, it is useless without suavitas mentis. With his Liber regulae pastoralis, Moralis in Job, and Dialogi de vita et miraculis patrum italicorum he set the moral standard for the next 600 years.

Oriental Theory and Practice. Oriental moral theory and practice was elaborated by EVAGRIUS PONTICUS (d. 399), who distinguished a threefold ascent to union with God. He concentrated on the psychological process of praxis, physical theoria (contemplation), and theologia in some four or six steps that began with the moral requirement of purging the soul by struggling against passion, obedience to God's Commandments, and the exercise of positive virtue. Faith and fear of God are the foundation for continence, patience, and hope, which lead to a deliberated selflessness (apatheia) and love (agape). In the second stage Evagrius gradually eliminated images and phantasms in prayer; but the complicated Neoplatonic notions of the spirit world in relation to God, involved in his second and third steps, were considered Origenistic in essence and were condemned at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II (553).

Closer to the Basilian ideal of praxis, the 6th-century monastic leaders of Palestine, Barsanuphius of Gaza and John the Prophet, insisted on the monk's revelation of his inmost soul to his spiritual director, while he strove through love to obey the Commandments, suppress his willfulness, and achieve the fulfillment of God's will in humility and docility. A life so directed leads to inner peacefulness (hesychia), which is a reward for virtue rather than a state of virtuousness. Abbot Dorotheus listed obedience, humility, temperance, patience, fraternal charity, and contemplation of the last things as the occupation of a monk; and Abbot Zosimus clothed these virtues in examples and experiences with a vividness that emulated that of John Cassian. Following this line was John MOSCHUS's Ladder of Paradise, in which he concentrated on sorrow for sin and obedience as the proper attitude in the practice of virtue; and the abbot Thalassius of Lybia (c. 650) developed the Evagrian praxis by insisting on a harmony between body and soul in the psychological activity of the nous, or spirit. In reaching for God man can attain the fulfillment of his personality. MAXIMUS CONFESSOR (580 to 655) accepted the Evagrian psychology and developed it in a humanistic sense, maintaining its propriety for both the laity and monks, whereas Theodore the Studite (759 to 826) denied an essential difference between the perfection of the monk and that of the layman, and centered on man's imitating Christ in his Crucifixion. JOHN DAMASCENE (675 to 749), in his tract on fasting and in his work on the virtues and vices, had summed up the patristic phase of moral development. His synthesis greatly affected the scholastic development in the 12th-century renewal of theology.

MORAL THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF (700 TO VATICAN COUNCIL I)

This article deals with the history of moral theology from the end of the Patristic period down to the beginning of the modern era.

From the Patristic to the Scholastic Period. From the years 700 to 1100 not a single work in moral theology appears. It was considered enough, especially in Benedictine cloisters, to reread the Fathers, to make extracts from them selected according to a practical point of view, as did, for example, Rabanus Maurus (d. 859). To reconstruct the moral theology of the period, one has to have recourse to the decrees of the popes, the councils, and bishops, made in the effort to remedy abuses and thereby raise the moral level of the Christian people.

The only important development of that time was the diffusion of the Libri poenitentiales (see PENITENTIALS) and the extension of private penance. Originating in Ireland or the British Isles, the Libri poenitentiales were spread through France, Germany, Switzerland, and Northern Italy by Irish missionaries. These books are not manuals of moral theology, but rather detailed lists of sins with their penances. Complaints arose very quickly against the mechanical character of the penitential books, and after the Carolingian renaissance, they were even condemned several times by councils, and their use from that time was considerably reduced.

The 12th and 13th Centuries and St. Thomas. During the 12th and 13th centuries development took place that led up to the moral theology of St. Thomas Aguinas. The causes of this are to be sought in the general reawakening of culture. The ancient philosophers, and among them, the moralists, began to be read again. In his Moralium dogma philosophorum, William of Conches (d. 1146) adapted Cicero's De Officiis. Aelred (d. 1166) was inspired by the De amicitia. John of Salisbury (d. 1180) wrote an anthology on the texts of Seneca. Soon the Nicomachean Ethics made its appearance and was frequently commented upon. Certainly all these authors did not intend to write a moral theology (the first use of the term theologia moralis is found in Alan of Lille, c. 1160). The proper subject matter of philosophy was human behavior, whereas theology treated of God. The matter, however, was being prepared for future synthe-

Following Gratian and the Decretum (1140), canonists gave attention to moral questions: laws and contracts, offences and sins, marriage, etc. After the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) canonists also took an active part in drawing up a theology of penance and in the editing of summas for the use of confessors, the Summa de Poenitentia of St. Raymond of Peñafort (d. 1275) being the bestknown effort of this kind. Abelard (d. 1142) attempted a synthesis of Christian ethics. Writers of mystical bent, the Victorines Hugh (d. 1141) and Richard (d. 1173) of St. Victor, and St. Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), conceived a synthesis of Christian wisdom, taking their inspiration from the Bible and the Church Fathers. Peter Lombard (d. 1160) in his Liber Sententiarum, which for more than four centuries was the textbook for theological students, synthesized the results of these renewals in moral as well as in dogmatic theology. In his theology, moral had no special place, but unfolded itself in dogmatic questions, and there was a lively awareness of the indissoluble unity of theological knowledge, dogmatic and moral, as well as spiritual.

In the 13th century it was especially the masters of the faculty of arts of the University of Paris who treated the scientific status of ethics and elaborated a moral philosophy already solidly framed, the best part of which St. Thomas was to integrate into his theological synthesis.

The Franciscan School from Alexander of Hales (d. 1245) to John Duns Scotus (d. 1308), including St. Bonaventure (d. 1274) and his numerous disciples, gave us, in theological summas, in commentaries on the Sentences of Lombard, and in particular treatises, a theological and moral synthesis centered in Christ and charity, but open to the contributions of Greek thought and the progress of the experimental sciences. As this Franciscan school taught, moral theology ought not to serve simply for contemplation, but ought to make us better. It is wisdom stimulating faith within us. All moral thought is love drawn from the very source of love, God in Jesus. The Franciscan theologians affirmed the primacy of charity, and also the primacy of the will.

St. Albert the Great (d. 1280) wrote of moral theory in philosophical terms and commented upon the Nicomachean Ethics, but he had also a moral theology that is ordained toward the life of Christian virtue and was practical and even hortatory in character. It was left to St. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) to unite in one grand synthesis the contributions of philosophical ethics and those of theological tradition. Rooted in his commentary of the Sentences, the moral work of St. Thomas culminated in the Summa Theologiae. The moral theology of the Angelic Doctor is a moral theology of man, the image of God, created by God (Pars I); he returns to God (Pars II); through Christ (Pars III). The Secunda Pars includes both a general moral theology, with the great treatises on the final end, the passions, habits, virtue, sin, law, and grace; and a special moral theology in which are included comprehensive studies of the theological and cardinal virtues and the states of life. To take the Secunda Pars from the Summa would be to betray St. Thomas's concept of theology. According to him, all theology, dogmatic and moral alike, are one. In a synthesis, unique in the history of moral theology, St. Thomas adopted the best in Greek tradition, especially Aristotle, and gave to moral a choice place in his system of theology as a whole, a place that had never been given it by anyone.

Origins of Modern Moral Theology: 14th to 16th Centuries. The equilibrium reigning in Thomistic moral theology between nature and grace was broken by nominalistic dialectics. From the beginning of the 14th century, the English Franciscan William of Ockham implacably criticized the Thomistic system. According to Ockham, the good is not defined by ontological reality, but solely by the arbitrary will of God: the good is what God orders and because He orders it; evil is what He forbids and because He forbids it. God is not bound by His decrees, and He could change them at any moment. The law, revealed or natural, is simply the expression of the divine will. All morality consists in the absolutely free obedience of man to the law. What causes merit, indeed, and consequently the morality of an act of obedience to the law, is the absolute liberty of indetermination with which man performs it. The influence of nominalism was great, especially in methodology, which in moral science opened the doors to casuistry. The center of nominalism was the University of Paris; among those associated with it there were Jean Buridan (d. 1359), Pierre d'Ailly (d. 1420), and Jean Gerson (d. 1429). Prague, Vienna, and the new German universities were also affected by nominalism. At the end of the 15th century Gabriel Biel (d. 1495) gave Ockhamism its scholarly form that influenced Martin Luther.

Thomistic Renewal in the 16th Century. The Thomistic renewal, the first signs of which appeared in the Rhenish universities during the 15th century, emerged at the beginning of the 16th century simultaneously in Germany, with Conrad Köllin, OP (d. 1538), and his commentary on the Prima Secundae of St. Thomas; in Italy, with Cardinal Cajetan (d. 1534), who published the first complete commentary of the Summa Theologiae; and in France, where Pierre Crockaert, OP (d. 1514), replaced the Sentences of Peter Lombard as a textbook with the Summa Theologiae of the Angelic Doctor, a step of considerable importance in the evolution of moral theology. The Thomistic revival spread out especially in Spain, at the University of Salamanca, where Francisco de Vitoria, OP (d. 1546), introduced the new methods of the Parisian masters. The school of Salamanca was before all else a school of moral theology, and the Secunda Pars was the center of preoccupation for the Salamancans, who studied it with a taste for the concrete and modern adaptations inherited from the nominalists. In his Relectiones, Francisco de Vitoria, founder of international law, studied the great political problems of his time in the light of Thomistic principles. In his De locis theologicis Melchior Cano, OP (d. 1560), renewed theological method. Dominic Soto, OP (d. 1560), wrote his famous De justitia, while Bartholomeo Medina, OP (d. 1580), provided the formula for probabilism. With Dominic Báñez the Thomistic revival became more refined, but what it gained in metaphysical depth, it lost in a lessening of contact with earthly realities, and it acquired a certain aridity of style. At the end of the 16th century the great theologians of the Society of Jesus appeared at Salamanca. If Gabriel Vásquez, SJ (d. 1604), and Francisco Suárez (d. 1617) adopted the Summa of St. Thomas as a basis for their teaching, they showed a spirit of independence in its use. They accentuated the part of philosophy and law in moral theology. Showing the same juridical inclination, the Jesuit theologians, L. Molina (d. 1600), L. Lessius (d. 1623), and De Lugo (d. 1660), wrote their notable treatises De justitia, and Tomas Sánchez (d. 1610) his De matrimonio, which has become a classic.

Practical Moral Theology. From the 14th to the 16th century, the summas for the use of confessors were popular. These were arranged according to an alphabetical plan and were in fact dictionaries of casuistry. Among these were the Summa Pisana (1338) of Bartholomew of San Concordia, OP, the Summa angelica (1486) of Angelo di Chivasso, OFM, the Rosella casuum of Giovanni Battista Trovamala, OFM (1484), and the Summa sylvestrina of Sylvestre de Prierias (1514). The Summa theologica, an original endeavor by St. Antoninus of Florence, goes widely beyond the plan of the alphabetical summas and offers us a complete picture of the life of the 15th century. In a line still more strictly practical appears the Confessionalia, simple vade mecums for the priest as confessor.

The Institutiones morales. Between the great commentaries of the Summa of St. Thomas and the more practical works, there appeared, at the end of the 16th century, a new literary genre, the Institutiones morales. The Council of Trent, in fixing the norms for the Sacrament of Penance, called for a deepening of the study of moral theology. The founding of seminaries, which prepared young clerics for their ministry with a cycle of study shorter than that of the universities, and which apportioned a biennium to the study of cases of conscience, led to the writing of manuals designed for that particular purpose. The plan for such a manual is to be found in the Ratio Studiorum of the Society of Jesus (1586). With a view to practical importance of cases of conscience it treated briefly the main headings of the Prima Secundae of St. Thomas-human acts, conscience, sin, law-and then proceeded to the study of particular cases in the following order: the commandments of God and of the Church; and the Sacraments; and censures. In 1600 Juan Azor, SJ, initiated this new organization of the subject by publishing his Institutiones morales. The convenience of the plan assured its success. In the 17th century, it was used by Jesuit authors such as Vincenzo Filliucci (d. 1622), Paul Laymann (d. 1635), Fernando de Castro Palao (d. 1633), Juan de Lugo (d. 1660), and especially Hermann Busenbaum (d.1668) who, in his short Medulla theologian moralis, produced the finest example of this kind of text. The plan of the Institutiones has remained to the 21th century the plan of most manuals of moral theology.

Crisis of Moral Theology in the 17th and 18th Centuries. In the Institutiones morales the treatise on conscience occupied the central place. Should not the penitent be judged according to his conscience and be left to form it? Probabilism claimed to bring a solution to this delicate problem. Originating in Salamanca, receiving its theoretical formulation from the great Jesuit theologians, Vázquez and Suárez, probabilism is immediately included in the Institutiones. But among some casuists too favorable to novelty or indulgence, it issued in laxist opinions that weakened beyond measure the demands of Christian morality. Some, unreasonably indulgent in according title of probability, came to accept the less probable opinion as a rule of conduct, provided that it was not actually improbable. Among those known for too great a laxity of opinion were Antonino DIANA (d. 1663), who in his Resolutiones morales examined more than 20,000 cases; Antonio de Escobar (d. 1669); Tomasso Tamburini (d. 1675); and Juan Caramuel y Lobkowitz (d. 1682), called the "Prince of Laxists."

A violent movement of opposition against laxism arose in the Church, especially in France, following the Abbé de Saint-Cyran (d. 1643). Unfortunately, Jansenism was involved in the controversy. Inspired with the heretical theses on nature and grace, Jansenist moral theology fell into rigorism. In 1643 Antoine Arnauld published his Morale pratique des Jésuites; Nicole, his Essais de morale (1671–78). Blaise Pascal had published his Lettres provinciales in 1656.

Even the orthodox theological schools began to find themselves ranged against each other. In 1656 the reaction of the Dominicans began. Defenders of a moderate PROBABILISM up to that time (D. Báñez, John of St. Thomas), they began to support PROBABILIORISM. Gonet, OP (d. 1681), in his Clypeus thomisticus, and Contenson, OP (d. 1684), in his Theologica mentis et cordis defended probabiliorism. At the end of the century of Louis XIV, severity prevailed in Paris as well as in Louvain and in Toulouse. Certain theologians, such as Louis Habert (d. 1718) in his Theologia dogmatica et moralis and Gaspard Juenin (d. 1713), pushed their severity to Jansenistic rigorism. The Jesuits, while disavowing the extreme theses, maintained the probabilist doctrine whose classic formula H. Busenbaum gave in his Medulla theologian moralis. Within the society, controversies were waged, especially when the Superior General, Thirso González, attempted to impose probabiliorism (1694). The interventions of the magisterium of the Church only touched the extreme positions. Alexander VII (1665–66) and Innocent XI (1679) condemned more than 100 laxist propositions. Alexander VIII (1690) condemned both laxist and rigorist theses. But the Holy See abstained from interfering with the dispute between the probabilists and the probabiliorists.

Outside the schools, the Carmelites of Salamanca published their Cursus theologiae moralis, certainly the most important moral work toward the end of the 17th century.

The 18th Century and St. Alphonsus Liguori. Controversies waxed most vigorously in Italy. Around the years 1740 to 1745, the Dominican theologian D. Concina (d. 1756) and his confrere G. V. Patuzzi (d. 1769), both probabiliorists, attacked a whole series of probabilist Jesuits—Sanvitale, Ghezzi, and Zacharia, among others—as well as St. Alphonsus Liguori (1696-1787). The latter strove the whole of his life to find a solution to the irritating problem of probabilism. In his Theologia moralis (1748), as in the Homo apostolicus and his numerous dissertations, he strove to develop, by a series of original rules, a system equally removed from rigorism and laxism, and to this he gave the name EQUIPROBABILISM. Of two opinions equally probable, one may choose that in favor of liberty or that in favor of the law. But the greatness of St. Alphonsus did not lie in his system. It consisted in his finding in the "swarm of probable opinions, more probable, less probable, certain, more certain, or less certain, some manifestly rigorist, others evidently lax, a collection of moral opinions truly certain, equally removed from extremes, scrupulously weighed in the conscience of a saint" (P. Labourdette, OP).

New Paths and Tradition in the 19th Century.

After the French Revolution in Austria and Germany new paths opened up for moral theology. J. M. Sailer (d.1832) and Johann Hirscher (d. 1865) strove to restore its evangelical purity to moral theology and to reunite dogma and moral, so as not to make a science for the confessor, but a doctrine of life. In their wake came the school of Tübingen, M. Jocham (d. 1893), Fuchs (d. 1854), Deutinger (d. 1864), Werner (d. 1888), and Probst (d. 1850), claiming that the foundation of moral theology is nothing else but grace considered as a call to perfect life.

The Institutiones morales continued their course. The controversy over probabilism was renewed (1840–50) around Rosmini, Antonio Ballerini coming to the defense of probabilism. The quarrel returned around 1870. The opinions of St. Alphonsus, if not his system, became the common doctrine of moralists about the time of Vatican Council I.

MORAL THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF (20TH-CENTURY DEVELOPMENTS)

Biblical Study. The mid-20th-century movements in the Church led to a change in approach and method in the teaching of moral theology, reflected also in subsequent writings. The remarkable increase in interest and work in Biblical studies, made possible and encouraged by Pius XII's encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu and important archeological discoveries, brought about a desire among theologians to use a more Biblical approach and to rely on scientific Biblical exegesis for interpretation of the message of salvation. Such a renewal was undoubtedly needed in all branches of theology, but especially in moral theology, where too much weight had been attached to philosophical and ethical reasoning and too little to the study of the teaching of the inspired word of God. The Biblical and kerygmatic movements helped much toward a more theological approach to moral theology even apart from the greater and more exact use of scriptural texts. This new approach has appeared especially in preaching and actual classroom teaching, and only more slowly in the textbook manuals, especially those that are merely new editions of older works.

More Positive Orientation. Also, an effect of the kerygmatic movement has been an effort to get away from the predominantly negative type of presentation that had prevailed in many older manuals. Whole books were written in an attempt to integrate this more positive, more theological, and more Biblical approach to moral theology; but by the mid-1960s not much success had been achieved in fully integrated works that would also stand as thorough scientific treatises of the whole of moral theology. It was left more to the living teachers and preachers to exhort their hearers to a fuller response of love to the call of Christ and at the same time to make clear what Christ Himself demanded in fulfillment of the Decalogue as a means of showing true love of God.

Some felt that such a positive approach requires a rearrangement of the order as well as the manner of treating moral theology. They insisted on dividing the matter of special moral theology according to the virtues rather than according to the precepts of the Decalogue, or according to the various relationships of man, i.e., to God, to himself, to his fellowman, and to his fellowman as individual and to society. However, it seemed that the positive approach, even by virtues, could still be achieved with the arrangement, for pedagogical and mnemonic purposes, of the precepts of the Decalogue. No one arrangement is essential to a positive approach.

Others felt that moral theology should include, in addition to what had theretofore been gathered under that name, a treatment of the ideal response to the call of Christ, and so have intermingled ascetic and moral theology. Certainly every individual Christian should respond on the ascetical plane, wanting to love Christ more and do the better thing always; but there is still room for exact treatment of the limits of obligations and rights.

Influence of Existentialism. Of tremendous influence for both good and bad was the philosophy of EXISTENTIALISM, with its moral counterpart known by various names such as situational, personalistic, or I-Thou dialogic ethics. It had a good influence in calling more attention to the personal and subjective factors entering into every real moral decision, and thus assisting in the assessment of the actual moral responsibility in individual real-life situations. It also helped moralists, and priests and counselors in general, to be more aware of the many complications of real-life problems and to see that a mere restatement of a universal negative precept of the divine law is never a full answer to such problems; help must be given to find alternative solutions that will be morally acceptable.

Existentialism also had a bad influence in a number of ways that called forth warnings and condemnations by Pius XII and the Holy Office in the 1950s. The atheism of the extremists in the movement seems to have led some Christian and even some Catholic writers to leave all consideration of God out of morality and to make morality merely a matter of deciding what best integrates an individual's own personality. Even when God is taken into account, the extremists tend to make morality merely a personal dialogue with God in which the individual tries to feel what God would have him do in a given situation, omitting all consideration of revelation and the teaching authority of the Church. Milder forms of bad influence appeared in writers who tend to neglect basic principles and rely more on sentiment and emotion in making moral decisions. Fortunately, these bad influences appeared more in popular writers or non-Catholics than in Catholic moral theologians, although the pope's warnings included some Catholic moralists.

Summary. To sum up trends in the 1960s: there was a definite effort on the part of most moral theologians to be more theological and Biblical, less philosophical and abstract; to be more positive in approach and emphasis, less negative; to treat morality more as a personal response to the divine call, less as a mere demand of human nature. The ideal seemed to lie in a delicate balance of the various elements, without letting the new emphases entirely eliminate the less important but still necessary elements.

MORAL THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF (CONTEMPORARY TRENDS)

In the years since Vatican II the problems and challenges facing moral theology have grown ever more extensive and complex. There have emerged not only novel questions regarding both old and new ethical subjects but also fundamental questions about even the methodology and the very identity of the discipline as well as about the ecclesiastical and academic roles of its professors. The questions, moreover, are not merely so many individual queries that can be addressed in turn; in many instances they are intricately interlocked and inseparable.

Reform of Moral Theology. The radical nature of the developmental process which has characterized postconciliar moral theology and continues to do so is comparable to that of the reform of Catholic Biblical studies toward the middle of the century. Nevertheless, there is a great difference between the two transformations. Understanding the challenge facing them in terms of contemporary scholarship, the reformers of Biblical studies conceived their task, with easy clarity, as one of bringing the various forms of critical method to bear on Biblical materials in the light of current knowledge of history, science, and language. Moral theologians, however, are not favored with a similarly clear vision of what the reform of their discipline in fact entails; for while reform in moral theology would be inadequate without an updating in light of contemporary knowledge in related fields, it must include also significantly more than this.

The reform of moral theology began with a recognition of major shortcomings of the discipline in its preconciliar state. Having developed as a science for ministers of the Sacrament of Penance, it was focused largely on sin and was thus susceptible to tendencies toward minimalism and legalism, issuing from a truncated and distorted perspective of the Christian life. Insight into the unsatisfactory state of the science, however, constituted only an initial step in the direction of discovering its remedy. It is toward this goal that moral theology continues to strive, attempting to transform itself into a science—or, as some would argue, an art-science—of the Christian life in its fullness.

In an often cited passage of Optatam totius, Vatican II called for a reform of moral theology that is, in itself, a return to sources rather than an updating. Having noted that special care should be given to "the perfecting of moral theology," the Council went on to specify that "its scientific presentation should draw more fully on the teaching of holy Scripture and should throw light on the exalted vocation of the faithful in Christ and their obligation to bring forth fruit in charity for the life of the world" (n. 17). Thus from the Council itself emerged challenges regarding structure, content and methodology of moral theology.

Structure, Content, and Method. The reform with which the conciliar document is concerned looks directly and exclusively to the religious dimension of moral theology, i.e., its relation to the revelation transmitted in Scripture, and envisions a restructuring of this science according to a more intense bond with the Bible. It is again, however, one thing to recognize the need for such a bond and quite another to determine its precise nature and what that entails. The latter is a task left to theologians, and since the Council much study has been and is still being given to the relation of morality to Christian faith.

The mode, however, in which the question of this relation was raised and for the most part has been discussed within postconciliar Catholic moral theology was determined by influences not directly related to the Council. In the atmosphere of controversy following the publication of HUMANAE VITAE (1968) there was some discussion of whether it was the intention of the encyclical to present a specifically Catholic and/or Christian response to the moral issue of artificial birth control. The particular question was expanded into the general inquiry of whether there can be a specifically Christian morality. Because of the longstanding natural law methodology of Catholic moral theology, the latter question was understood as asking whether Christian faith alters or adds to the natural law norms, knowable by human reason, that govern human acts—a question which, again as a natural law ethic, moral theology had long been inclined to answer negatively. This general question, which was eventually to appear in several forms, e.g., autonomous ethics or Glaubensethik, prescriptive norms versus parenetic discourse (see PARENESIS), then became the point of departure for virtually all discussion of the relation between Scripture and morality.

As a point of departure, the question of this relation now formulated as a question of whether there can be a specifically Christian ethic focused the ensuing discussion upon limitations and restrictions of Scripture vis-àvis natural law, and courted a negative response. Thus in postconciliar moral theology the question of the relation between Scripture and morality has been framed in a restrictive, negatively oriented way.

While the question in this limiting mode attempted to refine particular moral issues such as that of artificial birth control, it did not facilitate the creation of the new structure and method of moral theology which would realize the ideal of the Council. It has led, on the contrary, in the marginal case, to the position that moral theology is, in the final analysis, the same as moral philosophy. Elsewhere it has resulted in making the return to Christian sources into the use of key Christian doctrines as proof-doctrines, analogous to the Biblical proof-texts employed in preconciliar moral theology: the doctrines of creation and Incarnation, for example, undergird perspectives on the goodness of the world and the dignity of the human person, while the doctrine of sin serves to show that a realistic ethic must take shape around the fact of evil in the world.

Thus, despite the prolonged and extensive discussion of whether there is a specifically Christian morality, Catholic moral theology does not yet confidently claim to have discerned and established the bond with Scripture called for by the Council or even to have achieved consensus on whether there is a specifically Christian morality.

Although this formulation of the question of the relation between Scripture and morality is still dominant within Catholic moral theology, recently another has emerged there. Instead of a question of Christian principles and rules in relation to natural law norms there has appeared a question of the Christian story in relation to the community formed by it and to the individuals constituting the community (see NARRATIVE THEOLOGY). Reflecting the renewed interest in and respect for Scripture in the postconciliar Catholic Church, the latter approach, although promising, is still in only a very undeveloped state.

This scriptural approach, nevertheless, increasingly marks the pastoral social teaching of the Church, beginning with Gaudium et spes. Employing this approach, the U.S. bishops extend it to remarkable moral conclusions: pacifism is a Christian moral stance that complements adherence to just war theory (The Challenge of Peace:

God's Promise and Our Response), and the evaluation of the socioeconomic condition of the U.S. from the standpoint of the poor and the powerless is a basic moral obligation.

Personal and Social Morality. Before the Council there was a rather sharp line of demarcation between moral theology and social ethics according to the distinction between so-called personal and social morality. Moral theology dealt with personal morality; the development of social morality, since the time of Leo XIII, was largely, albeit not exclusively, the achievement of the magisterium. In the postconciliar Church, however, moral theologians increasingly view their role as transcending any division between personal and social morality. Some indeed find the very division inadequate, believing that the categories reflect and sustain the individualistic bias of modern liberalism. Nevertheless, at this point in the development of moral theology, creative advances in social morality are still to be found chiefly in official Church documents while much of the work of moral theologians in this area has been commentary on ecclesiastical teaching.

In its brief statement about the reform of moral theology the Council did not address the matter of the secular or universalist aspects of the discipline, nor its points of contact with other forms of ethics. Reform relative to this dimension of moral theology is a matter, not of returning to sources, but of updating the discipline in the light of contemporary knowledge and culture. Nevertheless, there is for moral theology a point at which returning to sources coincides with updating; for the recovery of the Christian story and the development of historical consciousness go hand in hand.

Although it did not explicitly advert to the need for the updating of moral theology in its secular dimensions, the Council nevertheless indirectly provided important guidance for such reform, especially in Gaudium et spes. It is in this document, together with Dignitatis humanae, that the Council decisively moved the Church's official understanding of human relations out of a longstanding classicist mode and into that of historicity.

Viewing the dignity of the human person from the perspective of historical consciousness, the Council advanced the Church's official teaching on human rights by taking into account cultural pluralism. The claims of human dignity, according to the Council, are historically conditioned and cannot be fully defined apart from cultural situations.

This understanding of the historicity of human dignity and rights has been furthered in postconciliar social teachings on papal, synodal, and episcopal levels. It has, at least indirectly, even led the U.S. bishops to employ in their advancement of Catholic social morality methods previously not used in magisterial teaching. The bishops not only created a forum of public discussion both within and outside the Church to assist them in forming their teaching; they also distinguished their moral conclusions from universal moral principles and formal Church teaching, explicitly noting that not all persons of good will must necessarily agree with the former.

The magisterium is often accused of disregarding the new methodology. In dealing with questions of personal morality classicist consciousness still prevails. It is said that there is little in this area of official Catholic teaching to which historical consciousness and this methodology is congenial. On the other hand, when classicist consciousness is alienated from contemporary culture, it is no longer adequate for understanding the dignity of the human person in relation to society, and by the same token not equal to the task of illuminating the moral relations of people in contemporary society.

Traditionally focused on personal rather than social morality, moral theology, by contrast, has been steadily moving its understanding of personal morality toward historical consciousness. The goal is still ahead; the strong heritage of moral theology as a natural law ethics inclines it away from serious and adequate attention to cultural diversity and moral pluralism. Nevertheless, an emergent historical consciousness has already led many moral theologians to view the moral act itself in a less timeless way than what was common in preconciliar moral theology.

The Human Act and Christian Moral Life. Where an earlier moral theology considered some acts to be ex obiecto intrinsically evil or inherently immoral, in much of contemporary moral theology there is an insistence on the historical concreteness of morality as distinguished from the abstractness of the object of an act. Only if an act is considered in light of its object, intention, and circumstances can its moral character be determined; evil entailed in its object, abstractly considered, is premoral or nonmoral.

This bringing of the moral act more directly into the historical dimension of human existence has caused many moral theologians to relativize some norms of personal morality previously held to be absolute; for, if an act in its object alone is not immoral but is, rather, a premoral evil, the moral prohibition of the act, so it was reasoned, cannot be universal. At this point in its argument, therefore, revisionist moral theology had to deal with the question of what conditions render allowable the doing of premoral evil; and from this question emerged the principle of PROPORTIONALITY or proportionate reason: premoral evil may be done for a proportionate reason.

The opponents of this revisionist moral theology, however, argue that there are incommensurable fundamental human goods, none of which a person has the right to sacrifice directly: there can be no proportionate reason to act against such a good. From this quarter, consequently, has come the charge that the proportionality principle introduces into moral theology a utiliarian consequentialism and fails to consider that adherence to an absolute moral norm can be the way of creating and developing personal commitment in life.

Centered on individual human acts, classicist moral theology eventually developed a close affinity with the study of canon law and to some extent became merged with it. This bond with canon law strengthened legalistic tendencies already present in an act-centered moral theology which had increasingly lost sight of the role of virtue in the moral life. The influence of rationalism eclipsed almost totally moral knowledge by connaturality, and the relation of affectivity to morality was largely overlooked. Heightening an individualistic sense of life, modernity divorced morality from tradition and story as well as from authority and confined it to the autonomous rational will of the individual. Thus focused virtually exclusively on doing as distinguished from being, classicist moral theology lacked a meaningful concept of the moral life-not to mention the Christian moral life.

With no normative concept of the moral life in classicist moral theology, the point of departure for the discussion of morality could be only the human act, which was understood according to its object, intention, and circumstances. Accordingly, when the idea of FUNDAMENTAL OPTION emerged in moral theology as it began to move toward historical consciousness after the Council, it met with considerable misunderstanding and resistance in the Church; for this notion presupposes that morality is to be understood from a more holistic perspective than that of the single human act, abstracted from life.

Nevertheless, despite widespread acceptance by contemporary theologians of the notion of fundamental option, the predominant point of departure as well as the most frequently employed framework for the investigation of morality in moral theology remains, as in the discussion of premoral evil and the principle of proportionality, the human act in its object, intention, and circumstances. There are in contemporary moral theology, however, early signs of an emerging normative understanding of the Christian moral life, as the Christian story is increasingly retrieved there and interest is taken by moral theologians in the subjects of virtue, the ages of human life, and its developmental stages.

Cultural Particularity and Universal Dimensions. In a still inchoative way contemporary moral theology, as already noted, encompasses social morality. Influenced by Latin American LIBERATION THEOLOGY and German political theology, themselves products of historical consciousness, moral theology in the U.S. is allowing itself to be molded by American culture and the national situation. In this respect moral theologians are following the lead of the U.S. bishops' pastoral letters on social issues. Although in earlier times it would have appeared to be an oxymoron, through historical consciousness the idea of an American Catholic moral theology is already taking shape in the literature.

While this shift toward particularity is still far from being a matter of theological consensus, it is a necessary step toward taking cultural and moral pluralism seriously, an inevitable result of the dawning of historical consciousness in moral theology. Thus one must expect to see this discipline, without losing its universal dimensions, become increasingly concerned with its own particular cultural and social situations and accordingly to become both more political and more self-critical.

One mode of such self-criticism has its source in feminism. Particularly strong in the U.S., the feminist movement has produced an extensive literature, which often deals with ethical issues, especially so-called feminist issues. Yet, among theologians feminist critiques have generally been focused more broadly on Scripture and Christian dogmas rather than on foundational moral theology. The focus of feminist criticism can be expected to expand as the number of women in the ranks of moral theologians continues to rise and as moral theologians, female and male, increasingly adopt feminist perspectives.

In a global age universal human solidarity must necessarily become, as is happening, a basic theme of Christian life and, therefore, of moral theology. Paradoxically, however, the truly universal dimensions of moral theology become apparent and are distinguishable from false universalities such as sexist conceptions of human nature only when they emerge from the dynamic, continuous mediation of self-critical historical particularities. Thus an incipient concern for global solidarity in contemporary moral theology is inseparable from newly generated concern with historical movements, communities, and societies.

While dialogue with Protestant ethics has become an essential element of method in postconciliar Catholic moral theology, there is still very little, and no systematic, intercultural engagement of ethical thought from other religious traditions. However, a meeting of the ethical traditions of world religions will inevitably become a necessary component of moral theology as the influence of historical consciousness makes headway in the discipline and its perspective is broadened from natural law to the dignity of the human person in different cultures.

With the technological developments of the present age another kind of particularity originates in moral theology. As this discipline moves decisively beyond its longstanding concentration on so-called personal morality, a concentration which both resulted from and contributed to the "privatizing" of ethics and morality, its scope is being broadened to encompass life in its totality in an age of advanced technology. Thus specialization is becoming an apparently permanent feature of moral theology, just as it has come to characterize the culture in which the discipline is rooted. Business ethics requires detailed knowledge of complex institutions constituting complicated economic systems. MEDICAL ETHICS has evolved into bioethics, whose ever increasing complexity and importance are reflected in recent events: in 1971 the beginning of The Joseph and Rose Kennedy Institute for the Study of Human Reproduction and Bioethics, now the Institute of Ethics; in 1978 the publication of the Encyclopedia of Bioethics; and in 1987 the establishing by the Catholic Theological Society of America of a seminar in addition to its seminar on moral theology—"Health Care Theology and Ethics." These and other areas of ethics, some of which—such as ecological and space age ethics—are new, frequently require very specialized knowledge from several different disciplines. Thus, while the field of moral theology is being vastly extended, the individual moral theologian is becoming less and less capable of representing the entire breadth of the discipline, and moral theology is becoming more a communal, collaborative, "team" effort.

The Magisterium and Moral Theologians. Having been a topic of theological discussion in the period following the publication of Humanae vitae, dissent from Church teaching has again become a much discussed subject among theologians, especially moral theologians. Once again there is controversy in the Church over questions of personal morality, but now the controversy is focused on the question of dissent itself. With the question of dissent, however, many other matters are intertwined: the relation of the magisterium to theology in general and to moral theology in particular, the distinction between the magisterium's relation to morals and its relation to faith, the role of the theologian in the Church and the academy, the theological basis for a canonical mandatum to teach theology, the nature of a Catholic university, private versus public dissent, private dissent and the public nature of the role of the theologian, etc.

While some theologians maintain that a certain tension between the teaching of the magisterium and theology is a normal dynamic between conserving the faith and creatively advancing the understanding of it, others see the origin of such tension, which in fact has been mainly between magisterial teaching and moral theology, in the difference between classicist and historical consciousness. Supporting the latter opinion is the fact that the tension surrounds matters of so-called personal morality; and, as noted above, while the approach of the magisterium to these questions remains largely a classicist point of view, many moral theologians are moving toward historical consciousness in their discussion of them.

As unfinished business for both magisterium and theologians there remain, after Lumen gentium of Vatican II, nonjuridical questions about doctrinal statements of the magisterium, especially with regard to morality. Vatican II, following the lead of Vatican I, discussed the authority of the Church regarding matters of faith and morals without distinguishing between the relation of the magisterium to faith and its relation to morals, relations—or more precisely, sets of relations—which must be understood in analogous, rather than univocal, concepts. It is, however, only through the clarification of these complex sets of analogous relations that the respective ecclesiastical offices of the magisterium and the moral theologian, with regard to morality and ethics, can be delimited and adequately understood. Toward this end the U.S. bishops in their 1983 and 1986 pastoral letters have made a significant contribution, in practice if not in theory, by distinguishing in their own moral teaching a level of inviting assent from levels requiring it.

The task of defining the respective places in the Church of magisterial moral teaching and moral theology has become one of the most urgent problems facing moral theologians. It is a problem characteristic of moral theology in a Church at the crossroads between a classicist and an historicist culture.

MORAL THEOLOGY, METHODOLOGY OF

Because the method of a science is dependent upon its nature, the method of moral theology cannot be determined without taking exact account of the nature of theology in general and of moral theology in particular.

As Theology. This article defines the term "theology," or science about God, not as the natural theology, or the summit of metaphysical inquiry into the cause of things, but rather as "sacred theology," or the science about God as He has revealed Himself. This is the theology that seeks to achieve an "understanding of faith." Discipline requires a rational organization, in the mode of science, of the truths communicated by God through divine revelation. This basic notion already imposes upon the whole of Christian theology a number of requirements and articulations with no less bearing upon moral theology than upon any other part.

Theology receives its object from faith. This object is proposed to men through the witness of the Church, in Sacred Scripture, which is the fundamental document of revelation. Scripture itself is received and read within the limits and in the light of a tradition contained not only in books, but in what was once the living word of the Apostles and the practice inspired by them, handed on to remoter places and times in the form of truths to which witness had been borne, and in the form of living objects full of significance, such as the Sacraments and the liturgical life.

The first endeavor of theological study, whether in the field of moral or of any other of its branches, is to assemble and scrutinize the data of revelation. To this task positive theology, employing the methods of history and of criticism, is necessary. In addition to increased study of the Fathers, and the whole tradition of the Church, historico-critical studies on the Bible and the early Church help shed light upon the distinctive moral commitments of Christianity.

Every science seeks the explication of its subject to the extent that this is possible. The theologian, then, will not rest content when he knows that a doctrine truly pertains to revelation, that it has been revealed implicitly or explicitly, or that it has been subject to this or that development. He has yet to answer the question: what precisely is the meaning of the revealed truth in so far as it is possible for the human mind to grasp it? His task is to attempt to reach what Vatican Council I described as "an understanding of mysteries, derived as well by way of analogy with truths known naturally, as through the bond linking the mysteries themselves and with the final goal of man" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3016).

Theological wisdom in which St. Thomas Aquinas saw a kind of "imprint on us of God's own knowledge" (Summa theologiae 1a, 1.3 ad 2) is constituted in that way. By its subject and by its distinctive intellectual vision, such a theology is a unique science. In all its parts it is ever "science about God," considering all else only as either proceeding from God, returning to Him, or expressing His image. For this reason, it is important that every part of theology, moral especially, be considered, not as isolated, but with reference to man's final destiny to be with God as this is seen linked with the revealed mysteries. This does not mean that moral theology lacks a specialized concentration and a method proper to itself. It does mean that it must remain in profound continuity with the totality of theology of which it is a practical function, to be exercised in the regulation of human conduct. This in turn means that any element of human life that touches upon human destiny (e.g., physical health, participation in the political and economic realms, conduct of war, matters pertaining to sexuality and human reproduction) is something about which the moral theologian, being true to his discipline, has something legitimate to say.

As Moral. A moral science is one concerned with human conduct. Many modern authors understand that any such science must be one of pure observation and description, concerned only with replying to the question "how do men live?" However, as applied to morality this is an woefully inadequate idea, falling short of what reason, even scientific reason, demands. A complete consideration of human conduct, precisely as such, cannot rest content with observation; it must deal also with the object of man's action, the operabile, that which is actualized and brought to realization. Intelligence grasps that object only when it is able to account for its being a goal of action. Thus a science of human conduct must be normative and in that sense practical. Obviously it draws on empirical inquiries embraced in the other sciences concerned with man—anthropology, sociology, ethnology, history, etc. However, a science that divorces the norms of morality from its consideration of the actual use man makes of his freedom cannot be, in a complete sense, "science of morals," for moral theology believes that there is a real, particular goal of human life that is attained through the performance, the doing, of discrete human acts.

Moral theology on its own level respects this requirement, for while not becoming a "science concerned with man," (as sociology and anthropology are) it is rather, as theology, a "science concerned with God," being concerned with God as the exemplar, end, and source of human activity. Yet this does not free it from the obligation to seek a proper, complete knowledge of the human activity that has God as its exemplar, end, and source, for while God is the aim or ultimate target (telos) of the action with which moral theology is concerned, that action is human action, straining to reach towards God. Hence the moral theologian must understand how and why human action takes place (perhaps thereby inviting consultation with other disciplines, such as philosophical ethics, law [both civil and canonical], and psychology).

The fact that moral theology is not a science specifically distinct from the rest of theology does not mean that it must remain at the level of generality; it must, on the contrary, extend to all the particularities of its object (individual human action) insofar as this is compatible with its universality as a science. There is, however, something moral theology will never attain, and should refrain from trying to attain: to become a substitute for PRU-DENCE. For regulation of a human act, in the concrete, prudence is irreplaceable. Particular application cannot be a science. Even moral science might attempt to solve certain general cases of conscience that are more or less typical; moral science will never resolve a particular case in the concrete situation with all the circumstances delineating it and making it absolutely particular. Moral theology aims only at bringing principles of moral conduct to light; it is the business of prudence to ascertain, in the here and now, which moral principles are to be employed, and how.

Nevertheless, neither can moral theology escape into a kind of heaven beyond the temporal. A practical science by nature is relevant to the concrete singular action to the extent that this is possible in a scientific consideration. Speaking of moral science, St. Thomas says that it "obtains its completion in particular consideration" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 6, prol.: in particulari consideratione perficitur). Thus moral theology should be especially attentive to the reality of the historical evolution of man. Human nature does not change in its essential principles, but these principles apply to man as a being engaged in time and achieving himself at his allotted period in history. From this consideration arises the realization that the method of moral theology must ensure recognition of norms relevant to the Christian not only of yesterday, or of the Middle Ages, but of his own age. Our increasing understanding, for instance, of how the human body functions, and the role that physiology plays in our physical and emotional inclinations, is of central concern to the moral theologian.

To regulate Christian conduct means to define what is worthy of a Christian living the new life received in Baptism and meant to develop into eternal life with God. With its view adjusted properly to a distinctively Christian existence, moral theology notes among the norms it considers those that follow from the fact of being human (i.e., the precepts of natural law), and the virtues simply of human nature; but its vision embraces norms and virtues as they are adhered to and exercised in a properly Christian existence. Moral theology or Christian ethics may well concern itself with matters with which the philosophical moralist is also concerned (e.g., feeding the hungry); but while the philosopher urges a certain course of action he does so with an eye to this world and this life alone. The moral theologian will urge a course of action because the Christ teaches us that in clothing the naked we are clothing fellow images of God, and are thereby also clothing him and building up the Kingdom of God in this world, which is to find its consummation in the next.

Despite its historical association with the sacrament of penance, moral theology cannot be reduced to the negative consideration of sins to avoid, to the mere cataloguing of what is forbidden and what is permitted. Such considerations can, of course, be useful for confessional practice; but they cannot constitute moral theology, which is not a science of sins, nor a morality of the bare minimum. The Christian life is the scope of moral theology; its aim is primarily the delineation of the positive rather than the negative features of that life. Moreover, there is not one morality for the generality of men and another for the elite; there is but one Christian morality; it defines the proper activity of every man in his progress, following the teachings and examples of Jesus Christ, toward eternal happiness the Triune God our creator, and the community of the blessed in heaven. The fundamental precept of this morality is that of charity, i.e., the love of God. The other precepts, including in the present order of things the Ten Commandments, simply spell out the demands of that charity (i.e., how we love God above all things, our neighbors as ourselves).

Moral theology, however, does not stop at the point where ascetical, mystical, or even what is commonly called "spirituality" theology begin. It covers the whole route of the progress toward God, toward an ever more unequivocal belonging to God. What is commonly called spirituality, ascetical or mystical theology, is simply either a part of moral theology, or a special type of consideration of subjects within its scope [cf. M. M. Labourdette, "Connaissance pratique et savoir moral," Revue thomiste 48 (1948) 142–179]. This fact aids appreciation of how a moral theology of the "speculative-practical" type found in St. Thomas could be extended to include another plane and other categories, exploring a phenomenology of Christian existence.

MORALES, CRISTÓBAL DE

The most important Spanish sacred composer after VICTORIA; b. Seville, c. 1500; d. Málaga?, between Sept. 4 and Oct. 7, 1553. The cathedral musicians at Seville during his youth included the brightest lights in the Peninsula—Francisco de la Torre, Alonso de Alva, Juan de Valera, Francisco de Peñalosa, Pedro de Escobar, and Pedro Fernández de Castilleja. Peñalosa, Escobar, and Juan de Anchieta (1462-1523) were the first sacred composers in Spain, and their influence on Morales admirably prepared him for a brilliant career as director of music in Ávila Cathedral (appointed 1526), Plasencia Cathedral (1528), and elsewhere. During 1531 he left Plasencia and on Sept. 1, 1535, began a decade as a singer in the papal choir. Although frequently ill in Rome, he published nearly all his major works before 1545, including 16 of his 21 Masses (2 v. Rome 1544). The second volume, dedicated to Paul III, opens with the Mass Tu es vas electionis in the pope's honor. Before Morales's death his Magnificats and motets were being published in Antwerp, Louvain, Nuremberg, and Wittenberg, and purchased by cathedrals as distant as Cuzco, Peru.

Upon returning home he was chapelmaster at the primatial cathedral of Toledo (Sept. 1, 1545–Aug. 9, 1547), then at Marchena, near Seville, and last at Málaga (Nov. 27, 1551). He was internationally acclaimed while he lived, and for a century after his death his works served as classic models everywhere throughout the Spanish dominions, including the New World. PALESTRINA based his O sacrum convivium Mass on Morales's motet of the same name and added optional voice parts to six verses from his Magnificats. Victoria founded his Gaudeamus Mass (1576) on Morales's 1538 peace cantata commissioned by Paul III; Francisco Guerrero and Juan Navarro were his personal pupils.

[R. STEVENSON]

MORALES, FRANCISCO DE

Franciscan missionary in Ecuador, Bolivia, and Peru from 1547 to 1567. His birth and death dates are unknown. He was born in Soria, Spain, and went to Peru during the administration of La Gasca, who recommended him to his successor as one of the few ecclesiastics from whom he could take counsel. After founding the convent of La Paz, Bolivia, Morales was sent to Quito, where he spent six years organizing the missionary work. He founded the Colegio de San Andrés for Indians, poor mestizos, and Spanish orphans, who were taught reading and writing, music, and some crafts. As provincial of Peru (1559–62) he vigorously opposed the perpetuation of the encomiendas, opposing in this the commissary general of his order, Luis de Zapata. He did not hesitate to criticize the government of the Viceroy Conde de Nieva, whom he considered reactionary in his treatment of the indigenous people. These differences of opinion were probably the chief reason for his return to Spain on Jan. 2, 1568, the date on which he sent to the Visitor from the Council of the Indies, Juan de Ovando, an important memorial setting forth his opinions on the encomienda system. In Spain he was guardian of the convent at Valladolid, the headquarters of the province of Concepción. In 1575 he took over the government of the province first as vicar and then as minister provincial. At the end of his term (1579) he was appointed visitor to the province of Castille. The last knowledge of him is a report, dated 1580, on Peruvian matters.

companied 16 Dominicans to Manila; however, he was later ordained in Mexico. In 1622 he was appointed curate of the Chinese in Manila; he was later sent to Cambodia (1628–29) and Fukien (1633), where he continued the work of Angelo Cocchi, OP, so effectively that he is called the second founder of the Chinese mission. He opposed the Jesuits in the controversy over the Chinese rites and brought the matter to Rome (1645), but the final decision upholding Morales and the Dominican condemnation of Jesuit practices was not given until 1742. He was a devout missionary, zealous for souls, who, according to Vittorio RICCI, was mourned by his flock despite his rigorous and unyielding temperament. Morales was the author of Historia evangelica del reyno de la China, of a life of St. Dominic in Chinese, and of a grammar and vocabulary of the Chinese language.

MORALES, MANUEL, ST.

Martyr, married layman; b. Feb. 8, 1898, Mesillas near Sombrerete, Zacatecas, Diocese of Durango, Mexico; d. Aug. 15, 1926, Puerto de Santa Teresa near Zacatecas. After Manuel's birth, his family moved to Chalchihuites, where he later met St. Luis BATIZ. He attend the Durango seminary but left to support his poor family, married, and sired three children. Known for his piety, he was secretary to the Circle of Catholic Workers and a member of the Mexican Youth for Catholic Action. As president of the National League, he announced at its first meeting that its mission was to peacefully petition the government to repeal laws suppressing religious liberty. After Batiz's arrest, he organized the locals to secure the priest's freedom. Instead he was himself arrested, tortured, then shot near Zacatecas. Morales was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

MORALITY

The quality attributable to human action by reason of its conformity or lack of conformity to standards or rules according to which it should be regulated. This supposes on the one hand that human actions are voluntary and responsible, and on the other, that there are standards and rules by which human conduct should be measured, a position not admitted by all contemporary philosophers. Existentialists, for example, dislike all universal norms and principles. The atheists among them have disposed of traditional morality by saying that anything a man chooses to do freely is morally permissible. Other contemporary philosophers, for different reasons, have a flexible, or even absent, attitude with regard to norms. Catholic writers agree that there are proper and binding norms of conduct, and therefore that morality in the strict sense is found in man's rational choices and is indeed the paramount aspect of human acts. They distinguish the physical from the moral aspect of an act, saying that the former refers to its physiological existence and that the latter is the relation of the act, and of the whole man, to the value of man. Since this is his supreme GOOD, the morality of a human act is the relation of the act to the supreme good of its agent.

Ethical Positions and Norms. A presupposed philosophy and/or theology will affect what kind of moral norms, if any, are to be considered. Moral theology or Christian ethics will differ from moral philosophy or philosophical ethics according to the sources of knowing such norms; and each will differ according to the different philosophy or theology upon which each is based (for some of this variety, see MORAL THEOLOGY [CONTEMPORARY TRENDS]).

All Catholic moralists and, in fact, all professedly Christian and theistic moralists should agree fundamentally that man's ultimate end is somehow connected with his Creator. In other words, that moral goodness means conformity in some way with the nature or will of God. Divergences occur in determining more proximate norms for learning what is or is not in conformity with man's ultimate end. For Catholics, a more proximate objective norm has been the nature of man as created by God, with all his relationships: to God, to fellow human beings, and to himself, as known by reason and by revelation interpreted by the living teaching authority of the Church. However, at present not all Catholic writers agree even on these points.

Many modern writers propose man's self-development as a norm, understanding such development to include a greater degree of knowledge, a balanced personality, and a comfortable degree of self-satisfaction and enjoyment. There is a great divergence in judging what these terms mean, in judging which acts or objects really contribute to such development, and even in judging what sort of norm or faculty may be used to discover which acts or objects will promote proper development. Self-development can well be a norm for judging the morality of actions even in accord with traditional Catholic thought, if measured by a full understanding of what is for the best welfare of the self in relation to the ultimate end.

Species of Morality. The distinction of the morality of actions into good, bad, or indifferent in kind, as well as the distinction between intrinsic and extrinsic morality, has been widely neglected, especially with a blurring of the distinction between subjective and objective morality. While all Catholic moralists have always agreed and still agree that the most decisive element in human morality is in the person, some modern moralists refuse to consider a distinction between this morality in the agent and a morality attributed analogously to certain described actions.

Determinants. The position of such moralists has led them to deny that morality can ever be legitimately attributed to any acts objectively considered, unless such acts are described by such a prejudicial term as "murder," which implies unjust killing. Some such writers fail to realize that the older distinction between the object and the circumstances of a moral action did not necessarily mean that the object signified some kind of physical action without any circumstances. Even the term "killing" necessarily includes more content than just a physical act; in ordinary usage it denotes an act by which a living being is deprived of life. Even in times past, all Catholic moralists agreed that there was no absolute moral imperative against all killing, nor even against all killing of a human being; but in times past all did agree that the direct killing of an innocent human being was always immoral—at least apart from a certain command of the Creator who possesses ultimate dominion over all of creation.

The traditional use of the term "circumstances" as a determinant of morality beyond the object, referred to circumstances which could affect the morality of an action, other than those included in the definition of the object or act.

Objective and Subjective Morality. The modern objection that morality is never present apart from the intention of the agent misses the essential idea of the distinction between objective (or material) and subjective (or formal) morality. It is certainly true that morality is essentially in the act of the human will, but that does not mean that there cannot be a proper but derived use of the term with regard to objects and circumstances. When traditional Catholic moralists speak of an object or of an object with certain defined circumstances, as intrinsically or objectively evil in a moral sense, it is understood that this means that it would be morally wrong to intend such an action in such defined circumstances, regardless of further circumstances or intention.

Moral and Physical Evil. In considering the object of a human action, Catholic moralists have always recognized a difference in the meaning of moral evil and physical evil, although at times some have used the terms in a confused way. Evil, in general, was understood to mean the lack of something which should be present. To speak of physical evil was to speak merely of such a lack in the physical make-up of things; a lack of conformity to what some reality should normally be. Thus, a human being with only four fingers on one hand, or with six fingers, was said to be lacking conformity with what should normally be the number of fingers on a human hand, with no reference to morality. It was understood that ordinarily it would also be morally evil for one human being to inflict such a physical evil on another human being, although it was generally admitted that circumstances and intention could alter the matter. Thus, it was commonly agreed that amputation or excision of a part of the human body can be morally good in circumstances in which that part constitutes a threat to the whole human organism. For this reason, the loss of a finger was not considered a moral evil even in a remote sense, but only a physical evil, which it would be illicit to intend unless there were a good reason for doing so. On the other hand, the direct killing of an innocent human being was considered an objectively immoral action, whose only imaginable justification could be a direct command of the Creator who had the absolute dominion over human life.

Some modern moralists, including some Catholic theologians, avoid this sort of terminology. They prefer to use terms like "ontic," "premoral," "non-moral" evil to include, apparently, what traditional Catholic terminology classed as "objective" or "intrinsic" moral evil, but also to include what traditional terminology called "physical" evil. As mentioned above, there was some confusion between the terms "physical evil" and "objective moral evil" in some older manuals, especially in the treatment of the so-called principle of DOUBLE EFFECT at least in their examples. However, this does not prove that the distinction itself is useless.

Values and Disvalues. Instead of speaking of moral good and evil, many modern Catholic moralists prefer to follow what had previously been mainly non-Catholic philosophical terminology and speak rather of values to be achieved or preserved and of disvalues to be avoided. Practically speaking, the use of the terms "values" and "disvalues" in morality differs little if at all from the older terminology among Catholic moralists of good and evil in morality.

Again difficulties and divergences arise in determining the norm or norms for judging what is a value and what is a disvalue, as well as in determining whether there are any disvalues so great that they may never be directly chosen as a means of achieving certain positive values. All admit that many human choices involve both values and disvalues, good and evil.

Often overlooked are values in what might be called a religious or spiritual sense. These can include the value of self-denial and sacrifice (the Cross); the value of patient suffering; the value of helping others even at a seeming loss (disvalue?) to oneself; in general, the value of submission to God; and, finally, the value of achieving the real end of man's existence (union with God), even at the cost of losing the greatest of merely human values. Nevertheless, even some who neglect man's relation to God, still recognize some of these values as helps towards character development.

Moral Absolutes. What was explained above as objective moral evil is the basis of most moral absolutes. When the more traditional moralists state that an action is objectively morally evil, they mean that such an action would be morally wrong as a direct object of a human will in all imaginable circumstances in the ordinary course of affairs. Accordingly, although all killing involves some form of physical evil to a living being, it was and is not considered absolutely morally evil objectively, but needs further determination by at least some added circumstances. On the other hand, the killing of an innocent human being was and is considered a moral evil, even though the traditional principle of double effect would, under certain conditions, allow such a killing to be the unintended but foreseen event of a directly willed action. On the contrary, the direct killing of a cat would not be considered an objective moral evil, even though it is a physical evil for the cat. It could be a moral evil or a moral good for the killer depending on further circumstances as well as on the intent. To deny that there are any objective moral absolutes is tantamount to saying that it is impossible to describe any action in such a way that in no imaginable further circumstances in the ordinary course of affairs could such an action be justified, and any person who felt justified in doing such an action would be laboring under a misapprehension or false conscience.

Some who profess to deny the possibility of moral absolutes actually restrict such a judgment to personal morality and especially sexual morality, while insisting on absolutes in social matters. For example, the same writer may voice an opinion that premarital sex, masturbation, adultery, and homosexual acts can be morally good in some circumstances, but that the use of nuclear armaments or even nuclear power sources are absolutely immoral.

The Notion of Moral Obligation. The connection between moral obligation, and thus of morality, and the relationship of man to his Creator is often overlooked in modern discussions of morality. In an analysis of the meanings of "ought," "must," and similar words, some common-sense ideas are often neglected. An instance of such an idea is that notions of obligation are concerned with a sort of conditioned necessity, and do not always have a tie-in with morality. For example, to say that a bridge player who bids four spades must take ten tricks, has nothing directly to do with morality. It only suggests that if he does not take ten tricks, he has failed in that round of play. So also with the obligation of religious rules in most religious orders and congregations. To say that a religious must keep silence, means that if he/she does not keep proper silence, he/she is not fulfilling the perfection of that form of life, but it does not imply any sin. Most regulations in business enterprises are similar. If one wishes to remain a member of the organization in good standing, one must follow such regulations. To fail to do so does not imply immorality, but may endanger the person's position in the organization. The condition implied in moral obligations might be stated: if you wish to achieve the purpose for which you exist, you must do certain things and you must avoid doing certain other things.

MORALITY, SYSTEMS OF

A system of morality or moral system is a method of forming one's conscience properly regarding the moral aspect of an action that is being contemplated with a view to performing or not performing it.

Purpose of a Moral System. The basic reason for a moral system is due to the fact that a person is frequently in doubt whether a certain course of action is good or evil. In such a case, if he performs the action while in practical doubt, he sins, for by doing what he thinks may be wrong, he shows that he is prepared to do evil. But a moral system will help him—at least at times—to achieve a practical certainty that he is free to perform the action, so that if he does perform, it he will commit no formal sin (see DOUBT, MORAL).

A person could, indeed, be in doubt as to which of two good courses of action is more pleasing to God. But in the treatment of moral systems, the only dilemma considered is the uncertainty as to whether one is commanded under pain of sin to perform an action or may lawfully omit it—law or liberty. This includes the doubt as to whether one is forbidden to do something or may lawfully do it.

Types of Certainty. From the fact that one who performs an action while in practical doubt as to its lawfulness commits a sin, it follows that before one may act in favor of liberty, he must have practical certainty that his action will not be sinful. This principle is corroborated by the words of St. Paul: "All that is not from faith is sin" (Rom 14.23). In this context, theologians understand the word "faith" to mean "certainty that one is doing right." However, this principle must be understood in the light of the fact that there are various types of certainty.

Philosophically, certainty, the assent of the intellect to a proposition as true, without fear of the opposite, is threefold—metaphysical, physical, and moral (see CERTITUDE). In moral problems only the third type is possible, at least ordinarily. But moral certainty has various degrees. First, we distinguish direct and indirect (or reflex) certainty. Direct certainty is that which is derived from an investigation of the moral problem itself, without recourse to reflex principles.

Yet direct certainty can be twofold—direct certainty in the strict sense, and direct certainty in the broad sense. The former excludes all reasonable possibility that the opposite may be true. For example, on a Thursday I can have this type of certainty that I am allowed to eat meat. Again, I can have direct certainty in the strict sense that it would be a grave sin to kill a baby who is playing on the floor before me. There is no possibility for an intelligent person to have a doubt about such propositions.

Direct certainty in the broad sense excludes not the possibility but only the prudent probability that the opposite is true. For example, a young man about to receive the Sacrament of Holy Orders must have direct certainty that he has been validly baptized. But if he procures a baptismal certificate, copied from a church register, testifying that he was baptized, nothing more is required to furnish direct certainty that he did validly receive Baptism. It is possible that the baptizing priest did not pronounce the essential words of the Sacrament or did not pour the water correctly, but there is no reasonable probability of such an occurrence. This direct certainty in the broad sense is all that the Church demands even for Sacraments so important as Baptism and Holy Orders.

Actually, this type of certainty is all that we can have, in many of our daily activities, that we are acting safely. We buy and use pills, confident that they will not harm us, though it is possible that they contain poison. A motorist drives his car through a street intersection with a sense of security when the green light assures him that he is safe; yet, it is possible that another driver will come through the red light. We could not go through life reasonably if we tried to eliminate all possibility of harm. We could not wait for a chemical analysis of a bottle of pills before taking them. Similarly, a priest about to celebrate Mass in a church where he is a visitor would act unreasonably if he called for an analysis of the wine, though it is possible that it is not true grape wine, and in that case the Consecration will be invalid. Evidently God, as well as the Church, does not require us to seek greater assurance than direct certainty in the wide sense that we are acting lawfully even when grave moral problems confront us.

Indirect certainty, on the other hand, does not exclude even the reasonable probability that the opposite is true; nevertheless, it can sometimes furnish a sufficient basis for acting in favor of liberty with the assurance that one is not committing formal sin. This takes place through the aid of REFLEX PRINCIPLES that can sometimes transform a probable opinion in favor of liberty into practical certainty that one is not bound by a law. (As is evident, in the dilemma we picture, between law and liberty, one may always follow the safer side, the opinion in favor of law, without fear of committing sin. But the chief purpose of a moral system is to inform us when we may lawfully follow the opinion in favor of liberty.)

Reflex Principles. A reflex principle is a general norm for the regulation of human conduct, applicable to problems of conscience for the purpose of determining when a person may act for liberty despite the probability of a law to the opposite. Probably he is bound by a law, but probably he is not bound. It is reasonable to presume that God does not always demand that there be direct certainty for liberty before one can consider himself free from a law. If God required this strict norm of conduct, human life would become well-nigh unbearable, since there are so many occasions when a person, even after he has studied a problem of conscience adequately, is unable to determine with certainty whether or not he is bound by some obligation. In other words, in His goodness and mercy God sometimes allows us to act for liberty, even when the arguments for liberty are only probable and there are also probable arguments in favor of law. When we say that an opinion is probable, we mean that the arguments in support of it carry some weight, though they are not fully convincing.

When the dilemma between liberty and law occurs, reflex principles may be applicable. Such principles would be: "A doubtful law does not bind," or "In a doubt the possessor is to be favored." When a reflex principle has been properly applied, the result is indirect or practical certainty.

In using a reflex principle in favor of liberty, we do not impugn the truth that one who acts for liberty with a practical doubt as to the lawlessness of his action commits sin. For, though the arguments for liberty still remain speculatively only probable, the opinion in favor of liberty has become indirectly but practically certain through the proper use of the reflex principles. Objectively the course for liberty may be forbidden; but in such an event there has been a prudent (though erroneous) judgment in favor of liberty, so that the action is only a material, not a formal, sin. (Below we shall see that when there is danger of another evil besides the material sin, the use of reflex principles is per se forbidden.) And we can safely presume that God permits such a material sin as long as there has been an adequate attempt to obtain direct certainty and a sincere and honest use of the reflex principles, so that men may be able to act with "the freedom of the glory of the sons of God" (Rom 8.21).

We have an example of the proper use of reflex principles in the case of a person who has been gravely tempted to sexual desires, and afterward doubts whether or not he gave consent and consequently whether or not he is bound to confess them as grave sins. If the arguments in favor of the opinion that he did not consent are sufficiently probable to render the opposite opinion truly doubtful, he need not confess these desires as serious sins. (The degree of probability required for this is disputed among theologians, as can be seen in the articles on the different systems.) For, in that case, the obligation to confess the desires is truly doubtful, and the reflex principle can be applied: "A doubtful law does not bind." If the person had actually yielded, he has an objective obligation to confess the sins, but his failure to do so in the case described is only a material sin for which God will not hold him responsible in conscience. In such an event, the sin of evil desire can be taken away by an act of perfect contrition or by the reception of the Sacrament of Reconciliation in which these sins are not told but the contrition of the penitent extends in a general way to all his mortal sins, or, in the opinion of many theologians, it is indirectly remitted in the reception of the Eucharist.

Another case of indirect certainty is that of the priest who is accustomed to mark the recitation of the canonical hours with the string in his breviary. One day he doubts whether or not he has recited Vespers, but finds the string at the beginning of Compline. He may prudently apply the reflex principle: "From what commonly occurs a prudent presumption can be drawn," and satisfy his obligation for the day by saying only Compline.

It must be noted that the first obligation of one confronted by a problem of conscience is to use adequate diligence to obtain direct certainty. It is only when he has attempted this, with an amount of effort proportionate to the importance of the matter, that he may seek indirect certainty through the use of reflex principles.

Exceptions to Use of Reflex Principles. The right to follow the course for liberty through the use of reflex principles does not apply to every case of doubtful conscience. For this reason it was stated above that indirect certainty can sometimes furnish a sufficient basis for acting in favor of liberty. Actually, this is per se permissible only when the sole evil that is to be feared is a material sin. For even a material sin is something evil, since it is objectively out of harmony with the order willed by God. Nevertheless, a material sin is immeasurably less evil than a formal sin, so that we can presume that God will sometimes tolerate the commission of a material sin in order to permit reasonable liberty to men, so often beset by doubts of conscience. But sometimes the use of a reflex principle in favor of liberty will entail the danger of another evil that cannot be averted by the use of the principle and that the agent is bound to avoid. For example, if a priest celebrates Mass with a liquid that is very probably (but not certainly) grape wine, on the score that a doubtful law does not bind-in this case the law forbidding the use of any liquid but grape wine for Mass-he does wrong. For if the liquid is not actually wine, the use of the reflex principle will not prevent an invalid Consecration—a grave evil that the priest is bound to avoid. In such a case, therefore, the opinion for law (the safer opinion, as it is called) even though less probable must per se be followed. In the case described, this means that the priest must abstain from celebrating Mass if he cannot get a liquid that is certainly wine. As was said above, such certainty can be direct certainty in the broad sense.

Theologians distinguish under three general headings the cases in which the use of reflex principles is per se forbidden in order to render practically certain a speculatively probable opinion in favor of liberty.

- 1. When there is danger that by following the opinion in favor of liberty one may endanger the validity of a Sacrament. Thus, in addition to the case given above, one may not per se use for Baptism what is only probably true water. A priest may not per se use chrism or the oil of catechumens for the Anointing of the Sick, even though probably these oils would suffice for validity, but must use the oil of the sick. A confessor must per se have moral certainty that the penitent has true contrition before he can absolve him.
- 2. When there is danger that some harm of body or of soul may come to oneself if a probable opinion for liberty is followed. Thus, a person commits a grave sin by playing "Russian roulette," pointing at his head a revolver with a cartridge in one of the six chambers and pulling the trigger. For, although there is only one chance in six that he will be killed, he may not take this chance, because a reflex principle will not help if the chamber with the cartridge happens to be under the hammer. Again, if a person goes into a proximate occasion of sin without a reason, he sins, even though there is some probability that he will not sin. (Theologians are not in agreement as to the degree of probability of sinning there must be in order to constitute the occasion a proximate occasion. However, all admit the principle.)
- 3. When an action will probably inflict some harm on a fellow man, not avoidable by the use of a reflex principle. Thus, if a pharmacist has in stock 20 bottles bearing the label of a patent medicine but knows that one of them through some accident contains poison, he may not sell a bottle to a customer, even though much more probably this bottle does not contain the poison. Reflex principles will not help the customer if he happens to get the bottle with the poison. The pharmacist must destroy the whole lot or return the bottles to the wholesale dealer, explaining the situation. Again, a jury may not return a verdict of guilty against an accused man, even though very probably he committed the crime. They must have direct certainty of his guilt—at least direct certainty in the broad sense.

We say that in the cases we have described one must per se follow the opinion for law, even though the opinion for liberty is much more probable, in order to avoid an evil that may ensue from the use of the opinion for liberty and that one is bound to avoid. But there can be instances in which one may per accidens follow the opinion for liberty, even though the evil will probably occur. Such is the case when the nonuse of the opinion for liberty may entail an even greater evil. For example, if an infant is dying and no liquid that is certainly water is available, one may use doubtful matter, such as weak tea, to confer Baptism conditionally (with the obligation to repeat the Sacrament afterward with certain matter if this is possible). For, although the danger of baptizing invalidly is an evil, the danger that the child may die without Baptism is a greater evil. Through a similar line of reasoning, it follows that a priest could anoint a dying person with chrism if he cannot get oil of the sick in time; a confessor could impart conditional absolution to a person who is doubtfully disposed, if there is reason to fear that he will not otherwise return to confession. Again, if a sick man is desperately in need of medicine and is likely to die without it, the pharmacist could take a chance and dispense to him a bottle from the consignment with one bottle of poison (previously giving a warning). The principle governing these cases is that at times one may choose the lesser of two evils. They are exceptions to the exceptions regarding the use of reflex principles.

History of Moral Systems. The scientific formulation of moral systems is comparatively new in the Church, though even from the early centuries we find indications of the use of a probable opinion as the basis of the formation of a practically certain conscience. Thus, St. Gregory of Nazianzus, in the 4th century, asserted against the severity of the Novatians that a second marriage is not forbidden since the prohibition of such a union is doubtful (In sancta lumina 19; Patrolgia Graeca [Paris 1857–66] 36:358). Apparently, in those early days, individual cases of conscience were solved reasonably with due regard to God's mercy and with proper respect for His law.

In medieval times, the common method of solving a doubtful conscience seems to have been a form of rigorism, to judge by the statements of some prominent writers. Thus, St. Bonaventure says: "If a person's conscience doubts with probability whether something is a mortal sin, he is obliged to abstain from it while the doubt remains" (In 4 Sent., 17.2.1 ad 4, ed. Quaracci, 4.458). And William of Auxerre asserts: "It is a rule that if anyone doubts whether something is a mortal sin and does it, he sins mortally" [Summa aurea, 2, tr. 29, c. 1, q. 3, (ed. Pigouchet, Paris 1500) fol. 92.5]. It can be doubted, however, whether in practice this rigoristic norm was used in its full literal sense to any great extent in the Middle Ages. According to Prümmer (Manuale theologiae moralis, I, n. 345), the prevalent usage in medieval times was rather probabiliorism according to which the opinion for liberty can be followed if it is clearly more probable than the opinion for law.

The fundamental principle of PROBABILISM was first clearly enunciated by Bartholomew Medina, OP, who wrote in 1577: "It seems to me that if there is a probable opinion, it is lawful to follow it, even though the opposite is more probable" (Comment. in 1a, 2ae Summa Theologiae 19.6). Probabilism then became an accepted system, and was followed moderately by many theologians. Unfortunately, others, such as Sanchez, Diana, and Caramuel, made use of it to support excessively lenient views. As a result, 17th-century popes, Alexander VII and Innocent XI, found it necessary to condemn lengthy lists of propositions too favorable to liberty, including the basic principle of laxism, i.e., that even the slightest probability will justify one in acting for liberty (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2021-65; 2101-66). Moreover, in 1656, Alexander VII recommended to the general chapter of the Dominicans that they defend probabiliorism, and the members of this order were the chief exponents of this system for many years. The most outstanding exponent of probabiliorism, it would seem, was Charles Billuart, OP, in the 18th century (De conscientiae diss., 6).

The principal exponents of probabilism, as enunciated by Medina, continued to be the Jesuits. In 1680, Innocent XI commanded a letter to be sent to the superior general of the Jesuits, stating that the members of the society were free to teach and to write against the opinion that in the conflict of a less probable opinion with an opinion clearly more probable, it is lawful to follow the former. However, the pope did not oblige the Jesuits to give up probabilism.

Another development in the 17th century was the effort of the Jansenists to introduce the system of RIGOR-ISM, the extreme opposite of LAXISM. The basic principle of this system, that it is not allowed to follow even the most probable opinion for liberty (but that direct certainty must always be had), was condemned, together with other Jansenist teachings, by Pope Alexander VIII in 1690 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2363). A slight modification of rigorism, known as TUTIORISM, which permits only a most probable opinion for liberty to be followed, though not formally condemned, has found few followers since the Church's rejection of rigorism.

The 18th century witnessed the propagation of the system of EQUIPROBABILISM, especially because of the influence of St. Alphonsus Liguori, who was declared the patron of confessors and moralists by Pope Pius XII. Alphonsus was first a probabiliorist, then a probabilist, and finally in 1762 announced himself as a defender of equiprobabilism. This system steers a middle course between probabiliorism and probabilism. It differs from the former in that it holds that an opinion for liberty that is as probable as the opinion for law may be followed (at least when the doubt concerns the existence of the law). It disagrees with probabilism in that it holds that an opinion for liberty that is definitely less probable than the opinion for law may not be followed. St. Alphonsus was not the author of this system, though he is its best-known proponent. Indeed, a statement of Suárez could be quoted in support of equiprobabilism: "Greater probability is a kind of moral certainty, if the excess of probability is certain" (De legibus, 8.3.19).

In recent times, the system of COMPENSATIONISM has been advocated by some theologians. According to this system, the benefits of liberty in each particular case of doubt must be sufficient to compensate for the danger of violating the law; hence, the degree of probability required to justify the use of liberty varies from case to case.

Thus, in the course of time, seven moral systems have been proposed: rigorism, tutiorism, probabiliorism, compensationism, equiprobabilism, probabilism, and laxism. Today the great majority of moralists defend either equiprobabilism or probabilism; comparatively few adhere to probabiliorism or compensationism.

MORALITY PLAYS

A type of drama that developed in the late Middle Ages and is distinguished from the earlier religious types mainly by its use of dramatized allegory in which abstract virtues and vices are personified. It attained its greatest popularity in England and France.

The major distinction between the cycle plays (see DRAMA, MEDIEVAL) and the morality plays is that between dogmatic and moral theology; the cycle play presents the history of salvation and the morality play the way to salvation. The essential theme of the morality play is the conflict between the forces of good (the good angel, the virtues) and the forces of evil (the bad angel or devil, the vices) for possession of man's soul. The allegorical motifs and devices employed in presenting this theme in the various morality plays that survive all point to their kinship with the literature of preaching, particularly to that group of treatises in Latin and in the European vernaculars that was concerned with the condition of man's life from birth to death, usually titled Speculum and subtitled Liber de Pater Noster, in some instances bearing the latter title alone (see PREACHING [MEDIEVAL ENGLISH]).

Pater Noster Play. From the earliest days the Church regarded the Credo as the rule of faith and the Pater Noster as the rule of life and made both prayers the subject of instruction, meditation, and sermons. Tertullian explained the significance of each of the seven petitions of the Pater Noster, and throughout the centuries various schemata were developed so that by the 12th century HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR, in De Quinque Septenis seu septanariis opusculum, listed the seven vices that the seven petitions guard against by supplicating the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost, which endow the soul with the seven virtues and lead to the beatitudes. In a later work he explicitly opposed the seven deadly sins to the seven petitions of the Pater Noster. When the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (1215-16) decreed that the faithful confess their sins and receive the Eucharist at least once a year, a need arose for manuals of instructions for priests and laity, and the traditional development of the Credo and Pater Noster form their basis. Some, e.g., Chaucer's Parson's Tale, dealt only with the Sacrament of Penance; others followed the pattern of the Liber de Pater Noster.

It is not merely coincidental that the first allusions to the morality plays in England and on the Continent occurred in the 14th century, the York Play of the Pater Noster in 1378 and the Gieux des sept vertuz et des sept pechiez mortelz of Tours in 1390, when the liturgical drama had passed from the Latin to the vernacular and, for the most part, from clerical to civic control. In England the emergence of the morality plays both in time and place coincided with the preaching reform of JOHN OF THORESBY, Archbishop of York (1352–74).

The Creed Play (Articula fidei catholicae) had its impetus in the same preaching reforms and literature. No text has survived, however, and records exist only for York. The play was presented to the Corpus Christi Guild by William Revetor, a chantry priest, to be performed at York every tenth year. That it was of considerable length is attested to by the fact that a transcription made in 1455 filled 20 quires and that the Corpus Christi Guild possessed elaborate properties to be used in the production. It was substituted for the York Cycle in 1435. Five performances are recorded between 1483 and 1535. A petition to present the play was refused by Dr. Hutton, Dean of York, in 1568 and the play has not been heard of since.

It is evident that the Pater Noster plays did not evolve from the cycle or miracle plays, but constitute an analogous or parallel development. The town records of York, Beverley, and Lincoln and the "returns" made to Richard II in 1389 attest to this development. WYCLIF alluded to the York Play of the Pater Noster in 1378; five performances are recorded between 1399 and 1572. After the performance of 1572 the books were given over for correction to Archbishop Grindal of York and disappeared from sight. Two performances are recorded for Beverley in 1441 and 1467, and four for Lincoln between 1398 and 1521. As to the origin, management, and nature of the play the records of York and Beverley yield little information; those of Lincoln, none at all. The "returns" reveal that the Guild of the Oratio Dominici had been organized in York to manage and perform the play, which later passed into the hands of the York Merchants' Guild (1462). In 1588 the York Pater Noster play was substituted for the Corpus Christi plays. The Beverley play was similar in scope to that of York. The number of crafts assigned to the Pater Noster play in Beverley in 1441 was almost equal to and in 1467 exceeded the number assigned to the cycle plays, and the stations assigned to the pageant wagons for the Play of the Pater Noster in 1467 were, with but one exception, the same as those stations that had been assigned to the cycle plays in 1449.

All conjectures as to the content and nature of the Beverley Play of the Pater Noster must be based chiefly on the two entries in the Beverley Town Minute Book of 1441 and 1467. Both entries record the date on which the play was to be given and the assignment of crafts to the pageants. The number of crafts assigned to the play and the length of time allotted for the preparation and performance indicate that it was an undertaking equal to the production of the cycle plays. The management of the plays was the same and suggests the possibility that the Play of the Pater Noster was actually a series of semi-independent but related plays, a cycle of morality plays. As to the subject matter of these plays, there is only the evidence of the titles of the individual pageants, one for each of the seven deadly sins and "Viciose" (possibly the Sinful Man), and the generic title Ludus de Pater Noster. The returns state that the York play had been put together to treat the utility of the Lord's Prayer, and that in it an equal number of vices and sins were reproved and virtues commended, and "therefore, it was of great influence for the salvation of souls."

Virtues vs. Vices. Of the English plays that have survived, the Castle of Perseverance (c. 1425), is possibly the most closely allied to the Pater Noster plays. Staged not on pageant wagons, but like the Cornish cycle on five fixed stages in an open place, it presented the struggle of the forces of good and evil for the possession of Humanum Genus (literally, the human race) and in the concluding Debate of the Four Daughters of God dramatically presents the part played by the Incarnation in mankind's redemption. In the extant plays, three major plots were employed: the Conflict of Vices and Virtues, the Summons of Death, and the Debate of the Four Daughters. The theme of conflict is explicit in all the plays except the Pride of Life and EVERYMAN, which are built on the plot of the Summons of Death, but it is implicit even in these plays. The Debate of the Four Daughters is an auxiliary plot employed in the Castle of Perseverance and is not used independently in any morality play. It is employed in only one other play, Respublica (1553), wherein it is clearly reminiscent of the Castle of Perseverance.

Three of the plays, the Castle of Perseverance, Mundus et Infans (printed 1522), and Henry Medwall's (fl. 1490) Nature, present the lifelong struggle between the Vices and Virtues for the soul of man and are therefore called full-scope morality plays. Each differs from the others in the traditional devices or motifs by means of which the struggle is represented. In the Castle of Perseverance, Humanum Genus is directly presented as the center of strife between his good angel and the virtues and his bad angel and the vices, who, in turn, are under the leadership of the sources of temptation, the World, the Flesh, and the Devil. Implicit in the plot is the device of the ages of man, for Humanum Genus is presented as newly baptized, as leading a life of sin until he is 40, as persevering in good for 20 years, and, at 60, falling into the vice of old age, covetousness. Mundus et Infans portrays the same lifelong struggle by means of the same device. The central figure appears first as Infans (the Chylde), and proceeds through each of the "seven ages," attaining a new name and a corresponding vice at each period of life, until Age and Repentance finally overtake him. The forces of good are economically represented by Conscyence and the Perseveraunce, of evil by the Worlde and Foly, who is the sum of the seven deadly sins. In Nature, the forces of evil are again servants of the World; they are presented, however, in a new motif, the sins under the leadership of Sensuality, the virtues under Reason. The theme of life as a journey appears in the 15th-century French Bien avisé, mal avisé.

Everyman, the Pride of Life, the Castle of Perseverance, Mundus et Infans, and Nature are universal in subject matter and appeal. Each member of the medieval audience identified himself with Everyman, knowing that the weaknesses of Humanum Genus and the follies of the Chylde were his own. Other 15th-century morality plays retained the "otherwordly" intent, but like Mynd, Wyll and Understanding (c. 1460) preached to a special audience (in this case to religious), or, like Mankynd (c. 1473) and Hyckescorner, against the specific vices of particular groups and of a particular time. John RASTELL's Interlude on the Nature of the Four Elements (1519), although it preserves its otherworldly purpose in its contention that true learning leads the soul nearer to God, is concerned primarily with the presentation of scientific information in the vernacular. The struggle between Reason and Sensuality (Studious Desire and Sensual Appetite) differs from the conflict in Nature in that it is a struggle for the mind rather than for the soul of man and is preserved chiefly to afford comic relief in the realistic tavern scenes and in the antics of Sensuality and Ignorance to the long lectures on science delivered by Nature and Experyence.

In the Interlude on the Nature of the Four Elements and its contemporary play Magnyfycence, the plot and machinery of the early religious morality play have been taken over simply as a convenient vehicle, in the former for presenting information, in the latter for the double purpose of teaching a political lesson and satirizing a political regime. Of the two plays, Magnyfycence definitely marks the break from the earlier morality plays. In the Four Elements, Rastell endeavored to bridge the gap between the otherworldliness of the earlier morality plays and the worldliness of his own productions.

Skelton's Magnyfycence (1533), however, is clearly of this world. Magnyfycence is a ruler, who, deceived by false courtiers, the court vices, and ruined through their connivance, is left to the mercy of Adversity and Poverty and so falls into the clutches of Despair. Rescued from self-destruction by Good Hope, he is advised by the loyal courtiers, the virtues of a wise sovereign, and after confessing to Redress and accepting the advice of Perseveraunce he is reinstated to his former power and position. The skeleton plot of the morality play has been retained in a conscious adaptation of its plot and devices to the presentation of a political theme. Magnyfycence and such neutral figures as Liberty and Wealth, as well as the court virtues, are derived from the Ethics of Aristotle. The play is of added interest in that it admits of a general and a specific interpretation, general as a political allegory warning against false counselors and prodigality, specific in its application to the reign of Henry VIII under the ascendancy of Cardinal Wolsey. The Cardinal had earlier (1526) objected to some of the political implications in Lord Governance and Lady Public-Weal.

Political and Social Purposes. Later morality plays openly adapted the theme of conflict to political purposes, as in Respublica (1553) and Wealth and Health (1557); to religious and political controversy, as in John Bale's (1495–1563) King Johan and David Lindsay's Satyre of the Thrie Estaites (1540); and to educational purposes, as in the series of "Wit and Science" school plays (1545 on). Others preserved the strictly doctrinal or religious aim of the earlier plays but confined their teachings to apply to a particular period of life, as in Youth (1553–58), or to a particular vice or group of vices, as in Impatient Poverty (1560). The subject matter of the later morality plays, other than the controversial and school plays, is almost wholly contemporary social satire. Lacking the universal application and timelessness of appeal that characterized the earlier plays, they lost the dignity and nobility of purpose of Everyman and the Castle of Perseverance. The same shift to social satire can be seen in the French plays, La Condemnation de Banquet (c. 1500) and L'Homme juste et l'homme mondain (c. 1500).

As Magnyfycence marks the conscious adoption of the plot of the morality plays as a vehicle of didacticism and propaganda, so Mankynd marks the transition from morality play to comedy through the gradual evolution of the vices from abstractions to realistic types, a transition through many and various intermediate stages from the Gula (Greed) of the early play to the Justice Greedy of comedy. Evidence of the process of transition can be noted in the contemporary plays Mynd, Wyll and Understanding and Hyckescorner, which are related to each other in representing the soul under the guise of its powers. In both plays the central or neutral figure no longer preserves its autonomy but becomes the vice, or type of evil to which it has consented. Thus, in Mynd, Wyll and Understanding the powers of good and evil are represented by Wysdom (who is Christ) and Lucyfer. Mynd, after yielding to temptation, becomes Mayntenance, the contemporary social evil resulting from the vice of pride; understanding becomes Perjury, the evil that results from avarice, and Wyll becomes sensuality. The three powers of the soul succumb to the three concupiscences: the concupiscence of the eyes (sensuality), the concupiscence of the mind (avarice), and the pride of life, which, in turn, are opposed to the three religious vows: chastity, poverty, and obedience.

Both Hyckescorner and Mynd, Wyll and Understanding are related in purpose to Mankynd as all three preach against and satirize the vices and lawlessness of the postwar period in which they were written; in fact, the social satire in the plays overshadows their original moral purpose. Mankynd marks the break from the realistic presentation and satire of contemporary vices as a deterrent from evil to the emphasis on such presentation for comic effect. Played by a traveling company whose members doubled in parts, the play was no longer, if it ever had been, under clerical supervision. The extant text presents a frankly commercial enterprise. The actors are out to please; local allusions and the antics of the devil Tityvillus and the gay young rioters are exploited to the fullest extent. But beneath the horseplay lies a serious theme, a protest against the irreverence and lawlessness of the age. Mercy, the single force for good in the play, is both priest and virtue, or virtue represented under the guise of a priest, who, through his admonitions and his power of forgiving sin, dispenses Christ's mercy on earth. Now-adays, New Guise, and Nought are vicious tendencies of the times presented under the appearance of the young men of the day: the modern young man or scoffer, the fashionable, and the frivolous young man. They hover midway between abstraction and type, for if they had been conceived as types of human beings they would have been subject to conversion. When, with their comrade Mischief, they scoff at Mercy, ridiculing his Latin and his ancient saws, they are directing their insults, not at the virtue, but at the priest. They represent the same lawless types which appear in Hyckescorner as the powers of the soul, the forerunners of the roistering tavernhaunting blades of the later comedies.

The use of allegorical characters and motifs are rare and sparse in the cycle plays, but they are utilized in the five temptation scenes of the Digby Mary Magdalene and in a scene interpolated into the Conversion of Saint Paul (see section 1 of this article). The scenes in both plays are clearly reminiscent of those in the Castle of Perseverance. In medieval literature Mary Magdalen, St. Paul, and St. Peter were the traditional exemplars of great penitents. In that sense, the theme of both plays relates them to that of the morality plays, for they are in reality dramatic exempla.

Plays based on the structure of the morality plays appeared throughout the 16th century (e.g., The Three Lords and the Three Ladies of London, 1592), and their influence is apparent in Elizabethan drama, specifically in such plays as Marlowe's Dr. Faustus and Thomas Dekker's Old Fortunatus. The later morality plays shaded off into the interludes and, together with the earlier religious dramas, prepared for the great dramatic outburst of the 16th and 17th centuries, principally in its development of moral themes, comic situations, comic types, and characters.

MORAN, PATRICK FRANCIS

Cardinal, archbishop of Sydney, Australia; b. Leighlinbridge, Ireland, Sept. 16, 1830; d. Sydney, Aug. 16, 1911. After education at the Irish College, Rome, he was ordained (March 1853) and became vice rector of the Irish College (1856-66). In 1866 he returned to Ireland to become private secretary to his uncle, Cardinal Paul CULLEN, professor of Sacred Scripture at Clonliffe College, and founder of the Irish Ecclesiastical Record. In March of 1872 he was consecrated co-adjutor bishop of Ossory, succeeding to the diocese in August. In March of 1884 he succeeded Roger Bede VAUGHAN in the see of SYDNEY and became cardinal (1885). Cardinal Moran was a powerful and creative prelate in the development of the Church in Australia. As a scholar, statesman, and democrat with wide interests, he was an enlightened leader who influenced both Church and State in a critical and constructive period of the country's history. He presided over three plenary councils (1885, 1895, and 1905). He established two seminaries for native clergy, ordained 500 priests, consecrated 14 bishops, and dedicated 500 churches, including nine cathedrals, in Australia and New Zealand. In his own diocese he erected Catholic churches, schools, and other institutions to the value of 1 ½ million pounds sterling and constantly appealed for justice to Catholics in education, claiming state aid for secular education imparted in Catholic schools. In public life Cardinal Moran gave Australians a vision of emerging nationhood founded on social justice. He actively supported the movement for the federation of the six colonies and the foundation of the Commonwealth of Australia. He applied the encyclical RERUM NOVARUM to local problems and encouraged the new Australian Labor party, then regarded by conservatives as socialist, and supported the strikers in the industrial conflicts of the 1890s. With Cardinal Manning in England and Cardinal Gibbons in the United States, Cardinal Moran was one of the pioneers of Catholic social movements in the Englishspeaking world. His published works include Essays on the Origin, Doctrine, and Discipline of the Early Irish Church (1864) and History of the Catholic Archbishops of Dublin (1864). He edited the Pastoral Letters of Cardinal Cullen and wrote many pamphlets on religious, biographical, and sociological questions. His main Australian publication is a 1,200-page History of the Catholic Church in Australasia (1895).

MORANDUS, ST.

Benedictine prior; b. near Worms, Germany; d. Altkirch, Alsace, France, c. 1115. Born of noble parents in the upper Rhine region, he was trained in the episcopal school at WORMS and ordained there. On his return from a pilgrimage to SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA in Spain, he visited CLUNY and became a monk there. Because of his exemplary life, HUGH OF CLUNY made him prior of a monastery in the Auvergne and then established him in the same office in a new foundation at Altkirch in Alsace. Because of his pastoral zeal he was called the "apostle of the Sundgau." He was buried in the monastery church at Altkirch, and his tomb became the object of pilgrimage. Under Archduke Rudolph IV of Hapbsurg (1339-65) a part of his head was taken as a relic to Vienna for the new Cathedral of St. Stephen. Morandus is represented in art as a monk or pilgrim, and with a bunch of grapes and a pruning knife.

MORANO, MADDALENA CATERINA, BL.

Religious of the Daughters of Mary Help of Christians; b. Nov. 15, 1847, Chieri (near Turin), Piedmont, Italy; d. March 26, 1908, at Catania, Sicily. Although Maddalena was forced from age eight to help support her family following the deaths of her elder sister and father, she also continued her studies. In 1866, she received her teaching diploma and began her career in a rural school in Montaldo while serving as a catechist in her parish. By 1878, she had saved enough money to provide for her mother's needs. No longer bound to supporting her family financially, she entered the Daughters of Mary Help of Christians, founded by (St.) John BOSCO (1872). In 1881, he sent her to Trecastagni (Catania) to oversee an existing institute and instill Salesian methods in its work. From there Maddalena founded new houses and established new services for the poor on the island. She also coordinated catechetical instruction in eighteen parishes and trained catechists. During her twenty-five years in Sicily, Morano served as local and provincial superior. Her remains now rest in the crypt of the institute at Messina. In 1935, the archdiocesan investigation of Maddalena's cause began. She was beatified at Catania by Pope John Paul II, Nov. 5, 1994.

Feast: Nov. 15.

MORAVIAN CHURCH

Also called the Unitas Fratrum, or Renewed Church of the Brethren whose members are called United Brethren or Herrnhuters. The Moravian Church claims direct descent from the Bohemian Brethren who were organized at Kunvald, Bohemia (1457), by the followers of John Hus, the Wyclifite burned at the stake in 1415. The Brethren formally left the Catholic Church, whose form of worship and creedal formulas they felt were a corruption of true Christianity. They accepted Hus's teaching that the Bible is the only norm of faith; that the human race is totally depraved; that Christ, truly God and man, redeemed the human race; and that the Holy Spirit convinces all persons of their sin and inspires faith in him when they become adopted daughters and sons of God. In general the Brethren constituted an association dedicated to strict scriptural teaching and the Apostolic way of life. Living and experiencing faith was for them true Christianity.

History. For two centuries the Brethren flourished in Moravia, Poland, and Bohemia; but after the Reformation, and especially the Thirty Years' War, the majority of them were absorbed into the Catholic, Lutheran, and Reform Churches. The remnant remaining, however, adhered to Hus's doctrine, even continuing the episcopacy. Their last bishop, John A. Comenius, usually considered the link between the ancient Brethren and the modern Moravians, died in 1671, and his few followers were soon scattered. In 1722 Christian David revived the principles of the Brethren and was partially successful in reorganizing them. However, when Ferdinand II suppressed the Brethren in Bohemia and Moravia, they were forced to live their faith secretly and in fear. Thus, in the late 1720s David and his followers left their homeland for Saxony and settled on the estate of Nikolaus Ludwig von ZINZEN-DORF and there set up a communal society called Herrnhut (the Lord's watch). Within a short time Herrnhut grew to several hundred members who were committed to "the fellowship of piety over that of doctrine." They felt they were "a little church within the Church," "a leaven" that would revive the church of the day. Zinzendorf became more and more enthusiastic about the community and hoped to make it a grand society founded on experiential religion and practical piety. Through them he envisioned the promotion of spirituality and brotherhood without regard for doctrine. In time Zinzendorf became their leader and fashioned the community into a distinct sect.

Originally he had no idea of establishing another church, but in order to acquire official recognition from the state, which was Lutheran, Zinzendorf adopted the AUGSBURG CONFESSION as a summary of the community's belief. In 1735 the community assumed the official name Unitas Fratrum; about this time the popular name, Moravians, was applied to the sect because of its origin. Zinzendorf's energy and zeal quickly brought into being the community's missionary character that still prevails. The Moravians believed they lived the life of Christ and had to proclaim it. They did evangelistic work with the hope of developing an evangelical alliance among the churches. They worked throughout the German states, in England, where they had a deep influence on John Wesley, and in America.

As early as 1734 Peter Bohler left Germany and established a community in Savannah, Ga. In 1740 a settlement was made in Philadelphia, Pa.; it was so successful that within a short time it was able to send missionaries to establish other Moravian colonies. Salem, N.C., as well as Bethlehem, Nazareth, and Lititz, Pa., were all founded by the Moravians. By 1776 there were more than 2,500 Moravians in Pennsylvania alone. An aggressive missionary program became part of their church life.

Their simplicity of life, as well as their sacrifices and perseverance, contributed to their comparative success. Unlike the Protestant national sects, the Moravians never exerted great influence in any given region, because they never identified their form of Christianity with a limited national group.

Doctrine, Worship, and Government. The basic tenet of the Moravians is true fidelity to Christ in daily Christian life. They officially adhere to the Apostles' Creed and the first 21 articles of the Augsburg Confession "without in the least binding [their] conscience." They are broadly evangelical and believe that the inspired Scripture is the rule for the practice of faith. Their principal belief is in God's love for man manifested in the redemptive life and death of Jesus and in man's ability in Christ to attain mystical union with the Savior. This is their goal in life and the force in Christianity as they understand it.

The Moravians of the mid-20th century believe that they have a special ecumenical mission and they hope to unite Christians of divergent beliefs by a practical system of living the Christian life. "We recognize as true men of Christ's body, the Church, every one who has experienced the new birth. Hence we regard all children of God as our brethren in Christ. We decidedly disclaim all sectarian animosity arising from diversity of views on points of doctrine, discipline, and Church government. We desire to live in cordial fellowship with members of all evangelical Churches."

Infant baptism by sprinkling is practiced by the Moravians, but they see in it only a public sign that the child will be reared in Christ's love. At least six times a year the commemorative rite of the Lord's Supper is held; this affords the Brethren the opportunity for self-examination, for renewing their mystical union with Christ, and for expressing their mutual bonds of fellowship. The Moravian Church is a liturgical Church, with collections of liturgical rites for all important occasions. The use of the liturgy, however, is never compulsory. The usual Sunday service is centered about a litany, with petitions drawn from Scripture, and the sermon, which emphasizes the love of God for man in His Atoning Son. Special emphasis is put on music in all liturgical worship; the Moravian Easter rites at dawn are perhaps among America's betterknown Church services.

The Moravian Church is governed by provincial synods, not by its bishops, who hold the office of spiritual leadership and administration only. Every ten years a synod is held that decides doctrine, approves liturgical rites, and nominates bishops. In the U.S., there are three provinces of the Moravian Church: Northern, Southern and Alaska.

MORE, GERTRUDE

Benedictine Abbess, descendant of St. Thomas More; b. Essex, England, March 25, 1606; d. Cambrai, Aug. 17, 1633.

After the dissolution of the English monasteries under Henry VIII, wealthy Catholics often sent their children to other countries to be educated. Many joined religious communities. Among them was Helen (Dame Gertrude) More, daughter of Crisacre More, greatgrandson of St. Thomas More.

Gertrude's father helped endow a women's monastery under the English Benedictines of Douai. In 1623, Gertrude and eight companions went to Cambrai where three Benedictine nuns from Brussels assisted in establishing the community. There Gertrude suffered physical illness, interior restlessness, indifference, and even hostility toward the life. She struggled to accept both her desire for God and the conflicts between her own natural inclinations and the demands of monastic life. Some time around her profession, Gertrude began to receive spiritual guidance from Dom Augustine Baker. Through this relationship she was able to come to understanding and acceptance of the monastic ideal as he envisioned it.

Both became known for their enthusiastic articulation and restoration of Benedictine spirituality, but not without controversy and detractors. Baker's critics feared that his way of prayer was too affective and allowed for too much personal authority. Dame Gertrude died of smallpox after four years as abbess, while the debate still raged. After her death, several writings by her were found and circulated to promote the spirituality, notably The Holy Practices of a Divine Lover, or the Saintly Idiot's Devotions (1657) and Confessiones Amantis, A Lover's Confessions (1658).

Baker took advantage of this in writing a biography of her in which he examined her struggles with her vocation, the nature of her personality, and the holiness that she exemplified. Benedictine life did revive and prosper, and eventually the monastic community was able to relocate to Stanbrook Abbey in England.

MORE, HUGH, BL.

Lay martyr; b. ca. 1563, Grantham, Lincolnshire, England; hanged in Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, Aug. 28, 1588 (date sometimes incorrectly given as Aug. 30). Hugh studied at Broadgates Hall, Oxford and Gray's Inn. He was arrested in London for having been reconciled to the Church by Jesuit Fr. Thomas Stephenson and traveling to Rheims to study for the priesthood. He was hanged together with Bl. Fr. Robert MORTON, and with him was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

MORE, SCHOOL OF

The "school" must be distinguished not only from the older friends of Thomas MORE, the group Frederick Seebohm called the Oxford Reformers, which included LINACRE and COLET, but also from the More "circle," which included such contemporaries as R. Pace and W. Lily, fellow humanists who shared More's ideals. Nearly all members of these last two groups, it must be remarked, were involved in education. The School of More is here taken to mean the group of discipuli—children, wards, their tutors, and younger friends—who lived or gathered in More's household from about 1511 to 1534.

In a famous letter of 1519 to Ulrich von HUTTEN, Erasmus described the household as Plato's Academy on a Christian footing. Members of the group were, first, More's children and their husbands or wives: John, married to Anne Cresacre, a ward; Margaret, married to William ROPER; Cecily, married to Giles Heron, a ward; and Elizabeth, married to William Dauncey. Then there were More's stepdaughter, Alice Middleton, and his fosterdaughter, Margaret Gigs, who married the humanist and physician John Clement; perhaps Frances Staverton, More's niece, and some others. The group included also John HEYWOOD (who married a niece of More) and his sons Ellis and Jasper. An important member, John Harris, was More's secretary, and taught the children as well. Harris married Margaret Roper's maid, Dorothy Colly; their son-in-law, John Fowler, a recusant printer in Louvain, joined the group also (see RECUSANTS). The children's tutors must be counted: a Master Drew, William Gonell, a Master Nicholas (later the King's astronomer), Nicholas Kratzer, and Richard Hyrde. Finally, there were part-time and transient members, such as Thomas Lupset and Juan Luis Vives. All members of the school taught and were taught, not only Latin, rhetoric, and logic, but also Greek and more advanced subjects. The amusing references to the More household in Walter Smythe's The Twelve mery jests of the Widow Edith (published by Rastell in 1525) suggest that a great deal of humor, as well as mature scholarship and deep piety, characterized the group.

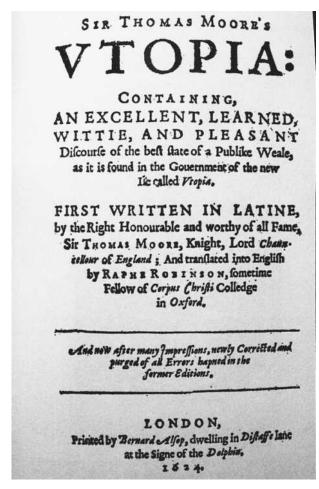

Individuals of the school advanced in Parliament, in the world of learning, and at court; but after 1535 the royal displeasure cast its shadow: Giles Heron was executed in 1540, and William Roper, John More, and John Heywood were imprisoned during the 1540s. As a group they were staunchly loyal to More's memory, and the Heywoods, Rastells, Clements, and Harrises all died in an exile necessitated by that loyalty.

MORE, SIR THOMAS, ST.

Lord chancellor of England and eminent humanist; b. London, Feb. 7, 1477; executed for high treason, London, July 6, 1535. The exact date of his birth has been the subject of much discussion, but the latest summation of the evidence (Marc'Hadour, 34-41) indicates that 1477, not 1478, is most probably correct. More came from a solidly prospering London family, "not famous, but of honest stock," as he says in his epitaph. His father, John More (d. 1530), was a rising member of the legal profession who seems later to have exerted no little pressure on his son to take up a similar career. More was educated at St. Anthony's school in Threadneedle Street, where Nicholas Holt was master, until he was about 12, when his father procured his appointment as a page in the household of Cardinal John MORTON, Archbishop of Canterbury and Henry VII's Lord Chancellor. In addition to being an expert canon lawyer, Morton was an astute and flexible politician who had helped to overthrow Richard III and bring Henry VII to the throne. In both his Richard III and Utopia More paid fine tribute to his old patron, and it is indeed difficult to overestimate the importance of the training he received from him. It was while serving in Morton's household that More, according to William Roper, his son-in-law and first biographer, "would suddenly at Christmastide sometimes step in among the players, and never studying for the matter, make a part of his own there presently among them, which made the lookers-on more sport than all the players beside" (Roper, 5). The anecdote reveals More's natural talent for adopting a role, for entering into a situation and yet remaining curiously detached from it. Even when he was only 12, the world was for him a stage, an insight that must have been appreciated by Morton when he predicted (ibid.) that his young page would prove "a marvelous man."

Student Years. The best dates for More's service with Morton are 1489 or 1490 to 1492. In 1492, through Morton's influence, he matriculated at Canterbury College, Oxford, where he remained until 1494. Little is known about More's Oxford years; although he did remark later on the poor student fare, he was always attached to university life and it was perhaps at Oxford that he first met John COLET, William Grocyn, and Thomas LINACRE, all senior members in the circle of English humanists that More later adorned so brilliantly.

In 1494, probably because of parental pressure, More left Oxford to begin the study of law at New Inn. He transferred to Lincoln's Inn on Feb. 12, 1496, and thereafter rose steadily through the ranks of his profession. Yet as More continued his legal studies in London, other interests constantly engaged his attention. It is here that one finds emerging, for the first time in the historical record, some indication of the intense spirituality that was later so fundamental a feature of his personality. Strongly influenced by Colet's purity of life, he seriously considered the possibility of a career in the Church. For about four years (probably 1500-04) he lived with the Carthusian monks at the London Charterhouse, where he first began the practice, continued throughout his life, of wearing a hair shirt. More's nature, however, as he gradually discovered for himself, was closely connected to the life of the senses; he would seek God through and in the world, not by retiring from it. About November 1504 he married Jane Colt, the oldest daughter of John Colt of Netherhall, Essex. Four children were born to them before Jane's death in the summer of 1511: Margaret (1505), Elizabeth (1506), Cecily (1507), and John (1509).

Erasmus and the London Humanists. It was during these years too that More firmly established himself as a leader among the group of humanists whose activities were then centering in London. ERASMUS visited England first in 1499, and he and More immediately became bosom friends. More's first literary works (see below) date from that period, and it was most probably about 1501 that he delivered his lectures on St. Augustine's City of God at Grocyn's church (St. Lawrence's), London. Subsequent visits by Erasmus (1505–06, 1509–14), who was rapidly acquiring an international reputation, cemented the friendship between him and More, a bond playfully alluded to in the title of *The Praise of Folly (En*comium Moriae), which Erasmus composed at More's house in 1509. More for his part was no doubt instrumental, with Colet, in directing Erasmus toward the great tasks of Biblical and patristic scholarship that were to become his life work.

Yet Erasmus himself often lamented that More— "England's only genius"—had of necessity to devote so much time to his legal work that little room was left for literature. For most of his life More was to feel this tension between the literary studies and the spiritual devotions so dear to his heart, on the one hand, and the endless round of legal business or royal missions, on the other.

Career of Law. By 1510, when he became undersheriff of London on September 3, More's competence as a lawyer was beyond question, and his income increased accordingly. Within six weeks of his first wife's death, he married Alice Middleton, a widow some years older than himself, who proved a good stepmother to his children despite her somewhat shrewish nature. The family continued to live at The Barge in Bucklersbury until 1524, when More built his 'Great House' at Chelsea. Meanwhile, More's oratorical skill at the bar and his reputation for justice and fairness brought him a host of clients. He championed the cause of the citizens on many occasions and often represented the guild companies of the city in both domestic and foreign affairs. By 1515 HENRY VIII, whose coronation in 1509 had been hailed by More in a series of Latin poems, had become fully aware of the young lawyer's talents. More's first royal mission, the famous "Utopian embassy" to the Low Countries, followed (May 7 to Oct. 25, 1515). More had been abroad before in 1508 for a few weeks (Louvain, Paris), but this was his first real introduction to the international circle of humanists that revolved around the ubiquitous Erasmus. In Flanders More met Peter Giles and Jerome Busleyden and formed lasting friendships with them. From August 26 to c. Dec. 20, 1517, he was again abroad on commercial negotiations, and it is about this time that he is first spoken of as in the King's service. It was not until June 21, 1518, however, that he received his first stipend as a royal counselor. On July 23 of that year, he resigned as under-sheriff of London.

The King's Service. There is every indication that More reached his decision to enter Henry's court only after long and perhaps agonizing meditation. The arguments for and against royal service are dramatized in the first book of Utopia (1516), but it is impossible not to consider More's final choice as to some extent a compromise between his idealistic view of the perfect counselor and his practical sense of what could actually be accomplished. He may well have felt that, given Thomas WOL-SEY'S apparently earnest efforts to obtain a universal peace, he would be able as a member of the council to give advice that, if it did not lead to good, might yet avoid what would otherwise be very bad. Nevertheless, his role as a champion of the people, which had just been illustrated by his intervention on their behalf in the May-day riots of 1517, was of necessity diminished. In addition, the precious time that he had snatched from his legal work for literary study was lost.

More's activities during the next 12 years (1518–29) centered on the life of the court. He proved an extremely able member of the council, acting on occasion as a secretary who transmitted reports to or from Wolsey and the King, participating in discussions with foreign ambassadors, attending on Henry at such grand events as the Field of the Cloth of Gold in June 1520, and undertaking still another royal mission in 1521 for commercial negotiations with the Hanse diet. Honors were quickly thrust upon him. On May 2, 1521, he became undertreasurer and was knighted. In 1523 Parliament, in which he had previously served on several occasions, chose him as its speaker. The next year saw him appointed high steward of Oxford University, and in 1525 he accepted the same position for Cambridge, becoming also, in October of that year, chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. During the 1520s too, More participated in the campaign against Lutheran literature, which was beginning to flood England. In 1523 he had written against Martin LUTHER on the King's behalf; and on March 7, 1528, he was to be authorized by Cuthbert TUNSTALL, Bishop of London, to read Protestant books in order to refute them in English. From 1529 until 1534 More gave much of his time to this polemical work against William TYNDALE, Simon Fish, Robert Barnes, and other early English Protestants.

Henry VIII's "Great Matter." By the time More's controversial English writings began to pour from the press, signs of change were beginning to appear in England too. Henry VIII had consulted More as early as 1527 with regard to his proposed divorce from CATHERINE OF ARAGON, and after a long study of the problem More had told the King that he could not support his case. Henry then promised to use other men in dealing with his "great matter," as it now came to be called. More thus remained aloof from the long series of negotiations that began in earnest after Wolsey's great embassy to France, with More in his entourage, in the summer of 1527. When Henry's case finally came to trial in the summer of 1529, with Lorenzo CAMPEGGIO and Wolsey serving as papal judges, More was in France negotiating the Treaty of Cambrai (August) with his friend Tunstal. The London trial ended in a stalemate when Campeggio prorogued the court. Wolsey, unable to gratify the King's wishes, was in disgrace.

Lord Chancellor. More returned to England at the end of August. On Oct. 25, 1529, he replaced Wolsey as lord chancellor. More's 2 and a half-year tenure of the realm's highest office has been the subject of much controversy. When the famous Long Parliament (1529-36) opened on November 3, he made a long speech attacking Wolsey and his policies. Reform was in the air, but the direction that it would take was tied to the course of Henry's plans for divorce. Throughout those years, the King's policies, if schismatic, were not irrevocably heretical. The breach with Rome, when it came, did not immediately involve England in doctrinal changes. While many members of the court showed sympathy for the Protestant doctrines, the King himself did not interfere directly with the campaign More, as lord chancellor, waged against heresy. More has been accused of intolerant cruelty in his handling of heresy cases, but such charges cannot be supported. As he constantly affirmed in his apologetic works, he controlled the civil arm of the law only, not the ecclesiastical courts in which heretics were tried. He did oppose heresy staunchly, believing that it was the cause of civil unrest in a realm still Catholic, but he cannot be accused of bigotry or relentless persecution.

More's record in the courts as lord chancellor is much clearer, for all attest to his fairness; Roper notes the remarkable circumstance that, while he was in office, no case remained to be heard in chancery, so prompt and impartial was the justice he meted out. More than 4,000 cases, all tried during his tenure, on file in the public record office are evidence of his diligence. It remains true, however, that while he was chancellor More's power was often more apparent than real. As the Reformation Parliament pursued its course and it became increasingly obvious that Henry must break with Rome if he was to wed Anne Boleyn, More's counsel was sought less and less. On May 15, 1532, the clergy made their complete submission to the King; the next day More resigned, pleading ill health, which was in fact true, as his reason.

Retirement. For a year at least More was able to live in relatively modest circumstances at Chelsea, continuing his polemical writings and devoting himself to those ascetic practices that he had loved throughout his life. But he was absent from Anne's coronation on June 1, 1533, telling his friends that though 'he might be devoured, he would never be deflowered' (Roper, 59). More knew indeed what was in store for him; the recently discovered fact that his Treatise on the Passion, once thought to have been written after his imprisonment, was begun in early 1534 indicates the foresight with which he was preparing himself. Pressure was soon generated from the court to make him acquiesce in the King's new title as head of the Church. Given More's European reputation and his position as the most prominent layman in the realm, it was impossible for Henry to proceed without his submission. Various attempts were made by Thomas CROMWELL, the King's new minister, to implicate him in treasonable activities; but More resolutely refuted the charge. The affair of Elizabeth BARTON (executed in April 1534), the socalled "Holy-Maid of Kent" who had seen visions prophesying ruin for Henry, was used against More by Cromwell; but More quickly pointed out that he had refused to discuss the King's business with her. On April 12, 1534, More was cited to appear before the commissioners at Lambeth to swear to the Act of Succession and to take the Oath of Supremacy. More was willing to accept the succession but refused the oath. On April 17, with Bp. John FISHER, he was committed to the Tower.

Trial and Execution. His real trial then began in earnest, although the formal legal proceedings against him were not conducted until July 1535. For about a year his family was permitted to visit him, and he was allowed to have writing materials and books. But when Cromwell's and Thomas CRANMER's interrogations began on April 30, 1535, these privileges were gradually withdrawn. Such a separation from his wife and children was one of More's greatest agonies, and it was made all the more poignant by the fact that they did not seem to understand the reasons for his refusal to take the oath—and, before his conviction, More swore that he would reveal his conscience to no one. Thus he consistently denied, during his interrogations, that he had acted maliciously in refusing to answer. Again and again efforts were made to entrap him either into submission or into uttering words that could be construed as treasonable. But More was too expert a lawyer and too resolutely confirmed in his knowledge of himself to be caught by such ruses. Finally, on July 1, 1535, he was convicted of treason on the perjured evidence of Sir Richard Rich, one of Cromwell's minions. When the verdict was delivered, More at last uttered his mind in a great speech, declaring that he had all the councils of Christendom and not just the council of one realm to support him in the decision of his conscience. He was returned to the Tower until July 6, when, about 9 A.M., he went to his death. Henry had commuted his sentence (hanging and evisceration) to decapitation; More died on the scaffold, after joking merrily with his executioner, affirming that he died "the king's good servant, but God's first." Simply put, his death resulted directly from his belief that no lay ruler could have jurisdiction over the Church of Christ.

More's Relics and Acknowledged Saintliness. After his execution More's head replaced that of Fisher (executed on June 22) on London Bridge. It was later preserved by his daughter, Margaret, and now lies in the Roper vault at St. Dunstan's, Canterbury. His body was buried in the chapel of St. Peter ad Vincula in the Tower. Other relics include his seal as under-treasurer, a gold George and the Dragon, two crosses, and two pendants (all at Stonyhurst College). Lady Agnes Eyston-More (East Hendred, Wantage, Berkshire) possesses More's staff and drinking cup. His hair shirt is preserved in the convent of the canonesses regular of St. Augustine's Priory, Newton Abbot, Devonshire. More's Book of Hours, into which he wrote an English prayer while imprisoned in the Tower, is in the hands of a private collector; the autograph manuscript of his Expositio Passionis, his most substantial literary relic, is in the library of the Royal College of Corpus Christi, Valencia, Spain.

More's death was lamented throughout Europe, and so powerful was the memory of his personality that a whole school of biographers wrote his life in the late 16th century. His saintliness was often openly affirmed by this group, but the movement toward canonization was long and arduous, for his cause was linked with that of other English martyrs from the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, and Elizabeth I (see ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF). In 1640 Pope Urban VIII created a commission to study evidence on these martyrs, but it was not until 1855 that the cause was brought forward by Canon John Morris as postulator. Leo XIII beatified More on Dec. 29, 1886. In the early 1930s more than 170,000 signatures were gathered requesting canonization from Pius XI. The movement culminated with a papal decree of Feb. 10, 1935, which dispensed with the proved miracles required in the canonical procedure; canonization took place on May 19. More has become the patron of Catholic lawyers and of university students.

Afterfame. A vital part of the influence of St. Thomas More came through the school of More (see MORE, SCHOOL OF): a significant part of the thought and letters of the early Tudor period bears the impress of More's ideas and character and, after 1535, reflects the widening significance of his life and action and eventual martyrdom. It is in and through such diverse men as John HEY-WOOD, William RASTELL, and Sir Thomas Elyot that the influence of More—a force as yet unmeasured in any fullness—is initially to be detected. Yet the influence of More and his afterfame are scarcely to be separated, and both must be studied together with his literary name. The provisional bibliography by Gibson (see bibliog.) includes a section of Moreana, literary allusions down to 1750 (allusions after that date need to be collected); and this section, expanded and corrected by the time the bibliography appears as the final volume in the Yale edition, will provide the materials for a fuller and more accurate charting.

Utopia. More's most famous work is the Utopia (1516), which has been a model or ultimate source of innumerable utopias and dystopias, from Francis Bacon's New Atlantis (1626) to those of Aldous Huxley and George Orwell in the 20th century. It was written during the closing sessions of the Fifth Lateran Council (1512–17) and published on the eve of Luther's posting his 95 theses. Utopia draws upon More's experience as a young devotee of classical and other studies at Oxford and in London, as a law student in Lincoln's Inn, and, after several years living among the London Carthusians, as a practicing lawyer who lectured in the Inns and achieved preeminence as legal counsel for the city of London, as a skilled arbitrator, and as one experienced in trade and diplomatic missions. But above all Utopia is a humanistic work that manages to subsume interests that in lesser minds might have been compartmentalized; its larger meaning is best appreciated when considered in relation to humanistic grapplings not only with philological concerns but also with the pressing problems of political theory and government. Utopia is written in that form closest to the humanist's mind and heart, the dialogue. For the Utopian dialogue is open-ended: it asks the right questions (and Hythlodaye has an ideal combination of indignation and hope, criticism and enthusiasm) and indicates that although there is no final answer to the problems of pride and greed, of injustice and folly, the use of reason provides a guide to tentative solutions.

Book 1 establishes the failure of contemporary England against the backdrop of debate whether a humanist should serve his prince. Hythlodaye's dramatic monologue in bk. 2 (which, Surtz points out, "contains answers and arguments against the implied queries or objections of his auditors") is the answer to the debate of bk. 1 and to the question of what might be done. Utopia is presented as a real country, and its geography and its political and social organizations are tersely described; its educational and religious practices and beliefs are then presented in greater detail. After touching on such miscellaneous matters as household management, conduct of war, and religion, Hythlodaye vehemently argues that pride is the root of the social ills of Christendom and pleads for Utopia—and the narrator More indicates that although he does not agree with all that Hythlodaye has said, he does wish that many Utopian features might be adopted.

This humanistic dialogue has occasioned literary judgments that range from considering it a jeu d'esprit (failing to understand its context and to appreciate its underlying seriousness) to literal readings by Kautsky and others who, failing to understand its form and tone, saw the work as a proclamation of revolt against medieval feudalism or nascent bourgeois materialism and as a program for socialistic measures, communism, or the like. Chambers's view that the "underlying thought of Utopia is always, With nothing save Reason to guide them, the Utopians do this; and yet we Christian Europeans . . . '' has been widely accepted, but is surely, as Surtz judges it to be, too narrow and moralistic. More was writing at a historical moment whose great urgency is attested by the failure of the Fifth Lateran Council and other events. He appears to have been making one final appeal for the full application of reason to contemporary economic, social, and ecclesiastic problems and making the appeal in the humanistic dialogue and language. He developed his argument like a declamatio: "postulating a society built upon and with reason alone, let us see what they could do," and, given More's own love of jesting and his work with Erasmus on Lucian and the ironic mode, used much wordplay and great irony throughout. The festive quality reinforces the thought, and it enabled the author in good humanistic fashion both to teach and to delight.

Other Works. In order to appraise More's reputation on the Continent as one of the foremost Latinists of his century, his other Latin writings, in particular his epigrams, his other Latin poems, his translations of Lucian, and his Latin epistles must be included with the immortal Latin masterpiece, Utopia. This would establish his rank with BEDE, JOHN OF SALISBURY, and later John Milton as one of the greatest Latinists in the long range of English literary history.

More's other writings also served as models. The biography of Richard III, which has been called the first English historical work to be written after classical modes and models—and thus the first humanistic English history—is now known to be indubitably More's. It is a great achievement, in both its Latin and English versions, and the simultaneous composition of such a literary work is itself rare. This biography shaped Shakespeare's dramatic rendering, and it has controlled the English conception of this monarch down to contemporary times. More is likewise credited as the inventor of the term "atonement," which appears for the first time in Richard III (see ATONEMENT). The controversial writings, largely in English, are only now beginning to be studied fully and in depth (by the editors of the Yale edition), and their influence on later writers of the Reformation is being searched out and evaluated. Such books as John JEWEL's Apology (1562) inevitably look back to More's work, as does much of Richard HOOKER; and the controversy between More and St. German is recapitulated in the controversy between Cosin and Morice in the 1590s: even now it is difficult to appreciate how much of later Tudor controversies was fought on ground chosen or seized by More and Tyndale. A significant part of the afterfame of More has been, appropriately, in the theater, although only two plays about More are at all well known. R. C. Bald has surveyed the story and the scholarly problems of the Elizabethan play Sir Thomas More, but there is no convenient study for the éclat of Robert Bolt's 20th-century play. Yet Bolt's A Man for All Seasons has eclipsed all earlier attempts to put Thomas More on the stage and has had a remarkable success not only in the theater but also as a school text since its London production in 1960.

MOREAU, ANNE FRANÇOISE, ST.

In religion Marie de St. Just; martyr and religious of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary; b. April 9, 1866, La Faye, near Rouen, Loire, France; d. July 9, 1900, Taiyüan, China. Anne was the daughter of a wealthy, charitable farmer, who died while she was still young. Thereafter, she assumed responsibility for taking the farm's produce to market. Perceiving a vocation as a missionary in China, she sought the counsel of Mary of the Passion and, against her mother's wishes, entered the novitiate of the Missionaries of Mary in 1890. During her stay at Vanves, France, she learned many practical skills to sustain the community, including printing and cobbling. For a time she suffered an interior darkness and struggled with her vocation. After finally making her perpetual profession, Sr. Marie de St. Just was sent to the orphanage in Shanxi, China in 1899, where she was martyred the following year. She was beatified with her religious sisters by Pope Pius XII, November 24, 1946, and canonized, October 1, 2000, by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: 4 July.

MOREAU, BASIL ANTHONY

Religious founder; b. Laigné-en-Belin (Mayenne), France, Feb. 11, 1799; d. Le Mans (Sarthe), France, Jan. 20, 1873. Basil Antoine Marie Moreau was the son of a country wine merchant. After attending the local College of Château-Gonthier, he studied at the seminary in Le Mans. After ordination (1821) he returned to this seminary as professor and as assistant superior. He was deputed by his bishop to establish in Le Mans a convent of Our Lady of Charity of the Refuge of Angers. This project involved him in controversy with St. Maria Euphrasia PELLETIER concerning the relationship of this house with the recently-founded Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of the GOOD SHEPHERD. Moreau was assigned in 1835 to reorganize the Brothers of St. Joseph, founded in 1820. In 1837 he founded the HOLY CROSS CONGREGATION by uniting this institute of brothers with the Auxiliary Priests of Le Mans, whom he had organized in 1833 to assist the diocesan clergy. Moreau founded also the MARIANITES OF THE HOLY CROSS (1841). The original purpose of this congregation of sisters was to provide for the domestic services of the Holy Cross Congregation, but the scope of their activities broadened later. The Congregation of Sisters of the Holy Cross and the Sisters of the Holy Cross and Seven Dolors, which developed from the Marianites of the Holy Cross, also regard Moreau as their founder (see HOLY CROSS SISTERS).

Moreau played a leading role in the movement to restore freedom for Catholic education in France by weakening governmental monopoly in this field. The college that he opened in Le Mans, even before the Falloux Law, was one of the first Catholic colleges to receive full teaching rights. Moreau started other colleges throughout France. He also published worthwhile pedagogical works. He extended the work of his religious foundations to Italy, Poland, India, Canada, and the United States. Dissension within these foundations clouded his last years. He was buried in the cemetery at Sainte-Croix, a suburb of Le Mans, until 1938, when his remains were transferred to the church in Sainte-Croix, where the motherhouse of the Holy Cross Congregation was located. The Decretum super scripta in Moreau's beatification process was issued in 1961.

MOREAU, LOUIS-ZÉPHYRIN, BL.

Bishop of St. Hyacinthe, Québec, Canada; b. April 1, 1824, Bécancour, Canada; d. May 24, 1901, St. Hyacinthe, Canada. Born and raised in a Catholic community in Québec, Louis-Zéphyrin was ordained priest in 1846 after completing his seminary studies locally. Following a variety of pastoral assignments, he was appointed secretary to his bishop (1852). On January 16, 1876, he was consecrated the fourth bishop of Saint-Hyacinthe. During his twenty-five years as bishop, Moreau oversaw the building of the new cathedral and promoted charitable, educational, and religious organizations. Additionally, he founded two religious communities: one dedicated to Saint Joseph; the other to Saint Hyacinthe (religious sisters). The latter, with the unique apostolate of administration to relieve the burden from priests and other religious, spread to the United States in 1929. Bp. Moreau was beatified by Pope John Paul II, May 10, 1987.

MORELLO, BRIGIDA DI GESÙ, BL.

Widow, foundress of the Ursuline Sisters of Mary Immaculate; b. June 17, 1610, San Michelle di Pagana di Rapallo (near Genoa), Liguria, Italy; d. Sept. 3, 1679, Piacenza, Emilia-Romagna, Italy. The daughter of the nobles Nicolo Morello and Lavinia Borgese, Brigida had to care for her sibilings when her mother fell gravely ill. Brigida married Matteo Zancari (1633), whom she and her sister Agata aided during his recovery from the 1630 plague. Four years later he died heirless while the couple was besieged in Tabiano Castle during a political upheaval. Thereafter Brigida fell gravely ill and vowed to devote her life to God should she recover. She fulfilled her obligation first by aiding the FRANCISCANS of Salsomaggiore and the JESUITS of Piacenza, then by taking charge of Saint Ursula's House in Piacenza, which had been founded by Margherita de'Medici Farnese. On Feb.17, 1649, the women who assisted her formed the Ursuline Sisters of Mary Immaculate. Brigida cared for the poor and educated children despite continued ill health. On Dec. 18, 1997, a miracle through the intercession of Brigida di Gesù was approved, which led to her beatification by Pope John Paul II, March 15, 1998.

MORENO, JUAN IGNACIO

First cardinal born in America; b. Guatemala, Nov. 24, 1817; d. Madrid, Aug. 24, 1884. His full name was Juan de la Cruz Ignacio Moreno y Maisanove. Moreno left America with his parents in 1834. In Spain he studied law, first at Valencia and then in Madrid. He received a doctorate in law in 1842 and sometime after that chose the clerical life. He was ordained in 1849, and he became bishop of Oviedo in 1857, archbishop of Valladolid in 1864, and archbishop of Toledo in 1875. He was the first among Spanish bishops to publish the encyclical Quanta Cura and the Syllabus of Errors. Moreno was a stanch opponent of the Spanish governmental restrictions on the Church and religious orders. He took part in VATICAN COUNCIL I, where he defended the dogma of papal infallibility. Moreno was made a cardinal by Pope Pius IX in 1869.

MORENO Y DÍAZ, EZEQUIEL, ST.

Augustinian Recollect priest, missionary, bishop of Pasto (Colombia); b. April 9, 1848, Alfaro, Logroño, Spain; d. August 19, 1906, Monteagudo Monastery, Navarra, Spain. Ezequiel, the son of Felix Moreno and Josefa Díaz, joined the Augustinian Recollects at Monteagudo Monastery (Sept. 21, 1864) and pronounced his vows at Marcilla Monastery the following year. He was sent to the Philippine missions (1870), where he was ordained in Manila in 1871. After evangelizing the Philippines for fifteen years, he returned to Monteagudo to serve as prior and form future missionaries. In 1888, he travelled to Candelaria, Colombia to reorganize the Augustinian Recollects there. His success in reinvigorating the faithful of the region led to his appointment as the first vicar apostolic of Casanare, and in 1895 Moreno was consecrated bishop of Pasto in southern Colombia, where he actively defended the rights of the Church. After developing cancer, he returned to Spain in 1906 where he retired to Monteagudo Monastery to die. Pope Paul VI beatified Bishop Moreno, Nov. 1, 1975, and Pope John Paul II canonized him in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, Oct. 11, 1992. Patron of cancer victims.

MORERUELA, ABBEY OF

Former monastery in Zamora province, Spain. It was originally founded at the end of the 9th century by (SS.) FROILÁN and ATTILANUS with 200 monks and dedicated to St. James, but it suffered from the raids of the Muslim al-Mansūr (978-1002) and was in ruins in 1143 when Alfonso VII of Castile gave it to two monks, probably Benedictines. The CISTERCIAN reform was introduced from CLAIRVAUX before 1158. For many years the abbey flourished, governing towns and founding other Cistercian houses in Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Sicily. It was head of the MILITARY ORDER of Trujillo, which later joined the KNIGHTS OF ALCÁNTARA. It belonged to the Congregation of Castile of Martin de Vargas from 1494 until suppressed in 1835. Moreruela is important in the history of Spanish Gothic architecture. Its large 12th-century church (now a parish church) has elements that seem to be neo-Visigothic or Mozarabic. Relics of a frieze with a braided design, marble jalousies, and volutes with a plant motif have also been preserved.

MORFI, JUAN AGUSTÍN DE

Franciscan chronicler; b. Asturias, Spain, exact place and date unknown; d. Mexico City, Oct. 20, 1783. He arrived in New Spain as a layman c. 1756. He made his profession in the Franciscan province of the Holy Ghost on May 3, 1761. Morfi was a great orator and noted teacher of oratory and of theology. He wrote the unpublished "Tractatus de Fide, Spe et Charitate" in 1766 and Diálogos Sobre la elocuencia (Madrid 1795). Against his will and only under obedience, he accompanied Teodoro de la Croix on his expedition to Coahuila, Texas, and New Mexico. On the trip he assembled a large amount of geographical, historical, and ethnographic information, which he included in Descripción del Presidio de San Juan Bautista del Río Grande, dated Jan. 23, 1778, but not published until 1950. Morfi elaborated on that manuscript in Viaje de Indios y Diario del Nuevo México (Mexico City 1935), which he finished about April 1778. He also wrote Memorias para la Historia de Texas and Historia de Texas, which are frequently confused by historiographers. The Memorias has been known since the end of the eighteenth century, and four manuscript copies are extant. The Historia, which Morfi did not finish, was found in the twentieth century, translated into English, and published as History of Texas 1673–1779 (Albuquerque 1935) by the Quivira Society. Morfi was one of the most vigorous religious writers of the eighteenth century in New Spain.

MORGAN, PHILIP

Bishop, lawyer, civil servant; b. Saint Davids Diocese, Wales; d. Hatfield, Hertfordshire, Oct. 25, 1435. A doctor of both canon and civil law at Oxford (by 1404), Morgan was employed first as one of Archbishop Thomas ARUNDEL's legal staff, becoming auditor of causes in the court of Canterbury. Like a number of colleagues, he passed into royal service and obviously won a high reputation as a diplomat. Between 1414 and 1417 he served on embassies to Holland, Burgundy, France, Aragon, and Germany. He accompanied King Henry V on his invasion of France and was appointed chancellor of Normandy in 1418. From 1422 until his death Morgan was an assiduous member of the privy council in England under HENRY VI. Morgan became bishop of WORCESTER in 1419 by papal PROVISION. In 1424, despite the crown's assent, Pope Martin V ignored his election to the archbishopric of York, but in 1426 translated him to ELY. Despite his preoccupation with temporal affairs, as bishop Morgan won praise from the censorious Thomas Gascoigne for his measures to prevent benefices from being charged with pensions as the result of simonaical agreements [Loci e libro veritatum, ed. MORIARTY, PATRICK EUGENE Missionary, orator; b. Dublin, Ireland, July 4, 1805; d. Villanova, Pa., July 10, 1875. He was the fourth son among the eight children of Eugene Moriarty, a lawyer. He received his higher education at St. Patrick's College, Carlow, Ireland, where he came under the tutelage of the Irish patriot James W. DOYLE, OSA. After joining the Augustinian Order at Callan, Ireland, on May 14, 1822, Moriarty continued his studies in Rome at the monastery of St. Augustine. He was ordained in Rome, probably in 1828, returned to Dublin, spent a brief period in Portugal, and then went to India (1835-38), where he was vicargeneral in the Madras mission. After receiving Moriarty's report on the mission work in India, Pope Gregory XVI named him Master of Sacred Theology; henceforth he was known as Dr. Moriarty. In 1839 he came to the United States, where he remained for the rest of his life, with the exception of six years spent in Europe after the anti-Catholic riots of 1844 in Philadelphia. He became a U.S. citizen in 1854. In America he was in great demand as an effective and controversial orator on such subjects as temperance and nativism. He busily engaged in publishing articles, writing a life of St. Augustine (1872), organizing lay societies, collecting funds, and defending the Catholic faith and the Irish. Despite occasional conflict with his superiors, he advanced the work of the Augustinian Order, whose missions in the United States he headed as commissary general (1841–44, 1851–57, and 1866).

One of his most important contributions began with the purchase of the Rudolph estate outside Philadelphia in 1841. There he helped to lay the foundation for Villanova College (later Villanova University, Villanova, Pennsylvania), which became the center of Augustinian development in the United States. Moriarty spent his later years in relative quiet at the church he established in Chestnut Hill, Pennsylvania.

MORIMOND, ABBEY OF

Fourth daughter abbey of Cîteaux, founded 1115 in the Diocese of Langres, France, by Olderic of Aigremont in a place called Moiremont. Morimond (Latin Mori mundo, to die to the world) founded other abbeys in France and later in Germany, acquiring over 210 affiliated monasteries throughout Europe, especially in Germanic countries. In Spain, the abbot of Fitero founded the military order of CALATRAVA, which remained attached to Morimond. OTTO OF FREISING, son of Leopold III of Austria, entered Morimond, became its abbot in 1138, and was later named bishop of Freising. The abbey suffered much damage during the Thirty Years' War and the War of Lorraine. It was rebuilt in 1706. After the French Revolution, the buildings fell into ruin. Today there remain only the 15th-century exterior chapel and one of the portal gates, which dates from the 18th century. Excavations in 1954 and 1955 have allowed reconstruction of the plan of the church, which had a large chevet with a square ambulatory (see CISTERCIANS, ART AND ARCHITECTURE OF).

MORIN, GERMAIN

Benedictine theologian and scholar; b. Caen, France, Nov. 6, 1861; d. Orselina-Locarno, Switzerland, Feb. 12, 1946. He entered the Abbey of MAREDSOUS in 1881, was ordained in 1886, and devoted himself to research in hagiography, patrology, liturgy, theology, and the history of monasticism. In 1884 he helped to found the Revue bénédictine. In 1907 he moved to St. Boniface Abbey in Munich, where he remained except for the war years 1914 to 1918 and 1940 to 1945, when he took refuge in Fribourg, Switzerland. A prodigious scholar, severe in his critical judgment, he explored manuscripts in many libraries and made important discoveries concerning the authorship of texts. His critical edition of the works of St. CAESARIUS OF ARLES (2 v. Maredsous 1937-42) was epoch making and represents the fruit of 50 years of study. He discovered commentaries and sermons by St. Jerome, which he edited with other texts in Anecdota Maredsolana (3 v. 1893–1903). A major contribution was his edition of the sermons of St. Augustine discovered since the great Maurist edition and published as "S. Augustini sermones post Maurinos reperti," in Miscellanea Agostiniana (v. 1 Rome 1930). He was the first to identify a large number of these sermons as belonging to Augustine. This edition was probably the most significant single contribution to the fifteenth centenary celebration of Augustine's death. In Études, textes, découvertes (1913) he published other discoveries of importance to the history and literature of the Catholic Church in the first 12 centuries.

MORIN, JEAN

Oratorian theologian, and Orientalist, editor of the Samaritan Pentateuch; b. Blois, 1591; d. Paris, Feb. 28, 1659. He came from a Protestant family, studied at La Rochelle, then at Leyden (Holland). He returned to France, was converted, entered the Oratory (1618), and was ordained in 1619. After two studies on the history and the ancient discipline of the Church (1626, 1630), he concentrated on publishing, in the Paris Polyglot (1629-45), the volume containing the Samaritan Pentateuch, a manuscript of which had been brought to Paris by Achille de Harley de Sancy. This work occasioned other publications: the Exercitationes ecclesiasticae in utrumque Samaritanorum Pentateuchum . . . (1631) and the Exercitationes biblicae de hebraei graecique textus sinceritate. Pars prior. (1633). He published the Opuscula hebraeosamaritica in 1657. After his death, the Exercitationes of 1633 were reedited, and a second part was added (1660). In these works, Morin gathered together everything he could concerning the Samaritan texts and the language, and advanced the thesis that the Greek text of the Old Testament is preferable to the Hebrew, which he held to have been corrupted by the rabbis. It was a reaction, necessary perhaps, but exaggerated, against the then current ideas of J. Buxtorf, and others. In 1639, Morin, called to Rome to work on the reconciliation of the Oriental churches, became friendly with two Orientalists, Leon Allatius and L. Holsten. His interest in the Oriental churches was aroused and he undertook works that he continued after his return (1640). He published his Commentarius historicus de disciplina in administratione sacramenti paenitentiae in 1651. Then followed the Commentarius de sacris Ecclesiae ordinationibus in 1655. Morin prepared works on baptism and marriage, which he did not finish. A late publication, Opera posthuma, which appeared in 1703, contains only secondary works. The person and the work of Morin were generally admired, and he was acknowledged to be a man of prodigious erudition. In the biblical domain, even if his main thesis was debatable, the materials accumulated and the edition of the Samaritan Pentateuch are of great value. In positive theology, he gave new impetus to the study of the sacraments by publishing rare texts and by reevaluating the Oriental tradition.

MOROCCO, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

An independent constitutional monarchy in north-west Africa, the Kingdom of Morocco (Al Mamlakah al Maghribiyah) has coasts on the Mediterranean and the Atlantic. It is bordered on the north by Spain and the Mediterranean, on the east by Algeria, on the south by the Western Sahara territory and on the west by the North Atlantic. The region, which enjoys a Mediterranean climate at its coast, contains a mountainous northern coast and an interior that is frequented by earthquakes, falling thence to plateaus and coastal plains in the west. Natural resources include phosphates, iron ore, lead and manganese, while agricultural products consist of barley, wheat, citrus, olives and wine. Morocco has long benefited from its strategic position along the Strait of Gibraltar.

Under the control of France for many years, Morocco gained independence in 1956. Territorial disputes with Mauritania over the ownership of Western Sahara continued through the late 20th century, and despite the ruling of international courts remained unresolved into 2000. Political reforms in the 1990s led to a two-party legislature by 1997.

Early History. Due to its treacherous coastline, Morocco was not strongly influenced by either CARTHAGE or ROME. As Mauretania Tingitana in 42 A.D. it was detached from Mauretania Caesariensis and Sitifensis to the east. While early Christian and Roman traces are scant, it is known that St. MARCELLUS was martyred in Tangier in 298. At that same time, Diocletian abandoned all but the Tangier peninsula, which was attached to the diocese of Spain. The Arian VANDALS invaded from Spain in 429 and set up a kingdom in Carthage by 439. The Council of CARTHAGE (484) was attended by 50 or 60 Catholic bishops from west Algeria and Morocco; there were no Donatists in Mauretania Tingitana. The Vandals were overthrown by the Byzantine BELISARIUS c. 533. Latin inscriptions from the old Roman capital of Volubilis attest to Catholic life under Moorish rule during the early 7th century.

The VISIGOTHS held Tangier from 618 until the Arab conquest of 700, and the region may have been Visigothic lasting into the 10th century. The Idrisid dynasty (788–940) freed itself from the Muslim East, and Morocco became the heart of the Almoravid (1062–1147) and Almohad (1147–1269) empires, which included Muslim Spain. There were Christian soldiers, merchants and slaves in Morocco, and the Mozarabs deported from Granada to Fez had a bishop in 1137. In 1219 St. Francis sent his first missionaries to Morocco, who were martyred in Marrakech (1220) and Ceuta (1227). After the martyrdom of a Dominican bishop of Fez (1227–32), Pope Gregory IX named a Franciscan to the see in 1233 and wrote to the sultan inviting him to become a Christian. Although most of the Franciscan and Dominican bishops of this see resided in Spain after 1237, the orders continued missionary work among the Christians, even though they were handicapped by wars after 1300. Barbary pirates were replaced by the Portuguese, who took Ceuta (1415), Casablanca (1468), and Arzila and Tangier (1471). Ceuta and Tangier, both made archbishoprics, were united in 1570. The See of Fez-Marrakech was suppressed in 1566, but the See of Ceuta-Tangier lasted until 1851.

Spanish influence, which replaced Portuguese in 1580, and French since the protectorate was established in 1912, became the dominant European influences in Morocco. The Filali or Hassani dynasty replaced the Sa'adi (1524–1668). Universities were established in Fez (1859) and Rabat (1957). The apostolic prefecture of 1630 restored Franciscan missions in Meknes, Fez, Salé, Marrakech and Tetuán; the expulsion of 1790 left them in Tangier only. The prefecture was restored in 1859 and became a vicariate in 1908. In 1912, the Spanish and French Franciscans divided the vicariate according to the protectorates established, the French in 1923 forming the Vicariate of Rabat, which included nine-tenths of Morocco.

Following World War II, during which time Morocco was used as an Allied supply base, the sultan's requested for political autonomy was denied by the French government. The French finally recognized Moroccan independence in 1956 and Sultan Muḥammad V became king in 1957. During the same period Spain gave up most of their territorial claims in Morocco. In 1955, a year before Morocco gained independence, the hierarchy was established, and the vicariates of Rabat and Tangier became archbishoprics. The Benedictine monastery of Toumlilene near Azrou in the Atlas Mountains hosted international Catholic-Muslim conferences of considerable influence.

Hassan II succeeded to the throne in 1961 and attempted to establish a constitutional monarchy. After this proved unworkable, he suspended Parliament in late 1963, and ruled amid charges of corruption that surfaced during the 1970s. In March of 1972 a constitution was finally implemented, and was revised in September of 1996 to create a bicameral legislature. In July of 1999 Hassan II died and was succeeded by his eldest son, Muḥammad VI, as the 18th king in the Alawite dynasty. Islam was the official religion, although the constitution granted freedom of worship to other faiths.

During the late 20th century Morocco dedicated itself to asserting its territorial claim to the Western Sahara, an area rich in phosphates formerly held by Spain. A deal between Morocco, Spain and Mauritania for control of the region was repulsed by the guerilla Polisaro Front, a Saharan nationalist movement. While Mauritania withdrew its claim in 1978, Morocco continued to assert its claim for full control over the region, despite a ruling against it from an international court. Meanwhile, Hassan II attempted to aid in mediation efforts between Arabs and Israelis following the Arab-Israeli conflict of the mid-1960s, and in 1984 hosted a peace conference in Rabat that ultimately proved unsuccessful.

By 2000 there were 49 parishes tended by 15 secular and 45 religious priests, most of them located near Rabat and Casablanca. Religious included over ten brothers and 270 sisters, who administered the country's 29 primary and 24 secondary Catholic schools and tended to other humanitarian needs within a steadily declining Catholic population. Islam was taught in Morocco's public schools, and the government also subsidized some Jewish education. Tolerance among the faiths was also actively encouraged by the state, which sponsored a series of programs through the University of Rabat and Al Akhawayn University.

MORONE, GIOVANNI

Cardinal and diplomat, prominent in Catholic reform, president of the Council of Trent; b. Milan, Jan. 25, 1509; d. Rome, Dec. 1, 1580. As son of the Chancellor of Milan, Girolamo, he came in early contact with the court of Pope Clement VII, who appointed him bishop of Modena in 1529. In the following years he was strongly influenced by the spirituality of the reforming group around Reginald POLE, Marcantonio Flaminio, and Gasparo CONTARINI. Pope Paul III sent him as nuncio to Germany in 1536. While there he advocated discussions by Catholic (Johann FABER, Albert PIGGE, Johannes COCHLAEUS) and Protestant theologians as a preliminary step toward a general council. At the time of the Regensburg religious conference (1541), he was persuaded by the Cardinal Legate Contarini to adopt a conciliatory tone in his negotiation with the Protestants. In a lengthy memorandum submitted to the pope he related the failure of the conference and the largely negative experiences with the German episcopate. This led to a reform directed immediately from Rome. Morone himself brought the first Jesuits to Germany upon his return northward in 1542. As newly created cardinal he was sent as legate to the Council of TRENT, together with Cardinals Pole and Pietro Paolo Parisio in 1542. When the opening of the council was postponed, Paul entrusted him with the legation in Bologna (papal governor in the Romagna).

Little known but very important are Morone's activities regarding the reunion of the English Church. From 1553 to 1555, at the request of Julius III, he studied the problems related to the English mission of Cardinal Pole. He also paved the way for farseeing solutions in the matter of church lands and of the appointment of bishops. Upon insistence of Charles V and his brother Ferdinand he was sent as legate to the Imperial Diet at Augsburg in 1555. The new pope, Paul IV, did not renew the appointment, however, since he looked upon Morone and Pole as cryptoheretics. In 1556-57 Morone tried to mediate the conflict between the Curia and the House of Hapsburg, but on May 31, 1557, he was seized and imprisoned in the Castel Sant' Angelo on suspicion of heresy. After the pope's death he was immediately freed and fully reinstated. Pope Pius IV at once offered him the post of secretary of state and later, at the reopening of the Council of Trent, considered him his first choice for president of the council. Morone declined both offices. But when the conference had reached a severe crisis in the spring of 1563, he answered the pope's call to help save the work of the council. The great Catholic powers (Spain, France, the Empire) distrusted Rome's willingness to reform and, by following their own aims in Church policy, threatened the autonomy of the council. Again it was Morone who, in Trent as well as at the imperial court in Innsbruck, proved so convincingly the sentiment of the Curia for reform that a positive settlement of the work at Trent with the Catholic powers became possible.

Although repeatedly mentioned as papabile, he always failed to obtain the nomination in view of his record of accusation and imprisonment by the Inquisition. But stamped with the spiritualità of the early Italian reform groups, he never abandoned his innermost convictions. The unusual combination of political insight and deep religiosity made him one of the most striking figures of the post-Tridentine Curia. His concern about the English Catholics prompted him many times to warn against a break with Queen Elizabeth. In Rome he was the most zealous promoter and best judge of her interests. The main part of his work was always concerned with the situation of the Church in Germany: witness the founding of the Collegium Germanicum in Rome (1552), the establishment of a Congregation of Cardinals for Germany, his participation in the Imperial Diet at Regensburg (1576). At the time of the Turkish danger, East European problems occupied his mind. He was especially interested in Russian-Polish relations. The conclusion of the Lepanto League in the Roman conference of 1570-71 was to a large extent a result of his efforts. He succeeded in bringing about at least a temporary compromise between the offensive aims of Spain in the western Mediterranean and the Venetian problems in the eastern Mediterranean. The evidence of his manifold activities for the unity and the religious renewal of Christianity fills many volumes of the Vatican archives. A fitting biography is still lacking.

MORONI, GAETANO

Scholar; b. Rome, Oct. 17, 1802; d. Rome, Nov. 3, 1883. When Cardinal Cappellari was made the prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, Moroni, formerly a barber, became his chamberlain and was assigned to transcribe the register of documents in the Congregation's archives. In 1831 Cappellari became Pope GREGORY XVI and named Moroni his private chamberlain (primo aiutante di Camera). In this position he was entrusted with many delicate confidential assignments. This gave rise to the unfounded rumor that he was interfering unduly in papal policies. Moroni did, however, share all of the pope's unpopularity, because as a newspaperman of the papal court and Roman Curia, he became the object of much sectarian hatred. Moroni continued to hold the same office under Pope Pius IX, but he did not exercise any important duties. This allowed him to concentrate on his studies in ecclesiastical history. His fame is due to his 103-volume Dizionario di erudizione storico-ecclesiastica (1840-61), to which were added (1878-79) six volumes of indexes. This encyclopedia, on which the chiefly self-educated scholar worked indefatigably for more than half a century, brought together a considerable body of important information that remains today useful for its information concerning Church history; the liturgy; the pontifical court; the ceremonies, traditions, and organization of the Curia; the administration of the States of the Church; sacred art; and the lives of the saints, popes, cardinals, and bishops. Moroni gleaned data from several thousand published sources and from information obtained from scholars and specialists. He was best informed on Roman matters, above all for the period of Pope Gregory XVI. Despite its inaccuracies, repetitions, lack of homogeneity and prolixity, the Dizionario is still frequently consulted. Moroni also wrote many official articles on such topics as papal ceremonies and journeys of the popes. His reputation earned him membership in many Italian and foreign academies and several decorations.

MOROSINI

Noble Venetian family, probably of Hungarian extraction, whose members were often statesmen, generals, admirals, doges of Venice, and cardinals of the Church. Among the doges were Domenico (1148–56), who waged successful wars against the Dalmatian pirates; Marino (1249–53); Michele, descendant of Marino, who was doge from June 1382 until his death in October of the same year; and Francesco (1688–94), who was one of the most successful of the Venetian leaders in the fight against the OTTOMAN TURKS. Included in the list of prominent ecclesiastics would be Giovanni (10th century), and especially Tomaso. When members of the Fourth CRU-SADE (1202-04) captured CONSTANTINOPLE, the Venetians claimed three-eighths of the city, including Hagia Sophia, where Tomaso was installed as the first Latin patriarch (1205-11). Pietro, a law teacher at the University of Padua, was created cardinal in 1408; Gianfrancesco, a friend of Philip NERI, and a diplomat in the papal service, was made cardinal in 1588 (d. 1596). Still another member of the family, Andrea (d. 1618), was entrusted by the Venetian Senate with the task of continuing Paolo Paruta's Annali Veneti, a history of Venice.

MOROSINI, PIERINA, BL.

Also known as Petrina, virgin martyr, lay woman; b. Jan. 7, 1931, at Fiobbo di Albino (near Bergamo), Lombardy, Italy; d. there, April 4, 1957. Pierina was the eldest child in a large, poor, farm family. After completing grammar school, she learned tailoring and quickly found work in a textile factory in Albino. St. Maria GORETTI became a model for her life. Although Pierina's family obligations prevented her from becoming a missionary nun, she annually renewed her decision for celibacy as an oblation. Pierina sanctified her daily labors and participated in CATHOLIC ACTION, evangelization, parish activities, and daily Eucharist. She was attacked on her way home from work by a man who stoned her to death for refusing to comply with his wishes. She never regained consciousness and died two days later in hospital at the age of twenty-six. Her mortal remains rest in the place of her birth and death. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II, Oct. 4, 1987.

MORSE, HENRY, ST.

English Jesuit martyr; b. Brome, Suffolk, 1595; d. Tyburn, Feb. 1 (N.S.; Jan. 22, O.S.), 1645 (N.S.; 1644 O.S.). He studied law at Barnards Inn, London, was converted to Catholicism, and entered the English College at DOUAI, France, in 1614. He returned to England, was arrested, and after four years in a London prison, was released and banished. From Douai he went to the English College in Rome, where he was ordained. In 1624 he returned to Newcastle on Tyne in England, and in 1626, traveling by ship to enter the Jesuit novitiate in Watten, he was captured. He completed his novitiate under a fellow Jesuit prisoner during four years in a York prison. An exile again, he became chaplain to English troops in the Netherlands. In 1633 he was sent to London to minister to the poor during an epidemic of the plague, and he converted many families. He was arrested in 1638 and charged with having been ordained by authority of the See of Rome, contrary to the statute of 27 Elizabeth, and with having seduced His Majesty's subjects from their due faith and allegiance. Having been found guilty on the first count but not sentenced, he was kept in Newgate prison until released by Charles I at the instance of Queen Henrietta Maria. After further service as a military chaplain, he returned to Cumberland, England, during the Civil War. In August 1644, while answering a sick call, he was taken near Newcastle by Parliamentary soldiers and put aboard a ship bound for London. Although his non-Catholic brother Robert strove to save him, he was charged with having returned to England after conviction and reprieve seven years previously and was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. He was conveyed on a hurdle to Tyburn, where a great crowd, including Catholic foreign ambassadors, waited. After addressing the crowd, he received absolution from a priest and was executed. He was known under several aliases: Ward, Sheppard, and Claxton. Beatified by Pius XI in 1929, he is one of the 40 martyrs canonized by Paul VI in 1970. His diary is in the British Museum.

Feast: Feb. 1.

MORTAL SIN

Central to the Judeo-Christian understanding of covenant (and creation) has been the recognition of the possibility and the fact of man's rejection of the loving initiative of God. The story of the God-man relationship from creation to final fulfilment, both individually and collectively, has become the story of salvation, the progressive continuance of the divine initiative of love in seeking to overcome man's failure to respond. This failure to respond in love to God is what is called sin and appears in the Bible as action, state, and power. Christian tradition has tried to remain faithful to these biblical ideas in presenting and reflecting on the saving message and power of Jesus Christ through the centuries.

While sin has been seen as a power in the world to which men are exposed, and by which they are influenced, this "original" sin has been sharply distinguished from "personal" sin. Personal sin confirms the original power of sin in the world and draws the person into the specific rejection of God which is at the heart of all moral evil. Thus personal sin is attributable to the individual who knowingly and freely effects his own rejection of God. Knowledge of what he is doing and freedom to do it become the analytic description of the personal character of sin as it comes from the heart of man (Mk 7; Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae 74, 75). Diminution or elimination of such knowledge or freedom clearly diminish or eliminate personal responsibility for sin.

In the New Testament the religious character of sin as rejection of God is clearly implied. This notion has prevailed in the Christian tradition even though it was somewhat blurred in the later manuals of moral theology because of their unduly legal interpretations of Augustine's definition of sin as any word, deed, or desire contrary to the eternal law (C. Faust. 1.22, 27; Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae 71.6).

Rejection of God. Thus the explicit or implicit rejection of God as the supreme good for man is the genuine Christian tradition of sin. As such it involves serious, indeed lethal consequences. Where the true notion of sin is realized and the rejection of God complete, the true life which the love of God bestows is lost; and should one persevere in this state into death, it is lost forever. Sin in its proper sense is mortal.

Yet the New Testament and subsequent Christian tradition recognizes that even those who enjoy the love of God in Christ are sinners who must continually ask forgiveness (Mt 7.3 "speck" and "beam"; Mt 7.12 "Our Father"; 1 Jn 1.8; Jas 3.2). The Fathers of the Church and the practice of Penance confirm this distinction between sins that reject God and exclude from the Kingdom (Gal 5, 19 ff; I Cor 5.9), and the slight almost inevitable sins of all Christians. The official teaching of the Church has developed and confirmed this (Council of Carthage 418 Dictionnaire de la Bible 228; Trent DB 1536; Pius V, C Bajum DB 1920).

The scholastics attempted a systematic exposition of this distinction between mortal (death-dealing) and venial sins. Aquinas insisted, in line with the tradition, that venial sins were called sins analogically; mortal sins were truly sins. Since then sins have been seen as venial either because of the imperfection of the act (lack of knowledge of consent) or the triviality of the matter involved. For mortal sin there must be full knowledge (awareness), full consent, and grave matter. Recent developments in psychology have alerted us to limitations on our knowledge (natural and real) and freedom that were hitherto barely suspected. Such developments do not exclude knowledge and freedom necessary to the traditional notion of mortal sin, although they make it less frequent.

Fundamental Option. The emergence of the idea of fundamental option or basic orientation helps us to understand how individual actions as expressions or modifications of the fundamental option may not easily reverse it in either CONVERSION or mortal sin. For the virtuous whose fundamental option is for God, and the good, evil actions will not easily overturn this option and when they do are more likely to be the critical completion of a process. Such critical actions alone should be classified as mortal sins, and the grave matter necessary for mortal sins is then related not to any arbitrary decisions of God or Church but to matters of such importance as are capable of involving the person at the core of his being. Only such fundamental decisions could overthrow a basically good orientation or confirm an evil one at a new level. In different areas of behavior and for different individuals, the threshold of this importance will vary, although the Christian and moral traditions provide clear indications in many areas of what the threshold is. Where that threshold is reached, the agent, because of lack of knowledge or freedom, may not become fully involved and mortal sin may not be committed. Where the threshold is not reached, the agent may choose to make this an issue of such importance that he becomes involved to the extent of mortal sin.

Given his historical condition, the human agent does not possess the fullness of his being at any historical moment and so cannot commit himself completely and irrevocably without the possibility of repentance in historical mortal sins. Irrevocable commitment occurs only at death, either with love or the final impenitence which is the real sin unto death.

MORTALIUM ANIMOS

Encyclical letter of Pope Pius XI published Jan. 6, 1928 [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 20 (1928) 5-16]. It was a solemn treatise on the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT as embodied in the LIFE AND WORK and FAITH AND ORDER Conferences. It was an explanation of Catholic nonparticipation in the Lausanne Conference of 1927. The pope forbade Catholic participation in a movement that he called "panchristian." The reasons were: the postulates of the union denied that the Church of Christ already visibly exists in the world and affirmed that it must be brought into existence; they implied that reunion can be achieved without unity of doctrine; they inferred that the Catholic Church is not the Church of Christ but one of many communities in His Church. These postulates involved RELATIVISM in doctrine, MODERNISM in theology, and INDIFFERENTISM in ecclesiology. Any meeting or association or movement based on such principles would contradict the entire faith of the Church, so that no Catholic could in logic take part in them. This encyclical was not well received by non-Catholics, but by its clear presentation of principles it served to pave the way for Catholic ecumenical activity in another generation. It was referred to in the instruction of the Holy Office of Dec. 20, 1949, on the ecumenical movement [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 42 (1950) 142-147].

MORTARA CASE

Edgar Mortara was born of Jewish parents in Bologna, Italy, Aug. 26, 1851. When he was one year old and seriously ill, the family maid surreptitiously baptized him. Six years later an uneasy conscience impelled her to report her action. When the matter came to the attention of the archbishop of Bologna (and presumably of Pope Pius IX), the Holy Office ordered Edgar removed from his family and given a Christian education. He was taken to Rome and became a ward of the pope, who thereafter manifested a tender solicitude toward him.

Mortara's parents made several unavailing attempts to recover him. As late as 1870, after Victor Emmanuel took Rome, they sought the aid of the new government, but found their son adamant in his Catholicism. He had entered the novitiate of the Canons Regular of the Lateran, taking Pius as his name in religion. He was ordained in 1873 and died in Bouhay, Belgium, March 11, 1940, having manifested throughout his priestly life great zeal for the conversion of his people.

The fruitless efforts of the Mortara family set off a violent international reaction. Initiated usually by indigenous Jewish communities, it took the form of mass meetings, petitions to governments, and excited discussions in the press. Non-Catholic opinion everywhere was indignant, while Catholic commentators strove, though not unanimously, to defend the removal. Protests were sent to the Vatican by Cavour, Napoleon III, and Franz Joseph. The pope's answer, when given, was always the same: "We can do nothing."

The Mortara case was the chief contributing factor in the formation of the Alliance Israélite Universelle (1860), for many years the foremost international Jewish organization devoted to the "defense of Jewish rights wheresoever attacked." Some historians also see the case as contributing to the downfall of the Papal States.

Catholic defenders of the action of the Holy Office based their arguments on the nature of Baptism, contending that the recipient becomes a child of the Church and incurs supernatural obligations; hence the Church's right to educate him. Canonical precedent for the action goes back to the 4th and 17th Councils of Toledo in the 7th century, which ruled that Hebrew children should be separated from their parents lest they follow them in error. These canons were accepted by Benedict XIV, promulgated in his letter Postremo Mense of 1747, and incorporated in the Canon Law in use in 1858.

The 1917 CIC makes no mention of this discipline, and recent theological opinion has not favored it. This became evident in discussions of the similar Finaly Case of 1950. Most theologians then argued that this discipline does not constitute a general law of the Church, that divine law does not abrogate natural law, and that recourse to the "secular arm" is neither a necessary nor a permanent part of the Church's mission to govern. All agreed that in extraordinary circumstances the salvific will of God may attain its ends without a Christian atmosphere or education.

MORTIFICATION

The deliberate restraint that one places on natural impulses in order to make them increasingly subject to sanctification through obedience to reason illumined by faith. Jesus Christ required such renunciation of anyone who wished to come after Him (Lk 9.29). And so mortification, or what St. Paul calls the crucifixion of the flesh with its vices and concupiscences (Gal 5.24), has become a distinguishing mark of those who are Christ's.

All theologians agree that mortification is necessary for salvation because man is so strongly inclined to evil by the threefold concupiscence of the world, the flesh, and the devil, which, if not resisted, must lead to grievous sin. One who wishes to save his soul must, at the very least, flee the proximate occasions of mortal sin. Of itself, such flight involves some mortification. In addition to these mortifications demanded by man's very condition, the Church, in view of the repeated insistence of the Gospels, imposes other restraints on the faithful. One example is the law of fast and abstinence. And those who, for one reason or other, are dispensed from such regulations, are advised of their duty to perform some mortification in their place.

Those who seek to advance in Christian perfection must mortify themselves more than ordinary believers are required to do. Christ made the bearing of a cross the price of being His close follower (Lk 14.33). Hence, from early Christian times, many embraced a life of mortification in imitation of the Lord. Those who achieve great sanctity are constantly moved to be like Him in His suffering. But because of the danger of self-deceit in assuming great mortifications, they are advised to submit all penances to the approval of a wise director.

MORTMAIN

A statutory provision in English law that prohibits the alienation of land to a religious or other body corporate. Mortmain first appears in English law in chapter 43 of the 1217 revision of MAGNA CARTA. The effect of this provision was to prohibit the transfer of land to religious houses and to forbid religious and other corporate bodies to accept any transfers of land without the license of the Crown and of the feudal lord from whom the land was held. In this way the Crown proposed to limit the amount of land falling into mortmain (literary a "dead hand," so called because land granted to religious houses could not be alienated). The principle was strengthened by further legislation in 1279 and 1290, which provided that land assigned in mortmain without royal license should be forfeit, and sought to give greater precision to the earlier enactment. In 1344 the penalties for contravention of the earlier statutes were extended; in 1391 exemptions from mortmain were granted to some corporate bodies, such as towns and guilds. Under Queen Mary mortmain was abolished for a short time, but under Elizabeth I the principle was reestablished, although further exemptions were authorized, and additional exemptions were granted in 1623, 1696, and 1736.

The modern law of mortmain is based upon the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, as amended in 1891 and 1892. These enactments maintain the principle of prohibiting the transfer of land to bodies corporate without the consent of the crown, but grant exemptions en bloc to many civic, commercial, educational, and charitable bodies.

MORTON, JOHN

Cardinal, archbishop; b. Bere Regis or Milborne S. Andrew, Dorset, 1420?; d. Knole manor, Kent, Oct. 12, 1500. He studied at Oxford, becoming a doctor of civil law, 1452. He became principal of Peckwater Inn, Oxford in 1453, the same year that he received the first of the numerous benefices he was to hold. Morton had already secured Archbishop Bourgchier of Canterbury as his patron and was soon appointed chancellor to Henry VI's son Edward, Prince of Wales, thus identifying himself with the Lancastrians. After the battle of Towton (1461) Morton was attained and went into exile with Queen Margaret and the young prince; but after the battle of Tewkesbury, when the Lancastrian cause seemed pointless (1471), he made his peace with King Edward IV, whom he subsequently served on many diplomatic missions and by whom he was well rewarded. From 1478 to 1479 he was made bishop of Ely. King Edward's successor, RICHARD III, arrested Morton (1483), but from prison he managed successful intrigue, escaping to Flanders and siding with Henry Tudor who, once he was settled on the throne as HENRY VII, laid a succession of honors on Morton, appointing him a member of the king's council and chancellor of England (1487-1500). Morton became archbishop of Canterbury in 1486 and a cardinal in 1493; he served as chancellor of both Oxford and Cambridge. King Henry's favor remained with him until his death. The picture of him as a harsh prelate, made traditional by Francis BACON, is less reliable than the sympathetic one given by Thomas MORE, who knew him.

MORTON, ROBERT, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Bawtry, Yorkshire, England; hanged in Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, Aug. 28, 1588 (date sometimes incorrectly given as Aug. 30). Morton, the son of Robert Morton and nephew of Dr. Nicholas Morton, studied for the priesthood at Rome and Rheims, where he was ordained in 1587. In accordance with 27 Eliz., c. 2, he was condemned at Newgate, Aug. 26, 1588, for being a priest. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.
